The hôtels of the new and secondary towns of the South, are often little better than those above described; but that of Macon formed an exception. This is a city rising only fifteen, and already numbering 8000 inhabitants; of whom 3000 are slaves and free coloured people. In the year before Mr. Buckingham visited Macon, its exports in cotton alone amounted to 5,000,000 dollars, and its imports to 4,000,000; the surplus, which is stated at about 2,000,000 dollars, being expended in buildings, railroads, and other improvements. This is a good rate of progress; and one which will inevitably bring silver forks, toilet tables, and everything needful in its train. As the place is comparatively new ground, and a promising field, we copy out a part of the account of the town:—

It is very agreeably and advantageously situated on the western bank of the river Ocmulgee, which joins the river Oconee, farther south, and their junction makes the river Alatamaha, on which the town and port of Darien is situated, within a few miles of the sea. This river, in its windings, goes over a space of 600 miles between Macon and Darien, a length equal to that of all England and Scotland united! yet Macon is very nearly in the middle of the State of Georgia, it being quite as far from it to the Tennessee river, which is its north-western boundary, as it is to the river St. Mary, or Cumberland Sound, which is its south-eastern boundary on the Atlantic. This extensive area has not more than 600,000 persons yet settled on it, according to the census of the last year, though its fertility and general resources would, no doubt, be sufficient to maintain in comfort, if not in affluence, the whole population of England; and this will, no doubt, be its ultimate destiny, when its forests are cleared, and all its agricultural, mineral and manufacturing resources are fully developed.

The plan of Macon, like that of nearly all the towns in the United States, is remarkably regular; the streets run at right angles with each other, and are from 100 to 120 feet in breadth. The houses are mostly of wood; many of these are spacious and elegant; and some of the private dwellings are of brick, well built, and in good taste. The public edifices are large, well proportioned, and indicative of a rising and prosperous city. . . .

A neat market-house, with open colonnade and tower, occupies the middle of the same street, and near this is the Railroad Bank, with a fine Doric portico of fluted pillars; while the new Presbyterian Church, with its square tower, completes a very interesting architectural group.

On the west of the town is a rising ground terminating in a hill, about a hundred feet in height, overlooking the town on the east, and having behind it on the west, a pretty valley, beyond which are clusters of villas and cottages, to which the wealthy inhabitants retire in the hot season to sleep, coming into the city for business only. On this hill are several private mansions, as large and as handsome as any of those which excited our admiration at New Bedford. On this elevation is now constructing, and nearly completed, an extensive pile for the Female College of Macon. This edifice, which is built of brick and stone, is sufficiently capacious to accomodate 200 boarders, and to educate 200 day-scholars besides; in addition to this, it has ample accommodation in rooms, for study, recitations, and every other requisite for pupils, with an excellent private dwelling for the master and teachers. Though the building is not yet finished, there are already 150 young ladies, from 10 to 18 years of age, receiving their education there; and the style of tuition, and range of subjects taught, are not inferior to those of any of the Female Academies of the north. I had an opportunity of conversing with the head master; and enjoyed the advantages of the services of the Latin, French, and Spanish teachers for my son; and they appeared to me to be quite as competent to the discharge of their duties, as those of the best schools of Europe.

In front of the College is a space of six acres of sloping land, which, as well as the site for the building, was the gift of a Methodist minister, who is also a merchant in Macon, and which it is intended to lay out as a Botanical Garden for the recreation and improvement of the students. Instruments are also providing for giving them instruction in chemistry, mineralogy, and astronomy, so that the course of education will be solid and useful, while languages, music, and drawing, will make it also ornamental. The whole will be extremely cheap; the English literary and scientific course, including the French language, being only 50 dollars per annum, or £10 sterling.

In this manner new cities start up in the wilderness. A chartered State Bank is made to contribute to the building of the College, as the price of its exclusive privileges. Like every American town, Macon has already a competent number of Voluntary places of worship, of the usual kinds—namely, Episcopalian, Presbyterian, Methodist, Baptist, and Universalist. Roman Catholic and Unitarian chapels, though generally found in the towns of the South, have not yet made their way here.

The Baptists are of an order new to us. They are named Hard-shelled; though hard-shelled Christians may, we fear, be found of all denominations. They seem to be what is termed Antinomians. Mr. Buckingham has probably received his account of them from their religious unfriends.

The Baptists are of the order called here "Hard-shelled Baptists," a phrase which was new to me; and which was given to them, as I understood, from their being so impenetrable to all influences of a benevolent kind, and so hostile to all the auxiliary aids of missions, tract societies, temperance societies, peace societies, sick-visiting societies, and other charitable and philanthropic associations; against all of which they are said to set their faces, and to denounce them as interfering with the free operation of the gospel, and substituting human machinery for apostolic preaching. They are accordingly given to the pleasures of the table without restraint; and one of their veteran preachers here is said to have declared from the pulpit that he would never submit to be deprived of his "worldly comforts" by the fanatics of modern times; and among those comforts he numbered his "honey-dram before breakfast" and his "mint julep or sling, when the weather required it."

"Well now," as the Yankees say, "but don't you regard your own creature-comforts pretty considerable yourself, Mr. B.?" as witness many pages of your book; only yours are not exactly of the same kind with those of the honey-dram preacher, or the smoker. We hear of a worse distinction between the Hard-shelled and the Evangelical Baptists than Teetotalism. At a place named Talbotton, in this district, there is a small chapel by the road-side, which, on a particular Sunday evening, was refused to the Orthodox Baptists by the Hard-shelled sect, though not otherwise occupied, and for this bad reason:—

A fact was mentioned to us here, as of recent occurrence, which will sufficiently show the necessity of more churches and more preachers, to correct the present state of things. In this quarter there are two descriptions of Baptists: the orthodox or evangelical, who are practically as well as theoretically pious, and disposed to assist in all benevolent undertakings; and the Antinomians, or, as they are here called, "hard-shelled" Baptists, who preach the doctrines of unconditional election and reprobation in their severest forms, and whose practice shows how little importance they attach to good works. In the neighbourhood of the road between Knoxville and Talbotton, was a small chapel, which belonged to the latter; and one of the preachers of the former wanted to occupy it on a Sabbath evening, when the others had no service, but it was refused. There was then a great question agitating the public mind here, whether Christianity should be preached to the slaves, and missionaries be permitted to go among them for this purpose or not. The evangelical Baptists desired this; but the "hard-shelled" order opposed it. In this they were supported by the majority of the whites here, who conceived that preaching to slaves would only make them more dissatisfied with their condition, and encourage them to rebel against their masters. The "hard-shelled" minister denounced missions and missionaries, from his pulpit, and was applauded and caressed by his hearers. The evangelical minister commended missions and missionaries, from such elevated stumps as he could find among the trees to preach from, and he was insulted and driven off the ground; since which the "hard-shelled" Baptists are said to have had everything their own way, in this quarter.

Young as the city of Macon is, there have already been several attempts made by the slaves to set it on fire. Incendiarism seems quite a common crime among the blacks. Three different times in the course of this summer, the hôtels at which Mr. Buckingham and his family were stopping, were set on fire by incendiaries; and one of these times the conflagration was attended with serious consequences. The fires were, in every case, known to be the work of slaves, either domestics of the house or of the guests; but all inquiry was prudently suppressed, as only tending to make things worse. On one of these occasions, Mr. Buckingham's trunks were only saved by the activity and zeal of his faithful Irish servant; though he lost a good deal of property which he considered valuable. The motive of the slaves to commit this fearful and common crime, is sometimes the hope of plunder, but much oftener revenge.

The settlers, or country people around Macon, are a very primitive and rude race. Their home-spun costume is that of the petty farmers in the remote parts of England and Wales, a century ago. But this does not appear to hold of the ladies. On the journey from Macon to Columbus, in Alabama, the stage-coach stopped at a cottage to take in a lady passenger:—

She was apparently about 14 or 15, and, like almost all the American females at that age, was remarkably pretty, with as much feminine delicacy as would be seen in the highest circles in England, though with less of polish or of grace. Though coming from so humble a dwelling, her apparel was of silk, while the gold rings on her white and taper fingers, and the green veil hanging from her Leghorn bonnet, showed that her hands had not been much inured to labour, or her complexion much exposed to the sun.

There is a great difference between the condition and appearance of young females in the humbler ranks of life in England and America. In the former, they labour to assist their parents, by which they get an air of roughness, and rude health, accompanied with a plainness of attire, such as is thought becoming in persons of inferior station. Here, except it be among the emigrants and first settlers, who are mostly foreigners, few females assist their mothers in household or any other duties. They are brought up to be waited on by a negro girl, who does all that is required; and every white woman's daughter, begins from the earliest years to think herself a lady. Fine dress and delicate appearance, with an imitation of genteel manners, are the business of her life, until she gets married, which is here often at 14 and 15; and then her utter inefficiency as a mother may be readily conceived.

There is hereabouts hardly a dwelling with females in it, in which there is not a pianoforte; all the girls being taught to play "a little;"—a very little. The picture of the settlers here, at their earlier stages, is not inviting:—

It is difficult for any one living in England to appreciate the difficulties, toils, and privations which a settler and his family have to undergo in clearing land, and surrounding themselves with even the barest necessaries. Every member of the family must work hard, from daylight to dark, the women as well as the men, and the children as well as the grown people. We saw many boys and girls, of not more than six or seven years of age, some using small axes, others carrying wood, and others assisting in domestic duties. In general they were very dirty in their persons, the mother being too weary to wash them; ragged, and ill-fitted in their clothes, there being no tailor or dressmaker to make them; and some of the boys especially reminded me of Cruikshank's ludicrous sketch of a "boy wearing out his father's garments," for many of them had the coats and hats of grown men, so that the former came down below their ankles, and the latter covered their eyes, and required constant lifting. They were all apparently unhealthy, parents and children looking pale and haggard, over-worked in body, and over-pressed with thought and anxiety in mind. What adds greatly to the disadvantage of their situation, is, that there are no schools, Sundays or weekdays, and very few places of worship; while dram-shops, under the name of confectionaries, exist in great numbers, where sweatmeats, cordials, and spirits are to be had so cheap, that the poison is abundant and the remedy scarce; so that the border population, surrounded by such circumstances, can hardly fail to be reckless and unprincipled.

The journey from Columbus to Montgomery proved tedious and fatiguing; but from the latter town the travellers were enabled to descend the Alabama river, by steam, to Mobile; going a distance of five hundred and eight miles in about forty-eight hours. The steamer does not set off until all the coaches from the East have arrived, and they are very irregular. Yet the wonder is not the irregularity of the conveyances, but the facilities for taking such journeys at all. The scenery on the Alabama is described as fine.

The steamer, the interior arrangements of which were comfortable, called at different places to take in bales of cotton for Mobile. Smoking, chewing tobacco, and spitting, flourished the whole way. The following are good specimens of the natives:—

Among the passengers was a planter from beyond the Mississippi, who evinced a great curiosity to become acquainted with us, as he stated that we were the first English persons he had ever yet seen. He seemed to be glad to find himself quite certain that he had now seen real people from the "Old Country," as he had passed his whole life in the interior, 200 miles beyond the great river, and would have something to say when he went back. Another of our passengers was a cotton planter, from the interior of Alabama, who was said to be worth 100,000 dollars, though his apparel certainly would not sell in any town of the United States, for five dollars. He was about seventy years of age, had lost one eye, had only three or four teeth left, a sunburnt and wrinkled countenance, like parchment, with white locks hanging over his shoulders, a pair of scarlet cotton trousers, crossed with bars of deep blue, snuff-brown cotton stockings, shoes without buckles or strings, a short buttonless waistcoat, no braces, a nondescript coat, between a jacket and a surtout, no neckcloth, and a low-crowned and broad-brimmed brown hat. He was of a merry disposition, and communicative as well as inquisitive. He was particularly impressed with the fresh and healthy appearance of myself and family, as contrasted with the generally pale complexions of his countrymen, and asked us if all the men, women, and children in England were as robust and rosy as we were. I told him that the greater number of those who lived temperately, and took a proper portion of exercise in the open air were so. . . . . He admitted that drinking, smoking, and chewing, were injurious, but thought it impossible to break the habit of either, when once contracted; and when I mentioned to him successful instances of abandoning them all, he seemed incredulous, and said he had never heard so much before. He thought it a great blessing that we had no negroes in England, as he believed they were enough to destroy any country. He was going down to Mobile, to receive money for cotton sold, and to make some purchases for his people; and when I said to him he would arrive in good time on Saturday night to go to church on the following morning, he said that he had never been in any church in all his life, and thought he was now too old to begin, though he had "heard a few preachings in the woods, but didn't much mind 'em."

Mobile, the principal town, and the port of the state of Alabama, has a population of 25,000, of whom the half are whites, and the remainder slaves, with some free coloured people. The manners of the better class of the inhabitants are nearly the same as those of the citizens of Charleston or Savannah; though the town seems as much to resemble New Orleans as the Atlantic towns of the South. Law is powerless at Mobile, and shocking outrages are frequent. The following sarcasm is fair:—

I had witnessed a Liverpool election for mayor, under the old suffrage of the freemen, and I had seen many other elections in England for members of parliament, in which drunkenness, riot, and disorder reigned; and I am bound to say that this municipal election for Mobile, was just as bad as any of them; worse would perhaps be impossible.

Mr. Buckingham was well received in Mobile, and his Lectures were numerously attended; so were they in New Orleans, in which city he remained for a month, and of which he has given the fullest account that has been published in any book of general travels. The party went by steam from Mobile to New Orleans, which thus picturesquely presented itself at dawn, as they advanced by the railroad cars, from the landing-place at Pontchartrain.

Going for about five miles over a perfect swamp or morass, through which the railroad ran, with impervious woods and thickets on either side, we reached, in half an hour, the outskirts of New Orleans. The avenue by which we entered the city was called Les Champs Elysées; and everything that caught our attention reminded us strongly of Paris. The lamps were hung from the centre of ropes passing across the streets, as in France women were seen walking abroad unbonneted, with gay aprons and caps; the names of all the streets and places we passed were French; the car-drivers, porters, and hackney-coachmen, spoke chiefly French; the shops signs, gateways, pavements, and passengers moving in the streets—all seemed so perfectly Parisian, that if a person could be transported here suddenly, without knowing the locality, it would be difficult for him to persuade himself that he was not in some city in France

After passing through the French quarter, we came to Canal Street, which divides it from the American and crossing this fine broad avenue, lined with trees on each side, the transition was as marked as between Calais and Dover.

His residence for a month in a hôtel in which there were about five hundred guests, gathered from all parts of the Union, enabled Mr. Buckingham to see a good deal of the American character. He was, besides, constantly in society; and a man who has bustled so much about the world, was sure, wherever he went, to meet with former acquaintances

From the account of this singular city we take the description of one of its most striking features:—

The most animated and bustling part of all the city is the Levée, or raised bank running along immediately in front of the river, and extending beyond the houses and streets, from 100 to 150 yards, for a length of at least three miles, from one end of the city to the other. Along the edge of this Levée, all the ships and vessels are anchored or moored in tiers of three or four deep. The largest and finest vessels are usually at the upper end of the city, near Lafayette, the steam-boats lie in the centre, and the smaller vessels and coasters occupy the bank at the lower end of the city. It may be doubted whether any river in the world can exhibit so magnificent a spectacle as the Mississippi in this respect. There are more ships in the Thames, but the largest and finest of these are usually in the various docks, while the smaller kind are chiefly seen without, and the Thames has not half the ample breadth and sweep of the Mississippi. There are as many vessels, perhaps, in the Mersey, but these are nearly all in dock, and the river is comparatively bare. The Tagus is a broader stream, but its shipping are neither so numerous nor so fine; and even New York, splendid as is the array of ships presented by her wharfs, is not so striking as New Orleans, where a greater number of large, handsome, and fine vessels seemed to me to line the magnificent curve of the Mississippi, than I had ever before seen in any one port. The reflection that these are all congregated here to receive and convey away to other lands the produce of such mighty streams as the Missouri and the Mississippi, the Ohio, the Tennessee, the Arkansa, and the Red River, including more than 20,000 miles of inland navigation, the sources of the principal streams being in the region of perpetual snows, and their outlet in the latitude of perpetual verdure, carries one's admiration to the verge of the sublime.

The Levée* itself, on the edge of which all these ships and vessels are anchored, is covered with bales of cotton and other merchandise; and in the busy season, such as that in which we were at New Orleans, in March and April, it is filled with buyers and sellers, from every part of the Union, and spectators from all parts of the world. There are no less than 1500 drays for the conveyance of this merchandise, licensed by the city; and they seem to be all in motion, flying to and fro on a brisk trot, whether laden or empty—the horses never walking, and the drivers never sitting, either on the shafts, or in the drays, as in Europe. The bales of cotton, on their arrival in the rafts or steam-boats, from the upper country, are carried off to the numerous establishments of steam-presses, where they are compressed into about half their original bulk, and repacked, in this reduced shape, for shipment to foreign ports. All this, with the arrival and departure every day of many hundreds of passengers up and down the river, from Cincinatti, Louisville, St Louis, and Pittsburg, to the Havannah, to New York, and to Texas, occasions such incessant bustle, that everybody and everything seems to be in perpetual motion.

The next scene is very characteristic of New Orleans. The locale is the splendid hôtel of St. Louis, where is the Exchange :—

In the outer hall, the meetings of the merchants take place in 'Change hours; and in the Rotunda, pictures are exhibited, and auctions are held for every description of goods. At the time of our visit, there were half a dozen auctioneers, each endeavouring to drown every voice but his own, and all straining their lungs, and distorting their countenances in a hideous manner. One was selling pictures, and dwelling on their merits; another was disposing of ground-lots in embryo cities, and expatiating on their capacities; and another was disposing of some slaves. These consisted of an unhappy negro family, who were all exposed to the hammer at the same time. Their good qualities were enumerated in English and in French, and their persons were carefully examined by intending purchasers, among whom they were ultimately disposed of, chiefly to Créole buyers; the husband at 750 dollars, the wife at 550, and the children at 220 each. The middle of the Rotunda was filled with casks, boxes, bales, and crates; and the negroes exposed for sale were put to stand on these, to be the better seen by persons attending the sale.

But public buildings, hôtels, churches, and Markets, are of less interest to those who are never to see them, than the varieties of the inhabitants of this strangely mixed city. Of these mingled tribes, those with whom we at home are least acquainted are the Creoles, who, out of the whole population of about 100,000, number 20,000. The Creoles are persons of pure race; born in Louisiana, but of French or Spanish ancestors; and still retaining, it would seem, many of the characteristics of their origin. They are almost all Roman Catholics; and they all speak the French language; though Mr. Buckingham ascribes to them much of the romance, generosity, and chivalrous bearing of Old Spain. They seem to be a people that will soon become secondary to the more energetic Anglo-American race :—

The men are generally small, and neither robust nor active, distinguished by no particular traits of character, except it be extreme sensitiveness on points of honour, and readiness to avenge an affront by appeal to arms; duels being much more frequent with them than even with the Americans, and almost always fought with swords till one or other of the combatants fall. There being no order of nobility or privileged class, and no great wealth possessed by individuals, there is a very general equality of condition among them; and though some few of the older inhabitants live on fixed incomes, derived from rents, investments in stocks and banks, and the labour of their slaves, yet by far the greatest number are engaged in business or professions, as merchants, shopkeepers, restaurateurs, and artisans, besides engaging in the liberal professions of medicine and the law. They are, in general, devoid of ambition, and deficient in energy, being content to live a quiet and an easy life, rather than incur the toil, anxiety, and wear and tear of body and mind, which they see the Americans endure to get rich. They are somewhat lax in their manners, which their religion and colonial origin may sufficiently account for; but they are upright in their dealings, faithful in all offices of trust, and remarkably docile and manageable with kindness in all subordinate offices, as clerks, assistants, &c.

The Créole women are not so pretty as the Americans, but their manners are more interesting. They are of the most delicate and graceful forms, with a roundness and beauty of shape, figure, and tournure, which contrasts very strikingly with the straitness and regularity of American female figures generally. Their complexions are like those of the women of Italy and the northern shores of the Mediterranean, approaching to brunette, of a rich marble-like smoothness, sometimes suffused with a glow of warmth indicative of the deepest feeling; large black eyes, full of langour and expression; jet-black hair, full, soft, and glossy; exquisite lips and teeth; and countenances beaming with amiability and tenderness. They combine, in short, the attractions of the women of Cadiz, Naples, and Marseilles; and notwithstanding the admiration they excite in strangers, they are said to make faithful as well as fond wives, and excellent mothers; except, indeed, that in this last capacity, their love for their children runs into such excess, as to cause them to be too indulgent to them, and thus to injure their future happiness by excessive kindness.

The Americans of New Orleans are said to be less keen in driving a bargain, and more profuse in their habits, than those of the North. In short, New Orleans is a place in which manners change not for the better, and morals relax with remarkable rapidity. There the young New-Englander soon becomes as dissipated as the Southern.

One of the female schools of New Orleans has an interesting history :—

There is one Protestant Female Academy recently established in New Orleans, the history of which is peculiarly interesting. A young American gentleman, of religious disposition, married the daughter of a Scotch merchant here; and after their marriage, which was one of pure affection, the father bestowed on his daughter a handsome fortune. Soon after their marriage-union, the young lady died; and as the husband had not married her for her wealth, he signified to the father that it was not his intention to use it, but caused it to be transferred back to her parents. This the father refused to accept, saying it was the husband's, by right of marriage, and should remain in his possession. The contest was at length ended by this honourable compromise. Neither would consent to accept the sum, which was considerable, amounting to 50,000 dollars. The young widower, therefore, purchased with it a piece of ground, built a Female Academy for the education of Protestant Young Ladies, endowed it with an annual income, and called it after the maiden name of his beloved and departed wife, "The M'Ghee Female Academy." I confess that I looked on this building with feelings of peculiar pleasure, and with great veneration for its amiable and pious founder.

* In a late newspaper, we regret to notice, that a considerable extent of the Levée has been destroyed by a landslip.—E. T. M.

The Scotch have thriven wonderfully in New Orleans. One Scotch settler named Henderson, said here to have once been a steward to the Duke of Gordon, left £50,000 for the support of an orphan asylum; and another named Milne, left 50,000 dollars to the same institution.

In New Orleans, Mr. Buckingham met with Mademoiselle or Signora America Vespucci, the magnificent beggar-woman, whom the ungallant Congress would have nothing to say to. He speaks of this new Corinne, in a strain of high-flown enthusiasm, which, contrasted with the cold caution of Mr. Combe, and the obduracy of the members of Congress, is somewhat diverting.

The party ascended the Mississippi, by steam, to Natchez, where Mr. Buckingham delivered his usual course of Lectures. Instead of going farther up the mighty river, and entering the Ohio, as he had proposed, he formed the determination of returning to Charleston by the route which he had already traversed, and thence to make an inland tour through the Carolinas, Georgia, Tennessee, and the back parts of Virginia. This was accomplished, and the narrative of the interior journey forms the most interesting part of the whole tour so far as it has yet been published.

It was now early summer, and the weather and scenery were delicious as the travellers proceeded by New Orleans, Mobile, and through the different places already described. The most remarkable event on the journey, was the danger Mr. Buckingham ran at Macon, of a "tarring and feathering," the usual punishment of the avowed, or even suspected Abolitionists. After remaining some time at Charleston, the party set forth on their tour through the Carolinas, Georgia, part of Tennessee, and finally Virginia. In those, and the other rambles recorded in the volumes, the remarks of Mr. Buckingham are rather corroborative of what has been observed by former travellers than strikingly original; though he contributes a liberal quota of new information.

The equality of rights in America seems, according to Mr. Buckingham's theory, to have produced a general uniformity even of stature among the citizens. There are no stately lords in contrast with stunted vassals.

The men are, in general, tall and slender. . . . . The arms are long, the legs small, the chest narrow, the form not so frequently erect, as slightly stooping, arising from carelessness of gait and hurry in walking; the head is small, but the features are long, the complexion pale, the eyes small and dark, the hair straight, the cheeks generally smooth, or without whiskers or beard, and the whole expression and deportment is grave and serious. The women of America are not so tall in stature as the women of Europe generally, being oftener below five feet four inches, than above it; of slender figure, without the fulness or rotundity and flowing lines of the Medicean statue, imperfect development of bust, small hands and feet, small and pretty features, pale complexions, dark eyes, a mincing gait, delicate health, and a grave rather than a gay or animated expression. If the men seem to be marked by a general uniformity of standard in personal appearance, the women are still more alike.

Mr. Buckingham adds his testimony to that of all travellers as to the beauty, or rather the prettiness of the women; though he denounces their thin, wiry voices, and drawling tones. Romantic love, the enthusiastic and impassioned devotion of Europe, is not more frequently found among the Anglo-Americans, than among the Aborigina race; and its absence is accounted for by the circumstances of a society, where there is no leisure for gallantry and the refined arts of courtship. Though the men of America are, in general, slender, very strong and very fat men are found in some localities. The robust Kentuckians have long been famed for height, strength, and bulk; but the farmers and yeomen of the interior parts of Georgia fully equal them.

Health, light labour, competency, content, and cheerfulness, are the probable agents in giving so remarkable a number of large, ruddy, and fat men to this section of the country, as I continually met with in my way. I heard, indeed, from others, that this was the case throughout the interior of the northern parts of Georgia; and I was assured that on a late occasion, in Sparta, near the capital of this State, a jury of twelve yeomen were so uniformly large, that they were weighed, as a matter of curiosity, and found to weigh thirty-six hundred weight, or, on the average, more than three hundred pounds for each person. In an amusing article in the Southern Whig of Athens, for July 5, published during our stay there, entitled "State Constitutions and Fat Men," it is alleged that the State Constitution for Florida was principally framed by "Jenckes, the fat man, of Florida, who weighed from 450 to 500 lbs.;" and the amended State Constitution of Georgia was chiefly carried by the influence of "Springer, the fat man of Georgia, who is fully as large as Jenckes." Dixon Lewis, the representative of Alabama, weighs nearly 600 lbs.

The inns in the interior parts of the southern States, and even those in places of considerable pretension, unite every kind of discomfort,—exorbitant charges too often included. At Sparta, in Georgia, one of the many Spartas, the new hôtel was not quite finished; but the national taste for show and finery was already conspicuous in all its appointments.

Though the rooms were small and mean, both in material and execution, the furniture was at once costly and tawdry; beautiful mahogany chairs, variegated marble tables, and rich mirrors, were seen in the same rooms with broken lamps, brass candlesticks, and common prints, in black frames, as pictures, such as might be had of hawkers and pedlars in England for a shilling a-piece. On what was called the ladies' drawing-room, though without a carpet, there was seen, on an Italian marble table, two gilded French lamps, a hair-brush "kept for the use of the company," and a dirty ivory small-tooth comb, for general use also, full of grease and hairs; yet the servant, a negress, when desired to remove it, said this was its proper place, as it was always left there with the brush for those who wanted it!

The Curraghee hôtel was not more inviting. The windows were without glass, and the greater part of the beds were placed in one large room, where all the male guests slept, two or three in a bed. The servant did his work with one hand, lighting himself by carrying a piece of pitch-pine in the other :—

If some operation required the use of both hands, his lighted torch was deposited erect in some part of the room where he could fix it, and his hand relieved. As an especial favour to us, who were declared to be "mighty particular," a candle was made while we waited for it, some threads of cotton serving for a wick, and this being enveloped in a mass of bees' wax, was brought to us quite hot from the melting. Washstands and looking-glasses were luxuries here unknown ; and the travellers whom we saw in the house appeared neither to undress, shave, or wash, but simply to lie down just as they alighted, from their horses or carriages, and rise up in the same manner. In our confined cell, there was not room for a single trunk, and the smallest cabin of a ship at sea, was more comfortable than this for sleeping.

We rested but little, therefore, during the night, and were stirring with the earliest dawn ; there was a common wash-basin of tin-plate placed in the veranda, with a piece of coarse yellow soap, and a rough rolling-towel hung on a roller, for general use. To this some of the inmates repaired in succession for washing, but the greater number came to the breakfast-table, as early as six o'clock, as dirty as they went to bed, and the whole scene and establishment seemed hardly a single remove beyond the rudest condition of the Indians which these settlers had displaced.

When the travellers reached Talbotton, they found the whole community in a state of excitement, from an occurrence which resembles, in character, a border bridal foray of past ages :—

It appears that there was a lady who had been settled for a few months as a teacher of music at Talbotton, but not having obtained many pupils, she had contracted more debts than she could pay, and went on to Columbus, to seek better fortune there. At this place, she wished to hire or rent a house, but the owner would not let it without some guarantee for the payment of the rent; and some resident of Talbotton became her security for this. As it was not paid, however, in due time, and as other debts were also unliquidated, the lady was arrested at Columbus by process of law. This the inhabitants of Talbotton chose to interpret as an insult to their town, from whence she had come; and accordingly, a large number of the young men of Talbotton mounted their horses, armed themselves with weapons, and rode off to Columbus, where they effected her release, and assumed such an attitude, that it was thought at one time nothing short of a civil war between the two towns must follow. It had gradually cooled down, however, into a state of peace; but no legal authorities interfered to stay the proceedings of these young cavaliers, who carried their point, and made what they called "public opinion" completely triumph over the laws.

This is Lynching of its own kind. Dancing, "promiscuous dancing," which was not tolerated by several denominations of dissenters in Great Britain so late as about fifty or fewer years ago, is still under the ban of the ministers in Georgia ; but they must submit. Temporizing and compromise are creeping in, and the matter will soon end in the good people of Augusta, the town referred to below, being, in this respect, as great sinners as their neighbours. The clergy have an instinct when to stand out, and when to give way. Church members in Augusta must not only not dance, but

It is deemed their duty not to countenance this amusement, even by their presence. No members of churches, as heads of families, therefore, ever give a party for dancing; and if any such exercise is enjoyed, it can only be by the unmarried. But of late, a curious evasion of this prohibition has been practised with success in this manner :—The family give what is called "a social party," to which a large number are invited to take tea, and spend the evening. When tea is over, some young lady places herself at the piano, and strikes up a quadrille. Presently a few couples rise, and speedily a "spontaneous and unpremeditated dance" is got up, and continued with great spirit till midnight. This point has been submitted, it is said, to the judgment of the clergy; who have decided, that if the carpets were taken up, and violins employed, and ball-dresses used, then it would be unequivocally "a dance," and, as such, clearly sinful. But the carpets being down, no music used but that of a pianoforte, and the ladies not in ball-costume, it could not be considered anything more than a "social party," and in this all might innocently join.

On the subject of religious revivals, also, we heard some curious particulars. There are fixed periods of the year in which these are regularly got up, in Georgia and the Carolinas, as in a prescribed circuit. The periods chosen are those in which there is the least business doing in the towns or on the plantations. The ministers, among whom those of the Methodist and Baptist persuasions take the lead, then organize the proceedings in such a manner as to produce considerable effect; and thus add every year to the number of their communicants. It is said that this is sometimes done in schools and colleges, where youths of nine to fifteen are so wrought upon as to proclaim themselves converts, and make public profession of a new birth; but it is doubted by the less zealous and enthusiastic, whether the instances in which these conversions are permanent are so numerous as those in which the parties fall off, and, by a reaction, oscillate to the opposite extreme of indifference, or something worse.

Mr. Buckingham witnessed some revivals. Of one at Athens, in Georgia, he observed nothing remarkable. It did not, in short, succeed, and a lady present told him,

That the ministers, who took a lead in this matter, were not good "Revivalists ;" that is, not skilled in the art of drawing forth the vehement expressions and passionate exclamations, the tremblings, and sobbings, and struggles, which a true revival requires. There were many, indeed, both male and female, among my informants, who thought this a failure, and attributed it to imperfect or unskilful organization :—the time of the year was thought to be too early ; the elders and members had not exerted themselves sufficiently in the private circles of their acquaintance, to bring in hearers ; the members were too few ; the preachers were too cold, and the spark could not be fanned into a blaze. Other similar meetings in the town during the last year, and at a later period, were referred to as "better managed," and therefore more successful. That of the Methodist church lasted eighteen successive days and nights, with singing, preaching, and prayer, three times each day, without intermission; and fifty new members were added to the church by open profession of religion. The Presbyterian revival was nearly as long, and quite as productive of converts. The pastors and the elders usually determine the period at which it is proper to begin the work of a revival ; and everything is duly arranged, prepared, and organized, to make it as effective as possible.

However free from objection was all I saw or heard at the meetings here, I was assured, by members of the church, and persons of undoubted piety and veracity, that such meetings elsewhere were not always so. One gentleman mentioned to me, that in the State of New York a meeting had been held for forty days and nights in succession, in imitation of the fasting and temptation of the Saviour ; and that he had attended several of its sittings. But though the quarantine was observed, as to the number of its days, there was nothing else in which the resemblance was complete. The ministers employed in this revival were very numerous, and many of them young and handsome men. When they saw a female under excitement, they would leave the desk beneath the pulpit, and go to her in the pew, take her by the hand, and squeeze it with ardour, look steadfastly in her eyes, stroke her on the neck, and head, and back, with the palm of the hand, give her spiritual consolation, and sometimes kneel down with her to pray on the same cushion. One of these was a married lady of great personal beauty, who was attending with her two daughters, but there was no husband or brother with them. The minister was so attracted by her beauty, and overwhelmed by her state of excitement, that after the prayer he placed his head beneath her bonnet, and attempted to "salute her with an holy kiss." She drew back, and refused his embrace. Her friend, my informant, saw this; and was in the act of rising to proclaim the offence, and to resent it on the spot; but the lady prudently prevented it, by a timely intimation with her hand, of her wish for him not to move or notice it; and assigned as her reason afterwards, that if made public at the time, it might have broken up the meeting, and brought a scandal on revivals generally, whereas this was but the offence of one man. The gentleman assured me, however, that this was not a solitary instance of such attempts, many of which were more successful, and that the moving of the ministers to and fro from pew to pew, their seizing the women by the hand, pressing and fondling various parts of their bodies, melting into tears with them, holding their hands together for a long period, and sometimes sustaining them in their arms from falling, were quite common.

By such means as these, many hundreds of converts were brought into the church, the chief portion of whom were females, some not more than seven or eight years old, but the greater number were between fifteen and twenty years of age. My informant further added, that not long after this, he was at Ballston Spa, near Saratoga, at which, towards the close of the gay season, there had been a Revival of more than usual intensity, both as to the time of its duration, and the fervour that existed through the whole period; and among the fruits of this excitement, he saw a public document in the hands of a legal gentleman, containing the affidavits of several young females, who had been prematurely made mothers of illegitimate children, some by clerical and some by lay-members of this great body of Revivalists! The churches of America, of course, no more approve of this, than do the churches of England the backslidings of her occasionally amatory preachers. There are, unhappily, wolves in sheep's clothing in all flocks; and "black sheep," as well as white, among the number.

It is quite true that Christianity should not be charged with the blame of these excesses; and equally true that its sincere and genuine disciples may preserve their integrity and chastity in the midst of such temptations. But that unprincipled men, and weak women, brought into close contact under such excitements as these, may and do create a great deal of suffering to themselves, and scandal and odium to the very cause of religion, no man can well doubt.

Mr. Buckingham, in short, is very doubtful about this kind of spiritual agency.

Our traveller repeatedly expresses surprise at the meekness, indifference, or insensibility, which the Americans display in the same circumstances which set an Englishman a-fretting and grumbling. At a watering-place in North Carolina, named Flat Rock, where fifty opulent persons of the best families in the State were residing for health or pleasure, the accommodation was, in every respect, of the most wretched kind. Mr. Buckingham has advanced, from "native authority," a theory for the ladies being so fond of gadding about, that they willingly submit to every inconvenience: this is, unhappy, or, at least, uncongenial marriages, which render every spot on earth more supportable than home. Or if not unhappy, yet listless and unoccupied, their idle life becomes a burthen; and thus, according to Mr. Buckingham,

They visit these springs and watering-places, where, as a gentleman truly observed to me, they do not "kill time," for that implies a battle with the enemy, or at least an active struggle, by energetic and lively amusement of some kind or other—but where they rather "lose time" in so complete a manner, by listlessness and trifling, that they are unable to give any account to themselves or others what has become of this, to them the most worthless of all possessions—since their great aim is to devise new modes to get rid of it.

This is miserable work, and much of it is to be attributed to the existence of slavery, the ill effects of which are visible in the domestic habits of all ranks. In North Carolina,—nor can the observation be limited to this State,——

In every farm-house you pass here, you see eight or ten lazy men and boys lounging idly in the veranda or piazza, in front of it, with their legs thrown up higher than their hips, their hats on, doing nothing, because the negro slaves can do the work; and what they do, though done badly, contents them. The white women are seen at the same time in groups of five or six at another part of the house, rocking in their chairs, with their loose cotton bonnets and deep hind-curtains hanging over their shoulders, wasting their time in the merest gossiping; their clothes dirty, their hair loose, and their whole persons most untidy; the children without shoes or stockings, filthy apparel, uncombed silvery hair, and unwashed pale faces; because the negresses do the household work, and look after the children; and what they do not do, is left undone, for the mothers seem to make no effort to assist them. The slave-system is, no doubt, one powerful cause of this general indolence and dirtiness of the whites, among the farmers and peasantry of the South; but we thought perpetually, that if an English farmer and his wife, with their sons and daughters, could be suddenly transported to some of these farm-houses, and told they were to be their homes, they would so change the face of things in a month, by their industry, cleanliness, and order, that the original occupants would hardly know them again in their improved dress; the English farm-houses, in general, being as superior to those of this part of America in cleanliness and comfort, as Mr. Baring's or Mr. Greig's beautiful dwellings are, to those of persons of similar wealth, but less love of order, and less taste, by whom they are surrounded.

The Mr. Baring referred to is a cousin of Lord Ashburton's. He has a pretty villa, or mansion, in this neighbourhood, of which the grounds are kept in trim order; though his English example seems to lead to no improvement among the slovenly natives. From Mr. Buckingham's work, many traits of manners, and various anecdotes, might be selected to show, that extreme niceness, or prudery, are no guarantee for real delicacy of mind and feeling, among the Americans, any more than among other folks; and also that long public prayers and graces are no proof of true religion. At the Warm Springs of Asheville, where, sometimes, so many as 500 visiters assemble, he saw, in the bar-room of the hôtel, persons Playing at cards at ten o'clock in the morning, surrounded by others who were drinking spirits and water, and betting on the game. In this respect, there is the same inconsistency observable in the American people as in their affectation of extraordinary delicacy; for while they make professions of great piety, have public prayers, and say long graces over their meals, they, at the same time, often indulge in practices that in most other countries would be thought wholly inconsistent with the profession of religion.

In the advertisements, to attract visiters to this place, it is first announced, that there will be Divine Service on every Sunday: and then, "Sportsmen" are informed, "that the race-course is the best in the State; and that horses will be in training for three months before the races commence. From a disgusting anecdote related, Mr. Buckingham draws the conclusion—

That though the Americans affect to be much more delicate in their horror of certain associations than the people of any other nation, and scrupulously avoid the utterance of certain words in common use in England in the best society, without the slightest idea of impurity being attached to them by us; yet that, in reality, the men, of the South especially, are more indelicate in their thoughts and tastes than any European people; and exhibit a disgusting mixture of prudery and licentiousness combined, which may be regarded as one of the effects of the system of Slavery, and the early familiarity with vicious intercourse, to which it invariably leads.

From among many Trollopian scenes we select the following, which occurred at Athens in Georgia, upon the occasion of the meeting of a Debating Club, consisting of the leading persons of the place:—

It was held in a spacious room over the Post-office, which served also for the reading-room of the club, and was amply supplied with newspapers from all parts of the Union. The meeting commenced at three o'clock, and continued till seven. The members in attendance were few, but they were all above forty years of age, and nearly all had titles, as general, colonel, major, &c. The appearance of the room when we entered it, was more like some of the scenes described by Mrs. Trollope in the West, than I had ever before seen. The floor was of newly-planed pine-wood, without mat or carpet, and it was covered with saliva and tobacco juice, from the chewers of the club, for whom no spitting-boxes appeared to have been provided, and, therefore, every minute at least, some member was seen and heard to project his contribution to the floor, which was spotted over like the leopard's skin.

The chair was taken by the President, a General, and the Secretary called the meeting to order, but this did not produce the least alteration in the aspect of the meeting. The few members who were scattered about the room, sat each after his own fashion. One gentleman placed his legs on the table, and exhibited the soles of his boots to the President. Another hung back in his chair, while it stood on its two hind legs only, with his feet placed on the upper front bar of the chair, in which attitude he rocked himself to and fro like a nurse hushing a baby to sleep, and everything was marked by the greatest indifference to decorum.

The question for debate was "Ought the State to have the right to educate the children of its citizens?" The first speaker was, by the rules of the club, the gentleman who placed the question on the books for discussion. He spoke for about an hour, in support of the affirmative of this question; and argued the case closely and well; but being a more than usually copious chewer of tobacco, he spit on the floor at the end of almost every sentence, rolling his quid from side to side in his mouth during the interval. Once, during his speech, he asked for a tumbler of water, which one of the members brought him from a wooden bucket, placed in the centre of the room, with a wooden ladle to drink and fill the glass with; and he then threw away his quid, stopped to rince out his mouth four or five times with the water, which he projected out of the window, near which he was speaking; he then took a fresh quid from a large black square mass of compactly pressed tobacco, which he carried in his waistcoat pocket, and resumed his discourse, spitting on the floor until a large pool had been formed before him; and at the close of his address, the rincing of the mouth, and the renewal of the quid, was repeated.

This gentleman, who we understood was a man of fortune and leisure, not engaged in any business or profession, was followed by three speakers in succession, who maintained the negative of the question; and, very much to my surprise, nearly the same arguments that are used against the adoption of any measures by the State for the promotion of general education in England, were repeated here. Each of these gentlemen spoke about half an hour, and delivered their sentiments with great force and in accurate language. They all copiously loaded the floor with tobacco-juice, so that the odour began to be extremely disagreeable, especially as the afternoon was warm; the thermometer being at 90° in the shade. The fifth speaker at length took up the affirmative of the proposition, as to the right and duty of the State to educate the children of its citizens, or, in other words, to provide funds, and establish a system of National Education, by which the children of all those who were either unable or unwilling to confer on them the advantage of primary instruction, at the expense of the State.

On the evening of the same day, Mr. Buckingham and his family attended a "very brilliant party," given by Dr. Church, the President of the University of this Athens, for there are many towns in the United States so named, to the principal families in the neighbourhood, and the senior students:

The party was very elegant, and highly intellectual. There were about 200 persons present, who remained together from eight o'clock till midnight. I do not remember ever to have seen a greater number of beautiful countenances than among the young ladies of this party; their ages ranging between fifteen and twenty. The style of beauty was like that of Charleston, Savannah, and New Orleans: small delicate figures, fair complexions, but not so deadly pallid as at the North; great symmetry of features, brilliant black eyes, finely-arched eyebrows, and full dark hair. The style of dress was not so stiff and formal as at the North, and more quiet, or less showy: white muslin being almost the only material of their robes, and pearls and white ribbons, with here and there a few delicate flowers, being the only ornaments seen. A young bride of fifteen, with her husband, were of the party, though their marriage had only taken place three days before; and many were surprised when I stated that English brides rarely mingled with large parties till a few weeks after their nuptials.

No doubt, many, or all of the squirting orators of the morning were present; and private parties never seem, in any degree, to arrest the perennial flow of tobacco-juice:—

Each young man carries in his waistcoat pocket, not in a box, but open, a flattened square mass of black compressed tobacco, like a piece of Indian rubber. From this he cuts off, from time to time, whether in the company of ladies or not, a large piece, and, taking the expended quid from his mouth, he flings it out of the window, or in any near corner, and replaces it by the new one, which he forthwith begins to roll about like any ruminating animal. Their practice is literally that of "chewing the cud," though they want the "dividing the hoof," to take them out of the class of "unclean beasts."

Once more, the traveller, who is as intolerant of tobacco, as of spirits or opium, raises his "counter blaste." But we have enough of it.

Mr. Buckingham has collected some of the peculiar phrases or idioms of the Americans; but we are now so familiar with "a pretty considerable fix"—a bad fix," "sun-up," and "sun-down," to "tote the plunder" of a passenger into his apartment, and so forth, that we prefer the following anecdote, which, in the revenge of the neglected young citizens, carries a deeper meaning than even the grand phrase used by the lady:—

Sometimes there is extreme reluctance to use particular words, because they are supposed to convey associations that ought to be avoided. For instance, I heard that on the night of the party given at the University, the president, Dr. Church, had received a slight injury in the head, by a stone being thrown in the direction where he stood, by one of the younger class of students who were dissatisfied with their not being included in the invitation, though it was never usual to extend it beyond the seniors. But the lady who mentioned this incident to me, said, "The little boy threw a rock at the president;" on which I expressed my surprise, thinking he must be an infant Hercules to hurl a rock; when she replied, "Oh! no, it was a very small rock, and therefore the injury was very slight." I found afterwards that it is thought indelicate to use the word stone; and that they say a house is built of rock, the streets are paved with rock, and the boys throw rocks at sparrows, and break windows by throwing rocks. To speak of the tail of a horse, or any other animal, is deemed most indelicate, and the words hip and thigh must not be mentioned. This fastidiousness is carried to such a length, as to lead to alterations in the prayers of the Episcopalian service, and even in the language of the Bible. The passage in the Litany, "When thou tookest upon thee to deliver man, thou didst not abhor the virgin's womb," is thought too shocking for the public ear; and the passage in which prayer is offered for "all women labouring with child," is also thought too gross to be uttered. In the mutilations of Scripture, these two cases were mentioned to me by a clergyman who had himself heard them. In the passage of Genesis, in which the curse is pronounced on the serpent, "On thy belly shalt thou go," the preacher read it, "On thy stomach shalt thou go;" and in the passage of the Evangelist, where the Saviour says to Peter, "Verily, before the cock shall crow, thou shalt deny me thrice," another preacher read it thus, "Before a certain fowl shall crow, thou shalt deny me thrice."

At their public celebrations the Americans are most gallant and ingenious in their toasts and sentiments. The following are happy specimens:—

"By Oliver P. Copeland.—The Ladies: The fairest part of God's creation—The mainspring that impels man to action: While our arms are able to bear arms, we will protect their charms."

"Woman, lovely Woman.—Ever useful and dear to us, whether in prosperity or in adversity. Without her, life would be insupportable."

"The Fair.—The beauty of a fine woman is the only tyranny to which a man should submit."

Sometimes, the ladies themselves send toasts, to be proposed by gentlemen present; and of these the two following will be regarded as curious, as well as the one by a bachelor which succeeds it.

"By a Lady.—Phrenology: May our children abound in bumps of discretion, and be free from all bumps of dissipation!"

"Sent by a Lady.—The Bachelor, 'solitary and alone in his glory.'"

"By an Expectant Bachelor.—Women and wine-presses: Sacred sources of sympathetic joy."

"By O. P. Copeland.—Success to Mulberryism, Silkism, and all other kinds of isms—except Abolitionism."

We have left ourselves little space to notice the specific facts illustrative of the teeming and complicated evils of Slavery, which Mr. Buckingham has diligently collected in the course of his travels. The arguments he held with the interested and prejudiced, always ended as might have been anticipated; but the reluctant admissions of those persons who acknowledged the evils of the system, while they were unable to devise any means of reformation, go in reality to the surrender of the entire question. In travelling from Charlotteville, in Virginia, to Richmond, the following conversation occurred:—

About five miles beyond this we passed the house and farm of Mr. W. C. Rives the Virginia senator. Nothing could be more slovenly than the state of the husbandry all along this road; and the neglected state of the farms gave evidence of great inferiority in their mode of management. We had with us in the coach a senator from Pennsylvania, who expatiated on the contrast presented by the appearance of the farms in his State; and I ventured to ask him what he considered to be the cause of so remarkable a difference in two districts or countries so nearly adjoining, with so great an equality of advantages in soil and climate. He replied, "There is no other intelligible cause for this difference, than that Pennsylvania is cultivated by freemen, and Virginia by slaves: the freemen have every motive to labour, because they enrich themselves by their toil, and enjoy what they produce; the slaves have every motive to be idle, because no toil enriches them, and nothing beyond bare subsistence ever rewards their exertions: therefore, the freemen do as much as possible, and the slaves do as little." He further expressed his belief, that there was many a farmer owning 500 acres in Pennsylvania, without a single slave, who was rich; while there were many planters in Virginia who were poor with 5000 acres, and as many slaves as were requisite to cultivate the whole; because the farmer of Pennsylvania, with such an estate, would lay by money every year, while the planter of Virginia, with so much ampler means, would get every year deeper and deeper into debt! Such is the difference in the results of freedom and slavery, according to the sober judgment of a native of the country. When I asked him, whether the Virginia planters were themselves aware of this difference, he replied, "The greater number of them undoubtedly are; but a spirit of false pride prevents them from acting on it." Many years ago, the Legislature of Virginia entertained the proposition of emancipating the slaves; and the public opinion of the majority of the State was in favour of such a step. Every one here, indeed, believes that if nothing had occurred to interrupt the progress of this sentiment, the abolition of slavery in this, and the adjoining State of Maryland, would have happened long ago. But they allege, that because the Abolitionists of the North wished to force them on faster than they chose to go, they would not move at all; and since these Abolitionists have increased their pressure, the slave-holders have actually receded backward, out of a sheer spirit of opposition, because they would not be driven even into the adoption of a measure which they approved. They seem, therefore, to be now in the position of a froward child, who takes delight in doing just the contrary of what he is desired to do—to show his independence.

It is remarked, that the democratic newspapers of the South, are uniformly those found the most violent against Abolition. To such a length does the tyranny of opinion go, that Mr. B. affirms:—

I feel assured that it would not be so dangerous for a man to preach the right of resistance to despotic authority in Petersburg or Vienna, to inveigh against Popery at Rome, or denounce Mohammedanism at Constantinople, as it would be for him to proclaim himself, either by his pen or by his tongue, an abolitionist in the slave-holding States south of the Potomac in America; and yet, to tell the Americans that they have neither freedom of the press nor freedom of speech, to the extent to which both are enjoyed in England, would greatly offend as well as surprise them, though nothing could be more true.

O'Connell is the object of the peculiar and violent hatred of the Slaveholders of the South.

Mr. Buckingham admits, that the condition of the domestic slaves in respectable or opulent families is, physically, exceedingly comfortable. The mere selfishness of their owners guarantees their comfort in food, dress, and appearance. As the influence of enlightened self-interest must ultimately be the main instrument in abolishing Slavery all over the world, arguments of the following kind cannot be made too familiar:—

Of the false economy of employing slave-labour in the ultivation of land, everything I heard and saw confirmed me in the opinion, that it was most injurious to he interests of the planters; and that none would benefit more by a system of free labour than the very landowners themselves. At present, if a planter wishes to purchase an estate for cultivation, he can get 1000 acres of land for 10,000 dollars; and if he could obtain free labour to till his fields, hiring it by the day, and paying for such labour as he required, and no more, 5000 dollars would be ample for a reserved capital by which to procure his seed, labour, and stock. But as he must, according to the present system, buy his slaves as well as his land, it will require at least 500 dollars, or £100 sterling, for each working negro that he may need; and supposing only 100 negroes to be purchased, this would require 50,000 dollars to be laid out in the purchase of prospective labour, paying for it before he receives the slightest benefit, and under all the risks of sickness, desertion, and death. In this manner, according to the statement of Mr. Clay, in his recent anti-abolition speech in Congress, there is locked up, of dead capital, in the purchase and cost of the negro slaves of the United States, the enormous sum of twelve hundred millions of dollars, or about two hundred and fifty millions sterling! Now, if slavery had never been permitted to exist here, and labour could have been hired by the day, or week, or year, as in other free countries, this enormous amount of capital would have been available to devote to other purposes; and the whole country would have been advanced at least a century beyond its present condition.

It may be quite true that the African race can alone sustain the exposure to heat and labour combined, which the cultivation of rice, sugar, and cotton demand; but it is at the same time as true, that their labour might be hired and paid for only as it was employed, instead of the ruinously improvident system of buying up all the labour of their lives, and paying for it beforehand; thus sinking an immense capital in the very country where capital is more valuable, because more productive of wealth, than in any other country that can be named. If a large manufacturer in England, when he had built his mill and fitted his machinery, were required to buy all his working hands at £100 each, and then maintain them all their lives, sick or well, aged or infirm, with the risk of loss by desertion or death, he would be less able to work his mill with £100,000, than he is now with £20,000; and consequently not half or a fourth of the mills now in operation could be established. If a shipowner, when he had built, equipped, and provisioned his ship for her voyage, had to buy up all his seamen at £100 a-head, and maintain them all their lives afterwards, it would require four times the capital that is now necessary to send a large ship to sea, and consequently fewer persons could equip vessels. Thus the manufacturing and the shipping interests would both be retarded in their progress by this improvident and heavy burden of paying for a life of labour in advance, instead of paying for it by the week or month, as its benefits were reaped by them.

Exactly the same effects are produced in retarding the prosperity of agriculture; and thus it is that the old slave-states of Virginia and Maryland are already exhausted. The Carolinas and Georgia are already partially so; and in process of time this will be the fate of Alabama, Mississippi, Kentucky, and the other slave-states; while those who employ the cheaper, more vigorous, and more productive element of free labour, will outstrip them in the race, from the mere advantage of a better system of industry. While I believe, therefore, that the condition of the slaves would be much improved by their being placed under the influence of those higher and better motives to labour which the enjoyment of the reward of their own toil can alone create, I also believe that the planters would all benefit by the substitution of free-labour for slave-labour, because the former is cheaper and more productive than the latter can ever be made. The slave-owners are indeed their own enemies in opposing or retarding the emancipation of their labourers.

Besides encouraging idleness, recklessness, and all manner of extravagance, among the whites, Mr. Buckingham justly imputes the arrogant and tyrannical temper of the gentlemen of the South to Slavery. From it arises—

The universal irritability of temper, impatience of contradiction, and constant readiness to avenge every imaginary insult with instant and deadly punishment of the offender. Hence the frequent affrays, duels, street-fights, shootings, stabbings, and assassinations, of which every part of the South, but more especially the newer States, is so full—producing, it is believed, five times as large a proportion of these crimes to the population, as is witnessed in the North, and ten times as large a proportion as is seen in any of the free countries of Europe. So long, indeed, as the slaves continue to increase in numbers beyond their masters, and coercive measures towards them may seem to be more necessary, because of such increase augmenting the danger of their revolt, so long the state of things will get worse; and as fear is a prolific source of cruelty, the very fears of the whites, which are continually increasing every year, will cause a greater exercise of tyranny than ever. How these fears ooze out in almost everything they say or do, may be seen by the following circumstance. The most religious and moral of the Southern population, have been long awakened to the cause of Temperance, and are very desirous of promoting it in this State, but as almost all the Temperance publications are issued in the North, they are literally afraid of their encouraging their circulation here, lest, by any oversight or inadvertence on the part of the editor, some paragraph favourable to Abolition should appear.

Many of the Americans have got it into their heads, that the English abolished Slavery in the West Indies merely to encourage the negroes of the South to revolt; and thus revenge England upon America for having "whipped" her! That slaves are the happiest of God's creatures is the constant assertion, in the face of all the floggings, sales, and runnings away that the newspapers daily set forth.

A citizen of Georgia has got a new key to the mystical Book of Revelations, and asserts, that the Beast, the Great Beast spoken of, means neither Catholics nor Protestants, but black niggers; and that there will be no hope for America, until the whole of the descendants of Ham are expelled!

In a large American war-ship, the Brandywine, which Mr. Buckingham examined at Norfolk, 40 of the crew of 470 were free negroes. He says:—

I was much struck with the fine, and even noble appearance of these men; their erect and muscular forms no longer crouching under the influence of forced servitude, nor their heads hung down under a consciousness of inferiority, but leading a free, bold, independent, and active life, their appearance partook of these new influences, and they were among the finest-looking men in the ship. In answer to my inquiries of the first-lieutenant, who had been upwards of thirty years in the service, I learnt that they received exactly the same bounty, the same wages, the same rations, and the same privileges as the whites; and that in their arrangements and classification for duty, as forecastle-men, top-men, waisters, and after-guard, no distinction was made between black and white, but each were mingled indiscriminately, and classed only by their relative degrees of seamanship. In this, he said, the blacks were not at all inferior to the whites, either in their skill, readiness, or courage. Nor did the white seamen evince the slightest reluctance to be associated with them on terms of the most perfect equality in the discharge of their duties, or make their colour a subject of antipathy or reproach. The cooks and stewards were chiefly coloured men, because they stand the heat better, and fall into these occupations more readily; and from the negro seamen, the launch for wooding and watering, and for anchor duty, was generally manned, because the African constitution could stand the heat of the sun, and the atmosphere of swamps and marshes, better than the American. In point of health, however, they were quite equal; and while the service was rendered more efficient by this arrangement, neither party objected to the classification. It was really to me a most agreeable sight to see forty or fifty of these fine athletic Africans holding up their heads like men, and looking as if conscious of their independence and equality, though at the same time respectful, obedient, and less frequently subjected to punishment for neglect of duty, than their white brethren.

One of the most amusing traits of the American general character, is the national vanity, or vainglory, which breaks out with great naïveté on the most trifling occasions. A Yankee hearing an account read of the part which Lord Brougham had taken in an important debate, remarked :—

"Well, then, I expect that this Lord Brougham comes the nearest to our Daniel Webster, of any man the English can produce." To which the others signified their assent; but no one seemed to think that he did more than approach him "at a considerable distance." One of the party, and in his general conversation an intelligent man, said that Henry Clay had electrified the English Members of Parliament when he spoke before them in the House of Commons; and that Daniel Webster, who was now gone to England, would astonish them still more, and give them a sample of what true American oratory really was. I asked when Mr. Clay had spoken in the English House of Commons, and was told that it was when he was resident as American minister in London. I assured them that on no occasion did foreign ministers or ambassadors appear in either House of Parliament in England as speakers; but the gentleman who made this assertion really believed that in his diplomatic capacity he had appeared before the House, and excited the astonishment and admiration he described! He still thought that an opportunity would be afforded to Daniel Webster to do the same. When they were informed, that among the Tory peers, Lord Lyndhurst was the most equal match for Lord Brougham, they felt this to be a confirmation of their confidence in their national superiority, as they claimed Lord Lyndhurst as an American, though they would rather have had him to be a Virginian than a Bostonian.

An Albany paper, speaking of Mr. Webster, while he was in England, after indulging in a lofty strain of panegyric, says :—

Such a man is a sublime spectacle, in these days of political corruption and misrule. But such is Daniel Webster. Unlike some of our foreign functionaries, he knows no difference among his countrymen, so far as they have merit to recommend them. He is alike beloved and respected by all; and be he at the table of the rich, or on the floor of the House of Lords, he is the attraction, the charm, and the admiration of all who behold him!

Mr. Buckingham confirms what all travellers allege of the overweening admiration of fashion, connexion, and wealth, displayed by the sturdy Republicans of America :—

The talk about "old families," and being "highly connected," and "moving in the first circles of society;" and the looking down with contempt upon "people whom nobody knows," or who are "not in society;" is nowhere carried to a greater extent than here; and the very children are found making these distinctions. This will account for the amazing eagerness with which the greater number of Americans who go to England and France, seek to be introduced at Court, and affect to be patronized and received by the nobility and fashionable world there. This has been carried to such an extent of late, as to have become the subject of just ridicule among themselves; and especially since the "Victoria fever," as it is popularly called, has prevailed so extensively in this country, where the name of Victoria has been appended to almost everything, from Mr. Sully's portrait of the Queen, down to the last new oyster-shop opened in New York.

Notwithstanding the strong prejudice of colour which exists throughout the breadth and length of the land, and especially in the North,—where free people of colour are, from their intelligence and wealth, becoming marked objects of envy and hate,—the few families who can claim any admixture of Indian blood, are as proud of the distinction, as if it were old Norman blood that flowed in their veins, and probably with as good cause for pride.

These extracts will sufficiently indicate the nature of this addition to Mr Buckingham's voluminous work, and the kind of entertainment which may be expected from it. Our own opinion of its merit may be significantly understood from the circumstance of our having spoken of the first three volumes merely in general terms of commendation; and regretting that we cannot afford more space to a fuller analysis of the portion of the work now before us.

TYTLER'S HISTORY OF SCOTLAND.*

THE history of Scotland, as an independent kingdom, properly terminates at the Union of the Crowns, by the accession of James VI. as the legitimate heir of the throne of England on the death of Elizabeth. To this natural close of our national annals, Mr. Tytler's work is hastening on; great events accumulating, and interest deepening, as the end draws nigh. Another volume will finish what is by far the most comprehensive and elaborate examination of the Scottish national annals which the world has yet received, independently of the literary merits of the work.

The preceding volume was devoted to those momentous transactions of which the consequences are developed in this new volume; to the rise and progress of the Reformation; the reign of Mary queen of Scots, with its romance, vicissitude, and disaster; and the Regency of Murray. The flight and imprisonment of Mary by her jealous and vindictive kinswoman, and the assassination of the Regent, were included in the seventh volume.

The new portion of the History opens with the Regency of Morton, a period which, notwithstanding the many bad points in the character of the Regent, was, from the vigour and energy of his government, one of prosperity to the country. Faction had exhausted itself in the tumultuary period of the civil war, and the dawn of a new order of things —the commencement of another epoch in the social progress of the nation was becoming visible. When Killigrew, the envoy of the English court, visited Scotland, after a short interval of quiet, he remarked in a letter to Burghley—

I see the noblemen's great credit decay in this country, and the barons, burrows, and such like, take more upon them; the ministers and religion increase, and the desire in them to prevent the practices of the Papists; the number of able men for service very great, and well furnished both on horse and foot; their navy so augmented, as it is a thing almost incredible.

This great change had taken place between the year 1567 and 1572; for while the hand of the rapacious Morton fell heavy on many individuals, yet trade and commerce, the great springs of national prosperity, escaped his grasp. Of this period Mr. Tytler remarks—

Notwithstanding the miseries of the civil war, the general prosperity of the country had been progressive. Commerce and trade had increased; and whilst the power of the high feudal lords was visibly on the decay, the middle classes had risen in importance; and the great body of the people, instructed in their political duties by the sermons of the clergy, and acquiring from the institution of parish schools a larger share of education and intelligence, began to appreciate their rights, and to feel their own strength.

Though many of the early acts of Morton's government showed great vigour, and were popular, he soon began to lay the foundation of his ultimate ruin, in his perilous attack upon the patrimony of the Kirk. It was much easier for the avaricious Regent to seize the revenues of the Church, and to fine the wealthy merchants and burgesses of the towns, than to induce Elizabeth to relax her purse-strings to his clamorous importunity, notwithstanding her desire to maintain her ascendency in Scotland, and her dread of the intrigues of France, and of the incessant plans and projects of the captive Queen.

It is already well known that Mr. Tytler's work owes much of its popularity, as well as value, to its singular richness in such original letters and documents as have hitherto lain dormant, or been quite overlooked, in the State-paper Office, and in other collections of manuscripts, though these constitute the very pith and marrow of authentic history. From those fresh sources we have the following portrait, drawn by Killigrew, in a letter to Walsingham, of James in his seventh year. It is the first that has been given of him at so tender an age. The child seems to have given more of promise than the man fulfilled :—

Since my last unto you, I have been at Stirling to visit the King in her Majesty's name, and met by the way the Countess of Mar coming to Edinburgh, to whom I did her Majesty's commendations.

The King seemed to be very glad to hear from her Majesty, and could use pretty speeches: as, how much he was bound unto her Majesty, yea, more than to his own mother. And at my departure, he prayed me to thank her Majesty for the good remembrance she had of him; and further desired me to make his hearty commendations unto her Majesty. His Grace is well grown, both in body and spirit, since I was last here. He speaketh the French tongue marvellous well; and that which seems strange to me, he was able extempore (which he did before me) to read a chapter of the Bible out of Latin into French, and out of French after into English, so well, as few men could have added anything to his translation. His schoolmasters, Mr. George Buchanan and Mr. Peter Young, rare men, caused me to appoint the King what chapter I would, and so did I, whereby I perceived it was not studied for. They also made his Highness dance before me, which he likewise did with a very good grace; a Prince sure of great hope, if God send him life.

Though the ostensible object of the English ambassador, at this period, was to form a league for the better security of both the kingdoms, and for the protection of the Protestant religion, an object as near and dear to Elizabeth was the getting quietly rid of her troublesome rival, Mary, no matter by what means, so that she herself escaped the odium of putting "a crowned Queen," her own near relation, to death. Morton had not been withheld from accomplishing this guilty project by any feeling of honour or pity; but he was resolved not to accept of the assassin's office without receiving the assassin's hire. That secret negotiations were several times entered into by Elizabeth, for giving up the unfortunate Queen to those previously pledged to murder her, is made abundantly evident in these pages, and was not wholly unknown; but Mr. Tytler has dragged forth from their obscurity, fresh and damning proofs of the cold-blooded and crafty policy of Elizabeth though some links still seem wanting in the chain. In the language of Elizabeth's diplomacy, the project for the murder of Mary, who was to be given up to her own subjects for this special purpose, is usually termed "the great matter." Often had Elizabeth and her counsellors been murderers in heart and intent before the final catastrophe. This new instance, brought forward by Mr. Tytler, is but one of many schemes, extending over many years :—

The Ambassador anxiously impressed upon Elizabeth and her ministers, that the Scots were no longer dependent upon England; and as to attempting to make any impression upon the Regent in "the great matter," which Leicester and Burghley were solicitous should be again secretly discussed, it seemed to him a vain idea at present. If Morton were to consent to put Mary to death on her delivery into his hands, it would only be, as he soon perceived, by the offer of a far higher bribe than Elizabeth was disposed to give; and by the settlement of large annuities on such of the nobles as were confidants to his cruel design. Killigrew was so assured of the backwardness of his royal mistress upon this point, and the determination of the Regent not to move without such inducement, that he begged to be allowed to return. "I see no cause," said he to Walsingham, "why I should remain here any longer; * * * especially if you resolve not upon the league, nor upon pensions, which is the surest ground I do see to build 'the great matter' upon, without which small assurance can be made. I pray God we prove not herein like those who refused the three volumes of Sibylla's prophecies, with the price which afterwards they were glad to give for one that was lost; for sure I left the market here better cheap than now I find it."

The Queen of England, however, was not to be so easily diverted from any object upon which she considered the safety of herself and her kingdom to depend, and she insisted that her Ambassador should remain and accompany the Regent in his Northern progress, upon which he was about to enter. "I think it not convenient," said Walsingham to him, in a letter of the 18th July, "that you be recalled till such time as you have advertised how you find the Regent affected touching

'the great matter' you had in commission to deal in; and therefore I think fit you accompany the Regent till you be revoked."

In the mean time, Elizabeth held a secret conference with Leicester, Burghley, and Walsingham, and appears to have herself suggested a new scheme for getting rid of Mary. It is unfortunately involved in much obscurity, owing to the letter in which it is alluded to being partly written in cipher; but it was disapproved of by Walsingham, apparently on the ground that it would be dangerous to send the Scottish Queen into Scotland, without an absolute certainty that she should be put to death.

The English Queen was evidently distracted between the fear of two dangers—one, the retaining Mary within her dominions, which experience had taught her was the cause of constant plots and practices against her; the other, the delivering her to the Scots, an expedient which, unless it were carried through in the way proposed by Burghley and Leicester, in 1572—that is, under a positive agreement that she should be put to death, was, as they justly thought, full of peril. Morton, however, although he had shown himself perfectly willing to receive Mary under this atrocious condition, continued firm in his resolution not to sell his services for mere words. He, too, insisted on certain terms; especially an advance in money, and pensions to his friends. But the Queen deemed his demands exorbitant; and, as was not unfrequent with her when pressed by a difficulty from which she saw no immediate escape, she dismissed the subject from her mind, and unwisely took refuge in delay. In this manner "the great matter" for the present was allowed to sleep; and Mary owed her life to the parsimony of Elizabeth, and the avarice of the Scottish Regent.

Even here, Elizabeth does not appear in so odious a light as when, after Mary had been tried and condemned, she shrank, with selfish cowardice, from carrying the sentence into execution, and eagerly instigated her own servants privately to murder the condemned Princess. Of the scenes behind the curtain, connected with the tragedy at Fotheringay, Mr. Tytler has given an account replete with dramatic interest, and one which must imprint an indelible stain on the memory of the English Queen, who, in heart and spirit, comes out, in the case of Mary, more black than some Princes whose reigns have been marked by more violent and atrocious crimes.

The Regent Morton's confiscations of the property of the Kirk, and attempts to establish the Episcopal form of religion, which, together with his violence and rapacity, led to the conspiracy which issued in his destruction, furnish matter for speculations which will, at the present moment, have an especial interest, at least with Scottish readers; though, when the wealth, intelligence, and numerical strength of the modern Dissenters of Scotland are taken into account, it would be a capital mistake to imagine the ministers of the Kirk, of this day, either so popular or powerful as their predecessors were in those times, and continued until much later days. The conspiracy or coalition of Argyle and Athole, which overthrew the power of the Regent, and emancipated the young King from one master only to place him under another, was welcome to the ministers, who, though suspicious of Athole as an avowed Catholic, were yet opposed to Morton, who had introduced Episcopacy, and crushed and pillaged their body. The complicated intrigues, plots and counterplots, and feuds, of this troubled period, are lucidly represented in the narrative, while tl secret springs of action are unveiled in its pr gress. But events so crowd upon each other, th we must be contented to notice only results, ar these briefly. Before the final overthrow of tl regent occurred, Lennox, the friend if not tl emissary of France, and the first favourite of king ever afterwards addicted to inordinate favou itism, had crept into the affections of the boyis James. The passage we select not so much for th events recorded, as a specimen of the narrativ style of the work.

The favour shown to Lennox, the friend c emissary of France, had exasperated and alienate Elizabeth, who had angrily withdrawn Sir Robe Bowes her ambassador to Scotland :—

This retirement of Bowes greatly strengthened D'Au bigny. The young King became more attached to th interests of France: he entered into communication wit his mother, the imprisoned Queen; and whilst the cour of Rome, Paris, and Madrid, united their endeavours t procure her liberty, Lennox persuaded James to secon their efforts, and to overwhelm their opponents by mighty stroke. This was the destruction of Morton, th bitterest enemy of the Scottish Queen, and whose recen intrigues with the English Ambassador had shown tha although his power was diminished, his will to wor their ruin was as active as before. Their plot again him, which had been in preparation for some time, wa now ripe for execution. . . . . .

For this purpose many things then assisted. Morto had quarrelled with the Kirk, and lost the confidence o its ministers; he was hated by the people for his avaric and severe exactions during his regency; and his stead adherence to England had made him odious to the friend of the imprisoned Queen, and the party of France. Len nox, therefore, had every hope of success; and to effe his purpose, he employed a man well calculated to cop with such an antagonist. This was James Stewar Captain of the Royal Guard, and second son of Lor Ochiltree, who had already risen into great favour wit the King, and was afterwards destined to act a noted par in the history of the country. Stewart had received learned education; and from the principles of his fathe and his near connexion with Knox, who had married h sister, was probably destined for the Church. But h daring and ambitious character threw him into activ life: he embraced the profession of arms, served as soldier of fortune in the wars of France and Swede visited Russia, and afterwards returned to his own cou try, where he soon won the confidence of the young Kin and the Duke of Lennox, by his noble presence and el gant accomplishments. Beneath these lighter attra tions, however, he concealed a mind utterly reckless an licentious in its principles, confident and courageous t excess, intolerant of the opinions of other men, and u scrupulous as to the means he adopted to raise himse into power.

To this man, then only beginning to develop the qualities, was committed the bold task of arraignin Morton; and to obtain complete proof of his guilt, it wa arranged that Sir James Balfour, who was believed t have in his possession the bond for Darnley's murde and who was himself a principal assassin, should con secretly from France, and exhibit this paper with Mo ton's signature attached to it.

In this last scene of his life, the ex-Regent exhibite the hereditary pride and courage of the house of Dou glas. He had been warned of the danger he in curred, and the storm which was about to burst over hi head, two days before, when hunting with the King But he derided it; and on the last of December, th day on which he fell into the toils, took his place, a usual, at the Council table, where the King presided After some unimportant business, the usher suddenl entered and declared that Captain James Stewart wa at the door, and earnestly craved an audience. The request was immediately granted ; and Stewart advancing to the table, fell on his knees, and instantly accused Morton of the King's murder. "My duty to your Highness," said he, addressing the King, "has brought me here to reveal a wickedness that has been too long obscured. It was that man (pointing to the Earl) now sitting at this table, a place he is unworthy to occupy, that conspired your royal father's death. Let him be committed for trial, and I shall make good my words."

Amidst the amazement and confusion occasioned by this sudden and bold impeachment, the only person unmoved was Morton himself. Rising from his seat, he cast a momentary and disdainful glance upon his accuser, and then firmly regarding the King, "I know not," he said, "by whom this informer has been set on, and it were easy for one of my rank to refuse all reply to so mean a person ; but I stand upon my innocence—I fear no trial. The rigour with which I have prosecuted all suspected of that murder is well known ; and when I have cleared myself, it will be for your Majesty to determine what they deserve who have sent this perjured tool of theirs to accuse me!" These bitter terms Stewart threw back upon the Earl with equal contempt and acrimony. "It is false, utterly false," he replied, "that any one has instigated me to make this accusation. A horror for the crime, and zeal for the safety of my Sovereign, have been my only counsellors ; and as to his pretended zeal against the guilty, let me ask him, where has he placed Archibald Douglas his cousin ? That most infamous of men, who was an actor in the tragedy, is now a Senator, promoted to the highest seat of justice, and suffered to pollute that tribunal before which he ought to have been arraigned as the murderer of his Prince."

This scene had begun calmly ; but as these last words were uttered, Stewart had sprung upon his feet, and Morton laid his hand upon his sword, when Lords Lindsay and Cathcart threw themselves between them, and prevented a personal encounter. The King then commanded both to be removed ; and, after a brief consultation, the Justice-clerk, who sat at the Council table, having declared that, on a charge of treason, the accused must instantly be warded, Morton was first shut up in the palace, and after one day's interval, committed to the castle of Edinburgh. Even there, however, he was not deemed secure from a rescue ; and his enemies were not contented till they had lodged him within the strong fortress of Dumbarton, of which Lennox, his great enemy, was governor.

On the same day that the ex-Regent was committed, the Council ordered his cousin, Archibald Douglas, to be seized ; and Hume of Manderston, with a party of horse, rode furiously all night to his castle of Morham : but Douglas had escaped, a few hours before, across the English Border, having received warning from his friend the Laird of Long-Niddry, who rode two horses to death in bringing him the news. Lennox and his faction, however, had made sure of their principal victim ; and all was now headlong haste to hurry on his trial, and have the tragedy completed, before any interruption could be made, or any succour arrive. Yet this was not easily accomplished. The story of his seizure had effectually roused Elizabeth. Randolph was despatched on the spur of the moment, to carry a violent remonstrance to the King ; and Lord Hunsdon, her cousin, a proud and fiery soldier, received orders to raise the power of the north, and lead an army into Scotland.

But we must hasten to the close of the scene. Elizabeth and her counsellors talked big and threatened, but did not proceed to decided action ; and the death of Morton was sealed. The open remonstrances of Randolph, and the secret intrigues of the English officials were alike inefficacious ; and the abortive conspiracy against Lennox only hastened the death of Morton, whose ruin was completed by Elizabeth coldly abandoning him, as soon as she lost the hope that he could longer be of use to her,—her undeviating policy.

His enemies were powerful and clamorous against him. Captain James Stewart, the accuser of the ex-Regent, had openly declared, if they by whom he had been urged to this daring enterprise, did not make an end of the old tyrant, he would soon make an end of them. The confession of Whittingham, and of Morton's confidential servants, had furnished his enemies with evidence sufficient to bring him to the scaffold ; and although Angus, Randolph, and Hunsdon still continued their plots, it was found impossible to carry them into execution. One by one the various Earls and Barons, whose assistance had been bought by Elizabeth, dropped off, and made their peace with the stronger party ; till at last Morton was left alone, and nothing remained to be done but to sacrifice the victim.

For this purpose, Stewart, his accuser, and Montrose, were commissioned to bring him from Dumbarton to the capital. In those dark days many prophetic warnings hung over ancient houses ; and among the rest, was one which predicted that the bloody heart, the emblem of the house of Douglas, would fall by Arran. This saying Morton affected to despise ; for the Earl of Arran was dead, and the Hamiltons, his enemies, in whose family this title was hereditary, were now banished and broken men. But Stewart, his implacable foe, had recently procured from the King the gift of the vacant earldom, though the news of his promotion had never reached the captive in his prison at Dumbarton. When Morton, therefore, read the name of Arran in the commission, he started, exclaiming, "Arran ! who is that ? the Earl of Arran is dead." "Not so," said the attendant ; that title is now held by Captain James Stewart." "And is it so ?" said he—the prediction flashing across his memory. "Then, indeed, all is over ; and I know what I must look for."

Yet, although hopeless as to the result, nothing could be more calm or undaunted than the temper in which he met it. During his long imprisonment, he had expressed contrition for his sinful courses ; deplored the many crimes into which ambition and the insatiable love of power had plunged him ; and sought for rest in the consolations of religion, and the constant study of the Holy Scriptures. At the same time, his preparations for the worst had not prevented him from taking as active a part against his enemies as his captivity would allow.

The trial of the ex-regent took place after he had suffered an imprisonment of five months. He denied that he had been implicated in the murder of Darnley ; but admitted that he previously knew that such an attempt was to be made ; and upon this confession he was found guilty. His last moments display much of the self-deceptive nature of a man, whose moral feelings, imperfectly educated, are farther depraved and warped by an evil course of life. When he was found guilty art and part of the murder of Darnley, it is said—

The Earl, who had maintained the greatest calmness and temper during the trial, became deeply agitated. "Art and part !" said he, with great vehemence, and striking the table repeatedly with a little baton or staff which he usually carried. "Art and part ! God knoweth the contrary." It is evident that he drew the distinction between an active contrivance and approval, and a passive knowledge and concealment of the plot for Darnley's assassination.

On the morning of the day on which he suffered, some of the leading ministers of the Kirk, with whom he had been much at variance on the subject of Episcopacy, breakfasted with him in the prison, and a long and interesting conference took place, of which the particulars have been preserved, in a narrative drawn up by those who were present. It is difficult for any one who reads this account, and who is acquainted with the dark and horrid crimes which stained the life of Morton, not to be painfully struck with the disproportion between his expressions of contrition, and his certain anticipations of immediate glory and felicity. The compunction for his many crimes—murder, tyranny, avarice, cruelty, lust, and all the sins which were the ministers of his exorbitant ambition and pride—is so slight, that we feel perplexed as to the sincerity of a repentance which seems to sit so easily. He speaks of the murder of Riccio, or as he terms it, "the slaughter of Davie," in which he acted so prominent a part, without an expression of regret; and appears to have lost almost every recollection of his former life, in his prospect of instant admission into the society of the blessed. Yet all may have been, nay, let us hope all was sincere; and whilst it is vain to speculate upon a state of mind known only to Him who sees the heart, allowance must be made for the character of an age familiar with blood; for the peculiar, and almost ultra-Calvinistic theology of the divines who ministered to him in his last moments; and the possibility of inaccuracy in the narrative itself, which was not read over to him before his death. In speaking of the assassination of the King, he distinctly repeated his admissions made at the trial; affirming that he, in common with many others, knew that Darnley was to be cut off, but did not dare to forewarn him; and adding, that the Queen was the contriver of the whole plot.

These conferences took place on the day in which he suffered; and his friends amongst the clergy had scarcely left him, when his keeper entered his room, and desired him to come forth to the scaffold. He appeared surprised, and observed, that having been so much troubled that day with worldly matters, he had hoped that one night at least would have been allowed him to have advised ripely with his God. "But, my Lord," said the keeper, "they will not wait, and all things are ready." "If it be so," answered he, "I praise God I am ready also;" and, after a short prayer, he passed down to the gate of the palace to go to the scaffold. Here another interruption took place; for Arran, his mortal enemy, was waiting on the steps, and requested him to tarry till his confession, which had been made to the ministers, had been written down, and brought to him for his signature. But this reimmersion into worldly affairs he entreated to be spared. "Bethink you, my Lord," said he, "that I have far other things now to advise upon. I am about to die: I must prepare for my God. Ask me not to write now; all these good men (pointing to the ministers) can testify what I have spoken in that matter." With this Arran professed himself satisfied; but his importunity was not at an end; for he added that Morton must be reconciled to him before he proceeded farther. To this the Earl willingly agreed; observing, that now was no time to reckon quarrels, and that he forgave him and all, as he himself hoped for forgiveness. He then proceeded to the scaffold, which he ascended with a firm step; and turning to the people, repeated, shortly, his confession of the foreknowledge of the King's murder, only suppressing the name of his near relative, Mr Archibald Douglas. He declared that he died in the profession of the gospel as it was at that day taught and established in Scotland; and exhorted the people, if they hoped for the favour of Heaven, to hold fast the same. Mr. James Lawson, one of the ministers, then prayed aloud; and, during this act of devotion, Morton, who had thrown himself, with his face on the ground, before the block on which he was to suffer, was observed to be deeply affected. In his agitation, his whole frame was convulsed with sighs and sobs bursting from his bosom; and his body rebounded from the earth on which he lay along. On rising up, however, his face was calm and cheerful; he shook his friends by the hand, bidding them farewell with many expressions of kindness; and having declined to have his hands bound, knelt down, and laid his neck upon the block. At this awful moment, Mr. James Lawson, stooping forward to his ear, read some verses from the Scripture, which Morton repeated with a firm voice. As he pronounced the words, "Lord Jesus, receive my spirit!" the axe descended, and the imperfect sentence died upon the lips, which quivered and were silent for ever. The execution took place about four o'clock on the evening of Friday the 2d of June. It was remarked that Fernyhirst, who was known to have been acquainted with the murder of the King, stood in a window opposite the scaffold. He was recognised by a conspicuous feature in his dress—his large ruffles; and seemed to take delight in the spectacle. The people also remarked that Lord Seton and his two sons had taken great care to secure a good view of all that passed, by pulling down a stair which would have intercepted their view of the scaffold.

We have had the less scruple in citing this long and striking passage, as the facts detailed so graphically are very little known, save to the few readers or porers over the historical antiquities of Scotland. The dying words of Morton bring another heavy proof against Queen Mary. With all his self-delusion, and desire to extenuate his own guilt, the false accusation of the captive Queen could not at such a moment serve him. His meditated crimes against her were then known only to himself, and to Elizabeth and her ministers.

French, or in other words, Popish influence revived with the death of Morton; and though Lennox had embraced the Protestant faith, he, with Arran, warmly supported the king's design with regard to Episcopacy, which the ministers of the Kirk regarded as a sort of bastard Popery. This was, in fact, their own project. Nor was this the worst. The king was now secretly intriguing with his mother; and the matter went so far that mass was to be restored under French influence. This much is necessary to be told, to introduce some extracts which have aptitude to the present state of things in Scotland, as well as intrinsic interest:—

Mr. John Durie, one of the ministers of Edinburgh, sounded a fearful note of alarm, in a sermon which he delivered in the High Church of the city. "The King," he said, "had been moved by certain courtiers, who now ruled all at their will, to send a private message to the King of France and the Duke of Guise, and to seek his mother's blessing. He knew this, he declared, from the very man who was employed in the message—George Douglas, Mary's sworn servant; and he painted in strong colours the deplorable effects which might be anticipated from such a coalition. It was proposed, in these dark counsels, that the King should resign the Crown to his mother, and she convey it again to him, with an assurance, that he should then be acknowledged as King by France, and by the powers of Europe, which, up to this time, had refused him the royal title. And what must inevitably follow from all this? If the transaction were completed, it would be argued, that the establishment of religion, and all other public transactions since the coronation, were null; that the King's friends were traitors, and their adversaries his only true subjects." After the sermon, a remarkable conference took place between the Earls of Argyle and Ruthven, and the ministers, Durie, Lawson, and Davison, in the Council-house. On being pressed as to the French intrigues, Argyle confessed that he had gone too far; but affirmed, that if he saw anything intended against religion, he would forsake his friends, and oppose it to his utmost. To Ruthven, Davison the minister of Libberton, in alluding to the murder of Riccio, used a still stronger argument—"If things," said he, "go forward as they are intended, your head, my Lord, will pay for Davie's slaughter. But Scottish nobles now are utterly unworthy of the place they hold: they would not, in other times, have suffered the King to lie alone at Dalkeith with a stranger, [Lennox,] whilst the whole realm is going to confusion ; and yet the matter (they significantly added) might be reformed well enough with quietness, if the noblemen would do their duty."

Nor were these warnings and denunciations confined to the nobility. The young King, when sitting in his private chamber in the Palace of Stirling, received an admonition quite as solemn as any delivered to his subjects. It was entered by Mr. John Davison, along with Duncanson, the royal chaplain, and Mr. Peter Young : and Davison, after pointing out the dreadful state of the country, exhorted him to put away those evil councillors who were so fast bringing ruin upon the commonweal, and his own soul. "My liege," said he, "at this present, there are three jewels in this realm precious to all good men—Religion, the Commonweal, and your Grace's person. Into what a horrible confusion the two first have entered, all men are witness ; but as to the third, your Grace hath need to beware, not only of the common hypocrites and flatterers, but more especially of two sorts of men. First ; such as opposed themselves to your Grace in your minority : whereby they have committed offences for which they must yet answer to the laws ; and, therefore, must needs fear the King. Remember the saying, 'Multis terribilis, caveto multos.' The second sort, are those who are conjured enemies to religion. If (he concluded) your Grace would call to you such godly men as I could name, they would soon show you whom they think to be included in these two ranks." It had been arranged beforehand, that should the young King exhibit any desire to profit by this counsel, Davison was to name the Lairds of Dun, Lundie, and Braid, with Mr. Robert Pont and Mr. James Lawson, two of the leading ministers ; but James, after hearing the exordium, and observing, hurriedly, that it was good counsel, started off from the subject, and broke up the interview. . . . . .

The Kirk at this time possessed, amongst its ministers, some men of distinguished learning, and of the greatest courage. Durie, Lawson, Craig, Lindsay, Andrew Melvil, Thomas Smeton, Pont, Davison, and many others, presided over its councils ; and formed a spiritual conclave which, in the infallibility they claimed, and the obedience they demanded, was a hierarchy in everything but the name. Eloquent, intrepid, and indefatigable, they had gained the affections of the lower classes of the people ; and were supported, also, by the increasing influence of the burghs and the commercial classes. Animated by such feelings, wielding such powers, and backed by such an influence, it was not to be expected that they would be easily put down. The great cause of Episcopacy, on the other hand, was supported by the young King, who was himself no contemptible theologian ; by the Duke of Lennox, the Earl of Arran, and a large portion of the old nobility.

While the ministers of the Kirk were in a high state of exasperation at the attempt made to install Montgomery in the Bishoprick of Glasgow, to which he had been appointed by the influence of Lennox, who was to pocket the greater part of the revenues of the See, a messenger arrived from the Duke of Guise, ostensibly with a present of horses for the young king, though it was suspected that he had a deeper errand. It was besides alleged that this Signor Paul had been one of the most active and remorseless murderers at the massacre of St. Bartholomew. It is not, therefore, wonderful that he was peculiarly obnoxious to the Protestant ministers. John Durie, mentioned above, instantly rode to Kinneil, now Arran's castle, to remonstrate with the king, who was then living there, and to dissuade him from receiving the envoy of the Guises :—

Meeting Signor Paul in the garden, the minister hastily drew his cap over his eyes, declaring he would not pollute them by looking on the devil's ambassador ; and, turning to the King, rebuked him sharply for receiving gifts from so odious a quarter. "Is it with the Guise," said he, "that your Grace will interchange presents—with that cruel murderer of the saints ? Beware my liege, I implore you, (he continued,) beware with whom you ally yourself in marriage ; and remember John Knox's last words unto your Highness—remember that good man's warning, that so long as you maintained God's holy Gospel, and kept your body unpolluted, you would prosper. Listen not, then, to those ambassadors of the devil, who are sent hither to allure you from your religion." To this indignant sally, James, overawed by the vehement tone of the remonstrant, quietly answered, "that his body was pure ; and that he would have no woman for his wife who did not fear God and love the Evangell."

From Kinneil, Durie returned to Edinburgh, where his zeal flamed up to the highest pitch ; and, transforming the pulpit, as was the practice of those times, into a political rostrum for the discussion of the measures of the Government, he exposed the intrigues of Lennox, the schemes of the Queen-mother, and the profligacy of the Court, in such cutting and indignant terms, that he was immediately summoned before the Council, and ordered to quit the city.

Lennox carried matters with a high hand against the Kirk ; but instead of intimidating, his rigorous proceedings only stimulated the ministers to bolder resistance, and even to retaliation. It must be acknowledged that the clergy then had somewhat stronger grounds of opposition than a "Strathbogie case." Mr. Tytler thus describes this singular epoch :—

The country, at this moment, must have presented an extraordinary picture : the pulpits rang with alternate strains of lamentation and defiance. Patrick Simpson, alluding to the fate of Durie, declared, that the principal link in the golden chain of the ministry was already broken. Davison, a firmer spirit, whose small figure and undaunted courage had procured him from Lennox the sobriquet of the "petit diable," exhorted his auditors to take courage, for God would dash the devil in his own devices ; and, on the 27th of June, an extraordinary Assembly of the Church was convened in the capital, to meet the crisis which, in the language of the times, threatened destruction to their Zion.

The proceedings were opened by a remarkable sermon, or lecture, which Andrew Melvil delivered from the pulpit of the New Kirk. He chose for its subject the 4th chapter of the first Epistle to Timothy ; and, in speaking of the fearful trials and heresies of the "latter days," inveighed, in no gentle terms, against the audacious proceedings of the Court. The weapon now raised against them, he described as the "bloody gully of absolute power." And whence, said he, "came this gully ? —From the Pope.—And against whom was it used ?—Against Christ himself : from whose divine head these daring and wicked men would fain pluck the crown, and from whose hands they would wrench the sceptre. These might be deemed strong expressions, he added, but did not every day verify his words, and give new ground for alarm ? Need he point out to them the King's intended demission of the crown to his mother ? Was not the palpable object of this scheme, which had been concocting these eight years past, the resumption of her lost power, and with it the reëstablishment of her idolatrous worship ? Who were its authors ? Beaton Bishop of Glasgow, and Lesly Bishop of Ross. And by what devices did this last-named prelate explain their intentions to the imprisoned Princess ? To the letters which he sent, he had added a painting of a Queen, with a little boy kneeling at her feet and imploring her blessing ; whilst she extended one hand to her son, and with the other pointed to his ancestors, as if she exhorted him to walk in their footsteps, and follow their faith.

At this Assembly, it was warmly debated whether Durie was bound to obey the sentence of banishment—a point upon which opinions were much divided. The Provost and Magistrates contended that they must execute the law which had pronounced the sentence, or become amenable to its penalties. One party of the ministers, taking a middle course, advised that two of their brethren, Mr. David Ferguson and Mr. Thomas Buchanan, should be sent to remonstrate with the King. But from this the fiery Davison loudly dissented. "Ye talk," said he, "of reponing John Durie. Will ye become suppliants for reinstating him whom the King had no power to displace; albeit, his foolish flock have yielded!" At this, Sir James Balfour started to his feet, and fixed his eyes sternly on the speaker. Balfour was notorious as one of the murderers of Darnley; yet, having been acquitted of that crime by a packed jury, he had resumed his functions as an elder of the Kirk. Such a man was not likely to overawe the bold minister; and he undauntedly continued. "Tell me what flesh may or can displace the great King's ambassador, so long as he keeps within the bounds of his commission!" Saying this, he left the Assembly in great heat, perceiving that the question would be carried against him, which accordingly happened; for, on the resumption of the debate, it was determined that Durie should submit, if the Magistrates, who belonged to his flock, insisted. They did so: and that very evening, he was charged not only to depart from the town, but not to reside within the freedom and bounds of the city. About nine o'clock the same night, he was seen taking his way through the principal street of the city, accompanied by two notaries, and a small band of his brethren; among whom were Lawson, Balcanquel, and Davison. On reaching the Market-cross, he directed the notaries to read a written protestation, which attested the sincerity of his life and doctrine; and declared, that although he obeyed the sentence of banishment, no mortal power should prevent him from preaching the Word. Upon this, placing a piece of money in the hands of the notaries, he took instruments, as it was termed; and, during the ceremony, Davison, who stood by his side, broke into threats and lamentation. "I too must take instruments," cried he; "and this, I protest, is the most sorrowful sight these eyes ever rested on: a shepherd removed by his own flock, to pleasure flesh and blood, and because he has spoken the truth. But plague, and fearful judgments, will yet light on the inventors." All this, however, passed away quietly, except on the part of the speakers; and the denunciations of the minister appear to have met with little sympathy. A shoemaker's wife in the crowd cried out, if any would cast stones at him, she would help. A bystander, also, was heard to whisper to his neighbour, looking with scorn on the two protesters, "If I durst, I would take instruments that ye are both knaves."

Mr. Tytler's authority for this is Calderwood's MS. History. This virago, who with her own party merits to rival the fame of Jenny Geddes, was named Urquhart. She had been "a sore troubler of the Kirk" in Morton's time.

While the conflict between the Kirk and the King, or rather Lennox, raged at the highest, the Gowrie Conspiracy, known in Scottish annals as the Raid of Ruthven, burst like a thunder-clap upon the nation, and was hailed by the ministers as a signal deliverance for the Kirk. The king was at length rescued from his evil counsellors, and in Protestant hands; and Mr. John Durie was brought back in triumph to the capital as the first-fruits of victory. Two thousand of the citizens walked in procession before him, singing the 124th Psalm; while Lennox, looking on from a high window, tore his beard for anger. The leaders of the Kirk were already in active communication with Gowrie, who if not immaculate either in principles or conduct, was in the meanwhile recommended to them by reasons of expediency. These scenes are all fresh in Mr. Tytler's pages.

In the midst of these events occurred the death of Buchanan, to whom one modern party will think that Mr. Tytler has done scanty justice, while another may allege that he has over-strained charity in judging of the most noted republican and leveller of an age which Buchanan's penetrating spirit had far outrun; both in speculating upon the principles of civil government, and on ecclesiastical affairs. Mr. Tytler's eloquent testimony to the great mental qualities of this eminent man, will, however, not affect the character which he has generally obtained for nice discrimination and dispassionate judgment:—

In the midst of the commotions which followed the Raid of Ruthven, occurred the death of Buchanan, a man justly entitled to the epithet great, if the true criteria of such a character are originality of genius, and the impression left by it upon his age. His intellect, naturally fearless and inquisitive, caught an early and eager hold of the principles of the Reformation; and having gone abroad, and fallen into the toils of the inquisition, persecution completed what nature had begun. In politics he was a republican; and his famous treatise "De Jure Regni apud Scotos," was the first work which boldly and eloquently advocated those principles of popular liberty, then almost new, and now so familiar to Europe. In religion he was at first a leveller, and with the keen and vindictive temper which distinguished him, exerted every effort to overthrow the Roman Catholic Church; but, in his later years, when the struggle took place between Episcopacy and Presbyterianism, his sentiments became more moderate or indifferent; and latterly he took no part in those busy intrigues of the Kirk and its supporters, which terminated in the Raid of Ruthven. Of his poetical works, so varied in style and so excellent in execution, it is difficult to speak too highly; for seldom did a finer and more impassioned vein of poetry flow through a Latinity that, without servile imitation, approached so near to the Augustan age. In his history of his native country he is great, but unequal: his was not the age of severe and critical investigation; the school in which he studied was that of Livy and the historians of ancient Rome, in which individuality and truth is often lost in the breadth and generality of its pictures. But in their excellencies, he has equalled and sometimes surpassed them. The calm flow of his narrative, his lucid arrangement, the strong sense, originality, and depth of his reflections, and the ease and vigour of his unshackled style, need not dread a comparison with the best authors of the ancient world. The point where he fails is that where they too are weakest—the cardinal virtue of truth. It is melancholy to find so much fable embalmed and made attractive in his earlier annals; and when he descends later, and writes as a contemporary, it is easy to detect that party spirit and unhappy obliquity of vision, which distorts or will not see the truth.

In an interesting letter quoted by the best of his biographers, and written not long before his death, he tells his friend, that having reached his seventy-fifth year, and struck upon that rock beyond which nothing remains for man but labour and sorrow, it was his only care to remove out of the world with as little noise as possible. With this view he abstracted himself from all public business; left the Court at Stirling, and retired to Edinburgh; where, on the 28th September, 1582, his wishes were almost too literally fulfilled: for amid the tumult and agitation which succeeded the Raid of Ruthven, his death took place in his 76th year, unnoticed, unrecorded, and accompanied by such destitution, that he left not enough to defray his funeral. He was buried at the public expense in the cemetery of the Grey Friars: but his country gave him no monument; and at this day the spot is unknown where rest the ashes of one of the greatest of her sons.

The arts of dissimulation, the political hypocrisy, which circumstances almost compelled James to adopt, even in childhood, and on which he came to take pride, while he dignified paltry deceit and gross insincerity by the gentle name of "Kingcraft," are more fully traced by Mr. Tytler in their minuter ramifications than by any previous Scottish historian. James made great progress in kingcraft while in the hands of Gowrie, and daily besieged by the Kirk ministers; who could not slip so favourable an occasion to mould the young monarch to their wishes. He pretended to be perfectly reconciled to the expulsion of his favourite, Lennox, who had repaired to the English court; but when it became a matter of debate whether an ambassador ought to be received from the French king,—"the bloody Tiger" and "Idolater,"—James demurred, and in one of the formal debates, then so much in vogue, fairly confuted the divines sent to instruct him in international law. James contended, that—

> Should an envoy come from the Pope, or even from the Turk, still he must receive him. This Lawson stoutly controverted; but the King not only maintained his point, but took occasion to blame the abuse with which this minister had assailed the French monarch. "As for that," said they, "the priests speak worse of your Grace in France, than we of the King of France in Scotland."—"And must ye imitate them in evil?" retorted James.—"Not in evil," was their answer, "but in liberty. It is as fair for us to speak the truth boldly, as they boldly speak lees [lies]; and if we were silent, the chronicles would speak and reprove it."—"Chronicles," said James, "ye write not histories, when ye preach." Upon which Davison whispered in Lawson's ear, that preachers had more authority to declare the truth in preaching, than any historiographer in the world. Gowrie then observed, that as hasty a riddance as might be, should be got of the French Ambassadors; and the ministers took their leave, but Davison lingered for a moment behind his brethren, craved a private word in the King's ear, and remonstrated sotto voce against his profane custom of swearing in the course of his argument. "Sir," said he, "I thought good to advertise you, but not before the rest, that ye swore and took God's name in vain too often in your speeches." James was nowise displeased with this honest freedom; but, accompanying the reverend monitor to the door of the Cabinet, put his hand lovingly upon his shoulder, expressed his thanks for the reproof, and, above all, lauded him for the unusually quiet manner in which it had been administered.
> No such reserve or delicacy, however, was shown by the ministers to the French Ambassadors; and Monsieur de Menainville—a man of great spirit—was compelled to vindicate their privileges in his first public audience. It had been debated by the Kirk, with a reference to their arrival, whether private masses should be permitted under any circumstances; and aware of this, he had scarcely risen from kissing the King's hand, when he put on his cap, and boldly claimed the privileges which belonged to his office. "I am come," said he, "from the most Christian King of France, my Sovereign, to offer all aid to the establishment of quietness; and being an Ambassador, and not a subject, I crave to be treated as such; and as I have food allotted for my body, so do I require to be allowed the food of my soul,—I mean the Mass; which if it is denied me, I may not stay and suffer a Christian Prince's authority and embassy to be violated in my person." This spirited address made much noise at the time; and drew from Mr. James Lawson, on the succeeding Sabbath, a counterblast of defiance, in which, seizing the opportunity of elucidating the mission of the King of Babylon, he "pointed out the French ambassage," and denounced Mons. de Menainville as the counterpart of the blasphemous and railing Rabshakeh. Nor was this all: the indignation of the Kirk was roused to a still higher pitch, when the King commanded the magistrates of the capital to give (as had been usual in such cases) a farewell banquet to De la Motte Fenelon. This Ambassador now proposed to return to France, leaving his colleague, Monsieur de Menainville, to watch over the interests of that kingdom in Scotland; and nothing could equal the abuse and opprobrious terms which were employed, to convince men of the horror of such a proposal. Even the sacred ornament of the Cross, which La Motte, who was a Knight of the Order of "Saint Esprit," wore upon his mantle, was described as the badge of Antichrist; and when the influence of the ministers was found insufficient to stay the feast, a solemn fast was proclaimed for the same day, to continue as long as the alleged profane entertainment was enacting. At this moment, the scene presented by the capital was extraordinary. On one side the King and his courtiers indulging in mirth and festive carousal; whilst, on the other, was heard the thunder of the Kirk, and its ministers "crying out all evil, slanderous, and injurious words that could be spoken against France;" and threatening with anathema and excommunication the citizens who had dared to countenance the unhallowed feast.

The pealing of the bells of St. George's, to summon Kirk-Defence meetings, or to hurl defiance at the Court of Session, is but child's-play to this. After the death of Lennox, which happened in France, and the emancipation of the king from the hands of Gowrie, James published a vindication of the memory of his favourite, who, he affirmed, had died steadfastly adhering to the reformed doctrines, which, after living for some time in Scotland, he had embraced. But the dying professions of Lennox did not satisfy the ministers; and the following graphic scene occurred in consequence of their unchristian aspersions of the king's favourite:—

> One of them affirmed that, as he thirsted for blood in his lifetime, so he died in blood: an allusion to the disease of which he was reported to have fallen the victim. This harsh attack upon his favourite justly and deeply offended the King; and Lawson, the author of the calumny, having been commanded to appear at Court, he, and a small company of his brother ministers, repaired to Dunfermline, and were carried into the presence chamber. Here, owing to the recent changes, they found themselves surrounded with the strange faces of a new Court. Soon after the King entered, and, whilst they rose and made their obeisance, James, to their astonishment, took not the slightest notice, but passing the throne, which all expected he was to occupy, sat down familiarly upon a little coffer, and "eyed them all marvellous gravely, and they him, for the space of a quarter of an hour; none speaking a word; to the admiration of all the beholders." The scene, intended to have been tragic and awful, was singularly comic; and this was increased when the monarch, without uttering a syllable, jumped up from his coffer, and, "glooming" upon them, walked out of the room. It was now difficult to say what should be done. The ministers had come with a determination to remonstrate with their sovereign against the recent changes; and he, it was evident, enraged at their late conduct, had resolved to dismiss them unheard; but, whilst they debated in perplexity, he relented in the Cabinet, to which he had retired, and called them in. Pont then said they had come to warn him against alterations. "I see none," quickly rejoined the King; "but there were some this time twelvemonth, (alluding to his seizure at Ruthven:) where were your warnings then?"—"Did we not admonish you at St. Johnston?" answered Pont. "And, were it not for our love to your Grace," interrupted Mr. David Ferguson, "could we not easily have found another place to have spoken our minds than here?" This allusion to their license in the pulpit made the King bite his lip; and the storm was about to break out, when the same speaker threw oil upon the waters, by casting in some merry speeches. His wit was of a homely and peculiar character. James, he said, ought to hear him, if any; for he had demitted the Crown in his favour. Was he not Ferguson, the son of Fergus the first Scottish King? and had he not cheerfully resigned his title to his Grace, as he was an honest man and had possession? "Well," said James, "no other King in Europe would have borne at your hands what I have." —"God forbid you should be like other European Kings!" was the reply; "what are they but murderers of the saints?—ye have had another sort of upbringing: but beware whom you choose to be about you; for, helpless as ye were in your cradle, you are in deeper danger now."—"I am a Catholic King," replied the monarch, "and may choose my own advisers." The word Catholic was more than some of the ministers could digest, and would have led to an angry altercation, had not Ferguson again adroitly allayed their excited feelings. "Yes, brethren," said he, turning to them, "he is a Catholic, that is, a universal King; and may choose his company as King David did, in the hundred and first psalm." This was a master-stroke; for the King had very recently translated this psalm into English metre, and Ferguson took occasion to commend his verses in the highest terms. They then again warned him against his present Councillors; and one of the ministers, stooping down, had the boldness to whisper in his ear, that there was no great wisdom in keeping his father's murderers, or their posterity, so near his person. Their last words were stern and solemn. "Think not lightly, Sir," said they, "of our commission; and look well that your deeds agree with your promises, for we must damn sin in whoever it be found: nor is that face upon flesh that we may spare, in case we find rebellion to our God, whose ambassadors we are. Disregard not our threatening; for there was never one yet in this realm, in the place where your Grace is, who prospered after the ministers began to threaten him." At this, the king was observed to smile, probably ironically, but he said nothing; and, as they took their leave, he laid his hand familiarly on each. Colonel Stewart then made them drink, and they left the Court. I have given this interview at some length, as it is strikingly characteristic both of the Prince and the ministers of the Kirk.

It is the many fresh incidents thus related which give vitality to the pages of this history; and instead of dry, meagre narrative, convert its records into a dramatic representation of facts.

The overthrow and execution of Gowrie, the punishment of his friends, and the ascendency of Arran, upon which events a new light is thrown, were followed by those sweeping forfeitures and confiscations, the hope of which was, generally, as much as the love of power or thirst of vengeance, the moving-spring of so many of the conspiracies and revolutions attending the early period of the reign of James. The following passage affords a vivid picture of the scramble for plunder which usually took place in Scotland after such convulsions:—

Nothing was heard of, from day to day, but prosecutions, arrests, forfeitures, and imprisonments; whilst Arran, and the nobles and barons who had joined his party, exultingly divided the spoil. The immense estates of the family of Douglas were eagerly sought after: and Davison, in a letter to Walsingham, conveyed a striking picture of the general scramble, "with the misery and confusion of the country. . . . . .

"Bothwell hath been an earnest suitor for Coldingknowes; but hath yet obtained no grace: he hath gotten the grant of Cockburnspeth; Sir William Stewart hath Douglas; the Secretary Maitland, Boncle; and the Colonel, Tantallon: all belonging to Angus, whose lady doth yet retain her dowry. The Colonel hath, besides, the tutory of Glammis, with the Master's living. Huntley hath gotten Paisley and Buquhan's lands; Montrose, Balmanno, belonging to George Fleck; Crawford hath gotten the Abbey of Scone; Montrose the office of Treasurer and the Lordship of Ruthven; Arran, Dirleton, Cowsland, and Newton: all some time belonging to Gowrie, whose wife and children are very extremely dealt withal. Athole stands on terms of interdicting, for that it is suspected he will relieve and support them. Glencairn hath taken the castle of Erskine; the Laird of Clackmannan hath spoiled Alloa; both belonging to the Earl of Mar, whose living is yet undistributed, save the Lordship of Brechin, which is given to Huntley. The Laird of Johnston hath gotten Locharnell, belonging to George Douglas. The living of the rest in exile being like to follow the same course."

The incessant plots and intrigues of the unfortunate Queen Mary, if the schemes, to regain power, of one who still considered herself a sovereign princess,—the longings of a captive to recover liberty,—deserve such harsh epithets, had, during much of this interval, kept Elizabeth in a ferment of doubt and apprehension, which produced their natural consequences, distrust and hatred. The crooked, yet deep and dexterous policy with which Elizabeth at this critical period played off parties against each other, alike false to them all, and true only to her own interests as these varied with the hour, is very forcibly set before the reader; and the "three modes of policy" carried on at the same instant by the English Queen are elucidated, for the first time, by the correspondence preserved in the State-Paper Office. In pursuance of one of these lines of policy, Elizabeth had sent her kinsman, Lord Hunsdon, to have a personal interview with the now powerful and insolent Arran; which was held in Foulden Kirk, on the borders of the kingdoms. What passed at this long private conference we must leave unnoticed, to usher in a new personage, destined to act an important part in the drama, and one whose perfidy and turpitude have never before been revealed to the world in all their diabolical blackness. This was the Master of Gray, a young nobleman at this time in the suite of Arran, and already as high in favour with the king as with the patron whom he was scheming to supplant:—

On coming out of the church, Arran called for the Master of Gray, a young nobleman of his suite, and introduced him to Hunsdon. It was impossible not to be struck with the handsome countenance and graceful manners of this youth. He had spent some time at the Court of France; and, having been bred up in the Roman Catholic faith, had been courted by the house of Guise, and employed by them as a confidential envoy in their negotiations with the captive Queen of Scots. He had always professed the deepest attachment to this unhappy Princess; and the young King had, within the last year, become so captivated with his society, that Mary, who had too rapidly trusted him with much of her secret correspondence, sanguinely hoped that his influence would be of the highest service to her, in regaining a hold over the affections of her son. But Gray, under an exterior which was preëminently beautiful, though too feminine to please some tastes, carried a heart as black and treacherous as any in this profligate age; and, instead of advocating, was prepared to betray the cause of the imprisoned Queen. To her son the young King, and the Earl of Arran, he had already revealed all he knew; and he now presented a letter from James his master, to Hunsdon. Its contents were of a secret and confidential kind, and related to the conspiracies against Elizabeth, which gave this Princess such perpetual disquiet. After enjoining on Hunsdon the strictest concealment of all he was about to communicate from every living being, except his royal mistress, Gray informed him that the King of Scots meant to send him speedily as Ambassador to England, with some public and open message to Elizabeth; under colour of which, he was to be intrusted with the commission of disclosing all the secret practices of Mary. Had Hunsdon kept his promise, we should have known nothing of all this; but, next morning, he communicated it to Burghley, in a letter meant only for his private eye. It is to the preservation of this letter, that we owe our knowledge of a transaction which brings the young King, and his favourite, the Master of Gray, before us in the degrading light of informers: the one betraying his mother; the other selling, for his own gain, the secrets with which he had been intrusted by his sovereign. This is so dark an accusation, that I must substantiate it by an extract from the letter in question: "Now, my Lord," said Hunsdon, addressing Burghley, "for the principal point of such conspiracies as are in hand against her Majesty, I am only to make her Majesty acquainted withal by what means she shall know it—yet will I acquaint your lordship with all. The King did send the Master of Gray, at this meeting, to me, with a letter of commendation, under the King's own hand, whom he means presently to send to her Majesty, as though it were for some other matters; but it is he that must discover all these practices, as one better acquainted with them than either the King or the Earl, (but by him.) He is very young, but wise and secret, as Arran doth assure me. He is, no doubt, very inward with the Scottish Queen, and all her affairs, both in England and France; yea, and with the Pope, for he is accounted a Papist; but for his religion, your lordship will judge when you see him; but her Majesty must use him as Arran will prescribe unto her; and so shall she reap profit by him.

The farther development of the Master of Gray's character and practices, are worthy of so hopeful a commencement. Nor was he solitary in villany, though unmatched in treachery and perfidy. Those who then ruled the country, and the instruments ready and willing by the foulest means to work their pleasure, exhibit Scotland in a more hideous moral aspect than it is seen even in times the most barbarous. The great and prominent actor at this period was the Earl of Arran, whose daring and ambitious career has never before been so ably and fully traced:—

On his return from the conference at Foulden Kirk, he was welcomed with cannon by the castle; a ceremony, as it was remarked, never used but in time of Parliament, and to the King or Regents: and when, soon after, summonses were issued for the meeting of the three Estates, all the country looked forward with alarm to a renewal of the proscriptions and plunder which had already commenced against the exiled lords. But the reality even outran their anticipation. Arran, assisted by his lady, a woman whose pride and insolence exceeded his own, domineered over the deliberations of Parliament; and, to the scandal of all, insisted on those Acts, which they had previously prepared, being passed at once without reasoning. Sixty persons were forfeited; many were driven to purchase pardons at a high ransom; and the unhappy Countess of Gowrie was treated with a cruelty and brutality which excited the utmost commiseration in all who witnessed it. This lady, a daughter of Henry Stewart, Lord Methven, on the last day of the Parliament, had obtained admission to an antechamber, where, as the King passed, she hoped to have an opportunity of pleading for herself and her children; but, by Arran's orders, she was driven into the open street. Here she patiently awaited the King's return, and cast herself, in an agony of tears, at his feet, attempting to clasp his knees: but Arran, who walked at James's hand, hastily pulled him past, and pushing the miserable suppliant aside, not only threw her down, but brutally trode upon her as the cavalcade moved forward, leaving her in a faint on the pavement. Can we wonder that the sons of this injured woman, bred up in the recollection of wrongs like these, should, in later years, have cherished in their hearts the deepest appetite for revenge?

Immediately after the Parliament, the King repaired to his palace at Falkland; whilst Arran, Montrose, and the other lords of his party, now all-powerful, remained in Edinburgh, engaged in pressing on the execution of the late Acts, for the confiscation and ruin of their opponents. Of these, by far the most formidable was the Earl of Angus; who, although banished, and now at Newcastle, retained a great influence in Scotland. He was the head of the Presbyterian faction in that country, the great support of the exiled ministers; and it was his authority with Walsingham, that traversed Arran's and James's schemes for a league between England and Scotland, on the broad basis of the establishment of Episcopacy. It was resolved, therefore, to cut off this baron; and Arran, and his colleague Montrose, the head of the powerful house of Graham, made no scruple of looking out for some desperate retainer, or hired villain to whom they might commit the task. Nor, in these dark times, was such a search likely to prove either long or difficult. They accordingly soon pitched upon Jock or John Graham of Peartree, whom Montrose knew to have a blood feud with Angus; sent a little page called Mouse to bring the Borderer to Edinburgh; feasted and caressed him during the time of the Parliament, and carried him afterwards to Falkland, where the two Earls, and the King, proposed to him not only to assassinate their hated enemy, but to make away with Mar and Cambuskenneth, his brother exiles, at the same time. Jock at once agreed to murder Angus, and was promised a high reward by the young monarch; but he declined having anything to do with Mar or Cambuskenneth, with whom he had no quarrel; and he left the palace, after receiving from Montrose a short matchlock, or riding-piece, which was deemed serviceable for the purpose in hand. But this atrocious design was not destined to succeed. The villain, who was probably lurking about in the neighbourhood of Newcastle, was detected and seized, carried before Lord Scrope, compelled to confess his intention; and information of the whole plot was immediately transmitted by Scrope to Walsingham. The English Secretary recommended, that the discovery should be kept a secret from all, except Angus and Mar, who were privately warned of the practices against them; and it is from the confession of the Borderer himself, which he made before Scrope, that these particulars are given. The intended assassin thus described his interview with the King: After stating that he had arrived late at night at the palace, they brought him, he said, into the King's gallery, where he [the King] was alone by himself: and only he, Montrose, and Arran, and this examinant, being together, the King himself did move him, as the other two had done, for the killing of Angus, Mar, and Cambuskenneth: to whom he answered, that for Mar and Cambuskenneth, he would not meddle with them; but for Angus, he would well be contented to do that, so as the King would well reward him for that. And the King said, he would presently give him sixty French crowns, and twenty Scottish pound land to him and his for ever, lying in Strathern, near Montrose.

These facts are so distinctly and minutely recorded in the manuscript history of Calderwood, who has given the whole of Graham's declaration, that it was impossible to omit them; but although there is little doubt of the truth of the intended murder, as far as Arran and Montrose are concerned, it would be, perhaps, unfair to believe in the full implication of the young King, on the single evidence of this Border assassin. To return, however, from this digression to Arran's headlong career. His hand, which had recently fallen so heavily on the nobility, was now lifted against the Kirk. Proclamation was made that all ministers should give up the rental of their benefices; and that none should receive stipend but such as had subscribed the new-framed policy, by which Presbytery was abrogated and Episcopacy established. As was to be expected, many of the clergy resisted, and were commanded to quit the country within twenty days: nor were they permitted, as before, to take refuge with their banished brethren in England or Ireland.

The people, very naturally, both from principle and sympathy, took the part of the oppressed ministers, of whom some remained in their livings, openly braving the court, and preaching resistance; and there is a rough honesty in the rudest of their homilies, which, together with their indomitable courage, entitle these successors of John Knox to respect. The tyrannical policy of Arran and the king, so far as the latter may be regarded as a free agent; and their violation of the laws and the rights of conscience, had made the resistance of the ministers a duty and a virtue. Yet comparatively few of them withstood the arbitary acts by which the Episcopal form of religion was thrust upon the country; the hour of trial found many of their number faltering. A letter written by an exile named Hume, describing the deplorable condition of the Kirk and the country at this time, states that "the ministers betwixt Stirling and Berwick had submitted with only ten exceptions." And it is also stated,—

That the Laird of Dun, the most venerable champion of the Kirk, had so far receded from his primitive faith as to have become a pest to the ministry in the north; that John Durie, who had so long resisted, had "cracked his curple" at last, and closed his mouth; that John Craig, so long the coadjutor of Knox, and John Brande, his colleague, had submitted; that the pulpits in Edinburgh were nearly silent—so fearful had been the defection—except, said he, a very few, who sigh and sob under the Cross. His own estates, he added, had been forfeited, his wife and children beggared; and yet he might be grateful he was alive, though in exile, for at home terror occupied all hearts. No man, said he in conclusion, while he lieth down, is sure of his life till day.

One of Elizabeth's three modes of policy had been to flatter the captive Queen with hopes of release from her long imprisonment. But if Mary was dangerous and dreaded while in confinement in England, she must have been much more dangerous if at liberty, whether in England, in Scotland, or in France; and no very serious intention of restoring her to freedom seems at any time to have been entertained.

No long period intervened ere Babington's Conspiracy was organized, and detected; and Elizabeth's minister, Walsingham, by means of his spies, and by intercepting Mary's letters, was craftily possessing himself of that evidence which, by proving her treason against his royal mistress and the commonwealth of England, was to justify her being brought to the scaffold. The participation which Mary actually and directly had in that foul plot, and the authenticity of some of the documents brought forward at her trial, as proofs of her guilt, are examined by Mr. Tytler carefully, critically, and at great length; both in the body of his history and in an elaborate note, which if it may not carry complete conviction to every mind, must at least raise doubts as to the guilt of the Queen of Scots in the main fact of being an instigator, or privy to the design, of Elizabeth's assassination. He however pronounces Mary's connexion with Babington's Conspiracy one of the most involved and intricate portions of the history of the two kingdoms. That it had ramifications in Scotland, and was favoured by Mary's partisans there, is not attempted to be denied; and many circumstances tend to show, that though not personally or directly connected with those atrocious designs, Mary must have been suspicious if not aware of them. Her daring scheme of instigating the King of Spain to invade England, dethrone Elizabeth, and re-establish the Catholic religion in Great Britain, is detailed at length in her own words. That design is not denied; nor that to carry it into execution the unhappy queen, long tantalized with the hope of freedom, and now in the nineteenth year of her captivity, proposed to give up her son to the King of Spain or the Pope; make her partisan, Lord Claud Hamilton, Regent of Scotland, and compel James either to embrace the Roman Catholic faith, or forfeit his right to the crown. Her correspondence on this her final design, with her emissaries and the Spanish ambassador, proves that the captive queen had become as dangerous to the King of Scotland as to the Queen of England and the Protestant religion. Of this plan of Mary's to regain her liberty, and also sovereign power, Mr. Tytler remarks:—

Here, then, was Mary's plan minutely detailed by herself; in which Spain was to "set on England," as she expressed it; Lord Claud Hamilton to be made Regent in Scotland; her son, in the event of his refusal to turn Catholic and combine against Elizabeth, to be seized, imprisoned, and coerced into obedience.

The vigour and ability with which the whole is laid down, needs no comment; and the Scottish Queen omitted no opportunity to encourage her friends in that great enterprise which was now regarded as the forlorn hope for the recovery of her liberty, and the restoration of the Catholic faith in Britain. All this time, however, Mary had no communication with Ballard.

Ballard was a seminary priest, who, with several other individuals, had undertaken to murder Elizabeth; or, in other words, to be the agents in accomplishing Babington's plot. Previously warned, though she must have had a shrewd guess of what was going forward, Mary "prudently" abstained from communicating with Ballard. Whether she was equally prudent in the case of Babington must, after all that Mr. Tytler has ingeniously and acutely urged, remain, and probably for ever, a matter of controversy—a question of conflicting evidence; since the implication of Walsingham and his agent Phelipps, does by no means fully clear Mary. Her plot for the invasion of England, with all its fearful consequences, was, at all events, simultaneous with Babington's and Ballard's plan of assassinating Elizabeth; and if Mary alone remained ignorant of that design, many of her most trusted adherents were cognizant of it. Her agent Morgan, who had taken refuge in France on the detection of Throckmorton's plot, with which both he and his mistress were connected, and who, though not given up to Elizabeth, was thrown into prison by the King of France, busily continued his intrigues in behalf of Mary, and must have been perfectly aware of the nefarious designs of Ballard. Ballard, as a measure of caution, and for her safety, was warned not to attempt to hold any communication with Mary, nor to compromise her; but Mr. Tytler states —and it is not easy to reconcile the notion of Mary's entire ignorance with such an admission—that,

She had been informed by Morgan, in a letter written from his prison, that such an agent was in England labouring busily in her behalf, but that there were strong reasons why she should avoid, for the present, all communication with him. "He followeth (said he) some matters of consequence, the issue whereof is uncertain; wherefore, as long as these labours of his and matters do continue, it is not for your Majesty's service to hold any intelligence with him at all, lest he, or his partners, be discovered, and they, by pains or other accidents, discover your Majesty afterwards to have had intelligence with them, which I would not should fall out for any good in the world. And I have specially warned the said Ballard (he continued) not to deal at any hand with your Majesty, as long as he followeth the affairs that he and others have in hand, which tend to do good, which I pray God may come to pass; and so shall your Majesty be relieved by the power of God.

In a postscript of a letter of Morgan's to Curle, Mary's French secretary, written on the same, which was intercepted and deciphered by Phelipps, an indirect allusion was made to these practices of Ballard against the life of Elizabeth. "I am not unoccupied (said he) although I be in prison, to think of her Majesty's state, and yours that endure with her, to your honours; and there be many means in hand to remove the beast that troubleth all the world."

Mary therefore entered into no correspondence, at least with Ballard; though her correspondence on the subject of "the great enterprise"—namely, the invasion of the kingdom by Spain—was actively carried on with Morgan, Paget, Mendoza the Spanish ambassador, and others. But Walsingham had long been weaving his snares around her, and the unhappy Queen was, by this time, completely meshed. Mr. Tytler speaks with just reprehension of the base system of espionage employed by the English minister; and yet he acquits Walsingham of the heavier charge of having, by a stratagem, drawn Mary on to renew her correspondence with Babington, that he might obtain fresh proofs of her guilt. As to the rest, if dangerous and treasonable plots are hatched, they must be detected. Walsingham had corrupted the principal person, Gilbert Gifford, through whom Mary transmitted her letters to her partisans. They were by these means regularly intercepted, deciphered, copied by Phelipps, and the originals forwarded to their destination. Mr. Tytler endeavours to establish the fact of Mary's letters having been tampered with, and added to, in order to draw information from Babington about the individuals connected with him; and he has successfully shown that Phelipps, the decipherer, was a man quite capable, "for State reasons," of writing spurious letters. Yet it is not easy to imagine any motive that he could have had for committing a villany that was to be confined entirely to his own bosom, and do him no advantage; and this leaves us to the alternative of the connivance of Walsingham and Paulet, who, if not actual parties to Phelipps' fraud, must, at least, have winked very hard. That the originals of Mary's alleged letters to Babington were not produced on her trial, does not quite establish the fact that they never existed; and her denial, in the circumstances in which she was placed, scarcely carries conviction, since she at first attempted also to deny the authenticity of other letters, regarding the plan of Spain invading England, and giving up James to the King of Spain or the Pope, which she afterwards tacitly admitted. Mr. Tytler has embraced the favourable side of the controversy, and supported it with great ingenuity. He has, besides, the authority of Lingard, and the assumption of Robertson, to strengthen his case; and yet the matter remains doubtful.

But whatever had been the secret practices of the Queen of Scots with foreign powers, with her former subjects of Scotland, or with Elizabeth's Roman Catholic subjects, and whatever the extent of her guilt, the hour of heavy retribution was drawing nigh, and that, as we have seen, while the poor victim was in full security.

There is no part of Mr. Tytler's work more effective than the pathetic record of the last days of Queen Mary; her arrest, trial, and execution. We fear that he may, with some persons, lay himself open to the grave charge which Burghley brought against the unhappy Queen on her trial, of "intending, by long artificial speeches, to move pity; and to lay all blame on the Queen's [Elizabeth's] majesty." He has certainly written from the heart; and, with all her frailties and all her crimes, the sad story of the Queen of Scots is one to move to pity and ruth the most severe of her judges; since, at the last, it was not as a guilty woman that Mary suffered, but as a political victim,—as the martyr of a cruel State necessity, sacrificed on the most forced or insufficient evidence. If our object were merely to select a popular extract, we should now copy out the trial scene of the deserted Princess, or the pathetic narrative of her last hours. But the part acted by Elizabeth, at this juncture, is of deeper interest to the historical reader, and to the student of the human heart; and it offers more novelty. Whatever doubts rest upon the degree of knowledge which Mary had of the scheme to assassinate "the Beast that troubled all the world;" there is no doubt whatever about the eagerness of Elizabeth to procure the death, by secret practices, of the condemned Queen. Elizabeth foresaw both danger to her own life, and the greatest odium in a public execution; though the spirit generally evinced in England, and especially in London, at this period, gave little apparent cause for apprehension. To Mary's appeals the Queen paid no attention; and the interposition of James, and the remonstrances of the King of France through a special ambassador, excited her hottest ire. The French ambassador—

After many affected delays, Elizabeth received in unusual state upon her throne, and heard his message with a flashing eye and flushed and angry countenance. She restrained her feelings, however, sufficiently to make a laboured reply, pronounced a high encomium upon her own forbearance, promised a speedy and definite answer, protracted the time for more than a month, by the most frivolous excuses, and, at last, drove the Ambassador to declare, that if Mary was executed, his master must resent it. The English Queen, fired at this threat, demanded whether his master had empowered him to use such language; and having found that it was warranted by Bellievre's instructions, wrote a letter of lofty defiance to Henry, and dismissed his envoy.

James, who had been made acquainted by Elizabeth's ministers with the kindnesses which his mother had intended for himself, was not, at first disposed to interfere.

Monsieur de Courcelles, who was then in Scotland, received instructions from the French King to incite the young monarch to interfere for Mary; but he replied, that his mother was in no danger, and as for the conspiracy, she must be contented, he said, to drink the ale she had brewed. He loved her as much as nature and duty bound him; but he knew well she bore him as little good will as she did the Queen of England: her practices had already nearly cost him his crown, and he could be well content she would meddle with nothing but prayer and serving of God.

But when the danger of his mother became imminent, he was somewhat moved, and sent, first Sir William Keith, and afterwards Sir Robert Melvil and the Master of Gray, to intercede for her and appease Elizabeth. The selection of the last individual leads Mr. Tytler to doubt of the sincerity of James's desire to save his mother; nor can it be questioned that the peril of his own succession to the English crown lay nearer his heart than the life of a parent whom he had had no great reason either to love or to respect. We make the less scruple to cite the following passages, as they are in substance new in any Scottish history hitherto published:—

"On Keith's arrival at the English Court, Elizabeth and her ministers attempted to frustrate the object of his mission, by the usual weapons of delay and dissimulation. When at last admitted, the Queen affected the utmost solicitude for Mary's life; but represented herself as driven to extremities by the remonstrances of her ministers and the fears of her people. "And yet," said she, turning to the Ambassador, "I swear by the living God, that I would give one of my own arms to be cut off, so that any means could be found for us both to live in assurance. I have already," she continued, "saved her life, when even her own subjects craved her death; and now, judge for yourselves, which is most just, that I who am innocent, or she who is guilty, should suffer!" Repeated interviews took place, and Elizabeth, on one occasion declared, that no human power should ever persuade her to sign the warrant for Mary's execution. But in the mean time, the sentence against her had been made public. Leicester, Burghley, and Walsingham advised her death. The people, alarmed by reports of the meditated invasion by Spain, and new plots against their Princess, became clamorous on the same subject; and James, agitated by the ill success of Keith, sent him new instructions, with a private letter written in passionate and threatening terms. On communicating it to the English Queen, she broke into one of those sudden and tremendous paroxysms of rage, which sometimes shook the Council-room, and made the hearts of her ministers quail before her. It was with the greatest difficulty that she was prevented from chasing Keith, who had spoken with great boldness, from her presence. But Leicester her favourite at last appeased her; and, on the succeeding day, she dictated a more temperate reply to the young King.

His next messengers were instructed to say, that their master's meaning "was modest, not menacing:"—

In her first interview with these new Ambassadors, Elizabeth received their offers with her characteristic violence. They proposed, that Mary should demit her right of succession to the English Crown to her son. "How is that possible?" said the Queen; "she is declared 'inhabil,' and can convey nothing." "If she have no rights," replied Gray, "your Majesty need not fear her; if she have, let her assign them to her son, in whom will then be placed the full title of succession to your Highness." "What," said Elizabeth, with a loud voice and great oath; "get rid of one, and have a worse in her place! Nay, then I put myself in a more miserable case than before. By God's Passion, that were to cut mine own throat; and for a duchy or an earldom to yourself, you, or such as you, would cause some of your desperate knaves to kill me. No, by God! your master shall never be in that place." Gray then craved, that Mary's life might at least be spared for fifteen days, to give them time to communicate with the King: but this she peremptorily refused. Melvil implored her to give a respite, were it only for eight days. No," said Elizabeth, rising up, and impatiently flinging out of the apartment, "not for an hour."

While the fate of Mary was thus hastening to a close, James ordered the ministers of the Kirk to pray for his unhappy mother, and received a peremptory refusal. This we notice, as Mr. Tytler appears to mistake the principle of their refusal, which could not have been to deny to any dying sinner, to the vilest condemned criminal, the benefit of their prayers, but to deny the king's right to issue any mandate assuming a spiritual jurisdiction over the Kirk. On the selfsame principle, when George the Fourth and the Privy Council, having first erased the name of another unhappy queen from the English Liturgy, next commanded the ministers of the Kirk of Scotland to omit the name of Queen Caroline in their public prayers, some of the best and ablest of the body resisted this encroachment upon the spiritual independence of the Kirk, and regularly prayed for the Queen. This much explained, we give the curious, and we admit very indecent scene; though we can no more admire the interference of the Royal Guard, than the folly or audacity of the minister, who might, after his violent "intrusion," have done all that was necessary to maintain the independence of the Kirk, without outraging the natural feelings of mankind, and his Christian duty.

It was at this time that the Scottish King, having required the ministers of the Kirk to pray for his unhappy mother, then in the toils of her enemies and daily expecting death, received a peremptory refusal. This was the more extraordinary, since James had carefully worded his request so as to remove, as he thought, every possibility of opposition; but finding himself deceived, he directed Archbishop Adamson to offer up his prayers for the Queen, in the High Church of the capital. To his astonishment he found, on entering his seat, that one of the recusant ministers, named Cowper, had preoccupied the pulpit. The King addressed him from the gallery, told him that the place had been intended for another; but added, that if he would pray for his mother, he might remain where he was. To this, Cowper answered, that he would do as the Spirit of God directed him; a significant reply to all who knew the history of the times, and certainly amounting to a refusal. A scene of confusion ensued. James commanded Cowper to come down from the pulpit: he resisted. The royal guard sprang forward to pull out the intruder; and he descended, denouncing woe and wrath on all who held back; declaring too, that this hour would rise up in witness against the King, in the great day of the Lord. Adamson then preached on the Christian duty of prayer for all men, with such pathetic eloquence, and so powerfully offered up his intercession for their unfortunate Queen, that the congregation separated in tears, lamenting the obstinacy of their pastors.

To return to Elizabeth,—to Henry the Eighth's own daughter, whom Mr. Tytler has so vividly painted:—Whilst "reports," diligently spread, performed the modern office of a ministerial press, and kept alive alarm in the public mind—

The Privy-council held repeated meetings, and pressed Elizabeth to give her warrant for the execution; Leicester, Burghley, and Walsingham, entreated, argued, and remonstrated, but she continued distracted and irresolute between the odium which must follow the deed and its necessity; at last, amid her half sentences and dark hints, they perceived that their mistress wished Mary to be put to death, but had conceived a hope they would spare her the cruelty of commanding it, and find some secret way of despatching her; she even seemed to think, that if their oath to "the association" for her protection did not lead to this, they had promised much, but actually done nothing. From such an interpretation of their engagement however they all shrunk. The idea of private assassination was abhorrent, no doubt, to their feelings; but they suspected, also, that Elizabeth's only object was to shift the responsibility of Mary's death from her shoulders to theirs; and that nothing was more likely than that, the moment they had fulfilled her wishes, she should turn round, and accuse them of acting without orders. Meanwhile, she became hourly more unquiet, forsook her wonted amusements, courted solitude, and often was heard muttering to herself a Latin sentence taken from some of those books of Emblemata, or Aphorisms, which were the fashion of the day: Aut fer aut feri; ne feriare, feri. [Either strike or be stricken; strike lest thou be stricken.] This continued till the 1st of February, when the Queen sent for Mr. Davison the Secretary, at ten in the morning. On arriving at the Palace, he found that the Lord Admiral Howard had been conversing with Elizabeth on the old point, the Scottish Queen's execution; and had received orders to send Secretary Davison to her with the warrant, which had already been drawn up by Burghley the Lord Treasurer, and lay in his possession unsigned. Davison hasted to his chamber, and coming instantly back with it and some other papers in his hand, was called in by Elizabeth, who, after some talk on indifferent topics, asked him what papers he had with him. He replied, divers warrants for her signature. She then inquired whether he had seen the Lord Admiral, and had brought the warrant for the Scottish Queen's execution. He declared he had, and delivered it into the Queen's hand; upon which she read it over, called for pen and ink, deliberately signed it, and then looking up asked him whether he was not heartily sorry she had done so. To this bantering question he replied gravely, that he preferred the death of the guilty before that of the innocent, and could not be sorry that her Majesty took the only course to protect her person from imminent danger. Elizabeth then commanded him to take the warrant to the Chancellor and have it sealed, with her orders that it should be used as secretly as possible; and by the way, said she, relapsing again into a jocular tone, "you may call on Walsingham and show it him: I fear the shock will kill him outright." She added that a public execution must be avoided. It should be done, she said, not in the open green or court of the castle, but in the hall. In conclusion, she forbade him absolutely to trouble her any farther or let her hear any more till it was done; she, for her part, having performed all that in law or reason could be required.

The secretary now gathered up his papers, and was taking his leave, when Elizabeth stayed him for a short space; and complained of Paulet and others, who might have eased her of this burden. Even now, said she, it might be so done, that the blame might be removed from myself, would you and Walsingham write jointly, and sound Sir Amias and Sir Drew Drury upon it. To this Davison consented, promising to let Sir Amias know what she expected at his hands; and the Queen, having again repeated in an earnest tone, that the matter must be closely handled, dismissed him.

All this took place on the morning of the 1st of February. In the afternoon of that day, Davison visited Walsingham, showed him the warrant with Elizabeth's signature, consulted with him on the horrid communication to be made to Paulet and Drury; and repairing to the Chancellor, had the Great Seal affixed to the warrant.

Their joint letter to Paulet was accordingly written. It concludes in these terms, having previously dwelt upon the guilt and the sentence of Mary, and the "indisposition of one of the sex and quality" of Elizabeth "to shed blood so near her" as that of the Queen of Scots:—

"These respects we find do greatly trouble her Majesty, who, we assure you, has sundry times protested, that if the regard of the danger of her good subjects and faithful servants did not more move her than her own peril, she would never be drawn to assent to the shedding her blood. We thought it very meet to acquaint you [with] these speeches lately passed from her Majesty, referring the same to your good judgments. And so we commit you to the protection of the Almighty.—Your most assured friends,

"Francis Walsingham.
"William Davison.

"London, February 1st, 1586."

Sir Amias Paulet was the Sir Hudson Lowe of his day. He had harsh and onerous duties to perform; nor can he, like the men of later times, be supposed to have viewed his troublesome and wayward charge through the softening medium of her beauty, her misfortunes, her tragic fate, and the lapse of three centuries. Mr. Tytler thinks of what Paulet was to his royal prisoner, "cruel and morose;" but he forgets, in telling the story, what his restless and intriguing prisoner was to Paulet. There is, however, no letter in the volume which does human nature, and the individual in question, more credit, than the reply of Paulet, the dogged Puritan, to the epistle of Elizabeth's subservient ministers:—

With the letter, Davison sent an earnest injunction that it should be committed to the flames; promising for his part to burn, or, as he styled it, "make a heretic" of the answer. Cruel and morose, however, as Paulet had undoubtedly been to Mary, he was not the common murderer which Elizabeth took him to be, and refused peremptorily, to have any hand in her horrid purpose. He received the letter on the 2d of February, at five in the afternoon, and at six the same evening, having communicated it to Drury, returned this answer to Walsingham.

"Your letters of yesterday, coming to my hands this present day at five in the afternoon, I would not fail, according to your directions, to return my answer with all possible speed; which [I] shall deliver unto you with great grief and bitterness of mind, in that I am so unhappy to have liven to see this unhappy day, in the which I am required, by direction from my most gracious Sovereign, to do an act which God and the law forbiddeth. My good livings and life are at her Majesty's disposition, and I am ready to lose them this next morrow, if it shall so please her: acknowledging that I hold them as of her mere and gracious favour. I do not desire them to enjoy them but with her Highness' good liking; but God forbid that I should make so foul a shipwreck of my conscience, or leave so great a blot to my poor posterity, to shed blood without law and warrant. Trusting that her Majesty, of her accustomed clemency, will take this my dutiful answer in good part."

This refusal, as we have seen, was written on the 2d February, in the evening, at Fotheringay; and, next morning, (the 3d, Friday,) Davison received an early and hasty summons from Elizabeth, who called him into her chamber, and inquired if he had been with the warrant to the Chancellor's. He said he had; and she asked sharply why he had made such haste. "I obeyed your Majesty's commands," was his reply; "and deemed it no matter to be dallied with."—"True," said she, "yet methinks the best and safest way would be to have it otherwise handled." He answered to this, that, if it was to be done at all, the honourable way was the safest; and the Queen dismissed him. But by this time the warrant, with the royal signature, was in the hands of the Council; and on that day they addressed a letter, enclosing it, to the Earl of Shrewsbury. This letter was signed by Burghley the Lord Treasurer, Leicester, Hunsdon, Knollys, Walsingham, Derby, Howard, Cobham, Sir Christopher Hatton, and Davison himself. Yet some fears as to the responsibility of sending it away without the Queen's knowledge, made them still hesitate to despatch it. In this interval, Paulet's answer arrived; and as Walsingham, to whom he had addressed it, was sick, (or, as some said, pretended illness,) the task of communicating it to Elizabeth fell on Davison. She read it with symptoms of great impatience; and, breaking out into passionate expressions, declared that she hated those dainty, nice, precise fellows, who promised much, but performed nothing: casting all the burden on her. But, she added, she would have it done without him, by Wingfield. Who this new assassin was, to whom the Queen alluded, does not appear.

The volume closes with the execution of Mary; and often as that tragic tale has been repeated, it loses nothing of interest or pathos in the elegant narrative of Mr. Tytler. This touching incident ends the scene:—

An affecting incident now occurred. On removing the dead body, and the clothes and mantle which lay beside it, Mary's favourite little dog, which had followed its mistress to the scaffold unperceived, was found nestling under them. No entreaty could prevail on it to quit the spot; and it remained lying beside the corpse, and stained in the blood, till forcibly carried away by the attendants.

A copious Appendix, consisting of Proofs and Illustrations of important facts in the volume, and drawn from manuscripts in the State-paper Office, and from other collections hitherto unprinted, to which Mr. Tytler has obtained access, besides stamping the work with authenticity, reveals many curious traits of individual character and national manners.

We have left ourselves little space to notice what we consider the peculiar merits of Mr. Tytler as an historian. These are of no ordinary kind. Shakespeare taught his countrymen a lesson in the art of writing History, by which few of them have yet profited. The English historical style was by many considered to have reached perfection in the stately march of the periods of Robertson; while others preferred the lucid and easy undulating narrative of Hume. Neither of these eminent writers have, like Mr. Tytler, as it were dramatized the great events they recorded, and placed the leading characters of history on the scene before us, surrounded by their natural accessories, and all in action,—each speaking his own very words, and unreservedly expressing the varied and conflicting passions and motives by which he was actuated while these things actually passed. This achievement, which Mr. Tytler has accomplished by ransacking their private and most confidential correspondence,—eaves-dropping, as it were, at their secret conferences and councils, and thus laying bare every throb of their hearts before the spectator,—was, we presume, thought below the dignity of legitimate or classic history; which only dealt in lofty generalities and sweeping results, without seeking to trace or display those great or more minute springs which guided the complex movement. For laboured descriptions, cold, however graceful, he has, in brief, substituted action and vitality.——What we, therefore, consider the peculiar and very decided superiority of Mr. Tytler, is, claiming ampler scope and verge for his narrative; applying, in short, the true principle to the composition of history,—resuscitating its mouldering remains—bidding the dry bones live; and yet, while thus boldly innovating, never once giving the rein to imagination; but, on the contrary, accomplishing his end by a more direct appeal to truth and reality, and to the primary and authentic sources of information and knowledge, than his eminent predecessors, who were contented to walk in the trammels which custom had prescribed. He has in every case gone to the fountain-head; taking nothing for granted, nothing at second-hand, and leaving nothing unexamined. This argues a degree of perseverance and of actual time-consuming drudgery, through which nothing save ardent enthusiasm in the pursuit could have carried an author. The results are corresponding. We have a work valuable for the primary quality of all history,—authenticity, and accuracy, and fulness in the detail of facts; while with the strict fidelity of the portraiture are combined beauty, expression, individuality, and whatever gives assurance that such was the real person—such the very scene.

TO MISS ELLEN TREE, AS "JULIET."

"I never thought before my death to see Youth's vision thus made perfect."
SHELLEY.

O, LADY! for one glance of Shakspeare's eyes,
From their eternity, upon thee now!
That he, e'en here on earth, might recognise
His youthful vision once again, and bow
Before it with youth's fervour. And art thou
But feigning passions which thou mak'st us feel,
As if each tear and vow to love were real?
Thy eloquence of face and "trumpet-tongue,"
Plead with our grosser senses to unseal
Sources of admiration, that belong,
Not merely to the abstract and ideal,
But to our proper nature—to the strong
Of heart, whom neither gold nor steel
Have power to alienate from hopes of human weal.

DUGGINS'S IMPRESSIONS OF AMERICA.

BY BON GAULTIER.

In my travels up and down the world, I have met with not a few unexpected coincidences; but one more pleasant than my meeting with my old friend, Charles Duggins, on the banks of the Upper Missouri, I certainly never encountered. The last time I had seen him was over the mahogany at my friend Briefless's chambers in the Temple, where, with Sam Lover, Theodore Hook, George Cruickshank, and a few more such spirits, we contrived to produce a very remarkable impression, or rather depression, upon a butt of our host's best Bordeaux. I had a faint recollection of having parted from him near the foot of St. Martin's Lane in the following singular fashion.—We had fallen into the hands of a couple of cabmen, who, seeing us somewhat lively, though not more so than gentlemen ought to be, snapped us up, and, depositing us in the interior of one of Hanson's Patent Safeties, drove us helter skelter down the Strand, till the upsetting of the Patent Safety projected its driver into the window of an oyster shop, and my friend and myself into a gutter unctuous with the mud of three weeks of rain. When I recovered from the stun of my fall, I discovered my friend embracing the curb stone in a very passionate manner,—a living illustration of Virgil's "procumbit humi bos;" but I had no opportunity of observing his further movements, as at this moment my hat was knocked over my eyes, and I felt my watch take flight from my fob. Having, with some difficulty, restored my D'Orsay to its position, I rushed after the thief in pursuit,—I need hardly say without effect,—and before I returned to the spot where I had left my friend, he was gone, some good Samaritan having, I presume, set him on his legs, and sent him home in a hackney coach.

Soon after this I left England, and had been wandering to and fro upon the face of the vast earth, till I found myself one fine morning at the most remote hunting-fort of the North American Fur Company upon the Upper Missouri. It was about the end of March when I arrived there; and as the hunters were about to descend the river with their returns of buffalo robes and other peltries, I availed myself of the opportunity of returning in one of their boats to the confines of civilisation.

We had been descending the river for several days, a task of difficulty and danger, which those only who have performed it can appreciate. What between hostile Indians, snags, sunken rocks, rapids, and frost and snow that cut into the bones, the voyageur's life presents to the eye of the town-bred man as many desagrémens as can well be congregated into a compact space. But the fatigues and sufferings of the day once over, the boat drawn up on shore, the fire kindled, and plenty to eat, you will rarely see a happier fellow than the voyageur. Hear his broad laugh ringing among the gigantic rocks, or through the silent forest,—his hearty carol echoing in the moonlight across the onward flowing river, and you would never think that this was the man who all day long had been wrestling with danger and privation, that to a man sitting over his parlour fire would seem to carry certain destruction to the sturdiest frame. Inured as my travels had made me to every species of privation, I was soon familiarized to this mode of life, and enjoyed the wonderful scenery, through which the river swept, with a relish to which your Cockney tourist, who carries, like Dogberry, "everything handsome about him," must be for ever a stranger.

It was early morning, and we had just emerged from a bend in the river where, on either side, precipices rose high above the water, shaped in fantastic forms, like huge monuments, terraces, and cathedral spires; and, turning a creek, came in sight of a stretch of the river where the country was more level, and covered with timber to the water's edge. The sun, which had hitherto been concealed from us by the steepness of the banks, now broke upon our view, suffusing hill, forest, and river with one broad glittering haze of gold, and almost blinding us for a time by the sudden brightness. As the eye became more familiar to the blaze, and better able to discriminate the features of the landscape, I descried, in the deep shadow of the forest on the left bank of the stream, a thin streak of blue smoke rising from the bank, and two figures standing near the point from which it rose.

I pointed them out to my companions; and lest they should prove to belong to a war party of the Indians, who, at this part of the river, are well known to be troublesome, we saw that our guns were in order, and got our ball-pouches ready, in case of a brush. As we neared the figures, they made signs to us to approach, and their gestures soon satisfied us that they did not belong to the Red Men, but came of the same stock as ourselves. Our boat pulled to the shore of the river, which at this point might be about two hundred and thirty yards broad; and never shall I forget the exultation of the poor devils as they hailed us, and we responded in good English to their appeal. The railway traveller who, after a collision, counts his limbs, and finds none of them amissing,—the mariner picked from his raft on the wild and wasteful ocean,—the ironed felon when he is reprieved,—the much-enduring husband when his termagant wife pays the debt of nature—the only debt she ever paid,—these may feel a thrill of transport; but their transport is nothing to that of the man who sees relief approach in the vast solitude, whose silence is broken only by the beatings of his own heart,—where he has, for hours on hours, heard, in imagination, the savage yell of the Indian ringing in his ears, as the Red Man flourishes the tomahawk over his doomed and defenceless head.

The outward man of my friends and myself was not remarkable for its elegance or refinement; but that of our new acquaintances was a good many degrees less so. The taller of the two had on a red flannel jacket, while his lower extremities were encased in a pair of deer-skin smalls of the amplest dimensions, with fringes about a foot long, sewed by way of ornament into the outside seams. A pair of mocassins, and a round white hat completed his attire. His friend was even more primitively arrayed; his vestments, saving and excepting a short buffalo robe round his loins, and a pair of mocassins, being rigorously limited to those with which nature had endowed him. His skin was agreeably diversified, much after the fashion of a painter's apron, with a variety of ochres of the coarsest kind; and from these, and the feathers stuck into his hair, it was apparent that an attempt had been made to ornament his person upon the Indian model, which had only imperfectly succeeded. I thought that I had seen the faces of our friends before; but when it is considered that one of them was fearfully gashed upon the cheek and brow, and that the other had been partially tatooed, I think I may be forgiven if I did not at once recognise in the former of these forlorn wanderers the immortal N. P. Willis, nor detect in the other the engaging smile of the peerless Duggins.

The first congratulations over, our friends applied themselves vigorously to the provisions which we set before them; and before they had finished their third pound of buffalo steak each, and washed it down with an extra draught of grog, one of them was apostrophizing a lady of the name of "Melanie," while the other muttered something about a child, a very little child, who rejoiced in the name of "little Nell." Hilloah! thought I, whom have we here? and I took a narrower view of the strangers.

"Willis, my boy," I exclaimed, in breathless surprise, as my scrutiny satisfied me of the identity of one of them with the illustrious Penciller, "what the devil brought you into the Far West? Ecod, my fine fellow, you seem to have picked up Pummelings by the Way, in place of Pencillings, this time?"

"Eh, what?" retorted N. P., arresting his molars in the act of mastification, and gazing at me with all his eyes, "Bon Gaultier? No! Is it you? Well, I never!"

"Don't stand gaping there, man, like a stuck pig. Thank your stars I'm not Gibson Lockhart."

"Bon Gaultier? Willis, did you say, Bon Gaultier?" exclaimed the shorter stranger, eyeing me with his large intelligent orbs.

"To be sure I did! I hope you have no fault to find with my pronunciation," responded the bard of "Melanie, and other Poems," bolting a mouthful in a pet, and nearly choking as he did so.

"My dear fellow, how are you?" exclaimed his friend; and, starting from his haunches, he rushed forward, and grasped me warmly by the hand. "You remember Duggins?"

"What!—Charles Duggins?" I replied, "Remember the Author of 'Chuckleby' and 'The Sketches?' Do I remember St. Paul's, or the Aldgate Pump? How can you be so superfluous, my dear fellow, as to ask me if I remember you? By the by, how did you get home that night you and I were spilt from the cab in the Strand—what have you been doing since—and, finally, what in the name of all that is absurd and incomprehensible, brought you to this quarter of the globe? To think of meeting such a pair of shepherds as you and Willis upon the Missouri, and in such toggery as this! Why, your mothers wouldn't know you. You have been getting yourselves into a pretty particular vicious fix, I calculate, as the Yankees say."

"Yankees, Sir,—what do you mean by that?" shouted Willis, reddening up in the face like a turkey-cock in a thunder storm. "The man, Sir, that insults my nation, Sir—"

"Oh, confound your nation!—we all know they speak purer English than the natives in the old country—ay, purer than my friends of Cockaigne themselves," interjected Duggins, in a bland and pacific tone, that operated like oil upon the tempest in a teapot, which our friend N. P. had been getting up on his own account. He cooled down in a moment, and commenced an assault upon the leg of a roast goose.

"Our friend, the Penciller, like all people that have no regard for other people's feelings, is absurdly sensitive," whispered Duggins to me, "in fact, he is one universal raw. You can hardly touch him, but he winces, ever since that merciless scourging he got in the Quarterly. But he is really not a bad fellow, though be does bore one dreadfully with that 'Melanie, and other Poems,' of his. Hear him!—there he is at them already, though not half an hour out of the very jaws of death!"

And, true enough, the author of "Musings under a Bridge" was vociferating the following lines ore rotundo, while he polished off the thigh bone of the goose, and gazed with glowing eyes upon the scenery before him:—

> "The mountains that enfold
> In their wide sweep the coloured landscape round,
> Seem groups of giant kings, in purple and in gold,
> That guard the enchanted ground."

"Is it not delightful to see such elasticity of mind?" continued Duggins, testifying his delight, by tossing off another sneaker of gin and water. "It is not often that we see such playful outbursts in the world-worn man, rising in the sunshine of fancy, like the glittering jet of some fairy fountain far hid in the gloom of an enchanted garden. The spectre of wishes, hopes, and loves, decaying or decayed, is too apt to fling its shadow across the weary heart. Its bloom, its first dewy freshness is dimmed and trodden away. Our tears are the consuming lava that scars the green mountain side, —not the bright April shower that gemmed the saddest moments of our infancy. When I was a young boy, a very little child;—"

"For mercy's sake, Duggins," exclaimed Willis, bursting into a cold sweat, "don't come that everlasting 'little child' over us just now. Deuce the hing else have you talked about since we left New ork."

"When I was a young boy—a very little child," ontinued Duggins, with an air of offended dignity—

"A little child, a rosy elf,
Singing, dancing to itself,
A fair round thing, with chubby cheeks,
In jacket blue, and nankeen breeks, uppose," I chimed in. "Go a-head, Duggins. When you were a very little child—"

"Really, gentlemen, this is too bad. I did not xpect to have the tender vein of sentiment which he retrospect of a bright joyous infancy always uggests to a gentle nature treated with this air of evity."

"Levity! my dear Duggins," replied the Penciller, "I can assure you, these same blessed abies of yours are no laughing matter. There's Smike—poor Smike, and the schoolmaster's boy, he very young boy, quite a little child—and little Nell, not to mention a host of minor fry, that have kept your readers weeping for the last three years like gum trees in the autumn time. Its an almighty shame, it is, to make the public your pocket-handkerchief in this way. You know it's all gammon, and that these same very little children of yours were a set of as greasy, wheasy, puking, puling, dirty-faced little vermin, as ever broke the hearts of their over-wrought mothers, or scorned the familiar use of a pocket-handkerchief. If you want genuine poetry, the sentiment of a Sappho with the eloquence of a Euripides—there's my 'Melanie.'—"

"Not to mention the 'Other Poems.' Not a doubt of it," said I. "By the by, did you ever hear that distich of Fitzgreen Halleck's upon your book? It runs something this way:—

Would you know the last stretch of poetical villany, Just read, if you can, N. P. Willis's Melanie."

"The everlasting nigger," roared the American Euripides, starting to his feet, and looking as though his skin wouldn't hold him. "Wait till I catch him in Broadway; and if it's a fair fight, and no gouging, burn my old shoes, if I don't beat him to the other end of eternity."

It was fortunate that it was now time for us to pursue our course, otherwise the excitement of the Penciller might have led him to commit some monstrous extravagance. As it was, he merely picked up his rifle, which, by the way, he had christened by the name of "Melanie," and levelled it twice or thrice at an imaginary Halleck, with a very ferocious air. "The lunatic, the lover, and the poet,"—for N. P. was at that moment the three gentlemen in one,—did no mischief, however, and we all jumped into our keel-boat, and pushed off. The boatmen began to sing one of their songs,—not the washy-washy affair, that Moore has palmed off upon the boarding-schools as "The Canadian Boat Song," —but a vigorous chant, manly in words and music, that chimed well with the wild magnificence of the forest solitudes through which we were sweeping; and away we went, beneath a bright blue sky, right merrily.

A pleasant time we had of it during the next fortnight, which it took us to reach St. Louis. Willis, Duggins, and myself took our share of the work at the boats, whenever we could be of service; and when we were forced to put on shore by the severity of the weather, the high wind, or any other cause, I found my friends no bad hands at bringing down an antelope, an elk, or a bighorn, and even a buffalo upon occasion, in the course of a forenoon's sport. And when we would lay up for the night, and the voyageurs were sleeping off the fatigues of the day, and the surfeit with which they invariably wound it up,—for a voyageur "beats all nature" at eating,—my literary friends and myself would pile fresh billets on the fire, and laying ourselves down beside it, on our buffalo skins, beguile the darkness with tales of our adventures and hair-breadth 'scapes. Willis would sometimes slop us with his poetry, and Duggins maunder about flowers and the glad sunshine, and young creatures, young and full of hope, stricken down and gathered to their graves; but I threatened the former with Fitzgreen Halleck's distich, and interrupted the other with the familiar carol of "Bye Babby Bunting," and by so doing rarely failed to bring them to their senses.

"This is indeed enjoyment," exclaimed Duggins, on one of these occasions, "a perfectly new sensation, that hopeless desideratum of the civilized world! Here, with the broad heavens, and the silent majesty of the stars, canopying our heads, the old primeval forests around us, and the river rolling at our feet, as it has rolled from the beginning and will roll to the end of time,—here, with the vast hush of boundless solitudes awing the heart into devotion too intense for words ——"

"Go a-head upon that figure!" said I, yawning, while the Penciller began to quote—

"Its my delight, on a shiny night,
When my Melanie peeps from her lattice light."

"Here, as I was saying, laid upon the banks of this vast river, by the wolf-scaring faggot," continued the imperturbable Duggins, "and couched upon the shaggy hide of the tremendous bison, that but yesterday shook the prairie with the thunder of his tread——"

"Oh did you not hear of a jolly young buffalo, struck in the incorrigible "Muser under a Bridge."
That kicked up his heels at the Indian's gruff hallo!"

"Here, as I was saying, in this pathless desert, I know not how it is, but somehow there rise before me bright visions of the homes of men, and all the soft humanities that impart a grace to life. I see fire-lit rooms, with happy faces smiling into the cheerful blaze: the father, his day's anxieties thrown by, and near him the young blossoms of his love,—his children, young boys and girls, very little children—— "

"These infernal children again! Really, Duggins, this is too bad. I'm chawed catawampously, if I stand it," exclaimed Willis, in a state of violent excitement.

"Green lanes, too, smile out before me in the cheerful sunshine, and flowers are springing there, and maids are singing there, in the gladness of their dawning love, and a world of all bright and beautiful things——"

"Oh, confound it, Duggins, keep all that for your next book. May I be shot, if I see any of these bright and beautiful things that you have been palavering about. It's desperately cold, and I feel as if I could pay my addresses to that flask which you've been sucking at for the last quarter of an hour; so pass the rosy, my friend, and give us something in your lively vein. That's all right," I continued, as I caught the flask which he threw across the fire to me; "and now, my fine fellow, fire away!"

"Very well, I confess I was growing sentimental. So here goes.

"I told you," said he, "last night, how the dinner went off, that they gave me on my arrival at New York. The dishes were excellent, the wine undeniable, and the speakers managed to soft-sawder me and themselves with the utmost dexterity,—taking care, though, to let me understand, that though I was a deucedly clever fellow, their own writers were all to nothing a cleverer set, 'by a long chalk,' than I was. I had had a taste of this sort of thing at Edinburgh, however; so I didn't feel much put about. Christopher North had told me in so many words that my works, beside Sir Walter's, and half a dozen other novelists of the north, were very small ale indeed; and a succession of orators, who spoke in strong gutturals, had thrown a man that they called Burns, I think, in my teeth, till I felt about as perplexed as a fly in a treacle-pot, and didn't know how to look. So, you see, when they came to telling me, at New York, to take lessons from Cooper, Fay, Flint, Bird, Sedgwick, et hoc genus omne, I did not feel at all strange, but took it rather as a compliment than otherwise. And so, seeing how the land lay, I talked to them about their everlasting fine country, which had given birth to the most everlasting lot of fine writers that ever dirtied paper; and told them how immortal proud I was to see such illustrious men as Halleck, and Bryan, and Peleg Longfellow, and Brown, and Smortolk around me; and then they cheered, and the band struck up 'Yankee Doodle,' and they all looked as lively as skinned eels. But the fancy ball at the Park Theatre, a few nights after, beat the dinner all hollow. Fill your pipes; and, Willis, mind you don't interrupt me with any of these verses of yours, but listen 'with an attent ear,' and I shall give you a full, true, and particular account of

THE DUGGINS FANCY BALL.

"The importunity of our kind friends detained us (nothing loath) so long at the festive board, that our preparations for appearing in fancy costume at this great national fête were necessarily curtailed. For my own part, I acknowledge that the copious draughts of American admiration forced upon me during that memorable evening, not to mention the champagne, were not without their effects. I felt, upon retiring to my apartment, slightly elevated, and would gladly, had it been possible, have pled the excuse of indisposition, and absented myself altogether. But I was conscious that, without me, that vast lamp-lit Transatlantic hall would appear to the mental vision of the spectators, as dark and dreary as the midnigh heaven without the cheerful moon; and mine i not the nature to inflict one pang of disappoint ment upon a single kindly heart, when any sacri fice of my own comfort or convenience can preven the sickly spasm. These reflections, and a coupl of soda powders, restored my equanimity, and proceeded forthwith to array myself in the dre which I had previously selected as the most appro priate for the occasion.

"I was intuitively aware that the extreme goo taste of the company would induce them in man instances to embody in a palpable form those char acters which have emanated with some little feli city from my humble pen. Such marked atten tion I was determined should be met upon my par with reciprocal delicacy: accordingly, as a com pliment to the characteristic features of the grea Republic, I had borrowed the dress and semblanc of one of their most distinguished citizens, and slight appliance of oil and lamp-black, togethe with a becoming disarrangement of the lowe garments, completed the transmutation of Charle Duggins into Mr. James Crow. I had persuade my poetical friends, Mr. Fitzgreen Halleck an Mr. Mullins Bryan, to countenance me in thi scheme, by adopting characters drawn from th unsurpassable fictions of the immortal Cooper and, accordingly, on my return to the drawing room, I was much gratified to find those gentle men attired with surprising fidelity,—the first a Natty Bumppo, the well-known Leather-stocking of the American Scott, and the other as Chingach gook, the Sagamore, with several fathoms of wam pum twisted round his waist, a tomahawk, as large as a coal-hatchet, in his belt, and as many scalps dangling about him as would have made the for tune of a London hairdresser.

"Ain't this the sort of thing, gentlemen?" said I, as, after performing several gyrations round the apartment in imitation of a whirling Derveesh, I struck, with elevated toe and depressed heel, the crowning attitude of the Columbian fakir, as I had seen it performed by Mr. Rice at the Adelphi.

"For I turn about, and wheel about, and do just so,
And every time I turn about, I jump Jim Crow."

"'Tarnal death to me, Bosh," replied Mr. Halleck, in convulsions, "if you a'n't enough to smother a 'possum—you are! But come, be spry! I'm chawed catawampously, if we won't be too late to see the gals splitting their toe-nails by the bushel—we will!"

"O yes!" added Mr. Mullins Bryan, affirmatively, in the strong nasal accent, characteristic of the true Columbian; whereupon we stepped into a coach, and drove straight to the place of festive expectation—the great theatre of New York.

"What pen shall describe the spectacle that awaited us there! How intensely gratifying to him who was the sole theme and object of a nation's homage! The pit of the enormous theatre was boarded over from the centre box to the back scenes, and crowded with animated figures, attired in every variety of gay and glittering costume. The boxes themselves were filled with the élite of the American nobility and gentry—all the high lood, all the intellect, all the beauty of Columbia as there! On one side sate the stately Virginian, ith wide-flowing nankeen pantaloons; his raven-lack glossy hair standing out in unpruned beauty ke a bush of funereal cypress, his sun-burnt heek as brown as the Havannah cigar which he eld within his finely chiselled lips. Beside him as the woodsman from far Kentucky, too sincere f heart to conceal his native forest manners be-eath the high military honours to which he had een self-elected. No! primitive and coatless, in ll the dignified and airy coolness of shirt sleeves, e sate with his Herculean legs thrown carelessly ver the front of the box; his checked shirt un-uttoned, so as to discover the shaggy redundance f a tawny chest, which, from the frequent sidelong lances of bright eyes, seemed to have a capillary ttraction for the ladies. The fragment of a pumpkin ie graced one of his hands, and a mighty bumper f gin-sling sparkled in the other. As I gazed n him, I felt my heart stirred with memories of ome, and my eyes moist with sweetest tears; for efore me there rose visions of the polished denizens f the shilling gallery at the Surrey, and the com-ination of refined enjoyment, and gay abandon, hich throws such a charm over the audience at Rous's Eagle Tavern, New City Road. Opposite the Kentuckian was the inhabitant of Arkansas, dis-ncumbering his brilliant teeth from dietetic frag-ments with the point of an enormous bowie-knife; nd in conversation with him the more refined D'Orsay of the Broadway, ever and anon ejecting rom his mouth, with careless grace, a jet of saliva inged with the hue of the cherished quid. And he women——but in mercy to myself, I must forbear describing them. Enough to say (and the words fall short of the reality) that all Paradise and New York were there.

"A general shout was raised at our entrance, and the rush towards us was so great, that I, though considerably above the average height of humanity, was in some danger of being over-whelmed. However, my friends, Natty Bumppo and the Sagamore, both men of extraordinary strength, set back to back, and by dint of vigorous kicks administered to the shins of the foremost of the throng, preserved something like breathing room. Halleck was the most emphatic.

"Darn your gander shanks, you cornshucking son of a crocodile!" said he, to a tall gentleman in a leather hunting-shirt, who was pressing pre-cipitately forward, "if you don't stand back from Squire Bosh, I'll be down upon you like a night-hawk on a June bug! Burn my old shoes, you 'tarnal nigger, do you hear me? Sheer off in some-thing less than no time, or I'll be too wrathy for my shirt to hold me; I will!"

"As my friend Mullins Bryan likewise announ-ced his intention of 'gouging' any individual, whose curiosity might overbalance his politeness, and with great liberality volunteered 'to whip his weight in wild-cats,' the ardour of the crowd con-siderably abated; and it was at length agreed that I should make the circle of the hall mounted on the shoulders of my friends, in order that proud America might behold her guest.

"On we went, the crowd gathering around us; bright, burning, blistering eyes darting lightning into mine—music, ringing in my ears, mingled with the shouts of admiration; a human ovation, probably without parallel since the days of Washington.

"Wherever I turned, I was stunned with cries of 'That's Bosh, is it?' 'Who's Bosh?' 'I'm blistered if I know.' 'Ain't he a ring-tailed squeal-ler? Darned if he don't beat all natur!'—'Crikey, which is him?' 'Him berry lubly, Missey Dinah! —I guess, him arn't bigger than a 'coon cub.' 'Garamighty, dat not Bosh; dat Massa Crow!' 'Him much too handsome!' 'Lively, I guess, as a Dutch cheese in the dog-days.'——''Tarnal death! straunger, stand off my corns.' 'Oh, you nigger, open the door and let the lady's heel out!' —'Isn't he the true breed, half horse, half alliga-tor, with a sprinkling of the steam-boat?' 'May I be shot, if he isn't.' 'O wake snakes and walk your chalks!'—'Three cheers for Duggins and independence!'—'That's your sort, old Loco-foco!'—'Take an ideer of drink, straunger?' 'Go a-head, Squire Bosh!' 'Liquor him, and he'll jump Jim Crow!' &c. &c.

"Amidst these and other gratifying exclama-tions, we made the tour of the theatre, when my friends set me down in a state bordering on suffo-cation, and I was formally introduced to the chief dignitaries of the place. This ceremony concluded, the dancing commenced with great spirit, and an elegance truly American, in minute spaces of five feet by four, dug out of the crowd by a posse of Kentuckians, who volunteered the assistance of their elbows for the occasion. I felt so much ex-hilarated, that I yielded to the request of some of my fair companions, and jumped 'Jim Crow,' and 'Sich a getting up stairs,' with a vivacity which surprised even myself. I was forced to re-peat this exhibition at various parts of the theatre; for when it became known generally that I danced these national figures, my entertainers were in such ecstasies, that they insisted on my going through them at every corner of the immense ball-room, that every person present might enjoy the sight. It was a fatiguing operation; but I am not one of those who can refuse to gratify the wishes of kindly hearts—"

"Get along, and never mind what you are!" I exclaimed.

"I can give no description of the brilliant scene in language vivid enough to convey the faintest idea of the reality. Even now, it flits before me like the disjointed fragments of those fairy visions which haunt the sleep of children—very little chil-dren, in the first bloom of innocence——"

"At these children again," screamed the Penciller!

Duggins continued—"those tender buds sprouting upon the tree of life. My heart is not seared; but yet it has survived its freshness!"

"And no mistake!" remarked Willis, paren-thetically.

"Between the intervals of the dance, I was highly gratified to observe the peculiar talent which many of the company exhibited in their personification of character. Of course, those drawn from my own works were most familiar to me; and I do not hesitate to say, that the performances, as a whole, were most creditable to the Transatlantic taste and feeling. Here two Messrs. Beerible, undeniable twins, brothers in love and in liquor, fraternally concocted a double sneaker of mint-julep: there, a Sniveller, with stentorian voice, demanded more fluid from the bar, or called upon a congenial Chuckster to circulate the rosy; and there, a John Browdie was making love to a blooming Kate Chuckleby in the choicest accents, and highly figurative language of Tennessee. On one side stood Mr. Winkin, arrayed for metropolitan sport, perfect even to the check of his unapproachable tie, with the sallow neck of a dead gosling depending from his shooting-bag: on the other, a Dolly Farden tripped bewitchingly along, casting sidelong glances of fascination at a representative of the great sea-serpent, who 'swinged the scaly horror of his folded tail' along half the floor of the theatre. But the most distinguished humourist of all was a Barnaby Fudge, who appeared with a real live turkey in his basket, an amazing animal, whose accomplishments fell little short of those possessed by the visionary Gripes. He accosted me thus:

"Ho, straunger! don't you know Barnaby, poor silly Barnaby, who can grin the bark off a gum-tree? You'll liquor us, master, won't you, for it's dry talking?—Eh heh?—Won't he, Gripes? won't he, you 'tarnal critter?"

"Gobble! gobble! gobble!—gone 'coon! gone 'coon! gone 'coon! Duggins, stand a sherry cobler; mix a julep up, we'll all have mint!" vociferated the bibulous bird.

"Well said, Gripes! brave Gripes!—Gripes is a knowing one, I calculate," said the fictitious Barnaby, placing his finger on the side of his nose, and edging me towards a side-table. "Mint's the word, eh? I'm from Natchez, where no man dare refuse grog before breakfast, and the pump-water is three-parts rum. Darn your wattles, Gripes! take them out of my tumbler, or I'll switch your tail with a coppersnake; I will!"

"Never say die! Drink's the thing!—Give Gripes a drink!—I'm a julep, I'm a julep, I'm a julep!" screamed the astounding turkey, every feather in its neck standing up like whalebone as it ineffectually pecked at the glass. Exhausted at length, it drew in its head to the basket, and issued copious orders for the immediate preparation of scores of juleps.

"Now straunger, take your change out of that," said Barnaby, shouldering his cudgel. "You won't grudge a dollar to stand treat for a rale genuine rough-neck, I calculate. I'll just step over to Namby-pamby Willis yonder, and bush-whack the old Adam out of the skeary critter, in less time than you'd skin a cockatoo!" So saying, he departed on his mission of mercy.

"By this time Willis had dropt asleep, or there is no saying how fatal the consequences of these personalities might have been.

"I was about to follow," continued Duggins, "when my eye was arrested by an interesting group, which I could not for a moment mistake. It was my fair-haired Nell, the most beautiful of my creations, my own peculiar dream-child, wi her old grandfather!—Yes! there they stood i living, glowing reality, eating macaroons in t lighted theatre of New York!—My heart yearn towards them.

"Come away, dear, do!" said the child, seizi the old man by the arm, "I have had a dreadf dream, and you musn't drink any more gin-sling —Come, and away with me!"

"Yes, but I will though, Nelly," said the o man, "for I'm thirsty—very thirsty.—Wh money have you about you, Nelly dear?"

"Don't now, dear!" said the child. "You' more than three-quarters corned already, and yo old head will be splitting to-morrow like a hicko nut."

"Look a-head for spontaneous combustion said Mr. Chuckster, swaggering up to the table "I'm a gray squirrel, if I won't stand brandy cock tails all round; I will. Straunger—let's liquor.

"I was on the point of complying with this cou teous invitation, when my attention was drawn t a gouging match between two gentlemen of th bar, which was decided in favour of the junio member, who plunged his thumb into the head the senior, and succeeded in forcing the eye fro its socket. This little incident over, dancing n commenced with great spirit: but it is really im possible to describe, with anything like accuracy all the events of this delicious evening. I migh did my modesty not forbid, descant upon the m dallions and decorations, of which the principa was a huge transparency representing the genius of Columbia in the act of crowning a certain indi vidual, and in large letters beneath,

"AMERICA'S WELCOME TO BOSH!"

But I shall forbear, and merely add, that I wen home about two o'clock of the morning, very suffi ciently in beer; that the harmony of the meetin was uninterrupted, save by a few bouts with th bowie-knife, (only five of which proved ultimately fatal;) and that in the words of my illustrious friend, James Langton Bennett: "It was a nigh long to be remembered—PERFECTLY PICKWICKIAN."

"Bravo, Duggins," I exclaimed, "that wil make a famous chapter in your forthcoming work on this country. You mean to publish your Im pressions of course?"

"Oh, yes, certainly, with illustrations, by my accomplished friend, Phiz, who, as he has never been in this glorious land, will do it admirably—his imagination being wholly unfettered by reality."

"A decided advantage. And what, pray, was your impression of the New Yorkers upon the whole?"

"Why, between ourselves, they are all very well, so far as dress and looks go, and hospitable enough, no doubt; but may I be whipped, if a more ill-bred, inquisitive, obtrusive set of bores ever worried a poor devil's life out of him. Wherever I went, I was stared at like a mountebank. If I walked abroad, I was not allowed to use my eyes for the crowds that pressed about me; and if I staid at home, I was not allowed a moment's ace by people calling, that I knew no more of an I do of the New Zealanders. At last I gave t that I was sick—dying—got a day's rest, cked up my traps, and started for Niagara!"

"Well, and what is your opinion of the famous lls?"

"Why, as to that," replied Duggins, "I have d some experience of cascades. That, for inance, at the Colosseum in the Regent's Park, has ways appeared to me a triumph of art. The sh of water occasioned by the opening of a cad lock, has ever struck me as one of the sublimest stures in nature; and no external object remains ore vividly impressed upon my mind, than the eat fall of the Water of Leith at Bell's Mills, ow visible from the Dean Bridge at Edinburgh, hich I visited when a young boy, a very little hild,—and again saw during my late visit. Notithstanding, I must confess, that the first view of Niagara took me by surprise. I was, in fact, not repared for it. The enormous volume of water—very ocean—rolling over the stupendous precice, the deafening sullen roar, and the drenching tmosphere of spray, do certainly form objects of ore than common interest. At the same time, the ir is decidedly damp and unpleasant, the temperare considerably below forty of Fahrenheit's scale, nd the Table Rock so sloppy, as to penetrate the hickest shoe."

"Excellent critic!" I exclaimed; calling to mind Yorick's exclamation in a well-known passage.

"I possess," continued Duggins, with a philosophical air, "a strong feeling of the sublime; but I have taken some pains to repress it: for, as a man dwelling among men, I consider the promotion of kindly and social emotions the first duty of existence; and experience has convinced me, that convivial hilarity is rarely to be found coupled with the more majestic attributes of savage nature."

"Spoken like an Aristotle!" cried I; as I blew a lengthened cloud from my calumet.

"Hongcore!" vociferated the Penciller, who was dreaming that he was listening to Mrs. Wood from the front seat of the shilling gallery at the Park Theatre, with his own Melanie by his side.

"Fancy Dick Swiveller at Niagara!" continued Duggins, rising in his tone. "Could that gorgeous spectacle awaken in his generous bosom any of the agreeable sensations which the sign of the Goat and Gridiron would inspire? No! Of him it might be said with Byron,

> "He heard it, but he heeded not. His eyes
> Were with his heart, and that was far away;
> The simple element he did despise—
> But where the tap-room in Whitechapel lay,
> There were his pot companions all the day,
> There sate the social Chucksters—

"My own feeling, I am not ashamed to say, is much the same."

"Duggins, you're a trump!" was all that I could find power to say, as in speechless emotion I handed him the flask of rum. He took an able-bodied pull at the generous fluid, and resumed.

"And yet I was overpowered—very much so, indeed, and so was my companion. My first exclamation was—'My eyes!' Hers was—'Well, did you ever?' and I believe we both felt the force of the sentiment. If I were asked to give a comparison of Niagara, I should certainly say, that it was like nothing in the world so much as a stupendous green stage-curtain flowing over an unbounded proscenium;—only I should rather think, that no sane spectator would care about a peep at what was going on behind.

"We were gazing at the Falls, when we heard a full musical voice below us, reciting some such verses as these:—

> "Seething with serpent hiss, that might appal
> The mightiest soul, the hell of water's hurl'd
> In thunder o'er the steep, as if that all
> The gods had set their seal, to give the world > Assurance of a glorious water-fall!"

"There's no snakes," exclaimed our friend Willis, who was with us, in his usual highly figurative style, "if that ain't Mullins Bryan spouting his own verses, the conceited nigger." "And so it was. Mullins Bryan, like myself, had fled the crowd, the hum, and shock of men, to wash off some of the dry dust of weary life in Nature's baptism; and we all returned to the hôtel together, where we made a jolly night of it, and projected that mad-cap expedition, which has landed me here, and left the bones of my poetical friend to whiten upon the prairies. Poor Bryan, thou wert as gentle a heart as ever dined upon roast chicken, or fanned the cheerful flame of sociality with a tumbler of thin negus."

"But what," I inquired, "put you upon making an expedition into the prairies among the savages and men of Inde?"

"You may indeed ask that!" replied Duggins. "I don't know how it was, but we got talking of the state of nature, and poor Bryan grew so eloquent about the prairies, and the rivers, and the mountains, and the buffaloes, and all that sort of thing, that I, who thought of them only as Leigh Hunt did of a withering lampoon, as something pleasant to read of in a book, conceived it might not be a bad idea to see something of the reality. And when Bryan reached the climax of his eloquence, and exclaimed,

> "And then to mark the lord of all,
> The forest hero trained to wars,
> Quivered and plumed, and lithe and tall,
> And seamed with glorious scars,
> Walk forth amid his reign, to dare
> The wolf, and grapple with the bear,

I felt satisfied that they must be a set of very fine fellows, these Indians, and resolved to make their acquaintance. Besides, what knew I but I might find a Pickwick among the Siouxes,—a Tim Linkinwater among the Pawnees,—a Mulberry Hawk among the Crows,—or a Swiveller among the Assinaboins? Bryan, too, wanted some ideas for his poems, and sure enough he stood direfully in need of them; and our friend the Penciller thought he might make a taking book by prying into the domestic secrets of the wigwam, and chronicling the small scandal of the smoking party in the New York Mirror. So we resolved to make a start of it, and accordingly off we set for the Indian country.

"We got on uncommonly well for a time, and I dare say should have managed to return home in a whole skin, but for that restless curiosity which, you know, is the besetting sin of our friend. We had spent a day or two with a party of the Blackfeet, with whom we had fallen in, and I had got into high favour with the chiefs, by making sketches of them; my friend Catlin had been among them before, and had inoculated them with a taste for the fine arts. I was looked upon as a great medicine man, and my friends and myself were treated with the utmost respect accordingly. But our friend there, not content with observing the manners of the Indians, as they showed themselves openly to us, resolved to take a sly peep of what went on within doors. He watched the moment when a brave entered his wigwam with his four young wives; and, creeping in, ensconced himself behind a pile of buffalo robes. What he heard or saw I suppose we shall learn one day from the New York Mirror. I never asked him. Suffice it that he had been outwitted in his eaves-dropping for once; for, while he was busy pencilling his observations, he felt himself grasped from behind, and on looking round, a fierce old Indian met his view, flourishing a grisly tomahawk in a playful but ominous manner above his head. Willis, who is a strong-boned fellow, and used to rough work, knocked him over and bolted. Bryan and myself were roused a few seconds afterwards by his calling to us to fly for dear life. In a twinkling we were on our horses' backs, and scouring along the prairie, while the howl of the infuriated Indians in pursuit lent new wings to our fear. However, we contrived to distance them; and morning's dawn, by the best of luck, brought us in sight of one of the Fur Company's forts, where we were admitted, and most hospitably entertained.

"We had not been long there when a host of our pursuers dashed up to to the palisades of the fort, flourishing their tomahawks and daggers, and filling the air with the most unearthly cries of vengeance. Finding that our fortification, however, was too strong for them, they retired. But the Indian, though foiled for a time, forgets not his revenge except in death; and of this we soon had experience.

"My friends and myself were sitting in one of the bastions of the fort one evening, smoking and chatting comfortably about things in general. The evening had been oppressively hot, and I had noticed that the sky was in some places as black as pitch. In a short time the whole firmament round and round was one mass of darkness. The clouds descended till they appeared almost to touch the ground,—the atmosphere was close and suffocating. I remarked to my friends, that, if I mistook not, we were going to have a fearful night. The words were scarcely out of my mouth when we heard a low moaning sound among the ravines. Presently the hurricane commenced, accompanied by the loudest thunder, the most vivid lightning, and the heaviest rain I ever saw. The bastion shook to its foundation. We ran down with all our speed. I lost my hat in crossing the fort; and by the lightning I could see the flagstaff bending like a willow. We reached our apartment in the fort with difficulty, and had scarcely done so when we heard something fall with a loud crash. We thought it was the old bastion, where we had been sitting, and the master of the fort tried to get out to see. After being fairly driven back four times by the wind and rain, he got out, and found the whole range of picquets on one side of the fort laid flat upon the ground.

"Here was a pretty business. The Indians, we knew, were close in the neighbourhood, and our party, which consisted of only eight men in all, besides my friends and myself, could present no opposition to their formidable numbers. So soon as we discovered the calamity, we seized our arms and rushed to occupy the trenches. The hurricane continued. The thunder pealed around us; and the occasional flash of the forked lightning served to add new terrors to the gloom. In about an hour the tempest abated; but not with it did our fears abate, for the crack of half-a-dozen rifles from the forest told us that the Indians were upon us. There was a pause of a moment, and you might have heard a pin fall along our line.

"Save your fire till you can get a view of the rascals," whispered the master of the fort. We did not require to economize it long; for, with a hideous whoop, the Indians dashed from the brake, and in a trice they were within a few yards of us. We fired, and not a ball but did its duty. The foremost brave received in his forehead the contents of our friend Bryan's rifle, and, jumping high in air, fell like a log to the earth. What followed is chaos—I saw Willis cutting about him like a Berserkar, giving and receiving gashes on every hand; and I warrant me, many a Blackfoot will carry his mark with him to the grave. Never could I have supposed the author of "Melanie and Other Poems," to have had so much mettle in him. I laid about me in all directions, and was growing faint with wounds, when a sudden blaze flashed out upon the midnight sky.—The fort was in flames! and the blazing pile lighted up the gashed and gory bodies of its unfortunate denizens. I sunk to the ground, alongside of my poor friend Bryan, who had been brought to the embraces of mother Earth by the blow of a club, some minutes before it bestowed a similar compliment upon myself.

"The dying groans of the unfortunate victims had scarcely sunk into the silence of death, when the Indians, hastily collecting their booty, placed my poor comrade, Mullins Bryan, and myself, who were the only survivors, upon two of the wild prairie horses, in the very centre of the cavalcade, and with ferocious yells of triumph, dashed at full speed into the heart of the boundless wilderness. Fettered, wounded, weary, and heart-broken as I was, the rapid motion and violent plunging of the animal which I rode somewhat recalled my energies, and enabled me with more attention to note the singular and terrific aspect of the savage tribe into whose hands I had fallen. Of a truth the survey was by no means encouraging. Conceive sixty or seventy tall, copper-coloured figures, half-naked, streaked over with seams of red and yellow paint, their faces tattoed with the most grotesque and hideous figures, gory scalps suspended from their waists, porcupine quills thrust through their noses and their ears, and mounted on a troop of infuriated horses as wild and frantic as though possessed by the demoniac spirit of their riders. Such was the ghastly troop that surrounded us,—the terrible and remorseless Blackfeet of the Chip-chow-cherry-chow river!

"With yell, and whoop, and eldritch laughter, we sped through the far Savannah, startling the gray wolf from his lair, and driving furiously through herds of astounded buffaloes. No rest, no refreshment,—not even a drop of water to moisten our parched lips, and allay the burning thirst that was gnawing at our vitals. Morning dawned; the sun glared upon us with intolerable vehemence.—Oh, that ever the blessed sun should become a weariness to man! Huge clouds of dust choked our feeble respiration,—my brain grew dark and dizzy, and I fell into a swoon.

"It was evening when I awoke. We had encamped for the night in a small ravine by the side of a murmuring stream. The clear stars already began to glitter in the dark-blue empyrean. The cool wind breathed upon my fevered brow with more than Elysian freshness. I raised my head with difficulty, and looked round. Our captors were seated by a huge fire, smoking their calumets, and circulating, with remarkable rapidity, several bottles of rum, part of the plunder from the fort. Near me lay Mullins Bryan, bound and shackled, his fine eye fixed with an expression of deadly hatred upon the savage group, and his hands convulsively clenched, as if clutching the fatal bowie-knife. I coughed slightly to attract his attention, and he turned his head.

"'Tarnal death to me, Duggins," said my friend, "if this a'nt a vicious fix, it is! Them bloodthirsty niggers will make mincemeat of us before long, or there's no snakes in Virginny, I reckon."

"Gracious heaven!" said I, "is there no possibility of escape?"

"Ax a 'possum to jump out of his skin!" replied Bryan. "It's as little use trying it as pumping for thunder in dry weather. I know the critters well. They're the bloodiest murdering set of savages in the prairies; and Lord help man, woman, or child, that falls into their hands,—gouging's a joke to it."

"An Indian advanced from the fire, and touched my shoulder. "Is the pale-face sad?" said he, in a tone of playful irony, "will he not drink fire-water with his red brother?" and he put a bottle to my lips.

"I drank, but not eagerly. The Indian observed me narrowly, and continued.

"The pale-face is a great medicine. Is not the fire-water good?"

"It is good," said I, "but I like it better half-and-half, and warm with."

"My brother is foolish," said the savage, with a chuckling laugh. "Fire and water no good together, better plain. Let the pale-face wait. He shall have it 'warm with' soon enough." Then turning to my companion, he ran his hand over his glossy locks, and said laconically,—

"My brother has a fine scalp."

"Darn your mocassins, you tarnation nigger!" shouted Bryan. "Take your obstumpulous fingers from my comb-box, or I'll make an expectoratoon of your gimlet-eye,—I will!"

"The Yenghese is angry. Anger is not good. My brother has a loud voice. Let us hear how he will sing his death-song at the stake."

"I cannot linger on these details. Even now the recollection of what I endured on that most fearful journey unmans me. I feel as if the tragedy were again reacting before me, and my blood curdles at the thought. In mercy to myself I must be short.

"On the evening of the second day we reached the Indian village. It was a hideous place. A circle of wretched, squalid wigwams formed a sort of arena, in the midst of which was planted the terrible war-post, with a heap of resinous faggots at its base. Round it were gathered the squaws of the tribe; lean, cadaverous hags, than whom Alecto must have been less revolting, and Hecate more humane. Children,—very, very little children (!) quite naked, like imps of darkness, crawled to and fro, contesting the possession of bones and half-gnawed morsels with the surly and ravenous dogs. Impotent old men, too, sate cowering at the entrance of their huts, shaking their withered hands and muttering curses at us, as, bound and helpless in the middle of the braves, we were led into the middle space, and made to lie down upon the ground, whilst a war-council was held around the pile.

"I'm a gone 'coon, I know," said Mullins Bryan. "They marked me when I shot their chief, the great Bull-turtle, as they called him, and my life isn't worth one of Willis's copyrights. But it's a huckleberry above my persimmon as to what they'll do with you; and so, Duggins, if you get off and return safe to New York, don't forget to tell Congress, that Mullins Bryan died like the American Byron he is, true to the rale principles of freedom, and an uncompromising enemy of all emancipation!"

"I will! I will!" said I, fervently; "and I'll write your epitaph——"

"You'll do it, Bosh,—you'll do it," interrupted Bryan, mournfully. "But you'll not do it well,—half so well as I could have written your'n; but that's past praying for. Only, if you should, just keep out all mention of the very little children, will you? in respect that there's a 'tarnation black little imp at this moment a-biting of my leg, and I cant't heel him no how."

"Great men will have their prejudices!

"At last the savages rose. Brandishing their tomahawks and scalping-knives, they rushed towards us, and, joining hands, executed an extempore war-dance around us, to the music of the hideous whoop. That over, an aged, scarred, skeleton figure, father of the fallen chief, stood forth, and spoke as follows:—

"Children of the Chip-chow-cherry-chow! listen to the voice of your Sachem. Seven times ten summers have past since Smack-whack-girnigo was young; tall as a warpost; spry as the mountain cat. His hand was on the scalp of the Yenghese: his foot on the trail of the buffalo. When the squaws cried for meat he gave it them; his wigwam was full of rum. But years came upon him, and his sinews were as weak as the skunk's. The 'coon sate upon the gum-tree, and laughed as he went by, and the father of the beavers was glad—

"But Smack-whack-girnigo had a son, and he was of the braves. Who was so swift as Calipash-awash, the great Bull-turtle of his tribe? When he smoked the calumet of peace, his breath was like the cloud of the morning; when he raised the war-whoop, the leaves of the forest fell. He filled his father's mouth with food. He gave him the roasted rattlesnake, and the baked opossum to eat, and he made his heart glad with the strong fire-water of the pale-face. But the Yenghese came to the crooked river, and drove the deer from the prairies; the beaver heard them and fled. The redskins dug up the war-hatchet; they threw fire into the fort and took the scalps of their enemies. They came back to the wigwams of their fathers, but Calipashawash was not with them, and Smack-whack-girnigo has a son no more!"

"Here the old savage paused, and the Indians yelled revengefully, with a dissonance more fearful than that of a chorus at Drury Lane.

"But the great Spirit is good. He loves the Chip-chow-cherry-chow. My young men have brought two pale-faces; and Calipashawash shall not go to the far hunting-grounds alone. The death-song of the Yenghese shall cheer him on his way. Let my young men light the pile."

"Swift as lightning this horrid mandate was obeyed. Thick jets of smoke began to rise from the crackling faggots, when the old man turned to us.

"The pale-faces are two," said he, "and death is slow. My young men love to look upon the burning of the brave, and the moon is but newly risen. Which of you will go first to the war-post and sing his death-song, that the ears of the other may be glad?"

"Before I had time to speak, Mullins Bryan burst out:—

"If my hands were free and a bowie-knife in them, you 'tarnation 'coon-faced nigger, I'd tickle your ribs without laughing. Howsomd'ever, I'm shot if I don't die like a free American; and since the best singer's to go first, I'm the man to break the heart of a nightingale. So kindle up your fires, you bloody critters, and do your worst. Duggins, my lad, I'm sorrier for you than myself. This is sort o' nat'ral to a down-Easter like me; but you're a straunger, and can't cotton to the business, no how you can fix it. There'll be talk o' this on Broadway, I reckon, anyhow. One comfort is, the President will be as wrathy as a painter. His shirt won't hold him, and he'll have them 'tarnal Injines lynched before six weeks are over, or there's no gougers in Hoboken."

"They tied Bryan to the stake, drew the lighted faggots in a circle round him, that the flames might scorch but not consume him, for the vengeance of the Indian is not easily slaked, and hand in hand resumed their horrid dance, like demons exulting over a fallen seraph.

"Firm and erect, in the midst of the fire, stood the dauntless and indomitable Bryan, no muscle moving, no nerve quivering, in the extremest agony. Pall-like, a huge cloud of smoke soon settled round his head, herald of the martyr's crown of fire, that was soon to envelop it; but from the middle of that funereal canopy, I could hear his manly voice, pouring forth the last impassioned accents of his soul—a dying swan, but alas! perishing in a fiercer element.

The Death-Song of Mullins Bryan.

"Come on, you 'tarnal Mingo!
I'll make you walk your chalks—
D'ye think I care, by Jingo,
For all your tomahawks?
Heap sticks upon your brander
Still higher if you can,
I'm more of salamander,
And less of mortal man;
You cannot shake my dander—
I'm rale American!

"My father was from Boston,
My uncle was Judge Lynch;
So, darn your fire and roasting,
You'll never see me flinch.
Come, pile the faggots bigger!
It's seldom you will see
A fellow of my figure
A-standing at your tree—
You darn'd 'tarnation nigger!
D'ye show your teeth at me?

"'Stir up your bloody natur';
You'll find me very soon
Half horse, half alligator—
With a sprinkling of the 'coon!
I've heard 'tis Injine fashions
To look a little spry;
So come, you black assassins,
And heap the faggots high;
And—'Burn your old mocassins,
You bloody imps,' say I."

"So ended the song—and with it, alas! ended the life of the intrepid Bryan. The chief, Smack-whack-girnigo, who had been for some time with difficulty restrained by his braves, now stung almost to madness by the opprobrious epithets lavished upon his race, sprung forward into the fire, and buried his tomahawk in the brain of the brave American. Mullins Bryan fell lifeless among the flames.

"It was now my turn for the sacrifice.—Strange as it may appear, every instant that brought me nearer to that burning pile seemed to give additional calmness and fortitude to my mind. I felt, as a martyr might do, superior to the fiery trial which awaited me, and determined that my bearing, in the last extremity, should not be unworthy of the noble example displayed by the American Byron. I had even (so lucid was my understanding) selected a little poem of my own, entitled 'The Ivy Green,' for my dirge; and doubt not that the wild Indians would have received it at least as favourably as an enlightened British public had done before them. But my destiny had decreed that my vocal powers should not be put to the test upon this occasion.

"The cold serpent-like fingers of the savages were already twining round my neck—already the death-damp stood in thick drops upon my brow—when a loud shriek was heard from one of the nearest wigwams. The Indians paused. A child—a very very little child—rushed to where I lay, and, flinging her arms around me, exclaimed—

"No, no!—you shall not kill him! He is my father!"

"It was the orphan daughter of Calipashawash, who, moved by a beautiful natural impulse, and perhaps by some indefinable resemblance between her deceased parent and myself, had interposed to save me from the murderous tomahawk. The Indians are a strange people. Another council was held, and, after the consumption of innumerable calumets, and all the remaining rum, it was unanimously agreed that the suggestion of the young lady should be ratified, and the stranger received into the tribe. I see you are getting drowsy, and shall not trouble you with the details of the interesting ceremony which ensued; suffice it to say, that, after a severe tattooing, I was raised to the distinguished rank of chief, under the title of Mastarumfri, or the Great Teller of Stories. A light supper of buffalo's liver, and a warm couch of polecat skins, in the Sachem's wigwam, awaited me, after the fatigue and agitation of the day."

"You don't believe that everlasting nonsense of his, about the very little child, do you?" exclaimed Willis, who had woke up at the mention of Calipashawash's daughter. "That dodge won't fit. But he's got into such a way of talking about young children, that he makes them the deus ex machina upon all occasions. I'm clear it was some young squaw took a fancy to him."

"'Pon honour," said Duggins, in a deprecating tone.

"Well, settle it between you," said I. "But, pray, how did you fall in with one another again?"

"Why," said the Penciller, "finding how the fate of our brush with the Indians was likely to go, I remembered me of the saw—

> That he who fights, and runs away,
> May live to fight another day, and, in the confusion occasioned by the burning of the fort, made my escape, seized one of the horses, and retreated into the wood, where I remained all night. In the morning, I crept to the fort, and found nothing but the blackened timbers, and the bleeding bodies of our friends. Among these, I saw no traces of Duggins there, or poor Bryan; so I concluded they must have been carried off by the Indians. I resolved to follow upon their trail, to gain tidings of them if I could, and, if possible, aid them to escape. At last I came upon the Indian village to which they had been taken, and while hovering about its outskirts, fell in with a young squaw, whom I had purchased, as a temporary wife, from her affectionate parent for half a pound of beads, during the visit which led to such fatal results. Would you believe it? The benighted savage actually preferred the glass to a dozen copies of 'Melanie,' my original tender! You all know the tenderness of the female heart. When she saw me, and after I had ascertained that Duggins still survived, I availed myself of her fondness for me, to procure another horse, and to drop a hint to my friend, that I was waiting for him in the neighbourhood. He contrived to give the Indians the slip, joined me, and a couple of days of hard riding brought us to where you found us; and mortal glad were we to see you, you may be sure—for we had been living upon pomme blanche, a root that St. Anthony himself would have sickened on, all the time."

> She rose, she flew, she clung to my embrace;

"And heartly rejoiced am I, I can assure you, that I should have tumbled over two such pleasant fellows in this outlandish region. But it is wearing late, and we are to start with the dawn. So, let us drain a bumper to the memory of poor Mullins Bryan, double ourselves up in our deerskins, and dream of fresh chapters for our friend Duggins's

'IMPRESSIONS OF AMERICA.'"

Miss Agnes Strickland's Lives of the Queens of England, from the Norman Conquest, &c. &c. Volume IV. With frontispiece and vignette. Colburn.

THE present volume of this attractive work does not lack for matter. Elizabeth of York, the heiress of the Plantagenet Kings, the "Good Queen" of Henry VII., leads the way to five of the six wives of the royal Blue-Beard, Elizabeth's son. The characters and fortunes of these distinguished women, such as they were, it has been Miss Strickland's object to exhibit unencumbered by public history, or those irrelative details which might interrupt the continuous interest of the several memoirs. "Their sayings, their doings, their manners, their dress, and such of their letters as have been preserved," are faithfully given; and, in order to do this, information has been gathered, both from the public muniments, and private MS. collections of old families and antiquarian collectors. It appears that many of the papers connected with, in particular, the personal expenditure of royalty, have disappeared. We should have hoped that this might have been caused by shame of that profligate expenditure; but Miss Strickland tells an extraordinary story of some tons of precious parchments having been boiled up into isinglass, to make jellies, and blancmange—probably, for the City feasts!

It gives a favourable impression of the spirit in which these Lives are composed, to find the author condemning the partial or party views of many historians, and their sycophantic manner of stating facts. "It was not thus," she remarks, "that the historians of Holy Writ performed their office. The sins of David and of Solomon are recorded by them with stern fidelity; for, with the sacred analists, there is no compromise between truth and expediency." In like manner has she dealt with Henry the Eighth, extenuating nothing. To heighten his vileness, to deepen the shades of his cruel and brutal character, was impossible even to a woman, inspired by the feelings of her sex. But if Miss Strickland has not concealed the frailties and vices of the personages of her narrative, she has dealt with them in a spirit of generous indulgence; allowing for the weakness of humanity, the force of untoward circumstances, and the many temptations which ensnare the fair favourites of princes. The "Good Queen," Elizabeth of York, she loves; Katharine of Arragon, she venerates and admires with enthusiasm; she can view with much indulgence the ambitious career of the wayward, accomplished, and unhappy Anne Boleyn; and Katharine Howard has never before, among her own sex, found so eloquent an advocate or so lenient a judge. The volume is full of Court anecdote, illustrative of manners; and abounds in lively traits of character, painted in the words of the individual described. The abundance bewilders choice; but the following detached passages may convey an idea of the lighter parts of the several narratives. Henry's passion for Anne Boleyn had, by this time, alarmed his delicate conscience as to his marriage with Katharine; and he had resolved to be divorced from his Queen, whom he now called his brother's wife; but the pear was not yet ripe; and——

Henry soothed the poor queen by hypocritical dissimulation, persuading her that the scruple of the Bishop of Tarbes was the sole cause of the point being mooted, and that the ecclesiastical inquiry respecting the validity of her marriage was only instituted that it might never be questioned to the prejudice of their child. With such plausible explanation, Katharine, after a "short tragedy," rested tolerably well satisfied, and waited patiently for the good result promised by the king. To her rival (who was now well known at court to be such) she behaved with invariable sweetness. Once only she gave her an intimation, that she was aware of her ambitious views. The queen was playing at cards with Anne Boleyn, when she thus addressed her,—

"My lady Anne, you have the good hap ever to stop at a king; but you are like others, you will have all or none."

By this gentle reproach, Queen Katharine, in some degree, vindicates the honour of her rival, intimating that Anne Boleyn would be the king's wife or nothing to him. Cavendish, who records this pretty anecdote, likewise bears witness that the queen at this trying crisis "behaved like a very patient Grissel."

While matters remained in this state at court, a dismal pestilence broke out in the metropolis, and several of the royal household dying suddenly, the king, who had made such pathetic harangues regarding the pains he had in his conscience arising from his marriage with the queen, was now seized with a true fit of compunction. Its symptoms were indicated by his sending Anne Boleyn home to her friends, and returning to the company and conversation of his queen, and sharing in her devout exercises. His recreations during this quarantine, were compounding, with his physician Dr. Butts, spasmodic plasters, ointments, decoctions, and lotions. The recipe for one of these precious compositions was made public for the benefit of England, under the name of "the king's own plaster." Moreover the king made thirty-nine wills; and confessed his sins every day.

Henry's penitence was precisely of the same nature as that described in some oft-quoted lines relative to his sable-majesty, "when sick;" the pest abated, the king's jovial spirits returned, he wrote love letters perpetually to his beautiful favourite, and huffed away his wife. The cardinal legate Campeggio having arrived to hold the court of inquiry regarding the validity of his marriage, he was once more elate with hope of long life and a new bridal.

ANNE BOLEYN'S BIRTH-PLACE.

To Blickling was decreed the honour of Anne Boleyn's birth. As Sir Henry Spelman was a Norfolk man, and the contemporary of Queen Elizabeth, we think his testimony, borne out as it is by the opinion of the late noble owner of the domain, is conclusive. No fairer spot than Blickling is to be seen in the county of Norfolk. Those magnificent arcaded avenues of stately oaks and giant chestnut trees, whose majestic vistas stretch across the velvet verdure of the widely extended park, reminding us as we walk beneath their solemn shades, of green cathedral aisles, were in their meridian glory three hundred and forty years ago, when Anne Boleyn first saw the light in the adjacent mansion.

The room where she was born was shown, till that portion of the venerable abode of the Boleyns was demolished to make way for modern improvements. Some relics of the ancient edifice have been evidently united to the new building, and the servants were formerly in fear of a domestic spectre, whom they call "Old Bullen." One room in the old house was shut up, on account of the supernatural terrors of the household. It is called "old Bullen's study." There are gigantic statues of Anne Boleyn and queen Elizabeth on the staircase. Gog and Magog in Guildhall are pigmies in comparison to these sculptured queens, yet their proportions are graceful. They are of wainscot, painted white. I saw them when very young, and was much impressed with the fashion of their robes, which are truly royal in amplitude and length. The head-dress of Anne Boleyn's statue is not the coif edged with pearls which bears her name, but is a small bangled hat. The full sleeves are confined to the arm, at regular distances, with strings of pearls.

The first years of Anne Boleyn's life were spent at Blickling with her sister Mary and her brother George, afterwards the unfortunate Viscount Rochford. Thomas Wyatt, the celebrated poet, was in all probability her playfellow; for his father, Sir Henry Wyatt, was her father's coadjutor in the government of Norwich castle, and when the Boleyns removed to Hever castle, in Kent, the Wyatts were still their neighbours, residing at Allington in the same county.

PORTRAIT OF ANNE BOLEYN.

"There was at this time presented to the eye of the court," says the poet Wyatt, "the rare and admirable beauty of the fresh and young lady Anne Boleyn, to be attending upon the queen. In this noble imp, the graces of nature, adorned by gracious education, seemed even at the first to have promised bliss unto her in after times. She was taken at that time to have a beauty, not so whitely, as clear and fresh above all we may esteem; which appeared much more excellent by her favour, passing sweet and cheerful, and was enhanced by her noble presence of shape and fashion, representing both mildness and majesty, more than can be expressed." Wyatt is rapturous in his commendations of her musical skill, and the exquisite sweetness of her voice, both in singing and in speaking. In the true spirit of a lover, the courtly poet, when he mentions the malformation of the little finger of the left hand, on which there was a double nail, with something like an indication of a sixth finger, says, "but that which in others might have been regarded as a defect, was to her an occasion of additional grace, by the skilful manner in which she concealed it from observation." On this account Anne always wore the hanging sleeves, previously mentioned by Chateaubriant as her peculiar fashion when in France. This mode, which was introduced by her into the court of Katharine of Arragon, was eagerly copied by the other ladies. Her taste and skill in dress are mentioned even by Sanders, who tells us "she was unrivalled in the gracefulness of her attire, and the fertility of her invention in devising new patterns, which were imitated by all the court belles, by whom she was regarded as the glass of fashion." The same author gives us the following description of her person from a contemporary, not quite so enthusiastic in his ideas of her personal charms as her admirer the poetical Wyatt.

"Anne Boleyn was in stature rather tall and slender, with an oval face, black hair, and a complexion inclining to sallow; one of her upper teeth projected a little. She appeared at times to suffer from asthma. On her left hand a sixth finger might be perceived. On her throat there was a protuberance, which Chateaubriant describes as a disagreeably large mole, resembling a strawberry; this she carefully covered with an ornamented collar-band, a fashion which was blindly imitated by the rest of the maids of honour, though they had never before thought of wearing anything of the kind. Her face and figure were in other respects symmetrical," continues Sanders; "beauty and sprightliness sat on her lips; in readiness of repartee, skill in the dance, and in playing on the lute, she was unsurpassed."

Having thus placed before our readers the testimony of friend and foe, as to the charms and accomplishments of the fair Boleyn, we will proceed to describe the allowance and rules that were observed with regard to the table of the ladies in the household of Queen Katharine, to which Anne was now attached.

Each maid of honour was allowed a woman servant and a spaniel as her attendants; the bouche of court afforded ample sustenance not only to the lady herself but her retainers, both biped and quadruped, were their appetites ever so voracious. A chine of beef, a manchet, and a chet loaf, offered a plentiful breakfast for the three; to these viands was added a gallon of ale, which could only be discussed by two of the party. The brewer was enjoined to put neither hops nor brimstone into their ale, the first being deemed as horrible an adulteration as the last. The maids of honour, like officers in the army and navy at the present day, dined at mess, a circumstance which shows how very ancient that familiar term is. To the honour of the ladies we have nothing to record of their squabbles at mess. "Seven messes of ladies dined at the same table in the great chamber. Manchets, beef, mutton, ale, and wine, were served them in abundance, to which were added hens, pigeons, and rabbits. On fast days their mess was supplied with salt salmon, salted eels, whitings, gurnet, plaice, and flounders. Such of the ladies as were peers' daughters had stabling allowed them."

Miss Strickland contends, that both Anne Boleyn, and Anne of Cleves, who came to England a Lutheran, and who, for a time, was the hope of the Reformed cause, died Roman Catholics.

Luther, a Poem. By Robert Montgomery, M.A., Author of "The Omnipresence of the Deity," "The Messiah," "Satan," &c., &c.

Whether is it more desirable for a man to have his writings almost universally abused by the critics and criticlings, and yet to be exceedingly popular in his day and generation; or to be lauded above measure by the press, and neglected by the public? This query comprehends the exact position of Mr. Montgomery. No living author is more heartily abused, and, if we may judge by the number of editions of his works that are sold, no contemporary poet is more generally read. There is in this, to any reasonable rhymer, abundant consolation for ill-natured criticism; and we make no doubt that Mr. Montgomery is perfectly satisfied.

Abused as we understand LUTHER has been, it is nevertheless its author's greatest work; his masterpiece. The subject is among the most lofty that remains in our day to a poet's choice; and if the author has not made the most of that which had been a task for Milton, he has shown, with a generous ambition, no despicable ability in realizing his aspirations. The due concoction of a design so comprehensive, and involving so many minute parts, might have taken much longer time than has apparently been bestowed upon the voluminous epic; and there is certainly abundant scope for the pruning-knife, in its desultory luxuriance. But with all this, there is mingled great excellence, and that copiously. If we do not always feel the power of the poet, then that of the rhetorician, the eloquent declaimer, must be confessed. Though Mr. Montgomery views Luther as the author of a finished work, rather than in what we consider the true light—namely, as a brave pioneer in the march of ecclesiastical and religious Reformations—the attention which his poem will draw to the manly character, and to the genuine Protestantism of the great Reformer, must, at this particular crisis, be productive of much good. It is not possible for the most zealous priest of the Church of England, as by law established, to conjure a Puseyite or a Formalist out of Martin Luther.

An elaborate prose Introduction, giving a sketch of the character and career of Luther, is prefixed to the Poem, for which it is a fitting preparative. Luther is written in blank verse, and divided into sundry sections, or paragraphs, according to a scheme announced at the opening. Our specimen is of the level manner of the work, and taken from that division of it entitled "Characteristics,"—of Luther, of course.

Genius hath faults, and Luther's none o'erveil.
A brave restorer of departed truth,
No hollow semblance, and no heartless shade,
Came he on earth to manifest or preach.
Manful but rugged; to the centre bold,
His heart beat fiercely, and his blood ran fire,
When Right divine, or diabolic Wrong
Challenged his faith, or forced his feeling out
In action; then the soul's tornado raged,
And shook the spirit to its moral roots!
Stormful and strong, and gusty in his moods,—
Oft the black whirlwind from some ireful cloud
Roused his rent bosom with disturbing rush,
And hurled propriety from off its throne
Amazed and o'er-mastered! His was battle-life—
Great-hearted being! with a lion plunge
Full on the foe, with all his living fire,
Leapt his free soul, magnanimously firm—
And—no surrender!—for the truth must fight,
And faith prove conflict if it stand sincere!
. . . . Like some burly oak,
Whose boughs wage battle with the tearing winds,
And bend, but never break,—his fighting heart
Contended with all mutinies that came
From Prince or Pope; from circumstance or creed,
And grappled with them; or with Samson force
Subdued them,—or himself with glorious fall
Laid prostrate. Sinful oft his moody ire,
And hot afflatus of o'er-heated faith
Betrayed him; unadvised words he spake;
And sometimes when his furnace heart o'er-boiled,
Scattered both friend and foe, with burning froth
And scalding fury! Like a soul on fire,
Intensely real, with his raging glow.
The gentle wondered, and the wise condemned,
To see him thus by evil lightnings rent,
And harrowed; but how soon the tempest died,
And the broad sunshine of forgiving love
Blazed o'er his spirit, like a summer noon
Settled and bright. Not always hot and harsh Did Nature find him; playful he could be;
For oft that smiting earnestness of tone
Priestly or papal, with a forcing might,
That scorned the false, and cleaved all Faction through,
That flashed with fierceness, like a sword's descent,
Melted away; and like an infant lulled,
Pathetic Luther, all the poet-life
Of purest feeling testified and taught.
Witness ye tears that dropt o'er Tetzel's bed
When reft and dying; and o'er thine that fell Beloved and lost, and beauteous Madaline!
. . . . . .
Luther had faults,—but can this feeble Age,
When Forms Heroic, such as olden life

Admired and moulded, are to faith and fact
No more,—where little-hearted Truths prevail,—
Where Mammon chiefly is the standard used,
And God's own world (where angel-wings yet play
In secret motion o'er the homes of men)
Is made an Engine, whose mechanic force
A mill may work, a manufacture sway,—
Oh! can this age, so derogate and dead,
The mighty passion, and majestic heart
Of Luther rightly, and with reverence, weigh?

. . . . . .

"Luther had faults,"—but, Oh, ye little Minds,
Less in your faith, and lesser still in deeds
That make the hero, or the man unfold
In full-soul daring, while the outer life
Ye ponder, have ye pierced the core within?
A fool can censure where a prophet weeps,
When life is only by its faults and falls
Reviewed; but underneath what noble tears,
What pangs remorseful, penitence, and prayers,
What struggles mute, what passionate regrets,
Deep in the bosom—there begins the fight!
And there the battle-scene 'tween flesh and faith
Unfold its grandeur; all without appears
The moral echo of that inward din,—
The mere reflection of internal strife,
In fitful shadows thrown on human eyes;
Yet, these are chiefly what adjudging sense
Accredits; character from these is drawn,
And so with Luther; bold as blazing fact
The failings of his outer life advance
To catch the censure of prosaic eyes,
And hearts that never with emotion rocked
Themselves or others; but the secret fight
Internal, when the wild and wasted heart
Struggled and strove, contending with the fiends
Of darkness,—baffled oft, bleeding, and faint,—
But yet right upward through eclipsing gloom,
Through storm and danger, and disastrous wrong,
From famished boyhood e'en to fearless man,
Advancing, with a most unconquered will,
To Heaven and virtue—who hath laurelled this?
Or wreathed the record with a just renown?

The Childhood of Luther, and several other of the heads, might have furnished us with samples more purely poetical than the above; but none that, within the same bounds, gives a more complete idea of the work. The Roman Catholics may, and with justice, affirm that Mr. Montgomery has dealt severely by them; but, with the subject in hand, it was not easy to spare the corruptions of the Church of Rome.

SERIAL WORKS.

Brande's Dictionary of Science, Literature, and Art. Part XI.—This valuable work, whether for information or easy reference, will be completed in another Part. Of it we may affirm, that there is not one word superfluous, nor any important fact omitted. It is composed upon the high-pressure principle, and compresses a vast deal of excellent matter into wonderfully little space.

Knight's Pictorial Shakspere. Part XLII.—The Three Noble Kinsmen, with a critical notice on the authorship of the drama.

England in the Nineteenth Century. Part IV. Southern Division—Cornwall; and Northern Division—Lancashire.

The Gaberlunzie's Wallet. Part IV.—These sketches, but above all the verses interspersed with them, fully sustain the high character which this work received on its appearance. Dot the artist, is now fairly entitled to divide laurels with Jot the poet and fictionist; or, more correctly, each must, from their conjoint labours, increase the other's share of fame. The illustrations are quite in the spirit of the work.

Waterston's Cyclopedia of Commerce, Mercantile Law, and Finance. Part IV.—This Part contains, among other articles, the important ones to commercial men of Insolvency, Insurance, and Interest.

Canadian Scenery. Part XXIV.

Scenery and Antiquities of Ireland. Part XIII.

POLITICAL REGISTER.

Income Tax.—As was generally anticipated, the Income Tax has passed the House of Commons—not without a great deal of talk, but without any real opposition. Lord John Russell's resolutions caused a debate of four nights; and the division being 202 for the amendment, and 308 against it, gave a majority of 106 in favour of the Ministry—a result which shows that the Tories maintain their power unbroken in the House of Commons.

Right of Petitioning.—A rather unexpected victory was, however, gained over Sir Robert Peel, with regard to the right of petitioning against a pending measure of taxation. Sir Robert Peel contended that it had been the practice for 150 years not to receive such petitions. The question was first raised on a motion by Mr. Thomas Duncombe; but was negatived by a majority of 167 to 136, leaving a majority of 31. Mr. Duncombe, however, declared his determination to present every petition that was sent to him, leaving the House to reject it, if they were so disposed. Accordingly, a day or two after his first motion had been disposed of, he presented a petition against the Income Tax; and although called to order by the Speaker, he insisted on his right to address the House. Thereupon a lengthened debate ensued, and he intimated his intention of persevering from night to night if the motion were rejected; and it was only lost by a majority of one in favour of Ministers, the numbers being 222 and 221. It was, no doubt, felt to be too serious a matter to exclude, by a solemn resolution of the House, the people from petitioning at the very time at which, above all others, it is their interest that petitions should be received. For example, in the present case of the Income Tax, had petitions not been allowed to be received during the discussion of the bill in the House of Commons, (and to say the truth, we don't see what harm would arise had none of them been presented,) there was no opportunity of remonstrating against the tax till the bill reached the House of Lords, where, of course, any measure of the Ministry for the time being is always safe.

The New Corn Bill.—The new Corn Bill is making the same sort of progress through Parliament as the Income Tax; that is to say, opposed and growled at by all classes, particularly the landed interest, whom Peel drags at his heels; and reluctantly supported by them, lest the loss of it lead to his resignation, and the ousting of the Tory party from office. The landlords have, no doubt, also the fear of the Anti-Corn Law League before their eyes, and are glad to take what they can get, lest worse befall them. They will also benefit greatly,—though they either don't know, or pretend not to be sensible of it,—by the addition of the 150 towns to those from which the averages are at present taken. The best grain, like the best of every other commodity, always finds its way to the best markets; while the inferior is in general sold and consumed in the locality of its produce. Hence there will be practically a large return of grain of inferior quality, and dressed in an inferior manner, thereby causing a considerable increase of the duty, particularly in the lower parts of the scale. Joseph Sturge of Birmingham, one of the greatest corn-merchants in Britain, calculates this increase at 8s. a quarter; and if he be correct in his calculation, even to a limited extent, it will be seen how serious a tax is imposed on the country for the benefit of the landed interest. Mr. Hawes maintained that the new list of towns would have a strong effect on the averages. He had made inquiries among persons long and extensively engaged in the corn trade, and the answers he had received had convinced him of the fact. Some persons estimate the reduction of the averages at from 2s. to 4s. And sedulous care had been taken to include districts growing wheat of inferior quality, while districts growing wheat of the best quality were excluded. Sir Robert Peel and Mr. Gladstone contended that the addition of the 150 towns would have no influence on the averages. Why, therefore, make any change? We may be sure that the trouble and additional expense of procuring accurate returns from so great a number of towns, dispersed all over England, would not have been incurred without some object in view.

Petitions against the Tariff.—Nothing is more amusing than to read the petitions of, we believe, every trade, against either an increase or a decrease of the existing duties. Every trade seems thoroughly resolved to shift the burden from its own shoulders, and put it on its neighbours', and leave it to get quit of it as it best may. Such is the morality of the present religious age.—We have the heads of 160 firms in the city petitioning against the reduction of the duty on coffee, and suggesting a scale of their own.—"Above half the mining interests of the country" have adopted a series of resolutions, condemning the measures proposed by Ministers, with respect to copper, tin, and the ores, and preparations in those metals; declaring, with the usual exaggeration, that such alteration would be a total destruction of the property invested in mines; not forgetting the injuries sustained by the parties supplying the iron, timber, ropes, powder, and tallow candles.—The glove trade is also up in arms; as well as the boot and shoemakers: and, to quiet the alarms of these persons, it is proposed, by the revised tariff, to increase the duty about a third.—The cork-cutters, however, have not been so fortunate; for instead of being prohibitory, as heretofore, the duty is to be reduced one shilling or two a hundred weight; by which it is gravely pretended "by persons having authority," and engaged in the trade, that 30,000 men will be thrown out of employment; a greater number than in all probability there are employed in the trade in Europe. But the most extraordinary part of the tariff, is the reduction of the timber duties, by which £600,000 of the revenue is given up, apparently for no purpose whatever.

The Agricultural Interest has, as usual, been opposing any change by which they anticipate that the food of the people will be lowered in price. The farmers in the North of Scotland are objecting to the removal of the present prohibition on the importation of cattle, sheep, &c.; those of the midland counties of Great Britain are exclaiming against the new Corn Bill, and the increase on the duties of rape and oil-cake; and the southern counties of England, against the reduction of the duty on clover-seed from £1 to 10s. a hundred weight. The proposed duties on cattle and meat have evidently been constructed without any principle at all, and with the view of enabling the landed interest to amend them according to their own fancy. What proportion is there between charging £1 of duty on a full-grown ox of forty stone, for example, and 10s. on a calf, which is probably not worth that sum? Suppose, again, an ox of the above weight brought in the shape of salted meat, the duty would be 56s., so that by bringing it in a live state a saving of £1, 16s. would be made. It is evident that so rickety a scale will not stand the assault of the House of Landlords. It is the more unnecessary to resort to any such arbitrary duties, as there is a mode of measuring live cattle, sheep, &c., by which their weight within a few pounds can be ascertained. With regard to the duty on rape and oil cake, we cannot but think that the raising of the duty would be no great harm; for the beef of oxen fed principally on this food, however rich and oily, is of very inferior quality to that fed on the ordinary food, such as grass and turnips. Whenever any alteration is proposed in the laws regarding the importation of agricultural produce, the farmers get out with a howl, that, if it be carried through, they will be unable to pay their rents; as if the public had ever agreed to guarantee their engagements to their landlords. Had duties been increased, we do not suppose that they would be selling their produce at ten or twenty per cent. under the market price, for the benefit of the public. Why, therefore, if they are to run all the chance of gain by the change of the law, are they to run no risk of loss? The obvious remedy, if the rents are too high, is to reduce them; and if the landlords, from the extravagance in which they have indulged, are unable to meet their engagements, they must just do what other people do in the circumstance—give up their estates to their creditors. The agitation got up, on this occasion, by the East Lothian, Berwickshire, and Roxburghshire agriculturists, is particularly ill-founded. The farms in these counties are almost entirely let on leases of nineteen or twenty-one years; so that nearly one-third of the present leases must have been taken before the passing of the existing Corn Law in 1828, and when an impending change of the law was inevitable. Besides, it is in vain for any one to pretend, in a country like this, that he ever calculated on any law being immutable. It ought also to be kept in view, for our readers will not learn from the proceedings at the agricultural meetings, that in arable farms the reduction on the duty of clover seed will go far to pay the tenant's Income Tax; so that there is no more danger of the farmers being utterly ruined, and the land thrown out of cultivation just now, than there has been since the end of the war, during all which time the agricultural interest never ceased to complain.

SCOTLAND.

The Kirk.—The principal object of attention here, for some time past, has been the proceedings of the clergy, which have astonished every person of common sense; and seem to indicate that the downfall of the Establishment is not far distant. Every care has been taken to pack the ensuing General Assembly, by returning, almost exclusively, Non-Intrusionists from the Presbyteries: so that the other party will have no chance in any contest that may take place in the Assembly. It is said that Professor Welsh is to be Moderator; and Viscount Strathallan, or Lord Arbuthnot, Commissioner. We think that it is a pity that a younger man than either should not have been appointed. Whether held out as a mere empty threat or not, we cannot tell; but circulars have been published under the authority of Drs. Chalmers, Candlish, and others of the highflying party, in which it is proposed that, at the ensuing Assembly, the whole minority of the Church should be deposed; the parishes declared vacant, preparatory to their being supplied with new Ministers, to be appointed by the Presbyteries. A company is to be formed on the model of the Wesleyan Methodists, for the payment of their salaries, at the rate of from £150 to £200 per annum. It will be easier to form a company than to get the money; for, suppose only 200 or 300 of the parishes out of the 1100 in Scotland are declared vacant, this will require from £40,000 to £50,000 a-year. The new Kirks, however, are to be built upon a scale of unparalleled economy. They are to be of wood: and Dr. Candlish states, that for £100 a wooden kirk can be built, which will accommodate from 600 to 700 people. We have no doubt, that on the first windy day the whole fabric will be blown down about the ears of the hearers. This is, no doubt, a bugbear held out to annoy Government, and will be treated with the contempt it deserves. But were it carried into effect, it would only be following out the Church Extension Scheme, which has been so unaccountably allowed to drop since the schism in the Kirk broke out. We think that some subscriber to the Schemes of the Church should call for an account of the investment and expenditure of the subscriptions; for there is great reason to believe that part of these funds has been expended for very different purposes from those for which they were intended. We are glad to observe, that, notwithstandinding all the threatened attempt a second time to stop the travelling of the Edinburgh and Glasgow Railway on the Sunday, public breakfasts, &c., the whole affair ended in smoke; for at the meeting of the shareholders, on the 15th April, they did not venture even to bring forward their motion. On the contrary, Sir Andrew Agnew made an apology, for advertising so long and loudly their intention again to bring forward the motion, thereby causing unnecessarily many shareholders to attend who would not otherwise have been present.

Mr. Hume and the Montrose Burghs.—The people have much cause to rejoice that the most faithful and efficient representative they ever had in the House of Commons has again been sent there; and at a time when his services will be particularly valuable. After much intriguing to keep him out, in which the Honourable Fox Maule had as usual his full share, Mr. Hume has succeeded in securing his return for the Montrose Burghs. We are surprised that a gentleman like Mr. Carnegy of Craigo, a good Reformer, and of considerable local influence, could be induced to allow himself to be made a cat's-paw by the late Home Secretary, for the purpose of endeavouring to secure the election of Mr. Stanley; he having gone the length of writing to Mr. Hume that he was a candidate, when it would appear from the whole proceedings that he never had any such intention. We cannot help thinking that Mr. Carnegy has damaged his character considerably by lending himself as a party to the Stanley Plot. All's well, however, that ends well; and the return of Mr. Hume, in the present state of the House, is of more consequence than the election of a score of Whigs.—Mr. T. Duncombe will now have an able coadjutor in carrying on the war against the factions in the House.

Affghanistan.—Although the reports from Affghanistan are still vague, there seems no reason to doubt that the whole Anglo-Indian force, with the exception of a few of the officers, has been annihilated. Great blame is attached to General Elphinstone, and loud demands are made for an inquiry into his conduct. It will be some time before it can be possible to hold such an inquiry, for there is little doubt that Dost Mahommed will take good care not to deliver up the prisoners till he makes favourable terms of capitulation. A loud call is made in many quarters for signal punishment of Dost Mahommed, and laying his country waste with fire and sword. But how this is to be accomplished, without sacrificing the lives of the prisoners, is not easily seen. We deprecate the intended vengeance, as wasteful, cruel, and unchristian. The sufferers would be chiefly our own troops, and the women, children, and helpless old men of the offending country; for the real perpetrators of the late sanguinary outrages would retire to their mountain fastnesses, on the approach of the invading force. Why do not the Scottish pulpits ring with anathemas against the wars—the notoriously unjust wars, in which we are engaged? Is the Sixth Commandment less sacred in the eyes of the Ministers of the Gospel of Peace, than the Fourth?

China.—Notwithstanding the boasted activity of the new Commander-in-Chief, he is doing a great deal less than his predecessor Elliot, by his exaction of the ransom-money for Canton, at least helped to make the war pay its own expenses—a thing which has not happened, we believe, since Anson took the Spanish galleons. The Tories pretend to be very indignant at the exaction of the ransom-money; but we do not find that any complaint now is made at the placing of £340,000 of it to the credit of the last quarter's revenue.

TRADE AND MANUFACTURES.

It is almost unnecessary for us to repeat month after month, that the distress continues unabated in the manufacturing districts. We may just give a few specimens of the condition of them, taken at random. In Manchester—The depression in this market continues without the slightest abatement. Rochdale—Few pieces have been sold, and the prices offered would do little more than pay the price of the raw material. The Wool market is dull. Stockport—Double houses which two or three years ago let for 2s. 6d. and 3s. per week, are offered at 7d. clear of all rates. Leicestershire—There is no improvement in the demand. Leeds—The business done is not half what is usual at this period of the year. Preston—A pretty general reduction of wages has taken place. Bolton—The trade here and in the neighbourhood, never was in a more unsettled state. Power Loom cloths are very much depressed. Brass and Iron founders are very slack. Hundreds of mechanics are wholly out of employment, and wages are from 50 to 70 per cent. lower than in 1835. Lancashire—The Cotton trade is in a most depressed state. Dundee—The number of the employed is diminishing, and upwards of 900 require aid from the Relief Association. Dysart, Pathhead, &c. &c.—Of the total number of looms, 1840, 531 are idle. In the village of Auchtermuchty, there were, some time ago, 277 idle looms. This is merely a specimen of the reports from various quarters; and it would be easy to double or triple similar accounts.

Agriculture.—The weather has been very favourable for sowing the spring crops; although it is complained, in some parts of England, that owing to the quantity of rain which fell during the latter part of last year, and since, the clay land has wrought very stiff and heavy. In the South of England a great part of the spring wheat was not sown till the middle of February, and no confident opinion can be formed as to its prospect. Some looked so indifferently, that it has been ploughed over and sown again. The young crops of all descriptions are exceedingly backward; and in Scotland, very little grass is yet to be seen, even in the most sheltered situations. The consequence has been, that the sheep markets have been completely overstocked, and prices have sunk greatly, as compared with last year's. At the House of Muir Market, near Edinburgh, held on the 28th March, there were 14,300 sheep shown; about double the quantity that has ever appeared in that market in any year since 1834. Prices were, of course, greatly down, fully a third from those at last year's market.——It appears from the reports from the best informed quarters, that the stocks of free foreign wheat are at a very low ebb, and the actual quantity appears to be much shorter than is usually the case at this season. That last crop was deficient is undisputed; but it is in vain to attempt to make any distinct estimate. Calculations vary from a fourth to a sixth, taking quantity and quality into account; so that a large importation of foreign wheat will be required before next crop can be ready for consumption. A very exaggerated notion is held out in some quarters, no doubt for interested purposes, of the immense number of cattle which will be imported when the present prohibition is removed. Some of these estimates go as high as 20,000 or 30,000 a-year; but we think the estimate of Professor Low of the University of Edinburgh, of 3,000, for many years at least, to come much nearer the truth. Indeed, the other is totally out of the question, when it is considered that France, Belgium, and Holland, are importers, and not exporters of cattle. The consumption of London alone is 170,000 per annum of cattle, much heavier than we are likely to obtain from the Continent: so that it may be judged what probability there is of the British markets being overstocked with foreign supplies.

BY MRS. GORE.

CHAPTER IX.

Basil Annesley was just about to enter the smoking room of his Club, after dinner, when the messenger he had despatched with a few lines to Verelst to inquire after the state of his wife, brought back a note from Salome, informing him that her mother was not only perfectly recovered from her seizure, but that she insisted upon their keeping their engagement with Madame Branzini.

Instantly relinquishing an enjoyment to which he only resorted when unlikely to find himself shortly afterwards in female society, Basil made the best of his way to his lodgings to dress. In a moment, his heart, previously depressed by his interview with the caustic Abednego, became light as a bird. A whole evening spent in Esther's society, no matter where, was at present the brightest prospect this world could afford him.

But for this conciliatory influence, the house to which he was about to repair, had little charm for Basil. The husband of Madame Branzini was the Neapolitan consul, and the persons resorting to his society were almost entirely foreigners. For though the highest diplomatic class is cordially welcomed into the best English society, nothing less easy than for foreigners, not included in the pomp of the court, to make their way in a country which prides itself on understanding all languages, and speaking none but its own.

Now there is a natural tendency in persons moving exclusively in the circles of fashion, to depreciate all those with whose faces they are unfamiliar. The great world is of such limited extent, that every one of its component parts is known to every one, either by acquaintance or sight; and the moment a strange face appears in the privileged crowd, it is regarded with suspicion. At the house of the Neapolitan consul, all the faces were strange to Basil Annesley. Once or twice, he had joined the circle of Madame Branzini, without finding there a single person he had ever seen before; and among them, not above three or four who spoke his language. It is true there was much to reconcile him to this strangeness; and a man blasé with the insipidity of the beau monde, might have experienced the greatest relief in contemplating, in place of the pale and faded faces of the belles of fashion, the fine rich glowing beauty of the southern dames, whose frank and courteous manners were as yet untrammelled by the conventional laws of the most formal country in the world.

Italians and Spaniards abounded at the house of Branzini, who had many years officiated at Cadiz as consul for the Two Sicilies; a circumstance that explained the dark and sunburnt complexion of most of the men whom Basil found assembled in his drawing-room; and who, to his Londonized eyes, had very much the air of opera-singers or French hairdressers. Though his German education in some degree liberalized his views on such points, a public school and the Guards had not a little inspired him with the prejudice of "a man about town," that every individual differing from himself in dress and manner, must be "a tiger!"

All Madame Branzini's guests were consequently "tigers" to Basil; though scarcely one of them but was distinguished by some talent or accomplishment, endowing him with a name beyond the conferring of king or kaiser. Most of them were men of science, or memorable artists, who had brought letters of introduction to the consul, from countries where their abilities procured them those distinctions which England is so tardy in bestowing upon men of genius. Still, the form of their beards and whiskers, the cut of their coats, the nature of their salutations, rendered them ridiculous or disgusting in the eyes of Basil; and he had scarcely patience, on entering the circle, to find several of these "foreign fellows" devoting their attentions to the beautiful daughters of Verelst.

For then came the vexatious reflection, that this was the natural sphere of Esther; that, even if these olive-hued individuals were the opera singers to which he so flightily compared them, they belonged to the same order of society as the girl he loved. Yet who could gaze upon that well-turned head, those Grecian features, that exquisite form, every movement of which was grace, and believe them created for any other than the noblest order of society?—No! Such women as the Maitlands were not worthy to tie the sandals of Esther Verelst!

She was indeed a being of superior nature. Peculiar elegance of mind served to animate and govern her peculiar elegance of person; yet in spite of her rare endowments, the spirit of the gifted girl was as meek and humble, as if she possessed no trace of personal distinction. Timid almost to a fault, Esther was content to remain perpetually in the shade. In her own estimation, she was less than nothing, and her chief object in life was to occupy the attention of others as little as she occupied her own. Never did there exist a human being so unselfish!

But for the passionate attachment of her sister, who gloried in her charms and talents, Esther might often have succeeded in causing herself to be overlooked, where presumptuous mediocrity was crowned with laurels. Salome, however, thought for her—felt for her—acted for her,—was vain for her; and insisted on her being heard and seen, when Esther had chosen to retire into some obscure corner. It was Salome who was at the trouble of dressing her, so as to enhance, as far as their limited means would allow, the character of her beauty; and as her sister's good taste restricted the utmost of these efforts to a well-fitting muslin dress, and her fine black hair twisted after the model of some antique bust, the unpretending Esther offered no resistance. She was seldom at the trouble of looking in the glass, indeed, when the task of her affectionate handmaiden was at an end. Beloved in her own family, secure in the friendship of one whom she believed to be superior to external attractions, it was indifferent to her whether her dress were more or less becoming than usual.

It was this very absence of pretension, that constituted the great charm of Esther Verelst. Those who are seen to be wholly unoccupied with themselves, are the first to occupy the attention of others; for vanity is so universal a weakness, that we are better inclined to seek the society of persons whose attention appears at our service.—She was a patient listener, an indulgent companion; and those who at a distance had been struck by her beauty or enchanted by the exquisite charm of her singing, were still more fascinated, when, on a nearer acquaintance, they found that the being thus accomplished, thought so little of herself and so much of the feelings of other people.

Still Basil Annesley, much as he had always admired in his gentle Esther this complete self-abnegation, considered that she was carrying it too far, when he found her at Madame Branzini's, listening deferentially to "a strange looking man," who was talking Italian to her with earnest volubility. As he stood opposite contemplating them, and enduring with ungracious impatience the civilities of his host, he could not help feeling angry at her greater patience. He felt certain that the dingy, bushy-whiskered stranger was redolent of garlic and cigars; and when he smiled at Esther, and Esther smiled in return, Basil could have annihilated the fellow on the spot!

Verelst, meanwhile, was seated at picquet with an eminent naturalist, his countryman; and Annesley had consequently no means of inquiring the name of this "damned foreigner." He had been often tempted to regret the secluded life led by th Verelsts, as dull and dispiriting for the girls. H now felt that they could not be too much at hom To be exposed to the assiduities of such society: they met at Madame Branzini's was worse tha nothing. "Such society!"—Why such?—Wh did he know about these strangers?—Did he u derstand their position—their habits—their la guage? No! but he assumed an Englishman prerogative of disparaging everything and ever body not precisely modelled after his nation pattern.

While giving vent in the depths of his heart t his unutterable disgusts, Esther, at the entreaty her olive-coloured friend, was about to compl with the request of Madame Branzini, for som music. As she passed him closely by to assum her place at the piano, there was time for momentary greeting.

"Do not, I entreat you, sing the song of thi morning!" said Basil, certain of not being under stood by those around him; to which request, reproachful glance from Esther, implying the im possibility of such sacrilege, was the only reply.

With all his prejudice against the individual composing Madame Branzini's coterie, who, be cause they did not look precisely like the gen company he was acquainted with, he decided t be bad,—Basil was struck by the good-breedin with which they disposed themselves to do justic to the musician about to exert herself for thei entertainment. In the world with which he wa familiar, he had often noticed the involuntary air of contempt with which the reluctant auditor prepare to disparage what they are about to hear; and the readiness with which, by their movement and whisperings, they interrupt the performers. Bu scarcely was the pure, clear, mellifluous voice o Esther Verelst audible in the first bars of tha beautiful German melody, the "Complaint o Thekla," than a pin might have been heard t fall in the assembly. There was perfect good faith in their attention. They listened to be gratified and to praise; not to detect errors in order hereafter and by the time the delicate musician had reached the concluding line of her song:—

To hint a fault, and hesitate dislike;

"Ich habe gelebt und geliebet!" every bosom thrilled in delighted unison with th well-defined expression of the songstress.

It was strange that, at that moment, Basil Annes ley felt more inclined to applaud the audience, tha the performer,—as if for a courtesy offered to him self. He felt almost grateful to them for thei attention to Esther. From that moment, the as sembly assumed new features in his eyes. H listened more civilly to the speeches of old Bran zini; and had the grace to ask the names of tw or three handsome women present. He even in quired in French, (the language of the house as o most foreign houses,) the name of the gentleman who had conducted Esther to the instrument.

"The Duca di San Catalda," was the reply.

"A Chevalier d'industrie, I make no doubt!" wa his mental commentary: but on looking round an perceiving that the Secretary of Legation, an attachés of the Neapolitan mission were present, it was impossible to infer that any person admitted to the house of the venerable consul, more especially a countryman of his own, should be otherwise than respectable.

He was now growing less thankful for the rapture lavished by the party upon Esther's performance. In some respects, Basil had all the waywardness of a spoiled lover. The secluded life of the Verelsts secured him from the usual terrors and jealousies of attachment. Go whither he would, absent himself as he pleased, he was certain to find that lovely girl on his return installed in her accustomed place, at her customary occupations; with the certainty that, since their last meeting, her looks, thoughts, or words, had been addressed to no individual qualified to excite his uneasiness. It induced a pang in his bosom, unfelt since the rehearsal-scene of the previous year, to find other eyes fixed upon her beauty, and other courtesies addressed to her ear; and, irritated and unhappy, one of the handsomest of human faces became overclouded with ill-humour.

"Our friends are now arrived," observed Madame Branzini, after looking graciously round upon the groups engaged in lively conversation which filled her handsome drawing-rooms; "let us now proceed to draw for king!"

Accustomed to the forms accompanying in Christmas parties this immemorial custom, Basil was surprised to see no token of the huge frosted cake, covered with bonbons and devices, which usually tends to sicken, for the remainder of the month of January, the nurseries of well-conditioned English families. Still more was he startled when (the handsome children of the Branzinis having been desired to commence the ceremonial, whereupon they insisted that the gâteau des rois was too heavy to be carried round without the aid of their dear Esther and Salome) he saw the Verelsts lend their cheerful aid to offer in succession to the guests a huge uneatable galette from which every gentleman present was to cut a slice.

As the stranger of the party, the honours were offered first to Annesley; and little Teresa and Cesarino Branzini set up a cry of triumph, when, on examination of his slice of galette, no bean appeared; the kingship being decided by the attainment of the fortunate lot containing a fève, or bean, dropped into the cake in the process of making.

In succession, young and old, were subjected to the trial; and every new defeat was accompanied by shouts of laughter. In their mirth, however, Basil found it impossible to join. He was thoroughly out of sorts on perceiving, that while the attention of the pretendant was fixed upon the galette he was cutting, that of the assistants was riveted upon the graceful figures of the two dish-bearers, each worthy to afford a model for a sculptor. It did not surprise him, so contrary was his mood, when the portion of the Duke of Catalda was pronounced to contain the bean! He had expected it!—He felt certain that it was a matter of preference and connivance; more especially when the Duke, his fine face sparkling with joy, presented it to Esther, so as to elect her his queen for the evening!

Universal acclamations followed. Basil Annesley found himself required to offer, among the rest, his homage to their majesties; who, according to custom, proceeded to elect their household and grand officers of the crown. He was more provoked than pleased, when, after naming little Teresa and Salome her ladies in waiting, Cesarino her page, and a merry old gentleman named Clary, (the precis writer to the French Embassy,) her almoner, she selected himself to be her Chevalier d'Honneur!

Few among the party but had been proud to become the knight of Esther! Yet Basil, whose heart was swelling with the newly-experienced torment of seeing the woman he loved in intimate communication with others, would gladly have rejected the distinction. It was no longer with him as in their old childish days, in the Neckar-Strasse, at Heidelberg! He was grown too much a man of the world to enjoy being included in a piece of buffoonery. Most of the company doubled, a few trebled his years; yet he was the only person too old for the indulgence of joyous sport!—Probably because the only Englishman present; the elasticity of spirits which disposes foreigners for enjoyment at any period of life between the cradle and the grave, being singularly deficient, or unfortunately extinguished, in our fastidious natures. The disipere in loco is a pleasure for which time and place are usually wanting in the British empire.

It was not so with the Verelsts. Completely at home in a house where their few intervals of leisure had been spent for two years past, (during which Salome had officiated as teacher of German to the children,) they gave themselves up with their little pupils to the joyous spirit of the hour. Elated by the presence of the object of her affections, from whom she had been some days separated, the cheeks of Esther glowed with unusual bloom, as she assumed her place beside the Duke, in the two arm-chairs, with foot-stools, which had been hastily covered with India shawls and velvet mantles, in regal guise, for the reception of the king and queen. Compelled to pledge the healths of the company, who drunk to them in return in the exquisite lacryma Christi, for which the cellars of the Neapolitan consul were renowned, she assumed courage to play with grace and spirit the part allotted to her in the pageant.

"What a charming actress Mademoiselle Verelst would make!" whispered the rosy Almoner, old Clary, to Annesley, fancying that he was paying her a judicious compliment; and little suspecting that her Chevalier d'Honneur would gladly have stuck him to the heart for the mere allusion.

Just as he was meditating an answer not too bitter, he found himself plucked by the sleeve by Verelst, whose careworn face had assumed a holiday aspect under the influence of conquest in a hard fought game at picquet.

"A word with you, my dear Mr. Annesley," said the old man, drawing him off into a corner; and so conscious was Basil of the evil spirit by which he was at that moment possessed, that he almost expected a reproof for his ill manners.

"Where did you tell me," inquired the artist, when they were out of hearing of the party, "that you had found that edition of Hollar?"

"I did not find it," replied Basil, almost relieved. "It is my own. For the credit of our taste, I am proud to say that the book is a family possession."

"Most strange!" murmured the old man.

"Why strange?" inquired Basil. "There is nothing, I believe, very rare in the volume. I hardly ever saw a considerable book-sale that did not contain a copy."

"Perhaps so; but not that copy."

"Of course not. It has been in our family library these hundred years."

"You use the term hundred years in a figurative sense," added Verelst.

"As my own age does not amount to a quarter of the period, I can scarcely give my personal attestation," observed Basil, with a smile. "But such of my mother's books as did not belong to my father's bachelor library, were probably derived from that of her father, the late Lord L——."

"Lord L——?" exclaimed the painter, again seizing the sleeve of Annesley. "You do not mean to say that you are the grandson of that man?"

"Perhaps you knew him," said Basil, evasively. "He was more than once, I fancy, employed in missions at the courts of Germany!"

Verelst was silent,—absorbed in reflection.

"Were you acquainted with my grandfather?" again demanded Basil, resolved to obtain an answer.

"I never saw him. Lord L—— was ambassador at Vienna at the breaking out of the French Revolution. I was then a child."

"May I ask in my turn," inquired Basil, "what particular interest you attach to the copy of Hollar?"

"Five minutes ago I would have answered you without hesitation," replied Verelst, in a voice tremulous from agitation. "Now, I must reflect. Inscrutable are the ways of Providence!" faltered the artist, after a few minutes' pause. "That ever I should be indebted for what is dearer to me than my life,—the welfare of my family,—to the grandson of——But no matter!" said he, checking his ejaculation. And Basil was too much struck by the profound emotion of the gray-haired artist, to persist in his inquiries. Luckily, he was at this moment summoned to the discharge of his duties, as Lord-in-waiting to the Reine de la Fève, to which he was compelled to attend for the remainder of the night; and much as Basil Annesley's jealous humour had found to cavil at in the easy and cheerful simplicity of Madame Branzini's party, he would gladly have recommenced the evening when, after taking leave of the Verelsts at the door of their own house, to which he was careful to reconvey them, he proceeded to the more pompous mansion of Lady Maitland.

The party he found assembled in Arlington Street was about the same, in point of numbers and intimacy he had quitted at the consul's. Nor were the Maitlands and their friends less talkative or less merry; but it was after a fashion of their own. The conversation of that brilliant coterie consisted in scandal, and its mirth in irony. The chief source of their gaiety lay at all times in quizzing old Carrington, or some other butt; and as the Dowager-colonel did not happen to be present when Basil entered, they were only too happy to attack him with railleries more agreeable to them than to himself.

"How dolorous he looks to-night!" cried John Maitland, extending a finger to the new comer, but without rising from the sofa on which he was lolling beside a handsome bold-eyed woman of a certain age. "I am afraid Nancy, (a nickname given to Annesley among the subs, from his beardless aspect on joining the regiment,) I am sadly afraid you have taken cold!"

"On the contrary, it is nearly a degree warmer at Barlingham than in London," replied Basil, referring this abrupt conjecture to his country excursion.

A vociferous laugh was the sole answer to this explanation.

"None of your put-offs, my fine fellow!" cried John Maitland. "Here!—Blencowe,—Blencowe!—I tell Annesley that I am afraid he caught cold in the rain this morning, and he tries to hum me by talking about his mother's thermometer!"

Captain Blencowe thus apostrophized, stationed himself on the scroll of the chaise langue, in an attitude little more ceremonious than that of his friend.

"I could scarcely suppose my movements of sufficient consequence," said Basil, somewhat nettled, "to make you aware that, a few hours after my arrival in town, I had enjoyed a wet walk."

"And in such company!" retorted Maitland. "arm in arm with an old beggarman under a cotton umbrella!"

"Reste à savoir," cried the lady with the bold bright eyes, "which of the two was affording hospitality to the other!"

"If you have any interest in inquiring," said Basil, aware that to defeat a jester is best achieved by meeting him half-way, "the cotton umbrella was the property of my companion; and an enviable property I thought it, in that pelting shower!"

"He talks as reverentially as if the old gentleman were his grandfather!" cried John Maitland.

"I did not know that Nancy had a grandfather, —extant, I mean. (I was not going to parody the vulgar quiz on Brummell.) Of course I am aware, that there was once a Lord L——; and surmise, that a Sir Bernard Annesley was not produced out of a crucible," said Captain Blencowe, watching, from a distance, the impatience with which Lucy Maitland awaited Annesley's release from her brother.

"The old beggarman who appears to have excited your curiosity," said Basil, with some emphasis, "was no relation of mine; but simply a person who obliged me with shelter from the rain."

"From South Audley to St. James's Street!" interrupted Blencowe.

"From South Audley to St. James's Street!" coolly repeated Basil,—and all the more coolly, that he was conscious of being in a passion.

"If no relation of yours then, perhaps a relation of the pretty Jewess?" persisted Maitland, also vexed at finding that his jokes were missing their mark.

"What pretty Jewess?" persisted Basil. "I should think your acquaintance with the Jews likely to be quite as extensive as my own."

"I should have been extremely happy to improve it with the lovely Esther," retorted Maitland; "but you and Carrington, or rather Carrington and you, were beforehand with me."

"If you allude to Miss Verelst," said Basil, gravely, "I have once or twice informed you, that she was as much a Jewess as you a Christian,—that is, in name alone. I am astonished, however, Maitland, that you should allude thus lightly to a lady whom you are anxious to introduce into your mother's house, as the preceptress of your sisters."

"Hear, hear, hear, hear, hear!" cried Maitland, in a voice that attracted the attention of the whole party. "Here is Nancy owning, with matchless audacity, that though only a few hours in town, he has been already playing the secretary, and examining the engagements of pretty Esther, the opera girl."

"Is there an opera girl of the name of Esther?" demanded Wilberton, who having been just elected of the Omnibus-box, felt bound to make himself Master of its Arts and Sciences.

"I believe not!" replied Basil, struggling to command himself; "certainly not in the person of the young lady to whom Maitland alludes. As he seems resolved to acquaint himself with everybody's business but his own, I am surprised he does not obtain better information."

"My dear Nan! I am now convinced that the shabby old fellow with the umbrella, whom Blencowe saw you skulking with in Piccadilly, is some near relation, or you would not be so deuced touchy at having been discovered!" cried young Maitland, starting from the sofa, and slapping Annesley provokingly on the shoulder.

"If Blencowe did see me with the individual in question," cried Basil, harassed out of his self-possession, "I wonder he did not give a more correct account; since the stranger was an acquaintance of his long before he became an acquaintance of mine!"

"An acquaintance of Blencowe's?"—cried John Maitland, while Loftus, Wilberton, and several others, crowded round on perceiving, by the tone of the parties, that something was going wrong.

"An acquaintance of Blencowe!" persisted Basil Annesley; "and an acquaintance of most of you beside;—being no other than the redoubtable A. O.!"

The silence of consternation instantly pervaded the giddy circle.

Ignorant of the awkward scene in Arlington Street, to which, during his absence in the country, Lady Maitland's friends had been witnesses, Basil was totally at a loss to understand the confusion which appeared to have arisen from an explanation extorted from him by the persecution of the triflers he so little intended to persecute in return!—

It was the first time he had seen so astounding an effect result from mere mention of the cabalistic name of—A. O.!

CHAPTER X.

The following morning, moved, perhaps, by curiosity to hear as much as was likely to be told by Esther and Salome concerning the Duke di San Catalda without questioning of his own to suggest their communication, Basil, furred to the chin, to meet the nipping blasts of January, (a severe frost having dried the rain of the preceding evening,) made his way towards South Audley Street:—he felt entitled to make early inquiries after the health of Mrs. Verelst. On reaching the house, however, his title was disputed. As if in anticipation of his visit, the maid-servant who opened the door, placed a packet in his hand, and informed him that the young ladies were "out," and Mr. and Mrs. Verelst "engaged."

The blood mounted into Basil's cheeks at this announcement. It was the first time he had ever found cause to suppose himself too frequent a visiter,—there or elsewhere. He had not advanced many steps from the door, when it occurred to him that the parcel in his great-coat pocket, which evidently consisted of the volume he had left with Verelst the preceding night, might contain a note of explanation. Proceeding, therefore, to the by-street on the opposite side of the Chapel, where he was secure from observation, he opened the packet.

Merely a few cold and dry lines from Verelst! "I return the book, and regret from my soul that you should have been induced to bring it!" afforded only new grounds for vexation and perplexity.—He had evidently given offence to those whom his whole life was spent in exertions to serve and please; and without having the slightest clue to their grounds for resentment.

Ere he replaced the volume in his pocket, Basil was moved by an irresistible impulse to reëxamine the inscription which had so singularly attracted the attention of the artist's family; and his curiosity thus specifically directed towards it, he saw, beyond all question, that the letters A. O. were inscribed in precisely the same handwriting which had embodied his communications with Abednego Osalez!—

What could be the meaning of this? He remembered the book in his mother's possession as long as he could remember anything. At what preceding epoch could it have been the property of the Money-lender? That, having been so, it should have passed into the hands of another, was nothing very wonderful;—inasmuch as a person with the covetous propensities of Abednego, was likely to dispose of all or anything belonging to him, for a "con-sideration." But that he should have been a buyer or seller at so early an age, as for a book of his to pass into the possession of the late Lord L——, who, if living, would be eighty years old, appeared unaccountable.——As Basil Annesley replaced the volume in his pocket, strange surmises crossed his brain, to which he would have been ashamed to give a more positive form. He had always entertained a sort of mysterious horror of people of Abednego's nation and calling; and though he would have scornfully rebutted the assertion of another that he mistook his Greek Street friend for the Wandering Jew, involuntarily there recurred to his mind the sentence of—"Thou shalt tarry till I come!"—

"Considering all the friendly advice the old fellow gave me last evening, as we were trudging together in the rain," mused Basil, while pursuing the self-same road he had so recently trodden arm-in-arm with A. O.,—"I am fully entitled to consider him a friend, and treat him as such.—I will make the best of my way, therefore, to Greek Street; and ask him, in plain terms, whether the book was ever in his possession. If he should resent my intrusion, what then? I am not in his power.—I have already booked up my interest. He can but give me a gruff answer; and from an oddity like him, a gruff answer is easily endured."

To Greek Street, accordingly, he proceeded, and soon found his way to the well-remembered door. —Alas!—huge papers, attached to the centre panes of the dining-room windows, announced, in printed capitals—

THIS CAPITAL ROOMY MANSION TO BE LET,
ON A REPAIRING LEASE.
INQUIRE AT 49, DELAHAYE STREET, WESTMINSTER,
Every day from 12 till 2.

"How provoking!" was Basil's involuntary ejaculation, as he stood contemplating the strange contrast of colour between the white paper, (to give place to which the panes had been wiped,) and the filthy encrustations of the remainder of the windows. As the house, however, had appeared quite as uninhabited as now, on his first visit, he determined to make an attempt to enter; nor was it till he had both knocked and rung without effect several times, that he felt convinced of its abandonment by its strange proprietor. Giving up the point in despair, he proceeded on his way; resolved to visit Delahaye Street the following day, at the early hour pointed out by the placard.

He had not proceeded far, however, when a jarring sound, and a sort of yearning curiosity, induced him to turn his head; when he perceived the door of the deserted house slightly opened, and the face of the dirty old woman peeping out. In a moment, he was back again; and having caught the eye of the grim porteress, it was impossible for her to shut the door in his face.

"Is your master at home?" said he.

"Nobody lives here now but me," grumbled the old woman. "'T isn't no fault of mine if I didn't answer the door. The owner of the house don't choose to pay taxes for it no more, till it's let: and only lets me live here, on condition that I answer no knocks or rings, and don't let myself be seen by the neighbours."

"Mr. Osalez, then, is really not at home?" inquired Basil.

The old woman contracted her brows, as if for an effort of comprehension; then drew back the dirty flap of her cap, and screwed her left eye, like a person hard of hearing.

"I inquired whether Mr. Osalez were at home!"

"A. O.'s to be spoke with at No. 49, Delahaye Street, Westminster," she repeated, either not knowing or not choosing to know the proprietor of the uninhabited house, by any other designation. "I would not say as much to a stranger:—but I knows you has had dealings with him afore,—and so I don't mind!"

Basil Annesley pointed to the notice in the window, as sparing him all necessity for especial gratitude for her communication, and wished her good morning. As he made his way towards St. James's Street, in a very different mood from that in which, three weeks before, he had pursued the same track, he could not but revert, with unspeakable irritation of mind, to his repulse at the door of the Verelsts. Never before had he felt so desirous of an interview with Esther! He wanted to inquire the meaning of the artist's letter. He wanted to inquire the nature and standing of their intimacy with the Sicilian Duke. He wanted to tell her that he had never seen her look so lovely—never heard her sing so sweetly—as the preceding night; and he desired this all the more, from feeling certain in his heart of hearts that, unimportant as such an attestation might appear to other ears, his approval was essential to the happiness of his own dear, timid Esther!

Like most men of his age when passionately in love, Basil Annesley found little enjoyment in either pleasure or business with which the object of his affections had not some remote connexion. In spite, therefore, of his intentions of proceeding straight from Greek Street to his Club, he found himself, in less than an hour afterwards, at Storey's Gate; contemplating the narrow opening to Delahaye Street, and as much cheered in spirits as is usually the result of a stirring walk in frosty weather.

He was now sufficiently acquainted with the eccentric habits of the Money-lender to perceive, without surprise, that the house to which he had been referred was just as dilapidated of aspect as the one he had just quitted. It was clear enough that the numerous temporary residences of Abednego, consisted of old houses, which he bought up on speculation, and inhabited till a favourable opportunity presented itself of getting them off his hands; and the mansion in Delahaye Street, still more "roomy" than the "capital" one abandoned by the Money-lender in Soho, was to all appearance still gloomier and more ruinous. It was of red brick, having five windows in front, with a pretence at pilasters between; the said pilasters being also of brick, with capitals of carved woodwork supporting a heavy cornice,—of which the object was doubtful, unless it purported to assist in weighing down the frontage of the attic story to which it was appended, and the peaked, ill-tiled roofing above.

"Truly, an appropriate den for the strange old fellow!" murmured Basil, as he approached the door; to which, contrary to the usage of London houses, it was necessary to descend a step from the street; finished probably after the completion of the house, which retained a sort of manorial air of antiquity among its modernized neighbours. He felt almost ashamed of presenting himself in broad daylight as a visiter, at a door which, he little doubted, was recognised by the neighbourhood as the den of a money-lending Jew.

In order to excite as little notice as possible, he contented himself with a modest ring at the bell; and so leisurely were the movements of those appointed to answer the summons, that he had time to notice a sort of damp vault-like emanation from the area, which not even the frostiness of the atmosphere could overcome.—So stagnant was the air brooding over the flagstones encrusted in mounds with green moss, (now hoary in patches with rime,) that it seemed as though any person descending into that deserted area would have been as much in danger of asphyxiation, as in some mephitic well.

At length the door creaked, or rather growled, on its hinges; and a starveling of a boy appeared, —the redundant growth of whose shock of hair was perhaps destined to replace a general scarcity of habiliments; his outer garments being sufficiently ragged to show that nothing in the way of shirt interposed between them and his sallow skin.

"I wish to speak to Mr. Osalez," said Basil.

The urchin stared, but made no reply.

"I was referred to this house," persisted Basil, more and more ashamed of himself and his errand, —"from Greek Street, Soho."

"You're after hours!"—said the boy, preparing to shut the door in his face.

"I know it," said Basil, placing his foot so resolutely on the threshold, as to render the attempt impossible; and at the same moment insinuating a coin into the hand of the boy, which, though sufficiently insignificant to have been flung contemptuously on the pavement by the door-opener of any other house in the street, was so much the most important ever clenched in the palm of the ragged page of the Money-lender, that he stood staring in stupid wonderment, instead of either persisting in excluding, or expressing his gratitude to the intruder.

"Are you Mr. Osalez's servant?" inquired Annesley, scarcely able to refrain from a smile.

"I'm Bill that sweeps the George Street crossing," replied the boy, tugging the longest of the elf-locks overhanging his forehead, in token of gratitude to his benefactor. "I runs of errands for the old gentleman, and opens the door from noon till two. Only to-day, I stayed later, to light a fire and set on the kettle, 'cos the old gentleman's poorly."

"He is at home then?—Be so good as to carry up this card, and say I am waiting to speak to him,"—said Annesley.

Thus certified of the claims and good intentions of the visiter, the boy invited him into the hall, while he proceeded to do his errand; and while the little sweeper, leaving his heavy shoes at the bottom of the square, creaking staircase, shuffled up stairs, Basil stood contemplating the dark but roomy hall, paved with black and white marble, which, by dirt and friction, had now degenerated into gray and yellow; besides being cracked in many of the lozenge-shaped squares, and in others, sunk into the flooring. In the angle formed by the dingy staircase, stood an old sedan chair, dropping into decay and covered with mildew, yet still retaining in its gilt mouldings tokens of aristocratic emblazonment.

Shuddering with cold, and the depression produced by the gloom of a spot into which the daylight of that narrow street struggled imperfectly through the half-shuttered windows, Basil waited impatiently till the barefooted boy shuffled down again.

"Master 'll see you,—you may walk up!" said Bill, pointing upwards with his thumb, while resuming his shoes; having done which, he disappeared towards the basement floor, leaving Basil to find his way unescorted to the presence of Abednego Osalez.

Concluding that he had only to follow the custom of morning visits, and enter the drawing-room, Basil walked leisurely up and opened the door that presented itself on the first landing. But with all his cognizance of the peculiarities of his host, he was not prepared for the scene that presented itself within. The drawing-rooms of which he had opened the door, though low, and rendered apparently lower, as in many old-fashioned houses, by a ceiling overlaid with ornaments and divided into compartments by beams of carved wood-work, were unusually spacious. Yet spacious as they were, not an alley presented itself by which Basil could penetrate into the interior, without the certainty of covering himself with dust and cobwebs, by collision with the heterogeneous objects crowded into the area;—pieces of antiquated furniture, articles of virtù, besides a variety of undefinable and indescribable things, which looked as if assembled together by a hasty removal in a fire or the sacking of a town, thirty years before, and abandoned ever since to the dust-gathering and smoke-gathering operations of Time.

Heaped on the floor, in one corner of the room, like potatoes in a barn or beans in a granary, lay the contents of a library; from their rich old bindings apparently valuable, but overgrown with dust and mould, like the bricks of some ruined pile.—To the left of the door, on entering, stood a fine marble copy of the Venus de Medicis, which the prudery of the spiders had covered with draperies of black cobwebs, that hung like draperies down to the very pedestal. Further on, was the Whetter, in bronze, on whose dark surface, on the contrary, the coating of dust, in ledges, assumed a lighter colour; and beyond, in all directions, were slabs of pietra dura slanting against rich consoles of carved ebony, and bas reliefs in rosso antico and other precious marbles, side by side with tawdry French clocks, Dresden cups, and Nankin vases; groupings of stuffed birds, which, by the fracture of their glass-cases, and the admission of the atmosphere, had sacrificed their bright plumage to the moths; so that only the shrunken skin, skeleton stuffed with straw, and staring glass eyes, remained perceptible, in ghastly mockery of the skill of the naturalist. Crystal girandoles stood on the consoles, so encrusted with dust as to have lost all symptom of transparency; while of a magnificent copy of Correggio's Notte that stood frameless against a japan cabinet, the rats had gnawn off a corner! There was a species of altar with folding wings, such as are used for the travelling devotions of crowned or mitred heads, adorned with chasings, the work of Cellini or one of his pupils, which, though evidently of silver, was tarnished to the tint of bronze!

Never before had Basil Annesley contemplated so singular a waste of property! But that these precious objects were intermingled with trays of old iron, rolls of lead, and fragments of packing-cases, he would have compared this singular museum to the bric à brac shops he had visited on the Quai Voltaire at Paris, or in the Juden Gasse at Frankfort; saving that, in these, though the chaos of valuable works of art was quite as confused, the strictest cleanliness was observed to preserve the component objects from injury or disregard.

After a deliberate survey of the room, a glance at the coating of dust through which the colouring of a parqueted floor, now so rare in London, was faintly perceptible, convinced him that, for some time past, no foot but his own had crossed the threshold; and that he must pursue his search elsewhere after the proprietor of the extraordinary treasury he had thus invaded.

Closing the door carefully after him, he ascended another flight of stairs, and again opened the first door facing the landing. But the result on this occasion was nearly the same as on the first; with the exception that the warehouse of curiosities on the second floor, appeared exclusively devoted to the reception of pictures.

"My friend the Jew has evidently a taste for lodging as near as possible to the sky!" thought Basil, proceeding to the attic story; and as he noticed the increase of light and decrease of density in the humid atmosphere while continuing to ascend, he came to a conclusion, that, were he a lodger in the old house in Delahaye Street, he should follow the example of its proprietor.

The door that now faced him on the landing was slightly ajar, as if purposely left so by the ragged page, by way of indication. Basil tapped lightly, to warn the inmate of his approach, and a hoarse whisper instantly bad him "Come in."

Before a smoking fire, composed of small coal and shavings, the crazy grate containing which emitted the stifling effluvia peculiar to rusty iron, in an old-fashioned bergère covered with the ragged remains of a rich brocade, which, in the days of Queen Anne and of the Sedan-chair below, had probably supported the graceful limbs of many a court beauty,—sat the Money-lender; enrobed in a faded, but magnificent wrapper of velvet and sables, and with his strongly marked features and picturesque costume, looking as though he had been sitting for his picture to Rembrandt.

"I am afraid your wet walk has had a worse influence on you than on myself, Sir?" said Basil, struck by the hoarseness of the tones in which the old man attempted to inquire his business.

"A slight sore throat,—nothing more!" grumbled Abednego; "easily cured with a quarter of an ounce of gum-arabic and a pint of hot water; half the price of a hackney-coach fare!—What do you want with me?"—

"So little," replied Basil Annesley, seating himself on a rickety straw chair opposite the invalid, "that I would by no means have troubled you had I imagined you were indisposed."

"Then why did you come at all?"—demanded the Money-lender, with surly abruptness.

"I came to ask you an idle question. You were in such perfect health and spirits when we parted yesterday evening, that I had no expectation of being so much an intruder as I find myself to-day.—I have been as far as Greek Street in search of you."

"Do you want to take the old house on a repairing lease?" inquired Abednego, with a sneer. "You imagine, perhaps, that some of the money-bags of A. O. will be overlooked in the old cupboards and odd corners?"—

"I have no views on your money-bags, Mr. Osalez, excepting such as you have found me very frank in declaring," replied Annesley, with a degree of steadiness that did him no disservice with one accustomed to be addressed in terms of abject subservience.

"Your question, then, I am to conclude, simply regarded the state of my health?" retorted the Money-lender, the wrinkles which had puckered the corners of his keen eyes into a sarcastic expression, gradually relaxing.

"Still less! I never saw a person more robust than my companion of last night. I merely wished to ask whether you could give me any information concerning a volume in my possession, which bears on the title-page your initials, inscribed in your own handwriting."

"I should be somewhat puzzled, I fancy," replied Abednego, with a hoarse chuckle, "to give you precise information concerning all the varieties of property which, one way or other, have passed through my hands! I buy whatever I can buy cheap, and sell it whenever I can sell it dear! The fools from whom I purchase, or who purchase from me, are of no more account in my eyes than one of the atoms of dust which your coat has imbibed by your recent visit to my lumber-rooms!"

Following the indication of the old man's skinny finger, pointed towards him, Basil perceived that his scrupulously neat dress bore unsatisfactory traces of the filmy drapery of the Venus de Medicis.

"With such feelings," resumed Abednego, on perceiving that his young visiter evinced no fastidious tokens of disgust at the misadventure which had befallen him, "I do not often set my mark on those temporary belongings,—any book in which I ever inscribed my initials, must have been a book I valued!"

"You can scarcely have failed to value a work so interesting as this!" replied Basil, drawing from his pocket the volume he had brought from Barlingham, for the amusement of Verelst, and placing it before Abednego, so as to bring the inscription under his eyes.

To his utter surprise, the effect produced on Osalez by the sight, was scarcely less remarkable than that which it had wrought in the mother of Esther! The old man fell back in his chair, and for a moment appeared to gasp for breath; while Basil sat watching him with uneasy consternation.

"That boy takes as long to boil my hot water, as a chemist to compound a medicine!" were the first words that burst from the quivering lips of Abednego, as if in apology for his emotion;—"yet I told him I was choking with my sore throat!"

"Will you give me leave to ring, Sir?" said Basil, perceiving that his singular host was desirous of evading his observation.

"I give you leave to find a bell,—if you are able!" retorted the old man, as though priding himself on the denuded condition of his habitation. "No, no!—no bells here, my fine captain, nor menials to answer them! No knaves in showy liveries, like those who held the great-coat on your back for you, last night, at my Lady Maitland's, who have received no wages save their pickings, stealings, and perquisites, these two years past! If there were indeed such a thing in this old house as an unbroken bell-wire, it would serve only to frighten the poor rats, who are as much masters here as myself. I have no servant, except the beggar-boy who showed you in."

"And do you consider such an unprotected state safe, Sir, with such an amount of property in the house?"—inquired Basil, wishing to give him time to recover his first surprise ere he renewed his inquiries.

"The half-starved terrier I let loose at night, is a better guard than a company of the household brigade!" replied Abednego; who had thrust the volume aside on the table, as if not choosing to encounter a second view.

"But even if the dog gave the alarm,—in your infirm state"——

"This is the first day's illness I have had these twenty years; and you may perceive that I am prepared to take care of myself!" interrupted the old man, suddenly opening the drawer of the table beside him, and taking out a brace of pistols, on half cock, which he quietly replaced,—having evidently exhibited them to reassure, not to intimidate his guest.

"Besides, the police have their eye on my house. I have them in fee, as I have the insurance offices, as a matter of business."

"But the discreditable urchin who waits upon you?"

"Regards me as little better than a beggar! Where a half-starved brat sees only an empty larder, he beholds only misery and want. The chef d'œuvres you saw just now in my drawing-room, have less intrinsic value in his eyes, than a sirloin of beef in an eating-house window. Bill the sweeper pities me, Sir,—pities me, as a poor old man, almost as much a pauper as himself!"

"He may some day come into contact with people able to enlighten him," observed Basil, gravely. "May I ask, Sir, whether you have any recollection of the book beside you?"

"You got it from your mother!" said Abednego, as if startled into the rejoinder.

"You sold it to her, then?"—demanded Basil, anxious to account for his knowledge of the fact. But at the word, Abednego half started from his chair, as if smitten with a sore and sudden pain. In a moment, however, he recovered himself.

"Nay,—I only so concluded by force of inference," said he. "A taste for the works of Holbein and Hollar, appeared more appropriate to an accomplished woman, than to a gay guardsman.—Perhaps you wish to dispose of the book?"

"I am not, thank God, so straitened, even by the imprudences which have rendered me your debtor," said Basil, proudly, "as to be driven to the sale of my mother's property,—or even of property derived from her. I merely wished to account to myself for the inscription of your initials on the title-page."

"The initials of A. O. have, I admit, obtained strange notoriety by my means," said Abednego; "nevertheless, you cannot suppose me to be the only individual who bears them, or has ever borne them?"

"Scarcely!" replied young Annesley. "But these letters are distinctly of your own tracing!"

"Are you so expert in handwritings as to swear to that?" demanded Abednego; abstaining, however, from a glance towards the book again officiously placed before him by Basil. "My dear young friend—take my advice, and neither perplex your brains with surmises on subjects that little concern you, nor by inferences arising out of idle coincidences, which the inexperience of boyhood conceives to be pregnant with meaning. You are surprised, for instance, that I am tolerably well acquainted with your movements, and the movements of people so much out of my sphere of life as Lord Maitland's wife. A moment's reflection ought to convince you, that a portion of the Money-lender's business is to obtain the most accurate information concerning the spendthrifts of the day,—already his debtors, or his debtors likely to become. I look upon all such as constituting my flocks and herds;—as much my property as the physician regards the gouty lord lolling past him in his chariot; or the undertaker the hectic wretch he hears coughing at the street corner!"

"It may be your business to seek such information: the wonder lies in your obtaining it!" observed Basil.

"All information may be had for money!" rejoined Abednego, rubbing his lean hands with an air of exultation. "Everything is to be had for money—if applied with the same intelligence that gathered it together. Look at me, Mr. Annesley!—Did you ever see a more loathsome scarecrow?"

And as he spoke, the Jew raised from his head the Greek cap, embroidered with tarnished gold lace, by which its bald crown was covered, as if to give greater expansion to his ugliness.

"Ay, smile, Sir!—You are too civil to confirm the ungracious verdict of a man who sees himself as he sees all things else in this world—in the clear and searching light of truth! But I tell you that, unsightly as I am, women both young and fair cajole me with their courtesies:—I would say, caresses, but that you must be an eye-witness of the fact, to have faith for disproportion so monstrous. Look ye here!—this tawdry thing," said he, pointing to the cap, which he now replaced upon his head, "was worked for me by the white hands of a countess; and if I chose it, she is ready to embroider a dozen such,—nay, to place them with her aristocratic fingers upon the gray head of the old Money-lender!"

"For which subjection to your will, you despise her!" said Basil, with indignation.

"I despise her, because the necessities that bring her cringing to my feet, arise from the wantonness of folly,—nay, the wantonness of crime; for, in a wife and mother, folly becomes criminal as vice! This woman must shine, forsooth, and glitter, and dazzle, by the splendour of her entertainments, and fashion of her dress. Why? Because she is proud;—because she has the ambition of being cited for her distinction of looks and manners!—And what is the result of her pride and her distinction? Even that she is made to crawl in all the indigence of extravagance, to the knees of A. O. the Money-lender, and beg him, with tears in her eyes, and prayers upon her lips,—nay, more than prayers, if I were brute enough to profit by her subjection,—to take pity upon her necessities.

"You doubt this?—Read, read! It may be treachery for a lover to exhibit the letters of a fond and trusting woman. It is none for the Money-lender to betray the correspondence of a thriftless customer!"—

And snatching a pen from the old leaden inkstand beside him, and passing it hastily through the signature of a letter which, while speaking, he had taken from an envelope lying on a table, he presented it to Basil. "Remark the countess's coronet on the seal," said he, "and admire the delicacy of the handwriting, and elegance of the paper, in confirmation of my assertion, ere you peruse the abject pleadings of this fashionable bankrupt!"

Basil Annesley shuddered as he read; for every line and every syllable adduced horrible confirmation of Abednego's assertions.

"You knew not half the advantages of my calling!" cried the old man, laughing with feeble triumph at the air of consternation that overspread the countenance of Basil, under the influence of one of those painful discoveries which tend to shake our confidence in human nature. "Till now, you regarded the old beggar of Paulet Street as the crazy proprietor of a warehousefull of worm-eaten curiosities, left in deposit by his customers,—of a few crazy houses,—and perhaps a few floating thousands lent out on infamous usury. Ha!—ha!—ha!—ha!—You would give worlds, boy,—worlds, for a thousandth part of my influence and authority!—Preferment and promotion lie in the bureau of the Money-lender!—I command most of those who command the destinies of the kingdom. I have princes, ministers, bishops, among my debtors; your highflying orator, your rhapsodizing author;—fellows who, upon the hustings, or in the House, or at Exeter Hall, get up and speechify upon virtue, honour, honesty: but whose shallow consciences are not the less admeasurable by certain shreds of parchment, called bonds, which I hold in my possession. There are few things they dare refuse me: and even as war-making kings tremble under the governance of Rothschild, under mine,—under the control of A. O. shivering in his garret,—abide more than one, two, or three of those to whom you uncover your head reverentially as you pass! You saw me keep the Duke of Rochester dancing attendance at my gate. As much, and more, also, have I done to men having the blood-royal of England in their veins!"

The spirits of Basil were overpowered by the vehemence of excitement gradually enkindled in the old man's frame by the progress of discussion. He almost feared that Abednego must be under the influence of fever, to become thus strangely communicative.

"Open yonder bureau," said the Money-lender, extending his skinny finger to one clamped with iron, which stood beside the wretched pallet that formed his comfortless bed.

And Basil almost mechanically obeying, beheld within, in separate compartments, piles of rouleaus, such as he had already seen in the secretaire in Greek Street, besides a variety of morocco-cases.

"Bring me a handful of those baubles—or stay! you know not the ways of the place," he continued, tottering from his chair, till he stood beside Annesley, leaning on the bureau, of which he opened a secret drawer. "Look here!—these are a duchess's diamonds. I hold them in pledge while she appears at the right hand of the throne, in false trinkets of paste! These sapphires are the property of a banker's wife, who pretends to have grown 'serious,' as a pretence for abjuring the use of jewels; because, deceitful jade! her own are in the keeping of A. O.! But this—this is my crown of glory!" chuckled the Money-lender, bringing forth a small round case, containing a bracelet of brilliants. "Do you see this miniature?—Six years only have elapsed, since the proud and happy young lord it represents, placed it on the arm of his lovely bride! He has been three years in his grave,—and the miniature is mine! The tinsel of fashion by which the widow is trying to bewilder another silly victim into wedlock, is procured with means of my supplying. But she broke the heart of her first husband by her extravagance. It may not be easy to find another ready to be heart-broken."

"Surely you had better rest yourself again, Sir, in your easy-chair," said Annesley, eager to avoid these hateful revelations. "Pardon me, if I own that I am by no means anxious to see the veil uplifted from the deformities and defeatures of my fellow-creatures."

"I have, nevertheless, too deep a stake in your well-doing, not to afford you the means of discriminating between the sheep of the flock, and the wolves in sheep's clothing," said the Money-lender, "as he doubly locked the bureau, and retreated to his seat. "Admit," said he, gathering more closely around him the robing of his furred symar, which might have served a theatrical Doge of Venice, or Grand Pensionary of Holland,—"admit that, if I choose to deny myself the daintiness of being drugged by a fashionable apothecary, and dawdled over by a canting housekeeper, it is not for want of means to keep such reptiles in my pay?"

"Which makes me only the more regret, Sir, your obstinate discomfort," replied Basil, beginning to survey the squalid wretchedness of the millionary, as the crotchet of a maniac. "You are ill—more ill, perhaps, than you imagine; and left here all night alone, (for even the boy, I conclude, quits you at night?) alone, with the gnawing of the rats for companionship,—to fight against fever and suffocation—you may have cause to repent your rejection of the means of care and comfort, secured you by your ample fortune."

"I have been left alone with worse things than gnawing rats,—even with my own bitter and gnawing thoughts, and yet struggled through the trial," said Abednego. "You pity me, young man, for risking to be stifled by a quinsy, when I might hire some frowsy old woman to sit up with me, whose gripe upon my throat at midnight were a worse peril than my disease!—Basil! had you ever experienced the heart-choking that suspends the impulses of life, under a sense of the contumely of those you love,—had you ever felt the fever that throbs in the burning veins, when disparaged by the idol of your tenderness,—the woman for whom you would have perilled every hope of your soul, in this world, and the world to come,—had you seen the fools, the knaves, whom you despise with the full force of your vigorous intellect—the warm fervour of your generous heart, triumphing over your defeat, and asking how you presume to form pretensions to the smiles of beauty; you—you,—with nothing to recommend you but the possession of youth, ardour, mind, cultivation, honour, truth,—and treble the earthly enjoyments of the lordly home from which you desire to remove her to the temple of wedded love where you would have served her as a slave;—had you known all this, Basil Annesley,—had you felt those contemptuous looks eating like caustic into your flesh,—had you heard those insulting words piercing like poisoned arrows into the marrow of your bones,—you would have been content to live as I do, apart from the titled herd, apart from the rapacious crew, despising alike the hirelings for bread, and the hirelings for vanity;—alone,—independent,—brooding over the sense of a mighty wrong, and anticipating the triumph of a mighty revenge!"—

"All this I could perfectly understand," replied young Annesley, steeling himself against the awe with which he was beginning to listen to what appeared to be the rhapsodies of a lunatic,—"provided your privation tended towards the accomplishment of aught beyond your personal inconvenience. But what enemy of yours will be the worse for your remaining this bitter night destitute of attendance and medicaments?"—

"They will be the worse for the results of a system of which these hardships form a part!" replied Abednego, in a gruffer voice, as if exhausted by his recent outburst. "I discern, by the growing superiority of your glance, young man, the contempt kindling in your soul towards my shortsightedness!—You recall to yourself the words of the Psalmist—'He heapeth up riches, and cannot tell who shall gather them!' I know—I know, Basil Annesley,—and I glory in knowing! He who gathers them will shed coals of fire upon those who——But no matter! What care you for the burning injuries or burning revenge of the old Money-lender?"—

"I shall care much more, Sir, to know that you are lying here devoid of the necessaries of life, while my pillow has been smoothed by your kindness," replied Basil mildly; "but I cannot offer you my aid. I cannot now ask you to accept the services of a faithful servant of my own; because, in the instance of others, you have shown me that you consider such acts of kindness to be interested and mercenary."

"Not from one so young and guileless as you!" burst in a hoarse murmur from the parched lips of Abednego. "Be satisfied!—It would make me far more uncomfortable to have my poor old dwelling ransacked by the curiosity of strangers, than to lie here conscious that the javelin of death is at my breast, and that there is none to close my eyes if the grim One gets the best of it!—I want no prying Jacks to spy out the nakedness of the land, or into its abundance; to exult over my empty cellar, or covet my brimming coffers. There is less peril, Basil Annesley, in the quinsy which, as you perceive, is gradually thickening my voice and filming my eyes, than in the malice of the cut-throats with whom your rascal in livery might league himself, on the temptation of the wealth that lies ensconced in this old seeming rat-hole, richer of contents than the palace of Aladdin!—But you pretend a desire to do me service?" said he, half-interrogatively.

Annesley answered not a word; and the Money-lender was forced to reiterate his question.

"I pretend nothing," replied Basil, coldly.—— "I pity your infatuation—I pity your abandonment;—and would fain induce you to take pity on yourself!"

"I repeat that you just now tendered me offers of service. If sincere, and your goodwill be not a mere pretence, confer an obligation on me by giving me this volume!" said Abednego, striking his bony hand on the copy of Hollar lying on the table.

"I cannot do that!" replied Basil, in a decided tone; "for it is not mine to give. It is the property of my mother!"

The piercing glance of Abednego peered from under his bushy eyebrows, and fixed itself scrutinizingly on his face.

"How comes it, then, in your possession?" said he.

"I arrived yesterday morning from Barlingham Grange, where she resides," replied Annesley, firmly, "and brought it with me"——

"Without her knowledge?"—

"Without her knowledge!" replied the young man, in a less assured voice. But the admission appeared less to provoke the contempt than the satisfaction of his singular companion.—A ray of joy twinkled in his deep-set eyes.

"And what tempted you to bring it with you?"—inquired Abednego, with persevering curiosity.

"I wished to show it to a friend, to whom, as a curious work of art, I thought the sight might be advantageous," replied the harassed guest.

"That is, you wanted to conciliate the blind old father of Esther Verelst!"—added the Money-lender, while the colour mounted to the temples of the astonished Basil.

"Do you mean me to believe you in league with Satan, as well as the comptroller of half the destinies of London?"—cried he, losing all self-possession.

Abednego laughed aloud at this apostrophe; and the huskiness of his voice was now painful to hear.

"You go far out of your way, young Sir," said he, "to account for my participation in the household secrets of a needy artist!—Is it so very marvellous that I—A. O. the Money-lender—should be aware that the sum of money you raised so rashly at my hands, was devoted to meet acceptances which had their origin in the embarrassments of that wrong-headed ass—Verelst the painter?"—

Basil Annesley now fairly started from his seat.

"Somewhat an onerous requital," persisted Abednego, with a sneer, "for a few cups of linden-water, bestowed upon you during your illness at Heidelberg, and a few lessons in crayons!"—

"Mr. Osalez,"—Basil was beginning,—but Abednego persevered in a louder key—

"You fancy," he continued, "that it would go to the stubborn heart of Lady Annesley, to know that a book of hers had fallen into the hands of an obscure, money-lending, miserly, contemned, and outcast Jew!—But I tell you, young gentleman, that, haughty as she is, her blood would rise to fever-heat, did she know that her only son,—the son of her pride, if not of her affection,—had pledged his heart, and meditated pledging his hand, to the daughter of a starving artist, and the granddaughter of——But no matter!—Her scorn and her humiliation are no affair of mine!—But here comes my brew of diet-drink!" cried he, as the dirty urchin, carrying a jug of hot water, peeped into the room; "and the more welcome, that my throat is parched with talking.—So no more to-day, Mr. Annesley!—Untempting as my bed may look to you, I am cowardly enough to feel that my old bones will be the better for it.—Farewell!—If you have consistency enough, to care two days hence for the ailment that paints such compassion in your looks at this moment, pr'ythee come and see whether death or A. O. have fought the better fight!—Till then, surely, you will entrust to my hands a volume so replete with instruction as this?" said he, again laying his hand upon the book, which Annesley had no pretext for refusing as a loan. And almost before he knew what he was about, he had been unconsciously dismissed by the Money-lender; and was standing on the pavement of Delahaye Street,—listening to the bolting, and barring, and putting up of the rusty chain within, by Bill the sweeper.

Basil had not resisted Abednego's commands, that the boy should follow him down to open the door; for he thus secured an opportunity to enforce, by a second bribe, his charge to the uncouth page on no account to leave the invalid that night; but to be in readiness to receive the medicines and instructions he was proceeding to despatch from the nearest chemist's, for the alleviation of the alarming malady of A. O.

THE SONGS OF THE MONTHS.

NO. VI.—THE SONG OF JUNE.

Night's conqueror I: on his ebon roof-tree
My mantle of twilight hangs haughtily.
The glistering stars from their temples of space
Look down and grow dim o'er the Isles I embrace;
For my chariot wheels carry sunlight afar,
And my oriflamme, lightning, aye challenges war,
Till hill calls to valley, and mountains reply,
With the thunder I wield while I traverse the sky.
But conclude not my life passeth drearily:
Though I frown, and have shadows,
While the bee winds his horn,
I ring scythes in the meadows,
With the whetstone at morn,
And at night send the mower home wearily.
About the green hedges,
I convolvulus twine;
Drive kine to the sedges;
Give bloom to the vine;
In the brook plunge the peasant-boy cheerily.
I canopy lanes for young lovers to stroll
In the dimness of eve, by the light of the soul;
Where the glow of my roses
Illumines the shade,
Yet vainly opposes
The blush of a maid!
Ah, lovers! fond lovers! you ne'er can commune
With a sensitive confidant secret as June.

Age blesses my feet; for I bring him the joy
Which surrounded his thoughts and his heart when a boy:
He shall dream in his porch of full fifty years gone,
When he loitered a listener in woods, not alone—
No; a face that was fairer, with soul insincere,
Poured its poisonous balm in the coquetting ear
Of her he adored, till fire flashed from his eyes,
And he thrashed the intruder, and bore off the prize;—
My sweet magic his dreamy thoughts brightening.
I have flowers for rough brambles;
Gild the broom in the wild;
I dry meads for the gambols
Of each dear happy child;
The bonds of all Nature's love tightening.
My bloom-pencil streaking
Full orchards, I ply,
While hay-wains are creaking
To homesteads hard by;
The fawn and the leveret frightening.
I will fill the warm air with a myriad hum,
And the dragon-fly bold, to your horse-fold shall come:
Where nightingale pineth,
And young squirrels grow,
And brown glow-worm shineth
'Midst foxgloves below,
Oh, citizens! citizens! come and attune
Your dull souls in the forests and pastures of June.

J. A. O.

A LECTURE ON COWPER AND BURNS, THE TWO EARLIEST GREAT POETS OF THE MODERN SCHOOL.

WRITTEN FOR THE SHEFFIELD MECHANICS' INSTITUTION, BY EBENEZER ELLIOTT.

YOUNG MEN!—Is it truly said that the age we live in is very unpoetical? I think not. Never was the best poetry better appreciated in this country than at present; for even in the Elizabethan period of our literature, the best poetry was not always best appreciated. Perhaps there is more poetry in the "Bride of Lammermoor," or in the mere conception of the character of the Master of Ravenswood, than in all the poets of the fifty years that immediately preceded the Modern school of poetry. Cowper and Burns were the earliest great poets of that school; and of them I proceed to speak.

Cowper, you are aware, was highly educated; and Burns was better educated than nineteen-twentieths of Englishmen are. But Burns was self-taught, we are told. So was Cowper. So is every man of genius. It is in being self-taught, that men of genius differ from other men; or how happened Cowper, in his writings, to oppose totally the approved standards of his day? Perhaps the productions of that power which is called genius, are not results of qualities inherent in their authors, but of fortunate circumstances, or even of disadvantages conquered: for instance, a man may conquer the disadvantages of a good education, as Milton did; or convert a bad one into the best, as Shakspeare did. I know a man who has obtained some literary notoriety in consequence of having a defective memory, which retains nothing but leading facts and principles: like the shark described by Cobbett, which swallowed hundreds of cod fish and millions of keplins, but only felt the cod fish. Now, Burns, when quite a youth, living on six pounds twelve shillings a-year, had the honour, it is said, to establish one of the earliest subscription libraries in Scotland—a glory worth living for. The funds of the subscribers would not allow them to buy many books, but the books they did buy were good ones. Burns, then, could not become an indiscriminate reader, or he might possibly have formed his taste on worse models than the "Letters of Junius." Six pounds twelve shillings a-year, is a small sum for a hungry youth to live upon; but if Burns had not known what poverty is, would he have written his "Cottar's Saturday Night?" And if he had not had the misfortune to be a gauger—too well acquainted with alehouse doings—could he have written his "Tam O' Shanter?" It is more than probable, then, that he owed much of his literary success to misfortunes—vanquished, and converted into their opposites. It is certain that Cowper did: he derived strength from his weakness: he had to fight battles with his miserable constitution, and he gained glorious victories over it. His works are those victories. How good, then, is God, even in what he denies! and how thankless are they who do not use what he gives! The dullest mechanic, by merely reading what is excellent in our language—the masterpieces alone, might, in a few months, become allied to the highest minds—a copartner in excellence; and, if thought is eternal, a shareholder with immortality. Think of this, Young Men! for you cannot win the race of knowledge (which is virtue) by lagging behind the age in which you live; and if you cannot answer Time—the great questioner here—how will you answer God, when he asks you, not if you won the race, but why you stood still?

It is not easy to conceive any two men more unlike each other, than Cowper and Burns were; and yet, in their genius, there is much similarity. Burns, perhaps, was twice as much a man as Cowper, and the tenth part of the tithe as much a poet as Shakspeare or Scott: he was a giant, nevertheless. His Muse was manliness: he was honest and fearless. The Muse of Cowper was conscience: he was honest but not fearless: he trembled, and a shadow overthrew him—but it was a shadow darker than the shadow of death. He would have been a far greater poet than he was, if disease had not made him a coward. Not that he was insincere: oh no! and yet he dared not whisper to his poor heart that God is merciful. Nor was his despair unpoetical; but the hope of Burns is more poetical than Cowper's despair; and Burns had this further advantage, that he neither despaired of man as he is, nor of his ultimate destiny. How much more respectable human nature appears in our eyes after reading Burns, than after reading Byron!

The language of Burns is frequently as condensed as that of Pope. Some of his lines contain as many thoughts as words. I will quote one of these: "his locked, letter'd, braw brass collar:" here are six thoughts in six words. Never, perhaps, was there a more pregnant style. And he is the most unsophisticated of poets. He is earnest as Milton, earnest as Cromwell, earnest as the Pilgrim Fathers, who, seeking the free worship of God on the shores of America, planted the world's political redemption in a wilderness of wants. His readers never mistrust him. It is not the poetry that we like, but the man. He has stamped his honest, fearless, individuality upon his writings: they are all marked "Robert Burns."

If you doubt the similarity of the minds of these two men, compare any one of the rhymed epistles of Burns, with the rhymed epistle of Cowper to Joseph Hill:—

> "An honest man, close-buttoned to the chin, > Broad cloth without, and a warm heart within."

Burns, however, had a great advantage over Cowper, in his option of rhyming either in English, or in his sweet native Doric. Burns knew this well. No man ever understood better his powers, or his position. I, therefore, venture to predict, that the rhymed epistles of Burns will never be excelled; nay, so unsurpassable is their excellence, that (if genius supposes judgment) few men of genius would attempt to imitate them. He was warned, indeed, that his truthfulness (his vulgarity it was called) would be fatal to the longevity of his writings. Wordsworth has had similar warnings; but if he fail to become permanently popular, he will not fail because his subjects are mean, but because what is called his simplicity, is that worst of all affectations, the affectation of unaffectedness.

It would be preposterous to class such writers as Cowper, our best ethic poet, and Burns, our best sentimental poet, with such writers (there are none such) as Shakspeare and Scott; but it cannot be denied that they are, though not greatest, great. Cowper, in fourteen of the noblest lines ever written, enumerates some of the qualities which, in his opinion, are requisite to constitute the character of a great poet:—

> "Fervency, freedom, fluency of thought:
> Harmony, strength, words exquisitely sought;
> Fancy, which from the bow that spans the sky
> Brings colours dipp'd in heaven, that never die;
> A soul exalted above earth; a mind
> Skill'd in the characters that form mankind;
> And as the sun, in rising beauty dress'd,
> Looks to the westward from the dappled east,
> And marks, (whatever clouds may interpose,)
> Ere yet his race begins, its glorious close;
> An eye like his, to catch the distant goal,
> Or, ere the wheels of verse begin to roll,
> Like his, to shed illuminating rays
> On every scene and subject it surveys."

Both these poets combined, do not possess all the requisites to form a Shakspeare or a Scott; and it s remarkable, that Cowper, in his enumeration, leaves unmentioned the quality in which himself and Burns were most deficient. Montgomery, rich in heavenly thoughts, "and that sweet peace which goodnesss bosoms ever"—Montgomery, who has heen called our second Cowper, and our miniature Milton, unlike them both, abounds in tenderness; but if I have been able to find only one eeply pathetic passage in the writings of Cowper, you will perhaps say the fault is mine. The lines I allude to, are called "The Castaway:" they are a narrative of the death of a sailor who was washed from the wreck of Admiral Anson's ship; and they conclude with this dismal stanza:—

> No voice divine the storm allay'd,
> No light propitious shone,
> When, snatch'd from all effectual aid,
> We perished, each alone;
> But I beneath a rougher sea,
> And whelm'd in deeper gulphs than he.

Few as are the pathetic passages in the works of Burns, they are sufficiently numerous to show, that "the weeping blood of woman's heart" was not unknown to him: how could it be unknown to one of the warmest hearts that ever beat? Perhaps he was too manly to weep often; but, if so, his tears are not the less affecting on that account. Is it possible for words to exceed in pathos the apostrophe of the captive Queen of Scots to her absent son?

> God shield thee frae thy mother's foes,
> Or turn their hearts to thee!
> But if thou meet thy mother's friend,
> Remember him for me!

How plain, how true are these words! Burns was too honest to sacrifice sense to sound: in some of his tenderest verses, he can scarcely be said to rhyme at all. I will try, by a very short extract from one of the finest of his poems, to illustrate the single-heartedness of his character.

> Oh, pale, pale, now those rosy lips
> I oft has kiss'd sae fondly!
> And closed for aye the sparkling glance
> That dwelt on me sae kindly!
> And mouldering now in silent dust
> The heart that lo'ed me dearly!
> But still, within my bosom's core,
> Shall live my Highland Mary!

Here is no sophistication. The pale lips were the lips that he had kissed; the closed eyes were the eyes that had looked on him with fondness; the mouldering heart was the heart that loved him. He was not afraid to be told that his love was selfish; it was enough for him that it was the love that God made.

With similar honesty, and with true piety, he calls the mouse "his fellow-mortal;" for, says Coleridge,

> He prayeth best, who loveth best
> All things, both great and small,
> For the dear God who loveth us,
> He made, and loveth all.

Burns having been called the Camoens of Scotland, I will recite a sonnet of the Portuguese bard, on the death of his mistress:—

> That gentle, bounteous hand; that heart sincere;
> Those locks of light, that shamed the beams of day;
> Those charming eyes, within whose starry sphere
> Love, turned from Heaven, charmed all my cares away;
> Are changed, for ever changed, and turned to clay.
> Death! thou hast torn, in one unpitying hour,
> The plant to which, erp scarce it bore a flower,[1]
> The mellower fruitage of its prime was given;
> Love saw the deed, and as he lingered near,
> Sigh'd o'er the ruin, and return'd to Heav'n.

The author, in every fibre of his frame, felt this to be true poetry; yet it wants the heartiness, the downright sincerity of our northern Camoens. The literature of the last sixty years can boast, at least, two truth-tellers,—Rousseau and Burns; but Rousseau told the truth of himself as a duty, Burns unconsciously, as a flower unfolds its petals,—and the latter revelation is likeliest to be the true one.

There are thoughts which, generally, it would be in the highest degree improper to divulge to others, but which we whisper to our hearts in spite of ourselves. They are often read in us by others, when we would not utter them for worlds. They are poetry in the highest, revelations of the past of thought, warnings,—sent of God, lest they become the past of action also; and if, after having become the past of action, they should happen to be revealed by accident, or by the agonies of a guilty conscience, they are then terribly sublime. Whoever thou art, Poet of the Future!—if such a being is now addressed by me,—listen, with trembling, to the first warnings of guilty thought; but if thou shouldst be so unhappy as to seek an excuse for evil thoughts in the evil deeds of Burns, ask thyself—before thou believe all the evil that has been imputed to him—whether he might not possibly have been justified in saying to himself, what few can say with truth, that he was better than his reputation? for, in speaking to his own heart, he has laid it, with unexampled manliness, naked before thine. Was he not, then, a man and a brother? Compare his revealed secrets with that frightful revelation of Cardinal Beaufort in Shakspeare—that terrible poetry of silence—when "he died, and made no sign."

If Cowper had written songs, such was the honesty of his nature, that he would probably have equalled Burns, great as are the disadvantages under which our language would have laid him. For Burns was not the prototype of the truthfulness of Scottish song; the ancient minstrels of Scotland did not forget to avail themselves of the marvellous facilities which the dialect of their country affords to the poet; but Burns has excelled their best productions. See his "Anna," that sweetest of lyrics; or see his "Banks and Braes o' Bonny Doon," the hacknied thought expressed in which is, in other writers, a mere conceit; but in Burns, a sentiment, solemn, mournful, almost sublime. At Doncaster, when I was lecturing there, I met with one of those intimations of a better world, which give us, in this, a presage of Heaven,—a lady, beautiful, good, and all-accomplished, who asked me if I could sing? I answered, "that I was passionately fond of music, but that my wife had been more than thirty years vainly trying to teach me the Hundreth psalm tune,"—there being a note toward the close of the third line which I cannot learn. She then said that, justice, she thought, could not be done to Burns, as a lyric poet, if his songs were divorced from their appropriate tunes. I thought differently; but mentally resolved that I would sing, and also recite, as I have now done, one of his best songs; for I knew that my bad singing would, at least, seem to help my theory,—that good singing is to good recitation what a silver chain is to the lark's wing, or a parrot learning language to the flower whose silence singeth.

Cowper does not, like Burns, write the history of the poor in every page of his works, but his heart was with them; witness his description of the street-imprisoned mechanic, and his miserable attempt at a garden, "A sprig of mint, set in a spoutless teapot." They were both patriots, both honest men; but the expression of their sentiments was remarkably modified by their physical condition. Burns speaks with the animal courage of health,—Cowper, with the faltering of incipient disease, or the energy of fever. "Is there," says Burns,—

> Is there for honest poverty,
> That hangs his head, and a' that,—
> The coward loon! we pass him by;
> And dare be poor for a' that.

"He," says Cowper, "who finds one drop of heaven's sweet mercy in his cup, can dig, beg, rot, and perish, well content so he may wrap himself in honest rags at his last gasp; but could not, for a world, fish up his dirty and dependent bread from pools and ditches of the commonwealth, sordid and sickening at his own success."

If Cowper had been blessed with the physical strength of Burns, he might have been,—but I don't say he would have been,—at once, one of the greatest of poets and ablest of active men. As it is, I am unable to name a poet whose writings, page for page, can boast an equal amount of original thought and sterling common sense.

In nothing did Cowper and Burns resemble each other more than in their power of comic delineation: had they written for the stage, we should have had three Sheridans—alike, yet how different!

> Yon ancient prude, whose withered features show
> She might be young some forty years ago,
> Her elbows pinioned close upon her hips,
> Her head erect, her fan upon her lips,
> Her eye-brows arched, her eyes both gone astray
> To watch yon amorous couple in their play,
> With bony and unkerchief'd neck, defies
> The rude inclemency of wintry skies,
> And sails, with lappet head and mincing airs,
> Duly, at clink of bell, to morning prayers.
> To thrift and parsimony much inclined,
> She yet allows herself that boy behind.
> The shivering urchin, bending as he goes,
> With slip-shod heels, and dewdrop at his nose;
> His predecessor's coat advanced to wear,
> Which future pages yet are doomed to share;
> Carries her Bible, tucked beneath his arm,
> And hides his hands to keep his fingers warm.
> She, half an angel in her own account,
> Doubts not hereafter with the saints to mount,
> Though not a grace appears, on strictest search,
> But that she fasts, and, item, goes to church.

But Burns could dash off a character with a stroke of his pen. Premising that my ignorance of the Scottish dialect will prevent me from doing him anything like justice, I will prove both these assertions by reading a few lines from a poem, which he alone of all mankind could have written. Study it, young men, if you would know what a power language is:—

TAM O' SHANTER.

> When chapman billies leave the street,
> And drouthy neebors neebors meet,
> As market-days are wearing late,
> And folk begin to tak' the gate;
> While we sit bousing at the nappy,
> And getting fou and unco' happy,
> We think na' on the lang Scots miles,
> The mosses, waters, slaps, an stiles,
> That lie between us and our hame,
> Where sits our sulky, sullen dame,
> Gathering her brows, like gathering storm,
> Nursing her wrath to keep it warm.
> This truth fand honest Tam o' Shanter,
> As he frae Ayr ae night did canter.
> Oh, Tam, hadst thou but been sae wise
> As ta'en thy ain wife Kate's advice!
> She tauld thee weel thou wast a skellum,
> A blethering, blustering, drunken blellum;
> That frae November till October,
> Ae market-day thou wasna sober;
> That ilka melder wi' the miller
> Thou sate as lang as thou had siller;
> That every naig was ca'd a shoe on,
> The smith and thee gat roaring fou on;

That at the Lord's house ev'n on Sunday
Thou drank wi' Kirton Jean till Monday.
She prophesied, that late or soon,
Thou would be found deep drown'd in Doon;
Or catch'd wi' warlocks in the mirk,
By Alloway's auld haunted kirk.

Ah, gentle dames! it gars me greet,
To think how mony counsels sweet—
How mony prudent sage advices
The husband frae the wife despises!

But to our tale. Ae market-night
Tam had got planted unco right,
Fast by an ingle, bleezing finely,
Wi' reaming swats, that drank divinely;
And at his elbow Souter Johnny,
His ancient, trusty, drouthy crony:
Tam lo'ed him like a vera brither,
They had been fou for weeks thegither.
The night drave on wi' sangs an' clatter,
And aye the ale was growing better;
The Souter tauld his queerest stories;
The landlord's laugh was ready chorus;
The storm without might rain and rustle,
Tam didna mind the storm a whistle.

Care, mad to see a man sae happy,
E'en drown'd himsel' amang the nappy;
As bees flee hame wi' lades o' treasure,
The minutes wing'd their way wi' pleasure;
Kings may be blest'd, but Tam was glorious,
O'er a' the cares o' life victorious.

But pleasures are like poppies spread,
We seize the flower, its bloom is shed;
Or like the snow-falls in the river,
A moment white—then gone for ever.

I hold in my hand some verses which have not appeared in any collection of the works of Burns. They want his terseness and condensation; but may be his notwithstanding;—if they are—and I do not know who else could have written them,—they show that he, too, could, when he chose, finish a portrait with minute touches of the comic pencil.

THE MINISTER.

Our gudewife she keeps beef and ale,
And tea, to treat the Minister,
While I, if hungry, sup the kale;
The beef is for the Minister:
Besides, a bottle she keeps by,
To warm his heart when he's no dry,
While I the water-pail maun try;
May the deil burst the Minister!

Our Minister he has nae pride,
Not a bit the Minister;
He just sits down by our fireside
As he were no' our Minister;
He taks our gudewife by the hand,
Says, John, man, sit, what maks ye stand?
He has the bairns a' at command:
They a' ken the Minister.

But still he's useful in his place,
He's a braw man the Minister;
At ilka feast he says the grace,
Nane fitter than the Minister;
And when the glasses come in view,
He says, We'll drink, but na' get fou
Sic things the Lord doth not allow:
Yet fou gets the Minister.

Our Minister he's now fall'n sick,
Waes me, the Minister;
Wha' now shall keep us frae auld Nick,
If the Lord tak our Minister?
Left to oursels, he kens fu' weel,
The brent up stairs we canna spiel.
We maun ev'n turn back and face the deil,
If the Lord tak our Minister.

He preaches loud, does saftly pray—
Thus says our Minister,
"Ye will be sure to find the way,
If ye are like your Minister;
Ye'll get a place, ye needna fear;
Be sure that after him ye spier."
But faith, I doubt, when we get there,
We'll no see the Minister.

I must now conclude, with a few observations on the lives and characters of the two great founders of the Modern School of Poetry. Perhaps no falsehood has been more frequently repeated than that men of genius are less fortunate and less virtuous than other men; but the obvious truth that they who attempt little are less liable to failure than they who attempt much, will account for the proverbial good luck of fools. In our estimate of the sorrows and failings of literary men, we forget that sorrow is the common lot; we forget, too, that the misfortunes and the errors of men of genius are recorded; and that, although their virtues may be utterly forgotten, their minutest faults will be sure to find zealous historians. And this is as it should be. Let the dead instruct us. But slanderers blame, in individuals, what belongs to the species. "We women," says Clytemnestra in Eschylus, when meditating the murder of her husband, and in reply to an attendant who was praising the gentleness of the sex, "We women are—what we are." So is it with us all. Then, let every fault of men of genius be known; but let not hypocrisy come with a sponge, and wipe away their virtues.

Of the misfortunes of Cowper, we have all heard, and certainly he was unfortunate, for he was liable to fits of insanity. But it might be said of him, that he was tended through life by weeping angels. Warm-hearted friends watched and guarded him with intense and unwearied solicitude; the kindest hearted of the softer sex, the best of the best, seem to have been born only to anticipate his wants. A glance at the world, will show us that his fate, though sad, was not saddest: for how many madmen are there, and how many men still more unfortunate than madmen, who have no living creature to aid, or soothe, or pity them! Think of Milton—"blind among enemies!"

But the saddest incident in the life of Cowper remains to be told. In his latter days, he was pensioned by the crown—a misfortune which I can forgive to him, but not to destiny. It is consoling to think, that he was not long conscious of his degradation after the cruel kindness was inflicted on him. But why did not his friends—if weary of sustaining their kinsman stricken by the arrows of the Almighty, suffer him to perish in a beggars' madhouse? Would he had died in a ditch, rather than this shadow had darkened over his grave! Burns was more fortunate in his death than Cowper: he lived self-supported to the end. Glorious hearted Burns! Noble, but unfortunate Cowper!

Burns was one of the few poets fit to be seen. It has been asserted that genius is a disease,—the malady of physical inferiority. It is certain, that we have heard of Pope, the hunchback: of Scott and Byron, the cripples: of the epileptic Julius Cæsar, who, it is said, never planned a great battle without going into fits; and of Napoleon, whom a few years of trouble killed: where Cobbett (a man of talent, not of genius) would have melted St. Helena, rather than have given up the ghost with a full belly. If Pope could have leaped over five-barred gates, he probably would not have written his inimitable sofa-and-lap-dog poetry; but it does not follow, that he would not have written the "Essay on Man;" and they who assert that genius is a physical disease, should remember that, as true critics are more rare than true poets, we having only one in our language, William Hazlitt—so, very tall and complete men are as rare as genius itself, a fact well known to persons who have the appointment of constables. And if it is undeniable that God wastes nothing, and that we, therefore, perhaps seldom find a gigantic body combined with a soul of Æolian tones: it is equally undeniable, that Burns was an exception to the rule—a man of genius, tall, strong, and handsome, as any man that could be picked out of a thousand at a country fair.

But he was unfortunate, we are told. Unfortunate! He was a tow-heckler who cleared six hundred pounds by the sale of his poems: of which sum he left two hundred pounds behind him, in the hands of his brother Gilbert: two facts which prove that he could neither be so unfortunate, nor so imprudent, as we are told he was. If he had been a mere tow-heckler, I suspect he would never have possessed six hundred shillings.

But he was imprudent it is said. Now, he is a wise man who has done one act that influences beneficially his whole life. Burns did three such acts—he wrote poetry—he published it; and, despairing of his farm, he became an exciseman. It is true he did one imprudent act; and, I hope, the young persons around me will be warned by it: he took a farm, without thoroughly understanding the business of farming. It does not appear that he wasted or lost any capital, except what he threw away in his farm. He was unlucky, but not imprudent in giving it up when he did. Had he held it a little longer, the Bank Restriction Act would have enriched him at the expense of his landlord; but Burns was an honest man, and, therefore, alike incapable of desiring and foreseeing that enormous villany.

But he was neglected, we are told. Neglected? No strong man, in good health, can be neglected, if he is true to himself. For the benefit of the young, I wish we had a correct account of the number of persons who fail of success, in a thousand that resolutely strive to do well. I do not think it exceeds one per cent. By whom was Burns neglected? Certainly not by the people of Scotland: for they paid him the highest compliment that can be paid to an author: they bought his book! Oh, but he ought to have been pensioned. Pensioned? Cannot we think of poets without thinking of pensions? Are they such poor creatures, that they cannot earn an honest living? Let us hear no more of such degrading and insolent nonsense.

But he was a drunkard, it is said. I do not mean to exculpate him, when I say, that he was, probably, no worse in that respect than his neighbours; for he was worse if he was not better than they, the balance being against him; and his Almighty Father would not fail to say to him, "What didst thou with the lent talent?" But drunkenness, in his time, was the vice of his country—it is so still; and if the traditions of Dumfries are to be depended on, there are allurements which Burns was much less able to resist than those of the bottle; and the supposition of his frequent indulgence in the crimes to which those allurements lead, is incompatible with that of his habitual drunkenness.

When I was a lad, one of my father's workmen sometimes sent me early in the morning with a quart pot to a neighbouring alehouse, for a jack of what he called "purl;" and later in the forenoon, for a pint of ale. Finding, by dipping my finger into it, that the "purl" had a bitter taste, and nasty yellow shake-up, I never tolled it; and I observed that my employer drank it without raising his eyes; but always, before he drank his ale, he looked at me, suspecting that I had some of it in me. The Corn Law Rhymer, then, was a rogue from the beginning? Yes. But the Corn Law Rhymer is not a poet; and if the slanderers of genius would consider, that, although they can place no Hamlets or Tam o' Shanters to the credit of their account, they certainly share with Shakspeare and Burns their full proportion of the faults and failings of our common humanity, we should hear less about the Dumfries Exciseman's drunkenness, and the wrongs of the dowered Ann Hathaway.

But Burns, it is said, was ungrateful to his patrons. Who were they? The Tories of his time, the fathers of men who must be clever, for, in our days, they have invented a new name for rascality, calling themselves Conservatives. But what did those lords and squires for him? They gave him a job, a nasty one; he did the work, and got the wages—with an early grave in at the bargain. No, no! He and they understood each other right well. He knew, and they knew, that men like them are as fond of men like him, as robbers are of the hangman.

But he was politically imprudent, we are told. Now, I do not think that any man ought to become a martyr, unless he likes martyrdom for its own sake; but they who accuse Burns of political imprudence, take a bat's view of his case—he took an eagle's. What should we now care for Burns, the honest, fearless exciseman, had he been a rhyming sycophant? His family, I suspect, are at this moment more prosperous, in the worldly sense of the term, than if he had died a collector; and it is plain he could not have become one, without forfeiting that independence which binds our hearts to him.

But I shall not do justice to him, if I do not give you his picture of himself, from his letter to J. F. Erskine, Esq., written 13th April, 1793, just after he had narrowly escaped being ruined, by the arbitrary wantonness of power; especially as it has been blamed as mere bravado on the part of Burns, by a patrician critic, who having found himself mistaken and ridiculous in his infallible decisions on modern poetry, determined to try his hand on a poet's prose. "Burns," says the bard of himself, "was a poor man from birth, and an exciseman from necessity; but the sterling ore of his worth no poverty could debase; and his independent mind oppression might bend, but could not subdue. Have not I, in my children, a more precious stake in my country's welfare, than the richest dukedom in it? Can I look tamely on, and see any machination wrest from my boys their birthright? Does any man tell me, that my efforts can be of no service? I tell him, that it is on men like me that a nation has to rest—men who are elevated enough to reason and reflect, yet low enough to keep clear of venal contagion. I have now drawn Burns as he is; but should any of the persons in whose hands is the bread he eats get the least knowledge of the picture, it would ruin the poor bard for ever."

Let us now compare Burns and his prose, with Dante's prose, and the writer of it. Dante—some of you know—a senator of Florence, corruptly driven from his country, and robbed of his ample possessions, lived long in banishment, and died in exile. About the year 1316, his friends obtained his restoration to his country and his possessions, on condition that he should pay a sum of money, avow himself guilty, and ask pardon of his oppressors. This is his answer on the occasion, to an aged kinsman whom he calls "Father." "From your letter I observe how much you have at heart my welfare, and I am bound to you the more, because an exile rarely finds a friend. But I must, by my answer, disappoint some little minds. Your nephew has written to me, that I am allowed to return to Florence on certain conditions; wherein, my Father, I see two conditions that are ridiculous and impertinent. I speak of the impertinence of those who mention such conditions to me; for in your letter there is no such thing. Is such an invitation glorious for Dante, after suffering in exile almost fifteen years? Is it thus, then, they would recompense innocence, labour, and unremitting study? Far from me be the senseless baseness of a beast of earth, that could offer himself up, as it were, in chains. Far from the man who cries aloud for justice, this compromise with his persecutors. No, my Father, this is not the way that shall lead me back to my country. But I shall return with hasty steps, if you can open to me a way that shall not derogate from the fame and honour of Dante; but if by no such way Florence can be entered, then shall I never enter Florence. What! can I not everywhere enjoy the sight of the sun and stars? Can I not contemplate, in any corner of the earth under the canopy of heaven, consoling and delightful truths, without rendering myself infamous? Bread, I hope, will not fail me." But bread did fail him. Every reader of his works must know, by heart, the prediction addressed to him by the shade of his ancestors:—"Thou shalt prove how bitter is the taste of the bread of others, how hard the road up and down strangers' stairs." But there is another passage in which he makes his readers shudder, discovering an exact portrait of himself in a man, "who, stripping himself of all shame, and trembling in his very vitals, places himself in the public way, and stretches out his hand for charity." "By such sacrifices," says the reviewer, "he preserved his principles, and sustained the magnanimity of his character;" and such are the rewards which, in all ages, have been paid to them "who are not of the wretches who may be said never to have lived, whom God's justice disdains to punish, and his mercy to pardon." Such, perhaps, will ever be the reward of the prophetic honesty of genius. Why were Dante and Burns persecuted? Because they saw farther than others; and what avails it to them, if the sons of their persecutors are instructed by their graves?

It is melancholy to reflect, that Burns died just in time to prevent the blackness of darkness from receiving its foulest blot—he did not live to be fed on alms, or stamped into a dungeon for the crime of honesty. But the rules of this Institution prevent me from saying more, than that he was one of the first victims of the English reign of terror. Merciful death would not allow the merciless to persecute him actually into the workhouse; but they applied to him an epithet fatal in those days, and not safe in these—they proclaimed him an honest man! They forbade him to hope. They appointed despair and wounded pride his Ganymede and Hebe; and when a man has such cupbearers, we need not ask if the liquor they fill is poison.

But was there no meanness in the pride of Burns? "Give me wit," said he, "and I am contented." The boon was his in superabundance, and he was not contented. "Had I but hearkened to good advice," said he, "I might by this time have led a market." I doubt whether the advice was good, but if it was, why did he not lead a market? They who lead markets, take the means. Instead, then, of striking dewdrops from the daisies, he should have covered himself with rust and dust, as they do. But why could he not be satisfied with the Muse, and poverty, her dower? True, he did not turn his back on the angel of his life; but he repined because she had not brought with her from heaven—a clod of clay. Out of more than two hundred thousand millions of human beings, he was an individual of the few hundreds who have won for themselves an earthly immortality—and he was dissatisfied! Surely, then, his light was not all "light from heaven." I can imagine the Father of Mercies looking down on him in stern pity.

Whatever his faults might be, he paid the penalty of them, and left the benefit to us. The most valuable bequest which a man of genius can leave to posterity, is the legacy of his faults. God, I have said, wastes nothing—no, not even the evil that men do. His eternal finger writes their lives in their deeds, that we may emulate the good, and be instructed by the evil. Burns was a poet, and a man. "The poet"—if I may use the words of Madame de Staël, the greatest man that ever wore petticoats—"the poet lives in his works;" but where, in this world, is the man to be found, if not in our affectionate remembrance, or in our just and benevolent appreciation? Is he not defenceless? Hath he not said to us, "Forget me not?" If the life of the slandered, like Religion itself, is a poem which prosers have covered with blots—let us not forget that the blots are no part of the poem. Whoever thou art, then, that in thy purity judgest thy brother, reflect that all other virtues in thee are worthless, if thou hast not charity. Burns lies before thee—helpless and self-condemned. With the manliness which was the corner-stone of his character, he wrote a true inscription for his own grave:—

The poor inhabitant below,
Was quick to learn, and wise to know,
And keenly felt the friendly glow,
And softer flame;
But thoughtless folly laid him low,
And stained his name.

If, then, his failings are recorded for eternity, while those of other men are written in water—if to err is human—if the angels fell—"speak of him as he was, set down nought in malice;" "and let him who is without sin among you, cast the first stone" at the grave of ROBERT BURNS.

A VISIT TO THE UNITED STATES IN 1841.*

THIS new work of the philanthropic Quaker comes before the public with the special recommendation that, in advocating the emancipation of the blacks, its author, as is now well known, does not overlook the rights of the whites; that he contends for universal suffrage, for equality of civil rights, as well as the abolition of slavery. This is only consistency; yet in a member of his quiet sect, it is a great step in advance; for we would fain hope that the decided line of conduct taken by Joseph Sturge is an augury of the opinions of nearly the whole body of the Friends, and that his next work may be a report of the progress of Associations formed in Great Britain for obtaining the suffrage.

With Mr. Sturge's Visit to the West Indies many of our readers must be familiar. His recent visit to the United States had the same object, "the universal abolition of slavery;" and one scarcely less important to mankind, "the promotion of permanent international Peace." The second object, though never lost sight of, was kept subordinate to the abolition mission.

Arguments against the principle, and expositions of the moral and even economical ill consequences of slavery, are no longer needed in Great Britain; and even in the United States, slavery is rarely now defended on other than narrow, selfish, and passionate grounds, save as a necessary evil; which, like lesser abuses in this country, has grown to such a magnitude, and has so intertwined itself with all institutions and interests, that it is dangerous to touch it or tamper with it. Mr. Sturge's work, therefore, is necessarily rather an account of the present state of opinion in America regarding slavery, and of the leading abolitionists and the prospects of their great labour, than an argument against slavery or an illustration of its horrible tendencies, which has surely become superfluous.

Mr. Sturge sailed in the British Queen in March 1841. He is a Tee-totaller, as well as an abolitionist and advocate of the suffrage; and he notices with approbation a useful change in the economy of the steamers, by which passengers need not pay for more wine and spirits than they choose to drink; instead of being tempted to drink to excess, because the liquor costs nothing, its price being included in the passage money. One of the passengers, who was the reverse of a Teetotaller, addressed the intelligent black steward of the vessel as "Blacky." "My name is Robert," replied the man. "And when you want anything from me, please to address me by name: we are all the same flesh and blood; I did not make myself; God made me." The rebuke was felt by all present. Mr. Sturge found native American slaveholders less bigoted and benighted than those Europeans who had been inured to slavery by participating in its gains, or by a residence in the slave States. A French merchant of New Orleans, a passenger in the steamer, said, "It would be as reasonable to class negroes with monkeys as to place them on an equality with whites."

Landing at New York, the missionary proceeded from town to town, indefatigably pursuing the objects which had taken him from home. He went as far south as Washington, and, in the other direction, he visited the Falls of Niagara; sometimes returning to places he had already visited, and often addressing public meetings. Among the first persons he saw on landing were ARTHUR TAPPAN and his brother LEWIS; the former said to be the most obnoxious individual to the pro-slavery party throughout the union. By this party he is regarded as ABOLITION personified. And never did goodness take a more attractive form, if he merits the character here given of him. These noble brothers have lavished their ample resources in promoting the cause of Abolition, with a munificence which, when the ends in view are compared, may well put the vulgar magnificence of the princes and magnates of Europe to shame. And their personal labours seem to have been as freely given as their money. Some years since, Lewis Tappan had the ear of a negro sent him by the post, in an insulting anonymous letter. Now, in the words of a countryman and fellow-labourer, "Lewis Tappan has made the whole nation look the captives in the face."

Mr. Sturge, besides giving the individuals whom he saw face to face the praise which is their due, adverts affectionately to the old abolitionists; to JOHN WOOLMAN and ANTHONY BENEZET, those early labourers who broke up the fallow-ground, and bore the burthen in the heat of the day.

* By Joseph Sturge. 1 vol. 8vo. pp. 215. Hamilton and Adams.

From New York, the missionary and his friend, Mr. Whittier, went to Philadelphia, where they daily received the supporters of the Anti-Slavery cause at their hôtel. Among other persons, they had the pleasure of seeing JAMES FORTEN, an opulent man of colour, whom our readers may remember in Mr. Abdy's Narrative. Anecdotes like the following, should set people's mind at rest on the question of the capture of The Creole. Surely British authorities, and British subjects in a British port, may be justified in doing what American subjects do every day, namely, connive at, or assist the escape of slaves to a free country :—

I returned to New York on the 15th, in company with several anti-slavery friends. One of these, Dr. Bartholomew Fussell, resided on the borders of the State of Maryland, and had afforded relief and aid to many negroes escaping from slavery. He had kept no account of the number thus assisted till last year, when there were thirty-four, being fewer he thought than the average of several years preceding.

A sketch is given of the rise, through many difficulties, of the Anti-Slavery party, and of its various Societies; and also of the late unhappy dissensions which have crept into it. One of the causes of difference is, the claim of the women to act prominently in the Associations, and to speak and vote. George Fox seems to have recognised the perfect equality of the sexes in religious, and also in civil matters, connected with church-fellowship and discipline; but some of his descendants do not go so far, while persons belonging to other sects are openly opposed to what are called "the women's rights." Now, the American ladies, and their male advocates and auxiliaries, appear to follow a policy somewhat similar to that of the English Chartists. They wish that the Abolition cause and their rights should advance hand in hand. They do not choose to be mere tools in the hands of the Abolitionists, for any purpose however good. They insist upon independent action; a direct voice in affairs. Whether the American women and the English Chartists have chosen their time ill, we do not pretend to say. Many condemn both the time chosen and the objects sought. We are more at liberty to decide against the paltering, hypocritical evasion, by which religious professors ensnare their own souls, while they practise cruelty and injustice. Their sneaking course is contemptible even when compared with the open, bold-faced conduct of the planters and slave-dealers :—

In some of the Southern States there are professing Christian churches who permit slave-holding, but disallow the selling of slaves, except with their own consent. Dr. Fussell informed me how this fair-seeming rule of discipline was frequently evaded. First, a church member wishing to turn his negroes into cash, begins by making their yoke heavier, and their life a burden. Next they are thrown in the way of decoy slaves, belonging to Woolfolk, or some other dealer, who introduce themselves to the intended victims, for the purpose of expatiating on the privileges enjoyed by the slaves of so indulgent a master as theirs; and thus the poor unhappy dupes would be persuaded to go and petition to be sold, and so the rule of discipline, above cited, would be literally complied with.

What the Tappans are to New York, is Samuel Webb to Philadelphia. Nor do these benevolent individuals and their fellow Christians limit their exertions to the emancipation of the black race. At the Yearly Meeting in Philadelphia, Mr. Sturge relates—

I was deeply interested in the statements made relative to the wicked expatriation of the Indians living within this Yearly Meeting's limits, by the United States' Government, from lands which had been secured to them by treaty in the most solemn manner, to the Western wilderness, under plea of a fraudulently-obtained cession of their lands by a few of their number. What greatly aggravates the case is the fact, that these Indians were making rapid progress in civilisation, and from a nation of hunters had generally become an agricultural people. Their whole history is a reproach and blot on the American Government, and shows either that public and private virtue amongst the people is at a low ebb, or that "the wicked bear rule." On behalf of this injured people, "Friends" appear to have made strenuous efforts, but have failed in producing any decidedly favourable impression on the Government. The report on this subject, embodied a very affecting letter from the chiefs of this tribe, describing their grief and distress at the prospect of a cruel removal from the homes of their ancestors.

The appeals of the Indians are heart-rending. Their last hope seems to be placed in the followers of the faith of William Penn. One of their communications states :—

"Although the information of the ratification of the treaty is distressing to us, yet it is a satisfaction to hear from you, and to learn that you still remember us in our troubles, and are disposed to advise and assist us. The intelligence of the confirmation of the treaty, caused many of our women to shed tears of sorrow. We are sensible that we stand in need of the advice of our friends. Our minds are unaltered on the subject of emigration." Another, dated Cold Spring, Twelfth Month, 8th, 1840, holds this language: "Brothers, we continue to feel, relative to the treaty, as we have ever felt. We cannot regard it as an act of our nation, or hold it to be binding on us. We still consider, that, in justice, the land is at this time as much our own as ever it was. We have done nothing to forfeit our right to it; and have come to a conclusion, to remain upon it as long as we can enjoy it in peace." "We trust in the Great Spirit: to Him we submit our cause."

A letter from the Senecas residing at Tonawanda, was addressed to the Committee, from which the following extracts are taken :—

"It is known to you, brothers, that at different times our people have been induced to cede, by stipulated treaties, to the government of the United States, various tracts of our territory, until it is so reduced, that it barely affords us a home. We had hoped by these liberal concessions to secure the quiet and unmolested possession of this small residue, but we have abundant reason to fear that we have been mistaken. The agent and surveyor of a company of land speculators, known as the Ogden Company, have been on here to lay out our land into lots, to be sold from us to the whites. We have protested against it, and have forbidden their proceeding. . . . . The friends who have for several years resided at Tunesassah, still continue to occupy the farm, and have charge of the saw and grist mills, and other improvements. The farm during the past year, has yielded about thirty-five tons of hay, two hundred bushels of potatoes, one hundred bushels of oats, and one hundred bushels of apples. Notwithstanding the unsettlement produced by the treaty during the past season, the Indians have raised an adequate supply of provisions to keep them comfortably during the year; and they manifest an increased desire to avoid the use of ardent spirits, and to have their children educated.

It is of no avail. The decree has gone forth. Near Philadelphia, Mr. Sturge saw a mansion which should act as a warning-post to slave-owners :—

My kind host, Samuel Webb, who accompanied me, pointed out a plot of land, presented by William Penn to a friend, to enable him to keep a cow, which is now worth many hundred thousand dollars for building purposes. He also showed me a mansion, the late proprietor of which had received a large accession of wealth from the quantities of plate which had been shipped to him in coffee barrels from St. Domingo, on the eve of the revolution in that Island, and whose owners are supposed to have subsequently perished, as they never appeared, with one solitary exception, to claim their property.

Besides actual slavery, the illegal seizure and detention of free people of colour as slaves, is of frequent occurrence in all the Slave States. While Mr. Sturge was at Baltimore, one of these flagrant cases was of recent occurrence :—

A woman, who was the wife of a free man, and the mother of four children, and who had long believed herself legally free, was claimed by the heir of her former master. The case was tried, and his right of property in her and her children affirmed. He then sold the family to a slave dealer for a thousand dollars ; of whom the husband of the woman re-purchased them, (his OWN wife and children,) for eleven hundred dollars, to repay which he bound himself to labour for the person from whom it was borrowed, for twelve years. Yet this is but a mitigated instance of oppression in this Christian country.

In the same city, the Roman Catholics, who, as a sect, are less tainted with the crime of slave-holding than any of the other religious denominations, with the exception of the Quakers, sold several of their fellow church-members, and piously applied the proceeds to the erection of a chapel ; the end, perhaps, justifying the means. In this State, Maryland, the Quakers scarcely form an exception. They have left off petitioning the Legislature for the abolition of the internal trade, and the Yearly Meeting advises " Friends " to keep aloof from the Anti-slavery societies. They are, in fact, overborne by the tyranny of opinion. It is not to the honour of the New Light Quakers, the Hicksites, that they are not found so active as abolitionists as the old Orthodox Friends.

In the Philadelphia societies, the women have triumphantly carried their point, and now act the same part as the men in all public discussions, and vote with them,—a woman's vote having the same weight as a man's. These societies have openly condemned the ungallant conduct of the late London Anti-slavery Convention, which refused to receive the female American delegates. Those members of the House of Commons who resisted Mr. Grantley Berkeley's motion for admitting ladies to be spectators at the debates, were in the right. If the women had once been allowed to listen, their next claim would have been the liberty of speech, and the right of voting. Mr. Sturge, whom some may charge with being scrupulous overmuch, with straining at gnats, would not even witness the proceedings of any of the societies where the women play the same part as the men ; and all those of Philadelphia are now of the mixed sort, against whom Mr. Sturge felt it his duty to silently testify.

While he was in America, the Mendian negroes, taken on board the Amistad were, under the auspices of the abolitionists, making a progress from place to place to forward the good cause. The account given of these untutored and unbased Africans is replete with interest and beauty. Many of the traits of native character revealed are indeed noble.

One of the most pleasing of the incidents during the residence in Philadelphia is the following :—

One evening during my stay, I took tea with twelve or fifteen coloured gentlemen, at the house of a coloured family. The refined manners and great intelligence of many of them would have done credit to any society. The whites have a monopoly of prejudice, but not a monopoly of intellect ; nor of education and accomplishments ; nor even of those more trivial, yet fascinating graces which throw the charm of elegance and refinement over social life. I found from the conversation I had with my coloured friends, on different occasions, that the prejudice against them was steadily, and not very slowly, giving way ; yet several instances were mentioned, of recent occurrence, which show that it is still strong. . . . . A lady, not of the proscribed class, who has long resided in New York, mentioned to me as a marked indication of a favourable change in regard to colour, the holding of such meetings as those at which the Amistad captives were introduced. Such an exhibition, instead of causing a display of benevolent interest among all classes, would, some years ago, have excited the malignant passions of the multitude, and probably caused a popular out-break. Another sign of the times was, that white and coloured children might be seen walking in procession without distinction, on the anniversaries of the charity schools.

In going, by steam, up the Hudson from New York to Albany, Mr. Sturge met with a couple whose history, without the fraud practised upon them, is, we hope, that of thousands in every year :—

As night drew on, and the deck began to be cleared, I observed a well-dressed black man and woman sitting apart, and supposing they could not obtain berths on account of their colour, I went and spoke to them. I told them I and several others on board were abolitionists. The man then informed us they were escaping from slavery, and had left their homes little more than two days before. They appeared very intelligent, though they could neither read nor write, and described to us how they had effected their escape. They had obtained leave to go to a wedding, from which they were not expected to return till the evening of the day following. Having procured forged certificates of freedom, for which they paid twenty-five dollars each, they came forward with expedition by railway and steam-boat. They had heard of emancipation in the British West Indies, and the efforts of the abolitionists in the States, but they were unacquainted with the existence of vigilance committees, to facilitate the escape of runaway slaves. We assisted them to proceed to the house of a relative of one of our party, out of the tract of the pursuer, should they be followed. There is little doubt that they have safely reached Canada, for I was told at Albany, public opinion had become so strong in favour of self-emancipation, that if a runaway were seized in the city, it is probable he would be rescued by the people.

And the Americans will vapour about The Creole !

In the different towns which Mr. Sturge visited, there were usually either great private tea-drinking parties to meet him, or formal assemblies, which he generally addressed in advocacy of the cause which had brought him across the Atlantic. He lifts up his testimony against Henry Clay, concluding with a very severe remark. It was to Mr. Clay that J. J. Gurney addressed his late work, a series of letters on the West Indies. Of that work the great argument is, that the prosperity of the planters themselves has been promoted by emancipation.] Mr. Sturge concludes :—

If J. J. Gurney could have shown that abolition would soon be the high road to the President's chair, it is not improbable that he would have made an illustrious convert to anti-slavery principles.

If Clay acted from motives of unworthy ambition, and against his own convictions, he richly deserved the fate he met,—that fall between two stools, which he will never, in all likelihood, recover.

The Temperance cause has made such progress in the Northern States, that at some of the principal hôtels no fermented liquors are now to be obtained. Nay, in some places, mistaking the reverse of wrong for right, no person is allowed to sell wine or spirits; the objects of persecution not being now in New England, alleged witches and Quakers, but people of colour and beer-sellers. This is an improvement. Mr. Sturge bears testimony to the complete efficacy of the Voluntary principle, in fully providing the means of religious instruction. Of Worcester he remarks :—

In common with the rest of New England, this town is remarkable for the number, size, and beauty of its places of worship. I calculated, with the aid of a well-informed inhabitant, that if the entire population were to go to a place of worship, at the same hour, in the same day, there would be ample accommodation, and room to spare. Yet here there is no compulsory tax to build churches and maintain ministers. By the efficacy of the voluntary principle alone is this state of things produced.

Some of the tee-totallers of America now go much farther than Tee-totalism. The eloquent sisters, Angelina and Sarah Grimke, are well known in the history of the Abolition Movement. Angelina has married Theodore Weld, who was an Abolition Missionary until he lost his voice, and is a writer against slavery. Mr. Sturge visited this family, who live on a small farm near Newark, in the State of New York, and of Mr. Weld he relates :—

He has found severe manual labour essential for the recovery of health, broken by labour of another kind. I found him at work on his farm, driving his own waggon and oxen, with a load of rails. When he had disposed of his freight, we mounted the waggon, and drove to his home. Two or three of his fellow-students at the Lane Seminary arrived about the same time, and we spent the day in agreeable, and, I trust, profitable intercourse. In the household arrangements of this distinguished family, Dr. Graham's dietetic system is rigidly adopted, which excludes meat, butter, coffee, tea, and all intoxicating beverages. I can assure all who may be interested to know, that this Roman simplicity of living does not forbid enjoyment, when the guest can share with it the affluence of such minds as daily meet at their table. The "Graham system," as it is called, numbers many adherents in America, who are decided in its praise.

My friends, Theodore D. and Angelina Weld, and Sarah Grimke, sympathize, to a considerable extent, with the views on "women's rights," held by one section of abolitionists; yet they deeply regret that this, or any other extraneous doctrine, should have been made an apple of discord.

Where is ascetism to stop? Temperance, nay, Total Abstinence, will soon be so common as to afford no mark of distinction.——While travelling to Auburn by the railroad, one of Mr. Sturge's fellow-passengers chanced to be a soldier, who had volunteered to serve in the revolt of the Texians :—

He stated that some planters were emigrating from Mississippi, with as many as two hundred "hands," (that is, slaves,) and plainly said it was intended to plant the Anglo-Saxon flag on the walls of Mexico. If half what he asserted was true, the worst apprehensions of the abolitionists are too likely to be realized by the Texian revolution, and the establishment of a new slave-holding power on the vast territory, claimed by that piratical band of robbers, and forming the South-western frontier of the United States.

Of this young Republic very severe things are said; and, we are sorry to think, with but too much apparent justice.

The people of England have been accustomed to hear the praises of Sing Sing prison, and its wonderful modes of reforming discipline, ever since we can remember. Now Sing Sing seems to be at length approximating to what it has long pretended to be, a well-conducted penitentiary :—

I gathered from the prisoners themselves that a great change had been introduced, both in the affairs and in the management of the prison, within the last eighteen months, by the present excellent superintendent and chaplain and their coadjutors, and with the happiest effects. The former system was one of brutal severity; now, without any relaxation of discipline, needless severity is discarded, and the floggings have been reduced nine-tenths, the great object being the reformation of the prisoners. One of these speaking of the superintendent and chaplain, said—"There was not a prisoner in the jail, but rejoiced to hear the sound of their feet."

The dietary of this prison may well make the mouths of our home-labourers water. This account of one day, which represents every day, all being alike monotonous, was given to Mr. Sturge by an Englishman, whom he found a prisoner :—

"Monday morning the large prison bell rings at five o'clock, when we all rise; half an hour after, we all go out to work to our respective shops, till breakfast; the keepers all the time seated upon a high seat, overlooking —seeing that everything is ordered and going on in a proper manner: no talking allowed upon any occasion, or under any pretence whatever.—When the breakfast-bell rings, we all go in to breakfast, each one to a separate room, (which are all numbered, one thousand in all;) every man's breakfast is ready for him in his room,—one pint of coffee, with plenty of meat, potatoes, and rye bread. After one hour, the prison opens again, and we work in a similar manner till twelve—dinner hour—when we go in again. Dinner is set ready as before—an ample quantity of meat, potatoes, and bread, with a cup of water (the best beverage in the world—would to God I had never drank anything else, and I should not have been here:) one hour allowed for dinner, when we go out and work again till six o'clock, when we come in and are locked up for the night, with a large bowl of mush, (hasty pudding with molasses,) the finest food in the world, made from Indian meal. Thus passes each day of the week. Sundays we rise at the same hour; each man has a clean shirt given him in his room, then goes to the kitchen, brings his breakfast in with him, the same as before, and is locked up till eight, when Divine service is performed by a most worthy and able chaplain. After service, through the pious and benevolent efforts of Mr. Seymour, we have an excellent Sabbath School. Bible classes, where from three to four hundred attend, about half to learn to read, and the others to receive instruction in the way to attain everlasting life, under the immediate inspection of Mr. Seymour; and I am happy to say, that the greatest attention is paid by scholars of both classes: many, very many, know how to appreciate the value of these privileges, and benefit by them accordingly. Mr. Seymour has obtained a large library for us, and one of the prisoners is librarian. At eleven o'clock we are locked up for the day, with an extra allowance of food and water sufficient. The librarian and an assistant are left open, to distribute the books; that is to go to each man's cell, get the book he had the previous Sunday, and give him another in exchange, generally supplying them with a small tract. . . . A number of the female domestics in different families in the village of Sing Sing have been prisoners, and are now reformed and generally conducting themselves to the entire satisfaction of their employers.

Mr. Sturge limited himself so strictly to the objects of his mission, that we find few observations on general topics or passing events; but the few that occur are valuable, either from relating to objects of utility, or containing hints for social improvements. Among these are his remarks on the management of Railways in the United States. In one place he says:—

Salem is a town of about fourteen thousand inhabitants, and I was told that the number of its population who went and returned to and from Boston, a distance of fourteen miles, weekly, was about five hundred—a striking proof of the locomotive energy of the Americans. Their gratification, in this respect, has been much facilitated of late by the rapid extension of railways. These, with few exceptions, are by no means so completely constructed as in England; but, owing to the cheapness of land, timber, &c., and by making the lines generally single, and, on the average, the speed of travelling being about one-fourth less than is common in England, they answer the purpose of rapid transit, while the outlay is about as many dollars per mile, as it is sovereigns with us. On this railway, and some others in New England, the lines are double, and the construction and speed is nearly equal to ours.

I was informed the proportion of severe accidents is not larger than in Great Britain. The carriages are generally built to hold sixty or seventy persons, who are seated two and two, one behind another, on double rows of seats, ranged across the carriage, with room to walk between, along the centre. The carriage in which we returned from Salem, had twenty-two seats on each side, to contain two each, or, in the whole, eighty-eight passengers. Yet the weight of this machine would be little more than that of an English first-class carriage, to hold eighteen persons, and its cost probably less. Their carriages are well ventilated in summer, and warmed by a stove in winter. Locomotive engines approach Boston near enough to prevent the use of horses; but, on arriving at the distance of a mile or two from New York, Philadelphia, and Baltimore, the cariages and passengers are drawn in by horses. One carriage is often specially reserved for the ladies on the principal lines, into which gentlemen do not usually intrude, unless they have ladies under their care. It is common, however, for the latter to take their seats in any of the carriages. There is no distinction of price, and none of accommodation, except that an inferior and more exposed carriage, at the same fare, is purposely provided for persons of colour; but this disgraceful relic of past times cannot survive long.

In the observations upon the highly comfortable physical condition of the manufacturers of Lawell, and their moral and intellectual superiority, this passage occurs:—

Besides the general prosperity of the operatives, the shareholders in the different corporations, divide from eight to fifteen per cent. per annum on their capital. The inquiry naturally suggests itself, why the state of things in the manufacturing districts of Great Britain should be so widely different from this? Some may satisfy themselves by recollecting, that England is an old and America a young country; though, to my mind, this affords no reasonable explanation of the contrast—since, from the possession of surplus capital, complete machinery, and facility of communication, &c., the advocates for commerce and manufactures, under a system of perfectly unrestricted exchange, must preponderate greatly in favour of the former. But whatever the solution of the difficulty, it is quite evident that the statesman who would elevate the moral standard of our working population, must begin by removing the physical depression and destitution in which a large proportion of them, without any fault of their own, are compelled to drag out a weary and almost hopeless existence. To some peculiarly constituted minds, "overproduction" is the explanation of the present appalling distresses of this country; and what they are pleased to consider a healthy state of things, is to be restored by a diminution of production;—yet nothing is more certain, than that the largest amount of production which has ever been reached, is not more than adequate to supply our increasing population with the necessaries of life, on even a very limited scale of comfort. A diminished production implies the starving down of the population to such a diminished number, as may obtain leave to toil, and leave to subsist, from legislators, who, either in ignorance or selfishness, set aside nature's laws, and disregard the plainly legible ordinances of Divine Providence. If we reflect on the part which commerce is made to perform in the moral government of the world,—on the one hand as the bond of peace between powerful nations, by creating a perpetual interchange of temporal benefits; and, on the other, as the channel for the diffusion of blessings of an intellectual and spiritual kind; we are conducted irresistibly to the conclusion, that any arbitrary intervention of its free course, must draw down its own punishment.

Though the laws of nature may not permit the limited soil of this country to grow food enough for its teeming population, yet, while Great Britain possesses mineral wealth, abundant capital, and the largest amount of skilled industry of any nation in the world, the tributary supplies of other countries would not only satisfy our present wants, but would, I firmly believe, with an unfettered commerce, raise our working population, the most numerous and by far the most important part of the community, to the same level of prosperity as the same class in the United States. Then would there be more hope for the success of efforts to elevate the standard of moral and intellectual cultivation among them, for, as an improveable material, they are no way inferior to any population upon earth.

What obstructs this?

We may infer, that Mr. Sturge saw nothing to alarm him at the extension of the suffrage in America; but the very reverse, since his active advocacy of Complete Suffrage takes date from the period of his return to England. May it go on and prosper unto the end! And can the working people of this country hear this excellent man's testimony to the happiness enjoyed by their brethren in America, without striving, with the most earnest endeavours, to better their own condition?

From the summing up of Mr. Sturge's report, we shall copy a paragraph or two, commending them to the best attention of those who may not be able to procure a sight of the original work.

Whether I consider the religious, the benevolent, or the literary institutions of the Northern States—whether I contemplate the beauty of their cities, or the general aspect of their fine country, in which nature everywhere is seen rendering her rich and free tribute to industry and skill—or whether I regard the general comfort and prosperity of the labouring population—my admiration is strongly excited, and, to do justice to my feelings, must be strongly expressed. Probably there is no country where the means of temporal happiness are so generally diffused, notwithstanding the constant flow of emigrants from the old world; and, I believe there is no country where the means of religious and moral improvement are so abundantly provided—where facilities of education are more within the reach of all—or where there is less of extreme poverty and destitution.

As morals have an intimate connexion with politics, I do not think it out of place here to record my conviction, that the great principle of popular control, which is carried out almost to its full extent in the free States, is not only beautiful in theory, but that it is found to work well in practice. It is true, that disgraceful scenes of mob violence and Lynch-law have occurred; but perhaps not more frequently than popular outbreaks in Great Britain; while, generally, the supremacy of law and order have been restored, without troops, or special commissions, or capital punishments. It is also true, that these occurrences are, for the most part, directly traceable, not to the celebrated declaration of the equal and inalienable right of all men to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, which is the fundamental principle of the constitution; but to the flagrant violation of that principle in the persons of the coloured population. . . . . On the subject of peace, my inquiries elicited an almost uniformly favourable response. If we except those who would encourage the war spirit, from hopes of sharing in the plunder, or those to whom it would open up the path to distinction and emolument, there are very few comparatively who do not desire the maintenance of peace. In the religious part of the community, there is a rapidly spreading conviction of the unchristian character of war, in every shape; and the President, in his late Message to Congress, in stating that "the time ought to be regarded as having gone by, when a resort to arms is to be esteemed as the only proper arbiter of national differences," has expressed the sentiments of the great bulk of intelligent Americans. I believe, also, that they are very ready to assent to any reasonable and practical measure, that should preclude the probability of an appeal to arms, or of keeping up what are absurdly called "peace establishments" of standing armies and appointed fleets for the protection of the national safety or honour. The late excitements on the Boundary and M'Leod questions, were confined to comparatively few of the population, and the report of them was magnified by distance.

But a far stronger guarantee for the permanence of international peace than any treaties, will be found in the interchange of the mutual benefits of commerce. And for this reason, he who is successful in promoting a free and unchecked commerce, is the benefactor, not of his own country alone, but of the world at large. There are few countries, where, in practice, free trade is more fully carried out than in the United States; but in theory its doctrines are only in part adopted by her statesmen and leading minds. They are willing to trade on equal terms, but will meet prohibition with prohibition. Here, undoubtedly, they mistake their true interests; but though this policy will not advance the prosperity of America, it will inflict tremendous and lasting injury on Great Britain. Whatever may be the event, we cannot complain. The terms offered by the United States, though not wise, on an enlarged view of their own interests, are yet reciprocal, and therefore fair between nation and nation.

THE REMONSTRANCE OF THE LOWLY.

"They smite in vain who smite with swords,
And scourge with vollied fire;
Our weapon is the whip of words,
And Truth's all-teaching ire."
Corn Law Rhymes.

'Tis not for us—the poor and lowly born—
That in a thousand valleys waves the corn;
'Tis not for us, that on a thousand hills
The kine are lowing,
Or that the sheep are feeding by the rills
Through meadows flowing;
Upon the teeming earth God sendeth rain,
And the germ swelleth, and the green blades spring,
In vain, for us, in vain!
We, in the midst of plenty, perishing,
Sigh out, alas! in vain.

'Tis not for us—the abject sons of toil—
To feast upon the riches of the soil;
'Tis not for us to touch the garnered store,
The rich man's treasure;
While to increase his wealth still more and more,
Doth yield him pleasure:
What though our wants we may not satisfy,
Nor cheer our sinking hearts with needful food?
What though we're all of one great brotherhood?
He disregards our cry.
Our pleadings are, if heard, not understood;
We faint, we faint, we die!

Huddled together in our wretched homes
Foodless and fireless, still we cry, "Why comes
No vessel laden or with meat, or grain,
The bounteous Giver
Hath herds of cattle upon many a plain,—
And many a river
Flows, fertilizing, through the cultured lands,
Whose owners have a plentiful supply,
And turn their gaze on us, and wonder why
We take not from their hands
The freely proffered food!"—Oh, misery!
How galling are thy bands.

They ask, "Why closed is now the factory door!
Why bales of goods lie rotting on the floor!
Why men want that which they, in fair exchange,
Would give right gladly?"
And "oh!" they cry, "infatuation strange!
When rulers madly
Urge a great nation unto ruin's brink,
And render a strong people desperate,
To please and serve a party in the State;
May it be theirs to drink
The waters of repentance—ere too late;
Yet may they pause and think."
We are the nation's sinews, and if they Suffer a waste and premature decay,
Will not her frame of all its strength be shorn!

* * * * *

Long have we waited, hoping for redress;
Long have we sought relief in our distress,
Bearing our burthens meek and patiently,
But can no longer:
Then listen to our pleading voices, ye
Who are the stronger,—
Stronger to succour, comfort, or uphold—
Stronger to injure, punish, or oppress;—
God gave ye power your fellow-men to bless
With blessings manifold;
Have ye not eyes to see our wretchedness,
Or have ye hearts stone-cold!

IRISH TREASON IN PARIS.

"At last, Sir," he said, on a subsequent visit, when I recurred to the subject of the advertisements in the publicans' newspaper, "at last, Sir, some notice was taken of my public applications for employment. Two answers appeared together for me: the first from a schoolmaster, the second from the head of a private family. They were so-so people enough, particularly the schoolmaster; but I cared little about that. Of course, I called on the private gentleman first. His survey of my attire, and his scrutiny of my forbidding and want-wasted features, was ominous enough. But I opened my mouth, Sir, and spoke about six words; and, even before entering on preliminaries, our negotiation quickly ended. The brogue, Sir, did my business, at a blow. 'Can anything good come out of Nazareth?' I heard him say, as I slowly descended the stairs, leaning for support on the balustrades, for I was very feeble. I forgot to say that he was a clergyman of some dissenting sect or other. So, God bless him. But I hav'n't forgotten since the text he quoted for me; and perhaps I sometimes make use of it myself now and then. Well, Sir, I crept to the schoolmaster's house after this; and the instant my brogue was heard there too, he, and two parlour boarders, who were sitting with him at the time, fairly laughed me off the premises.

"He lived in one of the environs of London. I was reëntering the great Babel in the dusk of the evening, and was in the act of approaching one of my only constant friends, a pump, Sir, when I fell head foremost on the pavement,—having fainted, Sir, from sheer starvation. I half came back to my senses, from the effects of a dash of water on my face, and confusedly heard one of the crowd, who had gathered round me, say—

"'Drunk, dead drunk.'

"'Drunk?' questioned another voice, of a more charitable sound; 'no, he a'int—not a bit of it—only look at the poor lad.'

"'No, he be not drunk,' said a third individual, a woman; 'no, he be not drunk, but he be a himporster, what can take on them 'ere fits whenever he chooses. I know him well.'

"I here opened my eyes, and looking up at my fair eulogist, was just able to articulate, 'God forgive you, ma'am!'"

"'Oh! Hoirish too?' queried many.

"'And if he be?' demanded the person who had spoken the first good-natured word in my favour. I now glanced at him. He was a little fattish man, with a round, red face; wearing black—all black,—coat, waistcoat, knee-breeches, and gaiters; and with light-blue, good-natured eyes, and some portions of fair hair scantily clinging to his head. His manner was eager and earnest.

"'And if he be?' he said; then running to me—'your hand, my lad; let's help you up into my gig; 't isn't a step off; take you home; not able to get there yourself, eh?—Live out of town a few miles, and was going fast towards old dulce domum when I saw you fall; no matter; can turn back with you, wherever you like; so come, step up, and sit at offside.'

"I mechanically did as I was bid. A few seconds afterwards he was driving me with some ostentation of whip-skill along the street.

"'Dulce domum?' I repeated his little schoolboy scrap of Latin; and then, in a flourish of my own egotism, gasped out a sentence from an ancient author, the meaning of which, in English, was, that I had no home; nor kith, nor kin, to receive me in one. He looked earnestly at me, and said, 'Hold the reins a moment; able,—eh?'—and without waiting an answer, threw them to me, jumped out of the gig, ran, or rather trotted, a little way, darted into a cook's shop, soon reappeared with a brown-paper parcel in his hand, reassumed his seat at my side, placed the parcel on my knees, took the reins again, turned the horse's head, and, without uttering a word, drove almost furiously towards the country. I aptly understood him. The very smell that reached my nose, mixed up with the smell of the brown paper, made me comprehend. I undid the parcel, and soon began an attack upon the breast of a cold fowl, a lump of bread, and thin slices of ham, Sir,—Yorkshire ham, Sir; and such ham, Sir! the wide world cannot match a Yorkshire ham."

"What," I cried, smiling at my narrator, "and can anything good come out of Nazareth?"

He laughed his low laugh, and answered, "Hams, Sir—I admit hams."

He laughed even cheerfully now. "I own, Sir, you hit me there; and I congratulate you on your reviving good spirits this morning. But I will go on, Sir. You remember how quickly the shilling loaf disappeared in Little Windmill Street? The breast of the fowl, the ham, and the bread, Sir, now vanished from sight quite as rapidly. I had noticed my companion glance sideways at me more than once during my repast. When I had quite done, 'God bless you, Sir,' said I, 'for you have this day fed the hungry,—the really hungry.'

"'Bad case, bad case,' the short gentleman replied; 'looked at you once or twice while you were taking your luncheon,—beg pardon, feared you might do yourself a harm swallowing it so quickly, having no drink to it either,—pint of porter, eh?' He pointed with his whip towards a public-house,—a bating-house, I well remember, for one of the short stages, with a sign-board over the door, having on it, 'Meux's Entire,' and then underneath—

"'The Admiral Keppel.'
"'John Huggit.'

"'Stop, my lads, and quench your thirst,
And if you don't, your horses must.'

"As he spoke, he pulled up. Mine host appeared instantly at the gig side. The next instant the pint of porter was in my clutch. Oh, that draught! Jove's nectar, Odin's mead, the Mussulman's sherbet, Byron's lock and soda-water!—they were all bracket-water to it. I was on Olympus' top—I was in the halls of Valhalla—I was among Mahomet's houris; in fact, Sir, I did not know where I was,—for, along with my luncheon, as the gentleman had called it, 'Meux's Entire,' quickly mounted into my brain, and in less than five minutes I was fast asleep.

"I awoke by the gig stopping. I looked round me in stupified surprise. The moon was shining brightly. I was before a large iron gate, from which swept a broad, gravelled way, up to a very good-sized red brick house, with a lawn of some extent before it.

"'Quite awake now, eh?' said my companion; 'able to sit up without wavering to and fro?' I found he had passed his left arm through my right one, to keep me steady during my doze. 'Yes; see you are; hold the reins again, pray.'

"He jumped down, and rang a bell at one of the gate piers, which sounded so loud and so near us as to startle me. A lad, in a modest, shy livery, directly appeared, running from the back of the house, and, at the same time, its hall door in front must have opened, for there came through it a dash of red light across the shining gravel which edged its steps, and I heard an outbreak of little shrill voices cheerily ringing together in the hall.

"He had scarcely pulled the bell when he stept into the gig again. Our footman, porter, and all, unlocked the gate. We soon arrived spankily at the open hall door. It was choked up, first by a matronly little woman, having a nice apron on, and even less for a woman than her husband was for a man; and next, by a number of small Christians, the smallest of whom held by her skirts and apron, or were kept back from the night air by her outstretched arms; and over their heads, I could see others of different sizes, while others still jumped high in the middle of the hall, or hopped about on one leg, all in great jubilation.

"My new friend said to me, as he prepared to descend,—'Must ask you to wait a moment in the gig here—have business below before I can get you in, Sir—hav'n't I, eh?' He pointed at the human barricade across the doorway, laughing chucklingly and happily.

"As he alighted on the steps, his wife tripped forward to meet him, and there was the sound of a very smacking and sincere kiss between them. During the ceremony, the good little gentlewoman had not observed me in the gig. Now she glanced up, saw me, uttered a small low scream, and retreated into the hall. The boy at the horse's head had been looking on indeed, but she was used to him.

"Her husband had first to kiss all the boys and girls at the door, before he could enter; then all the dancing performers in the middle of the hall; and lastly, ere they would permit him to proceed a step further into his own house, he was obliged to distribute among them certain London gifts, for which, in promises, he was their debtor: so, in and out of the stuffed pockets of the skirts of his coat, his hands moved rapidly, and a prodigious number of things he did indeed dispose of. There was confectionary and penny Dutch dolls for the very youngest of the female children; penny metal watches, and penny whistles, for their compeers of the worthier sex; larger dolls and spinning-tops, peg-tops, humming-tops, and drums,—but some of these articles came out of the locker under the gig's seat,—for the next in growth of both sexes; and a big drum, and a fusée with a tin barrel, and a stock painted with red lead, for the eldest and second eldest boys; and two large wax dolls, warranted French, with glass eyes, which could be made to move by pulling a wire under their gold-edged frocks, between their heels, for the eldest and second eldest girls.

"Nor was this all my energetic patron had to undergo. Little squeaks and cries of ecstasy, in different keys, as they surveyed their presents, escaped all the girls; rougher sounds the boys; while the whole crowd jumped, or danced, or hopped, again round him, in gratitude and thanksgiving; and he was pulled down by the skirts, by the sleeves, and by the coat collar, to be kissed over and over again.

"'Away with you now, you hussies and monkeys; and harkye; kissed for all night, now; remember, for going to bed and all,—take them away, mistress,—had their suppers, eh? To be sure they have,—and the boys above of course; tell Mr. Jones, my dear, to read nightly prayers for them to-night,—have a young man here in the gig on business with me; and see, my dear, let's have a cup of tea together in the back parlour, him and me,—you will tea alone, please,—any application for the school vacancy to-day? No. Glad of that, for reasons. How's poor little White, my dear? any worse since I went out to-day?—must keep that little fellow quite with yourself in the parlour, and not let him up to lessons at all for some time,—so, that's all,—no,—wait,—yes,—go along, the whole noisy set of you!'

"As the still ecstatic children vanished with their mother upstairs, he ran back to the gig,—

"'Now, Sir,—your hand, please,—hard enough to get into my own house sometimes,—isn't it?'

"He again laughed chucklingly, and in a few seconds we sat together in the back parlour. I had almost a certainty of what was coming. While sitting outside the hall door in the gig, I had noticed, between the windows of the first story, a kind of semicircular sign-board with a blue ground, and large gilt letters thereon; and it was very like one over the hall door of the second house which I had visited that day.

"'Hungry enough for tea, yet, eh?' he asked, as a tray was brought in perfuming the whole room, and with two piles of home-made bread and butter substantially ornamenting it. 'Hungry enough for tea?' I repeated to myself. Ah, God bless the little man; he little suspected as yet my powers in that way. Sir, I was hungry enough to remain so for a fortnight, notwithstanding his ample board, every day in the week, and his roast beef and plum-pudding every Sunday.

"And so, Sir, you begin to perceive that I became an inmate of that good man's house. Yes, Sir; he took me in, and gave me a home when I had no home; fed me when I was hungry; and clothed me when, if not naked, I was fast approaching to that condition.——I should have told you, Sir, that I had been ejected from my apartment under the slates, in Little Windmill Street, that very morning, for a long arrear of debt for rent, at two shillings a-week. Yes, Sir, he brought me a Latin book, and a Greek book, while we were at tea, and tried me in a few passages in each, and our bargain was soon completed. And then, Sir, he took a fistful of new bank notes out of his pocket, and paid me a 'quarter in advance.'—Oh, the melody of the sharp, crisp, crumpling of my present share of those notes as they settled out of my clutch into my own waistcoat pocket!

"'Might want a little ready cash,' he said, 'to complete my arrangements before coming back from town the next day to my new appointment—adding to wardrobe, and such like—and now would take a small liberty with me—but meant well—no offence—ought to get back to town soon as possible—last short stage for the night would pass his gate in a few minutes.' He rang a bell; the young footman entered. 'Here, John, run and watch for the stage, and—'

"'Here it comes, Sir,' said John, as a horn on the road abroad sounded at a little distance.

"I hastily bade my new principal farewell; and the next moment was whirled towards London on the roof of the stage.

"I understood him, Sir. I understood his getting me out of the house in the dark, that I might moult and become new-feathered before returning next day, and before the other teacher, or any of the boys could see me. But this, although prudential on his own account, might also have been well meant for my particular respectability and influence in his establishment. At all events, Sir, he had trusted me; trusted my story—I told him every word of it, Sir—and trusted me with unearned money; and the gratitude and love of my heart rose up to him in vows of constant service and attachment. Well, Sir, I went early that night to the public-house in Little Windmill Street, and called for a glass of gin and bitters, in the finest room in their caravansary. And they scarce knew me, Sir,—faith, I scarce knew myself, for I was clad from head to foot in a suit of professional black, and a round-crowned, broad-brimmed beaver, such as I wear to the present day,—(pointing to that which now lay at his feet on the floor,)—and then, Sir, I paid them for their lodgings, and for their gin and bitters, and ordered my things down stairs. My things! They consisted, Sir, of one pocket volume of Sallust, and—don't laugh at me, Sir—a miserable creature of a kitten which I had snatched up off the hearthstone, just before quitting the desolate ruins of my father's house, and had continued to take about the world with me till that moment. I used to carry it in a little old bird-cage in my hand, Sir; and it shared my starvation, Sir, with the frisky resignation that none but an Irish kitten could have shown.

"On being paraded before me this night, however, the kitten appeared very desponding, though it purred to me the moment it saw my face. So, I ordered it a good supper, on the table to my hand; and, while enjoying the feast, its example so moved my own stomach with a spirit of emulation, that, notwithstanding the fowl, ham, and bread, the Meux's Entire, the tea, and bread and butter, and penny buns ad libitum, while I was walking about the streets, pleasing my fancy in the choice of my new clothes, I could not stir out of the public-house till I had ordered supper for myself too. And this supper was huge, Sir: an incoherent mass, I remember, of plate after plate of boiled beef, coarse pickles—such as onions and red cabbage, and then a great big dish of hot stewed oysters, with about half a gallon of porter and ale, taken from time to time to lull all to rest.

"But next morning, Sir, after breakfast, I was at my post at the rural academy, and almost instantly began my trade. I worked hard and diligently, Sir, and gave satisfaction to my master. Night as well as day, Sir, I worked hard, perfecting my own knowledge of languages, that I might stand prepared for more perfectly instructing those committed to my charge.—You remember the vow I told you I had taken, Sir. And I have good reason to know, Sir, that I did some service to my patron's establishment. It got a name, Sir, for making good classical scholars; and its boarders increased in number, came from amongst a better order of society, and paid more liberal pensions. Nor did the good-hearted principal seek to disguise from any one, that this was mainly attributable to the poor young Irish lad, his assistant; nor did he fail to increase my salary as his own fortunes augmented.

"In six or seven years, Sir, he grew rich—rich enough to purchase an independence, and retire from business, to live upon it. I was rich too, Sir, in my own way. At any rate, I had enough to give him a sum in hand for his good-will of the academy, a legal undertaking for the payment of much more, together with an annuity from the current proceeds of the school. In fact, Sir, behold the Irish rebel, and refugee, and beggar, now well to do in the world, and superintending the education of youth in—above all other parts of that world—England itself.

"The sons and other near relations of Irish Members of Parliament—of the new Union Parliament, Sir—honourables too, began to be sent to me from London; and, in some time, it happened that the greater number of my pupils were Irish boys—at least so they called themselves;—and I was often entertained, and kindly entertained, at the houses of their fathers, their uncles, and so forth. Yes, Sir, all this, too, came to pass. I lived, Sir, to earn my bread, nay, to arrive at worldly wealth, by levying heavy contributions on the purses of some of the very kind of men who had sent me, a pennyless vagabond out of the wretched land of my birth; and I lived to sit at their costly boards, Sir, and to interchange opinions with them; ay, and to let them know, in some of those opinions, the degradation, the ruin, and the wrongs which they themselves had inflicted on that land."

"Indeed!" said I. "I thought that to keep friends with those individuals, you must have avoided all such topics in their company."

"Avoided!" he repeated. "Sir, they had my inmost experience, and thoughts, and feelings, and my fullest commentaries on the whole subject—my hatreds, my undying hostilities, my never-ceasing talk, talk, talk: and still I kept friends with those individuals, Sir. Pursuing the same course, I keep friends with them to this day. The Castlereaghan used to listen to the declamations of the Irish Republican, and the English hater and demolisher, and yet send his son to learn Greek and Latin of him; and the Irish Tory does the same thing at the present hour: they have even followed him here to Paris, Sir. There are some dozens of their sons, nephews, and cousins, this moment under his roof in the Bois de Boulogne."

"And have you never had a falling out with any of them?"

"Never with a single one of the fathers or other relations of my boys, Sir; but with one of the boys themselves I have indeed had a little misunderstanding. He was a great big boy, Sir—as big as myself—about eighteen; and one day, while I reprehended him in class for some glaring fault, he called me an old Irish rebel, Sir, to the face of my whole assembled subjects. It wasn't the cat-o'-nine-tails, or the birch, I took to him, Sir; no, Sir, but I laid my hand on what a great tall fellow like him would feel, Sir. I laid my hand on a smart bit of hazel, Sir, fresh cut in the wood, something between a riding-switch and a walking-stick, and I laid that on the young gentleman, Sir, from shoulder to flank, until I had given him such a drubbing as he will remember to his dying day. I drubbed him out of our study, Sir; I drubbed him out of my house, Sir; and then I shut the door in his face, Sir, and let him get home as well as he could to his father; and none of them ever called me an old Irish rebel after that, Sir.

"Good by, Sir,"—we shook hands—"I have staid with you an unconscionable time to-day, Sir,—good by." He left the room, suddenly returned to the door, thrust in his head, and adding, "The Doctor is in town, Sir," finally disappeared.

"The Doctor! what Doctor?" I asked of myself. "Or which Doctor?"—for I knew a good many doctors; doctors of Medicine, French, English, Irish, and Scotch, without number—they were quite in my way, unfortunately; doctors of laws, from Cambridge, Cork, and Mullinahone; more than one doctor of music—essentially my horrors; besides a little doctor of I know not what, who came to me one day with a French gentleman, both speaking Parisian French in its very perfection, and going through French manners to their utmost verge of refinement; and the little old man was librarian to some important public institution besides; and yet he bid me good-by, at parting, in English, and with such a determine, among this array of doctors, "the doctor" alluded to by my friend. The genteel Mr. Murray of Albemarle Street, had for some time been announcing for publication, a new novel called 'The Doctor;' and I wondered could it be the book, and not any living doctor, which was meant. The mystery quite engrossed me; but the propounder of it soon came to solve it himself. In fact, it was my excellent and respected friend, Dr. B——, who had arrived in Paris, to follow up his official care of a certain international question of great importance between France and England. And why was my old visiter so much interested with his coming to Paris? Because the question at issue proposed certain results, which, if accomplished, must, as a good many people thought, be productive of much commercial prosperity, and, indeed, social comfort, to England; and this prospect set my old Irish rebel almost mad; so that he nearly foamed at the mouth about it. He had made himself perfect master of the subject. During the last vacation at his academy, he had travelled north, south, east, and west, in its pursuit. He had hunted it down in the great manufacturing cities, and in the agricultural districts; he had attended meetings, and amassed reports of committees upon it; he had got himself introduced to all members of the Chambres des Deputés, as well as to all official persons who might be supposed in any way hostile to the measure, in consequence of their own private interests, or particular prejudices and views; and talked, and memorialed, and argued them to death; and, to crown all, he had just completed a brochure, concentrating his whole knowledge, and his whole argument, and his whole venom, upon the question; and a copy of this pamphlet he handed to me on the present occasion; and he was to distribute an edition of fifteen hundred copies of it, gratis, through the length and breadth of the land. And the negotiation between the two countries was to fail and fall into dust and ashes; "And, inch by inch, Sir, their commercial monopoly and tyranny shall crumble away, Sir; inch by inch, and time after time; until there shall be a want of bread in their houses, and a wolf-howl for it in their streets; and then, Sir, that other country shall begin to taste its revenge."

"I am sorry," I said, "that Dr. B——," of whom, during his outbreak, he had spoken very bitterly, "should have incurred your displeasure on this or any other subject; for he is a very good man, as well as a distinguished one; and, moreover, he has just done me a vital service. Becoming acquainted with my embarrassments, resulting from my long illness, he has just obtained for me, from Lord Grey's Government, assistance to a very considerable extent."

The drooping eyes of my visiter shot one powerful glance at me, and again bent to the carpet. I saw the muscles of his mouth move a little. I saw perhaps moisture on his eyelashes. He was silent for some time.

"Give me back that brochure, Sir," he said at last; "there is a page or two in it about your [illegible] which contains it, and have it expunged to the last letter. And may God bless your friend, Sir. Give him my respects and regards when you see him next, if he will let you."

I gave him back the pamphlet; he stuffed it into his pocket, suddenly arose, and suddenly took his leave, as he had done upon a last visit; and then, as if in prepense imitation of himself, he also returned to the half-opened door, poked in his head and shoulders, and said—"Reynolds is in town this time, Sir."

Reynolds! I was in still greater perplexity about this "Reynolds" than I had been about "the Doctor." It has been seen I knew a great many doctors; but there were very few Reynolds' of my acquaintance. One was the worthy Mr. John Reynolds, bookseller and stationer in my native town, whom I had not seen for a good many years; and it was very improbable that he had come to Paris, or that even if he had, any one could have known anything about the unpretending event, or about the unpretending causes of it either: and the other was Mr. Mansell Reynolds, the accomplished editor of "The Keepsake," who had patronised, by inserting them in his aristocratic annual, some of my "contributions." Could it be he?

"Come over with me, Sir, to the Champs Elysée," said my old friend, when he visited me the following Sunday. By the way, he almost always called on Sundays; it was his habit to convey his boarders, who were exclusively Protestant, to the door of the Church of England place of worship in the quarter mentioned, and see them carefully stowed into the building, though he never crossed its threshold after them. "Come over with me to the Champs Elysée, Sir, and I will tell you, and I will show you too, who this Reynolds is. I have met the carriage at your gate, Sir, to take you out for your daily drive; so only give me a seat in it with you, and let me tell the cocher where to go, and you shall speedily be satisfied."

"Almost as soon as I heard Reynolds was in town, Sir," he resumed, as we sat in the voiture together, "I went to look after him. They gave me the name of his hôtel at Galignani's, and I walked up and down opposite the hôtel, Sir, until at last I saw him come out in his fine new carriage; and then, Sir, I followed him the whole way he drove, and back again to the hôtel, sometimes walking, indeed, almost running at the side of the carriage—it was an open one, Sir—and sometimes before it, that I might have a good look at him. So, Sir, I have studied him well for you. Stop here, monsieur le cocher," he added, pointing to the English house of worship in the Champs Elysée. He was obeyed; and our vehicle stood still in a certain position appointed by my companion.

People were going into the church one by one, or in groups. Several carriages stopped, delivered their company, and drove up or down the spacious main avenue. There was a fine boy of about thirteen standing with his back against a tree, at a little distance from us. Our master of the ceremonies beckoned to this boy, who immediately ran to him.

"What!" I asked, "and is this the Reynolds?"

"Not quite, Sir," said my friend smiling; "one of my three sons, Sir—a fellow, who this moment has an appointment as midshipman on board an American ship; and who, please God, will help his father, and brothers, and sisters, when they have all become Americans,—for Americans we are all to be, Sir, and to America we have all been preparing to go for the last three months, Sir,—who, I say, will yet help all the rest of his family, please God, to ———" But I dare not utter what he added, Barnes; 'twas veritable, deadly treason, against somebody, his crown and dignity.

"Will," he went on, addressing his young son, "I brought you here to-day to see a remarkable countryman of your father; but before I bring you acquainted with him, make your bow to this gentleman, Sir,"—and thereupon he broke into a high-flown, though crabbed eulogy upon poor me; and the future young American midshipman pulled off his cap, and blushed, stammered, and bowed;—"and stand back now, Will, but stand near us, for here he comes! And say nothing, but listen to me; I'll describe him for you." He stood straight upright in the open voiture, fixed his hat steadily upon his head, fixed his eyes as steadily upon a carriage which drove towards us from the direction of the Rue de Rivoli, hugged his arms hard across his breast, pushed his lips in and out two or three times, and continued—

"The handsome new carriage, open, like our own, to give him air—why not?—with the new horses, new harness, new coachman, in the new cocked hat and in the white gloves, and white ribbons to his reins, and with the dashing chasseur sitting behind—that's his carriage, Will—that's his carriage, Sir; and as it comes nearer to you now, look closer: that's himself sitting in it—that large, bloated man, about seventy years of age, dressed out like a prince; that's Thomas Reynolds, the Irish Informer of '98."

I started, and I believe uttered an exclamation of great surprise.

"Yes, Sir; yes, Will, that's the Reynolds." People began to look up at the public showman, and then towards the Lion he was exhibiting and describing. Upon this, my good friend raised his voice, and went on.

"Ay, that's Thomas Reynolds, first an Irish rebel, sworn, and the swearer in of many other Irish rebels against his Majesty King George the Third, in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and ninety-eight; in which character, mind you, Will, he was as poor as a beggar-man; but then, Will, he turned informer, and sold the blood of his brother rebels for money; and then, Will, he became rich, and has been going about the world ever since as fine as you see him to-day." A crowd of English had now collected round our voiture, and Reynolds elegant new turnout was passing their outskirts. "Thomas Reynolds, Will; don't forget the name." The unhappy man was now so close to the orator that, if not very deaf, he must have heard every word he said. "Tho-mas Rey-nolds. And now he's going to church, Will, to pray to a God who has said that the incense of blood reeking up to His throne is an abomination to him; and yet, Will, the coat on that man's back, the shirt on that man's back, the shoes on his feet, the hat on his head, the breathing of his lungs, are all bought or prolonged with blood-money." Reynolds' carriage here passed us as close as it could, without coming in contact with us; his eyes and the speaker's eyes met; the expression of those of the former was baleful, that of the other blasting, although frownless. "Ay, Will, my boy, and the luxurious carriage he sits in is paid for with the price of blood—is but another shape or mode of blood-money; and his fine horses, Will, and their fine housings and trappings; and his fine foreign servants, bedizzened with gold-lace, and the gold-lace round the grand cloth of his coachman's seat; and the white gloves and the white ribbons—everything—everything belonging to him and about him, comes from blood—from blood—from blood!"

Reynolds' carriage stopped. The chasseur jumped down, pulled open its door, unfolded its steps, and the aged and feeble-limbed man was assisted by the gewgaw servant into the church. My companion kept his eyes fixed on him until he had completely disappeared through the doorway. We then drove away up the Champs Elysés, towards the vast and magnificent edifice at its Bois de Boulogne termination.

With such feelings stored up in his own bosom, and well wrought into the minds and hearts of all his family, the old Irish rebel, with his excellent wife, his three sons, and—including the poor moping innocent—his five daughters, accompanied by three grand pianos, two double-action harps, and a descendant of the Irish kitten, ennobled by an Angola cross, sailed from Havre for America.—But before he sailed, I received from him the following lines, commemorating, as he expressed it, one remarkable Sunday in the Champs Elysés.

THE SPY-INFORMER.

Lolling at his vile ease in chariot gay,
His face—nay, even his fearful name unhidden—
Uncloaked—abroad!—'neath all the eyes of day,
(Which, as he passeth, close, while breath is hushed)
Unspat upon—untrampled down—uncrushed—
I've met the seven-fold traitor!
Wretch curse-ridden
By a whole nation's curse—and a world's scorn
Alped upon that!
And, God, he hath upborne
For nearly forty years, on the broad back
Of his strong scoundrel mind, without or crack
Or cringe, the Atlas burthen!
Look! 'tis he—
Who for the gold that yields his luxury,
Sold all!—friends, honor, household hearth—the child,
The lisping, trusting child upon his knee,
Who looked into his horrid eyes and smiled,
While he its unsuspecting sire beguiled
Of words to make an orphan of that child!
Devil! who sold its little smile! and sold
Unto the gallows, scourge, or dungeon-hold,
The young, the noble, the high-hearted bold,
And with them humbler thousands ten times told!

And this of his own choice! Not even led
By the detected craven's shivering dread—
No—this of his own free cool-weighing choice.
His ear still ringing to the trumpet-voice
Of youthful ardour on its council day,
Stealthily, serpently, he slimed his way
Unto the pay-master—and back again
Unto those fearless and uncrafty men,
Till, drop by drop, he marketed away,
At cautious pricing—for no blood no pay,
Each vein which in their gallant hearts had sway,
With all that through a nation's bosom play!
Yea! till from lordly castle, to the cot
Of the starved peasant, reigned one common lot
Of carnage, and of torture, and of woe;—
Yea—till the household blood so fast did flow,
That, helped by women's and by children's tears,
The household hearth it slaked down for years!

Again look on him! To God's house to-day,—
(For he dares kneel, and he pretends to pray,)
Now hath he come. O'erfed, on bloated limbs
Scarce from his chariot-steps can he descend,
Tho' nought,—remorse, nor age, nor shame yet dims
That cool hyena-eye, which round him lowered,
Hopeless of fellow glance from fellow friend,
And yet so quiet-cruel to the end,
Might almost chill a brave man into coward!

Say I that in God's house he should not kneel,
And pray!—and be forgiven—if he feel!
That scarlet-red as are his sins and woe
True sorrow may not "wash them white as snow!"
I've said—I've thought it not; but this I say—
That even his Master, Judas, flung away
The blood-money, in penitence and dread—
But that this traiter of the hoary head
Hath clutched it hard, and kept it—and I say,
That if unto God's house he come to-day
He should not come in all the base display
Which it doth purchase—in that chariot gay,
And charioteered by liveried slaves (whose pay
Can reconcile them to such odious sway)—
But that unto God's house he ought to creep,
The "thirty pieces" given back, and weep—
Ay, as a pilgrim—on his knees—if God
Hath touched his feet with a chastising rod—
Ay, and in rags, if robe he cannot buy,
Without the wages of his infamy!

But, thus decked out within the holy place,
He but blasphemes to Heaven's averted face;
And for each prayer he cants, on high is writ,
In the dread book of doomsday—"Hypocrite!"

And sometimes as I see him whisked along
To join the swell of sacred words or song,
I have a feeling—vague though understood—
That in his lack of kindly, human blood,
Venom of reptiles crawleth lazily,
Through leprous breast, and brain, and artery—
And that the cushions of his chariot gay,
And all his pillows, or by night or day,
Are soft for him, with pulpy hearts which he Trucked for the mammon of impurity!

And this man lives!—lives on his Judas pelf—
He neither will refund nor hang himself!
He lives on those who would not live as slaves—
A fungus sucking aliment from graves!

He lives, too, on his name—his putrid name—
Immortal rascal! let him have that fame!

And on, still let him live!—in luxury!
Here in the capitol of Liberty!
Ay, here or anywhere!—or let him roam
North, south, east, west—to any point but—HOME!
For should he place upon that widowed shore
His loathsome foot—oh, it would shudder o'er!
Through victim-bones a stirring there would be 'Neath all the land, of him that land to free—
Heaving him back again unto the sea!—

COLLIERS AND COLLIERIES.

The Whig appetite for Inquiry by Commission was well nigh satiated,—Colonel Sibthorp's occupation was almost gone,—charities, factories, prisons, poor-rates, constables, corporations, church revenues, and weavers' wages, had all been duly examined,—investigation was dying of inanition, there being little on earth left unexplored; when Lord Ashley luckily bethought himself of subterraneous employment; and a Royal Commission was forthwith launched at the coal pits, and inquiry dived underground. Now this is just where inquiry ought to have begun. It is out of sight that abuses usually exist; and that which is least accessible to observation, is generally most in need of it. So it has proved in this case at least.

The Children's Employment Commission has just issued its Reports on Mines.

These reports exhume a mass of mental, moral, and physical degradation, which cannot be too generally known and denounced. They form, as usual, a pile of blue folios, the very sight of which sets condensation at defiance; and though the Central Commissioners have meritoriously compiled a digest, compressed into something under the compass of three hundred folio pages, we must [illegible] confine our gatherings to that portion which relates to Scotland, whither Messrs. Tancred and Franks were deputed to execute the inquiry; they have discharged their laborious office with no mean amount of diligence and ability. To Mr. Tancred was assigned the West of Scotland coal district, and to Mr. Franks that of Fife and the Lothians. The inquiry they were commissioned to execute extended to all points affecting the ages, hours of work, nature of employment, place of work, treatment, health, wages, morals, and education of the young persons and children employed.

Centuries after actual feudalism had disappeared in Great Britain, serfdom lingered in the collieries of Scotland; and not till 1775 was its abolition provided for in an act whose preamble ran thus;—

Whereas by the statute law of Scotland, as explained by the judges of the courts of law there, many colliers and coal-bearers and salters are in a state of slavery and bondage, bound to the collieries or saltworks where they work for life, transferable with the collieries and saltworks, &c.; be it enacted, "that all those who were colliers at the passing of the Act should become free on certain conditions, and under certain regulations, at periods varying from three to ten years," &c.

Such being the case, and the provisions of the act not having been fully effected for some years afterwards, we can readily understand how a patient endurance of degrading and oppressive toil may be evinced by those who are themselves the sons and daughters of slaves. It will require no slight effort to remove a system which seems to be regarded with the submission due to a decree of nature.

We shall, before indulging in any further comments on the subject, endeavour to cull from the reports of the assistant Commissioners for Scotland, a brief but sufficiently comprehensive description of the actual condition of the objects of the inquiry, under the various heads we have above enumerated.

In factories,—visited, ventilated, whitewashed, warmed, regulated, boxed, inspected, and medically superintended, by act of Parliament,—where the labour is anything but fatiguing, children are not admitted till they are nine years old, and must not be worked more than eight hours per diem. In collieries where the labour, dirt, confinement, and foulness of air, are limited alone by the mercy of the workmen, or the benevolence of the overlooker, children begin work at seven and eight years old, and the duration of work is generally for eleven hours, and frequently longer; sometimes continuing through the night; especially in the East of Scotland. This is attested by a number of credible witnesses.

The employment in all collieries is divisible into two main branches,—that of hewing the coal, and that of conveying it out when hewed. The former is properly the province of the adult collier, and the latter of women and children.

In the Western district, where the labour seems in every respect mitigated, the youngest children are employed only in opening and shutting the doors, which regulate the draft of air, as the whirleys or wagons of coal pass. The solitude and darkness constitute the only physical evil of the employment; though to entomb a young child all day long, in a dark and dismal passage underground, would be deemed a fearful cruelty, were it resorted to even as punishment in a prison. The next occupation is that of putting or pushing the whirley full of coal along the passages in the pit. Mr. Tancred speaks favourably of it in Lanarkshire:—

Any one who has seen the children at work can have no hesitation in saying that the physical exertion necessary in drawing is occasionally considerable. This exertion, however, is by no means continuous. . . . The whirley, being loaded and started on the tramway, runs pretty easily till perchance it gets off the rails at a sudden turn, or where another railway joins in. Then the drawer and his assistant, sometimes called the "putter," must put their shoulders to the wheel to lift or drag it upon the rails again. After this they can take a little rest. Once more they start, and perhaps hear a rattling, and see a light in the distance; this is another pair of children trotting along with an empty whirley towards the face of the coal. . . . Now, we will suppose they come to a part of the road where there is a slip in the strata, sometimes called "a trouble." Here the road rises pretty steeply for a short distance; and now comes the tug of war. The drawer, throwing his whole weight upon the chain, and leaning his body so forward that his hands touch the rails, whilst the putter pushes with might and main behind, with many a puff they urge the load to the top of the ascent. Here they sit awhile, till they have recovered their wind; after which, they soon see the lights dancing about a-head, and hear the hubbub at the pit bottom.

The work is not unhealthy when not carried to excess, and few females, Mr. Tancred reports, are to be found in the collieries in his district. Far otherwise is the case in many parts of Yorkshire and Lancashire, where Mr. Symons, Mr. Scriven, hand Mr. Kennedy, bear fearful testimony to the degrading nature of the employment to which females are subjected; and where they are habitually harnessed to the coal-wagons, dragging them on all fours, like animals, along passages which are often under a yard in height.

Mr. Franks details similar abuses in the Western coal districts of Scotland. "Females," he states, "have to crawl backwards and forwards with their small carts, in seams, in many cases, not exceeding twenty-two to twenty-eight inches in height." This operation, called "putting," prevails in Fifeshire, Clackmannan, Stirlingshire, and in parts of the Lothians.

The danger and difficulties, (says Mr. Franks,) of dragging on roads dipping from one foot in three to one foot in six may be more easily conceived than explained; and the state which females are in, after pulling like horses through these holes—their perspiration, their exhaustion, and very frequently even their tears, it is painful in the extreme to witness; yet, when the work is done, they return to it with a vigour which is surprising, considering how they inwardly hate it. The business of these females is to remove the coals from the hewer, who has picked them from the wall-face, and placing them either on their backs, which they invariably do when working in edge seams, or in little carts when on levels, &c., to carry them to the main-road, whence they are conveyed to the pit bottom, where, being emptied into the ascending basket of the shaft, they are wound up by machinery to the pit's mouth, where they lie heaped for further distribution.

This horrible work varies in different districts. In Fife and Clackmannan, the carts or "hutchies" are oblong, square-sided boxes, on four wheels, which run on railways. Frequently, however, where the declivities are great, or the roads are very soft, slypes are used, without wheels. The children, both male and female, are literally harnessed to these carts by a broad belt round the body, whence a chain passes either between their legs or over their backs. We shall cull a few extracts, however, from among the evidence of 429 witnesses examined by the Commissioner, premising that the floor of these passages is "usually wet and slushy, and not unfrequently dripping with water."

Katherine Logan, sixteen years old, coal-putter, examined at Vogrie Colliery, Borthwick, says—"Began to work at coal-carrying more than five years since; works in harness now; draws backwards, with face to tubs; the ropes and chains go under pit-clothes; it is o'er sair work, especially when we crawl."

Elizabeth Dickson, twelve years old, draws coals at Edgehead Colliery, Cranston—"I draw with the ropes and chain, and often fall and get crushed as the hurly comes down the brae: never off work long from the hurts. I am wrought with two brothers and two sisters below; we takes pieces of bread, and get nothing more till work is done; am never wrought less than twelve and fourteen hours; work about; we work all night. Many of the lassies get crushed, and lose their fingers; have often lost my finger nails. Always change my pit clothes when home; am obliged to do, for they are so wet. I bend nearly double while at work, as all the roads are very low. I can read a little; not learned much, as have been three years below, and not at school since."

Janet Selkirk, at Preston-hall Colliery, Cranston, eighteen years of age, draws coal—"Begun to work at ten years of age; did so, as hard work below had made mother blind. I cannot read, as family expenses are heavy. Am obliged to like the work, as all the lassies are. It would no be possible for men to do the work we are forced to do. Men only marry us early because we are of advantage to them."

Elizabeth Selkirk, Haugh Lynn Colliery, parish of Cranston, eleven years old, coal-drawer—"Works from three in the morning till four and five in the afternoon, and frequently all night. The work is so sore that canna help goin' to sleep when waiting for the gig to draw. I do not always change mysel, as I'm o'erfatigued. We have had much trouble (sickness.) My work causes me to stoop double; and when I draw, I crawl on all-fours, like the cuddies,"—[Very sickly, emaciated child, subject to severe pains in limbs and bowels, arising, no doubt, from overwork and want of food. Her parents, with seven children, live in a wretched hovel at Pathhead; the room not more than ten feet by fourteen; the furniture consisted of two old bedsteads, nearly destitute of covering, a few old stools, and bits of broken crockery.]

In East Lothian, that still more oppressive labour imposed on females, termed "coal-bearing," attracted the indignant notice of the Commissioner.

The abuses we have above alluded to are common to Yorkshire and Lancashire; but coal-bearing is peculiar, it seems, to the Lothians. In many collieries women bear the coal in baskets on their backs up ladders.

Agnes Moffatt, at Edmonston Colliery, Newton, seventeen years of age, coal-bearer, says:—"Works twelve and fourteen hours daily; can earn 12s. in the fortnight, if work be not stopped by bad air or otherwise. I fill five baskets; the weight is more than 22 cwt.; it takes me twenty journeys. The work is o'er sair for females; had my shoulder knocked out a short time ago, and laid idle some time. It is no uncommon for women to lose their burthen, and drop off the ladder down the dyke below; Margaret M'Neil did a few weeks since, and injured both legs. When the tugs which pass over the forehead break, which they frequently do, it is very dangerous to be under with a load. The lassies hate the work altogether, but they canna run away from it."

"I have wrought," says Jane Watson, "thirty-three years. Have had two dead born; thinks they were so from the oppressive work; a vast of women have dead children and false births, which are worse, as they are no able to work after the latter. I have always been obliged to work below till forced to go home to bear the bairn, and so have all other women. We return as soon as we are able; never longer than ten or twelve days; many less, if they are needed. It is only horse-work, and ruins the women: it crushes their haunches, bends their ancles, and makes them old women at forty."

Numbers bear testimony to the same facts. Some with a philosophical fortitude, which is almost ludicrous. Mrs. Isabel Wilson, thirty-eight years old, says:—

"When women have children thick (fast) they are compelled to take them down early; I have been married nineteen years, and have had ten bairns; seven are in life. When on Sir John's work, was a carrier of coals, which caused me to miscarry five times from the strains, and was gai ill after each. Putting is no so oppressive; last child was born on Saturday morning, and I was at work on the Friday night."

It is here worthy of remark, (adds Mr. Franks,) that to this labour, which is at once so repulsive and severe, the girls are invariably set at an earlier age than boys are to their peculiar labour, from a notion very generally entertained amongst the parents themselves, that girls are more acute, and capable of making themselves useful at an earlier age than boys.

The Commissioner, in his investigation into Mrs. Wilson's domestic arrangements and household goods, finds that nine sleep in two bedsteads with-ut beds, the entire furniture consisting of two hairs, three stools, a table, a kail pot, and a few roken basins and cups. On the subject of furniure Mrs. Wilson, however, supplied the Commissioner with a few new ideas :—

"Upon my asking if the furniture was all they had, he guid wife said, furniture was of no use as it was so troublesome to flit with!"

The general opinion, however, among the gudewives seems to have been one of less satisfaction with the luxuries of their lot :—

"You must just tell the Queen Victoria," says Mrs. Hogg of Gladsmuir to her Majesty's Commissioner, "that we are guid loyal subjects; women-people here don't mind work, but they object to horse-work; and that she would have the blessings of all the Scotch coal-women if she would get them out of the pits, and send them to other labour."

"In fact," says Mr. William Hunter, mining overseman of Arniston Colliery, "women always did the lifting or heavy part of the work, and neither they nor the children were treated like human beings, nor are they where they are employed. Females submit to work in places when no man or even lad could be got to labour in : they work in bad roads, up to their knees in water, in a posture nearly double : they are below till last hour of pregnancy : they have swelled haunches and ancles, and are prematurely brought to the grave, or, what is worse, lingering existence."

The hewing of the coal by the colliers is extremely hard work, often performed whilst lying at full length, or crouched up in an uneasy posture.

In the East of Scotland, boys are actually employed in this dangerous and oppressive labour!

Alexander Reid, aged twelve years, (in the Duke of Buccleugh's works at Dalkeith,) says :—"I have worked two years at Sheriff-hall, and go below at two or three in the morning, and hew till six at night; after that I fill and put the carts on the rails to pit-bottom. The pit I work in is very wet; we often work in slush over our shoe-tops. When first below I used to fall asleep; am kept awake now. It is most terrible work; I am wrought in a 30-inch seam, and am obliged to twist myself up to work on my side; this is my every-day work except Friday, when I go down at twelve at night, and come up at twelve at noon," &c.

This, and similar evidence which abounds throughout the Report, amply justifies the desire that Scotland may ere long be freed from what Mr. Franks justly terms "the remnant of the slavery of a degraded age."

The assisting of the wagons up the inclines, the craning of the wagons off the small trains on to the main road, constitute the remaining occupations of children in collieries.

On the subject of wages Mr. Tancred gives a deplorable account of the prevalence of the Truck System. In the Airdrie district, there is, it seems, a regular pewter coinage, bearing on it the name of the store where the coin is payable, with the amount it passes for. The usual system, however, is for—

A woman to go to the store, and say she wants so many ounces of soap, tea, sugar, so much meal, potatoes, bacon, &c. These articles are entered by the store-keeper in her pass-book, with the price of each, and she goes to the pay-office, close to the store door perhaps, and shows the book, upon which the clerk reckons up the amount, pays her the money, and back she goes to the store, and procures the articles. Another plan is this: the wife goes to the store, takes what articles she wants, and leaves it to the store-keeper to set the amount against her, having "a line" from the master to say what the wages of herself or husband are. On the pay-day the store-keeper sends in his books to the clerk, and the amount of each person's advances is deducted from the pay.

In few instances do the people receive the real value of their wages; besides it encourages them to run into debt. The remedy proposed by Mr. Tancred is, that the Inspectors, to whom he presumes the Report will give birth, shall have power to ascertain the terms upon which stores are rented; the prices and qualities of the articles sold, and to prevent the sale of spirits at them.

There is a page wanting in Mr. Tancred's industrial economy. He must hit at the root as well as the branches of the evil; whilst trade continues to be crippled for the sake of a cormorant monopoly, both masters and men are driven, the one to resort to, and the other to submit to resources, which could not live a day were the vast capacities of our industry released from the shackles of restrictions on trade, and the palsying effect of scarcity of food.

The actual wages professed to be paid to colliers in the West of Scotland is, for colliers under eighteen, 12s. to 24s. per week. Putters and drawers, 4s. to 9s. Trappers, 4s. Horse-drivers 3s. to 6s. Engine-boys, 6s. to 13s.

Mr. Franks gives a more detailed statement in the East of Scotland.

In the East of Scotland, wages of colliers average as follows :—

Accidents are stated to be of frequent occurrence in both districts; and as there are, says Mr. Franks, no Coroners in Scotland, "no notice appears to be taken of them." They arise chiefly from the falling of the roof, or ropes breaking.

Dr. S. S. Alison* remarks, in reference to this subject:—

I am pretty sure about 50 people under my care, and connected with collieries, have lost their lives in consequence of accidents occurring in the works around Tranent, and I do not remember of an investigation having been made by the sheriff in more than one instance.

The care taken of the children appears to be slight. They are generally employed, and paid by the coal hewers; and do not fall under the cognizance of the master. This seems to prevail almost everywhere throughout Great Britain. Their food consists seldom of aught else than kail, porridge, and bread, in East Scotland; and the homes of colliers are represented by Mr. Franks as "deplorable pictures of filth and poverty." It is otherwise in England. Both in food and houses the colliers appear to be comfortably provided there, in most instances. In the East of Scotland, in point of household and personal cleanliness, the condition of the collier community, struck Mr. Franks as that of a population abandoned to a course of life, which has blunted the commonest perceptions of human comfort.

But give the collier (adds Mr. Franks) the comforts of a clean and cheerful home, and the companionship of a sober and decently-educated female, not degraded to brute labour by working in the pits; let her attend to a mother's and housewife's duties: and you will soon change the moral condition of the collier.

The following is so graphic and terse a sketch of the collier character, and one so well borne out by other evidence, that we must add it to our extracts:—

Mr. Alexander Nimmo, innkeeper, Tranent, states that he has been some years resident in Tranent, and had frequent opportunities of witnessing the conduct of the collier people. They are very clannish, and hold very little intercourse with other tradesmen. They are quite as singular in their marriages as they are in their friendships—so entirely exclusive. They may well be so, for no working man would marry a collier's daughter, so little do they know of domestic duty. Colliers drink very hard, and rarely anything but whisky, which they subscribe for amongst themselves and purchase by the bottle or gallon. The bad custom of taking wives below causes them to neglect homes and carry down their children almost before they can walk, and they get little or no education; most of the children here are very ignorant. Sometime since Mr. Cadell had a school-house built; he engaged a teacher; the fees were fixed very low, so as to induce colliers to send their offspring; few attended regularly; and the school was closed after a few months; it was a voluntary school. The collier people in this town are dirty to extreme; their houses are not such as I should like to feed pigs in. Most keep fowls and ducks, and many pigs are kept in the houses. In consequence of the filthy state of the wynds and closes where the colliers stop, a neighbouring farmer lately went to a considerable expense in erecting a public privy, with separate partitions and apparatus to keep it well cleansed: but they took umbrage at being so provided for, and, thinking it an innovation upon their rights, they pulled the privy down, and burnt the wood of which it was composed. In this town there are some few colliers who are natives, and keep attached to the place, but the majority are changeable; they are apt to run in debt and then flit.

They are in knowledge, (says Mr. Ross, of the Loanhead Colliery,) both religious and intellectual, greatly inferior to all other classes; in moral courage and enterprise inferior; in taste for comforts, even of a domestic nature, inferior; and yet, abject as their condition is, it presents some favourable features of comparison with others, whose condition, as moral and intellectual beings, is undoubtedly superior. They are always respectful, and sometimes warmly attached to their employers, and exhibit none of the pert and discourteous behaviour of the manufacturer; they listen with cheerfulness and much seriousness to the ministers of the gospel who come among them; they show, and probably feel, less jealousy of their superiors in rank and fortune than is generally shown by other artisans, and they intermeddle less with politics.

The diseases to which colliers are most liable, appear to be asthma, rheumatism, irregular action of the bowels, and bronchitis. Scarcely any colliers are to be found, (says Dr. Alison in his evidence,) above twenty years of age, who are free from disease in the pectoral organs. Diseases of the spinal column, and fevers prevail. "Black spit," is the common term for the disease of the lungs; which aptly indicates its attendant symptom. "After death," says Dr. Mackellar,—

On examining the chest, the lungs are found excavated, and the cavities filled with a fluid or solid substance —apparently pure carbon.

This disease may be wholly obviated by a better ventilation, especially where gunpowder is used for blasting.

The physical condition, as regards health, is rather favourably reported on than otherwise, by Mr. Tancred, in the West of Scotland. No disease, save asthma, seems to have attracted his attention. Nutritious diet he deems to be common among colliers.

The morals of the Eastern pitmen are, with the exception of the prevalence of intoxication, far from depraved. They appear, in fact, too grievously over-wrought to be very vicious. They have no time for crime. Their leisure is necessarily devoted to rest. In education, not only are the present generation all but destitute of the commonest information; but the children are growing up in similar ignorance.

Mr. Franks says:—

I carefully examined the children on the spot, as well as the signatures to the returns which I had received; and I find, that out of 3886 children and young persons included in such returns, only 866 pretend to write their names, out of which number, I might venture to affirm, that it would require a well-practised eye to decipher even 150; and of those whose names are tolerably legible, I believe that not a couple of dozen could be found to write a dozen consecutive lines on any given subject, capable of being read and understood.

In scriptural and common secular knowledge, he found a "miserable deficiency."

He found the females, as might be expected, ignorant of ordinary household capacity. They knew nothing of housewifery. "How," the Commissioner asks, "should they? Are they to learn it in the pit?"

Mr. Wright, the Manager of the Duke of Buccleugh's mines, in speaking of the improvement there created by the exclusion of females, says:—

* In the Appendix to the Report, there is an elaborate and valuable Thesis, by Dr. Alison, on the physical condition and diseases of the collier population.

I feel confident, that the exclusion of females will advantage the colliers in a physical point of view, and that it will force the alteration of the economy of the mines. Owners will be compelled to alter their system; they will ventilate better, make better roads, and so change the system, as to enable men who now work only three or four days a-week, to discover their own interest in regularly employing themselves. Since young children and females have been excluded from his Grace's mines, we have never had occasion to increase the price of coal.

The desire for legislative interference to check the evils of the existing system, both as to the age of the children, and the employment of females, appears to have been generally expressed by the more intelligent, both of the workmen and the employers, when questioned on the subject.

The apathy of the great mass of this peculiar community, presents a painful theme of reflection. The spirit of serfdom is evidently rife among them still; and they exist, a singular and almost an isolated living instance, of what feudalism was, and of the effects of passive submission on the moral dignity of man, and the attributes of humanity itself. Mr. Franks rightly characterizes them as

A population, including 7000 to 8000 heads of families, leading a mere animal existence, without religious character, without political bias, without political representation—in short, without any political status whatever;—such, and so simple is the character of the people amongst whom my labours have been pursued; and to many, therefore, it was but too obvious that the visit of the Commissioners bore the appearance of an obtrusive and inquisitorial visit, rather than the anxiety of a philanthropy which needed no solicitation.

It is not undeserving of remark, (he adds) that this is the same people, who, wedded to ancient customs, and unaccustomed to the exercise of thought beyond the necessities of the morrow, were so totally ignorant of the boon conferred upon them by the Legislature in 1775, that they contentedly lived on in their bondage, and retained their old custom of "arleing;" and the then tacksmen of the mines, together with their ignorant dependents, continued their voluntary slavery, till the voice of the Legislature in 1799, again commanded them to be free.

He recommends as remedies,

1st. The exclusion of females and young children altogether from the mines.

2dly. The widest possible extension of the benefits of wholesome and sound instruction, and moral and religious training.

The General Report of the Commission for the United Kingdom, has been drawn up by Thomas Tooke, Esq., and Dr. Southwood Smith, with the aid of Messrs. Horner and Saunders, as a Central Board, and twenty visiting Commissioners, of whose Reports, their own is little else than a digest.

It draws a frightful picture of the character of pit-labour in all its aspects; one which may well cause the philanthropist to look back with regret on the time, labour, and money, spent on objects of infinitely inferior claim on the activity of benevolence. Our charities have roamed far and wide in search of food for compassion; and we have left unheeded at home beneath our feet, suffering of body, and heathenism of mind and morals, tenfold greater than we have traversed the globe in search of.

HYDROPATHY, OR THE COLD WATER CURE.*

Here is a new, or resuscitated, system of curing all manner of diseases, which bids fair, for a season, to eclipse Morrison's pills, Homœopathy, and even Brandy and Salt. Its author is neither physician, surgeon, nor apothecary. He has studied at no University, received no diploma. He is even more untutored than the first of the Whitworth Doctors, whom our readers may remember in our pages; and yet upon what appears very credible testimony, he has performed many notable, if not wonderful, cures, after the faculty had fairly given the patients up. There is this to be said for the system of Priessnitz, that he rejects all quack medicines and all drugs whatever; and wisely trusts a great deal to such potent remedies and auxiliaries as air, exercise, c h erfulness, and very homely and moderate, if not abstemious, living. These agencies, with unbounded faith in the treatment, might produce greater wonders than are performed at Gräefenberg, independently of the grand specific, cold water.

Among the grateful patients who have recently been cured at that celebrated place, is Mr. Claridge, the compiler and translator of the various papers which form this singular volume. Mr. Claridge was suffering severely from a complication of headache, tic-doloureux, and rheumatism, when, by the advice of a friend at Gratz, and the recommendation of an eminent medical man whom he met in Venice, he was led to become a pilgrim to the new Temple of Hygeia, at Gräefenberg, in Silesia. He has reason to bless the day when he took that resolution. Several German physicians, whom he accidentally saw, or consulted, instead of treating Priessnitz as an empiric, had sent their own patients to be cured; by swallowing copious draughts of the coldest spring water and using constant external ablutions of the same icy fluid. Mr. Claridge appears to be now in England: nor can we imagine any motive for his intense admiration of the water cure, save the benefits which he believes he has derived from it, and his desire to make generally known what he conceives to be a discovery fraught with immeasurable benefit to the tortured, drug-consuming, suffering, and short-lived human race. It is, however, somewhat disheartening to find him asserting that it is believed the system must decay with its inventor or discoverer; and that, if Providence should be pleased to remove the second Hippocrates, Hydropathy will again fall into a dormant state, if not into total disuse—"not that he (Priessnitz) will want numerous imitators, but because it is doubtful if the present, or any future generation will ever look upon his like again."

* "Hydropathy, or the Cold Water Cure, as practised by Vincent Priessnitz, at Gräefenberg, Silesia, Austria;" by R. T. Claridge, Esq. Madden & Co., London.

This is rather regarding Priessnitz as a worker of miracles, than a sagacious, self-taught physician, accomplishing cures by apparently very simple means. Priessnitz is by no means the first cold-water doctor of whom the world has heard; though he is certainly the first that "was never known to fail." And all diseases, acute or chronic, recent or of long standing, come alike to him: Dropsy, cancer, fever, rheumatism, gout, scrofula, consumption,—tender infancy, and extreme old age, it is all the same.

The father of this wonderful personage was a peasant proprietor at Gräefenberg. He, consequently, received little, if any education; and his skill in curing disease originated in mere accident. He was one day, while engaged in agricultural labour, severely kicked by a horse; and the surgeon called in said, that he would be disabled for life. The young man was, naturally, very unwilling to acquiesce in this opinion, and he cured himself of his wounds, and their consequences, by cold water and spare diet alone. He afterwards performed several cures both on men and animals; and as he became better acquainted with the virtues of water, his knowledge of disease and his renown gradually increased. A little opportune professional persecution confirmed his reputation. The jealous Austrian government interfered, but this only further spread the reputation of Priessnitz, who, after minute investigation, could not, it was imagined, with only cold water, homely diet, and severe exercise, do much injury to the lieges. And now the water doctor of Gräefenberg is as high in favour with the fashionable world of Austria, Prussia, and Bavaria, as is Sir James Clarke in London, or Dr. Jephson at Leamington. Between 1829, when he began to practise as a regular physician, and 1842, he has been consulted by 7000 persons; and, of course, has cured as many of them as were willing to be cured. Their patience may fail, though the cures seem accomplished with wonderful rapidity, but never once does the treatment fail. The number of patients increases every year. Nor have his labours been without their reward. He is little more than forty years of age—though, in spite of cold water, he is said to look older than he is—and his fortune is already £50,000. But the water doctor has other means of increasing his income besides fees. These are, in reality, very moderate,—though rich and grateful patients often load him with presents. He lodges and boards four or five hundred of his patients; and in the season, his extensive establishment, and the adjoining town of Freiwaldau, are crowded like an American watering-place. The cure of the patients is not obstructed by enervating indolence, luxurious accommodation, or sumptuous fare. Priessnitz does not wish to tempt them to loll in soft beds, remain in snug, neat chambers, or loiter at the table d'hôte; and therefore the beds are bad, and the table coarsely, though plentifully supplied.

As we can perceive no reason why the water-cure may not be accomplished quite as successfully in some secluded Welsh, Highland, or other Northern valley, as at Gräefenberg, and have great faith in the skill, sagacity, and enterprise of our own countrymen, medical and non-medical, it may be interesting to give some account of Mr. Priessnitz's establishment, as the book is still comparatively rare, and the season for watering-places just approaching:—

Gräefenberg is a colony of about twenty houses, placed about half-way up one of the mountains of the Sudates, forming part of the small town of Freiwaldau, in Silesia, Austria, about 18 English miles from Neissé, 70 from Breslau, 260 from Berlin, 200 from Dresden, 160 from Prague, 63 from Olmutz, and 175 from Vienna.

The town of Freiwaldau contains about 3000 inhabitants, most of whom are engaged in agriculture or the manufacture of linen. As the accommodations at Gräefenberg are not adapted to families, Freiwaldau is the resort of the fashionable world who have occasion to undergo the water cure, the upper part of most of the houses being let out as lodgings.

The establishment of Gräefenberg is most agreeably placed on a long slope, which extends from the valley to the top of the mountain. The views from it are magnificent, particularly in one direction, in which the plains of Prussia are seen in the distance. The highest houses chiefly belong to Mr. Priessnitz.

A number of irregular buildings can, at a pinch, accommodate from five to six hundred persons, besides containing the baths. The air is cold and bracing; and the presiding Hippocrates seems wisely to make fully as much use of the mountain breeze, as of cold water. At daybreak, the patients quit their comfortless chambers, setting weather at defiance, and drink the water, or take the baths prescribed for them.

At breakfast the table is supplied with brown bread, and most excellent milk and butter from Mr. Priessnitz's dairy: the same may be said of supper. At dinner there is soup, and beef boiled in it, a famous dish with Germans. After this, one occasionally sees pork, veal, beef, ducks, geese, potatoes, sour croute, gerkins, cucumbers, pastry, &c.: these are named to show the nature of the things which invalids are allowed to partake of, not that they all appear at one time, for in general it is complained that, though plentiful, the food is coarse. Mr. Priessnitz, when any allusion is made to this subject, says, "that the cure would progress quicker if the table were much worse served than at present; he has no objection to people eating heartily, but he insists on it that the food ought not to partake of those solid nourishing qualities which we are accustomed to in England." When it has been remarked to him that certain invalids appeared to overload their stomachs, he replied, "that they might go on as they would, that water sooner or later would find its own level, and that as they progressed towards a healthy state, their appetites would become more moderate;" a fact which observation fully confirms. At the same time that I admit this, if allowed to differ from such high authority, I should say that if more attention were paid to diet, cures would be effected in a much shorter time than they are. Mr. Priessnitz says that people must eat to acquire and keep up their strength; and in this I perfectly agree with him, all I would suggest is, a little more regard to the quality of the substances which individuals partake of.

In an Englishman one can understand the force of this objection. The breakfast costs about twopence halfpenny, the dinner one shilling, English money. Though the guests are not regaled with dainty fare, little or no restriction is laid upon them in regard to quantity, so that they drink plentifully of cold water—"which digests everything," and which is taken to the extent of from ten and twelve to twenty glasses a-day. The size of the glass we do not learn. If an ordinary wine-glass is meant, the quantity to people taking abundant exercise does not seem excessive.

Though the medical faculty were at first jealous of Priessnitz, some of them now seem the most active of his trumpeters; and there are already forty-five regular Hydropathic Establishments in Austria, Prussia, Hungary, Bavaria, and other parts of Germany. There is also one in St. Petersburg, one in Ghent, and one in Strasburg. The treatment, in its leading features, closely resembles, as we understand it, the methods of training long practised by the New-Market, and other trainers; though sweating, and violent transitions from hot to cold, and the reverse, are more decidedly practised. Yet these violent changes, though boldly spoken of, are not used without some discretion. In short, though swelling language is employed, the actual treatment is prudent and guarded. One great secret of the success of Priessnitz seems to be, refusing to undertake any hopeless or very bad case. To some patients he says at once, "I can do nothing for you;" but if they, animated by hope and lively faith, insist upon remaining under his care, they often partially recover. Sweating, and to excess, appears with Priessnitz to supply the place of all the evacuations usually employed by medical men in effecting cures. No grain of even the simplest medicine is ever used, nor are leeches, the lancet, or cupping-glasses known; and all mineral waters are considered poison. The only remedies employed by Priessnitz, in common with ordinary physicians, are the bath in all its forms and modifications, and clysters of cold water.

Many persons had cautioned Mr. Claridge against going to Gräefenberg; but pain—severe bodily suffering, from which he could find no relief,—urged him on; and the personal narrative of his sojourn affords to Englishmen a better account of the place, and its presiding genius, than the various papers he has translated from other sources, though these strongly confirm his testimony.

On arriving at the establishment at Gräefenberg, and finding all the rooms engaged, I was compelled to descend to the town of Freiwaldau, at the bottom of the mountain, where strangers are sure of finding accommodation. The arrival of an English carriage and family, probably for the first time, was too important an event not to be immediately known to everybody. Consequently, early the following morning, our countrymen, whom I had persuaded to go; one, a medical man, who had been there two months, the other one month, called upon me to invite my family up to the establishment that day to dinner. These gentlemen, on our meeting, declared that they owed me an eternal debt of gratitude, for having directed their attention to Gräefenberg, adding, "when we came here we were encased in flannel, to which we have said adieu for ever: our appetites are excellent; and above all, we sleep well, and exercise never tires us. We have now acquired a buoyancy of spirits quite incredible: had any one told us three months ago it was possible to attain it, we should have treated the idea as chimerical." They then expressed an opinion that it was flannel, abstaining from drinking water, and ignorance of its value in ablutions, and not the damps of England, that caused so many to seek health in other climes, to the evident disadvantage of our own country.

At dinner there were between 200 and 300 persons, of all ages and all ranks in society, who, with perhaps [illegible] exceptions, were invalids, a circumstance [illegible] quainted with the fact would have suspected; for I could not help remarking the happy, healthy-looking countenances of all around, and the merry laugh and mirth which burst from every part of the large saloon. On expressing my surprise to the English doctor, he said, "You will find difficulty, no doubt, in believing that there are, to my knowledge, forty or fifty persons here, who, but for Priessnitz, would have been consigned to their tombs, and not have been living here to-day to tell their tales; and that there are, perhaps, twice as many more who, under any other treatment, would have been confined to their beds. On looking at these people, you must bear in mind that they are not on a par with the casual occupants of an hospital; for the majority of them have come here after having consulted all the celebrated doctors within their reach, and tried the mineral waters in Germany in vain: that they are people who only abandoned their medical advisers when it became too apparent that they could receive no assistance from them, or when they could no longer be induced to follow their prescriptions; therefore, the majority of these cases may be considered more advanced and confirmed than the common run of an hospital; that disease is too firmly rooted in their systems to be relieved by the ordinary practice of the faculty, most of them being considered incurable." The doctor added, "If anything could be adduced to show that invalids can live, digest, and become strong without the aid of drugs, it would be the fact, that amongst the large number of people, both here and at Freiwaldau, some of whom have been many months under the treatment, not a grain of medicine has been taken by any one of them since their arrival; notwithstanding they eat with appetites that, but for the dissolving power of water, would cause them to die of indigestion. As there is no wine, mustard, or pepper on the table, people think no more of such things, than if they were not."

One can easily imagine much gaiety and cheerfulness to exist at the public tables of the different Spas, or at other watering-places, as they are devoted to recreation and amusement; but in an hospital, where almost every disease known in Europe is to be found, the existence of such gaiety appears incomprehensible except to those who have been some time at Gräefenberg, and have witnessed the soothing power of water in the alleviation of pain, and the buoyancy of spirits which it promotes, by regulating the digestive powers.

"Look at your neighbour to the right," said the doctor; "he came here twelve months ago on crutches, having previously been a year in bed. His disease, the gout, being an old hereditary complaint, he is not yet cured; but one thing he will tell you, that though in pain when he first came, it soon ceased, and he has never been confined to his room an hour since, nor did he ever enjoy finer health. Then look at that young lady opposite. From childhood she had scrofula in her face and neck to such an extent, that she was an object of pity to all who saw her: she has been here nine months, and is now so completely recovered, that she is considered the beauty of the room. That officer near her is suffering from a wound in his leg. At first it withered away until it became no larger than a man's wrist; the surgeons said, nothing but amputation remained. Upon which he came here, and now his limb has resumed its flesh, and will shortly be perfectly restored. Yonder female walking with a stick was brought here six weeks ago in wet sheets. She had been confined to her bed and room until she lost the use of her limbs, and so became a perfect skeleton; she now walks tolerably well with a stick, and in a fortnight, it is expected, she will do without it."

He then pointed out a child who had lost the use of his legs from scrofula, but now perfectly recovered. Another person was tormented for years with tic-douloureux, who, after remaining here a few months, became perfectly cured. There is an officer now recovered from hernia, and there several others from rheumatism. "That gentleman," said he, "is a field-marshal in the Prussian service; eighty-seven years old: he came here on crutches, with the gout, two months ago. He is delighted with the treatment, and now walks about these mountains with the use only of a stick. He intends staying here through the winter. That lady from Moscow has a child only three years old, distorted by a spinal complaint; four months ago the poor infant could not stand erect; now it plays about, and is as happy as the other children: in six months' time it will be perfectly cured." In fact, such a number of singular and extraordinary cases were pointed out to me by my friend, whose knowledge of the facts and veracity could be depended upon, that I no longer doubted the astounding accounts I had so frequently heard of the cures effected at Gräefenberg.

The faith of Mr. Claridge became stronger every moment; and in this favourable state of mental predisposition his cure was commenced.

Having at last made up my mind to become one of Priessnitz's patients, I was prepared for his coming in the morning. The first thing he did was to request me to strip and go into the large cold-bath, where I remained two or three minutes. On coming out he gave me instructions, which I pursued as follows:—At four o'clock in the morning my servant folded me in a large blanket, over which he placed as many things as I could conveniently bear; so that no external air could penetrate. After perspiration commenced, it was allowed to continue for an hour; he then brought a pair of straw shoes, wound the blanket close about my body, and in this state of perspiration I descended to a large cold-bath, in which I remained three minutes; then dressed and walked until breakfast, which was composed of milk, bread, butter, and strawberries, (the wild strawberry in this country grows in abundance from the latter end of May until late in October;) at ten o'clock I proceeded to the douche, under which I remained four minutes, returned home, and took a sitz and foot-bath, each for fifteen minutes; dined at one o'clock; at four proceeded again to the douche; at seven repeated the sitz and foot-baths; retired to bed at half-past nine, previously having my feet and legs bound up in cold wet bandages. I continued this treatment for three months, and, during that time, walked about 1000 miles. Whilst thus subjected to the treatment, I enjoyed more robust health that I had ever done before; the only visible effect that I experienced was an eruption on both my legs, but which, on account of the bandages, produced no pain. It is to these bandages, the perspirations, and the baths, that I am indebted for the total departure of my rheumatism.

Whilst thus near Priessnitz, and when consequently I had no fear of the result, by way of experiment I determined, one thorough wet day, not to change my clothes, which were completely saturated, and in this state I sat until they were completely dry: the consequence was, that in the night I awoke with a distracting head-ache, parched tongue, a slight sore throat, and the next morning felt no appetite, but a general languor of body. By the following detail of this case, the reader will judge how easily a cold of this nature is generally cured by Hydropathy. I laid in the kotz, or blanket, went into the cold-bath as usual, and in the afternoon was enveloped in a wet sheet for an hour, until perspiration commenced, then sat in the half-bath, (not quite cold,) and was rubbed all over by two men for twenty minutes; walked out as usual; at night, on going to bed, wore the bandages, or umschlags, on my breast and back of the neck; next day repeated the same, and the third day was perfectly recovered.

My family have all proved the beneficial effects of Mr. Priessnitz's treatment. The night before our departure, the patients gave their annual ball, in the great room of the establishment, in commemoration of Mr. Priessnitz's birthday. The whole of the buildings belonging to him were illuminated, both inside and out, at their expense. In this assembly, consisting of about 500 persons, no stranger would have believed, had he been unacquainted with the fact, that its members were chiefly composed of invalids. Tears were frequently observed to steal from the eyes of many who blessed the great man for their restoration to health; and I do not know a more touching scene than seeing invalids, who, by his means, had regained the use of their limbs, approach him, throw their crutches at his feet, and join in the maze of the waltz. Monarchs might have envied him his feelings on such occasions.

When to this testimony, which may be somewhat impugnable from the patient's prepossessions, is added that of many respectable, and even eminent German physicians, and of the conductors of Medical Journals, the Water Cure surely becomes worthy of examination. Mr. Claridge has given the following account of the theory or principle of Priessnitz's curative system—a system which that sagacious person has been able to form, though he probably could not put his ideas of it into language:—

I. Health is the natural state of the body.

II. The causes of bodily disease, which do not proceed from external injury, are material, and consist of foreign matter introduced into the infected system.

III. This foreign matter is divided into four parts:—

1. Bodily substances which ought to be carried off, but have not been evaporated in proper time.

2. Substances which, according to their nature, cannot be assimilated with the human body, and, notwithstanding, have got into the stomach, or the skin, or have penetrated into the interior.

3. Contagious ulcers.

4. Corruption of the elements, water and air; epidemical diseases.

IV. Every acute disease is an attempt of the system to dispel diseased matter.

V. Fever is not the disease itself, but the consequence of it; it is an effect of an exertion greater than the power of the system.

VI. The radical healing of acute diseases is only possible by separating the diseased matter by means of water, an agent which invariably effects its object, and that always in a manner perceptible to the senses.

VII. By means of physic and bleeding acute diseases become chronic; the system, medically treated, seldom attains a partial, but never a total ejection of diseased matter; therefore, physicians never get a sensitive perception of the causes of disease.

VIII. As sooner or later a body must yield to the effects of drugs, it is quite impossible that any one suffering from chronic disease should die a natural death, unless he be healed by Hydropathy.

IX. Chronic disease cannot be permanently cured by drugs: Hydropathy alone will effect this, by changing the chronic evil to acute eruptions, which are cured in the same way in which first acute diseases are cured, viz., by the water treatment.

X. Mankind, like other organic beings, ought to live according to nature's laws, without pain, and die a natural death, that is to say, without illness or suffering. But with us almost everybody dies from the effects of poisonous drugs, intoxicating liquors, adulterated food, want of water, air, and exercise. To this rule there are but two exceptions. First, if the elements, air or water, or both, be deteriorated, the two principal requisites of health disappear, and epidemics are the inevitable consequence, to which men as well as animals are exposed. Secondly, men are exposed to contagious diseases, but, except from epidemics and contagious disease, no one who has grown up in a natural water regime can be attacked by illness, (outer hurts or hereditary complaints excepted,) and of these two diseases he can be generally speedily cured, and after the cure will always retain his health.

XI. To think of curing disease with the poison commonly called physic, must, to the reflective mind, appear paradoxical, because it is impossible to bring the physic to bear upon the dispersed and deeply-hidden diseased matter; and even if this could be done, it is quite impossible, as every chemist knows, that the morbid matter and physic should mutually dissolve each other into nothing. The consequence of such treatment with physic is, that to the old evil, a new stimulus is added, weak or strong, according to the dose and quality.—"What is inflammable stays in the blood, and afterwards affects the brain."—ARBUTHNOT.

XII. No effective cure, whether of men, animals, or plants, can be made from the ejection of the diseased matter by means of their own organic strength, unless aided by the dissolving elements, air and water.

XIII. This is the treatment which nature bestows upon all her creatures, and it may be asserted without fear of contradiction, that without internal and external water diet, there can be no health for life. We must not look before us into the grey mysteries and doctrines of the future, for the true mode of curing disease, but far behind us, on the green plains of nature, and of the times which are past.

Such is the hard outline of the theory. The illustrative remarks, and the endless list of cases successfully treated, far exceed our limits. But if we cannot advert to these really extraordinary cases, or to the long catalogue of curable diseases, we may mention those which are not curable, the exceptions tending to establish the rule. The incurable diseases are thus stated by Rausse, the author of one of the many late essays on Hydropathy:—

All chronic diseases of the lungs; all organic defects, and all diseases in people whose muscles and sinews are past all power of action, and from whom the vital principle has passed beyond recovery: and he adds, "the cure of all acute diseases to Priessnitz is mere child's play, and in no instance of nervous fevers or inflammations, in any stage, was he ever known to lose a patient; and what is still more worthy of remark, a radical cure is effected in a few days, without the subsequent debility which would result from any other treatment. Hydropathy completely supersedes the dreadful necessity of cutting men's flesh, or amputating their limbs. In chronic diseases, it may especially be remarked, that all persons suffering from the effect of mercury, in its manifold and dangerous forms, will derive instantaneous benefit, and, in the end, perfect health from Priessnitz's water cure. I can affirm that half Priessnitz's patients are under the influence of this pernicious drug. Then follow those obstinate complaints, gout, rheumatism, hemorrhoids, obstruction of the bowels, and their concomitant ills; also scrofula, syphilis, in fact, all diseases known by the term chronic, or connected with the nerves.

"First.—By this treatment the bad juices are brought to discharge themselves from the skin.

"Secondly.—A fresh or new circulation is given to the diseased or inactive organs, and better juices are infused into them daily.

"Thirdly.—All the functions of the body are brought into their original healthy state, not by operating upon any particular function, but upon the whole system."

These opinions of Rausse are supported by another author, Mr. Raven, who writes as follows:—

"The groundwork of the water cure is to warm the body by passive means only, so that an active heat may proceed from the system; and to produce this desired effect, cold water is used in an infinity of ways. This is not effected by weakening the body, or by any deprivation of food; no bleeding; no surgical operations are resorted to, nor any description of medicine ever employed; but the great secret is, to subdue disease, and cleanse the system of all medicine, in a way dictated by nature, and not by art. The cure is only to be effected by great perseverance, a constant internal and external application of cold water, and by plain living. By the means of these necessary agents, strength is restored, and the system tranquillized.

Professor Mundé, who was perfectly cured of a painful complaint during his residence at Gräefenberg, collected sufficient facts to form a most interesting work upon the system there adopted, on which we have drawn largely in the following pages. He enumerates a great number of diseases, the cure of which he witnessed himself; amongst them are, gout, rheumatism, tic-doloureux, hernia, syphilis, piles, hypochondria, fevers of all kinds, inflammations, cholera, the gripes, &c.: and adds, that in all ailments, in the eradication of which medicine is known to be more or less powerless, the treatment at Gräefenberg triumphs daily. The following are Professor Mundé's views of the water cure:—

"Priessnitz contends that all diseases which are not occasioned by accidents, arise from vicious humours, which he calls bad juices; from these result either general derangement of the system, or disorder of some of the organs. Consequently, the object of his curative method is to expel the bad juices, and replace them by good. The means which Priessnitz employs to attain this end, are water, air, exercise, and diet. Is he right in looking for the diseases, or, at least, their causes, in the humours?" This is a question which (says Mr. Claridge) I do not pretend to decide; but if we judge by the success which attends his method, when followed up with constancy, we should say he must be right; for, generally speaking, with the aid of the above four means, he cures all diseases which professional men acknowledge to be the result of drugs; nay, more, this view of things agrees with the opinion of some of the most celebrated doctors of the last century, to whose practice Priessnitz's treatment bears a great resemblance.

Priessnitz does not now employ sweating, his most powerful active remedy, in above one-half of the cases which he treats.

Some people are made to perspire every day, every other day, or every third day, whilst perhaps, for at least one-half of his patients, he never prescribes perspiration at all, but most judiciously subjects them to treatment, that whilst it brings about a cure, has the effect of strengthening and invigorating the system.

Priessnitz does not, of course, employ medicine, nor even hot diluents, to induce sweat. His method is peculiar, and disagreeable, but it seems effective.

All affections caused by the bad juices are submitted to this process, which is conducted in the following manner:—

The invalid is enveloped, naked, in a large coarse blanket, the legs extended, and the arms kept close to the body; the blanket is then wound round it, as tight as possible, turning it well under at the feet: over this is placed, and well tucked in, a small feather bed, sometimes two, such as are usually employed in Germany, instead of a number of blankets; finally, a counterpane and a sheet are spread over all: thus hermetically enveloped, the patient exactly resembles a mummy: sometimes, when perspiration is difficult, the head, with the exception of the face, is also covered; but this expedient is not resorted to in the case of persons who have a tendency of blood to the head: the irritation caused by the blanket, and the closeness and duration of the confinement, render this operation disagreeable, especially, as I have already observed, until perspiration commences, which, in some cases, takes place in half-an-hour, in others in an hour, or even only two hours. After this, the patient sweats according to the orders of Mr. Priessnitz, for from half-an-hour to two hours. Previous to this packing up the patient, a urinal is placed between his legs, and any diseased part is bandaged with a damp cloth. When accustomed to this operation, the patient will be able to sleep, until awakened by his attendant; those who perspire with difficulty, are requested to move their legs, rub the body with their hands, and make all the movement that their close confinement will admit of. This little movement accelerates perspiration, which is always more tardy in summer than in winter: but, it should be observed, that if perspiration can be easily promoted without any exertion whatever, it is much more desirable.

As soon as perspiration commences, the windows are opened, and the patient, if he wishes it, is allowed to drink a glass of cold water every half-hour; this is not only found extremely refreshing, but aids the sweating.

If, during the process of perspiration, the patient should experience any headache, he may bandage the head with a damp cloth, an expedient which almost invariably succeeds in attaining its object. The duration of the sweating depends much upon the nature of the disease, the individual, &c.; in deciding this, Mr. Priessnitz shows his great skill: there are some who sweat every day, others every other day, or every second or third day only.

One would imagine that so much and such constant sweating must have the effect of weakening patients and making them thin; but at Gräefenberg the contrary effect is observed. . . . . .

The sweating which precedes the bath not only makes a powerful impression upon, and attracts the morbid humours to the skin, but it contributes again to engender a more intense heat in the system; this heat is of importance even in the bath, as it enables the body to support, for a longer time, the effect of cold water, which assists the more the longer it is continued. It is to be observed, that the longer the exterior cold and the reaction are kept up, the more the morbid humours are pressed to the skin, but the surplus of the internal heat ought not to be exceeded, for fear of producing congelation. Spontaneous nocturnal perspirations, which are called at Gräefenberg weakening sweats, ought to be avoided; this is to be done by covering the body very lightly, and by washing it at night with cold water. It is sometimes necessary when the skin is attacked by atony, to envelope the invalid in a wet sheet, in order to give it a tone before he is covered up for sweating.

The general practice of Priessnitz is said to have become milder of late. He does not sweat his patients either so profusely or so frequently as he once did. He treats animals, and in particular the horse, exactly as he does human beings, by sweating, baths, and cold water, and it would appear with equal success.

Mr. Claridge has interspersed his various translations, with pertinent original remarks, replete with that good sense which is at all times an excellent ingredient in works of this nature, whether the authors be medical or non-medical. Nor can it be doubted that there is much to be commended in the basis of that theory which, with certain alterations and improvements, Priessnitz has revived in Germany, and with such remarkable success. His great success he owes, according to Mr. Claridge, to his entire ignorance of medicine as a science; for—

What does the history of medicine offer, but the discouraging picture of the instability of principles, and a series of theories succeeding each other, without any one of them being able to content an upright spirit, or satisfy an inquiring mind? We can hardly expect, however, that Mr. Priessnitz will ever attempt to give the world any medical or systematic details. This is only left to intelligent persons and young medical practitioners, who should observe all that is observable, and communicate their observations, so as to form a whole of that which is most important. Fortune and fame will be the reward of any of our students who may go to Gräefenberg, and study the proceedings of this extraordinary man. To do this effectually they must be possessed of patience, as it can only be studied on the spot; nothing but danger would result from acting on the dicta of books, as will be shown by the following case whilst the author was at Gräefenberg.

This case, and others detailed, certainly show great self-possession and decision in Priessnitz. Some old-fashioned treatises upon the universal virtues of cold water in the cure and prevention of disease, were, in the last century, known in Germany, though it is not imagined that Vincent Priessnitz, a man wholly unlettered, could have been familiar with them. There was, however, an old peasant in the neighbourhood who had successfully cured animals by the cold-water treatment, and this may have afforded him the first hint—which, to a man of genius and sagacity, is often all that is required. In England, John Wesley, the founder of the Methodists, was distinguished as the apostle of temperance and cold water. In a tract of his, entitled "Primitive Physic, or the Natural Method of Curing Diseases," which is still circulated among the Methodist body, the virtues and healing powers of the native element are highly extolled, and the use of drugs is strongly deprecated. Wesley asserts that the compounding and decompounding medicines can never be reconciled to common sense. "Experience," he avers, "shows that one thing will cure most disorders, at least as well as twenty put together. Then why do you add the other nineteen?—only to swell the apothecary's bill!—nay, possibly on purpose to prolong the distemper, that the doctor and he may divide the spoil."

In conclusion:—Very few ailing or sick people can go to Gräefenberg; nor is this so much to be regretted, while it is in the power of every one to bring Gräefenberg to his own home. We have, indeed, reason to believe that frequent cold ablutions, and sponging with cold water, are much more commonly practised among the middle and higher classes in this country than Mr. Claridge seems to imagine, though we are all very sparing drinkers of cold water. Nor can these simple preventives of disease, (and absolute comforts or enjoyments, when once made habitual,) be too general in practice. The rules and remarks of Mr. Claridge on this topic are therefore useful and judicious. We copy one of them, hoping the exhortation will have due effect.

Two things all people, whether strong or weak, can do with perfect safety, and without these, health, for any length of time, cannot reasonably be expected; and those are, to drink plentifully of cold water, particularly before breakfast, and to rub the body all over every morning with a cold wet cloth, or take a cold bath. These simple measures will prevent and cure disease. Wherever pain exists, apply the healing bandage; that is, a cold wet cloth with a dry one over it, and its effect will prove miraculous.

If our readers would know more, they must consult Mr. Claridge's book; which, both to those seeking to regain or to preserve health, offers many excellent suggestions.

MISS BURNEY'S DIARY AND LETTERS.*

Poor Miss Burney! The brightness of her days is now for ever eclipsed!—the spirit of her life has evaporated!—she is alternately at Windsor, or St. James'; or else on the road between those places, cold blasts blowing upon her, and inflaming at once her temper and her eyes. Too just was the presentiment with which she entered upon her splendid bondage in the service of Queen Charlotte. It was the feeling of a slave going to the galleys. Yet the Queen, the "sweet Queen," appears to have been a good, and even a considerate mistress; which is more than can always be said for ladies of very inferior rank. It is the institution that was in fault. It is monarchy which makes the Queen herself a more complete thrall to ceremonial than her humblest attendant. But leaving to others to balance the advantages against the disadvantages of monarchy, we must be content, like Miss Burney, to make the best of things. She, poor young woman, frequently says, that in the service of the Queen she made up her mind to consider herself as "married,"—and unhappily married,—or else Miss Burney must have had very dismal notions of the holy state. In the condition to which she had wedded herself, everything like spontaneous or independent action, free social intercourse, or even unbroken, uninvaded solitude, was for ever placed beyond her reach. Her confinement was much more irksome, at all times, than that of a maid-of-all-work; and she had not the poorest drudge's privileged holiday, her "Sunday out." And conceive the admired author of Cecilia, the bosom friend of the brilliant Mrs. Thrale, the favourite of Johnson, summoned to her duties by sound of bell!—and receiving a present of a new gown from her mistress, through the hands of the other servants—as if she had been a young housemaid, and Mrs. Schwellenberg the housekeeper. One can sympathize in her distresses, and yet like her better, that though abundantly discreet and submissive, her spirit revolted at the indignities to which her position, and the mean and jealous temper of the Queen's countrywoman and favourite attendant subjected her. There must have been one individual who, in after years, received great pleasure from the lampoons and satires of Peter Pindar, who no more spared Madame Schwellenberg than her royal master and mistress.

We must not, all circumstances considered, blame Miss Burney, if the present volume of her Diary, taken as a whole, is somewhat dull and tiresome. Her powers of wit and observation might not have been impaired in these weary years, but she had no scope for the exercise of her lively faculties. The little which her duties permitted her to see of a dull court was not on its brightest side. The old adage truly says,—"No making a silk purse of a sow's ear." The most dexterous sempstress could not perform such a feat.

Miss Burney had had nothing to regret in leaving her paternal home, save leaving her father himself. Her sisters were all married; her brothers were away; and to her step-mother she appears to have been at least indifferent; but in entering upon her new way of life, she was foregoing all her cherished hopes and favourite schemes. "Every dear expectation fancy had ever indulged of happiness adapted to its taste—all was now to be given up." The pang was severe; nor were its causes soon forgotten. She compares herself to a girl who has married against her inclinations, to please her friends, and who must make the best of her hard lot; bear without repining, and make the best wife possible. The condition of a nun,—of one who has for ever renounced the world,—might be the better comparison, save that she enjoyed nothing of the nun's tranquillity. She says in one place to her sister:

> I am married, my dearest Susan—I look upon it in that light—I was averse to forming the union, and I endeavoured to escape it; but my friends interfered—they prevailed—and the knot is tied. What then now remains but to make the best wife in my power? I am bound to it in duty, and I will strain every nerve to succeed.

With kind management on the part of Mrs. Delany, the Queen, Miss Burney relates, on her arrival with her father at Windsor,—

> Received me with a most gracious bow of the head, and a smile that was all sweetness. She saw me much agitated, and attributed it no doubt, to the awe of her presence. O, she little knew my mind had no room in it for feelings of that sort!

She dined at Mrs. Schwellenberg's table, at which stray guests to the Lodge often dined. With this lady the Equerries in attendance on the King regularly drank tea. On the first day the new attendant's spirits had not quite deserted her, and we have this lively though brief sketch. The sucking in of the cheeks is an inimitable stroke.

> I was offered the seat of Mrs. Haggerdorn, which was at the head of the table; but that was an undertaking I could not bear. I begged leave to decline it; and as Mrs. Schwellenberg left me at my own choice, I planted myself quietly at one side.
> Colonel Polier, though a German officer, is of a Swiss family. He is a fat, good-humoured man, excessively fond of eating and drinking. His enjoyment of some of the fare, and especially of the dessert, was really laughable: he could never finish a speech he had begun, if a new dish made its appearance, without stopping to feast his eyes upon it, exclaim something in German, and suck the inside of his mouth; but all so openly, and with such perfect good humour, that it was diverting without anything distasteful. . . . . At dinner we—I mean Mrs. Schwellenberg and myself—had Miss Planta and Colonel Polier; and I was happy to be again diverted with the excess of his satisfaction at sight of turtle upon the table.

Miss Burney made this jovial gourmand Colonel teach her a few German phrases, all of which he contrived should relate to the main business of his own life, eating and drinking.

The new attendant had entertained an idea that the Queen meant to make her her English reader; an office much more suitable to Miss Burney than the one of dresser, for which a better qualified, though very inferior person might easily have been selected. But the Queen, whatever were her original intentions, never employed her in this way, save once or twice. Those who have any curiosity to know the ways of a sober court, the daily bed-chamber life of a Queen and her attendants, may read here. The season was summer.

I rise at six o'clock, dress in a morning gown and cap, and wait my first summons, which is at all times from seven to near eight, but commonly in the exact half hour between them.

The Queen never sends for me till her hair is dressed. This, in a morning, is always done by her wardrobe-woman, Mrs. Thielky, a German, but who speaks English perfectly well.

Mrs. Schwellenberg, since the first week, has never come down in a morning at all. The Queen's dress is finished by Mrs. Thielky and myself. No maid ever enters the room while the Queen is in it. Mrs. Thielky hands the things to me, and I put them on. 'Tis fortunate for me I have not the handing them! I should never know which to take first, embarrassed as I am, and should run a prodigious risk of giving the gown before the hoop, and the fan before the neck-kerchief.

By eight o'clock, or a little after, for she is extremely expeditious, she is dressed. She then goes out to join the King, and be joined by the Princesses, and they all proceed to the King's chapel in the Castle, to prayers, attended by the governesses of the Princesses, and the King's equerry. Various others at times attend; but only these indispensably.

I then return to my own room to breakfast. I make this meal the most pleasant part of the day; I have a book for my companion, and I allow myself an hour for it. . . . . At nine o'clock I send off my breakfast things, and relinquish my book, to make a serious and steady examination of everything I have upon my hands in the way of business—in which preparations for dress are always included, not for the present day alone, but for the court-days, which require a particular dress; for the next arriving birth-day of any of the Royal Family, every one of which requires new apparel; for Kew, where the dress is plainest; and for going on here, where the dress is very pleasant to me, requiring no show nor finery, but merely to be neat, not inelegant, and moderately fashionable.

That over, I have my time at my own disposal till a quarter before twelve, except on Wednesdays and Saturdays, when I have it only to a quarter before eleven.

My rummages and business sometimes occupy me uninterruptedly to those hours. When they do not, I give till ten to necessary letters of duty, ceremony, or long arrears;—and now, from ten to the times I have mentioned, I devote to walking.

These times mentioned, call me to the irksome and quick-returning labours of the toilette. The hour advanced on the Wednesdays and Saturdays is for curling and craping the hair, which it now requires twice a-week.

A quarter before one is the usual time for the Queen to begin dressing for the day. Mrs. Schwellenberg then constantly attends; so do I; Mrs. Thielky, of course, at all times. We help her off with her gown, and on with her powdering things, and then the hair-dresser is admitted. She generally reads the newspapers during that operation.

When she observes that I have run to her but half-dressed, she constantly gives me leave to return and finish as soon as she is seated. If she is grave, and reads steadily on, she dismisses me, whether I am dressed or not; but at all times she never forgets to send me away while she is powdering, with a consideration not to spoil my clothes, that one would not expect belonged to her high station. Neither does she ever detain me without making a point of reading here and there some little paragraph aloud. . . . . I find her then always removed to her state dressing-room, if any room in this private mansion can have the epithet of state. There, in a very short time, her dress is finished. She then says she won't detain me, and I hear and see no more of her till bed-time.

It is commonly three o'clock when I am thus set at large. And I have then two hours quite at my own disposal: but, in the natural course of things, not a moment after! . . . . . At five, we have dinner. Mrs. Schwellenberg and I meet in the eating-room. We are commonly tête-à-têtes: when there is anybody added, it is from her invitation only. Whatever right my place might afford me of also inviting my friends to the table I have now totally lost, by want of courage and spirits to claim it originally.

When we have dined, we go upstairs to her apartment, which is directly over mine. Here we have coffee till the *terracing is over: this is at about eight o'clock. Our tête-à-tête then finishes, and we come down again to the eating-room. There the equerry, whoever he is, comes to tea constantly, and with him any gentleman that the King or Queen may have invited for the evening; and when tea is over, he conducts them, and goes himself to the concert-room.

This is commonly about nine o'clock.

From that time, if Mrs. Schwellenberg is alone, I never quit her for a minute, till I come to my little supper at near eleven.

Between eleven and twelve my last summons usually takes place, earlier and later occasionally. Twenty minutes is the customary time then spent with the Queen: half an hour, I believe, is seldom exceeded.

I then come back, and after doing whatever I can to forward my dress for the next morning, I go to bed—and to sleep too, believe me: the early rising, and a long day's attention to new affairs and occupations, cause a fatigue so bodily, that nothing mental stands against it, and to sleep I fall the moment I have put out my candle and laid down my head.

Such is the day to your F. B. in her new situation at Windsor; such I mean, is its usual destination, and its intended course.

On public or state days, the etiquette was, and probably still is, that some of the women of the bed-chamber should finish the dressing. The women and the ladies have their different duties, but the women are all persons of family.

When the Queen returned, the bell was rung for the bedchamber woman; the etiquette of court-days requiring that one of them should finish her dress.

It happened now to be my acquaintance, Mrs. Fielding. She only tied on the necklace, and handed the fan and gloves. The Queen then leaves the dressing-room, her train being carried by the bedchamber women. The Princesses follow. She goes to the ante-room, where she sends for the Lady of the Bedchamber in waiting, who then becomes the first train-bearer, and they all proceed to the drawing-room. We returned to Kew to dinner very late. M. Polier and Miss Planta dined with us; and at the dessert I was very agreeably surprised by the entrance of Sir Richard Jebb, who stayed coffee. It seems so odd to me to see an old acquaintance in this new place and new situation, that I hardly feel as if I knew them.

One of the most mortifying circumstances to Miss Burney, at the outset, was being summoned by a bell.

A bell!—it seemed so mortifying a mark of servitude, I always felt myself blush, though alone, with conscious shame at my own strange degradation. But I have philosophized myself now into some reconcilement with this manner of summons, by reflecting that to have some person always sent would be often very inconvenient, and that this method is certainly less an interruption to any occupation I may be employed in, than the entrance of messengers so many times in the day. It is, besides, less liable to mistakes. So I have made up my mind to it as well as I can; and now I only feel that proud blush when somebody is by to revive my original dislike of it.

But ladies of quality, the bed-chamber women, and the very mistress of the robes, countesses and duchesses, were all summoned in exactly the same manner; which was some sort of consolation. Another awkwardness was finding herself obliged "to ask leave out." However, Miss Burney proved a very tolerable courtier for her brief standing; and by the friendly hints and suggestions of Mrs. Delany and others, got on wonderfully well Queenward, whatever her personal feelings may have been. The elder Princesses seem to have been really amiable, and not merely good-natured but considerate for her; and the younger ones were not very much spoilt. Yet the author of Evelina was sadly out of her true place. How happier far had the old rumbling chateau at Chesington, the head-quarters of her Daddy Crisp, been to her! One day she was graciously permitted, nay sent, by the Queen to visit her father there; and her heart led her pen when she wrote:

My breakfast was short, the chaise was soon ready, and forth I sallied for dear—once how dear!—old Chesington! Every step of the road brought back to my mind the first and most loved and honoured friend of my earliest years, and I felt a melancholy almost like my first regret for him, when I considered what joy, what happiness I lost, in missing his congratulations on a situation so much what he would have chosen for me—congratulations which, flowing from a mind such as his, so wise, so zealous, so sincere, might almost have reconciled me to it myself—I mean even then—for now the struggle is over, and I am content enough.

At the second toilette to-day, Mrs. Schwellenberg, who left the dressing-room before me, called out at the door, "Miss Bernar, when you have done from the Queen, come to my room."

There was something rather more peremptory in the order than was quite pleasant to me, and I rather drily answered, "Very well, Mrs. Schwellenberg."

The Queen was even uncommonly sweet and gracious in her manner after this lady's departure, and kept me with her some time after she was dressed. . . . .

When I went to Mrs. Schwellenberg, she said, "You might know I had something to say to you, by my calling you before the Queen." She then proceeded to a long prelude, which I could but ill comprehend, save that it conveyed much of obligation on my part, and favour on hers; and then ended with, "I might tell you now, the Queen is going to Oxford, and you might go with her; it is a secret—you might not tell it nobody. But I tell you once, I shall do for you what I can; you are to have a gown."

I stared, and drew back, with a look so undisguised of wonder and displeasure at this extraordinary speech, that I saw it was understood, and she then thought it time, therefore, to name her authority, which, with great emphasis she did thus: "The Queen will give you a gown! The Queen says you are not rich," &c.

There was something in the manner of this quite intolerable to me; and I hastily interrupted her with saying, "I have two new gowns by me, and therefore do not require another."

Perhaps a proposed present from her Majesty was never so received before; but the grossness of the manner of the messenger swallowed up the graciousness of the design in the principal; and I had not even a wish to conceal how little it was to my taste.

The highest surprise sat upon her brow: she had imagined that a gown—that any present—would have been caught at with obsequious avidity; but indeed she was mistaken.

Seeing the wonder and displeasure now hers, I calmly added, "The Queen is very good, and I am very sensible of her Majesty's graciousness; but there is not, in this instance, the least occasion for it."

"Miss Bernar," cried she, quite angrily, "I tell you once, when the Queen will give you a gown, you must be humble, thankful, when you are Duchess of Ancaster!"

She then enumerated various ladies to whom her Majesty had made the same present, many of them of the first distinction, and all, she said, great secrets. Still I only repeated again the same speech.

I can bear to be checked and curbed in discourse, and would rather be subdued into silence—and even, if that proves a gratification that secures peace and gives pleasure, into apparent insensibility; but to receive a favour through the vehicle of insolent ostentation—no! no! To submit to ill-humour rather than argue and dispute, I think an exercise of patience, and I encourage myself all I can to practise it: but to accept even a shadow of an obligation upon such terms, I should think mean and unworthy; and therefore I mean always, in a Court as I would elsewhere, to be open and fearless in declining such subjection.

When she had finished her list of secret ladies, I told her I must beg to speak to the Queen, and make my own acknowledgments for her gracious intention.

This she positively forbid; and said it must only pass through her hands. "When I give you the gown," she added, "I will tell you when you may make your curtsey."

I was not vexed at this prohibition, not knowing what etiquette I might offend by breaking it; and the conversation concluded with nothing being settled. . . .

How little did the sweet Queen imagine that this her first mark of favour should so be offered me as to raise in me my first spirit of resistance! How differently would she have executed her own commission herself! To avoid exciting jealousy, was, I doubt not, her motive for employing another.

At night, however, this poor woman was so ill, so lost for want of her party at cards, and so frightened with apprehensions of the return of some dreadful spasmodic complaints, from which she has many years suffered the severest pain, that I was induced to do a thing you will wonder at, and against which I had resolved to struggle unrelentingly. This was to play at cards with her.

In short, Mrs. Schwellenberg proved poor Miss Burney's bête noir throughout. N.B., the gifted gown, was a "lilac tabby," whatever sort of silken fabric that may have been, and was first worn on the birth-day of one of the Princesses; for on birth-days it was the etiquette for all the household to appear in new dresses, both in the morning and evening; a rather heavy tax on the attendants, where the family is as numerous as was that of George the Third. The excursion to Oxford is graphically narrated. It was replete with annoyances of all kinds. The head-quarters of the royal party was Nuneham, the residence of Lord Harcourt; and the confusion of the establishment, during the royal visitation, resembled that of an ill-organized inn, in a race-week.

When Miss Burney had been a few months in her new office, we find a gentleman, who afterwards makes a considerable figure in her Diary, under the nom de guerre of Mr. Turbulent, thus moralizing on the Queen's birth-day, which was approaching :—

He inquired of me how I should like the state business of that day!

I told him I knew nothing of what I had to expect from it. He undertook readily to inform me. He said I was to be sumptuously arrayed, to sit in one of the best rooms at St. James's, and there to receive all the ladies of the Queen in particular, and to do the honours to all the gentlemen also, belonging to the establishment.

I laughed, and told him he had painted to me a scene of happiness peculiarly adapted to my taste!

He did not concern himself to examine whether or not I was serious, but said he supposed, of course, the dignity of such a matter of state could not be disagreeable to me, and added, he should take the liberty to wish me joy of the day, among the rest, when it arrived, and to see me in my glory.

After this he said, "You have now nearly seen the whole of everything that will come before you: in a very short time you will have passed six months here, and then you will know your life for as many, and twice and thrice as many years. You will have seen everybody and everything, and the same round will still be the same, year after year, without intermission or alteration."

This gentleman, a married man, in orders, and French reader to the Queen and the Princesses, with all of whom he seems to have been a favourite, must have been a rather dangerous inmate in any female household. Miss Burney was guarded by a seven-fold panoply of prudence and discretion; yet she seems to have suffered not a little from his alternate audacious, or insidious advances. How would Queen Charlotte, the pattern of all virtue, decorum, and rigid propriety, have been shocked to hear the free opinions of the man in whom she placed so much confidence that he was the literary caterer for herself and for daughters just dawning into womanhood! The Miss Planta of the following dialogue, was the governess and attendant of the elder Princesses :—

The dinner was enlivened with very animated conversation, in which this gentleman took a part so principal, that I now began to attend, and now, first, to be surprised by him.

The subject was female character. Miss Planta declared her opinion that it was so indispensable to have it without blemish, that nothing upon earth could compensate, or make it possible to countenance one who wanted it. Mrs. Smelt agreed that compassion alone was all that could be afforded upon such an occasion, not countenance, acquaintance, nor intercourse. Mr. de Luc gave an opinion so long and confused, that I could not sufficiently attend to make it out. Mr. Smelt spoke with mingled gentleness and irony, upon the nature of the debate. I said little, but that little was, to give every encouragement to penitence, and no countenance to error.

The hero, however, of the discourse was Mr. Turbulent. With a warmth and fervour that broke forth into exclamations the most vehement, and reflections the most poignant, he protested that many of the women we were proscribing were amongst the most amiable of the sex—that the fastidiousness we recommended was never practised by even the best part of the world—and that we ourselves, individually, while we spoke with so much disdain, never acted up to our doctrines, by using, towards all fair failers, such severity.

This brought me forth. I love not to be attacked for making professions beyond my practice; and I assured him, very seriously, that I had not one voluntary acquaintance, nor one with whom I kept up the smallest intercourse of my own seeking or wilful concurrence, that had any stain in their characters that had ever reached my ears.

"Pardon me, ma'am," cried he, warmly, "there are amongst your acquaintance, and amongst everybody's, many of those the most admired, and most charming, that have neither been spared by calumny, nor been able to avoid reproach and suspicion."

I assured him he was mistaken; and Mrs. Smelt and Miss Planta protested he was wholly in an error.

He grew but the more earnest, and opened, in vindication of his assertions and his opinions, a flow of language that amazed me, and a strain of argument that struck and perplexed us all. He felt the generosity of the side he undertook, and he could not have been more eager nor more animated had the fair dames in whose cause he battled been present to reward him with their smiles.

In the end, finding himself alone, and hard pressed, he very significantly exclaimed "Be not too triumphant, ladies!—I must fight you with weapons of your own making for me. There is a lady, a lady whom you all know, and are proud to know, that stands exactly in the place I speak of."

"I'm sure I don't know whom you mean!" cried Miss Planta.

"You know her very well,—at least, as well as you can," answered he, drily.

Mrs. Smelt, laughing, said she might know many unfortunate objects, but she was unconscious of her knowledge.

I boldly protested I knew not, as an acquaintance of my own, a single person his description suited.

After a long series of protestations of ignorance and eager inquiries, Mr. Turbulent still hung back; and poor Miss Burney, what was her concern!—

He hung back, but we all called upon him, and I declared I should regard the description as fabulous unless he spoke out, and this piqued him to be categorical; but what was my concern to hear him then name—almost whispering with his own reluctance—Madame de Genlis! I was quite thunderstruck, and everybody was silent.

He was then for closing the discourse, but I could not consent to it. I told him that I pretended not to say the character of that lady had never, in my hearing, been attacked; but that I could, and would, and hoped I ever should, say I believed her perfectly innocent of the charges brought against her.

He smiled a little provokingly, and said, "We agree here, ma'am,—I think her innocent too."

"No, Sir, we do not agree!—I should not think her innocent if I believed the charge!"

"Circumstances," cried he, "may make her mind innocent."

I could say nothing to this, I think it so true; but I would not venture such a concession, where my wishes led me to aim at a full defence. Accordingly, with all the energy in my power, I attempted it; assuring him that there was an evidence of her untainted worth in her very countenance, and written there so strongly, that to mistake the character was impossible.

"True," cried he, again smiling, "the countenance speaks all that captivating sweetness that belongs—if she has them—to the very frailties of her character."

This is enough. The Queen directed Miss Burney to accommodate this man in her carriage; in returning to Windsor after the birth-day, and on other journeys; and "to hear was to obey, but,"—

The journey was rather awkward. To be three hours and a half tête-à-tête with a person so little known to me, and of whom I had been unable to form any precise opinion, while still in a feeble state of health, and still feebler of spirits, was by no means desirable; and yet the less as there was something in the uncertainty of my notions that led me to fear him, though I knew not exactly why.

The conversation that ensued did not remove these difficulties: wholly brought on and supported by himself, the subjects were just such as I least wish to discuss with him—religion and morality.

With respect to morality, his opinions seemed upon rather too large a scale for that perfect measurement which suited my more circumscribed ideas. Nothing faulty fell from him, but much was thrown out that, though not positively censurable, had far better never be uttered. He again revived the subject of Madame de Genlis; again I defended her, and again, while he palliated all the wrong with which he charged her, he ceased to disbelieve the seriousness of my assertions in her favour. True, however, it is, I do believe her innocent of all crime but indiscretion, and of that I know not how to clear her, since to nothing softer can I attribute the grounds upon which so much calumny has been raised. I imagine her, and so I told him, to have fallen at an early and inexperienced period into designing and depraved hands, and not to have been able, from cruel and distressed circumstances, to give up the unworthy protection of a profligate patron, though her continuing under it has stained her fair fame for evermore! Perhaps her husband, himself worthless, would not permit her—perhaps she feared the future ruin of her two children—perhaps, in a country such as France, she did not, in that first youth, dare even to think of relinquishing the protection of a Prince of the blood. She was only fifteen when she was married—she told me that herself. How hard do I think her lot, to fall into hands she must ever have despised, and so to be entangled in them as not to dare show to the world, in the only way the world would believe her, the abhorrence of her mind to the character of her patron, by quitting a roof under which she could not live without censure!

The subject, however, was so nice, it was difficult to discuss, and I wished much to avoid it, since there was so much that I could not explain without apparent concessions against my own case, which he instantly seized, and treated as actual concurrences. He praised her as much as I praised her myself, and I found he admired her with as sincere a warmth: but though we agreed thus far, and yet farther, in thinking all that might be wrong in her was venial, we differed most essentially in our opinions of what that wrong might be. He thought her positively fallen, yet with circumstances claiming every indulgence. I thought her positively saved, yet with circumstances authorizing suspicion.

I tried what was possible to fly from this disquisition, but I found I had one to deal with not easy to control. He kept it up, forcibly and steadily, till I was compelled to be silent to his assertions, from want of proof beyond opinion for answering them.

He then proceeded to a general vindication of the victims to such sort of situations, in which I could by no means concur; but when I resisted he startled me by naming as individuals amongst them some characters of whom I had conceived far superior notions. I heard him quite with grief, and I will not write their names. I cannot look upon him as a detractor, and I saw him by no means severe in his exactions from female virtue: I gave, therefore, and give, implicit credit to his information, though I gave not, and give not, any to his inferences and general comments.

"Depend upon it," said he, "with whatever prejudice, and even just prejudice, you may look upon these fallen characters at large, and considered in a class, you will generally find them, individually, amongst the most amiable of your sex: I had almost said amongst the most virtuous; but amongst those who possess the greatest virtues, though not every virtue, undoubtedly. Their own sweetness and sensibility will generally have been the sole source of their misconduct."

I could neither agree nor dispute upon such a subject with such an antagonist, and I took my usual resource, of letting the argument die away for want of food with which to nourish it.

I did not fare the better, however, by the next theme, to which the death of this led us: Religion.

There is no topic in the world upon which I am so careful how I speak seriously as this. By "seriously" I do not mean gravely, but with earnestness; mischief here is so easily done, so difficultly reformed. I have made it, therefore, a rule through my life never to talk in detail upon religious opinions, but with those of whose principles I have the fullest conviction and highest respect. It is therefore very, very rarely I have ever entered upon the subject but with female friends or acquaintances, whose hearts I have well known, and who would be as unlikely to give as to receive any perplexity from the discourse. But with regard to men, I have known none with whom I have willingly conferred upon them, except Dr. Johnson, Mr. Locke, and Mr. Smelt, and one more.

My companion was urgent to enter into a controversy which I was equally urgent to avoid; and I knew not whether most to admire or to dread the skill and capacity with which he pursued his purpose, in defiance of my constant retreat. When, in order to escape, I made only light and slight answers to his queries and remarks, he gravely said I led him into "strange suspicions" concerning my religious tenets; and when I made to this some rallying reply, he solemnly declared he feared I was a "mere philosopher" on these subjects, and totally incredulous with regard to all revealed religion.

This was an attack which even in pleasantry I liked not, as the very words gave me a secret shock. I therefore then spoke to the point, and frankly told him that subjects which I held to be so sacred, I made it an invariable rule never to discuss in casual conversations.

"And how, ma'am," said he, suddenly assuming the authoritative seriousness of his professional character and dignity, "and how, ma'am, can you better discuss matters of this solemn nature than now, with a man to whom their consideration peculiarly belongs?—with a clergyman?"

True, thought I; but I must better be apprised of your principles, ere I trust you with debating mine!

Again we repeat, that Queen Charlotte had a very equivocal character in her service. After a good deal of annoyance, Miss Burney resolved to apply to the Queen for LEAVE for Mr. Turbulent to travel with the Equerries:—

She seemed to think it quite strange that I should be content to part with him, and spoke of his agreeable and entertaining faculties in conversation with very partial admiration. I concurred in allowing them, but accepted her tacit consent to the occasional separation. I had now something to say to my knight that I knew would keep him in some order. . . . . .

The instant I was left alone with Mr. Turbulent he demanded to know my "project for his happiness;" and he made his claim in a tone so determined, that I saw it would be fruitless to attempt evasion or delay.

"Your captivity, then, Sir," cried I—"for such I must call your regarding your attendance to be indispensable—is at an end: the Equerry-coach is now wholly in your power. I have spoken myself upon the subject to the Queen, as you bid—at least, braved me to do; and I have now her consent to discharging you from all necessity of travelling in our coach."

He looked extremely provoked, and asked if I really meant to inform him I did not choose his company?

I laughed the question off, and used a world of civil argument to persuade him I had only done him a good office: but I was fain to make the whole debate as sportive as possible, as I saw him disposed to be seriously affronted.

A long debate ensued. I had been, he protested, excessively ill-natured to him. "What an impression," cried he, "must this make upon the Queen! After travelling, with apparent content, six years with that oyster Mrs. Haggerdorn—now—now that travelling is become really agreeable—in that coach—I am to be turned out of it! How must it disgrace me in her opinion!"

She was too partial, I said, to "that oyster," to look upon the matter in such a degrading light; nor would she think of it at all, but as an accidental matter.

I then added, that the reason he had hitherto been destined to the female coach was, that Mrs. Schwellenberg and Mrs. Haggerdorn were always afraid of travelling by themselves; but that as I had more courage, there was no need of such slavery.

"Slavery!"—repeated he, with an emphasis that almost startled me,—"Slavery is pleasure—is happiness—when directed by our wishes!"

And then, with a sudden motion that made me quite jump, he cast himself at my feet, on both his knees—

"Your slave," he cried, "I am content to be! your slave I am ready to live and die!"

I begged him to rise, and be a little less rhapsodic. "I have emancipated you," I cried; "do not, therefore, throw away the freedom you have been six years sighing to obtain. You are now your own agent—a volunteer—"

"If I am," cried he, impetuously, "I dedicate myself to you!—A volunteer, ma'am, remember that! I dedicate myself to you, therefore, of my own accord, for every journey! You shall not get rid of me these twenty years."

I tried to get away myself—but he would not let me move; and he began, with still increasing violence of manner, a most fervent protestation that he would not be set aside, and that he devoted himself to me entirely. And, to say the simple truth, ridiculous as all this was, I really began to grow a little frightened by his vehemence and his posture; till, at last, in the midst of an almost furious vow, in which he dedicated himself to me for ever, he relieved me, by suddenly calling upon Jupiter, Juno, Mars, and Hercules, and every god, and every goddess, to witness his oath. And then, content with his sublimity, he arose.

Was it not a curious scene? and have I not a curious fellow-traveller for my little journeys?

This sample of his behaviour in a tête-à-tête will not invite me to another with him: for though I think his rhodomontading as innocent as that of our cousin Richard, there is something in it now and then a little more violent than suits either my taste or my nerves.

Thus, between jest and earnest, Mr. Turbulent felt his way. He was, however, very capable of friendly actions, and a hearty hater of Mrs. Schwellenberg, so "here was sympathy." One day he had been an unnoticed witness of Miss Burney's sufferings from this mean-minded woman, of whom most of the household stood in such awe, from her powers of making mischief with the Queen, that when before her, they deemed it prudent to slight the new intruder. On the day Mr. Turbulent had witnessed her ill-usage,—

He put aside all his flights and his violences, and seemed hurt for me more than I could have supposed. I passed it all off as gaily as I could, but he touched me, I own, when in a tone of the most compassionate regret at my lot, he exclaimed, "This, ma'am, is your colleague!—Who could ever have imagined it would have been Miss Burney's fate to be so coupled! Could you ever, ma'am, foresee, or suspect, or believe you should be linked to such a companion!"

No, thought I, indeed did I not! But to recover myself from the train of thoughts to which so home a question led, I frankly narrated some small circumstances, of a ludicrous and unimportant nature, which regarded this lady, with some of her domestics.

They were almost in fits of laughter; and Mr. Turbulent's compassion so fleeted away from the diversion of this recital, that he now only lamented I had not also known the other original colleague, that she too might have lived in my memory. I thank him much!

He had lately, he told me, had much conversation concerning me with Mr. Boswell. I feel sorry to be named or remembered by that biographical, anecdotical memorandummer, till his book of poor Dr. Johnson's life is finished and published. What an anecdote, however, did he tell me of that most extraordinary character! He is now an actual admirer and follower of Mrs. Rudd!—and avows it, and praises her extraordinary attractions aloud!

But a little more of Mr. Turbulent and the strait-laced Court of Queen Charlotte, whom it was possible to deceive, much like inferior pattern women:

MARCH 1ST.—With all the various humours in which I had already seen Mr. Turbulent, he gave me this evening a surprise, by his behaviour to one of the Princesses, nearly the same that I had experienced from him myself. The Princess Augusta came, during coffee, for a knotting shuttle of the Queen's. While she was speaking to me, he stood behind and exclaimed, à demi voix, as if to himself, "Comme elle est jolie ce soir, son Altesse Royale!" And then, seeing her blush extremely, he clasped his hands, in high pretended confusion, and hiding his head, called out, "Que ferai-je? The Princess has heard me!"

"Pray, Mr. Turbulent," cried she, hastily, "what play are you to read to-night?" "You shall choose, ma'am; either La Coquette corrigée, or—" [he named another I have forgotten.] "O no!" cried she, "that last is shocking! don't let me hear that!"—"I understand you, ma'am. You fix, then, upon La Coquette? La Coquette is your Royal Highness's taste?" "No, indeed, I am sure I did not say that."—"Yes, ma'am, by implication. And certainly, therefore, I will read it, to please your Royal Highness!" "No, pray don't; for I like none of them!"—"None of them, ma'am!" "No, none;—no French plays at all!"

And away she was running, with a droll air, that acknowledged she had said something to provoke him.

"This is a declaration, ma'am, I must beg you to explain!" cried he, gliding adroitly between the Princess and the door, and shutting it with his back. "No, no, I can't explain it; so pray, Mr. Turbulent, do open the door." "Not for the world, ma'am, with such a stain uncleared upon your Royal Highness's taste and feeling!"

She told him she positively could not stay, and begged him to let her pass instantly.

But he would hear her no more than he has heard me, protesting he was too much shocked for her, to suffer her to depart without clearing her own credit!

He conquered at last, and thus forced to speak, she turned round to us and said, "Well—if I must then—I will appeal to these ladies, who understand such things far better than I do, and ask them if it is not true about these French plays, that they are all so like one to another, that to hear them in this manner every night is enough to tire one?"

"Pray, then, madam," cried he, "if French plays have the misfortune to displease you, what National Plays have the honour of your preference?"

I saw he meant something that she understood better than me, for she blushed again, and called out, "Pray open the door at once! I can stay no longer; do let me go, Mr. Turbulent." "Not till you have answered that question, ma'am! what Country has plays to your Royal Highness's taste?"—"Miss Burney," cried she impatiently, yet laughing, "pray do you take him away!—Pull him!"

He bowed to me very invitingly for the office; but I frankly answered her, "Indeed, ma'am, I dare not undertake him! I cannot manage him at all."

"The Country! the Country! Princess Augusta! name the happy Country!" was all she could gain. "Order him away, Miss Burney," cried she; "'tis your room: order him away from the door."—"Name it, ma'am, name it!" exclaimed he; name but the chosen nation!" And then, fixing her with the most provoking eyes, "Est-ce la Danemarc?" he cried.—She coloured violently, and quite angry with him, called out, "Mr. Turbulent, how can you be such a fool!"

And now I found . . . the Prince Royal of Denmark was in his meaning, and in her understanding!

He bowed to the ground, in gratitude for the term fool, but added, with pretended submission to her will, "Very well, ma'am, s'il ne faut lire que les comédies Danoises."

"Do let me go!" cried she, seriously; and then he made way, with a profound bow as she passed, saying, "Very well, ma'am, La Coquette, then! your Royal Highness chooses La Coquette corrigée?"

"Corrigée? That never was done!" cried she, with all her sweet good humour, the moment she got out; and off she ran, like lightning, to the Queen's apartments.

What say you to Mr. Turbulent now?

For my part, I was greatly surprised. I had not imagined any man, but the King or Prince of Wales, had even ventured at a badinage of this sort with any of the Princesses; nor do I suppose any other man ever did. Mr. Turbulent is so great a favourite with all the Royal Family, that he safely ventures upon whatever he pleases; and doubtless they find, in his courage and his rhodomontading, a novelty extremely amusing to them, or they would not fail to bring about a change. . .

TUESDAY, MARCH 6TH.—I spent almost all this morning with her Majesty, hearing her botanical lesson, and afterwards looking over some prints of Herculaneum, till the Princess Augusta brought a paper, and a message from Mr. Turbulent, with his humble request to explain it himself to her Majesty. It was something he had been ordered to translate.

"O yes!" cried the Queen readily, "let him come; I am always glad to see him."

He came immediately; and most glad was I when dismissed to make way for him: for he practises a thousand mischievous tricks, to confuse me, in the Royal presence; most particularly by certain signs which he knows I comprehend, made by his eyebrows; for he is continually assuring me he always discovers my thoughts and opinions by the motion of mine, which it is his most favourite gambol to pretend constantly to examine, as well as his first theme of gallantry to compliment, though in a style too high-flown and rhodomontading to be really embarrassing, or seriously offensive. Nevertheless, in the Royal presence, my terror lest he should be observed, and any questions should be asked of the meaning of his signs and tokens, makes it seriously disagreeable to me to continue there a moment when he is in the room.

He and Miss Planta both dined with me; and they entered into a very long dispute upon female education, which he declared was upon the worst of plans, teaching young girls nothing but disguise, double-dealing, and falsehood; and which she maintained was upon no other plan than decorum and propriety dictated. In all essential points she was undoubtedly right; but in all the detail he conquered—crushed her, rather, as forcibly by his arguments, as he disconcerted her by his wit. It was no disgrace to Miss Planta that she was no match for him, though she answered him with a degree of vexation, when overset, that made her lose the advantages she might have kept. Both of them called frequently upon me, but I declined the discussion: I should have been happy to have assisted Miss Planta, who, in the main, was right, but that she defended all, everything, on her own side, whether right or wrong, and sought to oppose the domineering powers of her adversary by allowing no quarter to anything he advanced. Candour in argument is the most rare of all things, and Truth is for ever sacrificed to the love of victory and the fear of disgrace.

At length, she went for her work: he then attacked me most vehemently, insisting on my opinion. But I never professedly argue: I may be drawn in by circumstances, or from the interest and feeling of the moment, or from an earnest desire to bring forward conviction, in some point of serious consequence to the principles or conduct either of another or my own; but deliberately and designedly I never enter into that mode of conversation, which, except arising from the sudden animation of the moment, I have always thought and found either wearisome or irritating.

He tried whatever was possible to urge me to the battle. "Come," he cried, "speak out your real sentiments now we are alone."

"Assure yourself," quoth I, "you will never have any other, whether alone or before millions!"

"O yes, I beg your pardon; ladies are never so sincere, with one another, as with us:—tell me, therefore, now, the truth of your opinions upon this matter."

Even this would not do. I told him I was in no disputative humour.

"You are unwilling to own it," cried he, "but I see you are precisely of my way of thinking! You would not say so before poor Peggy, who is but a bad logician, but I saw which way you turned."

This also failed. I assured him I was seized with a silent fit, and he might spare himself further trouble.

He would not allow this plea, and grew quite violent in his remonstrances, protesting I ought not to be silent, and he would not suffer it.

I worked on very quietly, only informing him that to be silent was a privilege I had everywhere claimed, and that though he had heard me talk probably as much as my neighbours, it was merely because I generally appeared before him as Lady of the Ceremonies, either at table or in the carriage, where I thought it incumbent on me to help forward all I could; but that, otherwise, and where I considered myself at liberty to do as I pleased, I had a general character, among strangers and short acquaintance, of the most impenetrable taciturnity.

He vowed he could not believe it. "It would be a shame," he cried, "and not only a shame, but an impossibility; you cannot be taciturn!—I defy you! Your eyebrow!"

And then broke forth one of his most flighty rants of compliments, with expressions really beyond badinage. He made me a little grave, and I told him, that however he might amuse himself with conning fine speeches to me, I should desire and hope he would at least confine them to my own ears, and say nothing of me in any way in my absence.

He was a little affronted, and asked why? but he had given me a feeling I could not quite explain, even to myself, and which, however, he almost immediately dissipated by a more moderate mode of proceeding."

This gentleman became every day more violent and troublesome; but Miss Burney was finally relieved from his impetuous gallantry, by the alarming and dangerous illness of his wife, which appears to have recalled him to a sense of duty and propriety. He implored Miss Planta to obtain leave for him to be absent from the Queen's Lodge, that he might attend his wife, who lived in Windsor; and at the end of a suffering month, he returned—

All civility, but wholly without flights and raptures: tamed and composed, happy in the restoration of his wife, and cured of all wild absurdity. I conducted myself to him just as when we first grew acquainted—with openness, cheerfulness, and ease; appearing to forget all that had been wrong, and believing such an appearance the best means to make him forget it also.

Such was this month: in which, but for the sweet support of Mrs. Delany, I must almost wholly have sunk under the tyranny, whether opposed or endured, of my most extraordinary coadjutrix.

Of this tormentor Miss Burney remarks, and the observation is of very general application:—

I know well, at a distance, you may think such conduct, in common with such a character, a mere subject for contempt, and be amazed at its effect: but were you here, and were you spending in one day a mere anticipation of every day—alas! my dearest friends, you would find, as I find, peace must be purchased by any sacrifice that can obtain it.

Mine was, indeed, a severe one: I gave up either going to my beloved solace, [Mrs. Delany,] or receiving her here, and offered my service to play at piquet.—At first, this was disdainfully refused, and but very proudly accepted afterwards. I had no way to compose my own spirit to an endurance of this, but by considering myself as married to her, and therefore that all rebellion could but end in disturbance, and that concession was my sole chance for peace! O what reluctant nuptials!—how often did I say to myself—Were these chains voluntary, how could I bear them!—how forgive myself that I put them on!

And does marriage often compel such sacrifices on the part of the woman? This were a stronger argument for divorces, from mere incompatibility of temper, than any we have ever yet met with.

Having sympathized in her trials and sorrows, we are now fairly entitled to see what amusement Miss Burney can, in return, afford us; and of the slender portion contained in her Diary of two years, there is, perhaps, nothing more piquant than her sketches of her literary and sentimental female friends. The most choice specimens are a French and a German lady, whose absurdities seem to have revived in the unhappy Mistress of the Wardrobe something of her early comic humour and sense of the ludicrous. The Madame la Fite alluded to had, we must premise, been a former acquaintance:—

Madame la Fite called in the morning, to tell me she must take no denial to forming me a new acquaintance—Madame de la Roche, a German by birth, but married to a Frenchman;—an authoress, a woman of talents and distinction, a character highly celebrated, and unjustly suffering from an adherence to the Protestant religion. "She dies with eagerness to see you," she added in French, "and I have invited her to Windsor, where I have told her I have no other feast prepared for her but to show her Dr. Herschel and Miss Burney."

I leave you to imagine if I felt competent to fulfil such a promise: openly, on the contrary, I assured her I was quite unequal to it.

She had already, she said, written to Madame la Roche, to come the next day, and if I would not meet her she must be covered with disgrace.

Expostulation was now vain; I could only say that to answer for myself was quite out of my own power.

"And why!—and wherefore!—and what for!—and surely to me!—and surely for Madame de la Roche!—une femme d'esprit—mon amie—l'amie de Madame de Genlis," &c., &c., filled up a hurried conference in the midst of my dressing for the Queen, till a summons interrupted her, and forced me, half dressed, and all too late, to run away from her, with an extorted promise to wait upon her if I possibly could.

Accordingly I went, and arrived before Madame la Roche. Poor Madame La Fite received me in transport; and I soon witnessed another transport, at least equal to Madame la Roche, which happily was returned with the same warmth; and it was not till after a thousand embraces, and the most ardent professions—"Ma digne amie!—est il possible?—te vois-je?" &c.—that I discovered they had never before met in their lives!—they had corresponded, but no more!

This somewhat lessened my surprise, however, when my turn arrived; for no sooner was I named than all the embrassades were transferred to me—"La digne Miss Borni!—l'auteur de Cecile?—d'Evelina?—non, ce n'est pas possible!—suis-je si heureuse!—oui, je le vois à ses yeux!—Ah! que de bonheur!" &c.

As nobody was present, I had not the same confusion from this scene as from that in which I first saw Madame la Fite, when, at an assembly at Miss Streatfield's, such as these were her exclamations aloud, in the midst of the admiring bystanders. . . . . .

Madame la Roche, had I met her in any other way, might have pleased me in no common degree; for could I have conceived her character to be unaffected, her manners have a softness that would render her excessively engaging. She is now bien passée—no doubt fifty—yet has a voice of touching sweetness, eyes of dove-like gentleness, looks supplicating for favour, and an air and demeanour the most tenderly caressing. I can suppose she has thought herself all her life the model of the favourite heroine of her own favourite romance, and I can readily believe that she has had attractions in her youth nothing short of fascinating. Had I not been present, and so deeply engaged in this interview, I had certainly been caught by her myself; for in her presence I constantly felt myself forgiving and excusing what in her absence I as constantly found past defence or apology.

Poor Madame la Fite has no chance in her presence; for though their singular enthusiasm upon "the people of the literature," as Pacchierotti called them, is equal, Madame la Fite almost subdues by her vehemence, while Madame la Roche almost melts by her softness. Yet I fairly believe they are both very good women, and both believe themselves sincere.

Madame de la Roche must be well-known to many of our readers as the first love of Wieland, and as the grandmother of Goëthe's Bettine. There are surely mental qualities as well as diseases that run in the blood. Upon a subsequent day, when Miss Burney returned from the Queen's toilet, she found the two ladies in possession of her room:—

SUNDAY, SEPT. 17th.—At the chapel this morning, Madame la Fite placed Madame la Roche between herself and me, and proposed bringing her to the Lodge, "to return my visit." This being precisely what I had tried to avoid, and to avoid without shocking Madame la Fite, by meeting her correspondent at her own house, I was much chagrined at such a proposal, but had no means to decline it, as it was made across Madame la Roche herself.

Accordingly, at about two o'clock, when I came from the Queen, I found them both in full possession of my room, and Madame la Fite occupied in examining my books. The thing thus being done, and the risk of consequences inevitable, I had only to receive them with as little display of disapprobation of their measures as I could help; but one of the most curious scenes followed I have ever yet been engaged in or witnessed.

As soon as we were seated, Madame la Fite began with assuring me, aloud, of the "conquest" I had made of Madame la Roche, and appealed to that lady for the truth of what she said. Madame la Roche answered her by rising, and throwing her arms about me, and kissing my cheeks from side to side repeatedly.

Madame la Fite, as soon as this was over, and we had resumed our seats, opened the next subject, by saying Madame la Roche had read and adored "Cecilia:" again appealing to her for confirmation of her assertion.

"O, oui, oui!" cried her friend, "mais la vraie Cecile, c'est Miss Borni! charmante Miss Borni! digne, douce, et amiable! Coom to me arms! que je vous embrasse mille fois!"

Again we were all deranged, and again the same ceremony being performed, we all sat ourselves down.

"Cecilia" was then talked over throughout, in defiance of every obstacle I could put in its way.

After this, Madame la Fite said, in French, that Madame la Roche had had the most extraordinary life and adventures that had fallen to anybody's lot; and finished with saying, "Eh! ma chère amie, contez nous un peu."

They were so connected, she answered, in their early part with M. Wieland, the famous author, that they would not be intelligible without his story.

"Eh bien! ma très-chère, contez nous, donc, un peu de ses aventures; ma chère Miss Burney, c'étoit son amant, et l'homme le plus extraordinaire—d'un génie! d'un feu! Eh bien, ma chère? où l'avez vous recontré? où est-ce qu'il a commençé à vous aimer? contez nous un peu de tout ça."

Madame la Roche, looking down upon her fan, began then the recital. She related their first interview, the gradations of their mutual attachment, his extraordinary talents, his literary fame and name; the breach of their union from motives of prudence in their friends; his change of character from piety to voluptuousness, in consoling himself for her loss with an actress; his various adventures, and various transformations from good to bad, in life and conduct; her own marriage with M. de la Roche, their subsequent meeting when she was mother of three children, and all the attendant circumstances.

This narrative was told in so touching and pathetic a manner, and interspersed with so many sentiments of tenderness and of heroism, that I could scarcely believe I was not actually listening to a Clelia or a Cassandra, recounting the stories of her youth.

When she had done, and I had thanked her, Madame la Fite demanded of me what I thought of her, and if she was not delightful? I assented, and Madame la Roche then, rising, and fixing her eyes, filled with tears, in my face, while she held both my hands, in the most melting accents, exclaimed, "Miss Borni! la plus chère, la plus digne des Angloises! dites moi—m'aimez vous?"

I answered as well as I could, but what I said was not very positive. Madame la Fite came up to us, and desired we might make a trio of friendship, which should bind us to one-another for life.

And then they both embraced me, and both wept for joyful fondness! I fear I seemed very hard-hearted; but no spring was opened whence one tear of mine could flow.

The ladies had resolved to make good their claim to dinner, which a disappointment with Madame la Roche's carriage, and an opportune shower, reinforced. But Miss Burney durst not, and would not, take any hint. She resisted the most annoying importunities; and the discomfited ladies sustained their spirits upon a roll and a glass of water,—so inhospitable was a sumptuous table kept by royalty, —so dead to genius and talents was the Court of England. It came out at length, that besides seeing "douce digne Miss Borni," Madame la Roche had a strong desire and hope to see the Royal Family, and even aspired through Miss Burney's good offices to a private audience of her Majesty, for which Madame la Fite again importuned. The thing was impossible.

Miss Burney had, though involuntarily, been so rude and inhospitable, that, in atonement, she went to meet the German party at breakfast, at the house of Madame la Fite:—

I was introduced to her baron, and to two other gentlemen, one of them a son of Madame la Roche. Much of civilities passed, and I feel that I could really like Madame la Roche, were she less flattering; which, perhaps, rather means were she more so: for much flattery given makes one fear much is thought acceptable.

I have seen her no more; she was going immediately to town, and thence soon back to the continent. She wept in parting with me, as if we had been friends of long standing!—If I were likely to see her often, I should be at some pains to try at discovering what is sensitive from what is affected. As it is, she has left me in such doubt of her real character, I scarce know whether I most should pity, admire, or laugh.

Miss Burney might very safely, as an Englishwoman, have laughed. The one lady was eminently French—the other transcendentally German. Both nations, and the English also, and their learned ladies, have changed and gathered sense since then. But we may be wrong.

Very extraordinary stories are at present told of the high fortune of the hair-dresser, who has had the luck to shred Mr. Dickens' redundant locks, and the taste and bounty to deal them out, on earnest solicitation, among sentimental young ladies, and,—

Poor Madame la Fite! her next visit to me was to request a lock of my hair for Madame de la Roche, who would "adore" that as she did its wearer.

I assured her I really must be excused; for, thinking so little as I think of Madame de la Roche, it would have been a species of falsehood to send such a gift.

Then she begged "anything"—a morsel of an old gown, the impression of a seal from a letter, two pins out of my dress—in short, anything; and with an urgency so vehement, I could not laugh it off; and, at last, I was obliged to let her have one of those poor pattern garlands that I made with plant impressions, under the eye and direction of my Fredy and Mr. Locke. I really was very unwilling to send anything; but she almost wept at my refusal, and appeared so much hurt that I was compelled to comply.

What, however, was truly comic, at the same time, was a certain imitative enthusiasm that was suddenly adopted by poor Mademoiselle de Luc—for as I happened to drop my needle, she eagerly insisted upon searching for it, and then exclaimed, "O! I have found it!—may I have it!"

"Certainly, if you like it," cried I, not comprehending her.

"Then I shall keep it for ever and never! it was worked by Miss Beurney!" And she put it up in her pocket-book, notwithstanding all my laughing remonstrances.

The wearying, lifeless uniformity, so long since threatened me by Mr. Turbulent, now completely took place, save alone for the relief of my beloved Mrs. Delany; but she softened and solaced all.

Though Miss Burney's experience at Court lay solely among deans, canons, equerries, and a few stray savans, she makes the most of them as characters; and we shall now transfer a few of the best of her portraits to our own gallery.

It was on the Terrace, at one of the evening parades, that the following gentlemen appeared:—

We were joined by a goodly priest, fat, jovial, breathing plenty, ease, and good living. I soon heard him whisper Mrs. Delany to introduce him to me. It was Dr. Roberts, Provost of Eton. . . . . In a few minutes more a thin, little, wizen old gentleman, with eyes that scarce seemed to see, and a rather tottering gait, came up to Mrs. Delany, and after talking with her some time, said in a half whisper, "Is that Miss Burney?" and then desired a presentation. It was Mr. Bryant, the Mythologist. I was very glad to see him, as he bears a very high character, and lives much in this neighbourhood. He talks a great deal, and with the utmost good-humour and ease, casting entirely aside his learning, which I am nevertheless assured is that of one of the most eminent scholars of the age.

Dr. Warton insisted upon accompanying me home as far as the iron rails, to see me enter the royal premises. I did not dare invite him in, without previous knowledge whether I had any such privilege; otherwise, with all his parts, and all his experience, I question whether there is one boy in his school at Winchester who would more have delighted in feeling himself under the roof of a sovereign.

The King, at all times an excellent gossip, often dropt into the tea-room, for a chat with whoever might chance to be there, or to carry some one off to play backgammon with him, or listen to his regular evening concerts. One evening he found Mr. Bryant with the ladies:—

The King entered into a gay disquisition with Mr. Bryant upon his school achievements; to which he answered with a readiness and simplicity highly entertaining.

"You were an Etonian, Mr. Bryant," said the King; "but pray, for what were you most famous at school?"

We all expected, from the celebrity of his scholarship, to hear him answer his—Latin Exercises: but no such thing!

"Cudgelling, sir. I was most famous for that."

While a general laugh followed this speech, he very gravely proceeded to particularise his feats; though unless you could see the diminutive figure, the weak, thin, feeble, little frame, whence issued the proclamation of his prowess, you can but very inadequately judge the comic effect of his big talk.

"Your Majesty, sir, knows General Conway? I broke his head for him, sir."

The shout which ensued did not at all interfere with the steadiness of his further detail.

"And there's another man, sir, a great stout fellow, sir, as ever you saw—Dr. Gibbon of the Temple: I broke his head too, sir.—I don't know if he remembers it."

One day Miss Burney was called upon to receive Mrs. Siddons, who had the honour to be commanded to come to the Lodge to read a play. There was a change of times, since the admired authoress, in the very zenith of her fame, had met at Miss Monckton's rout, the still comparatively obscure actress. But now—

I took her into the tea-room, and endeavoured to make amends for former distance and taciturnity, by an open and cheerful reception. I had heard from sundry people (in old days) that she wished to make the acquaintance; but I thought it, then, one of too conspicuous a sort for the quietness I had so much difficulty to preserve in my ever increasing connexions. Here all was changed; I received her by the Queen's commands, and was perfectly well inclined to reap some pleasure from the meeting.

But, now that we came so near, I was much disappointed in my expectations. I know not if my dear Fredy has met with her in private, but I fancy approximation is not highly in her favour. I found her the Heroine of a Tragedy,—sublime, elevated, and solemn. In face and person, truly noble and commanding; in manners, quiet and stiff; in voice, deep and dragging; and in conversation, formal, sententious, calm, and dry. I expected her to have been all that is interesting; the delicacy and sweetness with which she seizes every opportunity to strike and to captivate upon the stage had persuaded me that her mind was formed with that peculiar susceptibility which, in different modes, must give equal powers to attract and to delight in common life. But I was very much mistaken. As a stranger, I must have admired her noble appearance and beautiful countenance, and have regretted that nothing in her conversation kept pace with their promise; and, as a celebrated actress, I had still only to do the same.

Whether fame and success have spoiled her, or whether she only possesses the skill of representing and embellishing materials with which she is furnished by others, I know not; but still I remain disappointed.

She was scarcely seated, and a little general discourse begun, before she told me—all at once—that "There was no part she had ever so much wished to act as that of Cecilia."

I made some little acknowledgment, and hurried to ask when she had seen Sir Joshua Reynolds, Miss Palmer, and others with whom I knew her acquainted.

The play she was to read was "The Provoked Husband." She appeared neither alarmed nor elated by her summons, but calmly to look upon it as a thing of course, from her celebrity.

She left me to go to Lady Harcourt, through whose interest she was brought hither. She was on a visit for a week at General Harcourt's, at St. Leonard's, where there seems to be, in general, constant and well-chosen society and amusement.

As a foil to the actress, we present a grave and dignified character, a canon of Windsor:—

Who should find me out but Dr. Shepherd. He is here as canon, and was in residence. He told me he had long wished to come, but had never been able to find the way of entrance before. He made me an immense length of visit, and related to me all the exploits of his life,—so far as they were prosperous. In no farce did a man ever more floridly open upon his own perfections. He assured me I should be delighted to know the whole of his life; it was equal to anything; and everything he had was got by his own address and ingenuity.

"I could tell the King," cried he, "more than all the Chapter. I want to talk to him, but he always gets out of my way; he does not know me; he takes me for a mere common person, like the rest of the canons here, and thinks of me no more than if I were only fit for the cassock;—a mere Scotch priest! Bless 'em!—they know nothing about me. You have no conception what things I have done! And I want to tell 'em all this;—it's fitter for them to hear than what comes to their ears. What I want is for somebody to tell them what I am."

They know it already, thought I.

Then, when he had exhausted this general panegyric, he descended to some few particulars; especially dilating upon his preaching, and applying to me for attesting its excellence.

"I shall make one sermon every year, precisely for you!" he cried: "I think I know what will please you. That on the Creation last Sunday was just to your taste. You shall have such another next residence. I think I preach in the right tone—not too slow, like that poor wretch Grape, nor too fast, like Davis and the rest of 'em; but yet fast enough never to tire them. That's just my idea of good preaching."

Then he told me what excellent apartments he had here, and how much he should like my opinion in fitting them up.

The youth of a person, who remained a fixture at the Court of George III., Colonel, afterwards General Manners, furnishes an amusing example of the shallowness, ignorance, prejudice, and presumption of a class which has not wholly disappeared; one that never yet entertained any misgivings whatever of its own deficiencies; or doubted that all knowledge and science with which its members are not familiar must be worthless or spurious:—

Colonel Manners is a tall and extremely handsome young man, well enough versed in what is immediately going forward in the world; and though not very deep in his knowledge, nor profound in his observations, he is very good-humoured, and I am told well principled.

One evening at tea, a gentleman present, another equerry, happened to name Herschel, whose stupendous discoveries were then astonishing the world, when Colonel Manners broke in:—

"I don't give up to Dr. Herschel at all," cried he; "he is all system; and so they are all: and if they can but make out their systems, they don't care a pin for anything else. As to Herschel, I liked him well enough till he came to his volcanoes in the moon, and then I gave him up: I saw he was just like the rest. How should he know anything of the matter? There's no such thing as pretending to measure at such a distance as that. . . . . !

We had some discourse upon dress and fashions. Colonel Welbred regretted that we had not had little figures, dressed in the habits of the times, preserved from every century; and proceeded with enumerating various changes in the modes, from square shoes to peaked, from the mantle to the coat, the whiskers to the smooth chin, &c., till Colonel Manners interrupted him with observing, "Why, you may wear things of all times now, ever so far back;—buckles of four years ago, if you will!" There was certainly no gaining further ground here!

Virtuosos being next, unfortunately, named, Colonel Manners inveighed against them quite violently, protesting they all wanted common honour and honesty; and, to complete the happy subject, he instanced, in particular, Sir William Hamilton, who, he declared, had absolutely robbed both the King and State of Naples!

After this, somebody related that, upon the heat in the air being mentioned to Dr. Heberden, he had answered that he supposed it proceeded from the last eruption in the volcano in the moon:—"Ay," cried Colonel Manners, "I suppose he knows as much of the matter as the rest of them: if you put a candle at the end of a telescope, and let him look at it, he'll say, what an eruption there is in the moon! I mean if Dr. Herschel would do it to him; I don't say he would think so from such a person as me."

"But Mr. Bryant himself has seen this volcano from the telescope."

"Why, I don't mind Mr. Bryant any more than Dr. Heberden: he's just as credulous as t'other."

On a subsequent night, one of those who, perhaps, enjoyed Colonel Manners' bold and hardy John Bullish ignorance, began to tell Miss Burney of some of Herschel's latest discoveries:—

This was enough for Colonel Manners, who declared aloud his utter contempt for such pretended discoveries. He was deaf to all that could be said in answer, and protested he wondered how any man of common sense could ever listen to such a pack of stuff.

Mr. de Luc's opinion upon the subject being then mentioned, he exclaimed, very disdainfully, "O, as to Mr. de Luc, he's another man for a system himself, and I'd no more trust him than anybody: if you was only to make a little bonfire, and put it upon a hill a little way off, you might make him take it for a volcano directly!—And Herschel's not a bit better. Those sort of philosophers are the easiest taken in in the world."

. . . . . Our next topic was still more ludicrous. Colonel Manners asked me if I had not heard something very harmonious at church in the morning? I answered I was too far off, if he meant from himself.

"Yes," said he; "I was singing with Colonel Welbred; and he said he was my second.—How did I do that song?"

"Song!—Mercy!" exclaimed Colonel Goldsworthy; "a song at church!—why it was the 104th Psalm!"

"But how did I do it, Welbred; for I never tried at it before?"

"Why, pretty well," answered Colonel Welbred, very composedly; "only now and then you run me a little into 'God save the King.'"

This dryness discomposed every muscle but of Colonel Manners, who replied, with great simplicity, "Why, that's because that's the tune I knew best!"

"At least," cried I, "'twas a happy mistake to make so near their Majesties!"

"But pray, now, Colonel Welbred, tell me sincerely,—could you really make out what I was singing?"

"O yes," answered Colonel Welbred; "with the words."

"Well, but pray, now, what do you call my voice?"

"Why—a—a—a counter-tenor."

"Well, and is that a good voice?"

There was no resisting,—even the quiet Colonel Welbred could not resist laughing out here. But Colonel Manners, quite at his ease, continued his self-discussion.

"I do think, now, if I was to have a person to play over a thing to me again and again, and then let me sing it, and stop me every time I was wrong, I do think I should be able to sing 'God save the King' as well as some ladies do, that have always people to show them."

The other equerries were either too prudent, or too well-bred, to tease the formidable Madame Schwellenberg; but this gentleman had no scruples: and when he discovered her rose, very freely touched it. Mrs. Schwellenberg, "the faithful" and confidential servant of her royal mistress, shared in all her political resentments and predilections. Hence, Hastings was a favourite, his wife being a countrywoman, and Burke was detested. Upon this knowledge, Colonel Manners made one of his attacks:—

He said he did not doubt but Mr. Hastings would come to be hanged; though, he assured us, afterwards, he was firmly his friend, and believed no such thing.

Even with this not satisfied, he next told her that he had just heard Mr. Burke was in Windsor.

Mr. Burke is the name in the world most obnoxious, both for his Reform Bill, which deeply affected all the household, and for his prosecution of Mr. Hastings; she therefore declaimed against him very warmly.

"Should you like to know him, ma'am?" cried he.

"Me!—No; not I."

"Because, I dare say, ma'am, I have interest enough with him to procure you his acquaintance. Shall I bring him to the Lodge, to see you?"

"When you please, Sir, you might keep him to yourself!"

"Well, then, he shall come and dine with me, and after it drink tea with you."

"No, no; not I! You might have him all to yourself."

"O, but if he comes, you must make his tea."

"There is no such must, Sir! I do it for my pleasure only—when I please, Sir!"

The whole Court might, it would seem, at all times, have joined in the chorus, Let us all be unhappy together. Every one was suffering, dissatisfied, or wretched; and not without some cause. The King, from his robust constitution and boisterous animal spirits, appears to have been the sole exception. Even her magnificent jewels had ceased to delight the Queen; and her toilet had become a real toil, a heavy task. The following anecdote reminds one of the pretty little French tale of Alibeg the Persian: and while it corrects the vulgar idea of the ecstatic happiness of Kings and Queens, exalts the individual:—

NOVEMBER 8d.—In the morning I had the honour of a conversation with the Queen, the most delightful, on her part, I had ever yet been indulged with. It was all upon dress, and she said so nearly what I had just imputed to her in my little stanzas, that I could scarce refrain producing them; yet could not muster courage. She told me, with the sweetest grace imaginable, how well she had liked at first her jewels and ornaments as Queen. "But how soon," cried she, "was that over! Believe me, Miss Burney, it is a pleasure of a week,—a fortnight, at most,—and to return no more! I thought, at first, I should always choose to wear them; but the fatigue and trouble of putting them on, and the care they required, and the fear of losing them,—believe me, ma'am, in a fortnight's time I longed again for my own earlier dress, and wished never to see them more."

Ladies, at this time, wore, in the morning, some sort of easy dressing-gown, or wrapper, which they named a great-coat. Miss Burney made hers of white dimity. Of whatever costly or simple materials those of the Queen might be, she quite rejoiced in the ease and freedom of the garb, and the celerity with which it was put on; and enjoined her dresser to celebrate its praises in the verses alluded to above. The occasion was favourable to pay some handsome compliments to her majesty's good taste, and numerous or universal virtues. So far they were well merited.

out his woes more freely than most of the other gentlemen, though all suffered and grumbled. One afternoon, after a little misunderstanding between them, he declared to Miss Burney in the tea-room—

"All the comfort of my life, in this house, is one half-hour in a day spent in this room. After all one's labours, riding, and walking, and standing, and bowing—what a life it is! Well! it's honour! that's one comfort; it's all honour! royal honour!—one has the honour to stand till one has not a foot left; and to ride till one's stiff, and to walk till one's ready to drop,—and then one makes one's lowest bow, d'ye see, and blesses one's self with joy for the honour!" . . . . . .

His account of his own hardships and sufferings here, in the discharge of his duty, is truly comic. "How do you like it, ma'am?" he says to me, "though it's hardly fair to ask you yet, because you know almost nothing of the joys of this sort of life. But wait till November and December, and then you'll get a pretty taste of them! Running along into these cold passages; then bursting into rooms fit to bake you; then back again into all these agreeable puffs!—Bless us! I believe in my heart there's wind enough in these passages to carry a man of war! And there you'll have your share, ma'am, I promise you that! you'll get knocked up in three days, take my word for that."

I begged him not to prognosticate so much evil for me.

"O ma'am, there's no help for it," cried he; "you won't have the hunting, to be sure, nor amusing yourself with wading a foot and a half through the dirt, by way of a little pleasant walk, as we poor equerries do! It's a wonder to me we outlive the first month. But the agreeable puffs of the passages you will have just as completely as any of us. Let's see, how many blasts must you have every time you go to the Queen? . .

It was in vain I begged him to be more merciful in his prophecies; he failed not, every night, to administer to me the same pleasant anticipations.

"When the Princesses," cried he, "used to it as they are, get regularly knocked up before this business is over, off they drop, one by one:—first the Queen deserts us; then Princess Elizabeth is done for; then Princess Royal begins coughing; then Princess Augusta gets the snuffles; and all the poor attendants, my poor sister at their head, drop off, one after another, like so many snuffs of candles: till at last, dwindle, dwindle, dwindle—not a soul goes to the chapel but the king, the parson, and myself; and there we three freeze it out together!"

One evening, when he had been out very late hunting with the King, he assumed so doleful an air of weariness, that had not Miss P—— exerted her utmost powers to revive him, he would not have uttered a word the whole night; but when once brought forward, he gave us more entertainment than ever, by relating his hardships.

"After all the labours," cried he, "of the chase, all the riding, the trotting, the galloping, the leaping, the—with your favour ladies, I beg pardon, I was going to say a strange word, but the—the perspiration,—and—and all that—after being wet through over head, and soused through under feet, and popped into ditches, and jerked over gates, what lives we do lead! Well, it's all honour! that's my only comfort! Well, after all this fagging away like mad from eight in the morning to five or six in the afternoon, home we come, looking like so many drowned rats, with not a dry thread about us, nor a morsel within us—sore to the very bone, and forced to smile all the time! and then, after all this, what do you think follows?—'Here, Goldsworthy,' cries his Majesty: so up I comes to him, bowing profoundly, and my hair dripping down to my shoes; 'Goldsworthy,' cries his Majesty. 'Sir,' says I, smiling agreeably, with the rheumatism just creeping all over me! but still, expecting something a little comfortable, I wait patiently to know his gracious pleasure, and then, 'Here, Goldsworthy, I say!' he cries, 'will you have a little barley water?' Barley water in such a plight as that! Fine compensation for a wet jacket, truly!—barley water! I never heard of such a thing in my life! barley water after a whole day's hard hunting!"

"And pray, did you drink it?"

"I drink it!—Drink barley water? no, no; not come to that neither! But there it was, sure enough!—in a jug fit for a sick room; just such a thing as you put upon a hob in a chimney, for some poor miserable soul that keeps his bed! just such a thing as that!—And, 'Here, Goldsworthy,' says his Majesty, 'here's the barley water!'"

"And did the king drink it himself?"

"Yes, God bless his Majesty! but I was too humble a subject to do the same as the king!—Barley water, quoth I!—Ha! ha! a fine treat truly!—Heaven defend me! I'm not come to that, neither! bad enough too, but not so bad as that."

Major Price, another of the equerries, fell sick upon it; and no wonder, when the harassing duties are considered. A ploughman has more ease and leisure than an attendant on Majesty.

The equerry in waiting must be dressed and ready to attend by six o'clock in summer, and by seven in the winter; and he must be constantly prepared either for hunting, riding, or walking, the whole day through. The king, however, is the kindest master, and exacts from his equerries no more than he performs himself, save in watching and waiting, which are highly fatiguing.

This "watching" and "waiting" looks like an exquisite stroke of irony; but Miss Burney, we are persuaded, was quite serious in stating the small exception. One day, Colonel Goldsworthy had so far forgotten himself in his happy half-hour in the tea-room, that a brother equerry had to remind him that it was time they should appear at the King's everlasting evening concert.

"Ay," cried he reluctantly, "now for the fiddlers! There I go, plant myself against the side of the chimney, stand first on one foot, then on the other, hear over and over again all that fine squeaking, and then fall fast asleep, and escape by mere miracle from flouncing down plump in all their faces!"

"What would the queen say if you did that?"

"O, ma'am, the queen would know nothing of the matter; she'd only suppose it some old double bass that tumbled!"

"Why, could not she see what it was?"

"O no! ma'am, we are never in the room with the queen! that's the drawing-room, beyond, where the queen sits; we go no farther than the fiddling-room. As to the queen, we don't see her week after week sometimes. The king, indeed, comes there to us, between whiles, though that's all as it happens, now Price is gone. He used to play at backgammon with Price."

"Then what do you do there?"

"Just what I tell you—nothing at all, but stand as furniture! But the worst is, sometimes, when my poor eye-peepers are not quite closed, I look to the music-books to see what's coming; and there I read 'Chorus of Virgins:' so then, when they begin, I look about me. A chorus of virgins, indeed! why there's nothing but ten or a dozen fiddlers! not a soul beside! it's as true as I'm alive! So then, when we've stood supporting the chimney-piece about two hours, why then, if I'm not called upon, I shuffle back out of the room, make a profound bow to the harpsichord, and I'm off."

The Court usages and etiquettes were a fertile source of torment, and of real hardship to all concerned. No one, of course, must either speak, sit, eat, or walk (by the usual mode of progression) in the presence of royalty. On the excursion to Oxford, and while in one of the colleges, Miss Burney relates this extraordinary feat:—

I saw a performance of courtly etiquette, by Lady Charlotte Bertie, that seemed to me as difficult as any feat I ever beheld, even at Astley's or Hughes's. It was in an extremely large, long, spacious apartment. The king always led the way out, as well as in, upon all entrances and exits: but here, for some reason that I know not, the queen was handed out first; and the princesses, and the aid-de-camp, and equerry followed. The king was very earnest in conversation with some professor; the attendants hesitated whether to wait or follow the queen; but presently the Duchess of Ancaster, being near the door, slipped out, and Lady Harcourt after her. The Miss Vernons, who were but a few steps from them, went next. But Lady Charlotte, by chance, happened to be very high up the room, and near to the king. Had I been in her situation, I had surely waited till his Majesty went first; but that would not, I saw, upon this occasion, have been etiquette; she therefore faced the king, and began a march backwards,—her ankle already sprained, and to walk forward, and even leaning upon an arm, was painful to her: nevertheless, back she went, perfectly upright, without one stumble, without ever looking once behind to see what she might encounter; and with as graceful a motion, and as easy an air, as I ever saw anybody enter a long room, she retreated, I am sure, full twenty yards backwards out of one.

For me, I was also, unluckily, at the upper end of the room, looking at some portraits of founders, and one of Henry VIII. in particular, from Holbein. However, as soon as I perceived what was going forward,—backward rather,—I glided near the wainscot, (Lady Charlotte, I should mention, made her retreat along the very middle of the room), and having paced a few steps backwards, stopped short to recover, and, while I seemed examining some other portrait, disentangled my train from the heels of my shoes, and then proceeded a few steps only more; and then, observing the king turn another way, I slipped a yard or two at a time forwards; and hastily looked back, and then was able to go again according to rule, and in this manner, by slow and varying means, I at length made my escape.

Since that time, however, I have come on prodigiously, by constant practice, in the power and skill of walking backwards, without tripping up my own heels, feeling my head giddy, or treading my train out of the plaits—accidents very frequent among novices in that business; and I have no doubt but that, in the course of a few months, I shall arrive at all possible perfection in the true court retrograde motion.

The whole party had been up, and had breakfasted at an early hour. A splendid collation was provided for the royalties in a large hall of Christ's College, to which they sat down with entire satisfaction; but their attendants and entertainers, of whatever rank, were to be quite above the sublunary weaknesses of hunger, thirst, or fatigue.

The Duchess of Ancaster and Lady Harcourt stood behind the chairs of the queen and the princess royal. There were no other ladies of sufficient rank to officiate for Princesses Augusta and Elizabeth. Lord Harcourt stood behind the king's chair; and the vice-chancellor, and the head-master of Christ Church, with salvers in their hands, stood near the table, and ready to hand, to the three noble waiters, whatever was wanted: while the other reverend doctors and learned professors stood aloof, equally ready to present to the chancellor and the master whatever they were to forward.

We, meanwhile, untitled attendants, stood at the other end of the room, forming a semi-circle, and all strictly facing the royal collationers. We consisted of the Miss Vernons, thrown out here as much as their humble guests, Colonel Fairly, Major Price, General Harcourt, and—though I know not why—Lady Charlotte Bertie;—with all the inferior professors, in their gowns, and some, too much frightened to advance, of the upper degrees. These, with Miss Planta, Mr. Hagget, and myself, formed this attendant semi-circle.

The time of this collation was spent very pleasantly—to me, at least, to whom the novelty of the scene rendered it entertaining. It was agreed that we must all be absolutely famished unless we could partake of some refreshment, as we had breakfasted early, and had no chance of dining before six or seven o'clock. A whisper was soon buzzed through the semi-circle, of the deplorable state of our appetite apprehensions; and presently it reached the ears of some of the worthy doctors. Immediately a new whisper was circulated, which made its progress with great vivacity, to offer us whatever we would wish, and to beg us to name what we chose.

Tea, coffee, and chocolate, were whispered back.

The method of producing, and the means of swallowing them, were much more difficult to settle than the choice of what was acceptable. Major Price and Colonel Fairly, however, seeing a very large table close to the wainscot behind us, desired our refreshments might be privately conveyed there, behind the semi-circle, and that, while all the group backed very near it, one at a time might feed, screened by all the rest from observation.

I suppose I need not inform you, my dear Susan, that to eat in presence of any of the royal family is as much kors d'usage as to be seated.

This plan had speedy success, and the very good doctors soon, by sly degrees and with watchful caution, covered the whole table with tea, coffee, chocolate, cakes, and bread and butter. . . . . .

The Duchess of Ancaster and Lady Harcourt, as soon as the first serving attendance was over, were dismissed from the royal chairs, and most happy to join our group, and partake of our repast. The duchess, extremely fatigued with standing, drew a small body of troops before her, that she might take a few minutes' rest on a form by one of the doors; and Lady Charlotte Bertie did the same, to relieve an ankle which she had unfortunately sprained.

"Poor Miss Burney!" cried the good-natured duchess, "I wish she could sit down, for she is unused to this work. She does not know yet what it is to stand for five hours following, as we do."

Hints may be found here, by which Queen Victoria and her Consort might largely profit. What a relief to themselves, to shake off altogether, as they have done in part, many of those ridiculous mummings, which must, where they possess right feelings, be as annoying to the principal personages as to all about them.

We may now hint, that as Miss Burney has still above four years to pass at Court, her editress, unless her materials become richer and weightier, would require to study the art of compression. There are narrow, antiquated circles, whom the merest tittle-tattle and chit-chat of the Palace fifty years ago, will still amuse; but these small affairs cannot interest the public at large; nor yet the literary world, which must have had considerable curiosity about the contents of the earlier volumes, and received great pleasure from their perusal.

SIR THOMAS DICK LAUDER'S EDITION OF PRICE ON THE PICTURESQUE.*

THERE is no way in which a man of letters and cultivated taste can be more beneficially employed for the interests of Art and Literature, than in giving to the public perfect editions of those works on which Time has stamped its seal, with the addition of such commentaries as the progress of knowledge or the advance of Art may render necessary and appropriate. Such a work is the book before us; in the original one of the most elegant and delightful works of its kind in the language, if it be not, from the fine taste, genial sentiment, and various accomplishments of its author, at the very head of its class. From its richness and beauty of imagery, its luxuriance of word-pictures, and of literary allusion and apt quotation, this charming work belongs as much to Poetry as to Art. But our concern is not with the original work, of which every lover of nature and of rural scenery knows something either by snatches or in detail, but with Sir Thomas Lauder's Edition, and, above all, with his additions and commentaries.

The Preliminary Essay on the origin of Taste, though the most important in respect of size, is hardly to be considered as the most valuable of these additions; though Sir Thomas considers knowledge of the theory a necessary elementary study, before proceeding to the elucidation of the principle. He adopts, with very slight modification, Alison's theory of Association; and, unreservedly, the brilliant exposition of that theory by Lord Jeffrey, as it stands in the Essay on Beauty in the last edition of the Encyclopedia Britannica. Sir Thomas, instead of confining his commentaries and illustrations to foot-notes, intersperses them freely with the text of Price, though in general they are found at the end of each chapter. The interpolated matter, however, which might, to some sticklers for the purity of editions, prove offensive from its position in the heart of the text, is confined within brackets, and cannot be mistaken. It is always well worth perusal. The Editor, a man of congenial tastes and pursuits with Price, a practical amateur landscape gardener as well as one well versed in the theory, never dissents from his original—his master in one sense—without good cause shown. His first notable dissent explains the argument of Sir Uvedale without our quoting it:—

"From my own knowledge I can say, that however valuable the study of pictures may be for giving perfection to professors of landscape gardening, the painting of them does not always produce this effect. Artists, and especially young artists, have, not unfrequently, their tastes so much narrowed by their devotion to certain styles of subject, as to be incapable of enjoying, or even of tolerating anything in nature, however excellent it may be, if it be of a different character from that which they affect in their works. By attempting to become artists, they have ceased to be men, or to be able to sympathize with the universality of human feeling. It would be vain to expect that landscape gardeners could be made of such men, with the hope of their producing scenes which should give general delight to minds expanded by education and the love of nature. I have sometimes travelled through the most interesting countries with individuals of this cast, and found that great as was the delight which I was experiencing from the contemplation of the scenes we passed through, nothing could call forth one exclamation of pleasure from my companions, until something chanced to arise before their eyes of a character in harmony with that of the subjects they were most prone to paint. Such men would pass over nine-tenths of the finest places in England, and refuse to give any other opinion than that all was barren. That artist, indeed, who has followed and observed nature throughout all her different walks—who can draw enjoyment from associating himself with her in her softest and quietest scenes and in her more placid moods, as well as when she wildly wanders amid the dark woods and rocky fastnesses, and by the thundering cataracts of her mountains—such a man as this, I say, may well prove a profound master, not only in the composition of pictures on canvass, but in that also of those which may be created in actual landscape; but for excellence in that generalization necessary for landscape gardening, I consider that a very universal study of pictures will do more to accomplish the individual, than the particular practice of any one style of painting them. It appears indeed to me, that nothing can possibly tend more to educate the mind, for the just conception of such a true taste in landscape gardening as may enable its possessor to prosecute this delightful art with the hope of generally awakening agreeable associations in cultivated minds, than the frequent and extensive study of the works of the best landscape painters, modern as well as ancient.

This, after all, may rather be regarded as enlargement of the views of Price, than dissent from them. Utility as a principle, a constituent of beauty in gardens, and rural buildings, and their accessories, is better understood than it was thirty or forty years since; and this principle has dictated many of the remarks appended by Sir Thomas,—as those on roads and walks in the second chapter, and in many other places.

Some of our quotations from the remarks of Sir Thomas are to be received more as practical hints and illustrations than criticisms on Price; as, for example, the following on the assertion that the sublime cannot be created by the improver. And neither it can; though it can be either revealed or shut out by the hand of art:—

"There may be instances, indeed, in which the sublime may, in one sense, be created, so far at least as any one locality may be considered—I mean by the bringing into view some grand object, by the removal of some obstacle of fence, of ground, or of wood, which may exclude it from observation. I know a case, where a friend of mine by the judicious removal of ground, has opened up a view of a grand expansive branch of the ocean so as to bring it, as it were, under the windows of his mansion, though it is, in reality, several miles off. The view of sublime rocks, or mountains, or of magnificent waterfalls, or rivers, or lakes, is often lost for want of a little boldness in the sacrifice of a few trees. But no part of the art of landscape gardening requires greater caution, or more judgment than this, for rashness or ignorance may, perhaps, in a few hours, do such damage as ages may be required to repair.

It is as an "elegant extract," or as illustrative of the law of Association, that we copy the following beautiful passage, at least as much as for its just criticism on Price's dislike to glaring objects and to absolute dead white buildings in a landscape. Admitting that a white object forcing itself on notice, staring impudently in one's face, is exceedingly offensive, Sir Thomas proceeds :—

But, when richly embosomed in trees, I conceive that white buildings often give the liveliest and most sparkling effect to scenery. Of this fact, any one who has visited Italy, and particularly the Italian lakes, must be perfectly persuaded by experience. See, for example, how the shores of the Lakes of Maggiore, Lugano, and Como, are clustered with little towns of the purest white, that appear like strings of orient pearls, between the blue water in which they are reflected, and the deep woods which cluster interminably over them, whence every now and then some prominent rock rears its head, to be crowned with some convent or villa of the same hue, whilst every jutting promontory below is ornamented by some such gem of human workmanship. Over these the full Italian sun pours forth his unshorn splendour, giving so universal a tone of brilliancy to the whole fairy scene, as to bring all its parts into perfect harmony. I am quite aware that Claude himself in painting such a scene, would have felt it necessary to subdue and keep down the intensity of many of these touches of white. . . . . .
But be this as it may, as I floated over the smooth surface of Lugano or Como—although I failed not to drink in, with a never satiated thirst, the exhaustless beauties with which nature had so liberally surrounded me—although I was never tired with admiring the infinite variety of form and colour, which the margin of the lake exhibited in its rocks, and headlands, and mysteriously receding bays and inlets, whilst they shifted and moved upon one another, as the boat glided past them—although my eye at one time would sink in luxurious refreshment into the richly-tufted recesses among the noble trees, and then again soar upwards with eagle flight over the undulating surface of the hanging woods above, to skim with exultation over the bare and prominent crags, to the very summits of the mountains—yet it still would turn with unspeakable delight to rest upon those white buildings, the very sight of which awakened within me a thousand interesting associations with man—his happiness—his trials—his pains—his pleasures—and his passions ; whilst the gay sun reminded me that I was in the fascinating climate of Italy, and I here had the satisfaction of thinking, that my estimate of its advantages was not to be reduced by the miserable examples of poverty and disease, by which the eyes of the traveller are but too frequently shocked in other parts of the same country. Here I knew that early industry and prudence had produced comparative wealth and comfort. I was well aware that the greater part of these little sparkling habitations that studded the shore, owed their creation to the industrious habits of the youth of these districts, who, leaving their homes in early life with a small stock of prints, looking-glasses, and barometers, wander wearily over the European world, exposed to all the perils and vicissitudes of weather and of fortune, until their small but certain gains, husbanded by sobriety and frugality, enable them to return with a sum which, though little in itself, is wealth to them in these simple and unsophisticated regions—seeing that it enables them to become proprietors of their native soil, by the purchase of some small and picturesque spot of land, whereon to build a commodious and tasteful dwelling. There, after uniting themselves to the objects of their early affections, for whom their constant attachment has never varied, in defiance of all the blandishments to which they may have been exposed from women of all countries, they sit down contented, and full of gratitude to a beneficent God, to spend the remainder of their lives in ease and contentment, and to rear up a virtuous progeny, to go forth and return as their fathers had done. Filled with such reflections as these, how was it possible that I could have wished the white buildings of Como or Lugano to have been brought out less distinctly to my view ?

But with all this, Sir Thomas does not stint his anathemas, does not mince his malison in denouncing the enormous white-washers :—

Nothing can be more detestable in taste than this mode of marking out distant objects. A fine ancient Gothic church may thus be utterly destroyed in all its most venerable associations, and one's feelings outraged on a near approach to it, by beholding it converted into a dirty whited sepulchre, for the wretchedly absurd whim of some vulgar proprietor, whose tea-canister of a house happens to stand at some miles' distance, and whose immense liberality of purse so overpowers the village rustics, that they are led to talk of nothing but the bounty of the Squire, "who has so handsomely done up the ould church, out of his own pocket !" And nothing can be more abominable than the ignorant attempt of some people to make a hill more conspicuous, by putting some shocking nine-pin looking erection upon the summit of it.

Of this there is an illustration in the case of some Highland nobleman, who played extravagant pranks in beautifying a pair of noble hills, to the grief and discomfiture of the editor, when, after the deforming improvement, he first visited what had been a favourite haunt :—

On the green hill top, still sits this wretched abortion, in form and apparent size very much resembling an old witch wrapped in her plaid, and grinning as it were with delight, in the consciousness that she holds the whole scenery of this grand and magnificent valley bound up, as it were, in the envious spell of apparently comparative insignificance.

But may not Association, the association of memory, have been at work here ; creating deformity to the mind merely by displacing the old and familiar, in the consecrated scene of other years ?

One of the greatest enormities that has been systematically perpetuated by pseudo-improvers has been the destruction of old gardens and avenues. On this subject Sir Thomas is quite as sound, and almost as eloquently indignant, as Price himself. For these barbarous outrages upon taste, feeling, and the delightful and hallowed associations of the olden time, he has no pardon. Who, indeed, could endure to see the places he has described swept away—razed—"the roundels" of Wintoun wantonly demolished, or the almost sacred terraces of Barncleuch levelled? We cannot pass the latter charming spot. It breathes the very spirit of romance and poetry.

The unsparing innovators of the improving school of landscape gardening, seemed to consider that it was impossible to carry their system too far, and, accordingly, they shaved away all those rich and harmonious attendants upon the architecture of the house, and carried bareness and poverty up to its very walls. Few perfect samples of the old style, therefore, are now to be found ; but where they do exist, we are persuaded that they must always excite the liveliest feelings of delight, arising not only from associations with the olden time, but from those connected with that sense of propriety which gave birth to them. I know of one ancient garden of this description, that belonging to the old house of Barncleuch near Hamilton, the property of Lady

Ruthven, which I visited with extreme satisfaction and delight. The house stands on the brink of a steep and lofty bank, hanging over the river Avon, at a point a little way above its confluence with the Clyde. The bank is cut out and built up into terraces of different degrees of level, which are connected by flights of steps, and decorated by fountains—arched recesses—stone seats—and all those adjuncts usually found in such old domestic gardens; and the whole is thus softened into the happiest gradual combination with the wildness of the neighbouring scenery. The history of the original formation of this garden is very curious. It was constructed by that Lord Belhaven who lived about the middle of the seventeenth century, of whom Nicol in his Diary, (page 233,) gives us the following very strange history:—

"It is formerlie observit, that the Inglisches haiffing routtit this natioun at the fight at Dunbar, upone the 3d September 1650, they possest this kingdome, and did foirfalt the maist pairt of those that were ingadged in that unlauchful ingadgement in the Scottis ingoing to England; among quhome the Dukes of Hamiltoun, and all that formerlie were forfalt, the creditouris persewit the cautioneris for the Duke's dett and could get no relieffe. Among these cautioneris the Lord Belhevin being one, and being band for that hous in greater sumes of money than he was able to pay, he resolves to leave this natioun, that he mycht eschew comprysinges of his landis and imprissonement of his persone. This resolutioun he followes in this manner. He takis his jurney to England, and quhen he past by Silloway (Solway) Sandis, he causit his servand cum bak to his wyff with his cloak and hatt, and causit it to be ventit, that in ryding by these sandis, both he and his horse quhairon he raid wer sunkin in these quick sandis and drowned; nane being privy to this, bot his lady and his man servand. This report passed in all pairtes as guid cunzie, that he was deid and perisched, for the space of six yearis and moir; and to mak this the moir probable and lykelie, his lady and chyldrene went in dule and murning the first two yeiris of his absens, so that during these six yéiris it was certifyed to the haill cuntrey that he was deid and perished; all this wes done of set purpos to eschew the danger of the cautionary quhairin he lay for that Hous of Hamiltoun. Efter his ingoing to England, he strypit himselff of his apperell, clothed himselff in ane base servill sute, denyit his name, and became servand to ane gairdner, and laborit in gardenes and yairdis during the haill space of his absence; na person being privy to this cours bot his Lady, (as for his servand he went to other service, not knowing that his old Lord haid becum a gairdner,) till efter six yeiris absens; efter quhilk tyme and space the Dutches of Hamiltoun haiffing takin ordour with the dettis, and compereit and aggreyit with the creditouris, than he returned to Scotland in Januar last 1659, efter sex yeiris service in England as a gairdner, to the admiratioun of many; for during that haill space it was evir thocht he wes deid, no persone being accessorie to his secrecy bot his awin Lady to hir great commendatioune. By this meanis his landis and estait wer saiff, and his cautionarie for the Hous of Hamiltoun wes transactit for, as is afoirsaid, and his estait both personall and reall fred and outquytt."

I believe that it was owing to my friend Mr. Kirkpatrick Sharpe having on one occasion directed Sir Walter Scott's attention to this most singular story, that the first idea occurred to the great author of the Bride of Lammermoor, that he should terminate the existence of the Master of Ravenswood by a death similar to that which was thus feigned by Lord Belhaven, and which Sir Walter has made so sublimely affecting as the final fate of his hero. But the object which I have most particularly in view, in my present introduction of this piece of history, is, that I may be enabled to mention, that it was the knowledge which Lord Belhaven thus acquired, during his six years' hard horticultural labour in England, that enabled him to lay out and construct this beautiful old terrace garden of Barncleuch.

Sir Thomas is quite as orthodox on the doctrine of the old avenue, "the obsolete prolixity of shade," as on the Pleasaunce, the ancient terraced garden, with its fountains, and vases, and flights of steps. He has described what would seem a magnificent landscape garden in this style, at Castle Kennedy, the property of the Earl of Stair, in Wigtonshire; and gives many curious extracts from the correspondence of the worthy Andrew Fairservice of Castle Kennedy, when the place was forming about a hundred and ten years ago;—a person who gave fair promise of what the race of Scottish gardeners have since accomplished in every quarter of the globe.

Beautifully has Sir Uvedale Price spoken of the avenue; its solemn stillness, its religious gloom, its grand and mysterious effect by moonlight, its majesty and grandeur at all times, nor does he execrate the unhallowed destroyers of this noble feature in landscape, more cordially than does his sympathetic editor. "Melancholy indeed," says Sir Thomas,

Is the thought, that this is no solitary instance of this barbarous species of destruction in British places. I could name many which have come under my own observation. Some of the most interesting associations with our early history have thus been recklessly sacrificed beneath the chariot-wheels of the Juggernaut of modern barbarism. And what has been the general product of this most ruthless massacre? Instead of the grandeur which has just been so feelingly described, we have an abortive attempt to force the few unfortunate stragglers who have been spared from the slaughter, into formal groups, which have no other effect than to mark out the line which the whole army originally occupied when standing, so that they may serve to inform the indignant spectator of the full extent of the atrocity that has been committed. But even this is well, compared to the wretchedly puerile attempts which we often see made, to manufacture the straggling individuals that have been left into clumps, by the planting of younger trees around them. But when speaking thus of avenues I of course mean that these my observations shall apply to really ancient avenues, composed of grand ancestral timber: for I can quite easily understand the necessity which may sometimes arise for breaking up those of younger date, and more insignificant growth, and which are consequently neither possessed of grandeur of aspect, nor of ancient association—and with such I can conceive the propriety of making an attempt to employ some of the trees which may be judiciously left standing, as the nucleus of groups of younger creation. But even this I hold to be a very difficult undertaking, and one in which it will generally require years before the original state of things can be thoroughly obliterated.

Among other freaks of country gentlemen, whose passion for planting and improvement is not always under the guidance of the purest taste, Sir Thomas tells of one who planted the name of his place in letters that covered a whole hill!

Country gentlemen will in this work find many excellent hints for their instruction in ornamental planting; in other words, in all planting,—for how can wood in any stage be otherwise than ornamental? We copy out one caution, the due observance of which might save much regret and mortification:

One remark more, and I have done with this part of the subject. Nothing can be more unwise than to trust to delicate foreign trees or shrubs for the production of important effects, which may thus be all ruined by the destructive cold of some severe winter. Such tender strangers may be well enough introduced experimentally—but they should have places assigned to them where their failure may produce no serious blank, if they should unfortunately perish.

I shall offer but a single word on the subject of lawns. Levelling, smooth shaving, and rolling, are operations only admissible close to the house—and even there it is better that it should be associated with terraces, bowling-greens, flower-knots, and such minor pieces of formality as are in keeping with that of the architecture. Everywhere else the lawns should be in rich and natural-looking pasture, especially where they begin to sweep away under trees, or to lose themselves in the woodlands. In such places, some of the more graceful wild plants, such as those of the fern tribe, the great tussilago, and others, may occasionally be permitted to show themselves—and even tufts of whins may not be altogether out of place.

But we were treating merely of foreign delicate trees and shrubs, when the remark on lawns insinuated itself.

Water, so important an element in landscape, and in landscape-gardening, whether the river, the stream, the burn, the tarn, the pool, "the sheety lake," or the mountain loch, has drawn forth many fine observations, and useful hints for the formation of artificial pieces of water. Of this constituent of the landscape it is said :—

Even when it is attended by the most unfavourable circumstances, it is sure to be productive of one grand and ever changeful effect—I mean that of repeating the splendid colouring of the clouds, as well as their magical movements over the blue ether; whilst its occasional reflection of the moon, or that of the setting sun, which kindles up the wavelets on its surface into golden flames, are accidents of the most gorgeous description. However small the body of water may be, it will be found to yield this description of beauty in a greater or lesser degree, exactly in a proportion corresponding to that of its size. Some extent of water, then, is desirable in every scene, if it can possibly be procured.

And the following, among other directions, are given from, we should imagine, personal experience :—

The grand point is, if possible, to select a spot where some natural valley or hollow can be most easily blocked up, and that with the least appearance of artifice, so as to arrest the discharge of the running waters it may contain, until they may swell up to such a height as to float it backwards to the required extent. I can conceive, nay I have seen, such situations where the shores afforded bold headlands, and projecting points, and where even rocky steeps, and broken recesses and promontories were happily found. But where these do not exist already, it will require an improver of no ordinary talent to produce them by artificial means so that they shall look at all like nature; and if he is to fall short of this object, he had better not make the attempt. But much may be accomplished by plantation, and this should not be scanty, but so liberal as to give ample room for after openings, if such shall appear to be demanded. When the trees rise to a tolerable height, the beauty of the contrast of light and shade upon the water as well as on its banks, will thus be much increased, and every little bay or recess will begin to have its peculiar interest.

"Silva coronat aquas, cingens latus omne, suisque Frondibus, ut velo, Phœbeos submovet ignes."
Ovid, L. V.

And as the lapping of the waves against the shores will every day be wearing them out more and more into a natural aspect, and as reeds, sedges, bulrushes, the typha, and aquatics of various other kinds, may be planted here and there in the shallows, and water-lilies in parts that are a little deeper, the march of Nature will gradually advance, till she obtains a perfect dominion over the whole scene. If the piece of water be of such a size as to admit of its being the abode of waterfowl, it is quite indispensable to construct islands for their breeding and protection, however flat or small they may be—and if these are even covered over with willows, and bounded by reeds and sedges, they will add somewhat to the effect of the whole, whilst their winged and web-footed inhabitants will give a continual life to the lake. As an object of interest, as well as of amusement and advantage, fish should not be forgotten. Nothing can be more beautiful than to behold the trouts of a lake rising at the flies, in a fine summer evening, in so great numbers, as absolutely to dimple its glassy surface. To ensure this profusion of fish, it is quite essential that the rill that supplies the lake should enter it at one end and quit it at the other, so as to produce a certain degree of current throughout its whole length. It is also desirable that as many little feeders as can be commanded should find their way into the lake from its sides, as it is on the small gravelly shallows which these form at their embouchures, that the fish are most inclined to deposit their spawn; and to promote their doing so, artificial beds of such gravel should be projected into the lake, where they do not naturally exist.

Even on the smallest piece of water a swan produces a sparkling effect when seen amidst the bright light, or the deep green shadow which is thrown over the surface of the pool by the superincumbent foliage; and nothing gives greater animation to a scene.

We have already gone too far, but the commentary, or supplementary remarks, on Price's chapter on Architecture and Buildings, are quite irresistible to Scottish tastes and associations :—

I have already stated my decided predilection for irregularly built houses in the country. The styles which admit of this are the cottage, the villa, the old English manor-house, the old Scottish manor-house, and the castle. We may thus have picturesque houses adapted to all fortunes; for dwellings to suit incomes of all degrees of extent may be constructed from one or other of those kinds of buildings, and I am inclined to think, that if planned with judgment, they may be made so at no greater cost than they would have otherwise occasioned, if built with less attention to taste. One thing appears to me to be important, and that is, to preserve the integrity of our associations by avoiding, so far as we possibly can, the introduction of styles of building which must at once be perceived to be foreign to the country in which they are placed. For this reason, whilst I see all manner of propriety in erecting an old English manor-house in an English scene, I am rather disposed to think that such a building is not well placed in Scotland, where it must stand for ages before it can gather, with the mosses and lichens of years, those associations which may make it harmonize with the history of the country into which the style has been transferred. In the same way I think the old Scottish house, with its square tower and bartisan, plain windows, hanging turrets, round towers and lofty sugar-loaf roofs, high narrow gables, &c., all borrowed from France during the long period of alliance between Scotland and that country, but now for generations intimately associated with Scottish scenery, however picturesque in itself, would be quite out of harmony with English landscape.

With a useful warning to such of our friends still in the age of romance, as may be meditating a thatched cottage, and a well-merited eulogium on the most distinguished landscape painter that Scotland has ever yet seen, we must conclude our hasty and very inadequate notice of this charming book. Its handsome exterior, and characteristic and tasteful embellishments, are pleasant accessories, though quite secondary to its literary merits; yet one likes to see a beautiful woman well-dressed, and a beautiful book too. This is one alike fitted for the drawing-room and the library.

I confess, that after considerable experience, I have been completely cured of my romantic attachment to thatch. The continual repair which it requires to keep it water-tight, is a source of perpetual annoyance and vexation. If the roof of a cottage be well formed, and well projected, so as to throw a deep shadow over the wall beneath it, I do not conceive that it will be necessary to thatch it, in order to add to its picturesque effect, at the risk of diminishing the comfort of the poor inmates. The most beautiful thatch of any is that composed of heather. I remember a Highland proprietor, a friend of mine, who had constructed in different parts of his grounds, some of the most picturesque cottages which I ever beheld, which were all thatched with heather. When I first saw them I was loud in my commendation of his good taste, and high in my praise of his fine heather thatch. "It is very beautiful indeed," said he to me. "It has but one fault, indeed, and that is that it does not keep out one drop of rain." Now, I do not think that any one has a right to make his cottagers suffer to any such extent as this, in order that their cottages may look picturesque to his friends, as they drive past them in an open carriage on a sunshiny day. If a country gentleman must have thatch-roofed cottages, and particularly if he must have them thatched with heather, I would recommend, that he should, in the first place, put on a good slate or tile roof, and then cover it with the thatch, for which purpose a frame-work might be easily laid over it. . . . . .

The late Reverend John Thomson of Duddingstone, one of the most distinguished of our modern landscape painters, has shown by his works, how perfectly he was aware of the truth of the observation here made, with regard to the sublimity of effect produced by the height of the horizontal line. In his magnificent pictures of sea coast castles, he has very frequently availed himself of this circumstance. Where the building happens to be perched, as is often the case, on some lower projecting promontory, round which the sea rages with billows which are broken into ten thousand fluctuating forms, and chafed into spray and foam by the sunken rocks at its base, it has been no uncommon practice with him to take his view from some higher part of the continuous cliffs above, by which means the horizontal line of the sea is raised much higher than his principal object. This circumstance, together with the matchless skill which he has displayed in the management and treatment of his sea and sky, has enabled him to produce pictures of the most sublime description.

Greece Revisited, and Sketches in Lower Egypt in 1840, &c. &c. By Edgar Garston, Knight of the R. M. Greek Order of the Saviour, &c. In 2 volumes octavo, cloth, with lithographs. Pp. 666. Saunders & Otley.

This is by no means a profound work; but it comprises many lively sketches of the superfices of society in the New Kingdom, which the author had visited seventeen years before, a volunteer in the cause of Greek freedom and independence. In Lower Egypt his facts and observations are of a more solid and important character. Perhaps he was too well received at the Court of King Otho, and by the official people at Athens, to feel himself entitled to indulge in any freedom of remark. In the dominions of the Pacha he was under no restraint; and, taken altogether, we prefer the part of the work which refers to Egypt, though Mehemet Ali is less a favourite with him than with most other English travellers. The beauty of the women, from the fair queen of Otho and the stately and lovely classic dames of her Court, to the strapping and symmetrical Nubian slave girls, and the bright-eyed Arab maids, appear to have been objects of deeper concernment to this gallant knight than questions of politics or of public economy. Wherever he went he kept "a bright look-out" for female beauty. The descriptions of the private country residences of the persons whom he visited in different parts of Greece possess more general interest than court balls and fashionable parties in Athens. The Minister of Marine placed a government schooner at his disposal, and he cruised about among the isles of Greece. The scene of the following adventure is the Island of Milo:—

March 19th.—The heavy rain which was falling when I wrote my notes of yesterday continued throughout the day. It did not, however, prevent the governor from coming down to visit us in reply to the letters which we had sent up to his residence at the Castro. He is a fine, intelligent, old man, having still much of the vigour and vivacity of youth, and speaks both French and Italian with fluency. He was accompanied by one of his sons, an ex-scholar of the banished Cairis, and a perfect model of youthful eastern beauty, as also by the superintendant of the quarries and mines.

We received them with such hospitable appliances as our sea-store afforded, seasoned with the inevitable chibouque and coffee, and afterwards accompanied them on shore to the house of the director of the Dogana, Capt. Hadji* Andrea, by whom we were regaled with the same eastern pledges of welcome. He is a maternal cousin of the governor, and a fine specimen of the Hydriote of the revolution; with features strongly marked, but handsome, and expressive of indomitable resolution, he possesses the frame of a Hercules. He and his whole family retain the Hydriote dress and customs; and under his roof, for the first time since my return to Greece, I had my coffee and sweetmeats (τὸ γλυκὸ) presented to me by the hand of the eldest daughter of the family, according to ancient usage. On paying a visit to the adjoining village, we found the houses, so unpromising without, to be exceedingly clean within.

At about ten o'clock this morning, the weather became bright and propitious, and we set out for the Castro. The road, or bridle-path, winds among hills covered with volcanic remains. For some distance before approaching the town, the hills abound in excavations, many of which are used as storehouses, or as places of refuge for shepherds and their flocks; others are partially choked up; but those which have been recently opened, and they are numerous, are free from rubbish, and by their internal arrangement, show for what purpose they have been originally formed. They are quadrangular, and on either side and at the extremity of the excavations are tiers of sarcophagi, hollowed out of the rock, and disposed with architectural regularity. Some of the chambers contain six, some nine, or even more, of these resting-places of the departed. . . . . .

After visiting several of these family tombs, we went to pay our respects to the governor, whose residence is situated at the foot of the hill on which the Castro stands. In his house we were received with the same pleasing, but almost obsolete, etiquette which had been exercised to us the day preceding at that of the director of the customs. His government includes the islands of Siphno, Argentiere, Siphanto, and Polycandro. Notwithstanding so respectable an extent of rule, he seems disposed to look upon his government as a sort of exile, inasmuch as it debars him from giving to his children the education he would wish. On my inquiring what armed force he had to support his authority in the island, he told me that he had one phalangide; and that even of his assistance he had little need, his subjects being very orderly, and, moreover, so docile, that when any irregularity occurred, he had only to send an order to the culprit to go to prison, and forthwith to prison he went.

From the house of the governor, accompanied by him, we went to that of the French consul, by whom we were received with much kindness and politeness. The honours of his house were performed by a daughter of great beauty, who acquitted herself of the duty with a simple grace, which could scarcely be excelled among the most accomplished of the fair daughters of my own country. In those parts of the Levant where the light of woman's countenance is not hidden within the precincts of the harem, there is an extreme gentleness and almost submissiveness in the deportment of the sex, which, when accompanied by grace and beauty, tell forcibly upon the feelings of the wanderer from western climes. . . . . I return from this digression to the visits of the day, and to the house of the Chevalier Brest.

Though of French descent, and the representative of that nation, he can hardly be looked upon as a Frenchman, having been born in one of the islands of the Archipelago, and educated at Constantinople. He is also wedded to a Greek lady, the mother of our beautiful friend, and of three other daughters celebrated for their personal charms, who are married and established elsewhere, so that he may be considered as thoroughly naturalized. M. Brest has been resident here since 1816; and while the island was yet under Turkish rule, and such exports were not forbidden, he had the gratification of embarking the beautiful Venus of Milo for the land of his fathers. During the revolution, his house afforded shelter to the ladies of more than one distinguished family, and his assistance was freely extended to the unfortunate Sciotes and Moreotes who sought refuge here. I visited him in 1825, when the Greek fleet was lying off the south coast of the island, and it was not without pleasure that I found myself recognised by him as an old acquaintance, despite of the lapse of years and the substitution of a palletôt for a fustanella. M. Brest's house is situated on the verge of a lofty perpendicular cliff, which overlooks the entrance of the port.

Pursuing our round of visits, in which we were now accompanied by the Consul, we went to call upon Madame Tataraki, widow of a primate, who had extensive possessions in this island, and in those of Serpho and Siphanto; her son is affianced to the fair damsel whose grace and beauty suggested the foregoing observations respecting the ladies of the Levant. She received us with the same pledges of Eastern hospitality with which we had been met elsewhere; with, however, this difference, that her unmarried daughters, who are said to be very beautiful, did not make their appearance to do the honours of the house. I saw them, however, taking stealthy glances at the strangers; and, notwithstanding the care they took to avoid observation, I had ample opportunity of assuring myself that they well deserve their reputation as to beauty. The mother possesses the remains of equal or greater loveliness, and notwithstanding the peculiarity of her Serphiote costume, which is rather opposed to the acquirement or display of graceful carriage, is altogether ladylike and aristocratic in her bearing. She was clad in deep mourning, which she has not quitted since the death of her husband, who perished in a squall between this and one of the neighbouring islands about five years ago. Though the exterior of Madame Tataraki's residence be very unpretending, compared with the houses of persons of the same rank elsewhere, the interior is spacious, and fitted up with much elegance, and at the same time with extreme simplicity.

After paying our respects to her, we ascended by a sort of half streets, half staircases, to the highest point of the Castro, which is one of the stations whence the pilots look out for vessels entering the Archipelago. . .

The houses at the Castro are very unpretending in their outward appearance, but are models of neatness and cleanliness within. The seafaring portion of the inhabitants is a fine manly-looking race, and, judging from the specimens which we saw, the women are remarkable for beauty. During our ascent and descent through the town we noticed ten or twelve heads, which in delicacy of outline realized the beau-ideal of Greek soulptors, and scarcely less the dreams of eastern poets, in the softness of the eyes and the fine pencilling of the eyebrows. Two of these beauteous heads we saw bending over an occupation of a very humble nature—that of plying the shuttle.

The Venus of Milo was, we here learn, found near the theatre of the ancient city.

From the Castro we descended to the site of the ancient city. On visiting the theatre, I found it to be completely cleared of the soil and rubbish in which it was half buried when I was last here. It is beautifully situated on the slope of a hill, and the spectators, on looking beyond the scene, would command a view of a portion of the harbour, and of the coast beyond. The seats of the theatre are for the most part perfect, as is also their sheathing of white marble. Altogether it is in a better state of preservation than any other Hellenic theatre which has been discovered. The Venus of Milo was found at a very short distance from it, and probably other treasures of the same description are still lying buried in the neighbourhood. The inhabitants hold in a sort of superstitious awe the statues which they discover when excavating. They look upon them as personifications of the genius of the spot, and consider it unlucky to meddle with them. The superstitions of the Hellenes may be traced to this belief in an intermediate race between men and angels, which prevails both in the islands and among the mountains of Attica and of the Peloponnessus.

The next island visited was Agios Giorgios.

This island is inhabited by one family only—that of a Hydriote, who is also the proprietor of it. It was bestowed upon his father by a Capudan Pacha, to whom he had rendered some signal service, and who commanded him in return to name such reward as it might be in his power to grant. The Hydriote asked the grant of this island, which was then uninhabited, and his prayer was forthwith accorded by the Pacha, who also expressed his surprise at his moderation. The grant was confirmed by the Porte, and has remained unquestioned through subsequent political changes. The son of the original grantee has brought great part of the island into cultivation, and it now yields grain, wine, and figs in abundance, besides supporting four or five hundred head of sheep and goats. The lambs and the cheese of St. George are esteemed for their excellent quality, and in these and other produce the proprietor carries on an advantageous traffic with his native island.

This "Lord of the Isle" has a wife and a numerous family of children, so that his existence must be rather that of a patriarch than of a recluse. During the winter months, his opportunities of communicating with the mainland, or with the neighbouring islands, are very rare. In that season he inhabits a house which he has built in a sheltered situation on the east side of the island; during the summer, he takes up his quarters in a spacious-looking building on the highest point of it. Near to the latter is a very small chapel; and when we were off the island, with the aid of the glass, we could distinctly perceive the patriarch and his family passing from the chapel to the house, probably returning from the performance of his morning devotions. How much more pure and exalted must or may be the devotion of a man so situated than that of the inhabitant of a crowded city!

Agios Giorgios, by some of the commentators of Lord Byron, has been selected as the scene of the "Corsair." There are many points of the island from which Medora may be supposed to have gazed on the departing Conrad until "The tender blue of that large loving eye Grew frozen with its gaze on vacancy."

I should have treated as a "dreamer of dreams" any one who, fourteen years ago, might have told me that I should ever be a spectator of such ceremonies and scenes, and pass the day in the manner I have described at the foot of the Acropolis! . . . . . .

In the lecture-room I found M. Landerer, the royal professor of chemistry, surrounded by an attentive audience, composed of both middle-aged and young pupils, to whom he was delivering a lecture on mineralogy. He is a Bavarian, but is a perfect master of the language of the country, in which his lecture was delivered. I have thus heard an Englishman plead, an American preach, and a Bavarian lecture, in Greek, all apparently thoroughly versed in the delicacies of the language.

Sir Edgar's travels have not been wholly barren of purely original information, independently of the pleasure they convey as an every-day record. Here is an adventure that might raise Lord Monboddo from his grave, and which appears more marvellous than all the magic of Egypt:—

I must not omit to state, that at Heliopolis was exhibited to us an Arab boy of four or five years of age, to whom nature has been more liberal than to his fellows, having bestowed upon him a veritable Tail. It is placed in the precise spot where a tail ought to be, is about three inches long, and resembles the tail of a pig. If it grow with his growth, by the time he reaches manhood it will be a most inconvenient and extensive appendage. The boy is in all other respects well formed, and his countenance is more intelligent than that of most children of his race and age. I assure my readers that this Tale is veritable.

Egypt has ever been the land of marvels and prodigies.

Scott's Tour to Waterloo and Paris, in 1815.

Saunders & Otley. Pp. 284.

The volume is many years past date. Its author, the Laird of Gala, accompanied his eminent namesake, Sir Walter Scott, and some other friends and neighbours, in that journey to the Continent, immediately after the battle of Waterloo, and while the Allies were still in Paris, with which the world has been acquainted for upwards of twenty-five years, from Paul's Letters to his Kinsfolk. In those days, everything seen was fresh or wonderful to insular eyes. But if the interest of the realities have passed away, how much more that of the en passant descriptions of a tourist making no pretensions to the literary power or grace which can make much out of slender materials. The anecdotes and incidental notices of Scott, who by this time was in the zenith of his fame, will prove the most attractive part of the volume, and they are numerous. Scott, in short, is the pivot on which the narrative turns. A few of these anecdotes may serve as a specimen of a book which will be acceptable, at all events, to the old friends and neighbours of the author. At Mechlin, Mr. Scott, for the first time in his life, was present at the celebration of mass; and on going to the cathedral, Sir Walter remarked to him—"The officiating clergyman might possibly, at first sight, appear as if engaged in some nice process of cookery, rather than in a devotional exercise."

The spirit of Napoleon's soldiery is finely illustrated in the following anecdote:—

Some English friends, whom we met with in Brussels, had been resident during these days of peril, and described with horror the appearance of the wagon-loads of wounded men, who were brought in rapid succession from the field. But the doors of the inhabitants were invariably opened with the utmost readiness, and all were received without discrimination.

The enthusiasm of the French prisoners who were brought into the town was unshaken, and their ferocity unsubdued. They shouted "Vive l'Empereur" at the point of death, and declared they would do the whole work over again—that Napoleon would be in the Chateau de Lac immediately, and Brussels pillaged and burnt in a few hours.

The effects of war were painfully conspicuous as the tourists advanced into France; and the embittered and mortified feelings of the people were at least as remarkable as the outward signs of devastation, particularly on the line of march of the Prussians. In Paris, they were surprised at the number of caricatures to be seen of Napoleon and his friends. In the ballads sung in the streets, the Emperor was held up to contempt and ridicule; nor did the grotesque and awkward English, and their uncouth costumes, escape. One day, Mr. Scott and Sir Walter dined at a humble cabaret with M. Chevalier, the librarian of St. Genevieve, who gave them his notion of the sudden apparent tranquillity:—

M. Chevalier was somewhat of an alarmist, and could not believe that matters were by any means settled in Paris, notwithstanding the overwhelming power of the allies, and the ruined condition of France. The rage of party in the country, he considered it impossible to subdue.

"You English," said he, "have party feelings, which are no doubt sufficiently keen and constantly in action; but you have no idea of the extent to which they are carried with us. You publish placards, and you have processions and dinners, and you drink a great deal, and make long speeches—et vous dites, 'G—d d—n,' (thumping his fist on the table)—Sere—et 'G—d d—n encore,' —et voila tout. En France c'est different—bien—bien different."

In 1831, this great difference became pretty manifest; and may again, perhaps, before 1845. Fifteen years is a long interval in France. Notwithstanding the magnificent fêtes and charming balls given by the Duke of Wellington, and the other conquerors, Napoleon was not wholly forgotten. After a review of the Allied troops one day, Mr. Scott tells—

I observed in the hand of a lively young lady in the house, a bouquet of carnations, which she seemed to admire and arrange with much care and nicety. I said—"A ce que je crois, Mademoiselle, vous avez des fleurs dans ce joli bouquet là, que se trouvent dans le jardin de l'Empereur."—"Ah, oui, Monsieur," she replied, "et cela ne m' empeche pas de les admirer—elles sont des belles fleurs.—Je suis Française d'ailleurs." . . . . .

A little vaut rien had been detected calling out, "Vive l'Empereur;" on being pursued, he shouted it again—"Vive l'Empereur Alexandre."

One evening, at the opera, this diverting incident occurred—

The piece I saw was Figaro, which was well got up, although the ingenious valet himself appeared to me somewhat tame.

A Frenchman next me, who seemed very anxious to show off his knowledge of English, said, "He too old, et too cold." The effect of the music, however, was delightful, after what we had been accustomed to at most of the other theatres. It seemed also to give much satisfaction to the audience, which was extremely large and brilliant. The heat was excessive, and I was glad to leave the house as soon as possible after the conclusion of the opera. My neighbour, to whom I have alluded, seemed quite overpowered as well as myself, and said to me, rubbing his hands, "I am starving wid heat." Of course nothing was left for me but to assent to his observation. Shortly before I took my departure, his anxiety to display his acquirements in English, was explained by his putting into my hand a card of his terms as a teacher of our language, with a request for my patronage.

There is not much more in the volume requiring notice, save that Scott, the nearer he drew to Scotland and home, became the more gay and happy.

Imray's Cyclopædia of Popular Medicine. Intended for Domestic Use. Pp. 860. Simpkin, Marshall, & Co.

This is the work of a regularly educated and experienced physician, who avails himself of every resource of medical science in its present advanced state, without submitting to the trammels and mere conventionalities of his profession. It is no usual thing to find the Fellow of a Royal College of Physicians candidly confessing, while lamenting the fact, that medical skill is often baffled; and that the physician sometimes understands little more of the real causes, nature, and cure of many fatal diseases, than any uninstructed individual. Next to this honesty, as proofs of judgment and candour, we consider the importance which Dr. Imray uniformly attributes to what may be called simple and natural remedies and restoratives.

As Dr. Imray's Cyclopædia is not intended to instruct the profession, but to communicate popular information to private individuals, and form a work of reference for family use, no space is spent in theoretical speculation, or mere matters of debate or curiosity. The causes and symptoms of the various diseases are, in the first place, stated in plain and intelligible language; next the treatment is described, with such explanatory or cautionary remarks as are considered necessary, and then the doses of medicine to be given are accurately specified, so as to be seen at a glance in connexion with the general treatment. Not that the work is intended to supersede the regular practitioner, but to afford simple rules for the alleviation of diseases, and for the preservation of health, as often as circumstances or trivial derangement render it prudent to attend to small ailments, and inexpedient to summon the physician. The Cyclopædia, taken as a whole, contains a valuable body of popular medical information, without encouraging the temerity which would in any serious case dispense with proper advice, or fostering the more common error of flying to the doctor if "the finger does but ache."

The Life and Labours of Adam Clarke, LL.D. 8vo. With Portrait. Pp. 416. Longman & Co.

This volume bears no author's name. It contains in substance whatever was most interesting and popular in the Memoirs of Dr. Clarke, which appeared in three volumes shortly after his death; and which purported to be compiled, by a friend who had long known him, from his letters and journals, and to be revised by his sons. The present volume contains all that was essential in the former work, and much indeed to edify and to delight. The early part of Clarke's history, and his domestic life, is that which was both the most instructive and the most charming; and this is very fully detailed in the present volume. We do not know any piece of recent biography which we could more heartily recommend to the young, than the Life and Labours of Adam Clarke. In no man—no methodist minister—were warmth of heart and soberness of mind, strict religious principle and expansive charity, more happily blended. He must have been a rare methodist parson, who, born more than eighty years since, yet knowing what was in man, could judge and speak with tenderness and wise indulgence of Robert Burns; allow that Napoleon was a greater General than the Duke of Wellington, though the luck or chance went against him at last; and who could give this advice to a young preacher—"Acquaint yourself with British History. Read few sermons; they will do you little good. The lives of holy men will be profitable to you. Live in the Divine Life. Walk in the Divine Life. Live for the salvation of men." In the spirit of the above advice, we commend to young men this Life of Adam Clarke—of a "holy man"—as of more excellence than many volumes of even good sermons, or school theology.

Brief Notices of Hayti. By John Chandler. Ward.

The author of this little book appears to belong to the Society of Friends. In 1839, he made a missionary tour to Jamaica, accompanied by his wife. And every man going abroad, for the purpose of gathering information as to the social condition of the people he visits, ought, if possible, to be so companioned. All that Mr. Chandler witnessed in Jamaica, and the other islands which he visited, bore testimony to the complete success of the emancipation of the Blacks. The account of Hayti, where he spent some time, is composed in a plain, sensible, unaffected style; and contains many remarks and hints by which the Hayteans themselves might profit. The young Republic is still, as may well be imagined, very far from perfect in its institutions and government. In education, and in morals, (as regards the relations of the sexes,) the condition of Hayti is very low indeed. But the work of amelioration, in public affairs and in private conduct, is hopefully commenced. The priests are, as usual, busy for mischief; but the President is happily stronger than the priests; and he is an enlightened man. This little work is very well worth reading, both for its spirit, and the specific information which it contains.

Creoleana, or Social and Domestic Life in Barbadoes. By John Ordeson. Saunders & Otley.

A tale, written by a native of the West Indies, is made the vehicle of a description of what colonial life was sixty years since. It is homely enough; but evidently accurate and truthful in representation; and it is consequently possessed of more interest than many of those more ambitious attempts which depend only upon style and second-rate literary merit. The characters are felt to be literally taken from the life, and thus they please.

Essays for Summer Hours. By Charles Lanman.

We cannot guess how this American production has found its way to our table. The sketches, which are of the school which Washington Irving has rendered so popular, and which numbers many disciples both in the New and the Old World, are pleasingly written, and have all an excellent moral design.

Hart's Fancy-Work Book.

This is a little work adapted to the drawer or bag of every lady's work-table. The authoress teaches how all kinds of embroidery, bead-work, Berlin work, Chenille work, and so forth, are executed; all about patterns, and every variety of stitch; from cross-stitch to Gobelin stitch. In short, Mrs. Hart's book is the vade mecum of the embroideress, and the fabricator of tasteful fancy-works of cards, beads, &c., &c.

American Whites and Blacks. By E. S. Abdy, M.A., Fellow of Jesus College, Cambridge, Author of a Journal, &c., in the United States. Gilpin: London.

Mr. Abdy is beyond question the most fervent-minded friend of the blacks now in this country. He imagines that some of the most distinguished periodical publications of Germany betray a tone and tendency that would justify the suspicion of a systematic attempt to deceive the public mind on the subject of American slavery; and he accordingly takes up the cudgels to baffle this covert attempt, and plies them with vigour and right good-will, without respect of persons or authorities.

On the Use and Study of History. By W. Somers M'Cullagh, LL.B. Dublin: Machen. London: Longman.

This volume contains the substance of a course of lectures delivered in the Theatre of the Mechanics' Institution in Dublin. They are necessarily of a popular character; but they display both power and freedom of thought. The second lecture, What is history, and what is not history? and the fourth, How to read history, are deserving of particular commendation. The book may be read with advantage by young men everywhere; though one is not permitted to forget that the author is an Irishman.

Quæstiones Mosaicæ, or the Book of Genesis compared with the Remains of Ancient Religions. By Osmond de Beauvoir Priaulx. London: Bohn.

This is not a book for the many. It is the production of learned leisure; the ingenious speculation of a free inquirer, who imagines that in the multitude of commentators there has been anything rather than light or wisdom.

Elements of Astronomy. By Hugo Reid. Oliver & Boyd.

This is one of the best of Mr. Reid's useful elementary books; compendious and yet full; scientific and clear in arrangement. The treatise is illustrated by numerous diagrams and wood engravings of the heavenly bodies, very neatly executed, and will be found highly worthy of the attention of teachers, and of those who are endeavouring to instruct themselves in the most elevating of all the sciences.

A Few Words to Cadets, and other Young Persons, proceeding to India. By Henry Kerr, a retired Officer of the H. E. I. Company's Military Service, and formerly Commandant of Gentlemen Cadets in Fort-William, Calcutta. Second Edition. Allen & Co.

A useful manual for youths proceeding to India, among whom good advice is generally much wanted.

Works of the Honourable and Very Reverend William Herbert, Dean of Manchester, &c. &c. With Additions and Corrections by the Author. 2 volumes, octavo, cloth. London: Bohn.

The author of the works, of which the present is a new and corrected edition, has long enjoyed a high reputation, as an accomplished general scholar and an eminent critical linguist, besides his pretensions as an original poet, and as one more skilled in northern literature and antiquities than many of his contemporaries who have made this branch of knowledge a professional study. His translations of the relics of the Icelandic and Scandinavian poetry, have long been admired by all Gothic English readers for their fidelity and spirit. The present edition comprehends all these translations, as well as Mr. Herbert's original poems, with the exception of Attila, which appeared not long since in a separate volume of the same size with this edition. Three supplemental Books of that epic appear in this collection, and also the author's learned reviews; thus rendering the works complete, with the exception of certain treatises or essays on Botany and Natural History. Mr. Herbert's works are, however, not for the many, though a desirable addition to the stores of a scholar, and of every gentleman aspiring to form a library.

History of Christian Missions, from the Reformation to the present time. By James A. Huie. Oliver & Boyd.—An interesting epitome, compiled with pains and ability.

Lectures on Paley, or the Principles of Morality; designed for the use of Students in the University. London: Cadell.—A useful synopsis.

Lectures on Locke, or the Principles of Logic; designed for the use of Students in the University. London: Cadell.

Course of Civil Engineering, comprising Plane Trigonometry, Surveying, and Levelling, &c., &c., designed for the use of Engineering Colleges, Schools, Practical Engineers, and Land Proprietors. By John Gregory, Esq., Civil Engineer. Dublin: Machen. London: Simpkin, Marshall, & Co.; and Longmans.

The Religious History of Man, in which Religion and Superstition are traced from their source. By D. Morison. Second Edition. Smith & Elder.

Protestantism. Five Lectures delivered by John Gordon in Coventry. Whittaker & Co.

The Book of Thought. Bull: London.—This is a commonplace book, or selection of observations and passages on morals, manners, character, &c., &c. No compilation of the kind can be without merit; and this has its competent share of wisdom, philosophy, good plain sense, and also make-bulk, or book-making.

A Treatise on Fresco, Encaustic, and Tempera Painting: Being the substance of Lectures delivered at the Society of British Artists. By Eugenio Latilla.—This is a work for artists, but particularly for decorative artists, though persons intending to have their houses finished in the styles treated of, may receive useful hints from the perusal of the Lectures.

A Treatise on Land-Surveying and Levelling, &c., &c. By Henry James Castle, Surveyor and Civil Engineer, Lecturer on Practical Surveying and Levelling to King's College, London. Simpkin, Marshall, & Co.—This gentleman, feeling the want of an elementary treatise or class book for his pupils while a lecturer at King's College, compiled this work for their use; and he reasonably concludes that it may be found equally useful to those who are studying either land-surveying and levelling in other Institutions, or by themselves.

Manual of the Scottish Stocks and British Funds. By John Reid, Stockbroker. Fourth Edition.

NEW NOVELS AND ROMANCES.

Father Connell. By the O'Hara Family. 3 vols. London: T. C. Newby.

We deeply regret that Mr. Banim's latest, and, as it appears at a cursory glance, most perfect Irish story, has reached us at so late a period of the month, that we can, at present, do no more than herald its appearance, and inform the admirers of imaginative works, of the rich banquet that awaits them in this bright creation of original genius.

Trevor Hastings; or, the Battle of Tewkesbury. By the author of "Henry of Monmouth." 3 vols. Saunders & Otley.

This is an entertaining historical romance, which besides possesses the secondary advantage of forcing the students of the circulating library to know something of English history, and of historical personages, whether they will or not. The story shows one or two sturdy, and boldly-outlined, genuine English characters. We have read the romance with great pleasure. There is life and freshness in it.

Softness. By the Author of "Hardness." In 3 vols. Saunders & Otley.

The novel with this queer name, the symbol of a facile, good-natured young Baronet, as Hardness was that of a cross, harsh, obstinate old Earl, is one of those clever skimble-skamble narratives, which, without previous design, or much expense of thought, a man of lively talents, and general information, though of the superficial kind, who is conversant with the topics and the mixed society of the day, may put together in such a way as to be exceedingly amusing. One who has nothing else very pressing to do, will not think of laying the book down; but once read and laid down, few will think much about taking it up again. There are books which are like pleasant companions in a mail-coach, or at a table d'hôte. They serve to speed the hour agreeably, and that is praise enough. There is a very cleverly-sketched Irish servant of the old school of low comedy; but he becomes a bore from being too often obtruded. The tragic scenes have dramatic force; and the hero, the personification of Softness, is a higher and as truthful a conception, with much more to commend him to the sympathies of readers, than the rugged unnatural monster of the previous novel, Hardness.

NEW POEMS.

Of these, having run deeply into arrears, many volumes now lie before us. In endeavouring to render all the poets and versifiers whatever small measure of justice was in our power, we have unfortunately, by attempting too much, failed in everything; and must now be content with publishing little more than a catalogue of the latest additions to English verse.——Wordsworth claims the first place, if it be not too great a liberty to place him even at the head of the ordinary tuneful brotherhood.

Poems chiefly of Early and Late Years, including the Borderers, a Tragedy: By William Wordsworth. Moxon.—The far largest divisions of this new volume consist of poems of early date; but marked by the peculiarities and characteristics of the poet in the maturity of his genius. The first piece, Guilt and Sorrow, or Incidents upon Salisbury Plain, is a long desultory tale, which cannot take away, nor yet add much to the poetical reputation of the author of Ruth and Michael. The volume concludes with the Drama; which was composed, like the Tale, more than forty years since, and is now given to the world by the author, to spare his successors the task of deciding on its fate. It was never intended for the stage. It is without passion, and without action: a tranquil, though deep study of the human heart, in its most hidden weakness and perversity—those which are not suspected, even by itself, until the temptation and the hour bring into light all its hideousness. A series of short Poems and Sonnets, composed during a tour in Italy, and another series upon Death Punishments, many miscellaneous Sonnets, and a goodly number of occasional poems, fill up an ample and neat volume; which, besides, forms the VII. of the late edition of Wordsworth's Poetical Works. From the occasional poems, we select our specimens. Nor will their strength and beauty be their sole recommendation to Scotsmen.

AT THE GRAVE OF BURNS, 1803.

I SHIVER, Spirit fierce and bold,
At thought of what I now behold:
As vapours breathed from dungeons cold,
Strike pleasure dead,
So sadness comes from out the mould
Where Burns is laid.

And have I then thy bones so near,
And Thou forbidden to appear?—
As if it were thyself that's here,
I shrink with pain:
And both my wishes and my fear,
Alike are vain.

Off, weight—nor press on weight!—away
Dark thoughts!—they came, but not to stay;
With chastened feelings would I pay
The tribute due
To him, and aught that hides his clay
From mortal view.

Fresh as the flower, whose modest worth
He sang, his genius "glinted forth;"
Rose like a star that, touching earth,
For so it seems,
Doth glorify its humble birth
With matchless beams.

The piercing eye, the thoughtful brow,
The struggling heart, where be they now?—
Full soon the Aspirant of the plough,
The prompt, the brave,
Slept with the obscurest, in the low
And silent grave.

Well might I mourn that He was gone,
Whose light I hailed when first it shone;
When breaking forth, as Nature's own,
It showed my youth,
How verse may build a princely throne
On humble truth.

Alas! where'er the current tends,
Regret pursues, and with it blends,—
Huge Criffel's hoary top ascends,
By Skiddaw seen—
Neighbours we were, and loving friends
We might have been;—

True friends, though diversely inclined:
But heart with heart, and mind with mind,
Where the main fibres are entwined
Through Nature's skill,
May even by contraries be joined
More closely still.

The tear will start, and let it flow;
Thou "poor inhabitant below,"
At this dread moment—even so—
Might we together
Have sate and talked where gowans blow,
Or on wild heather.

. . . . . .

And oh, for Thee, by pitying grace,
Checked oftimes in a devious race,
May He who halloweth the place
Where man is laid
Receive thy spirit in the embrace
For which it prayed!

Sighing, I turned away; but ere
Night fell, I heard, or seemed to hear,
Music that sorrow comes not near—
A ritual hymn,
Chanted in love that casts out fear,
By Seraphim.

What follows is extracted from another poem, suggested by a visit made next day to the residence of Burns on the banks of Nith—to Ellisland farm-house :—

. . . . . .

Enough of sorrow, wreck and blight:
Think rather of those moments bright,
When to the consciousness of right,
His course was true,
When Wisdom prospered in his sight,
And Virtue grew.—

Yes, freely let our hearts expand,
Freely, as in youth's season bland,
When, side by side, his Book in hand,
We* wont to stray,
Our pleasure varying at command
Of each sweet day.

How oft inspired must he have trode
These pathways, yon far stretching road;
There lurks his home; in that abode,
With mirth elate,
Or in his nobly pensive mood,
The Rustic sate.

Proud thoughts that image overawes,
Before it humbly let us pause,
And ask of Nature from what cause,
And by what rules,
She trained her Burns to win applause
That shames the Schools.

Through busiest streets, and loneliest glen
Are felt the flashes of his pen;
He rules 'mid winter snows, and when
Bees fill their hives,
Deep in the general heart of men
His power survives.

. . . . . .

Sweet Mercy! to the gates of Heaven
This minstrel lead, his sins forgiven;
The rueful conflict, the heart riven
With vain endeavour,
And memory of Earth's bitter leaven
Effaced for ever.

But why to him confine the prayer,
When kindred thoughts and yearnings bear
On the frail heart, the purest share
With all that live?—
The best of what we do and are,
Just God, forgive!

For a pathetic passage referring to Scott's last melancholy days, and to the poet himself, which we had marked out, we find that there is no space left. It occurs in the poem entitled Musings near Aquapendente.

* In this pilgrimage Wordsworth was accompanied by his sister.

Poems—Legendary, Lyrical, and Descriptive. By David Vedder. Edinburgh Printing Company. Cloth. Pp. 372.

It gives us much pleasure to meet the scatterlings of one of the most popular of our living Scottish bards at last collected in a form worthy of them; and, with all the external accomplishments of typography, binding, and embellishment, laid at the feet of her Majesty, Queen Victoria, by one of the most loyal of her servants. So many of the poems have, within the last ten years, graced our own pages, that it might seem a kind of reflected egotism, or indirect compliment to our own taste and discrimination, now to sit down gravely to give Vedder's poems the praise we consider due. The task of criticism we accordingly leave to judges who may be presumed more impartial; contented with announcing and describing the work. The illustrations, by W. Geikie, a native artist of very great merit, are worthy of the work. We believe it is as a sentimental and descriptive poet that Mr. Vedder is best known. His forte, however, is humour; in proof of which, we select as a specimen of the new wares of the volume, The Street Auctioneer—a piece admirably illustrated by Geikie.

Come, crowd around the stair, gude fowk,
Ye'll get your fortunes mended;
For here's a weel-seleckit stock,
An' keen am I to vend it.—
See! here's a shawl for twa pound three—
Ye'll ablins think I'm boastin';
As gude as e'er cam ower the sea,
Frae Persia or Hindostan!
"A half-crown for't."—Are ye done?
I'm ruin'd—Goin'! goin'! gone!

Here's siller-mounted specs for age,
Frae Lon'on new come down;
For purblindism's a' the rage
Wi' half the fops in town;
An' youthfu' ladies sport them too—
It makes them look quite knowin'.
"A sixpence for them."—Thanks to you;
Agoin'! goin'! goin'!
"Another penny."——Are ye done?
I'm harried:—goin'! goin'! gone!

. . . . . .

Here's fifty yards o' Brussels lace,
Brought hame by Skipper Saunders;
He stowed it in a canny place,
When he came ower frae Flanders;
It's worth a guinea ilka yard,
'Twad been a glorious seizure;
But trade is dull, an' times are hard,
I'll gie you't at your pleasure.
"Five"—"ten"—"twall"—"fifteen"—"twenty-one."
I'll flee the kintra':—goin'! gone!

Scraps from the Knapsack of a Soldier, consisting of Brevities in Verse. By Calder Campbell; Author of the "Palmer's Last Lesson," "Lays of the East," &c., &c.

Following the laudable custom which this season seems in vogue among the poets, Major Campbell, besides publishing a good many new pieces, has collected his fugitive verses, scattered through magazines and annuals, into a neat small tome, and inscribed it to Leigh Hunt. There is nothing in the collection demanding any particular notice, as the character of his compositions is generally known to the readers of contemporary poetry. Flowing and graceful, and more distinguished by sweetness and amenity, and a gentle enthusiasm, than by fire or passion, his effusions, without startling or captivating at first sight, steal quietly into congenial hearts; and without awakening any vehement emotion, are treasured and brooded over. We might easily find a more ambitious specimen of the new pieces in the volume, but none which, for various good reasons, is, we believe, likely to be more generally admired than this

SONNET TO LEIGH HUNT.

Thy heart is young, it never can grow old,
For Love's kind dew still keeps it fresh and rife
With pleasant leafiness, which no strife
Hath ever stained, no cruel craft made cold!
—To feel the BEAUTIFUL and turn to gold,
The very dross of nature, through thy life
Hath been thy fond employ: and sorrow's knife
Hath vainly tried, by gnashings manifold,
To sever thy true heart from gentleness
Towards all mankind! I doubt thee not—I know
Thy nature, and I know it not the less
That we have seldom met. The sunny flow
Of truth and love is mantling round thee there,
In thine own home, midst books and fancies fair.

A RECORD OF THE PYRAMIDS. By John Edmund Reade.—There is a singleness and strength of purpose, an earnestness of perseverance about this gentleman,—which, in spite of the coldness, indifference, or the unwise contempt of the public and the critics, enables him to steer right onward,—and which commands respect. His New Dramatic Poem, the Record of the Pyramids, we should imagine likely to be not a whit more popular than his Italy. Whatever he has written, betokens, at least, an earnest and a cultivated mind, devoted to poetry. Having dedicated Italy to Sir Robert Peel out of office, Mr. Reade now inscribes the Pyramids to the same gentleman in office; and for this diverting reason, that both Peel and the Pyramids occupy a "transcendent position," and that Sir Robert, like the Pyramids, remains in character "unchanged and unshaken, through every reverse of fortune." We would not have our readers judge of the work by the dedication,—of the poetry by the logic.

LAUDATE PUERI DOMINUM, HYMNS FOR MY CHILDREN. By T. H., Esq.—These are elegant compositions in verse, by a pious Roman Catholic. The volume is almost overdone with pretty embellishments, savouring mightily of "Papistry." Though it contains many beautiful and touching lessons and precepts, it may not be, in all respects, fit to be placed in the hands of Protestant children; but this we leave to their religious instructors.

GISIPPUS, or THE FORGOTTEN FRIEND; A Play, in Five Acts. By Gerald Griffin, Author of the Collegians, &c. London: Maxwell & Co.—This play, written when the author was very young, and before any of his Tales, has had ill-luck, first and last, with theatrical managers. Mr. Macready, the patron of the classic drama, has now, however, pronounced a "decided opinion in its favour," which we hope the public voice may confirm. It is certainly a remarkable production for a youth of twenty.

SONGS OF THE SWORD. By Andrea Ferrara, junior. Vincent: Oxford.—The younger Andrea lays lustily about him; his themes are heroes, war, chivalry, and the SWORD. The verses abound in life and spirit.

TRANSLATIONS FROM THE GERMAN. By Henry Reeve and John Edward Taylor.—A few of the gems of Jean Paul, Goëthe, Novalis, and other of the more eminent German imaginative writers are translated into elegant English, and form a charming little volume.

I WATCHED THE HEAVENS; A Poem. By V., Author of IX. Poems.—This is a production of some mark and likelihood; a poem in the Spenserian stanza, and of the school of Shelly, without the objectionable tendency which his poetry is imagined by some to possess.

POEMS FROM EASTERN SOURCES; THE STEADFAST PRINCE, and Other Poems. By Richard Chenevix Trench.

POEMS, to which is added BELMOUR HOUSE—a Play not divided into Acts. By G. K. Mathews.—A queer rigmarole production.

THE BATH SUBSCRIPTION BALL.—A ditto, ditto to the above.

CONSCIENCE. An Essay in blank verse.

THE LOT OF MORTALITY, and Other POEMS. By the Rev. Adam Nelson, M.A.

HYMNS. By Thomas Harit.

SELECT POETRY FOR CHILDREN. By Joseph Payne.—A nice little book.

SOLITUDE, A POEM; with Other POEMS. By George Wingfield, Esq. Saunders & Otley.

SCENES of JOY and WOE. By Evan Rhyse.

PAMPHLETS.

The DIFFUSION of POLITICAL KNOWLEDGE among the WORKING CLASSES. An address delivered before the members of the Bradford Reform Club. By Samuel Smiles, M.D.—The time has not long gone by when it was dangerous to teach working-men to read or write. What use had labourers for more knowledge than their pastor conveyed to them on Sundays, save to make them discontented with their condition, and disrespectful to their superiors? The same prejudice which then existed against giving education of any sort to the people, still exists against their making politics, to them a most important branch of morals, the subject of their studies. But it too must give way. The people are educating themselves in politics, as in other departments of knowledge; and Dr. Smiles is among the best of their assistants. His Address embodies many of those enlightened yet sober views which should guide the people in their onward progress.

FRANKHAM'S DISCOURSE ON THE ENLARGED AND PENDULOUS ABDOMEN, WITH CURSORY OBSERVATIONS FOR THE USE OF THE DYSPEPTIC. Second Edition. AUGMENTED BY A DISSERTATION ON GOUT. Longman & Co.—We thought well of this work on its first appearance, and certainly do not consider it deteriorated by the additional matter. All that we need now say is, that the entire treatise may be studied with advantage by those "with fair round belly with good capon lined," but will be of very little use at present to the Paisley weavers.

THOUGHTS on the RELATIVE VALUE of FRESCO and OIL PAINTING, as applied to the ARCHITECTURAL DECORATIONS of the HOUSES of PARLIAMENT. By B. R. Haydon.—Mr. Haydon's opinions on this subject are already well known. The Thoughts are the substance, or probably the entire body, of a discourse lately read by him at a meeting of the Royal Institution, Albemarle Street. It is to be hoped that his suggestions and exhortations may have some effect in the proper quarter.

"NO POPERY," the CRY EXAMINED.—The spirit of this pamphlet is contained in the following sentence from Dr. Price, which forms its motto,—"The essential spirit of Popery has been retained under a Protestant name; and the consequence has been distraction to the state, and formality and worldly-mindedness to the church."

HINTS ILLUSTRATIVE of the DUTY of DISSENT. By the Rev. Thomas Binney.

LORD BROUGHAM'S SPEECH on the INCOME TAX; delivered in the House of Lords, March 17th. Hooper: London.

REMARKS ON PREVAILING ERRORS RESPECTING CURRENCY AND BANKING.

PLAN OF ECONOMY FOR GOVERNMENT, FARMING, MANUFACTURES, AND TRADE.

A LETTER TO GEORGE COMBE ON THE SUBJECT OF HIS ESSAY ON THE CONSTITUTION OF MAN. By one of the People.

PRINCIPLES OF MONEY, WITH THEIR APPLICATION TO THE REFORM OF THE CURRENCY AND BANKING, AND TO THE RELIEF OF FINANCIAL DIFFICULTIES. By John Wade.

THE REBEL PROVOST, OR THE TWO CITIZENS. By Argus.

SPEECH OF CORNELIUS MATHEWS ON INTERNATIONAL COPYRIGHT. Delivered at the Dinner given in New York to Mr. Charles Dickens.—The toast which this speech preluded will explain its object. "An International Copyright:—The only honest turnpike between the readers of two great nations!"

SERIAL WORKS.

BLACKWOOD'S STANDARD NOVELS.—GALT'S WORKS.—We notice with much pleasure, that, in a re-issue of a series of popular novels, the publishers have commenced BLACKWOOD'S STANDARD NOVELS with the fictions of GALT. It seems not a little strange, but such we believe is the fact, that for a number of years a Scotchman could not have procured a copy of the Annals of the Parish, the Ayrshire Legatees, or The Provost, in all Britain, for love or money. He might have been more fortunate in America. What the cause of obstruction might be, we do not pretend to guess; but we trust that it was anything save the deadness or indifference of the public to those genial and racy fictions, which stamp Galt as the true De Foe of Scotland. In their own place, his stories are as purely national in costume, and as catholic in spirit as are Don Quixote, Tom Jones, or Old Mortality. How much will Scotland have lost of all that is finest in the national character, before the time shall come when Galt's stories can no longer be understood and relished! But this is to contemplate an impossibility; to dream of a period in which Burns and Scott, and the language in which their writings are embalmed, have been forgotten. The unrivalled, in his own walk, and unique merits of Galt as a fictionist were at once acknowledged by his contemporaries, though they have never yet, in our opinion, been sufficiently appreciated. It therefore gives us great satisfaction to find that this cheap and neat edition of the best of his works may give the world another opportunity of judging of his claims, and perceiving his beauties. His friend, Dr. Moir of Musselburgh, (Delta,) has prefixed a memoir to the stories, written in a spirit which entitles him to the grateful regards of the admirers of Galt's genius. The biography is, on the whole, a painful record—for when was the history of genius all felicitous?—but it is not without instruction; nor is our pity our tender commiseration the less due, that many of the difficulties with which Galt was doomed to struggle in his later years were partly attributable to his own imprudence.

Besides the best of Galt's novels, this new series already comprehends Mr. Lockhart's Valerius, a classic and beautiful work; and the more-popular-in-its-day Tom Cringle's Log. It is exceedingly neat as a work, besides its more sterling merits.

THE ABBOTSFORD EDITION OF THE WAVERLEY NOVELS. Part I.—In this Pictorial Edition of the Waverley Novels, we hail Scott's proudest monument. It is one not confined to his native city, nor to any locality, but raised in a form that makes it fit to be included among every man's household treasures. It is intended that the Abbotsford Edition shall comprehend whatever is connected with the personal history of Scott and his friends that can enrich and embellish his fictions,—such as family and historical portraits; fac-similes of hand-writings, landscapes, architectural designs, and the many objects of art or of antiquarian interest—weapons, old armour, and the "fouth of auld nicknackets," which he had accumulated at Abbotsford. The Part before us contains Scott's general preface to the first collected edition of his Works, to what he called the Magnum Opus; and fragments or detached passages of hints and studies for Waverley and other Works, together with the first five chapters of that romance. The Part is profusely embellished. The frontispiece is a well-executed steel engraving by William Miller, of Edinburgh, of a view of the Vale of Menteith, the mountains of the Trosachs in the distance; and each section and chapter has appropriate head and tail-pieces. None of them is more interesting than Scott's comfortable modern easy-chair, over which is thrown his shepherd's maud; and by which lie his walking-stick, his strong shoes, and gaiters, as if placed in readiness for his daily ramble through his moors and young plantations. The most eminent British artists have deemed themselves honoured in contributing to the beauty and perfection of this edition, and in having their names associated with it; and original portraits and every kind of relic pours in so freely from old Scottish families, that the difficulty will be what to select.

MARTIN DOYLE'S CYCLOPÆDIA OF PRACTICAL HUSBANDRY AND RURAL AFFAIRS. Part I.—A second and augmented edition of this work is appearing in Parts. We presume that its utility as a manual is not a whit impaired by the lively manner in which it is written.

KNIGHT'S PICTORIAL SHAKSPERE. Part XLIII.—This Part is occupied with an account of the plays ascribed to Shakspere, namely, Locrine, Sir John Oldcastle, The Puritan, The Life and Death of Lord Thomas Cromwell, The London Prodigal, and A Yorkshire Tragedy. Specimens are given from the best of these dramas. Mr. Knight concludes that none of them could have been written by Shakspere; and on all questions regarding Shakspere, his opinion is entitled to the utmost deference.

ENGLAND IN THE NINETEENTH CENTURY. Part V. Northern Division: Lancashire. Part V. Southern Division: Cornwall.—County and family history, old stories and traditions, and a lively personal narrative of the adventures met with while in quest of them, render this a delightful work, independently of its embellishments, which are appropriate, fine, and numerous.

WINKLE'S CATHEDRALS.—This elegant work is now completed by the publication of the 56th Part. It must long keep an honoured place among those works in which Art becomes the graceful handmaiden and the popular minister to national feeling, and venerable antiquity.

LE KEUX'S MEMORIALS OF CAMBRIDGE, Parts 26, 27, 28.—These Parts contain numerous views of Jesus College and St. Peter's College, with the usual historical and descriptive accounts of the buildings, from the pen of Thomas Wright, Esq., and the Rev. H. Longueville Jones,—both of Cambridge.

ELEMENTS OF ELECTRO-METALLURGY; OR, THE ART OF WORKING IN METALS. By Alfred Smeer, F.R.S. Second Edition. Parts I. and II.

ELEMENTARY PERSPECTIVE, DIVESTED OF TECHNICALITIES. By T. J. Rawlins, Professor of Drawing and Perspective.

FACTS AND FIGURES. Nos. VIII. and IX.

CHAMBERS'S INFORMATION FOR THE PEOPLE. Part XVII. Arithmetic, Geometry, &c.

CHRISTIAN MISCELLANY. Part IV.

THORNTON'S HISTORY OF THE BRITISH EMPIRE IN INDIA. Vol. III. Part I.

INQUIRY INTO THE PRINCIPLES OF POLITICAL JUSTICE, AND ITS INFLUENCE ON MORALS AND HAPPINESS. By William Godwin. Part I.

THE YEAR BOOK of FACTS for 1842; with a Portrait of the late Dr. Birkbeck. Pp. 288. Tilt & Bogue.

CUMMING'S FOXE'S BOOK of MARTYRS. PART XII. With a portrait of Bishop Ferrars, and other embellishments, scenic, and of costumes.

THE BRITISH MINSTREL, and MUSICAL and LITERARY MISCELLANY.—This is a new Glasgow publication, very neatly got up. It contains in each penny number, one good popular song with the music. We say good, at least for the three that we have seen. The rest of the pages are occupied with anecdotes and facts connected with Music, extracted from books.

THE PRACTICAL MECHANIC and ENGINEER'S MAGAZINE. FIRST HALF-VOLUME.—This scientific journal is published in Glasgow, an appropriate locality for such a work. It is conducted with ability and spirit, and will, we hope, meet with the encouragement which it deserves.

ANNUAL of the GRAND CALEDONIAN CURLING CLUB, for 1842.—This is a report of the meetings of all the Curling Clubs in the world, we presume, that were held during the last year; and also of numerous recent Curling Matches.

PICTURES of POPULAR PEOPLE; or, ILLUSTRATIONS of HUMAN NATURE. By the author of "Random Recollections." No. I.—Sketches of this sort demand a lighter and more dashing pencil than that of the author of "Random Recollections;" yet the Marriageable Man is not amiss: and all the articles will find admirers. It is a happy provision of nature, that every author finds his own public; the great difference being, that genius has the power to create a public for itself.

MAP OF AFFGHANISTAN, CABUL, THE PUNJAUB, RAJPOOTANAH, AND THE RIVER INDUS. By James Wyld, Geographer to the Queen and Prince Albert.—Past and coming events will make this map, which is upon a rather large scale, of general interest both at home and in India.

PORTRAIT OF LORD BROUGHAM.—A young Artist of this city, named Grierson, has just engraved and published a Portrait of Lord Brougham, which makes, at all events, the most agreeable likeness we have yet seen of his Lordship. It is well executed in mezzotint; the plate about 10¼ inches by 9. It will be a desirable and welcome acquisition to the numerous admirers of the illustrious original.

POSTSCRIPT POLITICAL.

IT is to be feared that the prayer for Sir Robert Peel, put up by certain "respectable inhabitants of Kidderminister," is not all at once to be answered. "The path he has so gloriously entered upon," is now pretty well defined. He is a triumphant party minister. No Tory dares gainsay, and no Whig cares effectually to oppose him on any point of vital importance to the People. Yet "the sun of prosperity, through his means, under Divine Providence," has not yet risen, though we are assured it is "to rise upon Old England." His Sliding Scale is the law of the land; and already he boasts that the tax on Corn has fallen from 27 to 13 shillings a quarter. Let not the landlords, however, be uneasy,—while, short of absolute famine, 13 shillings is as available for a prohibitory duty as 36, and while no man finds any abatement in his baker's bill. The Council of the Anti-Corn-Law League seem to place no more faith in the new Sliding Scale, than in those alterations in the Tariff which relate to provisions. Nor for a gradual reduction of prices,—which, in the natural course of things must take place, unless there should be a succession of bad seasons unprecedented in the history of the world,—will they give to Sir Robert's Tariff the thanks due to a bountiful Providence. But Sir Robert has carried his new shape of Corn Monopoly; as he will carry his Tariff in substance, and his Income-Tax unmitigated. And what have the great body of the people gained by these wondrous measures? The promise of some shadowy advantage that may at some future time arise from some of the alterations in the Tariff; and the Ministers' declaration in favour of Free Trade, which The Spectator reckons as important as the Tariff itself, and in so doing probably rates both at their true value. Sir Robert is an admirer of the principle of Free Trade,—of Free Trade in the abstract. Well, this is something. Neither Lord John Russell, nor yet Mr. Macaulay, have got the length of admiring extension of the Suffrage, even in the abstract.

With the exception of Sir Robert Peel's triumphant procedure, there has been little done in Parliament worthy of much attention. Mr. Sharman Crawford's praiseworthy attempt gave a few honest men an opportunity of recording their opinions; and demonstrated how far exactly the Whig party will go—which is just no length at all. Mr. Roebuck's cleverly managed coup-de-theatre, which took the House nearly as much by surprise—at being found out—as Lord Castlereagh's memorable declaration of its corruption being "notorious as the sun at noon-day," did not in the least astonish the people, who have long been perfectly aware of the existence of such disreputable facts as those disclosed. The candour of Lord Palmerston, and Mr. Duncombe's ironical motion, the more cutting for its truth, tell strongly in Parliament; but are no news to the three millions of Chartists, and to the thrice three millions of the English, Irish, and Scotch people, who view the House of Commons as at present constituted with little more respect or confidence than the Chartists themselves do ; and place very little faith or hope either in Mr. Roebuck's Committee, or any other Committee ; or in Lord John Russell's Bribery Bill, or any other Bribery Bill. To put a stop to bribery by act of Parliament, to any effectual extent, is, in the present state of the constituencies, about as idle as an attempt to prevent seduction by a Bishop's bill. The Chartists better understand the vice and the remedy, when they say, " Reform it altogether" by granting such an extension of the suffrage as we crave.

It is with an ill grace, and some appearance of inconsistency, to say nothing of the injudiciousness of such a line of conduct, that some Radical members and journalists attempt to throw discredit and ridicule upon the judgment and the tactics of the Chartists, while professing to concur in their objects, and praising the purity of their motives. Sir Robert Peel and Lord John Russell, who might be coupled in a leash here, and who would walk together lovingly, must have been peculiarly indebted to Mr. Roebuck for furnishing them with those weapons of attack on the Chartists, which they did not fail to employ. The Chartist Petition, whatever be its defects, was treated far too cavalierly by Mr. Roebuck. The document was entitled to more respect, not only as emanating from a body of people, august were it but for their numbers, their sufferings, and their singular forbearance, and also for the great truths it embodies, and which vastly preponderate over what is erroneous and equivocal. No man has a right to taunt the working-classes with the ill selection of their leaders, and make this an argument against their fitness to exercise the franchise, unless he can at the same time show that a better choice was in their power, and rejected; and that they choose their leaders worse than many enlightened bodies, enjoying the franchise, do representatives to Parliament. If the choice of leaders were the test of the People's intelligence, this were an argument for disfranchising two-thirds of the present Electors. But the Chartists have no choice in their power. Like other men in similar emergencies, they take the best instruments they can obtain for their immediate purpose. Their confidence may sometimes be unworthily bestowed ; but it is placed in men who sympathize with them, and who have, or affect to have, a community of interests and objects. And when have the people ever either acted ungratefully to their real friends, or rejected, as guides and leaders, men of ability, integrity, and moral weight, who were willing to act with them, and for them ? Again, the means by which they pursue their objects are severely censured by those who never once condescend to point out what better means they might adopt. Are they to be blamed for not submitting to be made the tools of a party, or even for interfering with party arrangements,—for creating a sensation where they despair of producing a moral conviction. The success of Joseph Sturge, single-handed, and in a few months, shows what may be done among the intelligent people—among the Chartists, by those on whose integrity they can rely, and who go those lengths in reform, short of which they can have no hope of any permanent improvement in their social condition. And this is their great object, as in reason it ought to be. Along with censure and reproach, we should like, at all times, to see practical suggestions for better plans of organization, and wiser, though equally energetic modes of pursuing their ends.

Disheartening as is the political aspect of the times, and dark and dismaying as are the domestic prospects of the country, there are a few insulated facts, which, viewing them also as indications, afford ground of gratulation. The most eminent is the spontaneous choice of Mr. Hume, by the Montrose Burghs, (though to the disturbance of certain well-understood Whig arrangements;) and a sincerity in the pursuit of real reform, now evinced by many of the adherents of the late Whig Government, which leaves it, as an Opposition, very far behind. Of an organized Parliamentary Liberal Opposition, so far as the mere Whigs are concerned, there is indeed no appearance. On party measures, or finance questions,—as whether it shall be by a modified Sliding Scale, or a fixed duty of eight shillings, that the People's food shall be taxed ; whether timber or sugar be the fairer subject of taxation, there is diversity, or pretended diversity, of opinion ; but on every fundamental principle,—on everything bearing on those organic changes which Reformers consider vital and essential, there is the greatest harmony. In opposing the prayer of the Chartists' Petition, the Whig and the Tory Leader marched hand in hand, like the united Majesties of Brentford, frowningly. In past times the Whig leaders might have urged that the People should be heard for their distress, if not on the ground of their fancied rights ; but now they can be heard in the House of their Representatives upon no plea whatever. Mr. Roebuck is so unfortunate as an advocate, that in pleading that their prayer to be heard should be granted, he makes out, to the satisfaction of Sir Robert and Lord John, a case why it should not be heard.

Another, and the last of Sir Robert Peel's great trials, is approaching, in the attempt to continue the Whig Poor Law. The Home-Secretary has officially assumed the odium of announcing its continuance. After considerable bluster, honest and hypocritical, it will, by the aid of the Whigs, be carried, and, in fact, more firmly fixed upon the country than ever; never to be shaken off, until some of the principles found in the Chartist Petition are not only discussed, but the law of the land. Having in a few months bestowed upon the People the blessing of a new Bread-Tax, a Poor-Law of which every one admits the extreme harshness, and an oppressive and odious Income-Tax, nothing more remains to be done to render Sir Robert's first Session memorable and illustrious, save the vigorous prosecution, upon a grander scale, of two expensive wars in the East,—wars which few venture to justify in their commencement, either from policy or principle, and which surely will not improve in character, when, from unwise, aggressive, and wasteful, they shall also become merciless and vengeful. The moral sense of the nation will, we trust, be strongly expressed upon this matter, whatever is sanctioned by the Parliament.

THE NATIONAL DISTRESS.

Has Sir Robert Peel, when looking round on the unparalleled distress which surrounds him, the leisure and the courage to ask, Where is all this to end? to inquire if the present is one of those ordinary periods of distress which, from time to time, occur in the history of every ill-governed country; and of which the symptoms, after they have reached a certain height, gradually mitigate and finally disappear, to be succeeded in a few years by another and another of those periodical visitations which are tacitly charged against Providence, and never imputed to the true cause, namely, to the ignorance, blindness, and selfishness of those who claim, as of divine right, to administer the affairs of the world for their own advantage? Is it this temporary visitation, or is the present distress of a more inveterate and permanent character?

The universal and dreadful suffering which at presents pervades the country, which is felt by the great body of the labouring classes in the extreme of privation, and among too many of them in actual starvation,—and by the middle orders either in diminution of capital, narrowed means, bankruptcy, or complete ruin; has this character to distinguish it from former periods of national distress, that its advances have been insidious, and gradual, but steady. Often checked and repulsed by the enterprise and energies of science, capital, and industry, it has yet, during twenty-five years of peace, been gaining ground, until now that the floods surround us, and leave but little hope of escape. Do the men who assume to guide the destinies of this falling country, really believe that, acting upon their present system, trade and commerce will again revive and reach their former degree of prosperity; or even the state when from time to time they flourished, in spite of bad legislation, through their native strength?—or have the reflecting part of the governing class quietly made up their minds to see England by an accelerated movement, now fairly begun, sink into a second or a third-rate state, consisting of a few overgrown landed-proprietors and monied men, co-existing with a miserable population; without a middle order, entirely without manufactures, and with only a scanty, precarious, colonial commerce, suffering gradual decay and final extinction;—into, in short, a Genoa, a Venice, or, at best, a Holland? For this result those of the aristocracy must be prepared, who, being at all capable of reflection and forethought, yet cling to that pernicious and damning policy which has effectually crippled, and which, if persisted in, must shortly destroy the best resources of the country. Of the effects of that fatal policy, the much canvassed measures just carried by Sir Robert Peel, while they inflict considerable suffering upon individuals of the middle class, can prove at best but a temporary alleviation. And, indeed, altogether the effect of his measures is doubtful. The best that can be affirmed, is, that the changes in the Tariff, if they should do little good, can do no great harm. No man, not even the author of these changes, dares flatter himself that such petty alterations are speedily to repair the wide-spread calamities of even the last season; when distress has grown to so fearful a height, that even the wise and the courageous shrink from looking it in the face; and well-meaning humane persons, of limited understanding, are left to propose foolish or desperate temporary expedients. The causes of national decay, to be followed, it is but too probable, by social, and, not improbably, by violent disorganization, have been much longer at work than appears to be generally suspected. The ultimate consequences of unwise laws, and grinding taxation, with their concomitant undermining effects, have from time to time been lost sight of in the glare shed by a fallacious momentary prosperity. But even those intermissions have become so rare that people begin to despair of their ever returning again. They may and must still occur, those seasons of mitigation, once and again; Sir Robert Peel may reach the end of his power or of his life, and receive the congratulations of the country upon the happy effects of his policy; and yet while the present system is maintained, there can be nothing stable and safe, certainly nothing happy in the condition of a people, where the only alternation known to the industrious classes are whole starving or half starving, low wages with provisions kept by iniquitous legislation at a monopoly price, or half employment eked out by the dole of voluntary or extorted charity. Such at best are the future prospects of English industry under the Corn-laws and the Parliaments which maintain them. At present we hear of people living—but this is an abuse of the word—of skilful and industrious men languishing and dying upon 8½d. a-week. These things are openly stated in Parliament; and are not attempted to be denied by those who are, to a very great extent, the authors of the misery complained of; and who affect, forsooth, to pity the consequences of their own cruel injustice, while they obdurately refuse to redress the evils they have inflicted.

But times may mend, may become prosperous, and the weekly earnings of industry may increase to twice, or thrice, or ten times 8½d., and hunger not be so extreme as at present among the population—the "surplus population,"—how significant a phrase is that!—and yet the condition of the people in those happy, prospective periods may still require amelioration. Hitherto they have demanded but bare justice: that their industry should be unfettered; that they should be permitted to labour, and to exchange the fruits of their labour for their own advantage, and according to their own judgment, ever the most enlightened guide in every man's personal affairs; that they should have some voice in the direction of their own affairs, and some fair share of control in the distribution of the common stock to which they contribute in by far the largest proportions. These demands appear reasonable enough at any time, when quietly made; but at this time when, for want of what they pray for—for want of free trade, of an equal participation of common rights, they say that they perish, with what grace, waving the question of justice, are their prayers refused?—nay, even the poor boon of inquiry into their distress, which, though it could not improve their condition, might soothe their feelings. What a strange, blunt, and yet two-edged argument did the Duke of Wellington use when refusing the inquiry which Lord Kinnard urged into the causes of the distress! A Parliamentary inquiry might make the people flatter themselves that some idea was entertained of repealing the Bread-tax, with the hope of their sufferings being mitigated by the revival of trade; and his Grace was therefore too honest, too straightforward, to countenance any such fallacious notion. He would stick by the Bread-tax; and really, as he very truly if cavalierly intimated, what could it signify to the people what the price of wheat was, when they had no money to buy bread! The Duke of Wellington, and those of his order who betray their callous feelings by sallies and inadvertencies of this sort, have surely no proper idea of the exasperated state of the public mind. They may be taught a lesson by and by! The rebellion of free opinion they have long defied and affected to despise; but "the rebellion of the belly" is a matter more urgent. The same mental power and activity which enables a man to form an enlightened opinion upon his own condition, and his political and social wants, restrains his conduct, and ties him down to the use of peaceful means to carry his objects; but blind hunger owns no such restraint. There is nothing doubtful, nothing abstract about its conclusions. It admits of no difference of opinion, and it commands universal sympathy. If the police at Ennis did rashly fire upon a mob actuated by the natural impulse of hunger, all the rest of the world sympathize with, and endeavour to soothe those starving people. And what military or body of police could long be depended upon to suppress any outrage which was perpetrated to feed famishing women and children; or to prevent food from being taken from the country in which it had been raised, and torn, as it were, from between the teeth of the starving people whose industry had produced it? The great landlords, absentees or resident, may indeed go without their rents, the rights of property may be invaded, or the county rates may be burdened to make good the spoliation; but hunger is a keen feeler, a bad reasoner, and no political economist at all. But if the premonitory scenes that have been witnessed in Wexford, Ennis, Galway, and in different parts of England, should become general,—if the example should spread with the cause, what in the next winter have we to look for? The bounty of Heaven gives promise of a plentiful crop; but as the Duke of Wellington, a very Job's comforter, pertinently observed, what is the good of cheap bread to those who have no money to buy bread? And where are they to get money, to get the employment, which—and not the most liberal contributions of charity, the most urgent of Queen's begging letters—can effectually help them even for one short week? Last autumn it was hoped that, with the winter, trade would revive. Then the dead season was allowed to elapse; but in spring business would surely revive. The hope is again deferred; the heart is sick; for there is no rational ground of hope of any general or effectual resuscitation, unless from causes which it seems vain longer to talk about.

It is with heart-rending grief, and almost dismay and despair, that one now opens the provincial papers; and especially those of the districts where the signs of manufacturing and commercial activity and prosperity were in former times the most visible. Famine—or Famine prices in Ireland, in a country which Heaven has blessed with an exuberant fruitfulness—is unhappily of no rare occurrence, though at present it aggravates the sufferings of England and Scotland; but putting Ireland out of view, over what an appalling field of human misery may the eye of the statesman range in England! From the numerous reports which we have within a few days gleaned from the provincial papers, we have selected a few passages as a kind of off-set to the resistance made to Lord Kinnaird's motion for inquiry into the distress, and the Earl of Radnor's for a temporary suspension of the Corn-laws. At midsummer, with a decreasing consumption, and Sir Robert Peel's sliding-scale for a considerable time in operation, and his Tariff called into existence, what is the condition of the people, and what their prospects? Why, the price of the primary necessaries of life rapidly rising in the face of the promise of an abundant harvest, and trade more and more depressed every week. This holds especially of the cotton and linen manufactures, and of all mining concerns, which can hardly be in a worse condition than at present. In many localities above one-half of the factories are closed: in those still open, the work-people have been compelled to accept of such diminished wages as the masters are able to give them. The appalling statements made by Lord Kinnaird in the House of Peers, when introducing his motion for inquiry into the distress, have not been challenged, although they have been condemned; because inquiry—such inquiry as could be permitted by their lordships—should, it was predetermined, lead to no practical good. Yet these statements may, to some, carry more weight than the reports of local authorities, or of persons imagined to be interested in making out a case for the repeal of the Corn-laws. Having proved the falling-off in the consumption of wheat, Lord Kinnaird adverted to other articles of food, which wont to be considered necessaries in the humblest life, and drew his proofs from different and far-distant localities.

The consumption of groceries and butchers' meat in Leeds was reduced one-fourth: but as the middle and lower classes probably did not consume less, the reduction had fallen on the operative classes; the consumption of butchers' meat was half what it was in 1834. In Manchester the receipts of the grocers and butchers had fallen off forty per cent. in two years. In Rochdale, the quantity of butchers' meat was not half what it was in 1836. In Dundee, in 1836, the weekly number of cattle killed was 150; in May, 1842, it was 71, being a reduction of 79, or more than one-half. The sales of bread, butter, eggs, and sugar, was reduced to one-half. The cheapest and coarsest food was about the same. The diminution in the consumption of meat was not from dearness of price; best meat from November 1835, to May 1836, being 6d. per lb. From November 1841, to March 1842, it was sevenpence per pound, and from March 1842, to this date, it was sixpence per pound. These statements might be doubted; he was, therefore, anxious for a Committee, that he might show upon what grounds they were made. He would now call their Lordships' attention to the actual state of three or four of the principal towns in England, and to one or two in Scotland. Manchester had a population of 192,408. "The amount expended for the relief of the poor in 1836, was £25,669. In the year ending March, 1841, £33,938. But this gives no idea of the extent of the distress. The Rev. Mr. Hearne stated at the conference, that in one district there were 2000 families without a bed among them, and 8666 persons whose income is only 1s. 2½d. each per week. The grocers, butchers, drapers, &c., state that their receipts have fallen off 40 per cent. within the last two years. The total number of patients admitted into the dispensaries in the Manchester district during the last six years ending in 1835, was 54,000. The number admitted during the six years of dear food ending in 1841 was 196,000; an increase of more than 300 per cent. The deaths in the dispensaries during the six years of scarcity showed an increase of 1180 over the mortality of the six years of comparatively cheap food. The average daily number of prisoners in the New Bailey in 1836 was 539; the number has since gradually increased, and last year it was 722. The number committed for trial in 1836 was 1031; in 1841, 1992. Empty houses:—5492 untenanted dwellings, 681 shops, offices, &c.: 6173 houses, shops, &c., assessed at £76,168; 116 mills, works, &c. idle, £10,926; total 6,289, £87,094. The steam-power not at work is 1000 horse power, the yearly value of which is much above £100,000 of unproductive rateable property." In Bolton, containing a population of about 50,000, there are 50 mills, usually employing 8,124 workpeople, of these there are thirty mills, and 5061 workpeople either standing idle or working only four days a-week. Iron founders, engineers, millwrights, and machine makers:—In 1836, the number employed was 2,110; there are employed at present 1325; discharged 785. Carpenters—In 1836, the number employed was 150; at present they are reduced to 49, leaving 101 who are not permanently employed. Bricksetters:—In 1836, the number employed was 130; at present it is reduced to 16. Stonemasons:—In 1836, the number employed was 150; there are 50 employed at present. The estimated loss of wages in Bolton alone, was £320,560 in the year. What could any charitable collection do towards relieving so large an amount of distress? But this had not come upon their lordships suddenly; it had been growing gradually.

The condition of Leeds and Manchester is a fair specimen of the condition of many towns, of Glasgow, Paisley, Sheffield, Dundee. But why enumerate them? It is now three weeks since the above statement was made, and since then distress has burst forth in many other quarters. The alarming riots of the starving people in Ireland have occurred, and Burnley has thrown itself upon the Government; an example which will, and which ought to be followed by other places similarly situated; by communities rendered bankrupt by the distress occasioned by the continued operation of the Corn-laws. If Parliament tie up the people's industry, and grind them with taxation, it should tell them how they are to obtain food, or else provide it for them, and convert the country into one universal work-house. Paragraphs like the following now meet the eye in every provincial paper, together with accounts of public meetings for the relief of the clamorous starving, held by the poor or the straitened in their circumstances:—

Alarming State of the Manufacturing Districts.—This part of the county is in a deplorable state, for hundreds and thousands have neither work nor meat. They are daily begging in the streets of Haslingden, twenty or thirty together, crying for bread. Meetings are held every Sunday, on the neighbouring hills, attended by thousands of poor, haggard, hungry people, wishing for any change, even though it should be death. On Sunday last, a meeting was held on the hills, near Accrington, and the persons present, it is said, covered an acre of 4420 square yards of ground. They stood very near together in order to hear the speakers, who were stationed in a wagon in the centre of the ground, so that calculating six to the square yard, there must have been 26,000 persons present. The speakers, ten in number, were very violent, advising their hearers never to petition Parliament again, but to be determined to have a redress of grievances immediately. Resolutions to that effect were put to the meeting and carried unanimously. The people say they are determined to have their just rights, or die in the attempt, and say they will neither support delegates nor conventions,—for present relief they want, and present relief they will have before another winter makes its appearance. They say they might as well die by the sword as by hunger.—Correspondent of the Liverpool Mercury.

Camp meetings of Chartists of the extreme kind are being held in many places, where the denial that violent language has been employed, and the exhortations of the leaders to caution and forbearance in speech, are as decided symptoms of what is passing within their minds as the vapour of words. Bands of distressed artisans in many places parade the streets levying contributions, partly through pity, but as much from intimidation; and this example will spread; nor will the provision riots be confined to Ireland. It would not be worth while to notice cases like the following, stated in the Leeds Mercury, if such things were not unhappily but too general; if thousands in Ireland were not keeping soul and body for a time together upon nettles and cabbage leaves, and the yellow weed the Irish consume in dear years at this season, while the starving

English are, for the first time, consuming garbage not fit for dogs :—

DISTRESS AT HOLMFIRTH.—The working-classes in this district were never, taking them generally, in such a state of destitution before. There must be thousands wholly unemployed; and it is distressing to see the hundreds of labouring men who are daily rambling about the country evidently suffering for want of food, and many of them clothed in rags. Judge of their miserable condition from the following facts :—A man was observed a few days since eating grains out of a neighbour's swill-tub. The person who saw him, mentioned the circumstance to another, who asked the poor creature if it were true. "Yes," he said, "hunger drove me there, and I took some home with me to feed my famishing wife and children with!" This week a cow died at New Mill, of milk fever. A person in the neighbourhood bought the carcass, which was dressed as beef,—for what purpose may be guessed at. It was hung in an out-building, but next morning it was found that most of the flesh had been cut off and carried away. Oh! ye famine makers by law, what crime, suffering, and death, ye have to answer for! When will this tide of ruin take a turn? The overseers in several townships are applying for double rates; ruined tradesmen and unemployed workmen are weekly swelling the list of horror; and no one can tell where to turn for hope.

In almost every town, from Inverness to Falmouth, we hear of meetings for the relief of the unemployed poor:—and when are the poor to be employed? when is the need of relief to cease? and from whence, in the meanwhile, are the necessary supplies to come? With many of the middle-class, the burden of the Income-Tax must dry up the source of former bounty to poor neighbours; and even in England, where there is a Poor Law, the highest rate that can be extorted will soon be found quite inadequate to the demand. How are the needy in a place like Stockport, as it is described in the Memorial addressed to the Government by the inhabitants, to be relieved for one half year, although not a thought were bestowed upon replacing the fearful loss and depreciation of property which is going on in those districts. They state,

That there have existed in Stockport numerous sick and burial societies for a long period; there were few individuals of the working classes but what belonged to some one or other of these societies; there were also funeral societies for assisting to inter children, and many were the numbers that belonged to these societies; but since the depression of trade and consequent want of employment, many who were once members are now unable to maintain their membership (although the periodical payments of the members were very small); so that numbers who have been overtaken by sickness, and some who have died, have been cut off from the benefits themselves or their friends would have been entitled to; and it is no unusual thing for those to be buried out of the poor's-rates, or by subscription from benevolent individuals, who would, if trade had remained good, have had the solace of considering that the expenses of their funeral would be borne by funds partly created and supported by the means they enjoyed when work was plentiful, and they were in health to follow the same. That the amount required for the relief of the poor in 1836 and 1837 was £2,628; in 1841 and 1842, £7,126. That since 1836 more than half the master spinners have failed: twenty-nine firms including forty partners are in this list; the machinery of seventeen large mills has been sold by auction, and that of four mills by private contract; eight firms have effected a composition with their creditors. That there are now standing untenanted not less than 3000 dwelling-houses, besides mills, warehouses, and public houses. That in one township alone, viz., Heaton Norris, there are 3500 houses, out of which there are untenanted about 700; there are also nearly 800 compounded for, and 1000 excused from paying rates on the ground of their being too poor; so that the burden of paying the rates falls on no more than 1000 persons, many of these persons being in as bad, and in some instances a worse condition than the paupers themselves. That in February last, there was collected within a few weeks, by some generous and humane individuals, the sum of £5000 for the relief of the suffering poor. That in the week ending 19th February, 1841, the number of families relieved was 3473; the number of individuals, 14,424; the average income per head being 9d. 9–10ths. That owing to the loss of wages consequent upon the stopping of mills, the reduction in the rate of wages by lost time, by reduced number of hands, and the other causes, the total loss to the inhabitants of the borough is £5,483 per week. The cottage and messuage property has depreciated in value, in some instances, as much as 130 per cent., and the average may be fairly taken at 75 per cent. That there are now walking the streets, for want of employment, no less than 5000 persons, who are suffering the extreme of human misery and privations of the most alarming nature; therefore we, your memorialists, respectfully call your attention to these facts, and trust that steps will be immediately taken to relieve the unparalleled distress existing in this borough, and your memorialists will, as in duty bound, pray, &c.

Such in substance is the memorial of the respectable inhabitants of Stockport, agreed upon at a public meeting. By subsequent accounts the distress in that quarter, and in all quarters, is increasing every day; and we may say, in geometrical progression; famine engendering disease and inciting to crime. The following is a recent picture of once flourishing and wealthy Manchester:—

One fact will serve to give an idea of the intensity of the distress here. There is an establishment for distributing soup, which opens at six in the morning. Several hundreds of people surround the place by four o'clock, in order, by being first, to have a chance of receiving some, as the soup, though extensively distributed, is quite insufficient for the numbers who crowd to partake of it. Several failures have taken place this week, which from the respectability and high character of the houses, have thrown much gloom around the place. The Manchester Guardian, a remarkably cautious paper, in its state of the market on Wednesday last, observes, "that the condition of the working classes generally throughout the districts in which hand-loom weaving has been extensively carried on, is becoming worse daily; and the patience with which these privations have hitherto been supported has of late greatly diminished." But if matters are in this state in Manchester, in other towns they are much worse. Some idea may be formed of the distress in Bolton when we state that, though the rateable property is £86,000, there is actually but £36,000 which contributes to the rates. In this place there are 14,000 persons on the books receiving support. In Stockport the poor's-rate on the real rental amounts to eight shillings in the pound. In the township of Marsden, between Burnley and Colne, the poor-rate on the real rental is one shilling a-month. Every farmer in that township is ruined. Of 5000 people in that district, 2000 are without any means of support. When a mill is vacant, no one will venture on it for fear of the poor-rate. One business has been mentioned to us, which would have to pay £1000 a-year in poor's-rate. In Leeds, at the beginning of the distress, the poor-law guardians had a saving of £10,000 to fall back on, but that has long ago been exhausted. A number of hands are thrown out of employment, and the difficulty of supplying the necessitous with food is every day increasing. Some time ago £7000 was raised by the wealthier classes to meet the exigency; but all attempts to raise more is given up. The paupers actually beset the houses. They go about in bands, demanding relief in a tone which implies that it must be given. The distress of what may be called the better classes, who are ashamed to solicit charity, and conceal their sufferings, is awful. In some of those houses which have been entered, the people have been found boiling nettles to make a meal of them. In this, as well as all the other towns of the manufacturing districts, the pawnbrokers have advanced money till they can advance no more—the articles pledged are never redeemed—and the trade of pawnbrokers cannot be carried on. In Macclesfield one great manufacturer is discharging hands at the rate of about two hundred a-week, and he expects soon to have two thousand persons thrown out of employment. In Scotland, both in the west and east, the distress exceeds description. In all the manufacturing towns of England, there are numbers of persons who have what is called a "foreign settlement," and who must be thrown on their parishes; but there is nothing which these poor creatures dread so much as being sent back to the agricultural districts. We understand that in a few days a report will be received from Manchester on the state of the retail trade, containing the most astounding facts. Many shopkeepers of the second grade have not for months taken as much money as would pay for their gas. Chorlton union work-house (Manchester) is filled with the wives and families of men going, or who have gone, to America, in quest of employment.

The same observations apply to Bradford, Leicester, Nottingham, and indeed every manufacturing town in Lancashire or Yorkshire.

We hear on all hands of renewed voluntary subscriptions, of deputations from the manufacturing districts, one of which from Yorkshire is at present importuning the most eminent of the Tory aristocracy to take compassion upon their starving, wretched fellow-countrymen; but unless the effectual remedy be applied, of what value beyond the day and the hour is any palliative measure which does not arrest the progress of the gangrene? It is not a season of dull trade with which the country has to contend; but against the gradual decay, the downward tendency, the undermining of the manufacturing system, which has been at work for many years back. When we perceive that even the small temporary relief craved by Lord Radnor is refused, what ground of hope remains from the Famine Parliament, unless it shall be found more accessible to fear than to pity and justice. Lord Kinnaird only spoke the strongest natural sentiments of the human heart, when he avowed, before his Peers, that, if in the place of those suffering men, he would not see his children perish of hunger before his eyes while there was food within his reach to which he could help himself; and he only said what Nature herself approves.

He had lately asked a gentleman connected with a town in which distress existed, how it was that the people had borne their sufferings with such patience, for he thought if he had seen his children perishing around him from want—if he had seen the felon in gaol better treated than the person willing to work—sooner than submit to this, he thought he would have gone and helped himself—(laughter.) This might be a laughing matter for their Lordships comfortably seated on these benches, but it was no laughing matter to those who suffered from the distress. When he asked that gentleman how it was that the people had been so patient, he was answered, "If the bread had been taken from you suddenly, you might have gone and helped yourself; but if you had been gradually reduced to starvation, and weakened from not getting food sufficient to support the energies of nature, you would have become reckless, and would not have cared to see your children perishing around you." Now this, he believed, was the truth—the horrible truth.

A horrible truth indeed. But Englishmen have yet energy enough left to right themselves, and peacefully, if peace be possible.

Before the prorogation of Parliament, which, now that Sir Robert has accomplished his own objects, may be expected earlier than usual, another effort is to be made to force upon the Legislature the reconsideration of the all-important question of Free Trade in food. A special meeting of deputies from the Anti-Corn Law Associations is summoned by the council of the League. The country "cannot brook the delay of another eight months," which must elapse before Parliament shall reassemble. It can ill brook the delay of one hour. We would fain hope that, when the harrowing details to which we have adverted are formally brought under the notice of government and the legislature, together with the danger of simultaneous rioting or insurrection in the manufacturing districts, and in Ireland, to which men, inclined to be peaceful, and willing to work, are goaded by actual hunger,—some temporary relaxation of the Corn-Laws may be granted, and the interval employed to abolish them for ever—as utterly incompatible with the prosperity of the country, as with its internal quiet. Between the people and these laws there is henceforth deadly warfare. They ought to be abolished, were it but for the odium in which they are held, and as a peace-offering to the famishing millions who attribute to them their misery, and seek the suffrage mainly as the instrument of their destruction.

SONGS OF THE MONTHS.

NO. VII.—THE SONG OF JULY.

"Pho! how hot! how very hot!" you cry, "this is quite horrid!"
'Tis I that breathe upon you, I, July the dry and torrid.
I started from Sahara wide, and baited at Morocco;
Thence, swept the haughty midland sea on wings of the Sirocco.
Sirius bears my torch on high, earth holds no thing I char not,
The wide heath is my Congreve-box, the forest old my Arnott.
The tall rye I will scorch and parch, till his rough beard is yellow;
And roast the pear in his rough skin, until the rogue is mellow.
I'll stop your springs, and dry your wells, and make your rivers shallow,
And lay the rushes in the marsh, dead on the prostrate mallow.

Ay! do that I will;
While you shall pant
Like elephant
Toiling up a hill.
Drouth shall make you wish to booze
For ever;
Fatigue invite you to a snooze
Come never!
For ordure-fed flies, my own hybrids,
In your mouth ever anxious to drown,
Shall dance a Scot's fling on your eyelids,
The moment sleep coaxes them down,
Then hover till Sampson's dread weapon is dropping,
And the moment occurs o'er it safe to be hopping.

LIFE OF GENERAL MACKAY.*

Some years since, a small edition, in quarto, of the "Memoirs of General Mackay,"—the Prince of Orange's Mackay, William the Third's distinguished commander,—was given to the world by the very estimable and amiable man, long known and much beloved in the society of Edinburgh, as "Blind Mr. Mackay," who was the General's male representative. The relationship is of course distant, and not very easily understood, nor indeed of much consequence to any one, save a Highland genealogist, or perhaps one connected with the family of Scoury. The work was compiled from memoirs found in the Advocates' Library, and from the General's official correspondence. It is, however, devoid of the first charm of all biography. It is an account of the campaigns of the commander-in-chief in Scotland, Ireland, and the Netherlands, and not a history of the man. The narrative of the General's Scottish campaign, which, in a military view, terminated at Killiecrankie, is, however, as full of interest to Scotsmen, as the Irish campaign must be to natives of Ireland. Of General Hugh Mackay of Scoury, it is enough to say, that he entered the military service of Charles the Second, and afterwards studied the art of war in France, under the Prince of Condé and the Great Turenne. These were the Dugald Dalgetty times; and Captain Mackay was employed by the Republic of Venice, then at war with the Turks, and received a medal for his services at Candia. The death of his father and of two elder brothers, opened to him the succession to the family estate, of which the rent-roll might not have been even then a vast amount of punds Scots, as the young soldier did not return to take possession. He next served as a captain in Dumbarton's regiment, (now the Royals or First Regiment of Foot,) when he fought for France against the United Provinces. While his regiment made part of the division commanded by Turenne, Captain Mackay chanced to be billeted upon a respectable and pious widow lady at Bommel in Guelderland, and became attached to one of her daughters. Madame de Bie was unwilling to bestow her child upon the Scottish officer—grave, serious, and steady, as he appeared—while he fought against her country and the Reformed religion. He had doubts himself of the justice of the cause for which he fought; and he was, holding the same rank, at his own request transferred from Dumbarton's regiment, to the Scotch Brigade which was in the service of the States-General. He then married Clara de Bie; and was thenceforth, in effect, a Dutchman. The paternal estate was subsequently sold to Lord Reay, his brother-in-law, and the chief of the clan. The rest of General Mackay's public life is the subject of history. Of private information little or none has been obtained. He was mortally wounded in the battle of Steinkirk, and died on the field in the arms of a faithful and devoted clansman—a Mackay—who had followed his chieftain through many a campaign. Mackay bore a high and irreproachable character. He was devoutly religious; of strict moral principles; and a brave, steady, and prudent, if not a brilliant, military chief. But, to us at least, the Memoir of the author of the General's Life is far more interesting than that of his illustrious kinsman. While this edition was in course of printing, Mr. Mackay died at an advanced age; and a sketch of his life is prefixed to the annals of the General's campaigns. Much of it is extracted from "Family Annals," which Mr. Mackay had composed at different periods of his long life; and delightful and instructive annals they are. There must have been much virtue and happiness, and also great comfort, in Sutherland, long before its agriculture was improved, and everything had thriven, save the men and women. The old statistical account of the parish of Lairg, of which "Blind Mr. Mackay's" father and grandfather (gentlemen by birth and connexion) were successively ministers, during a period of nearly a century, must differ vastly from the present one.

Mr. Mackay, the eldest son of the minister, and author of this work, received a classical education at the Grammar School of Inverness, and afterwards at the University of Edinburgh. He was intended to succeed his father and grandfather as the minister of Lairg, and he became a tutor in the family of Lord Elphinstone. Among his college friends were Sir James Mackintosh, Malcolm Laing, Benjamin Constant, and Thomas Addis Emmet, to whom he clung with the warmest feelings of friendship when that unfortunate gentleman was kept for years a State prisoner in the fortress of Fort-George. At the age of twenty-nine all his prospects were blighted by a total bereavement of sight. Yet the remainder of his long and useful life seems to have been spent with a greater share of happiness than often falls to the lot of ordinary men. He possessed a highly cultivated and a pious mind, and a singularly amiable and kindly disposition. He was the father of the orphan, the friend of the poor, and the delight of society. Of two younger brothers, Hugh fell in the battle of Assaye, a captain of cavalry, after serving for twenty years in India, and realizing a handsome fortune. His considerate generosity and filial affection had long contributed to the comforts of the manse; and his fortune, after his untimely death, formed a competence for his blind brother. The third son, a mariner in the Indian seas, must be known to many of our readers from his popular "Narrative of the loss of the Juno," of which he was the second officer, and one of the few survivors of the wreck. But our small space must be reserved for a picture of Highland life, of an aspect somewhat new to those who conceive of Highlanders only as boisterous chieftains, and rude or servile gillies. Mr. Mackay's mother died in the manse of Lairg in giving birth to her eleventh child. He says—

"She died on the 9th November, 1773, a dark and dismal day, which time can never efface from my memory, nor the scene of her funeral amidst the tears and lamentations of our neighbours and the parishioners. Five only of her children survived our mother. My eldest sister was at school, and kind friends resolved to relieve our father of us all for a time; a worthy old couple, not under fourscore years, carried off my brother Hugh and myself. They were the quintescence of old-fashioned hospitality and kindness; and not even now, after the lapse of sixty years, can I recollect the kindness of both without emotion; and it has been to us a source of great enjoyment, that we have been able to testify our remembrance of it to many of their descendants.

"From the period of our mother's death, our father's health, which had always been delicate, began sensibly to decline; so that he appeared gradually to sink under the infirmities of a premature old age, aggravated by this domestic affliction. During a great part of the year, he was prevented, by bodily ailment, from taking exercise. His house was out of repair, pervious to wind and rain, and the room he occupied close and comfortless. His worldly affairs, too, fell into disorder, from various causes, chiefly from the want of our mother's judicious management, without doors as well as within. These things preyed on his spirits; he believed his end approaching, and could not contemplate without pain the prospect of leaving five orphans destitute and uneducated. Like David, however, 'he strengthened himself in the Lord,' and as his earthly comforts gave way, he kept closer communion with his God.

"He frequently quoted, and made us repeat, such passages from the Bible as the following:—'I have been young and now am old, yet have I never seen the seed of the righteous begging his bread;' and, 'When my father and my mother forsake me, then the Lord will take me up.'

"Our father had begun in some degree to recover his spirits after our mother's death, when it pleased God to visit him with another calamity, different in kind, and far less poignant in degree, but one, nevertheless, which put his faith and patience to a severe test. On the 27th of December, 1774, his cow-house was consumed by fire. Hugh and I only of the children were at home; we were in bed, when the cry reached us that the cow-house was on fire. We huddled on our clothes, and ran out to the spot. It was almost day-break, and never shall I forget the awful spectacle that presented itself to our view. The roof had fallen in, burying in its ruins thirty-five head of fine cattle—all our stock—the whole were consumed, and the flame was ascending to the skies with terrific grandeur. All the neighbours soon flocked to the spot. Amongst others, the son of the worthy pair who had taken us to their home and their hearts when we lost our mother. I well remember his words: 'Come, neighbours, we must build another byre for the honest man, and stock it as fast as we can;' and his pledge was redeemed: and it is a curious fact, taking into view the humble state of our fortunes then, that the kindness shown to our father at this time, has been repaid by his descendants to the families of all the contributors, we except, of course, the families of Sutherland and Reay, who each sent gifts of fine cattle. Our father was from home the night of the fire, and did not return till the forenoon after. His prayer at night made a deep impression on us all, but what I remember best is, that when we sat down to our supper of porridge and milk, he observed what an abundant supply of milk was on the table, sent in by the neighbours; then, for the first time, his fortitude gave way, and we all burst into tears. Never, before or after, perhaps, were we so amply supplied with dairy produce as during that winter. The cow-house was soon rebuilt and stocked.

A few years afterwards, the minister's stable and kitchen were burnt down, and the furniture of the latter destroyed. The minister bore this fresh accident with great Christian fortitude, though it was at the time a serious loss to him.

"The accommodations of the Sutherlandshire clergy were, in the last century, exceedingly scanty; and, in some instances, provided entirely at their own expense. It was so at Lairg; for, with the exception of £50 granted in 1750, not a shilling had been contributed by the proprietors, for the accommodation of the incumbents, till towards the close of our father's life, about which period a more liberal system commenced. When this circumstance is taken into account, with the very small stipend, his advanced age, and infirmities, his pecuniary difficulties in consequence, also the conflagration just mentioned having taken place in the dead of the winter, the foregoing will not seem an exaggerated expression of the distress occasioned.

"He was not forsaken by the God in whom he confided, but lived to have every comfort amply supplied by his second son, Hugh, while he was saved, by predeceasing him a few months, the overwhelming anguish which the news of his fall on the field of Assaye would have occasioned him."

After recording other circumstances respecting his revered father, Mr. Mackay concludes his notice of his character thus: "During the summer of 1797, the small-pox raged in the parish, and carried off twenty-five children in a few weeks, threatening the lives of many others. My father had for two years employed an assistant. On this occasion, being then in his 80th year, he preached his last sermon, a seasonable and most consoling discourse, from these words of Job:—'Shall we receive good at the hands of the Lord, and shall we not receive evil?' Though his great age, and increasing infirmities, rendered him unable to appear in public, yet in private he continued as assiduous as ever, exhorting, comforting, and praying with such of his parishioners as called on him. Having known them from their birth, he was intimately acquainted with their character, and to the last took a lively interest in their concerns. He had a clear understanding in temporal as well as spiritual matters, and his people frequently consulted him on the former, requesting him to act as arbiter in their differences. He had some skill in physic, a qualification which greatly promotes the usefulness of a minister amongst an isolated people; naturally humane and tender-hearted, he had always been liberal to the poor, in proportion to his means; and now that these were increased by the filial duty of his son Hugh, he was enabled to extend his charity. In a word, he was a fine example of what the English call a good parish priest,—the friend, the counsellor, the physician of the souls and bodies of his people."

This was in the old times of the Highlands; yet were they not so very barbarous, nor the Sutherlandshire people so very wretched and ignorant, as has been generally supposed by those political economists who hail the late sweeping and often cruel changes in that desolated country as so many social beatitudes.

In the character of his father's parishioners, and the tie which subsisted between pastor and people, there was much to foster the warm and active benevolence implanted by nature in his heart. To his grandfather, the people owed their civilisation, as well as their knowledge of the Gospel; and the order established, and the seed sown by him, were prayerfully maintained and nourished by his son,—father and son having lived as pastors over the parish eighty-nine years. Both had received a very liberal education, and were deep divines, as well as sound in faith, and holy in their characters.

The parish had been fortunate in its schoolmasters; the people were intelligent and in very comfortable circumstances, a fact which has more to do with human character, and the consequent strength and glory of a nation, than is usually considered. Primitive and simple as possible in their manners and wants, every family abounded in food and clothing, had wherewithal to give to the needy, and had leisure to think, to meditate on what their minister told them on the Sabbath, and on the works of creation by which they were surrounded in much beauty and grandeur.

The manse family stood first in the respect and love of each cottage household; all were known and recognised as friends at the manse. The unlimited range for cattle and sheep which the parishioners enjoyed rendered the bestowing on their pastor of marks of regard (the tributes of grateful reverence and warm affection,) as easy as it was gratifying to their self-respect, and to the kindliness of their nature.

Before he lost his sight, Mr. Mackay had procured a good appointment in India, which he lost from a severe and long-continued typhus fever, which prevented his embarking with the official person whose secretary he was to be. There is no more amiable trait in the character of this excellent person than his steadfast adherence to his early friend, Emmet, at a period when it was neither prudent, nor indeed quite safe, to know political rebels, or Irishmen of any complexion, save Orange. Emmet, his college friend in Edinburgh, had, in London, been his tender and assiduous attendant during his typhus fever.

And afterwards the proscribed and imprisoned, but still esteemed and loved, Irish rebel, was sought out by him; for political opinions could not sever the tie formed by esteem for great personal and mental worth, superior talents, and most engaging manners, and grateful remembrance of great kindness shown in a time of need. These feelings naturally induced Mr. Mackay to leave no means untried to gain access to his friend while a state prisoner at Fort-George; and, though the nearest approach allowed by the authorities, was intercourse with Mrs. Emmet and the children, and correspondence with Mr. Emmet under inspection of the governor of the fort, he had the happiness of cheering the sad period of imprisonment, as expressions in several letters of Mr. E.'s testify. In a letter to a friend, Mr. M. writes, "I must add an extract from a letter I lately had from Emmet; he says, 'I should be tempted to inquire from you after many old acquaintance, but that I do not know whether they might not consider being named by me, in the way of familiarity, as a possible injury.' . . I went to Fort-George in hopes of obtaining an interview with him; I waited on the governor with a letter I had received three years before from Emmet, by way of showing the nature of our connexion. He told me he could not permit an interview, but that I might write, which I accordingly did, and had an immediate answer. The governor (General Stewart) added, that he had already formed a high opinion of Mr. and Mrs. Emmet, and regretted their situation. He behaved to me with great politeness, and by no means blamed, rather approved of my anxiety about my friend, and has permitted me to correspond with him freely, through his hands." . . . One or two paragraphs from a letter written by Mr. E., in the expectation of an immediate change of abode, we are tempted to transcribe, as characteristic both of the writer and of the person addressed. "If we can draw any inference from the precipitate manner we were hurried out of Ireland, I should imagine the notification to us of our removal from hence being resolved on, will not long precede the executing of it, and that, therefore, it will be certainly out of my power to give you any timely notice of it; so that, much as I wish to see you, if that be practicable, and at any rate to acknowledge to you, through Mrs. Emmet, the strong sense I entertain of your unaltered friendship and great affection—(and I wish the opportunity of doing this before I leave your neighbourhood, probably for ever, more than I can well tell you)—it will scarcely be possible, unless your time permit you to come here before the notification arrives. At any rate, my dear Mackay, accept of this acknowledgment. What is to become of me, or for what I am destined, I know not; but in no place, or under no circumstances, shall I ever forget, that when I was proscribed and a prisoner, slandered without the means of vindicating my character, you held fast by your former friendship for me, and your previous knowledge of my dispositions. You loved me, and did not hesitate to give the most decisive proofs of it. Mrs. Emmet and I both request you to present our most sincere and respectful compliments to your venerable father; she, in particular, has to thank him for being the means of cheering and improving her mind, and opening it to all the pleasures of hope. Believe me, my dear friend, unalterably and affectionately yours."

Duly to estimate the reality of friendship evinced by this renewal of intimacy, it must be borne in mind, that during that period, (from 1799 to 1802,) and for several years preceding, the professing any sympathy with, or regard for, those who were suspected of disaffection to government, involved the individual in suspicion, and not unfrequently in very injurious consequences, through the artful malice of informers. Mr. Emmet was fully aware of this danger in the case of his friend, then receiving a pension from the India Board, in consequence of the loss of his sight, and wrote to him, entreating that he would not run any risk on his account, assuring him that his confidence in his friendship would continue unabated, should he never receive another letter or token of regard from him. Mr. Mackay, however, continued to visit Fort-George as long as his friends were there, and spent many interesting hours with Mrs. Emmet.

How this generous man must have enjoyed his friend's honourable and prosperous career in America. The last we hear of Emmet is connected with the crowning blessing of his friend's life.

"I spent two days with him at Fort-George, and reckon that he is about this time embarking for Hamburgh with his fellow prisoners, on board a frigate sent for that purpose, never again to be permitted to return to Ireland, on pain of death, in virtue of an act of the Irish Parliament. How they can be excluded from Britain I know not, unless the Imperial Parliament, before it expire, pass an act to that effect. I found him in perfect health and spirits, but not so her; she was recently delivered of a daughter, whom she endeavoured to suckle, but seemed to have no constitution for the undertaking. From Hamburgh he goes to America, where he is sure of being well received by Jefferson, and where I have little doubt, he may one day rise to eminence," (this anticipation was amply fulfilled:) "should you and I live to hear the event, what a striking proof it will afford of the vicissitudes of human affairs, and what strange reflections will not the remembrance of the years 1788-98 suggest to our minds! To come nearer home,—as to myself I feel as in a state of widowhood since the loss of my sister, who removed to her own house at Loth last week, accompanied by the prayers and blessings of the whole parish. To me, the blank her departure has made is such as none but a wife can fill up, and a wife I cannot have at present."

But the blank was filled up. He married the youngest daughter of Mr. Gordon of Carrol, a small proprietor in Sutherlandshire; and, after living for some time in London, Mr. and Mrs. Mackay settled in Edinburgh, where their home became the asylum of a succession of orphan nephews and nieces, whose education the accomplished blind man superintended with heartfelt enjoyment to himself, and immeasurable advantage to those whose minds he trained for Time and for Eternity. By his acquaintance and connexion with persons possessed of Indian and other colonial patronage and influence, he was able to be of great use to many young men "now acting important parts in different quarters of the globe." Among the other protégés of Mr. and Mrs. Mackay was one half-caste orphan boy, a nephew, and probably the son of William. From various causes, all of a generous and honourable kind, Mr. Mackay's fortune, towards the close of life, became somewhat embarrassed; and then—

By the grateful affection of the orphan nephew above alluded to, his then aged uncle, suffering under increasing infirmities, was released from embarrassment, and restored to all the comforts of competency; and a now widowed aunt amply provided for. Truly could they say, and rejoice in the reflection, that their parental care and culture of this half-caste orphan boy was repaid to them a hundred-fold, and it might be well if their experience should encourage others not to mark by contumely, and neglect of the unoffending offspring, their detestation of sin, but rather to atone to those hard-fated beings, and to society, as far as possible, by rearing them up "in the way in which they should go," as to their eternal and temporal wellbeing.

This is an example and an encouragement.——But we have been led too far by this engaging memoir, and must hastily conclude by cordially recommending the Life of Mr. John Mackay to those who may not care much for the campaigns of his illustrious kinsman—King William's great General.

HYMN.—BY EBENEZER ELLIOTT.

TUNE.—Luther's Hymn.

"To live in vain! to live in pain!
To toil in hopeless sadness!"
Is this the doom of godlike man,
Oh God of Love and Gladness!
Not so the rose in summer blows,
Not so the moon her changes knows,
Not so the storm his madness.

From storms, that rock the oak to sleep,
Thy woods their beauty borrow;
Thy harvests, shrouded now in snow,
Will kindle green to-morrow;
So Man, by painful ages taught,
Will build, at last, on truthful thought,
And wisdom, won from sorrow.

Else, "what a lie were written here"
By thy right hand, My Father,
O'er all thy seas, in crimson roll'd
When Morning is a bather;
O'er all thy vales of growing gold;
Or where, on mountains black with cold,
Thy clouds to battle gather!

BY MRS. GORE.

CHAPTER IX.

NEVER had Basil Annesley installed himself before the fire of his lodgings in so desponding a mood as after his interview with Abednego. Not a single point or person whereon he could fix his thoughts with complacency, by way of relief! After a visit to his mother, in which he had been made to feel himself an unwelcome guest, after becoming an ear-witness to the ravings of the old gardener, which he would have given worlds to efface from his memory, he had been spurned from the door which he had a right to approach as a benefactor, and where he would nevertheless have been proud to kneel in all the self-sacrificing humility of love!—

His mother, he knew to be exposed to the most harassing and painful duties.—The family of Verelst appeared to be distracted by some peculiar contrariety of fortune, of which he was unable to surmise the origin. And now, his benefactor, the man for whom, involuntarily, he entertained at once the greatest interest and greatest contempt, was suffering from a dangerous disease.—In neither of the three cases could he exercise a beneficial influence. Gladly would he have dedicated all the means at his command, to alleviate the pangs of any of the three. But he was powerless as a child.—All he could do was to sympathize in silence, and at a distance.—

To say that no floating visions of the Duca di San Catalda mingled with his many vexations, would be disingenuous. It was doubtless no small enhancement to the miseries of his position that, while excluded from the house of Verelst, he believed another to be favoured with access;—another, rich, great, powerful,—able to confer favours fifty times greater than the poor services he had rendered, and perhaps to make them acceptable by graces of deportment, in which he felt himself to be lamentably deficient. In the depths of his reverie, poor Basil seemed to behold passing before him, as in a dream, all that was occurring at Barlingham,—all that was chancing in the drawing-room of Verelst,—all that was exercising a fatal empire in the miserable attic of A. O.!—

So irritated was his mind by these perplexities, that he felt unequal to the exertion of dining at mess; and he accordingly determined to take an early dinner at the Clarendon, and proceed to the play;—the resource of homeless men in London against the publicity of their Club, or loneliness of their lodgings.

Now the play, in the month of January, is as habitual a resort of fashionable loungers as it is secure from their presence the moment the season commences. Scarcely had Basil taken a back seat in one of the public boxes, leaning back with folded arms, for the unmolested enjoyment of his reflections, when an unusual degree of movement and conversation in one of the private boxes attracted his notice, and he perceived that it was tenanted by a party of his brother officers,—Loftus, Blencowe, and Maitland, the old boy Carrington, and the young boy Wilberton,—precisely those whom others would have designated as his "friends."—This was vexatious; for Loftus had invited him to dine with them and join a party to the Adelphi, and they would now perceive that the engagement he had pleaded, was a mere subterfuge to avoid them; for he rightly conjectured that the unusual vociferation in their box was produced by their discovery of his entrance, and ejaculations of indignation at his desertion.

He was consequently as little at his ease at the theatre, as he would have been at home. To his disturbed thoughts, the eyes of the merry party seemed to be constantly upon him. He fancied them still pursuing the system of quizzing which had irritated him the preceding night into the unlucky explanation, the full force of embarrassments arising from which had been demonstrated to him by the officiousness of Carrington, on his way from Arlington Street to the Club.

It was, perhaps, because annoyed by the sort of Inquisition to which he felt himself exposed,—for the laughers had the advantage over him in point both of position and numbers,—that, the moment the curtain dropped upon a tragedy composed of glazed calico, gilt paper, glass beads, cotton velvet, twelve flourishes of trumpets, a voice more uproarious in offering "a kingdom for a horse" than all the twelve put together, and a prompter still louder and more active than both the trumpets and tragedian, Basil quitted the theatre. He foresaw that the significant smiles and whisperings they had directed towards him during the courtship of Lady Anne and the mild heroism of Richmond, would have double scope during the tumults of the pantomime.

It was a chilly night. The moonlight lay like snow upon the frozen pavement; and that vivid brightness, which in summer seems intended to facilitate happier enjoyment than the glare of day, either for the revellers of this world, or those which, unseen and unsuspected, disport themselves impalpably around us, seemed lost and thrown away on a state of atmosphere that drove both man and beast to shelter. There was nothing to tempt forth fay or fairy,—the sylph to the moonbeam, the undine to the wave. A few shivering mortals crept along the streets despairing,—or by a brisker encounter with the cold, attempted to lessen the evil; and it was impossible to connect the idea of that frozen moonlight with anything but suffering and discontent.—

Even the young blood of Basil was chilled within him; and though, in the course of his musings during the tragedy, he had made up his mind to proceed to Westminster and ascertain that the man whose eccentricities had so enthralled his attention was not wholly without assistance on such a night, yet on emerging from the heated theatre into the frosty atmosphere without, his courage almost failed him.

As he issued from the public door in Bow Street adjoining the private one, a tiger in livery, with a cockade in his hat, touched it to him, and ran to resume his place in the cabriolet he had abandoned to the care of a brother atom in order to gossip with the footmen in the entry. His attention attracted by this irregularity, Basil perceived that two of the cabs in waiting were those of John Maitland and Blencowe, both of which were always at his orders; and aware that neither of them would be in request for two hours to come, he jumped into that of the latter, and having hurried as far as the entrance of Delahaye Street, desired the lad to drive back to the theatre, and await his master,—to whom he was to explain the occurrence. Thus secured from a chilly walk, Basil proceeded, on the opposite side of the pavement, to the house occupied by Abednego; and raised his eyes anxiously towards the attic story.—

Not a gleam of light in the windows,—not a token of habitation!—The old man might have been left alone and fireless, to wrestle with his disease; nay, he might have sunk under it, united with the inclemency of the weather.—It was just possible that the room occupied by the Money-lender might not face the street,—for Annesley had taken no note in the morning of its look-out; but if not, the idea of an old man in a high fever, half suffocated with a quinsy, (a disease of all others demanding the watchfulness of an attendant,) exposed to the chill of that deserted rat-hole, was indeed a picture of desolation.

In spite of the cold, he stood for some minutes wrapt in his cloak, contemplating the quaint old mansion. Then, as if conscious of the absurdity of interfering in the domestic affairs of one to whom he bore so little affinity, and who would probably resent his kindness as importunate or artful, he walked away as far as the corner of the street, on his road homeward.—Again, however, his steps were arrested by a sense of the isolated wretchedness of A. O.!—

"If the old creature should die in the night for want of aid!" murmured he; and, at the supposition, back he hastened to the house, and stepping down to the door, rang gently at the bell.—

Basil was prepared to allow the greatest possible latitude for the deliberation of the little sweeper, to whom, in sending the medicines from the chemist's, he had addressed a message, promising a reward on the morrow, if he adhered to his promise of not quitting the house. He therefore waited quietly at the door, till he conceived the poor urchin had found time to shuffle up stairs from the heap of shavings in the front kitchen, on which he had promised Basil to pass the night,—visiting, from time to time, the chamber-door of the invalid. But when five minutes had elapsed, Basil rang again;—at the end of ten, a third time.—Still, no answer!—

Weary of standing in the cold, he began to exercise his personal observations by examining carefully through the area railings whether light were perceptible through the cracks of the shutters;—the kitchen, in which Bill had promised to station himself, bearing evidence in the name of "front" of being overlooked by the street.—But the most careful eye could detect no straggling gleam betokening habitation.—

"Perhaps the poor boy may have fallen asleep in the cold?" mused Basil, drawing his cloak closer about his ears. "If I were to try and wake him? A stone thrown against the shutter, perhaps, might rouse him up!"

But where was a stone to be found on the frozen pavement of Delahaye Street?—Though St. James's Park, and all its gravel, lay within distance of a stone's throw, Basil might as well have required an "entire and perfect chrysolite" to fling at the shutter, as a single pebble!—After a moment's deliberation, he whistled loudly, in hopes that, if dozing, this signal might reach the ear of the boy.—

In an instant, an answering whistle sounded shrilly from the opposite side of the street, and a rough hand was placed upon his collar!—Basil started round to grapple with his antagonist, but stopped short on noticing the dress of a policeman!—Ere he had time for explanation, two more ran up to the assistance of the first.—

"Hold fast, Bill!" cried one of the new comers, panting for breath.

"I've been watchin' on him this quarter of a hour," cried the original captor,—"seeing as he'd a heye to the parlour winders o' the old Jew. He's been trying skeleton-keys, and what not, at the door.—S'pose we gives the alarm indoors? From his piping up, the chap has maybe got accomplices within?"

"Ay, ay;—a put-up robbery"—

"Jist the flash-cut iv a Wist-ind burglar!"— cried the third policeman; all three keeping such fast hold of the collar of Basil, as to leave him scarcely breath for explanations, which, even when made, were utterly disregarded.

"A mighty likely story!" exclaimed the constable from Great George Street, who had now come up, in answer to the summons of his subs.—"Gentlemen who come to inquire after the health of other gentlemen do not whistle to the footman down the ary!"—

"Nor try skilliton-kays at the front doore!"—added the third policeman.—

"Besides, the old fellow at this 'ere 'ouse hav'n't e'er a friend as ever anybody hear tell of," observed the original captor;—"and from his anxiousness to have his house watched, I've a notion there's property past common inside."—

"In that case, knock at the door, and give an alarm to have the house searched," said the constable,—"B. 947, will assist in carrying this fellow to the station-house."—

"No assistance will be required,—I am quite willing to proceed there," said Annesley, perfectly composed. "But before I go, I should be glad to learn news of the old gentleman who resides here, who is dangerously ill."

The men, who were holding him as tightly as though Jerry Abershaw or Dick Turpin were in their clutches, now inquired, with expressive gestures, whether he saw any green in their eyes: to which inquiry, Basil replying by an eager renewal of his request addressed to the constable, B. 947, who, apparently less experienced in his calling than the rest, suggested that "no great 'arm 'ud be done by keeping him fast till the door uppen-ed."—

"Do you suppose, Sir, that I require to be obstructed in my dooty by the likes of you?" cried the indignant constable.—"I'm answerable to my super'ors, and that's enough. Carry him off!"—said he, addressing the "infer'ors" with the dignity of a Dogberry—"I'll be after you in a jiffy."

Annesley was accordingly compelled to hurry off between the two policemen, without waiting to hear the result of the alarm at the door of A. O. He offered no resistance,—concluding that his explanations at the station-house would produce his immediate release; and was only vexed to perceive, on entering the crowded room, that from the number of charges claiming priority, he should be some time detained.—It was no such pleasant sight to contemplate the number of wretches taken insensible from the door-steps of gin-shops; or, though it still wanted an hour of midnight,—the set of miserable beings,—more miserable from being less insensible, apprehended as wandering homeless in the streets at that inclement season.—Basil Annesley was far from needing Shakspeare's admonishment—

> Take physic, Pomp!—
> Expose thyself to feel what wretches feel, in order to waken his sensibility to the wants of his fellow-creatures: still, till that night, he had been scarcely aware of the nature and amount of wretchedness infesting the streets of the Great Babylon.

At length, his turn arrived; and he was beginning to launch forth into a simple narrative of what had befallen him, when he was authoritatively desired to hold his tongue; and the depositions of the police assumed their due precedence.

Let those who, after listening in either House to a dull debate, consisting of incoherent nothings, hemmed and hawed by one honourable member,—mumbled by a second,—mouthed by a third,—and executed in dumb show by the hands and lips of a fourth, (inaudible in the gallery,)—peruse with wondering eyes on the following morning in the flowing periods of The Times, a concentration of the wisdom of Parliament, arranged under the several heads of "The Duke of ——;" "The Marquis of ——;" "The Honourable Member for Finsbury," or the honourable member for no matter-what; as a fair and true representation of the bald disjointed chat of the preceding night,—conjecture the amazement of Basil on hearing a most consistent and plausible narrative of his exploits as a burglar!—His face was recognised by several present as familiar at Marlborough Street; and one more general of information than the rest, facetiously reminded him of his two months at "the Mill!"—

It was rather a relief than a vexation when an examination of his person was ordered, preparatory to his being locked up for the night;—knowing that, instead of the skeleton keys and jemmy imputed to him, the property in his great-coat pockets would confirm the identity he had asserted. When, however, the initials on his handkerchief, and the name inscribed in a pocket-book containing his letters and memoranda, had sufficed, as he fondly imagined, to prove the delinquent of Brixton Mill to be an officer of the Guards, of honourable reputation, and he was anticipating apologies from the Inspector, new grounds of suspicion presented themselves.—The fellow who taxed his face with having been "up a matter o' twenty times at Mobbro' Street," suggested that the "soortoo might have been prigged" from the rightful owner, and worn with all his property, in order to establish an alias for the thief!—

"If you will send a messenger to the Guards' Club, and request Captain Blencowe, whose cab is waiting there, either to drive hither and identify me, or despatch one of my brother officers for that purpose, or even his own servant who accompanied me an hour ago to Delahaye Street, you will perceive that these men have deposed falsely, or rather to thrice as much as the truth!"—said Basil, in a tone that startled the benumbed faculties of the stultified Inspector; and after some further discussion among the deponents, he was locked up to abide the result of the message.

Three quarters of an hour did poor Annesley await the return of the policeman despatched to St. James's Street; in a room reeking with the vapours of gin and tobacco, emitted by three ragged human beings who lay huddled together, two upon a flock bed in a corner of the strong room; the third upon the floor, and breathing so hard and irregularly, as to betoken an apoplectic seizure rather than mere drunkenness. It was in vain he remonstrated against being placed in collision with these outcasts. The charge of false-witnessing he had made against the police force, exposed him to the utmost rigour of what is called the Law.

At length, when heated and chafed almost to frenzy by this untimely incarceration and revolting companionship, the grating lock intimated that his probation was at an end; and he was summoned back into the police room,—now hotter than ever, and crowded with new committals.

The first objects that struck him, (their Chesterfield wrappers and laughing faces affording a singular contrast to the uniforms of the policemen and filthy tatters of the prisoners,) were Maitland and Wilberton, arm in arm, who, having issued from the supper-table into the frosty air on Annesley's summons, were just sufficiently affected by the cigars and brandy and water they had taken at starting, to enjoy beyond measure the part they proposed to play. Though satisfied by Basil's message of the nature of his scrape, they pretended, on reaching the station-house, to believe themselves summoned at the impudent instigation of an impostor; and the consequence was that, on emerging from the lock-up room, the prisoner found himself treated quite as cavalierly as before.

"Never saw the fellow in my life!" stammered Wilberton, who, more elated than his companion, was delighted at the prospect of the spree proposed by John Maitland, by way of retaliation on Basil's pretended engagement. "Some drunken dog of—of a pickpocket,—who has made fr—free with our names!"—

"It is deuced hard that a gentleman should be disturbed from his supper on such absurd pretences!" added Maitland, assuming an air of drunken indignation.—And Annesley was about to be removed to a cell for the remainder of the night, when something in the rollicking air and exulting tone of the two witnesses, so far attracted the notice of the experienced Inspector, that when Basil, appealing to him in the gentlemanly tone which rarely fails of effect, entreated that the servant or servants who had driven down with the two gentlemen to the Station might be called in, he readily complied. But before Maitland's tiger had time to make his appearance, whose testimony must put an end to the mystery, his master had begun to address Annesley by the name of "old fellow!" and to treat the matter as a joke.

The result was the instant release of the supposed burglar. Nothing had been found upon him confirmatory of the depositions of B 947, who had already sneaked off in anticipation of being given in charge in his turn;—and by way of conciliating the ex-prisoner, who, ere he followed his jocose friends out of the station-house, intimated his intention of lodging a complaint with the magistrates on the morrow, the Inspector acquainted him that, unable to obtain ingress to the house in Delahaye Street, and seriously alarmed for the safety of its inmate, the policemen had attempted to force the door,—the noise of which brought down the old man from his attic, pistols in hand, to certify his own safety.

"Nevertheless," added the Inspector, "the constable, who persuaded him to a parley with the chain up, states that the old gentleman was in such a state of debility that his voice was scarcely audible;—which account, Sir, ought certainly to have induced more belief than I accorded to the motive you adduced for visiting him at so strange an hour."

On his release from the tyranny of the police, Basil determined to return instantly to Delahaye Street; being now certain that the little sweeper had proved false to his charge, and that the miserable old man was left alone.

Just as he was quitting the door of the station-house, resisting the officious offers of a raggamuffin loitering near the door to run and fetch him a cab,—a strange figure appeared at the corner of the street; which, but for its venturing so near the head-quarters of the law, might easily have been mistaken for one of the calling to which Basil had just escaped the imputation of belonging.—But the moon shone too brightly through the clear atmosphere, to admit of any deception in the eyes of Annesley; who instantly discerned in that unsightly form, the individual to whose aid he was hastening, as perhaps on a bed of death!—

"What, in God's name, Sir, has tempted you out in your present state on such a night!"—cried Basil, eagerly accosting him.

But the answer was wholly unintelligible. Abednego leaned heavily against the area-railings of an adjoining house, as if overcome by his feelings or his infirmities, and groaned aloud.

"Fetch a coach!" cried Basil to the fellow who had been importuning him,—perceiving that, short as was the distance to Delahaye Street, there was much doubt whether the strength of the sick man would enable him to retrace his steps;—and while listening to the broken gasps, half invective, half endearment, in which Abednego attempted to express anger at his young friend's officiousness, and indignation at the dilemma into which it had betrayed him, a vehicle rattled up;—and the manner in which the invalid, after being lifted in, sunk breathless into a corner, convinced Basil Annesley that his previous anxieties were not exaggerated.

"It is as much as his life is worth to have encountered the night air on such a night!" burst involuntarily from his lips, as he compared the warm interest entertained in his behalf by the eccentric old Jew, with the desertion of his gay associates;—and a hoarse ejaculation of "MY life!" which escaped the lips of his companion, was the only intelligible sound that reached the ear of Basil till they stopped before the door in Delahaye Street.—

"You must allow me to assist you up stairs," said Basil, as the coachman held open the coach door, and Abednego taking a pass-key from his waistcoat pocket, prepared to open his own.—

"No, no!" muttered the old man,—"I tell you no!—Who is to put the chain up after you, when you quit the house?"—

But the effort he had made for this explanation proved too much for him; and on reaching his door, he tottered and would have fallen, while attempting to place the key in the lock, had not Annesley started forward and supported him in his arms. A low moaning now escaped his lips; and Annesley having taken the key from his icy hand, and pushed open with his foot the slowly yielding door, carried him into the hall, and placed him on a bench.—After returning to pay and dismiss the coachman, he carefully closed the street door; and even so far conceded to the habits of Abednego as to bar it and put up the chain, ere he snatched with one hand the filthy iron lamp which the Jew had left burning on the pavement of the hall, on his departure for the station-house, and offered his arm to A. O., who was gradually reviving.

"Let me see you up stairs, Sir," said Basil. "It is useless declining my assistance. The night is half over, and since I know you to be alone in the house, I swear to you that I will not quit it before morning!"

The suffering man seemed fully aware of his incompetency under the influence of growing indisposition to dispute the point with his young companion; for, instead of offering further resistance, he accepted the proffered arm of Basil, and attempted to ascend the stairs.—The task, however, was by no means easy. His respiration was all but impeded by the increased swelling and inflammation of his throat: and on attaining the second landing, he clung with both hands to the arm of Annesley, and panted for breath.

It was not till after the lapse of some minutes that they were able to attain the attic, the door of which was locked,—from habit more than as a security, since there was no other human being in the house.

They entered the room. Basil saw with concern that there was not a vestige of fire; and that his suffering companion had risen from his miserable bed to answer the summons of the police. From the iron lamp he carried, young Annesley hastily lighted a candle that stood on the table, which, in strange contradiction to the habits of Abednego, proved to be of wax.

"Give me the lamp!" faltered the old man, rising from the bergère into which he had sunk exhausted on entering. "I have wood and shavings in the other room. Since you choose to abide with me, I suppose I must kindle a fire."

"Not on my account, Sir!" said Basil, eagerly; but on reflecting that the sentiment of hospitality might be the only means of inducing the old gentleman to bestow upon himself a necessary indulgence, he desisted: and Abednego tottered, grumbling, into the adjoining chamber. Thus left alone, on casting his eyes around him upon that wretched room, as much a place of penance as the police cell he had quitted, Basil noticed that, on a low table beside the flock bed, lay the book borrowed that morning by his host,—and beside it, a large crucifix of Berlin iron,—and a folded paper!—A CRUCIFIX!—The world then, and his own suspicions, had decided wrongfully?—Abednego the Money-lender was only in name and practices a Jew!—

While pondering upon this startling discovery, a heavy fall in the adjoining closet attracted Basil's attention; and though believing it to proceed only from a log of the wood mentioned by his singular host, he hurried to his assistance.—Either A. O. had entangled his feet in the long wrapper in which he had enveloped himself to confront the night air, or had fallen from weakness;—for there he lay, stretched upon the heap of mingled coals, cinders, and fragments of old wood, that encumbered one corner of the room!

The old man had struck himself too in the fall; for on lifting him up, Basil perceived, by the light of the lamp, (which, though overturned on the floor, was not extinguished,) that blood was gushing from his lips.—Lifting him hastily in his arms, he bore him like a child into the adjoining attic, and placed him on the bed;—Abednego groaning heavily at intervals,—either from illness, or the disastrous effects of his accident.

His host thus manifestly disabled, Basil felt entitled to bestir himself according to his own inventions. He was there alone, in the dead of night, without aid or comfort, in sole charge of a sick or dying man. It was no moment for scruples or nicety.—Throwing off his great-coat, and hastily gathering from the heap in the adjoining room materials for a fire, he soon produced a blaze in the rusty old grate, which diffused some degree of cheerfulness, and promised gradually to diffuse warmth through the desolate apartment. An old kettle stood within the fender; but as it proved empty, Basil proceeded to a stone water-jug that stood in a corner of the room to replenish it. The water in the pitcher was frozen!—In order to break the ice, which resisted his hand, Basil took up a faggot stick lying near it on the floor. The crash caused by the fracture seemed to rouse the faculties of Abednego, who instantly woke as from a stupor.

"What mischief are you doing there?" gasped he, evidently only partially sensible. "What have you broken?—I have not kept a piece of crockery entire since you began to wait upon me!—And how dare you light that monstrous fire?—Fool!—what have I to roast here besides your own wretched limbs, that you thus waste my fuel?"

From the little Basil Annesley could gather of this apostrophe, uttered in a hoarse whisper, he saw that Abednego's head was wandering with fever, and that he mistook him for the little sweeper.

Without attempting to undeceive him, he persisted in his self-imposed task;—filled the kettle, set it on the fire, and having found untouched the packet of dried lime-flowers he had despatched from the chemist's for an infusion, prepared a drink for the sick man, such as he remembered to have been administered to himself at Heidelberg, by the mother of Esther.

There was some difficulty in finding a cup in which to offer it to Abednego. As a last resource, Basil took from a shelf behind him what appeared to be a bronze ornament, which afterwards proved to be an antique silver goblet, a chef-d'œuvre of one of the old chasers of Lombardy!

The invalid drank and seemed comforted. His moans became less heavy.—After a time he opened his eyes, and breathed as though the oppression of his chest were in some degree relieved. By degrees, and before he altogether regained his consciousness, Basil removed his outer garments, and having placed them under his pillow as a prop to his head, covered him closely up with the quilt of his wretched pallet.—With a second cup of the hot infusion, he now mixed some antimony as prescribed by the chemist he had consulted; and the invalid having again, almost mechanically, swallowed the soothing infusion, Basil left it to exercise its effect, and, wearied by his unaccustomed exertions, flung himself into the old bergère before the fireplace for rest and reflection.

The strangeness of his own situation afforded, of course, the first subject of his cogitations!—There was he, who had indignantly rebutted as an imputation, the charge of intimacy with A. O., brought against him at Lady Maitland's by Blencowe and his set,—actually established as sick-nurse beside his bed, in a filthy garret;—performing for him menial offices which he would have hesitated to execute for persons having claims upon his kindness!

Only a few nights before, his mother had refused to accept offices far less humiliating from him, in behalf of an old and faithful servant;—and now, he was attending, sole servitor, on the dying bed of a stranger,—whose very existence, a little month before, had been utterly unknown to him!—

But the strangest of all these incongruities was, that for the life and soul of him, he could not bring himself to regard Abednego Osalez as a stranger! Some mysterious tie appeared to unite them.—Though the common but most holy tie of fellow-creatureship, including even the Money-lender under the Biblical designation of "neighbour," ought to have sufficed as a motive for the exertions of the young Samaritan, so as to need no further adducement, Basil Annesley, as he contemplated the smoky fireplace, did not conceal from himself that he felt as if seated beside the hearth of one with whom he had been long accustomed to break bread, and take counsel. And yet, the man who lay breathing heavy and unconscious on that wretched pallet, was one whose vocation and habits were hateful to the generous mind of the young soldier! Though the vigorous language and force of intellect of Abednego had invested the calling of the Money-lender with a new character in the eyes of Basil,—though the keenness of his soul and greatness of his speculations had interposed a sort of veil over the littleness of his daily doings, and the detestable nature of his usury,—young Annesley did not attempt to disguise from himself that the man who contemplated with such far-sighted Philosophy the value and social influence of Money, was in practice a pettifogging miser!—Still, with all the inconsistency and odiousness of his pursuits, Basil was conscious of involuntary deference towards the proprietor of that filthy garret!—

"The power of thought,—the magic of the mind,"

the energy of soul of one so immeasurably superior to his own position, and so strangely master of the destinies of others, threw a sort of halo round the gloom of the place. It was such wilful, wayward, self-denying misery!—There was such a force of will, such a concentration of self-infliction in the privations of the starving millionaire,—that he felt as if contemplating De Rancé in the cells of La Trappe, or Charles V. in those of St. Quintin, rather than a vulgar miser undergoing his wilful Prometheanism!—While gazing on these denuded walls, if it were possible to abhor, it was not easy to despise the inmate of that iron chest of unavailing treasure!—

His greatest source of annoyance, now that he was satisfied of having afforded the best succour in his power to the physical ailments of the sick man, arose from the certainty of having exposed himself to the unsparing raillery of his brother officers.—Devoid as they were of entertainment at that season of the year, they would not fail to discuss among themselves his solitary visit to the theatre, after the pretext of an engagement; his having driven in Blencowe's cab to what would otherwise have passed for some rendezvous, but what was now discovered to be a midnight visit to A. O.;—a visit, moreover, so unauthorized, as to have caused him to be taken up as a burglar, and exposed him to the chance of a night in the station-house!—

It was not to be expected that such men as Wilberton and Maitland would deal leniently with these discoveries; and old Carrington was now too stale as a butt, not to impart due value to an adventure which exposed young Annesley for ever and a day to the bantering of those who had already so moved his choler by qualifying him as the arm-in-arm companion of the Money-lender!—

In order to escape the annoyance of his anticipations on this provoking subject, Basil proceeded to take from the table, the only book that naked room afforded for his amusement;—even the volume of Hollar which Abednego had so strangely chosen as the consolation of his hours of sickness!—As he removed it stealthily from the table, in order not to waken the sick man from his unquiet slumbers, he inadvertently brushed down the paper lying beside it, and stooped to restore it to the table. In the displacement something fell out.—On searching upon the floor, it proved to be a lock of hair;—a long, long tress, coil within coil,—which it was impossible not to recognise as that of a woman,—and difficult not to surmise as that of a woman young and lovely;—so silken was its texture,—so rich its hue!—

Without the smallest intention of prying into the household secrets of his host, Basil could not replace it in the paper without discerning this.—He even noticed the peculiar colour of the hair. It was a rare tint; yet long familiar to his eyes as that of a tress, all but similar, which he carried in his pocket-book, and which had been recently unfolded before him during the insolent examination at the police-office:—his mother's hair!—not silvered as now by the hand of time and influence of care;—but rich and glossy as during her sunny youth. Basil regarded this lock, which he had obtained as a gift from Dorcas without his mother's knowledge, as the most precious treasure in his possession.

Irresistibly impelled to compare it with the tress he had now discovered in the possession of the Money-lender, he drew forth his pocket-book, abstracted it from the paper, and placed them side by side.—Not the variation of a hair in the length,—not the difference of a shade in their hue!—They were one and the same!—The most indifferent observer would have decided, as Basil was for a moment inclined to decide, that they had been shred from the same beloved head!—

But could this be?—What analogy,—what connexion could exist, or could ever have existed, between them?—The Money-lender of Greek Street, Soho, and the widow of Sir Bernard Annesley!—The haughty daughter of the proudest of ambassadors,—Lord L——, and the thrifty, artful usurer,—the degraded,—the notorious,—the infamous, A. O.!—

CHAPTER X.

Scarcely less sad than the scene in which young Annesley was officiating, was the one in which, at the same moment, his mother was acting a part equally humane, in her dreary abode at Barlingham Grange.

The old gardener was no more. The burst of feeling of which Basil had been a spectator, proved to have been the last effort of expiring nature; and it was the lady to whom from her childhood he had been devoted, who closed the glassy eyes of the old man, and placed the watch-lights beside the dead. Lady Annesley was, perhaps, the inmate of the Grange best qualified for that solemn duty. Her mind, rendered stern by habitual contact with care, was now of a consistency to encounter without trembling all or any of those earnest duties of life, from which the gentle hearts and hands of her sex shrink with terror, before either the one or the other have been wrung under the influence of anguish or remorse!—

Like one moving in her sleep, she had breathed in the ears of old Nicholas the prayers appointed by the Church for a dying bed; and if this effort were perhaps instigated by reluctance to expose the revelations of his infirm intellect to the ears of a stranger, it was no such apprehension that induced her to assist the sobbing Dorcas in straightening his limbs for the grave, ere consigned by the proper attendants to his last home.—Once placed in his coffin, she quitted the room;—quitted it with a heavy sigh,—an in-breathed prayer!—Early sorrows had been bitterly renewed by her trying attendance on the old man, who had unconsciously wounded her to the quick by his incoherent ravings;—and above all, by the hazard to which they had exposed her of betrayal to the child of her heart.—But he was now at rest.—Both had done their duty. The gray-headed man was released from his earthly penance;—it was she alone who remained to suffer and to atone!

Every person whose feelings have been excited by the performance of some severe and engrossing duty, must have been conscious of a strange vacuity of feeling when the influence of that painful tension is at an end. Like a sufferer whose infirm or shattered limb has been removed by the surgeon, undefinable sensations of uneasiness seem to possess its vacant place. So harassed had been Lady Annesley during the continuance of the gardener's illness, and the perpetual hazards to which it exposed her, that, on the afternoon of the day in which he was laid in the grave, when the old house was restored to its usual mournful quietude, and the two women in their mourning suits kept moving silently and sadly about her, she could not settle to her customary occupations. Involuntarily, she reëntered the room which had been appropriated to the use of the deceased;—the threshold of which she had never crossed of late save under the influence of awe and remorse. All was restored to its usual form. The winter sun was shining through the open casement; and driven back by the piercing atmosphere thus admitted, she had no resource but her own warm sitting-room, and the solace of her books and desk.

Nothing more common than for people of the world, on hearing some compulsory recluse complain of the cheerlessness of solitude, to exclaim,—"But why not read to amuse yourself?" in pursuance of the commonplace encomiums of "the sunshine of the mind produced by study," which our copy-book morality inflicts upon the use of schools. But the notion of reading for amusement entertained by such people, consists in a first-class subscription to a fashionable library, ensuring the earliest perusal of popular works,—new novels, brilliant periodicals,—holding up to the eye, as in a mirror, a reflection of the progress of civilisation, and a picture of the manners and prosperities of the day.

Lady Annesley's book-case, on the contrary, contained only old editions of the works of past centuries; philosophy rendered obsolete by modern improvement; and theology purporting to split so fine the straws of doctrinal casuistry, as to reduce them to chaff. The few sterling books she possessed, the bosom comforters to which we turn in sickness and sorrow, had been her sole companions for twenty lonely years; and with all one's partiality for a favourite writer, it is not more impossible for the dried leaves of the rose to retain the hue and fragrance of the living flower, than for the hundredth perusal to yield the charm of the first. It may indeed, perhaps, when voluntarily culled from the shelves of a voluminous library. But it is only the uninformed and unimaginative mind of the peasant that can derive amusement, Sunday after Sunday, throughout a long life, from his solitary volume of the "Pilgrim's Progress."

Lady Annesley had been more than once forced to admit to herself, that her little library had ceased to charm; and if she pined after anything in her seclusion, it was for the charm of new book to create a new order of ideas, or a happier combination of the old.—But on that cheerless afternoon, she felt as if those ancient companions of her sorrow might perhaps renew their charm; and in accordance with the promptings of the solemn scene of the morning, in the little village church wherein she had seen ashes reconsigned to ashes, and dust to dust, she proceeded to her book-shelf to take down her favourite Holbein, with its well-remembered philosophical interleavings.—It was gone!—The book was included in a set of six volumes of favourite works—The Essays of Montaigne, and George Herbert's Manual—all in the same antique binding. Of these, five alone remained;—the copy of Hollar was no longer there!—

Lady Annesley felt surprised and angry. So undisturbed was the tenor of her life, that no person but herself and her two waiting-women ever crossed the threshold of that chamber; of whom, Hannah could not read or write, while Dorcas was one of those fortunate individuals who find better companionship in the seam they are sewing, than the choicest chef-d'œuvre of genius.—Still, either the one or the other might have been tempted by the striking designs of the book, to remove it from the room for more leisurely inspection. She rang and inquired. Neither of them had ever noticed either the existence or the disappearance of the book!—She now demanded whether, during her attendance on the gardener, any stranger had been admitted into the room.

"No person whatever!" was the reply.

"Most strange and most vexatious!" was her rejoinder;—adding, in the depths of her heart,—"So few as are the relics I retain of those days,—so few and so precious,—ill could I afford to part with this!"—

"It was perhaps Master Basil who borrowed the book?" suggested Dorcas, struck with a brilliant idea. "The morning he was forced to remain here, after your ladyship's fainting fit, he was hours moping alone here, in the morning room. Perhaps he had begun to read it, and took it with him to finish on the road?"—

Lady Annesley expressed a contrary conviction, and dismissed her attendant. Yet so probable was the surmise, that the moment she was alone again, she seized a pen, and addressed an inquiry on the subject to her son. She had intended deferring till the morrow intelligence of the decease of poor old Nicholas; but so eager was her desire to assure herself of the fate of her book, that she lost not a moment.

Nothing could be more embarrassing than to address Basil on the subject of their old servant's demise; for she had ventured no subsequent explanation with her son after the terrible scene in which they had borne a part; and she was consequently uncertain whether suspicions had been excited on the part of Basil, or whether he attributed the terrible revelations of the gardener solely to aberration of intellect.

The moment, however, that her mind became possessed by anxiety concerning her beloved volume, she lost sight of these considerations; and after narrating to him with simple succinctness, the death and burial of one who, she said, "had been to her as a friend when her own kith and kin had deserted her—a good, faithful, and submissive servant, in days of adversity as in days more prosperous,"—she proceeded to inquire whether he could give her any tidings of the missing book.

"You are my only son, Basil," wrote Lady Annesley; "nay, the estrangement and prosperity of your sister render you my only heir. Yet a few years, and the little I possess will be your own. Even now, I am not, I trust, sparing in administering to your comfort,—or prodigal in the indulgence of my own. I cannot therefore think, Basil,—I would willingly not believe,—that you have surreptitiously abstracted from my house an object which you know I prize. How much I prize it, you are not able to conjecture. I shall go down to my grave, and neither you nor others will ever learn how dear—yet how cruel—are the recollections with which that relic is connected.—In my solitude here, I live but in the past. That which is gone—those who are gone, encompass me with an atmosphere holy and precious as themselves.—The Hope that abideth in you—the Memory that abideth in them,—hath a joy which is not of this world. I know not what I write; the loss of this book has disordered me!—It seems as if one of the unrestorable treasures of past affection were wrested from me for ever!—

"No delay, Basil, I entreat! Write to me, if you have any communication to make touching the object in question. Fear no reproaches on my part, if it should prove that your hands indeed removed it from my house. Too happy shall I be to welcome it back again, to hazard a single accusing word!"—

Such was the letter despatched from Barlingham Grange!—Such the letter which Basil Annesley drew from his pocket beside a decent camp-bed established in the attic of A. O., on the fifth morning after the critical night of his disorder.

So imminent had appeared the danger of the Money-lender on the morrow of his vigils, that young Annesley—doubly alarmed by the responsibility devolving on himself should the death of a man so richly endowed occur under his solitary guardianship and circumstances so suspicious,—had despatched the sweeper for the aid of his regimental surgeon; through whose means, he had subsequently procured a proper attendant, and a few of the necessaries of life.

Abednego was now too heavily oppressed by disease to take heed of the arrival of strangers or bedding in his attic; and all that Basil could do in excuse for their introduction into the treasury of treasuries, should the old man survive to question his proceedings, was to seal up the doors of the different rooms and the invaluable bureau, and give up a daily portion of his time to the superintendance of the establishment.—

Abednego was, however, more cognizant than he surmised of what was passing around him. He was aware of his own danger; aware of the urgent necessity for the precautions taken; and the nurse proving a decent, dull woman, content to sit quiet in view whenever not employed in serving him, he was better satisfied she should be there, than that the house should be surrendered to the discretion of Bill the sweeper.

Still, Basil had little idea how often, during his absence, the sufferer raised his head from his pillow, to inquire of the woman in attendance the hour of the day,—the length of time that had elapsed since the young man's departure,—and what promise he had given of return.—He had little idea how completely he imparted light and life to that sinking frame!—He could imagine, of course, that his disinterested services had proved acceptable to the infirm Money-lender. He knew that Abednego must be aware how solicitude in his behalf had exposed him to one of the most disagreeable dilemmas it had ever been his luck to encounter; and though such was the state of weakness consequent on the yielding of the quinsy, that they had as yet held no conversation on the subject, young Annesley naturally conceived the sufferer to be gratefully and kindly disposed.—It was enough for him, however, that so whimsical a being had not seen fit to resent his interference; and he looked forward to the convalescence of the invalid rather as a relief to himself from a painful and responsible attendance, than from any desire to receive his thanks or accord explanations in return.

The receipt of Lady Annesley's letter startled him into other feelings. It was urgent that he should regain possession of the book, and lose no time in restoring it to his mother. But how was this to be accomplished?—It had disappeared from the table, as well as the crucifix and paper containing the lock of hair; and the nurse, who seldom or never quitted the room, declared that she knew nothing of it. That the invalid, still scarcely able to lift his head from his pillow, should have removed it, appeared improbable; and Abednego was so weak, and, above all, so peevish from the effects of illness, that Basil had scarcely courage to molest him with inquiries.

"If he only surmised," thought young Annesley, as he sat contemplating the embarrassments of the case,—"how mysterious a resemblance exists between her hair for whose pleasure I require the book, and the lock he seems to treasure with such wild devotion, he would forgive my importunity."

On entering the room on the morning he received the letter, Basil accosted the invalid with his usual inquiries concerning his night's rest, and the visit of the surgeon.

"Your doctor is to come no more," said Abednego faintly. "I paid and dismissed him last night. It was only to satisfy you, I bore with him, as I now bear with the old woman dozing yonder in my easy chair. But for her being here, how do I know that you would not come tormenting me again at midnight, to light my fire, and snuff my candle?"

"By all this, Sir, I perceive that you feel much better!—It is only the man in health who quarrels with his physician. As to the nurse, you will admit her to be a safer guardian for you than a beggar from the street?" added Basil, in a lower voice.

"That is as it may prove!" retorted Abednego, gruffly. "In the time of the Plague, Defoe informs us, that such nurses used to twist the windpipes of their patients. Thank Heaven, I am now strong enough to take care of my own! However, till I can make my fire, and boil my kettle, she is welcome to remain. She 'finds herself,' as such people call it; and gives me less trouble than I give her. Nor is there much here," he continued, glancing round the naked walls, "to attract pilfering fingers."

"There were things here," Basil began,—perceiving that the nurse was really asleep, under the influence of a crackling fire on a frosty day.—"there were objects here, at the commencement of your illness, which I see no longer; and the disappearance of which makes me somewhat uneasy."

"How mean you?"—cried Abednego, raising himself on his elbow, and pushing aside the curtains to peer out upon the bureau, which contained property to the amount of thousands upon thousands!—

"No need to look so far, or so anxiously!" observed Basil. "The things I speak of are of no such urgent value,—save perhaps to you and myself:—an iron crucifix, a timeworn book"—

"And what do you suppose to have become of them, pray?" cried Abednego, sharply,—letting fall the curtain, and sinking back again on his pillow.

"I was in hopes, Sir, you might be able to inform me."

"And if I were—are you so miserly with your property that you cannot trust me with an old book?"—

"I would trust you with any property belonging to myself;—the care you take of your own satisfies me that mine would run no danger of being mislaid while in your keeping. Unluckily, I have little either to lend or to give; so that you are unlikely to be much the better for my confidence."

"But when I tell you that, valueless as it may seem to you, I hold to that book—"

"I should still be under the necessity of—"

"When I tell you," persisted Abednego, not heeding his interruption, "that it is my comfort by day and by night,—that in the anguish of my disease, it lay upon my bosom, and soothed its throbbings,—that, in the darkness of my despair, it shed light and peace around me, as from the wings of an angel—"

Basil began to entertain an opinion that the senses of the invalid were again wandering!—

"When I swear to you, that while treasured here,—here, beneath my pillow,—here, side by side with the emblem of eternal redemption,—dear to me as to yourself, although the lying world opprobriate me by the name of Jew,—it has yielded me more confort than the Cross of Faith, with all its promises of heaven;—do you still desire to take it from me?—No, no! Basil, leave it,—leave it,—unless you wish to see me sink again into the bruised and breathless mummy to which I was reduced when you snatched me from the grave!"—

Basil Annesley was silent. To dispute with him on a point that seemed so trifling, at a moment thus critical, seemed an act of cruelty; yet to disappoint the anxious expectations of Lady Annesley, was a deed yet more unpardonable.

"I told you, Sir," said he, in a hesitating tone, and after a long pause, "that the book was not my own, and that I had abstracted it from home without the concurrence of my mother."

"Well?"—demanded Abednego, again drawing aside the curtains, and fixing his piercing eyes upon those of his visiter.

"She has demanded it back again. She is greatly displeased at my having removed it from Barlingham."

"Send her down the last new novel from Hookham's!" muttered A. O., with bitter scorn;—"the lady will doubtless consider it a profitable exchange!"—

"You are too presumptuous, Sir, in deciding upon the tastes and feelings of a perfect stranger," retorted Basil, with spirit. "You little know the woman you pretend to judge!—Never in my days did I see a novel in the hands of my mother! Her studies are severe as her conduct is exemplary."

"A saint, eh?—Then send her a bale of sermons from Hatchard's! What matter under what form the weak nature of woman accepts its subjugating influence? Novels,—poems,—tracts—"

"In one word," said Basil, drawing Lady Annesley's letter from his pocket, "read, and judge for yourself, whether a woman, so exalted in heart and mind as the writer of this, is likely to accept ANY exchange for the book she prizes!"

On seeing his mother's sacred handwriting pass into the withered hands of Abednego, Basil almost repented the concession he had made. It was degrading a letter of hers to expose it to the eyes of a Money-lender!—The deed, however, was done!

In order to give time to A. O., in his weak condition, for the perusal of the letter, Basil Annesley walked gently to the window so as not to rouse the nurse from her doze. There was nothing very interesting in the look out. A mass of icicles, appended to the leaden water-pipe of the opposite attic, was the most interesting object he found to contemplate.

At the close of a few minutes, he returned to the bedside, intending to resume his conversation with Abednego; but all was still as the grave!—No movement—not a sound!—The old man uttered not a word, and made no attempt to give back the letter. At last, in a gentle voice of expostulation, Basil addressed him, and addressed him in vain!

Young Annesley now drew aside the curtains of the bed; and found that no vestige of its inmate was perceptible. Abednego had gathered up the bedclothes over his head. Like some mourner of Scriptural times, he had covered his face with his garment, and was weeping bitterly.—

Agitated, in his turn, by this unaccountable emotion, Basil Annesley was beginning to feel intolerably bewildered by the baffling mysteries that seemed to involve the fatal volume, his removal of which from Barlingham had been the cause of such general disturbance.—

"For the love of Heaven, Sir!" cried he, "explain all this!—Explain the interest which you and every one else appears to attach to that accursed book,—the source of distress to all with whom I am concerned!"

Still, Abednego answered not a syllable. By the movements of the clothes in which he had enveloped himself, Basil could alone infer the struggles of his emotion.

"I beseech you, Sir," cried the young man, after a second pause, "if you entertain the least kindness for me,—if you feel towards me a thousandth part of the goodwill which has prompted my own exertions in your behalf,—tell me the meaning of your tears. They had not been wrung out of such a soul as yours, save by some all-powerful interest. You are not woman-hearted, to weep for wantonness, or from the weakness of mere exhaustion. —Tell me—"

"I can tell you nothing," murmured Abednego, uncovering his face, and showing the letter of Lady Annesley crushed in his hand by the grasp of uncontrollable passion,—"save that this letter has roused emotions dormant for years. I had not thought,—I had not dreamed,—that this woman had retired from the world to ponder over feelings such as these!"—and again, with trembling hand, he grasped the letter.—"I believed her cold and callous as she was once worldly!—I believed,—but no matter!—These few words have wrung a dew out of the stony depths of my heart, of which I believed the fountains to be long dried up!—Thanks, Basil Annesley,—this is not the first benefit you have bestowed upon me!—Thanks!—Here,—take your book!" he continued, drawing the volume from beneath his pillow. "But, unless you would convulse her heart with agony, as you have unwittingly convulsed mine, tell her not, on your life, through what strange hands it has experienced a momentary transit!—Unless you wish to be expulsed for ever from your mother's house,—unless you wish to incur her malediction,—never, never, while you live, breathe in the ear of that unhappy woman, the reprobated name of Abednego Osalez!"—

Ere the sufferer ceased to speak, his voice was becoming lost in broken sobs; and so terrible and absorbing was his emotion, that Basil had not courage to pursue the anxious inquiries suggesting themselves to his mind. He was overpowered by the spectacle of so profoundly-felt a grief.—In order to relieve the feelings of the old man from his observation, he again rose and walked to the window, in order to straighten and restore to his pocket the book and crumpled letter replaced in his hands by Abednego.

By the time he finished his task and returned to the bedside, the old man had completely recovered his self-possession, and was lying with his face exposed in all its usual harsh composedness of feature.

"You are the comptroller of my household now," said he, addressing Basil with a grim attempt at a smile. "Tell me,—does the poor boy still officiate as my lackey?"—

"Bill is installed down stairs, Sir, to answer the inquiries of your numerous visiters," replied Basil, somewhat startled by his change of tone.

"Ay, ay?—I wonder, while you were about it, you had not the street laid with straw, and the knocker tied up, as for some dainty goosecap's lying-in!"—muttered Abednego, forcing a laugh.

"Perhaps I might have done so, Sir, but from the fear of offending you," replied Basil, attempting to smile in his turn. "Methinks I have taken liberties enough in your establishment."

"My illness must have caused no little commotion among my customers!" resumed Abednego, evidently intent upon distracting Basil's recollections from his recent struggle of feeling.—"There are more people interested in the life and death of A. O. than in the fairest of the childbed puppets in fine linen, we were talking of!—Sore are their misgivings, poor prodigal souls, concerning the hands into which, on my decease, their bonds and securities might fall!—To them it is a matter of fame and name that the heir of the old Jew should prove a man as trustworthy as himself!"—

"There has been some anxiety testified, Sir, I must admit, if that be any consolation to you," replied young Annesley. "Every day, from twelve till two, the door is besieged, I am told, with applicants, concerning not alone your house in Greek Street, but dozens of other houses.—But as I am by no means qualified to act as your clerk or deputy, you must consult Bill on your recovery. Having little appetite for business, I have left all such matters in his hands."

"But my letters?"—inquired A. O., feeling, or affecting anxiety.

"As soon as you are better, the boy shall bring them up to you."

"I am better,—I am better,—I am quite well already!"—cried his companion, settling himself in bed. "I am always well enough for business!"—

Having roused up the nurse by a touch on the shoulder, Basil now despatched her down stairs in search of the letters and papers left for A. O.; of which, on her return, she brought back an apronfull.

"I find that you have had certain fair inquirers," observed Basil, while the woman was away,—"fully confirming your former attestation to me of the advantages of a Money-lender's calling!—You have had those pressing and sueing to be admitted to see you,—to be admitted to see whom, others are eager suitors!—You have had the Duke of Rochester here twice a-day, evidently believing your illness to be a subterfuge; and in the other room, there is a whole bale of necessaries,—sugar, arrow-root, wax candles,—despatched to you, not by a grocer's wife, (as the nature of the gift seems to indicate,) but by no less a person than the lovely Countess of Winterfield!"—

Abednego replied by a hoarse chuckle,—

"I should starve, but for that woman; and her family might starve but for me!" cried he, turning exultingly on his pillow. "She is the purveyor of my larder—the clerk of my kitchen! Well, well! I am at least as grateful to her for her sago, taploca, and Welsh flannel, (of which you might have found wholesale pieces had you looked in the lumber-room below, when you and the nurse were smothering me up the other night,)—as she to the memory of the husband who made her what she is, and whose portrait I have in pawn yonder in my bureau!"—

The nurse now reëntered the room with her burthen; and having deposited the papers on a chair beside the bed, Basil dismissed her, in order that Abednego might examine them undisturbed by her presence.

"Show me the minister who has a more voluminous correspondence on his hands than this!" cried the old man, pointing exultingly to the pile of papers.—"And, pray, who paid the postage of all these letters?"—

"I did, Sir; that is, I supplied the money to your servant."

"So, so!—you institute yourself my banker then, as well as my maitre d'hôtel and groom of the chambers?—With all my heart!—I am always ready to accept services and comforts I have not to pay for,—witness the tea and sugar of my Lady Winterfield!—Look here!"—he continued, pointing out, among the letters he was successively opening, several with seals that bore aristocratic emblazonments,—"Dukes, Marquises, Earls,—I have them all, all in my train! I walk like a king at his coronation, with Howards, Percys, Plantagenets, in the wake of the contemned and trampled A. O.!—Thriftless fools!—some flattering,—some cajoling,—some threatening!—as if any single word they could write or utter would influence me more than the winter's wind whistling through the crannies of my casement,—unless, indeed, the Open-Sesame called INTEREST!—at twenty per cent., fifty per cent., a hundred per cent.,—I am willing to hear of their bonds and post-obits, their wants and distresses! But what care I for the executions in their houses, or the seizure of their family plate, or their wife's jewels! Here's a fellow writes to me," pursued Abednego, striking the open letter in his hand, "begging me to save the honour of his family mansion from the desecration of sheriffs' officers, and swearing he will not survive such a disgrace!—Was it I who brought the disgrace upon him?—Was it I who decoyed him to Crockford's?—Was it I who induced him to hazard thousands, night after night, at piquet, when he had not even hundreds at his disposal? Don't let him survive his disgrace!—not the disgrace of bailiffs, but that of insolvency, brought upon himself by prodigality and vice!—When he first applied to me for assistance, he informed me, in answer to my remonstrances, (much in the terms once used by a certain Mr. Basil Annesley,) that he came for money, not advice,—that he wanted a Jew, and not a family chaplain!"—

Basil was vexed to find himself colouring deeply at this allusion.

"And here," continued A. O., bringing forward a perfumed billet from among the wafered communications of attorneys and stockbrokers—ill-favoured epistles from Birchin Lane, Bartlett's Buildings, and Hart Street, Bloomsbury,—"here is a dainty creature who wants me to oblige her with the loan of her own emeralds to appear at Windsor Castle!—The guest of royalty, forsooth!—yet writing in terms more abject than I ever heard used by Bill the sweeper to an old Money-lender!—More delicate handwritings.—'Lucy Maitland?'—Ay, ay!—the old-china fancier!—And here, Basil—here, Mr. Annesley, is the first application of one of your brother officers!—My eye has been upon that boy these two months!—I knew I should soon have him in my books,—that is, trying to get into my books; for I have enough of the family affairs on my hands with those of his precious uncle."

"Wilberton?—is he in difficulties?" exclaimed Annesley in a tone of regret.

"Why not?—He keeps the finest company; and has a taste for opera-dancers,—as costly an item for a boy in the Guards as Sevres and Dresden to his mother. You needn't blush again—I did not say opera singers, Mr. Annesley. Trust to my delicacy to make no allusion in your presence to any such fragile commodities!"—

"I do trust to your delicacy never again to allude, with light mention, to the person at whom, though under so false a designation, you are aiming!"—cried Basil, with warm indignation.

"Well, well,—no offence, no offence! Esther Verelst is, I dare say, no more fragile than her neighbours; though that implies no great things in the way of discretion.—'H. R.'—So! then, my Pericles of the day! the five thousand for which you pledged your public honour, and the title-deeds of an estate, in your family since they wheedled it out of the scurvy soul of James I., has not sufficed you?—You must cut a figure as a giver of banquets, must you, as well as on the Treasury Bench?—What is the joy of place, I marvel, unless its salary suffice to grease the wheels of office?—'The expenses of his very ostensible situation to be maintained!' he writes.—Jackass!—Because he chooses to have Rhenish wines and French entrees at his dinner, and to be a fop and a fribble as well as the first orator of the day, must he needs make false pretences to the Jews about 'the expenses of his ostensible situation?'—Excellent H. R.!—though you date from Downing Street, you will not throw dust in the eyes of A.O.!—Were you half the clever fellow the world believes you, your letter would contain three lines.—'I want two thousand pounds,—can give landed security, and not more than twelve per cent.'—That is coming to the point;—between knowing one and knowing one, the best statesmanship. I should have thought the experience of office might have taught him the futility of fine phrases,—mere loss of time to writer and reader!—It is not by locking up brickbats in a plate-chest, Mr. Basil Annesley, that you can convert them into family plate."—

"I am afraid you will tire yourself, Sir," said Basil. "I would fain see you take some nourishment before I go. Let me call up the nurse, and lay aside the remainder of these papers till the afternoon; for I have only a few minutes more to be here."—

"No, no!—you must wait a bit!" cried Abednego.—"I have something to say to you. I have a present to make you."—

"I want no presents!"—cried Basil, instantly rising, and preparing for departure. "I never accepted one in my life, save from kinsman or friend."

"From the former, I suspect, my poor Basil, your gifts have been scanty enough!"—ejaculated Abednego, with a degree of familiarity that served only to aggravate the displeasure of his companion.—"With respect to the latter, I flatter myself I have as good a title to the name as such flimsy things as Wilberton or Maitland."

"They are my brother officers,—not my friends!"—interrupted young Annesley.

"Then, how came you to accept from the latter the desk-seal, with which you daily seal your letters?"—demanded Abednego, having thrown young Annesley completely off his guard, and enjoying his uncontrollable start of astonishment at this minuteness of information concerning his private affairs. "But no matter! I will not force my benefactions upon you.—I do not deal in jasper desk-seals; and any day I choose, the Duca di San Catalda will give me a hundred ducats for the miniature I intended to throw away upon you.—Good morning!"—

The attention of Basil Annesley was arrested by mere mention of the name of the Duca di San Catalda. He was eager for a pretext to sit down again, and await an opportunity of renewing the conversation.

"I forgot to tell you, Sir," said he, "that among the applicants for the loan of the house in Greek Street, is a picture dealer who resides in that neighbourhood."

"Apropos to miniatures?" demanded Abednego, fixing his shrewd eyes, with a cunning smile, upon the young man's face.

"Apropos to your own affairs!" was the indignant rejoinder of Basil.

"As regards my own affairs, then, be so obliging as to inform my ragged footman, pray, when you go down, that when Mr. Stubbs calls again——"

"You know him, then?"—

"You told me his name, just now."

"I said a picture dealer in Soho. There are dozens upon dozens of such!"

"No matter! I know enough of the prying and intrusive dispositions of a certain Mr. Stubbs, to feel convinced that he is the man who, with the view of entering into personal communication with me on ANY subject, is likely to pretend a desire of becoming my tenant.—I desire none such!—He is a swindler and a liar. I will have none of him! I say,—let Bill inform the blackguard I will have none of him!"—

"You need not address yourself so pointedly to me, my dear Sir!" said Basil, unable to repress a laugh. "I am not the advocate of Mr. Stubbs. You might pitch him out of yonder window before I should lift a hand in his behalf. I merely mentioned to you that the boy complains of his coming here every morning between twelve and two, insisting upon seeing you on the subject of your house, conceiving you might be sorry to lose a good tenant."

"A good tenant in Mr. Jeremiah Stubbs?—But no matter!—He has no more real intention of engaging those premises, than you of bidding for Northumberland House!—Besides, I am in no such torture about the lease of my house in Soho! I have half a dozen others standing empty,—one in Park Lane,—one in St. James's Square,—and I shall soon have one, I suspect, in Arlington Street; for unless I am much mistaken, I shall be forced to make a crash at Lord Maitland's. I have given him three years' law to redeem engagements, which I knew from the first to be thousands upon thousands beyond his power of redemption!"

"Lord Maitland?"—exclaimed Basil, aghast.

"Ay! Lord Maitland!—Why not, as well as another?"

"But his unfortunate wife and daughters——"

"His wife is some degrees worse than unfortunate.—But that is her concern, and her husband's. As to their hopeful progeny, it is written that the sins of parents are to be visited on their children; and seldom were less deserving children exposed to ancestral retribution.—Like father, like son;—like mother, like daughters;—all empty-headed fools together! But that his Lordship has been trying to defraud me of my just due, I should, however, have felt disposed to deal less harshly with him. But when I find a fellow profiting by his privilege of peerage to——"

"Pardon me if I entreat you to give me no undue insight into the private affairs of my friends," —interrupted Basil, again rising from his chair, on finding that they were straying further and further from the miniature.

"Ay, ay!—You are afraid of finding your chains of gold mere pinchbeck.—You want an excuse to your conscience for continuing to flirt with Lord Maitland's giddy daughters, to eat his pine-apples, and drink his claret,—though certain that, by payment, they are no more his than yours!" cried A. O., with a caustic sneer.—"What curious calculations might one make, after some royal or noble banquet, of the number and names of the persons at whose real expense the noble guests have been entertained!—Messrs. Grove, the fishmonger,—Giblett, the butcher,—Fisher, the poulterer,—Gunter, the confectioner,—Fortnum, the grocer,—Morel, the oilman,—Durand, the wine merchant,—Garcia, the fruiterer!"—

"You are at least making out a very tempting bill of fare, Sir," interrupted Basil, anxious to get away.—"I can discern a Barmecide's feast through this bare muster-roll of names."—

"You are that filthy thing, a gourmand, then, as well as the slave of a pretty face?"—coolly demanded the old man.—"Well, well! God mend you!—In my time, young men were content with the vices of young men!—Now-a-days, they monopolise the weaknesses of boyhood and senility, —reconciling all extremes,—the follies of beardless chins and greybeards!"—

"I must again say, good morning, Sir, since you seem disposed to take me so severely to task," said Basil, abruptly.

"Before you go, however, I have a service to request of you," said Abednego, suddenly lowering his voice. "Don't be afraid!—I am not going to ask you for the book again. You have wisely put it into your pocket, and I honour your caution. All I have to request is, that you will break with your own hands the seals you prudently placed on yonder bureau. Here is the key!" said he, producing one which Basil had already noticed under his pillow, when they effected the sick man's change of bed.

Having readily complied with Abednego's desire, Annesley stood awaiting his further orders.

"Touch the head of the brass nail to the left of the last pigeon hole,"—said Abednego,—leaning on his elbow, and watching the proceedings of his delegate.

Basil Annesley did as he was required; when, lo! there started up, from the bottom of the old-fashioned bureau, a trap or hide, the well of which contained a variety of articles, apparently of less value than those which lay unguarded and exposed above.

"You will find a brown paper packet among those trinkets," said Abednego. "Take it out,—close the trap,—and see that the spring is secure! —Then lock the bureau, and bring me the key and the parcel."

More amused than angry at the imperative tone in which these orders were conveyed, Basil obeyed.

In another minute, he had laid both upon the pillow; and was again taking his leave, when Abednego bad him wait a moment.

With trembling hands, the old man was proceeding to undo the packet.

"Can I assist you, Sir?"—said Basil, conceiving that it was with this view Abednego had delayed his departure.

The old man answered not a word; though his hands trembled so exceedingly, that it was evident he would have some difficulty in accomplishing his purpose. There was a knot in the slight cord that tied up the packet.

"Better cut it!"—said Annesley, after a few minutes lost in unfructuous attempts, and presenting a penknife from his pocket-book for that purpose.

"Waste not—want not!" murmured the old man, in a feeble voice; and after another moment or two, Annesley perceived, to his utter amazement, that, in spite of Abednego's homely proverb, and deliberate parsimony, his feelings were so deeply involved in his task, that tears were actually falling upon the little parcel!—

"Again thus agitated!"—thought Basil. "This must be the very weakness of disease!—Twice in one day, for this iron man to evince tokens of sensibility!—Yet, who would believe me, were I to assert that I had seen tears shed by the stony eyes of A. O.!"

The packet was now open;—but Abednego's hands had not ceased to tremble, or his tears to fall!—

It contained only a miniature case; and Basil's heart began to beat strongly on recalling to mind the recent allusion of his host to such an object, in connexion with the Duca di San Catalda.

"Accept this from me!"—said the old man, placing it open in his hands.

And to the utter wonderment of Basil Annesley, he found, on opening the case, that it contained a beautiful enamel copy of Verelst's exquisite picture of the Esmeralda,—the female figure of which presenting a striking likeness of his beloved Esther!

The gift was indeed inestimable!—But by what strange series of coincidences was he indebted for such a treasure to the munificence of the Money-lender—A. O.?—

AFGHAUNISTAN—PRO AND CON.

KYBER PASS.

My song a mournful muse invokes:
Pale, bleeding o'er the vale she stands,
  Wildly waving forth her hands,
Where Kyber, from his snow-clad rocks,
Poured down his fierce, insatiate bands,
To bathe their keen, deceitful brands
In blood that looks to heaven, and smokes
  For Vengeance on their cursed lands.

The troop has reached the fatal vale—
Slowly the lengthening lines ascend;—
The crags in horrid tumult bend:—
Each eye is fixed—each cheek is pale;
  For, rising like a fitful gale,
A thousand echoing voices blend—
The heralds of a dreadful tale!

Gleaming athwart the firmament,
Like fiends by frenzied Murder sent,
  Wild figures blot the sky;
While one dire havoc, deeply pent,
Ten thousand bosoms' element
  Bursts like a flood on high;
And they who dare, and they who fly,
In one wide waste of death are blent,— Unburied there to lie.

The horseman rears his battle blade;
Secure the vengeful foemen crowd:
High, hanging like a thunder cloud,
  He falls—nor asks for aid.
The startled steed defiance neighs,—
Son of the desert! think not now
Thy freely-tossing mane will flow,
  As in the pride of other days,
  O'er half a nation low;
When sandy plain and sunny slope
Beheld thee rise, the Arab's hope,
Where Carmel's rocky mountain smiled
Upon thy birth, proud desert child!
High towers his head—quick heaves his breath—
The sun, like lightning, gilds his mane—
It ne'er will see it float again—
He sinks—the majesty of death!

Swift from the musket's deadly throat
The winged wanderer flies:
The mountain chieftain's wild war-note
Throbs on his tongue, and dies.
With streaming robe, and grasping hands,
A thousand feet beneath his bands
  The bleeding wretch is driven;
While coloured shawl, and caftan rent,
Wave far along the dread descent,
  Prone from the verge of heaven.

In vain, alas! devoted brave,
Firm as the rock that marks your grave,
In crowded rank ye stand;—
One effort more—one thought of home—
A prayer to heaven—then bid your hand,
With dying grasp, and dripping brand,
  Carve o'er your bloody tomb—
"The glory of an injured land
  In Vengeance yet will come!"

CRUSH THE AFGHAUN!

Crush the Afghaun! Why does he dare
  To claim man's birth-right and be free!
Go, slay him in his mountain lair,
  Go, teach him magnanimity.
Tell him about your gentle creed,
  Good will and Peace to wildest horde,
And preach it while his heart shall bleed,
  Revenge the grace that plunged your sword.

What is he, the bold Moslem thief,
  Rude Gheber, Bhuddist, blind Hindu!
All but your orthodox belief
  He dares to have:—wants freedom too!
Lifts he his sword 'gainst British wrong!
  Plucks he the lion by the mane!
The Rebel! Is not Britain strong!
  Sweep forth his race from hill and plain:

Go, crush the Afghaun! Ask him why
  He, dog! prefers his will to yours!
Full many a slave, 'neath ev'ry sky,
  Your mighty Helotry endures;
Toils to fill your cheating coffers,
  Your bondage feels, nor dares to sigh;
Who are Afghauns! Crush the scoffers,
  They dare refuse!—Then let them die.

Pomp of empire, blood-cemented!
  —Witness ye orphans', widows' tears;
Strife by treachery fomented,
  Proud conquests of a thousand years;
Can the mountain jackals tarnish
  All your glorious long array!
Christian Love is gloxing varnish,
  Shout out Revenge!—like Christians slay.

Kind,—you wished to ease the burden
  Which Freedom's independence gave;
He, for bonds of steel and hurden,
  Took all the promises you gave.
Stiff-neckèd! not to trust you better,
  Freedom,—a free man loves to be,
He broke your pious Christian fetter,
  And you denounced, for tyranny.

So, crush the Afghaun! now be bruited
  Throughout your realm,—with noble port,
Magnanimously spurred and booted,
  Ride down his children—spoil their sport.
Strew bones to bleach, and skulls to whiten,
  In every gorge round Afghaun's throne;
And, your triumphant march to heighten,
  Be careful that they're not your own.

MEMOIRS OF JEREMY BENTHAM.*

The Memoirs of Bentham, up to middle-age, have already appeared in a series of articles in Tait's Magazine, from the pen of his latest and most confidential friend, as well as his best beloved disciple, Dr. Bowring. On this gentleman Bentham fully relied, both for giving his works to the world in as perfect a shape as possible; and for letting posterity see, without disguise, what kind of man, in his daily private life, the most original thinker, and the most eminent jurisconsult, of the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries had been.

After so many pages, filled with Memoirs of Bentham, from the pen of Dr. Bowring, have appeared under our immediate sanction, it would, perhaps, be hardly graceful, or even decorous, to advert here, in any shape, to the manner in which he has performed his delicate and very onerous duties. There can, however, be no breach of decorum in adverting to the earnest spirit, the minute fidelity, and, above all, the affectionate warmth of feeling with which he has performed his sacred office to the dead. Bentham, in all the simplicity and truthfulness of his everyday life, and, as seen close at hand, has, to his biographer, appeared so truly great and amiable, and, in spite of his little foibles or peculiarities, (perhaps in some degree for them,) was so worthy of affection and reverence, that his biographer may have revealed trifling matters which more imparial or indifferent historians had thought better left in the shade, suppressed, or passed over with slight notice.

The period over which this new portion of the Memoirs extends comprehends above forty years: from 1792, when Bentham was in his forty-fourth year, until his death in 1832. The events are few, as the greater part of those years were spent in nearly entire seclusion from what is commonly called society; yet the narrative of their lapse is pregnant with matter, as the retired philosopher was cognizant, and, indeed, intently watchful of the complicated political movements of society, and personally acquainted with many of the most distinguished leaders of public affairs, during the various revolutions both of Europe and America.

Presuming that our readers cannot have forgotten those earlier portions of Bentham's Memoirs which appeared in our pages, we may now mention, that about the year 1792 his father died; and his income, already sufficient, if not ample for his wants, was increased by his succession to the family property in Queen's Square Place, and to farms in Essex yielding from £500 to £600 a-year. He appears to have immediately settled in the house in which he died forty years afterwards; though he often occupied country residences, and in particular Ford Abbey, which he calls "a monkish and magnificent place," and which, with the fine grounds, he rented for several years. He, at all times, as has been noticed, maintained a rather extensive correspondence with the most distinguished of the leaders in the great political and social movements, both of the new and the old world; and was, in his retreat, visited by the more remarkable of those foreigners who came to London for purposes of a liberal kind. An invitation to dinner given to one of those persons, General Santander, amusingly describes his precise locality:—

"1*st July*, 1840.

"Dinner with the Hermit, at the Hermitage, a quarter past seven on Monday. On entering St. James's Park by the gate, called Storey's gate, at the end of the street called Great George Street, you will find yourself in the alley called the Bird-cage Walk: midway in this alley are the barracks for recruits. Before reaching this building, you will see a garden entered by an iron-rail gate, near the barracks, where you will see a sentinel. Having entered this gate, you will find yourself in a narrow path, which takes you in a straight line to a walk, where there is another iron gate, which you will find open. Enter by it, and you will find yourself in another garden, on the left of which is the house I inhabit. You will mount by a step, which takes you to a door; and you will find yourself in a small hall, with a staircase before you, and a small chamber at the left, at whose door you will knock: as to porters, or other men-servants, they are a sort of animals not kept in my den."

In lieu of these animals, he kept as secretaries, young men, whom he honoured with the name of his "Reprobates;" and of whom he seems to have had a numerous succession. Besides these regular inmates, he frequently had guests domesticated with him—though never but with a view to those great objects to which his life, and every hour of it, were unreservedly dedicated. His letters to some of these individuals will best describe his domestic habits. The first is addressed to Mr. W. Thompson, of Cork, who had consulted him on the subject of establishing a Chrestomathic school in Cork, on the plan which Bentham had unfolded in his Chrestomathia. Having given this gentleman all the information and advice in his power, as to his laudable scheme, the correspondence is concluded by this invitation, which, with the next, to a more distinguished Irishman, we copy; as they vividly exhibit the interior of Bentham's hermitage in the heart of the busy world:—

"29*th September*, 1819.

"During your stay in London, my hermitage, such as it is, is at your service, and you will be expected in it. I am a single man, turned of seventy; but as far from melancholy as a man need be. Hour of dinner, six; tea, between nine and ten; bed, a quarter before eleven. Dinner and tea in society; breakfast, my guests, whoever they are, have at their own hour, and by themselves; my breakfast, of which a newspaper, read to me to save my weak eyes, forms an indispensable part, I take by myself. Wine I drink none, being, in that particular, of the persuasion of Jonadab the son of Rechab. At dinner, soup as constantly as if I were a Frenchman, an article of my religion learnt in France : meat, one or two sorts, as it may happen ; ditto sweet things, of which, with the soup, the principal part of my dinner is composed. Of the dessert, the frugality matching with that of the dinner. Coffee for any one that chooses it."

When, in the year 1828, he entered into a correspondence with O'Connell, from whose zealous coöperation in Law Reform he anticipated great benefit to the cause ever nearest his heart, in inviting him as a permanent guest, we find Bentham thus describing his domestic habits :—

"17*th July*, 1828.

"To obviate disappointment, it is necessary that my peculiar manner of living should be known to you. My lamp being so near to extinction, and so much remaining to do by such feeble light as it is able to give, I never (unless of necessity, and then for as short a time as may be) see anybody but at dinner hour, that which is here a customary one—seven o'clock. As to place, I never dine anywhere but in my workshop, where the table admits not of more than five. Having learned, from long observation, that as in love so in business, when close discussion is necessary, every third person is a nuisance ; in addition to any inmate I may have, I never have more than one person to dine with me—a person whom either my inmate or myself may have been desirous to hold converse with. After the little dessert, the visiter of the day, if mine, stays with me ; if my inmate's, goes with him into the inmate's room till tea-time—my two young constant inmates taking, as above, their departure of course. The evening, not later than to half after eleven, is the only time I could regularly spare for conference, so far as regards the purpose of questioning. Your mornings would be passed in reading any stuff in print, or in manuscript, or in receiving explanation from some young friend of mine, or in ambulatory conference, for health's sake, in the garden with me. Let not the word appal you, for, how much soever your inferior in wit, you would not find me so in gaiety. My abode, you see, is not without strict propriety termed a hermitage. Servant of the male sex, none—cookery, for a hermit's, tolerably well spoken of. As to the hermit himself, smell he has absolutely none left ; taste, next to none ; wine, such as it is, guests, of course, drink as they please—the hermit none. None better has he to invite you to than a few remaining bottles of Hock laid in in 1793 ; older, at any rate, than that which Horace invited his friend to in an Ode I have not looked upon these seventy years."

To this invitation Mr. O'Connell, who seems to have been a cordial and sincere admirer of Bentham, replied in this warm strain :—

"Would to Heaven I could realize your plan ! how I should relish a political retreat in your hermitage, to prepare for all of practical utility that my faculties enable me to effectuate ! But I cannot leave Ireland. The progress of political and moral improvement seems to me to want my assistance here ; and certainly there would be some retardation in the machinery, if my shoulder was not constantly at the wheel, and my back on the shoulders of those who help to force it forward. Without a metaphor, I am not able to leave Ireland, even for the purpose of replenishing myself with the reasons of that political faith which is in me. I am, in good truth, your zealous, if you will not allow me to call myself your humble disciple. It is said somewhere, that Irishmen frequently catch glimpses of sublime theories, without being able to comprehend the entire plan. For my part, I certainly see a part, and would wish to comprehend the details of the whole. My device is yours :—'The greatest possible good to the greatest possible number.' And I say it with sincerity, that no man has ever done so much to show how this object could be realized, as you have. I sincerely wish I could devote the rest of my life to assist in realizing this object ; but my profession gives my family at present between six and seven thousands of pounds in the year, and I cannot afford to deprive them of that sum : all I can do, is, to dedicate to political subjects, as much time as can be torn from my profession.

"I am deeply imbued with the opinion that our procedure is calculated to produce anything but truth and justice ; and if ever they are elicited, it is by accident, and at an expense of time and principle which ought both to be otherwise employed. How is it possible that law stamps and law fees have survived—about forty years, I think—your protest !

"I am also convinced, that, to be without a code, is to be without justice. Who shall guard the guardians !—who shall judge the judges !—A code ! Without a code, the judges are the only efficient and perpetual legislature. There is a melancholy amusement in seeing how the 'scoundrels'—pardon me—do sometimes legislate. In England, it is bad enough. In Ireland, where the checks (such as they are) of parliamentary talk, and of the press, are either totally removed or rendered nearly powerless, the mischief of judicial legislation, is felt in its most mischievous, ludicrous, and criminal operation.

"Mr. Brougham's evils are plain, and sometimes well displayed. His remedies are but patches placed on a threadbare and rent coat, and cut out of an unused remnant of the original cloth."

Unfortunately, some of the persons to whom Bentham's kindness of heart laid him open, were neither remarkable for gratitude, nor for a very nice sense of propriety. Among the latter class was JOHN NEAL, who requited his confidence and his hospitality, in a manner which Dr. Bowring blames only with too much gentleness, when he says :—

The rough republican frequently annoyed Bentham by his abruptness and incaution. His mind and manners had not been trained to that gentle and courteous bearing which so peculiarly distinguished Bentham, and to whose absence he could not reconcile himself. Quarrels with Bentham's servants added to the perplexities of his position : yet they parted with mutual, and, no doubt, sincere expressions of good will. . . .

Speaking of John Neal, Bentham said,—

"Neal's 'Brother Jonathan' is really the most execrable stuff that ever fell from mortal pen. No probability—no interest—no character resembling human character. Neal is a nondescript. We have no such being here : he was always cheerful and talkative—and talked on every subject with equal confidence. I might as well have had a rattlesnake in my house as that man."

Though entertaining an antipathy to the whole "rattlesnake" genus, Bentham was fond of animals, and especially of cats, which are often, probably from juxtaposition, pets of the studious and retired man. He was also fond of solemn music, and had an organ in his "workshop," which was played while he and his inmates, or guests, sat at dinner. Upon a platform in this apartment, which seems, in some sort, to have been library and study, as well as dining-room,—

Stood a bookcase named "the Caroccio," which he could reach without leaving his chair, and a reading stand with the MSS. on which he was occupied, a plate with writing materials, sticks, pens, and pins, wax, scissors, &c. The table was never removed. Opposite him was an arm-chair for a single visiter, for he did not like to have conversation divided and distracted by the presence of many persons. One, sometimes two secretaries dined with him, who were honoured with the name of "Reprobates." Himself he liked to call "the Hermit," and his house "the Hermitage."

A usual phrase on the arrival of a visiter for dinner was, "Let me whisk you round the garden. I always indulge in an ante-prandial circumgyration." The first time (says Dr. Bowring) I visited him, when he came to a corner of the garden, in which is a fine sycamore tree, and behind it an obscure brick house, he suddenly stopped, and, laying Dapple* on my shoulders, shouted out, "On your marrowbones, Sir!" I saw on a slab, to which he pointed, "Sacred to Milton, Prince of Poets." It was Milton's house, the house he occupied when he was secretary to Cromwell. The garden was an object of special delight to Bentham, who was passionately fond of flowers; and the garden had once, he said, been distinguished for its variety of fruits; but the growing deterioration of the atmosphere had destroyed one sort after another, so that a few currants and gooseberries, with abundance of fine mulberries, were all that time and smoke had left. Anne, the housemaid and waiter, always summoned us to dinner. His table was always liberally, not to say daintily served; and when he discovered that a particular dish was a favourite, that dish was sure to be found by the guest, and often bore the guest's name. I remember that "fried parsley" was Dr. M'Culloch's dish, "scolloped oysters" was mine. He ate abundantly, for dinner was his only substantial meal. "Let me have the ensign of authority," he would say, taking the bell-rope: and at ten o'clock tea was brought in; but he had a tea-pot of his own, which nobody else was allowed to use: the "sacred tea-pot," he styled it, its profaner name was "Dick;" and Dick was always put over the lamp to sing. Many an odd phrase did Dick give birth to: "Has my Dick begun his song?—then take him off his perch." "Take down Dicky: he is in a passion. What a piece of work he is making!" In Dicky the tea was made according to Bentham's peculiar notions of tea-making. The water was put in at once, so that the tea might be of equal strength to the end. To the sacred vessel a history was attached.

Dr. Bowring's connexion with Bentham commenced in 1820, and only terminated with the life of the great jurisconsult, who peacefully breathed his last breath in the arms of the affectionate, faithful, and reverential disciple, whose zealous service and filial ministrations must have shed so much of happiness over his latter years. Dr. Bowring's manly and tender account of their long and intimate connexion does even more honour to his own heart, than to the memory of his illustrious friend:—

My acquaintance with Bentham began in 1820. The politics of Spain were the first bond of intimacy. Blaquiere had suggested to Bentham that my knowledge of Peninsular matters might be not wholly without use to him. He invited me to his house. The intimacy strengthened from day to day. For the last ten years of his life, I believe, not a thought—not a feeling of his was concealed from me. Considering the disparity of age, I doubt if any man was ever more thoroughly possessed of the confidence of another than I possessed that of Bentham. Frequently I was an inmate of his house—always was I a welcome guest at his table. During his lifetime he placed in my hands the most interesting portion of his correspondence; and at his death, he bequeathed all his MSS. to my care, in order that I might select and superintend their publication.

Blessings, benefits, benignities, courtesies in every shape, I have received at his hands. No son was ever honoured by an affectionate father with more evidence of fondness, esteem, and confidence. And to me his friendship was that of a guardian angel. It conducted me with faithful devotion through a period of my existence in which I was steeped in poverty and overwhelmed with slander. His house was an asylum—his purse a treasury—his heart an Eden—his mind a fortress to me. It is only since his death, and when, in my situation of executor, all his papers have fallen into my hands, that I have learned how much I owed to his courageous friendship—his unbroken, his unbending trust. For I was calumniated on every side; and the calumnies were addressed in multitudes to my protector. His good opinion was turned aside by no insinuation; and the heavier the accusation, the more cordial and earnest was the defence. I give one of his earliest letters to me:—

"Queen's Square Place, September, 1820.

"Dear Sir,—Now that you have taken me under your protection, there are some hopes for me. I am a hard-working, pains-taking man: a law-maker by trade—a shoemaker is a better one by half—not very well to do in the world at present: wish to get on a little: have served seven apprenticeships, and not opened shop yet; make goods upon a new pattern: would be glad to give satisfaction: anything they may be thought wanting in quality, should be made up for in cheapness; under your favour could get up some choice articles for the Spanish market: would not interfere with my protector: scorn any such thing: mine a different line: would allow a per centage for agency, if agreeable. A few samples were circulated some time ago by an agent of mine, M. Dumont, of Geneva: think they were approved of. He has set up for himself, and got a job there. I let him have some of my tools and materials. He was forced to take in partners. They had been so used to the old way, that they were a little awkward at the new one: they have been coming out by degrees; still it is but up-hill work. He would have had me take the job in hand and go through with it. If I lived, so perhaps I might one of these days, rather than the thing should not be done; but the market there is so narrow. Spain! Spain! there is something like a market. An order from that country would make a man work early and late." . . . . . .

For some months before his death, Bentham had been anticipating the event. The loss of many of his faculties, particularly of his memory, was very obvious to him, and he frequently expressed his conviction, that mind and body were giving way together. I was absent from England a month or two before he died. So anxious was he to save me from the distress which the knowledge of his situation would have caused, that he directed certain letters of his to be sent to me, only in case of his recovery or death, lest their contents, by evidencing the state of his health, might be the cause of suffering to me.

From gentleness and kindliness of disposition, Dr. Bowring must have been much better suited to the temper and habits of the somewhat exacting and occasionally whimsical aged philosopher, than such sturdy disciples as Mill, or such admirers as Brougham. To the former, who, next to Dumont, was the most successful propagandist of his peculiar doctrines, Bentham had been a kind and liberal friend, when kindness was greatly needed, and, therefore, of tenfold value: but Dr. Bowring does not quite make out that in the misunderstandings—for quarrels would be too strong a word—of these distinguished men, there was not, as is usual in all such cases, faults upon both sides. However hard and unamiable the temper of Mill may have been—however impatient of contradiction and unsympathizing he was, there must have been some powerfully irritating cause at work, and that for a long period, before he could have written in this strain, while living under the sanctity of Bentham's roof:—

"I should contemplate with great dread the passing another summer with you, and think that we ought by no means to put our friendship to so severe a test. I am desirous of staying with you this season, as long as you yourself continue in the country, both for the sake of appearance, and because you have had no time to make any other arrangement for society: and I shall remain with so much the deeper an interest, that it is a pleasure not to be renewed. For I can most truly assure you, that at no moment were you ever more an object to me of reverence, and also of affection, than at the present; and nothing on my part shall be left undone while I here remain, to render my presence agreeable to you: perhaps, I ought rather to say, as little disagreeable as possible."

* Dapple was the name Bentham gave to his walking-stick.

After some details respecting family and pecuniary arrangements, Mill concludes:—

"As I propose all this most sincerely, with a view of preserving our friendship—and as the only means, in my opinion, of doing so,—the explanation being thus made, I think we should begin to act towards one another without any allusion whatsoever towards the past; talk together, and walk together, looking forward solely, never back; and as if this arrangement had been the effect of the most amicable consultation, we can talk about our studies, and about everything else, as if no umbrage had ever existed: and thus we shall not only add to the comfort of each other during the limited time we shall be together, we shall also avoid the unpleasant observations which will be made upon us by other people. For my part, I have been at pains to conceal even from my wife that there is any coldness between us. I am strongly in hopes that the idea of the limitation will give an additional interest to our society, and overbalance the effects of a too long and uninterrupted intimacy, which I believe to be the great cause; for there is such a disparity between the apparent cause, my riding out a few times in the morning with Mr. Hume, to take advantage of his horses in seeing a little of the country, instead of walking with you,—and the great umbrage which you have extracted, that the disposition must have been prepared by other causes, and only happened first to manifest itself on that occasion.

"I remain, with an esteem which can hardly be added to, and which, I am sure, will never be diminished, my dear Friend and Master, most affectionately yours."

The part of this letter, quoted above, or the whole of it taken together, will give, we should imagine, the impartial reader a somewhat different impression from that which Dr. Bowring, viewing the affair with Bentham's eyes, must have received from it, ere he could say—

This letter admirably exhibits the character of Mill's mind; not amiable, but most sagacious—impatient of contradiction or of check, but penetrating and philosophical. No man ever reasoned with stronger logical powers—no man had ever a more accurate perception of truth, or a more condensed form of expression. No man was ever more efficient as a controversialist, or more felicitous in the exposure of a fallacy or a flaw. His weaknesses were those of temper. When listened to, he was admirable; it was only when the tide of his feelings, and the peculiarities of his nature met with resistance, that he appeared in an unattractive light. Of his intellectual capacity, Bentham thought most highly: but the scholar had none of the gentleness, none of the tenderness for the feelings of others, which distinguished the teacher. "He argues against oppression," said Bentham—"less because he loves the oppressed many, than because he hates the oppressing few. He fights for the people—not that he cares for the suffering people, but that he cannot tolerate the suffering-creating rulers." While Bentham lived at Ford Abbey, "Mill," said Bentham, "his wife and family, and a servant, were there the whole of the time; and so it was at Barrow Green—only one summer was I there without Mill. Mill came in the train of Sir John Stuart, a man of good estate, married to a lady of quality. Mill's father had been his tenant. Sir John finding Mill something different from other men, sent him to Edinburgh for education—there he became bearleader to a Marquis, [the Marquis of Tweeddale,] who gave him an annuity. Through Sir John, Mill got the faculty of attending Parliament. He was writing his British India, while I was writing all manner of things. He was also writing for the Edinburgh Review. His work got him the situation he holds. Mill thought it was through Canning's suggestion that they applied to him. I brought him and his family hither from Pentonville. I put them into Milton house, where his family were all at ease. Afterwards gave him the lease of the house he holds, and put it in repairs for him. He and his family lived with me half of every year, from 1808 to 1817 inclusive. When I took up Mill he was in great distress, and on the point of migrating to Caen. Our scheme, which we talked for years, was to go to Caracas, which, if Miranda had prospered, we should have undoubtedly done."

Bentham, however, was not without just pride in his eminent Scottish disciple. Fourteen years after the above difference,—which, by the way, ought to be a warning against even the greatest and most equal-minded philosophers becoming too intimate where there are wives, children, and servants in the case,—we find Bentham writing thus to a friend:

"The bearer is Mr. Mill, author of the celebrated History of British India, which, if you have not read, you cannot but have heard more or less of. Under the obscure title of Examiner, he bears no inconsiderable part in the government of the threescore or fourscore millions which form the population of that country. On the death of the chief of the four Examiners, which is expected to take place ere long, he will succeed him, with a salary of £2000 a-year.

"He was one of the earliest and most influential of my disciples. The house he lives in looks into my garden.

"Hearing of the two spots in your neighbourhood, both of which I several times took up my summer quarters, he expressed a desire to make a pilgrimage to them, as he did once to my birth-place in Red Lion Street, Houndsditch, and the unfortunate half-burnt-down residence in Crutched Friars. There are your own quondam residence in Chertsey, which you cannot but remember, and the farm-house at Thorpe, to which George Wilson and I used to repair in the long vacation, as you probably remember.

"Perhaps, after reading this, you may have the charity to send some servant or retainer to accompany Mr. Mill and conduct him to the two spots."

Again, he says:—

"Mill will be the living executive—I shall be the dead legislative of British India. Twenty years after I am dead, I shall be a despot, sitting in my chair with Dapple in my hand, and wearing one of the coats I wear now. It was Mill who induced Ricardo to get into Parliament, and I took some trouble to get him a seat."

Mill, however, had his heresies—among others—what Bentham called "an abominable opinion" with respect to the inaptitude of women, and one "scarcely less abominable," that men should not hold office till they are forty years of age.

Though an exceedingly able, Mill was by no means an amiable man. Bentham said of him that his willingness to do good to others depended too much on his power of making the good done to them subservient to good done to himself. "His creed of politics results less from love for the many, than from hatred of the few. It is too much under the influence of selfish and dissocial affection.

"He will never willingly enter into discourse with me. When he differs, he is silent. He is a character. He expects to subdue everybody by his domineering tone—to convince everybody by his positiveness. His manner of speaking is oppressive and overbearing. He comes to me as if he wore a mask upon his face. His interests he deems to be closely connected with mine, as he has a prospect of introducing a better system of judicial procedure in British India. His book on British India abounds with bad English, which made it to me a disagreeable book. His account of the superstitions of the Hindoos made me melancholy."

No part of these Memoirs will be found more interesting, or more instructive, than the opinions which Bentham expressed of the more eminent and remarkable public characters, who were his contemporaries; though these opinions were sometimes rash, and not always just; at least in our opinion. We shall glean a few as specimens; and first, PITT:—

"Pitt the second," said Bentham, speaking of him to me in 1822, "had that quality,—the only quality necessary for a ministerial leader,—the quality of an orator. He had no plans—good or bad—wide or narrow. In fact, he came into office too young to have any,—just at the age when a man is intrusted with the conduct of his own private affairs. The Secretaries of the Treasury were Mr. George Rose and Mr. Charles Long. All that was wanting to the art of government was, that, from time to time, certain changes should be proposed, to prevent the machine from falling to pieces; and George Rose was generally employed to prepare and give an account of those intended and necessary changes. Mr. Long was the arbiter elegantiarum—the master of the government ceremonies. The work that was to be done was concocted by Rose,—the secret superintendence of the workmen was managed by Long. . . .

"I remember a curious partie quarré, consisting of Pitt, his elder brother, another, and myself. They stayed at Bowood some days.—I one day rode out with Pitt, and we talked over Indian affairs. I had just been reading an unpublished pamphlet,—and Bailey (an E. I. Director) said he wondered where I had got so much knowledge,—so much more than he had got. Yet I had only read that pamphlet, and really knew little about it. Pitt was like a great schoolboy, scorning, and sneering, and laughing at everything and everybody,—in terms of great insolence and pretence."

His opinion of Fox was not much more favourable. Dr. Parr had anxiously laboured to make them acquainted, and friends; but they seem never to have even met. After the death of Fox, Bentham wrote of him thus to Sir James Mackintosh, then in India:—

"Alas! while the propitiatory incense was lighting up, the idol [Fox] was no more. Peace be to his ashes! —My expectations of him were never sanguine. He was a consummate party leader: greedy of power, like my old friend Lord Lansdowne,—but, unlike him, destitute of any fixed intellectual principles, such as would have been necessary to enable him to make, to any considerable extent, a beneficial use of it. He opposed the Grenville Act; he opposed the Irish Union: Pitt, or anybody else in power, might have made him oppose anything by adopting it. I knew not where to find him, —and if I understand right, no more did anybody else. —He magnified Jurisprudential Law in preference to Statute; (this is a private anecdote that fell within my own knowledge;) an imaginary rule of action in preference to a real one,—the profligacy of a hireling lawyer, without the excuse; the power of the lawyer is in the uncertainty of the law. Like that of the lawyer, his wish was to see all waters troubled:—why? as feeling himself, in so superior a degree, a master of the art of fishing in them.

"Since your leaving England, three opportunities of being made known to him presented themselves to me: two by relatives of his when he was in the zenith of his power, were often expressed, or implied;—I closed with neither. Had he had anything to say to me, I would have heard it, with the respect due to his character:—having, on my part, nothing to say to him, I should have considered the time spent in his company as so much time thrown away. Dr. Parr, in his kindness, under the notion, I suppose, of doing me a service, took pains to throw me in his way, or draw down upon me the light of his countenance. He seemed disappointed at observing me as indifferent to his living idols, as Shadrach and Meshech were to the golden one of Nebuchadnezzar. Had I seen any opening for entertaining any such expectations from him in respect of the cleansing the Augean Stable, as I should from you, if you were in his place, I would have cried, Lord! Lord! till he had been tired of hearing me.

"When I saw you enlisted in the defence of a castle of straw, which I had turned my back upon as fit for nothing but the fire, I beheld with regret what appeared to me a waste of talents so unprofitably employed.

"When I heard of your being occupied in teaching the anatomy and physiology of two chimeras, the same sensation was again repeated. A crowd of admiring auditors of all ranks,—and what was it they wished for or expected? Each of them, some addition to the stock of sophisms, which each of them had been able to mount by his own genius, or pick up by his own industry, in readiness to be employed in the service of right or wrong, whichever happened to be the first to present the retaining fee.

"'There he is,' said George Wilson to me, one day, pointing out to me the Lecturer; (pulchrum est digito monstrarier.)

"To Wilson I said nothing;—to myself I said—'There or anywhere he may be—what is he to me? What he does—if anything, is mischief! What if he be Jupiter? So much the worse:—περὶ γὰρ Ζεὺς; the cloud-compelling Jupiter, heaping clouds on clouds. When I pray, it is with Ajax, for clear daylight: smoke I abhor, and not the less for its being illuminated with flashes.'"

The whole of the letter is characteristic, and exhibits Bentham's mind in its highest attitude, though wanting something of the indulgence, gentleness, and charity which he himself so frequently and earnestly inculcates; though his courteous admonition to Mackintosh was not altogether ill-deserved.

Horne Tooke.—Speaking of Horne Tooke, in relation to this period, Bentham said:—"Horne Tooke had a narrow mind. His library was narrow. A man may be judged of by his library. He was of great use to Burdett. He gave him some degree of intellectuality. Burdett always travelled with some stuff of mine—but I could not get him to give up the common law. He thought it 'a beautiful theory,' and Lord Coke 'a beautiful person.' What a sad thing it is that imaginary law should be confounded with real law. What authority has the maker of the common law?

"Horne Tooke's dinners were pic-nic dinners. Every man sent something, and more than he took. Among the eaters, Colonel Bosville was a republican. Humphreys was admitted on the strength of a bon mot."

From first to last Bentham had that true idea of Sir Francis Burdett, which every man of ordinary penetration seems at once to have formed, who saw that pseudo-patriot close at hand. Burdett, who had recourse to every man who could assist him in bolstering up a factitious reputation for statesmanship, upon one occasion applied to Bentham to draw up a Bill for Parliamentary Reform, which he was, of course, to introduce to the House—as his own. From the philosopher's reply to this proposal, we copy out one pithy sentence:—

"I never can bring myself to put my name to any plan of Parliamentary Reform, under which suffrages would not be free; nor do I see it possible how they ever can be free, otherwise than by being placed under the safeguard of secrecy."

The correspondence went on, Sir Francis freely promising,—

"I shall not only be happy, but proud to use every exertion in my power, to tax all my faculties to the utmost, in order to carry into effect your wishes upon this great and important, and indeed only important, subject. My tongue shall speak as you do prompt mine ear; and I will venture to promise, knowing so well whom I promise, that I will refuse attempting no himself—the hero of peace,—of that peace which is the child of Justice.

"After subduing the three kingdoms, he attacked the army of lawyers. They repulsed him. They were too many for him.

"About sixty years ago I deserted from it, and have been carrying on against them a guerilla war ever since.

"I have got together a body, which is every day augmenting. I am now on the point of attacking them in force.

"The materiel of my army may be seen in the volume accompanying this, intituled, 'Justice and Codification Petitions.'

"On the opening of the next campaign in Saint Stephen's, my Commander-in-chief (a truce to his name for the present) will commence the attack. His baton, the Bill (styled the Despatch Court Bill) which I have prepared for him.

"Under him will serve some stout fellows, whom I am occupied in enlisting and training.

"But a truce to allegory. It is time to speak in plain language.

"Our whole Judiciary Establishment, with the system of procedure, self-styled the regular, by which it works, is one entire mass of corruption: fruits of it, depredation and oppression,—both upon an all-comprehensive scale: its proceedings have, from first to last, had these for its objects and effects. Mere illusion the so indefatigably trumpeted purity of it. In comparison of the plunderage made by it, trifling is that made by the most corrupt, whichever it is, of those whose corruption is most notorious. By the plunderage which they make, they are always more or less exposed to punishment. Of that which our Judges make, the whole mass is intrenched in impunity; and by Parliament itself, under their influence, the fortress has recently been made impregnable. I mean—by the Statute of the 22d July, 1822, (3 Geo. IV. c. 69,) by which the Judges are authorized to impose on the afflicted suitors taxes without stint, and put the money into their own pockets.

"Open the accompanying volume. To one of the pages you will find a keep-place paper pinned. A single glance will suffice to show you fourteen charges. By the unreserved confession even of practising lawyers,—lawyers high in practice,—high even in Mr. Peel's confidence,—these charges are incontestably, every one of them, proved.

"The eyes of the people at large are fast opening, not to say already opened: opened to the slavery in which they have been so long held by lawyers. Soon will you hear the self-emancipated slaves, chorus upon chorus, in full cry for justice! 'Away,' say they, 'away with the technical, the unintelligible mode of procedure—the regular, as the so-monstrously-irregular chaos so falsely calls itself. Give us the only plain,—the only intelligible,—the only honest,—in a word, the summary mode. Give us the only mode employed by those who wish sincerely, seriously, and steadily, to give execution and effect to that rule of action for the effectuation of which this adjunct professes to be employed. Give us the mode employed in the Small Debt Courts. Give us the mode employed in the courts composed of Justices of the Peace acting singly, or in any numbers elsewhere than in Quarter Sessions. Give us the only mode employed where evidence is to be elicited—where information is to be obtained, by either House of Parliament,—the only mode, in a word, which is employed where a real desire has place to bring out 'the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth.' Thus say already in numbers, and will say every day in greater and greater numbers, the people at large. But, to crown all, speaking, as I do, to the Head of the Army, I say—Give us the mode—the only mode—employed in and by Courts-martial!

"Yes! give us the simplicity, the honesty, the straightforwardness, of Courts-martial.

"Yes: look here, Duke! Here you are at home. Had you a military offence to try—had you a dispute to settle between two officers—would you be satisfied to let five years pass before so much as the first question put received an answer? Would the sound of a word—the word equity, or any other—suffice to reconcile you to an absurdity so palpable, so abominable—to every mouth that can gulp it down, so dishonourable? But, if not, in what respect can such a delay, with the expense and lawyer's-profit for which it was created, be more conducive and favourable to civil than to military justice?

"No! the head of the army—in so far as it depended upon him—as often as a military wrong took place one moment, would not wait another moment before he applied the remedy.

"There sits Lord Eldon! for five-and-twenty years and more, to the ruin of so many thousands of families, head of the law. What says this, or any other head of the law, to the five years? Would he abate so much as a single moment of it? Ask him. Not he indeed.

"Think now of the difference! and—the cause of it—what is the cause of it? What but this:—The head of the army would be a ruined man—his army a ruined army—were he mad enough to establish any such matchless absurdity; or, though it were but for a moment, permit it to have place. But the head of the law, who not only permits it to have place, but would be ready to faint at the thought of its ceasing to have place—in what way is he a sufferer by it? Instead of being so, he is, and to a matchless amount, a gainer by it. His vast, his needless, his useless, his most mischievous income, so many times as great as that of the head of the army, is mainly constituted by it.

"Theory! speculation! visionary! enthusiast! Utopian! Of words such as these is composed the only sort of answer which the opposers of Law Reform—the defenders of established turpitude—are wont, or can find, to make to such damning truths.

"Head of the army! I repeat the question. In any Court-martial that ever sits, would you have five years elapse before so much as the first question received an answer? Would you have every innocent man, who, by some untoward occurrence, had been brought before a Court-martial regularly plundered of his last shilling before he received his acquittal? Well, then, if you would not, and forasmuch as you would not, you are as undeniably a theorist, a speculatist, and so forth, as I myself am.

"By the last returns, a sum, within a trifle of £40,000,000 was lying engulphed in Chancery. By this time that sum must have been exceeded. By my plan, this vast sum would, within a trifle, be given to the right owners, instead of being, in so vast a proportion of it, divided by the lawyers amongst the lawyers, while the remainder remained in the gulph, ready to be drawn upon by them, as occasion offered."

About this time occurred the duel between the Duke and the Earl of Winchelsea, upon which the octogenarian sage reads his Grace a homily against duelling, commencing,—

"Ill-advised man!—Think of the confusion into which the whole fabric of Government would have been thrown, had you been killed; or had the trial of you, for the murder of another man, been substituted in the House of Lords to the passing of the Emancipation Bill!

"I told you I was your well-wisher. Even in the common form of a letter I never speak unadvisedly. I now prove myself so."

Having adverted to a plan which he had in view, to put an end to "the pestilential practice of dueling," he leads the way to a curious piece of private history. Hitherto it has been generally imagined that O'Connell had never fired a pistol in his life, until he had the misfortune to kill Mr. D'Esterre; while, on the contrary, he had been a long-practised and an admirable marksman:—

"T'other day, O'Connell was with me. Amongst other things, he gave me his history in relation to duelling. About a dozen years ago, it happened to him to kill his man. He declares himself, in private as well as in public, and (strange as it may seem to many of us) as far as I can judge, with sincerity, to be a believer in the religion he professes in public. Not without visible signs of emotion did he speak to me of the catastrophe. The effect produced by it on his mind was (he said) such, that he made a vow, and that vow was—to make atonement for the transgression: and that atonement consisted in the determination never to engage a second time in the like contest; but to submit to any insult or indignity, how atrocious soever, rather than seek or accept of satisfaction in that shape. Yes: and to make this determination matter of general notoriety; and to this his determination he had hitherto maintained, and ever resolved to maintain, the most inviolable adherence.

"Not so much as five minutes had the report of the occurrence reached me in this my Hermitage, when I sat down to write the scribble, which, in the original, would not have been legible to you: in the meantime, what I hear is—that instead of being the challen*gee*, which would have been too bad, you were actually the challen*ger*, which is still worse. Friends, forsooth!—How narrow must have been the views and minds of friends, by whom advice, with such effects in the train of it, could have been given!

"These friends—in name, profession, and appearance; to whom were they so in reality? To yourself, to the king, to Great Britain, to Ireland, to the human species at this present time? To the same species at any future time?—Put to each of them these questions: and take note of his answers.

"In the United States, I am neither unknown nor unheeded. The President, and the present Finance Secretary, were my familiar friends. Propensity to duelling is, in that country, the cardinal vice. In that country, still more than in Ireland, the plague in that shape rages. If I live two years, or at the utmost three years longer, I shall be, in no small degree, disappointed, if I do not see the plague (as the Bible phrases it) 'stayed.'"

The Duke's reply to this epistle was immediate, and must have been kind, for now Bentham addresses him, "My dear Duke," telling him, that he could not afford to lose one whom he wanted to make "greater than Cromwell," and then comes a string of warning anecdotes—of duels:—

"First, as to O'Connell's. What I did not mention before is this. O'Connell was sure of his mark. He had made himself so in an odd way. In his part of the country reigns a commonwealth of dogs: their practice was to attack men on horseback, biting the horse's heels.

"Think not this incredible. A similiar commonwealth had place years ago, and probably has still, at Constantinople. Anno 1785, it made war upon me there: fortune saved me. O'Connell travelled with pistols, and practised with them upon those dogs, till he became expert as above. Hence the contrition spoken of in my last.

"2. Colonel Burr's case. Colonel Hamilton stood in the way of his ambition. Burr determined to put him out of the way. He too had made himself sure of his mark. Not confession this, but boast. I had it from himself. Anno 1807, or thereabouts, he was my guest for months.

"3. Target Martin's. John Wilkes got him christened by this name; the import you see already. In this Martin's case, it was an affair of speculation. How to use pistols, he had learnt from his target: whom to use them upon, from the case of St. Becket, in Hume's History. George the Third was his Henry the Second.

"4. Another case comes in this moment. Adam's,—Lord Commissioner Adam's case. Shooting at a great man by his leave, then figuring away and making a friend of him. Speculation this in another shape. . . .

. . . . With reminiscences such as these in his mind, could a man do otherwise than I have done, and am thus continuing to do? Had I not, I should, in case of your falling a victim, as above, to rage or speculation, read my own condemnation in my own Penal Code."

The correspondence between Bentham and O'Connell commenced in 1828, when the latter, in some public speech, had eloquently attacked the abuses of the law, and eulogized the great philosophic Law Reformer, JEREMY BENTHAM. The whole correspondence is highly animated and interesting, from the characters of the men, and also from the political views which it embodies, and those with which the sage wished to indoctrinate this new and promising disciple.

Lord Brougham, whose forbearance, and genuine respect and regard, the somewhat impatient and testy octogenarian jurisconsult seems often to have tried to the utmost of man's endurance, was about this time not keeping so kindly or gently to the leading strings in which Bentham tacitly insisted that all his "boys" should walk,—and O'Connell was hailed as "comforter of my old age! Illustrious friend! Invigorator of my fondest hopes!" And certainly O'Connell's letters breathe admirable sentiments, and excellent tendencies. His vehemence or impetuosity of temperament, and furious outbursts of abuse, coarse invective, and gross personality, often and deeply grieved his sage and courteous friend; and after they had corresponded for some months, we find Bentham, who playfully styled now Brougham and now O'Connell his grandsons, remonstrating with him as,—

"Dan, dear child,—Whom, in imagination, I have, at this moment, pressing to my fond bosom,—put off, if it be possible, your intolerance. Endure the conception, and even the utterance of other men's opinions, how opposite soever to your own. At any rate, when you assume the mantle of the legislator, put off the gown that has but one side to it,—that of the advocate."

O'Connell and Hunt were at this time abusing each other to the great amusement of the public and their own hearts' content; and Bentham, who endeavoured to restrain Hunt, conveys this affectionate admonition to O'Connell:—

"What is past cannot be recalled; but, in future, if he can be kept from abusing you, so much the better. In his pericranium, the organ of abusiveness is full a yard long. It must be driving at something. Driving at what is abuseworthy—it may do good; for there is no small strength in it: driving at what is praiseworthy,—it either does nothing, or does evil. Driving at the city of London abuses, he has already done considerable good, and is in the way to do considerably more.

"All that a vituperative epithet proves is—that he who uses it is angry with him on whom he bestows it, not that he has any reason for being so.

"Should you ever again have occasion to speak of Henry Hunt, I hope you will not again bring it up against him, as if it were a matter of reproach, that he sells Blacking, or anything else; for besides that there is no harm in selling Blacking, the feeling thus betrayed belongs not to us democrats, but to aristocrats who make property (and that more particularly in a particular form, the immoveable) the standard of opinion. Moreover, men of our trade should be particularly cautious as to the throwing into the faces of antagonists vituperation as to their trade; for thereupon may come in reply—Junius' aphorism about 'the indiscriminate defence of right and wrong.'"

As a literary curiosity, we copy out a Ciceronian epistle, which must in future times form a portion of the Derrynane Papers, and of the Memoirs of its remarkable writer:—

"Derrynane, Sept. 13, 1828.

"I am here amongst my native mountains, for a few, very few weeks. I decide all the controversies in the district. I never allow a witness to appear, until the plaintiff and defendant have both fully told their tales, and agreed their points. In nine instances out of ten, other testimony is unnecessary. This tribunal is so cheap, it costs them nothing; and is so expeditious (I decide as soon as the parties have exhausted their arguments, and offered their witnesses on the facts, ultimately in dispute) that they reserve for me all their disputes, and it appears to me that they are satisfied with the results. This deduction I the more readily draw from the purely voluntary nature of their submission to my awards. It proves, however, nothing, but as far as it shows me the great value of hearing the parties themselves."

It must be confessed that there was no want of "soft sawder" in the epistles of the Liberator to the Hermit of Queen's Square Place; yet O'Connell must at the moment have felt much of what he expressed, and been very sincere in making those promises which he has not yet been able to redeem. For example, the one for his long-announced, ever-delayed motion on Libel Law.

No one of those eminent persons, whom it filled Bentham with pride and hope to number among his disciples, seems to have piqued him more deeply than Brougham; who has accordingly been judged with unreasonable severity, and even with intolerance, as often as his compliance stopped short of the exact point whither Bentham wished to lead him. His differing in opinion as to the proper course to be pursued, was too often, if not uniformly, set down as coldness in the cause, or else insincerity. In 1812 occurs, in a characteristic letter, the first notice of Brougham, who then stood very high in the opinion and favour of Bentham, though even thus early he had probably not been all submission, however filled with regard and deference:—

"The member by whom this letter is franked, is the famous Mr. Brougham—pronounce Broom—who, by getting the Orders in Council revoked, and peace and trade with America thereby restored, has just filled the whole country with joy, gladness, and returning plenty. He has been dining with me to-day, and has but just gone. This little dinner of mine he has been intriguing for, any time these five or six months; and what with one plague and another, never till this day could I find it in my heart to give him one—I mean this year: for the last we were already intimate. He is already one of the first men in the House of Commons, and seems in a fair way of being very soon universally acknowledged to be the very first, even beyond my old and intimate friend, Sir Samuel Romilly: many, indeed, say he is so now.

"The editor of The Examiner, Hunt, has taken me under his protection, and trumpets me every now and then in his paper, along with Romilly. I hear so excellent a character of him, that I have commissioned Brougham to send him to me. . . . .

"Brougham is the sole confidential adviser of the Princess of Wales, in her contest with her husband. The Princess takes in The Examiner; and, as being in such pointed hostility against her said husband, reads it with great interest. The Princess Charlotte comes once a-fortnight, on a stated day of the week, I forget which, to dine with her mother, and there she steals a peep at the said Examiner. The Princess Charlotte had been taught by her father to be a great admirer of Charles Fox. Upon her father's casting off that party without reason assigned, she would not go with him; but being disgusted with his behaviour towards her mother, and on so many other accounts, adheres to her mother, and retains her original political feelings in great force. Brougham and Romilly are the Princess Charlotte's two great heroes, whom she is continually trumpeting. If she were on the throne, Romilly would of course be Chancellor, Brougham either Minister, or in some other high office. They are both of them more democratic than the Whigs; and Erskine, having already been Chancellor, would probably have been preferred for that office, to Romilly, by the Whigs, had they come into power when they were so near it. Romilly's is the only house I go to; and Brougham one of the very few, indeed, that I admit into mine. When the Earl of Dundonald dies, Lord Cochrane, who is his eldest son, will succeed to the peerage; and then it is understood to be certain that Brougham will succeed him as member for Westminster."

From his early years, Bentham indulged in a playful strain of badinage in his conversation and letters; in which vein of light pleasantry, it must however be confessed, that he was not always eminently felicitous. In this style he replied to an announcement made by Mr. Brougham in 1827, of "Opening a Budget of Legal Common Law Enormities," or of his purpose in his own words—

"To lift the floodgates of whatever stores I possess or can borrow (and herein don't doubt your reservoirs being freely tapped) of exposition—detail—illustration, homely and refined—attack, invective, sarcasm, irony, broad-joke, and drollery—in short, every kind of attack, not neglecting the pathetic, on our Criminal Code, and Debtor and Creditor Law. I mean, moreover, to carry my motion, not by moving for leave to bring in a code, or even one per of the said code, for I well know all powers of Church and State are against that; but by moving for a good commission, as good as the charity one was bad; and I know that their report must produce some proofs of changes, and large changes, being required. . . These things coming from a practical man, who is making many thousands a-year by the craft, must have a good effect. And now, to answer your second query—Why out of office is better for this great delivery than in? If I were Attorney or Solicitor General, they would have a right to gag, at least to mitigate me; and I want to be well delivered of my burthen before that happens."

With this announcement Bentham was enchanted, and he instantly replied in his favourite style:

"My dearest best Boy.—You are not so much as fifty. I am fourscore—a few months only wanting: I am old enough to be your grandfather. I could at this moment catch you in my arms, toss you up into the air, and, as you fell into them again, cover you with kisses. It shall have—ay, that it shall—the dear little fellow, some nice sweet pap of my own making: three sorts of it—1. Is Evidence. 2. Judicial Establishment. 3. Codification Proposal—all to be sucked in, in the order of the numbers. . . . . .

"In conclusion, hear grandpapa again, and accept his blessing, which, however, (remember!) is but a conditional one, and conditioned for your continuing as a law reformer till the end of the next session, the same bonus puer which you were on the 22d of this instant September, 1827. Should you become naughty any part of that time, though but in a parenthesis, the Bête Noire shall be set upon you, and will gobble you up at a mouthful, screaming and sputtering notwithstanding."

Lord Brougham humouring the old man's fancy, replied in the same vein:—

"Dear Grandpapa,—Many thanks for the pap, I am already fat on it. I did not acknowledge it, being busy eating it; and saying nothing at meals is the way with us little ones—when hungry.

"I shall be in town next week, late.—Yours dutifully."

The correspondence was not allowed to drop.

"DEAR SWEET LITTLE POPPET,—If it continues, unus bonus puer, it will toddle hither immediately upon its return; and besides some more pap, made in the same saucepan, it will get fed with some of its own pudding; for a dish there is, which, in the vocabulary of Q. S. P. goes by the name of 'Master Brougham's pudding,' though, if, in an indictment for stealing it, it were named by the name of pudding, defendant prisoner would be acquitted, had the whole of the noble army of martyrs kissed their thumbs in proof of the fact.

"Seriously, if you think seriously of making any use of that stuff of mine which you have, it will be material, (as I am sure you will be satisfied,) that you should have the earliest cognizance of a quantity of other stuff that is connected with it.

"At sight of this, employ two words in naming a day when I may expect you. All other engagements shall give way to the one so made."

"MY DEAR BOY—You have now been breeched some time; and, with a little study, you are able, I am sure, to get a short exercise by heart, and speak it quite pretty. Here is one for you: the next time you toddle to Q. S. P. let me hear you say it; and if you say it without missing more than four words, I have a bright silver fourpence for you, which you shall take and put into your pocket.

"When you say it, you are to fancy you are in the House of Commons; that I am Speaker; and you sitting on one of the forms, with a pretty silk gown on your little shoulders, and a fine bushy wig on your little pate; and then you start up, as fierce as a little lion, and say what is in the paper which is here enclosed.

"Do as you are bid—I am sure you can, if you will—and the one I have mentioned is not the last of the silver fourpences you will receive from the hands of your loving guardian,

"Master Henry Brougham."

If Master Henry had been docile, and taken kindly to all of his lessons, he would, beyond a doubt, have stood so much higher in the good graces of his grandpapa, that certainly no one would have been found his equal. In the instance in question, Mr. Brougham's plan, when propounded, fell very far short of Bentham's hopes. He had already learned the important secret, which Brougham had not then learned, that it is quite as easy, under certain circumstances, to carry a great and effectual measure of reform of any sort, as one of those half-ones called "a practical measure." Under the signature of Misopseudo, Bentham, therefore, wrote a letter criticising Brougham's measure, which was intended for publication, though we are not told in what journal it appeared, or whether it appeared at all. Though alloyed by some degree of impatience and injustice to Lord Brougham, much important truth mingles with Bentham's strictures. Having maintained his own view as to the parties to every suit appearing face to face before the Judge,—if to the satisfaction of the Judge the plaintiff has previously made out a case for trial,—he thus continues:—

"Mr. Brougham's mountain is delivered, and behold! —the mouse. The wisdom of the reformer could not overcome the craft of the lawyer. . . . .

"So would the interests of truth be served—but not the interests of lawyers.

"The system of special pleading is the pregnant, the prolific mother of lies. That is truly a mendacity license,—a reward and an encouragement to falsehood. All lies are bad,—judicial lies are the worst of all. Are they not, Mr. Peel? Are they not, Mr. Brougham? Those who like lies and lying, whether for the purposes of selfish interest or those of private and public injustice, let them cling to special pleading with the tenacity of the fondest affection. But if lies and injustice be objects of abhorrence, so will special pleading be. Mr. Peel will laud it, and so will Mr. Brougham. Special pleading cried up by both. Bavius and Mævius! Mr. Peel and Mr. Brougham! Those who laud the one, may laud the other. Boys of the same school,—heirs of the same inheritance,—preachers of the same faith! Shake them in a bag: look at them playing at push-pin together. Mr. Peel will have no short pleas; so he establishes long ones. Mr. Brougham will tear up this and that and t'other root of lies, with the special care to plant others just as noxious in their stead. Mr. Brougham! instead of six hours, you may talk for sixty. The public will be enlightened at last. They will look upon you as the sham adversary, but real accomplice of Mr. Peel, unless you can sacrifice (hard sacrifice, but how illustrious!) your interest and profit in this wholesale manufacture of lies,—of lies as mischievous as were ever devised by their great author and father. You know their paternity. 'Is it not written in the Book?'"

The Westminster Review was commenced in 1823, with the funds and under the immediate auspices of Bentham. In that work, Lord Brougham was, to say the least of it, very unceremoniously handled, though for his own share in the attack, whatever it had been, Bentham assumed high grounds of justification. But however dissatisfied Bentham might have been with Mr. Brougham's public conduct or backwardness, or however piqued upon personal grounds, he was always ready to be appeased. This is no small merit in one who has been the aggressor; which we are afraid Bentham was in this particular instance. Brougham was already Lord Chancellor, and it is probable that his appointment was generally known when his ancient friend, on the 19th November 1831, wrote this volunteer epistle:—

"MY DEAR BROUGHAM,—It is with no small gratification that I heard Doane's account of the kind mention you made of me in the short conversation he had with you this day: finding thereby that the state of your affections towards me harmonizes so exactly with that of mine towards you. Whatsoever may be in the Westminster Review notwithstanding, be assured that no sentiment of personal hostility has ever had place in anything I have said of you there or elsewhere.

"It is accordingly truly delightful to me to see such good reason for believing that no considerable, if any, uneasiness has been produced in your mind by what has been called my 'truculence:' for assuredly, if you were sitting opposite me, (as I hope you will shortly be ere long,) it would not be possible for me to witness any symptoms of uneasiness on your brow, without imbibing, through the channel of sympathy, more or less of it. Not that in substance my course would be altered by any such irrelevant observation: for, if you were my brother in the flesh, instead of being my soi-disant grandson in the spirit, (Oh, naughty boy!) never could I sacrifice to my regard for any individual that affection for my country and mankind, to which my whole soul has been devoted for I forget how much more than threescore years. As I am dealing with you, so dealt I by my friend Romilly: for, on the occasion of the Westminster election, he being, in my phrase, no better than a Whig, I wrote against him in favour of—I forget who, (Douglas Kinnaird, I believe,)—of whom I knew nothing, but that he stood upon Radical ground. What the Review has said of you, either this time or the former time, I know not; nor do I think I ever shall. Sure enough did I send in the meat for that meal; for it was what nobody else could have done; but, as to the dressing, I neither know how it was done, nor who were the cooks.

"I have understood that it was you that let slip the dogs of war at me in the Edinburgh, and perhaps elsewhere. The more there are of them, the more tickled I shall be ; and in so all-comprehensive an assurance you would find a good and valid license, should you ever suppose yourself to have need of any such thing.

"I have my views, you have yours ; but, in all other respects, I am—yours most truly," &c.

Brougham, now Lord Chancellor, immediately replied, and on the day we believe before the names of the Grey Ministry appeared in an Extraordinary Gazette.

"My dear Sir,—Many thanks for your kind letter ; but how could you listen to such a tale of tales as that I, of all your friends, ever could have let slip the dogs in the E. R. at you?

"The truth is, I had a correspondence of weeks, and all but a rupture, with Jeffrey on the subject. He had got committed on the point before I could remonstrate, not having a conception of what was doing till I saw it on my table in print, and published.

"I succeeded afterwards in stopping the useless, and worse than useless controversy between varying or differing allies ; for so it was,—not enemies.

"I want to see you one of these days ; and when you summon me to dinner, I will attend ; but don't make it next Wednesday, for I go that day to our society's monthly meeting.—Yours ever."

It has been whispered, that when this dinner was to take place, some pressing public business prevented the Chancellor from attending, and that this involuntary failure on his part swelled the measure of his iniquities, to a degree that his venerable friend could never afterwards forgive. Of intentional disrespect, or want of regard, it is next to impossible that, while his mind was in its pristine vigour, Bentham could have suspected Brougham.

AFFAIRS OF HONOUR.

"An honourable murderer, if you will;
For nought I did in hate, but all in honour."
Othello.

Mr. Ferdinand Keane was tried at Ballinasloe Quarter Sessions, on the 7th of April, for horsewhipping Mr. Hislop, with intent to provoke him to a breach of the peace. It is an ancient practice, recognised by the laws of chivalry ; but the discipline used by Mr. Keane was more rude than honour required, having been administered with the butt-end of a loaded whip, which he applied with such force to the back part of the prosecutor's skull, as to render the attendance of a surgeon necessary for some days thereafter. Such a horsewhipping being deemed more than was requisite to bring a man of proper feeling out, the Jury, albeit composed of Galway men, brought Mr. Keane in "Guilty ;" and he was sentenced to an imprisonment of six months.

This was sarving Mr. Ferdinand Keane right :—for although the code of honour permits an appeal to the whip, in the last resort, it must be handled with discretion. Besides, a bludgeon is not a horsewhip. "Consider yourself horsewhipped, Sir," says your true cavalier, to an adversary who will not stand at twelve paces to be shot at, upon lesser compulsion ;—and suiting the action to the word, a switch is then laid gently across the shoulders, as who should say—"Exert your imagination, Sir, to consider yourself horsewhipped."

Such a procedure is generally found sufficient to rouse the lion—if there be a lion to be roused. But it does not always lead to the desired result ; for it is impossible to draw blood from a turnip. Joe Miller cites a case in point,—in the matter of a certain Irishman, who had more brains than he wished to see blown out before his face :—"Consider myself horsewhipped, indeed ! (said Pat ;) and is that the way of it? Well, then—you may just consider yourself whipped clane through the lungs, with a short sword ; and so we are quits."

Nevertheless, the accolade I would describe is, in most cases, found sufficiently cutting. A great deal must be left to a man's own feelings in such affairs ; it being accounted a violent and unhandsome proceeding to resort to the peine forte et dure, when the object is simply to draw out an opponent to the daisied field. Honour is either a very sensitive or a very callous thing. If a nettle will not sting, a cudgel cannot provoke it.

But horsewhipping does not always go by favour, or by fancy, in this manner. There are in the lists of honour, as elsewhere, matter-of-fact fellows, like Mr. Ferdinand Keane, who look upon words as things, and whose minds can no more comprehend the humour of horsewhipping a man metaphorically, than their palates can relish the aroma of an ethereal banquet, or their lips smack of champaign sparkling à la Father Mathew. When such customers make up their minds to inflict a castigation, they do inflict it. Horsewhipping is no joke in their hands.

Honour is not only a nice thing with these persons, but a serious thing. It abhors a squib. The late Lord Ffrench "went out" on a time, to satisfy the punctilios of a gentleman who had been very valiant over-night ; but somehow the bite of a frosty morning in April so abated his rage, that he proffered the apology he had disdained to make twelve hours before. "Why, see now," said the aboriginal peer—"that would have done uncommonly well last night : but people are not to be taken out of their warm beds, on such a shivering sort of a morning, for nothing. We must take the dead cowld out of the air, by burning a little powdther ; but don't let the gentleman be at all unasy : we'll make a thrifle of it !" He shattered the man's arm ; which was indeed a trifle, compared to what he might have done ; for with the same saw-handled tool, he could just as easily have bored a hole in his mazzard.

Let a peaceable man, who desires to see length of days, and live in the use and enjoyment of whole bones, avoid collisions with blunt reasoners, who do not know how to abstract. To fight with the like, is to fight in earnest. They take everything au pied de la lettre, as French Barrington did, when—being dissatisfied with a Maryborough Jury—he was advised by counsel, learned in the law, to "challenge the array."

"That's the very thing I was thinking of," said Barrington; and straightway he not only called out the twelve, but, lest the right man should escape, tweaked the High Sheriff by the nose into the bargain. At the point of day he was on the ground, with a cow's horn brimful of powder, and a worsted stocking crammed with bullets; but the gentlemen of the jury did not attend, and it would not answer to pray a tales; so he went back and posted the whole panel.

It is possible, however, to be too polite, as was Henry Grattan, when he pinked Isaac Corry. Grattan was short-sighted, and wishing to bring his man within the proper focus, put on one of his most bland and insinuating smiles, which, as some old gentlemen may recollect, was a rictus from ear to ear; then addressing Mr. Corry in his peculiar and measured accent, he said, "Will the honourable gentleman please to step a little nearer?" The honourable gentleman most obligingly did so, and was winged accordingly. This was quite overdoing the thing, on the side of urbanity.*

Old Sir Capel Molyneux (not the last Sir Capel, but his predecessor) was one of those "butchers of a silk button," who would not allow friendship to cool in the very heat of a rencontre. When about eighty, he took offence at something said by the late General Mahon, then a youngster and Major in the 9th Dragoons, quartered at Armagh; and he invited the Major to come out to Castle Dillon, to be shot, and then to breakfast, with what appetite he might. They fired a brace of pistols, the young soldier taking heed to shoot wide of the grey head, while the palsied hand of the old man was a sufficient security against anything but that which, they say, may kill the d——l, namely, a chance-shot.

Six rounds were exchanged in this manner, the old cock stepping out at each interval during the reloading of the pistols, to interrogate "Mahon," as he familiarly accosted him, about his father's agricultural pursuits, and to enlighten him upon the relative virtues of red and white Norfolks. At last the young major got tired of the amusement, and sent a ball whizzing by the baronet's ear, which brought him to. "Thank you, Mahon," said he, "that was well-meant,—but come along now; we've had enough of it. My hand's not in, this morning. Let's finish it some other time." So saying, he took the major by the arm, and they walked together into the breakfast-parlour, where Lady Molyneux, a pious woman, was waiting with the family Prayer Book open, and wondering "what in the world had kept them so long?"

It is sometimes well to be of a lowly origin, and, therefore, unworthy to be laid in the bed of honour. Old Bagenal of Carlow, the proudest man in the king's dominions, had a neighbour named Weld, who was rich, and admitted into society as a gentleman, but he kept flour mills. This circumstance saved his life; for his pigs, having trespassed upon the aristocrat's demesne, were sent home with their tails shaved off to the stump; and, of course a challenge was the consequence.

Bagenal was in a fit of the gout, but he had himself carried into a church-yard and propped up against a tomb-stone, in which position he received the miller's fire. The shot struck a Death's head and cross-bones under his elbow, scattering a hundred splinters about his ears. It was now Bagenal's turn: but he disdained even to let off his pistol in the air. "You shall never boast," said he, haughtily, "that a gentleman's ball traversed your carcass;" and then letting down the pistol to half-cock, returned it to his second, and hobbled into his carriage.

There is an esprit de corps in your professional duellist, which will shrink from nipping in the bud a promising scion of the feather-spring, under any provocation. Bryan Maguire—who does not Remember the glories of Brian the brave!

—was paraded one morning, to his infinite amazement, upon Marlborough Green, by a stripling of sixteen, named Rowan Cashel. Marlborough Green was then classic ground. John Claudius Beresford had his famous riding-house in a corner of it; and it was a convenient place for gentlemen who had little differences to settle, under cover of the fog that arose from the marshes about the Custom House. But like other venerable institutions, the Green is "gone to the bad;" being now drained and desecrated to the uses of the National Board of Education. A Model School stands on the spot where the twenty-pace ground was wont to be measured; and Professor Magawley is teaching "the young idea how to shoot," where Bryan came down that morning, like Goliath of Gath, sending forth two curling pillars of smoke from his distended nostrils.

His opponent, a firm-set, fierce, little fellow, was already in waiting; and touching his hat slightly, went to work at once, like a French falconer, without a quiver in his eyelid, or a shake in his hand. Bryan stood his fire admiringly; and the more so, when he felt his whisker gently brushed by the passing missile, as it went on towards the riding-house.

"Ha!" said he.—"You'll do, my pigeon. I prophesy that the name of Rowan Cashel will stand high in the roll of history after I am gone. Why should I endeavour to cut short a career, which opens with such brilliant auspices? Your hand, young Sir; and now come, let me give you a lesson in our common art."

The champion's second, a little midshipman of the Royal Navy, placed a fivepenny piece on the flat head of the ramrod, and holding it at arm's length, Bryan, without seeming to take aim for an instant, sent the diminutive coin spinning through the air, in pursuit of the youngster's bullet. His prognostication of the youth's future fame proved him to be a discriminating judge of character. For Rowan Cashel has since attained great renown as a Fire-eater, having killed his friend

* The late Mr. Thomas Galoin, finisher of the law at Kilmainham, had a phrase, in the line of his business, very like that of the Great Orator and Patriot.—"One step farther," he would say, as he settled his man upon the drop; "one step farther, for your own aise, and long life to you!"

in a duel, and assisted, on several occasions, in rightly placing other honourable gentlemen, bent upon doing likewise.

An antagonist, who is half a fool, is about as dangerous a competitor "as you shall meet of a summer day." I would rather have an appointment with Mr. Ferdinand Keane himself; seeing that an ape is infinitely a more mischievous creature than a bear. One of this sort, known in the sweet county of Tipperary by the nom de guerre of "Goose Ryan," sent a hostile message to a dragoon officer quartered at Caher; and as the bearer of the cartel was not to be trifled with, the meeting took place in due course. "The Goose" came to the ground, wrapped up in a light drab-coloured fleecy Petersham, which made him about as tangible a mark as a haycock, were any man so malicious as to take deliberate aim at him. But the honest soldier had no such intention; as he laughingly said to his friend, he thought it "pity to singe a goose so well feathered."

After the usual formalities, however, had been gone through and the parties invited to take their ground, "The Goose" suddenly flung aside his covering, and appeared laced up in a suit of black from the chin to the toe, "a bare forked animal," like Romeo's apothecary, and offering such a profile to the gallant son of Mars, as none but a marksman, practised at splitting bullets upon the edge of a knife, could hope to hit. The word was given, and the unfortunate dragoon fell, while the featherless biped capered and cackled about the field, snapping his fingers and shouting—"Oh, what a goose I am!—Oh, what a goose I am!"

While the Galway militia was under arms, a scene occurred at the mess-table, showing what edged tools they play with who choose a half-natural for their butt. There was a sleepy, moping lieutenant in that corps, who went about with his mouth half-open and his lids half-closed, never addressing his brother officers, and when spoken to, replying in monosyllables "long drawn out," which he delivered in a tone pitched between a moan and a whisper. He was patient of slight taunts, probably because the trouble of resenting them would have been too great an exertion; and as for jests and witticisms—spoken at him—he heeded them not at all:—perhaps he heard them not.

But on the occasion in question, one of those would-be wits and couldn't be gentlemen—in which variety, every rank of the featherbed service abounded—proceeded beyond the limits of the quip modest and the cut circumstantial, to express his wonder, "Why the d—l Lord Clancarty had admitted such a spooney into his regiment at all?"

The sleepy lieutenant rose from his chair, strode across the floor at his usual pace, till he came to the door, which he locked, and putting the key in his pocket, drew forth his cut-and-thrust sword, and called on his laughing insulter to "dthraw." A broad grin was the only notice taken of this defiance. "If that won't do," said he, in his wonted sesquipedalian snuffle, "take this;" and he gave him a tap on the shoulder with his "King's-Order."

The gentleman's broad grin now became a broad stare. "Zounds," he exclaimed, as he lugged out his reluctant blade, "would you cut my throat for a joke?"

"I'll thry," replied the sleepy lieutenant, making a pass at the bright gorget, with which it was then the fashion to decorate and protect the midriff of officers of a certain rank.

Great confusion ensued, as commonly happens when half a score of Irishmen, over their third tumbler of punch, raise a simultaneous voice for "Paice;" but before order could be restored, the best uniform coat of the giber had been spoiled by an unmannerly gash in the right sleeve, through which a stream of martial ichor flowed, enough to shelve any garment in the world.

During the whole of this exciting controversy, it was remarked, that the gawky lieutenant neither closed his mouth nor raised his eyelids above their ordinary angle of inclination; but when all was over, and the key replaced in the door, he uttered a sort of chuckle over the remains of his tumbler, which was the only sound resembling a laugh that was ever known to pass through the fence of his teeth. It is hardly necessary to add, that he was let alone at the mess, after that evening.

I knew a booby of another description, who was challenged by a tenant of his own, a gentleman-farmer, who was bound by lease to pay him an enormous rent for a large tract of land. This squire was extremely pugnacious, and knew not what fear meant. Better sport than fighting he would not have desired, and he was an unerring shot. But like most of the Thickskullo-de-Half-witto tribe, he was also remarkably cunning and fond of money. When the challenge came then, accompanied by some taunting language, enough to "stir mood" in a wiser man, he declined it, alleging that it would be rare fun indeed to shoot the fellow; but then, said he, "who would pay me the big rent after that?"

The law, as it is administered against duellists, is as strange as anything else belonging to the subject. Indeed it is the cause, that so absurd and barbarous a practice still exists. Thus, it is much safer to kill your adversary than to thrash him,—and attended with less cost or bother, to blow his brains out, than to write a letter, upon which a criminal information may be grounded. A stage coachman, who is apt to meet with accidents, better consults the interest of his employer, by breaking the necks of the passengers, than by dislocating their limbs; because, in the latter case, they can sue for damages, but in the former all accounts are settled: and in like manner, the law (as far as its practice goes) punishes the threat or provocation to fight a duel, more surely and more severely, than the actual commission of murder in that form. It is "the attempt, and not the deed, that confounds."

Had Mr. Ferdinand Keane succeeded in inducing Mr. Hislop to go out, and had he shot him dead, after the proper forms and moods of honour, does any one suppose that Mr. Ferdinand Keane would have been sent to gaol for six months as a criminal? Most certainly not. He would have gone out of the way until the Assizes. The police would never have made their zeal and activity conspicuous, by ferreting out his hiding-place in the meantime; and when the Judges had made their entrée into the county town, this hero would have walked into the county gaol, given himself up to justice, (as the phrase is,) and stood his trial; if a trial that can be called, where the witnesses are not obliged to state what they know.

The inquiry would last about half an hour; and then Mr. Ferdinand Keane would walk out of the dock, an object of universal sympathy and of particular congratulation, "the observed of all observers," admired by the young ladies, and envied by all young gentlemen who had not yet achieved distinction by killing their man.

I do not advance this without proper warranty. Something better than a year ago, near to the same town of Ballinasloe, where this person performed his feat of horsewhipship, and received his due meed for it, a duel was fought, in which one of the combatants was mortally wounded. It was a blackguard affair (if one may venture to call things by their proper names) about a horse race.

Two of the persons implicated in this affair were tried before the Lord Chief Baron, at the Spring Assizes for Galway in 1841. Four individuals who had seen the duel, were brought upon the table and sworn to tell the whole truth. But, on being interrogated as to the circumstances which they had witnessed, they all declined to answer, alleging that they would not consent to criminate themselves.

One of these persons was the brother of the murdered man; and the Judge expressed his opinion pretty roundly, at his appearing to shrink from the question. "It must be a case of unparalleled atrocity, indeed, (said his lordship,) if the brother of a person who has been killed in a duel, really apprehends danger to himself from a disclosure of what he knows about the transaction." The rebuke had no effect. The young gentleman was game, and still refused to answer.

Another gentleman who had become accidentally a spectator of the encounter, and had even exerted himself with laudable humanity to prevent matters from being pushed to extremity, sheltered himself behind the same legal fiction, that he feared to inculpate himself; and the learned Judge being bound by the decision of the House of Lords—which he was pleased to call the Highest Court of Justice in the kingdom—was obliged to consent to these evasions. That lofty tribunal had ruled the point in Lord Cardigan's Trial; and until its decision is qualified or reversed by an Act of Parliament, it must henceforth be impossible to obtain a conviction in any case of murder, upon the evidence of eye-witnesses, unless they choose to give their testimony voluntarily and without compulsion.

THE CHANT OF AN OLD EDINBURGH STUDENT.

My College days,—my College days!
I'll still, whilst life's warm fountain plays,
In glad remembrance, chant the praise
Of days I spent at College.
My labours easy, studies light,
Lectures by day, my friends at night
To meet, and join in converse bright
Of pleasure and of knowledge.

The pleasant strolls in Prince's Street,
'Mongst brilliant crowds of ladies sweet,—
Whose bright eyes sparkle when they meet
Alumni bold and gay;—
Who fly from town when classes close,
For then the streets contain no beaux
Worth their regard,—Edina grows
A waste when we're away.

For where are men like students true,
To sport, to jest, to fight, to woo?
"Auld Reekie" might indeed look blue,
Should they no more return.
The ladies pale,—shopkeepers poor,—
Charleys would hold a sinecure,—
Professors beg from door to door,—
And good old Murray* mourn.

But let me not desert my theme,
Instead of Students' life, 'twould seem I'm praising Students' selves. You'll deem Me rather egotistical.
Then be those days with roses strewn,
In memory whilst she holds her own,—
Those days when Charleys were o'erthrown
With arguments so-fistical.

When cudgels rattled,—snowballs flew;
When Bluecoats blench'd and backwards drew;
When Provost, Bailies, and that crew,
For soldiers sought in fear.
O swiftly sped, and pleasantly,
Those days of mirth,—those nights of spree,—
When all was gladness—all was glee,
Good humour, and good cheer.

And here's a health in glorious wine
To all those comrades dear of mine,—
To Students all who still combine
Pursuits of fun and knowledge.
And here's that fountain-head of lore,
(And may her fame from shore to shore Resound until this earth's no more,)
Hurrah! Old Edinburgh College! A. C. G.

LINES

ON WORDSWORTH'S GREAT SONNET WRITTEN ON WESTMINSTER BRIDGE.

Many, with eye dilate, from some such perch,
In similar observances, have seen
The huge, wide city in its morning sheen;
And, though they felt the longing, and the search
For apt expression, not could call it "fair."
Open unto the fields and to the sky,
The domes that seem asleep in smokeless air,
"The mighty heart," "the river gliding" by,
Were felt; not also felt the power to name;
Bewildered intellect could, struggling, frame
No utterance. But he, the mighty one,
Had but to see to pour his words divine;
His eye, keen flashing, instant seized upon
The mystery; gave character and sign. C. B.

SUMMER READING.—THE NEW NOVELS.

I.—FATHER CONNELL; a Novel. By the O'Hara Family. 3 vols. London: Newby; and T. & W. Boone.

II.—THE MARCHIONESS; A Strange but True Tale. By Elizabeth Thornton, Author of "Lady Alice." 2 vols. Simpkin, Marshall, & Co.

III. THE HERBERTS. By the Author of "Elphinstone." 3 vols. Saunders & Otley.

IV.—MORLEY ERNSTEIN, or the TENANTS OF THE HEART. 3 vols. By G. P. R. James, Esq., Author of "Darnley," "Richelieu," &c. &c. Saunders & Otley.

The close of the publishing season, if it can now be said ever to know a close, is, in 1842, its most brilliant period;—so far at least as respects the daily bread of the large majority of the English "reading public:" namely, novels, romances, and poetry. The works enumerated above, are among the more choice of their kind, and, at all events, one of them, Father Connell,—is destined to an existence which must extend far beyond the season, and add fresh laurels to the most national and pathetic of the imaginative writers of Ireland. Although the name of the O'Hara Family were not emblazoned on the title-page of Father Connell, no one who has perused 'Crohoore of the Bill-Hook, John Doe, or The Nowlans,' could for a moment remain in doubt as to its authorship. The new work possesses, in a lavish degree, all the beauties, and also the idiosyncracies, the peculiarities, the strong mannerism of Banim. It displays his peculiar power of working out strong effects by means apparently the most rude and simple; of fathoming the depths and threading the intricacies of that greatest of all puzzles and mysteries,—the human heart; and especially of those hearts carried in Irish bosoms, in which the horrible and the ludicrous, the piteous, and the humorously grotesque, are either found in close proximity or in fantastic combination. It is the charm of Banim's writings, that all his pictures, though true in design to universal nature, are coloured with the hues of Irish fancy, and are, in style and costume, strictly national. Banim is indeed nothing if not Irish; and his fictions cannot be appreciated by those who do not relish them the more for this exclusiveness. If less national in his feelings, partialities, and even prejudices, he would, in our opinion, be a much less powerful fictionist, and less worthy of admiration, though probably much more popular with the ordinary class of English readers.

Than Father Connell, the hero and the heart of this new story, Mr. Banim has never painted anything more perfect, more true, or half so morally beautiful. Whatever is finest in the characters of Chaucer's good Priest, of the Vicar of Wakefield, or of Abraham Adams, meets in Father Connell, whose heart is a perpetual well-spring of overflowing love, and softest charity, and milkiest human kindliness. As good Protestants, we could be almost jealous of a Roman Catholic priest being made so very fascinating to the affections, while to the judgment he is faultless; especially as it seems impossible that Father Connell, unless vowed to celibacy, could have been, to the same degree, the pitiful and tender father, as well as the watchful pastor of his little flock. His locality is one which Banim has often painted; a small provincial third or fourth-rate ancient city, with its old-fashioned shopkeepers, petty tradesmen and vagrant mendicants; not without its religious and party jealousies and animosities; but with an under current of kindness and neighbourly feeling running through all, and brought into play by casual events. The personnel of the good priest is in all probability a portrait from the life; which some minute traits of identity, such as "his fingers closing on the palms of his hands, and almost always working against them," make almost a certainty. He was a hale sturdy man, of at least seventy-five, "yet without any indication of old age about him."

His face showed scarce a wrinkle, and it was florid;—not red and white, however, like some old people's faces, nor yet purple like those of others, as if the smaller blood vessels had burst, and become congealed within the surface of their skins;—but it was overspread with a still rosy colour of health. His forehead was expansive, and, at the temples, square; his eyes were blue, and generally expressing thought, and abstraction—in which state, they used to stare straight-forward, almost without ever blinking;—yet, they often relaxed into a smiling, or, as it might be, moistened expression; during which change they appeared half closed, and opened and shut very fast indeed. His scarcely grizzled eye-brows were bushy and protruding; his nose was long, large, but well formed, and with a broad back. His lips were full, and, for his age, remarkably red and handsome.

But above all, there was about his countenance the indications of a great singleness, and primitiveness, and beauty of character;—so that if you met him, stepping measuredly, yet almost springingly, along his suburb street, or the adjacent roads, and silently moving his lips, and working, as usual, the palms of his hands with his fingers, and taking no notice of you, though perhaps you might be an intimate friend, and his old eyes winking, and his whole face smiling to itself, you must inevitably have said, that the smile was not provoked by any object or circumstance then noticed by him, but rather that it came from a heart enjoying, at that moment, the sunshine of a virtuous, and therefore very happy intention; or—excuse poor, human vanity, even in its least offensive shape—recollection, perhaps.

Since the day he had become a clergyman, Father Connell had never altered the form or the texture of any article of his attire. He still wore the curious headdress which his present biographers have already endeavoured to describe—in their tale of John Doe in fact—as worn by father O'Clery—or indeed, if they had told the perfect truth, by the celebrated Irish friar, Father O'Leary.

A painter could paint Father Connell from the description given. Without being the ideal of an Apostle, his figure, countenance, manners, and dress harmonize well with his genuine character of the most benevolent of Irish priests, the most kindly-natured of human beings. And such he is from first to last,—whether cherishing the orphan, comforting the afflicted, reproving the vicious in the spirit of the purest love, or making the most heroic sacrifices for those he loved, and to whom he was bound by his personal feelings as much as by his pastoral office. The following scene, beside exhibiting Father Connell in his most engaging aspect, as an officiating priest, shows Irish Catholicity in the modesty and humility of past times, and the long way between St. Peter's at Rome and that little rude chapel, which is quite as near to heaven :—

It was Twelfth Night. Six o'clock, the hour for vespers in father Connell's little parish chapel, jingled from a little, cracked bell, set up at the top of a ruined, square, Norman castle, some distance from the half tolerated place of worship ; for at that time there existed a law that no Catholic house of prayer should summon its congregation from its own walls by means of a bell ; and, in removing the illegal monitor from immediate contact with his chapel, the priest hoped to elude the pains and penalties awarded by this large-minded piece of legislation, for any breach of its mandate.

So, the little old cracked bell was ringing ; the candles in the two badly gilded, wooden branches, which hung from the ceiling of the chapel, had been lighted ; and six others, supported by tall candlesticks, also wooden, and badly gilded, on the altar, were in process of illumination, by the agency of a very handsome little boy, with auburn hair, which curled and glittered over his white surplice, as far as his shoulders ; and the people summoned to evening devotion, were coming in ; or, after bending before the sacrament, enclosed in the altar tabernacle, were decently taking their places throughout the poor building.

In the centre of the chapel certain moveable seats, technically called the choir, were arranged. When put together they formed three sides of a long parallelogram, running from the semicircular railing around the altar (which enclosed a space called the sanctuary) to nearly the other end of the edifice. The top of this choir consisted of three old, worm-eaten chairs, with high, triangular backs, of which the middle one aspired to the dignity of an arm chair, and further in assumption of its dignity, it stood upon a kind of little dais, one or two steps above the clay and mortar floor. At right angles with these old seats, and almost touching them at either hand, were two long benches with railed backs ; while plain forms continued the side lines of the parallelogram, down to, as has been said, the railings before the altar.

It need not be said that the old arm chair, of little ease, was occupied by Father Connell, during vespers ; while its two humble attendants were filled by his two curates. The confronting benches, proceeding from them towards the altar, afforded places to very religious men, wearing long linen garments ; and after them, to little boys, wearing nice muslin surplices—the most eminent for good conduct in every way, to be found in the parish, as well as being the most distinguished for attention to certain small official duties of the chapel—enfans de prêtre in fact. And upon the forms continuing the lines of the benches, sat a second class of pious men and boys, not indeed robed in white, but still honoured with the distinction of immediately assisting in the chant of the vespers—although, be it noticed, every man, woman, and child of the congregation, might, if he or she liked, do the same thing. . . . . Father Connell's curates already stood robed ; and the old priest himself knelt, in silent prayer, to a kind of desk, in a corner—no one around him speaking above his breath.

He arose, and proceeded to put on his ceremonial surplice. To aid him in this task, immediately bounded forward the very handsome, glossy-haired boy, who has been seen lighting the tall candles on the altar, and who, that business ended, had been waiting in the sacristy to enjoy the honour of discharging a conferred duty of a higher degree. In his buoyant eagerness to exhibit as an expert priest's valet, he happened to tread too familiarly upon one of Father Connell's feet ; at which, smarting a good deal, and therefore a little ruffled at first, the clergyman suddenly turned round upon him ; but so soon as his eye rested upon the half penitent, half-laughing face of the blooming urchin, he could not help—for the old man loved the boy—smiling in sympathy ; and then he took him by the ear, in a make-believe show of punishing him, while thumb and finger pressed no harder than could a touch of velvet have done, and proceeded to address the offender.

"Neddy Fennell," it was in a whisper he spoke, and there was a curious contrast between his assumed tone of reproof, and the reflection in his eyes of the glances of his half-spoiled pet ; "Neddy Fennell will you ever stop doing mischief ? Neddy, while you are in the house of God, my child, you must behave quietly, and with decorum and gravity ; in the fields you may jump and play, Neddy Fennell, but in God's own house you must, I say, be orderly and well behaved." And again he feigned to inflict punishment on the boy's ear, only playing in the meantime with the little silky-surfaced organ. The moment he let it go, Neddy Fennell, covering it with his own hand, assumed such a farcical face of mock terror and suffering, and so well acted the part of pretending to wipe off his surplice imaginary drops of blood, which had trickled on it from the tyrannical pressure of the priest's finger and thumb, that his little companions, amongst whom he now resumed his place, grew red in the face, with the efforts they made to suppress their laughter.

The priest having adjusted his surplice, at the vestment press, stood inactive for a moment as if in thought, and then turned round and spoke in a low voice to all those who stood by :

"The men and the boys of the choir are to wait here in the sacristy after vespers for me ; I have something very particular to say to them."

No one distinctly replied, but there was a murmur of assent with a bending of many heads which gave a sufficiently satisfactory answer.

Vespers ended, the priest, and his curates, and other assistants, were unrobed, and Father Connell came back to his congregation.

Were there none among them who well understood what his formal intimation before vespers meant ! Ay, indeed, a good many, boys as well as men ; and they could scarcely now suppress, although, under the influence of a decorous feeling, they had lately done so, indications of their knowledge of Father Connell's intentions towards them, for the evening. It was Twelfth Night, in fact, and the majority of them knew his practices well.

He came back to them ; he gravely unrobed himself, not confronting them ; he bent his head over his clasped hands ; and then he turned round, and, his face shining with the delight which he knew he was about to impart to his auditors, said—

"My good friends and little children, this is the season for offering with pure and light hearts, to a good and great God, praises both in solemn hymns, and in cheerful acts, for the wonderful and merciful bounty of his coming to redeem and save us; and my friends, and you my little children, we have returned here after singing praises and thanksgivings to the Lord of Heaven and of earth ; and He in his love will not be displeased if we now enjoy ourselves in making use—temperately, however, and very temperately—of some of the good things which he has placed at our disposal—yes, my friends, big and little, we will now make merry amongst ourselves ; so come after me, my good friends and little children: it is Twelfth Night, and we ought to rejoice, and we will rejoice ; come —I have prepared a little treat for you—come after me and let us rejoice."

Father Connell and his invited guests had not far to go to their house of entertainment, for it was not more than a hundred paces from the chapel. He stopped at the head of his troop—the urchins partly composing it, shouting shrilly, though in a low key, and the pious men chuckling at their antics—he stopped, we say, before the humble entrance-door to his thatched dwelling, and after laughing heartily himself, knocked loudly. His old housekeeper, whose business it had been to prepare for the soirée, and who therefore expected the throng of revellers, quickly opened the portal to his summons, and, as amiably as her curious nature and habits would permit, bid everybody welcome.

Mrs. Mulloy was a peculiarity in her way;—tall, coarsely featured, pock-marked, and with an authoritative something like a beard, curling on her doubled chin; and almost fat in person and in limbs. Her bearing was lofty; her look arbitrary if not severe, and in every respect she seemed fully sensible of the importance of her station as house-keeper to her parish priest;—though it was whispered that even upon him, the source from which she derived all her consequence, Mrs. Mulloy did not always hesitate to forbear from dictatorial remonstrances, whenever, in the exercise of his charitable extravagance, she was pleased to detect a wasteful system of dissipation. Let it be added that her voice was the contrary of what Shakspeare calls,— and that her master was a little afraid of its not unfrequent eloquent exercise.

"An excellent thing in woman."

Yet on the present occasion, allowing, as a great rarity, her usual inhospitality to unbend a little, Mrs. Mulloy, inspired by the pervading spirit of the hilarity of the season, did, as we have hinted, behave very graciously in her capacity as portress.

"Welcome then," she huskily said, "welcome all, and cead mille a faultha, to the Twelfth-night's faste; come in, your reverence;—come in, men and boys, every mother's son o' ye."

"Come in my children," echoed the old priest, gleeishly, "come in, in the name of God;" and he bustlingly led the way into his white-washed, earthen-floored, and only sitting-room; in the black marble chimney-piece of which was, however, rudely carved a mitre, indicating that the paltry apartment had once, and very recently, been inhabited by a Roman Catholic bishop; but such was the fact; and such were the times. Father Connell was himself Catholic dean of his diocese.

Seats of every description had been arranged all round the parlour; in its centre stood a large square table, at the four corners of which was a mighty jug filled with ale, whose froth puffed over and adown the sides of each vessel. Rows of delft mugs were placed at the edges of the table; but the crowning feature of the Twelfth-night's feast, was a great two-handled osier basket, filled and pyramidically heaped up with brown-skinned, shining cakes of a fragrance so delicious as to perfume the apartment, and penetrating so keenly the nasal nerves of at least the younger portion of the guests as to give them fair promise of the capability of the contents of that basket to gratify equally and even more satisfactorily another of the senses. We could dilate at great length on the marvellous and long inherited excellence of these cakes. In our childhood they were termed, after the name of their then manufacturer, "Biddy Doyle's cakes;" in generations farther back they had borne, out of reverence to their great inventor, the appellation of "Juggy Fowler's cakes;" and Juggy Fowler had sold or bequeathed to Biddy Doyle the secret of making them;—but Biddy Doyle died suddenly and intestate, so that the grand secret died with her; and alas, from that day to this, no succeeding artiste has possessed genius enough, truly to imitate, in the estimation of the experienced, Juggy Fowler's far-famed and unique condiment.

We have enumerated all the dainties provided by Father Connell for his Twelfth-night's soirée, nor did he in his heart deem anything better or rarer could have been supplied on the occasion, in which opinion not one of his company differed from him; for indeed when they had taken their places, as exactly observed by them in "the Choir" at vespers, around the board, but at a distance from it, a set of happier faces could not on that same evening have been seen at any other board, no matter how costly, nor in any other mansion, no matter how magnificently contrasted with the poor priest's parlour. Our host hurried about, as if his very heart and soul were in the scene;—though why our mysterious "as if!" There is no doubt at all upon the subject; his heart and soul were in it. With one or two favourites assisting him, he walked round and round the circle until each individual of it held a "Biddy Doyle" in one hand and a merry mug of ale in the other; and he patted the children on the head; or rallied the men on their peculiarities; or joined in their homely jests upon each other; and loud and general arose the frequent laugh, in which none joined more gleeishly than he did; and almost as frequent as his laughter, and fully as loud, were his calls upon "Peggy," to replenish from the half barrel, under the stairs, the gigantic jugs which stood at the four corners of the square old oak table in the middle of the banquet hall.

Be it understood that all the members, men and boys, of our old friend's choir were unpaid volunteers; and moreover, of a very humble class in society; in fact working masons, or slaters, or carpenters, and so forth, or else very inferior shop-keepers—and with few exceptions, the sons of all such. And yet with these men and boys our good priest laughed, jested, and made merry; and anon, story-telling, himself setting the example, became the order of the evening.

Very curious and very Irish those stories are, in their blended gross credulity and rich grotesque fancy. These were succeeded by songs; many, and the best of them, old Irish ones, and then Father Connell himself being called upon—

Tried to recollect the only song—we do not know what song—that he had learnt in his early youth, but after repeated failures in his own mind, and half irritated by his sense of the necessity of contributing to the mirth of his revellers, he suddenly broke out into a joyous Latin hymn, and as suddenly stopped short, grievously scandalized at himself: and then, to cover his confusion, he appealed to "his boys," to help him out with "his portion of mirth;" upon which all of them became dumb and sheep-faced, except his old pet, Neddy Fennell, who, when no one else would befriend his patron, in this urgency, nimbly stepped to the middle of the floor, and with the small portion of a "Biddy Doyle" in one hand, and a half finished mug of ale in the other, sang with much spirit and fun, if not with skill or science, "Billy O'Rourke was the boy for it—whoo!"

This little display affected his parish priest in a peculiar way. Perhaps it was the first time he had ever heard a song of such a character; but however that might be, the old man now looked amazed, and as if admiringly, on such a new proof of the cleverness of his young friend; and then, as the little fellow swayed his body and limbs, and frisked here and there, humouring the burden of his melody, Father Connell smiled and winked his eyes, and laughed, and wagged his head from side to side, and almost attempted to whistle in unison with the unexpected talent and capers of the public performer before him; and when Neddy had finished, he beckoned to him, took the pretty boy in his arms, kissed him, played with his auburn hair, made him promise over and over again to be a good boy, slid a shilling into his pocket, although at that time neither Neddy Fennell nor any of his family wanted such a donation; and finally, laying his hands on the urchin's shoulders, gently forced him down on his knees, to give him his blessing.

And Father Connell's soirée almost so ended. True, he topped the delight of all his juvenile guests by giving them each a silver sixpence, as a Christmas-box; and cordially gratified and made important in their own estimation, the seniors of "the choir," by very often shaking hands with them at parting, whilst every one received with bent heads and knees, their old pastor's blessing. But with little Neddy Fennell he lingered at his humble postern door when they were quite alone; again put his arms round him, again kissed him, while Neddy thought he felt a warm tear drop on his sunny cheek; and again, and again, besought him to promise to be good: sighs of apprehensive doubt for the future—as we know them to have been—now and then interrupted the voice of the monitor.

Neddy Fennell is the secondary or lesser hero of the tale; and he is worthy of his high destiny, and of the warm affection of the good priest, who, loving every one, had yet taken this merry and kindly orphan boy into his very heart's core.

The penal laws, under which the Irish Catholics long groaned, were but little relaxed when Father Connell first became a parish priest; and, among other tyrannical prohibitions, no Papist durst then give instruction to youth, either privately or in the public schools. This unholy statute was of course at all times, to some extent, eluded; but when the detestable law was abrogated, and when the little ragged Papist children could legally be sent to school, and even placed under Papist instructors, Father Connell projected a school for the instruction of the children of the poor. The children themselves, by a happy idea originating in his fertile though simple mind—fertile in schemes of philanthropy, though far from being expert in arithmetical calculations—were, under his inspection, made the collectors of the stones and sand required to erect the wondrous edifice. After an immense mass of stones, of all sorts and sizes, had been collected in the wooden bowls with which the priest furnished each urchin, in lieu of a hand-barrow, sand was gathered in a similar way—no great scrupulousness being observed by the purveyors as to questions of private property, the end perhaps justifying the means. The history of Father Connell's parish school, built and thatched by tiny hands, and that of the beautiful Catholic College, now nearly finished, at the aristocratic end of his native city, and already inhabited by Popish ecclesiastical students, walking under handsome colonnades in academic caps and gowns, is that of the Catholic faith in Ireland for the last hundred years—first persecuted, then triumphant. At the period in which the story opens, the teacher of the priest's school was a certain Mick Dempsey, a poor lad, who had been educated in it, and who, from the "priest's boy," had been elevated to a dignity which he did not wield without control, or single-handed. And here we may learn one of the chief means by which the Roman Catholic priests of Ireland gain the hearts of the people, old and young, and, by inspiring love and reverence, spread their dogmas. In a very characteristic scene, the priest, whose benevolence was unbounded, though his means were narrow, bestows a watch upon the teacher, as a reward and encouragment to his virtues and to his usefulness, in labouring among the poor children. Mick had saved as much money as had bought him a handsome suit of new clothes. Hitherto—

Every Thursday the parish priest and his curates used to attend, in their very humble little chapel, for the purpose of instructing the poor children of the parish, principally composed of the pupils of the school-house, in their catechism; and, during Lent, every evening after vespers was devoted to the same purpose. The curates each taught a class; but as the number requiring instruction was large, and made up of different ages and capacities, it became necessary that these clergymen should have lay assistants, who were also appointed by Father Connell; and while the boys on the earthen floor of the chapel, and the girls on the galleries, assembled in little groups, each group attending to its own instructor, the parish priest walked up and down, from place to place, now superintending the business of one class, and now of another. . . . . Mick had been attired indifferently enough; but on a certain evening in Lent, in the dimly lighted chapel, Father Connell having listened to, and observed, as usual, his catechism classes, one after the other, and reprehended or encouraged, as the case might call for, suddenly remarked a tall and exceedingly well-dressed young man, in the centre of a circle grouped round him, very fitly discharging the office of teacher. The old clergyman stopped short and looked hard at the young man, standing at some distance from him. "Who was he?" questioned Father Connell—"was he a stranger, or had he seen him before?"—he thought he had; yet the dress, and even the air of the individual (for new clothes, when a rarity, do alter for the better even the very mein of their wearer) seemed quite strange to him. The person's back was, however, at present, turned to our priest, and he longed to look into his face; but feeling that it might be an indelicacy in manners to go at once up to him and stare into his features, he walked down the chapel, as if quite unobservant, yet turning his head every now and then in curious criticism: and presently he made a wide circuit, that the object of his interest might not suppose he was rudely inspecting him; till, at length, by prudent management, he stood face to face before his own schoolmaster, Mick Dempsey. And now he opened his smiling blue eyes, and contracted his brows, and poked forward his head, from its usual erect position, and drew it back again, and stood straight as ever, and smiled and smiled until his whole countenance lighted up—the degree of severe authority which he had thought necessary to assume in it, as befitting his character of inspector of the catechistical instruction, quite subsiding; until, finally, he nodded with undisguised delight, and almost with familiarity, to his quondam "boy," now attired from head to foot in a "spick and span new suit" of elegant clothes.

But, anon, he bethought that the young observers around him might notice his raptures, strange and unaccountable to them, and that such an exhibition might not, in their eyes, be seemly for the place and the occasion; so he suddenly resumed his former austere bearing, and addressing his schoolmaster, said aloud—laying a particular stress on the first word, and using much courtesy of manner—"Mister Dempsey, I shall be glad to see you below in my house, when the teaching is over; and don't fail to come, Mister Dempsey; I have something very particular to speak about, Sir." . . . .

The evening's instructions terminated; Mister Dempsey followed Father Connell to his house, and found him anxiously awaiting his arrival.

"Mick, Mick, is that you? Is that you, Mick?" began the priest, gently rubbing his hands within each other, and again smiling with peculiar pleasure, while he dropped the term Mister, which he had deemed fit to assume in the chapel.

"Indeed, and it is myself sure enough, Sir," replied Mick.

"Upon my word, Mick, very good—very good indeed, Mick, upon my word,—turn round Mick, my good boy, till I can have a full view of you; very nice, very handsome indeed; and very good, Mick, I declare you are a good boy; I do declare you are—a very good boy;" and while thus addressing Mick Dempsey, he turned the young man round and round by the shoulders; now viewing him in front, now in the back, and now upwards and downwards, and in conclusion walking round about him, and clapping his hands softly together and laughing outright.

"And now, Mick," he continued, more seriously, after fully indulging his joy; "now Mick, I like that! It shows that you don't throw away your little savings; and isn't it a fine thing, Mick, for a good boy to buy elegant new clothes for himself, and look so decent and respectable in them, and not lay them out on whisky, or cockfighting, or dancing-houses, isn't it a fine thing Mick? . . . . . Sit down Mick, sit down, my good boy—Peggy!" and here Father Connell cried out as loud as he could, and the burly person of his housekeeper appeared in the doorway of the parlour. "Come in, Peggy, and look at Mick Dempsey's new clothes, Peggy, ar'n't they very nice, Peggy? and all bought with his own earnings; ar'n't they very nice, Peggy?" and he again made Mick Dempsey revolve on his axis, for Mrs. Molloy's inspection, who, with her hands and arms thrust up to her elbows in her capacious pockets, critically analyzed her former fellow servant's outside, and then happening to be in something like good humour on the occasion, Mrs. Molloy pronounced Mick Dempsey to be a first rate beau.

"Bring Mick Dempsey a drink of ale, Peggy," continued Father Connell. "'Pon my word I think he deserves a little treat," and Mrs. Molloy not demurring, a pewter vessel of ale was shortly placed before Mick, who drank from it to the health of his entertainer, and to that of Mrs. Molloy also; and here be it noticed that to a measure of good ale was limited all the libations in which our priest indulged his favourites, or himself.

"Now, Mick, don't you think that something handsome, and respectable, and a little like what gentlemen wear, would be very becoming, with the new clothes, Mick? a watch now, Mick, suppose a watch! don't you think so, Mick? . . . . . And now, Mick, because I brought you up, and because I see that you are careful and don't spend your money badly, and because I am sure that your good conduct gives good example, I will take on myself to bestow a token of my encouragement and approval, where I think it is so well due. I'll give you the watch myself, Mick, to wear with your new clothes; and you may tell the people when you take it out of your fob to see the hour of the day, you may tell the people, Mick, that your poor priest made you a present of that watch; and you may tell them too all the reasons why he did so, just as you have now heard them from his own lips,—and when I am in my grave, and you show that watch as your priest's gift, it will do you no harm to be a little proud of it, and people may not think the worse of you for having deserved it."

"Take this to Tommy Boyle, Mick," meaning by Tommy Boyle, a wealthy and much respected inhabitant of the town, fully of the middle age of human beings, on whom, however, he still continued to bestow the appellation, by which he used to address him a good many years before, when that person was only a boy; "take this to Tommy Boyle, Mick; I have told him in it, to give you a watch, to wear with your new clothes, which he will charge to my account: 'tis not to be an expensive watch, Mick, because I have not much money to spare; but I have told him to give you a watch to the value of four pounds; and when he gives it to you, which I make no doubt he will do, wear it for my sake, Mick."

The young man was sincerely thankful for this handsome gift, and now found words to express his feelings.

But though the prudent and well-behaved teacher was thus handsomely equipped, his poor little scholars remained as ill-clad as ever; and it was Christmas-tide, and the weather very severe, when Father Connell went to the school.

Father Connell's business to the school-house, on the present occasion, was to superintend the distribution, amongst the most deserving of his pupils, of certain clothing which he had purchased for them; indeed if we said the worst clad amongst the poor creatures, we should be nearer to the real motive that guided him in his selection of objects for his benefaction.

About fifty suits of clothes awaited his arrival in the school-house, some of one calibre, and some of another; in fact all selected to the best of his judgment, as available to boys of from about five to twelve or thirteen. They were of nearly uniform material; namely, a shirt, a felt hat, a grey frieze jacket and waistcoat, a pair of worsted stockings, and a pair of brogues, with the addition of a very peculiar pair of breeches, or small-clothes, locally termed a "ma-a." And of course this word "ma-a," requires some passing explanation from us. It was, then, in the first place, bestowed on the portion of dress alluded to, as seeming to explain its pristine nature and quality, by imitating the bleat or sound uttered by the animal, from which the substance of the article had been abstracted. In good truth the "ma-a" was fabricated from a sheep-skin, thrown into a pool of lime-water, and there left until its fleshy parts became corroded, and its wool of course separated from it;—and with very little other preparation, it was then taken out, dried in the sun, and stitched, with scanty skill in fashioning it, into something rudely resembling a pair of knee-breeches. . . . . Fifty shirts, fifty little felt hats, fifty frieze coats and waistcoats, fifty pairs of the now (we trust) immortalized ma-as, and at least twenty-five pairs of stockings and brogues were heaped before Father Connell, in his school-house; and many more than fifty poor little creatures assembled, upon the coldest day that came that year, each hoping to be chosen as a fit claimant upon the bounty of his parish-priest.

On entering the school-room, the good man's compassion had been forcibly appealed to, as many of the almost naked children, ranged on the forms at either head, turned up to his face (while their little bodies cringed, and their teeth chattered) beseeching, and yet doubting eyes, whose lids fluttered, and could not for a moment meet his questioning regard. In fact he knew the meaning of these self-doubting, mute appeals of the wretched urchins, and his primitive notions of justice battling with them, he was made unhappy. For in truth his keen glance discovered among the greater number of the wearers of the petitioning faces, individuals who were very irregular attendants in his school; whereas the Christmas clothing had been publicly notified to be intended for the most regular visitants of it, taking always into account the most generally deserving also; so that he plainly understood that a great portion of the present expectants were not, in point of strict school discipline, entitled to the promised periodical favours.

And this discovery, while it grieved, also puzzled Father Connell. Rigidly, and properly speaking, these young outlaws and street idlers, who daily sinned against his constant admonitions, deserved no such reward. Yet how could he send out again, into the snow, which drifted upon a cutting north-east blast against the windows of the school-house, their little shivering carcases! He turned his back upon them, looked out through the window at the weather, shook his head, prohibitory of the measure, while a few drops, too warm and fresh from the heart for that weather or anything else to freeze, stole from his winking eyes. He quitted the window and walked up and down the school-room, pondering over the difficulty in his way. He sternly regarded the young vagabonds again and again; and, as if in answer to his every look, they cringed together, more and more piteously. What was to be done?—and he resumed his walk up and down the room; and finally stopped short again, nodded, but now approvingly to himself, and quite upright and austerely, went to Mick Dempsey and addressed him.

"Mister Dempsey," for in this style already noticed, he always spoke to Mick, in the presence of his pupils; "Mister Dempsey, I'd be thankful if you call over the list of your regular scholars, and then let every boy who answers to his name, come down to this end of the school-room;" and he bowed and waved his hand to Mr. Dempsey, while pronouncing aloud his request.

Mr. Dempsey obeyed the command; and when the muster-roll had been gone through, more than twenty, alas! of unfortunate young scamps, not comprised in it, remained huddled together at the other end of the apartment, with what looks of bitter disappointment must be imagined.

The priest then took Mr. Dempsey by the arm, and led him into a corner, where their whispered conference could not be overheard.

"Mick, the poor children below are strangers to our school, ar'n't they, Mick?"

"I hardly ever saw them here before, Sir, and now they only come to impose on your Reverence for the Christmas clothing."

"Mick, this is bitter weather, and the unfortunate little wretches have scarce a tatter to cover them against it, my good boy."

"But they have no right to get the clothes, Sir, from our own regular boys."

"That is true ; very true, Mick ; and I know it is a bad example to encourage the idle to the loss of the industrious ; so that I believe, to speak honestly and fairly, they ought to be turned out into the snow, without getting any clothes at all. But, Mick, they'd perish, they'd perish in this severe weather, they would indeed, poor little creatures, they'd perish, Mick ;" and he took the schoolmaster's hand and squeezed it, and shook it, and looked into his eyes appealingly, as if he would turn him from the rigid justice of the case, to its more merciful side.

"It would be a cruel thing, Mick," he continued, "to send them out, to have the snow and the biting wind going through their naked bodies ?"

"It would indeed Sir, but—"

The priest stopped him, before he could go beyond the the admission he sought for ; he did not want to hear the other side of the question at all. "Well, well, Mick ; —ay ;" and he more emphatically squeezed the hand he held, while his old face grew bright again. "I think I see how we are to manage it ;" and now he whispered certain instructions into the schoolmaster's ear, holding his mouth very close to that organ, lest a breath of the purpose of his plan should be overheard.

"Give me the cat-o'-nine-tails, Sir," he next said, in a loud and tyrannical voice.

And so, by a truly pious fraud, the good priest was enabled to distribute his pile of garments among the naked righteous and unrighteous alike. In the number of the latter was Neddy Fennell, who had lately lost his father; and whose mother, fallen into deep poverty and misery, now lodged in a wretched cabin in a thrice-wretched suburb named "The Green," or "The shower of houses," a locality inhabited by a population which Banim only could paint, and yet, amid all that is squalid and repulsive, contrive to interest the sympathies of beings, of like nature, in the fortunes of the miserable inmates of those hovels. But we must first turn to Father Connell, in triumph waiting to see his newly-clad boys, ere we follow him to the abodes of sin and poverty.

In a few minutes the old gentleman occupied his post at the little gate of the churchyard of his chapel ; and half secreted between its piers he now stood. "The Bosheen,"—a solitary, and unfrequented green lane, running to his right and to his left.

For a few minutes he waited here, smiling to himself, and clawing the palms of his hands with his fingers ; and anon, his ears were gratified by the expected sound of a great many little feet, softly tramping through the yet thin layer of snow, in the bosheen ; and in a few seconds more, appeared Mick Dempsey heading his army of newly-clad pupils, who coming on in great order, only two abreast, formed a goodly column. They slowly defiled before their priest and patron, each as he came up, squeezing hard, betwixt his finger and thumb, the narrow brim of his little felt hat, chucking it downwards, and the head it contained along with it ; and then abruptly letting go, that both might bob back gain, to their usual position, and so altogether performing a bow to his Reverence. And for every bow he got, every single one, Father Connell gave another bow, performed with studied suavity, though his face all the while glittered ; and when the troop had quite passed by, he stooped forward, leaning his hands on his knees, to peep after them ; and again standing upright, he clapped those hands softly together, and laughed, almost shouted forth his delight, while not tears alone, but little streamlets of tears, of happy, happy tears, trickled down his bloomy old cheeks.

It was some time before his outbreak of enjoyment permitted Father Connell's mind to recur to his engagement with Neddy Fennell ; but now suddenly starting, he looked about him for his young friend ; saw the boy standing timidly and alone, at a little distance, walked hastily to him, seized him by the hand, and under his guidance went to visit the widow of poor Atty Fennell.

"The Green," so called by Neddy Fennell, had not a bit of green about it, being a space, enclosed, at three sides, by wretched cabins, and at the fourth side by the high wall of the county hospital, within which that sedate edifice stood. The cabins were tenanted by the poorest of the poor ; their thatch half rotten, and falling in ; with holes in their clay walls for windows, and holes in their roofs for smoke vents ; and if ever the semblance of a chimney rose above one of them, it was contrived of a kind of osier work, plastered with mud. Upon the area of the ground thus hemmed in, presided disorder, and want of cleanliness, in many inert varieties : heaps of manure before each door, and everywhere about, carefully collected by the inhabitants, as their most considerable source of wealth ; little pools of dirty water, and puddle in all weathers ; stones, great and small, wherever they could find room ; while through these pleasing resorts pigs grunted and wallowed, vicious cur dogs barked, and gambolled, or else snarled and quarrelled, and bit each other ; miserable half-starved cocks and hens stalked here and there, in quest of something to pick up, and found nothing ; and half naked, and sometimes wholly naked, children ran, shouting, and playing, and enjoying themselves.

Fronting the hospital gate, but nearer to the opposite side of the irregular square, the gallows destined for the reception of city malefactors of the highest degree, used, occasionally—yet, we are bound to say, very seldom, recollecting the mass of squalid poverty around it—to be erected ; and this was one feature of notoriety for the green, from which it improved on Neddy Fennell's appellation, and was more emphatically termed Gallows Green. But there was also another trait of its celebrity, now to be indicated.

It had, time immemorial, been a kind of city corporate commonage. Everything with and without life might take possession of it ; no questions asked ; and the liberal indulgence was not long unacknowledged. When the hospital was being built, sand had been scooped irregularly, here and there, from beneath the surface of the green, nearest to the edifice's site, so that, after its completion, and the erection of its boundary wall, hollows remained. Upon the verge of one of those, or haply at its bottom, some speculating vagabond pauper experimentally ventured to erect a hovel, still more wretched than the buildings enclosing three sides of the space around it. How he procured the materials, even for such a dwelling, Heaven and he know—not we. No one interrupted his proceedings, and he lived for years, rent free, and tax free ; and in every way luxuriantly free, in his new house. His success emboldened others like himself to imitate his example ; and in a few years, copies of his domicile, perhaps to the amount of one hundred or of one hundred and fifty, were to be seen on the edges, or on the sinking sides, or in the very depths of the old gravel pits, and the population of the precious colony soon became very numerous.

To get into this jumble of miserable dwellings was a puzzle ; to get out of it, once in, a still greater one ; for it contained no streets, no lanes, no alleys, no enclosed spots, no straight ways, no level ways ; but hovel, turned its back upon hovel, or its side, or its gable, or stood upon the verge of an excavation, or upon the declivity, or at the bottom of one, as before hinted.

The fortuitous squatting or tumbling down of these hovels, had procured for the place the quaint appellation of the "shower of houses," a genuine Irish Alsatia, with this difference, that it was to be found at a not very distant day, and is not a thing of tradition or of centuries long elapsed. The owner of the cabin in which the Widow Fennell lodged is a rarer or more racy specimen of feminity, than the pious and patient suffering creature, her lodger, whom Father Connell had come to visit and to relieve, and therefore more entertaining; and the hovel is the perfection of squalor and discomfort; yet bright scenes of animal enjoyment passed in it. We pass at once to the mistress :—

Before the ardent little fire, and almost touching it, squatted a middle-aged woman, dressed in rags and tatters; cooking upon a "griddle," (a round flat piece of iron,) a cake which occupied the full space of her apparatus; and curious to relate, she was so happy in her den of seeming wretchedness, that she endeavoured to shape her cracked voice into what was intended for a merry song.

Catching the sound made by the old squeaking door as Father Connell came in, the woman stopped short in her melody, though not in her cooking process; and without turning or looking behind her, she jocularly shouted out—

"Ah, then, the divil welcome you, honey, and is that yourself?"

A step or two brought Father Connell close upon her. These steps did not sound like those she had expected to hear. She glanced sideways at the feet and legs which now almost came in contact with her own. The friend she had counted on, and for whom her salutation was intended, certainly did not wear black knee-breeches, and large silver buckles in her shoes. She looked quite up, and recognised the formidable hat and wig of her parish priest; and then, with surprising agility, up she bounced from her squatting position, retreated as far as the dimensions of her dwelling would permit, and there clasping her hands, gazed in terror at the old clergyman.

"I fear the word that is on your lips is in your heart," he said sternly, "sinful woman."

"Och, then, may the word choke me if—"

"Stop!—or I fear you may get your prayer; I fear you will die with that very word in your mouth."

"I won't—I won't, your rivirince!—I'll die a good Christian."

"Well, well—God mend you—God mend you!" and Father Connell passed into the inner chamber of her house.

Here, not able to see distinctly any object, he called at the orifice, through which he had squeezed himself, for a light; the woman without came with some burning straw in her hand, which only flared for an instant, and then left him in redoubled darkness. He asked for a candle, and unable to produce such a luxury herself, the dame tucked up her tatters and left the wigwam to hunt, as she said, "among the good neighbours for a scrap of one;" during which hunt she did not fail to telegraph through the shower of houses, that their most dreaded enemy, their parish priest, was among them.

Having visited and consoled the dying inmates of the inner compartment, and resolved upon what was to be done for their immediate comfort, the priest passed out—

Not, however, without taking the poor young widow's hand again, squeezing it hard and whispering to her—"I'm going from you, my child, but I won't be long away; rest you here as quietly as you can till I come back."

"Where are you, Neddy?" he called out: the boy ran to him from one of the hobs of the densely glowing little fire; "give me your hand, Neddy, and lead me out of this sinful place, as you led me into it; and, after that, come home with me; yes, Neddy, my poor little boy, come home with me; but we will come back soon again to your mother—we will indeed, Neddy—indeed we will."

In quitting the abode, holding fast by Neddy Fennell's hand, Father Connell had no eyes for anything around him. He did not therefore perceive, that the woman he had first seen cooking her griddle cake, was now sitting on her heels at the fire, along with another woman, habited very like herself; the friendly visiter, in fact, for whom she had mistaken Father Connell on his coming in; and who, during his conference with Mrs. Fennell, had really returned to her copartner in a certain traffic, her body bent under a little sack secured thereon by a hay rope passing across her forehead.

Upon the meeting of the two friends, a subdued "whist!"—and nodding and winking towards the inner room, on the part of the cook, and then, whispering explanations at the fire, enabled them to sit quietly until the priest passed out—not, however, without disagreeable apprehensions of what might be his notice of them before he left their house. But he did leave it, paying no attention to them; and then, after a cautious pause to give him time to get far enough away, they ventured to indulge a few sneers and jests at his expense; turning by and by to other topics.

The two persons before us were, what is locally called "potatoe beggars;" it should be added potatoe sellers too, as they certainly vended to good advantage, the food received as alms. Amongst the farmers' wives, whom in pursuit of their calling, they very often visited, one of them was in the habit of admitting that she "went by the name" of Nelly Carty, and the other by that of Bridget Mulrooney; and both used to tell pathetic stories of their large families of orphans, and how they were left alone in the wide world, without a "mankind to do a hand's turn for them on the flure," or to earn as much as a cold potatoe for themselves and their starving children. Copartners in trade, it has been said they were; joint owners of their crumbling hut, they also were, and every article of its furniture had two mistresses; and in all the hardships of business, as well as in all its profits, they had share and share alike.

Perhaps the majority of the colonists of the shower of houses, living upon chance, as we have intimated, were made up of potatoe beggars; as well, indeed, as were a good portion of the occupiers of all the miserable suburbs at that time surrounding our city; yet, none of them seemed dissatisfied with their social position; and, in fact, compared with the less brazen-faced paupers around them, who were ashamed to beg, little reason had these sturdy vagabonds to be so. If famine did not reign over the land, in consequence of the destruction, by an unfavourable season, of the potatoe root, "there was little fear o' them," as they said themselves; and a passing notice of the manner in which Nelly Carty and Bridget Mulrooney drove their thriving trade, may prove the assertion, as regards the whole of their numerous and respectable body.

At break of day in winter, and at six o'clock during every other portion of the year, out sallied either one or other of them; her well patched bag of indefinite material chucked under her arm, leaving her helpmate at home, to take care of the house, and perform other necessary duties of the firm. And suppose, Nelly Carty went out, Bridget Mulrooney had, compared with Nelly's responsibilities, a day of exquisite rest,—and hence, by the way, arose the necessity of the extensive association of potatoe-beggars following their vocation, in couples at least, if not in trios, or quartettos. So, Nelly went out, and after clearing the town and its environs, traversed a pretty wide district in mud and in mire, in sunshine and in all its contraries, hail, rain, snow, frost, fog, wind and tempest, and so forth; along high roads and bye roads, along boskeens and field paths; over hedge and ditch, over hill and valley, until at last she succeeded in amassing in her sack, a creditable load, amounting to about one hundred weight, gained by most plausible beggary from all the well-known farm-houses in her chosen haunt; and also very often from the cabins of the working peasants encountered on her way.

But Nelly was not such a fool as to carry her bag from door to door with any appearance of plenty in it. So soon as it began to assume a plethoric shape, she knew well some convenient spot in the open fields in which to deposit its contents; after which, she could bear it quite empty and open-mouthed and beseechingly to the thresholds next to be visited; and before evening fell, after receiving the "bit and sup," along with her usual donation of raw potatoes, at more than one of the truly charitable dwellings among which she quested, Nelly recurred with the certainty of a raven, to the hiding hole glanced at; secured the mouth of her now well distended wallet; passed a rope of hemp, or of hay over its middle, when she had poised it between her shoulders; repassed the rope across her forehead; then gained by the shortest cut, a place of rendezvous on the high road, where she met perhaps a dozen of her sisterhood, though by no means in partnership with her, who there had sat down to rest a little while, after the happy termination of their day's ingenuity; rested, and smoked, and gossiped merrily and loudly along with them; in their company walked home, bent double, though on sturdy bare red legs and feet; gained the rent-free and tax-free dwelling, of which she and Bridget Mulrooney were joint proprietors; entered it, and found Bridget prepared to afford her in every way a luxurious welcoming, after her tramp of at least fifteen long Irish miles; relieved herself, with her helpmate's joyous aid, of her formidable fardel, and sat down at the brisk little fire to become very happy. And the next morning Bridget Mulrooney went out with the bag, of course, and Nelly staid at home to enjoy her day of repose; and so, day after day, the year round, the business of their concern was regularly carried on. . . . . .

When they became quite assured that the priest was beyond hearing or observation, Nelly recurred to her griddle cake, which, during his retreat into the inner apartment, she had not forgotten to take care of, and now found it done "to a turn," and to her heart's full satisfaction, as it exhibited on both sides the proper speckled surface of brown and white, which demonstrated her culinary success. She removed it from the griddle, cut it up into measured portions, and placed these on edge round the hob, to keep them still comfortably hot. She then put a short form in front of the smirking fire; and using a rickety old chair as a sideboard, deposited upon it her odd cups and saucers, as she called them—and indeed "odd" they were in every sense of the word, of different sizes, patterns, and colours; by their sides, or among them, one leaden teaspoon, a little jug with a broken nose, three white delft plates with blue edges, a wooden "noggin" a little black tin teapot, and a wooden-hafted knife. This done, she drew out of one of her capacious pockets a flat bottle, containing whisky, which, when used as on the present occasion, is jocularly termed "colliery crame;" again from the same ample receptacle a small folded paper, holding one quarter of an ounce of tea, and after it a second parcel somewhat larger, enveloping two ounces of intensely brown sugar. During her proceedings so far, a small three legged metal pot had been boiling away gloriously, after the removal of the cake and the griddle, on the fire; with the aid of the wooden noggin she now abstracted from this pot, water to make her tea in the little dingy tin tea-pot; and, still continuing her allotted household duties, split the different portions of her cake with the wooden-hafted knife, and then heaped butter upon the insides of each portion until the dainty was saturated through and through.

Pending these preparations, Bridget Mulrooney, squatted on the floor, at one end of the short form, looked on at Nelly's process with very pleasing anticipations, and asking a careless question, now and then, and uninterruptedly extending the palms of her red hands and the soles of her red feet so closely to the fire as, by nice and habitual calculation, barely to avoid the uncomfortable result of having them blistered, enjoyed, it may be boldly affirmed, a position and situation of great bliss. Her day of labour was over; she was deliciously resting herself; she had not to stir in the performance of any household duty; abundant and cheering refreshment was close at hand; and she was not to go on the tramp for one whole day again: what earthly lot could surpass hers? Ask a queen!

Everything being in readiness, Nelly Carty also squatted herself at the end of the form opposite to which Bridget Mulrooney sat. The pair rubbed their hands in gleeish anticipation; and the pig, nestled in his corner, thrust out his snout from his straw, regarded his mistresses, and good humouredly grunted his satisfaction at seeing them so comfortable and so near the point of perfect enjoyment.

Our hostess of the evening poured out the scalding hot tea, sweetening it well with the thoroughly brown sugar, and more than once sipping with the little leaden spoon from both the cups before her, to ascertain, as in duty and etiquette bound, the quality of the beverage, according to the judgment of her own palate. She next infused into each cup no stingy portion of the "colliery crame," which, as it gurgled through the neck and mouth of the flat bottle, so tickled the ears of both ladies as to produce a pleasant chuckle. And again the smiling Hebe of the feast stirred the compound mixture with her little leaden spoon, again took a sip out of each cup, wagged her head in approval of the final fitness of the beverage; and handing over one measure of it to her helpmate Bridget, cried out in a tone of utter joviality—

"Here, my ould Duchess—will that lie in your way, we wondher?"

"That's nate tay sure enough, Nelly," after swallowing a mouthful so hot and so pungent that it obliged her to close her eyes during its descent through her throat—"but I think yourself is as much of an ould Duchess as I am, Nelly?"

"'Faith we're a pair of ould Duchesses, Bridget; and much good may it do us, I say."

"There's them is worse off, Nelly, wid our good tay and our butthered cake."

"Well, well Bridget, alanah machree, if you were lookin' at me to-day evenin' when the ould priest came in! By this same blessed tay, I thought the ground would open and swally me. Sure I thought that 'twas your four bones that lifted the latch; and, so, what does I do, but sings out 'divil welcome you, honey,' to the face iv his big wig."

"Oh-a, oh-a! and what did he say to you, Nelly?"

"He has no good will to me of ould—and he tould me I'd die with that word in my mouth—but I won't—I'll die a good christian yet, Bridget, as I tould him."

"And we'll all do that, Nelly, and why not?"

"If there's anything comes across you, Bridget, the grass won't grow under my feet, till I hunt out the priest for you, and bring him to the bedside to you—and, by coorse, you'll do the like for me, Bridget?"

"By coorse, Nelly, by coorse; but tell me what's the rason that Father Connell would have an old grudge against you, Nelly?"

While these luxurious dames were still enjoying themselves, and seasoning their repast with reminiscences of early adventures in love, and in war with the church or the law, Father Connell returned to their door on his errand of mercy.

Upon now hearing a loud thumping and kicking at it, considerable was their surprise, if not alarm. Up they bounced together, and together bawled out, through the chinks in their door, a questioning challenge to the unexpected visiters.

"Let me in, ye unfortunate creatures," answered the tones of Father Connell's well-known voice, not angrily however.

Suppressing their screams, shouts indeed, if they had let them escape, one of the ladies hastened to hide away as quickly as possible, all evidences of merry-making; while the second, with frank and hearty avowals of answering the priest's request, seemingly fumbled with great zeal to try and open the door; and when at last she did pull it open, great was her astonishment to see Father Connell and little Neddy pass in, each heavily laden with different kinds of burdens.

These consisted of clothes, bed-clothes, straw, and food for the perishing invalid, Nelly Carty and Bridget Mulrooney's lodger, which the priest, from dread of his thrifty housekeeper's opposition, had ingeniously purloined from his own stores, and from her bed and wardrobe. Having performed the burglary on his own house, he called to his accomplice, Neddy Fennell, whom he had secreted in the stable loft. He had felt little scruple in abstracting Mrs. Molloy's blankets and linen robes; but the few shillings which he borrowed for a time from the money begged for the support of his parish school, was matter of deeper concernment to his conscience, until compassion, and the resolution and power of making future restitution, made pity triumph over scrupulosity. When his thefts were concluded,—

Master Neddy Fennell saw so much drollery in the whole affair that, in assisting with all possible gravity, as he was desired to do, in every necessary proceeding, a looker on might have detected in his eye and manner signs of a waggish enjoyment, which, however, fully escaped Father Connell's notice.

But Father Connell was not to escape so easily. His "boy," Tom Naddy, though he had detected the manœuvres going forward, winked where he had been appointed by Mrs. Molloy to watch, and did not at all interefere to prevent the petty larency committed in that lady's bed-room. Tom Naddy, the "priest's boy," becomes a person of great consequence in the course of the story. He is the ingenious, scheming, and most devoted roguish friend of the hero, Neddy Fennell, the prime mover in the complicated machinery of the plot of the romance. His portrait, as we see him at first, is inimitable. He is seen left, by the housekeeper, who had gone abroad for a gossip, "in charge of the place," and taking but small charge of it.

As the evening was bitterly cold, Tom Naddy, the "priest's boy," resolved to establish himself, while keeping watch and ward, in the most comfortable position possible, within the house—which, as every one knows, or ought to know, must have been upon one of the huge hobs within the capacious kitchen chimney. Yet he paused for an instant, refinedly canvassing the question as to which hob he ought to prefer to the other. That on which the cat reposed he finally resolved upon preferring, and so displaced madam puss, and sat down exactly where she had been, his knees up to a level with his chin; and as some recompense to her for his unceremonious usurpation of her throne, he then fixed puss across his thighs, speaking fondly to her, and stroking her down, upon which his kitchen companion winked up at him with both her eyes, and began to purr gratefully. Thus established, the east wind might whistle, and the snow flake might dance to the tune, but neither Tom Naddy nor the cat chattered their teeth in unison with it.

Tom Naddy began to dose. The sound of a latch-key turning in the door of the house, fully restored him to his powers of observation. It was either Father Connell or Mrs. Molloy who was about to enter. If Mrs. Molloy, he did not care very much; if his master, he did fear a remonstrance against sloth and idleness, accompanied perhaps by some hard pulling at his ears; so without absolutely disturbing himself, he prudently bent his faculties of hearing, to interpret, to his own mind, the sound of the footstep which must follow the other sound he had just heard. Be it remarked, that Mrs. Molloy had, as well as Father Connell, a latch-key to the house door.

In one instant he became convinced that it was the priest who had come in.

But we have already seen the part which Tom Naddy thought it expedient to enact. Here is Tom:—

You were, at this time, about sixteen or seventeen though no one could venture to say as much by looking at you. You were very significantly described by your homely neighbours, as a "hard-grown brat;" short for your years, and not making up in bulk what you wanted in height. You had a jackdaw-coloured eye, of which it was not easy to define the expression. It did not we hope mean dishonesty; for, according to Lavater's rule, you looked straight into one's face; yet there was something in your glance, which made your philosophical observer curious to find out what that something was. Again, according to the sage mentioned, your nose had no hypocritical droop in it, but was on the contrary—a goodly broad snub; and a further and a greater puzzle about you was, that nobody could ever say whether it was a smile or a grin, which always played around your fleshless lips. And moreover, Tom Naddy, there appeared no boyishnsss about you. To be sure you had a certain easy slowness in your whole manner; not laziness, as your poor master would have called it, but a peculiar self-possession, often broken up by an unexpected briskness; and you were not a person of many words, although you whistled a great deal—not, however, it is conjectured, for want of thought; because your queer face never looked vacant; and even while seemingly given up, mind and soul, to produce the full pathos of "Molly Asthore," there used to be occasionally an abstract meaning in your eye, foreign from your harmony, and you would wink, or grin, or smile, or wag your white-haired head, in the very middle of the tune.

So, no sooner had Father Connell ascended to his own bed-room, than Tom Naddy, starting into one of his unusual instants of energy, very unceremoniously removed puss from his lap, darted through the open doorway of the house, and through that of the little yard also, and almost the next minute was shouldering into the cabin where he guessed Mrs. Molloy to be stationed; his assumption of briskness being, however, now forgotten, just as suddenly as it had seized upon him, while he moved very leisurely, and whistled slowly and beautifully.

When he confronted her, Mrs. Molloy paused in the midst of a holding forth, her hand suspended in mid air, and her tongue, for a novelty, between her open lips.

"Didn't I lave you, well latched in, to mind the house!" she asked in stern astonishment.

"There's some latch kays that opens what other latch kays shets in," answered Tom.

"What's that you say!"

"Fhu!" (shivering) "it's a cowld bitther night to sleep widout blankets," was Tom's far-off answer, and he resumed his interrupted whistling.

"Didn't you hear me, Tom Naddy!—didn't I lave you in charge of the place?"

"Yes ma—ma'am; but mostha, I couldn't stop his hand, if 'twas his liking to sthrip the house from the kitchen to the tatch on the roof in it, what I b'lieve he'll do afore he laves off."

"It's the masther at his work again, neighbours," cried Mrs. Molloy, starting up and seizing her cloak, "jist as I was telling you! He won't lave himself, poor fool ir a man, a blanket to cover his bed—no, nor a shirt to cover his ould skin! I'll tell ye something he done that-o-way, for the hundredth time, a little while agone—"

Tom Naddy deemed that she was staying too long from home, and interrupted her—"there's other blankets in the house as well as his own, and other things like shirts, too."

She started back, asking in her gutteral tones, with utter surprise—"Is it my blankets, or any of my things you'd spake of!"

Tom broke up his whistling only with a sedate nod of assent.

Mrs. Molloy bounded, as well as she could, out of the cabin. She encountered Father Connell and Neddy Fennell in the middle of the yard, each heavily laden, and just about to escape with their spoil. She whisked e tails of her cloak over each arm, thus having her nds at liberty to stretch themselves out, while her oice croaked more than usual, and the beard on her two ins might be said to stir and bristle.

"Well to be sure! Isn't this a poor case! I'm downght ashamed o' you, Sir! It's a burning scandal, Sir -an' will you never give up these doings!—an' I'll not and this, Sir—an' I'll not put up with it, Sir—an' I'll ve you to know that I won't, Sir!"

Father Connell, thus detected, after all his precautions, ily smiled inwardly, however, as he said in a temporis- g voice, "Peggy, Peggy, anger is a deadly sin!"

"An' what kind of a sin do you call thievin', Sir. 'e, thievin'—I can call it by no other name, Sir."

"Let me pass out, good woman," said the priest sternly, though he was now more disposed to laugh heartily; and be patient, Peggy, be patient."

"Patient in troth! patient! I can't be patient—and old Nick I pitch patience!—Look at that big hape adther your arum—my own things rowled up along id yours!—patient! why, if a holy saint was sent o' urpose down to keep house for you, and to look afther urself and yourself, you'd torment the very life and wl out iv her in a week, so you would; here I am, om Sunday morning to Saturday night, striving, an' raping, an' piecing, an' patching, for the two ov us—' all to no purpose—no, but worser and worser for all an do; an' now to make up the matther, you come ov ch an evening as this, and ov sich a night as this will , to make me an' you get our death o' could in our beds."

"There is no fear of that Peggy; we can still manage rest comfortably for one short night, in a good, warm ouse; but I must go with these things, to the help of o poor, naked women, who might really perish before orning on the damp earth, and without covering of any ind; so you had better let us go on our way peaceably, eggy."

Mrs. Molloy darted quickly at Neddy Fennell, making grasp at his burden, as she vociferated—"go on your ay!—the long and the short ov it is, since you put me to , there is no blanket to lave this to-night—no, nor the hread ov a blanket."

Her master now became really severe and determined. le removed her arm from the boy's fardel, put her to e side, and saying, "be silent, my good woman, be lent, and stand out of my way;—more than once since ou came in here, you have uttered sin with your lips, nd offended me—of that we will speak another time;— ow, go out of my way, I say—I command you;—come, Neddy Fennell come;" and without further opposition rom Mrs. Molloy, who became perfectly stunned at this udden and most unexpected annihilation of her authority -the priest and his follower cleared the premises.

A moment after their departure, Tom Naddy lounged o her side from the corner of an end wall of the stable, ound which all along he had been listening and peeping; nd while Mrs. Molloy still stood silent and utterly con- ounded, remarked—"Ho! ho!—so, the priest is to do hatever he likes in the house for the future."

"Get out, you kiln-dried brat!" was the housekeeper's ady reply, as she stumped in much dignity, into her itchen; while on his part Tom only sauntered after her, nd resumed his place and his eat upon the hob.

We shall conclude Father Connell's day, having et to touch very briefly upon the more exciting, hough not more pleasing scenes of the story. His rrand of mercy is speeded. He has made the bed f the sick, spread comfort and peace around he couch of the desolate, new-made widow; who ad but lately been a young, beautiful, and thrice lest creature, the cherished wife of a loving hus- and, the mother of little merry Neddy; and now he good man takes his way back to his own humble abin, where—

In a very short time afterwards, Father Connell, and Mrs Molloy, and Tom Naddy, were as good friends as ver they had been in their lives. The housekeeper placed before him the little measure of ale, with a foaming head on it, which he emptied every night before going to bed, and which, with a crust to eke it out, was his beau ideal of luxurious indulgence. A good fire, renewed by cinders, heated his outstretched limbs, and glittered in the large silver buckles of his shoes. To his left hand, was his allowance of ale; to his right, pen and ink; and while he sipped his beverage, and munched his crust, we may transcribe—peeping over his shoulders, as well as the protuberance of the great wig above his ears will allow, the following entries, made by him in a curiously covered book, which he called his journal, and, in which, for very many years, he had made some daily notes.

"I got up at three o'clock this morning to say my usual matins: it threatened to be a bitter day, and a bitter day it has been. I went to bed at four, and slept very well until seven; attended the chapel at eight: the snow was pelting in my face. God help the poor! Will the disbeliever persuade the poor man that there is no Heaven!—he would then make the lot of the poor a hard one indeed. Those who sleep on beds of the softest down, and need but to wish for everything in order to have it, are they as good Christians as the Widow Fennell and her aunt have been! God bless the good friends whose bounty enabled me to put warm clothing on so many naked children and boys this day. Mick Dempsey would cover the shivering body of only a good boy. Mick does not remember that the blast is as bitter to the bad boy as to the good boy; and that the Lord does not send the sunshine to the good only. It is not wise to drive even the most wicked to despair; if they have no hope of being better, they will not try to be so; and Mick Dempsey was not right when he gave me to understand that I was encouraging idleness. I humbly hope that I was doing something that may help to change it into industry. Neglected my middle of the day prayers. Miserere mei Domine! Our prayers should never be overlooked, especially by a priest; a priest is bound to give good example; he cannot hope to do this without grace; and grace is chiefly to be obtained by prayer. Reprehended Peggy Molloy for her tongue and bad language—not too severely, I think—and she seems the better of it; she is faithful and honest; a faithful and honest servant is a treasure; but Peggy must be taught not to fall into a passion; violent anger is like drunkenness—for the drunken and the angry man both forget their wisdom; almost as many crimes spring from the one as the other. The first fair day I have, I must beg all through the town, and then in the country, for the Widow Fennell, her poor aunt, and young Neddy. God help them all. I love that little boy in my very heart; and with God's help will be an earthly father to him."

And so ended our priest's entries in his journal for one day.

Micah Balquhidder, in his own parish, nor yet Dr. Pringle of the Ayrshire Legatees, was neither more admirable than their Roman Catholic brother; though, for the honour of Protestantism, they may cope with him in warmth of charity and singleness of mind.

Nelly Carty's tales of her youth, related over their tay to Bridget Mulrooney, her co-partner in the potato-begging concern, found an eager listener in Neddy Fennell, who heard with astonishment and some doubt, that in an old vagrant, ruffian beggarman, followed by three children, and lodging for the night in the adjoining hovel, Nelly had, with love's own eyes, discovered that very Robin Costigan, whom forty years before this——; but the deed done by a woman for her lover is, so far as we recollect, quite original even in romance,—and, moreover, who could relate it like the heroine of the wonderful tale:—

"Well, Nelly," said Bridget, "here we are on the hunkers before our little fire again, and what is left of the tay and the cake a'most as good as ever; and its mad intirely I am, yis indeed, to hear the rest that you have to tell about that Robin Costigan."

"Well an' sure, lanna machree, Nelly Carty won't be long till she satisfies you. Well, Bridget, sure, as I gave you to untherstand afore the ould priest kem in, Robin and myself were great cronies, and faix, I'll never deny that I liked the boy well. Bud, Bridget, sure it happened once of a time, that my poor Robin borry'd the loan iv a horse, widout axin lave; an' sure over again, he was cotch on the back of that horse at a fair in the Queen's county; and they brought the poor boy to his thrial afore the judge, an' I thought my heart would break, they found him guilty, an' sintinced him to die. An' sure enough, the ugly lookin' gallows was put up for Robin on the Green abroad, and sure enough he was walked to the gallows, and it was the same Father Connell that quitted us a little while agone, that stepped out by his side to the gallows' fut. Well, asthore, the day that was in it, was a winter's day. I'll never forget it, one o' the dark, black days afore Christmas; and the evenin' began to fall a'most before he was turned off; an' when the time come to cut the rope, cut it was; and sure meeself was the very girl that caught him in my arms."

"Yourself, Nelly?" half shrieked Bridget. As for Neddy Fennell, his jaws stopped grinding his loaf, while he stared in startled surprise at the narrator.

"Meeself, Bridget. Well, alanna-machree, sure I thought I felt a stir in my poor Robin," Neddy Fennell had taken another bite at his loaf, but again stopped short in his preparations to masticate it.

"An' you couldn't count twenty afore I had him in a good warm bed, and Darby Croak the bleether there by his side; an' surely, surely, the stir in poor Robin got more life in it from time to time; an' surely, surely, over agin, many hours didn't go by till we had my poor fellow alive, an' as well as ever—ay, an' laughin' heartily too at the brave escape he had—tho' that afther all might be a little bit iv a secret betuxt himself an' the skibbeah—an' faix we spent as pleasant a night as kem from that to this—in wakin' the poor corpse, as we called it."

"Are you tellin' the truth, Nelly Carty?" gasped Neddy Fennell quite aghast.

"Wait, Neddy, my pet—sure there's a little more to come. It was about an hour afore day-break, when my poor Robin strolled out, just to see how his legs would go on along some iv the roads convanient afther the dance upon nothin' they had the day afore. In the coorse iv the night, sure he swore a big oath to us, that he'd never borry a horse agin, becase they war unlooky cattle; but he made no oath agin cows; and it's as thrue as that I'm sittin' here tellin' it, afore the mornin' quite broke, Robin borryed a nice fat cow, out of a field by the road-side. Well, alanna machree, the cow didn't turn out a lookier baste for Robin nor the horse."

"What's that you're goin' to say now?" again interrupted Neddy Fennell, "was he hanged over again, Nelly?"

"Faix an' if he wasn't, Neddy, my honey, he had very little to spare that he wasn't; for the man that thought he had a betther right to the cow than Robin, soon missed her, an' ran thro' the town clappin' his hands, an' got all the help he could; an' sure they all kem up with the poor boy, on the road to the fair ov Bennet's-bridge, an' he in the cow's company; an' so they laid hoult on him, an' made him turn back, without the cow, and they rammed him into their gaol again."

"Well," whispered Neddy.

"Well, a-cuishla-gal-machree, there he was, shure enough—only not for a long time, for, well became Robin, he found manes ov breaking out ov their gaol, an' from that blessed hour to this no livin' creature but myself ever set eyes on him in the town. But now listen well to me, Bridget, and you, Neddy Fennell; afther five an' thirty years is past an' gone, an' I an ould woman, I seen Robin Costigan this day, as sure as I now see ye both forenent me."

Many were the ejaculations of surprise, and indeed almost of terror, uttered by the listeners. "And to-day, Nelly? when? where? how?" they asked together.

"Whist! spake lower; none ov us spoke very loud yet, but now we are to spake lower than ever—and for a good rason. I said that Father Connell had a sharp eye, and that he ought to remember Robin Costigan, for wasn't it he that made his sowl for him at the gallows' fut? But the ould priest couldn't know him now, Bridget, for Robin is changed by years, and he is changed by conthrivances, but I knew him well, Bridget, from the minute I saw him. I can't say that he had the same knowledge of me when he looked me in the face—but I used to be too fond iv him long ago, ever, ever to forget him. And I tell you I saw him this very day, and I tell you more than that; I saw him in the very next house—in Joan Flaherty's house."

Bridget Mulrooney thumped her breast, crossed herself, and turned up her eyes. Neddy Fennell jumped off the hob, breathing hard, and frowning abhorringly, and it would seem indignantly, at the remote end wall of the hovel, which divided him from Joan Flaherty's house. This wall however, did not rise higher than the point at which the wattles of the roof commenced; so that an inmate of either abode, could, by standing on a chair or even upon a stool, peep into the other.

After a few moments, Nelly Carty resumed slowly, and in whispers; and Neddy again seating himself on the hob, changed his wide-opened, glowing eyes from the end wall to her face.

"An' he is a beggarman now iv you plase; and he has a poor, withered limb, morya, an' I seen three childher wid him that he takes into the street, when he goes a begging."

"Tell me this, Nelly," asked Neddy Fennell suddenly, and as if wishing for an answer in the affirmative, "if the judge heard he was alive, wouldn't he have him hung over again?"

"Faix, an' I'm thinking he would, my lanna; sure they owe him the last hanging at any rate; an' I'd go bail that if they had a hoult iv him now, they'd—but be asy wid your thricks, ye young limb."

A handful of small peebles, as it seemed, clattering and jingling among Nelly's "tay things" caused her suddenly to interrupt herself.

"It wasn't I that did it, Nelly, though I often played you a trick before now," answered Neddy Fennell very slowly, and in the least possible whisper—"it wasn't I that did it; but just turn your head behind you, and look towards the far end of the room."

"Don't, Bridget! Don't for the world wide," admonished Nelly—"it's himself is in it—I know it is; for there is no male crature living on Joan Flaherty's flure along wid him."

So neither of the good ladies obeyed Neddy Fennell's command. The boy, however, saw indistinctly, in the almost complete darkness, at the remote point he peered at, the head and shoulders of a man elevated over the imperfect division wall.

"Is the ould priest gone?" asked this apparition, in stealthy and husky tones. Nelly winked at Bridget to answer, and Bridget accordingly said—"he is gone these three hours, neighbour."—"Will he come again to night, ye ould collochs?" continued the same voice. "No, surely, neighbour, he is gone for this night, sartin."—"Bannath lath, then," and the head and shoulders disappeared. A dead silence succeeded. Nelly Carty held up her hand, and significantly looked her meaning at Bridget Mulrooney, who, in return, nodded her head.

"Neddy Fennell," added Nelly, "for the worth of the life that's in you, and that's in all our bodies,"—she whispered these words into his very ear—"don't let out o' you a breath of what you have heard here this night; mind my words."

They all went to bed, Neddy lying down on some straw, confronting that side of the house occupied by Monsieur the pig; while his gentle hostesses unfolding certain rolled-up parcels in the corners to the right and left of the fire-place, but which, after all, contained only straw pallets, with very wretched covering, made their own couches thereof.

The idea of the man nearly twice-hung long efore his own mother was born, and now alive and vithin a few yards of him, took such possession f Neddy Fennell's head that he could not sleep. Neddy and Robin Costigan were not thus to part. The excited boy's nocturnal watch, and their early ncounters, exhibit Neddy as the most brave and enerous of Lilliputian heroes. Having moved the earts of all "the Christian people," and especially f the women, by his pathetic street appeals for his desolate orphans," the felon beggar, a brutal ruf- ian, who is portrayed with great force, returned to is lair, and was attacked by Neddy for ill-treating lovely little girl who accompanied him.

The opportune appearance of Father Connell, t this time, saved both Nelly and Neddy, the ne from the dangerous recognition, the other rom the summary vengeance of the ferocious uffian,—but Neddy had thenceforward a deadly nemy.——Years pass away, and Neddy's school- naster, and school companions, and the folks f note in his native town, give the author an pportunity of writing what may be his actual eminiscences, and, in part, genuine autobio- raphy. We give but one scene, which is highly haracteristic of the time in which it passed, and he place in which it is laid. Something resem- ling Dicky Wresham's school may still be found ingering in quiet out-of-the-way country towns; hough reading-rooms, newspapers, politics, and eriodicals, have made great encroachments on such eminaries:—

It is still a bitter December morning, not a great any removed from that with which we have last had o do. Dicky Wresham runs to his open door, peeps up and own the street; runs in again to his drugs, and out gain in a few minutes, to take another peep. He evi- ently expects the arrival of some person, or persons, nd he is very anxious and fidgety on the point. And ne by one the wished for visiters arrive, and one by one e greets them heartily.

Are they customers? No: they are individuals who, very day in the year, come to polish the bottoms of the ld black-leather chairs, within doors, if it be inclement eather; or else the window stools in the street, if it be ir weather; and they come each to empty his budget f small gossip, or to have a similar one emptied into im; or to join, open-mouthed, in scandal, not always of harmless nature, or to make remarks on all passers by the streets; or, in a word, idly to spend their idle me, in the best way they can possibly devise. So Dick Wresham has them almost all about him for the day, at hich he rubs his hands and looks fully happy—and he so; for, doubtless, a stock of capital gossip, and scur- lity, and fun, is now laid in for him; and Dick's craving ppetite for such mental food would be satisfied every orning as soon as ever he had powdered his head and at collar.

And this assemblage, in Dick's laboratory, was fami- arly known, through the town, as "Dick Wresham's hool." They also styled themselves "gentlemen;" d Dick and many others admitted the title, though a od many people besides questioned whether the stand- rd used by the little apothecary and his immediate iends, for measuring a "gentleman," agreed, in all re- ects, with that adopted for the same purpose by Ulster King-at-arms." But however this may be, the hool has now assembled. All the scholars are, upon is particular morning, within doors, of course, the eather not permitting a meeting in the open air. Two their number post themselves as sentinels of observa- n, face to face, against the jambs of the doorway, and eir business is to look out for objects and subjects of mmentary, among the simple people who pass by; or haply (for the videttes are great wags) to beckon some one of the simplest among the simple into Dick Wres- ham's school-room, and there exercise some practical joke—that smallest and most country-townish way of pretending to wit. A few of Dick Wresham's school may just be pencilled in.

Gaby Mac Neary was one of them. He had begun life with, as he himself would beautifully express it, "a blue look-out;" that is, with little to recommend him, except a handsome person, and a good flow of red Pro- testant blood in his veins. These two qualities, however slender they might prove in other countries, gained him a rich enough wife in Ireland; legacies from her relatives afterwards dropt in, so that he was now, at an advanced age, able to live "genteelly," that is, without doing any one earthly thing, except to eat, drink, and sleep, and have his own way, right or wrong; and Dicky Wresham accordingly wrote him down "gentleman."

Gaby was tall and bulky, but stooped in his shoulders. He could not be said to have an ill-tempered face; but it had a domineering look, befitting a person of much importance in the world, both as to rank and religious creed; and this was one of the characteristics of what the Papists of the time used to term a "Protestant face."

Jack Mac Carthy was another of the school; whilom a gauger, but now retired on a pension and some money to boot. He was a sturdy-built, low sized "gentleman" of about sixty, with tremendous grey eye-brows, always knit together, and a huge projecting under lip. He seemed as if ever revolving some unpleasant subject; and Jack was said to have a "Protestant face" too; that is, he looked as if he did not like a Papist, and was there- fore conscious that a Papist could not like him.

And Kit Hunter was upon this morning at "school" also; and he possessed property sufficient, we will not stop to say exactly how obtained, to satisfy Dick Wres- ham of his pretensions to be admitted into his seminary. The wrinkles about Kit's mouth, had formed themselves into a perpetual smile. He was known as the shadow of the great personage of the town, whether a lord or a baronet shall not now be told. He constantly attended the great man's levée, was honoured by being leant upon by him, whenever he flattered the streets by walking through them; he was always ready to run on his errands; and to crown all his glory, frequently invited to dine with, and drink the choice old wines of the high, and for the present, mysterious personage.

An easy tempered, middle-aged man was Kit, with a great talent for picking up gossip of every kind, and for retailing it too; for it may be fairly conceded that the sack of a news-gatherer gapes almost equally at both ends. In person he was tall, slight, thin, almost emaci- ated, and bent and weak in the hams; and always drest carefully and sleekly, in the best-brushed clothes of the leading fashion of the day.

After the sages here particularly noticed, there were two or three others of less interest; the sentinels who filled the door-way were younger pupils, "gentlemen, bloods of the city," roystering, swaggering blades; and hoaxers or practical jokers by profession.

The "school" has repeated some of its lessons for its master, and for each other, conned since they last as- sembled before him. Dick Wresham occasionally eyeing a prescription, continues:—

"Ah Kit, what about the old friar and his bell?"

"Ay Kit, my worthy," echoed one of the sentinel wags, "tell us about the friar and his belle—ha, ha, ha!"

And the ha, ha, ha! ran through the whole "school" —for a sparkling and original witticism had been uttered.

"Ay, joke away on it," said Gaby Mac Neary,— "but by Gog,—" and he banged his stick across Dick Wresham's "genteel" and delicate subterfuge for a counter, "you'll soon have them friars devouring up the fat of the land again. Ha, 'tisn't ould times with them now; they're creeping out of their holes among us again, —an honest man can't walk the streets without being jostled by one of them."

"And how divilish sleek the rascals look," sputtered Jack Mac Carthy, knitting wickedly his awful grey eyebrows.

"Well, but Kit Hunter, tell us about Father Murphy," commanded Dick Wresham impatiently.

"Why, you must know, he has built a kind of a little steeple on the gable of his chapel, and hung up a small bell in it; and this he rings out for his mass, as sturdily as if there was no law to prevent it."

"Ho!" grunted Gaby Mac Neary, "if that's not popish impudence, the divil's in the dice. Gog's blug!" he continued in a kind of soliloquy, puckering his lips into a fierce snarl, as he stumped about the school-room, and punched his stick downwards at every step.

"Well, Kit!" again asked Dick Wresham.

"Well: the dean was made acquainted with the matter, and requested to use his authority, in having the bell taken down; and so he called on Father Murphy for the purpose. The friar, you know, is a big, bluff-kind of an ould fellow—and hah! he said to the dean—and can't I have a bell to call my coachman, and my groom, and my footmen, and all my other man servants, and ould Alley the cook, to their dinners—eh!—ha!"

Some laughed at Kit Hunter's anecdote; but Gaby Mac Neary and Jack Mac Carthy could only ejaculate their indignation at such a piece of audacious Papistry.

Other anecdotes of Papist audacity are related, and—

Gaby and Jack expressed a huger indignation than ever. Gaby, in particular, though not feeling half of the real asperity experienced by his friend Jack, burst forth in his might. He imprecated, he cursed, and he swore, he bellowed as he stumped about; and "the vagabonds!" he went on, "there is'nt a friar, no nor a priest of 'em, that I would'nt hunt out of the counthry, over again! Why, they'll ride rough shod over us, as they did before, by Gog! They walk the very middle stone of the street, already—blur-an-ages!"

"And here is one of them walking the middle stone of the street, this very moment," reported one of the sentinels.

"Father Connell, no less—hat and wig, and all," added the other.

The charitable quest on which Father Connell was bound this morning, had for its object the relief of the Widow Fennell; and Gaby Mac Neary, one of those hot-brained, peppery, irascible, Hibernian Celts, of whom it is proverbially said that "their bark is worse than their bite," got into a Protestant fume upon the occasion. Gaby is very probably a bit of genuine life, transferred to the canvass of fiction. He is the father of the true heroine of the tale, who is neither Nelly Carty, nor yet the lovely little mysterious beggar-girl. The dialogue in the school-room, after the priest had been summoned in, and had told his tale in few words, is characteristic of the time. It thus proceeded:—

"Ah, yes, Sir," resumed the young "gentleman." "I might have guessed that it was for one of the fair portion of the creation your reverence took so much trouble this cold day!"

"And indeed it is to the credit of clergymen in general that they are such champions of the weaker sex," resumed his comrade.

"I remember the little Widow Fennell right well," quoth Dick Wresham, "and a plump little bit of flesh she was, and must be to the present hour."

At these words, to the surprise of all who caught the action, Gaby Mac Neary suddenly turned his head over the back of his chair, and scowled very angrily at the speaker.

"There certainly is some satisfaction, in bestowing charity, on such a pretty little widow," continued the chief sentinel—"one of her smiles, is good value for a guinea, any day—" and he took out of his waistcoat pocket, a glittering coin, and with a face of much earnestness, placed it on the priest's palm and closed the old man's fingers upon it.

Father Connell glanced, however, at the offering, and then reclosed his fingers upon it himself. The waggery and the sparkling wit went forward.

"By my oath and conscience," said the really spiteful Jack Mac Carthy, "I'd give a leg of mutton and 'thrimmins' to any one that ud tache me the knack of making friends among the women, as the priests do."

"Why, Father Connell might give you an insight," said another, "but nothing for nothing all the world over; no money, no pather-nosther—eh, Father Connell!"

Gaby Mac Neary did not now look round, but he seemed to grow very uneasy or very hot on his chair.

"Father Connell is a spruce ould buck," cried little Dicky Wresham "and there is no wonder that the women should be friendly to him."

"But how does he make the hat and wig go down with them?" resumed the brutal Jack Mac Carthy.

"Blur-an-ages-an-by-Gog!" exploded Gaby Mac Neary, jumping up at the same time, and jostling forward to where Father Connell stood—"and," he continued during his progress, "and every kind of sweet damnation seize upon my soul, if I can stand it any longer, or if I will stand it any longer!—give me your hand Father Connell—how do you do, Sir?"

Father Connell did as he was bid, standing somewhat aghast, however, at the roaring approach of such a forty-horse-oath engine.

"Why, what are you at now, Gaby?" asked the principal hoaxer—"you that swore, as no other man can swear, but you,—a little while ago, that you'd hang every rascally priest of them, sky high."

"You lie, you whelp!" answered Gaby, "I never swore, nor said any such thing, you young rascal! and you're all nothing but a pack of rascals—nothing else—to bring this good-hearted ould gentleman in here, to scoff at him, and to insult him."

"Well done, Gaby," shouted the second hoaxer, and he slapped old Gaby on the shoulder.

"Do that again, ye kout, and I'll dust your puppy's jacket, while a dusting is good for it or you!" and he flourished his stick about him, at a rate that made his old friends jump out of his way; while the only object he hit was, the hat of the very person whose champion he now was, and this, with the violence of his unintended blow, flew some distance off its accustomed resting place. But Gaby soon picked it up, replaced it on the apex of the wig, and then slapped it down, with a force that betokened in his own flitting apprehension, much friendly energy, and a liberal promise of chivalrous protection towards the wearer.

"Come away, Father Connell, out of this blackguard place," he went on, passing the priest's arm through his, "come along, Sir, come along I tell you!"

"My dear," said Father Connell, laying his hand on the arm of his doughty defender, "do not get angry, do not curse or swear on my account; these gentlemen have done me no harm; I wish I could say they had done themselves any good; nor have they been as successful in ridiculing me as they think; neither my years, now nearly four score, nor my hat and wig have made me so very stupid as they suppose. As for the witty young gentleman who gave me this," and he held out the counterfeit guinea on his open palm, and then allowed it to drop on the floor at his foot—"I won't say God reward him, no, no;" the old man shook his head, touched the brim of his hat, and looked upward—"the reward, if my poor prayer were heard, might be in proportion to the gift; but I can, and I do say—God forgive him."

"Hah! take that, you dirty curs!" triumphed Gaby Mac Neary, as he and Father Connell turned into the street.

Gaby became one of the most liberal contributors to the fund raising for the widow and her poor family, and from that time forward the hot-tempered Protestant and the Papist priest became the best of friends. Gaby was a widower, with one fair child, Helen,—but here is the heroine—the beloved from girlhood of Neddy Fennell:—

Her age was not more than ten years. No description of her face or person is about to follow ; but it is asserted over again that little Helen Mac Neary was very, very lovely, and bright, laughing, joyous—a very sun-burst of beauty, flashing over the freshness of life's almost break of day.

During the priest's statements, however, little Helen showed none of her usual brilliant joyousness. Her features became gently sorrowful, and tears started from her eyes. Father Connell took leave of his new friend. At the door of the house he felt his jock pulled, and turning round, he saw this beautiful little being looking up earnestly at him, and moving her fingers in a mute request that he might bend down to her. He laid his open palm upon her shining hair—of the same colour, by the way, as that of the poor little beggar girl—gazed in smiles, for a space, upon her glowing, up-turned features ; and muttered involuntarily—"May the Lord bless you, my little angel."

She beckoned to him again, and he bent his ear to her lips.

"I got this for a christmas box," she whispered, sliding half-a-guinea into his hand—"but will you give it, Sir, along with the rest you have, to poor Mrs. Fennell, and her old aunt, and to poor little Neddy?—Oh, you're hurting me, Sir!" she suddenly cried out, pained by Father Connell's ardent pressure of both her tiny hands in his. He relaxed his unconscious clasp ; but still held her tightly, and he still gazed at her, his lips working to keep in his emotion.

"Helen, Helen! where are you, girl?" bellowed out her father, descending the staircase.

"Good bye to you, Sir," she continued, again endeavouring to extricate her fingers.

"Blug-a-bouns! what's all this?" questioned her father, making his appearance.

"Your little daughter," answered Father Connell, "is a blessed child. She is beautiful to look upon ; but her fresh, young heart is more beautiful still. She—she has given me for the poor widow, what was bestowed upon her, these happy Christmas times, to buy playthings and sweet things—and she is only a little girl still,"—he inclined his head, and laid his cheek to Helen's—"I thought at first of giving back her little gift ;—and I thought too of bestowing upon her, a Christmas box, and a good one, out of my own pocket ; but I won't do either."

"Don't, don't," roared Gaby Mac Neary, half crying, "blug-an-ages!"

"No : I will not ; no my child I will not, I'll leave it in the hands of your God, to repay you for your charity. Here, Sir,—take your little daughter to you, and kiss her, and be proud of her." He took up the child, placed her in her father's arms, and left the house.

This sweet little creature, who, though not so beautiful, greatly resembled the beggar-girl Mary Cooney, was the worthy counterpart of Neddy Fennell who gained her heart at school by his gallant conduct. While Neddy, left an orphan by the premature death of his mother, resided under the hospitable roof of the priest, the darling of Mrs Molloy, and the beloved of Tom Naddy, he was, with his patron, a frequent visiter of Gaby Mac Neary, and the playmate of the pretty and gentle-hearted Helen. These were happy days, but they soon fled away. Seven years are gone, and Neddy is now the gay apprentice of Nick MacGrath, a comical, old, little, fat, oil and colour man, and indeed a very general dealer ; a bachelor well to do in the world, and a brilliant character at the Comic Club, though his mirth was now a good deal sobered down by the burthen of years. With Nick, and his old house-keeper Nelly Brehan, the sprightly Master Neddy, now almost out of his teens, was quite as much a favourite as he had been in the family of Father Connell ; and although he could not always refrain from playing off those mischievous tricks upon his master, to which the simple credulity of Nick, who believed in "the good people," tempted the light-hearted lad and his merry companions, he was warmly attached to him. Among the beneficences of Nick was suppering and lodging in his hay-loft all the vagrant pauper lunatics and idiots of the neighbourhood. The catalogue of his nocturnal guests, and the varied forms of their insanity, from the ravenous brutal idiot to the "fantastic madman," are depicted with wonderful discrimination and great force ; yet the general effect is painful and repulsive. There are things over which the skilful artist is bound to draw a veil, if not to keep altogether out of sight and thought. Along with the common horde of the idiotic and insane, there came one, on a particular night, who, for his own ends, outdoes them all in acting the extravagances of insanity. Yet there is horrible truth and wild eloquence in the seemingly insensate reiterated cry of Robin Costigan, the gallows-bird, who is "purshooed! purshooed!" Young Gloster's madness is not better feigned :—

"A poor boy that's burned wid the frost," whiningly appealed a fresh visitant, a man clothed in shreds and patches, and different portions of his attire kept on him by the aid of small hay ropes. As he announced himself he leaned lazily on a long, thick wattle.

As on the former occasion, the little half-door quickly opened to him ; and as he, too, very leisurely plodded his way into the inside of the house—he continued his egotistical account of himself.

"My fut is complainin' agin the road, an' my bones is grumblin' agin the weather ; an' I can't stop anywhere at all—an' I'm always goin' about over an hether—an' I don't see any business I have goin' about anywhere—no, no more business nor a starved bee in a fallow field." And at these words his voice died away, in the distance.

"They're purshuin' me over an' hether, an' here an' there, an' through the bogs, an' across the hills, an' over the river, an' into the thick woods—they're purshuin' me ever an' ever."

At this crisis the thrilling dramatic interest of this powerful story properly commences, and never again lags until the close of the narrative. The midnight murder, burglary, and arson, committed by this ruffian and his confederate imp in the dwelling of the hospitable Nick, is depicted with the same dramatic power and skill which Mr. Banim has so frequently displayed in similar delineation. In the thrilling and horrible he is more original, and excels as much as in the quaintly humorous.

Were we to be guided by the desire of giving an idea of the story, our specimens should be in a different style from those selected : but this we leave to Mr. Banim, contented with one or two isolated passages recommended by their delicacy or their pathos. By the generous interference of Ned Fennell, the beautiful beggar-girl is brought under the notice of Father Connell, who at once took her home. The developement of her affections and the expansion of her intellect, her progress in the arts of civilized life are beautifully depicted. She had been emancipated from the tyrannous yoke of Robin Costigan, which she had borne from infancy, when that ruffian fled from justice, after attempting the robbery and murder of poor Nick and his old housekeeper, and tried to conceal his crimes by setting the premises on fire. There is a magnaniminous disregard of ordinary romance in making this gifted creature merely the illegitimate daughter of Gaby Mac Neary, the half-sister of Helen, and the child of the potato-beggar, Nelly Carty, from whom she had been stolen in infancy by Robin Costigan. Nelly now recognises her for her lost child, and clings to her with the most passionate yearnings of a mother's heart, yet keeps the secret in her own bosom lest she should bring disgrace or injury upon her "beautiful Colleen," resolving, that though she is not herself a good woman, her child shall be good and happy, as she is fair and loving. There is much insight into the depths of the heart, and knowledge of elementary nature, of the universal sympathies of motherhood, shown in the character of the potato-beggar.

We do not know what, in this story, becomes of the theory of the bashful instincts of woman. Poor Mary never once attempts to conceal her passionate tenderness for Ned Fennell. By an accident, she becomes the casual witness of the celebration of his clandestine marriage with Helen Mac Neary, which, by a trick of the well-meaning rogue Tom Naddy, Father Connell had been induced to solemnize, though at great personal risk, it being then highly penal for a Roman Catholic priest to celebrate a marriage between a Papist and a Protestant. Her deep sorrow, her maiden shame, her low piteous wailing, are all beautifully pathetic; but we must not mar their effect by garbled extracts. Her initiation into the arts of domestic life, of which she knew as little as a native of the shores of New Holland, are not only charming in themselves, but allow the reader at once to trace the expansion of her knowledge, and the details of the good priest's humble household, with many points of his benevolent character, and of the condition of the Irish Catholic clergy. On the morning after he had rescued her from "the shower of houses," and committed her to the guidance and instructions of the dignified Mrs. Molloy, while that self-important personage prepared the priest's breakfast, we are told that Mary still looked on in silence with great wonder and curiosity.

Father Connell had been out about an hour. He now returned, and called out from the parlour, for "Peggy!" and Peggy, answering his summons, found that he had brought home a pair of shoes, and a pair of stockings, for his new protégée; together with materials, very humble indeed, for dressing her out, from head to foot. But until the latter could be made up, he earnestly consulted Peggy upon the best thing to be done, towards obtaining present substitutes for them. Peggy, after a pause, and bargaining for permission to have her own way in the matter, sallied forth from the house, and quickly came back, laden, however she had procured them, with a little stock of the necessaries required. They had been used indeed, but were clean, neat, and respectable, and Mrs. Molloy averred, would fit Mary to a T, for she thanked Providence she had eyes in her head. Her master, approving of everything, Mrs. Molloy swept the table clear of its little heap of habiliments ready made and raw materials for the same; and the next instant, she and her young friend were busily engaged in the housekeeper's bed-room, off the kitchen.

Father Connell would not—could not sit down to breakfast pending the great change that was going on under his roof. He walked about his parlour, bolt upright, champooing the palms of his hands, very very fast, and smiling smiles, as fresh as those of childhood. At last the parlour door opened, and Mary Cooney, ablutions and the other business of the toilet all gone through, appeared before him; Mrs. Molloy—as if Mary bodily and altogether were of her construction, and not merely the tie of the bau-knot of her cap, leading her in, with an air of great self-approbation. The old man stood still, and his smiling features half changed into an expression of surprise, at the vision of the beautiful creature he now gazed upon. Her newly polished face, burning with blushes, caused by her shyness of her fine clothes, and her blue eyes scintillating and enlarged, with a new-come excitement, the beggar girl did appear, indeed, surpassingly lovely.

He was struck, too, with her likeness to Helen Mac Neary—as any one might have been; and he thanked Heaven, in a silent aspiration, that his good child, Neddy Fennell, had been the means, under God, of directing his attention to the salvation, here and hereafter, of a creature so interesting in every way.

But this purely grave state of feeling, anon and quickly passed into a characteristic mode of expressing his delight in the change for the better wrought upon her outward appearance. As he has been seen to do, while the little ma-a-clad boys, were passing him in the bosheen, he bent himself, resting his hands upon his knees, admiring her finery, and then, standing straight, and laughing to himself, clapped the palms of his hands together softly, and declared to Peggy, that nothing on the face of the earth could be better; and, as will also be called to mind, in the same way that he had turned Mick Dempsey round and round, and walked round and round him, in approbation of Mick's first new suit of respectable clothes, he now turned Mary Cooney round and round, and walked round her. At length, the inspection over, he dismissed Mary and her new protectress, to their breakfasts in the kitchen, and then sat down to his own, very happy.

But though Mary was happy too, even to tears, which constantly streamed on, she made but little impression on the dainties before her, at least not one half, nor one third enough, to satisfy the ostentatious hospitality of Mrs. Molloy. The poor girl's mind had been suddenly stopt, and turned back in the circle in which it was wont to revolve, and though all was very blissful, all was, from its novelty, still very confusing. She did not yet understand, nor distinctly feel her changed position. She glanced shyly from one point to another of her new attire. She studiously regarded, above all things, her new shoes and stockings, and particularly admired the smallness of her feet, now shut up, for the first time, within limits which controlled their usual flatness and expansion. Opposite to her was a mirror hanging on a nail in the wall, of about six inches in height and three in breadth, at which Mrs. Molloy upon a sudden call from the parlour used to adjust her cap, and her strong wiry hair; and into this Mary could look at her own face, with its recent decorations; and all these little things at first deeply occupied her, almost to the exclusion of any other sentiment or feeling.

Father Connell went out on business, and she was left alone with the housekeeper, at the kitchen fire. After a while, recollection began to engage her. Darby Cooney, was she indeed safe from his hand? She asked Mrs. Molloy to give her assurance on the subject. The housekeeper, still obeying her master's instructions, asked in return, how could she know anything about it? And who was Darby Cooney? But wasn't she safe at present; and wasn't she with friends, who would keep hurt and harm far away from her? . . . . . Mary had other questions to ask, but she suppressed them. She arose, stumbling for the first time in her life, from the cramping effects of the first pair of shoes she had ever worn, her feet swollen by the influence of the fire, as well as by their novel state of captivity; and followed Mrs. Molloy on the proposed tour of discovery.

She had been in the parlour for a moment before, but under such circumstances, as only to have felt embarrassed with an overpowering sense of its importance. Now she dwelt under Mrs. Molloy's special instructions, on each article of furniture it contained. A small glass bookcase, filled with books, sparingly and smearingly gilt on the backs, particularly attracted her attention and her wonder; she did not think that there were so many books in the world, she said. Leaving the parlour, an old eight-day clock, almost eight feet high, placed in the little hall, with an old brass dial-plate, struck her with great awe, as well it might indeed. She stopped before it, and listening to its clogged and wheezing tick, tick, she shrank back, asking in a whisper, if there was not something alive within it? Mrs. Molloy then pointed out to her the cellarage, under the open stairs, with its constant occupant, the half barrel of beer; and Mary conceived great notions of the abundance of the house.

They proceeded up stairs to the priest's bed-room. Here were a few little religious prints, "framed and glazed," as Mrs. Molloy desired Mary to observe well; and in a corner, hung upon great brass hooks, Father Connell's Sunday hat and best wig; together with the mysterious old chest of drawers: and the young girl felt, she knew not why, an indefinable sense of a something—almost dread, which made her hurry out of the apartment.

They passed into the yard. The stable containing Father Connell's fat, strong mare; the step-ladder going up to it's hay loft; Neddy Fennell's black hole of yore—the coal-shed; the cask to catch rain-water; the lines to hang the house-linen on for drying; all this, and much more, were pointed out to Mary, whose mind still continued to fill and fill with great conceptions of the magnificence of the establishment. From the yard into the narrow strip of garden—and Mary clapped her hands, and almost screamed out with pleasure. Small as was the little plot of ground, it was neatly kept, at all seasons of the year, and even now, on a November day, looked trim and pretty. . . . . She glowed with a new pleasure. It was as if a garden had suddenly and freshly sprung up, amid the hitherto moral wilderness of her own mind. She prayed, she begged of Mrs. Molloy to let her pluck one rose—no, one rosebud—only one; the old lady consented, and as Mary placed it under her young bosom, it sparkled with her tears.

They left the enchanted spot, and proceeded up the silent little approach to the chapel, walled in at either side. They arrived at the very limited space before the chapel, almost entirely covered with the branches of a large lime, having a stone bench under it. Mary sat down on the bench, looking earnestly around her.

"And was that a chapel? A 'chapel of God?'" she asked of Mrs. Molloy in a whispering voice, pointing to the low built and rude little edifice, now straight before her.

Mary's only concern now was, that her "tender-hearted boy," whom she innocently told the priest she longed to see "for the great love was in her heart," never came near her. Her religious knowledge, or rather devotional feelings, ripened by culture; she was baptized, and received her first communion.

Oh, happy, happy was Mary, while she went through the business of that day, clad in her white muslin dress, and her cap with white ribbons in it. Happy, and yet tearful; proud of the day, and of herself, and yet the humblest of the humble. It was a time of flowers, too, and Mary had them all around her.

But Father Connell encountered a little more difficulty in removing from her mind a certain impression. Recurrence must again be made to the first days she spent under his roof. Her question of—"bud when would Masther Neddy Fennell come?" was almost ceaseless, and the priest at first only told her why he could not come. His old master was so ill, and he was so much engaged. "But if the whole world was dyin' I'd go see my tender-hearted boy," she said. Nick Mac Grath died, and she allowed some days to lapse, but then repeated her question. Father Connell now met her with an account of Edmund's great occupation in superintending the old man's affairs, and with a statement of his newly-acquired riches, according to the will made in his favour by his master. Mary was glad he was so rich, but sorry that his great business kept him away. Days passed over and she said she should like to go out on the roads, and walk here and there. The priest himself accompanied her forth, and led her for a walk, by the adjacent river's brink—a delightful walk, during the course of which everything around her was arrayed in nature's fully-matured gorgeousness. Thoroughly did she enjoy this recreation; but still she came back to Father Connell's house, dispirited, and feeling a great want.

Some more days passed on, and Father Connell told her that Edmund Fennell was to come and dine with him, previous to his going a great, great way off—to Dublin, in fact—there to engage in new pursuits, which the good man tried to explain to her. Mary changed colour, but listened meekly, and only said—"God spread the good luck an' the happiness in his road, wherever he goes!"

Edmund did come to dine with Father Connell, and Mary was summoned to speak with him in the parlour, in Father Connell's presence; but though her heart at first bounded to meet his heart, and though herself first bounded forward to be encircled in his arms, and though Edmund was not wanting in all show of affectionate interest, still the poor girl began to feel vaguely that there was in future to be a distance measured between them, and she retired weeping to her kitchen. Dinner came on, and she received the impression more strongly when she observed that Edmund and Father Connell dined together, and that she and Father Connell's servant dined together.

Edmund was retiring for the evening—the last he was to spend, for some time, in his native city. Mary was again called in, that he might bid her farewell. She entered the parlour with a humiliated and touching air—but not a bit of ill temper in it. Edmund shook her hands, kissed her cheek, and spoke still most affectionately to her. In return, she kissed his lips and prayed the blessing of God "on his road, wherever he went."—He left the house, attended to the outside door by Father Connell. The priest returned to Mary, and found her sitting stupified on the floor.

"When he was a very little boy, my poor child," the priest said, "he promised you if ever he should be rich, he would share his riches with you; and now, my poor child, see whether he does or not—only see;" and he emptied a purse of gold into her lap.

Mary put her hand under the guineas and let them drop, almost one by one, back again into her lap, and at last dolefully said—"May the good God reward him for his charity; but I'd rather have the love from Neddy Fennell than all this goold, Sir."

It was after this that Mary became the hidden witness of the marriage of him she loved. Much of the machinery of the plot henceforth hangs upon the agency of the potato-beggar, who, in the strength of her one passion, a mother's love, moved heaven and earth to promote the happiness of her child. She was besides entirely ignorant of the marriage of Edmund and Helen Mac Neary, though not of their attachment, which seemed the only barrier to her darling's felicity. It was now her first object to establish the identity of her Mary as the child of Gaby Mac Neary, and to alarm that hot-blooded Protestant gentleman, for the honour of his house and of his legitimate daughter, who had clandestinely bestowed her affections upon the "Papist-beggar." Kind as Squire Gaby had been to the priest's protégé, the orphan boy,—Edmund, as a future son-in-law, as the accepted lover of his sole heiress and darling child, was despised and hated. Yet Edmund was now studying in Dublin for the bar, and the wealthy heir of the grateful master he had rescued from the knife of Robert Costigan, though poor Nick died of the fright. In a very striking scene, Nelly Carty the poor potato-beggar, threw herself in the way of the father of her abandoned child, to warn him of the danger in which his legitimate daughter was placed, and to which his family honour and fierce pride were exposed by her degrading attachment. The violent rage, the sensitive pride of a good-natured man of loose principles, who has, without remorse, practised upon female ignorance and simplicity, (for we dare not call it innocence in Nelly,) when he is touched or menaced with danger to himself, is instructive as well as striking: one of those moral lessons which society requires. Poor Nelly Carty the potato-beggar, had once been rich in beauty, and not without womanly virtues. Her ruin and shame were no cause of regret; yet touch the Squire in his own person, in his daughter, and who so jealously sensitive to female honour and disgrace?

The contending interests and passions of the more important personages of the drama are now complicated and contrasted with great dramatic skill. The unconscious sisters are the innocent rivals of each other. The skulking felon, Robin Costigan, burning for revenge on Edmund, and finding that his own safety depends upon the removal of the beggar-girl by any means, resolves on her murder. Nelly Carty is watchful for Mary as a she-bear over her cubs; Squire Gaby is raving over the presumed dishonour of his daughter, and Tom Naddy, the scheming organ of much of the mischief, is driven to his wits'-ends. Father Connell alone, feeling deeply, yet ignorant of much of the complicated misery and villany around him, is true to his character of the most exalted Christian love, tempered by the tenderest human charity. We have said, that we purposely refrain from marring the effect of a highly interesting plot, by hinting at its progress and developement. After many thrilling scenes have harrowed the reader, it ends happily. Poetic justice is rigidly dispensed; and the sudden death of the aged Father Connell, while on an errand of love and mercy for his orphan protégé, to which his feeble strength was unequal, is, at last, more a transfiguration, an apotheosis, forming a suitable close to his divine life, than the mortal agony of death. At first sight, one is indeed disposed to grumble at this stroke, and to wish that the venerable Father had lingered yet a little while on earth, to enjoy the sight of the happiness which he had so long ministered to create. But it is better as it is.

We opened with the service in Father Connell's rude chapel. We may aptly close with that performed in the same place at his obsequies. The influence of a life like his does not end with the term of existence. Father Connell had dropped at the feet of the Lord-Lieutenant, while presenting a memorial craving a respite for his protégé, when Edmund, by a strange tissue of circumstantial evidence, had been condemned to death as the murderer of his own wife—of his beloved and adored Helen. The priest's remains had been brought from Dublin. It had been his dying wish, sent with his blessing to Neddy Fennell, to be buried with the former parish priests in his own old churchyard. Great preparations were made to do honour to the memory of the beloved pastor, and—

Before daybreak, next morning, people might be seen walking slowly, in two's and three's at a time, towards the Dublin road—rich and poor, all classes, in alternation. No public intention had been made known on the occasion; but the news that the body might be expected to leave Dublin, at an hour already mentioned, got abroad, and this silent movement was the result.

A very great crowd had congregated about two miles from the town, and still the day had not dawned. The people timed their motions very well, calculating on the decent and slow progress which would be made from Dublin. Presently, the red glaring lamps of a vehicle, steadily approaching, appeared in view. Soon after, the stepping of the horses was heard; and then the nodding of the plumes of the hearse became visible, together with the white scarf and hatband of the driver. Up to this moment, there had been a death-like silence among the crowd; now there was one low outbreak, made up of the suppressed groans of men, and the wailing of women.

All heads were uncovered, and many knelt in reverence or in prayer.

The hearse passed by; two mourning coaches followed it. In the first of these, visible by the light of the lamps which it also bore, and muffled up to the brows in his mourning cloak, and without motion or a glance around him, sat Edmund Fennell. In the other, the people discerned, to their great delight and admiration, the former bishop of their diocese; the former resident in Father Connell's little thatched house, and the former intimate and affectionate friend of the ancient priest. He was himself now a very old man.

There was a third vehicle, containing such of the near relations of Father Connell as had time so to arrange as to go a little way to meet him, on his last earthly journey.

The sad little cortége moved slowly on. The great throng of people proceeded with it at either side, or closed behind it. Profound silence again reigned amongst them. Arrived at the suburbs of the town, very little way was to be made to Father Connell's late dwelling; and here the people left the hearse, and returned into the town. The morning came through clouds and mists upon the little city; but a moral gloom, deeper than that cast by the weather, also fell upon it. There was no man, woman, or child, among its population who was not acquainted with Father Connell's character, who did not venerate and love him when alive, and who did not now mourn him dead. This assertion is literal; it makes no exception for social degree, or for sect, or for party. The glorious and the great charity, in the exercise of which he had spent a long, long life, and at last, braved and met death; the glorious and the great charity, which had been, as it were, the very essence, and the very breath of his being—that charity, now filling with admiration and affection all hearts, made all unite, for a time at least, in one demonstration of feeling. It was the pouring out of oil upon the spiteful though paltry ways of their sectarian personalities and passions, until it stilled them into a glassy stillness. And thus, charity begat charity. Their common love for one man, whom they loved, because he was charitable, made them also charitable in themselves, and to one another.

It was, and is the custom in Father Connell's town, for the shopkeepers partially to close their shop windows, upon the death of a neighbour. On this day, every shop window was fully closed. Every passing bell tolled—the almost unheard, illegal little bells attached to Catholic chapels, and the more sonorous ones in the legal church steeples. The citizens of every grade, met in little groups about the streets; and you could pass none of them, who were not talking in low voices of the man and the event, whom all mourned and deplored, and of arrangements to be made for a public funeral in his honour—and Protestant and Catholic discussed the subject together. And there was somehow a strange silence through all places of usual public resort and bustle, which thrilled you. And no man was seen to laugh during the day.

At about noon, hundreds after hundreds began to visit Father Connell's little chapel. There, upon an elevated frame-work, a kind of bier, they found, as they expected, his mortal remains, laid out in the coffin, in the middle of the building. The body was draped in its priest's vestments, with shoes and stockings on, and a chalice seemed to be held between its hands—so are Catholic priests arrayed for the grave. A number of candles surrounded the coffin. The features of the corpse wore their usual living smile; and the glittering benevolence of the handsome old blue eyes, was only wanting, to make it appear life indeed. Many, many who looked upon it, remembered it well as the blessed harbinger of consolation and relief to them, in former days of suffering and sorrow. . . . . Apart from the rest, immediately under the head of the body, stood one mourner whom, though no one could see his features, on account of the arrangement of his black cloak, all knew well; and they knew that since the body had arrived from Dublin, he had never quitted it for a moment, tasting no food, no drink—partaking of no kind of refreshment—speaking with none, and addressed by none—for his mighty grief, and, the people believed, his remorse was respected, nay, almost feared, to an extent which made all loath to communicate with him.

There he remained, the livelong day, wordless and motionless, except that now and then, and very seldom, he would change his standing position for a sitting one. Night came on, and he was still on his post. Messages reached him from the good old archbishop, who had taken up his temporary residence in the priest's abode, near at hand, entreating, nay, commanding him, to leave the body for a time, and take some repose and nourishment—but he only answered these communications with a denying and most mournful motion of his head. His father-in-law, Gaby Mac Neary, being applied to, came personally, and even with requests from his young wife, to solicit him on the same subject; but these appeals also he scarcely heeded. . . . . During the mass, one little occurrence should not be forgotten in this notice. The chapel was crowded to inconvenience. At a certain pause in the ceremony, a priest turned round on the altar, and strove to pronounce aloud, while his voice failed him, the following words:—

"Pray for the repose of the soul of the Reverend Phelim Connell, your late parish priest,"—all the people had been standing—the moment the words were heard, man, woman and child, suddenly knelt, and there was a burst of weeping petition to Heaven, smothered in sobs and groans, over which, women's stifled shrieks partially arose, and the bitter crying of the little boys of Father Connell's school, was distinctly heard.

The people would not permit the body to be conveyed to the grave, as was first proposed, by the directors of the funeral, in the hearse, which had borne it from Dublin—senseless animals, they said, should not move it on that occasion, while they had arms and shoulders to perform the duty. So they provided a handsome little thing, a miniature hearse, still, with plumes and velvet trappings, fringed with gold lace; and in this, almost exactly fitting it, the coffin was placed, and borne, palanquin-like, upon men's shoulders. On coming out of the chapel, the approach or lane leading to the little edifice, the churchyard, the priest's yard and garden, and the suburb street without, were found crowded with the more respectable citizens of all ranks—and after what has been said, it will be unnecessary to add, of all sects and parties, wearing ample scarfs and hat-bands of white linen, and waiting to form into funeral procession. There could not be less than thousands of them. Similar badges of mourning had been provided for the boys of the parish school; and amongst the general train, little fellows, almost children, the sons of the citizens, were also scarfed and hat-banded;—let it be permitted to us to record, that of these childish participators in the general demonstrations of sorrow, three little O'Haras were included.

Do the established clergy wish to recover their influence over the people of England and Scotland? Let them look to Father Connell, and go and do likewise.

THE MARCHIONESS.

THE MARCHIONESS, the second book on our list, if, in substance, true history, reads like "the wildest fictions of a heated brain." The story is drawn from the records of the Criminal Tribunals of France—from those records which, in every civilized country, embody the most marvellous combinations of facts, with the darkest tragedies. It might have been judicious in Mrs. Thornton to have, (if such an Iricism be allowable,) placed her preface at the end of her tale. Not one reader in a hundred would have known or remembered aught of the singular case, which she has embellished with many felicitous incidental circumstances, and in various ways altered and adapted to her purpose, while adhering to the outline of the original narrative of the extraordinary circumstances detailed. The investigation of this remarkable cause célèbre, occupied the criminal courts for more than twenty years; and yet the whole hinges on the single circumstance of a lady, the Countess St. Géran, having given birth to an heir, which a bold and intriguing sister-in-law, next heir to the family estates, contrived to send away at the moment of its birth, though in the midst of numerous attendants, and in presence of the anxious grandmother of the long-expected heir. The disappointed husband was persuaded, by the arts of his sister, that his hopes had been fallacious. No one, in short, long doubted that the young Countess, and those of her medical advisers who had pronounced her pregnant, had been deceived by appearances. The Countess alone, drugged as she had been, and left wholly in the power of her guilty sister-in-law, and her creatures, a midwife, a surgeon, and another and higher accomplice, clung, through years of pining and sorrow, to the absolute belief that she had given birth to a child. She never bore another, and the idea came to be considered, even by her husband, as a grievous and melancholy delusion; as a case of complete monomania in a woman languishing for offspring and denied that blessing.

The story, which is exceedingly well told throughout, opens finely. The Count had married, at the age of nineteen, a lady several years younger than himself. Marriages in very early life were quite common among the hereditary nobility of France, as indeed they are among the established families of the upper rank in every country. The only drawback on the happiness of the young couple, was the want of an heir; but at the end of three years,

The derangement of the Countess's health, and certain symptoms which accompanied her indisposition, again roused the hopes of the Count and the other members of his family. The most eminent medical men were consulted, but "who shall decide when doctors disagree?"

as they did in this instance. The shape of the Countess visibly changed; the sylph-like slimness of her figure disappeared, giving place to more matronly outlines; and at length, Madame la Maréchale de St. Géran, the mother of the Count, sent orders to Paris for a magnificent layette, and came herself to the château to wait the event: as did also the Marchioness de Bouillé, her daughter, and sister of the Count.

On the morning of the 16th of August, the Countess, during the celebration of mass in the castle chapel, was taken ill and duly conveyed to her apartment; the midwife summoned, and an express sent off for the Count. He arrived early in the evening, and, after a short interview with his wife, retired to the library, somewhat fatigued with the heat of the day and the business with which he had been occupied.

Anxiously waiting for news from the chamber of the Countess, he sat down to his solitary supper with little inclination to eat; and as soon as it was removed he put on his dressing-gown and slippers, and began a restless promenade up and down the room. It was large, and several of its windows, or rather sash-doors, opened on to the broad terrace which ran along the front of the château. The day had been intensely hot, and they had been left open to admit the cool evening air. He passed through one of them on to the terrace; the fresh air revived him, and he stood gazing at the placid beauty of the scene which spread around.

Impatient and restless, he returned again to the room, and rang a little silver bell which lay on the table. Pierre, a cherished and much-favoured domestic, who had been reared in the family, descending from ancestors originally vassals of the house of La Guiche, opened the door and entered.

"Pierre," said the Count, "why do they not let me know how the Countess is? Go and inquire."

He disappeared, and came back after a short interval with the information that she was better.

"Better!" said the Count. "What am I to understand by that? Who sent the message?"

"Madame la Maréchale," replied Pierre.

The Count resumed his walk. After a short silence, he inquired whether the Marquis St. Maixant had returned. (The Marquis was a relation, and then residing in the château as a visiter.)

"Yes—no, no, my lord," replied Pierre. "Monsieur le Marquis said he should not return to-night."

"And Father Aldrovand, where is he?"

"My lord, he is gone to administer the sacrament to a dying man."

Once again the Count was left alone to his uneasy lucubrations. A short time elapsed, and again the little bell rang. A servant opened the door.

"Where is Pierre?"

"I do not know, my lord."

"Go and inquire how your lady is."

The answer was,—"Madame la Comtesse is much better: the spasms are quite gone."

"Spasms!" exclaimed the Count. "These people are all fools! I will go myself."

He lighted a taper, and, traversing the intervening apartments, ascended the great staircase and entered a corridor, into which opened the principal sleeping-rooms. The bed-room of the Countess was somewhat distant from the staircase. He was proceeding towards it, when he was struck with the figure of a man, so like the Marquis St. Maixant, that he stopped for a moment astonished; then rapidly advancing, he saw it glide, with a step as noiseless as his own, into another room, which he knew was appropriated to the Marquis. He knocked at the door, which was closed but not fastened: no answer was returned. He opened it and went in; no one was there: he passed into a dressing-room; it was empty. Positive he had seen some one enter, he proceeded to a room beyond, where the valet of the Marquis slept; and there, in his dressing-gown and slippers, sat the Marquis himself, with his arms thrown on a little table, and his head resting on them.

He raised it as the Count approached him; his face was pale as death, and a wild and haggard expression indicated that, whatever were the passions by which his mind was agitated, they were terrible in their excess.

This was the accomplice and lover of the Marchioness de Bouillé. The Marquis pretended that he was ill, and had drank too much wine—and an equivocal conversation passed, though the Count entertained no suspicion.

The Count left the room without replying, and was about to enter that of his wife, but the Marchioness de Bouillé advanced as he opened the door, and laying her finger on her lip, in token of silence, stepped into the corridor and gently closed it after her.

"The Countess must not be disturbed," said she; "Blondeville has given her a composing draught. Return to the library, and I will come to you immediately."

Her instructions were obeyed, and again the harassed nobleman returned to traverse the terrace. It was now past midnight, and all was still, except that now and then an owl hooted from a ruined building in the wood, or a watch-dog bayed in the valley below. The lights in the cottage-windows of the village were all extinguished; the air, which had been hot during the day, felt damp and chill, and the Count was about to reënter the room, when the sound of a horse's hoofs, close to the terrace, struck his ear. The next minute he heard it descending the avenue which led to the high-road, at what appeared a fearful speed, under those arching trees, which, even at mid-day, hardly admitted a ray of light. Much surprised, he returned to the library, and was about to ring, when the entrance of his sister directed his thoughts into another channel.

The Marchioness de Bouillé was at this time about twenty-four years of age, handsome, well-formed, and of graceful air; of an active and enterprising character. Not unfeminine in her person, but possessing a bold and masculine spirit, which, had she been a man, would probably have led her to a rank as distinguished in the armies of her country as that of her father; while the Count, her brother, on the contrary, was somewhat supine and indolent. These were also the characteristics of the Maréchale her mother.

This quiet, easy indolence, rendered the promptitude and decision of the Marchioness's character doubly valuable, and gave her a power and influence over him, which, far from seeking to resist, he leaned on as a prop which saved him the trouble of supporting his own weight. She was the wife of the Marquis de Bouillé, a man of sixty, who seldom quitted the neighbourhood of his château in Auvergne, where he resided, and the mother of a daughter two years of age.

"My dear brother," said she, as she entered the library, "I have been anxiously wishing to come to you, for I am aware how wearily the time must have passed with you; but I could not leave her while she was so ill. The Virgin be praised! those terrible spasms are gone. Will you come and see her? you will not, I think, disturb her now."

"Spasms again!" exclaimed the Count, impatiently. "Am I to have an heir to my name?"

The Marchioness shrugged her shoulders, without other reply. After a pause she said, "We must wait, —we must have patience."

"But what is your opinion? What do you think will be the result?"

"Dear Claude," she replied, "what can I say?—you already know my opinion; I have never concealed it from you."

"You still think, then, that the Countess has deceived herself?"

Another shrug was again the only reply.

"This is incredible!" he exclaimed, with a tone of vehemence to which his voice was a stranger, and the blood flushed into his face, which wore an expression of disturbance and vexation that contrasted strongly with its natural placidity.

"This is incredible!" he repeated; "the most eminent men of Paris,—my mother—I myself—I could myself have sworn she was right,—all—all to have been deceived! you yourself appeared to be convinced!"

"Alas!" said she, "we are all but too apt to believe true that which we wish to be so. We must wait: time will decide."

She was about to leave the room, but as she reached the door she stopped, and seemed to hesitate, undecided whether to go or not, then slowly returning to the Count, added, "I am wrong; 'tis better you should know the truth, painful as it is. It is cruel to suffer you to entertain hopes which will never be realised;" and taking up the bell, she rang it. A servant opened the door, to whom she said, "Request Madame Goillard to come here."

Madame Goillard, the midwife, almost immediately made her appearance. She was a good-looking woman, apparently about forty years of age.

"Madame Goillard," said the Marchioness, "the Governor wishes to know whether the accouchement of the Countess is likely to take place soon,—whether it is likely to take place at all."

The woman looked frightened and bewildered; she remained silent, and evidently trembled.

"Come, ma mère!" said the Marchioness; "take courage! You tremble,—you are afraid! It is better the Governor should know the truth, and he will not be angry with you for telling it, as you seem to fear."

The woman fixed her eyes on the face of the Marchioness, while the appearance of fear and hesitation, which had before marked her countenance, gave place to a strong, but singular and undefinable expression, as it appeared to the Count, who watched her with the keenest interest, as one on whose fiat his fate seemed to hang, as she said, "I am to tell Monseigneur the truth!" then stopped, and remained silent.

"Come, ma mère!" again said the Marchioness, laying her hand on the woman's shoulder, as if to reassure her, "tell us, do you believe the Countess will give birth to a child say within a month,—two—three months?"

"No," replied the woman, in a low voice; then added, in a louder and more assured tone, "no! I am sure she will not."

"Sure!" cried the Count.

"I have had much experience, my lord, and I am sure the Countess is not enceinte."

She was no longer so. The false sister pretended to sympathize in his sorrow, and urged him to visit his poor wife.

The Count, silent and abstracted, mechanically, as it seemed, followed his sister to the bed-chamber of his wife, who lay sunk in sleep, so quiet and profound, and with a face so totally colourless, that the Count bent anxiously over her to assure himself that she lived. He took her hand, which, when he relinquished it, fell back on the bed-clothes like the hand of a corpse, except that it was warm and supple. He turned from the bed, around which many persons were standing, with a heavy sigh, and advanced to an arm-chair, where sat the Maréchale, his mother. She seemed overpowered with sleep and fatigue; her half-closed eyes, as she raised them for a moment to the face of her son, were dull and heavy, and the Marchioness in vain endeavoured to rouse her sufficiently to enable her to speak. For a few minutes, she kept them open, but they bore a glazed appearance, as she stared vacantly round, then closing them, sunk back in a profound and motionless sleep.

"She is wholly worn out," said the Marchioness; "she has been in constant attendance in the sick-room, fretting and anxious, since the morning."

Next morning, a message was sent to the Count by his wife, requesting to see him, and he—

Repaired to her bed-room, where she was lying, pale and apparently weak, but awake, and anxiously watching for him. As he approached the bed, she said—"Where is my child, Claude? They will not let me see it."

The Count, much distressed, knew not what reply to make. At length, he answered, "We have no child, my love; it is not the will of heaven that we should have an heir. We have many other blessings, and must not repine that one wish, however strong, remains ungratified. God and the Holy Mary best know what to give and what to withhold. We must endeavour to bear our disappointment cheerfully."

The Countess raised herself on the pillow, and fixing an earnest look on her husband's face, she said, "Have they then been trying to persuade you also of this? Claude de la Guiche!" she added, in a solemn voice, "as there is a God in heaven, I am the mother of a child—a living child—I heard it cry!"

Much affected, the Count endeavoured to tranquillize and soothe her; and again he said, "Let us entreat the Blessed Virgin to intercede for us, that we may be enabled to submit with patience and resignation to the will of Heaven, which has, for some wise purpose, crossed our wishes. It is the will of God, my love," he added.

"'Tis not the will of God," cried she, vehemently. "Claude de la Guiche! it is not the will of God: God has given us a child,—seek for it, and bring it to me. Let me see my child—your child, Claude. Seek for it, or they will destroy it. Oh, let me see my baby!"

The earnest and imploring air with which she uttered the last words served to destroy the small portion of firmness the Count had hitherto retained. He sunk into a chair by the bed-side, and covered his face with his hands, ashamed of the tears he could not control. Almost immediately rising, he said, "Be tranquil, my dear Susanne; I will go, and——"

"Do, Claude," said she—"do; and do not let them persuade you that I am deceived. I know not what passed before or after: I cannot recollect—I cannot—my head is—is——" The last words were uttered through her closed teeth, as if her jaw was paralyzed. She sunk back on the pillows—her eyes closed, and she lay in the same motionless stupor in which he had seen her before.

The Count quitted the room with a slow step and sorrowful air. Harassed and bewildered, he hardly knew what to think. His mind filled with a wild chaos of contradictory ideas, the only thing that appeared clear to him was, that he was most unhappy. As he traversed the long corridor to the suite of apartments occupied by his mother, the earnest and imploring look of his wife seemed to pursue him, and her words still to ring in his ears, "Seek for my child—for your child, Claude, or they will destroy it!"

He found the Maréchale in her dressing-room, not yet recovered from the fatigue and anxiety she had undergone the preceding day. Her eye was still glazed and heavy, and she appeared to wake from a doze as the Count entered the room.

"Mother!" said he, "Susanne declares she is the mother of a child!"

The aged lady, herself grossly deceived, entertained the common notion, that her daughter-in-law's brain was turned; and from this period the Countess was treated as one harmlessly but hopelessly insane. The husband became estranged from his wife. His sister, and the rest of her family, took their departure, and he made frequent and long visits to Paris, where he fell completely under the influence of the Marchioness. When at home he was engaged in the affairs of his government, or the chase; so that his young, melancholy, and neglected Countess was left to nearly unbroken solitude; to wander in the woods of the domain, or solace herself with the society of the kind-hearted old domestic chaplain. Nearly three years had passed on in this sad way, when Pierre, the maitre d'hôtel of the Count, brought a lovely boy to the chateau, whom he called his nephew. The Countess became strongly attached to the fine and engaging child, who, in his turn, became very fond of her. Little Bernard was gradually installed a member of her family, and the Countess began to recover her spirits and health. The boy was her own child—she knew it, she felt it by a mother's instinct; and Pierre, moved by remorse, pity, and gratitude, at last owned the truth. It was he that had carried off the newly-born infant, at the moment of its birth. It was the feet of his horse which the watching father had heard in the avenue; but now, as she valued the life of her precious boy, the Countess was warned, by the repentant agent of the Marchioness, to conceal the fact, even from her husband, and to treat the child as the nephew of Pierre, until the truth could be made known, with safety, to all concerned.

One day that the child's life was endangered by his falling into the water, while walking with the Count and Countess, the frantic mother, plunging into the stream after him, proclaimed her secret. The Count was shocked at this imagined sudden burst of insanity, but he rescued them both. The extraordinary attachment which the Countess showed to the young peasant began to be commented on in the household; and some of the servants protested that he was the very image of the Count, while others thought he resembled the lady. Strange rumours spread over the country; and the Marchioness arrived from Paris; when it was judged prudent by Pierre and his lady that little Bernard should be sent away. But it would be impossible to do any justice to the curious chain of facts by which the truth is finally evolved, in spite of the constant intrigues, machinations, and crimes of the woman who, once plunged into guilt, is compelled to go deeper and deeper. The gracious superintendence of a special Providence was never more manifest than in the facts of this case. We warmly recommend the TALE OF THE MARCHIONESS, as one worked up with great talent, and rendered exceedingly impressive. It indeed required no adventitious aid to deepen its interest. The authoress has inwoven that indispensable ingredient in all novels, a love story, into her romance of real life.

THE HERBERTS.

THIS is a sensible, or common-sensical, and soberly satirical, didactic novel, in which the prevailing foibles, and the most easily besetting sins of the different classes of English society, are, in the course of an agreeable, easily-flowing story, exposed and tacitly rebuked. The hero, William Herbert, is indeed somewhat of a David Simple; almost a ninny in his primitive honesty, and profound ignorance of the world; but how else could the author have brought out the heartlessness of the great, the pride and sensuality of bishops, the treachery and meanness of attorneys and tradesmen; and the pitiful ambitions of the aspiring devotees of fashion among the middle ranks. As a characteristic specimen of the novel, we choose the great establishment of Wellington House, where Herbert, after having in vain sought the patronage of the aristocratic friends of his late father, and failed in obtaining that of the publishers, in the despair of utter destitution applies for employment as a draper's assistant in consequence of an advertisement:—

William directed his course towards The Wellington House establishment, but as he approached it he was considerably mortified to find the house, which altogether was a very brilliant affair, ticketed from cellar to attic with the words, "Selling Off," in letters of colossal magnitude. . . . . The shop was a very large one indeed, although rather plain compared with the assemblage of magnificent colours in the window. The shop, indeed, consisted of the whole ground floor of the house, the front being looked into from the street, and the back consisting of a range of windows of ground glass, to let in a little muddy light from the couple of square yards behind the house, which were dignified by the name of "The Court." The walls of this large room were of course divided into niches, stuffed full of all imaginable productions of the loom; following the sinuosities of which were a range of mahogany counters, and between the two a regiment of obliging, but consequential-looking young gentlemen, rather under the middle-size, dressed in clothes of a very fashionable cut, with remarkably white shirts——wristbands and collars to hide all conclusions, and every one adorned with a head of elaborate curls, which even the perpetual bowing did no more discompose than it would those other polite gentlemen—the Mandarins in grocers' windows. The fronts of the counters were lined with cane-bottomed chairs, every one of which contained a lady when William entered; and for one moment he was at a loss to whom to address himself, since it appeared that every individual young gentleman had attached himself to an individual lady, with a devotion that rendered him, as it were, insensible to the existence of all others; so that if William had been very fanciful instead of very hungry that morning, he might have thought of the time when every knight was bound to perform such strange feats to show his allegiance to his lady-love, as we read of in those truest historians—the poets and romancers.

But neither Spenser nor Ariosto occurred to William in the draper's shop; and the hesitation as to whom he should address, which I mentioned above, did not last many moments; for a young gentleman, cut out after the same pattern as those he had already seen, sprang from some invisible door, advanced, with a smiling countenance, behind the row of young gentlemen already engaged, until he faced Mr. Herbert, when he insinuated himself between two of his fellows, looked earnestly at William to attract his attention, and as he drew nigh to the counter, spread open the fore-finger and thumb of both hands, put the tip of each perpendicularly on the counter, laid the weight of his whole body on them, bent kindly and confidentially towards him, and looking very serious, said, in the low, gentle tones of the truest affection—

"Good morning to you, Sir—a very fine morning, Sir. What shall I have the pleasure of showing you, Sir?"

"I wish to see Mr. Wiggins, if you please," William replied.

"Thank you, Sir; oh, yes, to be sure, immediately," the young gentleman replied. "May I ask you, Sir, if you wish to see him on business?"

"Yes, on business," William replied, rather at a loss to know why one man should wish to see another, unless he had some kind of business with him.

"I beg your pardon, Sir," said the young gentleman, "Mr. Wiggins is—rather—that is—he is engaged about this time. I should be happy to show you anything myself, Sir; and I flatter myself you could do business with me to advantage; or, if your business be private, Sir, I should be happy to introduce you to Mr. Scorum, Mr. Wiggins's principal secretary, what is his confidential—quite."

William was not aware that great men in trade in these latter days, however sharply they may look after their profits, sometimes dislike to soil their hands with the dirty details of business, so that he did not know that there could be any impropriety in wishing to see the master. This he was the more anxious to do, as it was the name Wiggins, and not the name Scorum, which was in the list of the charitable; and William knew just sufficient of the world to be aware, that, though a master might be a very liberal and excellent man, it did not follow that his servants must possess the same character. He, therefore, persisted in his request; and at length the young gentleman led the way through the shop, and up a circular flight of stairs, at the top of which he opened a door, and led William into a magnificent room, where sat Mr. Cornelius Wiggins, the great linen-draper. This room excelled in grandeur of proportion, and splendour of fitting up, all that William had ever seen. . . . . In the drawing-room of Wellington House, there was everything that money could purchase, and everything was in good condition, but everything seemed quite new. The paper on the walls was a delicate mixture of pink and silver, seemingly upheld by a cornice of heavy gold work, all of which looked infinitely finer than the old tapestry of The Hall, [Herbert's ancestral home.] The floor was covered with a Turkey carpet, containing only one flower or pattern, exactly the size of the room. There were two fireplaces, each with its polished grate decorated with designs in bronze from the antique, and surrounded by a colossal structure of white marble, embodying the fronts of two of the most celebrated porticoes of ancient Greece. A dozen of tables, of different shapes and materials, were placed in various parts of the room, about which were a profusion of couches, ottomans, and sofas, adorned with crimson and purple velvet, embellished with designs elaborately executed with the needle, and innumerable chairs, of such variety of form, that they seemed like samples of the distorted fancies of a hundred individuals who had much more money than taste; some of them round-backed, some square, some oval, some Gothic, some Norman, some of no definable shape; some high-backed, some low, some upright, some slanting, and some moveable at pleasure into every kind of angle; some were of mahogany, some of rosewood, some of ivory; and the sitting parts, of every variety of form, were as gay as the rest, with all that could be done with satin, cotton, cane, wood, wool, and velvet. Three or four first-rate historical paintings, a couple of magnificent pier-glasses, and three sets of gigantic hands in or-molu, grasping the window-curtains, which were of rose-coloured silk, completed the furniture of the room, which seemed worthy the occupation of the Queen of the Fairies, or that which suggests all the most beautiful ideas which enter the mind of man—a fair and accomplished woman.

But there was very little of the fairy-like about Mr. Wiggins; and, indeed, William was somewhat disappointed at the first sight of that gentleman, since, in speculation on his benevolent character, he had conjured up a thousand pictures of tall men, with grey hair and beneficent smiles, not one of which agreed entirely with the reality before him. Mr. Wiggins was a rather short man, with a pale face, and long black hair, brushed smooth over his forehead, dressed in a suit of well-brushed black, with white cravat, and high shirt collar. But if William felt that his anticipations of the person of a benevolent man were not borne out by present experience, he was as much surprised at Mr. Wiggins's personal appearance and apparent habits, contrasted with the splendour of the room; for that gentleman was sitting at one of the tables, on which stood a pewter pot of porter, an upright tobacco-box with a blackamoor's head on the top, with a clay-pipe at its side, while a very forcible reminiscence of tobacco pervaded the room. But all this rather pleased William than otherwise, since it proved to him that the benevolent man, although the owner of the great riches about him, was one contented with the humble pleasures of inferior men.

It must not be supposed that the last two pages of description were acquired by William as slowly as they have been written or read; for everything here set down he discovered at a single glance round the room, as he walked from the door to the table at which Mr. Wiggins was seated.

"I have the pleasure of addressing Mr. Wiggins, I presume?" William inquired.

"That's my name," replied Mr. Wiggins.

"I believe, Sir, this is your advertisement," said William, displaying the advertisement of Wellington House, which had created such hopes in his mind.

"That is the advertisement of this firm," replied Mr. Wiggins; "but I never attend to the retail trade myself. I will ring for Mr. Scorum, my secretary, who will be happy to receive your commands."

"Pardon me," William replied, "pardon me, Sir; but my business is with you. I am no stranger to the benevolence of your character; and I would rather appeal to you than to your secretary."

"I—I understand—a—" said Mr. Wiggins, with considerable hesitation; "benevolent—if you come with a case of distress—a—I am sorry, but really, Sir, so many calls—a——"

"You entirely misconceive my object," interrupted William; "I come to you on my own account only; and I should not doubt my success with a gentleman of your liberality, if I had not had the pain of discovering that you are selling off."

"Selling off!" cried Mr. Wiggins, in a tone of astonishment, not unmixed with anger, and rising suddenly from the sofa, as he spoke: "I don't understand you, Sir! What do you mean?"

Mr. Wiggins was always selling off. To cut short the story, William, though his academical acquirements were of no use at Waterloo House, was engaged; his certificate from the vicar of his parish being "quite satisfactory to the firm." William, though a sad dunce behind the counter, was of some use at the desk; but especially when a customer dropped in who spoke French or Italian, as native gentlemen speak those languages. He was consequently an acquisition to the firm in this particular.

Persons who are but little acquainted with the details of trade may be surprised at the confidence Mr. Wiggins placed in William Herbert, in taking him into his house on such slight recommendation. But the fact was, as William saw in a few seconds after sitting down at his desk, that it was nearly impossible for any one to be dishonest, in consequence of the very nice arrangement of the shop proceedings; for not only had every shopman a premium offered for the detection of a delinquent—so that the whole establishment was a set of spies one on the other—but the shopmen, instead of receiving money and putting it in a till, were compelled to make out a bill for every purchase, and carry the bill and money to a row of clerks who sat at the end of the shop, on an elevated bench, which gave them an uninterrupted view of everything passing in the busy scene below. The money was taken, and passed on to another clerk, who entered it in a ledger; the bill was filed, and a copy of it, made by a junior clerk, and receipted by Mr. Scorum, was handed to the shopman for the customer. During every moment of the day this was going on, so that there was actually no time for dishonesty, to say nothing of its impossibility on other grounds. . . . . .

It happened that the foreigner was a Frenchman and a gentleman, and discerning that William also behaved in a manner somewhat above that of his supposed class, the gentleman was very glad to converse with him. But if he was glad, Mr. Scorum was more so: for it seemed to him astonishing how any people could make such a stupid noise as they made, and yet understand each other as well as if they spoke good English. He could not help wishing to make Mr. Wiggins a witness of this strange phenomenon, and, with his very best bow, he accosted the Frenchman, and asked him to do him the extreme pleasure of walking into the drawing-room. Monsieur laid his hand on his heart in return for Mr. Scorum's smile, bowed in return for his bow, and made him a speech in good French, unintelligible to Scorum, in return for his unintelligible English, when William repeated the invitation in the foreigner's language, and they walked up stairs.

Mr. Wiggins also was pleased with William's great skill in languages, by which he gave such evident pleasure to a stylish customer, who, perhaps, bought more on William's account than he would otherwise have done, and whose order must have been certainly lost, if he had not been understood.

When the stranger left, William, on very good terms with Mr. Wiggins, went again to his desk with Mr. Scorum, who immediately ordered 20,000 copies to be printed of the following notice, some of which were stuck up in the window before night :—

"Messrs. Wiggins and Co., beg to inform their friends from the Continent, and others who do not understand the English language, that they will find no difficulty at their establishment, Wellington House, 980, Oxford Street, since Messrs. W. & Co. have engaged first-rate persons to conduct their continental business.

"Messrs. W. & Co., would suggest the favour of an early call at their establishment as above, since they offer the most extensive stock in Europe, at such a tremendous sacrifice, as will make it worth the purchaser's notice.

"N.B.—French, Mathematics, and Italian, are spoken by Messrs. W. & Co."

When Mr. Scorum removed the candle, as was his nightly custom, and descended, the young men had a free chat in the dark, Mr. Simpson, a man of note among them, commencing—

"I say, Mr. Wizzle, did you see that there young female in purple poplin, red beads, and green silk bonnet with French-white lining, at the grodynap counter?"

"I think I did," Mr. Wizzle replied, from the next bed.

"An uncommon fine girl—the Honourable Miss Thingamy—I forget her name. Oh, what eyes!—and you should have seen the look she gave me! I do think that she—I'll bet anybody sixpence that she'll come again to-morrow."

"There was a very handsome young lady at my counter, quite top-up, as looked very hard at me," said another young gentleman.

"So there was at mine," another replied.

"And at mine too," said a third.

"There's nothing very curious about that there," said the fourth and last, who had not yet spoken; "there's not a day as passes but what I gets a wicked look from some first-rate or other."

"Oh, Higgins," replied Simpson, in a tone of gentle reproach—"Higgins, my dear fellow, there's no better fellow than you in all the West End; but why don't you pay more attention to your language, as I have so many times told you?" . . . . . .

"Now, don't be offended, Higgins, my dear fellow," said Mr. Simpson, very blandly; "what I say is for your own good, and I know it's not your fault as you don't talk so fashionable as us. The fact is this here:—you've been a-spending all your days in the city, and got hold of their uncorrect talking; but I'm sure you'll rub it off, if you'll only listen to us, and I shall be very happy to correct you as often as you make a fawx pass. You see, Mr. Herbert, we know a little Greek here, without going to the university. But, gents, about this here gal, the Honourable Miss—Miss What's-her-name!—I'll be hanged if I know what to make of it! She wouldn't have looked as she did for nothing—and, my eye, such a fortune! Who knows, Mr. Nobbles, whether a young fellow may not have a chance!"

Passing over the Sunday morning toilet of the young gentlemen, and the service at the dissenting chapel which the pious Mr. Wiggins attended and in which he officiated, and also the evening amusements of the young gentlemen of the Establishment in their stroll, which savour a good deal of Tittlebat Titmouse, we come to business. William puts this natural query to the principal person among his companions :—

"I beg your pardon, Mr. Simpson; but I wish you would explain one thing that has a good deal puzzled me. You speak confidently of remaining here six months, while the house is covered with bills stating that our employers are selling off. I do not comprehend it."

At this remark all the young gentlemen united in a quiet laugh, and Mr. Simpson said—

"Why, you don't suppose as they're a going to shut up a concern like this here, do you?"

"I certainly feared that such was the case," William replied.

"Well," said Simpson, "I didn't think any young man in the world was so little down to the move, as that there. Why, we only put up the 'selling off' go, to make people believe as they'll buy bargains."

"Indeed!" said William, in amazement; "and do you consider that honest?"

"To be sure, I do. Why, there's hundreds of houses that does it. But who's to shut an establishment up like this here?"

"Why, the master, Mr. Wiggins, I should suppose."

"Stuff!—that's all gammon. Why, Wiggins could no more close the concern than Scorum could. Why he and Scorum are only put in by other parties to sell off what they send in. Perhaps Wiggins is a partner, too, and Scorum isn't—but that's all the difference; and Scorum is as much a spy over Wiggins as Wiggins is over him; and though Wiggins is master, he can't turn Scorum out. Don't you see the dodge."

"I don't exactly understand," William replied.

"Well, then, look here. Wiggins is a very pious man, and he knows a precious lot of pious men and parsons, in town and country, too; in fact, the parsons know one another, all through the country. Now this here first-rate concern belongs to a lot of these here pious men; and a precious lot of them there is. Well, they puts in so much a-piece, and starts it, and puts in Wiggins as manager; but puts in Scorum, too, to see all fair play; and they've got him in such a way that he and Wiggins can never put their heads together to do the rest of the firm. Now, you see, as these here pious people knows each other throughout the country, whenever one of 'em is down in his luck, and want's to make a move to America, or somewhere, all he's got to do is to tell his parson he wants to sell his stock, and he writes up to town, and one of the firm goes down, and if it's a stock that'll sell, he gives a sum quietly for the lot, and sends it up at once—and the pious man cuts off. And besides that, he deals sometimes with nobs, as witness the drawing-room. I'll he hang'd, if the house ha'n't been furnished throughout three or four times, the last two years, in the way of trade. There's no end to the business we've done of that kind, and 'tis a business that pays, let me tell you."

"But," asked William, "how does the creditor get his money?"

"Oh, he's done, of course."

"Well," said William, with some hesitation, "I don't exactly understand this—there seems to be something very dishonest in it; but I should think business of that kind must be extremely dangerous, since it holds out a temptation to the dishonest debtor to stretch his credit to the utmost, when, on the eve of bankruptcy or absconding, he knows he can sell his stock secretly for ready money."

"Oh! I dare say that game is kept up pretty well," Simpson replied with a laugh.

"Not with Mr. Wiggins's knowledge, surely?" replied William; for transactions of this kind cannot be called honest."

"Honest! honest!" repeated Mr. Simpson, doubtingly, as though he were beating his brains to make out the possible meaning of a Greek word which he had just heard for the first time. "Honest!—well, now, I don't know about that; we don't learn about that kind of thing, you know, when we are serving our time; but I can tell you, all the best houses do a good deal in that way."

"But you don't suppose that Mr. Wiggins would engage in such business?"

"Why, I should think 'tis the very thing to suit him."

"What! do you suppose that Mr. Wiggins is not honest?"

"Oh, no; I mean to say as Mr. Wiggins is a highly respectable man—very. He has knocked up for himself three times—that is, compounded with his creditors twice—and passed through the court once, and made lots of money. Nobody knows what he's worth. You see, being such a religious man, he got capital credit, and when he was in pretty deep, he smashed. But the worst of that trick is, it won't last. The trade get down to it, and won't stand tick any more; so that he embarks in this here concern, with other parties, and does a profitable business besides, in discounting bills in the connexion that he belongs to."

"I can't believe," William replied, "that a man of Mr. Wiggins's strict principles could be guilty of what you say."

"Guilty!—that be hanged," cried Simpson; "everybody does it; and I'll be hanged if it isn't a good move. But I say, we must get into bed, or we sha'n't be up by five."

Herbert was so very unsuccessful in coaxing ladies and their maids to make purchases, when sent out to show goods, that he must at once have been dismissed from Wellington House, save for his knowledge of languages. In consequence of the dismissal of one of the young men, William is placed at a counter, and—

The day passed away pleasantly enough, as he found sufficient work to keep himself constantly employed: but one or two things in this first day of counter-business puzzled him a good deal; the first of which was, that, after selling a variety of articles to a lady who had a servant with her, and laying them on the counter in readiness to make into a parcel when the order was finished, they were made up by another shopman, who rapidly substituted other articles of similar appearance to those which he had sold. The other thing which puzzled him was, that, after he had served a lady, who had no servant, with some goods which she said she would herself carry home, another shopman came up and requested to be allowed to send them. This the lady would not permit, as she said she could take them with the greatest convenience; but as the shopman waxed more pressing as the lady appeared more determined not to trouble them, and at length went so far as to assure her that it was a rule of the establishment never to allow a lady to be burthened with goods purchased there, she at length consented, and expressing her thanks for their politeness, went away, followed by a shopman bearing the parcel. Now, during this little altercation, William had observed a young man at another counter making up a packet composed of articles seemingly the counterpart of those the lady had bought, which immediately after she had departed a young man took up and carried into the street. After a few minutes, the latter young gentleman returned, bearing a parcel which he laid before William, and which, when he opened it, he found to be the very parcel he had sent out. In obedience to his instructions, he put the articles on the shelves whence he had taken them; but during the remainder of the day was puzzled to comprehend the meaning of this transaction.

When William expressed his astonishment at these things, he only got laughed at—in an under-tone, however; for laughing, among other ill practices, was not allowed at the Wellington House.

"Why, Mr. Herbert," inquired Simpson, "didn't Scorum instruct you in the counter-business?"

"The counter-business! why, now you mention it, I remember that he said something about it. He told me the young gentlemen would instruct me in it."

"Well, you know, in course, that all our ticketed prices are gammon!"

"What, do you mean that they are fictitious! I was not aware of it."

"Well, you know it now. Of course we can't sell by those prices, as we always mark those goods twenty per cent. under prime cost. This, you see, is only for a draw. People sees slap-up articles in the windows, and about the shop, marked at astonishing low figures, and they come in for what they want, expecting everything beside is as cheap. But if the person fixed her mind on the ticketed things, all you've got to do is to persuade them that other articles, which you show them, are of better quality, and then you'll do very well. But if the customer is an obstinate fool, and will have the very things with the tickets on them, and you have no means of persuading, or no other things just handy, you will do up the things on the counter, and another young gent will change them for things which we can get a profit out of at such a price. Why, didn't you see Hickson a-putting a piece of black silk in the parcel this morning, instead of the one you sold?"

"Is this all true?" William asked, in amazement.

"True!" cried Simpson, "to be sure it is. It is what we do every day—we could not keep our places without it."

"And do you not consider it very dishonest?"

"Why a—Mr. Nobbles—what do you say? The fact is this, Mr. Herbert, it's all honest enough in the way of trade. We can't afford to sell a shawl for a pound that cost us thirty shillings, and therefore, when a person takes a liking to one with that mark, we are obliged to manage so as not to lose anything by it, and so put in a fifteen shilling one instead." . . . . . .

"I did not suppose such villany was practised in the world," said William.

"Villany!" exclaimed Simpson, in surprise; "I assure you the young gentlemen in this establishment are as respectable as any that I know; and Wiggins and Scorum are really as good fellows as we generally meet with in the trade, and I am sure would not cheat anybody out of a farthing, unless in the way of trade—which is no harm, or they would not have such a precious lot of prayers said over us. They're a little sharp with their young gents, to be sure, but that's their only fault. But about this window business, we don't force people to come into the shop; we only put up low prices to persuade 'em; and it is not to be supposed that we're a going to sell at a loss. No, we sell them what we can get a profit out of, like any other concern in the trade. All houses do the same as ours, and if you or I was to take a concern to-morrow, we should do the same—for it's the only way of carrying on business. Besides, people as keeps shops must sell as much as they can; and its people's own faults if they're took in—eh, Nobbles? Do you think they'd do us?—not they. People should learn to be awake. . . . I'll be hanged if anybody 'ud ever do—me—very—brown."

William finally ruins himself by selling a muff to a lady at the price at which it was ticketed in the window. The victim of old-fashioned notions of honesty and ignorance of trade was sharply rebuked for his misdemeanours by Mr. Wiggins—who, however, after a pause of reflection, waxed milder. He said—

In a very religious voice, "But, young man, I will not put you forth at this late hour without hope; for we are just going to prayers, and you may stay till we have done, and who knows but a word or two may fall on your heart, and bring forth fruit."

William said that he doubted whether any form of prayer could make him a rogue; and left the room and the house without a single "God speed you" from any individual in the Wellington House.

Wellington House is, no doubt, a caricature, but it has truth for its basis. We do not consider it a favourable specimen of the novel, as a literary work, but it has a useful and definite moral.

But we have already, under the fascinations of the fictionists, so far exceeded our limits, that we are forced till next month to postpone Morley Ernstein, though it is named in our list of the new novels as deserving a special and lengthened notice. In it, the accomplished and fertile author has come out in a new character as an imaginative writer, and, in our opinion, increased his reputation, if he has not at last discovered the true bent of his genius.

VESTIARUM SCOTICUM, OR THE BOOK OF TARTANS.*

This splendid book belongs to a class of works which must, from their cost, be of rare appearance anywhere, and which are rare indeed in Scotland. It is a book for the rich and the aristocratical; or for what are called "historical families." It belongs as much to the decorative arts as to literature; though national costume certainly falls within the province of the literary antiquary. The author or editor of this unique publication must be well known in Scotland and the North of England, especially to the Roman Catholic and the old Jacobite families, or those who once were Jacobites. The phrase, publication, is, however, hardly applicable to a work of which there were only forty copies for sale; and of which it may soon be difficult to obtain even a sight. We therefore seize the first opportunity to describe to our clannish readers the Book of Clans and Tartans.

In the possession of Mr. John Sobieski Stuart, there is an old MS. black-letter quarto, of the sixteenth century, containing thirty-four pages of vellum, illuminated with small plain capitals, such as the ordinary initials of inferior missals. In this volume, the tartans of each of the great feudal families of Scotland are minutely described. It was at one time in the possession of John Lesley Bishop of Ross; but of the author, save that he would appear to have been a Sir Richard Urquhart, —and even that is indistinctly intimated,—nothing whatever is known. The MS. volume was deposited, no one can tell when, in the library of the Scots College at Douay, along with many other papers belonging to the Bishop. When Prince Charles Edward visited that seminary, some time between 1749 and 1754, he, according to Mr. Stuart, obtained from the Fathers this singular relic among many other papers. How or when it came into his own possession, or of its history since 1754, we do not learn. The MS. has been collated by Mr. Stuart, with the transcript of another copy stated to be in the library of the Monastery of St. Augustine in Cadiz, which bears internal evidence of having once belonged to "ane honerabil man, Maister James Dunbare, w^tin y^e burg of Innernesse," and which, it is imagined, may, through the hands of some refugee or Irish priest, have passed into Spain. Between these copies there exist merely the slight differences and omissions which arise from inaccuracy in copying, or clerical errors; but there is a third copy very much vitiated and mutilated, that is also in the possession of Mr. Stuart, of which the history is even more romantic than that of the other copies; the fathers and monks of the religious houses of the Continent being much more likely to prove faithful custodiers of rare MSS. than old illiterate Highlanders, transferred from the mountains to city lanes. This last "was obtained from an old Highlander named John Ross, one of the last of the sword-players, who may yet be remembered by those who recollect the porters of Edinburgh twenty years ago." It is written negligently and inaccurately, and differs in several particulars from the MS. of the Bishop of Ross.

It is as difficult to fix the date as the authorship of the Vestiarium Scoticum, though it is presumed by Mr. Stuart to be not later than the reign of James III. of Scotland, and, consequently, long prior to the time when it could have fallen into the hands of the learned and loyal John Lesley, the adherent and historian of Queen Mary, who was somewhat contemptuous of "Hieland vanities," and of "compilin ane buik upon the stripis and colouris of a common garment," though he has fortunately preserved this curious volume. It contains a roll of the clans, of date 1571, which is consequently very long subsequent to what Mr. Stuart imagines the date of the original document. Having given this roll which must be of interest to all feudal families, and to all who boast clan blood, Mr. Stuart proceeds with his Introduction, which, together with the numerous foot-notes, fills 66 quarto pages with antiquarian dissertation upon "the tartan;" which is shown to be of very ancient date, and which in all probability is nearly as old as the art of weaving cloth of different colours, the chequer or cross-stripe being quite as easily invented as the simple stripe. Indeed no sort of cloth for garments has been more generally diffused over the civilized globe than chequered cloth or tartan, (the breacan of the Highlander,) and that from periods of the highest antiquity down to our own age. "From the Highlanders of Scotland to the mountaineers of Burmah, from the Calmucs of the north to the Biscayans of the south," may be found variegated or parti-coloured garments, together with other relics and usages of a common family, now very widely dispersed. The antiquity and universality of tartan, or of chequered or parti-coloured garments, among different nations, is abundantly demonstrated; but until the eighth century no mention is, we are told, made of it in oral Gaelic poetry, or by manuscripts in the Gaelic language, though the omission is no proof of its non-existence. Tartan or Breacan is now, however, chiefly of interest from the exclusive appropriation of different and fixed patterns or setts by the leading clan families of the Highlands, and as it now appears from the Vestiarium Scoticum, by those of the Lowlands also, who were of any note previous to the 16th century. Indeed the leading object of the work is to prove, that to each of these families a particular sett or pattern was exclusively appropriated, by which every man of the tribe could be recognised from his plaid, as readily as from his surname or the badge or ensign of his clan. Its splendid illustrations are emblazonings of these tartans in every brilliant rainbow dye. The tartans so enamelled are in as great variety as the number of the great families, of whom each, according to the Vestiarium Scoticum, had a pattern of their own. There are between seventy and eighty specimens; forty-two Highland, and thirty-one Lowland and Border families being enumerated as each having its own tartan. These, taken alphabetically, are of Highlanders:—

Buchanan, Cameron, Campbell, Chisholm, Clanranald, Farquharson, Fraser, Grant, Gun, Lamont, MacArthur, MacDonald of the Isles, MacDougall, MacDuff, MacFarlane, MacGrigor, MacIntosh, MacIntyre, MacKay, MacKenzie, MacKinnon, MacLauchlan, MacLean, MacLeod, MacNab, MacNeill, MacPherson, MacQueen, Menzies, Monro, Robertson, Ross, Prince of Rothesay, The Royal Stuart, Sutherland.

The Lowland and Border Clans who had tartans were, the Armstrong, Barclay, Brodie, Bruce, Colquhoun, Comyn, Cunningham, Cranstoun, Crawford, Douglas, Drummond, Dunbar, Dundas, Erskine, Forbes, Gordon, Graham, Hamilton, Hay, Home, Johnston, Kerr, Lauder, Leslie, Lindsay, Maxwell, Montgomery, Murray, Ogilvie, Oliphant, Ramsay, Rose, Ruthven, Scott, Seton, Sinclair, Urquhart, Wallace, Wemyss.

The peculiar tartan of each of those families is accurately described in the Vestiarium, otherwise "ycleped the garderope of Scotlande," and for the following weighty reasons:—

For sameikle as in thir pres^t tymes bene sene dyuers vnevthe chavnges in the avld scottysche fassoune, and men do nowe effect foreigne and stravnge fantasyes, radder nor sic holsom vse and ordyr as cvmethe of y^r ain natiue gvise, and hes ben vsit be owr forbeiris yn the aulde tyme, for nowe all do tak pryd to buske y^m yn heich crovnit hattis, frensche claukis, Englische hudes, lang pykit schune, and vdder syk lyk vncovthe braueries, the quhilk wes vnknawen till owr antecessories of gude famen quha wes conteintit to gang w^t ane bonnette of Kelsheu-blewe, and ain mantil or playde lyk as affore tym wes vsit be ther faderis begone, w^t ane payr of rouch rowlyns, or hemands of harteshyd, as wes moche vsit be owr vmquhile lorde and souraine King James of nobil memorye; for he had euer, besyd thai of hys awin coulouris, twa or thre pladis of diuers kyndes in hys guarderobe, quhilk he vsit yn his iornayes quhen that he wald not be knawen openlye; and for that sic fassovns be not of vse in vther cvntryes nor foraine reaulmes, for thir cawsis I haue taken on hande to compil, accordand to my pvir habylitye, a trewe ensample off alle, or the maist parte, the pryncyppul tartanis of Scotlonde, sic as I maye discerne y^m, baithe for the trewe witting and pleasaunce of alle cvriovs straungeris, and to y^e ende y^t gif paravaunture, quhilk God forbyd, that herefter ovr covntrye fassoune sall alle to fayl and haillilie cvm to nocht, as heth bene sene w^t monie vtharis of mair and greater renome and puissaunce; as to wyt, y^e nobyll reaulmis of Babyloun, Troie, and Jewerie, Egyptia, Cartegen, and of lyk wyse gloriovs and ymperiall Rom, quhilk wes svmtym qwene and ladye of alle the wordle; seit, neuerthelesse, hathe her anticke and hethen fassovn all to perrischit owt of vse and mynd throuch y^e mycht of ovr Lorde and halye crosse, quhilk heth put doune theyr idollis lyk as wes y^e dewil Dagoune and the fenlie dragoune of Kinge Cyrvs, w^t y^e fowle ymage bel, w^t sindrie sick pagovne herreseye; quharfor, if so be befal on lyk sort that ovr gudlye oys sall be decayit and cvm to nocht, y^t then alle men may knawe the aulde gvyse of theyr forberis; for yn sae moche as we that be in thir daies be cvriovse and desyrous to seke efter and dyscouer the famous gestis of ovr antecessoris in theyr avld tym of renowme, swa yn lyk mannere I doubt not that thai quhilk sall cvm eftir vs, sall be careful to knawe owr maner of gyse and vdder manneris, to the end y^t thai maye vnderstonde yn quhat we be lyk vnto y^mselues, and alsua quharin we be dyuers from, and do vnlyk vntil y^m.

The manner of forming "the settis or stryppis" is next described, and also the different chequers proper for hose and trews, which admitted of great variety; every man being allowed, in those inferior articles, to follow his own convenience or fancy, though the plaid, the war-garbs, the garments of honour, were not to be tampered with. The women were, however, allowed unlimited license in the patterns of their plaids and dresses. Some of the setts, as they are blazoned in this work, and upon the authority of the Vestiarium, differ materially from the tartans usually recognised under the respective clan names. The tartans given here as those of the Mackays, the Mackenzies, the Grants, and the Macgregors, for example, are not those usually recognised as the tartans of those clans. We, however, only speak to the best of our recollection, as we have not lately visited a Clan Tartan Warehouse to refresh memory with a sight of those brilliant fabrics.

The Vestiarium Scoticum must henceforth be the book of authority, the final arbiter, in this important question with manufacturers as well as clansmen; and we suspect that its fiat will reduce many pretty patterns, with clan names, to the anomalous list of fancy or mongrel tartans. Many of the tartans in Mr. Stuart's work must be quite new, even to those who have, from commercial reasons, of late paid considerable attention to this fashionable and favourite manufacture; such are those of the Cranstouns, the Lauders, the Brodies, the Ramsays, and so forth. The description of one pattern from the Vestiarium will give a perfect idea of the whole; though, of course, the description is short or lengthened according to the simplicity or intricacy of the sett. Thus, the tartan of "the Mackfarlan of ye Arroquhar," is described in half a dozen words. It "hath thre stryppis quhite, vpon ane blak fyeld;" while the tartan of "MakDonnald of ye Ylis," and of the Clan Ranald, require this long explanation:—

MakDonnald of y^e Ylis, quhilk is the chiefest and maist nobil of alle clanned names, howbeit the clann Grigor and y^e Clan chattane of aulde sall be consawit of lyk avncient stocke; yet, in respect of pouste and dignitie, we call none lyk vnto hym: he heth ane blue set, and ane greine sett, quharoff y^e blew sett hathe twa greit panes of blak, ane vpon y^e ylk bordure y^roff and y^rby twa gross sprangis of y^e samen, and in y^e myduard of y^e ylk gren sett ane stryp quhite, the maist pairt of half ane fynger breid, and yn y^e mydward of y^e blew ane gross spraing reidd.

The clan Raynald, y^e second hovse of y^e Clandonald, howbeit y^rbe y^t say he svld be y^e fyrst off rycht, bot y^t Donald mak Ian mak Angus gat y^e herytage, contrar to y^e mindis of ye men of y^e Yllis: he hath ane sett of blewe and ane sett of grene, quharoff y^e blewe sett hath vpon y^e ylk syd ane blak stryp, and y^rby vpon y^e ynward syd y^off ane spraingе scarlatt, and yn y^e myddest of y^e blewe be ither tua sprangis of ye samen a littel asonder, as of fovrty threidis betuix y^m or thairby, and the greine sette hath ane quhite spraing, and be y^e ylk syd y^roff twa of redd, ain greiter and ane less, quharof y^e greiter sall be vtterward, and hathe avghte threidis, and y^e ynnerward hath fovr threidis, and betuix y^e reidd and the quhite sallbe y^e space of aughteen threidis or thairbye, and vtheris y^r be of y^e famylyes of ye clann-donald, lyk as the clan-huistein in Sky, makconel of y^e glennis, makiane of ardnamurackane, and vtheris y^t have y^e samen w^t diuers smal diuersities, of y^e quhilk I speke not yn respect I knawe yhaim not parfaictly.

Many of these tartans are truly beautiful; though no doubt they may owe part of their splen-dour to the artist or illuminator. But the style in which they are executed, and their dazzling effect, must be seen to be comprehended. We do not pretend to describe by words either the process of painting them, or to give any idea of the brilliant results. One may easily conceive the idea of a massy imperial quarto volume, very beautifully printed upon drawing paper, and magnificently bound, gilt, and emblazoned with the royal arms; but the illustrations, the illuminations, the tartans, are the novel feature of the work; and without the actual vivid representations of these beautiful and delicate fabrics be seen, glowing in all the colours of the rainbow, no adequate idea of the work can be formed. We would therefore advise all who have the power of inspection not to rest content with description, but to procure at least a sight of the original work.

The Vestiarium describes the badges of the different Highland clans, which also differ, in some instances, from those which have hitherto been received; and it gives the ensigns of several Lowland and Border families, which, we presume, will be quite as new to many of the descendants of these families as are their tartans. The badge of Bruce is rosemary; of Lyndsay, rue; of Hamilton, bay; Dundas, bilberry; and so forth. On these botanical badges Mr. Stuart has a long and curious note, from which, from its local interest, we copy the following anecdote :—

During the occupation of Edinburgh by the Prince, Charles Edward, in 1745, he paid a visit to the daughters of Sir Alexander Seaton, at the Grange House, then the property of their brother-in-law, William Dick of Grange, and now of their successor, Sir Thomas Dick Lauder of Fountainhall. Upon the steps of the entrance he was received by the ladies with a glass containing a bottle of Madeira. The Prince having drank to his fair entertainers, saluted them on the cheek in the fashion of that period, and taking the white rose from his bonnet presented it to Miss Seaton. Both the flower and the glass were preserved with that zeal by which the female adherents of all ages have sympathized in the ill fortunes of their cause, and which, if equally shared by men, would no longer have claimed sympathy, for it would no longer have been unfortunate.

After the death of the last Miss Seaton, the rose and the glass passed through several hands, and are now in the possession of William Blair, Esq. of Aventon. The badge is an artificial flower such as are usually made by florists.

The work contains much curious and erudite information on ancient Highland costume and usages, and a few lithographed illustrations. But all must give place to the rich, glowing, and resplendent specimens of the several tartans; which if they give the book its high price, also give it its singular value as a rare and splendid work, and an heirloom for Scottish families, and those connected with Scotland.

Essays on English Surnames. By Mark Antony Lower. 12mo, cloth. Pp. 240. London: John Russell Smith.

This is a curious book of its kind, written by a man of some antiquarian reading, and possessed of a certain vein of dry humour. He apologizes to the utilitarians for the frivolity of his subject; but the history of the origin of surnames is a branch of the history of the formation of language, and of the natural operations of the mind in making known, or supplying its wants. The first essay is introductory, and treats the subject in a general way, adverting to the uses and origin of surnames, and the different principles which have regulated their adoption in different countries, ancient and modern. Thus the Scotch Highlanders employed the sire-name with the addition of Mac; the Irish, the name of the sire, with Mac, a son, or O, a grandson; the Normans, Fitz; the Russians, Witz; the Poles, Sky. Surnames are not older than the fourteenth century in Sweden; and until a much later period the Welsh had nothing beyond their Ap. Among them,—

It was not unusual, a century or two back, to hear of such combinations as Evan-ap-Griffith-ap-David-ap-Jenkin, and so on to the seventh or eighth generation, so that an individual often carried his pedigree in his name. The church of Llangollen in Wales is said to be dedicated to St. Collen-ap-Gwynnawg-ap-Clyndawg-ap-Cowrda-ap-Caradoc-Freichfras-ap-Llyn-Merin-ap-Einion-Yrth-ap-Cunedda-Wledig, a name that casts that of the Dutchman, Inkvervankodsdorspanckinkadrackdern, into the shade. To burlesque this ridiculous species of nomenclature, some wag described cheese as being

Adam's own cousin-german by its birth,
Ap-Curds-ap-Milk-ap-Cow-ap-Grass-ap-Earth!

The second essay gives a history of English surnames: and one is somewhat surprised to learn that they were not permanently settled before the era of the Reformation. Parish registers tended much to fix surnames, as it was not likely that a man could be baptized by one name, and married or buried under another.

The Rev. Mark Noble affirms that "it was late in the seventeenth century that many families in Yorkshire, even of the more opulent sort, took stationary names. Still later, about Halifax, surnames became in their dialect genealogical, as William, a Bills, a Toms, a Luke."

On the remark of Tyrwhitt, in his edition of Chaucer, that it is "probable that the use of surnames was not in Chaucer's time fully established among the lower class of people," a more recent editor of the same poet says, "Why, the truth is, that they are not now, even in the nineteenth century, fully established in some parts of England. There are very few, for instance, of the miners of Staffordshire, who bear the names of their fathers. The editor knows a pig-dealer, whose father's name was Johnson, but the people call him Pigman, and Pigman he calls himself. This name may be now seen over the door of a public-house which this man keeps in Staffordshire."

But this is nothing to the practice of bearing a double set of names, which, we are assured, prevails among these colliers. Thus a man may at the same time bear the names of John Smith and Thomas Jones, without any intention of concealment; but it must not be imagined that such regular names are in common use. These are a kind of best names, which, like their Sunday clothes, they only use on high-days and holydays, as at christenings and marriages. For everyday purposes they use no appellative, except a nick-name, as Nosey, Soiden-mouth, Soaker, or some such elegant designation; and this is employed, not by their neighbours alone, but by their wives and children, and even by themselves! A correspondent of Knight's Quarterly Magazine, who is my authority for these statements, says, "I knew an apothecary in the collieries, who, as a matter of decorum, always entered the real names of his patients in his books; that is, when he could ascertain them. But they stood there only for ornament; for use he found it necessary to append the sobriquet, which he did with true medical formality, as, for instance, "Thomas Williams, vulgo dict. OLD PUFF. . . . . Clergymen have been known to send home a wedding party in despair, after a vain essay to gain from the bride and bridegroom a sound by way of name, which any known alphabet had the power of committing to paper!" A story is told of an attorney's clerk who was professionally employed to serve a process on one of these oddly-named gentry, whose real name was entered in the instrument with legal accuracy. The clerk, after a great deal of inquiry as to the whereabouts of the party, was about to abandon the search as hopeless, when a young woman, who had witnessed his labours, kindly volunteered to assist him.

"Oy say, Bullyed," cried she, to the first person they met, "does thee know a mon neamed Adam Green?"

The bull-head was shaken in token of ignorance.

"Loy-a-bed, dost thee?"

Lie-a-bed's opportunities of making acquaintance had been rather limited, and she could not resolve the difficulty.

Stumpy, (a man with a wooden leg,) Cowskin, Spindleshanks, Cookeye, and Pigtail, were severally invoked, but in vain; and the querist fell into a brown study, in which she remained for some time. At length, however, her eyes suddenly brightened, and slapping one of her companions on the shoulder, she exclaimed triumphantly, "Dash my wig! whoy he means moy feyther!" and then turning to the gentleman, she added, "Ye should'n ax'd for Ode Blackbird!"

I could adduce similar instances, where persons among the peasantry of my native county are much better known by sobriquets than by their proper surnames; and many only know them by the former. This is particularly the case where several families in one locality bear the same name. A friend of mine informs me, that he lately knew fifteen persons in the small town of F——, on the coast of Kent, whose hereditary name was Hall, but who gratiâ distinctionis, bore the elegant designations of—Doggy-Hall, Feathertoe, Bumper, Bubbles, Pierce-Eye, Faggots, Cula, Jiggery, Pumble-Foot, Cold Flip, Silver-Eye, Lumpy, Sutty, Thick-Lips, and Old Hare.

Local surnames, which form a very numerous class, names derived from dignities and offices, from personal and mental qualities, from Christian names, from accidents, from natural objects, signs of houses, and from changed names or corruptions of names, &c. &c., furnish the subject-matter of several essays, plausible in their reasoning, and often amusing. Yet we should not suppose the author a very far-read or profoundly learned antiquary. A slight acquaintance with the Gaelic and Scottish languages would have saved him from some obvious blunders. Yet a great deal of guess-work must, in any event, go to the explanation of surnames; though one man may be a more sagacious guesser than another. A few detached specimens will show the nature of the book; which is fully better adapted to popular than to learned readers.

PLEBEIAN ANTIQUITY. — The manors of Ripe and Newtimber, in Sussex, are mentioned in Domesday, as having been, before the Conquest, the estates, respectively, of Cane and of Ælfeck. Now these names are still found in the county as surnames; the former under its ancient orthography, and the latter under that of Elphick; but were these ever used as Christian names? Ælfech may be the same with Alphage, a Saxon forename; but Cane was certainly never so used. By the bye, it is an extraordinary fact that the name of Cane is still borne by two respectable farmers at Ripe, in which neighbourhood, I have scarcely a doubt, their ancestors have dwelt from the days of the Confessor, and all bearing the same monosyllabic designation: an honour which few of the mighty and noble of this land can boast!

Mr. Lower derives the surname Bain or Bayne from the French bath; whereas the Gaelic and Irish bane, fair, as Donald Bane, is a much more probable derivation. For the names Pende and Slack, of which he queries the meaning, he may consult Jamieson's Scottish Dictionary. Pend is an arch—and generally one under which there is a passage or road-way. Wordsworth or the Ettrick Shepherd could tell him what a Slack is. We have never, till now, understood that Bucoleuch was a surname. The surname of the Duke of that title is Scott, not Buccleuch. The derivation of the name Hay is from a hedge, which is quite as probable as the Scottish current tradition of the name being given to the ancestor of the Erroll family on the field of Luncarty. In speaking of names derived from apartments of houses, he remarks that they were

Most likely first given to menial servants who served in the respective rooms. Like the foregoing, they generally occur in old records in the form of John i' the Kitchen, William atte Chamber, &c. Besides these two we have Garret and Stair, and Camden says Sellar and Parler, which I have never seen.

Sellar is still a common surname in Scotland. In speaking of names derived from occupations it is remarked—

"LE BOUCHER," says Saintfoix, "was antiently a noble surname given to a general after a victory, in commemoration of his having slaughtered some thirty or forty thousand men!" Horribile dictu! henceforward let all lovers of peace exclaim,

One murder makes a villain; millions, a BUTCHER!

We should doubt a good many of Mr. Lower's derivations, were it not certain that the same surname may sometimes have been derived from distinct sources; as that of Wight, which, our author imagines, comes from the Isle of Wight, and is hence a local surname; but which, as we presume, is as probably derived from a personal quality. In Scotland we say, Wallace wight, and the wight—i. e. the strong Wallace. There is a lively and learned dissertation upon the syllable cock, which forms a part of a hundred and fifty English surnames. The theories of different antiquaries are merrily discussed. That some of these names are derived from cock, a hillock, as Cockburn, Cockham, Cockfield, is probable; and so may others be from cok, a cook; and a third class from birds, as Peacock, and Woodcock; though Mr. Lower reprobates the cook, and denies him to the teeth of a certain J. C. N., a learned writer in that refuge for such mighty points, The Gentleman's Magazine. J. C. N.—

Quotes the Great Rolls of the Exchequer for 25 Henry III. 1241, in which one Adam Coc or Cok is commissioned by the king to superintend certain repairs at Clarendon palace, "and to instruct the workmen, so that the kitchen and stables might be enclosed within the outer wall." Having hit upon this clue, he thinks it leads to an explanation of some of the names ending in COCK, as Meacock, the MEAT-COOK (!) Salcock, the SALT-MEAT-COOK (!!) Slocock, the SLOW-COOK (!!!) and Badcock, the IMPERFECT-COOK (!!!!) . . . . . Grocoke is the GROSS or wholesale COOK . . . or, perhaps, le gros cok, or fat cook (!!) and those compounded with Christian names are thus readily accounted for. Wilcox, will be William the Cook; HANCOCK, Johan the Cook; SANDERCOCK, Alexander the Cook; JEFFCOCK, Jeffry the Cook, &c. The ALLCOCKS may be descended from Hal the Cook, unless their great ancestor was Aulecocus, the Hall Cook." Some others he thinks have originated from names of places, as LAYCOCK from Lacock, in Wiltshire, &c. &c.; others from the bird, from their being persons of noisy or pugnacious dispositions, or, perhaps from their practice of early rising (!) COCKERELL (he justly says) is derived "from cockerell, a young or dwarf bird of that species."

Is J. C. N. not all this while slily joking? Our author treats it seriously however. As to

J. C. N.'s record in the Exchequer Rolls, it is a most amusing piece of nonsense to imagine that the said Adam Coe was the royal cook. Who, indeed, ever heard of a cook's possessing any architectural skill beyond what is required in the construction of the walls of a gooseberry tart or a venison pasty? Besides, what had a cook to do with walling in the royal stables? We have just as much right to assume that he was the king's farrier. But even admitting this said Adam's surname to have been originally derived from that necessary office of the kitchen, does it at all explain Meacock, Salcock, &c.? I do not consider the question deserving of a serious reply.

What then is the meaning of COCK? Why, it is simply a diminutive, the same as OT or KIN. This opinion I had formed long before I saw the correspondence just noticed, and it is supported by numerous proofs. I do not profess to assign a satisfactory meaning to all the names with this termination; yet I think I have been successful in affixing that of five-sixths of all such names as I have ever met with. And I doubt not that the remainder might be explained with equal facility, were not the Christian names, of which they are the diminutives, extinct. Bsdcock and Salcock in J. C. N.'s list are evidently "Little Bat," that is, Bartholomew; and "Little Saul," which, however unenviable a name, was sometimes used by our ancestors. In like manner we may account for Wilcocke or Wilcox, "Little William," Alcock, "little Hal or Harry," Luckock, "little Luke," and the rest. . . . . The term, in its simple form, was probably never used except in a familiar colloquial manner, and in this way the lower orders in the south of England, are still accustomed to address "little" boys with "Well, my little Cock," a piece of tautology of which they are not at all aware. I was long puzzled with the surname Coxe, which I have now no hesitation in calling a synonyme of Little. Mr. COX-HEAD is probably Mr. LITTLE-HEAD, (in contradistinction I presume, to Mr. GREATHEAD.) What a pity it is the syllables of that gentleman's name were not transposed, for he might then stand a fair chance of obtaining the preferment of HEAD-COOK in J. C. N.'s kitchen!

From the essays on oddities in surnames, and on those derived from feelings of contempt for the original bearer, we extract this lively passage:

Names of this kind are not very numerous in England; still we have Bad, Trollope, that is, slattern; Stunt, that is, fool; Parnell, (an immodest woman,) Bastard, Trash, Hussey, Gubbins, (the refuse parts of a fish,) and Gallows, which strongly implies that the founder of that family attained a very exalted, though at the same time unenviable, station in the world! Kennard, anciently Kaynard,* from caignard (Fr.) literally signifies "you dog!" which assuredly merits a place among surnames of contempt. The same word, in a figurative sense, means a sordid fellow, a miser. Craven, the surname of a noble family, might be thought to belong to the same class, but this is a local name derived from a place in Yorkshire.

Many of the names mentioned in former Essays might be placed among these surnames of contempt. Such also, are a variety of those indicative of ill-formed limbs or features, as Crookshanks, Longshanks, Sheepshanks, Greathead, Longnesse, &c. The ancient Romans, like ourselves, had many family names implying something defective or disgraceful. Their Plauti, Pandi, Vari, Scauri, and Tuditani would have been with us the Splay-feets, the Bandy-legs, the In-knees, the Club-foots, and the Hammer-heads! The meanness of the origin of some of the patrician families was hinted at in their names. The illustrious Fabii derived their name from being excellent cultivators of beans, and the Pisones theirs from their having improved the growth of peas. The Suilli were descended and denominated from a swine-herd, the Bubulci from a cow-herd, and the Porci from a hog-butcher! Strabo would have been with us a Mr. Squintum, Naso (Ovid) a Mr. Bignose, and Publius the proprætor, a Mr. Snubnose. Cincinnatus and the early poll of the Dainty Davie of Scottish song are, strange to say, identical ideas. The modern Italians are not more courteous than their ancestors of "old Rome," in the names they give to some families; as, for instance, Malatesta, chuckle-headed; Boccanigras, black-muzzled; Porcina, a hog; and Gozzi, chubby-chops.

To this place may also be referred the by-names of kings, as Unready, Shorthose, Sans-terre, Crookback. William the Conqueror was so little ashamed of the illegitimacy of his birth, that he sometimes commenced his charters with WILLIAM THE BASTARD, &c.!

Among other names not yet mentioned, may be noticed Whalebelly, (for which with all the rest that follow, I have authority,) the designation, probably, of some corpulent person; Rotten, Bubblejaw, and Rottenherynge, a name which occurs in some ancient records of the town of Hull, and was most likely given, in the first instance, to a dishonest dealer in fish. Indeed, I have little doubt that these odd appellations all applied with great propriety to those who primarily bore them.

Mr. Lower, who has a keen relish for a joke, or for a good story, and is not fastidious, so that it "shake the sides," has enlivened his essays with numerous illustrative bon-mots and anecdotes; nor does he slip any fair occasion of a sly stroke of irony at the fond vanity displayed in surnames. Taken as a whole, the book is really entertaining as well as informing.

Guide to the Highlands and Islands of Scotland. By G. and P. Anderson, of Inverness. Pp. 720. With a Map of Scotland, &c. &c. A Second and greatly improved Edition. Edinburgh: William Tait.

Some summers ago, when Murray brought out this Highland Guide, we, in common with the host of our brethren of the periodical and the broad-sheet, hailed it as the best description of the Highlands of Scotland that had ever appeared, independently of its merits and usefulness as a Guide-Book. The authors (brothers), well-educated and accomplished men, intimately acquainted with the Highlands from childhood, have, for a series of years, literally made their legs their compasses in exploring many a glen and mountain ravine, dell and forest, hardly known even by name save to the deer-stalker, and of late years to the botanist and geologist. These sciences were among the earlier objects of the Messrs. Anderson in their pedestrian excursions, and the results were apparent in the former edition of the work. But in the present they have, wisely as we think, abstained from formal dissertations on scientific and antiquarian subjects, contented with embodying whatever was necessary in their local descriptions. They have thus gained more space to farther popularize their work; as, besides the directions to pedestrians for threading their way through the more wild and inaccessible scenery of the west coast of Ross, Inverness, Sutherland, and Argyle shires, numerous by-paths and cross-routes are, for the first time, described in this edition, which will be found highly interesting to the tourist, the angler, the deer-hunter, the grouse-shooter, and the artist. We do not recommend the Andersons' Guide merely as such ; but equally as a preparative, as a previous useful study, to those who intend visiting Scotland beyond the Forth; and as a highly entertaining work, the product of full minds, to those who wish to gain an accurate acquaintance with the Highlands. The work contains a mine of varied and interesting information, well selected and skilfully condensed, besides those details needful to tourists of every description.

* Kinnaird, as a Scottish name, is much more probably derived from two Gaelic words signifying the head of the point or promontory.—E. T. M.

The Horse and the Hound, their various Uses and Treatment, including Practical Instructions in Horsemanship, and a Treatise on Horse-dealing. By Nimrod. Pp. 554. With numerous Illustrations. Adam & Charles Black.

This is a good book, opportunely published. It contains all the articles written by Nimrod on the above subjects for The Encyclopædia Britannica, carefully revised, and tastefully embellished. A treatise on Horse-dealing, the most ticklish of all transactions, is published for the first time, and forms a suitable conclusion to the work, as a manual and instructor in all relating to the Horse and the Hound, to horsemanship and hunting. Those who care not much, or who have no particular interest in either horse or hound, will yet find it neither unpleasant nor unprofitable to gallop or course through Nimrod's lively pages. As everybody has a chance of a fall from a horse at some time or other, we give Nimrod's directions for falling as easily as possible, and averting the ill consequences of the misadventure :—

In all falls, the horseman should roll away from his horse as soon as he possibly can, lest in his struggle to rise again he strike him with his legs or head. It frequently happens that the horse himself rolls after he falls, and, if in the direction in which his rider lies, is apt to crush and injure him. Indeed, there is scarcely any hard rider who has not been thus served; but here, again, self-possession often stands his friend. When he sees the body of his horse approaching him, he frequently saves himself by meeting it with one of his feet, and by obtaining a fulcrum, shoves his own body along the ground out of his reach. Coolness in this hour of peril, likewise serves the sportsman in another way. Instead of losing hold of his reins, and abandoning his horse to his own will, as the man who is flurried at this time invariably does, he keeps them in his hand, if not always, perhaps in nine falls out of ten, and thus secures his horse. It was the remark of a gentleman to whom we have before alluded, and who (singulus in arte) was, from his desperate system of riding, and despite of his fine horsemanship, known to have more falls than any other man during the time he hunted Leicestershire, that nothing had so low an appearance as that of a man running on foot over a field, calling out " Stop my horse."

Nimrod has mooted the interesting question, Did the Ancients cheat in horse-dealing ? We shall see how he settles it. Poor human nature is indeed much the same in all ages. Our ancestors at all events will have no right to sneer at us for their superior honesty.

It would be interesting to us to be informed in what way this traffic (in horses) was conducted, generally, in the early ages of the world ; whether the cheating, the tricks, and the frauds now in practice, and so often successful among the lower orders of horse-dealers, were resorted to then; and whether, amongst those of a higher grade, the wholesome precaution of " caveat emptor,"—" let the buyer beware," was as necessary as it is at present. We know, from the history of our own country, that cheating in horse-flesh was carried to such an extent during the reign of Richard the Second, that in 1386, a statute was passed regulating the price of all horses, and which statute was proclaimed in the chief breeding counties of England. But, according to Pomponious, the law of nature allows of over-reaching in buying and selling—(what a good father-confessor this Pomponious would have made to some of our modern horse-dealers !)—and Erasmus appears nearly to sanction a license to horse-dealers in these words :—" Scis quanta impostura sit, apud nos, in his qui vendunt eques." That some rules, however, should be established, for the protection of the ignorant against the arts of the designing, appeared absolutely necessary to British legislators; and the laws relating to selling horses on warranty, have been, in themselves, rendered as protective to the purchaser, as, we believe, it is possible for words to make them.

Nimrod is not more an admirer of the helter-skelter neck-or-nothing of the modern steeple-chase, than of the wholesale slaughter of the modern battue.

" A new system of racing jockeyship has come into fashion in Great Britain and Ireland within the last twenty years, which, however in character with the daring spirit of our present race of sportsmen, we cannot commend. We think it an unreasonable demand on the noble energies of the horse, to require him to go so very nearly at a racing pace (for such we find to be the case) over rough and soft ground, instead of upon smooth and elastic turf, with the addition of having too often a country selected for him to run across, abounding in almost insurmountable obstacles, as well as, in some cases, deep rivers ; likewise under a heavy weight. Human lives have already been the victims of this practice, and, we are sorry to say, several horses have died from over-exerting themselves, as well as by accidents, in steeple-races.

Sketches of Life and Character. By Alexander Campbell. Edinburgh Printing Company.

This is a collection of short papers, principally illustrating points of character, and the manners of the humbler portion of the middle classes ; which originally appeared in Chambers' Journal, and in the London Saturday Journal. Some original pieces are added. The papers are clever and lively ; they were well adapted to their primary purpose, and they form very pleasant reading in their collected form. Their exact nature may often be pretty nearly guessed from their titles, as, The Poor Dandy, The Reduced Family, The Steady Man, The Particular Man, The Particular Man's Wife, Borrowers, and such like.

The Life of the Admiral Viscount Keppel. By the Hon. and Rev. Thomas Keppel, rector of Warham. 2 vols. 8vo, cloth. With Portrait. Colburn.

This work is too important and valuable to be huddled into our limited monthly Register of current literature. At present, therefore, we merely announce the appearance of so valuable an addition to the biography of our great British Naval Commanders, which the author's access to official correspondences, and family papers of all descriptions, has rendered unusually attractive.

A Trip Home, with some Home-spun Yarns. 12mo, cloth. Pp. 424. Saunders & Otley.

An anonymous gentleman, of the genus pleasant fellows, who has something funny to say upon every theme that either occurs naturally or can be lugged in, lately returned from the West Indies, was put on shore by the Falmouth pilots, and before he had got clear of Cornwall, wrote this big book of his travels, and could, he avers, have made it three times bigger. It is very well as it is, and right pleasant reading for those who neither look for much thought in a book, nor much specific information.

THE RECREATIONS OF CHRISTOPHER NORTH. Volume I. CHRISTOPHER IN HIS SPORTING JACKET. Blackwood & Sons, Edinburgh.—This volume, the first of three, which we rejoice to see announced as shortly forthcoming, labours under one manifest disadvantage—and but one. Nobody, that is anybody, who has ever once read the papers which it contains, can have forgotten them. We do not mean that all these four hundred pages, and the many more that are to follow, can be remembered word for word; but their spirit, their scope remain, and the recollection may, after all, rather enhance the pleasure of reperusal. At all events, here they are, in a "self-contained" volume, not forming part and parcel of a voluminous work, which required to be hunted over if one wished to refresh their hearts—to recreate their spirits—to grow green and glad again. The book is besides a very handsome one; its typography neat, jacket Lincoln green and gold. The contents are the three Fyttes of Christopher in his Sporting Jacket; the powerful but painful Tale of Expiation; the Morning Monologue; the Field of Flowers; Cottages; and an Hour's Talk about Poetry, (one of the most vital pieces of modern criticism with which we are acquainted;) Inch Cruin; and a Day at Windermere. The selection is admirable. These papers, which it would be an impertinence to suppose require to be described to any modern reader, are the very flowers of their author's mind—ay, and the fruitage too—glowing together on the same richly laden bough.

NEW POEMS AND DRAMAS.

I. TALES and POEMS, By Sir Edward Lytton Bulwer, Bart. Foolscap 8vo, cloth, pp. 215. Saunders & Otley.

II.—POEMS by ALFRED TENNYSON, in 2 vols. Moxon.

III.—THE POETICAL WORKS of MISS SUSANNA BLAMIRE. With a Preface, Memoir, and Notes; by Patrick Maxwell. Foolscap octavo, cloth, pp. 262.

IV.—THE MAID of ORLEANS, and other POEMS, translated from the German. By E. S. and F. S. Turner. Foolscap octavo, cloth, pp. 247.

V.—A VOICE from the TOWN. By Bolton Rogerson, Author of "Rhyme, Romance, and Revery," &c. 12mo, cloth, pp. 193.

VI.—HOEL THE HOSTAGE. By M. E. Jeffreys. Post 8vo, cloth. Saunders & Otley.

VII.—POETICAL RECOLLECTIONS of IRISH HISTORY. By Jane Emily Herbert.—A small and very neat volume, bound in silk, gilt, and emblazoned with the Irish harp.

VIII.—SONGS, written by ANDREW PARK. Griffin, Glasgow.

IX.—POEMS and SONGS. By Alexander Maclagan. Edinburgh: Tait.

This is a long catalogue for one brief month. It is therefore quite impossible to do anything like justice to new aspirants for laurels, who are as numerous as the Muses themselves. Besides, we have registered a vow in Parnassus, not to speak of even the greatest poet alive, until we shall be able to accord the praises due to Andrew Park and Alexander Maclagan.

PLIGHTED TROTH, or a WOMAN HER OWN RIVAL.—A dramatic Tale in Five Acts. Saunders & Otley.

SERIAL WORKS.

SELBY'S HISTORY OF BRITISH FOREST TREES. Parts VII., VIII., IX., and X.—These Parts contain the History of the Oak in its several varieties,—the beech, the chestnut, the hornbean, the plane, the yew, the varieties of the pine, and the fir. Each species is illustrated with a fine woodcut of the kind of tree described, and the work is studded with vignettes in the tasteful style of all Van Voorst's illustrated publications. Another Part will complete this elegant work. In describing these trees, we are glad to find the historian more anecdotical, and paying more attention to the history of remarkable sylvan individuals than in the previous Parts. He has given a charming history of particular oaks and yews, and other trees, found in different places of England and Scotland. He has also given much additional value to his work by the liberal and judicious use which he has made of the writings of others upon the same subject.

YARRELL'S HISTORY OF BRITISH BIRDS. Parts XXIX. to XXXI.—These Parts contain the numerous species of the Duck genus—Natatores Anatidæ, which is important from its extensive diffusion, the beauty of its plumage, and its value to man, both as food and bedding. The different species are exquisitely represented, and with the same truth and life which distinguish all the bird-portraiture of this work. The history of the duck is highly interesting, from its connexion with man.

THE LONDON SATURDAY JOURNAL, Vol. III. Conducted by John Timbs, thirteen years Editor of the Mirror. Brittain, Paternoster Row.—The present volume contains a great mass of entertaining snatch-reading. The cuts, though inferior to those of the previous volumes, have their own uses, in showing up the Exquisites among the Crows and the Blackfeet, and other monsters, vital or skeleton, and holding the mirror up to nature, as seen in our own streets and parlours.

BY MRS. GORE.

CHAPTER XI.

THOUGH the gift bestowed by Abednego upon young Annesley must at all times have been a most welcome one, it could not have chanced at a more auspicious moment than now; when, for the first time since the renewal of their acquaintance in England, he found himself banished from the presence of Esther Verelst. He was himself moreover on the eve of exile to an opposite quarter of the town; so that even chance encounters in the street were improbable; the company of the Guards to which he belonged being under orders to march into the Tower the very day following his acceptance of the miniature from Abednego.

These Eastern quarters are rarely very inviting to the young men of fortune and family of whom the Guards are chiefly composed; unless during the summer months, when they can prevail on their gay friends of the West End to steam it to the Tower, and breakfast with them, on pretence of viewing the lions of the place; and examining the interesting autographs cut in the walls of their mess-room, by Peveril of the Peak and other prisoners of note. But it was just then peculiarly disagreeable to Basil to find himself moated up with Wilberton and Maitland, whose secrets had been accidentally placed in his keeping;—or even with Loftus and Blencowe, whose insight into his own, and want of delicacy in their railleries on the subject,—he had more than once found occasion to resent. There was no remedy, however. With so little to complain of in the hardships of his military duties, Basil Annesley was conscious that it would be absurd to murmur, as an evil, against a few weeks' banishment to a remote quarter of the town.

It happened, however, that within a few days of taking up his new quarters, he was attacked with indisposition: either the result of his exertion and attendance upon the Money-lender, or of the humid atmosphere of the Tower; which amounts almost to mal' aria, and at certain seasons of the year is sure to engender a low fever in the garrison. In compassion to his illness, perhaps, the two favourite raws established for his persecution by his facetious friends, (his intimacy with the Verelsts and with A. O.,) were suffered to heal unmolested. There was not sufficient resource in the place to dispense with his aid for picquet, or whist; and the little mess-table was accordingly undisturbed by the bickerings too often produced elsewhere, by the perpetual system of quizzing in vogue in the Maitland set. Basil did not hear, above half a dozen times a-day, allusions to his midnight attempt to break into the house of the Westminster Jew; and only very remote hints of his passion for the arts. Nevertheless, the first day he was able to shake off his indisposition so far as to visit the west end of the town, in spite of the bantering to which he had been subjected, one of his first visits was to Delahaye Street. He was anxious to inquire after his patient,—he was anxious to inquire after his friend;—yes! his friend!—for how could he otherwise estimate the man to whom he was indebted for the semblance of that beloved face which never quitted his bosom for a moment of the day or night? Abednego appeared, indeed, to have contemplated such an appropriation of the miniature;—for it was set in a plain gold fausse montre, with a loop for suspension round the neck.

"I swear I am now nearly as ill myself," murmured Basil, as he drove along Great George Street, "as poor Abednego on the bitter night I brought him home here; an exploit which, I verily believe, was the cause of all my own indisposition!"

At the end of Delahaye Street he got out, and proceeded on foot to the Money-lender's door.

So accustomed was he now to the untowardnesses of that rugged household, that he did not so much as expect any notice to be taken of his rap at the door for the first ten minutes.

To his great surprise, however, scarcely two were allowed to elapse, before it was opened;—not by the rough-headed sweeper,—not by the rotund nurse; but by a stranger,—an old Jew in all the nursery force of the term,—of sinister countenance and squalid attire,—stooping shoulders,—rusty beard,—and the physiognomy of Barabbas!

Now that Basil was certified of the disconnexion of Abednego with the hated tribe, to which his name appeared to proclaim him attached, he could not forbear being surprised and disgusted at his choosing to entertain so unsavoury an individual in his household.

"I wish to speak to Mr. Osalez," said he.

"You vish vat?"—demanded the new porter, with an ungracious air.

"I want to speak to your master.—"

"To the tevilsh wid your mastersh—" retorted the Jew, about to close the door in his face.

"I have business with A. O.!" cried Basil, resolved to forestall the measure by adopting the phraseology of the place.

"Theresh no A. O. here now! The housh ish shold," replied the man. "The housh ish mine own;—bought wid mine lawful monish,—and vat have you to shay againsht it?"

"Will you favour me with the present address of Mr. Osalez? He was ill when I left him a fortnight ago, and I am anxious to inquire after him."

"He may be ted now, for vat I or any one caresh!" retorted the Jew,—now really fulfilling his intention, and slamming the door in the face of the troublesome intruder.

Gone!—vanished like a Will of the Wisp! Most provoking—most perplexing! Basil, who had despatched the book back to his mother on the day of his parting from Abednego, with only a few words of apology for the liberty he had taken in borrowing it from her room, had in the interim made up his mind to appeal strenuously to the sympathy of Abednego, for further information on a subject concerning which, at his present age, he felt himself entitled to explanation;—and the unexpected disappearance of the old man was the heaviest disappointment he could have undergone.

Under a sudden impulse of irritation, instead of quitting the door which had been closed upon him, he knocked loudly.

"Vat ish your pleashure to make dis tevil's noish at my gatesh?" cried the angry new proprietor, instantly reopening it.

"My pleasure is to offer you a sovereign for tidings of the present residence of Mr. Osalez," cried Basil, following the axioms of A. O., and coming at once to the point.

The individual thus abruptly apostrophized, coolly jerked the proferred coin into the pocket of his dirty coat, and referred him to Abednego's former residence in Greek Street.

"Fool that I was, not to think of it myself!" muttered Basil; and away he hurried to drive off, like mad, towards Soho.

Arrived in Greek Street, however, his hopes were again frustrated. Scaffolding was established against the walls;—and bricklayers and plasterers were at work. The house was let, it appeared, for twenty-one years; and the workmen knew not so much as the name of the former proprietor.

"I was in hopes they were going to refer me back to Paulet Street," said Basil to himself, in the bitterness of his heart. "Nay, without their reference, I suppose it will end with my having to travel once more to St. Agnes le Clare.—A better alternative, certainly, than advertising in the Times or Hue-and-Cry for the present abode of A. O."!

In the excitement of feeling produced by his disappointment, he even determined on a personal inquiry at the door of Verelst, which he had promised himself never again to approach till recalled by the artist; and though he had the vexation of hearing, syllable by syllable, the same message delivered to him a fortnight before, that the young ladies were "out," and the painter and his wife "engaged," he had at least the comfort of finding that Mrs. Verelst was convalescent.

"The young ladies are well, I hope?" said he, turning away his face as he hazarded the inquiry.

"Quite well, Sir,—that is, except Miss Esther, who has been poorly for some time," said the maid, in a confused manner.

"But you said she was out?"

"Yes, Sir,—that is—Sir;—the family don't see no more company. I was ordered on no account to let nobody in," said the girl, still more embarrassed; and Basil, vexed as he was, having no further plea for inquiry, had only to express his regret at the young lady's indisposition and walk away.

He returned that day to the Tower in a mood of mind rendering it extremely fortunate that his companions received him on his arrival with yawns, rather than pleasantries. Maitland and Wilberton were growing too dull to find spirits for quizzing; and finding that he brought them no news from St. James's Street, they soon returned to the snooze before a roasting fire, from which his return had bestirred them.

Esther ill,—Abednego vanished!—No means of inquiry after either!—At his next visit to the West End, Annesley hastened to pay his tardy compliments to Madame Branzini, as a channel by which he might at least gain intelligence of the former. But, alas! the Consul and his wife were gone down to Brighton for the remainder of the holidays.

By degrees the state of suspense to which Annesley was reduced, became too intolerable to be borne. In the dreary isolation of the Tower, he had nothing better to occupy his time, than to ponder over his perplexities; till he finally became so overmastered by his feelings, as to take the desperate resolution of applying to Wilberton and Maitland for information. He had every reason to infer that they at least must be cognizant of the Money-lender's removal; and at the risk of incurring their sneers, boldly inquired of them one night, as they were separating for bed, whether they could favour him with the present address of A. O. Each looked at the other,—the one with surprise,—the other with indignation. Wilberton with his usual boisterous folly burst into a horse-laugh;—but John Maitland accepted the question almost as an insult. He had not forgotten Basil's allusion to the Money-lender in Arlington Street, a day or two after A. O.'s awkward appearance on the scene; and felt convinced that Annesley must be fully aware of his family difficulties.

"You had better look in the Court Guide," said he;—"or in the Directory, under the head of Money-lender. Should these resources fail, I daresay the thief-takers of Bow Street can give you information concerning your friend."

Maitland had quitted the room before Basil recovered breath to reply. Resolved to carry out their mutual explanations on the morrow, when John Maitland's groundless anger would have subsided, he returned to the corner where he had been seated, and, more from listlessness than with any settled purpose, took up from the table the Court Guide, which was lying beside the Annual Army List, (the two classics of London mess-rooms,) and turned to the letter O.

The patronymic of Osalez was too foreign to admit of much expectation of finding it there at all. Nevertheless, immediately preceding a long catalogue of O'Shannessy's, there appeared the name of Osalez three times repeated :—

Osalez, Bernard Esq., 14, Poland Street.
Osalez, R. Esq., 4, Abbey road, Regent's Park.
Osalez, A. Esq., 74, Bernard Street, Russell Square.

Now, though A. Osalez Esq., might import Andrew, Augustus, Alfred, Allan,—or fifty other names,—Basil could not for the life of him but hope and believe that the auspicious initial stood for no other than "Abednego." There might be dilapidated houses to be bought, sold, or exchanged, in Bernard Street as well as elsewhere; at all events, he was determined that the morrow should clear up his doubts; and, accordingly, at the very time he had previously promised himself to have a clearing up with Maitland, was approaching on foot the door of a substantial-looking house in Bernard Street, Russell Square.

"What a thrice double ass I must to be," was his secret commentary on his own weakness, "to fancy that such a man as A. O. would allow his abode to become a matter of advertisement in Boyle's Court Guide."

The nearer he approached the house, the more he became assured of his folly. Not a vestige, in the comfortable, clean, and modern residence before him, of the tumble-down nature of A. O.'s habitual resorts,—not a token of occasion for a "repairing lease," in Bernard Street, Russell Square; not a brick discoloured,—not an atom of mortar displaced in the pointing. The door was varnished,—the knocker lustrous,—the steps bath-bricked into snowy whiteness, not a speck under the scraper; and the A. Osalez of the Court Guide would have become an old maid of independent fortune, in Basil's apprehension, but for the qualifying designation of "esquire."

"At all events, as I am utterly unknown in this quarter of the town, I can knock and make inquiry,"—cogitated Basil; and the summons having been answered by a grave-looking family butler, he was informed, in answer to his formal demand, that "Mr. Osalez was out."

"Has he not been recently indisposed," demanded young Annesley.

"My master, Sir, is just returned to town."

Recollecting Abednego's diatribe against the ruinous waste of pampered menials, and estimating the expenses (perquisites included) of so respectable-looking a gentleman as he had the honour of addressing at between two and three hundred per annum, Basil almost smiled at his own infatuation in persisting in his inquiries. He was duly sensible of the impossibility of the Money-lender having affinity with the proprietor of an abode so comfortable, a servant so much its master.

"I called here for the purpose of inquiring after a relation of Mr Osalez,"—hazarded Basil, by way of excuse to the butler for not leaving his card.

"I am not aware, Sir, that my master has any relations," replied the man, assuming an air of dignity and mistrust.—"I have been some years in his service, and never heard of any."

"In that case," said Basil,—"I am mistaken.—I understood that Mr. Abednego Osalez was connected with him."

"My master's name, Sir, is Abednego," replied the butler,—evidently growing impatient of so long an interrogatory on so cold a day, the chilly breezes of which had already dislodged a portion of powder from his cauliflower head.

"At what hour is Mr. Osalez likely to be at home?"—inquired the overjoyed Basil.—

"I really can't take upon me to say, Sir. His time of returning from the city is very uncertain."

Young Annesley longed to hazard an inquiry what especial business or calling took him habitually to the city; but destitute of pretext for such impertinent curiosity, he found nothing better to say than that he would call again,—nothing better to do than to slink away;—leaving the dignified butler of opinion that he had been summoned from his afternoon doze in the pantry (or more probably before the dining-room fire, with the Morning Herald in his hand by way of a screen) to very little purpose, and by a very suspicious young gentleman.

Meanwhile, scarcely had Basil reached the corner of the street, when there drove past him, at a brisk pace, a plain but handsome chariot, to which he should have scarcely raised his eyes in Arlington Street; but which, in the neighbourhood of Russell Square, assumed something of an aristocratic grace,—nay, as it glanced along, he caught a glimpse of a head within, which, but for the impossibility of such a transition,—he could have sworn to be that of A. O.—

"The old man's face is running in my head,"—said he, vexed at his own folly: "and like Sir Thomas Browne, when writing upon quincunxes, I descry one in every object in nature.—Not an old clothesman passes me, but I fancy I can trace a resemblance to Abednego!—And now to be equally struck by the likeness of the proprietor of a pair of horses worth four hundred guineas, to a man who grudges himself a hackney coach!"

At that moment, however, he recalled to mind his collision with a similar carriage, when driving with Blencowe opposite to Hatchell's nearly a month before; and the assertion of his companion that it's solitary inmate was none other than the renowned A. O.!

He had half a mind to return and verify the fact; but already, while pursuing his train of recollections, and trying to recall to mind whether he had actually seen the face of the Money-lender in the brown chariot, on the day in question, he had reached half way across Russell Square; and by the time he retraced his steps into Bernard Street, the carriage had disappeared.—He had not courage to reconfront the portly butler in order to ascertain whether in the interim it had deposited its inmate at the door of Mr. Osalez.

Moreover, he had a commission to execute for Wilberton at Lawrence's, concerning the progress of a new dressing-box, the building of which had only reached the second story, requiring him to be in Bond Street at a certain hour, to meet a workman who was to receive orders concerning the admeasurement of the compartments; and there was no time to lose.

Still, the subject nearest his heart was not forgotten amid the perplexities of patent hinges, and the shades of green morocco or purple velvet;—and after taking a sandwich and glass of sherry at the Club, and asking every one in vain for news, to carry back to the ark from which he had been permitted to escape, he sent for Wilberton's cab, which he had promised to drive back to the Tower, and prepared for departure.

"Surely," argued Basil with himself, with singular disregard to metropolitan topography,—"it would make little difference were I to drive round by Russell Square, and so along the City Road?—I feel that I shall not sleep till I have cut through the heart of this perplexing mystery."

It is surprising how vaguely we admeasure distances, when they regard the legs and horses of other people. Having convinced himself that he was taking almost the nearest way, by half-past five o'clock, Basil was dashing along through the lighted streets, towards Bernard Street, Russell Square; and emboldened by a couple of glasses of sherry, he desired Wilberton's tiger to knock at the door before which he checked his horse, and inquire whether "Mr. Osalez were at home."

A footman in a plain livery now appeared to reinforce the butler; and who having answered in the affirmative, Basil had no alternative but to jump out and follow the servant, who was already preceding him to the drawing-room with the name he had received from the tiger, up the richly-carpeted and well-lighted stairs. Basil's heart almost quailed, as he followed his pilot in this vague voyage of discovery. How was it possible that THIS could be the new abode of A. O.? All was as well established and regular as if the proprietor were already a grandfather, succeeding in name of inheritance to a grandfather of his own.

The door of the drawing-room being now thrown open, and the name of "Mr. Annesley" articulately announced, there was no receding; and struck by the unusual gleam of light within, it occurred to Basil, that the rooms were prepared for á dinner-party, and that he passed with the servants for one of the guests!

Nor was he mistaken. On clearing the threshold, he perceived that half a dozen grave-looking gentlemen were assembled round the fire-place;—one or two seated in cozy arm-chairs,—one or two standing chatting together upon the hearth-rug. He would have given worlds to retreat!—Never had he felt himself so complete an intruder!—Not a face in the room,—all of which were turned towards him,—had he ever beheld in his life!—

Nevertheless, the servants had now retired, closing the door behind them; while he looked around in indescribable dismay, hoping to determine, from the attitude of the persons present, which of them was the master of the house, to whom his apologies were due. But a dead silence had followed the announcement of his name; and no one seemed more particularly surprised than the rest at his joining the party.

At length this portion of the mystery was explained. A solemn-looking old gentlemen with a high narrow forehead, a pair of nankeen shorts and discoloured white silk stockings, many degrees inferior in external presentment to the butler, stepped graciously forward from the rug to the carpet, to announce to the confused young man,—that "Mr. Osalez would make his appearance in a moment,—having had letters of importance to answer, after his return from the city."

Annesley bowed and tried to be thankful. At all events, he judged that it would be better to await the coming of the master of the house and make apologies to him, than to hurry through explanations unintelligible and unimportant to the guests, and sneak off with the air of a detected pickpocket. He had time, therefore, to examine the apartment; which though simply was richly furnished;—with two or three striking pictures and two or three noble bronzes by way of ornament.—The conversation his arrival had interrupted was now resumed, though little to his advantage—for not a syllable uttered by the five elderly gentlemen conveyed the smallest meaning to his ear!—It was a mystery of which he did not possess the key;—being neither more nor less than the jargon of bankers and stock-brokers!

Not daring to seat himself, he stood, hat in hand, awaiting the opening of the door, and wishing himself fifty fathoms under the foundations of the White Tower, or anywhere else, rather than a drawing-room in Bernard Street, Russell Square. Had there been women present, he would have felt less embarrassed; the tact and courtesy of the sex readily supplying excuses for the indiscretion of one of his age and appearance.—But those five solemn old men in their knee-breeches and buckled shoes,—their white side curls or bald crowns,—amounted to the awful.—He would as soon have interrupted a solemnization of the priests of Isis and Osiris in the Great Pyramid.

At length, a step approached the drawing-room door;—and though Basil's blood ran cold with nervousness, his cheeks glowed with blushes as the door opened, and the master of the house made his appearance!

"I have a thousand apologies to offer you, gentlemen," said a voice which yielded instant confirmation to the astounding conviction which a first glance had produced in the mind of Basil,—"I have a thousand apologies to offer you!—a messenger from Downing Street was awaiting me on my return.—I fear I have appeared very long. But dinner will be served in a moment."

Mr. Osalez now shook hands in turn with his elderly guests, addressing to each some distinguishing word of compliment. When it came to the turn of Basil to be noticed, the young man's heart sank within him. He was prepared for a start of surprise

—a sarcastic reproof!—It did not occur to him that, his name having been already privately announced to his host by the servants, no surprise, at least, would be manifested.—So far, however, from hearing the sarcasms he had anticipated, even his apologies were forestalled by the well-bred courtesy of Mr. Osalez.

"I rejoice to see you, my dear Annesley," said he. "You must leave it to me to apologize to my old friends here, for your appearance among them in your morning dress,—my invitation, I know, reached you too late this evening, to admit of your dressing to join our party. You have shown, indeed, far higher breeding than myself,—by preferring your own discomfort to keeping others waiting."

So perfect was the self-possession of A. O. while uttering this explanation, that Basil was for a moment really posed to determine whether he might not really have been invited, and the letter of invitation missed him.

"Believe me, I had not the smallest intention of intruding upon your party—" he was beginning. But Osalez stopped him short. "I have sent away your cabriolet till eight o'clock," said he—"that hour will, I believe, admit of your returning in time to the Tower."

There was something so collected and so positive in the manner of his host, that Basil, seeing at once he was resolved to detain him, conceived that the best thing he could do for the furtherance of his own objects, was to coincide in the decision of his extraordinary friend. He had no leisure for deliberation, indeed, for at that moment dinner was announced; and on proceeding to the warm and comfortable dining-room, he saw that a seventh cover had been added to the richly-laid, round table.

Never had Basil felt more embarrassed than on taking his place!—Never had he felt more thoroughly out of place!—Those grave-looking old men,—the mysterious host, who, by his composed manner of disposing of him, seemed to possess some preternatural influence over his destinies.—But by degrees the influence of light and warmth, capital wines, and an excellent dinner, exercised their genial influence on soul and body. Basil had been accustomed to feast with the great. The tables of the Duke of Rochester and Lord Maitland, of both of whom he had been of late a frequent guest, were cited by the world as uniting all that a cordon bleu, a first rate French cook, Italian confectioner, and German maître d'hôtel, could produce in the way of savoir vivre.—But it struck him that he had never seen fish, flesh, and fowl, in such exquisite perfection as now; and it amused him not a little to hear the venerable gentlemen treat of such matters, not only with the intense gusto invariably attributed by old books to Aldermen, (a proof among many others that we derive our civilisation from the East,) but as though the city were the fountain-head of the good things of this world; and that Billingsgate, Smithfield, and Farringdon, despatched to the West End only their refuse produce, after dedicating the finest to the heavier purses of the aristocracy of Guildhall. He had not been accustomed in Arlington Street to hear turtle and venison treated of as things unknown, in perfection, on the Western side of Temple Bar!

But it was not the mere gastronomy of the dinner that warmed his heart. It was most edifying to see the grave faces of the six old gentlemen relax under the influence of that convivial atmosphere. Warmed by the stimulus of wine, such as never before had reached his lips, (the juice of the grape pure from the wine-press of the sunny South, mellowed only by the hand of time, instead of the drugged and fiery decoctions to which messes and Clubs had habituated his palate!) they soon expanded into cheerfulness;—and he had occasion to note the difference between the man of intelligence and information unfolding his stores under such influence, and the empty noise produced by similar excitement upon his usual companions.—You might as well have attempted to intoxicate an exciseman's guage, as produce more than a certain effect on the well-seasoned brains of these good livers of half a century's experience. With them, the opener of the heart and mind served only to bring out, with freer expansion, their prodigious stores of knowledge of the world.

And what a world!—How illimitably did Basil's horizon seem to expand as he listened. Hitherto his notions of "the world" might have been geographically defined as "bounded on the North by Marylebone,—on the South by Lambeth,—the East by St. Martin's Lane,—the West by Kensington Gardens." But he now heard America and China familiarly talked of as lying within the ring-fence of the kingdom of Mammon!—India seemed regarded as a home-farm by these old gentlemen; and the spice islands were their flower-gardens!—Their caravans were traversing the wilderness, like the private post of some lordly establishment. As to Europe,—poor, common-place, domestic Europe,—each of them had his courier galloping homewards from Petersburg, Vienna, Berlin—like Horse Guards' estafettes, trotting backwards and forwards to Hampton Court or Hounslow.—As to Paris, it was a toy—a snuff-box, that seemed to lie in their waistcoat pocket!

While these facts were gradually transpiring, not in the way of vaunt but the course of conversation, Basil naturally expected that a triumphant glance of the eye from Abednego would furtively intimate to him—"Behold! these are the kings of whom I spake!—the Kings of Tarsus and Epirus, of Tyre and Sidon,—these are the master-hands that move the wires of kingly puppets,—these are the mainsprings of aristocratic action,—these are they without whom privy-councils and parliaments might mouth and gibber in vain,—these are the veritable monarchs who make peace and war;—these are the potentates who created the independence of America, who rendered France a citizen kingdom,—and would do as much for the British empire, had peer-ridden England the smallest taste for enfranchisement."

But not a look—not a word—not a syllable,—implied peculiar significance or understanding between himself and his host.—He probably passed, to those elderly sovereigns, as some protégé to whom Osalez deigned to extend no more than the protecting notice of admitting him occasionally to his board; and each in succession took wine with him in the encouraging manner with which they would have patronised a school-boy at home for the holidays. They refrained not from their usual discourse in mistrust of the presence of this one accidental stranger; neither did they seek to find in him more than a listener; but continued to treat of kings and ministers in all quarters of the globe,—as so many implements for coining in the hands of those real masters of the world,—the money-mongers of its various exchanges.

It was interesting, however, to young Annesley to perceive that there was nothing of assumption or braggarty in their self-assertion. In the House of Commons, in the Clubs, at the convivial meetings of the West End, he had been often disgusted by the tone of flippancy or bullying assumed whenever the deferences of life were laid aside. But here, all was decorous as in the Upper House with the Bench of Bishops and the Woolsack as dead weights upon the buoyancy of human nature. It was the magnanimous exercise of power, like the quiet lifting of an elephant's trunk to sport with the child it might, if angered, encoil and crush. These great financial operators, whose electric wires communicated from one end of the world to the other, would as soon have thought of jesting over the bankruptcy of kingdoms, or the necessities of princes, of which they were treating,—as the Home Department would think of perpetrating a pun over a death-warrant!

Still less, however, were they grave or pompous; and many an amusing anecdote transpired connected with the statesmen or measures of the day, that might have told less well elsewhere, but derived peculiar charm from the authenticity certified by the genius loci.

For Annesley was beginning to understand with whom he was dipping in the dish.—The names by which he heard his companions mutually addressed, were those he knew to be attached to loans and other gigantic financial operations, and saw announced by the papers as having audiences of the Chancellor of the Exchequer;—men whose names, inscribed on a sheet of paper, create a railroad that is to facilitate the intercommunication of kingdoms,—an Argentine Republic, a county hospital, or an insurrection in Cochin China!

Over a dessert, the forced fruit, lime-ice, and Château Laffitte of which would have caused the Duke of Rochester's eyes to glisten, the host and his most potent, grave, and reverend Signiors of guests, sat gossipping of the State affairs of the world, as though their little synod constituted the privy-council of the universe. They talked of the politics of Europe as men talked of the tactics of a game of chess, over which they have the disposal;—of sovereigns, as if in their degrees the ivory or ebony or box-wood pieces of the board. The identity of such privileged portions of human nature was evidently unimportant to their calculations.—There was no Nicholas,—no Francis,—no Frederick William to the high-priest of Mammon; but in their places, Prussia, Hardenberg and Co.,—Austria, Metternich and Co.,—Russia, Nesselrode and Co.—Of money itself, under the august name of CAPITAL, they treated as he had never heard it treated before,—as an end and not a mean;—and millions sounded in their mouths less than the pennies, or even the pounds, he was accustomed to hear betted elsewhere. In the arguments of that singular coterie, there was matter to drive thrice as many Political Economists to distraction!—

In the midst of the discussion, young Annesley could not forbear reverting with a degree of amazement, amounting almost to the ludicrous, to the sense of compassion with which he had, so short a time before, accosted the old beggar-man of Paulet Street; and the terrors with which, in his necessity for a paltry loan of £300, he had undergone his cross-examination in Greek Street, Soho, in presence of the redoubtable A. O.!

CHAPTER XII.

The pleasantries with which Basil Annesley had been of late persecuted by his brother officers concerning his unaccountable intimacy with and predilection for the notorious Money-lender, would unquestionably have been renewed on the evening of the day in question, could they have surmised the series of strange events which brought him back flushed and agitated to the Tower, a few seconds before the expiration of the garrison hour.—But he offered no explanations; and having two or three important pieces of political news to communicate, (acquired among the prophets of the Stock Exchange,) besides an anecdote of the Dowager Colonel's having fallen on his nose behind the scenes of one of the theatres, to the displacement of his hat, wig, and proboscis,—they let him off without much severity of cross-examination, and scarcely a single reproach.

It was not till alone, and in the silence of the night, that Basil began to inquire of himself whether all that had of late befallen him, were not the unreal mockery of a dream;—whether there really existed either an Abednego the Money-lender, or a high-bred and luxurious banker or stock-broker, or bill-broker, named Osalez.

Perplexed by his reflections and fevered by unusual excess, he was unable to close his eyes; or if he closed them for a moment it was to be further derided and perplexed by the confused dreams of indigestion; wherein his mother and Esther were intermingled with the dying man in the old attic in Westminster, and the Jew usurer who had relieved his pecuniary difficulties and bestowed upon him the richest treasure in his possession.

Nor did the morning sun bring its usual comfort and enlightenment.—The more he reflected on these mysteries, the more they appeared to darken.—He had lost all confidence in his own powers of perception,—in his own powers of volition.—This strange man,—this ignis fatuus,—this Djinn,—this mysterious influence,—appeared to enfold his destinies as with the coil of a Boa-constrictor, and the capability of crushing him at will;—and under this persuasion, endured in solitary irritation day after day, the health of Basil, which had been almost reëstablished, again began to give way. He was soon confined to his room,—wanting either power or inclination to cross the drawbridge: nor was this any source of regret to him.—Denied access to the house of Verelst—too proud to seek it again,—to that of a man whom he now recognised as rich and powerful, and on whom he had the claim of benefits conferred,—he had not the smallest inclination to quit his retirement.

It was a severe season.—Though the Spring was approaching, a six-weeks' frost filled the clubs of St. James's Street with hunting men, and augmented the wisdom and divisions of parliament with the number of its county members; yet Basil was perfectly satisfied to remain day after day in his quarters.—To beguile his ennui, he took opportunity to renew, as Esther had often entreated him, his study of the German language, which, since his departure from Heidelberg, he had suffered to grow rusty. For he had been struck, at his dinner in Bernard Street, with the advantage which those puissant old men seemed to derive from their familiarity with modern languages.—French, Italian, German, were familiar to them as English; (a circumstance strongly indicative of their own foreign origin;) and they appeared to verify the axiom of Charles V., that "so many languages as a man possesses, so many times is he a man."

It was in vain his brother officers reviled him by the name of "sap," and protested that Nancy was going to advertise for a place as finishing-governess. He adhered to his seclusion and submitted to be thought a bore rather than join in pleasures for which he had lost all inclination.

The insight he had incidentally obtained from A. O. into the prospects of Wilberton and John Maitland, rendered it doubly disagreeable to him to see them indulging in habits of expense unsuited to their means; and as they refused to listen to his remonstrances, and at first replied to them with repartees concerning the views and principles he was contracting among his Jewish associates, which he was compelled to silence by a serious explanation, there was nothing for it but to adhere to his own pursuits, and pass for a churl.

Meanwhile, fatal confirmation was yielded to the predictions of his mysterious friend, by an announcement which, some weeks afterwards, appeared in the morning papers,—that,—"The Duke of Rochester, having broken up his establishment at Rochester House and Wilberton Castle, was about to proceed to Italy, where his Grace's family intended to reside for a period of some years."

The news produced considerable emotion in the fashionable circles!—not indeed the expatriation of the Duke and Duchess of Rochester, for whom personally people cared no more than for any other hospitable duke and duchess. But the loss of Rochester House and Wilberton Castle was a serious injury to those innumerable butterfly friends who had found, in his Grace's rent-roll of fifty thousand per annum, a gratuitous source of enjoyment.—As Abednego had judiciously observed to Basil during his attendance in Delahaye Street, it was no wonder that so very popular a man should become a bankrupt; since, to ensure what is called popularity to a duke with fifty thousand a-year, it is absolutely indispensable that he should expend a hundred thousand.

In a society so limited as that in which Basil was living, and which included also one between whom and the dukedom of Rochester there interposed only a couple of lives, such an occasion as this public announcement could not fail to produce frequent and most disagreeable reference to Jews and money-lenders; or still oftener, and still more disagreeably, a sudden cessation of such references, in compliment to his presence.—It was not indeed for young Annesley to become the advocate of Abednego, or take up the line of argument in his defence which the Money-lender had himself assumed in treating of the extravagance of the Rochesters; nay,—since he had become so strangely an eye-witness of the wealth and transformations of this mysterious individual, mistrust was beginning to diminish even his own partiality. Still he experienced sufficient gratitude and sufficient interest in his favour, to feel the deepest regret at finding him exposed to general obloquy.

The premature newspaper announcement of the Duke of Rochester's intended departure, produced of course the measure it purported to prognosticate. Beset by claimants who, so long as his credit laboured only under an imputation of "done up," had refrained from molesting him in the hope of tempting him to add a few hundreds or thousands to the amount of demands they were certain of establishing with legal interest against his estate, his Grace was now compelled to bid a precipitate adieu to the London world, which shines upon us, like the moon, only so long as the sun of our prosperity reflects brightness upon its face; and the original inauthentic announcement of his intended departure, was shortly followed up by an authentic auctioneer's advertisement, setting forth, in periods uniting the sesquipedalian pomposity of Johnson with the efflorescence of Hafiz and a whole column of the Morning Post, the details of a sale of the effects of "a distinguished nobleman recently removed to the continent." Rochester House, Wilberton Castle, and their heir-looms, were of course inviolable; but the furniture of the former, including an unique collection of articles of virtù, had been seized by the creditors and was now on view; described, for the gratification of vulgar curiosity, in advertisements and catalogues, with a waste of pomp, circumstance, and ignorant diffuseness, serving to prove that what is called the Public must have a prodigious portion of leisure to read and stare.

One morning, about a fortnight previous to the expiration of his service at the Tower, a fine morning towards the close of March, which might have been mistaken for a sunny April day, tempted Basil Annesley and Maitland to boat it to the West End; where the chief interest and object of the former consisted in obtaining a glimpse of the house where Esther resided,—occasionally leaving a card at the door, with inquiries after the health of the family; in order to prove that, if excluded from their society, he had not become unmindful of their welfare.

Having fulfilled this chivalrous duty, while Maitland proceeded to Arlington Street in search of letters, (the family of Lord Maitland having profited by his being quartered at the Tower to refresh themselves for the London season by a few weeks' sojourn at Brighton,) they met again at the Club, and found that they had still an idle hour to dispose of.—Tennis presented itself as the readiest resource; but on hastening to the court, it proved to be engaged for the remainder of the morning: and in order to get rid of themselves on the easiest terms, Maitland proposed that they should saunter into Rochester House, which was open to public view, preparatory to the sale of the furniture.—A crowd of carriages of course obstructed the court-yard; for if, as La Rochefoucault assures us, there is something in the sight of the disasters of our friend which is not unpleasing to us, the fact is never more strongly exemplified than in the haste with which London idlers scamper to a peremptory sale of the effects of some fashionable bankrupt, at whose expense they have been long entertained.

The rooms were crowded, even to suffocation;—almost as crowded and almost as suffocating as for the assemblies and balls of the "popular" Duchess of Rochester;—and Maitland and Annesley, who had only a short time to allot to their visit, began to fear that they should be detained at the head of the stairs till their hour was expired.—Just, however, as Maitland was expressing this opinion to his companion, Basil found himself plucked by the sleeve by one of the auctioneer's men in charge of the furniture, who had mounted guard behind the marble pedestal of a magnificent bronze figure of Mercury, brandishing a candelabrum for a caduceus, which stood in the lobby.

"Schlip in behind here, Shir," said the man, "and I'll show ye a crosh-cut into the mushic room, that'll get ye shafe through the crowdsh."

And suiting the action to the word, the man opened a small door in the wall behind him, leading into a small passage; to mask the entrance of which, the placing of the niche and statue had probably been devised.

"Another Jewish friend of yours, eh, Nan?"—cried Maitland, when, at the end of the small and deserted corridor in question, they found themselves, by passing another masked door opening behind a chamber organ, in the music room;—and while Basil attempted to laugh off the favour shown him, which he was as much at a loss to explain as Maitland himself, the men in charge of the rooms, conceiving by the privilege they enjoyed, that the two intruders must be personages of signal mark and distinction, began to overwhelm them with such obsequiousness of service that they were glad to escape into the adjoining picture-gallery.

"By Jove! there's Lady Winterfield coquetting it away with the young Marquis, in the prettiest French bonnet I ever saw," cried Maitland,—with as little interest in the master-pieces contained in the gallery, as he had formerly experienced when visiting the spot as the guest of the Duke of Rochester. "Come along, Nan, and let us interrupt the courtship!—It will be famous fun!"—

Basil, however, was firmly rooted to the examination of the pictures.

"We may never have occasion to see these chef d'ouvres again!" said he.

"If we don't,—what the deuce signifies?—But we shall see them again. Some fool or other of our acquaintance will be sure to buy the best of them!—So, there's a good fellow,—come!"

But in spite of all his persuasions, Annesley remained immoveable. Among the pictures were three or four that claimed his earnest and startled attention, from the singular fact of having seen them in progress on the easel of Verelst. Above all, there was a pair of battle-pieces which could only have been very recently purchased by the unthrifty duke or finished by the needy artist; for one of them contained the identical design of the broken bridge, (though the figures were portrayed in costumes of the middle ages,) of which he had watched the original design start to life under the pencil of Verelst!

With eager interest, he instantly referred to the catalogue; and to his surprise and indignation, found each of the pictures in question assigned to some ancient master!—the pair in question was boldly attributed to no less a hand than that of Salvator Rosa!—

"Infamous!"—burst involuntarily from his lips,—and he was about to disclose to his companion the grounds of his indignation, as a further instance of the often-reviled impositions of auctions and auctioneers,—when Maitland impelled him forward for the amiable purpose of frustrating Lady Winterfield's flirtation.

To return to the charge, or even to return to the picture, was out of the question: they were now inextricably involved in the vortex of fashionable sight-seers, and compelled to add their confirmation to the luminous truism which had a hundred times escaped hundreds of lips, in that gallery that very day: i. e. "What a horrible crowd!"

A little reflection determined Basil to postpone, till the morrow, a more deliberate verification of the imposture of which he was himself convinced; and he consequently acceded to Maitland's request when, having reached the end of the gallery without exciting the slightest token of vexation on the part of the fashionable widow, he proposed that they should escape from the throng they had been surveying in lieu of the articles of virtù forming their ostensible attraction to the spot, and make the best of their way home to dinner, while time and tide permitted.

"What a devil of a show up!" was the amiable apostrophe of Maitland, on quitting the court-yard. "I'm sorry for Rochester, because he was really a deuced good fellow. He regularly mounted me for six weeks last hunting season, when I went down to the castle with Wilberton—ay, and capitally too!—Milton couldn't have done it better.—And then, he plays the best game of picquet in England,—that is,—the best or nearly the best!—I'm really deuced sorry for him."

"I am still more sorry for his family,"—observed Basil. "His family are growing up; and it is a hard thing for his daughters."

"Ay—they have your friend A. O. to thank, I suspect, for this disgusting publicity of the sale."—

"It is not the sale for which I pity them, but the occasion of it,"—observed Basil.

"It wouldn't much surprise me if there were the same sort of crash at our house one fine day or other," resumed Maitland, pursuing as if half unconsciously his own train of reflections.—"I've good reason to know that my father is cursedly dipped; and he won't give up Newmarket!—Let what will happen, he won't give up Newmarket!—A devil of a look-out for me,—and worse still for the younger children. I've gone as far as my conscience or my lawyer's (and I don't know which is blackest!) would let me, in cutting off the entail;—and though the governor and my mother have been badgering me these three months to sanction another mortgage, as to enable them to keep up the war, at least till my sisters are married, my duty to those that come after me (eh?—that's the right text, isn't it, for the No-go of an heir-apparent?) won't allow me to make ducks and drakes of the last few acres of the family property."

Basil Annesley, feeling that his companion was excited by the scene which they had just quitted into somewhat indiscreet revelations, now attempted to turn the conversation; no difficult matter with John Maitland, whose attention,—even when matters so serious were concerned as the ruin of his family—was only too easily distracted.—The transition from the heated atmosphere of Rochester House to the stirring breezes of the river, soon dispersed every shade of reflection from his countenance.

It was some days before Basil Annesley's course of regimental duty admitted of his revisiting the West End; and a whole week elapsed before he was sufficiently master of his time to return to Rochester House.—Even then, he had some difficulty in accomplishing his object. But there was not a moment to be lost.—The sale had been several days in progress; and on arriving at the door, he found that the pictures concerning which he was so deeply interested, were included in the allotment of that very day.—

No carriages now encumbered the courtyard. There were a few led horses and grooms at the stand, always to be seen near the Houses of Parliament about six o'clock, and an odd-looking gig or two. But the greater portion of the courtyard was encumbered with carts, trucks, and hand-barrows, removing articles of furniture sold the preceding day.

The sale of the pictures was proceeding in the gallery itself; and while still in the vestibule, Basil could distinctly hear the sonorous and defying voice of Hummins the auctioneer, and the strokes of his hammer,—duly succeeded by the loud clamour of the crowded assembly on the adjudgment of succeeding lots.

Basil cast an anxious glance round the assemblage.—If the truth must be told, he was horribly afraid of descrying among them the face now familiar to him through its varied disguises; either in the squalid array of a Jew broker, or stationed, polished and gentlemanly, among the noted connoisseurs of the day; most of whom, glass in hand or spectacles on nose, were present, busied either in detecting blemishes in the works of art, or pointing out errors of description in the Catalogue, with a view to cheapening the pictures for which they intended to become competitors:—sallow dukes, whose galleries were already stocked to overflowing, —parvenu millionaires, buying their way to worldly distinction,—country baronets, who regarded a fashionable auction as an indispensable ingredient to their season in London,—a few real amateurs, ever on the field to profit by the ignorance of others, and purchase a chef d'œuvre, when occasion presented itself, at the cost of a copy,—a still more limited number on the watch to purchase objects too high in value for general competition, as a safe investment of capital;—and, in the proportion of ten to one to all these,—the usual rabble of an auction-room,—picture-dealers, brokers, Jews, pickpockets, with an auxiliary force of unmeaning idlers, to increase the heat and confusion of the scene.

Two of Verelst's pictures had been disposed of before Basil Annesley entered the gallery; and, as far as he could understand from the dealers around him, at high prices,—the one as a Baroccio, the other as an Annibal Carracci, to a gentleman who, having recently inherited an enormous fortune, was making himself master of pictures, race-horses, and public contumely, at the cost of twenty thousand a-year.

The battle-pieces were just about to be put up; and Basil felt miserably nervous at the idea of hearing described as "matchless works of art," and perhaps sold at the price of such, creations which the poor living artist had drudged to produce for the remuneration of sign-paintings.—Nor was he deceived.—The auctioneer seemed disposed to exceed himself in his premonitory flourish concerning these "gems of art,"—the pride of the Rochester collection!

"The possession from which the noble owner had torn himself with the deepest regret in quitting England," he said, "was the well-known picture gallery which he had formed with so much pains, judgment, and cost: and which it was a scandal to the country that Parliament had not purchased en masse for the National Gallery. But of all his Grace's valuable, or rather *in*valuable pictures, it was well known that the accomplished and discriminating duke prized none more highly than his pair of Salvators!"

A few of the more discerning amateurs answered to this exordium with a grunt; unwilling to hazard further depreciation, in order that the monied ignoramuses might throw away their capital on pictures secure from their wiser competition; so as to leave them without means for the prizes; and when the flowery auctioneer pointedly addressed himself to a nobleman distinguished among cognoscenti, to place the upset price of these "matchless Salvators," without receiving any encouragement in return for the liberty, it was a strange voice from a distant part of the assembly that boldly named £120.

The auctioneer affected indignation, and inquired whether he were "indeed selling one of the most celebrated collections in the wealthy capital of the most enlightened country in the world?"—upon which piece of John Bullish clap-trap, a country Baronet, touched to the quick of his patriotism, added five sovereigns to the bid, which a Jew broker in the pay of the auctioneer, instantly converted into guineas.

The strange voice from the other extremity of the room, now bid £135 for the pair; and by a dexterous compliment to the spirit and discernment of the country Baronet, this was soon raised by Hummins to £140; and a competition thus established, the bidding went on briskly, and more briskly still; till at length, the incomparable Salvators were on the point of being knocked down to the proprietor of a hundred thousand pounds'-worth of copies and broken-down racers, for 275 guineas.—"Two hundred and eighty!" cried a voice from that portion of the crowd most encumbered with dealers and brokers; and after some further sparring, to the amount of about twenty guineas, the unseen competitor was declared victor.

The auctioneer looked surprised, or to borrow an expressive Americanism,—consternated.—He had done his utmost to spur on the nouveau riche to a further bid, but to no purpose. He was not to be bullied or cajoled a guinea further.—It is probable, by the way, that the proprietor of that "winged voice," though invisible to others, as the cuckoo to an unpractised eye, was perfectly known to Hummins; for the auctioneers of London are as notoriously cognizant of the names and natures of the apparent strangers who frequent their sales, as a shepherd individualizing every sheep in his flock.

Having witnessed all he wished to see, Basil was about to quit the gallery, desirous only to certify further the name of the rash purchaser.—Having reached a table at the farther end of the gallery, on which, in the midst of the greatest noise and confusion, a clerk was making entries, he interrupted his labours for a moment to inquire the name of the gentleman to whom the lot 347 had been knocked down.

"Do you wish to purchase, Sir?"—said the clerk, without raising his eyes from the paper.—"Here, Nathan!—Nathan Herz!—a gentleman who wants to speak to you about the Salvators."

A shabby-looking individual, who was now pressing forward among the bidders in the sale that was again proceeding, turned round at this apostrophe,—exclaiming "A shentleman vantsh to purshash?"—when Basil was inexpressibly startled on recognising in this man, who was simply one of the Jew brokers assembled together in a knot at that end of the room, at once the individual who, on a former occasion, had forwarded Maitland and himself through the private door into the music-room,—and the bearded Levite whom he had found in possession of the house in Delahaye Street, Westminster, the former residence of A. O.!

"I have something to say to you in private about those Salvators," said Basil, half unwilling to address so uninviting a personage, and lowering his voice so as to be unheard by the clerk.

"Dey are not for shale, ma tear,"—replied the Jew, evidently desirous to escape the interview.

"I do not want to buy them. They have been put up under a false description."

"Yesh, yesh—no mattersh—I ashk no questions," persisted the Jew, struggling with the crowd to get away.

"But since I am able to inform you—" Basil was beginning.

"You can tell noshing, I promish, ma tear young shentlemans, but I don't know better than yourshelf!"—replied the broker. And before Annesley had time for a rejoinder, the fellow had disappeared.

"After all, what plea have I for moving in the business?"—argued Basil with himself, as, disappointed, heated, and excited, he drove back through the city to the Tower.—"The better way will be to write to Verelst, and inform him of the exact state of the case, leaving him to act as he thinks proper. Shut up in his studio as he is, from one month's end to the other, the public disposal of these pictures will never reach his ears.—Besides, my letter may perhaps serve as a renewal of intercourse with the family."

On arriving at home, and before he had time to fulfil or even confirm his purpose, a note was placed in his hands by his servant; sealed with an antique, and having the look of a fashionable invitation; yet, but for the elegance of its form, Basil would have pronounced the handwriting to be that of the Money-lender. On tearing open the envelope, he found simply the following lines:—

"Take no further concern about the pictures!—I know all: and purchased them only to expose the villany of a knave and weakness of a fool.—

"Yours, A. O."

So great was the astonishment of Basil Annesley, that he all but allowed the letter to fall from his hands!—It seemed to him as if he had only that instant quitted the sale!—He had given intimation of his intentions to no human being. Yet already, the omnipresent Osalez had found means to penetrate his views, and to be beforehand with his warning!—He, then, was the purchaser of the pictures;—he who, from his intimate knowledge of the condition of Verelst and his family, must have been fully aware of their unauthenticity; he who, from his gift to Basil of a copy of the Esmeralda, had probably employed the poor painter as a patron!—Recalling to mind the exquisite nature of the works of art he had seen in Bernard Street, Basil could not suppose that the description contained in an auctioneer's Catalogue had for a moment influenced the choice of so critical a judge as A. O.; and at that moment a mortifying suspicion glanced into his mind. Abednego was evidently, in some way or other, in furtherance of some of his petty projects, either in confederacy with, or in authority over, the Jew broker he had seen in possession of the tenement in Delahaye Street; and Annesley knew him to have been mainly instrumental in promoting the ruin and break-up of the Duke of Rochester,—first by his usurious loans, and lastly by his rapacious persecutions.—What if he had been the means of selling these pictures to the would-be connoisseur?—and was therefore eager to get them once more into his possession.

Indignant at the suspicion, or rather, indignant with himself for having conceived it,—Basil resolved to reply by a few lines which he intended to leave in person in Bernard Street; acquainting Mr. Osalez of his resolution to enlighten the mind of Verelst upon a point so essential to his interests as the speculations founded by the picture-dealers upon his imitations of the Ancient Masters.

The following morning, after breakfast, he was quitting the mess-room for the purpose of addressing Verelst,—when Maitland, who was sunning himself, gathered up into the wide window-seat to peruse his favourite Morning Post,—suddenly exclaimed —"Hillo, hillo!—you were at the sale yesterday, at Rochester House, weren't you, Nan?"

"Only for a short time."

"And what was your sapient opinion of the pair of Salvators?"

"That they were very fine pictures."

"Come, come!—no hedging!—I mean did you consider them originals?"

Basil's colour rose to his temples at the inquiry.

"Because if you did, my fine fellow,"—resumed Maitland, unable to contain himself when bursting with so grand a secret, "you were among the knowing ones who appear to have been deucedly taken in!—Look here!—Here's a letter from Hummins the auctioneer, apologizing for having been made instrumental to an imposition on the public; and stating that the pair of battle-pieces, forming part of the gallery of his Grace the Duke of Rochester, and yesterday sold as such for the sum of 310 guineas, are the original productions of a German artist, of the name of Verelst, whose works are beginning to acquire considerable value in the trade; and furthermore, that they were purchased as originals by his Grace the Duke of Rochester, for the sum of 1500 guineas, from a picture-dealer of the name of Stubbs, residing in Frith Street, Soho.—Then follows a flourish about Hummins' value for his own reputation, his conscientious discharge of his duties to the public, and so forth.—There!—Read it yourself!—Your protégé's fortune is made, it seems. I shouldn't be surprised to find that you bribed Hummins to over-sell the pictures, and paid for the advertisement!—Unless I am much mistaken, Stubbs is the name of one of the ruin-mongers who make a fool of my mother.—The very brute, by the way, who brought no end of annoyances on the family, by endorsing over one of my father's acceptances (to pay for the carved furniture of that accursed suite of moyenage rooms at Maitland Park, which I never enter without feeling as if I should catch the Plague) to your Jewish friend Barabbas—the extortioner, A. O.!"

Luckily this taunt was unheard. Basil was now thoroughly absorbed in the perusal of Hummins' letter, the paper containing which, had been handed to him by John Maitland;—and having made himself master of the contents, he pursued his original design, and quitted the room.

Little had he expected, after his long and regretted alienation from the Verelsts, to prove the means of a discovery likely to produce so advantageous a change in their fortunes!—Never had Basil felt so happy. It was a balmy April day; and he ascended with gladsome steps the stone bastion overlooking the river, fancying that he had never before beheld its usually dingy current ripple so gaily in the sun!

The spring was rapidly advancing; and even for those denizens of London, who do not divide the year into three months of season and nine months of blank, the town was beginning to wear a pleasant aspect. Flower-carts and water-carts, jogging side by side through the streets, conveyed to the smoke-dried citizens an idea that, somewhere or other, the sun was shining, and the sky, so murky over their heads, exhibiting the cerulean hue of the poets; and by degrees, the sickly roots of primroses, hawked about in baskets by flower-girls, whose faces bore direful superficial indication of the fact that flesh is dust, gave place to bunches of faded lilacs; destined to be transferred in broken water-jugs to the window-ledges of all the by-ways of the metropolis, as too potent of scent to be borne within.

Even on the weed that clings with pendent streamers to the fœtid depths of a deserted well, once at least in the day the vertical sun sheds its reviving light; and even into the most dismal lodging of the least cheerful capital in Europe, summer infuses for a moment its cheering influence!

The Verelsts were happier now than in the trying winter season. The invalid could be wheeled to the window for change of air; and the girls, when proceeding to give their daily lessons, were less exposed to vicissitudes of weather.

But they had other causes for gladness. The more advantageous bargains made by Verelst under the management and protection of Basil Annesley were beginning to bring forth their fruits. They were getting in some degree above the world; and the comfort of seeing her family better clothed, better fed, and without fear for the morrow, had done more to restore strength and courage to Mrs. Verelst than all the previous advice and medicaments of the physicians.—Moreover, there was prospect of improvement for the little household. Placed at ease by the payment of his military sketches, the artist had ventured to give once more the reins to his imagination in the completion of a picture representing the Johanna von Orleans of Schiller bidding adieu to her native valley; which had been admitted, among cartloads of works of art more or less deserving, to the honour of the Exhibition.—For the twentieth time in his life, therefore, the artist was smoothing the plumage of new-fledged Hope,—a bird of promise which, like the Phœnix, has the faculty of giving birth from its ashes to a successor fresh and fair as the one of recent extinction.

The girls, meanwhile, had been objects of unusual solicitude to the good Branzinis; who, the longer they were acquainted with the gentle dispositions of the accomplished governess of their children, became more and more convinced of the high distinctions of the humble family; and delighted in every occasion of brightening their joyless existence.

Still, these music-parties,—these operas,—these cheerful little dinners,—though accepted with gratitude by Mrs. Verelst for her daughters, were far from affording pleasure to Esther and Salome, now that there was no longer a chance of meeting Basil Annesley. To them, his disappearance from among them was fraught with mystery. They knew nothing of his being quartered in the Tower; they knew nothing of their father's letter, or interdictions; and though accidentally apprized that their former friend appeared from time to time at the door with inquiries after the health of their mother, this total change in their habits of intercourse increased rather than diminished their surprise. Salome's frank expressions of regret at his absence had produced from her parents the most chilling reproof; and ever since, by tacit consent of all parties, the subject was dropped.

The lodgings inhabited by the Verelsts were of such circumscribed dimensions that the two girls slept in a small room within that of their mother, upon whom they took it in turns to attend, by day and night; so that there was no opportunity for those sisterly confidences which, in more splendid households, are the origin of such wanton waste of time and sensibility.—Nevertheless, Esther sometimes found a moment to whisper to Salome that it was strange Basil should so suddenly have withdrawn his interest from them; just as, occasionally, Salome found means to express to Esther her wonderment whether it would ever enter into her father's plans to return to Germany; and whether, even if they went back to their beloved Heidelberg, they might not find the Count von Ehrenstein a happy husband and father; and satisfied that, by the gift of Albert Durer's sketch-book to his old master, he had dissevered all ties of gratitude or affection with the family once so dear to him.—Each sister offered, indeed, to the other such consolation as her philosophy suggested; but both agreed that Basil's voluntary absence arose from scruples of conscience suggesting the danger of encouraging sentiments of mutual attachment, which could only end in disappointment and remorse.

Such was the position of their affairs, and such the monotonous tenor of their existence,—(unconnected with the passing events of the day by even the perusal of a newspaper, unless occasionally at the house of the Neapolitan consul,)—when one morning, as the artist was standing absorbed before a new canvass, on which he was beginning to sketch, with some enthusiasm, the rude outline of a new historical picture, he was roused from his reverie by a slight touch on the shoulder, and found that a stranger was standing behind him:—a man of simple but gentlemanly exterior, who, unobserved by the artist, had been introduced into the room by the servant on the plea of business with her master.

"I have the pleasure, I believe, of addressing Mr. Verelst," said he, "whom I have had more difficulty in tracing out, than ought to have been the case with the painter of such works as those I see around me."

As he spoke, the visiter glanced towards the two pictures from the Nibelungen Lied, which still occupied their post of disgrace against the wall;—and the poor simple artist who, from the seclusion of his habits of life, was becoming daily less and less a man of the world, felt so puzzled by hearing compliments addressed to himself by a man of such courtly manners, stood gazing in amazement, as if puzzled to determine whether he were not the victim of a mystification.

"I have reason to imagine," resumed the stranger, "that a painting which I bought nearly a year since, of a picture-dealer of the name of Stubbs, (representing the Marriage of Cana,) as the work of Poussin, is in reality a production of your pencil,—and though I plead guilty to having been the dupe of my own ignorance in the purchase,—(for after all the detection of the fraud rested with myself)—it grieves me much to believe that, of the price I paid for it, (four hundred guineas,) perhaps not a tenth part reached the hands of the admirable artist with whom it originated."

"Not a twentieth part!"—rejoined Verelst, with a smile. "I remember the picture only too well.—I had grounded great expectations upon it;—but was forced, by the necessities of my family, to sell it at a moment's notice for a paltry ten-pound note!"

"Ten pounds!"—reiterated the stranger, shrugging his shoulders. "The rogue,—the robber!—I had a hard matter to get it from him at less than the five hundred guineas he originally asked me.—I have bought many other pictures of him, at high prices, of some of which perhaps you may be able to indicate the true origin, which I am now beginning to suspect as bringing sad discredit upon my connoisseurship.—With this view, Sir, I have been making strenuous efforts to discover your abode. As some inducement to you to accord me the favour of a visit to my collection, I would willingly induce you to bring with you the two noble pictures I see on your hands, if, indeed, the value you set on them be not above my reach."

As he spoke, the courteous customer began to examine with care and interest the pair of pictures, on which the disappointed artist had almost ceased to pride himself, or found expectations of profit.

"I once prized these pictures, as a partial man is too apt to prize his favourite work!" said Verelst, standing beside his visiter to contemplate his neglected pictures.—"I once rated them at a couple of hundred guineas!—But I am sick of the sight of them; and should be glad to dispose of them for a quarter of the sum."

"That were a most unjust self-injury," observed the stranger,—"particularly where the original appraisement was so modest.—On the contrary, I shall be most happy to write you a cheque for the full amount. You are, in fact, doubly entitled to it,—for I have every expectation of obtaining, through your testimony, restitution of the price of my pretended Poussin."

Verelst began to stammer expressions of surprise and thankfulness; but the visiter interrupted him with a request for a pen and ink.

"If you present this draft at Coutts'," said he, offering to Verelst a printed paper he had taken from his pocket-book, "you will find it honoured; after which, I shall ask you the favour to bring the pictures in person to my house."

Verelst, having glanced, as well as his confusion would permit, at the name subscribed to the bottom of the cheque, saw with pride and exultation that it was that of the Marquis of ——; a nobleman honoured by the high estimation of artists and men of letters.

"If you can so arrange your engagements," dded the marquis,—interrupting his acknowledgnents, "you would do me an additional favour by bringing them at twelve o'clock; at which hour, you would find a vacant place at my breakfast able, and meet there the gentleman to whom I am ndebted for the discovery of the fraud practised upon me, as well as of your name and address;—an enlightened patron of the arts, doubtless known to you by name,—my friend, Mr. Osalez."

A faint cry bursting from the lips of the artist's wife, intimated at that moment, for the first time, to the marquis, that a third person was present at the interview, and that the easy chair placed beside the open window with its back towards them, contained the emaciated form of Mrs. Verelst, to whose side her husband now rushed in consternation.

Agitated by a thousand conflicting emotions on learning the tide of good fortune which would enable her husband to discharge the obligations, which had weighed so heavily on the minds of both, to the offending Basil, the poor invalid had been unable to control the revulsion of feeling occasioned by the discovery that they were indebted for this overpowering benefit to the interposition of A. O!

LAYS OF SCOTTISH HISTORY.—No. IV.

THE INVASION OF KING HACO.—ANNO 1263.

From the ancient warrior land
Haco, lord of Norway, came,
Proud of heart, and strong of hand,
Scotland's Isles in arms to claim.
England, on thy western shore
Be not now the 'larum dumb!
Where the Norsemen raged before,
Thither Norsemen still may come.
Ostmen of Hibernia's Isle,—
Ye that Henry's liegemen hate,
Bid your mourning widows smile,—
Bid your swords for vengeance whet!
Late, from Norway's crowded coast,
Haco steered his ships afar:
Shouted loud his mighty host
O'er the deeps of Breydeyar.
O'er his ship of oak the gale
Stirred the banner's gorgeous fold:
Round the prow and snowy sail
Mythic dragons shone in gold.
Men and ships—how great a band
Through the Hebrid Isles hath gone!
Crested warriors crowded stand;
Mail-clad rowers ply them on.
'Gainst him comes no foeman there,
But, with aiding ship and sword,
Homage paying, quick repair
Mona's prince and Isla's lord.
Who shall meet his vast array?
Hark, the storm is answering!
Will the winds allegiance pay,
Or the tempest homage bring?
Wandering in the stormy gloom,
Darkling moved the ships, and slow,
While the lightning's dart of doom
Paled the golden dragons' glow.
Vain to Cumray's rocks repair
Holy priests with bended knee;
Vainly rose their chant of prayer—
"Miserere, Domine!"
Still the waters louder woke,
Sweeping o'er each woeful deck;
And the billows, as they broke,
Downward crushed the shrieking wreck;
Till the nearer shores of Clyde
Saw the mighty navy sail,
Rising o'er the surging tide,
Stoutly struggling with the gale.
Soon to land the Norsemen spring,
Gathering fast and gathering aye:
Alexander, Scotland's king,
Met at Largs the foe's array!
Near and far, with warning horn,
Swift the signal beacons flew,
Hurrying there, from eve to morn,
Many a stalwart Scot, and true.
Clad in mail from head to heel,
Hasted thither knight and lord,
But the foremost foeman's steel
Rattled on a peasant's sword.
Alexander, Scotland's king,
Guarding well his sires' renown,
Bade his willing host to bring
Seaward forth from dale and town.
Heard ye not their steeds by night,
Thundering, as he led them on?
Saw ye not at Largs how bright
Sunrise on their armour shone?
There the shout that warriors love
Burst at morning's early glow:
Heaven's tempest raged above,
Battle's storm was rife below.
Sterner grew at noon the fight,
Murkier moved the troubled sun,
And his weak ray sank in night
Ere the bloody strife was done.
Glory to the Heavens on high,
Combating for Scotland there!
Roaring wind, and sea, and sky,
'Gainst the Norsemen fighting were.
Woe for Norway's sinking band!
Darkness hid them, battle-worn,
Staying each contending hand—
Darkness, sweeter than the morn.
Go—to wailing Norway tell
Tidings of her children's fate;
How at distant Largs they fell,
Fighting long in dismal strait.
Rudely sepulchred they lie,
'Neath the cairn and rugged stone,
Where the stormy sea-birds cry,
Where the western waters moan.
Merry England, joy the while!
Homeward oars the Norsemen ply:
Ostmen of Hibernia's Isle,
See them pass unaiding by!
Woe, for Norway's hapless king!
Baffled hope oppressed him sore:
Struck by Sorrow's deadly sting,
Turned he now from Albyn's shore.
Kingdom, kin, or native land,
Sorrowing Haco ne'er shall see:
Dead alone from Orkney's strand
He, enshrouded, borne shall be.
There, upon his dying place
Wounded in his soul he lay,
And the spirits of his race
Crowded round him, dim and gray.
Bid the Pagan forms avaunt,
By the charm of Christian prayer,
By the heavenward-swelling chant,
And the incense-perfumed air!
Yet outspake the warrior king—
"Bid my fathers' deeds be told;
Let the hoary minstrel sing
Chronicled achievements old."
Now the minstrel's Runic rhyme
Runs the sea-kings' glory o'er:
Christian priests, at other time,
Mercy for their prince implore.
Thus he breathed his weary soul,
Wept and wailed in homes afar,
While the dirge of death shall roll
O'er the deeps of Breydeyar.

TENNYSON'S POEMS.*

Mr. Tennyson has here given to the world two volumes; the first containing a selection with alterations of his earlier poems, published in 1830 and 1832, and the second consisting of productions entirely new to the public. The reception which his two earlier volumes met with, was that which usually attends the creations of true and singular poetical genius of a novel order. Here at least, felt the general readers, is something new and not of every-day; and the natural discrepancy of judgments followed. Malignity and mediocrity were at hand with their scoffs and misrepresentations; those whose cowardly vanity will neither dare to hail new merit on its birth, nor to abstain from following in the wake of growing admiration, acted after their kind, anticipating that the effrontery and dishonesty exhibited in this, as in similar instances, would tell for the moment with the misinformed, and when seen in their true light, instead of being duly exposed and branded, would be consigned, by a too easy contempt, to unmerited forgiveness. But here, too, as in the case of Wordsworth, it appears to us that the small circle of warm admirers of the poet has slowly but steadily widened, that the conviction of which a few were at first the adherents is still spreading its roots deeper, and will not cease to spread, till his fame can no longer be ignored or gainsaid by the pliant majority who call themselves the reading public.

We shall here endeavour to state with firmness, but with moderation, our judgment of these poems and their author; and by occasional extracts to exhibit the ground of the conviction we entertain of his very high powers; fully conscious as we are, that, if the poems have not indeed within themselves that which appeals to the feeling for the beautiful in others and accords with it, no remarks or criticisms of ours will avail to supply the deficiency.

Perhaps one of the most peculiar gifts possessed by Mr. Tennyson, in a degree so rare as of itself to declare a true poet, and displayed in clear light through some of his earliest efforts, is the power of making the picturesque delineation of external nature illustrate the mood of mind portrayed, and help the reader's imagination to the state of feeling which the poem seeks to produce. Though the little sketch "Mariana in the moated grange" is almost entirely pictorial, yet we doubt whether any skill of words directly descriptive of emotion would have conveyed a more thorough feeling of heart-weariness and blighted hope. While every single picture is at once recognised as strikingly true and beautiful in itself, its entire beauty is only perceived in the tempered proportion in which every new touch contributes to deepen the gloom of utter dreariness brooding around us. In instances of this kind we feel how the artist endues nature with the power of speaking a new language, and forces sense to be the interpreter of feeling; even as though a material frame were perfected into becoming the entire all-expressive symbol of the mind within. We have referred to this youthful production of Mr. Tennyson, as a proof how early he gave indications of this power in a remarkable degree. It would be easy to find many more equally perfect examples in his later poems.

When we compare these with his earlier volumes, Mr. Tennyson's mind appears to have expanded in strength, in steady self-possession, in vigour and concentration of thought, and in his dominion over language, while his imagination has lost nothing of its free productive elasticity. We find more that shows itself as the fruit of serious and kindly observation of human life, and reaches deeper into the springs of human interest: fancy and reality are blended together in harmonious fusion, but the more substantial element is asserting its rights more predominantly. Were we to seek by a single term to express what peculiarly affects us in this poetry, we should say that its informing principle is truth. In this little may seem to be said; but we use the word in its widest acceptation, and include, earnestness, sincerity, openness to every touch of genuine feeling, wideness of range, far and deep insight, the firm conviction that a man has something to say and the will to say it. When we peruse Mr. Tennyson's productions it strikes us that the vital energy of this feeling pervades the whole of his poetry more than that of any other writer who has arisen in our days. It is hardly possible to read such poems, for instance, as St. Agnes and Sir Galahad without being possessed with their thoroughness, (if we may venture so far to imitate the Germans,) without owning the spell of a gifted glance that has pierced into the inner truth of things, and has there seen and made visible to us such an image of feminine holiness and knightly purity, as seems a new revealing of something true and familiar in a fuller light.

In all Mr. Tennyson's descriptions there is a masterly richness of language, which never weakens down into languid exuberance, but is more expanded or comprest according as the tone may be best in keeping both with the whole poem, and the proportion which the individual part bears to the whole. In the second volume occur more frequently than in the first specimens of the comparatively unornamented, more grave and slow-moving diction, which in their simple statue-like grandeur and compression of strength remind us of Dante. We might appeal to several passages of the "Morte d'Arthur,"—as the throwing of the sword, the first approach of Sir Bedivere to the lake, the departure of the barge; but we select from the point at which he carries the wounded king, whom his own negligence has brought nearer death, to the shore where the barge appears that is to waft him to Avilion; a passage which we think it would be hard to match with any descriptive extract of modern poetry.

But the other swiftly strode from ridge to ridge,
Clothed with his breath, and looking, as he walk'd,
Larger than human on the frozen hills.
He heard the deep behind him, and a cry

* The Poems of Alfred Tennyson; 2 vols. foolscap. London: Moxon.

efore. His own thought drove him like a goad.
ry clash'd his harness in the icy caves nd barren chasms, and all to left and right he bare, black cliff clang'd round him, as he based lis feet on juts of slippery crag, that rang harp-smitten with the dint of armed heels;
nd on a sudden, lo! the level lake,
nd the long glories of the winter moon.
Then saw they how there hove a dusky barge, ark as a funeral scarf from stem to stern, eneath them; and descending they were ware hat all the decks were dense with stately forms, lack-stoled, black-hooded, like a dream—by these hree Queens with crowns of gold—and from them rose cry that shiver'd to the tingling stars, nd, as it were one voice, an agony
f lamentation, like a wind that shrills ll night in a waste land, where no one comes, r hath come since the making of the world.

Another admirable instance of the penetrative skill which invests with a new life external objects as beheld under the light of imagination, is supplied by the following description of Godiva riding through the town of Coventry.

Then she rode forth, clothed on with chastity:
The deep air listen'd round her as she rode,
And all the low wind hardly breathed for fear:
The little wide-mouth'd heads upon the spout
Had cunning eyes to see: the barking cur
Made her cheek flame: her palfrey's footfall shot
Light horrors thro' her pulses: the blind walls
Were full of chinks and holes; and overhead
Fantastic gables, crowding, stared: but she
Not less than all bore up, till, last, she saw
The white-flower'd elder-thicket from the field
Gleam thro' the Gothic archways in the wall.

Again, in the "Gardener's Daughter," the "Talking Oak," and others, where the passion is more vivid and redundant, the descriptions glow with luxuriant beauty which might summon to our remembrance the "lavish lights and floating shades" of Titian. The two extremes in regard to poetic diction are represented by the gushing fullness of melody and imagery in "The two Voices," and the severe bareness of "Dora," which in this property, as partly in their subjects, have recalled to us the opposite modes of feeling inspired by the biblical poems of Job and Ruth.

One remarkable characteristic exhibited in these poems, of which it would be unfair not to make particular mention, is the skill by which, while the poetry never becomes merely didactic, or ceases to be poetry, it yet expresses throughout a tone of high and just moral feeling, which can in few, if any instances, be overlooked or mistaken. It seems to be one of the most trying functions of a poet that he should set forth this feeling without yet losing himself in his subject, that he should be able to admire and warm in others the faculty of admiring, without ceasing to observe and describe,—or, in more technical language, should give due prominence to the objective side of his art without annihilating the subjective. By this perfect fusion of these two powers acting in such opposite directions, have the greatest poets ever been distinguished: the deficiency on either side is so far a falling short of the truthful harmony required by the idea of highest art. It is easy to bring into great prominence the moral mode of regarding an action to the comparative exclusion of the beautiful and other features as essentially true in nature, (in its widest acceptation,) and therefore in its mirror art. This seems to be the danger to which those endued with quick and generous sympathies are most naturally exposed in striving after poetical excellence. Yet such is not the mode in which Sophocles achieved the triumph of which he boasted over Euripides, when he said that he made men as they should be, his rival as they were. It would be an equal deficiency to contemplate the sphere of human action as a material for poetical creations, and wholly ignore the existence and sway of the moral sentiments: the products would be alike monstrous and untrue to nature. We cannot here enter upon the question whether the great German poet Goethe has erred in this latter deficiency,—or whether he is always as free from it, as he undoubtedly is in some of his greatest works; but we mention his name to illustrate our meaning, as we think many readers of Wilhelm Meister may have felt misgivings on this point, and been driven to ask themselves: Is there not here, by the leaving out of sight some of the moral impulses of our nature, amid the luxuriance of æsthetical perceptions, which the author loves to awake in his readers, an unreality, a coming short of the perfect truth, which we never even suspect in Shakspeare, though he at least as fully as Goethe or any poet sees through and above his subject, not only within it and no farther. By the necessity of our being, our sympathies are all human, and we miss at once, in a work of art, any great moving principle of our nature. Even poems of the most exquisite fairy texture require the soft warmth of human interests to fill with life their filmy moonlight substance. The tale of Undine would never have won delight if she had not acquired a soul. Who, indeed, is more human, nay, more English, than the world-poet Shakspeare? While no poet is so full of strong thought and deep moral truth, it is rarely possible to meet in him twenty consecutive lines that could be taken for a portion of a didactic or philosophical poem. This wonderful Shakspearian power has often been irresistibly felt and partially described, but never fully analysed, and perhaps never may be till our mental science is advanced very far beyond its present limits.

Mr. Tennyson appears to us nobly free both from this moral indifference and moral exclusiveness. At an early stage of his career he had seen through the delusion, that love of beauty is meant to absorb wholly the love of good, and portrayed in a poem full of grand and vivid imagery the guilt and misery of a soul that gives way to it. The introduction to this poem (the Palace of Art) sets forth the moral in these noble lines—

—Beauty, Good, and Knowledge are three sisters,
That doat upon each other, friends to man,
Living together under the same roof,
And never can be sunder'd without tears.
And he that shuts Love out, in turn shall be Shut out from Love, and on her threshold lie
Howling in outer darkness. Not for this
Was common clay ta'en from the common earth,
Moulded by God, and temper'd with the tears
Of angels to the perfect shape of man.

A few lines from "Love and Duty," in the second volume, give a profound expression of a great moral principle—

> Will some one say, then why not ill for good?
> Why took ye not your pastime? To that man
> My work shall answer, since I knew the right
> And did it; for a man is not as God,
> But then most Godlike being most a man.

But it is much less to detached passages that we should appeal, than to the whole under-current of right generous feeling on which these poems rest: the sympathy with good, which, never obtrusive, is yet a pervading influence everywhere. It appears to us impossible that a man whose heart is not attuned to the finest emotions of our nature could have composed (to mention no other instances) Godiva, the Gardener's Daughter, the Miller's Daughter, Love and Duty, and Dora. We recognise in them a thoroughly English appreciation both of sterling worth, and of the beauty of all the domestic affections, and a solemn reverence for the lofty and good. What deep tenderness breathes through the stanzas which introduce the end of the Miller's Daughter—

> Look thro' mine eyes with thine. True wife,
> Round my true heart thine arms entwine;
> My other dearer life in life,
> Look thro' my very soul with thine!
> Untouched with any shade of years,
> May those kind eyes for ever dwell!
> They have not shed a many tears,
> Dear eyes, since first I knew them well.
> Yet tears they shed: they had their part
> Of sorrow: for when time was ripe,
> The still affection of the heart
> Became an outward breathing type,
> That into stillness past again,
> And left a want unknown before;
> Although the loss that brought us pain,
> That loss but made us love the more,
> With farther lookings on. The kiss,
> The woven arms, seem but to be
> Weak symbols of the settled bliss,
> The comfort I have found in thee:
> But that God bless thee, dear, who wrought
> Two spirits to one equal mind,
> With blessings beyond hope or thought,
> With blessings which no words can find!

Indeed, we may observe, generally, that Mr. Tennyson is a master of harmonious proportion in his combination and arrangement: he is never unequal, never great or beautiful only in parts and at random, but each part is at the same time an element essential to the life of the whole,—"a joint that plies its office, moved with sympathy." Nothing occurs to distract the current of feeling which the main subject requires. For this reason his poems lose more than most others when quoted in extracts: yet in order to give some assistance towards forming a correct estimate of his powers, we think it worth while to adduce a few single specimens of imagery and sentiment, where we seem, in the fineness and strength of thought and depth of expression, to hear an echo of "those melodious bursts that fill the spacious times of great Elizabeth."

> Love took up the glass of Time, and turn'd it in his glowing hands:
> Every moment, lightly shaken, ran itself in golden sands.
> Love took up the harp of Life, and smote on all the chords with might;
> Smote the chord of Self, that, trembling, passed in music out of sight.
> . . . . . .
> Where is comfort? in division of the records of the mind?
> Can I part her from herself, and love her, as I knew her, kind?
> I remember one that perished: sweetly did she speak and move:
> Such a one do I remember, whom to look at was to love.
> Can I think of her as dead, and love her for the love she bore?
> No—she never loved me truly: love is love for evermore!
> . . . . . .
> Woman is the lesser man; and all thy passions, matched with mine,
> Are as moonlight unto sunlight, and as water unto wine.
> . . . . . .
> Not in vain the distance beacons. Forward, forward let us range.
> Let the peoples spin for ever down the ringing grooves of change.
> Through the shadow of the world we sweep into the younger day:
> Better fifty years of Europe than a cycle of Cathay.
> . . . . Such a noise of life
> Swarm'd in the golden present, such a voice
> Call'd to me from the years to come, and such > A length of bright horizon rimm'd the dark.
> . . . . . .
> The lights begin to twinkle from the rocks:
> The long day wanes: the slow moon climbs: the deep > Moans round with many voices.

(Of man, and his misgivings and aspirations:)

> Here sits he shaping wings to fly:
> His heart forebodes a mystery:
> He names the name Eternity.
> . . . . . .
> Ah! sure within him and without,
> Could his dark wisdom find it out,
> There must be answer to his doubt.
> . . . . . .
> From out my sullen heart, a power
> Broke, like the rainbow from the shower,
>
> To feel, although no tongue can prove,
> That every cloud, that spreads above
> And veileth love, itself is love.

"Locksley Hall," from which the first four of the above extracts are made, is one of the most unique of these poems. In the rapid alternation and fierce strugglings of passion, and the crowding together of so much incident and character, (which, though introduced by mere allusion, comes out full and clear,) we seem to feel a dramatic activity condensed into a lyrical form. Yet with all this there is the unbiassed aloofness which the poet should maintain; and we think it requires but ordinary powers of observation in the reader to perceive the direct opposition in this respect between Mr. Tennyson and Lord Byron. Though the hero is the speaker throughout, so that all the story passes through the medium of his feelings, yet there is nothing which could tempt to the identification of the poet with his hero. The passion is as stormy as it ever is in Byron, and a pervading feature of the mood portrayed is discontent: but that critic's notion of comparison would be curious indeed, who, on the strength of this subordinate characteristic, could discover a similarity between the two, much more who could surmise an imitation. Mr. Tennyson is mphatically not an imitator. Not one of the great oets of the present day does he follow in his style f thought, imagery, or language. In his earlier roductions perhaps some resemblance to Keats ight be occasionally traced: but in his later orks he is more and more himself alone. Not at any poet, however true, is in these days likely have had no experience of something modified his own mind by the labours of his great pre-ecessors or cotemporaries; and perhaps in very w cases indeed would it be a proof of originality at no such effect had been produced: as hardly er can original genius be entirely apart from penness to impression. If we were to form a ess as to what imaginative writers Mr Tennyson as of late been studying, we should say the great ermans, Goethe and Richter, are of the number: at as we have already said, he is not the less al-ays himself. The powers we perceive exhibited "Locksley Hall," suggest the thought, Might e author wisely exercise his genius in dramatic mposition? An idea, indeed, is not unfrequently xprest now-a-days, that the age of the drama altogether past: and some writers of not ordinary bilities have tried to refute this notion. We know ell how often the prevailing notion (especially ith regard to poetry) of a thing's having become mpossible has been refuted by its becoming actual; nd certainly it is from the poets, not the critics nd theorizers, that this refutation must come, if all. Perhaps Mr Tennyson may find it worth hile to try whether his hand wields the sword to lve this Gordian knot.

Our quotations have been sufficient to illustrate e fact that our author is not one of those poets hom nothing but turbulence and unrest inspires to poetic emotion; that he has a deep feeling of e beauty which is in stillness and repose. But e is far from regarding contentment as the end of t in such a sense, as that the artist, and those to hose sympathies he appeals, should ignore the evil nd weakness that are in the world, or cease to spire after a purer and better state of things. No rvey of what is around us, however complete, can true, unless the eye itself look upward and on-ard to a perfection which is beyond all around ; unless there be within itself a light, which, as lato says, being sunlike, seeks the sun.

> The type of perfect in our mind,
> In Nature can we nowhere find.

these pages frequent flashes come across us of is forward-looking aspiration, which disclose an rnest faith in good, not the less surely because ey appear in delicate graceful lightness rather an in broad and massive outline. The poem titled, "The Epic," supplies an instance of what e mean. The subject, Arthur's Death, belongs to e feelings of a bygone age; and it is treated with noble, touching simplicity. The high pure faith hich we ideally regard as characterizing the chi-drous ages, is, in a few clear touches, displayed the great light which guided and raised their mparatively unenlarged apprehensions. This nging after an absolute good is the meaning of any an ancient form, and yet hallows the form hich to us has lost the meaning it had to them. That this meaning is deeply significant to us, and that its significance can never end, is a truth which poetry, that far more subtly than science links the present and the past, is commissioned to assert and set forth to mankind. The close to the "Morte d'Arthur" seems fancifully to express the poet's reflections upon the like in unlike which unites the more and less self-conscious periods of human progress; and its effect is to spread a rich mellowness of tint over the whole, which sets every portion of the colouring in its proper light. We quote the concluding passage to illustrate our meaning; but it should be read in its appropriate place, after the whole of the poem. The party of friends met in the Christmas eve had heard a portion of the epic poem, which its author had burned, read aloud by the half-reluctant poet, and so retired to bed:

> . . Where yet in sleep I seemed
> To sail with Arthur under looming shores,
> Point after point, till on to dawn, when dreams
> Begin to feel the truth and stir of day,
> To me, methought, who waited with a crowd,
> There came a bark that, blowing forward, bore
> King Arthur like a modern gentleman
> Of stateliest port; and all the people cried,
> "Arthur is come again: he cannot die."
> Then those that stood upon the hills behind
> Repeated—"Come again, and thrice as fair;"
> And, further inland, voices echoed—"Come
> With all good things, and war shall be no more."
> At this a hundred bells began to peal,
> That with the sound I woke, and heard indeed
> The clear church-bells ring in the Christmas morn.

We shall endeavour to do as much justice as our narrow limits allow to some of these poems, by briefly sketching their general outlines, with extracts, which may serve, though very imperfectly, to convey some notion of the character of each poem as a whole.

The Talking Oak is an exquisite creation of airy fancy, lending wings to passion. All those who find a deep delight in the rich conceits which glisten through Romeo and Juliet, and the rest of Shakspeare's love poetry, in which the very strength and purity of the feeling are shown by its not fearing to sport whimsically with its own impulses, will surely rejoice in this poem. Not that it teems profusely with fast-recurring conceits, "hues of the silken sheeny woof momently shot into each other," but the idea which is the basis of the poem is one of that class, only to be apprehended by imaginative sympathy, and hopeless to be explained by reasoning to those who do not otherwise enter into it—where the soul delights to project its own emotions outwards, to contemplate them aloof from itself, and play with them in fondness. A young lover represents himself as returning with delight to the old Oak of Sumner-chace, to which when his passion first began he had spoken without restraint and often talked apart, "until he plagiarised a heart, and answered with a voice." He will try "if yet he keeps the power"—

> Hail, hidden to the knees in fern,
> Broad Oak of Sumner-chace,
> Whose topmost branches can discern
> The roofs of Sumner-place!
> Say thou, whereon I carved her name,
> If ever maid or spouse,
> As fair as my Olivia, came
> To rest beneath thy boughs.

The quaint sylvan tone of the Oak's language through all his replies has a peculiarly happy effect in making us feel at home with this new region of vocal trees. His answer to this appeal is naturally such as will satisfy the lover.—After telling how he has for ages sheltered

> Whatever maiden grace
> The good old Summers, year by year,
> Made ripe in Sumner-chace;

He swears that Olivia, Walter's choice, "is three times worth them all:" and further he avers—

> I swear by leaf, and wind, and rain,
> (And hear me with thine ears,)
> That though I circle in the grain
> Five hundred rings of years,
> Yet, since I first could cast a shade,
> Did never creature pass
> So slightly, musically made,
> So light upon the grass.

The grateful lover entreats him further to "declare when last Olivia came to sport beneath his boughs." Yesterday, when the fair at the town had taken her father and mother from home, she came by herself,

> . . . And round me play'd,
> And sang to me the whole
> Of those three stanzas that you made
> About my giant bole.

Walter, glad at heart, would know yet more; Did she read the name himself had carved with many vows?

> O yes, she wander'd round and round
> These knotted knees of mine,
> And found, and kiss'd the name she found,
> And sweetly murmur'd thine.

A tear-drop, which crept down the old Oak's surface, and a second kiss, charm him into wishing that, as in the foregone "Dryad days," he could have slipt his bark and paid her kiss for kiss.

> O flourish high, with leafy towers,
> And overlook the lea;
> Pursue thy loves among the bowers,
> But leave thou mine to me.
> O flourish, hidden deep in fern,
> Old oak, I love thee well,—
> A thousand thanks for what I learn,
> And what remains to tell.

We must give entire the graceful picture which is contained in the answer—

> 'Tis little more: the day was warm;
> At last tired out with play,
> She sank her head upon her arm,
> And at my feet she lay.
> Her eyelids dropp'd their silken eaves,
> I breathed upon her eyes
> Thro' all the summer of my leaves
> A welcome mixed with sighs.
> I took the swarming sound of life—
> The music from the town—
> The whispers of the drum and fife,
> And lull'd them in my own.
> Sometimes I let a sunbeam slip,
> To light her shaded eye;
> A second flutter'd round her lip
> Like a golden butterfly;
> A third would glimmer on her neck,
> To make the necklace shine;
> Another slid, a sunny fleck,
> From head to ancle fine.
> Then close and dark my arms I spread,
> And shadow'd all her rest—
> Dropt dews upon her golden head,
> An acorn in her breast.

This acorn, the finest on the tree, shaken down as a graceful gift, had startled the maiden, who flung it away in the grass. The lover hardly needs the Oak's exhortation to kiss twice and thrice the fruit which he declares to be blest by Love; and he records his gratitude by invoking the choicest blessings, air, earth, or heaven can bestow upon his aged friend, whom he has found as erewhile "garrulously given, a babbler in the land,"—by promising that only beside that faithful tree will he plight his troth to his bride, who shall be decked from its branches for her marriage morn,—and with another promise that closes the poem—

> — I will work in prose and rhyme,
> And praise thee more in both
> Than bard has honour'd beech or lime,
> Or that Thessalian growth,
> In which the swarthy ringdove sat,
> And mystic sentence spoke;
> And more than England honours that,
> Thy famous brother Oak,
> Wherein the younger Charles abode
> Till all the paths were dim,
> And far below the Roundhead rode
> And humm'd a surly hymn.

This pastoral, when we compare it with the other idyls, seems to stand out from them, in containing more of what is new, yet not startling, and into which the art of the poet gently leads the reader's fancy with such "willing chains and sweet captivity," that he can at once breathe freely the charmed atmosphere around him, nor feel that its sounds are in a tongue unknown. All of them display, in union with a Theocritean freshness and buoyancy, a broad English genuineness of feeling, lit up with a lively beneficent humour. One of the points which has most excited our admiration in perusing these volumes is the wealth of poetic production, the fruitful variety displayed in so small a space. Though some poems may be our favourites more decidedly than others, there is scarcely one which we could consent to give up on the score of its being in any sense a repetition of another, and not containing something novel and original in its fashion of beauty.

A poem widely different from any of those just described is the Vision of Sin, in which a wondrous dream, full of Dantesque imagery, represents the ruin of a selfish spirit, plunged downwards from youthful fiery vehemence through the mad whirl of sin and debasing pleasures into self-loathing and the scorn of all things. The melody, which throughout is exquisitely attuned to all the manifold variations of feeling, commences with a stately, sweeping, onward movement—

> I had a vision when the night was late:
> A youth came riding toward a palace-gate.
> He rode a horse with wings, that would have flown,
> But that his heavy rider kept him down.
> And from the palace came a child of sin,
> And took him by the curls and led him in,
> Where sat a company with heated eyes,
> Expecting where a fountain should arise:
> A sleepy light upon their brows and lips—
> As when the sun, a crescent of eclipse,

Dreams over lake and lawn, and isles and capes—
Suffused them, sitting, lying, languid shapes,
By heaps of gourds, and skins of wine, and piles of grapes.

The following verses, which seem themselves to "storm in orbs of song, a growing gale," describe the voluptuous melody that, rising from low tones, as the fountain spouted, died and rose again—

Till thronging in and in, to where they waited,
As 't were a hundred-throated nightingale,
The strong tempestuous treble throbb'd and palpitated;
Ran into its giddiest whirl of sound,
Caught the sparkles, and in circles,
Purple gauzes, golden hazes, liquid mazes,
Flung the torrent rainbow round:

The maddened company started up, seized each other, wheeled precipitately,

Dash'd together in blinding dew:
Till, kill'd with some luxurious agony,
The nerve-dissolving melody
Flutter'd headlong from the sky.

A different feature of the vision ensues. We are forced into thoughts of Dante by the figurative energy of phrase, (which, except in such wondrous allegoric Vision, might appear too daring,) that represents to us the one Sovereign Presence, never seen but felt in all, symbolizing itself in the ever-dawning light.

. . I look'd up toward a mountain tract,
That girt the region with high cliff and lawn:
I saw that, every morning, far withdrawn
Beyond the darkness and the cataract,
God made Himself an awful rose of dawn,
Unheeded.

For months and years "a vapour, heavy, hueless, formless, cold," floats on unheeded, till it touches the palace gate, when the dream is broken and link'd again. The figure appears now "a grey and gap-tooth'd man as lean as death," riding across a withered heath to a ruined inn, where he alights, and in the mad glee of self-scorn bids the "lank and sour" domestic join him, and "hob-and-nob with death." The harrowing start from dreamy indistinctness into the sharpness of a dismal reality is one of the most wonderful touches of the poem.

We can quote but a few stanzas to show the tone of this world-mockery—

I am old, but let me drink;
Bring me spices, bring me wine:
I remember, when I think,
That my youth was half divine.

Wine is good for shrivell'd lips,
When a blanket wraps the day,
When the rotten woodland drips,
And the leaf is stamped in clay.

. . . . . .

Fill the cup, and fill the can:
Have a rouse before the morn:
Every minute dies a man,
Every minute one is born.

. . . . . .

Friendship! to be two in one—
Let the canting liar pack!
Well I know, when I am gone,
How she mouths behind my back.

Virtue!—to be good and just—
Every heart, when sifted well,
Is a clot of warmer dust,
Mixed with cunning sparks of hell.

. . . . . .

Drink, and let the parties rave;
They are fill'd with idle spleen;
Rising, falling like a wave,
For they know not what they mean.

He that roars for liberty
Faster binds the tyrant's power:
And the tyrant's cruel glee
Forces on the freer hour.

Fill the can and fill the cup;
All the windy ways of men
Are but dust that rises up,
And is lightly laid again.

. . . . . .

Drink to lofty hopes that cool,
Visions of a perfect State:
Drink we, last, the public fool,
Frantic love and frantic hate.

. . . . . .

Tell me tales of thy first love—
April hopes, the fools of chance;
Till the graves begin to move,
And the dead begin to dance.

. . . . . .

Trooping from their mouldy dens
The chap-fallen circle spreads:
Welcome, fellow-citizens,
Hollow hearts and empty heads!

. . . . . .

Lo! God's likeness—the ground-plan—
Neither modell'd, glazed, nor framed:
Buss me, thou rough sketch of man,
Far too naked to be shamed!

Drink to Fortune, drink to Chance,
While we keep a little breath!
Drink to heavy Ignorance!
Hob-and-nob with brother Death!

Thou art mazed, the night is long,
And the longer night is near:
What! I am not all as wrong
As a bitter jest is dear.

Youthful hopes, by scores, to all,
When the locks are crisp and curl'd!
Unto me my maudlin gall
And my mockeries of the world.

Fill the cup, and fill the can!
Mingle madness, mingle scorn!
Dregs of life, and lees of man:
Yet we will not die forlorn.

A final change of the vision leads the awe-stricken mind to ponder on the inscrutable laws which are to reconcile the moral discrepancies of the universe, and points once more to that unseen presence, to which our hopes and fears turn for rest, which is around and beyond all. Divers voices are heard speaking of the crime of him who has past from earthly existence—

At last I heard a voice upon the slope,
Cry to the summit "Is there any hope?"
To which an answer pealed from that high land,
But in a tongue no man could understand;
And on the glimmering limit far withdrawn
God made Himself an awful rose of dawn.

The poem entitled the Day Dream is to us one of the most delightful in the whole series. It contains the old tale of the Sleeping Beauty, which the "Prologue" describes as having shaped itself into verse in the poet's mind as he watched his lady sleeping. The subject abundantly calls forth the exercise of that pictorial power which our author possesses in such a rare degree; and the feeling of dreamy stillness is quite magical, which breathes through the first and second parts, "The Sleeping Palace" and "Sleeping Beauty," the latter of which had appeared as a poem by itself in the small volume published in 1830. The vivid truth of every image in the Sleeping Palace, however, charms us scarcely more than the last stanza, which utters the dim yearning after new life that still wakes amid this silence.

> When will the hundred summers die,
> And thought and time be born again,
> And newer knowledge, drawing nigh,
> Bring truth that sways the soul of men?
> Here all things in their place remain,
> As all were order'd, ages since.
> Come, Care and Pleasure, Hope and Pain,
> And bring the fated fairy Prince.

"The Arrival" of the "fairy Prince with joyful eyes, and lighter-footed than the fox," shows a nimbler movement and quicker variation of feeling. He advances on through the ground fatal to so many before him, and we tremble with him as he approaches the ordeal of his lifelong hope.

> More close and close his footsteps wind;
> The magic music in his heart
> Beats quick and quicker, till he find
> The quiet chamber far apart.
> His spirit flutters like a lark,
> He stoops—to kiss her—on his knee.
> "Love, if thy tresses be so dark,
> How dark those hidden eyes must be!"

The flash into life of the "Revival" running through the Palace is electric.—

> A touch, a kiss! the charm was snapt.
> There rose a noise of striking clocks,
> And feet that ran, and doors that clapt,
> And barking dogs, and crowing cocks.
> A fuller light illumined all,
> A breeze through all the garden swept,
> A sudden hubbub shook the hall,
> And sixty feet the fountain leapt.
> The hedge broke in, the banner blew,
> The butler drank, the steward scrawl'd,
> The fire shot up, the martin flew,
> The parrot scream'd, the peacock squall'd,
> The maid and page renew'd their strife,
> The palace bang'd, and buzz'd and clackt,
> And all the long-pent stream of life
> Dash'd downward in a cataract.

A brief cheerful glance at the king and his court is allowed to divert our curiosity,—and then all this passes away that our fancy may, in the "Departure," inhale delight and repose from the deep, quiet, trustful tenderness of the lovers, as "far across the hills they went, in that new world which is the old":—

> And o'er the hills, and far away,
> Beyond their utmost purple rim,
> Beyond the night, across the day,
> Thro' all the world she follow'd him.

In the "Moral," "L'Envoi," and "Epilogue," which are fraught with fine touches of humour and feeling, and, with the "Prologue," form the framework of this sunny picture, a self-conscious spirit of poetry dallies in playful reflection, with the doubts stirred up by the contact and contrast of old and new, and, fancying to itself a moral from the apparent no-meaning of the story, gently guides us back, without sense of jar and harshness, from fairy-land to this new world which is the old.—

These instances may in part show how near Mr. Tennyson comes towards fulfilling one of the highest offices of a poet; to say that which has been trembling on the lips of others, but yet wanted an utterance, in words which are at once welcomed as the expression full and clear of what had long dimly possessed their hearts. To our feeling, flashes of this power are more frequent and piercing in Mr. Tennyson than any young author of these days.

We unwillingly pass by, with a single glance, the wise humour and fanciful grace embodied in such poems as the "Lyrical Monologue," "Walking to the Mail" and other idyls; the deep exquisite pathos of the ballads, as "Edward Gray" and "The Lord of Burleigh;" and shall merely quote one specimen which shows how by rare delicacy of skill a single touch can at once convey a world of comprest unutterable feeling.

> Break, break, break,
> On thy cold grey stones, O Sea!
> And I would that my tongue could utter
> The thoughts that arise in me.
> O well for the fisherman's boy,
> That he shouts with his sister at play!
> O well for the sailor lad,
> That he sings in his boat on the bay!
> And the stately ships go by
> To their haven under the hill;
> But O for the touch of a vanish'd hand,
> And the sound of a voice that is still!
> Break, break, break,
> At the foot of thy crags, O Sea!
> But the tender grace of a day that is dead
> Will never come back to me.

In the time which has elapsed since his latest publication, in the alteration and compression of many portions of his earlier volumes, and the entire rejection of much which his admirers might have deemed worthy of a better fate, Mr. Tennyson has shown that he is capable of exercising a severe self-judgment, and that he has a strict notion of the responsibility which his poetic talent, like all other intellectual gifts, attaches to the possessor. This is as it should be; a man gifted with such powers should always keep a high ideal before him; but a sensitive mind may perhaps easily grow over-fastidious, and be tempted to fall into self-distrust, and so lose somewhat of its inspiring energy. We trust Mr. Tennyson will never give way to this error any more than to the opposite one of haste and carelessness. He is called to take a lofty station among England's poets of this age; let him duly regard and keep ever before his view, the greatness of his vocation.

BENTHAM'S TABLE-TALK.

THE peculiar and original views, and benevolent wisdom for which the Sage of Westminster was remarkable, were strikingly evolved in his careless Table-Talk, and sometimes jotted down in memorandum-books as texts for more expanded discourses. Many of the felicitous passages and pithy sayings which enrich the pages of his Memoirs, display so much of the inner life of Bentham, that we regret that we can only glean a few random specimens. Yet these have great value.—In illustration of the nature of Prejudice, even among those who fancy themselves far above its influence, he told the following anecdote :—

Prejudice.—I met with a Frenchman once, whom nothing would persuade, that Priestley, whom he had been talking with, was not an Atheist as well as himself; because they happened to agree on some points relative to matter and free will. Priestley foamed with rage at the imputation, but the Frenchman was not to be so taken in. Priestley, on his part, was even with him; for he would no more believe the Frenchman's Atheism, than the Frenchman his Theism. If you and I, their adopted brethren, with our recorded merits, were to go and shake hands with them and call them fellow-citizens, we might say what we would,—for the first month at least,—they would no more believe it possible for us to "honour the king" that sent us, than the man believed it possible for Priestley to "fear God."

Public Bodies.—I have observed,—it is an old observation of mine,—that no political assembly adopts a printed project, or adopts ideas to which publicity has been given,—I mean textually and in mass. They nominate a committee.—Will that committee adopt a work already written,—a foreign work ?—Will they commit a suicide ?—a suicide of reputation.—Will they declare themselves null,—inept,—incapable ?—O, no ! Individual self-love,—national self-love, forbid it.

The above is the observation of Bentham's first and greatest disciple Dumont. Every day affords evidence of its universal truth.

Rules for Conversation.—Bentham, for himself, had made it a rule to avoid, as much as possible, discussions whose results would leave matters where they were, with the risk of annoyance to both parties in the progress of the discussion. "Endeavour," he said, "to ascertain the opinions of others, who are strangers to you, before you venture to introduce your own. Introduce them not, if their opinions are so remote as to be irreconcileable with yours. Say not, 'I have a right to proclaim and defend my opinion.' What is the English of all that ? 'I have a right to give pain,—to make enemies,—to have backs turned, and doors shut against me.'" . .

"Evitanda.—All discourse tending to give uneasiness to others without benefit to self or others. Example—Indication of imperfections of an irremediable nature, as bodily defects, mental defects, in so far as incorrigible, ex. gr. stupidity, dulness of apprehension.

"In so far as indication is given of remediable imperfections, it should be in such manner that it may be seen that the motive is the benefiting the other party,—not enjoying at his expense the pleasures of power and vanity. For this purpose, let it be in the presence of no other person that the indication is given; for if in the presence of others, the greater the number the greater the pain of humiliation, which, besides the irritation it may produce,—irritation from which you may yourself be a sufferer, it is so much pain produced in waste." . .

"If the affections of him with whom you are about to commence a conversation be matter of indifference to you, all topics are open to you : if it be an object with you to gain or keep his affections, choose that topic, whatever it may be, that is most agreeable to him. At any rate, you may avoid every topic which you know, or suspect, to be disagreeable to him.

"Kind words cost no more than unkind ones. Kind words produce kind actions, not only on the part of him to whom they are addressed, but on the part of him by whom they are addressed,—understand, not incidentally only, but habitually, in virtue of the principle of association."

The following appear among other notes and extracts from a memorandum book of 1811-19 :—

"Murder upon a small scale—no : that is not good. Why ! Because we are used to see men hanged for it. Murder on the largest scale. Oh, that is most excellent ! Why ! Because we are used to see men crowned for it."

"Oppression well exemplified by anti-combination and anti-emigration laws. Anti-combination acts prevent men from earning subsistence at home ; Anti-emigration acts from earning it abroad : both join in driving men into the poor-house and suborning suicide." . . .

"If Christianity be the law of the land, disobedience to the precepts in the sermon on the Mount is an indictable offence."

"Associated Suppressors of Free Inquiry.—They are paid for supporting what ? The truth ? No ! but that which is given them to support, whether it be true or no—like the hirelings of the law, purchasable male prostitutes."

"In Britain, the ruling few are in a constant state of alarm. Why ! Because the government is a continued system of oppression and injustice.

"In the United States, they know not what alarm is. Why ! Because, not having power to oppress, they never do oppress."

"J. B.'s knowledge of the World, Whig Lords, &c.—Those who live with them, and, by describing their doings and looking at their titles, pretend to know what they are,—know only what they say. I, who might have lived with them, and would not live with them,—and who neither know nor care what they say,—know, and without living with them, what they think."

"Interest appeals to the will, argument to the understanding. What can argument do against interest ? The understanding is but the servant—the very slave to the will. What can be done against the master by application to the slave ?"

Of a witty, but sneering and satirical person who wrote in that slashing scornful style which did not please Bentham, whose great and constant aim was truth and not effect, he wrote to a common friend :—

"I am concerned for ——. That which it grieves me to see are those expressions of universal and undiscriminating scorn, which it delights him to scatter on all that come in his way, whether friends or foes. Evil communications corrupt good manners. He has learnt this from ——; but —— is an unhappy man, and is independent of the affections of the people. To be loved by men, a man must appear to love them; and for preserving the appearance, I cannot think of any means so sure as the reality."

For the suppression of Anger, he gave the following rules :—

"When cool, satisfy yourself completely of the usefulness of these rules. Being thoroughly lodged in your memory,—when any incidental provocation happens to excite anger, the recollection of these rules may serve to suppress it.

"To avoid giving useless offence on the occasion of anything you are about to do, or to say, in relation to any individual, think, in the first place, in what manner, if said or done in relation to yourself, it would affect yourself: if to yourself it would be a matter of indifference, think then, whether, between your situation and his, there may not be some difference, the effect of which would be to render painful to him what would not be so to you." . . . .

"Curbing the irascible appetite is as good a subject of exercise and boasting, as extraordinary walking, running, donkey-racing, chess-playing, &c."

"Rich and Poor.—Rich, why less moral than the poor?

"1. The richer, the more independent of good behaviour. —2. The richer, the fewer with whom he sympathizes.

"The property of the rich is in no danger from the poor: the property of the poor is not only in danger from the rich, but constantly encroached on by them and lessened.

"The small property of the poor is, every particle of it, necessary to their subsistence; it is, therefore, more carefully watched and guarded: the richer a man is, the more careless, the better he can afford to see defalcations made from it.

"But the property of the poor is of no value in the eyes of the rich: hence they conclude it to be of little value in the eyes of its possessors."

The following are among the good things of 1821:—

"Duelling.—The man who values himself on his personal courage, independently of the application made of it, values himself on that which is possessed in a higher degree by a dog, especially when he is mad."

"Solitary Confinement.—To think that by vacancy of mind mental improvement can be assured! It is by well filling it, not by leaving it unfilled, that I (in Panopticon) should have operated."

"Abstain from imagining possible evils not preventible. Example—by anticipating diseases—stone—blindness, &c. So when preventible, after the means of prevention have been settled."

"Has human life more in it of pain than of pleasure? By no means. Why? For this plain reason: because it is in so high a degree in our power to embrace pleasure, and to keep pain at a distance."

"Intemperate language is strife upon paper."

"Effects of Urbanity.—In exemplification of the prodigious utility of general urbanity to self-regarding interest, bring to view Eldon, Sidmouth, Castlereagh, Canning, &c. Urbanity does what Scripture says is done by Charity. By this virtue on the small scale, vice in its most mischievous and efficient forms on the largest scale, to what a degree may it not be covered from opprobrium."

Saints.—"If, to be an Anti-slavist is to be a saint, saintship for me!—I am a saint!

"I should like to invite a Yankee and a negro, a lord and a beggar, to my table."

Another sort of Saints.—"There are many religious people who had rather see men miserable than innoxious. Unhappiness is the instrument by which they would make us angels; but the brutes are often interested in corruptions—out of them they gain influence and reputation."

Antiquarianism.—"Antiquarianism is the natural resource of aristocracy. All its memorials are monarchical and aristocratic." . . . . .

"De mortuis nil nisi bonum.—This maxim is one of the inventions of despotism: it perpetuates misrepresentation of the ruling few at the expense of the subject many; it employs suppression instead of open lying, for the purpose of deception; it would shield depredation and oppression from exposure; and when it is too late to prevent misdoings by present punishment, would protect the misdoers even against future denunciation and judgment. Aristocracy gets all the benefit of the maxim; for the poor are never honoured with unqualified posthumous praise. And thus, the world bestows its foolish confidence on those who always betray it. Thus, all distinctions are levelled, but those of wealth and prosperity. Thus, the fallacy becomes an instrument in the hand of tyranny. Thus, in the two Houses of Parliament men are always flattering one another: the most opulent, the most extravagant, and thence the most rapacious. Witness kings, who get the greatest portion of this flattery; and in the same spirit judges are always for punishing, with the greatest severity, those who utter anything to the disadvantage of kings."

Revenge.—"Revenge is a dear-bought, uneconomical pleasure. It purchases everlasting hatred at the price of a moment's gratification. Consider when a wrong has been done, if exposure would prevent its repetition. If so, it is an act of self-regarding prudence; but the exposure should be temperate, prudent, and appropriate to the occasion."

Bred a lawyer, and early abandoning the profession, Bentham entertained throughout life a most hearty and uncompromising hatred of lawyers, as well as of the existing system of laws. Of this, his friends, many of whom were of the legal profession, were quite aware. Writing him from Edinburgh in 1793, his valued friend Romilly remarks:—"I am passing my time very pleasantly here in a society, principally, however, which you would not at all relish—lawyers." Romilly's account of the Trial of Muir then going on, was not calculated to exalt the profession in any man's eyes. On one occasion we find Bentham saying:

"In Homer, Menelaus is asked whether he was a pirate or a robber! To suppose that a man had advanced himself by force was not taken amiss. In these days it is no reproach to ask, 'Are you a lawyer?'—which is to say, Have you advanced yourself by fraud? But the time will come when it will be as disreputable to have made way by the arts of the lawyer, as it is now considered to have made way by the arts of the thief."

He at one time interested himself in obtaining justice for a widow, who, through her husband, had some claim on the Russian Government; of which case it is said:—

The parties originally consulted had been endeavouring to involve the widow in law proceedings—had incurred expenses—and had been intriguing to get money for law charges, and for compliments, and for secret management. To all this Bentham would not listen. "Not a doit shall they have," he writes, "but what they shall have is a letter declining their plans of management, with all possible civility." . . . .

"Malice is a murderous instrument in the hands of a cursed lawyer, by which he may commit his murders in the name of law."

"Law and Lawyers.—The Roman law is a parcel of dissertations badly drawn up: the views of the Roman lawyers were, however, more expanded than the views of the English lawyers."

"Wherever you see the word void, there is rascality for the cursed lawyers—and this in all its conjunctions. It is a sacrifice of the ends of justice to the ends of judicature: so nullity,—so badness."

"Simple taxation to the amount of the sinister benefit of the lawyers, would be as nothing in comparison to the present evil: it would be merely depredation to the amount, without denial of justice."

"The late Francis Horner mentioned to me (1806) a case he knew of, in which thirteen representations, one after another, were made to the Lord Ordinary. Representations are papers put in merely for delay, in the same form of words, and there is a fee on each to the Judge's clerk. What is any such representation but a bribe? What does bribery lose of its baseness by being unpunishable?"

"What can be done with lawyers? Hold up rascality, and what then? Demonstrate, and you get no answer,—but if there be the slightest flaw in your arguments, it is laid hold of, and becomes an object of public attention."

"Pleadings are a most perfect nuisance,—to be expunged altogether: written pleadings are of no more use in a court than they would be in a necessary-house.

Now, suppose this system were applied to the evidence given before the House of Commons: they would have to wait one year for every answer, and the answer would have to wait another year for elucidation."

The Christianity of professing Christians.—"How little do Christians care about the commands of Christianity. Was ever a text more clear than that, 'Swear not at all,'—but it has been cavilled away by glosses and meanings which in no other case would be listened to for a minute."

"Utility was an unfortunately chosen word. The idea it gives is a vague one. Dumont insists on retaining the word. He is bigoted, old, and indisposed to adopt what is new, even though it should be better."

Public Abuses, and Public Men.—"In England, the most expensive plan is always preferred: 1st, because economy would set a bad example; 2d, because ignorance has no means of judging but from expense." . . .

Speaking of public men, hostile to good government, Bentham said: "The enemies of the people may be divided into two classes. The depredationists, whose love of themselves is stronger than their hatred to others; and the oppressionists, whose hatred to others is stronger than their love of themselves." . . .

"Precedent.—The habit of taking it for a rule in the practice of the legislature, is an expedient employed for supporting abuse against utility and reason: precedent being an avowed substitute for reason, and all precedents the results of the predominance of the sinister interests of the ruling few."

"For a share of power, a man will do many a bad thing which he would scarcely do for any sum of money. Why? Because in what he does for the power, there are so many to give him countenance and support." . .

"While the Government punish lies that make against them, they have full impunity for lies that make for them."

"Despotism punishes the vices which itself engenders: it creates the crime, and inflicts the penalty."

"Under libel law, whatever is done for the safety, for the liberty, for the morality of the people, depends for its efficacy on the weakness of the law."

"Every act of support to a constitution, in which corruption is the instrument of Government, is an act of accessaryship to every instance of obsequiousness to corruptive influence."

Abuses.—"Every abuse receives support from every other abuse."

"In this country, justice is sold, and dearly sold,—and it is denied to him who cannot disburse the price at which it is purchased.

"The expenses of suits should be defrayed by those who are in the wrong. They should fall heavily on those who are in the wrong with evil consciousness—and lightly on those who are mistakenly wrong.

"But now, the evils of expense are added to the wrongs of the injured; and injustice holds in its hands instruments of boundless vexation.

"Under a proper system, a small part of the expenses incurred in litigation would defray all the costs of justice."

Advice to Jurymen.—"My advice to jurymen is plain and unmisunderstandable, and nothing can be easier than to follow it. Examine the indictment, and if in any part there be any assertion that is either notoriously false or not proved to be true, do not join in declaring it to be true, but say, Not Guilty."

To return to individuals from opinions;—of Ricardo he said:—

"I was the spiritual father of Mill, and Mill was the spiritual father of Ricardo: so that Ricardo was my spiritual grandson.

"I was often tête-à-tête with Ricardo. He would borrow a sixpenny book instead of buying it. There was an épanchement between us. We used to walk together in Hyde Park, and he reported to me what passed in the House of Commons. He had several times intended to quote the 'Fragment;' but his courage failed him, as he told me.

"In Ricardo's book on Rent, there is a want of logic. I wanted him to correct it in these particulars; but he was not conscious of it, and Mill was not desirous. He confounded cost with value. Considering our intercourse, it was natural he should give me a copy of his book—the devil a bit!"

Of Buonaparte, Bolivar, and all men of their stamp, Bentham entertained the opinion which may be inferred from his cast of mind; but he was willing to make use of any man as an instrument of good;—of promoting the knowledge and operation of the "greatest-happiness principle."

With a slight notice of the more remarkable traits of this eminent person which Dr. Bowring has described, we must bring this paper to a close. From the portion of the Memoirs which appeared originally in Tait's Magazine, it will be remembered that, at a comparatively early period of life, he formed a strong attachment to a young lady whom he met at Bowood, the seat of the Marquis of Lansdowne. He was then in his thirty-fourth year, and the lady very young. As she is still alive, Dr. Bowring has withheld the name; but there is no great difficulty in the way of those bent on the discovery spelling it out. She was then at that age when the romping of the girl still gives impunity to the pranks of the flirt or of the incipient coquette; and in her own words, she was, while in her tenderest teens, accused by her friends of loving to play with the philosopher approaching middle-age, "as a cat does with a mouse." The attachment had never, it appears, been in any degree returned by her, although she remained single. After an estrangement of many years, the parties chanced by accident to meet again, and Bentham, now bordering on sixty, felt his first flame revive in all its original strength, and renewed his addresses. Her reply to his proposal of marriage, though decidedly unfavourable, does infinite honour to her understanding. As Bentham became older, this one affection seemed to take stronger possession of his heart, or—dare we say it?—of his memory; and, after the ice was broken, he often talked to Dr. Bowring of those early "love passages" where all the love seems to have been on the one side, all the fun and merry malice on the other. The love-letter of an octogenarian, the sentimental vein of Jeremy Bentham, does however excite curiosity; and also move tender and respectful emotions. We should not envy the feelings of those in whom the perusal of this letter could excite the sense of the ridiculous.

"I am alive: more than two months advanced in my 80th year—more lively than when you presented me, in ceremony, with the flower in the green lane. Since that day, not a single one has passed, (not to speak of nights,) in which you have not engrossed more of my thoughts than I could have wished. Yet, take me for all in all, I am more lively now than then—walking, though only for a few minutes, and for health sake, more briskly than most young men whom you see—not unfrequently running.

"In the enclosed scrap there are a few lines, which I think you will read with pleasure.

"I have still the pianoforte harpsichord, on which you played at Bowood: as an instrument, though no longer useful, it is still curious; as an article of furniture, not unhandsome; as a legacy, will you accept it?

"I have a ring, with some of my snow-white hair in it, and my profile, which everybody says is like. At my death, you will have such another: should you come to want, it will be worth a good sovereign to you.

"You will not, I hope, be ashamed of me.

"The last letter I received from Spanish America, (it was in the present year,) I was styled Legislador del Mundo, and petitioned for a Code of Laws. It was from the man to whom that charge was committed by the legislature of his country—Guatemala.

"Every minute of my life has been long counted: and now I am plagued with remorse at the minutes which I have suffered you to steal from me. In proportion as I am a friend to mankind, (if such I am, as I endeavour to be,) you, if within my reach, would be an enemy.

"I have, for some years past, had a plan for building a harem in my garden, upon the Panopticon principle. The Premiership waits your acceptance; a few years hence, when I am a little more at leisure than at present, will be the time for executing it.

"For these many years I have been invisible to all men, (not to speak of women,) but for special reasons. I have lost absolutely all smell; as much as possible all taste, and swarm with petty infirmities. But it seems as if they ensured me against serious ones. I am, still am I gay, eminently so, and 'the cause of gaiety in other men.'

"Oh, what an old fool am I, after all, not to leave off, since I can, till the paper will hold no more. This you have done at sixty, and at half six miles distance. What would you have done present, and at sixteen?"

This letter drew forth no response.

Of Bentham's personal appearance and habits it is said:—

The striking resemblance between the persons of Franklin and Bentham has been often noticed. Of the two, perhaps, the expression of Bentham's countenance was the more benign. Each remarkable for profound sagacity, Bentham was scarcely less so for a perpetual playfulness of manner and of expression. Few men were so sportive,—so amusing as Bentham,—none ever tempered more delightfully his wisdom with his wit. Of the wisdom that is called worldly, Franklin had, no doubt, a larger share,—for he had been a great actor as well as a great writer,—and had been engaged in the most interesting parts of the most remarkable events of his day. He was made of sterner stuff than Bentham. He lived in the eye of the world, and had to accommodate his outer man to the world's usages,—but Bentham avoided the rush and the shock of men. . . . . The manners of Bentham were polished in the highest degree. He was observant of all the minutia of courtesy. Every little object of desire that he could procure for his visiters he invariably procured,—the little enjoyments which he had discovered were acceptable to particular guests, were unostentatiously placed before them. His table was excellently served. He himself greatly delighted in its moderate luxuries. He began with the dessert, as he said he wholly lost the flavour of the fruit if he partook of it after the stronger viands of the first course. In the latter part of his life the sense of taste was nearly destroyed. He drank half a glass of Madeira wine daily. I believe he passed through life without a single act of intemperance. . . . . Bentham's dress was peculiar out of doors. He ordinarily wore a narrow-rimmed straw-hat; from under which his long white hair fell on his shoulders, or was blown about by the winds. He had a plain brown coat, cut in the quaker style—light-brown cassimere breeches, over whose knees outside he usually exhibited a pair of white worsted stockings—list shoes he almost invariably used; and his hands were generally covered with merino-lined leather gloves. His neck was bare: he never went out without his stick "Dapple" for a companion. He walked, or rather trotted, as if he were impatient for exercise; but often stopped suddenly for purposes of conversation. He was remarkable for attention to all that the French mean by their petits morale: a model of neatness and propriety himself, any the slightest deviation from good manners excited his attention, and almost always led to some playful criticism, not likely to be forgotten; for in lesser, as in greater things, he had adopted for his maxim—that a moralist, like a surgeon, should never wound but to heal.

For some years, Bentham's faculties had, we should conclude, been sinking, though his biographer gives no hint of this, and from proximity, and constant intercourse, might not have been sensible that so comprehensive and acute a mind could decay. But for some months before his death, Bentham, who had been anticipating the event, was quite conscious of the failure of his memory, and the decay of other faculties. He expired on the 6th of June, 1832. "It was an imperceptible dying." "Life faded into Death as the twilight blends the day with darkness." A brief, affectionate, and well-written summary of the personal character of his illustrious friend closes Dr. Bowring's labour of love.

MUSIC.

I SPEAK in Morn's first breath to the opening flow'rs,
Warble a promise of the coming sun;
At noon I softly sigh 'midst summer bow'rs,
And chant Day's requiem when her course is run.

I am the gentle voice of murmuring waves,
As with slow measured pace they kiss the shore;
And I, deep hid in Ocean's darkest caves,
Rave 'midst the storm, and fiercest fury pour.

The dashing torrent owes to me its spell,
Lulling the senses by its solemn roar;
O'er the still lake, and in the deepest dell,
There am I felt too, with my magic power.

The graceful Poplar loves to call me Friend;
For I delight its lofty hymn to breathe,
The varied language of the trees to blend,
And with their garlands my glad brow to wreathe.

The measured cadence of the matchless oak,
Nor less the trembling Aspen's sweeter strain,
Are but the melody with which I spoke
Our Maker's praise, ere man began his reign.

In early Spring in every breeze I laugh;
List to yon wood-note, doubt not I am there;
I, with the wild bee, Nectar stoop to quaff,
And as we rise, my song salutes the air.

I can to maiden's cheek the pale blush call,
When her fond ear detects loved footsteps near;
And o'er her heart in softest echoes fall,
As with low accents, I dispel all fear.

Mine is the varied might to reign a Queen,
O'er mystic Memory, and her hallowed stores;
And by a touch wake Fancy's wildest dream,
Or change to Sadness the erst smiling hours.

And not on Earth alone, my power I wield,
For Heaven's pure arch resounds to my high strain;
And when that hour shall come when worlds shall yield
Their empire, power, their being, and their fame,
To Him who gave them; then while elements dissolve,
And sea gives up her dead, I'll wake a song,
Shall drown the crash of worlds, and swell through ceaseless ages.

SUMMER READING.—THE NEW NOVELS.

(Concluded from our July No.)

MR. JAMES' MORLEY ERNSTEIN.

Morley Ernstein, Mr. James's new fiction, differs essentially from any work that we have previously seen from his pen. We are not however acquainted with one half of the voluminous works of a writer who might not only stock a circulating library, but keep it going. Morley Ernstein is not an historical romance. Though romantic enough in incident, and also in character, it is more like the modern novel of passion and character,—more like Bulwer's Tales; and, to our feeling at least, more truthful and impressive than its author's historical compositions. Those shadowy personages which appear before the reader as the assumed true beings of history, generally prove, unless he who calls them up wields potent spells, blank or unsatisfactory characters. With personages avowedly fictitious, there is less difficulty. In their case, the reader is not required to surrender anything, or to make any compromise between Hume and Clarendon, and the romancist. He is not perplexed by the necessity of displacing the Darnley or Richelieu, or Mary Stuart, of his his own fancy and memory, before he can accept those offered as substitutes, and who may, at first sight, appear very different personages from those which his imagination has adopted. The objection may not extend to all readers, but where it operates at all, it must be felt powerfully. Now, Sir Morley Ernstein and his satellites we receive without doubt or hesitation, just as Mr. James pleases to present them, and judge them by their own merits; and whether we like them or not, we do not quarrel about their identity. Whatever may be the cause, it is quite certain, that, in the most popular historical romances, the historical characters however truly and skilfully painted, are never felt to be the finest, nor are they the most effective. What is Queen Elizabeth to poor Amy Robsart? what the young Pretender to Vich Ian Vohr? Again, real public events, however momentous, take a feeble hold of our affections and sympathies, when they are compared with those of domestic and private life, represented in the masterly fictions which mirror our fellow-beings and our own age; the busy, striving, suffering world around us, the coil of humanity in its everyday play. Hence, in part, the superior attraction of the domestic novel, the romance of individualized passion, and hence the secret of more interest being felt by the reader in such transactions as the Porteous Mob, because the fate of one poor girl was involved in it, than as it bore on the peace of two kingdoms. With one exception, the characters of Morley Ernstein are all the ordinary beings of everyday life, purified, and elevated, and adapted to the artist's purpose, but not idealized out of their human nature. The exception is a certain mysterious German count or colonel, Lieberg, an incarnation of refined but intense selfishness; a libertine by theory, and from philosophy; one who denies himself no gratification, and who loves to experiment on human passions and character merely for an exercise of the intellect, as an amateur anatomist tortures frogs and puppy-dogs; not that he is naturally cruel and enjoys their writhings, but because he likes the excitement, and the useless knowledge gained by his cold-blooded processes. Without being in any degree a natural character, Lieberg, as a foil to the hero, is an effective personage in the drama. The delineations of female character are delicate, discriminative, and skilfully contrasted; and what is more important, highly pleasing. Each of the three gifted and lovely women devoted to the hero is meant to represent a class; and the classes exist, though one of them is limited in numbers in this country. Its type is found in another. It is the Corinne or George Sand genus. Mr James has deliberately ventured, and upon system, on one character for which the motive is praiseworthy; though where, save in modern novels, burglars of lofty soul, and disinterested heroic thieves, are to be found, it is not easy to tell. Yet it is not to be questioned, that a bad system of criminal law, faulty institutions, and social abuses, injuriously affect the formation of character among the lower classes, and tend to degrade, corrupt, and finally render criminal, many an unfortunate individual, who is punished for the sins into which he has been betrayed. Anything in imaginative fiction or true history, in prose or in verse, in tale or in sermon, which tends to promote the sublime object "of educating the whole people for good, and of combining the punishment of crime with encouragement to reformation," cannot be too much applauded.—But to our story. Sir Morley Ernstein, at the age of twenty-one, has just come into possession of his large estates, and of the wealth accumulated during his long minority, blessed with many good and beautiful gifts of mind, and heart, and person: a fine animal; and one, moreover, who gave promise of eventually becoming a noble-minded man. He had reached his ancestral home, visited for the first time since boyhood. The requisite ceremonial of arriving and taking possession being gone through, the lonely young heir became thoughtful, and began to philosophize; but banishing melancholy, he called for a horse, rode out, had an adventure, and fell in love at first sight, over head and ears, once and for ever! Though the conflicting "Tenants of the heart" sometimes mutinied, he was upon the whole wonderfully faithful to the fair Juliet Carr, not now first seen, though Morley remembered but as a dream the lovely child he had in other years called his little wife, and who had never forgotten him. In this novel, besides being descriptive and dramatic, the author is often, perhaps too often for the brisk pace which most readers like in narrative, betrayed into moralizing and philosophizing, and almost into downright metaphysics. This opening scene combines a little of these peculiarities, and is not an unfavourable specimen of the work, though many scenes might be found far more impassioned. Morley had cast off melancholy musings by the old English remedy, of a good hard trot: but

A little accident happened, however, almost at the outset of his ride, which checked the speed at which he was flying over the country. We have said he leaped the enclosure of the park at a bound; but he certainly did so without thinking that any one might be upon the high road at the other side. Such was the case, however; and, as Morley Ernstein darted over the fence, he perceived a lady and a gentleman on horseback, riding gently along.

The sudden and unexpected apparition of a mounted horseman at full speed, where there had been nothing but solitude the moment before, made the lady start, but it made her horse start still more; and being of that race of animals that is restive without being spirited, the beast plunged, reared, and would have fallen backwards, but, as quick as light, Morley was upon his feet by the lady's side, and with her bridle in his firm, manly grasp. The horse became quiet instantly; it seemed as if the animal felt at once that it could not resist; and though it passaged away from him who held it, it no longer tried to rear with that strong determination of crushing its fair rider which it had shown at first.

The lady, however, agitated with all that had happened, slipped from the saddle, quickly, but gracefully, and of course Morley Ernstein aided her to the best of his abilities, apologizing for frightening her horse, and assuring her that the animal was now quiet, that the danger was over, and adding a multitude of other things of the same kind, in a breath.

Our measures of time are all false and absurd together; we might find a thousand better clocks than any that have ever been carried up into the sky by a church steeple. Thoughts, feelings, passions, events—these are the real moral time-keepers. What is to me the ticking of a pendulum? There is many a five minutes, as they are called when measured by that false scale, that form two-thirds of a lifetime. One fortnight of existence has withered more than twenty years, cast down the barrier between youth and age, and dried up the fountains of the heart, like the simoom.

It was not exactly thus with Morley Ernstein and the lady; but the brief moments in which all passed that I have just narrated, comprised for the young gentleman a world of other things besides. She was young and very beautiful.—Is not that enough to load the wings of a single minute with the thoughts of years, for a young man of one-and-twenty? But that was not all; hers was the sort of beauty that he had always most admired, most thought of, most wondered at. It was all gentleness and brightness, but withal resplendent with high feeling and thought. It was the mixture that we so seldom see of all that is lovely in mere corporeal form and colouring: the rich contour, the flowing lines, the warmth but softness of hue, the contrasted tints of the hair, the eyes, the cheeks, the forehead, and the lips, with the lofty, yet gentle,—the tender, yet deep in expression. The young horseman had remarked all this in a moment, and he had seen that beautiful face agitated, that graceful form rendered more graceful by the effort to keep her seat upon the vicious beast that bore her. At the same time, the morning sun shone, mellowed through the foliage of a tree over head, and cast that rich mysterious yellow light upon the whole scene which is only produced when the sunshine falls through the green leaves that owe their brief and strange existence to his glorious beams. That light seemed to give a peculiar lustre to her face—a something that the youth, in his fond enthusiasm, could have fancied unearthly, had not the soft hand that rested upon his as he aided her to dismount, and the deep-drawn sigh of apprehension relieved, told him that she was but a being of the same nature as himself. It was all done in a moment, as I have said, and the manifold thoughts, or we m call them impressions, which took place in his bos were like the ripples of a moonlight sea; a thous bright things received all at once into the mind.

Scarcely, however, had Morley Ernstein time to u the few words which have been mentioned when lady's companion interposed, saying—"At this time the year, Sir, one does not expect to see people fly over a park fence like madmen. The periodical sea of insanity—I mean the hunting season—is at an e and I do not wonder at the horse being surprised a alarmed."

Morley turned his eyes suddenly to the speaker face; but he was an old man, with grey hair, and t youth had a certain foolish reverence for age, which w much inculcated amongst those weak people, our ance tors; though it has given way very generally now, und the influence of improvement and the diffusion of kno ledge. He refrained, therefore, and strangled an ang reply between his teeth, merely saying—

"I am extremely sorry I have alarmed the lady, a trust she will forgive me. You still look frightened he continued, addressing her with a voice in which son young timidity, and the slight agitation of admiratio mixed strangely with a consciousness, not so much varied powers as of high purposes and noble feeling "you still look frightened, and somewhat faint. Wer it not better for you to repose for a moment at my hous hard by?"

"At your house!" said the gentleman, with peculia emphasis, and gazing at him from head to foot; "I thank you, Sir, but the lady can very well pursue her ride. Th horse, too, will be perfectly quiet, unless he be agai startled; and it is not reasonable to expect two suc pleasant occurrences in one day."

The young lady bowed her head with a smile tha seemed intended and fully sufficient to compensate fo the harsh coldness of her companion. "I am not faint," she said—"a little frightened; but I can well go on." She thanked him, too, for his kindness, in a somewhat lower tone; not so low, indeed, as to be unheard by either of the two who stood beside her, but still softened, and with somewhat of timidity in her manner, as if she felt that what she said to the one might not be pleasing to the other.

Morley aided her to remount, and gave her the rein for her companion made no effort to assist her. As he did so, he gazed for one instant in her face, and his eyes met the deep blue heavenly light of hers, pouring through the dark lashes, like the first dawn of morning through the clouds of night. It was but for an instant, and bowing her head once more, she rode on, leaving him standing on the road, and marvelling still at the bright vision which had thus crossed his path, and vanished. Who has not, in his childhood, seen a shooting star cross the sky and disappear, on a bright autumn night?—and who has not then gazed long into the wide vacant heaven, to see if the shining wanderer would not appear again? Thus gazed Morley Ernstein after the fair being that had just left him, with that sort of admiration in which wonder has so great a share.

He stood motionless, his horse's bridle over one arm, his cane drooping from his wrist, and his eyes fixed upon the receding figures, till they reached an angle of the road. They were riding slowly, and by no movement on either did it appear that they gave another thought to what had occurred—to that momentary meeting which had furnished him with so many thoughts. He had no reason to suppose they would. Perhaps, indeed, with man's true perversity, Morley might have deemed it not quite feminine if the lady had turned her head as she rode away; but yet he was mortified that she did not do so; and sighed to think that he should most likely never see her more.

Now, who was she?—That cross, churlish, old fellow's daughter? Preposterous! His wife? That were very madness! His attempts to discover who or what was this angelic beauty proving vain, Sir Morley set off for London in a fit of the fidgets, nd the mail-coach met that handsome and gen-manlike mystery, or Mephistopholes, in a well-cut oat, named Colonel Lieberg, who was destined to ave so much influence over his future fate. The ecidental encounter serves for a peg on which to ang one of those passages of moralizing or phi-osophizing into which Mr. James is betrayed ftener, we have said, than is likely to please all is readers, though these passages are occasionally loquent and beautiful, and as true as well-worded ommonplaces cannot fail to be. The dark, handome stranger, with the high brow, the large, right eyes, and air of distinction, not only entered he coach, but he spoke, and—

Oh, how strange and complicated is the web of God's ill! How the smallest, the most pitiful, the most mpty of things, by his great and wise volition, act their art in mighty changes! How a look, a tone, a sound, pebble in our path, a grain of dust in our eyes, a head-che, a fit of gloom, a caprice, a desire, may not only hange the whole current of one man's existence, but ffect the being of states and empires, and alter human estinies to the end of time! The present state of France, he whole mass of facts, circumstances, incidents, acci-lents, and events, which are there going on, may all be wing to a lady, whom I knew well, having splashed her tocking fifty years ago.

"As how, in the name of Heaven?" demands the eader.

Thus! She was going out of her house with a relation n the town of Douai, when, carelessly putting her foot n a stone, she splashed her stocking. She went back o change it; the delay occupied a quarter of an hour.
When she went on again, she met, at the corner of the Place, a man, since too famous in history, then scarcely known as anything but a clever fop. His name was Francis Maximilian Robespierre. Instead of going on, he turned with her and her relation, and walked up and down the Place with them for half an hour. In one of the houses hard by, a debating society was in the act of canvassing some political question. As they passed to and fro, Robespierre listened at the door from time to time, and at length, pronouncing the debaters to be all fools together, he rushed in to set them right. From that moment he entered vehemently into all the fiery discussions which preceded the revolution, in which he had never taken part before, and grasped at power, which opened the doors of the cage, and let out the tiger in his heart. Thus, had the lady not splashed her stocking, she would not have met the future tyrant; he would have pursued his way, and would not have turned back to the Place; he would never have heard the debate that first called him into action, for he was going to quit Douai the next day; and who can say how that one fact, in the infinite number of its combinations with other things, might have affected the whole social world at present?

The stranger's heterodox opinions were developed in a prolonged conversation which happened to turn upon the joys of youth; its "pure joys" Morley Ernstein named them.

"Why call them the pure joys of youth? I do not see why they should be purer than those of any other period. Surely all joys are pure—I mean those that are not criminal. Anything that gives me pleasure, or by which I can give others pleasure, and which injures no one, is just as pure as the gathering of a flower, or the pruning of a tree—certainly more pure than crucifying a worm upon a hook, or shooting an inoffensive bird, or many another of those sports and pastimes of which youth is fond."

Morley was silent for some little time; he felt that there was something dangerous in his companion's doctrines, if pushed to the extreme; but still, as far as he had expressed them, there was nothing of which he could take hold. The other seemed to perceive, with fine tact, that the young man who sat beside him, had taken alarm at the indefinite nature of his argument, and he added in haste—

"You will understand that I mean strictly to limit enjoyment to that which is not criminal—which is not wrong—in short, all I mean to say is, that the wisest plan for man to pursue is, to go on without ever turning back his eyes to the past; to enjoy all that is natural for his period of life, without regretting others that are gone. Each pleasure is as a precious stone, picked up upon the sea-shore, a thing to be treasured by memory; but because we find an emerald at one moment, that is no reason why we should neglect the diamond that we find the next, or the ruby that comes a little farther on. Our capabilities of enjoyment were intended to be used, and he who does not do so, fails to fulfil one of the great obligations of his nature."

Morley was better satisfied, but still not completely so; and had he been older and more experienced, he might have thought that his conversation with his travelling companion, is like that which Conscience and Desire sometimes hold together, when temptation is very strong. Desire still finds an argument to lead us up to the very verge of wrong, assuring Conscience all the time that we are upon the safe ground of right, and trusting to some momentary impulse to make us leap the barrier when we have reached it.

Lieberg was a supicious guide to initiate a young man into the diversions and pleasures of the metropolis, and his accomplishments and fascinations were as powerful as his intellect:—

Every word appeared to be spoken, more as a suggestion than a decision; while the soft richness of the speaker's voice seemed calculated to persuade and lead. The look on the other hand was full of quick vivacity and fire—the eye brightened up at a word, the lip changed its expression twenty times in a minute, and withal there was an air of reckless joyousness, of rapid careless quickness, which contrasted wonderfully with the metaphysical themes he touched upon, and by contrast, gave the stronger effect to his deeper thoughts.

That he was a man of station and high breeding one would scarcely doubt; and in his dress there was that scrupulous neatness which is one of the distinguishing marks of a gentleman in youth. In older life, a man may well lose a part of that attention to his apparel which no young man should be without; but before the grand passage of forty-five, no one should deem himself old enough to go out in a bad hat if he can get a good one, or wear ill-blacked boots. The neatness of his dress did not at all approach to puppyism, but every article of his clothing was so well adapted to the other, that the whole harmonised perfectly, and gave that peculiar and undefinable tone to his appearance which has a vague sort of connexion with the mind within, a reflection, perhaps, we might call it, of the habitual thoughts and feelings influencing the dress without the wearer knowing it.

An accident on the road deprived Morley of sense, and had nearly cost him his life. In the long helpless unconsciousness of brain-fever, the stranger watched over him like a brother; and when, after recovery, Morley expressed his gratitude to the man who had not only attended him but saved his life by dragging him out of the carriage while it was under water,—

"Yes, that is true," replied his companion, half laughing; "I did, indeed, as Sheridan called it, play the Newfoundland dog, when I found you were likely to be drowned unless assisted; but that is all, and surely that is little enough. I have done the same for a fly in a cream jug."

"But you have never stayed three weeks in a country inn," answered Morley, smiling, "to nurse a fly in a fever; and for that, at least, you deserve my deepest gratitude."

"Not at all!" answered his friend—"not at all! Even on your own principles, you owe me no thanks. I never thought whether I was doing a good action or not. In regard to the first of your mighty obligations, that of staying three weeks in a country inn, it might truly have been a great tax upon me under some circumstances; but just at that time, I had nothing on earth to do. I was going back to London out of pure weariness of the place I was in; for in general I never am in town before the first or second of June. Here I have had fine air, fine scenery, and a fine trout stream. What would you have more? Then as to watching and taking care of you in your delirium, I have no merit there: the truth is, I am fond of all strong emotions, and the watching you, the wondering whether you would live or die, the changes of your countenance, the grey shade that would sometimes come over your face, the flush of fever, the restless tossing to and fro—and, then, again, the gambling, as it were, each moment in my own mind for your life—all this was surely excitement enough. Besides, your delirium was worth any money. There is something so strange and fantastic in the ravings of a man in fever—very much more curious and metaphysical than mere madness. In madness, one always finds one strong predominant idea; but in delirium it is as if all the ideas of a lifetime were mixed in one wild chaos. Not Talma, nor Schroeder, nor Malibran, could have afforded me so much interest as you in your delirium."

"You have a strange taste," replied Ernstein, not altogether well pleased.

This is a character to pique a reader's curiosity; and here, for the present, we leave the Byronic personage. We do not mean to even hint at the plot of the story; and detached scenes, complete in themselves, and showing the author's manner, occur in abundance.

Gracious mothers and lovely daughters courted the handsome young heir, who is both charitable and reasonable in his judgment of Mothers and Daughters.

Morley thought it very natural that such should be the case. "Were I a mother," he said to himself, "which, thank Heaven, I never can be, I would do just the same. People cry out upon this sort of thing—I really do not see why they should do so, more than censure a father for getting his son a commission in the Guards. It is right that we should wish to see our children well provided for; and so long as there is nothing unfair, no deception, no concealment, the purpose is rather honourable than otherwise."

It may be guessed that Morley soon became an immense favourite in fashionable society; yet he was not spoiled by conceit, nor did he become ridiculous through those suspicions of designs upon him, which are entertained by many men without any of his advantages of person and fortune. Among other places which Morley visited with curiosity, was Bow Street police-office, to which he was carried by Lieutenant-colonel Count Lieberg, who had been robbed of a gold snuff-box. This event leads to some good low-life description, without any nauseous affectation of low cockney, or thievish slang. Morley, after this stimulating glimpse, wished to see more of this kind of life, and Lieberg introduced him to Mr. Higgins, a worthy pawn-broker, who had acted an important part in privately recovering the snuff-box, besides proving the alibi of the thief of it.

"Mr. R—— has done me the honour, Sir," he began, in very tolerable language, "of bringing me here, because, he said you wished to see some little things in my way," and having uttered this very equivocal sentence, he held his tongue, and left Morley to take it up in what sense he chose.

Morley was amused, but he replied in such a manner as still to leave the task of explanation to the other.

"I am very much obliged to Mr. R——," he said. "Pray, what have you got to show me?"

The man grinned, to find that the young gentleman could deal in equivoques, as well as himself. Ere he answered, he gave an approving wink of the eye to the officer, which might have been translated, perhaps—"He is not a fool, after all, though he is a gentleman." However, he would not be brought to the point; and putting his hand in his pocket, he produced a small shagreen case, which he opened, and laid on the table before Morley Ernstein; displaying to the wondering eyes of the young baronet, a pair of very beautiful diamond ear-rings. Morley gazed at them for a moment or two, in no small surprise.

"They are very handsome, indeed," he said, at length—"they are very handsome, indeed, as far as I am any judge of such things; but, pray, what do you intend me to do with these?"

"To buy them, Sir," replied the man, quite coolly.

"I hope not to wear them, too," said Morley, "for that I shall scarcely consent to."

"O no, Sir!" answered Mr. Higgins, laughing; "but such gentlemen as you, are always wanting diamond ear-rings. Why, there isn't one of all those ladies that you want to make a present to, who would not say they are as handsome a pair as ever were seen. I will let you have them a great bargain, too. Why, Lord ——'s young lady sold me a pair, the other day, for twice the money, which he had given her only two days before."

"A pleasant comment on such sort of connexions," thought Morley Ernstein; but he answered, aloud—"There is one objection to my taking these, even if I did want them, my good friend—namely, that I do not exactly know where they may come from."

The man paused, and stared in his face for a moment.

"Ha, now I take you, Sir—now I take you!" he cried, at length. "But I can assure you, you are mistaken; they are not exactly mine. I am disposing of them for another party; but I think if you knew what an act of charity you are doing in buying them, you would give the full money willingly enough, and perhaps something into the bargain."

"Indeed!" said Morley, with his curiosity somewhat excited; "pray who do they belong to?"

"Oh, as nice a young lady, Sir, as ever lived!" replied the man. "Her father was a clergyman, and her mother a lady of good fortune, and amongst the tip-top of the world; but there was a law-suit about the mother's fortune, to whom these ear-rings belonged, I have heard, and that ruined her husband, and broke her heart. She died first, and the parson not long after; and they left this daughter, and a boy, who is a wild one, with about a couple of hundred between them, and some nic-nacs. Well, the boy soon got through his money, and his sister's too; and from time to time he came to me, with a lot of things to sell. His sister, he let out the other day, had kept him and herself too by teaching; but now she hasn't had much to do for some time, because she fell ill in the winter, and so lost her pupils. They are well-nigh starving, the boy tells me, and in the end she is driven to sell her mother's ear-rings. She only asks forty pounds for them, Sir—I think they are worth a hundred."

The story had every appearance of truth about it to the mind of Morley Ernstein. Such things were very likely to happen; and the man told it, too, like a true story. After asking why Mr. Higgins did not buy the diamonds himself, and receiving the satisfactory answer, that he had bought just such a pair before from Lord ——'s young lady, and could not afford to buy two, as well as having received truth-like replies to one or two other questions, Morley made up his mind somewhat precipitately to do three things; to purchase the ear-rings, to find out the brother, and to see if, through him, he could not do something for the sister.

"Pray where does this young man live?" he said, after having concluded the purchase; "do you think he will have any objection to speak with me about his affairs?"

"Oh, not he, Sir!" cried the man; "the young scamp don't mind talking about them to the whole world. He's no shame left! He lives at No. 3, Dover Street, New-road, and his sister too. A prettier girl I never saw, in all the course of my life, for I went there one day."

Morley put down the address; and having dismissed this subject, and arranged to make an expedition with the worthy Mr. Higgins, into some of the most reputable resorts of rogues and vagabonds, on the succeeding night, he suffered him and R—— to depart, waiting with some impatience for the following morning, when he proposed to put his Quixotic purpose, regarding the sellers of the diamond ear-rings, into execution. . . . . .

"He wants to see life, Master R——. We'll show it him, won't we? His old servant told me that he was a tender-hearted young gentleman, and did a world of good in his own parish!"

It was with the best and purest intentions that Morley meant to visit the young lady; and accordingly he very prudently resolved, beforehand, to employ the intervention of his friend and former guardian, Mr. Hamilton, in assisting her, lest his own age and appearance might draw suspicion upon them both.

At the hour of eleven, his new cabriolet, which the poetical coachmaker had assured him would roll over the pavement like a cloud through the sky, and one of his new horses, which if the same figurative personage had beheld him, would most likely have been compared to the wind impelling the cloud, were at the door of the hôtel, together with a groom upon the most approved scale, bearing gloves as white as the Horse Guards, and the usual neat but unaccountable sort of clothing, called leather breeches and top-boots. Morley Ernstein descended with a slow step, entered his cabriolet thoughtfully, and drove towards the house to which he had been addressed, not going above a mile out of his way, in consequence of his ignorance of all those narrow turnings and windings which a professed London coachman is fond of taking. The street was a small one, and evidently a poor one, but Morley Ernstein had expected nothing else; and the house was neat and clean, with a white door-step, a clean door, and a small brass knocker. The young gentleman's groom, by his directions, applied his hand to the implement of noise, and produced a roll of repeated knocks, which, in any other country, would be held as a nuisance. A few minutes after, a neat maid-servant presented herself, and, in answer to the question, "Is Mr. William Barham at home?" replied in the affirmative.

Morley Ernstein then descended, gave his name, and was ushered up a flight of stairs, having a centre line of neat stair carpet, not much wider than one's hand. The drawing room into which he was shown was very nicely furnished with a number of little ornaments, not indeed of the kind that could be purchased, but of the sort which a dexterous and tasteful female-hand can produce, to trick out and decorate the simplest habitation. There was a small piano in one corner of the room, a Spanish guitar, with a blue ribbon, lying on the sofa, a pile of music on the top of the piano, some very well executed landscapes lying, half finished, on the table, together with a box of colours, and a glass of water. All, in short, bespoke taste and skill, and that graceful occupation of leisure hours, which is so seldom found uncombined with a fine mind.

The room was empty of human beings, and while Morley was making his survey, he heard the maid-servant run up stairs to another flight, and say—"Master William—Master William, there is a gentleman below in the drawing-room wishes to speak to you." . . .

Morley Ernstein remained in the middle of the drawing-room, with the door partly unclosed, so as to allow him to hear the murmur of voices in the passage below, and the moment after, some light footsteps ascending the stairs. They were not the steps of a man, and ere he could ask himself, "What next?" the door of the room opened wide, and a young lady entered the room, whose appearance answered too well the description which had been given, for him to doubt that she was the late possessor of the diamond ear-rings.

She seemed to be about nineteen; and, both in features and figure, was exceedingly beautiful. Dressed in mourning, there could be no bright colours in her apparel, but every garment was so arranged as tastefully to suit the other; and the whole was in the very best style, if not absolutely from the hands of the most fashionable dressmaker. Yet all was plain—there was nothing at all superfluous: and, indeed, her beauty required it not. The luxuriant dark hair clustered under the close bonnet, and contrasted finely with the pure, fair skin, warmed by a bright blush, like that of a rose, which one could hardly believe that the air of London would leave long unwithered. The large and dark, but soft eyes, spoke mind and feeling too; though there was an occasional flash of brightness in them, which seemed to say that mirth had not always been so completely banished as it seemed at this moment. The whole face looked but the more lovely from the darkness of her garb; and the beautiful small foot and ancle were certainly not displayed to disadvantage in the tight-fitting black silk stockings and well-made shoe. She bowed distinctly to Morley, as she entered the room, with a look that expressed no sort of pleasure, adding—"The servant tells me, Sir, that you wish to see my brother. He will be here in five minutes; for I left him only at a little distance, at a shop where he wanted to purchase something. Will you not sit down?"

She pointed coldly to a chair, and as she spoke, began removing the drawings from the table; but Morley replied—"Perhaps I had better return again; I fear I interrupt you."

The lady looked up with an air of hesitation—

"Indeed, Sir," she said, after a moment's pause, "I do not know well how to reply to you. My brother will be angry, perhaps, if I say what I think, and yet——"

Morley was not a little surprised at this unfinished reply, and he answered, with interest, which, it is not to be denied, was increasing every moment under all he heard and saw—

"Pray explain yourself, madam. I think you must be under some mistake; but at all events, your brother cannot be made angry by what you say; for of course, unless you desire it, I shall never repeat it to him, or to any one."

"Well then, Sir," she said, gravely and sadly, "I was going to say, however rude and harsh you may think it, that I certainly would rather that you did not wait for my brother, and cannot but hope that he may be absent also when you come again."

Morley smiled at this very strange reception, but still he could not help thinking that there was some mistake. "Indeed, Miss Barham," he replied, "this is so unexpected and extraordinary, that I rather believe you are in error regarding me."

"Oh, no!" replied the lady in the same tone; "his description, Sir, was very accurate. Are you not Mr. Neville?"

"Oh, no!" answered Morley, with a smile, "my name is Morley Ernstein, and I came with a view of doing your brother good and not harm."

"Ernstein!" she cried, starting with a wild look of joy and satisfaction. "Morley Ernstein! Oh! then you are the gentleman whose name was to the draft! It was you who bought the diamonds, then; but my brother told me he had not seen you—that it was through a third person—" and she blushed deeply as she spoke.

"He said true, Miss Barham," replied Morley; "it was through another person, but from that other person I learnt something of your own and your brother's situation, in explanation of the cause for which the diamonds were sold."

"Oh! they should not have told all that!" murmured the young lady. "How did they know it? It was sad enough to sell them at all!" and her eyes filled with tears.

With the utmost delicacy Morley urged her to take back the diamonds, and promised his friendship and services to her brother and herself. While they conversed, the brother, a weak, vicious, and selfish being, thoroughly corrupted, appeared.

A young man, scarcely of eighteen years of age, entered quickly, with his long and shining, but somewhat dishevelled hair, tossed loosely about a face, quick and intelligent enough, but bearing an expression both wild and cunning. His complexion was very different from that of his sister, for he was very pale and sallow, and there was a certain look of premature dissipation about him, which is not easily to be mistaken.

"Here is Neville, Helen!" he exclaimed, as he entered; but the instant his eyes lighted upon Morley Ernstein, he started, and looked both surprised and annoyed.

Ere anything more could pass, however, a slower step was heard mounting the staircase, and through the door, which the youth had left open behind him, appeared a fashionably-dressed man coming up with an air of easy nonchalance, as if he were entering the abode of people very much below him, looking at his boot, which he tapped occasionally with his cane, and not raising his eyes in the slightest degree towards the drawing-room—though the door, as I have said, was open—till he was upon the very threshold. When he did look up, however, and saw the figure of Morley Ernstein standing exactly opposite to him, he started, with an appearance of even greater surprise than had been shown by the brother of Miss Barham; and at the same time his brow contracted, and his eye flashed, in a way that he seemed to think very imposing, for it was evident that his whole demeanour had much preparation in it.

Morley, in the meantime, could hardly suppress a smile, at seeing the man for whom he had been mistaken, and who had been described as so much like himself. This Mr. Neville was certainly not less than fifteen or sixteen years older: he was shorter, too, by two or three inches, not nearly so powerful in make, and though dressed in the very extreme of the fashion, which, in that day, was somewhat extravagant in itself, he wanted that easy tone and indescribable grace which marks the gentleman, both in mind and in station.

The feelings of Miss Barham, however, were evidently anything but pleasant, and it was with some satisfaction that Morley saw her draw in a slight degree nearer to himself, as her brother and his companion entered. All the parties gazed upon each other for a moment in silence; but the very first words which were spoken, and which proceeded from the lips of Mr. Neville, at once showed Morley that the fable of the borrowed plumes might be acted in real life. "I say, Barham!" he exclaimed—"what is all this, my boy?"

This is the person to whom the heartless and selfish wretched boy would have sold his sister, to secure his personal safety, and the means of an idle and dissipated life. Neville held over him the power of life and death, from the knowledge of a forgery which Barham had commited, as it turned out, upon Count Lieberg. High words passed between Morley Ernstein and Neville; and the former left the house, after expressing the utmost contempt for the braggart, and of his demand for "the satisfaction of a gentleman;" though he voluntarily promised him that of a horse-whip.

"Missed fire, by Jove!"—exclaimed Mr. Neville, as Morley descended the stairs, opened the door, and beckoned to his cabriolet, which was wandering up and down the street—"I say, what's to be done now? That bird's worth plucking, and you are a fool if you don't do it. I must have a feather, too, if it can be managed—but pray introduce me to your sister. Miss Barham, how do you do?"

Miss Barham drew back. "I must beg to decline the introduction, Sir," she said; "I have no inclination to make your acquaintance; I told William so this morning, and he might have saved me the pain of seeing you here, as his only pretext was an appointment to meet you, and it seems that you had joined each other before you came in."

"Hey! how is this, Barham?" exclaimed the other; "I thought you had talked to her about it all."

"So I did," replied William Barham; "but she is foolish. I tell you what, Helen; this wont do—you don't know what you are about; and it is all nonsense, too, because you have often told me about such things that——"

"It will so far do, William," replied Helen Barham interrupting him, that I will beg you will leave me my rooms to myself. If you do not, I must take means to free myself from society I do not like."

Thus saying, she passed through the door leading into another chamber, and was heard to lock it behind her.

"Leave me with her, Neville," said her brother—"leave me with her; I will bring her to, and will join you in an hour at Williams'."

"Well, mind you!" cried the other, somewhat steraly—"remember, my lad, I have got my thumb upon you!" and uttering these words, Mr. Neville marched out of the room. As soon as the door of the house closed upon him, the youth knocked gently at that of his sister's room. "Helen!" he exclaimed; "Helen!—he is gone. Do come out and speak to me, there is a dear girl!"

Helen Barham did come out; but her eyes were red with tears. "Oh, William!" she said, "I wonder you are not ashamed to see me——"

"Nonsense, Helen," he cried, "I have often heard you laugh at idle prejudices."

"Fie—fie!" she continued, not attending to him; "to wish to sell your sister to such a being as that! I did say that there is nothing I would not do to save you from destruction, but—oh! William——"

"Well, then, Helen," he said, "this is the only way of saving me from destruction."

"Not now, William," she exclaimed, "not now! The money which you got for the ear-rings will do for some time, surely; and before that is spent, I may get some other means of keeping myself and you."

"You will never get enough to keep us comfortably," replied the youth; "and as to that, it does not matter whether you do or not; I tell you, the only way to save me from destruction, is——"

"Is by my own, you would say," replied his sister.

"Stuff and nonsense!" answered her brother; "they never hang people for that, Helen: and I tell you, that man could hang me, or very near it, if he chose."

The face of Helen Barham turned as pale as death, and she sank into a chair without any reply, gazing in her brother's countenance, with silent agony, for several moments.

"It is true, Helen," said her brother, doggedly, and setting his teeth hard, "it is true what I tell you."

"Whoever heard of such horror!" exclaimed Helen Barham. "The brother would sell his sister to be the mistress of a low-bred, horrible villain; and that villain would hang the brother, if the sister will not consent to her own destruction. Is that it, William?"

"Not exactly," replied the youth! "you twist the matter which way you please, Helen. I said he could hang me if he liked, not that he would; and as for the rest, Helen, I don't sell you. I only want you to do the best for yourself, and for me too. You can never get enough by teaching, to keep me or you either. You are fond enough of fine clothes, I can tell you; and here's a man will give you as many as you want. He will settle five hundred a-year on you, just as if you were his wife. He can't marry you, you know, because he is married already."

"Hush! hush! hush!" cried Helen Barham, stopping her ears—"hush! and leave me. Do not make me hate myself! What did I ever say, William, to make you think that I would become any man's mistress for fine clothes?"

"No," replied her brother, "but I have heard you say that marriage is love; that a man and woman who have promised themselves to each other, ought to consider themselves just as much married as if all the ceremonies in the world had passed between them."

Helen hid her eyes in her hands, saying, "I have been very foolish, William, and I have talked wildly; but you have misunderstood me—sadly, too. I meant, that they had never a right to break that promise. Love!—can you talk to me of love with such a man as that?"

"Why, I suppose, then, you are in love with the other I found here," said her brother. "Pray what was he doing here with you alone?—What is it he wants with me, too?"

"He wants," exclaimed Helen, her face brightening up with renewed hope—"he wants to save you, William; he wants to aid you—to deliver you, if you will let him. Go to him, William—go to him; tell him the whole—tell him all the truth, and, I am sure, if it be in the power of man to help you, he will." . . . .

"That old fool, Higgins, has made a blunder," said the youth, thoughtfully; "I'll go and call upon him, Helen, and see if anything can be got out of him; but, as to telling him the whole, you do not think me such a fool, do you, to put my neck in two men's power, because it happens to be in that of one? You seem to be mightily smitten with him, Helen; and perhaps might not object to the arrangement there, eh? But, I'll tell you what—that wont do, my lady. Neville's the man, depend upon it; and I insist that you treat him civilly, at least. For to-day, I must quiet matters down as well as I can, but to-morrow I shall bring him here to tea."

Helen Barham again burst into tears, and in that state the youth left her. But ere half an hour was over, Mr. Neville was again in the house, and, passing by the maid, he entered the drawing-room unannounced, saying, he "only wanted to speak two words to Miss Barham." He certainly was not long with her, and what he said was in a low tone, for the maid, who was not at all inquisitive, could not catch the words through the keyhole of the door. In less than a minute and a half, he quitted the house again, and the maid looked at him from the parlour-window, as he mounted a beautiful horse and rode away. The moment after, she heard something heavy fall in the room above, and, running up, found Helen Barham lying senseless on the floor.

The unhappy girl had been threatened with the utmost severity that this low reprobate had power to inflict upon her wretched brother. On the same evening Morley kept his appointment with Mr. Higgins; and, properly disguised, was introduced to one of the haunts of the flash-men, where Harry Martin, the generous, gallant, and honest thief of the story, first appears on the scene. When Morley had seen enough to tire, if not to disgust him, he retired with his Mentor, who, in answer to the question of who was Mr. Neville, replied—

"Oh, Sir, Neville was what we call a prime swell; he's getting a little bit down now, but I can recollect the time when his line of business was altogether on the race-course, and at certain houses in the neighbourhood of St. James's. Then he took to getting money by lending it, and as long as he kept to pianoforte selling, and all that, it did very well; but he was fool enough to let a story get into the papers, about his filching some bills, and though the serjeant cleared him of that cleverly, it blowed him a great deal. Then he got horse-whipped one day, and showed a little bit of the white feather, and that did him no good with any party. But, if you are asking because of what happened this morning, I can put you up to all that in no time."

"Indeed!" said Morley. "Then you have heard all about this morning's business, it seems."

"To be sure!" replied Higgins. "The stupid young fool came to me to-night, about six o'clock or so, and told me the whole; so I showed him that Neville would never do for his sister, and told him what I wanted to make up for her. I said to him, there's Sir Morley Ernstein, he may do very well, if you like, and what he promises he'll keep; but as for Neville, he may have a hundred pounds in his pocket to-day, and not twopence to-morrow; and as for his doing what he says he will, even when he can, there's no use in trusting to that. We know him well enough—Master Neville. He's not a man of honour, Sir."

A new light was beginning to shine upon Morley Ernstein; he was now, indeed, seeing human existence, under a fresh aspect; he was too young to be suspicious, but yet he had heard a good deal of the world, if he had not mingled with it much; and the horrible scheme of villany and vice, of which the reader is already aware, but which now first broke upon him, made him ask himself, which were the agents, which the victims, in the sad affair wherein he had himself become so suddenly and unexpectedly a participator? or, was he alone the object of this nefarious arrangement? Was Helen Barham, beautiful and high-minded as she seemed, but a light woman, seeking for some new paramour; or was she in reality what she appeared, and a mere victim to be immolated by the criminal selfishness of her brother? He paused then, for several minutes, without making any answer; he was, in fact, putting on his armour, if one may so call it, finding himself suddenly attacked in a manner that he did not expect. Accordingly, after some silence, he replied, "Well, Mr. Higgins, I think you spoke quite reasonably. She is a very beautiful girl, certainly. Pray, who did she live with last?"

"No, Sir, no," said Mr. Higgins, with more warmth than Morley had expected. "She never lived with anybody that I know of—no, I'm sure she hasn't—but I'll tell you the plain truth of the matter. I have been given to understand, that you are a gentleman that wants to see life; now you know very well, Sir, that young gentlemen that set out upon that lay, make a point, in the first place, of picking up some lady. Well, Sir, what I've got to say is no bad compliment to you either. I had seen this youth—this William Barham—almost every day, for the last three or four months; and I had heard all about his sister from him, and how she had laboured to support him in his wild ways. Well, Sir, I found that now, having pawned or sold everything he had in the world, and almost everything she had, too, and done a great many other things besides, which we wont talk about, he was determined to sell his sister at last to some one. So, Sir, when I saw you, and heard you talk, I thought that you were one who, if you did take the young lady, would not treat her as some men do, but, if some time you liked to marry, and part with her, would provide for her handsomely. It was that made me put you up quietly to go into that house."

"A very hopeful scheme, indeed!" said Morley. "But it seems to me, my good friend, that this youth, who is, evidently, as hopeless a scapegrace as ever cut a purse, or trod the drop, has other views for his sister."

"Ay, sir; he's a bad one," answered Mr Higgins. "He's one that will come to no good. He might have been in a very genteel way of business, if he had liked it, without any risk either; but there's no keeping him steady, and he's got into bad hands that don't care how soon they ruin the young man altogether, provided they screen themselves."

We cannot pursue the moralizing vein of Mr. Higgins, whom Morley bribed by the promise of ten pounds, to find out and inform him of the exact nature of the power which Neville had acquired over young Barham. On the same night Sir Morley received a challenge from Neville, and next morning visited his friend Lieberg on the subject, whom he found at his luxurious breakfast:—

He had come thither in haste; but as his friend's servant was in the room, he had suffered the cup, the saucer, the plate, the knife and fork, and every usual implement of breakfast-eating, to be placed, before he touched upon the subject which had brought him thither at that hour of the morning. As soon as all was arranged, and Morley had scanned the whole of the beautiful china upon the table, each piece of which was worth a Jew's eye—as soon as the young gentleman himself had reached the middle term of his first cup of coffee—as soon as some very thin broiled ham, and some excellent caviare, looking like all the black eyes of a harem put together, had been handed round—as soon, in short, as the servant, having no pretext for staying longer, had retired from the room, Morley Ernstein threw an open note across to Colonel Lieberg, saying—"There, my dear Count, I have taken the liberty of referring my gallant correspondent to yourself, though I fear it may make you get up to-morrow an hour or two earlier than usual."

Lieberg read it, and smiled. "That will be exactly as you please, Ernstein," he replied. "Of course, you are aware that it is not the least necessary for you to fight that man, unless you like it."

"Oh, I will fight him, certainly!" replied Morley; "as a matter of course. Having told him I would horsewhip him, or something equivalent, I will not refuse to fight him, especially as he seems to have got a friend to stand by him."

"You mean this Captain Stallfed," said Lieberg, "who writes you the note? The greatest rascal in Europe, my dear Morley, except Neville himself! the one a common swindler, the other a blackleg, of the very lowest character. Nevertheless, I think you are very right, for several reasons. In the first place, every man should do a thing once or twice in his life, just to get over the novelty of it, and to see what it is like—a duel, as well as everything else. In the next place, having made up your mind to fight somebody, you could not choose anybody better to fire at than Neville. Whether you hit him or miss him, your conduct may well be regarded as philanthropical. If you kill him, the benefit to society at large will be immense; if you miss him, you restore to him a rag of that reputation which was never otherwise than in a very tattered condition, and of which there is not now a scrap left. Then, again, my dear Morley, as you are known to be a gentleman and a man of honour, and I am known to be a man of the world, with a tolerable portion of respectability also, your fighting Neville, with Stallfed for his second, will be considered as the surest proof that you are resolved to fight anybody and everybody that asks you, as nothing could justify such a proceeding except that resolution. This will have the effect of sparing you the chance of twenty duels in times to come; for, depend upon it, in this brave world of ours, the reputation of a readiness to fight keeps a man clear of a thousand petty insults and annoyances. There is one thing, however, which I very much doubt—namely, that these men will ever give us the meeting at all. . . . . .
But come, Ernstein, pray explain to me, if there be no secret in it, how you were brought in contact with this very reputable personage. You really must have been making your way in the world."

Morley Ernstein found more difficulty in replying to Lieberg's question than he anticipated. . . . .
That part of the affair which related to Helen Barham he did not like to mention to one whose views were formed in a different school from his own. He knew not what might be Lieberg's comments, what his inferences, what he might say, what he might suspect; and there is nothing that a young and high mind shrinks so timidly from as suspicion; it is the cowardice of a generous heart. As the matter was to be told, however, for he could not very well avoid it, he spoke with his wonted candour of the whole affair, related the manner in which the situation of Helen Barham and her brother had first been brought to his knowledge, his interview with her, and the subsequent conversation which he had had with good Mr. Higgins. But the demeanour of Lieberg was very different from that which he had expected. Not a smile appeared upon his lip which could have alarmed a heart the most sensible to ridicule; not a word passed from his tongue which could shock one feeling in Morley's breast. He listened in perfect silence, with his eyes bent gravely on the ground, and remained without answering for some moments after the other had done speaking.

"This is a curious and interesting history," he said, at length; and has some of the strangest points in it that I know of. Many men in London, who practically know as much of its ways as I do, but who perhaps have not speculated upon them quite so philosophically as I have, at least, tried to do, would conclude that a story thus told to a young and inexperienced man of fortune, by a mere 'fence,' as they call such fellows as Higgins, must be a trumped-up tale for the purpose of cheating; the woman a loose woman, the boy a swindler, and the man Neville merely brought in to give greater effect to the scene. But I know better than this, Morley, and can very well conceive the whole story to be true. Those who see a great deal of London will find, if they do but take the trouble to investigate the matter impartially, that even in the innermost recesses of vice and iniquity, mingling with all that is wicked and bad in the very hearts of men given up to various sorts of crime, there are peculiar virtues, good qualities, bursts of feeling, touches of generosity, and even of truth, which lie, like the jewels of Golconda, diamonds amongst mud, or grow, like some of our most beautiful plants, from a soil formed of filth and corruption. Do not misunderstand me: I do not mean to make heroes of pick-pockets and swindlers, forgers and housebreakers; but I mean to say, that in the very blackest of them there is some good point, some virtues carried to a high pitch—some which, perhaps I might say, are almost peculiar to the hearts of vice. Many a man who risks his life daily to take the money of another will give his own as freely as water to one of his fellows in distress. The tenderness, I have heard, with which some of the most abandoned women in Europe will nurse a sick friend, is quite extraordinary; and a strong and active feeling for sorrow and distress of every kind, is, I know, very much more common amongst ruffians than amongst the pampered men of pleasure. I can thus very well conceive that this good man, Higgins, might be touched by compassion for the situation of this poor girl, and lay out the plan that he says he has done, thinking it the very best thing for her and for you too, in which, perhaps, he is right."

Lieberg's last words were spoken calmly, deliberately, and thoughtfully; and not the most learned argumentations in favour of licentiousness would have been calculated to produce such a demoralizing effect as the deliberate matter-of-course manner in which he gave them utterance. It at once, in the very fewest possible words, and with the least possible shock, placed before the mind of Morley Ernstein the idea of seducing Helen Barham, and keeping her as a mistress, in the light of something not at all evil, and perhaps right; a thing to be considered, simply in regard to its convenience and expediency, without the slightest reference in the world to the morality or immorality of the transaction. Morley did not reply, but remained with his eyes thoughtfully fixed upon the floor, meditating over what he had just heard, and asking himself, it must be confessed, whether there is really an absolute right and wrong in such matters, or not. . . . . .

"You must see your way in the business clearly, Ernstein," continued his friend, "and make very sure that you are not deceived in the girl's character; but I am inclined to think with you that she is what she appears. However, one or two interviews will easily enable you to ascertain the fact. Art never yet looked so like nature, as to deceive an eye sharpened by doubt, and in a reasonable head."

"I shall most likely never see her again," replied Morley, "and therefore shall have small opportunity of judging."

"Indeed!—and why not?" demanded Lieberg.

"Simply because I think it dangerous," replied Morley. "She is very beautiful, very graceful, very charming. With such a brother it would be quite beyond my most romantic ideas to make her my wife; and as to the other sort of connexion which you speak of, I can conceive a man being betrayed into it by accident, or rather by a combination of unfortunate circumstances, but could never dream, for my own part at least, of sitting down deliberately to plan such a thing. It does not enter into my scheme of life, Lieberg."

Lieberg laughed.

"I know that I am not without strong passions," continued Morley, "as well as you do. When I love, it will be vehemently, ardently; and whatever may be her fortune or station, I will make that woman my wife if she will become so. It is for this very reason that I do not choose to run the risk of falling in love with any one that I would not choose to marry. I shall therefore take care not to visit such dangerous precincts again."

"Well, if you don't Ernstein," said Lieberg, "I think I shall."

Morley was mortified. "Perhaps, Lieberg," he replied, "if you do go, you may not find the opportunity that you expect."

"Nay, nay," answered Lieberg, laughing again; "you have no right to excite one's compassion for this fair orphan, and then, with a resolution to abandon her yourself, prevent any other generous man from showing her his sympathy."

As the conversation proceeds, Lieberg reveals his philosophy, of which the principle is not "the greatest happiness of the greatest number," but the greatest enjoyment or sensual gratification of Number One, though at the expense of the whole of the world besides. There are many practical philosophers of Lieberg's school, though they may not be so well versed in the theory.

Every man in life must calculate which he thinks will procure him the greatest sum of happiness, keen joys or calm pleasures. One man will argue that the joys—which undoubtedly are the brighter of the two commodities—are only followed by those counterbalancing griefs which moralists tell us of, in consequence of man's subserviency to various foolish prejudices and unjust regulations in his artificial state of being. Others again may contend that calm pleasures, though not so brilliant, are more durable; that they are extended over a greater space; that if a man obtains many joys and shakes off many griefs by throwing from him the prejudices of society, on the other hand, the very struggle with those prejudices is in itself an annoyance equal to the endurance of them all. I have never calculated the matter very nicely myself, but I recollect once going to see a fair cousin of mine who, when I went in, was in the act of giving two of her sons some jelly, or jam, or something of that kind. The one boy spread it thinly over a large piece of bread and butter; the other ate it plain all at once; my cousin, who was a very wise girl as well as a pretty one, let each do as he liked; and I, who stood by and watched, thought that it was a good picture and a good lesson of life.

Count Lieberg liked in general to eat his jam by itself. Morley's condition was becoming critical. "The Tenants of the Heart" were warring together, and the animal Spirit, not yet entirely subdued.—He was again with Helen Barham, listening to her sad tale.

The interest that Morley took in her, the anxiety that he felt to serve her; the apprehension for herself and for her brother, which her history excited, were all open to the eyes of Helen Barham, and were all in return powerful upon her spirit. At the moment, when, trembling, agitated, tearful, breathless, she concluded the sad tale with that one terrible truth, and when he, listening with quivering lips and eyes straining upon her bright face, heard the dark conclusion of the whole, which seemed to leave no course for him, no hope for her, but to snatch her at once from her unworthy brother, one rash impulse, two rash words, "Be mine!" would have sealed the fates of both for ever. Had he uttered them, she could but have cast herself upon his breast or died.

Oh, it is sad to feel that there is but one thing on earth to which you can cling, and yet not dare to cling to it! Oh, it is sad to feel within ourselves the power to cherish and to comfort, and yet not dare to use it! Those words, "Be mine," presented themselves to Morley's mind, rose up in his heart, trembled upon his lips; but as the destinies of men and states have ever depended upon accident, one instant's pause saved him and Helen Barham; whether permanently, or only for the time, those who read will learn. "Shall I say it?" he asked himself; and while his heart beat like an imprisoned eagle against the bars of its cage, his eyes turned towards the table and rested there for a moment. There was a book upon it, which she had evidently been reading before he came in, open, and turned upon its face. There was a word stamped upon the back, and Morley's glance passed over it—it was, Prayer!

In a moment lightning-like thought had passed round the whole range of the mental horizon.

"She has been praying," he thought—"praying to that God, who made her beautiful, and innocent, and bright—praying for help against the infernal powers of wickedness and evil, that seem to surround her; and shall I, the only help that he has sent her, shall I sully her brightness, destroy her innocence, and blister that fair brow with the name of harlot? God forbid!"

The ethereal spirit within him was triumphant in a moment: the hour of the animal spirit was over. . .

The spirit of the soul, as I have called it, exerted her sway during that hour with calm, but mighty power. He dwelt upon many a curious question with himself, both general and referring to the chief matter of the day; and although the idea of marrying Helen Barham, and thus freeing her from all her difficulties, never entered into his mind as a thing that could take place, because he could not dream of allying himself to one so base as her brother was proved to be, yet he asked himself, had circumstances been different, would he have offered her his hand? The answer was—"No—she was not the being he would have chosen." And why was she not so? became the next question. Could any one be more lovely?—could any style of beauty whatsoever be more fit to excite ardent passion? Had he a doubt of her virtue? of her simplicity, or truth? No, no, no! He could not tell why. He did not, or he would not, investigate why he felt that, although, had he given way to the temptation of circumstances, and the strong inclination of his own heart, he might have made Helen Barham his mistress—he would not choose her for his wife. Let not the reader suppose that it was any evil in her character, anything that betrayed itself therein, and which he felt, though he could not define it. No; she was all that she seemed—pure, bright, generous-hearted, tender, devoted, not without some faults, but those such as would little affect domestic peace. No! it was nothing in her character, but it was something in his heart. Reader! it was a memory!

The memory, fortunately for our hero, became on that same night a reality. At a party given by Lady Malcolm,—an old motherly friend,—he discovered his beautiful unknown—Juliet Carr—his future guardian angel, whose protection and friendship for Helen Barham he, like a sensible and generous man, frankly requested, and sweetly and freely obtained. Poor Helen! her honour, her good name, were now placed above suspicion; but the tenderest sisterly friendship could not protect her heart, and she was also exposed to the alternately bold or insidious attempts of Lieberg, who had obtained a more fatal power over her brother than that held by Neville, and used it with as little remorse. When Higgins waited upon his employer, Sir Morley, to make the report which was to gain him ten pounds, before he departed he asked with a sly look—

"Have you got hold of the young lady yet?"

"You mistake, my good friend," said Morley, sternly; "I have no such intentions as you suppose."

"Well, Sir," said the man, nothing abashed, "you'll easily manage it if you like. Bill Barham told me he was going to call upon you to-night between seven and eight; and you could easily bring him to terms—that I saw very well. No offence, Sir, I hope. Good night."

Morley Ernstein remained standing for a moment in thought. "The girl must be removed," he said, speaking to himself, "and if the youth can be induced to go and confess all to Lieberg, with an offer of repaying the money, I doubt not all may yet go well. When Lieberg finds that Helen Barham is gone, and that even her brother does not know where to find her, he will of course think that I have seduced her, and taken her away. Well, let him do so, for the present!" . . . . .

Ere he set out, he left directions to inform William Barham, if that praiseworthy young gentleman called, that he was gone to his sister's house; and in Davis Street he got into a hackney-coach with the intention of proceeding thither more quickly. That sad and tardy contrivance for wasting men's time, however, was not at all suited to the eager spirit of Morley Ernstein, and ere it had rumbled through more than two or three streets, he made the coachman stop, paid him his fare, jumped out, and proceeded on foot. On arriving at Helen Barham's dwelling, he was admitted instantly; for the maid, who had her own notion of the object of his visits, had heard all about him from the groom, who had accompanied him at first; and judging that the arrangement would do very well, took care to be especially civil to one whom she supposed would be her future master. She even made way for him to go up the stairs before her, and Morley, who was too eager to be ceremonious, passed on, and opened the drawing-room door himself.

Helen Barham had learned to know his knock and his step, however, and with her pencil in her hand, as she sat working hard at a drawing before her, she gazed up with a glad and eager look towards the opening door, to see if her ear had not deceived her. It was by this time night. There might be a ray or two of daylight still in the sky, but not enough for her to see her drawing. The windows therefore had been closed, and the lamp lighted, and as she sat with the rays falling full upon her face, with her bright eyes raised towards the opening door, her lips apart and showing the white teeth, her form bent forward with expectation, and the fair, delicate hand holding the pencil suspended over the paper, certainly nothing more lovely could have presented itself to the eyes of Morley Ernstein. Then came up in her face the light of joy as she saw him, the beaming of gratitude and regard, as if to give sunshine to the picture.

It was altogether like a fine Rembrandt, for, both morally and physically, the full light was all concentrated in that one spot in the room, and everything else around was dark to the eye, and to the heart. There she sat, alone—a being, formed to ornament society, to give happiness to others, to receive happiness from them, to animate, to cheer, to soothe, to taste, to feel, to enjoy! There she sat, alone, pursuing solitary and ungrateful labour through the long hours of the night, with sad thoughts as her only companions, and no voice of father, of brother, or of husband, to comfort and support her. The first reflection that crossed the mind of Morley Ernstein, after the impression of her dazzling beauty subsided, was, how sad and gloomy must her existence have been for many a long day past! The feelings in his heart might well have tempted him to take the stricken lamb to his bosom, to nourish, and to cheer her there, without one evil sensation, or one thought but for her good; and the reader may well pardon him, if—although he was guarded by a passion, intense and true, for another—if, notwithstanding all he could do, there was a tenderness in his manner, a gentle affection in his tone, that was very dangerous to poor Helen Barham. She sprang up, she held out her hand to him, she exclaimed, with a look that told the whole joy of her heart,—

"Oh! how glad I am to see you! Do you know, I have found a way of supporting myself quite well, till I can get some more scholars. Since I saw you, I have sold two of my drawings to a shop in Pall Mall, and received two guineas for them. I did not think the things were worth anything, but merely for my scholars to copy; but as I went past the windows of a drawing shop, I saw some that did not seem better than mine, so I resolved to try. The man gave me two guineas at once, and said he would take as many more as I could bring; so that now, you see, I am rich."

"I am afraid, my dear Miss Barham," said Morley, with a smile, "that I have come to destroy all your fine projects; but, do not be alarmed, it is to substitute others in their place, which, I trust, may not be disagreeable to you."

"The Tenants of the Heart" were again in momentary conflict; and yet Morley Ernstein was the passionate lover of Juliet Carr, who had loved him from childhood. To Helen he unfolded his plans for her brother.

At the same time he urged that the only way to make him abandon every attempt to carry out his infamous bargain with Neville, was to place her beyond his reach altogether, and not even to let him know where she was.

She listened for a moment in silence, with her eyes bent down, and evidently full of thought, and then looked up in his face, with something like a tear upon her eyelashes. "You have been so kind and good," she said, in a faltering voice, "and have shown yourself so generous, that I scarcely ought to ask you any questions, but only, I am afraid—that is to say, having no friend who has yet expressed a willingness to receive me, I think people might judge it strange, if I were to go anywhere with you alone—I mean, under your care, without my own brother knowing it. But I see you are smiling—I have mistaken you. But, oh, no! indeed I have not doubted you—I am sure, Sir Morley Ernstein, you would not wrong me in any way;" and she gave him her hand.

"Not for the world," he replied. "I smiled at myself. Miss Barham—my mind being fully occupied with my own plans for you. I forgot to tell you one half of them, which ought to have been told you at first.

He told her of the amiable ladies whose protection he meant to solicit for herself; but if they were not disposed or not able to offer her a safe asylum, then, he said—

There are occasions on which we must brave the world's opinion, when we know that we are doing what is right, when our purposes and views are high and pure, and when, by obeying the cold dictates of society, we should incur still greater dangers, or fall into real errors."

Was the doctrine that he preached a perilous one? Perhaps it might be so—at least, as far as human happiness is concerned; for the laws and customs of the world are exactly like the military code of Great Britain, which strictly forbids a man to fight a duel, and disgraces him if he refuses.

Helen Barham again looked up in his face, and replied, at once—"I will do anything that you please. Tell me what I ought to do! I am sure, as I said before, you will not tell me wrong; and I am sure, also, that when I am away, however criminal you may think him, you will do the best for my poor brother William."

Colonel Count Lieberg, presuming upon the hold which he had obtained over young Barham, visited the beautiful girl who had so strongly excited his curiosity from the description given by Morley. The interview is well painted. At its close, as he drove off, he muttered—

"Beautiful, indeed!—Beautiful, indeed! This boy is a fool, with his advantages!" and driving on, busy with reveries of his own, he well nigh killed two people at the corner of Oxford Street, and grazed one of the posts with the wheel of his vehicle.

The fiendish, imperturbable character of this incarnation of selfishness, is nowhere better brought out than in contrast with the thief and burglar, Henry Martin. This man, in company with a gang, had gone down to Yorkshire for the purpose of robbing an old rich miser, a retired attorney, and the supposed father of Juliet Carr. To this sordid churl Helen had been sent, in order to screen her from the audacious attempts of Lieberg; though Juliet still remained in town with her mother's relative, Lady Malcolm. By an accident, Lieberg discovered the place of Helen's retreat, and pursued her, artfully introducing himself to the miser at the ancient manor-house where he resided, as a gentleman come to take his moors for shooting. For these he bribed old Carr with the offer of so high a rent that his heart opened, and the liberal stranger was invited to remain for the night. The gang of London thieves, at the head of which was Harry Martin, were aware of Lieberg's journey down into the north, and Martin not only meditated the robbery of old Carr, but also robbing the Count, and thus obtaining possession of the forged bill, which was hanging over the head of his confederate, young Barham, and used as a dastardly means of ruining the youth's sister.

The household of Miser Carr had long retired to rest, but his guest knew not repose. He had again seen Helen, and admired her more than ever. He had induced her to grant him a private interview, upon the subject of her brother's danger, by writing her the following note :—

"Dear Miss Barham—Will you kindly write underneath, merely in pencil, at what time to-morrow I can have a few minutes' conversation with you alone, upon the subject that we mentioned?"

"There, take that!" he said, folding up the paper, "and find out Miss Barham's maid directly; bid her give it to her mistress, and let me have an answer."

The valet took the note, and disappeared. Helen's toilette for the night was well nigh done, and she was on the point of seeking her bed, when she received it; and, guileless and innocent herself, without a thought of evil, she wrote underneath the lines sent by Lieberg, in pencil, "Whenever you like.—Helen Barham."

When the note was brought back, Lieberg gazed at it with a keen, triumphant look, though his cheek was pale with intense feeling.

"Do you know which is Miss Barham's room?" he said, addressing the valet.

"The one at the end of the corridor, Sir," said the man; "that on the right; the opposite door leads to a store-room, I find."

"And where do you sleep yourself, Martini?" said Lieberg.

"I sleep just above Miss Barham's room, Sir," replied the man.

"Get a horse early to-morrow," said Lieberg; "go over to the post-office at Doncaster, and let me have my letters before eleven."

The man bowed, and very little further conversation took place, while Lieberg undressed, and retired to bed. His last words were, "Leave the light burning."

As soon as the man was gone, Lieberg rose from his bed again, carefully cut the sheet of note-paper on which he had written to Helen in two, separating the part containing his inquiry from Helen's reply, burnt the former part, and then gazed steadfastly upon the other, repeating—"Whenever I like!—whenever I like!—I like this very night!—This shall justify me;" and putting the paper into his desk, he extinguished the light, and retired to bed again, but not to sleep.

In a future scene he makes a base use of this note, which she resents and exposes indignantly and with high courage. Meanwhile—

Silence maintained her reign for about a quarter of an hour, during which time Lieberg gazed out upon a scene which was well calculated to afford high and holy thoughts, had his been a breast to receive them. The beautiful orb which, like woman's love to man, follows this earthly sphere through all its wandering course, was shining bright and pure, in her highest glory. The green lawn, the dark yew-trees, the sloping upland, the well-trimmed hedges, caught the rays as they fell, and deep shadows, like those which must ever fall to the eye of memory over various spots in the past, when we look back from the end of a long life, were cast over the turf from every rising object. Round about, at a distance from their queen, in the blue heaven,—for those that were near were swallowed up in her light,—the bright attendant stars filled up the glory of the sky, and spoke to man's heart of the majesty of that God who made a thousand worlds, and yet bows himself to regard the lowest being on the earth.

Such, however, were not the thoughts with which Lieberg gazed. We shall not, indeed, attempt to penetrate them; they were deep, inscrutable, and would do no good to the mind of any one. Suffice it, that as his eye strayed upon the dark blue expanse, and seemed shooting back rays to the bright orb above him, a dark shadow came upon his brow, his lip curled, his head was raised higher than before, his chest expanded, as if with some struggle within him. Indeed, it would seem that he heard some warning voice, and succeeded in drowning it in the clamour of pride and passion, for he muttered to himself as he turned from the window—"So hypocrites would tell us, and so fools would yield!"

He left the curtains open, and with a quiet and steady step, walked towards the door. As he did so, however, and as his hand was actually upon the lock to open it, he thought he heard a faint cry, and paused for a minute to listen. "Busy imagination!" he said, finding the sound was not repeated; and he opened the door.

All was dark, but the moonlight, which streamed through his room, crossed the corridor and gave a faint light. There was a sudden step heard in the passage, and Lieberg instantly drew back; but before he could shut the door, or see what was coming, he received a heavy blow upon the head, which struck him to the ground, and for a few minutes deprived him of all thought and feeling. When he opened his eyes, one of the candles on his dressing-table was lighted, and he saw two tall, stout men, covered with smock frocks, each with a large piece of black crape drawn over his face, busily engaged, the one in packing up quietly all his dressing apparatus, at least that part of it which was formed of silver or gold, whilst the other, who had, to say the truth, opened various portmanteaus and carriage-boxes, without their master's privity or consent, was examining a purse and a pocket-book by the light of a candle. . . . . After having examined the contents of the pocket-book, the man put it in his pocket, saying to himself, "That will do!" He then proceeded to aid his companion.

Lieberg, "though a man of dauntless courage," found it prudent to lie as still as if he had been dead :—

Lieberg could hear, as he lay with his eyes shut, however, that the two men stopped beside him; and the one said to the other—

"You've done for him, Harry!"

"No, I haven't!" exclaimed the other, in a loud, rough tone. "D—n his heart and limbs, I have a great mind to do for him, though! He's only stunned, like—see how he breathes! but if he were up to knowing why I did it, I'd take and thrash him till I drove the soul out of his body. I'll tell you what—this is the fellow that you heard of, who got hold of the poor boy, and threatened to hang him for forgery, if he wouldn't make his sister go into keeping with him. Now, that's what I call being a rascal, indeed. These gentlefolks call you and I blackguards, and scamps, and criminals, and felons; now, I should like to know who is the greatest rascal, who is the greatest felon—he or I? I never take anything but a little money from those that can spare it: but he—curse the pitiful mongrel—wants to take away a poor girl's life and soul, and threatens to hang her brother if he wont help him. If it were with all her own good will, I've nothing to say; but to think to go to buy her with the price of her brother's blood!—if that isn't a blackguard trick, I don't know what is. How it happens that what you call gentlemen keep him amongst them, I can't say; but I know if he were to come amongst us, we would kick him out. But come along; if I stand looking at him any longer, I shall do a something that I shall be sorry for. I don't like taking a man's life in that way, unless he stands up to me; so come along, for I feel inclined to put my foot upon him, and tread his dirty soul out, as I would to a toad."

Harry Martin, while his associates packed their plunder, had been in search of the forged bill.

A short time afterwards, and Harry Martin, who is humanized by the influence of an innocent and affectionate wife, was a prisoner in York Castle, and about to take his trial, with some others of the gang, for the robbery at the Manor-house. Helen Barham was the strongest witness that could be produced against him; but he had spared her life, in circumstances of great peril to his own, and she had pledged her word at that awful moment, never to reveal aught that could, even by implication, affect him. Another witness was Count Lieberg, whom the contempt and scorn of Helen had by this exasperated to madness. His conduct to her was, besides, made public, and had brought disgrace upon him. To recover the proofs of her brother's guilt, and subdue and torture her through her best affections, was the diabolical motive which now brought him to the felon's cell of York Castle:—

Harry Martin was not one to forget readily a face he had once seen, but it took the reflection of a moment or two to connect that of his visiter with the events of the past; and ere his recollection served him, the door was closed, and he stood face to face with the personage whom we have called Count Lieberg. The moment that he became aware of who it was, the brow of the prisoner contracted, and he demanded sternly—"What do you want with me?"

Lieberg's dark, keen eye rested upon him heavily, with that sort of oppressive light which seemed at once to see into and weigh down the heart of those he gazed at; and he remained for a moment or two without making any reply, as if to let the man before him feel the full force of that basilisk glance.

"When last we met," he said, at length, "you took away some papers——"

Harry Martin had by this time recollected himself, and he replied, with a loud laugh—"When last we met? Did we ever meet at all? That is the question, my fine fellow. You seem to me as impudent as a quack doctor, and I daresay are as great a liar as a horse-chanter."

"When last we met," repeated Lieberg, in an unaltered tone, "you took a pocket-book of mine, containing some papers of value to me and of no value to you. What has become of them?"

"What has become of them!" cried Harry Martin. "If I took any papers of yours, depend upon it that they are by this time what you and I soon will be."

"And what is that?" demanded Lieberg.

"Dust and ashes—dust and ashes!" replied Harry Martin.

"You make a mistake," said Lieberg, calmly, "I have no intention of being anything of the kind. But listen to me for a moment, my good friend, and I will give you sufficient motives for making you change your mind in this business. Those papers are of great consequence to me; if they can't be found, the proofs of the facts to which they referred are the next important things to obtain. If you can furnish me with either the one or the other, you will benefit me and yourself too. Hear me!—you will save your own neck from the gallows—You will save your own life, I say."

"I would not, to save fifty lives," answered Harry Martin. "Come, don't talk to me any more about it, for I don't want to hear such stuff. You have no power to give life or to take it. You, who, if laws were equal, and punishments proportioned to crime, would find a far higher gallows than any of us poor fellows—you, who are a robber of more than money—a murderer of more than life—who gave you power to offer me safety, or anything like it?"

"The chance that placed me in the house which you broke into," replied Lieberg, "and the wit that made me lie quiet when I found there was no use in resisting. Upon my words hangs your life, and I pledge my honour to save it, if you but restore me those papers."

"Your honour!" exclaimed Harry Martin. "What's your honour worth? I have heard some tricks of your honour, that make it of as little value, to those who know what is underneath the surface, as a coiner's shilling."

"You are in the wrong," said Lieberg, calmly, keeping still fixed upon him that peculiar look which Harry Martin could not prevent himself from feeling, notwithstanding all his daring hardihood—"you are quite in the wrong, my good friend, and are risking your neck, or rather, I should say, absolutely condemning yourself to death for the sake of a youth who has betrayed you, and who was the first to bring upon you the eye of the law."

"Has he betrayed me?" demanded Harry Martin, with his eye flashing. "Has he betrayed me? If I thought that——"

"I can prove it," replied Lieberg. "You have mistaken your friends for your enemies, my good man. . . . Take any means that you like to satisfy yourself, and you will find that almost immediately after the robbery had been committed, he went to the house of Mr. Carr, and has remained there ever since. You will find, also, that his sister has been brought down to give evidence against you; and every inquiry that you make will prove to you, more and more strongly, that it was he who pointed you out to the police as the man, even when suspicion had very naturally fallen upon two other persons."

Harry Martin walked up and down the narrow space of the cell, in a state of terrible agitation. "So, so!" he said, "this is the game! He shall smart for it!—I wish I had my hand upon his shoulder, that's all; but I will have my day, yet. Never mind—revenge will come, and it is sweet!"

"It is, indeed!" said Lieberg, with a tone of such earnestness, that no one could doubt he felt the burning passion, the hell-thirst of which he spoke, with strong intensity, notwithstanding the calm and indifferent demeanour which he so generally affected. "It is, indeed," he said, "and no man who knows how sweet it is, lets slip the opportunity when presented to him. The way before you, my good friend, is open, and easy; give me those papers, or, if you really have them not, furnish me with the proofs, which I know you possess, against the boy, William Barham, and you at once save your own life, and gain your revenge against him; for I tell you fairly, it is at him I strike."

"Pooh! nonsense!—don't talk to me," cried Harry Martin; "it's his sister you want. You care devilish little about him. Do you think to come humbugging me in that manner?"

"You are mistaken," said Lieberg, sternly; "I may seek revenge upon them both, and so may you, too, for she is as much your enemy as he is, and has come down for the express purpose of giving evidence against you."

"Not she!" cried Harry Martin; "that's a lie—I'll never believe it!"

"I tell you, she arrived in York last night, with Mr. Carr," replied Lieberg; "and, as you know, the trial comes on the day after to-morrow."

"She'll give no evidence against me, I'm sure," said Harry Martin, gazing down upon the floor, but speaking in a less assured tone than he had used before. "I don't think she would, if her life were at stake."

Lieberg's farther arguments made some impression:—

Harry Martin seemed shaken. He sat down at the table, he leaned his head upon his hands, and the workings of his countenance told how strong was the emotion within him. Lieberg watched him, with eyes terribly skilled in reading the passions and weaknesses of the human heart; and after he had paused for a moment, to let what he had said have full effect, he went on—"So much for the girl!—and you must recollect, that if she refuses to swear that you are the man, and assigns for the reason that her life had been spared, even that will tell against you, in some degree. Then comes her brother, and says all that he knows of you; then come I myself, and swear to you positively. Now, if you do what I want, you sweep away the whole of this mass of evidence at once, and, in fact, may be said to set yourself free."

"Why, how so?" cried Harry Martin. "How would that prevent her giving her evidence?"

"Do you think she would give her evidence against you, if by so doing she condemned her own brother to death?" demanded Lieberg, in a low, but emphatic tone; "and I promise you, she shall have that before her eyes, at all events."

Harry Martin gazed at him from under his bent brows, and for a moment or two a variety of different expressions passed over the prisoner's countenance, from which the dark, keen eye of Lieberg could extract no information in regard to what was passing in his bosom. All that his tempter could divine was, that he was shaken, that his resolution wavered, though there was a certain look of scorn mingled with all the shades that flitted across Martin's face, which was not very pleasant to his proud companion. He failed not, however, to ply him with every argument, to tempt him by every inducement, and Martin sat and listened, sometimes gazing full upon Lieberg sometimes bending his eyes down upon the table, sometimes frowning heavily, and sometimes indulging in a flickering smile, which crossed his countenance like the lights that we occasionally see carried across the open windows of a house, the tenant of which we know not, as we travel past it in a dark night.

"Well now, Sir," he said, at length, looking up with a softened look in Lieberg's face—"Well now, Sir, suppose I were to do as you wish, what surety should I have that you will stand by me, in the time of need?"

Lieberg bent down his head, speaking across the table, and replied, "I will acknowledge this night in presence of the turnkey, that in seeing you, and hearing your voice, I have become convinced you are not one of the men who broke into Mr. Carr's house, at Yelverly."

"That might do," said Harry Martin, in a thoughtful tone—"that would go a great way; but don't you think it would be a lie?"

"A lie!" exclaimed Lieberg, with his lip curling—"Are you fool enough to suppose, that a man of the world cares two straws about the mere empty shade of truth, when a great and important object is to be obtained? Where is the minister, the statesman, the patriot, who ever dreams of the abstract truth or falsehood of a particular proposition? The greatest reformer that ever lived, who harangues multitudes upon corruption, and all the evils that afflict a state or a religion, will no more scruple to falsify the truth in regard to an opponent, or to tell a bare falsehood to gain an end, than a schoolboy will to rob an orchard. Take them all, from Luther down to the lowest of your puritymongers in this happy island, and you will find that there is not one of them who considers truth and falsehood, except in reference to the end they have in view. Away with such nonsense between us—it is only fit for a schoolmistress's homily to girls of twelve years old. I will do what I say, and that is sufficient; and ere your trial comes on, I will so contrive to tutor Helen Barham that she shall work your acquittal, without committing herself."

"That will do—that will do!" said Harry Martin, meditating. "But then, Sir, I thought you intended to have your revenge upon this young woman. I should not be sorry to have mine upon that scoundrel, her brother. Now let me see; though we jump together in that, I should not like the poor girl ill treated at all—I don't suppose you would ever go to strike a woman, or to punish her in that sort of way, at all?"

Lieberg smiled contemptuously, and replied—"You cannot understand, my good friend, the nature of the revenge I seek; but be satisfied! It is nothing of the kind you imagine."

"But I should like to know what it is, Sir," said Harry Martin—"I should much like to know what it is before I consent.—Anything in reason, but no violence!"

His tone was very much altered, and Lieberg marked with no light satisfaction that everything promised well for his purposes.

"Well," he said, at length, "my revenge should be this: to force her to be mine, to bind her to myself by ties she loathes and abhors—to bow her pride to the dust, by none of the ill-treatment that you dream of, but by caresses that she hates—ay, and daily to know that her situation, as my paramour, is a pang and an anguish to her, while she has no means of freeing herself from the bond!"

"Well!" cried Harry Martin, starting up, with such fury that he overset the table, "you are a damneder scoundrel than I thought man could be! Get out, or I will dash you to atoms!" And at the same moment he seized Lieberg by the shoulder, as if to cast him headlong forth from the door.

To his surprise, however, he found that, notwithstanding all his own great strength, he could not move him in the least, and that the dark man before him stood rooted like a rock to the floor.

"Beware!" said Lieberg, lifting up his finger with a scornful smile, as the prisoner drew back in some astonishment—"beware!" and at the same moment one of the turnkeys opened the door to inquire what was the matter.

Lieberg went out without making any reply, and the prisoner was once more left alone.

"Ay," said Martin when he was by himself; "now if they have a cell in the place fit to receive a man that has murdered his own father, they should put that fellow into it. How the scoundrel was taken in, to tell all his rascality!—I don't believe a word of it—she'll never 'peach. I know a little bit about women, too, and I'll bet my life she doesn't say a word—only those rascally fellows may get it out of her; those lawyers. I have seen them puzzle a cleverer head than hers with their questions. However, we will see: a man can but die once, and I'd rather do that while I'm about it, than give the poor girl up into the hands of such an infernal villain as that, even if I had the papers to give him, which, thank God, I have not!—for no man can tell what he will do when he is tempted.—I suppose it will go hard with me after all!" and with this not very pleasant reflection, Martin cast himself into a chair, and appeared to give himself up to calculate the chances for and against himself, with a heavy brow and a sad and anxious eye.

The day of trial came, and Count Lieberg's evidence, dexterous as he was, did not without suspicion stand an acute cross-examination:—

Lieberg left the witness-box with a frowning brow, but took a place in the court to see the rest of the proceedings. At the next name that was called, there were two hearts that beat in the court—that of the prisoner, and that of Count Lieberg; but it was the heart of the latter which throbbed most violently when the crier pronounced the words—"Helen Barham!" He looked round the people, and thought it strange to see the indifference upon the faces of all ; for so intense were his own sensations, that he forgot the crowd were not aware who Helen Barham was, and that the name, for aught they knew, might appertain to some inferior person in the household of Mr. Carr. When she appeared, however, and lifted her veil, her extraordinary loveliness produced at first a dead silence, and then a low murmur of admiration. Helen's cheek, which was unusually pale when she entered, grew crimson as she saw the multitude of eyes upon her, and read in every look the effect of her beauty upon the crowd. To one, feeling as she did, that admiration was a very painful part of a situation already too terrible. She turned pale again—she turned red—she felt as if she should faint ; and, while in this state, an old mumbling officer of the court put a book into her hand, ran over indistinctly some words she did not hear, and then added, in a louder tone—" Kiss the book !" Helen obeyed mechanically ; and, after a short pause, to allow her to recover herself, her examination began. The counsel for the crown addressed her in a softened voice ; and while she spoke in answer to his questions, and detailed all that had occurred on the night of the robbery, the prisoner, Martin, never took his eyes from her face. At the same time, the dark light of Lieberg's—if I may use a term which seems a contradiction—poured upon her countenance unceasingly. It seemed as if he were trying to intimidate her by that stern fixed gaze ; but Helen had now regained her composure, and proceeded unwavering, with her soft musical voice, in a tone low indeed, but so clear, that each word was heard by every ear. There was no backwardness—no hesitation ; and there was not a heart in that hall which did not feel she was uttering the simple, undisguised truth. She told how she had been awakened ; how she had seen the face of one of the robbers ; how she had uttered an involuntary cry ; how he had rushed towards her, with the intention of burying her testimony against him in the silence of the grave, and how he had spared her.

She paused for a moment, while a tear or two ran over her cheek, and hers were not the only eyes in the court that shed bright drops.

She then went on to tell all that had occurred afterwards, till the period when she was left alone in Sheffield ; and then the counsel took a grave, and somewhat sterner tone with her, saying—" Miss Barham, I feel deeply for your situation, after the promise that you have made, for the purpose of saving your life ; but before I propose to you the question which I am about to ask, I beg to remind you, first, that no promise, exacted under fear of death, can be held binding for one moment ; secondly, that you have a duty to your God and to your country to perform—to the laws, and to society in general, which duty must be accomplished unflinchingly ; and I now ask you, by that duty, however much pain it may give you—Do you, or do you not, see in this court the man whose face you beheld on the night in question ?"

Helen paused, and there was a dead silence through the whole hall.

" I will not prevaricate in the least," she replied, in a voice still firm, though her face was very pale, " and I know fully what I expose myself to ; but I will not answer, in any way, a question which endangers the life of a man who spared mine when my death would have ensured his safety. I will not say, whether I do see him or do not see him, and I will bear no testimony against him whatsoever."

Again there was a profound silence in the court ; and then the counsel expostulated, and the judge, in a mild but serious manner, brought forward every argument which could be adduced, to persuade Helen Barham to answer the question asked her ; but nothing moved her, and when he added a threat of using the authority with which he was invested for punishing contempt of the court, she replied in a mild and humble, but still a firm tone—" I came hither, my lord, with a full knowledge of what you might be obliged to do ; and I have only to beseech you, in consideration of the circumstances in which I am placed, to deal with me as leniently as possible, believing that it is a firm belief I should be committing a great crime, were I to act otherwise, that makes me maintain a silence which, whatever it may be called, does not border in the slightest degree upon contempt."

The good judge looked down, evidently distressed and puzzled how to act. But the counsel for the crown—resolved at all events to gain some admission which might prove the fact he wanted to establish—demanded, somewhat suddenly—" Is it your final determination, Miss Barham, not to point out in this court the man whose face you saw on the night in question ?"

" I did not say he was in the court," replied Helen, who had studiously kept her eyes turned from the dock ever since she entered—" I know not whether he is in the court or not. I merely said that I would not answer any question on the subject. If it were to affect my life itself, I would make the same reply ; for that life which he spared he has every right to require again, if by the sacrifice of it his own can be shielded."

" I fear," said the judge, " that the dignity of the court must be vindicated. Miss Barham, I warn you, that if you still refuse to give evidence, I must commit you for contempt, as the most lenient method of dealing with you."

Helen bowed her beautiful head, replying, in a low tone—" I know it my lord."

" Let the warrant be made out," said the judge ; " and let the witness be removed in custody."

As he saw Helen quitting the witness-box in charge of the officers of the court, Harry Martin took a quick step forward to the front of the dock, as if about to speak, but at that moment a warning voice was heard amongst the crowd, exclaiming—" Harry !"

His eyes ran rapidly round to that side of the court, and he saw his wife with her two hands clasped, gazing with a look of agony in his face. He instantly cast down his eyes again, and drew slightly back, while one of his companions in captivity whispered—" Well, that girl is a diamond !"

The reader has by this time perceived that this differs materially from Mr. James's former style of romance. The plot—that is, the misunderstandings, cross-purposes, changed children, &c., &c.—may not be in any wise remarkable, but the characters are in general true both to individual and universal nature, while the interest is well kept up, and the narrative clear and distinct. These are great merits, independently of a graceful, lively, and correct style ; and it is another merit that all ends happily for the good, while the humanly frail and erring are reclaimed through mercy, and the irredeemably vicious meet their deserts. It was impossible that the lovely Juliet Carr could be the true daughter of the crafty, sordid miser. Helen Barham, released by death from the weak and worthless brother whom to the last she so fondly cherished, is found to be the heiress of great wealth, and has it in her power to repay the noble generosity of Sir Morley, who had been the innocent means of keeping her father and brother from their estates, which he at once restored on the true owner being discovered. Morley is, however, still rich enough ; and at the close of all, one feels much less interest in the happily married pair than in the virgin lady of the land, and her reformed steward Harry Martin, who in Italy had been her deliverer from the mortal peril which, through the attempts of Count Lieberg, had menaced her honour and her life. This is the graceful close of this well-told tale :—

For Morley, he was happier than even imagination, warmed by love and expectation, had been able to paint ; and with Juliet by his side, let it be said, the good " Tenant of the Heart," the high, the holy, and the pure —the spirit of the soul, maintained a perpetual sway over her more earthly comrade.

Some five or six years after the period of this tale, the two cottages, which we have described as seated in the little glen near Warmstone Castle, appeared thrown into one, decorated with shrubs and flowers, and, generally, with three or four rosy children running about the doors. From the little garden-gate every morning, half an hour after sun-rise, might be seen to ride forth a very powerful man, growing, perhaps, a little heavy withal, but mounted on a stout Yorkshire horse, well fitted to carry him. The labourers and tenants touched their hat to the steward; and, though with a wary and a watchful eye he perambulated the property, seeing that no injustice was done to his beloved mistress, yet all the people on the land declared that Mr. Martin was a kind, good man; that he was tender to the poor, charitable to all, liberal to the active and industrious, and, above all things, clement, and no way harsh to an unconfirmed wrong-doer; for he himself well knew, that, whatever magistrates or lawgivers may say, Mercy has power to reclaim.

And of her, the mistress of the mansion, what have we to tell? That Helen remained Helen Barham still, in mind, in character, as well as in name. If there was regret resting as a shade upon her mind, if there was disappointment amongst the memories of the heart, the pure, high spirit veiled them from all eyes; and though I must not say she struggled with them—for there was nothing like contention in her breast, after Juliet and Morley were once united—yet she repressed all selfish feelings, and saw the happiness that their union produced with a bright though grave tranquillity. She laid out for herself, from that moment, her course of life. In the fair and calm abode which seemed to have been prepared expressly for her, she passed her future years in diffusing happiness and sunshine round her. The cottage knew her step well; and a class above that found her a kind and indulgent lady, healing all wounds, reconciling all differences, and silencing clamour and complaint. It was very seldom throughout the whole neighbourhood, that sweet smile, and that soft voice, would not prevail, even where every harsher means had been tried in vain. She was a good neighbour, too, and a good friend; and her beauty, her extraordinary beauty, remained undiminished for many years. It was as if the pure and noble spirit had a balmy and preserving influence even upon her corporeal frame. There is one thing strange, however, in regard to her fate; though many admired the lovely woman, and many coveted the hand of the wealthy heiress, no one ever ventured to ask that boon of Helen Barham.

Several years afterwards she besought Juliet to allow her to adopt one of her children, and make him heir of the property which had once been his father's. The boy spent several months with her in each succeeding year; and once—but only once—as he looked up with a bright and beaming smile in Helen's face, while she parted the beautiful hair upon his brow, her eyes filled with tears, and she clasped him to her bosom, with emotions that could not be restrained.

And Lieberg! Was nothing, then, ever heard of him? Can one form no conjecture, backed by sufficient probabilities, of his real fate?

Reader, his body was never found; but his spirit, alas! still lives, and pervades too many a scene, blasting with its presence what otherwise might be bright. Happy is the man who has not a Lieberg always very, very near him!

Where?

In his own heart!

SONGS OF THE MONTHS.

NO. VII.—THE SONG OF JULY.

I.

"Pho! how hot! how very hot!" you cry, "this is quite horrid!"
'Tis I that breathe upon you, I, July the dry and torrid.
I started from Sahara wide, and baited at Morocco;
Thence, swept the haughty midland sea on wings of the Sirocco.
Sirius bears my torch on high, earth holds no thing I char not;
The wide heath is my Congreve-box, the forest old my Arnott.
The tall rye I will scorch and parch, till his rough beard is yellow;
And roast the pear in his tough skin, until the rogue is mellow.
I'll stop your springs, and dry your wells, and make your rivers shallow,
And lay the rushes in the marsh, dead on the prostrate mallow.

Ay! do that I will;
While you shall pant
Like elephant
Toiling up a hill.
Drouth shall make you wish to booze
For ever;
Fatigue invite you to a snooze
Come never!
For ordure-fed flies, my own hybrids,
In your mouth ever anxious to drown,
Shall dance a Scots fling on your eyelids,
The moment sleep coaxes them down,
Then hover till Sampson's dread weapon is dropping,
And the moment occurs o'er it safe to be hopping.
Yet, fribbling thus, I creep down to the roots
Of the oaks, in their sinewy grasp,
Whence, forth in the Navy my energy shoots,—
For the Nations all wonder, and gasp
At the thunder of England still awing the world,
With the flag of her FREEMEN for ever unfurl'd!

II.

"Oh, this meat! delicious meat!" you sigh, "already 's tainted!
And this nice pigeon-pie is sour; and see! my wife has fainted!"
Aha! I found your larder out, with malice preconcerted,
Your venison touch'd, your pasty spoil'd, and with your mistress flirted:
O! close I hugg'd her in my arms, as mine own crisp-hair'd Negress;
But the poor fool's soul, at every sense, beat languidly for egress:—
Dull death she feign'd in my embrace! so down I flung the vixen,—
Is she immortal Juno? Bah! July is not an Ixion:
I scarcely touch'd her churlish lips, which paled before my pleasure;
But I will have revenge enow at mine own royal leisure.

Ay! for that I vouch;
To mar your ease,
Rank bugs and fleas
Shall haunt your midnight couch:
Dreams shall crib you up in caves
Eternal,
'Midst molten ore, and sulphurous waves
Infernal!
Till much abused Fear,—you may think it's Benignity aye when you speak,—
Kicks you out from a mountain of blankets,
All steaming, and dripping, and weak,
Enraged at your vision, and chafing with fury,
That the year should contain or the earth should endure me.
But look at my glory! Refulgent from high,
While old Swithin is shedding his tears,
My pageant of gladness is coming,—'tis nigh—
I have gilded the barley-corn's ears,
And the sickle I've crook'd to the husbandman's hand,
I have ripened the harvest, and blessed the land!

NO. VIII.—THE SONG OF AUGUST.

I.

What wings be they make the Dottrel flinch?
The Aberdevine's, and the mountain finch,
I' th' forest tree:
They tell of thick clouds in the northern sky,
Where the snow-flake's gathering cold and high,
They tell of me!
They proclaim me the Son of the gentle South,
With her balmy breath, and her honied mouth,
Who, launching rich joy on the flagon's foam,
Fills every soul at the harvest-home:
And they follow me forth, like hordes of men,
From hyperborean steppe and glen.
Ah! never has conqueror's back been turned
On acre of mine which his sword has earned;
And never was hind, or pale oppidan,
But sighed for the South, a desiring man.—
The cucumber cool, and the black-currant's juice,
To your feverish lips I introduce;
The gooseberry ripe I offer, and bring
The luscious-pulp'd peach to your banqueting.
While blazing gems from old Midnight's crown
I will snatch from the sky, and fling you down.
Your barn doors I'll ope,
And cram to the cope,
With toil for the peasant, and tithe for the Pope:
For oysters I'll grope,
With dredgers and rope,
And give you their slime, for, grant me the trope,
You are greedy of garbage as Cormorant Hope,
Which still devours and sickens still of all within its scope.

II.

All meekness is mine; winds barely enough
To shake the rock samphire and gladden the Chough,
Or ripple the sea:
Yet, laden with riches, a boisterous throng
Of truant boys, bold in their daring and wrong,
Will follow me!
I saw them but now, scour the stubble in swarms,
With pinafores pursed, and hats hundreds of forms;
Thence tivy'd they all, with speed of a sledge,
And buried them deep in the hazel hedge;
Save one, who perched him in yew-tree as scout,
With wicked eyes peering for ever about.
Now in yon Orchard, stealthy and dumb,
Crunching the apple, and plucking the plumb,
How happy be they! and, proud of their cheer,
Think August the jolliest month of the year.—
Fresh notes I prepare for the woodland choir,
Give his voice to the Daw in the ancient spire;
The bull-rush I deck with a velvet cap,
And arouse the plough from his summer nap:
And, hark you! my sparrows I've led to your ricks,
Haste, thatcher, haste! with your tethering sticks:
And cook, get your coke,
Make jam-kettles smoke,
I will fill them with fragrance to shame your chiboque:—
Where water-plants soak
Life's music 's awoke:
Hear you the whistle, the cackle, and croak,
While the grasshopper chirrups in his russet cloak,
And bats flit round on plumeless wings, that gladden in the oak?

MOFFAT'S MISSIONARY LABOURS AND SCENES IN SOUTHERN AFRICA.*

This, in its leading feature, the personal record of its author, is a very remarkable book, and one which is better calculated to show the utility of missions to Africa than any work that has appeared for many years back. It is the narrative of a man who has been for twenty-three years a faithful and diligent labourer among the heathen, as the agent, in South Africa, of the London Missionary Society,—of a man of quick intelligence, and remarkable sagacity, and one who appears to have been in every way singularly well adapted to the difficult situation into which Providence has thrown him. From youth to middle age he has spent his life in privations, vicissitudes, and dangers, of which stay-at-home people can hardly form an idea; and which few men possess the courage, fortitude, and physical hardihood to encounter, and much less to persevere under.

The missionary to barbarous or half-civilized countries is the true hero of modern times. He is the successor of the hardy and enterprising navigator and discoverer of the middle ages; though he follows in their track for much nobler purposes, and in the strength of a purer spirit. But, independently altogether of his sacred vocation, we have seldom read any narrative which more powerfully stirs the sympathies than this of Moffat; or which interests the reader more deeply, in the perils, conflicts, and personal adventures of the actor, and in the display of those varied intellectual and physical qualities and resources which, in the face of what seemed insurmountable obstacles, has enabled him to work what looks like miracles, among the barbarous tribes for whose improvement he has laboured with untiring courage; often cast down, but never despairing. He and his coadjutors may now be hailed as the civilizers of the barbarous tribes of South Africa, whom they have conquered and civilized by Christianizing. But these—civilisation and Christianity—are phrases which ought to be synonymous.

From the published Reports of the Missionary Society, and the African Narratives of the Rev. John Campbell, late of Kingsland, some of our readers must probably have some previous knowledge of the author of this work. At a very early age he was sent out to Africa by the London Society. The principal scene of his missionary labours has been among the Bechuanas; and his headquarters is now the flourishing Kuruman Station, which he was mainly instrumental in planting. But his has been a wandering life, and one wholly spent among "savage tribes and roving barbarians"; nor does John Campbell over-rate Moffat's extraordinary powers and achievements when he says,—"To master the language he wandered the deserts with the savage tribes, sharing their perils and privations. He outdid Paul in accommodating himself to all men, in order to save some. Paul never became a savage in lot, to save savages. Many might indeed thus stoop to conquer, but few could retain both their piety and philosophy in such society!"

* 1 volume 8vo, cloth. With numerous illustrations, and coloured frontispiece. Pp. 624. London: Snow.

On Campbell's second journey to Africa, Mr. Moffat was his companion from Cape Town into the interior. Though much younger in years, and perhaps inferior to Campbell in some secondary attainments, we should infer that Moffat is a man of loftier intellect, and one who possesses, in a far higher degree, those qualities which enable the missionary to acquire and retain influence over a barbarous people. His personal courage alone, and skill in the chase and in many useful arts, must have given him an immense advantage with the Africans.

In the course of his long sojourn among the Bechuanas and Namaquas, and the neighbouring tribes, Mr. Moffat has made several journeys to Cape Town on private business, or for objects connected with his missionary labours. On one of these journeys he was married to a young lady to whom he appears to have been engaged before he left England, and who has been his faithful companion in the desert. In the wilds of Africa he has had a large family, and experienced a full share of domestic affliction and calamity, though his wife must have been not only a very great addition to his happiness, but to his usefulness as a labourer among the heathen. The year before last, Mr. Moffat, for the first time since his departure, visited England, to give an account of his extraordinary labours, and more extraordinary ultimate success. This, we understand, he has frequently done orally, but better by the publication of the interesting work before us, which he has bequeathed as a legacy to the multitudes of friends of all classes who have shown him kindness, before he shall finally return to the far-distant scene of his labours, his conflicts, and his triumphs. The country of his adoption has become that of his affections; the wilderness, now no longer a wilderness, his beloved home. We presume that Mr. Moffat is now far on his way to the shores of Africa.

In an old note-book of John Campbell's, there appears this notice of Mr. Moffat, which we cite in the first place:—"His education does not qualify him to preach at Cape Town; but I believe him to be a first-rate missionary to the heathen. He is also acquainted with agriculture, carpentery work, the sextant, map-making," &c. &c. A knowledge of medicine and surgery appear to have been among Mr. Moffat's useful acquirements; and with his own hands he printed the Gospels, which he had translated into the language of the country, as well as school-books, hymn-books, and other useful tracts. To own the truth, we are not certain that Campbell was able to appreciate the full merits of this breaker-up of the fallow-ground, in a field to which he was himself but a transient though a most useful visiter. As to Moffat not being qualified to preach at Cape Town, if such be the fact, the fault must rest with the audience, and not with the Preacher;—the actor in, and the author of, the remarkable narrative before us. Preaching—and we wish this were as generally understood among the clergy as it is among the laity—admits of much greater variety than is usually imagined, and of a far wider range of topics. If a man who has spent an active life, replete with wild adventure and daring enterprize, among the barbarous hordes of Africa, propagating the Gospel by exhibiting its fruits in his lessons and in his life, be not an adept in the conventionalities and usages of monotonous sermonizing, as they are practised among us and transmitted from generation to generation almost unchanged—if he may not be what is called a "good preacher," he is something of a far higher character, which not one "good preacher" in a thousand is fitted to become. A feeling of undue humility has led Mr. Moffat to make superfluous apologies for the imperfections of his style, and for his inability to enter upon philosophical disquisition and analysis. He has done much better; he has supplied philosophers, and all orders of men, with copious materials, and much novel matter for reflection; and the actor in the wild scenes he describes, the witness of the strange facts he relates, could not fail of apt expressions to convey his own vivid feelings and recollections of the events he had witnessed; could not, in short, fail to be imaginative and eloquent in the best sense. Moffat is so in an eminent degree. He is a native of Scotland, which says something for the early nurture of the higher faculties of his mind; and his residence in the wilderness has wonderfully preserved the originality and raciness of his mental constitution. An able man he must have been under all circumstances; but had he lived at home, aiming to become such a preacher as, for a season, is pretty sure to captivate a town or civilized audience, he would probably have been tamed down into respectable mediocrity.

He was accepted by the Directors of the Society, and set apart for his work at the same time with the lamented Williams, the "Martyr of Erromanga." His career has been more arduous, his conflict more protracted; and when the nature of his position is closely examined, his final success appears to us more remarkable. He has eminently been a breaker-up of the fallow-ground; one who bears the burden in the heat of the day. His volume must, we imagine, engage the attention of many who are not particularly interested in missionary enterprise, from the curious and novel aspects in which it presents a portion of the great human family, and from its copious additions to natural history. Intelligent travellers, passing through these tribes, describe superficially their condition and manners; but men like Moffat, who have spent a lifetime among them, studied and used their language, and adopted their usages so far as this was advisable, becoming, as it were, children of their family, are able to do much more. The missionaries, if tolerably enlightened men, are certainly much better qualified to tell us of the people among whom they labour, than any other description of travellers.

Mr. Moffat's volume opens with a general view of the condition of the tribes of Southern Africa; and a retrospective history of missions to that division of the great continent. He begins with Schmidt, who was sent forth by the Moravians to the Hottentots upwards of a century since. The fascinating history of Schmidt's successful labours has long been familiar to the world. They were suspended by the jealousy of the Dutch East India Company; but fifty years afterwards, when Missionaries were again sent out, the good fruits of Schmidt's labours were still visible, and his memory paved the way for the favourable reception of Vanderkemp and others. The retrospect of the various South-African Missions, from their commencement until the period when Mr. Moffat became himself an actor in the scenes he describes, and the principal hero of his own tale, is interesting, though it falls below the personal narrative, both from the tamer nature of the events, and the greater animation of the author, when he comes to be the actor, instead of the chronicler, of those daring and perilous adventures. From the Hottentots the missions were gradually extended to the Bushmen, the Namaquas, Corannas, Griquas, and Bechuanas; the native converts becoming efficient instruments in spreading religious knowledge among their savage and nomade neighbours. In 1806, the Orange River was first crossed by the missionaries, and the mission of Namaqua-land established, under very disastrous circumstances, by the brothers Albrechts. A fierce, predatory chief, named Africaner, a name which afterwards became familiar and dear to the friends of African Missions, was at that time the scourge and terror of the country, but particularly of the Dutch settlers on the frontier of the colony. The history of this noble African is not a little romantic. The first missionaries were ready to despond, and to abandon the enterprise under the many and grievous discouragements; and, among other reasons, from their proximity to this noted freebooter and cattle-stealer. One day, this dreaded personage appeared at the station, and thus addressed them—

"As you are sent by the English, I welcome you to the country; for though I hate the Dutch, my former oppressors, I love the English; for I have always heard that they are the friends of the poor black man." . . . Jager, the eldest son of the old man, from his shrewdness and prowess, obtained the reins of the government of his tribe at an early age. He and his father once roamed on their native hills and dales, within 100 miles of Cape Town; pastured their own flocks, killed their own game, drank of their own streams, and mingled the music of their heathen songs with the winds which burst over the Witsemberg and Winterhoek mountains, once the strongholds of his clan. As the Dutch settlers increased, and found it necessary to make room for themselves, by adopting as their own the lands which lay beyond them, the Hottentots, the aborigines, perfectly incapable of maintaining their ground against these foreign intruders, were compelled to give place by removing to a distance, or yielding themselves in passive obedience to the farmers. From time to time he found himself and his people becoming more remote from the land of their forefathers, till he became united and subject to a farmer named P——. Here he and his diminished clan lived for a number of years. In Africaner, P—— found a faithful, and an intrepid shepherd; while his valour in defending and increasing the herds and flocks of his master enhanced his value, at the same time it rapidly matured the latent principle which afterwards recoiled on that devoted family, and carried devastation to whatever quarter he directed his steps. Had P—— treated his subjects with common humanity, not to say with gratitude, he might have died honourably, and prevented the catastrophe which befell the family, and the train of robbery, crime, and bloodshed, which quickly followed that melancholy event.

We omit the tragedy, in which the farmer, by treachery, provoked his fate. When the horrible outrage was completed, Africaner, with as little loss of time as possible, rallied the remnant of his tribe, and, with what they could take with them, directed their course to the Orange River, and were soon beyond the reach of pursuers, who, in a thinly-scattered population, required time to collect. He fixed his abode on the banks of the Orange River; and afterwards, a chief ceding to him his dominion in Great Namaqua-land, it henceforth became his by right, as well as by conquest.

The subsequent wild adventures of this bold and generous outlaw, carry the imagination back to the days of Johnny Armstrong and Robin Hood, or of the "landless" Macgregor; but his end was of a very different character. The man who lived in continual strife with all around him, whose hand was against every man; whose business was rapine, and whose passion revenge; whose name was a terror not only to the colonists on the north, but to the native tribes of the south; "whose name carried dismay into the solitary places," became an eminent instance of the power of the principles of the Gospel over a mind which, however fierce and untaught, had never been treacherous nor ungenerous. Mr. Moffat relates, that after this great change had taken place—

As I was standing with a Namaqua chief, looking at Africaner, in a supplicating attitude, entreating parties ripe for a battle, to live at peace with each other: "Look," said the wondering chief, pointing to Africaner, "there is the man, once the lion, at whose roar even the inhabitants of distant hamlets fled from their homes! Yes, and I" (patting his chest with his hand) "have, for fear of his approach, fled with my people, our wives and our babes, to the mountain glen, or to the wilderness, and spent nights among beasts of prey, rather than gaze on the eyes of this lion, or hear his roar."

Another native chief, with whom Africaner was at deadly feud, was named Berend. Several of their bloody conflicts and cattle forays are described, in which great skill as well as prowess were displayed upon both sides. Theirs were generally drawn battles, and they continued to harass and to breathe hatred and defiance to each other, until Berend also was subdued by the power of the Gospel of Peace. Probably both the chiefs about the same time began to perceive the unprofitable nature of their sanguinary quarrels. Of Nicholas Berend, a brother of the chief, and one of his best captains, it is told that he was afterwards attached to different missions as a native teacher. He was, says Moffat,—

A very superior man both in appearance and intellect. I have frequently travelled with him, and many a dreary mile have we walked over the wilderness together. Having an excellent memory, and good descriptive powers, he has often beguiled the dreariness of the road, by rehearsing deeds of valour in days of heathenism, in which this struggle with Africaner bore a prominent part, and on which he could not reflect without a sigh of sorrow. . . . . Nicholas finished his Christian course under the pastoral care of the Rev. T. L. Hodgson, Wesleyan missionary at Boochuap. His end was peace.

Among the earlier exploits of Africaner was sacking the Namaqua mission-station, probably for the sake of plunder, but avowedly because some of his property had been unjustly seized by a settler. A conciliatory letter, which John Campbell, when travelling through Namaqua-land, in deadly terror of Africaner, addressed to the formidable freebooter, is said to have produced a powerful effect upon his naturally intelligent and elevated mind. Two of his brothers were converted by the preaching of the missionary Ebner, and were baptized shortly before Mr. Moffat, in 1817, left Cape Town for Africaner's village in the wilderness. He says—

It was evident to me, as I approached the boundaries of the colony, that the farmers, who, of course, had not one good word to say of Africaner, were sceptical to the last degree about his reported conversion, and most unceremoniously predicted my destruction. One said he would set me up for a mark for his boys to shoot at; and another, that he would strip off my skin, and make a drum of it to dance to; another most consoling prediction was, that he would make a drinking cup of my skull. I believe they were serious, and especially a kind motherly lady, who, wiping the tear from her eye, bade me farewell, saying, "Had you been an old man, it would have been nothing, for you would soon have died, whether or no; but you are young, and going to become a prey to that monster."

But we shall see more of this remarkable person. The privations and dangers of the journey to Africaner's village might have interest in the narrative of an ordinary traveller; but Moffat's subsequent adventures far eclipse these early trials of his faith and patience, his manliness and hardihood. His reception by the tamed Wolf, the scourge of the desert, is interesting. Africaner had applied for a missionary; but as Moffat advanced, the inhabitants of another kraal intercepted and wished to detain him among them, and almost forced him to remain, until the appearance of a party of the chief's people and three of his brothers ended the contest. Moffat's reception seemed cold; and his brother missionary Ebner, who had baptized the Africaners, described the whole inhabitants as a "wicked, suspicious, and dangerous people, baptized and unbaptized." The chief was so long of making his appearance that young Moffat's heart began to fail, but at length Africaner welcomed him with frank kindness; hoped that as he was so young he would live long among them; and he immediately set the labourers, the usual drudges, the beasts of burden, the poor women, to build a hut for the missionary:—

A circle was instantly formed, and the women, evidently delighted with the job, fixed the poles, tied them down in the hemispheric form, and covered them with the mats, all ready for habitation, in the course of little more than half an hour. Since that time, I have seen houses built of all descriptions, and assisted in the construction of a good many myself; but I confess I never witnessed such expedition. Hottentot houses, (for such they may be called, being confined to the different tribes of that nation,) are at best not very comfortable. I lived nearly six months in this native hut, which very frequently required tightening and fastening after a storm. When the sun shone, it was unbearably hot; when the rain fell, I came in for a share of it; when the wind blew, I had frequently to decamp to escape the dust; and in addition to these little inconveniences, any hungry cur of a dog that wished a night's lodging, would force itself through the frail wall, and not unfrequently deprive me of my anticipated meal for the coming day; and I have more than once found a serpent coiled up in a corner. . . . . But to return to my new habitation, in which, after my household matters were arranged, I began to ruminate on the past,—the home and friends I had left, perhaps, for ever; the mighty ocean which rolled between, the desert country through which I had passed, to reach one still more dreary. In taking a review of the past, which seemed to increase in brightness, as I traced all the way in which I had been brought, during the stillness of my first night's repose, I often involuntarily said and sung,

"Here I raise my Ebenezer, Hither by thy help I'm come."

The inimitable hymn from which these lines are taken, was often sung by Mr. and Mrs. Kitchingman and myself, while passing through the lonely desert. But my mind was frequently occupied with other themes. I was young, had entered into a new and responsible situation, and one surrounded with difficulties of no ordinary character. Already I began to discover some indications of an approaching storm, which might try my faith. The future looked dark and portentous in reference to the mission.

This was a cheerless beginning, and worse evils were at hand. Mr. Ebner, the missionary at this station, was, from some unexplained cause, on very ill terms with Titus Africaner, and he shortly after this abandoned the station, and returned to Germany, his native land. It is not unfair to conclude that he was not well adapted to a situation so difficult, and requiring so much sagacity; and it appears to have been owing to the presence and influence of Moffat that he at last got away unharmed. The condition of the solitary young man he left was painful in the extreme; and he had not yet made trial of himself. He tells—

I was left alone with a people suspicious in the extreme; jealous of their rights, which they had obtained at the point of the sword; and the best of whom Mr. E. described as a sharp thorn. I had no friend and brother with whom I could participate in the communion of saints, none to whom I could look for counsel or advice. A barren and miserable country; a small salary, about £25 per annum. No grain, and consequently no bread, and no prospect of getting any, from the want of water to cultivate the ground; and destitute of the means of sending to the colony. . . . . Soon after my stated services commenced—which were, according to the custom of our missionaries at that period, every morning and evening, and school for three or four hours during the day—I was cheered with tokens of the Divine presence. The chief, who had for some time past been in a doubtful state, attended with such regularity, that I might as well doubt of morning's dawn, as of his attendance on the appointed means of grace. To reading, in which he was not very fluent, he attended with all the assiduity and energy of a youthful believer; the Testament became his constant companion, and his profiting appeared unto all. Often have I seen him under the shadow of a great rock, nearly the livelong day, eagerly perusing the pages of Divine inspiration; or in his hut he would sit, unconscious of the affairs of a family around, or the entrance of a stranger, with his eye gazing on the blessed book, and his mind wrapt up in things divine. Many were the nights he sat with me, on a great stone, at the door of my habitation, conversing with me till the dawn of another day, on creation, providence, redemption, and the glories of the heavenly world. He was like the bee, gathering honey from every flower, and at such seasons he would, from what he had stored up in the course of the day's reading, repeat generally in the very language of Scripture, those passages which he could not fully comprehend. He had no commentary, except the living voice of his teacher, nor marginal references: but he soon discovered the importance of consulting parallel passages, which an excellent memory enabled him readily to find. He did not confine his expanding mind to the volume of revelation, though he had been taught by experience that that contained heights and depths, and lengths and breadths, which no man comprehends. He was led to look upon the book of nature; and he would regard the heavenly orbs with an inquiring look, cast his eye on the earth beneath his tread, and regarding both as displays of creative power and infinite intelligence, would inquire about endless space and infinite duration. I have often been amused, when sitting with him and others, who wished to hear his questions answered, and descriptions given of the majesty, extent, and number of the works of God; he would at last rub his hands on his head, exclaiming "I have heard enough; I feel as if my head was too small, and as if it would swell with these great subjects."

Before seasons like these to which I am referring, Titus, who was a grief to his brother, and a terror to most of the inhabitants on the station, as well as a fearful example of ungodliness, had become greatly subdued in spirit. . . . . He was the only individual of influence on the station who had two wives, and fearing the influence of example, I have occasionally made a delicate reference to the subject, and, by degrees, could make more direct remarks on that point, which was one of the barriers to his happiness; but he remained firm, admitting, at the same time, that a man with two wives was not to be envied; adding, "He is often in an uproar, and when they quarrel, he does not know whose part to take." He said he often resolved when there was a great disturbance to pay one off.

This poor man's trials and perplexities with his brace of wives are amusing enough; but in the character of his brother, the once fierce heathen, there is a mild dignity, a noble simplicity, which illustrates the influence of the pure faith of the Gospel better than a hundred homilies. Of him we have this testimony:—

But to return to the character of Africaner; during the whole period I lived there, I do not remember having occasion to be grieved with him, or to complain of any part of his conduct; his very faults seemed to "lean to virtue's side." One day, when seated together, I happened, in absence of mind, to be gazing steadfastly on him. It arrested his attention, and he modestly inquired the cause. I replied "I was trying to picture to myself your carrying fire and sword through the country, and I could not think how eyes like yours could smile at human woe." He answered not, but shed a flood of tears! He zealously seconded my efforts to improve the people in cleanliness and industry; and it would have made any one smile to have seen Christian Africaner and myself superintending the school children, now about 120, washing themselves at the fountain. It was, however, found that their greasy, filthy carosses of sheepskins soon made them as dirty as ever. The next thing was to get them to wash their mantles, &c. . . . . At an early period I became an object of his charity, for, finding out that I sometimes sat down to a scanty meal, he presented me with two cows, which, though in that country giving little milk, often saved me many a hungry night, to which I was exposed. He was a man of peace; and though I could not expound to him that the "sword of the magistrate" implied, that he was calmly to sit at home, and see Bushmen or marauders carry off his cattle, and slay his servants; yet so fully did he understand and appreciate the principles of the gospel of peace, that nothing could grieve him more than to hear of individuals, or villages, contending with one another. He who was formerly like a firebrand, spreading discord, enmity, and war among the neighbouring tribes, would now make any sacrifice to prevent anything like a collision between two contending parties; and when he might have raised his arm, and dared them to lift a spear, or draw a bow, he would stand in the attitude of a suppliant, and entreat them to be reconciled to each other; and, pointing to his past life, ask, "What have I of all the battles I have fought, and all the cattle I took, but shame and remorse?" At an early period of my labours among that people, I was deeply affected by the sympathy he, as well as others of his family, manifested towards me in a season of affliction. The extreme heat of the weather, in the house which I have described, and living entirely on meat and milk, to which I was unaccustomed, brought on a severe attack of bilious fever, which, in the course of two days, induced delirium. Opening my eyes in the first few lucid moments, I saw my attendant and Africaner sitting before my couch, gazing on me with eyes full of sympathy and tenderness. Seeing a small parcel, containing a few medicines, I requested him to hand it to me, and taking from it a vial of calomel, I threw some of it into my mouth, for scales or weights I had none. He then asked me, the big tear standing in his eye, if I died, how they were to bury me. "Just in the same way as you bury your own people," was my reply; and I added, that he need be under no apprehensions if I were called away, for I should leave a written testimony of his kindness to me. This evidently gave him some comfort, but his joy was full, when he saw me speedily restored, and at my post, from which I had been absent only a few days.

In addition to Christian Africaner, his brothers, David and Jacobus, both believers, and zealous assistants in the work of the mission, especially in the school, were a great comfort to me. David, though rather of a retiring disposition, was amiable, active, and firm; while Jacobus was warm, affectionate, and zealous for the interest of souls. His very countenance was wont to cheer my spirits, which, notwithstanding all I had to encourage, would sometimes droop. Long after I left that people, he was shot, while defending the place against an unexpected attack made on it by the people of Warm Bath.

After Moffat had laboured for a considerable time among the Bechuanas, and had made several distant excursions on objects connected with his mission, he induced Africaner to accompany him on a visit to the Cape, though the expedition was not without danger to the chief, who for his former marauding upon the settlers was still an outlaw with 1000 rix-dollars offered for his head. He said, when the journey was proposed, that he thought Mr. Moffat had loved him better than to give him up to the government to be hanged. The affair was for three days publicly discussed; and when it was concluded, nearly the whole inhabitants of Africaner's village—all his subjects—or clansmen, accompanied them to the banks of the Orange River, and parted from them with tears. At Warm Bath, the place referred to in the subjoined extract, there was a mission-station, from whence religion and civilisation had emanated to the wilds; and on the journey, it is said—

Arriving at Pella, (the place as before stated, to which some of the people from Warm Bath had retired when the latter was destroyed by Africaner,) we had a feast fit for heaven-born souls, and subjects to which the seraphim above might have tuned their golden lyres. Men met who had not seen each other since they had joined in mutual combat for each other's woe; met—warrior with warrior, bearing in their hands the olive branch, secure under the panoply of peace and love.

We spent some pleasant days while the subject of getting Africaner safely through the territories of the farmers to the Cape, was the theme of much conversation. To some the step seemed somewhat hazardous. Africaner and I had fully discussed the point before leaving the station; and I was confident of success. Though a chief, there was no need of laying aside anything like royalty, with a view to travel in disguise. Of two substantial shirts left, I gave him one; he had a pair of leather trowsers, a duffel jacket, much the worse for wear, and an old hat, neither white nor black, and my own garb was scarcely more refined. As a farther precaution, it was agreed, that for once I should be the chief, and he should assume the appearance of a servant, when it was desirable, and pass for one of my attendants.

Ludicrous as the picture may appear, the subject was a grave one, and the season solemn and important; often did I lift up my heart to Him in whose hands are the hearts of all men, that his presence might go with us. It might here be remarked, once for all, that the Dutch farmers, notwithstanding all that has been said against them by some travellers, are, as a people, exceedingly hospitable and kind to strangers. Exceptions there are, but these are few, and perhaps more rare than in any country under the sun. Some of these worthy people on the borders of the colony, congratulated me on returning alive, having often heard, as they said, that I had been long since murdered by Africaner. Much wonder was expressed at my narrow escape from such a monster of cruelty, the report having been spread that Mr. Ebner had but just escaped with the skin of his teeth. While some would scarcely credit my identity; my testimony as to the entire reformation of Africaner's character, and his conversion, was discarded as the effusion of a frenzied brain. It sometimes afforded no little entertainment to Africaner and the Namaquas, to hear a farmer denounce this supposed irreclaimable savage. There were only a few, however, who were sceptical on this subject. At one farm, a novel scene exhibited the state of feeling respecting Africaner and myself, and likewise displayed the power of Divine grace under peculiar circumstances. . . . . I gave him in a few words my views of Africaner's present character, saying, "He is now a truly good man." To which he replied, "I can believe almost anything you say, but that I cannot credit; there are seven wonders in the world: that would be the eighth." I appealed to the displays of Divine grace in a Paul, a Manasseh, and referred to his own experience. He replied, these were another description of men, but that Africaner was one of the accursed sons of Ham, enumerating some of the atrocities of which he had been guilty. By this time we were standing with Africaner at our feet, on whose countenance sat a smile, well knowing the prejudices of some of the farmers. The farmer closed the conversation by saying, with much earnestness, "Well, if what you assert be true respecting that man, I have only one wish, and that is, to see him before I die; and when you return, as sure as the sun is over our heads, I will go with you to see him, though he killed my own uncle." I was not before aware of this fact, and now felt some hesitation whether to discover to him the object of his wonder; but knowing the sincerity of the farmer, and the goodness of his disposition, I said, "This, then, is Africaner!" He started back, looking intensely at the man, as if he had just dropped from the clouds. "Are you Africaner?" he exclaimed. He arose, doffed his old hat, and making a polite bow, answered, "I am." The farmer seemed thunder-struck; but when, by a few questions, he had assured himself of the fact, that the former bugbear of the border stood before him, now meek and lamb-like in his whole deportment, he lifted up his eyes, and exclaimed, "O God, what a miracle of thy power! what cannot thy grace accomplish!" The kind farmer, and his no less hospitable wife, now abundantly supplied our wants; but we hastened our departure, lest the intelligence might get abroad that Africaner was with me, and bring unpleasant visiters.

The Governor at the Cape was Lord Charles Somerset, who was somewhat surprised to learn that the lion of the wilderness had been led in to him like a lamb. About this time, Dr. Philip and John Campbell had arrived from England to examine the state of the African missions. It was Mr. Campbell's second visit to Africa, and it appeared—

To be one of the happiest moments of Mr. Campbell's life to hold converse with the man, at whose very name, on his first visit to Namaqua-land, he had trembled, but on whom, in answer to many prayers, he now looked as a brother beloved. Often while interpreting for Mr. C., in his inquiries, I have been deeply affected with the overflow of soul experienced by both, while rehearsing the scenes of bygone days.

Africaner's appearance in Cape Town excited considerable attention, as his name and exploits had been familiar to many of its inhabitants for more than twenty years. Many were struck with the unexpected mildness and gentleness of his demeanour, and others with his piety and accurate knowledge of the Scriptures. His New Testament was an interesting object of attention, it was so completely thumbed and worn by use. His answers to a number of questions put to him by the friends in Cape Town, and at a public meeting at the Paarl, exhibited his diligence as a student in the doctrines of the Gospel, especially when it is remembered that Africaner never saw a Catechism in his life, but obtained all his knowledge on theological subjects from a careful perusal of the Scriptures, and the verbal instructions of the missionary.

Might it not be inquired whether the absence of catechisms and theological works, and the careful study of the Scriptures, without gloss or commentary, might have been the main cause of Africaner's growth in true knowledge, as in true grace; and that many things esteemed helps as often prove impediments? The conduct of Africaner to his dying hour was edifying and consistent. His latter years were spent in conducting the public offices of religion at the station, and in teaching in the schools. In his dying exhortation to the people, whom he had called together to hear his last words, when he had given them directions for their future conduct in temporal affairs, he bade them remember that they were no longer savages, but men professing to be taught by the Gospel, and that it was accordingly their duty to walk by its precepts. In summing up the character of Africaner, who from a fierce predatory warrior, the chief of a savage tribe, had by the power of the Gospel been converted into the Alfred of his subjects, Mr. Moffat remarks:—

Many had been the refreshing hours we had spent together, sitting or walking, tracing the operations of the word and Spirit on his mind, which seemed to have been first excited under the ministry of Christian Albrecht. Subsequent to that period, his thoughts were frequently occupied while looking around him, and surveying the "handy-works" of God, and asking the question, "Are these the productions of some great Being? —how is it that his name and character have been lost among the Namaquas, and the knowledge of Him confined to so few?—has that knowledge only lately come to the world?—how is it that he does not address mankind in oral language?" . . . . In trying to grasp the often indistinct rays of light, which would occasionally flit across his partially awakened understanding, he became the more bewildered, especially when he thought of the spirit of the Gospel message, "Good-will to man." He often wondered whether the book he saw some of the farmers use said anything on the subject; and then he would conclude, that if they worshipped any such being, he must be one of a very different character from that God of love to whom the missionaries directed the attention of the Namaquas.

How often must the same doubt have occurred to the Hindoo, the Mussulman, and the gentle savage of many other regions!

Mr. Moffat gives a very interesting account of the rise and progress of the Griqua mission, in which he was personally concerned, and a retrospective view of other inroads on heathendom, which will be perused with pleasure, were it only from the enterprise and bold adventures of the daring pioneers, and the light incidentally thrown upon the moral and physical condition of the barbarous tribes that they visited. His relation of his own conflicts and long fruitless endeavours have yet deeper interest. His actual experiences bring great doubt upon the theories of a natural conscience, a moral sense, and the idea of a "vicarious offering" or atonement said to be diffused over the whole globe, and also of man being a religious creature. The existence of a Supreme Being, and the immortality of the soul of man, had never, even in a shadow or tradition, been heard of among these people :—

A chief, after listening attentively to me while he stood leaning on his spear, would utter an exclamation of amazement, that a man whom he accounted wise, should vend such fables for truths. Calling about thirty of his men, who stood near him, to approach, he addressed them, pointing to me, "There is Ra-Mary, (Father of Mary,) who tells me, that the heavens were made, the earth also, by a beginner, whom he calls Morimo. Have you ever heard anything to be compared with this? He says that the sun rises and sets by the power of Morimo; as also that Morimo causes winter to follow summer, the winds to blow, the rain to fall, the grass to grow, and the trees to bud;" and casting his arm above and around him, added, "God works in every thing you see or hear! Did ever you hear such words?" Seeing them ready to burst into laughter, he said, "Wait, I shall tell you more; Ra-Mary tells me that we have spirits in us, which will never die; and that our bodies, though dead and buried, will rise and live again. Open your ears to-day; did you ever hear litlamane (fables) like these?" This was followed by a burst of deafening laughter; and on its partially subsiding, the chief man begged me to say no more on such trifles, lest the people should think me mad! . . . . . .

One day, while describing the day of judgment, several of my hearers expressed great concern at the idea of all their cattle being destroyed, together with their ornaments. They never for one moment allow their thoughts to dwell on death, which is according to their views nothing less than annihilation. Their supreme happiness consists in having abundance of meat. Asking a man who was more grave and thoughtful than his companions what was the finest sight he could desire, he instantly replied, "A great fire covered with pots full of meat;" adding, "how ugly the fire looks without a pot!"

The grander phenomena of nature had no power to awaken or fix their attention. The following is a true picture of these wandering children of the wilderness, of man in his natural state :—

"They looked on the sun," as Mr. Campbell very graphically said, "with the eyes of an ox." To tell them, the gravest of them, that there was a Creator, the governor of the heavens and earth, of the fall of man, or the redemption of the world, the resurrection of the dead, and immortality beyond the grave, was to tell them what appeared to be more fabulous, extravagant, and ludicrous than their own vain stories about lions, hyenas, and jackals. To tell them that these were articles of our faith, would extort an interjection of superlative surprise, as if they were too preposterous for the most foolish to believe. . . . . What they heard was all right, provided they got a bit of tobacco, or some little equivalent for their time—a thing of no value to them—which they spent in hearing one talk. Some would even make a trade of telling the missionary that they prayed, by which means God directed them to their lost cattle, at a few yards' distance, after having been in search of them several days; and that in the same way he had brought game within reach of their spears. Replies to questions as to what they thought of the Word of God, were very cheap; and if they supposed that by such means they had obtained favour and respect, their success would be the subject of merriment in their own circles. Some individuals, to my knowledge, who had carried on this deception in the early period of the mission, many years afterwards boasted how expert they had been in thus gulling the missionary.

Although they had received much instruction, they appeared never for one moment to have reflected upon it, nor did they retain traces of it in their memories, which are generally very tenacious. Accordingly, most of those who at an early period made professions to please, died as they had lived, in profound ignorance. Munameets, though an early friend of the mission, the travelling companion of Mr. Campbell, and one of the most sensible and intelligent men of the nation, than whom no one at the station had enjoyed equal privileges, made the following remark to the writer, in his usual affectionate way, not long before his death—"Ra-Mary, your customs may be good enough for you, but I never see that they fill the stomach," putting his hand on his own; "I would like to live with you, because you are kind, and could give me medicine when I am sick. Though I am the uncle of Mothibi, I am the dog of the chief, and must gather up the crumbs (gorge at festivals). I am one of the elders of the people, and though I am still a youth (seventy years!) my thoughts and perceptions are neither so swift nor acute as they were. Perhaps you may be able to make the children remember your mekhua (customs)."

They could not see that there was any thing in our customs more agreeable to flesh and blood than in their own, but would, at the same time, admit that we were a wiser and a superior race of beings to themselves. For this superiority some of their wise heads would try to account: but this they could only do on the ground of our own statements, that a Great Being made man.

A wily rain-maker, who was the oracle of the village in which he dwelt, once remarked after hearing me enlarge on the subject of creation, "If you verily believe that that Being created all men, then, according to reason, you must also believe, that in making white people he has improved on his work; He tried his hand on Bushmen first, and he did not like them, because they were so ugly, and their language like that of the frogs. He then tried his hand on the Hottentots, but these did not please him either. He then exercised his power and skill and made the Bechuanas, which was a great improvement; and at last he made the white people: therefore," exulting with an air of triumph at the discovery, "the white people are so much wiser than we are, in making walking-houses (wagons,) teaching the oxen to draw them over hill and dale, and instructing them also to plough the gardens instead of making their wives do it, like the Bechuanas." His discovery received the applause of the people, while the poor missionary's arguments, drawn from the source of Divine truth, were thrown into the shade.

In a country where extreme drought is the greatest natural calamity to be dreaded, the rain-maker is an important personage; and one who, if clever and cunning, turns his knavery to excellent account. The arts of the rain-maker among these African tribes are very similar to those described by Catlin, as employed by the rain-makers among the Indians on the Upper Missouri. Though the Bechuanas, like the Hottentots, have now adopted many of the customs of civilized life, and made considerable progress in the useful arts, they, in the early period of Mr. Moffat's labours, despised and ridiculed European customs, and gave a decided preference to their own :—

They could not account for our putting our legs, feet, and arms into bags, and using buttons for the purpose of fastening bandages round our bodies, instead of suspending them as ornaments from the neck or hair of the head. Washing the body, instead of lubricating it with grease and red ochre, was a disgusting custom, and cleanliness about our food, house, and bedding, contributed to their amusement in no small degree. A native, who was engaged roasting a piece of fat zebra flesh for me on the coals, was told that he had better turn it with a stick, or fork, instead of his hands, which he invariably rubbed on his dirty body for the sake of the precious fat. This suggestion made him and his companions laugh extravagantly, and they were wont to repeat it as an interesting joke wherever they came.

Mr. Moffat gives a long and minute account of their national usages, ending thus :—

These ceremonies were prodigious barriers to the gospel. Polygamy was another obstacle, and the Bechuanas, jealous of any diminution in their self-indulgence, by being deprived of the services of their wives, looked with an extremely suspicious eye on any innovation on this ancient custom. While going to war, hunting, watching the cattle, milking the cows, and preparing their furs and skins for mantles, was the work of the men, the women had by far the heavier task of agriculture, building the houses, fencing, bringing firewood, and heavier than all, nature's charge, the rearing of a family. The greater part of the year they are constantly employed ; and during the season of picking and sowing their gardens, their task is galling, living on a coarse, scanty fare, and frequently having a babe fastened to their backs, while thus cultivating the ground.

The men, for obvious reasons, found it convenient to have a number of such vassals, rather than only one ; while the woman would be perfectly amazed at one's ignorance, were she to be told that she would be much happier in a single state, or widowhood, than being the mere concubine and drudge of a haughty husband, who spent the greater part of his life in lounging in the shade, while she was compelled, for his comfort as well as her own, to labour under the rays of an almost vertical sun, in a hot and withering climate. . . . . .

While standing near the wife of one of the grandees, who, with some female companions, was building a house, and making preparations to scramble by means of a branch on to the roof, I remarked that they ought to get their husbands to do that part of the work. This set them all into a roar of laughter. Mahuto, the queen, and several of the men drawing near to ascertain the cause of the merriment, the wives repeated my strange, and, to them, ludicrous proposal, when another peal of mirth ensued. Mahuto, who was a sensible and shrewd woman, stated that the plan, though hopeless, was a good one, as she often thought our custom was much better than theirs. It was reasonable that woman should attend to household affairs, and the lighter parts of labour ; while man, who went to boast of his superior strength, should employ his energy in more laborious occupations ; adding, she wished I would give their husbands medicine to make them do the work. This remark was made rather in a way of joke.

The government of the Bechuanas is similar to that found everywhere in the same state of society,—patriarchal, but monarchical, mild in its character, and essentially popular. The head chief, or king, is restrained by the petty chiefs; and in the public assemblies or parliaments an eloquent speaker will often attack the chief, and turn the weight of opinion against him :—

I have heard him inveighed against for making women his senators and his wife prime minister, while the audience were requested to look at his body, and see if he were not getting too corpulent ; a sure indication that his mind was little exercised in anxieties about the welfare of his people. He generally opens the business of the day with a short speech, reserving his eloquence and wisdom to the close of the meeting, when he analyses the speeches that have been delivered, and never forgets to lash in the most furious language those who have exposed his faults, and who, as he would express it, have walked over his body, placing their feet upon his neck. This is all taken in good part, and the exhausted chieftain is heartily cheered when the meeting dissolves. These assemblies keep up a tolerable equilibrium of power between the chiefs and their king : but they are only convened when differences between tribes have to be adjusted, when a predatory expedition is to be undertaken, or when the removal of a tribe is contemplated ; though occasionally matters of less moment are introduced.

Any custom which might be construed into some vague idea of the necessity of an atoning sacrifice and of a future state, is by Mr. Moffat assigned to the cunning of the sorcerers or rain-makers, who order an ox to be sacrificed for the benefit of their own stomachs, though the ostensible purpose is the public weal, or to avert national calamity, or cure disease.

One will try to coax the sickness out of a chieftain by setting him astride an ox, with its feet and legs tied, and then smothering the animal by holding its nose in a large bowl of water. A feast follows, and the ox is devoured, sickness and all. A sorcerer will pretend he cannot find out the guilty person, or where the malady of another lies, till he has got him to kill an ox, on which he manœuvres, by cutting out certain parts. Another doctor will require a goat, which he kills over the sick person, allowing the blood to run down the body ; another will require the fat of the kidney of a fresh slaughtered goat, saying, that any old fat will not do ; and thus he comes in for his chop. These slaughterings are prescribed according to the wealth of the individual, so that a stout ox might be a cure for a slight cold in a chieftain, while a kid would be a remedy for a fever among the poor, among whom there was no chance of obtaining anything greater. The above ceremonies might with little difficulty be construed into sacrifices, if we felt anxious to increase the number of traditionary remains. Is it, however, to be wondered at, among a pastoral people, whose choicest viand is broiled or boiled meat, and to whom fat of any kind is like the richest cordials, that they should solemnize every event or circumstance with beef!

A treaty or covenant between parties is always ratified by the slaughter of one or more animals, and a consequent feast. In brief, Mr. Moffat's reasoning goes far to demolish many plausible theories of the innate perception of a Supreme Being, and an innate sense of rectitude in the human mind, and of the universal idea of the necessity of a vicarious atonement.

Years rolled on, and the benighted, or rather the embruted people, remained in apparently the same state of apathy and ignorance as at the first. As long as they were gratified with presents they remained good-humoured ; but when the streams of bounty or bribery ceased to flow they became rude, abusive, and even dangerous. The life passed by Mr. and Mrs. Moffat, and their fellow-labourer Mr. Hamilton, was not only one of great discomfort and hardship, but of peril and bitterness.

Our time was incessantly occupied in building, and labouring frequently for the meat that perisheth ; but our exertions were often in vain, for while we sowed, the natives reaped. . . . . The native women, seeing the fertilizing effect of the water in our gardens, thought very naturally that they had an equal right to their own, and took the liberty of cutting open our water-ditch, and allowing it on some occasions to flood theirs. This mode of proceeding left us at times without a drop of water, even for culinary purposes. It was in vain that we pleaded, and remonstrated with the chiefs,—the women were the masters in this matter. Mr. Hamilton and I were daily compelled to go alternately three miles with a spade, about three o'clock P. M., the hottest time of the day, and turn in the many outlets into native gardens, that we might have a little moisture to refresh our burnt-up vegetables during the night, which we were obliged to irrigate when we ought to have rested from the labours of the day. Many night watches were spent in this way; and after we had raised with great labour vegetables, so necessary to our constitutions, the natives would steal them by day as well as by night, and after a year's toil and care, we scarcely reaped anything to reward us for our labour. . . . . When we complained, the women, who one would have thought would have been the first to appreciate the principles by which we were actuated, became exasperated, and going to the higher dam, where the water was led out of the river, with their picks completely destroyed it, allowing the stream to flow in its ancient bed. By this means the supply of water we formerly had was reduced to one-half, and that entirely at the mercy of those who loved us only when we could supply them with tobacco, repair their tools, or administer medicine to the afflicted. But all this, and much more, failed to soften their feelings towards us. Mrs. Moffat, from these circumstances, and the want of female assistance, has been compelled to send the heavier part of our linen a hundred miles to be washed.

Our situation might be better conceived than described: not one believed our report among the thousands by whom we were surrounded. Native aid, especially to the wife of the missionary, though not to be dispensed with, was a source of anxiety, and an addition to our cares; for any individual might not only threaten, but carry a rash purpose into effect. . . . . As many men and women as pleased might come into our hut, leaving us not room even to turn ourselves, and making everything they touched the colour of their own greasy red attire; while some were talking, others would be sleeping, and some pilfering whatever they could lay their hands upon. This would keep the housewife a perfect prisoner in a suffocating atmosphere, almost intolerable; and when they departed, they left ten times more than their number behind—company still more offensive. As it was not pleasant to take our meals amongst such filth, our dinner was often deferred for hours, hoping for their departure; but, after all, it had to be eaten when the natives were despatching their game at our feet. Our attendance at public worship would vary from one to forty; and these very often manifesting the greatest indecorum. Some would be snoring; others laughing; some working; and others, who might even be styled the noblesse, would be employed in removing from their ornaments certain nameless insects, letting them run about the forms, while sitting by the missionary's wife. Never having been accustomed to chairs or stools, some, by way of imitation, would sit with their feet on the benches, having their knees, according to their usual mode of sitting, drawn up to their chins. In this position one would fall asleep and tumble over, to the great merriment of his fellows. On some occasions an opportunity would be watched to rob when the missionary was engaged in public service. . . . .

Some nights, or rather mornings, we had to record thefts committed in the course of twenty-four hours in our houses, our smith-shop, our garden, and among our cattle in the field. . . . . Some of our tools and utensils which they stole, on finding the metal not what they expected, they would bring back, beaten into all shapes, and offer them in exchange for some other article of value. Knives were always eagerly coveted, our metal spoons they melted: and when we were supplied with plated iron ones, which they found not so pliable, they supposed them bewitched. Very often, when employed working at a distance from the house, if there was no one in whom he could confide, the missionary would be compelled to carry them all to the place where he went to seek a draught of water, well knowing that if they were left they would take wings before he could return. . . . . .

Sometimes the missionary is called to suffer much greater privations than have now been described. This may be the most proper place, briefly to introduce a sketch of the general character of my manner of living, while on this station. As before noticed, I had neither bread nor vegetables. Mr. Bartlett, of Pella, once sent me a bag containing a few pounds of salt, but, on examining it, I could scarcely tell whether there was most sand or salt, and having become accustomed to do without it, I hung it upon a nail, where it remained untouched. My food was milk and meat, living for weeks together on one, and then for a while on the other, and again on both together. All was well so long as I had either, but sometimes they both failed. . . . . I shall never forget the kindness of Titus Africaner, who, when he visited the station, would come and ask what he could do for me, and, on receiving a few shots, would go to the field, and almost always bring me home something, for he was an extraordinary marksman.

The contents of my wardrobe bore the same impress of poverty. The supply of clothes which I had received in London were, as is too often the case, made after the dandy fashion, and I being still a growing youth, they soon went to pieces. There were no laundry-maids there, nor anything like ironing or mangling. The old woman who washed my linen sometimes with soap, but oftener without, was wont to make one shirt into a bag, and stuff the others into it, and I just took them out as they were, and more than once have I turned one to feel the comfort of a clean shirt. My dear old mother, to keep us out of mischief in the long winter evenings, taught me both to sew and knit; and when I would tell her I intended being a man, she would reply, "Lad, ye dinna ken whar your lot will be cast." She was right, for I have often had occasion to use the needle since.

These are but a specimen of the privations and hardships to which all these good men and their families had, more or less, to submit.

One main object with Moffat was the acquisition of the language, in which he has since made so great a proficiency. But this important acquirement was attended with many difficulties, and made under the most unfavourable circumstances. He relates—

It was something like groping in the dark, and many were the ludicrous blunders I made. The more waggish of those from whom I occasionally obtained sentences and forms of speech, would richly enjoy the fun, if they succeeded in leading me into egregious mistakes and shameful blunders; but though I had to pay dear for my credulity, I learned something. After being compelled to attend to every species of manual, and frequently menial, labour for the whole day, working under a burning sun, standing on the saw-pit, labouring at the anvil, treading clay, or employed in cleaning a water-ditch, it may be imagined that I was in no very fit condition for study, even when a quiet hour could be obtained in the evening for that purpose. And this was not all; an efficient interpreter could not be found in the country; and when everything was ready for inquiry, the native mind, unaccustomed to analyse abstract terms, would, after a few questions, be completely bewildered.

Upon this subject Mr. Moffat makes observations not less important to persons endeavouring to acquire an unwritten language than to philologers. Among the most formidable enemies of the missionaries were the sorcerers or rain-makers, whose province they had, it was suspected, come to usurp; for these crafty vagabonds, who live by adroitly cheating and deluding the people, seemed to think that the missionaries and themselves were of the same calling. A famous rain-maker, of grand pretensions, had been sent for from a great distance during a season of extreme drought, of whom it is told:

The rain-makers, as I have since had frequent opportunities of observing, were men of no common calibre; and it was the conviction of their natural superiority of genius, which emboldened them to lay the public mind prostrate before the reveries of their fancies. Being foreigners, they generally amplified prodigiously on their former feats. The present one, as has been noticed, was above the common order. He kept the chiefs and nobles gazing on him with silent amazement, while the demon of mendacity enriched his themes with lively imagery, making them fancy they saw their corn-fields floating in the breeze, and their flocks and herds return lowing homewards by noonday from the abundance of pasture. He had in his wrath desolated the cities of the enemies of his people, by stretching forth his hand, and commanding the clouds to burst upon them. He had arrested the progress of a powerful army, by causing a flood to descend, which formed a mighty river, and arrested their course. These, and many other pretended supernatural displays of his power, were received as sober truths. The report of his fame spread like wildfire, and the chiefs of the neighbouring tribes came to pay him homage. We scarcely knew whether to expect from him open hostility, secret machinations, or professed friendship. He, like all of his profession, was a thinking and calculating soul, in the habit of studying human nature, affable, engaging, with an acute eye, and exhibiting a dignity of mien, with an ample share of self-esteem, which, notwithstanding all his obsequiousness, he could not hide. . . . . He found we were men of peace, and would not quarrel. For the sake of obtaining a small piece of tobacco, he would occasionally pay us a visit, and even enter the place of worship. He was also studious not to give offence. While in the course of conversation, he would give a feeble assent to our views, as to the sources of that element, over which he pretended to have a sovereign control. . . . . .

It might be briefly noticed, that in order to carry on the fraud, he would, when clouds appeared, order the women neither to plant nor sow, lest they should be scared away. He would also require them to go to the fields, and gather certain roots and herbs, with which he might light what appeared to the natives mysterious fires. Elate with hope, they would go in crowds to the hills and dales, herborize, and return to the town with songs, and lay their gatherings at his feet. With these he would sometimes proceed to certain hills, and raise smoke; gladly would he have raised the wind also, if he could have done so, well knowing that the latter is frequently the precursor of rain. He would select the time of new and full moon for his purpose, aware that at those seasons there was frequently a change in the atmosphere. It was often a matter of speculation with me whether such men had not the fullest conviction in their own minds that they were gulling the public; and opportunities have been afforded which convinced me that my suspicions were well grounded. I met one among the Barolongs, who, from some service I had done him, thought me very kind, and, before he knew my character, became very intimate. He had derived benefit from some of my medicines, and consequently viewed me as a doctor, and one of his own fraternity. In reply to some of my remarks, he said, "It is only wise men who can be rain-makers, for it requires very great wisdom to deceive so many;" adding, "you and I know that." At the same time he gave me a broad hint that I must not remain there, lest I should interfere with his field of labour.

As those savages who are idolaters become enraged with their gods when their desires are not complied with, and break and tear them in pieces, so do these Africans act with their sorcerers. This great rain-maker was afterwards put to death by a chief; and his wife, who was considered too handsome for him, given to the chief's son. When all his arts, contrivances, and shifts had failed—and some of them were most ingenious—he insinuated that the cause of his failure was the presence of the missionaries, who rendered the clouds "hard-hearted," and "dried up the teats of heaven." The situation of the missionaries became at this juncture extremely perilous. It is said—

The people at last became impatient, and poured forth their curses against brother Hamilton and myself, as the cause of all their sorrows. Our bell, which was rung for public worship, they said, frightened the clouds; our prayers came in also for a share of the blame. "Don't you," said the chief rather fiercely to me, "bow down in your houses, and pray and talk to something bad in the ground!" A council was held, and restrictions were to be laid on all our actions. We refused compliance, urging that the spot on which the mission premises stood, had been given to the missionaries. The rain-maker appeared to avoid accusing us openly; he felt some sense of obligation, his wife having experienced that my medicines and mode of bleeding did her more good than all his nostrums. He would occasionally visit our humble dwellings, and when I happened to be in the smith's shop, he would look on most intently when he saw a piece of iron welded, or an instrument made, and tell me privately he wished I were living among his people, assuring me that there was plenty of timber and iron there.

One day he came and sat down, with a face somewhat elongated, and evincing inward dissatisfaction. On making inquiry, I found, as I had heard whispered the day before, that all was not right; the public voice was sounding ominous in his ears. He inquired how the women were in our country; and supposing he wished to know what they were like, I pointed him to my wife, adding, that there were some taller, and some shorter than she was. "That is not what I mean," he replied; "I want to know what part they take in public affairs, and how they act when they do so." I replied, "that when the women of my country had occasion to take an active part in any public affairs, they carried all before them;" adding, in a jocose strain, "wait till we missionaries get the women on our side, as they now are on yours, and there will be no more rain-makers in the country." At this remark he looked at me as if I had just risen out of the earth. "May that time never arrive!" he cried, with a countenance expressive of unusual anxiety. I replied, "that time would assuredly come, for Jehovah, the mighty God, had spoken it." He was evidently chagrined, for he had come for advice. "What am I to do!" he inquired; "I wish all the women were men; I can get on with the men, but I cannot manage the women." I viewed this as a delicate moment, and, feeling the need of caution, replied, "that the women had just cause to complain; he had promised them rain, but the land was dust, their gardens burned up, and were I a woman, I would complain as loudly as any of them."

The rain-maker kept himself very secluded for a fortnight, and, after cogitating how he could make his own cause good, he appeared in the public fold, and proclaimed that he had discovered the cause of the drought. All were now eagerly listening; he dilated some time, till he had raised their expectation to the highest pitch, when he revealed the mystery. "Do you not see, when clouds come over us, that Hamilton and Moffat look at them!" This question receiving a hearty and unanimous affirmation, he added, that our white faces frightened away the clouds, and they need not expect rain so long as we were in the country. This was a home-stroke, and it was an easy matter for us to calculate what the influence of such a charge would be on the public mind. We were very soon informed of the evil of our conduct, to which we pleaded guilty, promising, that as we were not aware that we were doing wrong, being as anxious as any of them for rain, we would willingly look to our chins, or the ground, all the day long, if it would serve their purpose. It was rather remarkable, that much as they admired my long black beard, they thought that in this case it was most to blame. However, this season of trial passed over, to our great comfort, though it was followed for some time with many indications of suspicion and distrust.

Matters were now coming to extremity. The long-continued drought, and all its attendant miseries, were attributed to the missionaries, who were ordered to leave the country; and it was hinted that violence would be employed unless the orders of the chiefs for their departure were obeyed. The missionaries refused to go away, and stated their reasons for remaining, which were of a nature quite incomprehensible to the aborigines, who however remarked, "These men must have ten lives. When they are so fearless of death, there must be something in immortality." The suspicions excited among these people, from the most trivial causes, forcibly illustrate the power of prejudice over ignorant minds. Two little images of soldiers, stuck upon a Dutch clock fixed in the wall in the place of worship, were magnified into something vast and sinister.

The little images in the clock were soon magnified into Goliahs, and the place of worship looked upon as an cintlu ea kholego, a house of bondage. It was necessary to take down the fairy-looking strangers, and cut a piece off their painted bodies, to convince the affrighted natives that the objects of their alarm were only bits of coloured wood. Many, however, thought themselves too wise to be thus easily deceived. Though perfectly convinced of the egregious folly of believing that the little lisêto, "carved ones," would one day seize them by the throat in the sanctuary, they nevertheless continued to suspect, that the motives of the missionary were anything but disinterested.

Mr. Moffat had been, even when matters looked the darkest, unconsciously laying the foundation of his future success; and now a crisis was at hand, of which he availed himself with singular boldness and sagacity, and at length fully gained the confidence and regard of the people, who could no longer doubt of his will and power to serve them. The details of those transactions which gained him the esteem and confidence of the tribe, exhibit one of the most complete pictures of savage warfare, —where the great impeller is hunger, and where one horde pours forth from the wilderness after another, spreading dismay and devastation in their course,—that ancient or modern literature affords.

For more than a year, numerous wild rumours of war, brought by the hunters and traders, had reached the mission-station, but of so extravagant a nature, that they were at first treated as the dreams of madmen. It was said that a mighty woman named Mantatee, was coming on at the head of an invincible army, numerous as the locusts, marching onward among the interior nations, bringing devastation and ruin wherever she appeared; and that she nourished the army with her own milk, sent out hornets before her, and was laying the world desolate. Mr. Moffat began to think that there must be some foundation for these extraordinary gazettes, and concluded that they were magnified rumours of the destructive wars carrying on by Chaka the tyrant of Zoolus; and though this monster was at too great a distance to cause alarm, the missionary had various reasons for wishing to ascertain the state of public affairs among the neighbouring tribes, and he accordingly resolved to visit Makaba, the chief of the Bauangketsi; and by opening a friendly intercourse, or mediating between hostile tribes, prevent, if possible, their perpetual bloody conflicts. He wished, besides, to become acquainted with their manners and language. The chief and people among whom he had so long resided on the Kuruman, were averse to his journey. Makaba was represented as a ferocious murderer, from whose territory he would never return alive. He however persisted in his purpose, and had not advanced far on his march when he ascertained, beyond a doubt, that the fierce and warlike tribe of Mantatees, typified by the gigantic woman, had actually reached some of the neighbouring tribes, whose towns were already in the hands of the marauders. The spies sent out to ascertain the movements of this advancing army,—which, like the ancient hordes, moved onward, accompanied by their wives, children, cattle, and dogs,—could give no satisfactory tidings; and Mr. Moffat and his company proceeded for the town of the chief, Makaba; but the party had not advanced much farther when they were driven to their wits' end.

We were on the alert, and made inquiries of every stranger we met about the invaders, but could learn nothing, although we were not more than fifteen miles from the town, of which it was reported the enemy were in possession. We saw, on a distant height, some men who were evidently looking our way, and their not approaching our wagons was so unusual with hungry natives, that we thought they must be strangers from a great distance, or some of the Mantatees. Two days passed over, and on the next, when we were about to start for the Bauangketsi, two Barolongs passing by, informed us of the fact that the Mantatees were in possession of the town, which lay rather in our rear, behind some heights, which we distinctly saw. As one of these men had narrowly escaped with his life in the conflict with that people, no doubt was left in our minds as to the propriety of returning immediately to the place whence we had come, particularly as there was a probability that our course might be intercepted, some prisoners who had escaped having reported that the enemy were about to start for Lithako. We lost no time in returning to Nokaneng, and were met there by individuals who authenticated my report to some thousands, who were pleasing themselves with the idea that there was no such enemy. When I arrived at our station the fearful news spread rapidly. A public meeting was convened, and the principal men met, to whom I gave a circumstantial account of all the information I had gathered respecting the character and progress of the Mantatees. That they were really a numerous and powerful body, had destroyed many towns of the Bakone tribes, slaughtered immense numbers of people, laid Kurrechane in ruins, scattered the Barolongs, and, in addition, were said to be cannibals! The alarming tidings produced at first a gloom on every countenance, and when I had finished speaking, a profound silence reigned for some minutes. Mothibi then replied in the name of the assembly, that he was exceedingly thankful that I had been tloga e thata, hard-headed, and pursued my journey, for, by so doing, I had discovered to them their danger.

All were now ready to bless me for having taken my own way. They solicited counsel, but all I could give was to flee to the colony, or call in the assistance of the Griquas; that as the Bechuanas were entirely unable to resist so numerous and savage a force as the Mantatees, I would proceed instantly to Griqua Town, give information, convey their wishes, and obtain assistance and wagons to remove our goods from the station. Some proposed fleeing to the Kalagare desert: but from this I strongly dissuaded them, fearing that many would perish from want. As no time was to be lost, in the absence of horses, I proceeded with my wagon to Griqua Town, where I had the pleasure of meeting, at Mr. Melvill's house, George Thompson, Esq., of Cape Town, who was on a tour, and about to visit Lithako.

In brief, the services which Mr. Moffat, by his promptitude and sagacity, rendered to the tribe at this critical period, gained for him an ascendency which he never afterwards lost. A public meeting or parliament was instantly assembled; the proceedings and eloquence of which are minutely described, and at which there was "little cheering, and less hissing, while every speaker fearlessly stated his sentiments." Our specimen of the eloquence of the pitsho must be brief. An old chief, when his turn came to address the assembly, said,—

"Ye sons of Molehabangue, ye have now had experience enough to convince you that it is your duty to proceed against the Mantatees, who have no object but to steal and destroy. Ye sons of Molehabangue! ye sons of Molehabangue! ye have done well this day. You are now acting wisely, first to deliberate and then to proceed: the missionary has discovered our danger like the rising sun after a dark night; a man sees the danger he was in when darkness shut his eyes. We must not act like Bechuanas, we must act like Makoöas (white people.) Is this our pitsho? No, it is the pitsho of the missionary; therefore we must speak and act like Makoöas."

But we have no space for eloquence. The time for action had come; the Griqua auxiliaries arrived; and the commando marched forth, accompanied by Mr. Moffat. It had been resolved in council, that the scene of combat had best be chosen at a distance from their town. The bold, yet becoming and consistent part, which the missionary acted throughout this campaign, must have raised him still higher in the esteem of the tribe, though he only acted as the consistent servant of the Prince of Peace. He and another individual advanced before the main body to learn how matters stood, and, if possible, to prevent a collision; but the Mantatees would not approach him; and he relates,—

At sunset I left Waterboer and the scouts, and rode back, to confer with Mr. Melvill and the Griqua chiefs, and to devise some scheme to bring the enemy to terms of peace, and prevent, if possible, the dreadful consequences of a battle. The Griquas had come, headed by their respective chiefs, Adam Kok, Berend Berend, Andries Waterboer, and Cornelius Kok; but it was unanimously agreed that Waterboer should take the command. Cornelius, nobly and generously, insisted on my taking his best horse, urging that my life was far more valuable than his. This kind act was the more sensibly felt as the horse was one of the strongest in the commando; and but for this circumstance, I could not have done what I did, nor, humanly speaking, could I have escaped with my life.

Having spent an almost sleepless night on the plain, from extreme cold, we were all in motion next morning before daylight. The attempt made the preceding day to bring about a friendly communication having entirely failed, it was judged expedient for the commando to ride up to the invaders, hoping, from the imposing appearance of about one hundred horsemen, to intimidate them, and bring them to a parley. For this purpose, the commando approached within 150 yards, with a view to beckon some one to come out. On this the enemy commenced their terrible howl, and at once discharged their clubs and javelins. Their black dismal appearance, and savage fury, with their hoarse and stentorian voices, were calculated to daunt; and the Griquas, on their first attack, wisely retreated to a short distance, and again drew up.

Soon after the battle commenced, the Bechuanas came up, and united in playing on the enemy with poisoned arrows, but they were soon driven back; half-a-dozen of the fierce Mantatees made the whole body scamper off in wild disorder. After two hours and a half's combat, the Griquas, finding their ammunition fast diminishing, at the almost certain risk of loss of life, began to storm; when the enemy gave way, taking a westerly direction. The horsemen, however, intercepted them, when they immediately descended towards the ravine, as if determined not to return by the way they came, which they crossed, but were again intercepted. On turning round, they seemed desperate, but were soon repulsed. Great confusion now prevailed, the ground being very stony, which rendered it difficult to manage the horses. At this moment an awful scene was presented to the view. The undulating country around was covered with warriors, all in motion, so that it was difficult to say who were enemies or who were friends. Clouds of dust were rising from the immense masses, who appeared flying with terror, or pursuing with fear. To the alarming confusion was added the bellowing of oxen, the vociferations of the yet unvanquished warriors, mingled with the groans of the dying, and the widows' piercing wail, and the cries from infant voices. The enemy then directed their course towards the town, which was in possession of a tribe of the same people, still more numerous. Here again another desperate struggle ensued, when they appeared determined to inclose the horsemen within the smoke and flames of the houses, through which they were slowly passing, giving the enemy time to escape. At last seized with despair, they fled precipitately. It had been observed during the fight that some women went backward and forward to the town, only about half a mile distant, apparently with the most perfect indifference to their fearful situation. While the commando was struggling between hope and despair of being able to route the enemy, information was brought that the half of the enemy under Chuane were reposing in the town, within sound of the guns, perfectly regardless of the fate of the other division, under the command of Karaganye. It was supposed they possessed entire confidence in the yet invincible army of the latter, being the more warlike of the two. Humanly speaking, had both parties been together, the day would have been lost, when they would, with perfect ease, have carried devastation into the centre of the colony. When both parties were united, they set fire to all parts of the town, and appeared to be taking their departure, proceeding in an immense body towards the north. If their number may be calculated by the space of ground occupied by the entire body, it must have amounted to upwards of forty thousand. The Griquas pursued them about eight miles; and though they continued desperate, they seemed filled with terror at the enemies by whom they had been overcome.

As soon as they had retired from the spot where they had been encamped, the Bechuanas, like voracious wolves, began to plunder and despatch the wounded men, and to butcher the women and children with their spears and war-axes. As fighting was not my province, of course I avoided discharging a single shot, though, at the request of Mr. Melvill and the chiefs, I remained with the commando, as the only means of safety. Seeing the savage ferocity of the Bechuanas, in killing the inoffensive women and children, for the sake of a few paltry rings, or of being able to boast that they had killed some of the Mantatees, I turned my attention to these objects of pity, who were flying in consternation in all directions. By my galloping in among them, many of the Bechuanas were deterred from their barbarous purposes. It was distressing to see mothers and infants rolled in blood, and the living babe in the arms of a dead mother. All ages and both sexes lay prostrate on the ground. Shortly after they began to retreat, the women, seeing that mercy was shown them, instead of flying, generally sat down, and, baring their bosoms, exclaimed, "I am a woman, I am a woman!" It seemed impossible for the men to yield. There were several instances of wounded men being surrounded by fifty Bechuanas, but it was not till life was almost extinct that a single one would allow himself to be conquered. I saw more than one instance of a man fighting boldly, with ten or twelve spears and arrows fixed in his body. The cries of infants which had fallen from the breasts of their mothers, who had fled or were slain, were distinctly heard, while many of the women appeared thoughtless as to their dreadful situation. Several times I narrowly escaped the spears and war-axes of the wounded, while busy in rescuing the women and children. The men, struggling with death, would raise themselves from the ground, and discharge their weapons at any one of our number within their reach: their hostile and revengeful spirit only ceased when life was extinct. . . . . The Mantatees are a tall, robust people, in features resembling the Bechuanas; their dress consisting of prepared ox hides, hanging double over the shoulders. The men during the engagement were nearly naked, having on their heads a round cockade of black ostrich feathers. Their ornaments were large copper rings, sometimes eight in number, worn round their necks, with numerous arm, leg, and ear rings of the same material. Their weapons were war-axes of various shapes, spears, and clubs; into many of their knob-sticks were inserted pieces of iron resembling a sickle, but more curved, sometimes to a circle, and sharp on the outside. Their language was only a dialect of the Sechuana, as I understood them nearly as well as the people among whom I lived. They appeared more rude and barbarous than the tribes around us, the natural consequences of the warlike life they had led. They were suffering dreadfully from want; even in the heat of battle, the poorer class seized pieces of meat and devoured them raw. At the close of the battle, when Mr. Melvill and I had collected many women and children, and were taking them to a place of safety, it was with the utmost difficulty we could get them forward. They willingly followed till they found a piece of meat, which had been thrown away in the flight, when nearly all would halt to tear and devour it, though perfectly raw.

When, a few days afterwards, upon an alarm reaching the station that the Mantatees were advancing to attack the Kuruman town, the female captives were carried along with the people who fled towards Griqua Town. We are told,—

Halting in the evening, a dead horse was found that had belonged to one of the Griquas, and which had been killed by the bite of a serpent. Next morning the women fell on the swollen and half-putrid carcase, and began, like so many wolves, to tear it limb from limb, every one securing as much as she could for herself. Mr Hamilton, who looked on with utter amazement, advised them to avoid the part where the animal was bitten. To his friendly warning they paid no attention whatever; in the space of about an hour a total dissection was effected, and every particle of skin, meat, bone, the entrails, and their contents, were carried off. Mr. H. was obliged to remain the whole day, finding it absolutely impossible to induce them to leave the spot till every particle was devoured, and in the evening they actually danced and sang with joy! This will appear the more astonishing, as the women were allowed a regular supply of rations; but when people have fasted for a year they require quantities of food, which, if mentioned, would appear incredible, and a long period elapses before the stomach regains its wonted tone. It would only excite disgust were the writer to describe sights of this kind which he has been compelled to witness. . . . . .

In the preceding sketch, I have glanced but very briefly at the varied scenes connected with the mournful picture of that day. It would have been an easy matter to give more facts, but my mind still shrinks from farther details of feats of savage barbarity, and lion-like ferocity, which I witnessed among the Mantatee warriors. No less furious and revengeful was the spirit manifested by the Batlapi and other tribes, who though the most accomplished cowards, compared with the invaders, showed that they were, if less inured to war, still as cruel as those who, for years, had been imbruing their hands in the blood of thousands. The wounded enemy they baited with their stones, clubs, and spears, accompanied with yellings and countenances indicative of fiendish joy. The hapless women found no quarter, especially if they possessed anything like ornaments to tempt the cupidity of their plunderers. . . . . .

The women evinced the most entire indifference to the objects of terror by which they were surrounded; but still mothers clung to their infants, whose piteous cries were sufficient to melt a heart of stone. With all their conquests and the many thousands of cattle which they must have captured, they were dying from hunger. Their march for hundreds of miles might have been traced by human bones. Not having seen horsemen before, they imagined horse and rider constituted only one animal; but this, as we afterwards heard, did not intimidate them, for their determination was fixed on attacking the colony, having heard that there were immense flocks of sheep there. Had they succeeded in reaching the Orange river, or the borders of the colony, where they would most probably have been defeated, the destruction of human life would have been even more dreadful, as they must have perished from want, when retreating through exasperated thousands of the tribes they had vanquished, towards their own country. Some of the Bechuanas were so sensible of this, that they secretly wished that it might be so, in order that they might satiate their vengeance on a conquered foe. . . .

The Mantatees, after finally leaving the country, separated into two divisions. The one proceeded eastward, towards the Bakone country, while the other proceeded to that of the Basuto, from the eastern parts of which they had emigrated, or rather been driven, by the destructive inroads of the Zoolu, Matabele, and other tribes. Like many other pastoral people, when robbed of their cattle, they have nothing left; and thus must either perish or rob others; and from being wild men they become more like wild beasts. It is a deeply interesting fact, that a missionary is now labouring with success among the latter, conquering them with far other weapons than those which were found necessary to arrest their devastating career at Old Lithako.

We have next this picturesque account of a night alarm in an African village:—

This was a night of great anxiety. Messengers arrived announcing the certain approach of the Mantatees. It was dark and dreary. The town, without lights of any description, except the few embers of the house-fires, round which sat the trembling families. Most of the men were out of doors, listening to anything like an unusual sound. The dogs kept up incessant barking. No watches were set, no spies sent out. There was no inhabitant between us and the field of battle. Every one appeared afraid to move from the spot where he stood. A cry of sorrow was raised in one part of the town which made every heart palpitate. It was the intelligence of one newly arrived,—the melancholy tale of the parent of a family having been slain by the Mantatees. Occasionally a chief would come to our houses to announce his terror. Imagination painted the town surrounded by a host of the enemy, waiting the dawn of day to commence a general massacre. The Mantatee women in our kitchens and outhouses perceived the alarm, and looked on, or slept with the most perfect indifference. Again and again parties came and knocked violently at our door, relating new fears—the spectres of their feverish minds. Mrs. M. put warm clothes on the two sleeping babes, in case of being able to escape on foot towards the mountain, while I hung my cloak on my gun fast by the door, ready to seize it for protection, in our flight, from beasts of prey. A woman who had the day before but scarcely escaped the deadly weapons of the enemy, ran the whole night, and on reaching the threshold of one of the houses, fainted with fatigue, and fell to the ground. On recovering, the first words she articulated was, "The Mantatees!" This went through the thousands like an electric shock. As morning light drew near, the intensity of feeling increased a hundred-fold. This was a season for the exercise of prayer, and faith in the promises of our God. The name of Jehovah was to us a strong tower, for, on looking back to that as well as to similar periods, we have often wondered that our fears were not greater than they were.

It was not until tranquillity was restored, after this alarming invasion, that Mr. Moffat accomplished his visit to Makaba. The picturesque details of all his journeys form delightful reading; but we press onward to the head-quarters of this formidable chief, who, as is proverbially said of another great personage, was found to be not quite so bad as he was sometimes called. They were welcomed by one of his sons and a party of his warriors; and—

Next day, before we had proceeded far, we were met by messengers from Makaba, who said he had not slept for joy, because of our approach. We passed many women, who were employed in their gardens, who, on seeing us, threw down their picks, and running to the wagons, lifted up their hands, exclaiming, "Rumela," (their manner of salutation,) which was followed by shrill cries sufficient to affright the very oxen. Our guide conducted us through a winding street to the habitation of Makaba, who stood at the door of one of his houses, and welcomed us to the town in the usual way. He seemed astonished and pleased to see us all without arms, remarking, with a hearty laugh, that he wondered we should trust ourselves, unarmed, in the town of such a villain as he was reported to be. In a few minutes a multitude gathered, who actually trode on each other in their eagerness to see the strangers and their horses. Meanwhile Makaba walked into a house, and sent us out a large jar, or pot of beer, with calabashes, in the form of a ladle. Being thirsty, we partook very heartily of the beer, which possessed but little of an intoxicating quality. . . . . .

Having thus reached the metropolis of the Bauangketsi, and having cast our eyes over a dense population, we were in some measure prepared for the din of many thousands of voices on the coming day. We were not mistaken, for, early next morning, and long before we were out of bed, we were surrounded by crowds, so that it was with difficulty we could pass from one wagon to another. On going up the hill to have a view of the neighbouring country, I was followed by a number of men, who, while I was taking some bearings, were not a little surprised at the compass, which they regarded as an instrument certainly belonging to a sorcerer, though they laughed when I asked them if they thought that I was one.

About ten o'clock A.M., Makaba made his appearance, with his retinue, and sat down opposite to my wagon. The bustling crowd retired to a distance, and a dead silence ensued. He addressed us nearly as follows:—"My friends, I am perfectly happy; my heart is whiter than milk, because you have visited me. To day I am a great man. Men will now say, 'Makaba is in league with white people.' I know that all men speak evil of me. They seek my hurt. It is because they cannot conquer me that I am hated. If they do me evil, I can reward them twofold. They are like children that quarrel; what the weaker cannot do by strength, he supplies with evil names. You are come to see the villain Makaba; you are come, as the Batlapis say, 'to die by my hands.' You are wise and bold to come and see with your eyes, and laugh at the testimony of my enemies," etc. A long conversation afterwards ensued respecting the state of the country, and the Mantatee invasion. On this topic he was eloquent while describing the manner in which he entrapped many hundreds of the enemy by ambuscades; and stretching forth his muscular arm in the direction of the field of conflict, he said, "There lie the bleached bones of the enemy who came upon our hills like the locusts, but who melted before us by the shaking of the spear;" adding, with a stentorian voice, and with superlative self-complacency, "Who is to be compared to Makaba, the son of Meleta, the man of conquest?" The listening multitude broke the silence in deafening applause. I then told him that the object of my present journey was to open a communication, that we might consider him in future as one of our chief friends.

Makaba's city was very large for an African town. He had many wives, each of whom had a large separate establishment. The houses, or clusters of huts, though not larger, were neater and better built than those of the tribe among whom Mr. Moffat lived; and there was one rare feature in their economy—cleanliness.

The accuracy with which circles were formed, and perpendiculars raised, though guided only by the eye, was surprising. Their outer yards and house-floors were very clean, and smooth as paper. No dairy-maid in England could keep her wooden bowls cleaner and whiter than theirs were. In this respect they formed a perfect contrast to the Batlapis. Makaba frequently referred to the barbarous manners of his southern neighbours, and asked me, with an air of triumph, if the Batlapis ever washed a wooden bowl, or if ever they presented me with food which did not contain the mangled bodies of flies, in a dish which had had no better cleaning than the tongue of a dog.

In the early part of the day Makaba was generally employed in cutting out skins to sew together for cloaks, and in the afternoon he was frequently found in a measure intoxicated, from a stronger kind of beer made for his own use. He appeared aged, although his mother was then alive. He was tall, robust, and healthy; had rather the appearance of a Hottentot; his countenance displayed a good deal of cunning; and, from his conversation, one might easily discern that he was well versed in African politics. He dreaded the displeasure of none of the surrounding tribes; but he feared the Makoöas, or civilized people. . . . . While walking to a neighbouring height, I was able to count fourteen considerable villages; the farthest distant about one mile and a half; and I was informed that there were more towns, which I could not see.

Though Makaba was a shrewd man about all ordinary affairs, and very fond of what he called news, it was impossible to engage, or even to awaken his attention to any of those serious topics upon which his visiter wished to converse. When told that he was to be entertained with news,—

His countenance lighted up, hoping to hear of feats of war, destruction of tribes, and such like subjects, so congenial to his savage disposition. When he found that my topics had solely a reference to the Great Being of whom, the day before, he had told me he knew nothing, and of the Saviour's mission to this world, whose name he had never heard, he resumed his knife and jackal's skin, and hummed a native air. One of his men, sitting near me, appeared struck with the character of the Redeemer, which I was endeavouring to describe, and particularly with his miracles. On hearing that he raised the dead, he very naturally exclaimed, "What an excellent doctor he must have been, to make dead men live!" This led me to describe his power, and how that power would be exercised at the last day in raising the dead. In the course of my remarks, the ear of the monarch caught the startling sound of a resurrection. "What!" he exclaimed with astonishment, "what are these words about? the dead, the dead arise!" "Yes," was my reply, "all the dead shall arise." "Will my father arise?" "Yes," I answered, "your father will arise." "Will all the slain in battle arise?" "Yes." "And will all that have been killed and devoured by lions, tigers, hyenas, and crocodiles, again revive?" "Yes; and come to judgment." "And will those whose bodies have been left to waste and to wither on the desert plains, and scattered to the winds, again arise?" he asked, with a kind of triumph as if he had now fixed me. "Yes," I replied, "not one will be left behind." This I repeated with increased emphasis. After looking at me for a few moments, he turned to his people, to whom he spoke with a stentorian voice:—"Hark, ye wise men, whoever is among you, the wisest of past generations, did ever your ears hear such strange and unheard of news?" . . . Makaba, then turning and addressing himself to me, and laying his hand on my breast, said, "Father, I love you much. Your visit and your presence have made my heart white as milk. The words of your mouth are sweet as honey, but the words of a resurrection are too great to be heard. I do not wish to hear again about the dead rising! The dead cannot arise! The dead must not arise!" "Why," I inquired, "can so great a man refuse knowledge, and turn away from wisdom? Tell me, my friend, why I must not 'add to words' and speak of a resurrection?" Raising and uncovering his arm, which had been strong in battle, and shaking his hand as if quivering a spear, he replied, "I have slain my thousands, (bontsintsi,) and shall they arise?"

There is much to interest in the character and romantic history of this barbarous chief, who, in his own fashion, treated his visiters with princely munificence. Before their departure, he entreated Mr. Moffat to let him see muskets discharged on horseback. Mr. Moffat says,—

I declined, observing that there were others of the company far more expert; but he would not be satisfied unless I did it, as I was a white man. After much persuasion I submitted, and going into my wagon, professedly to fetch my jacket, put into my pocket a brace of pistols, charged with powder only. After going a few turns round the smooth grassy plain, while the king and his attendants were roaring aloud with admiration, I galloped past them, discharging the contents of both pistols nearly at once, which astonished the Bauangketsi more than anything they had ever seen, and frightened them too, for they all fell prostrate to the earth, supposing they were shot. As soon as I alighted from the horse, Makaba began to unbutton my jacket to see the "little rogues," as he called them, exclaiming, "What a blessing that you white men seek to be friends with all nations, for who is there that could withstand you?" Laying his hand on my shoulder, he added, "I do, indeed, see that you were without fear, or you would have had your pistols this morning." After remaining for a couple of hours we parted, Makaba highly gratified, and the Griquas [they had been distrustful] no less so with the explanation which had taken place.

A still more remarkable and more distant chief named Moselekatse the king of a division of Zoolus named the Matabele, had heard of the white men of Peace, and sent two of his chief men, in company with some traders who had ventured into his country, to make themselves acquainted with the manners and arts of the Kuruman teachers. Knowledge of the art of war, of the means of destroying their enemies was, at first, the great object of all the chiefs in these embassies to the mission-stations. The strangers were astonished at all they saw—

Our houses, the walls of our folds and gardens, the water-ditch conveying a large stream out of the bed of the river, and the smith's forge, filled them with admiration and astonishment, which they expressed not in the wild gestures generally made by the mere plebeian, but by the utmost gravity and profound veneration, as well as the most respectful demeanour. "You are men, we are but children," said one; while the other observed, "Moselekatse must be taught all these things." . . . Nothing appeared to strike them so forcibly as the public worship in our chapel. They saw men like themselves meet together with great decorum; mothers hushing their babes, or hastily retiring if they made any noise, and the elder children sitting perfectly silent. When the missionary ascended the pulpit, they listened to the hymn sung, and though from their ignorance of the Bechuana language they could not understand all that was said, they were convinced that something very serious was the subject of the address. . . . . We embraced every opportunity of telling them the simple truths of the Gospel, and laboured to impress on their minds the blessings of peace.

It is often remarked that the Roman Catholic religion, from its imposing and, in some respects, impressive ceremonial, is the form of Christianity which is best adapted to a barbarous people; because it appeals at once to their senses. But may not this imposing ritual, with its attendant pomps and ceremonies, which so powerfully affect the untutored mind, in reality interpose a barrier between the understanding and the reception of spiritual truth?—may not those endless outward observances continue to hold the place of what they are meant to typify, and thus become hinderances and obstacles instead of helps? A picture of the Madona, a strain of music, the priests' vestments, the lights, the altar, and the picturesque celebration of the Catholic worship may, like any other spectacle, arrest the attention of those who cannot all at once apprehend the unadorned and simple, but sublime truths of the Gospel; but to gain this early advantage, is it wise to lay a false foundation and endanger the rearing of a superstructure of idle pageantry and useless ceremonial, while professing to teach the heathen that "God is a spirit, and that they that worship Him aright must worship him in spirit and in truth"?

When these intelligent barbarians had satisfied their curiosity, they proposed to return to their tyrannical and capricious sovereign, to report their embassy; but their way home, lying through hostile tribes, was unsafe, and any evil happening to the ambassadors of the fierce and warlike chief of the powerful and hostile tribe of the Matabele, must be productive of the worst consequences to the Bechuanas, and to the interests of the missionary cause in South Africa. Mr. Moffat, accordingly, resolved to become their escort as far as the Bahurutsi country, after which they could safely proceed to their own land. The adventures on this journey are, like the details of all Moffat's wanderings in those wild regions, full of incident of the most stirring kind. We shall refer to them again in connexion with some of the other encounters and perils from lions and other wild animals, which so often in this narrative freeze one's blood. We now take up the travellers on the tenth day of their journey—

We arrive at Mosega, the abode of Mokhatla, regent over the fragments, though still a large body, of the Bahurutsi. These had congregated in a glen, and subsisted on game, roots, berries, and the produce of their corn-fields; having been deprived of their flocks by the Mantatees. They were evidently living in fear, lest Moselekatse should one day make them captives. From these people I received a hearty welcome, though I was known to few of them except by name.

Having fulfilled my engagement, in conveying my charge in safety to the Bahurutsi, I, in a solemn and formal manner, delivered them over to the care of Mokhatla, requesting him either to go himself, or send a strong escort to accompany them until they reached the outposts of the Matabele. To this proposal the Tunas were strongly opposed, and entreated me most earnestly to accompany them to their own country; urging, that as I had shown them so much kindness, I must go and experience that of their king, who, they declared, would kill them if they suffered me to return before he had seen me. Mokhatla came trembling, and begged me to go, as he and his people would flee if I refused. I pleaded my numerous engagements at the Kuruman; but argument was vain. At last, to their inexpressible joy, I consented to go as far as their first cattle outposts. Mokhatla had long wished to see the fearful Moselekatse, who had desolated the Bakone country, and the proximity of whose residence gave him just reason to tremble for the safety of his people; and it was only because they were not the rich owners of herds of cattle, that they had not already become the prey of this African Napoleon.

The rain fell heavily for successive days, during which they halted with Mokhatla, who did not stand high in favour of the missionary. His Physiognomy and manœuvres evinced, that, while he had very little of what was noble about him, he was an adept at intrigue, and exhibited too much of the sycophant to command respect. He resolved to make himself one of my retinue. The country through which we had to travel was quite of a different character from that we had passed. It was mountainous, and wooded to the summits. Evergreens adorned the valleys, in which numerous streams of excellent water flowed through many a winding course towards the Indian Ocean. During the first and second day's journey I was charmed exceedingly, and was often reminded of Scotia's hills and dales. As it was a rainy season, everything was fresh; the clumps of trees that studded the plains being covered with rich and living verdure. But these rocks and vales, and picturesque scenes, were often vocal with the lion's roar. It was a country once covered with a dense population. On the sides of the hills and Kashan mountains were towns in ruins, where thousands once made the country alive, amidst fruitful vales now covered with luxuriant grass, inhabitated by game. The extirpating invasions of the Mantatees and Matabele had left to beasts of prey the undisputed right of these lovely woodland glens. The lion, which had revelled in human flesh, as if conscious that there was none to oppose, roamed at large, a terror to the traveller, who often heard with dismay his nightly roaring echoed back by the surrounding hills. We were mercifully preserved during the nights, though our slumbers were often interrupted by his fearful howlings. We had frequently to take our guns and precede the wagon, as the oxen sometimes took fright at the sudden rush of a rhinoceros or buffalo from a thicket. More than one instance occurred when, a rhinoceros being aroused from his slumbers by the crack of the whips, the oxen would scamper off like race-horses; when destruction of gear, and some part of the wagon, was the result.

We have little space for African landscapes; yet, for the sake of our juvenile readers, we must copy this pretty picture of a singular community, which will remind some of them of a description given by Humboldt of the Ottomaques on the banks of the Orinoco.

Having travelled one hundred miles, five days after leaving Mosega we came to the first cattle outposts of the Matabele, when we halted by a fine rivulet. My attention was arrested by a beautiful and gigantic tree, standing in a defile leading into an extensive and woody ravine, between a high range of mountains. Seeing some individuals employed on the ground under its shade, and the conical points of what looked like houses in miniature protruding through its evergreen foliage, I proceeded thither, and found that the tree was inhabited by several families of Bakones, the aborigines of the country. I ascended by the notched trunk, and found, to my amazement, no less than seventeen of these aërial abodes, and three others unfinished. On reaching the topmost hut, about thirty feet from the ground, I entered, and sat down. Its only furniture was the hay which covered the floor, a spear, a spoon, and a bowl full of locusts. Not having eaten anything that day, and from the novelty of my situation, not wishing to return immediately to the wagons, I asked a woman who sat at the door with a babe at her breast, permission to eat. This she granted with pleasure, and soon brought me more in a powdered state. Several more females came from the neighbouring roosts, stepping from branch to branch, to see the stranger, who was to them as great a curiosity as the tree was to him. I then visited the different abodes, which were on several principal branches. The structure of these houses was very simple. An oblong scaffold, about seven feet wide, is formed of straight sticks. On one end of this platform a small cone is formed, also of straight sticks, and thatched with grass. A person can nearly stand upright in it; the diameter of the floor is about six feet. The house stands on the end of the oblong, so as to leave a little square space before the door. On the day previous I had passed several villages, some containing forty houses, all built on poles about seven or eight feet from the ground, in the form of a circle; the ascent and descent is by a knotty branch of a tree placed in front of the house. In the centre of the circle there is always a heap of the bones of game they have killed. Such were the domiciles of the impoverished thousands of the aborigines of the country, who, having been scattered and peeled by Moselekatse, had neither herd nor stall, but subsisted on locusts, roots, and the chase. They adopted this mode of architecture to escape the lions which abounded in the country. During the day the families descended to the shade beneath to dress their daily food. When the inhabitants increased, they supported the augmented weight on the branches, by upright sticks, but when lightened of their load they removed these for fire-wood.

In the original work there is a wood engraving of the tree in which are perched those human nests. It is of the fig species, and, we need not say, very large. The houses in the boughs look like so many bee-hives. Though anxious to return to his station on the Kuruman, Mr. Moffat was induced to go forward by the eloquent entreaties of his companions, of whom he conceived a very high opinion. When for the last time he proposed to go back 'Umbate, laying his right hand on my shoulder, and the left on his breast, addressed me in the following language: "Father, you have been our guardian. We are yours. You love us, and will you leave us?" and pointing to the blue mountains on the distant horizon, "Yonder," he added, "dwells the great Moselekatse, and how shall we approach his presence, if you are not with us? If you love us still, save us; for when we shall have told our news, he will ask why our conduct gave you pain to cause your return; and before the sun descend on the day we see his face, we shall be ordered out for execution, because you are not." . . . . . I now found myself in a perplexing position, these noble suppliants standing before me, 'Umbate, whose intelligent countenance beamed with benevolence, while his masculine companion, another Mars, displayed a sympathy of feeling not to be expected in the man of war, who could count his many tens of slain warriors which had adorned his head with the ring or badge of victory and honour. My own attendants, whom I had the day before been commending for their intrepidity, were looking on the transaction as if the destinies of an empire were involved; and heard, not without strong emotion, my consent to accompany the strangers to their king.

We now travelled alone a range of mountains running near E.S.E., while the country to the north and east became more level, but beautifully studded with ranges of little hills, many isolated, of a conical form, along the bases of which lay the ruins of innumerable towns, some of which were of amazing extent. The soil of the valleys and extended plains was of the richest description. The torrents from the adjacent heights had, from year to year, carried away immense masses, in some places laying bare the substratum of granite rocks, exhibiting a mass of rich soil from ten to twenty feet deep, where it was evident native grain had formerly waved; and watermelons, pumpkins, kidney-beans, and sweet reed, had once flourished. The ruins of many towns showed signs of immense labour and perseverance; stone fences, averaging from four to seven feet high, raised apparently without mortar, hammer, or line. Everything was circular, from the inner walls which surrounded each dwelling or family residence, to those which encircled a town. In traversing these ruins, I found the remains of some houses which had escaped the flames of the marauders. These were large, and displayed a far superior style to anything I had witnessed among the other aboriginal tribes of Southern Africa. The circular walls were generally composed of hard clay, with a small mixture of cow-dung, so well plastered and polished, a refined portion of the former mixed with a kind of ore, that the interior of the house had the appearance of being varnished. The walls and door-ways were also neatly ornamented with a kind of architraves and cornices. The pillars supporting the roof in the form of pilasters, projecting from the walls, and adorned with flutings and other designs, showed much taste in the architectresses.

In short, there were many signs of a comparatively advanced state of civilisation visible in the dominions of the terrible Moselekatse, dominions not long obtained by his conquest of the Bakones, whose beautiful country had recently been desolated by the Matabele. Mr. Moffat relates—

Having Matabele with me, I found it extremely difficult to elicit local information from the dejected and scattered aborigines who occasionally came in our way. These trembled before the nobles, who ruled them with a rod of iron. It was soon evident that the usurpers were anxious to keep me in the dark about the devastations which everywhere met our eyes, and they always endeavoured to be present when I came in contact with the aborigines of the country, but as I could speak the language some opportunities were afforded. One of the three servants who accompanied the two ambassadors to the Kuruman was a captive among the Mantatees, who had been defeated at Old Lithako. He, as well as his fellow-servants, felt a pleasure in speaking with us in Sechuana, their native language. . . . . He was a native of the regions through which we were now passing, and would sometimes whisper to me events connected with the desolations of his father-land. These nations he described as being once numerous as the locusts, rich in cattle, and traffickers, to a great extent, with the distant tribes of the north. . . . . On a Sabbath morning I ascended a hill, at the base of which we had halted the preceding evening, to spend the day. I had scarcely reached the summit, and sat down, when I found that my intelligent companion had stolen away from the party, to answer some questions I had asked the day before, and to which he could not reply, because of the presence of his superiors. Happening to turn to the right, and seeing before me a large extent of level ground covered with ruins, I inquired what had become of the inhabitants. He had just sat down, but rose, evidently with some feeling, and, stretching forth his arm in the direction of the ruins, said, "I, even I, beheld it!" and paused as if in deep thought. "There lived the great chief of multitudes. He reigned among them like a king. He was the chief of the blue-coloured cattle. They were numerous as the dense mist on the mountain brow; his flocks covered the plain. He thought the number of his warriors would awe his enemies. His people boasted in their spears, and laughed at the cowardice of such as had fled from their towns. 'I shall slay them, and hang up their shields on my hill. Our race is a race of warriors. Who ever subdued our fathers? they were mighty in combat. We still possess the spoils of ancient times. Have not our dogs eaten the shields of their nobles? The vultures shall devour the slain of our enemies.' Thus they sang and thus they danced, till they beheld on yonder heights the approaching foe. The noise of their song was hushed in night, and their hearts were filled with dismay. They saw the clouds ascend from the plains. It was the smoke of burning towns. The confusion of a whirlwind was in the heart of the great chief of the blue-coloured cattle. This shout was raised, 'They are friends;' but they shouted again, 'They are foes,' till their near approach proclaimed them naked Matabele. The men seized their arms, and rushed out, as if to chase the antelope. The onset was as the voice of lightning, and their spears as the shaking of a forest in the autumn storm. The Matabele lions raised the shout of death, and flew upon their victims. It was the shout of victory. Their hissing and hollow groans told their progress among the dead. A few moments laid hundreds on the ground. The clash of shields was the signal of triumph. Our people fled with their cattle to the top of yonder mount. The Matabele entered the town with the roar of the lion; they pillaged and fired the houses, speared the mothers, and cast their infants to the flames. The sun went down. The victors emerged from the smoking plain, and pursued their course, surrounding the base of yonder hill. They slaughtered cattle; they danced and sang till the dawn of day; they ascended, and killed till their hands were weary of the spear." Stooping to the ground on which we stood, he took up a little dust in his hand; blowing it off, and holding out his naked palm, he added, "That is all that remains of the great chief of the blue-coloured cattle!" It is impossible for me to describe my feelings while listening to this descriptive effusion of native eloquence; and I afterwards embraced opportunities of writing it down, of which the above is only an abridgment. I found also from other aborigines that his was no fabled song, but merely a compendious sketch of the catastrophe.

This extract shows Moffat's command of the language, besides affording a fine specimen of the natural eloquence of the men we are pleased to call savages. One of the ambassadors preceded Moffat to announce his arrival to the king;—"to make his path straight" to the place where dwelt "the great King of Heaven, the Elephant, the Lion's paw." The inhabitants, who for the first time beheld men on horse-back, scampered off in great alarm when Mr. Moffat and some of his attendants appeared mounted. The account of this African sovereign, his metropolis, his court, and his army, is one of the most original parts of the work, and that which will probably have the greatest interest for the geographer. We pass at once into the august presence of the monarch, which was not reached until due care had been taken to impress the white man with a sense of his power and dignity.

SONNET.

BREAD for the body, and the anxious strife,
With carking care too oft avail to smother
My duteous love to thee, my loving mother;
Yet never dies that love. 'Tis richly rife,
Even as the frame in sleep with lusty life.
And when some hour more pleasant than another,
Recalls the time when Joy, my childhood's brother,
Gambolled by me at thy feet, no knife
Could wake the sleeper with more sudden stroke,
Than wake my fondest memories of thee.
So natural does thy presence seem in glee,
I start—and look—and deem 'twas thou that spoke
When the wind breathed. Of long, long years beguiled Whene'er I'm glad, I'm near thee, still a child.

ROBERT NICOLL AND HIS POEMS.*

BY EBENEZER ELLIOTT.

How refreshing to the readers of poetry, sick of the pretensions of commonplace men, and weary of the endless struggles of mediocrity for distinction, was the appearance, a few years ago, of the Poems of Robert Nicoll! Flowers of his heart, those poems will long remain fresh and beautiful, for upon them are the dews of an enduring season. The little volume which contains them (I make no exception in favour even of the marvellous fragments of Keats) is the best ever published by a mere youth; and, with the exception of the first edition of the poems of Burns, the best first publication of its kind ever given to the world by a poet. Burns, Byron, and Scott, at his age, had written nothing worthy of comparison with the early productions of Nicoll. It does not follow that, had he lived, he would have been a Burns, a Byron, or a Scott; but he was in all respects a most worthy son of "man-childed and child-honoured Scotland:" and when it is considered that he was exemplary in every relation of life, that his character was absolutely without stain, that he went to the Judgment-seat of God almost as one of the angels; and that he died by Act of Parliament, a victim, among innumerable others, of the food-tax, and the murderous competition of which it is the cause, surely I may be pardoned, if I look back with some degree of mournful attention on the character, the doings, and the fate, of such a man.

To the complete edition of his poems just published by Tait, is prefixed an affecting sketch of his life, from which it appears, "that Robert Nicoll was born (the second son of nine children) on the 7th January, 1814, in the farm-house of Little Tulliebeltane, in the parish of Auchtergaven in Perthshire, which lies nearly half way between Perth and Dunkeld; that his father, Mr. Robert Nicoll, was, at that period, a farmer in comfortable circumstances: that his mother was Grace Fenwick, one of the daughters of that venerable 'Elder John,' of whom Nicoll speaks so affectingly in his poems; and that both families from which he immediately sprung, had been long settled in the same neighbourhood, counting a long pedigree of decent, honest, God-fearing people. When he was about five years old, his father, who had become security to the amount of five or six hundred pounds for a connexion by marriage, failed, and became a day-labourer on the fields he had lately rented. Nicoll was thus, from the date of his earliest recollection, the son of a very poor man. Field labour was the daily lot of his father, and, at certain seasons, of his mother also; and the children, as soon as they were considered fit for labour, were one by one set to work. Robert was sent to the herding at seven years of age, and continued herding all summer, and attending school all winter." His rural employment (there have been thousands of herd boys, and one or two of them have been poets) may have helped to develope his imaginative tendencies; but it could not create his love of the beautiful, and did not make him, what he is and will ever be, a first-class "poet of the domestic affections, and an apostle of the moral and political regeneration of society." Perhaps some infusion of "gentle blood" is necessary to produce the poetical constitution: even Burns was descended from a race "of decent, God-fearing people," poor, but not poorest.

Always excepting that best of educations which the best of mothers gave him, Nicoll may be truly said to have been his own instructor. "To further my progress in life," he writes to a friend, "I bound myself apprentice to Mrs. J. H. Robertson, wine-merchant and grocer in Perth. When I came to Perth, I bought Cobbett's English Grammar, and by constant study soon made myself master of it. A gentleman lent me his right to the Perth Library, and thus I procured many books which I could not get before; Milton's Prose Works, Locke's Works, and, what I prized more than all, a few of Bentham's. I am employed in working for my mistress from seven o'clock in the morning until nine at night, and I must therefore write when others sleep." Like most men of genius, Robert Nicoll was the son of his mother. From her probably he derived his constitutional peculiarities, and certainly all that was given him worth calling education. A Yankee mother, we are told, boasted of her two sons, "that if they were locked in a barn, they would live by swapping jackets;" and in America, the ne plus ultra of energetic worldliness is said to be a "Scotch Yankee;" but Mrs. Nicoll bade her son "Speak the truth in love;" and while she taught him, by precept and example, the noblest self-reliance, she also taught him, in wrestling for the bread which perisheth, not to wrestle for it as if to die were only to forget what we have dreamed. And she had in him a pupil worthy of her teaching. "I have registered a vow in heaven," he writes to one of his correspondents, "that I will be independent, though it be but on a crust and water." "You have discovered," he writes to his brother, "that nothing can be accomplished without labour. But do you think, and engrave the principle on your heart? I am grown very industrious. I read in the morning while sluggards are snoring; all day I attend to my business; and in the forenights I learn my grammar." Writing of Coleridge, he says, "Had he dared to be poor, how much leisure he would have had for giving shape and utterance to his immortal thoughts. Through fear of losing caste in the world, he lost his station in the world of mind. Oh, for an hour of John Milton, to teach such men to act and comprehend!" "I look upon the earth," he writes to his mother, "as a place where every man is set to struggle, and to work, that he may be made humble and pure-hearted, and fit for that better land, to which earth is the gate. I think, mother, that to me has been given talent; and if so, that talent was given to make it useful to man. I am determined never to bend to the storm that is coming, and never to look back on it after it has passed. Fear not for me, dear mother. I feel that, whether I be growing richer or not, I am growing a wiser man, which is far better." What happiness might not the diffusion of such sentiments as these produce, "if there were no Governments to make nations miserable!"*—no Acts of Parliament to make food dear and labour cheap, by preventing the industrious from obtaining employment!—no land-holding paupers to rob the employed of half their wages, and expect us to touch our hats, when they happen to give the parish a flannel dicky at Christmas! And why should such paupers be allowed to prevent the diffusion of such sentiments, if six hundred acres of land employed in trade at Sheffield can maintain, in decent comfort, one hundred and ten thousand inhabitants?—if one hundred and ten thousand of the best agricultural acres in the world would not do more than keep them alive?†—and if five hundred thousand such acres could not maintain them in equal comfort?—Why should land-holding paupers, (or any paupers,) be allowed to destroy a productive power, which is as 500,000 to 600? Can it be destroyed without subverting the State? If it cannot, the determination of its destroyers to be self-exterminated vermin, will but ill console their multitudinous victims. "But to our tale."

In the autumn of the year which terminated his apprenticeship, Nicoll went to Edinburgh in quest of employment; but not finding it there, he opened a circulating library in Dundee. "This year, 1835, became an important epoch in his life. He wrote largely, and frequently for the liberal newspapers of the town; he delivered political lectures; he made speeches; he wrote poems; and—he prepared and published his volume of 'Poems and Lyrics.'" I have already expressed what, perhaps, any thorough admirer of the wisdom of our ancestors would deem a most extravagant opinion of the merit of these poems; they will be found, however, to deserve and sustain it. Certainly, they are by no means perfect. Their principal fault is diffusion, or luxuriance of expression; a fault of great promise in a young author, although the terseness of Burns may be said to go against that conclusion. Of him it has been said, that he was often coarse, and never vulgar; but though the nationality of Nicoll was real and intense, there is something like affectation (and affectation is vulgarity) in his determination, that his readers should pronounce his sweet native Doric to the very letter. Of Burns that Doric was the humble servant—Nicoll made it his master. In reading Burns, we never wish the dialect away; the poems he wrote in it, are his best; with Nicoll the case is otherwise; his best productions are English—and noble English he writes. Some of his songs have merit, but they bring him into immediate competition with Burns in his strength—and the weaker must go to the wall. He could not, like Burns, combine the humorous, the pathetic, and the sublime; there is no humour in his pathos, no sublimity in his humour; but with a mastery seldom equalled, he mingles tenderness with beauty, and pathetic sentiment with picturesque description. How full of picture and sentiment are these extracts:—

The memories o' my father's hame
Are twined wi' the stanes of the silver burn,
On bonnie Ordè braes.

. . . . . .

Laneness and Sweetness, hand in hand,
Gang o'er the Ordè braes.

Our laigh cot-house, I mind fu' weel:
On ae side mither spinning sate,
Droning auld sonnets to her wheel—
And purring by her side the cat.
Anent was sair-toil'd father's chair,
Wha tauld us stories, sad and lane,
O' puir folk's waes, until we wish'd
Them a' beside our cosh hearth stane.

A wither'd woodland twig would bring
The tears into my eye:—
Laugh on! but there are souls of love
In laddies herding kye.

And when they sang the holy psalm
Her voice was sweetest, dearest there—
'Mang a' that gaed to God aboon,
Her's was the purest, holiest prayer!
I thought the light o' day was gane
When she, ayont the kirkyard wa',
By yon burn brae gaed wandering hame—
The bonnie lass o' Turrit Ha'!

I like to pu' the heather—
We're a' sae mirthfu', where
The sunshine creeps atour the crags,
Like ravell'd golden hair.

I wish the wandering e'enin wind
Were whistlin' round the brakens lone—
That I might live another hour
O' love wi' Mary Hamilton.

The simmer e'enin's settin' sun
Into my dungeon throws
Ae single ray—a holy flower
That, 'mid the darkness, grows:
It tells me o' a gowany glen Afar, where it hath been—
A deep wild dell, amang the hills,
A' spread wi' brakens green.

The green leaves waving in the morning gale—
The little birds that 'mid their freshness sing—
The wild wood-flowers, so tender-ey'd and pale—
The wood-mouse sitting by the forest spring—
The morning dew—the wild bee's woodland hum,
All woo my feet to Nature's forest home.
There I can muse, away from living men,
Reclining peacefully on Nature's breast—
The woodbird sending up its God-ward strain,
Nursing the spirit into holy rest!
Alone with God, within his forest fane,
The soul can feel that all save Him is vain.
Here I can learn—will learn—to love all things
That he hath made—to pity and forgive
All faults, all failings: Here the heart's deep springs
Are open'd up, and all on earth who live
To me grow nearer, dearer than before—
My brother loving, I my God adore.

† A hundred and ten thousand agricultural acres of land could do no more than barely keep the inhabitants of Sheffield alive, unless human beings can be furnished with food, shelter, and clothing, in bread-taxed England, for less than 2s. a-week; and unless the net profit of land, fairly cropped, is more than £5, 4s. a-year per acre.

Thoughts like these, from the son of a poor "sair-toiled" man, (if it were still possible to live and be honest in bread-taxed England,) might inspire the despairing with hope, that such men "would mak the warld better yet." But let no friend of his country (imagining that our masters will educate the democracy, in time to guide the force which they cannot control) flatter himself into the belief that such are the sentiments of our working men generally, or that Nicoll is a fair sample of his class, north or south of the Tweed. I can assure all such persons, from extensive personal observation, that the rising race of working men in this country are deplorably inferior in all good qualities to the race which is going down. If the schoolmaster is abroad, what is he doing? Henry Hunt could not have prevailed on the men of Peterloo to howl for a food-tax, and become the most efficient tools and supporters of its authors. No. The descendants of those men (I speak not of Lancashire, but of the nation) are unworthy even of them. Destitute and desperate, utterly depraved, and worse than ignorant, they are ready to do the work which our monopolists have prepared for their hands, and will not fail, "in the hour which cometh, and will come," to cast the horrors of the French revolution into deepest shade. But before that hour come, certain immaculates would do well to ask themselves, if they know a class of men in this country, who have set an example, to the destitute and desperate masses, of spoliation and murder on a scale of gigantic destructiveness unexampled in the annals of national folly, madness, and crime. They will not put this question to themselves, neither will they read Robert Nicoll's

BACCHANALIAN.

They make their feasts, and fill their cups—
They drink the rosy wine—
They seek for pleasure in the bowl:—
Their search is not like mine.
From misery I freedom seek—
I crave relief from pain;
From hunger, poverty, and cold—
I'll go get drunk again!

The wind doth through my garments run—
I'm naked to the blast;
Two days have flutter'd o'er my head
Since last I broke my fast.
But I'll go drink, and straightway clad
In purple I shall be;
And I shall feast at tables spread
With rich men's luxury!

My wife is naked,—and she begs
Her bread from door to door;
She sleeps on clay each night beside
Her hungry children four!
She drinks—I drink—for why? it drives
All poverty away;
And starving babies grow again
Like happy children gay!

In broad-cloth clad, with belly full,
A sermon you can preach;
But hunger, cold, and nakedness,
Another song would teach.
I'm bad and vile—what matters that
To outcasts such as we?
Bread is denied—come, wife, we'll drink
Again, and happy be!*

* The best of all temperance associations,—the best of all peace associations,—the best of all anti-slavery associations, would be an association for the establishment and conservation of free-trade relations everywhere. Is it not high time for the Society of Friends to think of this, and act on their convictions, like their friend, Joseph Sturge? Yes; for free-trade is Peace—Religion—Christianity in its essence:—"Do unto others as ye would that they should do unto you."

Mary Howit said of Nicoll's eyes, that they were the finest she had ever seen; and the poor herd-boy must have possessed fine eyes for observation, or he could not have drawn to the very life his portraits of The Auld Gudeman, who duly sleepit the sermons at kirk and preachin—Janet Dunbar, who, for the sake of the bairnies at school, would scold the Dominie's sel'—Minister Tam, who, in his youth, rode on the ram, and huntit the ewes; but after fighting, wi' a masterful heart, up the brae, sported a wig, white with pouther—Janet Macbean, who sate in the Minister's seat, and had aye a curtsy for the laird when he came to drink his can—The Dominie, wi' his words o' queer langnebbit speech—The Smith, who had lost fifty law-pleas, he was sae weel acquaint wi' law—Fiddler Johnny, who cared not a hair for any mortal body—The Provost, who was twenty-first cousin to a highland laird, and could lie like an apple-wife—The Bailie, who keeps the causey-crown, and, at kirk, gi'es fearsome looks to the folks who fill the lofts—The Gudewife, of whose flytin' and din there was never an end—The Uncourted Maiden, who wished every lassie married but hersel'—The Auld Beggar Man, who could argue like a beuk—The Peaceful Hero, around whose hearth cheerful faces were an unending prayer—and many more equally good.

Before I resume the thread of Robert's narrative, I will try to convince all doubters that I have not over-stated the merit of his poetry in the first paragraph of this article. If they will read, The Ha' Bible—The Poor Man's Deathbed—I am Blind—Arouse Thee, Soul—Wild Flowers—The Mother—The Village Church—God is Everywhere—The Nameless Rivulet—The Dying Maiden—The Mossy Stane—Life's Pilgrimage—Stanzas on the Birth-day of Burns—Visions—I Dare not Scorn—The Questioner—We are Lowly—and there are others equally excellent—they will find that he "has written his heart," in compositions which require no apology on account of the age or circumstances of the author,—original poems, worthy of any poet.

"In the spring of 1836, Nicoll gave up his shop in Dundee, where, shortly after his coming, he had formed an attachment to a very pretty and amiable girl, who eventually became his wife. This attachment, and his extreme anxiety to relieve his mother from the small pecuniary involvements, (great to her,) amounting to about £20, which she had incurred to enable him to establish his library, rendered him exceedingly desirous to find the employment for which his friends conceived him at least as well qualified as many who filled similar situations; and they were as happy as himself when, by the kind intervention of Mr. Tait, he procured the situation of editor of the Leeds Times, with even the comparatively small salary of £100 a-year. He made a short visit to his mother, and to his betrothed in Dundee, and set out for Leeds in high spirits. So perfectly was he adapted to the wants of the crisis, and with so much enthusiasm and energy did he devote himself to his harassing and multifarious duties, that in a few weeks after his arrival in Leeds, the circulation of the Times began to rise, and continued to increase with unprecedented rapidity. Towards the middle of December, 1836, he stole a few days from his incessant toils, and came down to Dundee to be married. His father and mother met him there; and without loss of time he returned to Leeds with his bride. His home there was, in all respects, as happy as any one in which young and pure affections ever found a sanctuary. His wife had an unbounded admiration for the talents of her husband; and in his brief career poor Nicoll tasted largely of the higher enjoyments of life,—'of all the pleasures of the heart, the lover and the friend.' During the spring of 1837, in letters to a friend, he frequently alludes to the happiness of his humble home. Between it and his office-duties, between politics and poetry, his time was divided and very fully occupied. The circulation of the Times was increasing at the rate of 200 a-week; and his heart was in every word he wrote in it. From the period that he went to Leeds, until the hour that he left it, he lived in a constant fever of excitement. The Leeds Times is a paper of large size; and in reporting, condensing news, writing a great deal for every number, and maintaining a wide correspondence, he had no assistant. Yet in the spring of 1837, to increase his income, he was induced to write the leading article for a paper just then started in Sheffield. This was dreadful overtasking." But in bread-taxed Britain, "the labour of the poor is his life;" and where law makes poverty, poverty is crime. Need we wonder that his health gave way? "The finishing blow was given to it by the general election in the summer of the same year, when the town of Leeds was contested by Sir William Molesworth in opposition to Sir John Beckett. Into this contest Nicoll naturally threw himself with his whole soul. His wife afterwards said, that had Sir William failed, Robert would have died on the instant. He was destined to live on for a few more suffering months, and then die at the age of twenty-three, carried off by a disease which, under other circumstances might have been overcome, but which many causes now contributed to develope. He returned to Scotland, to be cured, as he fondly hoped, "by a breath of his native air;" and closed his brief but noble career at the house of his friend Mr. Johnstone, at Laverock Bank, near Edinburgh. By that gentleman, by Mr. Tait, Sir William Molesworth, and others, he was treated to the last with a kindness honourable to Scotland and human nature. Among the last words he wrote were these:—

Death is upon me, yet I fear not now:
Open my chamber window—let me look
Upon the silent vales, the sunny glow
That fills each alley, close, and copsewood nook.

But why was this man killed by Act of Parliament? Alas, the law-made competition of which he was a victim, is destroying millions of human beings who are neither poets nor men of genius, yet every one of them an immortal soul! God-fearing people (I do not mean religious formalists) should think of this; and while there is time to save the nation from anarchy, (perhaps there is yet time,) act resolutely on their convictions. For if all injustice is simply a violation of the laws of free exchange, taking something from somebody without returning an equivalent; and if murder itself is only the worst of all injustice, because it takes that for which no equivalent can be returned;* then are monopolists the worst of all murderers, and our food-monopolists the worst of their class; for they destroy their multitudinous victims by slow torture, and in cold blood.

I cannot resist the temptation to quote one of poor Robert's last compositions, written in pencil, and, of course, unfinished; for it is, as his editor observes, "so rich in descriptive beauty, that it all but rivals some of his Scottish moorland landscapes."

A WOODLAND WALK.

The blackbird's song is bursting from the brake,
And morning breezes bear it far away;
The early sunbeam from its breast doth shake
The floating veil of dewy mist so gray;
The dun deer wanders, like a frighten'd fay,
Through dingles deep and wild, where linnets sing:
Ah! who would slumber, who along can stray,
Where mighty oaks their branches o'er him fling,
To which the diamond dew, in pearlings bright, doth cling?

How beautiful! the green corn-fields are waving,
The clouds of dawn are floating on the sky;
The fearful hare its hidden couch is leaving,
And, sporting, to the clover-field doth hie:
Beneath the morning sun the waters lie,
Like treasur'd sunbeams in a woody nook!
God's earth is glorious; and how bless'd am I
Who love it all! On what I love I look,
And joy runs through my heart, like yon calm, tinkling brook.

The cottage-hearths are cold, the peasant sleeps,
But all the mighty woodlands are awake;
Within its hermitage the primrose sleeps,
And with the dew the beech-tree's branches shake,
As through the wood my devious path I take;
The velvet grass a fairy carpet seems,
On which, through leafy curtains, light doth break,
Now bright and strong, and now in fitful gleams,
As 'mid realities come fancy's fairest dreams.

Now stooping 'neath the branches wet with dew—
Now o'er the open forest-glades I go—
Now listening to the cushat's wailing coo—
Now starting from its lair the bounding roe;
And now I hear the breezes, to and fro,
Making among the leaves a pleasant din;
Or find myself where silent streamlets flow,
Like hermits, wandering these wild-woods within—
While hoar and aged trees bend o'er each little linn.

The lakelet of the forest I have left,
Sleeping, like beauty, in a branchy bower;
The woodland opens:—Crumbling all, and cleft,
There stands the ruin'd Abbey's lonely tower,
To speak of vanish'd pomp, exhausted power—
To hear these winds among the leaflets blow
With the same tone as in its proudest hour—
To see the flowers within the forest grow,
As when the fallen reigned—a thousand years ago!

* Think of this, too, ye God-fearers, who punish murder by repeating the crime!

Decaying, roofless walls! and is this all
That Desolation's blighting hand hath left
Of tower, and pinnacle, and gilded hall?
The everlasting rocks by time are cleft—
Within each crevice spiders weave their weft;
The wandering gipsy comes to hide him here,
When he from plunder'd housewife's stores has reft
The needful elements of gipsy cheer:
For ghost of Abbot old the gipsy doth not fear.

Where are the glancing eyes that here have beam'd?
Where are the hearts which whilom here have beat?
Where are the shaven monks, so grim who seem'd?
Where are the sitters in the Abbot's seat?
Where are the ceaseless and unnoted feet,
That wore a pavement-path with kneeling prayers?
Where is the coffin—where the winding-sheet—
And monuments which nobles had for theirs,
When death drew nigh, and closed life's long account of cares?

The ivy clings around the ruined walls
Of cell, and chapel, and refectory;
An oak-tree's shadow, cloud-like, ever falls
Upon the spot where stood the altar high:
The chambers all are open to the sky;
A goat is feeding where the praying knelt;
The daisy rears its ever open eye
Where the proud Abbot in his grandeur dwelt:
These signs of time and change the hardest heart might melt.

Is this a cell?—Offended God to serve
By the heart's crucifixion, here have tried
Self-immolated men, who would not swerve,
But in the impious work serene have died:
A glory on the lowly wall doth bide;
For though the hypocrite hath shuffled here,
Here, too, from earnest lips did often glide
The words of men mistaken, but sincere,
Who, with pure spirits, tried to fight man's battle here.

The buttercups are lifting up their heads
Upon the floor of the confessional,
Where came the worshipper, with counted beads,
Upon his knees in penitence to fall—
Where came the great to listen unto all,
And scoff or pray, as good or ill was he.
Could words come forth of that time-stricken wall,
Some wondrous tales retold again would be:
The maiden's simple love—the feat of villany.

This is the chapel where the matin hymn
Was chanted duly for a thousand years,
Till faith grew cold and doubtful—truth grew dim—
Till earnest hope was wither'd up by sneers.
Within it now no glorious thing appears:
But as the dewy wind blows sweetly by,
Upon the thoughtful list'ner's joyful ears
Doth come a sweet and holy symphony,
And Nature's choristers are chanting masses high!

Grow up, sweet daisies, on the silent floor;
Fall down, dark ivy, over every wall;
Oak, send thy branches out at every door;
Goat, from its chambers to thy mate do call.
Power reign'd in might, and never fear'd a fall.
And where is it? And what is here to-day?
Truth triumphs over mitre, crown, and all;
Mind rent its iron fetters all away.
The tyrants, proud and high—where, at this hour, are they?

Old walls and turrets, moulder silently,
Till not a trace of all your state remain!——
The throstle's song, from yonder spreading tree,
Doth call me to the woodlands once again;
Louder doth rise the blackbird's passing strain,
And gladness from its sacred heart doth flow,
Till music falls, like summer's softest rain,
On all that lives and suffers here below,
Making a flower upon the lonest pathway grow!

The sun is higher in the morning sky—
His beams embrace the mossy-trunkëd trees;
Yonder the squirrel, on the elm so high,
Frisketh about in the cool morning breeze—
Down peeps his diamond eye—amazed, he sees
A stranger in his solitary home;
And now he hides behind the oaken trees—
And now he forth upon a branch doth come,
To crack his beechen-nuts, and watch me as I roam.

The hawthorn hangs its clusters round me now,
Through which the sky peeps sweetly, sweetly in;
Through the green glades doth come the cattle's low
From the rich pastures of the meadow green.
Look up!—aloft, the twittering birds are seen
Upon the branches, their wild matins singing:
Look down! the grass is soft and thick, I ween;
And flowers around each old tree-root are springing,
Wood fancies, wild and sweet, to the lone wanderer bringing.

And here are rich blaeberries, black and wild,
Beneath the beech-tree's thickest branches growing;
This makes me once again a wayward child,
A pilgrimage into the woodland going—
The haunt of squirrel and of wood-mouse knowing,
And plucking black blaeberries all the day,
Till eastward mountain-shadows night was throwing,
And sending me upon my homeward way,
Fill'd, both in soul and sense, with the old forest gray.

I must away, for I have loiter'd long
Amid the wood, and by the ruins old:
I must away, for far the sky along
The sun doth pour his beams of brightest gold.
Farewell, sweet glades, wild dingles, grassy wold—
Squirrel and blackbird, linnet and throstle, too—
Farewell, ye woodland streamlets, pure and cold—
Sweet cooing cushat—primrose wet with dew—
To Woodland thoughts and things a sweet, a short adieu!

THE MODERN CRUSADER.

At the public meeting held in the Town Hall, Calcutta, to address Lord Auckland on leaving India, Bishop Wilson said, in reference to the late disasters in Affghanistan and the preparations made to repair them, "the triumph of the Affghans will be short; the spring will come, the snows will melt, the pass will be ascended, and——let us but get at them!"

On India's shore, armed cap-à-pie,
(What marvels time doth dish up!)
Of deeds of blood, right valorously,
Discoursed a burly Bishop.
Or sword or shield he could not wield,—
He ne'er was taught, 'ad rat 'em!
But martial skill, made up in will,
Cried, "Let us but get at 'em!"

"Those scoundrel hordes, Affghans and Koords,
Have tarnished Britain's glory;
Yet, please the Lord, they'll soon afford
Theme for triumphant story.

*'Author of peace!' our efforts aid.
'Lover of concord!' fat 'em
Like sheep for slaughter by our blade,
O let us but get at 'em!

"Dogs circumcised profanely dared
Resist thine own anointed,
Who merely plann'd the goodly land
To take, by heaven appointed.
Dogs dared defend hearth, altar, friend,
In Bolan's pass too, sate 'em,

* Collect.

And dealt hard knocks, behind the rocks,
On us—O to get at 'em!
"Hear, Lord of Hosts! our Litany,—
*From 'sudden death' and 'battle'
Save us, but pour thy reddest wrath
On Acbar's Moslem cattle!
Dark unbelievers, let 'em die
Who Infidelly gat 'em,
In arms to fight for native right,—
O help us to get at 'em!
"My friends! I see that chartistry,
And Erin's thin potations,
Are link'd in league with Russ intrigue
Against the Queen of nations.
That Jonathan and wild Affghan
'Gainst Church and State have set 'em:
Please heaven, the rod at home, abroad,
They'll taste, if we get at em!
"Up, Britons, up! smite 'hip and thigh,' Spare none in fight or flying;
'Vengeance!' our dead, like 'seraphim,
Continually' are crying.

* Litany.

Cabool bombard, the gates petard,
Leave not one living atom,
And be your song, or right or wrong,
'O let us but get at 'em!'"

The wide hall rang with plausive clang
From each war-smit observer,
That Peace's vest, on Prelate's breast,
Should hide such martial fervour.
A few, more cool, inquired what school,
What tiger who begat him,
Had taught the frere, the parlous pray'r,
"O let us but get at 'em!"

One twitch'd my ear, "Hist, comrade, hear,
'Tis no new creed he teaches,
The curate lean, and portly dean,
The self-same doctrine preaches;
The pulses all of cleric life
For 'lands of promise' beat 'em,
The earliest, oftenest, heartiest prayer
Is, 'Let us but get at 'em!'"

THE OLD OAK-TREE.

THE season of delight is come! 'tis SPRING'S luxuriant reign!
She moves in loveliness and grace,—the Wood-nymphs in her train.
Mellow'd by distance, hark! how sweet the wild-bird's tuneful throat.
Borne on the breeze, from tree and grove the strains of music float!
Nature looks glad at her approach, smiles forth from each retreat,
And spreads the first-fruits of the year in beauty at her feet!

And yonder still the old Oak-tree, our hamlet's pride is seen
Standing in all its noble age upon our village-green,
As fresh as when in childhood's hours beneath its spreading shade
With the glee and buoyancy of life in merry sport we play'd,
Nor deem'd that aught of chance or change should ever come to shed Gloom o'er those happy, happy days, alas! too quickly fled.

'Mid the dark tufted boughs that wide their sombre shadows fling,
The raven there hath built her nest, and plumed her glossy wing.
There oft at Even's pensive hour upon the well-worn seat
Rude fixed around its mossy trunk old friends familiar meet,
And love to speak of bygone days and hearts whose kindred glow
Had power to hallow every joy, and sweeten every woe!

I love each straw-thatched dwelling there, I love the village church,
And the tall linden-trees that grow around its sacred porch,
I love its time-worn dial too, oft lingering pause and weep
Beside the grave-stones o'er the spot where friends departed sleep.
Yes, these, through years of hope and grief, have been endeared to me,
And those of mine, yet, most of all, I love the OLD OAK-TREE!

LITERARY REGISTER.

The Biographical Dictionary of the Society for the Diffusion of Useful Knowledge. Volume I. Octavo, cloth, Pp. 440, double columns. Longman, Brown, Green, & Longmans.

Any approximation to a tolerably accurate and complete Biographical Dictionary is highly desirable, as there is no such work. The design ought to be taken up by the State, and could not be properly completed for a generation; as it is next to impossible that either private speculators, or any one literary man could effectually accomplish so difficult and comprehensive a work. Next to the funds and power of Government taking up the work as a national or a European concern, is its being projected by a body of enlightened and influential individuals, who may fairly be assumed capable of seeing the undertaking as well executed as circumstances admit of, and who are sure of receiving that degree of public confidence and support in carrying it through, which no ordinary publisher could reckon upon. The work is, therefore, exactly one which falls within the province of the Society for the Diffusion of Useful Knowledge; which is more than we could affirm of some books brought out under its auspices. We are pleased to find that the preface does not promise too much; though the plan, so far as it is detailed, appears good; and the volume published a fair, though not a faultless specimen of what the work will be. There will be some danger of it becoming too voluminous; and also that the memoirs of merely learned men may trench upon space better devoted to great men; men of science and of practical usefulness. In general the initials of the writer are appended to each biography, no matter how brief it may be; and this is commendable, as involving a proper degree of individual responsibility. It is probable, that if the work is to continue as comprehensive in names as the first volume, much less can be told of some of the great obscure than we find in it. There are, for example, fifty Aarons, chiefly Rabbies and Jewish writers; and more than three times that number of Abrahams, besides the Father of the Faithful. If all the Christian Johns and Jameses who have written, shall be equally distinguished, the Dictionary will become a formidable affair; though it is erring on the right side, to make a book of reference as full as possible. But this is more than a mere book of reference: some of the more important lives are tolerably comprehensive, as well as ably written. We would specify, among others, the articles Abelard, Abercromby, Æchines, Æschylus, Adams—Samuel, and many others. As this is a work in which, from its importance, a national interest must be felt, we trust to seeing it prosper from national encouragement.

Memoirs of Sir Robert Peel. By the author of "The Life of the Duke of Wellington." 2 vols. post 8vo, cloth. London: T. C. Newby, and T. & W. Boone.

This work is confined to the public career of the Premier, of whom it is abundantly laudatory; the author apparently forgetting that Sir Robert Peel's character as a statesman must be determined by the results of a policy upon which no one can yet decide, though impartial opinion is hostile to the course which he is at present pursuing. The book opens with an account of the Peel family, the origin of which is highly respectable; honourable, indeed, in the truest sense, from the industry and integrity of all among his ancestors of whom anything is known. The Peels are very probably an old, stanch Saxon family, though they had no known grandfathers. Sir Robert's father, whose public career is well known, was a shrewd and enterprising man; and one of the unmitigated commercial and manufacturing Pitt Tories of the close of the last century and the beginning of the present. He was born at Peel's Cross, near Blackburn, and was the son of "a small farmer and manufacturer," when all manufacturers were comparatively small. The first baronet is said to have had an early presentiment that he was to become a great or a rich man, and to found a family; but his most sanguine youthful expectations must have been far distanced by the reality. About the beginning of the century, he had 15,000 persons in his employment, many of whom were pauper children. He did something to mitigate the evils to which these poor friendless creatures were exposed in the factories. The accumulated fortune of Sir Robert Peel was enormous—his personal property being nearly a million. To his eldest son, the present Sir Robert, he left landed property to the value of £9000 a-year, and above half a million of money. The early career of the subject of the Memoirs is sufficiently well known. He was educated at Harrow, from whence he went to Oxford; and at twenty-one he took his seat in Parliament for the city of Cashel, as a hopeful young supporter of the Tory party. He was appointed Chief-Secretary for Ireland when, on the death of Mr. Perceval, Lord Liverpool became the head of the Government. Of Peel's Irish administration the less that is now said, he may probably be the better pleased. It is enough that our Prime Minister is said to be a man moulded by circumstances, and one unable to contend with or overmaster them, and to form his own and a nation's fate. During his Irish administration, new lights began to dawn feebly upon him; the consequence, probably, of his bitter experience of the Orange or Ascendency party, with and for whom he then acted, and whose idol he was so long as he was contented to be their tool and their slave. This Memoir of Sir Robert Peel is properly a political history of his times since the period that he entered on public life; beginning with his Irish Government, and closing with his able speech on introducing the Income-Tax. The work is somwhat diffuse, and the hero is often lost sight of altogether. Of Sir Robert's private life not a sentence occurs, save that he married an amiable woman, and is the father of a large family.

Recollections of the Life of the Rev. A. L. Scott, D.D., Lord Nelson's Chaplain. 12mo, cloth, pp. 302. Saunders & Otley.

This biography is compiled by the daughter and son-in-law of Dr. Scott. It may therefore be kind and partial, but it is not exaggerated. The Lounger, we think it is, who, frequently meeting the minister of the parish at dinner at the mansion of his friend Colonel Caustic, accounts for the reverend person being more of a gentleman in his manners than country-clergymen are sometimes found, from the circumstance of his having been the chaplain of the Colonel's regiment, before obtaining the living. Dr. Scott, in like manner, as the friend of Nelson, was brought into contact with a more varied and higher society than is usual with men of similar vocation. In the West Indies, in Spain, Italy, at Naples, Sardinia, and wherever his patron went, the chaplain was present; and he seems to have been at times employed in confidential matters, while acting as private secretary as well as chaplain, which are not usually reckoned among the becoming duties of a clergyman. He was present at the battle of Trafalgar, and brought the corpse of his illustrious friend to England, where, for a time, he seems to have been himself a kind of lion, and much in society. Considering his claims as the secretary and friend of Nelson, he was not very liberally treated, either by those possessed of Church patronage, or by the brother of the Earl, who, in the biography, appears in the light of a sordid and ungracious person, totally unmindful of the dying wishes of the hero, to whom he and his family owed every thing. Dr. Scott married at an advanced age. He enjoyed a serene old age, after a troubled youth and middle life, and seems to have been much beloved by his family and his neighbours, for the kindness of his heart and the amenity of his manners.

The Songs of Charles Dibdin, Chronologically Arranged; with Notes, Historical, Biographical, and Critical, and the Music of the best and most popular of the Melodies, with Pianoforte accompaniments. Part IX.

This work has been interrupted and delayed by an accidental fire; it is now, however, completed by this ninth Part,—in which appears a Memoir of Dibdin, written by Mr. George Hogarth. The Memoir is brief; and does not tend to exalt the character of Dibdin, nor in any way to commend him to the esteem or affections of the reader. It is, in short, not written in an indulgent spirit, but in what is perhaps better in the long-run—with severe truth. Dibdin, though a man of great and sterling genius, whether we regard him as a musician, or as a copious and fertile dramatic and lyric writer, was lamentably deficient in many of those qualities which gain a man the affection of his friends, and entitle him to the esteem of the world. He affords another proof of the moral contamination to which, at least in the past generation, composers for the stage, and persons brought into close intercourse with its votaries, were exposed. But independently of the temptations and seductions of the theatre, the early life of Dibdin was not favourable to the formation of good principles, or prudent habits. He was thrown at a very early period of life entirely upon his own resources, without any one to care for or control a neglected lad of strong passions, and conscious of great powers. He was among the youngest of eighteen children, and intended for the Church. When at Winchester College, his passion for music broke out, and he abandoned his studies, and took to music as a profession. A profitless and disheartening one it long proved to him. But his mind was based on that strong principle which makes genius cling to its darling pursuit in the face of every obstacle, and he ultimately, though not until after a long and hard battle, triumphed. Yet was not his course of life, when the tide turned, either happy or reputable, though the elements of the virtues and kindly affections must have been richly mingled with his original character. His were the days in which open licentiousness was not regarded as any blemish in the character of a man connected with the theatre, and when a certain off-handedness, and reckless generosity, were held to redeem every vice. According to this short memoir, Dibdin not only deserted his wife for a mistress,—a chorus-singer of Covent Garden,—but "left her in great privation;" and the mistress he in turn abandoned for another, whom, upon the death of his wife, he married. His children by his first mistress are those who, by their talents, have done the most honour to his memory; yet to him they owed nothing, save existence. He neglected his sons, and was greatly offended, it is stated, when they assumed his name. Loving and pitying their mother, they neither cared nor pretended to care for their unfatherly father. Another feature of Dibdin's character was continual squabbles with actors, managers, and musical publishers, all of whom he alleged cheated him and enriched themselves at his expense. Yet when his income became large, he was constantly needy, and, as at every period of his life, involved in pecuniary difficulties, and the consequent meannesses into which they so often plunge a man who is neither sustained by principle nor pride. When his income became very large, he was not much nearer independence than when striving for daily bread, and compelled to let sordid publishers take advantage of his necessities. The sketch of his life detracts so much from the enjoyment which arises from his numerous and beautiful compositions, whether musical or lyrical, that one could almost wish it away. But however erring, and unhappy his life may have been, his compositions are, many of them, as faultless as they are found fascinating to persons of all ages, and of every gradation of rank, as much from their genuine English humour and tenderness, and naturalness of sentiment, as from the exceeding beauty of the melodies to which they are set. Dibdin was the author of above a hundred operatic and other pieces, and he also composed the music for several pieces that were written by other persons. His sea-songs alone will keep his memory alive. Of them it is hard to say whether the poetry or the music be the finer. The present edition we consider one of the most important late accessions to the number of those native works which ought to find a place in every popular private library. It is got up in the best manner, both as regards internal qualities and external appearance.

The Non-Conformist's Sketch-Book; a Series of Views of a State Church, and its Attendant Evils.

These Essays or Sketches originally appeared in the Non-Conformist, an able and earnest liberal weekly newspaper. They must consequently be already known to many of our readers. They advocate the "Voluntary System," or rather they repudiate the "Unholy alliance" system, upon broad and indefeasible grounds. All the essays may not be exactly to the point in hand, but all are pithy and apt. The writer does not spare lukewarm and trimming dissenters, or "drowsy Voluntaryism," and for that we give him praise.

The Two Dangerous Diseases of England, Consumption and Apoplexy, their nature, causes, and cure. By Rowland East, Surgeon, &c. 12mo, cloth, pp. 129. London: John Lee.

This appears to us a sensible, judicious, and well-written treatise; and indeed of late years all medical publications are improved in character. Rising above pedantry and mystery, they more and more approximate to the plain, practical, and rational. The characteristic feature of the book is the reliance placed upon the inhaler in the cure of consumption, or for arresting the progress of the disease, and in the prevention of apoplexy strict temperance, or abstemiousness, and the quietude of the passions. Mr. Rowland East thinks that young ladies in this country are in more danger of dying from tight-lacing, thin shoes, and want of flannel, than even from broken hearts and unrequited love; and he counsels them accordingly.

The Botanical Looker-Out among the Wild Flowers of the Fields, Woods, and Mountains of England and Wales, &c. &c. By Edwin Lees, F.L.S. Tilt & Bogue.

This is a popular work for the stroller in the fields, woods, and mountains, and also for the amateur Botanist. It is enriched by apt poetical quotation, local description, and antiquarian and literary allusion. It is systematized by being divided into Months; the Wild Flowers of each month forming a chapter. It is, in short, one of a class of books which, if but tolerably well executed, cannot fail to please, bringing, as it does, "science, poetry, and adventure" to the investigation of what are so charming in themselves, "our Wild Flowers." A good many pieces of original floral verse are interspersed with the text, though we cannot say that the poetry excels the prose.

Geography Generalized; or an Introduction to the Study of Geography. By Robert Sullivan, Esq. A.M., Trinity College, Dublin. Dublin: Curry & Co.

This elementary treatise appears to be compiled with care, and ability.

An Outline of the General Regulations and Methods of Teaching in the Male National Model Schools. By Professor Sullivan. Dublin: Folds.

We point out this work to teachers in general, though it may be found the most useful to those who train by the system adopted in the Model Schools.

The Domestic Dictionary. By Gibbons Merle, and John Reitch, M.D. Octavo, cloth, pp. 424. London: Strange.

This book gives recipes for everything; toothache and rifles, typhus and turnips, in their varieties, cultivation, and mode of cooking. Perhaps it does all this as well as any book can do which attempts too much, and in which the authors are much oftener guided by precedent than personal knowledge or experience. This observation does not apply to the medical receipts, which occupy a large portion of the whole work, and appear useful.

Odes and Sonnets, with other Poems, Scotch as well as English. By the Rev. C. Lessingham Smith, M.A., Rector of Little Canfield, Essex. Deighton, Cambridge.

A volume this, consisting of short poems on every theme, and composed in every cheerful and happy mood; one which consequently contains things adapted to every taste, and which must give pleasure to everybody. It boasts of nothing very great or enduring, but of many things that are highly pleasing, and some that are charming: as for example,—

MY MOTHER'S SENTIMENTS.

A little stream that's never dry,
When summer suns are glowing;
That, when the wintry storm sweeps by,
Is never overflowing:
Such is the wealth that I implore,
And God has given me such and more.

Daughters more excellent than fair;
A son not great but good;
Servants with whom I've learned to bear,
Whatever be their mood:
In peace with these, in love with those,
I calmly live and have no foes.

A house for comfort, not too small,
Not large enough for pride;
A garden, and a garden-wall,
A little lake beside;
In these I find so sweet a home,
That not a wish have I to roam.

A little land to graze my cow,
Whose milk supplies my table;
A warm sty for my good old sow;
And for my nags a stable:
All have their space for food and play,
And all are glad, both I, and they.

I feed the poor man in his cot,
The beggar at my gate;
And, thankful for my quiet lot,
I envy not the great:
But rather praise my God on high,
Happy to live, prepared to die.

This matronly philosophy is quite beautiful. The Scotch poems are great curiosities in their way; as we should imagine it not much more difficult for a modern Englishman to write verses in Norwegian or German, than in broad Scotch. Some of the Scotch poems are, moreover, very sweet and pretty. The national sentiment is caught, as well as the trick of the language. For example, this song of BONNIE ANN.

I doutna whiles but I could wale
A lass wi' mair o' gowd and lan';
But no a lass in a' the vale
I lo'e so weel as bonnie Ann!

Her een sae sparklin' and sae blue,
Aye speak o' mirth and luve to me;
An' then her sweet wee rosy mou'
Just for ae kiss what wad I gie?

. . . . . .

Her daddie's aye a preachin' o't
That she's ower young as yet, ye ken;
But gudeness guide us! that's a faut
That ilka day an' hour maun men'.

She's seen the flowers o' saxteen springs,
Hersel' the sweetest flower ava'!
An' a' thing on her guidin' hings
In barn and byre, in house and ha'.

O' saxty nowt she's aye the rule;
O' sheep and kye two hunder fu',
Then whar, I'se like to ken, the fules
Wad threep she's no a woman nou'?

But I maun bide, as weel 's I may,
To please her daddie, honest man!
Though sair I lang for that blythe day
When I'm to wed my bonnie Ann.

Lectures to Young Men. Delivered at the request of the Edinburgh Young Men's Society. Edinburgh: Dalrymple.—These Lectures, twelve in number, were delivered by clergymen invited from different parts of the country. The subjects are widely different in many respects. The majority of the discourses are apt and able; and all have the merit of brevity.

Popular Cyclopedia of Natural Science. Botany. Wright, Alty, Baynall: Aldine Chambers.—The object of this volume of the series is to communicate a popular, but at the same time, a scientific view of the chief tribes of the Flowering Plants. The system of Dr. Lindley's "Ladies' Botany" is adopted, as that best suited to the anonymous author's purpose.

The Pictorial Catechism of Botany. By Anne Pratt, author of "The Flowers and their Associations," "The Field, the Garden, and the Woodland." Suttaby & Co.—This is a neat Lilliputian quarto, bound in cloth, and with gilt leaves, and altogether a handsome little book; and we doubt not a good one, too, for its purpose. The illustrations, which give it the name—pictorial, are exceedingly well engraved.

Report on the Present State of the New Observatory of Glasgow. By Professor Nichol.

I. Klauer's German Manual for Self-Tuition. Two volumes, 12mo, cloth. Third edition; entirely revised and improved. London: Rolandi, Foreign Bookseller.—We have had occasion to speak with approbation of this hand-book of the German language before now. It is not less deserving of praise after the pains bestowed upon improving it.

II. Klauer's Progressive Exercises in Writing German. Two volumes, cloth. Second edition.—These two volumes are bound in one for the convenience of students.

SERIAL WORKS.

Brande's Dictionary of Science, Literature, and Art. Part XII. Longmans.—This valuable work is now completed. For accurate information upon a vast variety of subjects, brought up to the present day and hour, (in matters of progressive science and discovery,) and carefully digested, this work is, in its peculiar department, unequalled. As a compendious book of reference upon all subjects, it will long retain its value.

England in the Nineteenth Century. Northern Division. Part VII: Lancashire.—Among other curious traditionary matter, the new Part of this elegant work contains a history of the Peel family, and a pretty wood-engraving of the cottage or small farm-house in which the first Sir Robert was born; the euphonious name of Peel Cross, his alleged birth-place, being, however, vulgarized into Fish-Lane, Blackburn. In the same neighbourhood, the ingenious Hargrave, the inventor of the spinning-jenny, was born. How opposite, as this world judges, has been the fate of the two families! The Part contains many valuable Tables necessary to a complete County History.

M'Culloch's Geographical and Statistical Dictionary. Part XV.—Another Part will complete this valuable work, whether it be regarded as a book of reference or one of information. The Part comprehends Turkey, Texas, and many important towns, and in it is commenced the article United States.

Introductory Lecture on Pictorial Anatomy. Delivered to the Students of the Edinburgh School of Design. By James Miller, F.R.S.E., F.R.C.S.E., Lecturer on the Principles and Practice of Surgery, Assistant-Surgeon to the Royal Infirmary, &c., &c., &c.—This able and eloquent address has been published at the request of the Commissioners of the Board of Trustees for the encouragement of Scottish manufactures, under whose superintendence the School is placed. It is the Introductory Lecture to a course upon Pictorial Anatomy, which Dr. Miller is at present delivering to the students of this eminent school of elementary art. The Honourable Commissioners conceived "that it would be highly desirable that the Lecture was not confined to the place where it was delivered," and requested Dr. Miller to publish it. The same motive makes us desirous to extend its usefulness as far as this announcement may reach; for its objects are extensive as the knowledge of art, and its instructions, or rather the impulse it gives, is as available to students in London, Liverpool, or Glasgow, as in the city where it was delivered. As a brief specimen of a Lecturer's style, who seems himself imbued with the love of art, we quote this eulogium on Wilkie:—

And is not Scotland doing her own share of the work! [The Lecturer is speaking of the advance of art in Britain.] It is true we have lost a "name in which Scotland had a high and endearing pride, which England delighted to honour, and which was cherished in the breast of every reflecting man throughout the whole civilized world,"—our own Wilkie is gone! He who "made the cottage hearth his grave theme,—who surrounded the lives, and cares, and daily occupations of the poor with dignity and beauty,"—who indeed found sermons in stones, books in the running streams, and good in everything,—and who left in all his works the same breathing health, as in the air wafted from the heather of his native land." He is gone! but he has left a name,—and a fame as pure and unsullied as the bright sky which shines above a painter's grave. He has filled our minds and memories with what is mournful, yet as soothing as the rolling of the blue waters over his honoured head. Scotland, though in sorrow, cannot be despondent. More than one son is left her of the noblest promise; and to them she looks in confidence. How many Wilkies may there not be now struggling onward in the path of fame! The exhibition of our Royal Academy makes rapid progress both in the number and merit of its works, and will bear, nay challenge competition with any in the Empire."

Who is to Blame! or a Cursory Review of the American Apology for American Accession to Slavery. By James Grahame, Esq.—Since this pamphlet was published, we have heard of the death of its author, the historian of the United States. THE PRIVATE BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE OF COMMONS.

To the Editor of Tait's Magazine.

Sir,—Having been, during the two last months, in London, superintending the progress of a private bill through Parliament, I am enabled to communicate some information with regard to the manner in which the private business, as it is called, of the House of Commons is conducted, and which, I believe, is not generally known to your readers, as the proceedings of Parliament in this department are very seldom published.

Private bills, you are aware, are frequently of the greatest importance, not only to the individuals immediately interested, but to the public in general. Under this head are comprehended road, ferry, railway bills, &c. &c.

Private bills, when opposed, after having been read twice in the House of Commons, are sent to a Committee, consisting of about twenty members, where they are gone over clause by clause. The bill, if not rejected by the Committee, is reported to the House of Commons, with the alterations made in it, and then read a third time, and sent to the House of Lords, where precisely the same process is adopted. Of course the whole House of Commons, and the whole House of Lords, have the power of altering the decisions come to by their respective Committees; but as this is seldom done, the fate of a private bill may be said to depend on the Committees of the two Houses, whose judgments are generally confirmed by the Houses, although certainly attempts are frequently made, and that sometimes too successfully to overset in the House of Commons the decisions come to by their Committees.

The members of Committees on private bills, have thus most important duties to perform. They have not only to decide as to the general merits of the measure, but have to adjudicate on most delicate points of equity, betwixt opposing parties,—for instance, on questions of direct compensation betwixt individuals and the promoters of a bill, or the principle by which such compensation shall be afterwards determined. The members of Parliamentary Committees may therefore be considered, to all intents and purposes, to be judges—bound to act upon the same principles, and to be regulated in their intercourse with the different parties by the same feelings of delicacy and honour, by which the Judges of Great Britain, may be said to be universally guided.

Such being the case, the first thing which naturally suggests itself, is, that the members composing the Committees on private bills should have no interest in the question that is to come before them, either in their own persons or in that of their relations. Such an interest would be a disqualification to a judge of the Court of Session deciding upon an abstract point of law; and much more ought it to be a disqualification in a question of equity, such as those which come before Parliamentary Committees, where the members ought to be influenced solely by a sense of what is expedient and just.

In the next place, a member of Committee should keep himself aloof from every species of influence. He ought to come to the sittings with his mind unbiassed either on one side or the other. Above all, he should permit no canvassing, no attempt to obtain the promise of support from him, by ex-parte statements out of doors. A judge of the Court of Session who would submit to this, would be considered infamous, and totally unfit to sit on the Bench.

I shall now inform you of the manner in which the Committees are appointed. Great Britain and Ireland are divided into a number of districts; and the members of Parliament, elected by the constituencies of each district, form a Committee, before which every private bill relating to that district is brought. For instance, the South-eastern list of Scotland is composed of the two members for Edinburgh, the members for Leith, Dumfries, Berwick-upon-Tweed, and the Haddington burghs, and the members for the counties of Linlithgow, Edinburgh, Haddington, Berwick, Peebles, Selkirk, Roxburgh, and Dumfries,—amounting in all to fifteen. Every private bill, relating to any of those counties or burghs, is sent to this Committee; and it is the same in the other districts.

It is thus apparent, that on the Committee of every private bill, it must be nearly certain that there will be at least one, most probably more, partisan judges, either in favour or opposed to the measure,—having a direct personal interest to warp them, and taking, as is always the case, the most active share in the proceedings, and in influencing the other members. Let us suppose a bill for a road through the county of Edinburgh: Would not Mr. Gibson-Craig, one of the members for the city, and Mr. Ramsay, the member for the county, have a direct personal interest to have this road pass through, or as near as possible to their estates, even although the public advantage required it in a different direction? I instance such a possible case, as no road-bill for the county of Edinburgh has been introduced since those gentlemen have been in Parliament.

This is the first great defect of the Committee system of the House of Commons. Instead of a private bill being sent to a Committee of the district members, there ought to be a positive regulation that no member having the least interest in the matter should be allowed to sit in that Committee. This is the case in the House of Lords, who have no district Committees, and where a Committee is expressly appointed for each bill; care being always taken that no member shall be named who is personally or even locally connected with the measure. From this circumstance, it arises that the Committees of the House of Lords are looked upon as tribunals, fairer, more impartial, and infinitely better in every respect than the Committees of the House of Commons. One proof of which is, that the decisions of the Committees of the Lords are never attempted to be set aside, when the bill is brought back to the House; whereas, in the House of Commons, continual efforts are made by parties to upset the decisions come to by their Committees: thus proving that the House of Lords look on the members of their Committees as impartial judges, while the House of Commons regard theirs as mere partisans.

But to return to the House of Commons, it may here be mentioned that, by a late regulation, five members, (called the selected members,) not connected with the district, are appointed on every Committee, to act along with the district members. This was done to give a show of impartiality to the Committee. But the five selected members form such a small part of the whole number, and are in general so indifferent to the measure, compared to those locally interested, that their presence is of very little use in giving fairness to the proceedings.

There is no obligation on any member to attend a Committee on a private bill; so that it often occurs that measures of great importance are delayed, to the enormous cost of parties, and sometimes eventually lost for the session from the want of a quorum of members; and those who do attend are principally composed either of men who, having a personal interest in the measure, ought not to be allowed to be members at all, or of men who have been canvassed to attend by those having an interest.

Let us next consider the manner in which the Committee so appointed conduct themselves. With regard to this, there is no difference of opinion among those acquainted with their proceedings. A more complete system of jobbing and corruption, for I can call it nothing else, does not exist than that carried on in the Committee: of the House of Commons. It is not reckoned etiquette to canvass the five selected members of a Committee: but with regard to the district members, who compose three-fourths of the whole number, not only may they be canvassed and solicited by both parties, but those opposed to such a corrupt practice as that of canvassing judges, are obliged to comply with the rule, lest the members not called on should consider themselves slighted, and vote against the party neglecting them. It is quite notorious that the fate of a bill depends not upon the expediency of the measure or its intrinsic merits, but upon the success of the intrigues carried on in its favour or against it by the parties or the members interested, who are always the most active and influential partisans. The members of Committee, for the most part, seem to consider themselves entitled, whenever their own constituents, whom they may be afraid to offend, are not interested, to gratify their particular interests, friendships, and caprices. They do not seem to think that they have any public duty whatever to perform. One member compliments a friend by promising to support a bill before he has read one clause of it; another votes against it because he personally dislikes the party or agent promoting it. And all this they can do with the most perfect impunity; because the divisions, and not only the divisions, but the discussions amongst the members themselves, take place with closed doors, and the public have no access to the record of the divisions, unless in the case of Committees on Railways, the minute of the proceedings of which, by a recent regulation of the House of Commons, have been ordered to be published with the votes. That there are exceptions to this mode of conduct I willingly allow; but that this is the case in the great majority of instances, I believe every one acquainted with Parliamentary practice will admit. So perfectly is this understood to be the case, that the principal qualification of a Parliamentary solicitor is, to be a man of gentlemanly appearance and demeanour, and to have a familiar and intimate acquaintance with the members, that he may bring them down to the House or to the Committees to support or oppose the bills, according as he, the solicitor, is employed to do so. It is quite ridiculous to see the manner in which the solicitors haul about the members, (the judges!) and make them do whatever they want.

Those members, in addition to those personally interested, who make a practice of attending the Committees on private bills, are, for the most part, men who have plenty of time on their hands, who are not in office, and whose voices are never heard in the debates of the house, and who are desirous of acquiring a little consequence by playing their part in a Committee on a private bill, where the agents and the parties are obliged to flatter and court them, lest they should revenge themselves by throwing out the measure. It is quite absurd to see the airs those little personages assume—the manner in which they keep their hats on during the dog days, to distinguish themselves from the audience, and swagger and lay down the law with the most peremptory caprice, and that without in the slightest degree understanding the case before them.

In what I have stated, I am not in any degree acted upon by spleen; for the bill in which I was interested has passed most triumphantly through both Houses, and of course I am naturally inclined to be of opinion that our Committee was an excellent one in every respect.

The question then is—How are these defects to be remedied? This, I conceive, can only be done in one way. The members of Committee must be paid. I am more and more convinced, from what I have lately seen, that we never shall have an efficient legislature until the members are remunerated for their services; and this might be commenced by paying those who sit in Committees on private bills. At the present time, members actually conceive that they confer a favour on a party by attending a Committee; but let them be paid, and they will feel that this is a duty. The only two members who are now paid for their services, as members of the House of Commons, are the Speaker, and Mr. Grees, the Chairman of Ways and Means, who have both a great deal to do with the passing of private bills. From this circumstance, both the Speaker and Mr. Green are completely at the public service. They attend in their offices at certain hours every day, and the solicitors can consult them freely on every point of difficulty.

It appears to me, that there should be selected from the House of Commons, at the commencement of every session, twenty men of good sense and business habits, who should receive £500 a-year each; and that from those twenty members a Committee of five should be appointed for every private bill, care being taken that any personal or local interest should exclude a member from a particular Committee. We should thus have four standing Committees, composed of men paid for their services, and therefore bound to act really as judges—to refuse themselves to every species of canvassing and solicitation; and who, from being paid, would be always ready when required, from ten o'clock in the morning till the House met at four o'clock in the afternoon, to sit on private bills.

I am convinced, if some such plan as this were adopted, justice, equity, and expediency would supersede influence and intrigue, and bills of the greatest advantage to the community would be introduced and carried by parties who, knowing the corrupt tribunals through which they must at present pass, will not venture on the expense and uncertainty now attendant upon Parliamentary Committees. The decision of such Committees would be viewed as the decision of judges, and would never, except on the ground of some glaring and acknowledged mistake, be interfered with by the House of Commons, any more than the judgments of the Lord Chancellor and the legal Peers, delivered on appeals, are interfered with by the House of Lords. The proceedings before such practised Committees, perfectly versed in the forms of Parliament and the laws of evidence, would be shortened to at least one-fourth of their present duration, and the expense of carrying a bill through Parliament would be diminished in a like ratio. Thus, for a cost of £10,000, paid to the members of Committee, many hundred thousands a-year would be saved to the country.

Such a reform as I have suggested would still leave with the House of Commons all the power it at present possesses. And as private bills have no connexion with party, I do not see how there would be any difficulty in selecting, from both sides of the House, competent men, willing to undertake the duties of acting as permanent judges on Committees.—Yours, &c.

TAYLOR'S NOTES OF A TOUR IN THE MANUFACTURING DISTRICTS OF LANCASHIRE.*

Dr. Taylor's new work is critically timed. Some proof is required of "the moral worth and social importance of the Factory System;" at a moment when the outrages of the exasperated and starving operatives is frightening the isle from its propriety. Had facts, with us in the north, not anticipated his statements, these would have prepared us for even worse excesses than have yet been committed in Lancashire. They show the day of hope and forbearance to be departing; some of the people to be possessed by a reckless and vindictive spirit; and not always alive to the real causes of the misery they have so long and patiently endured. Yet the more intelligent among them do attribute the prevailing distress to restrictions on trade, the burthen of excessive taxation, and corrupt political institutions; to—in the phraseology of the day—"class legislation."

Dr. Taylor is so thorough an admirer of the Factory System, that he can perceive no inherent defect in its nature, even of the slightest kind; nor any contingent evil which might not be remedied by free trade, and the careful superintendence of the master manufacturers. The comparative condition of the operatives in some of the great rural or village factories belonging to enlightened and philanthropic individuals possessed of large capitals, goes far to confirm his opinion: though all the mills in England may not be exactly like those of Turton and Egerton; nor all the mill-owners like the Messrs. Ashworth. The work-people of these gentlemen had the good sense to own that the reduction of their wages, which the masters had delayed as long as was possible, was not owing to any selfish design, but to the decay of trade—which evident and alarming decay the operatives universally attributed to the refusal of the government to admit the materials of payment proffered by those who were anxious to become our customers. This view would not seem to have reached many of the rioters and depredators in Manchester, and the towns around it.

It was Dr. Taylor's practice to enter into all the cottages and dwellings of the operatives open to him; and to converse freely with the people wherever he found them congregated, or chanced to fall in with them. He thus, both by eye and ear, gained much information which is lost to the tourist who does not diverge and pry. He relates—

> On one occasion, the group with which I was conversing on the road was joined by a man who was stated to have belonged to a large factory which had just been closed. He described the increasing misery which this event had produced in the district from which he came,—I think the neighbourhood of Accrington,—and then quite astounded me by declaring that abundant means of furnishing food to the starving, and employment to the idle, so as immediately to relieve all the distress of the manufacturing districts, were in the country, and were perversely withheld. Not a little surprised and perplexed, I asked him for an explanation. "The corn in bond," he instantly replied; "it would pay for my former employer's yarn,—it would give food to my starving family,—it would set those wheels going which are never likely to turn another spindle." Here was a lesson in political economy from a vagrant cotton-spinner which I had not learned from my university education or private study. I felt and confessed my obligation. He coolly replied, "I hope you will never have such a teacher as I have had,—it has been starved into me!"

At the village of Hollymount, in the Forest of Rosendale, the tourist, on a morning, witnessed the Factory System under the fairest auspices, in the large establishment of the Messrs. Whitehead, where all was harmony and happiness. Here were to be seen comfortable and ample houses, clean, and well furnished; neat, healthy, and intelligent children; a school well attended, and on the best foundation; a handsome chapel; tee-totalism in many cases; and money in the Savings Bank.

> I found the villagers of Hollymount healthy, happy, and contented. The operatives, one and all, declared that their only anxiety was, lest the progress of distress should reach the establishment of Hollymount, and deprive them of the employment they possessed, and the comforts they produced. . . . . Within the memory of living men Hollymount and the surrounding district were little better than an uncultivated waste, where the stony ground produced a scanty herbage for a few cattle: its present condition need not be again described, nor a contrast drawn.

Burnley, lately so famous in the annals of famine, was reached on the same evening, and presented that painful contrast to Hollymount, which the latter may ere this present to its former self.

From Hollymount we drove to Crashaw Booth, as I had been invited to make Sunnyside my quarters. Here I parted from my companions; and as it was yet early, I proceeded on the same evening to Burnley, where the contrast to what I had seen in the morning was perfectly heart-rending. Groups of idlers stood in the midst of the street; their faces haggard with famine, and their eyes rolling with that fierce and uneasy expression which I have often noticed in maniacs. I went up to some of them, and entered into conversation. They were perfectly candid and communicative; for the men of this part of Lancashire retain much of the sturdy independence of the ancient foresters: they will go miles to do you a service, but they will not stir one inch to do homage to wealth or station. Each man had his own tale of sorrow to tell; their stories were not

"The short and simple annals of the poor;"

they were complicated details of misery and suffering, gradual in their approach, and grinding in their result; borne, however, with an iron endurance such as the Saxon race alone displays, and with the sternness belonging to that noblest form of pride—the pride of independent labour. "We want not charity, but employment," was their unanimous declaration; and proofs of their truth were abundant in the anecdotes told and verified of men having travelled miles to obtain a job, however heavy the labour, and however wretched the remuneration.

I found them all Chartists, but with this difference—that the block-printers and handloom-weavers united to their Chartism a hatred of machinery, which was far from being shared by the factory operatives. The latter also deprecated anything like an appeal to physical force, while the former strenuously urged an immediate appeal to arms. There was no concealment of sentiment on either side. I heard more than twenty openly advocate the expediency of burning down the mills, in order to compel the factory hands to join in an insurrectionary movement. A mill had been burned down at Colne two nights previously; doubts were entertained whether this had been the result of design or accident; and in the streets of Burnley there were groups expressing their hopes that it would be traced to design, and followed by imitation, while the heaviest curses were bestowed on the factory hands of Colne for having heartily exerted themselves to check the conflagration, and to supply water to the engines. Permit me to repeat that these sentiments were expressed openly and in the public streets. I stood amongst them and was known to be a stranger: there was no appearance of speaking either with a design to be overheard, or an anxiety for concealment. Had I been one of the posts in the street, my presence could not have been viewed with more perfect indifference.

Now we begin to obtain the key to the disgraceful scenes that have occurred in Lancashire. An intelligent manufacturer, with whom Dr. Taylor conversed on the causes of the existing distress, repeated in substance what has been said a hundred thousand times of the corn-laws, and the consequent want of employment; and now we reach the next link in that chain, the termination of which it is frightful to contemplate. This gentleman Dwelt very strongly on the moral results of the crisis, which he described as far more alarming than its physical consequences; marriages had nearly ceased, while young persons, from having no work, were thrown together in dangerous circumstances, their passions stimulated by anger, and their powers of restraint destroyed by desperation. Revenge, "the wild justice of the hopeless," was preached by itinerant incendiaries; but while "the shadow of a chance" remained, he did not believe that the people would have recourse to violence. "If, however," he continued, "they once get it into their heads that no remedy is to be expected, there will be no safety in Burnley for any man with a decent coat to his back." From the conversations which I subsequently had with several of the unemployed operatives in this district, I am firmly persuaded that my informant did not exaggerate.

Conversations held with the people themselves, at different places, left no room for doubt, although such conclusions were not to be drawn from the state of physical suffering in which they were found. The manufacturing population are represented as very reluctantly yielding to accept parish relief, yet one-fourth of the people of Colne were receiving relief; the rates had been raised from 3s. to 10s. in the pound, and the relief granted was considered so inadequate by the paupers, that it was distributed, in one place, under the protection of a military guard. It was here that the tourist first adopted the plan which he afterwards invariably followed.

I went to the market-place, and addressed myself to the most intelligent-looking of the many idle operatives by whom it was crowded. I asked him to guide me to the streets where the unemployed work-people resided, that I might see with my own eyes the condition to which they had been reduced. As I had never been in this part of the country before, it was impossible for me to select specimens, and I took care that my guide should not; for, though he led to the streets, I took the houses at random. In all, I visited eighty-three dwellings, selected at hasard. They were destitute of furniture, save old boxes for tables, and stools, or even large stones, for chairs; the beds were composed of straw and shavings, sometimes with torn pieces of carpet or packing-canvass for a covering, and sometimes without any kind of covering whatever. The food was oatmeal and water for breakfast; flour and water, with a little skimmed milk, for dinner; oatmeal and water again for a third supply, with those who went through the form of eating three meals a-day. I was informed in fifteen families that their children went without the "blue milk," or milk from which the cream had been taken, on alternate days. I was an eye-witness to children appeasing the cravings of the stomach by the refuse of decayed vegetables in the root-market. I saw a woman in the very last stage of extenuation, suckling an infant, which could scarcely draw a single drop of nutriment from her exhausted breast. I inquired the child's age? Fifteen months. Why was it not weaned? Another mouth would be added to the number of those for whom the present supply of oatmeal was insufficient. I was told that there had been several instances of death by sheer starvation. On asking why application had not been made to the parish for relief, I was informed that they were persons from agricultural districts, who, on committing an act of vagrancy, would be sent to their parishes, and that they had rather endure anything, in the hope of some manufacturing revival, than return to the condition of farm-labourers, from which they had emerged. This was a fact perfectly new to me, and at the first blush utterly incredible.

To us it appears equally incredible, though it is plausibly supported. The houses, and the persons of the people of Colne, miserable as they were, in every respect, were "scrupulously clean." The children were in rags, but not in filth. Contrasted with their neighbours, they were also remarkable for calm endurance. At Padiham, a township in which the owner of the land had allowed no mills to be erected, the distress was equally great; but the people were violent and fierce.

Here teeth were set, hands were clenched, and curses of fearful bitterness pronounced with harrowing energy. "We wait but for the word to begin," was stated broadly and openly by every hand-loom weaver or block-printer I met in the place, and the tone in which this declaration was uttered gave startling evidence of its sincerity. There was a reckless desperation about the aspect of misery in Padiham, which was unlike anything I ever saw in Lancashire, but I doubt if it be more dangerous than the steady and fixed resolution to obtain a redress of real or imaginary grievances which I found among the people in Colne and Marsden. The destitution in all these places is much alike; in all, you may hear the same declaration, that "things are worsening:" in all, too, you may find something like a determination to effect a change; but in Padiham and its neighbourhood there are superadded aspirations for vengeance, and threats of retaliating wrongs on the head of supposed oppressors. In Padiham I heard a man in the open streets go beyond even the violence of Burnley, and, amidst the cheers of some scores, express an eager hope that "Captain Swing would take command of the manufacturing districts."

The sight of the idle wheels, and smokeless chimneys of a beautiful village upon the Irwell, gives rise to a painful strain of moralizing, on the obduracy and actual madness of those who continue to oppose the only rational remedy; the last chance of amelioration, and of averting that fierce conflict between the "Have-nots" and "the Haves" which has already broken out in so many districts. It is said here, and the fact begins to be realized,

Coleridge's fearful eclogue of "Fire, Famine, and Slaughter," will become applicable to districts far more important and extensive than La Vendée. This alarm is suggested by no loud threat or angry declaration; I have heard little of such vapouring in Lancashire; it arises from hearing stern declamations made with a concentrated energy and bitter resoluteness which found vent in few and brief sentences: these were pregnant with meaning, and meant far more than they said. I endeavoured to remonstrate with one of these men, and to show him the perils of the course which he wished to see adopted: he cut me very short, and coolly imformed me that "the time for argument was gone past."

In this village I met with one of the most remarkable men I have ever seen, a perfect specimen of the "abnormis sapiens:" he never studied logic in his life, but I never saw any one who approached him in quickness of detecting a fallacy or exposing a sophism. His art of reasoning consisted in his powers of graphic and comic illustration. For instance, some conversation arose respecting war; he said, in a strong Lancashire dialect which I am quite unable to imitate, "My father was killed at Waterloo;—there was a day appointed for thanksgiving in church;—parson comes to me and says—Will you not come to church and thank God for the great victory which he has bestowed upon your country? And, says I,—What should I thank God for? Is it for killing my father?"—He told us several anecdotes of his anti-corn-law debates, for he is a zealous agitator in the cause of repeal.

A Methodist preacher told this man that the present distress was a visitation from God for the sins of the working-classes. The man's bold and startling reply is hardly fit for publication, though it does less dishonour to the Divine goodness than is implied in the averment of the Methodist. An observation made by this man merits to be quoted, for its power, originality, and practical wisdom. The minds of the operatives are at present an universal raw.

"Every improved faculty of the mind is new strength of muscle to help us forward when times are prosperous; but in such seasons as this each improved faculty is a new raw on which the whip descends more painfully and bitterly."

A poor silk weaver in Stockport said—

"The distress is owing to bad legislation. Landed gentlemen will not let trade open, because it will hurt them; but if corn was cheaper, it would never do any good until taxes came off. It's the national debt; we had no voice in contracting that debt, and I don't think we are liable to pay it. This is the opinion of the working-men; I don't know what the gentlemen think about it. The working-men get together and talk of these things; I have not been much among them for twelve months. There will be no good without a law to fix wages." Being asked whether such a law would force masters to find work, he said "No." He added, "There's another thing: there 's too many salaries; this Government 's as bad as the last in that; pensions, and things of that sort."

I may add here that Pownall's sentiments respecting the national debt are not singular; I heard similar declarations made in various parts of Lancashire; and one operative worded his argument in such an original and forcible form that I at once copied it into my notes. His words were, "The national debt was contracted to protect property, but the burthen of its payment has been thrown upon industry; now Property has no more right to ask Industry to pay its debts than I have to ask you to pay mine." I represented to him Napoleon's invariable hostility to the trade and commerce of England, and endeavoured to show that the French wars were maintained for the protection of industry as well as of property. He asked me, with a bitter sneer, "How much worse the working-classes would be off, if Napoleon had conquered the country, than they are now?" He then added, "The policy of Buonaparte, you say, was intended to destroy the trade and commerce of England; have not the corn-laws a direct and obvious tendency to produce the same result? You know they have, and so does everybody know who can put two ideas together. We cannot sell to people whose payments we refuse. So that, according to your account, we have spent hundreds of millions to prevent Buonaparte from doing that which, at the very moment of his fall, we set about doing ourselves. This is exceedingly like the story told of a man who paid his servant for saving him from an assassin on the very morning that he committed suicide."

So much needful publicity has of late been given to the statistics of misery in Lancashire, that there is some danger of hearts becoming callous in the continued contemplation of evils which some selfish people would fain persuade themselves cannot be remedied. We shall not, therefore, load our pages with relations of the distress prevailing throughout these districts; and which it is impossible to exaggerate. Along with suffering comes recklessness and despair. At Colne, where the people are described as patient and peaceful, more than twenty persons, with whom Dr. Taylor conversed in the streets, or their own houses, said—"We used to think that something better would turn up; but have waited so long that hope itself is worn out. We must do something for ourselves, since those above us will never do anything for us." Others are represented as listless and apathetic, their souls having been gradually crushed within them. In this pitiable and hopeless condition were the operatives of Stockport, who, within a few years, had been among the most prosperous and happy of the manufacturing population of Lancashire. It is of them, and of the people of Bolton, Burnley, &c., that the tourist exclaims —

I have seen misery in many forms: I have been in the huts and hovels of Ireland, when my native land was visited with the fearful scourge of cholera; I have visited the cellars of Liverpool, where existence assumes an aspect which ceases to be human; I have penetrated into the wynds and vennels of Glasgow, localities which would try to the uttermost the hardest of hearts and the strongest of stomachs;—but nowhere have I seen misery which so agonized my very soul as that which I have witnessed in the manufacturing districts of Lancashire. And why? Because the extreme of wretchedness was there, and there only, combined with a high tone of moral dignity, a marked sense of propriety, a decency, cleanliness, and order, the elements which produced the vast wealth I have described, and which do not merit the intense suffering I have witnessed. I was beholding the gradual immolation of the noblest and most valuable population that ever existed in this country, or in any other under heaven. We are not stocks and stones: I am as firmly persuaded as I am of my own existence, that, if the noble and wealthy had witnessed the scenes which I have gone through, they would fling all prejudices and selfish interests to the winds, they would stretch forth eager hands to raise the sufferers, pour oil and wine into the wounds they have inflicted, and devote the whole of their energies, heart and soul, to prevent the recurrence of such misery.

We are hardly able to embrace this charitable view.

The whole of the volume is, if not a studied eulogy of the Factory System, somewhat liable to a suspicion of one-sidedness. But at the present juncture, this is the wise as well as generous leaning. The immediate necessity for the total abolition of the Corn-laws is, if not directly advocated, incidentally and powerfully made out; and the threadbare fallacies regarding over-production, emigration, and danger to agriculture and machinery, are once more demolished, and driven from their last refuge of lies. But nothing in the work is half so important as the report of the spirit, as well as of the actual condition, of the operatives, which is gathered from their own lips; and that not under the restraints of an examination before a formal board of Commissioners, but in free and spontaneous conversation.

Dr. Taylor was in Manchester when the British Association lately held there its meeting for 1842. The members, in spite of the prevailing distress and embarassments, were as hospitably received as in any of the towns in which they had held their previous meetings; and the inhabitants tried to keep their many anxieties and causes of uneasiness out of sight of their transient guests. Matters were at this time hastening to a crisis. And we are told, by one who saw behind the curtain—

A very different state of feeling was manifested when they were visited in their warehouses and counting-houses. Even a fortnight had made an immense difference; men whom I had known the most strenuous advocates of Conservative principles were now foremost in urging resolutions and addresses to stop the supplies; those who were moderate Liberals have become advocates of the five points of the Charter: and many were ready to join in an association for the non-payment of taxes: in short, a very angry and dangerous spirit was increasing, and this in a class which had been always remarkable for prudence and moderation. The shopkeepers were not less excited;—the collector of the income-tax in Manchester will have a situation as little enviable as that of an inspector of mines under Lord Ashley's new bill. I found, too, that the apostles of mischief and sedition were not idle at a crisis so favourable to their schemes; indeed, they openly declared that their detestable project of an appeal to arms, and the consequent result of a total change in the constitution of the country, were now close at hand. In the midst of this threatening and distressing aspect of affairs, I seem to myself to see the prospect of some good arising. I think that many will learn the lesson of the very little importance of the constitution of government,—considered as it relates to parties and persons rather than to principles. . . . . .
I am not at all sorry that the leading politicians of Manchester are "looking more to things and less to men." There is a proof of it, which I very much lament, but which nevertheless I am bound to record, that, with the majority of the members of the Anti-Corn-Law League, the most unpopular man at the present moment is Lord John Russell. I have endeavoured to ascertain the cause, because I am far from being pleased with the fact; and I have only received vague and indeterminate answers. Still the fact may be quoted as a proof that there is a growing tendency among the manufacturers to look to themselves as a body, and not to rest their dependence upon any party in the state.

The causes of the unpopularity of Lord John Russell with the Anti-Corn-Law party, are surely not difficult to divine, any more than his unpopularity with Radical Reformers, among whom, by the way, Dr. Taylor is not to be numbered. He concludes with an earnest exhortation to the manufacturers and the League to unite and consolidate their strength; to form, henceforth, an active as they are a powerful interest in the state; and not to rest contented with merely carrying the abolition of the Corn-laws. He would have them stand by their order, of which they have, till now, seemed ashamed; rescue their dependents from false teachers, by becoming their actual, as they are their natural, guides; and, in short, though this is not put in words, exercise that moral and political influence over them which the landowners do over the agricultural population, assuming that influence to be wholly beneficial. We do not mean to advert to several matters treated in Dr. Taylor's Letters. He is a Churchman; and, in suggesting some needful changes, would work only by machinery instituted by a state church. Yet there is good included, both in his means and ends.

We are sincerely happy to have his testimony to the increasing harmony between the employers and the employed, although it has not been corroborated by some of the circumstances and facts attending the late outbreaks.

We need scarcely add, that this work, though hasty and cursory, is well written, as well as ably reasoned, and peculiarly well-timed.

ABEDNEGO THE MONEY-LENDER.

BY MRS. GORE.

CHAPTER XIII.

On taking possession of his old lodgings on his return from the Tower, the first circumstance communicated to Basil by his landlord,—(the retired butler of a noble family,)—was, that a shabbyish-looking person had called repeatedly with earnest inquiries concerning the moment and manner of his arrival.

"A gentleman?"—inquired Basil, who, being out of debt, had less apprehension of shabby-looking persons calling with inquiries, than might have been the case with Maitland or Wilberton.

"Why, I should say, yes, Sir," replied the man, "though there warn't much matters to boast of in the coat on his back.—But he spoke like a person of eddication."

Basil smiled approvingly at the distinction, which did not, however, assist his guesses.—At length, it occurred to him, so strongly as to bring the colour to his face, that the mysterious stranger was most likely the Protean Abednego; a suspicion fully confirmed by the information which his minute inquiries now managed to elicit.

"And he said he would call again?"—demanded young Annesley.

"This evening, Sir,—he said he would be sure to look in this evening."

And the tone of glee in which the young guardsman hastened to give orders that the moment his strange visiter arrived he should be admitted into his sitting-room, relieved the mind of the landlord, (with whom his first-floor was a first favourite,) from a suspicion that "a small account,"—a name usually given to a very large one, had been the cause of the spontaneous change of colour.

"I shall come home immediately after dinner to meet this gentleman," observed the young guardsman; "but if by chance he should arrive here first, you would infinitely oblige me, Mr. Smith, by detaining him till I come."

Thus adjured, Mr. Smith lost no time in converting the shabby-genteel man into a rich uncle of eccentric habits; and, accordingly, when the stranger really made his appearance, he was received with all the state and ceremony due to the Ambassador of one of the Great Powers!—Ten minutes only had he been seated, however, in the favourite arm-chair of Basil, beside his shaded reading lamp, when the young man, who had hurried home from the house-dinner of the Club, entered the room.

"Verelst!"—cried he, starting at sight of his unexpected guest; "this is indeed a most agreeable surprise!—I was afraid you had dismissed me altogether from your recollection!"

"It is not so easy to dismiss those altogether from our recollection, Mr. Annesley," gravely rejoined the old artist, "towards whom we have heavy obligations."

"If such be your only motive for remembering me," cried Basil, warmly, "God knows I have little desire to occupy a place in your memory. Unless remembered as one, towards whom, in a foreign country, in sickness and neglect, you did the part of a kinsman,—one whom you admitted to sit before your household fire, one to whom you conceded almost the privileges of a son, one who has never ceased to regard you as a father,—I would fain be utterly forgotten."

Basil flung down his hat impetuously on a chair, while uttering this tender expostulation; to which Verelst replied only by turning away, as if seeking for some papers he had placed on the table beside him.—But Basil fancied when the old man again addressed him, that there was a kindly moisture in his eye, as though his own words had not been utterly disregarded. Still, the painter attempted no direct reply to the appeal.

"I am come, Sir," said he, evading the question of such reminiscences, "with a thankful and rejoicing heart, to discharge the obligations you so nobly conferred upon me. It would have been easy to do so by letter, or through the intervention of a third person: but I was unwilling, my dear Mr. Annesley, you should a moment suppose that, because able to return back the exact tale of monies you generously disbursed on my account, I had become unmindful of the favour, never to be forgotten, which your timely aid bestowed with them on me and mine.—Letters are cold and dry in the expressions of such feelings as now swell within my bosom. Nor should I have found it easy so to define my own sentiments as to render you sensible with what fervour I and mine recognise the extent of our obligations, without overlooking the cruel manner in which you have attempted to force your way into the painful secrets of a family, which had withheld nothing else from your participation."

"As I live and breathe, my dear Verelst," cried Basil, eagerly, "I have not the most remote suspicion to what you allude: nor did I ever, in your case, or any other, attempt to possess myself unhandsomely of the secrets of other people!"

The artist gravely shook his head; and taking from the pocket-book beside him three notes of £100 each, placed them in the hand of Basil, who had now seated himself on the opposite side of the table.

"I am glad you bring me these," cried Basil Annesley, laying them carelessly down, "because it is a proof that you are more prosperous than when I had the happiness of enjoying your society. But what is the return of this money compared with that of your friendship! I fondly trusted, on seeing you under my roof, that you were come to tell me my unknown offence was forgiven;—that you had repented your injustice towards me;—that you were again about to open your arms and heart to one who has no desire on earth so urgent as to find them unclosed to him as of old. I swear to you, dear Sir, that never, from the first moment of our acquaintance, have I cherished a thought or feeling that was not kindness itself towards you!"

"In that case," replied the artist, evidently much moved, and gazing upon the agitated young man with eyes which the tenderness of an almost paternal affection filled with tears,—"in that case, why insult my wife by disclosing to her that you have discovered her family connexion with one who—but no matter!"

"On my honour as a gentleman," cried Annesley, "I have made no discoveries,—I have intentionally offered no insult.—As regards the family connexions of Mrs. Verelst, she may be, for anything I know to the contrary, the daughter of a peer or the daughter of a peasant!—I never heard,—I never inquired even her name! It was enough for me that I knew her to be everything that is amiable, gentle, patient in woman,—the kindest of mothers —the most devoted of wives. In what way the book, which appears to have constituted my ground of offence, could have interested her feelings, I am wholly at a loss to surmise.—By a strange fatality, however, the very same volume proved to be of equal importance in the eyes of a person by a singular coincidence of circumstances highly interesting to myself,—a Mr. Osalez,—a man still more widely and more unsatisfactorily known under the name of A. O."

"You have said it!"—exclaimed Verelst, almost shuddering.

"What have I said?" inquired the astonished Basil.

"You have named the man by whose vindictive persecutions the heart of my poor wife was broken!"

"Persecutions!"—exclaimed Annesley. "Surely, surely you must be mistaken!—Chance has brought me somewhat familiarly acquainted with this singular individual; and as far as my observation and experience reach, I have found him the enemy only of his own comfort; generous to others,—to himself alone parsimonious; and even then, wilfully and waywardly,—as if in vengeance or atonement!"

"What should you know of him compared with my poor Rachael?" faltered the artist, much agitated by recurrence to the subject evidently so painful. "How should chance have taught you more of his character and motives than is known to her?"

"Pardon me!"—replied Basil.—"Circumstances which I will hereafter explain to you, make it evident to me that it is Mr. Osalez who, by a liberal expenditure of time, trouble, and money, has been the means of bringing to light those impositions so injurious to your prospects as an artist, which have been recently exposed in the newspapers. It was my intention, had you not visited me to-night, to take an early opportunity of apprizing you of the fact."

"I am aware of it," replied Verelst, coldly.—"The Marquis of ——, by whose munificent patronage I have been enabled to discharge my obligations towards you, informed me that it was to Mr. Osalez he was indebted for his knowledge of my address. But since acquainted with it,—since himself resident in this country, and aware that my unfortunate family had been driven hither for refuge,—what but the most cruel and revengeful obduracy prevented his offering the crumbs from his table to appease the hunger of his nearest kindred?"

Basil Annesley started from his seat to listen!

"Even if disposed to persist in his animosities against myself," resumed Verelst, "what pretext was there for withholding from his poor sister the aid that might have assuaged the pangs of sickness, and relieved the anxieties of a mother trembling for the destiny of her girls!"

Pale as death, and scarcely able to articulate,—Basil could now only falter, "Sister!—Mrs. Verelst sister to the notorious,—the infamous A. O.!"

Verelst appeared surprised in his turn.

"A few minutes ago," remonstrated the artist, "you were advocating his cause!—You even assured me that chance had brought you familiarly acquainted with circumstances inspiring high respect for his character?"

"I repeat it—"

"Yet you apply to his name such reckless epithets as infamous and notorious!" interrupted the artist.

"Say rather to his calling!" retorted Basil Annesley.

"In commercial England, you have surely little right to despise it!"—observed Verelst, in some amazement.

"Commercial England has her fair and legitimate modes for the disposal of Capital,"—observed Basil, somewhat nettled.

"I had always fancied that Exchange speculators, so long as prosperous, occupied an important position in the monied world!" replied Verelst.—"Without them, how are the finances of kingdoms to be carried on? The father and grandfather of my wife were the wealthiest merchants in Cadiz. Osalez, prospered by the advantages of an English education, entertained higher ambitions. —On the death of his father, he gathered together his enormous capital, and renouncing the hazards of commerce, attempted a career which, but for the accident of his singular personal disappointments, might have sufficed for his happiness. Of that period of his life, alas! it becomes me not to speak; but when enabled, later, to resume his position in society, it was surely insufficient to couple his unblemished name with such epithets as 'notorious' or 'infamous,' that it became one of the most accredited and widely known of those which convulse the Stock Exchanges of the various capitals of Europe?"

"Some of the first financiers and most respected men in the country, have been Stockbrokers," cried Basil. "But a Money-lender,—an advertising Money-lender!"

"How mean you?"—cried Verelst, growing pale in his turn.

"The money that now lies so unsatisfactorily before me," observed Basil, "enables me to inform you without further scruples of delicacy, that I should have been exposed to some personal difficulty by the payment of the bills I accepted in your favour, but for having raised the sum in demand by the assistance of a common usurer,—whom I then believed to be a Jew, and knew only by his ill repute in the world,—under the opprobriated name of A. O.!"

"And these inconveniencies—this hazard you incurred so generously for our sake!"—cried the artist, seizing his hand, and losing all interest in the disclosure more immediately concerning his family on discovering the real amount of his obligation to Basil.—"Fool that I was!—How little, how very little did I conjecture the truth!—I fancied that you were obliging me out of the overflowings of an abundant fortune,—and even then, was grateful!—But that you should have hazarded for our sake the shame of the spendthrift,—the cares of the prodigal!—That you should have been forced into contact with the vile and degraded.—Ah! Basil—oh! Mr. Annesley!—this touches me to the quick!"

And reading in the expression of his young friend's countenance a degree of emotion almost equal to his own, Verelst, without further effort to contain his feelings, threw himself upon the shoulder of Annesley and wept like a child.

"And we presumed to find fault with you?"—faltered the artist, raising his head after some moments of absorbing agitation.—"We dared to condemn you!—to call you proud,—to suspect you of an intention to offend and insult us!"

"You cannot surely have been so unjust!" cried Basil, starting from his embrace. "Surely your wife—your daughters—"

"My wife could place no other interpretation upon your conduct in suddenly placing before her a book, formerly the property of, and bearing the names of her father and brother; by the former of whom she had been cast off on account of her improvident marriage,—by the latter of whom she was visited with still bitterer perseverance of vengeance."

"I have only to reiterate my assurances that I had not the most remote suspicion of the nature of the inscription or the meaning of the initials,"—said Annesley; "and that I borrowed the work from my mother's library, with no other object than to afford you entertainment. How it even came there, must be the subject of close and, I fear, vexatious inquiry hereafter.—Very little, alas! did I surmise your kinsmanship with a man so disgraced in the eyes of the world as the individual whose initials (as I then supposed by the effect of chance) were inscribed therein."

"And yet," said Verelst, "you assure me that you were aware of the interposition of Osalez in my professional career?"

"Still, believing you to be utter strangers to each other!—I fancied he was interesting himself in your behalf, as he would have done in that of any other man of genius lying under the scourge of evil fortune. But advantageously as I am prepared to think of Abednego in comparison with those who judge him only as a Jew,—a miser,—an extortioner,—there are revolting mysteries both in his character and circumstances, which I am wholly unable to solve.—The more I ponder on all I know of him, the more I become perplexed by that which I am unable to understand.—At one moment, I believe him to be one of the greatest,—at another, the meanest of human beings. In him all extremes appear united:—opulence and penury,—generosity and baseness,—enlightenment and ignorance,—liberality and prejudice,—tenderness and brutality!—How am I to reconcile all this?"

"But during the intimate intercourse you appear to have held together," demanded the artist, "did Osalez never become aware of your interest in my professional fortunes?—Nor give you to understand the bond of kindred blood uniting him with my wife?"

"Never!—never in the slightest degree!" cried Basil Annesley. "Yet, now I think of it, I remember hearing him refer to your position as an indigent artist; a proof that the misfortunes of his excellent sister must have been fully known to him."

"Till within a few weeks," observed Verelst, "we were utterly ignorant of his social position in this country: and aware of his antipathy, and dreading further persecution at his hands, my wife had not courage to address him with representations of the abject nature of our own.

"It was, thanks to that very picture-dealer whose knavery has been the means of presenting me to the Marquis of ——, (from whom I have already received orders that will keep my easel in full activity for years to come, and at a rate of remuneration exceeding my most enthusiastic anticipations,)—I had grounds for conjecturing that a picture of mine,—a design from the 'Notre Dame' of Victor Hugo,—had fallen into the hands of the wealthy brother of my wife.—Even then, I knew not his abode,—I perceived not his riches and consequence. Nay, I believed him to have fallen considerably from his high estate, till apprized yesterday, by my noble patron, of his prosperity. Little did his lordship imagine when apologising to me at his breakfast-table this morning, for the absence of the enlightened patron of the arts to whom he was indebted for his knowledge of my works, that he was talking to me of a brother!"

"More irreconcileable incongruities!"—exclaimed Basil, greatly depressed by his discovery of a connexion which he knew would be more fatal to the interests of his affection, with his mother, than the fact that his beloved Esther was a teacher, and the daughter of an artist,—inasmuch as a mere remote allusion to Jewish partialities, had been the cause of driving Lady Annesley to frantic exasperation.

"That very picture of the Esmeralda," resumed the artist, "affords further proof of the contrariety and eccentricity of character of poor Osalez;—nay, but for my certainty of his infirmities of mind, I should be wholly unable to account for such inconsistency. While avoiding or injuring his sister and her family, he was induced, it seems, to give hundreds of pounds for a work of inconsiderable merit, simply because the principal figure is a likeness of his once-loved Rachael!"

"Far more so of her daughter," added Basil, in a lower voice.

"You knew not my dear wife in her days of youth and beauty!" faltered the artist. "The patient invalid,—the smiling drudge,—the humble artist's wife; presents but a poor shadow of the worshipped, the lovely, the triumphant Señora Osalez, who could not pass from her father's carriage to the steps of the church or theatre, but the idlers of Cadiz crowded to feast their eyes on her more than oriental beauty,—endowed as she was with the intelligence and accomplishments of Europe, yet glowing with the riper tints of the sunny South."

"I have seen all this, Sir, in your daughters," again hesitated Basil.

"Esther and Salome are lovely girls, as well as the most duteous of daughters," observed Verelst, with deep feeling; "but neither the one nor the other of them deserves comparison with her mother at the period when she forsook the gorgeous mansion of her father, to become the bride of the enthusiastic German artist, who dedicated to her beauty every impulse of a fervid soul, and had, alas! nought beside to offer to her acceptance.—The marquis informs me," added Verelst, after a long pause, during which he seemed labouring to overcome the struggle of his feelings,—"that large as was the price given by Osalez for my Esmeralda, he has offered him double the money to part with it, but in vain.—I cannot help fancying that, in spite of his apparent indifference to his sister's welfare, Abednego was unwilling her portrait should pass into the hands of a stranger."

"That can hardly have been the case," observed Basil, fancying he was about to flatter the self-love of the artist. "On the contrary, it must have been the intrinsic value he discerned in the execution of the picture, that rendered him so tenacious; since it was from his own hands, and as a free gift, that I obtained this copy."

While thus explaining himself, Basil drew forth from his bosom where, by day and night, it was fondly treasured, his enamel copy of the Esmeralda!

"What means this?"—cried the astonished Verelst, regarding at first sight the miniature in no other light than as a portrait of his wife. Say,—say!—what means this?—The likeness of my poor Rachael in your possession?"

The explanations rendered necessary by the emotion of Verelst, aroused Basil Annesley to a sense of his own imprudence.—It was impossible to give a colouring to his singular value for that lovely face, otherwise than startling to the painter.

"And you have been wearing it thus, then,—wearing it next your heart—wearing it as we treasure only the gift of affection, the pledge of fidelity!" cried Verelst; "and all the while we were accusing you of an intent to mortify us,—of coldness,—of—"

"Spare, spare me these vexatious truths!" cried Basil, eagerly.

"To you," resumed Verelst, after having hurriedly examined the beautiful execution of the miniature, (and noticed how singularly it recalled the features of those who were dearest to him, even while realizing one of the brightest creations of the magic of romance,) "to you it doubtless serves to retrace, in combination, both young and old of the grateful family of the artist on whom you have conferred such generous obligations."

Basil Annesley struggled for a moment with his feelings. However afraid of alarming the pride and susceptibility of Verelst, he would not submit to such a misconstruction of his sentiments. He satisfied himself however, by adding in a subdued voice—"It serves at least to recall to me the face which unites in my estimation all that is fairest, holiest, and dearest in human nature."

The simple artist listened with delight, but wholly without enlightenment.—It seemed to him the most natural thing in the world, that his old pupil, his generous friend, should love Esther and Salome, and pronounce them dear and holy,—they, whom he had known as children and appreciated in their womanly discharge of filial duty.—But that he should love either of them singly and separately, or one of them more than the other, never occurred to poor Verelst!

"You have received a commission then, from the marquis?" inquired Annesley, by way of giving a new turn to the conversation.

"A commission that delights me!" cried the painter with enthusiasm;" for it will enable me to realize my highest ambitions!—I am to paint in fresco the new gallery of his castle in the North;—a series of designs from English history!—For this, by the way, I must read as well as paint."

"But by such an engagement, you will be compelled to remove your whole family from town!" cried Basil, in a tone of consternation, on beholding his newly-erected castles-in-the-air precipitated in a moment to the ground. "Under such circumstances you will stand in need of funds previous to receiving the remuneration due to you; and I earnestly entreat you, as a friend on whom you have conferred obligations, and who has consequently a claim to priority of service in return, to appropriate the notes you have forced upon me to your own use.—At some future time, when you become rich, (as you now cannot fail to do,) you shall pay the money back to me. I promise you that it will be an act of charity so to secure it; for nearly a year will elapse before it becomes due to A. O., from whom I borrowed it on interest; and in the interim, if lying idle in my hands, it might lead me into a thousand scrapes.—It might teach me to become a prodigal,—a gambler,—a coxcomb,—heaven knows what!—Money, you know, my dear Verelst, is the corrupter of all human hearts!"

"An axiom of the truth of which my own experience, heaven knows, has availed little to persuade me!"—said the poor artist, with a bitter smile.—"Your arguments, my dear Mr. Annesley, are kind as they are specious. But my noble patron has rendered your assistance needless. Aware of the difficulties to be encountered by a poor painter of historical pictures, in such matter-of-fact days as the present, he has generously presented me with a couple of hundred pounds in advance. I am rich, my dear young friend,—rich,—rich,—I was about to say rich as a Jew—but that the word is in utter distaste in my family! Trust me, I am fully enabled to remove them all to the North in ease and comfort."

"But surely," cried Basil, horror-struck at such a prospect, "surely so long a journey, with such uncertain prospects at the close, will be disadvantageous to poor Mrs. Verelst, whose infirm state appears to demand the utmost care and consideration?"

"Rachael would suffer twenty times as much, my dear Sir, by separation from her husband.—As to accommodations, the Marquis has assigned to our use a suite of apartments in the castle."

Here was a new source of anxiety for Basil!—Esther,—his own Esther, exposed to the injurious admiration which her beauty must necessarily call forth in such a house!

"Surely," said he, attempting a new line of argument, "such an interruption to the engagements of the Miss Verelsts—"

"Engagements?"—interrupted the proud father, with enthusiasm. "You surely do not suppose that, now I am able to earn bread for them, I will allow them to waste their precious talents in teaching idiotic children or languid Misses?—No, no, no!—No more engagements for my girls!—It is one of my chief sources of joy and triumph on this occasion, that henceforward those dear children may live for the enjoyment of life,—for the embellishment of life,—for the delight of others, as ever, ever, of their fond and happy parents!—No, no!—No more engagements for Salome and Esther Verelst."

Basil was inexpressibly touched by the utter forgetfulness of self manifest in all the calculations of the good old man.

"Yet surely," said he, unwilling to abandon all hope of their future society,—"surely such utter seclusion as will await the young ladies at the castle—"

"They will not both bear us company," replied Verelst, calmly,—little suspecting the pain he was about to inflict.—"Salome is to go down with her mother; but, at present, Esther will remain on a visit to Madame Branzini. All was settled this morning. The Duke di San Catalda would not hear of her quitting London just now; and after some contestation, I acceded to their united request."

Basil Annesley had not strength or courage to give utterance to the question that rose to his lips—"They are engaged, then,—positively engaged?"

He could only stagger to a seat, and press his hand to his heart with the consciousness that its warm impulses of hope and affection were crushed for ever.

Shocked by his sudden change of countenance, Verelst was starting forward with inquiries into the nature of his seizure, when at that moment the door opened;—and, unannounced and unaccompanied, there appeared on the threshold the striking figure of—A. O.!

CHAPTER XIV.

It was now the turn of Verelst to change countenance; and a succession of strong emotions were rapidly portrayed on the open physiognomy of the painter, incapable of artifice or disguise. Surprise, vexation, satisfaction, perplexity,—obtained, by turns the mastery. There were tears in his large grey eyes;—there was determination in the lines surrounding the firmer and more expressive mouth.

His brother-in-law, on the other hand, betrayed not the slightest touch of feeling. Master of himself, hardened to habits of dissimulation, whatever emotions might be swelling in his heart, the countenance of Abednego was undisturbed. Though apprized that Basil was engaged with Verelst, he had still sought the interview. Nay, it soon became apparent that his visit was produced by the expectation of finding his brother-in-law with his young friend.

On recovering from the shock occasioned by his sudden entrance, Verelst, while Osalez gave his hand to young Annesley, (who, depressed and desperate, was scarcely sensible to his mode of salutation,) had snatched his hat and was preparing to quit the room.—But the unwelcome guest interposed ere he could reach the door.

"Hear me before you go!" said Osalez, in a firm voice. "I came hither for the express purpose of meeting you. The presence of a mutual friend was a fitter spot for our interview, than that of a cold stranger like the Marquis. It was not disinclination that kept me away from his house this morning."

It was now the turn of Verelst to exhibit composure!

"Had I been aware of your intentions," said he, coldly, "I would certainly have deferred my visit to Mr. Annesley till a future moment."

"You could not!" was the cool reply of Osalez. "It would have been impossible for you to sleep this night, with a sum of money in your possession which you knew to be the property of yonder boy.—I know ye both!—The same hot-headed enthusiasm that prompted him to pledge his name, his peace of mind, his narrow income, to a Money-lender, to obtain the means of obliging you, would render it impossible to you to close your eyes, while unnecessarily remaining his debtor."

"I have, I find, to thank you for the means of repaying him," observed Verelst, somewhat softened—"For that favour, accept my acknowledgments. But it does not, it cannot efface from my recollection your long neglect and unkindness towards the most deserving of women. Farewell!—Against you we cherish no resentment; but there can be neither love nor amity between thine and mine."

"Thine are mine!" replied Abednego, neither abashed nor dismayed by these bitter reproaches. "Resist as we may the dictates of nature, the ocean can no more dissever from its waves an offending drop, than your wife and children expel from their veins the blood that is kindred with my own."

"Neither are we the first of those so conjoined by nature," interrupted Verelst, "who have converted kindred blood to drops of gall!—Again I say, therefore, accept my thanks and my farewell. Between persons so closely united, it must be peace or war. With others there might exist a medium of lukewarm good-will,—with us there must be love or hatred!"

"I want no medium," said Osalez, still preventing his departure, and with such steadiness, that Basil

Annesley, deeply interested in the discussion, was driven to despair by the sturdy perseverance of Verelst. "There must be love between us,—there must be peace!—Never too late for peace. Your friend here will tell you," he continued, glancing towards Basil, "that I have recently wrestled, face to face, with Death. At such a moment the truths to which, in health and amid the contentions and struggles of life, we close our ears and eyes, speak trumpet-tongued to the Soul, and reveal their dread decree in characters as legible as those manifested in warning to Belshazzar. I have sinned against you, Verelst.—I have suffered vindictive feelings, and resentment of a single injury, to efface from my bosom those hallowed ties of affection vouchsafed by the Almighty for the solace and consecration of human life.—I have allowed your officious interposition in my affairs to steel my heart against the sufferings of a once-loved sister and the children she has born to you.—In this, I have greatly offended, and I therefore seek you, in all Christian humility, to acknowledge my fault and entreat the favour of your forgiveness."

Utterly thrown off his guard by this singular self-abasement on the part of the haughty and obdurate Abednego, Verelst was so far softened as to hesitate.—But a moment's consideration brought before him anew the years of suffering and privation endured by his excellent wife and lovely children; and again, he hardened his heart, and put forth no answering token to the extended hand of Osalez.

"You have my full forgiveness," said he.—"Friendship is not a thing to start into life spontaneously, on the slight demand of a converted enemy.—The wrongs of my family forbid me to say more:—the sense of what is due to your tardy repentance to concede less."

Once more the agitated artist made a movement to depart. But Basil Annesley now interposed.

"My dear Verelst!" cried he—"it is you who are now exhibiting a vindictive spirit. How—how can you allow yourself to torture a nature so beneficent, so cordial as your own,—in order to assume feelings of animosity, which, even if they existed, should be disarmed by the frank and fervent manner in which the olive-branch is extended towards you—"

"If you only knew, my dear young friend," cried the painter,—"what a series—"

"I know, and seek to know nothing on the subject of your quarrel!" hastily interrupted Basil. "But this I know,—that half the quarrels and half the resentments of this world, arise from misunderstandings, which a few reasonable words would suffice to clear up."

"In this case all is perfectly understood," replied the artist, coldly;—"nor are we children, to obey the impulses of momentary passion.—Both have brooded upon our wrongs, till mutual hatred has been engendered."

"If engendered,—on one side, it has been bitterly atoned,—on the other, bitterly repented," rejoined Osalez, with tears in his eyes.

"My dear Verelst!" cried Basil Annesley, deeply moved by witnessing such profound emotion on the part of men of advanced years,—"half an hour ago you were pleased to express towards me feelings of gratitude and regard. If I have ever served you, and you wish to mark your sense of obligation, I beseech you do it at once, and efface all trace for ever,—by accepting the hand which I see trembling with eagerness to enclasp your own!" At this appeal, Verelst, for the first time, turned his eyes full upon his brother-in-law: and either the traces of time and care perceptible in his broken frame and withered countenance, or the manifestation of emotions which Abednego was at no pains to conceal, softened the obduracy of the indignant husband; for, on finding the hand of Osalez placed in his, a moment afterwards, by Basil Annesley, he no longer persisted in rejection. At one moment, both gave a loose to the long-resisted promptings of nature; and the "iron tears of Pluto's cheek" were emulated in those that fell profusely from beneath the shaggy eyebrows of A. O.

Basil was about to retire to the adjoining room, leaving the two brothers to a more copious mutual explanation. But Osalez prevented him.—"Nay," said he,—"you are as if of our own flesh.—Tarry and hear all!—I have no secrets,—I wish to have none from you."

Amid all his struggles of feeling, Basil could scarcely refrain from a smile!—To hear A. O. boasting of having no secrets from him!—A. O. whose whole life was a mystery,—whose right hand knew not the doings of the left!—A. O., who concentrated in his own person half-a-dozen separate existences, and unaccordant fortunes!

"I would fain have taken steps towards this reconciliation, many months ago,—from the moment of my first acquaintance with this improvident boy, your friend Annesley," resumed Osalez, when at length confidentially seated beside Verelst on the sofa, (having resumed his own self-possession long before the simple artist had ceased to sob like a child,)—"but that I did not choose to approach as a benefactor the man I wished to conciliate as a brother.—I wished you to be independent in circumstances,—rich through your own talents and endowments,—before I addressed myself to you with overtures of good-will, of which the necessities of your family might seem to compel your acceptance. We have now met upon equal ground; and you have granted me your forgiveness, as a Christian and a kinsman, without forfeiting your self-respect.—All is as it should be!—I have taken every precaution to spare your pride as well as promote my own interest in your affection. And now, tell me—when will you propose a visit from me to my sister?—In her infirm condition, we must beware of producing agitation,—more especially on the eve of a long journey,—if, indeed, after our mutual explanations, you persist in fulfilling your engagements to the Marquis."

"I will speak to Rachael this very night," replied Verelst,—"but calmly and cautiously.—It will require time to prepare her for so trying an interview. Years of hardship,—the loss of several children, which she attributes to the same cause,—and positive ailments arising from those united causes, have so altered my poor wife, that the greatest precaution is indispensable. She is so changed that you will not know her."

"I have been many times in her presence within these last few months," said Osalez, with a smile.

"You are mistaken,—quite mistaken!" eagerly rejoined the artist.—"She never quits the house. Ask Mr. Annesley!—She never leaves even her own room!"

"It was there our interview took place," calmly rejoined Abednego.

"Mistaken,—mistaken!"—persisted Verelst with a smile,—gently shaking his head. "I promise you that you would not know poor Rachael were you to meet!"

"She is far less changed, however, than myself," replied Osalez; "since, when we did meet, I recognised her perfectly; while she, addressed me as a stranger!—Do you remember the person who fetched from your rooms the two battle-pieces sold by the scoundrel Stubbs to the Duke of Rochester?"

Verelst paused a moment, for consideration.

"Perfectly," said he, at length. "But that was an old Jew?"

"It was myself!"

The artist replied by an incredulous smile.

"Do you recollect, that when you received the three five-pound notes for which you had sold the pictures, or rather, in consideration of which you had been robbed of them by the knavish dealer—you had him inform Mr. Stubbs that the original design of the Battle of the Standard was still in your hands, having withdrawn it from your series of military sketches, as the ground-work of the picture in question, and produced at the suggestion of a dear friend?"

"Which dear friend, was, I trust myself?"—gaily interrupted Basil.

"But you were not,—you cannot have been that filthy old Jew?"—cried the artist, in utter amazement.

"You have seen me more than once in disguises equally unseemly," replied Osalez, undisturbed.—'For years past, I have placed a great gulph betwixt myself and what is called the world; and when once we hazard so bold a step as to fling off the bond of fellowship with our brethren, we require the creation of prodigious interests, and excitements indeed strong, to fill up the vacuum.—I have long been at war with mankind,—as long as they were previously my enemies.—Out of my sixty years, for thirty did I support their injustice; and during the last thirty I have revenged myself!—But he who fights single-handed against society, must multiply the guises under which he wields his weapons; and shrink from no means or measures by which he can strengthen his cause.—For such explanations, however, we shall find a time hereafter. Enough that you promise me to prepare my poor dear sister to receive me.—Basil Annesley will apprize me of your success;—or better still, conduct you to my abode.—The way to yours I learnt from him;—few people, I suspect, are better acquainted with it."

The young soldier coloured deeply at this hazardous allusion.

"I was not aware," said he, "of having mentioned to you the address of Mr. Verelst."

"It was from your pictures, which I found in the hands of Stubbs and others," replied Abednego, addressing Verelst, rather than replying to his host, "that I became aware of your being a resident in this country.—But you may imagine with what care and cunning these knaves guarded the scent, so long as you remained a dupe in their avaricious hands."

"And it was my good friend Mr. Annesley, then, who did me this further service," exclaimed the painter, warmly.

"Indirectly.—I was anxious to know the object of a certain levy of money which he effected through my means; and since, whether as Osalez the Crœsus, or as A. O. the Money-lender, (who created Osalez the Crœsus,) I have the means of investigating and comparing all the secrets of the two money markets, (the great and the small,) I had no difficulty in discovering that the acceptances he had to meet were in favour of one Gerard Verelst, a painter living near South Audley Street.—The rest was readily ascertained,—the miniature I presented to him affords sufficient proof how soon and how thoroughly I made myself master of the secrets of the family!"

Basil Annesley gasped for breath. There was no guessing where the indiscreet revelations of Abednego might stop.

"And now," said he, regardless of the embarrassment he had created,—"I must wish you good-night.—Though I have found time to say much that may have appeared to one or both of you superfluous, I am in the greatest haste and some anxiety.—I have business to transact before midnight, that dearly concerns the happiness of a family whose ruin,—whatever I may do to avert the fatal crash,—will ere long produce nearly as much sensation in the bedlam called the beau monde, as that of the Duke of Rochester.—I should leave these Maitlands, in fact, to the consequences of their folly, but that one of the girls has managed to soften my old heart by the eager interest she takes in the fortunes of a certain brother officer of her brother, named Basil Annesley."

"Is all up then, with Lord Maitland?" demanded Basil in a tone of regret, without noticing his allusion.

"His bills have been hawking about the town this year past," replied A. O., with one of his former sarcastic smiles.—"Her ladyship is at Almacks, while her signature is in the hands of the Jews!"

After a few more bitter allusions to the improvidence of the family, he was gone;—nor did Basil much regret that Verelst, in his eagerness to communicate to his family the singular reconciliation which had taken place, instantly followed. When the artist had taken his departure, his young friend picked up from the floor the three hundred-pound notes which, amid the varied interests of the foregoing conversation, had fallen unnoticed to the ground.

"Would any one imagine," said he, with a mournful smile, as he placed them in his desk,—

"how short a time has elapsed since the possession of these notes appeared to be a matter of life and death!—And would not any one believe that, instead of the beggarly fellow I am, I had the wealth of the Indies, or of Abednego Osalez, at my command!—But, alas! what further care have I for money?—Verelst is now prosperous,—Esther lost to me for ever. As to my poor mother, though straitened in means, her pride is so much greater than her poverty, that I am convinced she prefers dispensing with the luxuries of life to being indebted for them to any mortal living,—even to her son!"

By degrees, as he began to recover the cruel shock arising from the discovery that the object of his affections was nearly akin to the infamous A. O. and affianced to another, Basil was forced to admit to himself, that the former circumstance was of a nature to reconcile him to the latter! Never would his haughty mother have consented to his pledging his faith to the niece of a Money-lender!—Abednego, if not a Jew, could not be many generations removed from Hebraism; and Basil was only too painfully aware of her rooted antipathy to anything even remotely connected with the Jewish nation.

As this aversion now recurred with redoubled energy to his mind, he also recalled with surprise the half-forgotten fact of her being in possession of a book of a peculiar nature, which Verelst stated to have been the property of his wife's father and brother. By what possible concatenation of events was this to be accounted for?—Once more, he was compelled to ask himself, through what fortuitous chain of incidents the daughter of Lord L——, and widow of Sir Bernard Annesley, could have been brought into connexion with the family of A. O.?

Summer was at hand; and he resolved to make the inviting nature of the weather a pretext for a short visit to Barlingham.—The discussions which had already arisen between him and Lady Annesley would afford ground for such interrogations as could not fail to throw light upon the mystery.—It was time that all relating to Abednego Osalez should be cleared up!—He would no longer be silenced like a child. He was resolved to confront the utmost indignation and harshness on the part of the rigid recluse, rather than remain a martyr to the mysteries by which he now felt himself to be encompassed.—The more he had achieved towards fathoming their darkness,—the more he seemed involved in new perplexities!

It was, however, an inexpressible comfort to Basil, that his confidence in his old friend was in process of restoration.—To find him openly avowing his disguises, and glorying in his eccentricity, was far more satisfactory than to fancy him the confederate of knaves and impostors; and even the certainty of his obdurate estrangement from a sister so worthy as Mrs. Verelst, was nothing in comparison with the pain of supposing him in league with Stubbs the picture-dealer, in a double imposition upon the Duke of Rochester and the unfortunate Verelst.

The first person who accosted Basil Annesley on the following day, as he was about to enter his Club, was John Maitland; who, instead of the nod that usually passed between them, surprised him by a sudden and fervent grasp of the hand.

"Come a little way down St. James's Street with me, Nan," said he, hooking his arm into that of Basil, and proceeding with him, leisurely, towards Brookes's.—"You are a good fellow," he resumed, as soon as they were out of hearing of Wilberton, and one or two others who were clustered round the door.—"Believe me, I feel the full force of our obligations!"

"What obligations?" demanded the astonished Basil.

"Oh! you need not affect ignorance.—No occasion to be afraid now of my pleasantries on the subject of A. O.—I am as fully aware as you can desire that such a friend in need is a friend indeed.'—Yesterday afternoon, my dear fellow, my prognostications were fulfilled.—There was an execution in our house.—A pleasant thing, eh? for her ladyship and the girls, to see bailiffs sitting in the hall!"—he continued, with a swelling bosom.—"However, it is partly their own fault, if that be any comfort!—All the blame was not on my father's side,—though they choose to place it there!"

"I am heartily sorry,—sincerely sorry," Basil was beginning.

"Come, come!—don't talk so like the Dowager-colonel!" cried John Maitland—"Carr was heartily sorry,—sincerely sorry!—but, hang it—you were better than sorry!"

"What was I, then?" inquired Basil, shrugging his shoulders at the levity of his friend,—"for, upon my soul, I have not the least idea!"

"Of course not,—because you, forsooth, have not the slightest acquaintance with A. O.!—It was not you who interceded in behalf of my family!—It was not your liking for Lucy, (who by the way is half out of her wits with thankfulness,) which induced you to determine the man whom you will not own as friend or acquaintance, but over whom you have all the influence of a master over a slave, or a Czar of Muscovy over a Colonel of Hussars, to come forward once more to my father's relief,—discharge the writ,—and (on condition of his letting the house in Arlington Street, and retiring to Maitland Park,) reëstablish the family affairs?—Oh! no!—It was not by any means you who did us this excellent service!"

"As I live and breathe,—no!" cried Basil Annesley, with such earnestness as to cause his companion to stop short for a moment.—"Had I the power, indeed, I would have done as much, or twice as much for a friend.—But I have not a guinea in the world!"

"My dear Nan, it is too late to recommence with this flummery!" cried Maitland, almost angry at his seeming mistrust.—"This man, (I beg his pardon, this gentleman,—for a gentleman, God knows, he has shown himself to us,) owned to me, in so many words, that he was acting at your instigation; or, more correctly speaking, with a view of affording you pleasure."

"He has afforded me sincere pleasure by his liberality," rejoined Basil. "But he must have divined my wishes by preternatural means, for I wear I never expressed them; nor, on my word f honour as a gentleman, have I any claims upon im that could justify my attempting to influence is conduct in the smallest particular."

John Maitland replied by another incredulous mile.—But they had now returned to the Club oor.

"Not a word of all this before the others!"—as the parting injunction of John Maitland;—a arning altogether superfluous,—for nothing would ave induced Basil to advert, in presence of his rother officers, to any subject even remotely in-olving mention of a name so repellent as A. O.

Before night, Basil had managed to obtain a eek's leave of absence, with the view of accom-lishing his visit to Barlingham; and despatched letter to his mother entreating her sanction to is journey. The delay occasioned by waiting for er reply would, however, necessarily detain him wo days in town; a circumstance he would gladly ave avoided,—dreading that the renewal of his intimacy with the artist's family, and their recon-cilement with Abednego, might throw him once more into their society, and compel him to become a witness of the mutual affection and happiness of the Duke di San Catalda and Esther Verelst!

On the morrow, however, he was to be on guard, which, for four-and-twenty hours at least, would secure him from contact with any member of the family.

The weather was now as fine as London weather ever pretends to be;—for even the height of sum-mer is scarcely so enjoyable in the metropolis as those delicious days of opening May, before the young leaves have found out into what a world of soot and smoke they have budded: but bear their ver-dure in purity and freshness, like the bright and unsullied countenance of a sinless child.—The skies were blue,—the leaves green,—the sparrows chirping gaily in park and square, as if making the most of their time, ere London was covered once more with dust and ashes,—her leaves seared and shrivelled,—her atmosphere obscured.—At such a season, it is difficult for the buoyant heart of two-and-twenty to sink under the pressure of care!

At the instigation of its own pulses, it hopes when hope there is none,—it loves, when prospect of happiness there is none! The spring-tide of life dances wildly and irresistibly within its bosom.—No! despair is indeed difficult for the young.

Basil usually disliked being on guard; from the mere restraint of being tied to time and place;—getting up earlier than usual, and being restricted for the day to such pastimes as a lounge in the British Gallery. Unaffected and unpretending, he had no taste for parading himself and his uni-form in St. James's Street, an appetite that rarely extends beyond the first fortnight of escape from cubhood to ensignhood; during which, a young guardsman is privileged to astonish the waiting-women at Grange's and melt half the Mirific Balsam in Willis's shop, with the splendour of his scarlet and gold.

But on the day in question, howbeit the evening before he had congratulated himself on the certain-ty thus afforded of escape from the visits of Osalez or Verelst, no sooner was he established at St. James's, than he became insupportably irritated by his enthralment. He discovered that it was essential to go and pay a visit of ceremony to the Branzinis, before Esther was installed in their household. He found out that, in the family dis-tresses of the Maitlands, he should be inexcusable if he failed in the respect of leaving a card at their door.—In point of fact he wanted only to be free. —In the restlessness of his discontent he fumed and fretted to be master of his own actions. Had he not been on guard, Basil would probably have ridden off into the country;—devised business at Richmond, or sulked to his solitary white-bait at the Crown and Sceptre;—and when there—have suddenly become equally fidgety to return to Lon-don. He was, in fact, burning with desire to know all that was passing under the roof of the artist. For the first time, the brother officers on guard with him found him absent and unsociable.—Col-onel Loftus, (John Maitland being absent,) had ven-tured to banter him upon his flirtation with Lucy; and the pain which her manifest partiality was supposed to cause to their friend Blencowe.—But the fractiousness of Basil's replies soon convinced them that he was in no mood to be trifled with. They saw that he was thoroughly out of temper; nor was it till they had watched him fling away two or three successive cigars as they all stood smoking together on the steps after dinner, that they attributed his captious fastidiousness to the right cause;—the irritation of a man crossed in love, and whom everything and everybody else consequently crosses,—for if the course of true love never runs smooth, it assuredly seldom fails to render us equally stumbling-blocks in the paths of other people.

The first thing intimated to Basil on reaching his lodgings after coming off guard the following morning, was, that Mr. Osalez had called upon him once or twice in the course of the preceding day, manifesting great anxiety to see him.

"And why did you not tell him I was on guard?"—demanded young Annesley; to whom it appeared as easy a matter to pay a visit at St. James's, as at his private residence.

"I did, Sir; but the gentleman seemed put out, and muttered something about 'puppies' and 'coxcombs,' which made me think it unlikely he would drive further," replied the prim Mr. Smith.

"He was in his carriage, then?" inquired Basil.

"He was, Sir."

"And alone?"

"No, Sir.—There was another old gentleman with him, whom I could not rightly see. But both of them seemed much disappointed at not finding you."

After receiving this intelligence, Basil, while dressing and breakfasting, resolved to proceed immediately to the house of Osalez.—Something regarding the interests of Verelst might be in agi-tation, in which his assistance was needful.—But to which among the many residences of his Protean friend was he now to address himself?

"As he called in his carriage," mused the young guardsman, "he came, I conclude, in the character of Osalez the financier ; and I will therefore hasten to Bernard Street."

Having mounted his hack, he proceeded thither in haste ; but at the door received, from the now obsequious butler, who delighted to honour all whom his master delighted to receive at his dinner-table, the information that might have been anticipated—"Mr. Osalez had been off to the city these two hours."

"And where am I to find him in the city?" demanded young Annesley; a query that appeared to excite as much amazement in the rotund pantler, as though he had demanded in what quarter of the town he was to look for Westminster Abbey!

"You will find Mr. Osalez, Sir, on the Stock Exchange," said he, conceiving that the handsome young gentleman, differing so widely from the usual visitants of that house, must be infirm of intellect.—"If off 'Change, you will find him at his house of business."

"And where is that?"—incautiously inquired Basil.

The man seemed to draw largely upon the decorum of his calling, in order to refrain from a laugh.

"In the Old Jewry, Sir.—But you need only mention the name of Mr. Osalez in the city, Sir, for any one to show you the way. The first cabman or orange-boy you meet will inform you."

To the city Basil now hurried; and his park hack was probably as much amazed as his master, to find himself wedged between wagons full of puncheons of sugar or bales of dry goods, the gigantic size of which accounted equally for the power of the splendid draught horses and extent of the teams in use, which appeared to belong to a world of more colossal dimensions.—The stunning rumble of Cheapside, the perpetual motion involving so much of the utile and so little of the dulce of life, served to excite his wonder how the less practical part of business, the portion requiring the aid of figures and calculations, could ever be carried on in the midst of such a hubbub!

On turning, however, into the narrow lane suggested to him, at his first inquiry, as containing the house of business of Osalez & Co., he perceived that even the city has its "quiet situations," its "no thoroughfares,"—like the aristocratic Park Places, and St. James's Places, adjoining the parks of the West End. The narrow, dirty, dingy lane was apparently occupied by the warehouses of wholesale trade.—For just as every house of mark in St. James's had formerly its iron extinguisher beside the door, to put out the flambeaux of the footmen, every doorway had, in token of distinction, its ponderous iron crane, and the lower windows of the houses were closely boarded. On every door-post was inscribed one or more names, as unaristocratic as "Jacob Grimms & nephew," "Fiskin, brothers," "Dando & Company," without further indication of their calling, names constituting the unostentatious thews and sinews of commercial life ;—and though little or no traffic was going on, at that hour, in the street, it is probable that a larger amount of capital passed through every one of those shabby doorways in the course of a week, than into any mansion in St. James's Square in the period of a year!

Half-way down the lane, however, was an opening into a small court, which, by calculation, appeared to contain the number indicated to Basil; and having accordingly dismounted and given his horse in charge to a steady-looking old man, who put himself forward for the charge, Basil proceeded through the gorge of a narrow court into a larger one, surrounded by high buildings ; one side of which seemed occupied by a handsome old-fashioned dwelling-house, and the other by a range of buildings, the basement story of which was appropriated to counting-houses. Of this portion of the mansion, the huge swing-doors seemed in continual vibration to admit or emit a perpetual string of human beings ;—the sort of careworn, sallow-cheeked people, who walk with their coats closely buttoned over their pockets, and their blank visages indicating a mind wandering at many miles' distance ;—whom one recognises at first sight as the children of the tribe of Mammon.

Unnoticed,—for such people proceed straight to their place of rendezvous, without a vacant thought to bestow on auguries of the flight of crows or sight of strange faces,—Basil pushed his way through the swing-doors among the rest ; and, after passing a second swing-door, found himself in a vast, skylighted chamber, containing, by way of furniture, a large time-piece against the wall, three long ranges of wooden counters, forty wooden stools, and forty wooden clerks sitting calculating thereupon ; each with his parchment-bound ledger before him,—each with the multiplication-table engraved on his soul in characters effacing even those of the tables of the law!

In the centre of the hall, was a single mahogany desk and stool, somewhat loftier than the rest, apparently destined to the use of the high-priest of the temple of Mammon. But it was vacant.—Clerks were bustling backwards and forwards, with cheque-books, or pocket-books, or printed papers in their hands ; apparently as mechanical in operations involving the disposal of millions, as the time-piece against the wall in admeasurement of the still more valuable currency assigned to its computation.—A buzz of whispers, never rising into unbusiness-like tumult, seemed to form a portion of the heated and unsavoury atmosphere of the place ;—the money shovelled backwards and forwards across the grated pay-counter being of no more account in the eyes of the individuals occupied in promoting its circulation, than barley-sugar in those of the confectioner's boy to whom prohibition has ceased to be irksome.

As usual, when in chase of his extraordinary friend, Basil Annesley found himself among a race of persons with whom he had neither an emotion nor an impulse in common ; and after being pushed against, and shuffled aside for a minute or two, by individuals having business to transact, and as careless in their outward man as is usually the case with those who have anything to do in the world,—he inquired for Mr. Osalez. The clerk to whom he applied, pointed to the vacant chair, as much as to say, "Can't you use your eyes and perceive that he is absent?"—when Basil, perceiving that his informant was young and beardless, a stripling like himself, moved a few steps towards the swing-doors, and again addressed the inquiry to a grave-looking, middle-aged man, with a bald head, seedy coat, and mourning ring on his little finger;—who was wasting his time in mending his pen, and had the appearance, among his brother clerks, of a heavy coach running against the mails.

On finding himself civilly accosted by a well-dressed stranger, the elderly clerk slipped from beneath the counter, and desiring Basil to follow him, led the way to the extremity of the hall, towards a room divided from it only by a glazed compartment, shaded with green curtains; but containing only another desk with an old silver standish and writing implements, and half-a-dozen horse-hair chairs.

"I beg your pardon, Sir," apologized the dull old clerk,—"I fancied Mr. Osalez must be here!—He must have just stepped out. He will be back at two. He is always here as the clock strikes two. Perhaps you will return?—or at least favour me by writing your name for him?"

Basil declined doing either. He felt that he had committed a blunder in following Osalez. He found himself as little at home in that vast establishment, as at the bottom of a gold mine. The place was as little adapted to the confidences he was expecting as the little noisy chamber containing the clock-works of St. Paul's!—Angry with himself and the clerk for the time he had wasted, he muttered something about calling again; and bustled his way back again through the hall, when his transit was as little noted as that of one of the motes dancing in the slanting sunbeams straggling through the skylight,—as if in search of some living being on which to confer enjoyment, from the paved open space adjoining the old mansion-house, and ruralized by the name of garden, because containing a pump, and an old sycamore, with about as much sap in the trunk as there exists in the copper-tree forming part of the Chatsworth jets d'eau.

Having reached once more the narrow opening of the court into the street, Basil was about to remount his horse, the rein of which was offered him with one hand by the old man, while holding out the other for the expected remuneration; when, as he was groping in his pocket for a sixpence, instead of the shilling he would probably have given had his visit been less infructuous, the man whispered in a tone of mysterious confidence, "Vy for you sheek him here, ma tear?"—and lo, after a start of surprise, young Annesley recognised in the decent-looking individual by whom he was addressed, the fellow who, both in Delahaye Street and at Rochester House, had already marked his respectful recognition of the protégé of A. O.

"And where should I seek Mr. Osalez, unless at his house of business?"—demanded Basil, angrily.

"He hash more houshes of bushinesh than van, two, or dree,"—replied the familiar of Abednego's inquisition.

"Take me to the one where I am most likely to find him, then,—and it shall be worth your while," observed Basil Annesley.

The old man, who had been stooping in scornful examination of the minute coin bestowed on him by Annesley, now peered up into his face with a cunning glance, that not even the disappearance of his rusty beard could disguise from being that of the old Jew; and with only a familiar nod of the head by way of signal of acquiescence and intelligence, he now took the head of Basil's horse and preceded him through a tortuous complexity of dirty lanes, in which the stagnant atmosphere seemed imprisoned as in the cell of a felon!

At the close of a ten-minutes' walk, he paused in a small shabby street, which, from the unequal form of the buildings, seemed to constitute the rear or outlet of one of greater magnitude, and taking a key from his pocket, opened a mean-looking green door, to which neither knocker nor bell-handle was attached; then, stepping back stealthily to Basil, resumed the rein of his horse.

"Do you suppose that I am going to run my head into an earth so uninviting as that?"—cried young Annesley, warmly.—"How do I know into what sort of a den of thieves you may be decoying me?"

"Tievesh if ye shoose!" said the Jew, no whit offended. "But the pashage before you, ma tear, leadsh shtraigh where you would find A. O. Thatsh all!"

Reassured by his previous knowledge of the old fellow's connexion with Abednego, Basil determined to dare the adventure!—Single-handed, he knew himself to be a match for most men; and his strange conductor would scarcely venture to allure into any dangerous resort an officer of the guards, for whom active search would be made in case of disappearance, and who would easily be traced, through the house of business of Osalez, to the suspicious spot. Nevertheless, the entrance to the narrow passage was grim and repelling enough to daunt a bolder adventurer.

Once crossed the threshold, he was rather excited than otherwise, by the mysterious aspect of the spot. But scarcely had he groped a few steps along the dark stone corridor, when the door was clapped to behind him; and he found himself alone in the stone passage, which received light only through small gratings inserted in the doors at either end, as if for the purpose of ventilation.—Since it was as easy to attempt further progress, as to return, Basil pushed his way forwards; and on approaching the door at the end, he perceived that near it, the passage widened, so as to form a recess containing a wooden bench; while through the grating, which was on an exact level with his face, voices in eager disputation reached him from within.—One of them, at least, was familiar to him—one of them was that of A. O.!—The other was a woman's!

On applying his hand to find a latch or opening, he found to his surprise that what he had conceived to be a door, was simply a portion of the passage,—the wooden bench being continued across; and after a moment's reflection, the nature of the apartment within, and of the conversation which he could not forbear overhearing, convinced him that he was simply installed in some hiding-place or observatory,—some Dionysius's ear,—from which the Money-lender was in the habit of exercising his unholy inquisition over his victims previous to a closer encounter! To interrupt such a conversation as was passing in the chamber beyond, with the admission of having been an eavesdropper, would convey mortification to one party, vexation to the other; and Basil felt consequently privileged to abide the result of the interview.

The fragment of discourse that now reached his ears, however it might disgust, afforded him no new insight into the character or conduct of the lady upon whom he was thus forced to play the spy, —being no other than the young Countess of Winterfield. All he had formerly heard to her disadvantage from Abednego, naturally recurred to his mind; and he was consequently less surprised at the tone of harshness and air of contempt openly assumed towards her by the Money-lender.

For it was no longer the well-dressed, well-mannered Osalez who stood before him. There was nothing to recall the distinguished financier,—the enlightened patron of the Arts!—It was the hard, cautious, calculating old usurer of Soho who occupied a plain arm-chair; opposite to the sofa whereon, arrayed in all the elegance of fashion, alternately smiling and weeping,—exercising her coquetry as a beauty, and her pathos as a petitioner,—sat the unhappy woman, who evidently trusted to the effect of her mingled charms and eloquence, to soften the obdurate heart of—A. O.!

THE BROTHERS.

Corsican Hero! Citizen of France!
In manhood fire and light—as in youth flame!
Famed by a name which ages in advance
Shall echo doubly—nor let die that fame;
Buonaparte—Hero!—Lucien is thy name.
Murmur the world o'er his dead brother's glory,
As vain winds whistle o'er day's dying gleam!
Those praises like that breeze are transitory.
Awe-struck, we sorrow for ambition's child,
(The oft-repeated, still forgotten story,)
Beguiled by what has sometimes all beguiled—
War, victory, conquest, empire grim and gory.
Not all—true friend and brother free—not Thee,
Patriot, Citizen, more than Emperor free.

Emperor o'er thy own aspiring soul,
Whose virtuous soul withstood His guilty art,
Whose pilot-voice warned of the perilous shoal,—
Why from thy friendship did Napoleon start?
Love's rose-links once light-wreathed His living-heart.
He grasp'd a sceptre. The chill touch of power
Shot through his nature a torpedo dart—
Harden'd that heart, and petrified each flower.
He wedded Empire. Deadly was her dower—
Jealousies, envyings, whisperings, and divorce.
The phantom soon o'er land and sea 'gan tower
Beckoning o'er corpses and through blood his course.
The giant shade, world shadowing, rose before him,
And carrion War's strong wings in triumph bore him.

Destiny pitying tried the name of "Father."
Love's looks and childhood's prattle Peace persuaded.
In vain. Not long he now loved Love. Hate rather With wild songs lured him. Youth and Joy had faded.
If Pride woke Insult—Insult called in Wrong—
Wrong met with Wrath—and Wrath to Ruin rush'd,—
What marvel? Rapid is the strife—not long—
When the world's demon deities mingle, flush'd
With War's wild drunkenness, and drunk desire
Of more—more blood, more vengeance, more dominion.
If touchwood kindle—will not powder fire?
If hawks will soar—will eagles stoop their pinion?
If rats begirt with foes will fight for life—
Will the wolf, tiger, lion shrink from strife?
Was't strange—that, with the whole world's hunters round him,
Long kept at bay, he fell?—He fell to rise.—
Rose to fight—fought to fall. And then they bound him.
Yet Destiny, still pitying, her child's eyes
With solemn visions—such as make man wise—
In that first fall and second rise had blest;
Rent the sun-dazzling silver veil that drest
Glory's demoniac face in its disguise.
Avignon's hatred and Grenoble's love,
Echoing a brother's warnings, both exprest
His "had been" and his "should have been,"—and wove
Spells round his soul that might have given it rest,
And his realm blessing;—had it been his doom
To reign again—or rest, but in his tomb.

Oh France! thou wert not to be blest. Thy trial
Was not yet ended, as His nearly was.
That power whom thou hadst mock'd by thy denial,
Found not thy heart—if his—ripe for repose.
Yet look on these two brethren. Let the earth
Look on this drama of high heaven with thee.
On Glory's rocks red flares the beacon forth—
Home's hearth-flame shines more softly, yet as free.
Which will ye shun? which seek?—Lucien! once more
Upon thy amaranthine crown I gaze.
There Genius, Freedom, Self-restraint, the lore
Of art, of science, and of learning blaze
O'er eyes the stars of pure and faithful Love.
(If so—no nobler gem the skies above.)

Those eyes have gone searching the starry road
With Herschel, child of Science. Found they not There a new world,—Hope's, Liberty's abode!
When fiery hearts are laid in earth to rot,
Should these Two Brethren meet on such a spot,
In ages yet undream'd of—shall the last
Be first? and the first last? yet not a thought
Of envy-wakening Ambition cast
Its old shade o'er the recreated spirit?
Until precedence merge in love divine,
And each the long-lost brotherhood inherit—
And both hearts, perfect, in one will, combine.
Who will make answer?—Answer it who can.
Hath Knowledge, Faith, or Fancy such a span?

MUSINGS IN THE WEN.—No. V.

LEGENDARY LORE.

London is extremely poor in localised tradition. A good ghost, such as every close and wynd in the Canongate of Edinburgh can furnish, is not to be had for love or money. Some attribute this deficient supply of spectres, in a market which has a swallow capacious enough for them or anything else, to the density of the population, and the rapidity with which events calculated to arrest the attention of the populace succeed each other.

"Ghosts," say this class of reasoners, "are notoriously a shy and proud race. They do not like to mix in a crowd: it would almost seem that the thin air of which they are composed requires more elbow-room than our condensed bodies, and is more susceptible of pain and inconvenience from a squeeze. And they are (strange to say of immortal beings) mortally offended at the slightest show of disrespect. Luther used to drive away the infernal apparition by which he was haunted by 'rumping him,' to borrow a phrase once current at the court of 'the first gentleman in Europe;' and everybody knows that ghosts do not condescend to appear to those who do not pay them the respect of thinking a good deal about them. In the throng of London, a ghost can scarcely find a quiet corner where it can place its thin substance, without incurring the risk of some clown 'putting his foot in it;' and the people are kept so constantly gaping by new shows and wonders, that the shadowy people feel a want of proper attention, and withdraw themselves altogether."

This is rather plausible; but does not account for the want of localised legends of a merely human and mortal interest, which are quite as scanty as the others. The truth appears to be, that there is a scarcity of traditions in London, because there have been so few permanent resting-places for them to nestle in. Legends, like the "temple-haunting martlet," require "buttress and coigne of vantage, to make their pendent nest and procreant cradle." In the busy ever-changing world of London, buttresses and coignes are both knocked down before time is given to build the nests. Had Sir Thomas Gresham's old original Exchange survived, it is possible that the ghost of the knight might have been found taking its nocturnal rounds to see how affairs went on. Possibly the enormous posterior protuberance of the trunk-hose of some Dutch merchant, who killed himself with Schiedam, for grief at having been overreached by a Jew in some bargain about the blood-manured spices of Amboyna, might have been seen or heard to rustle along his countrymen's walk at the witching hour, a gleaming meer-schaum in his mouth, from which issued strong fumes of sulphur. But Sir Thomas had little personal connexion with the late, and will have less with the new Exchange; while both belong to an era at which the hinder-ends even of Dutchmen, having been compressed within moderate limits, have become much too common-place to be fitting wear for the denizens of the spectral world. Then again if ever a deceased worthy had a right to "walk," (we use the technical phrase of ghost-seers,) it was Thomas-à-Becket,—not only on account of the rude manner in which his spirit was dislodged from its earthly tenement, but on account of certain freaks and pranks of his younger days, before he set up for a saint. And London as his native place, and Londoners as entertaining a great affection for him, (the guild or corporation of brewers made him their patron saint,) were more likely than any other place or persons, (except perhaps Canterbury and its well-fed monks, worthily represented in these Protestant days by its no less well-fed prebends residentiary,) to catch a sight of him. But his own and his father's house at the corner of the Old Jewry has been swept away, and the site built upon over and over again, till no ghost could recognise it, and till the very antiquaries of the ward and parish have ceased to associate the place with St. Thomas—"the blissful holy martyr," as Chaucer, the first Cockney poet, (and an inveterate Cockney he was,) calls him. But, above all, we incline to attribute the extreme paucity of traditions—spectral or human—to be met with in London, to the great fire of 1666, which "burned them out," a summary method of ejection still pursued towards another class of refractory undesirable neighbours.

Almost the only man of note, who has kept his ground, is Oliver Cromwell—and that is as a flesh-and-blood, not as a ghostly character. You no more hear of his spectre being visible in the neighbourhood of Tyburn (or, as it is now called, with that strange fatality which seems to identify a certain ducal title "illustrious by courtesy," with everything disagreeable, Cumberland) gate, than you do of that of Charles I. haunting the precincts of Whitehall. And yet, if vulgar butcherly spite, vented upon his remains by poor-spirited enemies, ever gave a man's ghost a right to disturb peaceable, unoffending people, Cromwell's has that right. But though he does not condescend to appear for the purpose of keeping people in mind of him, he has not been forgotten.

You can scarcely remain any length of time in any part of London, or its suburbs, without hearing of some house which local tradition represents as connected, some way or other, with the Lord Protector. In the year 1794, there was still standing, in Clerkenwell, a large house, said to have been inhabited by Oliver Cromwell. It was burned down some years since; but the memory of its site is perpetuated by a Cromwell Place, which has risen upon the ruins. In Hoxton, in the far East, is or was a building, which claimed, in like manner, to have been once a residence of Oliver Cromwell. In Old Brompton, there is a Cromwell House, in which, so long as it was open to sight-seers, the old crone, who enacted the part of Cicerone, was wont to point out recesses and hiding-places in chimneys, and behind wainscots, in which, as she averred, Cromwell was wont to ensconce himself when the soldiers were in pursuit of him. What strange freaks oral tradition does play with its heroes! converting Cromwell, from a hunter of fugitive cavaliers, into a "partridge hunted" through priest's hiding-holes; and George Buchanan, from a grave reformer of universities, into "the king's fool." Whoever has traversed the suburban continuation of Tottenham Court Road, towards Highgate, through Kentish-town, must remember an old square brick mansion, with the appearance of having once been moated round. Lonely and isolated it appears, though not remote from houses, upon its smooth level of stunted grass, with one or two dwarf trees beside it. Every time we have occasion to pass it, some new evidence appears of its yielding to the insidious sapping of the elements—some widening crack in the walls, through which daylight is visible—some falling of a lump of brick-work, leaving the lathing bare to view: and yet, although new structures are rising all around, and the site is an eligible one, nobody seems to think of removing the ruins, and erecting a new dwelling in their stead. Is it that no one can make out a title to the land? Is it that no one cares to take up his abode upon that spot? We know not; but ask any of the natives what that old, decrepit mansion—dead and lonely amid the surrounding life and bustle—has been, and you will be told it was Oliver Cromwell's house.

It is at first somewhat perplexing to find as many localities in London contending for the honour of having been the residence of Oliver Cromwell as there were cities in Greece contending for the honour of having given birth to Homer; seeing that Cromwell was a country gentleman, and had little or no permanent connexion with the metropolis, till near the time when he occupied the regal palaces. The explanation of the anomaly seems to be in the fact, that there were various Cromwells, who occupied distinguished offices at different times, and who are known to have resided in London; but that none of these having made any very deep or lasting impression upon the popular imagination, the little lights of all of them have in turn been absorbed in, and swallowed up by that Cromwell who did leave an indelible impression of his power upon it. So in the East, wherever any little Alexander, (or Iskinder,) has contrived to write his name, we find it, in a generation or two, coming to be taken for that of the Alexander—the Macedonian. This circumstance of the traditionary fame of Cromwell being swelled by so many tributary brooks, is the best proof of the reality and extent of his popularity. It must have been a gigantic reputation that could so engross the attention of men as to make them, in a manner, forget that any other of the name had ever existed. And it is never in an unkindly manner that his memory is kept up. Even in the time of Charles II., it was recalled with a kind of confiding affection—a fact to which the court-hunting, though not very courtly, Mr. Pepys, more than once bears testimony.

Something of the same kind has happened in Scotland with the name of Wallace. The one Wallace, like the one Jupiter of the Greeks, has absorbed the minor glories of all others of the name; and we find Wallace caves and Wallace seats where the real Wallace never has been. Wordsworth remarks in one of his poems, that the "Scottish patriot has left the name of Wallace to be found like a wild-flower all over his dear country." Oliver Cromwell, let those to whose minds the name conveys none but distasteful associations look grim as they may, is, in like manner, the flower of London—"London pride,"—there was a flower which used so to be called in our younger days. In Scotland you are a kind of polytheists: besides the universal name of Wallace, every nook and glen of the country has its local minor deity. But London, were it not for Cromwell, would be utterly devoid of traditionary associations. Your hills are deep-rooted. They will not shift and move from their places at the will of man. They will scarce even alter one feature of their stern countenances at his bidding: whilst our brick-work varies in form and situation almost as rapidly and unsteadily as the smile and frown pass interchangeably across a human face, like sun-bursts chasing the clouds' shadows over a field of ripening grain. It is comparatively easy for man to write his history in the memories of the few deep-thoughted inhabitants of a mountain country, where intruders rarely come; but that must indeed have been a mind of rare and startling qualities, (we speak not of their moral worth,) which could stamp its lineaments for perpetuity upon the inexpressive surface of the rich but commonplace undulations of the site of our metropolis, and on the unimpressible minds of its shifting crowd, where the inhabitants of to-day are elbowed out by the new-comers of to-morrow; and where the glare and din of the busy scene of which he forms a part, blinds and deafens every man to all other sights and sounds. It is a miracle scarcely short of a man's "writing his name in water" in lasting characters.

There is one popular monument of Oliver Cromwell's "whereabout," that has considerable probability. West of Hyde Park Corner, a little past where the roads to Fulham and Kensington separate, on the rising ground up which the latter curves, directly in front of the cavalry barracks, is an old-fashioned building, which is currently understood to have been Oliver Cromwell's posting-house, and the head-quarters of his body-guard. It has in every respect, except that it has been of late most glaringly white-washed, the appearance of the inns of the seventeenth century. The front is long in proportion to its height, and the windows are as broad as they are high; at the west end of the house a gateway admits into a back-yard, round which are (or rather have been, for the continuity is now somewhat interrupted) tiers of open galleries, out of which the bedrooms (now in many instances occupied as separate tenements) open immediately. The house is tenanted by a genuine Scot, who promises in his tap-room windows excellent Scotch whisky in addition to the indigenous beverages of the South, and has extended above the house a board long and broad, ranging the whole extent of the building, containing,—among other delectable devices of two grim green-plaided Highlanders supporting the Fraser arms,—an intimation of the connexion formerly existing between the inn and the Lord Protector of these kingdoms.

The place seems to enjoy a fair share of the custom of the inmates of the neighbouring barracks. It would be curious if one could ascertain what are the prevailing traditions of the army about old Noll—for the army, (we mean the privates thereof,) like all corporate bodies, has a set of traditions especially and exclusively its own, of which the world at large is in a great measure ignorant. There are a many of military romance writers in our days; but the literati of the army are either the officers (and English officers know little of the men except on parade) or young men of some education who have drifted by their follies into the ranks, and never become perfectly amalgamated with them. The genuine old soldier is not a writing but a gossiping being, and he feels too awkward in the presence of his superiors to open out to them. Even the historian of the Peninsular War, whose battles read like passages from some epic poem, has failed in giving us an idea of the British soldier. Smollett and, still more, Fielding have left us one or two happy sketches; and Hogarth's grenadiers are the men themselves. But the opinions and traditions of the army—the current topics of conversation, the conventional creed of the private soldiery,—have yet to be recorded. It would nowise astonish us to find that Oliver Cromwell occupied a distinguished place in their muster-roll of military saints. One at least of the regiments which constitute the British army, dates from about his time; and of the component members of the original companies of the Guards, organized under his successors, Charles and James, not a few were drafted from the broken-up army of the Commonwealth. The revolution gave a tone to the soldiery favourable to the reminiscences of the civil wars, and the "iron-sides" who drubbed the Cavaliers, the legitimate ancestors of the Jacobites. Marlborough was a Whig, and the Tories (being mostly out of place) were the great declaimers against standing armies. It is far from unlikely that, could we creep into the confidence of the habitués of the guard-room, we might find Oliver warmly spoken of. This at least is in favour of the supposition:—Knightsbridge, the locality which has suggested these conjectures, has been long a military station. The Marquis of Granby had his head-quarters at the opposite end of the village from the present cavalry barracks, behind the great gallery where Mr. Dunn is now exhibiting his Chinese museum, and all the aristocracy are flocking to muse on the glories of the Opium War; but none of our more recent warriors have retained their position on the sign-posts around: Marlborough, the Duke of Cumberland, the Marquis of Granby—all have disappeared. A bleached Admiral Keppel at Little Chelsea, is the only rival, and scarcely a rival, to the jolly tavern immortality of the son of the brewer of Huntingdon.

None of our legitimate sovereigns has enjoyed such a popular immortality as this anomalous intruder, whose presence has sorely perplexed the bienséance of our decorous historians, in classifying and designating the successive rulers of England. He is not unfrequently concealed under the general title "the Commonwealth," like a pill in a spoonful of jelly. "Commonwealth," indeed, where one man's will was law, as surely as in the days of Bluff Harry VIII! He was a king in England,—a king with as little power of appreciating and respecting the liberty of the subject, as one born to the trade, but withal a greater master in their line of business than any of them. He and Napoleon are more likely to live in the memories of the people, than those who merely come to occupy a throne by hereditary succession; because it has been their lot to reëstablish the subverted throne, in order to sit in it,—to build up a new monarchy out of the disjecta membra of the old, weltering in gurgite vasto of a revolution. They obtain their hold on the public mind partly as de facto rulers, partly as belonging in some sort to the class of Lycurgus and Mahomet.

We have not quite so great an admiration for the Cromwell and Napoleon class, or so maudlin a love for them, as is felt or affected by some energumens of the press at present. They shine, in part, with a reflected light; what seems their own innate power, is in a great measure the force of circumstances,—they are cold, calculating, and swim with the tide, and thus succeed, not so much because they are better and braver than others, as because they are less accessible to self-forgetting enthusiasm. Take, for example, the latter of the two monarchs named above, whose career being nearer to us, whose feelings, and views, and language being those common to an age in which we have lived, we can more easily understand. When the revolution began, Napoleon hailed it gladly, because it removed the obstacles in the way of his rising in his profession. When he witnessed the capture of the Thuilleries, and saw Louis XVI. addressing his emancipated serfs with the bonnet rouge on his head, he merely exclaimed, "It is all over with that man." He did not sympathize with the possessor of fallen power, over whom all the savages who had been allowed or forced to grow up in the bosom of a seemingly civilized society, learning to imitate (as savages always will do) its vices more easily than its virtues, scampered with their muddy and bloody hoofs. But neither did he sympathize with the emancipated multitude who were by this outwardly revolting act rendered more assured of that freedom which man may abuse, but in which alone he can grow good or great. He sympathized merely with the idea of power, which had been overthrown, because deposited in feeble hands,—he sighed only for its restoration,—and perhaps even then the consciousness of what was within him, whispered the thought that he might be the person destined to weld its broken chain. He felt the instinct of domination strong within him, and he obsequiously, though warily, followed the pointing of his own appetite. There would be no tyrants were there no willing slaves. Already had the gilded and essenced sentimentalists of rank—already had the comfortable citizen—discovered that the road to that liberty which looked so fair, and which they dreamed could be obtained by grasping at, was long and rough, a succession of hard stony ground which cut their tender feet, and sloughs of despond. They were yearning right heartily for the flesh-pots of Egypt. And destitute of a man to encourage them in the right path, they found one ready enough to lead them back to their old land of slavery, and to be himself to them in the place of the silly Pharaoh who lay whelmed beneath the red waves of the Revolution. All the seekers after a quiet, easy life—horrified by the terrors of the revolution—unable to muster sufficient manliness to resolve, since they had drunk of the bitter cup, to make an effort to obtain some enduring recompense for their sufferings—cried, "Come and king it over us." The epicurean selfishness of society rose en masse, and crushed beneath its feather-bed weight not only the ruffians, but the heroes of the revolution. Buonaparte was as much the more than half-passive figure borne along by this wave of reaction, as Mirabeau, Danton, and Robespierre, had in their turn been merely the most conspicuous objects whirled along by the advancing wave of the revolution. Those effects were attributed to him, which were, in fact, marked by the combined force of the mass, at the top of which his good-luck as much as his genius had thrown him. He got credit for doing himself everything that was done in his name.

Something of the same kind can be traced in the career of Cromwell. He was born with the instinct of command, and he acted in blind obedience to it. He was strong—but strong like the elements, an involuntary power moving in obedience to a necessary law. He had not that degree of choice (most limited in all) which higher orders of intellect, by much wrestling, can attain to. He was the instinctive impulse of command contending against the equally blind appetite for having their own way, which animated the herd over which he triumphed. That there must be some kind of government is admitted upon all hands. This being the case, men are required with the taste and talent for commanding, just in the same way that men are required with aspirations after independence to keep the self-will of rulers in check. Minds like Cromwell and Napoleon are not to be lightly esteemed or indiscriminatingly reviled; but neither are they to be deified, as is the fashion with a class of pseudo-liberals—of men so liberal, that good and evil seem to them alike. The worship of a strong will is as degrading and more dangerous than the worship of "the moon as she walketh in brightness," and of the whole host of heaven to boot. They have their uses: their merits are to be allowed—and their despotism opposed.

It is a fatal thing for the greatness and happiness of a nation when such men arise at too early a period of their revolutionary struggles for liberty. The Toby Belches and Sir Andrew Aguecheeks,* who cluster round them, foster their innate egotism to a growth grotesque as it is gigantic. The mighty ruler learns to look upon himself as an end, not as the means to an end. The convulsive struggles, the sufferings of the nation, all are deemed to have been undergone in order that he and his race might be raised upon the shoulders of a crowd. The strife of men against a tyrant—of men against a false and degrading belief—becomes a strife of the slaves of contending dynasties. Men beat, and bruise, and hate each other, for empty words, or emptier puppets on a throne; and the investigation of truth, the flights of imagination, the cultivation of social happiness, are baffled and degraded.

These thoughts are for the present and for practical use: in the past we can regard the strife as we do a pageant on the stage—we can afford to be just to the merits of the idols of the populace. We do not quarrel with its deification of Cromwell, though we do protest against recent attempts to reëstablish the old idolatry of king and "hero-worship." And we feel that the isolation of Cromwell as the one hero of the localized traditions of London, has its bright side as a tribute to real, in preference to mere conventional greatness.

It is possible that we may be told that there are others besides him, whose memory is inseparably associated with certain places or buildings in the metropolis: and to obviate this objection we must point out the distinction between genuine and bookish tradition. Crook-backed Dick has an association with Crosby Hall, but only for the play-goer or reader of plays. It is the Richard III. of Shakspeare, not the real man that is thus remembered; and it is mainly by the reading public. This is a very different immortality from that which a man earns by his own efforts, impressing the recollection of his lineaments and deeds upon all, instead of having it done for him at second-hand by a poet. This book-worm tradition is forced work, not spontaneous: its shadowy objects stand in somewhat the same relation to those of the vulgar creed, that the grim phantom, which forced its presence upon Luther, does to the fiend whom Doctor Faustus conjured up with hard work and much sweat. There is a life, a distinctness, a reality about the voluntary spectre, that the reluctant slave of spells never attains to. Uncouth, tasteless, distorted are the lineaments of the heroes of popular tradition,—they are like fine drawings etched in lead or pewter,—but something of the geniality of the original does cling to them; and this is what we most desiderate in the associations of mere men of letters. Readers of the Tatler and Spectator, of Boswell's Johnson, of the writers of the Elizabethan age, have pleasing conceptions of their heroes, and take pleasure in endeavouring to associate them with the localities they once haunted. But the effort is fruitless; the tie which bound them, has been severed by a mightier than man, and cannot be reknit.

> "Proximus illi tamen occupavit > Pallas honores:"—

if any of the publicities of former days can be said to approximate to the traditionary vitality of Cromwell, it is the hero of one of the works just alluded to, Dr. Samuel Johnson. He has an immortality independent of Boswell, and extending beyond the mere reading public. The drayman is aware that Johnson's Court, was once inhabited by huge, blinking, ill-dressed gentleman, who "kept ne crown o' the causeway" (to use a northern hrase) when he walked the streets, and wrote ooks. His chair is still, or some years ago (as 're grow older those vanity-fairs cease to attract s) was shown at The Cock; and there the bag-ian, who drinks his stout and eats his oysters, nows who and what Dr. Johnson was without eing beholden for his information to the penny--liners, whose house-of-call it is; and not by any neans the more pleasant because of their company. At the Magog brew-house of Barclay and Perkins, he beer-swoln Cicerone points out to you a little oom over the gateway, in which, tradition says, Dr. Johnson composed his Dictionary. The anachron-sm contained in this last legend (for Johnson and he Thrales were not acquainted till long after the ublication of the Dictionary) warrants it genuine; no sophisticated extract of books. And it is right hat Johnson should thus live in the people's me-nory, for he had strong feelings for the rights of men, breaking through and illuminating his pre judices. He worshipped Church and State in the abstract, but he tore to tatters the cant which defended West Indian slavery, or any cruelty to man that was brought directly to his perception; and it is not in his books, but in Boswell, that we have his mind treasured up. A very incarnation was he of the spirit of domination, and tyrannised it in no gentle manner in the circles to which he belonged. But his conversation showed constant coruscations of robust, healthy judgment, which must have made him somebody had not his pension allowed him to indulge his constitutional idleness; and his tyranny was vented in words which, though they give pain, break no bones. He always strikes us as resembling Oliver Cromwell, much after the fashion that the swoln, distorted, and unsubstantial limbs of the giant spectre of the Brocken do those of the traveller who stands wondering at his uncouth mimicry.

Sir Andrew Aguecheek.—Or upon mine either?

THE SONGS OF THE MONTHS.

THE SONG OF SEPTEMBER.—NO. IX.

I.

SUMMER, in radiant paradise,
Was redolent and bright
Of wings and eyes, that matched the skies,
In their celestial light;
And man, with laughing, joyous Eve,
Basked in the perfumed bowers
Of orange trees, that interweave
Their golden fruit with flowers:
But Earth's enjoyments were not full —Though bright, and bland, and beautiful—
And so the whisper ran,
That fair September's hand must give
The heavenly grape to man,
Which tasted, he,
Like Gods, should be Immortal, wise, imperative.—
Hearing the words, I breathed around,
And young Creation well'd
Its essence forth from sky and ground.
Man sought the vine; with eager soul
Compressed its nectar in a bowl
Of melon's rind, quaff'd deep, and grew
Wise, witty, fearless; felt, and knew,
Gods' hearts; and so rebell'd.
Triumphant o'er his clay, my spell,
That ripened grape, had kept him well,—
But in his joy Death dash'd the draught with evil things from hell.

II.

Ages had passed, the canker worm
Of Death still eating on,
Till came the term Life hid its germ
In old Deucalion;
Who, ere the deluged earth was dry,
Ere ocean drank its brine,
Where Ararat climbs to the sky
Had planted Eden's vine:
All that is left of heaven below,
To cherish Love 'midst death and woe.
So felt that ancient man;
And when the purple blush I pressed
On its rich fruit, began,
Like he who sees
High mysteries,
To feel immortal, rapt, and blest.—
Seeing him glad, I swore to teach
His children truths divine,
Beyond the priest's or prophet's reach.
And when I thrilled good Bacchus through
With knowledge Gods themselves scarce knew;
How life's love-spell, wine, drunk on,
Mimics or mocks Oblivion,
What wisdom equalled mine?—
No blight have I, no dearth, no storm;
I breath soft dew, my sun is warm,
Yet only boast my grape and wine,—heaven's light in earthly form.

MADDEN'S HISTORY OF THE UNITED IRISHMEN.*

If the spy system be really revived in Ireland, which one insulated but very decided fact appears to intimate, then "The Lives and Times of the United Irishmen" is a work doubly called for. It forms the history of the horrible epoch known as "the Rebellion of '98"; an insurrectionary movement which is not the least memorable episode in the civilized world's grand revolutionary epic; opening with the revolt of the British American colonies, but where or when to terminate, no political prophet is yet alive that can foretell.

Dr. Madden, throughout a long course of years, has bestowed no ordinary pains in investigating facts, and collecting, from the most authentic original sources, materials for his desultory work; which may best be described as a series of biographical sketches of the Irish rebel leaders, illustrative of the profligate policy of the Irish government. If the work fail in accomplishing the perhaps impossible task of exalting the more distinguished of the actors and sufferers of that disastrous period into pure patriots and self-sacrificing martyrs, it completely succeeds in revealing the unworthy, and often atrocious conduct of the government and its base myrmidons; the total unfitness for their important trust of those to whom England then committed the safety of her most unmanageable conquered province, and the blindness of that dishonest policy with which Irish affairs have at all periods been administered. Nothing save that faint dawning of a more auspicious period, indicated by the active-passive, or resisting-nonresisting peaceful agitation, commenced by the Irish Catholic Association, which involves a grand principle in political science still very imperfectly developed, and from which society may hope for an illimitable power of self-improvement,—nothing save this could give us courage to enter upon the investigation of a period so deeply stigmatized by everything foul, treacherous, and base among the rulers; and hardly redeemed by the imperfect virtues and equivocal motives of the majority of the patriot leaders. In looking closely into the conduct and character of the more distinguished leaders in the Irish rebellion, even as displayed in this eulogistic work, little is to be seen save the fierce discontent of oppressed men wreaking itself indiscriminately upon whatever was nearest at hand; or the mercenary spirit which, in nearly the words of the old Highlander's prayer, wished to see the world turned upside down, that honest men might make their bread out of its troubles. With the few exceptions of the innocent victims most unscrupulously sacrificed by the villanous policy of the Irish government, and who are represented by such individuals as the elder Emmet; and of the honest if rash and shortsighted enthusiasts, who may be typified by Lord Edward Fitzgerald; there is really little among the leading Irish patriots of '98, or 1803, to command the sympathies of impartial inquirers looking calmly back after forty years; though there remains much to excite the bitterest indignation against those who played the Devil's part, in inciting to the commission of those acts or crimes which made the government sure of its victims at all hazards. We are not able, for example, greatly to admire the public character of Theobald Wolfe Tone, nor yet that of the Messrs. Sheares,—and are very doubtful of their claim to be enrolled in the list of genuine patriots; but we are, on the other hand, left in no manner of doubt as to the utter political profligacy of Lord Castlereagh and Lord Clare, and the unredeemed baseness of their subordinates and hired spies: if, indeed, enlightened morality does not regard the tempter as a greater criminal than the meaner and more needy villain; and if the world's hollow code of honour has not blinded society to the true moral principles by which actions are to be judged. Of the more prominent actors of that period, it is, as in all such cases, much more easy to distinguish the degrees of rank and worldly estimation, than of crime and of treacherous meanness. Lord Castlereagh, when the occasion was past, certainly became heartily disgusted and ashamed of his spy and protegé, Mr. Reynolds; but, upon the other hand, that greatly wronged and calumniated patriot became exceedingly exasperated at the selfish noble patron, who ceased to appreciate, or to acknowledge, the purity of his exalted motives, rather sooner than was quite convenient for him. In all nations there is naturally a greater conglomeration of ideas upon questions of political than of social morals; and the Irish are certainly, in this respect, not in advance of other nations; their cardinal principle being blind, implicit fidelity to their party and their leaders. And yet it is remarkable to find the tie sacredly observed by the lower class so frequently and basely violated by those above them in social position, as becomes apparent in the history of the Irish Troubles.† The sense of honour found its last refuge among the very lowest of the oppressed people. There were no traitors among the infuriated peasantry, and little middle-class patriotism that seemed proof against the temptation of personal safety and a sum of money; while to many it seemed matter of indifference whether the great object, wealth and distinction, came to them from English oppressors or foreign invaders, so that it was obtained.

We must be prepared for an immense burst of indignation from the young and generous of all com-ies, but especially from the Irish, when we venture › acknowledge, that the well-known and most pa-ıetic effusion of one of the most immaculate of the rish patriots, appears to us to embody a very equivoıl sentiment. "It was not thus, it was not thus, my arah!" says young Emmet, in his memorable ırewell letter to Curran's daughter, on the eve of is execution. It was not thus, in sorrow and in hame, that the rash and ambitious young barrisır, now become a sort of poetical idol, had looked › close that career which he had chalked out for imself, and of which individual exaltation seemed t this stage quite as much the object, as wise, coniderate, and, above all, disinterested patriotism.

›f this noble quality there is, alas! very little › be found in the whole world's history; and reland has not hitherto been the land most favour-ble to its growth. Yet society must act through mperfect human agents, and not by angel interərence; though this is no reason why it should ot examine and judge of the true character and ses of all its instruments.

We shall at once clear the ground before us, by cknowledging that the great majority of the peole of Ireland, the whole Catholic body, were fully, nd upon every principle of right, justified in their esistance to the policy of England, and almost in rying to shake off her yoke; and are only to be ›lamed for the ill-advised and suicidal manner in rhich their resistance was displayed. The policy f O'Connell, or whomsoever the merit may be-ong to, is immeasureably superior to the tactics of he leaders of the United Irishmen. It is the true ecret of all efficient resistance. It is that which lone is fitted to obtain the desired end, indepenently of the avoidance of the vast amount of vioence, crime, and suffering entailed by armed resisance. The ostensible object of the United Irish-nen was, in every view, just and sacred; the means hey employed were unjustifiable upon any princile whatever. Wisdom, humanity, the laws of nan and the commandments of religion alike ondemned them; and the insane attempt was, hough at great expense of human suffering, hapily, if by foul means, crushed; happily, we believe, or the Irish people, who had at least as much to ear from spurious native patriotism, and from ra-acious foreign auxiliaries, as from that acknowedged oppression which had goaded them into ebellion. To the account of that rebellion which ow lies on our table, a literary friend of the uthor has contributed an able and luminous Hisorical Introduction, in which he gives English eaders a tolerably clear notion of the anomalous elations that have ever subsisted between the coun-ries; and a summary view of the various means aken to subdue and coerce the Irish nation, from he conquest of Strongbow to the crushing of the Societies of United Irishmen; wading through the lifferent stages of forfeitures, penal enactments, ines, tortures, military law, and the blood-wrought ubjugation, finally consummated by the Union.
The Society of United Irishmen, though its objects xpanded with its growth, was the natural offspring f the Irish Volunteers,—of those volunteer political ssociations, which had become so formidable, and which had only ceased to exist actively for a few years; while, in contemplation of the French Revolution, the principles of these reform clubs were fast gathering strength. The same event which excited the Irish to a fresh struggle for freedom, made it imperative upon the English government to carry the long-desired measure of the legislative Union of the kingdoms; and to counteract at this crisis the influence of the reform associations, the Irish government first tried the effect of the Orange societies, now become so formidable to the successors of those who, if they did not actually call them into existence, countenanced and endeavoured to extend them, and who have, at all times, freely employed them as instruments for advancing their own purposes. It was alleged by the leaders of the United Irishmen, that until the government courted the alliance of these associations of fanatics and self-seekers, the patriots never had recourse to France; and that the proximate cause of the Rebellion, was the cruelty, rapacity, and bigotry of the Orangemen; who used the pretext of religion, in the hope of obtaining possession of the property of their oppressed Catholic neighbours; together with the enormities perpetrated under military law, in the few counties in which disturbances had arisen, either from predial agitation and religious animosities, or from actual Orange depredation. We have, in the Introductory Chapter, this account of the origin of these societies, fostered by Lord Castlereagh to become, in process of time, the torment of Sir Robert Peel, if their mischief shall terminate with him.

The idea of Orange societies arose from the association of the aldermen of Skinners' Alley; the latter owed its origin to the restoration of the old corporate body to their former power and privileges, at the departure of James the Second. Their meetings were chiefly for the indulgence of that kind of Cherokee festivity, which is indicative of sanguinary struggles or successful onslaughts, past or expected. Their grand festival was on the first of July, the anniversary of the Battle of the Boyne, on which occasion the charter-toast was drunk by every member on his bare knees. At the time of Sir Jonah Barrington's initiation, "his friend Dr. Duigenan was the Grand Master." The standing dish, at the Skinners'-Alley dinners, was sheep's trotters, in delicate allusion to King James's last use of his lower extremities in Ireland; and the cloth being removed, the charter-toast, the antiquity of which was of so ancient a date as the year 1689, was pronounced by the Grand Master on his bare joints to the kneeling assemblage, in the following words: "The glorious, pious, and immortal memory of the great and good King William, not forgetting Oliver Cromwell, who assisted in redeeming us from popery, slavery, arbitrary power, brass money, and wooden shoes, &c., &c., &c." The concluding part of this loyal toast is a tissue of vulgar indecencies, and impious imprecations on "priests, bishops, deacons," or any other of the fraternity of the clergy who refuse this toast, consigning their members to the operation of red-hot harrows, and their mangled carcases to the lower regions.

This, the Normal School of Orangeism is described by Sir Jonah Barrington as "a very curious, but most loyal society."

The first society of United Irishmen is said to have been formed at Belfast, in the close of 1791, and by the celebrated Theobald Wolfe Tone, then a barrister of short standing. In a few weeks afterwards, Tone and Napper Tandy organized a similar society in Dublin. The ostensible object of both was a better form of parliamentary representation. These societies were naturally viewed with great suspicion by the Irish Executive; and the system of persecution for opinion—of gross injustice perpetrated under the form of law, was at once adopted. With this policy on the part of the government, the tactics of the societies were at once changed. They no longer affected to seek only parliamentary reform. Oaths of secrecy were administered to all the members; an executive body was chosen; each province of Ireland had its local Directory; and the now almost avowed and well understood object of the rapidly extending organization, was the establishment of Ireland as an independent Republic, by means of a revolution, and with the aid of France. The government could not, in such circumstances, stand by supine; and its hired spies were already selected, not only from among the most active and conspicuous, but from among the earliest enrolled members of the societies. They were individuals holding the most important and confidential offices; and the government consequently knew, at the earliest hour, all the danger which did exist, and also all that its tools chose to incite or to invent, where it served their purpose. And,——

The betrayers of their society were not the poor or inferior members of it; some of them were high in the confidence of the directory; others not sworn in, but trusted in its concerns, learned in the law, social in their habits, liberal in their politics, prodigal in their expenses, needy in their circumstances, and therefore covetous of money; loose in their public and private principles, therefore open to temptation.

Another fact, though much more incredible, seems to rest upon good evidence,—

The want of good faith, however, was not alone on the side of the disaffected; in the closets of the most influential friends and agents of government, there existed channels of communication with the leaders of the United Irishmen, by means of which the most important measures of the administration were made known to the directory, and to others in the confidence of its members, which frequently baffled the designs of government, and disconcerted the plans of the law officers of the crown, in the course of the proceedings instituted against the members of this society.

Arthur O'Connor, on his examination before the secret committee of the House of Lords, stated—that "minute information of every act of the Irish government" was obtained by the executive directory.

There seems a strong probability that this was either an entire misconception or an idle boast. The Government were too cunning for the Directory; and the instances of secret kindness shown by men of approved "loyalty" to "traitors" like Lord Edward Fitzgerald, are only among those traits of high-minded generosity which illumine the blackest periods of civil strife. That officers of rank in the army, and persons in the confidence of the Government, furnished the leaders of the United Irishmen with money to carry out their objects, is also extremely doubtful. And, indeed, almost every important event in the history of that period is involved in doubts and endless contradictions, even in the simplest matters of fact, such as the arrest and last hours of Lord Edward Fitzgerald. From a civil organization reaching to provinces, counties, and baronies, the next change was to a military organization, until the total number of those enrolled considered capable of bearing arms, amounted to 300,000—a half million having taken the test. But these numbers are probably much exaggerated. The sworn members were next divided into battalions, and officers were appointed to each of them in regular order—all, however, only on paper; for, throughout the movement, there was at all times "great cry and little wool." All the individuals whose names have come down to us—as Emmet, Arthur O'Connor, and Oliver Bond—held high military rank, and were, at the same time, members of the Executive Directory, or Provisional Government. Lord Edward Fitzgerald, from his rank if not his military capacity, was chosen as the Generalissimo of this paper levy en masse; and the general rising—precipitated by the policy of Castlereagh, who afterwards boasted that he had caused the revolution to explode prematurely—was fixed for a particular day in March 1798. The military incapacity of the leaders in the Irish Rebellion is fully as remarkable as the devoted fidelity and bravery of the peasants in their after skirmishes. A conversation, vouched for in this work as authentic and as deserving full credit, which took place between Lord Edward and a man unnamed, but who seems to have possessed some common sense, goes far to dispel the false halo with which gallantry, intrepidity, an unhappy death, and a genuine if ill-based enthusiasm, has surrounded the name of Lord Edward Fitzgerald. It is important as an historical fact, and valuable for the lesson and warning it holds out to all conspirators, however pure may be the ends they have in view.

On the accuracy of the information given respecting this matter the most implicit confidence may be reposed. The person in question met Lord Fitzgerald by appointment at the Shakspeare Gallery, Exchequer Street, about one month before the arrests in March, to confer with the delegates from the different counties respecting the projected rising. After Lord Edward had received the different reports of the number of men ready for the field in the different counties, he called on the gentleman above referred to for his opinion. Lord Edward said, "he deeply regretted his friend should have withdrawn himself so long from any active interference in the business of the Union, and that one in whose judgment he so much confided, should stand aloof at such a moment: if he unfortunately persisted in so doing, the friends of the Union might be led to imagine he had deserted them in the hour of need; that he, Lord Fitzgerald, had determined on an immediate and general rising of the people, their impatience for which was no longer to be restrained, nor, with advantage to the cause, to be resisted." He then appealed to the delegates for the truth of this assertion, and his opinion was confirmed by them. His friend, it is well to state, had withdrawn himself from the Union, about the beginning of the year, when the system was changed from a civil to a military organization. . . . . On the Sunday previous to the arrests, the gentleman I allude to had declined an introduction to Reynolds, at Jackson's in Church Street, notwithstanding M'Cann's recommendation of him, as "one of the best and honestest men in the Union." He had avoided Reynolds, because he did not like his character. He informed Lord Edward, though he had taken no part for some time in the affairs of the Union, he did not cease to give his opinion when consulted, and especially by Lord Edward—though he was well aware, when once his lordship had made up his mind on a point, he was little influenced by the ounsel of any man: when Lord Edward had spoken of is deserting the cause, the latter felt hurt by the observation, and replied in strong terms that he had not eserted the people, nor betrayed their cause; but those eople had done so, who had precipitated measures prematurely taken, which did not afford the least promise f success. "My Lord," said he, "I am not a person desert a cause in which I have embarked. I knew ne dangers of it when I joined it: were those dangers nly for myself, or the friends about me, I am not the an to be deterred by the consideration of what may appen to myself or them—we might fall, but the cause ight not fail; and, so long as the country was served, would matter little: but when I know the step that ou are taking will involve that cause in the greatest ifficulties, my fears are great: I tremble for the result. Ly Lord, all the services that you or your noble house ave ever rendered to the country, or ever can render to will never make amends to the people for the misery nd wretchedness the failure of your present plans will ause them." "I tell you," replied Lord Edward impetuously, "the chances of success are greatly in favour of ur attempt: examine these returns—here are returns hich show, that one hundred thousand armed men may e counted on to take the field." "My Lord," replied is friend, "it is one thing to have a hundred thousand en on paper, and another in the field. A hundred housand men on paper, will not furnish fifty thousand in rray. I, for one, am enrolled amongst the number; ut I candidly tell you, you will not find me in your anks. You know for what objects we joined this Union, and what means we reckoned on for carrying em into effect. Fifteen thousand Frenchmen were onsidered essential to our undertaking. If they were at that time, still more so are they now, when our arlike aspect has caused the government to pour troops nto the country." "What!" said Lord Edward, would you attempt nothing without these fifteen thouand men—would you not be satisfied with ten thouand?" "I would, my Lord," replied his friend, "if he aid of the fifteen could not be procured."

"But," continued Lord Edward, "if even the ten ould not be got, what would you do then?"

"I would then accept of five, my Lord," was the eply.

"But," said Lord Edward, fixing his eyes with great arnestness on him, "we cannot get five thousand; and ith respect to the larger force we originally wished or, had we succeeded, with so large a body of French roops we might have found it difficult enough to get id of our allies." To this it was replied, "My Lord, if e found it possible to get rid of our enemies, ten mes as numerous as our allies, we could have little ifficulty in getting rid of the latter when necessity required it."

"But I tell you we cannot," said Lord Edward "get ven the five thousand you speak of; and when you now that we cannot, will you desert our cause?" The yes of the delegates were turned on the person thus ddressed. He felt that Lord Edward had put the atter in such a light before those present, that he ould have been branded as a traitor if he abandoned he cause, while there was a ray of hope for its success.

"My Lord," said he, "if five thousand men could not e obtained, I would seek the assistance of a sufficient umber of French officers to head our people, and with hree hundred of these, perhaps we might be justified in aking an effort for independence, but not without hem. What military men have we of our own, to lead ur unfortunate people into action against a disciplined rmy!"

Some farther conversation passed to the same mport, and then—

Lord Edward and his friend parted with the same ordiality and confidence in each other that had always ubsisted between them.

"Lord Edward," says that individual, who knew him erhaps better than any other of his associates, "was he noblest-minded of human beings. He had no deceit, no selfishness, no meanness, no duplicity in his nature; he was all frankness, openness, and generosity; but he was not the man to conduct a revolution to a successful issue."

The measures of the Government to make the insurrection (which they had winked at, if they had not, as is often alleged, fostered its growth) explode prematurely, by the simultaneous arrest of the leaders, we shall not dwell upon, though they are here fully detailed. Its secret machinery of informers, spies, corrupt witnesses, or regularly drilled "battalion of testimony," are more curious, as well as more instructive. The Government seems to have been aware of the most secret proceedings of the United Irishmen from the very first; and we would fain hope it is not possible that, among any people whom persecution and oppression has not debased, instruments could have been found in equal abundance, to do the same obnoxious and despicable, even when necessary, work. In 1795, a regular system of espionage was adopted; and in the following year the most hidden secrets of the societies were in the hands of the Government.

Mr. Cockayne, in 1794, was the first person who informed the government of the communication between France and Ireland. The agent of the French government, the Rev. W. Jackson, broached his mission to Theobald Wolfe Tone and other United Irishmen, at the house of Counsellor Leonard M'Nally, in Dublin. The treasonable communications were carried on with his knowledge and concurrence; the government was apprised of the fact by Cockayne; Jackson was tried and convicted, and Tone had to quit the country: but M'Nally was not molested; and being an United Irishman, and being generally employed as the professional advocate of the persons of that society who had been arrested and arraigned on the charge of treason, his means of acquiring information were very considerable; and it was only discovered at his death, that government had availed themselves of his knowledge, and had conferred a pension of £300 a-year upon him for his private services.

I do not here refer to the ordinary gang of spies and informers domiciled at the Tower, or in the purlieus of the Castle, under Messrs. Sirr, Swann, Hanlon, or O'Brien. These formed "the hacks of the department," of which I shall have to speak hereafter, and "the battalion of testimony," in general. We now only have to do with the "half-mounted" and "squireen" class of them, who appeared in the witness-box in the garb of gentlemen, or whispered yet unsworn informations in the ears of Mr. Cooke, and drew their bills from time to time on demand; and several of whom, after all the enormous sums paid to them during the rebellion, retired from business on their pensions, provided with the means of a respectable subsistence.

Mr. Frederick Dutton, who at an early period was employed in the north as an informer, and had been sent especially to Maidstone to ensure the conviction of O'Connor, was a regular informer of this class—a most reckless one in the case of the unfortunate priest, Quigley, in whose great-coat pocket, by mistake for Arthur O'Connor's, was placed the treasonable paper on which he was convicted. Mr. M'Gucken, the solicitor of the United Irishmen, was another of the private informers, who was intrusted with the defence of the prisoners charged with treason in Belfast, and at the same period was in the pay of government—was largely paid, and ultimately pensioned; and during these frightful times M'Gucken continued to possess the confidence of the United Irishmen.

For upwards of twelve months before the breaking out of the rebellion, several members of the Ulster United Irish Society were likewise in the pay of government. John Edward Newell entered on his duties at the Castle the 13th of April, 1797, and retired from them, rather abruptly, the 6th of February, 1798. Nicholas Maguan, of Saintfield, in the county of Down, a member of the provincial and county committees, and also described in the report of 1798, as a colonel in their military system during the whole of 1797, and down to June, 1798, regularly attended the meetings of the county Down United Irish Societies, and communicated to the Earl of Londonderry's chaplain, the Rev. John Cleland, a magistrate of that county, the treasonable proceedings of those societies after each meeting.

Mr. John Hughes, a bookseller of Belfast, another member of the United Irish Society, was apprehended at Newry, and brought into Belfast the 20th of October, 1797, on a charge of high treason, and the same evening was liberated on bail. Mr. Hughes's character and past services, it cannot be doubted, obtained for him an indulgence so extraordinary in those times. No date is assigned to the disclosures of Mr. Hughes, which were subsequently published in the secret report of 1798; but there is reason to believe that he was known to General Barber as an informer in the latter part of 1796. On the 7th of June, 1798, this man again went through the formal process of an arrest, and was transmitted to Dublin for special service there. Another member of the United Irish Society, named Bird, alias Smith, had from the same period been in the pay of government—had laid informations against Neilson and several of his associates, and in the latter part of 1797, like Newell, abruptly relinquished his employment. Both refused to come forward as witnesses on the trials of Messrs. M'Cracken, Flannaghan, Barret, and Burnside. Mr. Thomas Reynolds, of Kilkea Castle, at length supplied whatever evidence was wanting to enable government to complete its "timely measures."

It is not a little revolting to find that the legal advisers, the attorneys and counsel of the accused parties, were among the regular secret agents of the Government.

The fame of Reynolds, if not his services, soon, like his pay, far exceeded that of all who had gone before him.

Reynolds, of whom, in the course of these details, we hear enough, or more than enough, is thus described:—

> The person whose disclosures of the designs of the Leinster societies of United Irishmen, government ultimately availed themselves of, was Mr. Thomas Reynolds, a silk manufacturer in the Liberty, whose business had been carried on at 9, Park Street, the house in which he was born, on the 12th of March, 1771. On the anniversary of that day, twenty-seven years subsequently, namely, on the 12th of March, 1798, the first striking incident in the drama of his public life took place, at the house of his friend Oliver Bond, in Bridge Street, where the latter and fourteen others of his associates, delegates from various societies of United Irishmen, holding a provincial meeting, were arrested on his information.

Previously to these arrests, Reynolds, who was known to be a man of indifferent private character, had been suspected by the more discreet of the United Irishmen; though, as in many other cases, impudence, and the knavish affectation of excessive zeal, imposed on the greater number. How invaluable to society, and how formidable to bad governments, is the secret of having nothing to conceal! The striking incident referred to above took place at the house of Neilson, and is related by the younger Curran in the Memoirs of his father. It proves, that without a certain kind of daring hardihood, and great presence of mind, there cannot be a perfect villain. Reynolds was an Irishman, and therefore could not fail in personal courage; and he was troubled with none of the misgivings, and scruples of conscience or feeling which, in emergencies, embarrass less hardened rogues. Before the arrests, Reynolds was denounced by a distant relative of his own, who was himself one of the United Irishmen, and who, Brutus-like, proposed to assassinate the traitor; a proposal which was negatived by the meeting at which it was made. His life was afterwards, at different times, in danger, from the exasperated people whom he had betrayed; and it is probable that, had he continued to reside in Ireland, Mr. Reynolds might not have died in his bed. The services of Reynolds were not obtained for nothing, indignant as he at first affected to be at the idea of reward for saving his country. A person named Cope, with whom he had some money dealings, first sounded him, and made lavish, vague promises. Reynolds was quite willing to betray his friends, but he shrunk from being known as an informer; and though he would take no reward, he was willing, nay, eager to obtain ample indemnification for his trouble and alleged losses. That indemnification, first and last, in gratuities, appointments, and pensions, still continued to his family, has already cost the country above £45,000. Nor is this debt of gratitude yet fully discharged. Besides the arrests early in March at the house of Oliver Bond, upon information given by Reynolds, the arrest of Thomas Addis Emmet, Dr. M'Nevin, and other of his late associates, speedily took place, and were followed by that of Lord Edward Fitzgerald, who had been the personal benefactor of his betrayer. The dishonesty of this man, in the closest relations of private life, was proved against him on the State Trials of the United Irishmen, in order to invalidate his evidence. There was even proof of his attempting to poison his own mother, whom he had previously robbed. At the trial of one of the unfortunate persons done to death by his evidence, beside the testimony against his character borne by several respectable, impartial persons, two of his female relatives, nuns, his brother-in-law Major Witherington, and another brother-in-law of the same name; his late partner in trade, and his clerk, swore that they did not consider him worthy of being believed on his oath. But the Government needed convictions; pliant juries were tampered with; and his own attorney, and a clergyman, a friend of the Crown-solicitor, swore that Mr. Reynolds was, in their opinion, worthy of credit. If freely taking oaths the most solemn, and as freely breaking them, could make him so, his credit was unimpeachable. He had been sworn to secrecy and fidelity when admitted as a member of the United Irishmen's Society; and again to his Captains when he was appointed a Colonel in the projected Rebel Army. He solemnly swore at Oliver Bond's, when suspected and accused, that he had not betrayed his associates; and he swore the oath of allegiance, and to the truth of the information he gave the Privy Council, quite as often as he was required. It was afterwards attempted, when Irish policy was for a season introduced into England, to place this notorious person upon an Eng-sh jury; but the name was ill-omened; his true haracter transpired, and the infamy was crushed r public indignation. So self-deluding is the uman heart, and so reluctant is even the most egraded of educated human beings to be cut off om all sympathy and fellowship with his kind, at it is not surprising that even a Reynolds ould have had some reserve in his own favour: t it is wonderful to find another man, though at man be his son, attempting not merely to ologise for his father's deep-dyed crimes, but represent him as an extremely ill-used man by e ungrateful Government which he had so essenally served. According to this book, if not proerly appreciated, Mr. Reynolds was at least very ell paid. Thus stands the account with him, ken from authentic public documents—

"1798, Sept. 29, Mr. T. Reynolds received £1000
" Nov. 16, Ditto ditto 2000
1799, Jan. 19, Ditto ditto 1000
" March 4, Ditto ditto 1000"

—to complete £5000." And, moreover, on the 14th June, 1799, Mr. Reynolds received his annuity of 1000, "in full to the 25th of March 1799;" from which eriod till his death, the 18th of August 1836, his pen-on continued to be paid to him.

The amount of that pension was £1000 Irish, or £920 ritish. He received it for a term of thirty-seven ears.

he gross amount for the above period, at £920 per annum, is £34,040 ratuity before the trials of Bond, M'Cann, and Byrne, ... 500 ratuities between September 1798, and March 4, 1799, ... 5,000 onsulship at Lisbon, four years, at £1400 per annum, ... 5,600
onsulship at Iceland, two years, at £300 per annum, ... 600

£45,740

In 1810 he was appointed to the Consulate at Lisbon, here he remained nearly four years, the salary and moluments of which office averaged £1400 per annum.

In 1817 he was appointed to the consulate at Iceland, here he remained about one year, on a salary of £300 er annum; he returned to England, and in 1819 went ack to Copenhagen, where he continued a few months, nd then, on leave of absence, repaired to France, leavng his son to act in his stead as vice-consul, in which fice he continued till 1822; another son obtained a ecrative appointment under the stamp-office department t Hull.

This enormous sum of £45,740, the "disinterested riend of his country" received; and as the pension on he Irish civil list reverts to his widow and to his two ons, who are now in the prime of life, it is by no means mprobable that one of the parties may survive the per-on to whom it was originally granted some five-and-wenty or thirty years; and if so, the people of Great ritain will have the further gratification of paying nother sum of twenty or five-and-twenty thousand ounds more, for the credit of Lord Castlereagh's go-ernment in Ireland, (nominally of Lord Camden's,) and s a tribute of respect to the memory and worth of Mr. homas Reynolds. There are gentlemen in the British arliament, thought not forgetful of the services of Mr. eynolds and others of his class, who may think this ubject deserving of their attention, who may imagine hat the children of the starving operatives of Leeds and anchester, are entitled to as much consideration as hose of the gentlemen who made orphans of so many, nd who, during their lives, were amply rewarded for ny service they rendered to their employers.

This person neglected no pretext to establish pecuniary claims against the Government. While weaving his toils around Lord Edward Fitzgerald, then in concealment in Dublin, he presented his victim with a pair of pistols, to be used in self-defence, together with powder, bullets, and a bullet-mould, which Mr. Reynolds, junior, relates as a proof of his father's friendship for the unfortunate gentleman he is said to have betrayed. He, at the same time, gave Lord Edward some money. There is a bare chance that Reynolds might have wished his victim to escape; though every appearance favours the conclusion drawn by Dr. Madden, when he says—

The present of the pistols, with the powder, and bullet-mould, for the protection of a man whose peril, he well knew, was the consequence of his own treachery to him and his associates, was worthy of Reynolds; villany less accomplished would hardly have devised so refined an act of specious perfidy. It was a particular feature of Reynolds' infamy, that he seems to have felt a gratification in witnessing the effects of his proceedings on the unfortunate families of his victims. A few days after the arrests at Bond's, he paid a visit of condolence to Mrs. Bond, and even caressed the child she was holding in her arms. He paid a similar visit of simulated friendship to the wife of Lord Edward Fitzgerald, on the 16th of March. Mr. Reynolds' son must tell the particulars of this interview: "She (Lady Fitzgerald) also complained of a want of gold; my father told her he had given Lord Edward fifty guineas the preceding night, and would send her fifty more in the course of that day, which promise he performed. Neither of these sums were ever repaid. In the course of their conversation, my father mentioned his intention of leaving Ireland for a time; on which she took a ring from her finger and gave it to him, saying she hoped to hear from him if he should have anything of importance to communicate, and that she would not attend to any letter purporting to come from him, unless it were sealed with that ring, which was a small red cornelian, engraved with the figure of a dancing satyr."

Mr. Reynolds having deprived himself of his pistols, on the 15th of March, the act was considered by him, and, at a later period, it would seem was recognised by government as one done for the public service; for these pistols were replaced by Major Sirr, and the bill for the case purchased on this occasion, by the Major for his friend, was duly presented to Mr. Cooke, and the subsequent payment of it was not forgotten.

"1798, July 26, Major Sirr, for pistols, for Mr. Reynolds, ... £9 2 0"

So much for the friendship's offerings of Mr. Thomas Reynolds!

The insatiable cupidity of this man, at length disgusted the administration in both countries, and when his importunities were disregarded, in the pathetic language of his son, having settled his accounts "he bade an eternal adieu to his kindred and country, and arrived with his family in London, on the 1st of January, 1800."

According to his son's statements, this "Exile of Erin" was not much better used by the English Government than that kindred spirit, Richmond the Spy, describes himself to have been used by the Scottish Crown lawyers.

"During two years," continues his son, "he did not cease to urge on the English ministers, the promises made to him on leaving Ireland, but to no purpose. He received much politeness; but the English ministers referred him to the Irish, these again referred him to those in England, until at length disgusted with both, he dropped the pursuit and applied himself exclusively to the care of his family."

It argues a strange state of moral feeling to find that this person continued to be treated with the outward shows of civility by men bearing the character of respectable; though, for this, he may have been in part indebted to his own importunity and impudence. Mr. Henry Inglis, in his Tour in Ireland, expresses astonishment at having seen decent-looking country people in the Court-house of Ennis, at an assize, familiarly nodding and smiling to a prisoner arraigned for a foul murder, and of whose guilt there was no doubt; and from the Memoir of the notorious Reynolds, published by his son, who probably wrote in ignorance of many of the facts of the case, we find men in high situations, bearing (when put to the question by him) flattering testimony to his character; and Sir Jonah Barrington addressing him, when Consul at Lisbon, as "My dear Reynolds." There is, by the way, in this work, some statements or insinuations, which, though not very clear, tend to show that Sir Jonah, at the worst period of the Irish troubles, played fast and loose between parties, and took good care of himself, whatever became of his friends. Lord Castlereagh shied Mr. Reynolds at last; and England was found too hot to hold him.

In 1817 the people of England, who had given themselves very little concern about Mr. Reynolds' doings in Ireland, so long as they were confined to that country, took the alarm rather suddenly, when they found the subject of treason in England, and the system of packing the juries for the trial of the traitors, connected with the ominous name of Mr. Thomas Reynolds. On bills being found by the grand jury of Middlesex against Dr. Watson and four others, for high treason, (the Spafields Rioters,) no sooner was Mr. Reynolds' name discovered on the pannel, than the press of England took the alarm, and the walls of parliament rung with loud denunciations against the Irish informer.

Lord Castlereagh plainly saw the folly of the attempt to resort to the old practices, which had been adopted with so little trouble in the sister kingdom. He left Mr. Reynolds to his fate; and when he threatened to publish a vindication of his acts, it was plainly intimated to him, that it was the pleasure of Lord Castlereagh that he should be silent on these subjects. At length, the coollest sarcasm on an importunate candidate for public employment that ever was carried into effect, was put in practice by Lord Castlereagh in 1818, when he sent that ardent patriot, Mr. Thomas Reynolds, to freeze in Iceland. In October, 1818, Reynolds, having sickened of his Iceland consulship, abandoned his post and returned to London. On his arrival, Mr. Planta communicated to him "his lordship's extreme surprise, and marked displeasure, at his having quitted his public duties for his private affairs, without his lordship's previous sanction."

Lord Castlereagh "did not like him to be in London;" and the ill-used Mr. Reynolds, who had prevented the dismemberment of the empire, took great offence. The message which he left with his old friend, his Lordship's secretary, was, that

In case he continued to hold this consulship, he expected to be treated with attention and consideration by the British ambassadors wherever he settled, and that he still held government bound to provide for his two sons. "I tell you again," said Mr. Cooke, "I'll see them on it."

This must have been a scene that Gay would have delighted to have witnessed and to have depicted, for no other hand could have done justice to the little differences of the gentlemen of those golden days of the good old times.

In 1822, the star had set on the prosperity of Mr. Thomas Reynolds. Mr. Canning had come into power, and had been applied to for employment for the former. Young Mr. Reynolds states, that Mr. Planta communicated to his father Mr. Canning's final determination, "not to employ any member of our family in his department, as he did not consider himself bound by Lord Londonderry's engagements."

Mr. Reynolds deemed the time was come to retire from the turmoil of public life: he fixed his abode in Paris, and died in that city the 18th of August, 1836.*

Reynolds died at last "in the odour of sanctity;" but the less that is said of such great sinners and tardy saints the better. Charity enjoins that we should hope the best of every man; wisdom and modesty, that in such cases as this of "the notorious Reynolds," a modest silence should be preserved, and his family be contented with their pension.

Dr. Madden, in compiling these Memoirs, upon which he has spent many years, and travelled far and wide to gain information from the surviving eye and ear witnesses of the scenes described, has, among other documents, obtained a narrative containing an account of the arrest of Lord Edward Fitzgerald. It was drawn up by Mr. Nicholas Murphy, an honest shopkeeper, in whose house Lord Edward was then concealed. It is the plain story of an honest, unpretending, and peaceful man, brought into trouble through sheer goodness of heart. It possesses much of the De Foeish gusto, of the minute and graphic narrative of a deeply-interested eye-witness. We shall copy out a few extracts, from admiration of the natural manner of the writer, as much as from interest in his story.

An Account of the Arrest of the late Lord Edward Fitzgerald. Written by Nicholas Murphy, in whose house the arrest took place.

"On the night of Friday, the 18th May, 1798, Lord Edward Fitzgerald came to my house, (No. 153, Thomas Street,) in company with a lady,† about the hour of ten or eleven o'clock at night. I did expect him the previous evening; and the reason I state this is, that a friend of his came to me, and requested that I would receive him, as he wished to move from where he was at present.‡ I was getting the house cleaned down and scoured, and I brought his friend in, and he saw the persons employed as I told him; he mentioned that it was not intended to remove him immediately, but said, 'I think a week or ten days would answer.' I assented; and, indeed, with reluctance:—however, I made no mention of that. In a few days previous to Lord Edward's coming, the government had offered one thousand pounds reward for his apprehension. I certainly felt very uneasy at this circumstance, and I wished very much to see Lord Edward's friend; but where to see him I did not know. As a man of honour, I wished to keep my word; and I could not think of refusing him admittance when he came. Unfortunately for him and myself, I did keep my word. I expected him on Thursday, but he did not come till Friday, the 18th of May, 1798.§ I perceived † That lady was Mrs. Moore, in whose husband's house Lord Edward had been previously concealed.

‡ The person alluded to was Surgeon Lawless.—R. R. M.

§ Lord Edward had been previously concealed in his house for a fortnight, on his leaving the residence of the Widow Dillon, "a retired house on the banks of the canal." When Murphy wrote this part of the narrative he was in prison, and evidently did not wish to run the risk of its being discovered that he had previously sheltered Lord Edward.

Mr. James Davock, a respectable silk merchant of the city of Dublin, informed me, a short time previously to his death in 1836, that he and two other persons conducted Lord Edward to Murphy's house the first time he was in concealment there; that about a fortnight before, he met Murphy at the looked very bad and altered from what he appeared when I saw him before. The lady that came with him did not stay long; and I made a tender of my services to go home with her, as she lived in the neighbourhood: there was a person that we met on our way, who, I believe, was waiting for her—I had some knowledge of him myself:* I returned to the house with a troubled mind. Lord Edward told me he was very ill with a cold, and it was easy to perceive it. I had procured for him whey, and put some sherry wine in it. At this time he appeared quite tranquil, and went up to the room intended for him—the back room in the attic story. In the morning he came down to breakfast, and appeared better than the night before. The friend that spoke to me respecting his coming, came, I believe, about eleven o'clock. Then came out, for the first time, an account of the rencontre that took place the night before, between Lord Edward's party and Major Sirr's.† It is perfectly clear, in my humble judgment, that Major Sirr had known of his removal, and the direction he intended to take, when his party and Lord Edward's came in contact in a place called Island Street, at the lower end of Watling Street. They there met, and a skirmish took place, and in the confusion, Lord Edward got off: however, one of the party was taken, but could not be identified.‡ I found my situation now very painful, but nothing to what it was afterwards. In the course of the day, (Saturday 19th,) there was a guard of soldiers, and I believe Major Swan, Major Sirr, a Mr. Medlicot, and another, making search at Mr. Moore's house, the Yellow Lion in Thomas Street. A friend came and mentioned the circumstance to me. I immediately mentioned it to Lord Edward, and had him conveyed out of the house, and concealed in a valley, on the roof of one of the warehouses. While I was doing this, Sam Neilson came, and inquired of the girl if I was at home? I believe she said not. 'Bid him be cautious,' I think was what she told me he said. I considered that conduct of his very ill-timed; however, I am led to believe it was well-intended.

"After placing Lord Edward in the valley, on the roof of the warehouse, I came down in a little time and stood at the gate, the soldiers still at Mr. Moore's. I perceived four persons walking in the middle of the street, some of them in uniform; I believe yeomen. I think Major Swan and Captain Medlicot was of the party. Towards four o'clock, Lord Edward came down to dinner; everything was supposed to be still. Now, at this time, Sam Neilson came in to see us. Dinner was nearly ready, I asked him to stay and dine, which he accepted. Nothing particular occurred, except speaking on a variety of subjects, when Mr. Neilson, as if something struck him, immediately went away, leaving us together; there was very little wine taken. Lord Edward was very abstemious. In a short time I went out; and now the tragedy commenced. I wished to leave Lord Edward to himself. I was absent I suppose about an hour. I came into the room where we dined, being the back drawing-room: he was not there. I went to the sleeping-room: he was in bed. It was at this time about seven o'clock. I asked him to come down to tea. I was not in the room three minutes when in came Major Swan, and a person following him in a soldier's jacket, and a sword in his hand; he wore a round hat. When I saw Major Swan I was thunderstruck. I put myself before him, and asked his business. He looked over me, and saw Lord Edward in the bed. He pushed by me quickly, and Lord Edward seeing him, sprung up instantly like a tiger, and drew a dagger which he carried about him, and wounded Major Swan slightly I believe. Major Swan had a pistol in his waistcoat pocket, which he fired without effect: he immediately turned to me and gave me a severe thrust of the pistol under the eye, at the same time desiring the person that came in with him, to take me into custody. I was immediately taken away to the yard: there I saw Major Sirr and about six soldiers of the Dumbarton Fencibles.

"Major Swan had thought proper to run as fast as he could to the street, and I think he never looked behind him till he got out of danger, and he was then parading up and down the flags, exhibiting his linen, which was stained with blood. Mr. Ryan supplied Major Swan's place; he came in contact with Lord Edward, and was wounded seriously. Major Sirr at that time came up stairs, and keeping at a respectful distance, fired a pistol at Lord Edward in a very deliberate manner, and wounded him in the upper part of the shoulder. Reinforcements coming in, Lord Edward surrendered after a very hard struggle. Now the work of destruction commenced. The house was taken possession of by soldiers. An old invalid volunteered to guard me, along with the man who first held me in charge. The old soldier would not let me put my handkerchief to my face, to wipe away the blood. A neighbour came to offer me a glass of wine and water, but the valiant Major Sirr would not allow it. He was going to break the glass, saying, wine was not fit for rebels. There were Invalids at that time in James Street, and they were soon brought down, and took possession of the house. I never had such a stock of wine, before or since; I little thought who I bought it for. In some time a carriage came, and I was placed in it, in company with two soldiers of the Dumbarton regiment, then stationed in Dublin, and brought off to the castle, and there placed in the castle guard-house. A sad change for me! I was there perhaps an hour or more, when my friend Major Sirr came to me, to bring me into the presence of Mr. Cooke, taking me very friendly under the arm, and telling me to state everything I knew about the business. I felt no inclination to take his advice on that occasion.

"Well! I had the honour of an introduction to Mr. Cooke. There was a gentleman lolling on the sofa, who I afterwards learned was Lord Castlereagh. My friend Cooke looked at me very sharply, and now for question and answer. 'How long was Lord Edward in your house?' 'He came there last night.' 'Who came with him?' 'He came with a lady.' 'What was her name?' 'I cannot state the lady's name.'—I declined to answer to that 'in toto.' I mentioned that I was led into the business very innocently, and that would appear on an investigation taking place, and I could procure sufficient bail. Mr. Cooke laughed at that, and no wonder he might, for he immediately wrote out a Castlereagh warrant for me; I was walked back to the guard-house, and a large guard was ordered to prime and load, which was soon complied with. Then I was placed in the centre, and marched off to Newgate—this was about nine o'clock at night. On arriving there, I was left to ruminate on the situation I was unfortunately placed in. The only consolation I had was, that there were very respectable men at the time in the same place with me. . . .

"I have now to state the treatment I experienced from the soldiers and others that took possession of the house. Alderman Archer, who was one of the sheriffs at that time, but since dead, broke open my secretary and book-case, expecting, I suppose, to get as many papers of a treasonable nature as would convict a hundred, but was disappointed. Next he examined the clothes-press, and then a general search commenced through the rooms; the office desk was broken open, but no papers to be found that could attach criminality. Plundering the place then commenced. Unfortunately, there was a company of Invalids stationed in James Street; they were ordered down; they were known generally by the name of 'Old Fogies.' Their wives came in great numbers, and immediately commenced robbing the place. A large silver gravy-spoon, a plated tea-pot, and plated goblet were taken—everything they could lay their hands on! They were quarrelling, I was informed, about the plunder; nothing in the house could escape their Argus eyes. An officer asked the men 'if Globe Coffee-house, and told him there was a friend of his who wished to be out of the way for a few days; that he did not mention Lord Edward's name, for Murphy was not a United Irishman: but as a personal favour to him, Davock, Murphy agreed to receive his friend; but, subsequently, he told Murphy who the person was.—R. they found out the wine cellar!'—it was soon forced. I never had such a stock of wine, before or since. They destroyed six dozen of as fine wine as could be found—claret, port, and sherry—I purchased it in the wood. The late Alderman Manders fortunately came in as a magistrate, and I believe did all he could; but it had no avail. I had a respected sister—a married lady—who came to the house and conducted herself nobly in the cause of her unfortunate brother, by doing all that was possible under such circumstances. The soldiers and 'Old Fogies' fell to at the wine. I had some pickled beef and chickens in a coop; they were soon in requisition, and my new visiters, regaling themselves, calling aloud to the servant, 'You old—this and that—get us some porter,' they wanted it with the beef and chickens. Fine times with them while it lasted! They never took the trouble of using a screw, but struck off the heads of the bottles with the next thing that came to hand. I have grounds for stating, that when they got tired drinking the wine, they were selling it in the morning at sixpence per bottle, and buying whisky with the money.

"My losses in this unfortunate business amounted to upwards of two thousand pounds, and I never yet received one shilling of compensation from any quarter; and was confined fifty-five weeks a state prisoner, and my house and concerns made a barrack of for ten months and upwards, having ten soldiers—some with wives—besides Invalids, and some of the Rea Fencibles, and the baggage of the regiment in the warehouses."

After farther describing his own condition, and that of some other of his fellow-captives, he returns to Lord Edward, whom none of the other prisoners were permitted to see.

"Two surgeons attended daily on Lord Edward Fitzgerald. It was supposed, the evening of the day before he died, he was delirious, as we could hear him with a very strong voice crying out—'Come on! come on! d——n you, come on!' He spoke so loud, that the people in the street gathered to listen to it. He died the next day early in the morning, on the 3d of June. The surgeons attended and opened the body: then he was seen for the first time by the prisoners. The bowels were opened, and whatever was found there was thrown under the grate, and then the part opened was sewn up. He had about his neck a gold chain, suspending a locket with hair in it.

"Thus died one of the bravest of men, from a conviction, I believe, that his projects would ameliorate the condition of his country. I shall endeavour to describe his person: he was, I believe, about five feet seven inches in height, and a very interesting countenance; beautiful arched eyebrows, fine grey eyes, handsome nose, and high forehead—thick, dark-coloured hair, brown, or inclining to black. I think he was very like the late Lady Louisa Conolly about the nose and eyes. Any person he addressed must have admired his manner,—it was so candid, so good-natured, and so impregnated with good feeling; as playful and humble as a child—as mild and timid as a lady—and, when necessary, as brave as a lion. He was altogether a very fine, elegantly formed man. Peace to his name!"

Murphy received notice of trial along with the brothers Sheares, and about sixty other State prisoners. The execution of the Sheares was followed hard by that of M'Cann, and Michael Byrne. Bond died in prison before his sentence could be carried into effect. Murphy, with simple pathos, thus describes those dreadful days:—

"Words cannot now describe the feelings of the state prisoners: no chance of acquittal! an organized system! and the miscreant Reynolds the 'avant-garde' of it! I will not speak of the juries of 1798; I leave that for others to do.

"At this time there was a Mr. Dobbs a lawyer, and a Mr. Crawford an attorney—two very good men. There was a proposition, I believe, came to the state prisoners through those gentlemen, I suppose sanctioned by the government, and that was—'That the state prisoners would give the government such information as they required, and for the state trials to terminate; the information not to criminate any person, and the prisoners to emigrate to a country not at war with his majesty.' There was a document to be signed conformable to this agreement. There was not a moment to be lost, as Mr. William M. Byrne was to be executed this day, and Mr. O. Bond on the day following. All the state prisoners in our prison signed the contract, and myself among the rest. The privy council, early on that day, deliberated on the business, and the proposal was unfortunately rejected. In the course of the day, while it was pending, my revered and attached sister hearing what I had done, came to the prison in tears, and asked me if I had done such a thing! I answered, I had, and that I would go to any place to leave that abode of misery. 'The business is now,' I said, 'before the privy council; and if Mr. Byrne is respited, which I hope he will, I will be satisfied to expatriate myself; but, I will promise you, if it is to be done again, I will decline it.' Well, the awful news came; and the council rejected the proposition, and Mr. Byrne was executed. He was an elegant young man, and went to death with as much composure as if he was going to dinner. Well, the next day, the same business came on for Mr. Bond. I was now placed in a most unpleasant situation; but I was determined to keep my word. Mr. Dobbs, a good-hearted man, was most anxious for the prisoners, and the same business was again commenced. When it came to my turn to sign, I requested to say a few words:—I said, that I was under great obligations to my family; that one of them came to me yesterday, in great trouble, in consequence of my signing the paper; and that I then promised that I would not sign it if it was to do again: however, I went to Mr. Bond myself, and stated to him how unhappy my family was at my signing, and the promise I made; but that if I was at my liberty, and walking the street, I would sign for him if it served him. He very honourably left me to myself, and requested I would do nothing on his account, saying, at the same time, 'You know how you are situated.' The document went a second time before the privy council. The greatest excitement that could be conceived existed at this time in the prison, to see Mr. Bond, an athletic fine-formed man, who occupied the first class of respectability in Dublin, now heavily ironed!—and what made it more lamentable, was to see Mrs. Bond with him, linked arm to arm. The coffin in the yard! the dreadful apparatus ready! The sensation it excited could not be conceived. I cannot attempt to describe my own feelings at the time. Three o'clock came—no news from the Castle. Alternate hopes and fears crowded on the mind. At half-after three, the news came—'A respite during pleasure!' The shout in the street was the first thing to announce it. There was some person brought into the prison for shouting in the street. Joy was now visible in every countenance. A great change took place in the prison—the place was now comfortable to what it had been. The state trials now terminated, and the gentlemen who signed the agreement expected to go to America; but government decreed otherwise, for reasons best known to themselves. On the 6th of September, Mr. Bond died suddenly in Newgate: he was as well as ever he was on the evening before, and was playing rackets in the yard, to my knowledge: his apartment was quite detached from the rooms of the other prisoners, being convenient to the yard below stairs. Simpson the under-jailor, Samuel Neilson, and himself, spent the evening in Mr. Bond's room. It was understood Samuel Neilson went to bed top-heavy, and left Simpson and Mr. Bond together. About eleven or twelve o'clock, Simpson came into the room I was in. Mr. Pat. Byrne, Mr. J. G. Kennedy, and myself, were in this room. Simpson, I think, brought with him two bottles of wine, (I was in bed at this time:) they commenced drinking the wine. Mr. G. Kennedy got powerless, and went to bed as well as he could. Mr. Byrne being a strong man, kept drinking rith Simpson some time after. I was awake all this ime, and perceived that Simpson wished to provoke a uarrel with Mr. Byrne; Mr. B. acted with great com- and of temper in the business, and with much ado impson went away; I then spoke to Mr. Byrne, and old him I heard all that passed, and that if he had in ture any intercourse with Simpson, I would renounce is friendship, I was so enraged at what I heard. He greed with me in what I said. The next morning, bout five o'clock, it went through the prison that Mr. oad was dead. I immediately arose and went down airs, and there to my astonishment saw Mr. Bond, ing on his back lifeless, with exactly the same dress e wore the day before. I came and informed Mr. yrne and Mr. Kennedy of the fact. Samuel Neilson ept in the room that night, and could give no account hatever of what happened, or how it happened. S. eilson appeared very much affected, and cried like a hild. There was a serious alarm in the prison, and reat uneasiness among the prisoners, fearing there was ul play. Mr. Byrne arose in the bed, and mentioned ith great emphasis, 'Our lives are not worth an hour's urchase!'—however, nothing came out that could estab- sh that. As I was the only person who did not sign the Banishment Bill,' the government was endeavouring to ave me brought to trial; and for that purpose, the usty Major Swan went to my house, that was a bar- ack for three months at that time, with a person (I uppose one of the 'Battalion of Testimony') to look for ikes,—desiring the person to go through the dormant indow of the house, and if he found one, he would get alf a guinea for it. A person who was in the house, ame to my brother with that word: it was well the illow did not think of bringing one. However, nothing as found. When my brother heard of this, he went to e Castle and mentioned the circumstance, I believe to Ir. Cooke; and the answer he got, was,—'that there ould be no more searching.' Some of my family, en- eavouring to procure my liberation, went once, or twice, r thrice, to Lady Louisa Conolly, a very amiable char- ster, to interest herself with Lady Castlereagh, and at ne time, she gave my sister a letter to that personage. ly sister went to Lady Castlereagh's residence, expect- g a favourable answer; and after waiting a consider- ble time—'Indeed,' Lady Castlereagh said, 'she could ot interfere with Lord Castlereagh's affairs!' No hope that quarter!—well! patience is a virtue, if we could ot submit to it."

The remaining State prisoners were sent off to 'ort-George; and Murphy, after being confined or upwards of twelve months, was liberated on iving very heavy bail. He found his house lundered and dilapidated; and his claims for in- emnification were treated with total neglect: nor id the Duke of Leinster, though he appeared to el for the condition into which this worthy man ad been thrown by sheltering Lord Edward, offer im the smallest pecuniary assistance; for which is friends had hoped, when they urged him to ait upon the Duke. He farther relates—

"I endeavoured to raise my trade with very limited eans, and found it very difficult to do so. I felt now at great men were very easy about the misfortunes of thers; and, I am sorry I am obliged to make the re- ark—my case was one that was to be deplored in very point of view.

"There was a large reward offered for the apprehen- ion of Lord Edward, and I fearlessly state that, if it as ten times the sum, it would be no inducement to e, as I felt myself bound by every sentiment of honour- ble feeling, when he came to my house, to admit him nd protect him, as far the means were in my reach— nd what man could do less for an ill-fated gentleman, ndeavouring to evade the vigilance of his pursuers? I ink I would act on the same principle to my greatest nemy, under similar circumstances. However, my rospects in business were in a great measure destroyed by the long confinement I was obliged to submit to, and the coercive treatment I experienced from my oppres- sors. My trade totally disappeared—some of my friends were afraid to speak to me, from the appearance of the times. Well, I breathed the clear air of my beloved country, and was at liberty; and I felt some satisfac- tion at the circumstance. I commenced business, and I felt a great want of what is called the 'sinews of war,' and went on as well as the circumstances would admit."

When Robert Emmet and his associates were arrested on the assassination of Lord Kilwarden, this good man was once more brought into trouble; though he was quite unconnected with their schemes, and, indeed, entirely ignorant of them. His description of his second arrest is even more significant of the tender mercies of the "loyal" than his persecution when he was really implicated. The volunteer yeomen by whom he was escorted to prison, belonged to the "Attorneys' Corps." He says—

"I could not help taking a view of these military gentry —many of them quite boys, scarcely able to handle a musket; and their affected knowledge of military tactics drew from me a smile of contempt. On our way to the Castle the crowd increased immensely, every one inquir- ing—'Who is that?' Dublin appeared to be in a state of siege. In Skinners' Row, I saw Sir John White com- ing up against us on the other side; I knew his person, but never spoke to him. He came over to me, and said to me—'Murphy, you will be hanged to-morrow.' I told him 'I hoped not so soon.' He was fully appointed in military array. I was told he commanded a corps known by the name of 'Sepulchres,' and was going to meet them at the time. What a melancholy circum- stance it is, to be obliged to remark the conduct of re- spectable characters, wound up to a pitch of frenzied loyalty, and making use of language degrading to the human species. However, I met this military hero in some time afterwards, and he thought proper to apologize for it, and did appear sorry for his mistaken zeal. . . . . In a little time I was removed to the Castle guard-house, and there placed in a crib, with several others, a place I could hardly breathe in, and there exhibited for public curiosity. A soldier of the 38th said he wished to have a crack at me. In the course of the day I was ordered, with others, to the provost-prison, situated in Harbour Hill. I was brought there under escort. This place appeared to be a new building, and is situated on a rising ground. I was placed in a room, with five or six other prisoners; it was intended, I heard, as an hospital for invalided soldiers: there was not in it either table or chair, or anything whatever except the walls, and they were thick enough. I sent for a bed, and I accommodated two of my fellow prisoners with part of it. If I had not, they would be obliged to sleep on the floor. The window stools supplied the place of a table. The wet was run- ning down the walls in the most copious way. There was in this place two hundred prisoners, and from ap- pearances, the principal part of them were of the humblest class of society. It was a horrible place for any man to be placed in, that was accustomed to a respectable situ- ation in society. It required great fortitude to submit with calmness to this state of things; however 'we must bear those ills we cannot cure.' My house was deserted, my trade destroyed, my credit injured! I would prefer being three months in Newgate, to three weeks in this place. Sometimes there would come informers, and then the prisoners would be ordered out for inspection, two deep, and the informers would view us all round with the eye of an Argus, trying to recognise any unfortunate prisoner in the crowd to whom to attach criminality. I have seen Majors Sirr and Swan amusing themselves here, laughing at the misfortunes of others, but at the same time taking care of themselves. I felt I gave great uneasiness and trouble to my family, and it caused very unpleasant sensations to myself. I considered this cir- cumstance as a very coercive measure: but I was well aware, it was to please a certain party, at this time in power."

He was at last liberated, after giving bail for seven years, himself for £1000, and two sureties in £500 each; besides the similar amount of bail still hanging over him from the time of his previous liberation. Poor Murphy's example affords very little encouragement to a man sacrificing himself for a public cause. After he had been thus unjustly punished, "to please," as he says, "a junto of exclusive loyalists that were lording it over the people," he returned home to find his trade again ruined. He was once more induced to apply for assistance to the Duke of Leinster, who gave him sympathy and condolence, but nothing more substantial. He died at an advanced age, in embarrassed circumstances, but with the rare character, in those times, of unimpeachable integrity. Besides Murphy's Narrative, now first published, the "United Irishmen" contains other accounts of the arrest of Lord Edward Fitzgerald, and of the persons intimately connected with, and forming what was called his body-guard. Few as they were in number, (besides the information of Lord Edward's movements and places of retreat in Dublin regularly communicated by Reynolds,) there was one traitor among them; and it seems not unlikely that, throughout his various places of concealment in Dublin, Major Sirr never fairly lost sight of him.

Lord Edward Fitzgerald, Robert Emmet, the Sheares, and men of their cast, laid themselves fairly open to the government; but even the most wary and innocent were not safe in those treacherous and slippery times, and a bold attempt seems to have been made to implicate Grattan, who was denounced by Lord Clare in the Privy Council, along with the United Irishmen. This, however, failed. Grattan's accuser was another Government spy, named Hughes, who had been a bookseller in Belfast; a person who, if not as villanous as Reynolds, was a more fortunate and dexterous deceiver. He was one of the first and most active members of the Northern Societies. He was often employed in missions to other places; and as Secretary of the Belfast Society swore in all the members. Subsequently his affairs became embarrassed; he was declared a bankrupt; and probably became a volunteer spy, as the price of his liberation when arrested on a charge of High Treason. In his capacity of spy, he came up to Dublin, in the spring of 1798, to do useful work. He had been in the capital in the previous summer, when the military organization of the different counties was going forward, but he was not then in the pay of the Government. When once fairly at work, we learn his proceedings from his own evidence—

"He went to Dublin on the 20th of April, and remained there about nine days. He called on Samuel Neilson, walked with him to Mr. Cormick, a feather-merchant in Thomas Street. He was introduced by Neilson to Cormick in the office. Cormick asked them to go up stairs; he and Neilson went up stairs, and found Lord Edward Fitzgerald and Mr. Lawless the surgeon, playing billiards. He had been introduced to Lord Edward about a year before by Teeling; he was a stranger to Lawless; so he staid about an hour; no particular conversations; was invited to dine there that day, and did so; the company were Lord Edward, Lawless, Neilson, Cormick, and his wife. The conversation turned upon the state of the country, and the violent measures of government in letting the army loose. The company were all of opinion, that there was then no chance of the people resisting by force with any success. He was also introduced by Gordon, who had been in Newgate, and Robert Orr of Belfast, chandler, to Mr. Rattican, the timber-merchant at the corner of Thomas Street. Rattican talked to him on the state of the country and of the city of Dublin, and told him that they would begin the insurrection in Dublin by liberating the prisoners in Kilmainham. Rattican showed him a plan of the intended attack upon Kilmainham. Whilst he was in Dublin, in April, he dined with Neilson at the Brazen Head. Next day, Neilson called him up at five o'clock, and they went to Sweetman's, near Judge Chamberlaine's, to breakfast; Sweetman was then in prison, but Neilson lived in his house. Neilson took Sweetman's carriage to Mr. Grattan's, and brought him along with him. When they got to Mr. Grattan's, Neilson told him he had something to say to Mr. Grattan in private, and desired him to take a walk in the domain. Neilson, however, introduced him to Mr. Grattan first, and Mr. Grattan ordered a servant to attend him to show him the grounds. He returned in about half an hour. Went into Mr. Grattan's library—Neilson and Grattan were there together. Grattan asked a variety of questions touching the state of the country in the north: how many families had been driven out, and how many houses burned by the government or the Orangemen? Grattan said he supposed he was a United Irishman? he said he was. Grattan asked him how many United Irishmen were in the province? he said he reckoned 126,000. Grattan asked him how many Orangemen there were? he said about 12,000—Grattan made no particular answer. Neilson and he left Grattan's about twelve in the day; they walked to their carriage, which was at Enniskerry; he asked Neilson what had passed between Grattan and him? Neilson evaded the question, but said generally that he had gone down to Grattan to ask him whether he would come forward, and that he had sworn him. That Grattan promised to meet him in Dublin before the next Tuesday. He left Dublin that evening, and returned to Belfast. He has known the Reverend Steele Dickson, of Portaferry, for two years intimately."

Neilson afterwards denied that he had sworn Mr. Grattan, or that he had ever said so; and that any copy of the constitution of the society had been shown to Grattan. Hughes remained long unsuspected, as he was not called upon to give evidence at the trials of the persons whom his disclosures implicated. According to our author, he was kept in reserve for higher uses. Fuller light is thrown upon his functions and individual character by the narrative of the imprisonment and exile of the Rev. Dr. Dickson of Belfast;—

Dr. Dickson was arrested on the 4th of June, 1798, in consequence of the disclosures made by Magin and Hughes.

During his confinement in the house called the Donegal Arms, then the provost-prison of Belfast, the plan was carried into effect, which had been very generally adopted at this frightful period in other parts of the country, of apprehending some of the least suspected informers, and having it rumoured abroad that such persons had been arrested as ringleaders of the rebels, who were sure to be convicted, and then placing these persons among the unfortunate prisoners, for the purpose of making the latter furnish evidence against themselves and their companions. This proceeding, which would hardly be had recourse to in any uncivilized country, in these times, is thus described by Dr. Dickson, from his own sad experience of it:—

"The first of these persons, of whom I had any knowledge, or by whom I was beset, was the notorious John Hughes, a man some years before of considerable respectability, but with whom I never had any particular nnexion, or even intimate acquaintance. However, was fixed on as most likely to succeed in entrapping e and a few others. With a view to this, opportunity as taken to excite our compassion, either on the day , or after his arrest. We were entertained with a fable aly affecting—'that there was no hope of saving his e—that his mind was deranged—that he was treated ith great cruelty—and, that he was placed among a owd of poor wretches, with whom he could neither ve conversation nor comfort.' This pathetic fiction as immediately followed with an observation, that, 'if e could possibly make room for him, taking him to us ould be an act of the greatest charity.' Completely posed on by the tale, we instantly yielded to the ap ication, and smothering though we were, received him to our stove. On his entrance, his looks and manner ere wild, unsettled, and strongly marked with melan oly. Afterwards, he talked, in a desponding tone, of e certainty of his conviction, and sometimes of a secret nspiracy against him, in which, as it appeared, he con dered some of us as concerned. At other times, he ould start, with seeming horror, and exclaim that the ntinel was about to shoot him. On the whole, though sometimes talked soberly, and generally listened at atively to our conversation, he acted his part so well, at tervals, that during two nights, and the intermediate ay, I was as fully convinced of his derangement as I as of my own existence; and under this impression, ot only prayed with him, and for him, in his seemingly mposed moments, but was quite delighted with the onderful comfort which devotional exercises seemed to ive him. Some of our party, however, suspected him imposture from the first; and their suspicion was soon nfirmed, by his being removed, for some time every ay, to a distant apartment, and detained in secret con rence. His total removal from us, a few days after ards, and his symptoms of insanity suddenly disappear g, certainly excited suspicion, and his name was con gued to infamy together with those of his employers.

"Besides Hughes, other informers were placed among s, about the same time. One of which was the Mr. Magin ientioned by him, in his deposition, which will appear fterwards. He, like the other, was committed, under ie most dreadful denunciations of vengeance, and, as ie other had done, expressed the most lively apprehen ons of his impending fate, even with lamentations and ars. He made his way to me frequently, and under arious pretexts; sometimes to complain of his melan oly situation, sometimes to borrow trifles, and, at hers, to affect confidential conversation, or ask advice."

Hughes' sham arrest was therefore for the sole urpose of forwarding the objects of his nefarious ffice; and only took place when he had done his uty in Dublin; Lord Edward Fitzgerald having een arrested on the 19th of May in Dublin, and lughes on his return to Belfast on the 7th June. y official documents since brought to light, and hich form an important feature in this work, it ppears that even his most trifling personal ex enses while suffering confinement, were defrayed ut of the public purse. He was long detained a prison, it is not easy to say for what object; ough the Government seems to have had little nfidence in its spies; and though not paid upon ie magnificent scale of Reynolds, he did not go holly without his reward. When discharged from ie Castle, he seems to have received £200 "in full of ll demands." This was but poor work, though robably but a balance.

The novel infamy of employing the confidential aw-agents of prisoners as spies upon their clients, as reserved for the Irish Government of 1798. The aw-agent of the United Irishmen of Antrim was he person named M'Gucken; and the individual he employed to go to Dublin to engage counsel to defend his betrayed clients was Hughes, who, like himself, was then quite unsuspected by the members of the societies. Well is it said

Treason upon treason meets our eyes, at every step of the agents, actors, and adversaries too, of this conspiracy. It is painful to trace the revolting progress of such perfidy, but it is needful to unmask and to expose its hideousness, in order to prevent a recurrence to the use or practice of its wickedness.

It will be seen, that M'Gucken's "services," did not go without their reward in this world.

"March 5, 1799. J. Pollock for M'Gucken, sent to him by post to Belfast	£60

February 7, 1804. Mr. Pollock for M'Gucken	500"

It may be presumed, for these large sums and his pension, moreover, that Mr. M'Gucken rendered many and important services.

Though the first item which bears his initials is dated the 5th of March, 1799, several other sums of a previous date are set down, with the name of the person only through whom the succeeding payments were chiefly made, and one to the amount of £300.

The earliest proof of Mr. M'Gucken's services that has transpired, was given on the occasion of the disappearance of six brass field-pieces of the Belfast Volunteer Corps, the property of the town of Belfast, which General Nugent issued a proclamation to be given up to him, the 28th May, 1798. Four of the pieces were given up on the 30th; the two others, Mr. Robert Getty was held responsible for, as the officer of that corps, in whose charge they had been originally placed. The pieces having been carried away clandestinely long before, without the knowledge of Mr. Getty, it was not in his power to produce them: this gentleman was arrested and sent to the provost. This measure excited much surprise in Belfast, even at a period when any outrage on one of the old volunteers, of independent principles, excited little. Mr. Getty was a man of undoubted loyalty; he had been, however, one of the early advocates of Catholic emancipation, but on every political subject, was of very moderate opinions. In those times, few considerations weighed against the secret charges of a recognised informer.

Mr. Getty's life was in imminent peril, and probably, if the crown-solicitor, Mr. Pollock, had not visited him in the provost, he would have been hanged. It turned out that some charges, but utterly unfounded ones, had been laid against him. Getty's influence, however, and high character, triumphed over the malignity of the informer, and he was released.

It was only in the year 1809 or 1810, that Mr. Pollock told Getty, that the informer against him was Mr. James M'Gucken, the attorney. He showed Mr. Getty the informations, and I have good authority for saying there was no truth in them. Mr. Getty never could account for this proceeding; he had never given any offence to this man, and from his early advocacy of emancipation, to the last day of his life, was a favourite with his Roman Catholic townsmen, to which body M'Gucken belonged. The late General Coulson, an aide-de-camp at that time to General Barber, subsequently informed a member of his family, that one of M'Gucken's relations had been arrested by him in 1798, of whose guilt there was not the slightest doubt; he was allowed, however, to escape, but why, he did not know.

In the year 1802, there being no longer a field for the services of Mr. Hughes, he was "paid off," and permitted, like Reynolds, to "bid an eternal farewell to his friends and country." His loss, like that of Mr. Reynolds, no doubt, was borne with Christian fortitude.

From these details it may be concluded, that no man who has fairly entered upon the trade of a hired spy ever abides by the mere facts within his knowledge. He embellishes the real, or, if need be, creates fictitious circumstances to enhance the value of his information.

The sufferings of the country during the Rebellion forms a frightful chapter in this work. The use of torture is, we believe, no longer denied by any party; because the fact is undeniable. Without entering upon the painful details of these enormities, we shall cite one brief notice of the results.

Throughout the country, the total loss on both sides, in this rebellion, is estimated by Plowden, Moore, Curran, and Barrington, at about 70,000; 20,000 on the side of Government, and 50,000 on that of the insurgents. It is generally admitted by all, but more especially by the Rev. Mr. Gordon, that very many more were put to death in cold blood than perished in the field of battle. The number of deaths arising from torture, or massacre, where no resistance was offered, during the year 1798, forms the far greater portion of the total number slain in this contest. The words of Mr. Gordon are, "I have reason to think, more men than fell in battle were slain in cold blood. No quarter was given to persons taken prisoners as rebels, with or without arms."

It would be vain to conceal that the insurgents all but equalled the "loyal" and the military in acts of sanguinary and wanton cruelty, though the actual loss of life through their means was comparatively little.

The expense of this rebellion is estimated variously at from twenty-one to fifty-two millions of money. The sum must have been enormous. The indemnification of suffering loyalists alone, is estimated at about a million and a half; though there was no indemnity for the injury sustained by such poor, oppressed men, as Nicholas Murphy. We do not pretend to follow the narrative of the civil war, in Wexford and the other disturbed counties; but a few isolated facts will throw some light upon the appalling results of secret conspiracies, and attempts at employing physical force to overthrow any established government. When the rebels, or the rabble in arms, took the town of Wexford from the military, among other State prisoners whom they released, was Mr. Harvey, a popular young barrister of respectable family, and the heir to a good estate. They immediately made Mr. Harvey their commander, though he was very reluctant to accept an appointment for which he was totally unfit. But, though military talents were not to be expected from the rebel General and his chance-medley staff, steady conduct, and a moderate degree of sobriety might have been looked for. What was their behaviour while leading on a force, or a horde of from 20,000 to 30,000 men, and when preparing to attack the town of Ross?

They arrived late in the evening at Corbet Hill, within a mile of Ross, and there Mr. Harvey and his principal officers took up their quarters in the house of a gentleman, where "being regaled (says Hay) with an excellent supper and exquisite wines, they were so well pleased with their cheer, and so far forgot their prudence as commanders, that they had scarcely time to have fallen asleep, when they were roused, according to the orders they had given in their sober moments, to commence the attack at the break of day." In plain terms, the general and his staff, the night preceding a battle, on the issue of which depended all their hopes, sat up all night drinking and carousing, instead of making their dispositions, and maturing their plan of operations. Their example was followed by their troops the following day: and drunkenness alone was the cause of their defeat on that occasion. Cloney, an eye-witness of these scenes, says, "the leaders found more attraction in Mr. Murphy's good wines, than in the discharge of those arduous duties that appertained to their command."

Harvey had formed a plan of attack on three different parts of the town at once; which Mr. Gordon thinks, "would probably have succeeded if it had been put in execution." "Harvey, (he says,) though neither destitute of personal courage, nor, in some respects, of a good understanding, possessed not that calm intrepidity which is necessary in the composition of a military officer, nor those rare talents by which an undisciplined multitude may be directed and controlled."

Harvey's first act in the morning, was to despatch one of his officers, Mr. Furlong, with a flag of truce, and a summons to the commanding officer in Ross, to surrender the town. Furlong no sooner reached the out-posts, than he was shot in the performance of his mission. Mr. Gordon, a protestant clergyman, in relating this circumstance, says, "To shoot all persons carrying flags of truce from the rebels, appears to have been a maxim with his majesty's forces."

An attack was immediately made on the town, with indiscriminate fury; the plan of the general was totally disregarded. After some hard fighting, they gained possession of the town; but instead of following up their advantage, "they fell to plundering and drinking;" and after being some hours in possession of the town, the great body of the multitude was so inebriated as to be incapable of defending their new conquest. "Such of the insurgents (says Hay) as were not too drunk to escape out of the town, of which they had been by this time some hours in possession, were driven out of the town;" but having recovered a little after their hasty retreat, which in a great measure made them sober, they again returned to the charge, and their intrepidity was more signally displayed than on any former occasion. They again got possession of the town; "but even after this (we are told by Hay) they soon fell into the same misconduct as before, crowning their bravery with drunkenness." They were again driven out of the town; several houses were set on fire, and one in which seventy-five of these unfortunate wretches were shut up, all of whom perished in the flames, with one exception, who, in running away, was fortunate enough to get clear of the fire of the soldiery.

A Quaker of the name of Cullimore, who had been taken up on the preceding day, when leaving the town on a visit to his family, had the courage and humanity to interfere on behalf of the prisoners who were confined in the market-house; a number of soldiers had rushed in, with the intention of putting the prisoners to death; Cullimore stood boldly forth, and cried out in an authoritative and impressive tone, "You shall not shoot the prisoners, there are some men here as loyal as you are." The manner and the spirit of this single, unarmed, and uninfluential man, awed and overcame the infuriated band; "they retired without perpretating the horrid crime they had intended to commit." . . .

Several of "the respectable persons," of that class called middle men, during the engagement, having a cask of port-wine which they had conveyed from Corbet Hill to a well-protected spot, under the shelter of a high ditch, drinking out of wooden "noggins," and occasionally advancing in warlike array towards the gate, and then inquiring with becoming authority, "How goes the day, eys!" and then returning to the wine cask while the attle was going on; which, "if it had succeeded," (says loney,) "our way was open to Waterford and Duncanon Fort, both would have been hastily evacuated, and he province of Munster at once in arms."

Harvey was speedily deposed from his high post; ot altogether for military misconduct, but for his nterference to preserve the lives and property of he persons who fell into the hands of his troops. He was afterwards arrested in one of the Saltee slands, where he had concealed himself with some ther rebel leaders in a cave; and he paid with is life the penalty of his few days of generalship. Testimony borne on his trial to his humanity, stood im in no stead, but rather operated unfavourably. Ve are told that—

The rector of Killegny, in alluding to this fact, in the ase of one Redmond, observes, "The display of humanity y a rebel was, in general, in the trials by court-martial, y no means regarded as a circumstance in favour of the ccused; strange as it may seem in times of cool reflecon, it was very frequently urged as a proof of guilt. Whoever could be proved to have saved a loyalist from ssassination, his house from burning, or his property om plunder, was considered as having influence among he rebels, consequently a commander.

Men became afraid of being suspected of generosity r tenderness to their enemies, and a Roman Catholic gentleman, one of the rebels, under this pprehension, is said to have exclaimed, "I thank ay God that no one can prove me guilty of saving he life or property of any one!" Harvey, though ost unfit to be an insurgent leader, seems to have een an amiable, if weak man. When he beheld he horrible scene in the barn of Scullabogue, where number of prisoners had been foully destroyed in old blood by some of the rebels, in their flight after he battle of Ross, he is said to have turned from he scene with horror, and, wringing his hands, to ave exclaimed to those about him,—

"Innocent people were burned there as ever were orn; your conquests for liberty are at an end." He aid to a friend he fell in with, with respect to his own tuation, "I see now the folly of embarking in this usiness with these people: if they succeed, I shall be urdered by them; if they are defeated, I shall be anged." . . . . . Harvey met his fate with beoming fortitude; even Sir Richard Musgrave acknowdges, "he died in a very decent manner, having been ttended by a Protestant clergyman, and having prayed ost fervently." Hay, in his account of his execution, ates, that on the 27th, when he was brought out of his ail, "he met Mr. Grogan in the gaol-yard, and accosted im in a feeling and affectionate manner. While shaking ands with him, he said in the presence of an officer and ome of the guards, and in the hearing of several prisoners ho had crowded to the windows, 'Ah, poor Grogan! ou die an innocent man, at all events.' They were then onducted to the bridge, where they were hanged, when he heads of Messrs. Grogan and Harvey were cut off, nd placed upon pikes on each side of that of Captain Keogh, (who had been some days previously executed,) hile their bodies were stripped, and treated with the sual brutal indecencies before being cast over the bridge. Mr. Colclough was executed on the day following; but is body, at the intercession of his lady, was given up to er to be interred. Mr. John Kelly, of Killan, whose ourage and intrepidity had been so conspicuous at the attle of Ross, now lay ill in Wexford of a wound which e had received in that engagement—he was taken from is bed, tried, and condemned to die. His head was cut ff, and his body, after the accustomed indignities, was hrown over the bridge. The head, however, was reserved for another exhibition—it was first kicked along the Custom-house quay, and then brought up into the town, and treated in the same manner opposite the house in which his sister lived," &c.

The executioner of these unfortunate gentlemen was a sergeant of the King's-county militia, of the name of Dunn—a monster in the human form, whose brutality and ferocious cruelty has never been exceeded in any country—not even in France, in the worst times of the French Revolution. The clothes of each sufferer, he was accustomed to strip off, the moment the body was cut down, in the presence of the victim next in turn for execution, then tied up the effects in a handkerchief with the greatest composure; and proceeded with another victim, and with a similar disposition of his perquisites. As the generality of those executed on the Bridge of Wexford were persons of respectability in life, watches and other valuable effects were not unfrequently found on their persons, and these Serjeant Dunn was in the habit of selling to the yeomanry rabble and supplementaries, as rebel trophies, at the close of each day's business. The heads of the persons executed, he used to carry to his own house after the execution, rolled up in the linen of each, and in the course of the evening he proceeded to the town-house, mounted the roof, and fixed the heads on pikes.

For a length of time, the Bridge of Wexford was a fashionable lounge, for "the bucks and blades" of the Wexfordian "ascendancy;" and Sergeant Dunn was wont to gather his evening group around him, and regale his hearers with ludicrous anecdotes of his official labours. This brutal man, like one of the ermined jesters of that day, enlivened the awful scenes in which he acted a foremost part, by sallies of ribald humour, and jibes and jokes in reference to the appalling circumstances by which he was surrounded.

The arrest of the brothers Sheares, which took place in a few days after that of Lord Edward Fitzgerald, gave the last blow to the Societies of United Irishmen, an organization which we cannot view in the same light with our author, either in its origin or progress.

Dr. Madden's work, which is somewhat rambling and episodical, contains a very long and minute history of the brothers, which was communicated to him by a Mr. Davock of Dublin, who had been the intimate friend, near neighbour, and political associate of Oliver Bond. The Sheares were betrayed by the notorious Captain Armstrong, a spy who is classed by Sir Jonah Barrington as in a lower grade than even Reynolds; as he had the honour of a soldier, as well as the integrity of a man to sustain; and, in fulfilling his odious office, deliberately sacrificed both. The Sheares had imbibed the Republican mania in Paris, where they happened to be at the time of the storming of the Bastile by the populace; and the younger brother had become a member of a political club, most probably the Jacobin Club. They were the sons of a respectable banker in Cork, who had been a member of the Irish Parliament. He left the bulk of his fortune to his eldest son, Henry, who was for some time in the army, though he afterwards went to the bar. He appears to have been a genuine Irishman in his habits and tastes; and his late vocation to patriotism seems to have been quite accidental, and to have arisen from the agency of his more energetic younger brother, John Sheares, who was also a barrister, and who, after the fashion of the times, became a speculative Republican. It is stated in this narrative, that the dashing Henry Sheares was the successful rival in love of Lord Clare, when the latter was only known as Mr. Fitzgibbon, a struggling young barrister; and that this long past circumstance was, in 1798, ungenerously remembered, and was the cause of that implacable hostility which pursued both the brothers to an ignominious death. However this may be, Henry Sheares seems to have been both a more reluctant and a less deeply implicated conspirator than his enthusiastic brother; though men quite as guiltless suffered in those times. Nor are we inclined to place implicit faith in Henry's having, by the forfeiture of his life, expiated the crime of having married Miss Swete, an imaginary heiress, who had refused the future great man, and eloped with Sheares, sixteen years previously. Fitzgibbon, it was as likely, might have congratulated himself upon luckily escaping an heiress of £50,000, whose father became a bankrupt before one penny of her fortune had been paid. There was, however, bitter political animosity between the parties; and Lord Chancellor Clare, when raised to the Bench, showed the most vindictive feelings to the brothers, both of a personal and political kind. In Ireland there was then no room for a tolerant spirit among men of hostile parties; there is but little now. The Sheares professionally received great provocation from the Chancellor, and they were not forbearing. Henry Sheares upon one occasion challenged the Chancellor; and John was known to be the second of the Hon. Simon Butler, who also challenged the great man. Though the decorums of office prevented Lord Clare from taking any notice of these absurdities, as an Irishman he must have been more than mortal if he could have forgotten them.

When the first arrests, at the house of Oliver Bond, deprived the Society of United Irishmen of its more active leaders, the Sheares, but especially John, was induced to assume the guidance of its desperate fortunes. One of his duties was writing intemperate and inflammatory addresses for their newspaper, The Press.

Besides the information derived from Mr. Davock's memoranda respecting the Sheares, Dr. Madden has obtained an interesting communication, relating to the brothers, from a lady named Steele, to whom John Sheares was paying his addresses while engaged in those fatal transactions which cost him his life. She died unmarried; and never, to her latest hour, mentioned his name but with tenderness and sorrow. From her memorandum, we learn that "Both the brothers had been United Irishmen more than a year, when she first knew them in 1794: and they attended the meetings of that society as many others then did. A speech that was made at one of those meetings, gave Lord Clare an opportunity of speaking disrespectfully of them in the House of Lords, the consequence of which was a demand for an explanation from the eldest. They had become United Irishmen at the same time; but there was nothing legally criminal in their proceedings till 1798.

"In the year 1797, about Christmas, John was intensely desirous of going to America. He was indeed very anxious to leave Ireland, and would have gone wherever those he was attached to pleased, but he would not go without one particular companion."

Namely, the fair writer, who, after mentioning other family circumstances, relates—

"Henry's income was called twelve hundred a-year; John's fortune, three thousand pounds. At the time he joined the Society of the United Irishmen, he was not embarrassed, his little fortune was then whole, and fully satisfied his wants. He bought nothing but books.

"Henry lived beyond his income; his affairs were somewhat embarrassed, and he sold a part of his property; he also borrowed a good deal from John, who at one time wished to reside apart from his brother, but could not, on that account. In 1797, Henry was for some time in a retired lodging, at No. 5, Mecklenburgh Street, the house of a Miss Halpen. He was successful at the bar, till the Chancellor became the enemy of the brothers. Lord Clare's enmity was chiefly against Henry; John had no quarrel with him; but on their conviction, it was said, he could not be spared and Henry put to death. After Henry's correspondence with the Chancellor, he prevented them from doing business in his court as lawyers. John then became exasperated, and spoke more severely of him than he had done before, on account of his politics. He always thought him an enemy to Ireland. When I knew the brothers, in 1794, they had been at the bar some time, and lived together in Henry Sheares' house, in Baggot Street.

"Henry's second wife was a Miss Sally Neville, a beautiful and accomplished woman; I remember her well. He had two children by his second marriage.

"Henry Sheares was naturally high-spirited, eloquent in discourse, and possessed of a remarkably martial and noble bearing; but his great hauteur and want of discretion, would have made him a bad leader in any public cause. In his domestic relations, he was warm, tender, indulgent, willing to promote every present amusement, —but wanting calculation and foresight for the future. I have always heard he was a fair scholar; and have heard good judges say, that they had never seen a library so admirably selected as that of the Sheares. Henry was not considered so deeply read as John. He did not give so much time to study; but he never appeared deficient in company, either with the learned, or with those whose reading lay more amongst works of imagination and modern literature. He spoke with great fluency and elegance on literary subjects, but not without a degree of characteristic pride. His disposition was most generous; but he was not patient or forbearing. He would have made a good despot, if there can be such a thing. He spoke with much violence at times, even in society; but though haughty, and sometimes fierce, he was not of a cruel temper.

"He used to talk of republicanism—but he was formed for courts. He loved power, and splendour, and luxury. The self-denying virtues he knew not. He was, however, an accomplished gentleman, fond of society, and capable of adding lustre to the most brilliant circle.

"If it was possible for either brother to have acted on the proclamation attributed to John, found at the house of Henry, it was more so for the latter than for John, who was supposed to have written it; but Henry was as incapable of deliberate cruelty as his brother."

The violent proclamation referred to, was the strongest documentary evidence produced against the Sheares. That it was the production of John, and that Henry knew nothing of it, seems to be unquestioned. Of this document, Maria Steele farther writes—

"In regard to the proclamation found in his desk, I believe he was the writer of it; though that was never fully proved. At the time when it was supposed to have been written, he appeared so altered, that those who used to delight in listening to him would scarce know him. His mind seemed to have lost its balance. Even his dress was not the same—his hair was neglected, &c., &c. In March, 1798, he became a member of the Directory, and then first took any active part in the rebellion: I do not think he desired a revolution, till at a very late period of the struggle. . . . . .

John's sentiments, at the commencement of his political career, were moderate; but latterly they became less so. He once drew up a plan of an independent government for Ireland, but it was done in rather a sportive kind of manner than in a serious mood; and when the mother of a young friend of his spoke with displeasnre of it, he gave it to her to burn. . . .

"As to his personal appearance—he was tall, and rather slender than full; not what is termed muscular, but well-proportioned and active.

"In his person, he differed strikingly from his brother. His air was gentle and unassuming, but animated and interesting. He was pale; rather light complexioned, with full blue eyes, and an open countenance; well-formed nose; large eloquent mouth, and white teeth; his voice was fine, his articulation very clear, his language rich, but quite unaffected; he had much playful wit and humour, but was easily made serious. You ask, was he of a sanguinary disposition? He was quite the reverse. He had a most tender heart, and benevolent disposition."

This may be somewhat partial, but it is probably accurate testimony. The lady gives a genuine love-letter of Sheares, addressed to herself, breathing much ardour and passion, and with no alloy of fustian; and some copies of verses by him, also addressed to herself.

John Sheares devoted himself to his perilous duties after the arrest of the other conspirators, with redoubled energy, but with very little discretion; if, indeed, the most desperate counsels and courses were not now advisedly adopted as the forlorn hope of the United Irishmen. He and his brother were betrayed by the Captain Armstrong alluded to above, who forced himself upon their acquaintance through their bookseller, Byrne, who was one of the United Brethren. Armstrong pretended to be as violent a revolutionist as any of them, and one of old date.

The new Directory had fixed upon the 23d of May for the general rising of the people throughout the country. On the 10th, this infamous person, who was then a captain of the King's-County militia, visited the bookseller Byrne, to procure some of those deistical and republican works which he pretended to admire, and which he regularly purchased. He had no sooner effected his purpose of worming himself into the confidence of John Sheares, than he began, in the most business-like manner, to make notes of their conversations, which he had the incredible effrontery to refer to, when, soon afterwards, giving evidence on their trials, at which he said, "I never had an interview with the Sheares, that I had not one with Colonel L'Estrange and Captain Clibborn, and my Lord Castlereagh." This man's baseness surpasses belief.

Armstrong, on leaving Byrne's on the 10th of May, immediately proceeded to his brother officer, Captain Clibborn, and informed him of what had passed. The latter advised him "to give the Sheares a meeting." He then returned to Byrne's late the same day, and remained there till Henry arrived. Byrne led him to the inner part of the shop, toward a private room, and introduced him to Sheares, in these terms: "All I can say to you, Mr. Sheares, is, that Captain Armstrong is a true brother, and you may depend on him."

They remained at the entrance of the private room; but Henry Sheares declined any conversation, "except in the presence of his brother." Armstrong said, "he had no objection to wait until his brother came." Henry, however, declined to wait; and, shortly after, John Sheares arrived, and was introduced to him by Byrne.

John Sheares told Captain Armstrong, "he knew his principles very well." He then solicited him "to join the cause by action, as he knew he had done by inclination;" and Armstrong replied, "he was ready to do everything in his power for it, and if he could show him how he could do anything, he would serve him to the utmost of his power." Sheares then informed him, he states, that the rising was very near; "they could not wait for the French, but had determined on a home effort;" and the principal way he could assist them, was by gaining over the soldiers, and consulting with him about taking the camp at Lehaunstown. John Sheares then made an appointment with him for the following Sunday, at his house in Baggot Street; and on that day he went and found Henry only at home. He apologized for leaving him on the former occasion, "having had to attend a committee that day." The informer states, he then asked about the camp, where it was most vulnerable? how to be most advantageously attacked? John came in, and spoke about the necessity of gaining over the soldiers, and then informed Armstrong, that their intention was to seize the camp, the artillery at Chapelizod, and the city of Dublin in one night: there was to be an hour and a half between the seizing of the camp and Dublin; an hour between seizing Dublin and Chapelizod; so that the news of both might arrive at the same time.

The 13th, on Sunday night, at eleven o'clock, by appointment, Armstrong had another interview with the brothers at their house, for the purpose of getting the name of some soldiers in his regiment who were known to be United Irishmen.

In brief, he plied the brothers night and day, for ten successive days. On Sunday the 20th, the day before their arrest, he said, that John Sheares, on the part of the Executive, informed him that he was to be appointed to the King's-County rebel regiment; and that Sheares

Further informed him, that on the night of the rising in Dublin, the Lord-lieutenant was to be seized, and all the privy council, separately in their own houses. That, when the privy council was seized, there would be no place to issue orders from, so as to counteract the rising; and in case of a failure of the attack on the camp, on the march of the soldiery into town, through Baggot Street, they had a sufficient number of houses there in their interest, to shoot them from, so as to render them useless." All this part of the conversation was represented to have taken place while Henry had been present. Captain Armstrong did not think it necessary to state, that at his Sunday's interview, he shared the hospitality of his victims; that he dined with them, sat in the company of their aged mother and affectionate sister, enjoyed the society of the accomplished wife of one of them, caressed his infant children; and on another occasion (referred to by Miss Steele) was entertained with music—the wife of the unfortunate man, whose children he was to leave in a few days fatherless, playing on the harp for his entertainment! These things are almost too horrible to reflect on. . . . . .

Armstrong, after dining with his victims on Sunday, returned to their house no more. This was the last time the cloven foot of treachery passed the threshold of the Sheares:—on the following morning they were arrested, and committed to Kilmainham gaol.

The most active coadjutor of Sheares, at this juncture, was Mr. Lawless, a surgeon, who fortunately got some hint of danger, or felt some suspicion of the treachery of Armstrong, as he escaped. This man afterwards rose to the rank of a general in the French army, in which he greatly signalized himself. To have done with Armstrong, of whom it is said—

Other informers, when they have once wormed themselves into the confidence of their victims, and have possessed themselves sufficiently of their secrets to bring them to the scaffold, rest from their labours, and spare themselves the unnecessary annoyance, perhaps a feeling of remorse, at beholding the unfortunate wretches they have deceived, when they are fairly in their toils and delivered over to the proper authorities. In Ireland, there is no such squeamishness in the breasts of our informers. No sooner was the younger Sheares safely lodged in the Castle guard-room, than he received a visit of condolence from Captain Armstrong, on the very morning of his arrest. He was asked by the prisoner, if his brother was taken? and Captain Armstrong answered: "I do not know." The unfortunate young man then asked him, if his papers had been seized? Captain Armstrong replied: "I do not know." John Sheares then said, he hoped not, for there was one paper among them that "would commit him" (John Sheares.) The latter words were deserving of more attention on the trial, than, unfortunately for his brother, was paid to them; for it plainly showed the paper to have been in his possession, and not his brother's; and his own impression to have been, that he, John Sheares, only could be injured by its discovery.

His opening his mind at all on the subject, proves that when he made these inquiries, he had no suspicion that he had been betrayed by Armstrong.

The same strong delusion continued to screen Reynolds' treachery from the generous mind of Lord Edward Fitzgerald. He continued to receive the visits of the informer, after the arrest of his associates, and his poor lady was not even exempt from the infliction of his presence. This mode of recreating his feelings, for these visits were not essential to the objects of his employers, was a customary indulgence.

Before the trial of the Sheares came on, Mr. Wolfe was raised to the Bench by the title of Lord Kilwarden; and Mr. Toler, as a much fitter instrument for the purposes of the government, was made Attorney-general. It is not, amidst conflicting statements, easy to determine with what degree of fairness the trial was conducted; but, so far as the witnesses were concerned, there was certainly no scrupulosity on any side, either about the forms or the substance of justice. It is believed that, had Henry Sheares not requested to be tried along with his brother John, he might, though the successful rival of the vindictive Chancellor, have escaped with a more lenient punishment.

In the interval previous to the trial, the zealous Captain Armstrong was employed in hunting rebels, then a favourite pastime with the loyal; and on the trial of the Sheares, Curran, who was their counsel, elicited from him the following reply, concerning three inoffensive peasants whom Armstrong had tortured or murdered at this time.

He said, with respect to the three countrymen they had taken, "One was to be hanged, another was to be flogged. We were going up Blackmore Hill, under Sir James Duff; there was a party of rebels there; we met three men with green cockades. One we shot, another we hanged, and the third we flogged and made a guide of."

Mr. Curran asked the witness, "Which did you make the guide of?" Captain Armstrong jocularly replied, "The one that was neither shot nor hanged."

Lieut. Shervington of the 41st regiment, deposed that "he was nephew, by marriage, of Captain Armstrong, and had known him since his childhood. When in Lord Cork's regiment in England, had conversations with him. Did not think his principles exactly such as a military man's should be. Had a conversation with him at his agent's, Mr. Mulholland; talked of various things, the French Revolution, and he said he did not wish for kingly government. He said, that if there was not another executioner in the kingdom for George III. but himself, he would be one, and pique himself upon being so. I told him he was a d——d fellow and ought to give up his commission, and leave the army, and go over to France." He had met him at Byrne's, the bookseller's, in Grafton Street; he handed him a book, saying "Read this, it is my creed;" he (the witness) found it was Paine's "Rights of Man," he thrust it into the fire, and said, he (Captain Armstrong) should be served so." The witness further deposed, that he did not know the Messrs. Sheares, and never had seen them until that day. That he would not have come forward to give evidence on this trial, but had been summoned, "and would not have appeared for 100 guineas." That on meeting with Captain Clibborn, he had said, "he was sorry to hear that John Armstrong was finding out the secrets of men, in order to discover them, and being told it was a different thing, that the Sheares wanted to seduce the soldiers, he had said, 'D——n him, he should have run them through the body.'"

Soldiers, it would seem, may have different ways of considering such points. On the trial, Captain Armstrong was proved to be an avowed Atheist, and an unbeliever in a future state; yet, on his testimony, confirmed by that of the Captain Clibborn, to whom he made his diurnal reports, and the documentary evidence, a conviction was obtained. Captain Clibborn received £500 for his services on this occasion, and Armstrong had certainly worked for much more. By the law of Ireland at that period, (a very convenient law for that country,) a single witness was enough to convict a man of treason. From the testimony borne against both Reynolds and Armstrong, by their own relatives and friends, neither would, in England, have been believed on their oath.

Some deeply affecting letters, written by John Sheares to his relatives, while he lay under sentence of death, appear in these volumes. Great and generous efforts were made to obtain the pardon of the Sheares, but all proved unavailing. When Lord Cornwallis gave way, Lord Clare was at hand to inform the new viceroy, that if an example was not made, loyal men could have no confidence in him; an argument still occasionally used in Ireland in subduing liberal Lords-lieutenant to obnoxious measures. Of John Sheares, after his trial, we are told—

The only friend he saw after conviction, besides one of his counsel, was Dr. Dobbin, a clergyman of great worth, who had been his tutor at one time in college. He wrote three letters—to his mother, his sister, and one other person. He seemed indifferent to his own fate, but agonised at that of his brother. His speech in court, between conviction and sentence, expressed his real feelings. Lord Carleton, who was the judge on the trial, had been the particular friend of the father of the Sheares. Previous to passing sentence, he made a pathetic address, in which he mentioned the regard and respect he had ever felt for both parents. His cousin, the late Oliver Carleton, told me that, on his return home, after having passed sentence, he wept, and was obliged to go to bed."

The sister of the Messrs. Fleming, the friends and relatives of the Sheares, to whom I have already referred, as having given me many particulars respecting the brothers, has communicated the following circumstance of most mournful interest.

"The Earl of Shannon was a relative and intimate friend of old Mrs. Sheares, and the day of her son's execution, of which she was then ignorant, his lordship went to see her: a most melancholy scene, as may be supposed, occurred between them. She threw herself on her knees to implore his mediation for her younger son, at the time not knowing that her son Henry was implicated, or had been imprisoned, having been told that he had been advised to keep out of the way for some time, and was actually expecting him home that evening. The earl left the house, not being able to tell her they had been both executed that morning."

A more minute account of the survivors of the Sheares is given than was required to elucidate their connexion with the political disturbances of their country; and a copious Appendix is filled with documents connected with the Societies of United Irishmen. It is worthy of notice, that in the scheme for equal representation, prepared for the consideration of the United Irishmen, that though the suffrage was proposed to be universal, parliaments annual, and members paid for their services, the ballot was expressly prohibited.

The Appendix gives an account of the private life, "the birth and parentage," of Major Sirr, who died only last year, and who now lies buried very near his mangled victim, Lord Edward Fitzgerald; of Dr. Duigenan, who boasted that his obscure origin was like that of the Nile; and of many other worthies of the period. One of these, the account of Hepenstal, alias the Walking-gallows, is recommended by its brevity, and by the illustration which it affords of the ferocious loyalty of the "loyal." Hepenstal was, at the breaking out of the troubles, a lieutenant in the Wicklow militia. He was, we are informed—

A native of the county Wicklow, had been educated at the school of a pious Catholic priest, in Clarendon Street, Dublin, of the name of Gallagher, his mother being of the Catholic religion. He was brought up to the business of an apothecary, but, in 1795, renounced the pestle for the sword—and halter. Being a man of Herculean stature, he made a gallows of his person, and literally hung numbers of persons over his shoulder. The first inhuman exploit of this kind performed by him, was at Mysores, in the county Westmeath, in 1796, where he entered the cabin of a poor man of the name of Smith, arrested the old man and his two sons, and put the latter to death; one of them having been strangled by suspension over the shoulder of this monster.

At the trial of Hyland, in September 1797, at the Athy assizes, under the White-boy Act, Hepenstal being examined touching the mode of procuring evidence from the witness against the prisoner, said on examination, "He had used some threats, and pricked him with a bayonet;" and when cross-examined by Mr. M'Nally, said, "this prisoner had also been pricked with a bayonet, to induce him to confess: a rope had been put about his neck, which was thrown over his (Hepenstal's) shoulder, he then pulled the rope, and drew the prisoner up, and he was hung in this way for a short time, but continued sulky, and confessed nothing:" whereupon Mr. M'Nally said, "Then you acted the executioner, and played the part of a gallows?" "Yes, please your honour;" was the reply of Lieutenant Hepenstal.

The Solicitor-general, Mr. Toler, who tried the case, in his charge to the jury, regretted the treatment of the prisoner, "but it was an error such as a young and gallant officer might fall into, warmed by resentment." Sir Jonah Barrington was one of the counsel for the crown. The prisoner was found guilty.

The memory of this infamous man has received its deserts at the hands of a clerical gentleman of the name of Barrett, in the form of an epitaph.

"Here lie the bones of Hepenstal, Judge, jury, gallows, rope, and all."

The notorious Major Sirr was the son of an officer in the army, and had been a kind of wine-merchant in Dublin, when he took up the more lucrative employment of acting for the Government in the following capacity:—

His services chiefly consisted in organizing and maintaining a band of wretches, who were employed at the assizes throughout the country, but especially in the vicinity of Dublin—as informers. They were known to the people by the name of the "Battalion of Testimony."

It is said on high authority that the employment of spies and informers tends rather to the increase than the repression of crime, and that a good government has no need of their infamous services. One thing is certain, that their services were thought useful to a bad government; and the same circumstance that rendered their services necessary, made their infamy a matter of little moment to their employers. From the year 1796 to 1800, a set of miscreants, steeped in crime, sunk in debauchery, prone to violence, and reckless of character, constituted what was called "The Major's People." A number of these wretches were domiciled within the gates of the Castle, where there were regular places of entertainment allotted for them, contiguous to the viceroy's palace; for another company of them, a house was allotted opposite Kilmainham gaol, familiarly known to the people by the name of the "Stag House;" and for one batch of them who could not be trusted with liberty, there was one of the yards of that prison and the surrounding cells assigned to them; which is still called the "Stag Yard." These persons were considered under the immediate protection of Majors Sirr, Swan, and Sandys; and to interfere with them in the course of their duties as spies or witnesses, was to incur the vengeance of their redoubtable patrons.

When the country was broken down sufficiently in strength and spirit to effect the Union, these men were turned adrift on society. A great many of them took to desperate courses, and acting under the dominion of violent passions, they came to violent ends. The common people ascribed, and to this day continue to ascribe, their sudden and unprovided deaths to the divine retribution. The common expression is, "The judgment of God fell on them." Perhaps it would be more consonant to a widely extended knowledge of the action of those general laws of nature which govern humanity, to regard the violent deaths of unjust and cruel men, as the natural consequence of violent courses, and the aggregate of such awful examples as an evidence of the action of that law of nature, in its extended application, which visits even in this world, signal violations of it with a general rather than a particular retribution. Some of the men I speak of, expiated their subsequent crimes on the gallows; others were transported; several committed suicide: many of them, however, whose guilt was of as deep a die as that of Crawley's or O'Brien's, were men who could not say like these unfortunate persons when the times of public commotion were at an end—they had not the means to live—but their superiors in rank, fortune, and education, their employers and accomplices, who superintended their performances in the witness-box and at the triangles, who witnessed and directed their infliction of the tortures of the pitch-cap and the taws, still lived without reproach, but it could not be without remorse. And charity would hope that the time that was given them, was afforded for repentance!

The extent to which the organized system of espionage was carried in those days seems almost incredible. Items extracted from an account of secret service money, most of which passed either through the fingers of Mr. Cooke, Lord Castlereagh's secretary, or of Major Sirr, and was expended on spies and the Battalion of Testimony, amounted, from the 30th September, 1801, to the 28th March, 1804, to no less than £53,547, 13s. 1d. A good deal of this expenditure is for the board, lodging, washing, and clothes of the "Major's people." Some of these items are curious enough. M'Gucken, the treacherous agent of the United Irishmen of the North, comes on pretty well; but Reynolds is the only man gorged with gold. It is not easy to comprehend the precise nature of all the services so liberally rewarded. Sometimes we find Catholic priests receiving the secret-service money, and in considerable sums. It must, however, be confessed, that all the faults of that dreadful time did not lie on the side of the Government. In a paper named the Union Star, published at Belfast, which was the organ of the United Irishmen, assassination was openly advocated, and the persons to be got rid of denounced in terms as atrocious as ever were employed in the Jacobin clubs of Paris, or by the Mountain, during the Reign of Terror. From a complete copy of one number of this atrocious print, which seems to have appeared only at intervals, we select the following extract, which will sufficiently display the ferocious and vindictive spirit of the period.

The Star will be published occasionally, as new and notorious characters appear, which the committee may think proper to guard the Society of United Irishmen against.

The Star offers to Public Justice the following detestable traitors as perjured spies and informers :—

" Perhaps some arm, more lucky than the rest, may reach his heart, and free the world from bondage."

William J——s, about six feet high, corpulent, lives in William Street, better known by the name of Alderman Level-low, from some horrid murders he committed in Meath Street, under the name of laws, which are constructed to leave the lives and properties of Irishmen to the mercy of ignorant and abandoned magistrates. This nefarious upstart, in answer to a club of wretches calling themselves Aldermen of Skinners' Alley, boasts of a Constitution and Protestant ascendancy, secured by the blood and treasure of his forefathers. 'Tis notorious his forefathers were a long line of bricklayers' labourers. Though not at the battle of the Boyne or Aughrim, yet we acknowledge his grandfather died about that period, though he did not bleed, as his valuable life was squeezed out under the gallows for sheep-stealing. The Constitution and Protestant faith were rather ungrateful to the alderman and his cousin Nat, for the blood and treasures of the family so gloriously spent, by suffering those illustrious young gentlemen to begin a mercantile life, as root merchants, in a cellar in Bride Street, where our alderman often displayed his loyalty every returning 4th of November, or July the 1st, by ornamenting his vegetable merchandise with a well-placed orange lily. Thence we see the partners emerge from the subterranean apartment, to manage the nagin in the whisky-shop, which forwarded him rapidly to satisfy his devotion at the shrine of the Orangemen in College Green, when municipal wisdom made our hero lord mayor.

William B——w, sovereign of Belfast, by trade a minister of the Church of England. This infernal mountebank unites the cruelty of an Inquisition to all the chicanery of a vicious priest, under the patronage of what is called the Head of the Church, to whom he looks for rewards for committing every atrocity that ever English villany promoted ; why cross to the continent for a history of king-craft and priest-craft ; every crime that either is accused of, is united in this gospel magistrate and his English master.

Chichester S——n, high Sheriff of the county of A—— : This villain inherits all the vices of tyranny, as a descendant of the first English robbers and invaders; if assassination was heretofore unknown, his treatment and Bristow's of Mr. Orr, would awaken the necessary invention.

L——ll, an infamous name, which his father got hidden and disguised under the name of C——n. This nefarious tyrant, among the crimes that a military government empowers him to commit, has had several men committed to gaol on charges of treason, that he might have an opportunity of obliging their wives to earn a promise of the unfortunate men's enlargement by submitting to him; thus, the stories of Rhaynfault, and other monsters in power, of the dark and barbarous ages, are realized in unfortunate Ireland, and is named the mildness of administration. This villain is remarkable ill-looking, about five feet five inches high, black complexion, wears a uniform, and his hair in queue.

Stephen Sparks, master of the Charter School, Castle Carberry, and Michael Sparks, his brother, and Gilbert Walker, his brother-in-law ; the two latter were rewarded by Luttrell with commissions, for their alacrity as spies and house-burners.

Benjamin Armstrong, alias Benjamin Bung the gauger—43 years of age, large red features, hooked nose, lives at Ervey, near King's Court, county Cavan.

—— Fairbrother, about five feet three inches high, ruddy complexion ; a clothier, in Tenter's Lane, in the Liberty ; one of Corbally's jury.

—— Pettigrew, five feet six inches high, black complexion, thirty-three years of age ; lives in Linen Hall Street ; a sergeant in Dick's company—a juryman of young Hart's.

—— Robertson, five feet ten inches high, a black-looking fellow ; and car-pilot on the Custom House quay.

Hautenville, five feet eight inches high, sixty years of age ; collects for the pipe-water office ; formerly kept a huxter's shop in Mary's Lane.

—— Rice, silversmith in Capel Street, an infamous rascal, and gambler, known by the name of Count Brilliant.

Bartholomew Cannan, about five feet eight inches high, compass-knee'd ; keeps a public-house in William Street, corner of Castle market ; is a notorious spy.

These may serve as a specimen ; but other individuals are denounced in the same style ; and then their murder, or Lynching, is coolly recommended in this easy strain :—

We are constantly witnessing the impudent affectation of cowardly moderation, acting in partnership with tyranny, against the Union Star, which they accuse of inculcating principles of assassination.

We certainly do not advise, though we do not decry assassination, as we conceive it to be the only mode at present within the reach of Irishmen, to bring to justice the royal agents, who are constantly exercising rapes, murders, and burnings, through our devoted country.

We appeal to thy noble and venerated name, O Brutus ! who bravely assassinated the tyrant of your country amidst his cohorts, and in the presence of his pensioned senate ; it is not our solitary suffrage that has attempted to honour thy name and worship thy spirit. The patriot, the sage, and the hero, in every honourable state of life, for eighteen centuries, have given thy name the first and most unequivocal recommendation to the admiring earth, as one that deserves the highest rank amongst the benefactors of the human race.

Yes ! Prince of Patriot Assassins, thy noble and virtuous spirit should pervade our land ; the infant whom a British, or a British-Irish, butcher has left fatherless, should be taught, through his progress to manhood, that thy example should be rigidly imitated, as an honest duty to his parents and his country. The Irish seaman, maimed in the service of his country's tyrant, whose banners he often led to victory—perhaps at the same moment when his aged mother lived to see her daughter violated by a horrid soldiery, who had mingled the ashes of her husband with those of their humble habitation,—in such a son, assassination would be a holy duty, commanded by nature and approved of by Heaven.

Is it wonderful, that in a country where such atrocious doctrines were publicly inculcated only forty years since, that human life is still held of small value, and party murders considered no crime? One would be glad to find relief in imputing the above horrible suggestions to the license permitted to spies; but truth forbids the charitable assumption. They were the genuine effusions of what was then considered the liberal spirit.

Upon the whole, there is nothing in this history of Irish espionage to encourage the Irish Executive to repeat the experiment; nor in that of the Societies of United Irishmen to tempt any sane man to depart from that open course of steady but peaceful and continued effort, which has already accomplished so much, and which is equal to every desirable end.

MOFFAT'S MISSIONARY LABOURS AND SCENES IN SOUTHERN AFRICA.

(Concluded from our August No.)

We left our intrepid missionary making his way to the court of the renowned African sovereign, Moselekatse, the king of the warlike Matabeles, "The Great King of Heaven," "The Elephant," "The Lion's-paw." Moffat was the first white man who had ever penetrated so far in this direction. It will be remembered that he came hither with the ambassadors whom Moselekatse had sent to the mission station to examine and report on the wonders to be seen there; and with other secret diplomatic objects which were not avowed. In his reception of the white man, the representative of the powerful race of whom so many fables were told—this barbarous sovereign, the Napoleon of the desert, endeavoured to impress him with a due sense of his own power and dignity. As this is the most important of the native tribes whom Mr. Moffat visited, and equal in interest to any of the relations given by Park or Clapperton, we must present the "Lion's Paw" with some ceremony.

He came up to us, and having been instructed in our mode of salutation, gave each a clumsy but hearty shake of the hand. He then politely turned to the food, which was placed at our feet, and invited us to partake. By this time the wagons were seen in the distance, and having intimated our wish to be directed to a place where we might encamp in the outskirts of the town, he accompanied us, keeping fast hold of my right arm, though not in the most graceful manner, yet with perfect familiarity. "The land is before you; you are come to your son. You must sleep where you please." When the "moving houses," as the wagons were called, drew near, he took a firmer grasp of my arm, and looked on them with unutterable surprise; and this man, the terror of thousands, drew back with fear, as one in doubt as to whether they were not living creatures. When the oxen were unyoked, he approached the wagon with the utmost caution, still holding me by one hand, and placing the other on his mouth, indicating his surprise. He looked at them very intently, particularly the wheels, and when told of how many pieces of wood each wheel was composed, his wonder was increased. After examining all very closely, one mystery yet remained,—how the large band of iron surrounding the felloes of the wheel came to be in one piece without either end or joint. 'Umbate, my friend and fellow-traveller, whose visit to our station had made him much wiser than his master, took hold of my right hand, and related what he had seen. "My eyes," he said, "saw that very hand," pointing to mine, "cut these bars of iron, take a piece off one end, and then join them as you now see them." A minute inspection ensued to discover the welded part. "Does he give medicine to the iron?" was the monarch's inquiry. "No," said 'Umbate, "nothing is used but fire, a hammer and a chisel." Moselekatse then returned to the town, where the warriors were still standing as he left them, who received him with immense bursts of applause.

Some thousands of the Matabele, composing several regiments, are distinguished by the colour of their shields, as well as the kind and profusion of feathers which generally adorn their heads, having also a long feather of the blue crane rising from their brows, all which has an imposing effect at their onset. Their arms consist of a shield, short spear, and club. The club, often made of the horn of a rhinoceros or hard wood, they throw with unerring precision, so as even to strike dead the smaller antelope. . . . . Moselekatse did not fail to supply us abundantly with meat, milk, and a weak kind of beer, made from the native grain. He appeared anxious to please, and to exhibit himself and people to the best advantage. In accordance with savage notions of conferring honour, all the inhabitants and warriors of the neighbouring towns were ordered to congregate at head-quarters, and on the following day a public ball was given in compliment to the strangers. A smooth plain adjoining the town was selected for the purpose, where Moselekatse took his stand in the centre of an immense circle of his soldiers, numbers of women being present, who with their shrill voices and clapping of hands took part in the concert. About thirty ladies from his harem with long white wands marched to the song backward and forward on the outside of the ranks, their well lubricated shining bodies being too weighty for the agile movements which characterized the matrons and damsels of lower rank. They sang their war songs, and one composed on occasion of the visit of the strangers, gazing on and adoring with trembling fear and admiration the potentate in the centre, who stood and sometimes regulated the motions of thousands by the movement of his head, or the raising or depression of his hand. He then sat down on his shield of lion's skin, and asked me if it was not fine, and if we had such things in my country. . . . . Whenever he arose or sat down, all within sight hailed him with a shout, Baaite! or Aaite! followed by a number of his high sounding titles, such as Great King, King of heaven, the Elephant, &c.

The farther account of the court and the nobles of "the great king" is full of interest. The history of an officer of the king's, degraded for some crime, but who was saved from death by the intercession of the missionary, shows that the proud, conventional sense of honour, the feelings "of chivalry," may glow as intensely in the sable breast of a barbarian in South Africa, as in the heart of a descendant of the highest Norman nobility. The sable warrior disdained the poor boon of life if deprived of his rank and privileges, and the badges of his honours; and rejected the commutation of his sentence which, to the astonishment of the other nobles, the missionary had obtained.

The sentence passed, the pardoned man was expected to bow in grateful adoration to him whom he was wont to look upon, and exalt in songs applicable only to One, to whom belongs universal sway and the destinies of man. But, no! holding his hands clasped on his bosom, he replied, "O king, afflict not my heart! I have merited thy displeasure; let me be slain like the warrior; I cannot live with the poor." And, raising his hand to the ring he wore on his brow, he continued; "How can I live among the dogs of the king, and disgrace these badges of honour which I won among the spears and shields of the mighty? No, I cannot live! Let me die, O Pezoolu!" His request was granted, and his hands tied erect over his head. Now, my exertions to save his life were vain. He disdained the boon on the conditions offered, preferring to die with the honours he had won at the point of the spear—honours which even the act that condemned him did not tarnish—to exile and poverty, among the children of the desert. He was led forth, a man walking on each side. My eye followed him till he reached the top of a precipice, over which he was precipitated into the deep pool of the river beneath, where the crocodiles, accustomed to such meals, were yawning to devour him ere he could reach the bottom! This was a sabbath morning scene, such as heathenism exhibits to the view of the Christian philanthropist; and such as is calculated to excite in his bosom feelings of the deepest sympathy. This magnanimous heathen knew of no hereafter. He was without God and without hope. But, however deplorable the state of such a person may be, he will not be condemned as equally guilty with those who, in the midst of light and knowledge, self-separated from the body, recklessly rush into the presence of their Maker and their Judge. . . . . .

Moselekatse's conduct in this affair produced a strange impression among his people, some of whom regarded me as an extraordinary being, who could thus influence one more terrible to them than the fiercest lion of the forest. His government, so far as I could discover, was the very essence of despotism. The persons of the people, as well as their possessions, were the property of their monarch. . . . . Although his tyranny was such, that one would have supposed his subjects would execrate his name, they were the most servile devotees of their master. Wherever he was seated, or wherever he slept, a number of sycophants, fantastically dressed, attended him, whose business was to march, jump, and dance about, sometimes standing adoring his person, then manœuvring with a stick, and vociferating the mighty deeds of valour performed by himself and Machobane. The same things are repeated again and again, often with a rapidity of articulation which baffles the understanding of their own countrymen. After listening many times, I was able, with the assistance of one of these parasites, to pick up the following expressions:—"O Pezoolu, the king of kings, king of the heavens, who would not fear before the son of Machobane, mighty in battle! Where are the mighty before the presence of our great king? Where is the strength of the forest before the great elephant? The proboscis is breaking the branches of the forest! It is the sound of the shields of the son of Machobane. He breathes upon their faces; it is the fire among the dry grass! His enemies are consumed before him, king of kings! Father of fire, he ascends to the blue heavens; he sends his lightnings into the clouds, and makes the rain to descend! Ye mountains, woods, and grassy plains, hearken to the voice of the son of Machobane, king of heaven!" This is a specimen of the sounding titles which incessantly meet the ear of this proud mortal, and are sufficient to make the haughty monarch believe that he is what the terror of the name of Dingaan convinced him he was not; for, notwithstanding all his vain boasts, he could not conceal his fears of the successor of the bloody Chaka, against whose iron sway he had rebelled.

Monarchy was seen here in its highest perfection. The character of the monarch, the Napoleon, or the Nicholas of Africa, is of itself a study. We can only give a faint indication of his previous career, which is described at great length.

Though but a follower in the footsteps of Chaka, the career of Moselekatse, from the period of his revolt till the time I saw him, and long after, formed an interminable catalogue of crimes. Scarcely a mountain, over extensive regions, but bore the marks of his deadly ire. His experience and native cunning enabled him to triumph over the minds of his men, and made his trembling captives soon adore him as an invincible sovereign. Those who resisted, and would not stoop to be his dogs, he butchered. He trained the captured youth in his own tactics, so that the majority of his army were foreigners; but his chiefs and nobles gloried in their descent from the Zoolu dynasty. He had carried his arms far into the tropics, where, however, he had more than once met with his equal; and on one occasion, of six hundred warriors, only a handful returned to be sacrificed, merely because they had not conquered, or fallen with their companions. . . . . In his person he was below the middle stature, rather corpulent, with a short neck, and in his manner could be exceedingly affable and cheerful. His voice, soft and effeminate, did not indicate that his disposition was passionate; and, happily for his people, it was not so, or many would have been butchered in the ebullitions of his anger.

The above is but a faint description of this Napoleon of the desert,—a man with whom I often conversed, and who was not wanting in consideration and kindness, as well as gratitude. But to sympathy and compassion his heart appeared a stranger. The following incident, for a day or two, threw a mystery over my character which he could not understand, though it was only an illustration of the principles I laboured to implant in his heart, apparently impervious to any tender emotion which had not self for its object.

The affecting incident which afforded the missionary an opportunity to display what are Christian feelings and principles, tended, with many other circumstances, to excite Mokhatla's curiosity, is too long for us. The missionary was to him a completely new specimen of humanity, and consequently a mystery, whose motives of action were incomprehensible. Mr. Moffat says—

He asked me if I could make rain. I referred him to the Governor of the universe, who alone could give rain and fruitful seasons. 'Umbate was more than once called to bear his testimony as to our operations and manner of living at the Kuruman. Our leaving our own country for the sake of the natives, obedient to the will of the invisible Being whose character I described, was to him a bewildering fact; for he did not appear to doubt my word; and how we could act independently of our sovereign, or without being his emissaries, he could not understand: but his greatest puzzle was, that I had not seen my king, and could not describe his riches, by the numbers of his flocks and herds. I tried to explain to him the character of the British government, the extent of our commerce, and the good our nation was doing in sending the Gospel of peace and salvation to the nations which know not God; and told him also, that our king too had his instructors to teach him to serve that God, who alone was "King of kings, and King of the heavens." "Is your king like me?" he asked. I was sorry I could not give him a satisfactory reply. When I described the blessed effects of peace, the populousness of my own country, the industry of the people, the number of sheep and cattle daily slaughtered in the great towns, the reigning passion again burst forth in the exclamation, "Your nation must be terrible in battle; you must tell your king I wish to live in peace."

The day after this conversation he came to me, attended by a party of his warriors, who remained at a short distance from us, dancing and singing. Their yells and shouts, their fantastic leaps, and distorted gestures, would have impressed a stranger with the idea that they were more like a company of fiends than men. Addressing me, he said, "I am a king, but you are Machobane,* and I am come to sit at your feet for instruction." This was seasonable; for my mind had just been occupied in contemplating the miseries of the savage state. I spoke much on man's ruin, and man's redemption. "Why," he asked, "are you so earnest that I abandon all war, and not kill men?" "Look on the human bones which lie scattered over your dominions," was my reply. "They speak in awful language, and to me they say, 'Whosoever sheddeth man's blood, by man also will his blood be shed.'" This was fearful language in the ears of such a murderer. "You say," he added, "that the dead will rise again." My remarks on this subject were startling in the ears of a savage, and he interrupted by hastily assuring me that he would not go to war. While we were yet speaking, a body of Mackaha soldiers advanced, and bowed behind their shields at a distance, to wait his awful nod. The Entoto (married man) their leader, then addressed him in language and attitude the most suppliant. The burden of the petition was, "Permit us, O king of heavens, to obtain new shields:" in other words, "Allow us to go and attack some distant town, to acquire new spoils and fresh glory." This was an inauspicious moment for these ambitious men. Turning to me, the monarch said, "You see it is my people who wish to make war," and instantly dismissed them from his presence.

As he was rather profuse in his honorary titles, especially in calling me a king, I requested him rather to call me teacher, or anything but a king. "Then," he said, "shall I call you my father?" "Yes," I rejoined, "but only on condition that you be an obedient son." This drew from him and his nobles a hearty laugh. When I recommended a system which would secure not only safety, but plenty to his people, without the unnatural one of keeping up a force of many thousands of unmarried warriors, he tried to convince me that his people were happy; and to a stranger they might appear so, for, alas! they dared not let any murmur reach his ear; but I knew more than he was aware of. I knew many a couch was steeped with silent tears, and many an acre stained with human blood. About ten minutes after the conversation, a lovely boy, the son of one of his many wives, sat smiling on my knee, caressing me as if I were his own father. As some of the king's harem were seated near, I asked the boy which was his mother. He shook his little head and sighed. I asked no more, but learned soon after that the mother, who was the daughter of a captive chief, was a superior woman, and took the liberty of remonstrating with her lord on the multitude of his concubines. One morning she was dragged out of her house, and her head severed from her body.

The happiness of the king and his subjects appeared to be entirely derived from their success in war, and the reward of a wife was a stimulus to his men to multiply their victims. Days of feasting were held, when they glutted themselves with flesh. The bloody bowl was the portion of those who could count the tens they had slain in the day of battle.

The parting scene of the missionary and this barbarous monarch is characteristic.—

Having resolved on returning, Moselekatse accompanied me in my wagon a long day's journey to one of his principal towns. He soon became accustomed to the jolting of an African wagon, and found it convenient to lay his well lubricated body down on my bed, to take a nap. On awaking he invited me to lie down beside him; but I begged to be excused, preferring to enjoy the scenery around me. Two more days we spent together, during which I renewed my entreaties that he would abstain from war, promising that one day he should be favoured with missionaries, which he professed to desire. Having obtained from me my telescope, for the purpose, he said, of seeing on the other side of the mountains if Dingaan, the king of the Zoolus, whom he justly dreaded, was approaching, I bade him farewell, with scarcely a hope that the Gospel could be successful among the Matabele, until there should be a revolution in the government of a monarch, who demanded that homage which pertains to God alone. . . . . To my solemn exhortations he only replied, "Pray to your God to keep me from the power of Dingaan."

Mr. Moffat made a subsequent visit to this monarch, who had in the interval been constantly engaged in wars, and has since been driven from his conquests. Before he fled, the influence and admonitions of Moffat had this good effect.—

Overwhelmed by such superior and unexpected forces, he fled to the north; and it merits notice, that before his departure he allowed all the captive Bahurutsi, Bakhatla, and other neighbouring tribes, to return to their own land. This was a measure which astonished the natives, who have since congregated on the ancient domains of their forefathers; and if no foreign power again drive them from their native glens, they will ere long become the interesting objects of missionary labour.

By this time the tide had fairly turned in favour of the missionaries among the people amidst whom Mr. Moffat was stationed. The progress of evangelizing and civilizing, slow in the beginning, became rapid. The country, which had suffered from several successive years of great drought, had, in the season after he returned from visiting the Matabele, been blessed with plenteous fertilizing rains, and the fields and gardens teemed with a plenty which had been unknown for years. The native settlers began to cultivate the new sorts of grain and vegetables presented to them by the missionaries, and to plant fruit-trees; and all was cheerfulness and good-humour. The new converts among the natives soon became eminently useful in spreading knowledge and the love of improvement. Many were learning to read their native language; and Mr. Moffat had translated the Gospel of St. Luke, and Dr. Brown's Scripture Texts. A neat chapel, a school-house, dwellings for the missionaries, and workshops, had been substantially built by the voluntary assistance of the natives; and the important improvement of irrigation had been attended to: the natives, seeing the uses of watercourses, imitated what they saw, and gradually adopted those barrows, ploughs, harrows, spades and mattocks, which they had formerly ridiculed and despised, as innovations on the wisdom of their ancestors. Great progress was made at the station during the year in which Mr. Moffat was at Cape Town getting his translations printed, and acquiring a knowledge of the art of printing, which, together with that of the blacksmith, the mason, the carpenter, &c., was now brought to the station. A small hymn-book was first printed there. We are told—

Among the treasures brought with us from the colony, was a box of materials for clothing, for the encouragement of such as were making efforts to clothe themselves. This was the first supply of the kind, and nothing could be more seasonable to a people just beginning to emerge from barbarism, the impoverished remains of scattered tribes, but the first-fruits of the Gospel among the Bechuanas. The needy were supplied, and many a heart was made glad.

Mr. Moffat contends that "evangelization must precede civilisation." Among his converts they seem to have gone hand in hand. It was either made a condition or was a decent custom observed, that those who were baptized should previously procure decent clothing. How much of happy change to a whole people is comprehended in the following passage.

Hitherto a sewing school had been uncalled for, the women's work being that of building houses, raising fences and cultivating the ground, while the lords of the creation, for their own convenience and comfort, had from time immemorial added to their pursuits the exercise of sewing their garments, which, from their durability and scanty supply, was anything but a laborious work. It was a novel sight to observe women and young girls handling the little bright instrument, which was scarcely perceptible to the touch of fingers accustomed to grasp the handle of a pickaxe, or to employ them to supply the absence of trowels. But they were willing, and Mrs. M., in order to encourage them, engaged to meet them as often as her strength would permit. She had soon a motley group of pupils, very few of the whole party, possessing either a frock or gown. The scarcity of materials was a serious impediment to progress; and living as we did far beyond the reach of traders, and six hundred miles from a market town, it was next to impossible to obtain them, at least just when wanted. The same Gospel which had taght them that they were spiritually miserable, blind, and naked, discovered to them also that they needed reform externally, and thus prepared their minds to adopt those modes of comfort, cleanliness, and convenience which they had been accustomed to view only as the peculiarities of a strange people. Thus, by the slow but certain progress of Gospel principles, whole families became clothed and in their right mind. Ornaments which were formerly in high repute, as adorning, but more frequently disfiguring their persons, were now turned into bullion to purchase skins of animals, which being prepared almost as soft as cloth, were made into jackets, trowsers, and gowns. When opportunity was afforded by the visit of a trader, British manufactures were eagerly purchased.

For a long period, when a man was seen to make a pair of trowsers for himself, or a woman a gown, it was a sure intimation that we might expect additions to our inquirers; abandoning the custom of painting the body, and beginning to wash with water, was with them what cutting off the hair was among the South Sea islanders, a public renunciation of heathenism.

The garments were, and probably still are, awkward, grotesque, and incongruous enough, according to European ideas; but what an advance from the grease and ochre besmeared persons and filthy customs of former times!

Our congregation now became a variegated mass, including all descriptions, from the lubricated wild man of the desert, to the clean, comfortable, and well-dressed believer. The same spirit diffused itself through all the routine of household economy. Formerly a chest, a chair, a candle, or a table, were things unknown, and supposed to be only the superfluous accompaniments of beings of another order. Although they never disputed the superiority of our attainments in being able to manufacture these superfluities, they would however question our common sense in taking so much trouble about them. They thought us particularly extravagant in burning fat in the form of candles, instead of rubbing it on our bodies, or depositing it in our stomachs.

A bunch of home-made candles hanging from the wall of a hut was now often to be seen; and afforded the missionary more gratification than the most charming picture; as an indication that instead of moping over the embers, unable to see what they were eating, or each other, the inmates could now read, work, and converse by the steady light of a candle. "We have been like the beasts," the poor Bechuanas would now exclaim; "what shall we do to be saved?"

The lovers of Natural History, and juvenile readers, will find much to gratify their tastes in this volume, which abounds in anecdotes of lions, elephants, baboons, hyenas, buffaloes, &c.; and of the dangers incurred in numerous encounters with them, while the missionary was travelling through the arid deserts. The perils and adventures of Mr. Catlin among the Red Indians, and the buffaloes and bisons of the "Far, far west," are not nearly so stirring as those of the missionary Moffat, in the wilds of Africa, while bivouacking, or seeking food for himself and his attendants in the chase. And he appears to have handled a rifle quite as bravely and as skillfully as a text. One night, when sorely in want of "a collop," he went with two of his company, to watch at a place where wild cattle were likely to come to drink, resolving to shoot whatever first appeared, rather than be, next day, exposed to the burning sun, on an arid plain, in hunting for food. The hunters lay in a hollow place, close by the fountain.

It was half moonlight, and rather cold, though the days were warm. We remained for a couple of hours, waiting with great anxiety for something to appear. We at length heard a loud lapping at the water, under the dark shadowy bank, within twenty yards of us. "What is that!" I asked Bogachu. "Ririmala," (be silent,) he said; "there are lions, they will hear us." A hint was more than enough; and thankful were we, that, when they had drunk, they did not come over the smooth grassy surface in our direction. Our next visiters were two buffalos, one immensely large. My wagon-driver, Mosi, who also had a gun, seeing them coming directly towards us, begged me to fire. I refused, having more dread of a wounded buffalo than of almost any other animal. He fired; and though the animal was severely wounded, he stood like a statue with his companion, within a hundred yards of us, for more than an hour, waiting to see us move, in order to attack us. We lay in an awkward position for that time, scarcely daring to whisper; and when he at last retired we were so stiff with cold, that flight would have been impossible had an attack been made. We then moved about till our blood began to circulate. Our next visiters were two giraffes; one of these we wounded. A troop of quaggas next came; but the successful instinct of the principal stallion, in surveying the precincts of the water, galloping round in all directions to catch any strange scent, and returning to the troop with a whistling noise, to announce danger, set them off at full speed. The next was a huge rhinoceros, which, receiving a mortal wound, departed. Hearing the approach of more lions, we judged it best to leave; and after a lonely walk of four miles through bushes, hyenas and jackals, we reached the village, when I felt thankful, resolving never to hunt by night at a water-pool, till I could find nothing to eat elsewhere. Next day the rhinoceros and buffalo were found, which afforded a plentiful supply.

The thrilling adventures of Mr. Moffat, and other travellers in Africa, throw the feats of our lion-tamers of the theatre into the shade.

In another place our hunter relates;—

When I had occasion to hunt, in order to supply the wants of myself and people, a troop of men would follow, and as soon as a rhinoceros or any other animal was shot, a fire was made and some would be roasting, while the others would be cutting and tearing away at the ponderous carcase, which is soon dissected. During these operations they would exhibit all the gestures of heathenish joy, making an uproar as if a town were on fire. I do not wonder that Mr. Campbell once remarked on a similar occasion, that from their noise and gestures he did not know his travelling companions. Having once shot a rhinoceros, the men surrounded it with roaring congratulation. In vain I shouted that it was not dead: a dozen spears were thrust into it, when up started the animal in a fury, and tearing up the ground with his horn, made every one fly in terror. These animals were very numerous in this part of the country; they are not gregarious, more than four or five being seldom seen together, though I once observed nine following each other to the water. They fear no enemy but man, and are fearless of him when wounded and pursued. The lion flies before them like a cat; the mohohu, the largest species, has been known even to kill the elephant, by thrusting the horn into his ribs.

On another occasion, when Moffat was traversing the desert, bound on a distant expedition, he relates—

Our journey lay over a wild and dreary country, inhabited by Balalas only, and but a sprinkling of these. On the night of the third day's journey, having halted at a pool (Khokhole,) we listened, on the lonely plain, for the sound of an inhabitant, but all was silent. We could discover no lights, and, amid the darkness were unable to trace footmarks to the pool. We let loose our wearied oxen to drink and graze, but as we were ignorant of the character of the company with which we might have to spend the night, we took a firebrand, and examined the edges of the pool to see, from the imprints, what animals were in the habit of drinking there, and, with terror, discovered many spoors of lions. We immediately collected the oxen, and brought them to the wagon, to which we fastened them with the strongest thongs we had, having discovered in their appearance something rather wild, indicating that either from scent or sight, they knew danger was near. The two Barolongs had brought a young cow with them, and though I recommended their making her fast also, they very humorously replied that she was too wise to leave the wagon and oxen, even though a lion should be scented. We took a little supper, which was followed by our evening hymn, and prayer. I had retired only a few minutes to my wagon to prepare for the night, when the whole of the oxen started to their feet. A lion had seized the cow only a few steps from their tails, and dragged it to the distance of thirty or forty yards, where we distinctly heard it tearing the animal, and breaking the bones, while its bellowings were most pitiful. When these were over, I seized my gun, but as it was too dark to see any object at half the distance, I aimed at the spot where the devouring jaws of the lion were heard. I fired again and again, to which he replied with tremendous roars, at the same time making a rush towards the wagon, so as exceedingly to terrify the oxen. The two Barolongs engaged to take firebrands, advance a few yards, and throw them at him, so as to afford me a degree of light, that I might take aim, the place being bushy. They had scarcely discharged them from their hands, when the flame went out, and the enraged animal rushed towards them with such swiftness, that I had barely time to turn the gun and fire between the men and the lion, and providentially the ball struck the ground immediately under his head, as we found by examination the following morning. From this surprise he returned, growling dreadfully. The men darted through some thorn-bushes with countenances indicative of the utmost terror. It was now the opinion of all that we had better let him alone if he did not molest us.

Having but a scanty supply of wood to keep up a fire, one man crept among the bushes on one side of the pool, while I proceeded for the same purpose on the other side. I had not gone far, when, looking upward to the edge of the small basin, I discerned between me and the sky four animals, whose attention appeared to be directed to me, by the noise I made in breaking a dry stick. On closer inspection, I found that the large, round, hairy-headed visiters were lions; and retreated on my hands and feet towards the other side of the pool, when, coming to my wagon-driver, to inform him of our danger, I found him looking, with no little alarm, in an opposite direction, and with good reason, as no fewer than two lions, with a cub, were eyeing us both, apparently as uncertain about us as we were distrustful of them. They appeared, as they always do in the dark, twice the usual size. We thankfully decamped to the wagon, and sat down to keep alive our scanty fire, while we listened to the lion tearing and devouring his prey. When any of the other hungry lions dared to approach, he would pursue them for some paces, with a horrible howl, which made our poor oxen tremble, and produced anything but agreeable sensations in ourselves. We had reason for alarm, lest any of the six lions we saw, fearless of our small fire, might rush in among us. The two Barolongs were grudging the lion his fat meal, and would now and then break the silence with a deep sigh, and expressions of regret that such a vagabond lion should have such a feast on their cow, which they anticipated would have afforded them many a draught of luscious milk. Before the day dawned, having deposited nearly the whole of the carcass in his stomach, he collected the head, backbone, parts of the legs, the paunch, which he emptied of its contents, and the two clubs which had been thrown at him, and walked off, leaving nothing but some fragments of bones, and one of my balls, which had hit the carcase instead of himself.

When it was light we examined the spot, and found, from the foot-marks, that the lion was a large one, and had devoured the cow himself. I had some difficulty in believing this, but was fully convinced by the Barolongs pointing out to me that the foot-marks of the other lions had not come within thirty yards of the spot, two jackals only had approached to lick up any little leavings. The men pursued the spoor to find the fragments, where the lion had deposited them, while he retired to a thicket to sleep during the day. I had often heard how much a large, hungry lion could eat, but nothing less than a demonstration would have convinced me that it was possible for him to have eaten all the flesh of a good heifer, and many of the bones, for scarcely a rib was left, and even some of the marrow-bones were broken as if with a hammer. . . . . Much has been written about African lions, but the half has not been told. The following trait in their character may not be intrusive, or partaking of the marvellous, with which the tales of some travellers are said to abound. I give it as received from men of God, and men who had been experienced Nimrods too. The old lion, when in company with his children, as the natives call them, though they are nearly as big as himself; or, when numbers together happen to come upon game, the oldest or ablest creeps to the object, while the others crouch on the grass; if he be successful, which he generally is, he retires from his victim, and lies down to breathe, and rest, for perhaps a quarter of an hour; in the meantime, the others draw around, and lie down at a respectful distance. When the chief one has got his rest, he commences at the abdomen and breast, and after making havoc with the tit-bits of the carcase, he will take a second rest, none of the others presuming to move. Having made a second gorge, he retires, the others, watching his motions, rush on the remainder, and it is soon devoured. At other times, if a young lion seizes the prey, and an old one happens to come up, the younger retires till the elder has dined. This was what Africaner called better manners than those of the Namaquas, [who abandon their aged parents.]

Passing along a vale, we came to a spot where the lion appeared to have been exercising himself in the way of leaping. As the natives are very expert in tracing the manœuvres of animals by their foot-marks, it was soon discovered that a large lion had crept towards a short black stump, very like the human form; when within about a dozen yards, it bounded on its supposed prey, when, to his mortification, he fell a foot or two short of it. According to the testimony of a native who had been watching his motions, and who joined us soon after, the lion lay for some time steadfastly eyeing its supposed meal. It then arose, smelt the object, and returned to the spot from which he commenced his first leap, and leaped four several times, till at last he placed his paw on the imagined prize. On another occasion, when Africaner and an attendant were passing near the end of a hill, from which jutted out a smooth rock of ten or twelve feet high, he observed a number of zebras pressing round it, obliged to keep the path, beyond which it was precipitous. A lion was seen creeping up towards the path, to intercept the large stallion, which is always in the rear to defend or warn the troop. The lion missed his mark, and while the zebra rushed round the point, the lion knew well if he could mount the rock at one leap, the next would be on the zebra's back, it being obliged to turn towards the hill. He fell short, with only his head over the stone, looking at the galloping zebra switching his tail in the air. He then tried a second and a third leap, till he succeeded. In the meantime two more lions came up, and seemed to talk and roar away about something, while the old lion led them round the rock, and round it again; then he made another grand leap, to show them what he and they must do next time. Africaner added, with the most perfect gravity, "They evidently talked to each other, but though loud enough, I could not understand a word they said; and, fearing lest we should be the next objects of their skill, we crept away and left them in council."

At an earlier period, and in another part of the country, the following circumstance occurred, and formed Mr. Moffat's first introduction to the companionship of lions:—

One night we were quietly bivouacked at a small pool on the 'Oup River, where we never anticipated a visit from his majesty. We had just closed our united evening worship, the book was still in my hand, and the closing notes of the song of praise had scarcely fallen from our lips, when the terrific roar of the lion was heard: our oxen, which before were quietly chewing the cud, rushed upon us, and over our fires, leaving us prostrated in a cloud of dust and sand. Hats and hymn books, our Bible and our guns, were all scattered in wild confusion. Providentially, no serious injury was sustained; the oxen were pursued, brought back, and secured to the wagon, for we could ill afford to lose any. Africaner, seeing the reluctance of the people to pursue in a dark and gloomy ravine, grasped a firebrand, and exclaimed, "Follow me!" and but for this promptness and intrepidity we must have lost some of our number, for nothing can exceed the terror of oxen at even the smell of a lion. Though they may happen to be in the worst condition possible, worn out with fatigue and hunger, the moment the shaggy monster is perceived, they start like race-horses, with their tails erect, and sometimes days will elapse before they are found.

While travelling with the ambassadors of Mokhatla, the chief or king mentioned above, he relates—

As we were retiring to rest one night, a lion passed near us, occasionally giving a roar, which softly died away on the extended plain, as it was responded to by another at a distance. Directing the attention of these Balala to this sound, and asking if they thought there was danger, they turned their ears as to a voice with which they were familiar, and, after listening for a moment or two, replied, "There is no danger; he has eaten, and is going to sleep." They were right, and we slept also. Asking them in the morning how they knew the lions were going to sleep, they replied, "We live with them; they are our companions."

There is greater loss of human life from the hyenas entering the towns and villages by night, and lying in wait at the pools whence the women and children fetch water, than from the "monarch of the wild." Upon one occasion Mr. Moffat ran more danger from what are considered very ignoble animals—from baboons, than he had ever done from the lion. The whole passage is full of beauty, and shows the author to be a man who really need not fear to preach before the most cultivated audience that Cape Town or any other town could furnish. When travelling towards Griqua Town, and near the Orange River, he had the following animating series of adventures:—

On one occasion I was remarkably preserved, when all expected that my race was run. We had reached the river early in the afternoon, after a dreadfully scorching ride across a plain. Three of my companions, who were in advance, rode forward to a Bushman village, on an ascent some hundred yards from the river. I went, because my horse would go, towards a little pool on a dry branch, from which the flood or torrent had receded to the larger course. Dismounting, I pushed through a narrow opening in the bushes, and lying down, took a hearty draught. Immediately on raising myself I felt an unusual taste in my mouth, and looking attentively at the water, and the temporary fence around, it flashed across my mind that the water was poisoned for the purpose of killing game. I came out, and meeting one of our number, who had been a little in the rear, just entering, told him my suspicion.

He recovered, after great suffering, and tells—

I was deeply affected by the sympathy of these poor Bushmen, to whom we were utter strangers. When they saw me laugh, they deafened our ears with expressions of satisfaction, making a croaking and clicking, of which their language seemed to be made up. And these barbarians to the letter "showed us no little kindness," for they gave us some meat of zebras, which had died from drinking the same water on the preceding day. This was very acceptable; for having fasted that day, we were all ready for a meal; and, though the poisoned water had partially blunted my appetite, I enjoyed a steak of the black-looking flesh mingled with its yellow fat.

On leaving the next morning, I gave these poor people a good share of our small stock of tobacco, which set them all dancing like merry Andrews, blessing our visit with the most fantastic gestures. It grieved me, that, from the want of an interpreter, I could say but little to them about Him who came to redeem the poor and the needy.

These people had come down from the desert on the north in search of water, and were subsisting by the chase, by catching a solitary animal in a pit-fall, or else destroying it with water poisoned by an infusion of bulbs, or other roots. They were evidently living in some fear of the Corannas on the opposite side of the river, whose cattle form a tempting bait to these hungry wanderers. Thinking, and justly too, that some part of the earth's surface must be theirs, they naturally imagine that if their game is shot, and their honey pilfered, they have a right to reprisals, according to natural law, and therefore cannot resist the temptation of seizing the property of their more wealthy neighbours, when it lies within reach.

On the seventh day we reached that part of the river called Quis or Kwees, from which we intended to go in a direct course to Griqua Town, leaving the Orange River far to the right. We had previously made inquiries about the country which lay between: some said there was water; others, that we should find none. We had eaten a small portion of meat that morning, reserving only enough for one single meal, lest we should get no more; and drank freely of water, to keep the stomach distended; and felt tolerably comfortable. At night we came to some old huts, where were remains of tobacco gardens, which had been watered with wooden vessels from the adjoining river. We spent the evening in one of these huts; though, from certain holes for ingress and egress, it was evidently a domicile for hyenas, and other beasts of prey. We had scarcely ended our evening song of praise to Him whose watchful care had guided and preserved us through the day, when the distant and dolorous howls of the hyena, and the no less inharmonious jabbering of the jackal, announced the kind of company with which we were to spend the night; while, from the river, the hippopotami kept up a blowing and snorting chorus. Our sleep was anything but sweet. On the addition of the dismal notes of the hooting owl, one of our men remarked, "We want only the lion's roar to complete the music of the desert." "Were they as sleepy and tired as I am," said another, "they would find something else to do." In the morning we found that some of these night scavengers had approached very near the door of our hut.

Having refreshed ourselves with a bath and a draught of water, we prepared for the thirsty road we had to traverse; but, before starting, a council was held, whether we should finish the last small portion of meat, which any one might have devoured in a minute, or reserve it. The decision was to keep it till evening. We sought in vain for ixia bulbs. Our only resource, according to the custom of the country, was to fill ourselves with as much water as our bodies could contain. We were obliged to halt during the day, fearing our horses would give up, from the excessive heat. When the evening drew on, we had to ascend and descend several sand-hills, which, weary and faint from two days' fasting, was to us exceedingly fatiguing. Vanderbyle and myself were somewhat in advance of the rest, when we observed our three companions remaining behind; but supposing they staid to strike light and kindle their pipes, we thoughtlessly rode forward. Having proceeded some distance, we halted, and hallooed, but received no reply. We fired a shot, but no one answered. We pursued our journey in the direction of the high ground near the Long Mountains, through which our path lay. On reaching a bushless plain, we alighted, and made a fire: another shot was fired, and we listened with intense earnestness; but gloomy, desert silence reigned around. We conversed, as well as our parched lips would allow, on what must be done. To wait till morning would only increase the length of our suffering,—to retrace our steps was impossible:—probably they had wandered from the path, and might never overtake us:—at the same time we felt most reluctant to proceed. We had just determined to remain, when we thought we would fire one more shot. It was answered—by the lion, apparently close to the place where we stood. No wood was at hand to make a fire, nothing but tufts of grass; so we ran, and remounted our horses, urging them on towards a range of dark mountains, the gloom increasing as we proceeded; but as our horses could not go much above a walking pace, we were in dread every moment of being overtaken. If we drew up to listen, his approach in the rear was distinctly heard. On reaching the winding glen or pass through the mountains, despairing of escape from our enemy, we resolved to ascend a steep, where, from a precipice, we might pelt him with stones; for we had only a couple of balls left. On dragging ourselves and our horses up the steep, we found the supposed refuge too uneven for a standing-place, and not one fragment of loose stone to be found. Our situation was now doubly dangerous; for, on descending to the path, the query was, on which side is the lion? My companion took his steel and flint, to try, by striking them, if he could not discover traces of the lion's paws on the path, expecting every moment that he would bound on one of us. The terror of the horses soon told us that the object of our dread was close to us, but on the right side, namely, in our rear. We instantly remounted, and continued to pursue the track, which we had sometimes great difficulty in tracing along its zig-zag windings, among bushes, stones and sand. The dark towering cliffs around us, the deep silence of which was disturbed by the grunt of a solitary baboon, or the squalling of some of its young ones, added to the colouring of the night's picture. We had not proceeded very far before the lion gave a tremendous roar, which, echoing from precipice to precipice, sounded as if we were within a lion's den. On reaching the egress of the defile through which we had passed, we were cheered by the waning moon, rising bright in the east. Descending again, we would gladly have laid our weary limbs down to rest; but thirst, and the possibility of the lion's resolving to make his supper on one of us, propelled our weary steps, for our horses were completely jaded.

We continued our slow and silent march for hours. The tongue cleaving to the roof of the mouth from thirst, made conversation extremely difficult. At last we reached the long-wished for "waterfall," so named, because when it rains, water sometimes falls, though in small quantities; but it was too late to ascend the hill. We allowed our poor worn-out horses to go where they pleased, and having kindled a small fire, and produced a little saliva by smoking a pipe, we talked about our lost companions, who happened for their comfort to have the morsel of meat, and who, as Jantye thought, would wander from the position in which we left them towards the river. We bowed the knee to Him who had mercifully preserved us, and laid our heads on our saddles. The last sound we heard to soothe us, was the distant roar of the lion, but we were too much exhausted to feel anything like fear. Sleep came to our relief, and it seemed made up of scenes the most lovely, forming a glowing contrast to our real situation. I felt as if engaged, during my short repose, in roving among ambrosial bowers of paradisaical delight, hearing sounds of music, as if from angels' harps; it was the night wind falling on my ears from the neighbouring hill. I seemed to pass from stream to stream, in which I bathed and slaked my thirst at many a crystal fount, flowing from golden mountains enriched with living green. These Elysian pleasures continued till morning dawn, when we awoke, speechless with thirst, our eyes inflamed, and our whole frames burning like a coal. We were, however, somewhat less fatigued, but wanted water, and had recourse to another pipe before we could articulate a word.

My companion then directed me to a projecting rock, near the top of the hill, where, if there were water at all, it would be found. I took up the gun to proceed in that direction, while he went in search of the horses, which we feared might have been devoured by the lion. I ascended the rugged height to the spot where water once was, but found it as dry as the sandy plain beneath. I stood a few minutes, stretching my languid eye to see if there were any appearance of the horses, but saw nothing; turning to descend, I happened to cough, and was instantly surrounded by almost a hundred baboons, some of gigantic size. They grunted, grinned, and sprang from stone to stone, protruding their mouths, and drawing back the skin of their foreheads, threatening an instant attack. I kept parrying them with my gun, which was loaded; but I knew their character and disposition too well to fire, for if I had wounded one of them, I should have been skinned in five minutes. The ascent was very laborious, but I would have given anything to be at the bottom of the hill again. Some came so near as even to touch my hat while passing projecting rocks. It was some time before I reached the plain, when they appeared to hold a noisy council, either about what they had done, or intended doing. Levelling my piece at two that seemed the most fierce, as I was about to touch the trigger, the thought occurred, I have escaped, let me be thankful; therefore I left them uninjured, perhaps with the gratification of having given me a fright.

Jantye soon appeared with the horses. My looks, more expressive than words, convincing him that there was no water, we saddled the poor animals, which, though they had picked up a little grass, looked miserable beyond description. We now directed our course towards Witte water, where we could scarcely hope to arrive before afternoon, even if we reached it at all, for we were soon obliged to dismount, and drive our horses slowly and silently over the glowing plain, where the delusive mirage tantalized our feelings with exhibitions of the loveliest pictures, of lakes and pools studded with lovely islets, and towering trees moving in the breeze on their banks. In some might be seen the bustle of a mercantile harbour, with jetties, coves, and moving rafts and oars; in others, lakes so lovely, as if they had just come from the hand of the Divine artist, a transcript of Eden's sweetest views, but all the result of highly rarefied air, or the reflected heat of the sun's rays on the sultry plain. Sometimes, when the horses and my companion were some hundred yards in advance, they appeared as if lifted from the earth, or moving like dark living pillars in the air. Many a time did we seek old ant hills, excavated by the ant-eater, into which to thrust our heads, in order to have something solid between our fevered brains and the piercing rays of the sun. There was no shadow of a great rock, the shrubs sapless, barren, and blighted, as if by some blast of fire. Nothing animate was to be seen or heard, except the shrill chirping of a beetle, resembling the cricket, the noise of which seemed to increase with the intensity of the heat. Not a cloud had been seen since we left our homes.

The hardships of the missionary, on this wild journey, were not yet ended, nor was his every day course of life without severe privation.

We have been tempted beyond all due bounds by this fascinating narrative, which combines beauty and interest of every sort, divine and human. One more isolated picture, and we have done, sincerely hoping that tens and hundreds of thousands may experience the same delight and instruction from the perusal of this narrative, that it has afforded to ourselves. By a happy suggestion, the singing of hymns, which Moffat had composed or translated into the native language, was adopted, and it charmed the natives. A distant chief, of mild and highly interesting character, named Mosheu, had, at different times, visited the station, and had brought his family to be instructed; and while out on a tour, Moffat visited his village, where this animated scene occurred—

The moment I entered the village, the hue-and-cry was raised, and old and young, mother and children, came running together as if it were to see some great prodigy. . . . . I took my Testament and a hymn-book, and with such singers as I had, gave out a hymn, read a chapter, and prayed; then taking the text, "God so loved the world," etc., discoursed to them for about an hour. Great order and profound silence were maintained. The scene (so well depicted in the vignette in the title-page) was in the centre of the village, composed of Bechuana and Coranna houses and cattle-folds. Some of these contained the cattle, sheep, and goats, while other herds were strolling about. At a distance a party were approaching riding on oxen. A few strangers drew near with their spears and shields, who, on being beckoned to, instantly laid them down. The native dogs could not understand the strange-looking being on the front of the wagon, holding forth to a gazing throng, and they would occasionally break the silence with their bark, for which, however, they suffered the penalty of a stone or stick hurled at their heads. Two milk maids, who had tied their cows to posts, stood the whole time with their milking vessels in their hands, as if afraid of losing a single sentence. The earnest attention manifested exceeded anything I had ever before witnessed, and the countenances of some indicated strong mental excitement. . . When I had concluded, my hearers divided into companies, to talk the subject over; but others, more inquisitive, plied me with questions. While thus engaged, my attention was arrested by a simple-looking young man at a short distance, rather oddly attired. . . . The person referred to was holding forth with great animation to a number of people, who were all attention. On approaching, I found, to my surprise, that he was preaching my sermon over again, with uncommon precision, and with great solemnity, imitating as nearly as he could the gestures of the original. A greater contrast could scarcely be conceived than the fantastic figure I have described, and the solemnity of his language, his subject being eternity, while he evidently felt what he spoke. Not wishing to disturb him, I allowed him to finish the recital, and seeing him soon after, told him that he could do what I was sure I could not, that was, preach again the same sermon verbatim. He did not appear vain of his superior memory. "When I hear anything great," he said, touching his forehead with his finger, "it remains there." This young man died in the faith shortly after, before an opportunity was afforded him of making a public profession.

In the evening, after the cows were milked, and the herds had laid themselves down in the folds to chew the cud, a congregation, for the the third time, stood before my wagon. The bright silvery moon, holding her way through a cloudless starry sky, and shining on many a sable face, made the scene peculiarly solemn and impressive, while the deepest attention was paid to the subject, which was the importance of religion illustrated by Scripture characters. After the service, they lingered about the wagon, making many inquiries, and repeating over and over again what they had heard. . . . The following day, Monday, was no less busy, for though the wind was very high, so as to prevent a public service in the morning, I was engaged addressing different parties at their own dwellings, and teaching them to read. . . . When another deeply interesting evening service had closed, the people seemed resolved to get all out of me they could. All would learn to read there and then. A few remaining spelling-books were sought out, and the two or three young people I had with me were each enclosed within a circle of scholars all eager to learn. Some were compelled to be content with only shouting out the names of the letters, which were rather too small to be seen by the whole circle, with only the light of the moon. While this rather noisy exercise was going on, some of the principal men with whom I was conversing, thought they would also try their skill in this new art. . . . "Oh, teach us the A B C with music," every one cried, giving me no time to tell them it was too late. I found they had made this discovery through one of my boys. There were presently a dozen or more surrounding me, and resistance was out of the question. Dragged and pushed, I entered one of the largest native houses, which was instantly crowded. The tune of "Auld lang syne" was pitched to A B C, each succeeding round was joined by sucoeeding voices, till every tongue was vocal, and every countenance beamed with heart-felt satisfaction. The longer they sang the more freedom was felt, and "Auld lang syne" was echoed to the farthest corner of the village. The strains which infuse pleasurable emotions into the sons of the North, were no less potent among these children of the South. Those who had retired to their evening slumbers, supposing that we were holding a night service, came; "for music," it is said, "charms the savage breast." It certainly does, particularly the natives of Southern Africa, who, however degraded they may have become, still retain that refinement of taste, which enables them to appreciate those tunes which are distinguished by melody and softness. . . . . The company at length dispersed; and awaking in the morning, after a brief repose, I was not a little surprised to hear the old tune in every corner of the village. The maids milking the cows, and the boys tending the calves, were humming their alphabet over again. . . . Mosheu and his people made very pleasing advances in Christian knowledge, and so eager were they to benefit by the instructions of the missionaries, that at a considerable sacrifice of time and comfort, they made frequent journeys to the Kuruman. It was an interesting spectacle to see forty or fifty men, women, and children, coming over the plain, all mounted on oxen, and bringing with them a number of milch cows, that they might not be too burdensome either to the missionaries or the people. Their object was to obtain instruction; and they would remain at Motito and the Kuruman for more than two months at a time, diligently attending to all the opportunities afforded; and Andries, the brother of Mosheu, being the more talented individual, was soon after appointed schoolmaster, and under his humble and devoted labours they made wonderful progress. What they valued for themselves they were anxious to secure to their children; and Mosheu left his daughter to the care of Mrs. Moffat, for education, while Andries committed his son to that of Mr. Lemue, at Motito, both of whom made most satisfactory progress, not only in reading and writing, but the daughter in needlework, and in general domestic employments.

FEAST OF THE POETS FOR SEPTEMBER, 1842.

It is easy for us, however the public in general may take it, perfectly to comprehend the delicacies and difficulties which lately beset our opposite neighbours of the pavilion on the Castle Hill. We mean, of course, those gentlemen appointed by the Highland Society the other day, to judge and award its prizes among hundreds of rival candidates, and eager competitors for glory. Often, a fellow-feeling informs us, must they have felt, that where only one fortunate individual could obtain the reward of his achievements in breeding or feeding, there might be a dozen almost equally deserving of the prize; and that where the shades of superiority were so slight, and the claims so equally balanced, it might be quite as just to decide by a throw of the dice, as by critical examination and fixed rules. Such, at least, is our predicament; and our task is even more onerous than that of our neighbour judges, as, unlike the domestic animals and agricultural produce, verse, though it admit of being scanned and measured, cannot so well be judged of by its weight and bulk. In these circumstances, we can only protest that we have acted with due deliberation, and to the best of an unbiassed judgment, in awarding our annual prizes; an honoured place, namely, at our Feast of the Poets for 1842—with—upon certain conditions, which depend wholly upon the competitors themselves—Immortality in reversion. This premised, we proceed without farther observation.

GROUP I.

POETRY OF DAY, THOUGH NOT FOR THE DAY ONLY.

THE REVIVALIST.—A PORTRAIT.

And thou art he!—I wish thee joy
Of recent Time's arrivals,
Not the least strange, the godly boy,
The preacher of Revivals!
Thou hast made uproar great, I learn,
In this good town appearing;
Filled all our maids with soul-concern,
And all our men with sneering.

I'll judge thee justly, trust me, youth;
Fame, like a broken mirror,
With twenty faces of a truth,
Gives twenty shapes of error.
I find thee modest, meek, and mild,
With smooth and boyish braid
Thy hair, as simple as a child,
Thou gentle as a maid.

But pensive, sad, and inly-grieved,
Else that slow utterance why,
That each fair thought, howe'er conceived,
Must still be born a sigh?
But even thou art not all night,
Thy soul, too, has its gleaming;
Mark! now it flickers with fair light,
Now with red fire 'tis streaming;

Now like sea-murmur on the shore,
Soft ripple on the pebble;
Now like the many-surging roar
That furious scales the treble.
A wind-waked stream of gospel notes,
Which systematic ears,
Because for them too wild it floats,
Will listen to with sneers.

But God, who nothing does in vain,
And gives to each his part,
Oft compensates the feebler brain
By stronger-pulsing heart.

Thus He to thee gave strong desires,
Emotion deep, not clear,
The power to wake the fusing fires,
And urge the softening tear.

And if, belike, scant wisdom serves,
And weakness be an ally,
To witch convulsions from the nerves
Of Susan and of Sally;

Is it not better thus to hear
The Word, and wildly feel it,
Than to receive it in thine ear,
And in thy heart congeal it?

And were the preacher very fool,
A man of basest note;
'Tis well, lest men confound the tool
With the high power that wrought.

This further mark: whate'er he speaks
Is simplest and sincerest,
As if for each lost soul he seeks
His own heart's blood the dearest

He'd wring. Who rate him false mean this,
That they cased in his crust,
To weep like tears would act amiss,
Their hearts being dry as dust.

Ye Doctors learn'd, compact, and square,
Of decent reasons full,
This boy is rich where ye are bare,
And quick where ye are dull.

Let him alone!—with his rude creed,
And logic loose arrayed;
He is a workman, hath sown seed
Where ye ne'er moved a spade.

Enough with one gift to be true;
The poise of all the powers
Belongs to few, and very few,
In such a world as ours.

THE CLEVER YOUNG ADVOCATE.

[A Parliament-house Song. Air—"The Waterman."]

And did you ne'er hear of a clever young advocate,
Who in the Parliament-house used to pace?
Such a wonderful compound of strength and agility,
Life in each look, and each motion was grace.
He walked so trim, he trode so trippingly,
Hart on the hill never bounded more skippingly.
