By this time Horner had been for several years in London, pursuing his legal studies, and already an established favourite among the leading Whigs. He was, however, full twenty-seven years of age before it was deemed proper, discreet as he was, to adopt and push him forward. The first decided step was an invitation to a political dinner to be given by Earl Fitzwilliam, with whom he was not then even acquainted. After consulting with his friends, and probably nothing loath, he accepted the invitation, which was a virtual enlistment in the Whig corps, and a taking of the bounty. His feelings and conduct were, however, as independent as those of any man acting with a party ever can be. Among his political sponsors, on this occasion, were Lord Henry Petty and the Earl of Lauderdale. One must think the better of the sagacity and of the sterling principles of Horner from his early and correct estimate of the true character of the latter nobleman,—whose Brummagem gilt passed for sterling coin for a good many years after this period. But the whole passage, the formal profession of the new recruit's political faith, does him honour:—

I am ambitious to coöperate with that party, in labouring to realize those enlightened principles in the government of our own country; however I lament some violences and mistakes in the conduct of Opposition on particular occasions, and however much I suspect the characters of some who have at times been very near Mr. Fox's person. All my feelings carry me towards that party; and all my principles confirm the predilection. Into that party, therefore, I resolutely enlist myself; with very feeble hopes of its ever being for any long period triumphant in power. There is a low prudence, in rearing the fabric of one's fortunes, which fixes the ambition (if it may be called by so proud a name) on the actual possession of places and emolument; and there are some living instances which prove this to be quite a sure game, provided there are never any compunctious visitings of principle or personal regard. There is a more virtuous discretion, which limits a man's schemes of exertion to his professional sphere, and to the honest accumulation of large profits and small praises, such as the English bar seems almost infallibly to bestow on diligent abilities. But there is a more elevated prudence, which does not stop at affluence in its prospect, but ventures to include the chances of lasting service to mankind, and of a good name impressed upon the history of the times. I could not have desired a more respectable channel of introduction to the meetings of the party, than that of Lord Fitzwilliam's house; for though I have never been made known to that nobleman, I am not ostensibly brought to his house by any other person. I have some reason to believe that Lord Lauderdale may have suggested my name; but I am pleased that I do not enter under his wing, as his is one of those characters in which I have not yet entire confidence.

Again we find him saying to his friend Murray:

Lauderdale, you know, is not a character altogether suitable to my taste, nor have I yet, in spite of his steadiness to an unsuccessful party, entire confidence in the purity of his politics.

In the same epistle he thus explains to Mr. Murray his reasons for adherence to the Whigs, probably feeling that some explanation was required:—

I have always found that anything interesting to me becomes of still more interest, in its relation to myself, after I have imparted it to you. This summer, I have allowed myself to be recognised more expressly as an adherent of the Opposition, than I ever had an opportunity of doing before. I did not dine at Carlton House; but at Lord Fitzwilliam's, with a set of partisans, "black spirits and white." The advances were made to me, and after taking the subject into serious deliberation, I resolved to take advantage of them. You have known, as long as myself, the cast of my political opinions, as well as my wish that politics should be joined to law in the occupations of my future life, if indeed my schemes of life shall ever be matured into real occupations. To hold an efficient character in politics, a man must choose a party, if the state presents one to whose leading declarations and views he can honestly subscribe. Now, though there are several parts of the former conduct of Opposition which I cannot approve of, and some men attached to it whom I never can esteem, yet the maxims and principles professed by Mr. Fox are congenial upon all great questions to my feelings and conviction. I am not giving you this as an apology for myself, but as the deliberate mode in which I considered the subject before I came to a resolution. I accepted Lord Fitzwilliam's invitation, and permitted my name to be put down in the list of a new club to which Fox, Windham, Sheridan, &c., belong.

Admission into the Whig Club was then held equivalent to political confirmation: getting into parliament was a natural sequence. Mr. Horner owed his first seat (for St. Ives) to Lord Kinnaird, his next (St. Mawes) to Lord Carrington, or rather to "the Grenville interest." He rather admired rotten boroughs for their good uses to a "Constitutional" Opposition. Horner had before this time appeared as Counsel at the Bar of the House of Peers in Scotch Appeal Cases; and he seems to have soon obtained in this department a large share of professional employment. From his first appearance as a member of the House of Commons, he was recognised as a man of ability and information, and as one likely to rise. Through the patronage of Lord Minto he obtained the place of Commissioner for investigating the affairs of the Nabob of Arcot, but—which is not so explicable to us—received no salary; though other commissioners, to the best of our recollection, were well paid, while that interminable and unterminated business was in progress.

When called to the Bar, Mr. Horner chose the Western Circuit, and he was, though slowly, in the way of obtaining a fair share of business. But his reputation as a Member of Parliament advanced far more rapidly than his celebrity as a lawyer; and this squared with his inclinations and ambition, which had ever strongly prompted him to figure in public life, whatever became of his pecuniary interests.

Before he was offered a seat, but not before he had felt that "a snug family borough, held by stanch Whigs," would be a most desirable possession, we find him thus writing to Lord Webb Seymour, who, no more than Mr. Jeffrey or Mr. Murray, deemed this fast getting a-head in public life a prudent step for a young lawyer:—

After turning it very often in my mind, when I fancied the possibility of such an offer being one day made, I have never succeeded in subduing my strong inclinations, nor even in beating them out of the argument. A risk no doubt there is; but it is the risk inherent in the plan of life which I have long ago sketched for myself, and to which my ambition and my most reflected principles of approbation are steadily attached. A lawyer only, I never could consent to be, no more than to be merely a political adventurer; for mere emolument has no other attraction for me but the independence it gives, and mere office has no attraction at all. To carry on at the same time my professional views, and to bear a share in the great interesting discussions of public business, forms a combination not often tried with success, but which I long ago resolved to try. The question, no doubt, still remains, whether the active union of the two may not be attempted too soon; and if I have solved this question at all to my satisfaction, it is in this way, that I am about to begin it somewhat too soon: but opportunity is an element to be calculated in all such reasonings, and is one risk of another sort with which the other must be balanced.

The die was already cast:—the example of Romilly might have had a great and natural influence with Horner; and, whoever disapproved, his father, and at least one other sagacious friend, Mr. Whishaw, approved. Lord Webb finally and rightly calculated both risk and gain; and gave in, saying,

If then you go into Parliament, my prospects respecting you will revert to what they were last summer. I shall look upon you as advancing to fame and to power by steps that are honourable, and more rapid than if you had continued to tread the wearisome path of your profession; but, at the same time, with more hazard to your reputation, and to your integrity and wisdom as a politician.

It is enough that none of the supposed hazards were encountered. Horner had not been long in Parliament, when the death of Fox caused the disruption of the government.——But his public career is to us much less interesting than his personal history; and his social connexion; which from his position, and the universal kindness and confidence of his friends, included the brightest ornaments of the society of the period. This, and not politics, constitutes the charm of these Memoirs.

Horner's valuable efforts, both in Parliament and in The Edinburgh Review, for Catholic Emancipation, for Education, and on different financial questions, are, at the passing moment, of less interest than the deliberate convictions on the Corn-Laws of one who was the reverse of a lover of change, or of a bold or rash reformer. It is, too, worth while just now to see that there were sound views on this subject, some quarter of a century before the League, which is at present considered a quite novel sort of fiery dragon—a new disease of the body politic—was ever heard of. Of the Corn Bill of his day, of 1815, Horner remarks,—

There is certainly no foundation for the distinction with which I am honoured, it seems, at Edinburgh, of being a convert to the Corn Bill. The more I have read upon the subject, and the more I hear upon it, I get more firmly fixed in my original opinion, that nothing should be done; of course it will be carried with a loud clamour, and with much abuse of all lackland theorists. It would be as absurd to expect men to be reasonable about corn, as to be reasonable in matters of religion.

I do not imagine any new discovery is made about the relation of the price of labour to that of grain, or the effects of scarcity or plenty upon wages. The principles, upon which all such effects must depend, are obvious to every one who understands the operation of demand and supply upon prices; indeed, they are all an application of that single principle. A great many cases are necessary to be put, in order to distinguish the various effects of scarcity or plenty upon wages, according to the nature of the particular employment in which labour is to be paid for; but even when the effects are the most opposite, it is still the operation of the same principle. All this is stated well enough by Adam Smith, towards the end of his chapter on the Wages of Labour.

The most important convert the landholders have got, is Malthus, who has now declared himself in favour of their Bill; and, to be sure, there is not a better or more informed judgment, and it is the single authority which staggers me. But those who have looked closely into his philosophy will admit, that there is always a leaning in favour of the efficacy of laws; and his early bias was for corn laws in particular. It was a great effort of candour, in truth, to suspend his decision upon this particular measure so long.

In a letter addressed to his friend Malthus, who had just put forth a Pro-Corn-Law pamphlet, he remarks,—

If the consequence of "high farming" and curious cultivation be a progressive rise of the price of produce, an importation of partial supplies from countries, which by a ruder agriculture can furnish it cheaper, seems the provision laid by nature for checking too exclusive an employment of capital upon the land least fit for culture. It would be a palpable sacrifice of the end to the means, if, for the sake of extending our most finished husbandry to every sterile ridge that can be forced to yield something, we impose upon the whole body of the people extravagant prices for the necessaries of life. Nor do I see, upon your peculiar principles, what other result there would be, if Dartmoor and Blackstone Edge were laid out in terraces of garden-ground, but a population always in some peril of being starved, if their rulers will not let them eat the superfluity of their neighbours. . .

You state, p. 5., that, by the recent improvements of agriculture, "we had become much less dependent upon foreign supplies for our support." What proof is there of this? . . . In considering the influence of a low price of corn upon the condition and comforts of the labourer, you have wholly omitted this consideration, that such a fall will release thousands and tens of thousands from the parochial pauper list, and restore them to the pride of earning their bread by free labour. I could not read without indignation, in the evidence of Mr. Benett, of Pyt House, who seems the very model of a witness for Corn Committees, his cool statement of the rule he makes, and unmakes, for the distribution of rations of provender and fodder among the prædial slaves of a whole district of Wiltshire. It is this audacious and presumptuous spirit of regulating, by the wisdom of country squires, the whole economy and partition of national industry and wealth, that makes me more keenly averse to this Corn Bill of theirs than I should have been in earlier days of our time, when the principles of rational government were more widely understood, and were maintained by stronger hands at the head of affairs. The narrow conceit of managing the happiness of the labouring population, and of directing the application of industry, as well as the competition of the market, works in the present day upon a much larger scale than when it busied itself with the pedlar items of the foreign trade. . . .

Upon the whole, nothing will contribute so much to keep prices steady as by our leaving our own corn-factors unfettered by restrictions and regulations of our own making; and, without embarrassment from that source, to make their own arrangements for bringing corn, when it is wanted, from the various large and independent markets, of which, in the present circumstances of the world, they have their choice.

We exceedingly regret being under the necessity of garbling the arguments and opinions of one whose judgment is so well entitled to consideration; but our brief extracts may serve to draw attention to this part of the original work. When the landlords' measure was about to be carried, we find Mr. Horner saying,

The Corn Bill has been well discussed, though carried clamorously and precipitately. It is in truth a most unwise measure, though I really believe that most of those who vote for it have brought themselves to believe that it may be serviceable to the agricultural interests of the country; at the same time, the most conscientious of them cannot but know, they will be no losers by it: for if it proves effectual at all, its operation will be merely to save rents a little in their unavoidable fall, and to gain this advantage to landlords, by putting the people upon shorter allowance than they would otherwise have. Petitions are now coming from all quarters, and a good deal of heat is rising in the large towns; but the bill will probably be out of our House, before the petitions can be found in sufficient numbers to intimidate votes; and in the House of Lords, the voice of the people is not likely to be heard. . . . . .

It gives me great pain to hear such distressing accounts as are sent from England and Scotland of the scarcity, and the want of employment for the people. Their sufferings are, I fear, most severe, and will not admit of relief for months to come. In addition to other evils, we shall experience on this occasion one of the worst consequences of that sad job of the country gentlemen, the corn bill; for England will by its operation get no foreign grain till the prices are at the highest, and after all other countries have supplied their wants; and that means nearly all Europe.

When these important, but temporary discussions have long been forgotten in the accomplishment of the important measures to which they led, the literary history and incidental information concerning celebrated public characters, contained in these memoirs, will still retain an interest. With his "earliest friend"—his friend at eighteen months—Henry Brougham, Mr. Horner does not appear to have been, at any period, on terms more intimate than those of young men who are thrown together by vicinity, common acquaintanceships, and the similarity of their pursuits. The years he spent with Mr. Hewlett seem to have estranged him from all his earlier companions, save his chosen friend, Mr. Murray; at least we hear of none else. After his return to Edinburgh, he was admitted a member of the Speculative Society at the same time with Mr. Brougham; and both took an active part in the proceedings of the association. Here is Brougham's first appearance in these Memoirs, and at the age of nineteen or twenty, in a letter to Mr. Hewlett:—

I understand from my friend Mr. Murray, who is at present in London, that he and Mr. Brougham had the pleasure of meeting with you at the Foundling. They were much gratified by your politeness to them, for which you will permit me to thank you, as a kindness done to myself. Had you any conversation with Brougham? He is an uncommon genius of a composite order, if you allow me to use the expression; he unites the greatest ardour for general information in every branch of knowledge, and, what is more remarkable, activity in the business, and interest in the pleasures of the world, with all the powers of a mathematical intellect. Did you notice his physiognomy? I am curious to know your observations on it.

We have noticed above that the doctrines of Lavater were then a common topic of discussion. Horner himself appears to have considered Brougham as a kind of prodigy, a "universal genius." We at one time hear of him as a great mathematician, and at another as the individual in Edinburgh best fitted to rouse the spirit of the people by addresses and songs, &c., when invasion was threatened by Napoleon. Horner was at the time in London, arranging for his final residence in the South, and, in reply to a letter from Mr. Murray, he remarks: "Your plan of weekly incitements to patriotism is good, provided you execute them well; coarsely and plainly. Brougham, I think, will be most successful. . . . Pray, have you engaged Walter Scott in these patriotic labours? His Border spirit of chivalry must be inflamed at present, and might produce something." Some of our readers may remember that this "Border spirit" produced Scott's song of the Yeomanry Corps; which so far overshot the mark, that when the modest bard produced it, without acknowledging it, at a dinner of the corps, some refined brother in arms abruptly put a stop to the song by bawling out, "Give us Hogg's Donald Macdonald: that's but a drule." And "Donald Macdonald" was certainly better adapted to the end in view than anything that either Scott or Brougham could have produced.——Mr. Horner and Brougham went to London about the same period, and with nearly similar objects and ambitions, whether legal or political. We may be refining too far, but there appears to us, at times, in the correspondence of Horner, the faintest degree, the merest soupçon of something like jealousy of his early friend. Perhaps such passages as the following scarcely bear us out in this idea:—

Brougham has concluded a bargain about his book with Longman, who has been here making purchases of that kind; he talks of sending it to the press in about two months. The title, an "Enquiry into the Colonial Policy of the European Powers." That it will do him great credit, I have no doubt; I hope it may be the means of introducing him into a respectable line of political connexions. Old Liverpool wrote himself into notice by a seasonable, though puny, pamphlet on the rights of neutrals. Should an active scene be opened to Brougham, I shall tremble with anxiety for some time, though it is what I very ardently wish. His information on political subjects, especially in some departments, is now immense; his talents are equal to the most effective use and display of that knowledge. But his ardour is so urgent, that I should be afraid of his being deficient in prudence. That he would ultimately become a leading and predominant mind, I cannot doubt; but he might attempt to fix himself in that place too soon, before he had gone through what, I presume, is a necessary routine of subordination. . . . . .

As for the splendid hazardous pursuits of foreign policy and ministerial intrigue into which our friend Brougham is plunging himself, with a resolution to succeed that seems to insure success, and will, at all events, secure distinction, they are as unsuitable to the habits of my mind as to its powers; too bustling for the indolent predilection (which grows upon me hourly) for domestic and confined society, and not of magnitude, I will acknowledge, adequate to my idea of the highest sort of ambition. Lord Bacon and Dugald Stewart have made me a little of a visionary, as I believe you have sometimes thought; I am sure Brougham must have thought so always.

When Mr. Brougham got into Parliament, for which distinction he served a much longer probation than his more discreet and manageable friend, we find Horner speaking of him with what, after the lapse of thirty years, will, by many, be pronounced true insight and discrimination of character:—

I rejoice exceedingly at the news you give me of Brougham's coming into parliament; and I am particularly glad that Lord Holland has had so great a share in effecting it. Brougham never could have found a more fortunate moment for setting out upon his career; which, though it may appear less brilliant at first, on account of the expectations which are formed of him, will be very speedily distinguished; and, upon the whole, I would predict, that, though he may very often cause irritation and uncertainty about him to be felt by those with whom he is politically connected, his course will prove, in the main, serviceable to the true faith of liberty and liberal principles. For him, personally, it will be very fortunate, if he has some probationary years to pass on the Opposition side of the House.

Brougham had neither in the House, nor with the Whig leaders, the early success that marked the prosperous political career of his sage companion. He was left to fight his way, and he was equal to the battle. We find Horner bearing candid testimony to his final triumph:—

I was unluckily prevented from hearing the whole of Brougham's speech last night; what I did hear was most excellent, and the rest, I am told by the best judges, was still better. He has made an impression upon both sides of the House much more near the proportion of his talents and powers, than he had made by any former exertion of them in that place. He has done this, too, upon a subject of the first importance, and which has been waiting some years to be treated by so able a hand.* . . . . . It was objected by some of our critics, that he overcharged his statements; and it is true that his style in general has that fault, with another, which is akin to it, of charging the different parts of his subject and argument with an equal weight of earnestness and emphasis.

About this time, Mr. Brougham, for some cause inexplicable to Horner, showed symptoms of displeasure or alienation: but they seem to have been of short duration, and might be, in part, imaginary. If the sky ever did lour fitfully, no one was more ready than Horner to hail the dispersion of the clouds and returning sunshine and serenity. On his annual journeys to Scotland, we find him an occasional guest at Brougham Hall, where he appears to have felt himself with a friend. In one place we find him writing Mr. Jeffrey—

I am really obliged to you for reporting to me what Brougham has said of me; not only because I love praise dearly, but because it gives me more pleasure to hear of anything like partiality in Brougham about me or anything I have done, than even if I could be convinced that I had deserved his favourable testimony. His alienation from me, for reasons which I never have been able even to guess, is the only considerable misfortune I have ever suffered in my life; and it would take quite a load off my mind, if he would give me a hint to catch at, for forgetting that I ever had suffered it. I have always cherished a hope, that we may in time approximate again. . . . . I had a very agreeable journey with Brougham as far as Preston; nothing could be more entertaining, or in better humour. Indeed, since our old days of careless fellowship, I have never known him in so good a tone of mind, as through the whole of our late visit. After parting with him, I slept at Chorley, a dirty hole—Lancashire and manufactures.

When Brougham lost his election at Liverpool, after a hot contest, we find Horner remarking—

* On the Droits of Admiralty.

If Brougham is to be out of Parliament, which I hope and trust will not be the case, I am very far from being able to accede to your opinion, that this public loss will be counterbalanced by advantages to him, in a private point of view, such as ought to take away all regret from his friends and himself. I cannot conceive any single private advantage he will gain by it, of the least moment. Money, to be sure, he may make in abundance by Parliamentary business; for that loose, rambling sort of practice is richly paid; but no professional fame or science is to be gained in that department; and what are a few hundred acres more in Westmoreland worth to Brougham? Depend upon it, he will not quit politics, even for the time he is out of Parliament; but will exert his boundless activity in another sphere, and in other directions, where his exertions will be probably less advantageous to his own reputation, and to the welfare of the public. I was made quite happy by your account of the manner in which he took leave of the contest when it became hopeless; and I lost no time in communicating your account of it to such of our friends in London as were sure to take a proper interest in what concerns him.

It seems to have been, at all times, taken for granted by Brougham's friends, that, if useful employment could not be found on which that "perturbed spirit" might expend a superabounding mental energy and mobility, he must inevitably fall into some mischievous course of action, merely to get rid of the redundant excess of what we may term the robust animal spirits of the intellect. Happily, he has never lacked a safe and useful sphere of activity, even when, for a brief season, not impounded in Parliament. Of him we hear—

Brougham's success at the bar is prodigious; much more rapid and extensive than that of any barrister since Erskine's starting. I am going down to-morrow to hear him in defence of Hunt, which is a cause of great expectation. . . . The Hunts are convicted; but not without the jury retiring for about ten minutes. Brougham made a powerful speech, unequal, and wanting that unity which is so effective with a jury; some parts rather eloquent, particularly in the conclusion, where he had the address, without giving any advantage, to fasten the words effeminacy and cowardice where everybody could apply them. One very difficult point of his case, the conduct of the Regent to the Princess, he managed with skill and great effect; and his transition from that subject to the next part of his case was a moment of real eloquence. Lord Ellenborough was more than usually impatient, and indecently violent: he said that Brougham was inoculated with all the poison of the libel, and told the jury, the issue they had to try was, whether we were to live for the future under the dominion of libellers. . . . . There is but one sentiment of condemnation, respecting Lord Ellenborough's intemperate and indecent conduct at Hunt's trial. This is not only universal among the bar, who feel this as a professional concern; but among laymen, of all political denominations.

And at this day Lord Brougham is drawing odium upon himself, by volunteering the defence of Ellenborough's not over popular son. Men of equable tempers, and circumspect understandings, rarely betrayed either by the vivacity of their feelings or the generosity of their hearts, beyond the rigid line, are apt to be quite thrown out by conduct of this "inconsistent" sort.

We have expended so much space upon the most brilliant of the circle of Horner's early literary and political associates, that little remains for the rest of the band. It is doubtful if posterity will confirm his judgment of some of them, though his flattering opinions, and that from very natural causes, are rather chargeable with being overweening, than absolutely unjust. The admiration was reciprocal, as is shown in the eloquent tributes to the memory of their friend, paid by Sir James Mackintosh, the Rev. Sydney Smith, and others.

A few paragraphs, selected from Horner's correspondence and Journals, will, however, convey to the reader as fair an idea of the admirable and consistent character of the subject of these Memoirs as any, or all of the posthumous eulogies of his friends. The topics we have chosen, it will be seen, are diversified, and familiar; and the selections may be taken as additions to some of the above specimens of what may be described as Horner's Table-Talk. No attempt is made at classification where the whole specimens are both few and small.

Reynolds' Discourses—

Next to the writings of Bacon, there is no book which has more powerfully impelled me to revolve these sentiments than the Discourses of Sir Joshua Reynolds. He is one of the first men of genius who have condescended to inform the world of the steps by which greatness is attained: the unaffected good sense and clearness with which he describes the terrestrial and human attributes of that which is usually called inspiration, and the confidence with which he asserts the omnipotence of human labour, have the effect of familiarizing his reader with the idea that genius is an acquisition rather than a gift; while with all this there is blended so naturally and so eloquently the most elevated and passionate admiration of excellence, and of all the productions of true genius, that upon the whole there is no book of a more inflammatory effect.

Hint to a quizzical reviewer—

If you could review Mrs. Hutchinson without quizzing her, which I rather doubt, you might give a very gratifying and useful impression of the practicability of accommodating even to the sternest times of civil war, the same domestic virtues, and the same love of letters and the arts, which thrive best, no doubt, in tranquillity. I do not mean that those times are coming to us; we shall live on in the tranquillity of a vulgar servitude and degeneracy. In the spring you will have many fine subjects; Campbell, I am told by his friends, Richardson and Charles Bell, has written a charming poem of narrative and description; and Scott, of course, will be very vehement with irregular success.

The readers of The Edinburgh Review will remember that, instead of being quizzical, Mr. Jeffrey, in this instance, went to the opposite and better extreme of an enthusiasm not ungraceful.

Newspapers. We presume that the Mr. Buchanan alluded to, had, in these "worst of Tory times," projected a Liberal, or rather a Whig newspaper in the Tory stronghold of Edinburgh.

I shall mention Buchanan's project to Mr. Windham, who inquired of me the other day if I knew anything about him. Encourage him by all means to try the experiment, at least, of a newspaper in Scotland; though I doubt very much whether your advice of mere impartiality will help him to a better sale, than his own propensities of Whiggism. The latter has but a poor chance in Scotland, and the former none anywhere. The man had better be left to his own opinions and inclinations; for he will give them more warmth and force, than if he writes impartially upon system: a heavy monotonous fairness is the last thing that people will read in their newspaper. People read it to get their daily opinions and impressions; it is now a necessary of life, especially in the country towns; and a man feels himself as awkward if he walks out without his political creed for the day, as if he wanted his breakfast. Newspapers are a new means of influence to government in England; and no set of ministers ever understood this more practically than the present. Their indefatigable, systematic attention to the daily press is quite admirable: and the persevering activity with which the most palpable lies, the most atrocious calumnies and misrepresentations are circulated and repeated, after every refutation, is irresistible. Nothing ever equalled them, but the littérateurs of the French Revolution. It sometimes strikes me as quite ludicrous, to see the scrupulous, indolent leaders of our half-combined party, make a few feeble efforts to oppose this torrent, by good writing and virtuous indignation.

The Whig journalists have amended all this; and now are little, if at all, behind their opponents in the good gifts described. Nor are we sure that Mr. Horner did not do them some injustice even in 1808, when he imputes to them so much scrupulous conscience, and ineffective good writing.

Pleasure Tours. Travelling for mere pleasure, or for the enjoyment of fine scenery, was quite novel in 1800, when, after a pedestrian excursion to the Highlands, this conclusion of an Alisonian epistle was written :—

Am I too sanguine, or am I even correct, in fancying that some good effects may result from a fashion which carries the Edinburgh citizen to the lakes of Westmoreland, and brings the London citizen to the falls of the Clyde! In the course of the religious pilgrimages, some few gleanings of information were picked up and brought home. In the course of a picturesque pilgrimage, though undertaken from fashion, merely, some faint rays of elegant and refined pleasure may gleam upon the mind, and light up some portion of taste.

Contrast between George the Third and Queen Elizabeth, written in 1803 :—

What a mortifying contrast the behaviour of Elizabeth forces us to make with some characters of the present age; so much spirit, caution, and generous confidence, contrasted with bigotry, mean jealousy, and a selfish, stupid coldness towards the people. Remember what Hume tells us of the conduct of Elizabeth to the Catholics, who, in her time, were really dangerous; now it is a certain fact, that the few of the present peers and gentry of England, that adhere to that persuasion, have been treated with indignity and distrust. They held a meeting for an address to the King, adding to the usual forms of loyalty an expression of regret, that by the laws of the land, they could not contribute their personal services: Lords Petre, Arundel, and Kenmare, (of Ireland,) were the leading names. From delicacy alone, a draught of their address was previously communicated to one of the Secretaries of State, and it was returned with the passage I have alluded to expunged. The consequence was, that no address was presented. This was before the Rebellion broke out in Ireland. Since that event, a plan has been suggested by the Prince, that he should go to that country with Moira, Lord Hutchinson, and Sheridan; in such a disease, even desperate remedies and quack medicines ought to be tried, and I really believe that the humbug popularity of Sheridan and Moira might have a healing effect, especially if assisted by the more substantial measure of emancipation, which hazards nothing against us, gives the Irish almost all they ask, and nothing more than, in justice, they ought to have had long ago. The Doctor, or some other of his compeers, said of this scheme with great decency, that it was as much as their places were worth to hint at it.

Manners and Studies of Women. Upon this subject Mr. Horner had probably been indoctrinated by the Rev. Sydney Smith, a daring innovator, at least for the ancient times in which he flourished, wrote, and lectured, when an inroad on the sanctity of female ignorance was as unprecedented as it was bold. The passage occurs in a letter from Horner to one of his sisters :—

I spent a most agreeable ten days at Cheltenham; from the first day I felt myself in a family party. We spent the whole day at Lady Carnegie's house at Bay's Hill, about a quarter of a mile from the town; by the whole day, I mean beginning with breakfast, and keeping it up till past midnight. In the morning as many as were disposed made out a ride or a long walk, before and after which there was some loitering under those old trees, and in the evening, after a genuine "four-hours," all round a table, we had music and waltzing; we, I say, for after some morning lessons from Miss Elliot, I was hardy enough to attempt to swing, "and mock'd all tune, and marr'd the dancer's skill." In the course of our rides or walks, we saw the old abbey church at Tewkesbury; the ruins of Sudely Castle, where Queen Catherine Parr lived after her second marriage; and the ancient house of Squire Delabere, who at eighty-three years of age, lives with a brother and two sisters, all very old, and all unmarried, being the last of a family which dates from the Conquest, and had a knighthood in it, for saving the Black Prince at Poictiers.

I might refer you to Murray for his opinion of Lady Carnegie; for through him I have known something of her for several years; but you may tell him that he had not exaggerated anything in the praises he often bestowed upon her. She is an instance of the best Scotch female manners, affability, sincerity; a turn for speculation and inquiry; sprightliness of understanding, as well as manner, united with a great relish for humour, and considerable execution in that way; and all refined and regulated by natural good sense, and the experience of good company. There is not a word of panegyric in what I am saying; it is but a very imperfect likeness of her. Nothing can be more delightful than to find such a character at the head of a very large family, and to see all the cares and anxieties it must occasion, borne so gracefully.

I am glad to hear you are reading regularly,—I should like much to know more particularly what your schemes are in that way. Besides the usual chances of new books and periodical publications that must be read as they are passing, in order that you may be up with other people in conversation, and indeed to profit most by conversation which derives excellent topics from these materials, I strongly advise you to have some settled plan of your own for the winter, in which a little may be done every day, by which a great deal will be found done at the end of the campaign; some one subject to be mastered thoroughly, by reading the best of all that relates to it, and keep it a secret to yourself, and Nancy, and me; for talking spoils all such undertakings, and cuts them short. If you take one, and Nancy another, there will be information upon both, for both of you, when you want it; and for me, too, when we all live together again; and one little scheme of that sort, fairly and well executed in the course of the year, will, at the end of two or three years, leave you in possession of more than you can dream of at present. While it is going on, nothing is so satisfactory as to have that regular occupation to lean upon as a resource, for a portion of every day.

Parliamentary Reform.—The more I think about Parliamentary Reform, I am the more satisfied that good would result from making the representation more popular than it is; and if it is not done legitimately, the people of this country will one day have a fight for it.

Association of children of the different ranks, and of boys and girls, in education.

I was thoroughly convinced upon the spot of the good effects resulting from the mixture of the farmers' boys with those of their ploughmen; the former, who bring a little more education from home, and stay at the school till somewhat a more advanced age, gain, in the usual competition of their learning, a superiority which appears to be owing to nothing else than their fate in this fair rivalry, while it puts upon the most pleasing footing that difference which is to last through life; at the same time, that the competition, and the level upon which they are all placed, gives both that just sense of equality which both ought to be taught, and the teaching of which, in common, to boys of the middling and higher ranks, is one of the main advantages of the public schools of England. I like very much, too, the putting girls and boys in the same classes, at so early an age: it gives the boys a new spur to emulation; the girls are usually so much quicker. Of course, Mr. Poole's method will not have the same complete success as at Enmore, except where a person like himself will take as much pains.

It was Horner who, in The Edinburgh Review, and by other means, first brought forward Joseph Lancaster. The subject of early and of elementary education had with him all the weight and importance which it must ever maintain with enlightened statesmen.

Security for Civil Liberty in the diffusion of landed property.—The only sure and permanent prognostic of civil liberty, that I could hear of in France, is the prodigious subdivision of land, and the unprecedented multitude of persons directly possessed of that property. An estimate, which seemed to come from authority, made it as high as three millions of persons. So great a proportion of this must be held upon revolutionary titles, or upon titles founded in the new law of succession, that one should hope that so much at least of the benefits earned by the Revolution, as consists in this equitable law, and in the salutary transfer of vast domains to the people, must be secured for ever, and fortified against the designs of the court by an insuperable bulwark of such interests and such numbers.

The Squires and the Debt.—Upon the subject of the public debt, I look upon the whole body of country gentlemen to be altogether unprincipled; as eager and sharp-set for rapine, as the Jacobins ever were for their acres.

Scottish and English national characteristics.—Dr. Jamieson's new work on etymology would give occasion for quite a different sort of dissertation; not on the philosophy of grammar, but on the actual history of the languages of Europe, with many curious illustrations of the philosophical history of manners and customs among the common people. The traditionary preservation of so many catholic, and even the most ancient pagan, rites of superstition among the children and old women of your Presbyterian country, is very whimsical, and must be very mortifying to the serious and feeble. . . . . There is a field about a mile off, [from Ragland,] which is called the Leaguer, and must from that name have been Fairfax's encampment; though the people can give no reason for the name, and, like the common people everywhere in England that I have seen, have not the least curiosity or tradition about the history of their country. It is not so with the descendants of the Covenanters.

A Philosophical Reformer.—Stewart insisted this morning, with great elegance and force, on his favourite remark, that the general principles of internal economy and regulation, are far more worthy of the interest and attention of the political philosopher, because more immediately connected with the public happiness, than discussions with regard to the comparative advantages of different constitutions. . . . .

I attend Stewart's lectures, and strive to imbibe some portion of that elegant taste and comprehensive spirit which are diffused over his speculations. At the same time, I confess that I begin to suspect him of excessive timidity on the subject of political innovation, and the practicability of improvement by individual exertion. And I am not sure, if the great elegance and sensibility of his compositions, have not, in some degree, an unfavourable effect in the investigation of truth, and the communication of knowledge: in so pleasing a dress, error and involuntary sophistry might insinuate themselves undetected, because without suspicion; and even truth itself finds admission too easy, when the severities of attention have been lulled into reverie by the charms of the most select diction and the most attractive imagery.

Self-righteous and dictating Associations.—We have a society in town for the suppression of vice, which will probably be overcome, like the laws they would revive, by the good sense of the times; but which, if allowed to have any effect, can have no other than to abridge the pleasures of the lower classes, and to propagate among the class just above them, those views of canting, inquisition, and scandal, which are infinitely worse than all the stage-playing and sabbath-breaking; which I agree with them in holding in great abhorrence.

Provincial Party Politics.—Party politics at Edinburgh are a miserable waste of mind; from the unavoidable disadvantages of a provincial residence, they must narrow the judgment and debase the temper, in the worst manner. . . . . .

I knew long ago, how much the virulent spirit of faction entered into every concern in the narrow but active society of Edinburgh; and that there was no injustice to personal character, however ridiculous, that might not be apprehended in a competition of a public nature.

Reviewing Books.—I scarcely believe it ever answers any good purpose to treat with so much levity, and even petulance, the errors of a man like Burke, or of one who has written so excellent a book as Price.

We might multiply such passages without end. But it is needless, as the reader must already have obtained a tolerably clear idea of the character of Francis Horner, and of those causes which, at a comparatively early age, rendered him so useful in public, and so beloved in private life. From a fine moral and intellectual nature, there never was an adherent of political party whose spirit was so entirely free from rancour and bitterness, nor a man without original advantages of birth or station who had his own way to make, whose ambition was more pure from the alloy of servility. In the high political and social circles into which he was received as with open arms, he appears to have taken his place as of right, and to have sustained his part with simplicity and manly dignity.

For several years before his illness assumed the decided character of pulmonary disease, Mr. Horner had occasionally suffered from a complaint which perplexed the physicians whom he consulted, both in London and Edinburgh. An uneasiness, amounting to difficulty of breathing, was one painful symptom; yet the disease was declared to be neither water on the chest, nor tubercular consumption. Dr. Baillie alone rightly conjectured the real nature of the unwonted complaint to which Mr. Horner, without any apprehension of his end being so near, fell a victim. It was an enlargement of the air-cells of the lungs, and a consequent condensation of their substance,—a form of disease so unusual, that Dr. Baillie had known only of three cases of so rare a disorder, and these not in his own long and extensive practice, but from examining anatomical collections. This form of disease is quite beyond the reach of medicine. Mr. Horner died at Pisa, whither he had gone, attended by the Editor of the Memoirs, by the concurrent advice of all the physicians whom he had consulted. His letters to his family and friends are continued to within a very few days of his death. In them his mind appears in full vigour, his social affections in full play; and, indeed, there is no part of his correspondence more lively in style, and agreeable in matter, than his letters to those female friends who felt an anxious interest in his recovery,—of which neither he nor his brother ever appears to have doubted. On the 4th of February, 1817, he thus wrote his father, after describing the scenery around Pisa:—

I give you this description, that you may have the better notion of the rides we can take; nobody knows better than yourself, how much the efficacy of that sovereign medicine depends upon the eye being fed, as one jogs on, with cheerful scenery and great prospects. We shall have still greater enjoyment, when we can extend our ride to the hills themselves. At present I go out in a little carriage, and Leonard gives me his pony when we get to the turf; but I feel now so strong, that I have set Leo to inquire for a second pony, that we may take the whole in company. The riding does his stomach a great deal of good; since he has been regularly on horseback, he has complained much less of acid and other evils. The opium has certainly a very signal effect upon my breathing; within an hour after I take my pill, if I have been panting, and coughing, and irritated before, I become quite tranquillised, and all these symptoms are suspended, so that I not only have perfect ease while I remain at rest, but I may even move about, and use a degree of muscular exertion with freedom and impunity, for which I should be speedily checked by palpitations and short breath, if I had not the drug in me. . . .

Since writing this letter, I have had my ride; we are just come in. The air blows fresh, but the sun is warm, and the sky without a cloud. There are the most active appearances of spring; a strong vegetation in all the winter-sown crops, and that bustle of field labour which at no season of the year is more enheartening than at the present. The great variety of occupations here, makes it still more cheering and interesting; in one field, they are still gathering the olives, in another pruning the vines, in a third ploughing for their Turkey wheat, in a fourth preparing the ground with the spade for some other sowing. Labourers are mingled of both sexes. The plough is most primitively rude; the grey oxen have a primitive beauty, that seems to suit it. Nothing makes me more impatient of my restraints, than the sight of these fields; for I feel far greater curiosity to know the ways and habits of this peasantry and their husbandry, and to understand a little the frame of a society so unlike what we have at home in the most essential respects, than to penetrate into the Campo Santo, with all its treasures of art. I regret that we have lost Mr. Oswald, to whose assistance I looked forward in walking out to the Pisan farms, when I can walk; he is gone to Rome.

Only four days later, and the warfare of the writer was accomplished,—the task given him to do on earth, nobly fulfilled. The monument erected to his memory by his sorrowing friends has long had a place in Westminster Abbey; his more perfect and enduring monument will be found in the record of his virtuous and useful life, gathered into these volumes from his speeches in Parliament, and his private papers.

"RITTER TOGGENBURG."

A BALLAD, FROM THE GERMAN OF SCHILLER.

"Sir Knight, both sisterly and true
My heart shall ever prove;—
O ask no more, lest ye should change
To grief that sister love.
Calm would I still to you appear,
Calm my resolve be keeping;
Yet, O! I scarce can understand
Your dark eye's silent weeping."

He hears, and mute, with grief oppress'd
Upstarting—it were need,
He clasped her wildly to his breast,
Then flung him on his steed;
Summon'd his serfs—from Switzer's vales,
They come with horse and brand,—
Each bore a cross upon his breast,
Each sought the Holy Land.

There noble were their deeds, and great
The trophies which they won,
As through the banner'd ranks of war
Their plumy helmets shone.
Where charged the infidels, He bore
The proud, the fearless part;
Yet war, nor victory, could assuage
The sadness of his heart.

A year—no more he may endure
A woe so long concealed,
Then quits he, that unhappy Knight,
The war and tented field;
And in a ship from Joppa's strand,
He speeds him o'er the tide,
To that loved shore which, all for him,
Her sweet breath sanctified.

A pilgrim at her castle stands,
He knocks, in hope, in fear,
Ah! thunder-like what words are these
That smite his startled ear!
"She wears the veil, she whom you seek,
And is the bride of Heaven.
A festal day was yesterday,
When she to God was given."

For ever! quits he then, for ever,
His halls, his castle grey,
His arms, his faithful horse, and wends
His solitary way;
His solitary way he wends
From Toggenburg, unknown,
And o'er his noble limbs has he
A hair-cloth garment thrown.

And where, 'mid lindens dark, there stood,
In ever varying light,
Her cloister'd home, he rear'd his hut,
That miserable Knight.
Tarrying from morning dawn to eve,
Again when morning shone,
With hope like light upon his face,
There watch'd he—and alone.

And there for hours, long hours! he sat,
And for that best beloved,
Look'd ever towards the cloister, till
The well-known lattice moved,
And she appeared! O ne'er on him
A brighter vision smiled,
Than that dear form that meekly bow'd,
So calm—so angel-mild.

Joyful, O then, he laid him down,
And soothed with trustful sleep;
Joyful, that morn should call him up
His vigil fond to keep:
And so for days—for years he sat,
For years, all unreproved,
Unmurmuring, griefless, watching, till
The well-known lattice moved,

And she appeared—O ne'er on him
A brighter vision smiled,
Than that dear form that meekly bow'd,
So calm—so angel-mild.
And so—one morn there sat a corpse,
That cloister-ward did bear
Its pale and tranquil face, as still Intently, gazing, there.

MY MONOMANIACAL EXPERIENCES.

BY DON GAULTIER.

Yes, thank Heaven! there is a great load off my mind. I can now afford to smile at the foolish apprehensions which used to haunt me about certain transactions in which I have been engaged. How often have I started from my dreams in an agony of cold sweat, under the impression that the claws of a police-officer were riveted in the collar of my nightgown! What a hell of misery I endured that day, when at the hospitable board of the Editor of The Edinburgh Review, I sate cheek-by-jowl with the Procurator Fiscal of A——, and heard that facetious functionary discuss, with singular felicity, the rules of evidence as applicable to a notorious case of murder! Nor shall I ever forget my horror when, one fine winter's morning, No. 359 of the G. Division entered my apartments at the Albany, though the object of his avatar proved to be merely a summons for me to attend at Bow Street, for the purpose of identifying a noble friend, who was afflicted with an irresistible penchant for the silver plate of his Club! For years my life was a burden to me—not from any fault of my own—no! I flatter myself I am above the weakness of remorse!—but solely from my having misunderstood the laws of my country. Ass that I was, I believed that theft was theft,—murder, murder; and that Botany Bay was as surely the guerdon of the one, as an exit at eight in the morning through the New Patent Drop was the climax of the other. Chief Justice Tindal has purged my mental vision.

And thou, friend of my soul! why shouldst thou longer bear the secret in thy breast? The knife went to his heart with a scientific certainty. He fell without a groan. Oh, let not the world burst in ignorance. Step forth, worthy John Smith, from thy honourable obscurity;—Bentley will give a couple of guineas per sheet more for "the article,"—and henceforth let, "Who murdered Begbie?" be no vain inquiry.

For my own part, I mean to make a clean breast of it. A year or two ago I should have hesitated certainly before admitting the public to an unreserved acquaintance with certain passages of my biography. But as I left the Old Bailey the other day, after the trial of M'Naughten, I felt my scruples vanish into thin air, like the last whiff of an exhausted cigar. I am a MONOMANIAC! In that fact lies the solution of all my fears: it is the dissolvent of all my moral and civil responsibilities. I am impervious to public opinion, and rather court investigation than otherwise. I could fill volumes with my murd—monomanias; but, leaving my literary execution—I mean executor—to record my eventful history with more satisfactory detail, I shall now merely dash off a few sketches as a sort of Sop to Cerberus, to whet the public craving for wholesome excitement.

My first monomania dates from my native city of Glasgow. I was then a boy of some thirteen, in daily attendance at a classical seminary, where Latin and Geography were dibbled into the youthful mind by a snuffy probationer of the Kirk, at about the same rate of remuneration per numscull, as a market-gardener receives for planting a row of brocoli. Midway between this school and my paternal mansion, at the corner of a street, the name of which I have now forgotten, an aged minstrel, called Sanders Bogle, regularly took his stand. He was a decrepid villain, who might have seen some sixty winters, sand blind, with a white stubby beard, and a crooked nose, from the point of which a large amber-coloured drop evermore tremulously depended. A barrel-organ was slung over his shoulders by a discarded horse-girth; and on this infernal machine did the Timotheus of the Gallowgate grind away unceasingly for sixteen hours out of every twenty-four. It was a new barrel-organ when first I made its acquaintance, and possessed of considerable power, although adapted for only one tune—that tune being "The Flowers of the Forest," whose untimely disappearance must have been bewailed, by the hands of Sanders Bogle, many millions of times during the course of his miserable existence. I had to pass that man six times a-day on my way to and from school, and every time that I passed, there sate Sanders grinding.

> ——— Sedet æternumque sedebit
> Infelix Theseus.

By a constitutional antipathy I have always loathed and abhorred music—plaintive music in particular. I cannot listen to certain tunes, indeed, without experiencing a strong desire to strangle the performer. Of these is that sickening "Flowers of the Forest." When but six years old, I stabbed my nurse—a Yarrow woman—with the kitchen scissors, for merely attempting to use its magnetic influence, when every other means of putting me to sleep had failed; and Dr. Sourscones declared, upon soul and conscience, that had the implement not been somewhat blunted in the culinary operation of cleansing haddocks, poor Ailsie Potts would inevitably have been "wede awa," like her moss-trooping ancestors at Flodden. Judge then of my feelings towards Sanders Bogle!

In vain I thrust my fingers into my ears, and rushed past my tormentor like a whirlwind. A horrid fascination was upon me, like that of the Ancient Mariner upon the wedding guest. I was the man, or rather boy, "that must hear him." Sanders Bogle was a magician, the barrel-organ his implement of power. It was my weird——my destiny to see, to hear him. I was a victim to be daily immolated upon the organ of Sanders Bogle. My very sleep was haunted by the ghost of his solitary ditty.

This feeling grew upon me, till at last I stood in awe of the venerable ruffian. I firmly believed that, miserable as my actual existence was, he was able to make it infinitely worse. He might transform me into the barrel-organ, to moan out for ever, in atomic fragments of sound, the notes of that doleful coronach. At last an idea struck me. Michael Scott without his book sank from an Archimage into a dotard: might not Sanders Bogle sink likewise, if deprived of the implement of his power. I had but to possess myself of the barrel-organ, and I was free—free as an emancipated Ariel.

That very evening I stole an aged carving-knife from the kitchen dresser, and, with sixpence purloined from my mother's drawers, I purchased a hone. For two long days I sat in the garret, whetting the dull metal against the stone, until the edge was polished and the point sharp. I proved its keenness by a stab into the first volume of the Encyclopædia Britannica. It penetrated through boards and paper as far as the word "Acoustics." I tested its edge: it severed my uncle's newest and strongest buckskins, as if they had been made of cobwebs. Thus armed, and fortified with a couple of glasses of Port wine, surreptitiously swallowed from a decanter, which had been somewhat incautiously left in the dining-room press, I stole out of doors, a little after dusk, to effect the work of disenchantment.

It was a drizzly evening, and the lamps stared out of the mist at each other, like so many rising moons. As I skated along the slippery streets, a strange sensation of dread came over me. I had even begun to meditate a retreat—when a cold sleety gust of wind blew directly in my face, and brought with it the wail of the infernal machine. Of course, after that there was no drawing back. On I walked resolutely with set teeth, one hand buried in my breeches' pocket, the other in my breast, and that one clasped the knife! On I went, the hideous music sounding ever clearer in my ears, till I reached the well-known corner, where Sanders stood as usual grinding his infernal mill. I approached cautiously, got behind him, and was just about to insinuate my weapon under the horse-girth beneath his shoulder, when I felt something like a steel-trap close upon my left leg with an agonizing snap, and I knew that I was in the grasp of the fiend!

Like all other necromancers, Sanders Bogle had his familiar spirit. Some have attended their mortal masters in the guise of blue-bottle flies, others in the semblance of cats; and others—witness the imps of Faust and Albertus—in the shape of coal-black dogs. This latter description of demon it pleased Sanders Bogle to affect. His Mephistophiles was a shaggy, bandy-legged mongrel, with a pair of red eyes blinking through a felt of clotted hair. This imp, which rejoiced in the name of Bawsey, was fastened by a long string to the barrel-organ, of which he was thus constituted the tutelary guardian. It was in his fangs that I now found myself. His growl awakened the sensibilities of the wizard, and for a moment the organ ceased to grind.

"At him, Bawsey, at him!" muttered the malevolent organist, groping round him with his stick till he ascertained the precise position of my head, upon which he incontinently delivered a blow vicious enough to have cracked a cocoa nut. In vain I yelled and danced a frantic Cachuca. The demon would not let go, and I had dropped my knife. At last, however, I managed to plant a tremendous kick with my disengaged foot right between the eyes of Bawsey, who thereupon opened his jaws for a preternatural howl, and in so doing, voided his hold. I limped homeward in an agony of fear and pain; and the hateful dirge for the Forest Flowers sounded behind me as I went, like the Pæan of a mocking fiend.

Long and anxiously did I brood over my revenge. To attack Bogle again, so long as Bawsey was alive, I knew to be fruitless! Accordingly, I changed my tactics, and commenced a system of conciliation by throwing bread and other comestibles to the fiend as I passed on my way to school. Bawsey was propitiated, and invariably wriggled his misshapen stump of a tail, whenever I approached.

One day I abstracted a veal cutlet from a dish of these savoury esculents on its way from the dining-room to the kitchen, having previously procured a sufficient supply of a certain white powder, frequently employed to curtail the earthly sorrows of rats and octogenarian uncles. I deposited about half an ounce of this mineral in a longitudinal bisection of the cutlet; and having wrapped it carefully in paper, took my way to school. Bawsey wagged his tail as usual, and I threw him the cutlet. Fool that I was, to think I could cajole the fiend! He smelt it only once; and, fixing upon me the glare of his charcoal-red eyes, he curled up his hairy lip so as to exhibit a double row of formidable fangs, and emitted an unearthly howl. I took to my heels as if Beelzebub were after me in person, got well pawmied by the probationer for not knowing one word of my lessons,—how should I?—and on my return home, observed from the opposite side of the street—for this time even the barrel-organ could not draw me across—the malignant Bawsey frisking in a transport of satanic joy around the corpse of another mangy cur, whose hunger had, no doubt, overcome his discretion.

That very night I left Glasgow, and entered as a cabin-boy on board a merchant vessel bound for the West Indies. One city, one hemisphere was too small to contain both me and Sanders Bogle. There was no alternative: one of us must quit the field or die.

Such was the first phasis of my monomania. Its catastrophe was reserved until some eight years more had run their course. With slight exceptions, I was at sea during the whole of that period. For five years I sailed under the British flag, and for the remaining three beneath the shadow of a pennon undisgraced by national appropriation. In our moments of mirth and jollity, my gallant messmates used to designate our bunting by the endearing appellation of "The Jolly Roger;" and we vowed to keep it flying, as long as a plank of our craft stuck together. We were a happy and brotherly crew; but, somehow or other, every one of us had his monomania. If we casually came across a deeply laden merchantman on the high seas, with an infatuation not otherwise to be accounted for, we invariably attacked, boarded, and scuttled her, having first appropriated the cargo. Nor did we stop here. For we had a craze for seeing the captain and crew of vessels in this situation, walk along a plank placed on the bulwarks of our ship, until they plumped into the clear blue water. It was so beautiful an illustration of the laws of gravitation!

In the course of some months, a new monomania took possession of the common sailors, of whom I was one; and nothing could drive out of our heads the conviction, that it was indispensable for the welfare and enrichment of our body corporate, that a certain medicine, made up in leaden pills, should be administered to the captain, lieutenant, and certain others of the crew. The medicine was administered accordingly: but somehow it disagreed with the patients, and they all died. Having performed the last sad offices of friendship by pitching their bodies to the sharks, we shared their executry among the survivors, according to the marine code regulating intestate succession. The monomania went on increasing; and a good many of our original number were subjected to the recognised pharmacopeia, and died. Sometimes the treatment varied, and we let blood, without being particular as to an artery or two: but the result was quite the same. At last, when our number was reduced to six, we unanimously voted ourselves in sound health, put into a Spanish port, sold the vessel and cargo, divided the proceeds, and parted. I have heard nothing of these fine fellows since, except, indeed, a floating rumour that two of them, upon whom the fits of monomania had been very strong, had formed an eccentric fancy for hanging in chains; and, accordingly, are swinging still in that singular fix, somewhere in the neighbourhood of Port Royal.

I returned to Glasgow with rather more doubloons in my pocket than I am fortunate enough to possess at the present moment. The first thought that flashed across me as I set foot on the Broomielaw, was this. Was Sanders Bogle still alive? Did the destroyer of my boyhood's peace still drag on his miserable career?

I felt that I could have no peace until that problem were solved; and accordingly, after hastily depositing my luggage in an hôtel, I rushed towards the ancient corner. A feeble sound grated upon my ear, and there, as in bygone days, stood Sanders Bogle and his barrel-organ.

Years had told upon Sanders: he looked much older, and more decrepid; and his beard was, if possible, more stubby, and his nose more awry, though still decorated with its glancing pendicle. The world was evidently not the friend of Bogle. His coat was threadbare, and darned with worsteds of every dye; his hat had lost both rim and crown; the old horse-girth was split into separate thrums; and his shoes had degenerated into bauchles. My feelings towards him were those of commiseration. I yearned to remove him from a scene of so much anxiety and affliction. But the change upon the organ was even more remarkable. The very "Flowers of the Forest" had been ground away, in the course of its ceaseless revolutions, and nothing but a few petals turned up now and then, as the mill went painfully round. Many bars of the tune were wanting; yet still the withered hand of Sanders cleaved unto his beloved instrument. And Bawsey was gone! The demon was no longer there to interpose between me and Bogle; but for the moment I meditated nothing. The feeble squeak of the organ excited no frenzy in my bosom. The spell was broken, and, turning sullenly upon my heel, I walked back to the hôtel. My monomania, however, was not dead, though dormant.

I threw myself upon my bed, and smoked sixteen consecutive cheroots, in silence and moody rumination. I shall not trouble the reader with the detail of the mental process through which I arrived at the two following conclusions:—first, that Sanders Bogle, by forcing me prematurely to quit my home, had been the direct cause of thirty-nine human lives being sacrificed in engagements, philosophical experiment, and otherwise; and that indirectly he had aided and abetted in the destruction of some two hundred more; and, secondly, that the said Sanders was answerable for the aforesaid extensive loss of life, and ought to suffer death. My mind was further tranquillized by the reflection, that the removal of the minstrel from existence would be a direct benefit, not only to the public at large, but to himself.

Having arrived at these conclusions, I lost no time in repairing to a neighbouring slop-shop, where, for a trifle, I provided myself with the full-dress costume of "a young Gorbalite," a local character, somewhat resembling the flaneur of Paris, and well known to the shopkeepers of the Trongate. Arrayed in this elegant attire, I sallied forth after nightfall, and accosted Sanders in the melodious accents of the West, which, in all my wanderings, I had never forgotten.

"Eh, Sanders Bogle, man, hoo's a' wi' ye? It's a dooms-lang time sin' you an' me forgathered."

The crystal fell from the girandole of Sanders, as he replied—"'Deed, no weel ava; for its unco cauld, and aum getting frail. But wha' may you be that's speerin'?"

"Preserve us, man! hae ye forgot Jock Nievieson the collidgener?"

"Weel, I dinna ken. There's a hantle of the callants aye ganging aboot, and a body canna mind a' their names."

"Eh, man," I responded, "ye look unco dreich standin' there on the cauld stanes; and it's a wat nicht at best. Kwa doun wi' me to the Broomielaw, and I'll gie ye a half-mutchkin, man, for auld lang syne."

"Hoot, lad, I canna do that. I never gangs aff my stance till the clock has chappit ten on the Tron. No that I mislike the whisky; but whiles I get maist bawbees after the gloamin'."

"Deil take the bawbees, man, and the whisky baith. I tell ye it's brandy ye'se get frae me, and nae less; and a white shilling into the bargain."

"Brandy!" cried the sensual sinner, with a scream that almost amounted to a yell. "Was it brandy, ye said? O man, I'd gang to the end o' the warld wi' ye, for a mouthfu' o't. Just bide a gliff, till I sling my breadwinner on my back; and gie's a haud o' yer arm, for my sicht's no sae gude as it used to be."

We walked down slowly, leisurely, and affectionately to the Broomielaw. I began to love the old man, he nestled so close to me. We were accommodated with a back-room in a low pothouse. I remember that room well—there was a bed in it, with blue striped curtains, and over the fireplace was a glazed print of Britannia, and another of Marshal Blucher.

"O man! mak' the tumbler strong!" said Bogle, withdrawing his hands from the fire, as he heard the tinkling of the glass. I complied with his request—LAUDANUM materially increases the strength of brandy.

He drank three tumblers, however, before he became incoherent. He then rambled in his speech, and I made the fourth a good deal stronger. I never remember to have passed a pleasanter evening. Sanders was quite amusing for the first half-hour or so; then pathetic; then, as I said before, incoherent. Next he became somewhat lethargic; and I don't wonder at it, for he had swallowed enough of the opiate to have floored a Chinese mandarin.

"Take it easy, Mr. Bogle," said I, "and never mind me; I feel remarkably comfortable." And so I did. The head of Sanders dropped upon his barrel-organ,—he gave three or four heavy snores, and then all was still. I put my hand to his wrist, and felt that there was no pulse. Very quietly I lifted the tongs, took up a live coal from the hearth, and dropped it into the barrel-organ. I then went out, closed the door, and walked into the street. It was a sweet moonlight night, serene and placid.

"Now," said I, "that job's over."

Next morning, I was surprised to read in the papers, that there had been an extensive fire overnight on the Broomielaw; that three houses had been burnt down; and that the origin of the calamity had been traced to an intoxicated vagrant, who had taken fire by spontaneous combustion; and thus occasioned considerable loss to a respectable Insurance office.

So ended my first monomania.

My next monomania was geological. Its result, oddly enough, was equally fatal.

The summer had been an unusually warm one, and had made a perfect fermenting vat of my at all times too susceptible heart. My evil genius was Miss Jessy Staig, then the reigning beauty of Lanark. A charming creature she was, certainly:—all life, vivacity, and fun—a sort of Euphrosyne of the Upper Ward. I shall never forget the thrill of ecstasy with which I saw her bounding through the right and left of an eightsome reel the evening I was introduced to her at a tea-party at Mrs. Glaikit's, the provost's widow. How she curvetted in and out, clapping her hands, and reeling like an inspired Bacchante! The divine fury of her cutting sixes! I was a "gone 'coon."

I showed all the usual symptoms of the stricken deer—raved, sighed, sonnetteered. I was young then. My attachments are much less volcanic now. Miss Staig was not positively cruel.—No! When I have seized her hand in the twilight among the gooseberry bushes, it was not withdrawn. I can even now remember the diamond sparkle of the tear-drop that stood in her large black eyes, as, with a plaintive desolation in my voice and aspect, I recited to her my stanzas "On a Breaking Heart," over a dish of her paternal strawberries. Byron was in vogue in those days; and my experiences enabled me to pepper my verses with the sentimental ruffianism of Lara and The Corsair very freely. I hinted darkly at inexpiable crimes, and gave her very plainly to understand that remorse was eating into my vitals like corrosive sublimate. The Staig was a mortal woman. I felt assured she could not withstand my passion, and I was happy.

But there was a fly in my pot of ointment. There was a certain Mr. Alexander Treddles, whom I always met at the Staigs'—a young proprietor of looms uncountable—sole sultan of a seraglio of "spinning Jennies"—a linsey-woolsey rogue, that seemed to me to smell perennially of oily wool. If I called of a forenoon, Mr. Treddles was sure to be lounging on the sofa; while the Staig, whom I used prettily to call my Saint Cecilia, was essaying to raise him to the skies by her performance of "The Storm Rondo," or "The Copenhagen Waltz." Of an evening, when I would drop in for an hour, there was Treddles again, on the best possible footing with the authors of my charmer's being. He always stayed supper, and consumed large quantities of cheese. The monster!

I never noticed that he paid particular attentions to the Staig; and she always seemed to treat him with quiet indifference. Heaven! how was I undeceived! That kiss still smacks in my ears! And she—she, who had listened to the deep adoration of my poetic heart, she could calmly blow her nose, and, muttering, "Oh, Alick!" sink upon the soulless bosom of a twister of thrums! I had no malice towards him—none. But his presence haunted me. It was necessary to get rid of it.

The banks of the Clyde were a favourite resort of mine. The knap of my geological hammer often scared the lintwhite and the throstle-cock, as I chipped from the rocks a hundredweight or so of grauwacke, or diverted my daily sorrows with a remarkable specimen of syanite, (sigh o' sighs.) Just over against the Falls, in the side of a precipitous rock which overhung an eddying pool of unfathomable depth, I had discovered a remarkable deposit of trap, to which I frequently scrambled. My hammer had been so active, that a considerable excavation had been formed. It was an idle fancy, but I had a pleasure in hearing the strokes of the hammer falling against the stone, and breaking the monotonous thunder of the Cora Linn.

I remember well one forenoon in particular. There was to be a pic-nic party, from the Staigs' to the Falls next day, of which I had been asked to make one. Treddles was also to be there. It was, by this time, pretty generally understood, that the Staig had agreed to resign her own romantic name for his. But I was above evincing chagrin or disappointment. I had a vague idea that Treddles had wronged me, but that was all. I had, therefore, accepted the invitation cordially and frankly; and as I sat that forenoon by the deposit of trap,— thinking that another tongue than mine should, on the morrow, breathe in her ear the soft, low accents of love, another finger than mine point out each beauty of that fairy spot, another hand than mine cull for her the tenderest tit-bits of the chicken pasty,—my mind was so full of its own sad reflections, that I did not perceive that, in the meantime, my hammer, increasing in the fury of its strokes with the excitement of my feelings, had chipped away about half a ton of rock, leaving a projecting ledge above me, from the canopy of which I thought it prudent to retreat.

Next day we were all at the Falls, as pleasant a party as ever made the woods of Cora ring with their mirth. Treddles was as merry as a cricket, pouring out the facetiæ of "The Laird of Logan" in the jollity of his heart. He was all smiles and politeness, and radiant in a satin vest, sprigged with fuschias. The Staig was the envy of half the pretty girls present. Indeed they could hardly be got to pay the rest of us ordinary civilities, Treddles was so engaging. The weaver's beam had paled our ineffectual fires; and he—but if he did squeeze her waist slyly, every now and then, what was that to me?

Treddles grew excited. The intoxication of success, and of some execrable champagne, carried him away. We were rambling among the woods opposite the Falls, every one trying to discover some point from which their appearance should be most imposing. I found a spot that seemed to me to command a divine view of them. Winding among the bushes, till you reached the verge of the precipice, the sweep of the cataract broke suddenly upon the view; while the long, graceful arms of the silver birch that overhung the spot, formed a delicious framework to the picture. I felt the joy that it would be to point out such a view to the mistress of one's heart. It was a hard task, but I succeeded in stifling every throb of rivalry, and vowed that Treddles should have that joy, since I could not. I led him aside,—told him of the spot. He pressed my hand warmly, said I was a good fellow, and started off for the Staig. He was full of gaiety and lyrical emotion, which he vented by singing, as he went, the charming ballad of "The Glasco' Chappie." All day long, indeed, he had been favouring us with the beautiful moral which forms its burden:—

"What's the odds, sae lang as we're happy!
That's your sort, quo' the Glasco' chappie."

Light-hearted Treddles!

I saw him lead her towards the spot. A resistless impulse compelled me to follow. Her womanly timidity shrank from an approach to the verge of the chasm.

"Nonsense!" he exclaimed. "It's as firm as the rock of Gibraltar. Look here!"

He advanced. Almost instantaneously the ground gave way. Treddles disappeared, and I heard a cry and a splash, and then all was still. The Staig fell fainting in my arms.

Poor Treddles! I never could bear that spot afterwards. The deposit of trap was the most perfect I have ever seen. But my geological monomania left me about the same time that I left Lanark, which was within a week after Treddles' mournful catastrophe.

It was some years before I heard of the Staig again. She was then the mother of eight children, and spouse of Mr. Duncan Bapson, a wealthy baker, and deacon-convener of the trades in the ancient burgh of Hamilton.

I have had many minor monomanias. For instance, I am troubled with an impression that my acquaintances' umbrellas are my own. I never visit my friend Polyglott's magnificent library, but I claim some of his most valuable classics as my private property. It affords me inconceivable rapture to unburden my pockets of the literary treasures, and replace my old friends upon my shelves. In the course of a few days, I have a perfect conviction that I bought them at enormous prices. Another monomania of mine is, always to believe the best hat in the hall, at an evening party, to be my own. Greatcoats are apt to be recognised. I have had many friends who were subject to similar delusions. There was the Honourable I. O. Uwins, for example, who was always writing his friends' autographs on bill-stamps, in place of his own, till at last Government thought proper to interfere. It is not only the author of "The Tuft Hunter" who cribbages from the writings of other men; taking, to use Washington Irving's joke, "line upon line, and precept upon precept, here a little and there a little," and fusing them in the alembic of his own brain into a novel, or a magazine article, which he gives out, and firmly believes to be original, pocketing the price thereof without the smallest scruple. That is the commonest of monomanias. But why go on? Monomania takes as many shapes as Proteus. I asked Lardner, at Boston, the other day, how he came to make that mistake about the right of property in Mrs. Heavyside? His answer was, "Oh, it was all Monomania!"

TO THE SKY-LARK.

We call thee bird of ethereal wing,—
Morning songster,—musical thing,—
Melody's child,—bright bird of fame,—
Sky-lark,—and many a pretty name.

By what do spirits of upper air
Address thee when thou singest there?

Have they a name more sweet than ours,
To win thee from these earthly bowers?

Or what the appellation given
Thy spirit-self in fields of Heaven?—
I'd know it now, that, ere I go,
I may speak it, Lark, I love thee so!

THE LIFE OF A TRAVELLING PHYSICIAN.*

No profession affords such favourable opportunities of curiously and closely observing human nature, whether in its varied open aspects or secret recesses, as that of the "Medical adviser." Neither man nor woman can hope successfully to dissemble with "the Doctor," although so inclined. He sees them, mind and body, in undress,—pounces upon them, at all hours, and in all moods. Hence discretion, inviolable honour on every subject, on looks as much as words, gestures as well as direct confidences, are among his chief virtues; qualities indispensable to his function. But as, in public affairs, the lapse of time renders those transactions which passed in the Privy-council of the Sovereign, and in the secret bureau of the Minister—History, and patent to all mankind for instruction and improvement; so the period arrives, and much sooner than in state affairs, in which the confidential physician may warrantably unfold his experiences, moral as well as medical, for the benefit and entertainment of the world. The Experiences contained in "The Twenty Years' Wanderings" before us, have, however, only that dash of the professional which gives zest to a narrative, by marking it with a distinctive character. The author, though a Physician, is also a man of the world, and, which is better, almost a citizen of the world; clever, sprightly, well-informed, good-humoured, and withal sensible. We are not sure but that a long residence in foreign circles, and five or six years spent in gay Parisian society, at a time of life when the character and habits were still in a great measure to form, may not have made him half a Frenchman. But it is often an admirable structure that which is reared abroad, or rather which there receives its garniture, upon a solid English foundation.——The opening of the work will make a favourable impression, we should imagine, in spite of that airiness or levity, half affected, perhaps, to carry off those grave events which often press the heaviest when they are the most carelessly treated. It relates in substance the history of the outset in life, the hopes, and fears, and early difficulties of a sanguine young man, at that critical and trying period—of which hundreds have had painful experience—when his professional education is completed, and life opening upon him anxiously and with perplexed, if not baffled, hopes. It is at this crisis, when a single useful service rendered to a young man is worth ten benefits conferred afterwards; that in common phrase he "first knows that he is born." Feelings of this uneasy kind had probably helped to increase the indisposition of our wandering physician, when he says—

> What made me so sad, as I gazed upon the receding shores of "Auld Reekie!" What had produced so striking a change in my disposition? Why had pleasure ceased to please?
> I had attained the object of long and ardent pursuit; possession gave me no pleasure, because pursuit was at an end. There were more serious causes for the melancholy which beset me. I was embarking upon the wide world, upon the sea of life, without compass to guide, or sail to waft, or ballast to steady my boat. A pulmonic complaint, aggravated by the accession of a typhus fever, had reduced my frame to the shadow of itself.

This was some five-and-twenty years ago, and just when our Doctor had obtained his medical degree at Edinburgh. He is, however, an Englishman, or perhaps half a Welchman, which may in part account for his vivacity. The state of his own health made a residence in a warm climate highly desirable; and, with a whole pocketful of letters of introduction to influential people in London, and in many other places, he embarked at Leith to try his fortune. Many of these introductions might be of small value, but they were given in kindness; and their balmy effect on the Doctor's spirits is natural.

Roderick Random canvassing his patrons, or the early and the best chapters of "The Diary of a Physician," are not more interesting than our young man's narrative while looking about him, doing all that he could, and willing to do anything, and to go anywhere. India and the West Indies were each attempted to be reached. The abortive attempts, at least, bring us acquainted with some curious varieties of London Practitioners. It is enough that uniformly the patrons who promised the most, performed the least. After many hopes and disappointments, he was at last engaged, through the recommendation of Sir Astley Cooper, by a nobleman, then far gone in consumption, to attend him to the South of France. An idea of the style of the work, piquant, but shrewd, may be gathered from one or two of the early paragraphs. Before obtaining his appointment as travelling physician, the graduate of Edinburgh had been intrusted by a Dispensary London Doctor, who was obliged to leave town for a few weeks, with his practice.

> In a few days I was installed in the Doctor's chair, and was myself become a doctor de facto. It required more tact to manage the dispensary pupils than the dispensary patients. I found some of these said pupils my seniors in more than age, and very inquisitive. A good face upon difficulties, and carry all with a high hand: I was an advocate for decided practice, as it is styled—a decided practitioner; and there is no more certain way of imposing upon people, than by impressing upon them this idea—say that a man is a decided practitioner, it is enough. Nobody will inquire in what sense—bad or good—this word "decided" is to be taken. I bled, purged, and blistered, decidedly; and the cases being of an inflammatory character, as upon Gil Blas's debût, it happened to be decidedly good practice.
> I never shall forget the joy which I felt when I fingered the first guinea. It was a genuine coin, for it was at this time, and a most memorable period it was, that I took my maiden fee. The old unreformed guinea, none of your sovereigns wrapped up with a shilling, as you see them now-a-days. It was pure and without alloy, and often did I finger it over in my pocket, and sighing involuntarily, said to myself, How many more shall I receive in the career which is now opening to me? A conscientious hectic flushed across my face; it was the first and last time that I ever felt embarrassed at receiving a fee. I was in a few days afterwards presented with a second one; it came quite as a thing of course. I thought it tardy in its arrival. These are the only two fees which I took at that period in London.

He thus got wind of his appointment :—

Call upon me, on Sunday, and we will talk again upon the matter. I shall see Lord —— in the meantime." Lord! how the sound of "lord" resounded in my ears—physician to a lord!

In a few days all was arranged, and I was to be introduced to his lordship as Travelling Physician, previous to our departure for the continent. Lord, Physician, and Continent, were three words which I could not have supposed to bear any relation to each other as regarded myself. I had still a fortnight before me ; for his lordship had migrated into the country; and as I was not to see him till his return, I thought I could not do better than take a few finishing lessons in the French language, knowing just as much as boys do when they leave school, where they had a French master once a-week. It happened that M. Racine, professor of the language, lived in the same street as myself. The worthy professor told me, honestly, that as my stay would be so short in England, he could not do me any service, and declined the undertaking. Should I have acted as honestly, had M. Racine applied to me for a fortnight's doctoring for some chronic complaint?

The Doctor, by direction, preceded his patient and the family to Dover. The picture of his tumultuous feelings, his sanguine anticipations, is so freshly true, that its reality is at once felt.

I had received letters from my father, who was in France, authorising me to draw upon him for a hundred pounds ; but the last time that we parted, we had an altercation upon that subject, and I had almost resolved never to apply again to that source. It was an impious resolution, begotten in pride, and reared in ingratitude. Such were my feelings, two months previous, and they were wrought to excess by the little power my fever left me to resist them. How differently did I find myself situated at the present moment. I was at once turning my professional studies to account, and putting into my pocket what I had been putting into my head. I was about to work out my temporal subsistence ; and how easy, how amiable did the task appear! The same excess of feeling, which once depressed me beyond what was absolutely probable, now raised me above all possibility ; for no one ever so little reduced to practice the golden rule of Horace—"Æquam servare mentem." I imagined myself, therefore, at once launched into fashionable life, and was travelling physician to an English nobleman, about to set out upon his travels. How sweetly smooth did the future appear to me ; my success I considered certain. I had the first interest, which would protect and patronise me in future. I imagined myself already practising in St James's, my carriage waiting at the door, until I had dismissed my morning patients.

These, and similarly extravagant misconceptions of my real situation, worked upon my imagination, always prone to look forward to a brilliant future—always paying the price of its ardour in the disappointment of the present. How different did the thing really appear, when placed in its true colours.—What was I, and what was I about to do? A youth, who with some hundred more of his companions, had got a medical diploma, and, by a lucky concatenation of events, was allowed to accompany a family to the south of France, who might repay themselves for the inconveniences such a guest might cause them by some trifling services which he might render them!

The family did not send for me till the following day, when I was summoned to attend them. I was rather mortified, when I heard that they had arrived the previous evening, without immediately sending for me. Why should his Lordship miss an opportunity of availing himself of my services? It appeared to me rather infra dig. Nay, two or three other circumstances piqued me a little, and I determined to keep up the dignity of my cloth. Time and experience put all things to rights. . . . . I commenced practice this evening, and prescribed a composing draught for his lordship, which, perhaps, was never taken. The following morning we started for Paris. Two carriages were waiting in the yard, with the horses, ready. "You will take charge of the calash," said his lordship, pointing it out to me, as he and her ladyship mounted the chariot. Dignity of the cloth, I replied, mentally, as I found myself seated by the femme de chambre. I was sulky during half of the first stage ; I grew better towards dinner time ; and in the evening was as happy as ever I remember to have been. We proceeded by slow journeys, seldom starting before eleven, nor travelling after dinner ; for my patient was in too weak a state to allow of forced marches. This gave me an opportunity of seeing everything to advantage. The everything was in reality nothing; but I did not believe so then.

The ultimate resting-place of the party proved to be Pau, then an almost unknown land to the English—for this was in 1819. In this part of the Narrative there is some valuable medical information. The patient survived till fat in the following spring ; and the physician, after traversing a part of Spain, and seeing his noble patient interred at Orthez, returned to London in much the same condition as at his first starting.

I proceeded direct to London, and repaired to my old quarters in Thavies Inn, where I found things much as I had left them. I determined to remain quietly here, till I could decide finally upon the expediency of pitching my tent in London, or again travelling abroad. My medical friends advised my adopting the former plan ; I was disposed to embrace the latter.

"You must write a book," said the old gentleman to me, just as he awoke from his nap in the back parlour. "I want to see you write a book. Where are the young ladies?" And he took a pinch of snuff, and yawned again in his chair. "You may make it extremely interesting, and any of your friends will give it a dash of science for you. The mineral springs in Germany are good food for a physician, and they are of as much service to him at home as abroad." When I was told that I must write a book, and that it would be extremely interesting, I began to think that I had more talent than I was aware of. I replied, however, modestly, that my peregrinations had extended only to one foreign country, and I could not well write upon the German springs unless I had really visited them. "No necessity in the world," he replied, "for leaving the city ; you will find everything that you want without going a mile from your own door." He then gave me such instructions upon the subject as almost made me believe I had been on the spot, which he told me how to describe.

"A young physician must publish himself into practice," he continued, "or he will find it an uphill concern. I have helped more than one in this way. Nay, John Hunter was the worst writer that ever took a pen in hand. I wrote his essay on the teeth for him, and it was a hard job too ; for not only could I not understand him, but he evidently did not comprehend his own meaning. It was an Herculean labour to him to compose a sentence, and a week's work to make it intelligible, and yet he was a most extraordinary man, and the most laborious one I ever knew. I cannot necessarily know anything of his medical reputation, but I believe that it stands very high." I replied in the affirmative, that it certainly stood very high ; but that posterity judged very differently of his talents. Even John Hunter, I replied, has become a party question in this age of cant.

The old man laughed heartily at this idea, and begged me to explain what I meant.

The explanation has ceased to interest. The theories of Organization and Electricity have for the time given place to Mesmerism. The true principle of life is now, we believe, supposed to be involved in the magnetic influence, though what the old gentleman said of the then fashionable doctrines we may very safely extend to the modern or revived one—

"I would not recommend you, my young friend, to touch upon this subject in your book; it will do you no good; nor indeed have you any very clear ideas upon the matter." I bowed assent, and asked him which mineral waters I should first describe! As he was about to commence, we were interrupted by the arrival of the young ladies, who, as usual, ran up to him and embraced him as a father. "Is there any of the gooseberry pie remaining, my dears!" exclaimed the old man. "Pray let me have some of it." The girls ran out of the room, and the gooseberry pie and custards were soon ushered in. He ate eleven of the latter, and as much of the pie as the custards could cover; and in order to direct the attention of the company from his plate, he related an anecdote of the Lord Mayor's feast, where the deficiency of gooseberry tarts had nearly put to rout the whole Common Council.

And who was this old man, so fond of metaphysics and gooseberry pie! Who this patriarch with hoary head and furrowed cheek, who, not bent down by the infirmities of old age, proved that man can physically and morally laugh at four-score! Read his epitaph written by himself, and it will afford a true picture of what he once was. It was only in his latter years that I knew him, and then even it was impossible to suppose that he ever could have been younger. Replete with anecdote, and polished in his manners, he won the affections of all who knew him; and notwithstanding the mystery attached to his history, you forgot all that conjecture could suggest, in the fund of entertainment which his conversation afforded. He possessed that inimitable art of suiting his conversation to his company, having first, by an indescribable means, ascertained the bearings of their understanding, and the elevation of their intellects. He then ingeniously entered upon such topics as they could readily meet, and by a power of conversational arrangement, allowed them to suppose that they were leading the conversation, when they were in reality but passive listeners to what he said. "As you just observed, and with much justice," so he would tell them something quite new, which, by the manner of doing it, they believed in reality they had themselves told him.

It was the author of "Dr. Syntax," who visited in the family where I then resided. I knew not what was his chief attraction in this quarter, unless it were the gooseberry pies and custards, which he certainly demolished with a peculiar gusto. His anecdotes, which seemed to spring fresh from the bottom of an inexhaustible well, paid amply for the cost of the mountains of pastry which he consumed. . . . . His conversation was always most polished, and the outer was forgotten in the inner man. He often brought us his manuscripts of Syntax's Tour, to read, as he took them to the printer's, and always insisted upon it, that he had not the slightest idea, nor even taste, for poetry. He was the author of Lord Lyttleton's Letters, and the famous ghost story which once produced a sensation in the moral world. He considered this as the best of his productions, and I should agree with him. Although a most voluminous writer, he never put his name to anything he wrote.

Our Physician did not probably touch many fees during the two years he spent in London at this time. His canvass, for the appointment of Physician to an embryo Dispensary, exhibits a lively picture of middle-class London society in a particular aspect. When he obtained the appointment of Physician for five years to the family of a Polish nobleman residing in Paris, we should say the work becomes for a time quite a supplement to Gil Blas; correcting the statement, however, by the recollection that no truer descriptions of actual life are to be found than in the adventures of him of Santillane. We must be content with the head of the household, the Prince, and with but a side-view of him. The secretary, the cook, the valets, are more delicately traced, though each has received, probably, a few heightening touches for stage effect.

The Prince, then, was a man who lived for the day, and only thought of the morrow as able to procure him possibly more entertainment than the day. He seldom read, and if he did, it was only a pamphlet, or the last new novel published by Avocat. With politics he never troubled himself, or he had, perhaps, been too much troubled by them. As regarded general literature, however, he seemed to be quite au fait; he knew the merits of most authors, and could equally point out their defects. Speak of chemistry, he seemed thoroughly acquainted with the principles of the science. Physics he had a natural talent for, and was often occupied in inventing some plan to counteract the loss in vertical motion. He was a very fair mathematician. He was an excellent modern linguist, and could speak half-a-dozen languages fluently. He knew nothing of the classics. His conversation was replete with anecdote, for his memory was most retentive, and he turned everything he heard to his own account: he made it in fact his own. So far from appearing to have neglected his education, he seemed, on the contrary, to have studied a great deal; and yet his whole information was derived from what he had picked up in conversation, and little from books. His social powers were great; and as he was not pedantic, but gallant and amiable in the extreme, so he was adored by the fair sex. . . .

To return to the Prince. I may observe, that his occupations were most trivial. He would rise at five o'clock, put on his robe de chambre, and sit at his table in his study till ten or eleven o'clock, A. M. During the whole of this time he was employed in sketching something upon paper, chewing the corner of his pocket handkerchief, and taking snuff: wholly absorbed in these occupations, he hardly lifted his head from the table until he was summoned to breakfast. Then his latent faculties became free, and he would converse during the whole of this repast with his maître d'hôtel, or his cook, if he had no other company. He seldom, however, was driven to such expedients; for as his table had the first reputation, there were seldom wanting guests in the shape of cousins or nephews, or even of intimate friends. This repast, which generally lasted an hour, was always taken in the robe de chambre; and then he retired again to his cabinet, where he remained until it was time to dress himself for the more important duties of the day; such as are performed by a man with plenty of money, and without any official occupation, in the most dissipated city in Europe. It was a promenade with the Duchess of ———, or the Countess of ———; perhaps it was in paying court to the King, or more probably in doing nothing at all, with which he occupied himself till dinner-time.

If the time previous to this important epoch of the day, for to him "la vie c'était le dîner," was not all disposed of, he quietly undressed and went to bed, where he slept as soundly as at midnight, until his valet announced to him that it was time to dress. Then his imagination awoke, and he was employed in anticipating the quality of the repast, till he found himself seated by the fair Duchess, and in the act of saying the prettiest thing in the world, or relishing a delightful mouthful of some choice dish. This was his element; he shone here as a bright star in the gastronomic firmament; but what greater eulogium can be paid him, than the one pronounced upon him by his own cook, who, in speaking of him, and discussing his different merits, observed, that it was a pleasure to serve him, for, said he, "Monsieur le Prince est essentiellement cuisinier." Now this same artist had been cook to two empresses, and to many princes, which adds weight to the compliment paid the Prince upon his culinary talents. He paid dear for the compliment, it is true, in more ways than one; nor was he blind to the system of depredation which these artists practised upon him.

If he dined out, and the dinner was at all distingué, it served for conversation at the morrow's breakfast; and his cook was sure to criticise the dinner as related to him, and give reasons for administering his own kitchen in a different way; for any eulogium passed on another kitchen was an indirect insult to his own. If he had to cede a point, he always pleaded want of means, and begged for an increase of salary, and then he would compete with any artist in Paris; for he believed himself competent to anything yet known in his art.

Gall and Spurzheim were flourishing in Paris at this time, and their science was in the zenith. The Physician knew them both, and his opinion of them seems to have coincided with that of the French Professors who were unanimous in saying, "Spurzheim croit au moins à tout ce qu'il dit, comme un bon enfant. Gall n'y croit pas un mot." Such was the opinion in Paris.

Dr. Spurzheim at this time gave an opinion on the character of a person from the examination of his head, with which our Physician, though not a believer in Phrenology—which he indeed cuts up severely—was much struck. It was one happy guess.

The five-years' residence in France was, on the whole, a happy period of the Physician's life. He accompanied the family in their annual peregrinations to Dieppe, then first becoming the fashionable bathing-place of the Court. His engagement was not renewed; but he was invited professionally to spend one winter in Poland, and afterwards to go to St. Petersburg. Poland had not yet been finally conquered, and, besides, his Prince was much of a Russian. He took a few weeks to say farewell to old friends in England before setting off. Every one was kind; there could be no professional nor other jealousy of a man about to expatriate himself, probably for life. His country-town and his village sketches at this time are even more racy to English readers than his metropolitan and Parisian adventures. The one is as Crabbe-like as the other resembles Le Sage.

The period of twenty years, spent in different kingdoms, and in various society, affords our Wanderer copious materials for filling up the remainder of his book. Cracow, while Poland was still at least nominally an independent State; Odessa, and St. Petersburg, were alternately his places of residence. In the latter capital he was indeed settled for above twelve years, nor is it easy to say why he abandoned it; though he seems, at the close of his narrative, again adrift upon the world; in which, by the way, by some means or other—though we do not distinctly learn where or when, but before going to the north of Europe, he must have "given pledges to society"—gained a wife and children. We have of late heard a good deal of Odessa, the Crimea, and Petersburg; so, upon the whole, we are more attracted by the Polish sketches. Though it is the Poland of a dozen or more years since, they are more original and fresh than other parts of a narrative, all of which, however, is highly entertaining.

I was to be a hanger-on for some time, and as I had promised to remain the whole winter in Poland, I determined to amuse myself as well as I could in the republic. I had time and opportunity to appreciate the character of the people of both classes; and the more so, as a species of liberty was allowed them here, which has been interdicted everywhere else, viz. the liberty of speech.

The family in which I resided was the most opulent in the republic; nay, two-thirds of the territory belonged to its head, and the house was the scene of continued merriment. We seldom sat down less than twenty to table, and as many more were added to the party during the evening. Feasting and revelling lengthened the days by stealing from the hours of the night.

The guests seemed to go on much as the guests at the English mansion of Lord Amundeville.

> "The gentlemen get up betimes to shoot
> Or hunt; the young, because they liked the sport;
> The middle-aged, to make the day more short."

And so the reader may go on to the end of the canto, without requiring any note or commentary to explain the peculiarity of the country. It is true, we did not hunt the hare, nor chase the fox; but we hunted the bear and the wolf, or formed sledging parties when the weather permitted it. Prince Pückler Muskau has been very minute in his details of a day's amusement in England. In what does it differ from one spent in a Baron's castle in Germany, or in a Palatine's house in Poland?

Each guest breakfasts in his own room, where tea and coffee are served him at his own hour; he rises to take it, or takes it in bed, sipping his coffee, eating his toast, or smoking his pipe, alternately. If he has no particular plan of amusement for the morning—no hunting, no shooting, nor gallanting, he remains in his dressing-gown, reclining upon his sofa, with a pipe in one hand, and a book in the other, till dinner-time. There is in most houses a luncheon served about eleven, but it is often sparingly attended by the guests, for the dinner-hour is early in Poland. Not "longing at sixty for the hour of six," their longings are not so long, and all assemble for the grand object of life about three o'clock. Then the ceremonies of inquiries concerning health, and last night's fatigue, and "hope you did not take cold," and "I am afraid that you exerted yourself too much," and "how charmingly your daughter dances," and "when does your son return from his travels?" and then the servant enters with a little tray, covered with little glasses, which he presents with one hand, holding a bottle of brandy or some spirit in the other, to fill the glass at your command, and another servant hands you a small bit of cheese, or a bit of dried salmon, or salt herring, with a little bit of bread upon which to put the tit-bit, which you put into your mouth; and, the folding-doors opening, you hand a lady in to dinner.

As regards the seat you occupy, the nearer you are to the mistress of the table, the nearer you are to the seat of honour; and each takes his place by a kind of aristocratic instinctive feeling. The doctor sits very near the end of the table, the farthest removed from the seat of honour.

The dishes are all handed round, as in France, and nothing is carved upon the table, which is generally covered with the dessert. There are few dishes peculiar to the country, except the sour soup, which is exquisite. The beer is delicious: the wines of the country bad; but at a nobleman's table, of course, the best wines are imported from France.

The dinner does not last long; the process of carving much lengthens this repast with us. All rise together, and the gentlemen conduct the ladies to the drawing-room, where coffee is served. If there be no strangers present, it is customary for the men to retire into their rooms immediately after dinner, where they smoke their pipes, and take a siesta till about eight o'clock. All meet in the drawing-room at tea-time, when evening visiters flock in. Then begin the waltz and the mazurka, with the ravishing German music. How much he loses who does not dance, and has not music in his soul! Cards, dice, billiards, have their votaries, and the amusements continue till midnight, when all retire, and the following day resembles the preceding. . . . .

In Poland there are but two classes of society—the rich and the poor, or the nobleman and the peasant; there is no tiers état, and the whole commerce of the country is carried on by Germans and Jews. The lower class, who inhabit the towns, are, for the most part, indolent and lazy, and much addicted to drinking. As soon as they procure a few kreutzers by their labour, they buy spirits, and cannot be induced to work till their funds are exhausted. Everything therefore proceeds very slowly. It is the work of years to complete a moderate-sized house; and even public works do not seem to progress more rapidly. The people are dirty in the extreme; and their mental endowments are not of a very high order. They are very bigoted. . . .

The inhabitants of the country differ widely from those of the town. The peasant is a distinct being, living entirely upon the produce of the ground he cultivates, and with which alone he seems conversant. His state of well or ill being depends upon a variety of circumstances not to be understood but by those who have resided some time in the country. Some have no other possession than a hut and adjoining garden, sufficient only to plant their potatoes. Others are like our little farmers, who pay a rent for their land; and others pay an annual poll-tax. Some work out their temporal existence by labouring five days in the week for their master.

Their dress is grotesque, but pleasing to the eye. A long white cloth coat, reaching to the heels, cut in a peculiar shape: a large, broad, and thick-stuffed leathern belt, buckled before by five or six straps, surrounds the waist. This allows of all variety of taste. Some are of plain leather, some studded with silver-headed nails, and some with mother-of-pearl, inlaid in shapes of flowers and images. This part of the dress seems to be the touchstone of their pride. A long, blue waistcoat, with embroidered flap pockets; loose striped cotton trousers, thick long boots, and a broad-brimmed hat; all these much modified by the circumstances of the individual; but such was the Sunday attire of a respectable peasant when I resided in the republic of Cracow.

If a nobleman in a fit of anger killed one of his peasants, the law compelled him to furnish money sufficient to bury him. If he slew the peasant of his neighbour, the latter could compel him to replace him by one of his own. . . . . .

I was playing at cards on new year's eve, when the cold was very intense—I think 27° Reaumur, and a servant entered the room to inform a nobleman that three of his peasants were found frozen to death, about a mile from the town. "Il n'y a que trois, c'est peu de chose," and continued his game of quinze, without making another observation. The same circumstance might have occurred in England; but would not he to whom the news was communicated make it his care immediately to send his steward to give all the consolation possible to the distressed families? Not so with the Pole; he only became more anxious to win his game at cards, to make up for the loss of the three peasants. This, it is true, was an instance only of passive conduct; but I witnessed so much more active brutality exercised by the rich towards the poor, so much want of common humanity in the relations existing between them, on the part of the superior, that so far from sympathising with them upon the loss of their liberty, I could not but regret that they ever should have had so much in former times, seeing how cruelly they abused the little which was still left them.

The above might not be acceptable at a Polish public dinner in this country; but it has a flavour of truth notwithstanding. Those men hardly deserve freedom, who would deny the blessing to their fellow-creatures. A handful of proud and extravagant feudal nobles, with millions of their enslaved serfs, must have formed a social community which offers some palliation for the ruthless invader.

The true theory, nay, the actual practice of acquiring a variety of languages, is thus explained, and is not, philosophically considered, at all remote from the above subject of civil liberty:—

The Pole is of all others the man most calculated to shine in society. Variety of language, which to most foreigners is so great a barrier, and allows them rather to be tolerated than courted, is to him no obstacle. When he is at Vienna, he speaks better German than the Emperor; when in Paris, the most refined ear can hardly detect the foreign accent; and even in London, his pronunciation of English is so much more tolerable than that of all other foreigners, that it is the subject of general admiration.

This great facility of speaking languages, so peculiar to the Poles, is attributable to two causes: primo, their own language comprehends of itself all the sounds which can be found by a combination of letters; and, secundo, they are accustomed from infancy to speak several languages daily. Polish, German, French, and English ring the changes in their ears every hour of the day; and when these are instilled into them at an age when no choice is allowed, the difficulty of acquiring is inconsiderable.

Languages are only acquired by the habit of speaking them, and not by rules of grammar. It is the constant conversation with natives themselves which gives the facility. Whichever language is predominant, this alone will be the one well-spoken; hence the great object is to allow none to be predominant; and this is accomplished in the education of Polish children, as much from necessity as from choice. The child is, at the commencement of his existence, put into the arms of an English nursery-maid; as he grows older, he will probably have a French dancing-master, a German music-master, and an English tutor. When he has completed his morning tasks under these different tutors, he sits down to table, where the languages are as various as the dishes; and when he retires to his play-ground, he finds half-a-dozen children of different nations to play with. There is not a day in the whole year in which he is confined to speaking and hearing his mother-tongue. It is precisely the language which he knows the least, and which he never speaks from choice.

I have put all this in the masculine gender, and I should have put it in the feminine; for it is precisely the ladies who possess the talent of speaking languages so well. I have hardly ever met with a Polish lady with whom I could not converse in English, and without the least fear of being misunderstood. It is thus, however, that such facility is acquired, and it can be acquired by no other means.

Can a child be expected to learn a language, and speak it fluently, in which he takes a lesson three times a-week, and devotes the rest of his time to his mother-tongue? It is a common error to suppose that even the nice pronunciation of a language may be gained in maturer years; and young ladies are sent to Paris for six months, in order to acquire a correct pronunciation of French, which perhaps they have never heard spoken before, but from the mouth of an English teacher. They might be sent to Pekin with the same chance of success.

But, if so generally adepts in the living tongues, the Poles of this day, according to the Physician, know little of the dead languages. It was not always so.——Before the wandering Galen left Poland, he laid up materials for copious sketches of purely feudal social life. The Castle of a well-known Countess is among the most magnificent of his pictures. It carries one back to the times of the Plantagenets.——The travellers were in the Ukraine, en route for Odessa, and not far advanced in their journey, when the Doctor relates—

I was busy in conjecturing of what use were the small habitations which we passed on our route, as thickly scattered as the post-houses, but insulated from all other habitations. Each was surrounded by a thick-set wooden paling, formed of solid trees, pointed at the top, and which are used for park fences in Russia. The paling was so high as to allow of the top of the roof to be seen just peeping above it. In the middle of my conjectures, we happened to arrive just as three soldiers were lodging two prisoners, chained by the hands, in one of them. They are the resting-places of the criminals who go on foot to Siberia. Here they repose for the night, and sup upon black bread and water. We afterwards passed several convicts, journeying on with slow step and downcast look. Whenever they met with humankind, they were sure to receive some pittance; the poorest peasant would always put a mite into the hat of the criminal as he held it out en passant. There was a great difference in their appearance; some were scarce able to drag their legs along, their backs still smarting from the knout. Others paced it much more merrily.

The halting-places here were the private residences of the nobility; the wretched accommodation afforded by the Jew inn-keepers, being quite unfit for civilized people. This resting-place merits commemoration, from the curious picture of manners which it affords.

We journeyed on without meeting with any adventures, till we arrived at our half-way house, and entered the gardens of the Countess ———.

It would require the pen of Sir Walter Scott to do justice to the personage to whom the whole neighbourhood belonged, and at whose house we now made a halt. Herself of a noble family, and niece of the famous Potemkin, she had enjoyed in her youth all the advantages which personal charms, high birth, splendid connexions, and court favour could procure. The hero of the north, the minister and master of Catherine, had died in her arms. She had been herself the favourite of the empress. She now in her old age was cherished by the grandson, and was as much alive to the smiles of court favour in her eightieth as she had been in her eighteenth year. Possessed of the most splendid fortune in the whole empire, she was a sovereign in her estates, which were much larger than many of the German principalities.

From such a preface, what will the reader expect in the description of her person, of her castle, and of her suite?

He will perhaps figure to himself an old lady dressed in the ancient costume of the country, and in a style of great elegance, surrounded by her favourites, seated upon a stately sofa in a Gothic saloon, and probably occupied with some rich embroidery. He will expect to find the bust, the statue, and the portrait of the Empress Catherine in all the rooms of her palace, and his ear may anticipate the sound of blessed majesty upon all opportunities. He will imagine himself at Tillietudlem.

Of all these anticipations, however, few will be realized. He will see and hear enough of her blessed majesty; but here the illusion will end, and he will rather imagine himself in a comfortable inn in Germany, and a good fat hostess for its inhabitant, than suppose that he is contemplating her who once bore the train of Catherine of Russia.

Nothing surprised me more than my introduction to the old Countess. I had expected to find something noble and majestic in her exterior, and I had almost dreaded the presentation. Imagine my surprise when I was ushered by a Cossack servant into a small chamber, which was almost bare of furniture. The walls were merely whitewashed, and upon the chimney-piece rested an oval cast, in plaster of Paris, of the late empress, which was daubed over with paint. Some logs of wood were hissing beneath, and upon an oaken table were scattered some loose papers and rolls of parchment. The old lady was occupied with her steward when I entered; but, after having signed a few papers and given him her hand to kiss, he retired, and she returned my bow. I was struck with the beauty of her hand, with its delicateness, its apparent softness, and its unwrinkled smoothness. It was worthy of a maiden of eighteen. There was an immense torqueise on the middle finger, which by contrast made the smooth skin appear even more than naturally white.

"I am happy, Sir, to make your acquaintance. As an Englishman, Sir, you have no doubt seen many fine gardens; but I do not think, Sir, that you will find anything in Poland superior to Alexandrine.

"There is the garden of Potemkin, dedicated to friendship; and, not far off, you will find some trees planted by the Emperor Alexander, at his last visit. You will see his bust surrounded by an iron railing; it was upon that spot that he once took a cup of tea. The pagodas and statues cost me a deal of money; but I paid all ready cash, and got a good discount. My garden has cost me four millions of rubles; but, as the angel said, 'You know, Countess, the money has been spent in the country.'

"You will find in your walks, Sir, several pavilions; the windows in them are all of plate-glass. I have to thank Buonaparte for them. I made a vow that I would commemorate the expulsion of the French by spending ten thousand rubles in embellishments, and these windows form one of the items.

"In the great pavilion you will find a marble bust of the emperor, and underneath, engraved on a brass plate, (I suppose you do not read Russ, Sir?) but they are the words of the emperor himself—'I will not sheathe my sword whilst an enemy remains in my dominions.'"

She was running on in this style, without having allowed me to put in a word, when a sudden twinge in her face stopped her for a second, and changing her tone of voice, which was mild and harmonious, though sufficiently commanding, she turned to me, and said—

"Have you discovered, Doctor, any remedy for the tic doloreux? I have been plagued with it these ten years past."

I had now had sufficient opportunity of observing her person, and again admired the beauty of her hand, as she reclined in her Voltaire, and stroked her cheek with two fingers, passing them rapidly over the nerves of the face.

She was of middle stature, and stout. Her features retained all the marks of former beauty; her countenance was placid and expressive; her eyes had naturally lost much of their former brightness, but they still retained some of that animation and playful satire which are so strikingly represented in her portrait, painted in her youth, where, reclining against a column, she points with one hand to the bust of Catherine. All the features of this portrait are still traceable in her octogenarian face. She wore a white muslin cap, and the rest of her dress was comprised in a Turkish robe de chambre. She took snuff in large quantities, which fell upon her dress.

She was still suffering from pain in her cheek, when the dinner-bell rang, and, pointing to the dining-room, she begged me not to be ceremonious, and said she would soon follow.

The dining-room was not better furnished than the parlour; the walls were bare. There was a long table covered with a clean coarse cloth, and nothing encumbered it but a bottle of champagne opposite the hostess's plate, and a bottle of Don wine at each end of the table. About fifteen guests sat down to dinner. If I was surprised at the dinner-service, my astonishment was still greater when the dinner was served; and I committed my observations to paper after the repast. Behind each person stood a servant, not dressed in the most splendid livery. The dinner commenced by slices of cold ham, handed round in a dish; then a cold pâté of the livers of geese; then a salad consisting of raw fish, garnished with slices of beet-root; and, lastly, some thin slices of Parmesan cheese.

Being myself fond of cold meats, I congratulated myself upon having made a good dinner, though I could have devoured more with pleasure; but as I saw the other guests help themselves but sparingly, I could but follow their example. I was about to ask for a third slice of bread, having consumed the two portions of white and brown which were placed before me, when I opened the eyes of astonishment upon the entry of the soup. Not knowing how to act, I watched the operations of the Countess, thinking that I could not do wrong if I followed her example. I despatched a plateful of crawfish soup, than which I never tasted anything more exquisite; and, seeing the hostess qualify it with a glass of wine, I filled my glass from a bottle near me; the doctor's place being, as I have before observed, at the end of the table. Whether she perceived any wryness in my face, as I gulped down the sour wine, I know not, but she ordered the man behind her chair to put beer and kvass upon the board, and immediately a bottle of each was placed before me. I partook of both during the repast, but they were not to my taste. I now found a large sirloin of beef at my left shoulder. The Countess had already helped herself very plentifully; but, after having tasted a mouthful or two, she sent her plate away, which she did with two-thirds of the dishes. I found that a favourite servant enjoyed the privilege of eating off her mistress's plate, who was now employed in groping with her fork in a black earthenware jug, from the top of which a bladder had been partially removed, to pick out some stewed kidneys, which she consumed with a peculiar gusto. This dish was not handed round. Some buckwheat, boiled, and served up with cold butter in a saucer, followed the beef. I took the liberty of allowing this dish to pass, having indeed dined before the arrival of the soup: as I saw in what way the hostess treated her platefuls, I was easy upon this score. The next temptation presented itself in the shape of stewed carp, of which I partook, but they had the really muddy taste of the species; they were well dressed, and seemed to be approved. Had the wine been better it might have stimulated my stomach to a little longer warfare; as it was, I was quite hors du combat, and saw with pleasure what I supposed to be the last dish, in some chickens stuffed with parsley. . . . . Little conversation or only monosyllabic dialogues, enlivened the meal: all seemed anxious to lay in a stock of the vis vitæ only; for, as Pindar (Peter) has said—

Food is the bird-lime of the brain.

No sweet of any kind, save the few raisins in the schlopetse, found place in the banquet. Colonial produce is not patronised by the Countess, who, like one of the old school, thinks that every country sufficeth unto itself. The cloth was not removed, for the table was of common wood, and this does not set off a dessert to such advantage as polished mahogany. I counted fifteen different kinds of fruit upon the table, all the produce of the garden, which now became the theme of conversation; and, to do it justice, its credit was fully maintained by its fruits.

The flavour of the peaches, of the melons, of the pine-apples and grapes, was exquisite. A small basin of pounded sugar was handed to the Countess, who sprinkled a little over her melon, but sent away the basin, observing that the fruit was sugar itself. It is the custom in some parts of Poland for guests to bring their wine and colonial produce with them.

Looking around with a smile of great good-nature, the old lady arose; upon which many of the guests flocked round her and kissed her hand. We retired to the drawing-room, and found our coffee poured out, and ready sweetened. After having sipped it, I was invited to go and survey the garden, of which I had heard so much before dinner; and the old Countess sat down to the quadrille table with three other ladies.

The gardens and grounds were magnificent; the woods stocked with all kinds of game; the ponds full of fish; everything on a grand scale. The champagne for the exclusive use of the hostess; those "below the salt" being supplied with beer and quass; the sugar sent away when her melon alone was sweetened, are as characteristic of the refinement of manners, as anything else. The genius of her extraordinary kinsman had descended on this celebrated lady. "Nothing was too great, nothing too small, for her masterly mind."

She possessed a most speculative genius, and could equip a fleet, or an army, or gain a revenue of 15,000 rubles per annum, by levying upon her peasants a contribution of pigs' bristles! She was profuse in many things, penurious in some. She would give away a million, and contract for the transport of its carriage (if in specie,) upon the most economical terms, with the poorest of her peasants. Her faults have been much exaggerated; and, in spite of all that everybody says to the contrary, I did not find her slaves in a worse condition than those of her neighbours. Of her private character I can say but little, as I knew her only in her old age, and time softens everything. Her manners were agreeable, her conversation amusing, her information good. She had many prejudices inseparable from a character placed in her circumstances.

One important use of all books, those of travels especially, is, that by extending the bounds of knowledge, they show us the real value of what we possess, and furnish us with reasonable grounds of contentment with our own lot. How immeasurably superior in everything that constitutes the true enjoyment, and grace of life—in knowledge, refinement, accomplishments, elegance, genuine luxury—in a word, in the ease and manifold comforts of high civilisation, are the rural homes of many a quiet English family of the middle rank, to the establishment of this semi-barbarous chieftainess, lording it, in her vast principality, over hordes of rude serfs.

On the farther journey to Odessa, we find nothing so remarkable as the following singular scene:—

It was about three o'clock, or perhaps a little later; and in the distance was a hill, the only elevation we had seen since we left Lemberg. I was riding upon the outside of the calash, reading a book, and as we rolled slowly along, I perceived a large black cloud lying upon the top of the hill. I first thought it betokened a thunder-storm, a daily occurrence during the whole of our journey. I was, however, struck with the motion of the cloud, which seemed to assume all shapes, lengthening and contracting, and throwing itself into various contortions. I knew not to what this could be attributable, but of course immediately referred it to the usual and unerring cause which accounts for all physical phenomena—electricity. As I was still gazing upon it, the calash suddenly stopped, and Count ——, who was in the van, beckoned me to him.

"Do you see that large black cloud in the distance, Doctor?"

I have been watching it for some time, I answered.

"Well, what do you think it is?"

It is not difficult to say what it is, but I am puzzling my brains to find out what causes it to make such evolutions; and as I spoke, it suddenly tapered into a long string.

"Now look at them," said the Count. "These are the locusts upon wing. I hardly ever saw such an army in the air."

Is it possible? I replied, half convinced that it was something more solid than air, which now took a different direction, and left the hill clear to the view.

"We shall hear what devastation they have done before we get to Odessa. Woe to him on whose fields they alight—not a green thing will remain.

We lost sight of them all at once, and proceeded on our journey.

"Well, we shall dine with my uncle," continued the Count, "and he will give us forty different kinds of wine to drink, and thirty-nine of them will be detestable. He has been establishing a colony in the desert, and thinks that he can sit under his own fig-tree, and drink wine of his own pressing. You must praise all his wines, but for God's sake don't poison yourself with them."

We soon reached Severinowka, but the locusts were there before us. The host came out to meet us; a thin, spare, and feeble old man, polished in his manners, and affectionate in his greetings.

"Well, you are come to see me ruined," he exclaimed, "for this season. The locusts are in my garden, and in my fields, and my poor peasants will not have an ear of corn to put into their garners. They are all gone out to endeavour, by means of marrow-bones and cleavers, to drive them from the wheat; but it is all in vain. We have not enough hands to put to rout such an army. Come into the garden, and see how thick they cover the ground and the trees."

It is almost impossible to hope for credence from those who have not been eye-witnesses of the sight which the garden presented. The whole of the surface was covered, ankle deep, with these insects, clambering pellmell over each other, but all proceeding in the same direction. They did not allow us to tread upon them, but, on our approach, rose on wing with a whizzing noise, and, flying forwards over the heads of the main body, settled down again in the vanguard of the body of their army. This is the manner in which they alight from the wing: the first rank pitches upon the ground, and the others do not follow the train, but precede it, alighting one before the other, so that the rearguard in flight is the vanguard when they are upon the field.

The sight of them upon the trees was most curious. The branches were bent to the ground by the incumbent weight, and the Italian poplars resembled weeping willows, from their lighter branches being reversed by the weight of the locusts. Several trees were already completely bared, for the insect destroys much more than it consumes. It gnaws the stem of the leaf, and not the body, so that the leaf drops upon the ground almost entire, its stalk only having been eaten.

When the insects are browsing upon the trees, they are not so easily scared away by the appearance of man as when merely settled upon the ground; they hold fast to their food, and the boughs must be shaken before they will leave their hold. This was indeed a curious and amusing experiment; for it was something like magic to see a tree throw its branches up into the air, as soon as the locusts were shaken off. . . . . They avoid coming in contact with mankind in their flight. I have actually been in clouds of them, without one having come near my face. Sometimes, from accident, or from injury, or from fatigue, a solitary one will drop down exhausted, just as we see the straggling sick of an army; but when in vigour, upon wing, they steer clear of human kind.

Volney has given an accurate description of these insects in his Travels in Syria, and mentioned several facts which I myself witnessed. He observes that they are accompanied in their flight by birds of the size of a thrush, which devour them, and make continual war against them. These birds are cherished by the peasants in Syria, and so they are by the people in this country. I have watched them for hours, but must confess I never saw them make much havoc in the ranks of the enemy.

As Volney observes, the locusts are sometimes carried by the wind towards the sea, and being exhausted before they reach the opposite shore, fall dead into the deep, and are washed ashore by the tide, producing a foul infection. I have understood that this is also the case upon the borders of the Black Sea.

When they arrive in full force in a country which is at all populous, the inhabitants drive them away by making noises with marrow-bones and cleavers, &c. They also burn straw or sedge, or whatever light fuel they may possess, to smoke them out. All these efforts go but a little way to accomplish their end, for the locusts, driven from one field proceed to another; and wherever they appear, it may be truly said in the language of Scripture that "The land is before them as the Garden of Eden, and behind them a desolate wilderness." . . . . . At this period it is possible to destroy great numbers by preceding them and cutting deep trenches across their path; they all walk into the trench, where they find lighted straw to receive and consume them. This is a common and most effectual way. Upon the same principle, a person in Odessa invented a kind of long iron roller, which was to be dragged with horses at full pace over their marching armies. All the means, however, resorted to at present, are more plausible than effectual, and have only destroyed the hundreds, to see the millions vanquish. . . . . It is asserted, that when they have devoured all that is green upon the earth, and are unable to procure more food, they are pushed by hunger to prey upon each other; the weak and the wounded thus feed the strong as is the case with quadrupeds under similar pressure of want. The same cause which compels them to consume each other, has often compelled the inhabitants of Syria, in cases of famine, to consume them. They actually grind the dried bodies of the locusts, and knead them into a cake. . . . . We were conversing upon the history of locusts, and lamenting the ravages which they committed, when the steward was announced. He came to report upon the mischief they had done upon the estate. He informed us that the whole crop was destroyed, and that for the distance of several versts, not a head of corn was to be found upon the stalk; every ear of it had been gnawed off by these destructive insects. "Voilà donc mille guinées de perte pour cette année ci, et ce qui est encore pire c'est que le paysan n'aura rien à manger." "I am glad," continued the old Count, "that I am going to St. Petersburg this winter, for I should not like to see the misery which these poor people will have to endure." "Excusez moi, chère cousine," turning to the Countess, "il faut que je fasse ma méridienne;" and he retired to take his wonted nap.

The Poles, as a nation, are said to be the most inveterate gamblers in Europe; though we can hardly credit the wife-stakes to which the traveller alludes, at the close of the following passage. Yet the immoral facility of divorce is an unquestionable fact:—

It must be remembered that although rents may be paid but once a-year in Poland, still spending money goes on all the year round; and, of the expenditure, gambling forms the greatest item. There is much more play than cash, and more debts than ready money. The want of this is supplied, however, by notes of hand—I. O. U's.; such payment having been first instituted, as we are informed, during the siege of Grenada; and these notes are payable at the Contract of Kiev. Here they are exchanged (which is very rare) for ready money, or they are cancelled by a run of good luck on the opposite side, and are issued now by the former creditor, with his signature as a debtor. The original bond may be, however, much increased; and payment being pressed for, the estates are pawned or sold.

When the sums are not so large, nor the means of payment so considerable, still the same abominable system prevails; and many a man returns home lighter than he arrived by some thousand ducats, having left his coachman, horses, and some half dozen servants in pawn with his successful adversary. Of all the people in the world, the Poles are the most reckless gamblers. The French and Italians are fond of play; but there is a method in their procedure: some system and some bounds are prescribed. Not so with a Pole; he sits down to play for all he has.

I have known a man of high rank lose in one evening his estate, all his peasantry, his house and furniture, his stud of horses, and, descending in the scale, his carriage, and coachman, and valet, and finally the watch which he had in his pocket. England blushes for one Long Pole. Here is a nation of such.

Gambling supersedes all other considerations; and we find in the history of the dismemberment of Poland under Catherine, that they were often engaged at play in the camp when they ought to have been fighting their battles in the field. It is not their patriotism or their bravery which is impugned by the assertion. These will bear the severest scrutiny, and will come purer from the crucible of investigation. But still their insatiable passion for play is a spot too deep to be washed out. The largest fortune in Poland in olden times, when it was proverbial that it rained water in other towns, but ducats in Dantzic, was lost in Paris in the course of one short winter. . . . . Some matrimonial concerns have been transacted in a strange way, however, on these occasions. To lose each other's mistresses at play is a common occurrence; and if we examine into the causes of divorce and its repeated occurrence, nay, its universal toleration and sanction by the laws of the land, we may not be too uncharitable to suppose that wives may be played for, as any other exchangeable commodity. Now that Poland no longer exists, perhaps this crying sin will be no longer sanctioned by law, or rather the law will have the power of preventing its so ready accomplishment.

As the Poles are rigid Catholics, it puzzled me to know why this continual divorce, not allowed by the church, was permitted so frequently. The loop-hole of retreat lies in proving that the former marriage not having been legal is consequently null and void. This farce has been repeated as much as four or five times, each previous marriage being easily proved illegal as soon as the parties found it convenient to separate, or one party determined to have another companion. In the last Diet convoked by the Emperor previous to the revolution, this subject was recommended with much force and feeling in the speech from the throne to the consideration of the assembly. Notwithstanding this address, it was rejected by the Diet, which proved at least that the Diet had means of doing harm even in the face of imperial mandates. It is too true, and I speak from authority, that there does not exist a family of rank in Poland in which some of its members have not to plead guilty to this violation of all morality and decency.

The following is as characteristic as anything we meet with on the long journey. The travellers had, by this time, left the Black Sea, and were at the then new city of Nicolaieff, so named after the emperor :—

Few and uncivilized as are its inhabitants, we had time, even in changing horses, to find an Englishman with a numerous family occupying one of the best houses in the place. It had been deemed possible to carry the water of the Bog to Odessa ; and Mr. Upton wished to have an opportunity of showing his skill, but I believe the plan was given up without a trial. His tea and cold mutton, which must certainly have had a crom of Cobly's sheep, were not unwelcome ; and we took leave of him with sincere and heartfelt wishes for his success. . . . . There is this advantage in travelling in many parts of Russia,—the traveller, losing nothing by his journeying at night, sees often as much as in noonday : and so we lost nothing by this practice. The third day, however, we left the lone and dreary steppe, where all was barren as between Dan and Beersheba,—a vast plain, a sea of dry land. We bade farewell to it as we entered Ekateringrad, which introduced us to vegetable and animal life. It was as the fountain in the desert ; but we refreshed ourselves with more than the crystal spring. Beefsteaks and English porter are to be found on the borders of this desert ; and the walls of the post-houses are adorned with the Prodigal Son, the Gentle Shepherd, the Woodman, and a variety of such prints as adorn similar habitations in their mother country, from which these have been all imported. It is wonderful to see such a prodigious number of English engravings in so remote a part of the world. We refreshed ourselves, and proceeded; and every verst we journeyed marked an improvement in the country.

We were now in Poland, one of the most fertile provinces, and in the government of Podolia. A broken and variegated country in the decline of summer was more congenial than the burnt and withered steppe which we had so lately quitted ; but the contrast alone made it pleasing ; for there was nothing worthy of our notice, except as we approached the termination of the first half of our journey, when we overtook about three hundred Turkish prisoners taken at Anapa. Finer men were never seen ; erect, swarthy, muscular beings, well clothed, and with content lighting up their countenances. There is something noble in the appearance of a Turk, even of the lowest order. Even the canaille have an air distingué about them : there is nothing vulgar in their appearance ; and compared with the brutal, filthy peasantry, who quitted their dens to gaze and spit upon them as they passed along, because they were not Christians, they resembled beings of another and a higher sphere. . . . . We arrived quite safe and sound at the gardens of Alexandrine, and lodged in one of the travellers' pavilions. The house was tenantless, for the old Countess had proceeded to Odessa for the sake of seeing his blessed majesty ; and nothing was to be procured upon the premises, as she had taken the keys with her. We halted therefore, only for the night, and hired Jews' horses to transport us to Kiev the following day.

Kiev is the Mecca of the Russian ; and it is there that the Polish nobility of the province meet, or did then meet, annually, to settle their accounts with their stewards, or "to raise the wind." This very ancient city, situated on a bank, beneath which rolls the Dnieper, is picturesque and imposing ; and, at certain seasons of the year, it must present an animated scene. Pilgrims from all directions flock thither, and from great distances, to lay down the burden of their sins at the shrines of the saints.

A pilgrimage to Kiev is considered an infallible atonement for all the sins hitherto committed ; the debt is cancelled, the score is wiped off, to him who, having marched some few hundred miles under the infliction of corporeal punishment, enters the sanctuary of Kiev, falls prostrate before the saint, and with a contrite heart exclaims, "Baja moia veena vat." If to this confession be added some small donation to the priests, he will not go in vain ; without the latter, it will be in vain that he go. Men must labour in their vocation, as Falstaff says, and the labourer is worthy of his hire. In no country is this better understood than in Russia, where the priests being for the most part an uneducated people, do not refrain from exacting the utmost in their power.

Even at this period, more than twenty years since, many of the Russian nobility had engaged English stewards. To the disgrace of their country, many of these men were found so severe and cruel in their treatment of the peasants, that they rose en masse against them, and some of them had been compelled to leave the country. Flogging was then, and probably is still, as common as it was in the West Indies a few years since ; though most of the recent travellers are dumb on the subject. One day, our Wanderer was examining the husbandry of an estate belonging to Count Romanzoff, who had an English steward upon it. He relates :—

As we were returning home, we heard the cries of a man, and soon discovered the cause ; for two others were scourging him much in the same way as I mentioned having seen a man scourged at Coblevoy.

"Give it him well," said the steward, as we passed by ; "the rascal has been at some mischief."

I asked if it was allowed to inflict corporeal punishment at the discretion of the man who was then chastising, the under-steward of an under-steward.

"Not exactly," he replied, "but nearly so. Anything short of making the people rebel in a body, which they will not do till they are pushed to the last extremity, is allowable."

"Might not some milder means," I asked, "be adopted as a substitute for this disgraceful punishment ?"

"Not at all," he answered ; "we could do nothing without the rods here : women and men, we have at them both, or we could do nothing with them. When I first came into the country I thought as you did. Such means were repugnant to my feelings. I talked to them, and tried gentle means ; but I never forgave a Russian but he was the first to show me his ingratitude."

"What have they to be grateful for ?" I asked.

"It is true," said he ; "but without flogging we could never find out any of their misdemeanours."

"And how do you do it by that means ?"

"Oh, flog all who are suspected, till the sinner cries out peccavi."

"Rather an arbitrary method," I replied.

"What is to be done ?" he answered. "A peasant will call God to witness, go upon his knees, cross himself, and pray God to strike him dead upon the spot if he be not innocent of the charge brought against him ; and then, as soon as his back begins to smart, he cries out 'renevat,' and confesses the whole."

"Last week we had a good flogging match; and I will relate to you the particulars of the case, which will give you some insight into the superstition of the people. Twenty bushels of corn were one night taken out of the barn; as usual, nobody was the thief. The peasants who had been working upon that part of the estate came from a considerable distance, at least fifteen miles, and were naturally suspected. All called God to witness that they had not committed the theft. We resorted, however, to the following expedient. Calling them all together, in number about thirty, I harangued them at the barn door, from whence the corn had been stolen, having first procured a live black cock, and a large iron pot, the bottom of which was well covered with soot. I first asked them individually if they were Christians; to which they all replied in the affirmative, and made the sign of the cross. I then asked them individually if they had committed the theft; to which they replied in the negative, making also the sign of the cross. Well then, I observed, as you are all innocent, and moreover all Christians, you will prove it by the following trial; and at the same time I pulled a crucifix out of my pocket, and tied it round the cock's neck. At the sight of this they all fell to crossing themselves in right earnest. Having done this, I went into the barn, in the middle of which I had ordered a table to be placed, and took the pot and the cock with the crucifix tied round its neck with me, and allowed none to follow me. Having put the fowl under the black iron pot upon the table I returned, and shut the barn door, ordering my under-steward to go to the other side, where there was also a door, and examine each man's fingers as he came out. 'Now,' said I, 'my friends, you will go in one by one at this door, and place your two forefingers upon the bottom of the pot, and make the sign of the cross upon it; and as you are all Christians, if any of you be guilty of the theft, as soon as you touch the pot with your fingers the cock will crow, and you will prove that you have perjured yourselves.' I then opened the door, so as to let one only go in at a time, nor allow the second to proceed till the man at the opposite side gave notice that he had examined the fingers."

"Well," I observed, "was it an experimentum crucis?"

"Quite," he replied; "nine of them came out with clean fingers, not daring to touch the pot, lest the cock should crow."

"And what then?" I exclaimed.

"Oh, they all confessed the theft, and we found the corn upon the premises, and flogged them all."

I observed several poor wretches, shivering and trembling, sitting at the doors of their cottages. It was a sunny day, and they were basking.

"They have all the ague," exclaimed the steward; "the situation is very swampy, it ruins the health of half the peasantry. A man can do no work who has the ague, or at least it is a pretext for the villains to be more lazy."

"A man is not much disposed to labour under an ague fit," I replied.

"I thought exertion was good," he answered; "and so I ordered that fellow whom you heard howling there to go and carry wood."

"You have forgotten that you are an Englishman, I think."

"My dear sir, you little know what these fellows are, or you would not talk thus; the more kind you are to them, the more ungrateful they are. Nothing but the lash and the harshest treatment will make them do anything."

Slavery, in its moral effects, is the same thing all over the world; and whether with the slaves or their taskmasters. The wandering Doctor appears to have seen more of the real condition of the serfs than any of the late travellers in Russia with whose works we are conversant, and his testimony on this point is explicit:—

During our stay at Climoffiki, which was only of two days' duration, I had an opportunity of ascertaining several points as to the state of the peasantry, and proving that they were not the happiest under the canopy of heaven. I found that, in spite of written laws and ukases, it remained in the power of the stewards, the pub-stewards, and under-stewards, and the sub-under-stewards, to exact money of them, to maltreat them, and to render them almost as miserable as they pleased. That these things are all contrary to law, I do not deny; but what are laws when the administrators of them are scoundrels!

After his engagement at Odessa had expired, our Doctor took the resolution of establishing himself at St. Petersburg, to become one of the court physicians, and to make his fortune! As to the facility of doing so, with the noble patronage which he enjoyed, and the many large voluntary promises made to him, he had no doubt whatever. The long journey from Odessa to the capital, was accomplished in safety, though with considerable fatigue; but arrived there, the traveller's sanguine hopes were not realized. He never had the good luck to become a court physician, which he had fully expected; but he obtained a considerable practice among the British merchants—"The Factory,"—which he had not calculated upon. The account of this "Factory" is curious. The body of merchants so named, has existed in Russia for two centuries. Its first site was Archangel. It was, perhaps, by his early and accidental initiation into this society, that the new-comer lost his noble native patrons. He thus describes this aristocratic, and somewhat exclusive body of foreign merchants:—

The British society, by which sweeping clause I include more than the factory, was to be considered at this epoch of our existence only in its social relations, than which nothing could appear more respectable, or more creditable to the British character. Composed of men, who, if not opulent, were all in easy circumstances, and who made valid their situations by a certain expenditure, it offered many temptations to a new-comer, who, if he could not immediately count upon putting their purses under contributions professionally, might well hope to grace their hospitable boards; and it so happened that in a short time we made the round of the society; and their comfortable style of living, the luxury of equipages which most enjoyed, the elegance of the female dress, and the well-furnished tables, were not without their influence in lulling us into the idea that we had pitched our tents in a productive country.

It was at the hospitable board of my colleague that I had the first glimpse of the English aristocracy. I had been furnished with a letter of introduction to him from Sir Astley Cooper;—one of those lucky hits again which were so little calculated upon at the time, but which proved the foundation of my future career. Our host was at that period the first accoucheur in St. Petersburg, and had maintained an unblemished reputation in the obstetric art during forty years' residence in the country. He had presided at the birth of all the imperial children, had encouraged the Empress by his presence in the most trying moments, and an unparalleled success had crowned his endeavours. He possessed tact in the fullest acceptation of the term. . . . . .

It was at his table that I first became acquainted with the English residents. The dinner was of a mixed character, as to cookery,—half-and-half, as the Germans say,—very good of its kind—à la Petersburg; a term I shall in future adopt for all nondescript kind of things.

It is requisite to give the bill of fare, not to have to return to the subject again, however grateful it may be. An English factory party comprises from twenty to thirty guests. The table-service is generally of English ware; some sport silver forks—napkins always on great occasions; the host and hostess sit at the extreme ends of the table, as in England—these are the posts of honour; the table is covered with the dessert. Two tureens of soup find admission at the ends; these are succeeded by two kinds of fish;—that dish, par excellence characteristic of the English kitchen, viz. boiled potatoes, is handed round with every dish.

"Shall I have the pleasure of taking a glass of wine with you?" Generally after the soup this ancient custom prevails.

The fish gives place to a boiled turkey, or its equivalent, three boiled fowls, and a Yorkshire ham. This course, I may observe, is quite characteristic of a factory dinner. If anything prevent this, it creates some sensation in the town for a considerable time afterwards. Some made-dish, à la Française, is the half-way house of the dinner. Hock and claret are then handed round. Two kinds of roast close the solid part of the banquet. As conversation has flagged during the whole time hitherto employed, sparkling champagne is served, with the hopes of enlivening it—forlorn hope. Then sweets, à l'Anglaise, apple-pie and custards, plum-pudding; a Stilton cheese in very aristocratic society; formerly a glass of Burton ale afterwards—but no longer allowed to come into the country. Dessert follows,—but sat prata biberunt.

The champagne is intended to sharpen the wit, but it fails. Here, I repeat, the customs of a country are not easily to be set aside, and that strangers submit to them par force.

What prevents a party of Englishmen, Bacchi plenus, from launching out into the same kind of discussions and political disputes which they are wont to do at home?

Does the government prevent them? By no means; but the usages of the place do; and, as little conversation is indulged in at Russian tables, the English more or less follow the example of the natives. Hence there is no town where there is so little general conversation as in St. Petersburg. People assemble to eat, and not to talk. Hence the slang-word among the British—"Who gives a feed to-day? Where do you feed?"

The description of St. Petersburg, and of Russian society, and a Russian winter, by one who was not a flying visiter, but who spent many seasons amidst its rigours, and such comforts as mitigate its severity, is necessarily excellent of its kind; since it is written by a man of lively talents, intimately conversant with what he was describing. One day he was invited to dine, in company with a Princess—an order as plentiful in Petersburg as blackberries—who, he hoped, might become his patient:—

She had been recommended to my care, as an old lady very fond of physic and physicians, and still more fond of any new arrival; and she was, doubtless, selected for my medical operations. She commenced by paying me some compliments, and spoke in high terms of the English, whom she preferred much to the French, even in their medical capacities. She had travelled a good deal in her youth, had resided long in Paris, to which place she was passionately attached; had published a novel in her youth, which she allowed to be very stupid in her old age; but she was a woman of good education, and not deficient in understanding. She invited me to her soirées, which were held once a-week in the same room in which she slept, and which allowed of a sofa, and two card-tables at the most.

Soon after my arrival, she took me to a corner of the room, and complained of severe headach. "Ne faites pas attention à ma tante; elle ne fait que radoter," said an officer, who, turning his head from the whist-table, discovered me engaged in conversation with the old lady. "Faites attention à votre jeu," she replied, "et laissez-moi parler avec le docteur." I found, in reality, that she was not joking, and proposed to speak with her seriously when the party broke up. In the meantime I played my rubber, and made acquaintance with the lady of the house; for the old princess, who was a relation, resided in a couple of rooms upon the ground-floor. This is quite à la Russe: half-a-dozen lodgers live in a private hôtel. The family owner occupies the bel étage, or grand suit of rooms on the first floor; the ground-floor is often let to small shopkeepers; and the second and third floors to strangers of large and small families. The object of a Russian is to make as much as he can of his house. A shoemaker may, and does sometimes, occupy the antechamber to the grand suite of rooms. What Lady Mary Wortley Montague said of the houses in Vienna in her day, I found illustrated in those of St. Petersburg in the present. The owner of this hôtel was a lady of high rank; she spoke to me of her aunt, and asked me if I thought her case dangerous? I gave an evasive answer: she left the room soon afterwards. When the guests had retired, the old princess commenced her attack in earnest: "Asseyez-vous, mon cher; que je vous consulte."

She informed me that her medical attendant had called in the morning, and had prescribed for her. She showed me the prescription. I highly approved of it. She begged me to write another. I remonstrated. She entreated to have something English. I refused. She again insisted, and fate, and nothing but fate, made me consent to her demand. I prescribed for her, begging her, at the same time, to send again for her ordinary attendant.

I began early to appreciate the characters of the people among whom I was about to settle. The changes which took place in the state of the patient in the space of twenty-four hours, had produced as many in the opinions of the attendants as to the talents of the physician.

"Docteur, je vous en voulais bien; je croyais que vous avez expédié ma pauvre mère."

"Comment; je ferai chercher monsieur dans les quatre coins de la terre; pour moi je n'ai de la confiance que dans lui."

"Trente-deux ans; quel talent!"

Such were the encomiums passed upon me as the patient recovered from her lethargy. I was extolled to the skies.

M——, in whose house the patient was residing, begged me to dine with her the following day. She wished to place her family under my care. I met with many guests, and some old acquaintances at table.

"Je vous ai dit cela, mon cher. Vous ferez plus de visites qu'il n'y ait quart d'heures dans la journée." "You are acquainted, then, with our new doctor!" demanded one of the guests. "Si je le connais, cela va vite avec lui," and he looked at me, and then at his finger. I really thought that all was now right, and that the happy moment was arrived when I was to dash at once into practice.

Upon quitting the dinner-table, which needs no particular mention, as to any nationality connected with it, I again descended into my patient's room, and found her, as I supposed, convalescent. She talked with me for some time, and assured me that her case would do much towards establishing my reputation. She congratulated herself upon being what she styled its corner-stone. She was inquisitive about Paris, and intended to pay it soon another visit. She abused the French faculty.

She gave me some useful hints as to my plan of operations hereafter. "Ici, mon cher, vous trouverez plus d'ânes que d'ânesses." . . . . .

Upon returning into the saloon, I found the ladies, each of whom had been placed by the side of a cavalier at the dinner table, all sitting together in one corner of the room. I say sitting, rather than talking, for I heard nothing above a whisper. The males were mostly engaged at cards. My old patron, the Count, was fast asleep upon a sofa. He awoke as I approached. "Vous faites votre siesta, monsieur." "Moi! point de tout: même quand j'étais à Malte, (he was an old chevalier de Malte,) où tout le monde dort après dîner, moi, je ne dormais jamais; moi, jamais!" He had been fast asleep for half an hour previously.

I was invited to play a rubber, but I refused, for it was my first entrée to a Russian drawing-room, and I wished to see how things were conducted there. Just as everywhere else, I found, with less talking and more card-playing. Tea and ices; fruits,—as pears, apples, water-melons in slices, grapes from Malaga and Astrakan,—preserves in small saucers, were profusely handed round: the rooms warm to suffocation, causing a great demand for potables; lemonade, orgeat, wine and water, and especially mead, seemed to be preferred.

"The Russians are fond of a drink called imminya," says one of our publishing travellers. It is to be explained otherwise. The mead, or other beverage, is handed to him who calls for it; the person sitting near him, when the glass is presented, being also thirsty, says to the waiter, "Imminya," and to me also:—a mistake worthy of those who publish as they go along. Among the guests seated at cards, one character deserves to be mentioned. She was the most decided card-player of her day; and her voice rose above the multitude as she scolded her partner most furiously. A black crape gown, worn at the elbows, and polished from use, reaching from under the chin, descending to the feet, and enveloping the whole body corporal; such was the dress of one of the nieces of the celebrated ———. She was the worthy sister of the old lady who lived in the Ukraine, of whom honourable mention has been made: and they had certainly been cast in the same mould. The old Princess, who was a very Mrs. Battle at whist, gave me a cold reception when I addressed her; she was intent upon her game—she hated all doctors—never took doctor's stuff in her life—and made me that kind of bow, which says "Begone!" Though one of the richest women in the empire, she lived as if in the greatest penury; her clothes were a nuisance to those who approached her, and she played for a sixpenny stake. Notwithstanding such foibles, she was good and charitable without ostentation. She proved, in her latter years, to be one of the few examples of those who do not evince "the ruling passion strong in death:" she changed all her habits, became profuse in her expenditure, wore fashionable clothes, was remarkable for the brilliancy of her diamonds, penurious in nothing, liberal in all things.

There are some amusing sketches of those canny Scottish physicians, who have had much better luck in Russia than had our Wanderer. There may be a particle too much of the personal in the said sketches, though nothing ill-natured. Enough has been said and sung of the winter of St. Petersburg, which, next to Venice, is, at certain seasons the most picturesque city in Europe, as at all times it is the most unique; but the northern summers—the midsummer nights—are, surely, as worthy of commemoration as the frozen months. Then, as in her majesty Queen Victoria's dominions, the sun never sets on the capital of the Czar, or dips his rim only to wheel up again. The scene is finely described, and even with something of poetic power, of which the Wanderer is not devoid, when striking natural beauty stimulates the faculty.

It is curious, when it is new, to rest against the parapets of the quays at midnight, and read the smallest print as distinctly as at noonday: to see the great luminary dip, and watch him rise again where he sets. A bright halo marks his proximity to the horizon during the whole time of his absence. It is a peculiar and indescribable kind of light.

More curious is it to see large masses of buildings cast no shadow on any side. How would St. Petersburg appear upon canvass when taken at midnight! The soft glassy stream reflects from its surface the buildings which are situated on its banks, but the masses themselves form no shadow. It is an absence of darkness, rather than the presence of light; for this implies accompanying shadows. The moon shines so faintly, her soft light is so blended with the crepuscle, that the shadow caused by the obstruction of her rays is scarcely visible.

It is a heavenly enjoyment to sit upon the parapets of the quay, and wonder at the possibility of a people slumbering; for habit associates sleep with darkness, and now all is light.

Tired nature, however, seeks repose; but the man who feels not the want of this absolute refreshment can hardly persuade himself of its necessity, when nothing invites him to his pillow. He strolls along the river's banks, he watches the placid stream, he sees the cupolas of the churches glitter at a distance, the streets are empty, no noise salutes his ear, save "A boat, a boat unto the ferry," which occasionally breaks the silence around him. This is answered by the splashing oar, sounding louder as it approaches. Casting his eyes along the buildings, no taper shines in the windows. There is nothing within doors, nothing without, to persuade him it is night. It is a dream, an illusion; and whilst lost in doubt and uncertainty whether he be under fairy enchantment, removed from the nether world, the sun again rises, shadows stalk forth, and he finds himself in day, without having passed through the darkness of night. It is then time to go to rest. . . . . .

Thus it is during the first summer of a stranger's sojourn in St. Petersburg. He is not exactly the prey to all this illusion, but he witnesses these phenomena with rapture, watches the sun dip and rise again, and great is the effort necessary to make him seek his chamber during this "Midsummer Night's Dream."

> "This night, methinks, is but the daylight sick;
> It looks a little paler; 'tis a day
> Such as the day is when the sun is hid."

The population of Russia does not increase; and the cause is obvious,—the misery of the existing population—

The people, miserable themselves, are not anxious to entail the same lot upon their progeny. Few peasants rear more than from three to four children. A peasant with a numerous family is a thing unknown. In their infancy the children are neglected: if they fall ill they are almost sure to die; few have the opportunity of medical assistance: those who may procure it will not avail themselves of it, for they have great antipathy to administering drugs to their children. This conduct cannot be understood by the terms resignation, or even fatality. It must be ascribed to apathy. The child is ill—it is laid out to die—a priest gives it the last unction—starvation may ensue—the child is no more of this world. Were the parents in a better condition themselves, they would not be so indifferent to the welfare and being of their children. They would not look upon death as a blessing to the child, if they enjoyed any of the sweets of life themselves. In this sense, therefore, the good of the slave-owner must consist in the well-being of his boors, whose increase in number must add to his wealth. The duration of a peasant's life must be equally to his advantage. A man in robust health is a hard-working man, and a productive labourer at sixty years of age. The peasant's life in this country hardly averages forty. He has originally but little stamina: this little is undermined by the use of spirits, which generate dropsy and other diseases, which carry him off in what should be his prime.

Is this a country likely soon to become dangerous to its neighbours? And this is but one feature of its cumbrous weakness.

Our Wanderer lived for fourteen years in Petersburg, and finally left it upon the death of a noble patient, who appears to have been one of his original patrons. A serious obstacle to his success, was ignorance of the language of the country, a knowledge of which he considers essential to a medical man everywhere. A great part of the third volume relates to his leisurely homeward journey through Sweden, and his travels in the German states; for, before coming to England, he visited the most celebrated and fashionable German watering-places. He is an enthusiast for Goëthe, and admires the poet of Germany with the understanding as well as the heart. But, on the whole, Germany is not our Wanderer's most successful literary field. It has, indeed, been pretty well gleaned and raked of late, and, besides, his transit was rapid.

It is to the author's brother, a clergyman in the United States, that we owe his lively and informing book. This brother read his Journals and Memoranda, and fancied them well worthy of publication. His judgment was quite right. Our author says he is now riding at anchor, and will not put to sea again; but we shall not promise for him. The New World invites him. He has pretty well exhausted the Old; though, to an eye so quick and practised in seizing the most presentable attitudes of things, much remains to be seen in both worlds. He is, indeed, never more felicitous than in a small Shropshire town; and, go where he will, he must be entertaining and instructive likewise. We do not despair of meeting with him again.

LITERARY REGISTER.

The Poetical Remains of Lucretia Davidson, collected and arranged by her Mother; with a Biography by Miss Sedgwick. Tilt & Bogue.

The outlines of the history of the young and lovely American girl, Lucretia Davidson, who died at the age of seventeen, having shewn decided indications of poetical talent, is familiar to the British literary world, from an affecting and indulgent notice of her poetical Remains, which was written many years since by Southey, and which appeared in The Quarterly Review. A memoir of a younger sister, Margaret Davidson, which lately appeared from the pen of Washington Irving, has probably revived the recollection of Lucretia. The history of both of these lovely girls was strikingly alike: premature mental developement, morbid intellectual excitement, great delicacy of constitution, and early death. Something in their premature fate might have been inevitable; and it is not the less true, that something in their training must have been far wrong. Yet it is not easy to say how this might have been amended, though not difficult to point out where, at least, part of the error lay.

It may almost be laid down as an axiom, that true genius requires no fostering—no praise—no extrinsic encouragement. Like virtue, its self-depending exercise is both incitement and reward. In every instance in which poetical genius has come with power, it has also come without observation,—certainly without coddling and forcing. If may require to be judiciously curbed in its passionate early manifestations, though the best rule is, "Let it alone." If the true fire lurks there, many waters cannot quench it. Next to the impossibility of creating genius, where it does not exist, is the repression of genius where it has been given; and therefore again we say, "Leave it to itself." Southey, in his paper on the remarkable girl who excites these remarks, wisely says—"Let no parent wish for a child of precocious genius." "To those parents who have the fearful charge of a child like Lucretia Davidson, these memoirs will have a deep and painful interest..... The difficulty is to indulge such a mind without pampering it; to regulate it without forcing it from its natural and proper bent. The first step towards this is, that we should ourselves estimate mental endowments not too highly, but at their just worth; and then teach others in whom the dawn of genius appears, that the gift is not so rare as it has been deemed: that it is becoming less so in every generation; because, where it does exist, it is now called forth by the wide extension of education, (such as it is,) and by the diffusion of books." In the memoir, Miss Sedgwick dwells less upon the warning which the life of Lucretia Davidson offers to her young countrywomen, and to mothers, than might be deemed right. But were we to say all we think on the subject, we might be considered either very hard-hearted, or else deficient in the appreciation of youthful genius; so we recommend a volume which must deeply interest the feelings, whatever may be the ultimate judgment pronounced on the whole case. That Miss Davidson was as much the victim of constitutional disease and of the boarding-school as of precocious and morbid mental excitement, is evident from the record of her life. Her original constitution was delicate and fragile in the extreme; and it was further impaired by the preposterous cramming and exhibiting system of America, where education appears to be conducted more with the view of gratifying the vanity of the parents, than of improving the faculties of the child. Miss Sedgwick has some judicious remarks on this topic; though both she and Washington Irving, in their memoirs of the gifted sisters, have, it strikes us, been less successful in pointing the moral than in adorning the Tale. Of the poetry of Lucretia Davidson, highly as it has been extolled on both sides of the Atlantic, we must confess that the precocious and excessive manifestation of the faculty appears to us far more remarkable than the actual performances of the young poetess. They must be ill acquainted with the "parlous" school-girls of England, who do not know the wonderful power of writing verses, which, from twelve to sixteen, many of them now display, and which, fortunately for them, passes unnoted and unhonoured.——As a specimen of Miss Davidson's poetry, we select one of her latest pieces, written during her last illness, and accounted one of her best poems:—

THE LAST FAREWELL TO MY HARP.

And must we part? Yes, part forever;
I'll waken thee again—no, never;
Silence shall chain thee, cold and drear,
And thou shalt calmly slumber here.
Unhallow'd was the eye that gazed
Upon the lamp which brightly blazed,
The lamp which never can expire,
The undying, wild, poetic fire;
And, oh! unhallow'd was the tongue
Which boldly and uncouthly sung.
I bless'd the hours when o'er my soul
Thy magic numbers gently stole,
And o'er it threw those Heavenly strains
Which since have bound my heart in chains;
Those wild, those witching numbers still
Will o'er my widow'd bosom steal.
I bless that hour, but, oh! my heart,
Thou and thy lyre must part—yes, part;

And this shall be my last farewell,
This my sad bosom's latest knell.
And here, my harp, we part for ever;
I'll waken thee again, oh! never—
Silence shall chain thee, cold and drear,
And thou shalt calmly slumber here.

Punch's Letters to his Son. Corrected and Edited from the Manuscript in the Alsatian Library, by Douglas Jerrold. With Twenty-four Illustrations by Kenney Meadows. London: Orr & Co.

PUNCH, in these Chesterfieldian epistles, is as much a philosopher—a laughing one—as a wit; or, more correctly, the wit of Punch is often true philosophy. He is a satirist, too, but there is no acrid particle, no bitter drop in his whole composition: he tickles without wounding. Now, society may be disposed to bear, with meekness and patience, the titillating castigation which Punch bestows upon its pleasant vices, where it would either become savage and surly, refuse to listen to the grave exhortations of regular sermonizers, or to be coerced into reflecting upon its past evil life and the necessity of amending its ways. With these weighty merits in tendency, the letters of Punch are not merely clever, but often absolutely brilliant; and the illustrations are even finer than the reasoning. We do not now mean those of Mr. Meadows, than which we have surely seen better from his pencil. A work of this sort answers some of the best uses of comedy, by laughingly exposing and holding up to ridicule the hollow hypocrisies and rascally and pitiful conventionalities which keep vice and meanness in countenance; gild Sin with gold, and plate the brass of impudent pretension by the electro process in the world's sunshine.

Punch's Letters to his son on the choice of a profession, gives the worthy progenitor license to gird at all and sundry. His "hermetical philosophy" also unfolds many profound truths, which yet are as plain as if they had never lain at the bottom of the shallowest well. How true it is, though nobody will allow it save Punch, that "the world, as at present constituted, could not, for one day, go on without lying;" for which reason so many excellent people club their little modicum of daily falsehood together, for the benevolent purpose of keeping the world moving on its axis. Only conceive the scene of confusion, if all London, some fine morning, opened its lips only to speak truth, and so became one huge Hanwell asylum. But it is time that we gave a sample of Punch's paternal counsels.

My son, never see the meanness of mankind. Let men hedge, and shirk, and shift, and lie, and, with faces of unwrinkled adamant, tell you the most monstrous falsehoods, either in their self-glorification, or to disguise some habitual paltriness; still, never detect the untruth; never lay your finger on the patch they have so bunglingly sewed upon their moral coat, but let them depart with the most religious persuasion that they have triumphantly bamboozled you. By these means, although you are most efficiently assisting in the hypocrisy of life, you will be deemed a sociable, a most good-natured fellow. Be stone-blind, and you will be benevolent; be deaf, and you will be all heart. To have an insight—or at least to show you have it—into the dirty evasions of life, is to have a moral squint. To lay your finger upon a plague-spot, is to be infected with malice. No: though you meet with men scurfed with moral leprosy, see not the scales, but cry out lustily, "What perfect gentlemen!" To discover meanness in men, is, in men's opinion, to be strongly tinctured with the iniquity.

Mr. Chaucer, in allusion to the devil, says of him,

"He hath in Jewe's heart his waspe's nest."

Now, what we call the devil, has built—by the agency of his demon wasps, Pride, Avarice, Scorn, Oppression, Selfishness, and others—thousands of nests in the hearts both of Jews and Christians. Well, suppose you have the power of looking into their hearts, as though they were so many crystal hives,—suppose you behold in them the rapacious insects—hear their buzzing—almost see their stings;—if you cry "Wasps, wasps," men will shake their heads at you for a malicious, evil-minded fellow; but, my dear boy, clap your hands and cry, "What a honeycomb!" and you shall pass from mouth to mouth as the "best of creatures." When you have seen something more of the world, you will know that men rarely attribute an exposure of a social evil to an inherent indignation of the evil itself, but to an unhealthy appetite for moral foulness. Then, my boy, will they most virtuously defame you—then will they, in the name of outraged virtue, call you hard, high-sounding names. The wrestlers of old, says Plutarch, threw dirt on one another, that they might get a better grasp, and more successfully trip up each other's heels. In the like way, does ignorance or hypocrisy, in the name of virtue, cast dirt upon him who would trip up a giant wrong. There were, doubtless, those among the Philistines—particular and most virtuous friends of Goliath—who called David a very bitter, ill-natured little fellow.

We have often amused ourselves with imagining what their respectable next-door neighbours may have said of Martin Luther and John Milton, George Washington, De Foe, or Dr. Priestley, or any other "incendiary, heretic, or traitor," of the "hour." This is a speculation fraught with great consolation to some folks.——In a letter on the philosophy of gaming, PUNCH has this strong passage. He has been discussing the more vulgar modes of sucking-eggs; i. e. of preying upon fellow-creatures, and proceeds,—

There is, however, a more open—a more generous mode of living upon men; a mode, dignified by fashion, exalted by authority—I mean gaming.

The gamester is, indeed, a privileged person; a creature, who merges all the petty, wearying anxieties of life into one sublime passion. Become a gamester, and you are fortified—nay, exempt from the assault of divers other feelings that distract and worry less happy men. Gaming is a moral Aaron's rod, and swallows up all meaner passions.

Consider, my son, the vigilance, the self-concentration, the judgment, the quickness of wit, and at times, the dexterity of finger, necessary to a successful gamester; and you will look upon the character with still-increasing veneration. Did you ever know a gamester fall madly in love? Did you ever know him, if a married man, waste his profitable time, his profitable thoughts, upon the woman he has buckled himself to? If he be a father, what is the laughter of his children to the melody of the dice? What human hearts to the ace and king of the same suit, when trumps? He is exalted far above the weakening influences that pull down other men, and from his elevation looks with a cold eye of dignity upon the pettiness of human affections. You will hear other men rave about the beauties of nature; of hill and dale, mountain and flood. To the gamester, how small the space that bounds his imagination—but then how rich, how fertile—those half-dozen yards of bright green cloth!

You will hear men talk about the sweets of industry; of the dignity of labour; the more especially those men who never yet set their foot to a spade, or their hand to a plough. The sweets of industry! what are they to the sweets of fortune? And for the dignity of labour, give me, say I, the dignity of luck!

Observe what is called the industrious man. Mark his daily martyrdom. He rises early; breakfasts lightly; hurries off with his bread-and-butter yet undigested to his labour. He toils his eight, ten, nay, twelve hours; comes home; eats his crust; and, with hardly strength remaining to take off his stockings, slinks wearied to bed. In a brief time—how very brief!—the cock crows, and the industrious man has serious thoughts of shaving; again he is up—again has he bolted his morning meal, and again is he out to go over the drudgery of how many thousand yesterdays! The year's wound up; and for all this toil, this anxiety, this daily crucifixion of spirit, the industrious man counts one—two—shall we say three hundred golden pieces? For all this tedious misery—three hundred pounds!

My son turn your eyes to the gamester. He rises when he likes—dallies, at "his own sweet will," with his breakfast. He then lounges away the hours, pleasantly meditating on the coming night. He enters the arena. With what a graceful assurance doth he take the box in his hand. One—two—three: he throws sixes, and pockets five hundred pounds! What a miserable, felon, outcast sneak-up does your industrious man appear after this! What a poor sweating slave! Whilst on the other hand, what an air of power is about the gamester! What a glory—what a magic! He inherits, in one minute, by the potent shake of his elbow, all that poor, sordid labour wears its back into a hoop for—its eyes into blindness! Will you, after this, ever dream of becoming that miserable negative—an industrious man? Depend upon it, the true jewels of life—rightly worn—are the four aces. Hope has been vulgarly pictured with an anchor. Let your hope carry a dice-box!

As for luck, you may nearly always ensure that, if you properly educate your perceptions, and your fingers. Cultivate your thumb-nails, my dear boy; the smallest sacrifice to the personal graces is not lost upon the gamester.

But I will take the worst side of the picture. You are doomed to be unlucky—you are fated always to lose. You have no genius—like the genius of Socrates, that always popped into its master's hand the very trump required—to aid and abet you. The world turns its back on you; and neither by cards nor dice can you fob your brother mortal out of a single guinea. Debts come in like the waves about you: you have no home—no abiding place! This is the moment, my son, for you to exercise the most heroic of virtues. There is cord—there is steel—there are silver rivers. If you cannot live, you can die; and dying you will have this consolation: if you have steadily and inexorably vindicated the character of a gamester, your death will inflict no pang upon a single creature left behind you; and you will have the pleasing consolation to reflect that you never did the world a greater service than when you quitted it.

Punch would have a right to feel affronted, if we lessened his morality to the standard of Chesterfield. On the other hand, if his humour is less broad and racy than that of Swift in his Advice to Servants, it is never coarse, much less disgustingly gross.

Moffat's Farewell Services. Edited by John Campbell, D.D. London: Snow.

From the preface to Mr. Moffat's account of his Missionary Enterprises in South Africa, we had an idea that he had embarked on his return to the scene of his remarkable labours, while he was still, it appears, perambulating Britain, a more rampant lion at religious meetings than any king of the forest that he had ever encountered in the desert. The object of this small work is to give an account of these Farewell Meetings, and to report the addresses delivered at them by Mr. Moffat and the ministers who attended. Upon the whole we like the missionary much better as he describes himself in the African wilderness than during his lionizing tour at home. To himself, notwithstanding the bustle, adulation, and also real kindness with which he was everywhere received, this religious starring in the provinces appears to have been Labour dire and weary woe.

His life for the three years and a half that he spent in England, (the most of it in London,) seems to have been an incessant worry. It is quite piteous to hear him thus complaining.

"I have never had a day of my own, although I have been three years and a half in England. I had resolved and re-resolved ever since I landed on my native shores, to go and see the Polytechnic Institution; but the time of my departure draws near, and a day will not be allowed. A savage life, a rude life, a childlike life, coming from Africa, where we have been so long in the absence of those mental feasts that are calculated to increase knowledge, expand the mind, and prepare for great usefulness, made me wish to go and see the Polytechnic, the Colosseum, the National Gallery, the Adelaide Gallery, the British Museum, and so on; but if I am to see these places where science, art, literature, and objects of beauty and sublimity are exhibited, I shall have to come back from Africa again: for time, passing time, counting its units, will not allow me now. Never, during all my toils in Africa, have I toiled mentally—I might say in many instances physically too—as I have done in this my own native land. The incessant engagements of the pulpit and the platform, the travelling from place to place, not unfrequently from ten to twenty-six miles a-day, and holding two public meetings each day; the absence sometimes of three nights' sleep a-week out of seven; the incessant excitement of feeling always produced by seeing fresh individuals, and appearing in fresh pulpits and on fresh platforms; and the greatness, the awfulness, if I may so speak, of the subject which I was called upon to advocate, have thus occupied my time.

Besides this hard duty, he was employed in translating the Psalms into the Bechuana language; seeing a translation of the New Testament through the press, and revising his own Narrative. He must, we think, have been delighted to re-embark for Africa. Those good people who are so fond of religious excitement—religious is not the word, though the only one in common use for this particular species of dissipation—ought to remember, that what is sport to them is death to the overtasked performer; to his physical frame as well as to his modesty.——There is another feature of some of these meetings which rather jars upon delicate feelings; the subscription purses made up for the Missionary and his family. If such things must be, then surely the more quietly they are managed the better. In England, in the progress of refinement and of high principle, we have happily got rid of money-gifts to judges, jurymen, and schoolmasters, and of vails to servants, &c., &c.; and we could wish to see all orders of men, and certainly Missionaries, placed above the necessity of accepting "golden offerings," and taking "benefits." The system is also apt to beget an undue, not to say degrading expression of gratitude to noble and wealthy patrons, and strongly tends to throw out of view the moral and spiritual value and dignity of the Widow's Mite.

Moffat's own addresses are the only things of much value in the little volume; those of his brethren being mostly the usual common-places of all such occasions, deriving a little additional interest from the character of the hero of the day. A valedictory sermon preached by Moffat in a Dissenting Chapel in London, is more in the spirit of his Narrative than any of the addresses, and the best thing in the work.

Thomas Clarkson's demonstration against Puseyism.—Essay on Baptism, with some Remarks on the doctrines of the Nicene Church, on which Puseyism is built. By Thomas Clarkson, M.A. Longman & Co.

The venerable Clarkson, known to the whole Christian world as a leader and powerful instrument in delivering the Black race in the West Indies from the curse of slavery, has, in this Tract, come forward as the champion of uncorrupted Christian truth; as the deliverer of whites and blacks from the thraldom of superstition, which at present threatens both races alike.

With many other sober-minded and reflecting persons within the pale of the Church of England, Mr. Clarkson has taken alarm at the extraordinary doctrines so zealously promulgated by a number of those clergymen who, to use his words, "derive their revenue from a church which they decry; and whose vitals they are endeavouring to pull to pieces." They cannot offer themselves as martyrs at the stake for the confirmation of their novel doctrines, as the stake is no longer in repute in England; but Mr. Clarkson justly thinks, that if they were sincere men, "they might give up their preferments and go to Rome," as a course more consistent and honourable than their present line of conduct.

The Strictures set out with an exposition of the Scriptural doctrine of Water-Baptism. The several texts on which the Puseyites rest their opinions on the efficacy of the rite, are critically examined; and the erroneous nature of these opinions is exposed. He quotes Dr. Bradford Bishop of Rochester, in support of his views, and of the tenets which the Church of England holds upon this point; and what is of more importance, he states the doctrine of the New Testament. The second division of Mr. Clarkson's Tract consists of observations on the doctrines of the Nicene Church, on some of which doctrines the Oxford writers are at present setting up their New Church, or new form of Popery. Their new and mongrel faith is thus described by Mr. Clarkson:—

Puseyism is a branch of the corrupt Nicene church in the fourth century, and allied to Popery; which Popery was discarded by our legislature, backed by the opinions of our ablest, soundest, and best divines, more than two centuries and a half ago, as not only containing false doctrines, but as injurious to the spiritual welfare of the people in those times. But if this were the case, we, who live at the present day, ought to be upon our guard, and to consider to what moral degradation we may come, if we are to be guided in our religious faith and conduct by the traditions of fallible men, and not by the pure word of God. It is not yet known how far the Oxford divines, in organizing their new church, mean to go, or how many of the Nicene doctrines they mean to take up as constituting their canon; but what they have hitherto suggested in the way of reform gives us an awful presage of what we are led to expect from them. Surely our Bishops, if they do not speedily interfere, will be thought by many not to have done their duty.

One of the doctrines held in that age of the Fathers, to which the Puseyites seem to look back with far more affection and reverence than to the age of the ignorant Fishermen and their Divine Master, was celibacy; which, if not yet avowed, is, by some of the new sect, already admitted to be "the more excellent way." Nay, Mr. Clarkson goes the length of inquiring—

Is this a doctrine which the Puseyites would wish our clergy and our laymen to bring into their creeds, namely, that "chastity of itself, or with fasting or almsgiving, holds out to man or woman the state of immortal glory?" . . . This doctrine is opposed to all our present notions of true religion. "It was chastity," say the fathers, "which hands forth the state of immortal glory." What! is nothing more wanted to bring us to the gates of heaven! no faith—no repentance—no exercise of the Christian virtues but chastity? Chastity is no doubt enjoined us by scripture, and is lovely to behold, wherever it exists; but it is only one of the many, the many virtues commanded us to ensure to us a crown of glory. Do the Oxford tract writers mean to force celibacy upon us as the only change that will make us angels in heaven!

Prayers to the Virgin Mary, and prayers to Saints, the worship of relics, miracles, and many other corrupt and soul-debasing practices, existed in that dark age in which also pious frauds abounded. Now, if some of the doctrines of the Nicene Church are held as of authority, why not others—why not all—as they all rest on the self-same sanction! Mr. Clarkson relates some of the miracles of that ancient church, which are incredible and monstrous, and then pertinently adds—

But you must have believed them, if you had adopted the doctrines of the Nicene Church, on which Puseyism is built, or you would have been deemed an heretic; and therefore, I wish to know if the Oxford Tract writers mean to insert the belief of such miracles into their creed. . . . . .

Baptism, including the two ideas now mentioned, viz., "that by its regenerating power it does immediately metamorphose sinners into saints; and that sin after it disqualifies them for salvation,"—constitutes the foundation on which the edifice of Puseyism is built. I shall now ask these Oxford divines three questions: 1. Do they mean that we should, besides all these doctrines, substitute the word penance for repentance, in the reading of the New Testament! Do they mean that we should submit to auricular confession to our pastors! and that we should give up the right of private judgment in the interpretation of the Scriptures!

If, after the sinner has disqualified himself for salvation, by renouncing the supernatural effects of his Baptism—(though it is not easy to say how he is able to do so)—the Church could provide a remedy—the priest give absolution—the system would seem tolerably complete, and one exceedingly well adapted to the purposes of any priesthood: placing all power in its hands, first in imparting salvation through the rite of Baptism; and next, in restoring the sinner who has fallen away, by some other power which priests alone may wield. In the ancient doctrine, that the whole truth should not be told to the people, the modern Puseyites freely acquiesce, and on this Mr. Clarkson attacks them.——Whatever were the argumentative merits of his Essay, Mr. Clarkson deserves the thanks of Bible Christians of every denomination, for having lent the weight of his name to the cause of Scriptural truth; for, as it were, sealing with his dying testimony the great doctrines of the Protestant Reformation. After stating, on the authority of the Rev. W. Goode, of Trinity College, Cambridge, that the Oxford Tract Writers, in order to gain converts to their new doctrines, had inserted the names of the soundest and most esteemed divines of the Church of England, such as Hooker, Bancroft, and Taylor, as coinciding with them, while it is proved from the writings of these eminent men, that they have not only not said what the Tractarians allege, but quite the contrary,—after stating this, Mr. Clarkson comes to the Father of the Reformation, to Luther—no Father with the Puseyites.

This great man, whose name the Puseyites hate to abhorrence, had no idea originally of bringing about a reform in the Church of Rome, then his own church. He applied himself in early life, when at different universities in Germany, (his native land,) to the study of what were considered to be the Scriptures in his time, and simply with a view of entering into holy orders. Now, the only Scriptures then acknowledged to be such, were the Fathers of the Church, (such as the Puseyites now follow,) and commentaries upon them. There was then no translation of those two precious books, which we call the Old and the New Testaments; for the Popes would not allow these to be read. Luther, then, it appears, studied these Fathers with an intensity of application. At length parts of the Old and New Testaments (original copies in Greek or Latin manuscripts) fell into his hand.

These he now studied, and translated into the German language for the benefit of his countrymen. From this time new light broke in upon his mind, and his views began to be changed. But Luther was a man who could not be idle when convinced of error. He put himself into action, first by protesting publicly against the Pope's indulgences. These were grants of pardon for all sorts of crimes to those who would buy them. They were sold publicly in shops at Rome, and were hawked about for sale throughout Germany, Switzerland, Hungary, Bohemia, and other countries, (wagon-loads of them,) and produced a great revenue to the pretended Vicar of Jesus Christ, who was thus enabled to keep up, at that time, the most extravagant, luxurious, profligate, debauched, and harlot court in the world. He then introduced publicly, in that country, the doctrine of salvation by faith in Christ, and not by the deeds of the law. After this he combated one error after another, till at length he considered the Fathers generally, with many of their traditions, as unfit teachers in the school of Christ, and found real comfort and instruction only in what we now call the Word of God. And now what are these Puseyites doing? They are trying to bring us back to those unscriptural principles, practices, and superstitions, which this good man so admirably exposed, and which almost all Germany discarded 400 years ago, and which were discarded also by us in England afterwards."

If this solemn foolery and imbecility goes much farther, and there is no immediate prospect of its being arrested, we fervently hope that, besides so much grave discussion, and controversial writing, some spirit akin to that which dictated The Tale of a Tub and the Plymley Letters, may come to rescue our betrayed common Protestantism and insulted common sense.

How will Free Trade in Corn affect the Farmer? An Examination of the Effects of Corn Laws upon British Agriculture. By Richard Griffiths Welford, Esq., Member of the Royal Agricultural Society of England, &c. &c. London: Ridgway.

The author of this inquiry, though a barrister, is a practical agriculturist, and something more; a man who understands comprehensively the interests of agriculture, whether independently or in relation to commerce. If he bring any original bias, prejudice, or sympathy to the discussion of the question which now more or less occupies the British, and the whole corn-growing, and cloth-wearing world, his leaning must be towards the agriculturists, both from training, taste, and occupation. Yet his conclusions are for Free Trade in Corn, and in all sorts of agricultural produce, as the true interest of the Farmer. The book, as a whole, is an intelligent and luminous History of the Corn Trade in all its bearings. It is stuffed full of facts and figures. An analysis of the concluding part of it would form one of the most valuable tracts that could at present be circulated among farmers, were it merely for the hints and illustrations connected with practical husbandry, and although it did not also open their eyes to their real interests, and soothe their Abolition panic.

Methodus Medendi; or, The Description and Treatment of the Principal Diseases incident to the Human Frame. By Henry M'Cormac, M.D., Professor of the Theory and Practice of Medicine in the Royal Belfast Institution, &c. &c. 8vo. Longman & Co.

We have met with no recent Systematic Treatise on the Practice of Medicine of which we can speak with more unreserved commendation than this. It is the work of a well-informed physician, and a man of sound judgment and acute discrimination. It abounds in new and interesting matter, obtained from the best Continental, as well as English writers on medical science. It is clear, precise, well-arranged; and, in a word, a compact and highly-condensed body of the information useful alike to the student of medicine and to the young practising physician. We have never met with a medical institute more free from dogmatism in character and wordiness in style. Very great labour must have been bestowed upon the work, and not without correspondingly raising its value. It teems with the accumulated experiences and observations of the greater lights of the profession; and thus forms a condensed body of the Practice of the most eminent physicians for the last hundred and fifty years. The author records his own experiences in a practice which appears to have been pretty extensive in different localities. He is thoroughly candid; and has, of course, like all his brethren who are so, as frequently to notice failures as to boast of the success of his treatment.

Explanations of some Passages in the Epistles of St Paul; chiefly by means of an amended Punctuation. By the Rev. Robert Morehead, D.D. Edinburgh: Macredie.

This is a posthumous publication, the author having died while it was passing through the press. It had, however, been committed to able and affectionate care. The editor is understood to be the Rev. Mr. Wright, late of Borthwick; between whom and Dr. Morehead the most cordial mutual esteem and regard subsisted, although they were clergyman of different denominations. This, as some of our readers may remember, was manifested with peculiar warmth, when Mr. Wright was embroiled with the present dominant party in the Kirk, and suffering the pains and penalties of certain impalpable or purely constructive heresies, alleged to be found in his works. Dr. Morehead did not long survive the event which so strongly called forth his feelings of personal regard and Christian benevolence, and also somewhat of an indignation which cannot be called unrighteous. It now falls to his friend to speak of him; which is done in the preface to the Treatise in terms of veneration and affection, in which those who had the best opportunities of appreciating Dr. Morehead in the pulpit, and in private life, will the most cordially coincide. The preface will, on this account, form, to the great majority of readers, the most interesting part of this little volume of Biblical criticism. Perhaps we are not entitled to give to mere emendations in punctuation, where no doctrine is interfered with, and no alteration of the text attempted, so formal a title as Biblical criticism. Leaving this, however, to theologians and critical readers, we pass from the book to Mr. Wright's estimate of its author.

The interest attached to the work cannot but be enhanced by the consideration, that its accomplished and amiable author has been called from life while the work was in progress of publication,—and that it thus comes forth,—almost coeval with his funeral rites,—as the last effort of one whose whole life was devoted to the exposition of Christian doctrine in its purest and most captivating form,—and whose own character was an attractive display of all the graces that peculiarly belong to the Christian faith.—Perhaps few persons, in any sphere, have left behind them a character more beautifully marked by everything that was amiable, liberal, and purely Christian.

In this city,—where the excellence of the author's character, and the extent of his acquirements were universally admitted and honoured, he was regarded with a love and respect, which were not surpassed by the homage paid to any of his contemporaries. For a long series of years he officiated in this metropolis, as the colleague of the Rev. Mr. Alison, the celebrated author of the Essay on Taste, and, beyond all competition, the most accomplished preacher of his time. It was no easy task to be the colleague of so distinguished a preacher; —and few persons could have been found, who, in that capacity, could have sustained a high name, when obliged regularly to officiate in the same pulpit with such a master of high sentiment and of exquisite expression. But Dr. Morehead, with the humility and candour which never failed him, always considered himself as much the pupil as the colleague of his distinguished friend;—and taking him as his model, he produced, through the whole of his incumbency, a series of discourses, which were heard with the highest satisfaction by all who listened to them,—and which, in the public opinion, placed him next to his admired colleague in all the highest and most delightful qualities of an accomplished pulpit orator. Perhaps it is but fair to add, that in the variety of his discourses, and in some qualities of high value in pulpit ministrations, he even surpassed his model.

Legends, Lyrics, and other Poems. By B. Simmons. Blackwood & Sons.

This handsome volume is chiefly made up of poems which have appeared in Blackwood's Magazine within the last two or three years. They have been warmly admired; and from the mode of their appearance are necessarily familiar to the public. As mere occasional poetical pieces, they are always graceful, polished, and well-tuned. And some of them are true Poems. Had the Lines to Napoleon asleep in his Study, the Lines to Shelly, The Disinterment, The Vigil, and several more we could name, not recently appeared in a periodical work, we should have felt pleasure in confirming our opinion by citing some of them, though they are not likely to be the most popular pieces of the collection.

Scenes and Adventures in Affghanistan. By William Taylor, late Troop Serjeant-major of the Fourth Light Dragoons. London: Boone.

This narrative has been anticipated by others that have given full details of the disastrous campaign of Affghanistan. The author tells principally his personal adventures, and what fell within the scope of his own observation, in a clear and brief style; and relates many anecdotes of the attendant horrors of war, which may furnish apt illustrations for the Tracts of the Peace Society which is shortly to meet in London. Something of the same sort, and still more horrible, the committee of that society may find in the Memoirs of Francis Horner, in a Letter from the late Sir Charles Bell, surgeon, who professionally visited the Field of Waterloo immediately after the Battle.

The narrative of Mr. Taylor must give the reader a high opinion of the intrepidity, bravery, and high spirit of the Affghans; and had it appeared earlier, it would have been highly prized.

Lives of the Princes of Wales, Heirs to the British Throne. By Robert Folkestone Williams, Esq., Author of "Shakspeare and his Friends." Volume I. with plates. Colburn.

This, we presume, is to be another semi-historical work, somewhat after the fashion of Miss Strickland's "Queens of England." The author does not restrict himself to those Princes of Wales who have died without coming to the throne. He takes all in; and, for aught that we see, may make a work as voluminous as Hume's History of England and its Kings. It is more to the point that his reading, and the familiar style of his narrative, give a livelier interest to the memoirs than can be communicated to purely historical writings; which must treat of great events, and that by wholesale. This volume comprehends three lives; that of the first Prince of Wales, Edward of Caernarvon; his son, here styled Edward of Windsor; and Edward of Woodstock, the Black Prince, son of Edward the Third and Queen Philippa. By diligently ransacking the old Chronicelers, English and French, antiquarian works, and county histories, the compiler has contrived to collect a considerable mass of materials, which he has thrown into a very readable form.

The Friend of Youth; or a Series of Papers addressed to the Young, on the Duties of Life. By William Mackenzie. Oliver & Boyd.

This volume consists of a number of brief and well-written essays on a diversity of subjects; but all bearing upon the Duties of Life, and the formation of sound principles of conduct. The author is a teacher of youth; and he states that the materials of his work "are the result of his own observation and experience." He has, however, also been guided by the ripened judgments of the most enlightened and practical of our great moralists. He is seldom or never opposed to received sober opinions, and is never either visionary or paradoxical. At the same time, his moral standard is high, and his charity enlarged. The Essays, taken as a whole, must prove a beneficial study to the young; their author is often a highly instructive, and always a safe guide.

The Churchman's Companion; a Help to Scripture Knowledge for the Family Circle. London: Hastings.

This is a neat small volume, giving a brief general History of the Old and the New Testaments, and an explanation of their leading subjects; with a few excellent selections from eminent divines, for family reading, and some miscellaneous information useful to Episcopalians. The rest of the work is available to Christians of every denomination, whether in the Family or the Closet.

The Downfall of Popery and Civil Despotism; or the tremendous and final conflict with the Anti-Christian powers which shortly awaits the Church of Christ. By a Student of Prophecy. London: T. Ward & Co.

We need scarcely say that this is a broadside against Popery and Puseyism.

NEW NOVELS.

The Scottish Heiress: a Novel. In three volumes. London: T. C. Newby; and T. & W. Boone.

A romance of genuine Scottish manufacture is become so rare of late years, that anything of the sort must command some degree of attention. The Scottish Heiress will repay whatever attention it may receive. It displays considerable knowledge of external life, and even some power of looking into the human heart. It gives a just and lively picture of a certain kind of manners; has a fair share of romantic and sentimental incident and interest, and is withal amusing;—keeps the reader awake. What more would we have? The hero, the embryo lawyer Kenneth Clyne, is a manly-spirited young fellow, who gains the heart of the Heiress while battling for her legal rights of birth and heritage; rather by personal bravery, however, than professional ability. He has a capital henchman in a certain Ben Blinker, who plays Strap to his Random, and an equally admirable patron in Mr. Andrew Meiklejohn, a W.S.; and as honest a man as the profession will allow. There are many other characters, gentle and simple, that, if not "first-raters," yet play their parts well, or fill the scene respectably. We have been dipping for a sample. A Scottish summer landscape—the description of a feudal domain—a scene in the Westport, the region of Burke and Hare—an Edinburgh rout—or an exciting scene; which to choose? for we might find each and all of these good of their kind: but as the Box-like Dutch painting of still-life—or something like it, is, we are informed, more attractive to public taste at present than anything else, save the romance of Burglary and Murder, we copy out Kenneth's first London lodging, when he seeks the metropolis to better his fortunes:—

It was grey twilight when he arrived at the abode of Mrs. Tympany—his luggage was placed in the dark, narrow lobby, and the landlady inquired which of the rooms he chose to occupy. For a moment Kenneth debated with himself. The little room with the camp-bed was as narrow as a prisoner's cell. It was a place to foster gloom and despondency. You had only to enter it to see it was suited for none but those who were decayed in circumstances, and unhappy in their lot. The furniture was old—had once been good, but now was shabby. There is a kind of sympathy between a ruined man and old decayed furniture, but it is a sympathy which gives no solace—it is a melancholy and oppressive one. The room was almost dark, too; and the dim colour of every object made it yet more cheerless and forbidding. But it was cheaper than the other apartments, and Kenneth was forced to fix upon it. His trunks were carried in, a sickly burning farthing candle placed upon the table, to give light for some nook to place them in, and this done, the blinds were pulled down, the outside shutters barred, and the landlady reëntering seated herself without ceremony and began to enter into the details of his housekeeping. "I suppose," said she, "you would not like to clean your boots yourself?" "Not if I could avoid it," said Kenneth, feeling painfully the change in his circumstances by such a question being asked. "That will be an extra charge of a shilling a-week," said the little landlady pensively. "Well," said Kenneth, "I am afraid I cannot help it. "Then, Sir, there's candles: you cannot sit in the dark, and I require the rushlight." "Get what I require," said her lodger, handing her a sovereign, and putting an end to the conference. "I wish," said Kenneth, as soon as she was gone, throwing himself into a seat, and bending over the table with his hands pressed to his forehead, "I wish that I could not think!"

The following day it rained in torrents—the whole atmosphere was overcast, and one continued shower continued pouring—not an honest hearty patter, with now and then a blink of sunshine—but silent, rapid falling clouds of rain, streaming over the soaked street, filling the gutters to overflowing, and creating innumerable whirlpools, currents, and eddies of dirty black water, sweeping along orange peel, egg shells, and chips of wood; some half buried in the torrent, and others dancing and whirling upon it. A drudge of a girl, carrying a pewter pot, with an apron thrown over her head, passed hurriedly across the street—a cat's meat-woman, wrapped like a coach-guard, but evidently soaked through, moved melancholily along, with her half-drowned dog and creaking cart—and a sallow hook-nosed Jew, calling old clothes, his own suit of rusty black shinning with wet, and his saturated hat-brim drooping over his eyes—while a barefoot man, holding his hat in his hand, with the rain pouring on his head, was singing a miserable ditty in the middle of the street.

Such were the objects which presented themselves to Kenneth, as he pulled up the green, rattling, lathwood blind, and looked out from the window of his room. They were little calculated to elevate his spirits—he could not even help drawing an ominous presentiment from the poor wretch that sang unheeded under the pitiless rain. He turned from the sight, and cast his eyes over the room. The increase of light did not improve its appearance; on the contrary, it revealed various blemishes which had previously escaped his observation. The mirror over the mantelpiece was zig-zagged with cracks, the colours of the threadbare carpet were perfectly obliterated; the chairs, in addition to being rickety, were not two alike; the crystal and china, displayed in a narrow corner, had generally only the parts entire which were exposed to view, and indeed the most respectable looking objects in the room, were his own two travel-rubbed trunks.

The breakfast things, which the provident Mrs. Tympany now brought into the room, were of a similar character. The spout of the teapot had met with an accident, which caused it to sputter out the tea in two streams, a flowing and a dripping one; the tea-cup was of old china, and the saucer of the most ordinary stoneware, the cream-pot was perfect in itself, but bore no sort of resemblance, either in size or pattern, to anything else on the table; and a modest-looking white soup basin performed the office of a sugar-bowl. These were flanked on one side by a large loaf, an unshapely lump of butter, and a pickle-bottle full of tea, (Mrs. Tympany's purchases for her new lodger;) and on the other, by a breakfast-plate with a piece knocked off, and a green-hafted knife lying on it; a crystal saltcellar, which, notwithstanding its extreme thickness, had not escaped a rent; the plated salt-spoon looking blue and poisonous with copperas rust; and a couple of little, dingy eggs, in the bottom of what was intended to form afterwards the slop-basin.

But it was no place for finding fault, or even for making invidious observations; so, having finished breakfast, Kenneth began to think more seriously of his situation, not in a contemplative manner, but with the view to present exertion. "Something must be done," thought he, "it is now no time to indulge mournful dreams of the past; I have hardly twenty pounds in my purse, and every hour is eating even into that; I am here among strangers, friendless and unknown: in one word, I must do something or starve."

His circumstance rendered this in no need of demonstration; but the question was—"what is to be done!"—and this by no means admitted of so easy a solution.

Sir Michael Paulet; a Novel. By Miss Ellen Pickering, Author of "Nan Darrell," &c., &c., &c. 3 volumes. London: Newby; and T. & W. Boone.

In Sir Michael Paulet we have a fair specimen of the best staple of the modern Circulating Library, and an advance, by countless degrees, upon the Minerva Press achievements of our grandmothers. Yet Sir Michael Paulet is of their legitimate offspring, though a combination of the domestic novel and the wildest romance. Nella, the undersized heroine, is, for example, a creature whom Miss Burney or Miss Austin might have acknowledged as among their best literary creations; yet Nella is here made to perform the part of the heroine of a melodrama. The necessities of a writer of Circulating Library romances, in three volumes, require such sacrifices. We should hope that, in a novel which displays so much real talent, as well as facility, the sacrifices are made so as to ensure the proposed end—temporary popularity. Although the fickle public of this "transition period" is, above measure, capricious and difficult, Sir Michael Paulet must please.

The Man o' War's Man. By Bill Truck, Senior Boatswain of the Royal College of Greenwich. 1 volume. Blackwood & Sons.

This neat reprint is not "a new novel." It is the gathering together of a series of papers which appeared, above twenty years since, in Blackwood's Magazine, and were warmly admired for their animation, and their fidelity to salt-water life. The truth of these sketches proved their ruin; for before they had gone very far, the work began to give mortal offence—not to seamen, but to their officers; and all because the pourtrayer of nautical characters and manners "noted," as he tells, "the usual parlance of the commanders with as truthful and unprejudiced a hand as that of those they commanded,"—made, in short, but trivial distinction between the language "of Jack and the Gentleman."——Remonstrances and complaints came in thick and fast—the author laughed and persisted; and the publisher, "with his usual prudence," ran The Man o' War's Man, or his craft, on shore.—— Tales of the Sea—the Nautical Novel, which has since enjoyed such a long run of popularity, was then unknown. The author of The Man o' War's Man claims the honour of having led the way in this popular line, and it belongs to him. Even Cooper had not then launched The Water-Witch, and Marryat was probably still a Middy. But, independently of the honour of originality, his adventures possess truth, life, and a strong, rough interest. The Mutiny at the Nore, that appalling event in naval, and we may say national annals, was then untouched by the fictionist, and he made it his own. This revival of an affair, which had "frightened the isle from its propriety," was of itself enough, if well-managed, to make the fortune of the Tale.

SERIAL WORKS.

Jessie Phillips; a Tale of the New Poor Laws. Part IV.—This tale answers well its secondary purpose, as a clever and entertaining novel. We have not yet come to "the tug of war" with the new Poor Law—the Bastardy clause—of which, we presume, poor Jessie is about to be the victim.

The Steam-Packet; a Tale of the River and the Ocean. Part I.—This is another branch of the fruitful family of Pickwick. The author is G. W. Reynolds, the well-known writer of numerous fictions which, we believe, are popular with a large class of readers. After a learned preliminary chapter on steam agency, the reader is introduced to Mr. Pifpaf, an eminent pork-butcher, and his amiable and interesting family, consisting of a very delicate lady, and three super-refined daughters. Mr. Pifpaf presides, and for many years has presided, over the Luminaries, a convivial club, meeting every Monday evening at the Musical Bee, a public-house situated somewhere in the district of Eastcheap.——The club was philosophic; it discussed hot kidneys, Welsh rabbits, devils, and broiled bones; and sought Truth at the bottom of the porter-pot and the punch-bowl. From the days of Addison, a club has formed a happy medium of eliciting humours and character; and here, to heighten the zest, we have not only the members of the club, but their fair appendages, their womankind.

The Miller of Deanhaugh. By the Author of The Gaberlunzie's Wallet. Part I. Edinburgh: Menzies.—This is the commencement of a racy Scottish Tale; or as probably of a series of sketches, of which the scene is laid in a village, towards which Edina has thrown her "white arms," until they almost embrace the picturesque "Sleepy Hollow" in which it lies. The foreground of the piece is well sketched; the principal figures, the Miller and the Smith, boldly outlined. But four-and-twenty pages, however well they may promise, scarcely enable us to pronounce judgment. We should hope that, while maintaining the same character of nationality, the Jolly Miller will confine himself more strictly to the "Annals of the Poor"—and be less Jacobitical than the Gaberlunzie, and as poetical.

PAMPHLETS.

An Account of the only known Manuscript of Shakpeare's Plays. By James Orchard Halliwell, Esq. London. John Russell Smith.—The relic referred to, is a manuscript of the Merry Wives of Windsor, of which Mr Halliwell is the fortunate purchaser. It is not written by Shakspeare, however. It shows some considerable variations from the common editions of the Comedy; but is, after all, rather a curiosity for the antiquary, than a thing to interest the admirers of Shakspeare's dramas. The manuscript is believed to have been written for some private Play-house in the time of the Commonwealth.

Anti-Duel: A Plan for the Abrogation of Duelling. By John Dunlop, Esq., Founder of the Temperance Movement in Great Britain.—After a history of the practice of Duelling, and an exposure of the absurdity and unnaturalness of the custom, the common-place arguments employed in its defence are discussed, and the remedy proposed. Duelling is proposed to be prevented by what the author terms Negative Association among the duelling rank of society, or an Anti-duel pledge. Duelling is happily falling into desuetude through the refinement of manners, and the force of ridicule and contempt.

On the Educational Clauses in the Bill now before the House of Commons, for Regulating the Employment of Children and Young Persons in Factories; By W. J. Fox.—Of this Pamphlet it is enough to say, that Mr Fox, a Unitarian minister, is as decided in opposing Sir James Graham's Bill as any of the ministers of the other denominations of Dissenters, though his opposition is not always grounded on the same reasons. It is not while the clergy of the Church of England are displaying every day more strongly their Puseyite vagaries, and thirst of domination, and their Bishops rather encouraging than checking them in their new-fangled notions and arrogant pretensions, that the great body of the laity, and all the Dissenters, are to be won to a scheme of education which shall place any degree whatever of discretionary power in their hands.

A Day's Excursion and Discussion, dedicated to the Reformers of Fife, and Members of Complete Suffrage Unions. Cupar: Tullis.—In the form of a dialogue, in which the interlocutors—a Citizen of Glasgow, and a Complete suffragist of "the Howe of Fife"—talk "from morn till dewy eve," we find a good deal of clever familiar discussion on political parties and topics, and so tough an argument for Universal Suffrage, that at the close of the day the Glasgow citizen is a convert. The question of the Suffrage is well put, well sifted, and triumphantly established, as a great and necessary step in social progression; as a necessary preliminary to all other reforms, and even to the abolition of the Corn-Laws; as it is assumed that the landed influence in Parliament can never be subdued without a great extension of the franchise.

SIX LECTURES ON THE CORN-LAW MONOPOLY AND FREE-TRADE, delivered at the London Mechanic's Institution. By Philip Harwood.—There are many strong and telling points in these lectures. They are, of course, in form more rhetorical than argumentative; yet is there no lack of argument.

ADDRESS TO AGRICULTURISTS AND OTHERS, IN ONE OF THE RURAL DISTRICTS, ON THE NATURE AND EFFECTS OF THE PRESENT CORN LAWS. By Dr Henry Edwards.

A LETTER TO A PHILOSOPHER IN REPLY TO SOME RECENT ATTEMPTS TO VINDICATE BERKELEY'S THEORY OF VISION.—Mr. Bailey's Review of Berkeley's Theory was attacked in Blackwood's Magazine, and in the Westminster Review. This is his answer to the critics. It does not preclude "more last words," though probably no rejoinder will proceed from the former quarters.

M'NAUGHTEN—A LETTER TO THE LORD CHANCELLOR UPON INSANITY. By J. Q. Rumball, Esq.—The author of this pamphlet is a medical man, and a decided phrenologist; quite a conjuror in telling the characters of madmen of all sorts from the shape of their skulls. His Essay was written in substance twenty years since, and probably printed; but M'Naughten's case offered a good opportunity for a second and improved Edition, in a Letter to the Lord Chancellor. Mr. Rumball does not push tenderness for malignant monomaniacs quite so far as some of the phrenologists; yet he is no friend to the gallows. He would have no murderer get off from punishment under the plea of insanity, unless it is ascertained that his bump of Destructiveness was in a diseased state—was actively or acutely diseased when the crime was committed. If we understand him right, he would, if he had been on the juries, no more have acquitted Oxford and M'Naughten, than he would have acquitted Bellingham; though he would have sent all three to prison, not to the place of execution. Finally he confidently asserts that no one save a phrenologer can understand Insanity; whence it follows that, in all cases of insane criminals, phrenologers alone are qualified to be either judges or jurymen.

POSTSCRIPT POLITICAL.—THE REPEAL OF THE CORN LAWS.

As the hour of Trial approaches, public interest becomes more intense, if that be possible, as to the issue of the great Question,—would that we might term it the great Measure!—of the present session of Parliament—the total abolition of the Corn and Provision restrictions. Compared with this, Education Bills, Colonisation Schemes, Questions of Privilege, and every other subject, however important in itself, must give way as secondary in importance and urgency to the consideration, of how the people are to be fed and clothed, and how,—in order to being fed, and clothed, and permanently secured in the comforts needful to the well-being of rational creatures,—employment is to be found for them. That they should by their labour be freely permitted to sustain themselves, is surely no unreasonable demand upon a government or a legislature that assumes the right of making laws to regulate and limit the supply of their food, without undertaking to supply their wants. Since Parliament met, nothing has arisen to lessen the all-absorbing interest of this vital question, nor to divert public attention from it. That this measure should be carried, is the first, if not the one urgent and paramount necessity of the time. The Anti-corn Law League has fulfilled the duty to which it was solemnly pledged, by keeping the question constantly before the public, and by employing every means to disseminate knowledge; and these means have not been used in vain. But the League has had potent auxiliaries. A revenue exhibiting, if not a further actual decrease, yet no decided symptom of improvement, no token that the extreme sufferings of the people are lessening,—a fluctuating or steadily-falling corn and provision market, in the face of every iniquitous means employed to bolster it up,—no signs of reviving trade, save such as are partial and fitful:—these are all potent auxiliaries of the League; nor would it be matter of surprise if, in the natural course of retributive justice, the protected class—the farmers—when ruin has fully opened their eyes, should become active instruments in sweeping away those enactments which merely decree, that in the common destruction they shall have the privilege of being the last to be devoured. And this is the very utmost that protective laws can do for them. Nor have these laws always done even thus much; as is proved by the periodical, and often well-founded outcry, of "agricultural distress" heard in Parliament. It will not take us by surprise, before two more good seasons have gone by—if the Corn Laws shall exist so long—to find the farmers themselves suggesting Free Trade, in agricultural and all other produce, as the natural and permanent remedy for all that they have suffered, since first made, at the cost of their neighbours, the special objects of protective laws. They have already made the discovery of what the real object of these laws is; and that the keeping up of their landlords' rents is not the best way of securing their own prosperity. The progress of that enlightenment among the farmers, which sooner or later must be forced upon their landlords, is the most hopeful feature of the repeal agitation within the last six months. No other class of the community needed to have their eyes opened. There might be other men swayed by their party feelings or interests, but the country at large was, in its sober judgment, almost unanimous for the repeal of the Corn Laws, and for Free Trade; and this from the Prime Minister (in his secret heart,) to the lowest official who could put two ideas together. There was, and there is, no want of conviction, more united and more decided than has ever perhaps been held by the nation upon any other measure by which it has been powerfully agitated. We will not except the great moral question of Slavery. And this too is a moral question, and a momentous one. No one longer thinks of addressing any other class with a view to conviction save the hesitating few among the farmers and the obstinate many among the landowners. But with this union and force of opinion as to the policy and justice of the measure, and the overwhelming necessity for its immediate adoption, which is admitted in the admission of national distress, where lies the obstruction? The saving the credit of the statesmanship of

Sir Robert Peel, who last year invented a Sliding Scale, which, though now confessed to be completely inefficient, ought, notwithstanding, to be allowed a little time to die with decency—a couple of years or so instead of one year:—Is this an argument to use to starving workmen, and manufacturers threatened with ruin? But there is another and greater obstruction; and the people perceive it with bitter indignation, and brood upon the uses of their nominal body of representatives, and meditate future measures, and farther-reaching dark designs, which should find no place in the thoughts of a well-governed, which must necessarily be a fully employed, and a comfortably subsisted community. Every day longer that the hateful and grinding monopolies under which they groan, are retained, must and ought to add to the number of the discontented,—the fiercely discontented. The Address just issued by the leaders of the Complete Suffrage party—a party whose objects are good, openly avowed, and peaceful, presents a view of the condition of the people at the present time, which it would give us very sincere pleasure to be able to deny. We are compelled to confirm it; and to question if it goes far enough in painting the demoralization produced by the misery which has arisen among the people from bad legislation. Time it is for the Government to revolve plans of Educating the people, and more than time that it knew that the good training of the fire-side must be the preliminary as well as the accompaniment to the education of the School, if any considerable amelioration of character and social condition is to be hoped for among us. What are a knowledge of reading and writing and of the Church Catechism, to do for the degraded beings, born and living in those dens in the country as well as the towns, which Lord Ashley's speeches, and numerous official reports have of late laid open to our legislators and representatives? To these they will listen, these must make some faint impression, whatever has been the fate of the hundred upon hundreds of similar warnings that have been poured upon the deaf ears which the shouts of the rioters of last autumn first taught to listen. And while they listen, will they soberly ask themselves, laying it upon their consciences, what has caused this frightful extent of ignorance, suffering, and moral degradation among the people of England? among those who ought to be one of the most intelligent and happy groups of [the whole human family.

Until the annual motion of Mr. Villiers is debated, we shall not know the exact progress which the question of Free Trade in Food has made in Parliament. In spite of all impediments, active and inert, we should imagine that it will be found considerable. The minds of the people, the necessities of the people—strongly and universally expressed in ways that cannot be mistaken—must react even upon Peel's Corn-law-begotten Parliament. The necessary preliminary measures have been well taken, irksome as it must be to repeat the same tedious task. Mr. Ward did well once more to run Sir Robert Peel up to the wall, and thus once more demonstrate, though negatively, to the country the rottenness of that out-worn argument of the peculiar burdens affecting land, which will no longer bear handling; while, at the same time, he exhibited to the landed interest the helpless, the pitiable plight of their gagged champion, who had not one word to say for them. These exposures do immense good. The time of Parliament could only be employed better in one way—in abolishing the evils laid bare. Petitions against the Corn Laws will, no doubt, pour into the House from all quarters, and in abundance; and though we do not wonder that the people should sicken at what seems their useless and tedious repetition, petitions are desirable, both as the constitutional form in which the wishes and wants of the country are in the meanwhile to be expressed, and also as affording legislators a decent pretext for yielding. We, therefore, hope that Anti-corn Law Petitions will be multitudinous; so that no degree of legislative effrontery may give any man impunity in taxing the people with indifference on this vital matter. Not so well as Mr. Ward's movement was that of Mr. C. Buller with the revived Colonization Scheme; which, whatever may be its merits, and upon these we have frequently expressed a decided opinion,*—was surely inopportune and ill-advised, as tending to distract the attention both of the country and of Parliament from the one great measure to which every effort requires to be bent.

Mr. Buller is certainly far from denying the necessity of Free Trade, but he would not show it the courtesy which is demanded for Sir Robert Peel's Sliding Scale; he would not give a fair trial to the new plan of fetching home the food to the men, instead of shipping off the men with the chance, only, of either creating their own food or perishing in the attempt. The champions of this grand Colonization Scheme, broached several years since, and hung up and tried again as occasion offered,—champions whom it is no want of charity to describe as persons of strangely-mixed motives,—may hope, in the present exigency, to catch a little incidental Tory support or countenance, by creating a diversion in favour of the Tories. But those men in this small party who are single-minded, in their belief of the efficacy of colonization as a remedy for national distress, and at the same time the advocates of Free Trade, and especially of the repeal of the Corn Laws, must surely regret that Mr. Buller brought forward a measure which ought, at all events, to have been delayed to a more convenient season. We trust that the ill-consequences with which, at least, the time chosen for its discussion is fraught, are averted, and that the minds and efforts of all men who pretend to comprehend the interests of the country, will be bent in strength and union to the great duty before them,—to securing one admitted and great advantage, before vaguely aiming at any other.

THOMAS CARLYLE'S PAST AND PRESENT.*

WHAT are we to make of THOMAS CARLYLE?—how often have we been asked this question! and yet we wish we had been asked it somewhat oftener; for there are many persons in the world—in the limbo of the literary world more perhaps than anywhere else—who never think of asking any questions at all, but carry all their judgments ready-made with them in their pockets, prepared, packeted, and labelled, according to the exact recipe of some traditionary pharmacopœia of classicality; these men have made of Thomas Carlyle what they make of everybody whose name does not appear upon the superscription of their stamped papers;—he is not classical, he is not orthodox, according to their neat articles: therefore he is naught. But we have had too many turnings and overturnings in the literary, as well as in the political world, since the year 1789, to be much concerned now about the ready-made judgments of these nice and correct gentlemen of the pharmacopœia. Let them even count their packets, and take their powders regularly. None but a most wanton and mischievous person would attempt to disturb the composure of their stomachs by a dose of Coleridge or Carlyle. Let them continue, in the midst of these stormy times, to sit apart in their neatly-varnished cabinets, dealing forth, for recreation, at intervals, stout, puffy blasts against such questionable men as he with whom we have here to do—"a fool—an affected puppy—a blown-up bundle of conceited verbosity—a genius sublimely unintelligible—a metaphysician—a GERMAN!"—'Tis both a shorter and an easier method at all times to live down than to write down merely negative criticism of this kind. We shall, therefore, for the sake of ourselves, and those of our readers who are not too wise to ask questions, try in what fashion we can answer this one;—What are we to make of Thomas Carlyle?

Thomas Carlyle, in the common use of the English language, is not a poet. Much less does he look like a philosopher—as philosophers, calm, cool, and reasoning, are wont to be; a critic, though he has criticised a great deal, you cannot call him in the common sense at all; to science he has no pretence, one of the most unscientific men of decided grasp perhaps that breathes; political economy and statistics he hates; law he declares to be a mere SHAM; at legislation certainly he aims, and that on a great scale; but legislation, he says expressly, is not his business, and he has no business to intermeddle with it. What, then, shall we make of him? He is a preacher, a preacher out of the pulpit,—a prophet perhaps; for in these respectable days, when no man can preach or prophesy in the regular pulpits who cannot squeeze his thoughts into the orthodox dialect of the Thirty-nine Articles, or The Confession of Faith,—a thinker of power and originality, a soul burdened with a moral message to its fellow-souls—a heart from the fiery centre of Nature shot direct, as some one phrases it, literally "raging with humanity." Such an one, though meant by nature for occupying a pulpit, finding the entrance into the churches as they now are, guarded by grim comminatory clauses, and barricaded by thorny formulas, which he cannot swallow, necessarily becomes a wandering prophet, a preacher of the wilderness, whose house is where he can find shelter, and whose dinner must often be brought to him by ravens: what, since the invention of printing, we call a prophet no longer, but only a writer of books, a literary man of a very strange and eccentric character. Such a preacher, such a prophet is Thomas Carlyle; and if you do not take up "Past and Present" in this serious acceptation, you had better throw it down. The book is not written for you. People do not go to church merely or mainly to be amused. "ERNST IST DAS LEBEN." Life is a very serious thing: and we live, unquestionably, in very serious times. Mr. Carlyle (who has more of Schiller than of Goethe in him, though he is always talking of the latter) has written this motto, from the earnest German poet, upon the portico of his temple. Enter seriously with the real intent to worship, and assuredly you will find something worthy to be worshipped; for here also, amid many outlandish and fantastic imps, "here also there are GODS."

But what kind of Gods?—what sort of a sermon?—and what is the text?—The Gods, we are afraid, are strange Gods, very German-looking Gods, not English at all. The sermon is a very strange sermon, couched in a very strange dialect, half ancient Hebrew, and half modern Teutonic, rushing strangely into all places which vulgar sermons are strangely careful to eschew; orthodox only in one point, that it deals somewhat largely in a certain sweeping facility of denunciation: and the text is twofold; one from a book that we ought all to know something about—a very good text, but one very difficult to preach on to any practical purpose in this country—"THE LOVE OF MONEY IS THE ROOT OF ALL EVIL;" and the other, also a very good text, from the proverbial philosophy of some pious old monk—"LABORARE EST ORARE"—

* Past and Present. By Thomas Carlyle. Post 8vo. London: Chapman & Hall.

"Working is the best praying."—Labour, free labour, and the just wages of labour; labour, not for the material love of cold metals basely bright, but for the love of God, and of your fellow-men, for the love of mere labour, if you can find nothing better; this is the sum and substance of Thomas Carlyle's new book, and the drift of his new sermon: and if you will only not be too hasty to take offence at grotesque peculiarities,—if you will bear in mind charitably, that the most comely cavaliers in the days of romance used constantly to be escorted by the most ugly and misshapen dwarfs,—then, after reading to the end, you are like to confess with us, that, though somewhat too long, and too much crammed with eager iterations, it is, nevertheless, on the whole, a very good book, a very sound and (not to speak it profanely) Evangelical discourse.

But Mr. Carlyle is more than a preacher. He is a prophet also. A prophet is not essentially different from a preacher; he is only different in degree. Prophesying is preaching in its highest power. Preaching is a common thing—too common, and too cheap by far now-a-days—a thing to be heard decently on Sunday, (by all respectable persons at least,) that it may be decently forgotten on Monday; but prophecy is only for great occasions, for stirring eras, when self-renovating Time is pregnant with some new birth; such as the era of the preaching of Christianity, the era of the Reformation, the era of the French Revolution, of which last era, this present year, 1843, in Great Britain, is a part. We may be mistaken: every man may be mistaken; but we think we can mark with the finger distinctly three men who, in their whole aspect and character, deserve to be esteemed the mighty literary (as opposed to scientific or legislative) prophets of the great revolutionary change which is even now working itself out in this troubled isle. The men we mean are, Percy Bysshe Shelley, Samuel Taylor Coleridge, and Thomas Carlyle. Don't think it strange that these so different intellects in some respects, are here named together. It is the cast and character of the men, the tone of their mind, their position in relation to the age, of which we speak. No matter that Coleridge was outwardly connected with that political party whose office it is to maintain the present by explaining the past, rather than to interpret the future by creating the present: inwardly he did not belong to them: therefore, also, some of the less wise of them have already begun publicly to proclaim him a heretic. No matter either that of these three men whom we call preëminently prophets, the two who are gone had the function of verse, the one who remains has not; their vocation of preaching, of prophesying is the same. Do you not feel it? Is there not something serious and weighty, as if of a prophet-burden—something solemn, awful, and soul-compelling in the apparition, in the utterances of these men? Do you not see how they stand forth each of them, apart from the busy throng of British actualities, and in a dialect each of his own, testify solemnly against the various idol-worships of the age—the worship of Mammon and Materialism in all its portentous extent, of false glory, and of vain shows, of gilded coaches, and of sounding names, of titled idleness and mitred stupidity? This you must feel, this you must see in them, or you see and feel nothing at all in the matter. This you must see and feel specially in Thomas Carlyle; and yet, again, specially in this new book of his; than which a more solemn sermon in some respects, and terrible prophecy, has never been thundered into British ears.

There is one thing which, from the days of Cassandra downwards, has been characteristic of all prophetic utterances, that they are wont to be delivered in a language which, to the common ear, is not easy to be understood. This unintelligibility, in the case of true prophets, arises, in a great measure, not so much from any intellectual peculiarity on the part of the preacher, as from a moral incapacity on the part of the hearers. "Ears have they, but they hear not." They cannot understand, chiefly because they will not understand. At the same time, even prophets of the highest class are seldom altogether without blame in the matter of the proverbial obscurity with which they are wont to involve their oracles. Possibly, in some points of view, this obscurity cannot be altogether avoided; but it should always be guarded against. Unhappily of all modern prophets, there is none who lies open to the charge of having involved himself in needless obscurity, so manifestly as Thomas Carlyle. We must, therefore, speak more particularly of this matter, as much for the sake of the public, as for the sake of Mr. Carlyle himself perhaps. How does this obscurity of the prophetic diction arise in the general case, and why is Mr. Carlyle in particular more obscure than his brethren? Consider what language is. It is the general system of audible, and (by help of writing) visible symbols, whereby reasonable souls have agreed to express that general stock of ideas which one reasonable soul has in common with another; the common currency of thought, so to speak. But it is also another, and a no less important thing. It is that particular body of audible symbols which each particular soul moulds and shapes out for itself to express that particular system of ideas, so and so arranged, and so and so coloured, that belongs to it as an individual, and to no other; at least to none in exactly the same combination, and to exactly the same degree. Now, there are two kinds of style: the style of common men, and the style of uncommon men. Of these two kinds, you will plainly see that the former will necessarily be altogether composed of the common currency of thought; while the latter will always bear upon it a distinct image and superscription, to be deciphered perfectly only by spirits kindred to the coiner. And the more uncommon and original a man is, the more uncommon, original, and, to the common man, unintelligible will be his style. This is a universal rule applicable to all writers and speakers; but there is something more than this in the case of the prophet. He is a man who has not merely more of the individual to imprint upon his language than common men, but his whole habits of thought and manner of life tend to withdraw him (inconveniently we must say) from that public, or mass of common men, to whom it is his vocation to preach. John the Baptist was not the only prophet who showed himself fond of solitude and the wilderness. They must all be educated in that school. They must talk much with themselves, with God, and with the devil too, sometimes. Is it, then, strange at all,—is it not rather quite natural, that, with a gigantic soul, struggling with strong throes continually to shape the world to its likeness despotically, and not slavishly receive a likeness from the world, and communing daily in solitary places with spirits rather than with men,—the prophet should unconsciously (the wicked world says affectedly) form to himself a style of utterance only half understood at times by those common mortals to whom it is addressed? 'Tis a pity this prophetic obscurity—a great pity; but let not money-making men, with glib eloquence discoursing largely of the great material Trimurti, Corn, Coin, and Currency,—let not prim "Dandiacal bodies," expert masters of small-talk, and of large oaths,—let not nice, critical gentlemen, with a fluent array of vituperatory and laudatory phrases, from the most recent or the most ancient dictionary of Aesthetics,—let not exact, scientific men, painfully grinding out, to name the most musical things in nature, the most dissonant jargon in art,—let not damnatory, sacerdotal men, systematically deafening their own ears, and other peoples' with an "inane tumult of unintelligent and unintelligible hearsays,"—let not the wholesale dealers in these kinds, or in any other kind of authorized slang, be too ready to be found declaiming against the unauthorized slang of Thomas Carlyle, the literary prophet. Let us be charitable,—let us be considerate. We all deal in slang, more or less. The only difference is, that the prophet deals in a new and strange slang known only to himself, and not yet become the property of any legitimate corporation of men. This charity the prophet has a right to expect from us. He is not the less bound, however, to get rid of his slang as quickly as he can. Is there not offence enough in the matter, without adding a new stumbling-block in the manner? Men who are capable only of small things will lay hold of the tags of your style, and incommode the free movement of your apostleship seriously. Do not be afraid to harm your mighty mission by being as little singular as possible in small things. A more original, a more powerful, a more racy style, than Mr. Carlyle's, the English language has not to show; but its faults—O what faults! Was not the English language made to be understood by English men? It may be true—it is true to a certain extent—that the preachers of German things, in England, at the present day, are forced to Germanize their English, just as the Greek of the New Testament was necessarily Hebraized by the first preachers of Christianity; but Mr. Carlyle does not give himself any reasonable pains to temper the harsh edge of this disagreeable necessity. He will not even condescend to explain; he merely alludes. He tumbles and tosses, plunges and plashes, spouts and plays capriciously, a huge, strange, leviathan of literature in his wild German ocean at large, and seems nothing concerned to think, that of those who behold the portentous phenomenon, for twenty that will wonder and gaze, only one will be edified; as if the mission of a great prophet were to open the outward eyes of men merely, and not rather their understandings and their hearts. The god who exults thus inconsiderately in the strangeness of his own Avatar, had need to see well to it, that the children of men may not mistake him here and there (innocently enough) for a posture-maker and a buffoon.

We hope no reasonable admirer of Mr. Carlyle will consider us as having spoken too largely, or too severely on this merely external matter of style. There are some men in whom a vicious style of writing is so ingrained, that you cannot hope to reform them by criticism any more than you can teach the gnarled oak not to delight in tortuosity. There are also in Mr. Carlyle's style some peculiarities which, though they may be more nearly allied to fault than excellence, no man that loves natural vigour more than a conventional classicality, would wish to see removed. But there are other peculiarities, again, which are mere adventitious tricks, which do not belong to Mr. Carlyle's nature essentially; as any one may satisfy himself, by comparing the earlier productions of this writer's pen with the later. These tricks and juggleries of German phrase, partly of metaphysical, partly of merely grammatical peculiarity, our direct clear-seeing, steady-marching, hard-hitting, English tongue will not away with. Besides, John Bull, as Mr. Carlyle has very clearly discerned, is a great respecter of use and wont in all things, and will have law and custom to reign supreme, to a certain extent, over language as well as over the Church. Let this author, therefore, who, though of German training, has evidently not walked the streets of London with his eyes shut, only condescend to untwist a few of these foolish Teutonic tassels that he so studiously appends to his English speech: let him take, then, some historical theme worthy of his strength—Oliver Cromwell, say, Martin Luther, or Napoleon: let him leave the story as much as possible to tell itself, and not swamp it, as he did the French Revolution, in monstrous self-repeating convolutions and contortions of German phrase and German philosophy;—so, we predict he is strong enough to plant himself proudly upon the very top-pinnacle of British authorship; otherwise, he is secure only of a conspicuous niche in that already too crowded gallery of the "Eccentricities of Genius."

In order to understand rightly Mr. Carlyle's sermon, of which we shall now proceed to give some extracts, the reader will first consider, and mark distinctly, the preacher's position, intellectual and moral, in reference to the present age. We live in an age of railroads, and steam-coaches, patent coffee-percolators, and block-pavements. Plato knew nothing of these things: Immanuel Kant, 2000 years after him, not much more. Between Arkwright, with his sounding host of spinning jennies, and Hesiod, with his caroling troop of Heathen gods and goddesses, what a leap! Such a leap there is between Thomas Carlyle's "Past and Present," and the last edition of Adam

Smith, or any other book of these days (of which there are so many) that deals mainly in material facts and figures. Mr. Carlyle is the most thorough, the most earnest, the most despotic of all modern spiritualists. He is a burning-hot, heavy-hammering, practical English Platonist; not one of your old serene metaphysical vapourers, placid mathematical visionaries there at Alexandria. Marching with a visible glory in his countenance, from the base of the double-peaked Parnassus in Germany, upon the one summit of which sits Goethe, and on the other Jean Paul Richter;—marching resolutely forth, with a burden in his breast, as from some modern sacred Sinai, he dashes wildly into the midst of our Utilitarian stir here in Britain, and startles the ears of the money-changers, and the pleasure-hunters, and the idlers and hypocrites in high places, with the ominous cry heard of old from the wilderness, "Repent, I say unto you. Repent! Repent, or ye shall all certainly perish!"——Is Thomas Carlyle's prophetic cry in season, or out of season at the present hour? We think it is altogether in season. Who can deny that we English are idol-worshippers of Mammon more than any people upon the earth? Is it not a broad, day-staring truth which our many faithful church-goings, and constant cries of "Church in danger!" do not disprove at all, but rather prove in many ways? Who can deny that pampered idleness lolls with us in high places, and honest labour starves? Who can believe that these things shall be upon God's earth, and no prophet be sent to testify against them? Thomas Carlyle is not the first who has lifted up his voice against these things; neither will he be the last. Let us therefore receive him honourably, as a God-sent prophet, and thank Heaven for him. Adam Smiths, and Ricardos, and M'Cullochs, we have enough in every shop: they are prophets, too, after their fashion; and whoso denounces them is not wise. But there is an older and a more venerable gospel than that of political economy, of which Mr. Carlyle is one of the most notable modern missionaries; and among other definitions of wealth in these mercantile times,—in this mechanical age,—in this money-making country,—there was need of a strong and an earnest voice to call out loudly in every street this one also—"THE WEALTH OF A MAN IS THE NUMBER OF THINGS WHICH HE LOVES AND BLESSES, WHICH HE IS LOVED AND BLESSED BY." There was need of a prophet to preach the old gospel of Christ, "THE KINGDOM OF HEAVEN IS WITHIN YOU," somewhere out of the pulpit,—a gospel altogether contrary to that now preached in the pulpit by the Puseyites.

Mr. Carlyle has wisely, for the purpose of contrast, woven into the midst of his preaching, an old Monkish chronicle of the twelfth century, published by the Camden Society;* but his main business is not with the Past but with the Present; and to this, therefore, we shall confine ourselves in our extracts. The volume opens with the following dark picture of real British horrors in the nineteenth century:—

Why dwell on this aspect of the matter? It is too indisputable, not doubtful now to any one. Descend where you will into the lower class, in town or country, by what avenue you will, by Factory Inquiries, Agricultural Inquiries, by Revenue Returns, by Mining-Labourer Committees; by opening your own eyes and looking, the same sorrowful result discloses itself: you have to admit that the working body of this rich English Nation has sunk, or is fast sinking, into a state, to which, all sides of it considered, there was literally never any parallel. At Stockport Assizes,—and this, too, has no reference to the present state of trade, being of date prior to that,—a Mother and a Father are arraigned and found guilty of poisoning three of their children, to defraud a "burial-society" of some £3, 8s. due on the death of each child: they are arraigned, found guilty; and the official authorities, it is whispered, hint that perhaps the case is not solitary, that perhaps you had better not probe farther into that department of things. This is in the autumn of 1841; the crime itself is of the previous year or season. "Brutal savages, degraded Irish," mutters the idle reader of Newspapers; hardly lingering on this incident. Yet it is an incident worth lingering on; the depravity, savagery, and degraded Irishism being never so well admitted. In the British land, a human Mother and Father, of white skin, and professing the Christian religion, had done this thing; they, with their Irishism and necessity and savagery, had been driven to do it. Such instances are like the highest mountain apex emerged into view; under which lies a whole mountain region and land, not yet emerged. A human Mother and Father had said to themselves, What shall we do to escape starvation? We are deep sunk here, in our dark cellar; and help is far.—Yes, in the Ugolino Hunger-tower stern things happen; best-loved little Gaddo fallen dead on his Father's knees!—The Stockport Mother and Father think and hint: Our poor little starveling Tom, who cries all day for victuals, who will see only evil and not good in this world: if he were out of misery at once; he well dead, and the rest of us, perhaps, kept alive? It is thought and hinted; at last it is done. And now Tom being killed, and all spent and eaten, Is it poor little starveling Jack that must go, or poor little starveling Will?—What an inquiry of ways and means!

In starved sieged cities, in the uttermost doomed ruin of old Jerusalem fallen under the wrath of God, it was prophesied and said, "The hands of the pitiful women have sodden their own children." The stern Hebrew imagination could conceive no blacker gulf of wretchedness; that was the ultimatum of degraded god-punished man. And we here, in modern England, exuberant with supply of all kinds, besieged by nothing if it be not by invisible Enchantments, are we reaching that?——How come these things? Wherefore are they, wherefore should they be?

Nor are they of the St. Ives workhouses, of the Glasgow lanes, and Stockport cellars, the only unblessed among us. This successful industry of England, with its plethoric wealth, has as yet made nobody rich; it is an enchanted wealth, and belongs yet to nobody. We might ask, Which of us has it enriched? We can spend thousands where we once spent hundreds; but can purchase nothing good with them. In Poor and Rich, instead of noble thrift and plenty, there is idle luxury alternating with mean scarcity and inability. We have sumptuous garnitures for our Life, but have forgotten to live in the middle of them. It is an enchanted wealth; no man of us can yet touch it. The class of men who feel that they are truly better off by means of it, let them give us their name!

Many men eat finer cookery; drink dearer liquors,—with what advantage they can report, and their Doctors can: but in the heart of them, if we go out of the dyspeptic stomach, what increase of blessedness is there? Are they better, beautifuller, stronger, braver? Are they even what they call "happier?" Do they look with satisfaction on more things and human faces in this

* Chronica JOCELINI DE BRAKELONDA, de rebus gestis Samsonis Abbatis Monasterii Sancti Edmundi: nunc primum typis mandata, curante JOHANNE GAGE ROKEWOOD. (Camden Society, London, 1840.)

God's Earth; do more things and human faces look with satisfaction on them? Not so. Human faces gloom discordantly, disloyally on one another. Things, if it be not mere cotton and iron things, are growing disobedient to man. The Master Worker is enchanted, for the present, like his Workhouse Workman; clamours, in vain hitherto, for a very simple sort of "Liberty:" the liberty "to buy where he finds it cheapest, to sell where he finds it dearest." With guineas jingling in every pocket, he was no whit richer; but now, the very guineas threatening to vanish, he feels that he is poor indeed. Poor Master Worker! And the Master Unworker, is not he in a still fataller situation? Pausing amid his game-preserves, with awful eye,—as he well may! Coercing fifty-pound tenants; coercing, bribing, cajoling; doing what he likes with his own. His mouth full of loud futilities, and arguments to prove the excellence of his Corn-law; and in his heart the blackest misgiving, a desperate half-consciousness that his excellent Corn-law is indefensible, that his loud arguments for it are of a kind to strike men too literally dumb.

To whom, then, is this wealth of England wealth? Who is it that it blesses; makes happier, wiser, beautifuller, in any way better? Who has got hold of it, to make it fetch and carry for him, like a true servant, not like a false mock-servant; to do him any real service whatsoever? As yet no one. We have more riches than any Nation ever had before; we have less good of them than any Nation ever had before. Our successful industry is hitherto unsuccessful; a strange success, if we stop here! In the midst of plethoric plenty, the people perish; with gold walls, and full barns, no man feels himself safe or satisfied. Workers, Master Workers, Unworkers, all men, come to a pause; stand fixed, and cannot farther. Fatal paralysis spreading inwards, from the extremities, in St. Ives workhouses, in Stockport cellars, through all limbs, as if towards the heart itself. Have we actually got enchanted, then; accursed by some god?—

Midas longed for gold, and insulted the Olympians. He got gold, so that whatsoever he touched became gold,—and he, with his long ears, was little the better for it. Midas had misjudged the celestial music-tones; Midas had insulted Apollo and the gods: the gods gave him his wish, and a pair of long ears, which also were a good appendage to it. What a truth in these old Fables!

Such is the evil: we have known it, we have felt it in manifold ways—rising Hydra-headed against all attempts to subdue it—only too sadly. But where, and what is the remedy? Here, we have no doubt, Mr. Carlyle will disappoint many an inquirer, as he did in his precursor of this book, the "Chartism;" but Mr. Carlyle is true to his vocation. The remedies which he proposes are not legislative or legal remedies at all: he points at such, indeed, but he does not project them. The remedies which he proposes are the remedies which a preacher and a prophet only can propose—the same remedies that are proposed in the New Testament, in the Sermon on the Mount. Begin, he says, with examining yourself: see that your heart be in the right place. Be sure that you actually do wish to do something for the love of your brother's soul, and not for the love of your own purse. So setting out, you will find plenty of things to do: otherwise, unprovided with the motives of an honest love, you can only prove yourself a busy bungler; and there are too many such already. This is a favourite text with Mr. Carlyle; and no doubt he is right. Look at the thousandfold futile fruitless "tongue-fence" that goes on every day there in Parliament, and you will certainly see that the want of honest will to do, is the main cause why so little is done.

How it is to be cured? Brothers, I am sorry I have got no Morrison's Pill for curing the maladies of society. It were infinitely handier if we had a Morrison's Pill Act of Parliament, or remedial measure, which men could swallow, one good time, and then go on in their old courses, cleared from all miseries and mischiefs! Unluckily we have none such; unluckily the Heavens themselves, in their rich pharmacopœia, contain none such. There will no "thing" be done that will cure you. There will a radical universal alteration of your regimen and way of life take place; there will a most agonising divorce between you and your chimeras, luxuries and falsities, take place; a most toilsome, all but "impossible" return to Nature, and her veracities, and her integrities, take place: that so the inner fountains of life may again begin, like eternal Light-fountains, to irradiate and purify your bloated, swollen, foul existence, drawing nigh, as at present, to nameless death! Either death or else all this will take place. Judge if, with such diagnosis, any Morrison's Pill is like to be discoverable!

But the Life-fountain within you once again set flowing, what innumerable "things," whole sets and classes and continents of "things," year after year, and decade after decade, and century after century, will then be doable and done! Not Emigration, Education, Corn-law Abrogation, Sanitary Regulation, Land Property-Tax; not these alone, nor a thousand times as much as these. Good Heavens, there will then be light in the inner heart of here and there a man, to discern what is just, what is commanded by the Most High God, what must be done, were it never so "impossible." Vain jargon in favour of the palpably unjust will then abridge itself within limits. Vain jargon, on hustings, in Parliaments, or wherever else, when here and there a man has vision for the essential God's-truth of the things jargoned of, will become very vain indeed. The silence of here and there such a man, how eloquent in answer to such jargon! Such jargon, frightened at its own gaunt echo, will unspeakably abate; nay, for a while, may almost in a manner disappear,—the wise answering it in silence, and even the simple taking cue from them to hoot it down wherever heard. It will be a blessed time; and many "things" will become doable,—and when the brains are out, an absurdity will die! Not easily again shall a Corn-law argue ten years for itself; and still talk and argue, when impartial persons have to say with a sigh that, for so long back, they have heard no "argument" advanced for it but such as might make the angels and almost the very jackasses weep!—

The vain expectation of good from details of legislation, without a true and a loving heart, being thus summarily cut off, Mr. Carlyle proceeds to protest in his strong speech against that evil which, while it subsists to its present extent, is the grand obstacle to all improvement, namely, the Love of Money, or, as he phrases it, the Gospel of Mammonism.

"The word Hell," says Sauerteig, "is still frequently in use among the English people: but I could not without difficulty ascertain what they meant by it. Hell generally signifies the Infinite Terror, the thing a man is infinitely afraid of, and shudders and shrinks from, struggling with his whole soul to escape from it. There is a Hell, therefore, if you will consider, which accompanies man, in all stages of his history, and religious or other development: but the Hells of men and peoples differ notably. With Christians it is the infinite terror of being found guilty before the Just Judge. With old Romans, I conjecture, it was the terror NOT of Pluto, for whom probably they cared little, BUT of doing unworthily, doing unvirtuously, which was their word for unmanfully. And now what is it, if you pierce through his Cants, his oft-repeated Hearsays, what he calls his Worships, and so forth,—what is it that the modern English soul does, in very truth, dread infinitely, and contemplate with entire despair? What is his Hell; after all these reputable, oft-repeated Hearsays, what is it? With hesitation, with astonishment, I pronounce it to be: The terror of 'Not succeeding;' of not making money, fame, or some other figure in the world,—chiefly of not making money! Is not that a somewhat singular Hell?"

Yes, O Sauerteig, it is very singular. If we do not "succeed," where is the use of us? We had better never have been born. "Tremble intensely," as our friend the Emperor of China says: there is the black Bottomless of Terror; what Sauerteig calls the "Hell of the English!"—But indeed this Hell belongs naturally to the Gospel of Mammonism, which also has its corresponding Heaven. For there is one Reality among so many Phantasms; about one thing we are entirely in earnest: The making of money. Working Mammonism does divide the world with idle game-preserving Dilettantism:—thank Heaven that there is even a Mammonism, *a*nything we are in earnest about! Idleness is worst, idleness alone is without hope: work earnestly at anything, you will by degrees learn to work at almost all things. There is endless hope in work, were it even work at making money.

True, it must be owned, we for the present, with our Mammon-Gospel, have come to strange conclusions. We call it a Society; and go about professing openly the totalest separation, isolation. Our life is not a MUTUAL HELPFULNESS; but rather, cloaked under due laws-of-war, named "fair competition," and so forth, it is a MUTUAL HOSTILITY. . . . . .

O sumptuous Merchant-Prince, illustrious game-preserving Duke, is there no way of "killing" thy brother but Cain's rude way! "A good man by the very look of him, by his very presence with us as a fellow wayfarer in this Life-pilgrimage, promises so much:" wo to him if he forget all such promises, if he never know that they were given! To a deadened soul, seared with the brute Idolatry of Sense, to whom going to Hell is equivalent to not making money, all "promises," and moral duties, that cannot be pleaded for in Courts of Requests, address themselves in vain. Money he can be ordered to pay, but nothing more. I have not heard in all Past History, and expect not to hear in all Future History, of any Society anywhere under God's Heaven supporting itself on such Philosophy. The Universe is not made so; it is made otherwise than so. The man or nation of men that thinks it is made so, marches forward nothing doubting, step after step; but marches—whither we know! In these last two centuries of Atheistic Government (near two centuries now, since the blessed restoration of his Sacred Majesty, and Defender of the Faith, Charles Second,) I reckon that we have pretty well exhausted what of "firm earth" there was for us to march on;—and are now, very ominously, shuddering, reeling, and let us hope, trying to recoil on the cliff's edge!—

Here is a prophet's blast, indeed! containing much, doubtless, that is true, and something also that is not true. 'Tis a strong word that, "Two centuries of Atheistic government!" and too like the sweeping condemnations that we are accustomed to hear from Puseyite pulpits. We wish Mr. Carlyle would avoid such damnatory paradoxes. Even in the mouths of earnest prophesying men, these things have something puerile in them, and, worse than puerile, pernicious.

We do not stay to inquire whether the love of money is to be rooted out of the heart of man by putting a veto on "fair competition," and suppressing "cash-payment." Mr. Carlyle may settle these things (which may require a little more study than he, perhaps, has hitherto bestowed on them) with the political economists, with the bankers, and bill-brokers, and with Robert Owen. We proceed to the second great plague of England, which, after the gospel of Mammonism, must, according to Mr. Carlyle, imperatively be swept from its habitation on British soil, otherwise we are ruined,—it is the gospel of titled luxury and idleness, the plague of the UNWORKING ARISTOCRACY, of men holding land in a country, and doing no duty to the country, except, indeed, it be—as Mr. Carlyle delights to iterate—the duty of shooting partridges, and dilettantizing at legislation.

From much loud controversy and Corn-law debating there rises, loud though inarticulate, once more in these years, this very question among others, Who made the Land of England? Who made it, this respectable English Land, wheat-growing, metalliferous, carboniferous, which will let readily hand over head for seventy millions or upwards, as it here lies: who did make it?—"We!" answer the much-consuming Aristocracy; "We!" as they ride in, moist with the sweat of Melton Mowbray: "It is we that made it; or are the heirs, assigns and representatives of those who did"—My brothers, You? Everlasting honour to you, then; and Corn-laws as many as you will, till your own deep stomachs cry Enough, or some voice of human pity for our famine bids you Hold! Ye are as gods, that can create soil. Soil-creating gods there is no withstanding. They have the might to sell wheat at what price they list; and the right, to all lengths, and famine-lengths,—if they be pitiless infernal gods! Celestial gods, I think, would stop short of the famine-price; but no infernal nor any kind of god can be bidden stop!—— Infatuated mortals, into what questions are you driving every thinking man in England!

I say, you did not make the Land of England; and, by the possession of it, you are bound to furnish guidance and governance to England! That is the law of your position on this God's-Earth; an everlasting act of Heaven's Parliament, not repealable in St. Stephen's or elsewhere! True government and guidance; not no-government and Laissez-faire; how much less, misgovernment and Corn-law! There is is not an imprisoned Worker looking out from these Bastilles but appeals, very audibly in Heaven's High Courts, against you, and me, and every one who is not imprisoned, "Why am I here?" His appeal is audible in Heaven; and will become audible enough on Earth too, if it remain unheeded here. His appeal is against you, foremost of all; you stand in the front-rank of the accused; you, by the very place you hold, have first of all to answer him and Heaven! . . . . .

Nature's message will have itself obeyed: messages of mere Free-trade, Anti-Corn-law League and Laissez-faire, will then need small obeying!—Ye fools, in name of Heaven, work, work at the Ark of Deliverance for yourselves and us, while hours are still granted you! No: instead of working at the Ark, they say, "We cannot get our hands kept rightly warm;" and sit obstinately burning the planks. No madder spectacle at present exhibits itself under this Sun.

The Working Aristocracy; Mill-owners, Manufacturers, Commanders of Working Men: alas, against them also much shall be brought in accusation; much,—and the freest Trade in Corn, total abolition of Tariffs, and uttermost "Increase of Manufactures" and "Prosperity of Commerce," will permanently mend no jot of it. The Working Aristocracy must strike into a new path; must understand that money alone is not the representative either of man's success in the world, or of man's duties to man; and reform their own selves from top to bottom, if they wish England reformed. England will not be habitable long, unreformed.

The Working Aristocracy—Yes, but on the threshold of all this, it is again and again to be asked, What of the Idle Aristocracy? Again and again, what shall we say of the Idle Aristocracy, the Owners of the Soil of England; whose recognised function is that of handsomely consuming the rents of England, shooting the partridges of England, and as an agreeable amusement (if the purchase-money and other conveniences serve,) dilettante-ing in Parliament and Quarter-Sessions for England? We will say mournfully, in the presence of Heaven and Earth,—that we stand speechless, stupent, and know not what to say! That a class of men entitled to live sumptuously on the marrow of the earth; permitted simply, nay, entreated, and as yet entreated in vain, to do nothing at all in return, was never heretofore seen on the face of this Planet. That such a class is transitory, exceptional, and, unless Nature's Laws fall dead, cannot continue. That it has continued now a moderate while; has, for the last fifty years, been rapidly attaining its state of perfection. That it will have to find its duties and do them; or else that it must and will cease to be seen on the face of this Planet, which is a working one, not an idle one.

Alas, alas, the Working Aristocracy, admonished by Trades-unions, Chartist conflagrations, above all by their own shrewd sense kept in perpetual communion with the fact of things, will assuredly reform themselves, and a working world will still be possible:—but the fate of the Idle Aristocracy, as one reads its horoscope hitherto in Corn-laws, and such like, is an abyss that fills one with despair. Yes, my rosy fox-hunting brothers, a terrible Hippocratic look reveals itself (God knows, not to my joy) through those fresh buxom countenances of yours. Through your Corn-law Majorities, Sliding-Scales, Protecting-Duties, Bribery-Elections, and triumphant Kentish-fire, a thinking eye discerns ghastly images of ruin, too ghastly for words; a handwriting as of MENE, MENE. Men and brothers, on your Sliding-scale you seem sliding, and to have slid,—you little know whither! Good God! did not a French Do-nothing Aristocracy, hardly above half a century ago, declare in like manner, and in its featherhead believe in like manner, "We cannot exist, and continue to dress and parade ourselves, on the just rent of the soil of France; but we must have farther payment than rent of the soil, we must be exempted from taxes too,"—we must have a Corn-law to extend our rent! This was in 1789: in four years more—Did you look into the Tanneries of Meudon, and the long-naked making for themselves breeches of human skins! May the merciful Heavens avert the omen; may we be wiser, that so we be less wretched.

Truly here is a democratic sermon—a philosophy of property (a century or two beyond the repeal of the Corn-laws) very startling to Conservative ears. "Properly speaking, the LAND belongs to these two: To the ALMIGHTY GOD, and to all his children of MEN that have ever WORKED well on it, or that shall ever WORK well on it." Tiberius Gracchus, Frederick William III. of Prussia, (when Stein was his minister,) and Thomas Carlyle—these three shall teach us to make an AGRARIAN LAW, when it may seem necessary.

But the grand theme of this book remains. To balance these false gospels of "Mammonism" and "Do-nothing Aristocracy," we have the true gospel of Labour, and the just wages of Labour. Let the working man hear that, and amid his sooty toil rejoice. He is the only hero, in Mr. Carlyle's estimation—the only noble.

For there is a perennial nobleness and even sacredness, in Work. Were he never so benighted, forgetful of his high calling, there is always hope in a man that actually and earnestly works: in Idleness alone is there perpetual despair. Work, never so Mammonish, mean, is in communication with Nature; the real desire to get Work done will itself lead one more and more to truth, to Nature's appointments and regulations, which are truth.

The latest Gospel in this world is, Know thy work and do it. "Know thyself:" long enough has that poor "self" of thine tormented thee; thou canst never get to "know" it, I believe! Think it not thy business, this of knowing thyself; thou art an unknowable individual: know what thou canst work at; and work at it, like a Hercules. That will be thy better plan.

It has been written, "an endless significance lies in Work;" a man perfects himself by working. Foul jungles are cleared away, fair seedfields rise instead, and stately cities; and withal the man himself first ceases to be a jungle and foul unwholesome desert thereby. Consider how, even in the meanest sorts of Labour, the whole soul of a man is composed into a kind of real harmony, the instant he sets himself to work! Doubt, Desire, Sorrow, Remorse, Indignation, Despair itself, all these like helldogs lie beleaguering the soul of the poor dayworker, as of every man: but he bends himself with free valour against his task, and all these are stilled, all these shrink murmuring far off into their caves. The man is now a man. The blessed glow of Labour in him, is it not as purifying fire, wherein all poison is burnt up, and of sour smoke itself there is made bright blessed flame!

Destiny, on the whole, has no other way of cultivating us. A formless Chaos, once set it revolving, grows round and ever rounder; ranges itself, by mere force of gravity, into strata, spherical courses; is no longer a Chaos, but a round compacted World. What would become of the Earth, did she cease to revolve? In the poor old Earth, so long as she revolves, all inequalities, irregularities disperse themselves; all irregularities are incessantly becoming regular. Hast thou looked on the Potter's wheel,—one of the venerablest objects; old as the Prophet Ezechiel and far older? Rude lumps of clay, how they spin themselves up, by mere quick whirling, into beautiful circular dishes. And fancy the most assiduous potter, but without his wheel; reduced to make dishes, or rather amorphous botches, by mere kneading and baking! Even such a potter were Destiny, with a human soul that would rest and lie at ease, that would not work and spin! Of an idle unrevolving man the kindest Destiny, like the most assiduous potter without wheel, can bake and knead nothing other than a botch; let her spend on him what expensive colouring, what gilding and enamelling she will, he is but a botch. Not a dish; no, a bulging, kneaded, crooked, shambling, squint-cornered, amorphous botch,—a mere enamelled vessel of dishonour! Let the idle think of this.

Blessed is he who has found his work; let him ask no other blessedness. He has a work, a life-purpose; he has found it, and will follow it!

Mr. Carlyle's book is full of pictures dark enough, of complaints loud enough, and blasts strong enough of earnest, indignant appeal. But there is faith also, (as a prophet can never exist without that,) and a triumphant outlook into the boundless conquests that the "Chivalry of Labour," million-handed, under its thousand captains of the "Gifted," is yet destined to achieve on the earth. We can allow ourselves, further, only two extracts, burning with the noblest eloquence, one on these heroic guides and captains of labour; the other on that chivalry of labour itself.

I. THE GIFTED.

I know Mammon too; Banks-of-England, Credit-Systems, world-wide possibilities of work and traffic; and applaud and admire them. Mammon is like Fire; the usefulest of all servants, if the frightfulest of all masters! The Cliffords, Fitzadelms and Chivalry Fighters "wished to gain victory," never doubt it: but victory, unless gained in a certain spirit, was no victory; defeat, sustained in a certain spirit, was itself victory. I say again and again, had they counted the scalps alone, they had continued Choctaws, and no Chivalry or lasting victory had been. And in Industrial Fighters and Captains is there no nobleness discoverable? To them, alone of men, shall there forever be no blessedness but in swollen coffers? To see beauty, order, gratitude, loyal human hearts around them, shall be of no moment; to see fuliginous deformity, mutiny, hatred and despair, with the addition of half a million guineas, shall be better? Heaven's blessedness not there; Hell's cursedness, and your half-million bits of metal, a substitute for that! Is there no profit in diffusing Heaven's blessedness, but only in gaining gold!—If so, I apprize the Mill-owner and Millionaire, that he too must prepare for vanishing; that neither is he born to be of the sovereigns of this world; that he will have to be trampled and chained down in whatever terrible ways, and brass-collared safe among the born thralls of this world! We cannot have Canailles and Doggeries that will not make some Chivalry of themselves; our noble Planet is impatient of such; in the end, totally intolerant of such!

For the Heavens, unwearying in their bounty, do send other souls into this world, to whom yet, as to their forerunners, in Old Roman, in Old Hebrew and all noble times, the omnipotent guinea is, on the whole, an impotent guinea. Has your half-dead avaricious Corn-law Lord, your half-alive avaricious Cotton-law Lord, never seen one such? Such are, not one, but several; are, and will be, unless the gods have doomed this world to swift dire ruin. These are they, the elect of the world; the born champions, strong men, and liberatory Samsons of this poor world: whom the poor Delilah-world will not always shear of their strength and eyesight, and set to grind in darkness at its poor gin-wheel! Such souls are, in these days, getting somewhat out of humour with the world. Your very Byron, in these days, is at least driven mad; flatly refuses fealty to the world. The world with its injustices, its golden brutalities, and dull yellow guineas, is a disgust to such souls: the ray of Heaven that is in them does at least predoom them to be very miserable here. Yes:—and yet all misery is faculty misdirected, strength that has not yet found its way. The black whirlwind is mother of the lightning. No smoke, in any sense, but can become flame and radiance! Such soul, once graduated in Heaven's stern University, steps out superior to your guinea.

Dost thou know, O sumptuous Corn-lord, Cotton-lord, O mutinous Trades-Unionist, gin-vanquished, undeliverable; O much-enslaved World,—this man is not a slave with thee! None of thy promotions is necessary for him. His place is with the stars of Heaven: to thee it may be momentous, to him it is indifferent, whether thou place him in the lowest hut, or forty feet higher at the top of thy stupendous high tower, while here on Earth. The joys of Earth that are precious, they depend not on thee and thy promotions. Food and raiment, and round a social hearth, souls who love him, whom he loves: these are already his. He wants none of thy rewards; behold also, he fears none of thy penalties. Thou canst not answer even by killing him: the case of Anaxarchus thou canst kill; but the self of Anaxarchus, the word or act of Anaxarchus, in no wise whatever. To this man death is not a bugbear; to this man life is already as earnest and awful, and beautiful and terrible, as death.

Not a May-game is this man's life; but a battle and a march, a warfare with principalities and powers. No idle promenade through fragrant orange-groves and green flowery spaces, waited on by the choral Muses and the rosy Hours: it is a stern pilgrimage through burning sandy solitudes, through regions of thick-ribbed ice. He walks among men; loves men, with inexpressible soft pity,—as they cannot love him: but his soul dwells in solitude, in the uttermost parts of Creation. In green oases by the palm-tree wells, he rests a space; but anon he has to journey forward, escorted by the Terrors and the Splendours, the Archdemons and Archangels. All Heaven, all Pandemonium are his escort. The stars keen-glancing, from the Immensities, send tidings to him; the graves, silent with their dead, from the Eternities. Deep calls for him unto deep.

Thou, O World, how wilt thou secure thyself against this man! Thou canst not hire him by thy guineas; nor by thy gibbets and law-penalties restrain him. He eludes thee like a Spirit. Thou canst not forward him, thou canst not hinder him. Thy penalties, thy poverties, neglects, contumelies: behold, all these are good for him. Come to him as an enemy; turn from him as an unfriend; only do not this one thing,—infect him not with thy own delusion: the benign Genius, were it by very death, shall guard him against this!—What wilt thou do with him? He is above thee, like a god. Thou, in thy stupendous three-inch pattens, art under him. He is thy born king, thy conqueror and supreme lawgiver; not all the guineas and cannons, and leather and prunella, under the sky can save thee from him. Hardest thickskinned Mammon-world, ruggedest Caliban shall obey him, or become not Caliban but a cramp. Oh, if in this man, whose eyes can flash Heaven's lightning, and make all Calibans into a cramp, there dwelt not, as the essence of his very being, a God's Justice, human Nobleness, Veracity and Mercy,—I should tremble for the world. But his strength, let us rejoice to understand, is even this: the quantity of Justice, of Valour and Pity that is in him. To hypocrites and tailored quacks in high places, his eyes are lightning; but they melt in dewy pity softer than a mother's to the downpressed, maltreated; in his heart, in his great thought, is a sanctuary for all the wretched. This world's improvement is forever sure.

II. THE CHIVALRY OF LABOUR.

Some "Chivalry of Labour," some noble Humanity and practical Divineness of Labour, will yet be realized on this Earth. Or why will; why do we pray to Heaven, without setting our own shoulder to the wheel! The Present, if it will have the Future accomplish, shall itself commence. Thou who prophesiest, who believest, begin thou to fulfil. Here or nowhere, now equally as at any time! That out-cast help-needing thing or person, trampled down under vulgar feet or hoofs, no help "possible" for it, no prize offered for the saving of it,—canst not thou save it, then, without prize! Put forth thy hand, in God's name; know that "impossible," where Truth and Mercy and the everlasting Voice of Nature order, has no place in the brave man's dictionary. That when all men have said "Impossible," and tumbled noisily elsewhither, and thou alone art left, then first thy time and possibility have come. It is for thee now: do thou that, and ask no man's counsel, but thy own only and God's.

It is to you, ye Workers, who do already work, and are as grown men, noble and honourable in a sort, that the whole world calls for new work and nobleness. Subdue mutiny, discord, wide-spread despair, by manfulness, justice, mercy, and wisdom. Chaos is dark, deep as Hell; let light be, and there is instead a green flowery World. O, it is great, and there is no other greatness. To make some nook of God's Creation a little fruitfuler, better, more worthy of God; to make some human hearts a little wiser, manfuler, happier,—more blessed, less accursed! It is work for a God. Sooty Hell of mutiny, and savagery, and despair can, by man's energy, be made a kind of Heaven; cleared of its soot, of its mutiny, of its need to mutiny; the everlasting arch of Heaven's azure overspanning it too, and its cunning mechanisms and tall chimney-steeples, as a birth of Heaven; God and all men looking on it well pleased.

Unstained by wasteful deformities, by wasted tears or heart's-blood of men, or any defacement of the Pit, noble, fruitful Labour, growing ever nobler, will come forth,—the grand sole miracle of Man; whereby Man has risen from the low places of this Earth, very literally, into divine Heavens. Ploughers, Spinners, Builders; Prophets, Poets, Kings; Brindleys and Goethes, Odins and Arkwrights; all martyrs, and noble men, and gods are of one grand Host: immeasurable; marching ever forward since the Beginnings of the World. The enormous, all-conquering, flame-crowned Host, noble every soldier in it; sacred, and alone noble. Let him who is not of it hide himself; let him tremble for himself. Stars at every button cannot make him noble; sheaves of Bath-garters, nor bushels of Georges; nor any other contrivance but manfully enlisting in it, valiantly taking place and step in it. O Heavens, will he not bethink himself; he too is so needed in the Host! It were so blessed, thrice-blessed, for himself and for us all! In hope of the Last Partridge, and some Duke of Weimar among our English Dukes, we will be patient yet a while.

"The Future hides in it
Good hap and sorrow;
We press still thorow,
Nought that abides in it
Daunting us,—onward,"

PERAULT; OR, SLAVES AND THEIR MASTERS.

CHAPTER XVI.

The negro kitchens and apartments are generally built entirely separate from the houses of their masters, and none of the white people ever think of intruding into the negroes' premises; so that the slaves carry on much sport, without their masters or mistresses being in the least aware of it.

The company, according to invitation, assembled in the large kitchen of Mr. Bellgrove's dwelling; and in a very short time the kitchen was crammed with the negro party: "de laidies" arrayed in cast-off or "borrowed" dresses of their mistresses; "de genelem" in suits chiefly "taken de loan ob, for dis occasion," from their masters. On the hearth blazed several huge logs of turpentine pine, which lighted up the whole apartment, and, glowing upon the swarthy group, bronzed their happy-looking countenances. Haman, arrayed in his new livery, acted the part of door-keeper; and dandy nigger Tom, adorned in a full-dress suit of his master's, sporting a diamond ring and splendid gold watch and chain belonging to Galliard, acted the part of master of the ceremonies.

"Beg leabe for denounce Massa and Missee Pinkton ob de State 'teatre!" roared Haman, as he bundled into the room a swaggering stout negro, with a spangled jacket on, and a negro wench with a tinsel apron.

"Ha!" exclaimed Tom, catching the negro by the hand. "Bless a soul, bubba, how you do? Ha! sista—hope you is berry well?"

"Berry well, tankee heaben!" answered the negro. "How you do bubba Tom? Hope I is see you berry well?"

"Berry well, please de Lor!" was the pious reply; and Tom, then addressing the company, said, "Ladies an' genelem, we is now hab de werry unlook-for, and unexpect happiness, ob de felicity, ob Massa and Missee Pinkton company, for encrease de pleasure ob dis joyful and happy 'casion."

"Yearee—hearee—hearee—werry good—berry good!" was the unanimous response of the company.

Massa Pinkton then bowed, and politely handing his partner to a seat, threw himself on the floor before her, saying, "As Massa Hamlum say to Muma Owheely in a play, supper me for lie at you feet, fair lady!"

"Goley! Ben, you always say someting good!" was the merry answer.

A large black cauldron, filled with excellent coffee, was placed in the centre of the kitchen, and a number of cups, porringers, bowls, and calabashes, were handed round to the company. With an air of dignified importance, Tom strutted towards the cauldron, and flourishing a huge ladle in his hand, bowed lowly to the company and said—

"Genelem, do me de honor ob hand in de ladies' cups: please, attend to de fair sex."

Tom was soon surrounded by applicants; and dealing the coffee out with the ladle, he endeavoured to administer equal justice to all—although, at times, he could not avoid scalding the fingers of some unlucky holder of a calabash. The bustle around the cauldron was animating; and the shoving, jostling, yelling, and chattering, deafening.

"Massa Tom, you please, my cup next," cried one.

"Yeh! goley, no kick my shins!" cried a second.

"Wot de debil you press so for?" cried a third.

"Stan' back!" roared a fourth.

"Yeh! Massa Tom. Oh Lor! you scald my hand!" yelled a fifth, as he let his cup fall on the foot of his neighbour.

"Yeh!" shrieked the sufferer; "you dam tief, you let you cup fall and burn my foot!"

"Order, genelem!" vociferated Tom.

Amidst sounds such as these the ladies' cups were filled; and Tom then filling a bason of respectable dimensions for himself, resigned the ladle, saying, "Now, genelem, help youshefs!"

An engagement instantly ensued for possession of the ladle, each striving to catch it first. A kick on the shins of the holder was the most effectual method of causing the ladle to be relinquished; and, after much struggling, cursing, and jostling, the party was supplied. Waffles and hominey cakes, with sweet-potatoe loaves, were liberally distributed; and the smacking of lips, and loud plying of masticators, mingled with loud and hearty shouts of laughter, testified the very height of negro happiness. After coffee, sassafrass beer, gin-sling, apple-jack, cocktail, and brandy, were handed round in the same dishes in which the coffee had been distributed. A cessation at length occurring, a dance was loudly called for; but on inquiry, it was found that the musician engaged for the occasion was not forthcoming.

"Wot de debil hab become ob de moosic?" inquired Tom. "'Pon soul, I was gib dat old blind tief, Apollo, quarta dolla' for come here."

"'Pollo can't come," responded Haman; "him got dronk dis morning, and break him fiddle."

"So, him got dronk wid my money!" exclaimed Tom. "Dat's de good ob pay dese low moosicans beforehand: cus' bad lot!"

"Neba mind," cried Haman; "nigger always hab moosic in him own heart. Whackie, han' me down dat ole tin pan, and get I two sticks—I soon gib you plenty moosic."

The pan and two sticks were handed to him, and Haman gave the signal for a country dance. A slave will dance as merrily to the sound of a tin pan, as he will do to a full orchestra of first-rate music; so the party set to with right good will; and all was mirth and gaiety, till the company was startled by a loud and rapid knocking at the door; and a young negro, forcing his way into the kitchen, ran up to dandy Tom, and exclaimed, "Oh! Tom—you Massa is come home: he ax for you. Oh! Lor! him noo coat, and him gold watch and chain, and him big diamond-pin, hab been all stole!"

"Massa home!" exclaimed Tom, in alarm; "him noo coat—him watch and pin! Wot sall I do?"

"Oh! Tom, you rascal tief, you hab got de coat on," cried the youth. "Pull him off—fast: I run home wid him."

"Pull um off, den," cried Tom, in a quandary; "yes, pull away—fast—fast!" as he held out his arm to the young negro to help him in stripping.

The youth, as desired, took hold of the sleeve, and pulled with right good earnest; but the coat seemed resolved not to part from its present wearer; and all their pulling and tugging seemed in vain. No garment could stand such rough usage; and just as the parties had wrought themselves into a state of desperation and perspiration, the sleeve gave way, and both puller and pullee staggered back—one gazing at the sleeveless arm, the other at the armless sleeve.

"Cus' you black heart! see wot you do!" cried Tom, trembling with rage and fear.

"He no me—he youshef, you dam blacka waggibon!" roared the youth.

Tom flew at his opponent; and grappling each other by the shoulders, they forthwith proceeded to rap their heads together; till, tired of this manœuvre, they paused, and looked each other in the face, growling and grinding their teeth. "How you like dat, you black willan!" roared Tom.

"'Top till you Massa cotch you!" cried his antagonist; "goley! he sall gib you fum, fum." So saying, he broke from Tom's grasp, and darted out of the kitchen. Levelling his head like a battering-ram, Tom rushed after the fugitive, who, dexterously springing aside, saluted Tom as he passed with a kick, which sent him, head foremost, into the duck-pond, and fled. Half crying with shame and vexation, Tom extricated himself from the pond, and returning to the kitchen, placed himself before the fire to dry.

"I is werry sorry for dis lamencholly ewent," said Haman. "I tink you Massa will send you to de sugar-house."

"I tink dat myshef," groaned Tom.

The nine o'clock bell now struck, and the roll of the drums of the city-guard, gave warning for every negro to hurry home, as none are allowed to walk the street after that hour without a passport from their masters or owners. The company, therefore, hurriedly broke up, and fled in all directions homewards, without waiting the ceremony of bidding each other good night.

Tom and Ben were the only two left, and they agreed to go homewards together as soon as Tom's clothes were dry. Apprehensive, however, of encountering the city-guard, and thereby getting quarters in the guard-house, they entered into a consultation how they could best trick the sentinels. The guard being chiefly composed of Germans, who could not read English, Tom and his friend instantly concocted a plan to get safe off. Ben pulled a piece of dirty white paper from his pocket, and shaped it like a letter, after scrawling two or three lines with shoe-blacking on it.

"Now," said Tom, "when you meet de guard, gib 'em dis leely bit of paper, and say dat you hab got passport from you Massa on business, and I sall act de part of you dog, and gallop on my hand and feet in de gutter."

This being agreed on, they sallied forth; but had not proceeded far, till they encountered one of the city-guard, when Tom instantly plumped down on his hands and knees in the gutter, imitating the walk of a dog. Ben advanced towards the guard, who presented his bayonet at the negro's breast, and ordered him to stand.

"I hab got passport, Massa," said Ben, holding out the piece of dirty white paper to the sentinel.

"Yaw, yaw," said the sentinel, looking gravely at the paper by the light of a lamp; "pashport, yaw, all ish reicht—pass!" All would have been right, had Tom not suddenly raised his head, and his black phiz encountered the eye of the sentinel, who, starting back with affright, nearly dropt his musquet, as he exclaimed—"Main Got! vat der Teufel ish dat?"

"Oh!" said Ben, "dat be my Massa big, black dog."

"Plack Tog!" exclaimed the sentinel. "Donner et blitzen! he ish von ver queer plack tog; standsh, or I vill shot you tead!" So saying, he levelled his firelock at Tom, who, having no desire to get a bullet through his body, yelled out with terror.

"No, no; oh Lor'! Massa, no fire!—no fire! I is only one poor dam black nigger!"

"Surrender!" shouted the guard.

"Yes, Massa; yes," faltered Tom, as, quaking in every limb, he surrendered at discretion to the sentinel, who, tying him arm to arm with Ben, drove them both before him to the guard-house.

Willobay Brookley, captain of the city guard of Carlville, was one of the noblest-minded, and most accomplished young men in the city. Proud and lofty in spirit, like the rest of the gentlemen of his State, he yet had a powerful command over his passions; and his easy, accommodating manner rendered him a favourite with all classes of society.

Brookley was reclining listlessly on a sofa in his own apartment in the guard-house, when a brisk rap at the door aroused him.

"Come in," cried he; and instantly the door opened, and Hans Vonberg, the sergeant of the guard, entered—bowed stiffly, pulled off his cap, and then stood stiff as if he had swallowed a ramrod.

"Well, Vonberg, is there anything wrong?" inquired Brookley.

"Yaw, Mynheer," answered the sergeant, with a most mysteriously-important look.

"Ha!" cried Brookley, starting up alertly, "what is it?"

"Doo plack rashcal niggersh," responded Vonberg.

"Tut; is that all!" said the Captain.

"Nein, Mynheer!"

"Well, out with the rest."

"Von niggersh, gives shmall pit papersh vidout write for pashport; oder von, vash gallob on hish hant and foots in gutter, like pig plack tog." And Vonberg manœuvred with his hands and feet, to exemplify what he said.

"Oh, to cheat the guard, I suppose," said Brookley, smiling. "Were the negroes taken?"

"Yaw, Mynheer, bosh taken. See here;" and Tom and Ben were marched into the room, tied arm to arm, and guarded by two soldiers.

"Unbind them," said Brookley; and the negroes were instantly loosed.

"So, Sir," said the Captain, addressing Tom, "you have been endeavouring to impose upon the city guard?"

"No, Sir," answered Tom, with a look of offended dignity; "I neber was impose on nobody."

"I think I have seen you before," said the Captain. "Who do you belong to?"

"I belong to my own massa," said Tom, sulkily.

"I should guess as much," responded Brookley, biting his lip. "And, pray, what is your master's name?"

"Dey call um say massa," answered Tom, doggedly.

Provoked by the impertinent answers of the negro, Brookley rose and said, in an angry tone, "I shall try the effect of the black-hole on you, my fine fellow; it may cure your insolence."

Tom heard the threat with an uneasy tremour, and was about to beg for mercy, when the door was thrown open, and a servant entering, addressed Captain Brookley, saying, "Lieutenant Galliard presents his compliments, and wishes to know if you are disengaged."

"Show him in," said the Captain.

"Oh Lor', Massa!" ejaculated Tom, in the utmost trepidation. "O Massa, put I into a black-hole, a coal-cella', or up a chimney! O Massa, let I hide myshef!"

Galliard's voice was now heard, and Tom became the more earnest in his entreaties to be allowed to hide, no matter where; so that Brookley paused and looked at him with much surprise, till, on Galliard entering the apartment, Tom made a rush to the door to get off, but was instantly collared by the guard, and brought back.

"The deuce!" exclaimed Galliard, as he recognised his valet in the custody of the guard. "Tom, what are you doing here?"

"I come for look for you, Massa," said Tom, shaking himself free of his captors.

"Look for me!—in a guard-house?" cried Galliard, with astonishment.

"Yes, Sa, for true, Massa," answered Tom, staring him full in the face.

Captain Brookley burst into a loud fit of laughter at the cool impudence of the negro.—"So, ho!" cried he, "Master Blackie, this is your master, then? Mr. Galliard is your owner?"

"Yes, Sa," answered Tom, with a look of importance; "him hab dat felicity."

"To what am I indebted for the honour of this visit?" inquired Brookley, addressing Galliard.

"There has been a robbery committed at my house this evening," answered Galliard. "A ball-dress, a gold watch and chain, a diamond ring and pin, have been stolen. I wish you, therefore, to cause the criminal officers to be on the alert after the thief."

During this address Tom shook as if he had a fit of the ague, and faintly faltered "Massa, you please, I go home."

"You are a prisoner, you black rascal," exclaimed Brookley. "We do not require to look far for the thief. See, Mr. Galliard, that negro fellow of yours has been making free with your property."

Galliard turned to Tom, and with rage and vexation beheld the diamond pin glittering on his bosom, and the gold chain hanging in fantastic folds over the breast of his vest. A second glance showed the soiled and destroyed ball-dress, from which the sleeve of the coat had vanished. Transported with fury, Galliard grasped his delinquent valet by the neck, and was proceeding to execute summary justice on his person, when Tom yelled out—

"'Top! wurra de debil you mean? You tink I is gone a be ill use dat way—eh? No, I go dis moment to magistrate, and complain of dis ill use for noting, and 'ply to he for sell I to oder massa!"

"You infernal rascal—you impudent dog!" exclaimed Galliard, quivering with rage; "I'll break every bone in your body!"

"Wot de debil you mean?" yelled Tom. "You gone a kill I? Cus' you! want a get youshef hang for murder—eh?"

"Nay, nay, Mr. Galliard," said the captain of the guard; "restrain your passion—the fellow is not worth your attention: sell him at once, and get quit of him."

"Dat is all I want," cried Tom, freeing himself from his master's grasp. "I want for be sell—handsome, good-lookee nigger like I, is worth a tousand dolla' any day. Many nice lady be glad for get good-looka chap like I!"

"Then sold you shall be!" said Galliard; "and that, too, in the public market to-morrow morning. Captain Brookley," he continued, addressing the captain of the guard, "I will thank you to keep this rascal under close confinement till to-morrow morning, and send him down to the slave-market."

"With pleasure," answered Brookley. "Here," said he, addressing the guard, "clap that fellow in the black-hole. Strip him of his borrowed plumes, and put some old clothes on him; and, hark ye, give him nothing but bread and water."

"Bread and wata!" exclaimed Tom, with a look of horror. "Lor', Massa!—'pon soul, I no like dat; Massa—you is joke."

"Take him away," said the Captain; "and remove this other fellow," pointing to Ben, who had hitherto stood unnoticed. "Let them be confined separately." And the two prisoners were marched off.

"Don't allow the fellow's conduct to vex you so," said Captain Brookley to Galliard, who was pacing up and down the room, tearing the fingers from his gloves.

"I cannot help it," said Galliard; "but he is an ungrateful dog—let him go—one whom I indulged so much!"

"And by that indulgence ruined him," said Brookley, interrupting him. "Nay, I beg pardon if I have offended you; but you are well aware, my dear Galliard, that these black fellows must be kept under proper subjection, and at a proper distance. Allow them the least familiarity, and they soon become most insolent."

"Perhaps I am to blame," said Galliard; "but the fellow's mother was my nurse, and I have been accustomed with the rogue's insolence since childhood; and it is very hard to part with one whom —notwithstanding all his folly—I still like; and then, the thoughts of the poor fellow getting a harsh and cruel master. No, no, faith—I wont part with him yet."

"I honour you for your feelings," said Brookley; "but, unless you humble your slave's pride, you will never get any good of him. 'Tis plain he thinks himself superior to the rest of his race. Now, suppose you sink him in his own esteem—'tis the only way of bringing him in."

"How can this be done?" said Galliard.

"Send him to the slave-market early to-morrow morning," answered Brookley; "I will send two persons there, to buy him at a very low price, and you can have him from them again."

"Well, arrange it as you will," said Galliard; "but do not let him be ill used."

"Meet me here to-morrow night," said Brookley; "you will have some sport with my plans."

"Agreed—good night!" and Galliard departed.

Early next morning, Tom was awakened from his slumber on the hard floor of the black-hole by one of the guard saluting him with a kick on the shins. Tom instantly started to his feet, and casting a bewildered glance around, rubbed his eyes, and looked at the lamp which the guard carried.

"Come," growled the guard; "it's time you was in the slave-market. Put on that old coat, and them 'ere old trousers, and come along. Quick—will ye?"

Tom mechanically drew on part of the dress which the guard threw at him; but thrusting his arm into the sleeve of his coat, his hand went through a large rent in the elbow. Tom's fastidious niceness about dress was offended at this; but much more so when he found the coat was minus one of the tails.

"Wot de debil is dis?" cried Tom. "You tink I is gone a be exhibit in poblic like one cus' raggy-muffin? I see you dam fust!"

And he endeavoured to pull off the coat; but the guard, with a preliminary shake of his fist in Tom's face, said—

"Keep on the coat, or, darn me! I'll wallop your skin for you!"

So Tom most reluctantly assented.

In an open space near the Exchange, were assembled several groups of slaves, who were to be exposed for sale. Here might be seen a group of mothers, chattering merrily to each other; and their children, half naked, chasing one another in sport, or wallowing like little pigs among the mud, with shouts of glee; and there the fair-complexioned quadroon, the blood of the white man flowing in his veins, and mantling his cheek with the blush of grief and shame. Here might be seen a group of stalwart negroes, of herculean form, standing with down-cast melancholy looks, and there a young couple, perchance newly married, clinging to each other, as if taking a long and sad farewell. There, also, was the fond young mother, pressing her sleeping babe to her bosom, and bedewing its face with heart-felt tears; while others were talking loudly and merrily, totally careless of their fates. Again the eye would rest upon a group of sallow-faced Mississippi planters, at whose approach the boldest of the slaves would shrink back with quivering lips and terror-stricken eye, while the planters were sauntering from group to group, and examining each, with the same look with which a knowing jockey or cattle-dealer would scan a horse or a cow; while around were gathered a host of idle negro boys.

"Looka dere," cried one of the boys; "oh, looka dere. See dandy nigger Tom is come for sell!" And Tom, with a swaggering gait, entered the market, attended by two of the city guard; and, casting a look of infinite contempt upon the poor country negroes, marched directly up to the table, and was ordered to ascend it, which he did, and placed himself in what he considered a most commanding and elegant attitude, carefully drawing up the remaining tail of his coat.

The auctioneer now took his place, and, with a voice like a bull-frog's, croaked out, "Who bids for this black nigger?"

"Can he hoe, or plant, or work any?" inquired a planter.

"No, no," cried the auctioneer; "he's good for nothing—except stealing his master's clothes."

"Massa," expostulated Tom, "dat is not de way for sell I. You is hurt my carumter wid you dam imperence."

"Five dollars bid!" roared the auctioneer, to Tom's great indignation. "Who bids more?—Ten dollars bid!" roared the auctioneer. "Going—going—gone!" and down came the hammer of the auctioneer, who had been previously instructed how to act. "Come down, Sir," said the auctioneer to Tom; "come down—you are sold."

"Sold!" exclaimed Tom, with a strange bewildered look—

"Yes, sold—said the auctioneer: see, there's your new master." And he pointed to a fierce-looking squint-eyed, hickory-faced man, who stood flourishing a huge whip most ominously. Tom quaked at the very sight, and again said—"Sold?"

"Hav'n't I told you that already?" cried the auctioneer.

"How much I sell for now, Massa?" inquired Tom, shaking as if he had a fit of the ague.

"Ten dollars," said the auctioneer.

"Ten dolla'!" shrieked Tom. "Me? ten dolla'!"

"Yes," said the auctioneer, "only ten; and I think it is too much."

"Oh Lor!" cried Tom, "wot I is come to!"

And if aught else was wanting to humble him more, it was fully supplied by a band of negro boys roaring out, "Ten dolla' Tom! Ten dolla' Tom!" and laughing loudly at the joke.

"Tarnation!" roared the purchaser, striking the table a loud crack with his whip, "come down, Sir! Am I to wait here for you all day?"

"No, Massa," said Tom; "I is come, I is come.

Ten dolla'?" he muttered, as he descended from the table.

"Come along, then!" roared his purchaser.

"Yes, Massa, yes," faltered the poor fellow, as, with trembling steps and drooping head, he followed his new master from the Slave-market, followed by a crowd of negro boys, yelling in derision, "Ten dolla' Tom!"

Crushed in spirit and in hopes, Tom feebly followed his supposed new owner. He felt confused and stunned, and all seemed a horrid dream; but the shouts of his tormentors, and the threatening growl of his purchaser, struck like a bitter knell on the heart of the poor negro. At length, in turning round the corner of one of the streets, Galliard and Brookley suddenly met them. A single glance of Galliard recalled the wandering senses of his now humbled valet; and, clasping his hands together, in a voice almost choked with emotion, while the huge tears gushed from his eyes, Tom turned to Galliard and exclaimed, "Oh, Massa! is I your poor nigger Tom?"

"You are no longer my negro," answered Galliard. "I don't know you now."

"Gor Ormighty!" exclaimed Tom, still weeping, "I mus' be changed; um can't be me: ten dolla'? Oh Lor, wot I is come to!" And, throwing himself against a Pride-of-India tree, Tom sobbed most bitterly.

"We have carried the joke too far," said Galliard to Brookley. "It grieves me to the very heart to see the poor fellow in such a state.—You know, Tom," said he, addressing the negro, "you wished to be sold; and it was your own fault that I parted with you."

"I knows dat, Massa; I knows dat," sobbed Tom. "But to be sell for ten dolla'! You wouldn't sell you dog for dat; and why you sell poor Tom—dat lub you so!—for less dan you would take for dog?"

So pathetic was the appeal of the poor fellow, that Galliard felt his eyes moistening; but repressing his feelings, he said, "Well, Tom, if I buy you back, will you behave yourself better in future?"

"Yes, Massa, yes," was the eager response.

"Then I will buy you back. Here," said he, addressing the fancied buyer, "how much did you give for this negro?"

"Oh, Massa!" cried Tom, interrupting him, "no mention dat—no talk of dat."

"I gave ten dollars for him," said the man; "but he is a good-for-nothing—I'll sell him at a discount to get rid of him. You may have him at half-price; I'll give him back for five dollars."

"Five dolla'?" exclaimed Tom, almost fainting; "worser an' more worserer!"

"There's your money," said Galliard, placing it in the man's hand, who received it with a chuckling laugh, and walked away; leaving Tom gazing after him with a look of anger and perplexity, as he muttered "Five dolla'! dam imperence!"

"And now, Tom," said Galliard, addressing him, "return home; see, there's a dollar to you, and behave yourself better than you did."

Tom mechanically took the proferred cash, and as his master retired, looked earnestly after him, and exclaimed, "Dam, I tink I is in one cus dream!" Tom was aroused from his stupor, by somebody touching him on the shoulder; and, on looking up, he beheld Perault.

"You seem perplexed," said Perault, in a deep, stern voice, keenly eyeing Tom's countenance.

"Yes," answered Tom. "I is werry much perplex, and werry much grieve. I was been sold in de Slave-market dis mornin'."

"Sold!" exclaimed Perault. "How sold?"

"For ten dolla'!" groaned Tom, as if the words were choking him; "and my Massa buy me back for five dolla'. O Lor'!"

"So," said Perault, with a tone of deep sympathy, "they took you to the Slave-market, and sold you like a horse?"

"A hoss!" yelled Tom, in a perfect fury. "A hoss!—dam you insurance! who you call a hoss?"

Tom's rage got the better of his sorrow; and, not relishing the comparison drawn by his sympathizing friend, he clenched his fists, and stood, grinding his teeth, hesitating whether to fight or not. Without paying attention to Tom's hostile looks and gestures, Perault calmly said—"Tom, we are both negroes."

"We is berry like niggers, anyway!" exclaimed Tom, as he gazed on the sable visage of the conspirator.

"And," added Perault, "we are both slaves!"

Tom looked still more fiercely at him, grinding his teeth till the very foam came from his mouth.

"Our masters," said Perault, "buy their horses, work their horses, lash their horses, and sell their horses. They buy us slaves; they work their slaves; they lash their slaves; they sell their slaves. Now, wherein differs the lot of the slave from that of the horse?"

"Dat all werry good," answered Tom; "but nigger no hoss for all dat. Hoss hab four leg; nigger only hab two. Hoss hab long tail; nigger no got no tail at all. No, no; neber call nigger hoss again."

"You say that you was sold for ten dollars?" said Perault.

"Yes," said Tom, sulkily.

"And your master bought you back for five dollars?"

"Yes," groaned Tom.

"Had you offended your master before he sold you?"

"No; I was only take de loan of him clothes for go to ball last night."

"And do you think that your master would seriously part with you for ten dollars. You are certainly worth more."

"I tink so," said Tom. "I is good-looka nigger. De gals say I is de werry ting for fall in lub wid. I is worth good price. You tink so, eh?"

"And can you not perceive that this sale is all a pretence to insult you, and lessen you in the eyes of your fellow slaves?" Tom started, and looked somewhat bewildered, as Perault continued—"What negro will look at you without laughing at the price you brought? Hark! the very boys on the street are ringing it in your ears!" And the cry again arose from the little black rascals, of "Ten dolla' Tom!"

"Look at the dress they have exposed you for sale in! It would disgrace a scarecrow."

Tom looked at the torn coat, and, tucking up the solitary tail thereof under his arm, ruefully said—"Dat is true. Um was cus insult; 'pon soul him was!"

"And what negro girl will speak to you now? See, they pass along, and point at you with the finger of scorn!" said Perault.

"O lor'!" groaned Tom. "I is done for now. Oh, wot I is do!"

Perault said, in a low and impressive whisper, "Seek for revenge!"

"How?" said Tom.

"Follow me, and be cautious." So saying, Perault, followed by Tom, entered a narrow by-lane, and sought the outskirts of the city.

After the departure of their negro friends, Haman and Whackie, along with a few more of the household slaves, kept up the sport, till all of them became so much intoxicated, that the duties of the household, and all regard to their owner's interests, were completely forgotten. As it was the first debauch that poor Whackie had ever indulged in, he suffered severely from the consequences. Early in the morning, he was seen staggering forth from the kitchen, with a huge calabash in his hand, and directing his tottering steps towards the water-pump. Thrice he filled, and rapidly swallowed the contents of his calabash; then, laying it down, he stood for a second, and bitterly groaned—"Oh Lor'! wot is dis?" Again he suddenly filled his calabash, and bumpered draught after draught, as if determined to commit suicide by drowning himself on a novel principle. While thus endeavouring to quench the burning pain in his interior, Whackie was interrupted by Haman issuing from the kitchen, most miraculously drunk, holding a bottle of brandy in his hand.

"Whack—Whackie," hiccupped the drunken varlet, as he reeled towards his suffering companion. "See—see wot I is got. Looka dere, ole boy—noder bottle ob brandy; take suck ob um—um be far betta' dan col' wata."

"Cus you brandy," exclaimed Whackie, with a look expressive of the utmost loathing. "Get along wid you and de brandy. Oh Lor'—my head—I tink um is go all to pieces!" And he bumped his forehead against the pump, with a force which nothing but the skull of a negro could withstand.

Haman, in the meantime, staggered up, and hugging the pump in his arms, endeavoured to balance himself against it, as he began to lecture Whackie on the sin of drunkenness.

"Oh, fie shame," hiccupped this negro bacchanalian, his words so thickly uttered, as to be almost unintelligible. "Oh, fie shame, Whackie, you is dronk—quite tostified: fie shame! Wot will Massa say?"

Before Whackie had time to answer, the court-gate was thrown suddenly open, and Mr. Bellgrove's carriage whirled into the court-yard. The quick eye of Mr. Bellgrove at once detected the situation of the two negroes, and alighting from his carriage, he walked up to them. With a look of shame and terror, Whackie dropped the calabash on the ground, and covered his face with his hands, while Haman, assuming a look of the most consummate drunken gravity, vainly attempted to pocket his brandy bottle; and, by propping himself against the pump, made a fruitless effort to stand upon one foot, in testimony of his being perfectly steady and sober.

"What have you been doing, Whackie?" said Mr. Bellgrove, sternly.

"Oh Massa!" sobbed the poor fellow, "I was do werry bad. I take some brandy, Massa; and I is werry sick."

"So," said Mr. Bellgrove, "instead of getting the house prepared for our reception, you have spent the night drinking?"

"Oh no, Massa," hiccupped Haman; "we was no drink. Only wata, Massa—only wata!"

"The water must have been very strong that put you both into such a state," said Mr. Bellgrove. "Whackie, you have disobeyed my orders. I told you not to mingle with the negroes in the city, and to take no strong liquors."

"I sall neber take no more brandy, Massa," sobbed Whackie.

"Dat a good boy," exclaimed Haman; "de brandy is no good—um no agree wid country nigger stomack."

"I suspect, Haman, that you are to blame in giving Whackie so much brandy," said Mr. Bellgrove.

"Jost small drop, Massa—leely drop," answered Haman; "not so much as put out musquito eye."

"Retire both of you to bed, and sleep yourselves sober," said Mr. Bellgrove. "Miss Bellgrove will be here in the afternoon; the rest of the family go to Sullivan's Island to-night. When you are fit to appear before your Mistress, see that you pay proper attention to her." So saying, he turned and left them.

We now return to another group, for some time lost sight of.

Perault led Tom through a number of by-paths, till they reached a small rude edifice on the southern boundary of the lines, which was commonly reported to be a negro chapel. Pausing at the door, Perault struck it thrice, at intervals, and a voice from within inquired—"Who do you wish to pray for?"

"Hayti," answered Perault.

"Who else?" inquired the voice.

"Christophe, and Freedom," said Perault: and the door was suddenly thrown open, and, entering the chapel, they found it crammed full of negroes.

"Brethren," cried Perault, "I bring a new friend to join our cause," as he presented Tom to the meeting.

"He is a coward, and will betray us," exclaimed Gullah Jack, rising from a seat beneath the pulpit.

"He has been wronged, and seeks for vengeance.

Is not that a sufficient bond for his fidelity to those who will aid him?" said Perault.

"'Pon soul, genelem," exclaimed Tom, "I is feel rader strange here. Wot you is all going for do?"

"Cut your master's throat for insulting an African," said Perault. "Have you the courage to entrap him?"

"Ay," said Tom, fiercely.

"'Tis well," rejoined Perault. "Look around you; you will behold none but friends, leagued to vindicate their freedom. Will you join us?"

"I will," said Tom; and, repeating the conspirators' oath of secrecy, he was received into the insurgent band.

The chief ringleaders of the conspiracy were present; and Perault, ascending the rostrum, began, in a fluent address, to arouse their passions and their sense of wild justice. He dwelt upon the wrongs of the poor negroes, who were torn from their native sunny clime by force or fraud, and deprived of that freedom which was the birth-right of all mankind. He reminded them of the sufferings of the captives in the slave-ships, when even the mangled limbs of their dead companions were supplied as food to those who survived. He spoke of the slave-market, where every feeling shown by the poor negro—where every tie of nature was rent asunder,—where the husband was torn from his wife, the children from the parent,—all, all treated by the ruffian slave-dealer as a scoff, and the subject of brutal laughter by the surrounding planters and the mob. He then called on each to attest their sufferings after they had been sold—when the weak were lashed to compel them to work, and torture of mind and body was the sole reward for the poor African's labour. He reminded them of how brief a space had elapsed since their sufferings had brought on disease and death; and their proud masters, scorning to give them the rites of sepulture, caused the dead bodies to be thrown into the waters that washed the walls of that proud city, till the very fish in the Bay had become so gorged with human flesh, that no man dared to touch them. He told them of his voyage to Hayti, and his interview with King Christophe; he then explained the plans which he and his coadjutors had adopted for gaining freedom to the oppressed Africans. "The hour," he added, "is now come that we must strike for freedom; and this night shall see this city a heap of smoking ruins." A loud shout of applause from the assembled insurgents arose as Perault closed his address; and they called on him to lead them on to freedom, or to death. Calming their wild shouts, Perault called the leaders around him; and after some deliberation, the following mad and desperate orders were issued, as directions for the conspirators to act upon.——

That Perault was to meet the country negroes at their rendezvous up the Bay, and lead them on to join the insurgents in the city. That, in the meantime, the negroes in the city were to divide into different bands, and, at night-fall, seize possession of the principal thoroughfares. That the striking of the negro drum at nine o'clock should be the signal for mastering the city-guard, who were all to be massacred. That Perault, on his return, was to lead the whole negro host forward, and fire the town; and the flames were to be the signal for a general massacre of all who opposed them. The shipping was to be seized, and the plunder of the city placed on board; and the insurgents were then to sail in triumph for Hayti.

Each of the ringleaders' orders were given to them; and Perault urged Tom to conceal himself at night at the back of the guard-house, and to open the gate to him on receiving a private signal. This Tom readily agreed to, as his attendance at the guard-house on his master would not subject him to any suspicion.

Having arranged everything for the outbreak, Perault prepared to cross the bay, to lead over the insurgents from the plantations. Promising solemnly to join the rebel slaves in the city at the hour of nine, when the negro drum should strike, he departed, with a heart filled with exultation, on his horrid errand, accompanied by a few of his band.

The only pale face seen amongst the assembled rebels, was that of the Missionary, whose look of mute horror, at the announcement of the real nature of the plot, showed that he might yet strive to prevent it. Observing this, Perault induced the Missionary to leave the chapel along with him; and pretending that he wished his presence to curb the unruly spirits of the negroes, and that he had a different version of his plans to give him, he induced the unfortunate man to enter the canoe along with himself. They rowed in silence till they reached the heavy current formed by the conjunction of the Cowper and Wandoo rivers, when Perault suddenly turned to the Missionary, and said—"So, you dislike our plans?"

"I do," was the answer.

"And would betray us, if you thought there would be a general massacre of the whites?"

"You have deceived me," said the Missionary; "and before God and man I denounce thy bloody scheme."

"We have a method of silencing rash tongues," said Perault, sternly.

Silence again ensued for a short space, when Perault addressed the rowers—"Is that an alligator in the stream?"

The negroes turned to look in the direction pointed out, when a sudden plunge was heard, and the voice of the Missionary, in wild despair, exclaimed—"Spare me! save me! Mercy! God, have mercy!"

The rowers started up, and beheld the Missionary struggling in the waters, his features distorted with agony and despair. He was suddenly beneath the waves, his hands tossing convulsively for aid as he disappeared. "Resume your seats, and row on," said Perault, sternly. "He was a white man, and deserved his fate." The rowers silently resumed their paddles; but shuddered at the recollection of the scene.

We must now, for a time, return to the scene of warfare at Myrtlegrove, where we left the Cadet Brigade engaged with the Cherokees.

No sooner had Major Maitland seen the preparations made for escorting Miss Bellgrove and her friends to Carlville, than he headed his own troops in the forest; and, by a series of skilful manœuvres, forced the stubborn foe from the cover of the woods, and drove them into the clearings. Concealed by the underwood on the verge of the openings, the Cadets poured in a most destructive fire upon the enemy, till the mounted brigade, forming in line, charged furiously upon the Cherokees, and drove them into a large swamp upon the margin of the river, through which the Indians vainly endeavoured to force their way. Maitland then ordered the whole troops to advance, and extend along the outskirts of the swamp, to prevent the Indians extricating themselves from their perilous situation. Exposed to the galling fire of the Cadets and negroes around the swamp, and the deep mud and rapid river preventing all escape, the Indians soon made signs that they wished a cessation of hostilities. The firing having ceased, one of their chiefs scrambled out of the swamp, his long, white blanket thickly covered with mud, while his face, divested of its war-paint, expressed mingled feelings of chagrin and sullen haughtiness. Throwing down his rifle, he stalked, with proud up-springing, but slow steps, towards Maitland and a group of officers, who had assembled to receive him.

"Why do our white brethren war against the Red Cherokees?" demanded the chief, in a sullen, offended tone, as if he and his tribe were the worst-used men in the world.

"Why do the Red Cherokees steal on, like beasts of prey, to destroy the white men?" said Maitland, haughtily. "If ye come like wolves, we shall hunt ye down as wolves."

"The pale-faces were the first aggressors," replied the Indian, doggedly; "and the Red Cherokees only revenged their wrongs."

"You had no cause for this outbreak," rejoined Maitland; "and less cause to wander from the wilds of Georgia, to destroy the inhabitants of South Carolina, who were your friends."

"We came to trade with the Carolinians in peace," said the Indian. "The pale-faces in the State of Georgia would drive the Red Indian from the land. We deal not with them."

"Ye attacked and destroyed several plantations in this very neighbourhood about two years ago; ye burned the plantation of Mr. Bellgrove, who was ever the friend of your race, and carried off his only son: ye wrought ruin and destruction; your very footsteps were marked with massacre and fire; and yet you call this peace!"

"Our young braves were shot down like wild deer by your white hunters," said the Indian; "therefore we attacked your plantations. We carried away the young pale-face as a hostage, to prevent farther harm from his race. We meant to restore him, and brought him with us to smoke the pipe of peace, and be in friendship with our white brethren: but he slew some of our young braves, and fled from our wigwams; therefore we pursued him. Our chief, Moonakah, is also slain. Why should the Red Indian not seek redress for his wrongs?"

"Your braves got involved, as I learn, with some white hunters in the woods," answered Maitland, "and fell in combat with them. The young man harmed them not. As for Moonakah, he still lives."

"Restore him to us then," said the chief, "and the Red Indian will depart in peace, and no longer contend with his white brethren."

"Not so," answered Maitland; "your warriors cannot escape us now; let them lay down their arms and surrender."

"Never," exclaimed the Indian, fiercely, "we will die first."

"Look," said Maitland, pointing to the swamp where the Indians were struggling amongst the mud; "if they enter farther into the swamp, they will all be drowned. If they try to extricate themselves, they will be shot down. Take your choice. We will spare your lives and send you over to the State of Georgia, if you surrender; if not, we will destroy you all. See, the negroes are surrounding the opposite verge of the swamp to prevent your escape."

"The negroes' hearts are black like their faces," exclaimed the Indian, fiercely. "They are dogs—and sons of dogs. They are black-hearted, and have acted falsely to the Red Cherokee."

"Ha!" said Maitland, as suspicion flashed across his mind, "did the slaves promise to aid you in this outbreak?"

"They did," answered the Indian. "They seek to destroy the pale-faces, and pretend to offer the Red Indians their own land again. They are bad—bad!" and he spat on the ground to give stronger effect to his expressions of rage against the slaves.

Maitland and the officers around him exchanged glances of surprise; and anxious to ascertain the truth of the Cherokee's statement, Maitland again addressed him.

"So the black slaves broke faith with the Cherokees, and instead of aiding them against the whites, they fight against the Indians?"

"The Indian sees his folly in trusting to the black dogs," answered the chief. "Let our white brethren beware of them also. Let the Cherokees return, and they will keep down the black slaves."

"We can keep them down ourselves if we wish it," said Maitland. "You have heard our terms, if not complied with within ten minutes, your blood be upon your own heads."

The Indian shrugged up his shoulders, and muttered, "Ugh, ugh: it is not good—not good."

"Gentlemen," said Maitland, addressing his brother officers, "let the mounted brigade disperse along the margin of the swamp, to cut down any Indians who struggle out. Place the negroes at the farthest-off verge, and order our rifles to advance to the swamp."

"Stay," cried the Cherokee, "I will tell to my brethren what your conditions are."

"That will not prevent us from cutting off all possibility of your escape," said Maitland. "You may return; but the troops must take their ground; so look you to the consequences, if within ten minutes you do not accede to our terms."

With a downcast look, the Indian turned, and springing lightly on the harder parts of the soil, soon rejoined his tribe. An angry altercation ensued, which was suddenly broken off by a strong body of the Indians, making a bold attempt to force their way through the negroes on the verge of the swamp, but all their efforts only tended to their own destruction; and they were reluctantly compelled to surrender.

No sooner were the prisoners secured, than Maitland forwarded despatches to Captain Osborne, to return from Bellgrove Plantation with the troops under his command; and to escort the prisoners to the frontiers of the district. He then called a council of the officers of the Brigade, and represented the necessity of adopting instant measures, for checking any attempt on the part of the negroes, to take advantage of the outbreak of the Indians. Accustomed, however, to the crouching nature of the negroes, and being taught to look upon them as an inferior and degraded race in the scale of humanity, the officers only laughed at the idea of the negroes rising against their white masters; and maintained, that if they should dare to revolt, their owners had only to arm themselves with whips, to overawe their rebel slaves, and reduce them to subjection. Finding his remonstrances unavailing, Maitland consented to remain till the arrival of Captain Osborne's rifles; at the same time begging of the officers to keep a strict watch on the movements of the negroes on Myrtlegrove, and the surrounding plantations.

The loss on the part of the Cadet Brigade had been very trifling, while that of the Indians was severe; and the result was calculated to crush any future hostile movements on the part of the native tribes in the States.

Despatches were forwarded to the city, announcing the defeat of the Indians; and in the course of the following day, Maitland received orders to forward the prisoners to the frontiers of the district, and deliver them over to the troops provided to convey them to their destination; and then to march the Rifle Brigade back to Carlville.

It was late on the evening after the surrender of the Indians, before Captain Osborne's troops arrived at Myrtlegrove; and on the following day, the Indian prisoners were divided into different parties, and each, guarded by a strong body of the Cadets, was marched off, to be handed over to the neighbouring troops. Having seen the arrangements properly made, Maitland issued orders for the Mounted Brigade and remainder of the Cadets to march to Carlville; and, desirous to reach the city before their arrival, he embarked in a canoe on the Wandoo, and preceded them.

Evening had set in before Maitland landed at Carlville; but, as he proceeded towards the mansion-house of Colonel Waldenberg, he could not refrain from remarking the singular conduct of the negroes in the streets, and the uncommon number of country negroes assembled in small groups at the corners. He observed that, as often as he eyed any of them closely, they looked startled, and as if conscious of guilt. Filled with vague apprehension, he reached the outer gate of Waldenberg's mansion, and, on knocking, was answered by a surly black porter, who informed him that Waldenberg had left the city a few hours previously. Doubtful of the truth of this statement, but supposing that Waldenberg did not wish to be disturbed, and had given his slaves instructions to deny him, Maitland turned, and walked on to the city guard-house, where he found Galliard and Brookley together. Both were happy to meet with him; and, after the ordinary congratulations were over, Maitland told them of the disclosures made by the Indians, and his own fears that the negroes meditated a revolt. Brookley and Galliard exchanged glances, and a smile lurked around the mouths of both.

"My dear Maitland," said Brookley, "you view this matter too seriously. Your English education has spoiled you altogether. The negroes! Lord help the poor devils! if a single white man was to attack a thousand of them, with only a cowskin in his hand, he would set them all to flight."

"You are wrong, Brookley," answered Maitland. "I have seen the negro race do acts of most heroic daring; and I have heard of Africans whose bravery, in their own land, equalled that of the best and noblest of our patriots."

"Poor black devils!" cried Brookley; "what was the use of all their patriotism?"

"What is the use of ours, Brookley? What if our ancestors, when fighting for freedom, had been conquered and sold as slaves?—made hewers of wood and drawers of water to a race they abhorred, and we, their children, made the scoff and the scorn of our masters?"

"Nay," said Brookley, "that is too strong a picture."

"Not too strong," said Maitland. "Take the case home to ourselves: If the negroes fought openly and fairly for freedom, I'd break my sword in pieces rather than raise it against them."

"But they dare not meet us openly," cried Galliard.

"Therefore," answered Maitland, "they must plot in secret. You cannot expect your slaves to send their masters a fair and open challenge to combat."

Conversing thus, the gentlemen glided on, till Brookley, whose fears began to get excited, caused another body of the guard to assemble at the guard-house; and Galliard and Maitland agreed to remain with him till the guard should be posted at nine o'clock.

CHAPTER XVII.—THE INSURRECTION.

The sun was slowly setting behind the dark masses of forest to the westward of the city, and tinged the sky with fiery brightness, while the air felt hot and sulphureous, and gave tokens of an approaching thunder-storm. One dazzling glare of ruddy light shot across the heavy clouds, which came rolling along the heavens, and then all settled into the death-like silence and darkness of the grave. For a space all Nature seemed hushed into the most silent repose, and not even a breath of wind was heard. Suddenly the deep croaking of a solitary bull-frog broke upon the stilly solitude, and instantly the concert was joined by the noisy tenants of each swamp and fen; while the shrill chirp of the grasshoppers gave a variety to the rude, though not unpleasant, notes, which sounded far and near; and the fire-flies, darting through the air, spread a bright glare around them, as they ever and anon clustered together like a globe of fire, or darted asunder like sparks struck from a burning torch.

Refreshed by a sound sleep, our acquaintance Whackie was, at this time, listlessly leaning over the balustrade of the verandah of the mansion-house, watching the evolutions of the fire-flies, when the sound of a stealthy step, and a slight rustling amongst the shrubbery, aroused him. "Ah, ha!" he chuckled; "here be some black rogue come for tief de fruit. I hear him foot; stop, I go cotch um!"

The footsteps drew nearer and nearer, and at length were heard slowly ascending the staircase. "Who de debil is dat!" thought Whackie, as, creeping closely to the trelissed vines, which clustered around the pillars of the verandah, he lay motionless, listening to the advancing footsteps. A dark figure glided past him, and paused opposite to the window of Miss Bellgrove's apartment. The rays of the taper, beaming through the window, fell full on the face and form of the intruder; and Whackie, with mingled consternation and joy, beheld his friend Zama! Whackie had heard that Zama had been killed by the Indians; and the sudden appearance of his friend, in such a place, chilled the superstitious African's very blood, so that he had not the courage to move, but lay crouched up, gazing, as if transfixed, on the supposed apparition before him. Zama stood for a short space looking into the apartment; and Whackie beheld him wring his hands bitterly, while large tears coursed from his eyes. Heaving a deep sigh, he stepped back close to the spot where Whackie lay concealed. "She is alone," he murmured; "and yet I dare not warn her of her danger. But she shall be safe. Yes, Matilda; when the wild din of war bursts around thee, Zama's arm shall shield thee from all danger." He turned away, and slowly glided from the spot. Whackie, creeping on his hands and knees from his lurking-place, looked anxiously after the receding figure, and, shaking with fear, he uttered, "Dat is no ghost; him Zama heshef: wot him see in dat window?" So saying, he rose; and, running to the window, peered through it, and beheld Miss Bellgrove sitting in a pensive mood at a table. He then turned, and hearing the footsteps of the intruder gliding under the verandah, Whackie instantly thought of running after him, and bringing him back. Hurrying down the staircase, he followed Zama across the garden, and observed him pass through a private gate, and turn down a lonely lane, leading to Vendue range.

Thoroughly convinced that it was Zama, and no ghost, that he was following, and being anxious to find out his lurking-place, Whackie followed closely at his heels; and, slipping from tree to tree, kept Zama in view, without being observed himself.

After walking along the range, Zama struck down to the beach; and Whackie, availing himself of some piles of wood and bales of cotton which lay along the sand, crept cautiously along. On a sudden, Zama stopped, and gave a low whistle, which was instantly answered from the water, and a canoe shot close to the side of a deserted wharf, on which Zama had placed himself.

"Hayti!" whispered a voice from the canoe.

"Christophe!" answered Zama; and Whackie, to his amazement, beheld Perault, followed by other three negroes, spring upon the wharf, almost close to him.

Stretching himself behind a pile of cotton bales, Whackie listened with breathless attention to the conversation which was carried on in low tones by the conspirators.

"What news?" said Zama, hastily.

"The plantations are fired," answered Perault, "and blood has already flowed. The country negroes are even now crossing the bay. Where are your own bands?"

"They are concealed in the creeks, close to the city," answered Zama.

"All has gone well," said Perault.

"My heart misgives me," answered Zama. "Would to heaven that we could escape without bloodshed!"

"Now, by the soul of my fathers!" exclaimed Perault, "I would not leave the city in peace, if I thought that one white man, woman, or child, were left alive; or that one stone of it stood above another. No, Zama; so far we are successful. We must strike down every one of the pale-faced monsters, and let their blazing dwellings be their funeral piles!" Zama shuddered involuntarily. "But, hark! the canoes are rapidly approaching," continued Perault. "'Tis time we were at work."

"But the city guard?" said Zama. "Are they secured?"

"The first stroke of the nine o'clock bell, and the negro drum, settles that," answered Perault. "They will be suddenly overpowered as they issue from the guard-house. Besides, the postern gate, at the back of the guard-house, is in possession of one of our band. Negro Tom will remove the bolts to give us entrance. That done, the rest is easy; and the shipping once secured—Hayti, and Freedom, are before us!"

"But the garrisons in the bay?" inquired Zama, still unsatisfied.

"Are filled with our followers; and the first gleam of destruction from the city, sees the garrisons overpowered. Our schemes are too deeply laid to be thwarted."

The rippling of the water, and the slight splash of paddles, gave token of the advance of the canoes of the insurgents. A signal was exchanged between Perault and the foremost canoes, and a dense mass of negroes moved towards the place where Perault stood. Whackie crept closer behind the pile of cotton bales, where he lay concealed, peering out with terror on the scene before him. Canoe followed canoe, till the creek seemed crammed with them; and band after band of armed negroes sprang upon the landing-place, close to the spot where Whackie lay concealed. Rank on rank, and file on file, they moved past, and formed into close column. The words of command were given in suppressed whispers by the leaders. It was evident that considerable time must have been spent in bringing the insurgents to such perfection in their evolutions. No clang of weapons was heard amongst them; and the deep dry sand scarcely echoed back the measured tramp of the armed thousands, as they swept along the beach towards the city.

As the last column defiled past the spot, Whackie heard the voice of Perault in earnest expostulation with Zama.

"Not one of my band shall attack a white man, unless in self-defence, and in fair and open combat, should the citizens oppose our escape," Zama was heard to say.

"Zama, are you mad?" answered Perault. "Where can there be fair and open combat, when all our hopes depend on secrecy and expedition, under cloud of night? But, see!" he cried, with a burst of joy, "the plantations are in flames! God of my fathers! this is rapture! See how the flames kiss the sky, lighting the heavens like a vault of fire!"

"Ha!" exclaimed Zama, "this may alarm the whites."

"Tush!" said Perault, "fear not. The citizens will only think the neighbouring planters are burning down the long grass and reeds in the forest. But let us on; our host is far advanced towards the mustering-place. Now, proud city," he continued, shaking his clenched hand towards it, "the hour of thy destruction hath come; the chains of thy slaves are broken; and the blood of their oppressors shall hiss in thy smoking ruins. Come, Zama; on, on to vengeance and to freedom!"

With hurried steps the conspirators hastened after their fellow rebels; and Whackie, horrified at what he had overheard, raised his head, and looked cautiously around. The whole of the woods on the opposite side of the bay, was one vast body of flame; while, faintly wafted over its waters, came sounds of exultation and triumph. He rose, but, staggering, sunk on the ground.—"O God!" he exclaimed, "what, what is dis? Plantations on fire—murder—burn—kill all—destroy de city! No, you dam black-hearted villains!—no, I will baulk you yet!"

So saying, he sprang to his feet, and with speedy, but guarded steps, hurried through the most unfrequented lanes; and, scrambling over some walls, soon reached his master's house. Dreading lest the other negroes should be in the plot, he avoided the front staircase, and, climbing up the pillars, he entered the piazza. The light was still burning in the apartment where Miss Bellgrove sat; and Whackie, without ceremony, threw open the door and rushed in. Matilda was sitting alone; and, alarmed at the rude intrusion of the negro, she started from her seat, demanding what he meant by such conduct. Throwing himself at her feet, and, stretching his clasped hands towards her, while tears rolled fast down his cheeks, in broken accents the faithful negro exclaimed—"O Missee, save youshef!—save de city!"

"What mean ye, Whackie?" said Matilda, gazing, with amazement, on the kneeling negro.

"O Missee, de niggers are in rebellion; de plantations are destroyed; dey come to burn de city." And he told the appalling tale.—"Look," he cried, as, starting up, he threw open the window, and pointed to the clouds, which were illumined by the broad glare of the blazing plantations. "See, Missee, see!" cried the negro; dere is no time for put off here."

"Great God!" ejaculated Matilda, "what can be done?"

"Much, Missee, much!" answered the negro, as he earnestly approached her. "Come and alarm de city guard."

"Are there none of the citizens prepared to repel the negroes?"

"Not one," was the answer. "Dey do not seem to suspect ought wrong. But come, Missee—dere is no time for lose—come and arouse de guard."

"Dare I trust you?" said Matilda, looking earnestly at Whackie. "Surely you will not betray me?"

"No, Missee," was the earnest response; "poor Whackie would rader hab him heart cut out, dan betray you."

"I will trust you, then," answered Matilda. "Let us hasten to the guard-house."

"Tank you, Missee," cried Whackie, joyfully; "tank you! We is do for de dam rogues yet! But no put on you bonnet," he continued, as he saw Matilda preparing to dress. "Tie black crape veil round you face, and look like nigger girl." So saying, he tore the veil from the bonnet, and, casting it over Matilda's face, caused her to fasten it firmly. Then snatching up a poker, he said, "We sall do now: de fust nigger dat touch you sall feel dis." So saying, he brandished the poker; and requesting Matilda to take the private gate through the garden, led her along by the hand. No sooner had they passed from the garden, and entered on the street, than they found themselves in the midst of a group of armed negroes, one of whom grasped Whackie by the arm, and roughly inquired—

"Hallo! bubba, whereaway?"

With amazing coolness Whackie answered—

"To Hayti."

"Dat's good," was the murmur of applause around him; and he was allowed to pass. On advancing further along the street, they found that the lamps had all been extinguished. The night was now misty, and the heavy fog was loaded with the pestiferous exhalations from the swamps and fens around. On drawing near to the guard-house, they found it completely surrounded by a dense mass of the negro rebels. Again they were stopped; but Whackie, with ready coolness, gave the parole, "Hayti and Christophe," the password of the rebels, and was allowed to pass through their ranks.

"Go on, bubba," was whispered to him by more than one of the insurgent host; "in few minutes we sall dance in white man's blood."

Still holding Matilda by the hand, and cheering her onwards by his broken exclamations and whispering, Whackie reached the back entrance, which led through the Court behind the guard-house. On trying the door he found it secured in the inside, but suddenly was addressed in a deep whisper from within—

"Is dat you, Perault?"

Whackie at once answered, "Yes," and the door was slowly opened; and, dragging Matilda after him, he rushed in.

"Who de debil is you?" was the inquiry from the party who had opened the door, and whom Whackie instantly recognised to be Dandy Tom!

"Anybody along wid you, Tom?" inquired Whackie.

"No," answered Tom; "but who de debil is you?"

"He me—Whackie! and take dat, you dam tief." So saying, he raised his poker, and with a blow which might have brained a bullock, brought Tom to the ground. Then turning to Matilda, he cried, "Fly to de guard-house; I will secure dis door." He turned and refastened the bolts; then, raising Tom in his arms, said, "You shall go wid me, you dam black rogue," and followed his mistress.

Matilda flew forward and knocked loudly at the guard-house door, when a Spanish soldier from within cried out "Que es esto?"

"Abra V.M. la puerto," exclaimed Matilda.

Surprised at hearing the sound of a female voice, the soldier instantly opened the door, and Matilda rushed past him into the guard-room; and, to the surprise of the sentinel, Whackie also followed, with negro Tom lying over his shoulder. An exclamation of surprise from the guard, when they saw Matilda tear the veil from her face, and Whackie throw down his load, aroused Brookley, Maitland, and Galliard, who were consulting together.

"Where is the Captain of the guard?" cried Matilda.

Maitland at once recognised the voice, and, rushing forward, caught her by both hands.

"Miss Bellgrove!" he exclaimed.

"Oh, Maitland!" she answered, almost sinking into his arms, "the negroes are up in open rebellion; the streets are crowded with their armed bands, and the citizens are not aware of the danger."

"Yes," cried Whackie, "here be one of de black waggibones;" and he pointed to Tom, who was now sitting up scratching his head with a look of bewildered astonishment.

In a transport of rage, Galliard drew his sword, and placing it at the throat of his rebel slave, exclaimed, "Villain, confess, or I will plunge my sword into your body."

The sound of his master's voice, and the sight of the cold steel glittering before him, recalled the wandering senses of Tom. "Yes, Massa, yes," he ejaculated, "I will confess all."

"Quick, then," exclaimed Galliard. "How many negroes are in this plot?"

"Thousands—all de niggers in de city and country round."

"What is their object?" cried Galliard, still menacing him.

The answer of the trembling conspirator was pretty near the truth.

"Have they already made the attack?"

"No, Massa; not till de nigger drum beats."

"We have time yet," cried Maitland, "although it is close upon the hour; we must take instant measures to alarm the citizens."

"The guard," said Captain Brookley, "will make their stand against the rebels till aid arrives."

"Would to Heaven!" exclaimed Maitland, "that our rifles were at hand; and yet they cannot be far off. A trusty messenger might readily meet and hurry them forward."

"Alas!" exclaimed Matilda, "the guard-house is already surrounded by the negroes, so that it is impossible to get intelligence conveyed."

"Oh no, Missee," answered Whackie, eagerly. "I shall go myshef, and bring de Cadets to flog de black rascals. I sall get tro' de crowd of black niggers by say 'Hayti and Christophe.'"

"Is that their password?" cried Galliard, again menacing his delinquent valet.

"Yes, Massa," cried Tom, trembling. "No nigger in de plot has any oder signal."

"Then by your leave, Miss Bellgrove, I shall borrow your black veil," answered Galliard, lightly, "and become a negro for once. By this means I will hurry forward, and bring the Cadets in myself."

A FLIGHT IN THE AERIAL.

BY BON GAULTIER.

"Bless my soul, what can it be? A burnt-out comet, or Sinbad's roc? This is really very remarkable!" and I drew my cheroot from my mouth, and leaning against the old battlement of Ehrenbreitstein, where I had been sauntering for the last half-hour, gazed intently towards a black object, which I had observed for some time sailing towards the town. The afternoon had been squally, and the sky a good deal broken up with clouds, from a bank of which I had seen this inexplicable object emerge a little before, on the extreme verge of the horizon. By degrees, what had at first seemed but a speck glancing in the rays of the westering sun, grew larger and larger, as it advanced rapidly in the direction where I was standing. The wind, before which it was scudding, seemed to buffet it about considerably. It dodged and tacked and veered, as we have seen a crow do under similar circumstances, but, upon the whole, kept steadily on its course. It maintained a considerable elevation, and, as it drew near, looked for all the world like a gigantic eagle, except that it wanted a neck and head; for which, however, a stream of dense black smoke that issued from its back formed an imperfect substitute. Could this, I thought, be the Aerial Machine, which I had seen filling the paragraphs of such English papers as had fallen in my way during my recent excursion through Germany? But while I was still speculating, whether I was to regard it in this light, or to consider myself as under the operation of a bottle of Johannisberg, with which I had wound up my dinner, a new phenomenon developed itself, which in the end served to clear away all doubts upon the subject.

The roc, or rukh, as Mr. Lane writes it, if roc it was, seemed to have some spleen against me, as the rocs in the Arabian Nights had against Sinbad's vessel, and apparently wished to treat me to a similar fate. For, just as it passed over my head, I observed it throw out some bulky object, which swept onwards for a short distance with the impetus communicated by the speed of its recent domicile, then vibrated unsteadily for a few seconds, and descended perpendicularly right over my head. I had no desire, however, to play the Anacreon to this tortoise, and therefore made my way to "a more removed spot" with all speed. Down it came,—neither a roc's egg, nor a rock itself, but a veritable Montgolfier parachute,—with a bang that made the old walls echo again. I heard a faint cry from the basket, as I rushed forward.

"Good gracious! where am I?" said a voice, whose tones I thought I remembered.

"Run aground on Ehrenbreitstein! your broad seat of honour squatted on the broad stone of the same quality," I replied, helping the unfortunate and breathless aeronaut, in whom I now recognised my old friend Duggins, to rise and extricate himself from the ropes of the parachute. "Why, Duggins, who the deuce would have thought of tumbling upon you—no, I should say, of being tumbled upon by you, here? This beats our meeting on the Upper Missouri* all hollow."

"Oh! oh!" said Duggins, rubbing his nether man, "that expedition was a joke to this. I'd rather make fifty pilgrimages to the Siouxes and Assinaboins, than one voyage in the Aerial. The Crows of the Alleghanies are more to my taste a great deal, than aping the crows of the upper air is. My inside is shaken all to pieces. Oh!" he exclaimed, as in the effort to walk the probability of a dislocation of the hip-joint became painfully apparent, "Oh, I sha'n't get the better of this for a twelvemonth. Serves me right, for being such an ass."

"I really can't say as to that," replied I. "But lean on my arm. I presume you have no particular anxiety about preserving this piece of your moveable property," said I, kicking the broken fragments of the parachute. "I shall carry your valise for you. It seems safe enough. I promise you a wonderfully good bed for a German inn, at The White Horse, in the town here,—soft as eider down. So, come along. Take it easy—no bones broke. A little rest and a glass or two of wine will put you all to rights."

"Thank you, thank you. Oh, confound it!"

"What's the matter? What's the matter, my dear fellow? We'll soon be at The White Horse. There it is, that queer-looking old hostel, half-way down the street."

"Oh, never mind. It was only another twinge; but that twinge was a 'screamer,' as our Yankee friends say," said Duggins, conjuring up the ghost of a smile into his generally mirthful face. "I only wish poor Ainsworth and Cruikshank were as well out of the mess. As for Lever, poor fellow, poor fellow!"

"Ainsworth, Cruikshank, Lever! You don't mean to say, that they are all scouring through the air in yonder infernal machine! Where is it now, I wonder? Out of sight, by Jove. No. There it is—no—yes it is—a mere speck on the horizon. Why, at that rate, they'll be at London in an hour."

"Oh, bless you, that's nothing. Only you try it, and you'll not be surprised at that!"

"Thank you! But Lever, Cruikshank, what of them?"

"As to Lever, ask for him at the lions of the Zahara."

"Good Heavens, you don't mean to say, that—" and I went through a pantomimic representation expressive of a gentleman disappearing down an enormous throat—

"Like Harlequin through a clock case. It's a fact: Daniel himself could not have escaped."

"And Cruikshank and Ainsworth?"

"Oh, they're safe enough—that is, as far as any man can be safe in that Flying Steamboat. Ecod, I only wish them as well out of it as I am. Is this your inn? Das Weisse Pferd! meaning, The White Horse, I suppose. Well, upon my soul, I should not have known it—I should have said that animal belonged to quite a new species in natural history."

"A mere flight of German fancy. You wouldn't have a German horse like an English one, would you? However, let me hand you over to the comely Frau Kalbsbraten, who, I dare say, can contrive to cook some less equivocal object of natural history for our supper, while you are fomenting your bruises."

I supported Duggins to a bed-room to which we were heralded by our buxom hostess, who manifested her sympathy for his sufferings by a cento of Ach Gotts, Der Himmels, and Armer lieber Herrs! By vigorous application of shampooing and hot water, the pain of his bruises was considerably reduced; and in the course of a couple of hours, he was able to do justice to a devilled fowl and an omelette, tossed up by the fair hands of the Frau Kalbsbraten herself. A flask of excellent Geisenheimer by no means retarded his restoration to good spirits.

"And so this was the much talked-of Aerial Machine that you were dropped out of in such a summary way."

"Summary! I was only too glad to get out of it any way. The wealth of all the sugar-bakers in London would not have tempted me to stay in it ten minutes longer."

"What the deuce took you into it, then? The man that goes whisking over sea and hill-top, like

* See Duggins's Impressions of America. Tait's Magazine, May, 1842.

witches on a broomstick, can't expect to have as easy a seat up aloft, as if he were rolling along the wood pavement in a Brougham."

"Curiosity, sheer curiosity."

"Come now, confess, you wanted to make a book of it! Impressions of The Aerial—two volumes—one guinea. The public purse bleeds freely. Wasn't that it?"

"Well, perhaps there might be something of that, too. But the chief motive was curiosity. When Henson sent me an invitation to accompany him on the trial-trip with a few friends, What a glorious opportunity, thought I, for realizing the dream which I and you, and every poetical mind, has often entertained of passing from country to country and sea to sea, like an Ariel—"

"In a Taglioni and Wellington boots—"

"Now to see rivers, forests, cities gleaming under us in the sunshine, like gems upon the emerald robe of earth,—now to be sailing under the moonshine, with the waves of the Atlantic leaping and heaving beneath us."

"Now taking tea and toast upon the Wall of China; now sweating 'mong the blacks of Carolina! Exactly so; I entirely understand. You accepted Henson's invitation, in short."

"Oh yes, certainly. It was, let me see; yes,—on Tuesday evening last that I drove down to Notting Hill, where he had been making experiments with his machine for some time. I of course said not a word about it to my family. Merely mentioned I was going down to Penzance to make a few sketches for a book I am writing, packed up a few shirts, and pretended that I was to start by the Southampton Railway. It cost me a struggle, when the time to start actually arrived. The peril of the expedition had never crossed my mind before. But when my children, bless their chubby little feet and fingers! were brought to me that evening—in their smart little night-gowns, just before being put to bed—"

"Never mind these family matters. You got to Notting Hill all safe, I presume? Tell me how you managed to get under way."

"On reaching the ground, I found that I had to ascend an inclined plane, at the top of which, at an elevation of some hundred and fifty feet or so, the Aerial Machine was fastened. I was rather late, and found that my companions were already on board. The steam-engine was hissing and spluttering furiously. Everything, in short, was ready for the start. But as the whole arrangements were kept secret from the public, there was none of the usual flurry, and crush, and scrambling, the collision of porters, and insane bellowings of gentlemen for their portmanteaus, and ladies for their spaniels, that usually precede the starting of steam conveyances. On the contrary, an awful stillness was preserved by all present. None of the crew were visible. Cruikshank gave me a timid nod; and Ainsworth, instead of his usual warm grip of the hand, hailed me with a stare of very imperfect recognition. The only person who seemed at all at ease was Lever, whom I knew merely by sight, and who was lying on the sofa, wrapped in a military cloak, smoking a cigar, and tittering over the last number of Punch. I had a glimpse of Joseph Jenkins in the steward's room as I passed. He seemed to be under the influence of violent fear, which had driven out of his head every random recollection that usually illuminated his mental darkness. It was very clear, that my scheme of a book would never do. Lever with his dashing slashing style, Ainsworth with Cruikshank at his elbow, and Jenkins with his note-book of facts—I had not a dog's chance against them."

"We'll have a fine run of it," said Henson, who was all animation, his clear gray eye sparkling in anticipation of his approaching triumph. "There's a light wind creeping along from the north that will carry us away in fine style."

"Ha!" we exclaimed with one voice, trying to look as much at our ease as possible, and as if we had so stout a heart for the voyage, that it was a matter of total indifference to us, whether it blew great guns, or whether there was no wind at all.

"By the by, gentleman," said Henson, double locking the door through which we had entered the machine, and putting the key in his pocket, "there is one thing I forgot to mention to you. As we are forced to carry light weight, and therefore can have no idlers on board, you must all stand by for a turn of work on the voyage."

"Delighted—certainly—great pleasure!"—was the general exclamation.

"To prevent all mistakes—you see I like to have things all trim and ship-shape—suppose you draw lots among you who shall be cook, steward, and cabin-boy."

"Capital!" cried Jenkins.—"Such fun," said Ainsworth.—"I'll be steward, and mix the liquor," shouted Cruikshank.—"And I'll drink it, my jewel," said Lever, looking round and eliminating a whiff from his cigar with the utmost nonchalance as he spoke.

"A mighty pleasant avening," he continued, "we'll make of it; so, George, the sooner you begin your vocation and produce the matharials, the higher the opinion I'll have of you."

"Stop a bit, gentlemen," interrupted Henson. "I'm sorry to say, that my stoker is so infernally drunk, that I must leave him behind. I can't take his place myself, because, as you see, I will have enough to do looking after the tiller ropes. I'm the last man to put any gentleman in an awkward or painful position, but one of you must be stoker; and, if you please, we'll draw lots for that too."

"Not a face among us but grew as long, at this announcement, as a Philadelphia Quaker's. A considerable variety of expletives escaped in the agitation of the moment, and the eyes of all glanced feverishly towards the door.

"It's no use, gentlemen," said Henson, pleasantly but firmly. "We're ready to start. A great problem in science is on the eve of being solved. I put it to you as men of education, as philanthropists. Will you, for a small matter of personal comfort, delay the great experiment?"

"Oh, —— it," exclaimed the modern Hogarth, "science is all very well, and philanthropy may be so too—although I never knew a philanthropist yet, that was not a scoundrel—but I'll see them both at the bottom of the ocean before I'll consent to be shut up in a furnace like Monsieur Chabert. I'm not a salamander."

"It is most probable that we shall all be at the bottom of the ocean if you or some other of our friends don't accept the vacant shovel," said Henson, smiling. He stepped back and called down something into the engine-room; then advancing to the end of the cabin, he lifted a hatchet that was lying beside a large pin, around which was coiled a cable of the thickness of your arm, and with two rapid strokes cut the rope in two. That instant the vessel shot forward like an arrow. Cruikshank disappeared under the table, I was projected into Lever's lap, Ainsworth and Jenkins embraced each other on the floor.

"Now, gentlemen, settle it among yourselves," said Henson, taking his seat very quietly between the tiller ropes. "We are off, and must have a stoker."

"Remonstrance was now fruitless. We therefore picked ourselves up and proceeded to draw lots for the vacant posts with the best grace we could. Meanwhile Cruikshank kept muttering dark sayings about 'unhandsome advantage,' and making gestures typical of a desire to have a little fancy sparring with Mr. Henson. But when he drew the steward's place, the berth which he had previously destined for himself, he became wonderfully tranquil, nay, even smiled at Ainsworth's look of horror, when the dreaded post of stoker fell to his lot. I drew the cook's place, Jenkins the cabin-boy's; and that the joke might be thoroughly kept up, Lever undertook to be the gentleman of the party.

"Ainsworth, my lad, let me mix you a tumbler," said Cruikshank, who had had by this time ensconced himself behind a chevaux-de-frize of bottles, flanked by two enormous bastions of loaf-sugar, and garrisoned with a large supply of shot in the shape of limes. "It will do you good before you turn in for the night. Warm work, you know!"

"You'll excuse me, Mr. Cruikshank; I've had one stoker tipsy to night already," here broke in our conductor. "Not a drop till daylight. Mr. Ainsworth, the fire's getting low, I see," he continued, as he glanced through a wicket behind him, which commanded a view of the furnace. "You'll require to turn in and watch it."

"Good night, my dear fellow," said we all, pressing round the author of Rookwood, and shaking him affectionately by the hand. "It might have been our own case, you know."

"I wish to heaven it had!" said William Harrison, dashing into the engine-room, which Henson deliberately locked behind him.

"Upon my soul, Duggins," said I, "our friend Ainsworth was much to be pitied. I dare say he would rather have been in his own Well-Hole. But the bottle's done. Capital wine this, is it not? Lieschen, mein Liebeskind, kommen Sie herauf! Ein anderes Fläschen Geisenheimer!"

"Mit Vergnugen!" replied the pretty Lieschen, our landlady's daughter, placing another flask on the table. "Schmeckt das gut? Nicht wahr?"

"Himmlisch! Well, and how did you get on, after Ainsworth entered upon his fiery task?"

"Why, the fact is, after that we turned to, and made ourselves as comfortable as possible. Lever told capital stories—Cruikshank brewed capital punch;—as for Jenkins, we despatched him to the steward's room to wash the dishes and clean our boots, for fear of his dragging our conversation into his next book. The motion of the vessel, which pursued its way steadily through the air, became very pleasant, after a little, and we were as merry as possible. I soon became very drowsy. Perhaps it might be the rarefied air that overcame me, although I believe we took no great altitude at first either; or perhaps it might be the punch, or both; but I believe I fell asleep about eleven, singing the chorus of 'We fly by Night,' which Henson led off with great taste and no small execution."

"I dare say your aërial chant was regarded as the music of the spheres by any gentleman of a poetical turn who may have heard you."

"Very possibly. But if you're done with that bottle? Thank you!" Duggins refreshed himself with a potent pull at the Geisenheimer, and continued.

"When day dawned, we found ourselves skimming over the blue waters of the Mediterranean sea. The prospect was divine. To the east, on the very verge of the horizon, Malta appeared like a black speck against the brilliant orange hue which the rising sun sent forth as the precursor of his coming. To the west lay the Sierras of Spain, still wrapped in the fog and gloom of night; whilst the snowy tops of the Atlas range, towards which we were approaching, shone with that rosy light, which the denizen of the Alps beholds, ere, girding himself for the pursuit of the chamois, he prefers his prayer from the lowly valley to the blessed Saint, whose star rests like a halo upon the Jungfrau's untrodden summit!"

"That's very pretty, Duggins," said I, with a slight yawn, "but we hav'n't time for that sort of thing just now; so pray keep to facts, will you, and we'll imagine the poetry."

"Having satiated my curiosity with a view of the external landscape, I next directed my attention to my fellow-voyagers. Lever lay sound asleep with his legs stretching across the table. A purple velvet nightcap and gold tassel gracefully concealed his right eye; and the butt end of a cigar, with about an inch of gray ashes, was firmly fixed between his lips. The head of Cruikshank lay upon the table, under shelter of his right arm. Upon the thumb-nail of his left hand, which grasped an empty tumbler, I observed a sketch of myself. It was wretchedly drawn, and therefore, before awakening him, I took an opportunity of erasing it. At the extreme end of the car sat Henson, wrapped in a huge pilot coat, his vigilant clear eye dilated with the consciousness of superior genius, and the tiller ropes noosed around his arm.

"Good morning, Master Duggins!" said he. "You've slept well, considering the precious row we had on board last night."

"Gracious heavens!" said I, "did anything go wrong with the machinery?"

"Shiver my vanes! no," replied Henson; "we've had a glorious run of it. Light airs and catspaws from the north-west by north, since two bells. Only, d'ye see, there was something like a mutiny on board. Our stoker was going to strike work, because we refused him an allowance of grog; but I beat all hands to quarters, and we soon made him belay his jaw. He's quiet enough now, I reckon."

"A horrid suspicion seized me. Could they have pitched Ainsworth overboard? I believe the thought was legibly written on my countenance, for Henson gave a short gruff laugh, and continued—

"Why, no—we didn't do that exactly, for we couldn't spare him: but we shut him up in the boiler, and told him, that if he didn't work there like a good 'un till seven bells, he had very little chance of ever tasting half-and-half again. He roared a good deal for the first half-watch, and wouldn't poke the fire, but I turned in a jet of steam upon him, and that settled the business. He does his work now as handy as if he had been bred to it. Boiler, ahoy!"

"Boiler it is, Sir!" replied a faint voice from the interior.

"Chuck on another half hundred-weight of coke, will you, and then you can have a mouthful of fresh air!"

"A sudden scrambling and scratching in the bowels of the copper cone evinced the increased activity of its occupant.

"Ha! Duggins, my hearty, how are you?" said Lever, awaking—"Henson, my trump, how do you find yourself? Where the deuce may we be now? over the Mediterranean, eh? Well, that's some fun! That's Algiers, I suppose, in the distance—suppose we stoop down and take it from the French? Hallo! Cruikshank, my buck! waken up, will you, and give us a bottle of soda-water with a bottom of brandy in it."

"Cruikshank did as he was desired, and Lever rattled on—

"Devilish good stuff this, after a hard night's swizzling! Duggins, do you think you could knock off a spatch-cock, or a kidney with a slight sprinkling of cayenne? Try it—that's a good fellow. I say, Henson,—what the deuce have you made of Ainsworth? I could hardly get a wink of sleep for his confounded bellowing in the boiler."

"I dare say, Master Charley," said Cruikshank, a little offended at the cavalier manner in which Lever seemed disposed to treat his friend—"I dare say you'd be rather apt to bellow yourself, if you were shut in there without a drop of anything to wet your whistle. He hadn't six stiff tumblers and a snooze after them to keep him fresh."

"Which you had, at the very least, friend George," retorted Lever. "But, hang it, after all, it's not right to muzzle the ox that treads out the coke, eh? I say, Henson,—do you think it would be safe to let the poor devil out for an hour or so? We can easily shove him in again, you know, when he's wanted."

"Henson swept the horizon with his telescope, noted down some figures on a scrap of paper, and then appeared absorbed in calculation.

"By the quadrant less seven," he said, after a pause. "I think he may come out now. There's no chance of a squall on this side the equator, and there's fuel enough in the furnace to keep us going as far as the mountains of the Moon. Tumble out my kiddy!" and he drew back the bolt.

"Poor Ainsworth! When he entered the Aerial he was in ripe and ruddy condition, plump as a Dunstable lark, and full of fun and frolic. Now, he crawled out from his den, a spectral emaciated figure; his long hair, matted with ashes and sweat, hung around his cheeks like a bunch of tallow dips tied together by the wicks; his face was streaked with a fancy ochre formed by the combination of steam and cinders; and his elegant apparel, which might formerly have electrified Piccadilly, was now woefully soiled, and in some places burned into patches. His first action was to clutch convulsively at a jug of beer which he drained to the very dregs. He then threw himself upon a sofa and scowled moodily around.

"Ainsworth, my fine fellow!" said Lever, by way of soothing him, "you've had a long spell of it, and we all feel devilishly obliged. Take a drop more beer. Cruikshank, look sharp, will you, and handle the tap."

"William Harrison glared wildly at him. He said nothing, however, but took the beer.

"When I was a child," said I, cheerfully, hoping to allay the irritation of my friend, "quite a little child, you know,—a thing full of life and joy, I remember to have tumbled, on a rainy day, over a heap of ashes, and to have been very much in the same plight with yourself. Would you like to wash your face, my dear fellow?"

"Driz my kemesa!" said Ainsworth, savagely. "Give us none of your gammon, Master Duggins, for I won't stand no nonsense."

"Quite right," said Lever; "devilish spirited answer. I say, Duggins, where's that spatch-cock you promised to make about an hour ago? Look sharp, will you? Why, confound it, man, are you to sit there all day with your hands in your pockets, doing nothing? Joint-stock work, you know,—division of labour, eh? That's it. Ladle away with the cayenne. Cruikshank, I'll thank you for another glass of soda and cogniac; (a light for my cigar, Jenkins!) and then squeeze a lemon or two into that bowl—a glass of weak rum-punch will do us no harm, eh, Henson? and I've a notion we shall find it confoundedly hot in crossing the great Zahara desert. Ainsworth, my good fellow, 'pon my soul you'd better dip your head in that bucket. You'd improve your appearance vastly.—Eh! what was that? a cannon-shot? By George! we're above Algiers; and these confounded French are firing at us!"

"Sure enough a cannon-ball came whistling up within three yards of the larboard sail, and reaching its upmost point of elevation, about a hundred feet above us, turned in the air, and fell straight down with immense velocity to the earth. It went crash into a minaret.

"There's a muezzin done for!" cried Lever, who had been staring down through a telescope.

"Henson grew pale.

"If they hit the engine," said he, "or even shiver the canvass, it's all up with us. Blast them! there's another fellow below pointing a gun!"

"Short sixes, I perceive," said Lever. "Hand me that rifle, will you—bang!—there goes the artilleryman on the rampart, tumbling over like a dolphin with a hole through his jacket; and I guess, by this time we're pretty well out of their range."

"And so it proved. Five more guns were fired at us from the batteries of Algiers; but the shot, as Lever predicted, fell short of the mark, and no injury ensued. I must confess, however, that I felt rather nervous until the roar of the artillery was silenced.

"This incident had the effect in some degree of restoring peace among our party, and might have done so altogether, if the military man had possessed sufficient tact to improve his advantage. He seemed, however, to consider that his successful shot had placed him so far above the level of the rest of us, that he might do exactly what he chose. Accordingly, he kept me working at the spatchcocks and kidneys, as if I had been a regimental cook. What with squeezing and mixing and ladling, Cruikshank had a hard time of it. Jenkins was run off his feet by him; and even poor exhausted Ainsworth was forced to minister to the personal comforts of the author of Harry Lorrequer. Henson was the only man whom he did not dare to meddle with. Even the warrior of the peninsula quailed before the falcon eye of the aeronaut.

"We now approached the tremendous range of the Atlas. By a dexterous motion of the tiller, Henson lowered the tail of the machine, and we rose slantingly in the air, as light and gracefully as a swallow. At first our course lay above huge patches of forest—great hoary primæval trees stretching for leagues up the mountain sides, with large green prairies between, in which we saw herds of wild dromedaries grazing. It was strange to mark how these stupendous creatures raised up their heads, and craned out their long necks in wonder, as the shadow of the aërial car passed across them, and the flap of its wide vanes was heard in the liquid air. And what a bellow they gave, as, tossing their hinder feet and unshapely humps on high, they scoured along in a body to take shelter in the recesses of the umbrageous wood! Then we came to the slopes of mountain pasture, where wild sheep and bisons were grazing, and, higher up, to the broken crags, along which the goat and the ibex bounded. Presently we reached the regions of eternal snow, and swept through a flight of enormous eagles, who, scared at so unwonted an apparition, flew screaming towards distant Fez. But the most singular spectacle we beheld, was an obelisk of grey granite, on the extreme peak of the mountain, far above snow and glacier, and I need not add quite imperceptible from its base. We passed close to it, and by the aid of our glasses, read this inscription—

HIC. JACET.
HERCVLES.
FILIVS. IOVIS.
EQVES AVRATVS.
OBIIT.
A.C.
MMMDCCCLXI.
IN PACEM
NOSTRI, DOMINI. REGIS."

"Now, Duggins," interrupted I, "will you swear that you saw that?"

"Before any magistrate in Middlesex," replied Duggins. "I don't mean to say exactly that I copied the inscription myself, for at the moment we cleared the mountain I was making a batter-pudding in the forecastle, but Lever wrote it down, and told me ten minutes afterwards."

"That will do," said I. "Now carry on."

"Descending the mountain on the other side, we passed over a diversified plain of some extent, apparently inhabited by wandering Arabs. We then entered into the region of the great Zahara desert. You cannot conceive the desolation of that fearful region. Fierce in its meridian hotness the sun pours down its torrid rays upon the white and calcined soil. No fields are there—no green lanes where children—little children, full of life and merriment may hunt the butterflies or pluck the wild flowers—no quiet churchyards where young creatures too early withered may lie down and think that above them the bright sunshine shall fall in tempered beams upon the turf—no—"

"No Nells, in short, nor Smikes, nor Pinches, nor that sort of thing. You need not trouble yourself to go over the whole catalogue, Duggins. I know it by heart. There were no pothouses either, I suppose, or queer old quaint houses with a spectral look, or rotten wharfs, or windows with hyacinths in blacking-bottles, or any other of your old properties. In fact, I understand perfectly that it was merely a desert of sand, and therefore you need say nothing more about it."

"O very well!" said Duggins, getting rather red about the gills; "no man cares for description less than myself, and I sha'n't force it upon you. We had been two hours in that infernal desert, and were absolutely smothered with the heat. We were in fact fairly knocked up. Lever selected the shadiest part of the car, near the vanes, which made a current of rather cooler air, and stripping himself nearly to the buff, smoked and drank in silence. Cruikshank lay down beside the tap, and amused himself by making a little jet-de-biere from the spigot. I gave up the batter-pudding in despair, and was for once unrebuked. I had enough to do to keep my mouth, eyes, and nose clear of sand. Even Henson looked fatigued; and the only man of the party who seemed not to care about it was Ainsworth, whose experiences in the engine-room had probably seasoned him,—indeed, I question whether he had then an ounce of adipose matter left in his system.

"As the great Zahara desert is perfectly level, we kept the Aerial low, and moved along at the height of only twenty yards from its surface. At last Henson, who, notwithstanding the heat, was keeping a vigilant look-out, uttered an exclamation of surprise.

"We all started up, and leaning over the rail, descried two magnificent creatures, a lion and a lioness, basking in the sand a little way before us. In point of size, the famous Nero was a mere cat compared with these enormous animals. I should say that the lion, from snout to tail, could not have measured less than thirty feet."

"Should you?" said I, refilling my meerschaum.

"I should," continued Duggins. "Heavens! what a roar he gave, as, shaking his massive mane, and raising himself on his forepaws, he glared upon the object above him! and how terrible was his bound from the earth as the sweet savour of human flesh smote on his distended nostrils! Off started at full speed lion and lioness under the shadow of the moving car, ramping and leaping as though they hoped to reach us, and ever and anon bellowing forth their wrath at the first invaders of their native wild! I have been in many a menagerie, but I defy even the Zoological Gardens to produce a sight like this!

"Lever lost his apathy, and became much excited.

"What splendid brutes!" he exclaimed. "One of their skins would fetch the price of fifty acres in Connaught. I say, Henson, how many horse-power do you call this machine of yours?"

"Twenty," replied the aeronaut; "and you may throw in the pull of a jackass into the bargain."

"And what may be the equivalent of that male lion in horses?"

"Six times nine is seventy-two—dot one and carry three—then multiply by the periphery—and subtract by the quotient—seventeen minus nine is plus twelve.—Why, throwing the force of gravitating cohesion into the bargain, Mister Lever, I should say that 'ere animal is well-nigh on to thirteen horse-power—that is, by Astley's graduated scale."

"Then hurrah, my boys!" cried Lever, "we'll catch the lion after all—have him up among us, by the living Jingo, and rare sport it will be. Fourteen horse-power will do the trick perfectly. Cruikshank! I'll thank you for that grapnel."

"Fawney your famma, George!" cried Ainsworth, becoming suddenly as white as a sheet. "Blow me, if I stand any such nonsense. Why he'd crunch the whole lot of us up in less time than I could fake a cly?"

"You'd probably like to be shut up again in the boiler," said Lever, frowning ominously. "But you needn't be alarmed, my fine fellow. Before he comes up here, the lion will be as dead as any of your own heroes an hour after his last leap at Tyburn. Just hand over that yard of chain cable, will you, Duggins. That's your sort. Now that cold duck—and now, may I never bivouack again, if you could manufacture a better bait for a shark in the Pacific Ocean!"

"To do Lever justice, it was well devised. The duck was lashed on above the grapnel, which formed a very competent kind of hook; next came the chain cable, and then a thick rope, the end of which, for security, Lever knotted round his own body."

"Now for it, my lads!"

"Slowly and gently he lowered the bait. The roars of the racing lions beneath increased ten-fold as they saw it descend. For a time he kept it swinging about twenty feet from the ground, and tremendous were the exertions which the great lion made to seize it. Gomersal in his youth, Mr. William Cooke, the Flying Dutchman, or any other acrobat on the face of the earth never vaulted half so high. At length Lever dropped it a few feet lower down, and the monster with a prodigious spring caught it in his open jaws.

"Hurrah! I've hooked him," cried the author of 'Our Mess.'

"These were the last words we heard him utter. Lever had made a slight miscalculation. The locomotive power lay in the car, not in him; and the backward bound of the lion, as he felt the iron enter into his cheek, shot the unfortunate officer from his perch like a stone from a catapult. I know not if he was dead when he reached the ground, but I hope he was. We left the monsters tossing him in the air like a shuttlecock.

"All this passed in a moment. We remained horror-struck and motionless. For my own part I grew extremely sick. Ainsworth was the first to break the silence.

"There goes one monthly serial at all events," said he, brushing off a tear from his eye. "I'm sorry for him, though, and still more for the Dublin University. But, after all, what does it signify. To my mind there's little choice between being snapped up in the cracking of a ken by one of Wombwell's pets, and being broiled alive in the heart of a blasted engine!"

"There might be a sprinkling both of truth and philosophy in this epitaph, but it sounded heartless at the moment.

"Howsomed'ever, d'ye see, Mister Ainsworth," said Henson quietly, "we can't do without a stoker."

"Cruikshank took a sketch of the catastrophe, for an etching to appear in the next number of Bentley. I picked up this pipe, a silver-mounted meerschaum, you observe—a present, I believe, from Marshal Blucher to our poor friend, for distinguished military services,—and smoked it in memory of the deceased.

"The air now became perceptibly cooler, and before us, in the extreme horizon, we could distinguish belts and clumps of trees. Shortly afterwards, the tall stalks of the cocoa palms, like great factory chimneys with umbrellas on the top of them, became distinctly apparent. We had passed the zone of the Zahara, and were once more in the region of life. As we floated over the interminable jungles, it was beautiful to behold how nature luxuriated in gigantic growth, and put forth her full strength and magnificence under the tropical influence of the sun. The huge trees were bound by creepers of enormous size and length, which filled the intermediate spaces with festoons of dark green foliage, and innumerable blossoms of a bright scarlet hue. Birds of the most brilliant plumage, all crimson, green, and gold, flew and hovered around these, or picked the ripe red fruit which hung in clusters upon every bough. Countless groups of monkeys, some no bigger than my hand, some larger apparently than the human race, skipped along the branches, that scarcely bent under them, or sate chattering and stuffing themselves with bananas, guavas, mangosteens, and the other productions of that unsophisticated Covent Garden. Sometimes the head of the lordly giraffe might be seen thrusting itself through the matted covering of leaves, as if to descry what rare and wondrous bird was winnowing its way through the liquid realms of air; and once we observed a leopard rushing across an open glade in an agony of fear and desperation, closely pursued by a unicorn, which, with bended neck and long levelled horn, seemed bent upon the fugitive's destruction.

"It was impossible to look down upon this rich and glowing region without experiencing an ardent wish to descend. Poor Lever had made such wild havoc among our stock of fluids, (having even used up for punch some of the water destined for the engine,) that it became matter of necessity to procure a farther supply. Our mouths likewise watered, even like the mouth of Eve, for a taste of the native delicacies, which lay in such vast profusion beneath.—'I'd give ten bob and a tizzy,' exclaimed George Cruikshank, 'for a quiet walk into a pine apple,'—and the sentiment was echoed by every man of us.

"The only difficulty was to alight in such a position as to procure a proper start for the Aerial in recommencing our flight. Henson was of opinion, that this might be accomplished by securing the machine to the top of a cocoa-nut tree; and, having selected one about a hundred and fifty feet high, which grew upon the bank of a huge lagoon, in whose waters the hippopotami were wallowing like pigs, we caught it with our grappling irons, and, shooting out our rope-ladder, prepared to descend to terra firma. My head had by this time got so accustomed to the elevation, that I did not feel the least giddiness or trepidation at the prospect of a descent, which might have appalled Madame Sala or Monsieur Gouffe.

"As we might possibly encounter some danger, we considered it expedient to arm ourselves. I stuck a pair of holster-pistols in my belt. Cruikshank girded his loins with a cavalry scimitar. Henson carried a barrel of gunpowder and the blunderbuss of a mail-coach guard. Jenkins shouldered a huge rolling-pin; and Ainsworth, with characteristic propriety, armed himself with a crowbar. Henson locked the crew, three men and a boy, into the gun-room, to prevent their leaving the Aerial in our absence, and Jenkins led the way for our descent. We insisted upon his going first, in case of accidents."

"On the principle, I presume, of Fiat experimentum in corpore vili!"

"You have hit it. The literary world could afford to want him better than any of us. Down he went, scrambling hand over hand. We saw him reach the bottom in safety, and make the ladder fast to the stem of a gigantic magnolia. He had scarcely done so, however, when a loud scream rent the air, and, looking over the rails, we descried him locked in the embrace of a huge blue-nosed baboon, which lifted him in its arms, and carried him up into the branches of an adjacent orange-tree. In a trice the rest of us descended the ladder, to our collaborateur's rescue. The baboon was hugging him, stroking his whiskers, stuffing his mouth with oranges which she plucked from the branches around her, and every now and then kissing him with the utmost fervour. Poor Jenkins's disgust at these expressions of endearment would at any other time have convulsed us with laughter—but it was too plain that his breath bade fair to be squeezed out of his body by the Cornish hugs of his hirsute lady love. We trembled both for his virtue and his life."

"Stand by for a shot," said Henson, levelling his blunderbuss.

"Jenkins's screams now became a roar. But Henson was unmoved. Bang went the blunderbuss, and the baboon dropped to the ground with Jenkins in her arms. We all thought he must be dead; but before we could reach him, he had torn himself from the paws of his fair friend, and started to his feet unhurt. Henson, however, had fairly finished the lady's amours, having picked out her eyes with a brace of slugs as neatly as may be; and she lay dead and gory, an awful warning to all future Thaises of the wilderness.

"After this little incident, our party strolled up and down, revelling amid the luscious fruits of that delightful spot. Seated upon a rich bed of the flowering colloquintida, I was sucking guavas at my leisure, and contemplating the fine features of Cruikshank, who, with a custard apple adroitly buried in his mouth, was pulling vigorously at the stalk, when I was startled by a sudden cry from Ainsworth. Leaping to my feet I beheld that distinguished author in the grasp of three naked savages, each with a copper ring, about the size of a quoit, thrust through his nose; while about fifty more, armed with yataghans and assagais, had stealthily surrounded us. We had no choice except to yield or to sell our lives as dearly as possible. Prudential motives induced us all, without concert, to adopt the former expedient; and we accordingly threw down our arms, and were pinioned without a struggle. Our captors, having placed us in the midst of them, executed a kind of extempore war-dance, accompanied with a song the words of which struck me as being rather remarkable. They were as follows:

Timmanee bash, Timmanee boo
Squankum quo, gougeerumoo,
Sangaree whang, booee nyfe yoo
Mellanee squatteree, Timbuctoo!

"Was it probable then, that we were near the great metropolis of Africa, and could that dark hippopotamus-haunted lagoon be the long sought source of the Niger? The words too, which the savages sang, seemed somewhat familiar to my ears. Surely I had heard them, or something like them, elsewhere in some quarter of the globe,—in freeborn civilized America. A brilliant thought struck me. I fixed my eyes steadily on an athletic negro, whom, from his scarred visage and the cockatoo's feather twisted in his woolly shock, I judged to be their chief, and pronounced emphatically the monosyllable

'Lynch!'

"The effect was electrical. In an instant the savages were grovelling at our feet, howling like demoniacs—'Fetish! Fetish! Lynch! Obeah! Fetish!'

"They seized us by the ancles—they licked the very dust off our shoes, they rubbed their heads and faces against our knees, they cut the withes that held us, and, finally, raising us by main force upon their shoulders, they marched off with us in triumph, singing a hideous Pœan, in which I recognised here and there a bar of 'Yankee Doodle.'

"Winding along by what I now ascertained was not a lagoon but a river, we skirted a clump of acacias, and came in sight of a cluster of mean-looking huts, more like enormous dirt patès, than anything else I know. Hordes of savages came rushing out of these, like bees, at the chorus of our conductors, and followed us into the principal square of the city, howling like a pack of hungry wolves, the finest music of which a savage seems to be capable. We had no idea whither they were hurrying us; but inferred, from their extreme courtesy, that they were either about to stick us up as idols in their chief temple, or to introduce us to their king. The latter seemed the more probable conjecture of the two, as we now observed a right royal-looking savage, seated at some distance in front of us, with a score or two of savage beef-eaters around him. 'Mellanee Bosh!' cried our conductors, as they shot us from their shoulders in front of the divan.

"We found his Royal Highness seated beneath a shed thatched over with palmetto leaves. His costume was a strange mixture of the savage and the civilized. On his head he wore a huge straw sombrero, similiar to that which distinguishes the Virginia planter. His legs were swathed in deerskin breeches, with a tasteful fringe of scalp-locks down the seams. A striped Jersey shirt completed his costume. His ornaments consisted of a flat golden ring looped through the cartilage of the nose, and a necklace of sausages curiously entwined in triple folds round his throat. Before him was a huge bowl, containing a mess of hippopotamus tripe, and the thighs of a cold roast monkey. A fire of dried cow-dung burned on a little altar beside him, near which lay a pipe, and a small stack of tobacco. A large bowie-knife was stuck in his belt of leopard's skin.

"His Majesty of Timbuctoo seemed rather young; and although his skin was as black as my boot, his eyes were of a lightish gray colour, and his hair had a tinge of brown. Neither were his features altogether African in their expression; for the nose was long and pointed, and the lips cleanly chiselled. We made our salaam with all due reverence to his Royal Highness, and I was about to speak, though with little hope of being understood, when the king, after staring at me for a moment, leaped upon his feet and exclaimed, 'Tarnal death to me, Duggins, don't you know me!'"

"Oh, come now, my dear Duggins," said I, "you're joking. You don't mean to say that it was——"

"Willis—the veritable Penciller, as I'm an author. Your surprise, I can assure you, is not greater than was mine."

"But Timbuctoo, how the deuce did he get there? And king too? This is really too absurd."

"Not a bit more so than anything I have been telling you for the last half-hour. He had gone out with the last unfortunate Niger expedition. There is nothing that our enterprising Penciller would not do for a subject. It went all to wreck, as you know. Willis, thanks to his robust frame and some experience as a traveller, bore up through agues, jaundice, and all the other pleasant things of that sort which form the staple commodity of the country. With matchless intrepidity he made his way to the metropolis, with his wallet laden with unsaleable copies of his "Melanie." His fine figure predisposed the ladies of the capital in his favour. And when he produced his books and sang to them, the Timbuctovians, who surpass the Turks or Red Indians in their reverence for printed paper and poetical talent, hailed him as an inspired prophet. Willis had a fine stirring tale about the revolt of the citizens, which ended in the overthrow of the reigning dynasty and his own elevation to the vacant harem. But, as he will no doubt publish it himself,—that is, if the Aerial ever reaches terra firma in safety—I need not go into the details."

"What! Did Willis come back with you in the Aerial."

"To be sure he did. 'Duggins!' said he to me, after we had fully explained to him how and by what conveyance we had arrived at his dominions, 'It's an everlasting fine thing, it is, to be a king, I can tell you; and I'll bet you a diamond to a sunbeam, there's not a happier monarch on airth, than myself. But the duties are very hard. They're killing me, that's a fact. Latet anguis in herba. And, if you've got a spare berth, I don't mind if I lay down the royal necklace, and accompany you home.'"

"I dare say we might make room for him," said Ainsworth, his eye lighting up at the happy thought. "The stoker, you know, poor fellow? He's cool enough by this time, I warrant. You see, Mr. Willis, he lost his balance and tumbled off the paddle-box, as we were crossing the Zahara: so, if you have no objections to take his place, perhaps Henson——"

"Oh, my dear fellow, I should be delighted," exclaimed Henson.

"Couldn't you make the cabin-boy stoker on the home-voyage? I'd take a spell at the slop-basins in his place," said the Timbuctovian sovereign imploringly.

"That, my dear Sir," broke in Jenkins, who was taking an inventory of the contents of the royal wigwam, "that is utterly impossible. I am the cabin-boy."

"Suppose we swop places, then, straunger: you stay here as king, and I go home as cabin-boy. It's an almighty sight better employment to be drinking arrack punch with your harem here, than chronicling small beer at home."

"Jenkins however would not be convinced; and Willis agreed to accept the vacant tongs and shovel, vice Ainsworth retired. The next thing was to manage to get away. The savages would never have allowed their beloved monarch to leave them. In fact, if his squaws, of whom he had fifteen—"

"No wonder than he wished to abdicate!" said I.

"If they had got the least hint of it, the Penciller would have found himself strewed 'by the way' in fifty pieces. He therefore summoned his subjects to the great square, and harangued them with some cock-and-bull story about our being servants of the great Lynch—"

"The great Lynch. You dont mean to say that he had made a god of that eminent judicial functionary of his native land?"

"To be sure he had. New dynasty, new religion! Willis had not read the history of Europe for nothing. Bless you, he had made these poor benighted heathens believe that Lynch held the scissors of fate—"

"And the scales of justice, I suppose."

"I can't swear as to that. But at all events, they believed that Lynch carried a wallet, out of which he scattered good and mischief among them, as a farmer's wife scatters corn among her chickens with one hand, while she brains an interloping magpie with the other. This explains the magic influence of the monosyllable upon them. But to return. He told them that we had been sent by the great Lynch to his kingdom on the wings of a large bird, and that he was about to ascend to this bird, and pluck a feather from its wing, which would be a protecting deity to them against the war-knives of their enemies ever after, —greater than even the mighty Mumbo Jumbo himself. The savages were in ecstasy, and accompanied us to the tree where we had left the Aerial, dancing and beating the tom-tom, and yelling fearful verses, in which the words 'Mellanee Bosh' and 'Juggleree Bam' were constantly recurring. The latter, Willis told me, bore reference to the Aerial Machine, and meant in the language of the country, 'The Great Hum or Mocking Bird.'

"We sent Henson up first to get everything in readiness, and Willis set his subjects to knocking down cockatoos with the boomerang, which they did with wonderful skill, for our amusement, till Henson rung the first bell for our start. We then scrambled up into the Aerial, pulled up the ladder, cut away the fastenings, swoop went the machine till it came to within twenty feet of the ground, when Henson lowered the tail, which knocked out the brains of some score or two of the Timbuctovians as it descended, and we once more soared majestically into the firmament.

"For the first day and night nothing particular occurred, except that we very nearly foundered upon one of the mountains of the Himalaya chain in a squall that took us suddenly as we were approaching them. Willis murmured and tarnal-deathed a good deal for the first four-and-twenty hours, and it cost us no slight trouble to keep him pacific. But as he found the marrow oozing rapidly from his bones on the second day, in his own classic language his skin wouldn't hold him. Henson had his hands so full with keeping the machine right, that he could do nothing to bring the Penciller under subjection. The weather, which had hitherto favoured us, with light steady breezes, became squally and tempestuous. Such bumping, pitching, shivering, crackling, straining, heaving, never mortal men were subjected to. We were reduced, Cruikshank, Ainsworth and myself—to the last stage of imbecility. I have not even a random recollection of what became of Jenkins. I suppose he swallowed one of the blacking bottles, and put an end to his misery. Sea sickness! I thought I had touched the abyss of human suffering, in crossing the Atlantic. There is a slough of despond far below that, as I now know. Sea sickness indeed!

"In the midst of these horrors Willis burst open the door of the engine-room, and rushed in among us, reeking like an artisan from Vulcan's stithy. He was wild, demoniac, uncontrollable. Frantically he snatched the spigot from a beer-barrel, and throwing himself upon the floor, caught in his gaping mouth the foaming, yellow tide as it gushed from the bung-hole; then sunk insensible, while the liquor spurted over him as he lay, like some river-god beside his source. I saw Cruikshank turn up his sickly yellow eyes at this desecration of the generous fluid. He would fain have asserted his rights as steward; but his eyes closed again, and he relapsed into a powerless stupor.

"Ainsworth was the first to recover, and it was well he did so. Our fire must otherwise have gone out, and then farewell to all our greatness. Good kind soul, he resumed his post as stoker, and behaved as if he had been bred to the profession. When Willis recovered, it was only to a state little short of insanity. Conceive the horror of being shut up in a flying-box with a maniac. Many and strange were his fancies, but he gave the preference to one, which turned upon the belief that it was necessary for his personal comfort, that he should have a gouging match with me. It was all that our sturdy friend Cruikshank could do, to keep him down. My blood runs cold at the remembrance of these dreadful hours.

"At length Willis dropped asleep. We were crossing Mont Blanc at the time—and I resolved, come what might, that I should be out of the infernal machine. I remembered the fate of poor Cocking and his parachute. But it was better to die at once, than die fifty times in one day, with the almost certainty of making a final exit at night. Henson had a relay of parachutes, made upon the most scientific principles; and I might be as fortunate as Lunardi and Montgolfier had been in similar descents. So with the help of Ainsworth and Cruikshank, I got one of them rigged out—embraced my friends affectionately—got into it—and you know the rest. Catch me trying to again, and I'll make you a present of all my copyrights."

'Ride the whirlwind, and direct the storm'

"A sensible resolution, my good fellow. But it wears late; and as we are to start for Mayence at five to-morrow morning, we'd better turn in for the night. Good-night, and a sound sleep to you. —And, Duggins, no dreaming, mind you! No more FLIGHTS IN THE AERIAL!"

MUNICH, 20*th April*, 1843.

THE AFFGHAN WAR, AND LADY SALE'S JOURNAL.*

THE annals of British warfare contain no chapter more painful and humiliating than that which records the beleaguerment of the invading army by the Affghans at Cabul, its final expulsion, disastrous retreat, and utter annihilation. While all else was lost, honour was not saved. For the first time, irredeemable disgrace to a British army was combined with its destruction. A cause unjustifiable in its origin, met with the signal discomfiture which, in the eye of impartial justice, it seemed to deserve; but not without inflicting upon thousands of innocent victims an amount of suffering at which humanity recoils. The more recent brilliant achievements of our troops in Affghanistan can no more blot out the memory of the past, than recall to life those whose bones lie bleaching in the mountain passes and ravines of that fatal region. It is poor consolation to be told by the Governor-General of India that "in one short campaign our soldiers have avenged our late disasters upon every scene of past misfortune:"—a vindictive boast, as unwise as it is unchristian,—those scenes of plunder, carnage, and "vengeance" being, to a reflecting mind, as revolting as the miseries which preceded them.

The best account that has yet appeared of the disastrous events at Cabul, and their melancholy termination in the destruction of the British force during the retreat, is indubitably that of Lieutenant Eyre, an intelligent artillery officer, who was a deeply-interested eye-witness of the scenes which he depicts at the breaking out of the insurrection in Cabul; and who afterwards shared in that captivity which excited more interest in the mother-country than all the other events of the war. His narrative is corroborated and amplified by communications from those of his brother officers who were personally engaged in the several affairs which they describe.

The Journal of Lady Sale is also remarkable from the deep interest of the events and the character of the writer; a woman of a bold and decided spirit, who nobly sustained a part to which her sex is generally deemed quite unequal. In her private Journal Lady Sale has allowed herself a freedom of discussion and remark on matters which are supposed to lie beyond a woman's province, which her more restrained fellow-journalist, Lieutenant Eyre, has not assumed. Yet the question is not, Has a man or a woman, a soldier or a civilian, said these severe things, passed these stern judgments, expressed this bitter contempt, but are their opinions just or unjust? Lady Sale's impatience of feebleness and supineness, her quick womanly indignation, and avowed contempt of the capacity and conduct of the persons acting within the range of her keen observation, whether in every instance deserved or not, are at least as fearlessly expressed as they appear to have been sincerely felt. It is, without a joke, to be regretted that Lady Sale was not a member of those councils whose feebleness and vacillation she alternately deplores and contemns, or that she, a woman, had not been, for a few memorable days, the sole British power, political and military, at Cabul. She had at least undaunted resolution and a proud sense of honour; and the judgment of any single individual must have been better, and could not have been worse than the discordant opinions, conflicting interests, and feeble action or utter supineness which marked every act, from the breaking out of the revolt at Cabul on the 2d November, until the bloody tragedy was consummated at Gundamuck on the 13th of January by the sacrifice of the last man of the British force!—the last—for we do not reckon the captives or the sick left at Cabul—the last, with the solitary exception of Dr. Brydon; who alone, and by a sort of miracle, escaped to tell his countrymen at Jellalabad the dismal tale. Long before the final catastrophe, Lady Sale states in her Journal, along with many other of the reported threats of the notorious Mahommed Akbar Khan,—the evil genius of the English army, though he must be regarded by his countrymen as the saviour of his own land,—that he had said, the invaders, the Kafirs, the Infidels, should be destroyed all but one man; who, with his arms and legs hacked off, should be left sitting in the pass, with a letter, as a warning to the Feringee never again to approach Affghanistan. The prognostication was but too literally fulfilled.

It was by a fortunate chance, or rather act of forethought, that Lady Sale preserved the Notes before us, which are printed exactly as they were hurriedly written from day to day, and while the exciting events described were passing. This is perhaps the most satisfactory way to the public in which they could appear. The real facts are got at, the whole truth, as apprehended by the Journalist, and jotted down on the spur of the moment; and this often under circumstances of trial which might have unfitted either man or woman of ordinary stamp for the task. On the dismal winter morning when the retreat of the troops commenced, Lady Sale put her papers into a bag which she tied round her waist; and though her whole baggage was lost in the course of that same terrible day, the Notes were fortunately preserved, and retained during all the subsequent adventures of her rambling captivity. It had been intended that the Notes should be worked up by her son-in-law and fellow-sufferer, Captain Sturt; and improved by the valuable information which he could have furnished. This is another loss to the world from the melancholy fate of this accomplished and lamented officer; one of the most regretted victims of the retreat.——If Lady Sale's book had been dressed up for publication, it is probable that a few statements might have been softened, and some things omitted altogether; but, upon the whole,

* I. A Journal of the Disasters in Affghanistan in 1841-2. By Lady Sale. Post 8vo. London: John Murray.

II. The Military Operations at Cabul, which ended in the Destruction of the British Army, January 1842. With a Journal of Imprisonment in Affghanistan. By Lieutenant Vincent Eyre. Post 8vo. London: John Murray.

the Journal is quite as valuable in its unpruned condition. It is, among other causes, most valuable, as it illustrates and corroborates the honest, clear, candid, and wonderfully-temperate narrative of Lieutenant Eyre. If, however, it should be thought that Lady Sale is too harsh in her judgments, too severe in her sarcasm, it must also be borne in mind that she wrote during the excitement of the hour, while suffering and seeing those most dear to her about to become victims of the imbecility which she denounced, and the honour of the British name tarnished from the same causes. Lieutenant Eyre has also been blamed for the freedom and rashness of his judgment of the conduct of several individuals, civil and military, dead and alive; yet his narrative was leisurely reconsidered. Its sincerity and frankness, in our opinion, redounds greatly to his honour. We could not wish one word either softened or withdrawn.

Without a previous knowledge of Lieutenant Eyre's narrative, Lady Sale's Journal will, in many places, be barely intelligible to those not intimately acquainted with the history of the British invasion of Affghanistan, and occupation of the capital. She starts at once from the heady current of those agitating events which led to the treaty with the chiefs and the retreat from Cabul, and finally to the evacuation of a country into which the British force was sent without any honest business, and found more than enough to do. Both Journals have not only an intense temporary interest, but will remain to future times one of the most affecting pictures of extreme suffering, originating in gross incapacity and seeming infatuation, which the history of civilized warfare affords. The retreat of the French army from Russia, was one of the most horrible catastrophes that was ever acted on the face of the globe; yet, though on a scale of much greater magnitude, that tragedy possesses less concentrated interest, less individuality, than the calamity of Cabul. Delicate and helpless women, young children and tender infants, all of them known to many of us, either by name or connexion, did not swell and complicate the misery of the French retreat. That Pass of Death through which the betrayed and perishing British army struggled, in those dreadful days, must henceforth remain, to the English nation, one of the most memorable spots on the face of the earth. In more than one place, Lady Sale asserts, that, had this and the other thing been done, which she points out, the retreat might have been as glorious as that of the Ten Thousand; instead of which it must remain a monument——; but we forbear.——Moore's retreat to Corunna, an event of the present day, was attended with great loss, and the extreme of suffering; but it was redeemed by many deeds of gallantry and intrepidity, and ended gloriously. Many traits of individual heroism and devotion also illustrate the dreary darkness of the Cabul retreat.

Before introducing Lady Sale's Journal to our readers, it may be useful to recapitulate the leading circumstances in our relations with Affghanistan, which had placed the army in so difficult a position.

Towards the end of 1838, by a measure of very questionable policy, which is still the subject of angry dispute and recrimination, both in England and India, Lord Auckland, the Governor-General, having decreed that Affghanistan should be invaded and conquered, Dost Mahommed, its acknowledged sovereign, expelled, and Shah Soojah set up as king,—restored,—issued his celebrated proclamation. If there were strong doubts entertained of the mere policy of this aggression, the alleged reasons for which were partly commercial, and partly political, there could be none about the injustice of an uncalled-for interference, and unprovoked attack upon a distant nation that had given the British no substantial cause of either offence or reasonable apprehension. But Affghanistan was alleged to be influenced by Persia, which, again, was either favourable or subservient to Russian interests and ambitions; and the Anglo-Indian government was bound to act with promptitude.

The invasion, or conquest of Affghanistan, was not undertaken on the pure principle of supporting "legitimacy;" but it so happened that the cause of "legitimacy" chanced to square with those purposes and objects of the Anglo-Indian government; for which the mother country was to suffer in her honour and her treasure. The Governor-General deemed it expedient to set up or restore, in Shah Soojah, a pensioned and puppet sovereign, who was expected to remain the subservient instrument of Anglo-Indian interests, rather than the independent sovereign of Affghanistan, and ally of Great Britain:—another Company's King, in short; at best, another Nizam. The hopeful project, and the individual that was to assist in carrying it out, were alike obnoxious to the chiefs and people of Affghanistan, as the issue has amply proved. Shah Soojah was personally detested by the people and the chiefs; and it did not raise him in their favour that he returned from exile leading an invading army into the country of which he claimed the sovereignty. His claim to the throne did not seem the more powerful in their eyes that it was backed by foreign guns and bayonets—that his path was paved by the gold and intrigues of the Feringee. We do not mean here, however, to investigate the justice or policy of the invasion of Affghanistan, but merely to advert to those difficulties which ought to have been foreseen and calculated upon by the government at Calcutta, and which rendered it next to impossible that we could retain the country for Shah Soojah, even if it were subdued. It was no easy task to conquer Affghanistan; in fact it never was subdued, much less tranquillized; but to keep it in peace was impossible. It is evacuated; and on quite other considerations than those of pure justice, or the desire to atone for a great moral error. To invade a country, which nature itself has strongly fortified, and which was inhabited by numerous tribes of brave, high-spirited, and turbulent people, holding the faith of Islam; and in expelling Dost Mahommed, who, whatever were his character or claims, was the only supreme chief whom the Affghans acknowledged, to set up our minion, whom they despised and detested, was the first great act of injustice and infatuation of which all that followed was but the natural consequence. The destruction of our army, and all the attendant crimes, miseries, and shames of that disastrous period, have not so warped the natural feelings of justice in men's minds, but that the people of this country still sympathize in the enthusiastic patriotism and determined resistance of the Affghan tribes. Had those distant people been Spaniards, Prussians, or Tyrolese, and their invader Napoleon, how warmly would the patriotic sympathies of the English nation have been enlisted in the struggle of the brave people who rose simultaneously as one man to expel and take fearful vengeance on the invader. The Scots at Bannockburn had not a better national cause than the Affghans; and deeply stained as their resistance has been with acts of cruelty and even treachery, they should be judged by their own code of morals, by their own customs, and not by our standard of right. If ever speedy retribution was seen to follow a great folly and a great crime, it is beheld in the fatal consequences of the invasion of Affghanistan.——But it is with the deplorable results we have to do, and not at present with their causes. By fraud, force, intrigue, bribery, and all the arts, good and bad, long familiar to Indian diplomacy, in which the end has too often been held to justify the means, Affghanistan was conquered. Dost Mahommed and his family, now captives, had taken the place of the former royal exile, Shah Soojah, who now reigned in the Bala Hissar, the royal citadel of Cabul. It will be remembered that the wives and family of the Dost had taken the protection of the English, and that he subsequently gave himself up to the British Envoy in somewhat the chivalrous style of Napoleon Buonaparte. But although Affghanistan was overrun, and Dost Mahommed a captive, the country was far from being tranquil. Revolts were continually breaking out on every side; and although the chiefs were often divided by their personal interests and animosities, they were found firmly united against the Feringee, and bided their time. Dr. Atkinson, a strenuous partisan of the restored King, Shah Soojah, and a zealous defender of the policy of Lord Auckland,—a man moreover strongly influenced by prejudices of all kinds, both tells and admits how hateful British interference was to the Affghan tribes, and how much detested and despised was the puppet King set up. Their fidelity to their country, to their religion, and to the Dost, is proved even by the blackest acts of their treachery to the British. When Shah Soojah was advancing under the protection of the British, Jubbar Khan, one of the brothers of the Dost, in presence of the officials in the British camp, haughtily addressed him: "If you are to be King, of what use is the British army here? If the English are to rule our country, of what use are you?" This was plain sense. Dost Mahommed, after he had surrendered himself at Cabul to the Envoy, Sir William M'Naughten, recommended the English to take the dominion of the country into their own hands. They would find, he said, the very courtiers of the Shah, who had been fattening on their bounty, plotting against them. And so they did, with the Shah himself, it is said, added to the number. But treachery to Shah Soojah was not half so apparent as a devoted national feeling, and a clannish fidelity to the Dost. "You'll seize my country, will you?" was the taunting question of Mahommed Akbar Khan to the English in his hour of triumph at Cabul. "Wait," said Mihrab Khan, a powerful chief, able to bring 12,000 men into the field, "wait till sickness overtakes your troops, till they are exhausted with fatigue from long and harassing marches, and from the total want of supplies—wait till they have drank of many waters; and wait too till they taste the sharpness of Affghan swords." This was said at a conference with Sir Alexander Burnes, when the army was triumphantly advancing to Candahar, where Shah Soojah was soon afterwards solemnly installed. Though many of the chiefs, moved by the money-power, or compelled by stern necessity, gave a sullen acquiescence, there were few upon that occasion to cry, "God save him."

To those who would acquire an accurate knowledge of the national character and political and social condition of the tribes of Affghanistan, we would, instead of any late narrative, recommend the writings of Mr. Elphinstone. The chiefs greatly resemble the warlike, turbulent, and independent nobles of Scotland, the heads of great houses and of clans, during the tumultuary reigns of the princes of the family of Stuart. The government is patriarchal. Every chief is a petty sovereign in his own territory; and the king, little more than a nominal head, has small power, save in a few cities and commercial communities. For the king of a people of this character, Shah Soojah was in every way ill adapted; although he had not been liable to the foul imputation of having led a foreign invader into the country, with which he was sometimes haughtily taunted. Of the Shah, Dr. Atkinson, one of his warmest admirers—at least in those days—says, "Royalism is his rooted passion, and in etiquette, on public occasions, he is inflexible; for even when he was an exile, and our pensioner at Loodianah, ensconced in a corner on his throne, and playing the king there, he would not allow the Political Agent to sit in his presence; and now even the Envoy and the minister is placed under the same prohibition." This sort of assumption was peculiarly disgusting to the fierce, proud, and independent Affghan chiefs. In conversation, the Shah, instead of employing the first person singular I, spoke of "our royal self," as thinking or doing that or the other; and instead of using the third person, he spoke of himself as Sirkar, (the Government,)—"Sirkar heard, or did, or decreed this and the other." He was as much detested by the chiefs for his cold-blooded cruelty, as despised for egotism and vain-glory; though his greatest crime, in their eyes, was betraying his country. Lady Sale speaks of Lord Auckland's king with great freedom; and many a page of the interesting narrative of Troop Serjeant-Major Taylor proves the detestation in which the Shah, and his foreign infidel allies, were held by the people. We give from Taylor one instance out of many—monarch. There is a poetical superstition that approaching events are often foreshadowed, and the circumstance to which I allude seemed to impress every man's mind at the time with the result that has since happened.

The majority of the prisoners who fell into our hands were released on condition of their serving in the Shah's army, but there remained about thirty who refused to accept of their liberty on such terms. They consisted for the most part of the immediate followers of Dost Mahommed's father-in-law, and were devotedly attached to that prince. The Shah, on learning the circumstance, ordered them to be brought before him, and expostulated with them on the folly of their conduct. A Chief of haughty bearing stepped from amongst the prisoners, and after overwhelming his Majesty with reproaches, told him that nothing should induce him to enter the service of a man who had brought the horrors of foreign invasion on his country. Then suddenly snatching a dagger from one of the attendants, he rushed with uplifted arm towards the Shah, and would have pierced him to the heart had not one of his Majesty's servants interposed his person, and received the blow intended for his master. The faithful domestic fell dead at the feet of the Shah, and the officers and attendants instantly rushed towards the assassin with drawn swords; but he had already anticipated their intention by plunging the poniard in his breast. The Shah, alarmed and exasperated, ordered the whole of the prisoners to be immediately executed; and in a few minutes their heads were rolling in the dust.

Shortly after the Shah had been reinstated, the following circumstance occurred. It is strongly illustrative of the personal bravery of the Affghan guerillas.

Two of the marauders fell into our hands. In order to put an end to, or diminish these vexatious losses, it was determined to make a terrible example of the prisoners, in the hope that it would have some effect upon their companions. They were accordingly tried by a court-martial, composed of native officers, and sentenced to be blown from the mouth of a gun. Having been led into the market-place at Candahar, they were ordered to draw lots as to who should first undergo this dreadful doom. The younger of the prisoners, a stripling of about nineteen years of age, whose firm and gallant bearing excited universal sympathy and admiration, responded to this command by at once embracing the mouth of the gun, from which he was instantly blown to atoms. His companion, a grey-headed man, upwards of sixty years of age, sat looking on, unmoved at this terrible scene, and coolly smoking his hookah. On being ordered to take his place at the gun, he did not exhibit the least appearance of fear; and just as the match was about being applied, the officer in command arrested it and directed the prisoner to be taken away, the Shah influenced, it is said, by the entreaties of Sir Alexander Burnes, having granted his pardon. This unexpected release from the very jaws of death produced as little emotion on the part of this stout old man, as its near approach or the fate of his youthful companion had elicited.

Another wholesale execution or butchery committed by the Shah, which forcibly displays the spirit of the people, occurred shortly after the Restoration; and to eyes of wisdom might, with hundreds of concurring circumstances, have foreshown what the king and his European allies had to look for. The case is related by Dr. Atkinson.

Several prisoners were taken, but upon their declaring that they had been forced into the enemy's ranks, they were released by the Shah. In the afternoon, however, others were brought in, thirty-eight in number, and shown to be, on sufficient evidence, of most atrocious character, and his majesty was determined to make an example of them all, by having them beheaded on the spot. They had been captured whilst fighting against the Shah's troops; and when led before his majesty, they bitterly denounced him as an infidel, who had brought an army of infidels to pillage and destroy their country, and they only longed for the opportunity to put his majesty himself to death. The ferocity of one of them was carried to such an extreme degree, that, in the presence of the Shah, he struck a dagger into the breast of one of his personal attendants. The Envoy, on being informed of the determination of the Shah, suggested that, instead of putting so many to death, a selection might be made, and immediately communicated the circumstance to Sir John Keane, through Sir Alexander Burnes. His Excellency's opinion was, that the most summary example should be made of all such dastardly ruffians. They were known to be robbers and murderers, and to have been among those who committed such inhuman excesses on our line of march.

The number of prisoners of war put to death on this occasion has been stated so high as sixty. Dr. Atkinson not only thinks their execution quite justifiable, but states that the opinion in the British camp was, that the king had, on many occasions, been "merciful to a fault." The opinion we should imagine a solitary one. Shah Soojah, under the influence of selfish fears, might have shown weakness; but seldom even that kind of mercy which is sound policy.

Lady Sale, though she may think the Affghans unreasonable and even culpable in their hatred of the British, and their refractoriness to our rule, bears testimony to the sincerity and strength of their detestation. On the retreat, while the chiefs, in terms of the treaty, rode with the army to protect it through the passes, usually riding with the advance, and exposed to the fire of their countrymen who lined the heights, and kept up a perpetual and galling fire, she remarks—

They certainly desired their followers to shout to the people on the height not to fire: they did so, but quite ineffectually. These chiefs certainly ran the same risk we did; but I verily believe many of these persons would individually sacrifice themselves to rid their country of us.

This was carrying patriotism, or dislike of invaders, very far. Even the powerful Mahommed Akbar Khan, while apparently anxious to keep faith, was unable to restrain the vengeance of the petty chiefs. At a conference of chiefs and English officers, held to devise means for protecting the miserable residue of the army on the last day of its march through the passes to Gundamuck, we are told by Lady Sale—

The chiefs of the Pass sat down to discuss affairs. They were bitter in their hatred towards us; and declared that nothing would satisfy them and their men, but our extermination. Money they would not receive. The Sirdar, as far as words could prove his sincerity, did all in his power to conciliate them; and, when all other arguments failed, reminded them that his father and family were in the power of the British government at Loodianah; and that vengeance would be taken on the latter if mercy were not shown to the British in their power. . . . . Until 12 o'clock crowds of Ghilzyes with their respective chiefs, continued to pour in from the surrounding country to make their salaams to Mahommed Akbar Khan, to participate in the plunder of our unfortunate people, and to revel in the massacre of the Europeans. From their expressions of hatred towards our whole race, they appeared to anticipate more delight in cutting our throats than in the expected booty. . . In two instances, the reply of the chiefs [to Akbar] was, —"When Burnes came into this country, was not your father entreated by us to kill him; or he would go back to Hindostan, and at some future day bring an army and take our country from us? He would not listen to our advice, and what is the consequence? Let us now, that we have the opportunity, take advantage of it; and kill those infidel dogs."

And this was the people whom, according to Lady Sale, it was Lord Auckland's pleasure to decree to be in a state of tranquillity! submitting so peacefully to the rule of the restored king, that it was contemplated gradually to withdraw the British force sent to establish and protect him; and which now, besides its cantonments near the capital of Cabul, occupied all the important places in the country, Jellalabad, Candahar, Ghuznee, and other fortresses. The hardy and warlike tribes of the mountains were represented as having resigned the hopeless struggle. The few parties that infested the passes, and annoyed the troops on their marches, were described as predatory bands, whose only object was plunder. The league of the chiefs had been broken up by the address of the Political Agents * that swarmed in Affghanistan; that were indeed to be found at that time in every corner of the country; and the chiefs themselves were bound to their good behaviour by having been subsidized. Up to the autumn of 1841, it was believed, or pretended to be believed, that a moral and political miracle had been worked at the pleasure of the Anglo-Indian Government; and that in eighteen months, a hostile people, inflamed by religious fanaticism, patriotic pride, and the thirst of vengeance, had been not merely subdued, but conciliated. Nothing could be more fallacious. It is only astonishing that men of average understanding, acquainted with the usual course of human events, could, in the face of all probability and of numerous indications, have allowed themselves to be so fatally deceived. Lady Sale, who is frank enough in imputing motives, gives a clue to the prevalent delusion; prevalent among those who should have been the most clear-sighted, for others were not deceived. Those who, like Sir William M'Naughten, the Envoy at the Court of Shah Soojah, had originally approved of the objects of the invasion, naturally desired to witness the success of their own policy. But besides this motive, Sir William had just been appointed Governor of Bombay, and wished to withdraw in peace and honour from his present onerous duties; and Sir Alexander Burnes, his Assistant, it is alleged, desired and rather eagerly expected to succeed to the Envoy's appointment. Thus all tried to believe what they longed to find true. From the day that the formidable Dost Mahommed had given himself up, it was fondly imagined that tranquillity was ensured. But men, nay even Affghans, wild, lawless, predatory mountaineers, are not stocks and stones. Their whole passions, prejudices, and affections cannot be changed in a day; and they had various motives, for although they had harassed the invader, they had themselves suffered severely from the war which they had not provoked. Many were now fugitives, their families scattered, their property destroyed, driven from house and home. Present distress aggravated their bitter feelings of hostility; and even in Cabul, which the presence of the English had enriched by a lavish expenditure, the invaders were hated. The priesthood and the chiefs studied to inflame the deep-rooted feelings and prejudices of the people; and patriotism, a wild religious fanaticism, the lust of plunder, and the thirst of vengeance, were thus combined in one headlong passion. In a single day, according to Lieutenant Eyre, the fact burst upon the English like a thunderbolt, that they "had not one friend among the whole Affghan nation." And this is true with the exception of those that had been bought and corrupted. While such was the state of popular feeling, the stipends of the chiefs above referred to, were capriciously withdrawn. The state of things is thus described by Lady Sale in her Journal, towards the end of September, 1841, and shortly before the revolt.

Whilst these events were going on, disturbances had broken out near Cabul, where much had occurred to incite the chiefs to rise. In former times, under the feudal system, when the sovereign of Cabul required troops, each bold chieftain came forward with his retainers; but these vassals had been taken from them, and were embodied in corps commanded by British officers, to whom they owed no affection, and only paid a forced obedience, whilst their hearts were with their national religion; their chief's power was now greatly limited, and the chouk guaranteed to them was withheld on the plea that the Company had commanded retrenchments. But the saving required by Government was a curtailment of those expenses which were defrayed by its own rupees, whereas the 40,000 rupees now the subject of dispute were, in fact, no saving at all to us, as that money was never paid by the Company, but was the chouk or money excused to the chiefs out of the revenue or dues owing to the King, on condition of their enforcing the submission of the petty chiefs and the payment of their rents. This sum, whether paid to Shah Soojah or not, would never have replenished the Hon. Company's coffers; and by upholding the Shah in such an act of aggression, we compromised our faith, and caused a pretty general insurrection, said to be headed by Meer Musjude. The Kohistanee chiefs are urged on by the Dooranee Chiefs in Cabul, and all the country about Tézeen and Bhoodkhak is in a state of revolt. It is only wonderful this did not take place sooner.

The same circumstances are thus alluded to by Lieutenant Eyre, after he mentions the return of Captain Hay from the Zoormut valley, upon which expedition many of the forts of the chiefs, where every house is a fort, had been stormed, their property destroyed, and their families driven out destitute to brave the severity of the winter.

Three Giljye chiefs of note suddenly quitted Cabul, after plundering a rich Cafila at Tézeen, and took up a strong position in the difficult defile of Khoord-Cabul, about ten miles from the capital, thus blocking up the pass, and cutting off our communication with Hindostan. Intelligence had not very long previously been received that Mahommed Akbar Khan, second son of the ex-ruler Dost Mahommed Khan, had arrived at Bameean from Khooloom for the supposed purpose of carrying on intrigues against the government. . . . . Mahommed Akbar had, since the deposition of his father, never ceased to foster feelings of intense hatred towards the English nation; and, though often urged by the fallen ruler to deliver himself up, had resolutely preferred the life of a houseless exile to one of mean dependence on the bounty of his enemies. It seems therefore in the highest degree probable that this hostile movement on the part of the Eastern Giljyes was the result of his influence over them, combined with other causes which will be hereafter mentioned.

Mahommed Akbar Khan was henceforth to exercise a fearful influence over the fortunes of the English in Cabul. So completely had the apprehensions of Sir William M'Naughten, Sir Alexander Burnes, and others of the political agents been lulled, that the army, as soon as the season permitted, was to return to India; and General Sale had already marched for Jellalabad, where his brigade was to lie for the winter in camp, and, as was anticipated, unmolested. The advance had not many miles left Cabul when it was attacked by what are indiscriminately termed either rebels or robbers. They were in fact Guerilla bands of the same character as those that had so constantly harassed the British in their long, weary, and worse than fruitless advance into Affghanistan; watching the passes, lurking in ambush in every ravine, crowning the heights, and by their rifles or their murderous knives, destroying many lives, carrying off camels and horses, arms, ammunition, and stores, intercepting the daks or mails, and cutting off all communication between our posts; actively employing, in brief, every art of annoyance and destruction, until they had fairly seen the last of the force of Cabul annihilated at Gundamuck. The attack on Sir Robert Sale's troops was another symptom which ought to have helped to open the eyes of the Politicals, as the Indians term the Envoys and their coadjutors. But they were blinded and doomed men. Meanwhile the treachery, as it is styled, of the chiefs, or their defection from Shah Soojah and the British, to whom they had submitted only from necessity, became more apparent every day; and the violence of the people could no longer be restrained. There have been warm home disputes as to whether any "conspiracy," any league among the chiefs, really existed at this time. There can be no question that the rising was simultaneous in different and distant places, the time well chosen, in the depth of winter, and the elements of rebellion and hostility rife. From his remote outpost in Khohistan, the highland region of the province, Major Pottinger sagaciously foresaw the approach of the storm, and gave warning. But while many intelligent officers concurred in his opinion, and believed an increased force absolutely necessary for the safety of the army, the authorities at Cabul pertinaciously kept their eyes close.

Towards the breaking out of the insurrection, the English officers began to be insulted as often as they were seen beyond their forts or the walls of the cantonments; and attempts were from time to time made to assassinate them, which in some instances succeeded. Two Europeans and several camp-followers were murdered in October; but this was imputed to private revenge, or to the wild spirit of a reckless people, who universally carry arms,—and no inquiry was made. It was still thought prudent "to let sleeping dogs lie." The dogs were about to rouse themselves of their own accord. At the end of October, Lieutenant Eyre writes—

By this time it was too evident that the whole of the Eastern Giljyes had risen in one common league against us. Their governor, or viceroy, Humza Khan, had, in the interval, gone forth under pretence of bringing back the chiefs to their allegiance; on his return, however, which took place nearly at the time at which General Sale marched from Khoord-Cabul, the treacherous nature of his proceedings had been discovered, and he was placed by the Shah in confinement: he was suspected, indeed, before. . . . .

The two great leaders of the rebellion were Ameenoollah Khan, the chief of Logur, and Abdoollah Khan, Achukzye, a chief of great influence, and possessing a large portion of the Pisheen valley.

Ameenoollah Khan had hitherto been considered one of the stanchest friends of the existing government; and such was the confidence placed in him by the wuzeer, that he had selected him to take charge of Humza Khan, the lately superseded governor of the Giljyes, as a prisoner to Ghuznee. This man now distinguished himself as one of our most inveterate enemies. To illustrate the character of his coadjutor, Abdoollah Khan, it will be sufficient to relate the following anecdote:—In order to get rid of his elder brother, who stood between him and the inheritance, he caused him to be seized and buried up to the chin in the earth. A rope was then fastened round his neck, and to the end of it was haltered a wild horse: the animal was then driven round in a circle, until the unhappy victim's head was twisted from his shoulders. This same man is also mentioned in terms of just abhorrence by Captain A. Connolly in his Travels.

But though the two above-named chiefs took a leading part in the rebellion, there can be little doubt that it had its origin in the deep offence given to the Giljyes by the ill-advised reduction of their annual stipends.

The heroic and resolute spirit of the tribe thus capriciously treated is seen in the following trait:—

When oppressed by Nadir Shah, the Giljye tribes, rather than succumb to the tyrant's will, took refuge in the mountains amidst the snow, where, with their families, they fed for months on roots alone: of these they sent a handful to Nadir, with the message, that, so long as such roots could be procured, they would continue to resist his tyranny. Such were many of the men now leagued together by one common feeling of hatred against us.

The immediate cause of the outbreak in Cabul on the 2d November is stated, in a memorandum made by the Envoy, to have been an artful letter written by Abdoollah Khan to several influential chiefs in Cabul, asserting that they were all to be seized and sent to London! It was also, in a forged proclamation, pretended that the King, Shah Soojah, had issued an order, that all the Infidels should be put to death. The chiefs relied, in issuing these fabrications, if they ever were issued, upon the inflammable feelings of the people of Cabul. "A fearfully severe lesson," says Lieutenant Eyre, in reference to the Envoy's scepticism, "was necessary to remove the veil from the eyes of those who, drawing their conclusions from their wishes, would consider Affghanistan as a settled country." And the "fearful lesson" came but too soon. "It seemed," says Lieutenant Eyre on another occasion, "that we were under the ban of Heaven. . . . . Madness was equally apparent in all that was done, or left undone." Ten days before the final outbreak, Lady Sale enters in her Journal—

The Envoy was some time since warned by three Affghans not to ride so early in the morning or so late in the evening as was his wont; but, whether from policy or natural fearlessness, he has not attended to their advice. The Akhoonzadah has also told him that three men have sworn on the Koran to take his life. The people of Tagow and Lughman are leagued with those of Tézeen.

On the following day her Ladyship states:—

The general impression is, that the Envoy is trying to deceive himself into an assurance that the country is in a quiescent state. He has a difficult part to play, without sufficient moral courage to stem the current singly.

She then expatiates on the folly of Sir William M'Naughten in having yielded to the entreaties of Sir A. Burnes, ("who appears to have been blinded on the subject,") and who nullified the request he had made to the Governor-general for five additional regiments. Lieutenant Eyre states, that no additional force that could be sent would have enabled them to retain Affghanistan. But it might have saved the Army. Great stress was at this time laid upon the hostages which the chiefs had given us; but, as Lady Sale shrewdly remarks, they knew the British character, and they also knew that the Dost's family were safely and honourably treated, even when the father and son were in arms against us. In the meanwhile, the 40,000 rupees that the quarrel began about—money being the root of all evil—were again promised to the petty chiefs, who had, however, indemnified themselves for their loss by plunder; so that, says Lady Sale—

We leave off where we set out, barring our killed and wounded, expense, loss of ammunition and baggage, and annoyance of the detention, if not loss of our dâks, bhanghys, &c.

October 27th.—I hear that Macgregor writes to the Envoy that the country about Tézeen never was in so tranquil a state as it is at present! Now, with a little variation in the wording, he might have cautiously written to the Envoy, so as to be understood by him alone, and have intimated that the country was now as quiet as it ever was; which, to those who know the wild tribes thereabouts located, indicates anything but a state of pacification. . . . . Macgregor writes that he suspects the chiefs are at the bottom of all the plundering and attacks on our force, though they profess to have nothing to do with it, and that the depredators are the robber-tribes. . . . . Mr. Melville was attacked last evening, but set spurs to his horse and galloped off, on which the Affghans set up a shout; this is the fourth attempt on the part of the Affghans to assassinate British officers within a short time. I before mentioned Mr. Mayne's escape; Dr. Metcalfe was also nearly cut down; and Lieut. Waller, of the Artillery, was wounded on the head whilst riding close to the Siah Sung camp.

This was Shah Soojah's camp. Three days afterwards, another attack on the troops on their march for Jellalabad was announced, in which a part of them had been panic-struck, and considerable loss of life, baggage, and camels sustained; and on the 2d November, the insurrection fairly broke out in Cabul in a form that could not longer be trifled with. Yet Sir A. Burnes, the first victim, still fatally mistook its character, and also probably over-rated his personal influence. On that memorable morning, all the shops were shut; and a general attack was made on the houses of the English who lived in the city. On this day, Lady Sale writes—

This morning, early, all was in commotion in Cabul; the shops were plundered, and the people were all fighting. Our Affghan servant, Mahomed Ali, who used to sleep in the city, when he passed out to come to my house in the morning was threatened, and reviled as the chuprassy of the Feringhee General, who, they asserted, had been beaten at Tézeen, and that all his troops had run away, and he with them!

The Shah resides in the Bala Hissar, and his guns from that fortress were constantly firing; the Affghans in the city were doing the same from six in the morning. Captain Sturt hearing that Captain Johnson's (paymaster to the Shah's force) house and treasury in the city were attacked, as also Sir Alexander Burnes's, went to General Elphinstone, who sent him with an important message, first to Brigadier Shelton at Siah Sung, and afterwards to the King to concert with them measures for the defence of that fortress. Just as he entered the precincts of the palace, he was stabbed in three places by a young man well dressed, who escaped into a building close by, where he was protected by the gates being shut. Fortunately for my son-in-law, Captain Lawrence had been sent to the King by the Envoy, and he kindly procured a palkee, and sent Sturt home with a strong guard of fifty lancers, but they were obliged to make a long detour by Siah Sung. In the meantime, Lawrence came to tell me all that had passed, and to break the bad news to my daughter, Mrs. Sturt.

About 8 A. M. a hurried note was received by the Envoy, in cantonments, from Sir Alexander Burnes, stating that the minds of the people had been strongly excited by some mischievous reports, but expressing a hope that he should succeed in quelling the commotion. About 9 A. M., however, a rumour was circulated, which afterwards proved but too well-founded, that Sir Alexander had been murdered, and Captain Johnson's treasury plundered. Flames were now seen to issue from that part of the city where they dwelt; and it was too apparent that the endeavour to appease the people by quiet means had failed, and that it would be necessary to have recourse to stronger measures. The report of fire-arms was incessant, and seemed to extend through the town from end to end. . . . .

Widely spread and formidable as this insurrection proved to be afterwards, it was at first a mere insignificant ebullition of discontent on the part of a few desperate and restless men, which military energy and promptitude ought to have crushed in the bud. Its commencement was an attack by certainly not 300 men on the dwellings of Sir Alexander Burnes and Captain Johnson, paymaster to the Shah's force; and so little did Sir Alexander himself apprehend serious consequences, that he not only refused, on its first breaking out, to comply with the earnest entreaties of the wuzeer to accompany him to the Bala Hissar, but actually forbade his guard to fire on the assailants, attempting to check what he supposed to be a mere riot, by haranguing the attacking party from the gallery of his house.

This unfortunate gentleman apparently forgot that it was not the noisy, unarmed rabble of a European city that he had to harangue and bring to reason. He became the victim of a humanity which we cannot call weakness, and severely atoned for one fatal mistake. Though he fell by this casualty, no man better understood the true character of the Affghans, and that policy which, to maintain the British ascendancy honestly, ought to have been pursued. His brother, and Captain Broadfoot, who was at breakfast with him, shared his calamitous fate. He was bravely and gallantly defended to the last by the Sepoys who formed his guard. If, throughout the insurrection, all the European troops had acted as manfully as the Sepoys, much disgrace and ruin might have been averted. From the Bala Hissar the King watched the progress of the riot in the city, and in a short time sent one of his sons with some of his retainers, and a Hindostanee regiment in his service, called Campbell's regiment, to the rescue of his allies the British; for other houses and forts occupied by them in the town and its environs were now attacked. And already that spirit of indecision, not to say pusillanimity, or rank cowardice, which was so often manifested in the subsequent military arrangements, began to manifest itself. On this occasion, Lieutenant Eyre, who is reluctantly compelled to confess the ill-conduct of some of the troops, and the blunders and strange backwardness of one or two of the officers, remarks—

No support, however, was rendered to these by our troops, whose leaders appeared so thunderstruck by the intelligence of the outbreak, as to be incapable of adopting more than the most puerile defensive measures. Even Sir William M'Naughten seemed, from a note received at this time from him by Captain Trevor, to apprehend little danger, as he therein expressed his perfect confidence as to the speedy and complete success of Campbell's Hindoostanees in putting an end to the disturbance. Such, however, was not the case; for the enemy, encouraged by our inaction, increased rapidly in spirit and numbers, and drove back the King's guard with great slaughter, the guns being with difficulty saved.

Captain Trevor, who lived in a tower, or strongly-fortified house, adjoining Cabul, had, in common with other English officials, been attacked. He was bravely defended by the King's guard, who, however, were not Affghans, and owed the preservation of himself and his family at this time certainly not to the support of his countrymen, but to these Kuzzilbashes, and his own energy and presence of mind. He, his wife, and their seven children, after having been reported murdered, escaped, with difficulty, into the British cantonments during the night. This, to Captain Trevor, was a respite of but a few weeks. This gentleman was afterwards assassinated along with the Envoy.

On the day of the outbreak, the people of Cabul appear to have run a muck wherever a European face appeared. Their hate and fury were purely oriental. From Lady Sale's Journal we have seen the attempt made to cut down Captain Lawrence, and the murderous attack on her son-in-law, Captain Sturt, whose wounds, though severe, were, however, not dangerous. The ultimate fate of this accomplished gentleman is the more to be regretted, that every step taken, which led to such disaster, appears to have been against his judgment, and even protestations. He became one of the many victims of a calamitous fate, from which, had his suggestions been listened to, he might have saved himself and the whole force.

There could now be no doubt but that the insurrection, if not a premeditated rise, was a formidable affair. Already there were extensive desertions from the Shah's service. His Hindostanee regiment had been severely cut up. The following passage from Lady Sale shows the general consternation that already prevailed, which extended from the Royal Palace to the British cantonments:—

The King, sitting with the British officers around him, was anxious to obtain their advice in the present crisis, and particularly asked that of ———; whose conduct was represented on the emergency as pitiful and childish in the extreme, not having a word to say, nor an opinion to offer. In cantonments all was confusion and indecision. The Envoy mounted his horse and rode to the gateway, and then rode back again,—the best thing he could do; for had the Affghans either killed him or taken him prisoner, it would have given them a decided advantage on their part.

This is corroborated by Lieutenant Eyre at the close of the same day.

The day was suffered to pass without anything being done demonstrative of British energy and power. The murder of our countrymen, and the spoliation of public and private property, were perpetrated with impunity within a mile of our cantonment, and under the very walls of the Bala Hissar.

Such an exhibition on our part taught the enemy their strength—confirmed against us those who, however disposed to join in the rebellion, had hitherto kept aloof from prudential motives, and ultimately encouraged the nation to unite as one man for our destruction.

It was, in fact, the crisis of all others calculated to test the qualities of a military commander. Whilst, however, it is impossible for an unprejudiced person to approve the military dispositions of this eventful period, it is equally our duty to discriminate. The most responsible party is not always the most culpable. It would be the height of injustice to a most amiable and gallant officer not to notice the long course of painful and wearying illness, which had materially affected the nerves, and probably even the intellect of General Elphinstone; cruelly incapacitating him, so far as he was personally concerned, from acting in this sudden emergency with the promptitude and vigour necessary for our preservation. Major-General Elphinstone had, in fact, represented to head-quarters the shattered state of his health, stating plainly and honestly that it had unfitted him to continue in command, and was on the point of returning to India, thence to embark for England, when the rebellion unhappily broke out. . . . . Unhappily, Sir William M'Naughten at first made light of the insurrection, and, by his representations as to the general feeling of the people towards us, not only deluded himself, but misled the General in council. The unwelcome truth was soon forced upon us, that in the whole Affghan nation we could not reckon on a single friend.

The troubles of this doomed army, and the ruin of the cause for which it had been sent into Affghanistan increased every hour. The chiefs in Cabul, or many of them, had not yet taken any decided part, though, it is said, their retainers had been among those who attacked General Sale's troops in the Pass of Khoord-Cabul. They lay by to watch the progress of events; and everything conspired to encourage them in the course to which inclination prompted. We have seen the conduct of the General, for whom Lieutenant Eyre makes an apology, which, at least, demonstrates the candour and amiability of his own disposition. That it is the rule or custom of the British service to appoint aged or imbecile commanders, is not, however, to be attributed as blame to General Elphinstone, who long before expressed an anxious wish to retire from an appointment, for the arduous duties of which he felt himself unfit. If not from the evidence, and reports of Courts-Martial, then from testimony on which the public will have fully as much reliance, that of Lady Sale, Lieutenant Eyre, Colonel Dennie, and, we should suppose, every subaltern officer then at Cabul, now alive, we are led to conclude, that the unfortunate General of this disorganized force was much less blame-worthy than his second in command, Brigadier Shelton. Save mere vulgar, animal courage, the bravery of the bull-dog, this officer appears to have been wanting in every quality that the crisis and his position the most urgently demanded. We shall see more of him by and by. Lady Sale does not spare the Colonel of the 44th; a corps which distinguished itself in rather a remarkable manner for a British regiment, both during the siege at Cabul and on the retreat. General Elphinstone thus suffered from the gross errors of his predecessors, as well as from the incapacity and bad conduct of those who should have been his best stay in difficulty. The cantonments had been erected, it is fair to presume, under the immediate inspection of Sir John Keane, now the laurelled, pensioned, and ennobled hero of the glorious Affghan war. But one might fancy that the Dost had directed their erection, as they seemed placed as if for the express purpose of favouring any attack that might be meditated by the Affghans on the British troops. The insurrection was not, in point of fact, three days old when the English were literally beleaguered in their cantonments, and cut off from their magazine and stores. In three days they were in a state of actual siege, and liable to be starved out, if they could not forcibly be expelled. The choice of the position, and the accompanying blunder of having the commissariat store not only without the walls, but at some distance from the cantonments, was a main cause of all the disasters that followed. Lady Sale states pointedly that her son-in-law, Captain Sturt, the Engineer officer, had pointed out the Upper Bala Hissar as the proper site of the cantonments; but in this, as in other instances during the insurrection, he was obliged to yield to his superiors that better judgment which it was deemed officious to obtrude. Of the site of the cantonments at Cabul, one original blunder, in a long series of blunders, Lieutenant Eyre remarks:—

It must always remain a wonder that any Government, or any officer, or set of officers, who had either science or experience in the field, should, in a half-conquered country, fix their forces (already inadequate to the services to which they might be called) in so extraordinary and injudicious a military position. Every engineer officer who had been consulted, since the first occupation of Cabul by our troops, had pointed to the Bala Hissar as the only suitable place for a garrison which was to keep in subjection the city and the surrounding country; but, above all, it was surely the only proper site for the magazine, on which the army's efficiency depended. In defiance, however, of rule and precedent, the position eventually fixed upon for our magazine and cantonment was a piece of low swampy ground, commanded on all sides by hills or forts. . . . . General Elphinstone, on his arrival in April 1841, perceived at a glance the utter unfitness of the cantonment for purposes of protracted defence; and when a new fort was about to be built for the magazine on the south side, he liberally offered to purchase for the government, out of his own funds, a large portion of the land in the vicinity, with the view of removing some very objectionable enclosures and gardens which offered shelter to our enemy within two hundred yards of our ramparts; but neither was his offer accepted, nor were his representations on the subject attended with any good result. He lost no time, however, in throwing a bridge over the river, in a direct line between the cantonments and the Seeah Sung camp, and in rendering the bridge over the canal passable for guns; which judicious measure shortened the distance for artillery and infantry by at least two miles. . . . But the most unaccountable oversight of all, and that which may be said to have contributed most largely to our subsequent disasters, was that of having the commissariat stores detached from cantonments, in an old fort which, in an outbreak, would be almost indefensible. Captain Skinner, the chief commissariat officer, at the time when this arrangement was made, earnestly solicited from the authorities a place within the cantonment for his stores, but received for answer that "no such place could be given him, as they were far too busy in erecting barracks for the men, to think of commissariat stores." The Envoy himself pressed this point very urgently, but without avail. . . . . We were so hemmed in on all sides, that, when the rebellion became general, the troops could not move out a dozen paces from either gate, without being exposed to the fire of some neighbouring hostile fort, garrisoned too by marksmen who seldom missed their aim. The country around us was likewise full of impediments to the movements of artillery and cavalry, being in many places flooded, and everywhere closely intersected by deep water-cuts.

I cannot help adding, in conclusion, that almost all the calamities that befell our ill-starred force, may be traced, more or less, to the defects of our position; and that our cantonment at Cabul, whether we look to its situation or its construction, must ever be spoken of as a disgrace to our military skill and judgment.

On the first day of the outbreak, every circumstance, as we have seen, must have given encouragement to the rebels, who rapidly increased in numbers and confidence. At the Bala Hissar, as in the cantonments, all was consternation and confusion; dissentient councils, and discordant orders issued in haste, and as speedily recalled; and games at cross-purposes, which positively might be diverting, had the consequences not been so serious.

The second day of the Insurrection found the Affghan patriots, plunderers, and fanatics, in full confidence and activity; inflamed by religious zeal, and the passion of revenge: while the English authorities, and their King of snow, appear to have sunk into deeper despondency and apathy; absolutely paralyzed where they were not distracted. Early in the morning, the 37th regiment, which had been hastily ordered back when on the march, came in from Khoord-Cabul. They had gallantly fought their way, the pass being occupied by a band of three thousand Giljyes, who attacked them. From this time the miserable Envoy seems to have been like Job, receiving, one after another, only messengers of fresh misfortune. The only cordial news was the partial successes of General Sale, in beating off the insurgents, and subsequently his dashing sallies from Jellalabad. The condition of the army on the 3d, may be best learned from Lady Sale's Journal.

This day there was a great talk of the Kohistanees being expected to arrive to attack us. The double sentries are loaded to-day, as also the sentries placed round the ammunition and stores.

In the evening the rebels appeared in considerable numbers near Mahommed Khan's Fort, and between that and the Commissariat Fort, situated 300 yards from cantonments. We have only three days' provisions in cantonments: should the Commissariat Fort be captured, we shall not only lose all our provisions, but our communication with the city will be cut off.

This fort (an old crazy one, undermined by rats) contains the whole of the Bengal commissariat stores, valued at four lakhs of rupees, including about 12,000 maunds of ottah, wheat, and barley, and all the medical stores, &c.

No military steps have been taken to suppress the insurrection, nor even to protect our only means of subsistence (the Godowns) [stores] in the event of a siege. The King, Envoy, and General appear perfectly paralyzed by this sudden outbreak: the former is deserted by all his courtiers, and by even his most confidential servants, except the Wuzeer, who is strongly suspected of having instigated the conspiracy; and suspicion attaches to his Majesty again. . . . In Affghanistan the English act as they do in all other countries they visit,—keep to themselves, and even (generally) employ only servants brought with them. The Envoy kept but few Affghans in his employ; he had a news-reporter, at 150 rupees a-month, who had the credit of concocting splendid untruths; an old moollah picked up at Candahar, who, I believe, receives 200,—a man greatly in Sir William's confidence; there is also an old cossid. These people adhere to the Envoy, and flatter him into the belief that the tumult is bash (nothing,) and will shortly subside.

This day there was a grand bustle, getting guns into all the bastions. Captain and Mrs. Trever, and their seven children, came into cantonments. Trevor's Hazirbashes brought them in safe; but they had to walk through the river, and to carry the children, saving only the clothes they had on. As they escaped at one gate, their tower was taken possession of by the rebels from another. . . . . .

That the insurrection could have been easily crushed at its commencement, is evident from the circumstance, that on the 2d of November a considerable number of chiefs went to Captain Trevor's house to lend him assistance; amongst them were Osman Khan, Abdool Rahim Khan, Khan Shireen Khan, Taj Mahommed, Ghelam Moyenoodeen, &c. The Nawaub Zeman Khan sent one of his younger children to Trevor, and desired him to keep him as a hostage; but finding that no assistance came from cantonments, Trevor declined keeping the boy, and, accompanied by some of the above-mentioned persons and their followers, he made his way into cantonments on the 3d.

It is further worthy of remark, that Taj Mahommed Khan went to Sir Alexander Burnes the very day before the insurrection broke out, and told him what was going on. Burnes, incredulous, heaped abuse on this gentleman's head.

Lady Sale concludes the 3d thus: "Many projects were entered into for putting down the rebellion, but none were put into practice." And this might stand for many days. The "enemy," as the revolted subjects of the intruded king began now to be called, were not so undecided. The next day they captured the commissariat fort and Captain Trevor's tower; for no effectual support, no assistance indeed of any kind had been given to these officers who gallantly defended their posts to the utmost that prudence warranted, and in some cases to the last extremity. In a note, Lieutenant Eyre relates that, long afterwards, when talking over the affair of the capture of Trevor's Tower, with Khan Shereen Khan, some of the former Kuzzilbash leaders and other chiefs, they

One and all declared positively, that the slightest exhibition of energy on our part, in the first instance, more especially in reinforcing my post and that of Trevor, would at once have decided the Kuzzilbashes, and all over whom they possessed any influence, in our favour. Khan Shereen also confirmed the idea, that an offensive movement on the opposite side of the town by Brigadier Shelton, had it been made in the early part of the fatal 2d of November, would at once have crushed the insurrection.

How the officers were supported in the defence of their posts, we are informed by a letter from Captain Mackenzie to Lieutenant Eyre.

The chief of the Kuzzilbashes, and four or five other Khans of consequence, among them the leaders of the Hazirbash regiments, were with poor Trevor earnestly expecting that some decided measures on the part of the British would justify them in openly taking our part.

Trevor despatched my requisition for ammunition, at last, if not for more effectual assistance, into cantonments, where it arrived safely, the distance not being more than one mile and a half. Shortly after, our spirits were raised by the apparent approach of a heavy cannonade, and volleys of musketry from the direction of the Mesrud Khanah, and by the flight through the gardens of the multitudes who were assailing me, towards Deh-i-Affghan, from which quarter crowds of women and children began to ascend the hill, evidently in expectation of an assault from our soldiery. But these cheering sounds died away, and it was in vain that we strained our eyes, looking for the glittering bayonets through the trees, and round the corners of the principal street leading from cantonments. My besiegers swarmed back with shouts, and it required much exertion on my part to prevent despondency amongst my people, which feeling had been strongly excited by the confirmation of the rumour of the murder of Sir Alexander Burnes, his brother, and Captain Broadfoot; by the sight of the smoke from his burning house; and by the intelligence that the treasury of Captain Johnson, also in the town, had been sacked, and the guard slain.

This is pitiful! Captain Mackenzie held out unassisted all that night. He relates—

The extent of the fort required all my men to be on duty at the same time, and some now began to wax weary. The cheerfulness of the remainder was not improved by the incessant howling of the women over the dead and dying. As a trait indicative of the character of the Affghan juzailchees, I must mention, that whenever they could snatch five minutes to refresh themselves with a pipe, one or other of them would twang a sort of rude guitar, as an accompaniment to some martial song, which, mingling with the above notes of war, sounded very strangely.

In the middle of this day, (3d November,) to my great grief, I saw the enemy enter Captain Trevor's tower.

When it was found impossible to hold out longer, Mackenzie and his little garrison, with the women and children, escaped to the cantonments in the dark, but not without some perilous adventures. This officer would indeed seem to wear a charmed life. He concludes his report by remarking—

I cannot close this letter to you without remarking that, amongst other lamentable errors which led to our heavy downfall, that of omitting, in the first instance, to strengthen my post was, next to Shelton's refusal to pour his brigade into the town, while the rioters yet amounted to barely 200 men at the greatest. But the whole blame cannot, in this particular instance, be attributed to our poor friend General Elphinstone.

We now continue the narrative of the insurrection from Lieutenant Sturt's notes.

November 5th.—It no sooner became generally known that the commissariat fort, upon which we were dependent for supplies, had been abandoned, than one universal feeling of indignation pervaded the garrison; nor can I describe the impatience of the troops, but especially the native portion, to be led out for its recapture—a feeling that was by no means diminished by their seeing the Affghans crossing and re-crossing the road between the commissariat fort and the gate of the Shah Bagh, laden with the provisions upon which had depended our ability to make a protracted defence.

On this recapture at least the troops were animated by the best spirit; and Lieutenant Eyre, as the volunteer artillery officer, did his duty ably and gallantly. But as the mussulman Affghans often said in those days, "It is all destiny." The General had ordered out a storming party under Major Swayne. All was prepared for it—but

Major Swayne, instead of rushing forward with his men, as had been agreed, had in the meantime remained stationary under cover of the wall by the roadside.

It must be acknowledged that the General was singularly unfortunate in many of the coadjutors about him, who, with all the zeal and courage which distinguish British officers, were sadly lacking in that military judgment and quickSightedness which are essential to success in a critical moment.

We hear afterwards of Major Swayne at the village of Beymaroo, adjoining the cantonments, an important post of which the enemy had taken possession.

Major Swayne, whose orders were to storm the village, would neither go forward nor retire; but, concealing his men under the cover of some low wall, he all day long maintained an useless fire on the houses of Beymaroo, without the slightest satisfactory result.

We must, however, acknowledge that the generally dispiriting tone of the journals before us is sometimes agreeably relieved by instances of individual intrepidity, presence of mind, and devoted heroism among all ranks of the service. The military criticisms of Lady Sale are dealt out much more freely than those of Lieutenant Eyre or Captain Mackenzie and the other officers. Besides her own knowledge and excellent judgment, she must often have been discussing military affairs with her son-in-law and the other officers at a crisis when there could be but one absorbing topic of interest or conversation within the British cantonments. If the gentlemen are as decided in their judgment of passing events, they are somewhat more sparing of their censure. Every charge, however, that is made against Brigadier Shelton by Lady Sale, is corroborated by Lieutenant Eyre. She indeed keeps up a perpetual fire on the Brigadier, and her shots tell as if aimed from an Affghan juzail. The following are specimens of her military criticisms on this most unpopular, and as it appeared to his brethren in arms, most inefficient officer. We have the less scruple in citing them, as we believe that General Shelton has lately been white-washed by a court-martial, and so may despise public opinion and private blame.

Brigadier Shelton came in from the Bala Hissar with six companies of the Shah's 6th, one horse artillery gun, and one of the mountain train.

The people in cantonments expect wonders from his prowess and military judgment. I am of a different opinion, knowing that he is not a favourite with either his officers or men, and is most anxious to get back to Hindostan. I must, however, do him the justice to say, that I believe he possesses much personal bravery; but, notwithstanding, I consider his arrival as a dark cloud overshadowing us. Most glad shall I be to find that, by his energy, the General is roused up to active measures. . . . . Regarding Brigadier Shelton's view of affairs, it may be remarked that, from the first of his arrival in the country, he appears to have greatly disliked it, and his disgust has now considerably increased. His mind is set on getting back to Hindostan; and it is worthy of remark that from the first, on going into the Bala Hissar, he desired Captain Nicholl to fill all the ammunition boxes, as fast as it was expended, with flour (ottah,) to be ready for provision in case of retreat. . . . . The Envoy wished troops to be sent out; but deference was paid to Shelton's opinion, who would not attack them, [the rebels] being all for a retreat to Hindostan. . . At dinner-time Brigadier Shelton sent to Mr. Eyre, stating that the Envoy had information that 30,000 foot and 10,000 horse were coming to set fire to our magazine with red-hot balls! How these balls were to be conveyed here red hot is a mystery, as the enemy have no battery to erect furnaces in: but nothing is too ridiculous to be believed; and really any horrible story would be sure to be credited by our panic-struck garrison.

It is more than shocking, it is shameful, to hear the way that officers go on croaking before the men: it is sufficient to dispirit them, and prevent their fighting for us. . . . . Our useless expenditure of ammunition is ridiculous. At the captured fort last night the garrison popped away 350 rounds at shadows, probably of themselves: however, we have plenty of it; 13 lakhs made up, and 900 barrels of powder, shot, bullets, &c. in store in profusion. . . . . .

Shelton croaks about a retreat; and so much is openly said of our extremity, that were we obliged to fall back on Jellalabad, it is more than probable that there would be much desertion amongst the Mussulmans. . . .

Yesterday when Sturt was talking to the General and the Brigadier about the captured fort, he mentioned that Captain Layton commanded there that day, and that he wished he should remain and retain it as a permanent command, it being a place for which an officer should be selected, and he considered him as well fitted for the command. Shelton, with a sneer, asked if Layton would like to stay there? To which Sturt replied, "I do not know what he would like, but I know that I should wish him to do so." Captain Layton's courage and steadiness were too unimpeachable for the sneer to affect his character as a soldier. The Brigadier's dislike to him arose from his not being a man of polished manners, and rather ungrammatical in his language.

Brigadier Shelton appears to have given this high-spirited lady personal offence on some occasions. His disposition to "sneer" did not spare even General Sale. Those who would know more of him may consult the Letters of the late gallant and ill-rewarded Colonel Dennie; but we shall see what Lieutenant Eyre says too. The British public forms a wide court of inquiry, and one not so easily satisfied with the conduct of the commanders in disgraceful and ruinous wars as a professional court may sometimes be found. Though in Lieutenant Eyre's book we have a more connected narrative of the progress of events, yet Lady Sale's frank random jottings show as much of the genuine feelings and temper of the period. She never scruples to impute motives, and indubitably they are frequently the true ones, whether they refer to head-quarters, or to lower spheres, as thus—

The state of supineness and fancied security of those in power in cantonments is the result of deference to the opinions of Lord Auckland, whose sovereign will and pleasure it is that tranquillity do reign in Affghanistan; in fact, it is reported at Government House, Calcutta, that the lawless Affghans are as peaceable as London citizens; and this being decided by the powers that be, why should we be on the alert?

Most dutifully do we appear to shut our eyes on our probable fate. The Shah is, however, to be protected, whatever may be the fate of the English in the city.

As a proof of the condition of mind to which Shah Soojah was brought on the evening of the outbreak, Lady Sale relates, that he actually permitted the officers whom he consulted to take chairs in his presence. He was, indeed, in a sad plight.

On this day a report was carried to the King and Conolly that the rebels had mined from the Shôr Bazar to immediately under H. M.'s palace, which said mine was to be sprung the same evening. The King instantly left the palace, and took up his abode at the Gate of the Haram Serai, where he remained during the rest of the siege; and all day, seated at a window commanding a fine view of cantonments, telescope in hand, watched anxiously the course of passing events in that place. He was at this time quite sunk into a state of despondency, and would gladly seize any opportunity of asking the opinion of any of the officers as to what was likely to be the issue of the struggle. He put off for the time all the insignia of royalty, made the officers sit by him on chairs, and seemed quite gobrowed (an expressive eastern term, to be rendered something between dumbfounded and at one's wit's end.) The Shah's conduct in the particular of the chairs is the more worthy of remark, as he had been in the habit of keeping the officers for hours standing with folded hands silently in his presence, and then ungraciously dismissing them without even a passing remark. He now sent to each Sahib a warm silk resaiz and a pillow, which were very acceptable, as they were all starving with cold. . . . . .

Abdoollah Khan has sent a messenger to treat with the King, who replied that he would receive no such low person, and that some person of respectability must be sent.

This was right royal. It was, however, time to waive ceremony, and let the English gentlemen be seated; but sitting or standing was now all one. Danger, disaster, and disgrace were accumulating on every hand. On the third day of the insurrection, Lady Sale writes—

Trevor's tower has been burnt. Had reinforcements and ammunition been sent to Trevor's tower and Mackenzie's fort, they might have held out for ever against any force the rebels could have brought against them. The Hazirbashes refused to stay to defend them, because they saw they must be sacrificed, and that no reinforcements were sent. Had they arrived, the Kuzzilbashes would have declared openly in our favour, with Khan Shireen Khan at their head; but unless supported by us, they dreaded giving offence to the insurgents.

The Kuzzilbashes are Persians, or rather the descendants of Persians, and they formed the royal guard of the Dost. They were first brought into the country by the conquerer, Nadir Shah. They inhabit a particular quarter of the city of Cabul, live apart from the natives, and may be regarded as the Janissaries, Mamelukes, or Swiss of the Affghanistan armies. This was the only body of military that it was found practicable at once to corrupt. After the capture of Ghuznee, seeing the tide of success turning against Dost Mahommed, to whom they owed allegiance, these perfidious mercenaries began to meditate desertion to Shah Soojah and the British. It is related by Captain Havelock, that after Ghuznee was stormed, the Dost resolved to retreat to a good position on the Cabul river, and put his fortunes to the issue of a final battle with the invaders. But he durst not try this bold experiment without being sure of the fidelity of this important part of his army. He accordingly rode into the midst of the treacherous band, with the Koran in his hands, and adjured them, by their fealty to their common religion, not to break their allegiance. They were silent. As a last favour, he entreated that, before they sought a new service, they would stand by the brother of Futteh Khan, and, in requital of the kindness and maintenance of thirteen years, enable him to die with honour. "Stand by the brother of Futteh Khan, whilst he executes one charge against the cavalry of those Feringee dogs," was his last prayer. "In the onset he will fall, and then go make your own terms with Shah Soojah." The appeal of this brave man, who appears to have enjoyed more of the admiration of the British army than the minion they were escorting to set up in his place, had no effect on those perfidious followers, who found it more for their present advantage to enrol themselves in the service of Shah Soojah, and who were probably ready to change sides every campaign, if it suited their interest.——To return to Lady Sale, and the conduct of the war at Cabul.

The enemy have now possession of the Commissariat fort, the fort opposite the Bázaar fort, or Mahommed Shureef's, and the Shah bagh; the two latter posts appear to have been left unoccupied for the enemy's especial advantage. The only mortar we have, being a five-and-half-inch one, has little more effect than a popgun of large calibre. . . . . .

A Kulassy of Captain Maule's has just come in from the Kohistan half naked: he reports, that the Kohistanees are all up; that Maule and Wheeler were killed at Kar Durrah, and that they were overpowered. . . . . Sturt strongly advises the troops being all thrown into the Bala Hissar, and the cantonments being abandoned until we get up reinforcements; but the cry is, how can we abandon the cantonments that have cost us so much money!

This was also the advice of Lieutenant Eyre, and of other able officers; but unhappily those who possessed the capacity which might have extricated the army from its difficulties with safety and credit were without authority or influence of any kind. The troops, particularly the notorious 44th regiment, were already behaving in a way as novel in the English service as it was disgraceful. On the 5th, Lady Sale writes—

At 5 o'clock A.M., no reinforcement having gone to the assistance of Lieutenant Warren, although promised by two, that officer vacated the Commissariat fort. No blame can attach to him, but much to those who withheld aid. The enemy took possession, depriving us of our only means of subsistence. Nor was this all the mischief: it gave both confidence and much plunder to the enemy, and created great disgust amongst the Europeans, who lost all their rum; a worse loss was all the medical stores, sago, arrow-root, wine, &c., for the sick.

She then mentions the ill conduct of Major Swayne's party, which we have already seen, and proceeds—

When the 44th retreated from Mahommed Shureef's fort, all were in amazement; the 37th asked leave to go and take it, but were not permitted to do so.

Lady Sale relates, that her son-in-law, still confined by his wounds, had fretted himself half-mad at everything going wrong; and that, ill as he was, he resolved to assist in recapturing the important fort.

From the top of her house, Lady Sale was now in the habit of watching the sallies and skirmishes of the troops with the Affghans, screened from the bullets which whizzed about, by the tall chimneys, behind which she took shelter. On this occasion, she saw the breach made by Captain Sturt, and the fort stormed; and then she tells—

But few of the enemy were found killed; but it is difficult to estimate the numbers of their slain, as they are so particular regarding Moslem burial that they always, when practicable, drag the bodies away. Great numbers escaped to the hills behind, which were quickly covered with horsemen, from 2000 to 3000 men. A party of Anderson's horse charged straight up the hill (just to the left of the gorge leading to the lake) in most gallant style, and drove the enemy along the ridge to the extreme left. Meantime, the 5th cavalry rode along the foot of the hill to the left, and charged up at that end; by which manœuvre the enemy were hemmed in, in the centre of the two cavalry corps, when a very severe encounter took place. From the top of our house we saw everything distinctly; the gleaming of their swords in the sun, and the fire of their pistols and matchlocks: fresh horsemen came pouring on to the assistance of the enemy from the back of the hill; they buried our cavalry and Anderson's horse, who, overpowered by numbers and a most galling fire, were forced along the ridge to the spot whence the first charge took place.

The Affghans have many advantages over our troops: one consists in dropping their men fresh for combat; each horseman takes a foot soldier up behind him, and drops him when he is arrived at the spot he is required to fire from. Their horsemen are either gentlemen or yeomen, (as we should denominate them,) all well mounted; and their baggage ponies can manage the hills much better than our cavalry horses; in fact, the Affghan horses seem to me to climb about with as much unconcern as goats do. As regards pistols, we are on a par, as most of theirs have been presents from the Posha Khana; but their juzails [rifles] carry much further than our muskets, and, whilst they are out of range of our fire, theirs tells murderously on us. . . .

I often hear the Affghans designated as cowards: they are a fine manly-looking set, and I can only suppose it arises from the British idea among civilized people that assassination is a cowardly act. The Affghans never scruple to use their long knives for that purpose, ergo they are cowards; but they show no cowardice in standing as they do against guns without using any themselves, and in escalading and taking forts which we cannot retake. The Affghans of the capital are a little more civilized; but the country gentlemen and their retainers are, I fancy, much the same kind of people as those Alexander encountered.

Lady Sale's Journal continues to exhibit, in a deplorable light, the jarring councils and ill-concerted schemes of those in power. Whenever the Envoy gave good advice, or proposed an energetic course of action, he was thwarted by the General, or rather by those about the General—and vice versâ. Lady Sale's daily jottings now become more and more interesting. On the 5th, the Envoy wrote to General Sale to return immediately with the troops under his command, as they had been in siege for three days, had sustained some heavy losses, and were altogether in a most perilous position. The General first sanctioned the order for Sale's return, and then drew back.——The power which, all over India, political agents had for a century found of such wondrous efficacy, was not at this time neglected.

Sir William has given one of the Kuzzilbash chiefs 50,000 rupees to raise a diversion in our favour, and has promised him two lakhs more if he succeeds.

The insurgent chiefs have set up a king, and a wuzeer; they went to the mosque, and read the fatcha, or prayer, for the reigning monarch. . . . . This day General Elphinstone wrote to the Envoy to state that we were in want of ammunition, requesting him to endeavour to make arrangements with the enemy!

They still had abundant ammunition; and supplies of provisions and forage were coming in, though scantily. Yet starvation was in not distant prospect. They were, indeed, soon hard pressed. Captain Sturt was still urging the absolute and immediate necessity of abandoning the cantonments, and concentrating the whole force in the Bala Hissar. When the first plan of building at the Company's expense was entertained, he had strongly, as we have noticed, advised that the garrison should be placed in the Upper Bala Hissar, the most commanding point in the locality; and the erections were actually begun, when Shah Soojah took offence at being elbowed so closely by his august allies. The money spent was therefore so much thrown away, and that unfortunate site selected to which Lieutenant Eyre imputes every subsequent disaster, and which, of itself, was certainly sufficient to prove the ruin of a foreign army in the midst of an unsettled and determinedly hostile people. To return to Lady Sale, and still on the fifth day of the outbreak—

All seems confusion here. Those who, at the head of affairs, ought to have been directing everything, appear to be in consternation. . . . . Major Thain is said to be a good adviser, but unfortunately it is not always in the multitude of counsellors that there is wisdom; and so many proffered their advice and crossed his, that Thain withdrew his, and only now answers such questions as are put to him. . . . The enemy are using our guns against us, throwing shot into cantonments from Mahmood Khan's fort. . . . There is a report that we are to be attacked in cantonments to-night. . . . It is said that Mohun Lull has named the man who killed poor Sir Alexander Burnes; he also writes that there are only 500 Kohistanees in the city, and that otherwise all is going on well in the Kuzzilbash quarter of the city, where he resides.

This probably means that the Envoy's rupees were imagined to be telling better than the General's bullets. This individual, Mohun Lull, was, however, faithful to the English, in whose cause he had been long enlisted, and, though long in Cabul, he was not an Affghan. A letter of his, which first appeared in a Calcutta newspaper, gives a better account of the immediate causes of the insurrection, and of the wretched conduct of those who should have put it down, than any other that we have met with. It states—

Since the year of 1838, I have been in regular correspondence with my patron, Mr. Trevelyan, in London, and had repeatedly written to him, that if we do not rectify our conduct in the policy of Affghanistan, we will excite the whole country against us. These communications, I believe, have always been shown to the chairman of the Court of Directors, and it is great pity notwithstanding the late lamented Sir William M'Naghten and Sir Alexander Burnes were aware of the impending dangers which threatened the British authority, but they never took steps either to prepare to meet the evils or to conciliate the chiefs. Their pay was reduced, and the manner of our proceedings had convinced them that they shall be all banished. In October last the chiefs entered into the solemn agreement with each other, and thus the Eastern Ghiljies stood up against our arms. General Sale bravely defeated the enemy, and forced his road through the different passes down to Jellalabad. While these discontented chiefs were intriguing, we bore everything silently till the fatal day of the 2d of November arrived, and the houses of Sir Alexander Burnes and myself were surrounded by the rebels. They were not accompanied with more than fifty men, but not a battalion was sent to our protection. After poor Sir Alexander Burnes was murdered and his house set on fire, I made a hole through the neighbouring house and was nearly cut to pieces, had I not been protected by the good-natured Nuwab Mohammed Zeman Khan, and kept secretly a whole day in his house. All my property saved during the last twelve years was plundered, one of my servants murdered, and the house destroyed. For three days not many people had assembled under the flag of the rebels, and the Persians had not joined the enemy.

Lord Auckland's defenders or apologists deny that there was any organized conspiracy. The proofs are more clear that it did not at once rear its head in strength, and might have been, at least, temporarily crushed. In addition to the leading calamity of the revolt, a train of minor adverse circumstances arose, farther to increase the prevailing distress. Lady Sale's entries frequently now refer to the slender, but welcome supplies of provisions and fodder which came in. The health of the aged General, feeble before, became worse from his perpetual harassment, and the Envoy was distracted by present cares, and by dismal apprehensions for the future. Some of the officers croaked on where they should have worked; and the troops were disheartened, and several corps completely demoralized. The only cordial which the sinking garrison received, was, as we have said, occasional tidings from Brigadier Sale, whose presence in Cabul, at this season of general helplessness, might have produced a very different state of things. The points now debated in the jarring councils were a rapid retreat to Jellalabad; intrenchment in the Bala Hissar till succour came with the returning spring; or treaty and capitulation to the native chiefs. Nothing was decided. By this time the famous Mahommed Akbar Khan, the son of the captive Dost, had arrived in Cabul with his personal followers; where, by his presence and energy, he infused fresh vigour into the national or insurgent cause. The insurgents daily increased in numbers and confidence, and the spirit of the British sunk in a corresponding ratio. The feebleness and vacillation of the leaders had undermined the confidence of the troops. Nor is not surprising that men, fighting under every possible disadvantage, were sometimes reluctant to advance, when some of their officers gave a rather decided preference to the security of the cantonments over the perils of the field. Examples of the pusillanimous conduct of the troops abound in both Journals. Provoked by their backwardness, the high-spirited heroine of the siege appears to have often been tempted "to brain them with her fan." One day, when at her accustomed post of observation on the house-top, watching a large body of Affghans ascending an opposite hill, round which a party of irregular horse had been sent to cut them off, while Brigadier Shelton led on an infantry force to meet them, she thus proceeds, after having with great animation described the skirmish—

When they fairly appeared above-ground, it was very evident that our men were not inclined to meet them. Every field-glass was now pointed to the hill with intense anxiety by us in cantonments, and we saw the officers urging their men to advance on the enemy. Most conspicuous were Mackintosh, Laing, Troup, Mackenzie, and Layton, who, to encourage the men, pelted the Ghazeas with stones as they climbed the hill; and, to do the fanatics justice, they returned the assault with the same weapons. Nothing would do,—our men would not advance, though this party did not appear to be 150 in number. At length one of the Ghazeas rushed forward, waving his sword over his head: a Sipahee of the 37th darted forth and met him with his bayonet; but instead of a straight charge, he gave him a kind of side stroke with it, and they both fell, and both rose again. Both were killed eventually; the Ghazeea was shot by another man. It was very like the scenes depicted in the battles of the Crusaders. The enemy rushed on: drove our men before them very like a flock of sheep with a wolf at their heels. They captured our gun. The artillerymen fought like heroes; two were killed at the gun; Sergeant Mulhall received three wounds; poor Laing was shot whilst waving his sword over the gun and cheering the men. It was an anxious sight, and made our hearts beat: it lasted but for a few minutes.

This was not an every-day sight for a lady. The panic was not yet over—

Perceiving our defeat on the hill, the troops at the captured fort, and those at the Musjeed deserted their posts, and were with difficulty persuaded to go back to them. The troops all scuttled back as hard as they could. The General went outside the gate (and took great credit to himself for doing so) to rally them, as he called it; but there was little chance of doing that while they were under our walls. I was amused at hearing him say to Sir William, "Why, Lord, Sir, when I said to them 'Eyes right,' they all looked the other way."

On another occasion Lady Sale relates a shameful circumstance, in scaling a fort, and ending thus :—

In this room were six of the 44th. The Affghans planted their crooked sticks, which served them for scaling-ladders; got up one by one; pulled out the mud, and got in. A child with a stick might have repulsed them. The Europeans had their belts and accoutrements off, and the Sipahees the same. They all ran away as fast as they could! The 44th say that the 37th ran first, and as they were too weak they went too. Hawtrey says there was not a pin to choose,—all cowards alike. After he was deserted by the men, he himself threw six hand grenades before he followed them. One man of the 44th was an exception, and he was shot whilst assisting Hawtrey in throwing these missiles.

Lady Sale criticises military operations and manœuvres like a veteran Field-Marshal. Of this day's fight she remarks :—

The misfortunes of the day are mainly attributable to Shelton's bad generalship in taking up so unfavourable a position, after his first fault in neglecting to surprise the village, and occupy it, which was the ostensible object of the force going out.

Had he remained above Beymaroo, he might have retreated into and occupied that place, in which the enemy had but few men at first, and who might have been easily dislodged. Shelton tries to lay all the blame on the Sipahees.

Lieutenant Eyre's account of the backwardness of the troops on this occasion is more circumstantial, and, on the whole, more unfavourable to their spirit and discipline. The officers appeared to have lost all moral influence over their men; and, exposed to almost certain death in these desperate and close encounters, the soldiers, without confidence in their leaders, had not, like their fierce enemies, a national cause—the defence of their homes, their religion, and their native land, to animate their courage, and brace them for the required sacrifice. Lieutenant Eyre relates of this skirmish :—

As an instance of the backwardness which now began to develop itself among our men, it must be mentioned, that Lieutenant-Colonel Oliver endeavoured to induce a party of his own regiment to follow him to the brow of the hill, to keep down the sharp fire of a number of the enemy, who had ensconced themselves in a small ravine commanding the foremost square; not a man would follow him,—and it was only after the brave officer had gone forward himself into the thickest of the fire, saying, "Although my men desert me, I myself will do my duty," that about a dozen were shamed into performing theirs. . . . . Previously to this, numbers of the most daring Ghazeas had descended into the gorge, and, taking advantage of some hillocks on the ascent towards our position, had crept gradually up, maintaining a deadly fire on our skirmishers, who were, unfortunately, wholly exposed; they became at length disheartened, and gave way. At this moment the Brigadier offered a reward of 100 rupees to any man who should take a flag of the enemy, which had been planted behind a tumulus about thirty yards in front of the square, and he fruitlessly endeavoured to induce the men to charge bayonets; several of the officers at the same time advanced to the front, and actually pelted the enemy with stones. All attempts, however, to encourage our men were in vain. The attacking party were now emboldened to make a rush upon our gun; our cavalry were ordered to charge, but again in vain, for the men would not follow their officers. The panic spread, and our troops gave way, except the second square, which had been formed about 200 yards in the rear, and three companies under Major Kershaw at the other extremity of the hill; behind this second square the officers with great difficulty rallied the fugitives, leaving the gun in the hands of the enemy.

The Ghazeeas referred to were the most ferocious and cruel of the Affghan bands. They were a set of desperate, religious fanatics, incited by the Mollahs to consider the cold-blooded butchery of the Kafirs an act of heroic virtue, entitling them, as good Mussulmans, to Paradise.

RHYMED SKETCHES OF SCOTTISH PEASANT LIFE.

I.

At random take yon low and lonely cot,
Perch'd midway up that bleak and treeless fell,
—In front a deep and torrent-cloven dell—
And what but gloom and misery haunt the spot?
Some gleams of sunshine gild the walls of mud;
But can the woe-struck wretch who tenants here
Feel aught to cheer his poor and frozen blood?
From aught but winters can he date the year?—
O speak not so of honest Adam Glen.
A humble shepherd, with the happiest face
That e'er met morning smiling o'er the "Pen,"
Or hailed the welcome evening's glowing grace.
Adam is aged now; but fifty years
Have left, unchilled, the happy heart and smile
With which to those rude walls, where his "forbears"
Had centuries seen, he led by love's soft wile,
In matrimonial band, the beauteous Hannah Lyle.
And Adam Glen and Hannah Lyle have seen
The snows of fifty winters round them fall,
And storm to howling storm around them call;
Yet lasting as their years their joys have been.
They loved their rugged hut and stormy hills;
And would have sigh'd to think that future time
Should plant them where the summer songster trills
For ever, 'mid the bowers of happier clime.
"Flow'd not their bliss from brutish ignorance?"
No! They had read of fair Ausonia's plain,
Rhine's sunny wave—the vine-clad hills of France,
The golden streams and orange-groves of Spain;
And oft had with the wayward voyager
In fancy steered to isles of endless spring:
As oft return'd, contented well to hear,
Instead of lays which southern warblers sing,
A dearer melody—the sough of Scottish whirlwind's wing.

And Adam often read, with studious thought,
Huge tomes of deep divinity, and o'er
High, solemn themes—he reverently would pore,
Of works that man had marred and God had wrought;
But chief the Bible in his hill-plaid nook
Each morn saw duly placed—beside it lay
Altern, the "Pilgrim," and the well-thumbed "Crook,"
And "Cloud," that told of Scotland's darkest day;
And "Beuk of Discipline," that ray of truth,
That smote and wither'd Falsehood in its den;
And "Gospel Sonnets," conn'd in memory's youth,
And, prized and loved, in age oft conn'd again;
And haply, with the cream of sacred lore
Was blent some modern's sweet but thrilling tale,
That made his eye gleam sternlier than before,—
A tale of Times when Scotland's stifled wail,
And Persecutor's shout, were blent on every gale.

And 'neath that humble roof, at morn and even,
The song of praise and voice of prayer arose
From many a humble heart that pour'd its woes
And adoration in the ear of Heaven;
Without the aid—it needed not—of art
To swell devotion's tone, or fan its flame:
O, to the breathings of one simple heart
In praise to God, all melodies are tame!
Seven voices once their untaught music blent,
But two, the sweetest, have long since been mute;
And by one little mound, with flowers besprent,
Each Sabbath sees the print of Hannah's foot.
Two sons into another soil have borne
The stern parental virtues, and the mild—
Blame points not at the pathway they adorn;—
And one—a maid, as fair as ever smiled
Joy on a father's face—still blooms upon the wild.

Enter with me, and hear the artless tale
Of humble, cheerful piety from him,
The happy man, strong-sighted in the dim
Decline of years: but, hark! the voice of wail,
Of woman weeping, and of man's deep sighs.
O pause we reverently, for Grief is here!
Beside the bed, with sorrow-streaming eyes,
Stand Adam's sons—his heart-struck daughter near;
Within the bed an aged female bears
Upon her breast an old man's dying head,
And in her desolate woe she sheds no tears,
But gazeth fixedly, though hope be dead—
Gazeth to feed deep love—now deeper far
Than e'er before—upon that calm, pale face
Beaded with death's cold dew. The spirit's war
Seems nearly o'er with mortal feverishness,
And Heaven is breathing there a more than mortal grace.

The aged saint hath reach'd his glorious goal:
Well hath he run his heavenward, bright career;
Like solemn music swelling on his ear,
The wheels of Eli's fiery chariot roll;
Yet lingering ere he mount his angel-seat,
His spirit's eye one moment gazeth o'er
Life's bygone scenes, and holds communion sweet
With all the lost and loved in days of yore.
He sees the spot where, at his mother's knee,
He lisp'd his infant prayer; the hamlet school,
Where oft he'd con the holy "melody,"
And copy endless Truth's abiding rule;
The hamlet church, where words of endless bliss
Fell on his spirit like celestial balm;
The lone hill-cave, where deep forgetfulness
Of earth and time came o'er him with a calm,
That soothed his soul like dew from heaven's unfading palm.
He upward looks, and pants for failing breath,
To breathe one pious thought. Deep stillness round
Deepens to catch life's last low-murmured sound.
In vain—the Patriarch's eyes are closed in death.
Long gaze they in mute agony. Awhile
They scarce can say he 's dead—the silent clay
Seems still to wear a more than living smile,
Which from these throbbing hearts shall ne'er decay.
Such happy life—such holy death-bed scene
May oft be found on Scotland's hills of mist,
Crowning her rugged fells with brighter sheen
Than e'er the sun in lovelier climes hath kiss'd.
Let purple grandeur, in the glowing hour
When life with Hope's bright rainbow rays is clad,
Think, tremblingly, on Virtue's holy power;
Nor deem, though low the roof the dweller sad,
High hearts may bound beneath with feelings pure and glad.

II.

A cheerful blaze beyond the hallan flings
Its sportive flicker,—comfort warms each face.
The storm without the bickering clouds may chase,
More merrily within the matron sings.
What time she plies the busy spindle's speed,
She trills some lay of Scotland's ancient muse,
Or his who sweetliest touched the Doric reed
On Doon's fair banks when 'sprent with Autumn hues.
The song admired and cheer'd,—the gleeful group
Call for the tale of wonder, often told
By lips of aged crone, of faery troop
Seen skimmering on the mountains oft of old.
The merry, elvish race, with jealous care,
Screening their dance from gaze of prying wight—
The foe of Vice—oft, by delusive glare,
Leading vile treason into woeful plight,
But friends to virtue's cause and freedom's sacred right;

Or of pale ghosts that haunt some ruin'd tower,
Where stealthy murder's midnight step has been,
Moaning and jabbering from the casement, green
With damps of years, at midnight's dreary hour;

Or peering, unexpectedly, amid
The murderer's revelries, unseen by all
But him alone, streak'd with unnatural red,
And grinning ominous smiles from shadowy wall;
Or of the hags that ride the howling blast,
And dance in fearful orgies 'neath the moon,
And dark, unhallow'd spells around them cast,
'Mid the wild mutterings of unearthly croon.
With creeping flesh some list the wondrous tale,
Some with incredulous laugh, yet inward awe,
Shake their wise, sceptic heads; the children, pale,
Closer, with frightened looks, for shelter draw,
And, shuddering, think on those who break God's holy law.

III.

Pause on the bank of that melodious stream
Sacred to song,—its calm blue depths, o'erhung
By woods where oft his lyre the minstrel strung,
Woo the pale moonlight's holiest, tenderest beam.
Trees, myriad-hued, are glass'd within its blue,
Embosoming a Pile—a poet's thought—
A dream of old romance—whence witchery flew
With spells for generations, richly-fraught,
Wrapping a world in wonder-breathing gales
From Scottish mountains on the spicy shore
Of the Carnatic and the frozen vales,
Where Highland bosoms beat, in Labrador.
Within that Pile he dwelt, whose ardent soul,
Fill'd with bright dreams and aspirations high,
And boundless knowledge, wonder-chain'd the whole
Of human kind, but turn'd its glorious eye
Of love on Caledon's bleak hills and cloudy sky.

They led him forth, when sickness o'er him threw
Its soul-subduing shade, to breathe the gale
Of softer, sunnier clime, whose flowers exhale
The breath of heaven beneath its cloudless blue.
The hoary Alp sublime before him towered,—
The Rhine to dreams of Eld allured his mind,—
Praise from the lips of Fame was blandly poured:
They said His home was to no clime confined;—
But to his weary soul 'twas far away,—
The heather bloomed not there by strath and stream;
He longed to feel the breeze of Teviot play—
To watch on Eildon's height the setting beam.
"Home, home," he breathed,—"I must not linger here,
These scenes with exiled hearts but ill accord:
O, bear me back to all to memory dear,—
'Twill to my faded brow be health restored,
To feel the breeze that waves the woods of Abbotsford."

IV.

"Hath thy young eye e'er dropt a tear, fair child!
Thy face of smiles, and sunny brow, and glad
And gleesome step, and form with beauty clad,
Bespeak thee some sweet Fairy of the wild."
She answered not, but lightly tript away
To gather flowers; and, ever as she spied
A fairer, she would bound like dancing ray,
As though she had some pearl of price descried.
"All happiness, and loveliness, and life,— Pale Sorrow's cankerworm shalt e'er thou know!"
Poor child, she knows too well her lot is rife
With Memory's treasured thoughts and scenes of woe.
And every morn, at blink of dawn, she sheds
Her heart's first offering on her father's grave,—
And every eve at twilight hour she treads
The grassy tufts that o'er the church-path wave,
To dew the mound with tears, and heavenly aids to crave.

Last winter, one wild night, the storm came down
Yon mountain gorge with fierce and maddening howl.
The boldest shepherd trembled at the scowl
Of heaven, and sigh'd for wanderer's homeward boune.
Strong Symon of the Cleuch, that wons hard by,
Was gazing far into the eddying night,
When fearful shrieks, storm-smothered, fitfully
Bore to his soul some hapless traveller's plight.
He wrapt his plaid close round him, and he took
His lantern and his staff, and forth he rush'd,
Amid the blinding drift and blast that shook
His humble hut, to where a torrent gush'd
From crag to crag, whence faint and fainter scream,
Mix'd with the raving wind and waters' roar;—
And, on the brink of a snow-buried stream,
He spied a child within a snow-wreath's core,
Whose frame seemed touch'd by Death, and all its struglings o'er.

Her to his sinewy arms he caught, his plaid
Wrapt round her palsied limbs, and strove to fan
Life's flickering flame, till feebly, slow began
A conscious warmth her frozen blood t' invade.
And, as he homeward bore her, faint she gasped,—
"My father! save my father!" Backward hied
He to the perilous spot—his burden clasp'd
To a strong sheltering pine, he firmly tied.
Then, with endeavour calm and stern, he bent
Over the slippery rocks that edge the tide,—
And, where the snow with deep, black waters blent,
A prostrate human form he dimly spied.
With patient strength, unyielding, long he toil'd,
And raised at length the body, stark and dead,
And homeward hastily the corpse and child
He bore, the drift and howling storm amid;—
Sleep, meanwhile, soothed the child, and seal'd each laden lid.

Cold poortith had been Symon's lot through life,
But strong endurance, and unswerving will,
And holy resignation's power to still
Faint murmurings, had nerved him to the strife.
He had a numerous brood, whose daily bread
Hung on his stalwart arm—whose cheering smile
Illumed his hearth, and urged him on to tread,
Unflagging still, his course of ceaseless toil.
And yet no murmur breathed from Margaret's soul,
When the poor slumbering child her Symon laid
Within her arms—a mother's pity stole
Into her heart, and bless'd the orphan maid.
They placed the wandering Pauper in the tomb,
And with the orphan shared their humble crust:
Kind sympathy hath taught again to bloom
The rose upon her cheek—and holy trust
Assures her that kind heaven will guard her father's dust.

MEMOIRS OF THE LIFE OF THE REV. JOHN WILLIAMS.*

The terrible fate of "the Martyr of Erromanga," equally with his eminent missionary labours in the islands of the Pacific, have drawn the public attention to his career. His own remarkable narrative, his "Missionary Enterprizes,"—the accounts of him found in the Missionary Society's Reports, in the writings of the Rev. Mr. Ellis, and in the recent publications of Dr. Campbell, have contributed to gratify the general curiosity about an individual, who, if the accomplishment of actual good to his race is to be taken as the measure of a man's worth, ought to be ranked as among the first class. But the character and career of an individual so eminent for the good he has done, deserved the most ample and complete record; and this is now found in these Memoirs of the life of Williams, which are evidently compiled by one who could truly and warmly appreciate the many happy aptitudes and excellencies of his character, and also his peculiar—may we not say providential—adaptation to the work which was given him to do.

It is not until Williams is fairly landed on the Hervey Islands,—one of which, Rarotonga, re-discovered by himself, became the scene of his almost miraculous efforts in civilizing and evangelizing,—that the memoir becomes of intense interest.

Mr. Williams was the son of respectable parents of the middle class, and he was blessed with an excellent and pious mother. After receiving a very plain education, he was, at a suitable age, bound apprentice to an ironmonger in London, to attend the retail-shop only; but being of "a mechanical turn," he, most fortunately for the great cause in which he was afterwards engaged, lost no opportunity of stealing into the adjoining workshop, where he obtained that practical knowledge, and skill in the craft of the blacksmith, which enabled him, in after times, with more ease, to act as a self-taught mason, plasterer, shipbuilder, farmer, weaver, and, in short, Jack-of-all-trades. It was this "mechanical turn," together with his remarkable facility in acquiring the languages of the South Seas, and his peculiarly kind and engaging manners, together with his devoted energy, which enabled Williams so far to outstrip all his contemporaries, and to become the primitive Bishop of Polynesia. During his apprenticeship, his mind was forcibly directed to serious subjects, by accidentally hearing a sermon preached by Mr. East of Birmingham; and, after slender educational preparation, he was sent out, as a missionary, at a very early age, and when just married. The manner in which Williams, on landing at Eimeo, made the first great step, the acquisition of the native languages, goes far to establish the theory of Professor Blackie.* We are told,

By great diligence, he had acquired a sufficient acquaintance with the language while at Tahiti and Huahine, to be enabled to preach intelligibly as soon as he reached Raiatea. The method by which he made this rapid proficiency was his own. Instead of remaining at home, poring over translations and glossaries, or depending upon the assistance of his senior brethren, he constantly mingled with the natives, "hearing and asking them questions," and thus acquired, as he considered with great ease, not merely the signification of words and phrases, but, what was quite as requisite, the correct accentuation of the language. Whether this plan would be the most successful in all cases may admit of doubt; but there can be none respecting its suitableness to Mr. Williams, one remarkable characteristic of whose mind was the power of exact and minute observation.

In ten months after he reached Eimeo, he preached his first sermon in the native language; some of his elder brethren affirming, that he had done as much in that period, as might have taken another three years. As soon as, with the approbation of the chiefs, and with the prospect of quiet and permanency, the missionaries had settled at Raiatea, Mr. Williams laid a stable foundation for his future usefulness.

Having selected a convenient plot of ground, he resolved to erect upon it a dwelling-house in the English style, and in all respects superior to any building ever seen, or even imagined by the people around him. To this he was incited, not merely by a desire to obtain for himself and his family a commodious and respectable residence, but by the hope of elevating the standard and awakening the emulation of those whom he was anxious to benefit. Before this time, the best native houses consisted of but one apartment, which was used by the whole family, and for all domestic purposes. This was covered with a thatched roof, but open at the sides, and carpeted with dry, and too frequently, dirty grass. Mr. Williams perceived the unfitness of such abodes for the purposes he had in view. He knew that domestic comfort, social morality and spiritual religion could never flourish, unless the degraded habits, inseparable from such a mode of living, were first destroyed. He therefore resolved to show the people a more excellent way. "It was my determination," he writes, "when I left England, to have as respectable a dwelling-house as I could erect; for the missionary does not go to barbarise himself, but to elevate the heathen; not to sink himself to their standard, but to raise them to his."

Prompted by this enlightened and truly benevolent motive, Mr. Williams prepared the plan, and commenced the erection of his new and noble dwelling-house. And this was an undertaking in which most of the labour necessarily devolved upon himself. The natives, indeed, readily assisted in procuring the materials and placing them according to his direction; but all beyond what the most ordinary assistance could render, was done by his own hands. Yet although obliged to execute the work of many different artizans, whose divided labour and united skill are commonly considered essential to such an undertaking, he, relying solely upon his own resources, soon beheld, with pride and pleasure, his future home rising up before him. The natives saw it too, and were lavish in their expressions of astonishment and admiration. The house was sixty feet by thirty, and consisted of three front and four back rooms. French sashes, shaded with a green verandah and venetian blinds, gave an air of elegance to the sitting-rooms, which commanded a splendid view of the harbour. The frame-work of the building was wood, but the walls, both within and without, were wattled, and plastered with coral lime. From this lime, Mr. Williams made not only a white-wash, but a grey and orange colouring with which he adorned the interior. On either side and in front, he had enclosed a spacious garden, which was tastily laid out in grass-plots, gravel-paths, and flower-beds, where there flourished a variety of ornamental shrubs and plants, some of them indigenous, and others exotics introduced by himself and his brethren. Immediately behind the house, there was an enclosed poultry-yard, well stocked with turkeys, fowls, and English and Muscovy ducks; while beyond this, lay a large kitchen-garden, which supplied their table with several British roots and vegetables, including cabbages, beans, peas, cucumbers, pumpkins, onions, and pot-herbs. At a later date, the bleating of goats, and the lowing of oxen on the hills indicated that still more important additions had been made to their domestic comfort.

The furniture was in keeping with the house, and discovered in the Missionary an equal amount of taste and skill. Tables, chairs, sofas, and bedsteads, with turned and polished legs and pillars, quite in the English style, and carpeted floors, gave to the interior of this dwelling an appearance, equally inviting to the European visiter, and surprising to the natives. Mr. Williams augured much good from the excitement which these novelties would produce in the too sluggish intellects around him, and was soon rejoiced to see that their imitative propensities had been so powerfully called into useful exercise by his example, as effectually to overcome their indolence.

Much of the civilization, the fruits of which may now be witnessed in these then barbarous islands, resulted from this, and similar measures, to make civilization proceed hand in hand with evangelization. In about eighteen months after landing, we hear of a society established by Williams, for encouraging (among the natives) the growth of the arts and sciences! the reward being nails, a most desirable article to the islanders. Within the same brief space of time, we find this indefatigable missionary writing home:—

"It is a great advantage to me that I am able to turn my hand to anything, and indeed it is very desirable that every missionary, sent to an uncivilized part of the world, should possess mechanical qualifications, as well as a missionary spirit. . . . . .

"We have not only instructed the natives as to the improvement of their houses, but also in sawing timber, carpentering, smith's work, and, among other things, in boat-building. Brother Threlkeld has now in hand a very large boat, on which only the natives are employed. Requiring a larger boat than that which I built at Hinuo, that I may visit Tahaa, I have completed one sixteen feet long. . . . . .

"When we came to this place, there were only two native habitations, and it was difficult to walk along the beach for the bushes. But the former wilderness is now an open, clear, and pleasant place, with a range of houses extending nearly two miles along the sea-beach, in which reside about a thousand of the natives. We earnestly desire to see the moral wilderness present the same improved appearance. The king, who, we are happy to say, is one of the most consistent characters, resides very near to us. He is a very constant attendant both at the chapel and the schools. He will probably be one of the first whom we shall baptize in the islands. We are happy in being able to state that his behaviour is circumspect, and that he is very active in suppressing crime.

"We are glad to be able to inform you, that many have built themselves very neat little houses, and are now living in them with their wives and families. The king, through seeing ours, and by our advice, has had a house erected near to us. It contains four rooms, wattled, and plastered inside and out, and floored. He is the first native on these islands that ever had such a house; but many others are now following his example. . . . . .

"We have been constantly exhorting the people to abandon their pernicious custom of living several families together in one dwelling, and have advised their separation. Several have complied with our request, and before six months more have elapsed, it is probable that there will not be less than twenty houses, wattled, plastered, with boarded floors, and divided into separate rooms for meals and sleeping."

Mr. Williams had not been long in these islands, when he perceived that tobacco and sugar might be successfully cultivated by the inhabitants, and prove lucrative articles of commerce; and he accordingly endeavoured to acquire the arts of boiling sugar and curing tobacco, that he might be able to instruct the natives. Some small beginnings of a useful commerce were made; and, when at Sydney, on the secular business of his mission, about four years after he commenced his labours, we find him writing home:—

"I am taking with me to the islands, clothes for the women, shoes, stockings, tea-kettles, tea-cups, and saucers, and tea, of which the natives are very fond, and which, I hope, may prove an additional stimulus to the cultivation of sugar. And, moreover, when they have tea, they will want tea-cups, and a table to place them on, and seats to sit upon. Thus we hope, in a short time, that European customs will be wholly established in the leeward islands."

In the same year he writes:—

"With respect to civilisation, we feel a pleasure in saying that the natives are doing all we can reasonably expect, and every person is now daily and busily employed from morning till night. At present, there is a range of three miles along the sea-beach studded with little plastered and white-washed cottages, with their own schooner lying at anchor near them. All this forms such a contrast to the view we had here but three years ago, when, excepting three hovels, all was wilderness, that we cannot but be thankful; and when we consider all things, exceedingly thankful for what God has wrought.

"In a temporal point of view, we have everything we can possibly desire to make us happy. We have a good house, plenty of ground, an abundant supply of the productions of the island, cows, ducks, geese, turkeys, pigeons, fowls, &c., and a regular communication with the colony. But above all these things, we have the hearts and affections of the people, and the prospect of great usefulness in our Saviour's cause."

Under the date of November 13th, 1832, Mr. Williams informs the Directors that "the Endeavour" was then nearly ready for sea with a cargo, the proceeds of which and of another cargo which the people were preparing, would, he believed, complete the purchase-money of the ship. "Everything," he adds, "is succeeding beyond our most sanguine expectations. The natives have prepared from 120 to 150 large plantations, and I am perfecting myself in the art of curing tobacco, and boiling sugar. The people have also learned to boil salt; three or four tons of which they have recently prepared. You would be delighted to survey the scene of industry which our island presents. Even the women are employed in cultivating little patches of tobacco, in order to purchase European clothing, and we are most anxious to introduce these articles without expense to the Society."

The indomitable spirit of the man is characteristically displayed in the following passages from a letter to his father, and another to his constituents, the Directors of the Missionary Society:—

"I bless God that my heart is as much alive to missionary work as it was the first day I set my foot on these shores; and in this work of my Lord and Saviour I desire to live and to die. My highest ambition, dear father, is to be faithful to my work, faithful to souls, and faithful to Christ; in a word, to be abundantly and extensively useful. Our own station flourishes, and the people improve. I am fully occupied. I have lately made several lathes and a loom; and am intending to try to weave cloth. I am hoping we shall succeed, as the people have many grasses and barks of which they make cord, &c. My dear Mary is a good spinstress, and knows how to dress flax. But of course our principal attention is devoted to their spiritual improvement; although I have no great opinion of the missionary's labours who would neglect those minor matters."

To the Directors he says:—

"It is our duty to visit surrounding islands. You have fourteen or fifteen missionaries in these islands, missionaries enough to convert all the islands of the South Seas, and every one of these within a thousand miles of us ought now to be under instruction. Six good active missionaries, united in heart, mind, and plan, could effect more, if you would afford them the means, than you either think or expect. A missionary was never designed by Jesus Christ to gather a congregation of a hundred or two natives, and sit down at his ease, as contented as if every sinner was converted, while thousands around him, and but a few miles off, are eating each other's flesh, and drinking each other's blood, living and dying without the Gospel. Upon this subject it is my full determination to have some decided conversation with the deputation. For my own part, I cannot content myself within the narrow limits of a single reef; and, if means are not afforded, a continent would to me be infinitely preferable; for there, if you cannot ride, you can walk; but to these isolated islands a ship must carry you."

This sanguine and enthusiastic spirit precipitated the lamented fate of this admirable and devoted man. On the death of his mother, Mr. Williams received a considerable sum of money, which enabled him to prosecute, with greater effect, commercial objects for the advantage of the natives, though always in subservience to his principal duties as a missionary. But his hopes were destined to be harshly, and, as we cannot help thinking, unwisely checked.

Through the intervention of some interested merchants at Sydney, the governor had been persuaded to impose a prohibitory duty upon South Sea tobacco, and to make other fiscal regulations which materially reduced the value of all Polynesian produce. This severe and unexpected check to the newly-created industry and enterprise of the leeward islands, burst like a tornado upon their inhabitants, and proved a source of extreme embarrassment and distress to Mr. Williams. Not only did it contravene his benevolent plans for the social improvement of the natives, and deprive him of the means of more extended usefulness, but it involved him in serious pecuniary responsibility, from which he could not now expect to extricate himself without loss. To complete the calamity, and consummate his own disappointment, Mr. Williams at the same time received a letter from the Directors, in which the speculation was condemned, and his conduct censured. But his spirit, though bowed down, was not broken. Thus beset with difficulties, he summoned a meeting of the chiefs to whom the Enterprise belonged; and, after ingenuously explaining to them the exact position of affairs, it was resolved to send her immediately to Sydney, laden with the most marketable produce they could collect, with an order to sell both ship and cargo. Great as was the trial of parting with a vessel in which he had already done much missionary work, and by which he expected to accomplish still more, and keenly as he felt the censure of the Directors, he was comforted and cheered by the conduct of the chiefs and people, who clearly understood the whole case, and neither attributed the failure to their missionary, nor evinced towards him the least diminution of confidence and esteem.

To the Directors he wrote:—

"I am sorry that my conduct meets your disapprobation, and acknowledge the justice of all you say respecting a missionary entangling himself with the affairs of this life. But the benefit of others, not my own, was the sole object I had in view. Yet, should I get free from this perplexity, I shall in future avoid any similar entanglement. But although I have thus expressed myself, do not conclude that there is no need of a vessel in the islands. Even as a means of preventing other vessels from trading with the people, it is invaluable; for, with few exceptions, they are the very arks of Satan."

Some time subsequently, he formed the bold idea of building a vessel himself, and he accomplished his object by plans, and processes, and pains, which, in the detail, are as vividly interesting as the building of Robinson Crusoe's famous boat. Of this vessel, named the "Messenger of Peace," Mr. Williams' biographer fitly says, it was one of the most remarkable incidents in his life.

When he formed this purpose, he did it with the full foreknowledge that, in order to its accomplishment, he would be compelled not only to invent some things, but almost to create others, (for may not his new combinations truly bear this name!) and all this, moreover, by the aid of a people whom it would be necessary to teach, before he could employ. What, then, must have been the skill and self-reliance of the man who, in these unfavourable circumstances, could form and execute the design which he has thus described!—"After some deliberation, I determined to attempt to build a vessel; and although I knew little of ship-building, had scarcely any tools to work with, and the natives were wholly unacquainted with mechanical arts, I succeeded, in about three months, in completing a vessel between seventy and eighty tons burden.

Of the various expedients by which Mr. Williams supplied the deficiences and surmounted the difficulties of his position, that which, perhaps, has been regarded with the most lively interest was his novel substitute for a pair of bellows. This contrivance was perfectly original. It was not, however, a happy guess, but the result of reasoning. "It struck me," he observes, "that as a pump threw water, a machine constructed upon the same principle must, of necessity, throw wind." Acting, therefore, upon this suggestion, he constructed his new "air-pump." But although to him this contrivance was new, he subsequently ascertained that he was not its sole inventor; for, during a missionary tour in our manufacturing districts, he discovered with surprise and delight a similar machine in use there, and learned that it was deemed superior to the bellows. . . . . .

But the exemplification of Mr. Williams's genius will be found, not so much in any single invention, as in the circumstance, that it proved equal to every exigency, and enabled him to answer every demand. "None but a Williams," writes Mr. Pitman, "would have attempted such a thing as to commence building a vessel, not having wherewith to build her. I have often been amazed to astonishment to see with what coolness he met the difficulties as they successively arose in his undertaking." The cordage, the sails, the substitutes for nails, oakum, pitch, and paint, the anchors and the pintles of the rudder, made from a pick-axe, an adze and a hoe, are all striking illustrations of this remark. Nor should the fact be overlooked that, within the same limited period, Mr. Williams constructed the lathe which turned the sheaves of the blocks, the machinery which spun the ropes and cordage, the forge and its furniture, as well as all the numerous smaller tools required by himself and his native assistants in this remarkable undertaking.

In a letter to the Rev. Mr. Ellis, he says of this nautical masterpiece,—

"I have built a little vessel of between sixty and seventy tons for missionary purposes. She was not four months in hand, from the time we cut the keel until she was in the water. I had everything to make, my bellows, forge, lathe, and all the iron work, out of old axe, iron hoops, &c.; but I cannot enlarge on my numerous manœuvres to overcome difficulties, though they would be interesting to you no doubt. Suffice it to say she is finished!"

This was the very man to be sent forth, as missionary, among the uncivilized heathen. Few, if any, have been found at all points so qualified. To complete the picture of difficulties surmounted, it should be mentioned, that the ship of which Williams was so justly proud, was built at Rarotonga,—then a quite new missionary station,—and under very severe privations. He was at this remote place with a wife in very delicate health, and though not apt to complain, he is compelled to say,—

"My dear Mary is near her confinement. She is very delicate, but I trust all will be well. The Rarotonga people much wished her to be confined there, that their land might be honoured with the birth of one of our children. We have, notwithstanding the kindness of the natives, often been in want while at Rarotonga; having had neither tea, sugar, flour, rice, or fowls, for some months, and being obliged to make our own salt and soap." . .

The passing allusion to their privations at Rarotonga, contained in the preceding letter, will convey but a very inadequate idea of their extent. They were much more severe, and in their injurious effect upon his delicate and self-denying partner, far more serious, than such slight references would lead the reader to suppose. Accustomed as they had been at Raiatea to European food, it was not without difficulty, nor even without danger, that they conformed to the diet of the natives. But of this Mr. Williams would never have complained, had he suffered alone. Of personal privations he thought little, and said less. Although from his childhood he had been accustomed to domestic comforts, and knew how to provide and enjoy them, as was evident from the manner in which he had stocked his garden and poultry-yard at Raiatea, he could be content with the simplest provisions; and for a man so healthy and laborious, his temperance at the table was remarkable. Even when most actively engaged, he frequently manifested his indifference to food, and often would have rather prosecuted work in which he was interested, than submit to the interruption of the customary meals. Thus, when building his vessel, he could with difficulty be drawn from the scene of his delightful occupations; and, although he frequently continued from dawn until dark toiling at the bench or the forge, even through the sultry hours of noon, when the natives had slunk under the shadow of the trees, he was well satisfied with the humble fare of a single bread-fruit and a draught of water.

The possession of the vessel, built under such extraordinary circumstances, was of vast consequence to the missionary cause in the islands of the Pacific. By means of it, Mr. Williams and some of his brethren, accompanied by those most useful auxiliaries,—the native teachers, whom they had trained,—were enabled, like Apostolic Bishops, to visit the different island groups; and thus was the gospel first carried to, and planted in the Navigators' Islands, where the progress of civilisation has since been little less than miraculous. His labours in the Navigators' Islands, and the results, may, indeed, be considered as the greatest of all Williams' missionary enterprises. These fine and populous islands, which are only inferior to the Sandwich Islands of any archipelago in the whole South Seas, were found, but a few years back, in as rude and barbarous a condition as any that had ever been visited by Europeans. The natives were described by so recent a visiter as Kotzebue, in 1823, as among the most fierce and treacherous cannibals in any of the Polynesian Islands. When Williams ventured to approach them, he had along with him an intelligent man, a converted chief, a native of one of the islands, and his wife, who proved most invaluable auxiliaries. Yet it was not without considerable danger that he approached some of these tribes. The native chief, Fauea, and his wife were left at Samoa, an important island of this group; and when Williams came back, in about two years, on his second expedition, the people were found christianized, or, at least, nominal Christians. He had had a delightful run of 800 miles, from his station at Rarotonga, to the Navigators' Islands; and when he touched at the first of the group, was delighted with the salutation of his visiters, who exclaimed—"We are sons of the Word." This great change had been effected by Fauea, aided by the native teachers subsequently sent to different stations. The narrative of the conversion of these islanders is replete with interest. Williams carried forward what he had been the instrument of so happily commencing. He everywhere, acting on the maxim, "Kindness is the key to the human heart," gained the confidence and love of the people, who, wherever he went, formed the warmest attachment to him. At the Navigators' Islands, songs were sung and solemn dances performed by the women in his honour; the former of a description which forbids us to call the natives savages, horrible as some of their late practices had been. The following are specimens of the native poetry of Samoa. Viriamu, it should be premised, is the pronunciation of the name of Williams, in the soft language of these islanders.

"Let us talk of Viriamu.
Let cocoa-nuts grow for him in peace for months.
When strong the east wind blows, our thoughts forget him not.
Let us greatly love the Christian land of the great white chief.
All *malo are we now, for we have all one God.
No food is sacred now. All kinds of fish we catch and eat:
Even the sting-ray."

"The birds are crying for Viriamu.
His ship has sailed another way.
The birds are crying for Viriamu.
Long time is he in coming.
Will he ever come again?
Will he ever come again?
Tired are we of the taunts of the insolent Samoans.
'Who knows,' say they, 'that white chief's land?'
Now our land is sacred made, and evil practices have ceased.
How we feel for the lotu! Come! let us sleep and dream of Viriamu.
Pistaulau† has risen. Taulua† has also risen.
But the war-star has ceased to rise.
For Sulueleele‡ and the king have embraced the sacred word.
And war has become an evil thing."

Mr. Williams' first impressions, on seeing these islanders, convey a favourable idea of their natural capacity, and a lively picture of the best condition of the inhabitants of the South Sea, when its tribes were first seen by Europeans. The natives and the principal chiefs were delighted at the prospect of receiving teachers from the missionaries of whom Fauea and his wife had told them such wonders, and they were prepared to give Mr. Williams the most enthusiastic reception. How much in such cases is to be attributed to novelty, and how much to the vague hope of secular advantage, it is not important to us to determine. An opening was won; and the people, in professing Christianity, often appeared influenced by the most reasonable motives. Fauea eloquently pointed out to them the great superiority of the white people; whose religion, he said, had made them what they were. Mr. Williams, in part, attributed the remarkably rapid progress of the missionaries among the Samoans "to the absence of an interested, sanguinary, and powerful priesthood," and of temples and idols; a peculiar feature in their social condition, which, as compared with the inhabitants of the other islands, in all of which there were priests and idols, was found eminently favourable to missionary objects. We have given a specimen of the poetry of these islanders; and now select a few passages from a long and picturesque description of the first intercourse which Mr. Williams had with them:—

In language, and in their leading physical features, he at once perceived that they were Polynesian Asiatics; but in form, the men were neither so tall nor so muscular, and the females were not so beautiful, as the Tahitians and Friendly Islanders. But the inferiority of the men in height and bulk was fully compensated by their grace and agility. Of all the Polynesians whom he had seen, Mr. Williams pronounced the Samoan the most symmetric in form, and the most polished in manners. And of this they were themselves aware; and no means were neglected which could, in their estimation, set off or enhance their personal attractions. The toilet was a shrine before which the gentlemen, no less than the ladies, daily offered incense to their own vanity. A pair of portraits from the pencil of Mr. Williams, sketched from life upon his journal, will enable the reader to form his own idea of the people amongst whom he had now arrived. "Picture to yourself a fine well-grown Indian, with a dark, sparkling eye, a smooth skin, glistening from the head to the hips with sweet-scented oil, and tastefully tatooed from the hips to the knees; with a bandage of red leaves, oiled and shining also, a headdress of the nautilus shell, and a string of small white shells around each arm, and you have a Samoan gentleman in full dress; and, thus dressed, he thinks as much of himself, and the ladies think as much of him, as would be the case with an English beau fitted out in the highest style of fashion. A Samoan lady, in full dress for a ball, wears a beautifully white, silky-looking mat around her loins, with one corner tucked up, a wreath of sweet-smelling flowers around her head, a row or two of large blue beads about her neck; her skin shining with scented oil, and the upper part of her person deeply tinged with turmeric rouge. The ladies spend a considerable time in preparing themselves for company, as much so, perhaps, as their more enlightened sisters in Christian and civilized lands, and two or three 'lady's maids' will be required to assist in these decorations.

* Malo was a name given to those who were victorious in war, and is the opposite of vaivai, the conquered.

† Names of stars. ‡ The king's daughter.

They are not tatooed like the men, but many of them are spotted all over."

Of his subsequent visit, that on which the parting-song above cited was sung, he relates,—

"The people manifested a great deal of feeling at parting; and, as I passed through their ranks, they kissed my hands, and importunately entreated me to bring Mrs. Williams and my children, and to come and live with them, and teach them the word of salvation."

At another point of the island, touched at next day, he relates,—

"As soon as we had dropped anchor, we were surrounded by canoes, from which the natives came up the sides of our little ship, until she was almost deluged with them. Silence was then commanded; and, when it was obtained, Riromaiava gave orders to his tuulaafale, or orator, to tell the people who I was, whence I came, and what I wanted. He then commanded his spokesman to proclaim to the staring and wondering crowd, that Malietoa [the principal chief,] his father, had given me his name; and, consequently, that all the respect due to him must be shown to me. This was followed by a strict charge to steal nothing whatever from the ship, but that all should immediately bring off to us pigs, and bread-fruit, and yams. . . . .

"Having obtained wood and water, with a tolerable supply of provisions, I made presents to the various chiefs, and bade them farewell. On landing at the district of Riromaiava, I found that I had to walk two miles to his settlement. On reaching it, I was invited into the government house. Here I was requested to take my seat upon a beautiful new mat, and was immediately surrounded by all the chiefs. Soon after we had seated ourselves, a fine stately young woman entered the house, and was introduced to me by the name of Maria, as Malietoa's eldest, handsomest, and favourite daughter. She expressed her sorrow at not having seen me before; and assigned as a reason, that, at the time of my visit to Samoa, her husband was fighting against her father, and that she was with him in the fort. 'But,' she added, 'we were conquered; and, since then, I have been over to Sapapalii, and spent much time with the teachers, who have taught me the lotu, and I am learning it still.'"

The lotu appears to be the native name for the Christians, the Gospel, and everything connected with the new religion.

Shortly after this period, Mr. Williams and his wife visited England, from which they had been absent nearly twenty years. The great popularity of the returned missionary, on his progresses through the principal towns of England and Scotland, when, in his own manly and plain style, he expatiated on the wonders he had seen, and modestly alluded to what had been achieved in Polynesia, must still be fresh in the recollection of many of our readers. By the liberality of those who listened to his appeals, Mr. Williams was enabled to purchase a vessel of a size that transcended his most sanguine expectations. A large sum of money was raised for this object; and many worthy people were as munificent to him with gifts of ship stores, and other useful things, as ever he had found the South Sea Islanders with their pigs and sweet potatoes, when, to celebrate the opening of a chapel, or any other great event, from 300 to 700 pigs were sometimes slaughtered at once. The Polynesian Christians are certainly not ascetics.

Among the other articles which Williams carried back with him was a magic-lantern with slides representing Scripture scenes, objects in natural history, and in the English annals; and, as the whole was with the view of counteracting the operations of the Romish priests, who were even then supposed to be on their way to the islands with miracle-working electrifying machines, &c., &c., the plates of Foxes' Martyrology, exhibiting the cruel sufferings of Protestant martyrs from the Papists, were added to the list of pictures; a somewhat questionable addition. The natives were delighted with the magic-lantern, and particularly with the Scripture pieces. Mr. Williams carried out better gifts, in numerous copies of the New Testament, which had been previously translated into the native tongue by himself, and printed in England. He had scarcely visited and inspected his different stations, when the long-formed design of extending his labours to islands yet unvisited by the Messengers of Peace, came strongly upon him. His last fatal expedition to the New Hebrides was accordingly undertaken, and was, at the outset, successful. At the Island of Fatuna, and at Tanna, the strange, white visitors were well received; and that strong natural anxiety, or, as it is here represented, the deep or supernatural presentiment of impending evil with which the devoted man approached that group of islands which he regarded as the key to the ultimate evangelization of New Caledonia, New Britain, New Guinea and the whole of Western Polynesia, seemed to be wearing off and confidence returning when he landed on the fatal shore of Erromanga. The reception at Fatuna and Tanna had dissipated his previous fears, and fulfilled his warmest desires. He now appeared to feel a strong confidence of success. The grand object for which this Columbus of Missions had planned, and prayed, and pleaded, seemed almost within his grasp, when the fated hour suddenly drew near. On the horrible particulars, so well-known and recent, we need not dwell. The account of the murder of Williams and his companion, Mr. Harris, was transmitted to this country by the captain of the missionary ship, from the deck of which his murder was witnessed; and probably no event, involving merely the fate of a single individual, ever excited deeper sympathy in the public mind. But the grief and sorrow felt at home could not have been deeper or more sincere than that experienced by his native friends and disciples in the various places where he had affectionately laboured with head, and hand, and heart; and, indeed, over all the Christianized parts of the islands. "Lamentation was universal." Monuments to his memory have been erected in different islands. That in Samoa, where his family were living at the time of his death, and to which he had first sent the glad tidings of salvation, bears this simple and touching inscription:—"Sacred to the Memory of the Rev. John Williams, Father of the Samoan and other Missions, age 43 years and 5 months, who was killed by the cruel natives of Erromanga in Nov. 20, 1839, while endeavouring to plant the Gospel of Peace on their shores." The memoirs close with a friendly estimate of the character of Williams by the author, and another, which is quoted from the Rev. Mr. Ellis. It would not be easy to over-rate his many solid and useful qualities and acquirements; nor, indeed, to give due praise to that happy combination of gifts and graces which rank this excellent and honoured man as among the most eminent of the Christian missionaries of any age.

In perusing the memoirs of Williams, and some of our other celebrated missionaries, we are forcibly struck by the superior advantages which the presence of their wives and children, the influence, instruction, and example, of Christian matrons must give to Protestant over Roman Catholic missions. One family resembling the Williamses was worth a whole battalion of celibate spiritual propagandists.

THE IRISH SKETCH-BOOK.*

Mr. M. A. Titmarsh, (Qy. whether Maximilian Adolphus, or Marmaduke Augustus?) a celebrated Cockney literary character, here comes forth as a universally accomplished traveller. He draws, he etches his own designs on wood, he admires, and he understands too, fine scenery—the beautiful—not the sublime. He has stout, and, moreover, shrewd notions of priestcraft and statecraft, Irish justices, landlords, and squireens. He talks well on manners, music, wines, sauces, and the points of a fine woman. As to the points of a good horse, together with boating, racing, driving, fox-hunting, and sporting of all sorts, Mr. Titmarsh honestly proclaims himself a Cockney, and in total eclipse. This is more, we suspect, than our little, boastful countryman, whom he met at the Killarney races —an Edinburgh or Parliament-house Cockney— would have done. Besides these varied accomplishments, and partly in consequence of their possession, Mr. Titmarsh has contrived to put together a really clever and entertaining Sketch-Book, which he has dedicated to Dr. Charles Lever, under the alias or more imposing name of Mr. W. M. Thackeray.

As Titmarsh appears on the title-page, and Thackeray exactly over the leaf, the reader may take his choice of names. We prefer Titmarsh, (since writing as above, we understand, from a Cockney Intelligencer, Michael Angelo Titmarsh,) as a proper and significant Cockney appellation; and, besides, do not like to baulk an author's fancy in his favourite name. Mr. M. A. Titmarsh, then, made a dash upon the Emerald Isle last summer. He is neither a philosophical traveller, nor yet a political, statistical, or economical traveller; neither a Wakefield, a Young, nor an Inglis; though he the most closely resembles the last-named Irish tourist. He apparently went to Ireland with all his Cockney habits and affections strong in him; to see a new and interesting country, to make sketches, amuse himself well, and write a book that should amuse others. We think he has succeeded to a miracle. He has at least amused us, which is more than we are able to say of all the performances of late Cockney travellers; and we venture to think that, before we are done with him, our readers will agree in our opinion of Mr. Titmarsh. His first Cockney grievance lies on the English side of the water, where not even the customary few minutes to mail-coach travellers are allowed at Holyhead for dinner. Lord Lowther may probably wish to ward off sea-sickness or superfluous expense. The mate of the steam-packet was as like Mr. Titmarsh's friend, Mr. Charles Dickens, as two peas. Many amusing descriptions have we read and heard of landing in Dublin bay; and the Cockney's approach to the capital falls short of none of them. He had no sooner set his foot on shore, than he began to look about, and spy out the nakedness of the land. The "marine villas" about Dunleary, alias Kingstown, with their magnificent and oft-changing names, had, he thought, "a battered rakish look, and seemed going to decay before their time."

It is quite curious to see in the streets where the shops are, how often the painter of the sign-boards begins with big letters, and ends, for want of space, with small; and the Englishman accustomed to the thriving neatness and regularity which characterize towns, great and small, in his own country, can't fail to notice the difference here. . . . . As seamen of all nations come hither who have made no vow of temperance, there are plenty of liquor-shops still, and shabby cigar-shops, and shabby milliners' and tailors' with fly-blown prints of old fashions. The bakers and apothecaries make a great brag of their calling, and you see MEDICAL HALL, or PUBLIC BAKERY, BALLYRAGGET FLOUR-STORE, (or whatever the name may be,) pompously inscribed over very humble tenements. . . . . After the town come the suburbs of pleasure-houses; low, one-storied cottages for the most part; some neat and fresh; some that have passed away from the genteel state altogether, and exhibiting downright poverty; some in a state of transition, with broken windows and pretty romantic names upon tumble-down gates. Who lives in them? One fancies that the chairs and tables inside are broken, and the teapot on the breakfast table has no spout, and the table-cloth is ragged and sloppy, and the lady of the house is in dubious curl-papers, and the gentleman with an imperial to his chin, and a flaring dressing-gown all ragged at the elbows.

To be sure; a traveller who in ten minutes can see not only the outsides of houses but the interiors of the same, must have remarkably keen sight; and it is early yet to speculate. It is clear, however, that these are pleasure-houses for a certain class; and looking at the houses, one can't but fancy the inhabitants resemble them somewhat. The car, on its road to Dublin, passes by numbers of these—by more shabbiness than a Londoner will see in the course of his home peregrinations for a year.

And in this way Mr. Tit. went on till he reached the Shelburne hôtel in Stephen's Green, where Mr. O'Connell is, by and by, to summon and hold a Parliament. Out of the advertisements in the Dublin newspapers on his breakfast table, (graced with a couple of Dublin bay herrings, which made his chops water,) Mr. Titmarsh translated a good long chapter, illustrative of Irish national character, and the habits of Irish society. The Cockney is manifestly free from many sorts of cant. His newspaper contained an account of the trials of several persons convicted of murder, and of many persons who had attempted a crime so common in Ireland as to be truly vulgar. He remarks—

I confess, for my part, to that common cant and sickly sentimentality which, thank God! is felt by a great number of people now-a-days, and which leads them to revolt against murder, whether performed by a ruffian's knife or a hangman's rope; whether accompanied with a curse from the thief as he blows his victim's brains out, or a prayer from my lord on the bench in his wig and black cap. Nay, is all the cant and sickly sentimentality on our side, and might not some such charge be applied to the admirers of the good old fashion? Long ere this is printed, for instance, Byrne and Woods have been hanged: sent "to face their God," as the Chief Justice says, "with the weight of their victim's blood upon them,"—a just observation; and remember, that it is we who send them. It is true that the judge hopes Heaven will have mercy upon their souls; but are such recommendations of particular weight because they come from the bench? Paha! If we go on killing people without giving them time to repent, let us at least give up the cant of praying for their souls' salvation. We find a man drowning in a well, shut the lid upon him, and heartily pray that he may get out. Sin has hold of him, as the two ruffians of Laffan yonder, and we stand aloof, and hope that he may escape. Let us give up the ceremony of condolence, and be honest like the witness, and say, "Let him save himself or not, it's no business of ours." . . . Here a waiter, with a very broad, though insinuating accent, says, "Have you done with the Sandthers, [Saunders' News Letter] Sir? there's a gentleman waiting for't these two hours."

We confess that, after reading this paragraph, we began to have good hopes of our new acquaintance, and followed his ramble through Dublin city with some alacrity. But "the old familiar places" are somewhat hackneyed to us, and probably to our readers, though they may be fresh to many of Mr. Titmarsh's audience. Among the first of his wood-cuts, and a true portrait, is the queer-looking little window of his chamber at the Shelburne; and thus it is illustrated or moralized by pen and ink:—

I had been accommodated with a queer little room and dressing-room on the ground-floor, looking towards the Green—a black-faced good-humoured chambermaid had promised to perform a deal of scouring which was evidently necessary, (which fact she might have observed for six months back, only she is, no doubt, of an absent turn;) and when I came back from the walk, I saw the little room was evidently enjoying itself in the sunshine, for it had opened its window, and was taking a breath of fresh air, as it looked out upon the Green. Here is a portrait of the little window.

As I came up to it in the street, its appearance made me burst out laughing, very much to the surprise of a ragged cluster of idlers lolling upon the steps next door; and I have drawn it here, not because it is a particularly picturesque, or rare kind of window, but because, as I fancy, there is a sort of moral in it. You don't see such windows commonly in respectable English inns—windows leaning gracefully upon hearth-brooms for support. Look out of that window without the hearth-broom, and it would cut your head off. How the beggars would start that are always sitting on the steps next door! Is it prejudice that makes one prefer the English window that relies on its own ropes and ballast, (or lead, if you like,) and does not need to be propped by any foreign aid? or is this only a solitary instance of the kind, and are there no other specimens in Ireland of the careless dangerous extravagant hearth-broom system!

Yes, that little window is a map of make-shift Ireland all over.——Mr. Tit. rose a cubit length in the opinion of his friend the waiter, when a gentleman, driving his own well-appointed cab, with a gigantic horse, and a neat dwarf tiger, carried him off to dine at Salt Hill, with a set of jovial young blades, who talked of the Derby, the odds for the St. Leger, and the Ascot cup, as if on the Turf, not alone in Ireland but in England, since they had got out of long clothes. The banquet concludes with a receipt for dressing hot lobster extempore at the table, which almost merits to appear in the next edition of Meg Dods. Though some gourmands might elevate their noses at porter accompanying, and whisky-punch following, this bonne bouche, the prescription may, as to potables, be, we presume, varied at pleasure. While on the subject of cooking, we may mention, that at a great cattle-show dinner at Cork, when Mr. Tit. asked the waiter for the currant jelly, as the indispensable accompaniment of his slice of venison, that knowing individual blandly replied, "Sorry there is no currant jelly, Sir; but I have brought you some very fine lobster-sauce." This looks absurd enough; but who can tell the effect of lobster-sauce with venison, without trial. The Cockney, if a man of original genius in the affairs of the table, might have experimented:—sliced cucumber or green peas must, at one time, to Cockneys especially, have appeared quite as much out of keeping with Severn salmon as lobster-sauce to venison. But Mr. Titmarsh is not a philosopher; he does not generalize; he makes no pretensions of the sort. Among the pleasantest sketches in the travels of the Cockney are his descriptions of a gentleman's country-house in the county of Kildare;—a gentleman who—rare character in Ireland—was a judicious and spirited agriculturist, and who throve though he farmed his own estate. Making way in a friend's carriage for this gentleman's residence, the Cockney got to Kilcullen.

Kilcullen tumbles down a hill, and struggles up another; the two being here picturesquely divided by the Liffey, over which goes an antique bridge. . . There was no trade in the little place, and but few people to be seen, except a crowd round a meal-shop, where meal is distributed once a-week by the neighbouring gentry. There must have been some hundreds of persons waiting about the doors; women for the most part: some of their children were to be found loitering about the bridge much farther up the street: but it was curious to note, amongst these undeniably-starving people, how healthy their looks were. Going a little farther, we saw women pulling weeds and nettles in the hedges, on which dismal sustenance the poor creatures live, having no bread, no potatoes, no work,—well! these women did not look thinner or more unhealthy than many a well-fed person. A company of English lawyers, now, look more cadaverous than these starving creatures.

Thank Heaven for the blue sky that bends over all; for the free and fostering breezes, caressing all alike, and giving the poor, potato-fed, ragged peasant of Ireland a richer bloom, a more vigorous frame, than the sodden-complexioned denizens of wealthy cities, clad in fine linen, and daily feasted on roast-beef and plum-pudding. But no thanks to landlords and lawgivers, that the poorest may breathe fresh air, and thrive on it. It is not easy to put bits of the blue sky within a ring-fence. But to return to the happy Irish country residence—which might challenge Europe and America to match it for the "rural life in all its joys and elegance."

Just at the confines of this pretty rustic republic, our pleasant afternoon's drive ended; and I must begin this tour by a monstrous breach of confidence, by first describing what I saw.

Well then, we drove through a neat lodge-gate, with no stone lions or supporters, but riding well on its hinges, and looking fresh and white; and passed by a lodge, not Gothic, but decorated with flowers and evergreens, with clean windows and a sound slate roof; and then went over a trim road, through a few acres of grass, adorned with plenty of young firs and other healthy trees, under which were feeding a dozen of fine cows, or more. The road led up to a house, or rather a congregation of rooms, built seemingly to suit the owner's convenience, and increasing with his increasing wealth, or whim, or family. This latter is as plentiful as everything else about the place; and as the arrows increased, the good-natured lucky father has been forced to multiply the quivers.

First came out a young gentleman, the heir of the house, who, after greeting his papa, began examining the horses with much interest; whilst three or four servants, quite neat and well dressed, and, wonderful to say, without any talking, began to occupy themselves with the carriage, the passengers, and the trunks. Meanwhile, the owner of the house had gone into the hall, which is snugly furnished as a morning-room, and where one, two, three, young ladies came in to greet him. The young ladies having concluded their embraces, performed (as I am bound to say from experience, both in London and Paris) some very appropriate and well-finished curtsies to the strangers arriving; and these three young persons were presently succeeded by some still younger, who came without any curtsies at all, but bounding and jumping; and, shouting out "Papa!" at the top of their voices, they fell forthwith upon that worthy gentleman's person, taking possession, this of his knees, that of his arms, that of his whiskers, as fancy or taste might dictate.

"Are there any more of you?" says he, with perfect good humour; and, in fact, it appeared that there were some more in the nursery, as we subsequently had occasion to see.

Well, this large happy family are lodged in a house than which a prettier or more comfortable is not to be seen even in England; of the furniture of which it may be in confidence said, that each article is only made to answer one purpose:—thus, that chairs are never called upon to exercise the versatility of their genius by propping up windows; that chests of drawers are not obliged to move their unwieldy persons in order to act as locks to doors: that the windows are not variegated by paper, or adorned with wafers, as in other places which I have seen; in fact, that the place is just as comfortable as a place can be. . . . . .

There is no need to particularize the chairs and tables any farther, nor to say what sort of conversation and claret we had; nor to set down the dishes served at dinner. If an Irish gentleman does not give you a more hearty welcome than an Englishman, at least he has a more hearty manner of welcoming you; and while the latter reserves his fun and humour (if he possesses those qualities) for his particular friends, the former is ready to laugh and talk his best with all the world, and give way entirely to his mood. . . . .

Nothing could be more delightful to witness than the evident affection which the children and parents bore to one another and to their parents, and the cheerfulness and happiness of their family parties. The father of one lad went with a party of his friends and family on a pleasure party in a handsome coach-and-four. The little fellow sate on the coach-box, and played with the whip very wistfully for some time: the sun was shining, the horses came out in bright harness with glistening coats; one of the girls brought a geranium to stick in papa's button-hole, who was to drive. . . . .

"That's a rum fellow," said the eldest of these latter to me, as his father went out of the room, evidently thinking his papa was the greatest wit and wonder in the whole world. And a great merit, as it appeared to me, on the part of these worthy parents was, that they consented not only to make, but to take jokes from their young ones: nor was the parental authority in the least weakened by this kind familiar intercourse.

A word with regard to the ladies so far. Those I have seen, appear to the full as well educated and refined, and far more frank and cordial, than the generality of the fair creatures on the other side of the channel. I have not heard anything about poetry, to be sure, and in only one house have seen an album; but I have heard some capital music, of an excellent family sort—that sort which is used, namely, to set young people dancing, which they have done merrily for some nights. In respect of drinking, among the gentry, teetotalism does not, thank heaven! as yet appear to prevail; but although the claret has been invariably good, there has been no improper use of it. Let all English be recommended to be very careful of whisky.

So much for the interior. We shall now walk over the farm, and examine the improvements.

Before setting out on our second day's journey, we had time to accompany the well-pleased owner of H—— town, over some of his fields and out-premises. Nor can there be a pleasanter sight to owner or stranger. Mr. P—— farms four hundred acres of land about his house; and employs on this estate no less than a hundred and ten persons. He says there is full work for every one of them; and to see the elaborate state of cultivation in which the land was, it is easy to understand how such an agricultural regiment were employed. The estate is like a well-ordered garden—we walked into a huge field of potatoes, and the landlord made us remark that there was not a single weed between the furrows; and the whole formed a vast flower-bed of a score of acres. Every bit of land up to the hedge-side was fertilized and full of produce: the space left for the plough having afterwards been gone over, and yielding its fullest proportion of "fruit." In a turnip-field were a score or more of women and children, who were marching through the ridges, removing the young plants where two or three had grown together, and leaving only the most healthy. Every individual root in the field was thus the object of culture; and the owner said that this extreme cultivation answered his purpose, and that the employment of all these hands (the women and children earn 6d. and 8d. a-day all the year round,) which gained him some reputation as a philanthropist, brought him profit as a farmer too; for his crops were the best that land could produce. He has further the advantage of a large stock for manure, and does everything for the land which art can do. Here we saw several experiments in manuring. An acre of turnips prepared with bone-dust; another with "Murray's Composition," whereof I do not pretend to know the ingredients; another with a new manure called Guano. As far as turnips and a first-year's crop went, the Guano carried the day. The plants on the Guano acre looked to be three weeks in advance of their neighbours, and were extremely plentiful and healthy. I went to see this field two months after the above passage was written; the Guano acre still kept the lead; the bone-dust run Guano very hard; and Composition was clearly distanced.

Behind the house is a fine village of corn and hay ricks, and a street of out-buildings, where all the work of the farm is prepared. Here were numerous people coming with pails for buttermilk, which the good-natured landlord made over to them. A score of men or more were busied about the place; some at a grindstone, others at a forge—other fellows busied in the cart-houses and stables, all of which were as neatly kept as in the best farm in England. A little further on was a flower-garden, a kitchen-garden, a hot-house just building, a kennel of fine pointers and setters;—indeed a noble feature of country neatness, thrift and plenty.

We went into the cottages and gardens of several of Mr. P——'s labourers, which were all so neat, that I could not help fancying they were pet cottages erected under the landlord's own superintendence, and ornamented to his order. But he declared that it was not so; that the only benefit his labourers got from him was constant work, and a house rent-free; and that the neatness of the gardens and dwellings was of their own doing. By making them a present of the house, he said, he made them a present of the pig and live stock, with which almost every Irish cottar pays his rent, so that each workman could have a bit of meat for his support;—would that all labourers in the empire had as much! With regard to the neatness of the houses, the best way to ensure this, he said, was for the master constantly to visit them—to awaken as much emulation as he could amongst the cottagers, so that each should make his place as good as his neighbour's—and to take them good-humouredly to task if they failed in the requisite care. And so this pleasant day's visit ended.

In contemplating this scene of Irish prosperity, Mr. Titmarsh becomes a philosopher, for we will not believe that he is at all a courtier. He remarks—

There are some happy organizations in the world which possess the great virtue of prosperity. It implies cheerfulness, simplicity, shrewdness, perseverance, honesty, good health. See how, before the good-humoured resolution of such characters, ill-luck gives way, and fortune assumes their own smiling complexion! Such men grow rich without driving a single hard bargain; their condition being to make others prosper along with themselves. Thus, his very charity, another informant tells me, is one of the causes of my host's good fortune. He might have three pounds a-year from each of forty cottages, but instead prefers a hundred healthy workmen; or he might have a fourth of the number of workmen, and a farm yielding a produce proportionately less; but instead of saving the money of their wages, prefers a farm, the produce of which, as I have heard from a gentleman whom I take to be good authority, is unequalled elsewhere.

Besides the cottages, we visited a pretty school, where children of an exceeding smallness were at their work,—the children of the Catholic peasantry. The few Protestants of the district do not attend the national school, nor learn their alphabet or their multiplication-table in company with their little Roman Catholic brethren. The clergyman, who lives hard by the gate of H—— town, in his communication with his parishioners, cannot fail to see how much misery is relieved, and how much good is done by his neighbour; but though the two gentlemen are on good terms, the clergyman will not break bread with his Catholic fellow-christian.

Long life to you, Mr. P——! Hold on your way, and never you mind the parson. As we are among Irish interiors, we shall keep there some time longer; though it should prevent us from taking things in order. The second night's stopping-place, if less trim, refined, and well-appointed, was not less happy, and, we suspect, much more Irish.

Our day's journey lay through a country more picturesque, though by no means so prosperous and well-cultivated as the district through which we had passed on our drive from Dublin. This trip carried us through the county of Carlow, and the town of that name; a wretched place enough, with a fine court-house, and a couple of fine churches. . . . . There is a convent by the side of the cathedral, and, of course, a parcel of beggars all about, and indeed all over the town, profuse in their prayers and invocations of the Lord, and whining flatteries of the persons whom they address. One wretched old tottering hag began whining the Lord's prayer as a proof of her sincerity, and blundered in the very midst of it, and left us thoroughly disgusted after the very first sentence.

Mr. Titmarsh was predetermined not to give a single rap to any of those bleared, disgusting, impudent, witty, and canting beggars which so move the mirth or tenderness of all other travellers, and he in general kept his word. He first tells a very good story of the Landlord of the Royal Oak at Leighlin Bridge, and then we get into quarters:—

Soon after quitting the Royal Oak, our road branches off to the hospitable house where our party, consisting of a dozen persons, was to be housed and fed for the night. Fancy the look which an English gentleman of moderate means would assume, at being called on to receive such a company! A pretty road of a couple of miles, thickly grown with ash and oak trees, under which the hats of coach passengers suffered some danger, leads to the house of D——. A young son of the house, on a white pony, was on the look-out, and great cheering and shouting took place among the young people as we came in sight.

Trotting away by the carriage-side, he brought us through a gate with a pretty avenue of trees leading to the pleasure-grounds of the house—a handsome building commanding noble views of river, mountains, and plantations. Our entertainer only rents the place; so I may say, without any imputation against him, that the house was by no means so handsome within as without,—not that the want of finish in the interior made our party the less merry, or the host's entertainment less hearty and cordial.

The gentleman who built and owns the house, like many other proprietors in Ireland, found his mansion too expensive for his means, and has relinquished it. I asked what his income might be, and no wonder that he was compelled to resign his house; which a man with four times the income in England, would scarcely venture to inhabit. There were numerous sitting-rooms below; a large suite of rooms above, in which our large party, with their servants, disappeared without any seeming inconvenience, and which already accommodated a family of at least a dozen persons and a numerous train of domestics. There was a great court-yard, surrounded by capital offices, with stabling and coach-houses sufficient for a half-dozen of country gentlemen. An English squire of ten thousand a-year might live in such a place—the original owner, I am told, had not many more hundreds.

Our host has wisely turned the chief part of the pleasure-ground round the house into a farm; nor did the land look a bit the worse, as I thought, for having rich crops of potatoes growing in place of grass, and fine plots of waving wheat and barley. The care, skill, and neatness everywhere exhibited, and the immense luxuriance of the crops, could not fail to strike even a Cockney; and one of our party, a very well-known, practical farmer, told me that there was at least five hundred pounds worth of produce upon the little estate of some sixty acres, of which only twenty-five were under the plough.

As at H——town, on the previous day, several men and women appeared sauntering in the grounds, and as the master came up, asked for work, or sixpence, or told a story of want. There are lodge-gates at both ends of the demesne; but it appears the good-natured practice of the country admits a beggar as well as any other visiter. To a couple our landlord gave money, to another a little job of work; another he sent roughly out of the premises: and I could judge thus what a continual tax upon the Irish gentleman these travelling paupers must be, of whom his ground is never free.

There, loitering about the stables and out-houses, were several people who seemed to have acquired a sort of right to be there: women and children who had a claim upon the buttermilk; men who did an odd job now and then; loose hangers-on of the family: and in the lodging-houses and inns I have entered, the same sort of ragged vassals are to be found; in a house, however poor, you are sure to see some poorer dependant who is a stranger, taking a meal of potatoes in the kitchen; a Tim or Mike loitering hard by, ready to run on a message, or carry a bag. This is written, for instance, at a lodging over a shop in Cork. There sits in the shop a poor old fellow quite past work, but who totters up and down stairs to the lodgers, and does what little he can for his easily-won bread. There is another fellow outside who is sure to make his bow to anybody issuing from the lodging, and ask if his honour wants an errand done! Neither class of such dependants exist with us. What housekeeper in London is there will feed an old man of seventy that 's good for nothing, or encourage such a disreputable hanger-on as yonder shuffling, smiling cad!

Nor did Mr. M—'s "irregulars" disappear with the day; for when, after a great deal of merriment and kind happy dancing and romping of young people, the fineness of the night suggested the propriety of smoking a certain cigar, (it is never more acceptable than at that season,) the young squire voted that we should adjourn to the stables for the purpose, where accordingly the cigars were discussed. There were still the inevitable half-dozen hangers-on: one came grinning with a lantern, all nature being in universal blackness except his grinning face; another ran obsequiously to the stables to show a favourite mare—I think it was a mare—though it may have been a mule, and your humble servant not much the wiser. The cloths were taken off; the fellows with the candles crowded about; and the young squire bade me admire the beauty of her fore-leg, which I did with the greatest possible gravity. Did you ever see such a fore-leg as that in your life? says the young squire, and further discoursed upon the horse's points, the amateur grooms joining in chorus.

There was another young squire of our party, a pleasant gentlemanlike young fellow, who danced as prettily as any Frenchman, and who had ridden over from a neighbouring house. As I went to bed, the two lads were arguing whether young Squire B— should go home or stay at D— that night. There was a bed for him—there was a bed for everybody, it seemed, and a kind welcome too. How different was all this to the ways of a severe English house!

Next morning the whole of our merry party assembled round a long, jovial breakfast-table, stored with all sorts of good things; and the biggest and jovialest man of all, who had just come in fresh from a walk in the fields, and vowed that he was as hungry as a hunter, and was cutting some slices out of an inviting ham on the side-table, suddenly let fall his knife and fork with dismay. "Sure, John, don't you know it's Friday," cried a lady from the table; and back John came with a most lugubrious queer look on his jolly face, and fell to work upon bread and butter, as resigned as possible, amidst no small laughter, as may be well imagined. On this I was bound, as a Protestant, to eat a large slice of pork, and discharged that duty nobly, and with much self-sacrifice.

The famous "drag" which had brought us so far, seemed to be as hospitable and elastic as the house which we now left; for the coach accommodated, inside and out, a considerable party from the house, and we took our road leisurely, in a cloudless, scorching day, towards Waterford.

Don't you think this clever sketching, courteous reader? and don't you also think that Mr. Titmarsh knows how to select his subjects with some taste and judgment? We get on. Here next comes Ballyhale, a posting village, and its ancient population basking in the noon-day sun, as happy, and at leisure, as if they had no more to do or care for than Wordsworth's gypsies. There is a picture of this scene, on which the hard-worked or worried lawyer, physician, merchant, editor, or penny-a-liner of London, may look with envy, and sigh over his own unending toils.

At the great Cattle Show at Cork, a very grand and really interesting occasion, for it seems to have been the first of the kind ever held there, our Cockney friend showed himself a much better judge of the respective dinners of the rival hôtels, the Whig and the Tory houses, than of breed or condition. He wishes that Mr. Cuff of the Freemasons' Tavern had been in Cork to take a leaf out of the carte of the Whig, or guinea-a-head landlord of that city. He is not able to speak so favourably of the Conservative half-guinea host, who served up only cold joints—allowed poor pints a-man of bad wine, the whisky-punch to be paid for extra. One aged nobleman present set up the Cockney's bristles by talking of the landed gentry "condescending upon proper occasions," like this, to dine with farmers. He is eloquent on the subject:—

Prodigious condescension truly! This neat speech seemed to me an oratoric slap on the face to about nine hundred and seventy persons present; and being one of the latter, I began to hiss by way of acknowledgment of the compliment, and hoped that a strong party would have destroyed the harmony of the evening, and done likewise. But not one hereditary bondsman would join in the compliment—and they were quite right too. The old lord who talked about condescension is one of the greatest and kindest landlords in Ireland. If he thinks he condescends by doing his duty and mixing with men as good as himself, the fault lies with the latter. Why are they so ready to go down on their knees to my lord? A man can't help "condescending" to another who will persist in kissing his shoe-strings. They respect rank in England—the people seem almost to adore it here.

Now the fact is, that mere rank, "the guinea's stamp," does not fail of worship even in England. But we come to better things:—

After the grand dinner came a grand ball, which was indeed one of the gayest and prettiest sights ever seen; nor was it the less agreeable, because the ladies of the city mixed with the ladies from the country, and vied with them in grace and beauty. The charming gaiety and frankness of the Irish ladies have been noted and admired by every foreigner who has had the good fortune to mingle in their society; and I hope it is not detracting from the merit of the upper classes, to say that the lower are not a whit less pleasing. I never saw in any country such a general grace of manner and ladykood.

In regard of the Munster ladies, I had the pleasure to be present at two or three evening parties at Cork, and must say that they seem to excel the English ladies not only in wit and vivacity, but in the still more important article of the toilette. They are as well dressed as French women, and incomparably handsomer; and if ever this book reaches a thirtieth edition, and I can find out better words to express admiration, they shall be inserted here. Among the ladies' accomplishments, I may mention, that I have heard in two or three private families such fine music as is rarely to be met with out of a capital. In one house we had a supper and songs afterwards, in the old honest fashion. Time was in Ireland when the custom was a common one; but the world grows languid as it grows genteel; and I fancy it requires more than ordinary spirit and courage now for a good old gentleman, at the head of his kind family table, to strike up a good old family song.

The delightful old gentleman who sung the song here mentioned, could not help talking of the Temperance Movement with a sort of regret, and said that all the fun had gone out of Ireland since Father Mathew banished the whisky from it.

We recommend the Ursuline Convent, and the Père La Chaise of Cork to all sentimental readers, but especially to young ladies, and come to one of the most remarkable of modern men, namely that same Father Mathew of whom we have all heard.

On the day we arrived at Cork, and as the passengers descended from the "drag," a stout, handsome, honest-looking man, of some two-and-forty years, was passing by, and received a number of bows from the crowd around. It was THEOBALD MATHEW, with whose face a thousand little print-shop windows had already rendered me familiar. He shook hands with the master of the carriage very cordially, and just as cordially with the master's coachman, a disciple of temperance, as at least half Ireland is at present. The day after the famous dinner at MacDowall's, some of us came down rather late, perhaps in consequence of the events of the night before—(I think it was Lord Bernard's quotation from Virgil, or else the absence of the currant jelly for the venison, that occasioned a slight headache among some of us, and an extreme longing for soda water,)—and there was the Apostle of Temperance seated at the table drinking tea.

. . . . . The world likes to know how a great man appears even to a valet-de-chambre, and I suppose it is one's vanity that is flattered in such rare company to find the great man quite as unassuming as the very smallest personage present; and so like to other mortals, that we would not know him to be a great man at all, did we not know his name, and what he had done. There is nothing remarkable in Mr. Mathew's manner, except that it is exceedingly simple, hearty, and manly, and that he does not wear the downcast, demure look which, I know not why, certainly characterizes the chief part of the gentlemen of his profession. Whence comes that general scowl which darkens the faces of the Irish priesthood? I have met a score of these reverend gentlemen in the country, and not one of them seemed to look or speak frankly, except Mr. Mathew, and a couple more. He is almost the only man, too, that I have met in Ireland, who, in speaking of public matters, did not talk as a partizan. With the state of the country, of landlord, tenant, and peasantry, he seemed to be most curiously and intimately acquainted; speaking of their wants, differences, and the means of bettering them, with the minutest practical knowledge. And it was impossible in hearing him, to know, but from previous acquaintance with his character, whether he was Whig or Tory, Catholic or Protestant. Why does not Government make a Privy Councillor of him?—that is, if he would honour the Right Honourable body by taking a seat amongst them. His knowledge of the people is prodigious, and their confidence in him as great; and what a touching attachment that is which these poor fellows show to any one who has their cause at heart—even to any one who says he has!

Avoiding all political questions, no man seems more eager than he for the practical improvement of this country. Leases and rents, farming improvements, reading societies, music societies—he was full of these, and of his schemes of temperance above all. He never misses a chance of making a convert, and has his hand ready and a pledge in his pocket for sick or poor. One of his disciples, in a livery coat, came into the room with a tray—Mr. Mathew recognised him, and shook him by the hand directly; so he did with the strangers who were presented to him; and not with a courtly, popularity-hunting air, but, as it seemed, from sheer hearty kindness, and a desire to do every one good.

Cork, in some of its quarters, seems the very Naples of the British dominions. Dublin has the Bay, but Cork boasts the Lazzaroni population. After referring to the dulness and loneliness of the best streets in the respectable quarter of the city, our lively friend continues thus:—

I have mentioned the respectable quarter of the city—for there are quarters in it swarming with life, but of such a frightful kind as no pen need care to describe; alleys where the odours and rags and darkness are so hideous, that one runs frightened away from them. In some of them, they say, not the policeman, only the priest, can penetrate. I asked a Roman catholic clergyman of the city to take me into some of these haunts, but he refused very justly; and indeed a man may be quite satisfied with what he can see in the mere outskirts of the districts, without caring to penetrate further. Not far from the quays is an open space where the poor hold a market or bazaar. Here is liveliness and business enough: ragged women chattering and crying their beggarly wares; ragged boys gloating over dirty apple and pie stalls; fish frying, and raw, and stinking; clothes-booths, where you might buy a wardrobe for scarecrows; old nails, hoops, bottles, and marine wares; old battered furniture, that has been sold against starvation. In the streets round about this place, on a sunshiny day, all the black gaping windows and mouldy steps are covered with squatting lazy figures,—women with bare breasts, nursing babies, and leering a joke as you pass by,—ragged children paddling everywhere. It is but two minutes' walk out of Patrick Street, where you come upon a fine flashy shop of plated goods, or a grand French emporium of dolls, walking-sticks, carpet-bags, and perfumery. The markets hard by have a rough, old-fashioned, cheerful look; it's a comfort after the misery to hear a red butcher's wife crying after you to buy an honest piece of meat. The poor-house, newly established, cannot hold a fifth part of the poverty of this great town.

The excessive gentility of the shopkeepers in Dublin, Cork, and Limerick, all alike, is duly noticed by Mr. Titmarsh. They will hardly condescend to wait upon a customer on any terms, but never till it quite suits themselves. The want of small change is another feature as remarkable as the indifference to customers. In Cork, change for a five-pound note could not be obtained without sending to the bank; and at the post-office.—But this is a grievance that should be put on record. It is intolerable.

I received six £5 Post-office orders; I called four times on as many different days at the Post-office before the capital could be forthcoming, getting on the third application £20, (after making a great clamour, and vowing that such things were unheard-of in England,) and on the fourth call, the remaining £10. I saw poor people who may have come from the country with their orders, refused payment of an order of some 40s.; and a gentleman who tendered a pound-note in payment of a foreign letter, told to "leave his letter and pay some other time." Such things could not take place in the hundred-and-second city in England.

We leave our Irish friends to mark and inwardly digest what follows. It is but one of the many symptoms and indications of an inveterate disease corroding the entire fabric of Irish society.

Half-a-dozen of the public buildings I saw were spacious and shabby beyond all Cockney belief. Adjoining the Imperial Hôtel is a great, large, handsome, desolate reading-room, which was founded by a body of Cork merchants and tradesmen, and is the very picture of decay. Not Palmyra—not the Russell Institution in Great Coram Street—present more melancholy appearances of faded greatness. Opposite this is another institution, called the Cork Library, where there are plenty of books, and plenty of kindness to the stranger; but the shabbiness and faded splendour of the place are quite painful. There are three handsome Catholic churches commenced of late years; not one of them is complete. Two want their porticoes; the other is not more than thirty feet from the ground; and, according to the architectural plan, was to rise as high as a cathedral. There is an institution, with a fair library of scientific works; a museum, and a drawing-school with a supply of casts. The place is in yet more dismal condition than the library. The plasters are spoiled incurably for want of a sixpenny feather-brush; the dust lies on the walls, and nobody seems to heed it. Two shillings a-year would have repaired much of the evil which has happened to this institution; and it is folly to talk of inward dissensions and political differences as causing the ruin of such institutions. Kings or laws don't cause or cure dust and cobwebs; but indolence leaves them to accumulate, and imprudence will not calculate its income, and vanity exaggerates its own powers, and the fault is laid upon that tyrant of a sister kingdom. The whole country is filled with such failures; swaggering beginnings that could not be carried through; grand enterprises begun dashingly, and ending in shabby compromises or downright ruin.

The citizens of Cork are distinguished by their love of literature, and for their literary taste and talent, and the wit and vivacity of their conversation—distinguished to a degree which astonished the Cockney. "What," he asks, "do the ladies and gentlemen of Baker Street know about it?"

Who ever reads books in the city, or how often does one hear them talked about at a club? The Cork citizens are the most book-loving men I ever met. The town has sent to England a number of literary men of reputation too, and is not a little proud of their fame. Everybody seemed to know what Maginn was doing, and that Father Prout had a third volume ready, and what was Mr. Croker's last article in The Quarterly. The young clerks and shopmen seemed as much au fait as their employers; and many is the conversation I heard about the merits of this writer or that—Dickens, Ainsworth, Lover, Lever.

Now all this might have happened in Belfast, Liverpool, Glasgow, and every place inoculated from Scotland. But what follows is more purely Munsterian:—

I listened to two boys almost in rags; they were lolling over the quay balustrade, and talking about one of the Ptolemys! and talking very well too. One of them had been reading in "Rollin," and was detailing his information with a great deal of eloquence and fire. Another day, walking in the Mardyke, I followed three boys, not half so well dressed as London errand-boys: one was telling the other about Captain Ross's voyages, and spoke with as much brightness and intelligence as the best-read gentleman's son in England could do. He was as much of a gentleman, too, the ragged young student; his manner as good, though perhaps more eager and emphatic; his language was extremely rich, too, and eloquent. Does the reader remember his school-days, when half-a-dozen lads in the bedrooms took it by turns to tell stories? How poor the language generally was, and how exceedingly poor the imagination! Both of those ragged Irish lads had the making of gentlemen, scholars, orators, in them.

What follows is, we fear, the most Irish of all. The traveller is luxuriating in the midst of a charming landscape in the environs of Cork, the beautiful river Lee before him, the city spires and towers in the distance, an old castle, with villas and parks innumerable lying all around; but

In the midst of your pleasure, three beggars have hobbled up, and are howling supplications to the Lord. One is old and blind, and so diseased and hideous, that straightway all the pleasure of the sight round about vanishes from you—that livid, ghastly face interposing between you and it. And so it is throughout the south and west of Ireland; the traveller is haunted by the face of the popular starvation. It is not the exception, it is the condition of the people. In this fairest and richest of countries, men are suffering and starving by millions. There are thousands of them at this minute stretched in the sunshine at their cabin doors, with no work, scarcely any food, no hope seemingly. Strong countrymen are lying in bed "for the hunger"—because a man lying on his back does not need so much food as a person a-foot. Many of them have torn up the unripe potatoes from their little gardens, and to exist now must look to winter, when they shall have to suffer starvation and cold too. The epicurean, and traveller for pleasure, had better travel anywhere than here; where there are miseries that one does not dare to think of; where one is always feeling how helpless pity is, and how hopeless relief, and is perpetually made ashamed of being happy.

I have just been strolling up a pretty little height called Grattan's Hill, that overlooks the town and the river, and where the artist that comes Cork-wards may find many subjects for his pencil. . . .

What a strange air of forlorn gaiety there is about the place!—the sky itself seems as if it did not know whether to laugh or cry, so full is it of clouds and sunshine. Little, fat, ragged smiling children are clambering about the rocks, and sitting on mossy door-steps, tending other children yet smaller, fatter, and more dirty. "Stop till I get you a posy," (pronounced pawawawsee) cries one urchin to another. "Tell me who is it ye love, Jooly," exclaims another, cuddling a red-faced infant with a very dirty nose. More of the same race are perched about the summer-house, and two wenches, with large purple feet, are flapping some carpets in the air. It is a wonder the carpets will bear this kind of treatment at all, and do not be off at once to mingle with the elements. I never saw things that hung to life by such a frail thread.

This dismal-pleasant place is a suburb of the second city in Ireland, and one of the most beautiful spots about the town. What a prim, bustling, active, green-railinged, tea-gardened, gravel-walked place would it have been in the five hundredth town in England!—but you see the people can be quite as happy in the rags and without the paint, and I hear a great deal more heartiness and affection from these children than from their fat, little brethren across the Channel.

If a man wanted to study ruins, here is a house close at hand, not forty years old, no doubt, but yet as completely gone to rack as Netley Abbey.

Our sketcher very ingeniously traces out the growth and decay of an Irish dwelling, where he alleges punch was brewed before the rain was kept out; and the inmates had balls and dinner-parties before the floors were firm, or the wainscots painted, if that be yet done. A tenement of this sort was lately, and may be still, inhabited by Mrs. Fagan, a young widow, whose establishment aptly illustrates the social condition of her country:—

The drawing-room of the tenement mentioned just now, with its pictures, and pulleyless windows, and lockless doors, was tenanted by a friend who lodged there with a sick wife and a couple of little children; one of whom was an infant in arms. It is not, however, the lodger, who is an Englishman, but the kind landlady and her family, who may well be described here—for their like are hardly to be found on the other side of the Channel. Mrs. Fagan is a young widow who has seen better days; and that portrait over the grand mantelpiece is the picture of her husband that is gone, a handsome young man, and well to do at one time as a merchant. But the widow (she is as pretty, as lady-like, as kind, and as neat as ever widow could be) has little left to live upon but the rent of her lodgings and her furniture, of which we have seen the best in the drawing-room.

She has three fine children of her own; there is Minny, and Katey, and Patsey, and they occupy indifferently the dining-room on the ground-floor, or the kitchen opposite: where, in the midst of a great smoke, sits an old nurse by a copper of potatoes which is always bubbling and full. Patsey swallows quantities of them, that's clear—his cheeks are as red and shining as apples; and when he roars, you are sure that his lungs are in the finest condition. Next door to the kitchen is the pantry, and there is a bucket full of the before-mentioned fruit, and a grand service of china for dinner and dessert. The kind young widow shows them with no little pride, and says with reason that there are few lodging-houses in Cork that can match such china as that. They are relics of the happy old times when Fagan kept his gig and horse, doubtless, and had his friends to dine—the happy, prosperous days which she has exchanged for poverty and the sad black gown.

Patsey, Minny, and Katey have made friends with the little English people up stairs; the elder of whom, in the course of a month, has as fine a Munster brogue as ever trolled over the lips of any born Corkagian. The old nurse carries out the whole united party to walk, with the exception of the English baby, that jumps about in the arms of a countrywoman of her own. That is, unless one of the four Miss Fagans take her; for four of them there are, four other Miss Fagans, from eighteen downwards to fourteen:—handsome, fresh, lively, dancing, bouncing girls. You may always see two or three of them smiling at the parlour window, and they laugh and turn away their heads when any young fellow looks and admires them.

Now, it stands to reason that a young widow of five-and-twenty can't be the mother of four young ladies of eighteen downwards; and, if anybody wants to know how they come to be living with the poor widow their cousin, the answer is, they are on a visit. Peggy the maid says, their papa is a gentleman of property, and can "spend his eight hundred a year."

Why don't they remain with the old gentleman, then, instead of quartering on the poor young widow, who has her own little mouths to feed? The reason is, the old gentleman has gone and married his cook; and the daughters have quitted him in a body, refusing to sit down to dinner with a person who ought, by rights, to be in the kitchen. The whole family (the Fagans are of good family) take the quarrel up, and here are the young people under shelter of the widow.

Four merrier, tender-hearted girls are not to be found in all Ireland; and the only subject of contention amongst them is, which shall have the English baby; they are nursing it, and singing to it, and dandling it by turns all day long. When they are not singing to the baby, they are singing to an old piano; such an old, wiry, jingling, wheezy piano! It has plenty of work, playing jigs and song-accompaniments between meals, and acting as a sideboard at dinner. I am not sure that it is at rest at night either; but have a shrewd suspicion that it is turned into a four-post bed. . . . . .

One word more regarding the Widow Fagan's house. When Peggy brought in coals for the drawing-room fire, she carried them—in what, do you think? "In a coal-scuttle, to be sure," says the English reader, down on you as sharp as a needle.

No, you clever Englishman, it wasn't a coal-scuttle.

"Well, then, it was in a fire-shovel," says that brightest of wits, guessing again.

No, it wasn't a fire-shovel, you heaven-born genius: and you might guess from this until Mrs. Snooks called you up to coffee, and you would never find out. It was in something which I have already described in Mrs. Fagan's pantry.

"Oh, I have you now, it was the bucket where the potatoes were; the thlatternly wetch!" says Snooks.

Wrong again—Peggy brought up the coals—in a CHINA PLATE!

From Cork, Mr. Titmarsh set out for the Lakes, sketching all the way the market people, the rich river banks, old castles and trees, Irish clouds, (which, it seems, have a physiognomy and form of their own) stage-coaches, carts and cars, &c., &c. We take the group which at Skibbereen hailed the "Skibbereen Perseverance," a wondrous vehicle:—

Some gentlemen were at the coach besides those of lower degree. Here was a fat fellow with large whiskers, a geranium, and a cigar; yonder a tall handsome old man that I would swear was a dragoon on half-pay. He had a little cap, a Taglioni coat, a pair of beautiful spaniels, and a pair of knee-breeches which showed a very handsome old leg; and his object seemed to be to invite everybody to dinner as they got off the coach—no doubt he has seen the "Skibbereen Perseverance" come in ever since it was a "Perseverance." It is wonderful to think what will interest men in prisons or country towns!

There is a dirty coffee-room with a strong smell of whisky; indeed three young "materialists" are employed at the moment: and I hereby beg to offer an apology to three other gentlemen—the Captain, another, and the gentleman of the geranium, who had caught hold of a sketching-stool which is my property, and were stretching it, and sitting upon it, and wondering, and talking of it, when the owner came in, and they bounced off to their seats like so many school-boys. Dirty as the place was, this was no reason why it should not produce an exuberant dinner of trouts and Kerry mutton; after which Dan the waiter, holding up a dingy decanter, asks how much whisky I'd have?

It was Sunday—

The people came flocking into the place by hundreds, and you saw their blue cloaks dotting the road and the bare open plains beyond. The men came with shoes and stockings to-day, the women all bare-legged, and many of them might be seen washing their feet in the stream, before they went up to the chapel. The street seemed to be lined on either side with blue cloaks, squatting along the doorways as is their wont. Among these, numberless cows were walking to and fro, and pails of milk passing, and here and there a hound or two went stalking about. Dan, the waiter, says they are hunted by the handsome old Captain who was yesterday inviting everybody to dinner.

After a long stroll, Mr. Titmarsh felt ready for breakfast, which, however, was no reason whatever, in an Irish hostelrie, that breakfast should be ready for him. He says—

After making several useless applications to a bell, (which properly declined to work on Sundays,) I made a personal descent to the inn-kitchen, where was not a bad study for a painter. It is a huge room, with a peat fire burning, and a staircase walking up one side of it, on which stair was a damsel in a partial though by no means picturesque dishabille. The cook had just come in with a great frothing pail of milk, and sat with her arms folded; the hostler's boy sat dangling his legs from the table; the hostler was dandling a noble little boy of a year old, at whom Mrs. Cook likewise grinned delighted. Here, too, sat Mr. Dan, the waiter; and no wonder breakfast was delayed, for all three of these worthy domestics seemed delighted with the infant.

He was handed over to the gentleman's arms for the space of thirty seconds; the gentleman being the father of a family, and of course an amateur.

"Say Dan for the gentleman," says the delighted Cook.

"Dada," says the baby; at which the assembly grinned with joy: and Dan promised I should have my breakfast "in a hurry."

But of all the wonderful things to be seen in Skibbereen, Dan's pantry is the most wonderful:—every article within is a make-shift, and has been ingeniously perverted from its original destination. Here lie bread, blacking, fresh-butter, tallow-candles, dirty knives,—all in the same cigar-box, with snuff, milk, cold bacon, brown sugar, broken tea-cups, and bits of soap. No pen can describe that establishment, as no English imagination could have conceived it.

At Bantry he tried to make a sketch of the cabins. Sketchers in general do not object to those little dilapidations, or departures from the right line which heighten the effect of the picturesque; but here!—

As for drawing them, it was in vain to try; one might as well make a sketch of a bundle of rags. An ordinary pig-stye in England is really more comfortable. Most of them were not six feet long or five feet high, built of stones huddled together, a hole being left for the people to creep in at, a ruined thatch to keep out some little portion of the rain. The occupiers of these places sat at their doors in tolerable contentment, or the children came down and washed their feet in the water. I declare I believe a Hottentot kraal has more comforts in it: even to write of the place makes one unhappy, and the words move slow. But in the midst of all this misery there is an air of actual cheerfulness; and go but a few score of yards off, and these wretched hovels lying together look really picturesque and pleasing.

The rain had fallen pitilessly at Glengariff, day after day, and the cars to Tralee failed to come up, when a fortunate adventure relieved the tedium of the delay. He fell in (as if fortune desired to make him amends for the delay,) with a set of jovial Irish yachtsmen, like himself bound for Killarney, whither indeed all the world was hurrying.

A merrier set of fellows it were hard to meet. "Should you like anything to drink, Sir?" says one, commencing the acquaintance: "we have the best whisky in the world, and plenty of porter in the basket." Therewith the jolly seamen produced a long bottle of grog, which was passed round from one to another; and then began singing, shouting, laughing, roaring for the whole journey, "British sailors have a knack, pull away ho, boys! Hurroo! my fine fellow, does your mother know you're out? Hurroo, Tim Herlihy! you're a fluke, Tim Herlihy." One man sang on the roof, one hurrooed to the echo, another apostrophized the aforesaid Herlihy as he passed grinning on a car; a third had a pocket-handkerchief flaunting from a pole, with which he performed exercises in the face of any horseman whom we met; and great were their yells as the ponies shied off at the salutation, and the riders swerved in their saddles. In the midst of this rattling chorus we went along: gradually the country grew wilder and more desolate, and we passed through a grim mountain region, bleak and bare; the road winding round some of the innuinetable hills, and once or twice, by means of a tunnel, rushing boldly through them. One of these tunnels, they say, is a couple of hundred yards long; and a pretty howling, I need not say, was made through that pipe of rock by the jolly yacht's crew. "We saw you sketching in the blacksmith's shade at Glengariff," says one, "and we wished we had you on board. Such a jolly life we led of it!"—They roved about the coast, they said, in their vessel; they feasted off the best of fish, mutton, and whisky; they had Gamble's turtle-soup on board, and fun from morning till night, and vice versâ. Gradually it came out that there was not, owing to the tremendous rains, a dry corner in their ship; that they slung two in a huge hammock in the cabin, and that one of their crew had been ill, and shirked off. What a wonderful thing pleasure is! to be wet all day and night; to be scorched and blistered by the sun and rain; to beat in and out of little harbours, and to exceed diurnally upon whisky-punch—faith, London, and an arm-chair at the club, are more to the tastes of some men.

An Irish stage-coach is quite as hospitable, it would appear, as anything else of Irish construction that has a roof to it. All the passengers that offered along the road were made welcome; and once mounted, held on as they best could, or if they fell off, got up again. But of the extras:—

The fact must be told, that five of the new passengers (I don't count a little boy besides) were women, and very pretty, gay, frolicsome, lively, kind-hearted, innocent women too; and for the rest of the journey there was no end of laughing, and shouting, and singing, and hugging, so that the caravan presented the appearance which is depicted in the frontispiece of this work.

Now it may be a wonder to some persons, that with such a cargo the carriage did not upset, or some of us did not fall off; to which the answer is, that we did fall off. A very pretty woman fell off, and showed a pair of never-mind-what-coloured garters, and an interesting English traveller fell off too; but, Heaven bless you! these cars are made to fall off from: and considering the circumstances of the case and in the same company, I would rather fall off than not. A great number of polite allusions and genteel inquiries were, as may be imagined, made by the jolly boat's crew. But though the lady affected to be a little angry at first, she was far too good-natured to be angry long, and at last fairly burst out laughing with the passengers. We did not fall off again, but held on very tight, and just as we were reaching Killarney, saw somebody else fall off from another car.

Thus merrily they entered "ould Killarney;" but Here my companion suddenly let go my hand, and, by a certain uneasy motion of the waist, gave me notice to withdraw the other too; and so we rattled up to the Kenmare Arms: and so ended, not without a sigh on my part, one of the merriest six-hour rides that five yachtsmen, one Cockney, five women and a child, the carman, and a countryman with an alpeen, ever took in their lives. As for my fellow companion, she would hardly speak the next day, but all the five maritime men made me vow and promise that I would go and see them at Cork, where I should have horses to ride, the fastest yacht out of the harbour to sail in, and the best of whisky, claret, and welcome. Amen, and may every single person who buys a copy of this book meet with the same deserved fate.

The town of Killarney was in a violent state of excitement with a series of horse-races, hurdle-races, boat-races, and stag-hunts by land and water, which were taking place, and attracted a vast crowd from all parts of the kingdom. All the inns were full, and lodgings cost five shillings a-day, nay, more in some places; for though my landlady, Mrs. Macgillicuddy, charges but that sum, a leisurely old gentleman whom I never saw in my life before, made my acquaintance by stopping me in the street, yesterday, and said he paid a pound a-day for his two bed-rooms.

But the races, boating, the stag-hunt, &c., &c., we must leave untouched to the enviable purchaser of Mr. Titmarsh's volumes. Besides, we once had a stag-hunt at Killarney ourselves,* which has never yet been matched; and as for old Abbeys like Mucruss, and show-domains like Mr. Herbert's, they may be had anywhere. Here is a moral lesson:—

All round the town miserable streets of cabins are stretched. You see people lolling at each door, women staring and combing their hair, men with their little pipes, children whose rags hang on by a miracle, idling in a gutter. Are we to set all this down to absenteeism, and pity poor injured Ireland? Is the landlord's absence the reason why the house is filthy, and Biddy lolls in the porch all day? Upon my word, I have heard people talk as if, when Pat's thatch was blown off, the landlord ought to go fetch the straw and the ladder, and mend it himself. People need not be dirty if they are ever so idle; if they are ever so poor, pigs and men need not live together. Half an hour's work, and digging a trench, might remove that filthy dunghill from that filthy window. The smoke might as well come out of the chimney as out of the door. Why should not Tim do that, instead of walking a hundred and sixty miles to a race? The priests might do much more to effect these reforms, than even the landlords themselves: and I hope, now that the excellent Father Mathew has succeeded in arraying his clergy to work with him in the abolition of drunkenness, they will attack the monster Dirt with the same good-will, and surely with the same success.

It is a brave speech, Mr. Titmarsh; but the ancient union between dirt and idleness is not so easily repealed as you seem to take for granted. The Cockney did not much admire Tralee, and never once appears to have thought of O'Connell while in that neighbourhood. He went on to Tarbet, and reached Limerick by one of the steamers that ply between Kilrush and that city; and have done for twenty-five years; so that there is little more to tell of the navigation, nor yet of that Sovereign river the Mighty Shannon. Something novel is made out of the population of Limerick:—

I asked one of the ten thousand fruit-women the price of her green pears. "Twopence a-piece," she said; and there were two little ragged beggars standing by, who were munching the fruit; a book-shop-woman made me pay threepence for a bottle of ink which usually costs a penny; a potato-woman told me that her potatoes cost fourteen-pence a stone; and all these ladies treated the stranger with a leering, wheedling servility, which made me long to box their ears, were it not that them and who lays his hand upon a woman is an—, &c. After you get out of the main street, the handsome part of the town is at an end, and you suddenly find yourself in such a labyrinth of busy swarming poverty and squalid commerce as never was seen—no not in Saint Giles', where Jew and Irishman side by side exhibit their genius for dirt. Here every house almost was a half ruin, and swarming with people; in the cellars you looked down and saw a barrel of herrings, which a merchant was dispensing; or a sack of meal, which a poor, dirty woman sold to people poorer and dirtier than herself; above was a tinman, or a shoemaker, or other craftsman, his battered ensign at the door, and his small wares peering through the cracked panes of his shop. As for the ensign, as a matter of course, the name [be it James Hurley or Pat Hanlahan] is never written in letters of the same size. . . .

Well, over James Hurley, or Pat Hanlahan, you will most likely see another board of another tradesman, with a window to the full as curious. Above Tim Carthy evidently lives another family; there are long-haired girls of fourteen at every one of the windows, and dirty children everywhere. In the cellars, look at them in dingy white night-caps over a bowl of stirabout;

* See Tait's Magazine for May 1833.

in the shop, paddling up and down the ruined steps, or issuing from beneath the black counter; up above, see the girl of fourteen is tossing and dandling one of them, and a pretty tender sight it is, in the midst of this filth and wretchedness, to see the women and children together. It makes a sunshine in the dark place, and somehow half reconciles one to it. Children are everywhere—look out of the nasty streets into the still more nasty back-lanes; there they are, sprawling at every door and court, paddling in every puddle, and in about a fair proportion to every six children, an old woman; a very old, blear-eyed, ragged woman, who makes believe to sell something out of a basket, and is perpetually calling upon the name of the Lord. For every three ragged, old women, you will see two ragged, old men, praying and moaning like the females; and there is no lack of young men, either, though I never could make out what they were about: they loll about the street, chiefly conversing in knots; and in every street you will be pretty sure to see a recruiting sergeant, with gay ribands in his cap, loitering about with an eye upon the other loiterers there. The buz, and hum, and chattering of this crowd is quite inconceivable to us in England, where a crowd is generally silent: as a person with a decent coat passes, they stop in their talk, and say, "God bless you for a fine gentleman!" In these crowded streets, where all are beggars, the beggary is but small: only the very old and hideous venture to ask for a penny, otherwise the competition would be too great.

On the way to Ennis we hear—

A great light of the Catholic church, who was of late a candlestick in our own communion, was on the coach with us, reading devoutly out of a breviary, on many occasions, along the road. A crowd of black coats and heads, with that indescribable look which belongs to the Catholic clergy, were evidently on the look-out for the coach; and as it stopped, one of them came up to me with a low bow, and asked if I was the Honourable and Reverend Mr. S——? How I wish I had answered him I was! It would have been a grand scene. The respect paid to this gentleman's descent is quite absurd—the papers bandy his title about with pleased emphasis—the Galway paper calls him the very Reverend. There is something in the love for rank almost childish: witness the adoration of George IV.; the pompous joy with which John Tuam records his correspondence with a great man; the continual my-lording of the Bishops, the Right-Honourabling of Mr. O'Connell—which title his party-papers delight on all occasions to give him—nay, the delight of that great man himself when first he attained the dignity; he figured in his robes in the most good-humoured simple delight at having them, and went to church forthwith in them, as if such a man wanted a title before his name.

At Ennis the Cockney bought a whole library of popular Irish classics for eighteenpence; which, to use a phrase of his own, he "discourses" at considerable length, in his Galway Nights' Entertainments, particularly the adventures and exploits of the Irish hero, Captain Freeny. One of the afternoon entertainments in Galway was helping one gentleman of the party at the coach dinner to three wings of turkey! Luckily there were two turkeys on this bountifully-spread table. "Does," our friend asks,

Everybody in Galway eat three wings when there are two turkeys for dinner? One has heard wonders of the country,—the dashing, daring, duelling, desperate, rollicking, whisky-drinking people: but this wonder beats all. When I asked the Galway turkiphagus (there is no other word, for turkey was invented long after Greece) "if he would take a third wing?" with a peculiar satiric accent on the words, third wing, which cannot be expressed in writing, but which the occasion fully merited, I thought, perhaps, that following the custom of the country, where everybody, according to Maxwell and Lever, challenges everybody else,—I thought the Galwagian would call me out: but no such thing. He only said, "If you plase, Sir," in the blandest way in the world; and gobbled up the limb in a twinkling. As an encouragement, too, for persons meditating that important change of condition, the gentleman was a teetotaller; he took but one glass of water to that intolerable deal of bubblyjock. Galway must be very much changed since the days when Maxwell and Lever knew it. Three turkey-wings and a glass of water! But the man cannot be the representative of a class, that is clear: it is physically and arithmetically impossible. They can't all eat three wings of two turkeys at dinner; the turkeys could not stand it, let alone the men.

The traveller went to Ballynahinch and Westport. At the inn at Leenane, his Cockney gallantry was sorely tried by a delicate specimen of the "finest pisantry:"

With a curtsy, came a young woman, who sold worsted socks at a shilling a-pair.

It required no small pains to entice this rustic beauty to stand, while a sketch should be made of her. Nor did any compliments or cajolements, on my part or the landlady's, bring about the matter; it was not until money was offered that the lovely creature consented. I offered (such is the ardour of the real artist) either to give her sixpence, or to purchase two pairs of her socks, if she would stand still for five minutes. On which she said she would prefer selling the socks. Then she stood still for a moment in the corner of the room; then she turned her face towards the corner, and the other part of her person towards the artist, and exclaimed in that attitude, "I must have a shilling more." Then I told her to go to the deuce. Then she made a proposition, involving the stockings and sixpence, which was similarly rejected; and finally, the above splendid design was completed at the price first stated.

However, as we went off, this timid little love barred the door for a moment, and said that "I ought to give her another shilling; that a gentleman would give her another shilling," and so on: she might have trod the London streets for ten years, and not have been more impudent and more greedy.

His post-boy to Westport was an unlicked cub, who spoke no English, and who had inherited the identical breeches worn by Humphrey Clinker when he gave such mortal offence to the delicate Mrs. Tabitha Bramble. They stopped at a hut on the dreary way;

The driver pulled out a bag of oats, and borrowing an iron-pot from the good people, half filled it with corn, which the poor, tired, galled, bewhipped, black horse began eagerly to devour. The young charioteer himself hinted very broadly his desire for a glass of whisky, which was the only kind of refreshment that this remote house of entertainment supplied.

In the various cabins I have entered, I have found talking a vain matter; the people are suspicious of the stranger within their wretched gates, and are shy, sly, and silent. I have, commonly, only been able to get half-answers in reply to my questions, given in a manner that seemed plainly to intimate that the visit was unwelcome.

That Mr. Titmarsh is no friend to arrogant churchmen, nor to priests of any order, is sufficiently obvious, whatever may be his peculiar religious opinions; nor does he spare long-winded, bad, extempore, Protestant sermons, any more than Romish superstitions. At Westport he heard a charity sermon preached, and saw bank-notes in the plate. He thus moralizes:—

If I were Defender of the Faith, I would issue an order to all priests and deacons to take to the book again; weighing well, before they uttered it, every word they proposed to say upon so great a subject as that of religion; and mistrusting that dangerous facility given by active jaws and a hot imagination. Reverend divines have adopted this habit, and keep us for an hour listening to what might well be told in ten minutes. . . . . Beware of too much talk, O parsons! If a man is to give an account of every idle word he utters, for what a number of such loud nothings, windy emphatic tropes and metaphors, spoken not for God's glory but the preacher's, will many a cushion-thumper have to answer! . . . . . .

A Pattern or Patron at Croagh-Phadric is not so joyous or pleasant as we had hoped to find so festive an occasion; and the penances of the several stations are most orthodoxly denounced by Mr. Titmarsh, who had been told the truth, and probably a little more, ere he said—

My informant describes the people as coming away from this "frightful exhibition, suffering severe pain, wounded and bleeding in the knees and feet, and some of the women shrieking with the pain of their wounds. Fancy thousands of these bent upon their work, and priests standing by to encourage them!—for shame, for shame! If all the popes, cardinals, bishops, hermits, priests, and deacons that ever lived, were to come forward and preach this as a truth—that to please God you must macerate your body, that the sight of your agonies is welcome to Him, and that your blood, groans, and degradation find favour in His eyes, I would not believe them. Better have over a company of Fakeers at once, and set the Suttee going. Of these tortures, however, I had not the fortune to witness a sight; for going towards the mountain for the first four miles, the only conveyance I could find was half the pony of an honest sailor, who said, when applied to, "I tell you what I do wid you: I give you a spell about;" but as it turned out we were going different ways, this help was but a small one. . . . . The pleasures of the poor people—for after the business on the mountain came the dancing and love-making at its foot—was woefully spoiled by the rain, which rendered dancing on the grass impossible; nor were the tents big enough for that exercise.

Our friend is somewhat severe on the admiration of all orders of the Irish for all manner of titles and decorations—an absurdity which never fails to provoke his ire. The "mouldy, dirty" town of Tuam, has a splendid Catholic cathedral, and over

The door is a huge coat of arms, surmounted by a Cardinal's hat—the arms of the See, no doubt, quartered with John Tuam's own patrimonial coat; and that was a frieze coat, from all accounts passably ragged at the elbows. Well, he must be a poor wag who could sneer at an old coat, because it was old and poor. But if a man changes it for a tawdry gimcrack suit, bedizened with twopenny tinsel, and struts about calling himself his Grace and my Lord, when may we laugh, if not then? There is something simple in the way in which these good people belord their clergymen, and respect titles real or sham. Take any Dublin paper,—a couple of columns of it are sure to be filled with movements of the small great men of the world. Accounts from Darrynane state that the Right Honourable the Lord Mayor is in good health—his Lordship went out with his beagles yesterday—or His Grace the Most Reverend the Lord Archbishop of Ballywhack, assisted by the Right Reverend the Lord Bishops of Trincomalee and Hippopotamus, assisted, &c.; or Colonel Tims, of Castle Tims, and lady, have quitted the Shelburne Hotel, with a party for Kilballybatherahins, where the august [This epithet is applied to the party of a Colonel somebody, in a Dublin paper,] party propose to enjoy a few days' shrimp-fishing—and so on.

Now, when Mr. Titmarsh asserts that the English have kicked down this humbug, one might fancy that he never sees the Morning Post. Nor can he perceive that the Irish show greater common sense in matters that more nearly concern them. An Irishman, on the top of the coach, was bewailing that the pretty village of Ahascragh must go to rack and ruin, because a certain agent was removed and another appointed; on which the incredulous Cockney exclaims:—

How is it that the presence of one man, more or less, should affect a set of people come to years of manhood, and knowing that they have their duty to do? Why should a man at Ahascragh let his home go to ruin, and stuff his windows with ragged breeches instead of glass because Mr. Smith is agent in place of Mr. Jones? Is he a child, that won't work unless the schoolmaster be at hand? or are we to suppose, with the Repealers, that the cause of all this degradation and misery is the intolerable tyranny of the sister country, and the pain which poor Ireland has been made to endure? This is very well at the Corn-Exchange, and among patriots after dinner; but, after all, granting the grievance of the franchise (though it may not be unfair to presume, that a man who has not strength of mind enough to mend his own breeches or his own windows, will always be the tool of one party or another,) there is no Inquisition set up in the country; the law tries to defend the people as much as they will allow; the odious tithe has even been whisked off from their shoulders to the landlords; they may live pretty much as they like. Is it not too monstrous to howl about English tyranny and suffering Ireland, and call for a Stephen's Green Parliament, to make the country quiet and the people industrious? The people are not politically worse-treated than their neighbours in England. The priests and the landlords, if they chose to coöperate, might do more for the country now than any kings or laws could. What you want here is not a Catholic or Protestant party, but an Irish party.

"True for ye," Mr. Titmarsh; but how is that national party to be gathered together? At Ballinasloe, as it was not the Fair time, all was found cheerless and comfortless; and the beggars more hideous and loathsome than anywhere else: and this is surely saying a great deal—

"A penny for the sake of poor little Mery," said another woman, who had a baby sleeping on her withered breast; and how can any one who has a little Mery at home, resist such an appeal? "Pity the poor blind man!" roared a respectably-dressed grenadier of a fellow. I told him to go to the gentleman with the red neck-cloth and fur cap, (a young buck from Trinity College,) to whom the blind man with much simplicity immediately stepped over; and as for the rest of the beggars, what pen or pencil could describe their hideous leering flattery, their cringing swindling humour!

Mr. Titmarsh is perfectly hardened against Irish beggars. He cannot appreciate their wit, which he thinks impudence; nor tolerate the whine, which to other travellers—we cannot always tell why—smacks of so rich a humour. In travelling from Ballinasloe back to Dublin, Mr. Titmarsh had for companions, on the top of the coach, a lot of Maynooth students, returning to the college at the end of their vacation. It is well they have a vacation; and would be better that they had more, if his account be substantially correct:—

One of them, a freshman, was inside the coach with the clergyman, and told him, with rather a long face, of the dismal discipline of his college. They are not allowed to quit the gates (except on general walks;) they are expelled if they read a newspaper; and they begin term with "a retreat" of a week, which time they are made to devote to silence, and, as it is supposed, to devotion and meditation.

I must say the young fellows drank plenty of whisky on the road, to prepare them for their year's abstinence; and, when at length arrived in the miserable village of Maynooth, determined not to go into college that night, but to devote the evening to "a lark." They were simple, kind-hearted young men, sons of farmers or tradesmen seemingly; and, as is always the case here, except among some of the gentry, very gentlemanlike, and pleasing in manners. Their talk was of this companion, and that; how one was in rhetoric, and another in logic, and a third had got his curacy. Wait for a while; and with the happy system pursued within the walls of their college, those smiling good-humoured faces will come out with a scowl, and downcast eyes that seem afraid to look the world in the face. When the time comes for them to take leave of yonder dismal-looking barracks, they will be men no longer, but bound over to the church, body and soul: their free thoughts chained down and kept in darkness, their honest affections mutilated: well, I hope they will be happy to-night at any rate, and talk and laugh to their hearts' content. The poor freshman, whose big chest is carried off by the porter yonder to the inn, has but twelve hours more of hearty, natural, human life. To-morrow, they will begin their work upon him: cramping his mind, and bitting his tongue, and firing and cutting at his heart,—breaking him to pull the church chariot. Ah! why didn't he stop at home, and dig potatoes and get children!

We cannot be coaxed, even by Mr. Titmarsh, to take one more look of the beauties of Wicklow—not upon any terms whatever; and are nearly as indifferent to the Dublin cheap dandies, though they are among the most superb animals of that wonderful genus to be found throughout Europe or America. They are of a quite distinct species from those who are to be seen on a Sunday in the Park, or in Liverpool, which is rather famous for its commercial dandies. The Dublin breed, not content with Sunday, appear every day, and all day long. We wonder how they manage it. The wardrobe of Mr. Tittlebat Titmouse could not have stood such incessant calls upon its ways and means, although his washer-woman's bills had not been materially increased by the demand on the shirt-pins and flashy waistcoats. The Dublin dandies

Assume a sort of military and ferocious look, not observable in other cheap dandies, except in Paris perhaps now and then; and are to be remarked, not so much for the splendour of their ornaments, as for the profusion of them. Thus for instance, a hat which is worn straight over the two eyes, costs very likely no more than one which hangs upon one ear—a great oily bush of hair to balance the hat (otherwise the head no doubt would fall hopelessly on one side) is even more economical than a crop which requires the barber's scissors oft-times;—also a tuft on the chin, may be had at a small expense of bear's grease by persons of a proper age; and although big pins are the fashion, I am bound to say, I have never seen so many or so big as here. Large agate marbles or "taws," globes terrestrial and celestial, pawnbrokers' balls,—I cannot find comparisons large enough for these wonderful ornaments of the person. Canes also should be mentioned, which are sold very splendid, with gold or silver heads, for a shilling on the quays; and the dandy not uncommonly finishes off with a horn quizzing-glass, which being stuck in one eye, contracts the brows, and gives a fierce determined look to the whole countenance. In idleness at least, these young men can compete with the greatest lords: and the wonder is, how the city can support so many of them, or they themselves; how they manage to spend their time; who gives them money to ride hacks in the "Phaynix" on field and race days; to have boats at Kingstown during the summer; and to be crowding the railway coaches all the day long.

The Cockney made a farther dash into Leinster and into Ulster; and, with more of the "humours" of the country, saw also its best parts. One famous farmers' dinner was eaten at Naas, after a local cattle-show; not a grand affair like that of Cork, but a plain mutton-and-turnip concern: mutton boiled in legs and roasted in saddles, with squadrons of apple-pies, lots of whisky-punch, and wine for those that liked it, with plenty of toasts, songs, and speeches. Among the toasts, the healths of the Sallymount Beagles, and the Kildare Foxhounds, were drunk, with loud cheers and halloes. The masters of the hounds, of course, returned thanks, as husbands do for their wives, and on the part of the dogs promised famous good sport next season:

After the Kildare Foxhounds, an old farmer, in a gray coat, got gravely up, and without being requested to do so in the least, sung a song, stating that—

> "At seven in the morning by most of the clocks,
> We rode to Kilruddery in search of a fox;"

and at the conclusion of his song, challenged a friend to give another song. Another old farmer, on this rose and sung one of Morris's songs, with a great deal of queer humour: and, no doubt, many more songs were sung during the evening, for plenty of hot-water jugs were blocking the door as we went out.

The jolly frieze-coated songster, who celebrated the Kilruddery fox, sung, it must be confessed, most woefully out of tune; but still it was pleasant to hear him, and I think the meeting was the most agreeable one I have seen in Ireland: there was more good humour, more cordial union of classes, more frankness and manliness, than one is accustomed to find in Irish meetings. All the speeches were kindhearted, straightforward speeches, without a word of politics, or an attempt at oratory: it was impossible to say whether the gentlemen present were Protestant or Catholic,—each one had a hearty word of encouragement for his tenant, and a kind welcome for his neighbour. There were forty stout, well-to-do farmers in the room, renters of fifty, seventy, a hundred acres of land. There were no clergyman present, though it would have been pleasant to have seen one of each persuasion, to say grace for the meeting and the meat.

At a similar meeting at Ballytore the next day, I had an opportunity of seeing a still finer collection of stock than had been brought to Naas, and at the same time one of the most beautiful flourishing villages in Ireland. The road to it from H—town, [the charming residence of the family before introduced,] if not remarkable for its rural beauty, is pleasant to travel, for evidences of neat and prosperous husbandry are around you everywhere—rich crops in the fields, and neat cottages by the road-side, accompanying us as far as Ballytore, a white, straggling village, surrounding green fields, of some five furlongs square, with a river running in the midst of them, and numerous fine cattle in the green. Here is a large windmill, fitted up like a castle, with battlements and towers; the castellan thereof is a good-natured old Quaker gentleman, and numbers more of his following inhabit the town.

The consequence was, that the shops of the village were the neatest possible, though by no means grand or portentous. Why should Quaker shops be neater than other shops? They suffer to the full as much oppression as the rest of the hereditary bondsmen; and yet, in spite of their tyrants, they prosper.

That is an impertinent question, Mr. Titmarsh.

In the little village I remarked scarcely a single beggar, and very few bare feet indeed among the crowds who came to see the show. Here the Quaker village had the advantage of the town of Naas, in spite of its Poor-house, which was only half full when we went to see it; but the people prefer beggary and starvation abroad, to comfort and neatness in the Union-house.

A neater establishment cannot be seen than this; and liberty must be very sweet indeed, when people prefer it and starvation, to the certainty of comfort in the Union-house. We went to see it after the show at Naas.

The first persons we saw at the gate of the place were four buxom lasses, in blue jackets and petticoats, who were giggling and laughing as gaily as so many young heiresses of a thousand a-year, and who had a colour in their cheeks that any lady of Almack's might envy.

They were cleaning pails and carrying in water from a green court or play-ground in front of the house, which some of the able-bodied men of the place were busy in enclosing.

In spite of all The Times newspapers in the world, our Cockney affirms that the people who went in were happy, in their well-aired, well-scoured rooms, with their neat uniform, and good store of clean sheets and blankets. All very good, Mr. Titmarsh; but have you forgotten him who once said, "It is not bread alone, but where we eat it!" There was one more pleasant Agricultural sight, or show, at Castledermot. Here,—

Rich and poor were working friendlily together; priest and parson were alike interested in these honest, homely, agricultural festivals; not a word was said about hereditary bondage and English tyranny; and one did not much regret the absence of those patriotic topics of conversation. If but for the sake of the change, it was pleasant to pass a few days with people among whom there was no quarrelling; no furious denunciations against Popery on the part of the Protestants, and no tirades against the parsons from their bitter and scornful opponents of the other creed.

Next Sunday, in the county Meath, in a quiet old church, lying amongst meadows and fine old stately avenues of trees, and for the benefit of a congregation of some thirty persons, I heard for the space of an hour and twenty minutes some thorough Protestant doctrine, and the Popish superstitions properly belaboured. Does it strengthen a man in his own creed to hear his neighbour's belief abused? One would imagine so.

Drogheda was found in as bad a social and as stagnant a commercial condition as any city of the West. With the same mud-cabin suburbs, it is, however, quite as full of Emporiums, Repositories, and other slovenly places of great names and small business. To make amends, its Drogheda ale is even more famous than its Boyne Water. The principal use at present made of the Linen Hall of the town, is as a forum for the Liberator to harangue in about Repeal. Orangemen and Catholics seem, in Drogheda, to feel peculiar rancour, and even the children—the school-boys—venomously take a side.

When troops march over the bridge, a young friend of mine (whom I shrewdly suspect to be an Orangeman in his heart) told me, that their bands play the "Boyne Water." . . . . .

By a large public school of some reputation, where a hundred boys are educated—(my young guide, the Orangeman, was one of them: he related with much glee how, on one of the Liberator's visits, a schoolfellow had waved a blue and orange flag from the window, and cried "King William for ever, and to hell with the Pope!")

An admirable branch this of a young Irishman's education. Our traveller frequently and very seriously, too, mourns over the failure of the National School scheme of Education for Ireland—the blame of which, the sin of which, the Protestant and Catholic clergy and the Board may divide among them, as they best like. Mr. Titmarsh is highly pleased with Newry; and, upon the whole, Ulster—the Black North—appears to him not, by any means, the worst part of the Green Island. He drove from Armagh to Portadown, on a Sunday evening; and, found that if less Irish than Cork or Kerry, Armagh may yet venture to hold up its head.

The country is well cultivated along the whole of the road; the trees in plenty, and villages and neat houses always in sight. The little farms with their orchards, and comfortable buildings, were as clean and trim as could be wished; they are mostly of one storey, with long thatched roofs and shining windows, such as those that may be seen in Normandy and Picardy. As it was Sunday evening, all the people seemed to be abroad, some sauntering quietly down the roads—a pair of girls here and there pacing leisurely in a field—a little group seated under the trees of an orchard, which pretty adjunct to the farm is very common in this district; and the crop of apples seemed this year to be extremely plenty. The physiognomy of the people too has quite changed: the girls have their hair neatly braided up, not loose over their faces as in the south; and not only are bare feet very rare, and stockings extremely neat and white, but I am sure I saw at least a dozen good silk gowns upon the women along the road, and scarcely one which was not clean and in good order. The men for the most part figured in jackets, caps, and trousers, eschewing the old veil of a hat which covers the popular head at the other end of the island, the breeches, and the long ill-made tail-coat. The people's faces are sharp and neat, not broad lazy knowing-looking, like that of many a shambling Diogenes who may be seen lounging before his cabin in Cork or Kerry. As for the cabins, they have disappeared; and the houses of the people may rank decidedly as cottages. The accent, too, is quite different; but this is hard to describe in print. The people speak with a Scotch twang, and, as I fancied, much more simply and to the point. A man gives you a downright answer, without any grin, or joke, or attempt at flattery. To be sure, these are rather early days to begin to judge of national characteristics; and very likely the above distinctions have been drawn after profoundly studying a Northern and a Southern waiter at the inn at Armagh.

At any rate, it is clear that the towns are vastly improved,—the cottages and villages no less so; the people look active and well-dressed; a sort of weight seems all at once to be taken from the Englishman's mind on entering the province, when he finds himself once more looking upon comfort, and activity, and resolution. What is the cause of this improvement? Protestantism, as more than one Church-of-England man said to me; but for Protestantism, would it not be as well to read Scotchism?—meaning thrift, prudence, perseverance, boldness, and common sense, with which qualities any body of men, of any Christian denomination, would no doubt prosper.

Belfast and its inns were found all that the most fastidious Cockney could desire; save that the pint of port contains no more than two glasses, which, upon the Scotch principle of "Diel tak' him has the least pint stoup," rather detracts from the other merits of Belfast. We have heard that fine and thriving city called the Athens of Ireland; it is likewise called the Irish Liverpool; but sure never Irish city had so high a compliment made to it before, as that which the Cockney pays to Belfast when he calls it the—Irish London. There follows one of the best descriptions of the "Irish London" that we have seen of late years. Dublin will not be flattered by the comparison made with her; but she must just please herself again.

Mr. Titmarsh had some rather alarming adventures at the "Giant's Causeway;" and he kindly warns off all brother Cockneys from that savage coast and spot, fairly wishing himself back in Pall-Mall. There is clearly not one fibre which responds to the sublime in his whole composition. How unlike to Mr. Dickens at the Niagara Falls! Mr. Titmarsh ought to be ashamed of himself, as a man and an author; though the same gifts of lofty enthusiasm in alliance with exquisite sensibility may not be vouchsafed to every Cockney alike. But, as our friend happily remarks, after receiving the summons to dinner,

There is that in nature, dear Jenkins, which passes even our powers. We can feel the beauty of a magnificent landscape, perhaps; but we can describe a leg of mutton and turnips better. Come, then, this scene is for our betters to depict. If Mr. Tennyson were to come hither for a month, and brood over the place, he might, in some of those lofty heroic lines which the Author of the "Morte d'Arthur" knows how to pile up, convey to the reader a sense of this gigantic desolate scene. What! you, too, are a poet! Well then, Jenkins, stay! but believe me, you had best take my advice, and come off.

The worthy landlady made her appearance with the politest of bows and an apology,—for what does the reader think a lady should apologise in the most lonely rude spot in the world?—because a plain servant-woman was about to bring in the dinner, the waiter being absent on leave at Coleraine! O heaven and earth! where will the genteel end?

Kitty of Coleraine, like the Maid of Athens, must, we fear, be aging; but one might, last year, in her town, purchase beef for fourpence a-pound, and an excellent cod-fish for a shilling; so that Coleraine, besides eminence in gentility and "seriousness," has still its own attractions. The Cockney had not the felicity to see Kitty; and, beyond all the fair of the western, southern, and central provinces, he was smitten by one "bonny brucket lassie;" and though she may not compare with the above-mentioned Beauties, sung by Byron and Moore, yet Peg of Limavaddy will, at least, hold her place with the "sweet Molly Mog," and others of her fair countrywomen.

Yes, Peggy of Limavaddy, if Barrow and Inglis have gone to Connemara to fall in love with the Misses Flynn, let us be allowed to come to Ulster and offer a tribute of praise at your feet—at your stockingless feet, O Margaret! Do you remember the October day ('twas the first day of the hard weather,) when the way-worn traveller entered your inn? But the circumstances of this passion had better be chronicled in deathless verse.

PEG OF LIMAVADDY.

Riding from Coleraine
(Famed for lovely Kitty,)
Came a Cockney bound Unto Derry city;
Weary was his soul,
Shivering and sad he
Bump'd along the road
Leads to Limavaddy.

Mountains stretch'd around,
Gloomy was their tinting,
And the horses' hoofs
Made a dismal clinting;
Wind upon the heath
Howling was and piping,
On the heath and bog,
Black with many a snipe in:
'Mid the bogs of black,
Silver pools were flashing,
Crows upon their sides
Picking were and splashing.
Cockney on the car
Closer folds his plaidy,
Grumbling at the road
Leads to Limavaddy.

. . . . . .

Limavaddy inn's
But a humble bait-house,
Where you may procure
Whisky and potatoes;
Landlord at the door
Gives a smiling welcome
To the shivering wights
Who to his hôtel come.
Landlady within
Sits and knits a stocking,
With a wary foot
Baby's cradle rocking.

To the chimney nook,
Having found admittance,
There I watch a pup
Playing with two kittens;
(Playing round the fire,
Which of blazing turf is,
Roaring to the pot
Which bubbles with the murphies;)
And the cradled babe
Fond the mother nursed it,
Singing it a song
As she twists the worsted!

. . . . . .

Presently a maid
Enters with the liquor,
(Half a pint of ale Frothing in a beaker.)
Gods! I didn't know
What my beating heart meant,
Hebe's self I thought
Enter'd the apartment.
As she came she smiled,
And the smile bewitching,
On my word and honour,
Lighted all the kitchen!

With a curtsy neat
Greeting the new-comer,
Lovely, smiling Peg
Offers me the rummer;
But my trembling hand
Up the beaker tilted,
And the glass of ale
Every drop I spilt it:
Spilt it every drop (Dames who read my volumes, Pardon such a word,)
On my whatd'yecall 'ems!

Witnessing the sight
Of that dire disaster,
Out began to laugh
Missis, maid, and master;
Such a merry peal,
'Specially Miss Peg's was,
(As the glass of ale Trickling down my legs was,)
That the joyful sound
Of that ringing laughter
Echoed in my ears
Many a long day after.

. . . . . .

When the laugh was done,
Peg, the pretty hussy,
Moved about the room
Wonderfully busy;
Now she looks to see
If the kettle keep hot,
Now she rubs the spoons,
Now she cleans the teapot;
Now she sets the cups
Trimly and secure,
Now she scours a pot
And so it was I drew her
Thus it was I drew her
Scouring of a kettle,
(Faith her blushing cheeks Redden'd on the metal!)
Ah! but 'tis in vain
That I try to sketch it;
The pot perhaps is like,
But Peggy's face is wretched,
No: the best of lead,
And of Indian rubber,
Never could depict
That sweet kettle-scrubber!

See her as she moves!
Scarce the ground she touches,
Airy as a fay,
Graceful as a duchess;
Bare her rounded arm,
Bare her little leg is,
Vestris never show'd
Ancles like to Peggy's;
Braided is her hair,
Soft her look and modest,
Slim her little waist
Comfortably boddiced.

. . . . . .

The best of this delicious amatory jingle we omit from respect and tenderness for the feelings of Mrs. Titmarsh, who has something to overlook in this Irish tour of her husband's.

Back again to Dublin went Mr. Titmarsh; dined everywhere with everybody; and, were he as much in their confidence, he tells us, as Mrs. Sigourney, or any other American must have been, he might have had a great deal to tell of men of letters and fashion, and of University [Magazine?] Dons. But the author who, like him, hopes to dine a second time at the expense of his friends, must take care of what he tells. As he does not, probably, expect to dine at Maynooth College, he is no more chary of preserving its confidence than that of the disorderly Museum of Trinity College. Trollopizing is often a virtue in a traveller. Of Maynooth we are told:—

An Irish union-house is a palace to it. Ruin so needless, filth so disgusting, such a look of lazy squalor, so

Englishman who has not seen can conceive. Lecture-room and dining-hall, kitchen and students'-room, were all the same. I shall never forget the sight of scores of shoulders of mutton lying on the filthy floor in the former, or the view of a bed and dressing-table that I saw in the other. Let the next Maynooth grant include a few shillings'-worth of white-wash and a few hundred-weights of soap; and if to this be added a half-score of drill-sergeants to see that the students appear clean at lecture, and to teach them to keep their heads up and to look people in the face, Parliament will introduce some cheap reforms into the seminary, which were never needed more than here. Why should the place be so shamefully ruinous and foully dirty? Lime is cheap, and water plenty at the canal hard by. Why should a stranger, after a week's stay in the country, be able to discover a priest by the scowl on his face, and his doubtful downcast manner. . . . . This complaint of neglect applies to other public institutions besides Maynooth. The Mansion-house, when I saw it, was a very dingy abode for the Right Honourable Lord Mayor, and that Lord Mayor Mr. O'Connell. I saw him in full council, in a brilliant robe of crimson velvet, ornamented with white satin bows, and sable collar, in an enormous cocked hat, like a slice of an eclipsed moon—in the following costume, in fact.

The portrait is not the jovial Dan of the reader's acquaintance, but a very truculent-looking, paltry, bedizened, old personage, whom we at once repudiate as an O'Connell. The concluding sentence of Mr. Titmarsh's Irish Sketches, is an appeal to that gentleman, whether or not, from the growth of a middle class, too independent to be bullied by priest or squire—and he might have added, or misled by demagogue—from a middle class, having their interest in quiet, and alike indisposed to servility and rebellion, as much may not be hoped as from any legislative meddling. It is the want, he says, "of a middle class, which has rendered the squires so arrogant, the clergy so domineering, and the political demagogue so powerful; and I think that Mr. O'Connell himself would say——" But the Cockney is a simpleton with his what Mr. O'Connell would say. Mr. O'Connell, for some time to come, at least, will say no such thing, as that he surmises; so we need not trouble the reader about it.—Does that same reader now agree with us, that the Cockney is really a sensible, informing, and agreeable companion, so far as he goes? He may be called superficial, to be sure. It is very easy to call a man any sort of disparaging name; but, without making any pretension to profundity or yet to soaring, he bowls along, contriving to note and to impart a great deal.

LITERARY REGISTER.

The Life of Joseph Addison. By Lucy Aikin. 2 vols. Longman & Co.

Miss Aikin states in her preface that "she has undertaken, in these memoirs, to supply a real deficiency in our literature." Why is there no life of Addison, while there are lives of Pope, and Swift, and Dryden? It is not easy to say why, unless that there was less to tell of so correct and fortunate a person as Addison that the world cared for hearing, or beyond what had already been made known in the lives of his contemporaries, and in Johnson's preface to Addison's works. Yet the life of so distinguished an English classic surely deserved to be written with all the care and amplitude which literary research and talent could supply. Among the myriad books published on all manner of subjects, that one could not be considered superfluous, which had for its subject the most conspicuous writer in the Spectator, the life of the reformer and refiner of English manners and English style; the moralist of the social circle and the fireside. Qualified for this task by her previous habits of historical and biographical research, Miss Aikin possesses, in addition, that unbounded, and almost enthusiastic, admiration for Addison, which is no mean element in writing the annals of a man of calm passions; never, though in all apparent modesty, wanting to his own interests, who glided smoothly and cannily through life. If she has not been able to give her hero a strong interest in the affections of her readers, the fault is certainly not with her. She has thrown startling doubts on many of the most disparaging anecdotes that have been currently received as to the habits of Addison, and of his conduct in particular instances; and some of the worst of these she has clearly disproved. This quiet, unpretending, but sagacious and worldly fortunate man was, not improbably, the object of some small envy among his early friends and literary contemporaries.

Letters written during a Journey in Switzerland in the Autumn of 1841. By Mrs. Ashton Yates. 2 volumes. London: Duncan & Malcolm.

To soothe the sorrow of her younger children during her long absence on the Continent, Mrs. Ashton Yates promised to write them a particular account of every place which she and their elder sisters visited. This she has done in a series of Letters, into which, from previous knowledge and reading, she introduces both local and general knowledge, with sketches of the remarkable events that have occurred, and of personages who have figured in the scenes described. There is thus no lack of useful and entertaining information, conveyed in the plain and agreeable manner that is best suited to gain and keep alive the attention of juvenile readers. The personal narrative, at the same time, relieves and diversifies the graver matter of the volumes. Afraid of her children receiving erroneous impressions, or forming what she conceives wrong opinions, Mrs. Ashton Yates is so careful in their behalf, as sometimes to assume the governess, and to dogmatize, in pointing out the way in which they should walk. In short, she tells them what they ought to think of particular individuals, facts, and opinions. But this she may conceive a mother's duty. Her Letters will form pleasant and instructive reading, especially in those quiet family circles where juveniles and adults mingle for social instruction.

The Papal and Hierarchical System compared with the Religion of the New Testament. London: Charles Gilpin.

We have read this book with much satisfaction. To what Christian denomination the author belongs, we cannot exactly tell, but he appears to approximate the most nearly to The Friends. He is a thorough spiritual liberal, and keenly perceives the intolerance of each sect in its turn, from the earliest ages to the Lutherans lately persecuted in Prussia; while in Hanover, Hamburg, and Denmark, being the established and dominant sect, they were persecuting others. And all this is done in carrying out an ideal notion of uniformity as the alone perfection, and thus producing, on the one hand, persecution, confiscation, imprisonment; and, on the other, "a prevailing religious lifelessness, with infidelity at bottom." Antichrist is not considered by this writer as being by any means confined to the Church of Rome: Antichrist he sees enthroned in every church that avails itself of the sword of the magistrate to enforce uniformity of worship; although that church should uphold much sound doctrine, and contain many lively members of the Universal Church of Christ. There is an able chapter on "The spiritual power of the priesthood," and another on The Christian Ministry; and though on these subjects the writer's views coincide neither with those of Church of England-men nor Presbyterians, he, however, claims to found them upon the New Testament.

History of our own Times. By the Author of "The Court and Times of Frederick the Great." Volume I. Henry Colburn.

This portion of Our own Times relates entirely to the French Revolution, and does not get on with it farther than 1792. It promises to be a very voluminous work.

Thorn's Tracts on the Errors and Evils of the Church of England.

These "Tracts for the Times" are written by a Dissenter and a Voluntary, who attacks the Church shrewdly, on almost every point of her discipline and government, and on many of her doctrines; and who also shows up the Puseyites.

Letters on Puritanism and Non-conformity. By Sir John Bickerton Williams, Knt. London: Jackson & Walford.

These letters, written by an Independent who is well able to render a reason for the faith that is in him, have been drawn forth by the inveterate hostility which has been of late displayed by Churchmen to the very name of Dissent. The letters form an able popular defence of Protestant Non-conformity; and their author even carries the war into the enemy's camp, and attacks the Puseyites in their more vulnerable points.

Jest and Earnest. By Arthur Wallbridge.

These are a series of brief, piquant, or lively sketches, which may probably have appeared in some periodical. Some of them, as "Entertainment on the Road," are in Goldsmith's vein, and tell, even under the disadvantage of the comparison.

Bizzare Fables; a series of Eccentric Historiettes. By the author of "Jest and Earnest." Second Edition.

Hints to Servants. With illustrations by Kenny Meadows.

This somewhat bald imitation of Swift's inimitable "Directions to Servants," is written in loose rhymes. Of the dozen illustrations, the full half are very good. The fat cook; the smart lady's-maid, peeping into her mistress's sealed letter; the equivocal housemaid, leaning on her broom, while her thoughts are far distant, all prove their descent from the Meadows mould of woman, which is the same in every rank. It is not a high or perfect one. The portrait of the groom is very clever. He is daily growing in his quiet resemblance to a horse—his face is visibly lengthening.

Men and Manners in America. By Thomas Hamilton, Esq., author of "Cyril Thornton." A new edition. Blackwood & Sons.

This is a cheap and neat reprint of a well-known book, which was popular, at least, with a party. American society is better understood since Captain Hamilton travelled through the States, twelve years ago. Even he might now have modified some of his opinions, though he would not have changed them. There was apparently no subsoil in his mind, in which deeper thoughts could take root. To this reprint a few pleasing letters from the author to his friends and relations in Scotland are prefixed, with a portrait from a painting by John Watson Gordon, which does not in the least flatter the original.

The Latin Governess, for the Use of Mothers and Governesses, &c., &c. By John W. Freese, B.A. Simpkin, Marshall, & Co.

This manual will be found useful; as many ladies, who know nothing whatever of the Latin language, are often required either to give elementary instruction, or to hear young boys prepare their lessons for school.

Buckingham's America. Fisher & Sons.

Mr. Buckingham has concluded his leviathan work on America, by the publication of another large volume, solely dedicated to the British colonies of Canada, Nova Scotia, and New Brunswick. This volume thus forms in itself a complete work, and one containing abundant material. It is decorated with many fine views of cities, public buildings, and river scenery; and is written in the same style as the previous volumes, with perhaps rather more condensation.

Letters from the Pyrenees. By. T. Clifton Paris, B.A. Trinity College, Cambridge. London: John Murray.

The author of the Letters enjoyed a solitary pedestrian ramble of three months during the last beautiful summer, among the Pyrenean mountains. He had a fair share of adventures, and of small diverting hardships, and tells his story in a lively and unaffected manner. The travels of a pedestrian always possess an interest which belongs to no other mode of progression. He sees more, and he sees deeper; and his spirits are kept in brisker motion. This must be the secret of the attraction of such narratives, even when there is, as in the present instance, very little substance in them.

The Pyrenees; with Excursions into Spain. By Lady Chatterton, author of "Rambles in the South of Ireland," &c. &c. 2 vols. octavo. Saunders & Otley.

All the world, of fashion, is well acquainted with the writings of a lady whose works, according to The Quarterly Review, "are marked by talent and refinement;" who, by the authority of The Times, "displays an acute perception of human nature;" and who, on the authority of The Morning Chronicle, the other year "produced one of the most agreeable, picturesque, and readable books of the season." The work on the Pyrenees is no whit inferior in literary accomplishment to the books to which these praises refer, though the subject may be less interesting. The book, which externally is a very handsome one, is, like Lady Chatterton's former works, interspersed with the floating romantic tales and legends of the country in which she is travelling.

NEW NOVELS.

The Rambles of the Emperor Ching Tih. Translated from the Chinese. 2 volumes. Longman & Co.

The rambles of the Haroun Alraschid of the Celestial

Empire give a very curious, and, at the present moment, a peculiarly interesting view of Chinese opinions, usages, and institutions.

The Home; or, Family Cares and Family Joys. By Frederika Bremer, author of "The Neighbours." Translated from the Swedish by Mary Howitt. 2 volumes. Longman & Co.

We shall not fail to let our readers know something about a new novel, which the author of "The Neighbours" wrote, and Mrs. Howitt thought worthy of being translated into the language of Great Britain and America.

PAMPHLETS.

A Review of the Administration of the Board of National Education in Ireland, from its establishment in 1831 to 1843. By Durham Dunlop, Esq. London: T. C. Newby. Edinburgh: W. Tait. Dublin: Millikin, and Curry & Son.—Mr. Durham makes heavy and grave complaints of the Board, which it would require longer time to investigate than we have been able to command since his pamphlet appeared. The pamphlet merits the attention of every one interested in the Board honestly and fitly discharging its duties. The Commissioners cannot sit still under the serious charge of "having departed from the objects they were intrusted to promote; or that they have grievously misapplied the money intrusted to them, been reckless and wasteful, rash without success, and profuse without adequate advantage."

Numerous Cases of Surgical Operations without Pain, performed in the Mesmeric state; with remarks upon the opposition of many Members of the Royal Medical and Chirurgical Society, and others, to the reception of the inestimable blessings of Mesmerism. By John Elliotson, M.D.—In this pamphlet Dr. Elliotson relates many of those marvellous cases of which the public has already heard, and appears very sore and very angry with his brethren of the profession that they will not see with his eyes.

Six Letters to Sir Robert Peel; being an attempt to expose the dangerous tendency of the theory of rent, advocated by Mr. Ricardo, and by the writers of his school. By T. C. Bansfield, Esq.

POSTSCRIPT POLITICAL.

THE DISRUPTION OF THE CHURCH ESTABLISHMENT OF SCOTLAND.

The catastrophe, so long threatened and so long delayed, has at length arrived. The Venerable Kirk of Scotland is fairly laid on her beam-ends; the most affectionate and dutiful of her children, Dr. Chalmers and his coadjutors, standing by, looking with no little complacency on their handiwork. The reverend Doctor might have been delighted to say,

"Alone I did it!"

—but this is a glory denied him. He has had many willing, zealous, and unscrupulous auxiliaries, and many more dupes and victims. Let not, however, Voluntaries and Dissenters at a distance imagine, that this fell matricide has been committed from any dislike to the principle of a State Church, as one directly opposed to the religious liberties of mankind and the interests of pure Christianity. The new Seceders hold directly the reverse of this; and the "General Assembly of the Free Church of Scotland"—the resonant title which the body has assumed—was not three hours old, before its first Moderator, Dr. Chalmers, took pains to proclaim deadly animosity to Liberals and Dissenters, whom he denounced in no measured terms, as seditious, discontented, restless men, dangerous alike to Church and State; with whom he and his party would take neither part nor lot.* It is not then from disapprobation of a State, i. e. an "Erastian Church," or from dislike to ministers receiving State pay, which the Doctor regards as a most important element in the maintenance of religion, the very pabulum of Presbyterianism, that the disruption has arisen; but because the Established clergy, while eating the bread which the State provided for them, could not be as much above its control as the ministers of independent bodies of Dissenters; that they should not be at liberty to do what they liked with what was not their own,—that as often as the decisions of

* That Dissenters and Voluntaries everywhere may know what are the fundamental principles of the New Free Presbyterian Church, we subjoin an extract from Dr. Chalmers's opening speech:—"To be more plain, let me be more particular. The Voluntaries mistake, if they claim us as Voluntaries. We hold it to be the duty of Government to give their resources and means for the maintenance of a gospel ministry in the land; and we pray that their eyes may yet be opened, and that they may learn to acquit themselves as protectors of the Church, and not as its corrupters or tyrants. (Applause.) May the sin of Uzziah be forgiven them, and may the day speedily come, when 'kings shall be the nursing fathers, and queens the nursing mothers of the Church.' (Renewed Cheers.) In a word, we hold that every post and function of the commonwealth should be leavened with Christianity, and that every functionary, from the highest to the lowest, should in their respective spheres do all that in them lies to countenance and to uphold it. That is to say, though we quit the Establishment, it is right that it should be understood that we go out holding the Establishment principle. We quit a vitiated Establishment; but we shall rejoice to return to a purer one. (Great applause.) Or, to express it otherwise, we advocate the national recognition and the national support of religion; and we are not Voluntaries. (Cheers.) Again, if we thus openly proclaim our differences with men who, under the guise of principle—and of this principle we question not the honesty—refuse, in the affairs of the Church, to have any participation with the Government—still more resolutely do we disclaim all fellowship with men who, under the guise of direct and declared opposition, lift a menacing front against the powers that be; or, disdaining government, and impatient of restraint, manifest a spirit of contention and defiance. If we refuse to coalesce with one, and that a powerful body, on the question of ecclesiastical polity, still less would we seek to strengthen ourselves by amalgamating with another body of contentious and violent worldly politicans, and, least of all, with men whose element is confusion, and who delight in the wild war of turbulence and disorder. Our enemies—the high aristocracy of the land—will be strengthened in their hostility against us by our coöperation with men who are bent upon the destruction of the Church. . . . . I look upon the Presbyterian Church of Ireland as possessing a value which is possessed by no other Church in Christendom. It is altogether charged with high Christian principles; and there is not another Church within the limits of reformed Christendom of which we can say the same. Through the Regium Donum the principle of a National Establishment is invested in your Church, and yet you possess perfect spiritual liberty."—Scotsman, May 20th.

their courts came into collision with the judgments of the civil courts, the latter should yield. From first to last, for the seven years that this affair has disturbed Scotland, the struggle has been for clerical power, veiled, at one period, with the thin pretext, latterly thrown aside, of demanding for a few of the people a roundabout check —a veto upon the exercise of lay patronage.

The cry of "Wolf!" had been raised so often; the threat, "We will go off, and leave manse, glebe, and tiends!" so frequently reiterated, that the public had become incredulous; though it was not seen how the Protesters could, in common decency, remain much longer. Late symptoms, of a more than ordinary attention to the commissariat department and the replenishment of the treasure-chest, foreboded a serious campaign. By one means or another, nay, by all kind of means, fair and unfair, a very large sum of money had, this year, been collected for building meeting-houses, and "the sustentation of the clergy," and a much larger sum subscribed. In the meantime, by the late election of members to the General Assembly, it was evident that the party which had for some years carried matters with so high a hand—attempting to bully successive Governments into the concessions they demanded, and defying the courts of law—would be in a minority in their own Assembly, to whose dicta, of course, they were bound to submit. On perceiving this, it was deemed politic not to hazard even one vote; not to wait until the General Assembly had been constituted by the election of its chairman, (the Moderator,) which must have gone against them, but at once to declare off! This was done by the reading of a long protest against the proceedings and judgments of the Supreme Court of Scotland, which have been affirmed by Parliament as often as they were appealed, and against the Governments which had refused their claims; and the seceders rose and walked out, to the number of eighty-nine parish ministers, and thirty-one quoad sacra ministers—a kind of irregulars, who, by the decision of the courts of law, had no right to sit in church courts—and seventy-three elders. Even if the quoad sacra ministers and their elders had been included, the number retiring was a minority of the whole Assembly. It is not to be imagined that an affair which had, for seven years, produced so much rancorous agitation, was to reach the crisis without creating some sensation out of doors. The adherents of the party had collected in considerable numbers. The course that was to be taken was previously known; and, when the Seceders—the martyrs—appeared, they were received with some cheering, and accompanied down hill to a deserted pile, where, seven years ago, the citizens of Edinburgh gave a dinner to Mr. O'Connell. Dr. Chalmers was then, by acclamation, chosen Moderator of "The First General Assembly of the Free Presbyterian Church;" and, having first explained the reasons of secession, the Reverend Doctor lost no time in making that vituperative manifesto against other Dissenters, and that eulogy on endowed Establishments to which we have referred.

Leaving the new General Assembly to act its virgin fancies, let us now for a moment inquire what principle gave rise to it? what led so many protesting martyrs to forsake "the Church of their fathers," first inflicting upon her what they do not scruple to avow is, as they hope, a mortal stab. We write for the information of readers in England and Ireland, and for Scotsmen abroad, many of whom labour under the mistake of imagining that, on the part of the leaders of the seceding party, this has really been a liberal and generous popular movement; a struggle for popular principles, for extending the religious rights of the people of Scotland. It has been no such thing. How was it possible that a body of clergy, bound hand and foot to the State, who were preëminently—and right proud too of the title—Ministers of the Established Church,—how was a body of men thus fettered, and willing to be fettered, to take the lead in any popular movement which had for its object the enfranchisement of the People from the yoke of lay patronage, save by a species of rebellion? While the Non-Intrusion party—more correctly the Kirk-Court-Supremacy party—held the State bound to maintain them in their benefices, which they had obtained only through lay patronage, they also claimed, when it suited them, to defy and despise its control; and to become the soi-disant champions of the rights of the People. These things were wholly incompatible; and, accordingly, as soon as they were touched in what they claimed as their own prerogative, the bungle and juggle in which the popular part of the question was veiled, the Veto law, was thrown to the winds. "The veto was a bagatelle," proclaimed Dr. Chalmers, when compared with the Courts of Law audaciously presuming to control the Kirk Courts in matters which his party called "spiritual,"—while all men of plain sense called it the necessary protection of the civil rights of men, either deprived of their livings, or kept out of them, because they obeyed the laws of the Church and the laws of the land, instead of the arbitrary dicta of a dominant party in the Kirk Courts.——Had this party really been what they pretended to be; had they acted upon any consistent and intelligible principle, conducted themselves with Christian feeling and propriety, and, ceasing to be hirelings of the State, had become the leaders of the People, in seeking an enlargement of their rights, they would have gone out at once, carrying with them the sympathy and respect of good men of all parties. How stand they now, when forced to withdraw, from having found it hopeless to obtain, by defiance, threats, and bullying, those arrogant claims which the interests of society cannot permit any government to yield to any body of Established clergy? They must have been mad even to have dreamed of attaining their objects; and they must have seen their folly in the coldness, indifference, or reprobation with which their struggle has been viewed by the men of Scotland of every sect and political party. To persons at a distance, who cannot understand the real question—namely, the struggle of a Kirk corporation for power uncontrolled by the law—through the smoke of controversy and maze of words in which it has been involved, it is a pregnant fact, that not one newspaper in Scotland, Liberal or Conservative, has been found to advocate the cause of the Kirk-Court-Supremacy party; and that they were at last under the necessity of setting up a press of their own. The whole body of Dissenters in Scotland have, until they seceded, been against them, both in reference to the objects struggled for, and the unseemly mode of conducting the struggle. But to read of their sayings and doings, a stranger might imagine that there was not a Dissenter, nor a Dissenting minister, in all Scotland; that they alone divided the whole field with the Moderate ministers. Jealousy of the Presbyterian Dissenters, of the Secession body, was no mean ingredient among the various motives which originally produced this turmoil. That body has, within the last fifty years, rapidly increased in numbers, wealth, and intelligence; and now reckons, it is said, nearly a half, if not a full half, of the urbane population of the country among its adherents, while its substantial meeting-houses and manses rise in every valley. The passing of the Reform Bill brought this body a vast accession of political power. In some quarters of the country it turned elections against the Kirk party. This aggression from the Seceders without, was not to be submitted to; and, within, the Kirk was distracted, as it always has been, by party-feeling of the bitterest kind, inherited by its Courts from the old feud between the High-flyers and Moderates. The High-flyers had, at length, gained the Supremacy: they have not used their faculties either wisely or meekly. They perceived that, to cope with the new accession of political power, and the popular principle of electing ministers, enjoyed by the Presbyterian Dissenters, they, too, must popularize, or else lose their influence and numbers. But they did not set honestly about the work to which party zeal and hatred of the Dissenters prompted them. They wished to make tools of the People in carrying out their own selfish objects; and they have temporarily succeeded to a small extent: —to a very small extent it must be with men or women capable of putting two ideas together. To their flocks if what they longed for was freedom to choose their own ministers, the Secession stood open; holding the same doctrines, and discipline, and principles of Church government as themselves; differing in no respect, save that minister and people, choosing to enjoy spiritual freedom, had voluntarily, a century ago, renounced the secular advantages of an Establishment. Why did not the turbulent, restless, and ambitious leaders in this movement follow the dignified and Christian-like example of the Erskines and Moncrieffs, who, in peace and quiet, planted that little grain of seed which has since grown into a goodly tree, sheltering and adorning the land? And why have they not, on at length seceding, joined the original body of Seceders, who, if they are in the right path, are assuredly their elders and betters? Why have they not humbly sued to be received into that body? Do they hope ever to be recognised as an Establishment, or again to draw State pay? One might augur something like this from the fervent admiration which Dr. Chalmers, on the second day of the Free Assembly, expressed for the Presbyterian Church of Ulster, his beau idéal of a perfect church, where the State, from considerations of policy, gives, at its pleasure, a small dole to the ministers, exactly as it does to the College of Maynooth, and interferes with the internal concerns of neither. Dr. Chalmers' ideas of the glory and beauty of a perfect State Church have surely sunk lamentably. Is "The Free Presbyterian Kirk of Scotland" to end in accepting Larry O'Branigan's

"Good frindly sop of the rale Raigin Donem." *

Is the Chancellor of the Exchequer to become the nursing-father, and the Home Secretary the nursing-mother that Dr. Chalmers yearns after? The deputations to and from Ulster, the fraternization with the Presbyterians of Ireland, and the dead cut given to the Presbyterian Secession of Scotland—a pure and independent body, with whom people of common sense would imagine that the Non-intrusionists on leaving the Church would feel proud to be completely identified—have certainly a strange appearance. We shall see how they will shape their course, and what new spiritual privileges the Founders of the Free Church are to secure to the People beyond other Dissenters —now that they have the power to give the People, not a mere veto, but a direct and uncontrolled liberty of choice. But more: Will the Founders and Legislators of the Free Church consult the great body of the People as to its constitution, and the limitation of their own powers in its courts? Will they summon to their Assembly representatives from all the parishes? What power, what active and potent voice, are the Christian People to have in their own Church? The Fathers of the Free Church must adopt some popular measure, if they are to prosper. The constitution of the other Dissenting bodies—an eye to popular support—to the vile pence—guarantees some degree of popularity in their institutions. But will it be a large or a scanty measure? Will the ministers exercise no crooked control over the People's choice, by their veto? Will the People be allowed to elect their ministers and elders fairly and freely—and why not by ballot? Will the women, who have so liberally contributed to the "Sustentation Fund," have a vote, as among other Dissenters?

We have said, that if the object of the leaders of this party—for the host of followers have been like sheep driven to the slaughter—had been the single-minded and honest desire of extending the Christian privileges, or promoting the religious improvement, of the people of Scotland, even though in connexion with a State Church, they would have carried with them the sympathies and respect of all good men; and we say that even now, at the eleventh hour, when, by their arrogant pretensions and intemperate conduct, they have forfeited the general esteem, they may still redeem themselves,—and, in the hands of an overruling Providence, become the instruments of good both directly and indirectly. The first symptoms, so far as they are concerned, are, however, not favourable. It will soon be seen whether their future course is to be shaped by mere hostility to the endowed body they have tardily left, and jealousy of those Dissenters who lost no time in hailing their retirement from the Establishment,—or if they are actuated by purer motives. In cordially welcoming them into the independent ranks, the Dissenters have hitherto met with but an ungracious reward. Their new-born zeal, as if officious, has been very unceremoniously damped. Dr. Chalmers, who is a sad Marplot for an ecclesiastical leader and politician—though he does the best an essentially honest nature will permit—lost no time, as the Moderator of the Free Church, in giving a sharp rebuff to all Dissenters and Voluntaries. Their Browns, and Marshalls, and Wardlaws might be very respectable sectarian ministers; and the temporary use of their pulpits may be convenient until the Free Church mature her plans and rear her own edifices; but they must not presume to think themselves and their flocks on a footing of equality with the New Free Church and her flock. In a Seceder's Church, of which Dr. Candlish had got the use to raise a rebellion in the parish against the established

* "The fam'd Daddy C—ke, by gor, I'd have shown 'em
As proof how such bastes may be tam'd when you've thrown 'em
A good frindly sop of the rale Raigin Donem."

According to his editor, Moore, Larry, in this epistle, evidently means the Regium Donum, a sum contributed by the Government, annually, to the support of a favoured class of Presbyterians in Ulster; which they at first swallowed with some difficulty, but now make no bones of.

minister—that reverend person told the Seceders very roundly that he and his party could have nothing to say to them. They might, indeed, coöperate with them for "Catholic objects"—such, perhaps, as the conversion of the Jews!—but Scotland is the hereditary domain of the Free Church, in which its Founders will brook no interference.——The Dissenters, whether Presbyterians or Independents, will surely now know how to keep their distance, and be respectful. Their zeal to welcome the party whose objects and whole course of conduct they had justly condemned, far outran their discretion. They required a lesson, and they got it without loss of time.

In the meanwhile, the fact remains, that about a fourth of the parish ministers have left the Church of Scotland, and given up their livings, together with quoad sacra ministers, missionaries, and professors, amounting in all to above 400—some say 427 persons. The number seems very great, by whatever means it has been swelled. But let the friends of religion take the consolation, that not one of these martyrs is lost to Scotland. All who were worth retaining remain in full activity; if not in the Church, then out of it. By the spirit of emulation they will infuse new energy into the Moderate party—rousing the "slumberers in Zion" to a better sense of their duties. The Dissenters may comfort themselves with the reflection, that, in spite of Dr. Chalmers's premature and indiscreet vituperation of their body, and his steadfast love of an endowed establishment, his party, in having thrown off the yoke of the State Church, and placed their dependence on popular support—for there is, alas! no hope of a Scotch Regium Donum—must infuse some popular elements into the constitution of their Free Church; that it must be, to some extent, free for the people as well as for the clergy. And the government will now be forced to do something to adapt the Establishment itself to the popular wants and the spirit of the age. This will be immediately forced upon the attention of the government by the friends and the ministers of the Establishment. Reform will assuredly not be found in giving more power to the clergy; so that the prospect is cheering on every side; and every party has cause of congratulation in that awful disruption which threatened so much, and which has turned out,—however brought about,—if not a very great affair, then a good and desirable dispensation. The leading metropolitan martyrs, even in their secular interests, will not, we imagine, be much worse off in their attics, than when they were craving or permitting the aid of the civil power, of which they are so jealous, to distrain the goods, and imprison the persons, and violate the consciences of their fellow-townsmen and fellow-christians, to obtain payment of their own stipends. We have never heard of any protest of theirs against the exercise of the civil power in such flagrant cases for their own pecuniary advantage. That Annuity-Tax alone, and its hideous consequences to religion and social morality, would, it occurs to us, have been a much better cause for martyrdom—for forsaking the Church and trusting to Providence,—than any that has yet been assigned by the reverend Edinburgh Doctors, Founders of the Free Church.

If it were not that Journalists, like surgeons, become hardened in the discharge of their painful but necessary duties, we could pity those who have, in these times, to write from day to day upon public affairs,—diurnally to record, that everything looks more and more hopeless and gloomy. It is but poor consolation that a Tory Minister is at the head of affairs, and that he has egregiously blundered in all his calculations; while a regularly-declining revenue bears evidence of the protracted sufferings of the people, and of the gradual impoverishment of every class, save the privileged order. It is poor comfort for Liberals to know, that it is Sir Robert Peel, and not Lord Melbourne, who guides the helm, while lamenting the consequences of that system pursued by both parties, which has placed the nation amidst those difficulties and dangers which have imperilled every country that, with a narrowed field of industry, and a discontented population, has also had to contend with a deranged state of the public finances.——Under the pressure and gloom of the present hour, one is fain to look to the future; to watch the faint glimmer of dawn which is afforded by the progress of public opinion on those principles which may yet save the country. In the FREE-TRADE principle, and especially that branch of it which implies the abolition of all taxes and restrictions on the People's food, a long stride, a most triumphant progress, has lately been made. And the number of new votes gained in the House of Commons, and in a Corn-Law Parliament, is by no means the measure of the progress of a cause which must have a wide and solid foundation out of doors, before it can lift its head there. In the other great measure, that for Complete Suffrage, if the immediate agitation is less extensive, people not being able to do two things at a time, and do them equally well, the signs are as decided. This cause must prosper, and for the simple reason, that the working-class being already gained, the intelligent of the middle-class are daily learning that free representation is as necessary for the security of whatever degree of justice they may have wrung from the aristocracy, the "class legislators," as for the obtainment of those farther measures of reform which the well-being of the whole people requires. Mr. Sharman Crawfurd ought therefore to be congratulated upon the ground he has gained. How few years is it since Corn-law Repeal met with a much more ungracious reception in the House of Commons, than Complete Suffrage did last week. Looking around, all is gloom and despondency; but forward, and there is, else the blame is our own, every reasonable ground of hope which a good cause, union, and perseverance can inspire.

CHAPTER XVII.

THE INSURRECTION, AND ITS SUPPRESSION.

A NUMBER of the most intelligent of the guard volunteered their services to alarm the citizens at the various club-houses, theatre, and principal boarding-houses; and being all disguised, and in possession of the negro password, they slipped one by one from the private entrance of the guard-house, and passing the negro bands with the well-known signal, succeeded in putting a powerful body of the citizens upon the alert. In the meantime, Galliard passed safely through the various gangs, and having secured a horse, dashed through the city lines, and speedily gained the road along which the Cadets had been ordered to advance.

Brookley and Maitland were not idle. The guard were employed in secretly dragging several pieces of artillery from the sheds at the back of the premises, and placing them at the lower windows of the guard-house; whilst a strong body of the guard was placed on the upper part of the building, and even on the roof. These preparations being secretly and fully made, Miss Bellgrove was removed to the safest part of the building, and entrusted to Whackie's care, whilst Tom was placed in his old quarters, the black-hole; and the guard, in anxious silence, awaited the onset of the insurgent host.

The hour of nine was heard pealing from the various steeples of the city; still the negro drum was silent. A buzz of voices was heard: the sound rose louder and louder; a distant horn sounded; a wild horrific yell burst upon the ears of the guard, and amidst a tremendous volley of musketry, which smashed every window of the guard-house, the negroes advanced to the assault. Instantly the signal was given to the guard; the guns were pointed from the windows, and opened at once upon the assailants; whilst from the roof and upper windows of the building, the guard poured down a continued fire amidst the thick mass of the insurgents.

Surprised at the unexpected resistance, the negroes retired for a space; but the cry arose amongst them, to fire the guard-house and destroy its defenders. Maitland and Brookley instantly formed the design of attempting to drive the negroes back, and maintaining their position in front of the guard-house, till aid should arrive. They, therefore, headed a considerable body of the guard, and sallying out upon the insurgent host, by a sudden assault, drove them before them at the point of the bayonet; then causing a number of the trees to be torn down from the side walks, the street was speedily and effectually barricaded against the assailants. A number of the citizens had by this time assembled; but unable to break through the negro ranks, they took possession of a large wooden building adjoining the guard-house, and from the verandahs opened a most destructive fire upon the insurgents. It was then that the loud shouts of the advancing host, headed by Perault and the other ringleaders, was heard, and led the citizens to expect the fiercest part of the conflict. A number of buildings by this time had been set on fire; and, by the broad blaze, the immense mass of the rebel army was seen rapidly approaching.

Maitland and Brookley now caused the cannon to be dragged from the guard-house, and placed so as to enfilade the streets; and as the dense mass approached, the cannon opened upon them with fearful effect, and the well-directed volleys of musketry caused the fiercest of the insurgents to shrink back.

Perault now saw, that unless the barrier was surmounted, and the guard overpowered, the citizens would soon give sufficient aid to keep the negroes in check; and, followed by Zama, he rushed to the front of the assailants, and, cheering on their forces, dashed boldly over the barricade; but they were repelled, with dreadful loss, and obliged to retire. The citizens were now gathering fast; and, from the roofs and verandahs, a deadly fire was opened upon the negroes. Perceiving that the citizens, from one of these houses, were thinning the ranks of the insurgents, Perault ordered the house to be set on fire. Instantly his orders were obeyed. The negroes rushed to the assault; and a fierce struggle was carried on between the incendiaries and the defenders of the house, even while the flames were curling around the pillars of the piazzas, and bursting from the windows; while the gallant band forced their way through the insurgents' ranks, and joined the city guard. The whole host of the insurgents now advanced; and victory seemed inclining in their favour, when the rushing sound of horses' hoofs, mingling with the clang of sabres, was heard. The bright blaze gleamed upon the helmets of the mounted Brigade; and, with a wild hurrah, the cavalry dashed into the serried ranks of the rebels. Loud shrieks of terror burst from the trampled negro bands; and numbers of them, throwing away their weapons, fled for safety to the very homes which they had dedicated to bloodshed and ruin. Driven back by the furious charge of the cavalry, and checked in the midst of their career, the negroes became dispirited, and the tide of battle seemed rolling against them; when the quick eye of Perault at once perceived the ruin of their cause, and with ready tact the insurgent leader resolved to make one more desperate effort to retrieve his sinking power. Rallying the boldest of his followers around him, he led them again to the attack, and, in turn, caused the mounted Brigade to retire, disputing every inch of their ground. A number of trees were hastily torn down from the side walks; and, with them and the large paving-bricks and wood, the negroes speedily formed a strong barricade, to protect themselves from the sudden charges of the cavalry; and, from behind this barricade, the insurgents kept up a galling fire on the cavalry, causing horses and riders to roll in the dust. Still the Brigade resolved not to be repulsed; but their vain efforts to overleap the barricade only tended to their own loss and disadvantage. The white troops, seeing the strong position which the negroes were now assuming, resolved to drive them from it; and the signal being given for the mounted Brigade to fall back, Major Maitland advanced with his Cadets, who, pouring in a well-directed volley on the negroes, charged across the barricade, and drove the insurgent host before them.

Perault and Zama rushed to the spot; and the ranks of the Cadets being broken, the renewed combat became one of individual prowess—hand to hand, and man to man. Hemmed in, and surrounded by the whole host of the insurgents, the Cadets found their rifles of no use, and were obliged to have recourse to their daggers and long bowie-knives, which were of effectual service in this close fighting. Fresh troops, meanwhile, poured over the barricade to assist the Cadets; and the combat deepened. It was then that Perault singled out Maitland in the mêlée, to whom he imputed the frustration of his designs; and with redoubled ferocity he sprang upon him. Maitland parried the blows of the infuriated Perault, till Gullah Jack, rushing forward to the assistance of his friend, struck the sword from the hand of Maitland, and left him exposed to certain death. With a shout of exultation, Perault lifted his sabre; and the blow was descending on the helpless, unarmed youth, when it was suddenly arrested by Zama, who, perceiving the perilous situation of Maitland, and mindful of the affection which Zada had towards him, rushed forward to the rescue on the impulse of the moment, heedless of the consequence. Gullah Jack, at the same instant, was stretched upon the earth, and Zama stood between Maitland and his foes.

"Monsters!" exclaimed the negro; "two of you against an unarmed man."

"Hell!" shouted Perault, "are you against us? Do you betray us? Traitor! take your reward." So saying, he struck down Zama's guard, shivered his sabre to the hilt, and stretched him at the feet of Maitland. By this time the white troops had cleared away the barricade; and the cavalry, like a whirlwind, rushed on, driving all before them. Maitland, with difficulty, saved himself from the fearful rush; but Zama was completely covered by the falling negroes, and trampled beneath the horses' hoofs.

The stubborn spirit of the negro rebels was fast sinking, and their energies seemed almost paralyzed;—still they fought on without yielding one inch of ground. Perault's voice was still heard above the din, animating the rebels to the attack; till, maddened at the failure of his bold attempt, and still kept in check by the citizens, he gave the signal for the insurgent host to seize the shipping: and, while the foremost ranks continued to oppose the white troops, a heavy mass of the insurgent host deployed through the lanes and streets, and commenced their attack on the troops drawn up to defend the harbour. But here an unexpected obstacle arose. The sailors belonging to the various vessels had been speedily assembled and armed; and the garrison of Castle Pinckney, alarmed by the blaze of the buildings, and the sounds of warfare in the city, had forwarded a strong party to aid the citizens. These uniting with the sailors, repelled the insurgents with immense loss; and Perault, baffled in this attempt, was compelled to withdraw his forces. It was then that Perault formed the most daring project that ever entered his fertile brain. Seeing that almost every hope of success or escape was cut off, and knowing that the garrison had been hurriedly called from Castle Pinckney, and that the negroes in that fortress were all engaged in the plot, he resolved to seize it, and thus command his own terms with the city, which lay under its guns. His intentions were instantly communicated to the insurgent leaders; and in regular order the negroes retreated to the beach, (where their canoes lay,) closely pursued by the white troops. Having reached the beach, they formed; and, while one body endeavoured to drive back the white troops, another strong body entered the canoes, and gave the signal, "To the fort!—to the fort!" The citizens at once perceived the desperate game of the insurgents, and strained every nerve to defeat their object. One fierce charge broke the ranks of the negroes on the beach; and they fled to the canoes, scrambling in confusion through the water. The combat now became more fierce; for the white troops, rushing into the water after the fugitives, grappled with and upset the canoes; while others, hurling the negroes from the canoes, darted forward and prevented the foremost from proceeding. Among those most prominent on this occasion was Galliard, who took the lead, and, accompanied by a few of his gallant comrades in a boat, dashed forward to the place where Perault's voice was heard animating the insurgents; and sweeping alongside of the canoe which contained the rebel leader, Galliard and his companions grappled with the rowers, and with their bowie-knives cleared a space, into which they sprang. Galliard rushed on Perault, who struck him a blow which nearly shivered the steel frontlet of his helmet, and almost forced him overboard. Instantly recovering from the shock, Galliard flew upon, and closed with the insurgent leader. A furious struggle ensued; but the frail canoe, unable to bear the violent motions of the combatants, reeled from side to side, and at length upsetting, hurled the combatants into the waves. Other canoes pressed to the spot; and Perault, nearly drowned, and covered with wounds, was dragged insensible from the water; while the loud shouts of his conquerors, proclaimed the joyful tidings of victory.

The insurgents now sought for safety in confused flight; and the morning dawn broke in upon the scene of bloodshed, when, tired of their efforts, the citizens allowed the wreck of the rebel host to escape; while Perault, bound hand and foot, was dragged to the strongest cell of the city prison.

The sun arose upon a scene of horror and desolation. The streets were strewed with the dead and dying—negroes and whites stretched side by side; while the black and smouldering ruins of the burned houses, bore fearful evidence of the horrors of the preceding night.

Fatigue parties were sent out to carry in the wounded, and collect the dead. Few rites of sepulture were awarded to the negro dead; who were generally tossed into the bay, to become the prey of the swarm of sharks which always infest it. Amongst some of the parties who were removing the wounded and the dead, Maitland and Mr. Bellgrove, accompanied by Mr. Norrisville, appeared. Mr. Bellgrove and Mr. Norrisville had been alarmed, along with the other inhabitants of Sullivan's Island, at the sounds of war in the city, and had instantly left the island, and returned to town, where they had arrived immediately after the insurgent host was defeated. Many of the planters accompanied them; and amidst every group of the dead negroes, the favourite slave of some one or other of them was found. From amongst a group of the slain, one negro was dragged, who was still breathing; and the surprise of the guard, and those around, was great at the remarkable symmetry of this negro's form and features. Some considered that it was some young white man, who had tinged his features and disguised himself to lead on the insurgent bands; and they became still more confirmed in that opinion, when, on opening his vesture, they found a massy gold chain, to which was attached the portrait of a young and beautiful white female. Attracted by the crowd around this negro, Maitland and his friends pressed forward, and instantly recognised the wounded Zama. With some difficulty, they persuaded the guard to carry him to Mr. Bellgrove's mansion, pledging themselves to give him up should he be demanded; and Zama was instantly borne thence, and placed under the care of a skilful surgeon.

The citizens and army of the district were speedily assembled under arms; the city lines and fortifications were strongly guarded, and artillery was planted in every street; while troops of cavalry scoured the avenues to the town and the surrounding country. Strict search was made for the suspected ringleaders of the insurrection; and fully four hundred negroes were thrown into prison in the course of the forenoon. From documents found upon the persons of some of the conspirators, it was easily ascertained who were the principal instigators of the plot; and Perault was discovered to be the prime mover of the insurrection. His intercourse with Hayti was exposed, and the whole of his deep-laid plans were developed. The fearful extent of the conspiracy, and the profound secrecy in which it had been kept, amazed the citizens; and a feeling of distrust and inquietude pervaded every bosom.

Colonel Waldenberg heard of the defeat of the Cherokees, and the suppression of the insurrection of the negroes, in the same breath; and his rage, on learning that Major Maitland had the honour of both, completely overpowered every other feeling. Chagrined that his slave, Perault, should have carried on the whole conspiracy, actually under his own eye, and made him the unsuspecting tool of his personal negotiations at Hayti, Waldenberg felt no pity that his rebellious slave had fallen into the hands of the conquerors; and an anxious desire to throw part of the blame on Maitland, for forwarding Perault and the armed negroes to the city, was now his sole object. It was with a feeling of fiend-like joy that he heard Zama yet lived, and had been taken; and Waldenberg now swore deep and fearful vengeance against the negro for the blow which had reduced him to his present helpless state; and, shaking off sickness, he suddenly summoned his council to attend him.

In the evening, Mr. Bellgrove was seated with Major Maitland and Mr. Norrisville, talking over the events of the day, when Maitland expressed some anxiety about Zama.

"Poor fellow!" said Mr. Bellgrove; "he has been sadly misled. There was some foul play on Waldenberg's part towards Zada, which drove the poor fellow into the arms of the insurgents. Yet I feel deeply, that he of all others should have betrayed me."

"Horrible though that plot was," said Maitland, "still there are circumstances which ought to plead on the behalf of the greater number of those who joined it; and if examples are to be made, severity should not be stretched too far."

They were here interrupted by a loud knocking at the outer-gate, which was no sooner opened, than a troop of cavalry galloped into the court-yard and surrounded the premises; and the commanding officer, dismounting, requested to be conducted to the presence of Mr. Bellgrove.

"Captain Riley," said Mr. Bellgrove, as the officer entered, "you come followed as if you expected to meet with foes here."

"A council is at present sitting at the Governor's house," answered Riley, "which you and Major Maitland are requested to attend.——My orders are to search your premises, and seize upon the negroes therein."

"My name and rank," rejoined Mr. Bellgrove, "might have proved a sufficient protection from this violation of my house. By whose orders do you act?"

"By the orders of Colonel Waldenberg," he answered. "He heard that one of your favourite slaves led the insurgents last night, and that he lies concealed in your house."

Mr. Bellgrove, accompanied by Maitland, instantly proceeded to the Governor's house; and on entering the hall, observed that the council was composed of some of the district judges and citizens. Colonel Waldenberg acted as president of the meeting. His head was bound up,—his features were pale, and strongly marked with pain; while now and then an angry scowl gathered on his brows, as if he was bent on some desperate effort. At the moment of their entry, Lieutenant Galliard was undergoing an examination, relative to his negroes, some of whom were amissing, and, among the rest, dandy Tom.

"I can assure you, gentlemen," said Galliard, addressing the council, "that the fellow Tom is so great a coward, that he would not face his own shadow; and had it not been for his confession, we might have been overpowered by the insurgents before we were aware of their force."

"The negro is not worthy of our attention," said Colonel Waldenberg; "let him go, on Mr. Galliard's responsibility for his conduct." His eye fell on Major Maitland; and with a malignant scowl, he addressed him, saying—"So, Major Maitland, you have thought proper to call on me at last."

"Yesterday I called, but found your house locked up," answered Maitland; "hence I could not meet with you."

"You brought the Indian warfare to a close, I understand, on terms which we may yet reject," said Waldenberg; "and timed your arrival in the city so as to hurl our Cadets upon the unruly rabble of negroes."

"You speak the truth," answered Maitland, angry at the tone in which Waldenberg addressed him; "but had you followed up the first advantage which our Cadets obtained over the Indians, instead of loitering away the time at Myrtlegrove, their power would have been sooner broken, the insurgent negroes more easily awed, and much bloodshed prevented."

"I sit not here to be lectured by you," said Waldenberg, fiercely. "I am informed that you forwarded forty armed negroes to the city, under the command of one of the most powerful ringleaders of the insurrection."

"To guard you and the friends accompanying you to the city, I allowed certain of the negroes of Myrtlegrove plantation to escort you down the Wandoo, under the command of Lieutenant Galliard."

"You hear this, gentlemen," cried Waldenberg, addressing the council; "and you know that the greater part of these negroes were taken prisoners this morning! And I understand, further, that you, Major Maitland, refuse to give up any of your own slaves on this occasion."

"Because none of them were concerned in the insurrection," answered Maitland.

"How do you know that?" inquired Waldenberg, testily.

"Because my servants know, if they want their freedom they may have it for the asking; and they know, that every well-deserving negro on my estates is freed, without his asking it, and amply provided for," answered Maitland.

The councillors looked at each other with surprise; and Waldenberg, throwing himself back on his chair, addressed Mr. Bellgrove with assumed hauteur, which ill disguised the agitation he was evidently labouring under. "I regret to hear that you, Mr. Bellgrove, have been aiding the concealment of one of the principal ringleaders of this plot—I mean your slave, Zama."

"There has been no concealment, so far as he is concerned," said Mr. Bellgrove; "the poor lad may have been misled, like many others. Perhaps you know best, Colonel Waldenberg, what forced him to join the insurgents."

Waldenberg half started from his seat, his face flushed with anger; but he sunk back again, and, with quivering lips, sat trembling, lest the fact of his having been struck to the earth by the negro should be made public. Mr. Bellgrove, however, alluded to the carrying off of Zada, and imputed the Colonel's agitation to a consciousness of his guilt. Further conversation was broken off by the entrance of Captain Riley, who approached Colonel Waldenberg, and said, "Your orders have been obeyed."

"Is the negro, Zama, taken?" inquired Waldenberg, more violently agitated than before, as he arose hastily from his seat.

"He is," the Captain replied; "and he now lies in prison."

"Thank you!—thank you!" gasped Waldenberg, as he dropped on the chair again, and sat for some time silent; then suddenly rising, he said—"Gentlemen, I must now retire; I feel that to-day's proceedings have been too much for me." He bowed, and, leaning on the arm of Captain Riley, slowly left the hall.

The prisons were no sooner filled with the insurgent slaves, and preparations commenced for their trials, than Waldenberg, by dark hints and innuendoes, threw out suspicions of Maitland's conduct. The whole nature of Waldenberg seemed to have undergone a revolution. Pride, honour, rank, fortune,—all would have been gladly sacrificed, to drag Maitland into the toils; so bitter and so deep was hatred implanted in his bosom. There are, in every human breast, some latent sparks of evil, which, once struck, are fanned readily into a flame, and, in their volcano-like eruption, overwhelm all that is good and fair, even in the noblest character. So it fared with Waldenberg. Struck to the earth by a negro!——there was madness in the thought. Reduced, in consequence of that blow, to a state of almost utter helplessness; while Maitland, his rival in every point, was gaining high renown, and his name the theme of every tongue. It was beyond endurance. In the hopes that his influence with Perault would induce the negro to make some admission or confession which might militate against Maitland, Waldenberg proposed to the council that Perault should be examined before them; and, having gained their consent, orders were given to bring the fallen, though yet dreaded rebel chief into their presence.

In the strongest cell of the prison, heavily ironed and closely guarded, lay the haughty Perault. Knowing that every look was watched, and every word caught at, he had been extremely guarded in his looks, words, and actions; and no Indian Brave could meet his fate with more apparent coolness and indifference than did the baffled negro. Yet within his bosom hell raged; and, had the power been granted him, the wreck of creation alone would have gratified his thirst of vengeance. In this mood he was led before the council.

There was a calmness and dignity in the deportment of the fettered rebel, which inspired the judges with mingled feelings of wonder and hate. Walking with a proud step through the hall, he confronted Waldenberg, and haughtily said, "In obedience to your commands I have been brought hither: what would you with me?"

Waldenberg eyed him sternly, and answered, "I little expected that we should meet in circumstances like the present."

"Nor is it my fault," said the haughty insurgent, "that we do meet thus. If Perault had had his will, he would have saved you all this trouble."

"Remember your situation, Sir," said one of the judges; "and treat your master with respect."

"These," said Perault, as he held out his fettered hands, "remind me too strongly of my situation, but cannot teach me to respect what I despise."

"Perault," said Colonel Waldenberg, "your conduct annoys me. I have ever been a kind and indulgent master to you, and little anticipated such a reward for my kindness."

"Kindness!" exclaimed Perault, bitterly. "Mark me, Colonel Waldenberg: I was a free-born African; more nobly born than you, or any one of you who now pretend to sit in judgment on me. I was dragged from my native home, and illegally deprived of my freedom. Your father bought me; and I became your property. I was deprived of home, of fortune, rank and power, and kept the bond-slave of a petty Carolinian planter: this was kindness, was it not?"

"You give your insolent tongue too much license," said one of the judges. "You forget that you are a negro, and a slave."

Perault turned to the judge, and, with a sarcastic smile, answered:—"If I mistake not, when you Americans shook off the British yoke, you proclaimed to the world, that all mankind were born free; and ye raised the standard of Rebellion in the name of life, LIBERTY, and fortune: how then come you to drive the poor negro from the pale of humanity, and deprive him of the blessings you proclaimed to all mankind?"

"We came not here to discuss the question of slavery with you," said another of the judges, interrupting him.

"No," said Perault; "nor would you discuss it elsewhere, till the negro, aroused from his lethargy, pleaded his cause with the torch in one hand, and the sword in the other. You Americans fought for freedom, and were triumphant; we fought for freedom also—we have in the meantime been vanquished: a better day may yet arrive."

"Dog!" exclaimed one of the judges, starting from his seat, "do you hurl defiance in our teeth, and hold out threats to us?"

"I do," answered Perault; "and every negro in the land will respond to my feelings."

"You are too rashly rushing upon destruction," said Colonel Waldenberg. "Yet still we wish to extend mercy to you; and my own wishes will be altogether in your favour, provided you give up the real Instigators of the late rebellion, and confess who supplied the insurgent slaves with arms and money."

"Colonel Waldenberg, you think too meanly of the negro character," said Perault. "The negroes are not so destitute of means and money as the world imagine; and in the cause of freedom they would lavish all they have. Behold in me the sole instigator of the late attempt to break the yoke of slavery! I, and I alone, am the man who first aroused my countrymen to strike for freedom—I was the sole head and mover of the bold attempt. On me, then, and on me alone, let your vengeance fall; and if you hope for peace in this world, and for mercy in the next—shed no more blood than mine."

Waldenberg sat for some time in fixed astonishment, gazing at the insurgent. "You," he at length cried, "you whose every movement was under my own eyes; you who so recently ventured your own life to save mine from a band of blood-thirsty pirates!"

"Do not deceive yourself, Sir," answered Perault; "it was from no love to you, that I opposed the pirate horde: they were white men, and I was at liberty to slay them. When, single-handed, I had nearly cleared the deck, my rage could have turned on you, and our own white crew."

"You must have a savage heart indeed, to injure one who benefited you so much," replied Waldenberg.

"Benefited me?" cried Perault; "me who was born a prince, and leader of my native land! What benefits do you allude to? There is not an angry word or look, not a scornful taunt or gesture, but stands engraven upon my heart in indelible characters, and cries aloud for vengeance! My very garb, the glittering trappings of your own vanity, was to point me out to passers-by, that they might say—There goes some rich man's SLAVE."

"I can overlook your hatred and despise it," answered Waldenberg. "Yet I cannot believe, that you alone, and of your own accord, could have given to this conspiracy the deep and extensive organisation it assumed. It is generally thought that some foreign power, by means of some wealthy whites in this city, first set the Insurrection on foot. Confess, therefore, who are the real parties, and save yourself."

"Were I free to-night," said Perault, "my first act would be, to place myself at the head of my gallant countrymen, and again raise the banner of freedom. I have sworn eternal hatred to your race, and would not ask for mercy at your hands."

"You refuse to confess, then?" said Waldenberg.

"I have already confessed all I ever will confess," answered Perault.

"You know that you have forfeited your life to the injured laws of the State?" said Waldenberg.

"No man," answered the insurgent, "is to blame for recovering that, of which he has been illegally deprived. You talk of injured laws—I talk of injured justice! Maintaining as we do, that you hold us in illegal and unnatural bondage, we were and are at perfect liberty to recover our freedom by all means in our power."

"The laws of this State declare it to be death for any negro to rise in rebellion against his master," said Waldenberg.

"Laws," answered Perault, "are subservient to justice, and merely point out how justice ought to be administered: such a law as that which you lay down, is founded on injustice, and the sooner such laws are blotted from your statute-book the better. Beware! I say—beware! that they are not blotted out with the blood of their upholders."

"You are an incorrigible villain, Perault," said Waldenberg; "and I shall no longer stand between you and the death you merit."

"I know my fate," answered Perault, "and will meet it as I may. Would to heaven," he added, with energy, "that the shedding of my blood might be the means of filling every negro in your land with a desire of vengeance! My life would then not be laid down in vain."

"Remove him!" cried one of the judges. And, with the same haughty air with which he had entered, Perault retired from their presence.

"We must strike terror to the negro slaves, by making a fearful example of the ringleaders of this plot," said Colonel Waldenberg. "Let there be no delay in bringing the prisoners to trial."

So saying, the meeting broke up.

Every preparation was at length made, and the captive insurgents were brought to trial. No undue advantage was taken of their situation, and every legal means of defence was allowed them. Their trial was fair and open. Indeed, it could not be otherwise, when it is considered that many of the rebels were the favourite slaves of the wealthiest families in the city, and that every negro who was convicted was a considerable dead loss to his owner; so that the citizens, even had they no other feeling than the all-ruling one of dollars and cents, exerted every nerve to get their negroes freed of the imputation of participation in the insurrection. Legal talent was not wanting to aid the unfortunate negroes. The brightest and the best stepped boldly forward in their cause; and, to the eternal honour of the Carolinian Bar be it said, that no class of society in the whole Union have shown more determination to vindicate the legal rights, such as they are, of the poor negro.

Perault and Zama were the two most prominent ringleaders; and the bold and headlong charges which they had led on that fearful night, had pointed them out to be the master-spirits of the revolt. In vain was every impediment that legal acumen and forensic knowledge could display, thrown in the way of the trial. About three hundred of the negroes were found guilty. Perault and Zama, with Gullah Jack, Abdallah the Obi, and thirty of the ringleaders were condemned to death. The remainder of the negroes were banished to the swamps of the Mississippi—to them a fate more horrible than death in its worst form.

The only symptoms of agitation which Perault displayed throughout the whole trial, was when the dreadful sentence of death was pronounced, and his eye caught that of Abdallah, bent upon him with a look of deep grief. Regardless of the crowded court, and the mass of armed troops around, Perault stepped forward, and, grasping the hand of the old man, said, in a voice tremulous with emotion,—"Alas! my friend, I have been sorely to blame in dragging thy gray hairs to a bloody grave."

"Fear not for me," said Abdallah, faintly smiling; "they cannot harm me. Fear not for thyself: boldly hast thou braved them, and nobly shalt thou die."

A loud tumult arose near the bar, and the spectators were surprised to behold Colonel Waldenberg, pale and trembling, arise from his seat, and press forward till he stood before Perault and Abdallah.

"Do my eyes deceive me?" exclaimed the Colonel, as he gazed earnestly on Abdallah. "Do I behold——"

"The murderer of thy father!" cried the Obi, interrupting him. "Yes, proud man, thy father fell by my hand. The poor oppressed negro revenged his own wrongs. Thine own fate shall be like thy father's!" he added, in a deep, sepulchral voice; "a negro's hand shall hurl thee to eternity!" The Obi sunk back exhausted, and would have fallen to the ground, had not Perault caught him in his arms.

"Remove the prisoners," exclaimed a stern voice from the Bench; and the armed guards advanced, but suddenly paused as Perault, in a voice almost choked with grief, exclaimed—

"Hold! but one moment: he was the friend of my youth, the only one remaining of my tribe and kindred. If ye are men, grant me but a brief space:—'tis all the grace Perault asks of his conquerers."

Abdallah raised his head feebly, and looking fondly in Perault's face, said,—"I am dying; we will meet again in our own sunny clime, and fear no more oppression. My soul is eager again to wing its flight to its own loved clime. Perault, we part for a short space now ——" He rolled from the arms of Perault a lifeless corpse. The insurgent bent over the dead body for an instant, and hot scalding tears rolled fast from his eyes; then dashing the signs of his weakness aside, he rose haughtily, and with a look of proud defiance stepped back. He was instantly manacled with the rest of his unfortunate companions, and hurried away to the dungeons allotted for the condemned criminals.

Every exertion which could possibly be made, was essayed by Mr. Bellgrove and Maitland to obtain a respite for Zama. To their surprise, however, they found that every measure which they adopted was thwarted by Colonel Waldenberg; and at last they received a formal announcement, that any alteration of his sentence was impossible, and that Zama must prepare for death.

Among others by whom the fate of Zama was deeply regretted, was Miss Bellgrove. The fond attachment which she had to his sister, and the gratitude she felt towards Zama himself for having saved her life from the Indians, interested her the more in his behalf. The sudden and strange alteration in the conduct and character of Colonel Waldenberg, surprised and grieved her; and the innumerable mean subterfuges which he had recourse to, in protracting the measures for a mitigation of Zama's sentence, inspired her with a feeling of aversion and contempt. The open hostility which Waldenberg now displayed toward Mr. Bellgrove and his household, became the subject of public comment; and the manifold petty, yet irksome duties, imposed upon Major Maitland by his colonel, marked, in the strongest terms, the malignant feelings of the latter, and his anxious desire to harass and annoy his rival. Provoked as he many times was, at the conduct of Waldenberg, still Maitland knew, that whilst the city was in a disturbed state, it was the duty of every citizen to exert himself to the utmost in preserving peace. His duties, therefore, were cheerfully performed; and, in many instances, his gentleness and urbanity effected more in securing the affections of the most stubborn of the suspected negroes, and binding the disaffected ones to the whites, than could all the fearful display around, meant to crush and terrify them into submission.

Whackie was acknowledged as the preserver of the city; and the citizens determined to be for once generous to a negro. Mr. Bellgrove had already given him his freedom, and provided amply for his future support. But Whackie resolved that he would not quit "his good, kind massa;" and, at his own earnest request, he was appointed chief attendant on young Bellgrove.

One day, to Whackie's great consternation, he was ordered to attend a public meeting of the citizens in the Merchants' Hall; and, to his still greater perplexity, he was requested by Mr. Bellgrove to array himself in an elegant suit of clothes of the most fashionable cut. Having equipped himself, Whackie stood for a few minutes admiring his changed appearance in a large pier-glass.

"Oh!" he exclaimed; "wot would dandy Tom say if he saw I now?"

"Whackie, Whackie!" exclaimed one of the negro house-girls, who had pressed into the room unknown to him, "oh! how bootiful you is! you look jost like grand buccra genelem—only you is so black!"

"You is tink dat, Dolly?" said Whackie, with an approving grin.

"La, Whackie!" exclaimed the girl, "wot a nice husban' you make to pretty young nigger gal!" And she glanced at the looking-glass to catch a glimpse of her own face.

"Ah!" said Whackie, grinning and looking most gallantly at her, "some pretty gal jost like you, eh?"

"Oh! fie shame, Whackie!" cried the girl, with an affected giggle; "you make I blush!" And she hid her coal-black face, to prevent Whackie seeing whether a negro girl really blushed, or if, as is ridiculously supposed, they blush yellow.

"Don't blush," said Whackie, fondly; "I shall kiss de blush from dat lubelly cheek!" So saying, he flung his arms around the girl's neck; but was interrupted in the act by young Bellgrove entering the apartment.

"Whackie," cried the youth, laughing; "what is this you're about?"

"Beg pardon, Massa," said Whackie, looking rather awkward; "him was only Dolly—want for brush my coat."

"I should rather think," said the youth, laughing, "you wanted to brush her cheeks!"

Whackie hung his head and gave no answer: while Dolly, casting a saucy look at Charles, hurried from the room.

"Come, Whackie," said young Bellgrove, "the carriage is waiting."

Whackie instantly followed him, and at the front entrance was met by Mr. Bellgrove, who kindly shook hands with him; but the negro was still further amazed, when his friend Haman stood hat in hand before him, and bowing, requested him to step into the carriage. Totally bewildered, Whackie knew not what to say or think, till he found himself inside of the carriage, seated by Mr. Bellgrove. Mr. Charles and Mr. Norrisville followed in another carriage; and, drawing up at the Merchants' Hall, Whackie was ushered into the midst of a large assembly, with loud cheers and waving of hats; and, to his great consternation, was seated upon a chair raised on a platform above the spectators. An aged white gentleman approached him, and in name of the citizens of Carlville, presented him with a splendid gold medal, bearing an inscription expressive of their gratitude for the negro's fidelity. This was accompanied with a grant of one thousand dollars per annum while he lived, and freedom from all immunities. A long address was made, of which Whackie did not understand a single sentence, although the words "Saviour of the city"—"preserver of wives and families"—"eternal gratitude"—"negro rebels"—"fire"—"throats cut"—"blood and murder"—"noble negro"—"generous spirit"—"negro fidelity"—"annals of fame"—&c., sometimes struck his ear, which led him at last to suppose, that instead of going to shoot or hang him, as he had at first fancied, they were giving him praise for saving the city and its inhabitants.

"You will be gratified to learn," continued the speaker, "that those rebellious negroes have been brought to trial, found guilty, and condemned to death."

Whackie started, and looked anything but gratified at such intelligence; for, till that moment, he had been kept ignorant of the result of the trials.

"Yes!" continued the speaker, "it affords us the more gratification to honour and admire your fidelity, when we consider, that one of the principal ringleaders of the horrid plot was one of your own fellow-servants, and the favourite slave of your master. Yet vengeance has overtaken his ingratitude, and on the scaffold Zama will soon expiate his crime——"

A loud cry of grief and horror burst from Whackie's lips, as he started from his seat and exclaimed, "Oh! no, Massa!—don't say dat Zama is die!—my good, kind Zama! Oh! Massa, you not know poor Zama, or you would not kill him. I love Zama more den I is love my own life. If Zama die, I sall die too—no break poor nigger heart, Massa!—Take back you gold!—take back all you gib me! only spare my dear Zama—dat—dat—is all de reward I ask."

The emphatic noble appeal of the negro was electrifying, and tears were in many an eye that would have been ashamed to weep. The hearts of the hearers were touched, and one simultaneous burst of applause, rang throughout the crowded hall.

"Spare Zama!"—"Spare the negro!"—"Grant the noble fellow's request!"—"Spare them all, if he ask it!"—were the cries now loudly heard. At length the tumult ceased, and Colonel Waldenberg arose, and addressed the meeting. He dwelt upon the most fearful features of the plot, and the influence of the ringleaders over their followers; he pointed out the fairness of their trial, and justice of their sentence; he maintained it was madness to liberate one of the condemned insurgents, as, in that event, they would only plot anew with more effect. He spoke of Perault, his high talents, and depth of power for intrigue; he spoke of Zama as one of Perault's stamp, and blamed Zama for leading Perault into the conspiracy: if they liberated Zama, he maintained they might as well butcher their fellow-citizens at once, and fire the city themselves. So effectually did he lead his hearers along with him, that before he ended they were displeased with Whackie for having asked them to spare Zama.

Every word which Colonel Waldenberg spoke, was listened to by Whackie with intense eagerness, and he grew faint as he perceived there was no hope for Zama. Waldenberg having gained his point, now turned to Whackie, and proudly addressed him: "Take the rewards the citizens have thought fit to give you; but dare not to interfere with the course of justice."

"Dam you black heart!" exclaimed Whackie, transported with rage. "Oh! dat I was a white man for jost five minute, to lickee you!"

Waldenberg frowned darkly, and, turning to the spectators, proposed that the meeting should break up, which was agreed to; and poor Whackie, almost broken-hearted, was carried home again.

Resolved to make another effort to save Zama, Whackie instantly sought Miss Bellgrove, whose influence with Colonel Waldenberg, he thought, would go far in Zama's favour, and cause him to forego the bitter rancour he had displayed against the ill-fated negro. With the traces of grief still on his countenance, Whackie stood before Matilda, and sobbing, said:—"Missee, will you do poor nigger one favour?"

"Most cheerfully, if it is in my power," she answered.

"Den, Missee, will you save poor Zama?" he entreated.

"Would that I could!" she sighed. "But every effort has been made, and all in vain."

"Zama was save you life, Missee," said Whackie; "and I tink you can save Zama."

"How? I have no power to do so," she said.

"Yes! Missee, you hab, if Massa Coram Wallinbeg choose for do um, Zama will get free. Now, Missee, Coram Wallinbeg lub you, and he do anyting for you."

Matilda, blushing deeply, answered: "I fear, if you rely on that, you will be mistaken. You forget, Whackie, that Colonel Waldenberg has grossly insulted me, by causing his people carry off my poor Zada. Poor, dear girl!" she added, "would that I knew thy fate!"

"Do try, Missee!" implored the negro. "Oh! forget what he was do—he maybe wish for do good now, to hab you lub him again."

"No, no! Whackie, that cannot be," she answered.

"When poor Zama kill de red Indine, dat wanted for kill you, he no fear all de Red Cherokee togeder; an' why you fear for face Coram Wallinbeg? him was never do for you, wot poor Zama was do. Ah, Missee, do go to de Coram Wallinbeg—say you want Zama save, an' all will do right."

"It is a rash and indelicate step you advise," said Matilda.

"Wot, Missee!" cried Whackie, "it surely no rash and indelicate to save de life of a poor fellow-being?—one, too, dat was so good—so kind as my Zama! If you know how poor Zama lub you, how he use for pray for you—when he thought nobody was near—you would do all you could for save him. If it be rash and indelicate, den we was rash and indelicate for go to de guard-house, and save de city dat night!"

"Then, I will go," said Miss Bellgrove, rising. "You shall also go, Whackie; and heaven grant that we may meet with success!"

Dancing with joy, Whackie flew to order out the carriage for his young lady, and in a short time they arrived at Waldenberg's mansion. Matilda was surprised to observe none but quadroon slaves about the premises; and, on inquiry, learned that the Colonel had sold off all his negroes, and had purchased mulattoes and quadroons in their place, and that he would not suffer a negro to be about his house.

THE AERIAL STEAMER.

What times are ours! each day some new device:
One day we hear of artificial ice;
Anon, some grand machine for setting types,
And next, perchance, some plan for cleansing tripes!
This is indeed the era of machines;
Nought now is done, as wont, by human means.
The cheery whirring of the spinning-wheel,
The solemn click of the revolving reel,
Is hushed, by that sad climax of thine ills—
My good grandame—the modern spinning mills!
Be jealous, housewives; these dread innovations
Are spreading fast and fatal through the nations.
They soon may deal with culinary matters,
And have machines to wipe and rinse your platters.
Your charter'd rights assert then while you may;
They suffer new invasions every day.
Our honest forefathers, how would they gaze,
And scan your face with looks of dumb amaze,
As you rehearsed the wonders of our age,—
The strange uneasy universal rage,
For something novel, curious, or rare;
Sure there 's a spell about our British air,
That acts in some strange way as an incentive
To tickle up the faculty inventive.
Gas, railroads, steam, how foreign to their ears
The nomenclature of these recent years!
All things now move by clockwork and by springs;
How chang'd, alas! the present state of things
From those good olden times when men had measure,
Both in their plans, their profits, and their pleasure:
Alas! alack! for these degenerate days,
When sons, forsooth! would mend their fathers' ways,
And madly, nay, more impiously ambitious,
Would force the wind and water to their wishes.
Hills tunnell'd—mountains shoved into the sea,
Portentous deeds! The good old times for me.
Shades of departed ancestors! you stare
When told of steam-ships scudding through the sea,
But here is one,—to fly, yes, through the air!
"The air!—oh, hold—my brain reels dizzily."
Nor be it thought that this aërial steamer
Is but the freak of some romantic dreamer—
The airy phantom of his fever'd head:
'Tis the reverse—'tis fact—indeed 'tis made;
And in the British Parliament of late,
It form'd the theme of serious debate.
So this you see, although it is surprising,
'Tis something more than empty theorising.
All former arts this throws into the shade.
The rumbling mail will soon be superseded,
Railways and ships, fleet mediums once of trade,
Shall rust and rot paused, because unneeded.
This new device will carry all before it;
Not grovelling on the earth but flying o'er it,
'Twill scud and glide throughout the liquid ether,
In proud defiance both of wind and weather.
To float—to swing—to dangle in mid-sky!
Sublime, etherealizing thought, to fly!
Not dragging painfully along the earth,
Or jolting sea-sick in a sailor's berth,
At every undulation of the ship;
(Yet this is what some call a pleasure trip!)
Not jerked and shattered on a railway train,
With objects crowding on the dizzied brain;
No everlasting friction to impede
The panting engine, and impair its speed.
But, shooting up, we'll wing our balmy flight
Air-borne sublimed, like messengers of light.
Secure and free from every earth-born care,
We'll dance along, elastic as the air.
Swift as the wind our steamer flits along,
Starting the airy tenants in their song.
How shall we scour illimitable space!
Scan the fair features of creation's face;
Gaze from aloft on Etna's belching fire,
And view the garden of our primal sire!
Burst through the barriers of this narrow scene,
Leave far beneath the lumbering terrene,
And soar to regions of the upper world,
Where Britain's flag was never yet unfurl'd!
Up to the lofty eyrie of the eagle
Where he sits sole, magnificent and regal,
Flapping his scornful wings at every danger,
And gazing fiercely on the mighty stranger.
Yet higher still we rise, nor shall we halt,
Till, past the curtain of yon azure vault,
We look supreme down on earth's murky maze,
See far beneath the lurid lightnings blaze
The forky shafts of their innocuous fire,
And winds expend the tempest of their ire!
And lolling thus our airy car within,
Ride proud and safe above the thunder's din.
What altered times when steamers such as these,
Shall quite displace the vessels of the seas;
Shall ply and flit to earth's remotest goal,
And hover proudly o'er her ice-girt pole.
And when their springy forms shall fume and snort
In every inland town and every port,
Thus too most likely will they advertise
The next predestined voyage of the skies—
"The Aerial packet Pegasus will sail,
(It should be fly,) precisely without fail,
On Monday next, the sixteenth day of June,
For Jebel Kumrah—Mountains of the Moon."

Where do you mean or wish to pay a visit?
To Paris—eh? perhaps to Dublin—is it?
Oh, then ascend, we'll land you in a jiffey—
There, now, you're on the margin of the Liffey!
But, pox! I've left my walking-stick at Dover;
Just stand there half an hour till I fly over.
The packet? Sir, 'tis flying just this minute!
Step up.—Catch hold—oh, there now, you are in it.
A jaunt to India will be plaguedly easy.
Your very children will begin to tease ye—
"Papa, I'd like a trip to India soon,
The "Comet" flies this very afternoon."
Well, ought I now to grant this lad permission?
Let me bethink me—Hem! why this is Monday.
Well, you may go, child—but on this condition,
That you be back—mark—to the church on Sunday.
The joyous youth soon pledges punctuality,
As well as strict financial frugality.
Thus, one could spend his breakfast hour at Cork,
Set off and take his luncheon at New York;
In a few hours—rapidity terrific!—
Could cross the bosom of the wide Pacific,
Steer to Pekin and be in time to dine (eh?)
With his Celestial Majesty of China!
But still, perhaps, some timorous soul may say—
"Yes, this is fine; but what if on the way
You knock your head, some dark and starless night,
When by misluck you lose your only light,
On some projecting mountain? don't you fear,
In such a case, you'd scarce know how to steer?
Or it may be, by some disastrous motion,
You might capsize and fall into the ocean."
Now this at first looks plausible and sound,
But closely viewed has not the slightest ground.
We can ascend above earth's highest dust:
Were this not so your argument were just.
As to our course again; why such a rumpus?
Does it not strike you that we'll have a compass?
Thus furnish'd, sure we can be at no loss,
Just fix the tail—then fly direct across.
Not like a ship's course intricate and sinuous—
Ours shall be straight, unchequer'd, and continuous.
A light! Why we could blow one from a cinder;
Or—better yet, might have a box of tinder.
Fear not, good friend, but rest yourself contented;
All such unlucky scathe shall be prevented.

What happy times! when every man could fly
From earth-bred danger to the upper sky.
The earthquake! Pho, we'll mount our flying car,
And view earth's dread convulsions from afar,
Buoyant and safe superior to all harm,
Without one faint emotion of alarm.

Hail, happy day! auspicious era, hail!
When, spirit-like, all men shall fly—not sail:
When brightest names shall be no more despised,
When Henson thine shall be immortalized,—
And last not least, when schools of education
Will have their class for AERIAL NAVIGATION!

MEN OF PREY.

NATURALISTS admit the existence of birds of prey, beasts of prey, fishes of prey,—the jaguar, the shark, or the vulture;—why not of men of prey? The carnivorous fang, the crooked beak, the serrated jaw, the ferocious talon, may be wanting as indications; but it requires no over-wary activity of research to detect attributes equally characteristic.

In former times,

Ere human statute purged the general weal,

it was considered a fine stroke of governmental policy to rid the realm of a similar nuisance, by the exaction of an annual tribute of wolves' heads; and at the present day, every parish and farm has its official rat-catcher or vermin-hunter, whose business it is to issue rewards for the bodies of kites and carrion crows, which are nailed to the barn-door, like malefactors hung in chains, in terrorem to other vermin, and for the sake of public example. In our opinion, the moral annihilation of men of prey is an act equally beneficial to the community with the physical extermination of hawks and weasels; and we must consequently be permitted to congratulate the country on the casualties that have lately occurred among the predatory human kind. There has, in fact, been a murrain among these fat kine, which threatens destruction to the species.

But we even pretend to congratulate them on something further. No one can doubt that the order of privileged thieves to which we allude,—the money-lenders, usurers, and bill-brokers of the day,—are the mere excrescence of a corrupt order of society: like the fungi or vermiculi generated by decayed wood. In a wholesome framework of things, they could not exist;—there would be neither food for their sustenance, nor shelter for their loathsomeness. When, therefore, we find these noisome creatures perishing of inanition, we may as surely infer that the corrupt particles which nourished them are disappearing, as we are able to detect a house on the eve of falling from the migration of the rats. As the field which is covered with carrion crows must, we know, be fertile in grubs and worms, the city infested with usurers must also be infested with spendthrifts;—and, on hailing in the Gazette the names of notorious bill-brokers and their attorneys, we have a right to conclude that their occupation is gone. No victims being left to fill the maw of the men of prey, we are at once rid of the roué and his assassin.

It would be an apt lesson to the times,—a lesson which all who run might read,—were the effigies of these human kites nailed up, as a public example, over the ancient gateways of the various family mansions ruined by their interposition. As the heraldic achievement exhibits its proud escutcheon over the portals through which the master has been recently carried forth to the grave, the portraits of these extortioners should be affixed to the family mansion whose master is expatriated in consequence of the fatal ministry of the bill-broker. There they should hang, amid the curses of the miserable tenantry deprived of the protection of the noble landlord, to gild whose waste their labours were so fearfully taxed. The rural population, who have seen the Sheriff's officer and the auctioneer succeed each other in those time-honoured halls,—the fine old family pictures and plate, (in which they took a species of pride and delight, as an investment of the contributions of their forefathers to the family property,) transferred to the hands of strangers,—the old wines, and the last hogshead of October, brewed to grace the future coming of age of the heir of the ancient house, carried off by a publican's dray, to be sold in measures at a pot-house; and who turn away desponding from the mansion which, being entailed, cannot be transferred to a more deserving proprietor; aware that grass is about to clothe the court-yard to which the stranger never repaired in vain for hospitality in the olden time; and that no Christmas dole of blankets and coals is to requite the injury of their high rents and corn-law misfortunes;—the rural population, we say, should learn the precise name and nature of the evil;—should be enabled to place their finger on the livid spot from which emanates the plague and pestilence;—should be taught to pity the thriftless spendthrift, prematurely ruined, as a victim; but to execrate, as a privileged robber, the man of prey who has thriven on his undoing.

We do not allude simply to the bill-brokers,—the two hundred per cent. discounter, who pursues his mole-like calling in those dark corners of the metropolis, at the existence of which the law connives, till we are sometimes tempted to believe that Justice is represented with her eyes blindfolded, only that the people may be unable to discover she is fast asleep. When these men of prey have done their work,—when the silly schoolboy, into whom they inserted their vampire claws at seventeen years of age, is allowed to escape at twenty-one, with his strength exhausted, and scarcely a drop of blood remaining in his veins,—comes the operation of a secondary class of men of prey, more fatal perhaps than the first; who administer restoratives scarcely less exhausting than the attack of the original vampire-bat. In every malady, there are two dangers to apprehend,—the power of the disease, and the power of the physician; and in most fatal cases, the chances are even, which of the two has finished the patient. But the chances are not even when, to the injuries of the money-lender succeed the machinations of the legal setter to rights,—the dry-nurse of ricketty estates,—the bankrupt's friend,—the man of prey, who, seizing from the hands of the trembling, bewildered fool, who has outrun his means, his rent-roll and banker's book, puts a purse into his pocket, bidding him use it sparingly in some foreign country; and that, in the interim, his affairs shall be "brought round!"

We should very much like to know whose affairs were ever brought round by one of these plausible extortioners, the quacks of the legal profession. Like the nurse who silences the peevish cries of an ailing child by fatal opiates, they reduce the spendthrift to a state of torpor, by means which he does not perceive to be an extension of the evil; and in the end, devour what spoil has been left by their less plausible predecessors.

Such men enjoy their villa in the neighbourhood of London; their dinners and their claret are quoted;—and they are seen at Epsom, Ascot, or Doncaster, on the plea that one or other of their unfortunate clients is on the turf, whose interests they must attend to. Other of their victims have private boxes at the opera or theatres, which, during their absence from England, are comprehended among the perquisites of the man of prey; for, in sharing the predatory habits of the sleek and spotted leopard, he often shares also the animal's pretensions to comeliness.

Others are forced (for the interests of their clients) to shoot over their preserves or moors, or take a personal interest in their deer-stalking, which might otherwise fall into the hands of interested keepers. The pine-apples of the spendthrift also want eating;—for as a matter of merchandize, what signifies so small an item in the budget? Occasionally a fine statue or picture, bought in by a mistake of the auctioneer, is left to adorn for years the villa of the man of prey, "till he can obtain a purchaser." In short, he is reluctantly compelled to appropriate to his own use, the property of the simple fool to whom every fortnight he despatches lectures and expostulations to economy, at Naples or Brussels; and once a-year, a handsome folio volume in sheets, back-stitched with green ribbon, and neatly tied up with red tape, containing a MS. account of their mutual obligations;—the balance-sheet of which exhibits so formidable a show of arithmetic, that the horror-struck spendthrift locks it up in his desk from the participation of his family; determined to examine it at some more convenient season, and begging, in his next letter to his man of prey—(in this case the true synonym of man of business)—"that it may stand over;" and stand over it does, till, at the end of half-a-dozen years of privation and remorse, the starveling wretch, whose fine estate is at nurse, finds the half-a-dozen volumes as impossible of perusal as though they were Parliamentary Reports.

This is no imaginary sketch. Such men live, and move, and have their being, with their betters so much in their power, as to have acquired a sort of station and respectability among the infamies that be. The flagrant pitch to which the vice of usury was attaining in the English capital, has fortunately wrought its own cure; and within the last year, so prodigious has been the crash of ruin, that, as in the case of the earthquake at Pointe-à-Petre, where, unable to concede separate burial to the dead, quicklime was flung over hundreds of bodies at a time, in order to remove them out of sight before a general pestilence was engendered,—a sort of jail-delivery process has been resorted to, towards the spendthrifts of the land.

The moral effect of this has been considerable. The light of the lantern turned by a gaoler into a dungeon, serves only to revolt the spectator, by exhibiting a black and noisome hole, infested by vermin, and a wretched prisoner mouldering away in the gloom. But the disgust created in the visiter finds wholesome vent. Prison discipline becomes improved; and the successors of that wretched captive profit by the miseries and the exposure he has sustained.

So, though nothing will restore to the venerable castles stripped in our own day of the shade of their ancestral oaks, (the price of which, filtered through the hands of the bill-brokers and other men of prey, has been melted at Crockford's or Newmarket,)—though nothing will serve to reunite the princely galleries dispersed—to remould the massive plate melted down, or efface from the annals of a noble family the stigma of expatriation, absenteeism, bankruptcy, and the sufferings of the poor created by the loss of their natural protectors, a better order of things must arise from the catastrophe. Such misdoings strike a death-blow at all that remains to England of her feudal institutions. Such acts, and such subversions of authority and influence, beget the necessity of a new balance of social power.

Let the Conservatives look to it!—The cause of liberalism derives more benefit from one such aristocratic crash, than from a thousand Chartist meetings. The bankruptcy of the Prince de Guéménée gave the first blow to the nobility of France,—the final one being effected by the axe of the Revolution. The bankruptcy of the Prince de Guéménée, of the noble house of Rohan, was like the sudden withdrawal of one of the props of the throne. The thoughtless Parisians talked of it as a nine-days' wonder. Yet at the end of nine times nine years, the vibration produced in the ancient structure of the monarchy by that breach of aristocratic faith, will not have subsided! Again we say, let the Conservatives look to it, and coalesce with us in measures for the annihilation of the fatal race of MEN OF PREY.

THE LAND WE LIVE IN.

A POLITICAL FABLE.

"THE land we live in,"—is a maxim good:
But then, it should be rightly understood.
Its meaning this: Let each one have a part,
Who delves by labour, or who spins by art;
For, saith the words which working hands inspire,
"The labourer is worthy of his hire."

"The land we live in, those who like it not,
May quit the soil, and seek some easier lot:
Roam east, roam west, or south, seek any space,
But leave your birth-right, and your dwelling-place."
So speak the proud monopolising powers,
"Ye are not worthy, and the land is ours."

The maxim hath a moral; since I'm able,
I'll turn it to account by way of fable.

A merry linnet, merry as the spring,
With tuneful voice, upon a hovering wing,
A young mate sought; and having won his bride,
Built them a nest along the hedge-row side;
A pretty nest with slight fronds interlaced,—
By the green branchings of the hawthorn braced.
The mossy bank,—the leveret's russet hide,—
The swan's white neck,—the heifer's dun sleek side,—
All furnished garniture of nature's best,
And so the pretty linnets made their nest.
Proud to erect, proud also to maintain,
And thinking labour was the road to gain,
The gentle birds ne'er felt a wish to roam,
And called their little nest, their island home.
Blest in their love, content and happy they,
Nor sought for other scenes, more bright and gay:
Happy chirped he, and sang from every tree,
And she as happy as a mate could be.
—Days passed along, and procreant love array'd
Five little eggs within the home they made;
When nature whisper'd, incubation rife
Shall bring the senseless globes to light and life.
Sweet Jenny Linnet reared her little crest,
"'Tis nature's work,—and nature's works are blest."

A rustling sound of pinions wild and strong,
Is heard the branches of the thorn among;
A voice as harsh as Discord's voice may be,
The cuckoo note of proud Monopoly.

Watching the hour, unheeded, by the side
Of native worth its noxious germs abide.
Her wings disclosed, the simple linnet waits
The weary hours, nor patient watch abates;
Till time displays, beneath her ardent view,
Her five loved offspring now increased by two.
On all she equal tends, at morn, at eve,
At sunny noon, nor knew she how to grieve;
While on a neighbouring branch her jolly mate,
Trill'd forth his song of tender love elate.

Such joy was theirs—Joy, soon alas! to close,
For lo! the cuckoos proved right arrant foes.
Their ugly offspring, stoutest on the wing,
Swell'd round in belly—gave the shoulder spring,
'Till gaining strength they stinted not their rest,
Until they flung the linnets from the nest.
The parents, home returning with the food,
For which they'd rang'd the fields and leafy wood,
In dire dismay beheld their offspring laid
On the bleak sod, chill'd, bare, and almost dead.
With thrilling voice unto the cuckoo bird,
The linnets in remonstrance then were heard.
Of kindness shown, and tenderness displayed,
They spake, but neither threats nor vaunting made.
Then from the Cuckoo's wide imperious throat,
Was heard the impudent defying note:
"The land we live in, those who like it not,
May quit the soil and seek some happier lot."
Forth to the woods the sorrowing linnets go,
And to their neighbours tell the tale of woe:
With flowing, sympathetic tears, they heard
The sad recital of the injured bird;
Then wing'd their way, to remedy the wrong,
With stronger power than that held by the strong;
And hurl'd the hideous cuckoos headlong down,
And placed the linnets in the home,—their own.

MORAL.

Ye proud and powerful, selfish, rich, and vain,
My fable hath a moral close and plain.
Read as ye list,—Oppression, for a while,
May triumph in a nest, as in an isle.
Still the good day must come,—and right ascend
The throne,—as wrong and villany descend. K.

"THE LITTLE RED ROSE."

(FROM GOETHE.)

A BOY caught sight of a rose in a bower—
A little rose slyly hiding
Among the boughs; O! the rose was bright
And young, and it glimmer'd like morning light.
The urchin sought it with haste; 'twas a flower
A child indeed might take pride in—
A little rose, little rose, little red rose,
Among the bushes hiding.

The wild boy shouted—"I'll pluck thee, rose,
Little rose vainly hiding
Among the boughs;" but the little rose spoke
"I'll prick thee, and that will prove no joke:
Unhurt, O then will I mock thy woes,
Whilst thou thy folly art chiding."
Little rose, little rose, little red rose,
Among the bushes hiding!

But the rude boy laid his hands on the flower,
The little rose vainly hiding
Among the boughs; O, the rose was caught,
But it turned again, and pricked and fought,
And left with its spoiler a smart from that hour,
A pain for ever abiding;
Little rose, little rose, little red rose,
Among the bushes hiding! J. B.

THE DEATH IN THE QUICKSAND, AND THE MOURNER OF THE ESTUARY.

A ROMANCE OF LOCAL WELSH HISTORY.

BY JOSEPH DOWNES, AUTHOR OF "THE MOUNTAIN DECAMERON."

CHAPTER I.

That ghosts are not gregarious seems an established fact in (spectral) Natural History. Gatherings, and mobs of ghosts, are not mentioned by any historian more modern than Ossian. Ghost-seers also seem to have been solitary in their habits, hardly an instance of an apparition appearing to more than one person at a time being on record, if we except that once-famous reappearance of the dead, to be narrated here, which produced a "sensation" (for a certain time) in all North Wales. About the middle of the last century, there was to be read, in the few small booksellers' shops then found in Wales, a pamphlet of a few leaves, so heavy of type, and of paper so dingy, as to resemble an old black letter one, professing to be—"The Straunge And Wonderful True Relation of the Apparition Now Appearing to Divers Persons Crossing the Traeth Mawr, Merionethshire, and residing in the Hamlet of Maentwrog thereto adjacent; being the true Ghostly effigies of the unfortunate Gentleman, Sir Rowland Gervase, who was lost in crossing those Quicksands five years ago—Giving a full and true account of his Life and Misfortunes, which, as some report, did drive him to end it, and them therein, by Felo De Se. Which wondrous and awful visitation is vouched by many Persons of Honour, also his disconsolate Widow," &c., &c.

An old man was living fifteen years since in Harlech, who remembered reading this book, and was, of course, cognizant of the remarkable story it pretended to record. The gentleman alluded to had been distinguished, for a short time after his accession to a fine estate, as a sort of rural Timon, winning the tongue-worship, at least, of the whole country squirearchy, till his profusion had exhausted his means, and left him a prey to distress; when, like the trencher friends of the noble Athenian prodigal, they all (except one, a Mr. Archibald Gwynne of Pencraig, his constant companion in both fortunes, but more constant in the adverse) left him with his misery; but not alone—for he had been blest with an exemplary wife and affectionate son. The river Glasslyn, swelled by the mountain streams of the region round Snowdon, expands into a beautiful estuary, dividing the counties of Merioneth and Caernarvon, and forming, with another river's debouchure, extensive sands, known by the names of "Traeth Mawr" and "Traeth Bach," (greater and lesser sands,) dangerous to cross from the frequent shifting of the quicksands, (a danger once experienced by the writer of this, in company with his two sons, then children,) and still frequently fatal to travellers crossing without a guide. It was on the shore of this fine channel, overhung with woods, that the fine taste of Sir Rowland had chosen the site of a marine villa, which the people named Plas Newydd. After his death, (which was witnessed by his friend Gwynne,) this mansion stood ruinous, but still tenanted by his widow; and it was on the opposite shore, when divided by high-water, that the figure so exactly resembling the deceased was first seen, standing, as if gazing sadly across the summer blue of the waters on his earthly home. Again, the same form appeared at dusk on the wood's edge, gazing on his son, who was salmon-fishing out in the rocky bed of the stream. The common people were confirmed by this, in the suspicion of his death having been a suicidal one, his troubles having been as notorious as his lamented death. The condition of his still beautiful widow afforded a topic of piteous interest, hardly less awful than that of her husband's repeated ghostly visits. She herself, indeed, might almost have been said to rather haunt than inhabit that now decayed (once tasteful) villa on the very edge of the river widening into the sea, where her brief wedded life had been passed with him in "much of joy, but more of woe." Its site was very beautiful. Behind towered, peak above peak, all the mountains that cluster round Y Wydfa, the giant head of Snowdon, with all their woods; before, at low-water, a marbled breadth of fine sands, shelly and sparkling, stretched away to the broad sea, heard murmuring on one hand, to a grand range of mountain, topped with a darksome ruin (Harlech Castle) on the other. Happy Welsh cottage girls, barefoot, singing and knitting as they went, strolled over this fine yellow floor of natural Mosaic, formed by many-coloured shells, and little pools mirroring the blue sky of noon, or its rainbow clouds in a glorious sunset; while (picturesque in their red and blue clothing) other cottagers waded those tiny lakes for shell-fish, shouting their joy to each other whenever some fine prey was secured. The vast amphitheatre of wooded mountains supplied such shady covert for the feathered tribes, that one continuous harmony floated thence on the noonday silence—over the sands, with silvery polypuses shining there—over the little island (Inys Gyftan,) blue and red, and green, with wild thyme and ivied rock, and their pink vegetable tapestry—over the mid-river and the sea; that harmony hardly broken by the fitful shriek of the gull, and other birds of the sea, with their plaintive additions to the chorus.

But those fine sands were her husband's grave; and their gay aspects in sun and summer became shocking to the eye of the mourner. It was only while overhung by a black evening, and ready to be palled in a double darkness of night and storm, that this unfortunate lady endured to look across them, with her head on her white, wasted arm, from the ruinous window-place; or through the half-fallen iron barricade, which, with its rusty red bars, still leaned from the moss-grown stone balustrade enclosing the garden, now in ruin, which her own hand had planted to enjoy with him. Indeed, that lofty railing, discordant to the scene and the taste of both, had a sad recollection attached to it, and, therefore, was now no eye-sore to the broken-hearted lady. It was reared by the late baronet, to form a sort of barbacan against those to him worse than lawless—those lawful foes, ycleped "duns" or creditors, who there (detained by pulling at a large bell) afforded him time to become a fugitive, and use his own house as a hiding-place; while his ever-willing mate, (albeit all honour and all delicacy,) forcing him into some remote corner, always volunteered the sad office of evasion, and entreaty, and humble promise, to vulgar persecutors;

> Stood the fierce frown of supercilious brows,
> Deaf to their brutal threats.*

All this was over now. Too happy had poor Amelia now esteemed herself to have still fulfilled this loathsome part, had he been spared, for whose sake she welcomed—she usurped it!

Suffering no repairs to the mansion, nor any companion but one female servant, she was to be seen, in such evenings, pacing the green-grown garden walks, when the leaves were falling and yellowing all the surface of the river, at high-tide, or at low-water, rushing with a wild whistling noise, in red masses, across the undried expanse of sands; sometimes borne down in whirlwind from all the woods of Snowdonia, and often driven back, as in rout, by sudden opposing blasts from the sea, changing the peace into a tumult; joined to the screams of sea-birds, now congenial to one who now saw there but the grave where more than her heart's hopes—her heart's better half, lay buried. Insanity was suspected—whispered;—for she was known to take her perilous walk far out into the very mid-channel, over those sands, when the tide was running in; and great excitement often prevailed among the more than pitying—the fond inhabitants of the shores, when her lone figure had been espied half a mile out, alone in the shining wet waste, while the white leaping of the returning sea, and its hollow roaring, every minute grew greater on the eye and ear.

In the eternal blackness of all life before her, and of her mind within, she neglected the outer signs of mourning, deemed important by less desperate mourners. She did not wear black; but her face wore a ghastliness of hue, from loathing of daily food, sleeplessness, and sickness joined, far more akin to death and the grave, than any black habiliments. The whiteness of the shroud was added to her natural alabaster fairness of complexion, and the solemnity of what fancy deems the gliding movement of a ghost, to the native grace of her step. But it is time to briefly revert to an earlier period of her existence.

The connexion of this luckless pair had begun, as it closed, in romance and tragedy, connected with those sands. Lord Littleton has said of them, only "their appearance (in gloom and evening) was horrible." He has not noticed the beauty they impart to the noble marine and land landscape combined, in summer, (which I have attempted to paint;) but his epithet well applies to their appearance in shady hours; and had he been a loitering pedestrian, instead of an equipaged "lord," possibly he might have heightened his description, by actually catching a glimpse of this poor lady's figure out on those wild sands, and have given the world some particulars of a story, adapted, in my opinion, to purposes of the highest dramatic ambition. A terrible shipwreck on the sands of the "Traeth Bach," (smaller sands,) an adjacent river estuary, threw on that coast a most beautiful Irish girl of respectable parents, making her an orphan in the same moment, both perishing on the occasion; and their child being hardly rescued, with some property, from the barbarous hands of wreckers, by the gallantry of the youthful Welsh squire, afterwards her husband, and subsequently inheriting a baronetcy. One son was born to the juvenile couple, whose stolen nuptials had been so much before the usual period, that now (that is, at the period of her widowhood just described,) this son had reached his eighteenth year, while his beautiful mother was but in her thirty-fourth. Her husband's accession to title was marked with brief festive feelings, being the signal for the rush of ruin that followed his fatal imprudences. He had mortgaged all his available means so deeply, that a life-annuity, which his fondness had secured for his young wife in the event of his dying before her, was the only resource that remained for her against want when his tragical death occurred. Hence, much of their wedded life had been spent in the retributive pains of improvidence, humiliation, and terror, when, one autumnal evening, Sir Rowland ordered out his horse to cross the Traeths, in company with a friend.

He had been recently infuriated by an insolent creditor, who had caused his gentle lady to burst into tears by his brutal language; and, terribly agitated, while still pale with fury, after venting imprecations on his own head for his past folly, addressed her as follows; tears that followed this outbreak, like showers after thunder, terrifying, as much as they affected, his devoted wife, who well knew, that proud and fiery natures such as his, do not relieve themselves by that feminine mode of relief, but after the most terrific inward convulsions. Into no other bosom could he indeed have poured those (to him) unnatural drops forced out by the triple agony of fury, remorse, and despair:—

"Oh, Amelia, my dear Amelia, you shall bear this no more! Why would you go to the gate—why force me to skulk, like a poltroon, while I put you forth to be insulted? For God's sake, warn our Marmaduke, by his father's fate, against his father's folly! Tell him there is a hell on earth; it is—Debt! and a tormenting, degrading, pitiless devil of that hell—a creditor! Tell him—"

"My life and soul!" she replied, "you frighten me! Why do you bid me tell him? why do you talk like one dying, one leaving him and me? Let me hold your head! lay it on my bosom! Have you not often said nothing could reach you there? Oh, come, come, come!"

"Not even here, is refuge from these vulgar, these mean Furies that hunt me in this paradise," he rejoined, throwing himself into her embrace. "Who can bear this, and feel that it is deserved, self-inflicted? Tell him that I began with a dread of being thought poor-spirited and mean, so threw about wealth as worthless: and see me now! hunted into dark holes of my own house, God help me, for fear of the vile mechanic face of the meanest of mankind! Tell him how I scorned the miser, the money-hoarder, and, not to be thought like him, I cast it away on what others enjoyed but I did not, merely to show my spirit; and now there's not a starved miser breathing, that doats on gold as I do! Gold? gold! gold that would buy off these blood-hounds—that wolf-dog, who drew tears from these poor eyes," (and there he kissed passionately, as in madness, her wet eyes;) gold, that would restore peace to this sweet hermitage, sleep to my pillow, hope to my heart, some prospect to life—our life! waste gold? Oh, fool! madman! The sordid miser's madness is god-like wisdom to that! He has his pleasure over his heaps, I eat my own heart in wretched longing for gold, redeeming gold, and get only torment, remorseful torment for my love! I was a man of honour, tell him; I fancied myself such: but oh! who knows what horrid dreams of burglary, villany, foul, foulest felony, will force themselves on the purest mind, when a man has thrown from him that inestimable jewel, Independence, and he dreams of recovering it? What sea of horror, ay of blood, will he not be half ready to plunge into, in mad moments, to bring it up from its depths? Tell him, I once feared not the face of man, sword in hand or crown on his head. I felt neither fear nor awe: I was proud of this high spirit; but, despising Prudence, now, every day some mean wretch, with his vulgar face, stares in mine, and I dare not meet his surly eye, but deject mine like a chastised schoolboy. I could not endure injustice done to others, I fiercely resented the slightest offered to myself,—and now every day some such dirty tyrant and tormentor comes tearing at that bell, and insists on my doing an impossibility—paying, without the means of payment! I am lost, Amelia, lost, ruined and deserve to be; but you are not, my dearest, God be thanked! nor our boy: he will inherit those entailed estates, now unavailable to me, and you will be amply provided for by the several life-insurances I have effected on your behalf. My folly has cursed you in life, but my death will—I mean would—bless you with that competence, that affluence I must never know again!"

These were the last words heard by the weeping lady from the quivering white lips of the penitent prodigal. That same day, the friend who accompanied him returned with the dismal tidings of his death in the estuary quicksands. Passionate and desperate as they were, they involved truths not profitless for the warning of youth; showing how, what a youth often deems the soaring of a daring and generous spirit, is, in truth, the first stooping to abject slavery, and the buffets of the basest of mankind,—the contempt of money, but the first step toward the most sordid ravening, perpetual (yet hopeless) gloating on it, beyond the most insane longing of the meanest miser! And these sad, wild words remained engraven on the very heart of the widow like characters on a tomb, while their purport darkly hinted that the event of that (all-ending) day was not accidental.

Marmaduke, the son, failed not to profit by this terrible lesson. He grew up a wise, prudent, affectionate, though somewhat melancholic character, comforting his mother as far as filial fondness could avail against a "rooted sorrow." He constantly refused to assume the title of baronet, in (perhaps) morbid tenderness toward his parent's weakness, who could not hear, unaffected, that title borne by another, which of itself proclaimed the death of its former possessor.

When, after the lapse of four years, the rumour rose of her lost husband's very image having been espied gliding in the shade of the wood's edge, or solemnly standing by the river, looking, for hours, across the water, at the ruinous house, the living tomb of that mourning lady, she at first rebuked the credulity of the peasantry; but when the wonderful form of mystery was shown to her, seemingly leaning against a rock exactly facing Plas Newydd, (as the house was called,) but divided by the river Glasslyn, there from half a mile to a mile broad, she cried out for a telescope, and directing it, as well as her shaking hand allowed, to the dear delusion, as soon as it bore on the well-known features, fell down in a long and death-like fainting fit. But when repetition of this phenomenon had dulled the acuteness of her feelings, she seemed to derive strange comfort from the visitation. It was even whispered, that confirmed monomania had followed, and that she would frequent the loneliest recesses by moonlight, in the hope of attracting the spirit's awful society. There is a small island (already noticed) midway between the shores, then used only for pasturing a few goats and sheep, with a ruinous shieling upon it, or "hafodty" (summer-house,) as the Welsh call it, for sheltering the shepherd for a night, or during storm—a romantic little islet, like a Wales in epitome, ivied rock, greensward, precipice, and flowery hollow forming its few acres of sea-beat land. There the wretched lady had been known to seclude herself a night long, by crossing the sands to it and remaining till the sea cut her off, through the dark hours, from all sentient beings, except such as ghostly fancy may believe to have shared her solemn solitude; beings to which seas present no barrier, quicksand gulfs—even the grave itself, no prison-house.

CHAPTER II.

Truly has the great Roman Epic poet said,—"Varium et mutabile semper fœmina!" Behold a wonder! She whose self-immolated beauty seemed to forbid the very thought of passion in the boldest gazer—inaccessable as some glorious mountain flower, left high beyond the reach of human hands, by the sudden fall of the foundation-earth in which it grew from a seed, there to bloom out its last of life, gazed up to by men from below, and smiled on by heaven from above, but never touched or breathed on more—she, the "Mourner of the Estuary," became the object of vulgar sensual scandal—and, sad to tell! not the innocent object! In plain truth, passion, mighty passion, by which Troy was laid in ashes, and Rome rose from a robber colony into the city of universal empire, through the mediation of Sabine beauty,—this voiceless conqueror, it was too apparent, had found a time to penetrate the citadel of eternal mourning, and produced its usual effects.

The faithful Gwenlian, her servant once, companion now, even she was excluded all confidence in this astonishing and revolting secret; yet it became at last, no secret, even to her, that this once immaculate beauty had forgotten her dead lord, and was in that condition wherein the poet says "ladies wish to be who" have "lords" to "love." Some change, some great though secreted change, in her state of mind, had indeed betrayed itself to this watchful attendant. She improved in beauty; the wanness of mental repining gave place to a faint flush like that of sunset upon snow, and something of voluptuous exhilaration peeped at times from within the depth of her still hollow eyes. The country gossip of her poor forgotten husband's reappearance, when "beneath the pale moon his ghost would glide over the green," was no longer listened to with tears, but discouraged, as if it involved a tacit reproach. The rustics of the Traeth and its pastoral borders never heard of the Ephesian matron, the fort of whose heart was fairly carried by a common soldier even within the death-vault of her "dear" husband; but banters as keen, if less classical, were all afloat, against this "modern instance," as those which have perpetuated the shame of the mourning wanton of Ephesus. She confessed nothing—she was evidently in confusion of mind, overwhelmed with shame; she still exhibited even despair, but of a commonplace kind, easily distinguishable from that solemn sadder unearthly resignation, which had so long benighted her beauty, like the gorgeous pall of the Muse of Tragedy herself.

There was but one person on whom the suspicion of the country fell: there was but one male person besides her son who had approached her in her solitude in the character of comforter and adviser. This was Archibald Gwynne, Esquire, a retired military man residing near, married, and a father, and of spotless character, ostensibly at least, till then; the friend of Sir Rowland, already mentioned as witnessing his death on the sands, from which he himself, he said, narrowly escaped in trying to save him. This gentleman was also one of the trustees to the entailed estates during the son's minority, and acted for the widow in receiving her large annuities accruing on her husband's death. It appeared but too clearly, that his frequent access to the mourner in the character of comforter, had insensibly won on so tender and so forlorn a heart, to admit him in a tenderer character at last. This issue of their friendship was the more lamentable, as involving the peace of a woman not less amiable than she herself had once been, and been universally considered. Matilda, the wife of this too attractive friend, (for although older than his lost school-fellow and companion, Sir Rowland, he was still a remarkably fine man, of bland manners, and kindly feelings,) was inconsolable under his infidelity. The country people felt for her, as she was espied wandering in self-neglect with eyes red with weeping, in the loneliest places; and a sudden revolution transferred all their pity from the mourner of the Traeth Mawr to this more innocent mourner, attaching to the former all the odium so just towards one, who, under the mask of grief, still preserved, had inflicted on her that mourning, seduced her husband's heart and society from her, and acted the wanton under the garb of almost sainted sorrow and eternal faith to the dead.

The lady Amelia, I have said, had been known more than once to cross the sands at nightfall, and pass the night on the island, with only the little "hafodty," beneath one of the rocks, shut in by the tide. Rumour now gave a very different motive for that melancholy wildness of act,—that forsaking of human homes at midnight,—from ghostly assignation.

The maid Gwenlian had detected her mistress in the act of anxiously adorning her person, (that person so long neglected!) just prior to these ostensibly despairing excursions. She watched, and at last surprised the suspected gentleman in the act of stealing along the edge of the isle, among the deep sand-banks surrounding it, by moonlight. She knew him by his military cloak, (one worn by Mr. Gwynne,) though muffled; and though the tide, fast running in, compelled her to hasten back, otherwise she must have spent many hours on the island, her conviction was equally strong, as if she had accosted him.

The unfortunate frail one now endured trials, the hardest to be borne by women yet retaining womanly delicacy,—the silent scorn of her own sex, the vulgar merriment of the other, the indignation of all who loathed hypocrisy, and pitied conjugal love suffering, and domestic happiness broken for ever. But there was one to whose eye she could not bear to raise hers,—one whose presence, long her only comfort, was become her heaviest trial to bear,—those of her high-minded, gentle-hearted, but now indignant son. His dumb wrath had long been smothering: he threatened the seducer of his mother, with his eyes, every time he met him—declining all conference with him, though earnestly sought. Loving his deceased parent tenderly, he seemed to extend to his apparition, or rather his unresting soul, so wonderfully figured to his senses, all the love he had borne to him living—resenting his mother's incontinence, like infidelity to him alive. Insulted with vulgar lectures on chastity by her own menial, disdainfully passed in silence by the poor lady whose peace she had broken, and home embittered,—meditating flight for concealment of an event manifestly not distant, and, worst of all, expecting every hour the burst of her pure-minded son's natural pain and wrath, (long deferred by the delicacy of his situation, and revolting nature of the task,)—reviled, insulted, shunned, and trembling before her own child, this unhappy lady seemed now, when pitied no longer, most pitiable, and, under the pangs of her secret compunction, more truly, perhaps, than ever a mourner.

One day she ventured to hint to him a design of quitting, for a time, that melancholy home to which she had continued as constant as the dead to their eternal home, so long. Then the fury of the youth found vent, and dejecting his eye, while his cheek reddened like a girl's, whose modesty receives a shock, he vociferated, "Mother! mother! I am not so young as to be fooled in this manner. Though too young for such a part as this, which I could wish rather that poor lady you have wronged to have undertaken—"

"Son! Marmaduke! wronged? This is cruel,—a cruel trial!" she said.

"And crueller to others than to you," he retorted. "Cruel to poor Mrs. Gwynne!—cruel to me! I am quite an orphan now. I have no mother—I acknowledge not a—"

"Silence, Sir, I charge you! How dare you—oh! dear boy, how can you?——yet go on. What can I do?" and the poor penitent wrung her hands, her cheek flushed with all the crimson that virgin bashfulness ever painted there, and trembling in every limb before her son—her boy son! Such are the pains and penalties of frailty!

"Oh, mother! that I was once so proud to call so,—and now ashamed to hear called my mother,—how have you forgot yourself,—your sex, your fair name, everything,—for the sake of that hoary villain? I will speak with my father's tongue, and ask you why you have shamed his name in this manner? Have I been almost a stranger to you in your despair—it was so abstracted, so unnatural—for this? The comfort I could not give your society, which I sought in vain, a stranger could give, a stranger could enjoy, it seems, even while the spirit of my dear father—for what else can be that melancholy, wondrous picture of him?—hovering round our homes, seems conscious of some disastrous reverse to those still so dear, as to be watched by him, even from the world of the dead! And, oh! the filth of such hypocrisy, joined with such wantonness! Shame on you, mother! shame! Shocking as that sounds from my lips, I must cry shame on such conduct! Will you promise never more to meet, or speak to the author of that shame, if I refrain from that revenge I swear to take, if you will not? Will you swear?"

"Revenge!" she screamed, and saved herself from fainting, only by snatching at a supporting tree stump. "Marmaduke! my curse upon your head,—a mother's curse, who has loved you dearly,—if you ever mention, ever dare to think that crime again! I have known misery enough,—brought misery on others; would you make me the cause of more, and to——Oh! what has he not been to me?—my more than friend, guardian—"

"Oh, much more, dear mother!" returned the son, sarcastically, gnashing his teeth and smiling at once. "Who can tell what he has been to you? That pretty island does not invite ghosts only by moonlight. But, mark me, madam! I have learned to use a sword,—can strike, and can ward,—and, by the All-seeing God! if ever that island hold me and Archibald Gwynne at once, only one of us shall ever quit it alive! And assure yourself that he shall not easily reach it again, without having me at his heels like a dumb bloodhound!"

"I promise, then! I swear! Oh, anything, if you will promise to forego these deadly thoughts against your father's best, dear friend, and yours, Marmaduke, whatever you may feel,—to you a second father—"

"Ha! ha! ha! Why, mother, he should be my second father; but I see no other ring but that my first father put on that finger, and which you have so often kissed, so often wept upon, that you refused to have filed off when it pained you; that—"

"And so still kiss it," said the lady solemnly; "and still swear to keep, till this poor hand drops away from it in dust!"

"Madam!"—he interrupted her fiercely,—"these tragedy heroics melted people while you drooped here, in this ruined garden, a very nun to your widow-grief, making a sort of cloister of this wild orchard, and a cell of your chamber; but now ——However, you promise by the ghost of my father, and all that's sacred, never to meet again, wilfully, the man who has wrought you this shame?"

"I promise never to meet Mr. Gwynne clandestinely—I swear it! And now, my poor boy, let me kiss you! Kiss your mother, if your heart does not recoil: if so, pity me—withhold the kiss, but pity me; and know I love you ten times more than before you—used me thus!"

Marmaduke burst into a flood of tears, copious as a woman's, when suddenly the orchard-gate flew open, and a faded, but beautiful woman rushed in, disgust and anger equally depicted on her care-worn countenance.

"Young man," Mrs. Gwynne faltered, breathlessly, "I am not asking you to revenge my wrongs on that bad woman, but only not to be lulled into a dream of her still deserving those tears. My servants are ready to swear that they watched my husband, more than once, to places of retreat, where he awaited the coming of a female, closely muffled, whom your mother's servant will swear to have been no other than your mother there standing, and looking all injured innocence now!—so mournful, so reproachful, so perplexed how to clear herself from those cruel mistakes of us all!"

"Oh, Mrs. Gwynne—" the confounded mother began. But the wronged wife turned from her with ineffable scorn, and repassed the gate, not deigning to listen to her.

CHAPTER III.

In the terrible, but revolting tragedy of "The Mysterious Mother," its author represents his heroine as driven to violation of her conjugal vows, by mere force of grief for the death of a husband. Perhaps, if we except the horrible feature of the plot, the incestuous, which surely outrages nature as violently as it transgresses all legitimate sources of tragedy, the theory there involved is true to poor human nature,—that the utter prostration of mind produced by love, melancholy, and despair, may drive the sufferer to apparent violation of love-faith, as relief from that despair; the very violence of a passion thus becoming the ground of its own cure. However this may be, the passionate expressions into which her son's threatenings surprised the mourner's tender nature, seemed to prove that a new passion had sprung through the very ashes of the first, and made even a broken heart its own, at the price of fame and virtue. Marmaduke, or Sir Marmaduke, for he now assumed the title, cherished almost the fearful melancholy and brooding vengeance of a Hamlet toward the erring pair. This feeling was roused to its height, by his ascertaining, through the female spies at each house, that Mr. Gwynne had again been detected in frequenting the old places of assignation, (though more perfectly muffled, and evading long observation,) and—alas! for female vows and constancy of purpose!—that his mother's absences from home had corresponded with those periods. Meeting the hated object in a solitary place, he for the first time broke the silence of smothered fury, and charged him with his parent's dishonour. His address was everything, short of assault, which could enrage and overcome all patience; but when he had ended, from exhaustion of breath, and the powers of vituperative language, such was the practised placidity of look, and command of temper in his well-bred opponent, who regarded him with almost parental softness, (which his fury interpreted into contempt,) that a degree of compunction stole over his mood, for using such language towards his father's once dearest friend—his own guardian—and he hardly yet arrived at manhood. But the gentle bearing of the soldier and gentleman, did not long disarm a youth burning with a sense of his mother's shame, and he resumed—

"Are you aware, Sir, that in continuing this intercourse, you are polluting my lost parent, body and soul? You have made her infamous in this world already: at least have mercy on her in that to come! Why, Sir, the wretched woman has sworn to me to abstain from these libidinous orgies, these prowlings about the moonlight sand-hills. A vow was on her soul, and she has broken it: you have tempted her to break it! You know you have, not long since, under cloud of night, stolen out from your own house, your weeping lady, to—"

"Meet me about sunset, to-morrow evening, on the green sward at the bottom of my preserve—"

"By Heavens, I will! and give you choice of weapons; and may my mother's, my father's wrong, hang heavy on your heart, and on your arm!" the fiery youth exclaimed, stopping his further speech.

The imperturbable veteran resumed his wily smile, by which he seemed to rebuke the young man's violence, and explained, that to talk, not fight, was the purpose of his appointment.

"You mean then, that you refuse, you disdain to fight me?"

Mr. Gwynne had been somewhat of a duellist in his time, and of undoubted bravery. "Not disdain," he rejoined mildly; "refuse I certainly do. With that eye, and that brow of poor Rowland, bringing him before me in our college days, so vividly again, you must offend me grievously, indeed, before I could—"

"Mighty soft spoken, Sir! very forbearing! But understand this, that my mother's shame shall not go unavenged, because you are—a coward!"

"Ha! recall that, young man, or——"

"Coward! coward! coward!" reiterated the frantic youth; but the blood of the soldier, which had leaped for a moment to his cheek, and almost hurried his hand to his sword-hilt, had subsided again before this fierce defiance was uttered. The parting words of the youth, (who desired nothing so much as to try the chance of battle in this quarrel,) were —"Understand, Sir, that your steps are watched, —beware how you set foot on yonder island for a foul purpose. I will not meet you for any purpose but one—life against life; and since you refuse me that redress, by the God who hears me, if I come upon you, prowling after my poor insane mother, I will take it through your heart's blood without a minute's mercy to save your soul alive! So beware, beware, beware! I forbid you that island! I forbid you my mother's company and speech!" Mr. Gwynne again smiled him into tenfold fury, under which he left him.

Evil reports, involved in mystery, through which the truth cannot struggle into light, assume more terrible forms, and a darker hue, as they spread, as objects viewed through evening fogs, enlarge as night deepens round them, and at last assume the blackness of that night itself. The mingling mysteries of the haunted sands, the mourning widow, and (last not least) of the unlooked-for criminal passion, took now the shape of imputed murder, which did not spare even the widow, whose long despair might have arisen from remorse, and who might have favoured a paramour without connivance at his treacherous murder of her husband, whose death, it was now remembered, occurred in the solitude of the evening waste of the sands, shadowed by extensive woods, with no eye but God's all-seeing one, conscious of what happened between the two travellers, of whom one returned no more.

Probably young Gervase did not at this time really credit this foul report, but it served to give a solemner character to his now unvarying mood of profound melancholy and wrath combined. It was hardly to be expected that a guilty passion, in a man of mature years and worldly fertility of resources in exigency, would bear sudden baffling from the threatenings of a boy. Accordingly, but a short time elapsed before Sir Marmaduke gained certain information that the cloaked person of his enemy had been traced to Inys Gyftan, not long before the flowing of the tide; that his infatuated mother was also "at her toilet," (employment of a mind at ease so long suspended!) preliminary, no doubt, to the guilty assignation; involving little less than perjury—breach of a promise, given with the solemnity of an oath!

In an hour, the fine form of the infuriated young man was seen, mounted on a black horse, spotted over with white particles of foam, to spur the noble animal on to the edge of the sea-water, rushing up the estuary channel. A poor woman, at a river-side hovel, where had once been kept a ferry-boat, called to him to warn him that the tide had been some time running in, and was too deep for him to reach the island, for she had seen him rush by her door with the speed of huntsmen in full chase. He but waved his hand behind him, to signify that he saw her, and disregarded the warning. Plunging into the flood, he succeeded, by partly swimming his horse, in fording the current, which formed a sort of separate river in the estuary's wide channel, on the Merionethshire side; and setting his horse loose to return, took his lonely way across the sands, yet uncovered, to the island, where, however, he had again to ford, middle deep, a second water, already shutting up the little isle. It was one of those squally, variable nights common in late autumn. The moon broke, by starts, out of masses of piled clouds, hanging half of heaven with mourning, whose black background threw out into beautiful relief the leaping and falling line of sparkling snow foam, which stretched across the broad river's mouth, seaward, formed by the advancing tide, and glimpsed, with almost startling effect, every time the moon, overtopping the lower, broke out of lighter clouds, driven rapidly by the wind, and as suddenly vanishing with the overcast moon, was only known by its roar in the darkness, like some enormous beast retired into his den after shaking his white mane before the moon. The last leaves fluttered, yellow and thin, on the few trees there; all bent before the sea blasts, while the drift leaves, left by the last high tide, caught up, played round in separate eddies, their small whirlwinds all uniting their shrill rustling sounds into one, mournful, and in unison with the many-toned cries of sea-birds, and of land ones seeking covert. The numberless mountain rivulets (hardly heard in summer, from the distance inland) had now commenced their winter moan of low thunder from the rains that herald the advent of winter. On the little islet, however, all was peaceful; and his foot-fall was inaudible, except by the fallen leaves it disturbed, a depth of sand forming their bed, over which he passed stealthily, every moment expecting the muffled form of him whose blood he sought to appear in the silver light, or glide, glooming, in rock shadow. His purpose was indeed terrible. No other than to leave that form weltering in blood, for the eye of her who, he doubted not, was already shrouding herself from the chill gales beneath the sod roof of the low-browed "hafodty," little dreaming of his being so near. The furious spirit within him ill brooked that peace all around him; it rebelled against stealthy steps in sand. Bearing two swords, he flourished one in fancied passes of anticipated fight; and, tired with listening for footsteps, was just lifting up his voice to challenge any unseen prowler there, when an object appeared, before which his weapon dropped from his trembling hand, and he half bent his knee instinctively. What had at first seemed his own shadow, faintly limned on the rude wall of rock, as the moon flashed on it for a moment, revealed the very features of his father, the very form! A minute more and it vanished, smiling at him, as he fancied. Had he appeared to confirm him in his deadly purpose? He thought so; when, a few moments after, on rounding the rock-buttress, there hung with ivy and faded foliage, he met him he sought, drawing his cloak round him, and anxiously averting his face, and seemingly hesitating whether to turn and fly, or fight.

"Stop!" he exclaimed, "stop! I come not as an assassin; but rather than you shall escape——" He seized the arm of his adversary, and sprung on him from behind. The cloak, that minute snatched from a bough where, it seemed, he had suspended it recently, fell off ere he could muffle his person again; but, by a sudden bounding-spring, he extricated himself, and closed on the ill-guarded youth, rendering his sword useless; and Marmaduke (powerless as a child in his hold) found himself in the clasp of a—father! his cheek, already wet with tears falling fast from eyes on which his own had that moment flashed all the deadliness of his purpose! It was indeed the living, loving father—Sir Rowland, enveloped in the military cloak of his old, and faithful, and noble friend, true to his trust, true to his widowed wife, truly a second father to that erring son, his beloved ward, and still beloved while seeking his blood under that cruel error!

Hardly a minute's space was afforded for speech in this affecting rencontre, before the bewildered youth found himself encircled by other arms, of softer touch, a cold but softer cheek, succeeding in contact with his own; his own loved, loving, and love-worthy mother, rushed from behind the rock's hanging wood of ivy, and he stood (though almost sinking with the agitating revolution of so many feelings) the happy, astonished son, in the embrace of both parents! he whom death and guilt seemed but the previous minute to have orphaned utterly!

But the idea of a spiritual presence had been too long associated with that appearance for even the senses to instantly dissever them, and poor Marmaduke stood like one petrified, his teeth chattering, and whole person shivering as with cold. "Alas! you are ill, my darling!" the lady said tenderly, "or are you angry still? Will you not speak to me? nor to your poor father, your restored long-lost father? Oh, speak! Support him, Rowland; he totters!"

"And it is my father, and of this world still!" the youth faltered, inwardly, as in soliloquy. "Yet speak you to it—to him, dear mother, for me—yes, dear mother—virtuous mother; for I begin to see dawn through this darkness and this dream."

Limited space requires that we leave to imagination the thousand hurried questions and tender outpourings between the three restored and reconciled persons in this affecting moment. Provided with means of kindling fire in the lone hovel, almost overhung by a rock, and its bulging roots shut in by the high tide, ere long Sir Rowland explained to his now transported son (who had shed tears of repentant pain into his mother's bosom for the excess of his anger against her) the origin of these strange incidents in some such terms as these:—

"You remember too well, dear boy, the miserable life I led through my past improvidence. God forgive me the sin! But I firmly resolved to end that life, that your dear mother here might know that competence I must never know more, by receiving the several annuities which I had bought for her, claimable on my decease. My shocking resolve I disclosed to that dear friend—my life's—my soul's saviour!—poor Gwynne, (betwixt whose house and this island I have been spending these last months.) When he could, by no means, not by reasoning either religious or worldly, nor by entreaties, nor by tears, prevail on me to live, he stooped to suggest a mode of obtaining my object (your mother's rescue from poverty) without my dying; and for the first time in his life, poor fellow, left the high path of honour, by conniving at, and assisting a plot; alas! what avails soft language—a fraud! Procuring, first of all, my solemn promise to live, almost by main force wresting from me the instrument of death I had provided, he became the voucher for my death, at the risk of his own ruin and ignominy, and with the certain martyrdom of his conscience and honour, the severest trial of all. But his views—our views—embraced a prospect of return to honesty, which, blessed be God! is now accomplished, or very nearly. By his bounty I became a merchant—was joined in a great mercantile adventure in the Spanish Main, suffered some hardships, despaired, during many dismal months, of ever seeing native land or familar face again; but of all this hereafter. Success, wonderful good fortune, crowned our enterprise at last. Large portion of the treasures of a Spanish galleon fell to my share. I returned to these dear haunts, but returned, alas! a criminal. You may well start, my poor child: yes, I am at this moment liable to prosecution as a felon, at least as a fraudulent deceiver. Time was required for my dear friend (to whose door I ventured, and found, as ever, open to me as his heart and hand) to reverse all that has been done, on the presumption of my decease, to appease the directors of the life-insurance offices; all which was necessary to my escape from criminal justice, as my apprehension would have followed instantly on my being recognised as the living Sir Rowland. A cruel predicament, my boy! I hovered about both shores of these estuaries, watching you and your dear mother here in your daily doings; embracing both, in fancy; a hundred times in peril of detection; bursting, in my ignorance of your state and all which had occurred during my absence, yet afraid to address a question to any one but that fond friend, or even enter human doors. I cannot describe what I felt while watching you; it was like a ghostly existence in truth. The dumbness, and separation, and blank bondage of the state of death seemed indeed upon me, till I could bear it no longer. It was on this little island I first disclosed myself to my poor Amelia, who was almost agitated into insanity by the disclosure, and here we kept our second honeymoon. But time, stealing away, has brought fresh circumstances, your dear mother great perplexity, and, worst of all, domestic troubles to poor Archibald, which, however, I shall be able quickly to allay. Owing to my borrowing a large cloak he is known to wear, (the better to disguise myself, we being very alike in stature,) it was no wonder that my night wanderings involved him in suspicion."

A subsequent interview and confidential explanation soon after, restored harmony to the home of Mr. Gwynne, his lady cordially embracing her imagined rival; and the requisite transactions were completed in time for Sir Rowland to throw off his ghostly disguise prior to that "interesting event," whose advent had so much embarrassed all, and openly receive as his own the little stranger who came to crown the renewal of that conjugal happiness which once seemed eternally lost.

ON A PICTURE OF A VERY YOUNG NUN,

NOT READING A DOCTRINAL BOOK OPEN BEFORE HER, AND NOT CONTEMPLATING A CRUCIFIX BEHIND HER.

BY HARTLEY COLERIDGE.

So young, too young, consign'd to cloistral shade,
Untimely wedded—wedded—yet a maid;
And hast thou left no thought, no wish behind,
No sweet employment for the wandering wind,
Who would be proud to waft a sigh from thee,
Sweeter than ought he steals in Araby!
Thou wert immured, poor Maiden, as I guess,
In the blank childhood of thy simpleness.
Too young to doubt, too pure to be ashamed,
Thou gavest to God what God had never claim'd;
And didst, unweeting, sign away thine all
Of earthly good—a guiltless Prodigal.

The large reversion of thy unborn love
Was sold to purchase an estate above.
Yet, by those hands upon thy bosom prest,
I think, indeed, thou art not quite at rest.
Yon Christ, that hangs upon the sculptured cross,
Is not the JESUS to redeem thy loss;
Nor will that book, whate'er its page contain,
Convince thee that the world is false and vain.
Even now, there is a something at thy heart
Would fain be off; but may not, dare not start.
Yes, yes, thy face, those eyes, thy close lips prove,
Thou wert created to be loved, and love.

TEXIANA.

RIDES, RAMBLES, AND SKETCHES IN TEXAS.

BY CHARLES HOOTON, ESQ.

Some few months after our location in the delightful habitation just described, an English vessel arrived in Galveston shallows, with emigrants of a tolerably respectable class, as the world goes; and amongst them was one married gentleman, without family, who died within two months (I think) after setting his foot upon Texan sand. A sprightly and gay widow, of about five-and-twenty, with the highly-prizeable qualification of a small property, (a qualification more invaluable, perhaps, in Texas than in any other known region of the earth,) was immediately subjected to a kind of matrimonial public competition. The town was thrown into a state of social hurly-burlyism: single gentlemen dressed up in their best, pranced and capered about upon unruly horses, all in the widow's neighbourhood; small, but ambitious and aspiring storekeepers, rubbed their hands till their eyes sparkled again; peeped into their tills, cleaned up their fronts, and respectfully invited the widow to a seat, a cake, and a glass of wine, whenever she honoured the public side of their counters with her presence. Nothing, in fact, could be heard all along that part of the coast of the Mexican gulf, but the name of Mrs. ——. It surpassed in intensity of interest, and (of course) in beauty of association, the most horrid murder that ever was committed: it superseded the news from Orleans, and slipped unconsciously out of the mouths of bachelors whenever they attempted to tell you either about their own health, or the present value of a Texan dollar.

As this lady's husband died while they were yet remaining at one of the hôtels of the town, she found it necessary immediately to take a private house; and, as chance would have it, she took one upon the prairie close by our own. A servant girl, about as big again as herself, constituted her only companion in this retreat; and, when she came to take possession of it, such an escort of anticipatory husbands attended as was truly marvellous to behold. In no long time, there were a wine-merchant, a sea-captain, a baker, a liquor-storekeeper, and a petty Galveston doctor, all together keeping a sharp look-out after the widow, and contending, in jealous emulation, for the honour of her hand. Nor was this all. Numbers of other bachelors, without an object but deficient in "pluck," talked and boasted of meditated conquests, as yet only in the egg state; while the aforesaid baker's woman, and the proprietor of a ten-pin alley, severally laid close siege to the servant. Now, the widow gave none of them the least kind of serious encouragement; but, being one of the most giddy, mischievous, wicked young witches that ever did undertake to tease and torment the heart of unfortunate man, exerted her utmost abilities (and they were not few) in turning the whole affair to funny account, and setting her host of mercenary lovers as much at loggerheads as possible. The baker, a steady, industrious, ignorant, and raw Irishman, tolerably "well-to-do" in the city, who was previously in the habit of bringing bread round our neighbourhood early in a morning, mounted on the seat-board of a cart, and dressed like any sloven, now shaved and spruced himself up, because he had to call at the widow's on his rounds. And, whereas he was always before in such a desperate hurry to get back to the town again, that he might justly have been regarded in the light of a flying baker, lo! now, he began to dismount at the widow's, and leave his horse to take an hour's nap standing at the gate, while that courteous and facetious lady allowed him to entertain himself at her breakfast table. Being, however, of not the most valorous disposition, he held his rival the sea-captain in great dread; and usually contrived to sit where he could have an eye upon the window, and discern him upon the prairie afar off, (in case he should be coming,) so that time might be allowed for his precipitate escape with his cart, before Greek could meet Greek face to face, and soft-bread and sea-biscuit could jostle too closely together. In the course of the morning, she would take a drive with the captain: he, by the way, in order to demonstrate his triumph, generally contriving to crack his whip close by the very door of the baker, who had been before him. After dinner, she might chance to ride out on horseback, attended by the young wine-merchant; and, in the evening, be perhaps so perseveringly waited upon by several together, that all her address was required to stow them away out of one another's reach or knowledge, in order to prevent any alarming symptoms which might else have arisen on her premises of bowie-knife and bullet. On Sundays, the baker's man arrayed himself in his Texan volunteer dress, and, with musquet on shoulder, marched, in military pomp, to subdue the female force of the kitchen; while he of the ten-pin alley shone in the glittering colours of a fantastical, half Mexican, frilled, and decorated garb, not very distantly related to that of a harlequin.

Not, however, to prolong this tittle-tattle, which is far better adapted to the genius of Mrs. Trollope, or of Miss Mitford, than to my pen, let it suffice the reader to be informed, that after the expenditure, on the part of all these loving applicants, of a vast deal of time, of buggy hire, and of attendance;—after the wine-merchant had betaken himself to scandal and claret in despair; the captain sworn a violent oath, that he would shoot or knife any man who dared to wed the widow except himself; after the liquor-storekeeper had given it in as a hopeless speculation, the doctor discovered it was no joke to be made fun of; and the baker had even gone so far as to re-model, re-paint, re-furnish, and re-carpet, his bachelor's hall, in the self-imagined confidence of soon having a gentle addition to his household,—the widow openly avowed, that she knew they only wanted her for her money, refused to have any of them, and remained a widow still when I bade adieu to Galveston. From all this, however, a moral may be drawn for the benefit of the unmarried of the gentle sex at home; since it clearly appears that, if a woman may be no more of a witch in her own country than a man is said to be a prophet, she has only to go to Texas to charm and fascinate at least one-half of a town's bachelor population. I knew a lady there, about three-and-twenty, who had been married three times, and was then on with her third husband, who, if I recollect aright, was hardly expected to get better. For, notwithstanding the scarcity of women is so great in Texas, that the Government has recently offered six hundred and forty acres of land to any female emigrant who, within a given period, marries a permanent citizen of the Republic, yet the numbers of men who die there, as compared with the women, is as two or three to one; a fact partly attributable to the more evil habits of the former, but mainly to the greater exposures and out-door hardships commonly undergone by them. Still, I cannot conscientiously advise any one of my fair readers to go, either for the sake of becoming proprietrix of such an unavailable landed estate as the Government gives by way of marriage-portion, or to take the chance of becoming the wife of some wild squatter, scarcely more cultivated or productive than the waste prairie around him. Few and far between are the emigrant females of Texas who would not gladly go back again to the respective places from whence they came, if they conveniently could. The home-fever, of which Napoleon's Switzers died, is not unknown there, especially amongst the females, as many a longing-eye that too often gazes afar upon the vision of its birthplace can sufficiently prove. One notable instance of this yearning for home came across my observation, in the person of a lady from New York, whose husband was doing a respectable business in a store in the town, while he kept a sort of country house on the outskirts, as a more agreeable habitation for his family. During our first residence with Mrs. S——, (the English lady beforementioned,) this unfortunate victim, who was her next neighbour, used to come in about every other day at the very least, and invariably with the same doleful and piteous lamentations over the loss of New York.

"Well, Mrs. S——, and do you think you shall get to New York this summer?"

"I am rather afraid not, Madam," briskly replied the other. "My husband seems to have no intention of leaving Galveston at present."

"Ay dear, ay dear! I wish I was but going!—I'm sure I've been teasing my poor husband about it every day, both last year and this, and yet I can't get him to consent to go back to New York, though he was doing a deal better in New York than he is now, or ever will do in this miserable hole! I'm sure I was crying all day long yesterday to go back to New York, and couldn't eat a morsel of dinner, if it had been to save my life. Oh—o—h! If I could but persuade him to give up here, and go back to New York, I should be satisfied. Upon my word, Mrs. S——, I don't know how you feel about it, but I'd sooner starve in New York than be a first-rate lady here. I shall never be happy—that I know I sha'n't—till I do get back to New York. I'm always thinking about it, day and night. But I will tease it out of him, if I can. He sha'n't have a bit of peace as long as I'm here; for I couldn't let him, if I would. He'll be home to his dinner in about an hour or so, and then I shall be at him again about going off this summer to New York. If I had my will, I wouldn't live out of New York under any consideration; and only let me once catch myself there again, and if anybody ever sees me out of New York after that, I'll give 'em leave to take me, if they like me, for their pains. Well, good morning: and if you should think of going to New York, or happen to know anybody that is going, just step in and let me know; for I'm sure I envy anybody that's going to New York, that I do!"

And thus we used to be New Yorked, until the very name assumed the appearance of a verbal hobgoblin, and seemed to make us as anxious to keep clear of that famous city, as this dismal matron was to be once more embraced in its dear delightful arms.

Most feminine employments are liberally paid for—when paid at all—in this country. Seamstresses pick up a good living; and successful washerwomen flourish like vines and fig-trees. One of this latter profession, who occasionally washed for us, used to tell a story of her first interview with a great Texan commander, which amused me highly, though I fear it will not tell so well on paper.

"Now, yo' may believe me, Mrs. H——, for, upon my word, when me and my husband first landed on this island, we had but half-a-dollar in the world. But I'd brought a first-rate Yankee washing-machine with me, and set to work as soon as I could. Well, in a bit I got quite a reppytation for it, and was known all over th' town as the English washer-woman. One day a nigger man brought a big bundle of clothes to wash, and promised to call for 'em again at the end o' th' week. Setterday comes, and wi' it comes th' nigger. 'Them clothes,' says I, 'comes to two dollars and a hafe.'

"'Ain got no mony,' says he: 'Massa pay nex' week. Nebber pays till he sees how washin' done.'

"'Then them clothes don't go out of this house till he does pay. Next weeks don't do for me,—they're always coming, but never comes.'

"'Then I no tak clothes?'

"'Touch 'em at your black peril, if you dare, till them two dollars and a hafe is pead into these crinkley fingers that 's smarted over 'em!' says I; and in that way I got rid of him.

"After a bit he comes again, and says he—'Massa send his com'l'ment, and say he send mony Mundy; only he mus hav clothes t'night, cos he gwine out t'morrow, and his shirts all in that bun'l.'

"'I've nothing to do with his going out or his stopping in! If folks can't afford to pay for their shirts washing, they've no right to dirty 'em: that's my maxhum. Now, yo' need not stop stareing and grinning there; becos they sha'n't be stirred out of this house till they are pead for, be it longer or shorter, first.' And with that I sent him back a second time.

"Same night a gentleman taps at ar door,—a tall stout gentleman he was,—and says he,—'Ah, Mrs. Jones!' says he, 'so you won't let my slave bring my clothes home, I understand.'

"'Not till they're pead for, Sir,' says I. He smiled and said, he dare say it was right enough; and then began to look round the room, 'Well,' said he, 'you've a very delightful little house here,—very, indeed.—Ah!—that's a beautiful clock—a beautiful clock it is!—did you bring it from England?'

"'We did, Sir.'

"'Well, I should like such an one very much. Do you think your husband would part with it?'

"'I dare say he would, Sir, if he could get his price for it.'

"'Hum—well; when he comes home tell him a gentleman will buy it of him if he'll name his price, and I'll call up again on Monday. And at the same time, Mrs. Jones, I can settle this trifle about the washing, you know. You've no objection to my taking the clothes, I suppose?'

"'Not if you'll pay me for 'em, Sir.' He laughed at that, and said he, 'You don't seem to know who I am, Mrs. Jones.'

"'No, Sir,' said I, 'and, as far as that goes, I don't care either.'

"'My name is Sam Houston.'

"'Sam Houston, or Sam anybody else, it makes no difference to me. Them shirts sha'n't go out of this house till they are pead for, if they stay for six months; for I can't afford to buy soap and saleratus, and wash folkses things in at th' bargain, if they niver pay for it when it's done. Besides, Sir, I should think you can't buy the clock if you can't pay for your washing.' So he laughed agen, and bid me a good night. Next morning his nigger comed up agen pretty early, and broat th' money along wi' him; but I didn't know till then, when I axed him, that I'd bin talking a-that-a wey to th' President o' th' country hisself.

"However I always had his washing after; and he always took care to send th' money for it when it was done."

Any woman who happens to possess a genius for washing, an enthusiast in the business, a creature whose highest delight is in "fine drying-weather," must needs pass a blissful life in Galveston; since kitchen fires are altogether superseded by the more economical heat of the sun; and clothes-horses are a mechanical invention, the utility of which can scarcely be comprehended so close upon the tropic of Cancer. This will readily appear, if I may be allowed to pass, by such a rapid transition as the present, from washerwomen to the weather.

It has been affirmed by various Texan advocates, that the climate of the country is neither so hot nor so cold as in the more northern Atlantic States, but that the prevailing character of the weather, all the year round, is much the same with our fine summer weather in England.

Now as facts in this matter are preferable to assertions, and the quicksilver tongue of a thermometer is better to be depended upon than the silver tongue of any interested author, let us see what one of Fahrenheit's says of the heat and cold in Galveston. Opportunity did not allow me to begin a register until the 16th of July; but from that period to the middle of December, with some few unavoidable omissions, it is sufficiently complete to give a just idea of the heat which is "not too great to work in," and the cold which never grows unpleasant. The thermometrical "averages" given by Mr. Kennedy are very apt to mislead the reader. It is not by averages that the body feels changes or excesses of temperature. It is by these latter, relatively one to another, that the constitution is most affected. I prefer, therefore, to give a few accurate particulars, rather than to average the various temperatures throughout the day and night during any given month of the year. The season of 1841 was in no respect unusual; and as Galveston island is necessarily much cooler than the habitable "narrow strip" of main-land with its calm dead atmosphere, some idea may be formed of the greater heats of these swamps and alluvial bottoms. On the 16th July, at six in the morning,—about sunrise, the thermometer stood at 80° Fahrenheit in the shade; at seven it was 100° in the sun; at midday 100° in the shade. Next day, at seven A.M. 108° in the sun. On the 23d at nine A.M. 119° in the sun, and at the same point of time 91° in the shade, with a strong sea-breeze upon it. On the 25th, before sunrise, and in the house (open all night) 71°; at six, 102° in the sun, and at seven 115°. On the 29th, at ten A.M., 124° in the sun, with a N.E. breeze. This was at my house on the open prairie; but in the city the thermometer under the same exposure stood at 140°.

On the 5th of August, at six A.M., 80° in the shade, with an east wind; at ten A.M., 119° in the sun, and wind. On the 7th, at the same hour in the morning, 80°; and at half-past eight A.M., 122 in the sun, it being a dead calm. At mid-day, a strong breeze blew, and the thermometer fell to 120°. At four P.M., 108° in the sun, and wind. Throughout the remainder of the month, the average was some three or four degrees lower. About the middle of September, the thermometer varied from 70° in the shade, to 99° in the sun, and wind. A month later, the temperature varied from 50° to 70° morning and evening: noon is not marked. From the beginning to the middle of November, the lowest registration was 55° in the shade, at eight A.M.; and the highest 105° in the sun, at nine A.M. About this time many of the feathered tribes become migratory; as various red-birds and Bohemian chatterers staid, on the 14th, in our garden, apparently on their passage south. During the remaining portion of the month, the temperature varied, early in the morning, from 58° to 70°; and at noon, from 70° in the shade, to 98° in the sun. On the 26th, a "Norther" came on, and the thermometer suddenly fell, at seven in the morning, to only 2° above freezing. At noon, it mounted to 46°, and fell, by ten at night, to 40°. On the 28th, the norther still continuing, at seven in the morning it was as low as 22°, and of course there was a severe frost; at noon, 28°, and the same at sunset. The next day, at seven A.M., it rose to 44°. On the 4th December, at seven A.M., 43° in the shade; at noon, 56° in the same place, and 86° in the sun; at sunset, 56° again, in the house. Similar degrees of temperature prevailed until the 8th instant, beyond which my register does not extend.

The "averages" of all this might make a very delectable climate; but the fact is, that the various changes are felt very severely, and especially by individuals who are openly exposed to their influences. After a succession of hot weather, a norther, with the thermometer down to freezing-point, will, with many constitutions, produce the sense of excessive cold, and cause ague and fever to a certainty. These northers are sometimes accompanied by frightful storms of thunder, lightning, and rain, during which—what with the rattling of the latter upon your shingled roofs and wooden walls, the roaring of the wind, and the never-ceasing bellowing of the thunder, broken now and then by terrific claps, that convey the sensation of an immense weight let fall upon the top of the skull—it is next to impossible to make yourself heard by a person sitting close alongside, unless by literally shouting very loud. The lightning is incessant; the heavens appear one mass of vaporous fire, intermingled with streams of forked lightning of all colours, that really seem to run down from the sky like molten metal. Two or three hours of this are not amongst the most pleasant of things; but they have their glories nevertheless.

Amongst our band of emigrants who left England with the full and final intention of settling for life in Texas, was a sort of family-party composed of a Mr. L——, his mother, wife, several young children, and his sister and her husband, Mr. and Mrs. P——. All were full of hope; but the first-named individual, the most full of money, perhaps, of any one who sailed on that occasion, with the fixed determination to live and die in the land of his adoption. As the story of this family is one of the most strikingly illustrative at once of the "healthiness" of habitable Texas, and of the fate which commonly awaits northern emigrants, that my observation and experience enable me to adduce, I will give it at once; and, without regard to the period of time it occupied in the development, state it from first to last as briefly as the subject will allow.

During our passage out, we heard great boastings from this family-party about a high-sounding locality in Texas called "Cedar Bayou," to which they were bound; as well as much grand small-talk touching a certain Captain S——, a friend and distant relation,—an old campaigner in various parts of America, who had finally settled in Texas,—and at whose recommendation also it was that these samples of three living generations had embarked for that blessed country. They were about to locate land (£300 purchase-money) immediately adjoining their good friend and cousin Captain S——, who had now been settled two or three years; and whose descriptions of the locality were almost as charming as Milton's of the mount of Paradise.

Cedar Bayou then was everything:—alligators swam about in the front of the house,—the whole region thereabouts abounded in game,—and herds of fine deer not unfrequently came, in all unconscious security, so close upon Captain S.'s log-mansion, that he could shoot them down without going farther in the pursuit than upon his own terrace, or to his chamber window. What a pleasant foreshadowing of future delight was this, to sick and heart-weary passengers gazing over a ship's bulwarks into the vacancy where land should be; and longing, like lovers after the absent, for that bliss to come, the very thought of which made present pain less durable!

Immediately upon their arrival, preparations were made for an instantaneous removal from the ship to Cedar Bayou; and cases of crockery, glass, and furniture, translated from a London drawing-room—not forgetting a piano-forte to enliven the prairies, and mingle its nightly music with the howling of the wolves—all were bundled into a barge alongside; and, with some few casks of dry provisions to fall back upon, the happy group set out for the head of Galveston bay, on which Cedar Bayou lies. For a while, we who remained on the island heard little or nothing of them, except now and then when Messrs. L—— and P—— rambled five or six miles through woods and prairie in order to reach the Houston steamer as she passed down the paltry channel of Buffalo Bayou, and thus got a lift as far as the island;—but on those occasions we received flourishing accounts of the delightful country in which they were situated,—of the magnificent cedar woods where the white man's axe might cut and come again with unlimited impunity,—of the captain's timber dwelling, upon a scale as gigantic as an English baron's castle,—and many protestations that they were literally so enchanted with the place altogether, that no consideration on earth could ever induce them to leave it again.

At this time they were felling trees, and engaged in interesting discussions and agreeable social squabbles as to the most eligible site for their contemplated house. In the meantime Captain S—— had accommodated the whole family with shelter beneath his ample roof; but as the captain, in the construction of his castle, had committed the small oversight of expending all his resources upon the outside shell thereof only, it is not very surprising (what was indeed the fact) that the whole of the interior should be without partition walls, so as to constitute chambers and separate apartments. With this large influx of new comers, male and female, one room, however extensive, would scarcely suffice; the defect however was soon remedied by suspending sheets and blankets from corner to corner, and side to side; and thus shooting up woollen walls and linen defences instead of planks or lath and plaster.

But trifling inconveniences of this kind are cheerfully endured, if indeed, they do not vanish altogether, when thoughtful and reflective emigrants come to recollect that it cannot be expected that everything should be exactly to one's mind in any part of the world,—not even in Texas, though it does so far surpass every other known portion of the great globe in furnishing all that the human heart can desire.

The Captain also had a body-guard of dogs, of no mean size or very gentle nature, as may be surmised from the fact, that they earned their own living, equally with the wolves, by hunting down rabbits and other small game; and on one occasion fell unexpectedly upon one of their own species, and summarily disposed of his remains by devouring them.

On occasion of one of the visits of Messrs. L—— and P—— to the island, they purchased a boat for the navigation of the bayou, and also with the intention of using it, in future, on their various passages to and from the island. This they would be the better enabled to effect, inasmuch as Mr. P—— was previously a noted oarsman amongst the aquatic clubs of the Thames at London, and will be readily recognised by many members thereof, as the well-known Mr. Thomas. That this individual was also otherwise well adapted to brush through the difficulties and hardships of a settler's early life, may be inferred from the fact, that he was a pugilist of tolerable pretensions; and, at the period of our arrival in Texas, in excellent "training" for hard labour and endurance of any or all kinds.

The boat being purchased, they also found that another hand or two would be required, and accordingly fixed on one of the passengers who had come out with us, and whom they prevailed upon to accompany them back to Cedar Bayou, for the purpose of assisting them in building their log edifice, and enclosing and cultivating their land. This young man was Mr. T. B——, the son of an English curate, in the parish of W—lm—ton in Staffordshire. Sacred as his father's order was, he himself had been bred up to farming and cattle-breeding,—had been sent out (he said) by a gentleman in England who had purchased Texan lands, to discover and locate them; but had totally failed, like many others, in the attempt. The Cedar Bayou people had a shrewd eye to poor B——'s utility; and, seeing that his own enterprise had failed, reflecting that his knowledge of stock was likely to be eminently useful, while his own bodily powers of labour were none of the most contemptible, inasmuch as he stood nearly six feet high, and, though not positively robust, was strong in proportion,—they fixed upon him, as I have said; and, by the mere offer of "board and lodging," without wages, induced him to join his adventures with theirs.

In their own boat then, self-contained as it were, the three set off in high spirits, and with flying colours, to track, for the first time, by their own skill, the shoally waters of some forty or sixty miles of open bay. Boats discovered keel upwards, and swollen corpses found washed upon the desert shores of Pelican Island or Three Points, presented themselves to the imaginations of us treaders upon soft sand who remained behind; but, fortunately, no reality ever came to bear them out:—the three settlers arrived, after a long voyage, in safety; and, for "a time and a season" afterwards, very satisfactory accounts occasionally reached us, of their and their families' well-doing. But a change was about to come. Summer was advancing,—that season, when the "narrow strip" of Mr. Kennedy begins to reek and steam with pestilent carbonic acid gas, emitted imperceptibly through the myriad pores of the earth's surface,—when the fermentative part of animal and vegetable decomposition is most active beneath the almost perpendicular rays of the sun,—when water grows equally scarce and filthy, and fever-and-ague stalks forth alternately to scorch men's bodies with living fire, and shake their joints almost to dislocation with burning cold. And with the coming of all this likewise came flying accounts from Cedar Bayou, brought down by passing fishermen, hunters, or ramblers, who chanced to cross Captain S——'s, that some of the English family recently gone there were "sick,"—that one or two of them,—nobody knew who or which,—were dead; but that, altogether, they were in a very poor and desperate condition. These rumours obtained but a very partial and fluctuating degree of credit, until the return of a stout young Irish labourer, who had been at work upon the farm adjoining Captain S——'s, and had come back almost prepared for his coffin, confirmed, in great part, what had been previously said. About the same time, also, a strange, queer-eyed old vintner from the south of England, who had come out in the Francis,—but whose objects and intentions were as completely closed within himself as are the contents of a closely-bunged barrel of beer in the vessel which contains them,—chanced to penetrate into the country on a fruitless land-hunting expedition; and on his return to the island, called upon his friends at Cedar Bayou, not only for the purpose of seeing how they "got ahead," but also for the purpose of getting both his pockets and his belly filled with bread: an article which, as he did not find it growing wild in the prairies, he had rather naturally run short of during the two days last past. He found the inhabitants of Captain S——'s castle, with its blanket walls and sheet partitions, in a most deplorable condition,—nearly all of them being ill, few able to help themselves,—the whole without advice, or even medicine beyond what their own chests afforded,—and not a single one of all the four men, the Captain, Mr. L——, the Thames oarsman, or the curate's son, so much even as able to get down as far as the island for either physician, physic, or the ordinary necessaries of life. Indeed, so short were they run in the article of bread-stuffs, and so weak their prospects of being soon able to lay in an additional supply, that though our queer-eyed vintner had not enjoyed an opportunity of blessing his crust during forty-eight mortal hours before,—Captain S—— refused to let him do more than satisfy the cravings of his stomach while he remained on the spot,—most resolutely opposing all the persuasives he used, in order to entice a few cakes or biscuits into his wallet, by way of provision for the morrow.

With the return of the vintner, also arrived an immediate invitation from Mr. L—— to a young surgeon of our party, Mr. T. W——, the son of a gentleman in Kidderminster, requesting him to repair immediately to Cedar Bayou, with all such physical consolation as his professional knowledge, combined with the resources of the Pharmacopœia, might be able to afford.

When Mr. W—— returned from Cedar Bayou, he brought no very refreshing or encouraging information. Ague and fever had taken possession of the house so far as the new residents were concerned,—the men were unable to get out of bed,—one of the children was dead and buried in the prairie,—Mr. L——'s mother (an old lady about 70) was very ill indeed,—Captain S——, the old campaigner, had nearly all the joints of his fingers on both hands in a state of running sore, accompanied by such a fetid odour, that it was scarcely endurable even by himself. Of course, he was disabled, and had to sit still with both his hands swaddled up in cloths and poultices; while his wife was lame with similar sores upon the legs, amounting, I think, in number, to about seventeen. Yet, in this wretched condition, they were without help, except what could be afforded by a very young maid-servant, (herself at times delirious with intermittent fever;) nor had they had, for some time past, any fresh meat, but were living upon dry and salt provisions. Eventually the old lady also died. With some difficulty, it may be presumed, her own kith and kin contrived to dig her grave, and she was laid beside her grandchild. This was not all. Subsequently, in consequence of their inability to get down to the island for stores, they lived about a fortnight in this diseased condition, without a morsel of wheaten flour or bread in the house,—principally consuming boiled rice.

At length, one day, the startling intelligence reached me, that Messrs. L——, P——, and young B——, the curate's son, had arrived at Galveston in their own boat; but in such a condition, that they had to be carried or otherwise assisted up the strand;—that they did not know how long they had been in coming, as all three had been delirious on the water, and thus buried count of day and night in oblivion:—and that they were so desperately ill, that no Christian in Galveston, either at inn, coffee-house, or private residence, would take them in.

In all this it proved there was too much truth. Finding themselves somewhat recovered after the visit of Mr. W——, and being in extremity as before stated, they had set out some few days previously,—it appeared uncertain what precise number: had very naturally found their disease woefully aggravated by exposure in an open boat to the sun during the blaze of day, and the damps and dews of ten or twelve hours' night. They remembered having forgotten their course. They knew that on one occasion, when Mr. L—— was very bad, he threw his coat overboard, containing, they thought, his pocket-book full of important papers:—the coat they caught up again, but there was no book in it; and Mr. L—— had not the most remote knowledge whether he brought it with him or not, although he intended to do so, as his visit to the island would have been of little utility without. They also recollected that Mr. B——, when he was bad, got out of the boat and stood upon a little island in the shade of a tree, until they fetched him off almost by force; and afterwards they found themselves amongst a number of little shell islands, somewhere, it seemed, about Redfish Bar,—but they were lost, quite lost.

After a while they saw a boat at a distance, and hailed it with hats and handkerchiefs as well as they could. It tacked about and stood towards them. A gentleman and two fishermen were in it. They had previously observed something amiss on board our sick party's craft, and were thinking about steering down upon them. This gentleman was Dr. C. F. W—rs—tr, who resided at a place called Edwards' Point, hard by. He soon saw how matters stood; and with great kindness and humanity conveyed the whole party to his house, where a day or two's rest, shelter, food and medicine, enabled them to make another start, and just reach Galveston in the manner described.

By the by that same Edwards' Point forms one and almost the only bright speck in my Texan recollections; for at that place did I pass ten days of the most delightful wild happiness that ever poor lover of nature enjoyed. It will make me a chapter some day;—a feast for readers of natural history. I could almost think it worth a voyage of three thousand miles to enjoy.

So, as has been said, neither inn-keeper nor private lodging-letter would open the door for the reception of our sick. What was to be done? It luckily (for them) happened then, that one of their fellow-passengers from England had recently been established in a comfortable general store in the heart of the town. He was a married man without family, and had sufficient room in his house. To Henry J——'s all three were therefore conveyed. Poor J——! little did he think then that the path of humanity and benevolence would indirectly lead him to the most deplorable and unfortunate of graves. So however it proved in the sequel. It must be understood however at the outset that J—— had very kindly been put into this store by the owner, a merchant of Galveston, in order to find him something by which to earn a living. His receipts were also to be accounted for weekly. That two out of the three invalids had nothing in the world to pay either board, lodging, attendance, or medical advice with, was well known. Whether the third, who had it in his power, would do so remained to be seen. Meantime, however, J—— found ready money for all they wanted, as it appeared inconvenient to Mr. —— to advance anything or even pay as he went along: while his wife found more than sufficient employment in waiting upon them day and night. This was a heavy tax indeed upon a new beginner, without capital of his own, and acting in his capacity of shopkeeper merely as the retail agent of another. All the running expenses had to be supplied out of the till; and consequently the week's reckonings fell considerably short in actual cash. To add to these difficulties, the store also began to be deserted by the public who before appeared inclined to support it:—not so much perhaps from any fear of contagion, but because in fact, as one of the patients grew worse, it became highly disagreeable to enter the house. The Thames boatman was now in a wretched condition: for the most part insensible or raving deliriously. His legs also swelled to an enormous size, broke into sores, and rendered the office of waiting upon him so unpleasant and difficult to fill, that not one female in Galveston would undertake it for wages less than one pound English per day. Poor Mrs. J—— did it all for charity. I cannot enter into the full extent of the physical miseries to which poor humanity was reduced in the person of this individual. The curtains of silence must be drawn around this bed of suffering; and they that have hearts to sympathize may, if they will, drop a tear in secret behind them.

J——, in money matters, was now getting upon his last legs:—he knew it was useless to ask for supplies where none existed, and he had not the heart to attempt to relieve himself in the only practicable manner,—namely by turning the unfortunate out of his house. In this embarrassing and desperate situation, his moral philosophy forsook him:—hope of success now entirely abandoned his breast. He saw, or believed he saw, himself a totally lost and ruined man: and hence he abandoned himself as helpless at the edge of the declivity, and slid down to a pitiable death in despair. In utter recklessness he began to drink to excess: he foresaw the end; he pointed it out to others; he declared there was nothing else now left for him, and distinctly expressed to me personally his fixed intention to end his difficulties in that manner.

The Cedar Bayou settlement was finally abandoned as a delusive scheme, betraying only to disease and death. The women and remaining children, together with all the household gear, were removed at the earliest convenience, and preparations were contemplated for as speedy a retreat from Texas as the mitigation of disease would allow. At length the powers of human endurance triumphed so far, that all three patients were able to be removed,—a step which poor J——'s growing illness, combined with all other circumstances of this deplorable case, rendered absolutely indispensable. Our partially recovered oarsman did but vacate his bed just in time for his too tender-hearted and despairing entertainer to lie down upon it for the last time. I think he lay about two months; and notwithstanding everything that could be done was done, he gradually declined as though quietly going to sleep. At times he wandered in imagination over the scenes of more pleasant times in England;—he gathered dreamy fruits from visionary gardens; and often assured his afflicted wife that he was once more on the ship again, sailing back to that home which in this frail body he was destined to see no more. Then, by a transition which delirium never stays at, he bid her hurry,—make haste,—"Be quick, quick," said he, "or we shall be too late:—the ship is ready, and will go without us!"

Alas, alas, poor fellow! The phantom vessel of death was spreading her shadowy sails before his eyes, and pointing with her sable streamers across that obscure and horizonless ocean beyond which, let us hope, the mercy of the Almighty had prepared even for his erring but most charitable spirit, a more bright and golden land than that in which his bones were to be laid; and a happier home than any to which earth's seas could carry him. Every true catholic heart will believe, that as "charity covereth a multitude of sins," this unfortunate man's charity has blotted out the sin by which he died. Should any too self-sufficient moralist condemn the conduct of poor J——, and flatter his own vanity by boasting how very differently he would have done, had he been placed in the same circumstances,—let me remind him, that virtue without trial is but negative, not positive; that to conquer difficulties is easy enough at a distance and before trial, as the champions on both sides achieve a victory before the battle is begun. It is only he who does wrestle and contend, that is truly entitled to say, when he has tested the event, whether he has strength to stand or is only weak enough to fall. J—— died so, that life and death were fused together too closely for the actual line of distinction between the two to be observed. That gay young widow of whom I have before spoken, relieved his wife of all the last bitter duties, (for she was a good-hearted creature in truth;) and his body was buried as speedily as possible, after the Texan fashion; being about evening, if I recollect aright, of the same day.

Mr. I—— eventually disposed of his household goods by auction, and repaired with his own immediate family to New Orleans, on his way back to England: leaving his sister, and brother-in-law, Mr. P—— the oarsman, sick in Galveston, and reduced to the last extremity. From a fine powerful young man, such as I first described him, Mr. P—— was now become, it was believed by his physicians, a cripple for life; one of his legs, in which mortification had, it was said, at one time actually begun, being rendered comparatively useless. I was informed that he and his wife attempted to support themselves,—she by keeping a little school, and he by giving instructions upon the flute, an instrument that he played excellently. But what Texan barbarian could be found who would attempt to "soothe his savage breast" by learning music? I know not. An election drum or a nigger's fiddle makes up about the only orchestra ever heard in Galveston. The human voice "divine" is seldom heard in song; and in wooden church and chapel, where it is heard most loudly, truth obliges us to declare, that the divinity seems to have departed almost altogether from it. Sometimes a newly-imported voice from England will happen to trill an old country ballad, or detect itself half unconsciously murmuring some such tune as that of "I hear them speak of my fatherland," while yet the body is fresh with unexhausted northern health, and the spirits are bounding and free; but even such songster soon grows mute;—the music of the past sinks into a saddened memory, and the expiring soul of former song gasps out, after a few months, its last breath in that fevered and enervating atmosphere. Save the wild laugh and shriek of tavern loafers, and the explosive "yah, ah!" of the negroes, nights are silent enough in this most gay and amusing of southern cities. There is enough of glorious moonlight—bright, dreamy, and inexpressibly delightful from its warmth and splendour, but it is still as the reign of silence herself;—there is no music, save that of the far-off breakers of the treacherous gulf, a solitary voice from the charmed tongue of nature, which, sounding remotely through the dim hollow of the night, only makes stillness fall yet more emphatically upon the spirit. Yes,—there are other sounds which to some ears might be music too. The prairie seems alive throughout its whole extent with the sharp quick whizzing of millions of insects—grasshoppers or locusts—which play their little pipes and clatter the sounding cymbals of their dry skeleton wings incessantly all night long. While now and then the loud drum-like burr of the invisible goatsucker, as she pursues her painted prey of moths in the air, startles the solitary rambler as the bird repeatedly sweeps in a tremendous circle from above, and each time bursts this singular sound within a few feet of his head. But of that music of art which cheers or saddens, and speaks to the soul in heavenly syllables, there is nothing. Poor P—— may gather listeners about his door and window, but few within his walls desirous of instruction.

In February of the following year, (about three months having elapsed,) I met Mr. L—— and his wife and children on the Levee in New Orleans, just as they were going on board a vessel bound for England. The former was still suffering from frequent and periodical attacks of the old complaint, and was in so weak a state as to be but just able to get on board, even with the assistance rendered him by his friends. The curate's son remained in Galveston, because he could not get away; and mainly subsisted upon the two most precarious and pitiful of props—chance and half-disguised charity.

What farther became of the various members of this unlucky band, I know not. Enough however has been related to satisfy the reader that the enthusiasm created by first impressions in a foreign country, almost every object in which is delightfully new and astonishing to the senses, can be very little depended on for its report of sensations, places, and things. When a fresh settler, to whom the idea of possessing landed property is perhaps altogether new, first finds some actual hundreds of acres within his reach, and all his own, other minor matters never peep from out the shade; and for the time-being he becomes in fancy equal with some old feudal baron, or the peer of an English lord, though without that title which he can well afford to kick from before him with scorn. But when he comes to gather his fancied flowers, the thorns remind him that they are there also; and too frequently teach the hard and unpalatable lesson, that what the heart most seems to desire,—liberty and one's own ground to tread upon,—may be purchased too dearly. The pleasurable idea of felling wild cedar, and building one's house of scented wood, like the beams of Solomon's temple of old, becomes worthless when the risks are, that one may perhaps not live long enough either to finish or to inhabit it. Alligators may be, as they are, highly interesting and exciting reptiles to watch and chase and shoot at,—but the loss of your dogs dragged under water by them, or a long and delightful "spell" of intermittent fever caught by wading into muddy bayous to fetch them out, are drawbacks upon the gratification of curiosity and the hunting mania, which people are prone to think too lightly of until they are too completely in for them to be able to withdraw again. The certainly most delightful of all human field-privileges,—that of roaming savanna and forest as free as the very wind that blows across your face, with no man nor tyrant law to arrest the crack of your rifle or the louder roar of your fowling-piece, when the finest of four-footed game or the most magnificent of birds comes within your reach,—also loses some of the gloss which an English, and especially an English town-bred imagination is apt to put upon it, when, from practical experience, it is found that even the most expert sportsman must make a perfect business of hunting, if he expect to live upon wild game; and that, to do so, he has time neither to raise a roof above his head, a fence around his settlement, or put a plough into his ground. To see wild speckled deer from your door, is mightily attractive in a book, a letter, or a magazine;—it is also amazingly gratifying to see them fall before your weapon;—but the eating thereof is far less satisfactory, and the trouble usual upon success very much greater, than the object sought is worth, save only for the sake of recreation and sport.

The venison of Texas is poor, dry, insipid, and hard stuff,—because, perhaps, it cannot be kept to render it in general fit for any man who has not the teeth of a shark or the snout of a saw-fish. Nor, in a country where good beef may almost be had for the asking, is it—so far as the larder is concerned—very much worth the killing; those parts, which in a sheep commonly go to the manufacture of that true-bred Cockney's delight, a "chop," being in reality the only tolerable portion.

Our old vintner's overland expedition in search of an appropriate place of settlement has already been alluded to. Although he had by no means found what he wanted, he did not altogether fail in catching something; as he arrived on the island in an ill state of health, and immediately afterwards was laid up in bed of brain-fever. While he thus lay helpless, and in such a position that he could see through the doorway into the garden, he was amused by observing the pigs squeeze through his fences, crunch up his melons with their usual gusto, and in perfect safety from him, close as it were under his very nose; while his pumpkins and squashes were not unfrequently gathered by the children in mere mischief, and laid, out of very devilry, upon his own step. On these occasions—though otherwise a faithful member of the church

—he has been plainly seen to swear inwardly with great spiritual energy; but beyond that, his efforts could not go. After his recovery he borrowed a few dollars of a friend who had sat up with him many a tedious night and supplied him with numberless little luxuries otherwise beyond his reach, —he also increased the amount by another small loan obtained from some other quarter;—paid his outstanding small debts in a two-legged table and an old umbrella which he left behind him,—and then slipped off to Orleans for the ostensible purpose of fetching his wife, whom he expected to meet there on her passage from England; but somehow, very miraculously, he never came back again! Whether he forgot it; or whether, when he fell into his wife's clutches, she first detained him by violence and eventually hugged him off to a place of greater safety, can only be conjectured.—The most liberal construction we can put upon his conduct is, however, that he lost his way some night and tumbled into the Mississippi; or he would have surely gone back to Galveston again, if it had been only to return the amount of his loan to the friend and constant watcher during his sickness, from whom he had raised it. To be sure, if we are to credit the moral philosophers, there is such a thing as ingratitude in the world; and such a venial crime as "serving-out" one's friends; but then at the same time, let us reflect that a good specimen of ingratitude may possibly teach its victim an invaluable lesson for his future guidance through life; while to drop upon a kind-hearted friend at the earliest opportunity is, assuredly, to save his pocket for the future, by demonstrating to him, in the most conclusive manner, the extreme folly of lending money before he well knows whom he has got to deal with. It is as clear as mud, then, that our friend the vintner was entirely in the right, and he of the generous disposition as decidedly wrong.

The old boy was not altogether bad.—In fact I never yet met with the monster that could, truly, so be considered. He enjoyed some sort of a tender heart, though of what precise genus I shall not attempt to explain. Fowls sick of repletion and the pip,—pigs in lack of potatoes, or sheep bleating over the wastes of the Atlantic, either for the nibbled mountains they had left, or for a wisp or two of hay as a substitute, always found a friend and supporter in the vintner—as many fierce wordy conflicts with the supercargo of our vessel, entirely on their account, can amply testify. He could behold a poor steerage passenger sick and drooping for a drop of drink, with unusual complacency; but a chicken-breasted cockrel pining for a barley-corn, or a ship-grunter minus his natural and proper allowance of wrinkled carrots and cuddy slush, appealed to his tenderest affections in a manner as strong as it was instantaneous. One would verily have thought that he either lay under some deep obligations to cockrel, which he knew not well how to discharge; or that, at some former period of his life's history, he had been saved from the jaws of death by bacon alone.

"HONOUR TO WOMEN."

FROM SCHILLER.

Honour to women! entwining and braiding,
Life's garland with roses for ever unfading,
In the veil of the Graces all modestly kneeling,
Love's band with sweet spells have they wreathed, have they bless'd.
And tending with hands ever pure, have caress'd,
The flame of each holy, each beautiful feeling.

Ever truth's bright bounds outranges
Man, and his wild spirit strives,
Ever with each thought that changes
As the storm of passion drives—
With heart appeased, contented, never
Grasps he at the future's gleam,
Beyond the stars pursuing ever
The restless phantom of his dream.

But the glances of women, enchantingly glowing,
Their light woos the fugitive back, ever throwing
A link round the present, that binds like a spell;
In the meek cottage home of the mother presiding,
All graces, all gentleness, round them abiding,
As Nature's true daughters, how sweetly they dwell.

Man is ever warring, rushing
Onward through life's stormy way,
Wild his fervour, fierce and crushing,
Knows he neither rest nor stay,
Creating, slaying—day by day
Urged by Passion's fury brood,
A Hydra band, whose heads, for aye
Fall, to be for aye renewed.

But women, to sweet silent praises resigning
Such hopes as affection is ever enshrining,
Pluck the moment's brief flowers as they wander along,
More free in their limited range, richer ever
Than man, proudly soaring with fruitless endeavour
Through the infinite circles of science and song.

Strong, and proud, and self commending,
Man's cold heart doth never move
To a gentler spirit bending,
To the godlike power of Love,
—Knows not soul-exchange so tender,
Tears, by others' tear's confessd,
Life's dark combats steel, and render
Harder his obdurate breast!

O wakened like harp, and as gently, resembling
Its murmuring chords to the night breezes trembling,
Breathe's woman's fond soul, and as feelingly too:
Touch'd lightly, touch'd deeply, O ever she borrows
Grief itself from the image of grief, and her sorrows
Ever gem her soft eyes with Heaven's holiest dew.

Man, of power despotic lord,
In power doth insolently trust;
Scythia argues with the sword,
Persia, crouching, bites the dust.
In their fury-fights engaging,
Combat spoilers wild and dread,
Strife, and war, and havoc raging
Where the charities have fled.

But gently entreating, and sweetly beguiling,
Woman reigns while the Graces around her are smiling,
Calming down the fierce discord of Hatred and Pride;
Teaching all whom the strife of wild passions would sever,
To unite in one bond, and with her, and for ever,
All hopes, each emotion, they else had denied.

NOTE FROM A COUNTRY RESIDENT.

To the Editor of Tait's Magazine.

I LIVE in a country town, containing an unusual proportion of families in independent, or, at least, easy circumstances. Of its geography, I will only say that it is to the north of the Forth. The heads of the best families are retired officers of rank, Indians, professional men, and small land-proprietors. They form a delightful society, and are generally amiable and virtuous people. The one sad feature of their life is the want of what are called openings for the young men. A gentleman, accordingly, finds nothing but plain sailing till his lads begin to approach manhood, when it is generally discovered that there is positively no place of any kind, at home, to be had for one of them. You speak of the great commercial towns, as Liverpool, Glasgow, &c., and find that inquiries have been made in those quarters in vain. Law in Edinburgh is overdone: witness the sad waste of educated mind which saunters every forenoon, year after year, on the boards of the Parliament House, spending in perfect listlessness, or the perpetration and dissemination of small jokes, the time which it is the delight of manly youth to give to active and profitable pursuits. Divinity with us, as you are aware, is not a line into which gentlemen are ambitious of propelling their sons. Farming requires large stock, and is full of risk. What is to be done? The first resource aimed at is the military or naval service; but commissions therein are difficult of attainment, and but a small number take that course. The grand alternative is India. The town, as far as the superior classes are concerned, might almost be called a nursery for the public service in that great dependency. Not a year passes which does not see several youths draughted off to take commissions in the Indian army, or, more rarely, of course, writerships. By the way, an East India Director lately pulled up a man before a magistrate for pestering him to be allowed to recommend young men to his patronage, on the understanding that they should divide the spoil. I can have no doubt that the East India Directors are above bribery; yet how happens it that, in this country town, the advance of some six or seven hundred pounds to obtain a cadetship, although accompanied by the taking of an oath that no such money has been given, is talked of openly as indispensable? I know a gentleman who had secured a cadetship for his son, and was ready to pay down the money, but gave up the bargain when he found that he had to swear what was not the truth. Passing from this,—year after year sees troops of these striplings go off to India, all hopeful, of course, in time to return and settle with a competency in the scene of their early days—which not one in twenty, as I am assured by an attentive observer, ever does. They are, at least, cut off from the domestic circle and the affections of their kindred for a long course of years, during which death seldom fails to remove one or both of their parents. Their parting, indeed, for India, may almost be described as a kind of death. It must be felt nearly as such, one would think, by mothers. It is there, evidently, that the hardship falls most heavily. I often pity my good lady neighbours who have broods of sons rising up, reflecting that with every one of these it is as sure they must part, when the young men reach seventeen, as that they are to reach seventeen at all. I have heard mothers speak of this prospect almost with tears in their eyes, at the same time that they acknowledged that it was inevitable, and, to their conviction, for the best. But this is not the entire evil. The boys go—but the girls remain. Our society presents numbers of amiable and accomplished young ladies: but a beau is as scarce as were the younkers after the battle of Flodden, in Miss Elliot's song. Parents, therefore, have not only to lament the absence of sons whom they will probably never again behold, but they have to grieve over the presence of daughters who, in the course of nature, ought to be settled in houses of their own, as the wives of happy men and the mothers of pleasant children. A marriage is a perfect wonder amongst us; and it too often happens that, when one does take place, the gentleman has reached an age not a little disproportioned to that of the lady.

What I admire most about this system is the tranquil unconsciousness of all concerned as to the cause of it. These people are, for the most part, well-meaning Conservatives, and great abhorrers of the Anti-Corn-Law League. They have not the faintest idea that the Corn Law has anything to do with the want of openings at home, of which they are so constantly complaining. The poor mother looks on her striplings, and grudges every inch that is added to their stature, as it marks the approach of the time when she must divorce them from her arms to be sons to her no more; but she knows not that, but for false and selfish legislation, there need be no such hardship in her course. The father frets at the buffetings he gets when he writes to his cousin in Liverpool in quest of situations, groans at expenditure for commissions and outfits—and perhaps also repines a little at parting with Jack and Harry. But he sees no more relation between these vexations and the bread-tax than between tight shoes and the toothache. Most of these men have no interest in the present state of the law. They are only blinded by political prejudice and a servile submission to authoritative names. It is quite vain to try to lead their minds to trace the effect to its cause. To have any chance of convincing them, one would need to instruct them in the very A-B-C of political economy—then to undo their prejudices, and then to implant the right principles: a task which, I, for one, rather shrink from. But I confess it is with pain that I see so many respectable persons at once suffering what natural affection tells us is one of the greatest of hardships; and yet, from ignorance, disposed to worship the system which visits them with it.

Our town is an example of many in Scotland, in all, perhaps, but the unusual proportion of this easy(!) class to the remainder of the population. To have sons or other relations in India is the fate of something like one-half, I should suppose, of the families which live in elegant circumstances in this country. I remember having this very forcibly impressed on me, on encountering, by chance, in a country house in Lanarkshire, two ladies who had not met till then, for some years. They began, as people in such a case generally do, to run over the list of their mutual acquaintance, giving and receiving information about the domestic circumstances of each family. It was quite startling how many references were made by them to members of the various families who had gone to India. And this related to a circle of acquaintance in a district of which Glasgow was the centre. I remember that you and I once talked of this, and your remark was, that the facility of disposing of children in India might be one of the reasons why the superior portion of the middle classes are in so few instances opposed to the Corn Laws, as not having occasion to feel the pinch in their own case.

Now that I have had an opportunity of close observation, I believe that the pinch is fully felt in that class as well as others, and that the draughting off of the young men to Hindostan is a pis-aller adopted with reluctance, as might indeed be presumed, if we allow that these people have the ordinary natural affections. The true cause of their supporting the Corn Laws is, as far as I can observe, a woeful lack of knowledge upon the subject, and the blinding operation of class and party prejudices.

REMINISCENCES OF DUBLIN COLLEGE LIFE.

NO. II.—OLD CROW STREET.

In the spring of 1813, John Kemble accepted a long, and as it turned out, a very profitable engagement from the manager of Crow Street Theatre. The nett receipts of each night on which he played, after deducting a hundred pounds for salaries and other expenses, were divided, on the following morning, between the two potentates; and it rarely occurred, during a period of six weeks, that King John's share, for any one night, came short of a hundred and twenty pounds. As he played four times in the week, and never would face the footlights before his dues of the previous evening were safely lodged to his credit in La Touche's Bank, he had no cause to rail at the declining taste of the age.

At that period, indeed, the stage had lost none of its attractions. It was resorted to by all classes and professions, as a place of allowed and dignified delight. People were unconscious of the risk they ran; they dreamt not that they were consigning their spirits to the bottomless pit, by the endeavour to elevate them to the highest heaven of Eloquence and Nature. Shakspere was then looked upon as a man who might, in his day, have had "a soul to be saved." We know now what a sad mistake was that—modern discoveries in Celestial Topography having fixed a location for all such gallants, far wide of Elysium; and if old Wesley was determined that "the Devil should not have all the good tunes to himself," it is held to be true divinity, on the other hand, that all the good singers, actors, and dramatists, are his, to have and to hold, while grass grows and water runs.

In those days, however, as I have said, opinion was more generous, and even the Heads of the Church did not withhold their countenance from the stage. I never saw an actual bishop indeed at the play; but doctors in divinity, several of whom have since adorned the Bench, were constant frequenters of the theatre. I could, at this moment, place my finger on a prelate, whose style of preaching got him his mitre; and his whole merit lies in a close imitation of John Kemble's manner.

People say the world is more enlightened than it was thirty years ago, and that the clergy, as well as their flocks, dispose of their evenings much better. I cannot subscribe to either of these positions, in the sense intended. There is, to be sure, more literary cant and pretension, and a vast deal more of sanctimonious austerity abroad. The clergy, in particular, stalk about with an air that conveys, in some instances, to those "who know the men," the disagreeable impression, that it is only on the stage they dislike acting. But their performances are like Morton's tragi-comedies, very sad exhibitions indeed. Liston's Mawworm was far superior to the best of them; and of the boasted improvements in taste or manners, since the theatre has been interdicted, the signs are neither seen nor felt in the general tone and conversation of polite society.

The Provost of our University, Dr. Elrington, afterwards Bishop of Ferns, took great delight in witnessing the performances of Kemble; and the little commonwealth which he ruled, (with rather a rough hand, too,) was extensively imbued with the same taste. Each night during that memorable engagement, the three front rows of the pit were taken up exclusively by students. No townsman thought of encroaching within their critical pale; and when the veteran appeared in one of his Roman characters, another bench, sometimes two, were seized for their particular accommodation.

John Kemble, though past the climacteric, was then in the zenith of his fame, and still the unrivalled monarch of the stage. Kean, of whom no one had then ever heard, was playing in Waterford for half-a-guinea a-week. The discriminating audiences of that city were hardly disposed to think him deserving of so liberal an allowance; but as far as great bodily agility, and the unsparing use of a very husky voice, could be considered meritorious of that high figure, they candidly agreed that he went a good bit of the way towards earning it. How the Black Dictator was very shortly afterwards deposed, by that "swaggering upspring," from his pride of place in many characters, it is needless to relate. Unquestionably, there were other parts, besides that of Young Mirabel, of which Croker could have said with equal truth, being

> "By Kemble play'd,
> Were like Macbeth in masquerade."

But, in the classical worthies of antiquity, he never had, and—till I see the man—I will not believe that he ever can have, an equal. His outer man was cast in the antique mould, and he had a mind to correspond with it. The eagle-eye—the stern, and finely-chiselled features—(to which, by the by, that very handsome picture by Sir Thomas Lawrence, in the National Gallery, bears only a remote resemblance,)—the stately form—the majestic port—the grandiloquent and rhythmical elocution—all marked him as a leader in the Capitol.

I respect Macready's genius, and always did, since he first appeared—an almost unheard name—in Dublin, and gave, among other fine personations, a noble and affecting representation of King Richard the Second. He is, of living actors, perhaps the only one, who is truly capable of fathoming the deep things of Shakspere. His Othello and Hamlet are such performances, as the most accomplished mouther of the parts could hardly comprehend, much less aspire to emulate. In Harry the Fifth he is a gallant and true prince, as ever led the chivalry of a great nation to victory; and if ever he ventures upon Hotspur, doubtless he will invest rebellion with > "A grace beyond the reach of art."

I mean such "art" as exists anywhere without himself.

But let me not see Macready in Coriolanus, or Cato, or Brutus. I would also add Macbeth and Wolsey to the list. I have seen him in one of these, and he struck out some rare beauties; but I would not take a sterling sovereign of the gold coin of this realm, to sit by and have the glorious originals of the rest disturbed, in my mind's eye, as they even now stand out, all fresh and vivid, in the "Well-remembered form and face" of Kemble. Macready may play these characters to the delight of the present generation; but let me rather contemplate, through a vista of thirty years, the asthmatic old man,

"As he rose
Refulgent from the stroke of Cæsar's fate," or when, as Mr. Wyse graphically described him, in his prologue to one of Sheil's tragedies, he Scar'd the Volscians with a Roman cheer.

Eheu, quanto minus est cum reliquis versari, quam tui meminisse!

The first night that I saw Kemble in Coriolanus, was also that of my introduction to Billy Sheridan,—memorable events both of them. My companion was a freshman, lately caught near the far-famed Lough Erne, who called himself, in the patois of that loyal district, "an Inniskillen byhe,"* and was named in the college books, David M'Fad. Being the son of a Presbyterian minister, this was his first appearance before any stage. The praises of the great tragedian, which were sounded at Commons, and other places of collegiate colloquy, had excited his imagination, and he was overtempted of the Evil One, to put down his three shillings and threepence at the door. "Yon's a sight o' money," he said, "to pay for a nip of the conscience. But a byhe must sometimes go with the tide." And so Davy flung himself into the unruly current that was eddying, very tumultuously I must say, about the pit door of the "Crow Street House play."

If, as some of the good people used to assert even then, that was one of the adits of the bottomless pit, it was anything but a facilis descensus. Imagine two hundred people, or more, in a narrow street, gathered round a cellar door, bivalved, which opened inwards upon the topmost step of a steep flight of smooth stone stairs, much worn and polished by the many-footed public. Imagine those two or three hundred (as well becomes a modest Irishry) pressing forward, elbowing, crushing, squeezing and buffeting, to try who'll be first. Then, at the appointed time of half-past six, imagine the doorkeeper within, whose business it is to shoot back the bolt, stealing on tiptoe, for fear of being heard by the impatient crowd in the street, just as one might go about to open a tiger's cage; and the instant he performs the feat, bounding away before the roaring monster, as it follows, crashing, tramping, jostling, tumbling, capering, and yelling at his heels. Down it pours, a human cataract, through the palpable darkness of that sudden descent, careless who may be underfoot, and, indeed, without power—though it cared ever so much—to help or spare: for onwards it rushes, impelled from behind; and, like the hunted stag, until a light, glimmering from a chink in the wall, calls upon every one to stop and pay.

"Fearing the hind legs may o'ertake the fore;"

This chink could conveniently admit just two hands; and as there were two hundred varieties of that useful part of man, each clutching three-and-threepence in its palm, and all thrust towards the half pint of candlelight in the wall, I defy you, reader, to imagine the struggle which then and there took place; unless, indeed, you have made the attempt, which once I did, (and failed,) to squeeze into St. Paul's cathedral, upon the heels of the Judges, the Recorder, the Queen's Counsellors, the Mayor, the sheriffs, and the aldermen, on that day—I forget exactly what day that is—when they all proceed in state, to hear a sermon, and thence proceed, in haste, to eat a dinner with the lord of the city at the Mansion-House.

The thought of forming a queu, as at the French theatres, and constraining all comers to wait their turn, never enters into the arrangements of our Police, who indeed keep themselves out of sight during such melées; but are ready enough, as soon as people are quietly settled in the body of the house, to haul out any malecontent that complains too audibly of the loss of a shoe, hat, coat skirt, or watch in the crush.

David M'Fad was considerably amazed, when he found himself afloat upon the shoulders of this uneasy mass: for he very quickly lost his legs, and, by a happy accident, instead of being drawn underneath, was hoisted above the heads of the people, his own head bobbing, every moment, against the low ceiling, which over-arched the passage. "Oh, if my poor mother knew where I am now!" he screamed, at every thump, with a voice so piercing that it was clearly audible above the din and uproar of the place——"If she only knew!"

By good fortune the old lady was not then aware of her treasure being "out;" and he was too tender, I am sure, of her maternal feelings, to apprize her of it afterwards. His distress and ludicrous manner of proclaiming it afforded great amusement, and created no bad diversion for himself in the end, by disarming the wrath of those who felt his weight upon their necks, so that they let him down easy, amid shouts of laughter, as soon as they were free to shake him off.

When he got into the body of the house, and his unaccustomed eyes were able to endure the blaze of beauty that lit up the dress-circle of the boxes—Lord help us all! I have seen some of the fairest stars of that galaxy looking very cheesy of late years:—he stared about with a look of bewildered admiration, seemingly forgetful of what his poor mother might be thinking about his present more perilous situation. After a long and earnest gaze, he exclaimed, with a sigh, or rather a grunt, "Dear—dear—but the ladies do wear their necks uncommon low down in this town!"

The curtain was drawn, and a pair of "bald Tribunes" came forward to agitate a bit against the favourite of the Senate. One of them was represented by an actor from the Canongate of Edinburgh, named Thompson, a man of considerable energy and talent; but his voice was harsh and loud, and he declaimed in a "decalect," which would have been more appropriate to a bailie of the Potterrow, than to the character he assumed.

Mr. Thompson was unreasonable enough to be annoyed at the jibes we were wont to bestow upon his accent; and he once carried his displeasure so far, as to retort something about a pot and a kettle. He thought himself justified in making the reflection, because we not only endured, but applauded to the very echo, a performer from Cork, named Connor, (a Trinity College man, by the by,) who had, a few evenings before, called Ophelia his "Sisthur," and told the King of Denmark, that he had > "Bought an unction of a Mountybank,

> And would anynte his swoord."

An ignorant person was that Thompson, not to understand the proper distinction between the original English pronunciation, as it is to this day preserved, in the utmost purity, in the adopted county of Spenser, and a barbarous Sclavonian jargon, abhorrent both in sound and orthography from the genius itself of the language it deforms.

This bit of philology, by the way, is none of my own. I had it, with many other ἴσια συίζοντα of great value, from Billy Sheridan.

Davy M'Fad, however, did not participate in the general disrelish of the Scotch actor's lingo, which indeed was not very different from his own. He took it into his head, that a man who could wear such a black curled wig, and strut so fiercely, and scowl from under such a pair of shaggy eyebrows; one, moreover, who laid so marked an emphasis on so many of his words, must be the autocrat himself of the English stage. "Gray-she-ous!" he ejaculated, "what a grand man is Misther Kamble!"

But as soon as Foote, the other tribune, began to growl like thunder, in reply to Thompson, there was a manifest revulsion in his ideas; for Foote was "a grand man" too, and could "stalk o'er the scene" better than Thompson. He was in fact the Ghost of the company. A rustic youth, whose histrionic experience had never gone beyond the King of Morocco in the puppet-show, might well be charmed by such an imposing pair of ancient Radicals, dressed up in white togas. But the illusion was of short duration; for Caius Martius soon stept forth in person; and if the loud greetings of the audience had not made the case plain, the imperious waft of his arm, before he spoke a word, towards the Anti-Corn-Law brawlers at the opposite side of the stage, would have indicated him, to a greener than Davy, as the chief enemy of "The People," and the chief delight of the public.

"Yon's the man, after all," cried the byhe, and opened both his eyes and his mouth; all of which remained at their widest distension during the performance, till the green curtain dropped upon the bier of the hero; and the band in the orchestra struck up "Saint Patrick's day in the morning."

"O, damn that!" said Davy; ('twas his first oath: how the recording angel dealt with it, I never could learn;) and he ran home, disdaining the fiddlers and the farce, which was to follow. From that night, he became a constant visiter at the theatre, when anything likely to delight the mind, or improve the taste, was to be represented; and, in a short time, there were not many frequenters of the house more ready to decide whether full justice had been done to the poet or not. He became an acknowledged critic, and wrote the best half of a "tragic play," after the German model, to be called "Wickedness, or the Bravo with the Red Breeches;" in which he was not without hope that Kemble would undertake the principal character. But the unfinished manuscript fell into his mother's hands, during a visit which he made to the north, in the long vacation; and she singed a goose with it! Many a promising drama has been brought into familiarity with that name in a less savoury manner.

On that memorable night, Davy sat beside a student, some five-and-twenty years of age, who took up the room of two men. I don't mean that his séant rested on a double quantity of space, like that of poor Bumbo Greene, who was always obliged to pay for two seats in the Limerick mail, and whose servant once, not being able to secure them both inside, wisely engaged one beside the coachman, and the other beside a young lady, who rode with her back to the horses. But this personage planted his hat by his left side upon the bench, and, as his right hand grasped a gold-headed bamboo of formidable height, no person chose to dispute his right to do so. His stature gave him a command over the occupants of the other benches, who seemed to be swayed by him, in offering the meed of applause, and choosing the time when to give it. He always began the fire by three loud knocks of his bamboo upon the floor, and a deep-mouthed "Bravo," which went to the farthest recesses of the house. If any impatient admirer attempted to break out prematurely, in the midst of some enchaining passage, which was in danger of being marred, or lost, by the interruption, he would rebuke the unseasonable homage with a shake of his uplifted finger, looking round, the while, towards the offending quarter, with nostrils wide distended, as in the act of command, and a contemptuous curl, or rather protrusion, of the under lip. Afterwards, at the proper moment, he would set loose the imprisoned spirits, with an emphatic "Now!" Down went the bamboo, like the stroke of a hammer; and instantly the pack of claqueurs broke out, nor ever ceased to repeat round after round, as long as the well-known thunder of the bamboo could be distinguished pounding against the floor. This man was Billy Sheridan; and he was well known by all play-going people, as "the fugleman of the pit." That was his name about town.

He was extremely amused at the simplicity of the byhe, in worshipping that dull stick, Foote, by mistake, for Kemble; but he soon conceived a more respectable interest in him, when he saw the genuine enthusiasm which kindled in his eye, and seemed to agitate his whole inner man, as the force of genius, which gradually developed itself in the representative of the noble Roman, wound its spell around him. Two or three well-timed interjections of praise confirmed this favourable impression of his judgment; and at last the Longinus of the pit condescended to enter into conversation with him during an interval between the Acts.

"This is your first visit to the play?" quoth Billy, interrogatively.

A nod from David made the proposition affirmative.

"It wont be your last."

"I'm doubtful myself," said the byke, with the accent of a penitent who has half made up his mind to repeat an offence,—"I'm doubtful myself if it be."

"No doubt of it at all, youngster. This night decides it. You've tasted the fruit, and will come again, though you should climb the wall to get at it."

Miss O'Neil was Volumnia; and it was at first a great trial of Davy's faith, to be required to imagine that so tender a young creature could be the mother of "Misther Kamble." But he soon lost sight of the incongruity, under the influence of her spirit-stirring and vigorous impersonation.

We, in Ireland, were accounted rather niggardly of praise towards that accomplished actress; because we would not consent to be run away with by the first burst of London enthusiasm, to pronounce her the equal of Mrs. Siddons. But we were duly proud of her; and never spared applause, when she "came out" for it, as on that occasion. It was, indeed, a great triumph of art, which enabled a lovely girl of nineteen, without even a mock wrinkle stamped on her brow of youth, to pass for the stern matron who "saved Rome, and lost her son." In the great scene, where her intercession had been rejected, and tears, expostulation, reproof, and scorn, had all been tried in turn, and all failed to move the warrior's heart, the glance of mingled shame and indignation with which she turned away, exclaiming, in a tone of calm, but bitter contempt—quite melted away Davy's incredulity, and he whispered—"'Feth and you're his mother, for all that."

This fellow had a Volscian to his mother—

Miss O'Neil's style of acting did not please Kemble. It was not the fruit of study. Doubtless it would have been better if she had attended drill more regularly: but she was young, perhaps idle, and not quite capable of the arduous mental toil which a perfect preparation would have exacted. She, therefore, committed her part to memory, trusting to a correct ear and most melodious voice, to give it the right expression, and to the inspiration of the scene, to communicate proper force to the thoughts and feelings of the character, as they should arise. The consequence of thus throwing herself, as it were, into the tide of passion, wafted onwards, as she was sure to be, by the injudicious breath of the applauding million, was, that she was often carried beyond her depth. But her efforts, in the very torrent of these extravagancies, were always graceful, unaffected, earnest; and, though nature might be overdone, still natural—highly natural.

But Kemble did not like to play to a young lady, who was thus apt to kick against the traces, and start out of sight. It was, in truth, a grave embarrassment to him. As to himself, every inflexion of his voice, every glance of his eye, every movement of his limbs, even to the snapping of his fingers, when Brutus says he'd "rather be a dog and bay the moon," nay, every turn of his head, were timed and regulated like clockwork. It was even said, that the number of strides he would take in changing his position from one side of the stage to the other, at a particular passage, were carefully chalked upon the boards beforehand. However that might be, a great part of his business and labour at rehearsals consisted in marshalling and prescribing the movements of the subordinate performers, so as to make them keep in exact harmony with his own. On the very night which more immediately concerns us, I distinctly heard him say, snappishly enough too, in "a playhouse whisper," to Tullus Aufidius, "Look in my face, Sir." The said Tullus was at the moment pouring out a fierce tirade against his equal in command, and addressing it in a most pointed manner to some ladies and gentlemen in the lord mayor's box.

Now it did not at all suit this methodical system of action, every line and passage of which had been pre-arranged and laid down, for pictorial as much as for rhetorical effect, that the principal personage should be obliged to wheel about, at every hand's turn, to look for his mother. He always desired to find the ladies, as well as the gentlemen, well up to time and place and attitude and aspect; or else, as he apprehended, (and rightly too,) much of the general effect of the performance, together with many of his own happiest conceptions, were marred in the delivery. But with Miss O'Neil, in the exuberance of her young fancy, Kemble often found himself under the disagreeable necessity of playing at Hide and Seek. When he thought he had her, at the stage-door, hemmed in between that and the foot-lights, a burst of enthusiasm would carry her slick away, as they say at New York, to the very remote end of the stage, and thither was he constrained to follow her, looking almost as amazed and unhappy as Hamlet after The Ghost.

Hence it was no wonder that, when some person asked his opinion of Miss O'Neil, he replied in a slighting tone,—"She is a very pert young lady."

On a certain occasion the Lord Lieutenant had bespoken the play of The Stranger; and, as a most brilliant audience was anticipated, Kemble was very desirous that the performance should be as effective as possible. At the rehearsal, therefore, he induced Miss O'Neil, who was the Mrs. Haller, to go with him four times through the grand reconciliation scene, which concludes the play. Such a lecture ought to have been worth a thousand pounds to her; but she did not then set that value upon it. She became pettish and impatient, like a child that tires of an irksome task; and when he said to her, "Come, once more!" after the fourth turn, she pouted, and cried with downright vexation. "Pooh!" said John, as he strode stately off to the green-room, "you 'll never be an actress."

John was decidedly wrong; for she was at that moment an actress, and a very great one; nor was there in the whole range of the drama any character which she could represent with more truth and feeling than that very part of Mrs. Haller. Doubtless she was indebted for much of her subsequent brilliant success in the part to the instructions for which she appeared, at that time, so little thankful.

Kemble was peculiarly animated on the night we saw him; an effect which it required two concurrent circumstances to produce. First, that his lungs should be free from their chronic plague, the asthma; and secondly, the box-circle should be tolerably well filled. When he came upon the stage, and stood bowing his thanks for the storm of applause which greeted his first entrance, it was curious to observe the calculation in his eye, as he counted the house. This he did with surprising accuracy, while he smiled and salaam'd

From the centre all round to the Scenes.

That eye of his was a ready-reckoner, and informed him, in less than five minutes, of the sterling value of the audience; so that he seldom fell short or exceeded the actual amount by ten pounds. According to the result of this measuring cast, was the measure of his exertions. Three hundred pounds and upwards brought forth the vim insitam. If the receipts fell much short of that, he went through his part correctly, but without distressing himself in the least.

An incident occurred, which strongly proved the hold retained by this great man upon the mind of the spectators, in the midst of interruptions the most ludicrous and diverting. It was in the last act of the tragedy, when Aufidius begins his attack upon Coriolanus, taunts him with a betrayal of the Volscian interest, and haughtily requires him to relinquish his command. The whole passage is an interpolation of Jemmy Thomson, and one of the few, the very few, happy liberties which have been taken with Shakspere's text. The reply of the proud Roman, as delivered by Kemble, was exceedingly grand and impressive. The words dwell very imperfectly in my memory; but I think some of the lines ran to this effect:—

> Till I have cleared my honour in your councils,
> And proved before them all, to thy confusion,
> The falsehood of thy charge; as soon in battle
> I would before thee fly, and howl for mercy,
> As quit the station they have here assigned me.

The energy, at once impassioned and deliberate, with which he uttered these words, was enforced by action so noble and expressive, as to give a perfect idea of resolution and firmness of purpose "founded as the rock." Nobody would have thought that so much could be made of "sawing the air;" but, as Billy observed, "That was a 'wise saw.'" A roar of admiration, to which the bamboo beat time as true as a Maestro's fiddlestick, rose up from the pit, and was heartily echoed by cheers from every other part of the theatre. But during a brief interval, or lull of the tempest, the house was struck suddenly dumb by Big Beatty, who reared himself upon his hind legs, and swore a bigger oath than I choose to transcribe,—

"By ——, that bates Demosthenes!"

Yet, can you believe it reader,—especially such reader as may have seen the aforesaid Big Beatty in a moment of excitement, with his face red as the full moon in a fog, and his white cravat untied, and streaming like a meteor to the troubled air;—nobody laughed! We were actually too much afraid of Coriolanus, to laugh. He was not at all disposed to laugh; and the house respected his gravity too much to raise even a titter. It was only when the play was over, and a wag in the upper gallery proposed "Three cheers for Demosthenes' Nose!" —(Big Beatty had a strikingly prominent feature of that ilk,)—it was only then that we gave way to a ringing peal of merriment, which caused the big critic in the pit to look as black again as his admiring acclamation had made "Black Jack."

I remember this trifling incident with the more pleasure, because it was the means of bringing me acquainted with Billy Sheridan. When the current of our enthusiasm was so unseasonably obstructed by this grotesque interruption, I had almost unconsciously given utterance to my vexation by an Irish proverbial form of bespeaking silence—"Ah, will nobody put a wisp of straw into that calf's mouth?"

"That's an excellent suggestion, Sir," said Billy. "I desire your better acquaintance for it:—

Noris nos—docti sumus."

"Willingly," I replied. "Where shall I call upon you?"

"Call! call be hanged! Come and sup with me."

Trinity College men do not stand on punctilio, like your pompous nobs at Oxford and Cambridge, who must exchange cards regularly at each other's doors, before they will even bestow a recognition on an old school-fellow, or a neighbour's son, in the street. An invitation to supper is a very sufficient introduction; I should like to see the stickler for etiquette, upon our Foundation, who would make such a common ass of himself, as to refuse, because—"I have not the honour of knowing you, Sir." It is few men, worth knowing, a fellow of that starch gentility would have the honour of supping with, I fancy. In half an hour after we had first exchanged words in the pit, I was opening Billy's oysters, and calling him "Sheridan."

There were Noctes, good reader, not so select as those in Number Twenty-five, at which this convivial spirit, being less responsible for the decorum of his guests, was more of a boon companion. This was at the Shakspere Tavern, in Cope Street, which, being temptingly situated between the pit door and the College gate, it was not easy to pass its well-lighted window, rich in kidneys and ducklings, ready skewered for the spit. Mrs. Dempsy was a "genteel" woman, and attentive hostess. Her oysters were ever fresh; her spatchcocks done to a turn; and her Welsh-rabbits served in successive plate-oons—hot, hotter, most hot. She sat in her bar, dispensing smiles on every side, like the rays of the planet Venus; and I believe that since the time of Hebe, no lady, mortal or divine, ever mixed a more agreeable jug of punch. A pleasant flahoulagh sort of a woman was Mrs. Dempsy.

"The Shakspere" was crammed with critics, when Mr. Sheridan's party, consisting of three hungry sophisters, besides myself, were ushered into a curtained stall, or box, bespoken for his use, before the theatre was opened. "It is my custom ever in an afternoon," said our sonorous host, "as I pass these doors on my way to Crow Sthreet, to look into Mrs. D.'s larder; and, according as I find it provided, to programmatize the order of the course. I can't say that she is well assorted this evening. There are ducks without paise; and salad, but no lobster. The old spinach is too old, and the new is not come in yet. I have ordered, therefore, a roast fowl, and 'sparagus, a broiled blade-bone, a vale cutlet—for, after dining at Commons, you'll be sharp-set enough—and the remains of that cold ham that was so excellent last night. But here come the oysters, to clear out the cobwebs of that infernal pit-passage, before we fall to; and, as they are the last of the saison, you'll, of course, take an affectionate lave of them. Heus, puer!—hark ye, Mister Ganymade!—Tim Tunny, I say, d'ye hear me?"

"Comin', Sir," cried Tim, as he flitted by, with three covered dishes and a breadbasket, in haste to serve a still more vociferous table than ours, at the upper end of the apartment.

"Ay, comin', Sir," (mimicking him); "and so is Christmas comin', Sir. I believe that fellow is called waiter because he waits to be called, ten times at laste, without coming once."

Tim stood hard by with a greasy cloth in his hand, to represent a napkin.

"Oh, you came—did you?" cried Billy.—"Well, go now, and bring five pints of porter. Casey, my dear fellow," he added, turning to me, "you've no objection to the metal?"

"No, I prefer it."

"I'm glad of that. I have a contempt for a fellow, who would not take his porther out of the pewther, especially with an oysther."

Billy was quite right. While you live, reader, drink Guiness's XX from the pewter, especially with oysters. It is a combination of solid, fluid, and mineral delight, which blends, in a manner most pleasing to the educated palate, the genuine smack—integerrimum saporem—of all the three: I mean of the oyster, the pewter, and the double X.

A foaming pint stood beside each of us, and moustaches not being the go in those days, except amongst the pioneers of the British army, we dipped fearlessly into the froth, all save a rosy-cheeked stripling from Armagh, who, setting up for a bit of style, declared that he could not possibly think of plunging his nose amidst such an enormous wig of yeast as o'ertopped his cannikin.

The words were scarcely spoken, when the obliging and officious Tim caught up the pewter, and lustily blew away the froth, to the great annoyance of the youth, and the equal satisfaction of our Amphitryon. Billy was the more amused, knowing that Tim, even in his ordinary talk, had a trick of sputtering, which would render such an operation, from his lips, distasteful to a less fastidious drinker. But oftentimes "ignorance is bliss;" and Mr Grumley did not remark Tim's peculiarity, until the pewter was well-nigh drained. Then he seemed to "agnize" the cause of Billy's uncommon enjoyment of the affair, for he waxed extremely petulant and disputatious.

The conversation at our table, as at all the rest, was on the one subject—the performance of the night. It was the theme of general admiration; and every one exerted his wit or memory, to point out some particular beauty in the action or declamation of Kemble, except Grumley. He, with all his abhorrence of froth, taxed his ingenuity in starting vapid and trite objections, which even, if well founded, were not of sufficient importance to injure the grand effect of the whole representation. He fastened especially upon the pronunciation of the name of the tragedy, as if it were enough to dispel the classical prestige of the scene altogether. "Coriolanus!" he exclaimed.—"Did ever ye hear the like? It is a violation of all prosody."

"Well," said Billy, "let her be violated; she's a jade that deserves no better. It may not be prosody; but it is poetry, it is harmony, it is euphony, it is music—'Coriolanus from Corioli!' —There—what have you to say to that?"

"I say, that if he was in Room"——Every one —Kemble himself, said "Room" in those days— "if he was in Room—"

"Why, then he'd do as Room does, I suppose; but he's in Dublin, d'ye see? and may improve the Roman pronunciation as he sees fit."

"Ay; but I doubt, if he was educated at Dr. Carpendale's, he'd ha' tasted the taws for it long ago."

"Pooh, pooh," said Billy, and his under-jaw came out to the onset portentously. "Look at the man—behold his fine Patrician bearing—his splendid person—the awful beauty of his face and form —his action, his squareness of attitude and rotundity of motion—his dress itself—the very helmet he wore this night, and the head he put it on,—then listen to his solemn, majestic, impassioned elocution, unaiqualled since Roscius declaimed in the amphitheatre—and tell me that an ould schoolmasther at Armagh could taich him what becomes a Roman to say or do!"

Mr. Grumley was silenced, but not convinced.

"Did you see Macbeth last night?" proceeded mine host.

Mr. Grumley had seen it.

"Maybe you'll say that was all wrong too! What fault do you find there?"

"As you provoke me to it, then, I will say that his pronunciation of 'Amen' was both vulgar and incorrect."

"Aymen!" said Billy, mincingly; "like a parish-clerk at a wedding! What a thing that would be to stick in a fellow's throat, who could eat a piece of a broiled Highlander! Kemble was right, Sir—

I had most need of blessing, but Ah-men
St—st—uck in my throat.

That 's a fine mouthful of a word, Sir; enough to choke any man. I honour Kemble for restoring it to the language, which has been emasculated by their Cockney refinements of ees and aes. I only wish he'd cut deeper, and remove some more of the Inglified * varnish. The first letter of the alphabet—not only of our alphabet, but of all alphabets—has been totally obliterated, Sir, by their affectation."

Here the tavern clock struck twelve; and as we had but a quarter of an hour's law to get inside the College walls, or else to wander about the streets all night—such were the wise regulations of the Board—the bill was called for, Tim duly remembered by all but Grumley, who could scarcely be restrained from giving him blow for blow; and we separated, in high spirits, to flutter the Volces o'er again, or to dream of Miss O'Neil, and wish that Heaven had made us such another—mother!

* An Irishism used generally in derision, to express the over-refinement of modern English pronunciation. It is most commonly applied to those natives, who affect the mincing phraseology and accent of the sister country.

SMITH'S PRODUCTIVE FARMING.*

This well-digested Treatise comes out exactly as a work of the sort is urgently required for the instruction, and also for the comfort and encouragement of the farmer. With the vague undefined terror of the utter ruin which Corn-law abolition is to produce hanging over him, and while suffering under the Tariff panic, together with the real evils of exorbitant rents and fluctuating markets, the British Farmer now more than ever requires to be told how he may retrieve his affairs and improve his future condition. This is to be done simply by rendering his acres more productive, by means of improved principles of husbandry, originating in the discoveries of science and philosophically applied to the cultivation of the soil. In the Introductory Observations to this Treatise, Mr. Smith contrasts the rapid, the indeed marvellous progress of all sorts of manufactures within the last half century, from the discoveries of chemical and mechanical science, with the stagnant condition of agriculture,—with, in other words, the manufacture of corn and of the other kinds of food. Within that period, the steam-engine and the jenny have, in manufactures, taken the place of manual and animal labour, of the primitive hand-loom and the spinning-wheel, and with an increased power of production which it is not easy to calculate; while the sons of the soil, who ought to have made some effort to keep pace with the march of improvement, still plod on through winter's cold and summer's heat, reaping not much more than the same quantity of produce which their forefathers did five hundred years ago. And yet this writer contends that the limits of the earth's fertility are no more to be permanently fixed than the powers of manufacturing productiveness. Both are alike under the dominion of mind. Nor will any one deny that the ultimate limits of the earth's fertility are only, from the still imperfect lights of science, but beginning to be guessed at. Mr. Smith remarks,—

> Half a century sufficed to Europeans, not only to equal, but to surpass the Chinese in the arts and manufactures; and this was owing merely to the application of correct principles deduced from the study of chemistry. But how infinitely inferior is the agriculture of Europe, even of boasted England, to that of China! The Chinese are the most admirable gardeners and trainers of plants, for each of which they understand how to prepare and apply the best adapted manure. . . . Patient observation of results, and a ready adoption of really useful plans; steady persistance, not in antiquated methods and notions, but in all that has been found by experience to be beneficial,—have raised the agriculture of that country, long ago, to a position which would rapidly, nay, instantly, be ours, if science were permitted to achieve for us that which, with them, has been the slow growth of centuries of experiment. The soil of England offers inexhaustible resources, which, when properly appreciated and employed, must increase our wealth, our population, and our physical strength. The same energy of character, the same extent of resources, which have always distinguished Englishmen, and made them excel in arms, commerce, and learning, only require to be strongly directed to agriculture, to ensure the happiest effects. We possess advantages, in the use of machinery and the division of labour, peculiar to ourselves; and these having been mainly instrumental in aiding one great division of human industry, we are justified in the assertion, that the steam-engine and machinery has not done more for trade, than science and skill, in various ways, may do for land.

There is, at the present distressing crisis, cheering and consolation for all classes of society in the spirit of these remarks. The treatise which they introduce is, strictly speaking, a judicious compilation. It is, perhaps, its distinguishing merit that it is so, and that from its pages the practical farmer may obtain such a degree of insight into those general principles upon which all successful cultivation rests, as will awaken his mind to the necessity of farther inquiry, besides informing it. The Lectures of Sir Humphrey Davy on the Chemistry of Agriculture, and those of Dr. Mason Good, the writings of Johnston the agriculturist, and, above all, the important views more recently unfolded by Professor Liebeg, are presented to the farmer in a condensed form, and stripped of those technicalities in which men of science sometimes invest their discoveries, as if to veil them from the uninitiated, or the men of plain sense and plain education. A more useful work could not therefore be given to the practical farmer, than this brief and lucid exposition of the first principles of his art, and of their results in increased production. The treatise is divided into thirteen chapters, the earlier ones being more purely scientific, while the latter chapters are strictly practical. To give an idea of the nature and objects of the work,

* Productive Farming; or a Familiar Digest of the Recent Discoveries of Liebeg, Davy, and other celebrated writers on Vegetable Chemistry; showing how the results of English Tillage might be greatly Augmented. By Joseph A. Smith. Edinburgh: Tait. London: Simpkin, Marshall, & Co.

we shall, at random, cite a few detached sentences from its practical department:—

FALLOWING.

Let us premise that Mr. Smith patronizes no systematic fallows. He shows how the necessity for them may, in all cases, be obviated.

The exhaustion of alkalies in a soil by successive crops is the true reason why practical farmers suppose themselves compelled to suffer land to lie fallow. It is the greatest possible mistake to think that the temporary diminution of fertility in a field is chiefly owing to the loss of the decaying vegetable matter it previously contained: it is principally the consequence of the exhaustion of potash and soda, which are restored by the slow process of the more complete disintegration of the materials of the soil. It is evident that the careful tilling of fallow land must accelerate and increase this further breaking up of its mineral ingredients. Nor is this repose of the soil always necessary. A field, which has become unfitted for a certain kind of produce, may not, on that account, be unsuitable for another; and upon this observation a system of agriculture has been gradually formed, the principal object of which is to obtain the greatest possible produce in a succession of years, with the least outlay for manure. Because plants require for their growth different constituents of soil, changing the crop from year to year will maintain the fertility of that soil (provided it be done with judgment) quite as well as leaving it at rest or fallow. In this we but imitate nature. The oak, after thriving for long generations on a particular spot, gradually sickens; its entire race dies out; other trees and shrubs succeed it, till, at length, the surface becomes so charged with an excess of dead vegetable matter, that the forest becomes a peat moss, or a surface upon which no large tree will grow. Generally long before this can occur, the operation of natural causes has gradually removed from the soil substances essential to the growth of oak, leaving others favourable and necessary to the growth of beech or pine. So, in practical farming, one crop in artificial rotation with others, extracts from the soil a certain quantity of necessary inorganic matters; a second carries off, in preference, those which the former had left, and neither could nor would take up.

Experience proves that wheat should not be attempted to be raised after wheat on the same soil; for, like tobacco, it exhausts the soil. But, if "humus," decaying vegetable matter, gives it the power of producing corn, how happens it that, in soils formed in large proportion of mouldered wood, the corn-stalk attains no strength, and droops permanently? The cause is this: the strength of the stalk is due to silicate of potash, and the corn requires phosphate of magnesia; neither of which substances a soil of decaying vegetable matter can afford, since it does not contain them: the plant may, indeed, under such circumstances, become an herb, but will bear no seeds. We say phosphate of magnesia is necessary;—the small quantities of the phosphates found in peas and beans is the cause of their comparatively small value as articles of nourishment, since they surpass all other vegetable food in the quantity of nitrogen they contain. But as the component parts of bone, namely, phosphate of lime and magnesia, are absent in beans and peas, they satisfy appetite without increasing the strength.

Again, how does it happen that wheat does not flourish on a sandy soil, and that a limestone soil is also unsuitable, unless mixed with a considerable quantity of clay? Evidently because these soils do not contain potash and soda, (always found in clay;) the growth of wheat being arrested by this circumstance, even should all other requisite substances be presented in abundance. It is because they are mutually prejudicial by appropriating the alkalies of the soil, that wormwood will not thrive where wheat has grown, nor wheat where wormwood has been.

One hundred parts of wheat straw yield 15½ of ashes; the same quantity of barley straw, 8½; of oat straw, only 4: the ashes of the three are, chemically, of the same composition. Upon the same field which will yield only one harvest of wheat, two successive crops of barley may be raised, and three of oats. We have, in these facts, a clear proof of what is abstracted from the soil, and, consequently, what plants require for their growth,—a key to the rational mode of supplying the deficiency.

Potash is not the only substance requisite for the existence of most plants; indeed it may be replaced, in some cases, by soda, magnesia, or lime; but other substances are required also.

We cannot go farther on this topic. Let us take another and more limited case of agricultural economy, guided by science.

The offensive carbonate of ammonia in close stables is very injurious to the eyes and lungs of horses, as the army veterinary surgeons are well able to testify. They adopt measures to carry it off by ventilation and cleanliness. If the floors of stables or cow-sheds were strewed with common gypsum, they would lose all their offensive and injurious smell, and none of the ammonia which forms could be lost, but would be retained in a condition serviceable as manure. This composition, swept from the stable floor, nearly constitutes what is sold under the denomination of urate. Manufacturers of this material state, that three or four hundred-weight of urate form sufficient manure for an acre: a far more promising adventure for a practical farmer will be to go to some expense in saving his own liquid manure, and, after mixing it with burnt gypsum, to lay it abundantly upon his corn-lands. For, in this way, he may use as much gypsum as will absorb the whole of the urine. . . .

We have already alluded to the loss sustained by the fermentation of dung-heaps. As we observed, in an earlier section, when it is considered that, with every pound of ammonia which evaporates, a loss of sixty pounds of corn is sustained, and that, with every pound of urine, a pound of wheat might be produced, the indifference with which liquid refuse is allowed to run to waste is quite incomprehensible. That it should be allowed to expend its ammonia by fermentation in the dung-heap, and evaporation into the atmosphere, is ascribable solely to ignorance of the elementary outlines of that science which hitherto the practical farmer has thought it no disgrace, but rather an honour to publish, glorying in his utter disregard of all bookish knowledge, and substituting his own notions of wasteful and vague experience, for the calm deductions of sound and rational investigation. . . . . It is by no means difficult to prevent the destructive fermentation and heating of farm-yard compost. The surface should be defended from the oxygen of the atmosphere. A compact marl, or a tenacious clay, offers the best protection against the air; and before the dung is covered over, or, as it were, sealed up, it should be dried as much as possible. If the dung be found at any time to heat strongly, it should be turned over, and cooled by exposure to air. Watering dung-hills is sometimes recommended for checking the process of putrefaction, and the consequent escape of ammonia; but this practice is not consistent with correct chemistry. It may cool the dung for a short time; but moisture is a principal agent in all processes of decomposition. Water, or moisture, is as necessary to the change as air; and to supply it to reeking dung, is to supply an agent which will hasten its decay.

If a thermometer, plunged into the dung, does not rise much above blood-heat, there is little danger of the escape of ammonia. When a piece of paper, moistened with spirit of salt, or muriatic acid, held over the steams arising from a dung-hill, gives dense fumes, it is a certain test that decomposition is going too far; for this indicates that ammonia is not only formed, but is escaping to unite with the acid in the shape of sal-ammoniac.

When dung is to be preserved for any time, the situation in which it is kept is of importance. It should, if possible, be defended from the sun. To preserve it under sheds would be of great use, or to make the site of a dung-hill on the north side of a wall. The floor on which the dung is heaped, should, if possible, be paved with flat stones; and there should be a little inclination from each side towards the centre, in which there should be drains, connected with a small well, furnished with a pump, by which any fluid matter may be collected for the use of the land. It too often happens, that a heavy, thick, extractive fluid is suffered to drain away from the dung-hill, so as to be entirely lost to the farm.

EXAMINATION AND IMPROVEMENT OF SOILS.

In ascertaining the composition of barren soils with a view to their productiveness, or of partially unproductive land in order to its amendment, they should be compared with fertile soils in the same neighbourhood, and in similar situations; as the difference of composition will, in most cases, indicate the proper methods of improvement. For instance, if, on washing a portion of sterile soil, it be found to contain largely any salt of iron, or any acid matter, it may be ameliorated with quicklime, which removes the sourness, or, in other words, combines with and neutralizes the acid. For though pure fresh burnt caustic lime is injurious to vegetation, yet, in combination with acids, (as in chalk,) it proves eminently serviceable. A soil, apparently of good texture, was put into the hands of Sir Humphrey Davy for examination, said to be remarkable for its unfitness for agricultural purposes; he found it contained sulphate of iron, or green copperas, and offered the obvious remedy of top-dressing with lime, which decomposes the sulphate. So, if there be an excess of lime, in any form, in the soil, it may be removed by the application of sand or clay. Soils too abundant in sand are benefited by the use of clay or marl, or vegetable matter. To a field of light sand that had been much burnt up by a hot summer, the application of peat was recommended as a top-dressing; it was attended not only with immediate advantage, but the good effects were permanent. A deficiency of vegetable or animal matter is easily discoverable, and may as easily be supplied by manure. On the other hand, an excess of vegetable matter may be removed by paring and burning, or by the application of earthy materials, &c., &c. . . . . .
From what has been already said, it will be easily evident, that the beneficial effect of the burnt ash is chiefly owing to the ready supply of inorganic and saline material it yields to the seeds which may afterwards be scattered there; besides which, the roots of weeds and poorer grasses, if not exterminated by the paring, are so far injured as to lead to their death and subsequent decomposition.

DRAINING.

The improvement of peats or bogs, or marsh lands, must be preceded by DRAINING; stagnant water being injurious to all the nutritive classes of plants. Soft black peats, when drained, are often made productive by the mere application of sand or clay as a top-dressing. The first step to be taken, in order to increase the fertility of nearly all the improvable lands in Great Britain, is to DRAIN them. So long as they remain wet, they will continue to be cold. Where too much water is present in the soil, that food of the plant which the soil supplies is so much diluted and weakened that the plant is of necessity scantily nourished. By the removal of the superfluous water, the soil crumbles, becomes less stiff and tenacious, air and warmth gain ready access to the roots of the growing plant; the access of air (and consequently of the carbonic acid which the atmosphere freely supplies) being an essential element in the healthy growth of the most important vegetable productions. Every one knows, that when water is applied to the bottom of a flower-pot full of soil, it will gradually find its way to the surface, however light that soil may be: so, in sandy soils or subsoils in the open field. If water abound at the depth of a few feet, or if it so abound at certain seasons of the year, such water will rise to the surface; and as the sun's heat causes it to dry off, more water will rise to supply its place. This attraction from beneath will always go on most strongly when the air is dry and warm, and so a double mischief will ensue: the soil will be kept cold and wet; and instead of a free passage of air downwards about the growing roots, there will be established a constant current of water upwards. Of course, the remedy for all this is an efficient system of drainage.

The following judicious observations are found in a very brief chapter on Advertised "Mineral Fertilizers" for the soil; which, in their vaunted universality of useful application, Mr. Smith seems to hold in about the same relative value as fashionable quack pills for all manner of diseases. He lays down, that "fertilizers" which do not either add to the soil what it originally wanted, or what has been abstracted from it by previous cropping, must do more harm than good. Yet he sees many advantages that may result from the skilful use of these "fertilizers." There must, however, in the first place, be a close examination of the soil, to ascertain the kind of medicament or sustenance that it requires,—and then

Let us suppose that this is done, and that an artificial saline or mineral compost is judiciously and accurately put together, either to meet the deficiency, or added to a tolerably good soil to increase its fertility. The advantages of its use are not overstated in a recent pamphlet.

1*st*, It is cheap, compared with its value: a twenty shilling cask will supply an acre.

2*d*, It is light and easily carried, when compared with carting manure.

3*d*, It is suitable for small holders who cannot afford soiling, or keeping of cattle for making dung-heaps.

4*th*, It enables a tenant-at-will to take a good crop out of done-out land, if his landlord refuse to renew.

5*th*, It furnishes to barren land such food for plants as had been deficient; such defects of one or more substances being, in general, the cause of sterility.

6*th*, It enables the cultivator to extract ten times as much vegetable aliment for his plants from the soil, and from other manure, as they could otherwise, in most cases, yield.

But yet all these advantages remain to be tested in every case by individual experience.

The constitution of a soil, like the constitution of a horse, or a human being, requires to be known and understood, if we would prescribe otherwise than at random, expensively, unprofitably, or injuriously, either for the diseases of the one, or for the deficiencies of the other.

Many conditions are necessary for the life and growth of plants. Each kind requires special conditions; and should but one of these be wanting, although all the rest be supplied, the plants will not be brought to maturity. It is in vegetable as in animal life; a mother crams her child exclusively with arrow-root; it becomes fat, it is true; but alas! it is ricketty, and gets its teeth very slowly and with difficulty. Mamma is ignorant, or never thinks that her offspring cannot make bone, or what is the same thing, phosphate of lime, the principal bulk of bone out of starch. It does its best; and were it not for a little milk and bread, perhaps now and then a little meat and soup, it would have no bones and no teeth at all. Farmers keep poultry; and what is true of fowls, is true of a cabbage, a turnip, or an ear of wheat. If we mix with the food of fowls a sufficient quantity of egg-shells, or chalk, which they eat greedily, they will lay many more eggs than before. A well-fed fowl is disposed to lay a vast number of eggs; but cannot do so without the materials for the shells, however nourishing in other respects her food may be. A fowl, with the best will in the world, not finding any lime in the soil, nor mortar from walls, nor calcareous matter in her food, is incapacitated from laying any eggs at all. Let farmers lay such facts as these, which are matter of common observation, to heart, and transfer the analogy, as they justly may do, to the habits of plants, which are as truly alive, and answer as closely to evil or judicious treatment as their own horses.

GUANO.

The barren soil on the coast of Peru is rendered fertile by means of a manure called Guano, which is collected from several islands in the South Sea. It forms a layer several feet in thickness upon the surface of these islands, and consists of the putrid excrements of innumerable sea-fowl that remain on them during the breeding season. This substance has recently been imported in large quantities into England; and its fertilising powers are very extraordinary. Its price, about £18 per ton, is a serious objection; and since the nitrogen it contains forms its principal recommendation, doubtless other matters nearer home will not be wasted, or their value remain unknown and disregarded, as to a great extent they have been. As to the practical results of the application of Guano, an intelligent agriculturist in the neighbourhood of Hamburg has forwarded the annexed remarks to the Editor of the Gardener's Chronicle. He observes that "Most of the experiments with guano in the vicinity of this city have been made on meadows and lawns. On these it has produced the best possible effects; so that, for instance, at Flottbeck, the patches manured with guano presented not only a finer and darker green, but the grass was closer and more rich; so that, comparing it with patches not guanised, the produce of the former may, without exaggeration, be stated to be double. To give an idea of the extraordinary forcing qualities of guano, we may mention, that at Flottbeck, on a spot of grass managed after the English fashion, the second cutting of the grass was necessarily five days after the first; while the grass growing close by, (which had not been guanised,) although healthy and vigorous, required double the time to arrive at the same state of progress. It deserves to be stated as something remarkable, that on the guanised spot, the dew appeared in the morning much stronger on the tops of the leaves, than on the part unguanised. In an experiment made by M. Staudinger on a barren hill, composed of granite or quartz, the guanised spot exhibited a dark bluish green sward, while round about nothing but barrenness was to be seen. If, therefore, a landowner wishes to cover bleak hungry pasture in a short time with nutritious grass for cattle or sheep, the guano certainly is the thing to do it. It would not only produce a plentiful fodder in the autumn, where cattle can be well nourished and prepared for the winter, but such guanised pasture will bring a heavy crop early in the spring. Guano has also been used advantageously on a sour meadow, overgrown with horsetails; and it produced, instead of reeds and bull-rushes, a dense turf of sweet grass, and the horsetail almost disappeared. Thus, in the first place, more grass is obtained, which may be put down as double the former crops; and then the grass is very much improved in quality. Of course good drainage must be attended to on each meadow, if the result is expected to be complete. In using guano we must be careful to pulverise it well; because, on account of its tenacity, it will form into lumps, and on places where it lies too thick, it will burn the grass, although subsequently, even on such places a luxuriant herbage will spring up. Experiments with guano on spring crops have been as successful at Flottbeck, with both wheat and rye, as on the above meadow. The wheat manured in the spring with guano is much superior to that manured in the ordinary way, both in grain and straw. The following experiment was tried on a spot of almost blowing sand:—'On the 18th March, several square rods in the above locality, planted with winter rye, were strewed with guano. The spot thus manured was in a short time not only conspicuous for its dark green colour, but the tiller became so luxuriant as to cover the whole surface. Notwithstanding a drought of two months, the guanised crops remained in the same flourishing condition; whilst the other rye standing close by had a weak and sickly appearance. Subsequently the former attained the height of five or six feet, with ears five inches long, with strong plump grain; whilst the latter were scarcely half that height in straw, and their ears were barren and empty.' This experiment speaks in favour of guano in preference to other manure in another respect. If a light sandy soil like the above is manured too much with common dung, and if there follows a luxuriant vegetation, with dark green foliage, we may be sure that, if there be subsequently any long drought, or sudden change of temperature from great heat to intense cold, rust will follow as a matter of course; whilst, in the above experiment, notwithstanding a nine-weeks' drought, and some intervening nights' frost, the growth of the guanised rye was uniformly good up to the ripening of grain—a sufficient proof that the guano must possess the property of attracting and retaining the fine vapour contained in the air. Hence the fact is to be explained why dew was more apparent on the guanised turf than on that not subjected to that process. As we know that, in general, during the long drought, the action of dung—in fact of every manure—ceases; and as it is light sandy soil which first suffers from drought, it must be evident what valuable manure guano is, not only on pastures, but for winter rye, our chief crop on light land. If an acre of land is dressed with 125 lbs. of guano, an abundant crop of grain and straw will fully repay the expenses incurred. If such a rye-field is laid down in spring with meadow catstail grass (Phleum pratense) and white clover, a heavy grass crop in the autumn would still increase the advantages already mentioned. As rape can by no means be too luxuriant, guano would produce an extraordinary result on it."

If a soil consist only of sand and clay, and be deficient of organic matter, or the decaying remnants of animal or vegetable life, it is sufficient, and chemically correct, to add to it guano, in order to ensure a plentiful crop. Guano consists of ammonia in separate combination with uric, phosphoric, oxalic, and carbonic acids, together with a few earthy salts and some impurities. If guano be the fertilizer employed, it is valuable, chiefly from the ammonia it contains; and ammonia is valuable because one of its elements is nitrogen, which is yielded to the plants.

Mr. Smith goes on to exhort the farmer to preserve and economise all the substances containing nitrogen, and he tells how to prevent the waste of this important constituent of manures.

These random gleanings will enable the reader to judge of the nature and merits of the work—this true "Farmer's Friend." If the book were not brief, and so low-priced as to be accessible to even the humblest individual engaged in agricultural studies or operations, we should deem it a duty to refer to it at greater length. As it is, we earnestly recommend it.

NEW NOVELS.—THE HOME; OR, FAMILY CARES AND FAMILY JOYS.*

The cordial welcome given to the Swedish novel, The Neighbours, has made Mrs. Howitt lose no time in laying another Tale before the public from the same source. The Home is written by the same Frederika Bremer who has so charmingly described the domestic life and the womanly relations and character of her own country, and, we may affirm, of every country and people that claim descent from the Teutonic family. England, in the race of external civilisation, may, by a few generations, have shot a-head of her sister lands, Germany, Sweden, Denmark, and Norway; but all the group essentially belong to the same stanch, honest stock, and, save in the mere superficies of society, exhibit many more points of resemblance than of dissimilitude. One cause of the pleasure which many readers received from The Neighbours must have been, that it recalled and vivified for them an England of the olden time.

This new story, taken as a whole, fully sustains all that we said in praise of the penetrative subtlety, nice discrimination, and exquisite delicacy of touch, which is displayed in the first delightful fiction of Miss Bremer. Yet, though The Home does in one view exhibit equal, or even superior powers, it may not all at once be found to possess the same popular attraction as the elder-born. If not less substantially excellent, it is less brilliant in tone, and less romantic in incident, and more quiet and every-day in character. In many respects The Home, in the early part of the work, resembles the best of our Juvenile fictions; as many of the characters are still mere children, or very young persons, and the incidents refer to them. There is a whole happy household of these human microcosms, each sharply distinguished from the other in intellect, disposition, person, and countenance; but all good, true, fresh, natural, and charming, and, under a discipline of wisdom and love, growing better and more amiable every day. Judge Frank, the family-father, is a man of humble birth, now a provincial magistrate, who has manfully fought his way upward in society, and attained his proper sphere. He is an active-minded, firm, judicious man, as well as one of superior understanding and attainments; warmly affectionate in his family, yet feeling himself fully the master there; an earnest bread-winner, desirous of promoting the substantial comfort and happiness of his wife, and of all about him, but, at the same time, expecting, and indeed exacting strict attention to domestic duties, a regular well-ordered household; nay, even a good dinner for himself and his friends, well cooked and punctually served. His wife is, in her personal tastes, in some respects, most unlike her sturdy lord; yet, after they come to understand each other, they harmonize deliciously; her finer nature softening and tempering his sternness; his masculine strength stimulating and sustaining her more delicate and susceptible mental organisation. Elise, the wife, was refined and elegant in all her tastes; rather delicate in health, and if not indolent, yet gentle, and fond of quiet and repose. But upon the energies and activity of the mother of a large family, where the head of the house was not rich, there were strong and incessant demands; and the warmth of her affections, the exigencies of her position, and the character of her husband, roused the refined and well-born, though penniless Elise, to a steady sense of those duties which soon became dear to her.——The Tale opens with a charming domestic scene—the children assembled, with their parents, in a comfortable and handsome apartment, around the well-supplied breakfast-table; and Madame Folette, as they merrily nicknamed the coffee-pot, making her glad rounds. The children were already six in number; one boy, the elder-born, and the mother's darling child, and five girls, ranging from ten to two years of age; and each an individual, a human creature, complete in herself, and differing from every other,—and not a little Miss, distinguished from all other Misses by her pink, white, green, or blue sash. This is the birthday of the mother of the flock; and when the children have been put to bed by the ancient and faithful Brigitta—who had been their mother's nurse—and properly kissed and cared for, Elise, her husband being abroad, sits down to tell her distant sister of her happiness, and her household treasures; to pour forth a maternal heart overflowing with the sweetest affections, thrilling with the most exquisite tenderness. And, first, of Henrik, "the first-born," "the summer child":—

> My first-born, my summer-child, as I call him, because he was born on a Midsummer-day, in the summer hours both of my life and my fortune; but only the pencil of a Correggio could represent those beautiful, kind, blue eyes, those golden locks, that loving mouth, and that all so pure and beautiful countenance! . . . . . My eleven-years-old boy is, alas! very—his father says—very unmanageable. Still, notwithstanding all this wildness, he is possessed of a deep and restless fund of sentiment, which makes me often tremble for his future happiness. God defend my darling, my summer-child, my only son! Oh, how dear he is to me! Ernst warns me often of too partial an affection for this child; and on that very account will I now pass on from No. 1. to No. 2.—Behold, then, the little Louise, our eldest daughter, just turned ten years old; and you will see a grave, fair girl, not handsome, but with a round, sensible face; from which I hope, by degrees, to remove a certain ill-tempered expression. She is uncommonly industrious, and kind towards her younger sisters, although very much disposed to lecture them; nor will she allow any opportunity to pass, in which her importance as "eldest sister" is not observed; on which account the little ones give her already the title of "Your Majesty," and "Mrs. Judge." The little Louise appears to me one of those who will always be still and sure; and who, on this account, will go fortunately through the world.

Happy the household that has for "our eldest" one of the sisterhood of the careful Marthas; a sage, orderly, acquisitive, though somewhat prim and dictating, but duty-loving, conscientious, and diligent Louise. She is the very pattern of an excellent, if somew hat common-place Swedish girl and Swedish wife. And happy every land in which such commonplace wives abound. She has a woman's heart, too; falls in love, prudent as she is, and makes a disinterested choice, rejecting a wealthy, nay, landed admirer, for poor Jacobi; looking to build up her house upon a great stock of affection, some prospects, and very small worldly means, carefully and frugally husbanded. The second girl, Eva, was thought very like her mother; and when the critical hour of woman's destiny came to her, it was too surely found that Eva, the "rose" of the house, had her mother's own tender and susceptible heart, and more than enough of her mother's latent romance. She must have been very like her mother, the very same "Phantom of delight," —though, of the daughters, Petrea, the fourth, was the sole inheritrix of the poetical portion of the mother's nature. This is Eva:—

See, then, a little, soft, roundabout figure, which, amid laughter and merriment, rolls hither and thither lightly and nimbly, with an ever-varying physiognomy, which is rather plain than handsome, although lit up by a pair of beautiful dark-blue eyes. Quickly moved to sorrow, quickly excited to joy; good-hearted, flattering, confection-loving, pleased with new and handsome clothes, and with dolls and play; greatly beloved, too, by brother and sisters, as well as by all the servants; the best friend and playfellow, too, of her brother. Such is the little Eva.

Leonore, the third girl, had been a sickly infant, and grew up a very plain and peevish child; but her mother hoped to make her good and happy, and, by her tender care, and the happy influences of home and sisterly love, she succeeded. But Petrea is our favourite. She is the rarest creation, whether in point of art or nature, in Frederika Bremer's new group. Petrea bore the queer appellation of her humble maternal grandmother. She was the genius of the family, and long an unlucky genius; warm-hearted, an enthusiast, generous, disinterested, and candid to a fault; but restless, vaguely aspiring, ambitious to distinguish herself, and to make a sensation; though more, evidently, from an intense desire of sympathy than egotism. Petrea falls into a hundred scrapes and trivial follies, following the Will-o'-the-wisp lights of an extravagant fancy. She is a fair picture of the youth of a lively girl of really superior talents, whose undeveloped reason and small experience are unable to check her unregulated imagination. To crown all, there is a sad crook in the woman's lot of poor Petrea—a nose—how could she help it?—of most unseemly bigness. But for this nose she would have been positively pretty; as, with a little more discretion and tact, she would have been esteemed a very clever girl, instead of an eccentric, unlucky creature, whose carelessness and untidyness grieved her neat and decorous sister Louise; and whose unquiet temperament alarmed her mother. The youngest child, the pet of the family, the two years'-old Gabriele, was a bird, a flower, a gem; indescribably fascinating in her winning gentleness and playful graces.

She is a quiet little child, but very unlike her eldest sister. A predominating characteristic of Gabriele is love of the beautiful; she shows a decided aversion to what is ugly and inconvenient, and as decided a love for what is attractive. A most winning little gentility in appearance and manners, has occasioned the brother and sisters to call her "the little young lady," or "the little princess." Henrik is really in love with his little sister, kisses her small white hands with devotion, and in return she loves him with her whole heart. . . .

Peace be with my young ones! There is not one of them who is not possessed of the material of peculiar virtue and excellence, and yet, not also at the same time, of the seed of some dangerous vice which may ruin the good growth of God in them. May the endeavours both of their father and me be blessed in training these plants of heaven aright! But, ah! the education of children is no easy thing; and all the many works on that subject which I have studied, appear to me—whether the fault be in me or in them I cannot tell—but small helps.

Though the mother was at a loss to know all that she ought to do, she instinctively felt what to avoid. She therefore scolded the children as little as possible.

I know how perpetual scolding crushes the free spirit and the innocent joyousness of childhood; and I sincerely believe, that if one will only sedulously cultivate what is good in the character, and make in all instances what is good visible and attractive, the bad will by degrees fall away of itself.

I sing a great deal to my children. They are brought up with songs; for I wished early to make harmony, as it were, the very aliment of their souls. Several of them, especially my first-born and Eva, are really little enthusiasts in music.

The above resolution was unnecessary. It is impossible that a creature so deliciously soft as Elise could have scolded, though such an effort had been required. Her sway was solely one of love and gentleness. But this is her birth-night; and in her solitary hours she recalls the happy days of her bright youth with her sister, when life was joyous and free from care;

Made up of song, and dance, and merriment, with our so many cheerful neighbours; with the most accomplished of whom we got up enthusiasms for music and literature. We considered ourselves to be virtuous, because we loved those who loved us, and because we gave of our superfluity to those who needed it.

And then comes the remembrance of her courtship, when Ernst Frank came on a visit to her family; a man of humble birth compared with her condition, who had nobly fought his way, and gained the reputation of a learned and a strong-minded man. "Do you not remember," she asks,

How much he occupied our minds! how his noble person, his calm, self-assured demeanour, his frank, decided, yet always polite behaviour, charmed us at first, and then awed us? One could say of him that morally as well as physically he stood firmly. His deep mourning dress, together with an expression of quiet, manly grief, which at times shaded his countenance, combined to make him interesting to us; nevertheless, you thought that he looked too stern, and I very soon lost in his presence my accustomed gaiety. Whenever his dark, grave eyes were fixed upon me, I was conscious that they possessed a half-bewitching, half-oppressive power over me. . . . . Aunt Lisette gave me one day this maxim, "My dear, remember what I now tell thee: if a man thinks that thou art a fool, it does not injure thee the least in his opinion; but if he once thinks that thou considerest him a fool, then art thou lost for ever with him!"

Without having acted upon this maxim, (one not very complimentary to the nobler sex, take it in either sense,) Elise became Madame Frank; though even then trembling was slightly blended with her joy. And with much happiness domestic trials came, severe ones, and she tells—

My body and mind must both have given way under their burden, had Ernst not been the man he is.

It suited his character to struggle against the stream;

it was a sort of pleasure to him to combat with it, to meet difficulties, and to overcome them. With each succeeding year he imposed more business upon himself, and, by degrees, through the most resolute industry, he was enabled to bring back prosperity to his house. And then how unwearyingly kind he was to me! . . . . .

Do you know one thing, Cecilia, which often occasions me great trouble? It is that I am not a clever housewife; that I can neither take pleasure in all the little cares and details which the wellbeing of a house really requires, nor that I have memory for these things: more especially is the daily caring for dinner irksome to me. I myself have but little appetite; and it is so unpleasing to me to go to sleep at night, and to get up in the morning with my head full of schemes for cooking. . . . .

Ernst should have married a more energetic woman. My nervous weakness makes my temper irritable, and I am so easily annoyed. His activity of mind often disturbs me more than it is reasonable or right that it should; for instance, I get regularly into a state of excitement, if he only steadfastly fixes his eyes on a wall, or on any other object. I immediately begin to fancy that we are going instantly to have a new door opened, or some other change brought about. And, oh! I have such a great necessity for rest and quiet!

But Elise became better braced, and was enabled to perform her duties without effort and bustle, and to find pleasure in their performance. Though the cooking department was still distasteful to her, she knew its importance, and in the other departments she excelled; for order, beauty, and fitness, were her natural element. We would be charmed with the portrait of Elise, if it did not somehow remind us of the Julia of Rousseau; not, indeed, the fond girl, the impassioned lover of St. Preux, but the virtuous wife, and dignified matron of Clarens.

And clouds arose in the clear atmosphere of Judge Frank's home, as they will in the best-regulated families. A dashing, coquettish, and brilliant widow, an "Old Flame" of the Judge's, intrudes to mar the domestic harmony; and Jacobi, the young and handsome tutor of the children, somewhat of a roué, and more of a coxcomb, but kind-hearted, and possessed of many agreeable talents, who silently adores their mother, makes some slight impression upon the affections of the uneasy and depressed wife. These clouds are happily dispelled, and peace and mutual confidence are restored to the wedded couple, and established, beyond the reach of assault, upon the most solid foundation. This tranquillity gives place for a great many juvenile adventures and incidents, in which the dispositions of the young people are characteristically unfolded; Louise with her starch propriety, and Petrea with her wild ambition to "elevate and surprise." In the conclusion of the story, which becomes rather fragmentary, the fortunes of the sisters are followed, each finding the precise lot to which her natural character tended. The history of an adopted daughter—a beautiful girl of strong passions and imperious temper, who, in defiance of the advice and entreaties of her fatherly benefactor, Judge Frank, marries her music-master, a profligate and selfish foreigner—lends a little extrinsic interest and contrast to the domestic scenes. She goes upon the stage as a singer; but her wretched career is rather hinted at than described, until the lost sheep again seeks the fold, and the prodigal is tenderly welcomed back. Upon this girl, with all her vices of disposition, the enthusiastic Petrea lavishes her fondest affections; and she is at last rewarded. Henrik, the mother's darling, after displaying remarkable poetic talent, dies in early manhood of decline, carrying his mother's longing heart with him into the unseen world. The sage Louise becomes, in due time, and after sundry trials of her faith and constancy, the respectable wife of her early tutor; the kind-hearted, gay coxcomb—who had charmed everybody and adored Elise—now converted into a steady and industrious, though somewhat mercurial and slovenly schoolmaster, and finally, an esteemed preacher in Louise's native place. Louise, with her prudence, her frugality, her industry, her large stock of household virtues, her own eight fine boys, and numerous boarders, finds exactly her proper, useful, and honoured place. The beautiful Eva is the object from childhood of a romantic passion cherished for her by an eccentric, queer-looking, and solitary old bachelor, Munter, the friend of the family—an affected misanthrope, whose heart is full of the warmest and tenderest affections. And the beautiful Eva, "the rose," became herself the victim of a romantic and ill-placed attachment; suffered much, and caused much affliction to all that loved her; but at length rose superior to her youthful weakness, and lived on in happy serenity with her now amiable and cheerful, plain sister, Leonore; and with Petrea, with her erring, extravagant genius, and unlucky nose, now one of three happy, useful, respectable, and beloved old maids. We are not, indeed, sure but that Eva finally meditates the purpose of giving herself to the now aged philosopher, who had doated on her from her infancy,—of making his old age blessed by her affection. Nor had Petrea, the girl of genius, failed in what is thought to be the main object of every young woman's life. She had inspired a man of rank and fortune with a sincere passion; but he was a man of inferior intellect; and Petrea, living much in solitude with her own thoughts, her affections, her books, and her pen, had long since ceased to court distinction, and longed for exaltation of a higher kind than worldly rank. For she was an enthusiast, still longing to rise upwards, not now to grandeur, but to a higher, freer life. "Aunt Petrea" was, at the same time, the favourite of her brother-in-law, and the delight of her eight unruly nephews. Aunt Petrea was no common woman. In the course of twenty or more years, we see the family of Judge Frank tasting joyously of worldly prosperity and drinking the cup of adversity. Their handsome and even magnificent new mansion had been burnt to the ground; but it was built up again, and its library restored; and its master, now an aged but cheerful and vigorous man, owed much of his returning prosperity to the affection, industry, and talents of his daughters, exerted in the instruction of well-born girls, a plan in which they were aided by the generous, eccentric, and ugly, faithful family friend, the secret adorer of Eva, who was ever railing at all mankind, and constantly occupied in contriving blessings and benefits to individuals and the whole species. We must not grumble that all Judge

Frank's daughters, save "our eldest," remained spinsters, since such was their choice; all save the lovely Gabriele, who will, we are led to imagine, not prove utterly unrelenting towards the young Baron L——.

From her "Hermitage," her cheerful, chosen, garret apartment in her father's house, Petrea, who in literature and intellectual pursuits had at last found her true and high vocation, describes her family and her own feelings in divers eloquent epistles to her friend Ida. We select a part of this correspondence, not because it is the best thing in the book, but from its comprehensiveness. We might find many charming, detached scenes, impassioned or gay, such as the wedding of Louise, the death-bed of Henrik, and so forth; but we like best the end of all.

"Illusions! Illusions!" you cry over all joys, all faith, all love in life. I shout back with all my might your own words, "Illusions! Illusions!" All depends upon what we fix our faith and our affections. Must the beauty of love and worth of life be at an end to woman when her first spring, her bloom of love, her moments of romance, are past? No, do not believe that, Ida. Nothing in this world is such an illusion as this belief. . . . . Youthful love—the beaming passion-flower of earth! Who will belie its captivating beauty, who will not thank the Creator that he gave it to the children of earth? But ah! I will exclaim to all those who drink of its nectar, and to those who must do without it—"There are flowers which are as noble as this, and which are less in danger than it of being paled by the frosts of the earth—flowers from whose chalices also you may suck life from the life of the Eternal!" . . . .

You pray me to speak of my home and my family. But when I begin with this subject, who can say, Ida, whether I shall know how to leave off? This subject is so rich to me, so dear—and yet how weak will not my description be, how lifeless in comparison with the reality!

The dwelling-house—which may be said to have the same relation to home as the body has to the soul—arisen now out of its ashes, stands on the same place on which, twelve years ago, it was burnt down. I wish you had been with me yesterday in the library at breakfast. It was Leonore's birth-day, and the family had occasioned her a surprise by a little gift which was exactly according to her taste—ornament combined with convenience. It was an insignificant gift—wherefore then did it give us all so much pleasure? wherefore were there sweet tears in her pious eyes, and in ours also? We were all so still, and yet we felt that we were very happy—happy because we mutually loved one another, and mutually pleased one another so much. . . . . I will now, lively Ida, talk to you some little about the daughters of the house, and in order that you may not find my picture too sentimental, I will introduce first to you, "Honour to whom honour is due!"

well known for industry, morality, moral lecturing, cathedral airs, and many good properties. She married eleven years ago upon a much smaller than common capital of worldly wealth; but both she and her husband knew how to turn their pound to account, and so, by degrees, their house, under her careful hands, came to be what people call a well-to-do house.

Eight wild Jacobis during this time sprang up in the house without bringing about any revolution in it, so good were the morals which they drew in with the mother's milk. I call them the "Berserkers," because when I last saw them they were perfect little monsters of strength and swiftness, and because we shall rely upon their prowess to overturn certain planks—of which more anon—on which account I will inspire them and their mother beforehand with a certain old gothic ambition.

So now! After the married couple had kept school eleven years, he instructing the boys in history, Latin, and such like; and she washing, combing, and moralizing the same, and, in fact, becoming a mother to many a motherless boy; it pleased the mercy of the Almighty to call them—not directly to heaven, but through his angel the Consistorium, to the pastoral care of the rural parish adjoining this city—the highest goal of their wishes ever since they began to have wishes one with another. Their approaching journey here has given rise to great pleasure—it is hard to say in which of the two families the greatest. Thus, then, Louise will become a pastor's wife—perhaps soon also a provost's, and then she arrives at the desired situation in which she can impart moral lectures with power—of which sister Petrea might have the benefit of a good part, and pay it back with interest.

But the moral lectures of our eldest have a much milder spirit than formerly, which is owing to the influence of Jacobi; for it has occurred in their case, as in the case of many another happily-married couple, they have ennobled one another; and it is a common saying in our family, that she without him would not have become what she now is, neither would he have been without her what he now is.

The Rose of the Family, the daughter Eva, had once in her life a great sorrow—a bitter conflict; but she came forth victorious. True it is that an angel stood by her side and assisted her. Since then she has lived for the joy of her family and her friends, beautiful and amiable and happy, and has from time to time rejected lovers. I said that an angel stood beside her in the bitter conflict. There was a time when this angel was an ugly, uncomfortable girl, a trouble to herself, and properly beloved by none. But there is no one in the family now who is more beloved or more in favour than she is. Never, through the power of God, did there take place a greater change than in her. Now it gives one pleasure to look at her and to be near her. Her features, it is true, have not improved themselves, nor has her complexion become particularly red-and-white; but she has become lovely, lovely from the heartfelt expression of affection and intelligence—beautiful from the quiet, unpretending grace of her whole being. . . .

There is a peculiar little world in the house—a world into which nothing bad can enter—where live flowers, birds, and Gabriele. The morning would lose its sweetest charms, if during the same Gabriele's birds and flowers did not play a part, and the evening twilight would be duskier if it were not enlivened by Gabriele's guitar and songs. Her flower-stand has extended itself by degrees into an orangery—not large to be sure, but yet large enough to shelter a beautiful vine, which is now covered with grapes, and many beautiful and rare plants also, so as to present to the family a little Italy, where they may enjoy all the charms of the south, in the midst of a northern winter. A covered way leads from the dwelling-house down into the orangery, and it is generally there that in winter they take their afternoon coffee. The aviary is removed thither; and there upon a table covered with a green cloth, lie works on botany, together with the writings of the Swedish gardening society, which often contain such interesting articles. There stand two comfortable armed chairs, on which the most magnificent birds and flowers are worked, you can easily imagine for whom. There my mother sits gladly, and reads or looks at her "little lady" (she never grows out of this appellation) as she tends her flowers in the sun, or plays with her tame birds. One may say in fact, that Gabriele strews the evening of her mother's days with flowers. . . . . Gabriele, whose lively wit and joyous temper, united to her affectionate and innocent heart, make her deservedly the favourite of her parents, and the joy of every one. She asserts continually her own good-for-nothingness, her uselessness, and incorrigible love to a sweet "far niente:" but nobody is of her opinion in this respect, for nobody can do without her, and one sees that when it is necessary, she can be as decided and as able as any one need be. It is now some time since Gabriele made any charades. I almost fancy that the cause of this is a certain Baron Rudger L., who was suspected for a long time of having set fire to a house, and who now is suspected of a design of setting fire to a heart, and who with certain words and glances has put all sorts of whims into her head—I will not say heart.

And so then we have nothing bad to say of "this here Petrea," as one of the friends of the house calls her. This Petrea has had all kind of botherations in the world: in the first place with her own nose, with which she could not get into conceit, and then with various other things as well within her as without her, and for a long time it seemed as if her own world would never come forth out of chaos.

It has, however. With eyes full of grateful tears, I will dare to say this; and some time I may, perhaps, more fully explain how this has been done.

Petrea speaks farther of herself, and thus of her improved moral condition.

One of Petrea's means of happiness is, to require very few of the temporal things of earth. She regards such things as nearly related to the family of illusions, and will, on that account, have as little as possible to do with them. And thus has she also the means of obtaining for herself many a hearty and enduring pleasure. I will not, however, be answerable for her not very soon being taken by a frenzy of giving a feast up in her garret, and thereby producing all kinds of illusions; such, for example, as the eating little cakes—the favourite illusion of my mother—and citron-souffié, the almost perfect earthly felicity of "our eldest," in which a reconciliation skil with the frenzy-feast might be proposed to her beloved "eldest."

If you would make a summa summarum of Petrea's state, it stands thus: That which was once a fountain of disquiet in her is now become a fountain of quiet. She believes in the truth of life. She does not allow her peace to be disturbed by accidental troubles, be they from within or from without; she calls them mist-clouds, passing storms, after which the sun will come forth again. And should her little garret tumble to pieces one of these days, she would regard even that as a passing misfortune, and hold herself ready, in all humility, to mount up yet a little higher.

The mother was more fragile than ever, and now the only real cause of disquietude to her family.—But—

For the present she is stronger and livelier than she has been for a long time. The arrival of Louise and her family have contributed to this, as also another day of joy which is approaching, and which has properly reference to my father. She goes about now with such joy of heart, with the almanac in her hand, and prepares everything, and thinks of everything for the joyful festival. My father has long wished to possess a particular piece of building-land which adjoins our little garden, in order to lay it out for a great and general advantage; but he has sacrificed so much for his children, that he has nothing remaining wherewith to carry out his favourite plan. His children, in the meantime, have, during the last twelve years, laid by a sum together, and now have latterly borrowed what was wanting for the purchase of the land. On the father's seventieth birthday, therefore, with the joint-help of the "Berserkers," will the wooden fence be pulled down, and the genius of the new place, represented by the graceful figure of Gabriele, will deliver over to him the purchase-deed, which is made out in his name. How happy he will be! Oh, it makes us all happy to think of it! How he will clear away, and dig, and plant! and how it will gladden and refresh his old age. . . . .

I would speak of the circle of friends which has ever enclosed our home most cordially; of the new Governor Sternhök and his wife, whom we like so much, and whose removal here was particularly welcome to my father, who almost sees a son in him. I would speak also of the servants of the house, who are yet more friends than servants—but I fear extending my letter to too great a length.

Perhaps you blame me secretly for painting my picture in colours too uniformly bright; perhaps you will ask, "Come there, then, not into this house those little knocks, disturbances, rubs, overhastinesses, stupidities, procrastinations, losses, and whatever those spiritual mosquitoes may be called, which occasion by their stings irritation, unquiet, and vexation, and whose visits the very happiest families cannot avoid!"

Yes, certainly. They come, but they vanish as quickly as they come, and never leave a poisonous sting behind, because a universal remedy is employed against them, which is called "Forgive, forgive, amend!" and which, the earlier applied the better, and which make also the visits of these fiends of rarer occurrence; they come, indeed, in pure and mild atmospheres never properly forth.

Would you, dearest Ida, be convinced of the truth of the picture, come here and see for yourself. We should all like it so much. Come, and let our house provide for you the divertisement, perhaps also the rest which is so needful to your heart. Come, and believe me, Ida, when one observes the world from somewhat of an elevation—as, for instance, a garret—one sees illusions, like mist, passing over the earth, but above it heaven vaulting itself in eternal brightness.

There are here lessons worthy of the study of every household, and of every individual member of a household.——We shall leave off with a more homely, but as characteristic a Swedish scene, in which—

We find Eva and Gabriele on a visit at the beautiful parsonage-house immediately in the vicinity of the city, where Mrs. Louise is in full commotion with all her goods and chattels, whilst the little Jacobis rioted with father and grandfather over fields and meadows. The little four-years-old Alfred, an uncommonly lively and amiable child, is alone with the mother at home; he pays especial court to Gabriele, and believing that he must entertain her, he brings out his Noah's Ark, to introduce to her, in his low, clear, young voice, Ham and Hamina, Shem and Shemina, Japhet and Japhetina.

After all how-do-ye-do's between the sisters had been answered, Gabriele loosened the paper from a basket which Ulla had brought in, and asked Louise to be pleased to accept some roast veal and patties. "We thought," said she, "that you would need something fresh, after the journey, before you get your store-room in order. Just taste a patty! they are filled with mince-meat, and I assure you are baked since the Flood!"

"Really!" replied Louise, laughing, "they are delicate, too! See, there's one for you, my little mannikin; but another time don't come and set yourself forward and look so hungry! Thanks! thanks, dear sister! Ah, how charming that we are come again into your neighbourhood! How fresh and happy you all look! And Petrea! how advantageously she has altered; she is come to have something quiet and sensible about her; she has outgrown her nose, and dresses herself neatly; she is just like other people now. And see—here I have a warm, wadded morning-dress for her, that will keep her warm up in her garret; is it not superb! And it cost only ten thalers courant.

"O, extraordinary—out of the common way! Quite unheard-of!" said they; "is it not so!—why, it is a piece of clothing for a whole life!"

"What a beautiful collar Eva has on! I really believe she is grown handsomer," said Louise. "You were, and are still the rose of the family, Eva; you look quite young, and are grown stout. I, for my part, cannot boast of that; but how can anybody grow stout when they have eight children to work for! Do you know, sisters, that in the last week before I left Stockholm, I cut out a hundred and six shirts! I hope I can meet with a good seamstress here at home; look at my finger, it is quite hard and horny with sewing. God bless the children! one has one's trouble with them. But tell me, how is it with our mother! They have always been writing to me that she was better—and yet I find her terribly gone off; it really grieves me to see her. What does Mr. Munter say!"

"Oh," replied Gabriele, warmly, "he says that she will recover. There is really no danger; she improves every day."

Eva did not look so hopeful as Gabriele, and her eyes were filled with tears as she said, "When autumn and winter are only over, I hope that the spring——"

"And do you know," interrupted Louise, with animation, "what I have been thinking of? In the spring she shall come to us and try the milk cure; she shall occupy this room, with the view towards the beautiful birch grove, and shall enjoy the country air, and all the good things which the country affords, and which I can obtain for her—certainly this will do her good. Don't you think that then she will recover? Don't you think that it is a bright idea of mine?"

The sisters thought that really it was bright, and Louise continued:

"Now I must show you what I have brought for her. Do you see these two damask breakfast cloths, and these six breakfast napkins?—all spun in the house. I have had merely to pay for the weaving. Now, how do they please you?"

"O excellently! excellently!" said one sister.

"How very handsome! How welcome they will be!" said the other.

"And you must see what I have brought for my father—ah, Jacobi has it in his carpet-bag—one thing lies here and another there—but you will see it, you will see it."

"What an inundation of things!" said Gabriele, laughing. "One can see, however, that there is no shortness of money."

"Thank God!" said Louise, "all is comfortable in that respect, though you may very well believe that it was difficult enough at first; but we began by regulating the mouths according to the dishes. . . . Thank God, when people love one another, all does go right! I am happier than I deserve to be, with such a good, excellent husband, and such well-disposed children. If our little girl, our little Louise, had but lived! . . . . . Jacobi grieved as I have never seen a man grieve; but his happy temperament and his piety came to his help. She has now been dead above a year. Ah! never shall I forget my little girl!"

Louise's tears flowed abundantly; the sisters could not help weeping with her. But Louise soon collected herself again, and said, whilst she wiped her eyes, "Now we have also anxiety with little David's ancles; but there is no perfect happiness in this world, and we have no right to expect it. Pardon me that I have troubled you; and now let us speak of something else, whilst I get my things a little in order.

The sisters chat on, telling of old friends and relations; and the considerate Louise continues to describe the useful and appropriate gifts which she had brought for every one, servants included.

"Look at this dress, sisters—a present from my dear husband; is it not handsome? and then quite modern. Yes, yes, dear Gabriele, you need not make such an ambiguous face; it is very handsome, and quite in the fashion, that I can assure you." . . . "But tell me," continued Louise, "how will our 'great astonishment' go on? how have you arranged it?"

The Swedes seem as fond as the French are, or were, of scenes and pleasurable surprises. The Judge came in from his walk happy and warm.

"I must congratulate you," said he. "Louise, your boys please me entirely. They are animated boys, with intellects all alive—but at the same time, obedient and polite. Little David is a regular hair-brain, and a magnificent lad—what a pity it is that he will be lame!"

Louise crimsoned from heart-felt joy over the praise of her boys, and answered quickly to the lamentation over the little David, "You should hear, father, what a talent he has for the violoncello; he will be a second Gehrman."

"Nay, that is good," returned the Judge; "such a talent as that is worth his two feet."

The "Astonishment" was acted to admiration. The fence was joyously stormed by the Berserkers, and the piece of land taken possession of, on which the venerable Judge Frank had so long set his heart. Tears shone in the eyes of the family-father, but he spoke not. To see himself the object of so much love!—fatherly pride and joy, gratitude towards Heaven, towards his children, all united to fill his heart with the most exquisite sensations. Meanwhile—

Louise handed about white-sugar beer, which nobody praised more highly than herself. She found that it had something unearthly in it, something positively exalting; but when Gabriele, immediately after she had drank a half glass, gave a spring upwards, "our eldest" became terrified, for such a strong working of her effervescing white-beer she had by no means expected. Nevertheless she was soon surrounded by the eight, who cried altogether, "Mother, may I have some beer?" "And I too?" "And I?" "And I too?" "And I?" "And I?" "Send a deal of foam for me, mamma dear!"

"Nay, nay, nay, dear boys! people must not come clamouring and storming thus—you don't see that I or the father do so. Solomon must wait to the very last now. Patience is a good herb. There, you have it; now drink, but don't wet yourselves!" . . .

In the meantime the sun had set, and the cool kobolds of evening began to wander over the place, as the family, amid the most cheerful talk, arose in order to return to the house. As they went into the city, the ball on St. Mary's Church glimmered like fire in the last beams of the sun, and the moon ascended like a pale but gentle countenance over the roof of their house. There was a something in this appearance which made a sorrowful impression on Gabriele. The star of the Church tower glittered over the grave of her brother, and the look of the moon made her involuntarily think on the pale, mild countenance of her mother. For the rest, the evening was so lovely, the blackbird sang among the alders by the brook, and the heaven lay clear and brightly blue over the earth, whilst the wind and every disturbing sound became more and more hushed.

Gabriele walked on, full of thought, and did not observe that Baron L. had approached her.

The Baron and the lovely Gabriele, we doubt not, soon came to a proper understanding. He had been rather wild and foolish in his greener years; but all was right now.

They soon reached home. The mother stood with the silver ladle in her hand, and the most friendly smile on her lips, in the library, before a large steaming bowl of punch, and with look and voice bade the entering party welcome.

"My dear Elise," said the Judge, embracing her, "you are become twenty years younger."

"Happiness makes one young," answered she, looking on him affectionately.

People seated themselves.

"Don't make so much noise, children!" said Louise to her eight, seating herself with the little Elise on her knees. "Can't you seat yourselves without so much noise and bustle?"

Jeremias Munter had placed himself in a corner, and was quiet and seemed depressed.

Stillness pervaded the assembly; the glasses were filled, and the skäl began.

No. 1, which the Judge proposed, was "for the old friend, Jeremias Munter, on this last evening which he spends with us as our townsman—and may blessings follow him to his new home!" which was drunk with the warmest evidences of affection, and with tearful eyes.

This was the lover of Eva; and she had told her sisters that she had reflected deeply and seriously on what was best for her to do. Petrea had discovered that Munter, by his will, had left that estate to his "rose," to which he was now about to retire in sadness, feeling himself solitary in the world, and unbeloved. "We will all of us join in making his future home happy," was Eva's resolution; and she alone had the power to make old Munter happy. And so toast No. 1 was drank. No. 2 came next. Jacobi, the husband of Louise, spoke eloquently, for it was—

"For the parents; for their happiness and wellbeing," said he, with emotion, "through which I, and so many others as well as I, will be blessed!"

No. 3, was drunk to the prosperity of the new Pastor's family.

No. 4, for the new purchased land.

No. 5, for the old—ever-new Home.

No. 6, was "the health of all good children!" The eight seemed as if they could not return thanks enough.

Before long, the voice of Mother Louise was heard saying, "Nay, nay, children, you must not drink a drop more! What do you say, my little David? A thee-and-thou toast with Mr. Munter? No, thank you greatly, my dear fellow, you can propose that another time! You have drunk to-day toasts enough—more perhaps than your little heads can carry."

"I beg for the boys," said the Assessor in his most friendly voice; "I will propose a skäl, and they must drink it with me. Fill, yet once more, the glasses!—I propose a skäl for peace! peace in our country, and peace in our homes! A skäl for love and knowledge; which alone can make peace a blessing! A skäl, in one word, for—Peace upon Earth!"

"Amen! amen!" cried Jacobi, drank off his glass and threw it behind him. Louise looked at her mother somewhat astonished, but the mother followed Jacobi's example; she too was carried away.

"All glasses to the ground after this skäl!" cried the Judge, and sent his, cover and all, smashing on the floor. With an indescribable pleasure the little Jacobis threw their glasses up, and endeavoured to make the skäl for Peace as noisy and tumultuous as possible.

One can hardly wish Father Mathew in Sweden for some time to come. The mother glides away from this festal scene to seek repose, but where she might listen to the distant festal voices, while she pondered over the blessings and happiness of all those on earth that she loved. Her letter to her sister closes this beautiful fiction. She rejoiced particularly in the happiness of her husband, with children and grandchildren clustered around him.

He has reason to be joyful over them and proud; they stand all around him, good and excellent human beings; they thank him that existence has been given to them, and that they have learned its worth; they are satisfied with their lot. The lost, and again-found-one has come home, in order to begin a new life, and her charming child is quite established on the knees of the grandfather.

"I hear Gabriele's guitar accompanied by a song. I fancy now they dance. Louise's eight boys make the floor shake. Jacobi's voice is heard above all. The good, ever-young man! I also should be joyful, for all in my house is peaceful and well-arranged. And I am so; my heart is full of thankfulness, but my body is weary—very weary.

"The fir-trees on the grave wave and beckon me. I see their tops saluting me in the clear moonlight, and pointing upwards. Dost thou beckon me, my son? Dost thou call me to come home to thee? My first born, my summer-child! Let me whisper to thee that this is my secret wish. The earth was friendly towards me; friendly was my home; when thou wast gone, my favourite! I began to follow. Perhaps the day of my departure is at hand. I feel in myself as if I were able to go to rest. And might a really bright and beautiful moment be enjoyed by me before my last sleep, I would yet once more press my husband's hand to my lips, look around me on earth with a blessing, and upwards towards heaven with gratitude, and say as now, out of the depths of my heart, 'Thank God for the home here, and for the home there!'"

We have but little space left for the RAMBLES OF THE EMPEROR CHING TÏH IN KËAN NAN.* It is the translation, and apparently a good one, of a genuine Chinese romance, which tells the reader a great deal about the political institutions, customs, and usages of China. CHING TÏH comes to the throne at the age of sixteen; is seduced by intriguing courtiers and evil advisers, and degrades himself by the commission of imprudencies and follies, unbecoming so mighty a sovereign. Some of them do not seem of a very heinous kind, such as looking at wild beasts, exhibitions of singers and dancers, and so forth; but these things were opposed to imperial dignity, and courtly etiquette; and they, besides, occupied the young Emperor, and led him to neglect his main duty of giving audience to his subjects, hearing their complaints, and redressing their wrongs, and looking after his officials. But his eyes are at length opened. He has some wise and steady friends in the ancient councillors of the late Emperor, his father; and he sets forth incognito, somewhat like the Caliph Haroun Alraschid, to investigate the state of affairs in the provinces, to learn the cause of the insurrections that are taking place, and how those, to whom the administration of justice, and the well-being of the people were entrusted, discharged their duties; also, how the people were supplied with food—always an important concern to the Chinese government. These objects lead the Emperor through all manner of scenes and adventures among people of every rank. The reader, in an artless and indirect way, by this means acquires much knowledge of the peculiar manners, and social and political institutions of China; and of those forms and superstitions which constitute the prevailing religion of the empire. The young emperor, having reformed himself, quelled insurrections, taken back into favour his father's old councillors, punished the wicked by death or degradation from office, rewarded the good of all ranks, restored peace and plenty throughout his dominions, and in the provinces chosen a few beautiful maidens for wives, returns to his palace, and reigns supreme, a pattern of all the Chinese kingly virtues. No brief extract which we could give would convey to the reader any proper notion of this romance, which should be studied as a true picture of Chinese customs and opinions. It shows that, among the three hundred millions of the Celestial Empire, the Son of Heaven is supposed to have weighty and incessant duties to fulfil to his subjects.

THE AFFGHAN WAR—SIR A. BURNES—THE RETREAT AND CAPTIVITY.

THE amicable connivance of Sir Robert Peel and LordJohn Russell, of the Whig and the Tory chiefs, in baffling and resisting parliamentary inquiry into the causes and conduct of the Affghan war, both when demanded last year by Mr. Baillie, and again in the present session by Mr. Roebuck, renders it the duty of the Fourth Estate, as far as possible, to supply to the country the information withheld from the Third Estate. Parliament has abruptly closed the record; and the case now remains to be tried by the public. The maxim—Don't expose my weak side, and I will spare you next time—may be very convenient to the leaders of party governments; but it is not one which ought to satisfy any independent representative of the people,—and it does not satisfy the nation. It is true, that the Affghan war, with its profligate waste of blood, treasure, and national reputation, is past beyond recall; but other wars, alike foolish and unjust, may be rushed into; and if Affghanistan has not been converted into the promised bulwark of defence to our Indian empire, it may serve as a beacon. Besides, the stifling of this particular inquiry has been accompanied by some very ugly and suspicious circumstances. Not only has information been refused, but where it has been wrung forth, documents have been so shamefully garbled, as to be made to appear the reverse of what they really are. The truth has been warped and distorted, as well as suppressed. This has been especially the case with the Despatches of the lamented Sir A. Burnes, who, from first to last, disapproved of Lord Auckland's aggressive schemes, though he magnanimously sacrificed his personal feelings; and when opposition became fruitless, did his utmost to make the best for his country of that unhappy course of policy which his judgment disapproved. Even his personal partialities and sympathies appear to have been enlisted on the side of Dost Mahommed Khan; while he distrusted and, probably, despised Shah Soojah. His mission to Cabul, and long residence there, had enabled him to see and understand the character of the Dost; and his decided opinion was, that the popular sovereign of Affghanistan was the man whose friendship and alliance it was the policy of England to cultivate: and we may add, that honesty here coincided with sound policy. It must have been exceedingly irritating to Captain Burnes to find, not only that his opinions were scouted at Calcutta, but that his despatches were afterwards so garbled in Lord Palmerston's office, as to make him appear an advocate for what he had ever repudiated; namely, for the invasion of Affghanistan, and the setting up of Shah Soojah. Yet in Parliament, every party interested or implicated continues gravely to affirm, first, that Sir A. Burnes' despatches have not been tampered with in any way, or that if they have, then the omissions are quite unimportant. So say Lords Palmerston and John Russell; and Sir Robert Peel echoes that the "published papers were not garbled," but "gave such an account of the motives for undertaking the war as might enable Parliament to form a fair and unbiassed judgment." But what says Sir A. Burnes himself as to his share of this account of motives,—and he will surely be admitted to understand the meaning of his own Despatches. We now quote from his private and unpublished letters what he states in reference to the printed Parliamentary Papers on the affairs of Affghanistan:—

"6th November, 1839.—The exposition of the Governor-General's views in the Parliamentary Papers is pure trickery; and I have said so in every company since I have read them. I, however, acquit Lord Auckland of the fraud, and I am sometimes charitable enough to acquit the other authorities, and to believe that they had not read ere they printed. All my implorations to government to act with promptitude and decision, had reference to doing something when Dost Mahommed was king; and all this they have made to appear in support of Shah Soojah being set up! But again, I did advocate the setting up of Shah Soojah, and lent all my aid, name, and knowledge, to do it. But when was this? When all my advice had been rejected, and the government were fairly stranded. I first gave my opinion, and I then asked leave to withdraw; but Lord A. [Auckland] proved to me that it would be desertion at a critical moment, and I saw so myself; but I entered upon the support of his policy not as what was best, but what was best under the circumstances which a series of blunders had produced."

We have the means, and shall deem it a bounden duty to investigate this affair; a duty which is owing alike to the memory of this distinguished victim of the policy which he strongly disapproved, and to the public interests prospectively, if not retrospectively. Fortunately for his own reputation, and for the cause of justice, Sir A. Burnes, knowing the ticklish ground on which he stood with the government, or Bureaucracy of Calcutta, took the precaution to lodge authenticated copies of his Despatches in safe hands in India; while his private letters safely reached his friends at home. They afford a cue to his feelings and opinions, and a valuable commentary on his public documents. The above extract is from a letter of November 1839; but, two years later, and not long before the insurrection at Cabul burst forth, we find its first victim so far from being free from all apprehension,—as is generally alleged by those unacquainted with what was passing behind the curtain,—expressing himself, in his private correspondence, in the following terms:—"Cabul, 12th April, 1841. I keep things quiet here, certainly; but in this country we have done nothing, as you will see by a new paper I have drawn up, though I am sorely disheartened in doing anything, by the inattention of all."—"Cabul, July 1841. I think you overlook that my papers and notes are not to recommend what is best, but what is to be done under the abominable circumstances we have placed ourselves in. If they had listened to reason, the ex-chief of Cabul [Dost Mohammed] might have been converted into a valuable ally," &c., &c. And this was the man whose judgment, from his great knowledge of Indian affairs and interests, and the observations made during a lengthened residence in Affghanistan as a political agent, was held to sanction the invasion of that country, and the dethronement of the Dost, to set up Shah Soojah!

But though this is become, as regards the public interests in public servants discharging their duties efficiently and honestly, by far the most important part of the history of the Affghan war, we must, as we have commenced with it, conclude the account of the retreat, the destruction of the army, and the subsequent captivity of the ladies and the officers that were saved, before going further into the evidence afforded us by the unpublished private correspondence of Sir A. Burnes, and the suppressed passages of his official Despatches. Before we are done with these documents, the public will be enabled to judge how far the affirmations and denials of the Whig and Tory leaders in Parliament are well grounded, and whether the Despatches in question have not been garbled and perverted by studied suppressions and omissions. In the meanwhile, we may notice, that the idea conveyed by the Journals of Lady Sale and Lieutenant Eyre,—that Sir A. Burnes was lulled into unwise security, up to the moment that the insurrection broke forth in headlong force, appears a complete misconception. From his private communications, he appears to have been fully aware of the dangers by which the invading army was surrounded. When all were exulting in the surrender of the Dost, in the end of 1840, he writes: "The surrender of the Dost has made this country as quiet as Vesuvius after an eruption. How long this will last, it is impossible to say. . . . In my position, Government have a right to my support; and when I cannot give it, to my silence: they have in consequence far more of the latter than the former. Did I choose, I could a tale unfold that would make men stare. But I am silent. I see the wish to do good; but I see utter ignorance of affairs, for which abilities, however surpassing, can never make up; and we have no Wellesleys in these times."

These may serve as samples; and now we return to our proper business in the present article, reserving this discussion till next month.

We left off last month describing the un-British spirit and unsoldierlike conduct of the troops at Cabul; which anomaly in the service may be fairly attributed to the incapacity, and want of decision, which distinguished the whole of those in command, whether civil or military. Nor were the Affghans, as soldiers, contemptible foes. Their want of discipline, in the irregular and annoying warfare waged against the invaders, was fully made up by a fierce spirit of bravery, the enthusiasm inspired by what they felt to be a good cause, and also the baser motives of hatred and thirst for plunder.

The sudden cry of, Cavalry, latterly, always spread dismay among our troops; and not without cause. The Affghan horsemen, as irregulars, seem, indeed, the finest troops in the world. They remind one of the centaur-mountaineers of Circassia. Their martial appearance excited the warm admiration of many of our officers. Of the Affghan horsemen, one, who should be a judge of mounted soldiers—Troop Sergeant-Major Taylor—remarks,

These Affghan horsemen were a fine athletic set of men, and capitally mounted; their breed of cattle being much superior to ours, and exhibiting proofs of the most careful grooming. The riders wore coats of mail with steel gauntlets, and their arms consisted of a sabre, heavier and longer than ours, a dagger, and, in some instances, shields and matchlocks. I have no hesitation in saying, that the Affghan Cavalry, if these were a fair sample of them, are a most effective body of men. They may not be equal to ours in the field; but for a harassing system of mountain warfare, where they are required to make sudden descents upon Infantry, hemmed in between defiles, and embarrassed by ignorance of the country, no body of troops can be better adapted. Their horses are light-limbed, but strong and wiry, and capable of undergoing incredible fatigue; while the trooper himself, practised from infancy in the management of the animal, can ride him over places where no European horseman would venture. Had these wild mountaineers but the advantages of discipline, and proper organisation, their country would be inaccessible to any troops in the world.

The celerity with which troops are raised is quite astonishing to us; who are accustomed to see recruits drilled for a length of time. Here, every man is born a soldier; every child has his knife,—that weapon which has proved so destructive in the hands of a hostile peasantry, incited against us by the moollahs, who threaten eternal perdition to all who do not join in the cause of the Ghazeeas; whilst heaven, filled with Houris, is the recompense for every man who falls in a religious war. With them, the only expense attending the soldier consists in his pay, which is scanty; his horse, if he have one, is his own; and every Affghan is armed completely with some three or four of these knives, of different sizes.

In the same page, where we find this description of the Affghan cavalry, which was given while the author was at Candahar, we find another paragraph which, though somewhat out of place, as relating to past events, we cannot resist:—

Several of the Affghan chiefs, who were known to be devoted to the interests of Dost Mahommed, becoming alarmed at the turn affairs were taking, or, as some said, being dissatisfied with that prince for refusing to guarantee the safety of their women, now came into camp and tendered their allegiance to Shah Soojah. These reluctant auxiliaries were warmly received by the Politicals, who hailed their adhesion as an omen of the success of the expedition; and I observed Sir Alexander Burnes carry his joy so far as cordially to embrace one of them. The chief smiled grimly, but said but little. I had an opportunity, however, of ascertaining his real feelings, on getting amongst his followers a few days afterwards. They openly expressed their regret at being compelled to join the invaders of their country, and stated, that they could not have a braver leader, or a better prince, than Dost Mahommed. They described him as being of a just and generous nature, whilst they represented the Shah as being cruel and unprincipled.

During the siege in the cantonments, and the retreat from Cabul, the native troops in our service often behaved with more gallantry and devotedness than the Europeans; though the Sepoys upon some occasions did follow the bad example of their white comrades-in-arms. In one instance an important garrison, held by Europeans, was replaced by Indian troops, as no confidence could be placed in the former. The following disgraceful passage occurs in Lieutenant Eyre's Journal:—

December 7th.—The European garrison was this day withdrawn from the bazaar, and a company of the 37th N. I. substituted in their room! This, being the weakest point of our defences, had hitherto been protected entirely by parties of H. M.'s 44th, which post of honour they were now considered unworthy to retain. . . In the course of this narrative, I have been compelled by stern truth to note down facts nearly affecting the honour and interests of a British regiment.

There was recrimination among the differently-coloured corps of the force, each accusing the other of having been the first to give way. But on this subject the Court of Inquiry which was held kept a prudent silence. Nay, the very Affghan ponies, employed by the British were liable to be seized with panic; and, when exposed to the galling fire of their countrymen, they would cast off their burdens, and rush to the front for safety!

The Scottish Borderers were never more adroit horse and cattle stealers than the Affghans showed themselves in the passes and mountain ranges both in the advance and retreat; and they were often clever enough, after stealing the animals, to sell them back again to the original owners at a high rate. But, to resume our narrative, though, in the pathetic words of Lieutenant Eyre, it does "become a weary task to relate a catalogue of errors, disasters, and difficulties, which, following upon each other, disgusted our officers, disheartened our soldiers, and finally sunk us all in irretrievable ruin; as though Heaven itself, by a combination of evil circumstances, for its own inscrutable purposes, had planned our downfall."

The sojourners in the cantonments were, by the beginning of December, reduced to great distress from the failure of provisions and the many mouths to be fed; for, though the force numbered only about 5000, it was encumbered with the curse of all eastern armies—camp-followers to the amount of 12,000, besides numerous women and children. This was a fertile source of ruin, first and last. We hear of one regiment, the 37th, which had 5000 registered camp-followers. But for these encumbrances, the dreadful scenes of havoc on the retreat never would have occurred to nearly the same extent: for the regular troops could have made forced marches and saved themselves. Lady Sale makes this extraordinary statement:—

Added to these trying circumstances, the garrison [Ghoorkas,] were encumbered with their wives and children, who had been encouraged to come up from Hindostan in great numbers. It is affirmed that they did so by permission of Lord Auckland; it being supposed that they would have no wish to quit the country with their families settled along with them.

His lordship surely took Time by the forelock. By the middle of November the camels in the cantonments were fast dying for want of forage; and by the beginning of December, we learn,

A committee is ordered to assemble to-morrow to value all useless horses in the Bazaar, which are to be destroyed; so there will be plenty of cheap meat, as tattoos and camels have for some time past been eaten: even some of the gentlemen ate camel's flesh, particularly the heart, which was esteemed equal to that of the bullock. I never was tempted by these choice viands; so cannot offer an opinion regarding them.

The garrison at the Bala Hissar were equally destitute of provisions, as they had to send part of what remained to the famished people in the cantonments. Lady Sale makes no personal complaint, but she often expresses deep commiseration for the troops; harassed with incessant duty, and starving of cold as well as hunger, for fuel was as scarce as food. While Captain Sturt had a bottle of brandy remaining, he dealt to those about him a glass daily. Sometimes trifling supplies were smuggled into the officers' families, from their former friends in the city. When small quantities of flour were brought in, the competition to obtain it was hot, and the price exorbitant. The horses and cattle were, for some time, preserved by eating the bark and tender branches of the fruit and other trees in the gardens. One day Lady Sale was gravely told that the artillery horses had eaten the trunnion of a gun! and she saw her own riding-horse gnawing voraciously at a cart wheel. The garrison was, in short, starving, and the enemy knew it; and felt that, one way or other, the game was in their own hands. The Moollahs, or priests, at this time, went round all the villages, and laid the people under ban not to assist the infidel invaders with food, at any price. The General had often, before this time, begged the Envoy to negotiate; and new treaties were discussed every other day: the conditions varying with the military aspect of affairs: the demands of the chiefs rising in proportion to the distress of the British. But, in their first demands, the chiefs probably laid excessive damages, that they might afterwards afford some abatement. The Affghans gained time by these fruitless conferences, while the difficulties of the British accumulated, whether the negotiations proceeded or went off. By the 27th November, we learn,

The negotiations are now come quite to a close. The enemy's demands were modest, considering that they were the first to treat, it is said. They require, in addition to giving up the king and his family into their hands, all our guns and ammunition, muskets, bayonets, pistols, and swords. The married men, women, and children, to be given as hostages; and then—we are to trust to their generosity! To this the Envoy sent a chivalrous reply,—That death was preferable to dishonour,—that we put our trust in the God of battles, and in His name bade them come on.

The king is in an awful state of alarm; for he has been told that we have been making terms for our free exit out of the country, paying for the same five lakhs of rupees; and leaving him to his fate, poor man! He is certainly to be pitied, (if not at the bottom of it all,) fallen from his high estate, and believing us to have abandoned him.

Jan Fishan Khan is the only chief who stands by him; and he has had his forts and property destroyed: his wives and children, he hopes, may have been saved by some of his neighbours; but, as yet, he only knows the fate of one young boy, who was burnt alive. He had one wife with him in Cabul when the insurrection broke out, and urged her to fly to Pughman for safety; the old chief told me her reply was worth a lakh of rupees, "I will not leave you: if you fall, we die together; and if you are victorious, we will rejoice together!" . . . . .

29*th*.—The horses are hard up for grain: those for the artillery have not been much looked after since Lieut. Waller was wounded; and one of them is averred to have eaten his comrade's tail! That he bit it off there is no doubt. . . . . .

30*th*.—Amongst other political barometers, the manner in which persons are spoken of indicates whether affairs are going on well or ill: just now, things are looking up again. A few days ago people spoke of "The Macnaghtens;" then they became again "Sir William and my Lady;" and to-day they have left their refuge in a tent in cantonments, and are gone into the great house again, which they think will have a good effect, and tend to quiet people's minds.

The Politicals are again very mysterious, and deny that any negotiations are going on, &c.; but letters come in constantly; and we know they are treating with the Ghiljyes. . . . . .

Treaty is certainly going on; and we think that the confederacy may be breaking up. Humza Khan of Téreen is said to be sending his women away from Cabul, and many have been seen mounted on yaboos going away on the road leading to Bhoodkhak. 1*st December*.—Mohun Lull writes that the enemy will show in force to-day, and attack us to-morrow. The firing we heard in the night was an attack on the patrol, who got in safe. . . . . .

The plan proposed for the capture of cantonments by the enemy, is, to send 200 bildars in front to cut down the ramparts; next come the infantry, and then the horse. I suppose we are to stand still and look on. . . .

6*th*.—The General, unsettled in his purposes, delegates his power to the Brigadier, and the Brigadier tries to throw off all responsibility on the General's or anybody's shoulders except his own: and the General is, as in the present instance, too gentlemanlike to tell him that he deviates a little from the exact line, and thus takes on himself the evasion. Sturt came home quite disgusted; vowing that if those dear to him were not in cantonments, they might blow them up for what he cared.

On the 11th December, Sir William Macnaghten had a conference with the assembled chiefs, in a plain that could be seen from the cantonments; the General having previously formally intimated to him that, in the present condition of the troops for want of provisions, no time ought to be lost in entering into negotiations for a safe retreat from the country. The support of the authority of Shah Soojah was, by this time, thrown completely out of view by his allies, though they were willing to carry him back with them, and thus ensure his personal safety. Lieutenant Eyre gives a circumstantial account of what passed at this conference on the open plain. The terms were, that the British should evacuate Affghanistan, including every station within the country; that Dost Mahommed and his family should be set at liberty and allowed to return home, and also every other Affghan in exile for political offences; and that no British force should ever again enter Affghanistan, unless called for by the Affghan government; and, finally, that between the countries a permanent friendship should be established. On the other hand, the British were not only to be permitted to return to India unmolested, but they were, on paying for them, to be furnished with the necessary supplies, and hostages were to accompany their march. Shah Soojah was to be at liberty either to follow the British or remain at Cabul the pensioner of the Affghan government. Lieutenant Eyre relates:—

To all these terms the chiefs cordially agreed, with the exception of Mahommed Akbar, who cavilled at several, especially that of the amnesty, but was overruled by his coadjutors. He positively refused to permit the garrison to be supplied with provisions until it had quitted cantonments, which movement he clamorously demanded should take place the following morning. His violence caused some confusion; but the more temperate of his party having interfered, it was finally agreed that our evacuation of the cantonments should take place in three days—that provisions should be supplied—and that to all the above-mentioned articles of this new treaty a formal assent in writing should be sent, with all the usual forms of a restored peace. The chiefs, on returning to the city, took with them Captain Trevor as a hostage for the sincerity of the Envoy.

Even while this conference was being held, the Affghan troops occupied the field in a very tumultuary manner; and strong apprehensions of treachery were felt in the garrison, and of the danger to which the Envoy was exposed. We do not learn how Lieutenant Eyre came to know that it had been the intention of Mahommed Akbar Khan to seize the Envoy's person at this meeting, and that he was with difficulty restrained by the other Khans; but the Lieutenant states the fact, and pays the compliment to the memory of Sir William Macnaghten, "that no sense of personal danger could have deterred him from the performance of his duty." The day after this treaty (which was not yet formally signed) had been agreed on, and Captain Trevor given up as a hostage for the performance of its stipulations, Lieutenant Eyre writes:—

December 12*th*.—It is undeniable that Sir William Macnaghten was forced into this treaty with men whose power he despised, and whose treachery was proverbial, against his own judgment, by the pressing representations of our military heads. . . . . .

The terms of the new treaty were immediately made known to Shah Soojah, by which that unfortunate monarch found himself once more doomed to an old age of exile and degradation. The first step towards its fulfilment was the withdrawal of our troops from the Bala Hissar, which was to have taken place this very day, but was postponed for a short time longer, to admit of the necessary preparations being made. A deputation of chiefs had an interview in the close of the day, who were the bearers of a most unexpected proposition, to the effect that Shah Soojah should continue king, on condition of intermarrying his daughters with the leading Affghan chiefs, and abandoning the offensive practice of keeping the chief nobles of his kingdom waiting for hours at his gate, in expectation of audience. The Affghans hate ceremony, which Shah Soojah carried at all times to an absurd extent; hence much of his unpopularity. . . . . .

December 13*th*.—Such was the inveterate pride of the king, that he yielded a most reluctant consent to the above-mentioned proposals, notwithstanding that the only alternative was the instant resignation of his kingdom. Little confidence was, however, placed by the Envoy in the sincerity of the chiefs, whose hatred of the Doranee ruler was notorious.

Continual disputes and misunderstandings were still arising between the parties negotiating. The Affghans had the British in their power; and it was hardly to be expected that they should make the most generous use of their dear-bought triumph. Many delays occurred in furnishing the carriage necessary on the retreat; and there were strong suspicions of meditated treachery. We have seen that the Envoy, whose life had been a burthen to him for weeks past, was deeply galled by the humiliating terms of the capitulation; for such, in fact, it was. What a blow to the hopes cherished from the invasion of Affghanistan by the government at Calcutta, which hopes he had himself encouraged! In an evil hour he forgot what he owed to himself as an honourable and fair-dealing man, and what to the reputation of his country for good faith. He fondly imagined that he might bribe, buy off, or out-manœuvre Mahommed Akbar; sow dissension among the leagued chiefs; and, by a sudden revolution, retrieve the cause to which he was pledged and also his own reputation. He fell into the snare laid for him, or rather the plan devised by Akbar to test his fidelity to the provisions of the treaty. He failed in integrity, and sealed his own ruin; while he farther exasperated the Affghan chiefs against the British. We may imagine how the proud and fierce Mahommed Akbar must have despised the man who tried to conciliate and corrupt him with bribes and gifts, though he, nevertheless, accepted of them. Lady Macnaghten's carriage and horses were sent to him; and a splendid Arabian horse belonging to one of the officers, for which he took a fancy, the Envoy bought for him at an extravagant price. Every other thing which could mollify and gain him appears to have been tried. We cite from Lieutenant Eyre's narrative the relation of what is, perhaps, the most painful event of the whole war, as it was brought about by an unhappy and fatal policy, for which no honourable man dare hold up his face. On the 21st, the Envoy met Mahommed Akbar and another chief to arrange some details of the treaty, and to fix upon hostages for its due performance. It was at this time that he was loading Akbar with gifts; and, on the night of the 22d, this chief, with the connivance of some of the other leaders, laid the snare, from which the broad principles of common probity should have preserved any man of the most ordinary capacity.

Captain Skinner, at this time living under Mahommed Akbar's protection, was made the bearer of proposals to the Envoy, of so advantageous a nature, as to prove, in his forlorn circumstances, irresistibly tempting.

Amenoollah Khan, the most influential of the rebels, was to be seized on the following day, and delivered up to us as a prisoner.* Mahommed Khan's fort was to be immediately occupied by one of our regiments, and the Bala Hissar by another. Shah Soojah was to continue king; Mahommed Akbar was to become his wuzeer, and our troops were to remain in their present position until the following spring.—That a scheme like this, bearing impracticability on its very face, should have for a moment deceived a man of Sir William's usual intelligence and penetration, is indeed an extraordinary instance of infatuation, that can only be accounted for on the principle that a drowning man will catch at a straw. . . . . A treaty formed with men famed for falsehood and treachery, and who had already shown an utter disregard of some of its most important stipulations, could be regarded as little better than so much waste paper.

If not speaking as the apologist of the Envoy, but in his own person, Lieutenant Eyre falls here into the very error of Sir William Macnaghten. He proceeds:—

On either hand there was danger; and, miserable as Sir William's life had been for the past six weeks, he was willing to stake his all on the issue of a plan which seemed to offer a faint hope of recovering the ground we had lost.

In a fatal hour he signed his name to a paper consenting to the arrangement.—His doom was sealed.—The whole was a scheme got up by the chiefs, to test his sincerity.

Next day the Envoy took measures for the success of this grand coup d'etat, by calling on the General to have two regiments and two guns in readiness for a secret service; and directed that, as the interview he was about to have with the chiefs that day was of a delicate nature, the garrison had as well be kept on the alert. In riding from the cantonments, Sir William expressed his disappointment at the paucity of men on the ramparts, and the inertness of the garrison, saying, "However, it is all of a piece with the military arrangements throughout the siege." He now, for the first time, took the officers who rode out along with him and his small body-guard into his confidence; and one of them, Captain Lawrence, was warned to be in readiness to gallop to the Bala Hissar, to prepare the king for what was to follow.

Apprehensions being expressed of the danger to which the scheme might expose him, in case of treachery on the part of Mahommed Akbar, he replied "Dangerous it is; but if it succeeds, it is worth all risks: the rebels have not fulfilled even one article of the treaty, and I have no confidence in them; and if by it we can only save our honour, all will be well. At any rate, I would rather suffer a hundred deaths, than live the last six weeks over again."

Throughout the whole affair the doomed Envoy appeared in that state of extraordinary mental excitement, hurry, and perturbation, which the Scotch call being fey,—a preternatural condition, which is believed to precede a violent or unusual death.

That Sir William Macnaghten met his death at the hands of Mahommed Akbar himself there can be no reasonable doubt. That chief had pledged himself to his coadjutors to seize the Envoy that day, and bring him into the city, when the chiefs hoped to have been able to dictate their own terms, retaining him as a hostage for their fulfilment. Finding it impossible, from the strenuous resistance Sir William offered, to carry him off alive, and yet determined not to disappoint the public expectation altogether,—influenced also by his tiger passions, and the remembrance of his father's wrongs,—Mahommed Akbar drew a pistol, the Envoy's own gift a few hours before, and shot him through the body, which was immediately hacked to pieces by the ferocious Ghazeeas, by whom the dismembered trunk was afterwards carried to the city, and publicly exposed in the Char Chouk, or principal mart. The head was taken to the house of Nuwab Zeman Khan, where it was triumphantly exhibited to Capt. Conolly.

Captain Trevor, who, unfortunately, happened to stumble, was also instantly cut down. Captains Lawrence and Mackenzie escaped, by being protected from the violence of the ferocious Ghazeeas by the Giljye chiefs. Ameenoollah Khan, the chief who was to have been betrayed, gave vent to a torrent of angry abuse against these officers, and even threatened to blow them from a gun. One redeeming trait is found in this sad recital:—

It is deserving of notice, that, amidst the congratulations which on all sides met the ear of Mahommed Shah Khan on the events of the day, the solitary voice of an aged Moollah was raised in condemnation of the deed, which he solemnly pronounced to be "foul," and calculated to cast a lasting disgrace on the religion of Mahommed.

* As this sheet goes through the press, we have seen, from the Calcutta Star of the 8th of April last, an Affghan account of the murder of the Envoy, written at the time. It confirms in substance the details given by Lieutenant Eyre, save that the son of Amenoollah Khan, and not that chief himself, was to be given up, and that the assassination took place in the evening.

The account given by Captain Mackenzie of this affair, presses even more severely upon the unhappy Envoy, caught in the snare in which he fondly fancied he had coiled those who outwitted him.

Beset by this disgraceful imbecility on the one hand, and by systematic treachery on the other, the unfortunate Envoy was driven to his wits' end, and, as will be seen, forgot, in a fatal moment, the wholesome rule which he had heretofore laid down for himself, of refusing to hold communication with individuals of the rebel party. . . . . Late in the evening of the 22d December, Captain James Skinner, who, after having been concealed in Cabul during the greater part of the siege, had latterly been the guest of Mahommed Akbar, arrived in cantonments, accompanied by Mahommed Sudeeq Khan, a first cousin of Mahommed Akbar, and by Sirwar Khan, the Arbanee merchant, who, in the beginning of the campaign, had furnished the army with camels, and who had been much in the confidence of Sir A. Burnes; being, in fact, one of our stanchest friends. The two latter remained in a different apartment, while Skinner dined with the Envoy. During dinner, Skinner jestingly remarked that he felt as if laden with combustibles, being charged with a message from Mahommed Akbar to the Envoy of a most portentous nature.

Even then I remarked that the Envoy's eye glanced eagerly towards Skinner with an expression of hope. In fact, he was like a drowning man catching at straws. Skinner however referred him to his Affghan companions, and after dinner the four retired into a room by themselves. My knowledge of what there took place is gained from poor Skinner's own relation, as given during my subsequent captivity with him in Akbar's house. Mahommed Sudeeq disclosed Mahommed Akbar's proposition to the Envoy, which was, that the following day Sir William should meet him (Mahommed Akbar) and a few of his immediate friends, viz. the chiefs of the Eastern Giljyes, outside the cantonments, when a final agreement should be made, so as to be fully understood by both parties; that Sir William should have a considerable body of troops in readiness, which, on a given signal, were to join with those of Mahommed Akbar and the Giljyes, assault and take Mahmood Khan's fort, and secure the person of Ameenoollah. At this stage of the proposition Mahommed Sudeeq signified that, for a certain sum of money, the head of Ameenoollah should be presented to the Envoy; but from this Sir William shrunk with abhorrence, declaring that it was neither his custom nor that of his country to give a price for blood. Mahommed Sudeeq then went on to say, that, after having subdued the rest of the Khans, the English should be permitted to remain in the country eight months longer, so as to save their purdah (veil, or credit,) but that they were then to evacuate Affghanistan, as if of their own accord; that Shah Soojah was to continue king of the country, and that Mahommed Akbar was to be his wuzeer. As a further reward for his (Mahommed Akbar's) assistance, the British Government were to pay him 30 lacs of rupees, and 4 lacs of rupees per annum during his life! To this extraordinary and wild proposal, Sir William gave ear with an eagerness which nothing can account for but the supposition, confirmed by many other circumstances, that his strong mind had been harassed, until it had in some degree lost its equipoise; and he not only assented fully to these terms, but actually gave a Persian paper to that effect, written in his own hand, declaring, as his motives, that it was not only an excellent opportunity to carry into effect the real wishes of government, which were to evacuate the country with as much credit to ourselves as possible, but that it would give England time to enter into a treaty with Russia, defining the bounds beyond which neither were to pass in Central Asia. So ended this fatal conference, the nature and result of which, contrary to his usual custom, Sir William communicated to none of those who, on all former occasions, were fully in his confidence, viz. Trevor, Lawrence, and myself. It seemed as if he feared that we might insist on the impracticability of the plan, which he must have studiously concealed from himself. All the following morning his manner was distracted and hurried in a way that none of us had ever before witnessed. It seems that Mahommed Akbar had demanded a favourite Arab horse, belonging to Captain Grant, Assist-Adj.-General of the force. To avoid the necessity of parting with the animal, Captain Grant had fixed his price at the exorbitant sum of 5000 rupees. Unwilling to give so large a price, but determined to gratify the Sirdar, Sir William sent me to Captain Grant to prevail upon him to take a smaller sum, but with orders that if he were peremptory, the 5000 rupees should be given. I obtained the horse for 3000 rupees, and Sir William appeared much pleased with the prospect of gratifying Mahommed Akbar by the present.

After breakfast, Trevor, Lawrence, and myself were summoned to attend the Envoy during his conference with Mahommed Akbar Khan. I found him alone, when, for the first time, he disclosed to me the nature of the transaction he was engaged in. I immediately warned him that it was a plot against him. He replied, hastily, "A plot! let me alone for that; trust me for that!"

We need not a second time go over the catastrophe. Mackenzie had himself a very narrow escape, as we have in part seen; and certainly owed his life to the Giljye chiefs, who, at their personal risk, defended him. There were generous feelings at this period, even among Affghans. Lieutenant Eyre, though he denounces Mahommed Akbar almost as stoutly as Lady Sale, who would have him and his father-in-law hung without benefit of clergy, yet quotes Captain Mackenzie's confession.

I must do Mahommed Akbar the justice to say, that, finding the Ghazeeas bent on my slaughter, even after I had reached his stirrup, he drew his sword and laid about him right manfully; for my conductor, and Meerza Bàoodeen Khan, were obliged to press me up against the wall, covering me with their own bodies, and protesting that no blow should reach me, but through their persons.

Pride, however, overcame Mahommed Akbar's sense of courtesy, when he thought I was safe, for he then turned round to me, and repeatedly said, in a tone of triumphant derision, "Shuma moolk-i-ma me geered!" (You'll seize my country, will you!) He then rode off, and I was hurried towards the gate of the fort.

After encountering other deadly perils, from which he was rescued by the chiefs, one of whom was wounded in his defence, he and Captain Lawrence were, at midnight, taken for safety to the dwelling of the now triumphant Akbar. It is a characteristic trait, and one worthy of the Highlands two centuries ago, that those who defended these gentlemen's lives at the hazard of their own, in that same hour plundered them of their watches. We cannot forbear quoting another sentence of Captain Mackenzie's letter:

Reaching Mahommed Akbar's abode, we were shown into the room where he lay in bed. He received us with great outward show of courtesy, assuring us of the welfare of the Envoy and Trevor, but there was a constraint in his manner for which I could not account. We were shortly taken to another apartment, where we found Skinner, who had returned, being on parole, early in the morning. Doubt and gloom marked our meeting, and the latter was fearfully deepened by the intelligence which we now received from our fellow-captive of the base murder of Sir William and Trevor. He informed us that the head of the former had been carried about the city in triumph. We of course spent a miserable night. The next day we were taken, under a strong guard, to the house of Zeman Khan, where a council of the Khans was being held. Here we found Captains Conolly and Airey, who had some days previously been sent to the hurwah's house as hostages for the performance of certain parts of the treaty which was to have been entered into. A violent discussion took place, in which Mahommed Akbar bore the most prominent part.

We were vehemently accused of treachery, and everything that was bad, and told that the whole of the transactions of the night previous had been a trick of Mahommed Akbar and Ameenoollah, to ascertain the Envoy's sincerity. They declared that they would now grant us no terms, save on the surrender of the whole of the married families as hostages, all the guns, ammunition, and treasure.

Whether from shame or policy, for we imagine remorse had no place in his feelings, Akbar was then, and has always been, unwilling to confess that, in a sudden outburst of rage, he shot the Envoy with his own hands. Yet the fact seems beyond question, though the crime was evidently unpremeditated. During the time that the two officers were sheltered in Akbar's house, some of the Affghan gentlemen, who came to visit them, asserted that the Envoy had been murdered by the unruly soldiery; while others did not affect to deny that crime, which to Mahommed Akbar was passing the Rubicon.

In those days when the mutual treachery, or plotting and counter-plotting, was concerting and ripening, Lady Sale, unconscious of what was going forward, and pursuing the even tenor of her way, set down in her Journal:—

22*d*.—The wagons, ammunition, &c., given up to our "allies."

Lady Macnaghten's carriage and horses given to Mahommed Akbar Khan. . . . . .

The Envoy, in taking the part of Mahommed Akbar Khan, and in giving him money, has given him the means of doing much harm. Before he received money from us he had no power, and was not a person of any consequence; now he is in force, with the disadvantage of possessing a very bad disposition. . . . . .

Captain Skinner came in at eleven last night with two Affghans; one, I believe, was a half brother of Mahommed Akbar, by name Sultan Khan. At one this morning they returned to the city on important business. Moussa Khan was also sent into the city early this morning on some affair connected with negotiations.

The 54th, Shah's 6th, and some guns, are ordered for a secret service; which the staff officer who gave the order, said was to attack Mahmood Khan's fort, and from thence to bring away Ameenoollah Khan, dead or alive.

I remarked that Lawrence styled the chiefs rebels instead of allies; which, coupled with the order to the commissariat officer to lay in provisions, looked very suspicious.

About two o'clock we suddenly heard firing, and all went to the rear gate to see what the matter was; when I met Mr. Waller, who informed me that the Envoy had been taken away by the chiefs.

The reader is already aware that Skinner, on this day, came charged with the fatal message of Mahommed Akbar, and also for what secret service the two regiments were ordered out. Great anxiety prevailed all that day in the cantonments about the issue of the conference, and latterly for the fate of the Envoy, and also of the hostages in the city. Lady Sale concludes—

There is a general opinion in cantonments that faith has been broken on both sides, and that the Affghans have made the cleverest chupao. . . . . .

The plain was at one time covered with people; but the horsemen seemed wending up and down trying to quiet them, and they gradually dispersed.

There was a great crowd about a body, which the Affghans were seen to strip: it was evidently that of an European; but, strange to say, no endeavour was made to recover it, which might easily have been done by sending out cavalry. . . . . .

24*th*.—I received a note from Lawrence, enclosing one from Conolly (Sir William's nephew) to Lady Macnaghten, and had the sad office imposed on me of informing both her and Mrs. Trevor of their husbands' assassination.

Lady Sale thinks that the Envoy was quite justifiable in his crooked diplomacy, and only erred in supposing that Akbar Khan, "proverbially the most treacherous of all his countrymen, could be sincere."

The murder of the Envoy brought Major Pottinger, by the appointment of the General, to the head of the diplomatic department; and the original treaty was once more presented and discussed, but with new exactions. And now it was alleged that no faith could be placed in the words of the British, and the perfidy of the Envoy was loudly condemned.

It is a bitter chapter that, which Lieutenant Eyre has headed, "How we avenged him!" The military leaders showed on this occasion, it must be owned, a most quaker-like meekness and peacefulness of disposition:—

Although it was evident that our Envoy had been basely entrapped, if not actually murdered, before our very gate, and though even now crowds of Affghans, horse and foot, were seen passing and repassing to and fro in hostile array, between Mahommed's fort and the place of meeting, not a gun was opened upon them; not a soldier was stirred from his post; no sortie was apparently even thought of; treachery was allowed to triumph in open day; the murder of a British Envoy was perpetrated in the face and within musket-shot of a British army; and not only was no effort made to avenge the dastardly deed, but the body was left lying on the plain to be mangled and insulted, and finally carried off to be paraded in the public market by a ruffianly mob of fanatical barbarians.

The most dismal Christmas that was ever passed by British soldiers in a strange land, was next day spent in the cantonments. "25th December," says Lady Sale,—"A dismal day, and our situation far from cheering." Three additional hard clauses are stated by her as having been added to the treaty: viz, that all the treasure should be left, and all the guns, excepting six, and, instead of the present hostages, the married men with families.

General Elphinstone said he might give the officers as hostages; but that their wives and families were not public property: and, unless their husbands consented, he could not send them.

Major Thain was accordingly sent round to ask all the married officers if they would consent to their wives staying; offering those who did so a salary of 2000 rupees a-month. Lieutenant Eyre said, if it was to be productive of great good, he would stay with his wife and child. The others all refused to risk the safety of their families. Captain Anderson said he would rather put a pistol to his wife's head and shoot her; and Sturt, that his wife and mother should only be taken at the point of the bayonet: for himself, he was ready to perform any duty imposed on him.

And yet captivity, to Akbar Khan, became the final, and only resort of these ladies, and their only chance of safety—their last blessing. Some of the other officers, besides Lieutenant Eyre, were willing to remain with their wives and children as hostages, and were to have a handsome allowance, while others resented the proposal as the deepest insult—as something affecting their personal honour; and declared that they would rather die than surrender the ladies and children belonging to them. The floating rumours in the cantonments were now of a complexion that justified the most extreme apprehensions, though, throughout the whole war and period of captivity, no insult was offered to any woman of whatever rank. Indeed they were well-treated, even by the acknowledgment of Lady Sale. During the captivity, one woman, a half-caste, and the wife of a British sergeant, chose to become a Mahommedan, and change her English husband for an Affghan; but this was Mrs. Wade's own taste. A natural consequence of her bad conduct was extreme spite to her forsaken husband, whom she annoyed in every way possible, and to the rest of the prisoners.

While the treaty with the chiefs was still under discussion, Lady Sale prophetically says, "Whether we go by treaty or not, I fear but few of us will ever live to reach the provinces."

29th.—Mackenzie and Skinner came in, in handsome dresses presented to them by Mahommed Akbar Khan, who professed to them he had no hand in the Envoy's death; and, to prove his sincerity, wept for two hours. . . . . .

The night the Envoy was killed, the Ghazeeas rushed even up to the door, determined on Conolly's and Airey's death; and it was difficult to get rid of them. The poor Envoy's hand was held up to the window, to show it to Conolly! . . . . . .

30th.—The Nawaub's second son, Soojah ool Dowlah, is to go down with us: he is represented as a very nice fellow, about twenty-two years old. A postscript, added this morning, informs me that the chiefs are very well pleased; and do not wish us to go till all our arrangements are comfortably made, for their suspicions are now at an end.

It was this "very nice fellow" who, shortly afterwards, murdered Shah Soojah. The ungrateful cub had, in infancy, the honour of receiving the Shah's name of Soojah; the king (before his exile) having been what we call his god-father. The crime was loudly reprobated by the Affghans, and the father of the young assassin banished him from his house.

When the retreat was about to commence, the few friendly Affghans in Cabul were still secretly warning the families in the cantonments that they were doomed; and Lady Sale and her daughter were advised to wear turbans and men's outer habits over their own dresses, and to ride in the advance with the horsemen, rather than in the rude carriages furnished for the ladies. This they did.

On the 5th of January, and after endless delays, orders were issued that the retreat should commence next morning; Akbar and the other chiefs having been, by bills on India, extravagantly paid to provide for and protect them on the march to Jellalabad. It is extremely difficult to arrive at the truth as to the degree of fidelity to his engagements maintained by Akbar, though the following statement, made by Lieutenant Eyre long after the event, if it is to be implicitly received, would settle the question:—

Of Mahommed Akbar Khan, I have been told from an authentic source that, on the morning of the departure of the army from Cabul on the 6th of January, he and Sultan Jan made their appearance booted and spurred before the assembly of chiefs, and being asked by Nuwab Zeman Shah where they were going, Mahommed Akbar replied, "I am going to slay all the Feringhee dogs, to be sure." Again: on the passage of our troops through the Khoord-Cabul pass on the 8th, he followed with some chiefs in the rear, and in the same breath called to the Giljyes in Persian to desist from, and in Pushtoo to continue, firing. This explains the whole mystery of the massacre, and clears up every doubt regarding Mahommed Akbar's treachery.

It is curious to see the terms on which the British parted with their august protegé in the Bala Hissar. He was not too well used at the last:—

Shah Soojah has sent a message to ask if not even one officer of his force will stand by him. This message was, I know, delivered by Sturt himself to several; but circumstances admitted not of their further adherence. Indeed it is more than doubtful that the king was at the bottom of the insurrection, never dreaming that it would go so far. [This is said by Lady Sale.]

The assumption is not altogether established, though supported by subsequent evidence. Though the king was very desirous to be rid of his allies as soon as was consistent with his safety, and had been peculiarly jealous of the surveillance of Burnes, who was all along personally obnoxious to him; how far he actively participated in the treachery of his vizier, and other officials, can never now be fully ascertained; nor is it of much consequence. In one place it is stated by Lieutenant Eyre:—

Captain Conolly had obtained convincing proof that Shah Soojah originated the rebellion with a view to get rid of Burnes, whom he detested, and of several chiefs, whom he hoped to see fall a sacrifice to our vengeance; little anticipating the ruinous result to himself and to us. Poor Burnes had made but few friends among the chiefs, who now never mention his name but in terms of the bitterest hatred and scorn. He seems to have kept too much aloof from them; thus they had no opportunity of appreciating his many valuable qualities, and saw in him only the traveller, who had come to spy the nakedness of the land, in order that he might betray it to his countrymen. The king considered him as a personal enemy, and dreaded his probable succession to the post of Envoy on the departure of Sir W. Macnaghten.

The morning on which the unhappy retreat commenced was intensely cold; with snow lying a foot deep on the ground, and the thermometer considerably below the freezing point. So ill had the preliminary measures been taken, and the army was so encumbered with camp-followers, and women and children, that from a bridge intervening, two hours and a half were spent in marching the first mile from the abandoned cantonments. And already the havoc had begun. Lady Sale tells:—

Mrs. Sturt and I rode with the horsemen through the river, in preference to attempting the rattling bridge of planks laid across the gun carriages: but the camp-followers determined not to go through the water, and jostled for their turns to go over the bridge. This delay was the origin of the day's misfortune, which involved the loss of nearly all the baggage, and the greater part of the commissariat stores.

The troops had been on half rations during the whole of the siege: they consisted of half a seer of wheat per diem, with melted ghee or dhal, for fighting men; and for camp-followers, for some time, of a quarter of a seer of wheat or barley. . . . . The poorer camp-followers had latterly subsisted on such animals (camels, ponies, &c.) as had died from starvation. The men had suffered much from over-work and bad feeding, also from want of firing; for when all the wood in store was expended, the chiefs objected to our cutting down any more of the fruit trees; and their wishes were complied with. Wood, both public and private, was stolen: when ours was gone, we broke up boxes, chests of drawers, &c.; and our last dinner and breakfast at Cabul were cooked with the wood of a mahogany dining-table. . . . . .

When the rear-guard left cantonments, they were fired upon from the cantonment, then filled with Affghans. The servants, who were not concerned in the plunder, all threw away their loads and ran off. Private baggage, commissariat, and ammunition, were nearly annihilated at one fell swoop. The whole road was covered with men, women, and children, lying down in the snow to die.

The only baggage we saved was Mrs. Sturt's bedding, on which the ayah rode; and keeping her close to us, it was saved.

Lieutenant Eyre relates, that the last of the troops had not left the cantonments, when thousands of Affghans, the majority of whom were fanatical Ghazeeas, thronged the cantonments, rending the air with exulting cries, and committing every kind of atrocity. As soon as they had satiated themselves with plunder, some of them began to burn everything that had belonged to the hated "Feringhee dogs," while others amused themselves by firing on the rear of the troops.

The friends of the British in the city had reiterated the advice that the army should push on, at all risks, to Khoord-Cabul the first day, a distance of ten miles; but, instead of following this wise counsel, the General gave orders to halt within five miles of their place of starting, where the first wretched night was spent, the foretaste of worse days and nights. We have seen that they had already been plundered of every comfort and necessary; and Lady Sale relates of this first night:

There were no tents, save two or three small palls that arrived. All scraped away the snow as best they might, to make a place to lie down on. The evening and night were intensely cold: no food for man or beast procurable, except a few handfuls of bhoosa, for which we paid from five to ten rupees. Captain Johnson, in our great distress, kindly pitched a small pall over us: but it was dark, and we had few pegs; the wind blew in under the sides, and I felt myself gradually stiffening. I left the bedding, which was occupied by Mrs. Sturt and her husband, and doubled up my legs in a straw chair of Johnson's, covering myself with my poshteen. Mr. Mein and the ayah fully occupied the remainder of the space.

Previous to leaving cantonments, as we must abandon most of our property, Sturt was anxious to save a few of his most valuable books, and to try the experiment of sending them to a friend in the city. Whilst he selected these, I found, amongst the ones thrown aside, Campbell's Poems, which opened at Hohenlinden; and, strange to say, one verse actually haunted me day and night:—

> "Few, few shall part where many meet,
> The snow shall be their winding-sheet;
> And every turf beneath their feet
> Shall be a soldier's sepulchre."

I am far from being a believer in presentiments; but this verse is never absent from my thoughts. Heaven forbid that our fears should be realized: but we have commenced our retreat so badly, that we may reasonably have our doubts regarding the finale.

Never was ill omen more terribly verified. They were on the move by half-past seven next morning; "no order given—no bugle sounded;" the men half frozen, and having spent the night without bedding or a particle of food. Several had died in the night; discipline was at an end; the soldiers straggling everywhere, and the camp-followers pushing a-head to gain an imaginary security;—wholly imaginary, as the enemy were collecting everywhere around them; front, centre, and rear. As they advanced, the snow lay deeper; and, according to Lieutenant Eyre, the cold was so intense, that their breath froze, and formed a coating of small icicles on their moustaches and beards. It is to be remembered that Affghanistan is altogether a high-lying central region. In weather so extreme to Europeans, what must the shivering, puny natives of India have felt? The second day's march had not long commenced, when an attack was made on the rear by numerous small parties of Affghan horsemen, that had been hanging upon the flanks of the army. Much baggage was captured, and a harassing fire kept up on the rear of the force. By an unlucky accident, some mountain-train guns were at this time upset; and this was the signal for the Affghans to rush in and seize them. The soldiers were too much dispirited to defend the guns; and, shortly afterwards, the Affghan horse in a body charged into the midst of the remaining baggage, carried off great quantities of plunder, and created the utmost confusion and dismay. Many soldiers now dropped from exhaustion as well as wounds. Towards the close of the second day we learn from Lieutenant Eyre's narrative, that the General, instead of pushing on for Khoord-Cabul, on hearing that the rear had been attacked, ordered a halt, and sent back troops and two guns to drive off the hourly-increasing enemy. This was done by Brigadier Shelton. But where, meanwhile, were the protecting chiefs? those who had received bills on India to the amount of £45,000, to escort the army safely to Jellalabad? Captain Skinner, knowing that Mahommed Akbar was encamped in the neighbourhood, sought an interview with that chief, who told him that they had been attacked, because they had marched contrary to the wishes of the chiefs:—

He insisted on our halting at Bootkhak till the following morning, in which case he would provide food, forage, and firewood for the troops; but he said that he should expect six hostages to ensure our not marching beyond Tézeen, before tidings should be received of General Sale's evacuation of Jellalabad, for which an order had been already despatched to that officer, in compliance with the stipulations of the treaty.

These terms having been agreed to, the firing ceased for the present, and the force came to a halt on some high ground near the entrance of the Khoord-Cabul pass, having in two days accomplished a distance of only ten miles from Cabul.

Thus closed the second day of this fatal march; but not thus ended its horrors:—

Here, again, the confusion soon became indescribable. Suffice it to say that an immense multitude of from 14,000 to 16,000 men, with several hundred cavalry horses and baggage cattle, were closely jammed together in one monstrous, unmanageable, jumbling mass. Night again closed over us, with its attendant train of horrors,—starvation, cold, exhaustion, death; and of all deaths I can imagine none more agonizing than that, where a nipping frost tortures every sensitive limb, until the tenacious spirit itself sinks under the exquisite extreme of human suffering.

January 8th.—At an early hour the treacherous Affghans again commenced to molest us with their fire.

Too well does this, and similar passages, bear us out in affirming that nothing in the retreat of the French from Moscow was more appalling than those terrible six days in Affghanistan.

It was now the morning of the third day, and once more the living mass of men and animals was in motion, and entering the pass of Khoord-Cabul. The strongest men were now prostrated from the effects of the extremes of cold and hunger which they had endured. Even among the cavalry, who had suffered least, some of the men were obliged to be lifted on their horses, and only a few hundred fighting men remained fit for service. We can neither omit nor abridge the terrible description which Lieutenant Eyre has given of the march of the harassed army through the pass of Khoord-Cabul:—

The idea of threading the stupendous pass before us, in the face of an armed tribe of blood-thirsty barbarians, with such a dense irregular multitude, was frightful; and the spectacle then presented by that waving sea of animated beings, the majority of whom a few fleeting hours would transform into a line of lifeless carcasses to guide the future traveller on his way, can never be forgotten by those who witnessed it. We had so often been deceived by Affghan professions, that little or no confidence was placed in the present truce; and we commenced our passage through the dreaded pass in no very sanguine temper of mind. This truly formidable defile is about five miles from end to end, and is shut in on either hand by a line of lofty hills, between whose precipitous sides the sun, at this season, could dart but a momentary ray. Down the centre dashed a mountain torrent, whose impetuous course the frost in vain attempted to arrest, though it succeeded in lining the edges with thick layers of ice, over which the snow lay consolidated in slippery masses, affording no very easy footing for our jaded animals. This stream we had to cross and recross about eight-and-twenty times. As we proceeded onwards, the defile gradually narrowed, and the Giljyes were observed hastening to crown the heights in considerable force. A hot fire was opened on the advance, with whom were several ladies, who, seeing their only chance was to keep themselves in rapid motion, galloped forward at the head of all, running the gauntlet of the enemy's bullets, which whizzed in hundreds about their ears, until they were fairly out of the pass. Providentially the whole escaped, with the exception of Lady Sale, who received a slight wound in the arm. It ought, however, to be mentioned, that several of Mahommed Akbar's chief adherents, who had preceded the advance, exerted themselves strenuously to keep down the fire; but nothing could restrain the Giljyes, who seemed fully determined that nobody should interfere to disappoint them of their prey. Onward moved the crowd into the thickest of the fire, and fearful was the slaughter that ensued. An universal panic speedily prevailed; and thousands, seeking refuge in flight, hurried forward to the front, abandoning baggage, arms, ammunition, women and children, regardless for the moment of everything but their own lives.

The rear-guard, consisting of H. M.'s 44th and 54th N. I., suffered severely; and at last, finding that delay was only destruction, they followed the general example, and made the best of their way to the front. Another horse-artillery gun was abandoned, and the whole of its artillerymen slain. Captain Anderson's eldest girl, and Captain Boyd's youngest boy, fell into the hands of the Affghans. It is supposed that 3000 souls perished in the pass.

The children snatched were well taken care of, and, as soon as possible, restored to their parents. Captain Anderson's little daughter, who had resided in the family of a chief in Cabul, where she was treated with the utmost kindness, had been instructed to say, "My father and mother are infidels, but I myself am a Mussulman!" Lady Sale mentions her own wound as slightly as if she had been in the service and bound to receive wounds; and on this awful day, to her and to the army, there was no time for considerations of self. We formerly noticed that she allows that the chiefs riding with the advance were exposed to the same risks with the British, and that their commands were ineffectual in preventing the people on the heights from firing down into the Pass. And now her own most melancholy share in this dismal tragedy was drawing on. She relates—

After passing through some very sharp firing, we came upon Major Thain's horse, which had been shot through the loins. When we were supposed to be in comparative safety, poor Sturt rode back (to see after Thain, I believe:) his horse was shot under him, and before he could rise from the ground he received a severe wound in the abdomen. It was with great difficulty he was held upon a pony by two people, and brought into camp at Khoord-Cabul.

The pony Mrs. Sturt rode was wounded in the ear and neck. I had fortunately only one ball in my arm; three others passed through my poshteen near the shoulder without doing me any injury. The party that fired on us were not above fifty yards from us, and we owed our escape to urging our horses on as fast as they could go over a road where, at any other time, we should have walked our horses very carefully.

Fortunate it was for Mrs. Sturt and myself that we kept with the chiefs. Would to God that Sturt had done so likewise, and not gone back.

The ladies were mostly travelling in kajavas, and were mixed up with the baggage and column in the pass: here they were heavily fired on. Many camels were killed. On one camel were, in one kajava, Mrs. Boyd and her youngest boy Hugh; and in the other Mrs. Mainwaring and her infant, scarcely three months old, and Mrs. Anderson's eldest child. This camel was shot. Mrs. Boyd got a horse to ride; and her child was put on another behind a man, who being shortly after unfortunately killed, the child was carried off by the Affghans. Mrs. Mainwaring, less fortunate, took her own baby in her arms. Mary Anderson was carried off in the confusion. Meeting with a pony laden with treasure, Mrs. Mainwaring endeavoured to mount and sit on the boxes, but they upset; and in the hurry, pony and treasure were left behind; and the unfortunate lady pursued her way on foot, until, after a time, an Affghan asked her if she was wounded, and told her to mount behind him. This apparently kind offer she declined, being fearful of treachery; alleging as an excuse that she could not sit behind him on account of the difficulty of holding her child when so mounted. This man shortly snatched her shawl off her shoulders, and left her to her fate. Mrs. Mainwaring's sufferings were very great; and she deserves much credit for having preserved her child through these dreadful scenes. She not only had to walk a considerable distance with her child in her arms through the deep snow, but had also to pick her way over the bodies of the dead, dying, and wounded, both men and cattle, and constantly to cross the streams of water, wet up to the knees, pushed and shoved about by men and animals, the enemy keeping up a sharp fire, and several persons being killed close to her. She, however, got safe to camp with her child, but had no opportunity to change her clothes; and I know from experience that it was many days ere my wet habit became thawed, and can fully appreciate her discomforts.

Some European women, soldiers' wives, and some children were carried off. The troops were now through the Pass; another terrible night was closing upon the army; and yet the little episode we have to cite makes a deeper impression upon the feelings than the overwhelming misery which involved that entire mass of suffering humanity.

Poor Sturt was laid on the side of a bank, with his wife and myself beside him. It began snowing heavily: Johnson and Bygrave got some xummuls (coarse blankets) thrown over us. Dr. Bryce, H.A., came and examined Sturt's wound: he dressed it; but I saw by the expression of his countenance that there was no hope. He afterwards kindly cut the ball out of my wrist, and dressed both my wounds.

Half of a Sipahee's pall had been pitched, in which the ladies and their husbands took refuge. We had no one to scrape the snow off the ground in it. Captain

Johnson and Mr. Mein first assisted poor Sturt over to it, and then carried Mrs. Sturt and myself through the deep snow. Mrs. Sturt's bedding (saved by the ayah riding on it, whom we kept up close with ourselves) was now a comfort for my poor wounded son. He suffered dreadful agony all night, and intolerable thirst; and most grateful did we feel to Mr. Mein for going out constantly to the stream to procure water: we had only a small vessel to fetch it in, which contained but a few mouthfuls.

To sleep in such anxiety of mind and intense cold was impossible. There were nearly thirty of us packed together without room to turn.

The Sipahees and camp-followers, half-frozen, tried to force their way, not only into the tent, but actually into our beds, if such resting-places can be so called—a poshteen (or pelisse of sheep skin) half spread on the snow, and the other half wrapped over one.

Many poor wretches died round the tent in the night.

The night so dreadful to them, was not better to their companions in misery:—

An immense number of poor wounded wretches wandered about the camp destitute of shelter, and perished during the night. Groans of misery and distress assailed the ear from all quarters. We had ascended to a still colder climate than we had left behind, and were without tents, fuel, or food: the snow was the only bed for all, and of many, ere morning, it proved the winding-sheet.

Another dismal morning had hardly dawned, when the scenes of confusion and disorder of the former day were repeated and increased. There was now no attempt made to preserve discipline; and every one able to move did the best he could for himself. Mrs. Trevor, the new-made widow, and the mother of seven orphans who were travelling with her, gave up her place in a sort of rude carriage, to Captain Sturt, who must otherwise have been left to die on the ground.

The rough motion increased his suffering and accelerated his death: but he was still conscious that his wife and I were with him; and we had the sorrowful satisfaction of giving him Christian burial.

More than one half of the force is now frost-bitten or wounded; and most of the men can scarcely put a foot to the ground.

This is the fourth day that our cattle have had no food; nd the men are starved with cold and hunger.

Surely no English Lady has ever written anything more piteous than this brief and simple statement of a fact.

Mahommed Akbar, although he had been an incarnation of the Enemy of Mankind, as some of the British still believe him, deserves at this time some credit for a touch of humanity, nay, a strain of generosity. The proposal which he made on this day was to guarantee the safety of the widowed ladies, and those of the married men and their families who would accept of his protection, assuring them of honourable treatment, and a safe escort to Peshawar. He stated that he felt a delicacy in making the proposal, which more concerned them than himself. This proposal, the best which could have been made in the circumstances, was eagerly accepted; and to Mahommed Akbar the preservation of the children, the ladies, and those officers who accompanied them, is surely owing. Had they remained with the army, many, if not all of them, must inevitably have perished in the common destruction. There was, on this arrangement, no difference of opinion between the military and civil officers—all agreed on the expediency of the measure. Lieutenant Eyre relates—

Up to this time scarcely one of the ladies had tasted a meal since leaving Cabul. Some had infants a few days old at the breast, and were unable to stand without assistance. Others were so far advanced in pregnancy, that, under ordinary circumstances, a walk across a drawing-room would have been an exertion; yet these helpless women, with their young families, had already been obliged to rough it on the backs of camels, and on the tops of the baggage yaboos: those who had a horse to ride, or were capable of sitting on one, were considered fortunate indeed. Most had been without shelter since quitting the cantonment—their servants had nearly all deserted or been killed—and, with the exception of Lady Macnaghten and Mrs. Trevor, they had lost all their baggage, having nothing in the world left but the clothes on their backs; those, in the case of some of the invalids, consisted of night dresses in which they had started from Cabul in their litters. Under such circumstances a few more hours would probably have seen some of them stiffening corses. The offer of Mahommed Akbar was consequently their only chance of preservation.

Yet it must have been with no tranquil feelings that it was received. Lady Sale and her daughter were, on this day, in that condition of overwhelming sorrow, when the wretched become for the time indifferent to their fate. This is the only occasion on which the indomitable spirit of Lady Sale appears to have been utterly subdued. She relates—

Overwhelmed with domestic affliction, neither Mrs. Sturt nor I were in a fit state to decide for ourselves whether we would accept the Sirdar's protection or not. There was but faint hope of our ever getting safe to Jellalabad; and we followed the stream. But although there was much talk regarding our going over, all I personally know of the affair is, that I was told we were all to go, and that our horses were ready, and we must mount immediately and be off.

We were taken by a very circuitous route to the Khoord-Cabul forts, where we found Mahommed Akbar Khan, and the hostages. Mr. Boyd's little boy had been brought there, and was restored to his parents. Mrs. Burnes and young Stoker were also saved, and joined our party. Anderson's little girl is said to have been taken to Cabul, to the Nawaub Zeman Shah Khan.

Three rooms were cleared out for us, having no outlets except a small door to each; and of course they were dark and dirty.

Here a large party were huddled together in a small apartment, with no comfort of any kind save shelter from the elements, some coarse food, and the hope of personal safety. We shall afterwards see something of the weary marches, and countermarches, and hardships of the captives, for so they accounted themselves, though Akbar affected to call them guests; but shall first follow to the close the fortunes of the doomed army. On the 10th, the day after the officers and ladies who had accepted the protection of Mahommed Akbar had left the army, no enemy appeared for some hours; though many of the men dropped from fatigue, or were violently deprived, by their companions, of their camels and horses, and thus left to perish on the snow or be butchered by the Affghans. But, long before the day closed, the enemy again appeared, and the troops when attacked made no resistance, but threw away their arms, and fell an easy prey to the avengers of Affghanistan. The army was now greatly diminished in numbers, though many more had perished from hunger and cold than by the hands of the enemy. On this day, and after this fresh attack, Captain Skinner was sent by the General to remonstrate with Mahommed Akbar, who replied, that he could not control the Giljyes with his small body of horse, amounting to only three hundred. We have already seen the furious spirit displayed by these lawless chiefs, to which the English officers were themselves witnesses. Akbar also protested that the desertions to him which were taking place to a great extent among the native troops, were not incited by him; and, in proof of this, he offered to shoot every deserter that came in from the British camp. There were strong doubts of his good faith, to which his unfulfilled promises to provide food, fuel, and forage for the army, gave countenance; but it was thought wisest to dissemble. Lady Sale states that, at this interview, Akbar undertook for the safe escort of the troops to Jellalabad, if the general would consent to conduct them unarmed, and give his Affghans the use of their weapons, as an assurance that no treachery was meditated. This might have been listened to as the proposal of the Paladin of some high-strained romance of the age of chivalry, but not one to be entertained by a modern soldier. It was rejected by the General; and it is impossible to say what other course he could have followed, though it may be that Mahommed Akbar was not wholly insincere when he said, that the last chance of safety for the remainder of the army was to lay down their arms, as the Affghans had no faith in their promises. Yet how could he have guaranteed their safety from his fanatical followers, whatever had been his true purpose? From Lady Sale, who, like Lieutenant Eyre, received her information after the calamity was past, we borrow this account of the fourth day's march:—

The troops continued their fearful march [from Khoord-Cabul:] the remnant of the camp-followers, with several wounded officers, went ahead: for five miles they saw no enemy; all who could not walk were necessarily left behind. They descended a long steep descent to the bed of the Tézeen Nullah. At this dip the scene was horrible: the ground was covered with dead and dying, amongst whom were several officers: they had been suddenly attacked and overpowered. The enemy here crowded from the tops of the hills in all directions down the bed of the Nullah, through which the route lay for three miles; and our men continued their progress through an incessant fire from the heights on both sides, until their arrival in the Tézeen valley, at about half-past four P.M.

The descent from the Huft Kohtul was about 2000 feet; and here they lost the snow.

About 12,000 persons have perished!

A quarter of an hour after their arrival, the Sirdar and a party came into the valley to a fort higher up, belonging to his father-in-law, Mahommed Shah Khan. A signal was made to his horsemen to approach: two came, and Captain Skinner, by the General's desire, accompanied them to Mahommed Akbar Khan, to devise some means of saving the remnant—about 4000 people of all descriptions.

Skinner returned at dusk; and brought back the same message as from Kubber-i-Jubhar, regarding disarming the Europeans.

It was on the evening of this day that the proposition for disarming the troops had been rejected by the General, who, weak and famished as every one of the army now was, yet resolved to push on through the Pass of Jugdaluck at an early hour, before the enemy could be apprized of their intention to do what should have been done on a previous day. This seemed the last chance of safety to those that now remained of the broken force. They resolved to leave the camp-followers behind, —to, in short, abandon them to their fate. But no sooner had they started, than every poor wretch still able to crawl accompanied the march. We continue the narrative from Lady Sale's notes, which are more succinct in this place than those of Lieutenant Eyre, and not less impressive:—

The camp-followers having been the bane of this unfortunate army, they hoped to move off quietly and leave them behind; but no sooner did they start, than they found that all who were able to stand were accompanying them. They left their remaining gun behind; and Dr. Cardew, who was mortally wounded at the dip into the Tézeen Nullah, was laid on the carriage to await death, which was rapidly approaching: he was found dead by Mahommed Akbar's people the next morning.

The night was fine and moonlit, and they reached Seh Baba about midnight; here a few shots were fired on them; and the rear being attacked, the whole remains of the 44th, with the exception of about nine files to form the advance, were ordered there; and thus the column remained until their arrival at Jugdaluck; their progress being again impeded by that evil which always attends Indian armies, the camp-followers; who, if a shot is fired in advance, invariably fall back; and if in rear, rush to the front.

11*th*.—From Seh Baba the road turns off sharp to the right over the mountains to Jugdaluck; and across the Nullah is seen the short road to Cabul, but which cannot be travelled by guns or camels.

At Seh Baba, Dr. Duff, (the Surgeon-General to the forces in Affghanistan,) who had had his hand cut off with a penknife at Tézeen, in consequence of a severe wound, was from weakness obliged to lag behind, and was two days afterwards found murdered.

Bareekub is three miles from Seh Baba: there is a clear stream of water, and several caves cut in the rocks. Here our force observed a number of people in the caves; with whom they did not interfere, as they did not molest them. They eventually fired some volleys on the rear.

At day-break the advance arrived at Killa Sung, about seven miles from Seh Baba, where there are some streams of water: this is the general encamping ground, though very confined, and commanded by hills all round.

They proceeded about half a mile further on, and then halted, until the rear-guard should arrive; but they, having been much molested on the road, did not arrive for two hours. On their first arrival not an Affghan was to be seen; but shortly several made their appearance on the hills, and the number continued every moment to increase. Not a drop of water was procurable; nor would they get any until their arrival at Jugdaluck. They had marched for twenty-four hours consecutively, and had still ten miles to go before they could hope for rest. On being joined by the rear-guard they continued their march; the enemy in small numbers watching every opportunity to murder stragglers from the column.

At two miles from Jugdaluck the descent into the valley commences.

The hills on each side of the road were occupied by the enemy, who kept firing from their long juzails; and again the road was covered with dead and dying, as they were in such a mass that every shot told.

On arrival in the valley, a position was taken up on the first height near some ruined walls. As scarcely any Europeans of the advance now remained, and the enemy were increasing, the General called all the officers (about twenty) to form line and show a front: they had scarcely done so, when Captain Grant, Assistant-Adjutant-General, received a ball through the cheek which broke his jaw.

On the arrival of the rear-guard, followed up by the enemy, the latter took possession of two heights close to our position: on which our force went for security within the ruined walls. The men were almost maddened with hunger and thirst: a stream of pure water ran within 150 yards of the position, but no man could go for it without being massacred.

For about half an hour they had a respite from the fire of the enemy, who now only watched their proceedings.

The General desired Johnson to see if there were any bullocks or camels procurable amongst the followers: he obtained three bullocks, which were killed, served out, and devoured instantly, although raw, by the Europeans.

A few horsemen coming in sight, they signed for one to approach: he did so, and on being questioned what chief was present, said Mahommed Akbar Khan. A message was sent to the Sirdar by the General to know why they were again molested: the chief replied, he wished to converse with Skinner, who immediately accompanied the messenger. This was about half past three P.M. of the 11th.

After marching for thirty hours they lay down on the ground, worn out by cold, hunger, thirst, and fatigue: but scarcely had Skinner taken his departure, when volley after volley was poured into the enclosure where they were resting. All was instant confusion, and a general rush took place outside the walls; men and cattle all huddled together, each striving to hide himself from the murderous fire of the enemy.

At this time twenty gallant men of the 44th made a simultaneous rush down the hill, to drive the enemy off the heights they occupied: in this they were successful; for, supposing they were followed by the rest, the foe took to flight ere our men could reach their position.

In about a quarter of an hour, as so small a party would not admit of any division, this party was recalled. They again entered within the broken walls; and instantly our inveterate foes were in their former position dealing death amongst them.

About 5 o'clock Skinner returned with a message that the Sirdar wished to see the General, Brigadier Shelton, and Johnson; and if they would go over to confer with him, he would engage to put a stop to any further massacre, and also to give food to our troops: and on condition of their remaining with him as hostages for General Sale's evacuation of Jellalabad, he would escort all the small remaining party in safety.

Mahommed Shah Khan, father-in-law to the Sirdar, and whose daughter is with the Dost at Loodianah, is one of the principal Giljye chiefs: he came at dusk with an escort to receive them; and they started in the confident hope that some arrangement would be entered into to save the lives of the remainder of the army. The general and the above-mentioned officers proceeded to the top of the valley for about two miles, and found the Sirdar and his party in bivouac: nothing could exceed the kind manner in which they were received. The chief, on hearing they had not tasted food for forty-eight hours, had a cloth spread on the ground; and a good pilao and other dishes, as also tea, were quickly brought; and they formed a circle round it, and all ate out of the same dish.

Their hunger, though great, was not to be compared to their thirst, which had not been quenched for two days.

The European force now at Jugdaluck, was by this time reduced to 150 men of the 44th, 16 dismounted artillerymen, and 25 of the 5th cavalry. Not a single sepoy had now either arms or ammunition. On the morning of the 12th, the General, and the English officers who had been the night before with Mahommed Akbar and his friends, were treated with the same civility, and cautioned not to leave their tents, lest they should be ill-treated by the fierce Giljyes. It was at an interview which the Sirdar had with the chiefs of the Giljyes, on this same morning, that they avowed their bitter hatred of the British; refused 60,000 rupees offered by Mahommed Shah Khan, the father-in-law of Akbar; and declared that nothing would satisfy them but the extermination of the invaders! But we have already referred to this characteristic interview. The day was spent in altercation, and an attempt at conciliating these turbulent chiefs, which on the part of Akbar seems to have been sincere. All this while the wretched remainder of the troops were waiting, famishing of cold, hunger, and thirst. Towards evening, it was announced by Akbar's father-in-law, Mahommed Shah Khan, that everything had been amicably arranged for the safe conduct of the troops—the wretched remnant of the army—to Jellalabad; and the General wrote a letter, requesting General Sale to evacuate that place, as one of the conditions of the truce. While the General was writing this letter, shots were heard; and it was discovered that the troops were moving off through the pass, followed hard by the Giljyes. The desperate resolution to continue the march had been taken in the absence of the General, and Brigadier Shelton,—had, in fact, been forced upon the army from a constant harassing fire being kept up on them all day, followed by a furious onset at its close; while no supplies were obtained, and time was wasting by the absent commanders in fruitless negotiations. Another trait of generosity in Akbar occurred this day, which is related by his "unfriend" Lady Sale:—

Mahommed Akbar Khan told Johnson, after Mahommed Shah Khan went out to consult with the chiefs of the pass, that the latter were dogs and no faith could be placed in them; and begged Johnson would send for three or four of his most intimate friends, that their lives might be saved in the event of treachery to the troops. Gladly as he would have saved his individual friends, he was under the necessity of explaining to the Sirdar that a sense of honour would prevent the officers deserting their men at a time of such imminent peril. The Sirdar also proposed, that in the event of the Giljyes not acceding to the terms, he would himself, at dusk, proceed with a party of horsemen to the foot of the hill where our troops were; and, previous orders being sent to the commanding officer for all to be ready, he would bring every European away in safety, by each of his horsemen taking up one behind him: the Giljyes would not then fire upon them, lest they should hit him or his men. But he would not allow a single Hindostanee to follow; as he could not protect 2000 men (the computed number.)—Johnson interpreted all this to the general: but it was deemed impracticable.

The troops, now commanded by Brigadier Anquetil, in absence of General Elphinstone and Brigadier Shelton, had, as we have stated, taken the resolution to move forward without orders, rather than be cut off piece-meal.

Between 8 and 9 o'clock P.M. they took their departure; which was rendered a very trying scene, from the entreaties of the wounded, amounting to seventy or eighty, for whom there was no conveyance; and therefore, however heart-rending to all, they were necessarily abandoned, with the painful conviction that they would be massacred in cold blood, defenceless as they were, by the first party of Giljyes that arrived.

The enemy, who seem to have been aware of the intended removal, soon commenced an attack upon the straggling camp-followers; and a number of Affghans, favoured by the darkness of the night, stole in amongst the followers that were in column, whom they quietly despatched, and proceeded to plunder. These daring men, however, were nearly all cut up or bayonetted by the enraged soldiery; who shortly after came upon an encampment of the enemy; in passing which they were saluted with a heavy fire, followed up by a sally upon the camp-followers, as usual.

They proceeded on until they came to a gorge, with low, steep hills on either side, between which the road passed, about two miles from Jugdaluck. Here two barriers had been thrown across the road, constructed of bushes and branches of trees. The road, which had been flooded, was a mass of ice, and the snow on the hills very deep. The enemy, who had waited for them in great force at this spot, rushed upon the column, knife in hand. The camp-followers and wounded men fell back upon the handful of troops for protection; thus rendering them powerless, and causing the greatest confusion; whilst the men, in small detached parties, were maintaining conflicts with fearful odds against them.

In this conflict the Acting Quartermaster-Sergeant fell: and in the confusion, caused by an overwhelming enemy pressing on the rear in a night attack, it is not surprising that it was found impossible to extricate the colour from the body of the fallen man; and its loss was unavoidable. The disorder of the troops was increased by a part of them, the few remaining horsemen, galloping through and over the infantry in hopes of securing their own retreat to Jellalabad. The men, maddened at being ridden over, fired on them; and it is said that some officers were fired at; but that rests on doubtful testimony. When the firing slackened, and the clashing of knives and bayonets had in some measure ceased, the men moved on slowly; and on arriving at the top of the gorge were able to ascertain the fearful extent of the loss they had sustained in men and officers. Of the latter, Brigadier Anquetil and above twenty others, were missing. The troops now halted unmolested for an hour; during which time a few stragglers contrived to join them.

The country being now of a more open description, our small force suffered less annoyance from the fire of the enemy: but the determination of the men to bring on their wounded comrades greatly retarded their marching; and from the troopers having proceeded onwards, the wounded could not be mounted behind them: thus their pace did not exceed two miles in the hour. From time to time sudden attacks were made on the rear; particularly in spots where the road wound close under the foot of the hills, and there a sharp fire was sure to be met with. In this manner they went on till they reached the Soorkhab river, which they forded below the bridge at 1 A.M. on the 13th, being aware that the enemy would take possession of it, and dispute the passage. Whilst fording the river a galling fire was kept up from the bridge: and several men were killed and wounded.

We have now reached the last day of this fatal retreat.

13th.—From Soorkhab the remnant of the column moved towards Gundamuck: but as the day dawned the enemy's numbers increased; and, unfortunately, daylight soon exposed to them how very few fighting men the column contained. The force now consisted of twenty officers, of whom Major Griffiths was the senior, fifty men of the 44th, six of the horse artillery, and four or five Sipahees. Amongst the whole there were but twenty muskets; 300 camp-followers still continued with them.

Being now assailed by an increased force, they were compelled to quit the road, and take up a position on a hill adjoining. Some Affghan horsemen being observed at a short distance were beckoned to. On their approach there was a cessation of firing: terms were proposed by Captain Hay, to allow the force to proceed without further hostilities to Jellalabad. These persons not being sufficiently influential to negotiate, Major Griffiths proceeded with them to a neighbouring chief for that purpose; taking with him Mr. Blewitt, formerly a writer in Captain Johnson's office, who understood Persian, that he might act as interpreter.

Many Affghans ascended the hill where our troops awaited the issue of the expected conference; and exchanges of friendly words passed between both parties. This lasted upwards of an hour; but hostilities were renewed by the Affghans, who snatched at the fire-arms of the men and officers. This they of course resisted; and drove them off the hill: but the majority of the enemy, who occupied the adjoining hills commanding our position, commenced a galling fire upon us. Several times they attempted to dislodge our men from the hill, and were repulsed: until, our ammunition being expended, and our fighting men reduced to about thirty, the enemy made a rush, which in our weak state we were unable to cope with. They bore our men down knife in hand; and slaughtered all the party except Captain Souter and seven or eight men of the 44th and artillery. This officer thinks that this unusual act of forbearance towards him originated in the strange dress he wore: his poshteen having opened during the last struggle exposed to view the colour he had wrapped round his body; and they probably thought they had secured a valuable prize in some great bahadur, for whom a large ransom might be obtained.

Eighteen officers and about fifty men were killed at the final struggle at Gundamuck. Captain Souter and the few remaining men (seven or eight) that were taken alive from the field were, after a detention of a month in the adjoining villages, made over to Mahommed Akbar Khan and sent to the fort of Buddeeabad in the Lughman valley.

The General, still absent negotiating with the chiefs, never again saw the army. It had marched on the 12th, at night. On the morning of the 13th, he rode to the pass of Jugdaluck with Mahommed Akbar, and witnessed the dreadful spectacle of the struggle of the previous night.

They passed some 200 dead bodies, many of them Europeans; the whole naked, and covered with large gaping wounds. As the day advanced, several poor wretches of Hindostanees (camp-followers, who had escaped the massacre of the night before) made their appearance from behind rocks and within caves, where they had taken shelter from the murderous knives of the Affghans and the inclemency of the climate.

The final struggle at Gundamuck—the close of this dismal tragedy—was but some few hours later. Lieutenant Eyre thus closes the melancholy narrative of the retreat:—

It only remains to relate the fate of those few officers and men, who rode on ahead of the rest after passing the barriers. Six of the twelve officers, Captains Bellew, Collier, Hopkins, Lieutenant Bird, Drs. Harpur and Brydon, reached Futtehabad in safety, the other six having dropped gradually off by the way and been destroyed. Deceived by the friendly professions of some peasants near the above-named town, who brought them bread to eat, they unwisely delayed a few moments to satisfy the cravings of hunger; the inhabitants meanwhile armed themselves, and, suddenly sallying forth, cut down Captain Bellew and Lieutenant Bird; Captains Collier and Hopkins, and Drs. Harpur and Brydon, rode off, and were pursued; the three former were overtaken and slain within four miles of Jellalabad; Dr. Brydon by a miracle escaped, and was the only officer of the whole Cabul force who reached that garrison in safety.

Such was the memorable retreat of the British army from Cabul, which, viewed in all its circumstances,—in the military conduct which preceded and brought about such a consummation, the treachery, disaster, and suffering which accompanied it,—is, perhaps, without a parallel in history.

General Elphinstone survived the destruction of the army only three months, hastened to his grave by fatigue and anguish of mind. After the annihilation of the army he accompanied the other captives of Mahommed Akbar.

No one can have yet forgotten the alarm and consternation universally felt in England when the dismal intelligence of the insurrection at Cabul, the assassination of the Envoy and Sir A. Burnes; but, above all, the capture of the ladies, came upon the nation at "one fell swoop." The fate of the whole army excited, for the time, much less interest than that of the female captives, carried off to the hills, and at the mercy of the wild, blood-thirsty, and revengeful Affghans. To their adventures we shall now turn.

A Voice from the Vintage. By the Author of "The Women of England." Fisher & Co.

Mrs. Ellis has herself been a Tee-totaller for four years, and in this little volume she comes forward as the eloquent advocate for Total Abstinence; a subject which she has introduced more or less in all her late publications, and to which her fiction in numbers, Family Secrets, was, so far as we have seen it, entirely devoted. The stories of that work are so many Total Abstinence Tracts. Mrs. Ellis is a thoroughly-earnest pleader; and she strengthens her argument by frequent reference to her personal experience. She enforces upon the whole world, the men and women of every rank and class, but especially those who are influential from wealth or position, the duty of joining the Total Abstinence Society, of solemnly subscribing the Abstinence bond, as she has done. Temperance is not sufficient. Moderation is declared more dangerous, because more plausible and seductive, than actual excess. Mrs. Ellis was at one time quite contemptuous of the Temperance movement—an unwise contempt, which she has atoned for by running to exactly the opposite extreme. She says of this cause:

By degrees it began also to assume with me somewhat more of a personal character. I could not see how I was right while indulging in what was so fearfully destructive to others, and to some whom I had known and loved. Yet such was the force of habit; such my willingness to believe what doctors told me, that wine was necessary to my health, at that time far from good; and such, also, was my dependence upon stimulants, for increasing the strength of which I often felt miserably in want, that three years more elapsed before I had the resolution to free myself practically, entirely, and I now trust for ever, from the slavery of this dangerous habit.

Four years of total abstinence from everything of an intoxicating nature, it has now been my happy lot to experience; and if the improvement in my health and spirits, and the increase of my strength during that time, be any proof in favour of the practice, I am one of those who ought especially to thank God for the present, and take courage for the future.

Like many other women, and especially those who are exempt from the necessity of active exertion, I was, while in the habit of taking wine for my health, subject to almost constant suffering from a mysterious kind of sinking, which rendered me at times wholly unfit either for mental or bodily effort, but which I always found to be removed by a glass of wine. My spirits, too, partook of the malady, for I was equally subject to fits of depression, which also were relieved, in some degree, by the same remedies. During the four years in which I have now entirely abstained from the use of such remedies, I have been a total stranger to these distressing sensations of sinking and exhaustion; and I say this with thankfulness, because I consider such ailments infinitely more trying than absolute pain. That time of the day at which it is frequently recommended to take a glass of wine and a biscuit, I now spend as pleasantly as any other portion of the four-and-twenty hours, without either; and when fatigued by wholesome exercise, which is a totally different thing from the exhaustion above alluded to, I want nothing more than rest or food, and have not a symptom remaining of what I used to experience when I felt occasionally as if my life was ebbing away. Thus, I am fully persuaded, in my own mind, and by my own experience, confirming as it does the testimony of many able and important judges, that the very medicine we take in this manner to give us strength, does in reality produce an increase of faintness, lassitude, and general debility.

This is the best passage in the book. High time it is that every one, man or woman, liable to those sensations of sinking and exhaustion, and periodical craving, for which Medicine has a distinct name, and for which it assigns a distinct cause, should pause, and bethink themselves; and if not amenable to the control of reason and duty, then, by all means, call in any and every adventitious aid possible; among others, if they choose, that of the Total Abstinence Pledge. The irritable and sinking condition described is the first stage of those affections which often terminate in Delirium Tremens. This persons so affected should do, for their own sakes, and not on the more debatable ground of example to others. During four years of total abstinence, in which Mrs. Ellis has been connected with the Tee-total Society, she has never felt the want of the stimulants which her physicians and herself formerly deemed so necessary for her; and her health has been excellent. While, during two years that she acted on the partial Abstinence principle, her condition was uncomfortable.

But no sooner was an entire surrender made of inclination to a sense of duty, than all temptation vanished, all trial was at an end; while the act of totally abstaining became so perfectly easy, as to call forth no other feelings than those of gratitude and joy, that I was thus enabled, for the sake of others, to share in the self-denials of the tempted, and the privations of the poor.

We should, however, say, looking back to the above statement of the individual case, that her own sake made this renunciation prudent in Mrs. Ellis, both from regard to health and mental tranquillity, which had suffered under the use of stimulants. For the benefit of those meditating Total Abstinence, and likely to find the practice difficult, we find the following rules laid down:—

If your abstinence is not entire, the experiment is far indeed from being a fair one; for so long as the habit of taking even a little is kept up, the inclination to take more is kept up also, and consequently the trial and the difficulty remain. If also, during the time that you abstain, you sit up late at night, neglect to take exercise in the open air, or in any other manner fail to adopt the most rational and obvious means of preserving health, it cannot be said that the experiment is a fair one; more especially when, as is too frequently the case, every malady occurring during this period is charged upon the newly-formed habit of total abstinence.

Like all new converts, and especially such as have been persecutors, Mrs. Ellis may be zealous overmuch: but her book will be useful, particularly to those of the respectable of her own sex who are liable to forenoon sinkings, or who are under the necessity, as she tells us, of repairing to the sideboard for stimulants to soothe their ruffled spirits, if annoyed by any trivial domestic casualty, such as the ill conduct of a servant. The advice will also be useful to those ladies described in the passage below:—but all this is for their own sakes, for self-preservation, and not at all for the sake of the example, which is, in cases of this sort, a secondary consideration.

The stimulus to which we most habitually, and, according to the generally received opinion, most lawfully resort, is wine. We feel a little faint about the middle of the day, and we take it then. We are thus strengthened, and enabled to go out and make our calls, or to attend to our duties in any other way. We can even visit the poor; and we really do feel more vigour, more ability, and more courage to admonish them of their extravagance and excess, particularly in the way of intemperance, immediately after what we call the necessary stimulus has been taken. We come back, however, exceedingly tired, and did not the dinner-table present us with a fresh supply, we believe we should scarcely be able to get through the day. Our fathers and brothers, however, are surely not subject to this faintness about the hour of noon! No;—but they come home reasonably, and absolutely tired, and they, too, must have their strength restored by the same invigorating draughts.

Mrs. Ellis mentions other cases in which no one will demur to Total Abstinence being a duty, and where the necessity of Total Abstinence necessitates an absolute rule against the taste, sight, or smell of the powerful and seductive fluid.

A lady of my acquaintance, and I have it upon her authority, whose mind was seriously impressed with the importance of personal abstinence, struggled on for some time in the manner I have described, without being able to make a sufficient effort for the effectual carrying out of her purpose. Thus, she was often an abstainer for a week or a month, hoping she might keep up the habit, without really resolving to do so. While she remained in this state, it happened that on those days when she partook, with her friends, even of the smallest quantity, such was the force of habit, and such the power of association, that she invariably went to her store-room immediately after they were gone, and poured out for herself a glass of the wine she had just tasted; nor was she exempt from the same weakness for two or three days afterwards.

Dr. Johnson is often quoted as high authority in favour of the safety of abstinence, when compared with moderation. When asked by Hannah More, at a dinner-party one day, to take a little wine, he replied, "I cannot take a little, and therefore I never take any. Abstinence is as easy to me as temperance would be difficult."

It was the undeniable duty of both the lady and Dr. Johnson to abstain totally, if they could not be temperate; but the latter individual would no more have thought that, because he could not take a little, his friends should give up the moderate and proper use of wine at their own tables, to keep him out of all temptation, as that none of them should eat fresh-baked bread or butter, because his health required a plain, stale loaf. Nor had Johnson, or persons of similar temperament, any particular merit in practising entire Abstinence, if they found it easier than Temperance, which Mrs. Ellis contends that it is; though, bad as the drinking world may be, this surely does not hold as a general rule. A very great majority of those who taste more or less freely of all kinds of liquids that, if taken to excess, have the power to intoxicate, are decidedly to be pronounced Temperate; and have no personal reason to come under any pledge of Abstinence; unless it is contended that any use of such beverages, however moderate, is, under all circumstances, sinful, with the exception of the use permitted by the physician's leave. Is it then a duty to have a consultation, and pay a fee, before a man can allow himself a glass of wine, however much he may feel that he needs it, or however agreeable to him is what he regards as a perfectly innocent luxury? From Mrs. Ellis's treatise one is led to imagine that the use of intoxicating liquors is carried to an excess among women in respectable and high society in England which is little suspected, if this "means of excitement" really betrays them into the follies and errors enumerated in the passage cited below. Having spoken of the ill effects of moderate—or what she calls moderate, though it must, from the effects, be immoderate—stimulus on men, she proceeds,—

Hence an endless catalogue of evils, arising from the miscalculations, oversights in business, hasty conclusions, intemperate expressions, weakness under temptation, and general subserviency of principle to inclination, amongst men; while amongst women the sad consequences of the tell-tale tongue, the sudden impulse, and the wilful act, have been scarcely less calamitous. To women especially, the excitement of society alone is often enough, and too much for the equanimity of minds over which there has been exercised no habitual control; and, after the accustomed means of increasing that excitement have been freely, though not according to the opinion of the world too freely used, how many, through the long, dull, weary, morning hours, have to look back with shame to the confused and busy scenes of the previous evening, amongst which the dim, but certain witness of their own folly stands forth conspicuous, as if to warn them against ever venturing upon the same unguarded course again!

But it would require volumes to detail even the most familiar instances arising from this practice as it prevails in society, impregnating with its poison the secret springs of feeling, and stimulating to all those little acts, thoughts, looks, and words which constitute the beginnings of evil, and which may justly be compared to sparks applied to a long train of mischief, including the practice of every kind of selfishness, duplicity, and, too often, bad faith. Would that peculiar look, for instance, have been given? Would that word have passed the fair speaker's lips? Would that strange eccentric act have been committed, had no artificial stimulus been used? Oh, woman! reckless woman! how often has thy character received a bias, and thy whole life a shade, from the consequences of some rash purpose conceived without a thought of harm, and acted upon from the sudden impulse of a moment! How often has the friend of thy bosom been wounded, the love of years destroyed, and shipwreck made of happiness and peace, from the mere indulgence of a transient inclination too impetuous for reason to control! And yet under circumstances of peculiar temptation from the excitement incident to society, woman is the first to place herself in peril, by voluntarily adding to the stimulus, of which she has already more than her natural prudence can restrain.

Thus, then, we venture to trifle with the immortal mind; thus we presumptuously dare to ruffle the calm of that bright mirror which ought to reflect the image of Divinity!

Now, if all this evil comes of the glass of wine, or sip of negus or punch, that the ladies are allowed at dinner or at evening parties, and which is, "according to the opinion of the world," not too freely allowed, they surely ought to abstain, or else the world ought to alter its standard of the measure ladies are permitted to drink. But when or where in respectable society are these over-stimulated, these excited and reckless women to be seen?

It would appear, from Mrs. Ellis, that the ministers of religion sometimes prime themselves for extraordinary oratorical efforts by artificial and intoxicating stimulants. This is scarcely a legitimate use of the "creature;" nor can we think it one frequently had recourse to; although, in peculiar and indeed impossible circumstances, Mrs. Ellis seems willing to allow of it. She says,—

Were it lawful or expedient for the Christian to throw the whole energy of his mind and body into one great public effort, and to leave nothing for his private hours, for his family, or for the religion of his closet, but nervous irritation, weariness, or senseless sleep, I should be willing to allow that the use of stimulants might be favourable to such a course of action. Indeed, I am but too well assured, that many extraordinary instances of oratorical power, many startling flashes of brilliant genius, and many single efforts, almost supernatural in their force and their effect, have been produced under the influence of this kind of excitement. But who has followed the individuals, from whom such extraordinary action emanated, home to their families or their closets? or, having so followed them, who would pronounce upon their condition there as being that of happy men—of men whose daily and hourly conduct constituted one continued homage to the purity, the holiness, and the benignity of their Creator?

No. I appeal to common sense, to experience, and to observation of the world in general, whether the individuals thus occasionally wrought upon by artificial stimulus for a particular and transitory purpose, are not, of all mankind, the least enviable in their private experience and habits, the most irritable in their feelings, and the most weary of life and its accumulated ills.

Just in proportion then as the religious professor allows himself to approach to this extreme, his private life and the secret history of his religious character become stamped with an impress fearfully at variance with the calm purity, the clear intelligence, and the high spiritual enjoyment which constitute the Christian's happiest foretaste of the blessedness of the heavenly kingdom.

Such observations, however, belong only to the theory of this dangerous practice. Facts, awful facts, attested by ministers of every religious denomination, are not wanting to assure us, that of the causes of religious declension now prevailing in the world, the drinking usages of our enlightened country have been the most fatal in their consequences.

An argument against the use of anything whatever from its abuse, is as old as human discordance in opinion and taste, and is of universal application. It lies against turtle-soup and custard, because aldermen are or were apt to over-eat themselves, when these good things were set before them, and to die of apoplexy,—against music, because some enthusiastic amateurs fiddle all day long,—against dancing, because it sometimes excites youthful spirits beyond the rigid line of decorum,—against a warm and lively faith, because some men and women became fanatics, or deranged in their intellects. The Tee-totallers employ the same arguments in denying totally the use of those beverages which medicine freely prescribes as among its best and its most grateful restoratives; and which the common sense of mankind in all ages have placed among the thousand other admitted harmless luxuries and solaces of existence, all of them to be used, not abused. These they hold not merely useless, but noxious, and this not only in their abuse, but in their elementary character, of producing, when taken to excess, intoxication in all its direful degrees. Mrs. Ellis's discourse may probably gain a few more pledges to the Total Abstinence Societies; and, in the meanwhile, we rejoice to think that refining taste, improved morals, and the force of example, are silently settling this great question everywhere; and that if pledges are not universally given, it is because they are not felt to be required. Meanwhile, we wish all manner of success to Father Mathew; and no harm to those who take the pledge, provided they are tolerant and charitable with those who do not yet entertain their notions, nor follow their practice.

An Enquiry into the Principles of Human Happiness and Human Duty. In Two Books. By George Ramsay, B. M., Author of an Essay on the Distribution of Wealth, &c. Octavo, pp. 554. London: Pickering.

No speculative inquiry can have the importance of that which comprehends the entire "end and aim" of our being;—the pursuit of the purest happiness by the best means, the scope of which embraces the present and the future—Time and Eternity.

In entering upon the Enquiry into the Principles of Human Happiness, our author recognises two grand divisions of this subject; first, Speculative Morality, or that branch which treats of the nature and origin of the moral sentiments; and Practical Morality, which investigates the qualities of actions, and fixes their rule or standard; what Mackintosh terms "the Criterion of Morality." The fundamental principle of moral action is admitted by Mr. Ramsay to be Utility; but not utility in the restricted or loose sense in which, as he thinks, the term has been employed by Paley and Bentham, and the other utilitarian moralists; who, our author alleges, have, in general, laid too much stress upon the sensual and self-regarding pleasures, and too little on the purely mental and social; or if the masters have not done so, then this tendency has been shown by the disciples. He thinks the Utility of the Benthamites, in short, not sufficiently exalted and comprehensive. He would discard the phrase, if it were practicable, in favour of another; Eudemonism, invented by Mr. Whewell, and derived from the Greek word signifying happiness; and rather be called an Eudemonist than a Utilitarian.——A decided, if not, indeed, the leading merit of the work, is the manner in which the writer has treated his subject. His style is singularly lucid; and from scope and felicity of illustration, the treatise is calculated to be generally attractive, even to those who shrink the most from such speculations and discussions. If necessarily sometimes grave, it is never dull, complex, many, or monotonous. Though it is not in our power to give an analysis of the treatise, we shall, as far as is possible, (within very limited bounds,) endeavour to convey an idea of the spirit and execution of the Enquiry, by the quotation of a few detached passages, principally recommended by their utility, or Eudemonism.

MORAL EDUCATION.

The grand object of all moral education ought to be to stir up those inclinations which are naturally weak, and so to tame, or at least curb, those which are apt to run into excess. It will readily be granted that the self-regarding desires are more likely to become excessive or exclusive than the social; and that the natural tendency to the pleasures of sense is stronger than to those of the intellect, the imagination, and the affections. Moreover, the gratification of the present hour, fleeting though it may be, is apt to be preferred to a more permanent but distant interest. From these general facts, which are amply confirmed by experience, we draw the following conclusions. Moral Education ought to have three principal objects in view; first to encourage the social desires, and thus keep in check the self-regarding; secondly, to foster a taste for the pleasures of the intellect, the imagination, and the affections, and so discourage the sensual; thirdly, to teach self-control.

Man, though born with a capability for much that is great and exalted, would have scarcely any idea beyond the pleasures of sense, were he left by others to follow his natural inclinations. Education alone can call forth this latent capability, and create a taste for refined enjoyments. What a miserable miscalculation is that which seeks for happiness chiefly in the indulgence of the senses! For the sake of short-lived gratifications we lose the constant pleasure derived from a consciousness of the dignity of our nature, and get a distaste for purely mental delights which are very durable.

Since man, when left to himself, degenerates into an animal but little raised above the brutes, and since education alone can draw out his susceptibilities for the joys of the intellect,—of the imagination,—of the affections; wherever we find a strong attachment to these, we may be sure of a cultivated mind. A considerable part of mankind, even of those who have leisure from manual toil, know little of the pleasures derived from the two former, though there are few in civilized regions who do not share in the last. Travellers in picturesque countries are often surprised at the insensibility of the peasantry to all the beauties around them, and these again equally wonder what strangers come to see. Even among those who are called well educated, how many are dead to high intellectual delight, as well as to the charms of poetry! Even the great Newton called poetry ingenious nonsense, because he could not relish it; and how many treat metaphysics with no greater ceremony! . . . . . If man without education be naturally sensual, it is no less true that he is also selfish. Men may form erroneous notions of their interest, they may pursue apparent rather than real good; and they may often be diverted from their permanent advantage by a present temptation; but in all this we see the tendency to self more or less guided by reason. No one seems to think that this tendency is too weak, however badly it may be directed. On the other hand, the tendency to sympathize with the pleasures and pains of others, and to desire their welfare is very rarely too strong; and in the want of cultivation, it may scarcely appear at all. Here then again education steps in and opens our minds to feelings as necessary to our own happiness as to that of others; since the pleasures derived from the exercise of the benevolent affections, whether towards a few or many, are probably the greatest of which our nature is susceptible. The culture of these affections has a twofold good effect; for it checks those two great tendencies of our nature, the tendency to self, and that to sense; whereas the improvement of the intellect and imagination counteracts the latter alone. How can a being immersed in sensual indulgencies have any relish for the exalted and lasting delights of love and friendship? But without supposing a devotion to such indulgencies in particular, the circumstance of constantly pondering upon our own interests, of whatever kind they may be, tends amazingly to shut the heart to social affections, and therefore to deprive us of the greatest happiness of life.

We stop before the discussion reaches the difference which, according to our author, ought to be made between the education of man and woman, as we are not sure that the female philosophers and their champions will approve of the distinctions laid down. Mr. Ramsay's favourite, Madame Roland, undoubtedly cultivated her intellect as carefully as her imagination.——There is a long and very recondite and poetical chapter on Love, which we recommend to readers of all ages; the recent case of M. Gentz,—by no means an uncommon one,—establishing the fact that the subject may have interest to the latest term of life. This alluring topic is dwelt upon, and embellished and enriched by apt quotations gathered from the entire range of poetry and imaginative literature. From the conclusion of the dissertation on Love, we copy, as a sober specimen, the following remarks on marriages of convenience:—

If purely passionate marriages be very silly, marriages of pure convenience are so too; though in this case the folly is not quite so palpable. The evils of the former are such as any one may see: straitened circumstances, misunderstandings, quarrels, and sometimes final dislike; all which strike us the more by contrast with the previous love. The latter, on the contrary, carry an air of wisdom about them; they are said to be prudent, convenient, and so forth; but how often is folly clothed in a borrowed garb! One would think that any man of sense and spirit, having the common use of his bodily faculties, would rather delve or plough than submit to pass his life with one who was quite indifferent. To be burthened for life with such a weary load, to feel it at all hours, and on all occasions, at home and in society, at table, and by the fire-side, to be hampered eternally, and never be able to forget it, is a consummation of annoyance, which nothing, one would think, but absolute necessity, could induce a man to undergo. But facts speak otherwise; for marriages of this kind are not only very common, but in some countries there are scarcely any other. This, it must be confessed, does not speak much for the general clear-sightedness of men; but above all, it shows how they are led by example; for where such alliances have long been usual, they are entered upon as a matter of course.

Independently of its merits as a systematic treatise on Morals, the Enquiry deserves commendation from the beautiful character and pure tendency of what may be called its accessories and adjuncts. At once, as specimens of the style, and from their specific object, we cite two brief passages, distinct in their nature, but each commendable:—

PURE AND INEXPENSIVE PLEASURES.

It has often been said, but cannot be too often repeated, that there is no such source of enjoyment as an innocent, pure, and simple mind, ready to enter into every passing amusement, and to cull every flower, however humble, that may strew the path of life. How mistaken the notion that happiness consists in fuss, splendour, and noise, and in splendid rather than in cheap recreations! but how much greater is the delusion, that the transitory delirium of intemperance can compensate the loss of innocence and simplicity of mind, which are necessary to give relish to all natural enjoyments! Take, for instance, the pleasure to be derived from the contemplation of nature in all its various forms. Can we conceive any source of gratification more accessible, more permanent, more free from immediate pain or ultimate evil? Wherever men are brought together, whether for business or pleasure, there is always the possibility of something disagreeable, from the clashing of opinions or interests, the difference of tastes, the varieties of humour, or simply the contrast of position. Since inequality must always exist, there will always be inferiors who may feel disagreeably humbled in the presence of their superiors. But in the presence of nature, we are free from all these causes of annoyance, for she has neither opinions nor interests, tastes nor whims, pride nor affectation. She is indeed a loving mother, for she calls upon all her children to come and drain her treasures and be satisfied,—treasures that contain no alloy, and require neither bolt nor bar, which are gathered without present pain, and enjoyed without future sorrow.

Oh, nature! a' thy shows and forms
To feeling, pensive hearts hae charms,
Whether the kindly summer warms
With life and light;
Or winter howls in dusky storms
The lang, dark night.

But rarely are the votaries of intemperance susceptible of pleasures such as these. As well might we suppose that a palate long used to high dressed dishes should relish simple fare, as that a mind given up to dissipation should feel the charms of nature, and conceive the luxury of contemplation.

WHY HONESTY IS THE BEST POLICY.

In regard to justice, it has long been a maxim that honesty is the best policy, and if we consider the nature of men, we shall be satisfied that the maxim is true. For one man that makes a fortune by dishonest practices, we may rest assured that there are ninety and nine who fail. The great error of the dishonest is this, that they think themselves wiser, or, at least, act as if they thought themselves wiser, than all with whom they have to do. They forget that men in general are by no means inattentive to their interests, and that persons, on other occasions dull and narrow-minded, are here sufficiently alive. How short-sighted is a line of conduct which can prosper only if people in general were foolish, or indifferent! From the well-known eagerness of men about their own affairs, dishonesty is almost sure to be detected, and followed by disgrace and shame, desertion and ruin, if not by legal punishment.

Besides, even while undiscovered, there must be a constant dread of discovery, and what sort of life is that which is passed in continual alarm? Suppose knavery undetected and finally triumphant, would such triumph compensate for a long life of previous anxiety? Palpable success may be great, outward appearances may be splendid; but who but the giddy and superficial are deceived by these? Let us look to the mind within, and then let us say whether a life of fear can be balanced by the gifts of fortune, or all the outward advantages which the wide world can bestow.

In some cases, the period of triumph is the period of the greatest anxiety; for a high estate, though gained, may still be lost. Such, in particular, is the fate of those who by violence and injustice have risen to supreme power. Read the intimate history, as far as known, of the most celebrated tyrants of ancient and modern times, and then say whether they were happy. When we know that men naturally of the greatest courage, came at last to tremble at a shadow, we must confess that vice is inseparably connected with punishment; for if that punishment do not follow from private vengeance or public justice, it is sure to flow from the terrors which haunt the guilty.

The Perils of the Nation. An Appeal to the Legislature, the Clergy, and the Higher and Middle Classes. London: Seeley, Burnside, & Seeley.

The author of this singular book may be described as a prosaic, matter-of-fact, or "coat-and-waistcoat" Carlyle—Carlyle without his robes, his attitudes, his rolling cataract of words, the clouds of incense in which he involves himself, and the divining-rod with which he alternately astonishes and menaces his auditory; and we must also add, without his genius and eloquence. The author of The Perils of the Nation has most carefully exhibited the condition of the nation by the Daguerreotype process, where Mr. Carlyle dashes off his pictures with a few bold Martinic lines, filled up with vague, flitting, horrible shadows of coming events, veiled in portentous blackness. The substance of their respective appeals is the same; the style as opposite as the poles. Both are called for by the times: both must produce a good effect. The author of The Perils grounds his arguments on facts drawn from Parliamentary reports, and other authentic sources. He takes, as a starting-note, a sentence of Lord Ashley's late awful speech, and after some pertinent prefatory remarks, comes to his chapters—"England's Power and Weakness—Wealth and Peril," "The Manufacturing Poor," the "Mining Poor," the "Commercial Poor," the "Agricultural Poor," "The Selfish Principle," "Taking care of Number One," "Pauperism," "Want of sanitary regulations," "Education," &c., &c. And next, the remedies are proposed, where, if the great principle, assumed and inculcated, of doing as we would be done by, were kept in view, none would be required. As to details, he would have sanitary regulations, good education for the poor, moral training, church extension, more efficient pastoral care—but only by the Church of England—and a better Poor Law. But as we cannot fully detail the objects of the work, we shall go no further than to say, that with strong prejudices, and even bigoted notions on many points, the author displays much benevolent feeling and sound Christian morality. The feeling is always better than the judgment.

The volume is also of value, as it brings within reasonable compass a view derived from undisputable facts, of the wretched condition of the poor of England, and of the besetting errors and vices of the middle class.

As poor specimens of what, with all its errors, we must esteem a useful and well-timed book, we select these passages from the chapter contending for Parliamentary interference with what are considered private affairs, and repudiating what Mr. Carlyle calls Laisses faire.

Among those who are interested in upholding the present state of things, we often hear of an infringement of constitutional liberty, if Parliament shall presume to interfere. On the assumption, that in this country a man may do whatsoever he will with his own, some would uphold the English husband's right to condemn his wife to the drudgery of a beast of burden, to probable prostitution, and no less probable death;—an English father's right to cripple and destroy his infants by selling them to such toil as their tender bodies are utterly incapable of enduring, and to shut out from their minds every ray of knowledge, human or divine;—an English master's right to use his hired servants with a cruelty more withering than that beneath which the African slave formerly groaned; binding them under the yoke, by exhibiting as the penalty of their refusing to earn a scanty meal at so grinding a price, the certainty of imprisonment in a Union workhouse, divorced from every natural tie, unless they prefer starving in the midst of their famishing family. Of such rights as these, the persons in question are very tenacious; and extremely sensitive of the least approach to infringement on chartered liberties; but the legislature has a higher duty to perform, than sanctioning this licentious abuse of our national birthright, freedom.

The House of Commons consists of a certain number of gentlemen, sent thither by their respective constituencies, as being in their judgment best qualified to represent them. Their duty is, to take a comprehensive view of all national matters, and so to apply legal checks, encouragements, and regulations, as shall, in the view of the majority, best conduce to the well-being of the people. They are sworn to the right discharge of these and other well-defined duties; and the conscientious performance of their oath is the paramount obligation.

. . . . . One portion of the community has been encroaching on another, until the latter have not means to live, and scarcely room to die. To mask the true source of the anomalous evil, a cry is raised of "surplus population," and this surplus is always, by some fatality, found to exist among the poor. In the peerage, we may find instances of a dozen or fifteen children, and nobody ventures to call them "surplus;" they are rightly and scripturally regarded as a blessing: but let a labouring man admit the fact of having half as many mouths to satisfy, and they are all "surplus:" and preventive checks, and moral restraints (the latter being the most glaring abuse of language that ever was perpetrated) are talked of.

FEMALE MANUFACTURERS.

Marriages are formed, despite the universal licentiousness that seems to set the sacred tie at defiance; and the young wife enters upon her domestic duties wholly unacquainted with, and unfitted for, their performance. Her morals may have escaped the practical pollution of the mass, her mind cannot have continued undefiled in the daily hearing and seeing of such abominations; and she becomes, if the injuries sustained by the crippling nature of her employment have not incapacitated her from child-bearing, the mother of infants whom she knows not to train otherwise than upon factory principles; who are probably doomed, as soon as their little limbs shall have gained sufficient strength for the lightest description of labour, to be driven to the same shambles, and sacrificed to the same golden idol as their parents were. The man, meanwhile, finding no household fireside rendered pleasant in its poverty by female neatness and good management, cheerfulness and love, betakes himself to the gin-shop, or the Chartist meeting, to be wrought up by fiery potations and fiery harangues, to the pitch necessary for whatsoever evil work lies before him; whether it be in the dens of grovelling sensuality, or in scenes where the murderer whets his weapon, and the incendiary trims his torch.

A letter received last summer from a large town in Yorkshire, said, "Three years ago, at the opening of the morning, you might have seen flocking into our town, from the hamlets adjacent, more than seven hundred men, who were regularly employed in the factories of the place. You would now see them no longer; but in their room you would see seven hundred women, leaving the husbands unemployed, and their infants without female care, and all thronging in to do that very work which formerly gave occupation and a maintenance to their husbands. I need not explain, that the wages they receive are far lower, the condition of their families far more miserable, and that the saving thus effected by their employers is the sole cause of this deplorable change."

From Birmingham, one of the most energetic and well-informed of the clergy writes to the same effect. Even in the heavy and laborious metallic works of that place, female labour is rapidly superseding that of the men. The cause is quite obvious. A woman may be offered ten or twelve shillings a-week, when a male artisan would expect twenty or twenty-four. Hence vast numbers of the men have, within the last two or three years, been dismissed, and their wives taken on, to do the same work at lower wages. The operation of the change is deplorable. The man remains bound to the spot, because it is there that his wife is earning a poor subsistence for himself and the children. Yet he,—there being hundreds in the same circumstances, finds it quite impossible to get any employment. He lounges about the streets, or at the door of the beer-shop, or tries in vain to supply a mother's place to the miserable and crying children; till, exhausted in the vain attempt, he is driven forth into the streets, a fit instrument for Chartist or Socialist agitators. Meanwhile the woman becomes brutalized by her toil, and by workshop society, and cares only, when she returns home at night, for the recruiting her exhausted strength and spirits by such means as her poor earnings will afford.

Arts, Antiquities, and Chronology of Ancient Egypt. By George H. Wathen, Architect. Longman & Company.

Egypt, as the birth-place and cradle of his art, must ever be a country of peculiar interest to the Architect; but if he is also an antiquary, the attraction is irresistible. Mr. Wathen visited Egypt partly for professional improvement, and also to gratify a liberal curiosity. The result of his investigations leads him to conclude, that many incorrect opinions are current regarding Egyptian antiquities, and particularly as to the age of some of the most interesting monuments. In his very elegant work, Mr. Wathen, with diffidence, submits these views to the judgment of the public. This is the original feature of the volume. It is embellished with architectural and other plates, mostly taken from the magnificent works published by the French and Tuscan governments, and with tinted lithograph plates from views made by the author.

History of the Life of Cœur-de-Lion. By G. P. R. James, Esq. Volume III. Saunders & Otley.

This, we imagine, is to turn out a complete History of the Crusades, under the name of Cœur-de-Lion. The new volume relates more to Palestine than to England. It is full of interesting matter, and shows careful study.

Life of the Rev. James Renwick, the last of the Scottish Martyrs. By the Rev. Robert Simpson, author of "Traditions of the Covenanters," &c., &c. Edinburgh: Johnstone.

The early history, and perilous adventures of Renwick, while concealing himself from the myrmidons of a persecuting government, and persisting in preaching and teaching what were called the seditious and treasonable doctrines of active resistance, form the subject-matter of a small and rather homely volume, which will, however, be perused with interest in the rural parts of the south and west of Scotland. Those the most directly opposed to Renwick's conscientious views, must admit that he was an honest and amiable enthusiast, most severely treated, and most unjustly condemned for offences which would now be thought sufficiently expiated by, at the utmost, a few months' imprisonment.

The Last Days; their near Approach and Perilous Character, &c., &c. London: Ward & Co.

A Treatise on Astronomy, displaying the Solar System, &c. By E. Henderson, LL.D. Second Edition. London: Cotes.

Benthamiana; or, Select Extracts from the Works of Jeremy Bentham, with an Outline of his Opinions on the principal Subjects discussed in his Works. Edited by John Hill Burton, Advocate. Edinburgh: Tait; London: Simpkin, Marshall, & Co.

This is an excellent book of an excellent class, and one that must, as the world grows older, and as books and readers are multiplied, be greatly increased. It is a compendium which brings the whole doctrines, opinions, and systems of Bentham within the reach of men of moderate means, and of moderate leisure for study. It affords them the very pith and marrow of all that Bentham has thought with the most power and originality, and expressed with the greatest clearness and felicity. Many of these brief sections form a striking moral Essay; many of them are apt and forcible illustrations of some question in legislation, or administrative justice and general police. Mr. Burton has given interest and completeness to his BENTHAMIANA, by an Introductory Sketch of the Life of the Philosopher, and specimens from his familiar Correspondence. He has given the public a suggestive, useful, and what ought to be an imperishable book.

Rambles in the Isle of Wight. By John Gwilliam. Simpkin, Marshall, & Co.

These sketches are written in verse. Rhymed couplets is the metre adopted. The author takes a text from a prose description of the scenery of the island, and expatiates upon it; interspersing reflections, sentiments, and incidents. It is a work of no great mark; but may prove a pleasant travelling companion to persons making the now favourite and easy tour of the Isle of Wight.

NEW NOVELS.

The Amnesty; or, the Duke of Alba in Flanders: An Historical novel of the sixteenth century, in 2 volumes. By Charles F. Ellerman. Longman & Co.

A melo-dramatic novel, full of romantic situation and incident, which gets along trippingly, without the encumbrance of a heavy load of public events or characters, and which, without much depth, makes pleasant light reading; while, in a liberal spirit, it conveys a modicum of historical information in the way best suited to the popular taste.

King Eric and the Outlaws; or, the Throne, the Church, and the People, in the Thirteenth Century. By Ingemann. Translated from the Danish by Jane Frances Chapman. Three volumes. Longman & Co.

This is really what it purports to be—a historical romance, though of too solid a character, and too remote from English knowledge, sympathies, and tastes, to offer much attraction to the ordinary class of romance-readers. ——To those who like to see the manners of past ages among a kindred people, revived in a dramatic form, the romance, will, however, have considerable attraction. It is learned in antiquities, faithful to costume and historical character, and a very fair specimen of the school of Sir Walter Scott. The success of Frederika Bremer's Swedish novels in this country seems, however, to intimate that English readers would be more easily fascinated, and the Translator's labour better repaid, by the selection of a good Tale of Modern Denmark, than by Ingemann's national romances of the olden time.

NEW POEMS.

KELVIN GROVE, AND OTHER POEMS. By William Bentley, Senior. Glasgow: D. Robertson.—This is a neatly embellished little volume of fugitive verses on an endless variety of poetical subjects, or such as are usually chosen to write rhymes upon. Though none of the pieces are in a very striking or original vein, many of them are fluent and sweet.

JUVENILE POEMS. By John Ingham Black, Trinity College, Dublin.

IRWELL, AND OTHER POEMS. By A.

GATHERED LEAVES. By James A. Page, of Trinity College, Dublin. Longman & Company.—A bundle this of verses considerably above the average of those that it is often our weary task to turn over.

RETRIBUTION, LOYAL LYRICS, &c. London: Ward.

POEMS. By Viator. Saunders & Otley.

 Some volumes of verse that have appeared in Scotland within the last few months we reserve for a more convenient season.

SERIAL WORKS.

THE BIOGRAPHICAL DICTIONARY OF THE SOCIETY FOR THE DIFFUSION OF USEFUL KNOWLEDGE. Vol. II. Part II. Longman & Co.—We are glad to find that the committee appointed to carry through this great undertaking, have obtained some pecuniary aid from several noblemen and gentlemen, as a great deal of money must be required to carry the work to the conclusion contemplated, or indeed to any satisfactory conclusion. A few more names of really useful working men are, we perceive, added to the list of contributors; so that we may reasonably hope that that great desideratum in English literature, a comprehensive and accurate General Biography, may, in due time, be supplied.

THE BOOK OF SCOTTISH SONG, Nos. V., VI., VII., VIII., IX. This comprehensive "Book of Ballads" goes on prosperously. The cariorum notes turn out an immense improvement; and the work altogether must prove the most comprehensive popular body of Scottish song, and of songs by Scotchmen, published at a cheap rate, which we yet possess. The short biographical notices of such a host of hitherto nameless bards, are of themselves a great curiosity. Alas! that so many of them should be but the brief record of a life of adversity and conflict, and a premature death. But, as Burns has it, "Man is a soldier, and life is a faught."

One among the most graceful of the new songs, affords both a cue and consolation:

Weep not over poet's wrong,
Mourn not his mischances,
Sorrow is the source of song,
And of gentle fancies.

Rills o'er rocky beds are borne,
Ere they gush in whiteness;
Peebles are wave-chafed and worn,
Ere they show their brightness.

THE ZOIST: A Quarterly Journal of Cerebral Physiology and Mesmerism. No. I. London: H. Bailliere.—The other day we announced the PHRENO-MAGNET—a new periodical devoted to the now twin sciences of Phrenology and Mesmerism. Here is another which takes higher and more classic ground, though on the same field. The editor of the ZOIST, whoever he may be, is greatly scandalized at the editor of the Phreno-Magnet, Mr. Spencer Hall, having, by the aid of Mesmerism, discovered whole clusters of new organs about the eye-brows, and the root of the nose, to which Mr. Hall gives appropriate names; and at the mania for lecturing on Mesmerism and Phrenology, which has of late seized so many individuals, ill qualified to meddle with these mysteries.

THE ASIATIC JOURNAL AND MONTHLY MISCELLANY. Third Series. No. I. London: W. H. Allen & Co.

KNIGHT'S PICTORIAL SHAKSPERE. Part LIII.: of Shakspere, a Biography, Part 7.

CHAMBERS'S CYCLOPÆDIA OF ENGLISH LITERATURE. Parts VI. and VII.

THE OLD SAILOR'S JOLLY BOAT. Nos. I. II.

POPULAR FLOWERS—the Camellia, the Cactus.

CUMMING'S FOXE'S BOOK OF MARTYRS. Part XXIV.

SCENERY AND ANTIQUITIES OF IRELAND. Part XXV.

THE MILLER OF DEANHAUGH. Nos. II. and III.

PAMPHLETS AND TRACTS.

BRITISH AND FOREIGN TRAVELLER'S GUIDE.—This purports to be a Directory for all parts of the United Kingdom, as to the times of sailing, and fares of steamers, and the time of setting off of railway and other coaches. The little paper guide contains a great mass of information which must be found very useful to travellers. It notices the Continental railways and Colonial steamers in the same manner as the home ones.

GLYPHOGRAPHY; OR, ENGRAVED DRAWING, for printing at the type-press after the manner of wood-cuts.—We have here specimens of cuts executed by Palmer's patent, with directions for the use of the patent. The plates look fair; but are by no means equal to the best of those executed in the old manner. They are, however, recommended by cheapness.

PHOTOGRAPHIC MANIPULATION.—This Tract contains directions for executing the details of the improved processes of Daguerreotype and Calotype drawing, if drawing it may be called. So many amateurs are at present trying this curious process of making pictures, that these directions will be found very useful in directing their labour, and tending to prevent the disappointment which too often follows their crude attempts.

EQUITY WITHOUT COMPROMISE; OR, HINTS FOR THE CONSTRUCTION OF A JUST SYSTEM OF NATIONAL EDUCATION. By Edward Swaine.

Printed by WILLIAM TAIT, 107, Princes' Street, Edinburgh.

TAIT'S EDINBURGH MAGAZINE.

AUGUST, 1843.

THE REPEAL AGITATION.

THE Repeal Agitation is a new name in politics to many inhabitants of Britain; but the spirit, of which it is the outward sign, is as old as the historical event of which it demands the nullification. Clarendon, when he speaks of the bursting out of the flame in Scotland, which blazed into a civil war throughout the empire, says, "The truth is, there was so little curiosity either in the court, or the country, to know anything of Scotland, or what was done there, that, when the whole nation was solicitous to know what passed weekly in Germany and Poland, and all other parts of Europe, no man ever inquired what was doing in Scotland." And so have the British people continued ignorant of the national feeling that has been smouldering in Ireland, till they find that they have been standing on the ashes of a slumbering volcano, ready to burst forth again. It may be that, before these pages have reached the public, the war-trumpet has been sounded. But while we write, there is a stillness in the councils of the Ministry—the stillness of terror—the silence of men who wis not what to do; while, in the people, there is a breathless half-curious, half-timid expectation of some coming event, of which the results are as far beyond the grasp of accurate prediction, as the causes have been kept out of sight, and out of mind. When we look at the catastrophes which distant countries or old times reveal to us, as the consequences of tyrannical and selfish legislation, we wonder at the blindness and perversity of the men who provoked them. When we ponder over the History of Maximilian of Austria, and Philip II. of Spain, and Christian of Denmark, and our own Charles I., we seem to read of men whom some supernatural destiny kept blind to the moral causes of the moral effects by which their empires were broken; and yet it may be that some of our shrewd and wary politicians, being human beings such as these monarchs were, and such as George III. was when the people of Boston cast the tea-chests into the sea, may be subject to a like blindness, and may have been living in a like dangerous security. It would have been better, perhaps, for the peace, the integrity, and the prosperity of the country, if our statesmen had examined the view which foreign politicians—calm, but not uninterested observers—take of the relative positions of England and Ireland. They would have there found the question stripped of all its class and party disguises, and exhibited in the nakedness of historical truth—such as it will be when examined by the Hallams and the Raumers of the next century. They would have seen, that what Switzerland was to Austria, what Holland was to Spain, what Sweden was to Denmark, what Greece was to Turkey, and what Poland is to Russia, such is it considered that Ireland is to Britain; and they would have found, that from the time when Hoche collected his forces, to the present hour, Europe has been looking in anxious expectation for the day on which Ireland, outraged and crushed for centuries, will turn and bite, with poisoned tooth, the heel by which she has been trodden. The proclamation of the Emperor Nicolas spoke of the Polish rising as an "unnatural rebellion;" and Sir James Graham tells us, that conciliation to the Irish is exhausted. The two expressions are the representatives of each other. What will foreigners think of Sir James Graham's remark? let us ask it at ourselves—What do we think of the Emperor Nicolas's? Alas! of the quantity of sympathy for lacerated human feelings which we have at our disposal, there is much exported to a distance that might be beneficially expended near our own door. The patriot bosom burns with indignation at the story of Tell ordered to bow down before the hat of Gesler in the market-place; while seven millions of the Irish people are forced to bow their heads in subjection to a faith which they conscientiously believe is not the right path to salvation. Sir Robert Peel, in one of the speeches which he made before he had resolved to support Catholic Emancipation, said, "Emancipate the Catholics; and if they are constituted as other men—if they have organs, senses, affections, and passions like ourselves—they never will submit to our intrusive Church, or cease to aspire to the reëstablishment of their own." Is it not a startling illustration of a guilty consciousness of the perpetration of injustice, that the perpetrator can calculate from the extent of the injury itself, without any other data, what will be the amount of indignation among "people constituted as other men"? It was the remark of the Premier's congenial colleague, Stanley, when he was supporting the Whig Coercion Bill, that the very extent of its infringement on the Constitution, marked it as a measure not likely to be had recourse to without sufficient cause. How barbarous is our Political Philosophy, when the very extent of the injustice they commit, is the vindication of our statesmen!

It will be inferred from the foregoing remarks, that we are not inclined to take a harsh or uncharitable view of the proceedings of our Irish brethren. We believe them to be men sorely wronged; and if in their hour of wrath and power they should demand more than seems to be abstractly just, we are not prepared to judge of them severely. But the course which may be palliated on account of the provocation which has occasioned it, and that which may be abstractly vindicated as right, are two very different things; and it does not follow, that because we may palliate the present agitation for repeal, we hold its object to be a good one. The question is one which we think, in its abstract merits, and apart from passion and prejudice, has not been fully examined by the press, and we propose to bestow a page or two on its consideration. We do not pretend—our present disposable space would not allow us—to exhaust the subject, or even to present it for consideration in all its bearings. Great books have been devoted, and not superfluously, to subjects less pregnant with important interest; and if we can state the considerations that ought to weigh with the public mind in examining such a question, and give a few reasons and illustrative facts, we shall be content. We shall give no harbour to unsubstantial visions concerning national independence and national name, about arms and their bearers, mottoes, costumes, and colours. The day when these things decided the fate of a country is past—at least in this quarter of the world,—and substantial utilitarianism, with statistical reports and political economy under her arms, has taken their place. We care for none of these things nearer home; and it would be affectation to profess a sympathy for any relic of them that may exist in Ireland.

The arguments that have been used on this subject have generally affected to look solely to the interests of Ireland. When you advise a man to abstain from the thing he is inclined to do, you generally try to persuade him that you act solely for his own interest. In weighing the matter, however, abstractly, and without consideration as to the party-strength with which either side can be supported, we cannot admit the proposition, that in considering whether two islands, which have been united for more than forty years, should voluntarily sever, the interest of one alone is to be considered, and that of the other to weigh as nothing. It may be said, that it was a forced partnership; and that Ireland, which was seized and bound over to Britain, is justified by all principles of morality in making her escape when she can, without troubling herself about the effect which such an event may have on her deserted partner. The argument would be a sound one, if the British people had forced the Irish people into the Union; but the former had as little influence in the matter as the latter had. The arrangement was made between a section of the British aristocracy, on the one hand, and of the Irish aristocracy on the other. The people of both countries were injured—the Irish, perhaps, more materially than we. If the Union had been a free and honest one between the people of the two islands, we believe that the Irish would have readily consented to bear their full share of the mutual taxation, and we should certainly have agreed to let them have the same political and religious privileges as ourselves. But as the matter came to pass, the inhabitants of England and Scotland were over-taxed, in order that the Irish aristocracy might enjoy exemptions, by way of compensation for the insults heaped on the Irish democracy. The thing was as little the doing of Jenkins, and Smith, and M'Donald, in Britain, as it was of O'Leary, and Murphy, and O'Doud, in Ireland. If the British aristocracy in Parliament have been no friends to the Irish people, we can tell, in return, that the Irish aristocracy, whom the Union brought to hold rule over us, have been no friends to the British people. The present state of matters was, in short, no more the doing of the people of Britain, than it was of the people of Ireland. We are all "in the scrape;" and in whatever measures may be taken to get out of it, we deny that it is fair to look to the interest of Ireland solely and exclusively,—we deny, we say, that it is abstractly fair to view the question in such a light, although, in the exasperated state of Ireland, we can have some charity for one-sided views being adopted. But we profess to be able, at least on the present occasion, to discuss only a part of the question; and we have no objection to limit our remarks to the bearing which a Repeal of the Union would have on Ireland alone, leaving out of view its influence on ourselves.

A Repeal of the Union means a separation of the governments. It involves the most perfect freedom to Ireland to choose her own constitution—to have any king, or no king; to have her own alliances and her own wars. It is the most puerile folly to say, that she shall have an independent internal constitution, with which she may not do as she pleases. There might be a treaty of separation; what is a treaty to an independent nation, with its own legislature, its own laws, its own religion, and its own army? The succession to England is limited to Protestants. Degrading as that limitation may be felt by Ireland at present, how much more so would it be that the separate kingdom of Ireland should be bound to pass over a Catholic and adopt England's elected Protestant monarch? There can be no union of the executive with a distinct legislature, unless the one country be under the control of the other. If the monarch should be called on to do one thing by the English parliament, and another by the Irish, the stronger would invariably triumph over the weaker. Where is the monarch that would do what the Irish parliament commanded and the English should forbid? The history of Ireland before the Union is full of instruction on this point. During the existence of Poyning's Law, no act could pass the Irish legislature unless it had previously obtained the sanction of the privy-council of England; the British parliament legislated for Ireland, and the British House of Lords decided in appeals from the Irish courts of law. It must always be borne in mind, that Ireland had only for eighteen years—from 1782 to 1800—a separate independent legislature. These were years of despotic principles and strong governments, lavish in rewards to friends and punishments to foes. Yet with all the quantity of influence they had substituted for constitutional control, English statesmen could not look without tremulous anxiety at the movements of the independent authority that had erected itself beside them; and they worked their way with deadly energy towards the Union as a city of refuge. All the drilling and all the rewarding could not keep the Irish from an attempt at separation, on the only question that gave room for it; and the recovery of George III., in 1789, probably averted disunion and war. The English parliament, by statute, gave the Prince of Wales a restricted regency: the Irish parliament, by an address, acknowledged his possession of the full rights of a reigning sovereign. On another occasion, nothing but the stringent pressure of British influence could have prevented Ireland from declaring a separate war against Portugal, the ally of England. But we have said more than enough in support of what is self-evident, and shall make no farther apology for discussing the Repeal of the Union as the virtual separation of the two countries.

Among the greater grievances of Ireland, that which seems to be the most closely interwoven with the legislative Union, is the inequality of her representation in parliament. In the House of Commons, England, with a population close on fifteen millions, has 500 representatives, being 1 to every 30,000. Ireland, with a population of 8,179,359, has 105 representatives, or 1 to every 77,908. In this view, England is nearly three times as well, or rather as much, represented as Ireland. Then take the proportion of the electors to the population. The whole electors of the kingdom amount to about a million, being about 1 to every 27 inhabitants. Of these, England has (or had, by the last return we can command, which dates in 1839) within a very few of 800,000, or about 1 to every 19 inhabitants. Ireland has a fraction above 100,000, or about 1 for every 80 of the population. If Ireland were represented on the same scale as England, she would have 250 members, instead of 105. In England there are upwards of 80 represented boroughs, the population of each of which is under 10,000.* Of these there are 57 which each return two members; and taking the average population of these at 6000, a population of 342,000 returns more members to parliament than the eight millions of Ireland.

This is undoubtedly a grievance of great magnitude. However, it is not in the scantiness of the representation that the grievance consists, but in its disproportion to that of England, and its consequent incapacity to represent the interests of the people of Ireland with proper relative strength. The numerousness of Parliament is in itself a defect; 105 members might be sufficient for independent Ireland; and, as a method of accomplishing an equalisation, we would prefer the lopping off and uniting of the smaller constituencies of England, to the making any considerable addition to the number of Irish members.

But admitting, as we do, the extent of the grievance, and the efficacy of the remedy, are there not simpler, surer, less dangerous paths by which the Irish people may reach this object, than a severance of the connexion with Britain? They are not, let it be remarked, without large classes of people in Britain to make common cause with them. Scotland is unequally represented, though not so much so as Ireland. Our more than two millions and a half of people have only fifty-three representatives, or one to about 50,000—England having one to every 30,000. There are twenty-seven boroughs in England, containing among them a population of 120,000, that return as many members as Scotland does, and one more. Edinburgh is the smallest town in Scotland that returns two members. In England there are six boroughs, each with a population less than 4000—Buckingham, Dorchester, Evesham, Honiton, Thetford, and Wenlock,—that return each two members. In some cases, indeed, Ireland would appear to be better cared for than Scotland. Waterford, with a population under thirty thousand, and Galway, with one very little above it, have each two representatives; while Aberdeen and Dundee, with each nearly 60,000, and Paisley with nearly 50,000, have each but one. In Ireland there are eleven constituencies, each not exceeding 10,000 in population—in Scotland there are but two. But these are in themselves trifling matters—the inequality of representation is a small matter as regards nation or district—it is in regard to class that it is baneful and mischievously operative. The aristocracy of the three nations have an interest and an influence against their democracy, of an extent and effect that may laugh to scorn the competing interests of the three kingdoms as distinct communities. It is in this form that inequality of representation tells. Dublin, Glasgow, Manchester, Liverpool, Birmingham, and Leeds, with a population exceeding a million; and Dorchester, Honiton, Thetford, Evesham, Wenlock, and Buckingham, with a population of 22,000 among them, return the same number of representatives. Let Ireland ponder on this subject. If there had been a reform of the Reform Bill, removing these weak points from the hold of the enemy—abolishing a system by which the securing the vote of one man in one place, is as effectual as representing the opinions of forty in another—Ireland would have had more justice than she has obtained.

* It is necessary to say, that this part of our calculation is taken from the census of 1831; that of 1841 not being accessible to a sufficient extent to allow any general estimate, such as the above, to be taken. The reader may make what allowance he pleases for supposed changes in population.

"This may be all true," says the repealer; "but what is it to us?—we wish to redress our own grievances—do you look to yours." But it does signify thus much. There is a vast portion of our eighteen millions oppressed by the same grievance that crushes the eight millions of Ireland. If the removal of the evil be the end in view, and repeal be the proposed means, will the former be the more likely to be achieved by a project that divides and isolates the common interests? In favour of all that can be of good effect to either, there is a link of common sympathy and common feeling between the people of Ireland and the popular constituencies in Britain, that it would be a crime and a calamity to break. It is in making common cause with us that Ireland has her best chance for ultimate justice. A demand for the extension and equalisation of the Suffrage is the true policy of Ireland; and O'Connell would have done more to remove the grievances he can recount with such bitter and burning energy, if he had prevailed on the liberal members of Ireland to vote for Household Suffrage, than if he got all his millions to make one simultaneous hurrah for repeal. Eight Irish members, only, voted for Mr. Hume's motion, in 1839.* There were twelve against it.

Let us now look at the pecuniary branch of the question—the items that will have to be allowed for in the winding-up of the partnership accounts. The net receipts of the public revenue for the year ending 5th January 1842, were £48,937,397. Of this sum, the share borne by Ireland was £3,616,192, being less than a thirteenth part. The permanent branches of expenditure in Ireland were, in round numbers, (we exclude fractions,)—For courts of justice, £138,710. For police service, including the custody of convicts, secret-service money, &c., £416,744. For the Lord-lieutenant's establishment, and the public offices, £64,746. For public works and improvements, compensation salaries, the Regium Donum, &c., £107,615. For charities and educational institutions, £103,867. We have picked out the items relating to Ireland as they caught our eye in the dense thicket of the finance accounts for 1842, and we have grouped the numerous individual sums together, under the above general heads. We daresay many items may have escaped our notice; and we purposely overlooked many petty sums, or such expenditure as appeared to be of a temporary character. We have likewise passed over £91,326 charged as pensions and superannuation allowances, on the Irish list, because it is not clear how much of it is spent within Ireland. The sum total is £831,682. To compare this with the expenditure of Great Britain would bring us to no satisfactory result; because it is next to impossible to separate the charges that peculiarly affect England and Scotland, from those applicable to the services of the United Kingdom, as an individual country. Let us, however, compare the revenue and expenditure of Ireland with those of Scotland. The net revenue, for the same year, from Scotland, (exclusive of receipts from Crown lands,) was £5,026,048, being £1,409,856 more than that from Ireland. The payments (which "Oliver & Boyd's Almanac" enables us to give with great minuteness) were,—For the administration of justice, £196,042. Miscellaneous permanent charges, £63,753. Total, £259,795. It thus appears that the sum contributed to the purposes of the general revenue of the empire, by Ireland, is £2,784,510, while that contributed by Scotland is £4,766,253.

We are far from considering that the expenditure of money in Ireland is any great advantage to the Irish people. It is, in fact, as we have already hinted, a gilding of the slave's chain,—money taken from Britain, to render the perpetration of injustice more easy in Ireland. It was stipulated in the Act of Union, that "a sum not less than the sum granted by the Parliament of Ireland, on the average of six years immediately preceding 1st January 1800, in provisions for the internal encouragement of agriculture and manufactures, or for the maintaining institutions for pious and charitable purposes, shall be applied, for the period of twenty years, to such local purposes in Ireland as the Parliament of the United Kingdom shall direct." A committee, appointed to inquire into the fulfilment of this article in 1829, reported that the average expenditure, for the six years preceding the Union, was £73,270; and that the amount had gradually increased, until, for the three years preceding 1828, it averaged £173,866,—besides the grants for Maynooth college and the public works. The Report of the Finance Committee of 1817 gives an insight into the motives for this expenditure:—"Your committee must remark, that many of the charitable institutions appear to be of very doubtful advantage to those classes of society in whose favour they have been established; and that the expediency is more than questionable, of drawing together, into the capital of any country, large bodies of people desirous of partaking of the temporary support which these institutions may afford. Nevertheless, your committee do not suggest, at present, any reduction in the amount of these establishments, understanding that the people of Ireland have been accustomed to look upon them not only as affording a valuable relief in many cases of great distress, but as proving the liberal disposition of Parliament towards that part of the United Kingdom." On the one hand it gave vitality to many profitable jobs; on the other, it acted as a partial substitute for Poor-rates, in favour of the landlords.

The interest on the public debt of Ireland, for the year ending 5th January, 1842, was £1,186,963; while that on the debt of Great Britain was £28,263,161. The disparity in the amount seems to supersede the necessity of considering nice questions, as to how far Ireland should be held justly involved with Britain in the overwhelming debt with which she has been calamitously burdened. Deducting now this sum from the contribution which Ireland makes to the general revenue of the empire, we have a remainder of £1,597,527. This is what Ireland contributes to the active expenditure of an empire, of which the army and navy cost nearly fifteen millions. This does not look like a very grievous and unequal share of the burden; and the question comes to be: Could Ireland, left alone, "find herself" cheaper? It seems to be the general idea of the repealers—so much have Irishmen experienced of Saxon kindness and disinterestedness—that if Ireland be separated from Britain, she will have nothing to do but to follow her own interest and aggrandizement, backed by the gratuitous protection and assistance of England. Ireland is to trade, manufacture, and economise—England is to protect her with navies and armies. What has Britain ever done to warrant so ridiculous a supposition? Is British gold to be thus diverted from its proper channel? Yea, doubtless, if the Union were repealed to-morrow, our statesmen, as of old, would have their Irish army, and their Irish police too, paid by England; but they would not keep them up for nothing—they would get value according to their own notions of value—a resuscitation of the corruption and oppression of past times, when the protection administered to Ireland was in the blockading of her trade, and the crushing of her manufactures. But this can never be again. Ireland would have her alliances and balance-of-power projects. She might, perhaps, come under the protection of France, as Portugal has been under that of Britain; but France cannot sport subsidies. The protégé would require an army and navy—and pretty formidable ones too—to protect her from the jealous wrath of England. These things would be expensive. As to a stock to commence with, she would, of course, at parting company, be entitled to a share of the goods in communion in proportion to her contribution to the original cost; but she would have to provide for all her current expenses.

* We may here observe, in passing, that Mr. Hume's speech on this occasion, as authentically reported in Hansard, is a mine of information on the state of the Suffrage. The existence of such a document should not be forgotten; it might be useful to republish it as a separate pamphlet, with notes, bringing the information down to the present day.

Nor would an army and navy be her only expense, in addition to that of supporting a government. She would require a cordon of custom-house officers to superintend the trade with Britain. There would be counter-restrictions and prohibitions. Freedom of trade would, doubtless, be the mutual interest of the two nations; but, from the beginning, the repeal agitation has been clamorous against importation from England, and has denounced the exportation from Ireland to England as a robbery. "Heads you win,—Tails I lose" is the principle which Mr. O'Connell finds in free trade. Our barbarous ancestors were contented with one-half of the fallacy. They counted imports a loss; but they did not double the amount of their calamities by considering the exports in the same light. Is it seriously the view of the Repealers to put an end to the free trade between Britain and Ireland, which their prototypes, the volunteers, fought for and achieved? The resolutions to eschew calicoes and adhere to linen of Irish growth and make; the use of Irish frieze, with repeal buttons and home-made velvet to make it genteel, as a substitute for Yorkshire broad-cloth; the patriotic denunciations of Dutch tobacco-pipes,—are all innocent but expensive follies, which affluent people who can afford to do so, are quite entitled to indulge in. It would be as useless to interfere with these frolics, as with a patriot's determination to grow his own pepper and coffee in his own hot-house. The cost, is the protection of the public against such schemes being voluntarily acted upon: it is only when governors, who can cry, "Sink the expense!" and sleep soundly amidst the crash of bankruptcies, interfere, that they are carried to a formidable extent. And unless it be for the sake of getting the restrictive system sanctioned by laws, we see no change that can be operated by repeal. If the Irish have made up their minds voluntarily to act on the system, they are as free to pursue it at the present moment as they can ever be. The abolition of all imposts on the transfer of commodities between any one part of the world and another, is a blessing; and their restoration, where they have once been removed, would be a curse,—both alike beyond calculation. It is this blessing that the nations of the Prussian league have wisely braved so many impediments to obtain. The restrictions on the commerce with Ireland did not wholly disappear till 1825. During the course of their removal, from the Union to that period, the exports from Ireland into Britain increased from 3½ to 8½ millions. As there is now no money made to the Exchequer by the trade, there are no official returns; but there is no doubt, that since it was completely thrown open, it has increased almost in mathematical progression. M. Porter finds the import of live animals alone into the port of Liverpool from Ireland to have been, in 1837, worth £3,397,760. Between two countries so well-fitted for mutual interchange, he would be a bold man who should mark limits to the benefits that may arise from absolute freedom of trade. Nor are the advantages of like commercial laws and practices to be overlooked. The bill circulation of the British empire is supposed to amount to six hundred millions, and a uniformity of practice as to bill transactions in the two countries, would of itself be worth a considerable proportion of the annual customs duties of Ireland. As matters stand, by the way, such a uniformity has not been sufficiently cared for.

But there is a fiscal alteration, and one of a sweeping and comprehensive character, which if it should follow in the footsteps of repeal, and were not obtainable otherwise, might go far to justify the struggle. This is, the reduction of the customs and excise duties,—of all those duties which affect the consumption of the poorer classes, duties on intoxicating liquors excepted; the latter we would keep at the highest point that would not remunerate the smuggler. We must do the Repealers the justice to say, that they have held forth the reduction of these duties, and the obtainment for the people of civilized luxuries at a cheap rate, as among their ultimate objects. The Irish exemptions from taxation have been much, and justly attacked; but the working men,—the millions of the poor population, the tale of whose miseries is an overflowing well of sorrows,—are in nothing benefited by them, save in the absence of the soap-tax. It is the same classes who are benefited by the lavish expenditure, that profit by the exemptions. What chance have those whose history adorns the pages of the Poor-Law Inquiry, of reaping advantage by the exemption from the duties on armorial bearings, game certificates, dogs, horses, carriages, and houses with more than eight windows? Yet they have to pay a tax of twelve hundred per cent on their tobacco, and their sugar is trebled in price, to exclude foreign competition. These grievances are not peculiar to Ireland; but it is there that, from the preponderance of the poorer classes, their operation is exhibited on the largest scale. If, in 1825, the assessed taxes were given up to the aristocracy of Ireland, might it not be worth while trying if the democracy of the whole empire can influence the taxes that press upon the poor?

The evils of absenteeism have been prominently urged among the reasons for repeal. It is asserted that a rental of six millions is thus carried out of Ireland. We believe the only effectual means of dealing with this evil is—no thanks to Mr. O'Connéll—now in operation, in the progress of the Poor-Law. The evil consists not so much in the absence of the person of the proprietor, as in the grasping selfishness, and disregard of future consequences, characteristic of the man who believes that property has rights but not duties, and that it is only the instrument of supplying his momentary avarice. It is not less in the hunger it will prevent, than in that which it will appease, that a poor-law will make its greatest conquest. When the tenant ceases to be a mere machine for grinding rent, and must be supported on the land from which he sprung, landlords will cease to find their profit in stretching rents to the utmost that will leave a momentary support to the payer, but will adjust them to a rate that will admit of comfort and content, and call forth the exertion and emulation that are never wanting in Ireland when there is anything there worth living for. How the repeal of the Union can do much to further the return of the exiles, we cannot distinctly see. If the whole power of the Legislature were thrown into the hands of the aristocracy, we can imagine their having some inducement to leave Bath and Cheltenham—for a part of the year, at least; but if the institutions of Ireland are to be democratic, as the sympathizing Americans expect them to be, —if the franchise is to be even as wide as it is at present, we do not see how a parliament in Dublin, and no Italian opera, (Oude's reason for resigning the comptrollership of the kitchen to a Lord-Lieutenant,) would mend matters.

We admit, that as the natural consequence of repeal, there would be a pretty tolerable gathering in Dublin, and sundry butchers, bakers, tailors, and cabmen, would find the whole affair much to their advantage. The pecuniary influence of the change would go little or no farther; and, like all such alterations, it would hurt one class of tradesmen to the profit of another. The removal of so many good customers from the capital at the Union was, we have no doubt, a severe shock to the tradesmen of Dublin, and productive of much hardship. But it is now forty years since the change was made. Trade has fallen into settled channels. Very few of the present shopkeepers of Dublin commenced life with the view of employment from a legislative wisdom in College Green. Many of them, we doubt not, followed their patrons to London, and their children would have to re-migrate if matters were altered. Worthy Mr. Bish, the great lottery contractor, used to make an annual motion for an address to hold a parliament occasionally in Dublin; and the notion was characteristic of a brain accustomed to direct the revolutions of the wheel of fortune.

We cannot admit the theory, that it is a matter of indifference whether a proprietor resides among his tenants or not; but we believe his absence to be a less evil than popular opinion makes it. If it be much felt, it is a sign that there are evils of a far graver hue in the social condition to be remedied. Political economists tell us that the sending money out of a country is merely another word for sending produce; but, apart from this principle, it is in the exertions by which the rent is created, more than in the rent itself, that the wealth of a district consists. The landlord's part is but the surplus left, after the productive energy of the agriculturist or manufacturer has fed a multitude of producers. The landlord spends his income chiefly on unproductive beings,—many of them idle and worthless: and if the removal of this fund of subsistence be a calamity to a neighbourhood, it must be at all times, whether in his absence or in his presence, poor indeed in what constitutes real national wealth—an industrious productive population. Now, we do not deny that this latter is the sad condition of Ireland; but it is not in any efforts having for their ultimate object to force or coax back the landed proprietors, that an effectual remedy can be found. Their return, when it comes, will be but the effect of national prosperity—an effect that, like many others, is in anticipation confounded with its cause. In the meantime, a few of the great capitalists in England, finding temptation to settle in Ireland, would do more for her than the return of half her aristocracy. The field is wide,—the material is good. Irish heads are clear, and Irish hands are strong and active; and, what is of better augury still, Irish hearts are sound and honest, when not corrupted by the poisonous drug of oppression. Let temperance, accompanied by peaceful habits, industry, and self-respect, gain progress. Let it assume the aspect of a deep-seated moral feeling; not merely flashing forth amid the glare of religious enthusiasm, but impregnating itself with the every-day feelings and habits of the people. Then will the land be ploughed, and the seed sown; and who shall predict limits to the abundance of the harvest!

LOVE LAYS.

I.

INVITATION.

Not by Leman's lovely lake,
Or Italy far away,
Where the jocund Sun doth make Perpetual holiday;
Not in fair and festal Rome,
Not where Venice airy
Piles the palace and the dome
On her waters fairy;
On my own, my Scottish braes,
Where the tall pine darkly sways
O'er the fresh and purple heather
Green-bedappled with the fern,
Fondly, while we stray together,
I will teach, if thou wilt learn,
To love, sweet maid, to love.

Freshly blows the Autumn breeze
High over Ciach-na-Ben,
Fragrant wave the birchen trees
At Dye-brig, low in the glen.
There, if thou with me wilt stray,
Bird in April weather
Never was merrier on the spray
Than we shall be together.
Yes, fair maiden, thou wilt go!
Such sweet silence ne'er meant NO.
Thus my faithful fancy guesses
These bright eyes might ne'er look stern,
And who owns these golden tresses,
She can teach, as well as learn,
To love, sweet maid, to love.

II.

LIKING AND LOVING.

Liking is a little boy
Dreaming of a sea-employ,
Sitting by the stream, with joy,
Paper frigates sailing;
Love's an earnest-hearted man,
Champion of Beauty's clan,
Fighting bravely in the van,
Pushing and prevailing.

Liking hovers round and round,
Capers with a nimble bound,
Plants light foot on easy ground,
Through the glass to view it;
Love shoots sudden glance for glance,
Spurs the steed and rests the lance,
With a brisk and bold advance,
Sworn to die or do it.

Liking's ever on the wing,
From new blooms new sweets to bring,
Nibbling aye, the nimble thing,
From the hook is free still;
Love's a tar of British blue,
Let mad winds their maddest do,
To his haven carded true,
As am I to THEE still.

III.

LOVE'S REASONS.

Tell me why the forky fire
Darting dire,
From its cloud-home dark profound,
Seeks the ground;
Tell me why the magnet's soul
Finds the pole;
Why the warm-rubb'd amber wings
Stirless things;
Tell me why the pungent power
Of the sour,
Harshly wedding, this mate chooses
That refuses;
Why the fragrant birch, with grace,
Decks the face
Of the bare crag; why the willow
Loves the billow;
Why to-day the gentle West
Fans the breast;
Rudely why the North did bray
Yesterday;
Tell me why thy own self art
What thou art
Now, not Pompey, Cicero
Long ago;
Why, with eager agile start,
Thy strong heart
Bounds to-day, to-morrow why
Thou must die:
Tell me this, and I will tell
Why I love my lov'd one well.

IV.

I THINK OF THEE.

I think of thee
When day's first gleams through the east casement glitter,
When 'neath the eaves the frequent swallows twitter
With busy glee;
When quiet eve, with crimson curtains mellow,
O'erspreads her couch of soft green-tinted yellow,
I think of thee.

I think of thee
In noon-tide's heat, when myriad wings, sun-glancing,
O'erlace sweet waters with their woven dancing,
(Life's revelry;)
In dewy night, when the blithe birds are silent,
And earth, i' the ambient blue, sleeps like an island,
I think of thee.

I think of thee
I' the babbling streets, where din with din contendeth,
And the chaste eye sees much that much offendeth
Chaste eye to see;
In the lone glen, where no rude tread may follow,
Plucking the gem-eyed flowers from shady hollow,
I think of thee.

I think of thee
In happy hour when healthy fancy, firing
The pure-toned blood, wings me with high aspiring,
Noble and free;
When I have sinned, and written mine own sentence,
And the foul stain is washed in fair repentance,
I think of thee.

V.

LOVE'S LULLABY.

Ye waters wildly pouring,
With hollow murmurs roaring,
Plunging o'er the rocky steep
With a furious foamy sweep,
In the cavern'd cauldron boiling,
Turning, tumbling, twisting, toiling,
Sounding from the glen's dark throat
Old hymns of deep and drowsy note;
Ye waters, hollow-roaring,
Lull ye, lull my love asleep!

Ye forests, dark-surrounding,
With hollow whispers sounding,
Breath that stirs the horrid woods,
Voice of vasty solitudes,
Like the sea, with murmurs swelling,
Solemn, sacred, awe-compelling,
Speaking to the pious ear
Like God's guardian presence near;
Ye forests, hollow-sounding,
Lull ye, lull my love asleep.

MAGIC AND MESMERISM.*

MESMERISM, and Phreno-Mesmerism, seem the prevailing popular frenzy of the hour. The epidemic is, we presume, on the decline in America, where it broke out fiercely about four years back; but it has had a powerful revival in France, where the belief in Mesmerism has languished on for sixty years; while in Britain, in every town, village, and hamlet, adepts of both sexes, professional and amateur, are mesmerizing, and being mesmerized, hypnotizing, or being hypnotized; lecturing (for money) and exhibiting, in illustration of their lectures, the varied phenomena of Animal Magnetism, from the simple rigidity of a finger or a limb up to the highest achievements of phreno-magnetism, ecstatic delirium, and clairvoyance. Tailors, hand-loom weavers, sempstresses, and females of no ostensible calling, are all (for money) exhibiting the Mesmeric phenomena in various degrees of perfection, to select private circles—consisting of ladies, idlers, and men of science; while the less profoundly initiated, or the less enterprising, are content to perform before thin or crowded audiences, as it may happen, and generally at very moderate rates. The first crop of these itinerant lecturers and exhibitors in this quarter have been peculiarly unfortunate in their staff; that is, in the adepts who accompany them; clumsy, ill-trained, maladroit rogues, whose bungling performances were enough to ruin any professor, if the great majority of the audiences had not been in the humour of being gulled, while the minority viewed the thing in the light of a broad, acted piece of farce, too absurd to require exposure, and which served to laugh out the hour as well as anything else. It is not easy to say which class of society has been the most tickled with the excitement and palpable humbug of these edifying exhibitions. We restrict these remarks to the platform and private exhibitions in Edinburgh and the neighbouring towns; pronouncing no opinion upon genuine Mesmeric phenomena; a matter for grave and searching investigation, and one quite unconnected with the tom-fooleries and egregious humbug to which we allude. Meanwhile, we have reached a stage in Scotland which may well make England envious. If clairvoyance arose in France, and has made a distinguished progress in America, it ought to be remembered that second-sight, and second-hearing, though extinct for generations, was an exclusive attribute of the Scottish Highlanders, and chiefly of the Hebrideans; and, consequently, that modern clairvoyance is, in Scotland, but a recovered faculty. Scotland, also, has a prior claim to "The Tongues," though there were powerful "manifestations" both in London and Oxford. The only remarkable difference is, that science now pretends to explain the phenomena which formerly were said to be produced by supernatural influence, or the agency of the Devil. Clairvoyance is, we understand, at present as fashionable in Paris as ever was fortune-telling in the palmy days of Le Normand; and clairvoyance, we prophesy, will get fast ahead at home; while, instead of the magistrate sending the prophetesses to Bridewell as cheats and impostors, they are petted and well-paid by the ladies, and every encouragement afforded to keep up the deception, and attain greater proficiency in their art.——We therefore apprehend that anything we have yet witnessed in clairvoyance will be utterly eclipsed by what is to come hereafter, if proper encouragement be given. We have heard of a female whom a Frenchman, her mesmerizer, for a length of time exhibited at private parties in Boston, at 12 dollars for each exhibition, whose doings take the shine completely out of all that we have yet attained in Scotland. No doubt, after exhibiting in that intellectual city, the American far-seer must have been accredited to every town in the Union, and may still be prosperously pursuing her career. We are not here entering upon the question of the possibility, by certain means, of inducing artificial somnambulism, and even the cataleptic state: which is nothing new, and for which there seems an explicable cause. The agency by which this abnormal condition is produced, is, however, still the subject of controversy, some rejecting Animal Magnetism, who yet, under another name, recognise the Mesmeric phenomena to an extent at which others hesitate. The state of coma being produced, all besides may be resolved into the power of imagination, which has effected greater marvels, even of a curative sort, than have yet been attributed to Mesmerism.

Having, however, in the North, made a hopeful beginning in the development of the sublimer phenomena, and already got far beyond the poor lengths of allaying or curing disease, bringing out "the organs," and rendering patients insensible to pain during the most severe, painful, and protracted surgical operations, we are naturally unwilling to retrogade from our high vantage ground until we shall be driven from it. We have also, as a moral nation, laid strong hold on the moral uses of Mesmerism or Animal Magnetism. We confess, individually, that we are not prepared all at once to live in a house of glass, and have our curious or prying neighbours looking after all our movements, reading our very thoughts, and depriving us of the useful power

> Still to keep something to oursel
> We scarcely tell to ony.

That belief in Mesmerism has reached this length among us, may be gathered from the consolation administered by a correspondent of one of our ablest newspapers,—consolation under the novel and extraordinary condition impending over society. One might have tolerated such lucubrations in one of the mushroom towns of the Far West, overrun with all sorts of lecturers; but in Edinburgh, in June 1843, it does astonish, not to say humble us, to hear any man gravely saying, "Great terror has been expressed of the extraordinary power of clairvoyance. This can only be felt by the wicked; and not by the good. It is shocking to think how much we are in the habit of forgetting that God sees us, and how terrified we are lest our evil deeds should be exposed to the world's eye. Since, however, too many are unreformed by the thought of God's omniscience, is it not a proof of His extreme beneficence to His creatures to permit a discovery which will effectually check an inconceivable amount of evil, and bring mankind to a strict regard of moral duties. . . . . The power of clairvoyance will, doubtless, be eagerly sought after, [no doubt of it,] and, with whatever motive, a belief in its existence may have some influence in improving morals, and in establishing religion on the interpretations placed in our hands by God himself of his marvellous works." It is, at least, pleasant to find that every one can seek after and perhaps attain, this wondrous power for himself—and not be compelled to consult, and pay one of the initiated, when he wishes to peep in and see what mischief his neighbours are about in their blinded parlours and locked closets. One thing is clear: no police, or other crime-detector, should be appointed to office who does not possess clairvoyance —if there is to be any farther use either for them or for priestly confessors. How useful to Judges this faculty, if, like our female exhibitors, they can see what is past, as well as present—and also to physicians and lawyers, who never can get at the true facts and real symptoms of cases. There is, indeed, no end to the moral and social advantages of this new power. To a jealous or languishing lover it is exactly the magic-mirror of the ancient magician; he may always know what his absent mistress is about, and thus save anxiety, letter-writing, and postage. How pleasant, and satisfactory, for a neglected wife to look in at the Club, or elsewhere, and see what her truant husband is after—hear what he is saying, and when he thinks of moving homeward! How pleasant for the fagged reporter of the galleries to bring "the House" before his mesmerized eyes, or rather to go to it without the expense of cabs or bodily fatigue, and report all that is said without moving from the fireside! But "the discovery" opens up a field of speculation so vast, a state of society so entirely novel, that we, for the present, waive it. It is enough that men and women, who are in no immediate danger of walking into a draw-well, believe such things probable, or, rather, certain. The powers of magic, necromancy, and sorcery, were, and are believed by the vulgar, to be possessed by only a few persons in compact with the devil; but the men of science who believe to the full extent in the alleged higher Mesmeric phenomena, out-Herod the vulgar when they assert that all mankind are capable of clairvoyance. But, if not capable, on how unequal a footing are human beings placed! Those who possess, or have power to acquire the extraordinary faculty, must be supreme masters of the destinies of those shut out from participating in it. What would be an ordinary physician, however able, when compared with one who can look minutely into his patient's viscera, and examine his brain or spine; or Talleyrand himself, to the statesman who, instead of employing spies, and tampering with seals, could at once Mesmerize himself, and be transported, in spirit or by exalted sense, to the privy councils and cabinets of St. Petersburg, Madrid, or the Tuileries?——To come to our tale of Magic and Mesmerism, which, in the present fantastic humour of the public, is likely, we think, to make a favourable debût.

The tale is said to be founded on facts that occurred about a hundred years ago, when a Jesuit priest, who had atrociously abused his office of confessor, was tried for sorcery. He had corrupted the minds of many young women whose confessor he was, robbed them of their innocence, and obtained an extraordinary influence over them, which was, at last, imputed to magic and sorcery, though the phenomena exhibited were, it is said, precisely those which are witnessed in persons under the influence of Animal Magnetism.——The singular trial of the Jesuit is said to be found among the Causes Célèbres; though we do not remember it. The author of the tale appears to be a believer in Mesmerism, to the extent of ecstatic delirium and clairvoyance. He concludes, that what in former ages was attributed to sorcery, magic, demoniac possession, and witchcraft, was, in fact, the consequences of Animal Magnetism, or, as others think, of nervous disease, imagination, and trick. The tale is written with considerable power and skill, and has a certain Mesmeric influence. Although it is felt repulsive, and even unwholesome, one is constrained to follow it out. The scene is Toulon; the principal heroine is Catherine Cadières, the inspired and Holy Maid, who, like Isabella Campbell of Row, and other persons labouring under nervous disease, foretold future events, possessed the most exalted clairvoyance, and was followed and worshipped as a prophetess, until it was found, too late, that all was delusion, and that the weak-minded and weak-nerved excitable girl, who at last awoke to reason, had been the dupe and victim of a consummate villain and hypocrite. Remarkable instances are not wanting of the power of both priests and presbyters over women, through merely natural magic. But the Jesuit's magic was not simply the art of playing with and inflaming the passions, exciting the mind, and unhinging the reason, but that art or science afterwards named Mesmerism, in which he was a proficient. Protestant young ladies, of enthusiastic temperament and weak nerves and understanding, who are in danger of losing their sober-mindedness and retiring modesty from the ambition to make a distinguished figure in the religious world, or who, through the delusions of vanity, are betrayed into wild fantastical pretensions, may find a useful lesson in the fate of the Holy Maid of Toulon. She was constitutionally a natural somnambulist, and from childhood she had a decided vocation, and was, partly through her mother's excessive vanity, led to imagine that she was born to be a saint. Saintship, it should be noticed, was at that period the only passport possessed by the middle class in France for admission into the society of the aristocracy.

Such was the power of the priesthood, that what nothing else could effect, religion could; and before its members all doors flew open, all artificial barriers fell. Royalty itself was fain to humble its head before the cowl, and the veil had precedence of the coronet. Hence, perhaps, the secret of many a misnamed religious calling, the source of many a fervent devotion, and of a certain mania for saintship, a prevailing distemperature of mind at that epoch, which was a convenient channel for female ambition.

The young saint was exceedingly beautiful, and the object of the passionate attachment of a young lawyer of great worth and abilities. But spiritual vanity and delusion had shut up the womanly springs of her heart; though she was fluctuating between her natural affections and her imaginary spiritual vocation, when the Jesuit appeared on the scene, and began his magnetic and other practices, under the veil of the most stern and rigid sanctity, the most exalted spiritualism. His first object and his last was the honour of his Order;—to raise the Jesuits of Toulon above the Carmelites of that city, who had the best preachers, the care of the most fashionable souls in the place, and enjoyed more of the favour of the bishop. The ruin, soul and body, of the Holy Maid, was but an episode in the life of the wily Jesuit, who fell under the temptation of her beauty, though his master-passion was the exaltation of his Order. Before the arrival in Toulon of this star of the Order, rumour was busy about his talents, eloquence, and exalted piety. The Jesuits were triumphant by anticipation; the Carmelites incredulous and scornful. When the decisive Sunday arrived, the Carmelites were fairly routed, old and ugly as the Jesuit champion was found to be:—

Already past fifty, his tall, gaunt, emaciated frame made him look considerably older. His skin, sallow and drawn like parchment, adhered tightly to the frontal and cheek bones, giving to their cavities beneath a remarkably ascetic appearance—his pallor, contrasting with harsh, heavy unintellectual brows—his large mouth, and ears that stuck to his head like two plates, formed altogether one of the coarsest and most ungainly exteriors imaginable. His eye was the only redeeming point about the man—large, dark, and fiery, it scanned the assembled crowd with a glance of fierce assurance that seemed the prologue to success, and was not devoid of a sort of rude dignity.

His voice was at first husky, but cleared by degrees, until it became loud and full, and, like his glance, seemed to search every conscience, and descend into every heart. . . . . The Carmelites were routed; and the Jesuits looked that ineffably humble and meek triumph of which women and monks only have the secret.

The fame of Father Girard increased every day:—

Gradually, the churches of the bare-footed Carmelites were deserted, their preachers voted tame, their confessors unsatisfactory, and the tide of public favour was rapidly ebbing from them. Father Girard understood, marvellously, the art of warming the zeal of elderly ladies, and making them denounce and renounce the pleasures in which they could scarcely continue to take a share; but he had for some time no opportunity of exercising his power over the minds of the junior members of the community.

But this time came. Catherine had, in piety, always been the pattern of her young companions, and she, constrained by the will of Heaven, [by Animal Magnetism,] had chosen the Jesuit for her confessor, telling her friends—

It is not Father Girard's brilliant eloquence that has touched me, nor am I dazzled by his great reputation; for I should have resisted both these impulses, as being too worldly to induce me to resign my soul into the keeping of a stranger. No! it is the will of Heaven. You all remember St. John's Day, when Father Girard preached at the church of the Carmelites. The service being over, I was about to depart, when, crossing the porch, I happened to meet him, and caught his eye, as I had often done before, resting upon me. At the same instant, an angel form appeared visibly to me, pointing towards him, and a voice distinctly murmured in my ear—"This is the man who is to lead thee unto Heaven." I well-nigh fainted with surprise, and can well imagine yours in listening to this extraordinary fact. Yet, when we remember how of yore the will of God was revealed in visions to his chosen, we may wonder, but may not doubt. His voice bids me seek Father Girard, to whom, alone, the mission of my salvation is given. I follow not, therefore, my own blind, erring judgment, which might deceive, but the guidance of Providence, which I obey with joyful confidence.

Father Girard had thenceforward the care of the tender consciences of all the young ladies of Toulon, save the soul of one clear-headed and soberly religious girl, who stuck to the old Carmelite confessor, who from childhood had trained them all, and benefited them in many ways. Mademoiselle Raymond told her companions—

"This, I regret to say, seems, to me at least, a mere love of change, caprice, imitation. I, for one, am quite certain of having no part or parcel in Catherine's vision, and I am not likely to be visited by one myself. I shall not, therefore, attend Father Girard either at the confessional or even at mass, though I allow him to be an excellent preacher."

A murmur of disapprobation went round the circle, and the word heretic.

To Catherine's lover Mademoiselle Raymond remarked, as they walked home together:—

"You, I am sure, are not bigoted, and will not misunderstand me if I tell you, that I object to Father Girard as a confessor for Catherine on account of his zeal. The good fathers who have until now guided us, used all their efforts to maintain my poor friend within the bounds of real piety, and prevent her imagination from taking too wild a flight. They thought of her happiness and their duty only, and were not, like this idol of the day, struggling for notoriety. I hear that of him which convinces me he will be but too glad to have such a disciple, and will make of her an instrument for the advancement of his own vain-glory and ambition. But I am afraid," she added, hesitatingly, "you will think it very bold in one so young, so inexperienced, to advance such opinions."

Being reassured on this point, she continued,—

"Next to the danger of over-exciting a young person so predisposed to religious enthusiasm as Catherine is, there will be another and very serious evil attendant upon this. There will arise among these young ladies an emulation of holiness, a struggle to get furthest in the esteem and good graces of their teacher, who will know how to turn this rivalship to the advantage of his reputation. His disciples will no longer consider religion a duty, but desecrate it into an occupation—an amusement to fill up the void that must at times be felt in such a quiet life as ours. The loftier feeling of religion will be lost, in the hearts of many, amid its grimaces."

This is among the lessons that we consider excellently adapted to Protestant as well as Catholic young devotees. The greatest change in the character of these girls was soon visible. Some of them had been previously engaged to be married; but their approaching nuptials seemed, by a tacit understanding, to be something savouring of worldliness and levity, which should be altogether eschewed.

They walked as though they dreaded the contact of anything so material as earth, even with the soles of their feet; and their eyes sought the ground as if to avoid the subjects of scandal with which the air around must be filled. Confession, communion, and penance, employed all their days—holy converse with each other their evenings—and melancholy meditations their nights. The great reform that the rector had wrought in these lovely young pupils soon became known, and his power in reclaiming and purifying souls was the theme of every tongue.

The Jesuits deemed their triumph complete; but the Carmelites bided their time with that quiet, untiring patience of which men of the world cannot even form a conception.

But the individual most changed was Catherine:—

Her manner was strange and fantastic. Whenever the subject mentioned before her had no reference to religion, she either sat abstracted, with folded hands and uplifted eyes, the image of pious meditation, or testified, by fretful tones, her impatience of the topic. Instead, however, of listening with lively interest—as might naturally enough have been concluded—when religious discourse was introduced, she was restless and dissatisfied until she had the lead in the conversation. Then she would break out in the most flighty rhapsodies about visions and martyrdoms, saints and devils, temptations and submissions; in short, her language was mystic, and her ideas confused. She assumed a loftiness, a triumph in look, word, and action, that seemed plainly to intimate her consciousness of angel wings fast growing and spreading around her, shortly to waft her to the world of fleecy clouds above, which alone now filled her mind waking or sleeping. Her feet scarcely touched the earth when she walked; a painter must have been struck with the light buoyancy of her figure when in motion, so dreamy was its grace, and he might have borrowed inspiration from the heaven-wrapt expression of her countenance. . . . . She delighted now in the society of none but those who, like herself, were under Father Girard's direction. The intimacy of these young ladies, but lately differing so much from each other in temper, taste, and prospects, was—to borrow their own quaint, exaggerated style of expression—a bond of union; they were but as one in submission and love to Heaven and Father Girard, and through him, and with him, of Heaven's elect. It was, indeed, clear enough to the meanest comprehension, that he was the corner-stone of this alliance; for they met, as it seemed, merely for the pleasure of talking of him, and spent all their powers of figurative language in the ever-renewed struggle of outstripping one another in the most fulsome and extravagant adulation of his sanctity.

They were already under his Mesmeric influence:—

The imagination of poor Catherine was fast ripening at the fires of Saint Theresa's ecstasies of divine love, and Saint Anthony's temptations in the desert—both which, to the reflective mind, must appear but the self-deceits of poor, erring mortals, who had lost their path in life in seeking that to heaven. Her mind, naturally weak, yielding and affectionate, requiring, to maintain its equilibrium, a calm, serene state, was, by this constant effervescence of thought, wearied beyond its power, and in danger of being destroyed altogether. Already her health began to suffer from this feverish excitement: her nights were restless, or visited by the most appalling visions; and her mother, so obtuse in the ordinary matters of life, soon became painfully sensible, by the state of her daughter's nerves, of the necessity of medical assistance, and earnestly consulted Father Girard on the subject. But the rector, who saw, or pretended to see, in the altered state, sinking frame, and disturbed slumbers of his young penitent, nothing but the workings of the Divine Spirit, strongly opposed the intervention of an earthly power, proposed his own aid,—a measure joyfully accepted,—and, finally, established himself as a constant visiter at the house of the Cadières.

Catherine's earthly lover was now tacitly forbidden the house. The Holy and seraphic Maid was no fit object of an earthly love. The slang of people, whether Papist or Protestant, who are in this condition, is well hit off in the subjoined speech made by Catherine's mother, whose vanity in having given birth to so bright a Saint, was now boundless. She was recommending a wife to her saintly daughter's dejected lover, and mentioned several young ladies:—

"There remains, it is true, that half-pagan, half-heretic, Mademoiselle Raymond," she continued, with a frown,—"she has plenty of money to make one forget her uncomeliness; but ah! what can efface the uncomeliness of the heart that comes not unto God?"

"I thought Mademoiselle Raymond gave full satisfaction to the directors of her conscience?"

"The Fathers Carmelite! Lukewarm drowsy set, as they are—Catherine's soul languished beneath their care, like a flower in the shade. No warming up—no elevating—they understood nothing, felt and saw nothing—they would rather have turned away my Catherine from the glorious path she is about to tread, than, like Father Girard, borne her onward in it with a mighty hand."

The plain-featured, but handsome, sensible, kind, and excellent Mademoiselle Raymond, glided by degrees into the warmest affections of the young lawyer, and they were now often drawn together by their common pity and regard for the unhappy Catherine. One day he inquired of Mademoiselle Raymond, with some curiosity, what spell could have been exercised over the female imagination, to attract these young women to so austere and uncomely a person as the Jesuit:—

His very austerity, she said, was, to many women, a charm. Their weakness required a stay, which his severity afforded; their self-love was flattered by the importance which he attached to every trifle connected with his penitents; there was a species of voluptuousness in this petty sinning, constant reproof, performance of daily penances, and the necessity of satisfying his exalted notions of righteousness. It was a perpetual excitement, which chased away all languor from the mind, and kept it in unwearied exercise. The divine love, in short, as taught by Father Girard, had in some sort the advantage of an earthly one. It kept its votaries awake.

Mademoiselle Raymond was still unsuspicious of any spells being employed; but she knew the force of that passion for excitement among unoccupied women, which is often attended by even worse consequences than the excitement of worldly dissipation; as, in attending balls, plays, and operas, no woman fancies she is performing any very meritorious, and much less any exalted religious duty.

The sanctity of Catherine now became the theme of every tongue. There had been a signal revival among all the young ladies of Toulon; but she was supreme.

Her visions, too, and celestial colloquies, were much talked of—all crowded the Jesuits' church to obtain a glimpse of this beautiful and holy maid; and Father Girard's reputation spread like a mighty shadow, veiling completely the radiance of Mount Carmel—at least, in Toulon. . . . . Poor Catherine held on her course; from visions she passed to miracles, and grew every day more sick, and more saintly, drawing towards her all the praise the town could spare from Father Girard.

About this time Mademoiselle Raymond, unswerving in her attachment to her doomed friend, forced a visit upon Catherine.

Catherine was reclining, listlessly, on a couch, her head propped up by a deep crimson cushion, which, by its harsh contrast, caused the paleness of her features to be more apparent. At the slight noise caused by Eleonore's entrance she started up in nervous alarm, and on perceiving who was the intruder on her solitude, she became yet more agitated. Uncertainty, hesitation, a sort of reluctant shame, seemed to overwhelm her; but when Eleonore approached with open arms, she threw herself into them, and sobbed aloud on her bosom. Mademoiselle Raymond gently led her back to the couch, sat by her side, and still retaining her hand in hers, with the other stroked down her hair with a soothing fondness. Her manner was impressed with an eloquence that needed no words; Catherine evidently felt and understood it, for when she could control the vehemence of her first emotion, she said, in a tone of gentle reproach—

"Oh! Eleonore, why did you leave me for so long, or ever!"

Her friend fancied that poor Catherine felt remorse for having treated her ill, and she tried to soothe her with the kindest expressions of unchanging affection. But she had not touched the true cause of Catherine's grief.

"Oh! it is not that!" she impatiently exclaimed—"not that which torments me—not of that I would speak! Had I but followed your advice from the first, and never come near that man, or that you had never left me!"

"It was not my choice," gently remonstrated Eleonore; "you must not forget that. Leave Father Girard."

It is said that the unfortunate Edward Irving awaking from his delusions, on his death-bed, expressed a desponding doubt which, under such solemn circumstances, amounted to certainty, "that it was all delusion!" In like manner, poor Catherine began to be troubled with doubts about her ecstatic spiritual condition, and her singular feelings for her confessor, whom she alternately loathed and liked.——But here she reveals the secret of his influence, and her own Mesmeric subjugation to the will of her magnetizer.

"He has taught me the holiness of self-abasement—the necessity of sinning in order to repent—of yielding in all things to the will of Heaven, blindly, darkly, with the heart, not with the understanding."

"And he, I suppose," said Eleonore, with a flashing eye and contracted brow—"he is the oracle of that will!"

"Not he alone, he merely expounds it—it is revealed to me in visions, in ecstasies; and the palpable signs of these supernatural communions remain with me!"

"The palpable signs!—I don't understand you!" said the amazed listener.

"Yes, I can show them to you as I have to my mother and brothers. Look here!" and, removing the hair that clustered over her brow and neck, she exposed to view some rather severe and but recently-healed wounds.

Eleonore was mute with surprise.

"Yes," continued Catherine, "these are the inflictions with which the devils are permitted to visit me, during my trances; but do not look so shocked, there is more fear than pain attending them—my soul alone is conscious at such times, my body lies in a state of torpor that deadens feeling."

"This is passing strange," said Mademoiselle Raymond, as she closely examined the marks thus subjected to her observation. "These are but too real, and cannot well have been self-inflicted, even in the worst fit of —of——"

"Insanity, you would say," added Catherine, with a mournful smile. "I am not insane—but, oh! I often dread becoming so!"

"Do these fits—these trances, come over you by day or by night?"

"Both; they sometimes rouse me from my sleep, but, strange to say, it is but to another sort of slumber—a numbness steals over my frame whilst my mind wakens to activity."

"You describe but the state of dreaming, which is common to all," remarked Eleonore.

"Ay," resumed her companion; "but dreams do not extend to the waking moments. This phenomenon overtakes me when I least expect it—whilst talking or walking—even at meals."

"I have read of people being drugged into a forced sleep," said Eleonore, thoughtfully.

"But Father Girard gives me nothing, nor is he always present at such times. When he is, my slumber is more peaceful, and I feel more tranquil on waking. In his absence, the fits are torture; and on their leaving me I am totally exhausted."

"If you do not attribute these accidents to Father Girard, how do you account for them unto yourself and others?" demanded Eleonore, who was desirous to sift the matter to the bottom, and to probe her friend's feelings to the uttermost, before venturing on advice, or even on conclusions.

"I have already told you, I sometimes fancy he has charmed me; but am more often inclined to think myself, like Saint Theresa, one of those elected to suffer and to love, and unto whom mysteries are revealed in visions—through whom and upon whom miracles are wrought."

"This is a most extraordinary delusion," observed Eleonore, carried away by the feeling of the moment beyond the reserve which it was her desire to maintain until the close of the conference. . . . . .

"An unnameable, unaccountable feeling of repulsion at times possessed me, which I could with difficulty control. Well, this was again counteracted by his alternate severity and praise. Thus, even whilst secretly disliking him personally, I derived great benefit from his spiritual guidance. It is remarkable that Marie Langières, Anne Guyol, and all his penitents, have felt exactly like me in this respect. The bright side of my existence—I may even call it its glorious sunshine—was the hope I entertained of treading in the footsteps of the blessed virgins who adorn our church. He taught me to believe myself called to the same path as that of my holy patroness, sweet St. Catherine of Sienna. All the bright dreams of my childhood came back to my heart with renewed freshness. I was like one suddenly transported to the summit of a high mountain, whence the eye could bathe itself in the blue of the heavens, the green of the valleys, the radiance of the setting sun. I looked beyond the very heavens, and I was proud and very happy. My mother and brothers also encouraged me in my new vocation, to the utmost of their power. They already saw the halo of canonization encircling my brow; but we were all too vain-glorious—I especially. In vain did Father Girard warn me of the dangers of this self-exaltation; nothing could damp my glowing ardour; the warning was overlooked, but the punishment was not long in overtaking the fault. One day—I had already been a whole year under his care—he breathed gently on my brow, and looked full into my eyes as he did so. From that hour I have been his slave. He often repeated this form, and each time it drew the chain tighter that bound me to him, until I had no will but his. I could neither act nor feel as I pleased, nor even think. Thus I became, if I may so express it, estranged from my own self.—Oh!—but you cannot understand me—indeed, how should you? I cannot myself,—this perpetual struggle between my own will and that of another, gliding into my very being, was the dark side of that period of my existence."

As Catherine thus unbosomed herself to her friend, she became hardly intelligible.

After a time, her beatific visions completely changed their character.

"I had already had many visions of a mystic and holy character, all of a nature to flatter my inordinate vanity; but now came one predicted by Father Girard, in which I was told I should be possessed for more than a year by evil spirits, to whom the power of tormenting me should be given, in order that a soul in much pain should be freed from purgatory. From that time, my trances have changed their heavenly form,—foul fiends have haunted me under every shape, and burnt wounds into my flesh, which, upon waking, I still found there. Father Girard told me this was necessary to my soul's weal and to the perfection of my character, as well as implicit blind obedience to him in all things. . . .

"Father Girard must know best. He has forbidden me prayer; saying, that it is not an efficient means of binding myself to God: that has cost me the severest pang of all. But since I have fallen into the power of the spirits of darkness, I can no longer pray, even when I feel most the necessity for so doing. There is a moral impossibility, a clog on my thoughts, a seal on my lips, which all the warm impulses of my heart, and even the force of habit, are inadequate to vanquish. This is one of my greatest torments, which I am sure you, who knew me when the outpourings of my spirits flowed as freely from my lips as water from its source, will be well able to imagine."

"There may be a remedy to all this," said Eleonore, thoughtfully. "Have you thought of none?"

"Exorcism might afford a relief to my soul, and a physician to my enfeebled frame; but it is for my own future weal and glory that all this should be unflinchingly borne. How high the price at which both are bought, none shall ever know but myself. Oh! Eleonore, conceive, if you can, what are my feelings; when, in spite of all that he can say, I sometimes doubt if my path is a right one,—dread that I am altogether misguided,—that Father Girard is the only evil spirit which torments me! When that idea crosses my brain, I am for hours the prey to despairing regrets and the bitterest remorse. Then he comes and talks me over, or barely looks at me—for he reads my thoughts at a glance,—and I repent my miserable guilty doubts, so that my soul is ever dark and troubled as the most tempestuous night."

"It was once clear as a summer morning," said Eleonore, spiritedly; "why should not the mists that obscure it clear up again?"

Here every detail and circumstance of Father Girard's power over his penitents is referred to the agency afterwards named Mesmerism. Of that principle, a character in the story,—the individual, indeed, who relates it to a young German officer long after the events,—thus argues,

It is worthy of remark, indeed, that in the exposition of practical magnetism, Mesmer's directions tally so completely with some of the fantastic assertions of the talented secretary of Charles V., [Cornelius Agrippa,] in his occult philosophy, that on these points, at least, it may be said they have treated one and the same subject. And it is a no less remarkable fact, that every detail which has transpired concerning Father Girard and his penitents can be referred to that system, and, in my opinion, to nothing else.

You may adduce, and with truth, that by playing upon the mind—especially in youth—exalting and debasing it by turns, it is easy, without the assistance of any extraneous agency, to affect the reason, if not actually to destroy its equilibrium. You may further urge, and with equal truth, that so complete is the power which he who wields skilfully the dangerous weapon called enthusiasm may obtain over his miserable victims, it remains no difficult task to sway, not only their judgment, but their feelings also. It is, indeed, the knowledge of numerous cases handed down to us in history, and even still of daily occurrence, in which fanaticism conducts to crime,—to madness,—even to death, that has caused me sometimes to hesitate in my conclusions.

Had this, however, been the Jesuit's real hold on Mademoiselle Cadières, it is not likely that she would have struggled so painfully with the influence he exercised over her; she would rather have yielded cheerfully and wholly to it. But it is averred by the most experienced writers on the subject of magnetism, that the operator has an unlimited power over the patient, obtained by the concentration of his own thoughts, and their transfusion into the mind of the person subjected to this process, either by means of manipulation, which supposes consent in the party concerned; or by the mere attraction of gaze, and sympathy with surrounding objects submitted to the ordeal of magnetism by the one party, and unconsciously much used by the other; which does not imply connivance. This was the case with Mademoiselle Cadières and all the worthy Father's penitents, who yielded to, or rather suffered by an artifice whose very nature and existence was totally unknown to them.

When once affinity is established between the master and the patient,—or victim, as the case may be,—that strange psychological phenomenon takes place, of which I have often read in works on magnetism, but which I have never witnessed, or even heard of in real life, except in the case of Mademoiselle Cadières,—I mean that state of high exaltation of the nerves, which permits spirit to commune with spirit without the grosser intervention of the organs of speech,—when the half-formed thought is met by a corresponding thought, and the unspoken, unspeakable feelings are, at once, conveyed to a heart that throbs,—that must throb with sympathy;—a communion so full of harmony that, when we first contemplate its nature, we are excusable in believing it to belong to spheres and to beings of a higher order than ourselves, and the little world that contains us;—but when we bethink ourselves of the further consequences of this latitude, and perceive that the will of man, the noblest, holiest of his attributes, is also to be enchained by the same mysterious link between a stronger and a weaker mind, while both are yet clothed within their frail human tenements, liable to be shaken and riven by human passion, we shudder and turn away from the picture of mental degradation which this subject may offer to our view.

The antagonists of Mesmer have advanced a fact which, if true—as it seems likely enough to be—would bear me out in my supposition of his science being applicable to this particular case. They assert that magnetism is highly prejudicial to the health, and, by overexciting, is apt to cause the most serious derangements of the nervous system,—that the senses are frequently brought to a state betwixt waking and sleeping, which can hardly be said to be either, and yet partakes of both,—that this unnatural condition, in which the intellect is constantly struggling betwixt its perceptions of the real and the unreal, is most dangerous alike to mind and body, and that magnetism can produce other consequences as fatal to the sufferer as the convulsions which are its usual accompaniment.

After this meeting of Catherine and her friend, it was rumoured that the Holy Maid was about to retire to a convent and take the veil. Such was the fiat of the Jesuit. The seducer willed to immure his victim; and when dragged to the convent, the care of the soul of the beautiful saint—the Holy Maid—still occupied so much of his time, that his other fair penitents became jealous and discontented because they saw so little of him. Catherine was meanwhile rapidly advancing towards canonization.

Serious rumours now began to circulate about miracles having been wrought upon Catherine, visibly and palpably impressing her with the sign-manual of special election; and they soon became not only universally discussed, but credited in every circle, drawing the attention of the clergy and the great, in a marked manner, towards the convent. . . . . At Ollioules, as at Toulon, Catherine had trances, ecstasies, and fits of a character that almost bordered on epilepsy. At other times, she seemed to walk, talk, and exist, like one in a perpetual dream. The miracles spoken of had indeed wrought visibly on her person. She received the communion, and confessed almost daily with Father Girard; and the fame of her sanctity spread far and wide over the country, so that priests and laics, grandees and beggars, devotees of all classes, ages, and sexes, were daily entreating admittance to this new saint, of whom the strange fact is recorded, that she could read the thoughts, and guess the ailings or troubles, of those who approached her, before they had even spoken them.

Miraculous cures and heaven-inspired advice was soon reported to have emanated from her, and curiosity attracted even those to see the lovely saint of Ollioules whom credulity did not bring to her shrine.

Fashionable ladies came from Paris and the court to see and listen to the inspired novice, quite as much excited as are the Parisian ladies at this moment about Mesmerism, and women pretending to clairvoyance. Catherine's former lover now began to think that in this grand imposture she must herself be the arch-deceiver, and the Jesuit her dupe. He was far from suspecting the atrocity of the priest, and he had not yet wholly ceased to love her. Her friend Eleonore, at this time, magnanimously volunteered to repair to the convent, and bring him a report of the real condition of the prophetess. Eleonore Raymond went and was a witness of many things precisely similar to those exhibitions of clairvoyance which have long been naturalized in France, and which—thanks to the march of mind—may now be witnessed in every considerable town in our own country, at very reasonable cost. Catherine's revelations were, however, more imaginative and poetical; and, unlike the modern oracles, she never failed, which, spite of all the charitable help voluntarily, and involuntarily given, our prophetesses often do.

The abbess and nuns began to indulge strange worldly suspicions; and, though they durst not question the supernatural powers of the Holy Maid, they fairly wished her out of their house before scandal arose, and begged her spiritual director to take her away. Father Girard still visited her frequently, and claimed the privilege of being left for hours shut up with his penitent. He now saw the necessity of withdrawing her to another and more remote convent, in which the rule was much more austere than among the kind nuns with whom the unhappy girl had performed her noviciate. She, however, found means to send a note to her mother, imploring to be taken home, else she would perish! When visited at this time, she was found by her two faithful friends, now betrothed lovers, apparently dying, her person meagre and neglected, her beauty despoiled, her mind shattered, or utterly crushed and prostrate. She acknowledged that she would like to go home, if Father Girard would allow her—but he never would. "Exert your own will," said her friend.

"Why should this redoubted Jesuit wish to immure you here, or anywhere else?"

"Because he wishes my speedy death now he has ceased to like me; that is why he wishes me to go to Saletta. He may cheat others with fair words, but from me he cannot hide his thoughts."

"I daresay you know him thoroughly. But knowing him and his purposes well, why not defeat them?"

"I may not," muttered the novice, with a slight shudder.

"Then why write to your mother to take you away?"

"I don't know," was the disconsolate answer.

"If Father Girard be persuaded to let you go,—if he gave his free consent, what then?"

"Then—then I should be saved!" exclaimed Catherine, with some vivacity. "But, no: he never will consent!"

"He must have strange reasons for this insistance, Catherine."

"Of course he has. It would never do if the world at large were to learn that he is a magician—a sorcerer—and has bewitched me! But the lady abbess and all this community know it, and do not approve of my vocation, nor of him,—that is why I am to be withdrawn hence."

Catherine was brought home, suffered severely, and was tortured by the exorcisms of the Carmelites; but at length she was emancipated from the Mesmeric influences of the Jesuit, who, when the truth came out, was, through the intrigues of the jealous Carmelites, brought to trial for sorcery, seduction, and Quietism. This charge was met by the Jesuits, by that of Catherine having been a sacrilegious impostor who had deceived her spiritual director; and it was rumoured that the Bishop was about to prosecute her and her family for conspiracy, and for the defamation of Father Girard the Jesuit.

This news was the more startling, that it was well known throughout all coteries and classes that Catherine was no more of an impostor than any of the other young females who had come within the fangs of the wily priest; that all had been alike seduced from the path of innocence and honour, many of whom were even more unfortunate in the consequences of their fault than poor Catherine. All these were facts too well established to be disputed; and public opinion altogether flowed in her favour.

The singular trial was one of interest in France, equal to that of Madame Laffarge. People came all the way from Paris to attend it. The Lady Abbess and the mother of the novices were important witnesses for Catherine, and so were her young companions, the other victims of the Jesuit; while the Jesuits did everything that money or intrigue could effect, to screen their fallen brother from conviction.

They were moving heaven and earth; exhausting at once their credit and their treasury, to save a wretch whom it would have been wiser, cheaper, more honest, to have left to the justice of his countrymen. The most shameless and persevering corruption was tried upon the witnesses. Some, whom promises could not seduce, were intimidated by threats—anonymous letters were despatched to those who could not be openly addressed in the strains in which they were penned—in short, every engine was at work to crush, if possible, the accusers along with the accusation. . . . . Catherine, whom they had threatened with the rack and the faggot if she persisted in her vile falsehoods—thus the Jesuits were pleased to style her artless admissions, so unwelcome and disparaging to themselves—menaces, which she well knew were not idle breath, yet remained unshaken in her high resolve of unmasking vice and villany, let the consequences of her bold but virtuous deed be what they might.

The trial, as detailed, is full of interest. Catherine's former lover,—now the affianced husband of her friend,—unable to avert the exposure of her dishonour, which the envy of the Carmelites forced on, was her zealous and able advocate. The evidence in the extraordinary case was strong and clear; and that of the other young women whose confessor Father Girard had been, fully confirmed Catherine's testimony.

In admitting their individual dishonour, they one and all, like her, swore to breathings on the brow, fixed and prolonged gazes that bewildered their senses, and declared their conviction that their ruin had been accomplished by means of foul, dark acts of magic. Indeed, in spite of the enlightenment of that or any other period, it was next to impossible to assign a rational cause for the errors of so many youthful maidens in favour of the prisoner at the bar. It was difficult to believe these young victims, all equally perjured, willing abettors of a detestable fraud; and yet human reason was confounded in the inextricable labyrinth into which their disclosures were well calculated to involve it.

Thus ended the first day; and with perturbed, agitated spirit, did every single individual of that countless throng return to his home or his inn, as the case might be, to discuss throughout the livelong night possibilities that seemed to verge on the impossible; and dreamy questions, that led to anything but the sweet oblivion of slumber.

Had Mesmer but been there to give a new name to that mysterious phenomenon of nature, whose definition in darker ages, by their few and much-calumniated philosophers, has become a despised and contemptible by-word,—had Mesmer proclaimed his startling propositions to those whose minds the artless revelations of a few simple, uneducated young women had so much perplexed,—all would have been explained. Father Girard had been held a magician no longer; but a perfect adept in Animal Magnetism would have been unmasked at once.

The trial occupied many days, and all went favourably for Catherine. The Abbess and sisters established, by indisputable evidence, the motives which the confessor had, or might have, to practise magical arts on his penitent, and

The singular phenomenon of an exalted state of clairvoyance and artificial somnambulism of which the unfortunate Catherine had furnished so striking an example, was deposed to by physicians, doctors in divinity, nuns, and chance witnesses of every grade and station, and details were furnished which, as might well have been imagined, excited the court even more than all that had gone before. In short, to avoid wearying your patience as much as possible, no case was ever more complete as to evidence. There was not the least shadow of a doubt left wherein to conceal Father Girard's shame, nor outlet, however small, for him to creep through.

The Jesuit, when examined, completely broke down, subdued in mind and body; while Catherine acquitted herself nobly.

The Jesuits, ever since the beginning of the affair, had scarcely ventured to pass through the mob, so intense was the execration in which they were held at that moment by the very people who had worshipped them with slavish respect but a few short days before. The excitement within and without the court was at its height.

The spectators had nosegays of white flowers at their breasts, as if in joyous expectation of the triumph of that innocence for whose emblem they had been selected. Catherine looked still more beautiful than on the previous days, though somewhat more moved than usual; a slight blush suffused her face at almost every alternate minute, and her eyes more frequently sought those of her trembling mother, who was scarcely less an object of deep sympathy and interest than herself.

The judges seemed more perturbed and gloomy than ever, and turned no friendly glances towards the plaintiff and her advocate. . . . .

Once, and once only, did that advocate's eye light upon the Jesuit's countenance, whose every movement he had hitherto watched, nevertheless, most carefully. He seemed moody and absorbed, but in great measure recovered from the abject consternation and terror which had overwhelmed him throughout the proceedings of this harassing trial. The advocate remarked, that in the course of that morning he had helped himself repeatedly from a water-flask that stood near, in order, as he thought, to calm his inward perturbation; and when his glance fell on him, he was in the very act of raising a glassful of the pure element to his lips. There was nothing in this simple movement to excite any attention, and the advocate soon turned his thoughts to other objects. Shortly afterwards, Catherine feeling much exhausted, one of the inferior officers about the court approached her with a tumbler of fresh water, which was accepted, and drained at a draught. . . . . .

The examination of other witnesses went on, and, finally, Catherine was again confronted with Father Girard. Her behaviour in public had been, until that moment, in such perfect accordance with the sentiments she expressed in private, that her advocate no longer watched her with the same keen, sickening apprehension which at first his doubts of her stability had occasioned. But now there was something so strange and unsteady in the sound of her voice, as to cause him to start and look round, when the change that he beheld in her whole mien and bearing riveted at once his eye and his attention.

Had the wand of an enchanter touched her, and that wand been invested with all the mysterious qualities ever bestowed on it by the most generous imagination, it could not have wrought a change more complete, and to her friends and well-wishers more appalling. Her eyes wandered with uncertain, dreamy gaze from object to object, or sought the ground, not, however, from natural bashfulness, but from a heaviness that seemed to press the lids forcibly down; her lips and brow were contracted as if by an intense effort at collecting thought; her answers were broken, dark, vague, unconnected; and the light from within, that had irradiated her countenance and diffused its brightness into every lineament, seemed fading away from her perplexed brow, on which the mists that had lain so heavy on it at St. Claire's were slowly again gathering.

Gradually as Catherine lost her self-command—and that, too, at the most critical moment of her fate,—Father Girard assumed an air of growing courage, as much at variance with his hitherto abject timidity and unmanly incoherency. His manner grew proportionably assured, as that of his opponent lost firmness; the advocate gazed in speechless amazement; whilst the judges exchanged smiles, that showed how much this change relieved their minds at that decisive hour.

The rest passed with the rapidity and with the indistinctness of a dream. The advocate more than once made a violent effort as if to awake from some troubled vision, as he heard Catherine, in a hurried, confused manner, recant, one by one, every word she had before spoken, deny every fact that had been proved by irrefragable evidence,—assert herself a mean impostor, the tool of a vile conspiracy,—Father Girard, an injured saint,—herself, her friends and supporters, the vilest of sinners that ever trod the earth.

When Catherine was next day visited in her dungeon by her advocate, she asserted that the glass of water alone had produced such extraordinary effects, and he was more than ever bewildered. Father Girard, she said, had by some means charmed it.

"Scarcely had the draught passed my lips, when I felt its intoxicating qualities mount to my brain. I was lost in a world of deception; everything appeared under a new light—myself a monster; he was again, for the hour, the master of my soul, and I felt, thought, and spoke as he desired; the spell was again on my brain, on my heart, and my lips obeyed its suggestions. Oh! how could you imagine that of my own free will I could have uttered such horrid falsehoods—have thrown shame and danger on the innocent to save the guilty—sacrificed Father Nicholas, my brothers, my poor mother, for whom?—for that monster? No! surely you cannot think that, left to my own free will, I could ever have done this. It is impossible!"

A second trial was with difficulty obtained before the Parliament of Aix, and truth triumphed over Jesuitry and sorcery or Mesmerism combined; though, while Catherine was pronounced innocent,

Father Girard was declared not guilty, and made over to his superiors. The whole phenomena and incidents of the singular case, are represented as coinciding in every particular with the phenomena of modern Mesmerism; the trances, the visions, the clairvoyance, the fits and convulsions, the breathings on the brow, the signs of the cross, or wavings over her person and head; all were similar to the operations and effects of what is now named Animal Magnetism. It is said, "the charm that bound a young and lovely girl to an old, disgusting monk, and the magical influence of the glass of water, and even the vision which made Catherine choose Father Girard for her confessor, are completely in the course of Mesmerism."

Starting from the fact of her being from childhood upwards afflicted with natural somnambulism, thus predisposed to magnetic slumber, and by her constitutional delicacy laid open to every attack on the nerves, how easy for a man like Father Girard to practise upon her the dangerous skill which he had, doubtless, long before acquired by a close study of the old occult philosophers and mediciners.

As has already been seen in the course of the narrative, the advocate had no doubt but that primarily the Jesuit used this powerful agency merely as a means of exalting and guiding the human susceptibilities, in such a manner as to confer honour upon himself and his Order; but that his unbridled licentiousness, in spite of his better reason, led him away from his original design. Such a supposition is, however, but speculative.

It is easy, in many instances, to trace the numerous miracles and saintships that agitated France about that period to the same cause; showing that Father Girard was by no means the first monk who had made himself master of this mystery, though, perhaps, few ever adapted it to such vile ends.

But where unfair means are put into the hands of weak erring mortals, who can vouch for the purposes to which they may be applied? The moral of my tale is, therefore, that though I most firmly believe in the existence of such an agency as Mesmerism, and even think it might, in some cases, be turned to a good account, it is my conviction that it would for the most part be made an abuse and a nuisance of; perhaps, even as I have shown, admit of crime to which, unhappily, there are but too many inlets into the world without human ingenuity seeking to add to them.

Yes, I know that such a science exists; but I am of opinion that no government should allow it to be in any way practised within its boundaries; that no conscientious person should meddle with it, and that no prudent one should expose himself, or any member of his family, to its influence; and that, as a thing more likely to lead to evil than to good, it should be just sufficiently accredited to put people on their guard against it, but certainly not made the object of particular research or inquiry; its eventual utility to mankind not being sufficiently established to make it worth the student's while.

The moral is sound, but too weak to counteract the influence of this attractive but unhealthy tale; though, while Mesmerism is so much in vogue, it may be right to supply a popular antidote.

Unregulated enthusiasm, and the magical power of the passions in vain and unstable minds, is equal to everything alleged here to have been produced by Mesmerism. It would not do to absolve women from their moral responsibilities, nor to burn men as sorcerers, because, to take a familiar case, and one quite in point, a Dr. Lardner may seem to have enchanted or magnetized a Mrs. H——, a case that Mesmerism, were it true, would at once satisfactorily account for. It will not do to shift the blame of errors, once conveniently laid upon the stars, to the Mesmerizers. Dr. Elliotson, though pretty far gone in the science, disclaims the alleged power of the Mesmerizer over the will of the Mesmeree, who is compelled, it is averred, to act, think, suffer, taste, smell, and feel, as the more potent spirit chooses to ordain; to be in complete subjection to his absolute will. No one, he says, can be Mesmerized against their will; though, by his own account, Mr. Edward Gibbon Wakefield surely took Miss O'Key at vantage when he was suddenly converted. What power of resistance—what will could a poor half-conscious girl, dangling over a balustrade, oppose to a gentleman who stole on, and made passes at her behind her back, unless she could, like others in her condition, see with the back of her head—and so apprehend her danger?

Mr. Wakefield had been induced to witness one of Dr. Elliotson's wonderful exhibitions of Mesmerism. He had gone an unbeliever; and, when the experiments were over, was retiring at least sceptical, when, in passing through a gallery of the Hospital, "he accidently noticed one of the O'Keys, with her back to him, hanging over the balusters, and still in the Mesmeric delirium, and therefore highly susceptible. He thought this a most favourable opportunity to test her, because he was satisfied that she could not see anything that he did. He made a pass behind her back at some distance, and she was instantly fixed and rigid, and perfectly senseless. He had sense enough to believe his senses; was satisfied of the truth of Mesmerism, and has since mesmerized many hundred persons, and spread the truth widely."

This was indeed a sudden and remarkable conversion; but how, we again ask, could Miss O'Key's will have protected her from the magnetic influence of Mr. Wakefield? The wonder was, that thus left to roam about alone, she had not tumbled over the balusters and broken her neck.

THE SERENADE.

(FROM UHLAND.)

"What from my slumbers wakes me now,
With sweetest music's power?—
O mother, see! who can it be
In this deep midnight hour?"

"I nothing hear, I nothing see—
Break not thy slumbers mild!
No lover tunes his lute for thee,
Thou poor, pain-stricken child."

"It is not earthly music, this,
Which makes my joy so light—
The angels call me with their songs—
O mother, dear, good night!"

PERAULT; OR SLAVES AND THEIR MASTERS.

CHAPTER XIX.

WALDENBERG was sitting alone in his library when Miss Bellgrove was announced; and she had scarcely crossed the verandah when he was at her side. "This is an honour," he exclaimed, as he pressed her hand to his lips; "an honour, indeed, that I little anticipated."

"I fear it may be deemed a rash intrusion," she answered, smiling.

"Say not so," he answered; "surely an angel of mercy may deign to visit the afflicted."

Matilda sighed, and spoke not till they entered the drawing-room and were seated; when, after a few words of every-day courtesy, she at once explained to Waldenberg the object of her visit, and used every effort to gain him over to befriend Zama. He listened with his eyes bent steadfastly on the ground, now and then biting his nether lip, and knitting his brows; and when she had ended, he said, "You seem deeply interested for this negro!"

"I am," she eagerly answered. "I ever found him faithful, generous, and affectionate."

Waldenberg started, and bent upon her a look of searching scrutiny; but, unconscious of his gaze, Matilda continued: "And then his poor sister, Zada, was the companion of my childhood and my friend." Here her voice trembled as she looked up in Waldenberg's face. "Surely," she said, "you have not harmed her?"

"Her!" exclaimed Waldenberg; "harm her? I really do not understand you."

"Say that Zada is safe—save Zama, and I will forgive all," said Matilda, imploringly.

He drew his hand across his forehead as he muttered, "Zada? I remember now—the dog accused me of carrying off his sister, when he struck me to the earth.—Miss Bellgrove," he added, aloud, "I cannot, will not, interfere on this negro's behalf."

"If you have any humanity," said she, "do not, I implore of you, wreak your ill-judged vengeance on the poor lad!"

He frowned bitterly, and striking his heel on the floor, answered in a deep, stern voice,—"If every hair on that negro's head could ransom a universe,—if every breath he drew, could save a soul from perdition,—I would not, and I shall not save him!"

"This is fearful!" said Matilda, shuddering. "But surely, when Matilda Bellgrove asks you to befriend one who saved her life, you will not scorn her entreaties."

"I know that the negro saved your life, Miss Bellgrove," said the Colonel, fiercely. "I saw him save you from the Indians—yet, in that hour of dread and danger, I also saw the base-born dog press his burning lips to your cheek!"

"Slanderous liar!" exclaimed Matilda, starting to her feet, her eyes flashing like fiery orbs, and her whole frame convulsed with passion. The blood suddenly rushed from her cheek, and left her deadly pale, then flowed again, dying her face and bosom with the deepest blushes. "Yet," she said, as she recovered her power of speech, "I have acted wrong in degrading myself so far, as to solicit favours at the hand of one so utterly beneath contempt; or to talk of pity and mercy to one who has not the common feelings of a man!" She turned, and proudly walked from the apartment, leaving Waldenberg overwhelmed with confusion and regret. He saw the rashness of his conduct, and would have thrown himself at her feet and sued for pardon, but stood rooted to the spot, without the power to move, till looking up, he encountered the stupefied and perplexed countenance of Whackie, who stood, with gaping mouth, staring at him. "Here, fellow," cried Waldenberg, drawing a well-filled purse from his pocket, and placing it in Whackie's hand, "take that—fly after your mistress—delay her for one moment—I wish to speak to her—fly!"

Poor Whackie knew as much about love's diplomacy and bribery, as he did about Hebrew or High Dutch; and naturally thinking the purse was intended for his mistress, hurried after her. Matilda was just stepping into her carriage, when the negro called on her to stop. "Coram Wallinbeg want for speak wid you, and he was send you dat." He placed the purse in her hand, but started back, as she suddenly dashed it at his feet, and with flashing eyes, exclaimed—"What! insult upon insult! Colonel Waldenberg may thank his stars that I am not a man, otherwise he would pay dearly for his conduct." She stepped into the carriage and drove off, leaving Whackie more confounded than ever. He had just enough of sense left to perceive, that Matilda was insulted; and, highly indignant at Waldenberg, he picked up the purse to return it to him.

"Will your mistress consent to see me?" cried Waldenberg, as Whackie entered his presence again.

"No," answered Whackie, sulkily.

"What says she?" inquired the Colonel.

"She says, she get a man to gib you good lickee for insult she. She no want you money—she no take um," said Whackie, as he tossed the purse on the table.

"The fellow's mad," exclaimed the Colonel. "I gave you no money to give her."

"O Lor! wot a lie!" exclaimed Whackie.

The Colonel darted at Whackie like an enraged tiger. "Curses on you!" he exclaimed, "you have ruined me, you black dog! I will tear you limb from limb!"

Whackie did not await the onset of his foe, but fled from the apartment with the utmost speed, tumbling over one of the quadroon footmen, and rolling headlong down the outer staircase; then starting up, vaulted over the closed gateway, nor halted till he had gained the innermost recess of his master's kitchen.

Miss Norrisville was sitting alone in her apartment when Matilda returned, and was surprised to see her cousin enter in a state of violent agitation. Springing towards her, she caught her in her arms, and kindly inquired the cause thereof; when Matilda, leaning her forehead on her fair cousin's bosom, burst into a flood of tears. Suddenly shaking the cloud of sorrow from her brow, she said, "It is past now; I am only angry at myself for being so blinded." The cause of her grief was soon told; and Letia gave free vent to her honest indignation at Waldenberg's rash and ungentlemanly conduct.

The period fixed for the execution of Perault, and the other ringleaders of the plot, was rapidly drawing nigh; and such was the dread felt by the white population of another outbreak, that many of the principal families quitted the city, and retired to the Northern States, and to such other places they considered safe.

Waldenberg resolved to give one blow to the temper and pride of Maitland, which he hoped would gall him to the heart's core. Knowing that Maitland was averse to the wholesale butchery of the condemned negroes, he arranged so that more than twenty of them should be executed on one gallows, and at the same moment; and caused the orders for carrying of the sentence into effect, and superintending the execution, to be placed in the hands of Major Maitland. Against so broad an insult as this, Maitland at once protested, and forwarded the resignation of his commission as major in the Cadet Brigade. Had Waldenberg been in a fit state to meet him in a hostile encounter, he would instantly have challenged him; but the Colonel, knowing the proud and fiery nature of his rival, cautiously kept out of his way, and confined himself to his own mansion, on the allegation of ill health.

While Maitland was chafing against the studied insult he had received, Mr. Bellgrove, accompanied by Lieutenant Galliard, called on him. To them he unfolded all the story of his wrongs, and announced his determination to retire from the city.

"I have been thinking of leaving the city also," said Mr. Bellgrove; "but must retire with my friends to the Northern States; for, in the present excited state of the plantations, I cannot think of my friends risking their lives by returning amongst the negroes."

"And I," said Maitland, smiling, "mean to retire to my own plantation on the coast, and take up my abode amongst negroes, whose affection and fidelity I can depend upon."

"As for me," said Galliard, "my negroes are nearly all in this confounded plot together; and if some of the poor fellows should be executed, the rest will be up in arms beyond all doubt."

"Then, gentlemen," said Maitland, "I shall be most happy if you will accompany me to Tenda Cove. Mr. Bellgrove, if you can influence your fair nieces to risk themselves among my faithful negroes, it will afford me much pleasure to watch over their safety till the city becomes more settled."

Mr. Bellgrove caught him by the hand, and said, "Joyfully do I accept of your kind invitation; and, therefore, I shall burden you with my whole household for a season."

"And I with mine," said Galliard.

Maitland expressed his pleasure at the ready acceptance of the invitation; and Mr. Bellgrove and Galliard hurried homewards to make the necessary preparations.

Miss Bellgrove and Letia received the invitation with much pleasure; for they had long wished to see a plantation so much spoken of, and so highly praised as was Maitland's. Maitland sent an express to Tenda Cove to prepare for their reception; and, in the course of the afternoon, the whole party embarked for the plantation, attended by several of their household negroes.

On approaching the island, the party beheld a large body of negroes drawn up on the beach; and Mr. Bellgrove cast an anxious and alarmed glance at Maitland, who, smiling, answered the look.

"There are an immense number of negroes on the beach," said Mr. Bellgrove. "In such troublesome times as these, such numbers might excite alarm."

"Were every planter as certain of a loving welcome from his servants, as I am from mine, he would not dread to encounter them," answered Maitland.

Amid loud cheers and shouts of joy, the party landed on the beach. The negroes seemed actually frantic with rapture, at beholding Maitland. Old men pressed forward to meet him; the young ones were jumping with joy; negro mothers were elevating their little chubby, black, pudding-looking piccaninnies, to get a view "ob Massa;" and the little ones crowed, and kicked, and laughed, with as much glee as their seniors: it seemed a perfect jubilee among the negroes. And as Maitland walked along, with Miss Bellgrove leaning on his arm, the acclamations of the crowd around him sounded more grateful to his ears than any praises he had ever met with. He cast a proud and happy look on the joyous, sable mob; and their merry countenances beamed with redoubled pleasure on catching the kind looks of their "young Massa." The company now entered a long shady avenue of orange, fig, pride-of-India, and magnolia trees, beautifully arranged; and, on each side of the avenue, deeply embowered in their shade, stood the huts of the negroes. Each negro had his beautiful garden in front, and its porch trimmed with vines and jessamines; and flowers of brilliant hues tastefully laid out, glittered here and there.

"I thought," said Matilda, "that my own plantation of Myrtlegrove vied with any in the South; but this surpasses it by far."

Maitland was about to answer, but was interrupted by a band of negro children, all neatly dressed, who came pressing around them, offering them flowers and fruit. "Ah! Massa, good Massa, do take one from me"—"Do take present, Massa"—"I keep all dese flowers for you, Massa"—cried some of the little ones, offering him beautiful nosegays of the rarest flowers. "And de pretty lady, too," cried another. "Ah! Missee, oblige me by taking some fruit: see here be nice peach and nectarine—I keep all for Massa; and if you come and be our pretty Missee, we gib you all de flowers and de sweet fruit. Do take some, dear lady." Had the party taken all the fruit and flowers offered them, they would have had a wagon-load; and the wild joy the negroes showed, on their presents being even kindly looked at, was truly pleasing. The happy, healthy looks of old and young—the neat and clean, nay, even elegant appearance of their clothing, denoted the great attention paid to them by their generous-hearted master.

"Truly," said Mr. Norrisville to Mr. Bellgrove, "this is an earthly paradise. Never did I think that one man could inspire so many hearts with such true delight."

"And he deserves it all," said Mr. Bellgrove; "for if any man ever befriended the poor negro race, it is Major Maitland."

Galliard, who was escorting Miss Norrisville, was somewhat surprised to observe her in tears, and kindly inquired the cause of her grief.

"Nay," said she, smiling, "do not call it grief—for grief cannot be known in so gay a scene as this. How happy must he be who causes such joy!"

"I verily believe," answered Galliard, "that he has the saddest heart on the plantation—that is to say, if he has a heart at all, which I sadly doubt."

"No heart!" said Miss Norrisville, with a look of surprise.

"No more than I have," said Galliard, with a profound sigh. "Both were stolen by two fair cousins—heigho!"

"You should apprehend the fair thieves," said young Charles Bellgrove, who was at their side.

"So we have," answered Galliard; "but they don't apprehend us."

Bantering each other they walked onwards.

"'Pon soul, Whackie," said Tom, who had again been taken into favour by his master, and now brought up the rear of the party with a few more of the household, "'pon soul, dis is fine place. Nice, good-looka gals here—'pon soul! Dere is two ob dem smile on me!" and Tom, grinning, kissed his hand to the sable damsels.

"Caw!" said Whackie, "de gals be only laugh at you confounded nonsense. Don't make fool ob yoursef!"

"'Pon soul, Whackie, you no know de female heart: em is so werry suspectable of lub—specially wid good-looka chap like I."

"You is worth ten dolla any day!" cried a negro at his side. Tom started, looked frightened-like around, and, hanging his head, muttered "Dam de ten dolla!"

Maitland and his party now reached the front of the mansion-house, and here all that was rich and beautiful in that sunny clime, seemed to strew their stores with liberality. The garden glowed in gorgeous beauty like a second Eden, and the senses were intoxicated with the richest perfumes. The front entrance to the house was of the purest marble; whilst the sweet rose, the jessamine, and vine climbed around the verandahs, giving the house the appearance of a bower of richest beauty.

A host of gorgeously-apparelled household negroes were drawn up to receive them; and scarcely had they ascended the marble staircase, when Maitland was clasped in the arms of an aged Mustee woman, who wept with joy, and gave vent to her feelings in broken exclamations of fondness.

"My dear, kind nurse," said Maitland, affectionately, "I am come to you again."

"And you have been in battle and in danger," she sobbed, "and I far from you. But heaven has heard my prayers: you are safe."

"Ladies," said Maitland, "you behold in this kind-hearted female, the protectress of my infancy. But for her love and intrepidity, I might have perished, helpless and unknown."

"And this," said Matilda, "is the nurse who braved your grandfather's wrath to place you in his arms?"

"The same," answered Maitland. "And while I breathe she shall meet with the affection of a son from me."

They entered a large and richly-adorned apartment, and the eyes of the company were attracted towards a portrait of a young female, of dazzling beauty, which was surrounded by a hanging of black crape.

"Beautiful!" exclaimed Mr. Norrisville, entranced with the lovely features portrayed on the canvass. "Could such a being belong to earth? who, what was she?"

"My mother," said Maitland, in a voice trembling with emotion. Mr. Norrisville stepped back abashed; and the ladies were shown into their apartments to arrange their dresses.

Tom and Whackie, by way of spending the time, resolved to sport their figures through the different gardens attached to the negro huts, hoping to dazzle the eyes of some sable Venus. In passing one of the huts, a band of children came running along the walk, each with a book in its hand.

"Eh!" cried one little girl, as she observed the two strange negroes, "here be two nigger genelem from town!"

"Ha!" grinned Tom, "you is hear dat, Whackie?—'Genelem from Town!'—dat gal is hab good dish-crymation,"—meaning discrimination, as we suppose.

"Cleba gal dat is," said Whackie, pleased at being mistaken for a town swell.

"Come here, my pratty gal," cried Tom to the girl, who drew nigh and curtsied to him. "Wot is dis you hab got—book, eh?—you is read um?"

"Oh yes, Sir," answered the girl. "Massa is werry good: he teach all de boys and gals on de plantation for read and write."

"All de boys and gals!" cried Tom. "'Pon soul, dat is strange!"

Tom opened the book, and holding it upside down, pretended to peruse its contents; while Whackie thrust his head over Tom's shoulder, to see "wot de book was say."

"Oh, Sir!" cried the girl to Tom, "you hold de book upside down; dat is de wrong way for read!"

"Ah!" said Tom, gravely, "dat is de way nigger use for read long ago."

CHAPTER XX.

It was the night preceding the execution, when Zama, tired of pacing up and down the narrow limits of his cell, threw himself upon the rude couch therein, and gave way to the conflicting feelings which raged within his bosom.

"Fool!" he exclaimed, "to be led aside by a vain chimera—a thing which I might have known was an impossibility! To be dragged to ruin by a vain enthusiast—forfeiting the good opinion of all I loved—branded as a rebellious murderer—an ingrate—all that is vile! and dying the death of a dog!—Let me not think of it," he continued, as he started up, and once more hurriedly paced to and fro. "Ah, Zada!" he exclaimed, "who will tell thee of thy brother's fate? and thou, whose very name was a spell to urge me on—Matilda! what must thou think of me? Alas! there is none to feel for—none to pity the poor slave." He flung himself again upon the couch, as he added, "Let me at least meet my fate like a man. I have erred; and if heaven has doomed me to this death, why should I fly in the face of its decree?" The sound of a key grating in the lock of the door of his dungeon aroused him. "It cannot be time yet," he said; "it is not yet dawn." The door slowly opened, the rays from a dark lantern shone into the cell, and a voice, in a low yet earnest whisper, said, "Zama, arise!"

"I am here," answered Zama. "What wouldst thou with me?"

"Be silent," answered the voice again. "Arise, and follow me."

"Where, and for what purpose?"

"Escape is in your power!" was the earnest answer. "I come in name of your sister, to aid your flight from captivity and death."

"My sister!" exclaimed the negro; "where —how?"

"For heaven's sake be silent," answered the voice. "A single word may betray us: follow me—quick—cautiously, now." Zama sprang to his feet, and followed his deliverer from the dungeon. Silently and cautiously they moved through several windings of the building, till, ascending a narrow staircase, they entered a large hall. Here the stranger paused and whispered, "We must descend from this window. If we escape the sentinel's notice, 'tis well; if not, we must secure him." They approached the window, and the stranger fastened a strong cord to one of the balustrades and quickly descended. Zama, following him, found himself within the small garden attached to the prison. With rapid steps they hurried through the garden; and the stranger, applying a key to a small gate, opened it, and catching Zama by the arm, dragged him along, through the most retired lanes, till they reached the bank of the Ashley. Here the stranger paused and said,—"We are not yet safe; there is a canoe amongst the reeds in yonder swamp, we must cross the Ashley in it." Directing Zama where to find the canoe, the stranger remained close by the banks of the river, till Zama rowed up—then springing into the canoe he took one of the paddles, and telling Zama to pull strongly, they soon passed the current and reached the opposite side of the river. Here they stepped on shore; and the stranger, addressing Zama, said, "Your work is not yet done. I proceed through the woods to warn your friends of your safety. Enter the canoe again, and row to the bar of the bay, where you will find a small vessel waiting to convey you to the Bermudas."

"You spoke of my sister," said Zama. "Tell me of her: is she safe—is she well?"

"She is," answered his deliverer; "and will meet you on board of the vessel!"

"And you?" said Zama, "surely I may know to whom I am indebted for my escape?"

"To one," answered the stranger, "who foolishly has been the cause of grief to both you and Zada. I am Charles Waldenberg!"

"Charles Waldenberg!" exclaimed Zama, starting with surprise.

"Yes," said the Captain. "Led aside by my own foolish passions, and the devices of that arch-deceiver Perault, I carried your sister forcibly from her mistress's plantation. Touched by Zada's grief, I had not the heart to do her farther wrong; and I give you the word of a Carolinian and a soldier, that at my hands, she has, beyond her abduction, received no insult—no injury."

"I will believe you," said Zama. "And yet, what an abyss of guilt and misery you have plunged me into!"

"Let that pass," said the Captain. "I was on the point of restoring Zada to her mistress, when intelligence of your ill-timed rebellion, and your defeat and captivity reached us. I then solemnly pledged myself to aid your escape; and Zada, anxious to accompany you, remained at my plantation on the coast. Repeated attempts were made, but failed; till to-night, imposing on the guards as being on command, I entered your prison. I have been successful—the rest remains with yourself."

Scarcely crediting his senses, Zama listened to the detail of the young man; but was suddenly aroused from his stupor by Charles saying—"Remain here till you observe a light upon yonder point of land: that light will be the signal that all is ready; then row the canoe to the opening of the bay—we will be watching for your arrival." Grasping Zama by the hand, he said,—"God bless you! —I hope to see you soon beyond the reach of danger." He turned, and hurriedly hied through the forest, leaving Zama on the bank of the river. Joyful that his sister was safe, and anxious to behold her once more, the negro earnestly awaited the signal to approach the bay. Yet his joy was oftentimes clouded, with the thoughts of his hapless countrymen, who were so fast drawing nigh their doom; and dark doubts would arise on his mind, whether his own escape could be fully effected. At length he observed the beacon on the point; and as it shot up in a flickering flame, the assurance of safety filled his bosom, and inspired him with new hopes.

Zama entered the canoe, and, seizing the oars, strained every nerve to reach the opening of the bar. He soon passed Fort Pinckney; and, by dint of hard rowing, speedily approached the passage betwixt Fort Moultrie and Fort Jackson; but the wind suddenly changed, and blew in heavy blasts from the Atlantic ocean. The sea began to rise rapidly; and the heavy swell bursting on the breakers at the bar, whirled their long wreaths of white foam, like fiery flakes, high in the air; while the loud roll of the approaching thunder, came in sullen and terrific peals from the raging main. Zama knew this was a prelude to one of those awful tornadoes, which burst with such wild devastating fury over the southern coasts; and with a view to save himself from the hurricane, he resolved to run the canoe ashore, and seek his way, through the woods and swamps, to the beach. He had scarcely come to this resolution, when the canoe was raised by a heavy swell, while the heavens seemed rolling back like a scroll, and vomiting forth one continual blaze of lightning. A loud prolonged peal of thunder burst around the canoe; while the whirlwind catching it, tossed the canoe, like a feather, in the air, and dashed it to pieces, leaving Zama struggling amongst the raging waters. Boldly he crested the huge billows, and with vigorous strokes strove to reach the nearest point of land. At length he felt himself amongst the breakers, and tossed to and fro in the boiling surge. A fragment of the broken canoe struck against him; and, clutching it in his grasp, he was drifted on along with it. The waves were bursting fast over him; the noise of the waters became louder and louder in his ears; while the waves rolled around him like liquid flame, and a thousand demons seemed whirling their wild flight before him. Helplessly was he drifted onwards, till, seized by one huge billow, he was borne along with fearful force, and dashed headlong on a sand-bank, where he lay stunned and bleeding.

On recovering his senses, Zama was horror-stricken at the fury of the storm. The billows seemed every moment increasing in magnitude, and the lightning blazed forth incessantly, wrapping the ocean in a canopy of fire. His attention was now attracted towards a small dark speck, which was tossing among the breakers. With straining eyeballs he gazed upon the advancing object. As it drew nigher and nigher, and became more distinct beneath the lightning's blaze, he beheld a small vessel dismasted, and drifting before the gale towards the sand-bank on which he stood. One bright, broad flash illumed the deck of the drifting wreck, and Zama beheld two figures clinging to the broken mast, and the glare shone upon the white robes of a female. With a thrilling cry, Zama rushed amongst the surf, as if his feeble arm could still the raging of the storm; but he was hurled back. Again he saw the vessel borne on the crest of an enormous wave; a piercing shriek arose above the wild uproar of the storm—and the ill-fated vessel was swallowed up by the waters. Again Zama attempted to rush forward, to the rescue of the hapless beings cast amongst the surge; when beholding something floating amongst the foam, he clutched at it, and dragging it to the sand-bank, found his worst fears confirmed—it was his sister! In bitter agony of soul he pressed his lips to the cold, cold cheek of the inanimate form. "Zada—my sister—my beloved one!" he cried, "dost thou not hear thy heart-broken brother? She hears me not," he cried, in accents of deepest woe. "She is gone; my last, my only hope on earth." He cast himself at the side of the hapless girl, and sense and brain seemed reeling beneath the shock of this unlooked-for misfortune. "Zada, Zada!" he shrieked, as if calling on her name would awaken her to consciousness—and he pressed her to his bosom as if caresses could restore her again to life. "She is dead," he cried, as he started up, and, gnashing his teeth, shook his outstretched hands against the heavens. "Ye unrelenting and avenging powers," he exclaimed, "was it too much that the poor slave had one fond tie to earth?" He threw himself again on the sand, and clasped the insensible body of Zada in his arms. Suddenly he observed a movement of her bosom. With a thrill of reviving hope he placed his hand upon her heart, and, almost frantic with joy, he felt that it still throbbed. "She lives—she lives!" he cried, in a voice of rapture. "Oh, heaven! forgive—forgive my blasphemy! My own Zada," he continued, straining her to his breast, "we will yet be happy. I will bear thee far amongst the forest glades,—our white oppressors will not find us there,—we will be all in all to each other,—I will toil for thee, Zada. Oh! we shall be happy." A sullen roar of the waters startled him, and, looking up, he beheld with terror a mighty wave crested with vivid fire come rolling on towards him. Regardless of himself, his only care was for his sister. Throwing himself between the advancing billow and his sister, he stretched forth his hand as if to repel the advancing waters. . . . . .

Swept from the sand-bank on which they had been cast, Zama still clung by the body of his sister, and struggled gallantly with the swelling surge. Each deep-drawn sob, which burst from his bosom, proved that nature was unequal to the stern struggle. One earnest prayer burst from his lips, and heaven in mercy answered it. When, faint and weary with his exertions, Zama had abandoned every hope of safety, his feet touched the firm ground; and the bright glare of the lightning displayed the dark forests of the land, at a short distance before him. Clasping his helpless burden closer to his bosom, he pressed through the shallow tide, and once more trod the firm land. Breathing a heart-felt prayer for so miraculous an escape, Zama, with renewed strength, hurried through the forest, in the hopes of reaching some abode where he could obtain aid for his sister; nor had he proceeded far, till he reached the clearings of a plantation: the lights shone brightly from the negro huts, and, guided by them, he hurried forward. Faint and sick at heart, he staggered against one of the outer huts, and, listening for a little, he heard voices, which he instantly knew to be those of dandy Tom and Whackie.

"'Pon soul, Whackie," said Tom, "um is ob no use for cry your eye out 'bout Zama; dey will hang him as sure as I eat dis sweet tatie. When dey was hab de dam insurance for seek for hang I, (de most fassonable nigger in de city,) dere is no hope for poor Zama."

"If Zama was do like you," sobbed Whackie, "he would be safe: he fight like man; no hide heshef like dog, in a cella'."

"'Pon soul, Whackie, dat is insult!" responded Tom. "Dere be few braver nigger den I—when I like." Farther colloquy was cut short by Zama bursting the door open, and, with his fainting sister in his arms, rushing into the hut. "Help, brethren, help, for the love of heaven!" he exclaimed, as he sank with his burden on the floor.

"Zama, my own Zama!" yelled Whackie with a delirium of joy, as he started up and ran to aid him. Tom, however, sat for a second struck dumb with terror and astonishment; then, giving vent to his alarm in a loud diabolical howl, he tumbled heels over head through a window, and ran, winged with fear, to his master, to tell of the ghost he had seen.

CHAPTER XXI.

That morning was a melancholy one at Tenda Cove. It was fixed for the execution of the insurgents, and of the brave and faithful Zama. The night had been passed in restless gloom by Maitland and his visiters; and when they met for their early morning-walk, to enjoy the freshening seabreeze before the burning rays of the sun shot forth, there were traces of deep melancholy in every face. The only exceptions to the lachrymose countenances of the party were Galliard, and Whackie, who followed the lieutenant like his shadow, grinning and giggling, and playing off his negro antics, till Mr. Bellgrove seriously thought poor Whackie had lost his wits. In vain did Galliard shake his head, and try to frown at him; Whackie still persevered in his drollery, till the rest of the party began to comment on it.

"Surely the poor fellow has not gone crazy with grief for his friend;" was the remark of Maitland, as he beckoned on the negro to come nigh him. "You seem merry this morning, Whackie," said he, as the negro advanced.

"Yes, Massa, I is wery merry—ha, ha, ha!" roared Whackie, as he cut a caper in the air, and clapped his hands. "Oh! Missee," cried he, with a comical grin to Matilda, "if you know what I is sabey, you would dance wid joy too!"

"What do you know, Whackie? Do tell me; there's a good lad," entreated Matilda.

"Get along with you, Whackie," cried Galliard; "what are you about?"

"I was gone for tell Missèe 'bout Zada," said Whackie, laughing.

"Zada!" cried Miss Bellgrove; "what of her?"

"Fie shame, Massa Gallard," cried Whackie, as Galliard strove to push him out of the way. "You no want for tell Missee that Zada be here."

"Zada here?" said Miss Bellgrove, as she suddenly paused; and in a few minutes Zada, who had rapidly recovered under the care of the negro women and Maitland's nurse, was wrapped in the rms of her affectionate mistress. As yet Zada new not that she had been saved by her brother; that he was in safety and near her, concealed by generous friends.

his welcome intelligence was now communi- l by Miss Bellgrove. "Cheer thee, my sweet ' said Matilda, "Zama is now in the care of friends who will aid and protect him. Let no fears for his safety grieve thee."

"Alas! that he should have acted such a part," exclaimed Zada.

"Nay," said Matilda; "blame him not, blame those who forced him into the act. I will hear no harm of my brave Zama."

The meeting of the girl with her brother was affectionate indeed—the very thoughts of his danger endeared him the more to her; and her health being once more restored, she became his watchful guard and attendant, and would scarcely leave him, unless Whackie was nigh to watch in her place.

In a retired apartment in the mansion-house at Tenda Cove, Mr. Bellgrove consulted with Maitland and Galliard, concerning Zama's future prospects. Zama and Whackie stood close by them.

"It seems to me the best project to get him safely out of this country, and sent to Liberia," said Mr. Bellgrove.

"I beg leave to object to that proposal," said Maitland. "Liberia as yet is but a chimera; and it will be many a long year ere it realize the hopes of its founders. His talents would be completely lost there. However, let him answer for himself."

"Is there any other part of Africa you would wish to go to?" inquired Mr. Bellgrove at Zama.

"Alas! no," said Zama, mournfully. "Poor lost Africa! There the strong oppress the weak—and slavery, in all its hideousness, reigns throughout the land: the brother sells his brother, the parents their offspring, and rapine rules uncurbed; why then should I wish to go to the land of my forefathers, to mourn over the degradation of its people."

"No, Zama," cried Whackie, eagerly, "no go to Africa. Massa Joolay is tell I, dat all de people go naked dere!—Oh fie shame! de nasty indecent waggybones! Um no decent place. No, no, Zama; no go to Africa."

Maitland could scarcely refrain from smiling at Whackie's denunciation of African fashions; while Galliard, laughing, said, "Well, Whackie, suppose we send you and Tom out there."

"Ki! no, Massa," answered Whackie, with a look of disgust. "Tom could neber live wid people dat is go wantin' trousa'; I no like dat—um is no Christine—ki! fie shame!"

"The influence which a mind like yours would have over the untutored rabble, would lead to great good amongst them," said Mr. Bellgrove to Zama.

"It is not by individual examples that Africa is to be raised in the scale of nations," answered Zama. "Some powerful civilized nation must take the lead; and by opening up the vast resources of so rich a quarter of the world, introduce the blessings of peace and refinement. Then, and not till then, will Africa know her own power."

"I admire your sentiments, Zama," said Maitland; "and I trust in God, that the day is not far distant when Africa will arouse from her lethargy. May I anticipate your wishes, Zama?" continued Maitland, kindly. "There is a land where the negro is free; where his freedom was gained by his own exertions and bravery; where freedom will reign in defiance of the white man's power, and where a mind like yours will rise to eminence—that land is Hayti."

Zama started, and looked confused; while Mr. Bellgrove sat silent, and Whackie muttered, "Dat must be queer place."

"Recent events," said Zama, "make me almost tremble at that name; but to that land I would gladly turn for safety."

"Then," said Mr. Bellgrove, rising, "since that is your wish, you shall go to Hayti."

An arrangement was speedily entered into, by which Maitland agreed to give Zama one of his small schooners which traded to the West Indies; and Galliard undertook to see the captain of the vessel and bring him privately to Tenda Cove. This was done to the satisfaction of all parties; and the captain of the vessel agreed to sail without delay, whenever the signal-flag at Tenda Cove should be hoisted, which was to be the sign of danger.

"I fear that you are placing yourself too rashly in danger," said Zada to her brother, as they wandered into a flowery glade near Maitland's mansion-house. "Perhaps there may be spies around you now."

"Fear not for me, my sister," he answered; "but since my rambling here distresses thee, I will return." He turned, and Zada, leaning on his shoulder, looked fondly in his face and said, "In a few days you will be free from such surveillance; till then I must be your keeper."

"Alas! my sister, there will be one pang, and that a bitter one, to wring my heart at setting out."

"What is it, Zama?" said the fond girl, in alarm.

"The thoughts that I must leave thee behind me," he answered.

"Surely," she exclaimed, as she clung to him, "surely you will not leave me! Shall I not go with you? you will not refuse? When you are in sickness, who could tend you so carefully and so fondly as your Zada; when you are in sorrow, who will cheer you so lovingly as your own sister? You must take me with you—I cannot live separate from you. It will break my very heart, to think of your being cast amongst strangers, and no one nigh to cheer you."

"You forget, my dear Zada, that it is not in my power to take thee with me," answered her brother, while the tear glistened in his eye.

"Why not?" said the girl, eagerly; "if I am willing to go with you——Why do you turn from me? Brother, you are weeping."

"Oh! Zada," he said, in a voice almost choked with emotion, "God knows I would cheerfully bear thee through the world with me; gladly would I toil day and night to keep thee happy. You forget that it rests not with me to remove thee from this land."

"Who does it rest with, then?" she inquired, looking earnestly on him.

"With your owner, Zada!—You dare not run away from your mistress—you forget that you are a slave!"

With a piercing shriek the poor girl threw herself into his arms. "Zama, Zama!" she cried, "you will drive me mad!"

"My poor sister," he said, "you feel the bitter curse of slavery now."

"Alas! alas!" she sobbed, "bitter indeed—I little thought of this."

"Nay, cheer thee, Zada," he said; "we will not be long separated. I will toil hard, and late and early; I will save all my hard-won earnings, and buy thy freedom: then you will join me, and then we will be truly happy."

"Ah me," she sobbed, "how degraded I feel! How sunk in the scale of creation to be bought and sold! Hateful, hateful thought!"

"Banish that thought," said Zama; "you will soon be free. Dry up your tears. See, Major Maitland approaches."

They were now joined by Maitland, who stated that he had some intelligence for Zama, and requested him to accompany him. "You seem grieved, Zada," added Maitland, addressing her; "what distresses you now?"

Zama answered for her. "She is grieved at parting from me. She would wish, were it in her power, to accompany me to Hayti—but——"

"I understand you," said Maitland, looking fixedly at him. "However, rest assured you shall not be long separated."

"Heaven bless you!" exclaimed Zada; "I will comfort myself with that hope."

They reached the mansion-house; and Maitland requesting Zama to follow him, led the way to a retired apartment. "And now," said Maitland, "I am commissioned by Mr. Bellgrove to hand you this packet, which contains your manumission."

Zama started. His hand trembled as he took the packet and pressed it to his heart. With quivering lips and tearful eyes, he breathed forth to heaven the earnest prayer of a grateful, though penitent bosom.

Maitland turned to the window, and Zama had time to compose himself. In broken accents he thanked Maitland for his kindness, who, smiling, answered—"Independently of the gratitude I ought to feel for your saving my life, I owe you a still deeper debt of gratitude for saving the life of one whom I hold dearer to me than life itself."

Zama bent his head, and faintly said, "May you be happy in each other! Heaven must surely smile on the union of two generous, noble hearts."

Maitland sighed, and, turning to a table, lifted therefrom a small box, which he presented to Zama.

"Take this," he said. "In it you will find the only means to make your freedom available to you." Zama took the box, and feeling it was heavy, inquired what it contained.

"That," answered Maitland, smiling, "which the world worships—without which, talents, genius, nay, virtue itself, is spurned at."

"It must be a powerful talisman," said Zama.

"Yes," added Maitland; "it is the key to human hearts—'tis GOLD. In that box you will find three hundred doubloons. On your arrival in Hayti, purchase a small tract of land, and by steadiness and industry strive to gain independence."

"Pardon me," said Zama, as he replaced the box on the table, "I cannot accept of this kind gift: by my own industry will I gain my bread without becoming a burden to any one."

"And thereby," said Maitland, "lose the freedom that you prize so much. You have never yet experienced the humiliation which a proud heart feels, on soliciting from the hands of some purse-proud upstart, the hard-earned pittance due for your labour. From that degradation I would save you. Nay, I am too much of the Yankee to give my gold away gratis—I merely give you this sum in loan, and depend on your industry in repaying it. I insist, therefore, on your accepting it." He thrust the box into Zama's hand.

"Then," said Zama, "since your generosity enriches me so much, suffer me to apply the first of it in purchasing my sister's freedom."

Maitland shook his head, and answered, "No, no—that would insult Miss Bellgrove. Leave Zada's freedom to me." So saying, he arose and left the apartment.

Miss Bellgrove was deeply grieved to lose her beloved Zada; but, too generous to separate the sister from the brother, Zada's manumission was formally arranged; and Maitland, having made his nurse prepare everything fitting for Zada's departure, went in quest of Galliard, and explained his views to him.

"Do you not think, that if Zama had been sent to the Northern States he might have eluded Waldenberg's vengeance, and bettered his own condition in the world?" inquired Galliard at Maitland, as they sauntered down the avenue towards the beach.

"No," answered Maitland. "Throughout the whole length and breadth of our land the poor negro is spurned and despised."

"But when anti-slavery societies are springing up amongst them, surely a clever and talented negro like Zama would meet with attention from them."

"Yes; make a lion of him for a day; then toss him aside as unworthy of farther notice."

"The Northern States people appear to esteem the negroes amongst them; and in general the free negroes there are steady and industrious citizens."

"Still, the white citizens, from the highest to the lowest ranks, look upon the negro as of inferior caste to themselves. Ask even the most philanthropic of your Northern States men to sit down at the same table, and partake of the same cheer with a negro: you will see the white man—the man who claims the poor negro for a brother—start with horror, and indignantly spurn the invitation."

"You must admit that the negroes are inferior, in every sense of the word, to the white population of the States," urged Galliard.

"And why," said Maitland, "can the negro mind not be raised to the same standard of perfection as that of the white man? Where will you find more apt scholars than the negroes in general? Educate them; place them in their proper station in a free country—and, trust me, the negroes, in point of intellect and genius, will soon equal their white brethren."

Conversing thus, the two friends strolled arm-in-arm along the beach, when an unusual bustle at the landing-place attracted their attention; and proceeding thither they observed, to their mutual surprise, our old friend Joolay lifted out of a canoe by half a dozen negroes.

"Easy—easy, now, you black villains!" roared the Overseer; "gently, now, you eternal chimney sweeps! That'll do, now—I'm on my trotters once more. Help me up to the house, will ye?"

"I am heartily glad to see you, Mr. Joolay," said Maitland, approaching and shaking Joolay kindly by the hand. "Welcome to Tenda Cove."

"Thank ye, thank ye," said the Overseer. "Ha!" he cried, as Galliard advanced, "ha! you waggish puppy, are you here? Shake paws, my tartling." And Joolay grasped the laughing Lieutenant by the hand with hearty energy.

"Bless me, Mr. Joolay," said Galliard, after the customary salutations had been ended, "I little expected to see you venture so far from home. I heard that you had got your leg broke in the last engagement with the Indians."

"No, no," answered Joolay; "my leg wasn't broke; just a sort of a slap crack—kept me a-bed for two or three days. I feel it yet tremendously—quite lame, you see." And the Overseer limped a step or two, till his eye rested on the physiognomy of a negro grinning at him. "Ha!" cried Joolay, "is that you, Whackie? Come here, you rascal." Whackie obeyed the order, and Joolay, taking him by the ear, turned with a proud look to Maitland and Galliard, and said—"This chap, gentlemen, is a negro of my up-bringing; I used to flog him, when he was a little pig o' a nigger, worse than any piccaninny on the whole estate; didn't I, Whackie?" he added, appealing to his disciple for a confirmation of the fact. The negro, however, seemed to have entertained no great idea of the Overseer's system of tuition, for he looked very sulky as he grunted,

"Yes, Massa, you werry good at floggee."

"Yes, gentlemen," continued Joolay, "I trained him accordin' to Scripture; and, adopting old King Solomon's rule, I didn't spare the rod. I thrashed him as if he were my own son; and see what he's come to! He has saved the city—become a free nigger, with a thousand dollars a-year, darn me!"

Maitland smiled as he said, "Certainly, by your own account, you have given the honest fellow good cause for loving the white people. I would rely more on his own good heart than your cowskin for his saving the city."

"I thrashed it into him, Sir. Ah! he's an affectionate creature, Whackie," said the Overseer.

"They say, that the more you thrash a dog the more it loves you," said Galliard: "perhaps this is the system you act upon."

"Exactly so," answered Joolay. "But, gentlemen, I've almost forgot my business here. You see, I couldn't think of poor Zama being under the chokification concern yonder without me seeing him aforehand.—So, sick and ill as I was, I got into the canoe, and was rowed to town. Well, I went early in the morning to see him; but, my gracky, what a row!—the bird was flown—his prison empty—whew!"

"It must have created a great noise in town," said Maitland.

"Noise—oh! my!" exclaimed the Overseer, "what a cursing among the guard! Some swearing in Dutch, some in Spanish, some in French, some in broad Scotch, and some in illigant Irish—whew! Babel was a humbug to't for confusion. But Colonel Waldenberg was the worst of all: he was actually frantic, and swore to extinctify the whole guard himself for letting Zama escape."

"Waldenberg seems to hold the poor fellow in mortal hatred," said Maitland; "what can be the reason of it?"

"I've a half guess," answered Joolay, with a knowing look. "Among ourselves, I think the Colonel is indebted to Zama for getting the thickness of his skull ascertained."

"Impossible!" said Maitland.

"There's no impossibility in the matter," said Joolay. "Zama was the very chap to do it. His sister was carried off—Waldenberg was said to be the cause—Zama meets him—a row is kicked up—Zama breaks the Colonel's head—it's a mercy it was strong enough—then runs off; and, afraid of losing his right hand for striking a white man, or of losing his life, joins the insurgents. Phoo! it's as plain as mud on a door."

"This may explain the cause of Waldenberg's hatred," said Maitland.

"It strikes me as being true," said Galliard; "and Waldenberg, afraid to have it said that he was struck by a negro, would wash out the offence in Zama's blood."

"Just so," said Joolay. "Zama falls into the Colonel's hands, who, having the law on his side, tries to get the nigger hanged, and so square accounts,—the nigger escapes, and Waldenberg is up again in blazes. He'll hunt Zama down if he's in the States, as sure as my granny 's dead and buried."

"The sooner Zama gets out of his power the better," said Maitland.

"So say I," added Joolay. "So, thinking Zama would flee to the plantations again, I sent trusty chaps to hide him; and hearing that Waldenberg suspected he was on this island, and that troops were ordered to search it, I got crammed into a boat, and came off here direct to give the hint."

Maitland and Galliard looked at each other; while Whackie, bursting into tears, cried out, "Oh, my poor Zama—oh Maja Maitlam'—oh, Massa Gallard, do save him!"

"We will, my faithful fellow. Do you see yonder flag-staff on the top of my mansion-house?" and he pointed out the spot to Whackie.

"Wot," said Whackie, "yon long pole dat I is see above de trees?"

"The same," said Maitland. "Ascend instantly to the top balcony of the house, and hoist a red flag to the top of yon pole."

Whackie flew with speed to obey this command; and in a brief space a large red flag fluttered from the flag-staff.

"All is right now," said Maitland. "Let us return to the house."

"But what the plague has that red dish-clout to do with Zama's safety?" cried Joolay.

"You shall see," answered Maitland.

Leaning on Maitland and Galliard, Joolay slowly hobbled to the house, and in front thereof was met by Whackie. "I is do right, Massa?" he inquired, with an eager look.

"Quite right, my good lad," said Maitland.

Ascending the staircase, they entered the upper saloon, where Matilda and Letia were standing admiring some large roses, around which a number of brilliant humming-birds were fluttering. "Mr. Joolay!" exclaimed both ladies, as they flew towards him.

"Yes, my loves—just old Tom Joolay," cried he, as he grasped them by the hands. "I declare I'm getting quite childish now!" he continued, as he wiped his eyes. "I've got water in the head surely, for my eyes have got into a vile habit of overflowing of late." While answering the kind inquiries as to his health, Joolay observed a side-door open and a female figure enter the room. His nether jaw dropped—his eyes became distended, and a shock went through his whole frame as his look became fixed on the face of Zada. "Heaven protect me!" he exclaimed, "what is that?"

"Mr. Joolay," exclaimed that sweet voice which had been so long unheard by him, "have you forgotten your poor Zada?"

These words broke the Overseer's trance. "Zada!" he exclaimed, with a burst of joy, "Zada! no—is it possible?—have you again come to us?" He caught her in his arms; and still as if doubting her identity, passed his hands over her brow, and looked fondly and earnestly in her face.—"Ay, my sweet girl, it is you. The eye is dimmer, though, and the cheek thinner than they were on the banks of the Wandoo. I wish I had the grand rascal who played you such a trick. Darn his buttons! I'd kick him up to the sky and back again!"

"I have another truant to present to you," said Zada, as she stepped to the door and brought Zama forward.

"Eh!" roared Joolay, "magic by the 'ternal! Am I awake or dreaming? will nobody pull my nose or kick me, till I find if this be reality?—Zama, is it you or your ghost?"

"It is the unfortunate Zama you behold," said the negro.

"Didn't I say so?" cried Joolay. "Tarnation! I'm so happy—if that darned Indgine hadn't a-slapped that bullet into where it shouldn't 'a been—I could almost dance with joy. Don't think shame, my boy—you're a brave fellow. That comes o' being brought up by me—nateral genius polished up by art."

The Overseer's joy was interrupted by young Bellgrove hastily entering the apartment and beckoning Maitland aside. "There is a schooner," said the young man, "bearing down the bay under a heavy press of sail, with our private signal at her mast-head."

"All is as it should be," said Maitland. "But where is your father and Mr. Norrisville?"

"They are on the balcony watching the movements in the bay."

The upper balcony commanded a full view of the bay; and at the time Maitland ascended, he observed Mr. Bellgrove with a telescope, anxiously directing Mr. Norrisville's attention to a large boat approaching the island. "It is an armed body of men I am certain," said Mr. Bellgrove. "I see the sunbeams glancing on their muskets and bayonets. What think you, Major?" he added, as he handed the telescope to Maitland, who, taking a hasty glance through it, exclaimed, "It is part of the city-guard, —we must disappoint their errand. Come, gentlemen, we must get Zama and his sister away instantly."

"It will be a painful parting," said Mr. Bellgrove, with a deep sigh.

"I wish to spare them the pain of a formal farewell," said Maitland. And he led Zada from the apartment, and hurried her to the beach where the canoe was waiting.

"What is wrong?" said the poor girl, as he requested her to step into the canoe. "Is my brother in danger?"

Maitland pointed to the schooner, and answered. "That vessel which is now bearing down on us, is the one which carries Zama to Hayti. Nay, my sweet girl, do not tremble so. Your brother goes from this land with every means to make him happy." Zada raised her eyes and fixed them on his, with a look so fond, so beaming bright, and yet so melancholy, that Maitland's heart thrilled to the very core. Those beautiful gazelle-like eyes glowed with all the sensitive feelings of the gentle girl's heart; and Maitland started and felt confused, as a thought, nay almost a conviction, rushed through his mind, that the girl's affections were centred on himself. Zada seemed to read his thoughts, as, with a deep sigh, she drooped her head and burst into tears. "There are happier days in store for you, my gentle Zada," he said, as he pressed her hand. "Let not the feelings of your heart at this moment pain you: all is better than you expect." He placed her in the canoe, and at that moment was joined by Galliard and young Bellgrove.

In the meantime Mr. Bellgrove had mentioned to Zama that the vessel was waiting for him, and that his sister had gone to the beach to meet with him; when Whackie, with terror depicted on his countenance, rushed into the room. "Fly! Zama, fly," he cried. "Captain Riley and Sargem Vanburg, wid 'lot ob de city guard, hab landed on de island in search ob you—Oh! save youshef!"

Zama grasped Mr. Bellgrove's hand, and, pressing it to his bosom, said, "Can you forgive me for the grief I have occasioned, by my ingratitude, to you?"

"Fully and freely, my noble-minded Zama," said Mr. Bellgrove. "Farewell! In your future career never deviate from the strict path of virtue, and you will find peace and happiness. Heaven bless you!"

Zama turned to Miss Bellgrove, who, advancing towards him, stretched out her hands. The negro's frame shook with agitation, as, with a convulsive sob, he sprang forward and flung himself at her feet. "Farewell, dear lady, farewell," he cried, in a voice almost choked with anguish. "May all the bliss that a fond heart can wish you, be yours through life!" He grasped her hand, and pressed it to his forehead, his lips, and his heart, while his hot scalding tears fell fast upon it. "God bless you! God bless you!" One look, in which all the feelings of his soul were concentrated, was for an instant riveted on her—one deep-drawn troubled sigh, and Zama rushed from her presence, leaving her overwhelmed with sorrow and confusion, from which she was aroused by Joolay bellowing out, "There's ingratitude for you!—Zama—Lord preserve me! he's off—and never bade me good-by!"

Zama sped swiftly towards the beach, when Whackie, breathless with speed, overtook him. "Zama," panted the affectionate fellow, "you is angry wid I?"

"No, my kind-hearted friend. Farewell, Whackie; may you be happier than your heart-broken, exiled Zama!"

"See," said Whackie, as he tore the golden medal, the gift of the citizens of Carlville, from his neck, "dis is gold—take him—sell him; de money will do you good."

There was a sternness in Zama's look as he spurned the offering, and said, "Whackie, if you love your countrymen, never show that medal to an African."

"See, den," said Whackie, pulling forth a large well-filled purse, dis is dollars: do take 'em."

"Not a dollar—not a cent," said Zama.

"May I come to Hayti and see you, den?" implored Whackie.

"Most welcome," said Zama, as he pressed his hand;" and you will see the home of the free negro!"

They now joined Maitland and his friends on the beach; and bidding them adieu, Zama stepped into the boat. "And now, my beloved sister," he said, addressing Zada, "we must part for a while."

"Not so," cried Maitland, as he advanced and handed Zama a paper. "Behold her manumission —she is free—she goes with you. GOD bless and prosper you both!" He signed to the rowers, and instantly the canoe shot rapidly through the waves. Zada cast herself on her brother's bosom, and wept bitterly; and his own feelings were too powerful for restraint. They speedily reached the schooner, and were taken on board; all sail was hoisted to the breeze, and the fond brother and loving sister were wafted over the wide waters to a strange land.

A very different scene was passing in the city of Carlville. It was the day fixed for the wholesale execution of Perault and his comrades; and for miles around, multitudes of people thronged to the prairie, near the lines to the westward of Carlville; and thousands were assembled, gazing on a huge long gallows, which loomed from the ramparts towards the sky, its horrid outline clearly marked against the horizon. This gallows was composed of four huge upright posts, with cross-beams at the top, from whence dangled twenty-three ropes, with the detestable noose to each, indicating the shocking purpose for which they were destined. The platform on which the wretched sufferers were to be stationed, consisted of one long beam supported by three large props, behind each of which two hideous-looking mulattoes were stationed, with large hammers, to strike them away at the given signal.

File upon file of armed troops marched up, and took their station in front of the scaffold: the bells of the city were heard in the distance, tolling, as it might be said, in mockery of the approaching execution, and pealing the solemn funeral knell in the ears of the poor sufferers. The sound of the muffled drums rolled in solemn cadence along the lines; and a loud buzz of voices, and exclamations of expectancy and triumph arose, as the Cadet Brigade marched solemnly forward to the foot of the scaffold, and, opening their ranks, exposed to view, the doomed ringleaders of the rebellion. Chained two by two, Perault and his companions advanced with firm undaunted step to the gallows; and each, as he ascended the platform, looked with a smile of scorn and defiance on the assembled thousands who had come to witness their dying struggles. At length the chains were removed, and each was pinioned; then the spectators observed for the first time, that one place of the platform was vacant, and angry inquiries arose amongst the crowd, why the intended victim was not brought forth. The victim, it was rumoured, had escaped—'twas Zama!

The hateful preparations were at length gone through, and a number of clergymen addressed the sufferers, who spurned at their exhortations, and ordered them to be silent nor disturb their dying moments. One addressed himself to Perault, who scornfully ordered him to be gone; and turning to his companions, Perault addressed them in their native tongue, exhorting them to show, by their firmness, that they gloried in the cause for which they suffered, and hoped that their example might yet arouse the drooping spirits of their brethren. A wild, loud, and rapturous shout from his companions burst forth, as he finished his address, and the loud peal of "Africa and freedom!" again rung on the ears of the astonished whites. The signal was then instantly given; but a fearful and soul-harrowing scene ensued. The wild sound of the negroes' war-cry had alarmed and startled the executioners; and such was their trepidation and want of skill, that they struck away the props from one end only of the platform—which fell in a slanting direction, leaving the other end firmly fixed on the upmost prop. The unfortunate beings, who were placed at the lower end, were instantly strangled; whilst those whose feet still rested on the standing platform, were thrown into great agony—some hanging half suffocated and struggling violently, and others uttering loud shrieks of pain. These shouts were echoed by the dense mass of spectators, and loud entreaties of "Fire upon them! Oh! put them out of pain!" arose from every quarter. The Cadet Brigade levelled their rifles, and poured in a volley upon the struggling sufferers; but scarcely had the smoke cleared away, when the crowd, in amazement, beheld Perault, who had stood firm upon the raised end of the platform, burst asunder the bands which bound his arms, then, tearing the halter from his neck, and the cap from his face, he sprang with outstretched hands from the platform. "Fire upon him! he will escape!" was now the cry, when, in a voice like the shrill angry blast of a trumpet, sounding to the farthest corner of the densely-crowded plain, he cried, "Ye monsters! ye traffickers in human blood and flesh! how my soul loathes and abhors ye! Think not that by this foul deed ye have crushed the negroes' hopes of freedom. The day will yet come, when the poor negro will burst the chains of slavery asunder, and bitterly repay the wrongs which he has suffered; then shall this foul scene be remembered to you—then shall retribution be meted out. Curses on you all!—Even in death the negro spurns at and defies you!" He staggered back a few paces, and fell prostrate, when the executioners recovering from their fit of terror approached him; but a young officer from the Cadets stepped forward, and motioned them back.

"He is dying," said the young man. "See ye not how the blood is flowing from his breast over his white dress? Back and touch him not—he was a brave man."

From the faint heavings of his bosom, and difficulty of respiration, Perault was evidently fast dying, and the blood bubbling over his white vesture showed his wounds were many and severe. Feebly raising his head, his eyes rested for an instant on the dead bodies of the insurgents suspended on the gallows. His features softened with emotion. "My poor unhappy countrymen!" he murmured. "We hoped for better fates than this; but we are free—they cannot chain or bind our fleeting souls." His head drooped faintly on the ground, and almost inaudibly he uttered, "Home of my childhood!—thy sunny vales and thy palm groves arise upon my view——I come!—I come!—spirits of my fathers!—receive me!—" One feeble struggle, and PERAULT, the daring and ambitious insurgent, was hushed in death.

CONCLUSION.

The conclusion of our story is taken from the Carlville Courier and other newspapers of that city. In the former, the following statement appeared shortly after the events before narrated:—

"We are sorry to inform the public, that the negroes still display feelings of hostility towards their masters, which in many instances lead to the most melancholy results. On the 23d curt., while Colonel Waldenberg of Elmwood was crossing the Savannah river in a canoe, rowed by negroes, one of them gave the Colonel some insolent language; upon which the Colonel instantly struck him a violent blow with his cane. The slave, starting up, struck the Colonel with one of the paddles of the canoe, and, melancholy to narrate, the canoe was upset in the struggle, and the Colonel and two of the negroes were drowned."

In another paper the following appeared:—"We learn, from undoubted authority, that Zama, one of the principal ringleaders in the late negro insurrection, formerly the slave of Mr. Bellgrove, and who broke from prison the night preceding the execution of the other conspirators, has effected his escape to Hayti; and now holds a high situation in the Haytian government."

Some months thereafter, the marriage of Miss Bellgrove and Colonel (late Major) Maitland appeared in the public papers, along with that of Captain (late Lieutenant) Galliard and Miss Norrisville.

Whackie accompanied young Bellgrove on a tour through part of Europe; and old Joolay obtained the management of Myrtlegrove in addition to that of Bellgrove; while Mr. Bellgrove and Mr. Norrisville took up their residence in the city.

Tom was offered his liberty, but refused it; and strutted about as "de most fassonable nigger in town," till younger dandies sprang up, and thrust him out of the good graces of "de fair sex." Then, Tom took unto himself a wife, of whom, however, he seems to entertain no high opinion; for, when jested with on the subject of his marriage, Tom puts on a most dolorous look, shakes his head, and mutters, "'Pon soul, dat marry is no joke!" He is often seen with his friend Haman, indulging in gin-sling, and telling him to "Tank de Lor, for put wisdom in Haman head for live single man!"

WORDS FOR MUSIC.

No. I. MAID'S SONG.

Sigh of the western sea!
Wind that softly passes—
Murmur here, nor haste to be
With the idle leaves and grasses.—
Heedless all, it flutters by—
What a lonely thing am I!

Bird on my bower alight!
—Not for me he singeth;
But to join the merry flight
Fast and far away he wingeth.
—All are sporting in the sky—
What a lonely thing am I!

Lily! I tended thee,
Like a gentle sister!
—She is courted by the bee,
Breathing, when the truant kiss'd her,
All her sweetness in a sigh—
What a lonely thing am I!

There to the cooing dove,
Woodland Echo listens;
O'er a world of life and love,
Strewing bloom, the Summer glistens:
—But for me! O sad reply!—
What a lonely thing am I!

No. II. YOUTH'S SONG.

Her footstep is the airiest
That falls on summer ground;
Her wicked eye the wariest
Of all that glance and wound.
So winsomely, so heedlessly,
She ruins all she knows;
O! they will perish needlessly,
Who dost on Lady Rose!

There's not a promise bindeth her;
She's fairest when she feigns;
And every heart that mindeth her,
Must pine for life in chains.
And while she rules them frowardly,
There's none that dare oppose;
The bravest will turn cowardly
When led by Lady Rose!

Her rivals own her beautiful;
Her victims think her kind;
She makes the proudest dutiful;
She turns the wisest blind.
There's such a charm, subduing you,
In every glance she throws,
A look 's enough to ruin you—
O! fly from Lady Rose!

No. III.—WINTER SONG.

Must you coy it still, Fairy,
Now that summer 's over,
And the days are dark and chill?
—Look around, and, if you will,
Choose another lover!

While the sky was warm and bright,
And the glow-worm shone all night,
And the days in flowers were dress'd,
I could flatter with the rest,
—Then my heart was light, Fairy—
Now I cannot jest.

With the summer-bees, Fairy,
And the swallows vieing,
You have changed with every breeze;—
Is it time for flights like these,
When the year is dying!
Now that all is cold and gray,
Stiller thought will have its way:
If the Summer's charm beguiles
Wishes cross'd by froward wiles,
—When the Sun 's away, Fairy,
Love must bask in smiles!

I have paid with song, Fairy,
Every trick you play'd me:
Though your wildness did me wrong,
Though you tried and vex'd me long,
—Such a slave you made me!
Would you keep me still your own,
Syren, breathe a kinder tone.
I have served the summer through;
Winter comes to claim his due,
If I have not won, Fairy,
Bid me cease to woo.

No. IV.—FORESTER'S LAY.

The bloom was hanging on the vine
That noon you pass'd amid the May;
Was never heart so free as mine,
But ever since I fret and pine,
And wake the night, and waste the day
The vintage ripens in the vale,—
And I am here to tell my tale!

My horse upon the breezy hill;
The red-deer couching in the dew;
My greyhound ranging loose at will;
My forest-lodge, my woodman's skill,
Are lost; I lost them all for you!
I journey'd many a weary mile;
I came;—and now you will not smile!

I linger in the glaring street;
I lay me at your door at night,
To hearken for your fairy feet;
And though you scorn me when we meet,
I seek you still—as flowers the light!
Your very frown, so strange and cold,
I love it more than mines of gold!

Come to our forest-walks again!
A kinder Nature whispers there,
That never Love should plead in vain.
And you shall listen till the strain
Is softer yet, and learn to care:
I cannot cure, I cannot fly
The pain of such a careless eye!

STYRIA, AND THE STYRIAN ALPS.*

The most obvious and easy way to get a superficial acquaintance with the beauties of Styria, is to take that country in the route from Germany to Italy, following the great road from Vienna to Trieste, by Brück, Grätz, and Laybach. This road, after passing the northernmost ridge of the Alps by the pass of the Sömmering, which divides Austria from Styria, proceeds straight south to Brück, and there joining the Mur at the place where it makes the great bend in its course from east to south, winds along the romantic banks of that river, till it reaches the plain of Grätz. From Grätz on the Mur, it crosses the country to Marburg, on the valley of the Drave: thence to Cilli; soon after which it enters the valley of the Save, and proceeds through Carniola, over the broad, bare back of the Carnic Alps (the "Karst") to Trieste. This was the route followed by Mr. Russell in 1822, and described in his well-known "Tour in Germany;" a work, after so many years and so much publishing, is still, perhaps, the best English book of Teutonic travels that we possess. This also, taking it backwards, was the route followed by Captain Basil Hall in his famous expedition to Schloss Hainfeld, in 1835; of which expedition he has left posterity such a pleasant piece of gossiping record in the well-known volume, "A Winter in Lower Styria." The Countess Purgstall, in her letter of invitation to the gallant Captain, we recollect, expressed her surprise that so few Englishmen had hitherto had the courage to desert the beaten Tyrolese track, by the Inn and the Adige, for this of Styria, which is equally attractive in point of external beauty, and contains certain hidden wonders, which, for the sake of variety at least, the most devoted admirer of gray crags and green larches might delight to inspect. Such, for instance, are the iron mines at Eisen-erz, a little to the right, among the mountains, as you go up the valley of the Mur, from Brück,—"wo der Steirer Eisen bricht," as Arndt, in his noble song, sings; then you have the quicksilver mines at Idria, near the south extremity of the route; and not far from that the famous grotto of Adelsberg, with its subterranean cathedrals, and subterranean rivers; and then in the same caverned region, the amphibious lake of Cirknitz, which is wet one half of the year, and the other half dry,—running off, periodically, fish and all, into its rocky sanctuary, leaving the palace of the local Neptune, and the haunts of the Water-Nixen, to be ploughed up for a season by profane boors, and hunted over by a "game-preserving aristocracy." These things are at least worth seeing; and we don't remember (having travelled both) that the Brenner route presents anything so remarkable. The good Countess had therefore some reason to express her surprise, that more Englishmen had not made Grätz instead of Innsprück their half-way house to Italy. There is a railway now, however, finally determined on, (as we gather from a recent intimation of the French consul at Bavaria, †) between Grätz and Trieste; and from the extraordinary rate at which railways are jumping into existence in all parts of Germany, we have no doubt, that in a very few years this Styrian route will be a track as much beaten by view-hunting and other English travellers as any in Europe.

A mountainous country, however, like Styria, whose great valley, the valley of the Mur, runs longitudinally from west to east, (as, indeed, most of the Alpine valleys do,) is not to be known thoroughly by such a hasty cut across hill and dale in the direction of the great north and south highway, as we have described. Mr. Kohl has accordingly done wisely, or happily, by travelling this country from east to west, entering it—that is to say—by the valley of the Feistritz, and the Raab from Hungary, a little to the north of Grätz; and then proceeding through that capital, up the valley of the Mur to Brück; thence to Leoben, up the river westward, cross to the valley of the Ens, and over the heights of Upper Styria, direct down upon Salzburg. Herr Kohl is an intelligent and agreeable traveller. Many French tourists have written more cleverly, many English have described more dramatically; but the German naturally possesses more intelligence than the Englishman, at least in German matters: in all matters he is more honest than the Frenchman; and he is never ill-natured. The volume from which we are about to present a few extracts to the English reader, is only one of a series; but the Austrian empire is too vast a conglomerate to be turned over in a single article of a monthly magazine; and we thought we should edify our reader more, and confuse him less, by confining his attention for the present to a single point.

We enter, then, the good dukedom of Styria from the Hungarian border, a little to the north of Grätz, not far from that grim old quadrangle of a castle with which Captain Hall has rendered our imagination so familiar; and the first city that greets us is Fürstenfeld. This place is notable as one of the great manufacturing seats of the greatest tobacconist in Europe, the Emperor of Austria. Majesty on a throne, and womanhood in a house, are two things very much given to intermeddle; and when they intermeddle beneficially, (though somewhat vexatious at times,) we ought to thank heaven that we are not left in all things to our own evil wits. But when majesty or womanhood intermeddles to make that bad which might have been good without them, then indeed they are a curse.—His majesty of Austria intermeddles with tobacco, as Captain Hall also taught us, not with the intent to manufacture it as good as possible so it be only vendible, but with the deliberate purpose of making it as bad as possible, so it be only smokeable.—Mr. Kohl, in his remarks on this point, shows that the principles of free trade are recognised in Germany as perfectly as in England, France, or any other free country—upon paper:—

The imperial manufactory of cigars here is one of the most important in the whole monarchy. Not less than 45,000 cigars are brought into existence here duly every day that the sun rises; and of these the greater part are destined for Styria, Carinthia, Carniola, and the Austrian provinces south of Trieste. To Trieste alone 600,000 Imperial cigars are sent monthly. Annually—with a small deduction for holidays—there are produced here fifteen millions of smoke-tubes. When we consider that these imperial cigars are all the most vile stuff ever puffed by mortal mouth, which in fact never are puffed by any well-educated smoker, without the accompaniment of a hearty oath, or (if that be not allowed) an indignant half-suppressed murmur of execration; when we consider, further, what an unwieldy army of Tobacco Bureaucratists, what piquets of preventive soldiery the government is obliged to maintain, in order to manage such a monopoly; and moreover what an improvement of public morality would certainly take place in the spontaneous stop of smuggling that would instantly follow on the abolition of the monopoly—when we consider also, that in the place of the present paltry manufacturers—an uninspired race of government slaves and mere financial tools—the abolition of the monopoly would bring into existence a body of independent and enterprising merchants, who would not only improve the home manufactory, but give a new impulse to foreign trade; when we consider all this, and how easy it would be, out of the increased flow of manufacturing prosperity, to fish up some compensating tax to keep the revenue fat—we cannot but feel surprised that the Austrian government has not long ago fallen on some plan for doing away with a piece of financial machinery at once so preposterous and so odious.

The logic of Conservatism is everywhere the same. Prove a thing to be bad in itself, as bad as the devil can make it. Admitted, says Conservatism; but if it be bad in itself and for its own sake, it is good in reference to and for the sake of something else. To make bad tobacco is bad both for the tobacco and for the smoker; but it is good for the finances: ergo it is good for me! quoth the clerk of the treasury—Q. E. D.—"Go, my son, go," said the Swedish Chancellor to his boy, "Go to Westphalia, and see by how little Logic the world is governed!"

'Tis bad to begin with bad things; but better than to end with them. There are many good things in Styria, very many; good people generally everywhere, good girls and great beauties at Grätz, good steel, good timber, good water, good wine (some people think) at Radkersburg, good sugar biscuits, and a good Archduke John. But bad things there certainly are too; and as they happen to stand here somewhat prominently in the threshold, we must even take them as they come. First, then, in the capital—that is to say Grätz, for we have left Fürstenfeld behind us—there is, as in Vienna, a bad ARISTOCRACY. Mr. Kohl discourses very philosophically on this point.

There are about twenty-four families in this place who condescend to look upon one another as equals. These form a casino or club, of which pedigree is the first and the indispensable condition; so much so indeed, that from the meetings of this club the untitled wife of a noble is excluded. We are accustomed to say in the north, that the Austrian aristocracy mix more with the middle classes than our own nobility. This is the case, however, only in coffee-houses and other public places; in private circles the Austrian nobility are far more exclusive than any in the north of Germany. Aristocratic regulations, so absurdly severe as those in Grätz, are not to be found either in the Casino of Magnates at Pesth, or in the associations of the nobility in Dresden, Berlin, Courland, Livonia, or any part of North Germany. It is inconceivable to me how a thing of this kind can at the present day be tolerated. The nobles themselves are certainly principally to blame for such exhibitions of pompous puerility; but what shall we say of the people who tolerate and encourage the vanity! The conceited noble sets up his pedigree and his star, and his three letters before his name (VON) as an idol to worship; and the silly people fall down and worship. Why do they not rather (instead of looking up with reverence to aristocratic cliques and coteries) form themselves into a casino, of which the first law shall be, that no person being of noble birth shall be eligible as a member! A law of this kind would be one based upon the very rational presumption, that hereditary titles exercise such a pernicious effect upon the heart of him who is cumbered with them, that he must be considered, practically, as unfit for entering any association of which pure humanity is an indispensable element.

Bating, however, these twenty-four vain and foolish families, there is society enough in the forty or fifty thousand inhabitants of this "Vienna in miniature" (Wien im kleinen: so Weber calls it) to make the residence there uncommonly agreeable to strangers. For besides the lovely beauty of the situation in the rich plain of the Mur, and the romantic character of the mountains with which it is environed, Grätz, as the seat of the government for the duchy, of the military commandant for Styria, Illyria, and the Tyrol, of a University, &c., naturally possesses a variety of society which renders it independent of such petty aristocratic conspiracies as that just mentioned. It is, moreover, as the Countess Purgstall took care to inform Captain Hall, the cheapest place in Austria; and this, we are afraid, together with the railroads, will not preserve it long from an invasion of saving English—not always the best specimens of their nation. One thing, however, it wants, which Englishmen of the better sort will miss—high intellectuality. A significant enough token of this we have in the state of the circulating libraries, or library more properly:—

In Grätz, a city containing about 50,000 inhabitants, there is only one, and that a very wretched circulating library, containing about 3000 volumes, arranged, as I saw them, in very tolerable confusion. It is a poor widow that here occupies herself with the dangerous trade of lending books. When I asked her to give me something good to read to amuse a few evening hours, and to serve as a sleeping-draught, she handed me Clauren's Romances!* I asked for Victor Hugo, but his writings were forbidden; for James, but he was forbidden too; for Bulwer, but of him only a small part had been deemed admissible. On the other hand, many slippery writers that I did not ask for were on the shelves. "In den Sitten," said the old lady, "ist man nicht so streng wie in den Meinungen:"—"They are not so particular about morals as about opinions." I must mention, however, (to conceal nothing,) that such libraries have generally a secret nook in which contraband books in great request are reserved for a few quiet and discreet friends. In the whole of Vienna there are only two circulating libraries of any size, and four small ones like this at Grätz. In Ollmütz in Moravia, likewise, there is only one small library of this kind. In Innspruck, the capital of Tyrol, there was, a few years ago, also one. Now there is none; for the person who formerly managed it, lately gave it up; and there has been no new one established, for fear, probably, as I was told, of the Jesuits. In Munich, again, there are about a full half-dozen of very respectable circulating libraries; and a number of small ones besides. The 80,000 inhabitants of Dresden are supplied with spiritual food by twenty magazines of the same kind, great and small.

This is characteristic enough, not of Grätz only and Styria, but of the whole of Austria. And Herr Kohl knows very well too, though he does not choose to mention it, that certain Bureaucratists in Berlin are as completely opposed to free printing and free reading as the priests are at Vienna. We shall have to wait also some years and some days before we shall be able to say whether the provincial states, lately called into existence in the North, are anything more efficient for public and national purposes than those of the South of Germany, as they are described in the following passage :—

The assemblies of the states (Landtags-versammlungen) which are held here, (in the Landhaus at Grätz,) now do the country very little good, and very little harm. Formerly, however, they were important and influential enough; and, like the states of Barcelona, never submitted to the authority of a new sovereign without imposing on him an oath that he would keep the constitution, and obtaining from him certain popular concessions. This oath had to be taken publicly before the gate of the city, otherwise the new sovereign could not be admitted. On these occasions the Styrian estates were wont to show themselves much more sturdy asserters of national rights than the sturdiest of our modern Parliaments. Altogether, however much the Hapsburgers have been wont to boast of the loyalty of their Styrian subjects, their history is full of instances, in which they have made the most determined stand against the inroads of arbitrary power; and it is only the violent suppression of these repeated popular movements that has brought the country to its present state of political insignificance. Styria was, at one period of German history, of much greater extent, and of much greater importance, than we find it now. It has fallen from its days of glory. The same is true of the neighbouring province of Carinthia, a frequently-repeated name in the old German history, and a might that could make itself be felt, if not in Europe, at least in Deutschland. But now, in these latter days, both these countries have become remarkably silent. They speak nothing, and nobody speaks of them. They are two small weights that add their unnoticed momentum to the gravitating mass of Austria. Well worth the while it were for any thoroughly learned and intelligent man to write the history of this country in its great contrasts; as it was, as it is, as it might be: and men both learned and intelligent enough for this purpose there doubtless are somewhere on the banks of the Mur and the Drave; but what learned and intelligent men can do in Austria, they dare not do; not so do certainly as the sacredness of truth, the dignity of science, and the interest of their country would demand.* No less interesting would be the history of the estates of the archduchy of Austria itself, and of every other province of the Austrian empire. But all these important subjects have been either not handled at all hitherto, or handled with such a shrewd and subtle delicacy, that the naked truth can be discerned only by a few eyes practised to see through smoke, and to know by a peculiar instinct under what decent clod every dead dog lies buried.

The last public homage which the Styrian estates paid to their prince, according to the ancient constitutional practice, (the sovereign at the same time taking the oath to them,) was in the year 1728, when Charles VI. was emperor. The ceremony (for it was nothing more) which he volunteered to perform so many years after his accession, Maria-Theresa and Joseph did not think it worth the while to repeat; and this epoch of Maria-Theresa and Joseph, in many respects so glorious to Austria, must be named as that in which the Duchy of Styria lost its last show of a bulwark against arbitrary sway. This fine country, like so many other Austrian provinces, is now altogether without any constitutional means of asserting the public liberty. They who rule, however, are very much mistaken if they imagine that the once dear liberties of Styria, because the traces of its glory are effaced, are now no longer either needed or desired.

We wish we had time and space here to illustrate this matter of the German estates fully; because it may not be known to all our readers that the present despotic form of government which systematically suppresses freedom of thought and speech more or less in every state of Germany, is not native to that country, but altogether foreign and superinduced. The great elector of Brandenburg, the founder of the present Prussian monarchy, attained (as the student of history knows) to absolute power only by an act of positive public perjury. The liberals of Germany, when they ask for a free constitution, not in name only, but in deed, are not asking for anything new, but for that which was old and hereditary in their nation. Political liberalism in the north of Germany has been put down by fraud and by force; just as ecclesiastical freedom was annihilated by Ferdinand II. (a native, by the way, of this very place, Grätz) in the south. Having spoken of the occasion on which Styria lost her civil rights, we cannot do better here (although a little out of the geographical order of the narrative) than allow Mr. Kohl to state, at some length, how she lost her religious liberties.

At the end of the sixteenth century, Protestantism was widely spread in the duchies of Austria and Styria. Almost the whole of the Austrian nobility had become Protestant; and even the Emperor Maximilian II. (1564–1576) had shown himself in some degree favourable to the new doctrine. In particular, he had, at one time, seriously deliberated whether he should not take the sacrament in both kinds; and he had substantially acknowledged many of the Lutheran doctrines. Even so late as the beginning of the seventeenth century, the Austrian nobles kept private chaplains in their own castles, at first publicly and freely, then privately and in secret. How glorious for Germany had Maximilian only followed the impulse of his heart, and added the authority of the imperial name to the great moral might of the reformed faith! How happy for Germany to have had one confession, and one church,—then the political unity, so much talked of, might have been something more than a beautiful ghost! And how bloody and brutalizing, how irremediably baneful were the wars that the Ferdinands of the seventeenth century carried on against the outbreaking light of Luther's gospel! These wars had the effect of bringing back the nobility altogether to the Catholic faith; and the whole population of Austria and Styria fell back again, faint and hopeless, on the bosom of their dead mother. Still, however, some remnants of the ancient Evangelical church survive, as well in Styria as in the district of the Upper Ens, more especially in the mountain border region between Styria and the valley of the Salza.

According to Steller, there were, in the year 1839, in the district of the Upper Ens 15,300 Lutherans, and in Styria 5200, principally in the high country about the Ausseer and the Hallstädter Lakes. A Protestant clergyman, with whom I had occasion to converse, informed me that there were (in 1841) 17,000 Protestants in Austria: and I give credit to his authority; because the Protestants here being so few in comparison of the whole population, are, naturally enough, much interested to keep an exact account of their numbers. In Upper Austria, they form twelve congregations; in Styria, besides Grätz, three. In Lower Austria there are no Protestant rural congregations; but in Vienna alone there are 12,000 Evangelical and Calvinistic. In Carinthia and Carniola, again, a great number of Protestants remain; about 18,000. Very remarkable, on the other hand, it must be esteemed, that (except 120 Calvinists) there are no Protestants in the whole of Tyrol. This country is the pure Catholic district of the German, as Croatia is of the Slavonic-Hungarian, provinces of the empire.

The Jesuits and Capuchins, no doubt, came snuffing heresy about the Hallstädter See and in the gorges of the "Dead Mountain," as well as elsewhere; but it is almost as difficult to hunt out men in some of these corners as chamois-goats; and so this one and that one escaped, and the pure faith was propagated in secret. They had a practice also, which strict morality might question, but which certainly had a considerable influence in preserving a seed for the season of freedom that was hoped for:—when no other source of safety was left, they did not hesitate to conform outwardly to the Catholic Church; while, in their hearts and in their secret communings, they remained true to the doctrine of the Reformers. In the dark stormy nights, when the mountain blast howled, and the flood came roaring down the rocky glens,—when no hound of a Capuchin dared venture out to track the scent of human blood,—when the little children also were in bed, from whose innocent prattle the inquisitive priests were wont at times to draw the materials of their parents' condemnation,—then were the pious writings of Luther, and the Saxon hymn-books, silently brought out, and the secret worship was celebrated, to which only the eldest son and daughter of the house were admitted as confidants. Their pious books they kept in crevices of the wall, beneath the floor, or in any secret recess of the cottage. 'Tis only a few years ago that, on occasion of some old houses in this district having been pulled down, Lutheran hymn-books and German Bibles were found in the middle of the walls. So carefully did the pious peasants preserve the inestimable treasure, the Word of God,—a treasure obtained only by the most persevering efforts of concealed ingenuity, and to be guarded therefore as the apple of the eye, and as the jewel of God's sanctuary.

Many of these mountain heretics were doubtless discovered, and severely punished: others were banished to Transylvania. That country still shows many names that are to be found in the Traun and Gosau vales. Not a few of the richer sort voluntarily withdrew themselves from a country where they could not enjoy the characteristic privilege of a reasoning being—the right to think; and among these some settled in Prussia, as, for instance, one of the name of Herzberg, from whom the famous Prussian diplomatist of that name was descended. Of the rich who did not emigrate, almost all were forced to conform: only a few of the poorest sort,—"Holz knechte," log-carriers, as they call them in Styria, escaped at once the degradation of a forced conversion, and the misfortune of exile.

For 160 years did a secret Protestantism, under the mask of Popish conformity, maintain itself in these lonely mountain-glens,—a remarkable fact, to which a parallel is found only in the well-known history of the Albigenses, the humble and quiet Crypto-Protestants of Piedmont.

At length, in the year 1781, at the flat of Joseph II., appeared the long-delayed edict of toleration. Immediately on the appearance of this document, the concealed lights of the Protestant tapers in the vicinity of the Hallstädter See began to come forth and twinkle: and in a district where no bishop had suspected anything but the most loyal and unalloyed Catholicism, there were suddenly congregated about 3000 peasants, who publicly declared themselves adherents of the heretical faith. A pious Catholic pastor in the neighbourhood found, on a muster, only two or three families remaining of his once-numerous congregation; and his eyes were grieved daily to behold those who had so lately kneeled at his own altar, now busily employed in taking advantage of the imperial license, and building Protestant churches or meeting-houses.

We can only hastily refer our readers here to the recent proceedings of the Austrian government in reference to the Protestants of Zillerthal, in the Tyrol.* These proceedings show plainly enough that the Toleration Act of Joseph is still regarded by the dominant party in Austria, pretty much in the same light that the Catholic Emancipation Act is by the High Church party among ourselves. Leaving Grätz, and ascending the valley of the Mur, we encounter a phenomenon of a very painful description, too common in all Alpine countries. It shall be the last painful subject with which, on the present occasion, we shall have to do.

A little above Grätz begins the country of the Cretins, called here Troddeln or Trotteln, and in Carinthia, Kocker. In Lower Styria, a hilly wine-country, in which the inhabitants lead a somewhat less laborious life, only a very few of them occur; and further down, where the Mur enters Croatia, not a single one is to be found. Here, again, where the valleys are narrower, the climate more raw, the food less nourishing and salubrious, some of these wretched figures of abnormal humanity meet the eye in almost every village. With timid, cowering mien, with dull, listless eyes, with bent legs, with goitred neck, (many have three, or even four thick swellings on their throat,) these misshapen abortions drag themselves everywhere through the streets. 'Tis the saddest lopping and laming of humanity that is to be found anywhere on the earth; for the body is as deformed as the soul is debased; and the understanding as blinded as the feelings are perverted. These wretched creatures are, for the most part, malicious, revengeful, and cruel. They exhibit, when they eat, a most voracious, and entirely brutal appetite; as, indeed, all their sensual propensities are manifested in a most brutal and disgusting way. Like the brutes, they have generally a keen scent; but their hearing, as an observer stated to me, is seldom very acute. Their growth displays no vigour, and they are mostly of small stature. This is a small kindness of Nature to these unfortunates, for which we ought to be thankful; for if these unsightly shapes were allowed to attain a large and full development, the sight would be altogether intolerable. The vital power in them, however, imperfect as it is, exhibits toughness enough at times. They often live to a great age, and many of them drag their unhappy existence on for seventy years, and more—a misery to themselves, and an eye-sore to creation.

Upper Styria is the proper head-quarters of Cretinism. As, on the one hand, it disappears towards the south, in the more level country, so, in the opposite direction, towards Salzburg, it decreases, and in Bavaria ceases completely. In Linz there is not one to be seen: in Salzburg not a few still remain.

It is not a little remarkable, that there are whole villages and valleys which are unvisited by this infliction, while other adjacent localities suffer beyond the average. There is, for instance, not far from Fronleiten, a district called "in der gams," where it is said that every house has two or three Troddeln among its inmates. Many persons are of opinion that this peculiarity is to be explained only by the influence of the soil. Here, as in other places, a general observation is made, (whether well-founded or not, I have not the means to say,) that in the clay-slate districts, a much more marked tendency to Cretinism appears than in the neighbourhood of limestone.

The people themselves have many ways of explaining

* In the year 1836. See an article in The Quarterly Review, vol. lxiv. p. 120.

this odious phenomenon. The commonest theory, with them, is to throw the blame on the water; and many springs stand in bad repute with the boors, and are branded through a whole district, as fountains out of which one may drink stupidity, goitres, and Cretinism. About three hours' walk from Fronleiten, there is in the so-called "long meadow," (lange wiese,) a fountain which yields a pure delicious water; but it stands under the rustic interdict, and is called "Kropf-quelle," or goitre-well. The cattle drink out of this well without any injury; but men who allay their thirst by drinking from this stream, cannot possibly escape goitres, they say, and (in the case of young persons) Cretinism. Other springs, again, bear a good reputation in the country, and are recommended as the antidote to the bane which is in the former.

Mr. Kohl returns to this curious but painful subject, in several parts of his tour. We can only afford to add the following; remarking at the same time, in passing, that the author's assertion, in the extract just made with regard to the longevity of the Cretins, (if taken generally,) is contradicted by the best medical authorities, (see the article in Copland's Dictionary;) and also by that most respectable perambulator of Deutschland, Charles Julius Weber.*

To the west of Eisenärzt lies a district called "the Radmer." There are found the greatest number of Cretins, especially in "Upper Radmer," which is quite full of Troddelns, though in a very high situation. A young man from this district was named to me, who, till his eighth year, had been quite healthy and sound. He had attended school with the boys of his own age, and made considerable progress in his studies, when suddenly a dulness, and a shyness, became observable in his eye.† (This dulness of the eye is generally the first symptom of approaching Cretinism; and experienced persons can tell from the look of a child's eye, in the cradle, whether it is to share the common joy of intellectual day, or is destined to spiritual darkness.) Then his features assumed a stupid and rigid appearance; his legs bent inwards, and became crooked; his gait became clumsy and slow; his memory, and his desire of knowledge vanished; his mind was blunted in all directions; and the unfortunate parents saw their hopeful son sent down into the dark inanity of perfect Cretinism—an abnormal creature, without feeling, without thought, and yet living, and yet a man.

Here in Styria, also, as in Switzerland, the poor Troddelns are looked on by the people as a sort of hallowed persons; and any injury offered to the Troddel of any family, is highly resented. Nothing is more natural than this idea; partly because these helpless creatures actually stand in need of all the sympathy their fellow mortals can give them; partly because, in their mysterious and apparently-undeserved infliction, the friends of the helpless victim recognise the hand of Heaven, and cherish the fixed opinion that the poor Cretin suffers vicariously for the sins of the whole family to which he belongs. And, in almost all nations, a certain saintly halo is piously allowed to encircle the head of those who are unsound in mind; for what men cannot explain by any second cause, they inevitably refer to the great First Cause; besides, that in the common and normal condition of the mind, there is often less to remind us of our connexion with a higher spiritual world, than in the extraordinary and abnormal.

Very good!—witness animal magnetism. A German that does not philosophize, is a traitor to his country. Our way is now clear to allude more particularly to some of the good things in Styria. Of these, unquestionably the best at present—though, unfortunately, it cannot last for ever—is the Archduke John, "der Johann," as the good people familiarly call him; plain John, with an emphatic article—the John, as we in Scotland talk of the Bruce, and as the old Greeks did of ὁ Σωκρατης—the Socrates. Him, however, because we have no space, and because he has been sufficiently eulogized already by Captain Hall, we are compelled to satisfy ourselves with merely naming on the present occasion; remarking only as we pass, how strange a thing a real prince who knows his duty, and who does it, must have become in modern Europe, since, when we do meet with one now and then like this Archduke John, or the famous Duke of Weimar, the press must immediately blare out such multitudinous blasts of laudation. Honour be to the good Archduke John! We are thankful to Heaven that there is at least one prince in the world who knows he has something else to do on God's earth than to get into debt, to shoot partridges, and to drink wine to-day, and soda-water to-morrow. Go to Grätz, whoever has money in his pocket, and inspect the Johanneum, or public national museum of the duchy—that part of the Archduke John concerning which he can say triumphantly, as Horace said—"Non omnis moriar—I shall not all die;" and then let him travel up the country to the iron mines at Vorde'nberg, where he may chance to see the other part of him which shall die. A prince who is the best landlord, the best miner, the best farmer, the best public economist, the best chamois-hunter, the best dancer, and the best fellow altogether, in the country to which he belongs,—is really a thing to be looked at and loved. A prince indeed!—a Fürst, as the Germans emphatically phrase it; a person FIRST in all good works and noble qualities. This is the aristocracy whose heraldry we delight to acknowledge. But we must proceed in our catalogue of good things. The Styrian steel—"the Noric blade," as our poets, taught by the Romans, phrase it—has long been known as the best in the world. The principal seat of this is at Eisenerz, in the mountain ridge that divides the valley of the Mur from that of the Ens. This Mr. Kohl visits, and examines the mines. We pass on, in a north-westerly direction, till we reach this Ens-thal; and the first object that meets us there is the famous Benedictine cloister of Admont, founded in the year 1074, where there is a capital library, containing 100,000 volumes, Mr. Kohl assures us; and excellent quarters, as Sir Humphrey Davy found when he was there. Here, and beyond this, higher up the valley to the west, the Alpine scenery becomes truly sublime. We do not think Herr Kohl particularly happy in his descriptions; but the following may serve as a specimen:

'Tis truly astonishing how Nature has often shaken out her cornucopia so freely, that her abundance becomes a very burden to mortals. Thus in Hungary, for instance, and in Egypt, she has collected so much slime and rich fat loam, that humanity is well-nigh choked with it. Thus in Prussia, she has riddled out such a flat breadth of prose and sand, that people must stand and stare at every little hillock, as if it were a miracle of nature. Here, again, in Styria, she has dropped down such multitudinous masses of picturesque rocks, that men, amid this over-abundance of the beautiful, are like to starve for the want of what is necessary. On a single square mile of this country, there is congregated more of this rocky material of the sublime, than were sufficient to satisfy the demands of all the landscape gardeners in Europe. Take one of these high-throned, stern-commanding Titans, or even one of his vassals and sub-vassals here between the Ens and the Mur, and plant him suddenly down before the door of some honest boor in Brandenburg, the boor will fall down and worship, (people have worshipped less worthy things,) and pilgrims will come from far Pomerania and join him on their knees.

The plains of Hungary, and the heights of upper Styria, are two perfect opposites, which we may represent analogically thus: suppose a long picture-gallery, filled in its whole length with pictures of one kind only, landscapes in which nothing appears but four things infinitely represented—clouds, grass-fields, a stork, and a well. This is Hungary. Suppose, now, a picture-gallery furnished on all sides with every possible variety of the picturesque—with rocks, with forests, with rivers, with mountain gorges and devil's-bridges, with wizard paths and chamois-goat ladders. Aloft, like troops of misty-mantled spirits, float the restless clouds over the snowy peaks, while deep dark mines gape beneath. Mother earth has uplifted here her front so high, that the sky is visible to mortal eyes only in a few patches; and only in patches appear the few acres of workable ground that man can claim here for his own profit amid the unappropriated wilderness of rock. As the trees find their nourishment with difficulty, working their roots between the chinks, and thrusting themselves into the moist recesses of the stone, so men grow here also scantily, and are found only in spots, where haply there may be room for them. With such materials suppose the vigorous brush of some Salvator Rosa to have filled for you as much canvass as you desire; cover all the walls with such pictures, not your main gallery merely, but every antechamber, corridor, stair, and lobby, and the whole house to its smallest closet and corner—this is Styria. Es ist ein Anblick zum Erschrecken!—'Tis a spectacle of wonder, a spectacle of terror. It is as if one were set down to feast on a dish of pure pepper, or to hear a concert of mere trumpet-blasts blaring in from all sides, amid the loud roar of which the soft notes of the flute and of the violin were altogether mute.

There remain yet the two best things in Styria; and the first is the Chamois-goats and the Chamois-hunters, with whom Mr. Kohl was wisely careful to cultivate a particular acquaintance in these alpine regions. Of course there is no method of travelling in such places, but pedestrianizing; and pedestrianizing amid such magnificent mazes of mist and mountain no wise man will venture without a guide; and of guides, where such a one may be had, an old Gemsen-jäger is incomparably the best. Herr Kohl has reported at length some of his sporting conversations with these heroes of the cliff. Here follows one. The English reader will understand that the old he Chamois-goat is called a Bock, the she goat a Geis, and the young ones Kitzen:—

"You say that the old bocks have a habit of skulking behind the herd, sitting (like great men) apart from the vulgar throng. Did you ever bring down such a king of Gemsen, yourself?"

"O, Jesus Maria, and that I did!—Once I spied such a solitary old fellow beside that rock-wall yonder; a big rough old bock with a voice like a bear. This fellow, as soon as he observed us on the heights above him, began to walk backwards and forwards on the green platform where he stood, taking note of our bearings. This they always do when they spy the jäger; for they are no fools the gemsen, and never run right into the blue air after their noses without knowing where they are going. But for all their cunning we jäger yet know how to get the better of them. I had two jäger-boys with me, and them I told to stay where they were, and appear to be occupying themselves with this thing and with that, without minding the gams. Meanwhile I made a circuit among the rocks by ways known to myself, mounted myself on a cliff higher than where the bock stood, and intercepted him from behind. My boys remained where I left them, and the gams continued to walk up and down, reconnoitring their movements. I had thus time to advance and take a sure aim; and then bang! went my gun, and its contents into the stomach of the poor brute. I had shot it clean through the heart. 'Twas lucky for me that the wind was in my face; for we jägers with a fair wind sail worst. Had the breeze been blowing from me to the gams, and not contrariwise, all my caution and cunning might have helped me little.

"Two things an Alpine jäger must always attend to: (1,) the wind, as I have just been telling you, and (2,) the colour—that's to say his own colour. A fine new glossy hat is the worst possible for the hills; it must be old and gray. His jacket also, and his trousers must be gray, without bright metal buttons, which twinkle in the sun and make a jingle against the rocks. The young gallants with their gay toggery always bag less than we old stagers; for they will be showing themselves always to the sun, whereas one of us with a gray, rain-scoured thread-bare jacket, takes his stand beside the old stump of a tree as stiff and as gray as himself, and the cunningest old bock on the crag can't get a guess of our whereabouts till there is something past guessing about nearer home."

"O! you barbarians," said I; "and thus you sneak about your bloody business like wolves on the poor innocent sheep!"

"— s risch wohl so—even so mein Herr—aber wer will halt leb'n—but an honest man must live."*

"You said the old bocks were won't to separate themselves from the herd, and to graze alone. Do the geisen (the females) do the same?"

"Schaun's—if your wohlgeboren will attend, I'll tell how we manage it with the geisen. The old geisen remain almost constantly with the herd, and the oldest is always the most important personage in the troop—much more important than the bock, who only comes when his own business calls him—and rules only while that business lasts. The oldest geis, on the other hand, is the proper leader of the herd, and knows every secret path and crag and cranny of the rocks. This geis we call in our Jäger language the Vor-geis; (i. e. the geis that goes before,) and we take care never to shoot her; for if we shot her, by leaving the herd to a new leader, we would force ourselves to hunt upon a new plan. For when the vor-geis falls, either a new leader is chosen who has new devices in her head, or the herd breaks up into two or three troops, each with a separate head; and the ways and haunts of each of these must be studied thoroughly and watched by the Jäger before he can hope to do any good. Such a disruption of the herd never takes place when the bock is shot. Therefore, as I told your wohlgeboren, the vor-geis is the queen of the whole congregation; and let their number dwindle to never so little, she will never leave them. Only when she becomes very old, and has no longer any kitzen, and the warm mother's instinct in her breast begins to cool, then she is observed to lag behind the rest, partly, perhaps, because she cannot keep up at the same smart pace, partly because she has no longer the same taste for society. Such old geisen we shoot off, when we find them, without scruple, for that does no harm.

"Every herd of Geisen has its 'home' (Heimath) in the mountains, to which, after roaming about on grazing adventures, it always returns. This 'home' is some wild recess of the mountains, not easily accessible; and as good situations of this kind are not everywhere to be found, it sometimes happens that two herds of Gemsen will be found engaged in a serious fray about the lordship of a 'home.' And when a herd has once fairly lodged itself in such quarters, it is not easy to force it to decamp.

"When a herd of Gemsen has been out foraying, and is returning to their home, they observe uniformly the following order:—The Vorgeis always in the van; for she has a great tact at pioneering; then the other Geisen, the young Bocks, and then the Kitzen. The old Bock is always the last, and forms the rear-guard. Accordingly, when young inexperienced Jäger shoot hastily into the middle of the young Bocks, and disperse the troop, the oldest and the best Bock is always sure to escape.

"In their homes 'tis no easy matter to come upon the Gemsen. The chase there is, on account of the many abrupt precipices and sharp overhanging crags, often extremely dangerous. Yet even into these airy citadels we will follow them at times; and there are not wanting keen Jägers who will scramble up the most inaccessible cliffs in close pursuit of the Gemsen, making their quarters, night after night, in a deep gorge, under a toppling rock; or, if the chance is happy, in a cave. It is not once or twice either that some of us have been found in the deep ravines, fallen down from these high cliffs, or struck by the lightning. Sometimes it has even happened that a Jäger, in the eagerness of the chase, like the Emperor Maximilian at Schwatz in the Tyrol, has climbed to a point beyond which he cannot advance, and back from which he finds it impossible to return; and there is no remedy for it, but he must even starve, or be shot down."

"Shot down!—and who shoots him, then?"

"Ei! seine Freunde!—his friends, to be sure! He calls to his companions, and beseeches them to do it; and when every other plan fails, they must even do as they are desired. Of course, such an extreme as this does not often occur; but it has happened once, and twice, and it will happen again. Your wohlgeboren will trust me when I say, that there are things happen here in the high cliffs—that the Jäger knows—of which you gentlemen in the plains have no conception. Trust me—I tell you, none but a friend, and the best friend that a man has, will shoot him down from such a crag; for one who loves himself better, thinks of his own conscience first and last, and does nothing. But a true friend thinks only of shortening his brother's tortures;—and if a friend in need was ever a friend in deed, it is so in a case of this kind."

The last good thing of Styria, and, perhaps, (even better than the Archduke John,) the best, remains. It is the Alpine shepherdesses, the fair Sennerinnen, Arcadian maids, diligent as Minerva, and chaste as Dian's minions, who pitch their tents alone amid the lonely Alps securely, and fear no mortal. Some of our readers may recollect the beautiful opening chorus in Schiller's "William Tell," composed of three parts—the Fisher-boy's song, the Jäger's song, and the song of the Senners returning from the Alpine pastures.

"Ihr Matten lebt wohl!
Ihr sonnigen Weiden!
Der Senne muss scheiden,
Der Sommer ist hin!
Wir fahren zu Berg, wir kommen wieder,
Wenn der Kukuk ruft, wenn erwachen die Lieder,
Wenn mit Blumen die Erde sich kleidet neu,
Wenn die Brünnlein fliessen im lieblichen Mai.
Ihr Matten lebt wohl!
Ihr sonnigen Weiden!
Der Senne muss scheiden,
Der Sommer ist hin!"

What Schiller here so beautifully fancies, is described by our traveller as a more beautiful reality. The descent from the Alps ('s Aberauschen, as they call it) is conducted in Styria with a grace and a dignity that only requires to be seen, to convince poets and philosophers of a certain class, that even in this iron age of the world, Arcadian manners are in some places practicable. A common plan is for some nine or ten Sennerinnen to unite, and make the descent together. This, of course, cannot always take place; partly because the pastures are often small, and at a great distance from one another; partly because some pastures, from their situation, must be left much earlier in the season than others. But whenever a sufficient number can be brought together, they descend in a body; and in this way they will often have 200 or more kine in a troop; and as these are all busked with wild flowers and mountain wreaths, the effect of their march homewards with their pretty mistresses attending may be conceived.

The day before the descent, the mountain maidens employ themselves merrily in decorating their kine for the journey. Distinguished above the rest of the troop, are the oldest cow and the oldest steer. Their horns are gilded and adorned with silk ribbons, and massy, thickly-woven wreaths of the rarest Alpine plants. At times, an Alpine cow will be so richly adorned, that the mounting is worth twenty florins, or more; to understand which, we must bear in mind, that certain Alpine plants are in great request for medical and other purposes; so that a well-woven wreath for a queen cow may come to be a matter of as much usefulness in the plains, as it was of beauty and joy in the mountains. There grows, for instance, on the Alps, near the Carinthian border, a certain plant called "speik," in great quantities. Of this plant the shepherdesses make bushy crests for their kine; and thus profitably adorned, send them parading down the hills straight to the door of the apothecary's shop. The calves also—to the very youngest—are all decorated; but they must content themselves with a single small wreath about their horns, and this not a flower-wreath for the most part, but made of mountain berries, hips and haws, or roots cut into hearts and diamonds, strung together. Their cattle thus prepared, the Sennerinnen then pack their milk-pails, clothes, and whatever else they have, on the back of an ass, or a small pony, and then commence the descent. In this festive way they go on, laughing, and talking, and singing cheerily (they are beautiful singers often) till they come to the opening of their own valleys; and there the lads of the village will often be found meeting them with music, and gaily conducting them home. Sometimes, also, they will bring the Sennerinn a horse gallantly busked with flowers; and mounted on this, with her milk-pails dangling and jingling at her side, she rides into the hamlet in triumph.

The Sennerinn is, in the rural economy of the Alps, always the most important person, and much looked up to. For not only has she the management of the cattle, on which the livelihood of the good peasants principally depends, but the nature of the Alpine pastures is such that, without the superintendence of a person at once considerate and dexterous, serious accidents must continually occur, and heavy losses be sustained. The ground, for one thing, must be regularly studied and surveyed; pits must be covered, precipices railed in, and these rails must be kept constantly in repair. Many places of the pasture, also, are safe enough in good weather; but in bad weather, particularly dangerous. The Sennerinn, accordingly, must keep a constant lookout, to use skilfully the Alpine times and tides, and to obey the laws of pastoral navigation, which require a clear eye and a steady hand, as well as those of the sea.

A Sennerinn is responsible for any damage that may happen to the kine while under her charge: the presumption is, (so the peasant law has decided,) that without some carelessness on her part, the mischief could never have happened. For this reason, no Sennerinn who has lost one of her number, (were it only a silly calf or an unruly ox that threw itself down a precipice,) is allowed to come home flaunting with such festal decorations as we have described. She dare adorn neither herself nor her cattle, and the common halter serves them for a wreath. No Sennerinn, also, who is known as a gossiping girl, or one who has dawdled away her hours of duty with a sweetheart, may expect that the lads of the village shall come to meet her with music and merry welcome. Only the wise and dexterous manager is considered not to have disgraced her office by her conduct. She only comes down from her Alps (like the old Roman generals from the wars) with triumph or with ovation, as the case may be; while her careless colleague comes joyless home, and drives her bald charge into their stalls, which no one waits with forward welcome to open.

These Arcadian descriptions apply generally to the high country between Admont on the Ens, and Salzburg in the valley of the Salza, which, as we mentioned in the outset, our traveller makes the legitimate termination of his Styrian tour. Part of this region, the lakes in Upper Austria, and those in the Bavarian Highlands, are pretty well known to the great swarm of pleasure-tourists from Vienna or Munich, who make Salzburg their head-quarters for exploring these regions, pretty much in the same way that Stirling is a sort of gathering point for Highland travellers in Scotland. The proper Styrian Alps, however, over which Mr. Kohl passed in the upper valley of the Ens, are not often visited by travellers; and are not like to be so. So much the better. The travellers, who are something more than mere show-hunters, and wish to live with the people for a season, instead of merely looking at them, will meet with so much the more kindly reception. To the poet, the painter, and the pedestrian of this country, who have not sunk the man in the Englishman, and the Englishman in the tourist, there is treasured up many a happy summer hour yet, amid the nimblefooted Jägers, and the sweet-singing Shepherdesses of Upper Styria.*

* Observe, that nouns in r in German, have generally the plural like the nominative; so that the final s in Jägers is properly an Anglicism, that may be as well omitted. Observe, also, that the name of the capital of Styria is either Gratz, with the English a, or Grätz with the German ä; the former being the pronunciation of the Germans; the latter, of the Slavonic tribes in Styria and Carinthia. Observe, also, that in writing German words, two dots above a vowel, and an e after it, have the same effect—Grätz, or Graetz. Our printers, as if to make assurance doubly sure, often give both; which is absurd.

THE CAPTIVITY OF THE ENGLISH OFFICERS AND LADIES IN AFFGHANISTAN.

The ladies, the officers, and the children, as we have seen, left the British camp, at Khoord-Cabul, on the evening of the 9th January, and were taken for safety to the Khoord-Cabul fort, where, if not very delicately accommodated, they were respectfully treated. The party consisted of Lady Macnaghten, Lady Sale, Mrs. Sturt, Captain Boyd, his wife and child, Captain Anderson, with his wife and child, and another little girl, in the hands of the Affghans; Lieutenants Eyre and Waller, each with a wife and child; Mrs. Trevor and her seven children; Captain Troup, Mrs. Mainwaring and her child, and a few more persons, with their attendants. Lieutenant Eyre is more reasonable than Lady Sale. Where she complains of wretched accommodation and bad fare, he avers that the first night of the captivity was heaven itself, compared to what they had been suffering in the camp for the three previous nights, lying on the bare snow. The next day, Eyre relates—

The courtyard was all day crowded with the friends and relations of Mahommed Akbar, whose bearing toward us was exceedingly kind and courteous; but their presence obliged the ladies to remain closely immured in their dark cells. In the course of the afternoon the chief himself made his appearance, and, having requested an interview with Lady Macnaghten, expressed to that lady his sorrow at having been instrumental to her present misfortunes, and his desire to contribute to her comfort as long as she remained his guest. But an Affghan nobleman's ideas of comfort fall very far short of an English peasant's; and we soon learned to consider spoons, forks, and other table gear as effeminate luxuries, and plunged our fingers unhesitatingly into the depths of a greasy pilao, for which several of us scrambled out of one dish. The warmth of a wood fire, though essential to protect us from the severe extremes of cold, could only be enjoyed at the expense of being blinded and half stifled by the smoke; the bare ground was our only bed, and postheens (or sheepskin cloaks) our only covering; but these and various other inconveniences were indeed of small moment, when weighed in the balance against the combination of horrors we had escaped, and which still encompassed our unhappy countrymen and fellow-soldiers in camp.

The next day was one of extreme suffering to the captives, as their march lay over the route of the perished army. Of the dismal spectacles which met their eyes on this day, Lady Sale relates,

11*th*.—We marched; being necessitated to leave all the servants that could not walk, the Sirdar promising that they should be fed. It would be impossible for me to describe the feelings with which we pursued our way through the dreadful scenes that awaited us. The road covered with awfully mangled bodies, all naked: fifty-eight Europeans were counted in the Tunghee and dip of the Nullah; the natives innumerable. Numbers of camp followers, still alive, frost-bitten and starving; some perfectly out of their senses and idiotic. Major Ewart, 54th, and Major Scott, 44th, were recognised as we passed them; with some others. The sight was dreadful; the smell of the blood sickening; and the corpses lay so thick it was impossible to look from them, as it required care to guide my horse so as not to tread upon the bodies.

We cannot pursue this theme. The captives halted at the Tézeen fort, and next day pursued their route, still on the same dismal line of march.

We passed our last gun, abandoned, with poor Dr. Cardew's body lying on it, and three Europeans close by it.

During the march we were joined by Mr. Magrath, surgeon of the 37th N. I., and six men of the 44th. . . . . Mr Magrath had several narrow escapes; and when surrounded by Giljye footmen with their long knifes drawn, owed his life in a great measure to an Affghan horseman, who recognised him as having shown some little kindness to some of his sick friends at Cabul.

At night we had snow.

Our whole party, ladies and gentlemen, crammed into one room; one side of which was partitioned off with mats and filled with grain. Here an old woman cooked chupatties for us, three for a rupee; but, finding the demand great she soon raised the price to a rupee each.

13*th*.—We travelled over mountain paths, where the camels found it difficult to get on with the kajavas, till we arrived at Jugdaluck: near the Ghavoy there had been fearful slaughter, principally of Europeans.

We found General Elphinstone, Brigadier Shelton, and Captain Johnson here in tents.

On the journey of the captives on the 11th, Lieutenant Eyre tells us,

Numerous parties of truculent Ghazeeas, the chief perpetrators of these horrors, passed us laden with booty, their naked swords still reeking with the blood of their victims. They uttered deep curses and sanguinary threats at our party, and seemed disappointed that so many of the hated Feringhees should have been suffered to survive. We reached Tézeen, a distance of sixteen miles, at close of day, where the fort of Mahommed Khan received us for the night.

A few days afterwards, when they had reached the fertile valley of Lughmanee, we learn what were the true feelings of the peaceful inhabitants of the country for the invaders.

The whole plain beyond was thickly studded with small high-walled forts and villages, by whose inhabitants we were greeted, en passant, in no measured terms of abuse, in which exercise of speech the fair sex, I am sorry to say, bore a conspicuous part, pronouncing the English ladies not only immoral in character, but downright "scarecrows," in appearance, and the gentlemen, "dogs," "base-born," "infidels," "devils," with many other unpronounceable titles equally complimentary, the whole being wound up with an assurance of certain death to our whole party ere many hours should elapse.

We found the Affghan gentry most agreeable travelling companions, possessing a ready fund of easy conversation and pleasantry, with a certain rough polish and artless independence of manner, which, compared with the studied servility and smooth-tongued address of the Hindostanee nobles, seldom fails to impress our countrymen in their favour.

On the morning of this day it was necessary for the party to cross the Cabul river, at a ford where the water is both deep and rapid.

Many of the ladies, being mounted on ponies, were obliged to dismount, and ride astride on the chargers of their Affghan acquaintance, to avoid getting wet. Nothing could exceed the politeness and attention of Mahommed Akbar on this occasion, who manifested the greatest anxiety until all had crossed over in safety. Several men and ponies were swept down by the violence of the current and drowned; a whole host of camp dogs, whose masters had been slain, and who had attached themselves to us, remaining on the other side, to our great relief.

On this occasion Mahommed Akbar carried over Mrs. Waller behind him on his own horse. This lady was then very near the term of her confinement. At some of the forts where they halted, the ladies were sometimes taken by the chiefs to the apartments or private dwellings of their wives, who received them with kindness, gave them sweetmeats, and appeared, in dumb show, to compassionate their hapless condition. They were now equally anxious for intelligence from their friends, and about their own fate; for their faith in Mahommed Akbar could not yet have been strong. On the 17th they reached a large fort belonging to Mahommed Shah Khan, whose brother, Dost Mahommed Khan, was henceforth to have the charge of the captives; and here, to their horror, they were told by Akbar that only one man, Dr. Brydon, had reached Jellalabad to tell the dismal tale of the final destruction of the British army. Though their suite of rooms in this fort was neither large nor elegant, they took possession, and began to arrange their scanty property. That of Lady Sale and her daughter consisted of one mattress and coverlet, and the clothes which they had on their backs when they left Cabul. Lady Sale was told by the Sirdar, [General,] Mahommed Akbar, that her letters to her husband would be forwarded; that none of the party were considered prisoners, and that as soon as the roads were safe, they should all be escorted to Jellalabad. The correspondence with General Sale was in part openly allowed, and also contrived. The roads never became safe, until the advance of the British force, under General Pollock, had made them so. But that was still a far distant period, and much patience was to be exercised by the captives; though their friends at a distance, and indeed the whole of their countrymen in Britain and India, were much more anxious and apprehensive for the fate of the prisoners of the terrible Akbar than they either were or needed to be for themselves, after they were fairly in his power. Thirteen days after leaving Cabul, it is not surprising to find Lady Sale luxuriating in that "poor creature," fresh water.

19*th*.—We luxuriated in dressing, although we had no clothes but those on our backs; but we enjoyed washing our faces very much, having had but one opportunity of doing so before, since we left Cabul. It was rather a painful process, as the cold and glare of the sun on the snow had three times peeled my face, from which the skin came off in strips.

We had a grand breakfast, dhall and radishes; the latter large hot ones that had gone to seed, the former is a common pulse eaten by the natives: but any change was good, as we find our chupatties made of the coarse ottah, anything but nice. Ottah is what in England is called pollard; and has to be twice sifted ere it becomes flour. The chupatties are cakes formed of this ottah mixed with water, and dried by standing by the fire set up on edge. Eating these cakes of dough is a capital recipe to obtain the heartburn. We parch rice and barley, and make from them a substitute for coffee. Two sheep (alias lambs) are killed daily; and a regular portion of rice and ottah given for all. The Affghans cook; and well may we exclaim with Goldsmith, "God sends meat, but the devil sends cooks;" for we only get some greasy skin and bones served out as they are cooked, boiled in the same pot with the rice, all in a lump. Captain Lawrence divides it; and portions our food as justly as he can. The chupatty is at once the plate and bread: few possess other dinner-table implements than their fingers. . . . . .

24*th*.—A day or two ago the Sirdar sent some chintz to be divided amongst us. A second quantity was to-day given out; and we are working hard that we may enjoy the luxury of getting on a clean suit of clothes. . . . . . The Sirdar sent eight pieces of long cloth to be divided amongst us. I fancy he is generous at little cost; and that it is all a part of the plunder of our camp. . . . . .

10*th*.—I received boxes from Sale, with many useful things; and also books, which are a great treat to us. I wrote to him, but fear my letter will not reach him, as all notes that came for us were kept back by the Sirdar; who is very angry, having detected a private cossid between Captain Macgregor and Major Pottinger: if we behave ill again, the Sirdar says, woe will betide us. . . . . .

11*th*.—To-day all arms have been taken from the officers, on a promise that they shall be restored when we go away. I took poor Sturt's sword myself, and begged that the Sirdar would keep it himself; that we might be sure of its restoration, as being invaluable to his widow. Dost Mahommed Khan, Abdool Guffoor Khan, &c., desired me to keep it myself; acting in the handsomest manner, and evincing much feeling on the occasion. . . . . .

14*th*.—This is the day that Mahommed Akbar Khan is to go over the river towards Jellalabad to attack it. The 13th sent a quantity of clothes for distribution amongst the gentlemen. I received a large packet of letters, both from my family in the provinces, and also from England, but no note from Sale; so the Sirdar is still angry about the private correspondence. It was a very foolish attempt, for there was no news of consequence to send; and, rousing the Sirdar's suspicion is not the way to make him kind to us.

15*th*.—Firing of heavy guns distinctly heard to-day; supposed to be a salute at Jellalabad. . . . . .

18*th*.—Dost Mahommed Khan came with his son; the family have all arrived at a neighbouring fort in this valley. There is a report that Sale has chupaoed [surprised] Mahommed Akbar Khan's camp at Char Bagh, and cut up fifty of his men.

19*th*.—I heard from Sale. A friend writes me that there will be no relief before April. At noon I was on the top of the house, when an awful earthquake took place. I had gone up stairs to see after my clothes; for, servants being scarce, we get a sweeper, who also acts as saces, to wash for us; and I hang them up to dry on the flat roof: we dispense with starch and ironing; and in our present situation we must learn to do everything that is useful. But to return to the earthquake. For some time I balanced myself as well as I could; till I felt the roof was giving way. I fortunately succeeded in removing from my position before the roof of our room fell in with a dreadful crash. The roof of the stairs fell in as I descended them; but did me no injury. All my anxiety was for Mrs. Sturt; but I could only see a heap of rubbish. I was nearly bewildered, when I heard the joyful sound, "Lady Sale, come here, all are safe:" and I found the whole party uninjured in the court-yard. When the earthquake first commenced in the hills in the upper part of the valley, its progress was clearly defined, coming down the valley, and throwing up dust, like the action of exploding a mine.—I hope a soldier's wife may use a soldier's simile, for I know of nothing else to liken it to.

Poor General Elphinstone, who, by this time, was constantly confined to bed, and apparently neglected by everybody, was rescued by the intrepedity of his servant, a soldier of the 44th, who rushed into his room and carried him out. The Affghans, though earthquakes are common in their country, were more alarmed than the Europeans. Many of the neighbouring forts were levelled, though the one in which the captives were lodged escaped. The Affghans exulted in the hope that the earthquake might also have levelled the defences of Jellalabad; and that a direct interposition of the Prophet would make a road for the Sirdar and his troops to walk into that fortress. For some weeks, shocks of earthquakes were experienced every day, and sometimes several in a day, and, for safety, the captives deserted the fort, and lodged in small wooden huts which their servants constructed for them. One of their principal occupations was discussing the numerous rumours that reached them from different quarters, of which the most gratifying was, that Akbar was treating for their being exchanged for his father Dost Mahommed and the Dost's family. The successful sallies of General Sale were other delicious crumbs of comfort. The inhabitants of the valley were now removing their families and property to the fastnesses of the mountains for safety; but this told both ways, as the captives had reason to fear that, if their countrymen advanced triumphantly, they also would be sent back to the hills. There were also frequent rumours of their being ransomed; but, in the meanwhile, three months wore away, and Mahommed Akbar's camp had been surprised by General Sale, three guns taken, and his whole force routed. This was joyful news to the prisoners; though their joy was changed to sadness when they were told to prepare themselves, with all despatch, to follow the Sirdar's fortunes. He was to retreat towards the hills next morning. Lieutenant Eyre writes—

April 10*th*.—We were all ready for a start at an early hour, but no camels came till 3 P. M.; meanwhile a scene of pillage went on, in which Mahommed Shah Khan acted the part of robber-chief. His first act was to select all our best horses for himself, after which he deliberately rummaged Lady Macnaghten's baggage, from which he took shawls to the value of 5000*l*. He next demanded her jewels, which she was obliged reluctantly to give up, their value being estimated at 10,000*l*., or a lac of rupees. Not satisfied even with this rich plunder, he helped himself freely out of Captain Lawrence's boxes to everything that took his fancy; after which, being well aware of the poverty of the rest, he departed. Fortunately my own riding horse was spared, through the kind interference of the Meerza who accompanied the Khan. This characteristic little drama having been acted, the signal was given for our departure, the European soldiers being left behind, with a promise of release on the payment of a ransom.

It was a treat to get free of the dismal high walls within which we had been so long immured; and as we had arrived in the depth of winter, when all was bleak and desolate to the eye, the universal verdure with which returning spring had now clothed the valley struck us all with the force of magic. We had proceeded about four miles on the road towards Alishung, when our progress was arrested by a few horsemen, who galloped up waving their hands joyfully, and crying out "Shabash!" "Bravo!" "All is over! the Feringhee army has been cut up in the Khyber Pass, and all their guns taken by Sultan Jan!" The mutual joy of the Affghans seemed so perfectly sincere, that, notwithstanding the improbability of the story, we felt almost compelled to believe it, especially when the order was given to return forthwith to our old quarters at Buddeeabad. On the way back the new comers entered into full-length particulars regarding the alleged defeat of our army.

The story was a complete hoax; and next day the march was resumed, and in a short time the captives, after crossing a river, overtook the defeated Sirdar:—

He looked ill and careworn, but returned our salutes politely. A little further in we found three tents pitched for our reception, in which we had scarcely time to take shelter ere the rain fell in torrents, and continued all night. A very indifferent dish of tough mutton constituted our meal for the day. In the course of the evening Sultan Jan arrived in camp, with only about thirty horsemen left of the thousand with whom he went forth to battle; the rest had all fled. He seemed grievously crest-fallen, and, unlike the Sirdar, exhibited his malice and spleen by cutting our acquaintance. Mahommed Akbar, with the liberality which always marks the really brave, invariably attributes his own defeat to the fortune of war, and loudly extols the bravery exhibited by our troops led on by the gallant Sale. The guard around our camp consisted entirely of Seiks, under a mussulman Rajah, who, having been banished many years ago by Runjeet Sing, was befriended by Dost Mahommed Khan, the then ruler of Cabul, to whose family he has ever since attached himself. He was a splendid-looking fellow, with very prepossessing manners, and expressed himself much disgusted with the Affghans, who took advantage of his going out to fight at Char Bagh to plunder his camp.

Lieutenant Eyre often does justice to Akbar. He even attributes his worst faults to the counsels of his avaricious and treacherous father-in-law, Mahommed Shah Khan, whose great influence with the Sirdar was always employed for evil. This chief detested the British, and he had never acknowledged Shah Soojah. On the day after they met the Sirdar, the bachelors of the party were ordered to separate themselves from the married men and the ladies, as they were to travel by another route. This order was exceedingly disagreeable to all the captives; and Captain Lawrence not only remonstrated against the separation, but against the ladies and children being thus dragged about the country, exposed to so much hardship and fatigue; and represented that it would be more to the honour of Akbar to release them at once.

Mahommed Shah Khan, who was present, upon this flew into a rage, and declared that, "wherever he went we must all follow; that if our horses failed, we must trudge on foot; and that if we lagged behind, he would drag us along by force." He is the greatest enemy we have, and seems at present to govern the Sirdar completely. He was, however, taken to task by Mahommed Akbar for his rudeness, and we were allowed to proceed altogether, as heretofore.

When Lady Macnaghten's jewels were seized, (which, by the way, were afterwards returned,) Mahommed Shah Khan, who probably wished to take care of the property of all his captives, inquired if Lady Sale had any valuables. She tells, with some pardonable womanly malice—

My chest of drawers they took possession of with great glee—I left some rubbish in them, and some small bottles, that were useless to me. I hope the Affghans will try their contents as medicine, and find them efficacious: one bottle contained nitric acid, another a strong solution of lunar caustic!

When they came up with the defeated Sirdar, whose politeness Lieutenant Eyre celebrates, she relates:—

Mahommed Akbar Khan passed us; bowed, and smiled—"He can smile, and smile, and be a villain." I shook hands with Moyenoodeen, who is also arrived from the Khyber. He looks what is vulgarly called down in the mouth. He appeared afraid of acknowledging his acquaintance with me; and stealthily came to inquire if my wound was well. He was with Sale in the Kohistan; and then, and still, professes to be his friend, and the friend of the English in general.

While rambling over the country in this manner, the prisoners were exposed to some unavoidable hardships. They were, however, tolerably supplied with plain food, though obliged to encamp in crowded tents. But the season was now fine, the weather warm, and the country beautiful. Lieutenant Eyre has an eye for natural beauty, and some knowledge of natural history, while Lady Sale's descriptions have all a small dash of Dugald Dalgetty—an eye to future military operations and defences:—

14*th*.—A very tiresome hill on setting out,—the Bādhpush or Windy Back: the ascent rather difficult: the descent could be made good for guns with 100 sappers in a few days. Saw plenty of fruit trees in blossom on the hill; at the foot of which we halted, dismounted, and sat on the ground till all our people got over; and found Mahommed Shah's sons with large bouquets of tulips. I observed the misletoe, the myrrh, ilex, &c. The rest of the march was along a tolerably good road. We crossed the same stream at least twenty times.

This slow marching was tolerable in fine weather; but, when it rained, the condition of the captives was far from comfortable:—

19*th*.—A miserable day, and we marched through heavy rains to Tézeen: we are told that no supplies were to be had where we were. Kodá Buksh Khan's fort, close at hand, is full of loot and plate. The earthquake has brought down part of the fort they have brought us to.

The Sirdar could only get two camels with kajavas: but gave up his own palkee to Lady Macnaghten and me. I was utterly incapable of sitting on horseback: however, as I had to sit backwards, with very little room, nothing to lean against, and to keep a balance against Lady Macnaghten and Mrs. Boyd's baby, I benefited but little, except in the grandeur of a royal equipage. My turban and habit were completely saturated by the rain; and I shivered as I went. On arrival at the fort, I was told to go into the room where Mahommed Shah's and the other chief's ladies were. They received us with great kindness; and kept heaping up three large fires for us to dry our clothes by. The court-yard was a deep mass of mud; and in the evening Affghans carried us on their backs across it to another apartment, which was nicely covered with numdas: our beddings were all regularly sopped through. The whole of the baggage was sent on to the camp, with our servants. A dinner was cooked for us,—a huge dish of rice, with dhye (sour curds) in the centre, and ghee poured over all! This is a favourite Affghan dish, and therefore my bad taste must be arraigned for thinking it not eatable. Fortunately I had a little tea and sugar in a bag, suspended from the crupper of my saddle: they gave us some milk, and I found tea the most refreshing repast. We stretched ourselves on the numdas (coarse felt carpets) in our still wet clothes. In the night I began shivering again; and Captain Anderson, my nearest bed mate, covered me with a bed cloak, which, strange to say, soon imparted warmth to me. We slept, large and small, thirty-four in a room 15 feet by 12; and we lay on the floor, literally packed together, with a wood fire in the centre, and using pine torches for candles.

20*th*.—The Sirdar fears if he is taken by us, we shall either hang him or blow him from a gun. Mahommed Shah Khan is in a great fright also.

They had some cause for fear. Mrs. Boyd's baby (mentioned above) was but a few months old. It was one of several female infants added to the number of captives before the release of the party. One was added by Mrs. Waller next day; and shortly afterwards Mrs. Sturt gave a grand-daughter to Lady Sale. The weather again became fine, but the ladies still suffered severe hardships: though the Affghan ladies, the wives and daughters of the chiefs, were fully worse off in the precipitate retreats and drivings about from place to place. Mahommed Akbar sometimes apologized to the ladies for being unable to supply them with the comforts they required.

General Elphinstone, worn out in body and mind, expired on the 24th. Lady Sale, with whom he was no favourite, merely mentions the death; but Lieutenant Eyre refers to this melancholy event with indulgence, and even tenderness: regarding the General as less the victim of his own faults than of the errors of others, and of "the unfathomable designs of a mysterious Providence." Lieutenant Eyre is not, on some occasions, less just to Mahommed Akbar, who had been deceived as to the real condition of General Elphinstone, by those about him interested in keeping him in the dark, or he would have set the feeble old man at liberty long before this time. He made every atonement now in his power, by sending the remains of the General to Jellalabad, for honourable interment by his countrymen. General Pollock had, by this time, advanced. This respectful purpose was, in the first instance, frustrated by the vengeful reckless Giljyes, who seized and stripped the body, and ill-treated the European sent to conduct it. Mahommed Akbar was exceedingly indignant when he heard of this outrage. The Sirdar, like every other leader of turbulent clans, was often sadly annoyed by the conduct of his lawless adherents; and, by this time, Ameenoollah Khan and other chiefs were at open war with him. Some passages in Lieutenant Eyre's Journal, at this period, are of interest, from the light they throw upon the personal character of the hero of the close of the Affghan war, and the manners of the country. He tells—

The Sirdar was holding a levée to-day, at which Major Pottinger was present, when he burst into a violent passion, and declared that his own countrymen had basely deserted and betrayed him, although he had all along acted entirely at the instigation of the chiefs at Cabul, especially in the murder of the Envoy and the destruction of our army; yet these very men now refused to support him; and he solemnly swore that, if ever he had the power, a severe example should be made of them. . . .

At night the ladies of Mahommed Shah Khan, and other chiefs who were travelling in our company, invited Mrs. Eyre to dinner. She found them exceedingly kind in manner and prepossessing in outward appearance, being both well-dressed and good-looking. They asked her the old question as to the gender of the Company Sahib, and were greatly wonderstruck to learn that England was governed by a woman. They expressed the utmost dread of Captain Macgregor, whom they regard in the same formidable light in which a child does the giant of a nursery tale. . . . . .

Some one having told the Sirdar that I could draw faces, he sent for me on that pretence; but to my surprise pumped me for half an hour on artillery matters, being very inquisitive as to the manufacture of fuzes and portfires, the mode of throwing shells from mortars and howitzers, and the mode of regulating the length of fuze for different distances, on all which subjects I enlightened him just enough to render his darkness visible. Before I went, he requested me to take the likeness of one of his followers, and of a favourite Arab horse, and, though my performance was very indifferent, he expressed himself pleased. . . . . I was sent for by the Sirdar to examine a cavalry saddle, as he was anxious to know whether it was made of hog's skin. I told him it was a difficult question to decide, as both hog and cow skins were used, and could not easily be distinguished. As he gave me some knowing winks, and was evidently most unwilling that a good saddle should be sacrificed to the religious scruples of his moolah, who was seated in the room, I voted in favour of the cow; and, as Lieutenant Waller afterwards declared himself on the same side, the Sirdar, considering that two witnesses decided the point, determined to hold his own: and I believe in his heart he cared little about the natural history of the hide, so long as it suited his purposes.

At this time there was a fresh negotiation going on at Jellalabad for the release of the captives; but it was not successful, and they were carried still farther into the interior, and away from their friends, and longed-for deliverers. The country was found romantic and beautiful; the vegetation rich, and the climate delightful in early May, though in this high latitude still liable to sudden severe frosts. The gentlemen were now allowed more personal freedom; and often, in their desultory march, made long detours into the mountains, attended by their new and indulgent keeper, Mahommed Rufeek. Lieutenant Eyre relates:—

May 18th.—Dost Mahommed Khan was much struck by hearing Mahommed Rufeek read a Persian translation of the "Sermon on the Mount" out of Gladwain's "Moonshee." He was fervent in his admiration of the Lord's Prayer, as well as of several other passages; and the injunction to pray in private seemed to throw light on our apparent neglect of outward observances.

About the end of May they were once more approaching Cabul; but their escort had been obliged to take a new route, that through the Khoord-Cabul Pass being intolerable from the stench of the dead bodies of the men and animals that had perished there five months before. Mahommed Akbar was now in Cabul, which was the seat of fierce intestine strife. Shah Soojah had, before this, been assassinated, and several actions had already taken place between the chiefs who had embraced opposite sides. There were now said to be four candidates for the vacant throne of the Bala Hissar; and tidings were, meanwhile, daily received of the rapid advance of the British under General Pollock. Now, when all was internal distraction, came the favourable opportunity for the English to retrieve past reverses and disgraces, and the heroic spirit of Lady Sale blazed forth. "Now," she says,

Now is the time to strike the blow; but I much dread dilly-dallying just because a handful of us are in Akbar's power. What are our lives when compared with the honour of our country? Not that I am at all inclined to have my throat cut: on the contrary, I hope that I shall live to see the British flag once more triumphant in Affghanistan; and then I have no objection to the Ameer Dost Mahommed Khan being reinstated: only let us first show them that we can conquer them, and humble their treacherous chiefs in the dust.

There have been a number of reports to-day, which I believe to have no foundation in truth: amongst others, that the Giljye ladies have been packing up all night; and are going to give us the slip and leave us, in consequence of hearing that our force is coming up in four divisions.

These Giljye ladies had been the constant companions of their desultory marches. Lady Sale's report of these ladies is much less favourable than that of Mr. Eyre. On the 16th May, she relates—

I kept the anniversary of my marriage by dining with the ladies of Mahommed Shah Khan's family; who told us that Futteh Jung was king, Mahommed Akbar Khan wuzeer, and Mahommed Shah Khan the Sirdar-i-Sirdaran. It was an extremely stupid visit. We had two female servants to interpret for us. Three of Mahommed Shah Khan's wives, and some of Dost Mahommed's, with the mother of the chiefs, and two of their unmarried sisters, were present. They were, generally speaking, inclined to embonpoint, largely formed, and coarsely featured; their dress inelegant, and of the coarsest materials. The favourite wife, and the best dressed, was attired in a common Cabul silk, with a coarse piece of chintz inserted behind, evidently for economy's sake. The dress, which covers the whole person, nearly resembles a common night-dress; and has tacked on to it coins, or other pieces of silver or gold, such as crescents, &c., all over the sleeves, the front and sides, from the shoulders to the feet. A breast-plate is worn, commencing at the throat, of coins strung together: this descends far below the waist; and when they sit down, it hangs in festoons on the lap. Only the favourite wore gold coins: those of the other ladies being of silver. They had nothing in the way of jewels, properly so called. About seven common-sized pearls surrounding an emerald full of flaws, the whole set as a nose ornament, was the handsomest thing I saw in the trinket way. Some of them had very inferior ear-rings of gold and silver. They wear their hair in innumerable small plaits hanging down: these are arranged once a-week after taking the bath; and the tresses are then well stiffened with gum. The unmarried women bend their hair in a flat braid across the forehead touching the eyebrows; which gives them a very heavy look. These said eyebrows, whilst they are maidens, remain as nature formed them: but when they marry, the hair of the centre is carefully picked out; and the arch, thus most unnaturally raised, is painted. The Cabul women are much addicted to the use of both white and red paint; and they colour not only the nails, as in Hindostan, but the whole hand up to the wrist, which looks as though it had been plunged in blood, and to our ideas is very disgusting. A particular plant is often used for this purpose. The upper part of the leaf sparkles, and resembles the ice plant; but the lower side is red, and on being pressed gives a fine dye. A chuddah is thrown over the head and shoulders in the house, as in Hindostan; and when they go out they wear the bourka, ru-i-bund, and legwraps: high-heeled iron-shod slippers complete the costume. After a time an extremely dirty cloth was spread over the numdas in front of us, and dishes of pilao, dhye or sour curd, and férnéz or sweet curd, were placed before us. Those who had not taken a spoon with them, ate with their fingers, Affghan fashion;—an accomplishment in which I am by no means au fait. We drank water out of a tea-pot. A dinner was given to the gentlemen by Abdoollah Khan at his tents about two miles off, nearer the snow.

In the evening Captain Mackenzie arrived; and I received a letter from Sale. . . . .

Lady Macnaghten and a part of the ladies breakfasted with Dost Mahommed Khan and his ladies. They were told that, if the Sirdar gains the Bala Hissar, we shall all go there; if not, we go to Jellalabad. . . . . .

Chintz, sugar candy, tea, and cheese, distributed amongst the ladies; they were sent to us by our friends at Jellalabad: also Shalu (Turkey red cotton cloth) and jean, with boots, and shoes for the gentlemen. We also received the March overland mail. I heard a droll anecdote of Akbar when he went off to Cabul from Tézeen. His followers asked him what tent they should take for him: his reply was given with great good humour (he believed himself on the point of mounting a throne):—"The ladies and people above have got all our tents here; but you may send my salaam to General Sale, and ask him to lend me one of those he took from me."

About the end of May, matters were drawing to a crisis. The captives were now lodged in a fort near Cabul, and Mahommed Akbar was also near that city, having once more patched up a truce with the perfidious and versatile Ameenoollah Khan; while Futteh Jung, the son of the murdered Shah, held out in the Bala Hissar, in the expectation of being speedily relieved by the arival of the English. At this time, Lieutenant Eyre states, Mahommed Akbar is desirous to obtain possession of the citadel principally on account of the treasure within it, as he never professed to dream of resisting our arms. He earnestly desired to be on friendly terms with the British government, and often said that he wished he had been so fortunate as to become acquainted with the English in early life, as he had been filled with prejudices against them which had greatly influenced his conduct, but which he now saw to be unfounded. It seems that General Pollock offered, on his own responsibility, to release the ladies and children of his family from their confinement; but in his present precarious state of life the Sirdar has declined the offer.

Hundreds of Hindostanees crowded the streets of Cabul begging for bread, which was daily served out to them by Nuwab Jubbar Khan, and Zeman Khan. The civility of all classes to the European hostages and prisoners in and about Cabul was remarkable. . . .

June 3d.—It was reported that Futteh Jung had offered a large reward to any one who would seize and escort us all to the Bala Hissar. The Sirdar made a fierce attack on the Bala Hissar in the evening, and a brisk cannonade was kept up on both sides for several hours, but without any decisive result. . . . . .

June 9th.—Futteh Jung, finding his people disinclined to support him any longer, made terms with Mahommed Akbar and the other chiefs, giving up a tower in the Bala Hissar to each, and himself retaining possession of the royal residence. Thus the citadel was now divided between the Dooranees, Barukzyes, Giljyes, and Kuzzilbashes, represented by Futteh Jung, Mahommed Akbar, Nuwab Zeman Khan, Mahommed Shah Khan, and Khan Shereen Khan. A curious arrangement, truly! and calculated to facilitate the union of parties already jealous of each other, and each of whom had, doubtless, an eye to the rich treasure of money and jewels still in Futteh Jung's possession. . . . . There was a violent quarrel a few days back between the two old Nuwabs, Zeman Khan and Jubbar Khan, when the former seized hold of the latter's beard, exclaiming, "You are the fellow who first brought the Feringhees into the country, and to whom, therefore, all our troubles may be attributed." Abdool Glujas Khan, the son of Jubbar Khan, being present, drew a pistol and threatened to shoot Zeman Khan for the indignity offered to his father. Mahommed Akbar sat by the whole time, laughing heartily at the scene.

So rapidly does the face of affairs change in a country in the condition of Affghanistan, that in a few more days Mahommed Akbar was in the Bala Hissar, the wuzeer, [vizier,] or prime minister, and generalissimo of the new king, Futteh Jung,—and enjoying in reality the substantial power of the sovereign. Instead of now releasing the captives, he increased their number by purchasing from the chief priest those English hostages who had long before been committed to his care, and whose lives had been with difficulty preserved from the fanatical Ghazeeas. The new wuzeer paid his friends, the captives, a visit one day, accompanied by his father-in-law, who volunteered to restore Lady Macnaghten's jewels. They were restored next day; and it was almost time; for it was now late in July, and it was known that General Pollock was at Jellalabad with 20,000 men; General Nott at Candahar with 15,000; while an army of reserve was forming at Ferezepore, of 25,000; and 10,000 more troops on the way from England. Affairs were now looking serious for Akbar; and this must have been to the captives, probably, the most anxious period of their detention. Their ultimate fate looked more gloomy than ever, as they understood that the negotiations of General Pollock for their release, had entirely failed. At this time, Lieutenant Eyre states,

This negotiation, although commenced by General Pollock in the humane desire to accomplish our liberation by peaceable means, seemed now, by the sudden turn that had taken place, likely to plunge us into a dangerous dilemma,—Mahommed Akbar being notorious for stopping at no atrocity, when his angry passions were once aroused, as we knew they soon would be, when he should hear of the advance of both generals with their overwhelming forces.

In fact, we now fully made up our minds that death or slavery would soon be our probable lot, unless Providence should interfere to prevent it; which, indeed, was our best and only spring of hope.

August 2d.—A shock of an earthquake at three P.M., accompanied by a loud rumbling noise. The flies by day, and the musquitoes by night, swarmed to such a degree, as to banish all rest and enjoyment.

At the same period, Lady Sale, who was completely absorbed by military affairs, and the advance of the army, adverts to the condition of the captives.

The Candahar troops are ordered up; and the wuzeer told Lawrence (who says he never saw him appear so angry before) that if our troops advance, he should take us all to Bameean, and make a present of us to the chiefs of that place: so that our prospects appear gloomier than ever. I cannot understand the motive of moving up the troops both ways. Nott is to go to Ghuznee to receive the prisoners: not to fight, but only to defend himself if attacked; and then to come here and join Pollock: and, having received us, all are to walk back hand in hand. We are not to attack Cabul, &c., but to evacuate the country; with Akbar, the Giljyes, the Barukzyes, and all the other Zyes hanging on our flanks and rear: and if they can but get us to procrastinate, so as to give them the advantage of their faithful ally the snow, the Affghans will have the satisfaction of destroying another and still larger army this year. . . . . What will now be our fate seems very uncertain: but I still think he will not cut our throats;—not out of love to us, but because the other chiefs would resent it; as, having possession of us, they could at least obtain a handsome sum as our ransom.

At this time a disease, resembling the gaol fever, broke out among the captives, to which, among others, Captain John Conolly fell a victim. The tiger moods of Mahommed, (the new wuzeer,) so gentle and playful when things went well with him, broke fiercely out at this time; though many of the alarming rumours concerning him which reached the captives must have been exaggerations.

August 9th.—Mahommed Akbar having promised to send Captain Conolly's body for burial to Jellalabad, Major Pottinger sent to inquire this morning when it was to start, and received for answer from Akbar, that, "until Pollock should make peace, neither living nor dead should be suffered to go." The body was, therefore, buried this evening in the garden adjoining the fort. . . . . General Pollock still demanded that all the prisoners should be sent down immediately, which Akbar as positively refused to do without a written agreement. The crisis of our fate was consequently nigh at hand. About this time Mahommed Akbar, having made several fruitless attempts to collect revenue in the Zoormut valley, at last sent the Meer Wais, or high priest, thither for the purpose; but "his holiness" met with so little respect on this unpopular mission, that his horse was stolen, and he was obliged to return to Cabul on foot. Akbar, demanding that the animal should be restored, was told that the owner must "come and fetch him." Such is royalty in Affghanistan. If Akbar's merits as a ruler may be judged by the following anecdote, the future prospects of Affghanistan under his sway are poor indeed:—Shortly after his last assumption of power, under the title of wuzeer, some Lohannee merchants, whose trade had been entirely stopped by the late anarchy, ventured to Cabul with a few goods, to feel their way. Akbar no sooner heard of their arrival, than he sent for them to his house,—bought up all their stock,—paid them honestly,—gave them dresses of honour,—and, having urged them to return shortly with their richest wares, dismissed them to their homes rejoicing. Of course they gave out everywhere that such a first-rate fellow as Akbar had never appeared in any age or country. No time was lost in despatching a valuable cafila from Dera Ishmael Khan to Cabul, which was accompanied by many of the richest Lohannees in person. Akbar's eager eye was on the look-out for their coming; and scarcely had they set foot within the city, before he pounced upon them like a hawk upon his prey, despoiled them of all their merchandize, and levied a heavy fine upon the chiefs of the party.

Akbar was now fast sinking in the good opinion of Lieutenant Eyre, though, as a set off, we are told,

Captain Conolly informed us that Akbar lately held a council of chiefs, when Major Pottinger, who was (unknown to most of them) in an adjoining room, overheard a Kohistanee chief propose that all the English prisoners should be slain; on hearing which Akbar immediately got up in a rage, and turned the man out of the assembly.

One of the next deeds of the vizier was to arrest his sovereign, whom he had detected in a secret correspondence with General Pollock, whom he told to advance at once to assured victory; but if he delayed, a force would be collected to oppose him. Akbar had here some reason for displeasure. The captives now daily expected to hear of the death of Futteh Jung; but he was so lucky as to escape. The condition of the captives thus became more and more perilous, and more of them fell victims to the fever that raged in the fort where they were imprisoned. At last Akbar, for the moment both king and vizier, to whom their possession was become most important, resolved to send them away for greater security; and his orders were executed without much ceremony.

August 12th.—Major Pottinger, together with the five hostages, joined us, bag and baggage, from the Bala Hissar, by command of Akbar, who rudely told his people to "take those dogs away." This we supposed to be preliminary to our removal to Bameean or elsewhere.

August 13th.—Lawrence waited on Akbar, to ask him to give us two days' warning before taking us off; but he was told that we must be content with one hour's notice. Akbar also declared, that all further negotiation with General Pollock for our release being at an end, he should permit no more correspondence to take place between us and our friends.

Their prospect now was, being hurried off to some remote and savage region; and bad as Akbar was, they seemed to feel his vicinity a kind of protection. In a few days their march commenced; Mrs. Trevor and Mrs. Anderson, who were too ill to travel, being, as a favour, permitted to remain with their children, with Dr. Campbell as their medical attendant. The captives were attended by a strong escort of between 300 and 400 men, commanded by a Hindoo officer who had long before deserted from the British to Dost Mahommed. The march was commenced in very dejected spirits. The ladies now first adopted, in part, the Affghan costume, to save themselves from unnecessary remark or insult. They were no longer treated with the same civility as when they were the companions of Akbar. At the first halt, August 26th, Lieutenant Eyre found Sultan Jan halting to breakfast, en route to Ghuznee, with about fifty followers, with full purpose to annihilate General Nott. He having possession of the serai, our whole party were obliged to seek shelter under the scanty shade of three or four mulberry trees. Soon after Sultan Jan's departure, one of the officers went to the serai to beg for a room for the ladies and children, but was repelled with scorn, and asked, "what he, an infidel, meant by entering the place with his shoes on!" . . . . . Major Pottinger received a letter today, by stealth, from Major Rawlinson, political agent at Candahar, informing him of General Nott's advance on Cabul.

No provisions were served out the whole day to man or beast. In the evening, Salah Mahommed's band committed deliberate murder on some old regimental tunes.

August 27th.—We set out again at about two A.M. The road lay over the hill-pass of Suffed Khak, into the small but beautiful valley of Maidan. We halted for a few minutes under a splendid grove of spreading poplars.

August 28th.—We moved on again at two A.M. The road continued up the valley, which, if possible, improved in beauty as we proceeded. We halted within four miles of Sur Chusma, at Tak Khana, in a field bounded on one side by shady poplars, and on the other by a fine clear stream. This being the high road to Balk, we constantly met groups of asses laden with merchandise for the Cabul market, among which we could not be unconscious of the presence of assafœtida, which diffused its powerful and oppressive odour far and wide. Grapes, apples, pears, and apricots were brought to us in great plenty for sale from the villages, and furnished a seasonable refreshment after our journey of about fourteen miles. No tents were pitched, and the fever patients suffered greatly from the damp air at night.

Lady Sale describes the country which they now traversed as very beautiful; well wooded, with waters clear as crystal, and numerous forts. They were tending towards the hills, and the ways became more rugged; towns and fertile valleys were, however, interspersed. They were often falling in with straggling parties, and obtaining very contradictory tidings of the progress of the civil war, and of the advance of the English generals in different directions. On the 1st September, and the seventh day of this weary march, the Bameean valley, their place of destination, was descried as soon as they had traversed the Kaloo Pass. Lady Sale describes the scene.

It is nearly four miles to the top of it. The road at first is narrow and precipitous, and for the most part little more than a steep path. From the top the view is very grand; resembling the waves of a very troubled sea, and composed of barren hills of every variety of shade and hue. We saw Bameean from thence: but though a magnificent scene was before us, it presented no pleasing object to those who expected to remain captives in that desolate region.

3d.—Marched at daylight seven miles to Bameean. The road wild and uneven, with narrow paths and many ascents and descents. This valley is nowhere more than a mile broad; but it is very fertile, and produces particularly fine grain. Plenty of beans and peas are cultivated here; the former very small, the latter small and hard. The tamarisk and barberry were abundant, and a shrub with yellow berries. We halted for a short time opposite a fort, near which were many cows. Here we got some mast, (curds,) which we found very refreshing. Looking back from hence, we saw Zohak behind us, on a high point. At Bameean they refused to take us into the fort; and we pitched our tents just under the ancient fortress and city which were destroyed by Jhenzhis Khan; when upwards of 300,000 persons perished. The caves, ruins, and towers, extend for miles. There are two large images which have been described by former travellers: opposite to the largest was our encampment.

We had scarcely settled ourselves in the tents ere the General beat, in consequence of the people of the fort and the regiment disagreeing: so we went on about a mile, to such a wretched fort, that we asked leave to remain in tents; which was with difficulty obtained: but the Khan said he would endeavour to get a better fort for us to-morrow.

4th.—Saleh Mahommed Khan's lady came to visit Lady Macnaghten. She is young and fair, with a fat, round face; and comes from Loodianah; where, it is said, she was a dancing girl. Her information is, that Futteh Jung is a prisoner, or has been put to death: his family, she says, are expected here in a day or two.

From the 5th to the 9th we made excursions to see the caves, &c.*

Their accommodations at this place were of the worst description; and, in preference to remaining in the filthy, ill-aired fort, Lady Sale and her daughter chose a dark cow-house, in which, by hard work, they scratched out a place by which light and air might enter. These forts, the castles or strongholds of the Affghan chiefs, are even more rude than were the Peel-houses of the Scottish Border chiefs three centuries ago. The captives had not remained above eight days in their uncomfortable abode at Bameean, when a sudden order arrived from Akbar for their instant march farther off from all chance of deliverance—to Kooloom. All was now despair; till it was found that Saleh Mohammed, their new keeper, who had once before turned traitor, was ready to do so again—for a consideration, and the hope of being found on the side of the strongest. This worthy had been warily sounded by Major Pottinger in joke; and by the morning of the day after the order reached him to march the prisoners to Kooloom, Major Pottinger plied him effectually. For 20,000 rupees in ready cash, and a pension for life, he was ready to surrender the whole party to the British general, Nott. The terms were eagerly agreed to by all the officers, save Shelton and Colonel Palmer, who feared, it seems, to implicate themselves with Akbar, though quite willing to share the benefit of Saleh Mahommed's treachery to his Affghan master. It was afterwards learned that various motives had operated with this faithless follower, whose fidelity to his new chief had been assailed by Mohun Loll, and who, moreover, was aware of the advance of General Pollock upon Cabul, where his own family remained at this time, exposed to the vengeance of the British or of their friends (if they proved successful) the Kuzzilbashes. By one means or other, this double traitor was gained. The plot looked well; and the captives, taking courage, fairly turned the tables on their captor, and got up a small revolt of their own. The tissue of circumstances is at once curious and diverting. On the 10th came the order to march to Kooloom, and all had been gloom and despondency; and, on the 11th, the captives, with their keeper, were, in the words of Lieutenant Eyre,

Fairly embarked in the dangerous vortex of an Affghan conspiracy. The first point to be settled was, how to deal with a man called the Meer Akhor, who had accompanied our party from Cabul, as a sort of political colleague to Saleh Mahommed Khan. He was well known to be one of Mahommed Akbar's most faithful and confidential adherents: of his coöperation we could, therefore, entertain no hope, and of his continued presence, as he commanded a party of 100 Giljye horse, it was desirable to get rid as soon as possible. It was accordingly contemplated to seize his person on the first fair occasion that might offer. In the evening, Saleh Mahommed paraded his men, when they were very clamorous for pay, and declared their intention to proceed no further unless their wants were supplied. This little scene was probably got up as a blind for the Meer Akhor.

September 12th.—At an early hour Saleh Mahommed's flag of defiance was displayed on one of the towers of our fort. A supply of money being much wanted, to keep the troops in good humour, a cafila was intercepted from Bokhara, and about 400 rupees extorted by way of tax. Major Pottinger next adopted the bold step of appointing a new governor of the province, in the name of the British government. Presents and promises were at the same time liberally dispensed to the neighbouring Huzareh chiefs, who almost unanimously declared in our favour.

In the evening, Zoolficar Khan himself (the old governor) thought it advisable to send and tender his submission. Major Pottinger, in reply, reminded him that he owed his advancement originally to the English, and now had an opportunity to prove himself a friend, in which case his reward should be proportionate to his services. At night we were assured that the whole Huzareh population of the valley were on our side, and ready to take up arms against Akbar, even should he appear with a thousand horse to back him.

Altogether the plot prospered beyond our most sanguine expectations.

As Mahommed Akbar's arrival was to be hourly expected, (in flight from General Pollock's army,) we were impatient to get everything in proper trim against a surprise; and it seemed to us that Saleh Mahommed was much too dilatory in taking the necessary precautions. We now learned, for the first time, that he had yesterday received a second letter from Mahommed Akbar, urging him to hurry us off to Kooloom without delay, and instructing him to put to death all who, from sickness or the want of a conveyance, might be unable to travel. It is but fair to add, that none of our party actually saw this letter, and that we have since had reason to doubt whether Saleh Mahommed really received any such murderous order. The story was most probably an invention of his own, to enhance the value of his services.

The Meer Akhor had meanwhile become aware of what was passing, and wisely took himself off to the fort of Zoolficar Khan. In the course of the day he sent to assure Major Pottinger that he was his very dutiful servant. Saleh Mahommed, distrusting his professions and those of Zoolficar Khan, kept the troops under arms all the morning, and paraded them about for two or three hours, with drums beating and colours flying, hoping by this display of strength to intimidate his adversaries.

Saleh Mahommed, in the course of conversation with some of the officers to-day, said that he supposed we should no sooner find ourselves fairly out of his clutches, in the British camp, than we should turn round upon him and exclaim, "You be d—d!" (using the English words). Major Pottinger, both to-day and yesterday, wrote to communicate our situation to General Pollock, of whose arrival at Cabul we now daily expected to hear.

They now prepared their two forts for a siege, and raised a subscription of 500 rupees to lay in provisions. All was activity, and hardly were their small preparations completed when, at midnight on the 14th, an alarm was given, that the terrible Akbar was upon them. This luckily proved a false alarm, for the garrison was not strong, nor could much reliance be placed on the double traitor. But next day, certain news came that General Nott had stormed Ghuznee, and that General Pollock was near Cabul, and Akbar again a fugitive. It was now resolved to wheel about, and make a retrograde movement towards Cabul; and the captives accordingly marched out on the 16th, bag and baggage. Their condition was still very far from satisfactory. Had Mahommed Akbar, in his flight, come across them, the consequences might have been serious. By some means, Saleh Mahommed Khan procured ammunition and a few muskets, with which he wished to arm the European soldiers, to form a kind of show as an advanced guard in case of an attack. Lady Sale relates a shameful trait of the captive soldiers at this time, which is passed over in silence by Lieutenant Eyre. When Saleh Mahommed brought the muskets with some ammunition,—she tells,

Captain Lawrence said, "Now, my lads, here's Saleh Mahommed Khan has brought arms and ammunition for some of you: who volunteers to take muskets!"

I blush to record, that a dead silence ensued. Thinking the men might be shamed into doing their duty, I said to Lawrence, "You had better give me one, and I will lead the party;" but there was still no offer: and he told our General, that it was useless; and he had better take them on. It is sad to think the men were so lost to all right feeling.

From the names, most of these men must have been Irish. The captives departed with the apparent good wishes of the people of the Bameean valley; and when they halted for the night, they received the gratifying intelligence of the victory gained by General Pollock at Tézeen, and, what must have been more welcome still, a note from Sir R. Shakespeare, the general's military secretary, stating how far he had advanced on his way with a force of 600 men, mostly Kuzzilbashes, for their deliverance! Two days before this, General Pollock had in fact reached Cabul. Next day, the force of Sir R. Shakespeare was descried, and at first mistaken for the enemy. The emotions of the captives may be imagined. In the following days, while they continued their march, they were not, though thus reinforced, free from apprehensions that Akbar would make a desperate effort to recover his lost prey; and a request was forwarded to General Pollock, to send troops for their support, especially in a Pass that was said to be occupied by bands of marauders. We must let Lady Sale conclude the touching narrative of the deliverance. The brigade demanded from General Pollock did not arrive, and they considered themselves in some peril when the march was resumed on the morning of the 19th; Sir R. Shakespeare, now their commander, feeling much anxiety,

We had proceeded but a short way on our journey, when a horseman arrived with a note informing us that Sale was close at hand with a brigade. I had had fever hanging about me for some days; and, being scarce able to sit on my horse, had taken my place in a kajava; the horrid motion of which made me feel ten times worse than before I entered it. But this news renovated my strength. I shook off fever and all ills; and anxiously awaited his arrival, of which a cloud of dust was the forerunner. General Nott was near Urghundee, and consequently close to us; and General Pollock requested he would send a brigade to our assistance. This he refused, much to the disgust of his officers, alleging that his troops were fatigued. On this, General Pollock sent Sale with a brigade, at a few hours' notice. He left Siah Sung two miles east of Cabul; and made a forced march on the 19th (his sixtieth birthday) to Urghundee: he halted there that night; and on the following morning left his camp standing, and marched to meet us. At the pass near Kote Ashruffee, he left his infantry to hold the position, and proceeded at the head of the 3d dragoons. A party of Sultan Jan's men were in this neighbourhood; and some Kokhes in the immediate vicinity were driven off by the Juzailchees. Had we not received assistance, our recapture was certain: but as it was, they dared not attack the force they saw. It is impossible to express our feelings on Sale's approach. To my daughter and myself happiness so long delayed, as to be almost unexpected, was actually painful, and accompanied by a choking sensation, which could not obtain the relief of tears. When we arrived where the infantry were posted, they cheered all the captives as they passed them; and the men of the 13th pressed forward to welcome us individually. Most of the men had a little word of hearty congratulation to offer, each in his own style, on the restoration of his colonel's wife and daughter: and then my highly-wrought feelings found the desired relief; and I could scarcely speak to thank the soldiers for their sympathy, whilst the long-withheld tears now found their course. On arriving at the camp, Captain Backhouse fired a royal salute from his mountain train guns: and not only our old friends, but all the officers in the party, came to offer congratulations, and welcome our return from captivity.

That captivity had now lasted for nearly nine months; and, after all the hardships, fatigues, anxieties, and perils that had been undergone, ladies, children, and the infants born during this period of distress, had escaped unharmed. In a few days they entered Cabul, which presented a very different scene from that they had left on the morning of the retreat. "We passed," says Lieutenant Eyre,

We passed the spot where Sir Alexander Burnes's house had stood. It was now a heap of rubbish. The garden, in which he took so much interest and pride, was a desolate waste. It was here that I had last enjoyed his fascinating society, as he pointed out to me the successful results of his labours and experiments, and looked forward with enthusiasm to the rapid amelioration of the country, through the agency of British enterprise and skill.

Lieutenant Eyre afterwards learnt that the wily Akbar had betrayed no sign of discomposure at their escape, whatever he might have felt, and even professed himself well-pleased to hear of their safety.

So closed the captivity; but not thus closed the account of British "vengeance." We have, however, no desire, although we had space, to advert to the "glorious" events of that brief campaign, in which, according to Lord Ellenborough's boast, "our soldiers avenged our late disasters, upon every scene of past misfortune"—fearfully and cruelly avenged the vengeance which our aggressive injustice had provoked. Even the vengeance of Lady Sale must have been satiated at last; although her chosen victims escaped, and the wholesale, indiscriminate destruction fell, as ever, upon the peaceful and innocent. Lieutenant Eyre shows a more humane and sanctified spirit than the British heroine of Cabul, who owns, at least for Affghans, and camp-followers of every tribe and nation, "no pity, no relenting ruth." Of the wretched camp-followers a despatch of Wellington, nay, a bulletin of Suaroff, could not speak more cavalierly where such human impediments stood in their way, than this English lady. Yet these swarming hordes of God's rational creatures were not the least morally estimable portion of that ill-starred army. Apart from the narrative of events, whatever is noblest, and also whatever is hard, selfish, cruel, and insolent in the military principle, is strikingly illustrated in Lady Sale's Journal. It shows what, at the best, are the inevitable tendencies of the military life and spirit. From the conquest of Alexander the Great to that of Sir John Keane or General Pollock, that spirit has ameliorated wondrous little. The sufferings of the Affghans, first and last, from their unprovoked Christian invaders, must have been more severe than those inflicted by their Macedonian conquerors centuries before the Christian era. If mankind are ever to become enlightened to the infinitude of crime and misery entailed upon the race by the teeming curse of war, the tragic narratives which we now close should be valuable text-books.

THE GARBLED DESPATCHES OF SIR ALEXANDER BURNES.

It is almost unnecessary to bring farther proof than was given in our article on Affghanistan last month, that throughout the whole of our relations with that country and its Ruler, Dost Mahommed, the Anglo-Indian government acted directly in opposition to the judgment, and to the spirit and facts of the reports transmitted to it by Sir A. Burnes. This is now notorious, and, indeed, confessed everywhere, save in Parliament.——In the last number of this magazine, we quoted a few paragraphs from the strictly private correspondence of Sir Alexander Burnes, in which his opinions were freely and fully stated. From those of his official letters, which have not been published, and also from the suppressed or garbled passages of those of his public despatches which have been pretended to be published for the information of Parliament, we shall now select a few more passages. But, before coming to these, let us see the condition in which Sir Alexander considered Affghanistan, immediately previous to the revolt. Our first extract is from a long letter addressed to Sir William Macnaghten, upon the affairs of Cabul, after it had been for some time occupied by Shah Soojah and his English auxiliaries:—

My Dear Macnaghten,—The calamitous intelligence which we have just received of the recapture of Kelat, leads me to give additional reflection to the general affairs of this country, and convinces me that I am no longer justified in withholding from you those views which occur to me regarding it, and the very precarious tenure by which we would seem to hold it. You are aware that in February last, I drew up a paper of "Observations on the restored Government of the Shah;" and the general views laid down on that occasion, with some trifling exceptions, met with your entire concurrence. The paper in question was transmitted to government; but I have never heard that it was received, though it seems to contain much of the information which government are now seeking. I allude to this paper, because I do not mean to repeat on this occasion the sentiments therein set forth, but at the same time to add, that I see no reason to change those sentiments; and every day we have stronger proof, that, if they be not adhered to, we shall make nothing of Affghanistan, as a barrier, unless, indeed,—which God forbid,—we throw aside the mask, and resolve on converting it into a British province. . . . . Though I have not even a local habitation or a name in this country, I find myself so mixed up with it, both in the public mind, and in the despatches of government, together with my being in such constant communication with you, that it seems due to myself, I should to you, at least, clearly and candidly state the opinions which I hold,—opinions not lightly formed, but based on much personal intercourse with people of all ranks, and vitally affecting the sacred interests of our country in Affghanistan.

After describing the unsatisfactory condition of some of the provinces, he proceeds to say:—

What right have we to expect that any chief, placed in power by us, shall flourish, unless his government is better than that which we have overthrown! . . .

We came to this country to tranquillize, not to subdue; we handed it over to the Shah Soojah, inhabited by subjects, and not by enemies.

Having recapitulated the grievances under which the different chiefs and provinces suffered, and stated the very unsatisfactory progress made in tranquillizing the country, he thus sums up:—

So much for the state of affairs in the kingdom of Cabul on this day—the anniversary of our entrance into its capital. At court I fear we shall not find matters in a better state. Much is said of the King's popularity: this is a subject I feel anxious to grapple with thoroughly. To me it would be very astonishing if any Affghan King, who had allied himself to the Sikhs and the English, could be popular; it is not in the nature of things. His majesty's successor may hope for a better share of the public favour, but Shah Soojah must, I fear, get on without it. I would not, however, dwell much on the abstract question of unpopularity; I would rather inquire into the causes for it,—if they exist, or are only imaginary. Bad ministers are, in every government, solid grounds for unpopularity; and I doubt if ever a king had a worse set than Shah Soojah. His principal adviser is an old servant, by name Moollah Shikore, who has grown gray with his Majesty in exile, where he distributed, in some hundred fractional parts, the pension which the Shah received from the Company. He is not a man of family, but a Moollah. His faculties are impaired by age and disease. He once incurred his Majesty's displeasure, for which he forfeited his ears—a subject fruitful in witticism to the discontented about court, and little calculated to elevate the representative of majesty. So completely is this poor man's memory gone, that he never recognises a man he has once seen; [so] that the commonest business requires half-a-dozen of notes. In fact, of him it might be said, that his whole business is to gather money, and to this one end his remaining faculties are applied. Moollah Shikore passes by the name of Wuzeer, or minister, but his Majesty gets offended at his being so called; so we may presume he thinks it possible to get on without any minister. By facts that have come under my own knowledge, I shall depict the Vizier's character, and all of them can be tested by yourself. In the last winter, his notions of political economy led him to seize all the granaries around Cabul, on which he put his seal; and from which he drew forth the grain, and had it exposed for sale in the Bazaar by his own officers, and at a price fixed by himself. When spring arrived, he conceived it would please his Majesty to adorn the royal gardens, which have been long neglected—a measure most laudable; to a people so fond of gardens as the Cabulies, highly popular: but this was to be done gratis, and by conscription on all around this district. The poor peasantry were dragged, in hundreds, from their homes at seed-time, when their lands required their care, and compelled to labour without any reward. Discontent rose to such a height, that I sent to the minister, and plainly told him that he was disgracing his King and himself; and that I would no longer stand silent, as policy dictated I should, on all occasions, unless he, at least, gave the poor wretches bread; and if he would not do it, I would, from next day, open my own treasury and supply it. After this, the workmen got two pice worth of bread per diem, while our engineer officers were paying seven times that in the adjoining garden, where our cantonments were erecting. The next freak of this minister was to reduce the number of butchers' shops in this populous city, and to compel these to sell at his own price, thereby ensuring a monopoly of meat to a few, and injuring many. For days the loudest complaints were uttered, till free trade was at last established. As I write, the shops in which flour is sold are now shut, the minister having turned his views from meat to bread; and it is painful to pass through the Bazaar in consequence. With such an adviser, can his Majesty be popular,—do he and his minister deserve it?

Was it surprising that Shah Soojah and his minister looked with dislike upon the sharp-witted British functionary under whose surveillance they were placed, and heartily wished him disposed of one way or another; or yet that the people should have risen in insurrection against the new sovereign—although there had been no foreign invader in their country? The real grievances and insults to national feeling stated in other parts of this letter, were of themselves sufficient to incite a revolt among the oppressed people. Of his memorial, the writer says, in a postscript attached to a copy of it:—

The above paper was written on the 7th of August, or fifteen days ago; it has been deemed too gloomy. The following events have occurred since; and if the facts enumerated were insufficient, they may serve to indicate where the truth lies. Captain Hay, beyond Bameean, where all was deemed quiet, was invited to occupy some forts a-head of his position; he accepted the offer; 26 of his hundred men were wounded, and 9 killed; and the party only saved from destruction by Lieutenant Hart leading two companies to the rescue! 2. Captain MacGregor sent 1500 Affghans against a place north of Jellalabad; they were defeated, lost their gun and 100 men,—200 went over to the enemy!! 3. The Shah was going to Kohidamun, 30 miles from his capital; the chiefs objected to it: he is obliged to give up his trip, and return his tents into store!!! 4. Khelat has no sooner fallen than Belochees have moved against Shawl again, and troops have gone down from Candahar to the rescue!!!! 5. The chiefs of Khooloom and Koondoos have joined in a confederacy against us, and prevented Dost Mahommed coming in!!!!! 6. A conspiracy has been discovered by myself, and believed by the king and and the envoy, implicating almost all the first men in Cabul and the surrounding countries in a plan to subvert the country!!!!!! 7. Letters from the Sikhs to Dost Mahommed have been intercepted sending money!!!!!!! With seven points of wonder, I close the result of twice seven days. A. B.

A private letter, dated 6th September 1840, confirms the gloomy views of the above postscript, and, together with every line of his authentic writing which we have seen, proves that Burnes had all along despaired of the success of the cause to which he was reluctantly bound, and that he from the first foresaw the evils in which the whole scheme was ultimately overwhelmed:—

6th September, 1840.—I have not written to you for some time past, for, by my faith, I can write nothing to you but alarming truths: things have now got to such a height that we know not where they will end. This country has gone to the devil. The Envoy had persuaded himself, against every advice, that things were all right. The king set up a fool of a minister, and the injustice of his rule has raised the whole country against us. Dost Mahommed reached Khooloom, and got such encouragement from this that he advanced, and his son has had a brush with our advanced post of Bameean named Bajgot. He was licked; but our men have since had to fall back (oh, ye gods!) on Bameean, and a regiment has started to their aid this morning. The present force there is about 2000 men and 12 guns; but then half are Affghans, and friendly to the Dost. To add to this we have discovered plots and conspiracies all round us, and at our doors; so that the brigade from Jellalabad has been ordered up here! A pleasant state of things, you will say.—I sent a paper to ——, written this day month, showing my opinions up to that date, in a letter to MacN. The Envoy called it "gloomy;" but a month, alas! has proved it was not gloomy enough. There is nothing here but downright imbecility: I see no hope of keeping my character any longer. I am not answerable for what goes on, but people think I am. I get no share of any credit, (but alas! there is none for any one) and more than a full share of all discredit. Nothing on earth keeps me from breaking out but a fear of my motives being misconstrued, and people saying that I throw dirt on the Envoy and the King to exalt myself. I hope I may be able to bridle myself so as to continue silent to all but MacN. and the King, to whom I last night gave the whole of my mind, to their dismay. I, however, succeeded in getting the minister ejected, and a new one set up; and, if this is not shutting the door of the stable too late, good will come of it. The Dost, seeing he had so many friends here, got the Koondooz and Khooloom men to break their treaties with us, and get up a religious war. My fear is now, that he will effect a lodgment in the hills north of us, and avoid Bameean; and if so, we shall have all the country from that to the great road between this and Attock, i. e., the line higher up, against us,—Kohistan, Nijrow, Tézeen, Koner, Bajore, Swat, &c., &c.,—and this, too, from a quarter where, you will see by my letter, I had hoped most. I give you all this to keep you au fait at what you will read in the papers. We have brought all those things on ourselves, and we must get out of them as we can. Shah Soojah told us last night that he had no reliance on his own people, and on nothing but us and our force; but I assure you the King may be made a tool of, if we choose, and not a bad one. I have written to you all this as a kind of record of my views, for who knows how affairs may end?—— * * * Meanwhile, may God keep my "purda" [character] as they call it here, in these troublous times of mismanagement!

The subsequent successes of Colonel Dennie, and the surrender of the Dost, threw a transient brightness upon affairs. Affghanistan was become, for the moment, as Burnes said, "as quiet as Vesuvius after an eruption. How long to last, it was impossible to say." This lull gave him an opportunity of drawing up ample notes on Consolidating Affghanistan, which contain many valuable suggestions, and shew both a liberal mind and statesmanlike views. Even then he qualified his notes and papers by the remark, that they did not recommend what was actually best, "but what was best to be done in the abominable circumstances we have placed ourselves in."

The garblings and suppressions in the papers of Sir A. Burnes, furnished from the Foreign-Office to the House of Commons, refer principally to transactions which, by some years, preceded the date of the above letters, and took place while the writer was at Cabul, in the anomalous capacity of Envoy to a court with which the government at Calcutta seemed resolved to pick a quarrel. In reference to his despatches, Burnes says in one of his subsequent private letters of 1839: "Strange to say, all my implorations for the government to act in Cabul are now put as if I had wished them to do as they have done." In other words, as if he wished to invade the country, expel the Dost, and set up Shah Soojah. So far from Dost Mahommed giving into the views and policy of Russia and Persia, it appears, from these passages of Burnes' letters to Calcutta that have been carefully, ay, studiously suppressed in the Parliamentary Papers, that the constant aim and wish of the Ameer was to maintain a friendly understanding with the British. To effect this, he even went farther than an independent sovereign might have been expected to go. Of the first of the despatches of Burnes which we shall next quote, only two insignificant sentences have been printed in the Parliamentary Papers, merely mentioning the arrival of an agent from Russia; while all that here follows is suppressed:—

SUPPRESSED PASSAGE.

[On the morning of the 19th, that is yesterday, the Ameer came over from the Bala Hissar early in the morning, with a letter from his son the Governor of Ghuznee, reporting that the Russian Agent had arrived at that city on his way to Cabul. Dost Mahommed Khan said that he had come for my counsel on the occasion; that he wished to have nothing to do with any other power than the British; that he did not wish to receive any Agent of any other power whatever, so long as he had a hope of sympathy from us; and that he would order the Russian Agent to be turned out, detained on the road, or act in any way I desired him.

I asked the Ameer if he knew on what business the Agent had come, and if he were really an Agent from Russia; he replied that I had read all his letters from Candahar, and that he knew nothing more. I then stated, that it was a sacred rule among civilized nations not to refuse to receive emissaries in time of peace, and that I could not take upon myself to advise him to refuse any one who declared himself duly accredited; but that the Ameer had it in his power to show his feelings on the occasion, by making a full disclosure to the British Government of the errand on which the individual had come; to which he most readily assented.

After this the Ameer despatched a servant on the road to Ghuznee to prevent the Agent's entering Cabul without notice; but so rapid has been his journey, that he met him a few miles from the city, which he entered in the afternoon, attended by two of the Ameer's people. He has not yet seen the Ameer; he has sent a letter from Count Simonitch, which I have seen, and states that he is the bearer of letters from Mahommed Shah and the Emperor of Russia.

I shall take an early opportunity of reporting on the proceedings of this Russian Agent, if he be so in reality; for if not an impostor, it is a most uncalled-for proceeding, after the disavowal of the Russian Government conveyed through Count Nesselrode, alluded to in Mr. M'Niel's letter of the 19th June last.—I have, &c.

A. BURNES.]

In the printed despatches, all the causes of suspicion and discontent which the Dost felt with the policy of the Anglo-Indian government in regard to himself and his interests, which Sir Alexander Burnes transmitted to Calcutta, are carefully omitted. After summing up the complaints or remonstrances of the Dost, and saying, "I have thus placed before the Right Honourable the Governor-General the opinions and views entertained by the Ruler of Cabul, and the nature of the arguments I have opposed to them," we come to Sir Alexander's own suppressed opinions or recommendations, which are in these words, and are, with much more, wholly omitted:—

SUPPRESSED PASSAGE.

[It has appeared to me that they [the Dost's views] call for much deliberation. It will be seen that the Chief is not bent on possessing Peshawur, or on gratifying an enmity towards his brothers; but simply pursuing the worldly maxim of securing himself from injury. The arguments which he has adduced seem deserving of every consideration; and the more so, when an avowed partisan of Sultan Mahommed Khan does not deny the justice of the Ameer's objections. It will be for his Lordship to judge how far the British Government will agree to an interference through its agent, that will prevent the Chief of Peshawur from caballing against his brother in Cabul; and if this could not be brought about by the plan suggested, of placing the Nuwab Jubbar Khan there on the part of the Ameer, and on the terms proposed, it would give Runjeet Sing tribute from both the Ameer and Sultan Mahommed Khan, and thus gratify him; while the known good feeling of the Nuwab towards the British Government, would give confidence to Runjeet Sing in the arrangement, and secure to the British a great reputation in these countries. In the event of this arrangement being also rejected, it does certainly appear to me that we are bound in some way to protect the Ameer from the cabals of Peshawur and Candahar, without which this country will become a scene of strife, injurious alike to our commerce and our policy. Those Chiefs will acknowledge the ruler of Cabul as the head of the family, and respect him accordingly; but they do not admit being dependent on him, nor is it desirable to make them so. If we stand aloof, and do not encourage Runjeet Sing to recede, the Ameer of Cabul will hold his present ground, since he is the most powerful of his family. If we interfere, we endanger his supremacy, such as it is; and consequently it seems incumbent on us to prevent such interference being detrimental.

Under such circumstances, it might be urged that all interference had better be avoided; but this, as it appears to me, would be, under the existing state of affairs, a very doubtful line of policy, unless it is intended to put forth the ex-King at Loodiana, secure through him a footing in these countries, and sweep the present rulers from their authority, which has happily never been contemplated. Besides the very questionable nature of such a proceeding, it would not gain the objects of Government.]

But, unhappily, this policy was both contemplated and acted upon. Another suppressed passage in this despatch establishes the cautiousness and coldness with which the advances of Russia were received at the court of Cabul, and the inclination of Dost Mahommed, to the last, to maintain friendly relations with us, if that were possible, consistently with his own safety and independence.

SUPPRESSED PASSAGE.

[Since arriving here I have seen an agent of Persia with alluring promises, after penetrating as far as Candahar, compelled to quit the country because no one was sent to invite him to Cabul. Following him, an agent of Russia, with letters highly complimentary, and promises more than substantial, has experienced no more civility than is due by the laws of hospitality and nations. It may be urged by some, that the offers of one or both were fallacious; but such a dictum is certainly premature. The Ameer of Cabul has sought no aid in his arguments from such offers, but declared that his interests are bound up in an alliance with the British Government, which he never will desert as long as there is a hope of securing one. It is evident, therefore, that in this chief we have one who is ready to meet us; and from what is passing in Central Asia at this moment, it is anything but desirable to exhibit indifference to the solicitations of one whose position makes him courted, and whom aid may render powerful for or against us. . . . As this letter contains matter which may materially affect an adjustment of the differences between the Sikhs and Affghans, I have sent a copy of it specially to Captain Wade.—I am not in possession of his letter to you handing up the first overtures of the Ameer of Cabul; and I cannot in consequence give my sentiments thereon, which will be received as an apology for my not having touched upon them in this letter.—Captain Wade and myself have, I am sure, but one object, which is to gain the ends of Government, by using our most strenuous endeavours respectively at Lahore and Cabul; but I must respectfully entreat that Dost Mahommed Khan's views be subjected to strict scrutiny before they are pronounced to be a mere "gratification of his personal resentments."—Did I think so, I would not transmit this letter; but this chief is perfectly aware of the policy we have marked out for ourselves in this country, and his conduct has been already in some degree put to the test by Persia and Russia.—With regard to the latter, the importance of it has now become manifest by the arrival of an express from the Bombay Government, conveying to me the despatches of our Ambassador in Persia, which prove all previous conjectures to be well-founded, and that Mr. Vickovitch is, what he has given himself out, an agent from the Emperor of Russia.—The necessity for a good understanding with this chief has thus become more than apparent, as the dangers from such an alliance are no longer imaginary, but fairly developed.]

This suppressed letter appears to have given great offence at head-quarters. Burnes was not only blamed for a promise to the Candahar chiefs, which the public interests, and the exigency of the moment had drawn from him, but told that, from "all the reports and observations, his lordship [the Governor-General] cannot but conceive his [statements] of the resources and strength of Dost Mahommed Khan in Cabul, to be much exaggerated." His lordship as decidedly disapproved of the suggestions made, "as to its being the proper policy of the British Government" to come, in few words, to a proper understanding with the Dost. Having been chided for "having taken on himself," "wholly without authority," to make the promises above alluded to, to the Candahar chiefs, he is told,—

SUPPRESSED PASSAGE.

[After weighing, with all the seriousness which the subject demands, the various arguments adduced in your letters, his Lordship directs me to state that he adheres without reserve to the principles of policy by which his proceedings in respect to Affghanistan have heretofore been guided. He must dissent, consequently, from many of the recommendations which you have now submitted to him. . . . . His Lordship sees nothing in any facts, yet reported to him, to induce him to run into the dangers of such embarrassment as would attend the course which you have pressed upon him. . . . . His Lordship directs me to state, that he would persevere steadily in the course of proceedings which has been already prescribed in respect to Dost Mahommed Khan; and he is satisfied that, unless an entire change take place in the political constitution of Affghanistan, that course ought to be readily successful. . . . . It has been already intimated to you in different despatches, and especially in that under date the 27th ultimo, that the inordinate pretensions and expectations which Dost Mahommed Khan has appeared disposed to form in consequence of your presence at Cabul, ought to be decisively discouraged. He should be made sensible that in stepping forward from our conviction of the course of proceeding the most advantageous to all the Powers on this side of the Indus, to endeavour to induce Maharajah Runjeet Sing to refrain from prosecuting further hostilities against him, we have made the utmost demand, which our interest and long-established friendship admit, upon the consideration which that powerful chief is willing to show to our wishes. In the words of the Despatch of the 27th December, his Lordship would repeat that, "in the precarious position in which Dost Mahommed is placed, our good offices for the peace and security of his remaining territory, should be thankfully accepted by him." . . . . . His Lordship would, under any circumstances, be glad that, at a proper opportunity, these views should be stated with all frankness to Dost Mahommed Khan; for he greatly fears, from the tenor of your late despatches, that he may have been led to take an erroneous view of his own situation and of his Lordship's views; and it is of all things most important to act towards him with a clear, good faith;

and whatever may be his own trust in his independent means of defence, the British Government can deal with him on no other understanding.]

Now all this, and much more to the same import, is suppressed in these doctored despatches; while a few paragraphs, of little or no consequence whatever, are solemnly laid before Parliament, on which it is to judge of the policy of the Indian government, in the subsequent war with the Affghans. The fact is, that the principle of the "vigorous proclamation" of the close of the year 1838, seems to have been adopted at Calcutta before the above correspondence took place.

The inordinate demands of the Dost have always been held out as one main reason of the war; and particularly his demand of Peshawur. But, by a garbled letter from Sir A. Burnes, dated Cabul, March 5, 1838, it would seem that the alleged unreasonable demand was no real or formidable obstacle. In a conference which Burnes held at Cabul with the Ameer's brother, the Nuwab Jubbar Khan, the report of which is altogether suppressed, that personage said, not without a show of reason—

SUPPRESSED PASSAGE.

[That it appeared we valued our offers at a very high rate, since we expected in return that the Affghans would desist from all intercourse with Persia, Russia, Toorkistan, &c., &c., &c. Were the Affghans to make all these powers hostile, and to receive no protection against the enmity raised for their adhering to the British! As for Peshawur being withheld from the Ameer, it might be got over, and he believed he did not overrate his influence with Sultan Mahommed Khan, when he stated that he might bring about a reconciliation between him and the Ameer; but he must say, that the value of the Affghans had indeed been depreciated, and that he did not wonder at the Ameer's disappointment.

I replied to the Nuwab that I really did not comprehend the motives which swayed him or his brother. I had before found that it was not Candahar which he wished to subdue, and that the difficulties about Peshawur were not insurmountable, and that in consequence, it could not be that chiefship which the Ameer sought to conquer.—What then were his wishes or expectations? Dignity and respect (izzut wa ikram,) was the reply, and to be looked upon in the light of being able to do something for the British Government, and for such service to receive its real friendship and not a proffer of its sympathy, which did not ensure protection from the West, and which dwelt upon the good done on the Eastern frontier, by withdrawing Runjeet Sing, of whose attacks they were under little apprehension.—The whole of the Affghan country, continued he, is now at your back, and no future opportunity may prove so favourable to gain any ends which you may have to establish your influence in Cabul; and if you lose this opportunity you will have yourselves to blame.]

After reporting the result of his different conferences with the Ameer and his friends, Sir A. Burnes adds, in a sentence that is suppressed, "I am aware that the views of the government are decided, and that it would be highly presumptuous in me to make any observations on the record of the different conversations which have been above reported." But he had not renounced his own opinions or private judgment, though, in obedience to the orders of his official superiors, he was now preparing to withdraw from Cabul. Dost Mahommed, it is evident from all these reports, was most unwilling to come to a rupture with the British.

The above samples will show how far Lord Palmerston and Sir Robert Peel are to be credited in their Parliamentary declarations, that nothing essential to a complete knowledge of the truth has been suppressed, in the garbled Despatches of Sir Alexander Burnes. We must notice one more fact. While, in the Parliamentary papers, Captain Wade's arguments for the restoration of Shah Soojah are given, as a sort of vindication of the policy subsequently adopted by Lord Auckland, those of Sir Alexander Burnes, upon the opposite side, have been wholly suppressed. So much for official fairness. Would it not be safer and better for the public interest that such correspondences should be point blank refused to Parliament, than thus garbled, to screen official incapacity, obstinacy, and blunders, and serve the purposes of party?

Since our account of the revolt at Cabul, and the assassination of Sir Alexander Burnes, his brother, and Captain Broadfoot, on the morning on which it broke out, was written, some facts have come to our knowledge with which neither Lady Sale nor Lieutenant Eyre appears to have been acquainted. That Sir Alexander could, at no time, have felt great security, slumbering, as he knew, upon a volcano, is evident; but we are now enabled to state, that, on his house being threatened and surrounded, he sent one, if not two, letters to Sir W. Macnaghten, imploring assistance, "or he would be murdered." But, though General Elphinstone had, at this time, a force of 5,000 troops in the cantonments, he refused to allow a man to go out; and, when urged by Sir W. Macnaghten, persisted in refusal. It must have been in the hope of speedy and effectual assistance, which, alas! never came, that the unfortunate Burnes prevented his people from firing, and sought to appease the mob, and to procrastinate, by addressing them.

THE CLOSING EVENTS OF THE CAMPAIGN IN CHINA.*

Captain Loch was a volunteer in the Chinese war. He joined the force at the mouth of the Yang-tze-Kiang, when the campaign was drawing towards a close; though that was not foreseen, and though several of the most desperate encounters of the war afterwards took place. As an observer, Captain Loch possessed many advantages. He lived with Vice-Admiral Sir William Parker, and acted as an extra aid-de-camp to Sir Hugh Gough as often as the troops landed; and what, with a view to the present publication, was more important than all, by the kindness of Sir Henry Pottinger, he was present at all the interviews with the Chinese authorities during the desultory negotiations which led to the peace. Of the passing events, Captain Loch kept a Journal, from which he has compiled what, in reference to Chinese manners and national character, is, if somewhat tardy in appearance, yet one of the most interesting records of the war. Some of the details must long haunt the mind into which they are once received. The narrative is very well written, combining the various merits of style appropriate to the subject; namely, brevity, clearness, simplicity, and an unstudied elegance. Our limited space must be reserved for the graver matters; but, as a specimen of the purely descriptive parts of the work, which are lively and graceful, we select a sketch of Singapore, a place of growing interest with the British.

* "The Closing Events of the Campaign in China; the Operations in the Yang-tze-kiang; and the Treaty of Nanking." By Captain Granville Loch, R.N. London: Murray.

I drove through the town this morning with Keppel. The principal proprietors and inhabitants are Chinese: there are streets full of Chinese blacksmiths—fine athletic fellows; others, of shoemakers and tailors; and some containing open booths, under canvass awnings, resembling the Persian and Turkish bazaars.

I understand that our Celestial subjects here do not treat us with the same outward respect practised by their brethren of Java towards their more tyrannical masters, the Dutch. Here, they never think of letting fall their tails (which, for greater convenience, they wear twisted round their heads) when they speak to you. In China, such an omission is considered as great an insult as it would be in England to enter a room with a hat on; in Batavia, they not only drop their tails, but stand or squat until Mynheer passes. What struck me particularly was to see employed in common use the various (and to our habits inconvenient) utensils which are in England considered mere curiosities or ornaments, as, for instance, the small china tea-cup and cover, large glazed paper lantern, and porcelain stool, chopsticks, painted umbrella, glass-cloth shirts as fine as cambric, paper-soled shoes, and china jars.

Drove to the joss-house, so well described by Lord Jocelyn. . . . . It is dedicated to Fo. The outer gates conduct to an open court, neatly tiled and surrounded by a verandah, under which the embroidered silk canopies of procession appropriate to the various idols are arranged. On the beams, stone pillars, cornices, and wood-work, insects and flowers, birds and monsters are carved, with depth and boldness, in every variety of grotesque form. The corners and gable ends, curving upwards, are surmounted by porcelain dragons with forked and gaily-coloured tails; the roof is covered with glazed tiles made of the same material, but of a coarser texture; and underneath the projecting edge, upon a white china belt, flowers and creepers are exquisitely embossed and coloured.

In the midst of the temple, behind the high altar, and placed between a blue and red devil, each the size of life, sits an image of the Tien-How, or Queen of Heaven—a most ungainly idol. At the feet of this image are a number of little devils, each fronted by its pot full of incense sticks. The devotees seek for the protection of a grinning elf of sandal wood, or endeavour to propitiate some favourite idol of porcelain, much after the fashion and practice among the most superstitious of the followers of the Romish Church: as Père Intorcetta said, it seemed as if the Devil had run a race with the Jesuits to China, and, having got the start of them, had contrived these things for their mortification.

Here is Hong-Kong, which is springing up with the rapidity of a Transatlantic city, or with a still more vigorous growth:—

We anchored in the midst of men-of-war and transports, in a port where, a few short months before, ships were scarcely ever seen. Along the shore, and scattered over the breast of mountains rising to the height of 1500 feet, were wharfs and extensive stores, forts and magazines, streets of huts and commodious houses, a bazaar and a market-place, besides some comfortable bungelows and handsome country-houses, belonging to the public functionaries, built at considerable elevations, to command fresh air and a fine view. Ten months before, when Sir Henry Pottinger first landed, he lived in a pitched tent!

Then three small villages contained the entire population, amounting to about 4000; now there are upwards of 12,000 souls in our new town alone, and the great difficulty is, to restrain the rapid increase in proportion to the gradual advancement of the colony.

There is a narrative of a delightful excursion through this small island.

The first glimpse we have of the Chinese women, is at Macao. It would, however, be as unfair for a traveller to take his notions of the ladies of England from the bum-boat women of Portsmouth, as of the Celestial fair from these dames:—

After a longer passage than we expected, we sighted Macao and the shipping in the outer roadstead. Our small draught of water enabled us to anchor close to the shore, when we were in an instant surrounded by squat, oval-bottomed punts, pulled by specimens of the fair sex. The Chinese woman utters a clacking sound peculiar to herself, and employs her tongue with a volubility and a perseverance impossible to surpass. These jays—these unplumed paroquets—lauded the qualities of their respective barks, and depreciated those of their companions, until we were but too glad to stop their clamour by becoming their customers.

Captain Loch's first impressions of Chinese character, received, however, at second-hand, were unfavourable:—

The lower orders were better dressed and cleaner than I expected to find them, and withal civil enough. I was disappointed in the shops; they were small, and built of wood; the lower rooms open to, and on a level with the streets; the upper are low dens, badly constructed and very dirty.

We saw them painting representations of some of the late actions, and tracing charts of Chusan and the river Yang-tze-kiang from some of our recent surveys, which will enable the Fan-kwels to sail with safety "in their inner waters." What will not the Chinese do for money! They are curious beings: with an outward placidity of temper, and the good-humour of amiable people, they possess the hardness of heart and unforgiving nature of the Moor. From all that I hear, as a nation they are without virtue, deep feeling, or dignity of character. Sir Thomas Herbert told me, that after battering down forts and houses, and killing hundreds at Amoy, the boats of the Chinese were alongside his ship with supplies, before the guns were secured, to obtain what they prize before any good sentiment or moral obligation—profit and gain.

Captain Loch could not have retained the opinion that the Chinese, or, at least, those of the educated order, in whatever else they might be deficient, were without "deep feeling and dignity of character." There is even a stoical grandeur in their self-immolation, pride, and endurance. The first instance of gallantry which he recites, occurred on the dismantling of the Woo-Sung forts:—

Many instances of personal bravery have lately been observed, particularly among the mandarins. At Chapoo one fine old officer gallantly led his men twice to the very points of our bayonets, manfully rallying them after each repulse, until he fell, shot through the loins. When he was carried to the rear, an interpreter, seeing tears streaming down his cheeks, told him not to fear—that mercy and every kindness would be shown him—"Mercy!" he said; "I want no mercy. I came here to fight for my Emperor, and neither to give nor to accept mercy; but if you wish to gain my gratitude, and can be generous, write to my revered sovereign, and say I fell in the front, fighting to the last." . . .

They adopt the custom common among many Eastern nations of naming their guns. Some of these were stamped with Chinese characters signifying "The robber's judgment," "The tamer and subduer of Barbarians;" and one tremendous fellow, upwards of twelve feet long, was designated by the single title of "Barbarian."

After taking these forts, an inland march was undertaken, to the great delight of the troops:—

We were en route by six o'clock, and an imposing sight these 2000 hardy fellows marching in single files along the narrow path-ways must have offered to the gaping Celestials. The country, flat as Kent and Essex by the banks of the Thames, is completely cultivated, and as beautiful as its sameness of features will allow fertility to make it. The flattened tops of earthen dykes between the fields are the only roads, and these are flanked, and here and there crossed by deep ditches, which we passed on granite slabs, generally too narrow for the Horse Artillery. This provoking, but not unforseen hinderance caused some trouble and much delay, the Sappers having frequently to fill the ditches for the passage of the guns. We trod drier ground as we receded from the river; and, besides the perpetual rice, saw fields of beans, corn, cotton, and other plants. Farms, surrounded by high shrub hedges, neatly interlaced with platted bamboo, were thickly scattered over the country. Nothing could be more rural than the appearance of the houses, some in clusters, others by themselves, all half-hid by umbrageous enclosures, delightful lanes of fruit-trees, and abundance of wild honeysuckle and roses. Affluence and industry were everywhere apparent, and a love of neatness conspicuous from the arrangement of the house to the tilling of the ground.

We saw crowds of peasantry in every direction; they climbed the trees and little knolls to obtain a good view of us from a distance; but when a long survey convinced them that we were not "frantically" disposed, they approached with confidence. Our handful of men would not have been a mouthful a-piece to the multitudes around us.

We passed two wounded men lying on a bank, dying without assistance in sight of thousands. Unfortunately we could not afford them aid, advancing, as we were, through a hostile country.

We went through two villages; the shops were open, and the people remained in them; the first time such confidence had been shown towards us in China. Strict orders were issued to touch nothing, and to the credit of the thirsty troops be it spoken, they were obeyed. Almost every house has its little garden shaded by trees; among them I remarked the tulip, the tallow, and the mulberry. . . . Graves were in every field—mounds of earth, some hollowed into vaults, others solid, with the coffin resting on the top, and covered with matting. There appeared to be a great paucity of quadrupeds.

At the close of the peaceful march, they reached the suburbs of Chan-hai, a second-rate or second chop town. They took possession of the town, which was found nearly deserted. The following description is both picturesque and purely Chinese:—

The general took up his quarters in a pavilion built on the edge of a sheet of water in the public gardens of the Ching-hwang-mian. . . . . In the centre of a serpentine sheet of water, there is a rocky island, and on it a large temple of two storeys, fitted up for the accommodation of the wealthy public. Pillars of carved wood support the roof; fretted groups of uncouth figures fill up the narrow spaces; while moveable latticed blinds screen the occupants from the warmth of the noon-day sun. Nothing can surpass the beauty and truth to nature of the most minutely-carved flowers and insects prodigally scattered over every screen and cornice. This is the central and largest temple. A number of other light aerial-looking structures of the same form are perched upon the corners of artificial rocky precipices, and upon odd little islands. Light and fanciful wooden bridges connect most of these islands, and are thrown across the arms of the serpentine water, so that each sequestered spot can be visited in turn. At a certain passage of the sun, the main temple is shaded in front by a rocky eminence, the large masses of which are connected with great art and propriety of taste, but in shape and adjustment most studiously grotesque. Trees and flowers and tufts of grass are sown and planted, where art must have been taxed to the utmost to procure them lodgment.

In another part of the gardens there is a miniature wood of dwarf trees, with a dell and waterfall; the leaves, fruit, and blossoms of the trees are in proportion to their size. This ingenious science, (if science it can be called,) to bring it to perfection, requires the most assiduous care and patient watching.

But we must leave this to the Horticultural Society.

Tortuous pathways lead to the top of the artificial mountain, each turning formed with studied art to surprise and charm, by offering at every point fresh views and objects. Flowers and creepers sprout out from crevices; trees hang over the jutting crags; small pavilions, crested with the white stork, their emblem of purity, are seen from almost every vista; while grottos and rocky recesses, shady bowers and labyrinths, are placed to entrap the unwary, each with an appropriate motto, one inviting the wanderer to repose, another offering quiet and seclusion to the contemplative philosopher.

Three regiments were quartered in these gardens, and the rooms formed for the enjoyments of the wealthiest were occupied by the private soldier; and many of the most exquisite ornaments were torn down and burnt to cook their numerous messes. Nor could this be well avoided. . . . . .

The first thing that strikes one upon entering a captured city is Chinese robbers, passing like a string of busy ants, in a continuous line from some large house to the city gates, heavily laden. In this pursuit the Fokiens are the bravest of the brave. They will bear thumping, kicking, and maltreating in every way, but will most pertinaciously hold to their bundles.

When the fleet had advanced up the magnificent river Yang-tze-kiang, nearly to Chin-kiang-foo, Captain Loch one day landed with a storming-party to disable guns and destroy abandoned forts. He ascended a hill, and his fatigue was repaid by the beautiful and extended prospect.

Inland, towards the S.E., this detached cluster of hills broke into undulating country clothed with verdure, and fir plantations bordered small lakes confined in natural basins. Extending my view beyond, I saw the windings of the vast river we had ascended; our ships were still scattered over its broad surface, the sternmost divisions of the fleet coming up under all sail. To the other side I turned with yet greater interest; there the land in the foreground continued a low and swampy flat, leaving it difficult at a little distance to determine which of the several broad waters, winding in serpentine channels through the country, was the main branch. I looked down upon innumerable square sheets of water, separated from each other by narrow mounds of earth; they covered the surface of what we knew to be arable land, but which more closely resembled a vast lake, intersected by many causeways. Willow trees grew along their sides, and here and there small patches, somewhat higher than the common surface, supported cottages and farm sheds. Beyond this again, towards the west, the pagoda of Chin-kiang-foo was observable. . . . . I was not alone. Lieutenant James Fitzjames had gained the summit before me, and I found him, when I arrived, sitting upon a granite rock, quite out of breath, after his ascent. His coxswain, who had followed him at a slower pace, descried a martial hero under a bush, whom he captured and dragged up by his pig-tail. I verily believe the poor wretch thought we were going to eat him, which supposition said little for his estimation of our good taste. Had he been a firm, sleek, clean, and portly gentleman, it would have been another thing; but this was a poor devil whose flesh had left the bones from the constant use of opium.

Our further admiration of the prospect was interrupted by an explosion: the barracks and houses were all on fire, and our party in the boats waving to us to return; so we had to descend at a pace which did not suit our companion the prisoner, who fell upon his back, and resigned himself to despair. Fortunately the descent was steep, although, perhaps, somewhat rough; so down he went in a sitting posture between Fitzjames and his coxswain, and reached the bottom in safety; but, I shrewdly suspect, with the loss of more than a tailor could replace.

Captain Loch had frequent adventures of this sort, when indulging in rambles on the shore. Nothing in landscape, created or embellished by art, can be more enchanting than the scenes on the banks of the river or its islands. Here is one lovely spot, enlivened by the figure in the landscape:—

Seung-shan, a rocky cone, with a surface soil which nurtures luxuriant groves of tropical vegetation, is, like its sister, Kin-shan, or "golden island," imperial property. Priests are the only occupants; temples and palaces the principal buildings, surrounded by gardens and bowers. As we passed it slowly, we had time to observe the massive granite terraces, decorated with large stone monsters, and having convenient and handsome flights of steps descending to the water; fine temples placed to be seen, and yet shaded by useful and ornamental plants; open pavilions and secluded summer-houses embowered amidst the bright arbutus, which was enlivened by red berries and paddy-birds nestling amidst its foliage, like bunches of white blossoms.

Opposite this little paradise a plain honest rock of reddish granite, broken into an upright cliff, descends precipitously into the river; in the centre of its face a round hole is neatly excavated with a slight step before it, and some Chinese characters marked above it. While we were conjecturing what this singular orifice could be for, out came a figure dressed in a rusty brick-coloured gown, and made the ko-tow most obsequiously. We concluded him to be a recluse living upon charity,—a sort of Fuckeĕr,—common characters in the East, not less so in China than in India, but in this country a wiser sect, living a less purgatorial life than those of Hindostan.

Close to his abode, on the low land at the foot of the rocky promontory, we saw the remains of Phlegethon battery, and the smouldering ruins of the magazines. A party having been landed from the Blonde to destroy the dismounted guns, they found some brass pieces among the number, which, as prize property, were shipped. After traversing the narrow strait, we entered the long reach between the two islands. Over the sloping brows of some low hills, across two valleys, and a plain beyond, we traced the high and well-built wall of Chinkiang-foo, with its square and round flanking bastions. High above a conspicuous gate, a red and yellow flag waved, but not a man was to be seen along the whole range of the extensive ramparts, nor in the suburbs, which extended to the river's edge. All appeared to us as deserted and lone as a city of the dead. Little did we then think that in a few days this large, powerful, and wealthy city would in reality be what we by chance compared it to.

We want courage to enter upon the details of the siege of the devoted city, though to many readers this will form the very cream of the book. When the work of destruction was nearly completed, we find the following passing notice of the horrible suicides which too frequently closed the scene:—

The firing brought the General up, who resolved, when the sun became less powerful, to sweep the town from house to house.

As we marched along the walls, I saw what, as a novice in this description of warfare, shocked me much,—old men, women, and children, cutting each other's throats, and drowning themselves by the dozen; and no one either attempting or apparently showing any inclination to save the poor wretches, nor, in fact, regarding them with more notice than they would a dead horse carried through the streets of London to the kennel.

While the troops rested from their terrible work, an interpreter who was well known at head-quarters, brought letters to the British commanders from the Viceroy.

They were to the old purport, requesting them to send the ships down the river, and arrange a meeting with him on shore to settle differences. Such a modest request at such a time was exceedingly mal-à-propos, and very nearly cost the stupid old interpreter his life; who, fancying himself secure in his knowledge of our language, passed through the gate, and was nearly shot by the sentinel for advancing towards the General's quarters, after having failed in his endeavours to make himself understood. Sir Hugh was in no humour to receive him, which he, having lost but little of his self-confidence, thought exceedingly incorrect. He said that "Elipoo wished very much to have a talkey outside river —no inside—and that English very bad if they no obey."

Our reply was, (I mean that given by our individual selves, who had nothing to do with the matter,) that "Englishman may talkey a very, very leettle, if Chinamen pay 20,000,000 dollars, and afterwards pay more, talkey more," and then the respectable old gentleman was shown the way out.

Towards evening an advance was sounded, and the Commander-in-chief marched with two regiments towards the Tartar quarter of the town, guided by some Chinese and Mr. Gutzlaff. We broke into many houses where we imagined soldiers were concealed, but met with no resistance, nor saw any armed Tartars. Quiet and peace seemed to reign paramount in the still evening, while the fragrance of the flowers surrounding almost every house calmed the strong excitement that had possessed us throughout the day. It was the prettiest Chinese town I had seen: the houses were all well kept, and the interiors of many magnificent; the streets well paved and clean; and open grassy spaces and gardens gave a grace and airiness not usually met with in walled cities.

We were guided to a large building said to be the governor's palace. We saw that it belonged to government by the flying dragon painted upon the wall opposite the great entrance; but the gates had apparently been closed for some considerable time: weeds were growing before them, and the only sign of life was a wounded Tartar of great size and strength lying under the shade of the portico; he was dressed in the blue over-shirt with yellow trimmings, said to be the uniform of the imperial guard. When we forced the house, we found it equally deserted, but completely furnished, and of great extent. We set fire to it, and marched on.

I went with two soldiers of the 18th down a street to the right, to a large house, which I concluded belonged to a Tartar of consequence: we burst the door and entered. Never shall I forget the sight of misery that there met our view.

After we had forced our way over piles of furniture, placed to barricade the door, we entered an open court strewed with rich stuffs, and covered with clotted blood; and upon the steps leading to the "hall of ancestors," there were two bodies of youthful Tartars, cold and stiff, much alike, apparently brothers. Having gained the threshold of their abode, they had died where they had fallen, from the loss of blood. Stepping over these bodies, we entered the hall, and met, face to face, three women seated, a mother and two daughters; and at their feet lay two bodies of elderly men, with their throats cut from ear to ear, their senseless heads resting upon the feet of their relations. To the right were two young girls, beautiful and delicate, crouching over, and endeavouring to conceal, a living soldier.

In the heat of action, when the blood is up, and the struggle is for life between man and man, the anguish of the wounded, and the sight of misery and pain, is unheeded; humanity is partially obscured by danger; but when excitement subsides with victory, and the individual circumstances are recalled to mind which led to the result, a heart would be hardly human that could feel unaffected by the retrospection. But the hardest heart of the oldest man who ever lived a life of rapine and slaughter could not have gazed on this scene of woe unmoved.

I stopped, horror-struck at what I saw. I must have betrayed my feelings by my countenance, as I stood spell-bound to the spot. The expression of cold unutterable despair depicted on the mother's face changed to the violent workings of scorn and hate, which at last burst forth in a paroxysm of invective, afterwards in floods of tears, which apparently, if anything could, relieved her. She came close to me, and seized me by the arm, and, with clenched teeth and deadly frown, pointed to the bodies—to her daughters—to her yet splendid house, and to herself; then stepped back a pace, and, with firmly closed hands, and in a hoarse and husky voice, I could see by her gestures spoke of her misery—of her hate, and, I doubt not, of revenge. It was a scene that one could not bear long; consolation was useless; expostulation from me vain. I attempted by signs to explain, offered her my services, but was spurned. I endeavoured to make her comprehend that, however great her present misery, it might be in her unprotected state a hundred-fold increased; that if she would place herself under my guidance, I would pass her through the city gates in safety into the open country, where, doubtless, she would meet many of the fugitives; but the poor woman would not listen to me; the whole family were, by this time, in loud lamentation; so all that remained for me to do was to prevent the soldiers bayoneting the man who, since our entrance, had attempted to escape.

As Captain Loch returned to the city after this dreadful day's work, he relates,—

The moon was up, and shone with clear and tranquil light upon the silent town, lying like an amphitheatre at our feet; so still, so smiling in the placid beauty of the scene and hour, in sad mockery of the misery and despair of its concealed and wretched inhabitants. From the gate we took charge of a wounded officer to the boat, and by ten o'clock I was on board the Cornwallis.

Throughout the day both the Chinese and Tartar troops evinced a determined bravery, which commanded our respect; and I believe I may safely say, that the upper classes, from the first to the last, have shown, by their conduct, that they cannot brook defeat; for, although we have captured many a Mandarin, we were never able to keep them prisoners for any length of time, they having either starved themselves by refusing to eat food, or otherwise committed suicide.

The Chinese have shown many individual instances of conspicuous gallantry. . . . . I feel persuaded that, if drilled under English officers, they would prove equal, if not superior, to the Sepoys; they have greater physical power, greater obstinacy, and, consequently, minds that retain impressions with greater tenacity, and would be slow to lose confidence after it was once built upon the foundation of their vanity.

On the next day the work of havoc was not found complete in all its stages. When Captain Loch walked with a friend over the scene of the "last day's slaughter," they could hardly get along the streets for piles of plunder.

Crates of beautiful China, bronze ornaments, vases, satins, silks, crape, and gold embroidery; besides, bales of meaner articles were strewed about in every direction. The best had been selected and carried for a short distance until a new object attracted the pilferer's eye, when the old was cast away and trodden under foot. The Chinese were the most numerous and systematic plunderers.

The work of death was still progressing. Captain Grey and I entered a house, where we saw twenty bodies of women and young girls, some hanging, others extended upon the floor; all had either committed suicide, or been destroyed by their relatives. A panic had seized the unfortunate inhabitants, and every second house contained self-immolated victims. We saved several lives, but they were to the destroyed as drops are to the ocean.

On our progress to the General's quarters, we lost our way by leaving the ramparts, and entered a portion of the Chinese town hitherto unvisited. Apparitions from the lower regions could not have caused greater consternation among the crowds of unfortunate people, busily collecting their goods, and sending their wives and families into the country by a postern gate that had escaped our notice, than we three (including a middy of the Endymion) produced among them, particularly among the poor women, many of whom, I fancy, had seldom, if ever before, left the precincts of their gardens. Some were very good-looking, and all had a grace peculiarly their own. Two poor creatures, evidently belonging to the higher class, had blackened their faces to conceal their beauty—a thin disguise to the prying eyes of licentiousness. However, it is my belief that less villany was perpetrated than could have been reasonably expected, taking into consideration the anarchy that always, for a time, prevails in a captured city. Those they had cause to fear most were, beyond all doubt, their own countrymen.

These are apt passages for the Tracts of the Peace Society. It is a curious, if true fact, that the Chinese when the most afraid laugh the heartiest. The laugh must be hysterical, Sardonic, or what the Scotch call the "laugh o' Balmullo."

The famous Tartar general of Chin-kian-foo will, no doubt, be immortalized in the annals of every people sympathizing in the military spirit. Two days after the action, while Mr. Morrison, the interpreter, was viewing the ruins of his house, his funeral pile,—where, with the spirit of an old Roman, when all was lost, the brave soldier set himself down in his spacious hall, and gave orders to fire the building,—he discovered the civil secretary of the general hid in the garden. The man had many important papers about him, and he was brought on board one of the ships to have them examined.

He spoke of his lost master with great feeling, and described him as one of the best and noblest of men. Some of the despatches were from him to the Emperor, others from the Sovereign. The former gave a faithful account of our movements from Woosung to the day of our anchoring off Chin-kiang-foo. He expressed his unalterable fidelity and determination to fight to the last; but at the same time conjured his master, with the prophetic foresight of a doomed man, to end this war, at least, until their warlike resources were more systematically arranged, and the troops recruited and concentrated. He alluded to our science and energy; but did not allow that the barbarian's Queen possessed more devoted, or braver subjects than his august master. He mentioned all his own arrangements and readiness to await the attack; and, if joined by some expected reinforcements, his expectations of success. He concluded by saying, that his walls were high, and in good repair, and that the city, which some years before beat back an organised banditti, amounting to 300,000 men, might be able to repulse a few "barbarians."

The Emperor's letters are full of reproaches for battles lost, accusations of cowardice against men who had died bravely while he was writing these bitter letters, and threats in the event of future failure.

From this period negotiations were going on more actively, though the ships were still steering onward towards Nanking. The Celestials did not make a very bad figure at these conferences, though they fell into the common mistake of carrying diplomacy, or shilly-shallying, too far; or of not knowing the exact point at which yielding frankly becomes true wisdom, and dallying utter folly. Of one preliminary conference we have the following lively relation. The Barbarian negotiators and their interpreters were, on this occasion, all young men, of slight build, and rather shabby in their equipments, after their hard campaign.

We were received at the entrance of the spacious court of the temple by a bevy of mandarins, from the blue to the brass button. Different from us, they rustled in embroidered silks and flowered muslin of a design and beauty of texture worthy even to deck the forms of our own fair dames. They marshalled us with many obsequious bows, and really much graceful courtesy, into the great hall of audience, where Mr. Secretary "Whang" and the Tartar General "Chin" were standing to receive us. After Mr. Morrison had severally introduced us, we sat down in chairs that would have held two Daniel Lamberts, round a square table, Whang opposite Malcolm, I next to Chin, and Mr. Thom opposite me. Mr. Morrison retired to another table to translate some papers.

Whang, a man of seven or eight and thirty, is considered one of the most rising statesmen in China, and his manners and conversation marked him a perfect gentleman. I do not remember ever having met, even in my own country, a person of more gentle and polished manner or courteous breeding than this Chinese, so different from the majority of his countrymen in their intercourse with foreigners. The General was a portly old veteran of about sixty, wearing a little, gray, tufted beard, a plain dress, crystal ball, and peacock's feather. His red ball had been taken away, for some offence, shortly before our arrival.

The other mandarins stood round among the servants, and listened, as was the universal custom, to all that was discussed.

At the door were a few peace-keepers, or police, wearing red felt conical caps, each topped with a cock's feather, which traversed round upon a swivel. They were armed with cow-hide whips, which they kept in pretty frequent use upon the shoulders of the pressing and chattering rabble outside.

While Mr. Morrison was transcribing copies of his papers, tea was handed round by the attendants, and whether drank or not, a hot cup, every two or three minutes, superseded the colder beverage. . . .

Major Malcolm demanded to see the Emperor's commission, which, after some little delay, and great ceremony, was brought forth from a chest by a mandarin, under whose special charge it appeared to be. He carried the roll of yellow silk in both his hands, and proceeded—his eyes reverentially fixed upon it—with slow and solemn steps towards the table, and placed it in the hands of Whang with tenderness and forced resignation. The produce of the silk wrapper was a little, shabby, yellow box, badly made, and worse painted, containing the power, which Morrison, on examination, pronounced, as far as he was able to judge, authentic.

I was greatly amused watching the anxious and horrified faces of the various Chinese when Mr. Morrison touched the commission; and I thought the old keeper would have fainted on the spot when he, for an instant, held it in one hand.

In China, the same respect is paid to an Imperial edict, or the mark of the vermilion pencil, that, with us, the sovereign only receives in person. There are many powers delegated by sign-manual throughout the empire, and, in these cases, the same homage is bestowed upon the written name of the Emperor, that is, in other countries, only yielded to the prince himself.

After our skeleton treaty was satisfactorily arranged, and written both in Chinese and English, one copy being kept by the mandarins, the other by Malcolm, for Sir Henry's inspection, we rose to depart, and the old General laughingly remarked that the conditions were hard, but, after all, were only what they would have demanded under similar circumstances; that a war between nations might be likened to a game of chance, in which the loser must pay the winner; that this time they were the unfortunates, from having neglected the art of war during centuries of peace and prosperity; that our ships were our stronghold and glory, and had proved their curse.

Captain Loch concludes from what he has seen, that, in the event of another war, the Chinese will manage their military affairs much better. They are cool and apt scholars. Of a subsequent interview with higher dignitaries, this is a side-glance:—

Getting into the steamer, shod in their thick Tartar boots, was to them a service of danger, and which caused considerable delay. At last they paddled up, and came alongside from the steamer in the Admiral's barge. . . . . A number of subordinate officers and attendants, besides three or four mandarins whom we knew, from having been brought in contact with them at Chusan and Ning-po, followed in their wake. They presented, in their flowing robes, a lively contrast to our close fitting and (I think) ungraceful dress.

After a few of us had been presented, the authorities entered the Admiral's cabin, and were ushered to a large sofa, placed to face forwards, so that they might see everybody and everything. Sir Henry sat on the left—the Chinese seat of honour—the General on the right, and the Admiral, as the host, I think, next to him. Tea, coffee, wine, sweetmeats, and cherry-brandy, were handed round, the last of which they greatly appreciated.

As this was merely intended to be a visit of ceremony, no questions relative to future arrangements were mooted.

Ke-ying evinced considerable interest in all he saw, although he never trespassed on good-breeding, or forgot what was due to his dignity, by asking questions. Elpoo, who was upwards of eighty, appeared fatigued, and his countenance bore a sad expression of mental suffering; which is not to be wondered at, poor old man, considering the many misfortunes and heavy displeasure of his Imperial master that had arisen to him out of his former intercourse with us.

New-king sat without showing any outward or visible sign, beyond an occasional smack of satisfaction after each glass of cherry-brandy.

The General was as loquacious as on the first occasion that I saw him, and pretended a great interest in, and examined with a critical inquisitiveness, everything appertaining to the art of war. . . . . .

The Commissioners, at the Admiral's invitation, walked round the various decks; and I was somewhat amused to see that the men, to make their messes look the smarter, had decorated the shelves with small joss-images, and a few other articles of choice taste, that they had picked up in their perambulations. Well might the Chinese have exclaimed with Samson,

> "O indignity! O blot
> To honour and religion!"

But they acted the wiser part of "laissez faire, laissez passer;" and even their noisy train were, by humbled vanity, recalled to a temporary sense of decorum.

If the Chinese had strong feelings, whether religious or superstitious, such insulting displays as this ought to have been decidedly checked.

The Imperial Commissioners, upon one occasion, gave Sir Henry Pottinger and his friends a grand entertainment, at which they were well-crammed and well-flattered. It was given in a splendid suite of apartments, highly decorated in the Chinese taste. Some parts of the banquet must have been rather a tax upon an elderly English gentleman's patience; but what will a zealous plenipotentiary not submit to?

The tables and chairs were covered with red embroidered drapery, and the floor with crimson drugget. The bottom of this room opened into a court which was canopied by a chequered silk awning.

A more tolerable band than we had yet heard commenced, as we sat down, a tune resembling a pibroch, and continued to play throughout the repast. Young white-buttoned mandarins handed round tea, hot wine, and sweetmeats, while a conversation upon general subjects was maintained between the Commissioners and Sir Henry through the medium of the interpreters.

Numerous patties of minced meat, pork, arrow root, vermicelli soup, with meat in it, pig's ear soup, and other strange dishes, were served in succession, in small china and silver basins, and in proportion to our various capabilities in making these messes disappear, we seemed to rise in the estimation of the beholders. But human nature could not support this ordeal long, and, as a coup de grace, Ke-ying insisted upon Sir Henry opening his mouth, while he, with great dexterity, shot into it several immense sugar-plums. I shall never forget Sir Henry's face of determined resignation after he found remonstrances were of no avail; nor the figure of Ke-ying, as he stood planted before him, in the attitude of a short-sighted old lady threading a needle, poising the bonne bouche between his finger and thumb preparatory to his successful throw.

After this the tables were cleared and business commenced.

The demands, written in both languages, were again read; and, with the exception at first of a slight demur at our detention of Chusan as a guarantee until the full payment of the 21,000,000 of dollars, and a wish to exclude Foo-choo-foo from free trade, were unanimously agreed to.

The only thing about which the Chinese Commissioners showed great anxiety, was to be rid of their troublesome visiters, and get back possession of their forts; but of this no hope could be given, till every point demanded had been conceded. Sir Henry Pottinger at this time took the opportunity of discussing the Opium question. The Chinese argued that the growth of the poppy should be prohibited in India; while he contended, that if the Chinese gave up the use of opium, none would be grown for them: which is an incontrovertible, if not the best possible argument. He afterwards employed better reasoning. Having drawn a rapid sketch of the rise and progress of England from barbarism to a state of wealth and civilisation, through mild government and a tolerably free commerce,

He casually mentioned instances of governments having failed to attain their objects by endeavouring to exclude any particular article of popular desire: tobacco was one of those he alluded to; and now that it was legalised, not only did it produce a large revenue to the crown, but it was more moderately indulged in in Britain than elsewhere.

Shortly afterwards, the treaty was formally signed; and Captain Loch, quitting Nanking, descended the magnificent river, the great artery of China. An Appendix to the volume contains a good deal of geographical and statistical information; but its charm and interest is the author's personal adventures and narrative, which, as our readers may see, form a pleasant and instructive addition to the sum of our knowledge of this memorable war.

Numerous Cases of Surgical Operations without pain in the Mesmeric State; with Remarks on the Opposition of many members of the Royal Medical and Chirurgical Society to the reception of the inestimable blessings of Mesmerism. By John Elliotson, M.D., F.R.S.

Dr. Elliotson, having placed himself in a false position with his professional brethren and the public, has, unhappily, lost his temper, and been betrayed into something very like injustice and unfairness in the controversy he wages with the medical world. In November last, the Royal Medical and Chirurgical Society of London were induced, through curiosity or, as probably, courtesy and importunity, to hear read the account of a case of successful amputation of the thigh during the Mesmeric sleep, without the knowledge of the patient, and, consequently, it is alleged, without his feeling pain. Dr. Elliotson was not a witness of the operation, which took place in a district hospital in Nottinghamshire; but he not only believes in the case as it was stated, in which there is no harm whatever, but is exceedingly indignant with the other members of the Royal Medical and Chirurgical Society, because they withhold their assent from what they cannot believe. He charges them roundly with ignorance, prejudice, wilful injustice, and the obstinate denial of an obvious and well-attested fact; and he has indignantly ceased to be a member of their body. As a matter of course, the Society, having listened to the account of the case, (the sole authorities for which were a Mr. Topham, a lawyer, who Mesmerized the patient, and a Mr. Ward, a surgeon, who performed the operation,) passed a vote of thanks for the paper read before them, "without a dissentient voice;" but great was their astonishment when, next day, it was sent into the world as if it had been published with their approbation and sanction, though most of the leading members of the Society had, when the paper was read, urged formidable objections, and expressed the strongest doubts of the facts. They were naturally very indignant at the unhandsome advantage which had been taken of their good-nature in listening to the case at all.

The case had, in short, been ushered into the world under false pretences; and the whole proceedings were obliterated from the minutes of the society. Now, Dr. Elliotson is of opinion, "that the society had no right to complain" of a publication which virtually made the Society a party to this singular case. Among the professional gentlemen who attacked the statement when it was read before the society, and whom Dr. Elliotson cuts up with all his powers of sarcasm and invective, were Mr. Coulson, "a surgeon practising in the city;" Dr. Moore, "a physician-accoucheur;" several young surgeons; Dr. James Johnson; Dr. Marshall Hall, who is smartly twitted for his ignorance and inconsistency; and Mr. Liston the surgeon, who is repeatedly reproached with cruelty and brutality, for the single act of having pinched the skin off a girl's hand in the Edinburgh Infirmary, whom he suspected of shamming insensibility and occasional catalepsy, and wished to test. Dr. George Burrowes was also among the doubters of the reality of the case of amputation without pain; and Sir Benjamin Brodie, whom Dr. Elliotson cannot forgive for his scepticism, or for the somethings-else which led him to say, as the Doctor reports, when the O'Keys were in the blaze of their fame, that "he disliked turning his horses' heads towards Russell Square to see a patient, lest people should think he was going to that scene of humbug, University College Hospital." "Sir Benjamin Brodie is to be pitied," [for his indifference to Dr. Elliotson's demonstrations in Mesmerism,] "but he is also to be condemned." Sir Astley Cooper was equally cold to the phenomena of Animal Magnetism; but he was more excusable,—as a man "scantily informed, and endowed with but a moderate degree of the higher intellectual faculties." As a proof of Dr. Elliotson's fairness in argument and of his logic, we find him placing those who refused to examine Galileo's discoveries, and who died in ignorance of the discoveries of Newton, in the same category with Sir Astley Cooper and Sir Benjamin Brodie in their scepticism or indifference to Mesmerism; forgetting, apparently, that this agency has been familiar to all Europe for sixty years, and tolerably well sifted, and is not just yet entitled to rank with the great truths with which it is compared by its advocate. Another specimen of Dr. Elliotson's fairness is the assertion, that Cuvier and La Place were thorough believers in Animal Magnetism, and consequently in all the phenomena connected with it, or that may yet emanate from it. Nay, the Society for the Diffusion of Useful Knowledge is, by a side-wind, pressed into the service of Animal Magnetism, as, "in its article Somnambulism, in the 'Penny Cyclopedia,' Mesmerism is admitted to the extent even of clairvoyance," and this while Lord Brougham was president of the Society, and the Bishop of Durham and many men of the first distinction in science were on the committee; all of whom must consequently be held as believers in the doctrines they disseminate. With most of the "numerous other cases" of the Pamphlet, besides the great one that is the subject of dispute, the public is already acquainted. Some are of teeth extracted during the mesmeric sleep; one is the cutting the tendons at the back of a contracted knee-joint that had previously been mesmerized for three months; Dr. Elliotson himself reports a remarkable cure of a severe form of St. Vitus' dance of nine years' standing, which he made by Mesmerism, though Dr. Hall, who also treated it, thought the case feigned. Now, when doctors differ, who shall decide between them? It was certainly, if real, a very obstinate case. The well-known old case of the French lady operated upon for cancer, makes another of the "numerous cases." Mr. Braid of Manchester has, in one year, accomplished four times the number of cures by Hypnotism—his peculiar modification of Mesmerism—that are reported by Dr. Elliotson. This is no reproach to Dr. Elliotson. He has done well;—though it is much to be regretted that he should allow himself to get so very angry, and descend to unhandsome remarks on the number of a man's door-plates, or the quarter of London in which he resides; or to taunt Mr. Wakley with his ignorance of Latin and of everything else, because that gentleman has not been able to see the cases of the Misses O'Key with his eyes. Dr. Elliotson complains bitterly of the incredulity shown by the medical profession to the singular phenomena exhibited by these celebrated, and to him fatal sisters. Many of the profession will be equally astonished at what they consider the credulity of Dr. Elliotson and the other believers. Of the depth and sincerity of his own conviction there can be no question; and a little patience, could he command it, and if truth be on his side, will bring all right. The case of the man who had his thigh amputated without feeling pain, will, if real, not long remain solitary; and multiplied cases will compel belief in all that Dr. Elliotson contends for. Men are not to be scolded and bullied into conviction. Dr. Elliotson should allow the same latitude to others which he takes to himself. For years after Mr. Chenevix had startled, if not convinced him, he allowed the subject to drop; and were Mesmer, the Marquis de Puysegur, or Chenevix, alive at this moment, he would differ from them in the very fundamental principle of their doctrine—the power which one person can exercise over another by his will; which every believer in Animal Magnetism has held until now, that Dr. Elliotson broaches the new heresy of the magnetizer's will having no influence whatever.

One must regret that a man of the character and attainments of Dr. Elliotson should allow himself to speak in the manner he does of Magendie; only because the acute Frenchman is the opponent of Phrenology and Mesmerism; but it is yet more deplorable that he cannot spare a commission graced with the venerable name of Franklin, because its report, made sixty years ago, was wholly unfavourable to the then novel and astonishing doctrines of Mesmer.

The Hand-book of Taste; or how to observe Works of Art, especially Cartoons, Pictures, and Statues. By Fabius Pictor. Longman & Co.

We have never met with a compendious treatise on Art, and the principles which should guide taste in judging of its productions, that contained more excellent matter than this small unpretending volume. It is expressly compiled for the instruction of the Public, and with a view to that era in Art which the decoration of the new Houses of Parliament, and the present display of the Cartoons in Westminster Hall, may be expected to create. It exhibits the opinions of the best artists and critics of all ages. It is not intended to instruct the student in art, though he may profit much by its lessons, —but to tell the observer how he may judge of the productions of the Fine Arts. It is not flattering to set out with saying that England, in the art of design, is not only immeasurably behind Italy, but falls short of what France aspires to, and Germany has accomplished; but this is qualified by the admission that England is, nevertheless, quite capable of efficient progress.

That this Hand-book merits even higher praise than we have bestowed upon it, the intelligent reader will learn from the following specimens, while he receives a few sound lessons on taste:—

THE TRUE ARTIST.

A painter who only knows how to colour, if he colours well, has made himself master of a difficult craft, and deserves such praise as you would bestow upon a good workman; but he is not an artist.

A painter who invents, composes, and colours subjects which are pretty and pleasing enough in themselves, but produce no effect upon the mind, nor any result beyond the visual gratification of the observer, merits undoubtedly the first rank amongst decorators; but he is not an artist.

But the painter who represents ideas exalted, just, and noble, in such a manner as to transmit them from the canvass into the breasts of those who behold it, and to excite in them the emotions, thoughts, affections, or antipathies with which he is himself inspired,—he is an artist, equal in all respects to the first of orators, poets, or historians.

THE LIMITS OF IMITATION IN ART.

The artist who imitated Nature precisely as she is,

would fail entirely in his aim. A representation of what is constantly before our eyes is not worth so much trouble. A country lout, betraying in his attitude and countenance the very picture of rustic simplicity, while he scratches his head to stimulate it for an answer to the plainest question,—a servant girl down on her knees, with sleeves tucked up to the elbows, laboriously employed in scrubbing away at the floor of a room furnished with a couple of straw-bottomed chairs, a deal table, of which the legs appear to have a lien on the wall, a bandbox of blue paper, and a bed covered with a patchwork quilt,—are, no doubt, quite natural. And when the artist has represented these objects so truly that you feel obliged to listen for the vacant reply,—that you seem to see the flush of perspiration on the housemaid's face,—or fancy for the moment that the counterpane is really made of cotton print,—what have you gained? Would you wish to live in constant intercourse with just such companions at your hearth?—to see the room you occupy bedecked with such materials? Then why do you wish to have them on your walls? No; the real value of art does not consist in portraying Nature just as she is, but as she might be;—in depicting that which is not of common but uncommon occurrence,—which, in short, is never seen at one time, or united in one object. Hence those employed in reproducing images of mere nature are but copyists; and however much manual labour they may bestow upon these copies of theirs, they certainly do not merit any very great degree of praise. There are cases where they would be even censurable, and most so when the imitation was most perfect and most true. Who can endure the sight of monsters or tortures when so naturally represented as to appear real? If the Laocoon inspired horror, it would immediately cease to be a production of the fine arts; the effect of which, as has been said, must always be to excite emotions of pleasure, be the representation illustrative of what passion or quality it may,—joy, sorrow, majesty, grace, or hatred.

The following rules, and those which precede them, should be conned over before visiting Exhibitions, and afterwards stitched up with our catalogues:—

Do not allow yourself to be imposed upon by the celebrity of names. A name makes nothing. Hamlet or Othello would give you equal pleasure if they had been anonymous publications. It would be well if all works were anonymous; conceive that they are so; and create for yourself a just coup-d'œil by constant exercise, which will teach you how to discern the slightest variation in the forms, proportions, attitudes, accessories, characters, and expression. After all, a good copy is better than a bad original.

If the name of the artist is not allowed to influence your judgment, neither should you permit your reason to be enslaved by submitting it to the dictation of others. How seldom is it that a man's taste is formed upon his own observations! Most men see things, not in their own colours, but in those which others have ascribed to them; they see with other men's eyes. "Take your own sentiments for your guide," said the oracle to Cicero, "and not the opinion of the vulgar." When you meet with one who has the reputation of being a "connoisseur," whose knowledge is confined to the science of terms, stories, anecdotes of the lives of artists, the vicissitudes which their works have undergone, their prices, their scarcity, and their celebrity—who sweeps his hand, with a peculiar sort of air, over some little spot in some great picture, or imitates with his forefinger the motion of the brush, moving and circulating over the canvass, as it would do in the hands of an able artist, while his eyebrows arch themselves to the skies at the mention of a name,—be sure that that man is an impostor: he may be a successful picture-dealer, but he is not an intelligent observer; nor should you take him for your guide with any greater confidence than you would choose to bestow upon a critic whose knowledge of genuine poetry was confined to the art of discerning the autograph of every author from a forgery.

Do not permit yourself to be deceived by show and glare, nor conceive that the work which makes the greatest impression upon you at the first glance is therefore the best. This tells only at the Exhibition, where everything is seen through a false medium, distracted as the eye must be by the bustle of company, the gaudy dresses, the glitter of frames upon the wall, and the chaos of colours. An artist tones his picture there for the express purpose of attracting attention, to make it prominent by casting its neighbour into shade. This is called "Demolishing a rival." . . . .

Again, that which astonishes, always diminishes in effect every fresh time you recur to it; whereas real worth is unassuming, is often overlooked at first, but gradually gains upon you, unfolds new beauties, or presents the same ones in a still more pleasing aspect, as often as you revisit it. The "Paradise Lost" was sold for £10, and remained neglected for many years after its publication; but now we never tire with reading it; and the oftener read, the more it charms. Mademoiselle de Launay, afterwards Madame de Staël,—who had a niece living with her possessed of considerable personal beauty,—used to say, "The men come to see Sophia, but they stay to converse with me." We, too, go to see the pictures at the Exhibition: how many of them are there with which we should wish to stay and converse?

Finally, if you would have good artists and great works, never consent to accept the merits of execution for the intrinsic merits of a work. The value of a poem does not consist in hot-pressed paper and Baskerville types. If a painting has no merit beyond its beauty, it has failed of its end; if none but its colouring, it has failed in its means. To be perfect, it must be a beautiful as well as a good painting: and it cannot be a good picture unless it improves and instructs at the same time that it pleases; for it is not the eye which discerneth beauty, but the intellect.

Tales of the Colonies; or, the Adventures of an Emigrant. Edited by a late Colonial Magistrate. 3 vols. Saunders & Otley.

This life-like and truthful picture makes the reader quite enamoured of the ease, freedom, and ultimate comfort and prosperity of emigrant life.——Mr. William Thornley, a sensible, active man, anxious to provide for his young family, finding that he is every day going back in the world, and his small capital gradually diminishing, turns his thoughts to the colonies, consults his wife, and, though "some natural tears she drops," obtains her hearty consent to leave their native Surrey and embark for Van Diemen's Land with her old mother and their five children. This was in the early period of the colony, when there were some great, if distant advantages to compensate the settler for the many hardships and privations incident to a new settlement. Thornley, by scraping together all his means, mustered about £1150, besides an ample supply of bedding, clothes, and portable household articles. His capital was diminished to about £800 before he reached Hobart Town, for he had taken out, ready made, many articles required in the colony, such as nails, carpenters' tools, cart-wheels, &c. Now commence the Crusoeing adventures. The settler makes a long journey in search of good land, and falls in with a Man Friday in an old English humourist, a good agriculturist, by name Crab, and of a very crabbed temper, though possessed of an excellent disposition. This man, who had come out as an emigrant, railed every day of his life at the colony and all its ways; was for ever going to return to England, but died in Van Diemen's Land, after having been for many years the faithful and able assistant and director of Thornley, and a second father to the children. The family, with all their goods, were, as soon as possible, transported in their own bullock-wagons to their estate into the wilderness, and upon the banks of the Clyde. They encountered hardship enough, or what would be considered such by the luxurious inhabitants of English cities; but these were cheerfully borne, and there was a wild excitement in their adventures with sheep-stealers and natives, the vicissitudes and accidents of the seasons, and their peculiar position, which gives the charm of gypsy-life to their existence. No sooner had they reached the farm, than Thornley, his man Crab, and his two convict-servants, set hard to work, felling trees for the projected log-house. The journal kept from day to day shows their progress, and is truly an interesting record. A stock of pigs and poultry were procured in exchange for their salt pork, and dogs were bought to assist in keeping the sheep and oxen from straying. Before the weather became broken, the log-house was ready to receive the inmates of the tent; and furniture was made.

Saturday, March 23.—Tried my hand with Bob [the eldest boy] at making a table. Took some of the cleanest of the split logs, and splitting them again, contrived, by smoothing them with the axe, and planeing them where possible, to produce a tolerably even surface. It was six feet long, and four wide. My wife praised my ingenuity, and her mother declared it was a splendid piece of furniture. The children were very merry at it; and Betsy, my eldest girl, who was christened after her grandmother, covered it with an old green cloth, that had served to pack things in, which gave it quite a genteel look.

We were all abed and asleep, when we were awakened by a prodigious cracking of whips and sounds of voices in the distance. We were agreeably surprised by the arrival of the bullock-cart, with Crab and the man, bearing fresh supplies and additions to our stores, for we did not expect him till next day.

Sunday, 24.—Passed as usual. Crab says he has seen a fine lot of sheep—one hundred and eighty ewes with their lambs, and forty wethers, to be had cheap for money, near the Green Ponds. Thought of the sheep all night, but could not plan how to keep them without another servant.

Monday, 25.—Found that John Bond, one of my government men, had been used to sheep in England. Determined to have a look at the sheep next day, but very reluctant to leave home. . . . . .

There was a fine stir about the tents when the sheep came in sight. We were welcomed by my wife, and her mother, and the children in a body. Even Crab seemed pleased.

"Well," said he, "here's more company, at any rate. You must look sharp after them, or not a tail will you see to-morrow morning. The sheep in this country are dreadful creatures to stray."

There was henceforth plenty of salt pork, mutton chops, and dampers—a sort of sodden cakes—to be found in the log-house; with tea for the ladies—for the wife and mother had been educated as ladies—and rice and treacle for the children. There were also a gallon or two of rum, from which, upon great holidays, or days of extra labour, a bowl or jug of punch was brewed. Sometimes the addition of a cockatoo pie, or a stew or soup of kangaroo, was added to the usual fare. More children were born; and they were heartily welcomed: for now there were none of the fears of Old England, about how they were to be maintained and settled in life. There was "plenty for all; land, and house, and meat, and what not! so, the more the merrier!" Other settlers arrived in time: a blacksmith, most welcome; a gentlemanlike surgeon, who found very little to do; and farmers, in numbers, bought land, and commenced cultivation, and the rearing of flocks and herds. Our emigrant had now been eight years in the colony; he had a numerous flock of sheep, and a tolerable herd of cattle; he had forty-five acres enclosed and under tillage, and more land fenced in. A substantial, roomy house was building, and he had a large productive garden, with all sorts of English vegetables and small fruits, and apple and pear trees, coming on vigorously. Let us see him:—

"My family, now increased to seven, begin to be companions to me; and their education, even in this out-of-the-way place, has not been neglected. The place is becoming settled around me, which, although it curtails the run for my sheep and cattle, increases the feeling of security, and affords some society.

"My eldest boy, now seventeen years of age, is a valuable assistant to me, and affords the promise of becoming a healthy, intelligent, and honourable man. My daughter Betsy grows a fine, handsome girl; and my other children are healthy, happy, and improving. I have the pleasurable feeling of caring little whether my consumption of meat and flour is a little less or a little more. Abundance reigns around me. The feeling of anxiety with which I used to be haunted in England in respect to how my children could be made certain of lodging, food, and clothes, has departed from me. There is plenty for all; and the dominant desire now is changed to that of becoming wealthy! To be sure, we still live rather in the rough; but usage has made it familiar to us. We use no fine furniture, wear no fine clothes, and our establishment still bears the impress of a settler's early life. But I am rich (for independence is riches) in sheep and cattle, and house and land. My large room has become furnished with an ample supply of books, and I find recreation and advantage in their perusal.

"The climate, on experience, we find healthy, though very changeable, and subject to extreme variations of heat and cold.

"This year we have added fish to our table. We threw a net across a narrow part of the river, about half a mile from the house, and we now obtain a plentiful supply of eels at most times."

We take leave of Mr. Thornley the Surrey emigrant, a respectable, if not yet venerable patriarch; his elder children happily married and settled around him in peace and plenty; his wealth vastly increased, and with money in the bank at high interest; a rare circumstance, we presume, for an emigrant. The book is really pleasant, and even instructive reading; though the unvarying routine of a settler's life, and the sameness of the incidents and the adventures with bushmen, natives, and convicts, becomes somewhat tedious in the middle division of a three volume story.

Memoirs of the Marquis of Pombal, with Extracts from his Writings, &c. &c. By John Smith, Esq., Private Secretary to the Marshal Marquis de Saldanha. 2 vols. 8vo. Longman & Co.

This work may probably owe its existence to the laudable desire of the Marquis de Saldanha, to see the character of his grandfather, the eminent Portuguese minister, receive tardy justice before the eyes of Europe. Of justice from posterity the man who had made the whole body of the Jesuits his enemies had small chance, without explanation and an attempt at direct vindication of his conduct and policy. The Marquis of Pombal, when his age and country are taken into view—the latter the most ignorant and bigoted in Europe—was one of the most remarkable statesmen of his day; a happy accident in the history of a despotic country, which it was not his blame that he could only benefit so long as he lived and maintained his power. During the twenty-seven years that Pombal was the Minister of Don Joseph, he did more to regenerate Portugal than had been either thought of or attempted for ages. If his works, in a great measure, perished with the projector, the failure must be attributed to the retrogressive principle inherent in all despotic governments. Though the daring act of the expulsion of the Jesuits is the circumstance by which Pombal is best known to Europe, this was but one of the many bold and useful innovations and reforms which distinguished his administration. He began at the foundation, by endeavouring to educate the people; he fostered industry, and encouraged trade and commerce; curbed the priesthood, and humbled the Inquisition. These were his unpardonable sins. He also reformed the system of taxation, improved the police of the capital, and introduced many useful minor changes and regulations. His element seems to have been preternatural activity; and, though his efforts were in general well-directed, it is not wonderful, that at a period when political economy, as a science, could not be said to exist, bustle, and undue interference in all matters, might sometimes have taken the place of large and generalized views. The terrible earthquake of Lisbon, when 30,000 people perished by fire and water, or were crushed in the ruins of the city, took place at an early period of Pombal's administration. The energetic character of the man is revealed in his memorable speech to his Royal master upon this awful occasion. Don Joseph and his courtiers were then at Belem, and in a state of extreme distress and consternation. When the king addressed himself to Pombal, who hastened to Belem, and inquired what was to be done to meet this awful infliction of Divine justice,—"Bury the dead and feed the living," was the calm reply of the self-possessed minister, who already enjoyed his master's confidence; though thenceforward Don Joseph looked upon him as a superior being. In this dreadful emergency, he, indeed, effected marvels. The Jesuits could not slip so favourable an opportunity of maligning one whom they already instinctively felt their destined enemy and conqueror. Like other hypocrites and bigots, they represented the calamity as an awful visitation of the Divine displeasure for the impiety of the minister and his supporters, in which the King himself was included. A similar convulsion, it was foretold, would take place on the same day (All Saints' Day) of the following year. Other pious parties, not Jesuits, sometimes deal in this sort of presumptuous and scandalous menace. We have, of late, seen dismal things foretold of Great Britain and its Sovereign,—disaster, revolution, and dethronement, for the opposition made to the pretensions and demands of a violent sectarian body. When no earthquake occurred, the people laughed heartily at their own foolish fears, and at the prophets of evil; an ill presage for the Jesuits.

In that attempt to assassinate the King which had nearly proved fatal, and which was seized on as a pretext to expel the Jesuits from Portugal and its dependencies, they were, if not the sole instigators of the plot, deeply implicated; and by their restless ambition, insolence, and thirst for temporal power, they had made themselves feared and hated by every Catholic government. Austria was the first to follow the example of Portugal in discountenancing the Jesuits. It was not easy for Pombal and his sovereign to maintain the position they had taken, in despite of the intrigues of this powerful and active body, and of the power of the Court of Rome, which warmly favoured them. Mr. Hay, the British minister at Lisbon, in a despatch to his government, exposes the nefarious arts by which the Jesuits at this time sought to maintain their influence,—undermine Pombal, and frustrate all his measures of reform.

"The emissaries of the Jesuits," he writes, "endeavour to work upon the minds of the people, by persuading them that this kingdom is under the immediate chastisement of Heaven, and many expect some direful calamity; that as our Saviour's sufferings were for the redemption of mankind in general, so the present sufferings of the Jesuits are for the reclaiming of Portugal from its present errors, and which cannot be safe unless it return to them, (the Jesuits.) These and such like absurdities impose greatly upon an ignorant people, who have for their teachers but an ignorant set of clergy; but which the ministers seem determined to put a stop to as much as possible." Among the many useful internal regulations introduced by Pombal was an act restraining people from leaving their property, on their deathbed, to the church; and from building churches or other religious edifices save with the money they happened to possess at the time; from, in short, burthening their families.

The power of Pombal terminated with the life of Don Joseph. His ever-active enemies had previously obtained unbounded influence over the Queen, Donna Maria, who dismissed, or ostensibly permitted her father's favourite minister to retire. The faction that he had crushed and struggled with, was now triumphant; and many of his best regulations were summarily abolished. The Queen, always a fanatical and weak-minded woman, afterwards became insane, and all along she was but a tool in the hands of Pombal's enemies. From being neglected, he was finally persecuted; but he died in peace in 1782, and at a very advanced age, with the consolation of having done much to promote the improvement of a people whom ignorance and the intrigues and influence of the priesthood and the nobility alone rendered insensible to his merits and ungrateful for his services. The Memoirs leave us in doubt if the means employed by Pombal to crush the enemies of the public weal were at all times as fair as his ends were good; and the whole work has too much the air of vindication, of the pleading of an advocate, and the panegyric of an interested admirer, to satisfy the impartial inquirer after truth. Nor are we certain that this pervading tone does not produce effects on the reader's mind diametrically opposite to those intended.

The United Irishmen: Their Lives and Times. By R. R. Madden, M.D. Second Series; in two volumes, with numerous portraits. London: J. Madden & Co.

The subject of these volumes was well-nigh exhausted in the First Series. The Second is more connected, if less novel and interesting. It consists of Memoirs of Thomas Addis Emmet, Dr. Macneven, Arthur O'Connor, Samuel Neilson, and a few more of the sufferers and worthies of the period referred to. The work bears evidence of the pains and diligence with which Dr. Madden has hunted up all sorts of information, and also of the affection, pride, and veneration with which the memories of these patriots are cherished by their surviving relatives and countrymen. Mr. O'Connell would, however, denounce them as fools. One of the most interesting of the Memoirs is that of Samuel Neilson, the Editor of The Northern Star, whose whole correspondence with his wife and family, while a state prisoner in the garrison of Fort George, Dr. Madden has recovered. It is not a little remarkable that nearly every one of the most trustworthy of these individuals was at one time or other suspected by their associates of being traitors and spies; an inevitable consequence of secret societies. Neilson, among others, was suspected, and with no shadow of probability. He was a thoroughly honest man, if a mistaken one, as to the manner of accomplishing a good purpose; and during his long period of imprisonment he became a more reflective, "a better, and a sadder man." The conspiracies and insurrections which these men instigated, and for which they suffered and involved their country in distraction and blood, took place, we need not say, before the Legislative Union; which is, therefore, chargeable with no part of the grievances, real and imaginary, under which Ireland then suffered. Nay, Neilson appears to have decidedly approved of the principle of the Union, and to have looked forward to it as conducive to the prosperity of Ireland. Shortly before the Union was effected, in July 1799, while a prisoner at Fort George, we find him writing to his wife,

"I see a Union is determined on between Great Britain and Ireland. I am glad of it. In a commercial point of view it cannot be injurious; and I can see no injury the country will sustain from it politically. So decidedly am I of this opinion, that I would purchase or rent land in Ireland at this moment in preference to any country on earth, if I had it in my power. Many persons, however, of great knowledge, differ from me on this subject; but time will show who is right. . . . If I had possessed the means, I should have published my sentiments on this subject in a short nervous pamphlet; so deeply am I impressed with its national utility."

These sentiments are so little in repute at present in Ireland, that Dr. Madden has taken pains to make out that Neilson was here a double-dealing man, who affected to entertain opinions which his mind disowned, in order to recommend himself to the Governor of Fort George, who perused all the correspondence of the prisoners! The idea is as far-fetched and improbable as discreditable to Neilson, who appears to have been even rashly honest, and a worthy and sincere man in every relation of life.——The numerous portraits in the volumes, though of no value as productions of art, give a lively idea of the persons they represent; and the work, altogether, will be perused with interest by Irishmen,—though Englishmen may not always be able to see the Patriots of 1798 with Dr. Madden's green spectacles.

A Treatise on Food and Diet, with Observations on the Dietetical Regimen suited for Disordered States of the Digestive Organs; and an Account of the Dietaries of some of the principal Metropolitan and other Establishments for Paupers, Lunatics, Children, the Sick, &c., &c. By Jonathan Pereira, M.D., F.R.S., &c., &c. Octavo, pp. 542. Longman & Co.

There have of late been so many works on DIET, by eminent physicians, that another added to the number, required to have some new, and characteristic feature. This, in the work before us, is found in a systematic account of the chemical elements or constituents of the different articles used as food, and of their relation to the constitution and wants of the human body. In other particulars, a new plan and arrangement have been adopted. The chapter on Dietaries—which is an original one—has a present and vital interest, while half the world are contending that criminals and paupers should be nearly starved, and the other half that they ought to be crammed. In the general rules laid down for Diet, Dr. Pereira, the leading principles being fixed, observes the safe and happy medium, without pedantic strictness on the one hand, or laxity on the other. Like most other intelligent modern practitioners, he places the safety or health of the dyspeptic rather in the avoidance of excess than in the quality or kind of food and drink that is consumed; while he shows the rationale of the easy or difficult digestion of the different kinds of aliment, and draws attention to what nature herself either prompts us to seek or to avoid. There is much useful general information in the work, and not a few valuable receipts for the proper preparation of the diet best suited to the various ages and physical conditions of the human animal. Under the head Acids are found the formulæ of many refreshing and effervescing drinks proper for this season of the year. As a specimen of the homely, but really important parts of the Treatise, we copy out the following directions for making "a most delicious unfermented bread, equal in lightness to any bread prepared by the fermented process:"—

Flour 1 lb.
Sesquicarbonate of soda 40 grains.
Cold water half-a-pint, or as much as may be sufficient.
Muriatic acid of the shops 50 drops.
Powdered white sugar a teaspoonful.

Intimately mix the sesquicarbonate of soda and the sugar with the flour in a large basin, with a wooden spoon; then gradually add the water with which the acid has been previously mixed, stirring constantly, so as to form an intimate mixture very speedily; divide into two loaves, and put into a quick oven immediately. If any soda should escape the action of the acid, it will cause a yellow spot, which, however, is more unsightly than detrimental. The sugar can be omitted if thought desirable.

Dr. Pereira strongly, and for various reasons, recommends unfermented bread. In its preparation, time and trouble are saved, and it is not vitiated by bad yeast, or over-fermentation. He considers it, from lightness and porosity, more digestible than biscuits. On the question or controversy of wine or teetotalism, Dr. Periera takes a middle course. He allows that "the most perfect health is quite compatible with the moderate enjoyment of wine;" but asserts that, notwithstanding all that wine has to recommend it, "for healthy individuals (unaccustomed to its use,) it is an unnecessary article of diet." He holds beer in greater favour, which is fortunate, as this is the less expensive national beverage of the millions. "When Dr. Franklin," he says, "asserted that a penny loaf and a pint of water yielded more nourishment than a pint of beer, it is obvious that he regarded beer merely as a nutrient, and overlooked its stimulating and cheering qualities, of which bread and water are totally devoid." Beer has a tendency to promote corpulency, which cannot be from its alcohol, since spirit-drinkers are usually slender or even emaciated; and hence the nutritive quality of beer is inferred, and the conclusion drawn, "that the practice of taking a moderate quantity of mild malt liquor, of sound quality, at dinner, is, in general, not only unobjectionable, but beneficial; especially for those engaged in laborious pursuits, or who lead an active life." He especially recommends the Indian Pale Ale as a valuable restorative beverage for invalids and convalescents.——Upon the whole, we are led to conclude that people, who have the means, in general regulate their diet very judiciously; the rules of the most intelligent physicians being unconsciously acted on in most instances, which rules are derived from the practice and common consent of mankind. The grand, and almost sole error is excess, whether in eating or drinking, though Dr. Pereira does not think this holds in the case of either prisoners, children, or growing young persons, who are much oftener under than over-fed. Nor does under-feeding always preclude the use of improper diet.

Though there is, and must be, in this and every work of the kind, much that has been said over and over again a hundred times, Dr. Pereira's book contains, with a large proportion of novel matter, such an exposition of the entire subject of Alimentary substances and Diet as must be alike acceptable to the professional student, and improving to the popular reader.

History of the Sandwich Islands. By James Jackson Jarves. London: Moxon.

If it be true that the Sandwich Islands have been taken formal possession of in the name of the Queen of Great Britain, this history of our newest colony appears opportunely. But independently of this circumstance, the work is one that was wanted, and, moreover, one which fairly, if not faultlessly, supplies the want felt. The author appears to be an American, who, partly "in pursuit of health and recreation," visited the Sandwich Islands in 1837, and remained for some years. He became the Editor of The Polynesian, a weekly newspaper published at Honolu; which vocation brought him into intimate relations with the chiefs and natives, and enlarged his opportunities of acquiring the materials which he has turned to good account in this history. He went with a strong prejudice against his countrymen, the Missionaries,—and imagining the natives, (the Hawaiians,) though improved in morals, a priest-ridden people. In the course of a four-years' residence he completely changed this opinion. Much of the curious information which he obtained respecting the history, manners, religion, and traditions of the islands of the Hawaiian Archipelago has been derived from the Missionaries, and especially from those of them who were schoolmasters. A history written in the native language by the pupils of what is called the High School at Lahainaluna has been translated by a late American Missionary, and has been drawn upon for materials. The Tour of the Rev. Mr. Ellis, and the Missionary Records, have also furnished much useful information. The volume displays no fact more clearly than the extreme jealousy which the Americans feel of British interference with these islands, or with what they seem to assume as their superior claims. The Oregon Territory, according to Mr. Jarves, would ill compensate for the loss of the Sandwich Islands, and next to occupying them, the United States Government, or many of the citizens, would wish to see their independence guaranteed. There are more natives of the United States at present in the Sandwich Islands than of all other foreigners put together. Next to Yankees in number are the Chinese. The native population shows a tendency to decrease, and has decreased considerably within the last twenty years, though the rate of mortality is less within the last few years.

As the past condition of these islands is less familiar to ordinary readers than their history since the Missionaries have laboured to civilize and Christianize them, we shall select our few samples of this work from the description of the earlier period.

THE ARISTOCRACY OF HAWAII.

No regular police existed. The immediate attendants of the chiefs executed their orders. These attendants were numerous, every person of rank being supplied according to his grade. A certain number were bosom friends, who always remained privileged idlers about the persons of their lords, having no voice in political affairs: the others held different offices in the household, more or less menial, and constituted a permanent establishment. The principal of these were "pipe lighters," "spittoon carriers," "kahili bearers," "purloiners," "assassins," "cooks," &c. All ate, drank, and slept in common.

These retinues were formed immediately upon the birth of a chief of either sex, and each was designated by some peculiar title, generally of a whimsical character,—as "the fragments," "musquitoes," "umbrellas," &c. The care of the children devolved upon "kahus," or nurses, who assumed the sole direction, until the child was capable of exercising its own will; a period which, as no contradiction to its caprices was allowed, soon arrived.

Rank was hereditary, and descended chiefly from the females, who frequently held the reins of government in their own right. This custom originated in the great license existing between the sexes; no child, with certainty, being able to designate his father, while no mistake could be made in regard to the mother.

Three distinct orders of nobles existed. The first embraced the kings, queens, and all branches of the royal family. It also included the chief advisers, or counsellors, though of inferior birth. Governors, or chiefs of large districts, were included in the second; and the third embraced the lords of villages, priests, and those who held estates, by payment of regular taxes, which were raised by their own dependants, or those to whom they had farmed out lands.

Servile homage was paid to superiors, particularly to priests and chiefs of the highest rank. Their persons could not be touched, or their houses entered, without permission. . . . . .

Among the chiefs a considerable degree of courtesy prevailed, and a difference of language and demeanour, which betokened conscious rank. Perhaps in no other point was the exclusiveness of the aristocracy more strongly characterized. In every department of life a distinction was made, as if contact with the people, by touch, use of the same articles, houses, food, or bathing places, would produce contamination. From such rules and deportment, so great a physical difference arose, that many superficial observers considered the two as distinct races. The chiefs formed a conventional dialect, understood only among themselves; in it novel words were incorporated or formed, which, if they came to be understood by the common orders, were immediately discarded, and others substituted. Towards the common people their conduct was of the most oppressive character. No respect to their persons or property was shown. Their only security was to avoid their presence. To use the expressive language of their descendants, "their restrictions were like the poisoned tooth of a reptile." If a common man made use of any consecrated property belonging to a chief; or if a man walked in the shade of the house of a chief, with his head besmeared with clay, or with a wreath about it, with it wet, or wearing a kihei,—a kapa mantle,—or violated any one of numerous other regulations, equally whimsical and absurd, he lost his life. At sea, if their canoes interrupted their progress, they were overturned; on land, if the shadow of an individual fell upon the king, or he did not prostrate himself when anything was carried to or from his majesty, the punishment was death. This was likewise the case, should any one place his hand upon his head, or be found in a more elevated position. The laws of etiquette were of the most varied nature, dependent greatly upon the caprices of the prince. Justice, or humanity, were utterly set aside, though, as before remarked, the personal disposition of the sovereign greatly affected the whole system of government. But the humane character of the few was but a slight relief from the cruel and capricious desires of the many. Priestcraft lent all its adventitious aids to support this system, from which it derived its own existence. So that but two classes really existed, the oppressor and oppressed;—those who laboured and those who reaped.

Ordeals were employed by the priests; and sorcery, witchcraft, and divination were among their arts. A peculiar superstition, "praying to death," appears to have had as strong a hold over the imaginations of the natives, as the Obi has over the Africans. "No spirit of benevolence pervaded their religion." How uniformly does this hold of every Heathen superstition!—

Savage rites and blood-loving deities, a cruel priesthood and rapacious governments, inhuman faiths and absurd superstitions, were the burdens which the people were required to believe and sustain. From the perusal of the stories of this dark era, as gathered from their own lips, it would seem as if human depravity had reached its limits, and that the people must have gradually wasted away, like a mass of corruption, or have boldly cast off the slough with which they were enveloped.

Yet these people had some confused idea of a future state of rewards and punishments. The goddess Pele, their principal Deity, was supposed to live in the famous volcano of Kilanea.

Here, with her attendant spirits, she revelled in the flames; the unearthly noises of the burning mass were the music of their dance, and they bathed in the red surge of the fiery billows, as it dashed against the sides of the crater.

The overthrow of the goddess, which we do not find noticed in this volume, forms a remarkable event in the Missionary annals. There was no limit to the number of subordinate gods in the Sandwich Islands. The power of the priests, there as everywhere, was maintained by the severity of their rule, and by the systematic prostration of the understanding of their followers; though, like other priests, they knew human nature too well not to permit a Carnival to relieve the gloom and severities of the season of Lent. Human victims were sacrificed to the idols, and were often selected from such individuals as made themselves obnoxious to the priests. The priests held in their own hands much of the land, and taxed the whole of it; and, like the nobles of England, their rank was hereditary.

The power of the priest, though it partook more of a religious character, was scarcely inferior to that of the chiefs. Their persons were sacred, from their supposed familiarity with the gods. It sometimes happened that a chief took the sacred offices upon himself; though, perhaps, from the nature of the intimate connexion existing between the two orders, the absolute power, both in politics and religion, centred in the head of the state. . . . . One fact is everywhere apparent: the spiritual, like the temporal lords of the people, amid all their vagaries, never neglected their own interests. Every ceremony or superstition was framed to aid their already overgrown power; humanity, or a regard for the rights of their inferiors, would have been received as monstrous deviations from the true policy of government. Perhaps they governed no more harshly than could have been expected from a privileged order, nursed in selfishness and brutality.

Like the priests of some Christian countries, those of Hawaii possessed many immunities and privileges.

Offerings to the gods, or more properly to the priests, were required at definite periods, as at all religious ceremonies, and on all occasions when the people desired their services. The wants of the priesthood regulated the amount; and when the regular taxes failed in supplying their desires, the wishes of the god were called into requisition, and the coveted articles tabued for his use. Orisons, chants, and offerings, were made by the priests at their meals. Even in the care of their fowls and quadrupeds, they enjoyed remarkable privileges. When hogs were received alive, they were dedicated to the god of the order, received his marks, and were turned loose, to fatten upon the plantations of the poor cultivators; no one daring openly to injure or drive away the sacred animals.

How many common features does the history of every human tribe present!

The taboo, or tabu, as we find the word spelled here, is a very singular feature among the social institutions of all the Islanders of the South Seas. From its obvious utility, an improved or modified form of the taboo is still preserved in communities now professing Christianity.

Formerly, it was applied exclusively to persons or things in a sacred sense, and was strictly a religious ceremony, imposed only by the priests; but has since come into common use in all the every-day concerns of life. Anciently, those chiefs who pretended to derive their descent from the gods, were called alii kapu, sacred chiefs. A temple, exclusively devoted to the abode and worship of gods, was said to be wahi kapu—sacred place. Anything dedicated or reserved for the exclusive use of gods, chiefs, or priests, was considered as kapu for them. Certain lands and islands were kapu, as well as hunting-grounds, fish, fruit, or whatever the sacred classes chose to reserve for themselves. These kapu were occasional, or permanent—particular fruits, fish, and vegetables, being sometimes tabu both from men and women, for several successive months. The idols, temples, persons, and names of their kings, and members of the royal family; persons and property of the priests; everything appertaining to the gods; religious devotees; the chiefs' bathing-places, or favourite springs of water; and everything offered in sacrifice, were strictly kapu. In modern times, this magic term has become the property of all. A common man can tabu his house, lands, or make any partial restrictions, and all would respect the prohibition. Any forbidden article, or action, is called tabued; hence, its common use in the domestic circle, and its application to laws. A captain can tabu his ship, and none dare approach. Tabued property is generally marked by small white flags, or other signs which are well understood. At the present time, any individual can impose such tabu as suits his necessities or convenience, provided they do not infringe personal rights or the laws of the kingdom.

Formerly, a religious motive was necessary for its assignment; but as the power of the chiefs increased, its use was greatly corrupted, while its influence remained the same, and may be said to have partaken of the preternatural. The bans of the Romish church, in the proudest days of that hierarchy, were not more powerful or obligatory. Every will of a chief, however monstrous, was promulgated as a tabu, and officers were appointed to see that it was observed. . . . .

Particular seasons were tabu; as on the sickness of a high chief, preparations for war, or the approach of important religious ceremonies. Their duration was indefinite, sometimes for a day only, then for months, and occasionally for years. Thirty to forty days was the ordinary period before Kamehameha's reign, when they were much reduced.

These tabus were either common or strict, and were proclaimed by criers or heralds. Men only were required to abstain from their common pursuits, and to attend prayers morning and evening at the heiau, during the former. But when the season of strict tabu was in force, a general gloom and silence pervaded the whole district or island. Not a fire or light was to be seen, or canoe launched; none bathed; the mouths of dogs were tied up, and fowls put under calabashes, or their heads enveloped in cloth; for no noise of man or animal must be heard. No persons, excepting those who officiated at the temple, were allowed to leave the shelter of their roofs. Were but one of these rules broken, the tabu would fail, and the gods be displeased.

When the sacred chiefs appeared in public, all the common people prostrated themselves, with their faces upon the earth. The food of chiefs and priests, they being interdicted from handling anything during this tabu, was put into their mouths by their attendants.

At Hawaii there were two cities of refuge, where criminals, or those in danger of falling victims to revenge, found a sanctuary. The breed—the large, well-fed, and lazy aristocratic race, and the stunted meagre, lower order—were as distinctly marked as they are among the natives of the Hebrides, or among the unmixed Irish. The chiefs, as among the Highlanders,

Were almost invariably tall, stout, and well-formed, and in most instances, as age advanced, increased to unwieldy corpulence; the latter were, upon the average, middle-sized, perhaps falling somewhat short of the European standard. Six feet and upwards were common to the stature of the chiefs of both sexes, with gigantic frames more capable of exerting great strength than of endurance. It is said of some that they could, by taking a man by the head and leg, break his back across their knees. While some exhibited persons so perfect, with Roman features, and with such full development of muscle, as to have delighted the eye of a sculptor, others were remarkable for their size and weight alone; from three to four hundred pounds being not an uncommon gravity. The female chiefs, when young, possessed interesting and intelligent features, which, however, soon became lost, as their bulk increased; this, fortunately, in the eyes of their lords, only heightened their charms. When these were most matured, they became almost as helpless as the belles of the Celestial empire. The latter tottered from want of feet of sufficient size to support frames of scarcely larger proportions; those of the former, though stout, were equally feeble to sustain the immense bulk above. Their flesh hung in deep folds about them; their walk, a majestic stagger; their carriage lofty, and betokening an innate pride of birth and rank. No aristocracy was ever more distinctly marked by nature. To a superficial observer, they might have appeared as a distinct race. The monopoly they enjoyed of the good gifts of Providence, with the greater exercise of their mental faculties, (for they did most of the thinking for the people,) served, every generation, to increase the distinction between the two classes. The great personal size was doubtless partly inherited, and partly the result of early care. . . . Did they over-eat themselves, (a common case,) menials were always ready to do that for the system, which, otherwise, active exercise could only have effected. People were especially trained to lomi-lomi; a kind of luxurious kneading or shampooing, and stretching and cracking the joints, which served completely to renovate the system, when suffering either from a surfeit or fatigue. The fatter the chiefs, the more they required this operation.

Their most common position was reclining upon divans of fine mats, surrounded by a retinue, devoted solely to their physical gratification. Some fanned, brushed away insects, and held spittoons; others fed them, lomi-lomied, or dressed their hair or persons. In short, the extremes of activity or laziness, temperance or sensuality, were wholly at their option. Ambition and apathy, superstition and avarice, love and pleasure, by turns controlled them; and war, priestcraft, and oppression, varied by occasional acts of good nature, or the ebullitions of innate benevolence, which even such an education could not wholly eradicate, were the lot of their subjects.

This was the life of a lord or of a lurdane in all its glory. From this sort of exalted condition must have come the common English phrase descriptive of vinous beatitude, "as drunk as a lord." Cannibalism had not long ceased prior to the visit of Cook; and infanticide was a prevailing custom, but secretly practised, for its existence was a subsequent discovery. The condition of the women was even more degraded than among other savages. Even when a woman, in right of blood, held the sovereign authority, she was not permittted to eat with the men. The lives of the sexes were more apart than that of the humbler classes of other countries and their domestic animals.

Their aliment was separately prepared. A female child from birth to death was allowed no food that had touched its father's dish. The choicest of animal and vegetable products were reserved for the male child, for the female the poorest; and the use of many kinds, such as pork, turtle, shark, bananas, and cocoa-nut, were altogether interdicted. Whatever was savoury or pleasant, man reserved for his own palate, while woman was made bitterly to feel her sexual degradation. Her lot was even worse than that of her sex generally in the southern groups. She was excused from no labours, excepting such as were altogether too arduous for her weaker frame. When young and beautiful, a victim of sensuality; when old and useless, of brutality.

Christianity had much to accomplish in the Sandwich Islands; and, within the last twenty years, the change is, indeed, little short of miraculous. The principal Missionaries to the Sandwich Islands have been from the United States. The overthrow of the old system came suddenly.

The example of the southern groups, in the destruction of their idols, added much to the spreading disbelief. Incontestible evidences of the falsity of their oracles, together with the increasing inconvenience of their absurd rites, confirmed the scepticism. Those interested in the continuance of paganism, redoubled their efforts; threats, prophecies, and promises were freely uttered, and as freely falsified by their own failure. Like Laocoon and his offspring in the folds of the serpent, heathenism writhed and gasped, each moment growing fainter, under the strangling embrace of public opinion. Foreigners conformed to none of their rites, yet they lived and prospered; their own countrymen who had gone abroad, lived in equal disregard of their ritual, and with like impunity. Individually, their memories convicted them of frequently breaking tabus, yet no evil had overtaken them, for they were unknown to the priests. Men and women had eaten together, and of forbidden food; still the predicted judgments slept; their priests must be, as the foreigners described them, liars, and the tabu system altogether foolish and contemptible. Drunken chiefs often had violated the most sacred injunctions; no vengeance overtook them; the female rulers had of late broken through all restrictions, yet prosperity and health were still theirs. They encouraged others to do the same; and in this way the conviction of the folly of supporting an oppressive and corrupt faith for the benefit of a few, daily strengthened.

On the very day of Kamehameha's death, a woman eat a cocoa-nut with impunity, and certain families displayed their contempt for these laws, by feasting in common.

Kaahumanu, the Queen-mother and Regent, proved the Henry VIII. of the native priests.

Kaahumanu, determined in her opposition to the priests, prepared for decisive measures. In November, she sent word to the king, that upon his arrival at Kailua, she should cast aside his god. To this he made no objection, and, with his retainers, pushed off in canoes from the shore, and remained on the water two days, indulging in a drunken revel. On the last evening, Kaahumanu despatched a double canoe for him, in which he was brought to Kailua. Between them matters were arranged for the further developement of their designs. He then smoked and drank with the female chiefs. A feast was prepared, after the customs of the country, with separate tables for the sexes. A number of foreigners were entertained at the king's. When all were in their seats, he deliberately arose, went to the place reserved for the women, and seated himself among them. To complete the horror of the superstitious, he indulged his appetite in freely partaking of the viands prepared for them, directing them to do likewise; but with a violence which showed he had but half divested himself of the idea of sacrilege and habitual repugnance. This act was sufficient; the highest had set an example, which all rejoiced to follow. The gladdening cry arose, "The tabu is broken! the tabu is broken!" Feasts were provided for all, at which both sexes indiscriminately indulged. Orders were issued to demolish the heiaus, and destroy the idols; temples, images, and sacred property were burnt; the flames consumed the sacred relics of ages. . . . . Idolatry was abolished by law; Kaumualii cordially gave his sanction, and all the islands uniting in an exulting jubilee at their deliverance, presented the singular spectacle of a nation without a religion.

The author of the History is as jealous of the Roman Catholic Missionaries, who arrived a few years after the Protestants, as if he had been a Missionary himself. It is sometimes—and very inconsiderately, as we think—said, that the Roman Catholic religion is better adapted to a barbarous people than the purer faith and simpler worship promulgated by Protestant Missionaries; as if the doctrines and teachings of the gospel in their primitive simplicity and plainness, stripped of all perversions and additions, were not the lessons best adapted to every creature possessing human reason and affections. The Sandwich Islanders are, at all events, no proof that a superstitious or ritual religion is better adapted to semi-barbarians than that which the first Missionaries to the South Seas taught. A small congregation of Catholics, foreigners, was formed after the arrival of the Catholic priests, to which the native government offered no molestation.

Curiosity attracted some natives to witness the ceremonies; they speedily reported that images were worshipped. This excited much surprise, and drew many of the chiefs to the chapel; among them went the young king. He afterwards confessed he could scarcely avoid laughing at the absurdity of worshipping a lifeless stock. This led to an investigation of the new rites: the popish doctrines of veneration of holy relics, use of images, fasts and feasts, were found strikingly analogous to their previous idolatry. To use the words of the chiefs, "This new religion was all about worshipping images and dead men's bones, and tabus on meat."

The Islanders could not comprehend the nice distinction between the worshipped symbol and the essence it signified, any more than they might the mystery of the priests' vestments, and lighted candles of the Puseyites. The new religion seemed to them, in externals, very like that idolatry which they had abjured; so much so, that the Queen began to persecute the new converts to Romanism upon an edict that had been made against the old exploded religion of the Islands; nor were the American Missionaries in any way averse to the severity shown to the French "Jesuits" by "the State;" nor by their final expulsion, and the introduction, by a native official, of a system which would have delighted Sir Andrew Agnew. The natives were prohibited from attending the religious services of the Papists, which had the natural effect of sending them in greater numbers; and some of them became true martyrs, if suffering for conscience' sake, though for an absurd tenet, entitles any one to the name. About this time a prime minister, or rather a viceroy, took a very decided line of conduct.

He entered upon the duties of his station with a determination of enforcing the very letter of the law; this was done with a rigour which gave cause of offence to many foreigners; but his sternness quelled every appearance of insubordination. He was equal to the task of subduing the impertinence of lawless whites, and compelling them to keep within their proper spheres. At the same time his officers, with a rudeness which was inexcusable, entered private houses, and carried liquor from tables. Horses were seized for their owners violating the law respecting the Sabbath, but were eventually released. The violence with which the statutes were now enforced contrasted forcibly with the laxity of the previous rule. Armed bands paraded the streets; grog-shops, gaming-houses, and haunts of dissipation, were suppressed; even quiet riding on Sundays was forbidden. But the strong arm of government was not capable of infusing order and sobriety into a dissolute population; though outward decorum prevailed, far preferable to the former laxity of society, secret means of indulgence were sought out; all his measures met at first a strong opposition, and many continued to be evaded. It was proposed to sell rum to foreigners only: Kuakini replied, "to horses, cattle, and hogs, you may sell rum; but to real men you must not on these shores." A national temperance society was formed, in the objects of which the chiefs cordially united.

Entirely to suppress all opposition to government, Kuakini next determined to send away the Romish priests; on the 2d of April 1831, they were summoned to the fort, and ordered to leave the islands in three months. As they manifested no disposition to comply, this order was repeated twice afterwards.

But "conscience," and the interests of the true faith, commanded them to remain and intrigue against the government. The story of their expulsion is well-known. Our American does the Papist priests but scanty justice, though we are not defending their deceptive conduct, and actual defiance and contempt of the government of the country they had entered uninvited and unwelcomed. A period of great laxity followed the stern ascetic rule of the viceroy. When the young king assumed the government, it was exactly a Charles II. succeeding an Oliver Cromwell; the dissolute licentious cavalier to the rigid Puritans and Roundheads. The pertinacious "Jesuits" made other attempts; the "persecution" was renewed, and the American Missionaries still maintained their influence with the native government and their converts. This strife of rival sects is not likely soon to terminate.

The American Missionaries are not more jealous of the French Roman Catholic priests in the Sandwich Islands than is this author of English ascendancy there. It is asserted in his book that the English are, at present, very unpopular in Hawaii; and the English Consul, Mr. Charlton, is run down and calumniated in a style which, perhaps, required to be modified before the work was published in England. So would the account of the death and visits of Cook. If American writers were thus fierce before, what will they be now that the Sandwich Islands, which were long since ceded to Vancouver, have been taken formal possession of. Though the book is alloyed by these jealous feelings, and some unfairness, it possesses merit, and both value and interest, as a fresh and faithful picture of a group of the great human family placed under very peculiar circumstances.

Neurypnology; or, the Rationale of Nervous Sleep considered in Relation with Animal Magnetism. By James Braid.

The author of this book with the queer name, appears to be a medical practitioner in Manchester. He imagines that, while studying the phenomena of Animal Magnetism, in which he does not believe, he has discovered the real cause of the Mesmeric trance, or of somnambulism artificially produced. As his discoveries were diligently promulgated in some of the Manchester newspapers, we presume that his principle may be familiar to as many of our readers as care about the subject. The most important feature of hypnotism—the short name of the newly-discovered agency—is, that like Animal Magnetism, it is alleged to be subservient to the cure of many diseases; though Mr. Braid does not yet make hypnotism, like Parr's or Morrison's pills, altogether an universal remedy. The more remarkable of the cures he reports himself to have effected by hypnotism, are making the deaf hear, the blind or half-blind see, the lame and the paralytic walk, and so on. An elderly lady, who had been half-blind for sixteen years, and tormented with pain in her eyes and head, could read a small print without glasses, after being hypnotised for eight minutes. Another lady, whose sight had been bad for twenty-two years, could not, without glasses, read large capital letters in an advertisement; but after eight minutes' hypnotizing, she could distinctly read the smallest print, and in a short time thread her needle, and write without glasses. A young lady, of twenty-two, daughter of the above, was also operated on, and can now read and thread needles without glasses. Another lady was cured of deafness, as well as blindness. Many things, even more wonderful, are related; and it is pleasant to find that the cures are produced with very little trouble—for we see a lady in Edinburgh advertising her first six Mesmeric operations at a couple of guineas, with the second course reduced to one guinea, which intimates, that at least a round dozen of manipulations may sometimes be required. Mr. Braid cured a young lady of a violent attack of tic douloureux, by only once hypnotizing her; and others similarly afflicted were cured quite as easily. But these are the most trivial of his numerous cures. Spine disease, and paralysis of long standing, have submitted to hypnotism after five minutes' application, though other patients for spine complaint have required three processes; a number not unreasonable. One young apoplectic patient required daily operations till the end of a month. But one day, after being quite well and able to walk without her crutch, she was seized in the street, and died. There is, however, no end to the cases of paralysis which Mr. Braid has cured by hypnotism. A lady had her voice restored by it; and the remedy was found sovereign in severe rheumatism of thirteen years' standing in fifteen minutes. The cripple could not only walk, but run. There are many cases of this kind reported, and also of the cure of severe headach, epilepsy, malconformation, palpitation of the heart, &c. Mr. Braid has also extracted teeth without the hypnotized patient being sensible of any pain. The most severe spasmodic affections have been cured by hypnotism in a very few minutes; cases which, without this new remedy, Mr. Braid believes, must have speedily proved fatal. Insanity also, it is considered probable, may be cured by it. Hypnotism proves Phrenology as decidedly as does Animal Magnetism; so that Phrenology has now got two strings to her bow, though Mr. Braid will not allow the discovery of Gall to be nearly equal in importance to the human race to his own of hypnotism.—— We hear of no case in which the remedy has failed. The numerous ways in which all manner of diseases may be cured by newly-discovered means,—by Mesmerism, hypnotism, hydropathy,—makes it rather surprising that people will continue so perverse as to be ill, and die.

The disciples of Mesmer, the believers in Animal Magnetism, Dr. Elliotson and others, will, we presume, repudiate Mr. Braid's discovery of the rationale of the unnatural nervous sleep. Some of them allow that he has discovered a new agency, but deny that it is identical with Animal Magnetism. Mr. Braid owns that he has never yet been able to make any of his blindfolded patients read a book laid on the pit of their stomachs, or a closed letter; tell the time on a watch held at the back of their heads; see what is doing miles off, or perceive the nature and cure of internal diseases, though possessed of no previous medical knowledge. This establishes that his agency, and that of the disciples of Mesmer, are not identical, as Mesmerism can do all that, and more; yet we must acknowledge that he has made, in his own walk, what appears an astonishing progress. We must also report to his advantage, that, with Dr. Elliotson, he has given up the power claimed by the Mesmerizer over the will of the Mesmeree—that tremendous power, to which the worst form of despotism, priestcraft, or aristocracy, has never approximated. There is good policy, as well as good sense, in disclaiming this awful supremacy; and permitting us still to sing—

My mind to me a kingdom is,

Or,

My heart's my own,—my will is free.

Once submitting to be Mesmerized or hypnotized, however, the will of the patient is completely annihilated. He must obey the mysterious and irresistible impulse given him; and allow "the manifestations" to come forth in spite of himself. Besides the marvellous cures which it effects so easily, hypnotism is the very minister of the Graces. Persons who have, or seem to have, no ear, and who cannot, in their natural condition, sing a note, can, when hypnotized, and their tune and imitation brought into play, sing beautifully in French, German, or Italian; and those who never danced in their lives, and who, from their religious opinions, hold dancing to be a sin, when hypnotized, "cut a very good figure at waltzing." Mr. Braid tells this of a lady, "a strict Methodist." By the way, nearly the whole of Mr. Braid's patients are ladies. It was women who were cured, in the great majority of cases, and it is women—generally young women—who exhibit the phrenological manifestations. Boys are also operated upon; but they seem dull and slow at the manifestations, when compared with young ladies. Some of the manifestations, even as reported, appear rather contradictory—as veneration giving the desire "to sing," and wit "to walk," benevolence "to travel," &c.; but the science is still in its infancy, and Mr. Braid holds, that the variety or discrepancy of the manifestations of his patients, "is the most striking proof of the reality of the phenomena."

Hydropathy. The Theory, Principles, and Practice of the Water Cure shown to be in accordance with Medical Science, and the teaching of Common Sense. Illustrated by some important cases. By Edward Johnson M.D. Simpkin, Marshall, & Co.

Dr. Edward Johnson, a medical writer of ability, has become a thorough convert to the Hydropathic system of cure, as practised by Priessnitz at Gräfenberg; and he has, in this volume, attempted to explain the rationale of that system. Last November he met with Captain Claridge's account of the cold water cure, which our readers may remember to have seen noticed in Tait's Magazine;* and the coincidence between the practice of Priessnitz, and the principles which he had previously adduced in his Treatise on "Life, Health, and Disease," led him to make a journey to Gräfenberg to examine and decide. The results of his observations are embodied in the present volume, which was written on the spot. He is not only a confirmed believer in the cold water cure, but is, we daresay, well qualified to practise it. He sets himself to prove, and indeed reasons with great ingenuity, that the practice of Priessnitz is so eminently successful because it is in perfect accordance with the theories or principles of Professor Liebeg and Dr. Billing, two of the greatest names in modern medical science. These learned persons are, of course, as unconscious of this harmony as is the untaught Preissnitz; who knows nothing of either drugs or doctors, and despises both. They have each arrived at the same goal by different roads.

* For June, 1842.

"Priessnitz," says Dr. Johnson, "cannot give his knowledge a scientific expression. But when Priessnitz declares (as he does) that the application of cold water cures diseases, by strengthening the general health and fortifying the system—and when Liebeg declares (as he does) that the abstraction of heat cures diseases, by exalting and accelerating the transformation of tissues, the two do but give expression to the same fact in different language. When Priessnitz declares that cold water has a tendency to bring 'bad stuff' out of the system; and when Liebeg declares that it promotes the union of certain matters with oxygen, by which they are carried out of the system, and which matters, if not so carried out, become causes of disease—the two do but give different forms to the same fact. . . . . Priessnitz's treatment by no means confines itself to the general application of cold water. Its partial application is much more frequently adopted; as, for instance, the sitz bath, the foot bath, the head bath, the arm bath, the face bath, &c., &c. The duration of the sitz bath varies from twenty minutes to two hours and a half; and the effects thus obtained vary not only in amount, but also in kind. How do these partial applications of cold water act on the system? They act by determining the force of oxygen from one part to another. They produce all the effects of both bleeding and blisters, except the pain."

Liebeg being thus found to confirm the principle of Priessnitz in spirit, if not quite literally, Dr. Billing is next impressed into the service.

If Dr. Billing be right in his assertion, (and I see not how it can possibly be refuted,) that all diseases have exhausted nervous influences for their causes, then it follows that all diseases whatever must consist essentially in weakened, enlarged, and congested capillaries, since the relaxation of the capillaries must be the first effect which is produced by exhausting that influence, which alone preserves them their normal size or diameter. Such being the one proximate cause or essential nature of all disease, the principle of cure is one also. The proximate cause is relaxation and enlargement of the capillaries—the indication of cure, therefore, is to constringe the capillaries—to cause them to contract, and resume their healthy dimensions.

This the regular practitioner attempts by the use of medicines, bleeding, and other remedies, by which the engorged capillaries are unloaded, and their coats constringed; and Priessnitz by sweating, cold water, baths, and wet cloths. Though the practice may be different, Dr. Johnson contends that the principle is the same. In some respects he pushes the theories and the practice also of Priessnitz to the extreme; and in his admiration of nature, would have us strip off our artificial clothing, or nearly so, and take to herbs and roots, with, perhaps, a little meat, and water ad libitum. The treatise is, however, the most ingenious argument for Hydropathy which has yet appeared; and, moreover, hydropathy itself is not all naught, whatever the Faculty may aver.

THEOLOGICAL WORKS.

Works of pure Theology are not more in our way than works of pure Mathematics; and while so many popular vehicles for their review exist in the numerous religious periodicals of the day, we feel the less reluctance to waive them altogether. With serious works of a mixed nature, in which questions of personal and social morals, or practical religion, are involved, this objection does not exist. This premised, we shall merely enumerate those new theological works on our table, which, from the names of the authors alone, seem entitled to consideration.

Divine Inversion; or, A View of the Character of God as in all respects opposed to the Character of Man. By David Thom, Minister of Bold-Street Chapel, Liverpool. 8vo. Simpkin, Marshall, & Co.

The author of this work imagines that he has discovered a new and fundamental, or, at least, "a supremely important" principle, which he has named as above; and to the history of its gradual discovery, and the elucidation of its nature and bearings, an ingenious volume is entirely devoted. As we do not, we fear, clearly apprehend the principle of Divine Inversion, we can still less attempt to define it. But the author complains of the indifference of the professors of religion to his publications; of positive injustice, and of the supercilious silence of the modern Pharisees: and this is a complaint which should be listened to by those trustees of the public press under whose jurisdiction works of this kind naturally fall. From a note in the Appendix to the volume, we learn, that there are now religious writers in England, who, at least, go the length of suggesting the final annihilation of the wicked and unregenerate; and others, who broadly assert the doctrine of annihilation. Can one be surprised that such a condition of society as that described by Lord Ashley and in many late Parliamentary Reports, as existing in our large towns, should tempt benevolent minds into this extraordinary error.

The Advancement of Religion the Claim of the Times. By Andrew Reed, D.D. 8vo. London: Snow.

This can scarcely be called a purely theological work. It consists of lectures of a character essentially popular, as well as practical. Its animated exhortations apply to the daily life of all men, under all circumstances. There may be considerable difference of opinion as to the relative weight of these exhortations; none as to their general tendency. Friend James Backhouse, the Quaker missionary to Australia, for example, would certainly demur to the pulpit or the ministry, in the very widest sense, being held "not only as a means of grace," but "the best and chiefest means;" while in the section on the advancement of the cause of religion by personal effort he would find everything to admire.

History of the Westminster Assembly of Divines. By the Rev. W. M. Hetherington. Edinburgh: Johnstone.

Though Mr. Hetherington's is an extremely one-sided account of the proceedings of this memorable Assembly, it may be of use to many students of English Ecclesiastical History from its brevity. Its errors and partialities will probably be pointed out in some of the religious periodicals under the immediate influence of the Independents or Congregationalists;—and this is required. Instead, therefore, of meddling with the controversy as between the Presbyterians and Independents in the Assembly, or yet with the Erastian Controversy, we should, at the present moment, prefer as a sample of the History, the disputes concerning priests' vestments, and those other frivolities and fopperies which have come into vogue of late, and with more blame and absurdity than in past times, as this superstitious nonsense is revived in an age claiming to be much more enlightened than the sixteenth century. From recent appearances, one might conclude that the Bishop of London would not be very loath to see the whole clergy of London summoned, as of old, to Lambeth, and compelled to assume the sacerdotal costume prescribed for them, or forfeit their livings, which thirty-seven out of a hundred ministers then did. This arbitrary order, however, was alleged to be issued to enforce the great duty of conformity, and not from any intrinsic importance connected with the mere vestments and frivolous rites. Both objects may now be contemplated by the Puseyite clergy.

Piety and Intellect relatively Estimated. By Henry Edwards. Second Edition. Simpkin, Marshall, & Co.

It is needless to say that piety is here exalted above intellect. The strain of the whole argument of a work written in a pleasing and popular vein by a man of refined literary taste, confirms the saying of Evelyn, "that there is no solid wisdom but in real piety."

An Essay on the Profession of Personal Religious Conviction, and upon the Separation of Church and State, considered with reference to the fulfilment of that duty. Translated from the French by Professor A. Vinet of Geneva. By Charles Theodore Jones. London: Jackson & Walford.

This somewhat heavy treatise is of interest in a secondary way, from exhibiting the progress which the Voluntary Principle has made on the Continent. It teaches and tells nothing new, but much that is worth listening to, both on account of the quarter whence it proceeds, and the hope which it encourages.

Chronicles of St. Mungo; or Antiquities and Traditions of Glasgow. Glasgow: John Smith & Son.

Besides the Antiquarian history of the capital of the West, and a description of its ancient and modern Public Buildings, and Literary and Scientific Institutions, we find, in this intelligent and well-filled volume, what many will think of more account—a sketch of the progress of the manufactures and commerce, and steam navigation of Glasgow, with biographical notices of its eminent natives, public characters, and those humourists and oddities of which Glasgow has had a full share. As the citizens of Glasgow have always been famed for their opposition to injustice, the town has frequently been the scene of riots, or popular outbreaks; for Glasgow bore a brave hand at "the dinging doun o' the Cathedrals," though its own was spared,—and subsequently against the Establishment of Episcopacy. These riots afford matter for many pages. The Annals of St. Mungo will be found highly entertaining to general readers, and precious to Glaswegians.

Nelsonian Reminiscences; Leaves from Memory's Log. By G. T. Parsons, Lieut. R. N.

These Reminiscences are a reprint of a series of articles which appeared in the Metropolitan Magazine, regarding Nelson, and other contemporary naval heroes of various grades.

Addresses Delivered at the Manchester Mechanics' Institution. By Sir Benjamin Heywood, Bart., F.R.S., the late President. Collected and published by the Directors. London: Charles Knight.

Cæsar, with Vocabulary, Notes, and Map. By W. M'Dowall. Simpkin, Marshall, & Co.

A Travelling Map of Scotland. Edinburgh: Macredie.—A very suitable and portable companion for the season, which we recommend to all travellers unprovided with such a guide. It has the railroads.

NEW DRAMAS.

Launcelot of the Lake. A Tragedy in Five Acts. By C. J. Rietmüller. Chapman & Hall.

The Conde's Bride. A Historical Drama in Five Acts. By Thomas Smibert. Orr & Co.—This play was performed in the early part of the present season before the critical and fastidious audience of the Modern Athens, who, we understand, received it most graciously, and with high approbation. And, in truth, it merited such a reception, by a well-developed fable and easy flowing dialogue, with many of the natural graces, if few of the artifices of dramatic composition.

SERIAL WORKS.

Blackie & Son's Illustrated Edition of the Works of Burns, Parts IV., V., and VI.—In Part IV., the poems are advanced to a certain stage; and Professor Wilson's Essay on the Genius and Character of Burns is commenced and continued through the other Parts. It is somewhat late in the day to speak of this well-known masterpiece. It is enough that a more just and generous, and yet discriminating appreciation of Burns, the poet and the man, has never been made by any other writer, than is contained in what, from first to last, reads like a glowing and enthusiastic panegyric; nor can we conceive any study so more improving, whether previous or subsequent to the perusal of the works of Burns, as this commentary—all light and fire. Reading by it, the page is illuminated, and a thousand hidden beauties are brought out.

As a poet, Burns is believed, even by his warmest admirers, to be the most vulnerable through some of his humorous or "profane rhymes;" and, among others, "The Holy Fair," and "Holy Willie's Prayer." Instead of citing Wilson's ceaseless, fervid eulogies, interspersed with copious and most felicitous and apposite quotations from the long and serious poems, we shall copy out the Professor of Moral Philosophy's manful vindication of the bard from the charge of impiety, or even of profaneness;—an accusation made on the assumption, that true religion, and the practices and characters which Burns scourges and ridicules, are not wide as the poles asunder; or as if the pious and sacred had the slightest connexion with the hypocritical and sanctimonious.

"His satires were unsparingly directed against certain ministers of the gospel, whose Calvinism he thought was not Christianity, whose characters were to him odious, their persons ridiculous, their manners in the pulpit irreverent, and out of it absurd; and having frequent opportunities of seeing and hearing them in all their glory, he made studies of them con amore on the spot; and at home, from abundant materials, with a master's hand, elaborated finished pictures—for some of them are no less—which, when hung out for public inspection in market-places, brought the originals before crowds of gazers transported into applause. Was this wicked? Wicked we think too strong a word; but we cannot say that it was not reprehensible, for to all sweeping satire there must be some exception—and exaggeration cannot be truth. Burns, by his irregularities, had incurred ecclesiastical censure, and it has not unfairly been said that personal spite barbed the sting of his satire. Yet we fear such censure had been but too lightly regarded by him; and we are disposed to think that his ridicule, however blameable on other grounds, was free from malignity, and that his genius for the comic rioted in the pleasure of sympathy and the pride of power. To those who regard the persons he thus satirized as truly belonging to the old Covenanters, and Saints of a more ancient time, such satires must seem shameful and sinful; to us who regard "Rumble John" and his brethren in no such light, they appear venial offences, and not so horrible as Hudibrastic. A good many years after Burns' death, in our boyhood, we sometimes saw and heard more than one of those worthies, and cannot think his descriptions greatly overcharged. We remember walking one day—unknown to us, a fast-day—in the neighbourhood of an ancient fortress, and hearing a noise to be likened to nothing imaginable on this earth but the bellowing of a buffalo fallen into a trap upon a tiger, which, as we came within half a mile of the castle, we discerned to be the voice of a pastor engaged in public prayer. His physiognomy was little less alarming than his voice, and his sermon corresponded with his looks and his lungs—the whole being indeed an extraordinary exhibition of divine worship. We never can think it sinful that Burns should have been humorous on such a pulpiteer; and if we shudder at some of the verses in which he seems yet alive, it is not at the satirist.

"From this time I began to be known in the country as a maker of rhymes. Holy Willie's Prayer next made its appearance, and alarmed the kirk-session so much, that they held several meetings to look over their spiritual artillery, and see if any of it might be pointed against profane rhymers;" "and to a place among profane rhymers," says Mr. Lockhart, in his masterly volume, "the author of this terrible infliction had unquestionably established his right." Sir Walter speaks of it as "a piece of satire more exquisitely severe than any which Burns ever afterwards wrote, but unfortunately cast in a form too daringly profane to be received into Dr. Currie's collection." We have no wish to say one word in opposition to the sentence pronounced by such judges; but has Burns here dared beyond Milton, Goethe, and Byron? He puts a Prayer to the Almighty into the mouth of one whom he believes to be one of the lowest of blasphemers. In that Prayer are impious supplications, couched in shocking terms, characteristic of the hypocrite who stands on a familiar footing with his Maker. Milton's blasphemer is a fallen angel, Goethe's a devil, Byron's the first murderer, and Burns' an elder of the kirk. All the four poets are alike guilty, or not guilty—unless there be in the case of one of them something peculiar that lifts him up above the rest, in the case of another something peculiar that leaves him alone a sinner. Let Milton then stand aloof, acquitted of the charge, not because of the grandeur and magnificence of his conception of Satan, but because its high significance cannot be misunderstood by the pious, and that out of the mouths of the dwellers in darkness, as well as of the Sons of the Morning, "he vindicates the ways of God to man." Byron's Cain blasphemes; does Byron? Many have thought so—for they saw, or seemed to see, in the character of the Cursed, as it glooms in soliloquies that are poetically sublime, some dark intention in its delineator to inspire doubts of the justice of the Almighty One who inhabiteth eternity. Goethe, in the "Prologue in Heaven," brings Mephistopheles face to face with God. But Goethe devoted many years to "his great poem, Faust," and in it he too, as many of the wise and good believe, strove to show, rising out of the blackness of darkness, the attributes of Him whose eyes are too pure to behold iniquity. Be it even so; then, why blame Burns? You cannot justly do so, on account of the "daringly profane form" in which "Holy Willie's Prayer" is cast, without utterly reprobating the "Prologue in Heaven."

Of the Holy Fair few have spoken with any very serious reprehension. Dr. Blair was so much taken with it, that he suggested a well-known emendation—and, for our own part, we have no hesitation in saying, that we see no reason to lament that it should have been written by the writer of the Cotter's Saturday Night. The title of the poem was no profane thought of his—it had arisen long before among the people themselves, and expressed the prevalent opinion respecting the use and wont that profaned the solemnization of the most awful of all religious rites. In many places, and in none more than in Mauchline, the administration of the Sacrament was hedged round about by the self-same practices that mark the character, and make the enjoyment of a rural fair-day.

We wish that we could exhibit more of the vigorous operation of the crutch upon conventional hypocrisies of other kinds; for Christopher, when he gets among them, thwacks about him lustily and unsparingly. And yet courageous honesty, if the most rare thing in a modern biography, is not by any means the highest excellence of Wilson's matchless discourse on the genius and character of Burns. This single new contribution to whatever has already been best said upon the poet of Scotland, all of which is to find a place in the work, gives this edition a vast superiority over every former one, independently of its other claims as the most comprehensive and the most handsomely embellished that has yet appeared. The new Parts on our table are adorned by several interesting portraits. "Bonny Jean" appears as a rather well-dressed comely elderly lady. There is a portrait of worthy Dr. Blacklock; and one of Lucy Johnston, a beautiful plate, from a fine painting by Raeburn. The scenic plates are numerous and fine, though somewhat monotonous. It would require more than one artist, more than one style of art, and more diversity of genius, fully to illustrate Burns.

Miss Strickland's Lives of the Queens of England, Volume VI. Colburn.—This volume is entirely occupied with memoirs of the life of Queen Elizabeth; beginning with her birth, and extending to the middle of her reign. Miss Strickland has elicited a great deal of gossip and prittle-prattle, illustrative of the personal character of that strange compound of strength and weakness, "the lion-hearted Elizabeth." The annals of the Queen's progresses, and of her various matrimonial negotiations, coquetries—not to say gallantries—and flirtations, are peculiarly rich. If there be much of what history might regard as slight and frivolous details, these are, in the words of the writer, "at least, as interesting to the world in general as slaughters in battle;" and she might have added—"or as intrigues in Council." Never had spinster, whether noble or royal, such a succession of suitors, if not of lovers and admirers, as Elizabeth, to die unwed at last. We have attempted to reckon them up, but have completely failed. Miss Strickland has no predilection for Elizabeth; and in the account of her early girlish entanglement with the audacious Seymour, she does the Princess some injustice. The vanity of Elizabeth might have been touched by what seemed a first conquest; but the High Admiral does not appear to have had any power over her heart,—if heart she ever had.

Knight's Pictorial Shakspere: William Shakspere, a Biography. Part VIII.—In this Part an ingenious attempt is made to show that Shakspere may, or rather must, in 1601, have visited Scotland, and examined the scene of Macbeth. It is a right pleasant and not improbable conjecture, which every Scot may be happy to entertain without much scrupulous sifting of the evidence.

ALIENOR; OR, "DIED LIKE A DOG."

A TALE.

BY MRS. GORE.

FEW districts in Europe are more devoid of local interest than the frontier-country between Belgium and France; especially at its maritime extremity, towards West Flanders, where dykes and ditches, and an ill-favoured, aguish-looking population afford incontrovertible testimony to the fenny nature of the soil. In that flat and dreary landscape, where a canal becomes an interesting feature, and a flax-ground or tobacco-field a towering plantation,—though the fertility of the reclaimed land is such as at least to secure the traveller against incurring the hatred of the benevolent Yorick by declaring all "barren,"—the tedious sameness of the scene soon wears down his spirits to depression.

How much more then the spirits of those less-fortunate individuals whom circumstances have endenizened in those truly Low Countries, whose waters are brackish,—whose earth is spongy,—whose air baneful! Persons so situated soon cease to wonder at the repugnance which has stripped so many of the quaint old towns of Western Flanders of the better order of inhabitants, for whom their stately mansions appear to have been constructed; abandoning them to the occupation of weavers and lace-makers;—with only the pompous gravestones of the grand old churches to attest that, in days of yore, under the sceptre of Burgundy or Austria, high and puissant families abided beside those sluggish canals;—eventually consigning their bones to the tombs of highborn ancestors, coeval with the foundation of the Church.

In their degree, the Flemish villages have shared the fate of the cities;—producing a population far inferior to the thriving farmers in possession when France wrested from Spain the fair provinces she chose to enjoy by the double right of conquest and queenly dowry. Instead of the sturdy boors we find in the groups of Teniers, Wouvermans, and Paul Potter, the modern inhabitants of the debatable land lying between Nieuport, Dunkirk, and Courtray are chiefly smugglers, carrying on a reciprocal trade across the frontier;—with the exception of a liberal allotment of gendarmes appointed by the two governments to watch over their maraudings; and the dykemen officially employed in the care of the sluices, so important to the health and wellbeing of the community.

Among the villages distinguishing themselves in the squalid district of Ypres by their contraband trade,—a village, by the way, which has the presumption to call itself a town,—is Vraeschoot;—a little verdant nook, of which every separate habitation, small, green, and concealed amid surrounding vegetation, bears a striking resemblance to the ark of Moses resting among the bulrushes.

For an eye sufficiently habituated to the deficiencies and peculiarities of a Flemish landscape, Vraeschoot possesses a certain degree of beauty. Its low roofs and bright green window-shutters,—its glassy pools and highly-cultivated meadows,—pretend to as much rural distinction as is compatible with the nature of a landscape which an ignorant or careless sluice-man at the neighbouring Sas might lay under water in an hour,—converting the whole parish into a cheerless lake. Such accidents, however, are unexampled; and Vraeschoot, though of amphibious aspect, has no record of an inundation to diversify the somewhat monotonous annals of her municipality.

For there is no admission, of course, into similar archives for the thousand interesting episodes derived from her perilous breach of international law by defiance of excise and customs,—octroi and droits réunis; nor are the Vraeschooters ever heard to boast of the number of martyrs they have furnished to the blunderbusses of the maréchaussée while violating the rights of the contributions indirectes.

Nevertheless, these things have become legendary in the village; and many a story, equaling in barbarous detail the feats of the early buccaneers, is related in winter time beside the turf-warmed stoves of Vraeschoot. It seems to add flavour to the eau de vie, for which they have fradulently managed to exchange their Schiedam, and to the cervelas they have bartered for their salted stockfish, to relate their struggles with the officials appointed by the French and Belgic governments to restrict their traffic within the stricter letter of the law.

Last summer, in my zeal to complete a collection illustrative of the Flemish Flora by a few rare specimens of bog and aquatic plants, I spent a week in the comfortable little inn of the Korren Bloem at Vraeschoot; and to many a tale of local prowess was I compelled to listen while wearing out the morning in pursuit of marsh hyacinths, and the curious rushes and mosses of the Ypres swamps. After listening for a day or two to the buzz of the dragon-flies and other winged nuisances over the weed-crested ditches of that watery waste, the drone of the Flemish peasants appeared less insupportable.

According to the custom of the country, dinner was always laid in the inn-kitchen;—but it was a kitchen that might have sat for its picture of Flemish cleanliness to Van Hooghe; the neatly-varnished Cambray stoves, and bright blue Delft ware gracing the plate-racks, forming the only interruption to the general whiteness of walls, ceiling, floor, and dressers; the former being white-washed at certain intervals of the year, and the floor daily strewn with fresh, white sand;—while the stove-handles, and nearly all the kitchen utensils, were of brass, so brightly kept as to be more brilliant than vessels of gold or silver.

By the time dinner was over, the tapering decanter of Faro and tall, thin-stemmed beer-glass removed, and, by way of dessert, the stunted fruits of the country, and a dainty formed of pastry and treacle, appropriately called Bonbon de Sluys, placed upon the table, the good women of the house, Vrouw Van Kerckx and her wooden-faced daughter Trincia,* used to draw near, with their knitting needles in their hands,—the latter having abandoned her less portable lace-pillow for the express purpose of gossiping with a stranger, sufficiently unversed in the ways of Vraeschoot to find amusement in anecdotes of its illicit trade and the judgments thereby provoked.

Sometimes it occurred to me that Vrouw Van Kerckx exhibited a closer insight into and warmer interest in these exploits than was altogether reconcileable with her deep devotion to Church and State. In the eagerness of narration she often spoke as though an eye-witness of the feats she was relating,—like an old sportsman or veteran warrior warming with the recapitulation of heroic scenes in which they have borne a part;—till, at length, I began to surmise that the Macon and Médoc, issuing from the gelid cellars of the Korren Bloem, (where, according to its sign and inscription: VERKOOP MAN ALLE SOOTEN VON DRANK) had made no pecuniary acknowledgment to His Majesty King Leopold for the honour of enteiing his dominions.

"But you have never taken any share in these daring enterprises?" said I, addressing Vrouw Van Kerckx at the close of one of her strange, eventful histories. "You would not, surely, defraud the revenue, by smuggling?"

"And why not?" cried she, crossing her arms defyingly, over the jacket of her Flemish costume. "Wherefore is a poor widow woman like myself to abide by the juggling of princes and their ministers,—who deal with nations and languages as with flocks and herds; creating as it were a line in the air, which they advance or retrograde at will, and which is to make me French or Fleming, according to their whims and fancies?—My old grandfather used to boast of having spoken with those who remembered the time when Flanders extended half way into the France of to-day,—the time when Marlbrook came soldiering here, and for all the great victories we hear so much of, left the grand Monarque in possession of our finest provinces! Even I,—I, Lottje Van Kerckx, who am speaking to you,—recollect the period when the French eagle was the Imperial standard for our stamps;—when Brussels, which now calls itself a capital, was but a country-town like the rest of us;—and all was France, France, France, from Rouen to Hamburg;—paying toll and tax to the same Parisian seat of government! And why, pray,—because it pleased the crowned heads of Europe to knock themselves together at Aix-la-Chapelle, and decide that this patch of ground should be called Prussia, and t'other patch of ground be called France,—is a poor widow woman to pay mulct and fine to this new king of ours, for liberty to drink and retail the French liquors, which, in my youth, I bought and sold at prime cost? I had no hand in their rubbishing congress!—My opinion wasn't asked! And so, without further ceremony,—feeling myself guiltless in the sight of ALMIGHTY GOD for violating a law which is none of his making,—I make bold to catch the gendarmes of the frontier napping, whenever they are fools enough to let me!"

It was no province of mine to resolve this complex periphrasis into the simple word "smuggling," or remind mine hostess of the Korren Bloem, that to "honour the king" and the laws of his making, quand méme, comes next to the fear of God in the enactments of all the churches of Christendom. It was plain that her conscience lay in her kegs of Cognac; and to judge by the number of country curés in their three-cornered beavers and rusty gowns, whom I saw in the course of the day trying the strength of her "alle sooten von drank," she could be in no need of spiritual exhortation.

I contented myself, therefore, with pursuing my inquiries into the gestes et faits of the heroes of Vraeschoot contrabandery; which are truly of a nature to deserve that some descendant of Froissart, (a native of these web-footed provinces,) should arise to snatch them from oblivion. Among other questions, I ventured to inquire whether the marine smugglers of Flanders were of equal hardihood with its land marauders;—whether Nieuport and Ostend, for instance, rivalled Vraeschoot in the quality of their traditions?—

To my great surprise, the voluble old Vrouw became instantly dumb. I fancied, however, that a significant glance toward Trincia purported to assign her daughter's presence as the cause of this sudden taciturnity; and a few minutes afterwards, the phlegmatic-looking damsel having quitted the kitchen as if to fetch fresh worsted for the stocking she was knitting, mine hostess burst forth.

"I did not care," said she, "to answer just now your question about the Nieuporters, because of poor Trincia!—You can't have been so many days in the village without knowing her story?"

"I have heard nothing concerning your daughter, but that she is an excellent housewife and the best

* Written Trinje by the Flemish.

lace-maker in the district," said I; feeling it unnecessary to declare how little the dull, inanimate face of the Flemish damsel had interested my inquiries.

"Well enough for that!" replied her mother. "But surely you must have heard of her misfortune?"

The village interpretation assigned in England to the word "misfortune," as regarding persons of Trincia's age and sex, rendered my denial somewhat embarrassed.

"What!—not heard of Peter Van der Heyden?" cried the mother, apparently priding herself in her family disasters.

And this time I was bolder in my avowals of ignorance.

"Then, I can tell you that you never heard of the bravest and best fellow who ever trod the earth or dared the sea!" retorted the old lady, with fond enthusiasm. "Never a better sailor than Peter Van der Heyden steered into the port of Nieuport; and to this day, whenever a storm stirs up the breakers betwixt the headlands and Ostend, and the signals of distressed vessels are heard in the offing, the lighthouse-keeper and water-bailiff are sure to shake their heads, and mutter the name of poor Peter Van der Heyden, once the boldest and surest of their pilots!"

"He was not a smuggler, then?" I inquired; glancing towards the door through which Trincia had disappeared, lest she should be within hearing.

"He was a smuggler,—and a thriving one!" replied Vrouw Van Kerckx, stoutly, and without shame. "But you need not be afraid of that poor soul's overhearing you!—Trincia is gone to sob away half-an-hour in her own chamber, as she is sure to do whenever there is talk before her of Nieuport and the Nieuporters. Trincia's heart is as soft as a bran-binn."

I certainly expected no such imputation of sensibility against the girl whose inexpressive countenance had disposed me against her. But, like others of hasty judgment, I have often to amend my rash decisions on men, women, and things; and am, accordingly, anxious to do justice to poor Trincia Van Kerckx, as one of the warmest-hearted individuals of my acquaintance. The fixedness of face I had so misappreciated, was, in fact, the result of despair:—the expression of a passionless heart, whose hopes are dormant in the grave,—whose life must be at best a life of duty,—whose earthly happiness consists in retrospection,—and a retrospection whose cloudy distance is lost in tears! The poor creature I had seen knitting from morning till night, till I fancied her a mere machine, worthy only to fidget the bobbins of a lace-pillow or the needles of her worsted stocking, was one of that holy army of martyrs—a broken-hearted woman, faithful to the memory of a first and only love. Let my readers, however, work out the discovery as gradually as I did myself.

"The young man, of whom you speak so highly, was affianced, then, to your daughter?" said I to the Vrouw, when, shortly afterwards, she brought in my coffee, in a cup of enamelled Delft, almost rivalling Nankin, and by no means the worse of a certain bitter flavour of chicory, from which no coffee compounded in the Netherlands is ever free.

"Yes!—betrothed! Had he lived two months longer he would have been my son-in-law,—and God knows I loved him as such! I sometimes doubt whether the son born of her loins is dearer to a mother's heart than the man who constitutes the happiness of an only daughter!" she replied, in a tone of unusual emotion. "And Peter loved me, too—next, after poor Trincia, dearest in the world. And well he might; for he had no father or mother of his own, and neither kith nor kin that cherished him as I did. I often think, as I sit by my comfortable stove o' winter nights, and hear the wind whistling seaward over the flats, that I would give house and homestead, and all I'm worth in the world, and beg my bread for the remainder of my old days, only to have Peter Van der Heyden alive again, and my poor Trincia's face as sunny as it used to be in days of old."

"She was once lively, then, like other young people?"

"Lively?—There was not such a dancer at the Kermesses of the country round!—And then, for singing, the Harmonic company of St. Sebastian of Ypres sent her their silver medal. She has got it now, put by somewhere with a lock of Peter's hair, and a button or two cut from his jacket when he was taken out of the water. But we must not ask her to look at them. I never saw her discomposed but once since the day he was buried, and that was when one of the Bruges musicians, when dining here on his way to Courtray, asked her, joking-like, for a sight of her badge. So, when she took out the little ivory box, intending to oblige him, the sight of the other treasures was too much for her,—and down she fell her length yonder on the floor, as cold as marble. 'Twas twenty minutes or more before we could bring her back to the smallest sense of life!"

So much for trusting to appearances!—So much for the phlegmatic nature of poor Trincia Van Kerckx!

"There was every reason they should love each other dearly," resumed the good woman, returning towards the table and her domestic troubles, after bustling about the kitchen for some minutes to conceal her emotion. "Peter, as I told you before, was an orphan, brought up at Nieuport by the brother of my late husband; and, from a child, even before I laid poor Van Kerckx in the churchyard, Trincia used often to go over, and spend the Kermesse time, and other holidays, with her uncle and aunt. There, in course, she fell in with poor Van der Heyden, who was six years older than herself, and was her unfailing champion in her plays and games with the Nieuport children, when they were hard on the stranger; and when, at ten years old, he went to sea, Peter was sure to bring her home, from his voyages, something or another for a keepsake,—such trifles as are had for working or striving for—a curious shell, or marten skin, or bird, or bunch of rare sea-weed.—For poor Peter, being brought up, as one may say, for charity, had not a doit of his own to buy presents for his little playmate.

"Her father and I thought little of such matters at the time; for young Van der Heyden, having been reared at his brother's cost, the attachment the lad testified to Trincia passed for gratitude towards her aunt and uncle. Even when the little cabin-boy grew up into a comely, strapping young fellow, the presents went on, and the liking went on, without our being a bit the wiser—old oafs that we were!—For never did the Equinoctial pipe up, but Trincia would let her knitting drop into her lap, while she sat and crossed herself with an Ave for those who travel by sea or land in such weather; and one dreadful winter, when the Greenland fleet, in which Peter Van der Heyden was embarked, was a month after its time in returning, every morning, though the snow lay a foot on the ground, did Trincia rise by candle-light, and the first at Church for the Angelus! I was never there myself at that hour, in winter time—the more 's my shame;—but those who did go, told me how she used to kneel on the cold stones, poor child, praying and praying to Gon,—and to the holy apostles, who themselves suffered shipwreck in their time,—and crying all the while as though her heart would break."

"But her prayers were answered?" said I. "The fleet came back at last?"

"Came back at last;—and so well did all besides her parents understand the girl's feelings, that the first Greenlander that steered into the port, after the cheers that greeted her were over, the general cry was for Trincia Van Kerckx, who had burnt so many candles at the shrine of St. Elias for its safe arrival, and watched so many hours on the shore for a sight of its well-known sails."

"And a happy girl she must have been! But how came you at last to discover the real nature of her feelings?"

"Why, strangely enough. In the first place, do they keep, in your country, the feast of Candlemas?"

"The Catholics of my country keep it, as well as every other festival of the Church observed in Belgium," said I; "and I think I have heard it used as a legal term in old leases of property granted before the Reformation."

Mine hostess looked puzzled,—and no wonder, for I was puzzled myself.

"But you don't observe it, I suspect, for the purpose we do," said she; beginning to enumerate a variety of semi-christian, semi-pagan rites and ceremonies, nearly akin to the Hallowe'en superstitions of the Scottish peasants,—more especially that of the hemp-seed sowing of the Scottish lassie, with the view of discovering the name of her future partner for life.

"Our maidens of Vraeschoot," said the good woman, "have a foolish, old fancy of baking a troth-cake, which they leave nightly on the supper-table, with a knife and fork placed cross-ways, and bless it with a Benedicite for nine successive nights before Candlemas;—and those who have courage to enter the room as midnight strikes twelve, on the eve of Candlemas day, are said to see the shadow of their future husband sitting down to sup upon the troth-cake."

"And my friend Trincia, then, imagined she saw the figure of the bold sailor of Nieuport uncrossing the knife and fork she had laid for him?"

"Worse, worse, a thousand times! Peter, who, from his childhood upwards, had known of this custom, and perhaps, of late, heard whispers in her uncle's house that my girl was likely to make proof of her curiosity like the rest, had the audacity poor fellow, to undo the shutters of the house after all the family were abed, at the risk of Van Kerckx's blunderbuss, (with which he was never scrupulous when there was talk of robbers,) and make his way into the kitchen; so that, when Trincia crept down stairs at midnight for the completion of the spell on Candlemas eve, who should be sitting in the chair, with the cake cut in two in the dish before him, and dressed out in his Sunday suit and new glazed hat, but Peter Van der Heyden, in living flesh and blood!"

"More welcome than a thousand shadows!" said I, with the laugh expected from me.

"Her father didn't think so, I promise you;—and, though there was no longer a question of powder and shot, when, on being alarmed by his daughter's shrieks, he rushed into the kitchen, and found the arms of his brother's protégé clasped round Trincia's neck, my husband gave the young man so proper a thrashing, that poor Peter's bones must have ached for it a month or more."

"And your daughter's sympathy on the occasion of course gave grounds for suspicion that she was not displeased at the result of her Candlemas incantations?"

"This time you have guessed right!" said the good-humoured hostess. "Poor Trincia got her share of her father's strappings, for trying to interpose betwixt him and Peter; and from that day to the day that witnessed their troth-plight, there was neither rest nor peace for my poor daughter."

"For a courtship that commenced so stormily," said I, "her father and mother do not appear to have been very unrelenting. How soon was your consent obtained?"

"Alas! her poor father's consent was never obtained! It was not likely Van Kerckx should be pleased at the idea of marrying his only child to a penniless mariner; and though Van der Heyden promised, again and again, never to claim her hand till his voyages and the labour of his hands enabled him to give her a decent maintenance, my husband would not hear of it. He disliked the thought of the match and the man. The courtship began, he always said, under evil auspices. For, though a publican, Van Kerckx was a grave man, a churchwarden, and averse to jesting upon even superstitions of religious origin. 'For those who commence,' he used to say, 'with mocking the holy things that are little, will end by mocking holy things that are great:' and so that foolish boy-and-girl-joke about the troth-cake on Candlemas eve was mightily displeasing to him."

Remembering the aphorism of a greater man than mine host of the Korren Bloem, that "he who, in his youth, derides the spilling of the salt, will, in his age, deride the overthrow of the altar,"

I made no comment on the Van Kerckxical pragmaticality; but was surprised to learn that Trincia, contrary to all continental custom, should have persevered in an attachment unsanctioned by her parents.

"Why, bless you! she had not long for disobedience," replied the Vrouw, in answer to my remark to this effect. "Within three months Van Kerckx was in his coffin! Not, as many folks fancied, from the effects of a cold caught in jumping out of his warm bed, and rushing, half-naked, into the kitchen on a cold Candlemas eve, but from a long-standing liver-complaint,—your Flemish tapsters' sure and certain ending."

"And when he was gone, you were moved to compassion by your daughter's faithful affection for her old playmate?"

"This time—wrong! It was the old playmate who was moved to compassion: it was I and Trincia who were to be pitied! Would you believe it?—scarcely was my goodman in his grave, when his brother, the rich drysalter of Nieuport, who had always lived on the best of terms with us, pretended to turn me out of my house and home, on pretext of being the next male heir, according to an old custom of the canton. The law knows best on such matters; and the law, I was resolved, should decide between us. But while the plea was pending, before the meeting of the county assizes at Ypres, most people gave it against me and the poor girl, and predicted that it was all over with us; and that, having provoked the enmity of the heir-at-law, on whom we were dependent, we should assuredly come to want! For as prosperous as you see us now and surrounded by friends, (as the prosperous ever are,) I can promise you that at that time everybody, even our cousin Tony Van Kerckx and his wife, looked askance at us when, of an evening, we took our way through the town to pray our prayer on Van Kerckx's grave, who little thought, poor fellow! to what evil he was leaving us. And who was it stood our friend?—Who dared to battle it out, pray, with the drysalter, and call his conduct by the name it deserved? Why, even the young man who had eaten of his bread, and drunk of his cup; and who, at the certainty of being scoffed as an ingrate by his fellow-townsmen, ventured to turn round upon him and tell him the truth!"

"At the risk of being turned out of doors by your brother-in-law?"

"Not he!—from the moment the claim was set up, he had turned himself out of doors; and the first thing Peter did, on becoming homeless, was to come and offer me all the little earnings of his industry, by way of helping our plea; for you see the seals of the authorities were upon every shred of property belonging to the deceased, till the cause should be decided in court."

"Poor fellow!—the amount of his assistance must have been moderate enough."

"'Twas all he had!—a king could have done no more! But this generosity was not all. On learning how bad were our prospects, instead of going off with the Newfoundlanders, as usual—their wages being small, and their hazards also trifling—Van der Heyden, for the first time, became helmsman to a smuggling vessel; and having already a great name as a mariner, he now trebled his gains, as his treble risks entitled him. All that he achieved that winter, were I to relate to you, you would not believe! All we suffered, while he was braving these desperate hazards, you will more readily credit. Before our cause so much as came on, poor Trincia, by want of sleep and want of appetite, was fretted to a skeleton! And yet, I don't know how it was, but when, at a year's close, and being removed from tribunal to tribunal, and swelling the gaping purses of the lawyers, till our name of Van Kerckx must have been a pleasure for them to hear,—the plea was decided in favour of the widow and daughter, she seemed to have grown so habituated to the casualties of the life Peter had embraced, or, to say the truth, was so vain-glorious of the great name his bravery had acquired along the coast, that she ceased to remonstrate against his perseverance. He had enrolled himself, for a couple of years, in a smuggling company at Nieuport, at a salary doubling what poor Van Kerckx ever gained in a year from the best-kept tap in the district; and it was finally settled between the young folks, that he should serve out his time; and at the end on't, they were to be married, and take possession of this house, leaving me my comfortable stool by the corner of the stove, for the remainder of my happy days."

"He became, in short, a desperate and notorious smuggler?"

"An eminent smuggler!—Ask the Comptroller of the Customs at Nieuport, if ever he had such an enemy to deal with as Peter Van der Heyden! Yes!—now I think on't, he had one,—one who is at no great distance from you at this moment."

Mechanically I turned towards the half-open door of the drinking-room adjoining the kitchen, expecting to see some vestige of one of those figures in frieze pilot-coats, with wide-mouthed boots, and cutlass in belt, with which the children of the Belgic coast are frightened into obedience, as pirates and smugglers. But there was not so much as the shadow of a man under Vrouw van Kerckx's roof at that moment.

"There are none here, to-day, but you and I," said I. "For my own part, I plead guiltless. It must be you, then, my good hostess, who have waged war against the douaniers of Nieuport."

"Look again," replied Vrouw Van Kerckx, with a smile.

I obeyed her, and still saw nothing stirring in the room but the little Dutch sentry pacing the dial of the old cuckoo-clock.

"Nevertheless," persisted she, in reply to my shrug of incredulity, "I promise you that you have one of the most desperate smugglers in Belgium within half a foot of your chair. Alienor!" cried she—"Alienor!" And, at her call, up started a favourite old dog, lying under the table, and went, stretching, yawning, and deliberately wagging its grizzly tail, towards her, as if reluctantly roused from some dream of former exploits. I had often noticed the passionate fondness of Trincia for the poor beast, as scarcely consonant with the sober serenity of her deportment. How was I to guess that this dog was all that remained to her of her lost lover; that its lameness was a disablement arising from a wound received in his defence?

"You have heard, I suppose, of our famous smuggling dogs?" said the Vrouw, almost as much surprised at my new avowal of ignorance as she had been at that respecting her daughter's love for Peter Van der Heyden. "Not heard of our smuggling dogs?—not seen them? Then, I can tell you, you have a curious spectacle to make acquaintance with; and no one at Vraeschoot, perhaps, so well able to procure it for you as myself. In the first place, you may admire Alienor, as the very type and model of the breed. Alienor's pups have been sold for as much as a couple of hundred francs a-piece before they could see!"

"The price of a pony in my country," said I.

"Ay! but such dogs as those pups are pretty sure to turn out, would earn the worth of half-a-dozen ponies here on the frontier," replied the Vrouw.

"I always took her for a setter," said I, beginning to examine, with some curiosity, the animal, which was affectionately thrusting its head into the roomy lap of the hostess, who, in her turn, fondly caressed its cropped ears. "Yet, on the whole, I perceive Alienor rather resembles our Northern sheep-dogs, though of stronger build."

"Strong enough, I promise you,—as you would own if you had ever seen her laden for a smuggling expedition in former days."

"With a false skin?" said I, recollecting anecdotes I had heard of lace smuggled between the two skins of a poodle, just as the despatches of Hofer were passed through the enemy's camp during the Tyrolean war.

"No! Packed upon her back, like a sumpter-mule. The frontier smuggling dogs, as I was about to tell you, having been carefully trained to the calling, are kept in packs of twenty, thirty, or more; and on the nights favourable to the purpose, loaded with contraband goods,—tea, tobacco, lace, cambric, what you will, and loosed from the villages nearest the frontier.—Off they go, at a steady trot; and are never at fault, and rarely known to come to harm; but pelt straight across the country, to the houses t'other side the frontier, where they have been trained to deposit their merchandize; and, till the two countries are rich enough to afford a line of douaniers standing close as infantry companies on a field-day, never will they be able to defeat these shrewd and steady contrabandiers. Thousands and thousands of florins' worth of Flanders lace has Alienor smuggled into France, to dress out the fine ladies of Paris;—hasn't thou, my good old wench?"—said Dame Kerckx, sportively seizing by its white beard the intelligent-looking head of the animal resting on her knee.

"And now she enjoys, it seems, the privilege of a holiday after her labours."

"And a well-earned one!—Moreover, there are a couple of scores, or more, of her race still in and about Vraeschoot, labouring in her old vocation," continued the hostess. "Couldn't one swear, from the twinkling of her old eyes, she knew all I was telling you?"—

"She certainly looks very much like a Chelsea pensioner listening to old Waterloo stories," said I.

"Ay, ay!—Waterloo, Waterloo! You English have always Waterloo in your mouths!" cried the old lady; "and sweet enough the word ought to be, to take away the bitter taste of certain other English expeditions, with which we Flemings are familiar. 'Twas in my father's house your Duke of York lodged when he brought his guards to knock their heads against the French troops, the night before the——But the less said on the subject the better," said she, perceiving my countenance change. "Better talk about Alienor! Her victories, at least, are undeniable. Do not suppose, however, that it is in consideration of them, or of the profits derived from them, she has the best place by the stove, and a cut of every joint that smokes on our table. 'Tis not for that, my old wench, is it, that poor Trincia knit thee the lamb's-wool rug, which now replaces, in winter time, for thy old bones, the straw good enough for thy bed so long as thou wast young and hearty? 'Twasn't for that, old Alienor, was it—was it?"

And at this direct appeal, the old dog began to wag its tail in double-quick time, by way of alacrity in reply.

"No, no! It was because Peter loved thee, and because thou didst love Peter. Poor Peter!—poor Peter!"—And at the sound of that well-known name, the faithful animal desisted from its joyous movement, and looked up wistfully into the eyes of the Vrouw, not for an instant erecting its ears, or glancing at the door, as dogs will do on mention of the name of their living master. Alienor knew as well that Peter Van der Heyden was gone for ever, as Trincia knew it, who had seen him laid in the grave!

"You are to know," resumed the Vrouw, once more addressing herself to me instead of the dog, "that thrice was this stanch adherent wounded in defence of her master. The exploits of our smuggling dogs are not confined to land. The most valuable species is that which, like Alienor, combining a cross of the Newfoundland, takes the water boldly. For these are embarked at Nieuport and elsewhere, and, being thrown into the sea off the French coast, swim straight to land, their merchandize being packed in tin, to secure it against the salt water.—Our old favourite here, being one of the strongest and bravest of the water-dogs, and, moreover, the pet of the famous Peter Van der Heyden, was often admitted upon expeditions from which the rest were excluded; and twice did she save her master, the good old wench, by setting her fangs into the legs of the douaniers, when they were three to one upon Peter."

"And it was in one of these struggles he lost his life?" said I.

"I was coming to that in time. The longest story has an end, for those who have patience to wait.—But won't you try a glass of kirsch-geist after your coffee, or Schiedam, five-and-twenty years in bottle? No? Well, you're right!—Genuine coffee, like ours, needs no lacing. And, by the way, among the dry goods despatched by the Nieuporters over the frontier, is sure to be a few pounds of genuine Mocha, for the lady of the Governor of Lisle, who is curious in her coffee, and won't stand Bourbon. We get it from Smyrna by the Maltese vessels freighted with oranges from Messina; and what you have been drinking is genuine. But, as I was saying, poor Peter, in spite of all the predictions of the government officers, was not, at last, the victim of the coast or frontier guard. Would that it had been so! I could almost say, would that it had been so! I have already told you, or meant to tell you, how high and low fell upon Peter for his ingratitude towards the benefactor who had reared him, by siding with Trincia and her mother against the kinsman who unnaturally attempted to despoil them of their lawful rights;—most folks holding that, knave or honest, it was his duty to abide by Jehann Van Kerckx. Even when, on attaining an independence, the lad was careful to despatch to his patron, to the last doit, every florin expended on his maintenance, they still looked upon him as an ingrate; though, Heaven knows, as many kicks and hard words had been bestowed upon Peter, in the course of every year of his boyhood, as there are saints in the kalendar! Still, I admit that, but for Jehann's malpractices towards his brother's widow, the lad would have remained his household slave for ever; nay, the question being set at rest, our rights established, and Jehann proved an evil-dealer, it only needed for him to get into trouble, for the strong arm of Peter to be uplifted in his benefactor's defence."

"And such a man as Jehann, I conclude, was often getting into trouble?"

"Often? Better say that he was never out of it! We Flemings pass in other countries for stockfish; and, to all appearance, many of us are taciturn and phlegmatic enough. But the Flemish head that once gets a wrong turn, is warped for ever; and the Flemish temper that once takes fire, goes smouldering on like a flax-heap, smoking and smoking till all is consumed. Now, Jehann Van Kerckx had taken a spite at his brother's rightful heirs; and, of course, doubly at Peter, as our avowed champion. One unlucky night Peter had been over to Vraeschoot to say us good-bye, because about to sail for Nantes on an expedition after the next day, which was the feast of St. Sebastian, (the patron of our Flemish bowmen;) so that on the morrow, the lugger was to set sail. Alienor was with him,—poor beast! and there he sat, just in the old ebony chair where you are sitting now, with a glass of Faro on the table before him, and the dog at his feet,—asking coaxingly of Trincia, (who was down in the mouth at the thoughts of the week's absence or more that was to divide them,) whether he should bring her from France a Croix de Jeamnette, or a pair of the light sabots for which Brittany is famous,—and in which a duchess might dance at a coronation ball. Trincia, poor child, answered only by smiles,—smiles that were as nearly like tears, if I may say so, as smiles could be. And at last, when he had been joking and funning like, about how he would be sure to dance with the prettiest girl at the ducasse, if there was one within five leagues of Nantes, during his stay,—my daughter, instead of humouring the joke, as she was apt to do any joke of Peter's, went straight up to him, as I never saw her do before, and drawing aside the heavy curls from his forehead, imprinted a silent kiss upon it. She has often told me since, how, all the time he was speaking, an evil omen seemed to ring in his voice,—and that, when she so abruptly gave him that unasked-for kiss, she felt as if pressing her lips to the dead!—For my part I can't say I felt more on the occasion than I always felt when poor dear Peter was on the eve of a cruise; only I must admit, that when the time came for shutting up the tap, and for Van der Heyden to take leave, and he came as usual to call for Alienor, the poor beast, instead of bounding forward to his voice as she usually did, (didn't you, my lass?—didn't you, my good old Alienor?)—was nowhere to be found; and after a long search, lo! and behold, she had skulked up into Trincia's chamber, and lay asleep beside the bed, and even made a hard ado to quit the post when summoned by her master, as though she had a presentiment of coming evil. And who can say what instincts may be vouchsafed to dogs? We know they are truer friends than mankind—why not truer prophets? However, not to bother our brains with surmising what wiser than ourselves will never be able to decide, by eleven of the clock the house was shut, and Peter on his road, and Trincia in her bed; not sleeping, however,—for often has she tried to describe to me the restless painful confusion of ideas that kept her eyes open the greater part of that unhappy night."

"Peter Van der Heyden met with mischance, then, on his way back to Nieuport."

"Not he!—He trudged gaily back, whistling through the moonlight, and arrived safe and sound in his own lodgings, beside the sea-gate of the town. But let me tell you my story in my own way. Let me tell it as it came to my own knowledge. Next morning being, as you will have borne in mind, the festival of St. Sebastian, (and you doubtless remember, since you say the English Catholics observe our festivals of the Church, that St. Sebastian's day is the 20th of January,) my daughter came down to breakfast with heavy swollen eyelids;—and when I tried to laugh her out of countenance, by taxing her with having cried over her pillow, because of Peter's departure, she attributed her dejection to the cold.—And cold enough in truth it was;—three days' frost upon the top of a heavy snow: so that such of the Vraeschoot farmers as were bound for Nieuport to assist at the mass of St. Sebastian, or the supper that was to take place afterwards, and were too lazy to walk, were forced to set off in their sledges. Well! will you believe it? Nothing would serve Trincia but she must accompany her cousin Tony Van Kerckx, who was of the number, and whose wife declared that the wind was too piercing over the marshes, for her to venture. 'But why?' said I. 'What would you at Nieuport?' If there were prize-shooting going on, or dancing, or anything worth seeing or hearing, you might go, and welcome. But this supper is to take place at the coffee-house on the ramparts; and though Peter certainly said the band of the regiment in garrison would attend to cheer the company of St. Sebastian with military music during their repast, be assured no women will be admitted."

"I care neither for prize-shooting, nor dancing, nor drum, nor fife!" replied the girl. "I shall go straight, dear mother, to the house of Peter's sister, in the Market Place, and stay there with Aloyxia and the children, till my cousin Tony calls to take me home."

"And what, then, is your object in going?" said I.

"Cannot you guess, mother?" replied Trincia, with her white forehead nearly as red as her cheeks.

"But you saw him only last night," I replied, rightly interpreting her blush.

"I did, I did! But if ever in your early days you parted from my father, admit that when he was away —away at a great distance—twenty-four hours more or less of his company seemed an enjoyment to be bought with millions! I want to see Peter again before he goes. I dare not tell you, for you are in a laughing vein this morning, what a dread has come over my soul. I am not often anxious, mother; but I know,—yes, dear mother, I feel and KNOW—that evil is at hand! Let me go, I beseech you, and bid one more good-bye to Peter."

"I was not in the habit then, any more than I am now, of thwarting the wishes of my dutiful and excellent daughter. So I even complied with her earnest entreaties; and having lent her my furred capuchon in addition to her own quilted faille of black merinos; and having adjured our kinsman to be careful over her, of which I was no whit afraid, away she went with him, to be in time for the grand mass; and a doleful long day it seemed to me without her. The snow had so drifted in the night, that there was no setting foot on it; and within doors, the stove clicked and crackled with the frost; and that was all the sound I heard the whole day long, amid the general muffle of the weather, unless when the carillon of Vraeschoot set up its little tinkling chime at noon in honour of St. Sebastian, as though it chose to have a voice in the matter of the archers' patron, as well as e'er a belfry in Flanders!

"The latest of our Flemish carouses terminate at an hour you English call early. This bowmen's banquet was to take place at four o'clock; and with all the Faro like to be drunk on the occasion, and all the marches to be played by the band, at seven all would be over; and an hour over the snow on such a moonlight night, with a horse so stout as Tony's, would bring my daughter to my door. Nine struck, however; and, at half-past, according to custom, rang the curfew; but still, no Trincia! At length, I closed the house as usual, after seeing, as well as the moonlight would allow, all the lights in the town expire one by one. But still,—still no sledge!—By degrees, I grew alarmed. Clear as was the night, the whiteness of the snow was so dazzling, that nothing could be easier than for a driver to get off the road; and the ditches, though hard frozen, were very inadequate to bear the weight of a market-sledge. Moreover, there is a canal to be crossed twice betwixt this and Nieuport: and what with the chance of overstepping the road, undiscernible in the snow; and the probability that, having overstepped it, a driver who had been dining with half-a-hundred jovial companions would find his way with his charge to the bottom of the canal,—my mind so misgave me, that spite of the bitterness of the night, and having lent my capuchon to Trincia, I determined to set off and meet them by the way."

"I do not wonder. I should have done as much in your place."

"And, oh! what piercing blasts would you have had to encounter, when, after passing the embankments of Vraeschoot, the salt marshes lay before you like a glacier! How the wind shrieked and screamed like a witch at her mischief! About half a league from the town, too, there mingled with its shrill whistle, a still stranger noise,—the cackling of a prodigious flight of wild geese, such as is often on the wing in frosty moonlight nights in these countries. Still I went on, and on; but no signs of the sledge! No marks on the snow fallen since morning, of either hoof or wheel! Not a vehicle could have returned to Vraeschoot from the supper. This was at least some comfort. Yet I could not help fancying that some evil must have chanced in Nieuport to detain them; and being now nerved to the cold, so that my old frame glowed again, I pursued my way;—satisfied that one or other of the sledges,—the first I happened to encounter,—would find room for me homewards.

"None, however,—not one,—was I destined to meet; and nearly two hours must have gone over my head, and more than two leagues under my feet, when at a distance, beyond the glacis, which was imperceptible from the self-colour of the snow, I saw the fanal or beacon-light of the harbour of Nieuport!—Ah! it was a joyful sight;—not joyful, indeed, as that of the sledge would have been, bearing back my child safe and sound,—but enough to make my old heart dance within me!

"Right glad was I to reach the gates. Though little had I ever expected to approach them in the dead of night, on foot, alone, and in a mood like one distracted!—For you may guess that a thousand vague terrors on the girl's account, had, by this time, added themselves to my anxiety,—she, who never in her born days had slept a night from under my roof, save under that of her good aunt, —now too much our enemy to have invited her to play the truant thus!—What was I to think!—

"'Twas no surprise to me, meanwhile, to find the drawbridge up, and be challenged by the sentinel. 'A friend,' did not suffice me as password to obtain admittance. He asked my name; and when I answered Lottje Van Kerckx, instead of demanding my passport, as I expected the next affront would be, said it was 'right well.' Instantly the bridge was lowered; and, as I went over and passed under the gateway, he bade me 'haste or I should be too late,' as though he supposed me to be bound on some especial errand. I had half a mind to ask him whether the St. Sebastian supper had been kept up till an unusually late hour, or whether anything sinister had occurred. But, somehow or other, the question stuck in my throat. For the life and soul of me, I could not utter a syllable!"—

"You are agitated even now!—Compose yourself! compose yourself!—You shall tell me the rest of your interesting story another time," said I,—trusting, however, that she would scorn to profit by the permission; for I was greatly interested,—the more so that, from the strange eager face with which poor Alienor stood listening almost as anxiously as myself, one might really have fancied she understood every word of the narration, in which the familiar names of Peter and Trincia so often recurred.

"I pushed my way straight to the market-place,"—resumed Vrouw Van Kerckx,—"where abided Peter's sister; and so silent were the deserted streets, that the sound of my sabots on the beaten snow seemed to bring echoes from the houses. But, if you'll believe me, eager as I was for a sight of my poor girl's face, no sooner did I come within view of the dwelling of Van der Heyden's sister, Aloyxsia, than I would have given much to be assured there was no Trincia Van Kerckx within her doors!—For late, or rather early, as it was, (the small hours were passing,) and dark as was every other house and homestead in the town of Nieuport, that one was bright in every window! Feeling sure, therefore, that some sort of junket or festivity was going on—perhaps a masked dancing-bout, (for the carnival had begun,) I dreaded lest I should find my girl had, for the first time, deceived me; and that her real errand to the town had been to join the revellers at the house of her sister-in-law."

"I am convinced you wronged her!"

"Wronged her,—poor unhappy child!—That did I, indeed! So far from having a bad motive for her excursion, heaven itself must have inspired her with the impulse to visit Nieuport that day; for otherwise, she had never beheld Peter Van der Heyden's loving face again!—Those lights—those fatal lights that streamed from his sister's windows—were the tapers burning round his corpse!"

"Alas! poor Trincia!"

"She was not, at that moment, so much to be pitied; for when I entered the house, the press and movement of the strangers who filled it was towards one of the upper rooms, into which they had removed my daughter; and there she lay, lifeless as marble, on the bed, going from one fainting fit into another;—so that the doctors, who had been summoned to poor Van der Heyden, were busy by her side, suggesting first one thing, then another,—and evidently in some alarm lest all their remedies should fail. At first, you may suppose, all my care was for her; for on asking the first person I met on the stair for Trincia Van Kerckx, I was taken straight to the room where she lay by those who fancied I must, of course, know all that had befallen; and so long as I saw her lie insensible before me, (an only child—I never had another,) my heart and soul were in her revival;—so that I never so much as cared to ask what had brought her to that state. 'She was dying!' they said. To me what mattered it why! At last,—more than an hour after my arrival, and when the agony of my mind had changed the frozen condition in which I entered the house into such a state of excitement as made the big drops fall from my forehead like rain,—the poor child opened her heavy eyes;—yea, opened them, and knew me;—for her first movement was to raise to her lips my hand that was fondly clasping hers,—and then, the first sound she uttered was the name of poor Peter; but so faintly—so very faintly, that I was forced to bend down my ear to her pillow that I might catch the words she was muttering.

"Where is he—where is Peter?" said I, turning to the person nearest me. "Can't somebody fetch him?—He was to sup with the company of St. Sebastian."

"The person I addressed (one of his sister's neighbours) stared at me as though I were possessed; and put her finger to her lips in token of silence.

"Have they quarrelled, then?" said I, in a whisper,—now fancying I understood the cause of Trincia's illness. "Have he and my daughter had any words? No wonder the poor child is in this state!"

"No wonder, indeed!" replied the woman. "But hush!—She is conscious now, and will hear you.—Do not mention his name!"

"She was conscious; for she stretched out her poor arms towards me, till they were clasped round my neck; and in a piteous voice besought me to take her to Peter. I told her she was not strong enough to move,—that the doctors, on quitting the house on the first symptom of her amendment, had desired she should, on no account, attempt to rise.

"I must—I MUST see him again!" was Trincia's frantic answer.

"You shall see him, my child!—He shall come to YOU,—I will send for him!" said I. "Whatever misunderstanding may have arisen between you, lovers' quarrels are but the renewing of love; and Peter will come if I make it a request of mine.—Never, for a moment, did he fail towards me in the duty of a son!"

"Before I had done speaking, my poor girl's arms were suddenly unloosed from my neck; and back she fell again upon the pillow from which she had upraised herself, as cold as a stone.

"I warned you to hold your peace!" said the woman who was assisting me. "I knew her fits would come on again, if you mentioned his name!"

"Why, you heard her ask to see him? She at least bears him no malice. If he were here, his voice would revive her twice as soon as the burnt feathers you are holding to her nose."

"May be, it would,—poor fellow!—But Peter Van der Heyden's voice she will never hear again!"

"Never hear again?"

"Why, is it possible you don't know what has happened?——Listen, listen! do you not hear the priests' voices below?"

"I obeyed, and heard a mournful chanting from the ground-floor rooms! My heart sickened within me!—It was the Psalm of Intercession for the dead.

"Poor Aloyxsia's first thought, when others sent for the doctor, was to send for the priests!" observed my companion, shrugging her shoulders; "as if they could do anything at such a moment, except add to the general confusion!"

"My poor Peter—my own dear, precious son!" cried I, losing sight of the temporary evil before me in this far greater misfortune. "Dearest Trincia!—no wonder I find her thus!"

"No wonder, indeed!—And for any comfort she will henceforward find in this world, as well for her, perhaps, if she never opened her eyes again!" replied the woman,—still continuing to bathe my daughter's temples with vinegar. "They did love each other most dearly—ay! and from children upwards!"

"I, who was full of my own grief at that moment, could have smitten the foolish woman for seeming to say, it were better my child should have died with Peter. However, not to keep you in further suspense, (since you can well figure to yourself all the care we bestowed on the restoration of that poor girl,) suffice it, that when morning dawned, I was able to leave her for a moment, and comply with Aloyxsia's wish, that I should go, like the others, and throw holy water on the dead. But that ceremony was not enough for me! Having fulfilled the duties of religion towards him, in spite of the presence of the lay vicar who remained reciting his breviary in a corner of the room, I took his clay-cold hand in mine, and parted his wet and matted locks, even as I had seen my daughter do the preceding night, to press my lips to his poor forehead,—colder than the ice I had been traversing to reach that heart-breaking spectacle! At that moment he looked so tranquil,—so happy,—there was such a sweet, melancholy smile upon his countenance,—that one might almost have thought he enjoyed the grief we were enduring. Yes! I felt that never, in his life-time, had I loved him as I did then! My child that was to have been!—my brave, kind, thoughtful, devoted son!"

And covering her face with her clasped hands, Vrouw Van Kerckx began to sob distractedly, as though the dreadful scene were again passing before her; while poor Alienor, moved by her distress, and seemingly understanding its origin, uttered a sort of low whining cry, till the good woman recovered herself sufficiently to withdraw one of her hands from her face, and place it caressingly on the head of the faithful dog.

"Poor Alienor might tell you all this as well as I, if she could speak!" she resumed, after fondling the animal;—"for there she lay, at the foot of the table on which they had placed the body of her master;—shivering with the freezing waters she had not courage to shake from her coat,—shivering and miserable, conscious as any present that the kindly soul on which she was dependent was gone for ever,—that she should never be caressed again by the hand of Peter Van der Heyden!—Lord—Lord!—why do I dwell upon it all!—How have I the heart to dwell upon it!"

"Let us say no more, then, on the subject," said I; "though, I confess, I am most eager to learn how that brave fellow came by his untimely end!"

(To be concluded in our next.)

FEAST OF THE POETS FOR SEPTEMBER 1843.

The duty which devolves upon us in the passing year is wholly one of ease and pleasure. The honoured guests whom we have at this time to marshal to their places at our Banquet require no elaborate introduction. Their names, whether baptismal or as they are registered in our pages, are already "dear and familiar" to our readers. No preliminary flourish of trumpets is required to awaken attention to a first Horatian attempt by the Corn-Law Rhymer; to a voice issuing from the grave of the Ettrick Shepherd, bewailing the untimely loss of him whom Scott has lamented as "a light too soon extinguished;" to the animated descant of J. S. B. on the brave field of Rullion Green; or to the varied lyric effusions bearing to your younger readers—may we not say it?—the charmed initials of L. D., V., G. P., J. A. O., and others equally beloved and welcome, that have now for many successive years graced our pages.

To the present Feast, we have very sparingly introduced fresh guests. Among so many young candidates for laurels, it is not always easy to choose. Let not those, however, who find no place be either too deeply disappointed, nor at all dejected. We permit them to be as angry as they please; while reflecting that, for each and all of them who shall be found to deserve it, "there is a braw time comin';" and a manly spirit—and every true poet must first be a man—would scorn to wish for more. Besides this solid and broad ground of encouragement, the composition of poetry, or even mere verse-meting, the stringing together of the veriest doggrel rhymes, is, we hold, eminently improving and self-rewarding, if the tuneful art is exercised without that very extravagant or over-weening conceit of the writer's crudest performances, which, while it makes him ridiculous, satisfactorily demonstrates his inherent incapacity for better things.

To disappointed young candidates, for all of whom we feel a peculiar tenderness, we shall make, as we imagine, a completely satisfactory vindication of their sentence of temporary, or be it perpetual, exclusion from our Feast, when we frankly avow, that had Byron sent us his first verses for our Banquet of this Anno Domini 1843, we must have proved as dull and unprescient as Edinburgh Reviewers, and have rejected them; though (every gentle Muse, and every reverential feeling forbid!) we could no more have sneered at them than have ridiculed the first attempts of an infant to walk alone. Nay, had Burns sent us the reputed first-fruits of his muse—

> In Mauchline there dwells
> Five handsome young belles—

we very much fear that we should have been so entirely destitute of clairvoyance, as to have subjected them to the same cold treatment.

Like these two great lights, and like other distinguished poets of small and crude beginnings, some of our nameless correspondents may largely possess the Heaven-given gift of poetic genius; but until their light shall shine forth in some one striking manifestation, though but a sudden and fitful flash, we are compelled to delay judgment. Let this be received as a general answer to all who do us the honour to request our critical opinion as to their untried, or faintly-indicated powers; and as a civil, if tacit, reply as to our estimate of certain performances submitted to us with many hopes and fears—and likewise with

"Gentle wishes long subdued, Subdued and cherish'd long,"— for immediate publication in our indulgent columns.

And now, without further preface, we proceed to the more agreeable—to the wholly agreeable part of our pleasant office.

PART I.

MISCELLANEOUS.

NAPOLEON AT THE INVALIDES.

A RECOLLECTION OF PARIS IN 1842.

Φεῦ, τοῦ θανόντος ὡς ταχεῖά τις χάρις
Χάρις διαρρεῖ, καὶ προδοῦσ' ἀλίσκεται.—Sophoc. Ajax.

No life! 'tis fever all, a maniac's heat,
Whose mirth affrights, and sleep of palsy tells!—
Oh! from this glare, the tramp of shameless feet,
The loud pretence, the din of Folly's bells,
Turns thy worn spirit, thirsting but to meet
Some breeze unstained, some place where Silence dwells!
Then come! in yonder pile, to earth inclined,
With one grave image calm thy aching mind!

Napoleon sleeps in Paris! on the shore
Where his last murmurs for a soldier's grave
In earth beloved, his captors did implore
Too long in vain!—till Hate at length forgave,
And monarchs trembled at his dust no more,
When, sought with seeming homage, o'er the wave
Again the Exile to his home was borne,
And France uprose to greet his third return.

Beneath the dome that shields what War could spare
Of his grim bands, the Warrior's bed they made;
The trophies of a hundred battles are
His peerless pillow; at his feet is laid
The sceptre-sword no feebler son shall bare:
Alone, in memories of his might arrayed,
He sleeps:—no borrowed pomp, or bootless line
Degrades, as yet, the plain majestic shrine.

So rests the Great Destroyer! But the race
That knew his voice are gone, or kneel to-day
At meaner feet; and petty hands efface
From all his thrones the traces of his sway;—
The wanderer to his stately resting-place,
Save some pale annalist or veteran grey,
Beholds no pilgrim there, that bends in grief
O'er the cold relics of the wondrous chief.

The Sent of Gaul! the Idol bright and dread
Whom France adored;—and thrill'd by each recoil
Of the torn hosts that roll'd beneath his tread,
Grew drunk with pride!—His glories and his toil
Were lavish'd on her brow: his triumphs fed
Her heart with joy, her temples fill'd with spoil
Of fifty realms:—and now—can France afford
No more remembrance to her buried sword!

I saw one pilgrim in the motley crowd,
Who frowned; methought recalling him he saw
Of yore—his chief—a sunbeam through the cloud
Lurid with battle; or beheld him draw
His harrow o'er the necks of Kaisers bowed
With fear;—in days when legions asked no law
But his brief word, no guerdon but his smile,
To shake the world from Weser to the Nile,

At once the shadows o'er that silent clay
Which late was empire, vanished from his sight:
And crowned by France in one imperial day,
He saw him rise:—or radiant in the light
Of Austerlitz,—or towering where the way
Looks down on Italy!—and hail'd at night
By the red watch-fires with a soldier's cheer,
Again he dreamed that wondrous voice to hear!

And like a charger at the trumpet's call
He started,—all forgotten that before
His eyes lay darkling:—but perchance the pall
Stirred in the wind, or on the hollow floor
Some ruder footstep echoed through the hall:—
'Twas gone!—he woke to sadness, saddened more
By that brief dream:—as o'er a midnight waste
The clouds seem darker when the lightning 's past.

He woke, and gazed around. A vulgar few
Were striving at the grate, and peering in Eager and shameless, like the rankest crew
That brawl for pastime till the sports begin:
While one, that guides for hire the idler's view,
Rehearsed his droning story 'midst the din,
As in some stroller's show, where nought restrains
The meanest gazers, and the meanest gains.

One, too, was there, an alien, and a son
Of England, her, of all that warrior's foes
The fellest and the last; whose hand alone
Was never spread for respite, and from whose
Sea-citadel recoil'd his power o'ergrown,
Like angry waves that break in fruitless blows;—
The land he hated most, and most pursued
With vain despite, and bitterness of feud.—

Yet only, midst them all, that one drew nigh
Where humbled lay his country's direst foe,
With bated footsteps, and regardful eye
Cast on the bier and banners laid below,
And sighed: "alas! great heart, that swelled so high,
Shrunk to this urn! the majesty and show
That dazzled myriads, spent, and narrow'd all
To this pale niche, a coffin and a pall!"

—Not that he loved his country least; or shared
In the dull ecstasy of eyes grown dim
With gazing on the orb of power; nor cared
For all the gold that hides the aspect grim
Of Wrong, and coins it Glory;—but compared
The rise and exit—all that spoke of him
To Time—his own vast wishes—and the doom,
A few cold ashes, a neglected Tomb!

And as it were some vision, face to face
Before him rose the fate that flings aside
The bravest daring of a pigmy race,
And bids the dust to which they turn deride
The nothingness, and pains, and shallow space
Of even the Gods of Time! For such, he cried,
Were the quick wonders, and the giant throes
Of this, the greatest;—such the chilling close!—

And, weeping, turned away! The veteran eyed
The heedless crowd; it stung with treble smart,
That midst their mirth untimed his country's pride
Should wake a stranger's pity:—but his heart
Was opened towards him,—silent, side by side
They left the tomb, and seem'd in love to part;—
For kindred grief the alien's soil forgave,
And made them brothers at the warrior's grave! V.

WHO IS MY NEIGHBOUR?

Thy neighbour who? son of the wild?
"All who, with me, the desert roam;
The freemen sprung from Abram's child,
Whose sword 's his life, a tent his home—
Whose steeds, with mine, have drunk the well
Of Hagar and of Ishmael."

Thy neighbour who? oh tell me, thou,
With burning cheek, and eyes of flame!—
"The iron breast—the dauntless brow—
The souls that Persia could not tame;

The free—the brave—by me led on—
The conquering bands of Marathon!"

Who were thy neighbours? name them, thou,
The sire of academic lore—
There 's something on thy noble brow
Bespeaks a spirit that can soar;
The echoes tell—while Plato smiles,
"The free of Doric lands and isles."

Who is our neighbour? Ask at Rome
The marble bust—the mould'ring heaps;—
At Ctesiphon, the Parthan's home—
His bow 's now broke, his charger sleeps—
At every mound that awes or shocks,
From Indus to the Grampian rocks.

A voice comes o'er the northern wave—
A voice from many a palmy shore—
Our neighbour who? "The free—the brave—
Our brother clansmen, red with gore,
Who battled on our left or right,
With fierce goodwill and giant might."

Who, then, 's our neighbour? Son of God,
In meekness and in mildness come!—
Oh! shed the light of life abroad,
And burst the cerements of the tomb!
Then bid earth's rising myriads move
From land to land on wings of love.

Our neighbour's home 's in every clime
Of sun-bright tint, or darker hue,—
The home of man since ancient time,
The bright green isles, 'mid oceans blue;
Or rocks, where clouds and tempests roll
In awful grandeur near the pole.

My neighbour, he who groans and toils,
The serf and slave, on hill and plain
Of Europe, or of India's soils,—
On Asia, or on Afric's main,—
Or in Columbia's marshes deep,
Where Congo's daughters bleed and weep.

Poor, sobbing thing, dark as thy sire,
Or mother sad, heartbroken, lorn—
And will they quench a sacred fire?—
And shall that child from her be torn?—
'Tis done—poor wrecks, your cup is gall;
Yet ye're my neighbours, each and all.

Who is my neighbour? Is it he
Who moves triumphant down the vale,
While shouting myriads bend the knee,
And poison all the passing gale
With adulation's rankest breath,
To one whose trade is that of death?—

Yes; he 's my neighbour—he and they
Who press around yon gallant steed,
That, in the frenzy of the fray,
Has crown'd his rider's ruthless deed—
Crush'd out life's slowly ebbing flood,
And stain'd his iron hoofs in blood!

The gallant chief is passing by,
And crowds on crowds hang round his way,
And youth has lift the voice on high,
And age has bared his locks of gray;
And gentle forms, like birds on wing,
Are passing by and worshipping!

My neighbours all—each needs a sigh,
Each in due form a friendly prayer:—
"Oh! raise the low, bring down the high
To wisdom's point, and fix them there;
Where men are men, and pomp and pride
Are mark'd, and doom'd, and crucified."

Thou art my neighbour, child of pain;
And thou, lorn pilgrim, steep'd in woe;
Our neighbour she, with frenzied brain,
Whose pangs we little reck or know;
Who loved while hope and reason shone,
Nor ceased to love when both were gone.

And if on this green earth there be
One heart by baleful malice strung,
A breast that harbours ill to me,
A sland'rous, false, reviling tongue,—
My neighbour he—and I forgive;
Oh! may he turn, repent, and live.

AMICUS.

A CLEVELAND SKETCH.

THE LOVERS.

By J. WALKER ORD, Esq., Author of "England," a Poem, &c.

"In the Hospital endowed by an ancestor of Sir Charles Turner, at Kirkleatham, amongst other natural and artificial curiosities, is a very singular tree. It had been cut down in Kirkleatham Park, but, upon its being split by the woodman's wedge, the heart of the tree turned out round and entire, the outward part which enclosed it being about the thickness of four inches.

"Round the inner bole, or heart, which is about a foot in diameter, are several letters, carved in a rude and seemingly irregular manner; but upon a clear observation are found to wind in a spiral form, and the following couplet is plainly legible:—

"'THIS TREE LONG TIME WITNESS BEAR,
TWO TRUE LOVERS DID WALK NEER.'"

Grose's "Cleveland."

Pleasant are thy vales, Kirkleatham,
Bright and glad yon golden tide;—
Hark! a thousand choral voices
From old Ocean rolling wide:
Every cavern, fountain, hill,
To Love and Hope are sacred still.

There the monarch oak-tree wantons
In his pride of pomp and power;
There the wild-rose, there the woodbine,
Gaily flaunt their summer hour:
There sweet Nature's choristers
Deftly pour harmonious airs.

When the wild-birds carol'd highest,
Piercing heaven's abysm clear,—
Ere the spring-flowers closed their eyelids,
Pillow'd on their forest bier,—
Paced two lovers through the woods,
Sweet Kirkleatham's solitudes.

Who can picture how they linger'd
In each pleasant, gay alcove?
Words of passion, sighs of rapture—
All the ecstacy of love:—
Who evoke a semblance fair,
Of that young, devoted pair?

Dreams of Venus, of Adonis,
Dian and Endymion bright,
(When the world was fresh and joyous,)
Dazzle with poetic light:
Yea, a glory fills mine eyes
From the bowers of paradise!

Young and fair,—(O, never doubt it!)—
Eyes that mock'd the azure deeps;
Neck of snow, as May flowers fragrant;
Tresses bright as evening streaks:
Such wert thou, beloved maid,—
Heaven's whole treasury display'd!

Who the youth?—some rustic poet—
Dreamer of the woodlands he?
Hill-side shepherd? joyous ploughman?
Pilgrim o'er the lonely sea?
Little recks it,—LOVE was his—
Youth, and Hope, and Happiness!

From the fierce, the surging billow,
From the thunderbolts of war,
Came he forth to see his true-love,
From the gory fields afar?
Haply, this the farewell token
Of a fond heart well-nigh broken!

Spring pour'd forth her virgin glories,
Verdant shade, and sunny hue,
Whilst from every secret covert
Rose the blackbird's song, as now;
And each mellow distant wave
Chimed a dirge o'er Memory's grave.

'Twere a tale too oft repeated,
How that maiden's heart beat high,
When the tender scroll was sculptured,
What entrancements fill'd her eye!—
"THIS TREE LONG TIME WITNESS BEAR,
TWO TRUE LOVERS DID WALK HERE."

Heaven was witness of their bridal,—
Never breath'd a holier vow;
Nature sang their hymeneal,
Kiss'd with nectar lips each brow:
Love protected—virtuous love—
Such as seraphs feel above.

Now, alas! the grove is vanish'd,—
All the verdant boughs are dead,—
Ceased the wild-bird's joyous music,
Angel strains divinely wed:
Now, no more the tuneful breeze
Murmurs Nature's minstrelsys.

Now, no more the evening voices
Echo where that maiden stood,—
Sounds of waters, hymnings holy,
(Guests of woodland solitude,)—
All are gone—the very tree,
Tablet of their memory!

They are gone, too-happy lovers—
Living pulses beat no more;
Keener blisses, deeper raptures,
Greet them on the Eternal shore;
As those lovers lov'd below,
Sister angels love them now!

But, though fled from human vision,
Not from human hearts they fade;
Sacred is the grove they wander'd,
Sacred every nook and glade:
Nature's self doth "WITNESS BEAR,
TWO TRUE LOVERS DID WALK HERE."

THE SECOND HOME.

A little rivulet, whose source
Was some lone mountain-glen,
'Mong much of yellow broom and gorse
Descended, and pursued its course
Among the homes of men.

Its banks with water-weeds were crown'd,
And sand and pebbles choice
Adorn'd its bed, as on it wound,
Mixing its murmurs with the sound
Of childhood's happy voice.

By leafy alders shaded o'er,
Through swamps where willows grow;
Through much of meadow-land and moor,
By orchard and by cottage-door,
Did this glad streamlet flow.

Widening it went toward the sea,
Which doth all streams engross,
Still haunted by the bird and bee,
And school-boy, that, in homeward glee,
Can scarcely jump across.

Yet all this happy stream had past,
Of beautiful and wild,—
All flowers, and fruits, and trees were cast
In shade, when there appeared at last
A mother and her child!

The very waters leapt for joy,
And murmur'd as they leapt,
In admiration of the boy
Who, making every flower a toy,
Had to their margin crept.

The happy mother's watchful eye,
And her protecting hand,
With pride and promptitude were by
To snatch unconscious infancy
Attracted by the sand,

And, as her yellow ringlets shook
O'er his impatient face,
The little struggler, with a look,
Turn'd backward on the bubbling brook,
Spurn'd purest love's embrace.

Strive, child of nature, to be free,—
For glittering pebbles cry,
Although the world contains for thee
No seat like thy fond mother's knee,
Nor love like her blue eye!

Still, from its little garden near
The cottage where they dwelt,
The babbling of the brook might hear—
Might gladly feel its waters clear
Wind round it like a belt;

And flowers in Nature's brightest hue,
Which Art in vain would match,
Around its doors and windows grew,
Exulting in the morning dew,
Up to the very thatch.

Love, surely, never did create,
Since his auspicious birth,
So fit a home for Man to mate
With Beauty, and perpetuate
Her image upon earth;

Nor, by Love's oft-destroying flame,
Was ever maiden wooed
To give up native joys and name,
Who with a better grace became Prolific womanhood.

Old Tyber's stream, though passing still
The once world-ruling Rome,
Ne'er helped a purer heart to fill
With gladness, than this nameless rill,
Nor past a happier home!

A PILGRIM OF NATURE.

You boast of the grandeur of cities in vain
To one who loves valleys, wild mountain, and plain:
Have you beauties to vie with the river and rill?
Have you fragrance, like morning's, on heath and on hill?
O, a Pilgrim of Nature for ever I'll be;
Your city 's too stifling and narrow for me.

Will you match me the lamps of some festival fine,
With the gems on night's mantle, so pure and divine?
Will you minister music devotion to form
Like the voice of the forest that sings to the storm?
O, a Pilgrim of Nature for ever I'll be;
Your city 's too stifling and narrow for me.

Have you curtains like evening? Can you find hair or eye
Like the cloud of the thunder, or smile of the sky?
Have you clothes like the lilies? Like the night-wind's a kiss?
Or language like summer's pure anthem of bliss?
O, a Pilgrim of Nature for ever I'll be;
Your city 's too stifling and narrow for me.

Keep your gold-moulded mansions, let Pomp have his seat,
To give him all place I will gladly retreat;
From Vanity's banquet one guest you may spare,
Brake, meadow, and wilderness, beckon me there:
And a Pilgrim of Nature for ever I'll be;
Your city 's too stifling—too narrow for me.

ONE OF INSPIRATION'S TEMPLES.

A cool green recess in a quiet valley,
Drawn a space backward from the rippling brook,
That freshly flows, yet, child-like, stays to dally
With flower and leaflet in each verdant nook.

A rush-fringed gorge with gentle slope ascending—
The channell'd issue of some fountain old—
Crown'd by a white-boled maple, oftimes lending
Oracular whisperings but to breezes told.

Rich cultur'd hills shut in this fairy region,
Save one small loophole opening on the west,
Which lets in Glory when the cloud's bright legion
Loosen Day's curtains as he sinks to rest.

Here no rude sound the vagrant fancy chiding,
No voice of labour or its cares may come;
But the birds' song, the streamlet's plashy gliding,
Mix in soft union with the wild-bees' hum.

This is a temple where the mind's glad altar
May well be raised—a pure and votive shrine,
Where the frail thought, too prone, alas! to falter,
May burn sweet incense to the power divine.

THE ROMAUNT OF LORD EDWARD AND HÉRIDA.

[An almost literal Translation from the Spanish.]

It was in the month of April,
Wanting but a day of May,
When the lilies and the roses
Show themselves most blithe and gay,
On a night, I trow, the sweetest
Which the Heavens could display,
What time Hérida, that fair maiden,
Was about to flee away,
That she, in her father's garden,
To the dumb trees thus did say:

"Never, tho' I live, oh! never Shall I see you for one day,—
Never hear, their music singing,
Nightingales amid your spray!
Stay with God, ye clear, clear waters—
Cool, cool waters with Him stay;
Stay ye too with God, my flowers,
Ye in whom my glory lay.
I go to the land of strangers;
Fortune thither points the way.
If my father should seek for me,
(Much he lovëd me alway,)
Tell him that not mine the fault is
If love beareth me away;
That his stern caprice compell'd me
Thus to shun a father's sway.
Sad I go, I know not whither—
Whither going, none will say."

Then out spoke to her Lord Edward:
"Weep no more, my joy, I pray
Weep no more,—in England's kingdoms
Clearer do the waters play;
Fairer smile the sunny gardens,
Lady, and your own are they.
Thrice a hundred high-born damsels
Your commands shall there obey;
Palaces of silver, lady,
There for you their wealth display,
All of hyacinth and emerald
To and fro the arras sway;
Patines of fine gold of Turkey
All the chambers do inlay,
With enamell'd mottoes, telling
How my life hath sped away;
Telling how my heart hath sorrow'd
Absent from you for one day.
When with Primaleon stoutly
I was fighting, bold and gay,
Lady, oh! 'twas you that killed me!
Him I feared not in the fray."

Then she did soothe her weeping,
Giving ear unto his say;
And they went forth to the galleys,
Which there for Lord Edward lay.
Fifty were they all together,
All together sailed their way.
By the rippling oar's sweet tinkle
Sleeps the maiden till the day,
Sleepeth on Lord Edward's bosom,
There, I ween, where best she may.

Know all those that dwell 'neath Heaven
This the moral of my lay;
Death and Love are mighty princes;
None can resist their sway.

PSYCHE IN THE ENCHANTED PALACE.

She had aërial servants, fit to please
Each faintest wish; voices invisible—
Such as we dream of in our reveries,
When, flower-like, we drink dews from Fancy's well:
They brought her banquets, such of which Jove sups,
Fruits, violet-strewn, and nectarous wines in cups
With ivy crown'd,
While all the wing-stirred air shook murmuringly round.

Oft when she stray'd 'neath some cool shadowy dome,
Such melancholy harpings would arise,
As if each tone of melody had come
To woo a tear for lovers' memories,
Or sing some sick hope to its funeral;
Till she sad drops, yet sweetly sad, let fall—
Then the strain died,
While the repentant notes would back to silence glide.

At times was pour'd a cataract of song
Into the silentness, till through the hall
The faint air tremulous grew with such a throng
Of thrilling sounds;—and then 'twas noiseless all,
Till one clear voice soared up, blent with the tone
Of sad flutes, now and then,—as when a lone
Sea-goddess sings,
While all her train of waves join gentle murmurings.

She had a glassy, leaf-embower'd bath,
Whose silver sleep, with entering, she would wake,
As sudden music, spirit-chanted, hath
The moon-bright stillness of some midnight shaken;—
And thence, refreshed, return'd to couch of Ind;
While each frail flower that round the bath was twined
Resumed its dream
O'er its own bending shape, in the reposing stream.

AIR.

Air! that fillest every place
In thy viewless course!
Element! pervading space!
Life-sustaining force!
Sphere-encircling! unconfined!
Parent of the mighty wind!
Where ye list—ye winds!—ye blow,
We hear your sound, but cannot know
Whence ye come, or whither go,—
Wild—resistless—boundless—free—
A marvel and a mystery!

Ye storm-blasts loud, that fiercely fly,
Rushing through the crashing sky,
Bringing, with your ice-cold breath,
Desolation, blight, and death;
Rending, as ye tear along,
Forests tall, and oak-woods strong.
Wondrous power and strength have ye—
Beauty—might—and majesty!
And ye soft airs! that gently sigh
Through the leafy bowers!
Gales that seem to faint and die
On beds of perfumed flowers!
Whispering zephyr! cooling breeze,
Stealing through the rustling trees,
Making all the green leaves quiver,
Crisping o'er the rippled river,—
Fitfully ye sink and swell
O'er moss and moor—o'er crag and fell,
Breathing into Nature's face
Freshness, loveliness, and grace.
Wanderers ye, from pole to pole,
Far as the ocean-billows roll!
O'er the sea, and o'er the land,
O'er pathless tracts of desert sand;
O'er the snow-clad mountain's peak,
O'er the hill-side, lone and bleak;

O'er tangled glen, and rose-twined bower,
And o'er the ivy-mantled tower;
O'er minster gray, and cloister dim,
O'er castle old, and dungeon grim.

Tell us, as ye sweep along
With your melancholy song,
Tell us of those distant lands—
Of Arab hordes, and pirate bands.
Ye have been upon the deep,
Where the eddying waters sweep—
Ye have heard the stifled cry
Of the tired swimmer's agony.
Tell us of the eagle's nest
Far on the snow-topp'd mountain's breast;
Of wild bee in the forest glade,
Of lovers in the greenwood's shade;
Of monks that meditate and pray
In gloomy niche of cloister gray;
Of nun devout, of chanted hymn,
Of bearded baron stern and grim;
Of castle moat, and minster bell,
Of captive in the dungeon's cell.

Where ye list, ye winds! ye blow;
We hear your sound, but cannot know
Whence ye come, or whither go.
Wanderers ye, from pole to pole,
Far as the ocean-billows roll,—
Wild—resistless—boundless—free—
A marvel and a mystery! A.

THE HERO'S GRAVE.

Far off, it rises on the sullen plain
A solitary heap of barren earth;
No frequent footstep startles there the reign
Of primal silence,—mortal woe or mirth
Hath there no voice to call its echoes forth;
But there the night-breeze round the basement creeps,
And deep-toned blast, the tempest's eldest birth,
In dismal howlings o'er the summit sweeps,
Fit requiem at the grave where martyr'd valour sleeps.

Lives there no record of his dear-bought fame?
No grandly-eminenced column, that may laugh
Defiance at hoar Time? none,—yet his fame
Hath prouder permanence; his autograph
Was desolation,—and his cenotaph
Of wasted cities reared, and slaughter'd foes;
Mocking the blazonry of epitaph,
These tell his deathless doings—Lethe flows
Idly for him whose fame decay nor death o'erthrows.

Ay, glorious was the strife he led, if blood
Have aught of glory that may purge its stain;
Foremost, unflinching, in the van he stood
Of them who Freedom's holy fight maintain,
And win deliverance cheap—though myriads slain
When tyrant's heart-stream flows—call it no theme
For wailing; rather swell the exultant pæan;
Joy glistens through the tears that well beseem
O'er Freedom's fallen sons, as raindrops sunlit gleam.

And Freedom was his idol; at her shrine
Suppliant he knelt, and vow'd to consecrate
His spirit's mightiest efforts,—to resign
Himself the slave to fortune, or to fate;
Nor pass'd that vow unkept; the empty prate
Of misnamed patriot, traitor in disguise;
Freedom's, his country's foes, his sword, his hate
Pursued alike, nor boastful nor unwise,
To seek, through blood of these, a pathway to the skies.

Saw ye that morn?—as if in mockery
Of the dread-doing day, it gaily dawned;
Heard ye the clang of arms?—the wild war-cry
Of myriads rushing to the hell that yawned
Unseen, beneath?—saw ye the shields upturn'd,
And shiver'd banners stream in seas of gore;
Heard ye the death-groan burst from lips that spurn'd
The craven cry—that field when night palled o'er,
And deeper pall outspread ten thousand eyes before?

Foremost, 'mid "clustering squadrons," was he seen,
There, like some blazing meteor, flamed his hand;
Till many a life-rift dimmed its fearful sheen,
And the foe quailed,—now waved his red right hand,
Mighty, impetuous—torrent-like his band
On—onward rushed,—then rose the horrific yell,
The shout of death or victory—to command
That shout was his—he unavailed to quell—
It ceased—the foe prevailed—the patriot champion fell.

Not unavenged he fell: around him strew'd
In horrible confusion, friend and foe;
None shamed their leader on that day of blood,
The partners of his glory and o'erthrow;
Valour had saved them—destiny laid low;
And now around him rest they, not unknown,
Though undistinguished in their weal or woe;
Noteless their sepulchres,—above his own
That band's illustrious wreck uprear'd this hillock lone.

Sleep on, ye brave!—it is not yours to weep
The land's enthraldom, which ye bled to save;
And thou, of heroes most heroic—sleep!
Thou hast the guerdon 'twas thy soul to crave;
Still is thy name a spell-word to the brave;
With immortality thy record blends,—
As freedom's sanctuary seems thy grave,
Thither nor crouching slave nor despot wends,
Nor aught save freeborn pilgrim's footstep thenceward tends.

Ay, glorious is thine unfrequented tomb,
Glorious, 'mid desolation and decay;
All of the battle-field hath ceased: its gloom
Morn calm dispels, and eve her shadows gray
Flings duly there;—of the tremendous day,
When its sun set in blood, ye might not deem O'ergazing where the stilly waste of clay,
As ocean slumbering o'er his wrecks, doth seem
As heaven—all trackless of the lightning's scathing stream.

ST. PETER'S LIGHT.—A BALLAD.

[The light from a mountaineer's cottage is frequently distinctly seen at sea, when the storm prevents the sailor from recognising his proximity to land; and this, the superstitious Italian deems St. Peter's Watchlight—the precursor of his death.]

"My son, my son, go tell thy beads,
The tempest is not past;
By that blue gleam the sailor knows
Death rides upon the blast.
'Twill be, 'twill be a fearful night
My gallant boy and brave,
For yonder beams St. Peter's Light
To guide us to the grave.

"My son, my son, go tell thy beads,
And breathe a prayer for me,
Not one of us who tread this deck
To-morrow's dawn may see.
In calm, in storm, I've plough'd the main
For forty years and more,
But never knew St. Peter's Light
To beam so bright before.

"My son, my son, hast told thy beads?"—
Before he could reply,
Above the foaming billows' roar
Arose a fearful cry.—
"Breakers a-head." None spoke again—
A crash—the barque was gone;
Still brightly shone St. Peter's Light
As it before had done.

A cloudless sky at morning dawn
Hung o'er the sleeping wave,
Altho' that night of storm engulph'd
The bold, the young, the brave.
And wreck on wreck along the shore
Reveal'd the tempest wild;
But deep in Adria's bed reposed
The old man and his child. H. B.

THE FLIGHT OF DEATH.

He riseth—he riseth slowly
From his bed—the vast—the lowly,
Where ages have swept o'er his slumbering form,
Unknown to the sunshine, unknown to the storm.
With greatness and power he has slept,
The Mammoth beside him reposed,
The vast Megatherium near him had crept,
When his terrible eye had closed.
Since he lay down to rest, their giant bones
Had crumbled to dust, and harden'd to stones;
And heaved, in chaotic slime,
O'er the hills that had shelter'd their giant play,
And the boundless woods that had melted away
With the moon from the night, and the sun from the day,
The wrecks of a perishing Time.

He riseth—the Phantom King,
On his strong and shadowy wing,
And he feels the breeze as fresh as at first,
When an earlier world on his vision burst.
The woods and the hills were there;
The ocean beyond them was roll'd;
The sun with his glory fill'd the air,
And bathed the springs in gold.
The soft blue sky and the woods were rife
With music, and beauty, and joy, and life,
And the bloom had a fragrant breath.
Together the fawn and the lion play'd,
And Might with Innocence gambolling made,
When rose from its sunless deep the shade
Of the terrible wings of Death.

He snuffeth the wind—Ha! ha!
Earth shudders with secret awe;
There is blood on its bright and flow'ry sod,
And it feels the frown of an angry God.
The first of human gore
On the blushing earth has been shed;
It held of human kind but four;
Now one is cold and dead.
And one with a fierce and bloodshot eye,
And crimson club, is standing by—
A sear'd and blasted man.
"Thou earliest child of a mortal race,"
Said the Phantom King, as he hover'd in space,
"Shalt hold, for the deed, the proudest place
In Death's pale army's van."

He saileth aloft, afar,
In a heaven where shines no star,
O'er a silent, dark, and moaning sea,
Where Earth and its isles were wont to be.
The living have pass'd away;
Their myriad heart is at rest;
It had leap'd into gladness at opening day,
With life and music bless'd.
But the tumbling tide, ere daylight's close,
Had still'd the tumult of joys and woes
O'er all the hills and dales:
The tribes of the cold and the burning zone,
The city and empire, the monarch and throne,
Have pass'd from the scene, with a hollow groan,
Where Death's gray pinion sails.

He poiseth his plumes,—again
The day-star illumines the plain;
And again the forest melody floats
To the heart of heaven in million notes:
But other sounds are there;
The yell, and the shout, and the groan,
And the bickering blades as they cleave the air,
And the dying's anguish'd moan.
A female arm is uplifted high,
Guiding the March of Victory
O'er red and smoking plains;
Assyria's queen—she trampleth down
An empire's might, and the pride of its crown;
And the Phantom smiles to behold her frown
Blight Asia's rich domains.

Time passeth—His centuries sweep
Assyria's throne from the steep
Where it tower'd—a beacon of flame and might Claiming eternity—quenched in night.
The eye of the Phantom shone
On the earthquake that shatter'd its pride,
And upheaved the glories of Babylon
On empire's changing tide.
It glow'd with delight when the voice of wail
Pass'd over the city and shrines of Baal,
By the Persian trampled low.
It sparkled when Asia's haughty crest
Had stoop'd to the conquering spears of the West
And flash'd when the foot of a Cæsar prest
Achaia's plumes of snow.

Time ageth—his locks are hoar;
He hath gather'd a ghastly store
Of years and of nations to darkness and sleep
In the tombs of the earth and the caves of the deep;
Still, the shade of the wings of death,
In motion or terrible rest,
Is falling wherever there heaves a breath
On the vale or the mountain's breast.
Refreshed by the lapse of thousand years,
He smiles, as of old, on the clash of spears;
On the swift or the slow decay
Of imperial pride, with its pomp and power,
Of altar and pyramid, statue and tower,
And calmly awaits the last bright hour
That shall o'er their ruins play.

They gather—a mighty host!
All that have yielded the ghost
Since Time began. At the midnight hour
Death summons to meet him his ghostly power;
A vast and shadowy train.
They circle the earth in a zone;
With one hand the Phantom touches Cain,
With the other Napoleon.
Around they sweep on an infinite wing,
By race and by nation, the subject and king—
The lowly and the high.
And a voice they blend, like the awful chime
Of a distant ocean roll'd sublime,
"We are thine, O Death, till the terrible time
When Death himself shall die!"

LINES ANENT HULTEN ABBEY.*

Not far from where Trent's waters rise,
The ruins of an abbey lies,
Beneath a grassy mound:
So say the legends of the place;
But vainly would ye seek to trace
A vestige above ground.

Though in the shallow stream ye cross
To get to the old bridge, with moss
Mixt with its crumbling stones,
The stepping flags, there random placed,
'Tis said the abbey cells once graced,
Where monks stretched lazy bones.

Come, on this bridge across the Trent
We'll sit, and fancy how they spent
Their days, those monks of old,—
Which, if they built it, as 'tis said,
Lasts longer than the shaven head,
Or I were not so bold.

They chose a pleasant, sheltered spot,—
The knaves knew well it was their lot,
The chosen of the Lord,
To choose in turn; and I believe
That many still this faith receive
As chiefest of His word.

O, good old monks! I know you well,—
Methinks that I could soothly tell
How happened ye grew fat.
The prototypes of those we may,
Gramercy! see this very day
In black, and broad-brimmed hat!

* The site of the abbey is near Stoke-upon-Trent.

Doubtless ye fasted oft—and hence
With fish-pools could not well dispense,
Whose outlines still remain—
Just for such few small fry, as might Keep soul to body, in despite
Of penances—'tis plain:

And, with their native element
Doubtless washed down, the flowing Trent
Supplied that simple need:
Your cellars had no goodly store
Of wine, or humming ale,—no more
Than priests of Harry's breed.

Bluff Harry—ah, a sad one he—
Dad of the surpliced hierarchy
That has usurped the throne,
Which ye, fat brethren of the cowl,
Held for the comfort of the soul,
But nowise for your own!

Ah, well-a-day! so wags the world!
And from that seat whence ye were hurl'd,
Their turn may come to drop:
Methinks they hold too high their head;
Pride comes before a fall, 'tis said,
But does not prove a prop!

The bird that sings upon yon brier,
Better than a cathedral choir,
A thousand years has sung:
His cheery canticles outlive
Your solemn chantings, and shall give Delight when theirs have rung!

Faith still in simplest form is best;
And that which shall survive the rest,
Will of pomp take least count;
But show, in daily deeds of love,
That fructifying from above,
Which testifies its fount.

Believing this, I hold there may
Be still religion in the day
When neither of ye reign:—
Good Churchmen! if the spirit be
Of Christ, 'tis shown in charity,
And that may chance remain!

This spirit that poor brother showed,
Who took through cold and snow the road
To some meek orphan's bed;
Or whom some dying widow strove
To bless, as bending o'er her shrove,
He raised her sinking head.

This spirit that rich abbot proved,
From whose still-open gate ne'er moved
The wanderer unreceived.
Round whom the neighbouring poor would press,
Not for his blessing—but to bless
The hand that aye relieved!

Well! here where the old abbey stood,
Pray I that spirit may o'erbrood
This land from end to end;
To which these waters say—Amen—
Flowing as peacefully as when
Monks by their side did wend. A.

THE CORN-LAW RHYMER IN THE COUNTRY, TO HIS FRIEND FRANCIS FISHER.

Dear Francis,—'Twas on All-Fools' day,*
(Our farmers' hecks were scant of hay,
Their horses, on the common bare,
Neighing, "Come, come," to my black mare;
While she, in plenty to the knee,
Still answered, "Nay, come you to me,"
When, by my parlour fire, I read,
In Hunter's book, (his best, 'tis said,)
Not precepts wise about new tillage,
But stories old about "our village,"
And that huge hall, whence Strafford bore
His third good wife, in days of yore.
Discord, a saint to churchmen dear,
Dropp'd, in those days, an apple here:
Sir Edward Rodes took up the apple,
And built, to vex the church, a chapel:
Ah, little dream'd he or his mate,
That priests would preach at Houghton Great,†
In house of his, for church and state!
And much I fear, mankind will never
Be, as they should be, good and clever,
Till two curs'd plagues are hounded out,
Call'd He-Knows-wrong, and He-Knows-nought;
For He-Knows-wrong is sly and strong;
While He-Knows-nought is dull, though stout:
Sad deeds are done by He-Knows-wrong!
But when came good from He-Knows-nought?
No. We must wait till He-Knows-right
Shall slay them both, in Christian fight,
Ere humble truth can be forgiv'n,
And earth rejoice—a humble heav'n.
Meantime, let's peel Saint Discord's apple,
And talk of preachers, and our chapel.
One of our pastors—we have two—
(Of course not sprung from Discord's apple,)
Is evangelically true,
Elect of God to serve our chapel.
He preaches (truth for truth) like those
Who preach'd above Sir Edward's nose;
Bidding us fly to good from evil,
Chiefly because we fear the devil.
At Darfield stands his Church in-Co,
Near which a river windeth slow
Beneath the tower, time-tinged and strong,
Whose famous clock, which ne'er goes wrong,
Hath too respectable a chime
To follow vulgar railway time.
That chime of chimes no chime excels;
Who hath not heard of Darfield bells?
Of Darfield's prophet-preacher too?
The evangelically true!
He is of "saintship old" a sample!
Good Francis, follow his example;
And don't get lick'd by worse than Turks
For preaching moral worth and works.
No, let the dread of hell defend
Your flock from sin, my erring friend!
Placed, as they are, above the pit,
On a mere crust, which covers it!
If that crust break!—why, down they'll go,
Down to the flaming lake below:
This you from sacred writ can show.
Yet you may hint, (perhaps 'twere fit,)
That if, unmarried, they have heirs,
Or fail, when scared, to say their prayers,
They'll each be burnt into a brick!
To build an oven for Old Nick,
In which he'll bake his brimstone pies!
Garnish'd with fried Socinians' eyes!
But I forget—I'm bearing hard on Socinian patience, and beg pardon.

* April is said to be the month which pudding-proofs the farmer's calculations. A quaker being applied to by a neighbouring farmer, in that month, for a loan of money, inquired what it was wanted for?—"To buy hay," was the reply. "And before thou earnest to borrow money of me, for such a purpose, on thy personal security, didst thou, in thy heart, think that I would lend it thee, or that I would not?" asked the quaker. "If I must tell the truth," answered the farmer, "I thought you possibly would not."—"According to thy faith be it unto thee," concluded Broadbrim.

† See in Hunter's Deanery of Doncaster some particulars of the life of Sir Edward Rodes, a parliamentarian, whose magnificent seat at Houghton Magna in Yorkshire, is now almost a ruin. Of the descendants of the families that strove for the right in the Civil War, how few are now worth sixpence! So much for the gratitude of nations. The body of Sir Edward was arrested for debt. Where is his grave? Echo answers, "Where?" He is said to have been bad tempered and honest; but if bad temper is selfishness, he could not have been both. The truth is, his half-faced double-face ruined him. In these times, he would have made a capital Finality John.

The singers in our little chapel—
Were they, too, rais'd from Discord's apple?
This a Yankee might boldly say,
Nor could my conscience answer, Nay.
They sing too long, and yet too fast,
Each striving to be heard the last.
But discords sometimes harmonize;
And one fam'd fiddle well supplies,
By sundry sorts of strange crack'd noises,
The want of modulated voices:
Singers and preacher well agree,
They to mend tunes, and sinners he!
When will you visit our old chapel,
To see what springs from Discord's apple?
And hear them sing, and him exhort,
Hoping they've got a patent for't.
Note. Don't you tell all this, or hint it,
To any monster who might print it,
And get me blamed for raising scandals,
About our Fenelons and Handels;
And hated by our blara-blelias;
For some of them are Saint Cecilias.
Besides, they're bonny—one, a matron,
Might find in coldest saint a patron:
Another—come and see!—a Dido;
When will you look and long, as I do?
And then, a maiden beauty-laden;
Oh, such a figure! such a head!
(Just now, she stopp'd two girls, to kiss them,)
What need of saints to raise the dead?
If she would do it, who could miss them!
Now, Francis, pull a prudish face,
Long, long—all length—a fiddle-case,
With not a string of frailty on't;
And cry, if age would frolic, Don't.
Yet why grudge man his winter flowers?
The few brief beams of wintry hours?
If dewdrops gem the wither'd thorn,
Why may not he, whom Time hath borne
Close to the margin of the tomb,
Rejoice, if there a daisy bloom?
Laugh, if a glad thought visit him?
And play his freak? and do his whim?
Look on the dome, that roof'd the sun
Ere cant, or prudery, had begun;
How bright (with God's own fingers spread
In gladness over every head)
It shines—Blue, blue! or golden-white
In lucid beams—a hymn of light!
A song of boundless festival,
To Him whose glory gladdens all!
Yonder, amid the gath'ring storm,
The shadow of His hand I trace,
And catch wild glimpses of His form;
Oh, might I meet Him face to face!
I know He loves and pities me:
Therefore, in woman's smile, I seek
Him; in true hearts His goodness see,
In every deed that helps the weak,
In every look that lessens pain,
And bids the old feel young again;
And still, when kindness speaks, I hear
The footsteps of the Blessed near.
But falsehood in the heart and eye,
Like manacles on mind or limb,
Degrades the Lord of Liberty—
Belies the hymn'd of seraphim;
And oh, when lours from man's proud brow
Darkness, which makes God's image tremble,
My stricken soul asks—asks it now—
"What! can my Sire—can He dissemble!"
Thus far I'd writ on Old May day.
This sixteenth morn of new-styled May
Brings me your letter—Ah, you say,
You cannot come to Argott-Hill;
You almost say, you'll never come!
I'm sorry—But my bees are come!
There's gold, there's fire on Argott-rill,
The forests kindle into green,
Sun-bright, the landscape burns between,
And bees hum o'er my apple-bloom;
You will not come, but they are come!
The bees, my punctual bees, are come!
Oh, when arrives my hour of doom,*
Bury me where the bees will come!
Bury me where the orchards bloom,
That to my grave the bees may come,
And while the wren his dinner gets,
Murmur a song of violets!
I've pass'd with bees some happiest hours;
For well they know I dwell with flowers:
They love me, don't they—little wags!
Ay, just as heirs do misers' bags.
My flowers they seek, my flowers—not me;
Good taste is thine, thou bonny bee!
As skylarks love the clouded sky,†
Where bees and flowers are, there am I.‡
Who loves not flowers? I know not who;
But this I know, most good folks do.
No foe of flowers could I forgive;
"They are my life, in them I live;"
But, oh! there's frailty in their beauty,
How mutely making sadness duty!
DEATH!—he who says I fear thee, fibs—
Unbellied Thing! all spine and ribs!
Lanky old Shanky!—use thy tool,
Where greed buys life, there spit the fool;
But, I sha'n't yet intend to die;
Don't swear!—thou'lt bone me, by and by.
Yes, Francis, yes, he'll "wait a wee,"
And grin a while, ere he spit me.
Me! Why, my alter'd visage glows
Like claret—No, like Sharon's rose!
My cheeks are redder than my nose!
My steps to health, though slow, are sure;
My choking fits are few, and fewer:
Though I may yet be choked, I've hope
It will not be without a rope;
Thanks to the air of Argott-Hill,
And breeze, and bee, and flower, and rill;
And rides, (or drives in carriage low,)
To Nostell, Watchley, villa'd Mat,
Tower'd Bilham, castled Conisbro,
Or palaced Wentworth, famous far;
And pathless walks o'er sweetest thyme,
By fountain'd Howell's dewy chime,
Or Waltheof's moat, or hall of Grime,
Through woods that wave in olden rhyme,
To roofless mill, half-crush'd by time,
Or gray historic oak sublime;§
And though, perhaps, despised by fools
These peptic precepts! read my rules:
"Rise at six—but eat and drink
Ere you walk, or deeply think:
Dine at one—take ale, or wine:
Sup at eight, and work till nine:
If you sup not, sip, till ten,
With the best of dames or men;

* Why do even good men think of the hour of death with sadness? Because death is the saddest of facts. Is it not therefore the greatest fact, too? More emphatically even than the existence of pain, it declares the eternal being and omnipotence of God. Yes, or who would submit to die? death being the saddest of facts, simply because it forces on us the conviction of our utter powerlessness, except in submission. It is this tremendous sentiment which enables men to die with dignity.

† We often say, "What a cheerful little fellow the lark is, singing in the rain-cloud!" We ought to say, "What a clever fellow he is!" for, (unlike man,) he leaves the cloud beneath him, and sings in brightness.

‡ The allusions to bees in this paragraph are not mine. I have only done them into verse for Mrs. Akeroyd of Sheffield, aged seventy-three!

§ Adam, one of the wind-gap oaks, forty-five feet in circumference, a relic of the ancient Barnesdale forest. Eve, the other, sixty feet in circumference, was destroyed a few years ago by gipsies, who made a fire within it. Nevinson, the highwayman, it is said, used to secrete himself in the latter tree.

Wine, (a glass,) if home-made wine,
Turn the soul of cowslipp'd doses*
Into love's or friendship's roses:
Then, let Mary, (if you're wed,)
Light you with a kiss to bed."
  Thanks to the air of Argott-Hill,
And breeze, and bee, and flower, and rill!
No alderman, at city feast,
On turtle feeds with heartier zest
Than I on root or crust can dine,
Perchance, with Adam's ale for wine.
I seldom slept till morning woke,
When lodg'd ten doors from Sheffield's smoke:
Sweet, after toil, are slumbers deep:
Here (after labour,) I can sleep.
But oh, in sleep what dreams will come!
And mine are dreams of pain and gloom!
But one, my dream of yesternight,
A fleeting dream of blissful tears,
Repaid, in scarce a minute's flight,
The pangs of many weeping years;
For on a friend estranged I smil'd!
Two sever'd hearts met, reconcil'd.
Long parted, and no more to part,
We met, with mutual earnest look,
And wept, methought, heart clasp'd to heart,
And sweetest kisses gave and took.
We met—Oh, not as spirits meet!
But lock'd and strained in fleshly fold;
And yet her kiss was cold as sweet!
Cold—heavenly sweet! but deathly cold.
What may it mean, this vision?—Oh!
That kiss of ice! those lips of snow!—
Why comes the friend of long ago,
A mournful flower of coldest bloom?
White roses best befit the tomb!
  I wak'd—the beauteous vision fled;
I wept—as men weep for the dead;
Weeping I heard the transient rain
Patter against my southern pane,
The cuckoo in the vale beneath,
And oxen lowing o'er the heath.
Then sang the mated thrush his best,
And bade the crimson'd sun arise;
Free soar'd the cloud-left skylark—blest
As man will be, when men are wise;
But I was sad, as pity's sighs.
Fain would I jest, but know not how;
Throned sorrow darkens on my brow,
For millions "in their misery dead,"
And nations still discomforted.
And let it darken! while I look
Back on my heart, as on a book,
And ask the memoried scribe within
To name my unrepented sin.
The loan of life how have I spent!
What did I with the talent lent?
Tell me, thou mute Accuser, when
I doubted God, or loved not men?
Much have I sinn'd in deed and word,
But He to crush His child forbore;
He tells us not that we have err'd,
But bids us learn to err no more.
I care not who, in coat or gown,
Wears crop or wig at church or chapel,
Converts a village, or the town,
And throws, or gathers, Discord's apple;
But can I sage or Christian find
In men whose zeal misleads the blind?
Assists bad strength! and shuts the door,
The heart—against the victim—poor?
No. Who reviled Him crucified?
The servants of our meanest pride.
Who fed the hungry? He, who cried,
"Feed ye my little ones!" and died.
You, Francis, well-resolved, prepare
His cross profaned to lift and bear;
You on God's altar pure will lay
No hands impure; and good men say,
Just pleaders are themselves a plea;
He hears such preachers when they pray.
Pray, then, Beginner!—not for me;
Nor for God's doom'd, who sow, for gain,
Woes steep'd in crime, (such prayers were vain;)
But for Man's doom'd! And who are they?
The famish'd slaves, whom laws betray;
Who mutely pine in sternest need;
Whom none salute, and many meet;
Who ask (unheard!) the fiends we feed†
"For leave to toil," that they may eat,
And rise up men—from Satan's feet.
He is the Christian, he alone,
Whose love is wisdom, (sad, when groan
Millions, but angel-glad to trace
Heaven's peace on earth's afflicted face,)
Teaching the sons of toil and care
TO EARN SUFFICIENT, AND TO SPARE.‡
  Have we no Christian teachers then?
What preacher pleads for helpless men?§
Good Francis! lest we meet no more
On this side the uncharted shore,
(Where all whose hearts as children's are,
Will find a region good and fair,
Exchange a bad world for a better,
And earth's best hopes for joys sublimer,)
Answer, and in an early letter.
Your friend sincere,

THE CORN-LAW RHYMER.

PART II.

GEMS FROM THE GERMAN.

"IN THE FIELD OF OSTROLENKA."

[The battle of Ostrolenka, towards the close of the last Revolutionary war, though of more than doubtful success, as far as the cause of Poland was concerned, has left an impress of undaunted

---

* Cowslip wine disposes to sleep. A late thimbleful of it, strong of the flower, is good for the supperless.

† How in the world could the world get on without these Powers of Weakness? "If the Corn Laws are repealed," they say, "their lands will go out of cultivation!" But what a comical set of all-important personages they must be, if (with the sea between them and their rivals, and such markets as Sheffield at their doors,) the account they give of themselves is true! If they were not worse than idiots, they would bless their stars that the question of Corn-Law Repeal is in the hands of the League; for the moment it gets into other hands, the cry will not be for repeal, but for compensation!

‡ The enemies of human happiness, (while their food-tax threatens to scatter them over the earth as common beggars,) are convulsing society, rather than let the British people receive the only education worth having; that which would enable those whose sole possession is labour or skill, to earn honestly a decent maintenance, with a surplus. We might laugh, while we tremble, at their tremendous folly: but who can patiently endure their shameless insolence? I have long been a dealer in metals; but until I met with their last specimen of ecclesiastical bronze, I did not know that brass could bear so black a polish. With all their pretensions to learning, they are either the worst-taught men in the nation, or utterly without excuse. They rejoice in the awful fact, that the well-fed generation of workmen, over whom the grave has recently closed, were civilized and rational, in comparison with the generation of ignorance prepared to take their places; seeming not to know that time inevitably removes, gently or otherwise, every obstacle to improvement; that effects can only be produced by existing means; and that as the instruments are, so will the work be.

§ Did not our anti-slavery preachers plead for the helpless? No, they pleaded against the helpless. They could have emancipated the fat negro, without prolonging the miseries of the starved white slaves here, his true feeders, by demanding, as I urged them to do fifteen years ago, the equalization of the duties on sugar. But then they would not have been serving the monopolists. No, they would neither have prevented the victims of the food-tax from seeing it, nor have robbed them of twenty millions to strengthen the hands of despotism. Oh, saints, surpliced or croppy, dissenting or law-established, what a tale will you have to tell, each in his doom-hour, to the MASTER OF FREEDOM!

heroism that will endure while the human heart can sympathise with the wrongs of the oppressed.]

In the field of Ostrolenka
Stands an oak-tree waving wide
Its arms in Heaven, which have the storm
A thousand times defied.
Through its leaves the wild winds rustle
With a deep prophetic tone,
And an eagle white on its lofty top
Hath built her daring throne.
In the field of Ostrolenka
There are those who roam at night—
There clang the plumy helmets,
And the thunder-crash of fight.

In the field of Ostrolenka
There ghosts go trooping round,
And Russian brands with Polish swords
In wild encounter sound.
In the field of Ostrolenka,
With arms across his breast,
O Diebitsch pale! thy spirit sits
With deepest grief oppress'd.
On a grassy mound beside
Is a fearful form array'd;
'Tis Kosciusko's pride
Looks through thy trembling shade.

In the field of Ostrolenka,
Bewailing deep his lot,
There 's many an old man seeks his sons,
And yet—he finds them not.
Then looks he where the wild oak stands,
And, with a tearful moan,
He lifts to Heaven his wither'd hands,
And sighs, "Alone!—alone!"
In the field of Ostrolenka
There was once an early time,
For the harvest fell to the sickle's stroke
Ere the spring had reached its prime!

In the field of Ostrolenka
The silent moss creeps o'er
Ten thousand weary reapers,
Who rest to toil no more!
In the field of Ostrolenka
Ne'er lark shall sing again;
Nor flower shall blow, but desolate
And wild shall be the plain.
O'er the field of Ostrolenka
The crimson evening tends,
And to the slaughter-throne beneath
Death's angel dark descends.

In the field of Ostrolenka
That oak shall aye remain,
And through its leaves shall murmur
The old prophetic strain.
There 's a breath of spring that stirreth
From out the eagle's keep;
It speaks of thunder-clouds that rise
O'er tyrants' thrones to sweep.
In the field of Ostrolenka,
While the oak-tree, tempest crost,
Shall stand, tradition old shall tell,
"That Poland is not lost!" J. B.

THE DYING FLOWER.

[From Rückert.]

By Bon Gaultier.

Have hope, my winsome flower! Thou'lt see
The spring come back again full fast.
Hope lives and stirs in every tree
That's stripped by Autumn's withering blast:
Through the long winter hours it dwells,
In every bud with might serene,
Till the sap rushes from its cells,
And clothes them in fresh robes of green.

"Alas! I am no forest king,
No stately tree, that draws a gleam
Of brighter joy for opening spring
From its remembered winter-dream.
Ah, no! An humble flower am I,
A nursling of the gentle May,
Unheeded, unobserved I die,
And in my grave of snow decay."

If thou art but an humble flower,
Meek spirit, comfort thee, there grows
A living germ, a spreading power,
Within the meanest thing that blows.
Death's sweeping blast may strew thy dust,
Along the sod, all icy cold;
Yet be thou gladden'd by the trust
To live renewed a hundred-fold.

"Ay, others such as I will bloom,
When I am gone; the green array
Of earth knows not a mortal doom,
But each green thing must pass away.
Yes, they may live, like me may blow,
But dead to me Spring's golden prime,
Now only do I live—I know
No share in past or future time.

"What though the sun's bright glance should bless
Their life, that now with genial might Glads mine, can I lament the less
The fate that buries me in night?
Yes, from afar, now, even now,
False sun, thou'rt beckoning them to thee:
Why with that icy smile dost thou
Look scornfully from the clouds on me?

"Why did I trust thy faithless smile,
Why woo thy kisses day by day,
Gazing into thine eye the while,
Until it stole my life away?
Thou shalt not triumph o'er the poor
Remains of life are left me still,
Wrapp'd in myself I'll hide secure
From looks that pity but to kill.

"Yet, no! For gentler thoughts awake
In tears beneath thy kindly power:
Take, thou Eternal one, oh take,
My fleeting being of an hour!
Yes, thou hast bid my sorrow fly,
With sunshine filled my soul anew,
And I will thank thee, as I die,
For all, which e'er from thee I drew.

"For all the freshening gales of morn,
Whereon, the summer long, I've fed,
All the gay moths on bright wings borne,
That e'er have sported round my head;
Eyes that my hues with gladness drank,
Hearts which my fragrance oft hath cheered,
For these, for all I now would thank Thee, who my every beauty reared.

"Like stars, that heaven's high pavement gem,
Thou madest me in the field to shine,
A jewel in earth's diadem,
What though a lowly lot was mine?
One breath, my latest, yet remains,
And it shall yield no thankless sigh;
One look on earth's enamelled plains,
One glance up to the welkin high!

"Thou world's bright ever-burning soul,
Oh, quench my being in thine own!
Thou sky, apart thy curtain roll,
And clasp me in thy azure zone!
Hail, Spring, thy winds that gently creep,
Hail to thy thousand glorious dyes!
Unsorrowing I sink to sleep,
Unhoping e'er again to rise!"

THE GOLDEN RING.

[From the German of A. Grün.]

An exile from my native land,
I sat upon a mountain high;
Below me valleys, hills, and plains,
Above me an autumnal sky;

Then gentle thoughts of bygone times
Came gushing up from Mem'ry's spring,
And from my hand her farewell pledge
Of faith I took—a golden ring.
Like to a telescope I raised
Unto mine eyes that ring of gold,
And, looking down upon the earth,
Beheld it like a map unrolled.
The fields all rich with yellow corn,
The groves of shaded green, I found
More beautiful a thousand times,
When in my golden circlet bound.
And huts, "where poor men lie," shone white
Upon the hills of sloping green;
And i' the sun the mowers' scythes
Threw back a flickering silver sheen.
And high-piled rocks of granite gray,
Like battlements of antique mould,
Bounded the plain where, serpent-like,
A noble river winding roll'd.
And there were dark primeval woods,
And towers, and towns, whence the smoke curl'd
Unto the clouds, and seem'd to fly
Where I would fain, o'er half the world.
All these were framed within my ring;
And lands, and men, and sea, and skies,
A wond'rous halo round them thrown.
I gazed on them with wond'ring eyes,
And thence I learned all God hath made—
The earth beneath, the skies above;
And all that breathes is beautified,
When framed within the Ring of Love. S. S.

"NAMES NAME THEE NOT."

[From the German of JEAN PAUL.]

Names name Thee not; no sculptor's skill with thee hath living part;
No hand of mortal artist paints how beautiful thou art!

Songs sing Thee not; the sweetest lay connected with thy praise,
Faints like an echo of the Past, a theme of distant days.

But as thou art and breathest, so, with life, with beauty warm,
Fond loved one! in this heart is shrined thy all but angel form.

Bright as the angels are; like them, alone as worthy love,
So do, in grace and innocence, thy heavenly footsteps move.

Can I not love Thee only? Yes; and holy as a prayer,
That love's a trust laid up for Heav'n, a hope recorded there.

And could the feelings of this heart but speak, each thought would be
A Guardian Genius that would rise to minister to thee.

Thy name! O, with that gentle name to me such faith is given,
That, whisper'd round my Urn, 'twould waft my spirit
up to Heaven. J. B.

"DESTINY."

I saw a Flower over a starlit brook,
All sad and lone, bending her dewy head;
And every time the ruffling night-wind shook
The darkening waves, she bow'd, as though she read
Some legend of her destiny; for there
Were mirror'd a few stars, in their faint shining
But half revealing, half with doubt entwining,
The fate of all things, faithful, fond, and fair!

I looked again, that dreamlike Flower was gone—
Over the brook the night-wind sigh'd alone,
And, one by one, upon the stream did fling
The purple leaves of that frail, faded thing,
Sybilline, scatter'd to the waves to be Emblems to others of like Destiny. J. B.

"IDLE WISHES."

[From the German.]

Were I a brooklet clear,
Sparkling for thee I'd bear
Welcome and bliss;
Shouldst thou bend down to greet,
Murmuring, thy lips I'd meet,
Soft as a kiss.

Were I a roselet small
Scenting the air, and all
Fragrant around,
Plucked, I would not complain,
No little thorn again
Ere should thee wound.

Were I a little bird,
Soon as the morning stirr'd,
Sweetheart! I'd light,
Perched on thy fairy hand,
Singing so sweet and bland,
Charming thee quite. J. B.

PART III.

SCOTTISH LAYS.

RULLION GREEN.*

Here, on this height, where pastoral Pentland falls
With easy slope into the Lothian plain,
Where silence fills the azure-vaulted halls,
And solitude's serenest soul doth reign;
Where scarce the curlew's many-quavering cry
Disturbs the quiet sweep of the hill-breeze,
And the bare brae seems clad, in mockery,
With one thin belt of lean and scrubby trees.
Here let me pause! Here mighty deeds were done
By Scotland's sires; and I am Scotland's son.

Say not that they were harsh, and stern, and sour,
Or say they were so, but not therefore base;
In iron times God sends, with mighty power,
Iron apostles to make smooth his ways;
And hearts of rock, close-clamped with many a bar,
He plants where angry billows lash the shore;
Thus love by fear, thus peace is pledged by war,
(Stern law!) and gospel paths are paved in gore.
We reap in ease what they did sow in toil,
And rate them harsh, and stern, and sour the while.

I blame them that they were not stern enough,
Too tamely bore, and waited overlong.
They should have check'd, with sharp, severe rebuff,
In the first threshold of his impious wrong,
The royal fool, whose rash conceit did ween
With statute-work to stop the strong, full heart
God-moved. He fell; and in his fall was seen
Man less than God, and nature more than art;
Old text, which many wars have preach'd, and more
Shall write in blood, ere folly's reign be o'er.

Here, on this slope, the Covenanting men
Stood, lifting holy hearts and holy hands;
And from the hill they look'd with eager ken
To catch the nearing of some brother'd bands.
From Teviot's banks, from high Dunedin's brow,
Some aid was promised, and they hoped for more;
But ah! it was too bold a venture now,
And hands were weak where tongues were strong before:

---

* The battle of Rullion Green, between the Royalists and the Covenanters, was fought on the 28th November, 1666. See Memoirs of Veitch and Colonel Wallace; (Blackwood, 1825;) and Turner's account, published by the Bannatyne Club. The scene of the battle is on the south slope of the Pentland hills, about eight miles from Edinburgh. A simple tombstone, with a rude inscription, stands as a memorial.

Dunedin closed her ports; and from the west
Hung grim Dalziel, avoidless as the pest.

But fear they knew not. With an holy bond
In Clydesdale they had bound them to their God;
Nor do their hearts in danger's hour despond,
They bear Heaven's mandate, and they own its nod.
Beneath the cold and clear November noon
Their souls beat high upon the lonely hill:
A soul as mild and leafy as the June
Stood cased in stern resolve, and dauntless will;
And when soft pity melts the mood severe
There God doth paint a rainbow in each tear.

Hark from the hill ascends the solemn chant!
And hark again the startling war-cry rings!
A mud-plashed rider comes with breathless pant—
"'Tis he, the grim Dalziel, and death he brings
Or to himself, or you!"—Straightway were heard
The hungry hell-hounds through the stony dell
Hurrying. Their swords the godly warriors gird—
With godly benediction bless them well,
And rush into the fray. The hostile horse they beat
Back to the glen with swift severe retreat.

And yet again the clattering onset came;
And yet again they drive it back in blood;
But grim Dalziel, now burning with fierce flame,
Gathered his serried thousands. Like a flood
He rolled, and swept the rankless tens away
Whose valour now was bootless. They so few
Had boldly hoped to keep a host at bay;
Nor vainly—had their plighted friends been true.
Not lack of heart, but lack of order'd skill,
And lack of needful aidance wrought their ill.

Rude warriors, rest! God from that ill wrought good;
Your strong endurance wrought strong hate of wrong.
Let dark Dunottar's dungeon-solitude,
And the strong Bass attest your sufferings long;
No polish'd pen, no neat and courtly verse,
Ye need to prove the virtue of your crime;
Pentland's green slopes, the bleak moors of the Merse,
Shall be your record to remotest time.
Ourselves, your sons, inheriting your stuff,
While we are worthy, shall be praise enough;

As ye were worthy of the royal man
Whose battle-axe the English epicure
Clove with a stroke, when the first fray began
At glorious Bannockburn. The purple moor,
While 'tis our home, the high hills granite-bound,
Shall brace our hearts, and make us valiant men;
From every crag a hero's tale shall sound,
A holy warning echo from each glen.
Shall slaves be dull where Wallace' blade was keen?
Shall sleeve and surplice flaunt o'er Rullion Green?

Needs not this rhyme to tell their pious roll,
Who slept in caves, and on bleak hills did preach;
Guthrie, M'Kail, strong hearts that kicked control,
The soldier Wallace, many-wandering Veitch.
These sure did share his brotherhood sincere,
The Christ, who had not where to lay his head:
He died for all; for some who haply jeer,
They in this clay did make their gory bed;
Men rude and wild, rough, shaggy, and uncouth,
But true and honest, and who died for truth.

Thou, Scotland's son, that would be leal and true,
This storied stone, not dry and tearless scan:
Bleed for their wounds who freely bled for you,
And know how good, how great a thing is man.
O these did boast no brightly barren deed!
One death for freedom makes a million free;
And who achieves a self-dependent creed,
Has gained Mind's first and last great victory,
Gains more than hero's, more than bard's renown—
"GOD'S SAINTS DIED HERE, AND GAINED THE MARTYR'S CROWN."*

LINES ON THE DEATH OF DR. JOHN LEYDEN.

BY THE ETTRICK SHEPHERD.†

THE HARP OF TEVIOT.

Why weeps the poplar o'er the stream?
Why wails the chilly winter gale?
Why starts the peasant from his dream
Adown the links of Teviotdale?

What strain was that so wild, so sweet,
A hymn of heaven that strain must be,
To theme so thrilling, woe so sweet,
So soft the midnight melody!

It flows not from yon streamer pale,
Nor from the window'd choirs of bliss;
Ye maidens fair of Teviotdale,
What wild, what wondrous song is this?

A thoughtful shepherd, fair and young,
Upraised his head to list the strain;
And aye it rung, and aye it sung;
But every note was fraught with pain.

Full well the fairy sound he knew;
It waver'd from the poplar pale,
Where parting genius weeping threw
The magic Harp of Teviotdale.

So sweetly down the dale it rung,
The breeze of midnight died away,
The falcon o'er the poplar hung,
The fieldfare, and the merlin gray.

The wakeful cock forgot to crow,
The snow-birds flocked around the tree,
And ravish'd, sunk in trance of woe,
Thrilled by the melting melody.

It rung so low, it rung so long,
Few were the notes the youth could hear,
But aye the burden of the song
Was, "Soundly sleeps my Minstrel dear."

"The gray moss o'er my strings shall spread;
My notes must die adown the vale,
Since lowly lies the Minstrel's head
That tuned the Harp of Teviotdale.

"LEYDEN is fallen, and genius weeps!
Leyden to me, to nature true;
Sound, sound the bard of Teviot sleeps!
—Sweet Minstrel of the vale, adieu.

"His lonely grave may balm entwine
With bandalets so beauteously;
Weep o'er his dust, the purple vine,
And wave the wild banana tree.

"Ye spirits of that vernal clime,
Around his grave your vigils keep,
And wake the choral hymn sublime,
To soothe my Leyden's slumbers deep;

"For, ah! that soul of fire is fled,
To dream o'er fields of wondrous lore;
And consecrate my rural reed,
A Harp of Heaven for evermore.

"Long may the Harp of Teviotdale
Forgotten on the poplar hing,
Save when the spirits of the vale
At midnight twang my runic string."

Slow died its wailing sound away;
The shepherd sought the poplar pale,
And reached his skilless hand to play
The heavenly Harp of Teviotdale.

A spirit clove the welkin gray,
Swift as the motion of the mind;
The sacred symbol snatch'd away,
And mounted on the murmuring wind.

* So the inscription on one side of the stone.

† The above lines, written about the beginning of Hogg's career, have since lain in the repositories of one of his early friends; and, so far as we are aware, have never till now appeared in print.

SKETCHES OF THE MORAL SCENERY OF SCOTLAND.

O well may Nature's worshipper to thee,
Queen of the storied North, enchanted hie,—
For thine is every changing charm of sky,
Each bold vicissitude of land and sea.
Thine is a vast old brotherhood of hills
Where the wild storm and eagle couch upon,—
One heart that nought but earthquake's music thrills,
Or sweep, in stern companionship, alone;
And thine, the solitude of lake and fell,
Where Power, and Loneliness, and Vastness breed,
And bid the heart's deep music sink or swell
More than the tumult of the multitude;
And thine the silver brook, by faery flung
From tiny rocklet on the mountain's side,
Widening as winding lonely straths among,
Till on its azure bosom proudly glide
Wealth's forest citadel—the masts of every tide.

And worthily may he whose heart is smit
With old Tradition's wild and wondrous lore,
Visit, from sunnier clime, thy stormy shore
Where Ancestry's gray spectral banners flit
O'er many a battle-field, where sleep the sires
Of Scotland's freedom, piety and fame,
Whose spirit crowns her hills with altar fires,
And fills her household echoes with their name;
O'er many a ruin mantling with its mould
The haughty heart of old crusading knight
Crumbling beside his lance and banner's fold,
That once a death-star urged the Paynim's flight;
O'er time-gray abbey, chapel, aisle, and cell,
Whence poured her ancient Priesthood's holy hymn,
And "Dies irae" mingled with the knell
That sped the parted soul of warrior grim,—
The solemn rites of years in Time's deep shadow dim.

What though no Eden flaunt an eastern bloom
And wealth of beauty 'neath her varying heaven,—
A magic to her hills and vales is given
To win the soul, despite their wintry gloom;
What though her plains no Marathon may boast
To lure a world's vast worship, Freedom owns
No spot more sacred on her once-loved coast
Than that whose name to Music's martial tones
Is wed by Scotland's peasant bard,—the plain
Of Bannockburn; or that where Wallace stood,
A matchless outlaw—with his country's chain
Broken and bathed in her enslaver's blood;
What though within her groves no classic fane
Of marble more enduring than the god
Once worshipped there, lures pilgrims o'er the main,—
Not Hellas, nor Ausonia, boast a sod
Holier than that where erst her sainted Culdee trod.

But yet 'tis not, fair Scotland, that the charm
Of high, cloud-cleaving rock, and torrent's foam;
Of Highland solitudes, the wild deer's home;
Of Lowland valleys, beauteous, rich, and warm;
Of legendary stream, and haunted tower;
Of battle-plain, though Bannock's field it be;
Of ancient abbey's stern, awe-breathing power;
Of cities, tribute-fed by many a sea,
Is thine, that wins thee homage from afar,
More pure than Rome's when Thule own'd her sway—
Than Hellas brighter when her conquering star
On Indus flashed its desolating ray;
But that thou hast a jewel in thy Crown,
Before whose light Earth's glories dim their shine—
A Truth unbought by smile, unawed by frown,
A pure Religion, hallowing life's decline,
Dearer than life to those who tread those hills of thine.

Hark to the Sabbath-bell!—its solemn tone
Far-wafted on the ear of dewy morn,
O'er quiet glen, and soundless hamlet borne—
Amid the hush of Nature heard alone—
A sense of holy quiet fills the air
At each long-measured pause, and far and near,
Slow-moving onward to the House of Prayer
With sober step, the peasant groups appear
From glen and upward height, and gathering, stand
Awhile amid the tombs that, gray with age
Or freshly piled, hold many 'mid the band
Tranced in deep thought on life's past pilgrimage.
Silent from thoughtful commune with the Dead
They enter now the sacred pile, and wait
Th' approach of him by whom their souls are fed
With bread of life: he comes in sober state,
Harmonious with his theme—not with vain pomp elate.

Let Casuists tell what outward show beseems
The inward sense of deep devotion best;
For these hard-featured auditors, the test
Varies like varying hues from boreal gleams.
Mark, as the preacher pours around his theme
The lights of logic, or the warmer rays
Of high impassioned eloquence, the beam
Of thought that o'er these storm-beat features plays.
And mark—'neath many a bronzed and shaggy brow
Sparkles an eye of keen intelligence,
Now following argument complex, and now
At Passion's breathing rapt in thought intense;
Now kindling into triumph, when the spell
Of lucid reason, like Ithuriel's spear,
Falls on the loathly Sophist's cobwebb'd cell,
And shows the monster in the daylight clear,
Of heaven's undoubted truth, deformed, and gaunt, and drear;

Now downcast, uttering prostration deep
Of contrite soul in presence of the God
Who dwells in Holiness, and with his nod
Woke vast creation from its primal sleep.
Gaze round from pew to pew, then, sooth declare,
Are these the men, though drest in hodden gray,
Who blindly follow each bewildering glare,
Misnamed by Sophists Truth's eternal ray?
No! they have learn'd to fix on Truth severe
And sternly beautiful their youthful eye;
In holy mirror changeless, bright and clear,
They trace the lines stamped with Eternity;
And jealously, undimmed by tainting breath
Of false though witching Florimel, they guard
That heavenly mirror's brightness; and in death
'Twill be their joy, their pride, their rich reward,
To leave to those they love its purity unmarr'd.

CORBIESDALE.

[James Graham marquis of Montrose fought his last battle at a place called Corbiesdale, on the borders of Ross and Sutherland shires. The following legend is still preserved amongst the shepherds thereabouts, and forms an example of the hundreds of others which may be gathered from the same source.]

THE LEGEND OF CORBIESDALE.

The setting sun o'er Strui's peaks
Gilds Carron's gentle flow,
Then, like a weary giant, sinks
Into the vale below.

A quieter scene you ne'er could find
Than that sequester'd vale;
Yet once was heard the dreadful sound
Of war in Corbiesdale.

No stone is there to tell the tale,
No epitaph in sight;
But upturn'd skulls and mould'ring bones,
Still mark the scene of fight.

Ay, there it was the gallant Graham
Fled,—ne'er to fight again;
And Royal Charles' latest hope
Expired upon that plain.

. . . . . .

There, to this day, the old folks tell
A strange fantastic tale,
Of spectre fights that once had been
In lonely Corbiesdale.

Till down from its high pinnacle
Was ta'en the hero's head,*
Each year was seen a solemn fight,
A battle of the Dead.

* Montrose's head had been placed on a pinnacle of the Tolbooth, where it remained till the Restoration.

The soldiers of the Covenant,
The soldiers of the king,
There met in spectral ghastly shape,
And scared each living thing.

No groans, no shouts of battle fierce,
No impress on the land,
Proclaim'd the fate on either side,
Of either spectral band.

No clash of heavy broadsword there,
No cry of dismal pain;
No red blood forming pools around
The wounded or the slain.

No roar of fatal culverin,
No musket-shot was heard;
No lurid smoke hung closely o'er
That haunted grassy sward.

But on a milk-white charger there,
A form without a head
Dealt death to those who nobly stood,
And death to those who fled.

Down fell the foe before that form,
They sunk into the grass;
But hundreds more sprung up amain—
They seem'd an endless mass.

. . . . . .

At length a shout, a fearful shout,
Utter'd a warrior's name;
And hills and mountains echo'd back
The war-word of the Graham.

The spell was burst—the spectre bands
Vanish'd from the wild vale;
But every year was seen that fight
In lonely Corbiesdale.

THE NECROPOLIS OF GLASGOW.

I often think on the little rill
That flows beside the Fir-tree hill.
In my youthful days the dark fir-trees
Proudly wav'd in the northern breeze,
All o'erlooking the homes of the dead,
One tree peep'd over another's head,
Whilst there flowed beneath, the little rill:
Washing the foot of their native hill.
This rugged hill, where the fir-trees grew,
Its sombre shade o'er a church-yard threw.
An old church-yard, where the heap'd-up bones
Lie under a pavement of old grave stones,
That rise, as each generation falls,
Nearer the top of the church-yard walls;
And a church, in the Gothic fashion made,
Lay under the fir-trees' sombre shade.
The trees are gone like a long-passed dream;
They've built a bridge o'er the little stream;
And a stately arch they did devise,
And call'd the arch the "Bridge of Sighs;"
And where, long ago, the fir-trees grew,
Is now to be seen the mournful yew;
And flowers of a fair and cheerful kind,
Now grow where the fir-trees braved the wind.
A zig-zag path up the rugged steep,
Where, on either side, the dead now sleep;
Where many a strange device in stone
Declares that some loved one is gone;
Where lovely flowers are strewn, to show
That it 's hallow'd ground whereon they grow;
Where at intervals dark caverns yawn,
With flowers around their portals drawn,
Conceal, with their bright bloom, the dust
That once gave pleasure—but now disgust;
Else, why all this use of sculptur'd stone
And flowers, if beauty had not gone?
It is to hide, in a sweet disguise,
Death's loathed form from Affection's eyes.
A sequester'd nook, in this great keep
Of the tyrant Death, where the rocks are steep,
Where their brown and rugged sides embrace
A green grass plot, of a tiny space—
So much retired, that you may regard
It, by itself, as a small church-yard,—
How oft am I by my fancy led
To this retreat of the future dead!
Where, if there be deep peace in graves,
They will lie like hermits in their caves.
There, sitting beneath the rocks, I muse
On human life and its narrow views:—
The little stream, o'er its bed of stones;
The old church bell, with its solemn tones;
The hum of the mighty city near
Are the only sounds that strike the ear.—
The city's hum and the streamlet's noise
Together seem blended in one voice,—
Whilst now and then there falls the knell
Upon the ear, of the old church-bell.
Above the rocks a pillar is rear'd
To him who is said to have never fear'd
The face of man.* There his statue stands,
A huge colossus, with out-spread hands
Toward the old church he meant to raze
In his fiery zeal: but in those days,
Of dawning freedom, was found a few
Who loved the truth, and who likewise knew
That the good old church was not to blame
For the sins of priests. They boldly came (O worthy heroes of history's page!)
And screen'd their church from the zealot's rage.
That statue, now with hands outspread
Over a host of the long-since dead,
Seems urging again to life their dust,
By pictures drawn of the wealth and lust
Of monks and priests, that they might arise
To level the church before his eyes.
Though far away from the fir-tree hill,
The old church-yard, and the little rill—
I see them oft, like a vision rise,
Before my memory's home-sick eyes.
Though I am now a wanderer, cast
On the sea of life, where the rude blast
Of fortune's unsettled wind is cold,
Yet my warmest hopes retain their hold:
Which are, that before my days I end
That I may return, their close to spend
Near the old church and the "Bridge of Sighs,"
And the stream, o'er which the dark rocks rise.

TO ROBERT NICOLL.

Go, manly spirit, to eternal rest;
Go, glorious flash of mind's wide-spreading light;
Go, thou deep-drinker from th' exhaustless breast
Of truth, and energy, and quenchless might.
Go, youthful martyr for resistless right;
Go, whilst thy spirit still is fresh and free,
Whilst thy example burneth in our sight,
And all that thou hast been, we strive to be;
And all thou wouldst have conquer'd, we will dare.
Let me but pile one thought unto the fair
And spotless tabernacle of thy fame:——
Love, Independence, Feeling, Genius rare,
And sympathy with all things, raise thy name
To MAN—the noblest title aught that lives can claim.

LINES

BY ELIZA MARY HAMILTON.

[Written at the request of a relative, on the death of a dear friend in Honiton, February 1843.]

Oh! blessed are the dead in Christ!
Why will we mourn for them!
No more the stormy billows here
With weary heart they stem!

* The statue of John Knox.

No more they struggle here below
To guide, through many a gulf of woe,
Their being's fragile bark,—
But, harboured in eternal rest,
By far off islands of the blest,
Calm on a sunlit ocean's breast,
Anchor their fearless ark.

Seem they to sleep? 'tis but as sleeps
The seed within the earth,
To burst forth to the brilliant morn
Of a more glorious birth;—
Seem they to feel no breath of love
That o'er their icy brow will move
With tearful whispers warm?
'Tis that upon their spirit's ear
All Heaven's triumphant music clear
Is bursting, where there comes not near
One tone of sorrow's storm!

Oh! give them up to Him whose own
Those dear redeemed ones are!

Lo! on their wakening souls He breaks,
"The bright and morning star!"
His are they now for evermore,—
The mystery and the conflict o'er,
The Eternal city won!
As conquerors let them pass and go
Up from the fight of faith below,
The peace of God at last to know
In kingdoms of the sun!

"Lift up your heads, ye heavenly gates!
Ye everlasting doors give way!"
And let the Lord of Glory's train
Throng the bright courts of day!
We follow, too, ye lov'd ones gone!
We follow, faint but fearless, on
To meet you where the Lamb, once slain,
Amidst His ransom'd church on high
Shall dwell—and wipe from every eye
The tears that, through eternity,
Shall never flow again!

RANDOM REMINISCENCES OF SIR WALTER SCOTT, OF THE ETTRICK SHEPHERD, SIR HENRY RAEBURN, &c., &c.—No. 1.

The value of reminiscences of eminent men must be in proportion to the opinion entertained of the writer's powers and opportunities of observation, and of his good faith as an accurate reporter and chronicler. The reminiscences we have to present to our readers, connected with Scott and "The Shepherd," bear intrinsic evidence of their genuineness in every sentence. Yet we deem it the most satisfactory, and also the most simple and direct mode of procedure, to permit Sir Walter Scott himself to introduce the individual who here recalls his sayings and doings; and who, without being blind to his weaknesses, appears to cherish his memory with the most devoted and grateful respect. To few individuals could Sir Walter Scott have appeared under an aspect more uniformly kind and benignant than he must have done to Mr. Morrison. Their acquaintance commenced in 1803—an early period of Scott's brilliant career; and eighteen years afterwards, we find him thus cautiously and characteristically describing the author of the subjoined Reminiscences, in whose prosperity he at all times took no ordinary interest. Mr. Morrison's name does not, we believe, once occur in Mr. Lockhart's Memoirs of Scott; but this is an oblivion which he shares with many other of Sir Walter's early friends; and it is one of small consequence, save that it renders this explanation necessary:—

MR. WALTER SCOTT TO MR. ROSCOE OF LIVERPOOL.

Dear Sir,—I should not have presumed to give the bearer an introduction to you on my own sole authority; but as he carries a letter from General Dirom of Mount Annan, and as I sincerely interest myself in his fortunes, I take the liberty of strengthening (if I may use the phrase) the General's recommendation, and, at the same time, of explaining a circumstance or two which may have some influence on Mr. Morrison's destiny.

He is a very worthy, as well as a very clever man; and was much distinguished in his profession as a civil engineer, surveyor, &c., until he was unlucky enough to lay it aside for the purpose of taking a farm. I should add that this was done with the highly laudable purpose of keeping a roof over his father's head, and maintaining the old man in his paternal farm. At the expiry of the lease, however, Mr. Morrison found himself a loser to such an amount that he did not think it prudent to renew the bargain, and attempted to enter upon his former profession. But being, I think, rather impatient on finding that employment did not occur quite so readily as formerly, he gave way to a natural turn for painting, and it is as an artist that he visits Liverpool. I own, though no judge of the art, I think he has mistaken his talents; for, though he sketches remarkably well in outline, especially our mountain scenery, and although he was bred to the art, yet so long an interval has passed, that I should doubt his ever acquiring a facility in colouring.

However, he is to try his chance. But he would fain hope something would occur in a city where science is so much in request, to engage him more profitably to himself, and more usefully to others, in the way of his original profession as an engineer, in which he is really excellent. I should be sincerely glad, however, that he throve in some way or other, as he is a most excellent person in disposition and private conduct, an enthusiast in literature, and a shrewd entertaining companion in society.

I could not think of his carrying a letter to you without your being fully acquainted of the merits he possesses besides the painting, of which I do not think well at present; though, perhaps, he may improve.—I am, Sir, with very great respect, your most obedient servant,

Walter Scott.

Edinburgh, 1*st June*, 1821.

In Liverpool, Mr. Morrison, as will afterwards be seen, met with the kindest reception from Mr. Roscoe, who returned him Sir Walter Scott's introductory letter, as a document of more value to himself than to any one else. Before coming to the Reminiscences, and in order to throw a little more light upon the character of their writer, and his connexion with the distinguished individuals from whom they derive their interest, we copy from the original MS. of the Ettrick Shepherd, the following rhymed epistle and epitaph, addressed to Mr. Morrison while he was engaged on some piece of professional business with Mr. Telford in North Wales.

Edinburgh, July 18, 1810.

Thou breeze of the south, so delightful and mild,
Enriched with the balms of the valley and wild,

With pleasure I list to thy far-swelling sigh,
And watch the soft shades of thy vapours on high.
—O! say in thy wanderings afar hast thou seen,
'Mong Cambria's lone valleys and mountains of green,
A wanderer from Scotia, unstable and gay,
The friend of my heart, but the friend of a day!
Who left us without telling wherefore or why,
Unless by thy murmurs uncertain and shy;
And pleased a new scene and new manners to see,
He breathes not a sigh for old Scotia and me!
Then say, gentle breeze, ere for ever you fly
To mountains and moors where thy murmurs shall die,
Say where my few lines or inquiries shall find
This bird of the ocean, this son of the wind!
Is he dancing with Cambrian maids on the green?
Or making a plain where a mountain has been?
Or diving the deep, the foundation to see
Of a bridge to astonish and rainbow the sea?
Or watching in rapture, unbounded and high,
The bright maiden-glance of a sweet rolling eye?
—Or say, has his deep hyperbolical smile,
With a flow of fine words, and deep phrases the while,
The gentry of Wales to astonishment driven,
At a mind so unbounded by Earth or by Heaven?
—Whate'er he is doing, where'er he may roam,
O bear him good news from his sweet native home;
And tell him his friends in Edina that stay
Are sadly distressed at his biding away;
That a passionate ———, and pennyless Bard,
Would, with much satisfaction, his presence regard;
That the one still is basking in Fortune's bright smile,
The other 's despised, though admired all the while;
And from listless inaction, if nothing can save,
He may sink, without fail, in despair to the grave;
"Like the bubble on the fountain, like the foam on the river,
The Bard of the Mountain is gone and for ever."
O tell me, dear Morrison, fairly and free,
Say what must I do to be gifted like thee!
Is genius with poverty ever combined
Without perseverance or firmness of mind?
Or would affluence load her bold pinion of fire,
And crush her in*——— of sense to expire?
If so, let me suffer and wrestle my way;
But give me my friend and my song while I stay:
With a heart unaffectedly kind and sincere,
To the lass that I love, and the friend I revere;
Though thou, as that friend, hast been rather unseemly,
A Shepherd, dear Jock, will for ever esteem thee.

James Hogg.

In the above epistle the following epitaph was enclosed:—

EPITAPH ON MR. JOHN MORRISON, LAND-SURVEYOR.
BY JAMES HOGG.

Here lies, in the hope of a blest resurrection,
What once was a whim in the utmost perfection;
You have heard of Jock Morrison, reader. O hold!
Tread lightly the turf on his bosom so cold;
For a generouser heart, or a noddle more clear,
Never mouldered in dust than lies mouldering here.
His follies, believe me—and he had a part—
Sprang always spontaneous, but not from his heart:
Then let them die with him; for where will you see
A man from dishonour or envy so free.
For a trustier friend, or a lover more kind,
Or a better companion, is not left behind.
O! had I a headstone as high as a steeple,
I would tell what he was, and astonish the people.
How solid as gold, and how light as a feather,
What sense, and what nonsense, were jumbled together.
In short, from my text it may fairly be drawn,
Whatever was noble or foolish in man.
Then, read it with reverence, with tears and with sighs,
'Tis short but impressive,——Here Morrison lies.

This much premised, we may now, with propriety, allow Mr. Morrison to speak for himself.

REMINISCENCES OF SIR WALTER SCOTT.

I became acquainted with Mr. Scott in 1803, from the following circumstance:—

In the first edition of the "Minstrelsy of the Scottish Border," and in the ballad of "Annan Water," are these words,—

"O! wae betide the frush saugh wand,
And wae betide the bush of brier,
For they broke into my true love's hand,
When his strength turned weak, and his limbs did tire."

And in a note at the bottom of the page, Frush signifies fresh or tough. On which I took the liberty of writing to the Editor, "Frush does not mean fresh, but brittle, or half rotten; and such is the meaning of Holinshed in his description of Ireland: 'They are sore frushed with sickness, or too far withered with age.' The saugh wand broke in her true love's hand, from its being frush, i. e., withered or rotten. So Barbour, when the shaft of Bruce's battle-axe broke in his encounter with De Bohun, says—

'The hand-ax schaft fruschit in twa.'

"You state that the ballad of 'Annan Water' is now published for the first time; I send you the song in a half-penny ballad, published in Dumfries thirty years ago. I have seen still another copy, where the hero is more cautious,—

'Annan Water 's broad and deep,
And my fair Annie's passing bonny,
Yet I am loth to wet my feet,
Although I lo'e her best of ony.'"

I received an immediate answer, thanking me for my communication, and desiring my farther remarks on any other subject in the publication, with a present of the "Minstrelsy of the Scottish Border," and an invitation to visit him when I might have occasion to come to Edinburgh.

It was two years before I had occasion to visit Edinburgh, when I waited on Mr. Scott, and had a most gracious reception. I had visited the Court of Session on my arrival in town, to have a look; and I was much disappointed. He had a downward, and, to me, a forbidding aspect; and so strikingly resembled Will Dalzell, the gravedigger of my native parish of Terregles, a person of rather weak intellect, that I could not help thinking there must be some analogy in their genius; but the spell dissolved the instant he spoke. He invited me to dinner: "Indeed, you had better wait,—in the library there are maps and prints, besides books; and dinner will be ready in an hour." His family was in the country, so that he was keeping bachelor's hall. Mr. Scott inquired much about the ruins and traditions of Galloway, but more particularly about the songs and rhymes that had not appeared in print, and if we had any legends of the Douglases, "who once were great men in your country."—"We have," said I, "their castle of Threave still standing on an island of the river Dee; but we do not associate their memory with anything that is good. Their castle of Threave was, with the assistance of the devil, built in one night; although the stones were brought from Rascawel Heugh, a distance of at least ten miles; as the same kind of sandstone is there only to be found. There are some lines, descriptive of this infernal piece of masonry, which I have written down somewhere."—"Do," said he, "let me have a copy. Any more about the Douglas?"—"He had a grudge at the Laird of Cardoness, and surrounded the castle; but the laird was nowhere to be found. He offered to satisfy any one with gold who would show him the hiding-place of his enemy. The cook pointed up the chimney, where he was concealed; from whence he was immediately dragged and despatched. Douglas then directed the cook to put on the fire a little pot, which he filled with gold, and, placing the betrayer of his master fast in a chair, directed his mouth to be gagged, and poured down the melted liquid: then, turning to his followers, said, 'Behold the reward of treachery!' He also, as you have yourself narrated, murdered the Master of Bomby; but the country resolved to suffer his tyranny no longer. Twelve brothers,* blacksmiths by trade, who lived at Carline work, not far from Threave, made a cannon, consisting of twelve staves, each brother making one. They then bound them in the proper form, by twelve hoops, or girds, and carried the cannon to a commanding situation, still pointed out, and still retaining the title of Camdudal or Camp-Douglas, and at the first shot knocked a hole through and through the castle, as the breach now shows; on which Douglas fled, and never again set his foot in Galloway. It is said that, in his flight, he robbed the abbey of Lincluden, and with his men ravished all the nuns."—"I have understood," said Mr. Scott, "that he expelled the nuns on account of their irregular way of living; but I have my doubts whether he was so stern a moralist. You must make me a drawing of Threave, or any other town or castle connected with the Douglas. The Gordons succeeded the Douglases, and some of them were not much better. I have seen a copy of a pardon granted to Gordon of Lochinvar for certain crimes and misdemeanours: for the slaughter of Lord Herries, and driving his cattle; for the crime of adultery; for abusing a witch, or supposed witch, and scoring her with his sword across the forehead; and for not only deforcing the king's messenger who came to arrest him, but forcing him to eat and swallow his own royal warrant."—"With respect to our songs, we have the Lass of Loch Ryan, which you know; Fair Margaret, of rather spectral import; we have Lochinvar who carried off a lady on her wedding day. She—

* A word obliterated.

'Sent her former lover a letter, her wedding to come see.
When Lochinvar he read the lines
He looked o'er his land,
And four-and-twenty wild wight men
All ready at his command.
He mounted them all on milk-white steeds,
And clothed them all in green,
And they are off to the wedding gone.
* * * * *
Now one bit of your bread, he said,
And one glass of your wine,
And one kiss of the bonny bride
That promised to be mine.
He took her round the middle jimp,
And by the green gown sleeve,
And mounted her on his milk-white steed,
And speered nae bold baron's leave.
The blood ran down the Kylan burn,
And o'er the Kylan brae,
And her friends that kenn'd naething of the joke,
They a' cried out foul play.'"

"There's the banes of a good song there; try to recover some more."†——"The rest, so far as I can recollect, is mere doggrel. The disappointed bridegroom receives a taunt, that he had catched frogs instead of fish. Kenmure's on and awa is very good the old way; not the edition in Johnson's Collection, but a set much older. In 1746 or 1747, one of the Gordons of Kenmure lived in Terregles House. My father, when a boy, used to accompany him to the fishing, and had from him many stories about Kenmure. Kenmure was forced out in 1715, against his better judgment, by his wife. On leaving the castle his horse stumbled, which, he observed, was a bad omen. 'Go forward, my lord,' said she, 'and prosper! Let it never be said that the snapper of a horse's foot daunted the heart of a Gordon.' There is a saying of hers often repeated in the country, of which I do not know the import: 'If the lads lose the day at Preston, I'll let the witches of Glencairn see to spin their tow.' Some have it, 'If the dogs lose the day at Preston, I'll let the b——es of Glencairn see to spin their tow.' The uncle, William Gordon, said that she was a rank Catholic b—— from the Highlands; and was the ruin of his poor brother. And added, that Kenmure had a favourite in the clachan he liked much better, to which the old song alludes—

'Kenmure's on and awa,
And Kenmure's on and awa,
And Kenmure was the bonniest lad
That lived in Gallowa.
Kenmure bought me ae silk gown,
My minnie took that frae me,
When Kenmure he got word of that
He bought me other three.'"

"The Gordons," said Mr. Scott, "were from the south. The parish of Gordon was their property. Two brothers left the country: one went north, whose descendants are dukes of Gordon; the other directed his course west, and became Lord of Lochinvar and Kenmure. You sent us Buccleuch, and we sent you Kenmure; and as you say the one was sent for stealing sheep, perhaps the other was expelled for something of the same sort."

An old gentleman made the third person at dinner. He spoke little. He was one of Mr. Scott's neighbours in the country. On preparing to go away, Mr. Scott said—"You will oblige me greatly by making me some drawings of your old castles. I am particularly anxious to have a drawing of Caerlaverock: it is a noble ruin, and the stacks of chimneys are still very perfect, and in the finest style. I was once there, and was much pleased. Threave, also, I must have; but I suppose there is nothing elegant there: strength was the grand object. And any old scraps of rhyme, or anecdote, will be most acceptable. Come to breakfast to-morrow, and come early; you will find me in the library, and can divert yourself with a book."

* The name of these brothers was M'Min. I have talked with a person of that name, who claimed being their lineal descendant.

Next morning I found him in his study. "There," said he, "is a line to the keeper of the Advocates' Library. Ask for a catalogue, and the keeper will bring you any book you ask for. You can also have writing materials." During breakfast he inquired if I was acquainted with James Hogg. "I met with him," said I, "on my way to Edinburgh. I was perambulating the country for a proposed road from the south towards Edinburgh, and on my route passed the farm of Mitchelslacks, where he is shepherd. I intended to call; but before reaching the house I met him on his way to the hill. His plaid was wrapped round him, although the morning was warm and sunny. He was without shoes, with half stockings on his legs, and a dog at his foot. I inquired if he knew Mr. Hogg—'I am that individual.' We sat down by a well; and I had a small flask of brandy in my pocket. We instantly became friends. 'What are you doing in our part of the country?'—'I am,' said I, 'endeavouring to find a line for a proposed road up the vale of the Ae water; and hitherto I have met with no difficulty from the water of Sark, near Gretna, to where we are sitting. From this point I wish to get into Daar water, and so down the Tweed.'—'Your work is near an end,' said the Shepherd; 'for the devil a wheel-carriage road you will ever get from this to the water of Daar.' And on examining the county, I found that he was perfectly correct."

"Hogg is a wonderful man," said Mr. Scott; "and has been of great use to me in procuring materials when I was arranging the Border Minstrelsy; and furnished me with one of its best pieces, Auld Maitland, with some other excellent fragments." I mentioned that Mr. Hogg intended coming to Edinburgh soon. "If so, you will meet him here often. I hope that you are to remain for some time,—indeed, as a Landsurveyor, you ought to make Edinburgh your home. Come, and I will introduce you to some friendly writers; they have all the most lucrative department of your business in their hands, as I learn, by plans and surveys passing through the court." I mentioned that I had the offer of being appointed secretary to General Dirom, Deputy-quarter-master-general, worth a hundred pounds a-year, and liberal leave of absence.

"Accept, by all means; it may, nay must, lead to something better; and I will be always ready to give you a lift."

"I am here," said I, "on a trial for murder; having made a plan of the scene and country connected. I have been summoned as a witness to describe my plan as connected with the circumstances of the murder."—"Mention the leading points connected with your plan."—"On the night of the murder, Mary Robson and John Hannay met by appointment in Dumfries to arrange their marriage. She lived with her mother about five miles distant at Lochrutton, and he was a servant in Castlehill, about three miles from Dumfries. They were seen in the town, and also resting about twilight not far from the place of Hannay's residence. At the usual hour he appeared at supper with his fellow-servants. He was asked what he had done with Mary. He answered that she was gone home. He then apparently retired to bed. On the following morning the girl was found dead at a short distance from her mother's door. I was present at the precognition with the sheriff, Sir Alexander Gordon. In the meantime Hannay was secured. The girl was found on a rising ground. There had been a severe struggle from this spot to the bottom of the brae. The broom, which was in full bloom, had been grasped and stripped of its blossoms; one of her shoes was found at the bottom, where the murder had been finished; and the body carried up the bank, where the struggle had commenced, and the clothes adjusted. The black marks of fingers and a thumb were visible on her throat, and a little blood was oozing from her mouth. The body was warm when found. I was immediately sent to examine the ground. The servant, on going to make up Hannay's bed, which was in the stable above the horses, found that the bed had not been occupied. At some stiles between Castlehill and the girl's home, and on the footpath, the ground was soft, and I observed the print of feet, a greater and less, which I concluded to be a man's and a woman's; these I measured carefully, and found them to agree exactly with the shoes of Hannay and the poor girl. It was evident that he had made his victim conceal herself about the place; and, in order to lull suspicion, had made his appearance at supper, and seemingly retired to bed, but had again joined the girl, and conducted her to the place where he committed the crime.

"I am going now," I said, "to call on the Crown agent respecting the plan."—"He is," said Mr. Scott, "my most particular friend, William Clerk. I will, if you wish it, give you a card of introduction. You are likely to be the first witness called; and, after giving your evidence, you may remain during the trial, take notes, and compare the proof with the opinions you have already formed. I recollect," said Mr. Scott, "something of a murder that was committed in Galloway, where the guilty person was discovered in the same manner, by the size of his shoe, and also by some particular mark on the sole. Your sheriff, Gordon, was the person who took the precognition, and measured the murderer's foot, who was condemned altogether on presumptive proof, but afterwards confessed."

Mr. Hogg, soon after this, arrived in Edinburgh, and introduced me to Mr. Grieve, with whom we dined; and next day Mr. Hogg brought us an invitation to sup with Mr. Scott, and to be in Castle Street at eight o'clock.

When we arrived, "I have reserved my wine till your arrival; and we will have, as Burns has it, 'some rhyming ware.'" It was Mr. Grieve's first interview. "I am happy," said Mr. Scott, "to meet a Borderer and a poet." Mr. Scott read to us some of the introductions and two of the cantos of "Marmion." In the introduction to one of the cantos, there is a description of St. Mary's Loch, which Mr. Hogg praised out of all measure. The poetry, he said, was beautiful; but the accuracy of the description better still. Mr. Scott inquired if I had been at St. Mary's; and if so, how I liked the description.

"You have," said I, "given the lake what it has not, and taken from it something that it possesses:

'Save where a line of silver sand
Marks where the water meets the land.'

You have no line of silver sand. You have been thinking of some of the Highland lakes, where, from the decay of the granite, the water is encircled with a beautiful line of silver sand. On St. Mary's, also, you have some good trees, particularly one very fine old ash, that has seen the deer resting under its branches 300 years ago.

'Thou know'st it well: nor bush nor sedge
Pollute the pure lake's crystal edge,'— is not rendering it justice. There are also some tolerable birches on the Bowerhope side."

"You are quite correct," said Hogg. "I had forgotten these trees, led away by the beauty of the poetry."

"Very well, Mr. Hogg," said Mr. Scott; "but a few facts, or a little sound criticism, is infinitely more welcome to me than any praise whatever. I am sorry that I had not observed these trees, as the part is now printed off. I am sorry these trees have escaped me; but my eyes are not good; and I should, when I am in search of the picturesque, always have some better eyes than my own near me."

It was a high treat to hear Mr. Scott read his own poetry; even the burr had a charm. His voice was harsh and unmusical; but the passion and impressive manner made ample amends. I have heard many readers of high character reciting and reading his poetry; but after himself they all fell short. There is, to be sure, a sympathy betwixt a poet and his work that gives double interest. He called on Mr. Grieve to repeat a "verse or two," and if his own, it would enhance the value. Mr. Grieve recited a poem that was afterwards published in a collection arranged by Mr. Hogg. In my turn I gave a ditty called the Pedlar, who was murdered on his way to a fair. Mr. Scott was pleased to give me credit, and desired a copy. It has since been published. Mr. Hogg repeated, "The Moon was a-waning;" the best, to my mind, of the whole. Mr. Scott told some remarkable instances of the second-sight, one of which I afterwards recognised in the gray Spectre of Waverley.* "Have you any ghosts in Galloway?"—"We have many: Mary's Dream, for instance, which is a true tale, and was told in my hearing by Mary's sister. Sandy had just sailed on a voyage. Mary had 'laid her down to sleep.' The rising moon was shining in at her window, when Sandy came and sat down with a soss on a chest by her bedside. 'Dear Sandy,' said Mary, 'your clothes are all wet!' The Spirit addressed her nearly in the words of the song. The lady used to say the song was improperly called a dream—it was reality."

"This," said Mr. Scott, "is a most beautiful ballad as ever was written. Did the author write nothing more?" I repeated some verses, and mentioned that I had a poem of considerable length in the handwriting of Lowe. "We are obliged to Galloway," said Mr. Scott, "for the first of our clan." And he read a passage to us from Scott of Satchel's history of the name of Scott.

'Gentlemen in Galloway by fate
Had fallen at odds, and a riot did commit;
Then to the south they took their way,
And arrived at Rankleburn.
The keeper was called Brydon.
They humbly, then, did him entreat
For lodging, drink, and meat."
He saw them pretty men,
Immediately grants their request,
And to his house they came.
To wind the horn they did not scorn
In the loftiest degree;
Which made the Forester conceive,
They were better men than he.
These gentlemen were brethren born;
The one of them was called John Scott,
And the other English Wat.'

"Our tradition has it," said I, "that they were banished for stealing sheep."—"Not at all unlikely," said Mr. Scott; "for they continued to practise the business on a pretty large scale when they settled in our country. It is," said Mr. Scott, "not a bad subject for a better poem than our friend Satchel's. You should, Morrison, try your hand."

Next morning, I introduced Mr. Hogg to General Dirom, who invited us to dinner, was much pleased with his company, and continued Mr. Hogg's steady friend ever after. He left Edinburgh to enter on his new farm of Locherben, which he had taken in company with his friend, Mr. Adam Brydon of Aberlosk, in the south. About this period Mr. Hogg was arranging the "Mountain Bard" for publication; and I received many letters from him enclosing poems. Mr. Scott also showed me some of his correspondence. "I am afraid," said he, "that Hogg will neglect his hirsel with his poem-making."

I was commissioned to make a survey of a line of road in Dumfriesshire, the direction of which passed near Hogg's farm of Locherben; and on mentioning to Mr. Scott that I would call and see the Shepherd,—"Do," said he; "and bring me an account whether he is doing any good. I am a subscriber to the 'Mountain Bard.' Here are six pounds—it is all that I have in my pocket;—give it to him, with my best respects. He is, I am informed, an indifferent practical shepherd; and his partner, Edie Brydon of Aberlosk, is, it is said, a hard drinker: if so, the farm speculation has but a poor chance of succeeding."

I rode some miles out of my way, and called at Locherben; but Hogg was from home. His housekeeper, a very good-looking girl, under

* When Waverley was published, I had no difficulty in recognising the Bodach Glas, and nearly in the same words:—"I stood still and turned myself to the four points of the compass—turn where I would, the figure was instantly before my eyes."—See Waverley.

twenty, or about eighteen years of age, invited me to alight and come in; for she expected James every minute. She unsaddled my pony, and gave it plenty to eat. I told her that I had a small parcel to leave for her master. "I have two masters," said she; "but I own the authority of Jamie only." The bottle was put down; and, soon after, an excellent tea-table was laid,—cold lamb, and fried mutton-ham, cheese, &c.,—"For," said she, "you will not have dined." She sat down, and made tea; and I would not wish to have it served by a better hand. Hogg did not make his appearance; and, after tea, the bottle and glasses were again put on the table. I waited till after sunset, and then prepared to go, presenting the housekeeper with the money. She still insisted that I would wait an hour or two. "You have only to Thornhill to ride; it is the longest day, and it never is dark." I waited still longer; but he did not come. I learned that the Shepherd was too often from home, and his partner had a farm to attend to in Eskdale Moor; from all which it was evident that the concern must be much neglected. The housekeeper said that the farm was understood to be high-rented, and, even with the most prudent management, would have enough to do. She had left her father's house in a pet, and was a servant for the first time. "My work is easy enough; but I have reason to regret that I ever left my father's house." On my return to Edinburgh, on meeting with Mr. Scott, "Well, friend Morrison," said he, "what the devil is this you have been about? I have had a letter from Hogg; come to breakfast to-morrow, and you shall read it. The letter was as follows. It is now before me; for, though Mr. Scott's, by some mistake I had put it in my pocket:—

DEAR SIR,—Our friend Morrison called at Locherben, and left with my housekeeper six pounds, which is far too much. I was from home; but he found things, I suppose, pretty comfortable; for he drank tea and toddy, and passed the evening, if not the night, very agreeably; and has left a dashing character behind him. I have little doubt that he was presented with the deoch-an-doruis [stirrup-dram] on his departure. I have also observed that my housekeeper wears a brooch in her breast, which used not to figure there.

"Pray," said Mr. Scott, "what kind of looking wench is this same housekeeper?"

"She is," said I, "a very comely, courteous, modest-looking damsel, as heart could wish, or eye look on. Her age may be twenty years. My expedition to Locherben is more like a scene in romance than an adventure in real life, and has given me a high opinion of Mr. Hogg's taste."

"Happy rogue!" said he. "I am well informed that he has put more pretty girls through his fingers than any fellow in Ettrick Forest."

The letter went on to ask advice respecting some publication; and ended by desiring to be kindly remembered to me. "So you observe," said Mr. Scott, "that Hogg harbours no malice."

Hogg, from being a shepherd on the farm of Mitchelslacks, took, in company with Edie Brydon, the farm of Locherben. I paid a second visit to Locherben. My pretty housekeeper was then gone. It was the time of sheep-shearing, which was just finished. Masters and men were sitting round a small cask of whisky, drinking it raw out of a tea-cup. They were all rather merry. I sat with them for some time, and was regaled with some excellent mutton-ham, cakes and butter, whisky and water. I had a surveying engagement at Moffat, about ten miles across a rough moor. A number of the company were going the same route. Mr. Brydon was of the party, and fortified his pocket with a bottle of whisky, which was finished on our journey. I was obliged to attend to some papers for the greater part of the night, but I heard the distant sound of revelling. The establishment at Locherben soon after was broken up—how could it stand?—and Mr. Hogg, with a small reversion, took on lease a farm on the Water of Scar, in the parish of Penpont, about seven miles west from Locherben. Corfardine was its name. I happened to be at Eccles with Mr. Maitland for a few days, and one forenoon paid him a visit, distant about three miles. The ground was covered with snow; and on entering the farm, I found all the sheep on the wrong side of the hill. Hogg was absent, and had been so for some days, feasting, drinking, dancing, and fiddling, &c., with a neighbouring farmer. His housekeeper was the most ugly, dirty goblin I had ever beheld; a fearful contrast to his former damsel. He arrived just as I had turned my horse's head to depart.

"Come in," said he. "Put your sheep to rights, first," said I; "they are on the wrong side of the hill, and have nothing to eat."

"Never mind," said he; "the lads will soon be home." The inside of his house corresponded with its out. A dirty-looking fellow rose from a bed, who was desired to go and look after the sheep. "I have been up," said he, "all night in the drift." —"You have been so," said I, "to very little purpose. Your hirsel is on the wrong side of the hill."

He ordered some ham, and bread and butter; but it came through such hands that I could not eat. Over our glass of whisky we had a long conversation. I strongly recommended him to give up his farm, and come into Edinburgh, and attend to the publication of the "Mountain Bard," which he said agreed with his own opinion, for that he had in contemplation a long poem about Queen Mary.

As Mr. Scott had warned me to keep a sharp look-out, particularly if his farming was doing any good, on giving him this account, he entirely agreed with the advice which I had given, and said that he would write him to that purpose. "Or why should he not engage again as a shepherd?"—"That," said I, "is now impossible. One who neglected his own flocks is not likely to manage well those of another, unless you could get him appointed one of the King's shepherds in Hyde Park or Windsor Forest. It would be a glorious sight to see him with his checkered plaid round his shoulders, and his dog, Lion, lounging behind him! On his first appointment I should like to have the keeping of the Park gates for one week, at a shilling a-head; it would be worth ten thousand pounds. One half of London would be out to see him. One day of it would make Hogg's fortune."

Soon after this Mr. Hogg came into Edinburgh, and was at first received into the house of his friend Mr. Grieve, where I often met him, as well as at the house of Mr. Scott.

About this time, 1809, I was employed to make a survey for a railroad from Glasgow to Berwick. Mr. Telford was the directing engineer. Mr. Scott gave me letters of introduction to several gentlemen along the line of survey, and I procured leave of absence from my office in the Quarter-master-General's Office. "These cards of introduction are," said Mr. Scott, "unconnected with any business except your own; and you may deliver them or not, as you may find it convenient. Draw all the old castles,—Bothwell and Craignethan are not far from your route. I am informed that there are some fine old rhymes still lingering about the Upper Ward of Clydesdale."

I was, however, too much engaged with my survey to pay much attention to any other thing. As it was my first survey under Telford, Mr. Scott was anxious to hear how I was getting on, and desired me to write from time to time. I wrote to him in considerable perplexity, that Mr. Telford, on making the Trial Levels, had left a mark on the steeple of Lanark, from which my level differed fifteen feet; and that I had carried my level back to Glasgow in order to prove it, and found it correct. In answer to this he wrote, "Go on in your own way; but be sure that you are correct. Telford is a clever fellow, and a bit of a poet, and will thank you for correcting the error; it will be a feather in your cap." Having also written to Mr. Telford, I received a letter which put all to rights.

In the Upper Ward of Clydesdale I fell in with some old editions of some of those ballads given in the Minstrelsy of the Scottish Border, and obtained two additional verses to the Twa Corbies.

'My mither cleket me of an egg,
And brought me out wi' feathers gray,
And bad me flee where'er I wad,—
Winter would be my dying day.

But winter it is gane an' past,
And a' the birds are bigging their nest,
But I'll flee heigh aboon them a',
And sing a sang for summer's sake.'

I also got another edition of Young Benjie; and the pool was pointed out to me where the Lady Marjorie was drowned; her struggles to gain the bank are described, but the relentless Benjie

'Took a fouw and fouwed her in,
And Bodell banks are bonny.'

Fouw is pitchfork, and the image gives a fearful picture of savage cruelty. Young Benjie I have heard sung, or rather chanted, by the late Dr. John Leyden, with whom it was a great favourite. The air is beautiful and wild, and will be found in Alexander Campbell's "Albyn's Anthology." The ballad was given by Leyden to Mr. Scott, and may have received some dressing up. Mr. Leyden's style of singing young Benjie was particularly wild. The tune is not a little obliged to Allaster Dhu, (Mr. Campbell,) whose taste for the old ballad music was exquisitely delicate. I likewise found a different edition of Johnie of Braidislee:—

'Johnie sat his back against a aik,
His foot against a stane,
He shot seven arrows all at once,
And killed them all but ane;
He broke three ribs frae that ane's back,
But and his collar-bane;
Old. { Then fingers five came on belyve,
O, true heart, fail me not!
And, gallant bow, do thou prove true,
For in London thou was coft;
And the silken strings that stenten thee,
Were by my true-love wrought.'

On my return to Edinburgh, and showing my sketches and scraps, Mr. Scott wished much that I would return and explore every cottage and corner of Upper Clydesdale; "where," said he, "I suspect there is much valuable wreck still floating down the stream of Time."

This expedition never took place; as I was engaged to go, early in spring, to meet Mr. Telford in North Wales, and engaged in a survey of the Holyhead, Chester, and London roads.

On mentioning the Holyhead expedition to Mr. Scott, he gave me several letters of introduction. "Draw every old castle and glen that comes in your way. Keep a regular Journal, which, if you bring it up every night, will be, so far from any trouble, rather an amusement. Wales is particularly rich in castles; but the old towers of the Welsh, prior to the ravages of Edward, are by far the most interesting, and have been much neglected. The Welsh have famous memories, hate the English, and are partial to the Scots. There are no parts of Wales, I suppose, where the English language is not understood. You may, therefore, have translations; and the more literal the better."

With respect to understanding English, Mr. Scott had been misinformed. I found many places where the Welsh language only was spoken and understood.

Among the superstitions of Wales is the Mort Bird, or Bird of Death, which appears at the window of every person about to die. The Bird of Death, black or white, is seen flapping its wings at the window or door.

On mentioning this to Mr. Scott,—"The warning bird we have also in our own country.

'The Lady of Ellerslee wept for her Lord;
A death-watch had beat in her lonely room;
Her curtain had shook of its own accord,
And the Raven had flapped at her window-board,
To tell of her Warrior's doom.'"

When at Bangor Ferry, I received from Mr. Scott "The Lady of the Lake." This book I regret much having lost. I lent it to a lady, who refused to return it. "You may spare," said she, "yourself the farther trouble of asking it; give it to me, therefore, with a good grace, and write your own name under your friend's, Mr. Scott; and I will keep it for both your sakes, besides making you a handsome present."

On mentioning this to Mr. Scott,—"I wonder," said he, "you hesitated one moment to give the lady the book. I will replace it. Pray, what was the present she made you?"—"It was," said I, "a handsome Bible, in two volumes, accompanied by a letter of good advice, with a request that I never would sketch views on the Sabbath-day, and to make her a solemn promise to that effect."

"Well; and did you promise."—"No. I answered her with a story of Sir Joshua Reynolds and Dr. Johnson. When the latter was on his death-bed, he sent for Reynolds, and desired him to promise three things: "First, you are not to ask me to repay the thirty pounds that I borrowed of you long ago; second, you are to read a portion of your Bible every Sabbath-day; and third, never use your pencil on Sunday." To the first two Sir Joshua readily consented, but bolted at the third. The lady wrote me back that Reynolds consented to all the three requests.*

Alas! she has been several years dead. I would give anything for the book; and have some thoughts of making a pilgrimage into Wales to endeavour to recover it.

I was often at a loss to reconcile Sir Walter Scott's descriptions of scenery, which were excellent, to his practical taste, which was not always in good keeping; for, after all, Abbotsford is a strange jumble. If he had searched all over his property, he could not have built on a less interesting spot. The public road from Melrose to Selkirk passes within fifty yards of the front of his house, and is on a level with the chimney tops. I have read somewhere, by some dashing Syntax, the following description of Abbotsford:—

"Beyond the gates you had an extensive park' laid out on the best and boldest principles of landscape gardening, as applicable to forest scenery!" The gates are very simple affairs; and the park, a field of eight English acres, rising up the shoulder of a steep brae, with the public road passing betwixt it and the mansion-house. Before building his garden-walls, and constructing a very expensive screen, as it is called, I seriously recommended that he would lift or remove the whole to a more eligible situation, and, being built of hewn stone, the affair could be easily done; and cited, for example, the House of Glasserton, in Galloway, which was removed, stone by stone, from a distance of, at least, fifteen miles, and it was of treble the magnitude of Abbotsford. "You require no architect, or new plan; the stones are numbered as you take them down; and if you have committed any mistake, you will have an opportunity of correcting it in the new erection."—"I wish," said he, "that it stood at Castlesteads, or Turnagain; but it has cost me so much to place it where it now stands, that I feel something like a duke or lord of Drumlanrig, who built that castle, expecting, it is said, to marry Queen Ann; and, when disappointed in that plan of ambition, locked up, in an iron box, the accounts of the expense of the building, pronouncing a curse on the head of any of his descendants who should uncover the nakedness of their father."

While I was engaged in surveying the estate of Abbotsford, Sir Walter was much with me in the fields. He used to come, leaning on his favourite, Tam Purdy, and tell me tales connected with the spot I might be surveying.

"This," said he, "is Turnagain; and the field below is Castlesteads, where, between the Scotts and Kerrs, a battle was fought in 1526. Buccleuch fled, pursued by the Kerrs, when one of Scott's men, an Elliot, turned again, and killed Kerr of Cessford, which was the cause of a bloody feud between the families for many a day."

One day a large wagon arrived, drawn by eight oxen, loaded with an obelisk from Forfarshire, or some of the distant eastern counties, covered with Danish or Norwegian hieroglyphics, animals, and so forth; and was erected, with great ceremony, on the rising ground above Turnagain. Having, no doubt, been erected to commemorate some battle-field, it was of little value out of its original place. My opinion being asked, I said that it had better be taken home again; for such monuments having been raised to commemorate some victory over the Scotch, were rather a disgrace to the country. Sir Walter pointed out to me, with considerable triumph, the door of the Heart of Mid-Lothian—that is, the old prison-door of Edinburgh—which he had procured, and erected as the gateway from his mansion-house to the offices. I observed, that its grim aspect gave me a disagreeable feeling, to think how many human beings had passed through it—never to return, but to the scaffold and death. How many of our noble martyrs and patriots!—"Yes," said he; "but many a traitor has passed also to receive his doom!"—"Yes," said I; "your friend, Montrose, passed through it."—"Noble martyr!" said Sir Walter, with great emotion. "As he passed to prison, up the Canongate,—placed backwards, with his face to the horse's tail, the hurdle drawn by an old white horse, and driven by the common hangman,—on passing the Chancellor's house, his head uncovered, the ladies, the Chancellor's wife and daughters, leaned over the balcony, and spat on his sacred head—the b——s!"

We entertained very different sentiments respecting the character of Montrose.

Abbotsford is intersected by footpaths in every direction; and he was particularly anxious that none of these paths should be interfered with, although the Road Commissioners offered to close some of the least important up. "Remove not the ancient landmarks," he would say. The consequence was, that he never received any injury in the way of trespass; and the people declined of themselves to walk on many of these paths, restricting themselves to those that were least offensive; such was the effect of his forbearance. "If I was to stop up any of these footpaths, which I might be able to do as unnecessary, the people, if they took it into their heads, would walk over them in spite of both the law and myself; so far, then, my indulgence is good policy." His attention to the lower orders of the country people but ill accorded with his high aristocratical visions; and his political principles were as ill digested. He wrote and distributed the Visionary,† a poor, ridiculous pamphlet, which he said was written in a style to meet the acquirements of the country people. It was distributed in the villages around, Galashiels, Selkirk, Darnick, Melrose; and a large parcel was despatched to Jedburgh, Kelso, &c. A Conservative acquaintance of mine boasted that not a single copy of the Edinburgh Review, or Scotsman was received on the banks of the Jed. Mr. Harper, a great favourite with Sir Walter, and a very large, powerful man, was fixed on to distribute, read, and explain the Visionary, to his neighbours. I asked Harper what success he had, and what he himself thought of the pamphlet. "O! man," said he, "it's waesome to see so good a man in other respects, in such a state of bewilderment."

Sir Walter presented me with some copies, and said, "They may be useful to some of your Galloway friends." After having perused a copy, I returned the parcel and said, that it was my business to prevent such principles being circulated in my native country. "Why," said he, "I have been endeavouring to prevent the rascals from pulling down the old house about their ears; and some of my best friends will render me no assistance."

Mrs. Maclean Clephane of Torloisk, in the Isle of Mull, and her daughter, were guests at Abbotsford. Both ladies were highly accomplished in Highland traditions and music. During dinner, Bruce, the family piper, was parading before the dining-room window, the great drone of his pipe decorated with a flag, and dressed in the richest Highland costume. "Is he not an elegant performer?" said Sir Walter to Mrs. Maclean Clephane; "and does he not go through these martial airs well?"—"He is a pretty man," replied she; "but he understands little of his pipe."—"Some throw cold water on the poor fellow, others praise him to the skies; for myself, I do not pretend to be a judge."—"His drones are not in tune with his chanter," said Mrs. Maclean. "He wants the Highland style altogether." The piper was served with a dram, and retired. Mr. Thomas Scott of Monklaw, uncle to Sir Walter, who was himself an excellent performer on the pipe, told me that he had given Bruce some lessons. "But his ear is false, and he will never play well. My nephew, however, is fond of a good-looking man, which Bruce is; and he can make a noise, which is all that is necessary."

Sir Walter Scott had a ballad ear only for music; and his voice, though interesting, was not musical. He complained of the judgment of Spurzheim, the phrenological doctor, who, on examining the heads of two ladies, one, of his own family, the other a daughter of the late Lord Kinedder, because the doctor gave the preference to the latter, Miss Erskine. "The other lady," said Sir Walter, "I am told by her masters, is quite a prodigy." I entirely agreed with Spurzheim. Miss Erskine was, indeed, a very superior performer. Allister Dhu used to lament, that he never could teach Scott anything of tune; but he had excellent time, and his reading and reciting were impressive. One Sunday morning he read prayers and part of the service of the Church of England, which Mrs. Maclean declared was the most impressive church service that she had ever witnessed; and every one present seemed to have the same feeling.

On a day appointed, we all set out on a hare-hunting expedition. Miss Scott rode Queen Mab, a little pony; and John Ballantyne was mounted on Old Mortality, an old, gaunt, white horse. He was dressed in a green coat, the buttons of mother-of-pearl, silver and gold, with, if I remember well, a precious stone in the centre, and altogether a most harlequin and piebald figure. Sir Walter appeared to laugh and amuse himself with his grotesque appearance. I admired the buttons. "And well you may," said Sir Walter. "These buttons, Sir, belonged to the Great Montrose, and were cut, by our friend John, from an old coat belonging to the Marquis, and which he purchased from the unworthy descendant of the family, Graham of Gartmore, with many other nick-knackets, too tedious to enumerate in this place."

As we rode to this hunt, he told us many tales connected with localities. "Here is the old Kirk of Lindean, where I once saw a vision. I had sent my servant, with a horse and cart, for provisions and other articles expected from Edinburgh. I had walked out to meet him about the time he was expected, and I saw the man, horse, and cart, coming to meet me. At once, the whole tumbled down the bank. I hurried on to render assistance, when, to my surprise, nothing was to be seen. I returned home, not a little ashamed at having allowed myself to fall into a delusion. The cart did not arrive for two hours and a half after its proper time; and when I questioned the man what had occasioned his delay,—'The carrier from Edinburgh, Sir, did not arrive until two hours after his usual time, which caused me to wait till it became dark. I got all loaded, and came away; but, on account of the darkness, the cart ran too near the brae, and all tumbled to the bottom. I found the horse had thrown himself out of his harness, and was standing unhurt. Assistance came, and I got the cart righted, and again set on the road, and we are all here safe at last.' The time that the cart really tumbled over was at least two hours after my vision."

On passing a field near Selkirk,—"There," said he, "a relation of my own, a Scott of Raeburn, fought a duel; and, in order to save himself from his adversary's weapon, wrapped round his waist a web of wet flannel. But this device did not save him; for Pringle killed him."

On passing Philiphaugh,—"There the brave Montrose had encamped, little thinking that the old, sly fox, Leslie, was at his heels, who surprised and killed the greater part of his army."—"I think I see Montrose," said I, "flying out at the Harewood head, or, as the old song has it,—

> 'At Philiphaugh the fray began,
> At Harewood head it ended;
> The Whigs out on the Grahams they ran,
> Sae merrilie as they bended.'

I am told," continued I, "that Montrose never drew bridle till he arrived in Edinburgh."

"I believe," said Sir Walter, "that he rested at Peebles. But they made a sad hand of the prisoners. Four hundred of the Colkitto Macdonnels they enclosed in the castle-yard of Newark, which you see yonder, and, at the instigation of one of their canting ministers, put them all to death; while he addressed Leslie, exclaiming, 'The wark gangs bonnilie on.' On cleaning out the old castle-yard lately, their bones were found where they fell and had been buried."

We were now at Bowhill, and the hunting commenced. Sir Walter did not ride after the hounds, but stationed himself on high ground, where he could observe the chase. The hares were so plentiful, that the moment they were started the poor creatures were run down. I never* enjoyed hare-hunting; and, giving my pony its freedom to graze, took out my sketch-book and employed myself in drawing,—"which, after all," said Sir Walter, "is more rational." He stood beside me, and inquired if conversation disturbed my drawing.—"Not in the least," said I; "and but for the pleasure of being with you, I should not have joined in this ignoble chase, which is, indeed, murder; for the hares are in a park or enclosure, and have no chance for their life in escaping."

"No doubt," said he, "the deep baying of the fox or stag-hound has a much grander effect; but we must take such as we can get. Poor things," said he; "after starting, they make a short round, and return to their form to be worried."

More hares were soon killed than could be conveniently carried home, and we left the ground at an early hour; and some of the neighbouring young farmers, who had joined the day's sport, were kept to dinner at Abbotsford.

"I promised," said he to me, "to show you some of the articles purchased by my friend, Mr. Ballantyne. He purchased for himself books, some of which I have picked out. Some old armour, &c., were all laid on a heap on the floor, and bills at three and six months about to be granted; when my friend's falcon eyes searching round the premises, to see if any article of worth had escaped his notice, espied a sword hanging on the wall. 'Whose sword may that have been?' —'That,' said Graham of Gartmore, 'is the sword of my ancestor, the Marquis of Montrose.' —'Will you sell it,' quoth John. 'No, by G—. I am bad enough; but not quite so low as that yet." —'Well,' responded John, 'if you will throw that sword into the concern, I will, in twenty-four hours, make the whole a ready-money transaction.' —'Take it, and be d——d to you,' said Graham, throwing the sword upon a heap of other articles.

'My poverty, but not my will, consents.'

And here it is," said Sir Walter Scott. "This is the very sword sent by King Charles to the gallant Montrose, the General of his armies in Scotland;" and he presented the sword for examination. "No," said I; "it was drawn against the cause in which my fathers bled, and I should account it pollution to touch it."

"Morrison," said he, "if you had lived in those times, you would either have been killed or hanged."

"And why not? If I had been properly exercised as a warrior, might not this lucky hand have saved the hangman's trouble, as a predestined arm achieved in the case of his descendant and successor bloody Clavers; but we will let the old fellows sleep."—"So be it," said Sir Walter.

At and after dinner, although he looked very kindly on Johnny Ballantyne, he made himself merry sometimes at his expense; and Ballantyne seemed awed in his presence, although, when addressed, he turned a bold front to everybody else. I ventured to joke him a little on the quality of his coat, and said that it was the best at table. "Yes," said John, "and it belonged to a better man." —"You will find some difficulty in convincing Mr. Morrison of that," said Sir Walter.

The piper strutted about as usual, and played during dinner. His dress and decorations, at least, were imposing; for, as Mrs. Maclean said, he was a pretty man. Sir Walter observed, "that pretty, in the Highland idiom, did not so much apply to a handsome man, as to a man of courage, and to the deeds he might have achieved; "yet, although Mrs. Maclean does not approve of his music, I think that she would have no objection to Bruce as a recruit."

THE SCOTTISH UNIVERSITIES AND THE ESTABLISHED CHURCH.

In the Acts of the Scottish Parliament "holden and begun at Edinburgh the third day of October, 1706," chapter VI., entitled an "Act for securing the Protestant Religion and Presbyterian Church Government," we find a clause to the following effect:—"That in all time coming, no professors, principals, regents, masters, or others bearing office in any university, college, or school, within this kingdom, be capable, or be admitted or allowed to continue in the exercise of their said functions, but such as shall own and acknowledge the civil government in manner prescribed, or to be prescribed by act of parliament: as also, that before, or at their admission, they do and shall acknowledge and profess, and shall subscribe to the Westminster Confession of Faith, AS THE CONFESSION OF THEIR FAITH; and that they will practise and conform themselves to the worship presently in use in this Church, and submit themselves to the government and discipline thereof; and never endeavour, directly or indirectly, the prejudice or subversion of the same." This is not an oath of allegiance merely: it is a Test act, a Protestant Presbyterian TEST act. It constitutes an exclusive privilege in favour of the Established Presbyterian Church, directed generally against all denominations of dissent,—intended, however, specially, as the historical circumstances out of which it arose indicate, to operate against Episcopalians and Papists. In order to secure themselves sufficiently against the then so-much-dreaded evil of the return of "Black Prelacy," our Presbyterian forefathers thought it necessary to exclude from the office of public teacher, whether in school or university, all persons who were not, in point of theological doctrine, strict adherents of the Westminster Confession of Faith,—that is, all who were not sound Calvinists; and, in point of external religious profession, genuine members of the Established Church.

How has this Act of Parliament been observed in practice?

In respect of the schoolmasters connected with the Established Church—the teachers of "the parochial schools," as we call them in Scotland—it has been most strictly observed; so much so, indeed, that in the year 1803, when Toryism was strong in this country, the clergy and the landlords got an act passed, (43 Geo. III., c. 54,) commonly called the Schoolmasters' Act, binding the parochial teachers yet more strictly down to the Church creed; and subjecting them, in matters of religion, exclusively, and without review, to the jurisdiction of the established clergy. The practical consequence of this is what might have been expected, —viz., that in this free Protestant country there is not a single schoolmaster now holding office who dares to think for himself in matters of religion, otherwise than the clergy of the Established Church choose to dictate or to permit; an evil of the very first magnitude, inasmuch as it palsies public education at the spring-head, and which would be altogether intolerable in practice, were it not that the great majority of our parochial schoolmasters have studied for the church; and are, so long as the hope may reasonably last, all expectant clergymen. From men in such a situation, anything like an independent and manly assertion of the civil rights of their order, or the religious right of private judgment, is not to be expected.

In respect of the Professors of the Universities, the clerical act of exclusive privilege has been observed more or less loosely; and in Edinburgh, at least, has, for a long series of years, been altogether obsolete in both branches of the Test: neither soundness of Calvinistic creed, nor strictness of Church conformity, having been uniformly exacted from the Professors holding lay-chairs in the Scottish Universities. On the contrary, it is notorious that many of the most distinguished Professors in Edinburgh have never signed the Calvinistic creed at all; and it is equally notorious that in Glasgow, some who did sign it, (among others the late talented Professor Sandford,) considered themselves, nevertheless, at liberty to refuse conformity to the worship of the Established Church, and have, de facto, been in the communion of the Episcopalian dissent: the very body of "black Prelatists" to exclude whom the act was more immediately intended.

The Moderate party of the Church of Scotland, that is, the great majority of the clergy now, since the late Secession, remaining in the Establishment, have, in conjunction with the Senatus Academicus of the University of St. Andrews, lately made a movement towards the restoration of the slumbering Test act to full vigour and active operation. They have memorialized Government to eject Sir David Brewster—a man well known in the scientific world—from the office of Principal in that institution, because this gentleman belongs to the Free Protesting Church of Scotland, and not to the Establishment. This is an indication of considerable vigour on the part of the Moderates, and proves, that if the Evangelical Secessionists are remarkable for bigotry in points of doctrine, they, on the other hand, do not lack intolerance in small points of church discipline and ecclesiastical practice. This move of the Moderates shows a determination to enforce, not merely the spirit, but the strict letter of the enactment. Sir David Brewster and the Free Protesting churchmen are brother-PRESBYTERIANS of the Established clergy. The Act of Parliament was certainly not made to exclude, but to include Presbyterians.

The question is, Whether the Scottish universities and the Scottish people should sanction, by their acquiescence, this move of the Moderate clergy? whether they should not rather most decidedly and energetically protest against it? We think they should do this last, and this last only; and that for the following reasons:—

In the first place, it is extremely desirable—even the clergy, we hope, will admit—when a vacancy occurs in an academical chair, to supply such an important public office, not with the best man being a churchman, but with the best man generally. A man may be a good Chemist, and be very ignorant of Calvinistic theology; a good Naturalist, and prefer a liturgy to extempore prayers. It is proper, indeed, that the patrons of the universities should select men, when they can get them, who are not merely expert in their particular department, but also of good morals and respectable character generally; but this duty on the part of patrons is a very different thing from a right on the part of the clergy to exclude all men, however eminent in science, from the universities, who have not the good fortune to have been born sound Calvinists and good Presbyterians. Church orthodoxy is one thing, Christian piety is another; and heterodoxy, as everybody knows, does not mean cacodoxy at all—not an evil or malignant doxy in any sense, but only another man's doxy: your doxy generally as opposed to mine. Now, when there is a plain advantage, an imperative necessity, in a university filling its chairs with the best men generally, in a scientific and literary point of view, such a talk about theological doxies, Calvinism, Arminianism, Thirty-nine Articles, and Thirty-three Chapters, is, to say the least of it, pretty considerably impertinent.

In the second place, of all creeds which lay professors, not necessarily instructed in sectarian peculiarities, could be called upon to subscribe, the Confession of Faith is certainly the most objectionable. It is not a creed, indeed, in the common sense of the word, at all, like the Apostles' Creed, or the Thirty-nine Articles even; it is, more properly speaking, a pocket body of divinity, and a portable digest of Calvinism; it is not a parchment merely, it is a book. It is a book containing thirty-three chapters, in which many of the most minute and knotty points of controversial divinity are discussed; it is a curiously-compacted and systematically-complete architecture of Calvinistic theology; it is a scheme of theological science, as comprehensive and detailed in its doctrinal views as it is strict and rigorous in its sectarian spirit. Nay, more, as the manifesto of an ascendant religious party in an age when intolerance was a necessary part of piety, it is essentially leavened throughout with an intolerant and persecuting spirit, from which every large-hearted and Catholic-minded man must instinctively recoil. Witness, for instance, the following clause from the well-known chapter, (xxiii.) "OF THE CIVIL MAGISTRATE." "The civil magistrate hath authority, and it is his duty to take order that unity and peace be preserved in the church, and the Faith of God be kept pure and entire; that ALL BLASPHEMIES AND HERESIES BE SUPPRESSED, and all the ordinances of God duly settled, administered, and observed." If we can read the English language, this clause both sanctions and enjoins persecution for religious opinions (in the language of the Church, heresies;) and it is from this text that all penal statutes and Test acts, all religious wars and persecutions, all church-monopolies, and practices of priestly ascendency have been preached in Europe from the Reformation, and are preached, even now, to a certain extent; so far, that is to say, as the public opinion of Europe will allow. Now, is it not a most monstrous pretence, on the part of the clergy, that all the professors, say of the Medical Faculty of Edinburgh, shall not only subscribe their implicit faith in the Calvinistic theology of the Confession, but, by so subscribing, (if without qualification,) do that also which is tantamount to signing away their liberties as British subjects, and publicly protesting against all the acts of toleration which have been passed in this country since the days of King William? We can understand how the clergy who subscribe such things are, and, indeed, if they are honest men, must be intolerant; but it is enough for the good of the community, one should think, that subscription of creeds in the nineteenth century be confined to the Church exclusively, and leave the universities free.

III. We are opposed to this bigoted move of the Moderates farther, on the special ground, that whatever may be the character of Oxford and Cambridge, an ecclesiastical character does not, in any sense, belong to the Scottish universities. They are not seminaries of the Church merely, and private institutions for educating the children of Churchmen, as the English Universities, falsely so called, are; but they are national institutions, supported, and existing for great national purposes generally. This was expressly declared by the Commission.* The students in our universities subscribe no tests, as they do in Oxford: why should the grown men be slaves of a Presbyterian priesthood, any more than the little boys?

IV. It is, moreover, insulting in the highest degree, and degrading to the literary and scientific character of this country, that such a test should be allowed to exist, even for a moment. It is insulting: for what right has the Church to lord it over the Universities? With what grace do clerical men prescribe creeds and modes of belief to persons who, in intellectual strength and culture, are generally their own equals, and often their superiors? It is degrading: for mark the consequences: either the clergy—as they have too often done—work this Act of the Scottish Parliament so as to secure to themselves and their creatures (often an inferior and ignoble set) the principal places in the universities; while laymen, not creatures of the Church, are publicly declared unfit for those situations of academical dignity, for which they may possess superior qualifications; or free-minded laymen are constantly tempted, and (as human nature is constituted) will generally be seduced to sacrifice high principle and manly independence to the convenience and (as it will seem) necessity of the moment. Such a Test act degrades literary men only too often, by making them public participators in an act of solemn hypocrisy and humbug. It is a bridge of easy passage to the bold and unprincipled; to the modest and conscientious a ban. Let bigoted Churchmen, and monopolizing Moderates, plead for this thing; good Christians never will.

For these reasons, we are of opinion that the Scottish universities, and the Scottish people, should protest at once, firmly and decidedly, against the practical enforcement of the Presbyterian Test act, now most unwisely attempted to be made by the Moderate party in the Church. We have said nothing of consequences; but if this movement of clerical exclusiveness be persisted in, it is plain we must lose, not only all the Free Protesting professors, who may not amount to above half-a-dozen, but all the Episcopalians also, who, indeed, are the grand offenders against both the spirit and the letter of the act; and who, in Edinburgh and Glasgow together, amount to at least a whole dozen. There must, in short, be a royal commission issued forthwith; and all professors, however orthodox, who are not Established Churchmen; and all professors, who, however much attached to the Establishment, are not Calvinists sound in the faith, (for both these conditions are equally a part of the bond,) must be summarily ejected. This would be a consummation by none but violent Churchmen devoutly to be wished. Then, again, the Free Protesting men, the Episcopalians, and other Dissenters, if their Professors be forcibly driven out of the Universities by a conspiracy of the old Moderates and the Tory government, may easily retaliate by conspiring to withdraw their students from these institutions, not at present particularly over-burdened with a fee-paying population. The Scottish Universities will then become, like the English, mere ecclesiastical seminaries; and what they shall or shall not endure in this capacity, will then be to the general public a matter of comparative indifference. The Academical and Presbyterial bigots of St. Andrews are much mistaken if they think Scotland cannot now help itself to learning without ecclesiastical universities and Calvinistic professors.

We shall conclude these remarks with two quotations:—

"I am of opinion," says Mr. BURKE, in his speech on the second reading of a bill for the Relief of Protestant Dissenters, (1773) "I am of opinion that IT IS NOT WISE IN A WELL-CONSTITUTED COMMONWEALTH TO RETAIN THOSE LAWS WHICH IT IS NOT PROPER TO EXECUTE." This is the opinion of a great statesmen. "I dissent," says LORD CORNHOUSE, in the explanation appended to his subscription of the University Commission Report in 1830, "I dissent from the resolution, that all Professors shall be required to subscribe the Confession of Faith of the Church of Scotland. It is proper and necessary that the Theological faculty should belong to the Church established in this part of the kingdom; but to extend the same rule to the other faculties, by which not only Dissenters of all denominations, but members of the Church of England are excluded from teaching science and literature, seems an inexpedient restriction in the choice of Professors. It is true that subscription is enjoined by the Acts of Parliament cited in the Report; but the circumstances and opinions of the country have materially changed since that period: and, in particular, the number of Episcopalians has increased among the best-educated class of the community. Accordingly, the practice of subscription has, for a long time, been generally discontinued in the Universities; and I AM OF OPINION THAT THOSE STATUTES, NOW FALLEN INTO DISUSE, INSTEAD OF BEING ENFORCED SHOULD BE REPEALED. Each of the Universities has the privilege of sending a representative to the General Assembly; but there is no danger that a Professor, qualified for that office, should not be found in each, especially as the Theological faculty are necessarily Presbyterians.

"In like manner, I see no reason why subscription by all the members of the University court should be required." This is the opinion of a great lawyer, and an eminent judge. How simple and how beautiful a thing is UNDERSTANDING!

SPECIMENS OF MODERN ROMANCE.

NO. VI.—THE SLAPDASH MILITARY.

PHELIM O'TOOLE, THE LIGHT DRAGOON.

THE RENDEZVOUS.

I LEFT my comrades seated by the watchfire, and throwing a military cloak loosely over my shoulders, I pursued the narrow winding path through the brushwood, towards the spot indicated by the Señora's letter. It was a glorious balmy night—glorious even for the Peninsula, where the curse of watery skies and nipping blasts rarely chills the occidental luxuriance of the summer. In the sky above, a thousand stars were gleaming brighter than the polished sparkle of lances, a galaxy of heavenly jewels! The leaves of the cork-trees scarce fluttered beneath the aspirations of the warm midnight air, and beds of the scented wild asparagus loaded the atmosphere with a rich and indolent odour. At any other time the emotion excited in my bosom by these scenes would have led my thoughts back to the shores of my native Ireland. I would have drawn a contrast, not unfavourable surely, between the limpid vale of the Bidassoa and the brown bogs of Ballyshannon; but now, both the absorbing thought of the coming interview with my adored Donna Susquehanna, and the intense anticipation of the morrow's combat, thronged upon me, and I had no space left to dwell upon the wrongs of my beloved country.

I reached the ridge, and, turning back, surveyed the plain beneath. An undulating curve of blazing watch-fires marked where the embattled squadrons of the French held their furious bivouac. Faintly, from the remote distance, came the neighing of the steeds as they champed their withered provender; and I could hear, at times, the voice of the watchful sentinels, as they passed along the line the emphatic watchword of the night "Sauve qui peut!"

"If the fighting Fifty-fifth don't give some of these lads their gruel before this time to-morrow," said I to myself, "my name isn't Phelim O'Toole."

So saying, I descended the path on the other side of the hill, and, in a few minutes, reached the appointed spot. It was a little mound of turf, above the slope of which spread the foliage of a luxuriant ilex; whilst a spring, clear as crystal, welled out from its mossy covering. A figure advanced from the shade of the trees, and in a moment the Señora was in my arms.

"Oh, is it indeed you, Phelim?" said she, with the delightful abandonment of her country. "Do you indeed love me, Capitano mio?"

"Don't I, you crathur?" was the reply. "By this, and this——"

"Ah, Phelim! don't squeeze me so tightly! And you have forsaken that pale English girl for ever?"

The blood rushed to my brow as if driven by a force-pump. Yes! wretch that I was,—villain,—traitor,—what you will! I had forgotten poor Mary Howard. The ripe charms of the beautiful Spaniard had come between me and the star of my earliest affection, and blotted her from my memory. I covered my face with my hands, and groaned bitterly!

The Señora tried to comfort me; but in vain. She could not understand my feelings,—I question if any one but an Irishman could,—and perhaps thought that I was overpowered with my affection for herself. All at once the brushwood crackled behind us,—the Señora screamed,—and I was struggling in the grasp of two French tirailleurs. "Rendez vous, Capitaine; vous êtes notre prisonnier!" said one.

"The Fifty-fifth never yield!" said I, making a dash at the throat of the speaker. We rolled over and over upon the velvet turf; whilst the other Frenchman drew his sword, apparently for the purpose of running me through the body the moment he could do so without inflicting injury on his comrade. At this crisis the report of a pistol sounded close by, and the gigantic Frenchman fell with a loud malediction on his lips. He was shot through the heart.

"Take this poignard!" said the Señora, "and rid yourself of the other!"

I grasped the proffered implement, with which the pocket of every Spanish lady is furnished, and buried it in the bosom of my antagonist. His hold instantly relaxed, and I started to my feet.

"Who fired that shot?"

"Phelim O'Toole, it was I!" said a deep voice at my back; and, turning hastily round, I recognised Trevyllian, the heavy dragoon. His face was as pale as death, and his large glassy eyes stared gloomily upon me.

"Trevyllian!" said I; "how strange! I little expected this. But you have saved my life. Here is my hand!"

"Boy!" he replied, with a scornful laugh, "do you think that I love you, because I slew your enemy? Remember Mary Howard, and that fatal night beneath the plane-trees of Pampeluna, and then say—say, as a man of honour and a soldier, whether I can accept your hand!"

"Trevyllian!" I said, mournfully; for I felt how deeply indeed I had wounded the heart of that noble though saturnine being; "Trevyllian! is it indeed so? And have I made you unhappy? Ask of me what you will; my life—my fortune—all—anything—but do not ask me to abandon Mary Howard!"

"Traitor!" cried the Señora, "is it thus that you keep your vows?"

"And this," said Trevyllian, bitterly, "this is the pure, high-minded lover of her who rejected me for his sake? Why, the very infant in pursuit of the butterfly has more steadiness of purpose; for he does not seek to run down a second insect until he has secured the first; but you, Captain O'Toole, I ask you, as a man of honour, why you are here with the lady?"

"Major Trevyllian," said I, sternly, "you abuse the advantage you have gained. Much as I am indebted to you, Sir, I shall not suffer you to play the inquisitor; nor even, for the sake of my own vindication, shall I be induced to compromise the reputation of another."

"An excellent excuse! You do justice to your education, Captain O'Toole. A lawyer could not have answered better. It is a pity that the army should have robbed the Irish bar of so subtle and ready a casuist."

"Trevyllian!" I said, "beware!—Do not press me too far, or force me to remember that I am indeed a soldier."

"Methinks, young man," said the heavy dragoon, "it had been well if you had remembered that sooner. But enough of this. What has become of the lady?"

And, indeed, it appeared, that during our discussion the Señora had stolen away. I confess that I was not sorry to be relieved from a disagreeable explanation; and perhaps I had, indeed, allowed my warmth of temperament to carry me beyond the bounds of discretion. But an Irishman is never cool, except in the field of battle.

"Major Trevyllian," said I, "however harshly you may think of me, I cannot forget the great duty that we both owe to our country. Should we survive to-morrow's battle, there will be time enough for us to settle our private quarrel. Till then, let us bury all animosity. Is it a bargain?"

"It is!" said the heavy dragoon, emphatically; "and we shall see whether you or I pierce deepest into the ranks of the enemy. He who wins an eagle from the French is best worthy of Mary Howard!"

"So be it!" said I; and we parted. Trevyllian strode through the forest, and I returned to the bivouac.

THE NIGHT ATTACK.

"Charley O'Malley, my son, push round the sherry!" said old Monsoon, as I approached. "It's little way towards quenching your thirst that the thought of Lucy Dashwood will go. There's poor Jack Hinton, with a throat as dry as the great Zahara desert."

"Come, come, Major! that excuse wont do. Hinton has been remarkably shy of the sherry, ever since you hocussed him with the Teneriffe from the King of Portugal's cellar."

"Ha, ha! capital joke that was, to be sure! Why, O'Toole, what's the matter with you? You look as pale as moonlight, and your epaulette is half-tore away."

"A slight brush with the French, Major; that's all. Two of their skirmishers fell upon me in the valley, down yonder; but they'll never trouble us again!"

"Tuns and puncheons!" cried Monsoon, starting to his feet. "You don't mean to say the blackguards are prowling about so near!"

"Faith do I, Major; more by token that one of them, in his last moments, confessed that he had been instigated by Junot to seek for, search, and capture a certain fat commissary, known by the name of Monsoon, who drank, to his own cheek, the whole of last year's vintage of Alcantara."

O'Malley burst into a loud laugh. "Never mind him, Major; he's only making game of you. Better see to the broiled bones. I'm devilish hungry; and we'll all be ready for supper by the time Lorrequer has finished his song."

"If that's all you're waiting for, Charley," said Lieutenant Lorrequer, "Mickey Free may be looking out the forks. Here goes; and I say, my lads, mind you help me with the chorus."

Harry Lorrequer's Song.

'Twas in the field,
When none would yield,
And Frenchmen breath'd defiance,
Our gallant band
Went, hand in hand,
With the Portuguese Alliance.

The fighting Third
They onward spurr'd,
To give the foe their gruel;
And Picton, he
Cried out to me,
"Pitch into them, my jewel!"
(Chorus.)—We'll drive them back
Across the track,
And carry all their trenches.
It's little sin
To pitch it in,
And floor the furious Frenchies.

At beat of drum
The squadrons come,
With all their colours flying;
And valiant look,
While great "Malbrook"
Their fifers play'd, defying.
Like lightning, through
A bush or two,
Right through their lines soon we go;
And, ere night sank,
Our wine we drank
Within Ciudad Rodrigo.
(Chorus.)—We drove them back
Across the track;
We carried all their trenches.
It's little sin
To pitch it in,
And floor the furious Frenchies.

"Bravo, Lorrequer!" cried a dozen voices.—"Moore is a joke to you," gurgled Monsoon, through a quart of sherry, which he had tossed off during the pauses of the song. "Oh, the divil! hear to that crathur Sparks!"

We turned to our sentimental friend, who sat by the fire, playfully stirring the embers with his counterscarp, and humming to himself—

It's little sin
To pitch it in,
And kiss the charming wenches!"

"I say, Sparks," cried O'Malley, "we'll allow none of your low immorality here."

"Shame, shame!" echoed half the mess.—"Oh, the deludin' villin! It's little I'd uv thought it ov you, Misther Sparks," exclaimed Mickey Free, who at that moment entered, bearing a steaming load of soup, which, for want of a more convenient utensil, he had dished up in a spontoon.

"Push the sherry, O'Toole," said Monsoon, "and don't look sleepy. May I die the death of a sinner, if I don't think you're grown spoony of late. It's the way with all you young dogs. You will always be looking into bright eyes till they burn a hole in your shakos, and fingering glossy ringlets, or, as that old ruffian Milton has it, sporting 'with the tangles of Neæra's hair,'—isn't that it, O'Shaughnessy?—till you're fixed like a sheep in an Anaconda's tail. Rosy cheeks and rosy lips—fudge,—stick to the broiled bones and the sherry negus. That's your only safety. Push the liquor, boys. The night's young, and the drink's plenty."

[We omit a great quantity of lively dialogue, consisting, for the most part, of requests to pass the bottle, and squibs upon Monsoon's thievish propensities.]

"Good God!" cried Sparks, starting back from the pasty, the breach in which he had just stormed, "did you hear that?"

"Cockadoodle-doo—oo—oo!"

"There it is again. The spatchcock is alive, as sure as I am. See, it stretches out its neck! It flaps its wings. Mick, you rascal, what do you mean by serving up live spatchcocks?"

"Sorrow taste of it's living, Misther Sparks. I twisted the necks of every bird of them with my own hands, as nate as any boneen in all Galway."

"Cockadoodle-doo—oo—oo!" again rose shrilly from beneath the pie-crust. Sparks grew very white in the face, and Monsoon hiccuped the propriety of passing the gentleman the sherry. We were all at a nonplus.

"Where's Lorrequer?" said I, for the first time missing that illustrious campaigner from the seat opposite me, which he had been occupying.

"Bolted,—gone to roost!" said a dozen guttural voices.

"Cockadoodle-doo—oo—oo!" The interior of the pasty was again vocal.

My foot happening, at this moment, to come in contact with a heavy body, I thought of looking under the table. There lay O'Malley, in a state of blissful unconsciousness, preparing his throat for another crow. The mystery of the spatchcock was explained. We raised O'Malley, who was by this time so completely occupied with one engrossing idea, that he could give utterance to no other, but continued to exclaim, in subdued and slightly inarticulate accents, with an air of quiet philosophy,—"I'm d——d drunk;"—a position which none of us felt called upon, at that moment, to dispute.

We were still engaged in restoring the equilibrium of our fallen friend, when the swell of a bugle, ringing through the silence of the morning—for we had carried our revels so far—startled us from our friendly office. To this succeeded the quick roll of the Devil's Tattoo upon the muffled drums along the whole of our line. It was manifest that the camp had been surprised. We all started to our feet; and in an instant every man of us had buckled on his sabretache, and slung his ravelin across his shoulder. The soda-water was fortunately abundant, and soon dispelled the fumes of Monsoon's sherry. Even O'Malley was as steady as the monument.

"To your troops, you drunken vagabonds," said Picton, dashing into the room, and waving high above his head a camp-stool which, in the hurry of the moment, he had caught up in the nearest bivouac. "You, O'Malley, carry your detachment round by the bend of the river, cross the hill, and charge the enemy's left flank.—O'Toole, keep them in play on the right, till the Eighty-fifth come up." We touched our caps and retired. Five minutes before, and we had been fast drowning the little brains we had in the vintage of Alcantara—heedless alike of present, past and future—and now, with energies braced for the grapple of death, with heads clear, and hearts throbbing with the high impulses of patriotism, and eyes bright with visions of promotion, we were ready to lead our gallant countrymen to the conflict with that noble foe, whom they were bound to vanquish by every tie which glory and their country's pay could impose upon a British soldier's heart. I have often had occasion to observe, from personal experience, how the stupid imbecility of drunkenness vanishes before the excitement of sudden danger, or the call of elevated duty; but I never felt this more signally than in the present instance.

Not a moment was to be lost. A dropping fire told us that part of our lines had already engaged. So we sprung into the saddles of our horses, which by this time our servants had led round from the pickets, and dashed off to our different troops. A loud cheer from my men received me as I rode among them. With the rapidity of thought I drew them up in a hollow square; and, as I passed the command, "Make ready, present," along the line, I felt that when the time came to conclude the order with the word "Fire!" the French troopers would go down like ninepins before the withering volley. The morning had begun to break; but the mist, which hung upon the low ground, concealed the enemy from our view. We could hear, however, the clatter of their sabres against their horses' flanks, and the "Allez vous en!" of their commanding officers encouraging them to the onslaught. It is a moment of vast interest—of thrilling suspense—the brief interval that precedes the shock of action. The fitful thought of home, of our own native bogs,—the years long past curdled into a moment's space—the hurried glance to all that the heart holds dearest—the brief prayer—and, over all, the high prevailing thought of a grave of glory or The Gazette. All these passed with the swiftness of intuition through my mind; and still, amid them all, one bright form shone ever serenely forth, and seemed to beckon me to honour and to fame. "Yes, Mary," I exclaimed, to the infinite surprise of a sergeant who was chewing a cartridge at my elbow, "if I die, thy tears shall hallow my bloody sepulchre; and if I live, it shall be with a name not unworthy to mingle with that of the noble Howards!"

"Silence in the ranks!" cried the hoarse voice of my commanding officer, Sir George Dashwood. I of course did not pursue my apostrophe further.

At this moment the mist before us seemed rent asunder; and from its depths, as from the bowels of a volcano, shot forth a mass of flame, with a roar that shook the ground on which we stood. Again and again it came, scattering death on every side. Presently, from amidst the smoke, issued forth a dark mass, which I soon distinguished as a troop of cuirassiers. "En avant, mes braves!" exclaimed the gallant Ney, whose voice I recognised in that of the officer at the head of the column. Every sabre started from its sheath, and we were preparing to charge down the hill upon the advancing enemy, when an officer rode up. It needed not his eagle eye and equally aquiline nose to tell us that it was Lord Wellington.

"Lads," he cried, "you know your duty. Do it. Cha-a-a-a-a-a-a-rge!"

Every spur was buried in our horses' flanks as we thundered down the hill. The French cavalry, horse and man, were trodden under us like brushwood. Indeed, such was the impetus which the declivity gave our troops, that we rode through the French column, and were a considerable way beyond it, before we drew a rein. But our success had carried us too far. Before us were a troop of horse artillery, who, after discharging their ricochets in our faces with deadly effect, wheeled and unlimbered with the speed of lightning. On the left a strong body of infantry was advancing towards us, headed by Junot; while Massena was bringing up a squadron of heavy cavalry to charge us on the right. By this time, too, the broken fragments of Ney's battalion had re-formed upon our rear; and thus we all at once found ourselves completely hemmed in by the flower of the French Peninsular army. But it is in positions like these, that the dauntless bravery of the British veteran is best seen. Here was glory indeed to be won! On every side flashed the deadly musketry. Volley after volley told with shattering effect. One ball passed through my thorax, while another pierced my left shoulder. But I had no time to think of these wounds; for I presently found myself engaged, sabre to sabre, with Massena. The struggle between us was long and desperate. I have never encountered a better swordsman than Massena; and the result might have been anything but favourable to me, had not his charger tumbled over a spent bombshell. Availing myself of the accident, I made a furious cut at him, and his sword-arm fell powerless by his side. I should have spoiled his fencing for the future, had not a young Frenchman, dashing between us, given me enough to do to defend myself.

Faint with loss of blood, and with my exertions, I found myself gradually giving way before my new assailant, when a loud huzza, from the hill above us, rung in my ears, and, turning my head, I saw Sir Stapleton Cotton's brigade dashing down the hill to the assistance of our now severely shattered troop. A deafening shock—the mingled roar of artillery and earthquake clash of cavalry—rent the air; whilst the cheers, which told of the vacillating fortune of the fight, rose amid the wild scream of the Highland bagpipe. All was confusion before my eyes, and I remember nothing of that dreadful moment, but the ferocious visages of the Old Guard, as they stroked their grim moustaches, and prepared their bayonets to receive the charging squadron.

The young Frenchman continued to press me with unabated fury. By this time my troop had retreated to some little distance, so that I was entirely separated from them. The issue of our combat was still doubtful, when a cannon ball struck my horse in the shoulder, and, covered with blood and foam, he rolled to the earth, bearing me with him.

"So perish all faithless English!" said my opponent, waving his sabre exultingly; and in that voice I recognised one which, in its softer accents, had often charmed my ear. Yes, the Señora—for she it was—had thrown aside the woman, and, disguised as a French tirailleur, had sought me through all that ghastly fight to slake her jealousy in my blood. Such is the fatal fervour of the Spanish maiden's heart.

My fall had not been unobserved; for, while the Señora was yet speaking, an officer, bareheaded, with his long, dark hair streaming like a meteor from his haggard face, rode up to the spot. It was Trevyllian. The pallor of death was on his brow, and the blood sprung from his firmly-compressed lips. "Curses on you!" he exclaimed; "you have stripped me of my revenge;" and, whirling his sabre above his head, he rose in his saddle, and bringing it down with a force which bore down all opposition, he struck the Señora to the earth; not, however, before she had discharged her pistol in his face. The ball took effect in his forehead. I saw the blood gush in a torrent from his lips. He reeled in his saddle, and fell.

* * * * *

The sun was high in the heavens when my senses returned. I was lying against a broken gun carriage, with my head leaning on a military chest. Around me lay fearful evidence of the bloody fray—dismounted guns, broken wagons, and heaps of dead and dying rolled in blood. At some distance from me I observed figures moving to and fro about the field, removing the wounded and pillaging the dead; and, from their uniform, I knew but too well that the French had remained masters of the field.

I was stiff with cold, and my wounds smarted severely. Feeling myself unable to rise, my first thought was, how to make the best of my position till some good Samaritan should come up to me. I pulled a cheroot from my cartouche-box, and, striking a light, proceeded to smoke with what serenity I could. I never found the flavour of the Indian weed more grateful than at that moment.

I had commenced a second cheroot, when several of the French staff, Murat, Junot, Ney, Massena, and the rest, approached. The military chests, which had fallen from a broken wagon near me, had obviously attracted their attention. I saw Junot strike open one of them with a broken gun-rammer. A quantity of doubloons rolled to the earth.

"C'est a moi!" cried the gallant Ney, dashing forward and snatching up a handful of the broad pieces.

"A toi! vil pendard! Nous verrons ça," shouted Junot, tapping the Marshal's head, as he spoke, with the rammer.

"Dix milles tonnères. Quoi! Frapper un Marèchal de l'Empire! Gardez vous, infâme!" cried the Marshal, unsheathing his sword and rushing at Junot, who with equal rapidity stood upon the defensive. They went to work with all the ferocity of disappointed avarice; while their fellow-generals seized the opportunity to appropriate the doubloons. They were still busy stowing them away in their haversacks, when Ney, observing them, dropped his sword, and exclaimed—"Arrêtez vous, mon cher Junot. Regardez ces voleurs infames!"

"Sacristie!" muttered Junot, and they both began to drive off their brother generals from the disputed treasure.

I thought it was time to end this fun. Not far from where I was lying, and within a few feet of the French generals, lay a barrel of gunpowder, which had dropped from the artillery train. The head of the barrel was stove in, and, with a cautious aim, I threw my lighted cigar into it. The next thing I saw was Massena following Junot on his way to heaven; but at this moment Marshal Ney falling across my body, drove what little breath was left me entirely out of it.

ANTI-CORN LAW RHYME.

THE STARVING MOTHER AND HER CHILD.

Oh, hush! my darling, for your wail
Distracts my head, and pains my heart.
I have no bread—no bread to give,
You must endure fierce hunger's smart.
I pine and faint with hunger too,
And other cares unknown to you.

Oh, nestle in thy scanty straw
And try to sleep away thy care;
Yes, sleep, and dream of happy days,
Of blessed ease, and dainty fare.
The waking hours are slowly sped
Amid one gnawing rage for bread.

Gaunt fever that with busy death,
Still hovers o'er the starving poor,
Assailed us in our lowly shed,
And thy poor father is no more.
They bore him out, I know not where,
But almost wish that I were there.

I saw them take him from that straw,
I spoke no word, I could not weep;
Some cursed fiend aye bid me laugh,
And then I thought I did but sleep.
I rush'd to clasp him where he lay;
I did not dream he was away.

I never yet could rightly tell
What people mean by happiness;
If I could rest, and eat, and sleep,
I had no thought of other bliss.
I've heard them sing of joy, and love,
By flow'ry fields and sighing grove,

That some are great and rich I know,
And oft have wish'd such lot were mine;
No doubt that happiness is theirs:
When do they toil, or starve, or pine?
Ah, they can never, never know
Dread hunger's terrors, want, or woe.

Beyond the grave, I've heard it said,*
There is a life of joy and peace,
A life which never, never ends,
Where want, and toil, and sorrows cease.
It may be true, I scarcely know,—
But if it is, should like to go.

There is a day when, to the church,
The people crowd to hear the priest;
But oh, too glad to be at rest,
From mill and labour when releas'd,
I never went. 'Twere vain to ask
The priest to stop an endless task.

You sigh, my child; as the dull light
Falls on your pallid face you sigh
In sleep. Oh me, it is no sleep!
Or what! what means that starting eye?
'Tis death!—'tis death!—'tis death! Despair
Has done its worst: thy grave I'll share!

HOOD'S AUSTRALIA AND THE EAST. *

If the breed of English Squires has amazingly improved, or rather been completely regenerated, since the days of Squire Western, it is not less true that the race of Scottish Lowland Lairds has ameliorated at least as much since the age of Balmawhapple, the Laird of Dumbiedykes, and Morton of Milnwood; those flagrant types of Scottish gentry, among whom a Jonathan Oldbuck of Monkbarns was but a happy accident. If proofs of this improvement were not rife on every hand, the recent writings of Mr. Samuel Laing, and the work now before us, might alone establish the fact. This work is the production of a Berwickshire Laird; and the best book, with the exception of Dr. Lang's elaborate history of the colony, which we have yet seen upon Australia. Its inferiority to Dr. Lang's History consists in the absence of facts and statistics. This is a want, to those seeking merely for the kind of information which may enable them to concert their plans and regulate their proceedings, for which nothing can atone; but as a book to gratify the general reader, it is in every way superior to the more formal work, and in one respect more valuable to persons meditating the serious step of emigration, as it exhibits the internal state and prospects of the colony at a later period and during a disastrous crisis. And of all these rapidly-increasing colonies, it may be affirmed, that what was true in any one year does not exactly hold in the next, whether in relation to the value and eligibility of land, stock, or locality. Mr. Hood's eldest son had gone out at a very early period of life to New South Wales. With a Scottish partner he first settled at Bourolong, in the New England of Australia, and subsequently by himself at a station named Connobolas, a place sufficiently remote and wild, though only about two hundred miles west from Sydney. To visit this son, to spy out the capabilities of the land of promise, and to gratify a liberal curiosity, Mr. Hood embarked for Australia in May 1841, accompanied by a younger son, who had also views of settling in Australia.

The journal of the voyage out in an emigrant ship fills up a considerable portion of the volume, and is among the best narratives of the kind that we remember, whether as regards the gratification of the general reader, or his instruction if he shall become a voyager. Mr. Hood's observations and hints must, we should think, lead to improvement in the conduct of such voyages. There seems indeed great room for reform on board of all emigrant ships. But leaving these, and the incidental advices given to voyagers for the promotion of their personal comfort, we shall cite but one or two sentences illustrative of the style of the work, and pass to the heart of the matter—Sydney and the Bush. Many of the passengers in the crowded vessel were Irish. Scarlet fever, measles, and hooping-cough had broken out in the ship, and there was much suffering and dismay.

The Irish heart is of the finest porcelain of the earth. More affection and kindness I never saw displayed in my life than amongst these Irish emigrants. The husband and father is to be seen supporting the drooping head of his sick wife or child; and the wife and mother showing all the better qualities of the female heart, while oppressed and stricken herself. I see at this moment such a group before me. Silent and watchful lies a poor man supporting his partner in distress,—her head upon his breast, and a child in her arms, which she is feeding from her withered breast, when any short respite from extreme illness enables her to do so; all the three are one mass of squalid wretchedness, painful to look at, but rendered interesting by the air of resignation and kind feeling in the countenance of the man. The Scotch are apparently less afflicted. Habit reconciles the eye to everything. Poverty, Shakspere says, makes us acquainted with strange bedfellows. So does sea-sickness. In one heap of discomfort, we see on the main deck, twenty or thirty people all lying together, heads and feet, without their delicacy being offended. That influence that draws together stranger hearts is also here. Several young men and young women have already shown a predilection for each other's society; and I have little doubt that, shortly after our arrival, there will be a numerous batch of marriages at Sydney. . . . . I have mentioned that our Scotch and Irish passengers kept themselves separate. This evening they were ranged on opposite sides of the ship. The Irish were dancing their fandango-like dances, when, to the great delight of us Scots, a Blairgowrie man and two other Highlanders struck up, in admirable style, a whistling trio—"Scots wha ha'e wi' Wallace bled," and "John Anderson my jo." The effect was electric: the airs of Scotia on the wild strange sea sounded more touchingly to us than they ever did before.

A beautiful little Greek vessel crossed our bows this evening, and hundreds of porpoises played around our ship. In striking contrast to the stormy weather and rough seas we have lately had, this morning has arisen all we could desire it;—a beautiful sun, mild air, and comparatively smooth sea; and, better than all, a more favourable wind. A fine day at sea is certainly a very delightful thing; but, after all, it is sadly monotonous, and soon wearies the eye. How different from the landscape on shore, with its thousand objects and endless variety of tints! Here all is one vast interminable heaving mass of dazzling deep-blue water—there, all the varieties of light and shadow give interest to the scene: thousands of animated things arrest the attention; the flocks, the herds, and, were there nothing else, the singing of birds. Here the grampus and porpoise tumble and dive about, but they are mute; and, for the merlin and the mavis, we have the scream of the wild sea-mew and the rapid silent flight of Mother Carey's chickens. . . . . How often has the fate of the President been in our minds, and formed the subject of our discourse! Never, till now, could I fully estimate the unutterable horrors of her end, whether by fire or water. In our ship, fire is too little guarded against; smoking is allowed too liberally both fore and aft, and the fires in the cook-shops, and the lights under the forecastle, are very disagreeably brilliant, and at too late hours. I have hinted at this, and an order was given for "douse the glim" earlier; but as yet it has not been attended to.

Every one that goes to sea, for however short a voyage, must lay his account to encounter at least one awful and perilous storm, such as no man has ever before met with and survived. The Lady Kennaway, Mr. Hood's ship, experienced several fresh gales, as sailors term violent storms, and one really terrific hurricane; and had sundry hair-breadth escapes from dangers caused by accident, and also by very culpable negligence. Of negligence, which under such circumstances becomes serious guilt, we shall give but one instance.

* Australia and the East: being the Narrative of a Voyage to New South Wales in an Emigrant Ship: with a residence of some months in Sydney and the Bush, &c., &c. By John Hood of Stoneridge, Berwickshire. Octavo, pp. 465. London: John Murray.

To-day it rains heavily; the dense atmosphere and thick haze are melancholy; and we feel more depressed than we ought to do, when we reflect upon the past, and consider that the Heads of Sydney are only eighty miles distant. We had a grand but stormy sunset last evening, and to-day all is again dark and gloomy. . . . .

Tuesday, 12th October.—When will our troubles end? Last night, after the heavy rain, it cleared up, and by ten o'clock we all had turned in, weary of the day. At eleven, a loud voice called out at the door of one of the passengers' cabins, "The lanthorn, Sir, the lanthorn—a large ship close upon us to windward." It appears that the only ship's lanthorn we have, has been most improperly given to one of the passengers for his individual use, and we were now in the greatest danger for want of it,—the lives of all in the ship in jeopardy, for the accommodation of one person: this needs no comment. Before the lamp could be got ready, the strange ship had, fortunately, passed us. We were now but a few miles from port, and in the very run of ships outward bound; it was very dark, and yet our only warning light was in the cabin of a passenger. Our captain confessed to me next day, before the surgeon, that she passed us within half the length of the ship!—a large ship, on the opposite course, under all sail—the collision must have sunk us. The heat has been excessive, and the lightning was flashing wildly the whole night. Early this morning I was awakened by a tremendous bustle on deck, and on quitting my berth I found everything in confusion. A sudden storm had arisen; we were quite unprepared, and everybody was alarmed.

This storm was, like its numerous forerunners, weathered; land was in view, a pilot on board, and things beginning to look more and more Australian.

The boat that brought our pilot on board was manned by six New Zealanders; they were fine-looking, athletic fellows, with good expressive faces, copper-coloured, and tattooed in every part. They were most picturesquely dressed, in red shirts. Their boat was painted light blue, her bows were scarlet, and the shape most beautiful; it was long and narrow, and cut through the waves like an arrow.

Colonial manners and minor morals must have improved considerably since Dr. Lang denounced large classes of his fellow townsmen so unsparingly; but the commercial and pecuniary distress of the colony at the period when Mr. Hood landed, and which has since reached the climax, may have at that time somewhat sobered down the horse-racers and Sabbath-breakers of Sydney. He remarks—

We have arrived in this country at a critical moment: alarm and panic prevail; over-speculation, as it is alleged, has been going on to an extraordinary extent; and all credit and confidence are gone. The demand for money is unexampled; but there is none to be had, and the bill system will go no further. Many causes are assigned for this distressing state of affairs; and sundry proposals are now brought forward to give temporary relief, or rather to afford a barrier against the ruin that threatens to engulph the country. Individual suffering is very great, and in some cases peculiarly severe. There seems a kind of "sauve qui peut" feeling in the community, that banishes the better feelings of our nature; and if a few pounds are wanting to pay debts, or to meet bills, an execution is taken with as little compunction as I now state it, against those with whom habits of business, intimacy, and friendship, have been hitherto uninterrupted.

Government also appears to have arrived at the bottom of its strong-box; and delays occur in the payments of the emigration bounties, which cause, and will continue to cause, great and unexpected inconvenience and loss. Our surgeon is alarmed for the bounties due to the Lady Kennaway, and for his own gratuities and salary; but I trust and believe this is without foundation. . . . .

In every department stagnation and pecuniary pressure are excessive; and for those that occupy the credit-side of the books of the Sydney storekeepers, the times are alarming indeed.

The general appearance of the town exceeded my expectation. Although the houses, even in the principal streets, form most striking contrasts as to architecture—a handsome stone building of four stories being frequently next neighbour to a slab wooden erection of one, still the great length of some of the streets, and the regularity of their plan, being cut at fixed distances by others at right angles, and the great extent of the place altogether, bordered by these beautiful bays on every side, give the whole an extremely imposing effect to a stranger.

The shops are very handsome; and were it not that the trottoirs are so villanously bad as even to endanger life at night, and so broken up as to appear intended as a check, or at least a punishment to drunkenness, one would have pleasure in looking at these signs of prosperity, and at the most wonderful collection of merchandise, furnished by almost every part of the globe. Some of the shops are lighted up with gas; and those of the confectioners, silversmiths, and haberdashers would, many of them at least, not discredit Prince's Street, Edinburgh, or that street of streets, Regent Street, London. . . . One thing that pains and surprises a stranger, is the vast number of grog-shops, and the conspicuous and public places and thoroughfares selected for these wells of poison. I am told there are at present in Sydney two hundred and fifteen of these dens of iniquity; which gives one public-house, where spirits are sold and drunk over the counter, for every one hundred and forty souls, including women and children! . . .

Shop rents in Sydney are higher than in any town I ever was in. Those of the corner shops in some of the chief streets—George Street and Pitt Street, for instance—range from three hundred and fifty to five hundred and fifty pounds per annum. Retail prices are enormous: in some articles two hundred per cent. upon the prime cost in England. This, together with there being no local dues, and very few taxes of any sort, accounts in some degree for these high rentals.

This report of extravagant retail prices does not tally with other accounts of profits, and may perhaps only apply to articles sold in the finest shops.

Though Sydney boasts of several splendid public buildings, and many handsome private houses, it is still without common-sewers; a want which, to a city, is like that of a dandy with a flashy waistcoat, cravat, and glittering pins, without a clean shirt or a shirt of any kind on his back. This applies to towns nearer home than Sydney. Mr. Hood waited upon the Governor, Sir George Gipps, and is on the whole favourable in his report of that once-unpopular functionary. His salary of £5000 is considered too narrow to maintain the proper state of the foremost man in the land; but it should be remembered that the President of the United States manages with less, and that the Australians seem eminently to require examples of that frugality and simplicity of living, which are perfectly compatible with high station and dignity of character.——Our readers will be glad to hear once more of their old combative acquaintance, Dr. Lang, to whom Mr. Hood does no more than justice.

Dr. Lang has, I believe, four times braved the ocean, and made the voyage to England on different errands, but chiefly on the affairs of his church. He has obtained for himself the character of great pugnacity, and is considered not to be very scrupulous as to either his language or his assertions; and will, occasionally, descend from his sphere. I believe it is true that vice, in New South Wales, is not public outrage so much as domestic iniquity. But it is rather extraordinary that men of his calibre should not see that their thunders lose their power when hurled at individuals instead of at the multitude; but Dr. Lang is no common man. I went on Sunday to hear him preach. I was very much struck at first with his meagre appearance, his low, flat head, unmarked features, and the total absence in his countenance of the fire and force of genius. He strongly resembles, however, one of the ablest men of his day, the late Dr. Thomas Brown, Professor of Moral Philosophy in the University of Edinburgh; the resemblance extends even to the single lock of hair that used to curl over that mild and thoughtful brow. Dr. Lang's forehead is particularly low, and bespeaks none of the intellect and talent which he undoubtedly possesses; phrenologically speaking, it is a poor development, as far as I could see at the distance I sat from his throne. . . .

Upon the whole, I left the church confirmed in my expectation of finding in Dr. Lang a man of a superior order of mind. He is proprietor, it is said, of the Colonial Observer newspaper; and writes in it pretty regularly, under the apology of its being necessary to combat the opposition the Scotch Church has within itself, and meets with from others, and to write down as well as preach down the loose principles and practice of the colony.

Though the charges in the best hôtels are very high, board and lodging seem reasonable in Sydney, if the best may be obtained for forty-five shillings a-week. Mr. Hood advises all young settlers to escape from Sydney as fast as possible; but, while there, counsels all who hope to turn "their plack into a bawbee," to betake themselves to the boarding-houses, were it but to avoid the enervating consequences of the seduction of those temples of luxury—fine hôtels; contrasting as they do so dangerously with the discomforts of the airy cabins and rough fare in the Bush. It is well known, from a hundred writers, that Sydney is a fine and finely-situated town; but its environs are also peculiarly delightful.

Many of the private houses in the vicinity of the town are delightful little retreats, placed amid beautiful gardens and scenery, wood and water. Many are magnificent in their architecture and dimensions. When you inquire the names, however, of some of them, you are amused at hearing, in reply, a nickname generally indicative of the calling or origin of its possessor or builder. "Frying-pan Hall," for instance, a very handsome château in the neighbourhood, belonged to a person who, after serving his term of bondage of seven years, followed the useful calling of an ironsmith! It is not safe to be too curious in Australia, as to either fortune or family: we must take the good the gods provide us, and the civilities sometimes vouchsafed the stranger, without much inquiry as to the pedigree of the host, or the mode in which his wealth was acquired. Personal history is at a discount; and good memories and inquisitive minds are peculiarly disliked.

When I landed first on the beach, I was naturally desirous of being relieved of my baggage. Small as it was in bulk, I should have in vain waited for anything of the nature of a porter, or cab, or coach. There are no such conveniencies in Sydney,—a very extraordinary deficiency in a place of its size. A dray may be had to transport heavy goods landed at this place, if you walk a quarter of a mile into the town; but the lesser conveniencies are not to be found.

Evidences of civilisation, however, and proofs of one's being in a land of money and of classes, are seen on every hand. They have their theatres, amateur theatricals, promenades, balls, concerts, reviews, bands, and other amusements. . . . . .

In Sydney one naturally looks for the badge of the country—convicts and shackles. In the morning, forenoon, and evening, large bands of these unfortunate persons are to be seen marching, two, and sometimes three or four abreast, to and from their respective places of labour. They are nearly all dressed alike, in a garb of hodden gray, or duck, and are branded with the initials of the place of their confinement—as P. B., signifying Paramatta Barracks, &c. Some of the greater delinquents are also to be seen in bands, chained by the ankle, and sometimes to each other, when marching from one place of imprisonment to another. Some few are dressed in piebald, brown and yellow cloth; so that should they attempt an escape they may be instantly known.

The squalor carceris is generally written in the sunken cheeks and unhealthy countenances of these wretched men. Many have a stupid, heavy expression; others have cunning printed most manifestly on their faces; and some have the villain written in every feature. I dare say I may be in error in my observation, that the general colour of eye of these criminals was black; but certainly the eye of the greater part of the offspring of the earliest convicts, the generation now peopling Sydney, is of that hue. The convicts are guarded to and from their work; and it is not often that escape is effected: when it is, the bush is their resort, whence the perpetration of additional crimes generally consigns them to Norfolk Island, or the gallows.

The communication with the interior is now very regular; mail coaches, as they are termed by a very strong figure of speech, run in every direction, and the scarlet-coated postman raps at your door almost as regularly as at home. . . . The banks of the Paramatta salt water river are certainly extremely pretty: gentlemen's houses stud them all the way down throughout the eighteen miles; and every turn and bend of this arm of the sea presents a new and interesting landscape, with the water in front, and for a background the eternal forest. I do not know a finer piece of scenery of the kind than that of the river banks from the town of Paramatta to Sydney.

I know not how it was, but, thankful as I felt to escape from the ocean on first setting foot in this country, I was rejoiced [after leaving the bush] to see the blue sea again.

While Mr. Hood's younger son went off to his brother's station, he amused himself with looking about him in Sydney. Among other places to which he went, he tells,

I went to what is called the Park to-day—it has some other name, but I forget it—to see a few soldiers reviewed, and hear the band. There were a great many carriages, gigs, horsemen, and pedestrians. It was the first time that I had seen, in the open air, an assemblage of the people.

I observed no good steeds on the ground; and I have scarcely seen what in Britain would be called a well-shaped horse since my arrival. Most are sheep-necked, lanky-leggy, weedy-looking cattle. This was a gala day, and I should have supposed that the best would have been on the field; but possibly it is a rule with the aristocracy (!) of New South Wales not to sport their best nags on such plebeian occasions. The heat while we were on the ground to-day was very great, yet not beyond what I have known it in Scotland; and the weather, in its changeableness in this, the April of Britain, very much resembles that of the English October or November. But here no change in leaf or grass meets the eye: universal greenness reigns at all seasons. To-night it rains violently, and lightens as it does in no other country—sheet upon sheet, flash upon flash, illuminating the whole heavens above, and earth beneath, with a lurid blue glaring light, that envelops you, as it were, and blinds your eyes, and, if you are walking, compels you to stand still. Here it often, indeed generally, rains after a fashion unknown in England—pouring down as if a waterspout had burst directly overhead.

The precocity of the female sex in Australia is extraordinary. I was told, the other day, of a mother thirteen years of age! This must be an unusual case; but at fifteen the instances are numerous. At twelve they have the form and appearance of women. They look much older, however, than they are; and one with difficulty credits the extreme youth of some. I am not aware that life is proportionally shorter; indeed, that can scarcely yet be known accurately in the colony; but I find that the enamel of youth and beauty is gone here at an earlier age than that at which it reaches its perfection with us. The young men and boys of this country appear sharper, quicker, and more manly than at home, and speak with a keener and more decided confidence in their own opinions. But in this also, it is said, the fruit does not fulfil the promise of the blossom.

The Botanical Garden of Sydney, Mr. Hood thinks the most beautiful spot that he ever saw. He gives us but few city interiors, or personal sketches. The following are among the most remarkable:—

I have just returned from a visit to an old acquaintance, who possesses one of the most splendid villas in the neighbourhood of Sydney, in the midst of an extensive and beautiful garden. The interior of the mansion is handsome and spacious, and fitted up with good taste; comprising in its many elegancies the results of his extensive travels in Europe. Mr. B. is a gentleman very justly esteemed, and is an active member of many of the excellent public institutions in Sydney; and his ample fortune and high respectability are just those lights that settlers in this distant land should keep ever before them, as guides to show what may be accomplished by prudence, activity, and strict integrity.

His gardens are most beautifully arranged. Here I saw the almond, the fig, the citron; the blossom, the newly-set fruit, and the ripe fruit of the orange, all on the same tree; the lemon, the loquat, (an excellent Chinese fruit, of the size of a plum, and in taste resembling the gooseberry,) the pomegranate, the grape, nectarine, apricot, and pear; the date, the aloe, the sugar-cane, the strawberry, and, better than all, the delicious water-melon. The white cedar is also there, and the bamboo; the dark Norfolk island pine, with its pelican-pouch, and the weeping willow, in all their vigorous and graceful perfection. Fifty hives of bees amuse the leisure hours of my excellent friend and his lady. . . .

While merely glancing at the hospitality of Sydney, I may mention meeting at a dinner a person of name and rank in his own land, with whose career considerable interest is associated—the chief of G——. He is a large muscular man, of the Marquis of T. school. His garb was a blue cap with a tarnished silver band, pea-coat, thick cloth trousers, and no waistcoat; and in this he rode seventy miles in a hot wind. Although outré in his attire, whenever he addresses you, you instantly recognise the gentleman. He made himself extremely agreeable; and the evening passed cheerily away under the benign influences of burgundy, claret, hock, sherry, mareschino, curaçoa, and aqua vitæ.

G—— has settled down in a newly-discovered district of the colony, called after the present governor's euphonious surname, Gipps' Land; and intends to cultivate cattle, and not sheep. The country, it is asserted, suits the former best, being moist, in consequence of its vicinity to the mountains and sea; and he is now chartering a vessel in order to remove his lady and establishment thither.

Alone in the wild! what a life will it be for a woman of fashion and elegance, with native blacks on every side, and her home regularly guarded, as if danger were ever at the door! She ought indeed to have a bold Scotch heart. And yet, when one casts a look back towards home, what is life in the far highlands and islands of Scotland? what is society there? or to the sister isle, "that first gem of the sea," as we are commanded to term it! where is the security for life there? And what a change to G—— himself is this! In his native mountains he was laird—chief "prince of all the land." With his tail on, his clan around him, he was mighty among the chieftains. Now his country owns another lord—a Southron; and the descendant and representative of his chivalrous and ancient race, (for a time only, I trust,) is a stockholder in the wilds and woods of Australia. May he be spared to rebuild the walls of his house, and one day tread again the mountains of his fathers as their rightful lord!

Were Mr. Hood to consult some of the Glengarry Highlanders, long since exiled—happily for themselves, and no thanks to their chiefs!—exiled to Canada, he might modify his regret that the head, in the due revolution of human events, has followed the fate of the tail. There have been harsh clearings and ejectments from other estates besides those of Irish absentees.——While among Scottish Highland emigrants, we must describe one more, whose fortunes, if not quite so romantic as those of the chief of Glengarry, are to the full as important in the history of the social progress of the race. ——When Mr. Hood was travelling by very indifferent roads—or no roads at all—and very slow stages, to his son's station, among his halting-places was the hostelry of the "Green Swamp," the station of Lauchlan Mackay.

Our next hostelry was the "Green Swamp," the station of Lauchlan Mackay. Here we rested our horses and ourselves; and Lauchlan, the fortunate possessor of the "Green Swamp," furnished me with his history. He, his wife, and six grown-up children—three sons and three daughters—were, four years ago, a starving family in the island of Coll; and now he possesses "seventy head of cattle, seven or eight horses, a vineyard which last year yielded two hundred-weight of grapes, which were sold at the Bathurst races at a shilling the pound; and a 'bonny farm,'" giving three crops of oat-hay, self-sown for three years, without plough or harrow; and follows, with his sons, the callings of farmer, blacksmith, and innkeeper. Lauchlan monopolizes and prospers; and, from being in wretched poverty in the island of Coll, is now thriving, rich, and happy. "Had it no been for the laird himsel, I wad ne'er hae gotten frae Tobermory; for I was a gie bit abune forty, sir; and it's no easy getting aff after that age. But I was the first yemigrant that ever went frae Coll, and it was just lookit over; and weel it was sae, for we had tint the coo, and the wife was like to gang daft on our hands a'thegither—that's her, sir, (pointing to a moving mountain,) she hasna yae word o' English, puir auld crature—and now I'm prood to say she has mair coos than she kens what to do wi'!" Happy Lauchlan!—what with one shilling and threepence for a horse-shoe, three shillings per bottle for porter, and three crops of self-sown oats, I prophesy that, ere long, you will be a wealthier man than Coll himself! . . . . . .

Small settlers are a description of persons that do well in this country. Possessed of a few hundred pounds, they purchase one of these allotments, which are generally backed by the bush, into which no one will go, as the frontage and water are, of course, preoccupied; so that after tilling the allotment, and accumulating a little fund, they buy cattle or sheep, and gradually extend their holdings: such persons certainly change for the better in coming to Australia. And just so with a still poorer class, who, like Lauchlan Mackay, have only mechanical and labouring skill for their capital. Lauchlan's whole wealth was seven pounds.

We must return to the regular course of the narrative. The brothers had a romantic and happy accidental meeting in the bush; and the Australian settler, leaving the European stranger to supply his own place in superintending the flocks and herds, galloped off to Sydney to welcome and escort the father, whom anxious affection had unexpectedly brought so far.

Our arrival was unknown to the Australian; and, of course, his surprise was unbounded, as well as his delight; and it will easily be believed, that when he was told that I had crossed the ocean to visit him,—that I was at that very time within two hundred miles of him, and was now to be his guest for a time,—there was little delay in making arrangements for his journey to Sydney. Having placed his brother at the head of affairs during his absence, he the next day mounted his horse; and as, in the bush as well as in the town, every one gallops as if on an errand of life and death, he was by my side on the second day. Rapidity is the grand characteristic of Australian life; and the habits of this country remind me much of what is asserted of the Americans. "They are born," it is said, "in a hurry; educated at full speed; make a fortune with a wave of the hand, and lose it in like manner, but only to remake and relose it in the twinkling of an eye. Their body is a locomotive, travelling at the rate of ten leagues an hour. Their thoughts are a high-pressure engine. Their life resembles a shooting star, and death surprises them like an electric shock." I was walking in Prince's Street to my lodgings, when my son overtook me. I heard a bounding step behind me; and, looking round, saw a countenance that I felt I ought to know, although I could not instantly recognise it; but the very first accents of his voice removed all doubt. The first greetings over, I began to examine my boy. He was but eighteen when we parted. He was altered, of course, and had become more manly in figure and face—bronzed, older-looking, changed! I felt somewhat disappointed at not seeing exactly the same slim young creature that had left me three years before: but, if I had lost the boy, I had found the man; and so, after a second look at his garb—and a look of amazement I fancy it was, for his toggery partook largely of the backwoodsman's style of costume—the past was dismissed with something like a feeling of regret, and the present became all in all. The negligence of dress that these sons of the forest indulge in in this country, is somewhat appalling to a stranger. The face is adorned with a luxuriant growth of beard and moustache. The dress consists of a cabbage-tree hat, as large as an umbrella; a round cut-away jacket; no waistcoat; a black glazed belt round the waist; white trousers; and frequently a stock-whip in the hand, almost as long as a South American lasso, while clouds of smoke unceasingly issue from the mouth. My son was not quite after this fashion; but, had I met him in the recesses of the bush, my first impulse would, I confess, have been to have looked to my pistols.

But for the costume and habits of settlers and bushmen, we refer to the AUSTRALIAN SKETCHES, of which sketch the first appears in the present number of Tait's Magazine. Mr. Hood purchased a gig and two horses, and father and son at once departed for the bush. On the road the inns were found English-like, and much more clean, comfortable, and well-ordered, than the hugger-mugger but thriving hostelry of Lauchlan Mackay. The first stage was Paramatta, the second town in the colony.

It is now the beginning of the Australian summer, and everything around me is fresh and blooming. Our road was bordered on either side by the bush all the way, except spots here and there picked out and partially cleared of wood, with wooden and sometimes turf cottages, resembling those one sees in the wilds of Lochaber. Miserable as such dwellings with their open crevices must appear to our northern notions, they are quite sufficient for this mild climate; and their neat appearance (for many of them are white-washed) made them look wonderfully comfortable, and picturesque too, as the night drew on, when the light shone through their crevices, and brought them into view in the forest. Before day closed in, we passed one or two really sweet places, with neat and pretty gardens and vineyards around the cottages and paddocks, as the adjoining cleared spaces are called; but the continual croaking of frogs, the tormenting everlasting chirping of myriads of locusts and insects that cover the trees by the way-side, the dust of the road, and, above all, the melancholy impressions produced by the never-ending succession of public-houses, with the tumultuous scenes around their doors, greatly detracted from the pleasurable feelings we experienced in this emancipation from the sea and the city.

The eye of one accustomed to Berwickshire and East-Lothian husbandry, of course spied out some strange things, and many more things were missed. Among these were enclosures, which give so finished and secure a look to all fields. On the journey, the travellers were frequently entertained at private residences. Hospitality is a necessary virtue on the frontiers of the bush.

3d November.—We drove this morning to breakfast to an extensive station that lay on our way to Penrith, called by the pretty native name of Bungarrabee. The occupier, an English gentleman of the name of K——, is an acquaintance of my son's, and is married to the sister of my friend Mr. D. of Sydney. The entrance to this place is by a fine avenue through the bush. The house is most peculiar in its style; beautiful festoons of roses and plants almost conceal it from sight; it is a delightful spot; and, like most houses in this country, is encircled by a broad verandah to exclude the sun. The interior was as pleasing as the exterior; comfort and elegance were blended in all its arrangements. Mr. K—— is principally engaged in rearing stock of a very superior kind: nags, with pedigrees as long as their legs, and bulls and cows of the most aristocratic blood; he is considered to have some of the best in the colony. We inspected his stock minutely: his horses and mares; his bulls and cows, and also his oat-hay; bad turnips; (this root does not grow well in this country;) good beet and mangel wurzel; his thriving garden with its vines, cabbages, potatoes, and strawberries. . .

Before coming to Bungarrabee, the country is one continued dense wood, except at one or two places. One of these open spots, called Prospect, resembles very much the country above Bennahie, in Aberdeenshire. The hills are of the same character, with a similar half-boggy, half-cultivated country at their foot. The high grounds here cannot properly be called hills, but there is a general resemblance between the scenery. Here, however, on the hill-side grows the vine, and in the swamp the best land grows wheat, oats, and maize; instead of bear, oats, and heather. This place belongs to a Mr. Lawson, one of the most considerable stock-holders in the colony; and his house, grounds, and vineyards, seem to be very handsome and extensive. There is a little modest English chapel, beautifully situated on the opposite side of the road here, at the end of a little avenue of trees cut out of the solid bush, that has a pleasing effect.

We left Bungarrabee after one of the most terrific land thunder-storms I ever witnessed; and after a wet drive, in the cool of the evening of a very sultry day, through a country partially cleared by the roadside, but in the main one forest of eucalypti or gum-trees, and brushwood, reached the village of Penrith, where we proposed passing the night.

The "Rose Inn" at Penrith, was found all that even a fastidious traveller could desire. It is probably from hearing such frequent and grievous complaints of slovenly taverns on the best-frequented roads in America, that we are so much struck with the superiority of these Australian way-side inns; though, it must be confessed, that the traveller pays for his superior comforts.

Here we are at the nice little village of Penrith, with its hostelry of the Rose Inn, kept by "John and Susannah Perry," with every comfort about us. The cleanliness of the beds, the very first object with a traveller, is here, as at Paramatta, above all praise. From their style, one can scarcely credit that these inns are in the bush. Although not so large, the rooms are as comfortably and completely furnished as any in our best provincial towns; and their bouffet is covered with plated articles of all kinds, and glass, ready for use, and clean and bright as they can be made. . . . . The charges at the inn were certainly very high: our horses cost six shillings each for the night: beds, and the usual meals, are tolerably reasonable; but the feed of horses, and luxuries such as porter and ale, are three hundred per cent. dearer than in England. I am informed that as much as twenty shillings a-night was paid for the keep of a horse in the dear years 1837-8-9.

The country, after leaving Penrith and coming in sight of the Cow Pasture river, resembled, as Mr. Hood thought, the rich carse of Falkirk; though it is not yet so well-studded with hamlets and farmhouses as that celebrated locality. And now the Emu plains were traversed, and the Blue Mountains penetrated by a pass more dangerous and grand than Killiecrankie. But, alas! there were here no Tummel or Garry; and this was, besides, the second of a series of those blighting, dry seasons, which are the greatest drawback of all the Australian colonies. Mr. Hood's brief, incidental descriptions convey a very lively idea of the Australian landscape; for we should imagine that his sketches are nearly equally applicable to the bush in all the colonies.

We are now quite in the bush, in the midst of a world of trees that are unknown out of Australia: the red, white, and yellow gum-trees; the stringy bark, and the mimosa or acacia, with its yellow flower, and its sweet perfume, lined our road occasionally; and the twelve miles we drove before breakfast were once or twice enlivened by drays and teams of bullocks, winding their slow and clumsy way to their far-off homes in the wild. The bush ought, in proper language, to be called the forest: it is an interminable world of large timber, interlaced below with young wood springing up of the same trees, chiefly the gum tribe or eucalyptus.

Thus far in my drive I have not seen one patch of what, at home, would be called good grass. With the exception of one small field, I have seen neither white nor red clover; but the yellow or hop kind, is not uncommon. We have not yet had many birds to enliven our way, but shall, I am informed, when we get further to the west. . . . . .

The never-ending forest soon grows wearisome to the eye; and the roads are so bad that it requires all one's attention to prevent the vehicle from upsetting, or falling through the holes in the bridges! . . . . . The corn given to the horses in this country is not oats, but Indian corn or maize; very excellent, if not preferable food. Oats are only grown for hay: when cut green, and properly winnowed, they make most excellent fodder. This, and, in some places, lucerne, are the only representatives of rye-grass and clover in this land.

The inns are not placed with reference to the convenience of travellers, but with reference to water,—that scarcest and most valuable of all articles in Australia.

4th November.—We started this morning at seven, and, by a road which one would be inclined to say, was not made for civilized man, horse, or even bullock-dray, reached Jager's inn to breakfast, at the foot of the celebrated Mount Victoria. In our way we passed some of the noblest and grandest scenery I ever beheld; and by a most wonderful road, a new and enormous work, descended into the Vale of Clwyd, through a pass cut partly out of the solid rock, and falling some thousand feet in a circuitous route of little more than two miles and a half. This is a large and commodious inn, excellent in every way, and most romantically situated. The first view we had of the vale from the mountain-top, struck me as having some resemblance to Highland and Welsh scenery; but the universal wood did not permit the idea to last long. There are a few green patches of open land, here and there, interspersed in the low ground; but around, behind, on every side, the view is hemmed in by the boundless forest. These patches, however, with a cottage generally dotted upon them, are a great relief to the eye. We lost a horse's shoe at the village of the vale, which consists of four or five houses; and the rural Vulcan protested to my son he had seen me in Wales. He left it only last year: I was there some years ago, and it may have been so. This peaceful valley is soon passed, and again do terrace upon terrace, mountains upon mountains, uplifted to the clouds, and covered with forest, distress the eye.

We are now nearly a hundred miles from Sydney, in the wilderness of Australia; and I have as yet seen no blacks, no bushrangers, no snakes, no kangaroo, no emu, nor any of the Australian wonders. Indeed it has been too like home in some respects; for a dense fog, like the mists on our own hills, wetted us to the skin all day, and scarcely permitted us to catch occasional glimpses of the high upheaved rocks by which our path led. .

. . . . . After leaving these peaceful retreats, we began to mount our last and worst range, which seemed to have no summit. We at last arrived at a prettily-situated inn, called "Rottens," where her Majesty's portrait swings betwixt two poles, inviting all her loyal subjects to halt there. From the summit of this mountain, the eye stretches over a whole world of ranges, towering one over the other, and all covered with forest,—the dismal-looking gum and stringy bark trees, which, seen in certain lights, have at a distance a gloomy reddish-brown shade, that gives a sombre character to this country. When near, the hue of all the tribe of eucalyptus is that of our gray saugh or willow, and the leaf is of exactly the same shape; but in the mass in the distance, at evening, it is dusky, and dark, and painful.

For the first time since I landed in the colony, my spirits gave way. When looking abroad from this mountain on the interminable forest around me, I confess I did, for a time, wish my sons and myself were again in our own native land. But the interior of the inn in some degree made us forget the desolate scenes around us. A large cheerful wood-fire was burning on the hearth; the room was neatly furnished with the usual showy sideboard of bright plate and crystal; and a good meal, consisting of green tea, (black tea, or coffee, are not much used in Australia,—the very labourers consume only green tea,) eggs, excellent home-baked bread, beef-steaks, &c., served to dissipate my gloomy reflections. Fires are rarely needed in this country, and few houses have grates. The wood-logs blaze, as in the Highlands, on a clean hearthstone.

The next stage was Lauchlan Mackay's, which we have already seen; and, upon the whole, good progress had been made, when, at the close of the seventh day, young Mr. Hood's lonely station was reached, placed at a distance of fourteen miles from any other habitation. The country, in point of soil, improved as they approached Connobolas, and, when there, was found better than any that had been passed.

As we drew near, we got a good view of his runs, as sheep-walks are called, which form a long stretch of country, on the slope of a glen, ending in the towering top of the lofty Connobolas, a mountain seen from a great distance, and said to be about 4,450 feet above the level of the sea. We left the dray track, called a road, some miles before coming to his residence, and took to the bush. I was not a little surprised at the first view of his gunyah or house: it belonged to no recognised order of architecture. However, I was too much rejoiced at finding myself at the end of my long journey, to feel inclined critically to inspect his domicile; but felt thankful that the object of my journey was now likely to be attained, and that I was permitted to see both my sons safe and well in the land of their choice.

The ranges of the station were most extensive, and it appears to have possessed several natural advantages. However, as seems common to all young settlers, Mr. Hood, junior, still wishing "to better himself," had turned his views to Moreton Bay, which was then in high vogue as a place of settlement. His father set himself to examine and balance the advantages of the two localities, assuming in all his speculations and calculations, that wool is, and must long remain, the staple of Australia, the only exportable commodity, and, consequently, that upon which the advancement and prosperity of the colony and the settlers must for generations depend.

Mr. Hood exerts his philosophy in the bush; knowing well that a man cannot carry into the Highlands "a' the comforts of the Saut Market at his tail," and makes the very best of the lodge in the wilderness; though he permits us to see many discomforts which his Australian son had by this time happily forgotten. He says,—

We must make ourselves as comfortable here as we can. I have now been three days in this far corner of the wilds of the bush; sleeping and living very comfortably, despite the uncouthness of our abode.

"Parva Domus Magna Quies," was written over some Roman door; and here we do, indeed, rejoice in a small and quiet house. It is divided into two rooms, not by any wall or partition, but by my old cloak, which is made to do duty as a curtain. The abode is as primitive as anything can well be. It was erected in a day, and is formed of slabs of bark, supported by boughs of trees. Daylight or starlight penetrate it at every corner, affording to those of an astronomical turn excellent opportunities of studying the heavens, while they recline on their couch; admitting, too, as freely, the cold by night as the heat by day. Yet, in spite of the torments of myriads of flies, and the apprehension of an attack from the bushrangers, who prowl about these mountains; with no door to the mansion, a sheet for a carpet, and a thing called "a stretcher" for a bed, placed beneath the bare bark of the sloping roof, I have slept as soundly as I ever did on my own bed in my own home.

We rode out to-day to survey the run: we went to the foot of the "Old Man of Connobolas," as the highest mountain is called, and saw there the house occupied as a station by my son's predecessor; and a more sequestered and beautiful spot I never beheld. In front, the mountain towers in three high ridges, wooded to the summit, with here and there spots green and devoid of trees. A little streamlet runs before the door, and behind and on both sides the dense forest shuts in the house. Two glens stretch upwards from the spot, and lose themselves in the recesses of the ranges; and one of them—the channel of the "creek," as the rivulet is called—winds downwards to the gunyah.

A path, admitting of the passage of a gig or dray, leads to Boree, a district of country fourteen miles off, where our nearest neighbours reside. This upper station is, indeed, a sweet place, and, but for the close neighbourhood of the bushrangers, who scruple not at anything to obtain a booty, however small, and to whom no one dare give food or water, lest the law punish the charity, it would be a delightful retirement from all the ills of life—a perfect hermitage. My son proposes moving thither shortly. The distance from any other habitation, and from help of any kind, when needed, would, to me, be a great objection to this or any such situation. But, in this strange country, it is considered no objection; on the contrary, it is held to be an advantage. It is not long ago since a gentleman in the county of New England, challenged a new comer for "sitting down" within ten miles of him, which he considered to be an encroachment on his runs. Sitting down is the expression used by the blacks for encamping or settling at any place.

I had heard so much of the fare of the bush, that the very word "damper" was associated in my mind with something like the black bread of Russia, or the pine bread of Sweden. I am glad to say, however, that it is the very best bread I ever ate. The merino mutton is very excellent, though not equal, in my opinion, to our blackfaced wedder; and, what with the hundred shapes which flour assumes in this country, and other aids, living in the woods is as good as any one need desire, albeit the service is not of plate, nor the variety of viands very great. At one house at which I have been, although it was that of an extensive stockholder, and one which might be called a superior establishment in these parts, the remnant of a broken tumbler did service as a mustard-pot, a silver salt-cellar was the point of attack for every knife, black bottles passed for decanters, and one tumbler did the duty of five.

In the bush Mr. Hood found one old friend, whom, next to his son, he must have been rejoiced to meet with,—a worthy repesentative of the primitive and hereditary hind of Scotland, before the era of the bothy system and of the ploughman changing his place at every six-months' term.

My old servant, James Simpson, whom I allowed to accompany my eldest son to this country, has been, indeed, a great assistance and comfort to him. He had been with me all his life, and his father had lived for sixty years in the service of our family; it was, therefore, not without reluctance that I parted with him. Faithful, intelligent, and careful, James is just the support needed by my son in all the dilemmas incidental to such a country, and such a neighbourhood and population. His wonder was excited to the uttermost, on hearing I was really in Australia. His pleasure did not display itself at the first moment of our meeting, as I expected. He afterwards explained the cause. "I was quite dung doon donnerit, whan I saw the laird; I canna concet what doonned me; I was raal glad to see him; bit I dinna ken hoo, I couldna speak it." I, however, saw the cause, James; and I gladly took your hand as that of an attached friend in a far foreign land. "Eh, sir; I little ever expeckit to see you here!" was said so truthfully and naturally, that I valued the words more highly than I should have done the best turned compliment. And the very sight of James returning at evening from the hills, quietly following his flocks, is pleasant to me; and I make it a rule always to meet him, as soon as the sheep-bells and the bleating reach my ear.

James is a good deal altered since he left Scotland. He wears his chin in colonial fashion, with a beard as long as a Hebrew's, which makes him look like a Cossack. His manner, too, is changed, more self-possessed and more independent; and he can say "Mornin'"—the usual Australian salutation—with as much bonne grâce as an American. But he has not yet acquired that disagreeable nasal twang with which it is pronounced, and which is purely Australian.

Our hours in the bush are very early; we rise at six, and retire to our couches at nine. One of the first things done in the morning, is to look in the direction the horses should be. On looking across the forest to-day we could not see any of them, and without them nothing can be done. Stables are not much used; the open wood is, generally speaking, the only stable, and hobbles the only halter. To seek and find was the next step. My son's experience led him to the belief that they were only gone to the ranges, and would return when the sun got high. James, however, was dispatched to Boree, the place at which one of them had been purchased, as it was possible he might have returned to his old abode. But he had his trouble for nothing: at noon they all came galloping home. They had gone to the ranges in their wandering during the night, and were driven home, as my [illegible] had foretold, by the sultry heat of the sun. June absence afforded my younger son, Alexander, the first opportunity of following his chosen vocation. His man, Luke, knew nothing of a bushman's life at present, and had a wholesome apprehension of bushrangers, blacks, snakes, and all such horrors; and his master, therefore, determined to accompany him on his first essay in sheep-tending, the other men being off with their own. He and John Luke are, therefore, away with the merinos, pipes in mouth—no oaten reeds, but actual tobacco clays—for the pastures among the mountains.

Mr. Hood makes here some judicious animadversions upon the trouble of gathering back wandering flocks, cattle, and horses; but this seems an evil not easily remedied in a country where labour is very dear, fences nearly unknown, ranges wide, and neighbours unscrupulous. Mr. Hood saw no wild animals; and the birds were tuneless, and fewer than with us. Among the variety of wild plants, he met with nothing that, in Scotland, would be called grass. The party visited Captain R—— of Boree, one of their next neighbours,—though more than fourteen miles off,—who had a large and thriving sheep station, which, at this time, had suffered so much from the drought of two successive summers, that the soil looked like arid sand. The homestead consisted of a large cluster of wooden huts.

Both Borees were esteemed as nearly the best sheep stations in this part of the colony; and, until lately, were well watered by a chain of ponds supplied by the rivulet that passes Connobolas: lying low, moreover, the heat, though excessive, was well suited to merinos; which, provided they have plenty of food and water, cannot be in too warm a situation. But last year, and this also, the drought has been so great, that even these favoured stations have suffered dreadfully, and are now looking as if the whole was arid sand, or red earth. Captain R——'s fields, enclosed as usual with pales, were as large as those in Scotland, and were studded over with mares and foals; the cleared ground beyond was similarly enclosed, and would bear comparison with the park of any noblemen in England. The open plain in front, with its semicircular background of forest, looked more inviting, more British, than anything I have seen here. Captain R—— was not at home; but we found, instead, a relation of the immortal Sheridan residing there, who did the honours of the house.

This is sheep-shearing time—the most important season of the year in Australia. All was activity and bustle, and extensive were the operations which were in progress. The sheep was first dipped into hot water, and then into cold—a regular Russian bath, the wool meanwhile being washed carefully with the hand; when well done, this leaves it white and clean. The hot water is used, because the lime in the bed of the creek is thought to possess some quality that darkens the fleece. The flock was all merino; and it was wonderful to see animals in such good condition on such miserable pasture. Clipping, sorting, packing, and branding were, also, all going forward. The clipping struck me as being done in a slovenly way, and with great cruelty to the sheep. . . .

After leaving Boree Cabonne, we crossed the creek, and, about a mile further on, arrived at Boree Nyrang, just as dinner was about over; and here we found Capt. R——, who also gave me a polite invitation to spend some time with him, either at Boree Cabonne, or at his homestead, near Bathurst. Mr. B—— received us very kindly, with a warm welcome,—a point of first-rate importance in a visit,—and good cheer of every kind, including delicious Sauterne, and excellent porter; (no man can, prior to experience, duly estimate a glass of London porter on a hot day, sixteen thousand miles from the Thames.) The first day, which is sometimes a little stiff and formal, passed agreeably away, amid general conversation. This is also a very large station, not quite so well situated perhaps as Captain R——'s, but possessed of a better cottage. Many thousand sheep bleat on its ranges; and the wool harvest in all its stages was going on. The first step is to place the sheep in the man's hands; who, holding it by the fore-feet, rolls it backwards and forwards in the water; and then passes it under water to a second, and he to a third; a fourth holds it under a fall of water of two or three feet, spreads the wool, removing every impurity, and allows it to scramble out the best way it can. Then follow the clipping, and the packing in large bales, which are marked with the letters N. S. W. W.,—New South Wales Wool; with the addition of the degree of fineness, the initials of the grower, and the number of the bale. Some of these bales weigh three hundred pounds and upwards; and many persons take great pride in the neat appearance of the packages, and the great mass of wool compressed into them. For this purpose a pressing-machine is used; but, in small establishments, this operation is performed with the spade. In this station everything seemed to go on like clockwork. . . . .

This summer, the terrible drought has robed every plain and patch in this district in russet brown, and shrivelled the leaf as with a scorching fire. These dreadful evils—the failure of the pastures, and the drying up of the usual supplies of water—added to the unremunerating price of the fleece, are indeed severe dispensations, and would appear to have thrown a gloomy foreboding of evil over the settlers, which is exceedingly alarming. They are a class of great enterprise and daring, with a vast amount of invested capital; and the generality of them are men of superior birth and education—in fact they are the gentlemen of the colony: and hard indeed would it be, if, as seems to be expected by some, the present difficulties should cause the destruction of so important a class.

In the face of these apprehensions Mr. Hood was hopeful both for timely rains and rising prices. Mr. Hood had some intercourse with the natives at this place. He considers them not negroes,—which is, we believe, a general opinion,—but Asiatics; not descendants of Ham, but of Shem.

While on a visit to a near neighbour, Mr. Hood, among other novel and curious spectacles, saw bullock drays loaded with huge bales of wool, passing the station on their yearly journey to Sydney:

It is a most picturesque sight to see these immense piles winding their slow way through the forest. These drays are of two kinds,—some have shafts and others have a pole; these had six bullocks in pairs before the one in the shafts. The bullocks are harnessed in the simplest manner, with a rod of iron for a collar, and the yoke over the shoulders of each pair, to which is fixed the chain, which is fastened to the end of the pole or shafts. Their progress is slow, averaging from ten to fifteen miles a-day; but they drag heavy loads up steeps and over roads upon which no horses in our country could be made to draw a load. They have the advantage, too, of being cheaper; the roadside is their pasture; and blows and curses their only grooming. The bullock-driver is a being completely sui generis; he is the most cruel and profane wretch that breathes; his cruelty and drunkenness render him more a brute than the animal he tortures. Of all men that ever broke the third commandment, they are the most perfect in profanity. . . .

Swearing, drunkenness, and blackguardism of every description, characterise these draymen; and while better paid than any other daily labourer, some of them receiving forty pounds per annum and victuals, they are the laziest of men, often refusing to do anything whatever, except belabour and curse their helpless victims; but, of course, there are exceptions to this rule, as to every other. Respectable men may sometimes be found in this class.

The fact of being a drunkard, or a convict, is not looked upon, in this country, amongst the class, as any disgrace; on the contrary, they often openly express their intention "to go and get drunk;" and "Where have you been, Tim? have you been getting drunk?" is an every-day question. As to being a convict whose term has expired, and who is called an expiree, or one still under sentence, but possessed of a pass during good behaviour for the unexpired period of his sentence, called a "ticket-of-leave man," no shame whatever is evinced by the very best amongst them; and they look down upon all "self-imported devils" as beneath them, and not worth consideration. And yet many of the convicts are good servants: there are several of them at this station; and Mr. B—— assures me he looks upon them as the best servants he has.

It is characteristic of the bush, that the days of the week are sometimes forgotten, and Saturday kept as Sunday.

A grand mansion, with wings, which, as some one quaintly says, are constructed as if to fly away with the estate, is a first consideration with a Scottish Laird at home. In the bush, the emigrant settlers are more prudent. A house, which can be got any day, is their last consideration. Mr. Hood tells—

I have been in a house in Australia where there was no lock to secure my bedroom; where the furniture was of the very plainest kind; where bunches of receipts were suspended from the roof, and books and drawings lay promiscuously amidst guns and constables' fetters; and yet the owners were among the élite of the colony, and would be found in the first circles of society in England.

Here, at Connobolas, we rejoice in one table of homely manufacture, fixed to the earthen floor, with a long suitable seat to match. A similar piece of upholstery, minus one leg, supports my desk and dressing-case; a stretcher (universally used in the bush) supplies the place of a bedstead;—mine I have adorned magnificently with a curtain of mosquito-gauze. The rafters are our roof and ceiling, and slabs of bark our serking and slates. Glass windows we do not patronise; shutters outside are our only screens. The walls are slabs of bark, closely fitted upon upright slabs of wood; and the painting and papering are clean white sheets, nailed all round the room, to exclude, in some degree, the light and cold by night, and the sun by day. Two loaded guns stand, ever ready, in the corner; and pistols are always below my pillow. In the space betwixt my apartment and that of James Simpson, is the couch of my sons, where, beside another stretcher, may be seen saddles, bridles, ropes, rice, tea, sugar, tools of all descriptions, gig gear, preserves, butter, cheese, spirits, et multa alia. As to James, he and his wife slumber upon a very primitive elevation above the floor, prepared by him in half an hour, and find rest and peaceful oblivion "as weel as e'er they did at hame." The cuisine is furnished with considerably fewer materials than would be held requisite at the Clarendon, or Gresham's; but there is merit in management; and I never dined more comfortably in my life than among the mountains of Connobolas. Nor has the fear of snakes, (although the trail of one that must have been at least six feet long, and as thick as my arm, lay on our path to-day, betwixt the stations,) of blacks or of bushrangers, yet cost me an hour's rest. There was a person in this neighbourhood, fifteen or twenty miles distant, who forfeited this station and his license, in consequence of having allowed bushrangers from these haunts to come about his house—harbouring them, as it is called; and it is not a fortnight ago since certain gentlemen (!) made use of the enclosures around for the purpose of branding their neighbours' cattle and calves with their own marks—a process carried on by the light of the moon, and a favourite pursuit in this colony. If my memory serves me, there is a motto on the borders of Scotland, "Reparabit Cornua Phœbe!"

The nearest town is Bathurst, distant from us about fifty miles; and there, also, are the nearest magistrates' bench, church, and physician. Our nearest post-office is at Boree or Peisleys, both of which places are fourteen miles distant, and the post is only once a-week. At Boree, also, live our nearest friends. The shepherds' huts are scattered around in every direction, but some miles from us, and quite out of reach in any case of emergency.

Such is our present situation. Hitherto we have not been disturbed by night or day. No door as yet prevents intrusion; a piece of unbleached linen alone excludes man and beast! Indeed, a door of sheet iron would be of little avail against the class of persons who sometimes demand admission from these mountains; and the linen portal is so much cooler, that we prefer it, as it acts like an Indian punka. We erected a tent, but I could not breathe in it. In this country, as in the East, tents ought to be double, to exclude the sun. My two youths intend to try it; but I suspect that, what betwixt the cold by night and heat by day, they will be glad to flee to their storehouse again. Amidst all this exposure, which but lately would have appeared to me the life of a savage, with a blazing fire on the hearth in the ample chimney of bark slabs, we pass our evenings wonderfully well.

Yet Mr. Hood had grown rather too old in the comforts of civilized life, to take so kindlily to this mode of existence as did his stout-hearted sons. He felt that this seclusion was Wild, grand, and beautiful; but there is a silence about it, a singular loneliness, which, coupled with the impression that we are constantly within the ken and shot of the outlaw, gave a tone to the mind and feelings not beneficial; and which can scarcely be conceived by those who have never lived in forest scenery. . . . . .

Life is passed with us after a most primitive and pastoral fashion. We rise at six, and the early mornings are delightful; we see the flocks tended by James, and the other men set off for the ranges; then breakfast, read, write, shoot, lose a horse and seek and find it again, send off a dray on "a canny errand, to a neighbour town;" I write these notes of my wanderings, then dinner; after that, we walk a mile or so to a fall of the creek, among the hidden places of the glen, amidst rocks and solitary woods, making calculations and plans as to the future; then tea, good-night, and to bed by ten. . . . . .

The more I see of this country, the more I am at a loss to form an opinion regarding it. There does seem a curse upon it at present, judging from the awful droughts to which it has been subject from its first discovery: the first was in 1791, and they have since happened pretty regularly every seven or ten years; 1827, 8, and 9 were dreadful years; little or no rain fell in 1837, 8, or 9; and, in 1840 and 1841, in most parts of the colony complaints have been general. The fall of prices, the increase of expenses from the scarcity of labour, the want of public markets, the insecurity of property, the difficulties of realizing property when necessary, from the scarcity of money, the almost complete impunity with which crimes are committed, the impracticability of procuring evidence of deeds done in this thinly-peopled country,—these, and many other evils, render it a difficult and serious matter indeed to point out the right and prudent path for a settler to pursue; and the task is rendered still more arduous by the fact, that almost the whole of the country in this district worth possessing is already occupied.

This want of country is one of the most serious bars, as it appears to me, in the way of the future advancement of the colony. The idea of the settler not finding ample room in so immense a country as Australia may at first seem absurd; but many things are required to form what is called "a desirable run." The feed must be good; the water must be in sufficient quantity not to fail in dry seasons; there must be a passable country betwixt it and Sydney; the land carriage must not exceed three hundred miles, at the utmost, or there must be good water communication with the metropolis. Now a very considerable part of the known country, where these requisites are combined, is already occupied; and without these no station is worth having. No one taking a station would wish it less in extent than would be sufficient for five thousand sheep at the least, and from that to twenty thousand, with a proportionate number of cattle—say from three hundred to a thousand. From the information I have been able to obtain, such stations must now-a-days be bought, and not selected; and, in these times, purchasing becomes an affair of grave consideration. . . . . .

18*th Nov.*—Great excitement was created amongst us to-night; and I confess I was again induced to wish that my boys had remained at home in Britain instead of becoming bushrangers in New Holland. But I suppose the thousand gentlemen bushmen would laugh at my apprehensions. At sunset it was observed by Alexander, that one of the flocks of ewes and lambs was greatly diminished in numbers; and upon their being counted, two hundred and fifty were found to be wanting.

In coming home with his flock, James Simpson had seen a fire in the woods, with three sheep roasting upon it! One of the shepherds, formerly a convict, had been lately warned away.

We cannot follow out this long adventure,—it is enough that the missing merinos were recovered. Mr. Hood was, however, the witness of still more alarming and really perilous bush adventures before he left an abode which, with the habitual love of books, and the habit of receiving letters and newspapers, transmitted regularly by the post every day, he never could have relished as a permanent home, although it had been his intention to make trial of it. When he had been about a fortnight in the bush, part of which time was spent in a visit to a highly civilized and accommodated station, he writes :—

20*th*.—Here is a morning as gloomy and surly as any November morning in Scotland: the elements, like everything else in this country, are always in extremes—great heat or great cold—a calm or a whirlwind—a drought or a deluge.

The Australian is off to Boree for some of his stores, which he did not consider it safe to keep at his own station. A—— is gone after some bleating sheep, which he supposes to have strayed from the shepherds. James has driven his fleecy treasures to the pastures; and Luke is clearing out the yards,—an operation performed daily with a broom and shovel, that the sheep may lie upon a clean hard bed every night, which is thought essential to their well-being. These yards are regular stockades, impregnable to native dogs. Mrs. Simpson is at her housewifery, and my black fellow is looking after the horses; and here I am left to guard the castle, and smile to find myself daundering about with a loaded gun over my shoulder, expecting every moment that the hill folk, seeing the dispersion of our forces, may forego their usual times and seasons, and consider it a suitable opportunity for replenishing their rocky storehouses with the plunder of our ill-manned garrison. These accounts may, I fear, give a rather unfavourable idea of my first impressions of bush life in a new station. But to these evils are to be added other discomforts: there is no sort of society, no new books, no letters, and the newspapers only once a-week—and, after all, merely Sydney ones; a slabbed and bark hut, open to every chilling blast, and scarcely affording a shelter from the heat, which is, occasionally, still more unendurable than the cold; no glass in the window frames; a bark slab door, that turns on the broken end of a black bottle for the lower hinge,—(the bush is certainly a good school for invention,)—and is tied with a stirrup-leather for the upper one; which door, moreover, when shut, darkens the apartment, and when open leaves you to the mercy of the dust, (a terrible nuisance in Australia,) of the rain, the wind, the horses, the oxen, the sheep, and the bushranger. I confess that for me such a life has not charms to compensate for all these disadvantages; but there are those that hold a different opinion. . . . . We were honoured last night by a visit from his sable majesty, Sandy king of Boree. He was accompanied by one or two of his subjects, and came to strip bark for "the master;" at which operation they are particularly dexterous. . . . .

James's admiration for his black brethren is not great; and his jargon when addressing them is a very droll mixture of broad Scotch and the little he has picked up of Wirradery, the language of this district. When angry with them, for being dissatisfied with any meat given to them, James will say, "Ye no ken what budgeree pata is, ye sumphs!" But to do them justice, though very greedy they are not very difficult to please, as far as relates to the delicacy of their provisions. The price of their labours in this instance was an old coat of my son's, which his majesty had long coveted.

Their eye is invariably black, with a suspicious watchfulness lurking in its corners; but it is not so ferocious as I had expected. All I have heard speak have a smattering of slang English: they have some expressions which are not without poetic beauty; for instance, "Euroka boi,"—the sun is sick and dying; "Euroka naroi,"—the sun jumps up. The following are some of their phrases:—"Orquoyapita,"—make haste; "Oquarapata,"—bring water. If you ask them if they saw any one yesterday, they reply, "Bel, he no make a light yesterday,"—No, I did not see him yesterday. Their sense of sight is remarkably acute: they will trace a footstep while galloping on horseback through the woods, where no mark is visible to a white man, and can tell whether an opossum went up or down a tree. The acuteness of their hearing is also extraordinary. . . . . .

There are various and never-ending annoyances in this shepherd's life, and of various degrees of importance. Both of my horses have for some days disappeared; and the glens and ranges are so numerous and difficult of access and search, that it is almost impossible to trace them. Two men have been out, Monday, Tuesday, and to-day, with the Australian, peering into every hollow, but without success; and I am now, therefore, a close prisoner, with ample time and subjects for reflection.

The plague of insects was severely felt, and there were of them and reptiles of all sorts,—

Flies of all kinds, and shapes, and sizes; ants, single and double-headed; grasshoppers, locusts, scorpions; a large assortment of centipedes, varying in length from one inch to four; snakes from those eight or nine feet long down to the little adder, whose bite is instantly fatal; and, worst of all, the common fly: you eat it, you drink it, you inhale it,—truly, their name is legion! We have at last had a slight shower, which I hope will set these villanous annoyances to roost, and refresh the thirsty ground at the neighbouring stations; for the earth there, indeed almost everywhere for three hundred miles west of Sydney, is parched up, and as red as a tile. But here all is luxuriantly green. The heat this evening is tremendous, and, from the perpendicular rays of the sun instantly absorbing the moisture, it is quite overpowering; and yet at night we shall be drawing round a blazing fire; and when in bed, having in some places only a sheet overhead between us and the moon, we shall be heaping up mountains of blankets, opossum cloaks and shawls. Fuel, fortunately, is a thing we can never want here. . . . . .

For my own part I conceive that the changes of climate here are fully as great as at home, and more instantaneous; and that the deluges of rain that do occasionally fall, the dust that almost constantly fills the air and penetrates everywhere, the heat by day and the cold by night, require as perfect dwellings both for man and beast as in other lands.

Shortly after this, Mr. Hood's younger son, and James Simpson, had nearly perished while wandering in pursuit of their strayed horses. The danger of such expeditions is stated in one brief sentence, and illustrated by some horrible stories :—

One dreadful feature of the forests of Australia is, that they do not furnish a single plant or blade that will sustain human life, nor any wild fruit; and, in this case, they were also without water.

Mr. Hood made other visits to the friends and fifty-mile-off neighbours of his son, and had opportunities of seeing some of the most fertile places of the colony. But the drought had burnt up everything, and the arid soil seems to have been like the ashes of a volcano. We shall present one station, as we fancy it a favourable specimen of the homes of the best order of settlers that are of some standing:—

What a drawback to the advantages of this country is the want of water! We left this uncomfortable caravansary by early dawn, and journeyed towards the station of some friends of my son's to breakfast. In this stage we travelled fourteen miles through one of the finest tracts I have yet seen in the colony. . . . My hospitable acquaintance of "Twenty-mile Hollow," who so politely offered me the comforts of his station, has a very pretty place upon a rising ground, above the Bell River. This sweet romantic spot is at present inhabited by a lady,—rather a lonely situation for a female. An excellent sheep country is intersected here for many miles by the Bell. It is one of the few parts of the colony that have left a very pleasing impression on my mind.

We were most hospitably received by the Messrs. B——, and had a most excellent breakfast set before us. Fresh fish was on table, a luxury seldom known in the bush; it was a kind of cod, caught in the Bell River, and very like, in shape, the salt water cod-fish; its taste was excellent. The Messrs. B—— have a very considerable station here, in a spot quite retired from the world, with the winding Bell River below; so called by courtesy, being, at present at least, only a chain of ponds. I have not seen in Australia any gentlemen who appeared to me more likely to do well than our kind entertainers. They are, I believe, from Lancashire, have a large stock, and are steady sensible men, blending, as every man ought to do, strict economy with most liberal and gentlemanlike hospitality.

From this comfortable mansion—at which, by the by, one of the emigrants brought over by the Lady Kennaway was sinking a well—we drove to the Plain of Nurya. . . . . The Plain of Nurya delighted me excessively: it is the prettiest open space I have seen in New South Wales; of an excellent level, and beautifully green, bounded on the one side by the river Bell, which all the way is concealed by the fringe of its beautiful dark green swamp oaks. This river winds most picturesquely here, as indeed it does throughout its whole course. We have passed over its dry bed four times within the last twelve miles.

In connexion with these gentlemen, a story of Australian life is afterwards related, which is almost too horrible for publication.——Mr. Hood and his elder son returned from these visits to spend Christmas under their own slab roof; the younger son having been constrained to remain at home, as, after the lapse of three months, the Sydney carriers had not yet brought up his clothes!

If Mr. Hood considers Australia a land of promise to men like Lauchlan Mackay of Coll with his industrious family, this does not always apply to all the young gentlemanly settlers with some property, of whom "the fathers of the colony" often take every manner of unhandsome advantage.

These young settlers have to contend with a total ignorance of the native customs, of the peculiarity of the climate, and of the nature of the country, as well as with the impossibility of obtaining stock, &c., at fair prices, from the want of public markets. In short, it almost seems as if "every man's hand were against them," and they had reason to apprehend that "every one that finds them" will sacrifice them. There is at present a feeling among many holders of stock which makes them rather cold and unfriendly to new settlers, as if they were rivals that would destroy them; and assuredly the times are favourable, in some respects, for those now arriving with capital.

All property has fallen dreadfully in value. Sheep that sold at 16s. and 20s., may be had for 8s. and 10s., and cattle have fallen from £5 to 35s.; while at sales in Sydney, the former fetch 1s. 6d., and the latter 30s.,—still there are many circumstances connected with these low prices that a youth has to consider before he invests his capital: such a step requires the greatest caution and circumspection. He will not find it here as at home, where, by attending public places and markets, he may inform himself of everything he desires to know connected with the object he has in view; and he will be fortunate indeed if he can discover any one that will give him an unbiassed opinion, either as to a proper country in which to settle, or as to the advisability of any purchase of stock. It is the policy and practice of almost all to extol their own district, and to induce "new chums," as such fresh arrivals are called, to alight in their vicinity, or it may be in their own dove-cotes, that they may be caught and plucked advantageously and quietly by themselves. . . . . The young settler will find himself flung entirely upon his own energies and prudence: and, instead of rushing headlong into investments suggested to him, it may possibly be by some very disinterested friends, and, fixing instantly upon some station of which he knows nothing except through the same kind advisers, he will act more wisely if he places his cash in some safe custody,—the bank in preference to every other place,—mounts his horse, and buys experience and knowledge of both country and stock by the wanderings of some months, without being seduced by the gilded colouring of either sanguine or interested men, or tempted to buy at cheap prices what he may find too late to be, in consequence of scab or catarrh, not worth his acceptance as a gift.

It will scarcely be believed in England, that the estimated number of sheep which have died within the last twelve months in the colony, from catarrh and drought, is seventy thousand!!—that colonists are compelled, in order to save the dam from starvation, to cut the throat of her lamb—that no means are adopted for securing a stock of lambs for next year—or that a stockholder would offer 8000 sheep to any one that would remove them from his runs; and, finding that no one could be prevailed upon to taint his own flocks by accepting so dangerous a present, had recourse to consuming them by fire! and had actually killed and burnt two thousand.

Such things are nevertheless perfectly true. I myself know the parties; and it all goes to prove that everything depends upon the healthiness and character for feed and water of the country in which a stockholder locates, and the freeness from disease of his stock, and not so much upon his commencing with what is called a great bargain. The first object on the arrival of every settler, should be to procure a good country for his flocks; and this, I have elsewhere said, is his grand difficulty. Let him be wary upon this point. Almost every desirable or habitable spot in the old countries—as the early-settled districts are called—is already occupied; but there is ample space in the south and north, and will be, I believe, for years to come, though enterprise is fast penetrating into these regions also.

But those who meditate emigration will study this important section of Mr Hood's work for themselves and at length; so we content ourselves with one wholesome caution—

One grand mistake is committed by almost all young men, and by others too; and that is, the desire to commence with an immense stock at once—some seven or eight thousand sheep, whether their funds be adequate or no; in short, to buy beyond their capital, in hope of being able, by good fortune and the chapter of accidents, to pay off their debt gradually. The phrase "a respectable commencement," has deluded many; and the ill effects of this delusion are, at this very moment, cruelly proved by the experience of hundreds.

Instead of this, the very opposite course ought to be the one universally adopted. Where there is plenty of capital, to establish at once an extensive station in the bush is very desirable for many reasons; but even then he is a wise man who places some portion of his ready money in safe securities, or in the Sydney banks, and who does not buy up to the full extent of his funds, but one-fourth short of them; and keeps the reserved fourth where it shall be always ready to meet unexpected demands, or to take advantage of those opportunities which this country constantly presents to a prudent man who has cash at his command.

One of the great causes of the general distress among the settlers is the credit obtained by them from the very outset of their career from storekeepers, who being themselves pushed for money, not only are obliged to bring their creditor's property into the market at a sacrifice which is ruinous to him, but also decline to make even the usual annual advance of rations.

To return from these grave matters to the ordinary life of the bush—

1*st January*, 1842.—The year eighteen hundred and forty-one is gone—a record against us for weal or woe. To me this is a melancholy and lonely New Year's-day; for both my sons are absent. Having heard of stock and stations, which are very desirable, to be disposed of in the Buckingbar country, down on the river Lauchlan, about a hundred miles off, they set out last night to inspect them, and I sadly miss their society on this, which ought to be the gayest day of the whole year. The sultry heat of this midsummer is a disagreeable contradiction to all our impressions of that happy season of frosts and snows, and fire-side comforts. . . . .

2*nd January*.—The travellers returned this evening from their journey to the river Lauchlan. The account they give of the country is extremely bad. They proceeded about forty miles down the river, and found the plains in the neighbourhood of it as level as if a roller had passed over them. But, as far as the eye could reach, there was no verdure; all was arid red earth and sand, and interminable wooded flats. The heat was so intense, they could scarcely breathe. The very birds sat open-mouthed panting on the trees: and the atmosphere was such, that A—— says it seemed as if the sky was "raining down a fiery heat!"

The finest rivers in the colony were, in this season, quite dried up. Of the Darling it is said—

When Mitchel first discovered this river, the grass was luxuriant, and the river full of water. Now it is a chain of distant ponds; although, in some parts above, it is still in a continuous stream. The blacks and cattle are fighting for the stagnant pools of the Lauchlan, Macquarie, and Darling, in the western districts. But the scarcity is greater on the two former rivers than on the last, which is the recipient of all these western waters; and ultimately becomes, after the junction with the Murrimbidgee, the great River Murray, which runs southward into Lake Alexandrina. The cattle render the water putrid; and the blacks, irritated to madness, murder the shepherds, and slaughter the cattle, or drive them into the interior. On Liverpool Plains the carcases are lying in heaps; and the plains are impassable for the white man, there being no water for a hundred and sixty miles. On the River Hunter, the very air is tainted, and rendered unwholesome by the stench from the dead animals that have perished on its banks from drought and catarrh. The emus have come down to the low country in great numbers, in search of water; and, in New England, the natives have become exceedingly violent, and set the police at defiance, killing the shepherds, and driving off large flocks of sheep. This is a dreadful season, and will be long-remembered in the colony. I am inclined to believe, however, that these excesses do not result so much from want of water in the New England country, as from other causes, often originating in the conduct of the whites. My sons are fortunate in being in this district, where, at least, none of these evils assail them. Had they wished to proceed to Moreton, it would now have been quite impossible to have done so. No one can pass over the Liverpool Plains at present; nor for six months past has the transit been practicable.

I do not think that that invaluable animal, the camel, could anywhere be used with greater advantage than in Australia. . . . . .

In the bush, the most common things are often the most difficult of acquisition. Thus, the great event of to-day is the arrival of four hens! They have long been much coveted by me, and I cannot but mark their appearance as an epoch in my life at Connobolas. One white cock has strutted about in solitary importance ever since I have been here; and truly I have obtained these ladies nearly as much for his domestic happiness, as for the prospect of fresh eggs. Anything of far less consequence would be a matter of interest here, for such complete seclusion I have never before known.

On his return to Sydney, Mr. Hood was accompanied by his elder son, the younger being left to look after the concerns of the wide station. The journey was at the outset rendered dangerous and uncomfortable, by the bush being found on fire on a part of the route, a frequent accident in dry seasons.

Mr. Hood returned to Sydney in time for the great colonial holiday, the anniversary of the founding of the colony of New South Wales, now in the fifty-fourth year of its age—an infant giant. The anniversary, we are told—

Is kept as a holiday; the shops are shut, and all Sydney is agog. A regatta, feasting, firing of guns, and other noisy symptoms of rejoicing, mark this national festival. The boat-races were good: thousands of people in their best attire crowded every part of the shores, the gardens, and rocks around; most romantic-looking parties were dining al fresco in the recesses of the rocks, in alcoves, and amidst the bushes; and several of the Sydney tribe of natives were mingled with the crowd, full of wonder at the strange doings. They are decidedly the ugliest blacks I have yet seen. The waters were covered with hundreds of boats of all descriptions, and filled with people of every class; and steamers covered with gay flags, dashed up and down the beautiful Paramatta River. The sun shone brightly; the day was every way propitious; and it was altogether a truly gay and pleasing scene. The governor, with some of the officials, were at Daw's Battery, under an awning. He looked extremely well and governor-like, and a salute of twenty-one guns announced his arrival.

But, alas! these regattas and boat-races too often end in loss of life, and suddenly change rejoicings into mourning. . . . . .

26*th*.—I had the pleasure of dining yesterday at a Mr. C———'s, son of a judge in I———, and nephew of one of the Scotch judges, who in my early days was one of the most brilliant ornaments of the bar, and one of the first founders of the "Edinburgh Review." With the exception of one New Zealander, we were a party of Scotchmen: Mr. C———, who originated the mail betwixt Damascus and Aleppo; Mr. T———, son of one well known and highly respected in the Scottish capital; and Mr. B———, nephew of the cleverest peer in England. In short, to use a phrase of former days, we were all from the right side of the Tweed, and, for a few fleeting hours, felt as if we were once more in the "Land o' Cakes." . . . .

By letters from my son at Connobolas, I learn that the evils of the bush are displaying themselves there in a new and alarming shape. The country around him has been enveloped in fire for miles on all sides, and at one time threatened his paddocks, stockyards, and house with destruction. The whole mountains are scorched and red, and the grass much injured. My kind friend at Boree came up to see if he could be of assistance to them; but I am thankful to say that the danger had been warded off from the house by clearing a space in advance of the flames, setting it on fire, and after it had blazed for a time, brushing it out with stable brooms. When James found that he and the men could do no more, he turned to his master and said, "'Deed, Sir, this is waur than the rough sea at the warst o't: oo maun just lippin to Providence." In short, every corner of this country seems to have its visitation. It is a trying commencement for my young bushman; but he writes to me like a man, that is resolved to bear up against all difficulties.

Before leaving Sydney, Mr. Hood visited Mr. Macarthur, the representative of that fortunate early emigrant, who so well deserved his good fortune by his industry, enterprise, and public spirit. Of this visit he reports—

Feb. 6th.—I have passed a most delightful day at C——; a more agreeable English-looking place I have not seen. The house, the park, the water, the gardens, the style of everything and of every person, master and servants, resembled so much what one meets with in the old country, that I could scarcely believe myself sixteen thousand miles from it. Mr. M——— is well informed, and gentlemanlike, and I have never before found myself so completely at home on so short an acquaintance. His obliging kindness and attention in showing me his domain, his vineyards, wine-house, the view of the place, and surrounding scenery, the church, his horses, and cellars, I shall not soon forget; nor the regret with which I parted from him. The house is handsome; the drawing-room is a particularly fine room, and furnished quite in English fashion; and books of all descriptions, reviews foreign and colonial, prints, &c., cover its tables. The lady of the house was kindness and politeness itself. Everything here is carried on on a scale suitable to the large possessions of the family. There are 25,000 acres attached to the place in the celebrated Cow pastures; which, by the by, are not the extended plains I had expected to find, but they are rich and well cultivated.

Ten acres of the most beautiful vineyard imaginable, containing many different varieties of grapes, lay at a short distance from the house, and are managed by a colony of vine-dressers from the Rhine. This year ten thousand gallons of wine are expected from it, and next year a much larger quantity, which, at four shillings per gallon, would form a handsome item in the income of this wealthy colonist. The expense, however, is great, and a considerable outlay is incurred before there is any return. . . . . I have little doubt but that Australia will one day owe to this gentleman the development of its as yet comparatively untried capabilities and resources, in the production and exportation of Australian wine. Grapes grow well in all the parts of this colony that I have seen, and are common at the cottage-door, as peaches also are by the roadside. I must, however, confess in passing, that except at C———, I have nowhere in this country tasted a peach equal in flavour to those of England, nor such as I should consider thoroughly ripe, the generality of them being of a sort that, even when apparently ripe, still adheres to the stone. With grapes, however, it is different; they are as fine as in any country in the world; and the wine I tasted here, which was two years old, and made from the Madeira grape, was equal, except perhaps in strength, to any Madeira I have ever drank in England. There are other gentlemen in the colony who are vine-growers to a considerable extent. I allude to Mr. R———, Mr. P———, and Sir J. J———; but not on the same large scale as Mr. M———. His father was the first person who introduced the merino into Australia, and is therefore entitled to be considered the father of the colony; and I have no doubt the son will ere long be acknowledged as the author of another source of its wealth.

I am satisfied, from many reasons, that this continent was not designed ever to be a great agricultural country, being essentially a pastoral land; and the same circumstances fit it, I conceive, for a wine country. Drought and dry seasons are beneficial to the grape; and the best vintages in Europe have always been in dry years. An irregular supply of moisture unfits it for an agricultural, but not for a wine country. The climate is everything that could be desired for the proper growth of the vine; and I entertain no doubt that, ere many years are over, it will be a source of great revenue to the colony.

After expatiating upon the magnificence of this farming establishment, and lordly residence, Mr. Hood relates the history of the rise of the founder of this wealthy and lucky colonial house, who obtained by public grants 18,000 acres of land, and purchased 32,000 more. On this land 25,000 sheep are kept, and 700 acres are under the plough. One understands whence the mania for town lots has arisen in all these colonies, when informed that the elder Macarthur, in 1800, purchased sixty acres of land in the township of Sydney for £25, which, in 1836, were valued, according to the current government land price, at £1000 an acre!

Mr. Hood's chapter on Emigration holds out no great encouragement to emigrants, unless some new and comprehensive scheme of settling them be adopted. His report is fully as gloomy as the late newspaper accounts; yet he has faith in wool; and does not despair of returning prosperity, while the manufacturers of England find the Australian wool the best in the world. On emigration, he says—

The present state of the barracks for immigrants in Sydney is, in some degree, a commentary on the system of immigration pursued of late; there are five hundred and sixteen Irish, one hundred and sixty-four English, and thirty-five Scotch immigrants, living unengaged at this moment in tents at this place of refuge. Ireland, from the poverty of its lower classes, readily suggested itself to the wholesale agents for the exportation of human beings, as the most promising field from which to obtain lading for their ships and bounty for their pockets. Ambulatory decoy-ducks were employed to traverse its southern (the Roman Catholic) counties, and speechify the unfortunate and discontented into delusive hopes of a better world at the Antipodes.

The Irish are hard-working men at any fixed and certain labour; they can live at home on simple and scanty fare, but on reaching the shores of this country their character changes; they are found to be indolent at their tasks, and troublesome and discontented as to their food. Their families are generally numerous; and the result is, that they find, when too late, that their labour is not in demand. From what I learnt from several families in these tents, it is evident that the Irish are neither liked in the bush, nor inclined to make themselves of value; and it is a fact that there are many now there that have been five months on the government allowance of beef and flour, and prefer living in idleness on that, to taking such wages as were offered them. One would have expected a different state of things, and that they would be thankful to get a home and employment. Some arrangement is evidently required to combat this injurious sloth; instead of the charity being extended for such a lengthened period, they ought, after moderate wages have been refused by them, to receive that support no longer.

In many respects the Irish are unsuited to a pastoral life; they do not in general make good shepherds; their wives are seldom contented with the bush life; and the expense of removing their families is a great objection to their being employed there. Were the young unmarried men, and young women of character, to cross the sea, they would, however, as labourers and servants, be eagerly sought after; and it is to be hoped that such, in future, will be the persons chosen. . . . . .

National reflections are national injustice; but I shall be borne out by the present state of the populace of New South Wales, when I say that the lower Irish character, in some of its worst features, is deeply imprinted upon this colony, and that it would be well for it if the tide of a similar description of its population were to cease to set in here from the shores of Ireland. Free or voluntary emigration should undoubtedly be fostered and encouraged; it is of all others the point of greatest consequence to Australia. Scotland is too poor in population to afford to spare its best sons, and generally throughout the country the mechanics and labourers are able to make a decent livelihood. I say its best sons; for as far as my observation enables me to judge, it is the educated, enterprising portion who have funds that leave it, and not the poor in character or in purse. But I should certainly say to such as possess knowledge of any of the branches of mechanics—wrights, blacksmiths, and joiners, and those who have been accustomed to tend stock—that if they can be happy away from Scotland, and dare brave the discomforts and risks of a long voyage; can resist rum, and are content with reasonable wages,—in this country they will never be in want of employment, and that at a higher rate of remuneration than in Scotland. But England seems to me the portion of the empire best fitted to supply that class of emigrants who would, by removal to Australia, greatly benefit not only themselves but also the country they leave and the country they adopt. There are thousands of persons in England in such circumstances as to make the change no sacrifice to them, while the old country would not suffer by the loss of their labour. The same classes are in a different state of advancement, and are of a different temperament from their Irish brethren; and a considerable influx of English blood would very greatly improve the Australian character. To Englishmen, therefore, I would hold out every inducement to cross the sea. They must not expect to find gold lying at their feet; but the national character, stamina, and energy, must greatly change with the climate, if they do not obtain a competency in Australia in every line in which English skill excels. I have said that they would benefit the country they leave: for the population of England in many parts is redundant; and there is, also, a growing disposition to settle in towns, adding largely, year by year, to an already superabundant manufacturing population, and increasing poor-rates, to the injury, moral and pecuniary, of the whole community.

With regard to the immigration of females, I have already shown, by the facts stated in a former page, how important it is that it should be encouraged. I will only add here, that there is a certain and very considerable demand for their services as domestic servants, provided they are not absurd in their expectations as to wages. But I must remark, that no unmarried female ought ever to set her foot in a vessel for this country, unless under the protection of some respectable married woman, to whom she can look for a home in Sydney until she is provided with one in some other satisfactory way.

Married couples, from any country, would readily find employment in their various callings, and in the bush would be preferred, for the very evident reason—their greater steadiness. But from the cases that have occurred within my own knowledge, I would hold out no inducement to persons with four or five young children to leave their native land.

Having wished for a freer infusion of British blood, Mr. Hood in another place concludes—

Were I asked whether I would recommend my fellow-countrymen and others to emigrate to Australia, my reply would be, If they are possessed of caution, energy, and self-command, and have moderate views, let them come here. There is a field open for industry and capital to almost any extent; and the following classes of persons are those most likely to benefit themselves by emigrating:—Among the lower ranks, the poor man, with his tools and his skill as his capital, the day-labourer, and the shepherd; among the better ranks, men that possess not less than three thousand pounds, whose object is to become stockholders; and those also of more limited means, who, by the industry of their own families, could cultivate a small section of arable land, and subsist upon its produce. Without some certainty of procuring a situation here, I do not think there is an equal prospect for an educated youth with small capital to improve his position, unless he puts his little fund to interest, and is fortunate enough to become a manager for others. I am quite satisfied, that with less than three thousand pounds no young man can profitably invest his capital in sheep, if the care of them is to be his sole occupation, and it ought to be the sole occupation of every stockholder. Not only is Australia essentially a grazing country, but it is also the poor man's country. If he be reasonable in his expectations, the mechanic need never want work, and at wages above what he can obtain in Great Britain; nor need the shepherd, unless burdened with a wife and numerous family. But let no man come here, relinquishing his country and friends, under the expectation of making a fortune by the wave of his hand, or in the twinkling of an eye. Time, character, and minute attention to his business, aided by strict economy, will doubtless enable such persons as I have above enumerated to make money, if they keep clear of the rum-shop. But they will find all these qualities as essentially and fundamentally requisite here as at home. They may possibly hear that wages in the bush, for shepherds and labourers, are as high as £40, with the addition of rations; and that 15s. per diem is the pay of mechanics in Sydney: but they will find themselves misinformed. They will, however, readily obtain in the bush from £20 to £30, to which will be added the principal articles necessary for their maintenance, with a dwelling-house. . . . . For the wealthier classes, Sydney is by no means a cheap place of residence. . . . . I would not have any youth fear the bush life from anything I have said of the discomforts of the dwellings it affords. Connobolas was a new and previously unoccupied station. When once here, a young man will soon learn to consider this almost the least important point of all. I do not think that I have seen any house in the bush inhabited by stockholders not proprietors, that might not have been built for £100; and I have seen many that could not have cost £20. His abode is a matter in which he may speedily suit his taste. Nor should he start at the retirement of the bush. With anything like a tolerable quantity of stock, he will find ample occupation: he will soon learn to dislike near neighbours as hindrances to business; and while, on the one hand, he enjoys the society of an occasional visiter with double zest, it is most essentially necessary, on the other, that he should be ever at the head of his business. From the depressed state of matters at present, too many of the stockholders are neither more nor less than managers for behoof of their creditors in Sydney—the storekeepers. But this cannot last long.

With two sons settlers, and a great stake in the colony, Mr. Hood, perhaps unconsciously, looks, as we think, somewhat colonially at certain subjects; though many excellent suggestions for the solid improvement of the colony in its best and permanent interests may be found in his work.

Mr. Hood's judicious political disquisitions have been superseded by the late measures of the Home government; and New South Wales is now left to make trial of its representative constitution and legislative assembly, of the working of which we can as yet say nothing.

Before Mr. Hood left the colony, he had the satisfaction to see the windows of heaven opened, and rain pouring down in torrents for several successive days.

He returned home by India, in which country he hoped to see another of his sons; but was disappointed. His short residence in Bombay, and overland journey homeward, furnish matter for some pleasing chapters; but we have exhausted all our space on Australia, and on matters interesting only to emigrants, which forms the cream—the enduring staple of this excellent book.
