He had a prodigious readiness in writing and speaking the Greek tongue; and he himself tells us (7), 'he found it much easier to him to write in that language, than in Latin or even English, since the ornaments of poetry are almost peculiar to the Greeks, and since he had for many years been extremely conversant in Homer, the great father and source of the Greek Poetry: However, that his verses were not mere Cento's from that Poet, like Dr Duport's, but formed, as far as he was able, upon his style and manner; since he had no desire to be considered as a Rhapsodist of a *Rhapsody, but was ambitious of the title of a Poet.' Dr Bentley, we are told, used to say of Johua Barnes, that he understood as much Greek as a Greek Cobler.

BARNWALL (ROBERT) was of a family which has yielded many considerable men in times past [A], but of which branch of it this Robert was, we cannot with certainty declare. It was originally French, from Little Bretagne, where, we are told (a), (a) Irish Compend. p. 133. the surname is considerable to this day. This gentleman was born in the county of Dublin, and educated in the study of the Law at Gray's-Inn, London; where he became a writer while he was a youth, what progress or figure he made at the bar in his riper years, or when he died we know not, nor should we have known thus much, if the dedication to the book underneath mentioned, had not informed us of it [B].

[A] Yielded many considerable men. As Barnwall, Lord Viscount Kingland; Barnwall, Lord Baron of Trimelston; of which family John Barnwall, Lord Trimelston was, Lord Chancellor of Ireland, and made so (1), on the 16th of August, 1534; and before that was made Lord Treasurer (2) of Ireland, on the 30th of September, 1524. There was also a Baronet's title in the family, and many gentlemen of considerable estates.

cafes concerning Irish affairs, he dedicated to Sir Robert Gardiner, Lord Chief Justice of Ireland, and in his dedication observes, 'That among all the volumes of the law he had read, the second part of Henry the sixth, was the worthiest to be heeded, and specially regarded by all who should intend the manner of proceeding of Law, within the realm of Ireland, which was the motive to writing such an index, as may serve both as an abridgment and table to the said volume.' D

BARO, or BARON (PETER) a learned Divine in the XVIth century, was born at Estampes in France, and educated in the university of Bourges, where he was admitted a Licentiate in the Law (a): But being of the Protestant religion, he was obliged to leave his native country, to avoid persecution. Whereupon, withdrawing into England, he was kindly received, and charitably maintained by the Lord Treasurer Burghley, who admitted him to eat at his own table (b). He afterwards settled at Cambridge, upon the invitation of Dr Andrew Perne, Master of Peter-House, by whom he was entertained (c). In 1574 [A], at the recommendation of the Lord Burghley, Chancellor of that university, he was chosen the Lady Margaret's Professor there (d). But finding, after some years, that his income was not sufficient for his maintenance, as he was a married man, and had scarce any thing else to depend upon but his salary; he prevailed upon Dr Perne, to petition the Lord Burghley to make some addition to his livelihood (e). This Lord accordingly promised that he would take care of him: but not performing his promise soon, Dr Baro wrote him, on the twenty-first of November, a modest and handsome letter, wherein he put him in mind of his mean condition; and desired his assistance when any occasion should offer (f). For some years he quietly enjoyed his Professorship; but, at length, either out of envy, or on account of some unfashionable opinions of his, a restless faction arose, which rendered his place so uneasy to him, that he chose to leave the university. At that time, Absolute Predestination, in the most rigid and Calvinistical sense, was strenuously maintained, as the only orthodox and true principle, and as the established doctrine of the Church of England. The chief promoters of it at Cambridge, were, Dr Whitacre, Regius Professor of Divinity; Dr R. Some, Dr Humphrey Tyndal, and in general the oldest members of the university (g). On the contrary, Dr Baro, with some of the younger students, had a more rational and moderate notion of that doctrine. The Doctor having mentioned it in some of his lectures, That occasioned a contest between him and Mr Lawrence Chadderton, in the year 1581, which came to such a height, that Chadderton attempted to confute him publickly in one of his sermons (h). Dr Baro thinking himself injured, caused Mr Chadderton to be summoned into the Consistory, before the Vice-Chancellor and some others, when the latter utterly denied he had ever preached against the Doctor; and after some papers had passed between them upon those points (i), the affair was dropped (k). The chief objections made by the rigid Calvinists against Dr Baro were these, 1. That in his lectures upon Jonah (l), he taught the Popish Doctrine of the co-operation of faith and works in order to justification; which, though in terms a little changed, yet the doctrine was in effect one and the same. 2. That he endeavoured to persuade mankind, that the doctrine of the Reformed Churches was not so widely different from that of Rome, but that by distinctions they might be reconciled, and therefore concluded that both professions might be tolerated. 3. That in his lectures he taught, that the Heathen may be saved without the faith of the Gospel; and other strange matters which were looked upon as damnable errors. — Moreover, that he brought the Popish schoolmen into credit, and diminished the honour of the learned Protestant writers. Since which time, the course of studies in Divinity, and the manner of preaching, had been changed in the university; by some, who left the study of sound writers, as they filed them, and applied themselves to the reading of Popish, barbarous, and fantastical schoolmen, delighted with their curious questions and quiddities, whereby they drew all points of Christian faith into doubt, being the high-way not only to Popery but to Atheism (m). Some years after, a controversy arose between Dr Baro and Dr Some about the indefectibility of faith; but this dispute was soon composed (n). The next dispute Baro was engaged in, was of much longer continuance, and in the end proved his ruin. For Dr Whitacre having, in the beginning of November 1595, preached a sermon before the university, in defence of Absolute Predestination, on purpose, as he said (o), to stay the minds of the scholars, and to maintain what he called the doctrine of our Church, against innovations; he was not satisfied therewith, but endeavoured to have his weak arguments strengthened with the irresistable ones of authority and force. To bring that about, he and Dr Tyndal were deputed by the heads of the university, to Archbishop Whitgift. They loudly complained to him, that Pelagianism was getting ground in the university, and that no better method could be used to stop the progress of it, than the confirmation of some propositions they had brought along with them (p). These, according to their request, were established and approved on the 20th of November, by the Archbishop, the Bishop of London, the Bishop-elect of Bangor, and a very few other

Divines (q), and came to be known by the title of the Lambeth-Articles [B]. The Archbishop recommended them to the university, as the private judgment only of those that had made them, and not as laws and decrees, but as things necessary for the observation of peace; and desired them to take care that nothing should be publickly taught to the contrary (r). They were immediately communicated to Dr Baro (s), against whom probably they were more immediately designed. But he, either disregarding them, or being provoked thereby, preached a contrary doctrine, in a sermon before the university on the 12th of January following (t). In that discourse, he studied not to exasperate any; and therefore did not so much deny, as moderate those propositions; and state, as he apprehended, the true sense of them (u), and said nothing in his sermon concerning those Articles [C]. However, his adversaries judging of it otherwise, the Vice-Chancellor consulted the same Day with Dr Clayton and Mr Chadderton, what should be done. The next day he wrote a letter to the Archbishop of Canterbury, wherein he informed his Grace of the affair; and as he intended to call the Professor to an account for his sermon, and for breaking the peace of the university, but knew not what course to take, nor upon what statute to proceed, he desired his aid and advice; unless they were pleased to call him before the High Commission (w). The Archbishop returned for answer, on the 16th, that they should call Baro before them, and require a copy of his sermon; or, at least, cause him to set down the principal heads thereof: and to demand of him what should move him to continue that course, notwithstanding order taken, and so many advertisements to the contrary: But not to proceed to any determination against him, till they had advertised him of his answer, and the particular points of his sermon (x). In the mean time, Dr Baro finding what great offence was taken at his sermon, wrote, on the 14th of January, to the Archbishop to this effect (y). 'That when his Lordship lately spake with him about the nine Articles [D], he spake freely that which he thought good,

I. God hath from eternity predestinated some persons to life, and some he hath reprobated to death. II. The moving, or efficient cause of predestination to life, is not the foresight of faith, or perseverance, or good works, or of any other quality in the predestinated persons; but the sole will and good pleasure of God. III. The number of the predestinate is before-limited and certain, and can neither be increased nor lessened. IV. Those who are not predestinated to salvation, shall be necessarily damned for their sins. V. A true, lively, and justifying faith, and the sanctifying spirit of God, is not extinguished, doth not fail, nor vanish away in the Elect, either totally, or finally. VI. A man who is truly one of the faithful, that is, endued with justifying faith, is certain, with full assurance of faith, of the remission of his sins, and of his everlasting salvation by Jesus Christ. VII. Saving grace is not given, is not communicated, is not granted to all men, so as that they may be saved by it if they will. VIII. No one can come to Christ unless it is given him, and unless the Father draws him; but all men are not drawn by the Father that they may come to the Son. IX. It is not in every one's will or power to be saved (4). When Queen Elizabeth heard of these articles, and the manner in which they were framed, she was excessively angry. It was a maxim with her, Not to have to tender a point, and so dangerous to weak, ignorant, minds, disputed, and brought in question. Besides, she thought such an assembly, and their framing articles or canons without her special licence, derogatory to her Royal dignity. She therefore, immediately sends for Whitgift, and accosts him thus, 'My Lord, I am informed you are heaping up riches, and now I shall want no money.' The Archbishop replied, 'That he had but little, however, it was at her Majesty's service.' Nay, says the Queen, 'It is mine already, for you are fallen into a Premunire, by calling a Council without my consent (5).' Whitgift, in his own excuse, said, that those articles were not designed for a standing rule to direct the Church, but only for the appeasing of some unhappy differences in the university of Cambridge. Whereby the Queen, being somewhat appeased, proceeded to no extremities, but only commanded those articles to be speedily recalled and suppressed; which was performed with such care and diligence, that a copy of them was not to be found for a long time after (6). The Lord Burghley also disliked them: For when Dr Whitacre presented them to him, he reasoned with him upon those points; and drew by a similitude, a reason from an earthly Prince. Inferring thereby, that they charged God with cruelty, and might cause men to be desperate in their wickedness ——— As the Queen was angry with the framers and contrivers of those articles, so was she also displeased with Dr Baro, for disputing upon such abstruse points. For, in a discourse he had of those matters with the Archbishop, she wondered Baro should meddle in that controversy he being an alien, and so ought to have carried himself quietly and peaceably, in a country where he was so humanely harboured, and enfranchised both himself and his family. The Archbishop informed Dr Baro of this, who wrote a letter to his Grace, on the 13th of December, wherein he expressed the utmost affection and loyalty for her Majesty (7); and declared it as his opinion, 'That God is not the author of sin, nor would that it should be committed; when he openly forbids it, and reproveth men for nothing, but because of sin, which he hateth. And, that the Faithful, or the Elect, ought not to be secure of their salvation (8).'

[C] And said nothing in his sermon concerning those Articles. In that sermon he asserted particularly these three things; I. That God created all men according to his own likeness in Adam, and so consequently to eternal life; from which he chased no man, unless because of sin. As Damascus taught, lib. 2. de Fide orthodox. II. That Christ died sufficiently for all; against Joh. Piscator, a German Divine, who denied it: Whose opinion, he shewed, was contrary to the confession of the Church of England, and the XXXIX articles; and for proof thereof repeated the XXXIst article. III. That the promises of God made to us, as they are generally propounded to us, were to be generally understood, as is set down in the XVIIth article. But these three points were disagreeable to some unreasonable men, who endeavoured to persuade the world, that God did on purpose create the greatest part of men to destruction, that by the perdition of them he might get glory to himself: And that Christ did not die for all; not, for that many refused to accept his benefits, but because he would not that his death should profit them. And, moreover, because they were not created to salvation, as others, but to destruction. And, for the same cause, they would not have the promises to be general, but restrained them to those persons alone, who, they said, were created by God to be saved (9).

[D] When his Lordship spake to him about the nine Articles. It seems evident, from Mr Strype's account of this whole matter (10), That when Dr Baro heard of the confirmation of the nine articles, [and not after the preaching of his sermon as that author asserts (11)] he waited upon the Archbishop, about the beginning of December; who showed him those articles, and demanded his opinion of every one of them severally, and at two several times. The last time, he seemed ‘ good, and what then occurred to him. But because many things came not so soon, into his mind, which might be said for a favourable exposition of them, he thought it would not be unacceptable, if he wrote something more amply and particularly concerning each.’ — Then he adds, ‘ That he spake in his sermon according to those old and orthodox Articles *, and did not so much as touch the New †. And for a witness of it, sent his Grace an exposition of these last nine Articles (z). However, according to the Archbishop’s directions, Baro was cited before Dr Goad the Vice-Chancellor in the Consistory; and appeared there the 17th, 21st, and 29th of January (a), when several articles were exhibited against him [E]. At his last appearance, the conclusion against him was; ‘ That whereas Baro had promised the Vice-Chancellor, upon his demand, a copy of his sermon, but his Lawyers advised him not to deliver the same; the Vice-Chancellor did now, by virtue of his authority, peremptorily command him to deliver him the whole and entire sermon, as to the substance of it, in writing. Which Baro promised he would do the next day, and did it accordingly **.

‘ And, lastly, he did peremptorily, and by virtue of his authority, command Baro, that he should wholly abstain from those controversies and articles, and leave them altogether untouched, as well in his lectures, sermons, and determinations, as in his disputations and other his exercises (b).’ The Vice-Chancellor, who had proceeded thus far without the knowledge of the Lord Burghley, their Chancellor, thought fit to acquaint him, January 29, with their proceedings, and to desire his wife and honourable advice (c). And, on the other hand, Dr Baro being informed of his enemies invidious aspersions of him to that Lord; took care to represent his own case to him in a true light: Assuring him, that he had only defended the truth of the Gospel against Piscator; whose book he saw was in the hands of many of the younger students; and begged of him, not to resolve any thing concerning him, till he had diligently enquired into the truth of what he had written. The discountenance hereupon given to this affair by the Chancellor [F], stopped all further proceeding against Dr Baro (d). He continued in the university the February and March following (e), but with much opposition and trouble, especially from Dr Goad, and Mr Chadderton [G]. But Archbishop Whitgift (tho’ he had weakly yielded in many respects to the solicitations of his enemies) being fully satisfied at last of his learning and integrity, protected him against all attempts that could hurt either his learning or reputation. Only he charged him, to forbear such arguments as would provoke contentious disputations, that so peace might be preserved in the university, and by that means religion and learning flourish there (f). The Doctor, notwithstanding his troubles, had many friends and adherents in the university, as Mr Overal, Dr Clayton, Mr Harfnet, and Dr Andrews; and his disciples were so far from being suppressed or silenced by the Lambeth Articles, that they were become more united (g): So that, had he stood again for his Professorship, when it became vacant on the 25th of March 1596 (h), he would undoubtedly have been chosen in again. But he had met with so much vexation, and such to make some small objections against one or two of them only; yet confessed that they were all true. Whereupon, the Archbishop admonished him not to dispute any more upon those points, which he faithfully promised to observe (12).

[E] Several articles were exhibited against him. He was charged with having asserted, I. That God, by an absolute will, created all, and every man, to eternal life: Because, he created all according to his own image; and therefore for happiness; consequently, he deprives no one of salvation, but for his sin. II. That there is a two-fold will in God, an antecedent and consequent will. By his antecedent will God hath rejected no body, otherwise he would have condemned his own work. To explain this, he alledged the instance of a King, a father, and a husbandman: A King makes laws for the good of his subjects; a father does not beget a son to have him hanged, or to disinherit him; a husbandman does not plant a tree to root it up again. III. That Christ died for all men, and for every one in particular; that all, and every man, might know they have a remedy in Christ; according to what is said, That Christ came to save that which was lost (13). Now all, and every man were lost in Adam: Therefore, &c. For the remedy is as extensive as the disease; and God is no respecter of persons (14). IV. That God’s promises to life are universal; and belong to Cain as well as to Abel, to Esau as well as Jacob, to Judas as well as to Peter. And that Cain was no more rejected of God than Abel, before he had excluded himself: That men exclude themselves from Heaven, and God does not exclude them; according to what is said, O Israel, thou hast destroyed thyself (15). — These were subscribed by Jo. Alenton, Will. Nelson, Obadiah Ashton, James Crowther, John Hooke, George Downham. — Dr Baro alledged in his own defence, that he had not preached doctrines contrary to the nine articles. And, with regard to the grace of God sufficient to eternal life being offered to all; he said, that grace was indeed offered to all, but in a different measure: For to some was given greater grace, to others less; to some more talents, to others less (16).

[F] The discountenance given to this affair by the Chancellor. He told them in his letter among other things, that they sisted Dr Baro with interrogatories, as if he were a thief; — and that their proceedings against him seemed to be done ‘ of stomach,’ out of passion and prejudice (17). However, his enemies not discouraged thereby, writ another letter to the Chancellor, on the 8th of March, wherein they informed him — ‘ That Dr Baro (18) had not only in the sermon, but also for the space of fourteen or fifteen years taught in his lectures, preached in his sermons, determined in the schools, and printed in several books, divers points of doctrine not only contrary to himself, but also contrary to that which had been taught and received ever since her Majesty’s reign, and agreeable to the errors of Popery (19).’

[G] With much opposition and trouble, especially from Dr Goad, and Mr Chadderton. Dr Goad had been his private enemy a long while. For about ten or eleven years before, in a clandestine synod at London, held probably by Cartwright and his adherents, some things had been decreed against him unheard. Of which being informed, he takes a journey to London, complains to Dr Goad who had been in that assembly, and desires him at least to show him, what they had decreed concerning, or against him. But he could not obtain a sight of it, till Dr Bancroft shewed it him a few years after. And, from that time, they hated him; and having always privately watched him, they at last took occasion from that sermon of his, to endeavour to cast him out of the university with shame (20).

ill usage, from the Elect, that for the sake of peace, he chose to retire to London, and fixed his abode in Crouched-Friers (i). There he died about three or four years after, and was decently buried in the parish church of St Olave-Hart-street, his pall being supported by six Doctors of Divinity, and his corps attended by the most eminent Ministers in the city, according to an order of Dr Bancroft, then Bishop of London (k). Dr Baro left several children, which settled in and about Boston in Lincolnshire (l). B A R O N (BONAVENTURE) whose true name was Fitz-Gerald [A], was descended from a branch of the Fitz-Geralds of Burnchurch in the county of Kilkenny, a family settled in Ireland soon after the English acquisitions in that country, which has produced several men of figure in the Church [B]. But he has been more remarkable in the learned world for his maternal genealogy, being the son of a sister of Luke Wadding, that eminent Franciscan Friar, who in the last century demonstrated his great abilities and industry, by many voluminous treatises of genius and labour (a). His uncle Wadding took great care of his education in his youth, which he saw rewarded by an uncommon diligence, and when he was of a proper age procured his admission into the Franciscan order, and sent for him to Rome; where he lived under his own eye in the college of St Isidore, a society of that order founded by himself in 1625, for the education of Irish students in the study of the Liberal Arts, Divinity, and Controversy, to serve as a seminary, out of which the mission into England, Scotland, and Ireland, might be supplied. Baron, after some time, grew into high reputation, and became especially remarkable for the purity of his Latin style, which first fell under the notice of the Publick, by means of the ignorance of a Roman Cardinal [C]; from which time his fame increased, and he became the author of many books both in prose and verse, a catalogue of which may be seen in the remarks [D]. He was for a considerable time Prælector of Divinity in the college aforesaid, and in all resided at Rome about sixty years, where he died, very old and totally deprived of sight, on the 18th of March 1696, and was buried at St Isidore's.

[A] Whose true name was Fitz-Gerald. His family were antiently Palatine Barons of Burnchurch, who had no seats in the House of Lords, but were created titular Barons by the Count Palatine of that jurisdiction, by virtue of a royal feignury granted by the Crown; of which kind of Barons there were many in England. As in Cheshire (according to Camden) (1) the Barons of Haulton, Malbank, Malpas, and Kinderten, &c. who were made so by Hugh Lupus, the first Count Palatine of Cheshire, immediately upon his creation: Of the same sort were the Barons of Walton, in the Palatinate of Lancaster, and the Baron of Hilton in the Bishopricks of Durham. In Ireland also were the Barons of Skrine, Navan, Galtrim, Nerraghmore, Rheban, &c. and the Barons of Burnchurch, from whence many of the Fitz-Geralds in process of time took the names of Baron, and it is now become a family name.

[C] His Latin style first fell under the notice of the Publick, by means of the ignorance of a Roman Cardinal. The story I had in a letter from Rome, containing many curious remarks on the college of Cardinals, which are foreign to the present purpose.—'A certain Cardinal (says the letter writer) writ a small piece in Italian, but for 'fame sake desired to have it put into good Latin. He 'employed Luke Wadding to find him out a proper 'person to undertake the task, and Wadding committed it to his nephew Baron's care, with whose 'talents that way he was well acquainted. The Cardinal, not understanding a word of Latin, to conceal his ignorance, condemned the translation, and blamed Wadding for recommending to him such a dunce. This accident made a great noise in Rome, and became the table-talk of the town. For Wadding, who wanted no preferments, and Baron who despised every thing in comparison of his reputation, appealed to the college of Jesuits, who, upon examination, unanimously allowed the version to be extremely well done, to the no small confusion of the Cardinal, and the meriment of the Publick.'

B A R R O W (ISAAC), Bishop of St Asaph in the reign of King Charles II, was son of Isaac Barrow of Spiney-Abbey in Cambridgeshire, and uncle of the famous Dr Isaac Barrow, Master of Trinity-College in Cambridge (a). He had his education at Peter-house in Cambridge, and became Fellow of that college; but was ejected by the Presbyterians about the year 1643: whereupon going to Oxford, he was appointed one of the Chaplains of New-College by the Warden Dr Pink (b). It is said, he was created Bachelor of Divinity in that university the 23d of June 1646; but his name is not to be found in the register (c). He continued at Oxford till the garrison of that place surrendered to the Parliament, after which time he shifted from place to place, and suffered with the rest of the loyal and orthodox clergy, till the Restoration of King Charles II, when he was not only restored to his fellowship in Peter-house, but elected likewise one of the Fellows of Eaton-College near Windfor. July the 5th 1663, he was consecrated Bishop of the Isle of Man, in Henry the VIIth's chapel at Westminster; and the year following he was appointed, by Charles Earl of Derby, Governor of the Isle of Man; which office he discharged with great reputation all the time he held that See, and some time after his translation to that of St Asaph. He held his fellowship of Eaton in commendam with the bishopric of Man, and was a considerable benefactor to that island, and especially the clergy thereof (d) [A]. Afterwards going into England for the sake of his health, and lodging in a house belonging to the Countess of Derby in Lancashire called Cross-Hall, he there received the news of his Majesty's conferring on him the bishopric of St Asaph, to which he was translated March the 21st 1669, and to which diocese he was no inconsiderable benefactor [B]. This worthy Prelate died in the 67th year of his age, at Shrewsbury, the 24th of June 1680, and was buried the first of July following at the cathedral church of St Asaph [C]. His epitaph [D] gave great offence to the Presbyterians (e) [E].

[A] He was a considerable benefactor to the island of Man, and especially to the Clergy thereof.] He collected with great care and pains from pious persons one thousand eighty one pounds, eight shillings, and four pence; with which he purchased of the Earl of Derby all the impropriations in the island, and settled them upon the Clergy in proportion to their several wants. He obliged them all likewise to teach school in their respective parishes, and allowed thirty pounds per annum for a free-school, and fifty pounds per annum for academical learning. He procured also from King Charles II, one hundred pounds a year (which, Mr Wood says, had like to have been lost) to be settled upon his Clergy, and gave one hundred thirty five pounds of his own money for a lease upon lands of twenty pounds a year, towards the maintenance of three poor scholars in the college of Dublin, that in time there might be a more learned body of Clergy in the island. He gave likewise ten pounds towards the building a bridge over a dangerous water; and did several other acts of charity and beneficence (1).

[B] He was no inconsiderable benefactor to the diocese of St Asaph.] He repaired several parts of the cathedral church, especially the north and south isles, and new covered them with lead, and wainscoted the East part of the choir. He laid out a considerable Sum of money in repairing the episcopal palace, and a mill thereunto belonging. In 1678, he built an alms-house for eight poor widows, and endowed it with twelve pounds per annum for ever. The same year, he procured an act of parliament for appropriating the Rectories of Llaurhaiaid and Mochant in Denbighshire and Montgomeryshire, and of Skeiviog in the county of Flint, for repairs of the cathedral church of St Asaph, and the better maintenance of the choir therein, and also for the uniting several rectories that were sine-cures, and the vicarages of the same parishes, within the said diocese. He designed likewise to build a free-school, and endow it, but was prevented by death. Nevertheless, in 1687, Bishop Lloyd, who succeeded Bishop Barrow in the see of St Asaph, recovered of that Prelate's executors two hundred pounds, towards a free-school at St Asaph (2).

[C] He died at Shrewsbury — and was buried — at the cathedral church of St Asaph.] Six days after his death, his corpse was removed to his house called Argoed-Hall in Flintshire, and from thence carried to his palace at St Asaph, and the same day interred, after divine service and a sermon, by Dr Nicholas Stratford, Dean of St Asaph, on the south side of the West door in the cathedral church-yard, which was the place he had appointed (3).

*manum Domini depositæ, in spem lætæ resurrectionis per sola Christi merita. Obiit dictus reverendus pater festo Divi Johannis Baptistæ, anno Domini 1680, ætatis 67, et translationis suæ undecimo: i. e. 'The remains of Isaac, Bishop of St Asaph, deposited in the hand of the Lord, in hope of a joyful resurrection thro' the alone merits of Jesus Christ. This reverend father died on the feast of St John Baptist, in the year of our Lord 1680, the 67th of his age, and the eleventh his translation' On the lower stone, which is even with the ground, is the following inscription, engraven on a brass plate fastened thereunto, which was made by the Bishop himself. *Exuvie Isaaci Asaphensis Episcopi, in manum Domini depositæ, in spem lætæ resurrectionis per sola Christi merita. O vos transuentes in domum domini, domum orationis, orate pro conservo vestro, ut inveniat misericordiam in die Domini: i. e. 'The remains of Isaac, Bishop of St Asaph, deposited in the hand of the Lord, in hope of a joyful resurrection thro' the alone merits of Jesus Christ. O ye, who are passing into the house of the Lord, the house of prayer, pray for your fellow-servant, that he may find mercy in the day of the Lord.' The said brass plate was fastened at first, as is reported there, over the said West door, but was afterwards taken down, and fastened to the lower stone next the body (4).

[E] — gave great offence to the Presbyterians.] What they excepted against in this epitaph was, no doubt, the latter part of the second inscription, as favouring too much of the Popish doctrine of Prayers for the dead. But let us cite Anthony Wood (5). 'As soon as this last epitaph was put up, the contents thereof flew about the nation by the endeavours of the godly faction (then plumped up with hopes to carry on their diabolical designs upon account of the Popish plot, then in examination and prosecution) to make the world believe, that the said Bishop died a Papist, and that the rest of the Bishops were Papists also, or at least popishly affected, and especially for this reason, that they adhered to his Majesty, and took part with him at that time against the said faction, who endeavoured to bring the nation into confusion by their usual trade of lying and slandering, which they have always hitherto done to carry on their ends, such is the religion of the Saints. But so it is, let them say what they will, that the said Bishop was a virtuous, generous, and godly man, and a true son of the Church of England; and it is to be wished that those peering, poor-spirited, and sneaking wretches would endeavour to follow his example, and not to lie upon the catch, under the notion of religion, to obtain their temporal ends, private endearments, comfortable importances, filthy lusts, &c.'

B A R R O W (ISAAC), an eminent Mathematician and Divine of the last century, was descended from an ancient family of that name in Suffolk (a). His father was Mr Thomas Barrow [A], a reputable citizen of London (b) and Linnen-Draper to King Charles I (c); and his mother, Anne, daughter of William Buggin of North-Cray in Kent, Esq; whose tender care he did not long experience, she dying when he was about four years old. He was born at London in October 1630 [B], and was placed first in the Charter-house school for two or three years, where his behaviour afforded but little hopes of success in the profession of a scholar [C], for which his father designed him. But being removed from thence to Felstead school in Essex, his disposition took a more happy turn, and he quickly made so great a progress in learning, that his master appointed him a kind of Tutor to the Lord Viscount Fairfax of Emely in Ireland, who was then his scholar (d). During his stay at Felstead, he was admitted, December the 15th 1643, being then fourteen years of age, a Pensioner of Peter-house in Cambridge, under his uncle Mr Isaac Barrow, afterwards Bishop of St Asaph, and then Fellow of that college. But when he was qualified for the university, he was entered a Pensioner in Trinity-College, the 5th of February 1645; his uncle having been ejected, together with Seth Ward, Peter Gunning, and John Barwick, who had written against the Covenant (e). His father having suffered greatly in his estate by his attachment to the royal cause, our young student was obliged at first for his chief support to the generosity of the learned Dr Hammond, to whose memory he paid his thanks, in an excellent epitaph on the Doctor (f). In 1647, he was chosen a scholar of the house (g); and, tho' he always continued a staunch Royalist, and never would take the Covenant, yet, by his great merit and prudent behaviour, he preserved the esteem and good will of his superiors [D]. Afterwards, when the Engagement was imposed, he subscribed it; but, upon second thoughts, repenting of what he had done, he applied himself to the Commissioners, declared his dissatisfaction, and prevailed to have his name razed out of the list. He applied himself with great diligence to the study of all parts of literature, especially Natural Philosophy; and tho' he was yet but a young scholar, his judgment was too great to rest satisfied with the shallow and superficial Philosophy, then taught and received in the schools: he applied himself therefore to the reading and considering the writings of the Lord Verulam, [A] His father was Mr Thomas Barrow. He was son of Isaac Barrow, Esq; born at Gazeby in Suffolk in 1563, but afterwards of Spiney-abbey at Wickham in Cambridgeshire; a gentleman of a good estate, and forty years in the commission of the peace for that county. This Isaac Barrow was son of Philip Barrow, who published a Method of Physic, and whose brother Isaac was a Doctor in that faculty, a benefactor to Trinity-College in Cambridge, a Fellow of that college, and tutor therein to Robert Cecil, Earl of Salisbury, and Lord Treasurer of England (1). They were the sons of John Barrow of Suffolk, and grandsons of Henry Barrow (2). Mr Thomas Barrow, our Divine's father, adhered to the interests of King Charles I, whom he followed to Oxford; and, after the murder of that Prince, he went to his son Charles II, then in exile, whom he attended till the Restoration (3). He had a brother whose name was Isaac, afterwards Bishop of St Asaph (4), whose consecration sermon, his nephew and name-sake preached at Westminster-Abbey (5).

[B] He was born — in October 1630. The year of his birth is evidently inferred from that of his death, which, according to his funeral inscription (6), written from the information of his father, was the year 1677; from which subtracting the years of his life, said in the same inscription to be 47, we find he was certainly born in the year 1630. And this is farther confirmed by the date of his admission in Peter-house, which, Mr Ward tells us (7), was in 1643, at which time, according to the express words of the college register (annum agens decimum quartum) he was entered upon the fourteenth year of his age. Notwithstanding all which, Dr Pope will have it, that the date assigned by Mr Hill is not right. Mr Hill, says he (8), fixes Dr Barrow's birth in the month of October, A. D. 1630. But I hope, he will not be offended, if I dissent from him, both as to the year and month, and produce reason for so doing; 'tis this: I have often heard Dr Barrow say, he was born upon the twenty-ninth of February; and if he said true, it could not be either in October, or in 1630, that not being a Leap-year. I would not have asserted this upon the credit of my memory, had it been any other day of any other month, it being told me so long since, had I not this remarkable circumstance to confirm it; he used to say, "It is, in one respect, the best day in the year to be born upon; for it afforded me this advantage over my fellow-collegiates, who used to keep feasts upon "their birth-day; I was treated by them once every year, and I entertained them once in four years, "when February had nine and twenty days." These accounts are so inconsistent, that we must either suppose, that Dr Barrow's father was mistaken as to the year of his son's birth, and that his age was falsely entered in the register of Peter house; or (which is no improbable conjecture) that Dr Pope has, thro' forgetfulness, ascribed that to Dr Barrow, which he had head of some other friend.

[C] He gave but little hopes of success in the profession of a scholar. His greatest recreation, Mr Hill tells us (9), was in such sports as brought on fighting among the boys; to which he adds, his negligence of his cloaths, and (which was much worse) that of his book. Nay, there was then so little appearance of that comfort, which his father afterwards received from him, that he often solemnly wished, that if it pleased God to take away any of his children, it might be his son Isaac, so vain a thing, as my author judiciously observes, is man's judgment, and our providence unfit to guide our own affairs. It is observable, that Dr Barrow always retained a natural courage, tho' he had perfectly subdued all inclination to quarrelling, and that the neglect of his dress continued with him to the last.

[D] He preserved the esteem and good will of his superiors. Of this we have an instance in Dr Hill, Master of the college, who had been put in by the Parliament in the room of Dr Comber, ejected for adhering to the King (10). One day laying his hand upon our young student's head, he said, Thou art a good lad, 'tis pity thou art a Cavalier; and when, in an oration on the Gunpowder-Treason, Mr Barrow had so celebrated the former times, as to reflect much on the present, some Fellows were provoked to move for his expulsion; but the Master silenced them with this, Barrow is a better man than any of us (11). This, Dr Pope observes (12), is very remarkable, and an evident testimony of our young scholar's irresistible merits, which could, as the Poets feign of Orpheus,

Make savage tygers and fierce lions tame;

that is, as the Doctor interprets it, make a Presbyterian kind to a Cavalier and Malignant, which names the adherers to the King, Church, and Laws, went under in those days.

- M. Des Cartes, Galileo, &c. who seemed to offer something more solid and substantial (b). In 1648, Mr Barrow took the degree of Bachelor of Arts (i). The year following, he was elected Fellow of his college, merely out of regard to his merit; for he had no friend to recommend him, as being of the opposite party [E]. And now, finding the times not favourable to men of his opinions in matters of Church and State, he turned his thoughts to the profession of Physic, and made a considerable progress in the knowledge of Anatomy, Botany, and Chemistry: but afterwards, upon deliberation with himself, and with the advice of his uncle, he applied himself to the study of Divinity, to which he was further obliged by his oath on his admission to his fellowship. By reading Scaliger on Eusebius, he perceived the dependance of Chronology on Astronomy; which put him upon reading Ptolomy's Almagest: and finding that book and all Astronomy to depend on Geometry, he made himself master of Euclid's Elements, and from thence proceeded to the other antient Mathematicians. He made a short essay towards acquiring the Arabic language, but soon deserted it. And with these severer speculations, the largeness of his mind had room for the amusements of Poetry, to which he was always strongly addicted (k) [F]. In 1652, he commenced Master of Arts (l), and, on the 12th of June the following year, was incorporated in that degree at Oxford (m). When Dr Duport resigned the chair of Greek Professor, he recommended his pupil Mr Barrow to succeed him; who justified his tutor's opinion of him by an excellent performance of the probation-exercise: but being looked upon as a favourer of Arminianism, the choice fell upon another (n); and this disappointment, it is thought, helped to determine him in his resolution of travelling abroad (o) [G]. In order to execute this design, he was obliged to sell his books. Accordingly, in the year 1655, he went into France; where, at Paris, he found his father attending the English court, and out of his small Viaticum made him a seasonable present (p). The same year his Euclid was printed at Cambridge, which he had left behind him for that purpose (q). He gave his college an account of his journey to Paris in a Poem (r); and some farther observations in a Letter (s) [H]. After a few months, he went into Italy, and stayed some time at Florence, where he had the advantage of perusing several books in the Great Duke's Library, and of conversing with Mr Fitton his Librarian (t) [I]. Here the straitness of his circumstances must have put an end to his travels, had he not been generously supplied with money by Mr James Stock, a young Merchant of London, to whom he afterwards dedicated his edition of Euclid's Data (u). He was desirous to have seen Rome; but the plague then raging in that city, he took ship at Leghorn, November the 6th 1656, for Smyrna. In this voyage they were attacked by a corsair of Algiers, who, perceiving the stout defence the ship made, sheered off and left her; and upon this occasion Mr Barrow gave a remarkable instance of his natural courage and intrepidity (w) [K]. At Smyrna, he made himself welcome

[E] He had no friend to recommend him, as being of the opposite party.] Dr Pope, having mentioned this particular circumstance attending Mr Barrow's election, says; 'This brings to my memory a certificate or testimonial, which my worthy friend Dr Gilbert Ironside, then Warden of Wadham-College in Oxford, and now Bishop of Hereford, gave to a member of that college, who was candidate for a fellowship in another college; it was to this purpose: If this person, whom I recommend to you, be not a better scholar than any of those who are his competitors, choose him not; and he did, upon examination and trial, so far surpass the rest, that they could not refuse him, without being and appearing partial and unjust. I mention this as parallel to Dr Barrow's case (13).'

(13) Life of Bishop Ward, p. 133.

(14) Ubi supra.

[F] He was always strongly addicted to Poetry.] This is sufficiently evident from the many performances he has left us in that art. Mr Hill tells us (14), he was particularly pleased with that branch of it, which consists in description, but greatly disliked the hyperboles of some modern Poets. As for our plays, he was an enemy to them, as a principal cause of the debauchery of the times; the other causes he thought to be, the French education, and the ill example of great persons. For satires, he wrote none; his wit, as Mr Hill expresses it, was pure and peaceable.

(15) Ibid.

[G] This disappointment helped to determine him in his resolution of travelling abroad.] His other motives, according to Dr Pope (15), were the melancholy aspect of public affairs, and a desire to see some of those places mentioned by the Greek and Latin authors. But whatever they were, there is no doubt, as Mr Hill observes (16), but that he, who, in lesser occurrences, did very judiciously consider all circumstances, had on good grounds made this resolution.

[H] Some observations in a letter.] This letter, which shews Mr Barrow's piercing judgment in political affairs, when he turned his thoughts that way, gives a particular account of the controversy between M. Arnaud the Janenist and the Jesuits, and mentions the favourable disposition of the King and Queen of France towards the Protestants of that kingdom, which plainly appeared upon the following remarkable occasion. The Archbishop of Thoulouse, being to come to Paris, waited upon the Queen, and in discourse with her majesty began to complain that the Protestants enjoyed too great a liberty in his diocese; to which that Princess replied by assuring him, that she had sufficiently experienced their loyalty, and had found them to be more faithful subjects than those who accused them of sedition. The King coming in during the conversation, joined with the Queen in her opinion of the Protestants, and declared he would continue to them the liberty, which had been granted them by the edicts of his predecessors. In speaking of the university of Paris, Mr Barrow tells them, that it produced at that time very few men of distinguished learning and abilities, and that its colleges were remarkable for nothing but their structures, tho', even in that respect, the University of Cambridge had no reason to envy that of Paris, since Trinity-college alone equalled, if not exceeded, the colleges of the Sorbonne, Navarre, and Clermont, thrown together.

[I] Mr Fitton, the Great Duke's Librarian.]

This gentleman, who was an Englishman, had been appointed by the Great Duke of Tuscany to take upon him the charge of that valuable treasure of antiquity, his library, on account of his extraordinary abilities in that sort of learning (17). This is so clearly expressed by Mr Hill, that one would wonder how Dr Pope came to mistake him so far, as to assert (18), (18) Ubi supra, that, upon Mr Fitton's recommendation, Mr Barrow was invited by the Great Duke to accept of the office of his Librarian. P. 134.

and intrepidity.] Take it in Dr Pope's words: 'In his passage from Leghorn to Constantinople, the ship he failed in was attacked by an Algerine Pirate; during the fight, he betook himself to his arms (*), and stayed welcome to Mr Bretton the Consul, upon whose death he afterwards wrote an elegy (x), and to the English factory. From thence he proceeded to Constantinople, where he met with a very friendly reception from Sir Thomas Bendish the English Ambassador, and Sir Jonathan Daws, with whom he afterwards kept up an intimate friendship and correspondence. This voyage, from Leghorn to Constantinople, he has described in a Latin Poem (y) [L]. At Constantinople, he read over the Works of St Chryostom, once Bishop of that See, whom he preferred to all the other Fathers. Having stayed in Turkey above a year, he returned from thence to Venice, where, soon after they were landed, the ship took fire, and with all the goods was consumed. From thence he came home, in 1659, thro' Germany and Holland, and has left a description of some parts of those countries in his Poems. Soon after his return into England, the time (z) being somewhat elapsed, before which all Fellows of Trinity-college are obliged to take orders, or quit the society, Mr Barrow was episcopally ordained by Bishop Brownrig, notwithstanding the unsettled state of the times, and the declining condition of the Church of England. Upon the King's Restoration, his friends expected he would have been immediately preferred on account of his having suffered and deserved so much; but it came to nothing, which made him wittily say (which he has not left in his Poems)

Et nemo sensit te rediisse minus (a).

That is,

*Thy Restoration, Royal Charles, I see,
By none more wish'd, by none less felt, than me.*

However he wrote an ode upon that occasion, in which he introduces Britannia congratulating the King upon his return (b). In 1660, he was chosen, without a competitor, Greek Professor of the university of Cambridge (c). His oration, spoken upon that occasion [M], is preserved among his Opuscula (d). When he entered upon this province, he designed to have read upon the Tragedies of Sophocles; but, altering his intention, he made choice of Aristotle's Rhetoric (e). These Lectures, having been lent to a person, who never returned them, are irrecoverably lost (f). The year following, which was 1661, he took the degree of Bachelor in Divinity (g). July the 16th 1662, he was elected Professor of Geometry in Gresham-College, in the room of Mr Lawrence Rook, and chiefly thro' the interest and recommendation of Dr Wilkins, Master of Trinity-College, and afterwards Bishop of Chester. In this station, he not only discharged his own duty, but supplied likewise the absence of Dr Pope the Astronomy Professor. Among his Lectures, some were upon the projection of the sphere; which being borrowed and never returned, are lost (h). But his Latin Oration, previous to his Lectures, is still extant [N]. The same year 1662, he wrote an Epitaphium on the marriage * stayed upon the deck cheerfully and vigorously fighting, 'till the Pirate, perceiving the stout defence the ship made, sheered off and left her. I asked him, why he did not go down into the hold, and leave the defence of the ship to those to whom it did belong; he replied, "it concerned no man more than myself; I would rather have lost my life, than have fallen into the hands of those merciless Infidels." This engagement, and his own stout and intrepid behaviour in it, to defend his liberty, which he valued more than his life, as he asserts in that verse,

* Almaque libertas vitali charior aura,

* he describes at large in a copy of verses (19) in the fourth volume of works (20). Dr Pope adds to this another accident, which, because it is a farther proof of Dr Barrow's natural courage and intrepidity, I shall insert in this place. 'He was at a gentleman's house in the country, if I mistake not in Cambridgeshire, where the necessary-house was at the end of a long garden, and consequently at a great distance from the room where he lodged; as he was going to it very early, even before day, for he was sparing of sleep, and a very early riser, a fierce mastiff, who used to be chained up all day, and let loose at night for the security of the house, perceiving a strange person in the garden at that unseasonable time, set upon him with great fury. The Doctor caught him by the throat, threw him, and lay upon him, and, whilst he kept him down, considered what he should do in that exigent; once he had a mind to kill him, but he quite altered this resolution, judging it would be an unjust action, for the dog did his duty, and he himself was in fault for ram* bling out of his lodgings before 'twas light. At length he called out so loud, that he was heard by some of the house, who came presently out, and freed both the Doctor and the dog from the eminent danger they were both in (21).'

[L] This voyage ——— she has described in a Latin poem.] The time of his sailing from Leghorn is, at the head of this poem, thro' mistake, printed Nov. 6. anno 1657; it should be 1656; otherwise he could not have stayed above a year in Turkey, as Mr Hill assures us he did, and is manifest from his letter to the Master and Fellows of Trinity-College, dated at Constantinople Aug. 1, 1658 (22).

[M] His oration spoken upon that occasion.] In this speech Dr Barrow pays a high compliment to the memory of Sir Thomas Smith, Sir John Cheek, Downs, Chrichton, and Dr Duport; and particularly commemorates Erasmus, who had been so nobly instrumental in reviving the study of the learned languages. He compliments the University of Cambridge upon the good sense, true judgment, real wit, and extensive learning with which it abounded; in which respects it had the advantage over all the universities he had seen in his travels. He apologizes for his own insufficiency and inability to fill that chair; but, as he had the honour to be elected, he should use his utmost endeavours to supply the want of genius, by industry and diligent application. He congratulates his hearers upon the revival and encouragement of good literature and the politer arts by his Majesty's happy Restoration. Lastly, he expatiates upon the great antiquity, extensive use, peculiar energy, and superior advantages of the Greek language; and displays the several merits of it's writers in every branch of learning.

About this time, Mr Barrow was offered a very good living; but the condition annexed of teaching the patron's ſon made him reſuſe it, as too like a ſimoniacal contract (k). Upon the 20th of May 1663, he was elected a Fellow of the Royal Society, in the firſt choice made by the Council after their charter (l). The ſame year, Mr Lucas having founded a Mathematical Lecture at Cambridge, Mr Barrow was ſo powerfully recommended, by Dr Wilkins, to that gentleman's executors Mr Raworth and Mr Buck, that he was appointed the firſt Profeſſor; and the better to ſecure the end of ſo noble and uſeful a foundation, he took care that himſelf and his ſucceſſors ſhould be obliged to leave yearly to the univerſity ten written Lectures (m). We have his Preferatory Oration [O], ſpoken in the publick Mathematical ſchool, March the 14th 1664 (n). Tho' his two profeſſorſhips were not inconſiſtent, he choſe to reſign that of Greſham-College; which he accordingly did, May the 20th 1664. He had been invited to take the charge of the Cotton Library; but, after a ſhort trial, he declined it, and reſolved to ſettle in the univerſity. In 1669, he reſigned the Mathematical chair, to his very worthy friend and learned ſucceſſor Mr Iſaac Newton, being determined to quit entirely the ſtudy of the Mathematics for that of Divinity [P]. In 1670, he wrote a Latin poem upon the death of the Duchefs of Orleans (o), an Epicidium upon the Duke of Albemarle (p), and a Latin Ode upon the Trinity (q). He was only a Fellow of Trinity-College, when he was collated by his uncle, the Biſhop of St Aſaph, to a ſmall Sine-Cure in Wales, and by Dr Seth Ward, Biſhop of Salifbury, to a prebend in that cathedral [Q]; the profits of both which he applied to charitable uſes, and afterwards reſigned them, when he became Maſter of his college (r). This year, 1670, he was created Doctör in Divinity by mandate (s). In 1672, Dr Pearſon, Maſter of Trinity-College, being, upon the death of Biſhop Wilkins, removed to the biſhoprick of Cheſter (t), Dr Barrow was appointed by the King to ſucceed him [R]; and his Maſtey was pleaſed to ſay upon that occaſion, he had given

From thence the Orator proceeds to celebrate his predeceſſors in the Geometry Lecture, Mr Henry Briggs, Sir Chriſtopher Wren, and Mr Laurence Rooke; and laments his own want of abilities to ſupply the place of ſuch great men. The reſt of the oration is taken up in diſplaying the ſolid foundation, and great advantages, of Geometry, to which the world has been obliged for ſo many noble and uſeful diſcoveries.

[O] His Preferatory Oration.] In this piece the Doctör gives us a fine encomium on Mr Lucas, founder of the Lecture, and pays a compliment to his executors Mr Raworth and Mr Buck. He then mentions the reaſons, which induced him to reſign the Greek Profeſſorſhip for that of the Mathematics, which were chiefly, that the bent of his genius led him more ſtrongly to the ſtudy of Philoſophy than of Philology, the knowledge of things than of words; and that, having undertaken the Greek lecture, at a time when the duty of it was very great and the profits very ſmall, he thought himſelf at liberty, eſpecially now that the circumſtances of that lecture were altered very much to it's advantage, to quit it, and exchange a very laborious duty for one of leſs fatigue. He employs the reſt of the oration on the praifes of the Mathematics, and their excellent uſe in freeing the mind from credulity, fortifying it againſt the vanity of Scepticiſm, reſtraining it from raſhneſs and preſumption, inclining it's aſſent to proper evidence, ſubjecting it to the juſt authority of reaſon, and ſetting it free from the unjuſt tyranny of deluſive prejudices; in fixing the volatility of the imagination, ſharpening the dull and heavy genius, pruning the luxuriant, bridling the impetuous, and ſpurring the ſlow and indolent.

[P] He determined to quit entirely the ſtudy of the Mathematics for that of Divinity.] What contributed not a little to detach him from the farther purſuit of mathematical knowledge; was, the little notice that had been taken of his Geometrical Lectures; which had now been ſome time publiſhed, and yet Mr Hill tells us (24), he had heard of very few that had read and conſidered them thoroughly, beſides M. Sluſius of Liege, and Mr Gregory of Scotland, two that might, indeed, be reckoned inſtead of many; but the little reliſh that ſuch things met with helped to looſen him from theſe ſpeculations, and the more engage his inclination to the ſtudy of Morality and Divinity, which had always been ſo predominant, that, when he commented on Archimedes, he could not forbear in diſcourſe to prefer and admire much more Suárez for his book of Legibus.

[Q] He was collated by Biſhop Ward to a Prebend in the cathedral church of Salifbury.] That Prelate, Dr Pope tells us (25), had invited Dr Barrow to live with him, not as a Chaplain, but rather as a friend and companion, tho' he frequently officiated in the abſence of the domeſtic Chaplain. About this time, the archdeacony of North Wiltſhire becoming void, the Biſhop made an offer of it to Dr Barrow, who modeſtly and abſolutely reſuſed it, for a reaſon, which Dr Pope thinks it not neceſſary to declare. Soon after, a Prebendary of Salifbury being dead, and the Biſhop offering Dr Barrow the Prebend, he gratefully accepted it, and was inſtalled accordingly. 'I remember about that time, ſays Dr Pope, I heard him once ſay, I wiſh I had five hundred pounds. I replied, That's a great ſum for a Philoſopher to deſire; what would you do with ſo much? I would, ſaid he, give it my ſiſter for a portion, that would procure her a good huſband. Which ſum, in few months after, he received, for putting a life into the corps of his new Prebend; after which he reſigned it to Mr Corker of Trinity College in Cambridge.' Dr Pope relates a circumſtance during Dr Barrow's reſidence in the Biſhop's family, which, however trifling it may be thought, I ſhall here ſet down in that writer's own words: 'We were once going from Salifbury to London, he in the coach with the Biſhop, and I on horſeback; as he was entering the coach, I perceived his pockets ſtrutting out near half a foot, and ſaid to him, What have you got in your pockets? He replied, Sermons; Sermons, ſaid I, give them me, my boy ſhall carry them in his portmanteau, and eaſe you of that luggage. But, ſaid he, ſuppoſe your boy ſhould be robbed. That's pleaſant, ſaid I; do you think there are Parsons padding upon the road for ſermons? Why, what have you, ſaid he; it may be five or ſix guineas; I hold my ſermons at a greater rate; they coſt me much pain and time. Well then, ſaid I, if you'll inſure my five or ſix guineas againſt Lay-Padders, I'll ſecure your bundle of ſermons againſt Eccleſiaſtical-Highway-men. This was agreed; he emptied his pockets, and filled my portmanteau with Divinity, and we had the good fortune to come ſafe to our journey's end, without meeting either ſort of the Padders before-mentioned, and to bring both our treaſures to London (26).'

(25) Ib. p. 144.

[R] He was appointed by the King Maſter of Trinity-College.] The Doctör being at that time one of the King's Chaplains, his Maſtey had often done him the honour to converſe with him, and in his facetious way uſed to call him an unfair Preacher, becauſe he exhausted every ſubject, and left no room for others to come after him (27). He gave the highest satisfaction to that society, whose interest he constantly and carefully consulted (x) [T]. In 1675, he was chosen Vice-Chancellor of the university (y). This great and learned Divine died of a fever [U], the 4th of May 1677, and was buried in Westminster-Abbey, where a monument was erected to him by the contribution of his friends. His epitaph [W] was written by his dear friend Dr Mapletoft (z). He left his manuscripts to Dr Tillotson and Mr Abraham Hill, with permission to publish of them what they should think fit (a).

obtained by faction or flattery; it was the King's own act, tho' Dr Barrow's merit made those of the greatest power forward to contribute towards it, particularly, Gilbert Lord Archbishop of Canterbury, and the Duke of Buckingham, then Chancellor of Cambridge, and formerly a member of Trinity-College (28).

[S] His patent. His patent, according to Mr Hill (29), being drawn up, as it had been for some others, with permission to marry, he was at the charge of getting it altered, as thinking it not agreeable to the statutes, from which he desired no dispensation. Dr Pope pretends, he procured a new patent. 'Nay, says that Life-writer (30), he chose rather to be at the expence of double fees, and procure a new patent, without the marrying clause, than perpetually to stand upon his guard against the sieges, batteries, and importunities, which he foresaw that honourable and profitable perferment would expose him to;

in this wisely imitating the beaver; who knows for what he is hunted. Thus making matrimony a forfeiture of his preferment, it was as effectual a way to secure him from all dangers of that kind as castration itself could have been; for women, in this age, like hens, desire only to lay where they see nest-eggs.' But it is not true, that Dr Barrow procured a new patent, the original instrument, in the hands of the Earl of Oxford, having a blank occasioned by the erasurement (31).

[T] He constantly and carefully consulted the interest of that society. Particularly, he excused them from some expences, and allowances, which they had made to his predecessors (32); among other instances, he remitted to them the charge of keeping a coach for him, as had been done for other masters (33). Upon the single affair of building their library, which was begun under his mastership, he wrote out quires of paper in letters, chiefly to those who had been of the college, first to engage their benefactions, and then to give them thanks, which he never omitted. He kept no copies of these letters; but by the generous returns they brought in, they appeared to be of no small value (34).

[U] He died of a fever. It pleased God, Mr Hill tells us (35), that being invited to preach the Passion-Sermon, April 13, 1677, at Guild-Hall, (which, by the way, was the second sermon, for which he received any pecuniary recompence) he never preached but once more, presently after falling sick of a fever. The like distemper he had once or twice before, tho' otherwise of a constant health; but this fatally prevailed against the skill and diligence of many Physicians his good friends. Dr Pope is more particular in relating the circumstances of Dr Barrow's death. 'The last time he was in London, says that writer (36), whether he came, as it is customary, to the election of Westminster, he went to Knightsbridge to give the Bishop of Salisbury a visit, and then made me engage my word to come to him at Trinity-College immediately after the Michaelmas ensuing. I cannot express the rapture of the joy I was in, having, as I thought, so near a prospect of his charming and instructive conversation; I fancied it would be a heaven upon earth, for he was immensely rich in learning, and very liberal and communicative of it, delighting in nothing more than to impart to others, if they desired it, whatever he had attained by much time and study; but of a sudden all my hopes vanished, and were melted like snow before the sun. Some few days after he came again to Knightsbridge, and sat down to dinner, but I observed he did not eat.

Whercupon I asked him how it was with him; he answered, that he had a slight indisposition hanging upon him, with which he had struggled two or three days, and that he hoped by fasting and opium to get it off, as he had removed another and more dangerous sickness, at Constantinople, some years before. But these remedies availed him not; his malady proved, in the event, an inward, malignant, and insuperable fever, of which he died May 24, Anno Dom. 1677, in the 47th year of his age, in mean lodgings, at a Sadler's near Charing-Cross; an old, low, ill-built house, which he had used for several years; for tho' his condition was much bettered by his obtaining the mastership of Trinity-college, yet that had no bad influence upon his morals; he still continued the same humble person, and could not be prevailed upon to take more reputable lodgings.' The same writer informs us (37), that my Lord Keeper sent a message of condolance to Dr Barrow's father, who had then some place under him, importing that he had but too great reason to grieve for the loss of so good a son, but that he should mitigate his sorrow upon that very consideration.

ISAAC BARROW, Doctor in Divinity, and Chaplain in Ordinary to King Charles II. A godlike, and truly great man, if piety, probity, fidelity, the most extensive learning, and no less modesty, together with most holy and sweet manners, can confer that title. He was Professor of Geometry in Gresham-college, London; and of the Greek tongue and Mathematics, at Cambridge: An ornament to all his chairs, to the Church, and to the nation. He added lustre to Trinity-college, as Master, and improved it by laying the foundation of a truly Royal Library. Riches, honours, and whatever else men eagerly pursue, he did not despise, but neglect, being born to greater and nobler views. God, whom he had served from his youth, he imitated in wanting but few things, and doing good to all, even posterity, to whom, tho' dead, he yet preacheth. The rest, and even greater things than these, may be found in his writings. Go, reader, and imitate him. He died the 4th of May 1677, in the 47th year of his age. His friends erected this monument to his memory.

We shall give a catalogue, with some account, of Dr Barrow's Works in the remark [X].
He

[X] A catalogue, with some account, of Dr Barrow's works. The following were published in his life-time: I. Euclid's Elementa; i. e. 'Euclid's Elements.' Printed at Cambridge in 1655, and oftner, 8vo. This is an edition of all the books and propositions of Euclid, demonstrated in a more compendious manner than had been done before. It was afterwards translated into English, and published at London, 1660, &c. 8vo. II. Euclid's Data; i. e. 'Euclid's Data.' Cambridge 1657, 8vo. This was subjoined to the Elements in some following editions. III. Lectiones Opticæ XVIII, Cantabrigiæ in Scholis publicis habitæ, in quibus Opticorum Phænomenon genuinæ rationes investigantur et exponuntur; i. e. 'Optical Lectures, read in the publick Schools at Cambridge, in which the true reasons of the Optical Phænomena are investigated and explained.' London, 1669, 4to. It is dedicated to Robert Raworth and Thomas Buck, Esquires; the executors of Mr Lucas, founder of the Mathematical Professorship. In the preface, he acquaints us, that Mr Isaac Newton revised the copy, pointed out several things which wanted correction, and made some additions of his own. An account of this book is published in the Philosophical Transactions, No. LXXXV. pag. 2258 for September, 1671. These Lectures being sent to the learned Mr James Gregory, Professor of the Mathematics at St Andrews in Scotland, and perused by him, he gave the following character of the author in a letter to Mr John Collins (38): 'Mr Barrow in his Opticks sheweth himself a most subtil Geometer, so that I think him superior to any that ever I looked upon. I long exceedingly to see his Geometrical Lectures, especially because I have some notions upon that same subject by mee. I entreat you to send them to me presently, as they come from the press, for I esteem the author more than yee can easilie imagine.' Being informed by letter, that an account of these Lectures, together with those on Geometry, was designed to be printed in the Philosophical Transactions, he shews by his answer (39), how cautious he was, that nothing might be said to recommend them to the Reader. 'Concerning the character (says he) which you speake of, of my bookes, I shall esteem myself obliged to you, if you will effect, that there be nothing said of them in the Philosophical Reports, beyond a short and simple account of their subject. I pray, let there be nothing of commendation, or difcommendation of them; but let them take their fortune or fate, pro captu lectoris. Any thing more will cause me displeasure, and will not do them, or me, any good.' IV. Lectiones Geometricæ XIII, in quibus præsertim generalia linearum curvarum symptomata declarantur; i. e. 'Thirteen Geometrical Lectures, treating more especially of the Properties of Curve Lines.' London, 1670, 4to. An account of this book is published in the abovementioned Transaction, pag. 2260; with An Addition of some Corollaries communicated by the author, belonging to the second Problem of his third Appendix to the twelfth Lecture. These Lectures were first printed separately from the former upon Optics; but afterwards, in the years 1672 and 1674, they were published together with them, but without the Corollaries now mentioned, whence it is probable they were not re-printed, but only a new Title-page prefixed to them. V. Archimedis Opera, Apollonii Conicorum libri IV, Theodosii Spherica, methodo nova illustrata, et succinctè demonstrata; i. e. 'The Works of Archimedes, the four Books of Apollonius's Conic Sections, and Theodosius's Spherics, explained in a new method, and briefly demonstrated.' London, 1675, 4to. As to the Lemmata of Archimedes published in this volume, we are told in the Preface, that they now appear in Latin, from two translations; the one by the learned John Gravius, published, with some Animadversions, by Mr Samuel Foster, Professor of Astronomy at Gresham-college, in 1659; the other by Abraham Ecchellenfis, published at Florence with Notes by that excellent Mathematician, Alphonfus Borellus. An account of this work may be seen in the Philosophical Transactions, No. CXIV. pag. 314. May 1675. And the copy of all the books of Archimedes, published in it, except the second book De Equiponderantibus, the two books, De insidentibus humido, the Lemmata, and the book De Arenæ Numero, written in

Dr Barrow's own hand, in one octavo volume, and the four books of Apollonius in another volume in quarto, are reposit in the library of the Royal Society (40). (40) In the Catalogi librorum Manuscriptorum Angliæ, &c. printed at Oxford, these two manuscripts are thus imperfectly described: Isaacus Barroce in Apollonii Conicis. 2 Vols. Tom. II. p. 84. Before his Apollonius Dr Barrow wrote the following divine ejaculation. 'O Θεός γεωμετρίας. Tu autem, Domine, quantus es Geometra? Quum enim hæc scientia nullos terminos habeat; cum in sempiternum novorum theorematum inventioni locus relinquatur, etiam penes humanum ingenium; tu uno hæc omnia intuitu perfecta habes, absque catena consequentiarum, absque tædio demonstrationum. Ad cætera penè nihil facere potest intellectus noster; et tanquam Brutorum phantasia videtur non nisi incerta quadam somnari; unde in iis quot sunt homines, tot existunt fere sententiæ. In his conspiratur ab omnibus, in his humanum ingenium se posse aliquid, imo ingens aliquid et mirificum visum esse, ut nihil magis mirum; quod enim in cæteris penè ineptum, in hoc efficax, sedulum, prosperum, &c. Te igitur vel ex hac re amare gaudeo, te suspicor, atque illum diem desidero suspiriis fortibus, in quo purgata mente et claro oculo non hæc solum omnia absque hac successiva et laboriosa imaginandi cura, verum multo plura et majora ex tua bonitate et immensissima sanctissimaque benignitate conspiceret et scire concedetur, &c.' i. e. God acts the Geometrician. But how great a Geometrician art thou, O Lord! For whereas this science has no bounds, and there is room even for human wit to discover infinite new theorems, thou perceivest all these truths at one view, without a chain of consequences, and without the tiresome length of demonstrations. In other points our understanding is almost entirely at a stand, and, like the imagination of brutes, seems only to dream of some uncertain objects; whence in such matters there are almost as many opinions as there are men. But in these there is an universal agreement; in these the human mind seems capable of something great and wonderful; for notwithstanding its inability in other respects, here it exerts itself with diligence and success, &c. Thee, therefore, even upon this account, I rejoice to love; to thee I look up, and with ardent wishes expect that day, when thy immense goodness shall enable me to perceive and understand, not only all these things, but even more truths, and of much greater importance, with a mind purged from error and prejudice, and without this successive and laborious effort of the imagination.

These, which follow, were published after Dr Barrow's decease: I. Lectio, in qua Theoremata Archimedis de Sphæra et Cyliandro, per methodum indivisibilium investigata, ac breviter demonstrata, exhibentur; i. e. 'A Lecture, in which Archimedes's Theorems of the Sphere and Cylinder are investigated and briefly demonstrated by the method of Indivisibles.' London 1678, 12mo. This was written in English, but soon after the author's death being turned into Latin, was subjoined to the editions of Euclid's Elementa and Data. II. Mathematicæ Lectiones, habitæ in Scholis publicis Academicæ Cantabrigiensi, Ann. Dom. 1664, 5, 6, &c. i. e. 'Mathematical Lectures, read in the public Schools of the University of Cambridge, in the years 1664, 1665, 1666, &c.' London 1683, 8vo. These were some of his Lucasian Lectures; to which the editor, Mr Wells, has prefixed the author's Oratio Præfatoria (41), made at the opening of them. III. The Works of the learned ISAAC BARROW, D. D. late Master of Trinity-College in Cambridge (Being all his English Works) in THREE VOLUMES. Published by his Grace DR JOHN TILLOTSON, late Archbishop of Canterbury. The first edition of these Works was in 1685, when Dr Tillotson was Dean of Canterbury; to whom Mr Abraham Hill addresses his Account of the Life of Dr Isaac Barrow, prefixed to the first volume. There have been several editions, the last in 1741. It is dedicated to the Earl of Nottingham, then Lord Chancellor, by the author's father Mr Thomas Barrow. The first volume contains, Thirty-two Sermons preached upon several occasions; A Brief Exposition of the Creed, the Lord's Prayer, and the Decalogue; to which is added, The Doctrine of the Sacraments; and A Treatise of the Pope's Supremacy, to which is added, A Discourse concerning the Unity of Church. The excellency of Dr Barrow's Sermons is so thoroughly understood at this time of day, as to stand in need of no Elogium. M. Le Clerc says of them;

He was not only remarkable for the excellence, but for the extraordinary length likewise; of

Les Sermons de cet auteur sont plutôt des traitez, ou des dissertations exactes, que des simples harangues pour plaire à la multitude (42). i. e. 'This author's sermons are rather treatises, or complete dissertations, than meer harangues to please the multitude.' The editor, Dr Tillotson, gives us the following account of the subject-matter, and some other particulars relating to these sermons (43). The design of the five first is, to recommend religion to our esteem and practice, from the consideration of the manifold excellencies and advantages of it. The four next treat of the two great duties of religion, and parts of divine worship, prayer and thanksgiving; and contain likewise a very powerful persuasive to the practice of them. The three following were preached upon three solemn occasions; the first of them upon the 29th May, 1676, the anniversary of his majesty's happy Restoration; the second upon the 5th of November 1675, in commemoration of our deliverance from the Powder-Treason; both in the year of his Vice-Chancellorship; the third, at the consecration of the Bishop of Man (afterwards Lord Bishop of St Asaph) his uncle; in which he pleads for the due respect and revenue of the Clergy; with so much modesty, and yet with so great force of reason and eloquence, that the whole profession may justly think themselves for ever indebted to him. Some of these twelve sermons were the very first that he made; by which we may judge with what preparation and furniture he entered upon this sacred employment. The first of them was preached at St Mary's in Cambridge, June 30, 1661, and was (the editor thinks) the first that he ever preached. Those two excellent sermons of thanksgiving were, it is said, the next. The fourth in order was the first that he preached before the King. In placing of them as they now stand, the editor had very little regard to the order of time, but rather to some small reason taken from the subject-matter of them. The next ten sermons were placed together, because of their affinity to one another, all of them relating to the same argument, and tending to reform the several vices of the tongue. The two last of them indeed, against pragmaticalness, and meddling in the affairs of others, do not so properly belong to this subject; but considering that this vice is chiefly managed by the tongue, and is almost ever attended with some irregularity and indiscretion of speech, they are not altogether so foreign and unsuitable to it. The eight following sermons are likewise sorted together, because they explain and enforce the two great commandments of the law, the love of God, and of our neighbour. The two next were published by himself, and only these two. The first of them, concerning the duty and reward of bounty to the poor, was preached at the Spital, and published at the desire of the Lord-Mayor and Court of Aldermen: 'This (says the editor) was received with universal approbation; and perhaps there is nothing extant in Divinity more perfect in it's kind; it seems to have exhausted the whole argument, and to have left no consideration belonging to it untouched.' The other, on the Passion of our blessed Saviour, 'was the last he preached but one, and, I think, the occasion of his death, by a cold he then got, which, in all probability, was the cause of the fever of which he died, to our unspeakable loss.' This he sent to the press himself, but did not live to see it printed off. The Exposition on the Creed, &c. Mr Ward tells us (44), was a talk enjoined him by the College, being obliged by the statutes to compose some Theological discourses; and these, he says (45), so took up his thoughts, that he could not easily apply them to any other matter. The excellent and elaborate Treatise of the Pope's Supremacy was written after his promotion to the headship of Trinity-college. 'He understood Popery (says the writer of his life) both at home and abroad; he had narrowly observed it, militant in England, triumphant in Italy, disguised in France; and had earlier apprehensions than most others of the approaching danger, and would have appeared with the forwardest at a needful time' (46). The learned author, upon his death-bed, gave Dr Tillotson a particular permission to publish it, with this modest character of the performance, that he hoped it was indifferent perfect, tho' not altogether as he intended it, if God had granted him longer life. He designed indeed to have transcribed it again, and to have filled up those many spaces, which were purposely left in it, for the farther confirmation and illustration of several things by more testimonies and instances, which probably he had in his thoughts. However, as it is, (to use the editor's words) it is not only a just, but an admirable discourse upon this subject; which many others have handled before, but he hath exhausted it; inasmuch that no argument of moment, nay, hardly any consideration properly belonging to it, hath escaped his large and comprehensive mind. He hath said enough to silence the controversy for ever, and to deter all wise men, of both sides, from meddling any farther with it. 'And I dare say (adds Dr Tillotson, with some warmth) whoever shall carefully peruse this Treatise, will find, that this point of the Pope's Supremacy (upon which Bellarmine hath the confidence to say, the whole of Christianity depends) is not only an indefensible, but an impudent cause, as ever was undertaken by learned pens. And nothing could have kept it so long from becoming ridiculous in the judgment of all mankind, but it being so strongly supported by a worldly interest. For there is not one tolerable argument for it, and there are a thousand invincible reasons against it. There is neither from scripture, nor reason, nor antiquity, any evidence for it; the past, and the present state of Christendom, the history and records of all ages, are a perpetual demonstration against it; and there is no other ground in the whole world for it, but that now of a long time it hath been by the Pope's Janizaries boldly asserted, and stiffly contended for without reason. So that any one might with as much colour and evidence of truth maintain, that the Grand Seigneur is of right, and for many ages hath been acknowledged, sovereign of the whole world, as that the Bishop of Rome is of right, and in all ages from the beginning of Christianity hath been owned to be the Universal Monarch and Head of the Christian Church (47). The second volume of Dr Barrow's English Works consists of Sermons and Expositions upon all the Articles of the Apostles Creed. They are dedicated by his father to the King, and are in number thirty-four. The third and last volume, containing Forty-five Sermons upon several Occasions, is dedicated by his father to the Princess Anne of Denmark, and has the following Imprimatur: C. Alston, R. P. D. Hen. Episc. Lond. à Sacris, Feb. 11, 1685-6. IV. Ijaaci Barrow, S. S. T. Professoris Opuscula, viz. Determinationes, Conciones ad Clerum, Orationes, Poemata, &c. Volumen quartum; i. e. 'The fourth volume of Dr Barrow's Works, consisting of Determinations in the Divinity-Schools, Sermons ad Clerum, Speeches, Latin Poems, &c.' London 1687, folio. This is called Volumen quartum, because it was printed after the three English volumes in folio. It is dedicated by his father to Dr Montague the Master, and the Senior Fellows of Trinity-college in Cambridge. The Dissertatiuncula de Sestertio, page 356, was reprinted the same year in the Philosophical Transactions, No. CXC. p. 383. V. There are two letters written by Dr Barrow to Mr Willoughby, and printed in the Philosophical Letters between Mr Ray and his Correspondents, p. 360, 362, upon the following subjects. The former, dated March 26, 1662, contains the Method, whereby Mons. Roberval was said to have demonstrated the Equality of a Spiral Line with a Parabola. And in this letter he signifies his intention of reading lectures upon Archimedes De Equiponderantibus; but whether he afterwards put that design in execution is uncertain. In the latter, dated October 5, 1665, he approves Mr Willoughby's Discourse, insuring the Solidity of the Sphere from the Surface, by comparing the concentrical Surfaces of the Sphere with the parallel Arches of the Cone, and acquaints him with his own method of doing it. Here follows a short account of several curious papers of Dr Barrow, written in his own hand, and communicated by William Jones, Esq; to the author of the Lives of the Professors of Gresham College (48). [Y] The extraordinary length of his sermons.] Dr Pope gives us (49) the following instances hereof. He was once requested by the Bishop of Rochester, Dean of Westminster, to preach at the Abbey, and withal desired not to be long; for that auditory loved short sermons, and were used to them. He replied, My Lord, I will shew you my sermon; and pulling it out of his pocket, put it into the Bishop's hands. The text was the 10th chapter of the Proverbs, the latter end of the 18th verse; the words these; He that uttereth a slander is a liar. The sermon was accordingly divided into two parts; one treated of slander, the other of lyes. The Dean desired him to content himself with preaching only the first part, to which he consented, not without some reluctancy; and in speaking that only, it took up an hour and a half. An other time, upon the same person's invitation, he preached at the Abbey on an holiday. Here I must inform the reader, that it is a custom for the servants of the church, upon all holidays, Sundays excepted, betwixt the sermon and evening prayers, to shew the tombs and effigies of the Kings and Queens in wax, to the meaner sort of people, who then flock thither from all quarters of the town, and pay their two-pence to see the Play of the Dead Folks, as I have heard a Devonshire clown not improperly call it. These perceiving Dr Barrow in the pulpit, after the hour was past, and fearing to lose that time in bearing, which they thought they could more profitably employ in receiving; these, I say, became impatient, and caused the organ to be struck up against him, and would not give over playing till they had blowed him down. But the sermon of the greatest length was that concerning charity, before the Lord Mayor and Alderman at the Spital; in speaking which he spent three hours and an half. Being asked, after he came down from the pulpit, whether he was not tired; yes indeed, said he, I began to be weary with standing so long.

[Z] He was negligent of his dress to a fault.]

This could not but expose him to some inconveniences, and was apt to prejudice his hearers against him, where he was not known; of which Dr Pope gives us (50) the following very remarkable instance. Dr Wilkins, then Minister of St Laurence-Jewry, being forced by some indisposition to keep his chamber, desired Dr Barrow to give him a sermon the next Sunday, which he readily consented to do. Accordingly, at the time appointed, he came, with an aspect pale and meagre, and unpromising, slovenly and carelessly dressed, his collar unbuttoned, his hair uncombed, &c. Thus accoutred, he mounts the pulpit, begins his prayer, which whether he did read or not, I cannot positively assert or deny. Immediately all the congregation was in an uproar, as if the church were falling, and they scampering to save their lives, each shifting for himself with great precipitation; there was such a noise of pattens of serving-maids and ordinary women, and of unlocking of pews, and cracking of seats, caused by the younger sort hastily climbing over them, that, I confess, I thought all the congregation were mad; but the good Doctor, seeming not to take notice of this disturbance, proceeds, names his text, and preached his sermon, to two or three gathered, or rather left together, of which number, as it fortunately happened, Mr Baxter, that eminent Nonconformist, was one; who, afterwards gave Dr Wilkins a visit, and commended the sermon to that degree, that he said, he never heard a better discourse. There was also amongst those who stayed out the sermon, a certain young man, who thus accosted Dr Barrow as he came down from the pulpit, Sir, be not dismayed, for I assure you, it was a good sermon. By his age and dress, he seemed to be an apprentice, or at the best a fore-man of a shop, but we never heard more of him. I asked the Doctor, what he thought, when he saw the congregation running away from him? I thought, said he, they did not like me, or my sermon, and I have no reason to be angry with them for that. But what was your opinion, said I, of the apprentice? I take him, replied he, to be a very civil person, and if I could meet with him, I'd present him with a bottle of wine. There were then in the parish a company of formal, grave, and wealthy citizens, who having been many years under famous Ministers, as Dr Wilkins, Bishop Ward, Bishop Reynolds, Mr Vines, &c. had a great opinion of their skill in Divinity, and their ability to judge of the goodness and badness of sermons. Many of these came in a body to Dr Wilkins, to expostulate with him, why he suffered such an ignorant, scandalous fellow, meaning Dr Barrow, to have the use of his pulpit. I cannot precisely tell, whether it was the same day, or some time after in that week, but I am certain it happened to be when Mr Baxter was with Dr Wilkins. They came, as I said before, in full cry, saying, they wondered he should permit such a man to preach before them, who looked like a starved Cavalier, who had been long sequestered, and out of his living for delinquency, and came up to London to beg, now the King was restored; and much more to this purpose. He let them run their selves out of breath; when they had done speaking, and expected an humble, submissive answer, he replied to them in this manner. The person you thus despise, I assure you, is a pious man, an eminent scholar, and an excellent preacher; for the truth of the last, I appeal to Mr Baxter here present, who heard the sermon you so vilify. I am sure you believe Mr Baxter is a competent judge, and will pronounce according to truth. Then turning to him, Pray, Sir, said he, do me the favour to declare your opinion concerning the skin, and very sensible of cold; his eyes grey, clear, and somewhat short-sighted; his hair a light brown, very fine, and curling (f). He was of a healthy constitution, very fond of tobacco, which he used to call his Panpharmacum or Universal Medicine, and imagined it helped to compose and regulate his thoughts (g). If he was guilty of any intemperance, it seemed to be in the love of fruit, being of opinion that if it kills hundreds in autumn, it preserves thousands (b). He slept little, generally rising in the winter months before day (i). His conduct and behaviour were the most amiable imaginable: for he was always ready to assist others, open and communicative in his conversation, in which he generally spoke to the importance, as well as truth, of any question proposed; facetious in his talk upon fit occasions, and skilful to accommodate his discourse to different capacities; of indefatigable industry in various studies, clear judgment on all arguments, and steady virtue under all difficulties; of a calm temper in factious times, and of large charity in mean estate; he was easy and contented with a scanty fortune, and with the same decency and moderation maintained his character under the temptations of prosperity (k). In short, he was the greatest scholar of his times; and, as an ingenious writer expresses it, 'he may be esteemed as having shewn a compass of invention equal, if not superior, to any of the moderns, Sir Isaac Newton only excepted (l).'

(l) Preface to Dr Pemberton's View of Sir I. Newton's Philosophy.

'the sermon now in controversy, which you heard at our church the last Sunday. Then did Mr Baxter very candidly give the sermon the praise it deserved; nay more, he said that Dr Barrow preached so well, that he could willingly have been his auditor all day long. When they heard Mr Baxter give him this high encomium, they were pricked in their hearts, and all of them became ashamed, confounded, and speechless; for tho' they had a good opinion of themselves, yet they durst not pretend to be equal to Mr Baxter; but at length, after some pause, they all, one after another, confessed, they did not bear one word of the sermon, but were carried to dislike it, by his unpromising garb, and mien, the reading of his prayer, and the going away of the congregation; for they would not by any means have it thought, if they had heard the sermon, they should not have concurred with the judgment of Mr Baxter. After their shame was a little over, they earnestly desired Dr Wilkins to procure Mr Barrow to preach again, engaging themselves to make him amends, by bringing to his sermon their wives and children, their manservants, and maid-servants, in a word, their whole families, and to enjoyn them not to leave the church till the blessing was pronounced. Dr Wilkins promised to use his utmost endeavour for their satisfaction, and accordingly solicited Dr Barrow to appear once more upon that stage, but all in vain; for he would not by any persuasions be prevailed upon to comply with the request of such conceited, hypocritical Coxcombs.'

B A R R Y (G I R A L D) better known by the name of G I R A L D U S C A M B R E N S I S, i. e. Girald of Wales, and by some called Silvester Giraldus Cambrensis, (which addition of Silvester is certainly (a) erroneous) is one of those writers, whose style is so puerile and affected, so diffuse and full of quibbles, and gingling conceits, (especially in his treatises relating to Ireland, which were writ in his younger years) that it can by no means please men of sober taste. He was born (b) near Pembroke in South Wales, in the castle of Mainarpir, about the year 1146, and was descended of a noble family, with which circumstance he takes care that the world should not be unacquainted [A], since he often repeats it in his Works. While he was a boy, the omens of his future learning and reputation were so extraordinary, that he could not pass them over in silence, and yet in themselves so trifling, that it is irksome to repeat them [B]. He was not very lucky in his early education; for keeping company with his brothers, he followed them in their play, grew a truant, and neglected his books, and had like to have

[A] Descended of a noble family, with which circumstance he takes care, that the world should not be unacquainted.] 'Patre (inquit) natus Willielmo de Barri, viro egregio, matre Angareth filiâ Nestæ, nobiliis filiæ Rhafi, Principis Sudwalliæ, scilicet, filii Theodori (1). — My father (says he) was William de Barry, a man of extraordinary fame, my mother, Angareth, the daughter of Nestæ, who was the noble daughter of Rbees, Prince of South-Wales, the son of Tudor.' This, in fact, was his genealogy; but it would have come with more decency out of the mouth of a Herald than his own.

[B] Omens irksome to repeat.] 'Ex fratribus quatuor germanis et uterinis minor, tribus aliis nunc castra, nunc oppida, nunc palatia puerilibus, ut solet hæc ætas, præludiis in fabulo vel pulvere protrahentibus ac construendis modulo suo, solus hic (i. e. Giraldus) simili præludio semper ecclesias et monasteria erigere satagebat. Pater hæc considerans, ductus prognostico quodam ipsum literis et liberalibus disciplinis applicandum præfata mente decrevit, eumque suum episcopum vocare consuevit. — Being the youngest of four brothers by the same mother, while the other three employed themselves, as children will do, in raising castles, towns and palaces in dirt, Girald alone, tho' he busied himself in the like work, yet his employment was to erect churches and monasteries. His father taking this matter into his consideration, and prognosticating what his child would come to, ominously determined to educate him to learning, and the liberal arts, and used frequently to call him his little Bishop.' — And then he proceeds to tell us, that in some hostile invasion, when all people were running to their arms, that he desired to be carried to the church, declaring by a wonderful forethought in a child, that the immunity of the house dedicated to God ought to be secured; from whence people made a judgment, that in time to come he would prove a champion and protector of the liberties and immunities of the Church. — It is certainly the most difficult task in the world, for a man to write the history of his own actions, nor should any body attempt it but a man of mortified passions, which was by no means Girald's case. Self-love, on the one hand, will not suffer him to vend any thing to the disadvantage of himself; on the other hand, if he speaks in his own praise, every mortal will cry out on his vanity: This last particular has been the fate of the author now under consideration; every page of his book, intitled de Rebus a se gestis, is stuffed with this kind of vanity, and so full is he of himself, his learning, his importance, and his conduct in great affairs, that it is impossible to turn him over without being surfeited: and the same self-sufficiency runs through all his other writings, so that he often stops short, and rambles from his subject, in order to dwell upon his dear self; and thus much enough to observe in this place once for all.

have disappointed those omens, which were conceived of him. But his uncle, the Bishop of St David's, took him to task, and his masters wrought a reformation in him, which was effected more out of a principle of shame than fear: From which time he altered his course, and applied himself to his books with such diligence, that he soon got the start of all his school-fellows. He was three times sent to France for the sake of improvement, and at first continuing there three years, he obtained a great reputation in Rhetorick [C], which upon his return in 1172, soon brought him into notice, and he was promoted unto several ecclesiastical livings in Wales and England, in the last of which places he was Canon of Hereford (c). His busy temper, especially in what related to Church affairs, soon made him notorious, and, as he designed it, proved no small motive to his advancement, in an age, when the temporal interest and splendor of the Church, were more considered than the piety and virtue of it's members. He gives two instances (d) of his vigilance in this particular, one of which, it must be confessed, does not redound much to his honour [D]. Being invested with the archdeaconsry of Brechin, in the manner mentioned in the remarks, he behaved himself with great activity in his archidiaconal visitations, and reformed many abuses. In 1176, he was elected, by (e) the Chapter of St David's, Bishop of that See, not then exceeding thirty years of age; but he declined the election, fearing to be foiled, as also, because the King had not been previously consulted, nor issued his licence to go to election, as the law required. King Henry II, was a Prince exceeding jealous of his prerogative, and tho' the Archdeacon's seeming modesty might have excused this over hasty step in the Chapter, yet the King did not like to see even the appearance of his growing interest, which would be a means of fortifying the power and grandeur of his relations in Wales, in his Majesty's opinion too considerable already; and so he expressed himself, in a consultation held with the Archbishop of Canterbury upon the occasion [E], which was followed by the election and consecration of another Bishop. Notwithstanding this shew of modesty in declining the election, yet he could not well digest the disappointment, and the more so, as it afforded him a proof of the King's inclinations, and a demonstration, that those qualities, which would have advanced another man, served only to depress him. Being informed of what passed at the consultation, he at once determined to quit his country for a time; and accordingly the same year he passed a second time (f) into France, in order to pursue his studies at Paris, that is, to add to his knowledge in the Arts and Sciences, the study of the Civil and Canon Laws, with the more important one of Divinity. With his usual vanity he boasts (g), what a prodigious fame he acquired here, especially in the knowledge of the Decretals [F]. In 1179, he was elected Professor of the Canon Law in the university of Paris; but rejected the honour, out of an expectation of more solid advantages in his own country. In 1180, he returned (b) home through Flanders and England, and in his way stopped at Canterbury, where he emphatically describes (i) (what may be well allowed him) the great luxury of the Monks of that place. At length he got home, where he found the whole country in a flame, the Canons and Archdeacons of Menevia having joined with the inhabitants, in driving out the Bishop of that See [G], the administration of [C] Obtained a great reputation in Rhetorick] Probably it was during this first journey that he was made Rector of the publick schools in Paris, which (as he (2) says) he governed for some time.

[D] Two instances of his vigilance, one of which does not redound to his honour.] He tells us (3), that observing through the diocese of St David's that by the negligence of the Prelates, neither tithes of wool nor cheefes were payed, he informed Robert, Archbishop of Canterbury, then the Pope's Legate, of this loss to the Church, and by that means in 1175, obtained a Vice-Legantine authority from the Archbishop through all Wales, to visit and see these and other excesses amended; and by a strict discipline he effected a thorough reformation. This would have been tolerable, and might have been imputed to zeal for the service of the Church; but the other instance carries in it the appearance of covetousness, and a sordid baseness: The story is best heard from his own mouth (4). Being informed that an aged Archdeacon of Brechin, in the diocese of St David's kept a concubine, (a crime not very uncommon among the Ecclesiasticks of England in that age, as will appear in the sequel of Girald's life) he suspended him and seized his archdeaconsry, which he put into the hands of the Archbishop of Canterbury, and the Archbishop made Girald a complement of the fruits of his information, and advanced him to the Archdeaconsry in the room of the degraded old man. Virtue or honour would have persuaded him to have refused the promotion; and by that means he would have convinced the world, that conscience, and the good of the Church, were the motives to this action, and not covetousness, or the desire of stepping over the head of his brother. His refusal would have been the result of an honourable principle, as his acceptance implied, that he was actuated by something opposite: And as this was the case of an aged man (who do not often keep concubines, as younger Clerks might have done) it gives a strong presumption, that he had cast his eye upon the warm Archdeaconsry, and made his appetite to that, the motive of his information.

[E] And so the King expressed himself, in a consultation held with the Archbishop of Canterbury upon the occasion.] When the King had information given him of the election of Girald, he was much moved, and sent (5) for the Archbishop of Canterbury and his suffragans, to consult what should be done in the election of a Bishop of St David's. They were of opinion, that Girald ought to be consecrated, both on account of his birth and learning, and as he was a man of courage, parts, and activity. But the King told them, that for the reasons they had given, he by no means thought Girald a fit person to fill that station; because his advancement would strengthen the power and interest of Rhees, Prince of South-Wales, to whom the Archdeacon was a near relation, as he was to most of the grandees of that country.

[F] Acquired great fame in the knowledge of the Decretals.] The Decretals are that part of the Canon Law that consists of the Papal Constitutions, called Litteræ Decretales, or Rescripts of Popes, by which some difficulties in the Ecclesiastical laws are cleared up.

[G] In driving out the Bishop of Menevia] Menevia is an antient episcopal See, seated on the west side of Pembroke-shire in Wales, subject to the jurisdiction of the Archbishop of Canterbury, and known better of which was committed (k) to our author, by the Archbishop of Canterbury. Under (k) this authority he governed the See of St David's for three or four years, and made wonderful reformations in it. The abdicated Bishop, whose name was Peter, did not acquiesce in the conduct of his clergy; but by letters he suspended and excommunicated the Canons and Archdeacons, uncited and unheard: and at length, Girald, not having power to redress them, resigned his charge to the Archbishop, who absolved the excommunicated. Bishop Peter imputed his disgrace, or at least the continuance of it, to Girald; upon which great contests and bickerings arose; appeals upon the occasion were made to Rome; but at length they were reconciled, and the Bishop restored. About the year 1184, King Henry II sent (l) for Girald to Court, and made him his Chaplain; and at times he attended the King for several years, and was very useful to him in keeping all matters quiet in Wales. Yet though the King approved of his services, and in private often commended his prudence and fidelity, yet he never could be prevailed on to promote him to any ecclesiastical benefices, on account of the relation he bore to Prince Rhee, and other grandees of Wales. In 1185, the King sent (m) him to Ireland with his son John, in quality of Secretary and Privy-Counsellor to the young Prince; but the expedition did not meet with success, because Earl John made use only of youthful counsels, and shewed no favour to the old adventurers, who were men experienced in the affairs of Ireland. While Girald thus employed himself in Ireland, the two bishopricks of Ferns and Legthin fell vacant, which Earl John offered to unite and confer on him (n); but he rejected the promotion, and gave the Earl an answer worthy of a great and good man [H]. He took this opportunity of collecting materials for writing two books; which he compiled and published a few years after [I]. In the spring of the year 1186, John Comyn (o), Archbishop of Dublin, convened a Synod of his clergy, in Christ-Church in that city. The first day of the meeting, the Archbishop himself preached on the better by the name of St David's, from the founder of a church here, St David, the patron of Wales. The land about Menevia, is called (5) Kantrew Dewi, i. e. David's Cantred, but Ptolemy's name, for it is Octapitarum Promontorium, or the promontory of the Octapitæ. A late Antiquary (6) thinks this word of Ptolemy to be corrupted, and that it ought to be Oreo Petrarum Promontorium, or the promontory of the eight rocks, ὄρεα πετρῶν, which eight rocks are those called the Bishop and his Clerks. The notion carries with it a good deal of weight.

[H] An answer worthy of a great and good man. He told the Prince, that if he saw him inclined to be beneficial to the Church of Ireland, he would cheerfully accept the honour he offered him; but because he found by his actions that he had no regard to that particular, he chose rather to continue in a private station, than, being unprofitably placed in power, to be able to do no service.

[I] Materials for two books, which he compiled and published a few years after. They bear this title, namely, Topographia Hiberniæ; 'A Topography of Ireland;' and Historia Vaticinalis de expugnatione Hiberniæ; 'The Vaticinal History of the Conquest of Ireland.' The reason he gave such a whimsical title to the last of these treatises, appears in the first preface to his Description of Wales, where he says, 'that he had given the name Vaticinal, to the said history, because he had sprinkled up and down in it, the prophecies of Caledonius and Ambrosius Merlin, in such convenient places as the subject required.' He might have added also, the prophecies of Moling, Braccan, Patrick, and Columbkille, which he has also inserted in the said work. The Topography contains three books or distinctions, and not four, as Bale says (7), and the Vaticinal History contains only two books and not three; and thus they came originally out of Girald's hands. For he himself says (8), 'Se Hibernicam Topographiam, cum abditis suis, et naturæ secretis, in tribus distinctionibus trennii labore digessisse, & Vaticinalem expugnationis Hibernicæ subsequenter Historiam, duabus distinctionibus biennali lucubratione complevisse. — That he had employed three years labour in digesting the Topography of Ireland, with the hidden things thereof, and the secrets of nature in three distinctions; and that by the study of two years, he had afterwards completed the Vaticinal History of the Conquest of Ireland in two distinctions.' He writ indeed a preface (9) to a third book of the Vaticinal History; but it seems he never finished it: Bale (10) also makes him the author of a Vaticinal History distinguished from that on the conquest of Ireland; but the error of that writer manifestly appears in the reasons given before by Girald (11), why he called his book Vaticinal; as also from the catalogue he has himself furnished (12) of his writings, wherein he mentions not a word of any other Vaticinal History than that of the Conquest of Ireland. The same reason extends to set aside other inventions of Bale in ascribing (13) to Girald, one book of the Caledonian Merlin, and one book of Merlin Ambrosius, as also, Illustrationes Merlinorum; — 'Illustrations of the Merlins in two books,' beginning Quoniam in Prioribus Libris Merlini. For these words are taken from the beginning of the preface of the third book of the Vaticinal History of the Conquest of Ireland, which he intended to have written. Bale makes him the author of another book called Distinctiones Giraldi, beginning, — Nunc ad ea quæ contra naturæ cursum; but this is manifestly the same with the second book of the Topography of Ireland. Girald began his Topography and Vaticinal History while he was in Ireland; but finished them after his return to Wales. They lay in manuscript from about the year 1190 to the year 1602, when they were first published by Mr Camden at Frankfort, as appears from what Peter Lombard says (14), who being educated under Mr Camden at Westminster-school must probably have known the matter; and he having writ his Commentary on Ireland, a short time before the Frankfort edition of Girald came out, though not published till after, taking occasion to mention this author's Topography, says Topographia ista non est excussa typis — 'That Topography of Girald's is not yet printed.' When it first came out in manuscript, Girald heavily complains (15) of the Carpers and Critics who had then taken it to task; but when it appeared in print, the many invectives contained in it against Ireland, and the natives of it, the fables with which it abounded, and the gross errors through the whole, alarmed many of the Irish, and set their pens a going. Stephen White, a Jesuit of that country, first took up arms upon the occasion; and in an Historical Treatise confuted those base and scandalous aspersions related by that writer. A part of this work was in the custody of John Lynch (16), though so imperfect that it could not be fitted for the press, a loss to be lamented, since so good a Judge as Archbishop Usher (17), calls the author: 'Virum Antiquitatum, non Hiberniæ solum suæ, sed aliarum etiam gentium, scientissimum; — A man of exquisite knowledge not only in the antiquities of his own country, Ireland, but also of other nations (*).' Philip O-Sullivan (†) next took Cambrensis to task, a writer much inferior to White, who in a treatise intitled Zoilomastix, or a Whip for Zoilus, exposed that writer, as well as Stanihurst; but it does not appear that this Treatise of O-Sullivan's was ever printed. For in an encomiastick copy of verses prefixed to another work (18) of O-Sullivan's by George Mendoza, a Portuguese, there are the following the Sacraments of the Church. The second day, Albin O-Mulloy, Abbot of Baltinglas, afterwards Bishop of Ferns, made a prolix discourse on the continence of the clergy, wherein he inveighed bitterly against the clergy that came from England and Wales to Ireland, and by their evil examples, had vitiated the probity and innocence of the Irish clergy, and shewed how great their chastity was, before they had contracted contagion from the evil examples of corrupted foreigners. After the sermon was ended, the English clergy of Wexford were accused and convicted by the testimony of witnesses, for cohabiting publicly with harlots, and received sentence of suspension, which gave no small mirth and triumph to the Irish clergy. The third day Gerald mounted the pulpit, by order of the Archbishop, and preached on the pastoral duty. He did not conceal what he had truly to say in praise of the Irish clergy; but afterwards he took occasion to enlarge on their vices, and taxed them with that of drunkenness; and turning his discourse to the Prelates, he proved their neglect of the pastoral charge, by irrefragable reasons. He seems to have valued himself much upon this sermon, since he has given it to the world at large, both in his Topography (p), and in his Life (q). The same evening, Felix, Bishop of Offory, happening to sup with the Archbishop, was asked, How he approved Gerald's sermon? Felix, who was suspected to be an eunuch Monk [K], answered, That it was true, Gerald said many scandalous things well, and with a good grace; but he called us, added he, drunkards. Indeed I could scarce contain myself from flying in his face, or at least from returning him in words a like treatment. It seems to have been at this same Synod, that Maurice, Archbishop of Cashel, made that stinging and poignant repartee, that Gerald (r) takes notice of [L]. Having obtained a great fame in Ireland, as he has the modesty

(JOHN).

The next who undertook Gerald was John Lynch ||, under the feigned name of Gratianus Lucius; who doubtless had good aid from White's Fragment, which, he confesses, was in his hands; and it may be not improbable, but that he had White's whole treatise, and destroyed it to enhance the value of his own performance. Such things have been done in ancient and modern times, and will be done again till pride be rooted out of the human constitution. Lynch's book, intitled, Cambrensis Everus, was printed in folio in 1662, and in that he has pursued Gerald step by step, and chapter by chapter; wherein he shews not only his ignorance and malice; but has demonstrated, that he had not one quality fit for a Historian. Nor has Giraldus escaped the censure of Sir James Ware (19), who expresses himself with an asperity uncommon to him: 'Admonendus est (inquit) interim lector, Topographiam eam cautè legendam, id quod ipse Giraldus quodammodo fatetur in apologia, quam habemus in primâ suâ prefatione in librum Expugnationis Hibernicæ, cum ob fabulosa, jam dictæ Topographiæ inserta, infimularetur; cui hanc etiam admonitionem è retractationum suarum tractatu hic adjicere visum. — De Topographiâ Hibernicâ, laborè scilicet, nostro primævo ferè nec ignobili, ubi multa nova, aliisque regionibus prorsus incognita (ideoque magis miranda) scribuntur, hoc pro certo sciendum, quod quorundam, quinimo et plurimum per diligentem et certam indagacionem, a magnis terræ illius, et authenticis viris notitiam elicuimus, de cæterisque talibus terræ famam potius secuti fuimus. De quibus omnibus cum Augustino sentimus, qui in libro de Civitate Dei, de talibus, quæ solum fama celebrat, nec certa veritate fulciuntur, loquens, nec ea affirmanda plurimum, nec prorsus abneganda decrevit. — Sic ipse Giraldus. — Atqui non possum non mirari viros aliquos hujus sæculi, alioquin graves et doctos, signenta ea Giraldi mundo iterum pro veris obtulisse. — Yet (says the learned Knight) I must admonish the reader to turn over that Topography of Cambrensis with great caution; which Cambrensis himself in some sort acknowledges in an Apology made by him in his first Preface to the History of the Conquest of Ireland, after he had been taxed with the fabulous reports inserted in his said Topography, to which it is proper also to add this admonition taken out of a treatise of his called, his Retractions. — Concerning the Topography of Ireland (says he) our first, and not altogether contemptible labour, in which many things new, and unknown to other countries, and therefore the more wonderful, are written, the reader may with certainty be convinced, that we have obtained the knowledge of some, nay, of most of the things therein related by a diligent and painful inquiry from the authentic testimonies of men of weight and reputation in that country, and in other particulars we have contented ourselves to follow the reports and fame of the whole kingdom. Concerning all which we are of opinion with St. Augustin, who, in his book de Civitate Dei, speaking of things which fame only has spread abroad, and which are not supported by indisputable evidence, says, that as such things are not positively to be affirmed, so neither are they to be wholly rejected. — Thus much Cambrensis himself owns: — But I cannot forbear expressing my astonishment, that some men of this age, who in other respects, are men of gravity and learning, should again obtrude these fictions of Cambrensis upon the world for truths. — Yet Cambrensis himself had the confidence (20) to obtrude them on a body of grave and learned men. For in a catalogue that he furnishes of his own works, this is what he says of his Topography: — Item de Topographiâ Hibernicâ, liber, scilicet, de situ terræ illius, et mirabilibus ejusdem multis exaratus, apud Oxoniâ per tres dies continuos in publicâ cleri audientiâ recitatus: — This book (says he) of the situation of Ireland, and the wonderful things in it, written at large, was read over at Oxford for three whole days in a public audience of the Clergy.

In an epistle (21) to William Vere, Bishop of Hereford, he is in raptures upon that part of the third distinction of his Topography, wherein he treats of the Irish harp and other musical instruments, and with vanity enough imagines, that he has handled the subject with an elegance suitable to the dignity of it. The author (22) of Cambrensis Everus hints, that Girald had maliciously destroyed a great many old annals of Ireland, that his own performance might carry the greater weight; but the consequence drawn by Stillingfleet (23) from this action is not just; namely, that he had therefore better authorities to build his history on than Keating; but unfortunately, whatever number of Irish annals might have been in his hands, he could make no use of them, as he had not the least knowledge in the language.

[K] Suspected to be an eunuch Monk.] Girald's (24) words are, 'Monachus mutilatus, ut videbatur, et eunuchatus: — A mutilated Monk, as it seemed, and one gelt.'

[L] A poignant repartee that Girald takes notice of.] Cambrensis objected to Archbishop Maurice, that there never were any martyrs in Ireland, who suffered for the faith: It is true, said the Archbishop; for tho' our country be looked on as barbarous, uncultivated, and cruel, yet they always have payed modesty to tell us himself (s), between Easter and Whitsuntide, 1187, he returned to Wales, and employed all his time in writing and revising his Topography, to which, when he had put the last hand, he took a journey to Oxford, and repeated it in a publick audience of the university; and as it consisted of three distinctions, he repeated one every day of three successively: and in order to captivate the people, and secure their applause, the first day he entertained all the poor of the town, the next day the Doctors and scholars of fame and reputation, and the third day the scholars of the lower rank, the soldiers, townsmen, and Burgessees. In the year 1188 (t), he accompanied Baldwin, Archbishop of Canterbury, in a journey through the rough and mountainous parts of Wales, in order to preach up to the people the necessity of taking the cross, and engaging in an expedition in defence of the Holy Land. Here our author runs riot in his own praise, and shews the vast success his eloquence met with, in persuading the greatest part of the country to engage in this foolish adventure; whereas the Archbishop was able to do nothing. Girald himself took the cross at this time, and it afforded him the opportunity of writing a book, mentioned below in the remarks [M]. The same year he posted over into France, in the retinue of King Henry II, which he did by the advice of the Archbishop of Canterbury, and Ranulph de Glanville, Chief-Justice of England; but the King dying the year after, he was dispatched back by King Richard I, to assist upon this alteration in keeping the peace in Wales, which was then in great confusion. He effected this commission with great address, and the King the same year, going to the assistance of the Holy Land, left the chief government of the kingdom in the hands of William Longchamp, Bishop of Ely, Lord-Chancellor, and joined Girald in commission with him [N]; but he was under the necessity of obtaining a dispensation from the Pope's Legate, for not pursuing the voyage to the Holy Land, having been signed with the cross for that purpose, in the year 1188. In the year 1190, the Bishop of Ely and the Pope's Legate, offered to advance him to the See of Bangor, then void by the death of the Bishop of it, which he declined. About the same time he advised Earl John, the King's brother, to go over to Ireland, and make a final conquest of it; but without success, the Earl aspiring to usurp the kingdom of England in his brother's absence. In 1191, Earl John having obtained the chief rule in England, by expelling the Bishop of Ely, offered to advance Girald to the bishoprick of Landaff; but this promotion he also refused, waiting for the opportunity of stepping into the See of St David's, which he had his heart set upon from his youth. In the year 1192 (u), Girald retired from Court, where he saw promotions did not go according to merit, and removed to Lincoln for the sake of studying Divinity, as to a more secure and quiet port; and here, it is said, he remained six or seven years (w). In this retirement he employed his pen in writing some works [O]. Upon the death of Peter, Bishop of St David's, in 1198, he was advised by the Chapter and the Barons of that country, to bestir himself in seeking this promotion, and in procuring the interest of the King, to whom and his father he had been upon many occasions eminently serviceable. But he rejected the motion, and reverence and honour to the Ecclesiasticks, and never would stretch out their hands against the Saints of God. But now, added he, there is come a people among us, who know how, and are accustomed, to make martyrs.' Alluding to the affair of Thomas Becket.

[M] Gave him the opportunity of writing a book mentioned below in the remarks.] This book passes under different titles: Bale (*) calls it in two words, Itinerarium Cambrie. Mr Wharton (25) enlarges the title from some of the manuscripts of Girald, and shews us not only what the book was, but the time and intention of writing it; namely, Itinerarium Giraldi, et laboriosa Baldwini Cantuarenfis Archiepiscopi legatio, devotaque per Walliam in crucis obsequium predicatio; i. e. The Itinerary of Girald, and the laborious embassy of Baldwin, Archbishop of Canterbury, and his devout preaching up the duty of taking the cross through Wales. Girald (26) himself calls it, Itinerarium laboriosum per hispida et inaequalia Walliae loca; i. e. A laborious Itinerary through the rough and mountainy places of Wales. Bale (27) has split this treatise into two, one of which he calls, Itinerarium Cambrie, and the other, Itinerarium Baldwini, both which are manifestly one and the same work; nor does it contain three or four books, as he says, but two. It has been printed (28), with the annotations of David Powell, under the title of Itinerarium Cambriae, seu laboriosa Baldwini Cantuarenfis Archiepiscopi per Walliam legationis accurata descriptio. Probably, it was at the same time he compiled, Kambriae totius Mappam (29); i. e. A Map of all Wales, which Bale (30) calls, Cambriae Mappa expositionem, lib. 1. whereas it is a coloured Geographical Map yet extant, as Mr Wharton says, and oesides, rivers, mountains, and the sea-coasts, and the neighbouring places of England, it lays down 43 towns of Wales.

[N] Joined Girald in the commission of government with the Bishop of Ely.] This fact is unnoticed by the Historians of England, and for what we know, only told by Girald (31) himself, out of a vanity to inhance his own importance. As the Bishop of Ely was Chancellor, as well as chief governour, perhaps he appointed Girald, his deputy, or co-adjutor in the custody of the Great Seal, to ease him of part of the burthen, that was too heavy in the whole administration of the kingdom; and this is the most we can upon this occasion allow to our author.

and made use of a memorable saying [P], which perhaps was the fashion of the age, and equivalent to the term, Nolo episcopari, I won't canvas or make interest for a bishoprick. Yet being put in nomination for it the beginning of the year following, he was active enough in supporting his interest. For two of the Archdeacons, and four of the Canons of St David's, in September, nominated three persons for the bishoprick, to Hubert Archbishop of Canterbury, then Chief-Justiciary, and in the first place the Archdeacon of Brecknock, Girald; to whom they added Reginald Foliot, an Englishman, of whose success they did not think there was any likelihood. The Archbishop rejected Girald, and when the Canons expostulated with him, and desired to know his reasons, why he refused a discreet and learned man, a gentleman, and one born in lawful matrimony; he told them, 'That the King would have no Welshman a Bishop in Wales, and especially him, who was so near in blood to the Prince of Wales.' And the Archbishop rejected not only Girald, but all the Welshmen who were put in nomination. Besides the political reasons beforementioned, the Archbishop had a private one of his own, namely, a particular pique against Girald. On the twenty-ninth of June 1199, the Chapter went again to election, and without one discordant voice, chose Girald. The day following he passed over into Ireland, (where his kinsman Meiler Fitz-Henry was then Lord-Justice) in order to strengthen his interest among his great relations there, and probably to supply himself with money to prosecute his claim. Having received promises of their assistance, in less than three weeks he returned to St David's, where he was informed, that, during his absence, the Canons had received a mandate from the Archbishop and Justiciary, to elect and admit Geoffry, Prior of Lhanthony, for their Bishop. Girald appealed to the Pope, and the Canons, by letter, requested his Holiness to consecrate him. Furnished with these credentials, he took a journey to Rome, where he arrived, about the feast of St Andrew, and presented his letters to the Pope. The Prior of Lhanthony was not behind him in supporting his interest; and he also went armed with letters from the Archbishop, stuffed, as Girald says (x), with nothing but calumnies and lies. All the letters being read, and the suit canvassed during the whole winter, the Pope perceived that the cause would not soon be determined, and therefore to provide in the mean time that the See should receive no detriment, and to give Girald some seeming satisfaction, in May 1200, he appointed him Administrator both in spiritualities and temporalities of the bishoprick of St David's, during the continuance of the litigation, and sent him home. At this time he published one of his treatises mentioned in the remark [Q]. In the year 1201, about Midlent, he again went to Rome, and finding his suit not far advanced, he returned to England before the end of summer; and in November 1202, he took his third journey to Rome, where he continued till the fifteenth of April 1203, on which day the Pope gave a definitive sentence in the cause, and vacated both candidates claims, and in August, Girald returned home to solicit a new election. Notwithstanding all the opposition made by him; Geoffry, Prior of Lhanthony, was elected by the Canons, and Girald, finding it to no purpose to withstand the Archbishop's weight, desisted from all further pretences to the See of St David's, and soon after resigned the archdeaconry of Brechin, to a nephew of his called William. He seems to have spent the remainder of his life in a state of inaction, and for the most part buried in retirement, where he writ many books, of which the reader may see a catalogue below [R], partly collected from his own works, and partly from the observations and collections

(x) De Rebus a se Gestis, ut supra, where the letters are set forth at large.

[P] He made use of a memorable saying.] He tells (36) us himself the saying, namely, Virum Episcopalem peti non petere debere:— That a man ought to be courted to accept a Bishoprick, instead of suing for it.

(36) De Reb. a se Gestis, Lib. iii. cap. iii.

[Q] At this time he published one of his treatises mentioned in the remark.] The treatise here mentioned, was that, De Rebus a se Gestis; lib. 2. which Ward (37) calls de Vita sua; lib. 2. There are two reasons that induce us to think, that the birth of this piece was at the time mentioned. First, As it sets forth all the great actions in which Girald was concerned, in lively colours, and with no little share of vanity; so it seems calculated to fortify his interest with the Pope, by letting him see how fit a man he was to serve the Pope's views in point of activity and consequence, a matter of no mean consideration with Innocent the third. Secondly, As the book breaks off abruptly just at the time, the Archbishop of Canterbury's letters against Girald were read before the Pope, after which he returned to Wales.

(37) Script. p. 225.

[R] The reader may see a catalogue of such books he writ after his retirement.] Several of our author's books are mentioned before in the remarks I, M, O, Q, which therefore we shall not repeat. The others are these, namely.

Epistola ad Capitulum Herefordense de libris a se scriptis; — i. e. An Epistle to the Chapter of Hereford concerning the books written by himself.

Chronographia Metrica, et Mundi nascentis Descriptioniuncula; — i. e. A Chronology in Metre, or a Description of the growing World.

Cosmographia pentametris versibus exornata; — i. e. A Cosmography embellished with pentameter verses. — Bale calls this piece Cosmographia Mundi, lib. I.

Ecclesiæ Speculum, sive de Monasticis Ordinibus et Ecclesiasticis Religionibus variis Distinctionum, Lib. IV. — i. e. The Mirror of the Church, or four books of Distinctions concerning Monastick Orders, or Ecclesiastical Religions. — Mr Wharton (38) says, 'That Girald bore an immortal hatred to the Monks, inso-

' much that to his Litany he added this deprecation; —
' A Monachorum malitiâ, libera nos Domine — From
' the malice of the Monks, good Lord deliver us; —
' which he used in his daily prayers, and advised his ' friends to do the like; and in all his writings he ' takes a delight in railing at their hypocrisy, frauds,
' and ignorance. But he took three years in compiling ' his Speculum, that he might to the full indulge his ' spleen against the Monks, and lay an eternal brand
' of infamy on them.' Bale has given us the title of Ecclesiæ Speculum; but then has formed two other tracts out of it (viz.) de Monachis et Clericis, lib. I.
and de Cisterciensium Nequitia, lib. I.

Librum de Invectionibus; — i. e. A Book of Invectives; — which Bale calls, Invectiones Triennales, alluding to his three years journies to Rome, in each of which it is not improbable, but that Archbishop collections of Mr Wharton; and though he lived till after the year 1220, yet we do not find that he engaged in any publick business, except that in the year 1215, he was offered his favourite bishoprick of St David's, upon some terms that he looked upon as unreasonable, and therefore rejected it. The time of his death is not mentioned by any author that we know of. Bale (y), in giving his character, describes his person as particularly as if he had been his intimate acquaintance. — 'Adolescens staturâ procerus, facie & formâ nitidus, &c. — A young man tall of stature, and of a delicate form and countenance.' It is more certain that he was a man of learning, and of considerable address and merit; but that his other good qualities were much tarnished by an excessive vanity; and whoever reads his works cannot but see, that he was either extremely credulous

Hubert wrote sharp letters against him, to which this book of invectives was an answer. Bale multiplies these invectives in his catalogue, and thereby makes Girald the author of another book called, Ad Invectiones Huberti, lib. 1. which manifestly is the same with the former. In another place (*) our author enlarges his former title, and shews therein the cause of his writing it. Thus he calls it, Liber Invectionum Romæ in Giraldum acriter inchoatus, et ibidem ab ipso, Papa monente, in pleno Consistorio ad injurias respondente, et objecta crimina non incompetentèr evacuante pariter et refundante; nec non et utilia quædam adjiciente consummatus. — i. e. A book of Invectives severely set on foot at Rome against Girald, and by the advice of the Pope, an answer given in a full Consistory to the injuries and crimes objected; wherein the same are sufficiently retorted and confuted, and some other useful things added.

Epistolæ: — These are what Bale calls Remordentes Epistolæ; and he has some reason for it. Because our author says (39), that to his Speculum Duorum he hath added, Epistolæ paucas ad injurias illatas respondentis ac remordentes, quasi querulum carmen.

Symbolum Elektorum, sive Epistolæ variz a semet ipso collectæ. In his sunt plures invectivæ adversus Wibertum, Abbatem de Bethlesdene, ordinis Cisterciensis, Epistolâ proluxa ad Petrum Menevensem Episcopum de officio Episcopi; altera ad Adamum, Abbatem Evehemensem de laude amicitiz, et alia. — i. e. A collection of pieces, or various Epistles collected by himself. In which are many invectives against Wibert, Abbot of Bethlesdene, a Cistercian Monk; a prolux Epistle to Peter, Bishop of St David's, concerning the office of a Bishop; another to Adam, Abbot of Eveham in praise of friendship, and other things.

Speculum Duorum, Commonitorium et Consolatorium, et quod sola peperit indignatio, quasi querulum carmen emissum. — i. e. A double Mirror, Commonitory and Consolatory, set forth in the form of a querulous copy of verses, produced by indignation alone. Bale makes two separate books of this one, which consists of two parts.

Liber de Principis Instructione; — i. e. A Book for the Instruction of a Prince; in three distinctions.

Dialogum; i. e. A Dialogue. This single Dialogue Bale has enlarged into a volume, intitled Dialogus Profanos, lib. 1. and indeed it may be well called a volume, if (as is highly probable) it be the same tract, which is called, Liber de Gestis Giraldi laboriosissimis, Menevensi Ecclesiz futuris fortè diebus pernecessarius; — i. e. A Book of the most laborious actions of Girald, which in future times may be very necessary for the Church of Menevia; written in the form of a dialogue between Quærens and Solvens; from whence Bale takes occasion to father on him a treatise, de Quærente et Solvente, lib. 1. but it is the same with the dialogue de Jure Statûs Menevensis Ecclesiz, divided into seven distinctions.

Vita S. Edelberti Martyris Herefordensis egregii, S. David, S. Caradoci, loci ejusdem Heremitz nobilis et Presbyteri, S. Remigii, Lincolnienis Episcopi primi, et S. Hugonis, sedis ejusdem Episcopi. — i. e. The life of St Edelbert, the excellent Martyr of Hereford, the life of St David, the life of St Caradoc, a noble Hermit and Priest of the same place; the life of St Remigius, the first Bishop of Lincoln; the life of St Hugo, Bishop of the same. In the short catalogue he gives (40) of his own works, he intitles this piece, de Legendis Sanctorum; i. e. of the Legends of the Saints, and then enumerates the foregoing lives.

VOL. I. No. 43.

Topographia Cambriæ, et tam terræ quam morum gentis illius compendiosa descriptio; cujus in fine satis succinctus ac dilucidus, tam Retractationum Tractatus, quam librorum nostrorum catalogus non incompetentèr est appositus. — i. e. A Topography of Wales, and a compendious description of both the land and customs of that nation; to which is added, a Treatise of Retractations succinct and clear enough, and a catalogue of our books is not incompetently annexed. This is the title Girald himself gives. Bale divides this Topography into four books; but it consists only of two, the first of which intitled, de Laudabilibus Cambiorum; — i. e. of the Praises of the Welch, was published by David Powell with annotations; but the second intitled, de Illaudabilibus Cambrorum, out of zeal to his country, was left by him unpublished; which omission has been since supplied by Mr Wharton (41), and intitled, Giraldi Cambrensis liber secundus, de Descriptione Walliz, seu liber de Illaudabilibus Walliz; — i. e. The second book of the Description of Wales written by Girald Cambrensis, or a book of the Dispraises of Wales. In ten chapters. This book escaped the industry of Sir James Ware (42), who unjustly imputes it as an invention of Bale, that Girald wrote de Illaudabilibus Cambrorum.

Epistola ad Stephanum Langton, Archiepiscopum Cantuariensem; — i. e. An Epistle to Stephen Langton, Archbishop of Canterbury; the purport of which is to advise him not to resign his See.

De Proemiis operum suorum. — i. e. Of the Prefaces to his own works. This piece is mentioned in his epistle to the Chapter of Hereford.

Rhetoricas Orationes; these were dispersed through his other works as they were occasionally written.

De Distis Quatuor, per totidem distinctas particulas artificiosè contextas, sicut delectabile, sic et opus non inutile compagine curavit: — says he in his epistle to the Chapter of Hereford. This treatise contained a collection of the four immediately preceding pieces.

Bale, who upon many occasions was fond of multiplying the works of writers, has been liberal to Girald, and has ascribed many treatises to him, which nobody else ever dreamed of, some of which have been observed before, as they occurred in the remarks. Among the spurious pieces, are the Topographia Britanniz Primæ, lib. 4. — Relationem Dormientium, lib. 1. — In Opera quædam Senecæ, lib. 1. — De Planctu Lachrymabili, lib. 1. — Pro reddenda Talione, lib. 1. — It is probable this is another title for his Liber de Invectionibus, the subject being the same, and contains returns to the Archbishop's invective letters against him. — Acta Regis Johannis, lib. 1. — De Avibus et eorum naturis, lib. 1. This is manifestly a part of his Topography of Ireland. — Querulum Carmen. — the same as his Speculum Duorum. — De Flosculis Philosphicis. — De Mahumeto et ejus nequitiis, lib. 1. — Pro Guidone Warwicensi, lib. 1. — Prerogativarum Computum, lib. 1. — De Mundi Mirabilibus, lib. 1. — Descriptionses Magnorum Virorum: — i. e. the Characters of Great Men. — are certainly a part of the history of the conquest of Ireland.

Josias Simler (43) erroneously ascribes to Girald, a book de Viti-Saxonum Regibus, lib. 1. And another called Anglorum Chronicon, lib. 1. But he was led astray by the first edition of Bale's writers of Britain; for they are not mentioned in the second. — The books also Demonâ Insulâ, and de Vitâ S. Patricii, which are extant in manuscript in the publick library at Cambridge, are none of his; though some have made a handle from their being mentioned by Dr Thomas James in his Eclogâ Oxoniâ-Cantabrigienfi to ascribe them to Girald. But that writer only enumerates them as bound together in one volume with some works of Girald. D

B A R R Y (JAMES) Lord Baron of Santry. The family of the Barrys were originally Welch, seated in Pembrokeshire, and descended from the Princes of that country by a female line. Several of them passed into Ireland among the first adventurers in 1169 [A], of whom Robert de Barry is highly celebrated by Girald Barry (a) [B], commonly called Cambrensis, who was of the same family. Camden (b) makes this Robert an Englishman, meaning, it may be presumed, that he was born within the allegiance of the King of England, to whom the Princes of Wales paid homage, and to understand that careful writer in any other sense, would be to detract from his skill in genealogy, of which indisputably he was a great master; and yet it may be doubted, whether one small error in relation to this family of the Barrys settled in Ireland may not be imputed to him [C]. It is certain therefore, that Robert de Barry was a Cambro-Briton, and nephew to Robert Fitz-Stephen, who first invaded Ireland in aid of Dermot Mac-Murrough, King of Leinster, a year or two before Earl Strongbow's arrival. From which of the four branches mentioned in the remark (A); the gentleman, who is now our subject, is descended, must be left to the Heralds to trace; but both his father and grandfather were bred to merchandisè in the city of Dublin, by which they not only acquired a considerable estate, but also enjoyed, and with sufficiency executed, the several posts of honour in the government of the city [D]; which his father represented more than once in Parliament. He educated this his son in the study of the Law, who did not disappoint his expectations: for being called to the bar, he practised in his profession for several years, with great reputation and success. In 1629, the King thought him a proper person on whom to confer the office of his Majesty's Serjeant at Law (c), for the kingdom of Ireland, at a yearly fee of twenty pounds ten shillings, sterling, and in as full a manner, as the same office was granted before to Sir John Brereton, Knt. This was a prelude only to his future advancement. For the Lord Wentworth, afterwards Earl of Stafford, found him in this post when he first arrived Lord-Deputy of Ireland, and soon discovered his abilities, and took him under his protection. His Excellency laid hold of the first opportunity he had to promote him; and accordingly on the fifth of August 1634, he obtained a grant (d) of the office of Second Baron of the Exchequer of Ireland, to hold during pleasure, with such fees, rewards, and profits, as Sir Robert Ogelthorpe, Sir Lawrence Parsons, Sir Gerard Lowther, or any other Second Baron did or ought to receive; and he soon after received the honour of knighthood. He obtained this favour, notwithstanding a powerful recommendation from England in behalf of another,

[A] Several of the Barrys passed into Ireland in 1169.] We read in history of four principal adventurers of the name of Barry, who arrived in Ireland upon the first invasion undertaken by Robert Fitz-Stephens, namely, 1. Robert Barry the elder. 2. Robert Barry the younger. 3. Philip Barry, and 4. Walter Barry; besides Girald Barry (1) the Historian, an Ecclesiastic, who went thither in Earl John's retinue in the year 1210.

(1) See the preceding article.

[B] Of whom Robert de Barry is highly celebrated by Girald Cambrensis.] The character Cambrensis gives of Robert de Barry is this, 'That he was a young gentleman ambitious rather to be really great than to seem so, was by nature both noble and valiant, and could not bear either to glorify his own actions, or to hear others do it. That he was of a sedate, stayed courage, one whom no sudden misadventure could terrify, was always ready at his arms, forward in battle, and the first that received a wound in the conquest of Ireland.'

[C] Whether one error in relation to the Barrys may not be imputed to Camden.] Camden makes Robert de Barry the ancestor of the family of Barry-mor, or Barry the great (one of whom was created Baron Barry, afterwards Viscount Buttevant, and they are now Earls of Barrymore). Whereas it is strongly to be presumed that that branch of the family are descended from Philip de Barry, to whom his uncle, Robert Fitz-Stephen, made large grants in the county of Cork, which that family enjoy to this day, as appears from from King John's Charter of confirmation (2). For then (says the Charter) 'Johannes Rex confirmavit. Wil-[D] His father and grand-father enjoyed the several posts of honour in the government of the city.] His grand-father, James Barry, was one of the Sheriffs (3) of the city of Dublin in 1577. His father, Richard Barry, was also Sheriff (4) of the same city in 1604, and Mayor thereof in 1610. He likewise served as Member of Parliament (5) for the city in 1613, with his colleague, Sir Richard Bolton, Recorder; and again in 1634 (6), with Serjeant Catelin, who was the King's Serjeant, Recorder, and Speaker of the same Parliament. Lord Wentworth speaks of him to Mr Secretary Coke in terms of respect, and as a good Protestant.

another [E], and it was merely the fruit of the Lord Wentworth's friendship, of which he had occasion soon after of making a publick acknowledgment [F], and of doing justice to his patron's merit. In the mad times that followed in the year 1640, when the Parliament of Ireland were upon the point of sending over a Committee of their body to England, to impeach the Earl of Strafford, he joined all his weight and interest with Sir James Ware (e), and other moderate members of the House of Commons, to oppose those measures; though the torrent was so violent, that all he or his party could do to stop it was vain and fruitless, and he had nothing left him but prayers to avert the fate of his noble friend. Times of distraction and confusion afford only few opportunities to gentlemen of the long robe, to display their talents in; the gown upon such occasions must give way to the sword, and therefore we hear little of our Baron during the long course of the rebellion, till a little before the Restoration of King Charles II, in the year 1660, when he was appointed Chairman of the Convention, which voted his Majesty's Restoration without any previous conditions, in which Revolution no doubt he was useful; since we find his Majesty took his merit into consideration in a very short time after. For on the seventeenth of November that year, the King issued a privy-seal (f), for advancing him to the office of Chief-Justice of the King's-Bench in Ireland, and another (g) on the eighteenth of December following, in consideration of his eminent fidelity and zeal, shewn in his Majesty's service, for creating him Lord Baron of Santry in the kingdom of Ireland, to him and the heirs male of his body, and separate patents (h) accordingly passed on the eighth of February ensuing, and he was presently after called into the Privy-Council. He died some time in March 1672, and was buried in Christ-Church, Dublin, having left behind him issue to inherit his estate and title [G].

[E] He obtained this favour, notwithstanding a powerful recommendation from England in behalf of another. This recommendation was from Dr Laud, Archbishop of Canterbury in behalf of Mr Chadwick. Lord Wentworth takes notice of it in a letter (7) to his Grace of Canterbury at that time. 'Your Grace (says he) recommends unto me Mr Chadwick, in your letter of the 23d of June, for a second Baron's place in the Exchequer: But I had, with the advice of the Chief Baron, promised it before to Serjeant Barry, the King's Serjeant, so as I could not with honesty recall it. Besides, Mr Chadwick is not held here so fit as yet for the Bench; nay, the Chief Baron has a very mean opinion of his judgment in his own profession. But I will be answerable to your Grace, he shall be by me effectually remembered in virtue of your Lordship's recommendation, at one time or other, and as soon as ever any occasion shall present itself.'

[F] Of which favour he had occasion soon after to make a publick acknowledgment. This acknowledgment appears in a book he published in the year 1637, intitled, The Case of Tenures upon the Commission of defective Titles, argued by all the Judges of Ireland, with the Resolution and the Reasons of their Resolution. Dublin 1637, folio; ibid. 1725, 12mo. In the report of this case he displays his own abilities in the Law, and in the dedication of it to the Lord Strafford, he acquaints the world with his gratitude to his patron in terms very full and expressive: 'This work, (says he) my Lord, is your's by more than one interest, and therefore it returns naturally unto you; for to lay aside my particular respects (it being by your Lordship's favour that I serve his Majesty in this place) you are Pater Patriæ, and not more so by your office, than by your love to this nation, and your most equal, and indifferent dispensation of justice, (next under his Majesty) the father of this Church and Commonwealth: And for whom can an oblation of this nature be more proper? Besides, all that is here, as it was at first spoken, in an humble obedience to your Lordship's order, so it was after upon a noble invitation from you digested into this form, and it is now made publick by your commandment; so that in all the passages of it, it carries your image, your superscription, and therefore by this dedication, I do not so much give it, as restore it. If there be any thing in it, that is mine, that answers your expectation, even in that, that it answers your expectation, I have my reward; for all that are below your Lordship, I hope it shall have their use, to satisfy them that your Lordship's proceedings in this business have been in all points agreeable both to honour and justice, &c.'

[G] Having left issue to inherit his estate and title. He married Catherine, daughter to Sir William Parsons of Bellamont in the county of Dublin, Baronet, one of the Lords Justices of Ireland in the year 1640, and ancestor to the Earl of Ros's; and by her had issue Richard, Lord Santry, the father of Henry, Lord Santry, who by Bridget, daughter of Sir Thomas Domville of Temple-Oge, Baronet, and half sister to the present Sir Compton Domville, had issue Henry, Lord Santry, who unfortunately forfeited the title. D

B A R R Y (GERAT) a gentleman descended from the noble family of Barrymore, Earls of that title in Ireland, as he tells us himself in a book of his writing, mentioned in the remarks [A]. He served many years with reputation as an inferior officer in the armies of the King of Spain, in Germany and the Low-Countries, being (as we apprehend) of the Popish religion, from the circumstance of his not being employed at home; and in the Spanish service he never rose higher than to the office of a Captain of foot, few foreigners in that age obtaining considerable posts, at least he styles himself only Captain in the title of his book, which was in the library of Dr King, late Archbishop of Dublin, and is now in the Diocesan library at Cashell; a scarce piece, but of little intrinsic value. What became of the author, or when he died, I know not, having met with no account of him, but in his own Preface; but of whatever sufficiency he was in the army, he seems to have been very ignorant in other respects, not being able even to spell in the manner used in his time; of which his title-page and the whole work are manifest proofs.

[A] A book of his writing mentioned in the remarks. The title of the book here referred to is as follows. A Discourse of Military Discipline, divided into three bookes, declaring the Partes and Sufficiency ordained in a private Souldier, and in each Officer serving in the Infanterie, till the Election and Office of the Captain-Generall; and the last booke treating of Fire-Wourks of rare Executions by Sea and Lande; as also of Fortifications. Composed by Captain Gerat Barry Irish. Brussels 1634, folio. Dedicated to David, Earl of Barrymore. D

BARRY (LONDOWICK) a gentleman of Irish birth, flourished in England about the middle of the reign of King James I; and, it seems, must have been a man of some figure, since Anthony Wood (a) is pleased to complement him with the title of Lord Barry, which is certainly a mistake; nor would we think him worth introducing into this work, but to correct that error. Mr Langbaine (b) ranks him among the dramatick poets, and makes him the author, as well as Anthony Wood (c) does, of a Comedy, intituled, Ram Alley, or Merry Tricks, Printed at London, 1611, acted by the children of the King's revels, before the year 1611, but printed that year. Some have ascribed this Play to Philip Massenger; but the author (d) above quoted clears that mistake. The plot in this Play of Will. Smallhanks decoying the widow Taffeta into marriage, is the same with that in Killigrew's Parson's Wedding, and both taken from the English Rogue (e), where a servant is introduced decoying his mistress into a wedding, by bribing the city musick to play under her window, and with her joy of her marriage, when at the same time he appeared at the window of her bed-chamber in his shirt, and threw them money.

BARTON (ELIZABETH) (a) when or where born we do not find, 'tis more than probable she was of no great extraction or family, since we first meet with her in the character of a servant to one Thomas Knob of Aldington in Kent, in the year 1525, in whose service, and much about which time, she first began her pranks (b): for being troubled with hysterical fits, and the usual symptoms of risings in her throat, faintings, deliria, &c. which strangely distorted her limbs, and threw her body into very unusual agitations; it was no difficult matter in an age of credulity and superstition, to make people believe, there was something more in her fits than a bare paroxysm of the disease (c), and she accordingly become the object of their wonder and surprize: thus her strange fits and odd gesticulations, together with a little success (she accidentally met with) in divination [A], soon spread her fame abroad, and made people believe she was really inspired of God. This affair coming to the ears of Masters, the parson of Aldington, he immediately resolved to set her up for a prophetess, in hopes perhaps thereby to prop the sinking foundation of the Romish Church (though the event turned out directly the contrary) [B]: this, or at least the hopes of making his chapel famous, that he might reap thereby the advantages of pilgrimages, offerings, &c. (d) made him very ready to contribute to, and carry on the imposture. To this end his first care was, to advise her to pretend (or at least to persuade her to believe) she had a supernatural impulse, and that what she said was truly prophetic: for when her fits were over, and she had forgot all she had said in them, Masters, the Priest, took care it should not go so, but persuaded her, all she had said was of the Holy Ghost, and that she ought publickly to confess it was so (e); this distemper holding her for some time, she had thereby an opportunity (as it were by daily habit and experience) of attaining such perfection in counterfeiting her fits, that when cured, she could so exactly imitate them, as would have deceived any body, so ready and expert was she at it, to which her own application and observance, and the diligent tuition of her preceptors, Masters and other Monks and Friars, did not a little contribute (f): For having by her art brought the fit upon her, she would lie as it were in a trance for some time, then coming to herself, (after many strange grimaces and odd gesticulations) she would break out into devout ejaculations, hymns, and prayers, sometimes delivering herself in set speeches, sometimes in uncouth monkish rhymes, pretending to prophesy, and that she had been honoured by God with many strange

[A] Together with a little success (she accidentally met with) in divination.] It happening, that a child of her master's, that was sick in the cradle by her, being near death, just as she was come out of one of her fits; she asked, with great pain and groaning, whether it were dead or not? And hearing it was alive, she said it would die anon; which words were scarce out of her mouth, but the child fetched a deep sigh and died; as might be naturally suggested without any great skill in divination (1): This success however, simple as it was, together with her odd fits, soon set her up for a Prophetess: For a little while after this, she took upon her to tell things that were done at church, court, and other distant places, where she could not be present, or have any apparent information; nay so low did her divinations descend, that she would also tell in particular on any night, what meat the Hermit of that chapel had for his supper, and many other things told her concerning him, to the great admiration of those about her; delivering her speeches, as the lay immovable, and as it were dead, all which she seemed (by signs that she gave) most lively to behold, as it were with her eyes —

[B] In hopes thereby to prop the sinking foundation of the Romish Church, though the event turned out directly the contrary] For the foulness and wicked designs of this imposture says Burnet (2), did much alienate people from the interest of Rome, and made the other acts pass more easily, and be better received by the people; inasmuch that it was generally believed, or at least least shrewdly suspected, that what was now discovered was no new practice, but that many of the visions and miracles, by which religious orders had raised their credit so high, were of the same nature; on which account, it was not a little instrumental in making way for the destroying of all the monasteries in England, tho' all the severity which at that time followed on it, was that the Observant Friars at Richmond, Greenwich, Canterbury, Newark, and Newcastle, were removed out of their houses, and put with the other Grey Friars, and Augustin Friars were put in their houses (3). — This however, was the first that provoked the King against the regular Clergy, and drew after it all the severities that were done in the rest of this reign, and not undeservedly; for had it fallen out in a darker age, in which the world went mad after visions, the King might have lost his crown by it*.

[C] Saying

visions, heard heavenly voices and melody, and had the revelations of many things, talking much about religious matters, as Heaven, Hell, Purgatory, &c. [C] declaiming against the wickedness of the times, and evil life, in no bad manner; and was always particularly vehement against Heresy and innovations, exhorting to frequent the church, to hear masses, to use frequent confession, and to pray to our Lady and all Saints, and to all the superstitions of the Romish Church. The artful management of this imposture, together with her pretended piety, virtue, and austerity of life, gained her undoubted credit to all she said; the common people looking on her with a kind of reverence, as a person truly inspired of God, and not only the commonalty were deceived, but several learned men of uncommon understanding, and persons of great characters were wrought upon to give credit to her pretended revelations (g). Among the rest was Sir Thomas More, and Fisher Bishop of Rochester, who are by some reported (though falsely) to have been afterwards appointed by the King to examine her [D]; as also Warham, Archbishop of Canterbury; to whom Masters having set this holy Nun off in an extraordinary manner, by relating her pretended revelations, divinations, and long speeches (b), Warham ordered him to attend her carefully, and bring him a further report of any new trances, &c. she might afterwards fall in; to whom was joined Dr Bocking a Canon of Christ-Church in Canterbury, and Mr Hadley and Barnes, two Monks of the same place, together with Father Lewis his official of Canterbury (i), and others, as commissioners to examine

[C] Saying that she had been honoured by God with many strange visions, and heard heavenly voices and melody, and that she had the revelations of many things to come, talking much about religious matters, as Heaven, Hell, Purgatory, &c.] In her trances she would often say, that she would go home; and sometimes when she came out of them, that she had been at home; and being asked where her home was; she said it was in Heaven, where St Michael weighed souls, and St Peter carried the keys; and where she had the company of our Lady of Court of Strete, who had commanded her, to offer a taper up to her in her chapel, and that then she would immediately be cured; discovering great pleasure in the thoughts of being talked of for the miracles: Saying, our Lady would show more miracles there shortly, and that if any one should chance to depart this life suddenly, or by mischance, or in deadly sin; if they vowed heartily to our good Lady at Court of Strete, they should be restored to life again, to receive swift and bowfell, and should after depart this life with God's blessing (4).

It was also given out that she had much conversation with, and many revelations from, Mary Magdalen, who gave her a letter that was wrote in Heaven, which was shewed to many, being wrote in golden characters; this was however afterwards found to be wrote by one Haukerhit, a Monk of Canterbury (5).

She pretended also to be present at Henry the VIII's interview with the French King at Calais, and that God being displeas'd with King Henry, an angel, when he was at mats, took away the sacrament out of the Priest's hand invisibly, as he was going to administer it to the King, and gave it to her, being then invisibly present, and that she was immediately wafted over sea again to her monastery, as she had been carried from it (6).

In the chapel of St Giles in the monastery of Christ Church, Canterbury, she is said to have been particularly honoured by God with the sight of heavenly lights, the sound of celestial voices and melody, and sensation of unspeakable joys; to which chapel, she, by the peculiar command of God, is said oftentimes to have resorted (especially by night) to receive visions and revelations, the door of the dormitory, opening itself to her by the power of God, and not only to her, but to Dr Bocking and some others; however, her stealing forth of the dormitory by night, (which she did four or five times a week) was at last found not to be for spiritual business, nor to receive revelations of God, but rather for bodily communication and pleasure with her friends, who could not have so good leisure and opportunity with her in the day (7).

The books and papers wrote about her, mentioned the devil's having appeared to her, and tempted her in diverse forms and fashions, sometimes like a man wantonly dressed, &c. sometimes like a deformed bird, and sometimes in other shapes (8).

One of her prophecies or revelations was, that there was a root with three branches, and till they were plucked up, it should never be merry with England, interpreting the root to be the late Lord Cardinal, the first branch the King, the second, the Duke of Norfolk, and the third, the Duke of Suffolk (9).

[D] Among the rest were Sir Thomas More, and Bishop Fisher, who are by some reported (though falsely) to have been afterwards appointed by the King to examine her.] Sanders (10) has the following paragraph,

Quam sceminam, cum inter ceteros Roffensis & Morus diligenter examinasset, confessi sunt se nullo indicio deprehendere potuisse, eam fanatico spiritu (quod in ejus invidiam tunc spargebatur) agitatum fuisse: Unde et ipsi in suspicionem, apud Regem venerunt, quod cum illa sentirent, &c. — Which woman (speaking of the Holy Maid of Kent) when, among the rest, Bishop Fisher and More had carefully examined, they confessed, that they could not by any sign or token find out, that she was possessed by a fanatical spirit, (as was then reported in her dispraise) upon which they themselves, as agreeing with her in sentiments, became suspected by the King, &c. Stapleton (11) in his life of Sir Thomas More is still stronger in this respect; his words are these, 'Hujus rei invidia in Thomam Morum, qui illam jussu Regis examinaverat, devolvitur, quod præter examinationis tempora, secreto cum ipsam contulerit; quodque literas ad eam miserat, ad eaque acceperit: Jamque adeo accusatur, &c. — The blame of this affair turned chiefly on Sir Thomas More, who having examined her by the King's command, did nevertheless, after the time of examination was over, hold private conferences with her, writing and receiving letters from her, for which reason, &c.' Both these authors, but especially the last quoted, make Sir Thomas, as one among the rest, appointed by the King to examine her and her associates in this affair: But this seems highly improbable, for in the first place, we find no other circumstances in history to corroborate it; and in the next place, Sir Thomas, in his long letter of justification to Cromwell (in note K) tells us, the manner of his being brought acquainted with her, the several conferences, &c. he had with herself and her accomplices about her; but throughout all his letters in no way intimates any command he ever had to visit her, or inspect into the affair, which had it been true, besides being too material a point to be omitted by inadvertency, would have been too good an excuse, to have been passed by in silence; nay, the passage marked with an asterisk thus *, in his long letter (note K) indicates directly the contrary: — In this letter he acknowledges he had esteemed her highly, not so much out of any regard he had to her prophecies, but for the opinion he conceived of her holiness and humility; but he adds (12) that he was then convinced, that she was the most false, dissembling hypocrite, that had been known; and guilty of the most detestable hypocrisy, and devilish dissembled falsehood; he also believed that she had communication with an evil spirit, and had, we find by his other letters, as well as this, a very mean opinion of her, looking on her as a weak woman, and in discourse with his beloved daughter Roper, he commonly called her the Silly Nun (13): — And Fisher disowned her when the cheat was discovered, though he had given her too much encouragement before (14): See note [F] for Fisher's opinion of her, &c.

examine further into this affair (k). However, for all this piece of outward ceremony, Warham (as he was a violent, persecuting Papist) was not a little suspected, with some others, to have countenanced this imposture underhand. And if he was not really privy to the contrivance, he must have been most egregiously imposed on. For Fisher, in his letter of excuse to Cromwell (l), seems to throw the chief of his credit or belief in this affair, upon the testimonies and accounts he received from Warham; his words are these: 'Finally, my Lord of Canterbury, that then was both her Ordinary, and a man reputed of high wisdom and learning, told me that she had many great visions; and of him I learned greater things, than ever I heard of the nun herself, &c.' (*) Masters, and the rest (thus commissioned by Archbishop Warham) finding her upon examination a staunch Catholick, that they might reap some benefit from the noise her inspiration and revelations had made in the world, instructed her to say, in her counterfeit trances, that the Blessed Virgin had appeared to her, and that she never could recover, till she went and visited her image, in the famous chapel that was dedicated to her, and was called the Chapel of our Lady, of Court of Strete (†). Accordingly, the day being made publick that she intended to go and visit the image of the Virgin, a mob of above 3000 people gathered together to attend her there, as did likewise several persons of quality of both sexes, and the hopeful commissioners made a part of the solemn procession (m). At her entrance she was saluted in a hymn, with Ave Regina Cælorum; when she came before the image of our Lady, she fell down before it in one of her trances, delivering therein rhymes, speeches, &c. all tending to the honour of that Saint, and the Popish religion (n): she wished also that there was a singing Priest to attend the chapel; and said, that she herself was by the inspiration of God called to be a Religious; and that it was also the will of our Lady, that Bocking should be her Ghostly Father, but there were violent suspicions of her incontinency, and that Bocking was her carnal as well as spiritual Father (o). It was now given out, that she was, by the intercession of our Lady, miraculously recovered of her former distemper; and on the report made by the faithful commissioners, the Archbishop ordered the wench to be put into the nunnery of St Sepulchre's in Canterbury, where she feigned to have frequent returns of her former trances, visions, and revelations, working (as was pretended) many miracles, on all such as would but make a good profitable vow to our Lady, at Court at Strete. The design of the contrivance was now in some measure answered; the Priests had made plentiful gains of her, the Hermit thrived well on the offerings, and the convent was much pleased with the new Nun, who was in such great credit and vogue, that there were several books wrote, about her sanctity of life, visions, revelations, and prophecies [E]: and thus matters went glibly on for divers years together. But now the Roman clergy being apprehensive, that the King's marriage with Anna Bullen would prove very detrimental to their religion; they set every engine at work to prevent it, and among the rest, Bocking and her other associates were prevailed upon, to persuade her to menace the King, with death or the loss of his crown: she, puffed up with her former success, and the credit she bore in the world as to sanctity, &c. was hardy enough to be governed by this advice, and made no scruple to declare publickly, that God had revealed to her, that in case the King went on in the divorce, and married another wife while Queen Catherine was living, he should not be King of England a month longer, and in the reputation of Almighty God, not one hour longer, but should die a villain's death. This she said was revealed to her, in answer to the prayer she had put up to God, to know whether he approved of the King's proceedings or not (p). This coming to the ears of the Bishop of Rochester, and some others who adhered to the Queen's interests, they had frequent meetings with her and her accomplices [F], concealing

[E] That there were several book wrote about her sanctity of life, visions, revelations, and prophecies.] Among which books, one pamphlet contains twenty-four leaves, printed by Robert Red-Man, intituled, A marvellous work done of late at Court of Strete in Kent, and published to the devout people of their time for their consolation. John Deering, a Monk in the monastery of Christ-Church (says the act) made, wrote, or caused to be wrote, sundry books, both great and small, both printed and written, concerning the particularities of the false and feigned hypocrisy and revelations of Elizabeth Barton, in defence and great praise of the same: ——— And one Edward Thwaites, Gentleman, translated and wrote diverse quires and sheets of paper, concerning the said false, feigned revelations of the said Elizabeth: ——— And Thomas Laurence of Canterbury, being Register to the Archbishop, at the instance and desire, of the said Edward Bocking, wrote a great book of the false and feigned miracles and the revelations of the said Elizabeth in a fair hand, and ready to be a copy to the Printer; Laurence was also her interpreter to one of the Pope's Legates (15).

[F] This coming to the ears of the Bishop of Rochester, and some others who adhered to the Queen's interests, they had frequent meetings with her and her accomplices, &c.] Not to break into the life of Fisher*, and to avoid being tedious, we shall only give extracts of the two letters that passed between Cromwell and Fisher on this occasion, the original whereof may be found as in the margin. ——— Upon the first discovery of this cheat, Cromwell sent Fisher's brother to him, to reprove him, for his carriage in that affair, and to advise him to ask the King's pardon, for the encouragement he had given the Nun, which he was confident the King would grant him: But Fisher by letter (16) excused himself, and said, he had done nothing, but only tried whether her revelations were true or not? He confessed, that upon the reports he had heard, he was induced to have a high opinion of her; and that he had never discovered any falshood in her; it is true, she had said some things to him concerning the King's death, which he had not revealed; but he thought it was not necessary to do it; because he knew she had told it to the King herself. She had named no person that should kill the King, but had only denounced it as a judgment of God on him; and he had reason to think that the King would have been offended with him, if he had spoken of it to him; and so he desired to be no more troubled with that matter. Upon that, Cromwell wrote him a sharp letter (17), wherein he shewed him that he had proconcealing what she spoke concerning the King, and some of them gave such credit to what she said, that they practised on many others, to draw them from their allegiance, and prevailed with several of the fathers of the Nuns of Sion, and the Charter-House in London, and Shene, and of the Observants of Richmond, Canterbury, and Greenwich; and a great many other persons, which appeared, however, most signally at Greenwich [G]. Nor was this all; but the Fathers that were in the conspiracy, had agreed to publish these revelations in their sermons up and down the kingdom: for by Sir Thomas More's long letter, as well as by the act itself we find, that Rich, Rifby, and several other Monks and Friars, made it their business to travel up and down the countries, artfully introducing and insinuating themselves, not only to the commonalty, but into every family of note, and all degrees of men. Where they took an opportunity to report, in the most advantageous manner and terms, the hypocritical holiness, and feigned revelations, miracles, &c. of this imposture. By this means, poisoning and prepossessing the minds of the people, not only against the King's intended marriage; but against the King himself, declaiming against the wickedness of his life, and declaring, that he had abused the sword and authority committed to him by Almighty God; stirring up rebellion, withdrawing and absolving his subjects from their allegiance to him, by publicly preaching and declaring, that he was no longer King according to revelation. They had also given notice of these her prophecies to the Pope's Embassadors, and had the maid brought to declare her revelations to them; they also sent an account of them to Queen Catherine, to encourage her to stand out, and not submit to the laws (g). Of this confederacy Thomas Abel (r) was likewise one. The thing being now far from a secret, the King, who had hitherto despised it, thinking it now proper to take notice thereof, ordered that, in November 1533, the maid and her accomplices (Richard Master, Dr Bocking, Richard Deering, Henry Gold a parson in London, Hugh Rich an Observant Friar, Richard Rifby, Thomas Gold, and Edward Thwaites, gentlemen, and Thomas Laurence) should be brought into the Star-Chamber, where there was a numerous appearance of Lords, &c. Upon examination, they did all, without any rack or torture, confess the whole to be a contrivance and imposture [H], and were first sentenced to stand at St Paul's Cross, on a scaffold built on purpose for them, all sermon-time, and after sermon the King's officers was to give every one of them their bill of confession, to be opened and publicly read by each before the people, which was accordingly done the Sunday after; the Bishop of Bangor preaching, and giving an account of their treasonable practices to the audience. This publick manner was thought, upon good grounds, to be the best way to satisfy the people, of the imposture of the whole affair, and it did very much convince them, that the ceeded rashly in that affair, being so partial in the matter of the King's divorce, that he easily believed every thing that seemed to make against it; he shewed him also, how necessary it was to use great caution before extraordinary things should be received, or spread about as revelations; since otherwise the peace of the world would be in the hands of every bold and crafty impostor; yet, in the conclusion, he advised him again to ask the King's pardon for his rashness, and he assures him, that the King was ready to forgive that and every thing else by which he had offended him. But Fisher was obstinate and would make no submission, and so was included within the act, yet it was not executed till a new provocation drew him into further trouble.

[G] This appeared most signally at Greenwich. Where the King chiefly resided in the summer, for one Peto, an Observant, being to preach in the King's chapel, denounced heavy judgments upon him to his face. His text was the Prophet Elijah's reproof of Abab; where the fate of that Prince is denounced in these words: In the place where dogs licked the blood of Naboth, shall dogs lick thy blood, even thine. Peto quickly discovered his meaning in taking this text, and drove the application strong upon the King; he told him, notwithstanding the countenance and opinion of learned men, his second marriage was altogether unlawful, and as for himself, he was resolved, like Micajah, to deliver some unacceptable truths, tho' he was sensible, he should suffer for his plain-dealing, but pretended a divine commission for his freedom; upon presumption of this warrant, he told the King, his Highness was furnished with a great many Preachers to justify his marriage with Mrs Boleyn; but that these were men of no sincerity, that courted the King's fancy, and applied to his inclination for wealth and promotion in the Church: These were extraordinary fallies, however, the King bore the reprimand with great temper, and suffered Peto to go off without trouble (18).

[H] And upon examination, did all, without any rack or torture, confess the whole to be a contrivance and imposture.] Sanders nevertheless has the following encomiums on her, calling her and those that suffered with her, Martyrs; his words are, 'Celebre erat his diebus Elizabethæ Bartonæ Monialis, nomen, quæ propter samam sanctitatis, Virgo sancta Cantiana, vulgo appellabatur. Hæc asserbat Henricum non amplius jam esse Regem, eo quod ex Deo non regnaret, Mariam vero Catherinæ filiam, quæ tunc minus legitime nata habebatur, ad Regni gubernacula suo jure fessuram esse: Ob quæ verba in jus vocata & in publicis regni comitiis una cum cæteris—(qui omnes eam Spiritu Dei afflatam credentes) capitis condemnata fuit, & post ludibria publica, omnes constanter supplicium ultimum subierunt, &c. (19)—— Much about this time, Elizabeth Barton, the Nun, was in great esteem, who was so highly famed for her sanctity as to acquire the title of the Holy Nun of Kent. She affirmed that Henry the eighth was no longer King, because he did not now reign of God*, and that Mary, the daughter of Catherine, tho' then esteemed illegitimate, should succeed by her own right to the government of the kingdom; on account of which words she was, with her accomplices, accused in Parliament, and there with them, who all believed her inspired by the Holy Ghost, condemned to die; which, after having been publicly exposed, they all did with great constancy.'

(19) Sanderus de Schismate Anglicano, p. 106.

(*) Alluding to her Prophecy.

Upon this paragraph of Mr Sanders's, Burnet has the following evident remarks, viz. First, that her associates knew she was not inspired, and that all that was given out about her was a contrivance of theirs, who had instructed her to play such tricks as was proved by their own confessions and other evidences. Sanders also says, 'that they all died with great constancy; and in the margin calls them seven Martyrs.'—— Now the Nun herself acknowledged the imposture at her death, and laid the heaviest weight of it on the Priests that suffered with her, who had taught her the cheat; so that they died both for treason and imposture; and this being Sanders's faith, as appears by his works, they were indeed martyrs for it (20).

the cause must needs be bad, where such methods were used to support it (s). From thence they were carried to the Tower, where they lay till the meeting of the Parliament, during which time, some of their accomplices sent messages to the Nun, to encourage her to deny all that she had said, and it is very probable, that the reports that went abroad, of her being forced or cheated into a confession, made the King think it necessary to proceed more severely against her. The thing being brought before, and considered in Parliament (t), it was judged a conspiracy against the King's life and crown, and the Nun, Masters, Bocking, Deering, Rich, Ribby, and Henry Gold, were attainted of high-treason; and Fisher Bishop of Rochester, Thomas Gold, Thomas Laurence, Edward Thwaites, John Adeson, and Thomas Abel, were judged guilty of misprision of treason, and to forfeit their goods and chattels to the King, and to be imprisoned during his pleasure (u). But in the conclusion of the act, all others who had been corrupted in their allegiance, by these impostures, except the persons abovenamed, were, at the earnest intercession of Queen Anne, (as it is expressed in the act) pardoned. On the reading the bill about them the third time, on the sixth of March, the Lords addressed the King to know his pleasure, whether Sir Thomas More, and others mentioned in the act as accomplices, or at least as concealers, might not be heard for themselves in the Star-Chamber (*). By this we find, Sir Thomas More was at first inserted in the bill of attainder, and though the King was at last, with some difficulty, prevailed upon to let his name be erased, yet he was nevertheless so highly displeased with him for the conference and correspondence he had carried on with the Nun herself, and her accomplices, that this was afterwards laid hold on, and made the ground-work of his ruin [I]. And yet the care and caution he used in this affair was very extraordinary, and his grandson says (w), 'that he demeaned himself so discreetly in all his talk with her, that he deserved no blame, but rather great commendation, as was afterwards evidently proved, when it was fore laid to his charge.' The same was also very conspicuous from his letter of justification to Secretary Cromwell, which lays open the artifices, by which he was drawn in to have so high an opinion of her, as he at first had, as also that he was at last thoroughly convinced of the forgery and imposture of the whole; but as this letter contains several remarkable passages of the Nun herself, and will give some light into her character and genius, as well as into those of the clergy that adhered to the interest of the Court of Rome, we thought it not improper to give it at length, as below in note [K]. Soon after the

[I] The King was at last, with some difficulty prevailed upon, that no bill of attainder should pass against him, he was nevertheless highly displeased with him, &c. that it was made the ground-work of his ruin. 'Now after the report made of this their examination of Sir Thomas to the King, by the Lord Chancellor and the rest, King Henry was so highly displeased with Sir Thomas More, that he plainly told them, that he was resolutely determined that the aforesaid Parliament bill should undoubtedly pass against them. Yet to this the Lord High Chancellor and the rest said, that they had perceived that all the Upper-House, was so powerfully bent to hear Sir Thomas speak in his own defence, that if he were not put out of the bill, it would be utterly overthrown, and have no force against the rest; which words although the King heard them speak, yet needs would he have his own will therein, adding, that he would be personally present himself at the passing of it. But Lord Audley and the rest, among whom was Cromwell*, seeing him so violently bent upon it, fell down on their knees, and besought his Majesty not to do so; considering, that if in his own presence he should be confronted and receive an overthrow, it would not only encourage his subjects ever after to contemn him, but also rebound to his dishonour for ever throughout Christendom; and they doubted not in time, but to find some other fitter matter against him; for in this case of the Nun, they said all men accounted him so clear and innocent, that for his behaviour therein, every one reckoned him rather worthy of praise than of reproof; at which words of theirs, the King, at their earnest persuasion, was contented to condescend to their petition; yet was not his displeasure against Sir Thomas More any whit abated, but much more incensed (21). Sir Thomas, however, wrote a letter to the King upon that occasion, to this effect (22).

He clears himself of having any communication with the Maid of Kent to the King's displeasure (23); and for this he refers his Majesty to his long letter lately written to Secretary Cromwell; he takes the freedom to tell the King, that if he should miscarry and fall under the forfeiture of the Law, either by bill of attainder or otherwise, he should have the satisfaction, after his own short life, and the King's long one (as he wishes it) was over, after this he said, he should have the satisfaction to meet his Highness once again, and be merry with him in Heaven, where among other pleasures, this would be one, that his Majesty would clearly see there, whatever his opinion might be now, that he had always been his faithful subject. In the close of the letter he desires the King, that no bill of attainder may pass against him, because it must be drawn upon untrue suggestions, misreport him to the world, and stick a blemish upon his memory.

Right Worshipful,

AFTER my most hearty recommendations, with like thanks for your goodness, in accepting my rude long letter; I perceive that of your farther goodness and favour towards me, it liked your Masterhip to break with my son Roper, of that, that I had had communication, not only of divers that had acquaintance with the lewd Nun of Canterbury, but also with herself; and had over that, by my writing declaring favour towards her, given her advice and counsel; of which my demeanour, that it liked you to be content to take the labour and the pain to hear, by myne own writing, the truth, I very heartily thank you, and reckon myself therein right deeply beholden to you.

It is, I suppose, about eight or nine years ago, sith I heard of that house-wife first, at which time the Bishop of Canterbury, that then was, God assyl his soul, sent unto the King's Grace a roll of paper, in which were written certain words of hers, that she had, as report was then made, at sundry times spoken in her trances; whereupon it pleased the King's Grace, to deliver me the roll, commanding me to look thereon, and afterwards shew him what I thought therein; whereunto at another time, when his Highness asked me, I told him, in good faith, I found nothing in these words, that I could any thing regard or esteem; for seeing that some part fell in rhyme, and that, God wot, full rude also, for any reason God wots that I saw therein; a right simple woman, might, in my mind, speak it of her own wit, well enough:

the condemnation of these delinquents, viz. on the twenty-first of April (), the Nun, and Bocking, () Several authors have it the twentieth of April.

‘ Howbeit, I said, because it was constantly reported for a truth, God wrought in her, and that a miracle was shewed upon her, I durst not nor would not be bold, in judging the matter; and the King’s Grace, some thought, esteemed the matter as light, as after it proved lowd.

‘ From that time till about Christmas was twelve-month, albeit that there was continually much talking of her, and her holiness, I never heard of any talk rehearsed, either of revelation of her’s or miracles, saving that I heard divers times in my Lord Cardinal’s days, that she had been both with his Lordship and with the King’s Grace, but what she said either to the one or the other, upon my faith I never heard any one word. Now, as I was about to tell you, about Christmas was twelve-month, Father Risby, Friar Observant, then of Canterbury, lodged one night at mine house, where, after supper, a little before he went to his chamber, he fell in communication with me of the Nun, giving her commendation of holiness, and that it was wonderful to see and understand the works that God wrought in her; which thing I answered, that I was glad to hear it, and thanked God thereof: Then he told me that she had been with my Lord Legate in his life, and with the King’s Grace too, and that she had told my Lord Legate a revelation of her’s of three swords, that God had put into my Lord Legate’s hand, which if he ordered not well, God would put it fore to his charge; the first he said was, the ordering the spirituality under the Pope as Legate; the second, rule he bore, in order of the temporality under the King as his Chancellor; and the third he said was, the meddling he was put in trust with by the King, concerning the great matter of his marriage; and therewithal, I said unto him, that any revelation of the King’s matters, I would not hear of. I doubt not but the goodness of God should direct his Highness with his grace and wisdom, that the thing should take such end as God should be pleased with, to the King’s honour and the surety of the realm: When he heard me say these words or the like, he said unto me, that God had specially commanded her to pray for the King; and forthwith he break again into her revelations concerning the Cardinal, that his soul was to be saved by her mediation and without any other communication went into his chamber; and he and I never talked any more of any such manner of matter; nor since his departing on the morrow, I never saw him afterwards to my remembrance, till I saw him at St Paul’s Cross.

‘ After this, about Shrove-tide, there came unto me a little before supper, Father Rich, Fryar Observant of Richmond; and as we fell in talking, I asked him of Father Risby, how he did? Upon that occasion he asked me, whether Father Risby had any thing shewed me of the holy Nun of Kent? And I said yea; and that I was very glad to hear of her virtue; I would not, quoth he, tell you again what you have heard of him already; but I have heard and known many great graces that God hath wrought in her, and in other folk by her, which I would gladly tell you, if I thought you had not heard them already; and therewith he asked me, whether Father Risby had told me any thing of her being with my Lord Cardinal? And I said yea; then he told you (quoth he) of the three swords; yea verily, quoth I: Did he tell you (quoth he) of the revelations she had concerning the King’s Grace? Nay forsooth, (quoth I) nor if he would have done, I would not have given him the hearing: Nor verily, no more I would indeed; for fith he have been with the King’s Grace herself, and told him, methought it a thing needfuls to tell me, or any man else: And when Father Risby perceived, that I would not hear her revelation concerning the King’s Grace, he talked on a little of her virtue, and let her revelations alone; and therewith my supper was set upon the board, where I required him to sit with me; but he would in no wise stay, but departed to London. After that night I talked with him twice; once in mine own house, another time in his own garden at the Fryars, at every time a great space, but not of any revelations touching the King’s Grace,

‘ but only of other mean folk I know not of whom; which things, some were very strange, and some were very childish. But albeit that he said he had seen her lie in a trance in great pains, and that he had at other times taken great spiritual comfort in her communication; yet did he never tell me that she had told him those tales herself; for if he had, I would for the tale of Mary Magdalene, which he told me, and for the tale of the hostie, which I have heard she hath said, she was houseled at the King’s mass at Calice; if I had heard it of him, as told unto himself by her mouth for a revelation, I would have both liked him and her the worse. But whether ever I heard the same tale of Rich or of Risby, or of neither of them both, but of some other man, since she was in hold, in good faith I cannot tell; but I wot well, when and wherefoever I heard it, methought it a tale too marvellous to be true, and very likely that she had told some man of her dream; who told it out for a revelation; and, in effect, I little doubted but that some of those tales that were told of her were untrue; but yet, since I never heard them reported as spoken by her mouth, I thought nevertheless, that many of them might be true, and she be a virtuous woman too; as some lies be peradventure virtuous of some that be Saints in Heaven, and yet many miracles indeed done by them for all that.

‘ After this, I being upon a day at Sion, and talking with divers of the Fathers together at the grate, they shewed me that she had been with them, and shewed me divers things, that some of them misliked in her, and in this talking they wished I had spoken with her, and said, they would fain see how I should like her: Whereupon afterwards when I heard she was there again, I came thither to see her and to speak with her herself. At which communication had in a little chappell, there were none present but we two; in the beginning were I shewed, that my coming to her was not of any curious mind, any thing to know of such thing as folks talked that it pleased God to reveal and shew unto her; but for the great virtue I had heard for many years, every day more and more spoken and reported of her, I therefore had a great mind to see her and be acquainted with her, that she might have somewhat the more occasion to remember me to God in her devotion and prayers; whereunto she gave me a good virtuous answer, that as God did of his goodness far better by her than she, a poor wretch, was worthy; so she feared, that many folks yet besides that, spoke of their own favourable minds many things for her far above the truth; and that of me, she had many such things heard, that already she prayed for me, and ever would, whereof I heartily thanked her. I said unto her, Madam, one Hellen, a maid at Tottenham, of whose trances and revelations, there hath been much talking, she hath been with me of late, and shewed me that she was with you; and that after the rehearsing of such visions as she had seen, you shewed her that they were no revelations, but plain illusions of the Divil, and advised her to cast them out of her mind; and verily she gave therein good credit unto you, and thereupon hath left to lean any longer to such visions of her own, whereupon she sayeth, she findeth your words true; for ever since she has been the less visited with such things, as she was wont to be before: To this, the answered me, forsooth, Sir, there is in this point no praise unto me; but the goodness of God, as it appears, hath wrought much meekness in her soul, which hath taken my rude warning so well, and not grudged to hear her spirit and her visions reprov’d. I liked her, in good faith, better for this answer, than for many of those things that I heard reported of her. Afterwards she told me, upon that occasion, how great need folk have that are visited with such visions, to take heed, and provc well of what spirit they come of; and in that communication she told me, that of late the Divil, in the likeness of a bird, was flying and fluttering about her in her chamber, and suffered himself to be taken, and being in hands, suddenly changed in their sight that were present, unto such a strange, ugly-fashioned bird, that they were all afraid, and threw him out at a window.

Bocking, Masters, Deering, Risby, and Gold, (Rich is not named, being perhaps dead or

‘ For conclusion, we talked no word of the King’s Grace, nor any great personages else, nor in effect, of any man or woman, but of herself and myself; but after no long communication had, for as soon as ever we met, my time came to go home, I gave her a double ducat, and prayed her to pray for me and mine, and so departed from her, and never spake with her after. Howbeit, of a truth I had a great, good opinion of her, and had her in great estimation, as you shall perceive by the letter I wrote unto her: For afterwards, because I had often heard, that many right worshipful folks, as well men as women, used to have much communication with her; and many folks are of nature inquisitive and curious, whereby they fall sometimes into such talking, as better were to forbear, of which things I nothing thought, while I talked with her of charity; therefore I wrote her a letter thereof, which, sith it may be peradventure that she brake or lost, I shall insert the very copy thereof in this present letter, these were the very words.

‘ AFTER most hearty commendations, I shall beseech you to take my good mind in good worth; and pardon me, that I am so homely, as of myself unrequired, and also without necessity, to give counsel to you, of whom, for thy good inspirations and great revelations, that it liketh Almighty God of his goodness, to give and shew to many wife and well learned, and very virtuous folk, testify, I myself have need, for the comfort of my soul, to require and ask advice; for surely, good Madam, sith it pleaseth God sometimes to suffer such as are far under, and of little estimation, to give yet fruitful advertisement to such as are in the light of the Spirit far above them, that there were between them no comparison, as he suffered his prophet Moses to be, in some things, advised and counselled by Jethro; I cannot, for the love that in our Lord I bear you, refrain to put you in remembrance of one thing, which, in my poor mind, I think highly necessary to be by your wisdom considered, referring to the end and the order thereof, to God and his Holy Spirit to direct you. Good Madam, I doubt not but you remember, that, in the beginning of my communication with you, I shewed you that I never was, nor would be curious of any knowledge of other mens matters; and least of all of any matter of Princes, or of the realm, in case it so were that God had, as to many folks beforetime, he hath any time revealed unto you such things; I said unto your Ladyship, I was not only not desirous to hear of, but also would not hear of. Now, Madam, I consider well, that many folk desire to speak with you, which was not all, peradventure, of my mind, in this point, but some hap to be curious and inquisitive of things that little pertain unto their parts; and some might, peradventure, hap to talk of such things as might afterwards turn to much harm, as I think you have heard how the late Duke of Buckingham, moved with some one who was reputed a holy Monk, and had such talking with him, as after was a great part of his destruction, and disinheriting of his blood, and great slander and infamy of religion. It suffices me, good Madam, to put you in remembrance of such things, as I nothing doubt your wisdom, and the Spirit of God shall keep you from talking with any person, especially with high persons of such manner and things, as pertain to Princes affairs or the state of the realm, but only to commune and talk with any person, high or low, of such a manner of things, as may to the soul be profitable for you to shew, and for them to know. And thus my good Lady, and dearly beloved Sister in our Lord, I make an end of this my needless advertisement unto you, whom the Blessed Trinity preserve and increase in grace, and put in your mind to recommend me and mine unto him in your devout prayer.

‘ THOMAS MORE, Kt.

‘ At the receipt of this letter, she answered my fervant, that she heartily thanked me: Soon after this, there came to mine house the Prior of the Charter-House at Sheen, and one Brother Williams with him, who nothing talked to me but of her, and of the great joy they took in her virtue, but of any of her revelations they had no communication; but at another time Brother Williams came unto me, with a long tale of her being at the house of a Knight in Kent, that was fore troubled with temptations to destroy himself; and none other thing we talked of, nor could have done of likelihood, though we had tarried together much longer, he took so great pleasure, good man, to tell the tale with all the circumstances at length. When I came again another day to Sion, on a day in which there was profession, some of the Fathers asked me how I liked the said Nun, and I answered,* that in good faith I liked her very well in her talking; howbeit, quoth I, she’s never the nearer tried by that, for, I assure you, she were likely to be very bad if she seemed good, e’er I should think her other, till she happened to be proved naught; and, in good faith, that is my manner indeed, except I were fet to search and examine the truth, upon likelihood of some cloaked evil; for in that case, although I nothing suspected the person myself, yet no less than if I suspected him so, I would, as far as my wit would serve me, search to find out the truth, as you yourself hath done very prudently in this matter, wherein you have done in my mind, to your great laud and praise, a very meritorious deed, in bringing forth to light such detestable hypocrisy, whereby every other wretch may take warning, and be feared to set forth their own devilish dissembled falsehoods, under the manner and colour of the wonderful work of God; for verily this woman so handled herself, with the help of that evil spirit that inspired her, that, after her own confession declared at Paul’s Cross, when I sent word by my fervant to the Prior of the Charter-House, that she was undoubtedly proved a false deceiving hypocrite, the good man had had so good opinion of her so long, that he could at the first scarcely believe me therein; howbeit, it was not he alone that thought her so very good, but many another right good man besides, as little marvel was, upon so good report, till she was proved naught: I remember me farther, that in communication with Father Rich and me, I counselled him, that in such strange things as concerned such folk as had come unto her, to whom, as she said, she had told the causes of their coming, e’er themselves spake thereof, and such good fruit, as they said, that many men had received by her prayer, he and such other so reported it, and thought that the knowledge thereof should much return to the glory of God, should first cause the things to be well and sure examined by the Ordinary, and such as had authority thereunto, so that it might be surely known whether the things were true or not, and that there were no letters intermixt among them, or else the letters might after hap to aweigh the credence of the things that were true; and when he told me the tale of Mary Magdalen, I said unto him, Father Rich, that she is a good virtuous Woman in good faith I hear so many folk so report, that I verily think it true, and think it well likely, that God wrought some good and great things by her; but yet are you wot well these strange tales no part of our Creed, and therefore, before you see them surely proved, you shall have my poor counsel not to wed yourself so far forth to the credence of them, as to report them very surely for true, least that if it should hap, that they were afterwards proved false, it might minish your estimation in your preaching, whereof might grow great loss; to this he thanked me for my counsel, but how he used it after, that I cannot tell.

‘ Thus have I, good Mr Cromwell, fully declared to you, as far as myself can call to remembrance, all that ever I have done or said in this matter; wherein I am sure, that not one of them all shall tell you any further thing of effect; for if any of them, or any man else, report of them, as I trust verily no man will, I wot well, truly no man can, any word or deed by me spoken or done, touching any breach of my or (y) pardoned) were drawn to Tyburn, where the Nun made a speech, as in the note (y) Hall's Chron. below, acknowledging her crime, and the justness of her sentence [L], and was then executed with her abovenamed five accomplices, who were all beheaded, and their heads set up in different parts of the town; as to the Nun's head, Stowe informs us, that was set upon London-Bridge.

' my legal truth and duty towards my most redoubted Sovereign and natural liege Lord; I will come to mine answer, and make it good, in such wise as becometh a true poor man to do, that whosoever any such thing shall say, shall therein say untrue; for I neither in this matter have done evil or said evil, nor so much as any evil thing thought, but only have been glad and rejoiced of them that were reported for good, which condition I shall nevertheless keep toward all other good folk, for the false cloaked hypocrisy of any of these, no more than I shall esteem Judas the true Apostle for Judas the false Traytor.

' But so propose I to bear myself in every man's company while I live, that neither good man or bad, neither Monk, Fryar, nor Nun, nor other man or woman in this world, shall make me digress from my truth and faith either towards God, or towards my natural Prince, by the grace of Almighty God; and as you therein find me true, so I heartily therein pray you to continue toward me your favour and good will, as you shall be sure of my poor daily prayer, for other pleasures can I not do you; and may the Blessed Trinity, both bodily and ghostly, long preserve and prosper you.

' I pray you pardon me that I write not unto you of mine own hand-writing, for verily I am compelled to forbear writing for a while, by reason of this disease of mine, whereof the chief occasion is grown, as it is thought, by the stooping and leaning on my breast that I have used in writing; and thus oftfoons I beseech our Lord long to preserve you.'

Concerning this Letter, a curious discovery has been made, viz. that Rastal, who published Sir Thomas More's works in Queen Mary's time, and among them other letters of his to Cromwell relating to that long one, which he wrote concerning the Nun, were printed, but that long one was left out, though More refers to it in all his following letter, which is a little unac-countable, viz. that the referring letters should be preserved, and the original letter, referred to in all the others, suppressed—but it is highly probable this was done on purpose, and with design; for in Queen Mary's time they had a mind to magnify that story of the Nun and canonize her, since she was thought to have suffered on her mother's account, and was called a Martyr to her mother's marriage, and there was no want of miracles to justify it; therefore a letter so plain and full against her was thought fit to be kept out of the way; and that one of their Martyrs might not lessen the esteem of another, it was thought fit to suppress it: This, however, Burnet acknowledges to be only a conjecture, leaving it to the judgment of the reader to determine (23).

[L] The Nun made a speech, acknowledging her crime and the justness of her sentence. Her dying words, as recorded in Hall's Chronicle, are, Hither I am come to die, and I have not only been the cause of mine own death, which most justly I have deserved, but also I am the cause of the death of all those persons which at this time here suffer; and yet to say the truth I am not to be blamed, considering that it was well known to these learned men, that I was a poor wench without learning, and therefore they might easily have perceived, that the things that were done by me could not proceed in no such sort; but their capacities and learning could right well judge from whence they proceeded, and that they were altogether feigned; but because the thing which I have feigned was profitable to them, therefore they much praised me, and bore me in hand, that it was the Holy Ghost, and not I, that did them; and then I, being puffed up with their praises, fell into a certain pride and foolish fantasie with myself, and thought I might feign what I would, which thing hath brought me to this case; and for which now I cry God and the King's Highness most heartily mercy, and desire you all good people to pray God to have mercy on me, and on all them that suffer here (24).

BARWICK (JOHN) an eminent English divine in the XVIIth century, and Dean of St Paul's. He was born at Witherflack, a little village in Westmoreland, the twentieth of April, 1612 (a). His father's name was George Barwick, and his mother's, Jane Barrow. They were far from being considerable either for rank or riches, but were otherwise both of them persons of great merit, and remarkably happy in their family [A]. John was the third son, and his parents intended him from his childhood for the Church. In his nonage he went to school in the neighbourhood, and lost much time under masters deficient alike in diligence and in learning. At length he was sent to Sedberg school in Yorkshire, where, under the care of a tolerable master, he gave early marks both of genius and piety (b) [B]. In the year 1631, and the eighteenth of his own age, he was admitted

[A] Persons of great merit and remarkably happy in their family. Mr George Barwick was descended of a very antient family of that name in Lancashire. The village of Wetherflack, where his small estate lay, is about six or seven miles from Kendal in Westmoreland, but is considerably nearer the borders of Lancashire. Old Mr Barwick was a great oeconomist, and, though he bred up a large family, made a handsome figure, and did a great deal of good in the neighbourhood where he dwelt. He was blessed with five sons who lived to mens estate, besides one who died young. Nicholas and William, the two eldest, settled in the country, each having a farm; Nicholas that which descended from his ancestors; and William another purchased by his father. John and Peter we have particularly accounted for, and as for the youngest, Edward, he was bred a Herald-Painter, and became a very eminent man in his profession; as well as very remarkable for his loyalty and steady courage, as will be observed in the course of this life (1).

[B] He gave early marks both of genius and piety. The master of this school at that time was Mr Gilbert Nelson, who, we are told, taught his scholars Latin very well, and Greek indifferently. Dr Peter Barwick says, 'He was a very pleasant, facetious man, and by his

' merry comments rendered so very agreeable, what uses to give most uneasiness in learning, that his scholars became fond of their books tho' never so hard. They were wonderfully delighted, when he undertook to explain any of the dramatick Poets, particularly Terence or Plautus; for whatsoever in them seemed difficult to the weaker capacity of the boys, he expounded with so much wit and merriment, that all who had the least ingenuity were extremely in love with that sort of learning. In order also more clearly and thoroughly to explain the meaning of those Poets, whether Comedians or Tragedians, he used to teach such of his scholars as he found fit for it, to reach the stage now and then for their diversion, and act the several parts of those plays; without which kind of knowledge he knew he might fit them for the lives of Monks or Hermits, but not to bear any offices in the state, or perform the duties of civil life. Among such as were most skilful in acting plays, he took greatest delight in John Barwick, and was mightily pleased to see him act so much to the life, the part of Hercules raving in the tragedy, as to gain the applause of all the spectators. This shewed that our young scholar had now laid aside all childish sports, and was fit to converse with men before he admitted of St John's College at Cambridge, under the tuition of Mr Thomas Fothergill, who proved at once a guardian and a preceptor, supplying his necessities as well as instructing him in learning (c). By this gentleman's help Mr Barwick quickly distinguished himself to such a degree in his college, that when a dispute arose about the election of a Master, which at last came to such a height as to be heard before the Privy-Council, the college chose Mr Barwick, then little above twenty, to manage for them, by which he not only became very conspicuous in the university, but was also taken notice of at court, and by the Ministry, who in those days were encouragers of learning (d). In 1635 he became Bachelor of Arts while these affairs were still depending [C]. April the fifth, 1636, he was created Fellow without opposition, though a party was already formed against him in the college by such as were inclined to Puritanism. In 1638 he took the degree of Master of Arts. When the civil war broke out, and the King wrote a letter to the university, acquainting them that he was in extreme want, Mr Barwick concurred with those loyal persons who first sent him a small supply in money, and afterwards their college plate (e), and upon information had, that Mr Cromwell, afterwards the Protector, lay with a party of foot at a place called Lowler Hedges, between Cambridge and Huntingdon, in order to make himself master of this small treasure, Mr Barwick made one of the party of horse, which conveyed it through by-roads safely to Nottingham, where his Majesty had set up his standard (f). By this act of loyalty the Parliament was so provoked, that they sent Cromwell with a body of troops to quarter in the university, where they committed such outrages, as would scarce have been credible in succeeding times, if Mr Barwick, in conjunction with many other learned members of that celebrated society, had not transmitted an authentick account of them to posterity (g) [D]. Mr Barwick also published another piece against the Covenant, and having thereby provoked such as were then in power, he thought proper to retire to London, there to render all the service that he was able to the royal cause (h) [E]. Soon after he settled there, he was intrusted with the management of the King's most private concerns, and carried on with great secrecy a constant correspondence between London and Oxford, where the King's head quarters then were. A nice and arduous employment, and for which there never was a man perhaps better fitted, than he. For with great modesty, and

'left school; for Hercules's buskins (as the proverb says) are not fit for children. But he never suffered these diversions to interrupt the steady course of piety, to which he had been remarkably accustomed from his childhood; for I remember when at a break-up for Easter holidays, he came home from school, (as is usual at those great festivals) he spent all Good-Friday at church in devotion, suitable to that solemn occasion; when every one else came home after morning prayer, and went not to church again till evening service (2).'

(2) Vit. Johan. Barwick, p. 6, 7.

[C] While these affairs were still depending. The author of the English translation of Dr Barwick's Life, seems to be a good deal embarrassed as to the chronology of this fact, Dr Gwin, the old master, died in June 1633, upon which a struggle followed between Dr Lane and Mr Holdsworth, wherein though the latter is thought to have had a clear majority of legal votes, yet it was held most for the peace of the University to set both candidates aside; and, in consequence of this expedient, Dr Beale was admitted Master the 20th of February 1633-4 (3). Now the difficulty lies here, Mr Barwick at this time was not so much as Bachelor of Arts, nor is there any entry in the college books, of his being appointed Professor for the society upon this occasion. I am therefore inclined to believe, there might be a subsequent hearing before the Council, in relation to the settlement of St John's college, at which Mr Barwick might assist. Dr Holdsworth was soon after Master of Emanuel-college, and both Dr Beale and he were ejected by the Parliament (4).

'did at that time expose these venerable persons to sale, and would actually have sold them for slaves, if any would have bought them (5).' Sir William Dugdale carries this still farther, he says, 'That this Mr Alexander Rigby, twice moved the House of Commons, that those Lords and Gentlemen, who were prisoners for being malignants, should be sold as slaves to Algiers, or sent to the new plantations in the West-indies, because he had contracted with two Merchants for that purpose (6).' Dr Fuller, who was a very cautious writer, and rather inclined to favour, than to exaggerate the proceedings of these people, is pleased to own, that soldiers were quartered in their colleges, their chapels abused, their bridges broken down, materials for building taken away, Jesus-college grove cut down, and a noble collection of antient coins belonging to St John's college, sold by weight for twenty-two pounds (7). Such was the effects of some mens zeal for liberty and reformation! But the best and most authentick account of this persecution, because written at the time, and wherein our author had a large share, is intituled, Querela Cantabrigienfis, or the University of Cambridge's Complaint, at the end of which there is a list of the Heads and Fellows, &c. ejected and plundered, &c.

[E] All the service he was able to the royal cause. The title of this piece at large runs thus: Certain Disquisitions and Considerations, representing to the Conscience the Unlawfulness of the Oath intituled, A Solemn League and Covenant for Reformation, &c. as also the Insufficiency of the Arguments used in the Exhortation for taking the said Covenant. Published by Command. Oxford 1644. It contains forty-nine pages in quarto, besides the Printer's postscript to the reader. It seems this was but the second impression, for the first was discovered, and the greatest part of it burnt. The learned persons who joined with our author in composing this piece, were Mr William Lacy of St John's college, Mr Isaac Barrow of Peter-house, Mr Seth Ward of Sidney-college, Mr Edmund Baldero, and Mr William Quarles of Pembroke-hall, and that incomparable disputant against the Schismatics, Mr Peter Gunning of Clare hall, each of whom took his particular share of this Covenant to confute, and bringing his part of the work to Mr Gunning's chamber, there they all conferred, and agreed upon the whole (8).

a temper naturally meek, he had a cool settled courage, and so much prudence and sagacity, that as, on the one hand, he never wanted presence of mind, so, on the other, he was never at a loss for expedients (i). He lived upon his first coming to town with Dr Morton, then Bishop of Durham, at Durham-house, which being an old spacious Building, afforded him great conveniences for hiding his papers (k), and at the same time his residence with that prelate as his chaplain, countenanced his remaining in London. One great branch of his employment, was the bringing back to their duty some eminent persons who had been misled by the fair pretences of some of the great speakers in the long Parliament. Amongst those who were thus reclaimed by the care of this religious and loyal gentleman, were Sir Thomas Middleton and Colonel Roger Pope, both persons of great credit with the party, and both very sincere converts [F]. By his application likewise Mr Cresset was convinced of his errors, and became a useful associate in the dangerous employment of managing the King's intelligence (l) [G]. Even after the King's affairs became desperate, Mr Barwick still maintained his correspondence, and when his Majesty was in the hands of the army, Mr Barwick had frequent admittance to him, and received his verbal orders, which he executed both punctually and successfully. To perform his duty the more effectually, he had the King's express command to lay aside his clerical habit, and in the dress of a private gentleman, with his sword by his side, he remained without suspicion in the army, and gave the King the truest lights possible as to the humour both of officers and soldiers, till all intelligence of this sort became unnecessary, by the army's throwing off all pretences to loyalty, and even shew of tenderness towards the King's person. When his Majesty came to be confined in Carisbrook Castle, in the Isle of Wight, so closely, that guards were posted at all the avenues to his chamber, and even at his windows, to prevent his having any correspondence, Mr Cresset; who was placed about him, through the dexterous management of Mr Barwick, defeated all their diligence, and preserved his Majesty a free intercourse with his friends: For this purpose he first deposited with Mr Barwick a cypher, and then hid a copy of it in a crack of the wall in the King's chamber. By the help of this cypher the King both wrote and read many letters every week, all of which passed through the hands of Mr Barwick (m). He likewise was concerned in a very well laid design for procuring the King's escape, which however was unluckily disappointed [H]. These labours, though they were very fatiguing, did not hinder him from undertaking still greater, for when Mr Holder, who had managed many correspondencies for the King, was discovered and imprisoned, he had so much spirit and address as to procure admittance to, and a conference with him, whereby his cyphers and papers were preserved, and Mr Barwick charged himself

[F] Both very sincere converts. This Sir Thomas Middleton of Chirk-Castle in Denbighshire, had been a Colonel under the Earl of Essex, but was afterwards eminently loyal, which so far irritated General Lambert, that he pulled his fine feat quite down to the ground. John Middleton, Esq; of Chirk-Castle, is the grandson of this gentleman. As for Colonel Roger Pope, he soon after died of the plague, and upon this occasion, Mr Barwick performed an act of piety worthy of immortal memory. The Colonel it seems was under great trouble of mind, and exceedingly desirous of receiving the sacrament, but at the same time afraid of sending for any Clergyman on account of his infectious distemper. Mr Barwick being informed of this, tho' he never had either the measles or small-pox, went immediately to assist his dying friend, and remained with him till he had yielded his last breath (9).

[G] Managing the King's intelligence. This gentleman had lived long in the Bishop of Durham's family, and afterwards entered into the service of the Earl of Pembroke, who made so great a figure on the side of the Parliament. He found it impracticable to bring his Lord to a better way of thinking, and was therefore forced to content himself with making him an instrument in doing good without his knowledge. Thus he obtained passports for certain London Pedlars to carry wares into all the quarters of the Parliament army; under the pretext of this commerce, Mr Barwick procured a safe conveyance as far as to the King's quarters, which joined upon those of the Rebels; for not a few messages of great importance, slid in as it were by stealth among the Pedlar's wares, and sometimes also for money and ammunition, furnished by certain Citizens in his Majesty's interest, to be conveyed thence to Oxford by some of the King's party, who waited in those places to receive them. In the mean time, Mr Barwick himself (lying as it were behind the curtain) was known to very few of those of whose help he made use, either by fight, or so much as by name; and those few only persons of the greatest probity, and who knew hardly any thing of what was doing, or indeed desired to know it, but as it were through a lattice, and enveloped in a mist, to the end that they might more easily clear themselves if they should happen to be taken (10).

[H] Which however was unluckily disappointed. The Earl of Clarendon was absolutely misinformed as to this project for the King's escape, he tells us that it was concerted by Osborne and Rolph, the latter designing to kill the King, that his Majesty coming to the window at midnight and putting himself out, discerned more persons to stand there than used to do, thence suspecting some discovery, shut the window and retired to bed; and this, says his Lordship, was all the ground of a discourse which then flew abroad, as if the King had got half out of the window, and could neither draw his body after nor get his head back, and so was compelled to call out for help; which was a meer fiction (11). To the authority of the Earl of Clarendon, I oppose that of King Charles I, who wrote the following letter with his own hand, which is still preserved by the descendant of the gentleman to whom it is addressed. 'D, (which in the cypher stands for Henry Firebrace, i. e. Sir Henry Firebrace, to whom it was directed) since I see that A, i. e. Cresset cannot stay, you must take the more care to settle the intelligence between my friends and me at London; to which end, I hope you have shewn the packet to F, i. e. Doucet, I have written to W, i. e. Titus, but it is only to refer him to you: Wherefore let him know, that the narrowness of the window was the only impediment of my escape, and therefore that some instrument must be had to remove the Bar, which I believe is not hard to get, for I have seen many, and so portable, that a man might put them in his pocket, and yet of force sufficient to do more than this comes to; I think it is called the Endless Screw, or the Great Force. Likewise acquaint him with those other ways that were in discourse among us, desiring him upon the whole matter (as well upon his own, as other mens inventions) to give his judgment, which is the most probable way to effect this business (12).'

himself with the intelligence which that gentleman had carried on [I]. After this he had a large share in bringing about the treaty at the Isle of Wight, and upon this occasion rode from London thither in one day, and returned in another (n). By this time he was so well known by reputation to all the loyal party, that even those who had never seen him, readily trusted themselves to his care even in the nicest and most dangerous conjunctures. Thus Sir Marmaduke Langdale, who had been condemned to suffer death before the walls of Pomfret, which he had defended against the Parliament, and who, by the assistance of the Lady Saville, had made his escape while he lay under condemnation, after lying some weeks in a hay-stack, came boldly up to London in a clergyman's habit, and remained under Mr Barwick's protection as a poor minister driven from his benefice in Ireland, till such time as an opportunity offered for his safe conveyance out of the kingdom (o). When the King was murdered, and the royal cause seemed to be desperate, Mr Barwick still kept up his spirits, and though harrassed with a continual cough, followed by a spitting of blood, and afterwards by a consumption of his lungs, yet would not interrupt the daily correspondence he maintained with the ministers of King Charles II. At last, when he was become very weak, he was content that his brother Dr Peter Barwick should take off a-part of the burthen, by attending the Post-office, which he did for about six months, and then this office was devolved on Mr Edward Barwick, another of his brothers. This gentleman had not been engaged two months in this perilous business, before one Bostock, who belonged to the Post-office, betrayed both him and Mr John Barwick, together with some letters which came from the King's ministers abroad, into the hands of those who were then possessed of the government. These letters were superscribed to Mr James Vandelft, Dutch merchant in London, which was a fictitious name made use of to cover their correspondence. Upon his examination, Mr Barwick did all he could to take the thing upon himself, in order to free his brother Edward. Yet so careful he was of offending against truth, that he would not deny his knowledge of the letters, but insisted that he was not bound to accuse himself. Those who examined him were not ashamed to threaten him, though half dead with his distemper, with putting him to the torture, if he did not immediately discover all who were concerned with him. To this Mr Barwick answered with great spirit, that neither himself or any of his friends had done any thing which they knew to be repugnant to the laws, and if by the force of tortures, which it was not likely a dry and bloodless carcase like his would be able to bear, any thing should be extorted which might be prejudicial to others, such a confession ought to go for nothing. Mr Edward Barwick behaved with the

[I] Which that gentleman had carried on.] This Mr Thomas Holder was Auditor-General to the Duke of York; he had the care of the King's correspondence with the Lady Saville, Sir Marmaduke Langdale, and other persons of great quality. He gives the following account of the kindness he received from Dr Barwick; but as he wrote it in the year 1671, the reader will find that he styles him Dean of St Paul's. 'On account of this correspondence, says he, I took up my station in London, where I had an intimate acquaintance with the late reverend Dean of St Paul's, Dr John Barwick, who, as he was a person of great zeal towards his Majesty, so he was of great correspondence also with many Lords, and other eminent persons of the King's Party; and, besides that, of indefatigable industry in the service of his Majesty; to promote which, he and I did often meet twice or thrice in a week, and sometimes oftner, and communicated to each other what we had to make use of from time to time for his Majesty's service; and some post-days, when I was in danger, he was pleased to go himself, and take up my letters and packets at the Post-Office, and bring them to me, and stay with me until I had decyphered them to give him the contents thereof, that he might serve himself of what was fitting amongst his correspondents: And twice, by his means, I procured conveyance of dispatches to, and of returns from, his Sacred Majesty, in the time of no address to him in the Isle of Wight, touching some difficulties that did arise in some of his Majesty's affairs within my correspondences: And he told me since, that he was beholden to one Mr Cresset for effecting that matter of so great an undertaking and danger. And after I had carried on my correspondences throughout the great business of the year, for the most part successfully, I was at last betrayed, and, by order of the Juncto at Derby-House, committed to close prison; and then this worthy Dean, my dear friend and confident, adventured himself, and by my contrivance got to whisper with me through the chinks of a door nailed up, and the hangings before it turned by, in the chamber next to mine at Peter-House, where Major Polwheel was prisoner upon the King's account, by whose favour we conferred together; of which I made this good use, that by my directions the Dean found all my cyphers, papers, &c. and burnt them; and at my request he also exposed himself to give intimation to some worthy honest gentlemen, (though strangers to him) who had very faithfully acted with me in many things to provide for their own security, which I was very desirous they might have notice of, because I had heard them threatened by those in whose custody I then was. And when I saw myself thus shut up, and past hopes of coming again to be farther serviceable to his Majesty, I asked the good Doctor if he would adventure and engage himself to carry on my correspondences, (not knowing then what had befallen our friends in the North) which he cheerfully resolved on, if I would bring him into a confidence with those persons I had been engaged with; upon which I gave him a short character of my most incomparable Lady Saville; for till that time I had never named her to any person but whom herself had trusted, and by letter recommended him to her, who received him with much esteem and confidence, under the same trusts I had been with her and others: And the worthy Dean going on therein as I had done, (but with more abilities) came at last to my misfortune of imprisonment, which 'tis likely might have befallen any other person that would have adventured to act as he and I did, in such times, under such disadvantages, and with so much danger: And for my part, I thank God that I held out so long as I did, till the very day, (viz. the 17th of August, 1648) on which my Lord Langdale's forces were worsted by Cromwell's army, in fight of the Scotch army. God in his providence so ordering his defeat and my imprisonment on the very same day, and thereby making an end of our correspondence and endeavours for his Majesty's service together. And I must not omit, in gratitude to the memory of my worthy friend the good Dean, to acknowledge the many comforts he afforded me during my imprisonment, and the many kind visits and helps after my escape, until I got out of England. the like firmness, so that not so much as one person fell into trouble through their misfortune; and as for Mr John Barwick, he had the presence of mind to burn his cyphers and other papers before those who apprehended him could break open his door (p). This extraordinary fortitude and circumspection so irritated President Bradshaw, Sir Henry Mildmay, and others of the Council who examined them, that, by a warrant, dated the ninth of April, 1650, they committed both brothers to the Gatehouse, where they were most cruelly treated, and three days afterwards committed Mr John Barwick to the Tower; and the reason they assigned for this change of his prison was, that he might be nearer to the rack, assuring him, that in a few days they would name commissioners to examine him, who should have that engine for their Secretary. Mr Francis West, who was then Lieutenant of the Tower, put him in a dungeon, where he was not only kept from pen, ink, and paper, and all books, but the Bible, with restraint from seeing any person except his keepers, but, as an additional punishment, had boards nailed before his window to prevent the coming in of the fresh air. In this melancholy situation he remained many months, during which time the diet he used was herbs or fruit, or thin water-gruel made of oatmeal or barley, with currants boiled in it, and sweetened with a little sugar, by which he recovered beyond all expectation, and grew plump and fat. A cure so perfect, and withal so strange, that many Physicians have taken notice of it in their writings, as a most pregnant instance of the power of temperance even in the most inveterate diseases (q) [K]. While he was thus shut up, his friends laboured incessantly for his service and relief, and his Majesty King Charles II, for whom he thus suffered, gave such testimonies of his royal concern, as shewed him to be the worthy master of so faithful a subject [L]. After fifteen months passed in this strict confinement, Mr Orway and some other friends procured a warrant from President Bradshaw to visit him, who were not a little surprized to find him so lusty, and in so good health, whom they had seen brought so low, as to engage this very Mr Orway to take care of his burial. His prudence and patience under this terrible persecution were so great, that they had a happy effect on all who came about him, so that Mr Robert Browne, who was Deputy-Lieutenant of the Tower, became first exceeding civil to him, and afterwards his convert, so as to have his child baptized by him; and, which was still a stronger proof of his sincerity, he quitted the very profitable post he held, and returned to his own business, which was that of a cabinet-maker (r). Nay, Mr West, the Lieutenant of the Tower, who treated him so harshly at his entrance, and executed to the full, if he did not exceed the orders of his superiors, abated by degrees of this rigour, and became at last so much softened, that he was as ready to do him all offices of humanity as Mr Browne was those of duty and religion, for he removed him out of a noisome dungeon, into a handsome convenient chamber, with a pair of leads over it, where he might enjoy freer air, and sometimes also the company of his friends. He likewise made assiduous application to the Council of State, that while Mr Barwick remained in the Tower, he might have an allowance granted him for his subsistence, and when he could not prevail, he supplied him from his own table. Indeed, after two years confinement, the Commonwealth did think fit to allow him five shillings a week, which he received for about four months. Then, through the same friendly intercession of Mr West, he was discharged on the seventh of August, 1652, but upon giving security to appear at any time within a twelvemonth before the Council of State (s). This procuring his discharge, was the last friendship Mr West did him, who within three days after died of an apoplexy, and was succeeded by Colonel Barksted, a barbarous, bloody man, and so cruel to his prisoners, that Mr Barwick thought it the greatest mercy afforded in his life-time, that he became not one of the number (t). On his deliverance, he went and paid his respects to his old patron the Bishop of Durham, his aged parents, and the incomparable Lady Saville, but the place he chose for his residence, was the house of Sir Thomas Eversfield of Suffex, a man

[K] Even in the most inveterate diseases. Longbefore Dr Peter Barwick wrote his brother's Life, this circumstance was become famous. Lloyd tells us the Dean of St Paul's was in the Tower several years with bread and water; which diet, by God's providence, having saved his life when his vein broke, he drank little or nothing but water almost all his life after, and eat nothing but once in twenty-four or thirty hours (14). A late writer mentions this case of Dr Barwick's as a strong proof of the virtue of water (15). The celebrated Dr Cheyne gives us the following account of it, wherein the reader will see that he has committed some slight mistakes. 'Dr Barwick tells us in the Life of his brother, who in the late civil wars had for many years been confined in a low room in the Tower, during the Usurpation, that at the time of his going in he was under a phtisis, atrophy, and dyscrasy, and lived on bread and water only several years there, and yet came out at the Restoration sleek, plump, and gay (16).'

one thousand pounds, out of which his Majesty immediately ordered two hundred pounds to be employed for Mr Barwick's relief. Afterwards he attempted to purchase his liberty in exchange for one who had made an attempt upon his own life, which Dr Barwick thankfully acknowledges in a dedication of his (17). When the King lay encamped near the city of Worcester, a few days before the battle, Dr Peter Barwick coming to pay his duty, and mentioning slightly his brother's confinement, the King was pleased to say with great warmth, 'I well know that honest man, who for my sake, and that of all my loyal subjects, has been treated with great indignity, and suffered the utmost hardships; but now, says he, the time is at hand when I shall either with these arms succour him, and the rest of my dearest friends that groan under the cruel yoke of this usurpation, or willingly lay down this life for them (18).' Many more instances might be given of the King's gratitude, but it will be sufficient to indicate the pages where they are set down in the margin (19).

man of great integrity as well as learning, with whom he lived for many months (u). After the expiration of the year, to which the recognizance entered into by himself and his friends, Mr Thomas Roylton, student of Gray's Inn, and Mr Richard Roylton of London, Bookfeller, extended, he began to think of getting up his bond, and entering again into the King's service. With this view he found it expedient to pay a visit to President Bradshaw, who received him very civilly, and entered into such a conversation, as deserves particular notice (w) [M]. Having thus received satisfaction, as to his being out of danger from that recognizance, he began to enter again into business, and drew over several considerable persons, such as Colonel John Clobery, Colonel Daniel Redman, and Colonel Robert Venable, to the King's service, with whom he conferred on several schemes for restoring monarchy, in all which they were long disappointed by the craft and industry of Cromwell. His friend, Sir Thomas Eversfield, dying, and his widow retiring to the house of her brother, Sir Thomas Middleton, at Chirk-Castle in Denbighshire, Dr Barwick accompanied her thither, and remained for some time with Sir Thomas, who was his old friend. His own and the King's affairs calling him back to London, he lived with his brother, Dr Peter Barwick, in St Paul's Church-Yard, and there managed the greatest part of the King's correspondence, with as much care, secrecy, and success, as ever (x). While he was thus engaged, he received some interruption, by the revival of that old calumny on the Church of England, the Nag's-Head Ordination, to which he furnished the materials for a full and conclusive answer [N]. His modesty and private way of living, preserved him from much notice even in those prying times; and yet, when proper occasions called for more open testimonies of his principles, Mr Barwick did not decline professing them, as appeared by his assisting Dr John Hewet, while in prison for a plot against Cromwell, and even on the scaffold when he lost his head (y) [O]. By the death of this gentlemen, his branch of intelligence, and the care of conveying some hundred

[M] As deserves particular notice] The account of this conversation given in his Life runs thus: ' Mr Barwick finding the year expired, and no indictment against him, goes to Bradshaw, whom Cromwell had now turned out, to consult with him what was to be done in order to get his bond cancelled, since it ought to lay him under no farther obligation to the commonwealth, now changed into a new tyranny. Bradshaw receives him with great courtesy and civility, and professes himself willing to do him any good office, even with Cromwell himself, if he had interest enough in him. But, Sir, says he, there is no occasion that you should be very solicitous about this matter, for such papers are either all lost, or otherwise lie in so much disorder and confusion, that they are never like to give trouble to any one. Hence he took occasion to express himself with great bitterness against Cromwell, and utter the most direful execrations against his arbitrary tyrannical government, but spake as respectfully of the Royal Authority exercised within those bounds prescribed by the laws, as if he had had a mind to return into favour with Kings: But you Cavaliers (says he, smiling) must needs laugh in your sleeves at our dissentions, and the struggle there is amongst us who shall have the government; and promise your King, not without reason, great advantages from our disagreement (20).'

(20) Ibid. p. 159, 160.

[N] A full and conclusive answer.] The revival of this dispute was occasioned by a little Piece published at Rouen under the title of A Treatise of the nature of the Catholic Faith, and of Heresy. The authors of this Piece, for there was more than one, asserted therein, that a Presbyterian Nobleman, who sat in the late Parliament, had written a book with intent to exclude the Bishops from their seats in the house of peers, by shewing that they were not the legal successors of the ancient Bishops for want of due consecration; and, in answer to this, they pretended that the Bishop of Durham stood up and made a solemn speech; in which he averred, in express words, that the first Bishops, after the Reformation, were consecrated in a tavern (the Nag's Head in Cheapside); and added farther, that this was a fact notorious to all the world, and to this the book affirms the Bishops then present assented. In all probability the coiners of this fine tale persuaded themselves, that the Bishop of Durham, who was now in the ninety-fifth year of his age, had been in his grave, and so out of a capacity of contradicting them. But when that grave prelate heard in the country of this strange reflection cast upon him, he sent for his chaplain Mr Barwick, then at London, directing him to bring a Public Notary with him, that by a solemn protestation made before them, and other proper witnesses, he might declare the falsehood of this story (21). When his Lordship had made this protestation in due form, he employed Mr Barwick to lay it before all those Lords who had sat in that Parliament, and were yet surviving, whether spiritual or temporal, living either at London or in the neighbouring counties; appealing to the faith of them all, that, preferring the sacredness of truth to all other considerations whatever, if they believed him undeservedly aspersed with this calumny, they would freely attest it by subscribing their names (22). And this was readily done, not only by all the Lords of Parliament, to whom the protestation could be carried (and it was carried to a great many), but by all the clerks also, and other officers of the house, whose business it was to register in authentick journals all such debates if there had been any; but they all declared there was not the least footsteps to be found, either of any such book as was pretended to be laid before the house, or of any such speech, as the adversaries alleged to have been made on that occasion. The aged Bishop, now past managing Church controversies himself, lays his command on his Chaplain Mr Barwick to publish this protestation, together with the noble testimony thereto subjoined: And this he designed to do in a volume; but when he heard that the learned Bishop of Derry (23), then an exile in Holland, intended the same thing (having been engaged before with the same adversaries in that controversy) (24), he readily left this work to his Lordship's irrefragable pen, furnishing him in the mean time with materials proper to end this dispute (25).'

hundred pounds, which he had collected for the King's use, devolved upon Mr Barwick; who, though he had already so much upon his hands, readily undertook and happily performed it. It is indeed surprising, that a person in his circumstances, and so little used to an active life, was able to go through the drudgery of such a correspondence, wherein he met daily accessions of fatigue, and yet durst not take in any assistance; but what is still more wonderful, is the silence of the Earl of Clarendon as to this gentleman's indefatigable service, who never once mentions him, tho' he was his principal correspondent, and his Lordship certainly drew from his intelligence, the fund of that history which he wrote of these times (z). The concern Mr Barwick had for the King and for the State, did not hinder him from attending, when he was called thereto, the business of the Church, in which however he had a very worthy associate, Mr Richard Allestrey, who took the most troublesome part on himself, by performing several dangerous journies into Flanders, in order to receive the King's commands by word of mouth; neither did Mr Barwick's assiduity in this respect, proceed in any degree from that kind of ambition which is but too common amongst churchmen, for with great modesty he declined the episcopal dignity when offered him, and with unfeigned humility consented to receive this office, in case the circumstances of the Church absolutely required it, and no fitter person could be found (a) [P]. In the rising of Sir George Booth, he had a principal concern in the managing of the design, and in providing for the safety of such as escaped after it miscarried. Not long after he narrowly missed a new imprisonment, thro' the treachery of some who were intrusted by the King's ministers: For by their intelligence, Mr Allestrey was seized as soon as he landed at Dover, and one of Mr Barwick's letters intercepted, part of which was, and all might have been decyphered by the famous Dr Wallis, if in pity to those concerned, or perhaps from some prospect of a change in the King's affairs, he had not been content to appear less knowing than he really was (b) [Q]. Secretary Thurloe, with all his intelligence, never gained any notice of Mr Barwick, tho' he carried on so long and regular a correspondence with the King and Chancellor Hyde, of which there are still in being a great variety of instances, which sufficiently discover how industriously he

[P] And no fitter person could be found. The business then in agitation was the filling up the vacant Sees, a point of very great consequence, and not more warmly pushed by the Clergy themselves than by the Chancellor Hyde; yet some unexpected difficulties sprung up, which retarded it. Mr Barwick declined the episcopal dignity, because he thought it irregular at least, if not something more, for a Presbyter to be made at once a Bishop without passing through any of the lesser dignities of the Church. When, however, the Bishoprick of Man appeared to have no candidate, several eminent Divines looking upon it as a kind of banishment to be sent thither, Mr Barwick readily accepted of it, and, as we shall see hereafter, as readily resigned the promise he had of it; when, upon a nearer view of possessing it, others thought it worth the seeking (30). The letters which passed between the Earl of Clarendon and Mr Barwick upon this occasion, and which may be found in the Appendix to his Life, are sufficient to shew how large a share he had in the settlement of the Church, and how honestly he discharged it.

[Q] Less knowing than he really was. When Chancellor Hyde was informed that letters written by him were not only intercepted, but decyphered, he would scarce believe it; and upon this occasion he wrote March 8, 1660, thus to Mr. Barwick: 'I confess to you, as I am sure no copy could be gotten of any of my cyphers from hence, so I did not think it probable that they could be got on your side the water: But I was as confident, till you tell me you believe it, that the Devil himself cannot decypher a letter that is well written, or find that roo stands for Sir Henry Vane. I have heard of many of the pretenders to that skill, and have spoken with some of them, but have found them all to be Mountebanks; nor did I ever hear that more of the King's letters that were found at Naseby, than those which they they found decyphered, or found the cyphers in which they were wrote, were decyphered. And I very well remember, that in the volume they published, there was much left in cypher which could not be understood, and which I believe they would have explained if it had been in their power; but you can easily satisfy yourself in this point, if you either make a cypher yourself, or write half a score lines out of several other cyphers, and send them to the artist, and you will then be convinced yourself, and be able to convince others; and then it will be to no purpose to traffick any more in those commodities (31).' The account given by Dr Peter Barwick of this accident, is to this purpose: Mr Allestrey, as he was returning home from thence, i. e. Brussels, was betrayed (by whose perfidiousness is unknown); but he was no sooner landed on the English shore, than he was immediately made a close prisoner; and Mr Barwick's letter, with more sent by Mr William Rombald and others, were intercepted by the garrison of Dunkirk, then at enmity with the King; and what was yet worse, although every different person's letter was written in a distinct cypher, and that contrived with great thought, yet they were all decyphered by the art and ingenuity of a certain very famous Mathematician (Dr Wallis, who was hired by the Rebels: For it was the very same artist that made these discoveries, who (too officiously to gratify the Rebels) had (as was intimated above) decyphered his Majesty's papers written also in characters, and taken at Naseby fight. Yet he had now at last this in him of a good subject, that at this time he discovered nothing to the Rebels, which much concerned the publick safety; though he satisfied some of the King's friends, that he could have discovered a great deal; but all those whom it concerned being sufficiently assured that no key of any cypher had fallen into the enemy's hands, it was thought nothing but vain boasting, when the Rebels bragged, that by the help of their friends they were able to find out the most hidden secrets of the Royalists, till Mr Matt. Wren (son to the right reverend Bishop of Ely), who was intimately acquainted with this Mathematician, obtained of him some copies of those letters as he had decyphered them, and took care to have them delivered severally to the persons that wrote the letters, who all acknowledged them for their own, and left no room to doubt of the Decypherer's art (32). — By comparing these passages, the Reader will easily discern that this enquiry by Mr Wren, who was son to the Bishop of Ely, was made in pursuance of my Lord Chancellor's direction, who yet seems, by another letter of his, to have remained fixed in his old opinion, that, without treachery, a good cypher could not be penetrated. There is a letter in Thurloe's collection, supposed to be written by Chancellor Hyde to Mr Barwick, in which the Names of persons are not decyphered, yet upon carefully reviewing the letter, I am very positive that it was not directed to Mr Barwick, because it cannot be read by his cyphers, as all the other letters to him in that collection, which are not a few, may (33). If this was a letter from the Chancellor to any body else, then it would give some probability to his opinion; but as to that I can determine nothing.

enquired into all that passed here; as well as how true judgment he made of all the schemes of the Cromwellians, and how exact an account he transmitted of them to the King and Chancellor Hyde, which is a secret but lately revealed (c) [R]. In the midst of these difficulties died the good old Bishop of Durham, whom Mr Barwick piously assisted in his last moments, preached his funeral sermon, and afterwards wrote his life, which he dedicated to the King (d) [S]. All the hopes that now remained of a Restoration rested upon General Monk, and though it is certain that Mr Barwick had no direct correspondence with him, yet it is no less certain, that he furnished him with the principal instruments he employed in the most difficult parts of that arduous affair; as for instance, Colonel Daniel Redman, who carried over to Monk the Irish horse, and Colonel Cloberry, whom he intrusted chiefly with the guard of the Parliament, as well as with his messages to them. After the affair was so far ripened, that there seemed to be no longer any doubt of the King's return, Mr Barwick was sent over by the Bishops to represent the state of ecclesiastical affairs. He was received by his Majesty with the most endearing marks of cordial affection, preached before him the Sunday after his arrival, and was immediately appointed one of his Chaplains. Yet did not his great deserts, or these extraordinary marks of the King's favour induce him to make any request for himself, tho' he did not let slip so fair an opportunity of recommending effectually several of his friends, and procuring for them an acknowledgment suitable to each of their services (e) [T]. On his return he visited the university of Cambridge, where he gave a new proof his disinterestedness and generosity, by relinquishing his right to his fellowship in favour of an intruder, because he had the reputation of being a young man of learning and probity (f). Before he left the university, he took the degree of Doctor in Divinity, upon which occasion he performed his exercise, tho' that might have been well dispensed with, merely to support the discipline of the university, for which he had a very warm and just concern. The thesis made choice of upon this occasion was very singular, viz. That the method of imposing penance, and restoring Penitents in the primitive Church was a godly discipline, and that it is much to be wished it was restored. The Latin disputation upon this question has been preserved, and it was chiefly for the sake of inserting it, that Dr Peter Barwick composed his brother's life in Latin. It is indeed a most learned and instructive piece, and does our author's memory much honour (g) [U]. When the Church of England was restored in all it's beauty by King Charles II, and Deans and Chapters revived, Dr Barwick, according to his usual modesty, contented himself with recommending his tutor, old Mr Fothergill, to a Prebend in the cathedral church of York, but as to himself, he would have rested content with the provision made for him by his late patron, the Bishop of Durham, who had given him the fourth stall in his cathedral, and the rectories of Wolsingham, and Houghton in le Spring, nay when he found of how great value these preferments were, he was inclined to think he had too much (h). Among other extraordinary offices to which he was called at this busy time, one was to visit Hugh Peters, in order to draw from him some account of the person who actually cut off the head of King Charles I; but in this neither he nor Dr Dolben, his associate, had any success (i). Before the Restoration there had been a design of consecrating Dr Barwick, Bishop of Man, but the Countess of Derby desiring to prefer her Chaplain to that dignity, the Doctor readily resigned all title thereto in his favour, upon which,

[R] Which is a secret lately revealed. It is indeed something strange, that, in so long a correspondence, Dr Barwick should never be detected, especially if Thurloe had been as well furnished with intelligence as he is generally supposed. Yet in his voluminous collection I do not find one of Mr Barwick's, or of any directed to him. Those that are in the seventh volume of that work were communicated to the Editor, and not intercepted (34). This shews, that if a man be very prudent and cautious of conversing with strangers, he may avoid great dangers in this way. It was Dr Hewer's foible to converse freely with every man who professed himself a Royalist, and this undid him. Mr Barwick, on the contrary, avoided being known as much as possible, and suffered none of his correspondents to pry into each others affairs, by which means he escaped.

[S] Which he dedicated to the King. He also drew up an Epitaph for him, in which is contained a very just, as well as very accurate, panegyrick on this great man. A circumstance from the dedication of Dr Barwick's book has been before taken notice of, and the title of this Treatise will be given in another note. Here we shall only add, that an account of Bishop Morton's life was written by another Chaplain of his, Dr Joseph Nelson, Prebendary of Durham, and Rector of Sedgfield.

[T] To each of their services. In his Life we have the instructions given by the Bishops to Mr Barwick, in relation to his laying before the King a state of the Church; and we have also a paper of his containing the requests made by him to his Majesty, such as that he would be pleased to confer the honour of Knighthood on the eldest son of Sir Thomas Middleton, which was complied with; that his Majesty would take care of Colonel Cloberry, which had also it's proper weight; and that gentleman, soon after the Restoration, had a grant made him of six hundred pounds a year; that some some eminent mark of the King's favour might be shewn to Colonel Robert Venables, the reason assigned for it I must give in Mr Barwick's own words, viz. Because it was sufficiently known that he formerly both could have restored his Majesty to his throne, and would have done it, if he had not been hindered by the perfidiousness of some to whom the King's business was trusted, but we are not told what return this representation met with; that such as had transmitted money through his or Dr Hewer's hands might be admitted to kiss his Majesty's hand, and that Dr Hewer's family might be provided for (35).

[U] Our author's memory much honour. The title of this piece in Latin runs thus: Exomologesis primitivæ Ecclesiæ est Disciplina pia, ejusque Restitutio est maximè optanda. This dissertation makes about forty pages at the end of the Latin life, and shews the Author's perfect acquaintance with the discipline of the Primitive Church, and how diligently, and to how good purpose, he studied the antient Fathers. It is indeed in every respect so well conceived, and so well executed a piece, that it is surprizing the Editor of the Latin life, and Translator of it into English, did not take the pains to give us a version of it; for though it be true that the subject is handled in a scholastic stile, yet it is no less evident that it's author was as much for Reformation in a right course as any man of his time.

which, the King, of his own motive, would have promoted him to the See of Carlisle, which the Doctor steadily refused, that the world might not imagine, the extraordinary zeal he had shewn for episcopacy, flowed from any secret hope of his one day being a Bishop. Upon this he was promoted to the Deanery of Durham, with which he kept the rectory of Houghton, which is only four miles distant from the city. He took possession of his deanery on the feast of All Saints 1660 (k), and as he enjoyed a large revenue, so certainly never any man employed it better, or more conscientiously studied the laying it out for those purposes for which it was given; he repaired publick buildings, relieved the poor, and kept up great hospitality, both at the house of his deanery and at Houghton. But before the year was out, he was called from these cares, in which he would willingly have spent his whole life, by his being made Dean of St Paul's, which though a preferment less in value, and attended with much more trouble than that he already possessed, yet Dr Barwick readily accepted, because he knew he was called thereto, purely for the service of the Church (l). As soon as he had done this he put an end to all granting of leases, even where he had agreed for the fine with the tenants, and did many other things for the benefit of his successor, which shewed his contempt of secular advantages, and his sincere concern for the rights of the Church (m) [W]. He took possession of the deanery of St Paul's, about the middle of October 1661, and found, as he expected, all in very great disorder with respect to the church itself, and every thing that concerned it. He set about reforming these abuses with a truly primitive spirit, and prosecuted with great vigour the recovery of such revenues, as in the late times of distraction had been alienated from the church; though with respect to his own particular concerns, he was never rigid to any body, but frequently gave up things to which he had a clear title (n). By his interest with his Majesty he obtained two royal grants under the Great-Seal of England, one for the repair of the cathedral, the other, for enumerating and securing it's privileges. In this respect, he was so tender, that he would not permit the Lord-Mayor of London to erect there a seat for himself at the expence of the city, but insisted that it should be done at the charge of the church (o). Towards the repairing the cathedral, he, together with the Residentiaries, gave the rents of the houses in St Paul's church-yard as a settled fund, besides which they advanced each of them 500 £. a piece, and, in many other respects, he demonstrated, that neither the love of preferment, or the desire of wealth, had any share in his acceptance of this dignity (p) [X]. Though this office might sufficiently have employed, even as active a person as Dr Barwick was, yet he was called to still greater labours by the good opinion of the King, and the universal respect of the Clergy. In consequence of the former, he was appointed one of the nine assistants to the twelve Bishops, commissioned to hold a conference with the like number of Presbyterian Ministers upon the review of the Liturgy; which conference was held at the Bishop of London's lodgings in the Savoy (q). As an effect of the latter, he was, by the unanimous suffrage of all the Clergy of the province of Canterbury assembled in Convocation, chosen Prolocutor on the 18th of February 1661 (r); in which high office he behaved himself in such a manner, as added even to the great reputation he had before acquired. His application, however, to the discharge of so many and so great duties brought upon him his old distemper, so that in November 1662 he was confined to his chamber: He heightened his disease by officiating at the sacrament the Christmas-day following, after which he was seized with such a violent vomiting of blood, that he brought up whole basons full. Upon this he was advised to a change of air, for the enjoyment of which he retired to Therfield in Hertfordshire, of which he was Rector, but finding himself there too far from London, he returned to Chiswick, where he in some measure recovered his health (s). As soon as he found he had a little strength, he applied himself there to the putting in order the archives of St Paul's church, and so threw himself down again. This was followed by an extraordinary flux of blood, which rendered him very weak, and defeated his favourite design of retiring to Therfield. When he first found his health declining, he made choice of and procured this living, intending to have resigned his deanery and office of Prolocutor, to those who had vigour enough to discharge them, and to spend the remainder of his days in the discharge of his pastoral office,

[W] For the rights of the Church.] This induced him, upon his coming to Durham, to take great care that the prebendal houses should be repaired, and a grammar-school erected from the ground; he brought water into the college, and took upon himself a very hard task, that of bringing all the officers of the church under a good discipline and to a regular life, and at the same time to augment such salaries as were too small, not only of the mother church, but of all the churches depending upon it; and the Chapter not only gave their consent to this, but did all in their power to promote it; yet they were so far from exacting in the matter of fines, upon such as had leases of the church lands, and were so beneficial to all the poor, that, in an age very little favourable to the clergy, they are mentioned with honour to this day for their humanity, candour, and piety: Nay, in many cases they were so bountiful, as to recede from their own right in favour of their successors, that the revenues of the Church might descend to them with some augmentation (36).

[X] Accepting this dignity.] One may safely say, that nothing could have happened more-for the service of the church of St Paul's than Dr Barwick's being appointed it's Dean. He boldly entered into suits for the sake of the church, and was not to be terrified by any interpositions of the Great, or ill grounded calumnies of the Many. He followed a cause even before the Privy-Council, and though it came there with an ill grace, yet he procured a good end to it, and justified his own conduct to the satisfaction of every body. He would have gone a progress into Essex for the settling the estates of the Church there, if he had not swooned at setting out, and even then was hardly prevailed on to desist, and this for no other reason, than because he was afraid the tenants might be squeezed or harrassed by such as were employed in this affair (37).

But Providence prepared for him a still more quiet mansion, for coming upon some extraordinary occasion to London, he was seized with a pleurisy, which carried him off in three days. He was attended in his last moments by Dr Peter Gunning, afterwards Bishop of Ely, and as he lived, so he died with all the marks of an exemplary piety, on the 22d of October, 1664; after he had struggled almost twelve years with this grievous distemper (u). Upon inspection, all his entrails appeared to be decayed, particularly his liver and his lungs, and yet not so much vitiated, but that he might have lived considerably longer, if the mass of blood, had not been in a great measure, by continual evacuations, exhausted. Many good and great men came of their own accords from all parts to his funeral, where Dr Hinchman, Bishop of London, read the service, and Dr Gunning preached the funeral sermon (w). By his will he bequeathed the greatest part of his estate to charitable uses, and this with a judgment equal to his piety (x) [Y]. His body was interred in the cathedral of St Paul's, and his epitaph, composed by Mr Samuel Howlet, then not twenty years of age, is not inferior to the worth of him it celebrates (y) [Z]. The character of Mr Barwick is so easily collected from these memoirs, that nothing in relation thereto can seem necessary in this place, as the extraordinary length of this article forbids any addition which is not absolutely of that kind; I shall therefore conclude with observing, that as his was a life of action, and not a very long one neither, dying at fifty-three, so we have no reason to wonder, that he did not leave behind him a greater number of writings, though what he has left are sufficient to shew, how well he could have expressed his zeal and his loyalty by words, if he had not been better employed, I mean, in expressing them by his actions. Mr Wood has given us a catalogue of his works (z) [AA], which, with those already mentioned, may satisfy the reader on this head, only it may not be amiss to remark, that abundance of his letters to Chancellor Hyde, may be found in the Collection of Thurloe's State-Papers.

[Y] Equal to his piety. He gave to the daughters of his brothers, four in number, one hundred pounds each; to his brother William's son, his only nephew, two hundred pounds; the works of King Charles I. to his dear friend Mr John Otway; the rest of his study to Mr Samuel Howlet; to the school at Sedberg forty pounds; to St John's College, Cambridge, three hundred pounds; to St Paul's church one hundred pounds, all to be employed in the repair of those public buildings. He likewise purchased an estate of about fifty pounds a year, belonging formerly to the Church, but now alienated and applied to secular uses for seven hundred pounds, and out of this he gave, by way of augmentation, to the poor endowment of the chapel of Wether Slack, his native village, thirty pounds a year, which chapel in his life-time he rebuilt from the ground far more elegantly than it was before. The surplus of this estate he directed to be annually disposed of in mending the highways, in the instruction of the sons of the poorer sort, or in marrying their daughters. Thus, for the most part, he disposed of all he had, or was due to him from those whom he thought would readily pay his executors. The residue of his estate, by reason of the doubtful credit of some of his debtors, or the less doubtful indigence of others, he could not reduce to any just estimate; but whatever it should amount to, after his funeral expences and other debts paid, he directed it to be disposed of either for the relief of poor families, or to other pious uses, at his discretion, to whom he intrusted the care and execution of his will. And indeed this surplussage of his estate, by the diligence and faithfulness of some persons that had a just value for his memory, and were well versed in the practice of the Law, amounted, beyond all expectation, to little less than one thousand pounds; so faithfully did he discharge the public trust committed to him, and so prudently manage his private fortune (38).

[Z] To him it celebrates In this epitaph, which has been often printed both in Latin and English, there is a concise history of Dean Barwick's life, in a very elegant and classic style, though the author was so young a man. He had some relation to the family, being, as I take it, son to Dr Peter Barwick's wife, by her first husband Dean Howlet, and bred at Cambridge in St John's-college under Mr Fothergill, Dean Barwick's own tutor. The text, on which Dr Peter Gunning, afterwards Bishop of Ely, preached on this occasion, was Philippians i. ver. 22, 23, 24. His funeral was solemnized on the 27th of October, 1664 (39).

[AA] A catalogue of his works. This worthy person, Dr Barwick, says he, has published, 1. The Fight, Victory, and Triumph of St Paul, accommodated to Thomas (Morton) late Lord Bishop of Duresme, in a sermon preached at his funeral in the parish church of St Peter at Easton Manduit in Northamptonshire, on Michaelmas-day, on 2 Tim. iv. 7, 8. Lond. 1660, 4to. 2. A Summary Account of the Holy Life and Death of Thomas late Lord Bishop of Duresme, printed with the said sermon, which Bishop died at Easton Manduit before mentioned on St Matthew's day, an. 1659, aged 95 years. 3. Deceivers deceived, or the Mistakes of Wickedness, &c. a sermon at St Paul's cathedral the 20th of October, 1661, on Prov. xiv. part of the 8th verse. B A R W I C K (PETER) Physician in Ordinary to King Charles II. He was brother to John beforementioned, and was born some time in the year 1619, at Wether Slack in Westmoreland (a). He went to the same grammar-school with his elder brother, till such time as he was fitted for the university, when he removed to St John's-college in Cambridge. This was about the year 1637, and he continued there about six years, being much furthered in his studies, by the care taken of him by his brother. In 1642, being then in the twenty-fourth of his age, he took his degree of Bachelor of Arts (b). In 1644, he was nominated by the Bishop of Ely, to a fellowship of St John's, in his gift (c) [A]. It is very probable that he had left the college before he obtained this presentation,

[A] To a fellowship of St John's in his gift. The industrious and reverend Mr Bedford, editor of Dr Peter Barwick's Life of his brother, the Dean of St Paul's, had the first hint of our author's being not only a scholar, but a fellow of St John's, from his daughter, Lady Dutton. Upon this, he applied to the late excellent Mr Baker of the same college, who, of all men living, was the most capable of obtaining for him a true account. He searched the college registers to no purpose, which, to a less curious man, would have been a sufficient proof that this report was ill-grounded; but he, to avoid all possibility of mistake, consulted the registry of Ely, where he found an entry to this purpose, That on the third day of Dec. 1644, presentation, for as he was eminently loyal, as well as his brother, there is little reason to doubt his withdrawing from the university, about the same time his brother did, which was in the foregoing year. It is uncertain, whether, at that time, he had made any choice of a profession or not, so that being invited into Leicestershire, in order to become Tutor to Ferdinando Sacheverell, Esq; of Old Hayes in that county, a young gentleman of great hopes, he readily accepted the proposition, and continued with him for some time (d). In 1647, he returned to Cambridge, and took his degree of Master of Arts, applying himself then assiduously to the study of Physick. While he was thus engaged, he lost his friend and former pupil, Mr Sacheverell, who, as a testimony of his esteem and affection, bequeathed our author an annuity of twenty pounds, which was very punctually paid him (e). How he disposed of himself for some years, does not very clearly appear, because he who so elegantly recorded the loyal services of his brother, as studiously concealed his own. It is however more than probable, that he was engaged in the service of his Sovereign, since it is certain that he was at Worcester in 1651, where he had access to his royal master King Charles II, who testified to him a very kind sense of the fidelity of his family (f). In 1655, he was created Doctor of Physick, and two years afterwards, being then near forty, he took a house in St Paul's Church-Yard, and much about the same time, married the widow of an eminent merchant, who was a near relation of Archbishop Laud's [B]. Being thus settled, he soon gained a very great repute in the city, for his skill in his profession, as amongst the learned, by his judicious Defence of Dr Harvey's Discovery of the Circulation of the Blood, which was then, and is still, admired, as one of the best pieces wrote upon that subject (g) [C]. At this house of his, he entertained his worthy brother Dr John Barwick, who repaired at his own expence an oratory he found there, wherein he daily read the service of the Established Church, and with a few steady Royalists, prayed for his exiled master. After the Restoration in 1660, he was made one of the King's Physicians in Ordinary (h), and in the year following, received a still stronger proof of his Majesty's kind sense of his own and his brother's services [D]. On the eighth of May 1661, Dr Gilbert Sheldon, then Bishop

Peter Barwick, Bachelor of Arts, was presented to a fellowship in St John's college, void by the marriage of John Topping, Master of Arts, late Fellow, being in the gift of the Right Reverend Father in God, Matthew, Lord Bishop of Ely. Dated the same day from the chamber in which his Lordship was then imprisoned in the Tower of London. This Bishop was the famous Dr Matthew Wren; and the reason why our author made no use of this presentation is obvious enough, the Parliament was then possessed of the University, and none could be admitted there who were not well affected to them. Accordingly, in the college register we find, that on April 26, 1650; John Heath, a Middlesex man, was admitted by the Visitors into this fellowship without any notice taken who he succeeded (1). This little circumstance certainly deserves notice, as it is an early proof of our author's modesty, who, in the title of his books styles himself, formerly a scholar of that college, though, as we see, he might justly have wrote himself Fellow, as having for many years a legal title thereto.

[B] A near relation of Archbishop Laud's] This Lady's maiden name was Brown, descended of the ancient family of Browns in Norfolk. She married first Dr Richard Howlet, a Clegyman of great merit, who became a Dean in Ireland, but being driven from his deanery in the Rebellion, came over into England in very distressed circumstances; on which account, as well as because his wife was his relation, Archbishop Laud collated him to the rectory of Lachingdon in Essex. After his decease she married Mr Sayon, a rich Merchant, whose widow she was when our author espoused her (3). He had by her several children, viz. a son who died an infant, two daughters who also died in their non-age, and one who survived him, mentioned in the text.

[C] Which were then admired as the best pieces on that subject.] The learned Dr Harvey published his useful discovery of the circulation of the blood when our author was between eight and nine years old (3), and yet the disputes about it were very warm after, Dr Barwick had taken his degree, the author himself being still living. As two things were chiefly insisted on, first that the fact itself was still dubious, and next, that admitting it certain, it was a thing known long ago even to Hippocrates, the Father of the Faculty, our author was excellently qualified to shine in this dispute. The learned writings he left behind him on the human system, though they were never published, sufficiently demonstrate his exquisite skill in Anatomy, and his great sagacity in applying the lights he drew from that science. On the other hand, no man was ever better read than he in the antient authors on Physick, whence he made it evidently appear, that such as attributed this discovery to Hippocrates, did it only out of envy to his friend Dr Harvey. As these fugours from so worthy a person were kindly acknowledged by that venerable old man, so our author himself, as he often told Dr Woodward, reflected on no action of his life with greater satisfaction, than he did on this, of espousing the cause of so worthy a person against a troop of malevolent opponents (4). To this we may add what is likewise a circumstance much to our author's honour, that Dr Woodward, late Professor at Gresham-college, was his pupil, and very probably derived from him that fluency in writing and speaking elegant Latin, for which he is deservedly famous.

[D] His and his brother's services] The patent under the hand and seal of Sir Edward Walker, Knight, Garter King at Arms, bears date the 20th of November 1661, and recites, That whereas nothing can be more just, than that such as have deserved well of their Prince and of their country, should be properly distinguished, and their merits pointed out to posterity, and whereas nothing hath more effectually answered the former purpose, or furnished stronger incitements to loyalty, or virtuous achievements in the latter, than the rules observed in bearing arms; and whereas the reverend John Barwick, Professor of Divinity, Chaplain to his Majesty, late Dean of Durham, and then of St Paul's, and his brother, Peter Barwick, Doctor in Physick, and one of his Majesty's Physicians in Ordinary, during the late troublesome and distracted times, did constantly, faithfully, and assiduously, with their lives and fortunes, support the royal cause, deserving thereby not only an authentick concession of arms to them and their posterity, but also an addition and augmentation to be in them inserted. Know therefore, that I Edward Walker, Principal King at Arms by the name of Garter, by virtue of the authority to me given by letters patents under the great seal of England, do hereby give, grant, and confirm, unto the said John and Peter Barwick, the following arms, which they have hitherto born by the sur-name of Barwick, viz. in a field argent, three bears heads sable, muzzled, gules, and as a crest on a helmet proper, a bear's head sable, muzzled, gules, with a crown Or, by way of collar; signifying their extraordinary fidelity to the King, their many great services and toilsome afflictions by them endured with patience; and I farther give and assign to the said John and Peter Barwick, the addition and augmentation following, that

Bishop of London, with several other Bishops, Deans, Archdeacons, &c, met in the morning at our author's house, and proceeded thence to the cathedral of St Paul's in order to open the Convocation (i). In 1666, being compelled by the dreadful fire to remove from St Paul's Church-Yard, where he had remained all the time of the plague [E], and been very active and serviceable in his profession, he thought proper to take another house near Westminster-Abbey, for the sake of being near that cathedral, to which he constantly resorted every morning at Six o'clock prayers (k). He was a very diligent Physician, and remarkably successful in the small-pox, and in most kinds of fevers. Yet he was far from making money the main object of his care, for during the many years that he practised, he not only gave advice and medicines gratis to the poor, but likewise charitably administered to their wants in other respects. He was very kind to all who had suffered for the Royal cause, to which he was a constant votary all his life, and with a view to it's service, in 1671, he drew up in Latin, which he wrote with unusual elegance and purity, the Life of the Dean his brother, and took care to deposit it, and the original papers serving to support the facts therein mentioned, in the library of St John's college at Cambridge (l) [F]. Twenty years after this, when our author was in the seventy-fourth year of his age, and his eye-sight so much decayed, that he was forced to make use of the hand of a friend, he added an appendix in defence of the Ἐικὼν Βασιλική, against Dr Walker, who was very well known to him, and of whom in that treatise he has given a very copious account (m) [G]. This piece of his is written with a good deal of asperity, occasioned chiefly by the frequency of scurrilous libels against the memory of Charles I. To this appendix, our author, as well as he could, subscribed his name. In 1694, growing quite dark, and being besides frequently afflicted with fits of the stone, he gave over practice, and dedicated the remainder of his life to the service of God, and the conversation of a few intimate friends, amongst whom Dr Busby, the ever-famous master of Westminster school, was one (n) [H]. From this sedentary course of life, his old distemper the stone grew very much upon him, and toward the end of August 1705, being seized with a vomiting and looseness, followed with an intermitting fever, and in a few days, with a great and sudden evacuation of blood, he exchanged this life for a better, the fourth of September the same year, in the eighty-sixth year of his age, and by his own direction, was interred without any monument, as well as with great privacy, near the body of his dear wife, in the parish church of St Faith's under St Paul's (o). He was a man of a very comely person, equally remarkable for the solidity of his learning, and for a wonderful readiness as well as elegance in expressing it. His piety was sincere and sublime, his reputation absolutely unspotted, his loyalty exemplary, and his modesty almost without example. In all stations of life admired and beloved, of a cheerful and serene mind in all situations. Happy in the universal approbation of all parties, as he was himself charitable to all, and never vehement but in the cause of truth. He left behind him an only daughter, Mary, who married Sir Ralph Dutton of Sherbourne in Dorsetshire, Baronet, and brought to him a very considerable fortune, and her only son Sir John Dutton is now living, together with two daughters, who inherit all the virtues of this their illustrious ancestor (p).

that is to say, in the midst of the field abovementioned, a rose gules irradiated Or, which arms, crest, and augmentation shall be born by them and their posterity, &c (5). This we thought, might with greater propriety be taken notice of here than in the life of his brother John, who lived and died a bachelor.

[E] Remained all the time of the plague.] This is taken notice of by Dr Hodges, in his treatise de Peste, wherein he says, that there were not wanting many learned and famous Physicians, who, notwithstanding the great danger to which they were exposed, exerted their utmost endeavours to stop the progress of the contagion, particularly Dr Francis Glisson, Regius Professor of Physick in the university of Cambridge, Dr Nathan. Paget, Dr Thomas Wharton, Dr Peter Barwick, Dr Humphry Brooks, and others (6). This was a noble instance of piety, fortitude, and publick spirit.

[F] In the library of St John's college.] Our author had a great respect for this learned society, as appeared not only by his depositing these valuable papers there, but also by his lending two hundred and eight pounds to the college for many years without interest, and making at length a present of the whole sum (7). This copy however, was not the only one he left of his book, on the contrary, he left another MS. to his family, which is now in the hands of his grandson, Sir John Dutton, and a third given by him in his lifetime to Dr Woodward, and deposited for some time with the author's approbation in the library of St Martin in the Fields. Of these the Cambridge copy is most authentick, which is fairly copied, bound up in Turkey leather, with three of the King's original letters, and an acquittance, all in his Majesty's own hand. Together with this volume there is another of the Chancellor's, Dr Barwick's and other original letters and papers relating to the same subject (8).

[G] Of whom in that treatise he has given a very copious account.] This he was very capable of doing, since Dr Anthony Walker, while at the university of Cambridge was pupil to Dean Barwick, and a very indifferent character is given of him, though without mentioning his name, in the life of the Dean written by our author. In this appendix, the conduct not only of Dr Walker, but Bishop Gauden is fully exposed, in relation to the point therein examined.

[H] Dr Busby, the famous master of Westminster school was one.] In Mr Bedford's preface to the Latin life, there is inserted an elegant letter from the ingenious Mr Mattaire, wherein he, of his own knowledge, most pathetically describes the dear friendship there was between those two excellent persons, particularly the infinite pains taken by Dr Barwick, as a Physician, to alleviate the many painful diseases to which, in the latter part of his life, Dr Busby was subjected. The piece itself, though very curious and entertaining, is too long to be inserted here (9).

BASIER, or BASIRE (ISAAC), a learned and active Divine in the XVIIth century, was born in the Isle of Jersey (a), in the year 1607 [A]. In what school and university he received his education is altogether unknown. For some time, he was master of the college or free-school at Guernesey (b): But, at length, became Chaplain to Thomas Morton Bishop of Durham (c), who gave him the rectory of Stanhope, and the vicarage of Egglecliffe, both in the county of Durham (d). In July 1640, he had the degree of Doctor of Divinity conferred upon him at Cambridge, by mandate (e); and was incorporated in the same at Oxford, the November following (f). About that time he was made Chaplain in Ordinary to King Charles I (g). On the twelfth of December 1643, he was installed into the seventh prebend in the church of Durham, to which he was collated by his generous patron Bishop Morton (h). The next year, on the twenty-fourth of August, he was also collated to the archdeaconry of Northumberland, with the rectory of Howick annexed (i). But he did not long enjoy these great preferments. For, in the beginning of the Civil Wars, being sequestered, purloined, plundered; and forced to fly (k), he repaired to King Charles at Oxford, before whom, and his Parliament, he frequently preached (l). In 1646, he had a licence granted him under the publick seal of the university, to preach the word of God throughout England (m). Upon the surrender of the Oxford garrison to the Parliament, not caring to stay any longer within the British dominions, he resolved to make a virtue of necessity, and to go and propagate the doctrine of the English Church in the East, among the Greeks, Arabians, &c. (n). Leaving therefore his family in England, he went first to Zante, an island near the Morea, where he made some stay; and had good success in spreading among the Greek inhabitants the doctrine of the English Church, the sum whereof he imparted to several of them, in a vulgar Greek translation of our Church-Catechism (o). The effect of it was so remarkable, that it drew envy, and consequently persecution, upon him from the Latins [B]. This occasioned his voluntary recess into the Morea, where the Metropolitan of Achaia prevailed upon him to preach twice in Greek, at a meeting of some of his Bishops and Clergy, which was well taken. At his departure, he left with him a copy of the Catechism above-mentioned. From thence, after he had passed through Apulia, Naples, and Sicily again (in which last, at Messina, he officiated for some weeks a-board a ship) he embarked for Syria; and, after some months stay at Aleppo, where he had frequent conversation with the Patriarch of Antioch, then resident there, he left a copy of our Church-Catechism, translated into Arabick, the native language of that place. From Aleppo he went in 1652 to Jerusalem, and so travelled over all Palestine. At Jerusalem he received much honour, both from the Greeks and Latins [C]. The Greek Patriarch (the better to express his desire of communion with the Church of England, declared by the Doctor unto him) gave him his bull, or patriarchal seal, in a blank, which is their way of credence, and showed him many other respects. As for the Latins, they received him most courteously into their own convent, though he did openly profess himself a Priest of the Church of England. After some disputes about the validity of our English ordinations, they procured him entrance into the temple of the sepulchre, at the rate of a Priest, that is half is half less than a layman's rate [D]; and, at his departure from Jerusalem, the Pope's Vicar gave him his diploma in parchment, under his own hand and publick seal, in it styling him, 'a Priest of the Church of England, and Doctor of Divinity.'

[A] Was born in the Isle of Jersey, in the year 1607. This is expressly asserted by A. Wood (1), but it is contradicted by a gentleman, who hath imparted some materials to the author. And Dr Durel, a native of Jersey, and an intimate acquaintance of his, calls him a Frenchman born (*). There is no memorial of him in the island, nor any account of his birth and baptism in the parish registers there, which have been searched upon this occasion. That he was born in the year 1607 appears from his epitaph recited below (2), for in the year 1676 when he died, he was 69 years of age.

[B] From the Latins. The Latins are those members of the Romish Church, dispersed throughout the East; which, because they perform their divine service in the Latin tongue, are thence called Latins.

[C] He received much honour from the Greeks and Latins. Who the Latins are, hath been explained in the last note. As for the Greeks, they are such of the original inhabitants as are Christians and members of the Greek Church.

[D] They procured him entrance into the temple of the sepulchre at the rate of a Priest, &c. Christians having always expressed an uncommon regard, and extreme veneration, for the place of Jesus Christ's burial, (on which a church is built) when the Turks became possessed of those places, they took care to make an advantage of it. And therefore the church doors are guarded by several Janizaries and other Turkish officers; who are placed there to watch, that none enter in, but such as have first paid their appointed caphar or tribute: This is more or less, according to the country, or character of the persons that enter. For Franks [i. e. Europeans] it is ordinarily fourteen dollars a head, unless they are Ecclesiastics; for in that case it is but half so much, namely seven dollars. Having once paid this caphar, you may go in and out gratis as often as you please during the whole feast of Easter; provided you take the opportunities in which it is customary to open the doors. But if you would have them opened purposefully for your own private occasion, then the first expence must be paid again (3). The care of the holy sepulchre formerly belonged to the Greeks; but was in the last century, committed to the Latins: For there being violent disputes and animosities about it between the two nations, so that, in striving which should go in to celebrate their mass, they proceeded to blows and even wounds; the late King of France, in order to put an end to those infamous quarrels, did, about the year 1685, write a letter to the Grand Visier, wherein he requested him to order the holy sepulchre to be put into the hands of the Latins. The consequence of which letter, and of other instances made by that King, was, that the sepulchre was appropriated about the year 1690, to the Latins: Since which time they alone have the privilege to say mass in it. And tho' Christians of all nations are permitted to go into it for their private devotions, yet none may solemnize any publick office of religion there, but the Latins (4).

'Divinity (p);' at which title many marvelled, especially the French Ambassador at Constantinople. Returning to Aleppo, he passed over the Euphrates, and went into Mesopotamia, Abraham's country, where he intended to send the Church-Catechism in Turkish, to some of their Bishops, who were mostly Armenians. This Turkish translation was procured by the care of Sir Thomas Bendyshe, the English Ambassador at Constantinople. After his return from Mesopotamia, he wintered at Aleppo, where he received several courtesies from the Consul, Mr Henry Riley. In the beginning of the year 1653, he departed from Aleppo, and came to Constantinople by land, being six hundred miles, without either servant, or Christian, or any man with him, that could so much as speak the Frank language [E]: Yet, by the help of some Arabick he had picked up at Aleppo, he performed that journey in the company of twenty Turks, who used him courteously; the rather, because he was by the way, Physician to them and their friends: A study (as he says) whereunto the iniquity of the times, and the opportunity of Padua drove him (q). After his arrival at Constantinople, the French Protestants there desired him to be their Minister. And, tho' he declared to them his resolution to officiate according to the English liturgy (a translation whereof, for want of a printed copy, cost him no little labour) yet they orderly submitted to it, and promised to settle on him, in three responsible men's hands, a competent stipend: And all this as they told him, with the express consent of the French Ambassador, but still under the roof and protection of the English Ambassador [F]. Before he quitted the Eastern parts, he intended to pass into Egypt, in order to take a survey of the churches of the Cophties, and confer with the Patriarch of Alexandria, as he had done already with the other three Patriarchs, partly to acquire the knowledge of those Churches, and partly to publish and give them a true notion of the Church of England (r). But whether he accomplished his design, is not certain. He went next into Transylvania, where he was entertained for seven years by George Ragotzi the second, Prince of that country; who honoured him with the divinity-chair in his new-founded university of Alba Julia (or Weissenburg) and endowed him, tho' a mere stranger to him, with a very ample salary (s). During his travels he collated the several confessions of faith of the different sorts of Christians, Greeks, Armenians, Jacobites, Maronites, &c. which confessions, he kept by him in their own languages (t). His constant design and endeavour, whilst he remained in the East, was, to persuade the Christians of the several denominations there, to a canonical reformation of some errors; and to dispose and incline them to a communion, or unity, with the Church of England (u). But his pious intentions were afterwards defeated by the artifices of the court of France (w). Upon the Restoration of King Charles II, Dr Basire was recalled by his Majesty to England, in a letter written to Prince Ragotzi. But this unfortunate Prince dying soon after, of the wounds he received in a battle with the Turks at Gyala, the care of his solemn obsequies were committed to the Doctor's care by his relict, Princess Sophia, whereby he was kept a year longer out of England (x). At length returning in 1661, he was restored to his preferments and dignities; and made Chaplain in Ordinary to King Charles II (y). He wrote several things [G]. Having for many years after the Restoration, quietly enjoyed his large revenues, he died on the 12th of October in the year 1676, and in the 69th year of his age (z):

This passage I take notice of, because it plainly manifests the Doctor's inviolable affection for the Church of England.

It was found in the Lord Hopton's cabinet after his decease, by Richard Watfon, an exile for his loyalty, who not only caused it to be printed at Bruges in 1656, 8vo. but also translated it into English, and put it out under the title of 'The antient Liberty of the Britanick Church, and the legitimate exemption thereof from the Roman Patriarchate, discoursed on four positions, and asserted, &c.' To which are subjoined, 'Three chapters concerning the Privileges of the Britanick Church, &c. selected out of a Latin manuscript intituled, Catholicæ-Romanus Pacificus,

At the end, there is, 'A Letter, written by Dr Basire to the Honourable Sir Richard Brown, when Resident at Paris for his Majesty of Great Britain; relating his travels and endeavours to propagate the knowledge of the doctrine and discipline, established in the Britanick Church, among the Greeks, Arabians, &c. dated from Pera, near Constantinople, 20 Julii, 1653.' Sir Richard Brown, in a letter to R. Watfon, printed at the beginning of this book, observes, 'That he could never read this letter, but as a kind of nine and twentieth of the Acts.' The Doctor writ some further accounts of his travels, in letters to Sir George Radcliffe, but they could not be recovered. This book, dedicated by the translator to Sir Richard Brown above-mentioned, was printed at London 1661, small 8vo. III. Dr Basire hath also written, 'The History of the English and Scotch Presbytery, Lond. 1659, 1660, 8vo.' And was buried in the yard belonging to the cathedral of Durham [H], where a tomb was erected over his grave, with an inscription, set down below in the note [I]. His character sufficiently appears from what hath been said of him in this article: Namely, That he was a learned, active, and industrious man; a true son of the Church of England; and a loyal subject to his two masters, King Charles I and II [K].

[H] He was buried in the yard belonging to the cathedral of Durham. And, as Wood informs us (6), 'Near the body of an antient servant that had lived many years with him, and not by that of his wife in the cathedral.'

[I] A tomb was erected over his grave, with an inscription, &c. The inscription on this tomb, is as follows, Deposum IS. BASIRE, S. T. D. Archidiaconi Northumb. hujus ecclesie Canonici, & Regibus aug. CAROLO I. & CAROLO II. a Sacris, qui obdormiuit 12 die Octob. Anno Domini 1676. anno Ætatis suæ 69. 1 Theff. iv. Deus eos qui dormierunt per Jesum adducet cum eo (7). i. e. 'Here lie the remains of ISAAC BASIRE, D. D. Archdeacon of Northumberland, Prebendary of this Church, and Chaplain to their Majesties King CHARLES I, and II, who fell on sleep the 12th day of October, in the year of our Lord 1676, and in the 69th year 'of his age. 1 Theff. iv. 14. Them which sleep in Jesus, will God bring with him.'

[K] A true son of the Church of England; and a loyal subject, &c.] An undeniable instance of this, and a signal proof of his sincerity was, his suffering the loss of his large preferments, rather than submit to what he thought unlawful. And a further confirmation of it was the resolution he took, 'not to exercise his function where the duty of praying for King Charles should be prohibited.' Accordingly, he refused from the Consul at Smyrna the offer of a plentiful support, because that would not be allowed (8). But, let us hear the Doctor's own words to the same effect (9). 'I should now, says he, long for a comfortable post-liminium [return] to my family; but yet I am resolved rather intermori [to die] in these toilsome ecclesiastical peregrinations, than to decline the least, on either hand, from my religion, or allegiance.' BASINGE (JOHN) (a), more commonly known by the name of Basingstockius, or de Basingstoke, was born at Basingstoke, a town in the north part of Hampshire, and from thence took his surname (b). He was a person highly eminent for virtue, and learning. For having very good natural parts, he so improved them by study, that he became a perfect master of the Latin and Greek languages; and also an eloquent Orator, a compleat Mathematician, a subtil Philosopher, and a sound Divine (c). The foundation of his great learning he laid in the university of Oxford (d), and, for his further improvement, went to Paris [A], where he resided some years (e). Not satisfied with that, he travelled to Athens (f), that agreeable seat of the Muses, and the mother of all polite literature, where he made many curious observations, and perfected himself in his studies, particularly in the knowledge of the Greek tongue [B]. At his return from thence to England, he brought over with him several curious Greek manuscripts (g), and introduced the use of the Greek numeral figures into this kingdom (h). He became also a very great promoter and encourager of the study of that language (i), which was much neglected in these western parts of the world [C]: And to facilitate it, he translated from Greek into Latin a Grammar (k), which he entituled, The Donatus of the Greeks [D]. Our author's merit and learning recommended him to the esteem of all lovers of literature; particularly to the favour of Robert Grossete, Bishop of Lincoln, by whom he was preferred to the archdeaconry of Leicester, as he had been some time before to that of London (l). He died in the year 1252 (m), the 26th of King Henry III.

[A] For his further improvement went to Paris.] The university of Paris was then, and had been for some years before in great reputation, on account of the famous persons that taught there; namely, Peter Abailard, Alberic of Reims, and especially Peter Lombard. See Cinquieme discours sur l'Histoire Ecclesiastique, par l'Abbé Fleury (1).

[B] Particularly in the knowledge of the Greek tongue.] He used to say, that he learned most there, from a young Lady named Constantina, daughter of the Archbishop of Athens; who, before the age of twenty, was a prodigy of learning, and, through her great skill in Natural Philosophy, could foretell plagues, earthquakes, thunder, eclipses, and the like (2).

[C] Which was very much neglected in these Western parts of the world.] From the ninth to the fourteenth century, may even to part of the fifteenth, the ignorance in all points of learning, and among the rest in the Greek tongue was extreme. So that, as Espenæus observes (3), Græcè nosse suspectum fuerit, Hebraicè propè Hæreticum; for a man to understand Greek, rendered him suspected; but, if he knew Hebrew, it made him be looked upon almost as a Heretic. The Monk's saying is also well known, Græcum non est legi, Greek is not to be read. For more instances of that monstrous ignorance, See An Apologie or Declaration of the Power and Providence of God, by George Hakewill, D. D. (4).

[D] Which he entituled The Donatus of the Greeks.] The rest of his works are, I. A Latin translation of a Harmony of the Gospels. II. A volume of sermons. III. Particulæ sententiarum per distinctiones, or a Commentary upon part of Lombard's Sentences, &c (5). — It was he also that informed, Robert, Bishop of Lincoln, that he had seen at Athens, a book called The Testament of the XII Patriarchs. Upon which the Bishop sent for it, and translated it into Latin (6), and it was printed among the Orthodoxographa, Basileæ 1555, fol. C

BASKERVILE (Sir SIMON) Knight, (of the antient family of the Baskerviles in Herefordshire) (a), an excellent scholar and eminent Physician, famous for his skill in Anatomy, and happy practice (b) in the time of King James the First, and King Charles the First, born at Exeter 1573, was the son of Thomas Baskerville, an Apothecary of that city (c), who observing an early love of knowledge and thirst after learning in his son, gave him a proper education for the university, to which he was sent about eighteen years old, entering him in Exeter-college in Oxford, on the 10th of March 1591, putting him under the care of Mr William Helm (d), a man no less famous for his piety than learning, under whose tutorship he gave such early proofs of his love of virtue and knowledge, that he was on the first vacancy elected Fellow of that house, before he had taken his Bachelor's degree in Arts, which delayed his taking it, till July the eighth, 1596 (e), to which he soon after added that of Art's-Master; and when he was admitted, had particular notice taken of him (according to our author's own words) for his admirable knowledge in Humanity and Philosophy (f) [A]. After this, viz. 1606, he was chosen Senior Proctor of the university; when he bent his study wholly to Physic, in the knowledge of which useful faculty, he became a most eminent proficient, and was then in as great esteem at the university for his admirable knowledge in medicine, as he had been before for other parts of learning, taking at once by accumulation (on the 20th of June, 1611) both his degrees therein, viz. that of Bachelor and Doctor (g). After many years study and industry, leaving the university, he came to London, where he became of great eminency in his profession; being a member of the College of Physicians, and for some time also President thereof (b). His high reputation for learning, great skill and good success in Physick [B], soon brought him in vogue at court, where he was sworn Physician to King James the First, and afterwards to King Charles the First; with whom, Mr Wood (i) tells us, he was in such esteem for his learning and accomplishments, that he conferred the honour of knighthood upon him. — He, by his practice, obtained a very plentiful estate, and shewed in his life a noble spirit suitable to the largeness of his fortune [C]. What family he left besides his wife, or who became his heir to all his great wealth, we can no ways find: He died July the 5th, 1641, aged 68 years (k), and was buried in the cathedral church of St Paul, in the city of London; (unto which, says Mr Prince, ' he had probably, ' been a liberal benefactor.' [A] For his admirable knowledge in humanity and philosophy.] He was so noted and eminent for his excellent parts, knowledge of the arts and sciences, and quickness in arguing, that, upon the first coming of King James to see that flourishing university, he was chosen as a prime person to dispute before him in the philosophic art, which he performed with great applause of his Majesty, who was not only there as an hearer, but as an accurate judge. — After this he had the honour to be one of the Proctors of that university, which gave him farther occasion of shewing himself publicly; and, having laid his grounds so firmly in Natural Philosophy, he went on happily in the study of Physic, according to the known method of Ubi definit Philosophus, ibi incipit Medicus (1).

[B] His high reputation for learning, great skill and good success in physick.] This gentleman is one of the famous men mentioned by Dr John Prideaux (as the great ornament of Exeter college, 'nay even of the university itself in their time) in his epistle to the reader before his consecration sermon (2); the dedication whereof (to the right worshipful George Hakewill, D. D. Archdeacon of Surrey, and founder of St James's Chapel), after a short preamble, runs thus: ' About ' your standing in Exeter college, what a knot of noted ' scholars appeared in sight of one another, to the credit of our common mother, who supplied her other ' defects with such a fair issue? ' He then enumerates the ' several persons' (and among the rest Dr Baskerville, whom he compliments with the title of a Worthy Physician) ' who had there laid those grounds which, ' since improved, have attained that height the world ' now takes notice of.'

[C] He by his practice obtained a plentiful estate, and shewed in his life a noble spirit, suitable to the largeness of his fortune.] No Physician of that age could, we imagine, have better practice than he, if what is reported of him be true, viz. that he had no less than one hundred patients a week; so that it is not at all strange he should amass so great an heap of wealth,

BASNET (EDWARD) Dean of St Patrick's, Dublin, was an active man at the time of the Reformation, and a Privy Counsellor to King Henry VIII, and King Edward VI. He was descended of an Esquire's family, long seated at Eaton in the county of Denbigh, in Wales, and had some relations in Ireland, who probably came over with him [A]; for we find no such names in history or records, planted in Ireland before his time. He was presented (a) by King Henry VIII to the vicarage of Swoids, in the diocese of Dublin, on the 11th of May, 1535, during the vacancy of that see by as to acquire the title of Sir Simon Baskerville the Rich (3). Fuller, speaking concerning the stoppage of the river Ex in Devon, has the following words: ' Some ' knowing Sir Simon Baskerville, a Physician, and native of this place, to have a plentiful purse and a ' public spirit, wished he would have taken the work ' in hand to cure this obstruction; but it was no Physician's work to meddle therewith, nor is it either ' powder or steel, or gilded pills, which can do the ' deed, but only pills of massy gold and silver (4). — As to his spirit being equal to the largeness of his fortune, we have, among others, the following instances recorded of him: That being a great friend to the clergy and inferior loyal gentry, he would never take a fee of an orthodox minister under a Dean, nor of any suffering Cavalier in the cause of King Charles the First, under a gentleman of an hundred a year, but would also with physick to their bodies generally give relief to their necessities (5).

D.* as having one; but Dugdale (7) goes yet farther, giving the very figure of the marble tablets, on which were the following inscriptions:

the murder of Archbishop Alan^(b); and this is the first promotion we find he had in Ireland, so that in all probability he came over the year before in the retinue and under the countenance of Sir William Skeffington, Lord-Deputy. About the latter end of April 1537, he was elected by the Chapter, Dean of the cathedral of St Patrick's, Dublin [B], that dignity being void on the eighth of the said month by the death of Geoffrey Fitch, his predecessor; and this promotion gave him a rank almost equal to the episcopal [C]. He was styled Sir Edward Bafnet, and is so named in an act of Parliament of that time [D]; not that he had been dubbed a Knight, but was called so in the same sense as those are called Sirs, who have taken the first degree in the university [E]. However active he was in the work of the Reformation, when he found his Prince, King Henry the Eighth, was in earnest to shake off the Pope's power, it is certain, he did not shew his zeal in other particulars, by running so fast into it as his Metropolitan, Archbishop Brown had done; who having received an order (c) from the Lord Thomas Cromwell, for removing all superstitious images and reliques out of the churches of his diocese, he set about it immediately, and removed them from all his parish churches. But the cathedral of St Patrick's being not under his jurisdiction, as Ordinary, but under the Dean alone, he could not make any alteration there, but through the Dean in person, who had neglected to carry this order into execution. The Prior of Christ-Church, who was head officer of that cathedral, was guilty of the same disobedience, and both of them had written to Rome for encouragement. The Archbishop attributes this their negligence to their avarice (d), on account of the rich offerings that devotees used to make at the shrines of the saints. Wherefore he applied to the Lord Privy-seal, Cromwell, for a more extensive commission, in the execution whereof, if occasion required, he might be supported by the civil power [F]. It is not likely Dean Bafnet waited to see such a new coercive authority in the hands of his Metropolitan: For he received such honours from his Prince, for his fidelity and personal bravery against the Popish rebels, as wipes off any suspicion of his being a bigot to Popery; further, than standing out a while against innovations, as a prudent man would do (especially where his interest was concerned) until he saw upon what foundation they were built. In 1539, O-Neal and O-Donnel, with some other Irish chieftains, or heads of clans, conspired against the gentleman of the Pale [G], and made terrible ravages in the county of Meath, by burning towns and villages as far as Tara-hill, before the country was able to oppose them.

[C] Gave him a rank almost equal to the episcopal. The jurisdiction of the Dean of this church, is called quasi episcopalis, as it were episcopal, and is founded upon the model of the church of Sarum in England. He is Lord of a manor extended about the cathedral, and has a fenechal for holding courts leet and baron.

[D] Named Sir Edward Bafnet in act of Parliament of that time. He is so named in an Irish statute of 28 Hen. VIII, chap. xiv. for the payment of the 20th parts, whereby it is provided, 'That nothing in the said act should extend to charge the said Sir Edward Bafnet, now Dean of the said cathedral church of St Patrick's Dublin, for the payment of the said twentieth part of the yearly profit or revenue of the said deanery, till the feast of the nativity of our Lord, which shall be in the year 1538.' The same act discharged him, and the other dignitaries of the said church, for the time being, from going or sending to any hosting, road, voyage, or journey, under the penalty of ten pounds forfeiture on the Sheriff who should detain for his or their absence; the weight of which extraordinary charges of hosting for reducing the kingdom to the obedience of the English government, used to be borne by such subjects as were answerable to the English laws; and whenever they failed to send their proportion of armed men and horses, they were amerced in certain sums of money.

[E] In the same sense as those are called Sirs, who have taken the first degree in the university. In this sense it is taken by Selden (1), and Chamberlayne (2); and we find in Chaucer and Shakespear, Clergymen frequently introduced under the titles of Sirs, though they were no Knights.

[F] Applied for a more extensive commission, and required to be supported by the civil power. All the matter alledged above in the text, appears from a complaining letter (3) of Archbishop Brown's couched in these terms, viz. 'I have observed your Lordship's letter of commission, and do find several of my pupils leave me for so doing. I will not put others in their livings till I do know your Lordship's pleasure; for it is meet I acquaint you first. The Romish reliques and images of both my cathedrals in Dublin, of the Holy Trinity, and St Patrick's, took off the common people from the true worship; but the Prior and the Dean find them so sweet for their gain, that they heed not my words: Therefore send in your Lordship's next to me, an order more full, and a chide to them and their Canons, that they might be removed. Let the order be, that the chiefe governors may assist me in it. The Prior and Dean have written to Rome to be encouraged, and if it be not hindered before they have a mandate from the Bishop of Rome, the People will be bold, and then tug long before his Highness can submit them to his Grace's orders, &c.'

[G] Conspired against the gentleman of the Pale. The Pale was a canton of land, which was sometimes larger, and sometimes less, as the English power prevailed or was depressed. It originally comprehended all Leinster, which, upon the English acquisition, was divided into the counties of Louth, Dublin, Meath, (afterwards divided into two counties) Kildare, Kilkenny, Carlow, and Wexford, and also properly comprized that district, which, in latter times, was converted into shire ground, and called the county of Wicklow. For all Leinster becoming the property of Earl Strongbow, upon his marriage with Eva, daughter of Mac-Murrough King of Leinster, and on the death of that Monarch in 1171, the whole became subject to the English power, and was called the Pale, from Palor, an old Latin word, which signified to inclose with statutes, as though the English by this imaginary fortification were separated from the Irish. What was immediately without the Pale, was called the Marches; all within the Pale was amenable to law, and the King's writ obeyed there. It once extended from Dundalk, the most remote part of the county of Louth, to Carlow and Kilkenny; but in Queen Elizabeth's time was included within much narrower bounds. The notion of the Pale became obsolete when the whole kingdom submitted to the English laws, and now is only to be found in history; the Marches of the kingdom being only the seas surrounding it.

The Lord-Deputy Grey, attended by several of the nobility and gentry, and the citizens of Dublin and Drogheda, marched out to suppress the insolence of the rebels; and Dean Basnet, laying aside his sacerdotal habit, served in a military capacity upon this occasion. Both armies were encamped on each side of the river Belahoa, where the English waited till their whole forces were come up; and then passing the river they attacked the Irish, killed great numbers of them, put the rest to flight, and took all their baggage. Stanihurst (e) gives an account of those gentlemen, who distinguished themselves for their courage and conduct in this action, and among the rest, mentions Sir Edward Basnet, Priest, who, on account of his good services to the State upon this occasion, was made one of his Majesty's Privy-Council [H]. In 1541, an act (f) passed in the Irish Parliament, declaring Henry the VIIIth King of Ireland, who before only enjoyed the title of Lord of Ireland [I], and making it high-treason in any person to impeach that title. His Majesty was accordingly proclaimed King of Ireland, in St Patrick's cathedral on the 13th of June, the principal nobility attending the solemnity in their parliament robes (g), and Dean Basnet, with all his Chapter in their Pontificalibus; and the joy upon that occasion in banquets, plays, and other entertainments, was very extraordinary. On the 5th of July 1542, the King wrote a letter (h) with his own hand to Dean Basnet, and others of the Privy-Council [K], 'Shewing them the necessity of providing good and faithful pastors through the diocese of Dublin, for instructing the people in the duties of religion, and no less in obedience to those new laws, which every day restored to them more and more of their Christian liberty, and promoted trade and industry through the whole kingdom.' In 1544 a report was made by the Lord-Deputy about the singular merit of Dean Basnet from the Crown. For which the King was pleased to reward him with a grant (i) to him and his heirs of the cattle, town, lands, and rectory of Kiltiernan [L], in the marches of the county of Dublin, to hold in capite by the service of one Knight's fee for ever, and three shillings Irish money, per annum rent. In 1545, August the 20th, the King, as a mark of his royal indulgence, granted to the Dean a particular favour [M], in which his Chapter, under his countenance, was concerned, which is registered among the records of the deanery (k). About Christmas this year, the Dean was employed to mediate a reconciliation between the Lord-Deputy St Leger, and the Earl of Ormond [N], whose bickerings and quarrels had caused no little uneasiness to the subjects; but he had the misfortune

[H] For his services upon this occasion was made one of his Majesty's Privy-Council.] Stanihurst (4) alleges, that he was for this service made also Dean of St Patrick's, Dublin; but this must be a mistake, he having been made so two years before this action; and it appears before, remark [B], that it was not in the power of the Crown to promote him to this dignity, the Deanery being elective by the Chapter.

[I] Who before only enjoyed the title of Lord of Ireland.] The Kings of England from the first conquest of Ireland to this time, never assumed any other title than Lords of Ireland, though they enjoyed Regal authority and jurisdiction under that stile, in as full a measure as if they had been called Kings: Yet the Irish did not pay the same reverence to the name of Lord, as they did to the name of King, and those who were traitorously inclined often made use of the distinction to inveigle the common people into rebellion. This was the cause of making the statute before mentioned in the text, and it answered the end intended by silencing all objections.

[K] The King wrote a letter to Dean Basnet, and others of the Privy-Council.] The letter here mentioned was sent in answer to an application made by the Privy Council, in favour of Archbishop Brown, to obtain for him a remittal of a sum of money which he owed to Lord Rochford, then a forfeiting person. It may not be unpleasant to the curious reader to see the language and manner of writing in that age. It runs thus (*), 'We bene pleased at youre humble suites to forgyve to th Archbushope of Dublyn the two hundreth and fyfte poundes, whyche he oughte to the late Lorde Rochford, not doubtyng but he woll the better applie his charge and offyce, and provyde that there may be some good prechers, to instructe and teche the people ther duties to God and us; the lacke whereof is grete in thos parties: Wylling therefor, youe, our Deputie and Counsaill, that yeoue have a specielle regard alfoo to this poynte: And as youe may provyde, that they may lerne by good and Catholique teaching, and the mynstracione of justice to knowe Godde's lawes and ours togythir, whyche shall dailie more and more frame and conforme theym in honest lving, and due obedyence to ther owne benefictes, and th univerfalle good of the countrey.'

Kiltiernan.] Kiltiernan lies about five miles S. S. E. of Dublin, in the road to Power's court; and was part of the possessions of the abbey of the blessed Virgin Mary near Dublin: After the suppression of which it was leased for twenty-one years to Walter Pippard of Kilca, gentleman, whose interest therein probably Basnet purchased; for he lived partly in this castle, and partly in the castle of Dean-Rath, near Cladocan, which belongs to the deanery of St Patrick's. Basnet is distinguished by both places in a pardon (5), that he sued out in 1545, for the death of one William Fowle.

[M] Granted to the Dean a particular favour.] The favour was a licence or privilege, that if the Dean or any of the Canons of St Patrick's, had benefices in any distant diocese, that they should not be obliged to personal residence in those parts, during their continuance in Dublin, as residentiaries near their own cathedral.

[N] To mediate a reconciliation between the Lord-Deputy St Leger and the Earl of Ormond.] The quarrel between the Lord-Deputy and the Earl of Ormond, had it's rise the preceding year from this motive. The Exchequer being exhausted, and the exigencies of affairs requiring a supply before a Parliament could be convened for that purpose, the Lord-Deputy by his own authority (6), would have laid some new and extraordinary impositions upon the people. The Earl of Ormond opposed the Deputy's proceedings, but finding his own influence could not prevail in obtaining a respite, he wrote letters of complaint to the Council of England, which were intercepted at sea by a friend of the Lord-Deputy, and put into his hands. After perusing them, he employed Dean Basnet, as a person in whose prudence he could confide, to repair in all haste to the castle of Kilkenny, and to communicate his knowledge of the letters to the Earl, that he might see the Deputy was not insensible of his complaints, and he had it in commission, to reason with the Earl about the subject of their quarrel, and, if possible, to end the disputes between them in a private, amicable manner, that neither the Council of England, nor the subjects of Ireland be troubled with their disputes. The Dean found the Earl immoveable, and finding nothing could prevail on him to drop his complaint, he returned unsuccessful. Soon after both parties were sent for by the English Council, who made up the breach between them, and put an end to all disputes.

fortune to fail of success. Notwithstanding his Majesty's gracious favour, lately conferred on the Dean and his Canons, yet, in the year 1546, the King projected (l) the ruin of that ancient cathedral, which he soon effected [O]. The Dean had a pension assigned him of two hundred marks sterling a year, to commence from the day that the church was surrendered, and pensions were settled by the King's Commissioners upon each of the Dignitaries, Prebendaries, Minor-Canons, and Vicars, in proportion to the income of their several offices before the dissolution of the cathedral. In the first year of King Edward the VIth, Commissioners were appointed (m), for disposing of all the revenues and buildings belonging to this cathedral. The deanery house, wherein Basnet lived was given to the Archbishop of Dublin, who was desired to accommodate the Lord-Deputy with the Archiepiscopal palace. Another house was ordered for the Lord-Chancellor's dwelling. The plate, jewels, and ornaments, were given to the Dean and Chapter of Christ-Church, except what was reserved for the parish-church of St Nicholas without the walls, whose service was always celebrated in St Patrick's church. One part of the building was ordered for holding the courts of justice in, while another part was appropriated to the use of the said parish-church. The hall belonging to the Vicars choral, was appointed for keeping a grammar-school, of which one Matthew Talbot was constituted master. The publick records, which before had been kept in Bermingham tower, were removed from the castle, and lodged in the library of St Patrick's; and the college of Minor-Canons and Choristers was fitted up, for an hospital to entertain twelve decayed soldiers, worn out in the service. Sir Edward Basnet lived to see all these changes, and continued a member of the Privy-Council, during the reign of King Edward the VIth; but did not live to see his church restored to it's former dignity, and all it's antient rights and privileges by King Philip and Queen Mary; for he died in the first of that Queen's reign, as appears by an inscription (n) post mortem Edwardi Basnet. He continued to write himself Dean after the surrender of his cathedral. For in an act of Council (o) of the fifth year of Edward VI, about sending the records of Bermingham-tower to the Library of St Patrick's, he subscribed himself Edward Basnet, Dean; but a dash of the pen is drawn over the word Dean.

[O] The King projected the ruin of that antient cathedral, which he soon effected. On the 8th of November, 38 Henry VIII (1546). The King issued a commission (7) to Sir Anthony St Leger, Lord-Deputy, Sir Richard Read, Lord-Chancellor, Edward Staples, Bishop of Meath, Sir William Brabazon, Vice-Treasurer of Ireland, Sir Thomas Luttrell, Chief-Justice of the Common-Pleas, James Bath, Chief-Baron of the Exchequer, and Sir Thomas Cusack, Master of the Rolls, empowering them, or any three of them, of whom Sir Anthony St Leger was to be one, to receive a resignation from the Dean and Chapter in person, of the church with all it's revenues, lands, tythes, &c. which was accordingly complied with on the 8th of January following, and the same was enrolled in the High Court of Chancery. But all this was done without the consent of the Archbishop, who is the chief Ordinary there, and the founder and Lord-Paramount of all their benefices. This undue resignation of the cathedral church afterwards occasioned a trial at law (8) about the validity of a lease perfected by the Archbishop of Dublin, without the consent of this Chapter, to one Brereton, which was only confirmed by the Dean and Chapter of Christ-Church, whereas both Deans and Chapters usually confirmed leases made by the Archbishop. When Archbishop Loftus was advanced to the See of Dublin, he looked upon the lease made to Brereton as bad, and endeavoured to break it. The case was adjudged in Easter-Term, 11 Elizabeth, and certified from England to the Lord-Deputy Sidney, under the hands of the Judges, that the lease was allowed to be good and valid in Law; because that at the time of making it, there was no Chapter in being except that of Christ-Church. A majority of all the Judges of England were of this opinion, although many held the contrary; who maintained, that after the death of the Archbishop who made the lease, it could not bind a successor; because it ought to have been confirmed by both Chapters, as leases always had been before. BASSANTIN (JAMES) a Scots Astronomer in the XVIth century, whose writings have deservedly transmitted his memory to posterity, was the son of the Laird of Bassantin in the Mers, and born some time in the reign of King James IV (a). He was sent while young to the university of Glasgow, where, instead of applying himself to words he studied things, and while other young men of his age were perfecting themselves in style, he arrived at a surprizing knowledge (for that time) in almost all branches of the Mathematicks (b). In order to improve himself in this kind of knowledge, and to gratify his passion for seeing other countries, he travelled, soon after he quitted the college of Glasgow, through the Netherlands, Switzerland, Italy, and Germany, fixing himself at last in France, where he taught the Mathematicks with applause, in the university of Paris (c). He fell in there with the common notions of the times, and was either credulous enough to entertain a good opinion of Judicial Astrology, or had so much address, as to make the credulity of others useful to him, by supporting an erroneous system, then in too great credit for him to demolish, even if that had been his inclination (d). For the humour of believing such kind of predictions, never ran so strong as at this time, nor ran any where stronger than in that country [A]. At last, having a desire

[A] Any where stronger than in that country. The great end of publishing lives of this nature, and in this manner, is not only to make the history of learned men, but of learning itself thoroughly known, which is a thing equally laudable and useful. In order to have a just notion of this Scots Astronomer's merit, we must consider him as contemporary with the famous Nicholas Copernicus, and somewhat earlier than the celebrated Tycho Brahe; so that we may thence discern how few helps he had, and what an amazing progress he made, if, as Vossius says, he was unacquainted with Greek, and knew but little of Latin (1). However, Vossius desire to see his relations, and spend his remaining days in his own country, he resolved to quit France, where he had acquired a high reputation and some fortune, and returned home in the year 1562 (e). It seems he made his journey through England, and as he was entering the borders of his native country, he met Sir Robert Melvil, a very worthy gentleman, and a most loyal and faithful servant to his unfortunate mistress, Mary Queen Scots; with whom he entered into a conversation on the then state of affairs, which gained him the reputation of being deeply versed in those styled the Occult Sciences (f). [B].

Vossius himself does him injury, by placing him a century later than that in which he flourished (2). In reference to Judicial Astrology, it must be owned it was at this time in so great credit, that almost all who applied themselves to Geometry, Astronomy, or, in short, to any branch of the Mathematicks, struck also into this way, which served in times of so much ignorance to keep up the reputation of this supposed science. As for Tycho Brahe, he was so addicted thereto, that he was wholly guided by it; and though he owned he was mistaken in many, or most, of his predictions, yet he remained obstinate in his opinion, alledging first, that the Astronomical tables then in use were faulty; and when with prodigious labour he had corrected these errors, and still found his judgments wrong, he complained that the rules commonly received were bad or misunderstood, but never laid the fault on the Art itself (3). This conduct of the learned had so bad an effect, that almost every Prince in Europe had his Astrologer. There were, however, more at Paris than almost in any other place. Catherine de Medicis was excessively addicted to this sort of superstition; and we know that the Horoscope of her Husband Henry II, was not only calculated, but published also by Gauric; and some affirm, but without due proof, that his death, and even the manner of it, was predicted by Jerom Cardan (4). Mr Finé, better known by his Latin appellation Orontius Fincœus, who taught Mathematics in the university of Paris, was famous for the judgments given by him upon Nativities; and once, his predictions having offended the Court, he was imprisoned for it a long while in the Bastile, which undoubtedly, had he been truly able to read future events in the Stars, he would have both foreseen and avoided (5). The old friendship and intimacy between the Scots and French nations, joined to the close connection between them at the time he was at school, and while Bassantin flourished, was sufficient to carry all the French customs over thither; and this, amongst the rest, and that in fact this was the case, will manifestly appear by what is related in the next note. If therefore we lay all this together, it will not seem at all strange that a Scotman, who had not comprehensive knowledge, should be led away by so many and great authorities, in a matter which perhaps made the best branch of his business, and for which he had naturally a happy turn; for we may with truth affirm, that no man ever set off the system of the twelve Houses, and the influences of the Planets in them, in a more plausible way, or which seems more free from absurdities. It is likewise more than probable, that as this humour long survived him, and even grew more and more into fashion after his decease, it promoted the reputation of his writings, and procured them so quick a sale. But how well or ill founded this notion may be, we are certain of this, that he laboured the point exceedingly, and left no stone unturned to maintain a doctrine he had too hastily embraced, and from which, so long as he lived, he never departed. His having this kind of taking way of delivering himself on such subjects, must have recommended him in Courts, where such notions frequently prevail; and I can easily conceive, that his being so well received took place in his judgment, made him more satisfied of the rectitude of his opinions, and gave him spirit likewise to profess, maintain, and defend them against all opponents.

[B] The reputation of being deeply versed in those styled the Occult Sciences. There are very few books in better credit for the supposed candour and veracity of their author, than the Memoirs of Sir James Melvil of Hal-hill, wherein, after describing the decisive Action which obliged Queen Mary to fly into England, proceeds thus (6): 'After the loss of the battle, her Majesty lost all courage, which she had never done before, and took so great fear, that she never rested till she was in England, thinking herself sure of refuge there, in respect of the fair promises formerly made her by the Queen of England by word to her Embassadors, and by her own hand, writ before and after she was captive in Lochleven. But God and the world knows how she was kept and used, for not only she refused to see her, of whom she appeared so oft so desirous of a sight and a meeting, but also caused to keep her prisoner, and at length suffered her life to be taken away, or else it was subtilly taken against her intention. This puts me in remembrance of a tale my brother Sir Robert told me: The time that he was busiest dealing betwixt the two Queens to entertain their friendship, and draw on the meeting at a place near York, one Bassintoun, a Scotman, who had been a traveller, and was learned in high sciences, came to him, and said to him, Good Gentleman, I hear so good a report of you, that I love you heartily, and therefore cannot forbear to shew you, that all your upright dealing and honest travel will be in vain: For whereas you believe to obtain advantage for your Queen at the Queen of England's hands, you do but lose your time and your travel: For first, they will never meet together; and next, there will never be any thing else but dissembling and secret hatred for awhile, and at length captivity and utter wreck to our Queen from England. My brother answered, he liked not to hear of such devilish news, nor yet would he in any sort credit them, as being false, ungodly, and unlawful for Christians to meddle with. Bassintoun answered, Good Mr Melvil, entertain not that harsh opinion of me, I am a Christian of your own religion, and fear God, and purposes never to cast myself on any of the unlawful arts that you mean; but so far as Melancthon, who was a godly Theologue, hath declared lawful, and written concerning the Natural Sciences, which are lawful and daily read in divers Christian universities, in the which, as in all other arts, God gives to some less, and to others clearer knowledge; by the which knowledge I have attained to understand, that at length the kingdom of England shall of right fall to the crown of Scotland, and that at this instant there are some born who shall brook lands and heritages in England: But, alas! it will cost many their lives, and many bloody battles will be fought ere things be settled, or take effect. And by my knowledge, says he, the Spaniards will be helpers, and will take a part to themselves for their labour, which they will be loath to leave again.' It has been shewn in the former note, that listening to these kind of predictions was one great foible of those times; and if it had not been so, one could hardly account for so wise a man as Sir James Melvil giving this, and some stories of the like kind, a place in his book. But it is observable, that he gives no judgment upon it, he introduces it only as a tale, and does not at all recommend it to his readers belief by professing it had gained credit with him. A less cautious writer, who repeats this story (7), could not help adding, that all our author's predictions were fulfilled except the last, and even as to that he makes some apology. It may not be amiss therefore to bestow a few remarks, and they shall be but short ones, upon this singular story. I. It does not appear how he should come at this knowledge on the principles of his art, supposing it to be an art. He might indeed have calculated the natiivities of both the Queens, and from thence have predicted what would happen to them; but how could he from thence learn that the crown of England should descend to a Prince of Scotland? It might be answered well enough if King James had been then born, but he was not till four years afterwards; and from the Horoscopes of the two Queens it was impossible, by the rules of Astrology, for him to pretend to foretel what he did. II. It is in the next place clear, that the greatest part of what he foretold was absolutely false; for there was not so much as one battle fought, or a drop of blood shed, to make way for the accession of the King of Scots, which was the act of Queen Elizabeth herself; and the King of Spain was so far from assisting in this, that he actually set

But whoever maturely weighs what passed in that conference, of which we have a most authentick account, will see good reason to believe, that our learned author was more a Politician than a Prophet, or else, that he talked at random, and on false or precarious principles. It does not at all appear in what manner he spent the remainder of his life, after he came back to Scotland, but it is certain he did not survive long, since his decease happened, as those who were well acquainted with him attest, in 1568 (g). As to his learning, we are told by those who admired it most, it lay not in languages, of which, except his mother-tongue, he knew none thoroughly, though he spoke and taught in French, but in a very incorrect manner, and wrote much worse (h). He had very clear notions in most parts of his writings, and was far from being a contemptible Astronomer, though the commendations bestowed on him by some authors, very far surpass his deserts. He was too much tinctured with the superstition of the times, not to intermix a vast deal of false, and even ridiculous stuff in his writings, on the virtues, aspects, and influences of the planets; yet in other respects he shews much good sense and industry, which render his works very well worth reading, and ought to secure both them and his memory from oblivion, as they are so many indubitable testimonies of his merit (i) [C]. As to his religion, he is reported to have been a zealous Protestant; and with regard to his political principles, he is said to have adhered to the famous Earl of Murray, then struggling for that power which he afterwards obtained (k).

set up a title against that Prince, and did all that lay in his power to hinder his succession: So that if this story proves any thing, it must prove that there was either no certainty in this art, or that our author did not sufficiently understand it. III. Upon the whole, it is highly probable that this man was no friend to the negotiation Sir Robert Melvil was then engaged in, and that he said what he did, with a view to hinder that Gentleman from proceeding in it: And if we take the thing thus, he may be allowed to have acted very right as a Politician; but a man must have had very indifferent parts for a statesman, who could be diverted from his duty by such suggestions as these; and it is certain that they had no weight with Sir Robert Melvil, who behaved in all these transactions with the utmost prudence, steadiness, and courage. But when things were over, and Queen Mary in her grave, Sir Robert Melvil told this tale to his brother, who committed it to writing, and so it has passed for a full proof of our author's proficiency in these high sciences; whereas there cannot well be a more convincing argument of the contrary.

[C] So many indubitable testimonies of his merit.] The Works published by our author were these that follow, viz. I. Astronomia, Jacobi Bassantini Scoti, opus absolutissimum, in quo quicquid unquam peritiores Mathematici in caelis observarunt, eo ordine, etque methodo traditur, ut cuiusvis post hac facile innotescant quaecunque de Astris ac Planetis, nec non de eorum variis orbibus, motibus, passionibus, &c. dici possunt, ingens et doctum volumen ter editum Latine et Gallice: That is, 'The Astronomy of John Bassantin, a Scot, a compleat work; wherein, whatever the most expert Mathematicians have observed in the heavens, is digested into such order, and in so exact a method, that every one may henceforward apprehend whatever, as to the Stars and Planets, their orbs, motions, passions, &c. can be delivered; a work large and learned, now thrice published in Latin and French.' This is the Title given by John Tornæsius, who translated it into Latin, and published it in a large folio at Geneva in 1599. In his account of our author, in his Epistle dedicatory addressed to Frederick IV, Count Palatine of the Rhine, he represents him as a wonderful proficient in this science; and, as a proof of it, tells him, that this circumstance was very surprising in him, that tho' he was unskilled in polite learning, and understood only his Mother-Tongue, yet he made so great a progress in Astronomy, as to be esteemed one of the greatest Astronomers of the age. And whereas other persons were obliged to learn the Latin, Greek, and Arabic languages, if they were desirous of raising themselves any reputation in that science, our author was born an Astronomer, and not made one. He observes likewise, that Bassantin's book was at first published in French, not as it was written by the author, who was so little master of that language, notwithstanding he lived most part of his time in France, that he could not write even so much as tolerable Grammar; upon which account the stile of his book had been corrected and polished by some other persons who better understood the genius of that language. This affords us a sufficient account of the author; but, perhaps, the value of his book will be better understood by taking a view of it's contents. In this great work he first of all lays down the necessary axioms and definitions for the understanding of the science, and then gives a table of Sines; after this a treatise of Rectilineal Triangles, in twenty propositions; and another of Spherical Triangles, in thirteen propositions. The next Tract is concerning the Sphere of the World, in thirteen chapters. The first chapter treats of the System of the World in general, and the several parts of it. The second of the Magnitude of the Earth compared with the Firmament. The third of the Circles of the Sphere. The fourth of the Declination of the Degrees of the Ecliptic from the Equinoctial. The fifth of the Ascension and Descension of Signs in a direct Sphere. The sixth of the Ascension and Descension of the Signs in an oblique Sphere. The seventh of the Eastern and Western Latitude. The eighth of the Declination, Ascension, Descension, and Latitude, of the Eastern and Western Stars. The ninth of the Elevation of the Stars above the Horizon. The tenth of the Variation of the Artificial Days and Nights in the different parts of the Earth. The eleventh of the Twelve Celestial Houses, and their Divisions. The twelfth of the Division of the Zones and Climates. And the thirteenth of the Regions of the Earth; to which is annexed, A Table of the Longitudes and Latitudes of the principal cities and places of the world. Then follow the Hypotheses of the Celestial Orbs, containing the Theory of the Sun, Moon, Saturn, Jupiter, Mars, Venus, and Mercury. After this he gives an account of the direct retrograde and stationary motions of the Planets, their various Aspects, the Declination of the Stars, the Latitude of the Moon, the Latitude of the three Superior Planets, the Latitude of Venus and Mercury; of their Eccentricities, Ellipses, and whatever else relates to the Planets. After he has treated of these things, he gives us the Theory of the Motion of the Eighth Sphere, and concludes with the practical part of Astronomy, in thirty propositions; wherein he gives the figures of many curious instruments, with proper tables, and directions for the use of them. II. Paraphrase de l'Astrolabe avec une amplification de l'usage, de la Astrolabe; that is, 'A Paraphrase (or ample explanation) of the Astrolabe, with an improvement as to the uses to which this instrument may be applied.' This Treatise was printed at Lyons in 1555, and again at Paris 1617, in 8vo. III. Super Mathematica Genethliaca; i. e. 'Of the Calculation of Nativities.' IV. Arithmetica, or 'A Treatise of Arithmetick.' V. Musica secundum Platonem; i. e. 'Musick on the principles of the Platonists.' VI. De Mathesi genero; i. e. 'Of the Mathematicks in general.' The very titles of his works, joined to the age in which he flourished, sufficiently justify his right to a place in this work; and though he might have foibles, yet without doubt his practical skill was great, and the pains he took contributed not a little to bring in that accuracy and correctness in observations, which have effectually exploded those superstitions to which, with other great men, he was too much addicted.

behind him one only son, an infant, by whose death soon after the inheritance devolved to Fulk (b). In the year 1225, he was made Provost of the collegiate church of St John of Beverly, and in 1230, Dean of York (c). In December 1241, he was elected, by the Chapter of London, Bishop of that See, in the room of Roger Niger [A], both in regard of his family and his great virtues, and notwithstanding the King's recommendation of Peter de Eggeblanche Bishop of Hereford (d). The See of Canterbury being vacant at the time of this Prelate's election, he was not consecrated till the ninth of October 1244 [B], at which time the solemnity was performed at London in the church of the Holy Trinity (e). In the year 1250, Bishop Basset began to have a warm dispute with Archbishop Boniface (f), concerning the right of metropolitan visitation [C]; in the course of which he met with very rough treatment from the Archbishop, and at last, after a long contest, thought it best to submit [D], and acknowledge his jurisdiction (g). But he succeeded better in the opposition he made to Rustand the Pope's Legate [E], in 1255 (h). In 1256, this Prelate began to build the church of St Faith, near that of St Paul, on the spot which King John had formerly given to the Bishops and Chapter of London for a market (i). In the latter part of his life, he is said (k) to have tarnished his virtues, by inclining to the cause of the rebellious Barons [F]. He died of the plague in 1259, having sat near fifteen years from the time of his consecration, and was buried the twenty-fifth of May, in St Paul's church (l). Bishop Basset founded a chantry in his cathedral church, near the altar of the Blessed Virgin, for his own soul; and another near the altar of St Catherine, for those of Alan and Alice, his father and mother. He also bequeathed to his church a golden apple, two rich chests for relics, some ecclesiastical vestments, and several books relating to Church matters (m).

[A] He was elected ——— in the room of Roger Niger.] During the vacancy of the See, the King, in consideration that the temporalities were in his hands, ordered his treasurer, January the 17th, 1244 (1), to distribute victuals, on the ensuing feast of the Conversion of St Paul, to fifteen thousand poor people, in the church-yard of St Paul's, and upon that occasion to light up fifteen hundred wax tapers in the church. Whence it appears what large alms were formerly bestowed by the Bishops and other Ecclesiastics (2).

[B] He was not consecrated till the 9th of October, 1244.] About the beginning of that year, Archbishop Boniface, being then in France, commissioned a certain number of Bishops to consecrate Basset at his church in London (3). But, at the intercession of the Chapter of Canterbury, he revoked that commission in February following, under pretence that it was surreptitiously obtained, namely, by dissembling the privilege of the church of Canterbury; so that Basset could not obtain consecration but by entering a solemn protest (4), that he had no design to infringe the rights of that church.

[C] He had a warm dispute with Archbishop Boniface concerning the right of metropolitan visitation.] The See of Canterbury had from the beginning an undoubted authority over all the churches of that province, received appeals, censured offenders, and occasionally exercised a jurisdiction over the Bishops and Canons of the cathedral churches. But hitherto solemn metropolitan visitations at stated times were not in use. Boniface was the first who introduced them (5), and loaded the Bishops and Chapters with a prodigious expence, under the name of procurations. On the 12th of May, 1250, he visited the Bishop of London, and, being intolerably insolent, as well as avaritious, treated the good Prelate with the grossest indignities and most opprobrious language. In crastino autem visitavit episcopum Fulconem, apud quem inverecundiam ab eodem archiepiscopo factam, tum in esculentis, tum in poculentis, tum in ferratura, scilicet equorum deferratorum, si quis enarraret, aures et animos offenderet audientium, imo et corda cruentaret (6). Designing to visit the Chapter of St Paul's, and the Priory of St Bartholomew, he was opposed by the Canons of both places, alleging that they had a learned and diligent Bishop, who was their proper visitor, and that they neither ought, nor would submit to any other visitatorial power. Cui respondit unus Canonorum pro omnibus, quod episcopum haberent peritum et diligentem, qui eos habuit, cum necesse fuerat, visitare, nec voluerunt, nec debuerunt ab alio, ne contemptus videretur, visitari (7). The Archbishop hereupon excommunicated the Canons, and involved the Bishop, as favouring their obstinacy, in the same sentence (8). Both sides appealed to Rome, where the Archbishop, supported by money and the royal favour, pleaded his cause in person; and, notwithstanding the English Clergy, by their Proctors, offered the Pope four thousand* marks to be exempted from the archiepiscopal visitation, he obtained a confirmation of his visitatorial power, with this restriction only, that he should be moderate in his demand of procurations (9).

[D] He thought it best to submit.] Matthew Paris represents his submission as the effect of fear, lest his holding out against the Archbishop should provoke the King to seize his effects, and ruin his family; and therefore, as the least evil, he chose for the present to humble himself under the Archbishop's authority, rather than experience the consequences of the King's displeasure. His igitur subtiliter pensatis incommodis, quasi inter duas molas contritus, angustiabatur: hinc honor et causa ecclesie sue, hinc impetus regalis iracundie, ipsum hinc inde disrhebant. Tandem vero, ut minus malum subiret, praelegit, quamvis læsus, et quamvis passus injuriam, ad tempus humiliari, et jurare stare provisioni archiepiscopi licet adversantis, potius quam regalis impetus discrimen experiri (10).

[E] He succeeded better in the opposition he made to Rustand the Pope's Legate.] The King and the Pope had agreed, with their joint force, to squeeze a large sum of money out of the English Clergy, and to share the plunder. To this end Rustand, the Pope's Legate, summoned a Council at London in October, 1255, in which he produced a commission from the Pope to demand a certain sum of them. Whereupon the Bishop of London, rising up, said: 'Before I will submit to such great servitude, injury, and intolerable oppression of the Church, I will lose my head.' Antequam tanta ecclesie consentiam servituti, injuria, et intolerabili oppressioni, profecto decapitabor. The rest of the Prelates being animated by Basset's constancy, it was unanimously decreed, that the Pope's demand should not be complied with, nor any regard paid to Rustand's authority or censures. The Legate carried his complaints to the King, who, sending for the Bishop of London, reviled him most shamefully, threatening him with the severest Papal censures. To which Fulk replied, 'The King and the Pope, though they cannot justly, yet, as being stronger than me, may force my Bishoprick from me; they may take away the mitre, but the helmet will remain.' Auferant episcopatum, quem tamen non possunt de jure auferre, Papa et Rex, qui me fortiores sunt; tollant mitram, galea remanebit. This steadiness, and the decree of the Council, quite disconcerted the scheme (11).

[F] He inclined to the cause of the rebellious Barons.] Take notice, that it is Matthew Paris, a Monk, who censures our Prelate for so doing, telling us, That, by this step, he brought the greater stain upon his character, inasmuch as he was a man of more honour than the rest. In hoc tanto plus famam suam denigravit, quanto aliis fuerat generosior (12). And afterwards, mentioning Basset's death, he says of him: 'He was a noble and an honourable man, and, excepting only his last slip, the anchor of the whole kingdom, and the shield of stability and defence.' Vir quidem nobilis et magnæ generositatis, et, nisi paulo ante titubasset, totius regni anchora, et clypeus stabilitatis et defensionis (13).

BASSET (PETER, Esq;) a gentleman of a good family [A], and a writer in the XVth century, was Chamberlain (a), or Gentleman of the Privy-Chamber, to King Henry V (b). He was a constant attendant on that brave Prince, and an eye-witness of most of his glorious actions both at home and abroad: All which he particularly described, and faithfully related (c). For, beginning at his tenderest years, he gave a full and exact account of his several expeditions into France; his glorious victories, large conquests, and illustrious triumphs in that kingdom; his most advantageous and honourable peace with Charles VI; his marriage with the Princess Catherine, his coronation at Paris: And, finally, his death, and the coronation of King Henry VI, his son and successor. These several remarkable events, Peter Basset comprized in one volume, which he intitled, The Actes of King Henry V. This book was never printed; but is extant in manuscript in the college of Heralds, and perhaps in some other places [B]. In one particular he differs from the rest of King Henry Vth's historians: For whereas Montrelet says (d), that that Prince died of a St Anthony's fire; others, of a fever and dysentery (e); or of the disease of St Fiacre (f), which is a flux accompanied with the hæmorrhoids; Peter Basset, who was with him at the time of his decease, affirms, that he died of a pleurisy [C]. This author flourished about the year 1430, under the reign of King Henry VI (g).

[A] A gentleman of a good family. This noble family, which was seated at Draiton Basset in Staffordshire, derived it's descent from one Turstin, Lord of that place in the reign of Henry I. They grew up into a numerous and considerable family (1). For, from this stock at Draiton, were derived the Bassetts of Welleden, Northamptonshire; Wiccomb, Bucks; Sapcott, Leicestershire; Hedendon, Oxfordshire; (which were all Barons of the Realm) (2), besides several other eminent private families, (3) ———— Ralph Basset, and Richard his son, were successively Justiciaries of England, in the reigns of King Henry I. and King Stephen (4).

[B] But is extant in MS. in the college of Heralds, &c. Upon the closest examination it appears, that he is originally quoted only by Edw. Hall in his Chronicle (5), and perhaps by J. Bale (6). What hath been said of him, or quoted out of his writings, either by Mr Thomas Goodwin in his 'History of the reign of Henry the Vth,' or by other Historians within that period, is visibly borrowed from Hall. Dr Nicolson (7) mentions Basset only upon the authority of Pits, who had taken his account from Bale.

[C] P. Basset ——— affirms that he died of a Pleurisy. Edw. Hall, from whom we learn this particular, calls it a Plurifis; 'whiche (adds he) at that tyme was so rare a sickenes, and so straung a disease, that the name was to the most part of men unknown, and phisicians were acquainted as little with any remedy for the same, and therefore every man judged as he thought, and named a sickenes that he knew, & shooting not near the pricke, nor understanding the nature of the disease (8).'

BASTARD (THOMAS), a Clergyman and a Poet, was born at Blandford in Dorsetshire, and educated at Winchester-school; from whence he removed to New-College in Oxford, where he was chosen Perpetual Fellow in the year 1588, and two years after took the degree of Bachelor of Arts. But indulging too much his talent for satire, he was expelled the college for a libel; and not long after, being then in Holy Orders, he was made Chaplain to Thomas Earl of Suffolk, Lord-Treasurer of England, through whose favour and interest he became Vicar of Beer-regis, and Rector of Amour or Hamer, in his native country, having some time before taken the degree of Master of Arts. He was a person of great natural endowments, well skilled in the learned languages, a celebrated poet [A], and, in his later years, an excellent preacher [B]. His conversation was witty and facetious, which made his company courted by all ingenious men. He was thrice married, as appears from one of his epigrams [C]. Towards the latter end of his life, being disordered in his senses, and thereby brought into debt, he was confined in the prison in All-Hallows parish in Dorchester; where dying in a very obscure and mean condition, he was buried in the church-yard belonging to that parish, April the 19th, 1618 (a).

[A] — A Poet. Among other poetical performances of our author's, that had been published, Mr Wood tells us (1), he had seen only the following. 1. Epigrams, which were greatly admired in that age, and occasioned Sir John Harrington's addressing one or more epigrams to our author. 2. Magna Britannia, a Latin poem in three books, dedicated to King James I. London, 1605, in quarto. Besides which, there is in the King's Library, Jacobo regi I. carmen gratulatorium (2), i. e. 'A congratulatory poem to King James I.' Under this head we may mention his Libels, two of which Mr Wood met with in his collection of Libels or Lampons, written by several Oxford Students in the reign of Queen Elizabeth. One of them is intitled An Admonition to the City of Oxford; or his Libel intitled Mar-prelate's Bastardine; wherein he reflects upon all persons of note in Oxford, who were suspected of criminal conversation with other men's wives, or with common strumpets. The other, made after his expulsion, and in which he disclaims the former, begins thus; Jenkin, why man? why Jenkin? sie for shame, &c. But neither of these were printed (3).

[B] — A Preacher. Under this character, he published, I. Five Sermons, Lond. 1615, 4to. The three first, on Luke i. 76, are called The Marigold and the Sun. The two last, on Luke vii. 37, 38, are intitled The Sinner's Looking-Glass. II. Twelve Sermons, Lond. 1615, 4to. The first, on Ephef. iv. 26, is intitled A Christian Exhortation to innocent Anger. The second, on Exod. iii. 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, is intitled The Calling of Moses, &c (4).

[C] He was thrice married, as appears by one of his epigrams. It is this (5):

The meaning of which (for it is impossible to give the force of it in an English version) is, that he married his first wife, in his youth, for love; his second, when he was grown a man, for money; and his third, in his old age, for a nurse.

BASTON (a) (ROBERT), a Poet of some note in the XIVth century, and author of several works [A], was descended of a noble family, and born in Yorkshire, not far from Nottingham. In his youth he became a Carmelite Monk, and afterwards Prior of the convent of that order at Scarborough. He was likewise Poet Laureat, and Publick Orator, at Oxford (b). King Edward I, in his expedition into Scotland in 1304, took Robert Baston with him, in order to celebrate his victories over the Scots; but our Poet, being taken prisoner by the enemy, was obliged by torments to change his note, and sing the successes of Robert Bruce [B], who then claimed the crown of Scotland (c). Our author's poetry was somewhat barbarous, but not contemptible for the age in which he lived. He died about 1310, and was buried at Nottingham, being succeeded in his monastery by his brother Philip (d).

BASTWICK (JOHN) a man more remarkable for the great noise he made, in the last century, than for any singular merit of his own, was born at Writtle in Essex (a), in the year 1593 [A]. He was entered in Emmanuel-college, Cambridge, the nineteenth of May 1614, where he continued but a little while (b). Leaving the university without a degree, he travelled beyond sea for the space of nine years (c), where he spent his time between the schools and the camp (d), and was made Doctor of Physick at Padua (e). Upon his return to England, he settled at Colchester, where he practised Physick for some time (f). But not satisfied with his profession, and being a man of strong zeal, with a warm imagination, and commanding a pure and fluent Latin style (g), he applied himself to write books, especially against Popery. About the year 1633, he printed in Holland (h) a treatise called Elenchus Religionis Papiſticæ, with Flagellum Pontificis & Episcoporum Latialium, 'A Confutation of Popery, and a Scourge for the Pope and the Latin Bishops (i);' which he industriously dispersed in London, and throughout the kingdom (k). It was in effect an answer to one Short a Papist, who maintained the Pope's Supremacy, the Mass, and Papal Religion [B]: And Bastwick, in his epistle to the reader, declared, that he intended nothing against such Bishops, as acknowledged their authority from Kings and Emperors (l). But it seems, as Mr Fuller observes, he confined not his character so to the Latian Bishops beyond the Alpes, but that our English Prelates counted themselves touched therein (m). The author therefore being questioned for this book in the High-Commission-Court, in 1633 (n), was, on the twelfth of February, fined a thousand pounds, sentenced to be excommunicated, debarred his practice of Physick, his books to be burnt, to pay costs of suit, and to remain in prison till he made a recantation [C]. In pursuance of this sentence, he was committed two years to the Gate-House (o), where his violent temper would not permit him to be quiet. For he writ during his confinement there, Apologeticus ad Præsules Anglicanos, &c. 'An Apology for himself, addressed to the Bishops (p),' and another book called

[A] Was born — in the year 1593. This appears from the date on his picture, prefixed to his Flagellum pontificis & episcoporum latialium (1): For there it is said, that he was forty-seven years old in 1640, and consequently must have been born in 1593.

[B] He printed in Holland a Treatise called Elenchus, &c. It was first printed in Holland, in 1633, and reprinted at London in 1641, 12mo, under the title of Flagellum Pontificis & Episcoporum Latialium, autem & multis argumentis locupletatum, with three Letters at the end: 1. To a Protestant who had embraced Popery. 2. Concerning the absurdity of the Popish Religion, to one Mr St John: And the 3d, to prove that the Church of Rome is not a true Church, directed to one Coleman. In the beginning, there is a Letter of thanks to the King, the Parliament, and the people of England; in which he bitterly inveighs against his persecutor Archbishop Laud. The book is written in good Latin, and, to an unprejudiced reader, there doth not appear any thing in it that could deserve so severe a censure as was inflicted on the author; except it is his maintaining a parity or equality between Bishops and Presbyters (2), which was by some persons reckoned a most heinous crime in those days. The contents of the book are, An Answer to these Questions: 1. Whether Christ constituted Peter monarch, or supreme head, of the Catholic Church: Nay, whether Peter was ever Bishop of Rome? 2. Whether the Pope (if he is Bishop) as Bishop of Rome, has authority and jurisdiction over his fellow-christians, and the flock of God, or no? 3. Whether the Popish Bishops are true Bishops? The first he thinks is sufficiently overthrown by these passages of Scripture, Matth. xx. 25, 26. Mark x. 43, 14. Luke xxii. 25, 26. To the second he opposes Acts xx. 28. Titus i. 5. Philip. i. 1. 1 Pet. v. 1, 2, &c. from all which he infers, that Bishops and Presbyters were originally the same. In answer to the third he affirms, that the Popish Bishops not performing the functions of a Bishop, as laid down by St Paul, (to Timothy and Titus) are not true Bishops.

[C] The author — was fined, &c. All the Bishops present at this censure, as Whitelock observes (3), denied openly that they held their jurisdiction, as Bishops, from the King; but they affirmed, that they had their jurisdiction from God only. For which, as that author further observes, they might perhaps have been censured themselves in the times of Henry II. Edw. III. or Henry VIII.

called the Letany (g), wherein he grossly reflected upon the Bishops, taxed them with an inclination to Popery, and exclaimed against the severity and injustice of the High-Commission's proceedings against him (r). The persons then in power were of too impatient and revengeful a temper, to let such reflections and invectives go unpunished [D]. Accordingly, on the 11th of March, 1637, an information was exhibited against him (and Henry Burton, B. D. and William Prynne, Barrister at Law) in the Star-Chamber, by the Attorney-General, 'For writing and publishing seditious, schismatical, and libellous books, against the Hierarchy of the Church (s).' They being thereupon served with sub-pœna's returnable immediately, refused to appear, unless they had liberty of access to Counsel; which being granted them, they prepared their answers; but Dr Bastwick's Counsel, for fear of offending the court, refused to sign his answer, which he had drawn up himself; alledging it was of such a nature, that they could not well set their hands to it (t). And indeed, according to Mr Whitelocke (u), it contained something very abusive, to this effect: 'The Prelates are invaders of the King's prerogative royal, contemnors and despisers of the holy scriptures, advancers of popery, superstition, idolatry, and prophaneness: Also they abuse the King's authority, to the oppression of his loyallest subjects, and therein exercise great cruelty, tyranny, and injustice; and in execution of those impious performances, they shew neither wit, honesty, nor temperance. Nor are they either servants of God, or of the King, but of the Devil, being enemies of God and the King, and of every living thing that is good. All which he is ready to maintain.' — And none of his friends could prevail with him to expunge this, and other the like passages. Upon the Counsel's refusing to sign the answers, Bastwick, and the rest of the defendants, petitioned the court, that, according to antient precedents, they might put in their answers signed with their own hands; and declared, they would abide by the censure of the court, if they did not make good what was contained therein. But this was refused by the court; which ordered them to put in their answers by the Monday following under Counsel's hand, or else they should be taken pro confesso. Bastwick, thereupon tendered his answer under his own hand at the Star-Chamber-Office, and there left it. On the 14th of June, the day wherein sentence was passed on them, they first presented to the court a cross-bill against the Bishops, which was not admitted (w). Next, they were told, That they had not put in their effectual answer into the court, though they had sufficient notice and competent time. And the Lord-Keeper Coventry informed them, of a precedent, wherein, for such a neglect, the court had, after six days notice, taken a cause pro confesso, [as if the parties had confessed] whereas they had had six weeks allowed them; and therefore the court desired them to shew cause, why sentence should not pass upon them immediately (x). Dr Bastwick, in particular, being asked, why he did not bring his answer in due time? laid the blame on the cowardice of his Counsel, that durst not sign it, for fear of the Prelates; and then tendered an answer upon oath under his own hand: But the Lord-Keeper told him, they had no need of his answer. Whereupon Bastwick said, My Lord, I most humbly beseech your Honours to accept of it; for it is pretended that it is taken pro confesso, as if we had failed on our parts, either out of contempt to the order, or negligence, both which on my part I am free from; and if your Honours shall refuse it, then I protest before men and angels this day, that I will put this answer of mine in Roman buff (*), and send it through the whole Christian world, that all men may see my innocency, and your illegal proceedings, and this I will do if I die for it; and then casting it into the court, my Lord-Keeper said, 'Dr Bastwick, it seems we must have your answer.' After that, Bastwick taking notice of the punishment, which he understood was designed for him and his fellow-sufferers, added — I shall presume to say unto your Honours, as Paul spake unto the Centurion, when they went about to whip him, What, saith he, will you whip a Roman? So, my good Lords, let me say unto your Honours, What, will you cut off a true and loyal subject's ears for doing his duty to his King and country? Will you cut off a scholar's ears? Will you cut off a Doctor of Physick's ears, able to cure Lords, Peers, Kings, and Emperors? Will you cut off a Christian's ears? Will you make curs of Christians, my Lords? Will you cut off a catholick, apostolick, a Roman's ears? Men, brethren, and fathers, what an age do we live in, that we must thus be exposed unto the merciless fury of every malignant spirit (y). In the end, he, and Burton, and Prynne were censured, as scandalous, seditious, and infamous persons (z); and condemned in a fine of five thousand pounds each; to stand in the pillory in the Palace-yard at Westmister, and there to lose their ears; and to perpetual imprisonment (a) in three remote places of the kingdom [E]. [D] The persons then in power were of too impatient a temper, &c. It appears from Rushworth (4), that June 6, 1636, all the Judges, and the King's counsel, met at Serjeant's-Inn to consider, whether there were not divers passages in Bastwick's and Burton's books that amounted to high-treason? But the Judges agreeing, that no indictment would be found good for treason, unless it was grounded upon the statute 25 Edw. III. 'Tis probable that nothing could be found in their books that amounted to high-treason, according to that statute.

[E] In the end, Bastwick, Burton, and Prynne were censured, &c. At the passing of this censure, Archbishop Laud made a speech, which was afterwards printed by the King's order. In the dedication to the King (5) he says, 'I must humbly beseech your Majesty to consider, that 'tis not wee only, that is, the Bishops, that are stricken at, but through our sides, your Majesty, your honor, your safety, your religion, is impeached. — And again (6) — both myselfe and my brethren have been very courselly used by the tongues and pennees of these men, yet shall I never to this rigorous sentence, the three unhappy persons were set in pillories in Palace-yard, Westminster, on the 30th of June. Bastwick made there a very odd speech [F]. Soon after, he was sent prisoner to Launceston-castle in Cornwall; as Prynne was to Caernarvon, and Burton to Lancaster-castle (b). But they finding means to hold a correspondence together, and to have some of their virulent books dispersed in London (c), the court thought fit to remove them at a greater distance from that city. Accordingly Bastwick was sent to St Mary's castle in Scilly island (d), Prynne to Jersey, and Burton to Guernesey (e), whence they were not allowed to keep correspondence with any one (f). And the wives of Bastwick and Burton were not permitted, after many petitions, to have access unto them, nor to set foot in the islands, where they were confined (g). As the punishment of these men was exorbitant, and disproportionate to the offence, it was then, and hath ever since, been looked upon by all merciful and unprejudiced persons with horror and detestation [G]. Their imprisonment was of no long continuance; for, upon the meeting of the Parliament in 1640, a petition was presented by their wives and friends November 7, to the House of Commons (h), wherein they requested, 'That the justice and rigour of their sentence might be reviewed and considered; and their persons brought from those remote and desolate places they were confined in, to London, that so they might be able to facilitate or attend their own business.' Whereupon the House ordered, That they should be removed from the foreign prisons they were in, to the places to which they were regularly first committed [H]. And for that purpose, warrants were signed by the Speaker to the Governors and Captains of the several castles, to bring them in safe custody to London; which were sent with all possible expedition (i). Bastwick landing at Dover, on the 4th of December, had his charges borne all the way to London; was loaded with presents, and received every where by vast numbers of people, with wonderful acclamations of joy; particularly, before he came to Southwark, he was met by great crowds of Londoners, with boughs and flowers in their hands [I], and conducted by them to his lodging in the city (k). The 21st of February following, the House of Commons declared, That the several proceedings against him were illegal, unjust, and against the liberty of the subject: That the sentence passed upon him be reversed, his fine remitted, and he restored to his profession [K]; and that, for reparation of his losses, he ought to have 5000 £. out of the estates of the Archbishop of Canterbury, the High-

And in the speech itself (7) — 'This I will say, and abide by it, that the calling of Bishops is jure divino, by divine right, though not all adjuncts to their calling. — But this takes nothing from the King's right or power over us: For though our office be from God and Christ immediately, yet may we not exercise that power, either of order or jurisdiction, but as God hath appointed us, that is — by and under the power of the King. — No man can libell against our calling (as those men doe), bee it pulpit, print, or otherwise, but hee libels against the King and the State, by whose lawes wee are established (8).'

[F] Bastwick made there a very odd speech. It was to this effect: 'There are many that are this day spectators of our standing here as delinquents, yet am I not confcious to myself wherein I have committed the least trespasse to take this outward shame, either against my God or my King. — The first occasion of my trouble was by the Prelates, for writing a book against the Pope; and the Pope of Canterbury said I wrote against him, and therefore questioned me: But if the prestes were as open to us, as formerly they have been, we would shatter his kingdom about his ears. But be ye not deterred by their power, neither be affrighted at our sufferings; let none determine to turn from the ways of the Lord, but go on, fight courageously against Gog and Magog. I know there be many here who have set many days apart for our behalf (let the Prelates take notice of it), and they have sent up strong prayers to Heaven for us; we feel the strength and benefit of them at this time. — In a word, so far am I from 'bafefear, or caring for any thing they can do, or cast upon me, that had I as much blood as would swell the Thames, I would shed it every drop in this cause. — As I said before, so I say again, had I as many lives as I have hairs on my head, or drops of blood in my veins, I would give them all up for this cause (9).'

(9) Fuller, ubi supra, p. 155, and New Discovery of the Prelates Tyranny, &c. p. 34, 35, Part II.[G] The punishment of these men — hath ever since been looked upon — with horror, &c.] My Lord Clarendon observes (10), 'That they were men of the three several professions which had the most influence upon the people, tho' none of them of interest or any esteem with the worthy part of their several professions, having been formerly all looked upon under characters of reproach; yet when they were all sentenced, and for the execution of that sentence brought out to be punished as common and signal rogues, exposed upon scaffolds to have their ears cut off, and their faces and foreheads branded with hot irons; men begun no more to consider their manners but the men; and each profession, with anger and indignation enough, thought their education, and degrees, and quality, would have secured them from such infamous judgments, and treasured up wrath for the time to come.'

[H] To the places to which they were regularly first committed. It seems their first sentence was, that they should be committed to some prisons in London; but they were afterwards removed thence by an order of the Privy-Council, which was now looked upon as a violation of the sentence; and therefore that order was reversed without any scruple (11).

[I] He was met by great crowds of Londoners, &c. This could not be looked upon by impartial persons, but as a very great affront to, and bold insult upon legal authority: But, as Mr Hobbs judiciously observes (12), the parliament's design, in sending for those men to London, was, to try 'how the people would be pleased therewith, and, by consequence, how their endeavours to draw the people's affections from the King had already prospered. — So, by the people's flocking together to behold those men, and receiving them with such acclamations, and almost adoration, as if they had been let down from Heaven, the parliament was now sufficiently assured of a great and tumultuous party, whensoever they should have occasion to use it.'

[K] And he restored to his profession. June 11, 1641, it was ordered that Dr Bastwick be restored to his place in the College of Physicians, and to the liberty of his practice as formerly (13). The former part of which order shews the mistake of Lord Clarendon, when he says (14), that he was 'unknown to either University, or the College of Physicians.'

BATE (GEORGE), an eminent Physician of the last century, was son of Mr John Bate of Burton or Bourton in Buckinghamshire, and was born at Maid's-Morton near Buckingham in the year 1608. At fourteen years of age, he became one of the Clerks of New-college in Oxford; from whence he removed to Queen's-college for a time, and from thence to St Edmund's-hall. Having taken the degrees of Bachelor and Master of Arts, he proceeded on the Physic line, and commenced Bachelor in that faculty in the year 1629; about which time, having obtained a licence, he practised in and about Oxford for some years, but chiefly among the Puritans, who at that time considered him as one of their party. In 1637, he took the degree of Doctor of Physic, and became more eminent in his profession, especially while King Charles I, to whom he was Principal-Physician, kept his court several years at Oxford, in the time of the rebellion. When the King's affairs began to decline, Dr Bate left Oxford, and settled in London; where, complying with the times for the sake of interest, he became Physician to the Charter-house, and Fellow of the College; and afterwards Principal-Physician to Oliver Cromwell; nor did he stick (tho' he pretended to be a concealed Royalist) to flatter the Protector in the highest degree. At the Restoration, he ingratiated himself with the Royal party, by means of a report industriously spread by his friends, that he had secretly, by a dose, hastened the death of the Usurper; whereupon he was made Principal-Physician to King Charles II, and elected a Fellow of the Royal Society. Dr Bate wrote in Latin, An Account of the late Commotions in England, together with a short Narrative of the Regal and Parliamentary Privileges [A], and

[A] An Account of the late Commotions in England, &c.] The Latin title is: Elenchus Motuum nuperorum in Anglia, simul ac Jwis Regii et Parlamentarii brevis narratio. It was printed at Paris in 1649, and at Francfort upon the Maine in 1650, in quarto. Before it went to the press, it was communicated to Dr Peter Heylyn, who made several observations on it greatly tending to the honour of the King and the Church. The first part of the Elenchus was translated into English by an unknown hand, and printed at London in 1652, in octavo. The second part, in which the author had the assistance of some papers communicated to him by the Lord Chancellor Hyde, afterwards Earl of Clarendon, was printed in Latin at London in 1661, at Amsterdam the year following in octavo, and reprinted with the first part at London in 1663, in octavo (1). A Learned Writer, having condemned George Hornius, Honorius Reggus, an anonymous Scotchman (2), and Salmonetus Scoto-Britannus (3), who have written very erroneously of our English affairs, assures us, Dr Bate is the only author, who has written in Latin concerning the late transactions, that deserves to be read, tho' he is accused by an anonymous writer of leaning too much to the side of Puritanism. Eorum omnium, qui hactenus de rebus apud nos nuper gestis scripserunt Latino idiomate, unus Bateus dignus est qui legatur; quamquam etiam ab anonymo scriptore propensum nimium in Puritanos animi nuper est accusatus (4). There was published at London, in 1676, a third part of Elenchus Motuum nuperorum, &c. written in Latin by Thomas Skinner, Doctor of Physic, and published with the two former parts. But this part would have been much better performed, if Dr Bate had lived one year longer. In 1685 came out a Translation into English of all the three parts by one A. Lovel, A. M. of Cambridge. The two parts published by Dr Bate having given offence, not only to the Papists, but to the Cavaliers likewise, on account of their favouring the Puritans; one Robert Pugh, who had been an Officer in the King's army, wrote an answer to them, intituled Elenchus Elenchi, printed at Paris in 1664, in octavo. Dr Bate replied thereto; but his answer was never published (5). The first part of Dr Bate's Elenchus is dedicated to King Charles II. In the Preface, the author gives us a Plan of his design. He tells us, 'He has touched upon such particulars as may serve to settle the just boundaries between the Rights of the King, the Parliament, and the People; that he has briefly related the Causes, Progress, and Conclusion of our Civil Dissensions; that he has purposely omitted dwelling upon military affairs, chiefly to avoid prolixity; and that the facts he relates were not taken from the report of others, but from his own knowledge and experience, confirmed by Records, Parliament Rolls, and the authorities of the most eminent Lawyers; all which he had an opportunity of consulting in person.' He observes, that 'towards the end of this Tragedy, he was fired with indignation at the villainies he related, and his pen grew warm; but that he strictly confined himself within the bounds of truth, and even treated those horrid crimes and their actors in a milder style than they deserved.' Sub hujus Tragædiæ finem, rerum atrocitate motus concepit flammam animus, et incaluit calamus; sed intra veritatis metas religiose se continuit, et scelera autoreseque mitiore stylo quam par erat perstrinxit (6). At the end of the first part (7), the Doctor tells us, the Manuscript, before it went to the press, was revised by the Bishop of Winchester, Nicolas Oudart, Secretary to the Prince of Orange, Sir John Wederburn, Dr Richard Owen, Dr George Ente, and Fabian Phillips the Lawyer; the last of whom assisted him in searching Records, &c. The second part is dedicated to King Charles II, and Edward Earl of Clarendon. The author tells us, it contains an account of King Charles II's wonderful escape after the murder of his father, and a distinct account of the affairs, both civil and military, of England, Scotland, and Ireland. And he promises a third part, if his health should permit. Dr Skinner (as has been observed) executed this design. His performance is intituled Elenchus, &c. Pars Tertia; sive Motus Compositi. Ubi illustrissimi G. Monchii Albemarlæ Ducis à Scotia Progressus; nec non Augustissimi Caroli 2di in Angliam Reditus, ejusdemque regie majestatis

I cannot forbear giving the learned reader a specimen of Dr Bate's Latin style, which I chuse to do in his character of King Charles I. nacks. III. After Dr Bate's death came out a Dispensatory in Latin, intitled Pharmacopœia Bateana; in qua octoginta circiter pharmaca pleraque omnia è Praxi Georgii Batei Regi Carolo 2do Proto-medici excerpta. Lond. 1688 and 1691. It was published by Mr James Shipton, Apothecary, and translated into English by Dr William Salmon, under the title of Bate's Dispensatory. We have the following account of this Book in the Philosophical Transactions (10). 'The translator of this work, in his Preface, gives first an account of the Original, that it is a collection of most excellent Recipe's made by Mr James Shipton, who was the preparer and maker-up of the greatest part of them, tho' their author was the famous Dr Bate, whom to name is sufficient, by whose knowledge and experience this work was produced. The first edition was so well received by the Learned, that they were soon presented with a second, with an addition of not only above 100 more of Dr Bate's Recipe's, but also of the Arcana Goddardiana from the author's own MS. which much advanced the value of the book, so that at least 6000 of this Latin edition were sold; which was digested into an alphabetical method, with the Arcana Goddardiana at the end thereof, which were only nominal without their preparations; whereas in this English Edition they are at large, and interspersed in their proper places: The method of the book is likewise altered classically, according to the method and order of the chapters of the London Dispensatory. The work in the Latin being thus approved of by the Learned, and especially Physicians, induced our author to publish this English edition, as he says, for it's more general use and entertainment; adding some preparations never before printed, as Goddard's Drops, Russel's Powder, Emplastrum Febrifugium, with near 50 more valuable Recipe's out of the Collectanea Chymica, and other authors, of which he gives a catalogue both of the antient and modern which he has consulted in this undertaking; which is not a bare translation, a Comment being added upon each particular, especially upon all the Chymical Processes, which he has searched out from their original fountains, and explicated the Process itself, adding as a Supplement a Rationale upon the same; and having examined the prescriptions of other authors, he shews wherein they chiefly differ from these, and gives their processes at large, if new. — He obviates some objections against the publishing this work in English, and discovering the secrets of the Art to the Vulgar, which he hopes he has made some amends for, by divulging several secrets not generally known even by the Learned; amongst which is the Prince's Powder, once accounted a great secret, and sold for above five pounds a dose; the preparation whereof is Lib. 1. Cap. 9. Sect. 80. Pag. 526. which happens to be omitted in the Table; and, as a general answer, adds, that all particular interests should be sacrificed to the common good, which ought to be preferred before any private one, how dear and valuable soever: And justifies himself in this by the examples of Hippocrates, Galen, Paracelsus, Celsus, and others, who all published a system of Physic in their own languages; as likewise from the present usage of the French, who now treat of all subjects in their own tongue; and, as he conceives, they are not to be imitated only in their vices.' BATE, in Latin BATUS (JOHN), Prior of the monastery of Carmelites at York, in the fifteenth century, was born in Northumberland, and educated at York in the study of the Liberal Arts; in which he was greatly encouraged by the favour of some persons his patrons, who were at the expence of sending him to Oxford, to finish his studies in that university. Bate abundantly answered the hopes conceived of him, and became an eminent Philosopher and Divine, and particularly remarkable for his skill in the Greek tongue. He took the degree of Doctor in Divinity at Oxford, and afterwards distinguished himself as an author [A]. The Carmelites of York were so sensible of his merit, that, upon a vacancy vacancy, they offered him the government of their house; which he accepted, and discharged that office with great prudence and success (a). He died the 26th of January 1429, in the beginning of the reign of Henry VI (b). Bale, who cannot refuse him the character of a learned man, pretends he adulterated the word of God with false doctrines, to support the blasphemies of Antichrist, and defiled his own writings with the filth of Paganism (c).

BATECUMBE or BADECOMBE (WILLIAM), an eminent Mathematician (a), is supposed by Pits (b) to have flourished about the year 1420, in the reign of Henry V. He studied at Oxford (c), where he applied himself to Natural Philosophy in general, but chiefly to the Mathematicks, in which he made a very great proficiency, as is evident by his writings in that science [A], which introduced him to the acquaintance and intimacy of the greatest men of those times (d). It is not known when he died.

BATEMAN (WILLIAM) Bishop of Norwich in the fourteenth century, and founder of Trinity-Hall in Cambridge, was born at Norwich; being the son of a citizen of good repute in that place (a). He was, from his tenderest years of a docile and ingenious disposition (b). Having therefore made a good proficiency in learning, wherein he surpassed all his equals (c), he was sent to the university of Cambridge (d). And after having gone through the usual circle of the sciences, he applied himself to the study of the Civil Law, in which he took the degree of Doctor, before he was thirty years of age, a thing then uncommon (e). On the 8th of December 1328, he was collated to the Archdeaconry of Norwich (f). Soon after which, he went and studied at Rome, for his further improvement; and so distinguished himself by his knowledge [A] and exemplary behaviour, that he was promoted by the Pope to the place of Auditor of his Palace. He was likewise advanced by him to the Deanery of Lincoln (g); and so great an opinion had he of his prudence and capacity, that he sent him twice as his Nuncio, to endeavour to procure a peace between Edward III, King of England, and the King of France (h). Upon the death of Antony de Beck, Bishop of Norwich, the Pope did, by his usurped provisional authority, confer that bishopric upon our William Bateman, on the 23d of January 1343, and consecrated him with his own hands. He was confirmed the 23d of June 1344 (i). Being invested with that great dignity, he returned into his native country after many years absence; and lived in a regular, and withal in a generous and hospitable manner (k). Of Pope Clement VI he obtained for himself and successors, the first-fruits of all vacant livings within his diocese; which occasioned frequent disputes between himself and his clergy (l). In the year 1347 (m), he founded Trinity-Hall in Cambridge, for the study of the Civil and Canon Laws [B]; and another Hall dedicated to the Annunciation of the Virgin Mary [C], for the study of Philosophy and Divinity (n). Being a person

[A] And so distinguished himself by his knowledge.] He was reckoned at the court of Rome, the most eminent Lawyer of his time. In tanta vero justitie, equitate, & sententie, soliditate in gradibus illis inflexibilis præpallebat, ut ipsius summi Pontificis, ac totius curie, assentione, utriusque Jurisperitorum flos precipuus diceretur (1).

[B] He founded Trinity-Hall in Cambridge, for the study of the Civil and Canon laws.] In the place where he built it, there formerly flourished a society of students, who lived at their own expence. John Crandene, the twenty-second Prior of Ely, purchased that house with his own money, in the reign of King Edward III, and converted it into an hôtel for the reception of the Monks of Ely, coming thither at their leisure to improve in learning (2). To these beginnings, Richard Ling, Chancellor of the university, Archembald Norwich, Simon Rekeghall, and Walter Elveden, Rector of Smitterton in Norfolk, added four tenements. Likewise Robert Stratton, John French, Walter Bakton, Walter Aldeley, and Peter Bittering, gave seven parcels of land and two messuages, one of which was called Drake's entry. All these Bishop Bateman purchased of the aforesaid Prior and Monks of Ely, giving some rectories in exchange for the same, and converted them into a Hall, in the year 1347, twenty-first of Edward III, which he dedicated to the Holy Trinity. He endowed it with the rectories of Britton, Kymberley, Brimingham, Woodalling, Cowling, and Stalling in the diocese of Norwich: And designed that it should consist of a Master, twenty-Fellows, and three Scholars; to study the Canon and Civil law, with an allowance for one Divine. But being prevented by death, he left provision only for a master, three fellows, and as many scholars. However, by the munificence of several worthy persons, it now maintains a master, eighteen fellows, and fourteen scholars. The chief benefactors thereto, have been Simon Dalling the third master, who gave two fellowships. and one scholarship; Walter Huke, the eighth master, who gave one fellowship; Robert Goodknape, once a fellow there, gave one fellowship; Richard Nix, Bishop of Norwich, three fellowships and two scholarships; Laurence Maptid, fellow of the same, one fellowship; Gabriel Dun, Canon of St Paul's cathedral, London, one scholarship; Henry Harvey, the twelfth master, one scholarship; Matthew Parker, Archbishop of Canterbury, one scholarship, &c. [C] And another Hall dedicated to the Annunciation of the Virgin Mary.] This is what the writer of his life, published by Fr. Peck (4), affirms, in the following words. — Duae aulas collegiatis in universitate Cantabrigiensi, propriis sumptibus honorifice construxit; unam, quam intitulavit S. Trinitatis, de studentibus

a person of great wisdom, eloquent, and of a fine address; he was often employed by the King and Parliament in affairs of the highest importance; and particularly was at the head of several embassies, sent on purpose to determine the great differences between the crowns of England and France. In 1354, he was, by order of Parliament, dispatched to the court of Rome, with Henry, Duke of Lancaster, and others; to treat (in the Pope's presence) of a peace, then in agitation between the two crowns above-mentioned (o). This journey proved fatal to him; for he died at Avignon, where the Pope then resided, on the 6th of January 1354-5, and was buried with great solemnity [D], in the cathedral church of that city (p). With regard to his person, we are told that he was of an agreeable countenance; and tall, handsome, and well made. He was, likewise, a man of strict justice and piety, punctual in the discharge of his duty, and of a friendly and compassionate disposition (q). But he was a stout defender of his rights, and would not suffer himself to be injured, or imposed upon, by any one (r) [E]. He gave a chest with a hundred pounds to Trinity-Hall, to be lent to poor scholars (s).

i. e. 'He founded two collegiate halls in the university of Cambridge, at his own expence; one called Trinity-Hall, for students in Law; and the other named of the Annunciation of the Virgin Mary, for students in Divinity and Philosophy, which he enriched with possessions and revenues.' Bishop Godwin asserts the same (5), and adds, that he likewise advised one Gunville to found the college that bears his name. The author of Bishop Bateman's life in Anglia Sacra (6), thus expresses this fact: —

Hic etiam duo collegia in universitate Cantabrigiæ fundavit, viz. S. Trinitatis & Annunciationis B. Mariæ vocatum Gunwyle-hale; quæ ditavit redditibus & adificiis — i. e. 'He also founded two colleges in the university of Cambridge, viz. Trinity-Hall, and that of the Annunciation of the Virgin Mary, called Gunwyle-hale, &c.' Upon comparing these several historians one with another, and examining every circumstance, the truth seems to be this; Gonville-college was dedicated by its founder, Edmund Gonville, to the Annunciation of the Virgin Mary (7); now, as Bishop Bateman was executor to Gonville, and finished and settled what the other had begun; hence visibly arose the mistake, and to this it was owing, that Bishop Bateman came to be reputed, and called by some, the founder of Gonville-hall, or college. But, upon the strictest examination, it doth not appear, that he otherwise founded a distinct Hall of the Annunciation; especially considering, how slender a foundation his own Hall of Trinity originally was.

[D] And was buried with great solemnity. He was attended to his grave by the college of Cardinals, and by the Archbishops, Bishops, and all other great men at the Pope's court. The funeral service was performed by the Patriarch of Jerusalem (8).

[E] And would not suffer himself to be injured, or imposed upon, by any one. Of his resolution in this point, we have this remarkable instance. Robert, Lord Morley having killed some deer in his parks, and misused his servants, he made him do public penance for the same; that is, he obliged that nobleman to walk, uncovered and barefoot, with a wax-taper of six pounds in his hands, through the city of Norwich to the cathedral, and there to ask his pardon. And all this was done notwithstanding an express order of the King to the contrary, and tho' his Majesty had seized the Bishop's revenues, for his obstinacy. But the King was soon after reconciled to him (9).

BATES (WILLIAM), an eminent Nonconformist Divine of the last century, was born in November 1625 (a); admitted in Emanuel-college in Cambridge, and from thence removed to King's-college in 1644; took the degree of Bachelor of Arts in 1647; and admitted Doctor of Divinity by the King's letters, dated November 9, 1660 (b). Soon after the Restoration, he was appointed Chaplain to King Charles II, and became Minister of St Dunstan's in the West; but was deprived of that benefice for Nonconformity (c). He was one of the Commissioners at the Conference in the Savoy, in 1660, for reviewing the publick Liturgy, and was concerned in drawing up the Exceptions against the Common Prayer (d). He was likewise chosen, on the part of the Ministers, together with Dr Jacob and Mr Baxter, to manage the dispute with Dr Pearson, afterwards Bishop of Chester, Dr Gunning, afterwards Bishop of Ely, and Dr Sparrow, afterwards Bishop of Norwich (e). In 1665, he took the oath, required of the Nonconformists [A] by the Parliament, which sat at Oxford during the plague at London. Dr Bates bore a most excellent character [B], and was honoured with the friendship of the Lord-Keeper Bridgman, the

[A] He took the oath required of the Nonconformists. It was to this purpose; that they should swear, 'that it was not lawful, upon any pretence whatever, to take arms against the King; and that they abhorred the traitorous position of taking arms, by his authority, against his person, or against those, that are commissioned by him, in pursuance of such commission; and that they would not at any time endeavour any alteration in the government, either in Church or in State.' Those who refused this Oath were to be restrained from coming (except upon the Road) within five miles of any city or corporation, or any place, which sent Burgesses to Parliament, or where they had been Ministers, or had preached since the Act of Oblivion. The Act, which imposed this oath, openly accused the Nonconformist Ministers of seditious doctrines and practices. Hereupon some of them studied how to take the oath lawfully; and Dr Bates consulted the Lord-Keeper Bridgman, who promised to be present at the next Sessions, and openly to declare from the bench, that by Endeavour to change the Govern- ment in Church was meant only Unlawful Endeavour; which satisfying him, he thereby satisfied others; and accordingly twenty of them came in at the Sessions, and took the oath. Dr Bates wrote a letter hereupon to Mr Baxter, representing the case, and the reasons upon which the Ministers acted; but Mr Baxter, who gives us this account (1), tells us, that the arguments used in the letter seemed to him not sufficient to enervate the force of the objections against their taking the oath.

(1) Reliquiæ Baxterianæ, &c. Part. iii. p. 2, &c.

[B] He bore a most excellent character. Mr Baxter (2) styles him a learned, judicious, and moderate Divine. Mr John Howe, formerly Fellow of Magdalen-college in Oxford, in his Funeral Sermon for him, has given his character at large. He represents him as a man of the most graceful appearance and deportment; of strong natural abilities, and extensive learning; of an admirable memory; a great collector and devourer of books; of the most agreeable and useful conversation; and remarkable for a peculiar spirit of Moderation, and zeal for union among Christians (3).

During his life, he published the Lives of several Eminent Persons in Latin [C]; and, since his death, his Works [D] have been printed in one volume in folio; besides a posthumous piece of his in octavo, containing some Sermons on the everlasting Rest of the Saints (k).

[C] The Lives of several Eminent Persons, in Latin.] They were written by different persons; and the copies being grown scarce and valuable, Dr Bates collected them into one volume, intitled, Vita Selectorum aliquot Virorum, qui doctrina, dignitate, aut pietate inclaruere. London, 1681, 4to. The Authors of the Acta Eruditiorum (4) have distributed these Lives into three classes. The first contains the Lives of Princes, and men of superior rank and quality. Among these are, The Funeral Oration upon Henry Prince of Wales, by Francis Neatherfole, Orator of the University of Cambridge; Optimus's Funeral Oration upon Ulderick, the King of Denmark's son; Frederic Spanheim's Funeral Oration upon Frederic Prince of Orange; the Life of John Picus, Prince of Mirandula and Concordia, by John Francis, his son, Prince of Mirandula; John Hales's Funeral Oration upon Sir Thomas Bodley; and Gerard Vossius's Commentary concerning the Life and Actions of Fabian a Dona. To the second class are referred the Lives of men eminent in the Church; among which are, Dr Arthur Duke's Life of Henry Chichley, Archbishop of Canterbury; William Budden's Life of William Waynflete, Bishop of Winchester, and Lord-Chancellor of England; John de la Casa's Life of Cardinal Bembo, and of Cardinal Gaspar Contareni; the Life of Jerom Savanarola, by John Picus, Prince of Mirandula; Sir John Cheke and Nicholas Carr's Letters concerning the Death of Martin Bucer; the Life of Bernard Gilpin, by Dr George Carleton, Bishop of Chester; and the Life of Archbishop Usher, with a Catalogue of his Works. The third class contains the Lives of men distinguished for their Learning; particularly, the Life of Erasmus, with a Catalogue of his Works, by Rhenanus; of William Budæus, by Ludovicus Rhegius; of Christopher Longolius; of Vincent Pinnellus, by Gualdus; of Scævola Sammarthanus, by Gabriel Michael Rupimalletus; of Julius Cæsar Scaliger, with an Account of his Writings; Daniel Heinsius's Letter to Isaac Casaubon concerning the Death of Joseph Scaliger; the Life of Hugo Grotius, with an Account of his Writings; the Life of Peter Pithæus; an Elogium upon Janus Gruter, with a Catalogue of his Writings, by Balthasar Venator; the Life of Julius Cæsar Lagalla, by Leo Allattius; of William Camden, by Degory Wheare; of Anthony Wallæus; of Peter Puteanus, by Rigaltius; of Dionysius Petavius, by Henry Valesius; of James Simondus, with a Catalogue of his Works, by the same author; of Peter Molinæus; and of Henry Valesius, by his brother Hadrian.

[D] His Works] They consist of Sermons and Discourses on the most important Subjects, such as The Harmony of God's Attributes, The Final Happiness of Man, The Four last Things, &c. With regard to his manner of treating what he undertook, Mr Howe tells us (5), Bishop Wilkins's Character of Mr Baxter might be applied to him, that he cultivated every subject he handled, and that, if he had lived in an age of the Fathers, he would have been one. His Panegyrist particularly celebrates him for the Critical Exactness of his Method, and the inimitable politeness and refinement of his Style.

BATHE (HENRY DE), a learned Knight, an eminent and skilful Justiciary of the thirteenth century (a), was a younger brother of an antient family of that name, (which we find variously written) [A] born, most probably at that antient seat of this family, called Bathe-house in the county of Devon; being a younger brother, it is not unnatural to imagine he might, upon that account, apply himself to the study and profession of the laws of his country, in the knowledge whereof he grew so eminent, that he was advanced by King Henry III in 1238, to be one of the Justices of the Common-Pleas (b); and in 1240, was constituted one of the Justices Itinerant, (as they were then called) for the county of Hartford (c); and in 1248 he was appointed the same for Essex and Surrey; in 1249 for Kent, Berks, Southampton, and Middlesex; and in 1250 for Lincolnshire; at which time he had allowed him out of the Exchequer, by a peculiar favour, an hundred pounds a year for his sustentation in the discharge of his office (d). But the year following he fell from the King's grace and favour; the occasion of which were certain crimes laid to his charge, which if true [B], he cannot be justified; although upon a due examination

[A] A younger brother of an antient family of that name, which we find variously written.] We have three observations to make upon this paragraph, viz. 1st, The various manners in which we find the name wrote; 2^{dly}, The antiquity of the family; and 3^{dly}, Of his being a younger brother. The name appears among various authors very differently wrote, as DE BAA, DE BADA, DE BATHON, DE BATHOND, DE BATHONIA, DE BATH, DE BATHE, DE BASH, DE BACH, &c (1). Which name the family either took from, or left unto an antient seat of that name, called Bathe-house (in the parish of North Taunton, in the heart of the county of Devon), the principal place of the family's residence, where we find it of so long standing, that our author says (2) it ran so very far back, that he could not trace out and overtake the original; thereof he also adds, that the honour and reputation of it was not at all diminished by Sir Walter de Bathon, Kt. who was High-Sheriff of Devon 1 Hen. III. 1217, and after that in the second year of the same reign, he was again advanced to the same honourable office, in which he continued fourteen years together; unto which Sir Walter, adds our author, 'we take

' Sir Henry, of whom we are treating, to be a younger brother, being expressly said to be a branch of this family *.'

[B] Which if true.] There being very good reasons to imagine this prosecution was incited and carried on by the interest of the court, at the instigation perhaps of a few, whom he might possibly have injured or obliged in the execution of his office, or the envy and malice of others, whom he then excelled in favour and fortune; nor is it at all to be wondered at that the King himself (as we find) should be his chief enemy in this affair, since his beggarly circumstances at this time was such, that Historians inform us, he, his Queen, the young Prince, and his court, went about upon their own invitation from house to house, where, besides their own entertainment, they generally expected large donatives; it was no wonder then if a Prince, thus needy and distressed, should encourage any proceedings which could favour such a charge (against so wealthy and envied a subject as de Bath was) as might infer treason and forfeiture of estate. For farther proofs of his innocence see the next note.

of the matter we may observe, some circumstances that will greatly alleviate, if not totally expunge and blot them out [C] (e), he is however reported, unfortunately to have been of a narrow, squeezing disposition, which was encouraged by the arts of an extravagant, rapacious wife, proud of her origin, as sprung from the Bassetts and Sandfords, great men in those days (f), so that what thro' his own natural disposition, and her strenuous encouragement, he, in a very short time accumulated a prodigious estate; in one circuit only he is said to have gotten land of inheritance to the value of 200 pounds, per annum (g). This charge, viz. That he had not exercised his office uprightly, but to his own private gain, having perverted justice through bribes, upon an occasion of a suit betwixt him, and one Everard Trumpington, was chiefly supported against him by one Philip de Arcis, Knt. who also added treason to that of infidelity in his office. The accused was attached in the King's-Court; but one Mansel, who was now become a great favourite at court, offered bail for his appearance: King Henry refused this, the case, as he alledged, not being bailable, he terming him guilty of high-treason (h). Fulk Basset however, then Bishop of London, and a great many of de Bathe's friends interceding, the King at last gave orders that he should be bailed, twenty-four Knights becoming sureties for his appearing and standing to the judgment of the court; but de Bathe seems to have been conscious of his own demerits, or the prepossession of his Judges against him; for he was no sooner set at liberty, than he wrote to all his relations either by blood or marriage, desiring that they would apply to the King in his favour, at first by fair speeches and presents, and that if these did not prevail, they should appear in a more warlike manner, thereby to intimidate the court (i); this they faithfully and unanimously promised to do, upon the encouragement given them by a bold Knight, one Nicholas de Sandford. But the King, imagining, that his own power and the interest of de Bathe's accusers infinitely outweighed all the preparations of the others, appeared the more inexorable upon the intimation of these proceedings, he rejected all presents from the friends of the accused, and put on an air as if nothing but his punishment should satisfy his and the nation's justice. De Bathe knew well to what all this outward inflexibility tended; but was certain that if Henry persisted in his resolution, he himself must perish; he therefore had recourse to more prudent measure, he applied himself to the Bishop of London, and other his special friends, and with a great posse of these goes to Richard, Earl of Cornwall (afterwards King of the Romans) (k), whom by prayer and fine promises he won over to his interest [D]. The King continued deaf to all his remonstrances, and about the end of February (l) de Bathe was summoned, and obliged to appear to answer what should be laid to his charge; this he accordingly did, but strongly defended by a great retinue of armed Knights, Gentlemen, and others, viz. his own and his wife's friends and relations, among whom was the family of the Bassetts and the Sandfords; a band as undaunted as his persecutors were violent (m). We may, from what our historian has delivered upon this occasion, conclude, that the assembly was divided between those who depended upon the King for their posts and preferments, and those who (though a great majority) were so thoroughly exasperated at the measures of the court, that they were resolved not to find de Bathe guilty (n). It was not long before the King perceived this, and upon that occasion, he made an unjust and impolitic stretch of his prerogative, in an unheard-of proclamation [E]. And a new charge

[C] Although, upon a due examination of the matter, we may observe some circumstances that will greatly alleviate, if not totally expunge and blot out his crimes. Which we shall endeavour to prove from the following particulars, viz. That so great a number of persons of the first quality took his part, powerfully defending him from any intended mischief to his person. Another no inconsiderable circumstance in behalf of his innocence is, that the King's own brother, Richard Earl of Cornwall, was so zealous an intercessor for him, urging the danger of the time, the discontentment of the kingdom, and how the proceeding in such a manner with one of his Council, whom he had used in so great business, would discourage others to serve such a master, who upon malicious accusations should so forsake them whose places were ever exposed to envy and detraction (3); concluding his speech with these words: We must not forsake gentlemen in their right, nor in preserving the tottering peace of this kingdom (4). The Bishop of London also and several others became mediators in his behalf with the King, which, it is not natural to suppose they would, had he been so notorious a criminal. — Another argument of his innocence, or at least of his not being so guilty as suspected, may be gathered from hence, that after this storm was blown over, the King took him again into his good grace and favour; — but left it may be imagined, that this gentleman's restoration to so weighty a trust should be the act of the King's mere arbitrary pleasure, we are informed it was done by the advice and provision of the Lords and great men of his council, as appears from this clause in the writ Hi omnes (speaking of Sir Henry and his associates) per provisionem magnatum

angliæ, qui sunt de concilio regis ad meliorationem status totius regni, assignati erant (5). These all by the providing of the great men of the kingdom, who are of the King's council, were appointed for the better estate of this realm. — That this gentleman should be re-admitted to the dispensation of public justice is a manifest argument, that he either was not guilty of the corruption he had been accused of, or that those great men who entrusted him in that office were not innocent (6). All these arguments together, with note [B], do almost amount to a proof he was not guilty, or at least not in so heinous a manner as is suggested in our chronicles.

[D] Whom by prayer and fine promises he won over to his interest. The motives which determined the Earl to befriend the accused, proves the wretched situation of the kingdom at this juncture; for de Bathe swore by a solemn oath, that if the King should attempt his life, or even the forfeiture of his estate, he would raise such a disturbance as should not be in the power of the government to suppress (7); knowing that the disaffection of the kingdom, at Henry's partiality to Foreigners, would render this the more practicable; the Earl was conscious what great causes the people had of rebellion, and how small a matter might kindle it. So that partly through fear, and partly, as our Historian says (8), through rich presents, and the prayers and entreaties of De Bathe and his friends, he at last came entirely into the sentiments of De Bathe's parties, and applied to the King in his favour.

was now brought against de Bathe, and perhaps the chief and only one, at least that had exasperated King Henry, viz. he was impeached (not only on the former articles, but particularly) for alienating the affections of the Barons from his Majesty, and creating such a ferment all over the kingdom, that a general sedition was now on the point of breaking out (o). This speech was enforced from Bathe's Brother-Justiciary, who declared to the assembly, that he knew the accused to have dismissed without any censure, for the sake of lucre, a convicted criminal (p). Many other complaints were urged against de Bathe, but they seem to have been disregarded by all but the King and his party; who was so much exasperated to see de Bathe likely to be acquitted, that he mounted his throne, and with his own mouth made proclamation, That whosoever should kill Henry de Bathe, should have the royal pardon for him and his heirs [F]; after which speech he flung out of the room in a great passion. Many of the Royal party who were exceedingly keen upon this occasion, would readily have executed the King's terrible doom, and were for dispatching de Bathe in court; but his friend Mansel, one of the King's Council, and Fulco Basset, Bishop of London, interposed so effectually that he was saved [G]; and afterwards, by the powerful mediation of his friends, (among whom was the Earl of Cornwall, the King's brother, and the Bishop of London) and the application of a sum of money, viz. 2000 marks † to the King, he obtained not only a pardon, but all his former places and favour with the King, who re-established him in the same seat of judicature, as he was in before, and rather advanced him higher, for he was made Chief Justice of the King's-Bench (q), after about three year's discontinuance from his office of a Judge, in which honourable post he continued for eight years after, till the time of his death, as Dugdale informs us (r); for in the year 1260, we find he was one of the Justices Itinerant for the counties of Huntington, Norfolk, Suffolk, and Cambridge, which was the year before he died (s). Where his ashes were laid, or what family or issue he left we do not find.

clamation.] The King was so resolved upon the downfall of De Bath, that he had public proclamation made, that whosoever had any action or complaint against Henry De Bath, should come in, and they should be heard (9). 'A strange encouragement this for envy and malice to break in upon and confound the greatest innocence; though we do not find that any one thereupon urged any thing against him, which is no mean evidence that he was not so guilty as represented (10).' This however was a mistake of Mr Prince's, for all the authors that mention this affair take notice, that there were many accusations against him, though none of them were at all regarded; by which we may indeed imagine they were very inconsiderable, or far from being proved upon him.

[F] That whosoever should kill Henry De Bath should have the royal pardon for him and his heirs (11). Hollinshed (12) varies these words a little, viz. If any man will flea Henry De Bath, he shall not be impeached for his death, for I do here plainly declare him acquit and guiltless for the same. — Others have it, Whosoever shall kill Henry De Bath shall be quit of his death, and I do hereby acquit him. — This is the nearest the words of Matth. Paris (13), which are, 'Si quis Henricum de Bathonia occidet quietus sit a morte ejus, & quietum eum protektor.'

[G] But his friend Mansel, and Fulco Basset, Bishop of London, interposed so effectually, that he was saved. Affwaging their fury with the following words (14). 'Domini mei et amici non est necesse, quod in ira præproperè dicitur, prosequamur, pœnitebit fortè dominum nostrum, jam elapso iræ tempore hæc intonuisse: Præterea si aliquid violentiæ ipsi Henrico intuleritis ecce episcopus Londinensis qui spirituales, et alii amici ejus militares, qui vindictam exercebunt materialem, &c.' Gentlemen, it is not all necessary that we should put in immediate execution what the King has thus too hastily commanded, which perhaps, when his passion is past, he may repent him of; besides, if any violence or outrage be offered to De Bath, his friends are here ready to assist and revenge him, some by strength of arms, and others by their prayers and good wishes, &c.

BATHE (WILLIAM). The family of the Bathes was heretofore of considerable consequence in the counties of Dublin and Meath, and dispersed into many branches [A]; but what by rebellions, extravagance of heirs, or one misfortune or other, has been reduced to narrow bounds, insomuch that not one of them remains now of any rank in their country. The person who is now our subject was of a citizen's family, though descended from Bath of Dullardston, and was born in Dublin in 1564 (a). We have it by tradition, that he was of a fullen, saturnine temper, and disturbed in his mind, that his family was reduced from it's antient splendor. His parents, who were Protestants, had a greater regard to the learning of their child, than his religion, and therefore put him in his green years under the tuition of an eminent Popish schoolmaster, who thoroughly corrupted his principles, and fitted him for that station of life, which he afterwards embraced. He removed to Oxford, where he studied several years with indefatigable industry; but the inquisitive

Sir Luke Bath, Baronet, who had his estate seized and sequestered in the Rebellion of 1641, but was restored to it by the Act of Explanation of the Act of Settlement (1). — II. Luke Bath of Athcarne, who was in like manner restored for his great services to the King against the Pope's Nuncio. — III. Bath of Dromconrath, near Dublin, of which James was Chief-Baron of the Exchequer in the reigns of Philip and Mary, and Queen Elizabeth, and under that name had a grant (2) of the lands of Ballybought near Dublin, parcel of the possessions of Mary's abbey, made to him, on condition of maintaining a Foot-Archer, sufficiently armed, on his lands of Dromconrath. — IV. Bath of Dullardston, of whom William was active in the Rebellion of Thomas Fitz Gerald in 1534, and was that year attainted (3) of high-treason, and executed. — V. Bath, of Colper in the county of Meath, who furnished his quota of men at the general hosting (4), at the hill of Tarah, on the 29th of September, 1593, equal to many men of rank of that county. — VI. Bath of Rathfeigh, who sent as many to the said hosting as the Baron of Skrine. — VII. Bath of Cashel and Morton. — And VIII. Bath of Laundeston.

quifitive Anthony Wood (b), could not discover in what college or hall he sojourned, or whether he took any university degree. The same writer alledges (c), that growing weary of the heresy professed in England, (as he usually called the Protestant faith) he quitted the nation and his religion together, and in the year 1596 was initiated among the Jesuits, being then between thirty and forty years of age; though one (d) of his own order says, he was then but twenty-five, which certainly is erroneous. Having spent some time among the Jesuits in Flanders, he travelled into Italy, and compleated his studies at Padua; from whence he passed into Spain, being appointed to govern the Irish seminary at Salamanca. He is said (e) to have had a most ardent zeal for the gaining of souls, and was much esteemed among the people of his persuasion for his extraordinary virtues and good qualities; though he was of a temper not very sociable. At length, taking a journey to Madrid to transact some business of his order, he died there on the 17th of June 1614, and was buried in the Jesuit's convent of that city (f), bearing among his brethren a reputation for learning; which nevertheless from the titles of his books, as given in the remark [B], one would not judge to be his talent, but rather that of devotion.

[B] One would not judge of his learning by the titles of his books. Here follows a catalogue of them, as given by Allegambe (5), and Anthony Wood (6). I. An Introduction to the Art of Musick; wherein are set down exact and easy rules, with arguments, and their solutions, for such as seek to know the reason of the truth. London, 1584, 4to. Salamanticae, 1611, i. e. An Entrance into the Languages.* — This book was much used in Spain for the instruction of youth, and was published under the inspection of the Jesuits of Salamanca. — III. A Methodical Institution of the principal Mysteries of the Christian Faith; with a Method annexed for the right exercise of General Confession. He published (7) this tract in English and Latin, but without his name; however, Allegambe (8) ascribes it to him. — IV. He writ also in Spanish, and published it under the name of Peter Manrique, A Preparation for the Sacrament of Penance, intituled, Aparejos para administrar el Sacramento de la Penitencia, con mas facilidad y fruto; en Milan, 1604, 4to, rather 1614, as appears at the end of the work. D

BATHURST (RALPH) an eminent Physician, Poet, and Divine, in the XVIIth century, was born in the year 1620 (a). He was the son of George Bathurst of Howthorp in the county of Northampton, Esq; and Elizabeth Villiers (b), daughter and coheir of Edward Villiers of Howthorp aforesaid [A]. In what place he was educated in school-learning, is not known. As for his academical education, it was in Trinity-college in Oxford, where he applied himself to the study of Divinity (c). But the times of confusion coming on, in which there was no likelihood of any encouragement for the ministerial function, he altered his design, and studied Physic (d). Whereupon he was employed in the service of the State, as Physician to the sick and wounded of the Navy; which he managed with much diligence and success, to the full satisfaction both of the Generals at sea, and also of the Commissioners of the Admiralty (e). June 21, 1654, he accumulated, that is, took together, the degrees of Bachelor and Doctor of Physic (f). After the Restoration of King Charles II he returned to the study of Divinity, and entering into orders, was made Chaplain to the King; and also became Fellow of the Royal Society (g). On the 10th of September 1664, he was elected President of Trinity-college, in the room of Dr Hannibal Potter deceased (h). And June the 28th, 1670, was installed Dean of Wells (i). In the years 1673 and 1674, he served the office of Vice-Chancellor of the university of Oxford. In April 1691, he was nominated by King William and Queen Mary to the See of Bristol (k), with liberty to keep his deanry in commendam (l). But intending to become a benefactor to his college, of which he afterwards rebuilt the chapel in a very neat and elegant manner, he refused to accept of that bishoprick (m). He was a person of great learning, and particularly celebrated for his poetical genius. We shall give account of what few works he published, in the note [B]. He died June the 14th, 1704, in

[B] We shall give an account of what works he published They are as follows: I. 'Newes from the Dead; or a true and exact Narration of the miraculous deliverance of Anne Greene, who being executed at Oxford, Decemb. 14, 1650, afterwards revived, and by the care of certain Physicians there, is now perfectly recovered; together with the manner of her suffering, and the particular meanes used for her recovery. Whereunto are prefixed certain

'Poems, casually written upon that subject.' This A. Greene was executed for murdering her bastard child; and, after having hung almost half an hour, was brought to life again by Dr Petty, Mr Tho. Willis, Mr Bathurst, and Mr Clerke. The tract here mentioned is said, in the title-page, to be 'written by a Scholar in Oxford;' but Dr Derham informs us (2), that the author of it was Dr Bathurst. It was printed at Oxford, 1651, 4to, and reprinted in the Phoenix, 2 Vol. 4to. II. He writ a Poem 'On the death of the learned John Selden,' which is inserted in the third part of Miscellany Poems (3). III. He also composed several Latin Poems, printed in the Musarum Anglicanarum Analecra; namely, 1. In Libellum Viri clarissimi Tho. Hobii de Natura Hominis, 1650 (4), i. e. 'On T. BATMANSON (JOHN), a person of great piety and learning in the sixteenth century, was at first a Monk, and afterwards Prior of the Carthusian monastery or Charter-houfe, in the suburbs of London (a). For some time he studied Divinity at Oxford, but it does not appear he took any degree there in that faculty (b). He was intimately acquainted with, and a great favourite of Edward Lee, Archbishop of York; at whose request he writ against Erasmus and Luther [A]. He died on the 16th of November 1531, and was buried in the chapel, belonging to the Charter-houfe (c). Pits gives him the character of a man of quick and discerning genius; of great piety, and learning, and fervent zeal; much conversant in the study of the scriptures; and that led an angelical life among men (d). Bale, on the contrary, represents him as a proud, forward, and arrogant person; born as it were, for disputing and wrangling; and says, that Erasmus, in one of his letters to Richard Bishop of Winchester, styles him an ignorant fellow, encouraged by Lee, and vainglorious even to madness (e). So opposite are the characters given by zealots of different parties! However, Bale in another place (f) calls him a very clear sophist, or writer.

BAXTER (RICHARD), a very eminent Divine amongst the Nonconformists in the last century. His father was a freeholder in the county of Salop, an honest, religious man, who had an estate of his own, but a very small one. His mother was of the same county, the daughter of Mr Richard Adeney: Himself was born at Rowton, near High-ercal, in the hundred of South-Bradford, November 12, 1615 (a). There he spent his infancy, wherein he is said to have given strong indications of that piety and purity which appeared in his subsequent life and conversation [A]. In 1625 he was taken from his grandfather's house where he had hitherto lived, and brought home to his father's at Eaton-Constantine, a village within five miles of Shrewsbury, where he passed the remainder of his childhood (b). He was far from being happy in respect to his school-masters, who were men no way distinguished either for learning or morals, and missed the advantages of an academical education, through a proposal made to his parents of placing him with Mr Richard Wickstead, Chaplain to the Council at Ludlow. The only advantage he reaped there was the use of an excellent library, which by his own great application proved of infinite service to him. In this situation he remained about a year and half, and then returned to his father's (c). At the request of the Lord Newport he went thence to Wroxeter, where he taught in the free-school for six months, while his old schoolmaster Mr John Owen lay in a languishing condition (d). In 1633 Mr Wickstead prevailed on him to wave the studies in which he was then engaged, and to think of making his fortune at court. He accordingly came up to Whitehall with a recommendation to Sir Henry Herbert, then Master of the Revels, by whom he was very kindly received. But after a month's stay discovering no charms in this sort of life, and having besides a very strong propensity to undertake the ministerial function, he returned to his father's, and resumed his studies with fresh vigour, till Mr Richard Foley of Stourbridge, fixed him as master of the free-school at Dudley, with an usher under him (e). In the time he taught school there, he read several practical treatises, whereby he was brought to a due and deep sense of religion, his progress therein being not a little quickened by his great bodily weakness and ill state of health,

[A] Which appeared in his subsequent life and conversation.] When he was yet very young, we are told his father said, with tears of joy, to a friend, My son Richard I hope was sanctified from the womb; for when he was a little boy in coats, if he heard other children in play speak profane words, he would reprove them, to the wonder of them that heard him (1). Yet it is certain, that at this time of life he was not altogether free from those irregularities common to lads of his age; this we learn from himself: 'Though my conscience, says he, would trouble me when I sinned, yet divers sins I was addicted to, and oft committed against my conscience, which, for the warning of

' others, I will here confess to my shame. I was much addicted to the excessive gluttonous eating of apples and pears, which I think laid the foundation of the imbecility and flatulency of my stomach, which caused the bodily calamities of my life. To this end, and to concur with naughty boys that gloried in cvil, I have oft gone into other men's orchards, and stolen the fruit, when I had enough at home.' There are six other retractions, at the end of which he concludes; 'These were my sins in my childhood, as to which conscience troubled me for a great while before they were overcome (2).'

health, which inclined him to think he should scarce survive above a year (f) [B]. However, having still an earnest desire to the Ministry, he in 1638 addressed himself to Dr Thornborough, Bishop of Winchester, for holy orders, which after examination he received, having at that time no scruples of conscience which hindered from conforming to the Church of England (g) [C]. Being settled at Dudley, he preached frequently in that town, and in the neighbouring villages, with the approbation of all his hearers. In three quarters of a year he was removed to Bridgnorth, where he officiated as assistant to Mr William Madstard, then Minister of that place, who treated him with great kindness and respect, and did not put him upon many things which he then began to scruple doing (h). When the et cetera oath came to be imposed, Mr Baxter applied himself diligently to study the case of Episcopacy, and it fared with him as with some others, the thing which was intended to fix them to the Hierarchy, drove them into a dislike of it (i) [D]. In the year 1640 he was invited to Kidderminster by the Bailiff and Feoffees, to preach there for an allowance of sixty pounds a year, which he accepted; and applied himself with such diligence to his sacred calling, as had a very great effect in a short time, upon a very dissolute people. He continued there about two years before the Civil War broke out, and fourteen afterwards with some interruption (k). He sided with the Parliament, [B] Scarce survive above a year.] We are told by Dr Calamy, that, from the age of twenty-one till twenty-three, he lived constantly as it were in the shadow of death; and, finding his own soul under serious apprehensions of the matters of another world, he was very desirous to communicate those apprehensions to such ignorant, careless, presumptuous sinners, as the world abounds with. Although therefore he had his discouragements, through his sense of the greatness and awfulness of the work of the Ministry, and his fear of exposing himself to the censure of many, on the account of his wanting academical education, honours, and dignities; yet, expecting to be so quickly in another world, the great concerns of miserable souls prevailed with him to engage in it; and finding in himself a thirsty desire of men's conversion and salvation, and a competent perswading faculty of expression, which fervent affections might help to actuate, he concluded, that if but one or two souls might by his means be won to God, it would easily recompense any treatment he might meet with in the world (3).

(3) Calamy's Abridgment of Baxter's Life, Vol. I. p. 11.

[C] From conforming to the Church of England.] We have a very distinct detail of the means by which he first came to alter his opinions in these matters; and it will be very proper to take notice of them here, because they will serve to let the reader into the character of the man. Being settled at Dudley, he fell into the acquaintance of several Nonconformists, whom, though he judged severe and splenetick, yet he found to be both godly and honest men. They supplied him with several writings on their own side, and amongst the rest, with Ames's Fresh Suit against Ceremonies, which he read over very distinctly, comparing it with Dr Burges's Rejoynder. And, upon the whole, he at that time came to these conclusions. Kneeling he thought lawful, and all meer circumstances determined by the magistrate, which God in nature or scripture hath determined on, only in the general. The Surplice he more doubted of, but was inclined to think it lawful: And though he intended to forbear it till under necessity, yet he could not see how he could have justified the forsaking his Ministry merely on that account, though he never actually wore it. About the Ring in Marriage he had no scruple. The Cross in Baptism he thought Dr Ames had proved unlawful; and though he was not without some doubting in the point, yet because he most inclined to judge it unlawful, he never once used it. A Form of Prayer and Liturgy he judged to be lawful, and in some cases lawfully imposed. The English Liturgy in particular he judged to have much disorder and defectiveness in it, but nothing which should make the use of it in the ordinary publick worship to be unlawful to them who could not do better. He fought for Discipline in the Church, and saw the sad effects of it's neglect; but he was not then so sensible as afterwards, that the very frame of Diocesan Prelacy excluded it, but thought it had been chargeable only on the personal neglects of the Bishops. Subscription he began to think unlawful, and repented his rashness in yielding to it so hastily. For though he could use the Common-Prayer, and was not yet against Diocesan, yet to subscribe ex animo, that there is nothing in the three Books contrary to the Word of God, was that which he durst not do, had it been to be done again. So that Subscription and the Cross in Baptism, and the promiscuous giving the Lord's Supper to all comers, though ever so unqualified, if they were not excommunicate by a Bishop or Chancellor who knows nothing of them, were the only things in which he as yet in his judgment inclined to Nonconformity: And yet, even as to these things, he kept his thoughts to himself. He continued to argue with the Nonconformists about the points they differed in, and particularly kneeling at the Sacrament; about which he managed a dispute with some of them in writing, till they did not think fit to pursue it any farther: He freely reprov'd them for the bitterness of their language against the Bishops and their adherents, and exhorted them to endeavour for patience and charity, but found their spirits so exasperated by the hard measure they had met with, that they were deaf to his admonitions (4).

(4) Ibid. p. 15.

[D] Drove them into a dislike of it.] In order to have a just idea of this matter, it is necessary to transcribe this famous oath at large; whence it will appear why some very honest men scrupled it, and why some as honest men took it without scruple. The oath ran thus: 'I A. B. do swear, that I do approve the doctrine and discipline, or government established in the Church of England, as containing all things necessary to salvation: And that I will not endeavour by myself or any other, directly or indirectly, to bring in any Popish doctrine, contrary to that which is so established; nor will I ever give my consent to alter the government of the Church, by Archbishops, Bishops, Deans, and Archdeacons, &c. as it stands now established, and as by right it ought to stand, nor yet ever to subject it to the usurpation and superstitutions of the See of Rome. And all these things I do plainly and sincerely acknowledge and swear, according to the plain and common sense and understanding of the same words, without any equivocation or mental evasion, or secret reservation whatsoever. And this I do heartily, willingly and truly, upon the faith of a Christian. So help me God, in Jesus Christ (5).' Men of tender consciences thought it hard to swear to the continuance of a Church government, which many of them disliked; and yet these men for the Church's quiet would willingly have concealed their thoughts, had not this oath, imposed under the penalty of expulsion, compelled them to speak. Others complained of the et cetera, which, they said, contained they knew not what, and might be extended to they knew not whom, but in all probability to the officers of Ecclesiastical Courts, and to swear to them they thought not only a little extraordinary, but very far from being lawful. Mr Baxter seems to have understood this matter exactly right, for he took the oath to be a direct declaration in favour of the ecclesiastical jurisdiction of Prelates as then established, which, tho' it might be submitted to with little, he apprehended could not be sworn to without much, consideration. This put him upon studying the best books he could meet with on this subject; the consequence of which was, that he utterly disliked the oath, a thing which fell out to many others besides him, who, but for this accident, had never disturbed themselves about so knotty a question (6).

ment, and recommended the Protestation they directed to be taken, to the people: This exposed him to some inconveniencies, which obliged him to retire to Gloucester, but he was soon invited back to Kidderminster, whither he returned. His stay there was not long, but beginning to consider with himself where he might remain in safety, he fixed upon Coventry, and accordingly went thither. There he lived peaceably and comfortably, preached once every Lord's day to the garrison, and once to the town's people, for which he took nothing but his diet, though besides thus exercising his function, he did great service in repressing the Anabaptists (l). After Naseby fight, when all things seemed to favour the Parliament; he, by advice of the Ministers at Coventry, became Chaplain to Colonel Whalley's regiment, and in this quality he was present at several sieges, but never in any engagement, so that there was not the least grounds for that scandalous story invented and trumpeted about by his enemies, viz. that he killed a man in cool blood, and robbed him of a medal (m) [E]. He took all imaginable pains to hinder the progress of the Sectaries, and to keep men firm in just and rational notions of religion and government, never deviating from what he judged in his conscience to be right, for the sake of making court to any, or from baser motives of fear. But he was separated from the army in the beginning of the year 1657, in a very critical juncture, just when they fell off from the Parliament, Mr Baxter being at that time seized with a bleeding at the nose in so violent a manner, that he lost the quantity of a gallon at once, which obliged him to retire to Sir Thomas Rouse's, where he continued for a long time in a very languishing state of health, which hindered him from doing that service to his country, that otherwise from a man of his principles and moderation might have been expected. He afterwards returned to Kidderminster, and resumed the work of his ministry. He hindered, as far as it was in his power, the taking of the Covenant, he preached and spoke publicly against the engagement (n), and therefore it is very unjust to brand him, as some have done, as a trumpeter of rebellion [F]. When the army was marching to oppose King Charles II at the head of the Scots, Mr Baxter took pains both by speaking and writing, to remind the soldiers of their duty, and to dissuade them from fighting against their brethren and fellow-subjects (o). After this, when Cromwell assumed the supreme power, he was not afraid to express his disaffection to his tyranny, though he did not think himself obliged to preach Politicks from the pulpit. Once indeed he preached before Cromwell, but neither did he in that sermon flatter, or in a conference he had with him afterwards, did he express either affection to his person, or submission to his power, but quite [E] That he killed a man in cold blood, and robbed him of a medal.] This strange story was first published to the world in a book written by Dr Boreman, of Trinity-college in Cambridge; for 'til then it passed current in discourse, but was often contradicted, and generally looked upon as a calumny. At length it was stated as a direct charge, on the credit of Major Jennings, the very person whom Mr Baxter left for dead. The substance of the story was as follows: That Mr Baxter finding one Major Jennings in the war time among the bodies of the dead and wounded, looked on while Lieutenant Hurdman that was with him ran him thro' the body in cold blood; and that Mr Baxter took off with his own hand the King's picture from about his neck, telling him, as he was swimming in his Gore, that he was a Popish Rogue, and that, that, was his crucifix; which picture was, it is said, kept by Mr Baxter 'till it was got from him, but not without much difficulty, by one Mr Somerfield who lived with Sir Thomas Rouse, who restored it to the true owner, who was supposed to be dead of his wounds (7). And this narrative was subscribed by Jennings himself, that it might pass for the more authentick. Mr Baxter, in a piece published by him two years afterwards, absolutely denies this, declaring that he took a voluntary oath it was false; that he was not near Major Jennings at that time, nor indeed ever saw him any where else to his knowledge in the course of his life. But in the house where he was, he did hear the soldiers tell how they wounded and stripped him, and took his medal (laughing at a silly soldier that called it a crucifix); and the man that took it offering it to sale, Mr Baxter declares he gave him eighteen pence for it, and some years after sent it Major Jennings freely, which it seems made him think, and rashly affirm, tho' falsely, that it was Mr Baxter that took it from him (8).

[F] As a trumpeter of rebellion.] To enter into all the gross things that have been said of Mr Baxter by his enemies, would take up more room than we have employed in writing his life. It is sufficient to note their names, and the pieces they have wrote, in the margin (9); adding, as a specimen, the following speech put into the mouth of President Bradshaw in Hell, who, in deciding on the merits of Mr Hobbs,

Mr Nevill, and Mr Baxter, is made to speak of the latter thus: 'If he, whose Faith is faction, whose Religion is rebellion, whose Prayers are spells, whose Piety is magick, whose Purity is the gall of bitterness, who can cant and recant, and cant again; who can transform himself into as many shapes as Lucifer (who is never more a Devil than when an Angel of Light), and, like him (who proud of his perfections, first rebelled in Heaven), proud of his imaginary graces, pretends to rule and govern, and consequently rebel on earth, be the greatest politician; then make room for Mr Baxter: Let him come in, and be crowned with wreaths of serpents and chaplets of adders: Let his triumphant chariot be a pulpit drawn on the wheels of cannon, by a brace of wolves in sheep's clothing: Let the antient Fathers of the Church, whom out of ignorance he has villified; the reverend and learned Prelates, whom out of pride and malice he has abused, belied, and persecuted; the most righteous King, whose murder (I speak my own and his sense), contrary to the light of all religion, laws, reason, and conscience, he has justified, then denied, then again and again justified; let them all be bound in chains to attend his infernal triumph to his Saints Everlasting Rest. Then make room for Scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites, atheists, and politicians, for the greatest rebel on earth, and next to him that fell from (10) Heaven.' Yet it is certain, that no man made more warm pretensions to loyalty than Mr Baxter did, who, as we shall presently see, had the courage to tell the Protector Cromwell his face, that the old English monarchy was a blessing. He was at the desire of King Charles II. appointed one of his Chaplains, and had some share of royal favour as long as the King lived. But what seems to put this matter out of all question is this, that after the severe treatment he met with in the reign of King James, which might easily have sowed his spirit, and after the Revolution, when he was under no necessity of keeping terms, he disclaimed all such sentiments, declaring positively, that throughout the whole civil war he was always for the King and Parliament, and never against the King's person, power, or prerogative (11).

quite the contrary (p) [G]. He came to London, a little before the deposition of Richard Cromwell. At that time Mr Baxter was looked upon as a friend to monarchy, and with reason, for being chosen to preach before the Parliament on the 30th of April 1660, which was the day preceding that on which they voted the King's return, he maintained, that loyalty to their Prince, was a thing essential to all true Protestants of whatever persuasion (q). About the same time likewise he was chosen to preach a thanksgiving sermon at St Paul's, for General Monk's success; and yet some have been so bold as to maintain, that he attempted to dissuade His Excellency from concurring in, or rather from bringing about, that happy change (r) [H]. After the Restoration he became one of the King's Chaplains in Ordinary, preached before him once, and had frequent access to his Royal person, and was always treated by him with peculiar respect. At the Savoy conferences, Mr Baxter assisted as one of the Commissioners, and then drew up the Reformed Liturgy, which all who are competent judges allow to be an excellent performance. He was offered the bishoprick of Hereford, by the Lord-Chancellor Clarendon, which he refused to accept, for reasons which he rendered in a respectful letter to his Lordship (s). Yet even then he would willingly have returned to his beloved town of Kidderminster, and have preached there in the low state of a Curate. But even this was refused him, though the Lord-Chancellor took pains to have settled him there as he desired (t). When he found himself thus disappointed, he preached occasionally about the city of London, sometimes for Dr Bates at St Dunstan's in the West, and sometimes in other places, having a licence from Bishop Sheldon, upon his subscribing a promise, not to preach any thing against the doctrine or ceremonies of the Church (u). The last time he preached in publick was on the 15th of May, 1662, a farewell sermon at Black-Friars. He afterwards retired to Acton in Middlesex, where he went every Lord's day to the publick church, and spent the rest of the day with his family, and a few poor neighbours that came in to him. In 1665, when the plague raged, he went to Richard Hampden's, Esq; in Buckinghamshire, and returned to Acton when it was over. He staid there as long as the act against conventicles continued in force, and when that was expired, he had so many auditors that he wanted room. Hereupon, by a warrant signed by two Justices, he was committed for six months to New-Prison jail, but got an Habeas Corpus, and was released and removed to Totteridge near Barnet (w) [I]. At this place he lived quietly and without disturbance, but [G] Affection to his person, or submission to his power, but quite the contrary] The Earl of Warwick and the Lord Broghill were the persons who drew him to preach before the Protector, and the words he made choice of were these: Now I beseech you, brethren, by the name of our Lord Jesus Christ, that ye all speak the same thing, and that there be no divisions among you, but that ye be perfectly joined together in the same mind, and in the same judgment. He levelled his discourse against the divisions and distractions of the Church, shewing how mischievous a thing it was for Politicians to maintain such divisions for their own ends, that they might fish in troubled waters, and keep the Church by it's divisions in a state of weakness, lest it should be able to offend them. Awhile after Cromwell sent to speak with him, and when he came he had only three of his chief men with him. He began a long and tedious speech to him of God's providence in the change of the government, and how God had owned it, and what great things had been done at home and abroad in the peace with Spain and Holland, &c. When he had continued speaking thus about an hour, Mr Baxter told him, it was too great condescension to acquaint him so fully with all those matters which were above him; but that the honest people of the land took their antient monarchy to be a blessing, and not an evil, and humbly craved his patience that he might ask him how they had forfeited that blessing, and unto whom this forfeiture was made? Upon that question he was awakened into some passion, and told him there was no forfeiture, but God had changed it as pleased him; and then he let fly at the parliament, which thwarted him, and, especially by name, at four or five members, which were Mr Baxter's chief acquaintance, whom he presumed to defend against the Protector's passion. And thus were four or five hours spent, though to little purpose. Some time afterwards the Protector sent for him again, under pretence of asking his judgment about liberty of conscience, at which time also he made a long tedious speech himself, which took up so much time, that Mr Baxter desired to offer his sentiments in writing, which he did; but he says he questions whether Cromwell read them (12). We have also a character of this usurper drawn by the pen of our author, too long to be inserted here (13).

[H] From bringing about that happy change.] The credit of this story depends on the intelligence of Sir Roger L'Esrange, who, in one of his dialogues, introduces it thus. ' Tor. Prithee ask Mr Baxter if he knew who it was that went with five or six more of his own cloth and character to General Monk, upon his coming up to London in 1659; and finding a great deal of company with him, told His Excellency that he found his time was precious, and so would not trouble him with many words; but, as they were of great weight, so he hoped they would make an answerable impression on him. I hear a report, Sir, (saith he) that you have some thoughts of calling back the King; but it is my sense, and the sense of the gentlemen here with me, that it is a thing you ought not to do upon any terms; for profaneness is so inseparable from the royal party, that if ever you bring the King back, the power of godliness will most certainly depart from this land (14).'

To which charge Mr Baxter returned an answer in the following words: ' Dr Manton (and whether any other I remember not) went once with me to General Monk, and it was to congratulate him, but with this request, that he would take care that debauchery and contempt of religion might not be let loose upon any man's pretence of being for the King, as it already began with some to be. But there was not one word by me spoken (or by any one, to my remembrance) against his calling back the King, nor any of the rest here adjoined: But as to me, it is a mere fiction. And the King was so sensible of the same that I said, that he sent over a proclamation against such men, as while they called themselves the King's party, did live in debauchery and profaneness; which proclamation so rejoiced them that were after Nonconformists, that they read it in publickly in the churches (15).'

but not without many marks of Royal favour. The King was resolved to make some concessions to the Dissenters in Scotland, and the Duke of Lauderdale, by his order, acquainted Mr Baxter, that if he would take this opportunity of going into that kingdom, he should have what preferment he would there; which he declined on account of his own weakness and the circumstances of his family. His opinion however was taken on the scheme for settling Church disputes in that country (x). In 1671, Mr Baxter lost the greatest part of his fortune by the shutting up of the King's Exchequer, in which he had a thousand pounds (y). After the indulgence in 1672, he returned into the city, and was one of the Tuesday lecturers at Pinner's-hall, and had a Friday lecture at Fetter-lane, but on the Lord's days, he for some time preached only occasionally; and afterwards more steadily in St James's market-house, where in 1674, he had a wonderful deliverance, by almost a miracle, from a crack in the floor (z). He was apprehended as he was preaching his lecture at Mr Turner's, but soon released, because the warrant was not, as it ought to have been, signed by a city justice. The times seeming to grow more favourable, he built a meeting-house in Oxenden-street, where he preached but once before a resolution was taken to surprize and send him to the county-jail on the Oxford act, which misfortune he luckily escaped; but the person who preached for him was committed to the Gatehouse, and continued there three months. Having been kept out of his new meeting-house a whole year; he took another in Swallow-street, but was likewise prevented from using that, a guard being fixed there for many Sundays together, to hinder him from coming into it. On Mr Wadsworth's dying, Mr Baxter preached to his congregation in Southwark for many months. When Dr Lloyd succeeded Dr Lamplugh in St Martin's parish, Mr Baxter made him an offer of the chapel he had built in Oxenden-street, for publick worship, which was very kindly accepted (a) [K]. In 1682, he suffered more severely than he had ever done on account of his non-conformity. One day he was suddenly surprized in his house by many Constables and officers, who apprehended him upon a warrant to seize his person, for coming within five miles of a corporation, producing at the same time five more warrants, to distrain for one hundred and ninety five pounds for five sermons. Though he was much out of order, being but just risen from his bed, where he had been in extremity of pain, he was contentedly going with them to a Justice, to be sent to jail, and left his house to their will (b). But Dr Thomas Cox meeting him as he was going, forced him again into his bed, and went to five Justices and took his oath, that he could not go to prison without danger of death. Upon this the Justices delayed till they had consulted the King, who consented that his imprisonment should be for that time forborn, that he might die at home. But they executed their warrants on the books and goods in the house, though he made it appear they were none of his, and they sold even the bed which he lay sick upon (c). Some friends paid them as much money as they were appraised at, and he repayed them. And all this was without Mr Baxter's having the least notice of any accusation, or receiving any summons to appear and answer for himself, or ever seeing the Justices or accusers; and afterwards he was in constant danger of new seizures, and thereupon he was forced to leave his house, and retire into private lodgings (d). Things continued much in the same way during the year 1683, and Mr Baxter remained in great obscurity, however, not without receiving a remarkable testimony of the sincere esteem, and great confidence, which a person of remarkable piety, though of another persuasion, had towards him: The reverend Mr Thomas Mayot, a beneficed Clergyman in the Church of England, who had devoted his estate to charitable uses, gave by his last will 600*l.* to be distributed by Mr Baxter to sixty poor ejected Ministers;

the courts in Westminster-hall he could procure his liberty; upon this a Habeas Corpus was demanded at the bar of the Common-Pleas, and granted. The Judges were clear in their opinion, that the mittimus was insufficient, and thereupon discharged him. This exasperated the justices, who committed him; and therefore they made a new mittimus in order to have sent him to the county-gaol of Newgate, which he avoided by keeping out of the way. The whole of this persecution is said to have been owing to the particular pique of Dr Bruno Rives, Dean of Windsor and of Wolverhampton, Rector of Hafely and of Acton, and one of the King's Chaplains in Ordinary (16). The reason that he pushed this matter so far was, because Mr Baxter had preached in his parish of Acton, which he fancied some way reflected upon him, because Mr Baxter had always a large audience, though in truth this was in a good measure owing to the imprudence of the Dean, whose Curate was a weak man, and too great a frequenter of alehouses.

[K] Which was very kindly accepted] This was a fact publick enough in its own nature, and which Mr Baxter had mentioned in his life-time; and yet, on its appearing in Dr Calamy's Abridgment, a very considerable writer, in a work which makes no mean figure in the world, was pleased to tell his readers, that this part of the relations, as to the offer of a chapel, is known to be false (17), which occasioned, as it well might, a strict enquiry to be made. At first sight, indeed the point might seem to be of no great importance; but when it is remarked that Mr Baxter had given it under his hand, that Dr Lloyd and his parishioners had accepted it for publick worship, on the offer of himself and his wife (18); it is plain, that admitting this to be a falsehood, must prove a stain on the character of the deceased, and such a one as might make very disadvantageous impressions on the minds of posterity. Hereupon application was made to Dr Lloyd himself, then Bishop Worcester, who was, pleased in justice to truth, and to Mr Baxter's memory, to give it under his hand, 'that Mr Baxter, being disturbed in his meeting-house in Oxenden-street by the King's drums, which Mr Secretary Coventry caused to be beat under the windows, made an offer of letting it to the parish of St Martin's for a tabernacle, at the rent of forty pounds a year; and that his Lordship hearing it, said he liked it well, and that thereupon Mr Baxter came to him himself, and upon his proposing the same thing to him, he acquainted the vestry; and they took it upon those terms (19)'. Thus this matter was fully and clearly made out beyond any possibility of a reply, and is a full proof that we ought not to take upon trust, whatever haughty or partial men may think fit to set down in their histories.

fters; adding, that he did it not because they were Nonconformifts, but because many fuch were poor and pious. But the King's-Attorney, Sir Robert Sawyer, fued for it in the Chancery, and the Lord-Keeper North gave it all to the King. It was paid into the Chancery by order, and, as Providence directed it, there kept fafe, till King William the third afcended the throne, when the Commiffioners of the Great-Seal, reftored it to the ufe for which it was intended by the deceafed; and Mr Baxter difpofed of it accordingly (e). In the following year, 1684, Mr Baxter fell into a very bad ftate of health, fo as to be fcarce able to ftand. He was in this condition, when the Juftices of Peace for the county of Middlefex granted a warrant againft him, in order to his being bound to his good behaviour. They got into his houfe, but could not immediately get at him, Mr Baxter being in his ftudy, and their warrant not empowering them to break open doors. Six Conftables however, were fet to hinder him from getting to his bed-chamber, and fo by keeping him from food and fleep, they carried their point, and took him away to the Seflions-houfe, where he was bound in the penalty of four hundred pounds to keep the peace, and was brought up twice afterwards, though he kept his bed the greateft part of the time (f). In the beginning of the year 1685, Mr Baxter was committed to the King's-Bench prifon, by a warrant from the Lord Chief Juftice Jefferies, for his paraphrafe on the New Teftament, and tried on the 18th of May in the fame year in the court of King's-Bench, and found guilty, and on the 29th of June following received a very fevere fentence (g) [L].

[L] Received a very fevere fentence.] This trial of Mr Baxter was by much the moft remarkable tranfaftion in his life; and therefore, though we by no means affect long citations, yet in fuch a cafe as this we are under a neceffity of ftating things from a perfon, who has given us the faireft account of them, for the fake of authority. On the 6th of May, being the firft day of Eaft Term, 1685, Mr Baxter appeared in the court of King's-Bench, and Mr Attorney declared he would file an information againft him. On the 14th the defendant pleaded not guilty, and on the 18th, Mr Baxter being much indifpofed, and defiring farther time than to the 30th, which was the day appointed for the trial, he moved by his counfel that it might be put off; on which occafion the Chief Juftice antwered angrily, I will not give him a minute's time more to fave his life. We have had (fays he) to do with other forts of perfon, but now we have a Saint to deal with, and I know how to deal with Saints as well as finners. Yonder (fays he) ftands Oats in the pillory (as he actually did in the New Palace-yard), and he fays he fuffers for the truth, and fo does Baxter; but if Baxter did but ftand on the other fide of the pillory with him, I would fay two of the greateft rogues and rafcals in the kingdom ftood there. On the 30th of May, in the afternoon, he was brought to his trial before the Lord Chief Juftice Jefferies at Guild-hall. Sir Henry Ashurst, who could not forfake his own and his father's friend, ftood by him all the while. Mr Baxter came firft into court, and with all the marks of ferenity and compofure waited for the coming of the Lord Chief Juftice, who appeared quickly after with great indignation in his face. He no fooner fat down, than a fhort caufe was called, and tried; after which the clerk began to read the title of another caufe. You blockhead you (fays Jefferies), the next caufe is between Richard Baxter and the King: Upon which Mr Baxter's caufe was called. The paffages mentioned in the information, were his paraphrafe on Matth. v. 19. Mark ix. 39. Mark xi. 31. Mark xii. 38, 39, 40. Luke x. 2. John xi. 57. and Acts xv. 2. Thefe paffages were picked out by Sir Roger L'Eftange, and fome of his fraternity. And a certain noted clergyman (who fhall be namelefs) put into the hands of his enemies fome accusations out of Rom. xiii. &c. as againft the King, to touch his life; but no ufe was made of them. The great charge was, that in thefe feveral paffages he reflected on the Prelates of the Church of England, and fo was guilty of fedition, &c. The King's counfel opened the information at large, with it's aggravations. Mr Wallop, Mr Williams, Mr Rotherham, Mr Atwood, and Mr Phipps, were Mr Baxter's counfel, and had been feeb by Sir Henry Ashurst. Mr Wallop faid, that he conceived the matter depending being a point of doctrine, it ought to be referred to the Bifhop, his Ordinary; but if not, he humbly conceived the doctrine was innocent and juftifiable, fetting afide the inuendo's, for which there was no colour, there being no antecedent to refer them to. (i. e. no Bifhop or Clergy of the Church of England named) He faid the book accufed, i. e. The Comment on the New Teftament, contained many eternal truths; but they who drew the information were the libellers, in applying to the Prelates of the Church of England, thofe fevere things which were written concerning fome Prelates who deferved the characters which he gave. My Lord (fays he), I humbly conceive the Bifhops Mr Baxter fpeaks of, as your Lordfhip, if you have read Church hiftory, muft confefs, were the plagues of the Church and of world. Mr Wallop, fays the Lord Chief Juftice, 'I obferve you are in all thefe dirty cafes; and were it not for you gentlemen of the long robe, who fhould have more wit and honefty, than to fupport and hold up thefe factious knaves by the chin, we fhould not be at the pafs we are.' My Lord, fays Mr Wallop, I humbly conceive, that the paffages accufed are natural deductions from the text. 'You humbly conceive,' fays Jefferies, and I humbly conceive: Swear him, 'fwear him.' My Lord, fays he, under favour, I am counfel for the defendant; and, if I understand either Latin or Englifh, the information now brought againft Mr Baxter upon fuch a flight ground, is a greater reflection upon the Church of England, than any thing contained in the book he is accufed for. Says Jefferies to him, 'Sometimes you humbly conceive, and fometimes you are very poffive: You talk of your skill in Church hiftory, and of your understanding Latin and Englifh; I think I understand fomething of them as well as you; but, in fhort, muft tell you, that if you do not understand your duty better, I fhall teach it you.' Upon which Mr Wallop fat down. Mr Rotheram urged, that if Mr Baxter's book had fharp reflections upon the Church of Rome by name, but fpake well of the Prelates of the Church of England, it was to be prefumed that the fharp reflections were intended only againft the Prelates of the Church of Rome. The Lord Chief Juftice faid, Baxter was an enemy to the name and thing, the office and perfon of Bifhops. Rotheram added, that Baxter frequently attended divine fervice, went to the facrament, and perfwaded others to do fo too, as was certainly and publickly known; and had in the very book fo charged, fpoken very moderately and honourably of the Bifhops of the Church of England. Mr Baxter added, my Lord, I have been fo moderate with refpect to the Church of England, that I have incurred the cenfure of many of the Diffenters upon that account. 'Baxter for Bifhops, fays Jefferies, that's a merry conceit indeed: Turn to it, turn to it.' Upon this Rotheram turned to a place where 'tis faid, 'That great refpect is due to thofe truly called to be Bifhops among us,' or to that purpofe. 'Ay, faith Jefferies, this is your Prefbyterian cant; truly called to be Bifhops; that is himfelf, and fuch rafcals, called to be Bifhops of Kidderminfter, and other fuch places: Bifhops fet apart by fuch factious, fnivelling Prefbyterians as himfelf; a Kidderminfter Bifhop he means: According to the faying of a late learned author, and every parifh fhall maintain, a Tith-pig Metropolitan.' Mr Baxter beginning to fpeak again, fays he to him, 'Richard, Richard, doft thou think we will hear thee poison the court, &c. Richard, thou art an old fellow, an old knave; thou haft written books enough to load a cart, every one as full of fedition

In 1686, the King, by the mediation of the Lord Powis, granted him a pardon; and, on the 24th of November he was discharged out of the King's-Bench. Sureties, however were required for his good behaviour, but it was entered on his bail-piece by direction of King James, that his remaining in London, contrary to the Oxford act, should not be taken as a breach of the peace. After this he retired to a house he took in Charter-house yard, contenting himself with the exercise of his ministry, as assistant to Mr Sylvester, and though no man was better qualified than he, for managing the publick affairs of his party, yet he never meddled with them, nor had the least to do with those addresses which were presented by some of that body to King James II on his indulgence (b). After his settlement in Charter-house yard, he continued about four years and a half in the exercise of publick duties, till he became so very weak as to be forced to keep his chamber. Even then he ceased not to do good, so far as it was in his power; and as he spent his life in taking pains, so to the last moment of it he directed his Christian brethren by the light of a good example. He departed this life December 8, 1691. A few days after his corps was interred in Christ-church, being attended to the grave by a large company of all ranks and qualities, especially ministers, and amongst them not a few of the Established Church, who very prudently paid this last tribute of respect to the memory of a great and good man, whose labours deserved much from true Christians of all denominations (i). He was a man, to speak impartially from the consideration of his writings, who had as strong a head, and as found a heart, as any of the age in which he lived. He was too conscientious to comply from temporal motives, and his charity was too extensive to think of recommending himself to popular applause by a rigid behaviour. These sentiments produced such a practice as inclined some to believe he had a religion of his own, which was the reason that when Sir John Gayer bequeathed a legacy by will to men of moderate notions, he could think of no better expression than this, that they should be of Mr Baxter's religion (k) [M]. We need not wonder that a person so little addicted to any party should

' (I might say treason) as an egg is full of meat. Hadst thou been whipped out of thy writing trade forty years ago, it had been happy. Thou pretendest to be a preacher of the gospel of peace, and thou hast one foot in the grave; 'tis time for thee to begin to think what account thou intendest to give. But leave thee to thyself, and I see thou'lt go on as thou hast begun; but, by the Grace of God, I will look after thee. I know thou hast a mighty party, and I see a great many of the brotherhood in corners, waiting to see what will become of their mighty Don, and a Doctor of the party (looking to Dr Bates) at your elbow; but, by the Grace of Almighty God, I'll crush you all.' Mr Rotheram sitting down, Mr Attwood began to shew, that not one of the passages mentioned in the information ought to be strained to that sense, which was put upon them by the innuendo's, they being more natural when taken in a milder sense, nor could any one of them be applied to the Prelates of the Church of England without a very forced construction. To evince this he would have read some of the text: But Jefferies cried out, you shall not draw me into a conventicle with your annotations, nor your snivelling parson neither. My Lord, say Attwood, I conceive this to be expressly within Roswell's case, lately before your Lordship. You conceive, says Jefferies, you conceive anis; it is not. My Lord, says Mr Attwood, that I may use the best authority, permit me to repeat your Lordship's own words in that case. No, you shall not, says he. You need not speak, for you are an author already; though you speak and write impertinently. Says Attwood, I cannot help that my Lord, if my talent be no better; but it is my duty to do my best for my client. Jefferies thereupon went on, inveighing against what Attwood had published: And Attwood justified it to be in defence of the English constitution, declaring that he never disowned any thing that he had written. Jefferies several times ordered him to sit down, but he still went on. My Lord, says he, I have matter of Law to offer for my client; and he proceeded to cite several cases, wherein it had been adjudged that words ought to be taken in the milder sense, and not to be strained by innuendo's. Well, says Jefferies, when he had done, you have had your say. Mr Williams and Mr Phipps said nothing, for they saw it was to no purpose. At length says Mr Baxter himself, My Lord, I think I can clearly answer all that is laid to my charge, and I shall do it briefly. The sum is contained in these few papers, to which I shall add a little by testimony: But he would not hear a word. At length the Chief Justice summed up the matter in a long and falshome harangue. ' 'Tis notoriously known (says he) there has been a design to

' ruin the King and the nation. The old game has been renewed, and this has been the main incendiary. He is as modest now as can be; but time was, when no man was so ready at bind your Kings in chains, and your Nobles in fetters of iron; and to your tents O Israel. Gentlemen, for God's sake don't let us be gulled twice in an age, &c.' And when he concluded, he told the jury, that if they in their consciences believed he meant the Bishops and Clergy of the Church of England, in the passages which the information referred to, they must find him guilty; and he could mean no man else; if not, they must find him not guilty. When he had done, says Mr Baxter to him, Does your Lordship think any jury will pretend to pass a verdict upon me, upon such a trial? ' I'll warrant you Mr Baxter, says he, don't you trouble yourself about that.' The jury immediately laid their heads together at the bar, and found him guilty. As he was going from the bar, Mr Baxter told my Lord Chief Justice, who had so loaded him with reproaches, and yet continued them, that ' a predecessor of his had had other thoughts of him.' Upon which he replied, ' That there was not an honest man in England but what took him for a great knave.' He had subpoenaed several clergymen, who appeared in court, but were of no use to him, through the violence of the Chief Justice. The trial being over, Sir Henry Ashurst led Mr Baxter through the crowd (I mention it to his honour), and conveyed him away in his coach. On June the 29th following he had judgment given against him. He was fined five hundred marks, to lie in prison till he paid it, and be bound to his good behaviour for seven years. (20).

(20) Calamy's Abridgment, Vol. I. p. 368—372.

[M] That they should be of Mr Baxter's religion.] Sir John Gayer did by his last will and testament bequeath a considerable sum of money to persons lately entered into the ministry, and young students for the ministry, with this restriction, that they should be such as were neither for domination nor unnecessary separation, but of Mr Baxter's principles. His Lady, being of the Established Church, inclined to pay the legacy to such as were within Sir John's description of her own community. Upon this a Chancery suit was commenced, wherein it was proved, to the satisfaction of the court, that Mr Baxter was a Nonconformist; whereupon a decree went in favour of the plaintiffs (21). This was certainly a very singular case, and much for the honour of Mr Baxter, since it plainly appears that Sir John Gayer thought him a man of distinguished piety and uncommon moderation; and, on the other hand, neither Church nor Dissenters could be prevailed on to part with their right in him, but actually tried it in a court of equity.

experience the bitterness of all, and in truth, no man was ever more severely treated in this respect than Mr Baxter, against whom more books were written, than against any man in the age in which he lived [N]. His friends, however, were such as the bare repetition of their names might well pass for a panegyrick, since it is impossible they could have lived in terms of strict intimacy with any other than a wife and upright man [O]. But the best testimony of Mr Baxter's worth may be drawn from his own writings, of which he left behind him a very large number [P]. Many indeed have censured them, though it is certain, that [N] Against any man in the age in which he lived. It is said that in whole, or in part, no less than sixty treatises were opposed to him and his writings; neither would it be difficult to make this good by a distinct citation of them; but, for brevity's sake, perhaps the following succinct account may do as well. He had for his adversaries certain modern Sadducees, who were provoked by his strenuously asserting the immortality of the soul, and a future state of rewards and punishments. He was opposed by Materialists, on account of his maintaining the distinction between spirit and substance. By the Anti-trinitarians, for affirming their doctrines to be incompatible with the scriptures. By certain zealous Ecclesiasticks, for representing the old controversies with the Nestorians, Eutychians, and Monothelites, as capable of easier reconciliations than is allowed by fierce dividers. By Arians and Socinians, as judging too hardly of such as deny the godhead of Christ. By Arminians, as holding special Election and differing Grace. By hot Anti-arminians, for holding such free-will and universal redemption, as Usher, Davenant and Preston, and other such knowing men defended. By the Anabaptists, for writing so much and so warmly for Infant Baptism. By rigid dissenting Separatists, for separating no farther from the Conformists than they separate themselves from necessary truths, and for persuading men to communion with the parish assemblies. By the Conforming Separatists, for not separating from all save themselves, and for owning those to be faithful servants of Christ whom they reject. By Clement Writer, and the Seekers, for asserting the Certainty of Scripture Verity, as sealed by the Spirit, by miracles and sanctification; and for maintaining that there is yet a continuance of a true Ministry and true Churches. By Mr Liford, and some others, for taking the blasphemers of the Holy Ghost to be fixed Infidels, judging Christ's miracles to be by the Devil. By Mr Henry Dodwell, for not taking the office of Presbyters to be varied by the will of the Bishop or Ordainer, without being determined by Christ's institution; and for not denying the Presbyters and Bishops of the reformed Churches to be real ministers, and not unchurching their Churches, who have not an uninterrupted succession of canonical ordination by Dioceans, as from the days of the Apostles, and not inveighing against them as committing the sin against the Holy Ghost, in administering the sacraments while but laymen, though he himself held such as the French to be true ministers. By the Erastians, for vindicating the power of the keys, and the necessity of ministerial Church discipline. By the Independents, for being too much for a national Church, and against their unnecessary covenanting terms of communion, and their giving too much power to popular votes. By the Scottish Presbyterians, for being against the imposition of their Covenant, and too much for Episcopacy. By zealous Churchmen, because he was not entirely a Conformist, and particularly differed from them in his notions of Episcopacy. By eager Politicians, who sought to represent him as a republican, and avowed enemy to monarchy, and to the Royal family. By loose and licentious writers, who, through the sides of Mr Baxter, were for ridiculing and exposing religion and sobriety, morality, and good manners (22). All these adversaries pursued him with uncommon virulence in sentiment and language; and he, on the other hand, defended himself with great vigour against them all, being seldom known to quit the field where his adversary brought any other weapon to the dispute than scurrility. To set down the names of all who made themselves remarkable by contending with Mr Baxter would take up too much room, and therefore let it suffice, that we give an instance in one of the malice of the rest; and this instance shall be an epitaph, or monumental inscription, drawn up for him in his life-time, and published, that he might see how he was to be represented after his death. (22) Review of Mr Baxter's Life, by Mr Thomas Long, p. 189.

[O] With any other than a wife and upright man. We have already mentioned many of his court friends, to whom we ought to add the famous Duke of Lauderdale, the Earl of Balcarras, a Scotch nobleman of the name of Lesley, and at the head of the Presbyterian interest in that kingdom. The great Chief Justice Hale, who honoured him with an intimate friendship, gave a high encomium of his piety and learning to all the Judges; when he was in prison, on the Oxford act, left him a legacy in his will, and several large books, in his own hand-writing, on the matter of their confessions; Alderman Ashurst, Sir John Maynard, Sir James Langham, Sir Edward Harley, &c. He was likewise honoured with the correspondence of many foreign Divines, such as Mr Brunfenius, Chaplain to the Elector Brandenburg; Dr Spencer, chaplain to the Elector of Saxony; the celebrated Monsieur Amyrald, and many others: Among whom we ought not to forget Dr John Tillotson then Dean of St Paul's, and afterwards Archbishop of Canterbury (24).

[P] Of which he left behind him a large number. Dr Bates tells us that his books, which for number, and variety of matter were sufficient to make a library, contain a treasure of Controversial, Casuistical, Positive, and Practical Divinity (25). Bishop Wilkins affirms, that he has cultivated every subject he has handled (26). Dr Simon Patrick, Bishop of Ely, commends him as a useful and pious writer (27). But the reverend Mr Long of Exeter, whom we have quoted more than once, says, that it would be well for the world if they were all burned (28). According to his computation, they were in number fourscore: Dr Calamy says he wrote above one hundred and twenty (29). Neither of these computations are exact. The author of this note hath seen a hundred and forty-five distinct treatises of Mr Baxter's, whereof four were folio's, seventy-three quarto's, forty-nine octavo's, and nineteen in twelves and twenty-four's, besides single sheets, separate sermons, and at least five and twenty prefaces before other men's writings. The first book he published was his Aphorisms of Justification, and the Covenants, printed in 1649, and the last in his life-time; The Certainty of the World of Spirits, printed in 1691, so that he was an author two and fifty years. Amongst his most famous pieces were his Saints Everlasting Rest; his Call to the Unconverted, of which twenty thousand were sold in one year. It was translated into all the European languages, and into the Indian tongue; his Reformed Liturgy, his Catholic Theology, his Poor Man's Family Book, his Dying Thoughts, and his Paraphrase on the New Testament. His practical works have been printed altogether in four volumes in folio, and it is a

B A X T E R (WILLIAM) nephew and heir of Mr Richard Baxter, mentioned in the last article (a), was an eminent Schoolmaster and Critick, in the end of the XVIIth, and beginning of the XVIIIth, century. His family was ancient and not inconsiderable [A], but (by what means we are not informed) his parents were but in very indifferent circumstances (b). He was born in the house of his mother's father, at Llanlugany, an obscure village in Shropshire (c), in the year 1650 (d). No care, it seems, was taken of his education in his younger years: For, at the age of eighteen, when he first went to the school at Harrow on the Hill in Middlesex, where he was educated (e), 'he knew not one letter in a book, nor understood one word of any language but Welsh (f).' But he so well redeemed and improved his time, that he became a person of great and extensive knowledge. His genius led him chiefly to the study of Antiquities and Philology, in which he composed several books. The first he published, was in 1679, a Grammar, intituled, De Analogia seu Arte Latinæ Linguae Commentariolus [B]. Next, in 1695, a new and correct edition of Anacreon, with Notes; reprinted in 1710 with considerable additions and improvements [C]. In 1701 he put out an edition of Horace [D], which was reprinted in 1725, with additions. And in 1719 he published his curious and learned Dictionary of the British Antiquities [E]; of which a second edition came out in 1733, after the author's decease. His Glossary of the Roman Antiquities, which goes no further than the letter A, was published

[A] His family was ancient, and not inconsiderable.] He derives his pedigree (like a true Cambro-Briton) through a long series of ancestors, from John Baxter, who, in the reign of Henry VI, settled at Shrewsbury. And he shews, that the name of Baxter signifies originally a Baker. in Saxon Bæceter; and that it was given that family, because they were Bakers to the ancient Princes of Wales; in which post, according to the custom of the antient Celtes and Greeks, the noblest persons were employed. — De more scilicet veterum Celta- rum atque Græcorum, ut nobilissimi quique in sanulatu essent Regio, domesticisque fungerentur officii (1).

[C] A new and correct edition of Anacreon, &c.] The title of which is as follows: Anacreontis Teij carmina. Plurimis quibus hætenus scatebant mendis purgavit, turbata metra restituit, notasque cum nova interpretatione literali adjecit Willielmus Baxter. Subjiciuntur etiam duo vetustissima poetriæ Sapphus elegantissima odaria, unâ cum correptione Isaaci Volsii, & Theocriti Anacreonticum in mortuum Adonin. Lond. 1697, and 1710, 8vo. In the dedication he makes very free with the famous Tanaquil Faber, who formerly published an edition of that Poet, calling him a silly Frenchman, who rejects as false and spurious whatever he doth not understand; that he trifles every where, hath no acuteness nor critical discernment, but is a meer blockhead. J. Cornelius de Pauw, who published a new edition of Anacreon at Utrecht in 1732, 4to, is even with Mr Baxter, and treats him with as much contempt as he had done T. Faber; saying, that his, and Joshua Barnes's Commentaries upon that poet, are full of the most silly and ridiculous trifles. Such is the common usage of criticks to each other. Sec Dr Bentley's notes throughout.

[D] In 1701 he put out an edition of Horace, which was reprinted in 1725.] The second edition was finished by him but a few days before his decease, and published under this title: Q. Horatii Flacci Eclogæ, una cum scholiis perpetuis, tam veteribus quam novis. Adjecit etiam, ubi visum est, & sua; textumque ipsum plurimis locis vel corruptum vel turbatum restituit Willielmus Baxter, 8vo. In this some things are corrected, others altered, and several additions made. The notes are collected from the most eminent commentators on Horace, particularly those two antient ones, Helenius Aro, and Pomponius Porphyrio; and also from the moderns, namely from Lambinus, Cruquius, Torrentius, Lubinus, Chr. Landinus, Anton. Mancinellus, Muretus, Henric. Stephanus, Heinsius, &c. As for Tanaq. Faber, he says he hath not one good note upon that poet. And, with regard to Dacier, he leaves the candid reader to judge, whether the want of fidelity or diligence is most to be complained of in that commentator. Then as to Dr Bentley, he seems in his opinion to have rather buried Horace under a heap of rubbish, than to have illustrated him. Scriptorem ipsum videtur magis oppressisse quam adornasse. (To this second edition are subjoined the third Satire of the second book of Horace restored to it's original order, by Dr Aldrich, Dean of Christ-church, and an account of that poet's metre by Chr. Wase.)

[E] In 1719 he published his — Dictionary of the British Antiquities.] Under the title of Glossarium Antiquitatum Britannicarum, sive Syllabus Etymologicus Antiquitatum veteris Britannicæ atque Ibernicæ, temporibus Romanorum. Authore Willielmo Baxter, Cornario, Scholæ Merciariorum præfeto, 8vo. Dedicated to Richard Mead, M. D. by whose advice it had been saved from the flames. In the dedication and preface the author observes, that by the help of his knowledge in the British, or Welsh tongue (which he affirms to be absolutely necessary to a British Antiquary) he had corrected Camden in a great many passages, and added about two hundred names of antient places and rivers, which were not taken notice of in his Britannia; besides the old appellations of Gods, Kings, and Generals, which he had explained according to the best of his abilities; and had compared occasionally the surnames and expressions of Old Gaul, and other countries. Through the whole work he goes upon this supposition, that all the nations of Europe were Heneti, or Brigantes, and of an Asiatic origin; and on account of their being Foreigners at first, were called Galli by other nations. In the second edition are added some short notes, in the beginning, by Dr W. Stukely, F. R. S. and, at the end, Mr Edw. Lhwyd's posthumous observations on the names of the rivers, mountains, towns, &c. in Britain. By extracts of some letters published in the beginning of this book, it appears that the author was above twenty years about it.

published in 1726, by the reverend and learned Mr Moses Williams [F]: who also put out proposals in 1732 for printing Mr Baxter's notes on Juvenal [G]. He had likewise made notes on Perlius; which are at present either lost or mislaid. And translated into English some of Plutarch's Lives, done some years ago by several hands (*). Our author was an extraordinary good Linguist, and a great master of the ancient British and Irish tongues; most particularly skilled in the Latin and Greek, and in the northern and Eastern languages. He kept a correspondence with the learnedest men of his time, especially with that eminent Antiquarian Mr Edward Lhwyd. Some of his Letters are published at the end of his Glossarium Antiquitatum Romanarum, of which we shall give an account in the note [H]. There are likewise in the Philosophical Transactions (g), two letters of his to Dr Harwood; one concerning the town of Veroconium, or Wroxeter, in Shropshire (b); and the other concerning the Hypocausta, or Sweating-Houses of the Ancients. And another to Dr Hans Sloane, Secretary of the Royal Society (i), containing an abstract of Mr Edward Lhwyd's Archeologia Britanica, or Account of the Languages, Histories, and Customs of the original inhabitants of Great Britain, &c. Mr Baxter was taken up for the most part of his life, with the toilsome employment of teaching youth. For he kept some years a boarding-school at Tottenham-High-Cross in Middlesex: from whence he was chosen master of Mercers school, near Cheapside in London (k). In this post he continued above twenty years (l); but resigned it before his death, which happened on the thirty-first of May 1723, in the seventy-third year of his age (m). Having had no thoughts of marrying in his younger days, and even rejected some advantageous offers, he took at last to wife a woman without a fortune, but of a very good character, named Sarah Carturit, by whom he had two sons, and three daughters (n).

[F] His Glossary of the Roman Antiquities ——— was published in 1726, by Mr Moses Williams. It was published under the title of Reliquiæ Baxterianæ, sive Willielmi Baxteri opera posthuma. Præmittitur eruditi auctoris vitæ a seipso conscriptæ Fragmentum. But the book, very likely, not selling under that title, it was republished in 1731, with this title, Glossarium Antiquitatum Romanarum, A Willielmo Baxter, Cornavio, Scholæ Merciariorum Præfeto. Accedunt eruditi auctoris vitæ a seipso conscriptæ Fragmentum, et selectæ quædam ejusdem Epistolæ. Lond. 8vo. The author intended, if God had granted him life, to have gone through the whole alphabet, but he was hindered from proceeding in this useful, though difficult, undertaking, by the discouragement he met with from the Book-sellers, to whom he offered the copy of his Glossarium Antiquitatum Romanarum, when it was ready for the press (2). To satisfy the learned reader's curiosity we shall insert one article, which will give a true notion of the author's method. 'A, Au, vel Ab, à Græco Ἀπ' vel Ἀρ' prò Ἀπὸ; veteribus Gothis Af, uti & Germanis; indigenis nostris Av, unde & ἄρην τινὸν A, quod sequente Vocali est 'Ar, uti & Persis, Armenis & veteribus Britannis; Anglis Un, & Latinis In, etiam sequente Confona.' Most of the articles are long and learned Dissertations.

[G] Who also put out proposals in 1732 for printing Mr Baxter's notes on Juvenal. Under this title, Gulielmi Baxteri quæ supersunt enarrationes & notæ in D. Junii Juvenalis Satyras. Accedit rerum & verborum observatione digniorum, quæ in iisdem occurrunt, Index locupletissimus. Accurante Mose Gulielmo A. M. R. S. Soc.

[H] Some of his letters are published at the end of his Glossarium Antiquitatum Romanarum. The first is a very curious one to Mr Edw. Lhwyd, in which he asks his judgment of the account he there gives him of the antient language and alphabet. In the first place he takes it for granted, that no language is natural; and concludes, that as the sounds, or Potestates, of the letters were first owing to the imitation of sounds natural; so the first figures were contrived to signify, for the most part, the things from which those sounds were first learned. For instance, A wide is the voice of a Bull, which is therefore called by the Syrians Alpha, or Ail appa, Huyes attes in Phrygian, and in Latin Liber pater, in Egyptian Ou Siri, and sometime only Apis, which, as is well known, was represented under the shape of a Bull. — B we learnt of the Sheep: The Tyrians therefore call it Baita, and Babine is still Greek for a Sheep-skin: And so on. He sums up the whole by observing, that the whole Alphabet consists first of Gutturals, which are the Vowels, with H, X, and Ng, or Y, which H being added to any Vowel or Consonant, will make a secondary kind of Alphabet, as Ha, Bha, &c. He places these Gutturals first, because they are most simple, and common to man with brutes. The second sort he calls Linguals, which are proper to mankind, and borrowed by imitation from animal and other sounds. Palatins and Dentals are reduced to these. The third sort are Labiaks, formed by the lips alone.

In another letter he says, that before the invention of letters, the heads of nails served to count by, and that for a memorial of that antient usage, they elevated their cups, chairs, hilts of their swords, and their very letters. At Rome they kept memorandums of years, by driving a nail in the Capitol, on the ides of September, as is well known.

In a third letter he observes, that Plutarch in his Cato Uticensis makes Cicero the contriver of writing per notas (in characters or short-hand) upon the score of Catiline's conspiracy. And that he used that way of writing is apparent from an epistle of his ad Atticum, lib. XIII. Dion. lib. LV. tells us, that Mecænas communicated the art to the publick by his freed man Aquila, as Eusebius in Chronicis saith Cicero did by his man Tyro. Notwithstanding all this, it appears by Suetonius in his Cæsar, that Cæsar himself did write per notas. For my own part, saith Mr Baxter, I am very apt to believe this way of writing to have been universal before a Musician invented the Alphabet. The antient marks, used both by Musicians and Physicians, I take to be a remainder of these Notæ. C

BAYLY (LEWIS), Bishop of Bangor in the reign of King James I, and author of a celebrated piece called The Practise of Piety [A], was born in the town of Caermarthen in [A] He wrote a celebrated Treatise called The Practise of Piety. The title at length is, The Practise of Piety, directing a Christian how to walk that he may please God; with this motto, Piety hath the Promise. 1 Tim. iv. 8. It is dedicated to the high and mighty Prince, Charles, Prince of Wales; and the author tells His highness, he had 'endeavoured to extract (out of the Chaos of endless controversies) the old practice of true Piety, which flourished before those controversies were hatched (1).' After the Epistle Dedicatory follows this distich, addressed to that Prince:

Ad Carolum Principem.
Tolle malos, extolle bonos, cognosce teipsum;
Sacra tene, paci consule, disce pati.

The reader may judge of the reception this book has met with from the great number of editions it has run through; that in octavo, 1734, being the fifty-ninth. Mr Wood tells us, it was the substance of several sermons, preached by Dr Bayly while he was minister of Evelham; that it was translated into Welsh, and into French in Wales, and educated at Oxford; but in what college we cannot say. We find only, that he was admitted to the reading of the sentences, in the year 1611; about which time, he was Minister of Evesham in Worcester-shire, Chaplain to Prince Henry, and Rector of St Matthew, in Friday-street, London; and that he proceeded in Divinity two years after. Being an eminent Preacher, he was appointed one of King James's Chaplains; who promoted him to the See of Bangor, to which he was consecrated, at Lambeth, December the eighth, 1616. On the fifteenth of July 1621, he was committed a prisoner to the Fleet: but what his crime was, we know not; unless, perhaps, it concerned Prince Henry's match with the Infanta of Spain. This Prelate died in the beginning of the year 1632, and was buried in the church of Bangor. He left behind him four sons, Nicholas, John, Theodore, and Thomas (a); the last of whom deserves our particular notice (b).

French in the year 1633; and that the fame of it was so great, that one John D'Espagne, a French writer, and preacher in Somerset-house chapel, complained, that the generality of the common people looked upon it's authority as equal to that of the Bible (2). Lewis du Moulin denies Bishop Bayly the honour of writing this book. He pretends (3), it was the composition of a Puritan minister, and purchased of the author's widow by Dr Bayly, who interpolated it in several places, and published it as his own; and that the style and sentiments of the book being absolutely puritanical, and yet a Bishop's name being prefixed to it, occasioned it to be equally fought after by Puritans and Episcoparians. Others ascribe the Practise of Piety to Mr Price, Archdeacon of Bangor. But Dr White Kennet, Bishop of Peterborough (4), has put it beyond all question, that our Prelate was the true author of this book, and that pretending the contrary was a lying, malicious, puritan story, invented by that proud pharisaical faction, who were not willing a book so well esteemed should be writ by a Bishop.

B A Y L Y (THOMAS), Doctor of Divinity, and son of Dr Lewis Bayly Bishop of Bangor (a), was educated at Cambridge; and, having taken the degree of Bachelor of Arts, was presented by King Charles I, in May 1638, to the sub-deanry of Wells, upon the promotion of Dr William Roberts to the See of Bangor. In 1644, he retired, among other loyal Ministers, to Oxford, and, in the month of August that year, was created Master of Arts, and soon after Doctor in Divinity. In 1646, we find him with the Marquis of Worcester in Ragland-Castle, which that nobleman defended for King Charles I, against the Parliament army. But that castle being surrendered on the nineteenth of August in the same year, upon good articles, mostly of Dr Bayly's framing, he travelled into France and other countries; where having spent a considerable sum of money, which he had gotten from the said Marquis, he returned into England the year after the King's death. Having given offence by his writings (b), he was committed prisoner to Newgate; out of which he soon made his escape, and retired to Holland; where he declared himself a Roman-Catholic, and became a great zealot for that cause, often breaking out into rage and fury against the Protestant religion, which he had before preached and professed. Some time after, he left Holland, and settled at Douay; and at last went into Italy, where he died [A]. We shall take notice of him as an author in the remark (c) [B].

(c) Wood, Atten. Oxon. Vol. 1. col. 567, 568, 569.

[A] He died in Italy. Anthony Wood tell us (1) he was informed by several Roman Catholics, that Dr Bayly was received into the service of Cardinal Ottononi, and that he died in the Cardinal's family, whilst his Eminence resided at Ferrara as Nuncio from the Pope. But an English traveller assured our Biographer, that this was not true; that the Doctor was reduced to the necessity of turning common soldier; that he lived poor at Bononia; and that he saw his grave there. And this account was confirmed by Dr Trevor, Fellow of Merton-college (younger brother to Sir John Trevor, some time Secretary of State), who was in Italy in 1659, and who several times told Mr Wood, that Dr Bayly died obscurely in an hospital, and that he had seen the place where he was buried.

[B] He was an author. Soon after his return into England in 1649, he published a book, intitled, Certamen Religiosum: Or, A Conference between King Charles I, and Henry late Marquis of Worcester, concerning Religion, in Ragland-castle, an. 1646. Printed at London, in octavo. The Doctor was blamed by the true sons of the Church of England for publishing this piece, in which the Romish cause was set forth with great pomp; and it was looked upon by many as nothing else than a prologue to the declaring himself a Papist. Besides, the orthodox party affirmed, that this Conference had nothing of the style of King Charles I in it, and that the Marquis of Worcester had not abilities to maintain a discourse of religious matters with the King. There was published in 1651, An Answer, with Considerations on Dr Bayly's parenthetical Interlocution, by Hammond L'Esrange; and C. C. i. e. Christopher Cartwright of York, published An Answer to Certamen Religiosum, &c. together with a Vindication of the Protestant Cause. Printed at London, 1651, in quarto. About the same time Dr Peter Heylyn put out an advertisement against it, as an imposture, in his Epistle to the Reader, prefixed to the collection of King Charles's works, intitled Bibliotheca Regia; in which the Conference is inserted, but omitted in all other impressions of his Majesty's works (2). The same year Dr Bayly published The Royal Charter granted unto Kings by God himself, &c. To which he added A Treatise, wherein is proved, that Episcopacy is Jure Divino. It was afterwards reprinted at London, in 1656 and 1680, in octavo. In this piece, Mr Wood tells us, the Doctor, like an unskilful builder, diruit ædificat; what he rears with one hand, pulls down with the other, and is guilty of many egregious errors, a specimen of which may be seen in a book, intitled, Legenda Ligneæ (3). And, amongst many stories of his travels, having sailed with great freedom at all the governments in Europe, he at last falls desperately on that newly established in England; which provoked a strict enquiry after the author, and ended in his discovery and imprisonment in Newgate. During his confinement he wrote a piece, intitled, Herba Parietis: Or, The Wall-flower, as it grows out of the Stone-chamber belonging to the Metropolitan prison; being an History, which is partly true, partly romantic, morally divine; whereby a marriage between Reality and Fancy is solemnized by Divinity. Printed at London, in 1650, in a thin folio; in the Preface to which the author falls foul upon Peter Heylyn, whom he calls a fellow without a name, for the advertisement abovementioned. He also tells us of his great sufferings in the late civil war, in which, he pretends, he had lost not only a thousand pounds per annum, but his blood and his liberty; and he brags of the nobility of his descent, his father being a Peer, and his mother a Knight's daughter. Whilst he lived at Douay, he gave the public a book, intitled, The End to Controversy between the Roman man Catholic and Protestant Religions, justified by all the several manner of ways, whereby all kind of Controversies, of what nature soever, are usually, or can possibly, be determined. Printed at Douay in 1654, in quarto, and dedicated to Walter Montague, Abbot of Nanteuil, and afterwards of Pontoise. There also goes under Dr Bayly's name, The Life and Death of the renowned John Fisher, Bishop of Rochester. Printed at London in 1655, in octavo. But the true author of this work, Mr Wood assures us (4), was one Richard Hall, Doctor of Divinity, some time Fellow of Christ's-college in Cambridge (of which Bishop Fisher was a member), afterwards Canon and Official of the cathedral church of St Omers; who leaving it behind him at his death in 1604, it was esteemed a curious piece, and as such deposited in the library of the English Benedictines at Dieuward in Lorrain. Afterwards several copies of it getting abroad, one of them fell into the hands one West; from whom it came into the possession of Francis a Sancta Clara in 1623, and from him (as Mr Wood was assured from his own mouth) to Sir

Wingfield Bodenham; who, keeping it in his hands several years, with an intention to print it in the name of the true author, communicated it for some time to Dr Bayly; who, taking a copy thereof, and making some alterations in it, sold it for a small sum of money to a Bookseller, who printed it at London under the name of Thomas Bayly, D. D. Mr Wood adds, that he had seen a manuscript life of Bishop Fisher, beginning thus; Est in Eboracensi Comitatu, obsequens à Londino lapide, ad aquilonem, Beverleie oppidum, &c. Who the author was, he knew not; but thinks it not unlikely Hall had seen it, having been written before his time. There is another work ascribed to our author, intitled, Golden Apophthegms of King Charles I, and Henry Marquis of Worcester. Printed at London in 1660, in one sheet quarto. But Mr Wood tells us, they were taken entirely from another piece, intitled, Witty Apophthegms delivered at several times, and upon several occasions, by King James, King Charles I, and the Marquis of Worcester. Lond. 1658, 8vo. without the author's name. T

B A Y N E S (Sir THOMAS), an eminent Physician, and Professor of Musick at Gresham-college in London, was born about the year 1622, and educated at Christ's-college in Cambridge, under the tuition of the learned Dr Henry More, where he took the degree of Bachelor of Arts about the year 1642 (a). In 1649, he took the degree of Master of Arts (b), after which time he applied himself to the study of Physick. He went into Italy in company with Mr Finch (afterwards Sir John) with whom he had contracted the strictest friendship [A]; and at Padua they were both created Doctors of Physick [B]. Upon the Restoration of King Charles II, in 1660, Mr Baynes and Mr Finch returned into England (c), and the same year their Grace was passed at Cambridge, for creating them Doctors of Physick in that university (d). On the twenty-sixth of February following, Mr Baynes, together with Sir John Finch (e), was admitted a Fellow-Extraordinary of the College of Physicians of London [C]. Dr Petty having resigned his Professorship of Musick in Gresham-college, Dr Baynes was chosen, to succeed him, the eighth of March 1660; and the twenty-sixth of June following, he and his friend Sir John Finch were admitted Graduates in Physick at Cambridge, in pursuance of the Grace passed in their favour the year before [D]. The winter following, this inseparable pair

[A] Mr Finch — with whom he had contracted the strictest friendship.] This gentleman was of the same college with Mr Baynes, and a pupil likewise of Dr More's; and the lives and fortunes of these fellow-collegians were so interwoven, as to render their history in a manner inseparable. They have a tradition at Christ's-college, that while Mr Finch was a student there, Mr Baynes, who was then his Sizar, took the liberty to admonish him with great tenderness of some misconduct in his behaviour, which at first he repented, but afterwards complied with his advice, and made him his constant and bosom-friend. Mr John Finch was younger brother of Sir Heneage Finch, afterwards Earl of Nottingham, and born about the year 1626. His admission at Christ's-college does not appear by their register, which is very imperfect (1). Anthony Wood tells us (2) he was educated in Grammar learning under Mr Edward Sylvester at Oxford, became a gentleman-commoner of Baliol-college about the fifteenth year of his age, and after he had taken one degree left that university, upon the coming of the visitors the year following. It appears by the Oxford register, that he took the degree of Bachelor of Arts there the 22d of May, 1647. But it is certain from his epitaph, that he was pupil to Dr More at Cambridge, as well as Mr Baynes. And therefore there is some difficulty in reconciling these two accounts, unless we suppose, that, in the year 1642, when Oxford was a garison, Mr Finch might for a time remove to Cambridge, and afterwards returning to Oxford, and taking his first degree in Arts there in 1647, leave it again the year following, and go back to Cambridge. Mr Finch pursued the study of Physick with Mr Baynes; and their friendship had then so firmly united them, that it is very probable they determined to proceed together through the several steps and advancements of life, so far as was consistent with their respective circumstances; for which reason Mr Baynes, who did not take the second degree till seven years after the first, might probably defer it till Mr Finch by his standing could do it with him (3).

[B] They were both created Doctors of Physick at Padua.] Mr Finch was made Consul of the English nation there, and likewise a Syndic of the university; in which office he acquitted himself so well, that he was honoured with a marble statue, and the great Duke made him public professor at Pisa (4). The like honours were afterwards paid by that university to another English Physician, Dr William Stokeham (5).

[C] Mr Baynes and Sir John Finch were admitted Fellows-Extraordinary of the College of Physicians of London. The order for their admittance being somewhat singular, I shall give it in the words of the register. *Ob præclara Doctoris Harveii, nobis nunquam sine honore nominandi, ejusque fratris germani Eliabi, in collegium merita, placuit, sociis omnibus presentibus, præterquam quatuor, Dominum Johannem Finch et Doctorem Thomam Baines (Patawii Doctorali laurea ornatos) adaucto tantumdem in eorum gratiam sociorum numero, in collegium eorum socios extraordinarios adsciscere. Ea tamen lege et conditione, ne res hæc facile in exemplum trabatur; i. e. 'In consideration of the great services done to the college by Dr Harvey, whom we ought never to mention without honour, and his brother Eliab, it is resolved, in the presence of all the fellows, excepting four, to elect into the College, as fellows-extraordinary, Sir John Finch and Dr Thomas Baynes, created Doctors at Padua, the number of fellows being increased merely for their sakes; but on condition that this proceeding shall not be drawn into a precedent.' The reason of their admission as Fellows-Extraordinary, with the condition annexed that this instance should not be drawn into a precedent, seems to have been, that the number of fellows, which at that time was limited to thirty, was then full: But by their new charter, granted by King Charles II, in 1663 (wherein the names of Dr Baynes and Sir John Finch were both inserted), the number was enlarged to forty (6); which in the reign of King James II was increased to eighty: And since that time they have been limited to no certain number, but remain candidates a year before their admission as fellows (7).*

pair of friends designed to have made a second tour into Italy [E], but did not execute their design. The twentieth of March 1663, they were elected Fellows of the Royal Society, upon the first choice made by the Council, after the grant of their charter, of which they had been members before (f), and, 'May 15, 1661, had, with several others, been nominated a Committee for a library (at Gresham-college) and for examining of the generation of insects (g).' In March 1664, Dr Baynes accompanied Sir John Finch to Florence, where that gentleman was appointed his Majesty's Resident, and returned back with him into England in 1670. Towards the end of the year 1672, Sir John being appointed the King's Embassador to the Grand Seigneur, Dr Baynes was ordered to attend him as his Physician, and, before he left England, received from his Majesty the honour of knighthood. Nine years after, Sir Thomas still continuing in Turkey, the Gresham Committee, taking into consideration his long absence without supplying the duty of his place, thought fit to dismiss him from his professorship, and, on the ninth of August 1681, chose Mr William Perry in his room. The news of this dismissal could not reach Sir Thomas Baynes; for he died at Constantinople [F] the fifth of the following month, to the inexpressible grief of his dear and constant friend Sir John Finch, who did not long survive him [G]. Their epitaph [H], written by Dr Henry More, is yet to be seen in the chapel of Christ's-college; and therein it is said, that they jointly left four thousand pounds to that college (b) [I].

grant of the university are so much to the honour of both of them, and express the great esteem they had gained abroad in so full a manner, that I shall here insert them in the original words. Cum vir eximie nobilitatis Johannes Finch eques auratus, et Pise magvi ducis Hetruriae professor publicus, et dignissimus etiam vir Thomas Baynes, duodecim abhinc annis admissi fuerint apud nos Cantabrigienfes ad gradum magistrerii in artibus, et postea in externas regiones profecti, diuque apud Patavinos commorati, non sine summo eorum applausu, et Anglicani nominis honore, gradum doctoratus in medicina ibidem adepti sint; in patriam demum reversi superiori anno isdem gratia concessa est, ut hic apud nos admitterentur ad eundem gradum, statum, et honorem, quibus apud Patavinos prius insigniti fuerant: At vero cum ipsimet in personis propriis ob importuna negotia, quibus impliciti et detenti sunt, adesse non possint: Placeat itaque vobis, ut vir nobilitatis Johannes Finch admissionem suam recipiat ad dictum gradum, sub persona Doctoris Carr, in Medicina Doctoris; et Thomas Baynes suam itidem, sub persona Johannis Goslin, inceptoris in medicina; et ut eorum admisso sit eisdem pro completis gradu et forma (8). The high reputation they had gained at Padua, and the honour they did to the English name, are here assigned as the reasons of their admission to the same degree at Cambridge, which had been conferred upon them in that foreign university. We learn also from this Grace, that they were admitted to their degree at that time by proxy; Mr Finch being represented by Dr Carr a Physician, and Dr Baynes by Mr John Goslin, Inceptor in Physick.

[E] They designed to have made a second tour into Italy.] For this purpose they had desired and obtained the consent of the College of Physicians, as appears by the following minute in the register. [F] Sir Thomas Baynes died at Constantinople.] His body was embalmed, and the bowels interred there, with a monument over them, by order of Sir John Finch; who soon after returning into England, brought the body with him, and sent it to Cambridge, where it was deposited in the chapel of Christ's-college, Sir John himself making a funeral oration in honour of the deceased (9).

[G] Sir John Finch did not long survive him.] He died the 18th of November, 1682, at London, and, according to his own desire, was carried down to Cambridge, and interred in the same grave with his beloved friend, being unwilling to be separated from him at death, who had been his constant companion, and the partner of his fortunes so many years while living (10).

BEATON, BETON, or rather BETHUNE (JAMES), Archbishop of St Andrews in the reign of King James V. This famous Prelate was descended from a very antient and honourable family, that came originally from France, but had been long settled in Scotland (a) [A]. His father was John Beaton of Balfour, and his mother Mary, daughter to Sir David Boswell of Blamuto (b). We have no certain account of his birth, or of the manner of his education, except that being a younger brother, he was from his nonage destined for the Church, and with that view kept to his studies (c). He had great natural talents, and having improved them by the acquisition of all that sort of learning fashionable in those times, he came early into the world, under the title of Provost of Bothwell; a preferment given him through the interest of his family (d) [B]. When he was once put into the road, he made a very quick progress in his journey, for having stepped into his first benefice in 1503, we find him the very next year advanced to the rich and honourable preferment of Abbot of Dumferling, which abbacy became void by the death of the most noble Prince, James Stuart, Archbishop of St Andrews, Duke of Ross, and Chancellor of Scotland (e). A very shining testimony this was of his master's favour, but in 1505 he received still a greater; for upon the death of Sir David Beaton, his brother, his Majesty honoured him with the staff of High-Treasurer, and he was thenceforward considered as one of the principal Ministers of the King his master (f). In 1508 he was promoted to the bishoprick of Galloway, on the death of Bishop Vaus, and before he had sat a full year in that cathedral chair, he was removed to the archiepiscopal See of Glasgow, vacant by the death of Dr Blackader, upon which he resigned the Treasurer's staff, which was bestowed on Dr Hepburn, Bishop of the Isles (g). This was in the year 1509, and his Grace seems to have taken this step, in order to be more at leisure to mind the government of his diocese; and indeed it is universally acknowledged, that none more carefully attended the duties of his functions than Archbishop Beaton while he continued at Glasgow, and he has left there such marks of concern for that church, as have baffled the strong teeth of time, and, which is still keener, the rage of a distracted populace (h). In a word, the monuments of his piety and publick spirit which he raised at Glasgow, yet remain and justify this part of his character [C]. It does not appear that he had any hand in those fatal counsels, which drove the unfortunate King James IV into his last war with England,

[A] Originally from France, but had been long settled in Scotland.] This noble family takes its name from the town of Bethune on the little river of Brette in Artois, five leagues from Aire, and six from Lille; and the first mention we meet with in history of these Lords of Bethune, informs us, that Robert the First founded the collegiate church of St Bartholomew in the year 999. He had six successors of his own name, the last of which left his title and estates to William, surnamed the Red, father of Daniel and Robert the VIIth. The latter left behind him an only daughter Maud, who married Guy de Dampierre Earl of Flanders, who had by her Robert the IIIrd, surnamed de Bethune, who bore his father's title (1). William de Bethune, Lord of Locres, settled in France, where he died August 24, 1243, and from him descended the Dukes of Sully, D'Orval, and Charost, and all the families of the same name in France (2). It is a point out of dispute, that the Scotch family are descended from the same stock with the French, but it is at the same time very certain, that the French writers are in the wrong to suppose that James de Bethune, who lived in the XVth century, was the founder of this family, since it appears, that Robert de Bethune was possessed of lands in Scotland in the reign of King William; and Sir David Bethune, who probably was his son, was living in 1296 (3). From him descended Robert de Bethune, who was of the household to King Robert II, and marrying the daughter and heiress of Sir John Balfour, chief of that family, obtained with her the lands of Balfour in the county of Fife; from whence this family has been ever since distinguished by the name of Bethune, or, as it is commonly written in Scotland, Beaton, of Balfour. This, it seems, was their principal Seat, and the family gained an establishment by marrying this heiress, but they retained nevertheless the name of Bethune, and quartered the arms of Balfour with their own, viz. quarterly 1st and 4th azure a Fess between three Maces Or, 2d and 3d Argent on a Chevron sable, an Otter's head erased of the first for Balfour, Supporters, two Otters proper, and an Otter's head for crest, with the word Debonnaire (4). Besides this, there have been several considerable families of this surname in Scotland, such as the Beatons of Creigh, of Baudon, of Blebo, &c. but as they all derive themselves from Beaton of Balfour, it is needless to dwell upon them.

[B] A preferment given him through the interest of his family.] He was remarkably happy at his setting out, for his brother, Sir David Beaton of Creigh, a very learned, wise, and prudent gentleman, was then a great courtier, and so much beloved by his master King James IV, that he raised him to the honour of being Comptroller of his household; and on the death of Sir Robert Lundin of Balgony, in 1502, he made him Treasurer of Scotland (5). But besides the assistance derived to our Divine, by the interest of this brother, he was also in great credit with the powerful house of Dowglas, from whom he received his first preferment, which was that of the Provostship of Bothwell. It may not be amiss to shew what the nature of this preferment was, and how the family of Angus came to have the bestowing of it. The reader then is to know, that there were in Scotland before the Reformation many collegiate churches of secular priests, and he who presided over these canons was styled Provost (6). The church of Bothwell was one of these, and belonged to the potent family of the Hepburns, Earls of Bothwell. But Archibald Dowglas, Earl of Angus, one of the most potent noblemen in Scotland, making use of this saying, That when the King was angry he had nothing to do but to retire to his hermitage in Liddesdale; King James IV swore there was no keeping the kingdom in order while the Earl of Angus was possessed of that country, of which the Earl was no sooner informed, than he resolved to sacrifice his own ease to the satisfaction of his master, and therefore consented that his eldest son and heir, George, according to the Scots customs, styled Master of Angus, should exchange the lands of Liddesdale for those of Bothwell, which, with the King's consent, was accordingly done in the year 1492 (7). And thus the Earl of Angus became patron of the college of Bothwell, which, upon the first vacancy, he bestowed upon Dr James Beaton; a plain proof that he came into the world under the powerful protection of this noble family, with which however he had very high differences afterwards, as in its proper place the reader will be informed.

[C] Still remain and justify this part of his character.] It may be justly observed, that there is no history of any country written with so much inaccuracy and confusion as that of Scotland, in respect to which, even those who might have been best acquainted with it, have committed strange mistakes. As for instance, Archbishop Spotswood tells us expressly, that our Arch-

England, which ended with the battle of Flodden-field, wherein the King lost his life. With him fell the flower of his Nobility, and amongst them Alexander, Archbishop of St Andrews, and Chancellor of Scotland, his natural son, of whom Erasmus has spoken with so much honour (i). By this fatal blow the kingdom was thrown into the utmost confusion, all minding rather their private advantages, than how to repair the publick loss. The Queen, by a very hasty and indecent marriage with the Earl of Angus, lost the regency, about which the Nobility could not agree, and the Clergy who ought to have interposed their good offices, were all together by the ears about the Archbishoprick of St Andrews; so that, for the re-establishment of peace, it was found requisite to send for John Duke of Albany, the young King's great uncle from France, and to declare him Regent (k). He was a very wise and moderate Prince, but at the same time, one who loved to make use of his authority, by which means he restored order and quiet in the State, and for a time satisfied every body. Among those particularly distinguished by his favour, was our Archbishop of Glasgow, whom he raised to the office of High-Chancellor, and conferred on him other benefits, which shewed how much he esteemed him (l) [D]. Some time after, when the Regent thought proper, or perhaps found it requisite to go to France, he appointed (amongst other great men) our Archbishop of Glasgow, one of the Governors of Scotland in his absence; and to prevent, if it had been possible, all disputes amongst them, they had different provinces assigned them (m). This was in 1517, but it did not answer the Duke-Regent's intention, for they quickly broke into parties, and this brought on such confusion, that they were content to devolve their whole power upon the Earl of Arran, nearly allied in blood to the King, and one of the most worthy Noblemen in the kingdom (n). Upon this, at his instance, and in order to reform the disorders that were crept into the Government, a Convention of Estates was summoned to meet at Edinburgh on the 29th of April, 1520. On which day, the Earl of Arran, with the chief of the Nobility of the West, assembled together in Archbishop Bethune's house, at the bottom of Blackfriar-wynde; where, before the fitting of the Convention, they resolved to apprehend the Earl of Angus, alledging that his power was so great, that so long as he was free they could not have a free parliament (o). But as soon as the Earl was informed of their design, he sent his uncle, the Bishop of Dunkeld, to the Archbishop of Glasgow, then Chancellor, offering if he had failed in any point of his duty to the rest of the Lords, he would most willingly submit himself to the censure of the Convention, which was going then to meet, and the Bishop himself, earnestly besought the Chancellor, that he would use his best endeavours with his friends to compromise matters, and prevent as much as possible the shedding of blood, which in a contest of that kind would be inevitable. The Archbishop, though he was as deep in the design as any of the party, and had put on armour to assist them in person, or at least, to animate others by his example, made the best apology for himself he could, and laid the blame wholly upon the Earl of Arran, who, he pretended, was dis-

bishop Beaton sat in this See twenty-two years (8); if so, he must have been Archbishop in the year 1500, that is about three years before he had any preferment at all. But the truth is, that, he was only fourteen years Archbishop of Glasgow, during which space he did many things for the honour of that church, and the convenience of his successors, as a very careful writer tells us in the following words. 'While Archbishop Beaton was in the See, he inclosed his episcopal palace in the city of Glasgow with a noble and magnificent stone wall of asiler work towards the east, south and west, with a bastion on one corner, and a tower on the other fronting the high street, whereupon are fixed in different places his coat of arms, viz. quarterly first and fourth as the Heralds blazon it, a fess betwixt three lozenges, two in chief, and one in base; second and third a chevron charged with an Otter's head coupee, surmounted by a salmon fish, the arms of the See, and his archiepiscopal cross instead of a mitre and crozier, and the word Misericordia for his motto. But this was not all his benefactions to the See while he sat here, for he augmented the altars in the choir of the cathedral, over which he caused to be affixed his arms emblazoned in their proper tinctures, where they are still to be viewed by the curious. He laid out also a good deal of money in building and repairing of bridges that were gone to decay at different places within the regality and about the city of Glasgow, whereupon are his arms engraven, which will remain as perpetual monuments of his charity (9).' At the time he sat here, the famous Dr Gawen Douglas, uncle to the Earl of Angus, and brother of the Archbishop's first patron, George, Master of Angus, was promoted to the See of Dunkeld, which being a suffragan to the Archbishop of Glasgow, Dr Douglas went thither to be consecrated; this was in 1515; and our Prelate, to shew how much he respected the new Bishop and his family, entertained him and all his attendants magnificently, and most generously defrayed the whole expence of his consecration (10).

[D] Which shewed how much he esteemed him.] He gave him for the support of his dignity the two rich abbeys of Killwinning and Arbroth, which he held with his Archbishoprick in commendam, and by this means drew him over from the faction of the Douglas's to his own party (11). But though this might satisfy both him and the Duke-Regent, yet it was so far from quieting the troubles and disturbances in Scotland, that, on the contrary, it contributed to increase them. The Lord Hume, who had been the principal person in bringing over the Duke-Regent, was so ill treated by him, that he was forced to join with the Earl of Angus, and the Earl of Arran was also not very well affected to the administration. After many confusions however (in some of which the Queen for her own safety fled to England, and her husband reconciled himself to the Regent) things seemed to go better, and there was some appearance of the publick tranquillity being settled, when suddenly, and without any cause, proportioned to such an effect, he summoned the Lord Hume and his brother, under colour of certain offences, and with the formality of Law cut off their heads. This so disgusted the nobility, that the Duke-Regent finding himself hated by the common people, and his commands slighted by the Peers, repented he ever came thither, and resolved to return to France; hoping that in his absence they might forget what had lately happened, and recover that spirit of cordial love and affection towards him, which they had shewn when he first assumed the government, and which he thought he should not have lost by putting the Humes to death, since whatever the pretence might be, the true cause of that severity certainly was the common fame, that the late King James IV. did not fall in battle, but was traiterously murdered by the Humes afterwards, which supposed fact he thus revenged (12).

obliged with the Earl of Angus upon many accounts, and after he had reckoned up the chief of them, he in the end concluded, There is no remedy! Upon my conscience, I cannot help it. And in the heat of his asseveration he beat on his breast with his hand, which made the iron plates of the coat of mail under his cassock return a rattling sound, which Bishop Douglas perceiving, he gave his brother, the Archbishop, this severe and just reprimand. How now, my Lord, methinks your conscience clatters: We are Priests; and to put on armour, or to bear arms, is not consistent with our character (p). But the good Bishop Douglas, perceiving he was able to do little with the Archbishop, who ought, upon this occasion, to have been a promoter of peace, but, instead of that, as Mr Buchanan assures us, flew up and down like a firebrand of sedition, left him: And thereupon ensued a hot skirmish, in which the Earl of Angus's party had the better. The martial Archbishop seeing the day lost, and his friends defeated, fled for sanctuary to the Black-friars church, and was there taken out from behind the altar, his rochet torn off him, and would certainly have been slain, if Bishop Douglas, from a tender regard he had for his character, had not interceded for him and saved his life (q). One historian indeed says, that the Archbishop fled on foot to the Queen; which possibly may be true, but then it must have been after he recovered his liberty, in the manner we have just now related (r). But from these distresses he was happily relieved the next year, 1521, by the return of the Duke-Regent from France, who very soon restored the face of affairs, and some kind of order in the government, obliging the Earl of Angus to consent, for the sake of the publick peace, to remain for a year in France (s). Affairs might have after this gone on well enough, if the Regent and the Clergy had not been bent upon involving the nation in war with England, to serve the purposes of the French, which, together with the suggestions of the Bishop of Dunkeld, and other Scotch exiles, greatly incensed King Henry VIII against the Regent, the Chancellor, and all their party (t). In the midst of these confusions died Dr Andrew Forman, Archbishop of St Andrews, and Primate of Scotland, which opened a fair path for Dr Beaton to set himself at the head of the Clergy (u), who were very well inclined to him, and very desirous that he should succeed; but however a great struggle there was before he could bring his design to bear, and in order to it, he is charged (though I think, without reason) which acting very ungratefully towards the Bishop of Dunkeld (w) [E]. At last, in 1523, he became Archbishop of St Andrew's, not only by the favour of the Duke-Regent, but with the full consent of the young King, who was at that time, and indeed all his life, chiefly governed by the Archbishop's nephew, David Beaton, for whom this great Prelate had such a regard, that soon after his promotion he resigned to him the rich abbey of Arbroth, or Aberbrothock (x). But this fair weather did not last long, for in the same year the power of the Regent was abrogated by parliament, the Earl of Angus returned from France, and by degrees made himself master of the government, and of the King's person (y). He was extremely incensed against the Archbishop, drove him from court, and dispossessed him of the office of Chancellor, obliging the King for that

[E] Very ungratefully towards the Bishop of Dunkeld. This is charged very home upon the Archbishop's memory by Mr Crawford, who, speaking of the generous behaviour of Bishop Douglas, when he delivered the Chancellor from the power of the mob, he proceeds thus; 'For which he made him afterwards a very ungrateful requital; for having an eye towards the Bishoprick of St Andrew's upon the death of Archbishop Forman, he was afraid of no competitor so much as of Bishop Douglas, and therefore, to be rid of him, writes a letter to the King of Denmark, wherein he represents him as a person disaffected to the government, and going about to infringe the privileges granted to the Scots nation by the holy See, endeavouring to be preferred to the Archbishoprick by the interest of the Emperor and the King of England, then publick enemies to Scotland, and therefore he intreats that King, that he would write to his ministers at Rome, to inform his Holiness that the Bishop was under a sentence of banishment because of his demerits, and thereby put a stop to his ambitious designs (13).' This letter, which has been hinted at by several other authors, was long preserved among other pieces relating to the histories of those times in the Advocates library at Edinburgh, which letters are now made publick. This is dated from Edinburgh, April the 8th, 1522 (14), and the contents of it are as before set forth; but then it is to be considered, that the Archbishop was Chancellor of the kingdom, and therefore the only person that could write this letter by the order of the Council; that the facts mentioned therein were strictly true, that is to say, the Bishop of Dunkeld was at that time a fugitive in England, was actually practising to restore the affairs of his party by the assistance of the King of England, and was endeavouring to obtain the Archbishoprick of St Andrew's and the Primacy of Scotland, not only without the consent, but in spite of the will of his Prince and the States of the kingdom, by whose direction this letter was written to induce the King of Denmark to interpose at the court of Rome on behalf of the King of Scots, his nephew, to prevent the Pope from making Douglas Archbishop at that juncture (15). Such was the fact, and such the circumstances that attended it. The reader will therefore judge between these two Prelates, who, in point of ambition, seem very nearly to have resembled each other, and at the same time he will remember, that the Chancellor must have written this letter in right of his office, whether he had any private interest in the affair or not; besides all which it is certain, that but a very little before this the Earl of Angus and his faction had forced the Archbishop to fly for his life. Whatever his motives might be, most certain it is the letter produced no effect, for before it could reach the hand of the King of Denmark, the Bishop of Dunkeld was in his grave (16), which perhaps might facilitate the Chancellor's scheme of becoming Archbishop of St Andrew's. Yet, with all the care I have been able to take, I have not been so happy to discover when he was promoted to this See: Only this is certain, that it was between the months of April and December 1523, since in the first he subscribed himself Archbishop of Glasgow, and Archbishop of St Andrew's in the latter (17). It is certain, that his promotion was very critical, since the Duke-Regent lost his authority so soon afterwards, which had he done before, there is no doubt but that Dr Dunbar would then have supplanted him in the Primacy, as he afterwards did in the Chancellorship, when the King was at full liberty, and disposed of the offices of state at his own pleasure (18).

that purpose to write him a letter, demanding the Great-Seal, which he very respectfully delivered, and some time after took upon himself the office of Chancellor (z) [F]. The Archbishop afterwards found means to revenge, in some measure, this usage, by giving a sentence of divorce, at the instance of the Queen, against the Earl of Angus; about the circumstances of which the historians differ, yet the fact is certain (a) [G]. When the Douglasses were driven from court, and the King recovered his freedom, the Archbishop came again into power, but did not recover his office of Chancellor, which was bestowed upon Gawen Dunbar, Archbishop of Glasgow, who had been the King's tutor (b), and stood very high in his favour. Our Archbishop resided from this time forward in his own palace at St Andrew's, where, by the arts of the Clergy, and chiefly by the influence of his nephew, he was drawn to proceed violently in the persecution of the Protestants, and actually caused the Abbot of Ferne to be burnt for a heretick, which drew upon him great odium (c) [H]. He went on afterwards in the same course as long as he lived,

[F] Took upon himself the office of Lord-Chancellor.] It was in the spring of the year 1523, that the Duke-Regent returned for the third and last time into France. Soon after which his authority was taken away by an act of parliament; for the Earl of Angus returning, quickly came to have such an influence, notwithstanding the ill terms upon which he stood with the Queen-Dowager his wife, that all things were directed by him and his creatures, and such an interest he had in parliament, that on the 25th of February, 1525, an act past, devolving the supreme authority upon a council of seven (19), viz. The two Archbishops, the Bishops of Aberdeen and Dumblain, the Earls of Argyle and Lenox, and himself, into which Council the Queen was to be admitted, and nothing was to be done without her advice. But it was not long that he was satisfied with this regulation, with which, while it lasted, he never complied, but managed all things at his own will; and therefore, by another act of parliament, dated the 17th of June, 1526, the King was declared of full age though but eighteen, and the administration placed entirely in his hands; that is, in the hands of the Earl of Angus, who kept him in his custody, and made him the engine of his will (20). One of the first things he made him do after this alteration took place, was appointing a new Privy-Council, in which the Archbishop of St Andrews was left out, and soon after the seal was taken from him, as is said in the text, but the Earl did not assume to himself the title of Lord-Chancellor before the month of August, 1527, after he had entirely new modelled the court (21). It was no wonder that in this plenitude of power, the Earl should persecute a man whom he hated, whose parts he feared, and whose interest was very great, his niece having lately married the Earl of Arran, who was looked upon as the second person in the kingdom. All this time King James V was very little better than a close prisoner, and though in publick he professed himself very affectionate to the Earl of Angus, yet he privately excited two attempts to rescue himself out of that Nobleman's hands; one by the Laird of Buccleugh, in which some blood was spilt; the other by the Earl of Lenox, which likewise failed, and in which that noble Lord was killed: And as the Earl of Angus foresaw what afterwards fell out, he endeavoured to secure himself from being called to an account for his conduct, by procuring an act of parliament in support of it (22). But soon after the King made his escape from Faulkland, and rode directly to the castle of Stirling, where the Queen, his mother, was; and from thence he presently issued a proclamation, forbidding the Earl to act any further in the government, taking from him all his places, and forbidding him, or any of his adherents, to come within twelve miles of the court. And in a parliament held the next year, he, and two of his nearest relations, were adjudged guilty of high-treason (23), which put an end to his power during that reign, though he recovered it after the King's death. But as this has nothing to do with the present article, we shall not pursue it any farther, as desiring only to shew how the Archbishop lost his credit and power, and how, in some measure, he afterwards recovered them.

[G] About the circumstances of which, though Historians differ, yet the fact is certain.] The rise of this divorce was very early, for the Queen of Scotland, like her brother Henry VIII, was very apt to grow weary of the conjugal yoke; and this humour, though resembling his own, that Monarch much disliked in her, which contributed to retard this affair for some years. The first ground of the quarrel between the Queen and the Earl, was upon their retiring out of Scotland, at the time the Duke of Albany became Regent, when her Majesty went to London, and the Earl remained on the borders: That is, in the year 1518, when it seems he had an amour with one Mrs Stewart, daughter to the Lord Traquair, by whom he had a daughter, who was afterwards married to the Lord Ruthen; of which the Queen having notice, she was much incensed against him; tho', for her own purposes, she frequently assisted him even afterwards with her interest (24). However, coming at last to know, that the Earl's correspondence with Mrs Stewart, was earlier than her marriage, she suggested that there was a pre-contract between the Earl and this lady, which rendered her marriage void (25). Upon this, a suit was commenced, in the Consistorial Court of the Archbishop of St Andrew's, who, after mature deliberation, and no doubt, upon due proofs, pronounced a judicial sentence of divorce, declaring the marriage to have been null from the beginning; but by an express clause, the legitimacy of the daughter the Queen had by the Earl was saved, because born under a marriage de facto, and contracted bona fide on the Queen's part. As soon after as this divorce could be confirmed by a Bull from Rome, the Queen-Dowager married Henry Stewart, brother to the Lord Evandale, who, on account of this marriage, was created Lord Methuen, the charter for erecting that barony being dated at Edinburgh the 7th of July, 1528 (26). Hence it appears, that Mr Hume was mistaken when he asserted, that the Queen did not prevail in her suit before the Pope, because what she alledged could not be proved; and that this increased her spite and hatred against the Earl, and set her to contrive by all the means she could, how to destroy him (27): For it is impossible to conceive how the Queen could openly marry a third husband in the life-time of her second, if she had not obtained such a divorce. It is indeed true, that her brother, King Henry, was very much offended with her upon this account; but then this arose from two causes, the first, That he held that scandalous in a woman, which he thought tolerable in a man; the second, that this lessened the interest of the Earl of Angus, to whom he always wished well, and who was both the most proper, the most steady, and the most useful friend he had in Scotland (28).

[H] Which drew upon him great odium.] The clergy of Scotland at this time were all in the French interest, and bitter enemies to England, because they looked upon King Henry VIII as a friend to the Reformation (29). The Abbot of Aberbrothock, who governed at this time both his uncle the Archbishop, and the King his master, was zealous for the religion, and for the court of Rome, which induced him to aim at stopping the growth of the new opinions, as they were called, by a vigorous prosecution. This was a thing to which neither his master nor his uncle was inclined; but his power was so great, and he had such an ascendancy over both, as enabled him to carry his design into execution, with the assistance however of many of the Bishops, who began to think that the Church was in the utmost danger, and came therefore very readily into that method, which this cunning and ambitious man persuaded them would effectually answer the end, and tear up Heresy by the roots, though it proved uneasy to the Archbishop, fatal to the King, and in the end also, notwithstanding all his artifices, no less fatal to himself, as the reader in the next article will see at large. The first that was called in question was Master Patrick Hamilton, Abbot of Ferne, a man nobly descended, (for he was nephew to the Earl of lived, though probably, against his inclination, for, as one of his successors tells us, he was naturally indifferent enough about religious disputes (d): But as to essential points, and the promoting piety and learning, he shewed a real concern, by founding the New-college in the university of St Andrew's, which he did not live to finish, and to which, though he left the best part of his estate, yet after his death it was misapplied, and did not come, as he intended, to that foundation (e). One of the last acts of his life was the being present at the baptism of the young Prince, born at St Andrew's the very year in which he died (f). His nephew acted for several years as his co-adjutor, and had the whole management of affairs in his hands; but the King retained to the last so great an affection for the Archbishop, that he allowed him to dispose of all his preferments, by which means, his relation, George Dury, obtained the rich abbey of Dumfermling, and one Mr Hamilton of the house of Roplock, became Abbot of Killwining (g). Our Archbishop deceased in 1539, and was interred in the cathedral church of St Andrew's before the high altar (h). He enjoyed the Primacy of Scotland sixteen years, and his character is very Arran by his father, and to the Duke of Albany by the mother) and not much above twenty-three years of age (30). This young gentleman had travelled in Germany, and falling into a familiarity with Martin Luther, Philip Melancthon, Francis Lambard, and other learned men, was by them instructed in the knowledge of true religion; in the profession whereof he was so zealous, that he was resolved to come back into his country, and to communicate the light he had received unto others. At his return, whereforever he came, he spared not to lay open the corruptions of the Roman Church, and to shew the errors crept into the Christian religion, to all which many gave ear, and a great following he had both for his learning and courteous behaviour to all sorts of people. The Clergy grudging at this, under colour of conference, enticed him to the city of St Andrew's, and when he came thither appointed Fryar Alexander Campbell to keep company with him, and to use the best persuasions he could to divert him from his opinions. Sundry conferences they had, wherein the Fryar acknowledged that many things in the Church did need to be reformed, and applauding his judgment in most of the points, his mind was rather confirmed than in any sort weakened. Thus, having staid some few days in the city, whilst he suspected no violence to be used, in the night, he was apprehended, being in bed, and carried prisoner to the castle. The next day he was presented before the Bishop, and accused for maintaining the articles following, viz.

I. That the corruption of sin remains in children after their baptism.

II. That no man by the power of his free will can do any good.

III. That no man is without sin so long as he liveth.

IV. That every true Christian may know himself to be in the state of grace.

V. That a man is not justified by works, but by faith only.

VI. That good works make not a good man, but that a good man doth good works, and that an ill man doth ill works, yet the same ill works truly repented make not an ill man.

VII. That faith, hope, and charity, are so linked together, that he who hath one of them hath all, and he that lacketh one lacketh all.

VIII. That God is the cause of sin in this sense, that he withdraweth his Grace from man, and Grace withdrawn he cannot but sin.

IX. That it is a devilish doctrine to teach, that, by any actual penance, remission of sin is purchased.

X. That auricular confession is not necessary to salvation.

XI. That there is no purgatory.

XII. That the Holy Patriarchs were in Heaven before Christ's Passion.

XIII. That the Pope is Antichrist, and that every Priest has as much power as the Pope.

It being demanded of him what he thought of these articles, he answered, that in his judgment the first seven points were undoubtedly true; that the rest were disputable, but that he could not condemn them without hearing better arguments offered against them, than any he had yet met with. These propositions therefore were delivered to the Rector of the university, and twelve other Divines, who, on the second of March, 1527, delivered them back again to the Judges, with their certificate that they were heretical. Upon this judgment they founded their sentence, which was subscribed by the two Archbishops, three Bishops, six Abbots and Fryars, and eight Divines. The very same day he was transferred to the secular Judge, and by his order burnt that very afternoon (31). He suffered with great courage and constancy, and his death was so far from answering the intentions of the Clergy, that it promoted the Reformation exceedingly, so that in a very short space afterwards many publicly professed their opinion, that Patrick Hamilton suffered unjustly, though for saying so one was burned (32). The Clergy however were for going on in the same track, and for stopping the mouths of such as preached what they disliked, in the same manner as they had done Hamilton's. The Archbishop moved but heavily in these kind of proceedings; and there are two very remarkable stories recorded to have happened about this time, which very plainly shew he was far enough from being naturally inclined to such severities. It happened at one of their consultations, that some who were most vehement pressed for going on with the proceedings in the Archbishop's court, when one Mr John Lindsey, a very merry man, and in great credit with the Archbishop, delivered himself to this purpose: If you burn any more of them, said he, take my advice, and burn them in cellars, for I dare assure you, that the smoke of Mr Patrick Hamilton has infected all that it blew upon (33). The other was of a more serious nature; one Alexander Seton, a black Fryar, preached openly in the church of St Andrew's, that, according to St Paul's description of Bishops, there were no Bishops in Scotland, which being reported to the Archbishop, not in very precise terms, he sent for Mr Seton, and reproved him sharply for having said, according to his information, that a Bishop who did not preach was but a dumb dog, who fed not the flock, but fed his own belly. Mr Seton said, that those who had reported this were liars, upon which wittnesses were produced, who testified very positively to the fact. Mr Seton, by way of reply, delivered himself thus: My Lord, you have heard, and may consider, what ears these asses have, who cannot discern between Paul, Isaiah, Zachariah, Malachi, and Fryar Alexander Seton. In truth, my Lord, I did preach that Paul saith, it behoveth a bishop to be a teacher. Isaiah saith, that they that feed not the flock are dumb dogs; and the Prophet Zachariah saith, that they are idle Pastors. Of my own head I affirmed nothing, but declared what the Spirit of God before pronounced; at whom, my Lord, if you be not offended, you cannot justly be offended with me. How much soever the Bishop might be incensed, he dismissed Fryar Seton without hurt, who soon afterwards fled out of the kingdom

(34). It does not appear, that from this time forward the Archbishop acted much in these measures himself, but chose rather to grant commissions to others that were inclined to proceed against such as preached the doctrines of the Reformation, a conduct which seems very fully to justify the remark of Archbishop Spotswood upon our Prelate's behaviour. Seventeen years, says he, he lived Bishop of this See, and was herein most unfortunate, that under the shadow of his authority many good men were put to death for the cause of religion, though he himself was neither violently set, nor much solicitous (as it was thought) how matters went in the Church (35).

very differently represented, according to the dispositions of those who have mentioned him in their writings (i) [1].

(i) Buchanan, Lesley, Spotswood, &c.

[7] Who have mentioned him in their writings.] It may be easily conceived, that a person for many years in so high a station, and in such factious times, must have provoked many, and yet we do not find that even those who were least his friends could lay much to his charge. Mr Hume, who disliked all that were no friends to the family of Douglas, does not for all that bear very hard upon the Archbishop. Except in the business of the riot at Edinburgh, of which we have given an account before, and in speaking of the Earl of Angus attacking the castle of St Andrew's, and pillaging it, he adds, He could not apprehend the Fox himself, who fled from hole to hole, and lurked secretly amongst his friends (36). The famous George Buchanan, who was obliged to fly for Heresy a little after Mr Hamilton was burnt, has no where spoken with heat or vehemence of the Archbishop; on the contrary, he styles him a very prudent man; and speaking of the violence with which the Earl of Angus persecuted his enemies, he adds (37), Neither did the Douglasses exercise their revenge and hatred less fiercely upon James Beaton, for they led their forces to St Andrew's, seized upon, pillaged, and ruined his castle, because they counted him the author of all the projects the Earl of Lenox had undertaken; but he himself went about in various disguises, because none durst receive him openly, and so escaped. The famous John Knox, who was no friend to Bishops, mentions him frequently, and gives him this character: 'He was more careful of the world than to preach Christ, or yet to advance any religion but for the fashion only, and, as he fought the world, it fled him not; for it was well known, that at once he was Archbishop of St Andrew's, Abbot of Dunfermling, Aberbrotho, Kylwinning, and Chancellor of Scotland (38).' Yet says nothing of him elsewhere particularly, except it be insinuating that he had a leprosy (39), of which there is not a word mentioned by any other writer. Archbishop Spotswood's character of him has been before given; but in another place he mentions some circumstances relating to the Archbishop's behaviour, which ought not to be omitted. 'The Archbishop, James Beaton, says he, committed the charge of all Church-affairs to his nephew the Cardinal (who succeeded in his place), for he was aged and sickly himself, and not seen often abroad. In his last days he began to erect the new college in St Andrew's, and set men at work to build the same: But neither lived he to finish the work, nor was the money he left in store to that use rightly bestowed. Some contesting, some few years before he and the Clergy had with the King, because of the imposition laid upon the Prelates for the entertainment of the Senators of the College of Justice, so that the matter was drawn by an appeal to Rome, and Gawen

Dunbar, Bishop of Aberdeen, appointed to prosecute the same. But this ceased upon an accord made, which was, that the Senate should consist of fourteen Ordinaries, with the Resident, seven of the Spirituality, and as many of the Temporality, the President always being of the spiritual estate, and a Prelate constitute in dignity. According to this appointment a Ratification passed in Parliament, anno 1537, and the Abbot of Cambuskenneth was elected President of the new Senate in the year 1539 (40).' But, as might be well expected, Dr John Lesley, Bishop of Ross, gives our Archbishop the highest character in his history; where, speaking of his death, he says, That after having long, with great reputation, enjoyed the highest offices in the State, the Archbishop, in a very advanced age, paid his last debt to nature, and was honourably interred in the cathedral of St Andrew's. That while he was yet alive, he disposed of all the benefices which he enjoyed, which the King did not oppose, but suffered those to whom he gave them freely to remain in possession, that he might not seem to controvert the will of him dead, whose opinion he had always followed while living. That he began to build the new college at St Andrew's, and left wherewithal to have finished it in the most beautiful manner, if the money had not been (to say no worse) applied to other uses than those of the college. But this character, as drawn by it's author, has something in it so elegant, that we cannot better close this life than by adding the author's own words, which must necessarily suffer by any translation. 'Jacobus Beatonius Archiepiscopus Sanctandropolitani, qui maximis reip. honoribus, summaque gloria, apud nos quam diutissime floruerat, ætate jam grandio natura concedebat, ac in æde Sancti Andree tumulo honorifice tegebatur. Hic Antistes quosdam, quos egregie caros habuit, vivos constitutebat, ut in beneficio sibi mortuo succicerentur. BEATON, BETON, or rather BETHUNE (DAVID) Archbishop of St Andrew's, Primate of Scotland, and Cardinal of the Roman Church. He was nephew to the Archbishop his predecessor, being the son of his elder brother John Beaton, or Bethune, of Balfour, by Isabel his wife, daughter of David Moniepenney, of Pitmillie, in the county of Fife (a). He was born some time in 1494, and had all imaginable care taken of his education while at home, where having passed through the ordinary discipline of the schools, and of the university of St Andrew's, he began to discover a pregnancy of wit, and an application to learning, which gave his relations great hopes of his becoming a considerable person (b). His uncle therefore being very desirous to complete his education, sent him over to France, where, in the university of Paris, he perfected himself in the Civil and Canon Laws, and applied diligently likewise to Divinity, in order to qualify himself for the service of the Church, and as soon as he attained to a proper age, entered into holy orders (c). His long stay in France was no way prejudicial to his preferment, for it gave him an opportunity of entering very early into the favour and service of John Duke of Albany, whom the States of Scotland had made Regent, during the minority of King James V, by whom he was employed in several affairs of consequence, in which he discharged his duty with such diligence and capacity, that upon the death of Secretary Pantar, he was appointed in his place, Resident at the Court of France, in the year 1519 (d). About the same time his uncle, then Archbishop of Glasgow, bestowed upon him the rectory of Campsay, though he was only in Deacon's orders, as appears plainly by the Act of Presentation, in which he is styled barely Clerk of the diocese of St Andrew's, so that he was beneficed in the Church, and a Minister of State at the age of twenty-five (e). In the year 1523, his uncle being now Archbishop of St

St Andrews, Primate of Scotland, and Commendator of Arbroath, resolved to resign the abbacy in favour of his nephew, and for that end he prevailed with the Regent Duke of Albany, to write in the most pressing manner, both in the young King's name and his own, to Pope Adrian VI, to expedite and dispatch the Bulls of his investiture, and withal, requesting his Holiness, that by the plenitude of his apostolick power, he would be pleased to dispense with Mr Bethune's taking on him, what they call the Habit, for the space of two years, which the Pope, to gratify the King, granted (f) [A]. These two years Mr Bethune continued in France, and upon his return in 1525, we find him taking his place and seat in Parliament, as Abbot of Arbroath (g). Almost all the writers of the History of Scotland, and even such as have undertaken to give us the particular memoirs of this great man, have represented him, as falling some way under a cloud after this time, through the great power of the Earl of Angus, into which they were led, by considering that nobleman's bitter hatred against his uncle the Archbishop of St Andrews (h). But how probable soever this might make it appear, yet the fact, beyond all question, is far from being true, since it appears from the very Act of Parliament, which constitutes the Earl of Angus one of the Regents, the following persons were appointed to attend upon, and to remain in the service and company of the King, viz. the Bishop of Orkney, the Earl of Morton, the Abbot of Holy-Rood-House, the Lord Seaton, and our Abbot of Arbroath (i); so that it is plain, he had either wrought himself into some degree of confidence with the family of Douglas, or stood at that time in so great credit with the King, that even this powerful party did not think proper to remove him; which, as it is a circumstance of his history not generally known, so it is certainly a very high proof of his eminent abilities (k). It does not appear, that in any of the subsequent changes of government, he was ever obliged to leave the person of his royal master, with whom he grew into such a high degree of favour, that in 1528, on the resignation of Bishop Crichton of Dunkeld, he was promoted to the dignity of Lord Privy-Seal (l). In this capacity he assisted the King with his counsels, and was looked upon to be the person in whom the King confided most. And there is good reason to believe, that it was by his persuasion the King instituted a College of Justice in 1530, after the manner that Philip IV of France, had established a court of the like kind (m). He was also intrusted in the year 1533, with a very important commission, which obliged him to return to France, in conjunction with Sir Thomas Erskine, with directions to give the Most Christian King, the strongest assurance of their master's, King James's, resolution, to adhere steadily to the alliance concluded between the two crowns at Rochelle, and to demand in marriage for him the Princess Magdalen, daughter to the French King, which marriage however did not then take effect, because the Princess was at that time in a very bad state of health (n). The Abbot of Arbroath, was likewise entrusted with some other

[A] Which the Pope, to gratify the King granted.]

The Duke of Albany, while Regent of Scotland, had as many cares and difficulties to struggle with, as any Prince that ever was intrusted with the management of the publick affairs of a kingdom (1). His father had been banished into France, where he was born; and it does not appear that he had intermeddled with the concerns of Scotland, or had any great intercourse with the Nobility, before he was called upon by them to take upon him that high office, which he is allowed to have executed with great diligence and capacity (2). He depended very much upon the French King Francis I, and promoted, as far as in him lay, the interest of that monarch in Scotland, which was the only objection that was ever made, even by his greatest enemies, against his administration. The opposite party were supported by, and acted wholly in favour of, King Henry VIII of England, uncle to their King James V, and who professed much tenderness and regard for his nephew. Thus the Nobility of Scotland were almost wholly divided into two factions (3); the French, at the head which was the Regent, with whom sided almost all the Clergy, and the greatest part of the common people; and the English, of whom the principal person was the Earl of Angus, and to him many of the active nobility were inclined. The former of these factions charged the latter, with having little respect for their King, and still less for their country, promoting their private interest by procuring pensions from King Henry, and implicitly obeying his commands to obtain them. On the other hand, the latter charged the former with being the absolute creatures of a foreign power, enemies without any cause to the English nation, and ready to involve the King, tho' in his minority, in a very unequal as well as unnatural war against his uncle, purely to gratify France. It must be allowed, that the greatest part of both these charges was true, and consequently it must be owned, that there were many selfish Statesmen on both sides, and but very few patriot on either (4). I thought this explanation of the state of affairs in Scotland, at the time of this great man entering upon business, necessary, to give the reader a just notion of his future conduct; for by this the reader sees, that he was brought up in, and brought in by, the French faction, in the service of which he acted from his first setting out, and for which at length he sacrificed his life. The procuring him this rich Abbacy was one of the last acts of the Regent, as it was one of the first of his uncle's after his coming to the See of St Andrew's. The letter written for the King to Pope Adrian VI, is conceived in the strongest terms possible, and therein the highest character is given of Abbot Bethune, who is said to have given such proof of his capacity and probity in the services rendered to the Regent, during the time of his residence in France, and management of affairs there, as made him truly worthy of the King's favour and liberality; and therefore out of respect to the man's merit, the King most earnestly desires his Holiness would yield to his request (5). The Archbishop likewise in his letter presses the matter very warmly, and recommends his nephew very strongly to his Holiness's favour, both in this and in other respects. In the first letter he is styled Prothonotary of the diocese of St Andrew's, and the King's Counsellor and domestick servant; and in the Archbishop's letter, he is called Chancellor of the Church of Glasgow. It seems the Duke-Regent was very desirous of having this young man provided for, as being both his own pupil and the King's favourite, and the person already fixed upon to have the principal management of the affairs of Scotland, at the courts of France and Rome (6), which he looked upon as of much consequence to himself, tho' in reality, it did him little or no service, as he never returned to Scotland afterwards, but continued in France; where he received marks of favour from the King, and the highest proofs of gratitude from our Abbot, who always considered him as his patron, and the author of all his fortunes (7).

secret commission at the French Court, where he continued for some time, and gave his master such intelligence from thence, as enabled him to secure his peace with his uncle, at the same time that he was complimented and caressed in the most extraordinary manner, by the Emperor and the Pope, both violent enemies to King Henry (o) [B]. It was during the time he was thus employed at the French court, that our Abbot laid the foundation of all his greatness, entering so deeply into the good graces of King Francis I, that he granted him many, and those too very singular, favours; from whence it has been conjectured, that he was now admitted into the whole system of the French Politicks, and engaged to keep his master close up to the same plan, which, if true, it is no wonder the French monarch should, by virtue of his prerogative, grant him all the privileges of a native of France, and afterwards confer upon him a bishoprick, favours not frequently bestowed on strangers, and never by so wise a Prince as Francis I, without just cause (p) [C]. To say the truth, these were not so much encouragements as rewards, for

[B] Both violent enemies to King Henry.] The bold step taken by King Henry VIII, in marrying Anne Bullen, alarmed all Europe, particularly the Emperor Charles V, and the Pope (8). They were both great Politicians, and therefore we need not wonder at their both thinking at once of the same expedient for distressing King Henry; which was to excite the King of Scots to take up arms against him, and attack his dominions on one side, while they were preparing several Princes on their side the sea to attack him on the other. It was with this view that the Emperor in 1534 sent Goddefalco Errico, a Sicilian, round by Ireland into Scotland, to renew the antient treaties between the Emperor and King James, to carry him the order of the Golden Fleece, and to offer him his choice of three Ladies for a wife (9), viz. Mary the Emperor's sister, widow of Lewis King of Hungary; Mary, Infanta of Portugal, his niece, by his sister Eleanor; and his other niece, Mary of England, daughter of King Henry VIII, by Queen Catherine the Emperor's sister also. But the real and great design of his negotiation was to press the three following points, viz. To engage King James to espouse the cause of the Emperor against King Henry, to irritate him against those that were called Hereticks, and to engage him to assist in the scheme then on foot, of calling a general council to support the cause of the Pope against the King of England. As this embassy did great honour to the King of Scots, he treated the Ambassador with all the marks of respect possible; and in regard to what he proposed, he testified the utmost esteem for the three Ladies, but more especially for Mary of England; and yet suggested, that the Emperor had another niece, Isabella, daughter to the King of Denmark, more suitable in age and temper to become his consort; at the same time he offered to act as a mediator between the Emperor and the King of England his uncle; assured him of his great zeal for the Catholick religion, and promised to send his Clergy to the general council, in case that council should discover a truly Christian spirit for reforming abuses in the Church (10). In the mean time King Henry VIII, persisting in his resolution of throwing off the yoke of papal tyranny, had caused Dr Fisher, Bishop of Rochester, to be tried, condemned, and put to death, for denying his supremacy (11). This induced Pope Paul III to send to the King of Scotland John Antonio Compeggio. This Legate finding King James at Faulkland, the 22d of February 1535, there with many ceremonies and apostolical benedictions, delivereth him a cap and a sword consecrated the night of the nativity of our Saviour (12), 'which the fame of his valour, and many Christian virtues, had moved his master to remunerate him with. Also (saieth the original), that it might breed a terror in the heart of a wicked neighbouring Prince, against whom the sword was sharpened.' The Pope's letter, which accompanied this present, was conceived in a very submissive stile towards the King, though full of sharp and indecent expressions against his uncle; alledging, that King Henry 'was a despiser, a scornor, one who set at naught the censures of the Church, an Heretick, a Schismatick, a shameful and shameless adulterer, a publick and professed homicide, murderer, a sacriligious person, a Church-robber, a rebel, guilty of lese Majesty divine, outrageous, many and innumerable ways a felon, criminal by all laws, therefore justly to be turned out of his throne; praying the King of Scotland, for the defence of the Church, would undertake something worthy a Christian King, and that he would endeavour to suppress Heresy, and defend the Catholick Faith from those against whom the justice of Almighty God and judgments were now prepared, and ready to be denounced.' The King of Scots entertained this minister very kindly, and gave him very good words, but without promising any thing more than to use his utmost endeavours with his uncle to reconcile himself again to the Church, and in the mean time to use his power to abolish and extinguish Heresy in his own dominions (13). The Abbot of Arbroath, then in France, and in the highest credit with the King, who was a firm friend and steady ally to Henry VIII, took care to advise his master, that this was all artifice, and that the Emperor and the Pope aimed only at making him subservient to their views, and a thorn in the side of his uncle (14). This induced King James to send back the Ambassadors as they came, with much shew of friendship, fair promises, and nothing else. But as he was sensible that King Henry could not fail of hearing of both these embassies, and of doubting their consequences, he immediately, after the departure of the Legate, dispatched Lord Ereskine to London, to give his uncle a fair account of what had passed, and to give him likewise the strongest assurances of his living with him, not only in the most peaceable, but the most friendly manner possible (15). This gave his Majesty such satisfaction; that he immediately sent his nephew the order of the Garter, and also dispatched Lord William Howard as his Ambassador into Scotland, who, finding the King at Stirling, proposed a meeting between him and his uncle at York, promising, that if he would condescend to this, and a few other points there to be mentioned, the King would give him his own daughter Mary, create him Duke of York, and Lord Lieutenant-General of the kingdom. But the Council expressing some dislike to that match, as the Lady Mary was but a child, and the King the last heir male of his family; and at the same time doubting, whether it would be altogether safe for him to proceed so far as York, Lord William Howard took upon him to chide, brow-beat, and even threaten the Lords with his master's displeasure. This rude behaviour proved fatal to both nations; it gave King James an ill opinion of the interview, and Lord William, on his return to London, infused into King Henry such bad impressions of his nephew, as could never afterward be effaced (16).

[C] By so wife a Prince as Francis I, without just cause] The Kings of France, so long as Scotland remained an independent kingdom, affected to live upon very good terms with it's Monarchs, and indeed it was their interest so to do, because it afforded them an opportunity of creating powerful diversions whenever they were attacked by the English. The desire therefore of gaining to his interest a person who was known to have the ear of his master, was very natural to such a Prince as Francis the First, who had great designs, and understood perfectly well how to make a fit choice of such instruments as were necessary to be employed in the execution of them (17). It was with this view that he always caressed Dr Beaton extremely, and perceiving that he was fond of being considered as descended of a French family, he laid hold of that circumstance to bring him over wholly to his interest; and therefore in November, 1537, he made him a grant, by which he was allowed to hold benefices, and acquire lands, as a native of France; in the same year he bestowed upon him the Bishoprick of Mirepoix, a city in the county of Foix in Upper Languedoc, suffragan to the Archbishop of Toulouse (18), a very considerable for the Emperor having invaded France in 1536, King James resolved to go with the flower of his nobility to his assistance, and knowing that this would be attended with much opposition, he kept his design so close a secret, that though he was twice forced back by contrary winds into his own ports, yet he embarked a third time, and arrived safely at Dieppe in Normandy, before his design was suspected either at home or in England (g). He went immediately to visit the Lady Mary of Bourbon, daughter to the Duke de Vendosme, to whom the French writers say he was already contracted. He did not desire that this lady should know him on his first arrival, but it seems she was advised by letters from the Abbot of Arbroath, of the King's intention, and of the means by which he might discover him, as she did at first sight. But it appears his Majesty was not so well pleased with her as she expected, and therefore continued his journey towards the French camp, but was met upon the road by the Dauphin, who conducted him to Paris, where he had all the honours paid him that he could desire, and what he seemed to wish most, the Princess Magdalen, for whom he had sent two embassies in vain, was given to him in person, whom with great pomp he espoused, on the first of January 1537 (r). The Abbot of Arbroath returned with the King and Queen to Scotland, where they landed on the twenty-ninth of May, but before the rejoicings were well over for her arrival, the Court was thrown into the deepest mourning for her death, which happened in the month of July following (s). It was not long after this, that our Abbot, in conjunction with one Maxwell, was sent over again to Paris, to negotiate a second marriage for the King, with the Lady Mary, daughter to the Duke of Guise, and the widow of the Duke de Longueville, in which some time was spent, and it was during his stay at this time in the kingdom of France, that he was consecrated Bishop of Mirepoix, which was to make way for that higher dignity that was perhaps already intended him (t). All things being at length settled, in the month of June 1538, he embarked with the new Queen for Scotland, where after great hazard of being taken by the English, they safely arrived, and, in the month of July, their nuptials were celebrated at St Andrew's (u). Our Bishop had now all the power and authority of the Archbishop, though he was no more in title than Coadjutor of St Andrew's; but this being thought insufficient for the ends which he had undertaken to promote, he was, by Pope Paul III, raised to the dignity of Cardinal, by the title of St Stephen in Monte Caelio, on the twentieth of December 1538 (w) [D].

preferment in every respect, the revenue being no less than 10,000 Livres per ann. which at that time of day was a large sum, and enabled the Bishop to make a great figure (19). Neither was this all, for we find that on the 30th of June, 1539, he had a new grant made him in consideration of services already done, and which he might afterwards do his Majesty, allowing him all the privileges of a native of France, and permitting his heirs to succeed to his estate in France, notwithstanding they might be born and live within the kingdom of Scotland, and this without their having any particular letter or act of naturalization for that purpose. This grant, which was made after he was Cardinal, and which recites the grant formerly made him in 1537, still remains in his family, and there is an authentick copy of it preserved in the Advocate's library at Edinburgh (20). I have mentioned all these favours from the French King in one note, though granted at different times, that we might not be obliged to repeat matters relating to the same subject. There is a tradition in the Cardinal's family, that he obtained all these extraordinary marks of esteem and confidence, in virtue of his personal interest with King Francis I (21); but I conceive that they were bestowed upon him rather from political motives, and, as the grant expresses, for services done, and to be done, for the crown of France; and this I am the rather inclined to believe, because he received none of them 'till after King James's voyage to France, and his marriage with Queen Magdalen, nor indeed 'till after her death, when the French King stood more in need of his services in Scotland. As to his being made Cardinal, which all our Historians attribute also to the interest of the French Monarch, I must confess I doubt of the fact, not that I believe he might not have obtained that King's recommendation had it been necessary; but because I apprehend there were other and more powerful motives which induced the court of Rome to grant him that and other favours, as will be more fully shewn in the succeeding note; wherein I hope I have set the true causes of his being promoted to that dignity in their proper light.

[D] By the title of St Stephen in Monte Caelio, December 20, 1538. It is very strange that none of the authors of the Histories of Scotland should have given themselves the trouble, to enquire into the causes of our Prelate's being raised to the rank of a Cardinal, which was certainly a thing extraordinary enough to merit their attention, since, as far as I could ever learn, they had of their nation but one Cardinal before (22). I the rather wonder at this, and at the ascribing his promotion to the influence of the King of France, because I think it may be easily proved that the crown of Scotland had at that time credit enough at Rome to procure him this promotion. There was nothing the Pope so much aimed at, as attaching the Clergy both of England and Scotland strictly to himself, and it was this that put him but a very little before upon making Dr Fisher, Bishop of Rochester, a Cardinal. When England was lost, there was the more need to take care of Scotland, where the old Archbishop of St Andrew's, of whom we spoke in the former article, was equally unfit and uninclined to undertake such a persecution of Hereticks as the Pope desired; and as for the Archbishop of Glasgow, he was still less inclined to such warm measures than the Primate. It was necessary therefore to give the Popish Church of Scotland another head, and this could be no way done but by raising one of their Clergy to the rank of a Cardinal, and for this there was none so fit as our Prelate. He was then Coadjutor of St Andrew's, and from his capacity alone had acquired the entire management of the affairs of the Church; was of all the Clergy the best known to the court of Rome, and most trusted by it. Besides all this, he had the entire confidence of the King his master, and therefore was of all others the fittest for this dignity. But if it should be objected, that these are conjectures only, I shall desire the reader to consider the following passage from a letter of the Cardinal to Mr Andrew Oliphant, his Agent to the court of Rome, which will put the matter out of question, by shewing that he owed his promotion solely to the circumstances of affairs, and to the necessity the Pope was under of managing the King his master (23).

'We have received an instrument of possession of our title, sub Stephano in Caelio monte, and we likewise have received our Bull of provision thereto, sent to us lately by Mr James Salmund, and have received all other letters and missives ye make mention of in your said letters. As to the matter of Legation we desire, and that the King's grace desires to be granted to us, we understand perfectly your diligence with the Pope's Holiness, and the Cardinal of Chincis in that behalf; and how come of our own countrymen

In the February following, Queen Mary was solemnly crowned, with great splendor and magnificence, in the abbey church of Holy-Rood-House. It was not long after this, the Cardinal ran a great hazard of being turned out of his master's favour; for his uncle King Henry VIII, having good intelligence of the design upon which he was made Cardinal, sent about this time a very able Minister of his to King James, with particular instructions to procure the Cardinal's disgrace, in order to which that King had contrived a very deep and subtle scheme, which however had not the success that he expected (*) [E]. men have done, and do, that they may by their private informations and persuasions for their own particular weal and money, that they get in these parts by particular commissions, in conduccionibus et locationibus in emphyteosin, and not having any regard to the common weal of the King's grace, his realm and subjects, to stop and make impediments that the said Legation be not granted to us. And therefore in this matter, touching the said Legation, ye shall have yourself secret from all Scotsmen, and labour therein, 'till by yourself and others our friends, viz. by the Cardinal of Chincis, to whom the King's grace and we write presently, in that behalf of the which ye shall receive the copy cum presentibus; and also have written to Monsieur Lynoges Langtab, Ambassador there presently, for the King of France, and likewise to Latinus de Juvenalibus, our good friends, to do for the King's grace effectuous desire in this matter to have the said Legation granted to us. And we assure you the King's grace has this matter right high in head and mind, for the common weal of his realm and subjects. And this, considering the great parts, he keeps to the siege apostolick and obedience thereof, and maintenance of the Faith Catholick in this his realm, now in this most perilous time, that his Grace should not be denied of his just and reasonable desires, which tend all utterly to the auctorization of the holy siege apostolick, and obedience of the Pope's Holiness, as head of the Kirk Catholick. And hereafter with the first ships his Grace will write of new to the Pope's Holiness hereupon, that it may be understood perfectly, that this Legation is desired by his Grace specially, and not principally, by us; therefore do diligently herein, as we doubt not but ye will, as ye have begun, and write resolutely to us hereupon in your first writings.

Upon this letter we shall make but a very few observations. It appears to be entirely of a private nature, and therefore is the best authority with regard to the temper and sentiments of the man; and from hence it very clearly appears, that tho' he thought he might claim the assistance of the French King's minister at Rome as a friend, yet it was not upon that, but chiefly upon the state of affairs in Scotland, his own services, and the King's influence, that he relied. It is to be observed, that the point he labours about the Legation in this letter, was no more than this, that he might have a special faculty for the execution of that office as Archbishop Forman had, and not trust barely to the Legantine authority annexed to the See of St Andrew's. It seems the court of Rome was a little stiff in this point, and did not come into it so readily as the Cardinal expected, which obliged him to write in the manner he did to his Agent, and the reason of this stiffness may very easily be guessed at. The Pope was liberal of his favours while he was only Coadjutor of St Andrew's, because he thought them necessary to give him weight in Scotland, and to enable him to do the business of the Papacy; but now he was become Archbishop, Primate, and Legatus natus, he thought he had power enough, and what the Cardinal aims at in his letter, is to shew that this was a mistake, and that the additional power he wanted did not arise from his own ambition, but was really requisite to enable him to do what the Pope expected from him; and that this was the opinion of the Clergy in Scotland, and the desire of the King himself. He therefore instructs his Agent to insist upon the granting him this faculty, as a thing not of grace but of right, as it was for the good of the Church, and no more than one of his predecessors had obtained, and obtained upon the same reasons from which he expected it should be granted to him. Besides this letter, we have another express authority to prove that he obtained his promotion to the rank of Cardinal not by the mediation of the King of France, but from the immediate good will and pleasure of Paul III, which is that of Bishop Lesley (24), whose authority is good as an Historian, but is more particularly of weight in this case, because he had a better opportunity of knowing things of this nature, as being intimately acquainted with the politics of the court of Rome, as well as with the state of affairs in Scotland at that time. This point I have taken so much pains about, sets the character of our Prelate in it's true and proper light, and shews him to have been a man of such parts and penetration, as to have raised himself to the highest dignities, of which his profession was capable, not by the little arts of fawning and flattering; which it does not appear he ever used, but by his doing such real services as commanded those rewards he received, and which therefore he regarded not in the light of favours bestowed, but of preferments acquired by his merit and abilities. How far this was right, or how strong evidences these may be of the haughtiness of his spirit, and of that boundless ambition with which many writers charge him, must be left with the reader to determine; all I aim at is, to shew him as he was, and to draw his character neither better nor worse than as facts direct. There are men rise by little arts, by low submissions, and by a dirty kind of cunning; and there are others who arrive at the highest preferment by a more direct road, which is always the mark of a superior genius; and of this kind that age produce various instances, such as Cardinal Wolfey, and his successor Thomas Lord Cromwell, men as proud and as ambitious as our Cardinal, and men, who, like him, forced their passages to the highest pitch of grandeur, by the services they rendered to those from whom their honours were received.

[E] Which however had not the success he expected.] By the publication of Sir Ralph Sadler's original Instructions and Letters, we are let entirely into the secret of this negotiation, the main point of which was to procure the Cardinal's disgrace. In order to this King Henry, in his instructions, directs his Minister to represent to King James V, that the Cardinal held a correspondence with traitors, was endeavouring to render himself in a manner independent of his master, by the powers he laboured to procure from Rome, and was entirely devoted to that See; in proof of which he was to produce a letter of the Cardinal's (cited in the former note), which if King James was much moved on the reading, he was to deliver, otherwise he was to pretend he had no commission to part with it. How well this was executed, appears clearly from Sir Ralph's own account of the matter, which is so full, and so fully shews the temper of both these Kings, and the true nature of this transaction, that though it is of some length, and penned in the rough stile of those times, I am persuaded the reader will be glad to see it. We find it in a letter addressed to the King his master by Sir Ralph, which appears to have been written in the month of February, 1540, and the passage (25) runs thus:

The first thing, quoth I, that I have to declare unto your Grace, my Sovereign Lord and Master the King's Majesty your uncle, requirith you to keep it secret, unless ye shall determine and promise to proceed thereupon, to the punishment of those persons which shall be detected according to your Laws; and if your Grace shall so determine when ye have heard the matter, then the King's Majesty, your uncle, is content to leave the opening thereof to your arbitry; but otherwise, his Majesty would be loath to seem author of any such thing, if your Grace should not weigh it, and take it in heart, as he doth; for be ye assured, quoth I, whatsoever toucheth your Grace, or your honour, his Majesty weigheth it as his own. Here he seemed to be very desirous to know the matter, and said, I pray you what is it! for I assure you, whatsoever he be that doth offend us, or our Lawes, he shall well know that we stand not in awe to see him punished. Sir, quoth I, this is the matter: It fortuneth late, that a subject of your's, being servant as is reported to your Cardinal here, months after, the old Archbishop dying, the Cardinal succeeded in the Primacy, whereby he was, by the rage and tempest of the sea, driven a-land in the north parts of England, and very like to have been drowned. Yea, quoth he, that was Brunstoun, he is now newly come home. Yes, Sir, quoth I, the King's Majesty my master had advertised you of the matter afore this time, but he respited the same until the return of the man, because your Grace should both be sure of the parties, and be advertised of the matter all at once. This Brunstoun, quoth I, when he was thus on land, by chance left certain private letters and copies behind him. No, quoth he, the letters were taken from him by the King mine uncle's officers. Indeed, Sir, quoth I, the letters were found by the King my Master's officers, and sent up to his Majesty. Well, quoth he, it is no force. Now and it please your Highness, as I passed by Bamburg, I met with John Horsley, Captain of the same, who, in communication, told me, that he had taken a packet of letters from certain Scottish men which were driven a-land there by tempest, and named the said Brunstoun to be one of them; and therefore knowing the same by that means, when the King of Scots told me that the said letters were taken away from the said Brunstoun, I would not wade too far in the defence thereof, but thought to pass it over, and proceed to the matter as I did, and so said unto his Grace, that when the letters came unto your Majesty's hands, and that your Grace had perused them, there appeared such strange matter in them, that your Majesty could no otherwise think, but that God had sent them to your hands for the surety and commodity of his Grace; for, quoth I, it appeared unto the King's Majesty your uncle, by a letter subscribed with your Cardinal's own hand here, that under colour to serve your Grace, being his Sovereign Lord, he laboureth to bring into his own hands, not only the whole spiritual jurisdiction of your realm, but under colour of it also the temporal, taking for cloak the Bishop of Rome's usurped power, which may serve him for a sword, if he be suffered to enjoy the same: So that the just power and authority given you by God, as to a King, should thereby in few years be little or nothing at all. And, Sir, for a plain declaration of his intent herein, he shewed himself to be a friend and fautor of your Grace's traitors, devising how to compass himself by a crafty mean, under the colour of the Bishop of Rome's power, to be their judge, to the intent he might deliver them. Which traitors I pray you, quoth he. Marry, Sir, quoth I, as I conceive by the Cardinal's said letters your Grace committed to ward one Hutchenfon and one Harvy for their treasons and offences committed against your Grace, and to these your Cardinal, seemeth to be a great friend; and as it shall evidently appear to your Grace by his letter, he deviseth to make himself their judge, to the intent he would deliver them, and all for that he would seem to be a good workman for his chief Captain the Bishop of Rome, for whose service he is only meet, which meaneth nothing else than to usurp Princes powers, and to diminish the same. And, quoth I, as this matter may declare unto you, the crafty dealing of those Prelates, so by opening thereof your Grace may well perceive that the King's Majesty your uncle doth both love and trust you, and wisheth to God that your Grace knew as well as he doth, to what ruin those Prelates do labour to bring the state of Kings, that they may be rulers of all, and keep Princes in their own realms, as their Ministers and Deputies; or else by most detestible and impudent boldness vindicate the deposing of them, and making of new at their pleasure. In the declaration hereof I observed well his countenance, and perceived that he gave me an attentive ear, and somehow looked very steadily on me, and with grave countenance; somehow he bit the lip, and bowed his head. And when I had said, and waited what he would say, he answered these words: By my truth, quoth he, there are two laws, the Spiritual Law and the Temporal. The cure of the one pertaineth to the Pope's Holiness, and the spirituality; the other to Kings, Princes, and the Temporality; and, for my part, I trust I shall do my duty to God in the discharge of such things as pertain to the Temporal power within my office and rule within in this realm. But as for the Spiritual Law, in good faith we take no regard thereof, but commit that to the Pope's Holiness, and other ordinary Ministers of the Kirk within our realm. Sir, quoth I, it may please your Grace to consider, that God hath called you to be a King, and hath not only committed unto your charge, to see his Laws executed within your office and realm, as supreme head thereof, but also hath put the sword into your hands for the punishment and reformation of the transgressions of the same. And thinks your Grace, that if the Ministers of the Spiritual Laws within your realm, for that they know your Grace taketh no regard thereof, shall not do their duty, so that your people in their default shall perish for lack of justice, and run headlong in blindness and ignorance of God's word, for lack of doctrine and true preaching of the same, by your Prelates and Clergy of your realm, think you, quoth I, in that case, if your Grace do not your Kingly office to redress the same, and appoint every man to serve in his vocation, that ye shall not yield a just reckoning thereof unto God. Marry, quoth he, I trust God shall give me Grace to do my duty to him; and whatsoever he be in Scotland, that we may know doth not his duty both in the execution of God's Laws above all, and also in the ministrations of indifferent justice to our Lieges: By God, quoth he, if we may know him, we shall not let to punish him, be he Spiritual or Temporal, in such ways as appertains, and that (ye shall throw me) they know all full well. But by my truth, quoth he, I thank God Scotland was never in better love and obedience to no King of the same than they are unto me; and, I dare say, that there is no man in Scotland, either high nor low, but will do willingly and gladly whatsoever is my will and commandment. For, quoth he, they do both love and dread me. And for this matter which the King mine uncle hath advertised me of, touching this Cardinal, ye shall well know, that if he hath, or shall in any ways offend our Laws, we shall not stand awe of any man to punish him as he merits. But, quoth he, I know not but that he wrote to Rome to his Agent there for the procuring of a Legation, which, in good faith, should be a benefit to our subjects, and we also did write to the Pope's Holiness in the same. Sir, quoth I, the King's Majesty my Master hath sent with me the original letter of the said Cardinal, to the intent I should read the same to your Grace, whereby you shall perceive all his crafty pretence; and, quoth I, if your Grace will see the letter, I have it here ready, and will myself read it unto you. No, quoth he, keep the letter still, we will take another time for it; and that he spake to me very softly, which I think he did because the Cardinal was present in the chamber. And again he said, Let this matter pass at this time, we shall talk more of it at our next meeting. — The Ambassador took care to put King James in mind of his promise, and to give King Henry an account of what passed at it, which he does thus (26).

Quoth I, your Grace may well perceive by the advertisements that he hath now sent you by me, and also by his friendly advices and counsels, that his Grace doth both love and trust you. By my soul, quoth he, I have advised me of the matter his Grace has advertised me of by you at this time touching the Cardinal here; and, quoth he, I can find no default in him, for when his letters were taken and holden in England, we heard of it, and asked him thereof; and by God, quoth he, he had the doubles and copies of them, and shewed them all to us, and we remember not that any thing was amiss in them. Sir, quoth I, did your Grace see the double of a letter wrote to his Clerk and Agent at Rome. Yea marry, quoth he, to one, that is all his doer there. Well, Sir, quoth I, if your Grace do see the very original, then shall ye perceive if the double and it agree. Quoth he, Have ye the original here upon you? Yea, quoth I, that I have. Take it out privately, quoth he, as though it were some other paper, and let me see it. (The Cardinal was in the chamber, and therefore think I he bad me take it out secretly.) I took it forth of my bosom, and he took it, and read it softly every word, from the beginning to the end; and in one place of the letter, the Cardinal biddest his Agent sollicit, that nothing be done that might in any

he was investted with as great or greater power, than ever any churchman had enjoyed in that kingdom. And it was very soon after his promotion to the archbishopsrick, he discovered himself of a most warm and persecuting temper (y). For to stop the progress of those who opposed the established religion, he brought a great confluence of quality, both clergy and laity, to St Andrew's, and there in the cathedral he made a speech, to acquaint them with the increase of Heresy, how the Catholick faith was insulted, that Heterodoxy was openly maintained, and too much encouraged within the Court particularly, he mentioned one Sir John Borthwick, who had been cited to St Andrew's, for dispersing heretical books; and holding several opinions contrary to the doctrine of the Roman Church (z) [F]. Sir John Borthwick appearing neither in person nor by proxy, the charge was taken for confessed, upon which he was declared a Heretick, his goods confiscated, burnt in effigie,

' any wise irritate the King's Grace and his Council against the liberties of the Holy Kirk, considering the time is perilous. When the King did read these words, By God, quoth he, they dread me. Sir, quoth I, they know their own abuses, and they fear least your Grace should find them. By my truth, quoth he, if they do not well, ye shall ken that I will redress them. When he had read the whole letter, he took it me again. And, quoth he, In good faith I have seen the double of it word by word: But I have good cause to thank the King mine uncle, for I see well, quoth he, if his Grace should see any thing that should be to my displeasure or dishonour, he would advertise me of it; and by God, quoth he, I shall do sicklike to him. Sir, quoth I, doth not your Grace perceive by this letter the crafty pretences of the Cardinal. Why, quoth he, wherlein? Marry, quoth I, he sheweth himself to be a great friend to your rebels and traitors, and deviseth to be their judge because he would deliver them; and so your Grace may easily see how he laboureth to bring into his own hands both the spiritual, and also the temporal jurisdiction of your realm. No, no, quoth he, I warrant you we shall use him and all his fellows well enough; if they do not their duties, I may tell you, quoth he, they may dread me. And as for those men, Hutcbenson and Harvy, which ye name traitors to us, in good faith, quoth he, they are but simple men, and it was but a small matter and we ourself made the Cardinal the Minister both to commit them to the castle, and also to deliver them. Sir, quoth I, the matter is as ye please to take it; but it seemed so strange to the King's Majesty your uncle, and in such wise to touch your honour and surety, that he could not but advertise your Grace thereof. And if your Grace, quoth I, think ye may justly take any advantage thereof, ye may at your pleasure; if not, the King's Majesty prayeth you to compress it, and keep it secret to yourself. Yes, quoth he, I warrant you his Grace shall bear no more of the same. I assure your Majesty he excused the Cardinal in every thing, and seemed wonderous loath to hear of any thing that should sound as an untruth in him, but rather gave him great praise.'

[F] Contrary to the doctrines of the Roman Church.] He was no sooner become Archbishop of St Andrew's, and Primate, than he resolved to give the strongest proof of his attachment to the religion and interests of Rome, and therefore in May 1540, he went to St Andrew's in that pomp and splendor as certainly no Primate of Scotland ever used before. He was attended by the Earls of Huntley, Arran, Marshal, and Montrose; the Lords Fleming, Lindsey, Erskine, and Seaton, with many other persons of distinction that were laymen; and he had also with him Gawen, Archbishop of Glasgow and Lord High-Chancellor, with five other Bishops, four Abbots, and a vast train of Clergy beside. In the presence of these witnesses he held, in wonderful state and grandeur, a kind of visitation or enquiry after Hereticks, in which this Sir John Borthwick was condemned for Contumacy on the 28th of May, 1540, and his effigies was publickly burnt the same day in the market-place of St Andrew's, and a week after at Edinburgh (27). This proceeding of the Cardinal's did not very well answer his purpose, and therefore he had soon after recourse to another method, which was to engage the King to issue a commission for enquiring after Hereticks, and to place at the head of it Sir James Hamilton, bastard-brother to the Earl of Arran, a man of a barbarous and bloody temper, whom the King 'till this time had always hated (28) for many reasons, but more particularly for his having killed the Earl of Lenox, when he had taken arms by the King's express direction to rescue him out of the hands of the Earl of Angus, as the reader has seen in the former article. The great point the King is said to have had in view by setting up this terrible court was, the obtaining large sums of money by the conviction of such as were discovered to be favourers of the new opinions, that is, of the doctrines of the Reformation. The truth seems to be, that the King was very desirous to increase his revenue, that he might be able to defend himself in case of being attacked, and to make a greater figure in Europe than any of his predecessors (26). To enable him to do this, there had been two schemes proposed to him, one by his uncle Henry the Eighth, and the favourers of the Reformation, which was by suppressing monasteries, and seizing the estates of the Clergy. The other by the Clergy themselves, to defeat this project of their enemies, and to engratiate themselves with the King; to which end they were for establishing this dangerous court of Inquisition, and of this it seems the King made choice, as being more agreeable to his sentiments than the other. We are informed by a very good author, that the Clergy persuaded the King he might by this means add to his income one hundred thousand crowns of annual rent, by annexing the lands of Hereticks convict to those of the Crown; but in case this scheme of theirs failed, the Clergy offered to grant him fifty thousand crowns per ann. out of their own estates for the present, and more if his necessities so required (30). It was upon this occasion that the famous roll was made, which is mentioned in the text, containing the names of such as were suspected and might be profecuted, in order to fix the King in a belief of the mighty advantages that were promised him from the execution of this barbarous design. That such a roll there really was, and that the Earl of Arran was the first named therein, is best proved by the Earl's own testimony, who told this to Sir Ralph Sadler (31), but that it was found in the King's pocket after his decease is a little improbable, considering that the Cardinal is on all hands allowed to have been with his Majesty at the time he died, and who one would think should have secured this roll for his own sake. But be this as it will, most certainly the scheme came to nothing, for Sir James Hamilton, while busy in persecuting others for Heresy, was himself accused, convicted, and soon afterwards executed for high-treason; and with him ended all endeavours to bring this project of the Clergy to bear, the King himself growing out of humour with it, and expressing upon many occasions a strong sense of the severity and baseness of such proceedings (32). Yet the Cardinal always found means to shift such things from himself, and to keep as much in the King's favour as ever, in order to which he scrupled not doing any thing that might flatter the King's humour and gratify his desires, though in doing this he acted so cautiously, that he seemed to be rather obliged to do what he did from a principle of duty to his Prince, than to carry into execution any of his own advices (33). But notwithstanding all his arts, many of the Nobility who began to fear the King, and consequently to hate him, looked upon the Cardinal as the great author of all these mischiefs, and probably would have made him feel the weight of their resentment, if he had not had so much address as to keep a strong party of the Nobility attached to himself; so that even after the King's death, by which he seemed to be exposed to all his enemies, he made it clearly appear, that he had a superior interest, and was able to do more with all ranks of people than any other person in Scotland, as the reader will see in it's proper place.

effigie, and all persons prohibited to entertain or relieve him, under the penalty of excommunication. Being informed of these proceedings against him, he retired into England, where he was well received by King Henry, and honoured with a publick character to the Protestant Princes in Germany. But Sir John Borthwick, was not the only person the Cardinal proceeded against for Heresy, for quickly after this he prosecuted several others, some of them persons of quality, for what he called the same crime, as Andrew Cunningham, son to the master of Glencairn, James Hamilton of Livingston, and Mr George Buchanan the celebrated Poet and Historian; and they would all of them have certainly died, if they had not made their escape out of prison; for the King having absolutely left all men to the mercy of the Cardinal, one knows not what lengths he might have gone, if Providence had not prevented the execution of his bloody designs, by the death of the King, since it is said, he had presented to him a roll of three hundred and sixty of the chief Nobility and Barons, as suspected of Heresy. In which black roll the first man was the Earl of Arran, and though several attempts were made to bring the Cardinal into disgrace, or at least to deprive him of his large and unlimited power, yet they were all unsuccessful, for no mark or evidence appears, that the King did ever lessen his affection to him to the hour of his death (a). On the contrary, it was by his influence that the King directed his troops to invade England, whereupon followed the dismal overthrow of the army at Solway Moss, which broke his heart, and occasioned his death (b). But then it must be allowed, that the Cardinal acted so artfully, that though the general course of his conduct manifested sufficiently his intentions, yet he hardly left it in the power of any of his adversaries, to make any thing out against him by proofs or particular facts (c) [G]. The King had none so near him when he died as the Cardinal, which gave him an opportunity of forging a will for him, or at least afforded a pretence for suggesting that he forged it, which occasioned it's being set aside, though he caused it to be solemnly proclaimed over the cross at Edinburgh, in order to establish the Regency in himself, the Earls of Argyl, Huntley, and Arran (d); and besides losing his design, the imputation has remained upon his memory, though perhaps there is no sufficient authority to prove it [H]. By this means he was entirely excluded from the government, and

[G] Make out any thing against him by proofs of particular facts. It was a maxim with this great Politician, from which he never digressed, to run no needless hazards, and to decline none when they became necessary. It was his constant adhering to that rule which preserved him from suffering, as he otherwise would have done, in the various revolutions which he lived to see in the government of Scotland. It was report only that fastened upon him the business of the roll, mentioned in the former note, for the Earl of Arran, then Governor of Scotland, told the English Ambassador Sadler, that it was the King himself, not the Cardinal, who procured that roll to be written (34). In like manner the common opinion was, that the Cardinal persuaded the King his master not to go to the meeting at York, which occasioned a great difference between him and King Henry. But when Sir Ralph Sadler was sent a second time into Scotland, the Cardinal sent a message to him, assuring him, that this fact was false; that he was able to prove it so; that he had always had as just a sense of the great advantages that would result to both kingdoms, from the preserving peace and friendship between them, as any man in Scotland, and had been as far from seeking to destroy them; and that, if he had an opportunity of paying his respects to King Henry, he did not doubt being able to satisfy his Majesty in that respect (35). It is certain, that throughout the whole reign of the King his master, though his enemies at home and abroad were continually labouring to bring him into disgrace, and in order thereto suggested many things against him, yet they were able to prove none (36). As for the capital imputation, that he meant to establish the Pope's power over the Clergy, and to exercise it in Scotland himself, independent of the King, it never could make any impression, because his Master very well knew that it was by his own interest and interposition, that the Cardinal had obtained the power which he possessed, and that the great point he laboured with the Clergy, was to persuade them it was better to grant a part of their revenues to the Crown for it's protection and support, than to rely on the sole authority of the Church (37). It was likewise imputed to the Cardinal, that he gave the King a distaste to his antient nobility, advised him to lessen their power, and to cut off the most potent; but whoever considers the great interest he had with the best families in Scotland in the life-time of that King, the steadiness with which they adhered to him through all his troubles after the death of that Monarch, and his influence upon them to the very time of his own death, must be satisfied that they did not apprehend this charge to be well founded, or at least that it could be proved, for if they had, no doubt they would have exerted themselves to his destruction when they had him in their power, and not have laboured as they did to restore him not only to his liberty, but also to his former, and even greater, authority (38). But it is time to part with this subject at present, the rather, because in the subsequent notes we shall be able to set this point in a still clearer light; from whence it will appear, that how often or how loudly so ever he was accused, yet he was never proved guilty of any thing laid to his charge. We except only his severity against the favourers of the Reformation, which, as it cannot be denied, so it ought not to be excused; but in other parts of his life he seems to have acted with very singular address, and in that, as well as other parts of his character, very nearly resembled Cardinal Wolsey, made use of the same precautions, and with the same effect, that is to say, both defended themselves from being in danger of capital punishments by legal prosecutions (39). In this indeed Cardinal Beaton seems to have had the better, that even his greatest enemies never thought it in their power to procure any sentence against him by a parliament; but whether this might not be owing rather to his influence over his judges than to his innocence, may very well be made a question (40). In his life-time, however, this circumstance made wise and thinking men wonder much, as appears from what Sir Ralph Sadler tells his master King Henry VIII, at the time the Cardinal was in prison, and the cry strongest against him, that he could never learn from his bitterest enemies what it was they had against him (41). So much it is in the power of a great man to guard against conviction, though he cannot avoid clamour.

[H] Though perhaps there is not sufficient evidence to prove it. This is one great crime with which the memory of the Cardinal is stained, but it so falls out, that we have no very clear testimony to prove that he was really guilty of forging the King's will. The author, upon whose authority this has been chiefly believed, delivers himself thus (42). 'As for the Cardinal, he thinking that in these publick calamities he might have an opportunity to aggrandize, that he might shew himself somebody, both to his own order, and also to the French faction, attempted a thing both bold and impudent. For, by the hired assistance of Henry Balfour, a mercenary Priest, he forged a false will of the King's, wherein he himself and before the close of the year 1542, the Earl of Arran was declared sole Regent during the minority of Queen Mary, then but a few days old. This was done chiefly by the Lords inclined to the English interest, who being desirous also of complying with a proposal made by Henry VIII, for the marriage of the Prince of Wales to their young Queen, judged it necessary, before this came to be discussed in Parliament, to procure the Cardinal * was nominated to the supreme authority with three of the most potent of the Nobility to be his assessors. He was in great hopes that his project would succeed from the dispossession of the Earl of Arran, one of his assessors and partners in the government, who was not turbulent, but rather inclinable to be easy and quiet. And besides, he was near of kin to him, for he was son to the Cardinal's aunt. Moreover, the opportunity to invade the supreme power seemed to require haste, that he might be possessed of it before the exiles and captives returned out of England, that so they might have no hand in conferring this honour upon him, for he was afraid of their power and popularity. Neither did he doubt their minds were alienated from him upon the score of a different religion. This was the cause, that presently after the King's death he published an edict concerning the choosing four governors of the kingdom.* He then proceeds to give us an account of King Henry's sending back the Scots prisoners, and of the recalling the exiles, and then he resumes his former subject thus. The Cardinal who saw this storm gathered against him, making no doubt but the prisoners and the exiles would be both his opposers in the Parliament, had taken care to be chosen Regent before their coming, but he enjoyed that honour not long, for within a few days his fraud in counterfeiting the King's will and testament being discovered, he was thrown out of place, and James Hamilton, Earl of Arran, made Regent, through a desire which some had to ingratiate themselves with him as the next heir to the crown. Others foresaw so long before the cruelty of the Cardinal in matters of religion, and therefore provided against it by lessening his power.* There is a very different account in this matter in a book of good authority, generally ascribed to John Knox, and part certainly written by him, where, speaking of the King's last sickness, he writes thus (43). 'In the mean time, in his great extremity, comes the Cardinal (a fit comforter for a desperate man). He cries in his ear, Take order, Sir, with your realm who shall rule during the minority of your daughter. Ye have known my service, what will ye have done? Shall there not be four Regents chosen? and shall not I be principal of them? Whatever the King answered, documents were taken that so it should be, as my Lord Cardinal thought expedient. As many affirm a dead man's hand was made to subscribe one blank, that they might write above what it pleased them best. The Cardinal having hired one Henry Balfour, a Priest, to make a false testament, which was done accordingly, but in vain. This finished, the Cardinal posted to the Queen, lately before delivered as is said.' Bishop Lesley says nothing more than that the Cardinal opposed the setting up the Earl of Arran as sole Regent, because the King by his testament had appointed four (44). We have seen that Buchanan says also there were four, of whom he names only the Cardinal, and the Earl of Arran; in Knox's history, mention is made of the Earls of Huntley, Argyll, and Murray (45). And Archbishop Spotwood agrees with this, though he quotes Buchanan, who says no such thing (46). Most certain it is, that the common reports charge not only the forging the King's will, but the King's death upon the Cardinal. We find it in the margin of Knox's history, that some did not stick to say the King was hastened away by a potion (47), which is however inconsistent with that history, wherein it is more than once said, that the King foretold his own death, Drummond mentions this as a groundless rumour (48), but Melvil is clear that the fact was true, viz. that the King was poisoned by the Clergy (49). Sir James Balfour is as clear, that there was nothing of poison in the case, but that the King died of a Lent fever (50). Of this therefore we may fairly acquit the Cardinal, especially since neither Buchanan nor Knox so much as suggest that he was guilty. As for the Forgery of the will there is assertion, but no proof; and upon comparing the several accounts, I hope to be able to give a more satisfactory relation of this affair than we find in any of our modern Historians, though they would be thought to have taken great pains in following the matter (51). After the encounter at Sollway Moss, in which a great body of Scots suffered themselves to be defeated and made prisoners by a handful of English, because they had a person appointed to command them whom they did not like: King James the Fifth died of meer vexation for what had happened at Falkland in the county of Fife, which lies twelve miles west from St Andrew's, and about ten from the river of Frith, on the 13th of December 1542 (52). He was during the time of his sickness attended by the Cardinal, who, when he found him so near his end, desired to know how he would have the affairs of the kingdom settled, and caused his answers to be set down and subscribed a few moments before he fell into the agonies of death (53). On the 14th the Cardinal brought over the King's body to Edinburgh, and with the Earls of Argyll, Marjhal, Rothes, and Arran, assisted at his funeral. On the Monday following the Cardinal caused himself and the other Lords to be proclaimed Governors, of whom, without doubt, the Earl of Arran was one (54). But Mr Kirkaldy of Grange advised the Earl of Arran to call an assembly of the Nobility, and therein to demand his right of being Governor alone, as he was next heir, if the young Queen died, to the crown, which accordingly he did; and though this was most vehemently opposed by the Cardinal and his friends, it was carried notwithstanding, and the Earl of Arran thereupon declared sole Regent (55). But so little notion was there then amongst those who were well acquainted with the thing, that the Cardinal had forged the King's will, that it was amicably resolved that he and the other Lords should have free pardons granted them by the Governor for what they had done, which agreement was made December 25, 1542 (56). In the month of March following came Sir Ralph Sadler, and found the Cardinal a prisoner, and the Governor at least in appearance, bent upon his destruction. But notwithstanding this, he some time afterwards granted him more liberty, though he did not care to own that, but pretended that it was done against his will, and therefore he enquired the English Ambassador Sadler's opinion, what he should do with the Cardinal if he came to Edinburgh; and in the conversation upon this subject, which we have in Sadler's letters, there is an account of this matter, which, from what has been said before, may be very easily understood, and sets the whole in a very clear light (57). 'My Lord, quoth I, I am not able to give you advice; but if it may please you to tell me what ye have to charge him withal, and for what cause he was apprehended, I will tell you, quoth I, mine opinion. Marry, quoth he, the principal matter whereupon he was taken, was upon knowledge that we had by a letter from my Lord Warden, my Lord Lytle, quoth he, that the Cardinal had procured the Duke of Guise to come hither with an army to subdue this realm, and take the government of the same, whereof now, quoth he, we have no proofs; nor we perceive not, quoth he, that the same was true; nevertheless, quoth he, we have other matters to charge him with, for he did forge, quoth he, the late King's testament; and when the King was even almost dead, quoth he, took his hand in his, and so caused him to subscribe a blank paper; and besides that, quoth he, since he was prisoner, he has given special and secret command to his men to keep his hold and castle of St Andrew's against us, which, quoth he, is a plain disobedience and rebellion. I engrrieved these crimes as much as I could, and told him that I heard say he had forgiven and pardoned the Cardinal of that crime in forging of the King's testament, as indeed, communing yesterday with the Lord Summerville in that matter, he told me it was so; nevertheless the Governor assured me, that he never gave the Cardinal remission for the same.'

Cardinal to be seized, and sent prisoner to the castle of Blackness, after which they conducted all things at their pleasure, and settled publick affairs as they thought fit (e). But this did not last long, for the Cardinal, though confined, raised so strong a party, that the Regent scarce knew how to proceed; and, which was still more extraordinary, had gained so many of those about him, that the Regent began to dislike his former system, and at last deserting it, released, and was reconciled to the Cardinal (f) [I]. This was undoubtedly

The dates, and even the facts, in this part of the history are so perplexed and differently told, that there cannot be a more difficult task than to endeavour to set them in a plain light. In the text we have shewn, that the Governor was persuaded by the partizans of King Henry, whom the Scottish writers call, the English Lords, to seize upon the Cardinal, and send him prisoner to Blackness, on the south side of the river Forth, ten miles from Leith, in the custody of the Lord Seaton, where he continued during the time the Parliament was held, and the treaty with England for the marriage of Edward, Prince of Wales, and Mary, Queen of Scots, was concluded (58). The Queen Dowager however, and many of the Nobility, shewed great concern for him, and laboured all they could to prevail upon the Governor to set him at liberty. In the mean time, the Cardinal took better methods himself, for he offered the Lord Seaton a considerable gratification, and his constant friendship, if he would transfer him to St Andrew's, which before the end of the month of March 1543, he did with the consent of the Governor; notwithstanding the English Ambassador had laboured to have the Cardinal sent into England (59). At St Andrew's he was at full liberty, and actually called there an assembly of the Clergy, which met upon the 25th of May, and was adjourned to the first of June, for which he had the Governor's permission, though the latter pretended he had not. In this assembly of the Clergy, the Cardinal shewed them, that nothing could preserve the Church as it was then constituted, but their raising a sum of money sufficient to defeat the intended match with England, which in consequence of his arguments, he obtained (60). When this was done, the Earls of Huntley, Argyll, Bothwell, and Murray, raised a force sufficient, and coming down to Linlithgow, carried off the two Queens to Sterling, and endeavoured to prevent the meeting of the Parliament, which the Governor had summoned for the 25th of August, which however they could not do; but the Governor, and such as were of his party actually met, and ratified the two treaties of peace and marriage with the crown of England, under the Great Seal (61). But the very day after he had done this, the Governor set out for St Andrew's, pretending that he would force the Cardinal to a submission, or push all things against him farther than ever; and accordingly upon his coming to St Andrew's, and the Cardinal not coming out of his castle to meet him, he caused him to be proclaimed a rebel openly in his town of St Andrew's; which had such an effect upon Sir Ralph Sadler, that he really expected that a civil war would have broke out, and therefore wrote very earnestly into England, to procure assistance for the Governor (62). In a very few days, however, it appeared very clearly that all this was a mere contrivance, for upon the third of September, the Governor having received a message from the Cardinal, by Sir James Campbell of Lundy and the Abbot of Pittenweem, gave out that his Lady was fallen in labour at Blackness, and under that pretence went out of town the next day to Calendar, where the Cardinal and the Earl of Murray met him, and after a long conference they set out together for Sterling, where they entered into the closest engagements with each other, and from that time forward the Cardinal had the ear and confidence of the Governor, as much as he ever had of the King, his master (63). These are the plain facts. But to enter a little behind the curtain, and penetrate as far as we may, into the causes of them, which were no other than the arts of the Cardinal, who, step by step, increased his own power, and diminished that of those who opposed him, till for their own sakes they were glad to come to an agreement with him, to have that Head on their side, which had been too hard for all their force. As soon as he had drawn over the Lord Seaton to his party, he advised him to insinuate to the Governor, that it was for his interest, the Cardinal should go to St Andrew's, because this would put him in possession of that castle, and all the wealth that he had in it: When he was got thither, he gave the Governor to understand, that as he was sensible he consented to the late treaties with England through want of power and of money, so if he would consent to an assembly of the Clergy there, it might be a means of procuring for him such a supply, as might enable him to act as he thought proper (64). In the mean time, he had sent for two persons over from France, one or other of which he knew must answer his purpose. The one was the Earl of Lenox, son to that Earl of Lenox, who had been killed endeavouring to rescue his master, King James, out of the hands of the Douglasses, which induced that Prince to have such a kindness for his son, as to promise that he would settle the crown upon him, in case his own issue failed. The other was Mr John Hamilton, Abbot of Paisly, the Governor's natural brother, a down-right creature of France, and wholly devoted to the Cardinal. The first of these two the Cardinal carried to Sterling, gave him hopes of marrying the Queen Dowager, and made him believe himself the most powerful person in the kingdom. The other he sent to the Governor, to let him know he did this very unwillingly, that the Cardinal and his friends were ambitious of nothing so much as his friendship, and that by coming over to them he would have the whole kingdom at his devotion (65). The Abbot repented farther to his brother, that he would find no real support from England; since King Henry did not acknowledge him in quality of Governor, but stiled him in his letters, the Earl of Arran occupying the place of Governor; that by desiring to have the young Queen and the Cardinal delivered up to him, he meant to deprive him of all power, and to render him odious to the Nobility, and to the common people; that while he depended thus upon England, he must ever remain in a dangerous and precarious situation; whereas, by joining with the Cardinal, he would have the whole Scotch nation at his devotion, and might be sure of what support he pleased from France. The Governor having once relished these notions, suffered the Cardinal to make trial of what force he could raise, and when he saw that the assembly at Sterling was become very powerful, he threw off his disguise, and went directly into the Cardinal's measures (66). At their first conference at Calendar the Cardinal shewed the Governor, that by siding with the friends of the Reformation, he was ruining himself and his family; for as there were two divorces in his family, the one of his father, and the other of his grandmother, which depended entirely upon papal authority, if that should once be taken away, his claim to the crown might be questioned, and even his title to the earldom of Arran, and his private estate, both which would devolve upon the Earl of Lenox, who, upon the Governor's joining the Cardinal, had gone over to the English party, and was so well received by King Henry, who gave him his niece, the Lady Margaret Douglas in marriage, that the Governor saw plainly it was impossible for him to retreat (67). Thus the reader sees clearly, that by his superior knowledge of men and things, by his great art in turning every circumstance and event to his advantage; and his prodigious dexterity in applying to the passions and interests of mankind, the Cardinal extricated himself out of all his difficulties, and in the space of eight months, from being the Governor's prisoner at Blackness, became master of the Governor and of the whole kingdom, for on the twenty-third of January 1542-43, the Council came to a resolution of seizing his person, and on the third of September 1543, the Governor left Edinburgh to go and join the Cardinal, and the Lords of his party, at Sterling, and thus in as few words as possible, we have unravelled as dark an intrigue as is to be met with in the history of Scotland.

undoubtedly one of the most singular turns that ever happened in any government, and is very expressive of this great Statesman's genius and character, who knew how to court and manage factions so well, that, from being excluded the Court and imprisoned, he, upon the young Queen's coronation, was again admitted of the Council, and, at the request as well as by the consent of the Regent, assumed the high office of Chancellor, out of which the Archbishop of Glasgow was turned to make way for him. Some authors indeed suggest, he shewed uncommon haughtiness, or rather insolence, in the manner of his accepting this great office (g), but this ought to be regarded as a mistake at least, if not a calumny [K]. His interest was now so great with the Regent, and so well established, that he might be said to have as much influence over him as he had over the King, which manifestly appeared, by his procuring him to solicit the Court of Rome, to extend his already almost boundless authority, by appointing him Legate à latere from the Pope, which was done accordingly, and in all probability was less a favour then, than it is usually accounted, as being with no other view procured, than to sustain and promote the cause of the religion and See of Rome (b). As soon as he obtained this new dignity, he shewed plainly enough, to what end it had been both sought and granted; for he immediately proceeded to a most severe persecution of those he styled Hereticks, to countenance which he had address enough to procure such numbers of persons of high rank and distinction to be present at, and to attend him in, his judicatories, that instead of appearing an act of his own, or the effect of his intrigues, it looked rather as a thing imposed upon him, and in which he acted with the approbation of the nobility and gentry, as well as clergy of the kingdom. Such was the wonderful dexterity of this man, and such the zeal with which, to the very utmost of his power, he promoted the cause of Popery (i) [L]. It was with a

[K] As a mistake at least, if not a calumny. The Archbishop of Glasgow had continued Chancellor of Scotland from the time that the seals were given him, upon the retreat of the Earl of Angus into England, to the latter end of the year 1543, and then we are told that they were taken from him in a very ungracious manner, to put them into the hands of the Cardinal. We find several authors hinting this, but Mr Crawford affirms it more positively than any of the rest, and attempts to prove it by record. His words are these (68). 'The Cardinal having now all the sway, that he might the more easily carry his designs, and have the greater authority in the kingdom, the Archbishop of Glasgow was laid aside from being Lord Chancellor, and the Cardinal came in his place in a very haughty manner; for both before and since that time, when any alterations were made in that high office, the record bears such a person to have been made Chancellor; but such was the pride and ambition of the Cardinal, that it is entered in the record of Parliament, That my Lord Cardinal has accepted the office of Chancellor in and upon him, at the desire of my Lord Governor and Lords of Council though I see he gave his oath de fidelit upon the delivery to him of the great seal, liely (honestly), and truly to minister in the said office during the time he shall happen to haif (have) the same.' Tho' this is seemingly very clear, and very positive, yet perhaps there may be good cause shewn why none of these facts should be considered as certain. For first, as to the Chancellor Dunbar, his office might be, and probably was, inconvenient and troublesome to him in many respects, so as that he might be well enough pleased to part with it; and this will have the greater appearance of truth, if we consider that the two Archbishops continued very good friends ever afterwards, which could scarce be supposed if the Archbishop of Glasgow had been so ill treated in the business of having the seals taken from him. In the next place, as to the pride and haughtiness expressed by the Cardinal in his manner of taking the great seal, we shall the better know what to think of it when we have cast our eyes upon the entry in the publick records, of the delivery of the great seal to George Earl of Huntley in full parliament (69), June the 10th, 1546. 'The whilk day my Lord Governor, in presens of the Queenis Grace and Lordis of Counsaile, has chosen George Earle of Huntlie Chancellor of the realme of Scotland, who has accepit the said office in and upon him, and has sworn that he shall lelely and treulie minister in the said office after his wit, cunyng and knowlage, like as outhir Chancelluris has done, and usit the said office in tymes biganis, and the Queenis Grace and Lordis of Counsaile thought him able therfor, and in signe and takin thereof my said Lord Governor has in presence of the Queenis Grace and Lordis forsaid, deliver it to the said Earl our Sovereign Ladyis grete sele, and has ordaint the Kingis quarter sele, whom God assolize (pardon) to be broken, off the whilk that ane half was cuttit in presens of the Queenis Grace and my Lordis of Counsaile.' It appears very clearly from hence, that there was nothing of arrogance or presumption in the manner of the Cardinal's accepting of the great seal, but that he received it in the ordinary form, and had thereupon the same entry made on the records as was usual, though it must be confessed, that at the first reading, the words, in which his receiving the great seal are entered, seem very lofty and assuming. But the bottom of the business was certainly this, the Governor was desirous that his brother the Abbot of Paisley should have some good employment, and he had no less a mind that the Cardinal should be Lord Chancellor; upon receiving which high office he willingly resigned his former post of Lord Privy-Seal to his friend the Abbot of Paisley, as the reward of that pains and diligence he had used, in bringing about the agreement between his brother the Governor and the Cardinal, and the daily endeavours used by him to serve the latter with the former, and hinder the stories told by his enemies to the Governor from making any impression (70).

[L] He promoted the cause of Popery. It is a full proof that the Cardinal had gained an entire agency over the Governor, since he was able to engage him to apply to the court of Rome, in order to his being promoted to the rank of Legate à Latere, to which he had always aspired, but which he could never obtain 'till now. The Bull for this promotion is still extant, but there seems to be some dispute about the date (71). In the printed copy we have it in words at length 1543, which, as it does not at all agree with history, so it is likewise inconsistent with the other part of the date in the Bull itself, for it is said to be in the tenth year of the Pontificate of Paul III; now that Pope being created October 12, 1534, it is very evident that January 30, 1543, was in the ninth, and not in the tenth year of his reign. It may not be amiss to take notice in this place of the different kinds of Legates, in order to render this note the clearer. A Legate, simply taken, is an Ambassador or Representative of the Pope. The Legate à latere, i. e. from the Pope's side, is always a Cardinal, vested with the fullest powers that can be given him, and in some measure capable of doing as much in the name, and by the authority, of the Pope, as if his Holiness were present he could do himself. The Legate de latere has, or may have, the same power, but is not a Cardinal; and as to the Legati nati, or Legates born, they are so only virtute officii, or in right of their dignity in the church, as our Cardinal was from his being Archbishop of St Andrew's (72). It is plain therefore, that by obtaining this dignity the Cardinal reached the utmost step of preferment, unless he had acquired the papacy itself; and there is no doubt, that when it was desired from view to serve this cause still more effectually; that he summoned, in the beginning of 1546, a Provincial assembly of the Clergy, at the Black-Friars in Edinburgh (k). He proposed to himself doing great things at this meeting of the Clergy, and at the opening thereof he made a speech, in which he shewed, that Religion was in great danger from the prevailing of Heresy, for which he said he knew but two remedies, the first of these was, to proceed vigorously against such, as either adhered to, or encouraged the new opinions; and the other was, to reform the scandalous and immoral lives of the clergy, which gave the greatest pretence for men to separate from the Church (l). How far they proceeded in that affair remains altogether uncertain; but it is generally agreed, that the Cardinal was diverted from the purposes he had then in hand, by the information he received, that Mr George Wishart, the most famous Protestant preacher in Scotland, was then at the house of Mr Cockburn, of Ormiston in East Lothian. The Cardinal upon this immediately applied to the Governor, to cause him to be apprehended, with which, after great persuasion, and much against his will, he complied. The Cardinal went in person with the Earl of Bothwell, who was Sheriff of the county, to see him apprehended, and staid about a mile from the place, while the Earl went and took him into custody (m). After this was done, the Cardinal procured an order, or, as they call it in Scotland, an Act of Council, requiring the Earl of Bothwell to deliver his prisoner to the Lord Governor (n). Pursuant to which, he was first carried to the house of Elphinston, where the Cardinal then was, from thence to the castle of Edinburgh, and by the Queen-Dowager's persuasion, the Governor caused him to be transferred to the castle of St Andrew's (o). As soon as the Cardinal had him there, he resolved to proceed without delay to his trial, and in order thereto, summoned the Prelates to meet in the city beforementioned, on the twenty-seventh of February following. When they were accordingly met, the Archbishop of Glasgow very wisely and prudently advised, that they should apply to the Governor to grant a commission, to some man of quality, to try so famous a prisoner, that the whole blame might not fall on the clergy, to which the Cardinal agreed, and application was accordingly made (p). The Governor at first made no great scruple of the thing, but Mr Hamilton of Preston interposing, shewed him so clearly the folly of taking the thorn out of another man's foot, to thrust it into his own, that in the end he returned the Cardinal this answer, That he would do well not to precipitate this man's tryal, but delay it until his coming, for as to himself, he would not consent to his death before the cause was very well examined, and if the Cardinal should do otherwise, he would make protestation, that the blood of this man should be required at his hands. When the Cardinal received this message, he was equally angry and perplexed; yet determined however to go on, and therefore sent this return to the Governor: That he had not wrote to him about this matter, as supposing himself to be any way dependent upon his authority, but from a desire that the prosecution and conviction of Hereticks, might have a shew of publick consent, which since he could not this way obtain, he would proceed in that way, which to him appeared the most proper (q). Accordingly he went on to try Mr Wishart upon eighteen articles, notwithstanding his appeal, as being the Governor's prisoner, to a temporal judicatory, and having condemned, caused him to be burnt at St Andrew's, on the second of March, forbidding likewise all persons to pray for him, whom he stiled an obstinate Heretick, under pain of incurring the severest censures of the Church (r). He died with great firmness, constancy, and Christian courage, and, if we may believe many of the writers of those times, prophesied in the midst of the flames, not only the approaching death of the Cardinal, but the circumstances also that should attend it; which however has been called in question by others, who the court of Rome, there was a promise made that the Cardinal should make good use of the power bestowed upon him for the service of the Church. So indeed he did, for in the close of the year 1545, he went in the most solemn manner to visit his diocese, agreeable to a law of his own procuring, as well as to the promise made, as before-mentioned, to the court of Rome. He was attended in this visitation by the Lord Governor, the Earl of Argyll, Lord Justice-General, the Lord Borthwick, the Bishops of Dumblain and Orkney, Sir John Campbel of Lundy, and several other gentlemen (73). When they came to Perth several persons were accused of Heresy, being indicted particularly for breaking the act of parliament of 1542-3, by which the people were forbidden to argue or dispute concerning the sense of the Holy Scriptures. They were quickly found guilty, and these following were condemned to die, viz. William Anderson, Robert Lamb, James Ronald, James Hunter, James Finlayson, and Helen Stark his wife. Mr Knox tells us, in his History of the Reformation of Religion in Scotland, that they were convicted of nothing but only a suspicion of having eaten a goose on a Friday (74). Great intercession was made for a pardon, but nothing would prevail, so that the men were executed by hanging, and the woman drowned, though, as Buchanan informs us, she was then big with child (75). 'Perhaps, says Mr Keith, the Cardinal was the more inexorable, that he might cast a copy for the other Prelates what they ought to do in their several dioceses; or perhaps he thought by this exemplary punishment, to put an effectual stop to the growing of Heresy throughout the kingdom, seeing that town, and the country therabouts, was more infected therewith than other parts of the nation (76).' Sir Henry Elder, Walter Piper, Laurence Pullar, with some other Burgessees, were banished, and the Lord Ruthven, Provost of the town, was removed from his office as a favourer of the Reformers. He likewise caused John Rogers, a black Friar, who had preached the reformed doctrines in Angus and Mearns, to be murdered in prison at St Andrew's, as Knox says (77), or as Spotswood (78) relates it, he was charged therewith, because the body of this man was found at the bottom of a wall behind the place of his confinement; but he leaves it doubtful whether he fell in the endeavour to make his escape, or, as the report went, was murdered. By this visitation, we very plainly discover to what end all the honours our Cardinal received were heaped upon him, as every accession of power produced also fresh instances of clerical severity, inconsistent with true Christianity.

[M] As a story invented after his and the Cardinal's death.] It must be allowed, that the diffusing of this fact is one of the most curious points in the history of our Cardinal, and therefore it seems but requisite to give as clear and fair account of it as may be. And as we find none in any of our authors which can answer this purpose so well, we shall present the reader with that of Mr George Buchanan, of which indeed most of the rest seem to be but copies, and those too, in all respects, very far inferior to their original. Our author, having given an account of the manner in which Mr George Wihart spent the morning of his execution, proceeds thus (79). 'Awihle after two executioners were sent to him by the Cardinal, one of them put a black linen shirt upon him, and the other bound many little bags of gunpowder to all the parts of his body. In this dres they brought him forth, and commanded him to stay in the Governor's outer-chamber, and at the same time they erected a wooden scaffold in the court before the castle, and made up a pile of wood. The windows and balconies over against it were all hung with tapestry and silk hangings, with cushions for the Cardinal, and his train to behold, and take pleasure in the joyful sight, even the torture of an innocent man. Thus courting the favour of the people as the author of so notable a deed. There was also a great guard of soldiers, not so much to secure the execution, as for a vain ostentation of power. And beside, brafs guns were placed up and down in all convenient places of the castle. Thus, while the trumpets sounded, George was brought forth, mounted the scaffold, and was fastened with a cord to the stake, and having scarce obtained liberty to pray for the Church of God, the executioners fired the wood, which immediately taking hold of the powder that was tied about him, blew it up into flame and smoke. The governor of the castle, who stood so near that he was singed with the flame, exhorted him in a few words to be of good cheer, and to ask pardon of God for his offences. To whom he replied, This flame occasions trouble to my body indeed, but it hath in no wise broken my spirit. But he who now so proudly looks down upon me from yonder lofty place (pointing to the Cardinal), shall ere long be as ignominiously thrown down, as now he proudly lolls at his ease. Having thus spoken, they straitened the rope which was tied about his neck, and so frangled him, his body in a few hours being consumed to ashes in the flame. The Bishops being yet mad with heat and rage, forbid every body, upon great penalties, to pray for the deceased.' We have the same story told at large by Archbishop Spotswood, more briefly by Petrie, but it is evident that they copied all they say from Buchanan. On the other side the question, the reverend Mr Keith suggests that the story is very doubtful, if not plainly false. As this is a very tender point, and seems to bear very hard, not only upon the authority of Buchanan, but upon the judgment of all the writers that have transcribed him, I shall cite the words of my author, that I may not either weaken or strengthen his arguments by a different manner of expressing them (80). 'I confess I give but small credit to this, and to some other things related of those persons that suffered for religion in our country, and which upon that account I have all along omitted to narrate. I own I think them ridiculous enough, and seemingly contrived, at least magnified, on purpose to render the judges and clergymen of that time odious and despicable in the eyes of men. And as to this passage concerning Mr Wihart, it may be noticed, that there is not one word of it to be met with in the first edition of Mr Knox's history; and if the thing had been true in fact, I cannot see how Mr Knox, who was so good an acquaintance of Mr Wihart's, and no farther distance from the place of his execution than East Lothian, and who continued some months along with the murderers of Cardinal Beton in the castle of St Andrew's, could neither be ignorant of the story, nor neglect to insert in his history so remarkable a prediction. And it has even its own weight, that Sir David Lindsay, who lived at that time, and wrote a poem, called The Tragedy of Cardinal Beton, in which he takes together all the worst things that could be suggested against this Prelate, yet makes no mention either of his glutting himself inhumanly with the spectacle of Mr Wihart's death, nor of any prophetic intermination made by Mr Wihart concerning the Cardinal; nor doth Mr Fox take notice of either of these circumstances; so that I am much of the mind, that it has been a story trumped up a good time after the murder.' The language of this author is a little uncouth, but his observations are very weighty. As to the history ascribed to Mr Knox, it is undoubtedly none of his, but was so called because in some measure a history of his actions, and because taken from his books, papers and sermons (81). It was first printed in octavo, in 1570, and suppressed by order of Queen Elizabeth, next in quarto (82), and again in folio in 1644, where we have this very passage at full length, which shews evidently the liberties taken with this History of the Reformation in Scotland, which in the main however is a very useful work, and contains many things from Knox. I therefore think that the want of these passages in the first edition is a good proof that John Knox knew nothing either of the Cardinal's looking out of the window, or of Mr Wihart's prophecy. His arguments from Lindsay and Fox are likewise very strong, for Sir David Lindsay hated the Cardinal, who drove him from court, was a friend to the Reformation, and a hearer of Wihart's, and wrote immediately after the Cardinal's death. As for Fox, he had the best informations from Scotland that could be, and he always quotes them, so that these passages being wanting in his work, is very strong evidence they were not then heard of in Scotland, if they had, unquestionably they would have been sent to him. But there is still something more to be added on this head, that will add to the weight of Mr Keith's objection, which is this, that our famous John Bale has given us an article of Cardinal Beaton (83), in which the burning of Mr Wihart, and the murder of the Cardinal are both mentioned, but not one word of the Cardinal's beholding the execution, or of the Martyr's prophecy. Yet John Bale wrote his fourteenth Century of learned men to include the Scots, dedicated it to Alexander Ales and John Knox, of whose friendship to him, and their communications in a literary way, he makes honourable mention, having had their company long in exile, into which John Knox was driven for adhering to the Cardinal's murderers. This seems a very strong proof that neither he nor they ever heard of this wonderful prophecy, or the manner in which it was so surprizingly fulfilled; since, if they had, such as are acquainted with the characters of the men and their writings, will scarce believe they could be omitted. But there is still one circumstance more, which seems absolutely conclusive. Bale has added to his article of Cardinal Beaton an appendix, for the sake of giving us from Hall an account of his first visitation, when he condemned Sir John Borthwick, May 28, 1540, for Heresy; and in the close of this account we are told, that by the just judgment of God, six years afterwards, the said Cardinal on the same month, day, and hour, was killed, and afterwards shamefully hanged out at a window of his own castle, in all the pompous habiliments of his dignity. Sed ecce mirum divine providentia judicium sexto post anno eisdemq; mense die et hora, occisus presatus Cardinalis fuit, probro expositus, et ad fenestram suis castri, in solenni Cardinalatus apparatu suspensus ut dictum est. Bale printed this, as appears by the colophon of his book in February 1559, which is but thirteen years after the fact, and in that space he had conversed long with John Knox, who acted as pastor and preacher to those, who after they had killed the Cardinal held out the castle of St Andrew's against the Government, and who knowing both Bale's design of writing, and all the circumstances of the Cardinal's death, would never have suffered him to make such a mistake as this about the judgment visible therein. On the other hand, however, some who favoured the Cardinal, to combat this prophecy of George Wihart the martyr, have invented a story that he was privy to the conspiracy formed to murder him, and so might foretel his end without inspiration (84). A notion as indifferently supported by proof, though as roundly asserted as the former.

of this proceeding made a mighty noise throughout the whole kingdom, such as were zealous Papists, magnifying the spirit and steadiness of the Cardinal, manifest in this execution; others of more moderation censured it, as a rash and very imprudent action, which could not but be attended with very dismal consequences; and the friends to the Reformation openly declared, that as it was done without due course of law, it ought to be considered as a murder (t), which if unquestioned by the State, private men might revenge. As for the Cardinal, he did not seem to be highly concerned at the rumours which his conduct in this matter had raised, he was so much persuaded in himself of his great interest among the nobility, that he did not apprehend any sort of danger from the Governor's displeasure; and, on the other hand, he thought, that having embarked the whole clergy of Scotland in the same cause with himself, by engaging them so deeply in this prosecution, he was sure of their assistance, and of all the interest they had among the people (u). There is a circumstance mentioned by several historians, which very plainly proves, that the Cardinal was at this time at the height of his fortune and wishes, and that he was intent upon nothing, but the means of adding to and securing this prosperity for the future. For it was in order to this, he went, soon after the death of Mr Wishart, to Finhaven, the seat of the Earl of Crawford, to solemnize a marriage, between the eldest son of that nobleman, and his own natural daughter Margaret, which was performed with great pomp and splendor (w). This fact is the clearest proof that the Cardinal had no dread or terror upon his mind, but thought his state and condition as safe and secure, if not more so, than ever; and it likewise proves, that he stood in very high credit with the principal nobility of Scotland, when he was able to marry his natural daughter, to the heir apparent of one of the most antient and honourable families in that kingdom. But while he was thus employed, and in the midst of their rejoicings occasioned by this match, he had intelligence that an English squadron was upon the coast, and that consequently an invasion was to be feared. The Cardinal upon this returned immediately to St Andrew's, and appointed a day for the nobility and gentry of that country, which is very open, and much exposed to the sea, to meet and consult about the proper means of raising such a force, as might be sufficient to secure them from any attempt of that nature (x). He began likewise to strengthen the fortifications of his own castle at that city, into which he was at any time able to put a garrison of his own, sufficient to defend it. But the time of meeting not being come, and no farther news being heard of the English fleet, he was more intent upon rendering this castle tenable against a foreign force, than solicitous about assembling such a number of men, or taking such other precautions, as might secure him from being surprized by his enemies at home, of which, for any thing that appears in History, he does not seem to have had the least suspicion (y). But while he was busy about these matters, there came to him the eldest son of the Earl of Rothes, Mr Norman Lesley, a gentleman with whom he had a very intimate friendship, and who expected from him on that account some favour, which the Cardinal absolutely refused him, and provoked him thereby to such a degree, that they parted in great displeasure (z). It happened that this gentleman's uncle, Mr John Lesley, was one of the most violent enemies the Cardinal had in the world, and he knowing his nephew's passionate temper and daring spirit, repaired to him immediately, aggravated the injury done him by the Cardinal, and brought with him several other persons who thought themselves wronged by that Prelate; and after a short conference together, it was resolved to cut him off. There were but a very few concerned in this conspiracy, and of them the principal persons were, Norman Lesley, John Lesley, William Kircaldy of Grange, Peter Carmichael of Fife, and James Melville (a). The scheme they laid, was to meet at St Andrew's with as much privacy as it was possible, and to surprize the castle in a morning, before the Cardinal's servants were stirring, and they entered into an agreement under their hands, to be at that city on the twenty-eighth of May, and to behave in the mean time in such a manner, as to afford no room for suspicion. Accordingly, at the time agreed on, Norman Lesley came, with no more than five persons, and went to the place where he usually lodged; William Kircaldy was there a day before; but John Lesley, because he was known to be the Cardinal's avowed enemy, did not come till it was almost dark. On Saturday morning the twenty-ninth of May, they met in the abbey church-yard about three o'clock, being no more than twelve in all (b). There they agreed, that Kircaldy should take six persons with him and secure the gate, that the rest might enter, which he accordingly did, entertaining the porter with some discourse, about the time when the Cardinal would be stirring and might be spoke with; then came Norman Lesley and two more; and lastly John Lesley with the other two, upon the sight of whom, the porter made towards the draw-bridge, but they seized him, took the keys from him, and secured the gate (c). The next thing they did, was to send four persons to watch the Cardinal's chamber, that he might have no notice given him of what was doing; they afterwards went and called up the servants, to whom they were very well known, and turned them, to the number of fifty, out at the gate, as they did above an hundred workmen employed in repairing the castle, but the eldest son of the Regent, who was with the Cardinal, they kept for their own security. All this they did with so little noise, that the Cardinal was not waked till they knocked at his chamber door, upon which he cried out, Who is there? John Lesley answered, My name is Lesley; Which Lesley? replied replied the Cardinal, Is it Norman? Answer was made him, That he must open the door to those who were there; instead of doing which he secured it the best he could (d). They then called for fire, and while it was fetching he conferred with them, and upon promise made him that no violence should be used towards his person, he opened the door, when rushing in with their swords drawn, they without any regard to their promise given immediately murdered him (e). Thus fell the great Cardinal of St Andrew's, by a small number of private enemies, after he had managed, in a manner absolutely, all the affairs of Scotland for seven years, and had overcome several powerful oppositions formed against him. The circumstances of his death have been differently reported, and variously censured, according to the sentiments of those by whom they are recorded (f) [N]. As for the [N] According to the sentiments of those by whom they are recorded] In the account of the Cardinal's death we have given in the text, we depend chiefly on the authority of Archbishop Spotwood, which agrees very well with that of Buchanan, except that there are some strokes of bitterness in the one, which are very prudently left out in the other. It is however very material to see the colours which Buchanan gives to this action, because there is no doubt that he, who was well acquainted with the principal persons concerned therein, had as good intelligence as it was possible both of the real grounds upon which this action was committed, and the pretences given out to save appearances in the world, and to justify the conduct of those concerned in it, as far as possible. Buchanan having related the manner of Wishart's suffering, and the reputation the Cardinal acquired thereby with the popish party, proceeds thus (85). ' This luxuriant and superlative joy of the priests for their obtained victory, rather irritated than discouraged the minds not only of the promiscuous vulgar, but even of some great and noble persons too. They fretted that things were come to that pass by their pusillanimity and cowardice, and now they thought some bold act or other was to be attempted and hazarded, or else they must remain slaves for ever. Led by this same motive, more company came in to them, whose grief forced them to break out into complaints against the Cardinal, so they encouraged one another to rid this Priest out of the way, and either to recover their liberty, or lose their lives. For what hopes of thriving, said they, can there be under so arrogant a priest, and so cruel a tyrant, who makes war against God as well as man, and those not his enemies only, as were all such as had estates, or were any way pious, but for a small grudge he will haul a man as a hog out of the sty to be sacrificed to his lusts? And besides, he is a publick encourager and maintainer of war both at home and abroad, and in his private capacity he mixeth the love of harlots with lawful marriages, legitimate wedlock he dissolves at pleasure, at home he wallows in lust among his minions, and abroad he ravages to destroy the innocent.' As for Bishop Lesly, he gives but a very short account of the matter; but, however, he observes that the murder was committed by men who, whatever they might pretend of zeal for the publick good, were in reality highly incensed against the Cardinal from private and particular motives (86). Norman Lesly was angry because the estate of Easter Weems was taken from him upon Lord Colvin's being pardoned, which had been given to him upon that Lord's forfeiting. John Lesly had borne an old grudge against the Cardinal, and had publicly vowed revenge. As for Kircaldy of Grange, he was moved to it by his resentment for his father's being removed from the post of treasurer in the late King's reign, which he had executed with great advantage to himself, and with much satisfaction to the people. In respect to Carmichael, he too had a dispute with the Cardinal about lands, for which he hated him mortally. As for the rest of the people concerned in the fact, they were either dependants upon, or servants to, the gentlemen before-mentioned, and at their command would have done the same thing against any other person. The account of the Cardinal's death, which is inserted in his history of his own times by the famous President de Thou, better known by his Latin name Thuanus, is taken from Buchanan, upon whose credit he relates at large the circumstance of Mr Wishart's prophecy, and the accomplishment of it in such a manner, as very plainly shews that he firmly believed it (87). But it is very remarkable, that William Harrison, or whoever compiled the history of Scotland, which is inserted in the first volume of Hollinshed's Chronicle, tho' he takes the whole of the story from Buchanan, yet omits that circumstance (88); and tho' in another place he gives some account of the life of Cardinal Beaton, Archbishop of St Andrew's, yet he says nothing therein either of Wishart's foretelling his death, or of it's being looked upon as the judgment of God on the Cardinal for that pious man's suffering (89), which is the more extraordinary, because Buchanan insists so much upon it, and makes it the chief reason why the people of St Andrew's dispersed and raised the siege of the castle immediately after the fact was committed (90). In The History of the Reformation of Religion in Scotland, which, as we have said, is commonly ascribed to John Knox, as being for the most part taken from his papers, there is a very full relation of this transaction, and with circumstances so different from those that are contained in the other accounts, that it deserves the reader's particular notice, the rather because it is this very passage which induced Archbishop Spotwood to maintain, that great injury was done to Mr Knox in publishing that book under his name (91). But if it be considered, that Mr Knox of his own accord went into the castle of St Andrew's, and preached for many months to the persons concerned, we can hardly suppose that if he left any papers relating to the history of the Church, he should omit so remarkable a passage as this, with the particulars of which scarce any man could be so well acquainted as himself. The account before-mentioned (92) runs thus. ' Many purposes were devised how that wicked man might have been taken away, but all failed 'till Friday the 28th of May, 1546, when the aforesaid Norman came at night to St Andrew's, William Kircaldy of Grange Younger was in the town before, waiting upon the purpose; last came John Lesly aforesaid, who was most suspected. What conclusion they took that night it was not known but by the issue that followed. But early upon the Saturday in the morning, the 29th of May, were they in sundry companies in the Abbey church-yard, not far distant from the castle. First, the gates being open, and the draw-bridge let down for receiving of lime and stone, and other things necessaries for building (for Babylon was almost finished), first, we say, assayed William Kircaldy of Grange Younger, and with him six persons, and getting entry, held purpose with the porter if my Lord Cardinal was waking? Who answered, No; and so it was indeed, for he had been busy at his accounts with Mrs Marion Ogilby that night, who was espied to depart from him by the privy postern that morning, and therefore quietness, after the rules of physick, and a morning sleep, was requisite for my Lord. While the said William and the porter talked, and his servants made them to look to the work and the workmen, approached Norman Lesly with his company, and because they were no great number, they easily got entry. They advanced to the middle of the court, and immediately came John Lesly somewhat rudely, and four persons with him. The porter fearing, would have drawn the bridge, but the said John being entered therein, staid it and leaped in, and while the porter made him for defence, his head was broke, the keys were taken from him, and he cast into the ditch, and so the place was seized. The workmen, to the number of more than an hundred, run to the walls, and were without hurt put forth at the wicket-gate. The first thing that ever was done, William Kircaldy took the guard of the privy postern, fearing that the fox should have escaped. Then go the rest to the gentlemen's chambers, and without violence done to any man, they put more than fifty persons to the gate. The number that en- terprized, the character of this famous man, it may best be collected from his actions. That he had great parts is certain, and that his pride and ambition were boundless is no less certain; that he was a zealous friend to the Popish religion cannot be doubted, and that this zeal of his altered his natural temper is very probable; for except in matters of religion, he was so far from acting with severity, that he seems to have carried every thing rather by persuasion than by force. Though he was not remarkable for his learning by any writings that he published, yet he was very far from being deficient in that point; and though he is grievously terprized, and did this, was but sixteen persons. The Cardinal waking with the shouts, asked from his window, What meant that noise? It was answered, That Norman Lesly had taken his castle; which understood, he run to the postern, but perceiving the passage to be kept without, he returned quickly to his chamber, and took his two-handed sword, and caused his chamberlain to cast chests and other impediments to the door. In the mean time came forth John Lesly unto it, and bids open. The Cardinal asking, Who calls? He answered, My name is Lesly. He demands again, Is that Norman? The other says, No, my name is John. I will have Norman, says the Cardinal, for he is my friend. Content yourself with such as are here, for others shall you get none. There were with the said John, James Melvin, a man familiarly acquainted with Master George Wifcharde, and Peter Charmichael, a stout gentleman. In the mean time, while they force at the door, the Cardinal hides a box of gold under coals that were laid in a secret corner. At length he asks, Will ye save my life? The said John answers, It may be that we will. Nay (said the Cardinal), swear unto me by God's wounds, and I will open you. Then answered the said John, It that was said is unsaid, and so cried, Fire! fire! (for the door was very strong), and so was brought a chimney full of burning coal, which perceived, the Cardinal, or his chamberlain (it is uncertain), opened the door, and the Cardinal sat down in a chair, and cried, I am a Priest! I am a Priest! ye will not slay me. The said John Lesly (according to his former vows) stroke him once or twice, and so did the said Peter. But James Melvin (a man of nature most gentle and most modest) perceiving them both in choler, withdrew them, and said, This work and judgment of God (although it be secret) ought to be done with greater gravity; and presenting unto him the point of the sword, said, Repent thee of thy former wicked life, but especially of the shedding of the blood of that notable instrument of God, Mr George Wifcharde, which albeit the flame of fire consumed before men, yet cries it for vengeance upon thee, and we from God are sent to revenge it; for here, before my God, I protest, that neither the hatred of thy person, the love of thy riches, nor the fear of any trouble thou could have to me in particular, moved or moveth me to strike thee, but only because thou hast been, and remained an obstinate enemy against Christ Jesus and the holy gospel. And so he stroke him twice or thrice through with a stag sword, and so he fell, never heard word out of his mouth, but I am a Priest! Fie! fie! all is gone! While they were busied with the Cardinal, the fray rose in the town, the Provost raised the commonalty, and comes to the house side, crying, What have you done with my Lord Cardinal? Where is my Lord Cardinal? Have ye slain my Lord Cardinal? They that were within answered gently, Best it were for you to return to your own houses, for the man ye call the Cardinal has received the reward, and in his own person will trouble the world no more. But then they more iragely cry out, we shall never depart 'till we see him, and so was he brought to the East Blockhouse head, and shewed dead over the wall to the faithless multitude, which would not believe before they saw, and so they departed without, Requiem eternam et requiescat in pace, sung for his soul. Now because the weather was hot (for it was in May, as ye have heard) and his funerals could not soon be prepared, it was thought best to keep him from stinking to give him great salt enough, a cope of lead, and a corner in the bottom of the sea tower (a place wherein many of God's children have been imprisoned before), to wait what exequies his brethren the Bishops would prepare for him. These things we write merrily, but we would that the reader should observe God's just judgments, and how he can depre- hend the worldly wife in their own opinion, make their table to be a snare to trap their own feet, and their purposed strength to be their own destruction. These are the works of our God, whereby he would admonish the tyrants of this earth, that in the end he will be revenged of their cruelty what strength soever they make to the contrary. But such is the blindness of man (as David saith), that the posterity doth ever follow the footsteps of their wicked fathers, and principally in their impiety, for how little differs the cruelty of that bastard, that yet is called Bishop of St Andrew's, from the cruelty of the former, we will after hear. It seems from this last passage, that this account was written very soon after the thing happened, and while all the circumstances were fresh in the writer's mind, which renders it so much the more probable it was really penned by John Knox; and another circumstance which makes it still more likely is, that the whole relation is found in the first octavo edition. But whereas in that edition against the recital of James Melvin's killing the Cardinal, there was this marginal note 'the goldly fact and words of James Melvin;' the word goldly in the quarto and folio editions is left out. We must consider this however as a compliance with the milder disposition of the times, for Mr Fox the Martyrologist scruples not saying, the gentlemen were stirred up by the Lord (93). Mr Calderwood (94) also tells us, in the same spirit with Mr Fox, the Cardinal intended further if the Lord had not stirred up some men of courage to cut him off in time. Upon these insinuations the reverend Mr Jeremy Collier reflects very severely, and says it is strange to astonishment men should defend such things (95). The right reverend Bishop Burnet speaks of this transaction thus (96). 'This fact was differently censured, some justified it, and said it was only killing a mighty robber; others, that were glad he was out of the way, yet condemned the manner of it as treacherous and inhuman; and though some of the preachers did afterwards fly to that castle as a sanctuary, yet none of them were neither actors or consenters to it. It is true they did generally extenuate it, yet I do not find that any of them justified it. The exemplary and signal ends of almost all the conspirators, scarce any of them dying an ordinary death, made all people the more inclined to condemn it.' It is not at all strange, that even men of sense and learning should differ in their opinions of this fact; but it is very strange, that amongst all the Historians that have mentioned it, there are scarce two that fix it upon the same day. To begin with Buchanan: He says the days were then very long, for it was about the Nones, i. e. the 7th of May. Bishop Lesly places it on the 30th of May. Dempster tells us he suffered on the 28th of May. John Bale says the same. Petrie, in his Church History, says positively it was on the 7th of May in the morning. In Hollinshed's Chronicle he is said to have been killed on the 13th, but in the History of the Reformation of Scotland, both the day of the week and the day of the month are fixed, viz. Saturday, May the 29th, which is followed by Archbishop Spottwood, and by Mr Keith. I am the rather inclined to think that this is a right date, because I find that the 29th of May fell that year upon a Saturday, and that the Cardinal was killed on that day of the week, is set down in several collections of those times. The reader will the less wonder at this, when he is told that the death of King James V, and indeed the most remarkable dates in the Scotch history, are not at all better fixed than this; so that there cannot well be a more troublesome task assigned, than to put the memoirs of any remarkable person of that nation into tolerable order, more especially if the facts relating to him are mentioned by several Historians, who in this, as well as in other points, seldom or never agree.

grievously censured by some, as well as highly extolled by others; yet it seems to be a thing agreed by all, that his abilities were no way inferior to his fortune (g) [O]. [O] His abilities were no way inferior to his fortune.] It has been already shewn, in what light Buchanan would have the Cardinal considered in the description he gives us of him, before he proceeds to the account of his death (97). Bishop Lesly speaks of him with great reverence and respect, but without giving us any large or full character of him (98). In the History of the Reformation of Religion in Scotland, he is represented as a most barbarous and bloody man, and he is scarce mentioned in that book without some mark of infamy and reproach. It is hinted that he poisoned his master, it is suggested that he had an intrigue with the Queen, it is positively affirmed he more than once contrived to have Mr Wishart murdered (99). But there is so much heat and passion expressed, that it is impossible to give any great credit to what is asserted there without proof. Spotwood, though he relates his actions largely, yet declines saying any thing of his conduct or behaviour, except where he condemns him for cruelty, for persecuting the favourers of the Reformation. Paulus Jovius, in his description of Scotland, speaking of St Andrew's, delivers himself thus (100). In which See David Beaton at present presides, honoured with the purple, and no less distinguished by the lustre of his great actions, and the superiority of his genius. John Bale bestows on him a very indifferent character, but such an one as it is the reader shall have it in his own words (101). descended from no extraordinary family in Scotland, was, at his setting out in the world, a young man of a bold and wicked spirit, and first in his own county, afterward in Paris, gave himself over entirely to flattery, ambition, and luxury, and the finding out some means for the support of these. He wrought in such a manner, that after some embassies to Francis I, and Paul III, he was preferred to be Archbishop of St Andrew's and Primate of Scotland, that he might extinguish the gospel of Christ, which began to be preached there by those who came out of England. Such was his behaviour in this station, and he so persecuted the godly, that by the same Paul III he was made Cardinal Priest, and Apostolic Legate, &c.' Dempster only says, That having merited exceedingly of the Catholic religion, and of his country, he was promoted to these dignities. But I have seen a supplement to Dempster, in which there is the following account of this great man, which in my judgment comes very near the truth. 'It frequently happens, that the same great qualities of mind which enable a man to distinguish himself by the splendor of his virtues, are so over-strained or corrupted, as to render him no less notorious for his vices. Of this we have many instances in ancient writers, but none by which it is more clearly displayed, than in the character of the Cardinal Archbishop of St Andrew's, David Beaton, who from his very childhood was extremely remarkable, and whose violent death had this in it singular, that his enemies knew no way to remove him from his absolute authority but that. When he was but ten years of age he spoke with so much ease and gravity, with so much good sense, and freedom from affectation, as surprized all who heard him. When he was little more than twenty, he became known to the Duke of Albany and to the court of France, where he transacted affairs of the greatest importance, at an age when others begin to be acquainted with them only in books. Before he was thirty he had merited the confidence of the Regent, the attention of the French King, and the favour of his master, so that they were all suitors to the court of Rome in his behalf. He was soon after made Lord Privy-Seal, and appointed by act of parliament to attend the young King at his Majesty's own desire. Before he attained the forty-fifth year of his age he was Bishop of Mirepoix in France, Cardinal of the Roman Church, Archbishop of St Andrew's, and Primate of Scotland, to which high dignities he added, before he was fifty, those of Lord High-Chancellor, and Legate à latere. His behaviour was so taking, that he never addicted himself to the service of any Prince or person, but he absolutely obtained their confidence, and this power he had over the minds of others, he managed with so much prudence and discretion, that his interest never weakened or decayed. He was the favourite of the Regent Duke of Albany, and of his pupil James V, as long as they lived, and the French King and the Governor of Scotland equally regretted his loss. He was indefatigable in business, and yet managed it with great ease. He understood the interests of the courts of Rome, France, and Scotland, better than any man of his time, and he was perfectly acquainted with the temper, influence, and weight, of all the nobility in his own country. In time of danger he shewed great prudence and steadiness of mind, and in his highest prosperity discovered nothing of vanity or giddiness. He was a zealous churchman, and thought severity the only weapon which could combat Heresy. He loved to live magnificently; though not profusely; for at the time of his death he was rich, and yet had provided plentifully for his family. But his failings were many, and his vices scandalous. His pride was so great, that he quarrelled with the old Archbishop of Glasgow in his own city, and pushed this quarrel so far, that their men fought in the very church. His ambition was boundless, for he took into his own hands the entire management of the affairs of the kingdom; civil and ecclesiastical, and treated the English Ambassador as if he had been a sovereign Prince. He made no scruple of sowing discord amongst his enemies, that he might reap security from their disputes. His jealousy of the Governor was such, that he kept his eldest son as a hostage in his house, under pretence of taking care of his education. In point of chastity he was very deficient, for though we should set aside as calumnies, many of those things which his enemies have reported of his intrigues, yet the posterity he left behind him, plainly proves that he violated those vows to gratify his passions, which he obliged others to hold sacred on the penalty of their lives. In a word, had his probity been equal to his parts, had his virtues come up to his abilities, his end had been less fatal, and his memory without blemish. As it is, we ought to consider him as an eminent instance of the frailty of the brightest human faculties, and the instability of what the world calls Fortune.'

He wrote, if we may depend upon Dempster (102), Memoirs of his own Embassies, a Treatise of Peter's Primacy, which had been seen by William Barclay, and Letters to several persons; of these last there are still some copies, said to be preserved in the library of the French King.

[P] Yet maintain an honourable rank in their native country.] The lady who lived with the Cardinal as his concubine, was Mrs Marion Ogilby, by whom he had six children; three sons, to each of whom he gave a good estate in land; and three daughters, who were married into three as good families as any in Scotland (103). Mrs Ogilby was of that family, which has since born the honourable title of Earls of Arby, and lived many years after the decease of the Cardinal, in great credit and respect. One of the sons was Mr Alexander Bethune, Arch-Deacon of Lothian, and Laird of Carigouny, who turned Protefant, married and established the family of Nether-Tarvit, who bear quarterly, first and fourth azure, on a fess between lozenges Or, a leaf of betony (alluding to the name Bethune) slipped Vert, second and third, the arms of Balfour; crest, a Physicians square cap; motto, Resolutio cauta (104): From whence it should seem, that Mr Peter was mis-informed, as to the falling of all these families to decay. The eldest daughter married the son and heir apparent of the Earl of Crawford, and the marriage contract is still in being, dated at St Andrew's, April the 10th, 1546; in which the Cardinal expressly styles the bride, my daughter (105). The fortune he gave with her, was 4000 marks Scots, which must have been a very considerable sum in those days, since King Henry VIII gave his niece, Lady Margaret Douglas, daughter to the Queen-Dowager of Scotland, by the Earl of Angus, when he married her to Mat-

the people of St Andrew's, that as soon as they knew the castle was seized, they rose in hopes of delivering him, but his dead body being exposed from a window, their hearts failed them, and they dispersed. The conspirators in the castle were soon joined by many of their friends, who enabled them to hold out for a long time, and to make a tolerable capitulation at last, in consequence of which they were transported to France, but the castle was afterwards demolished, the true reason of which the reader will find in the notes (i) [2]. What Dempster says, as to the apparent judgment of God upon Norman Lesley, is evidently false, and was no doubt contrived to please the Romanists, and to pay his court to the Cardinals and other Ecclesiasticks (k) [R]. But Archbishop Spotwood, though he does thew Stewart, Earl of Lennox, no more than 6800 marks (106). But then it is to be considered, that the proportion between English and Scotch money was not the same that it is at present; for whereas the Scotch mark is now but thirteen pence and one third of a penny, it was then three shillings and four pence, or in other words, whereas eighteen Scotch marks now make a Scotch pound sterling, there were then in it no more than six; so that the Cardinal gave his daughter a thousand marks sterling, which is six hundred sixty-six pounds, thirteen shillings and four pence. His other two daughters married into the houses of Nairn and Kelly, which, if we may depend upon Mr Petrie, were ruined and come to nothing in his time (107). All these observations of his are calculated to shew, that the wrath of heaven pursued the Cardinal's family, which is a notion equally irreconcilable to the principles of the Christian religion, to those of common sense, or to matters of fact.

[2] The true reason of which the reader will find in the notes] The evening of that day in which the Cardinal was killed, there came in about one hundred and forty persons to join those concerned in the action, and to assist them in defending the place, congratulating them upon the success of their enterprize, and applauding them as the deliverers of their country (108). On the other hand, the government of Scotland summoned them to appear, and answer in a judicial way, for what they had done. In this situation things remained from May to November, when the Governor, wearied out by the clamours of the Queen and of the Clergy, marched at length with a body of forces to besiege the castle, which he did for somewhat more than three months, but to no purpose; and therefore he raised it, in order to go to Edinburgh to hold a convention of the Estates, which he had summoned to be held in February. It may seem strange, that so small a body of men, should be so long able to hold out such a place against the force of a whole kingdom; but then we are to consider, that at the very time they seized it, the Cardinal had just repaired and fortified the place, and had filled the magazines, that it might be in a condition to resist the English, in case they should land upon that coast. Besides this, they were very well supplied from England, whither they sent Mr Henry Balnaves as their agent, and they had also another security against the Governor, which was their finding his eldest son in the castle, whom they kept for their security, and in the nature of a hostage, as the Cardinal had formerly done for his (109). But that these men were not such virtuous and godly people, as the history of the Reformation, and some other writers represent them, appears very clearly from what Mr Buchanan tells us of their behaviour, after the Governor had raised his siege. 'They who held the castle, says he, being thus out of all fear of their enemy, did not only make frequent excursions into the neighbouring parts, and commit depredations with fire and sword all round, but as if the liberty gotten by their arms, were to be spent in whoredom, adulteries, and such vices, they ran into all wickedness which idle persons are subject to; for they measured right or wrong by no other rule but their own lust, neither could they be reclaimed by John Knox, who then came to them, and often warned them that God would not be mocked, but would take severe punishments on those who were violators of his laws, even by those whom they least dreamed of; yet his exhortations could not stop the course of their impiety (110).' The success they had in defending themselves, did not hinder their listening to propositions made them for surrendering the place upon reasonable conditions, amongst which one was, that they should have an absolution from Rome, which came over in June 1547, conceived, in other respects, in very strong terms, but because the crime of which they had been guilty was stiled, irremissible, they refused to accept it, alledging, that if the crime was unpardonable, they could reap no benefit from a pardon. The truth of the matter was, that they had now from England settled pay for the soldiers in the castle, at the rate of 1180 l. for the half year, besides good pensions for the principal persons, so that they thought there was no haste necessary in making terms (111). But it was not long before they changed their opinion, for, when they least expected it, a fleet arrived from France, commanded by Leon Strozzi, who blocked up the castle on one side, as the Governor did with his army on the other. They were now in earnest to reduce the place, and therefore planted some of their artillery in the steeples, which had a terrible effect, and what increased their calamity was, the breaking out of the plague in the place itself, by which many were carried off. These misfortunes drove them to such distress, that by the end of July they were content to surrender, but chose to do it by capitulation with the French, who granted them no other terms than preserving their lives and carrying them over to France, where they were to be set at liberty to go where they would (112). By this agreement the French became possessed not only of all the Cardinal's wealth and rich furniture, but of all that many of these people had in the world, which from a notion of security they had brought into the castle. As soon as they had evacuated the place, and the French fleet was sailed, the castle of St Andrew's, in pursuance of an act of council, was demolished, out of respect, as was generally given out, to an injunction of the canon law, which directs, that the place where a Cardinal has been slain shall be ruined and laid level with the ground; but the Governor and Council however proceeded on a much better and more substantial reason, which was an apprehension that the English, who at this time invaded their country both by land and sea, might make themselves masters of this fortress, and from thence infest and destroy all the neighbouring country, which was very open and defenceless (113).

[R] His court to the Cardinals and other Ecclesiasticks.] The humour of discovering God's judgments in all remarkable events was very strong at this time, as has been largely shewn in the course of this article; but it must be allowed that Dempster outdoes all the attempts of this kind in the following instance (114). 'This great Prelate, as he tells us, being slain by barbarous Hereticks in his bed-chamber, his principal persecutor Lesly pissed in his mouth, and afterwards caused his dead body, in his Cardinal's robes, to be hanged against a wall, and exposed it to sacrilegious insults; for which, however, God afterwards inflicted due punishments, since none of these wicked murderers escaped a violent death: As for Lesly himself falling dead from his steed, the horse, which was a wonderful thing, staled in his mouth, shewing thereby the certainty and severity (though sometimes delayed) of divine vengeance.' It falls out, not a little unluckily for Dempster, that he fixes on the only person, who, supposing this doctrine to have some foundation, was most likely to have escaped such a particular judgment, and that for this plain reason; that, so far as we know, he was the only one concerned in the Cardinal's murder, who gave public marks of his sincere repentance. For Bishop Lesley (115) tells us, that he was wrought on while in heat of passion to resolve upon this action, and that being ever afterwards disturbed with a remorse of conscience, he laboured by all means possible to atone for what was passed, by doing good to the friends and relations of the deceased Cardinal. But to shew the falsehood of the fact, and thereby remove entirely the credit of this strange story, does not speak at all favourably of the Cardinal, seems to give into this opinion, concluding his account of that great Prelate's death with this observation (1). Indeed, few or none of those who had an hand in that work escaped an extraordinary judgment, God thereby declaring, that howsoever it please him, in the execution of his judgments, to use sometimes the ministry and service of men, yet doth he not allow of their wicked disposition, and for the most part, faileth not to reward them with the same, or the like, that they do unto others.

it will be requisite to give a short account of what became of Norman Lord Lesly to the time of his death. While he remained in the castle, he had a pension allowed him by King Henry VIII of two hundred and eighty pounds, which he also enjoyed during the reign of King Edward VI, but upon the accession of Queen Mary an order of council was made, not only to stop the payment of all Scotch pensions, but also to oblige such as had received them to leave the kingdom by a day certain, upon which he sent over a gentleman to offer his service to King Henry the Second of France in his wars against the Emperor (116), which was readily accepted on account of his known reputation for personal courage; and Bishop Lesley tells us expressly, that he did this with a view to wipe off the stain he had brought upon his family, by being engaged in the slaughter of the Cardinal, for which his father the Earl of Rothes had been brought to his trial, and acquitted. In these wars he distinguished himself most remarkably, and we have the following account of the manner of his death from Sir James Melvil*, a man of great honour, and an eye-witness of it. 'The Constable of France, says he, having besieged the city of Reny, and the Emperor having come to their relief, Norman Lesly, Master of Rothes, won great reputation, for with thirty Scotsmen he rode up the hill upon a fair grey gelding; he had above his coat of black velvet his coat of armour, with two broad white crosses, the one before, and the other behind, with sleeves of mail, and a red bonnet upon his head, whereby he was known and seen afar off by the Constable, the Duke of Anguin, and the Prince of Conde, where with his thirty he charged upon sixty horse with culverines, followed but with seven of his number. He in our sight struck five of them from their horses with his spear before it broke, then he drew his sword, and run in amongst them, not valuing their continual shooting, to the admiration of all the beholders. He slew divers of them, and at length, when he saw a company of spearmen coming down against him, he gave his horse the spurs, who carried him to the Constable, and there fell down dead, for he had many shots, and worthy Norman was also shot in divers parts, whereof he died fifteen days after. He was first carried to the King's own tent, where the Duke of Anguin and Prince of Conde told his Majesty, That Hector of Troy was not more valiant than the said Norman, whom the said King would see dressed by his own Chirurgions, and made great moan for him, and so did the Constable and all the rest of the Princes, but no man made more lamentation than the Laird of Grange, who came to the camp the next day after.' But as we have mentioned Sir James Melvil's memoirs upon this occasion, it may not be amiss to give an account from them, also of the death of the Cardinal, which he positively ascribes to King Henry the Eighth, who, he says, perceiving clearly that all his designs on that kingdom were defeated by that man (117), 'he, to be revenged on that Cardinal, dealt with Sir George Douglas and the Earl of Angus, who were but lately returned out of England, where they had resided during the time of their banishment till the death of King James V. These two brothers appearing to be of the Reformed Religion, persuaded Norman Lesly, Master of Rothes, the young Laird of Grange, and John Lesly of Park-hill, who had been persecuted by the said Cardinal for religion, after he had taken their preacher Mr George Wishart, and burnt him at St Andrew's. These, I say, were easily stirred up to slay him, whom they were persuaded to be an enemy to the true religion, to the welfare of the country, and to themselves in particular. This proud Cardinal was slain then in his castle of St Andrew's, so ended all his practices, having obtained nothing but vain travel for his pretences, and sudden death.' If we may give credit to this, the putting the Cardinal to death was no act of patriotism, as Buchanan represents it, but a downright conspiracy against a man that stood in their way, by a few bold Politicians who had very little, if any, religion. This was Archbishop Spotwood's opinion, who, though he was too honest a man to frame, like Dempster, a false story to serve his purpose, yet he has made no scruple of treating the death of Sir William Kirkcaldie of Grange, who in 1573 was hanged in the grass-market of Edinburgh, for holding out the castle against the Earl of Morton, then Regent, as a judgment upon him for the share he had in the death of the Cardinal. His words, which are very remarkable, are these (118). 'Such was the end of Sir William Kirkcaldie of Grange, a man full of valour and courage, who had sometimes done good service to his country against the French, and purchased by that means great honour. But seeking ambitiously to raise his fortunes, and hearkening to perverse counsel, he did break his faith to the Regent who had put him in trust, and thereby lost all his former esteem, and drew upon himself these troubles, wherein he perished. His part was foul in the death of the Cardinal, and for it when he was in his best estate, many did foremed that he should not escape some misfortune.' Bishop Burnet seems to have been governed in his opinion of this action by the same kind of observation, for having stated very fairly what was said for and against it, he concludes (119). The exemplary and signal ends of almost all the conspirators, scarce any of them dying an ordinary death, made all people more inclined to condemn it.

(116) Mackenzie's Lives of Scotch Writers, Vol. III. p. 28.

BEATON, BETON, or rather BETHUNE (JAMES) Archbishop of Glasgow, nephew to the former, being the son of his elder brother, Mr Beaton or Bethune of Balfour (a); a Prelate of great prudence, moderation, and learning, as appears by the high character given him by all his contemporaries, though many differed from him in sentiments, both with respect to Politicks and Religion. He was educated with great care both at home and abroad, but chiefly at Paris, under the eye of Abbot Bethune, then Resident or Minister from James V to Francis I (b). By this means he came very early into business, and was employed in matters of the greatest importance by his uncle, when he came in a manner to govern Scotland. Yet it does not appear, by what intermediate steps he was raised to the great preferment of Archbishop of Glasgow, to which he was consecrated in 1552, as some writers tell us, at Rome, whither very probably he was sent, to lay before the Pope an account of the situation of ecclesiastical affairs after the murder of his uncle (c). The authors of the common Histories of Scotland, mention him as the immediate successor of Gawen Dunbar in that See, in which they are right, but it was after a long vacancy, of which they take not the least notice. For Archbishop Dunbar died June 30, 1547 (d), so that our Prelate did not succeed him till five years afterwards. He was no sooner advanced to this dignity, than he began to be considered as one of the ablest, and at the same time one of the most powerful, persons in the kingdom (e). He had the confidence of the Earl of Arran then Regent; his niece, Mrs Mary Beaton, was the Queen's favourite in France; and in regard to his uncle's memory, as well as his own personal merit, he was highly esteemed by the Queen-Dowager, who was endeavouring to gain the regency of the kingdom, to which, before herself, no woman had ever aspired (f). In order to carry this point, it was judged necessary to procure the consent of the States, to the marriage of the young Queen to the Dauphin, which was accordingly done, though secretly opposed by the Regent, and in the month of December 1557, the same Parliament which had consented to the marriage, appointed also certain Commissioners to be present at it (g). These Commissioners were James Beton, Archbishop of Glasgow; David Panter, Bishop of Ross, then Secretary of State; Robert Reid, Bishop of Orkney, then President of the Session; George Lesly, Earl of Rothes, of the Privy Council; Gilbert Kennedy, Earl of Cassils, Lord High-Treasurer; James Lord Fleming, High-Chamberlain; George Lord Seton; James Stewart, Prior of St Andrew's, the Queen's bastard brother; and James Ereškine of Dun (h). They had very large and strict instructions given them, in reference to the contracts, and other instruments that were to be signed before the marriage, and most evident it is from them, that the States considered this as one of the most arduous commissions, and of the greatest consequence to the nation, ever entrusted to any subjects [A]. In discharge of this commission, most of the persons beforementioned, embarked at Leith the February following, and, not without suffering some loss, and being exposed to much danger, arrived at Paris, where, after many disputes, they were present, at last, at the proposed marriage, between Francis Dauphin of France, and Mary Queen of Scots, which was celebrated April 24, 1558, in the cathedral church of Nôire Dame, the ceremony being performed by the Archbishop of Rouen (i). On the twenty-eighth, the Commissioners took an oath of allegiance to King Francis and Queen Mary, but when the French Court endeavoured to draw them into farther compliances, they shewed a just firmness to their trust, and could not by any means be brought to yield in any thing, to what was inconsistent with their instructions; by which steadiness of theirs all the French schemes were entirely defeated (k) [B]. After all

[A] Of the greatest consequence to the nation ever entrusted to any subjects.] We must, in order clearly to comprehend this, consider the situation of things in that kingdom when this commission was given, and next the nature and design of the commission itself. The young Queen Mary was the last of the line of Stuart, and by her marriage the kingdom was either to obtain much good and a powerful ally, or must be exposed to many and great dangers. We find the States agreed to her marriage with Francis, Dauphin of France, and the business was to provide, that this step might procure as many benefits, and expose the kingdom to as few inconveniencies, as possible; to which end these commissioners were chosen and intrusted. Their commission, which is still preserved, bears date the 14th of December, 1557, and is subscribed by the Governor, the Archbishop of St Andrew's, many of the Nobility, and some of the Commons; and the principal points in their instructions were, I. To obtain from their sovereign Lady Queen Mary, by and with the consent of her Curators, before the marriage, and by and with the advice and consent of the King of France her father-in-law, and the Dauphin her husband afterwards, a full and ample ratification of the act passed in the Parliament held in the convent near Haddington, July 7, 1548, for the transferring the person of her Majesty to France. II. To obtain from the King of France a ratification of the promises made to the Duke of Chastelherault, for so the Governor James Hamilton, Earl of Arran, had been created in that kingdom, for supporting him in his claim to the succession, in case the Queen's Majesty should chance to die without children; to obtain farther, after the marriage, a declaration to the same purpose from the Queen and her husband the Dauphin, as also a full discharge to the said Duke of the dispositions he had made of the publick money, &c. during the time of his regency. III. To obtain from the Queen and Dauphin a promise, in the most ample form, to preserve and keep all the liberties and privileges of the realm of Scotland, and the laws of the same, whole and entire, as in the days of her Majesty's royal ancestors, Kings of Scotland. IV. To obtain from the Queen and her future husband, an ample commission for a Regent to govern the said kingdom of Scotland, according to the laws and privileges above-mentioned. These they did accordingly obtain, in as full and ample manner as they were instructed. But such was the baseness and perfidy of the French court, in the midst of all this seeming candour and fair dealing, that they contrived to defeat these very grants and concessions while they were making. For notwithstanding all the solemn declarations made by that King, and his son the Dauphin, to the Queen, yet in one day, viz. the 4th of April, they made the poor young Queen subscribe the three following papers, viz. one, wherein she makes over the kingdom of Scotland in free gift to the King of France, to be enjoyed by him and his heirs, in case she shall happen to die without children. Another, in which she is made to assign to the King of France the possession of the kingdom of Scotland, after her decease without children, until he shall be reimbursed of a million of pieces of gold, or of any great sum that he shall be found to have expended on her entertainment and education during her abode in France. And a third (the worst of all), by which the Queen declares, that although both before her marriage and after it, in compliance with the desire of her Parliament, she shall sign a declaration touching the lineal succession of her Crown; yet she protests that the genuine sense of her mind is only contained in the two preceding papers. There are authentick copies of all these instruments in a large fair manuscript, preserved in the Advocate's library in Edinburgh, which manuscript contains all the treaties and other publick transactions between the Crowns of France and Scotland, and was by the order of Louis XIV transcribed from the publick records, for, and bestowed on, the Lord Viscount Preston when Ambassador to him from King Charles II, in lieu of a considerable (but usual) present in gold offered him at his departure, and by him so deposited, for preserving these memorable pieces for the satisfaction and benefit of latest posterity.

[B] All the French schemes were entirely defeated.] The French upon this, as well as other great occasions, affected a great shew of candour and good faith in publick transactions, though at the same time they meant nothing less. Thus, soon after the arrival of the commissioners, they proceeded to sign with them the marriage-contract, agreeable to a new commission granted them by the Queen for that purpose, that her own and the Parliament's commissioners for this great affair might be the same. This contract bears date, April 19, 1557 (1), and appoints the Sunday following, viz. the 24th, for the celebration of the marriage, upon which day it was accordingly performed. The jointure assigned by it to the Queen is 60,000 Livres, in case the Dauphin shall die King of France, or a greater sum if such shall be found to have been ever given to a Queen of France. And it provides all their business was dispatched, they began to provide for their return to Scotland, but before they were able to proceed from Dieppe, they lost no less than four of their number, and many likewise of their servants, which happening in a very healthy season, and when there was no sickness in the country, occasioned a very strong suspicion of poison, and the more so, as those died, who declared themselves with most heat against the projects of the French Ministry (l). The Archbishop, with the rest of the surviving Commissioners, arriving on the ninth of October 1558, at Montrose, a Parliament was immediately summoned to meet at Edinburgh on the twenty-ninth of November following. To this Parliament the Archbishop and his three colleagues repaired, and exhibited to the States; the several instruments they brought with them from France, as also, a general Act of Naturalization in favour of all Scotsmen; which papers being read and considered, an Act passed for the general naturalization of the French in Scotland, and then an Act declaring the Parliament's entire and absolute approbation of the Commissioners conduct in every respect (m). The Archbishop of Glasgow, after his return, acted as a Privy-Counsellor to the Queen-Dowager, appointed Regent of the kingdom of Scotland by her daughter, and laboured all he could to maintain peace by fair and equal measures, to which, according to the accounts given us by the best historians, that Princess was sincerely inclined. But by the arts of some, and the open violence of others, the kingdom for the space of three years after, was a scene of fury, faction, fraud, and folly, so that all things ran into confusion, and this chiefly on the score of religion, for which, while in words both sides expressed much zeal, their actions shewed it was little regarded by either. For the Papists on one hand, did all they could to blow up again the flames of persecution, and on the other, the Reformers proceeded with such violence, that they seemed bent upon destroying all monuments of antiquity, under colour of rooting out superstition (n). It was from this disposition, that the Duke of Chastelherault, whom Cardinal Beaton drew from the Reformers, and who was now gone over to them again, came with a great force to Glasgow, in the month of November 1559, and under pretence of pulling down images committed great havoc in the cathedral, and also took possession of the castle (o). But the Archbishop, with the assistance of a few French soldiers, soon recovered the place, but perceiving (that considering his principles) it was not probable he should be able to remain there long in quiet, he began to prepare for a retreat into France, resolving to carry with him the treasures and records of his archiepiscopal See, which accordingly he did, in the month of July 1560 (p), and carefully deposited what he carried, in the Scots college at Paris [C]. On his arrival in France, he was extremely well received by Queen Mary,

The eldest daughter (in case there be no sons) to be Queen of Scotland only, and to be given in marriage by the advice of the King of France and the Estates of Scotland, and besides her inheritance of this kingdom, to have, as a daughter of France, 400,000 crowns in portion, and each younger daughter 300,000 crowns. After the death of her husband, the Queen to be at liberty either to remain in France, or to return into Scotland at her pleasure, and to carry along with her her servants, cloaths, jewels, and such other things as belong to a Queen of France, and to have her jointure duly paid her in what place soever she shall chuse to abide. The commissioners from Scotland to give presently after the marriage, in name of the Estates of Scotland, an oath of fidelity to the Dauphin during the subsisting of the marriage, and the Dauphin shall bear the name and title of King of Scotland, and have his arms quartered with those of Scotland, and when he comes to be King of France shall bear the title and arms of the two kingdoms of France and Scotland united under one crown. And to this all parties concerned did likewise promise and swear. The marriage being celebrated, it was now thought time to try what might be done with the commissioners, in order to bring them to promote the great design of the Guises, which was under colour of this marriage to gain the entire possession of Scotland. The whole is succinctly related by a great Historian thus (2). 'The court of France, says he, for some days being transported with the nuptial revels, when they came to themselves called the Scots Ambassadors into council, where the Chancellor of France dealt with them to produce the crown and the other ensigns of royalty, and that the Queen's husband should be created King of Scotland according to custom. To whom the Ambassadors answered in short, That they had received no commands concerning those matters. The Chancellor replied, That no more was desired of them at present than what was in their power, viz. That when this matter came to be debated in the parliament of Scotland,

' they would give their suffrages in the affirmative, and give it under their hands that they would do so. That demand seemed to be fuller of peremptoriness than the former, and therefore they thought it best to reject it with great vehemence and disgust, inso-much that their answer was, That their embassy was limited by certain instructions and bounds, which they neither could or would transgress; but if they had been left free without any restriction at all, yet it was not the part of faithful friends to require that of them which they could not grant without certain infamy and treachery, tho' there were no danger of life in the case. That they were willing to gratify the French, their old allies, as far as the just laws of amity required, and therefore they desired them to keep within the same bounds of moderation in making their demands.' This is a very clear testimony to the honour and fidelity of the Archbishop and the rest of the commissioners, and from the same author we have a farther account of what happened to them afterwards, which we shall give the reader in his own words (3). 'Thus the Ambassadors were dismissed the court, and though they hastened home as soon as they could, yet before they went a shipboard, four of the chief of them, Gilbert Kennedy, George Lefly, Robert Reid, and James Fleming, all brave men and true patriots, departed this life, as did likewise many of their retinue, not without suspicion of poison. It was thought that James, the Queen's brother, had also taken the same dose, for although, by reason of the strength of his constitution and his youth, he escaped death at that time, yet he lay under a constant weakness of stomach as long as he lived.'

[C] Carefully deposited what he carried, in the Scots college at Paris. It was certainly a very wise and prudent step in the Archbishop to secure his church-plate from being plundered under pretence of Reformation. The violences of those times were such, that it was with much difficulty private property was preserved, and as to publick offices and preferments, they were coveted only for the sake of what went along with them; and though there might be many zealous now Sovereign also of that country, and by all the Court of France to whom he was before known. Immediately after his departure, the Protestants in Scotland named Mr John Willock to preach at Glasgow, seized all the revenues of the archbishoprick, and afterwards proceeded against the person of our Prelate (g). As his return to his own country was by this means rendered in a manner impracticable, and as his fidelity and capacity were well known to the Queen his mistress, she resolved after the death of the King her consort, and her going back to her hereditary dominions, to leave her affairs in France in his hands (r). Accordingly, in 1561, he was declared her Ambassador to the most Christian King, and on the first of June 1564, that commission was renewed (s), under which he acted as long as her Majesty lived, and having most carefully preserved her letters, those of her Ministers, and other papers of state communicated to him during that time; these form at once the most complete, the most curious, and most authentick memoirs of that unfortunate reign, that are still any where remaining (t). The publishing this collection entire, would be unquestionably a great and acceptable service to the lovers of true and genuine History [D]. While he remained at Paris in quality of Ambassador in words, yet very few in their hearts had any real concern for the good of their country. The Archbishop saw and considered this, which induced him to take advantage of the going over of the French troops out of Scotland, in pursuance of a solemn agreement for that purpose, to transport himself, his effects, and the treasury of his church, which it would have been very difficult, if not impracticable for him to have carried away at another time (4). It is impossible for us to give any exact account of what was then taken away, but the best writers agree, that the church of Glasgow was very rich in plate of all sorts, and we are particularly told that they had an image of Jesus Christ made of gold, and the twelve Apostles in silver (5). Besides the plate, he carried away all the writings, evidences, and records, belonging to his See, which by this means were preserved from destruction: Amongst these there were two chartularies, one of which, from its character, as well as its contents, is judged to be above 500 hundred years old; and the other, commonly called The Red Book of Glasgow, was certainly written in the time of King Robert III. There were besides many original charters, particularly one of King David I, with the seal well preserved, as also bulls from the Popes, and the grants to and from the Bishops of this See, from the time of its first erection (6). All these the Archbishop, soon after his arrival in France, placed in the monastery of the Carthusians, founded by a Bishop of Murray in 1325, and which has been since known to the world by the name of the Scotch college at Paris, to which he was himself so liberal a benefactor, that he has been esteemed a second founder, and besides what he bestowed in his life-time, bestowed upon it at his death no less a sum than 80,000 livres for the maintenance of poor scholars of his own nation (7). There are certainly very ample and authentick marks of a disposition in that Prelate very suitable to his dignity, and it was this behaviour that gave him such credit at the French court as he could never have obtained by less honest arts. This procured for him a rich abbey in Poictou, the treasurer-ship of St Hilary the Great in the capital of that province, and the priory of St Peter's, which furnished him with the means of living decently, and affording some assistance to such of his countrymen as were driven by the confusions at home to seek for safety and a subsistence abroad (8). His behaviour in all respects was so prudent, and so free from any imputations of pride, self-interest and revenge, that though he always continued faithful to the Queen his mistress, and expressed the greatest zeal upon all occasions for her service, yet we find little or nothing said to his prejudice by such as were enemies to her and to all her adherents, which is a manifest proof that virtue is its own reward, and that men who behave with duty to their benefactors, moderation towards the rest of the world, and are charitable in their opinions of such as differ from them, may not only secure peace and tranquillity in the place of their exile, but also raise to themselves a reputation equal, if not superior to what would have waited upon them in better fortune. There is one thing ought to be added before I close this note, which is, that the Archbishop, at the time he deposited the valuable effects of his See with the Carthusians at Paris, took care to make a declaration that it was in trust only, and and for the benefit of his successors, in case that any time thereafter the Romish religion should prevail in Scotland (9), of which he was too wise a man to have any great hopes then; and as there is no sort of probability of it now, it would be well if the papers there, of a publick nature, were committed to the press, the only way by which they can be made useful.

[D] To the lovers of true and genuine history. As the Archbishop of Glasgow resided in quality of Ambassador from Queen Mary and King James, from 1560 to 1603, and was all that time in the highest confidence with those Princes, it might well be supposed that his papers would afford a curious and authentick collection, of the most important facts relating to the history of those times, from which most of the printed histories might receive, what it is plain they very much want, correction; and in this respect our Prelate was no less careful, than he had been with regard to the records of his Church, though it should seem that equal attention was not paid to this last collection of papers, by which they have suffered much, though they are still very valuable, and are capable of affording us many particulars not to be met with elsewhere. The best account that can be given the reader of these memoirs, in the condition they are now in, is the following letter from a person resident in the Scotch college to the reverend Mr Keith, dated Paris, May 25, 1733 (10).
 ' For your farther information as to the remains of the ' last Archbishop of Glasgow, our second founder, I ' must tell you, that though all or almost all his papers
 ' and letters of negotiations should naturally have come ' to this house, to which he left the small remains of ' his fortune, to wit, his moveables, yet it happens ' that many of these papers were scattered and want' ing before our time by several chances, and 'tis even
 ' much that there is even so many remaining as yet.
 ' The first time I had occasion to see them here, in or ' about A. D. 1686 or 1687, they were lying in con' fused heaps or bundles in old trunks without locks, in ' a wardrobe exposed to all hands, and thus they had
 ' lain for about eighty years after the Archbishop's
 ' death; and besides that, many of them were carried ' off by curious or unskilled people during that time,
 ' as I found by some important papers found in a
 ' Scots gentleman's house in the country, the remains ' of which I recovered. Besides, I say, accidents ' which happened to them since the Archbishop's
 ' death, I find by Counsellor Blackwood's letter to the ' Archbishop, that he had the use of many important
 ' pieces concerning Queen Mary in the Archbishop's
 ' own time, whilst he was writing at Poictiers the apo' logy for that Queen, and so of others. But as I
 ' formerly wrote to you to prevent farther dilapidations
 ' of these papers in time to come, after reading them
 ' all over, and ranging them in order of time, we have ' caused to bind them up in volumes, and cyphered the ' pages. The chief reason why I take notice to you ' of the loss made before our time of many of them,
 ' by the little concern and care our predecessors had of ' them, is to answer an objection made to me more ' than once, That it would seem that Queen Mary's ' cause was not sufficiently justifiable, since there were ' no more important pieces for her justification to be ' met with now among the Archbishop her trustee's pa' pers. And I doubt not but that there were many
 ' and more important pieces among them when the ' Archbishop

of Scotland, he received very little, if any thing, from thence; for we find Mr James Boyd appointed Superintendent of that diocese after the death of Mr Willock, and upon the death of Mr Boyd in 1578, it was bestowed on Mr Robert Montgomery, who, tho' a zealous Protestant, was so persecuted by his brethren for accepting a bishoprick, that in 1587 he resigned it to Mr Ereskine, by whom the best part of the revenues of the See, were granted away to the family of Lenox (u). But not long after, King James VI becoming of age, and having a full account of our author's fidelity to his mother, restored him both to the title and estate of his archbishoprick, of which he had been so long deprived. Before this, however, he had obtained several ecclesiastical preferments in France (w), for the support of his dignity, which he enjoyed as long as he lived, King James continuing him there as his Ambassador, to whom he rendered many, and those too important services. He was universally and deservedly esteemed for his learning, loyalty, and hearty affection to his country (x). He was uniform in his conduct, sincere in his religion, and unblamable in his morals. He was unfortunate in many respects, but more especially in being driven from the cathedral chair, and from his country; but wonderfully happy in this, that he lived in credit abroad, beloved and admired by all parties, and left his memory unstained to posterity [E]. He died April 24, 1603, aged eighty-six, and was succeeded in his See by that grave and worthy Prelate Mr John Spotwood.

' Archbishop died than now remain.' We shall have frequent occasion to make use of several of these letters in different parts of this work, that will sufficiently shew both the nature and the value of this collection, which certainly deserves the character that is given it by a learned and ingenious Prelate, who has done great justice to the histories and antiquities of Scotland, and who, speaking of the papers in the Scots college at Paris, makes use of these words, viz. (11) ' There are also letters and minutes of the said Archbishop (digested in a good orderly manner), which might furnish out a valuable history of the troubled face of affairs during all his ministry, and (consequently) afford some of the best lights for the history of a couple of reigns which were both full of extraordinary occurrences.' It might be added, that from these papers most of the dates in which the printed histories are so remarkably perplexed and deficient, may be set right, which alone would be a singular conveniency, and would contribute more than could well be imagined to the clearing up things within that period of time, by shewing what facts might possibly be true, and what could not be so, let there be what authorities there will to support them. For the Historians of those times, writing mostly in a declamatory stile, very frequently join facts of a like nature, though long spaces of time intervened between them.

[E] Left his memory unstained to posterity. If our Archbishop was restored to the revenues of his See, as some writers suggest, for the ten or twelve last years of his life, he might have grown rich, since, according to the best accounts I have been able to meet with, those revenues might amount at that time to about four thousand pounds a year Scots money; but I rather believe that he received but a part, and that the family of Lenox kept the rest. His benefices in France must likewise have suffered during the civil wars in that kingdom, and without doubt his interest was not so great under the reign of Henry IV, upon account of his connections with the house of Guise, from which, by the mother's side, the Queen his mistress was descended. His age and experience made him, however, respected to the last, for in these he had scarce any equal, as his epitaph takes notice (12). For he had sat Archbishop of Glasgow fifty-one years, and had been forty-two honoured with a publick character at the court of France, where he had seen a succession of six Kings, and had transacted publick affairs under five of them. He was likewise so fortunate as to see that accomplished which had been long the object of his wishes, that is to say, the succession of King James to the crown of England, very soon after which he died. The popish writers give him, as we may naturally expect, a very high character; but that which seems to do him most honour, is, the account, which remains of him in his successor Archbishop Spotwood's writings (13). ' A man, says he, honourably disposed, faithful to the Queen while she lived, and to the King her son; a lover of his country, and liberal, according to his means, to all his countrymen. In his last will he bequeathed all his means to pious uses, leaving, as was said, ten thousand crowns for the education of poor scholars, being Scotsmen born. The evidences, vessels, and ornaments to the See of Glasgow, he consigned in the hands of the Carthusians of Paris, appointing the same to be re-delivered how soon Glasgow should become catholick, and this year, being the sixty-sixth of his age, departed peaceably this life.' The reader will observe, that here is a mistake of no less than twenty years as to the age of our Prelate, who, at the time of his decease, instead of sixty was eighty-six, and faults of the like kind occur very frequently in the works of this author, which however are not to be ascribed to any negligence in him, but to the books being printed from a very incorrect copy, that which the Archbishop had prepared himself for the press, and which is still preserved, being remarkably fair and perfectly exact. Mr Middleton, who wrote an appendix to Spotwood's history, speaks therein of Archbishop Beaton in the following terms (14). ' He was a person honourably disposed, faithful to Queen Mary while she lived, and to King James, whose Ambassador he was, a lover of his country, and liberal, according to his means, to all his countrymen. He died 1613, a full jubilee of years from his consecration.' We might add many more authorities of the same kind if they were necessary. As he had much time upon his hands, especially in the latter part of his life, he composed several books, which are still preserved, tho' none of them have been ever published. Their titles are (15), I. Commentary on the Books of Kings. II. A Lamentation for the Kingdom of Scotland. III. A Book of Controversies against the Sectaries. IV. Observations upon Gratian's Decretals. V. A Collection of Scotch Proverbs. These we have upon the credit of Dempster, who was very likely to be well acquainted with what relates to this Prelate, considering how long he resided himself at Paris, and the opportunities he had of enquiring into all the facts he has set down concerning him. Thus we have given the reader a much larger and more distinct account of this remarkable family of the Beatons, than hath been until now any where published, and have set a great many facts, that have hitherto been misrepresented, in their proper lights, which we hope will be so much the more satisfactory to the learned and inquisitive reader, as we have thereby had an opportunity to clear up many perplexed points of history within the compass of one hundred years, which will therefore excuse the length of these articles, as they could not have been curtailed without omitting many useful and curious particulars that lay scattered in a multitude of books that required much time to peruse, and could not have been collected without difficulty. B E A U C H A M P, in Latin de Bello Campo, a very noble English family, transplanted hither from Normandy at the Conquest (a). One of the first of this race mentioned in our Histories, is Hugh de Beauchamp, who received from Duke William, after he subdued this kingdom, lands of great extent, for by the general survey it appears, that he was possessed of Belinghou, in Hertfordshire; Linclade, Solebery, and Catebery, in Buckinghamshire; and of forty-three lordships in Bedfordshire (b). Another nobleman of this family was Walter de Beauchamp, who had likewise large grants made him, and whose capital seat was Elmley in Worcestershire. This Walter, as we learn from an author of good credit, was related to the Conqueror, who therefore enriched him, as he did others of his countrymen, at the expence of the English (c). There seems indeed to be no doubt, that Hugh and Walter de Beauchamp were of the same family, and they appear to have been equally favoured by Duke William their master; yet their fortunes were very different, for the family of the former soon extinguished in the male line of the eldest branch, and the descendants of a younger branch, so divided and diminished the lands that came to them from their ancestors, as to lose the degree of Barons, so that we know very little or nothing of their posterity (d). But in regard to Walter de Beauchamp, he married a lady of the name of Talbot, and by her had several children, whose posterity came to have large estates, and to be honoured with many high titles (e) in this kingdom, though the male line seems to be now extinct. We might be thought inexcusable if we should take no notice of the great men of this family, who at several times bore the titles of Earls and Dukes of Warwick, Lords Bergavenny, Powyke, Holt, Bletsho, St Amand, Essex, and Hacch, and at the same time, if we should pretend to give an exact account of all these, it would swell this work beyond its due bounds. We shall therefore endeavour to avoid both these inconveniencies, by giving a concise account of such of this noble family, as make the greatest figure in our Histories, and refer the reader for an account of the rest, to Sir William Dugdale, who has treated of them largely in his Baronage of England (f).

B E A U C H A M P (RICHARD DE) Earl of Warwick, and one of the most considerable persons in this kingdom in the XVth century, was descended from a series of illustrious ancestors both by father and mother, and enjoyed, in virtue of that descent, very large estates in different parts of the kingdom (a) [A]. He was born January 28, 1381,

In order to keep this article as much within bounds as it is possible, we have chosen to give an account of this noble Earl's descent in a note. Walter de Beauchamp, of Helmely-castle, mentioned in the former article, had a son named William, who in the wars, after the death of King Henry I, adhered to the Empress Maud against King Stephen. He was hereditary Sheriff of Worcestershire, which descended to him from his mother, and he had a grant of the town and castle of Tamworth in Warwickshire for the good services he did the Princess before-mentioned. He was also in great favour with King Henry the Second, and executed various high offices in his reign (1). He was succeeded by his son of the same name, of whom we find nothing remarkable. His son Walter, in the time of King John, was Governor of Hanley-castle in Worcestershire, but afterwards took part with the Barons against that Prince, and his son King Henry III, but was at length reconciled to him, and died in the year 1236 (2). He was succeeded in all his possessions by his son William, who was in great favour with King Henry. This William de Beauchamp married Isabella, sister to William Mauduit Earl of Warwick, and by her had issue another William de Beauchamp, who upon the death of the said Earl took the title of Warwick in his father's life-time, which Sir William Dugdale thinks was by the King's special favour, for that otherwise he could not have borne it 'till the death of his mother (3). We do not know exactly the time of this Lord Beauchamp of Helmely's death, but we find, that on the 9th of February, 1268, William Earl of Warwick did homage to King Henry III, for the lands descended to him by his father's death. (4). This Earl, during the reign of King Edward I, was principally employed in awing the Welsh, with whom he had many engagements, and in the year 1295 gave them a great defeat near Montgomery (5). He afterwards served the King in his wars against the Scots and French with great reputation. He married the daughter of Richard Fitz-John, Justice of Ireland, and had by her several manors in Wiltshire, Northamptonshire, and Bucks, besides a large estate in Thomond (6). He departed this life in May, 1298, leaving his son Guy, so called no doubt from the famous Saxon Guy Earl of Warwick, aged 26 years. He, the very same year that his father died, attended the King into Scotland, and was present at the battle of Falkirk, where he behaved so well, that the King gave him all the lands, of which three Scots Lords were possessed, on the day upon which it was fought, which was the 22d of July (7). He served that Monarch several years after in that country with such fidelity and success, that, as a reward for his services, he obtained a grant to himself and his heirs of Bernard-castle in the Bishoprick of Durham, together with the town and lordship, with the manor of Middleton and the chaces thereto belonging, and the manor of Gainsford, which lands were held for life by the wife of Hugh de Baliol, as also all the lands held by the wife of Alexander de Baliol, which were to have descended to John de Baliol, then the King's enemy and rebel (8). In the reign of King Edward II he was one of the nobility who seized Piers Garveston, the King's favourite, at Scardeburgh, of which the King having notice, he sent to desire they would spare his life, which the Lords, at the request of the Earl of Pembroke, agreed to do, and thereupon delivered him into the hands of that Earl, who sent him to Wallingford, from whence he was again taken by our Earl Guy, who carried him back to Warwick-castle, where, having conferred with some of the Lords, and persuaded them they could not be safe while this man lived, he caused him to be conveyed to Blacklow-hill, about a mile from Warwick, and there cut off his head. It seems this great favourite had a particular spleen to the Earl, and was wont to call him in derision the Black Dog of Arden, for which, as we have seen, he paid with his life (9). The Earl thought fit notwithstanding this bold step, to demand a pardon from the King, who was obliged to grant it him, but never loved him afterwards (10). They did not however live long together, for on the 12th of August, 1315, the Earl died at his castle of Warwick, as some insinuate, of poison (11). He left behind him by Alice his wife, sister and heir of Robert de Tony (by whom another great estate was brought into the family), several children, particularly two sons, Thomas and John, the former of which was scarce two years old at his father's death, and therefore the King's great favourite, Hugh le Despenser, had the custody of his lands, and probably of his person; but after the ruin of that great favourite, in the beginning of the next reign, the Lord Mortimer obtained the custody of Warwick-castle, and the rest of this young Lord's

1381, at the manor-house of Salwarpe in the county of Worcester, and had for his god-fathers, King Richard II, and Richard Scroope, then Bishop of Coventry and Lichfield, and afterwards Archbishop of York (b). He was made Knight of the Bath at the coronation of King Henry IV, in the year 1399 (c), and in the fourth year of the same reign he had livery of his lands, and was retained to serve the King one whole year, with one hundred men at arms, and three hundred archers (d). The next year which was 1404, on the coronation of the Queen, he kept, according to the custom of those times, Jufts, in which he behaved himself very gallantly. He was called the same year to do the crown more serious service, in that dangerous rebellion raised by Owen Glendowr, against whom he behaved bravely, and took his standard in open battle. He was likewise in the famous battle at Shrewsbury, against the Percies, where he gained great honour (e), and was, not long after, made Knight of the Garter (f). In 1408, he obtained a licence from King Henry IV, to visit the Holy Sepulchre at Jerusalem, in pursuance of a vow he had made, and set out with a splendid retinue for that purpose. He took the Court of Bar in his way, the Duke being his cousin, by whom he was nobly entertained for a week, and then that Prince accompanied him to Paris (g), where he was very graciously received by Charles VI, King of France, with whom he dined on a high festival, and at his departure was attended by a Herald, who was charged to conduct him safely through that realm (h). Upon his entering Lombardy, he was met by another Herald from Sir Pandulph Malacet, or Malet, with a challenge to perform certain feats of arms with him at Verona, upon a day assigned, for the Order of the Garter, which he accepted, and having performed his pilgrimage at Rome, returned to that city, where, in the presence of Sir Galeot of Mantua, he first engaged Sir Pandulph with spears, and afterwards with battle-axes, in which combat Sir Pandulph received a dangerous wound on the shoulder, and had been killed out-right, if Sir Galeot had not interposed and cried Peace (i). He went from thence to Venice, where he was most nobly entertained by the Doge; and then pursued his journey to Jerusalem. He had much respect shewn him in that city by the Patriarch's Deputy, and having performed his devotions and offerings at the Holy Sepulchre, he set up his arms on the north side of the Temple, where they long after remained (k). He was also very respectfully treated by the Soldan's Deputy, and between them there passed many reciprocal acts of kindness [B]. From Jerusalem lands, on account of a marriage intended between him and a daughter of that Lord's (12). And two years afterwards the King received his homage by special favour, as if he had been of full age, though only in his seventeenth year, when he took upon him his hereditary offices of Sheriff of Worcestershire, and Chamberlain of the Exchequer (13). Before he was twenty the King made him Governor of Guernsey, and the little islands adjacent (14). He attended the King in his wars in Scotland and in France, and was present and did great service in the famous sea-fight in 1340 (15). In the eighteenth of Edward III he was constituted Sheriff of Warwick and Leicestershire for life, and the very same year was created Earl Marshal of England (16). At the famous battle of Cressley he commanded the van of the English army, and afterwards, for the great service he performed at the siege of Calais, he had a thousand marks a year granted him during life. He was present after this in the famous battle of Poitiers, where the King of France was taken prisoner, and where our Earl fought so long, that his hand was extremely galled with using his sword and poll-axe, but he had the good fortune to take prisoner William de Meleun, Archbishop of Seinz, for whom he received as a ransom eight thousand pounds (17). He attended Edward the Black Prince in several campaigns after this, and in the year 1360 he passed through France with a train of six hundred horse in his passage to the east, where he made war against the Infidels for three years, and at his return into England brought with him the son of the Prince of Lithuania, who was christened at London by the name of Thomas, the Earl being his godfather (18). This noble Earl and his brother John were two of the first Knights of the Garter, and we find that he continued in high favour with the Sovereign, and in the exercise of his military virtues, to the time of his decease, which happened on November 13, 1369, of the Plague, at the time that he commanded the King's army in France (19). He had by his Countess Catherine, daughter of Roger Earl of March, five sons and nine daughters. His eldest son Guy died in his life-time; the third son, Reynburne, died a little after him; William, his fourth son, was created Lord Bergavenny, and married the sister and co-heiress of Thomas Earl of Arundel; his fifth son, Roger, died young. Seven of his daughters married into the greatest families in the kingdom, Catherine, the youngest but one, became a Nun at Wroxhall, and Juliana died a maid (20). Thomas, his second son, who succeeded him as Earl of Warwick, served King Edward III in his wars with great reputation, and succeeded his father as Governor of the island of Guernsey. In the third year of Richard II he was chosen by the Commons in parliament to be Governor of the King, who was then young (21), and when that Prince afterwards took the government into his own hands, he treated this noble Lord so ill, that he was constrained to join with Thomas Earl of Gloucester, the King's uncle, to compel him to rule by law, in which, though he succeeded at that time, yet the King gave him afterwards such marks of his displeasure, as induced him to retire to his own estate (22). At this time he built the stately tower at the north-east corner of Warwick-castle, the cost of which amounted to (23) three hundred ninety-five pounds, five shillings and two-pence. But though he no longer intermeddled with publick affairs, yet the hatred the King bare him was so strong, that having by an invitation to dinner got him into his power (24), he intended to put him to death, but was afterwards prevailed upon by the Earl of Salisbury to send him prisoner to the Isle of Man, from whence he was very soon removed to the tower of London, and the King granted his fine castle of Warwick to Thomas Holland Duke of Surrey (25). After King Richard was deposed, he recovered his liberty, was restored to his estate, and had a grant of all the goods, which the Duke of Surrey had at Warwick (26). This noble Earl, who was also a Knight of the Garter, spent the remainder of his days in peace, having a great reputation for his valour, publick spirit, piety, and charity, as saith John Rous the Historian of this family, and departed this life, April 8, 1401 (27), lying buried under a noble monument in the fourth part of the collegiate church at Warwick, built by himself, and wherein also lies his Countess Margaret, daughter of William Ferrers, of Groby (28), by whom he had Richard de Beauchamp Earl of Warwick, his only son, who is the subject of this article, to whom descended all the great estates this family had acquired by marriage, and which by the same means he much augmented, as will be shewn in it's proper place.

[B] Between whom there passed many reciprocal acts of kindness. This part of the story is thus given us by Sir William Dugdale, from the memoirs of John Rous

he came back to Venice, and was there nobly received. Thence travelled he into Russia, Lithuania, Poland, Prussia, Westphalia, and some countries of Germany, shewing great valour in divers tournaments whilst he was in those parts (l). And no sooner returned into England, but that he was, by indenture dated 2 October, 12 Hen. IV, retained with Henry Prince of Wales, afterwards King by the name of Henry V, to serve him as well in times of peace as war, both in this realm, upon, and beyond the seas, and two hundred and fifty marks per annum, to be paid out of the Prince's Exchequer at Caermarthen, at Easter and Michaelmas, by even portions: and whensoever he should be in that Prince's Court, to have four Esquires and six Yeomen with him, and diet there for them all; provided that the Prince, in service of war, should have the third part of what he got in battle, and the third of the thirds of what his men at arms should gain; and in case he took any great commander, fort, or castle, the Prince likewise to have them, giving him reasonable satisfaction (m). He was also appointed, in conjunction with the Bishop of Durham and others, the same year, to manage a treaty with the King of Scots (n). At the ceremony of the new King's coronation, he was constituted Lord High-Steward, as the patent expresses it, for his known wisdom and indefatigable industry (o). One would have imagined, that by these great employments he should have been sufficiently employed, and yet in this same year 1413, we find him one of the King's Commissioners into France, to treat of a solid peace between the two kingdoms, to be strengthened and cemented by a marriage, between the King his master, and the Princess Catherine, daughter to the King of France (p). In the second year of Henry V, when the Lollards, as they were then called, created some disturbances, he, amongst others of the nobility, took up arms on that occasion, and was very instrumental in reducing them to their duty (q). In the year 1415, he was declared Captain of Calais, an office of great trust and honour in those days, and never conferred but upon a man of known abilities as a soldier, and of a clear unquestionable character in point of fidelity; and in such case, there was a contract in writing between the King and this Captain, whereby the former undertook to pay, and the latter to keep in constant order and readiness, such a garrison as was thought requisite, by which means it was very easy to discover where the fault lay, if any miscarriage happened; and, on the other hand, a Governor had it always in his power to demonstrate his innocence, if maliciously accused by his enemies of ill conduct (r) [C]. While the Earl of Warwick commanded in Calais, there was a report, that the French were drawing troops together with a view to besiege that fortress; which occasioned his putting himself hastily into a posture of defence, but learning afterwards that this was an alarm only, and that the French forces were actually marched another way, he, to cover his former preparations, and to prevent the French from perceiving his mistake, gave out, that he meant no more than to exercise some feats of chivalry, according to the custom of those times, and so turned this accident into a means of acquiring great honour and reputation (s) [D]. Rous (29). 'At the time of his being thus at Jerusalem, a noble person, called Baltredam (the Soldan's Lieutenant), hearing that he was descended from the famous Guy of Warwick, whose story they had in books of their own language, invited him to his palace, and royally feasted him, presented him with three precious stones of great value, besides divers cloaths of silk and gold given to his servants, where this Baltredam told him privately, that he faithfully believed, as he did, though he durst not discover himself, and rehearsed the articles of the Creed. 'But on the morrow he feasted Sir Baltredam's servants, and gave them scarlet, with other English cloth, which being shewed to Sir Baltredam, he returned again to him, and said he would wear his livery and be marshal of his hall. Whereupon he gave Sir Baltredam a gown of black peak furred, and had much discourse with him, for he was skilful in sundry languages.' I must confess there are many circumstances in this short tale that render it in my opinion fabulous, and therefore I did not insert it in the text. But the reader will the better judge what credit is due to this and other relations from the same author, if he consults our article of this John Rous, who was Chaplain at Warwick-castle, and is therefore supposed to have wrote from good memoirs.

[C] If maliciously accused by his enemies of ill conduct. It may not be amiss to give the reader an instance of this manner of proceeding from the present case. Richard de Beauchamp, Earl of Warwick, by indenture (30) bearing date June 19, in the third of Henry V, covenanted to serve the King to February 3, 1416, as Captain of Calais, and to have with him in the time of truce or peace, for the safeguard thereof, thirty men at arms, himself and three Knights, accounted as part of that number, thirty Archers on horseback, two hundred Foot-soldiers, and two hundred Archers, all of his own retinue, besides ten men at arms, and ten Archers on horseback, belonging to the treasurer of Calais, for which service he was to receive for himself six shillings and eight-pence per diem, for his Knights two shillings apiece, for the rest of the horse twelve-pence, for every Archer on horseback and Foot-soldier eight-pence, and for every Archer on foot six-pence per diem for their wages: In which town there was also to be at the King's charge forty cross-bow men, twenty Carpenters, and five Masons, besides Bowyers, with other officers and pensioners; and in time of war, to have one hundred and forty men on horseback, himself, and sixty Knights, accounted part, and one hundred and fifty Archers on horseback, one hundred Foot-soldiers, one hundred and eighty-four Archers on foot, and four Scouts on horseback, for his own retinue, over and above twenty men at arms, and ten Archers on horseback, as also ten Archers on foot, belonging to the same Treasurer, besides Balistiers, Carpenters, &c.

[D] A means of acquiring great honour and reputation. The reader cannot help perceiving, by what has been already related, that this was an age in which knight-errantry flourished, and when even the greatest persons in the kingdom, and those too distinguished by prudence and conduct, as well as intrepidity and courage, thought fit to distinguish themselves in this way; and indeed as this was the case, the Earl of Warwick was to be commended for deceiving the French by so well contrived a stratagem, rather than allow them to think they could not march a body of troops on any side, without alarming the Governor, of Calais. The method he took was this (31). He caused three shields to be made, and in each of them a Lady painted, the first harping at the end of a Bedstead, with a grate of gold on her left sleeve, and her Knight, called the Green Knight, with a black quarter, who was ready to joust with any Knight of France, twelve Courtes having two shields of Purveyance, and his

of his residence in Calais, and the King's sending thither the Bishops of Salisbury, Coventry and Lichfield, Bath and Wells, Norwich, Hereford, and St David's, the Abbot of Westminster, Prior of Worcester, and other learned men; the Earl of Warwick, for their greater honour, escorted them thither, their whole train consisting of eight hundred horse (t). While he remained at Constance, he received a challenge from a great Duke for his Lady's sake, slew the Duke in jousting, whereupon the Empress took his livery; viz. the Bear from one of his Knight's shoulders, and for great favour to him set it on her own shoulder. But he having notice thereof, made one of pearl and precious stones, which being presented to her, she received with great respect (u). Here also it was, that the Emperor Sigismund gave him his sword to bear, and offered him the heart of St George (the Englishman's tutelary Saint) to bring over into this realm, but hearing the Emperor say, that he would come in person into England, he restored it to him again, saying, That the delivery thereof with his own hand, would be much more acceptable. Nor was it long after, that the Emperor did come over accordingly, and being then installed Knight of the most noble Order of the Garter, offered the holy heart at Windsor, which was there kept in great esteem. Upon whose passage hither and return, he was sumptuously entertained at Calais by the Earl, then Captain there, whose behaviour was such, that the Emperor told King Henry, 'That no Christian Prince had such another Knight, for wisdom, courtliness, and manhood; adding, that if all courtesie were lost, yet might it be found again in him.' Inasmuch as ever after, by the same Emperor's authority, he was called the Father of Courtesy (w). In his return from Calais at that time, he took at sea two great carricks. In 4 Henry V, his commission for Captain of Calais, and Governor of the Marches of Picardy was again renewed. In the same year he was one of the chief commanders at the siege of Caen in Normandy, the King himself being there with a great army (x). In 1417, he was constituted one of the King's Commissioners for settling the capitulation of that castle, the same year he was likewise empowered to reduce and receive into the King's obedience several other strong places in that country, which he likewise performed to the great satisfaction of the King, and with great credit to himself (y). In the same year he attended Thomas, Duke of Clarence, General of the King's army into France, where he gave fresh marks of valour, and did several eminent services, for having taken Dampfront, he was the first who entered Caen, which was taken by storm, and set the King's and the Duke of Clarence's ensigns on the walls (z). Then he laid siege to Caudebeck on the river Seine, blocked up the city of Roan by land and water, and reduced Mount Saint Michael, and other strong places, as a reward for which services, the King created him Earl of Aumarle, or, as we usually call it, Albemarle (a). At the siege of Roan his tent stood between the King's pavillion and St Catherine's, which last place being taken, he was appointed to keep port Martevile (b). In the month of May King Henry sent him to the King of France, attended by a thousand men at arms, to treat of a marriage between him and that King's daughter, the Lady Catherine; but the Dauphin knowing that this marriage was intended to defeat his succession, he sent a body of five thousand men under the command of the Earls of Vendosme and Lymosin, to obstruct his passage, to whom the Earl gave battle, in which both of those noblemen were killed, and one of them fell by the Earl of Warwick's own hand, and about two thousand of their troops were either slain or taken (c). He then proceeded on his embassy, in which, notwithstanding the difficulties he had to struggle with, he very happily succeeded his letter sealed with the seal of his arms, the field silver, a manch gules. The second pavice on shield had a Lady sitting at a covered board working pearls, and on her sleeve a glove of plate tacked, her Knight being called Chevalier Vert, having his letter sealed with these arms. The field silver, two bars of gules, who was to joust fifteen courses, and that should be saddles of chains. The third pavice had a Lady sitting in a garden making a chaplet, and on her sleeve a polein with a rivet, her knight being called Chevalier Attendant, who with his fellow must run and course with sharp spears, his letter being sealed with gold, and gules quarterly, and a border Vert; which letter was sent to the King's court of France, where three French Knights received them, and promised their fellows to meet at a day and place assigned, whereof the first was a Knight, called Sir Gerard Horbaumis, who called himself Le Chevalier Rouge; the second a famous Knight, named Sir Hugh Launey, calling himself Le Chevalier Blank, and the third a Knight named Sir Collard Fines. Twelfth-day in Christmas being appointed for the time that they should meet in the land called the Park-hedge of Gyves. On which day this Earl came into the field with his face covered, a plume of Ostrich feathers upon his head, and his horse trapped with the Lord Toney's arms (one of his ancestors), viz. Argent a manch gules, where first encountering with the Chevalier Rouge, at the third course he unhorsed him, and so returned with close vizor unknown to his pavillion, whence he sent to that Knight a good courser. The next day he came into the field with his vizor close, a chaplet on his helmet, and a plume of Ostrich feathers aloft, his horse trapped with the arms of Hanlap, viz. Silver two bars gules, where he met with the Blank Knight, with whom he encountered, snote off his vizor thrice, broke his bisagurs and other harness, and returned victoriously to his pavillion with all his habiliments safe, and as yet not known to any, from whence he sent this Blank Knight, Sir Hugh Launey, a good courser. But the morrow after, viz. the last day of the jousts, he came with his face open, and his helmet, as the day before, save that the chaplet was rich with pearl and precious stones, and in his coat of arms of Guy and Beauchamp quarterly, having the arms of Toney and Hanlap on his trappers, and said, that as he had in his own person performed the service the two days before, so with God's grace he would the third. Whereupon, encountering with Sir Collard Fines, at every stroke he bore him backward to his horse, inasmuch that the Frenchman, saying that he himself was bound to his saddle, he alighted, and presently got up again. But all being ended, he returned to his pavillion, sent to Sir Collard Fines a fair courser, feasted all the people, gave to those three Knights great rewards, and so rode to Calais with great honour.

ceeded to the King's great satisfaction (d) [E]. But as many places in France immediately after this treaty declared for the Dauphin, it was thought requisite to take the strongest of them which was Melun, in order to set an example to the rest; which place this noble Earl reduced in fourteen weeks and four days, to the great amazement of the French, who had flattered themselves that it was impregnable (e). In the last year of the victorious Henry V, he attended John, Duke of Bedford, the King's brother, who marched with an army to the relief of a town, belonging to the Duke of Burgundy, which the Dauphin had besieged; but the reputation of these Noblemen did all that was expected from their army, for the French no sooner heard of their coming, then they retired from before the place (f). King Henry dying soon after this, gave, by his will, the highest testimony a Prince could give, of his respect for, and confidence in, the Earl of Warwick, by directing that he should have the tutelage of his son, then an infant, till he arrived at the age of sixteen, which was afterwards confirmed by Parliament (g). In the first of Henry VI, he was by indenture retained to be Captain of Calais for two years, which fortrefs being besieged by Philip, Duke of Burgundy, now reconciled to the French, this noble Earl, assisted by Humphrey Duke of Gloucester, and Humphrey Earl of Stafford, so gallantly defended it, that, after a long siege and great loss, the Duke of Burgundy was forced to rise from before it (h). Upon the death of the Duke of Bedford, who was Regent of France for King Henry, the Earl of Warwick was judged by the King's uncles, and the principal nobility of the realm, the only person that could repair his loss, and therefore he was discharged from the care of the King's person, and constituted Lieutenant-General of the realm of France and duchy of Normandy, the highest honour a subject of England could receive (i). He embarked thereupon with his lady and son, in order to pass the seas to his charge, but meeting with a dangerous storm in his passage, he caused himself and both of them to be bound to the main mast of the ship, to the intent that if they had perished, and were afterwards found, being known by his coat of arms, they might have been buried together (k). He had with him in this voyage a peculiar officer at arms, called Warwick herald, who received from him an annuity of ten marks a year (l). There are still extant the articles of agreement, made between this noble Earl and the King on his going over to govern France, dated the 11th of May in the fifth year of Henry VI, which being of a great length, we could not insert here (m). He executed this great and difficult employment with his usual wisdom and diligence, for the four last years of his life, and died in possession thereof in the castle of Roan, April the 30th, 1439 (n). Leaving issue by Elizabeth his first wife, daughter and heiress to Thomas Lord Berkely, three daughters, viz. Margaret, married to John Talbot, Earl of Shrewsbury; Eleanora married to the Lord Rofs, and afterwards to Edmund Beaufort, Marquis of Dorset and Duke of Somerset; and Elizabeth, who espoused George Nevil, Lord Latimer. Our great Earl took to his second wife, by special dispensation from the Pope, because she was the widow of Richard de Beauchamp, Earl of Worcester, his uncle's son, Isabel, daughter to Thomas le Despenser, Earl of Gloucester, and, by the death of her brother Richard, and her elder sister Elizabeth without issue, heiress of all his lands (o). By this his second Countess, Richard Earl of Warwick had a son and a daughter, the name of the former was Henry, of whom in our next article, at the close of which we shall speak of his sister, whose name was Anne. This noble Earl of Warwick, who was the fifth of his family who bore that title, died possessed of a vast estate in lands, from the consideration of which, and of the nature of tenures in those times, we may very easily form an idea of his great power and influence [F]. We are certainly much

[E] He very happily succeeded to the King's satisfaction.] We are told by the author of the life of King Henry, that this treaty was first proposed to that Prince by Philip, Duke of Burgundy (32), and that he solicited his Majesty to send a Nobleman, in whom he had the greatest confidence, to confer with and settle preliminaries of peace, with the ministers of Charles VI of France, who, by reason of his having been long disordered in his senses, was not able to transact the great affairs of his kingdom in person; and he tells us, that the Earl of Warwick was thereupon made choice of for his singular abilities in negotiation, and that he was attended by several of the King's ministers, who were to assist him in this important affair. He accordingly adjusted the principal points of this most remarkable treaty, which was of the greatest consequence by far, of any, in which a subject of England had been employed; and by his advice it was agreed, that there should be an interview between the two Kings, in order to settle the remaining points, which accordingly took place at Troyes (33). There this treaty, of which that writer gives us a copy at large, was concluded and ratified in the cathedral church of St Peter, under the great seals of the respective Kings, on the 21st of May, 1420. By this treaty King Charles appoints and acknowledges King Henry heir to the crown of France; but it is agreed, that Henry should not bear the title of King of France till the death of Charles, but should content himself with the title of Regent, and the managing all publick affairs. The two kingdoms of France and England were to remain under one Prince, viz. Henry, and his heirs, but were to be independent of each other, and to be governed each by its own laws, the privileges and rights of all persons and estates were to be preserved, and no treaty of accommodation with the Dauphin was to be made, but by the consent of the two Kings, the Duke of Burgundy, and the three Estates of both realms (34). Such were the terms of this treaty, by which the crown of France, after the death of the before-mentioned Charles VI, was set upon the head of our King Henry VI, son to Henry V, by the Lady Catherine.

[F] An idea of his great power and influence.] We have already seen how the estates of several noble families came to the Beauchamps, and what vast grants they received from the crown, in gratitude for the services performed by them, so that we may well credit what Sir William Dugdale tells us upon this subject, tho' he has not given us the roll of the Earl's estates, which, I apprehend, would have been more satisfactory than the Painter's bill, upon the Earl's going to France, which he has twice exhibited; he has, however, given us the substance of that roll, which shall be presented in his own words (35). 'The lands whereof much indebted to the historian of the family, John Rous, for the particulars he has preserved in relation to this noble Earl's life and actions, with respect to most of which, there seems to be no reason to doubt of his veracity, since we find them fully confirmed by contemporary historians; but in one thing he seems to have been much mistaken, which is with regard to the time of his being made Knight of the Garter, at least if there be any dependance on the register of the Order in those times [G]. One might have reasonably expected to have had this matter cleared up by the inscription on his monument, which remains undefaced in the collegiate church of Warwick, and of which there is a very fine cut by the famous William Hollar, preserved in Dugdale (p), but there is not a word of it. However, as this inscription is but short, and withal very curious, I thought the reader might be pleased to see it, and therefore it is placed in the notes [H]. His second Countess Isabel, on her return from France, retired to the monastery of Southwyke where she did not long survive him, as appears by her monument in the chapel of the abbey of Tewksbury, her own foundation, the inscription on which says, that she died on the 24th of June, 1439 (q). As to the pious legacies and foundations of this great Earl and his Countess, the reader may find an account of them in the books mentioned in the margin.

(p) Antiquities of Warwickshire, Vol. I. p. 410.

(q) See the inscription, in Antiquities of Warwickshire, Vol. I. p. 412.

he was possessed were very vast, as may be seen by the computation of their yearly value, extracted from the accounts of his several bailiffs through England and Wales in 12 Henry VI (36), amounting to no less than eight thousand six hundred and six marks, eleven shillings, eleven pence half-penny, which, setting aside the good pennyworths that his tenants had of what they then held, would, in the days we live, augment the sum six fold at least, considering about that time, barley was sold for four shillings and two pence a quarter, oats at two shillings and one penny half-penny, capons at three pence a piece, and hens at one penny half-penny, as by certain accounts of his household officers appeareth (37).

[G] Any dependance on the register of the Order in those times.] Sir William Dugdale introduces his Memoirs of this noble Earl by these elegant observations (38). 'If the leaving behind us an honourable fame, which lives in the memories of all good men, when these mortal bodies of ours are turned to dust, be accounted some happiness, as doubtless it is, and hath therefore excited divers noble spirits to bold and high adventures, whereof we want not manifold testimonies, then surely the transmitting a remembrance of our virtuous actions to posterity by a faithful register, must needs be a thing most acceptable to those whose memories are so preserved, as the like by Polybius of Scipio Africanus was, as also a singular estimation with after-ages, which are so much quickened we see by such notable examples, and therefore I cannot but observe, that the advantage which this Earl had herein was much more than any of his ancestors, by reason that Rous being his contemporary, and so well affected to history in general, out of the special relation he had to this family, hath with great diligence observed the most remarkable passages of his life, which with no less art than industry are set forth by him in curious pictures, historically representing them in order of time from his birth to his death, and which has added much to the lustre of his history, as by and by will appear.' All this we allow to be handsomely said, but for all this John Rous cannot pass for an accurate writer, of which we cannot well have a stronger proof than his asserting the Earl of Warwick was honoured with the Garter early in the reign of Henry IV. The plain reason for his saying so is, to give him greater lustre in his tournament at Verona against Sir Pandolph Malet, who he insinuates had offered combat to any of the Knights of this order, the honour of which was gloriously sustained by the Earl of Warwick. But in the registers of the order, which contain the names of twenty-five Knights, elected companions during that reign, we meet with nothing of this Earl of Warwick. It must indeed be allowed that these registers were not so compleat as could be wished, because we have the names only of the Knights, and not the dates of their election. But from the beginning of the reign of Henry V they became more regular, and though the dates of their elections were not then added, yet their names were set down in the order they were elected. It is from hence we have some light as to the time when the Earl of Warwick was really elected, for we find him the fourteenth Knight companion elected in this reign, and the hundred and twenty-fourth of the Order from its first institution (39). It is therefore clear enough, all circumstances considered, that instead of obtaining this honour in 1403, he did not attain it before 1420. I might take notice of some other small slips of this nature, but as they are not of great consequence, and seem to proceed purely from his excess of zeal for this noble family, from which he received his living, I shall not detain the reader longer upon this subject, which I hope is already rendered sufficiently clear.

[H] I thought the reader might be pleased to see it, and therefore it is placed in the notes.] This noble Earl, by his last will and testament, bearing date at Caverham in Oxfordshire, appointed that first, and in all haste possible, after his decease, there should be five thousand masses said for his soul; next, his debts to be truly paid, and then, that till the new chapel adjoining to the collegiate church of Warwick should be finished, his body should be laid in a chest of stone before the altar, on the right hand of his father's tomb, and afterwards to be removed into the chapel before-mentioned, where he directed three masses every day to be sung as long as the stone should endure (40). We have a copy of the epitaph inscribed on this monument in Leland, which is very exact (41). But it seems a little strange that he does not take any notice of an odd circumstance therein, which is, that instead of the usual stops we find the figure of a bear, or of a ragged staff, through the whole inscription, which runs thus (42).

BEAUCHAMP (HENRY DE) son to Richard Earl of Warwick, of whom in the foregoing article. He was born at Hanley castle in Worcestershire, on the 22d of March, 1424, and baptized two days afterwards. The famous Henry Beaufort, Cardinal Bishop of Winchester, being one of his god-fathers, and Humphrey, Earl of Stafford, the other; his god-mother Joan, Lady Bergavenny (a). At the time of his father's decease he was very little above fourteen years of age, and yet he had been for some time married, for his father having formed a design of allying himself to the house of Salisbury, he made a double match between this only son of his, then stiled Lord Despenser, and Cecily, daughter to Richard Nevil, Earl of Salisbury, with whom he had a portion of 4700 marks, and at the same time gave his younger daughter, Ann, to Sir Richard Nevil, son to the Earl before mentioned (b). This Henry, Earl of Warwick, being a young Nobleman of great spirit and courage, offered his service before he was full nineteen for the defence of Normandy, with which the king was so well pleased, that, by his charter bearing date the second of April in the twenty-second year of his reign, he created him Premier Earl of England, and for a distinction between him all other Earls, he farther granted him, and the heirs male of his body, leave to wear a gold coronet upon his head, as well in his own presence as elsewhere, in all such assemblies, and upon all such feasts as the like ornaments were worn (c). Within three days after this he advanced him to the rank of Duke of Warwick, in consideration of the many virtues and great services of his father, granting him place in parliament and at all other meetings, next after the Duke of Norfolk, before the Duke of Buckingham, bestowing likewise a pension of forty pounds, per. ann. to be paid by the Sheriffs of Warwickshire and Leicestershire out of the revenues of those counties, towards the better support of that honour (d). But this extraordinary mark of the royal favour, was not more kindly and gratefully received by the young Duke of Warwick, than it was hatefully and enviously looked upon by the Duke of Buckingham, who thought himself extremely injured thereby. In that reign every thing was apprehended from the feuds and disputes of the nobility, and therefore, to prevent any ill consequences that might arise from the differences between these two noblemen, this point was settled by an act of parliament; which declared, that for appeasing the contention and strife moved betwixt them for that pre-eminence, it was established, that from the second of December then next ensuing, they should take place of each other by turns, one that year, and the other the next, and so on as long as they should live together. The Duke of Warwick to have the first year's precedence, and he which should survive, to take place of the other's heir male as long as he lived, and from that time the heir male of each should take place of the other, according as it should happen, that he had livery of his lands before him (e). Besides these additional titles and marks of honour, the King gave Henry, Duke of Warwick, more substantial proofs of his affection and gratitude, by granting him the reversion after the death of the Duke of Gloucester, of the islands of Guernsey, Jersey, Sark, Erm, and Alderney, for the yearly tribute of a rose, to be paid at the feast of St John the Baptist (f), as also of the manor and hundred of Bristol in Gloucestershire, for the yearly farm of sixty pounds, as also the castles and manors of the King within the forest of Dene, yielding and paying the yearly rent of one hundred pounds (g). But as if all these honours and grants had been still insufficient to express the King's affection for this young nobleman, and his remembrance and respect for his father's services, Henry VI went still farther, even to the utmost verge and extent of his prerogative, by declaring the said Henry Duke of Warwick King of the Island of Wight, and placing the crown upon his head with his own hands (h). But as this was the highest honour the King could bestow, so it proved the last favour the Duke could receive, since he was taken off in the flower of his age, at the castle of Hanley, where he was born, on the eleventh of June 1445, in the twenty-second year of his age (i). He was buried in the abbey of Tewksbury, leaving behind him an only daughter, Anne, Countess of Warwick, born at Kaerdiff in February 1443 (k). This young lady was first under the tutelage of Queen Margaret (Consort to Henry VI) afterwards she was committed to the care of William de la Poole, Duke of Suffolk; at whose manor of Newelme in the county of Oxford, she deceased January 3, 1449, having not quite attained six years of age (l). She was afterwards buried in the abbey of Reading, near the body of her great-grand-mother Constance Lady Despenser, daughter of Edmund of Langley, Duke of York (m). As for Cecily, Duchess of Warwick, she afterwards espoused John Lord Tiptoff, Earl of Worcester, but did not long live with him, deceasing in the month of July 1450, and was buried in the abbey church of Tewksbury (n). In order to complete our account of this most noble family, we must farther observe, that upon the demise of Anne, Countess of Warwick, in her childhood, Anne, sister to Henry Duke of Warwick, of the whole blood, became his sole heir, and her husband, Richard Nevil Earl of Salisbury, took in her right the title of Warwick (o). This title was afterwards confirmed to him by Patent dated July 23, 1445, with all the pre-eminencies enjoyed by any of his wife's ancestors, before her brother Henry was created Duke of Warwick. After this, Richard Earl of Warwick and Anne his Countess, levied a great xv. Trin. 28 Hen. VI, by which they entailed the castle of Warwick, with a great number of fine lordships, in that and sixteen other counties, upon the issue of their bodies lawfully begotten, and for default thereof upon the issue of her, with the remainder to the heirs of Richard Beauchamp late Earl of Warwick, &c. (q). Thus we have shewn how this high honour descended from the Mauduits to the Beauchamps, and from them in the same manner to the Nevils, of whom more may be seen under their articles. At present we are to proceed with other honourable branches, from this great stock of the Beauchamps Earls of Warwick; and first of

BEAUCHAMP (JOHN DE) Baron of Kidderminster in the reign of Richard II, and the first Baron created by patent in this kingdom. He was the son of Sir Richard Beauchamp of Holt, who was the grandson of William de Beauchamp of Elmeley, and brother to William de Beauchamp the first Earl of Warwick of that family. He was born in 1320, and by the death of his father inherited the lands of Holt in Worcesterhire, 1 Edward III (a). He was early in the service of his Prince, for 12 Edward III, when he was not more than twenty, he was in the expedition to Flanders, and in 20 Edw. III. in France, and acquired reputation in both (b). In 1353 he was in Gascoigne, in the retinue of Thomas Earl of Warwick, and continued there all the next year (c). In the thirty-third of the same reign he served again in France with much honour. In the forty-second of that King, he went over into that realm on the same account (d); and in 46 Edward III, he attended the King's son, John Duke of Lancaster, in his expedition into Spain (e). By these long and faithful services to the Crown, he so raised his credit at Court, that in the sixth of Richard II, being then one of the Esquires of the King's chamber, he had a grant of twenty marks per annum, out of the manor of Sutton, in the forest of Macklesfield in Cheshire (f). But growing more and more into the King's favour, he in the ninth of the same reign, from the like considerations, and because he had received the honour of knighthood, under the King's banner displayed against Scotland, had an annuity granted him of one hundred marks, out of the King's rents and revenue in North Wales (g). But soon after he made a surrender of this annuity, and, instead thereof, had a considerable grant made him in Caermarthenshire, and was also appointed Chief-Justice of North-Wales, both for term of his life. He had also a special charter of divers liberties and privileges, as well in vert and venison, as other things, in his lordship of Kidderminster, in the county of Worcester, granted him, much about the same time (h). By these repeated testimonies of royal kindness, Sir John Beauchamp now advanced to be Steward of the King's household, and one of his chief favourites, was encouraged to procure new gifts from the Crown, and therefore in the eleventh year of King Richard, laying hold of the breaking out of a French war, Sir John Beauchamp obtained for himself, a grant of all the manors and lands belonging to the priory of Deerhurst in the county of Gloucester, then seized into the King's hands; as all other priories-alien were (i). By such grants he acquired a good estate, and to add an augmentation of honour to these of fortune, he procured himself to be created Baron Kidderminster by patent, limiting that honour to his heirs male; which became the precedent for all future creations (k) [A]. It was thought that the King intended him farther honours, and one

[A] Which became the precedent for all future creations.] It was this circumstance of his being the first Baron created by patent, that induced us to insert his article preferable to others of his noble family, of whom enough might be collected from our histories to fill a volume. But in order to conceive the reason of this, it will be necessary to say somewhat of the different kinds of Barons and Baronies amongst us. He who would see all the antient learning upon this subject, and has a mind to judge for himself as to the most probable etymology of the word, and it's various significations, may consult the learned Selden (1), or the no less learned Spelman (2), who have undoubtedly shewn as much labour, reading, and judgment, on the subject, as any man can expect. In respect to our present purpose, it is sufficient to say, that as at his entrance into this kingdom, William Duke of Normandy subjected most lands to military or honorary tenures, as in making hereditary Earls, so he invested others in smaller territories, and with lower jurisdiction; these were Barons (3). Such persons might, and did grant lands to others, to hold of them as they of the King, and if the number and value of these amounted to 13 $\frac{1}{2}$ Knights fees, then such a one was Baro Regis, and might sit in parliament. Thus it is clear our first Barons had their dignity à censu from their possessions, or, as things stood then, from their tenures; for whoever held land to the value of four hundred marks, as immediately from the King was his Baron (4). But Baronies were not only held from the King, but from Earls and other superior nobility, and if such as held under them attained the limited sum of four hundred marks, then he became a Baron's Peer, or one having equal privileges with a Baron; and thus we plainly see the sense of Barones and Parcs Baronum (5). But besides these there were yet another kind of Barons, that is, such as held lands with mean jurisdiction, but not to this value; in plain English, every Lord of a manor to whom as such a Court-Baron belonged. In antient times therefore, that is, before the forty-eighth of Henry III, upon the King's calling a parliament, all who had a right to sit therein, came of their own accord; but at that time we are told, the King having made his peace with Simon de Montfort, it was agreed that such of the Barons only should resort to parliament as the King summoned (6). By this means came in the second sort of Barons, who are from thence stiled Barons by writ. But of these there have been distinguished two kinds, viz. Barons by writ and tenure, and by writ only; for the King might if he pleased summon others as well as Barons to parliament, but this did not give their posterity, or indeed themselves, a right to sit in parliament independent of the summons from the Crown, whence some have taken a new distinction between Barons and Peers (7); esteeming the former, such as were so tenure, as well as summons, and the latter such as obtained their seats in parliament by their writs only. As to the third kind of Barons by patent, our John de Beauchamp being the first, and this now being as usual a method, or rather more so, of creating Barons, than the other by writ, it may not be amiss (especially as they are short) to insert the King's letters patents on this occasion (8).

historian tells us particularly, that he was to have had the title of Bridgnorth (l), if a sudden reverse of fortune had not put a stop to his master's power, and to his prosperity. This happened in the same, or the next, year, viz. 1388, when the Duke of Gloucester, and other powerful Lords, having first defeated the army raised by the King's favourite, whom he had created Duke of Ireland, marched on to London, and forced him to call a Parliament, which for the strange and extraordinary things done therein, and thereby, was called the Wonder-working Parliament (m). Amongst other noble persons then called to account for their past behaviour, our Lord Beauchamp was one, who was first removed from his office of Treasurer of the King's household, then sent prisoner to Dover-castle, and lastly condemned and executed for high-treason upon Tower-Hill (n) [B]. Thus

The form of these Patents hath been since often varied, but this before us seems to be remarkably clear, succinct, and to the purpose, agreeing very well with the account which we have before given of the state and degree of Barons of this realm, until this method of creation took place. With respect to the other ceremonies used in conferring this dignity, Sir William Dugdale discourses thus: 'That the solemn investiture of this John, and all other the Barons who were thenceforth created by patent, was performed by the King himself, by putting on a robe of scarlet, as also a mantle (with two guards on the left shoulder), and a hood all furred with minever, there is no doubt. Which form of creation continued, until the thirtieth year of King James, that Sir James Hay (a Scotsman) was advanced to the dignity of a Baron of this realm, by letters patent, bearing date the 29th of June, by the title of Lord Hay of Sauley, in Com. Ebor. the Lawyers then declaring, that the delivery of the letters patent was sufficient without any ceremony. But now besides this honourable Robe, through the special favour of our present sovereign King Charles II, there hath been granted to the Barons a coronet of gold, with six pearls placed upon the circle thereof, as by a special instrument under his Majesty's royal signet, bearing date upon the 6th day of July, 1661, in the thirteenth year of his reign, appeareth, the form of which is by divers Painters and Carvers already so much mistaken, as that they commonly advance the pearls thereon in such sort, as those are wherewith the Earls coronets be regularly adorned, though not (as yet) to the full height, whereas they being devised in imitation of the Viscounts coronets, the pearls ought to stand as they do, without any advancing at all.'

[B] Condemed and executed for high-treason upon Tower-hill.] The circumstances of this Nobleman's unhappy fate are but confusedly reported in our general histories, and the dates very differently set down; but from the best authorities we can procure, this transaction seems to have happened thus. King Richard II was a Prince of great condescension and good nature, which made him too easy towards such, as by being long in his service, and gratifying his humours, had found a way to conciliate his good graces (9). Sir John Beauchamp, of Holt, was one closely allied by all the ties of friendship, gratitude, and interest, to those about the King, who were most obnoxious to the Lords, such as Alexander Nevil, Archbishop of York; Robert de Vere, Duke of Ireland; and Michael de la Pool, Earl of Suffolk; and for their service had consulted and acted in all the steps taken to preserve the King's ministers, and to bring the patriot Lords under the imputation of treason, for what they had done in parliament for the King's service and the publick good. It was very probably for this conduct and ill-turned zeal for the King's inclination against his interest, that he was, October 10, 1387, raised to the dignity of Lord Beauchamp of Kidderminster (*). But the tide soon turned, for the five great Lords, Thomas, Duke of Gloucester; Henry, Earl of Derby; Richard, Earl of Arundel and Surrey; Thomas, Earl of Warwick; and Thomas, Earl Marthal, seeing plainly that since Sir Robert Tresilian and the rest of the Judges had, at the instigation of the King and his favourites, declared them traitors, there was no way to avoid being treated as such, but by having recourse to force; and immediately began to arm, and hearing that the King was got to London before them, where he had a strong party, they assembled their forces at Haringay-Park near Highgate, where they appeared to be 40,000 strong (10). The King used all the means he could devise, to save when he could no longer support his creatures, and sending most of them out of the way, he consented at last to a conference with the Lords in the Tower, at which he promised to come the next day to Westminster, to consider of the best means for settling publick affairs, now in the utmost distraction. Before the next morning, however, he changed his mind; but upon the Lords giving him to understand, that if he would not come and countenance their counsels with his presence, they would take other measures, implying they would elect another Prince, he was constrained to go, and when amongst them, gave up all his Ministers, who were soon after seized, and sent to several prisons, and amongst the rest Lord Beauchamp was transferred to Dover-castle (11), there to be kept till he should abide the judgment of the next parliament (that wonderful parliament mentioned in the text), which was summoned to meet upon the third of February next following (12). The first step taken when this parliament did meet, was a solemn claim made therein by the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, that whatever was moved therein, or in future parliaments touching Peers, should be discussed and decided not by the civil law or common law of the land, but by the law and custom of parliament, which by the King was cheerfully granted. In consequence of this, the five great Lords before-mentioned, as appellants, accused or impeached the Archbishop of York, the Duke of Ireland, and the Earl of Suffolk, of various treasons, and they being fled were condemned for want of answer (13). On the twelfth of March following, Simon Burley, John Beauchamp of Holt, John Salisbury, and James Berners, Knights, were impeached by the Commons of various treasons, as being engaged with and assisting in the contrivances of the great Lords before-mentioned. These articles, in number sixteen, have nothing in them very remarkable, except that Sir John Beauchamp is charged with having been unfaithful to his old master King Edward III, and to Lionel Duke of Clarence (14), whence an old Monkish historian (15) takes upon him to stile this unfortunate Lord an old false Traitor, which however is not justified by any proof. To this impeachment the persons accused pleaded Not guilty; the Commons joined issue, and the Lords took time to consider, adjourning to the twentieth of that month, then to the thirteenth of April, and lastly to the fifth of May, when they gave judgment, as is usual in cases of high-treason, on Sir Simon Burley; but in regard he was a Knight of the Garter, his father's old servant, and his own, the King remitted all but the beheading, which he suffered on Tower-hill (16). On the twelfth of May the Lord Beauchamp, Sir John Salisbury, and Sir James Berners, received the like sentence. Beauchamp and Berners were the same day beheaded, and Sir John Salisbury suffered according to his sentence at the common place of execution (17). After all these severities (which had been extorted from the King) were over, some new demands were formed to prevent such a turn as had happened once before in this reign, which were, that no judgments given in this parliament should be reversed, none of the statutes made controverted, and none of the parties attainted pardoned which the King promised (18). He likewise, to satisfy the people more effectually, and to re-settle the crown upon his head, renewed his coronation-oath, hoping after these great sacrifices to reign happily, in which however he was, chiefly through the unsteadiness of his own nature, miserably disappointed.

Thus died Richard Beauchamp, Baron of Kidderminster, in the sixty-eighth year of his age, leaving, by Joan his wife, daughter and heir to Robert le Fitzwith (o), John, his son and heir, about ten years of age, during whose minority, the lordship of Holt was committed to the custody of Thomas Beauchamp Earl of Warwick, from whom it was held (p). When this John de Beauchamp came to man's estate, he attended King Richard II in his voyage to Ireland (q), but it does not appear that he was restored to his father's honours [C]. In the eighth of Henry IV, we find that he executed the office of Escheator for the county of Worcester (r), which he likewise had in the reign of Henry V (s), and in the eighth year of that King, died possessed of four manors in Warwickshire, and two in Worcestershire, which estate descended to his daughter and sole heiress Margaret (t), then twenty years of age, who was married first to John Pauncefort, and afterwards to John Wysham (u), of whose posterity I find no account.

[C] But it does not appear that he was restored to his father's honours. It was the great misfortune of this unhappy Monarch, Richard II, that he was ready to risk any thing for his favourites when they were present, but did not so much regard those who suffered from their attachment to him, when either banished or dead. Thus, notwithstanding all his affection for the Duke of Ireland, and the hazards he had run to support him, when he escaped to the Low-Countries, he let him remain there in so low and poor a condition, that he broke his heart (19). It is true, that afterwards, in the twenty-first year of his reign, A. D. 1398, when he had brought matters so about as to have all things done in the parliament, held in the 11th of his reign, declared null and void; and those who had acted most in them, attainted on that score of high-treason, he procured an express repeal of all forfeitures incurred by judgments then given (20); yet we do not find that this young man was restored to his honour of Kidderminster, or that he had any benefit of the royal grants made to his father. But perhaps we want sufficient memoirs of those times to enable us to speak with certainty on that head. It is very remarkable, that on the execution of Sir Simon Burley, the Earl of Arundel interposed so warmly with the Duke of Gloucester to save his life, that a quarrel had very near happened on his refusal, but we hear nothing of any application made by Thomas Earl of Warwick in behalf of his near relation the Lord Beauchamp, though upon his unfortunate death he had his estate and ion committed to his care. But upon the new and strange turn in 1398, this very Earl of Warwick was by the same kind of process, appealed and convicted of treason, and received (though remitted) the same sentence with Lord Beauchamp (21). Such sudden and violent revolutions was this age subject to, from the rage of parties, the power of faction, and the scandalous corruptions of Parliaments; so that no man knew how to be safe, or by what means to distinguish loyalty from treason.

BEAUCHAMP (JOHN DE) son to Sir William de Beauchamp, Constable of the castle of Gloucester, by Catherine, daughter to Gerard de Usflete, was, on the death of Richard de Beauchamp Earl of Warwick, constituted one of the guardians of his son Henry (a). He purchased from Thomas de Botreax, the moiety of the manor of Alcester, and obtained from King Henry VI, a charter for various privileges and immunities to that place, as also the grant of another fair to be held there on the eve of St Dunstan, and to continue for two days following (b). He was in so great credit with that Monarch, that in the twenty-fifth year of his reign, he was advanced by him to the dignity of Lord Beauchamp of Powyke, and had an annuity of sixty pounds, out of the fee-farm of the city of Gloucester (c). He was also constituted Justice of South Wales, with power to execute that office by himself, or his sufficient Deputy (d). About three years after this, by the kindness of the same Prince, he was promoted to the office of Lord High-Treasurer of England, which he did not hold full two years (e), but retiring to a private life, died at a good old age, in the year 1475 (f), leaving his son Sir Richard Beauchamp then forty years of age, who married Elizabeth, daughter of Sir Humphrey Stafford, Knt. in the private chapel of his manor-house of Beauchamp's Court, by virtue of a special licence from the Bishop of Worcester (g), by which lady he had three daughters coheiresses, the eldest, Elizabeth, married Sir Robert Willoughby, Lord Brooke; the second, Anne, to Richard Ligon; and the third, Margaret, to William Rede (h).

BEAUCHAMP (WILLIAM DE), Lord Bergavenny. He was the younger son of Thomas de Beauchamp, Earl of Warwick, and Catherine Mortimer, as has been before shewn (a), and there are no memoirs extant of any one of this noble family better worth notice, than those of this Lord Bergavenny. He seems to have made his first campaign in 1366 under the famous John of Gaunt, Duke of Lancaster (b), in his expedition into Castile, who, when the armies were in fight, is recorded to have said, Sir William, yonder are our enemies, this day shall you gain the name of a successful Knight, or else die in the quarrel. He served continually after this through that whole reign, mostly under John Duke of Lancaster, sometimes in Spain, sometimes in France, by land sometimes, and sometimes by sea (c). For these great services and others expected from him, we find in the first of Richard II, he was appointed Governor of the castle and county of Pembroke, and in the fourth of the same King, Lord Chamberlain, with an annual pension of two hundred pounds for life (d). The same year he was retained to serve by indenture with two hundred men at arms, and two hundred archers, under Edmund de Langley, Earl of Cambridge, in Spain (e). In the sixth of that King, he should have served under that martial Prelate, Henry Spencer, Bishop of Norwich, then victorious in Flanders; but not receiving, according to the terms of his agreement, the full sum of five hundred marks, Lord Bergavenny declined the service (f). In the seventh of that King, he was retained in the manner before described, to serve as Captain of Calais for two years, and was also appointed a Commissioner to treat with the crown of France about a peace. His conduct in this important employment, was not only every way irreproachable, but so highly esteemed and approved, that his commission was continued for three years more, in which space he took from the French no less than forty-eight vessels, two of which were laden with spices, and some with white herrings bound for Flanders (g). In the ninth of King Richard, he again attended the Duke of Lancaster into Spain, to support his pretensions to the crown of Castile. He was the next year constituted Captain of the castles of Pembroke and Kilgaran in Wales, and holding still his command of Calais, was appointed the King's Commissioner to treat with the Earl of Flanders (b). It was at this juncture he distinguished himself in a manner so particular, that it deserves to be for ever remembered. Amongst other base schemes put into the head of King Richard II by his favourites, one was, to retire, when the Duke of Gloucester and the other Lords were near London with an army, to France, and there purchase the assistance of that Monarch, by giving up to him most of the fortresses he then held in that realm (i). If it be some scandal to our country, that it produced men base enough to betray a young and inconsiderate Prince into so foul a contrivance; we must allow that is no less honourable for us, that this gallant Lord Bergavenny had the courage to stand in the gap to secure our possessions from being so shamefully given up, and, at the hazard of his life, serve the King against his will, and merit his confidence by a noble act of disobedience. For when all things were ready at home for carrying this dark design into execution, and the King sent orders to this Lord to quit his command, and transmit certain letters to the court of France he stoutly refused both (k). He declared with respect to the former, that he was intrusted with this important fortress, with the advice and consent of the nobility, and without their consent, he would not render up his command. As for the letters, (guessing at their tenor) instead of sending them to Paris, he transmitted them to the Duke of Gloucester in England. He went still farther than this, for when John de la Pole, brother to the great favourite, Suffolk, came with the King's orders to take from him the command of Calais, he not only refused to yield it into his hands, but seized him and carried him over prisoner to England, which at that time incensed the King to such a degree, as it entirely ruined the scheme of his ministers, that he caused the Lord Bergavenny immediately after his arrival, to be arrested and committed to close custody; but soon after, either through fear or choice, caused him to be set at liberty again (l). But I do not find (and I speak it to his honour) that after this, he was much employed during that reign. But in the very first of Henry IV, we find him constituted Justice of South Wales for life, and restored to the government of the town and castle of Pembroke and Lordship of Tineby, with the addition of the castle and lordship of Kilgaran, and county of Osterlowe also for life, paying into the Exchequer seventy marks, per. ann (m). This noble Lord deceased about 1411, possessed of a very large estate, which descended to his only son by Joan, one of the daughters of Richard, Earl of Arundel, one of the sisters and coheiresses of Thomas, Earl of Arundel, and Widow of Humphrey de Bohun, Earl of Hereford, Essex, and Northampton (n). The name of this only son and successor of the Lord Bergavenny was Richard, who married the lady Isabel Despenfer very soon after his father's death, and had by her a very large estate in land (o). In the fourth year of Henry V, we find him retained to serve the King abroad in his wars, where he behaved with such courage, wisdom, and success, and rendered the King so many and so important services, that in reward of his zeal and fidelity, that Monarch advanced him in the eighth year of his reign, to the title of Earl of Worcester (p), and for the better support of that dignity, made him large grants of land in Normandy and other parts of France (q). It was not long that he survived to enjoy these marks of Royal favour; for very soon after he was wounded by a stone from a sling at Nusembry in France, of which he languished for some time and then died; his body was interred at Tewksbury with great solemnity (r), and in him ended this branch of the family. He left an only daughter Elizabeth, born at Hanley castle, December 16, 1415, who afterwards married Edward Nevill, a younger son of Ralph Nevill, Earl of Westmoreland (s). The best part of his paternal estate descended, by virtue of a special entail, to Richard Beauchamp, Earl of Warwick, who observing that his widow Isabel, Countess of Worcester, had a very large estate, and a fair prospect of increasing it, he applied to the court of Rome for a special dispensation to enable him to marry her, who had been his uncle's son's wife, which having obtained, he espoused her (t), and had by her, as we have already shewn, Henry, Duke of Warwick; and a daughter, Anne, by whom this title was transferred to the family of Nevill. We might add to these many other illustrious persons of this great and noble family, such as Roger Beauchamp of Bletsho, from whom the St Johns, Barons of Bletsho are descended (u). Bishop Beauchamp of Hereford (w), Richard Beauchamp, Lord St Amand, who died in the reign of Henry VII, and was buried in the Black-Friar's church near Ludgate (x): But the bounds we have prescribed to ourselves in this work, will not admit of our prosecuting our account of this family any farther; nor had we insisted on it so long, but as it affords variety of circumstances, necessary to be referred to in many subsequent articles.

BEAVER (JOHN) otherwise named Bever, and in Latin Fiber, Fibérius, Castor, and Castorius (a), was a Benedictine Monk in Westminster-Abbey, and flourished about the beginning of the XIVth century (b). He was a man of quick parts, and of great diligence and ingenuity (c). But he applied himself particularly to the study of the History and Antiquities of England, and became a great master of both. Among other things, he writ a Chronicle of the British and English Affairs, from the coming in of Brute to his own time [A]. He also writ a book De Rebus cænobii Westmonasteriensis, of Westminster-Abbey, and the several Transactions relating thereto (d). Leland commends him (e) as an historian of good credit; and he is also cited with respect by J. Stow in his Survey of London and Westminster (f). Bale says (g), he doth not give a slight or superficial account, but a full and judicious relation, of things; and takes proper notice of the virtues and vices of the persons mentioned in his History.

There was another of the same name, a Monk of St Alban's; who left behind him a collection of some treatises that are of no great value. They are extant in the King's Library (b).

[A] He writ a Chronicle of the British, and English affairs.] It was never published, but remains in manuscript in several places, particularly in the Cottonian library (1). In the late fire there, it was pretty much damaged, but may still be used. Mr Hearne published, in 1735, proposals for the printing of it; but his death put a stop to the publication (2).

BEAUFORT, was at first the Surname, and became afterwards the Title, of a noble family, which hath produced several eminent persons of both sexes. It was taken from the castle of Beaufort in Anjou (a), which came to the House of Lancaster, by Blanche of Artois, Queen of Navarre, wife to Edmund Crouch-back, second son of King Henry III, and first Earl of Lancaster. The children to whom that SURNAME was first given, were John, Henry, Thomas, and Joan; being the natural issue of John of Gaunt, Duke of Lancaster (fourth son of King Edward III) by Catharine, daughter of Sir Payn Roet, Knight, Guyenne King of Arms, and widow of Sir Otes (b) Swinford; then Governess to the ladies Philippa and Elizabeth, daughters of the said Earl of Lancaster (c); and afterwards married to him, being his third wife (d). Those children were legitimated, by Act of Parliament [A], bearing date February 9; 1396-7, the twentieth of Richard II, and exemplified afterwards by King Henry IV, on February 10, 1406-7 (e), by which legitimation they were rendered capable of all offices and honours whatsoever, the royal dignity excepted. In pursuance of this, John was created Earl of Somerset; Henry became Bishop of Winchester, and Cardinal of St Eusebius; and Thomas was made Earl of Dorset, and Duke of Exeter (f). Joan was married, first to Robert, son of Robert Lord Ferrers, and afterwards to Ralph Neville, the first Earl of Westmoreland. The grandson of John Earl of Somerset, was, Henry Duke of Somerset, who being beheaded April 3, 1463, for his adherence to the House of Lancaster, left issue by Joan Hill, or De la Montaign, an only natural son named Charles, who assumed the surname of Somerset. Descended from him in the fifth generation, was Edward Somerset Marquis of Worcester; on whom King Charles I, conferred the TITLE of Baron Beaufort (g), as King Charles II did, that of Duke of Beaufort (Decemb. 2, 1682.) on his son Henry Somerset, great-great-grandfather of the present Duke of Beaufort.

[A] Those children were legitimated by Act of parliament.] There is an observation at the beginning of this act, made by Dr Edmund Stafford, Bishop of Exeter, and Lord-Chancellor of England, intimating, that Pope Urban VI, at the earnest request of King Richard II, had before legitimated these children (1).

BEAUFORT (JOHN) eldest son of John of Gaunt Duke of Lancaster, by Catharine Swinford, as is above related, was born in Beaufort-castle in Anjou. In 1394, being then a Knight, he accompanied his father into Gasconne (*). He was advanced to the honour of Earl of Somerset, in a Parliament held at Westminster (a), by creation, bearing date 1396-7. And on September 29, in a Parliament held at the same place, was created Marquis of Dorset [A]. But this last honour being vacated, he was created the same day, Sept. 29, Marquis of Somerset (b). Notwithstanding which, he was summoned to Parliament (c) by the title only of Marquis of Dorset: And, by that denomination, was made Constable of Wallingford-castle, and Steward of the honour of Wallingford, November 22, 1397 (d); as also Constable of Dover-castle, and Warden of the Cinque-ports, on the 5th of February following (e); and not long after, King Richard the second's Lieutenant in Aquitain (f). He was likewise, on the 2d of February the same year, constituted Admiral of all the King's fleet, both to the north and west (g). In 1397, he was one of those Lords, who, at the great Council at Nottingham, impeached Thomas, Duke of Gloucester, &c. of treason (b). For which, he and the rest of them, were adjudged, in the first Parliament of King Henry IV, to lose their titles, and and the estates that had been given them, at or since the last Parliament, belonging to any of those persons they had impeached; or such as they enjoyed at the time of the Duke of Gloucester's imprisonment (i). By this means, John Beaufort lost the title of Marquis of Dorset, and retained only that of Earl of Somerset. But soon ingratiating himself with the new King, who was his brother by the father's side, he was constituted by him Chamberlain of England for life (k), Febr. 9, 1399-1400. In 1401 he was retained by indenture to serve the King as governor of the town of Caermardhyn (l), and had his estate restored to him (m). He was also made Captain of Calais, with its marches. In 1401, or 1402, he was commissioned with others, to treat of a League of amity, between the King of England, and the Duke of Gueldres (n). In 1402, the Commons in Parliament petitioned for his restitution to the dignity of Marquis; which he seemed unwilling to resume, because that title was new in this kingdom, he being the second on whom it was conferred; however, he accepted of it at last (o). In the year 1404, he had an assignation of the isle of Thanet, for the support of himself, and the garrison of Calais, which consisted of his soldiers (p): And was appointed Embassador to treat of a peace with the French (q). He also was one of the Commissioners, empowered to receive such sums of money, as then remained unpaid for the ransom of John, King of France, taken prisoner at the battle of Cressly (r). And finally, in the eighth year of King Henry IV, was constituted Admiral of the King's whole fleet, as well for the north as west (s). Having thus passed through many honourable employments, he departed this life, on the 21st of April 1410, and was buried in St Michael's chapel, on the south side of Canterbury cathedral (t). He married Margaret Holand, third daughter of Thomas, and sister and coheir to Edmund, both Earls of Kent, by whom he had four sons, Henry, John, Edmund, and Thomas; (of whom, and their posterity I shall give an account in the note [B]) and two daughters: Joan, married to James I, King of Scotland; and Margaret, to Thomas Courtney, the seventh Earl of Devonshire (u).

[B] He had four sons, Henry, John, Edmund, and Thomas, &c.] Henry dying young, and unmarried, was succeeded in the earldom of Somerset by his brother JOHN; who, in 1443, was created Duke of Somerset and Earl of Kendal (1), and constituted Lieutenant and Captain-General of Aquitaine; as also of the whole realm of France, and duchy of Normandy (2). He was taken prisoner at the battle of Baugy in 1421, and was not released till some years after (3). Dying May 27, 1444, he left issue by his wife Margaret, daughter of Sir John Beauchamp of Bletso, an only daughter named Margaret, of whom I shall give an account in a particular article. — To him succeeded his next brother EDMUND, who, before that time, had the title of Earl of Mortain in Normandy, and the Lordship of Chirkland in the marches of Wales (4); and had also, Aug. 20, 1442, been created Earl, as he was on June 24, 1443, Marquis of Dorset (5); and finally, after his brother's decease, Duke of Somerset, March 31, 1448 (6). He had at several times the regency of France and government of Normandy; and behaved with great bravery there at the taking of Harfleur, though he lost afterwards a great deal of his glory upon the surrendering of Caen and Roan (7). Being recalled to England by King Henry VI, to make head against the Yorkists, he was slain at the first battle of St Alban's, May 22, 1455 (8). His wife was, Eleanor, second daughter and coheir to Richard Beauchamp Earl of Warwick, by whom he had four sons and five daughters. Of the daughters, Eleanor was the second wife of James Butler Earl of Ormond and Wiltshire; Joan was married first to the Lord of Hoth in Ireland, and next to Sir Richard Fry, Kt. Anne was the wife of Sir William Paston of Norfolk, Kt. Margaret was first married to Humphry Stafford Earl of Stafford, and secondly to Sir Richard Darrel, Kt. and Elizabeth was married to Sir Henry Lewis, Kt (9). The sons were HENRY Duke of Somerset, who being taken prisoner at the battle of Hexham in 1463, was there beheaded on the 3d of April. EDMUND, that succeeded him, sailed into France, where he lived in great misery. But returning again to England, he was in the second battle of Barnet, and in that of Tewksbury; after which last, being taken prisoner, he was beheaded May 6, 1471 (10). JOHN, his next brother, was slain in the same battle of Tewksbury, May 4 (11), and Thomas, the fourth son, died young (12). But to return to Henry, the elder brother, mentioned a little above: He bore the title of Earl of Mortain in his father's life-time, and gained great honour in the French wars (13). In the 36th of Henry VI, he was constituted Lieutenant and Governor of the Isle of Wight and Carebrooke-castle (14); and the next year made Governor of Calais. But being recalled to England, he was made General to Queen Margaret, and led her main battle at Wakefield. He was also commander in chief for King Henry VI, at the bloody fight of Towton, March 12, 1461; after which, seeing this poor King's affairs desperate, he submitted to the conqueror, Edward IV, though he turned afterwards against him (15), for which he was beheaded after the battle of Hexham, as is above related; leaving only a natural son, named Charles, who took the surname of Somerset. C

BEAUFORT (HENRY), Bishop of Winchester, and Cardinal-Priest of the Roman Church, was the son of John of Gaunt, Duke of Lancaster, by his third wife, Catherine Swinford [A]. He studied for some years at Oxford, but had his education chiefly at Aix

[A] He was the son of John of Gaunt, Duke of Lancaster, by his third wife, Catherine Swinford] John of Gaunt's third wife, Speed tells us (1) 'was Catherine, the widow of Sir Hugh Swinford, a knight of Lincolnshire, eldest daughter and coheir of Payn Roet, a Gascoigne, called Guen King of Arms for that country, his younger daughter being married to Sir Geoffrey Chaucer our Laureat Poet. By her he had issue (born before matrimony, and made legitimate afterwards by parliament holden in the twentieth year of King Richard the Second) John Earl of Somerset, Thomas Duke of Exeter, Henry Bishop of Winchester and Cardinal, and Joan, who was first married to Robert Ferrers (Baron of Wenme and Ousely in the counties of Salop and Warwick), and secondly to Ralph Nevill, the first Earl of Westmorland. She and all her brethren were surnamed BEAUFORT, of a castle which the Duke had in France, where they were all born; and in regard thereof bare the Portcullis of a castle for the cognizance of their family.' We shall produce the charter of legitimation of the Beauforts, after having observed that the preamble of the Act of Parliament (2), which confirmed it (drawn up by Dr Edmund Stafford Bishop of Exeter, and Lord-Chancellor of England), intimates, that Pope Urban VI, at the earnest request of the King, vouchsafes to legitimate these Beauforts, the natural children of the Duke of Lancaster; and that the King also, having power to legitimate and enable bastards in as ample a manner as the Emperor hath

A Charter of Legitimation of the Bastards of John Duke of Lancaster.

Richard, by the Grace of God, King of England and France, and Lord of Ireland; To our most dear Cousins, the illustrious John Beaufort, Knight, Henry Beaufort, Clerk, Thomas Beaufort, Gentleman, and Joanna Beaufort Gentlewoman, of our most renowned Uncle, the noble John Duke of Guienne and Lancaster, Children German, and our Lieges, Greeting. We, for honour and merits, &c. of our Uncle, of our own good pleasure, and in consideration of his deserts, because you are conspicuous for your virtuous inclinations, and honesty of life and manners, and defended of Royal Progenitors, &c. Hence it is, that, moved by the earnest intreaties of our Uncle your parent, to remove from you (for, as is said, there is a defect in your birth) this defect, and all it's present consequences, we will that you be, and be reputed, capable to be preferred, promoted, elected, assumed and admitted, to any honours, dignities, states, degrees, offices public and private, as well perpetual as temporary, and judicial and noble, by what appellations soever distinguished, whether Dukedoms, Principalities, Earldoms, Baronies and Feuds, whether mediately or immediately depending, or holding of Us, and them to take hold of, and enjoy, as freely and rightfully, as if you had been born in lawful Matrimony, all Statutes and Customs of our Kingdom of England, to the contrary enacted or observed, as if they were here mentioned at length, notwithstanding; with which, out of the fulness of our Royal Power, and with consent of our Parliament, by the tenor of these Presents, We dispense, and you, and every one of you, to Birth restore and legitimate — Day of February, in the 20th year of our Reign. R. II.

Notwithstanding this Act of Legitimation, it was afterwards disputed (especially in the reign of Richard III, when, after the death of Edward Prince of Wales, the affair of the Succession came to be considered), whether the Beauforts were of the House of Lancaster, or not; as also whether King Richard the Second's Charter conferred on them any title to the Crown. Upon which we shall subjoin the observations of George Buck, who, though otherwise a writer of little weight, may be allowed to speak upon this subject, which concerns a matter of right, rather than of fact. After reciting the above-mentioned Charter, he goes on 'Here we find large Graces, Honours, and Privileges conferred upon these Beauforts; for the King calls them consanguineos suos, and not only confirms their legitimation, but makes them, by the help of the Parliament, capable of Baronies, Earldoms, Dukedoms, and Principalities; enableth them for all offices public and private, temporary and perpetual, to take hold of, and enjoy, all Feuds, as well noble as other, all lands and seignories hereditary, as lawfully, firmly, and rightfully, as if they had been born in lawful matrimony; but yet confers no Royal title nor interest in the crown, at the least to the observation of those, who allow not the claim of the Beauforts and Somersets, and say, that, to reach that, there must be words of higher intent, words of Empire, Majesty, and Sovereignty; such as Regni summa Potestas, Corona, Sceptum, Diadema, Purpura, Majestas, and the like; neither of these, nor any importing their extent, being in this Grant, so no title to the Crown or Sovereignty could pass to them. To which the other side replies, that there is a word in the Charter that comprehendeth Empire, Reign, and Sovereignty; that is, Principatus, whereof the King and Parliament make the Beauforts capable, Principatus being the State of Princes, a title of the most absolute sovereign power; for the Roman Emperors in their greatest height were called Principes; therefore Princeps is thus defined: Princeps est penes quem summa reipublicæ potestas est, et qui primus omnium dominatur; and Principatus and Dominatus are used as synonymies. But it is conceived an error now, to take Principatus for Regnum or Supremus Dominatus, being the word Principatus long before, and in the age of Richard II, also ever since, hath been restrained to the Estate of Primogenitus, and Heir Apparent, not only of Kings, but also of Dukes and Marquisses, as well Feudal as Sovereign. And the next King, Henry IV, a wise, discreet, and wary Prince, tho' he was much inclined to these Beauforts (as being his natural brethren by the paternal side, and willing to advance them all he could), yet he discovered clearly enough by that certain Charter, in which he entailed the Crown successively to his four sons, and to the heirs of their bodies, that he reputed not the Beauforts to be Lancastrians, or near the Crown; neither is there the least clause or mention to leave any Remainder therein to them. First, he entailed the Crown to his eldest son Henry Prince of Wales; after him, to the heirs of his body: if they fail, then to Thomas of Lancaster his second son, and to the heirs of his body; so to his third son John of Lancaster, and to the heirs of his body. Lastly, to his fourth son Humphrey, and to the heirs of his body. The words are, post ipsum successivè hæredibus suis de ipsius corpore legitime procedendis; which is implicitly an express exclusion of the Beauforts (4). Our author adds in the margin, This Charter I saw in the hands of Sir Robert Cotton, and from it took these summary notes.

[B] He was elected Bishop of Lincoln, in the room of John Buckingham, who resigned.] On occasion of this promotion, Godwin complains (5) of the tyranny exercised at that time by the court of Rome. He tells us, that the Popes not only appointed Bishops in England, but deprived them at pleasure; which they generally effected by translating persons, without their consent, to other Sees, from which it was well known they could reap little or no advantage. Thus Urban VI extorted the archbishopric of York from Alexander Nevill, whom he translated, whether he would or no, was Chancellor of the university of Oxford, and at the same time Dean of Wells (c). He was Lord High-Chancellor of England in 1404, the fifth of his brother Henry IV. The next year, he succeeded William of Wickham, by Papal provision, in the See of Winchester, and received the spiritualities from the Archbishop of Canterbury, in the Bishop of London's palace, the 18th of March. He was again Lord-Chancellor in 1414, the second of his nephew King Henry V (d). The same year, he went over one of the King's Embassadors into France, to demand in marriage, Catherine, the daughter of Charles VI (e) [C]. He was a third time Lord-Chancellor in 1417, the fifth of Henry V (f). The same year, he lent the King his nephew twenty thousand pounds (a prodigious sum in those days) towards carrying on his expedition against France [D], and had the crown in pawn as a security for the money (g). This year also he took a journey to the Holy Land; and in his way, being arrived at Constance, where was held a General Council, he exhorted the Prelates to union and agreement in the election of a Pope; and his remonstrances contributed not a little to hasten the preparations for the Conclave, in which Martin III was elected (h). We have no farther account of what happened to our Prelate in this expedition. In 1421, he had the honour to be god-father, jointly with John Duke of Bedford, and Jacqueline, Countess of Holland, to Prince Henry, eldest son of his nephew Henry V, and Catherine of France, afterwards Henry VI (i). M. Aubery pretends, that James, King of Scots, who had been several years a prisoner in England, owed his deliverance to the Bishop of Winchester, who prevailed with the government to set him free, on condition of his marrying his niece, the grand-daughter of Thomas Beaufort, Earl of Somerset (k). This Prelate was one of King Henry Vth's guardians during his minority; and in 1424, the third of the young King's reign, he was a fourth time Lord-Chancellor of England (l). There were perpetual jealousies and quarrels between the Bishop of Winchester, and the Protector, Humphrey Duke of Gloucester [E], which ended in the ruin and death of the latter (m). Their dissensions began to appear publicly in the year 1425 (n), and rose to such an height [F], that Beaufort thought it necessary to that of St Andrew's in Scotland, from which, receiving no benefit, he lived in extreme poverty. In the same manner, the same Pope deprived Thomas Merks of the See of Carlisle; and Alexander V turned out Lewis from that of Bangor, trusting them (says my author) into certain shadowy Bishoprics *. And Boniface IX intended to have translated John Buckingham to the See of Lichfield, to make room for Henry Beaufort; but that Prelate, to make the injury done him the more glaring and notorious, chose rather to be without both, and, abdicating the See of Lincoln, retired to the monastery of Canterbury, where he took the habit, and lived a Bishop without a Bishopric to the day of his death.

[C] He went over — into France, to demand in marriage Catherine the daughter of Charles VI.] A French writer, cited by M. Aubery (6), tells us, that this year, 1414, the Duke of York, the Bishop of Winchester, and the Earl of Somerset, the King's uncles, with some other persons of distinction, came to Paris, to demand the King's daughter Catherine for the King of England. They were splendidly entertained by the King at his palace of the Louvre; but received for answer, that his Majesty could not for the present take the affair into his consideration. The ambassadors being to return home, and knowing that King Henry's intent was to make a descent with a powerful army in Normandy, desired to be conducted to Harfleur, and from thence to embark for England; but their real design was to take a view of that town and its fortifications. We shall set down the original, because it wants a little correction. *Celui an vindrent à Paris, par sans-conduit, le Duc d'Yorb , l'Archevesque de Vincerre, et le Comte † Dorsec, Oncles du Roy d'Angleterre, le Sire de Cornouaille, et autres Cheualiers Anglois, et Gens de Conseil, pour demander à auoir en mariage, pour ledit Roy d'Angleterre, Madame Katherine fille du Roy: lesquels Ambassadeurs furent moult grandement festoyez du Roy, en son Chastel du Louvre a Paris, et aussi Monseigneur de Berry en son Hostel de Neelle. Et fut donnee responce ausdits Ambassadeurs, que l'on ne pouoit entendre à cette matiere pour le present, et ainsi s'en retournerent. Et pour ce qu'ils scauoient que l'intention de leur Roy estoit de venir descendre en grande armee en Normandie, requierent qu'on les amenaist monter en mer à Harfleu pour aller en Angleterre. Mais le principal point estoit, pour regarder la ville, et comment elle estoit fortifiee.

[D] He lent the King 20,000 £. towards his expedition against France.] In the month of May (Speed tells us) a Parliament was held at Westminster, whose chief intent was to have means to continue the King's conquest in France; but such was the state of those lavish times, that, to stop the current of this melting mint, some, minding more the heaps of their money than the spreading abroad of England's faire monarchy, exhibited their bills unto the three Estates in Parliament, and petitioned the King to commiserate the poverty of the Commons, which (as they said) were beggered by these wars. For which cause, as it seemeth, no subsidy or ayde was demanded; but the King, pawning his Crown to his uncle Beaufort, the rich * Cardinal, for twenty thousand pounds, before the said month was expired, with foure thousand horse, and foure and twenty thousand foot, returned into France to follow those warres (7). Bishop Godwin tells us, that King Henry V, a little before his death, having, by his continual and expensive wars, contracted large debts, began to cast his eyes upon the wealth of the Church, which was then arrived at its highest pitch, and was even advised to supply his wants out of the spoils thereof. But the Bishop of Winchester, to stop this mischief in the birth, lent his nephew the above-mentioned sum out of his own pocket. Henricus Quintus Rex, paulo ante exitum, per continua maximeque bella ere alieno ingenti contracto, in opes Ecclesie (quae id temporis ad summum pervenerant) oculos cepit conjicere: neque deerant permulti, qui ex spoliis ejusdem inopiam suam sublevaret, hortarentur. Quapropter Praesul hic noster, ut huic malo tum primum pullulanti obviam iret, viginti librarum millia ex suis loculis deprompta, nepoti Regi mutuo dedit (8).

[E] There were perpetual jealousies and quarrels between the Bishop of Winchester and the Duke of Gloucester.] The grounds of their dissension are not certainly known; whether it was that the Bishop of Winchester was disgusted at the preference given to the Duke of Gloucester in the government of the kingdom; or that the Duke conceived an aversion to the Bishop on account of his perpetually opposing the excess of authority he would annex to the office of Protector.

[F] Their dissensions — rose to such an height, &c.] About Michaelmas, 1425 (an historian writes), Peter Duke of Coimbra, eldest son of the King of Portugal, came into England, and finding a kind and generous entertainment from the Protector and Nobles, staid the whole year, to inform himself of the customs, and enjoy the pleasures of the country. In the time of his abode here, there happened a fierce and mighty quarrel between the Protector and the rich Bishop of Winchester, Henry Beaufort, the King's great uncle, the English Pope, who in his magnificence and grandeur seemed so much to out-cessary to write a letter to his nephew the Duke of Bedford [G], Regent of France, desiring his presence in England, to accommodate matters between them. The Regent accordingly arriving in England the 20th of December (o), was met at his landing by the Bishop of Winchester with a numerous train (p), and soon after convoked an assembly of the Nobility at St Alban's [H], to hear and determine the affair. But the animosity on this occasion was so great on both sides, that it was thought proper to refer the decision to the Parliament, which was appointed to be held at Leicester the 25th of March following. The Parliament being met [I], the Duke of Gloucester produced six articles of accusation against the Bishop of Winchester, who put in his answers severally [K]; and a Committee shine the Protector himself, though on the throne almost, that he drew his Odium and hatred upon him; which was so increased by the haughty spirit of the Bishop, who being the Protector's uncle, and the Pope's Legate (), carried himself as if he were much above him both in nature and grace, that the Protector could not endure his pride; and so an implacable enmity grew between them, and great parties were raised on both sides for each other's defence, the Bishop's dependencies, money, and Church-power, making him able to contend with the Protector himself. The Duke of Coimbra, and the Archbishop of Canterbury, interposed themselves to reconcile them, and were so zealous to heal this dangerous breach, that they went from the one to the other ten times in one day; but all proved to no purpose. No mediations could pacify the mind of the Protector; and Winchester would yield no farther than was becoming his place and state, though he was willing, for the good of the nation, that the difference might be composed without arms (9). M. Rapin relates (10), that the Duke of Gloucester, going one day to the Tower, was refused admittance by Richard Woodvile the governor, at the instigation of the Bishop of Winchester; and a French writer (), cited by that historian, pretends the quarrel rose so high thereupon, that the Bishop was forced to take refuge in the Tower, and that five or six of his attendants were killed by those of the Duke. But this is not probable, since there was no mention made of it in their mutual complaints before the Parliament the year following.

[G] He wrote a letter to the Duke of Bedford.] It is extant in Hollinshed's Chronicles (11), and is as follows.

(* Right High and Mighty Prince, and my Right noble and after One, Leignest [Earthly] Lord. I recommend me unto you, [Your Grace] with all my heart. And as you desire the Welfare of the King our Sovereign Lord, and of his Realms of England and France, your own Weal [Health] with all yours [with Ours also] haste you hither: For by my Troth, if [and] you tarry [long] we shall put this land in jeopardy [adventure] with a Feild; such a brother you have here, God make him a good man. For your wisdom well knoweth, that the Profit of France standeth in the Welfare of England, &c. The blessed Trinity keep you. Written in great haste at London on Allhallowen-Even. By your Servant to my Lives end.

HENRY, Winchester.

This letter was sent over to the Regent by his chamberlain Sir Robert Butler.

[H] The Regent convoked an assembly of the nobility at St Alban's.] The Duke of Bedford had a nice affair upon his hands. If he had sided with the Duke his brother, as the ties of blood seemed to demand, he would have been a very improper person to discharge the office of mediator. And, besides the characters of brother and nephew, he had another to support, in order to act agreeably to his own duty and the just expectations of the people; namely, that of Protector, who ought to prefer the good of the State to the obligations of kindred. He therefore very judiciously threw the business off his own shoulders upon a general assembly of the Nobles.

[I] The Parliament being met, &c.] The meeting of the Parliament drawing nigh, when it was usual for the Lords to come with great numbers of servants and attendants, and it being feared that the great trains of the Protector and the Bishop of Winchester might fall into open war one with another, if no restraint were laid upon them; it was therefore thought fit, that the King should strictly forbid any person coming to it with swords or other warlike weapons: Which order, though it was literally observed, yet the Lords attendants came with Bats, or great clubs, on their shoulders, from whence this Parliament was called The Parliament of Bats; but this, as soon as it was taken notice of, was also prohibited (12).

[K] The Duke of Gloucester exhibited six articles against the Bishop of Winchester, who put in his answers severally.] As these articles were thought not unworthy the Parliament's notice, they may not be beneath the reader's perusal, and are as follows (13).

ARTICLES of Accusation presented to the Parliament by the Duke of Gloucester, against Henry, Bishop of Winchester, with his ANSWERS to them severally.

I. That Richard Woodvile, Esq; Keeper of the Tower of London, did, by the instigation and encouragement of the said Bishop of Winchester, deny admittance to him the said Duke of Gloucester, then being Protector of the kingdom, into the Tower, contrary to reason and duty, and in derogation to the King's authority.

To this Article the Bishop answered, 'That while the Duke of Gloucester was gone into Hainault, it happened that many Pamphlets and Reports being dispersed up and down the city of London, tending to Rebellion, it was ordered by the Lords of his Majesty's Council, that Richard Woodvile, Esq; should, with a sufficient number of armed men, have the keeping of the Tower, and should not permit any man to come into the Tower stronger than himself, without the special commandment of the King, by the advice of his Council. After this strict charge, the Duke of Gloucester, returning out of Hainault, and not approving the fortifying the Tower, told the citizens, who were dissatisfied at it, that had he been in England, it should not have been so; and immediately going to the Tower, demanded admittance; but Woodvile, not daring to give him entrance, came to the Bishop of Winchester for advice; who told him, that the Duke of Gloucester took upon him greater authority than he ought, and that before he admitted him into the Tower, he ought to provide himself a sufficient warrant of the Council and King for his so doing, contrary to the former order.'

II. That my Lord Bishop of Winchester, without the advice and consent of my Lord Duke of Gloucester, or of his Majesty's Privy-Council, contrived and purposed to lay hands of his Majesty's person, and to have removed him from Eltham, the place he was then in, to Windsor, there to put him under the government of such persons as he pleased.

The Bishop's Answer to this Article was, 'That he never could propound to himself any advantage, by removing the King, or taking him into his custody or charge; nor did ever intend to meddle with any thing about the King's person, without the advice of the Privy-Council, as in time and place he could prove.'

III. That my Lord Bishop of Winchester, knowing that the Duke of Gloucester had resolved to prevent his design of seizing the King's person at Eltham, laid wait for him, by placing armed men at the end of London-Bridge, and in the windows of the chambers and cellars in Southwark to have killed him, if he had passed that way; all which is against the King's peace, and duty of a true subject.

Committee appointed for that purpose having examined the allegations, the Bishop was acquitted [L]. The Duke of Bedford however, to give some satisfaction to the Protector, took away the Great-seal from his uncle (q). Two years after, the Duke of Bedford, returning into France, was accompanied to Calais by the Bishop of Winchester (r), who, on the 25th of March, received there with great solemnity, in the church of Our Lady, the Cardinal's hat [M], with the title of St Eusebius, sent him by Pope Martin V (s). In September 1428, the new Cardinal returned into England, with the character of the Pope's Legate lately conferred on him; and in his way to London, he was met by the Lord-Mayor, Aldermen, and the principal citizens on horse-back, who conducted him with great honour and respect to his lodgings in Southwark (t). But he was forced for the present to waive his Legantine power, being forbid the exercise of it by a proclamation published in the King's name [N]. Cardinal Beaufort was appointed, by the Pope's bull, bearing date March 25, 1427-8 (u), his Holiness's Legate in Germany, and General of the Crusade against the Hussites, or Heretics of Bohemia [O]. Having communicated the

The Bishop's defence to this heavy charge was this; That true indeed it is, that he did provide a certain number of armed men, and set them at the foot of London-Bridge, and other places, without any intention to do any bodily harm to the Duke of Gloucester, but merely for his own safety and defence; being informed by several credible persons, that my Lord Duke of Gloucester had purposed bodily harm to him, and gathered together a company of citizens for that end.

IV. That the late King Henry the Fifth told him, that when he was Prince, a man was seized in his chamber, who was hid behind the hangings, and confessed, after his apprehension, that he was set at work by the Bishop of Winchester to kill the Prince in his bed. He was delivered to the Earl of Arundel, who drowned him in a sack in the Thames.

To this Accusation the Bishop replied, 'That he was ever a true and faithful subject to his Sovereigns, and never purposed or contrived any treason against any of their persons, and especially against his Sovereign Lord King Henry the Fifth. And this he thought was sufficiently evident to any that considered the great wisdom and courage of the said King; and the great trust he reposed in him so long as he remained King, which he would not have done, had he found him guilty of such unfaithfulness to him while he was Prince.'

V. That the Bishop of Winchester, in the sickness of King Henry the Fourth, advised his son Prince Henry to assume the government of the nation before his father's death, as the said Prince himself told him.

The Bishop replied, 'That this was meer calumny, which could not be proved; and he hoped the Parliament would appoint them judges, that he might vindicate his honour, or else leave him to sue out his right before suitable judges.'

VI. That my Lord Bishop of Winchester had, in his letter to the Duke of Bedford, plainly declared his malicious purpose of assembling the people, and stirring up a Rebellion in the nation, contrary to the King's peace.

The Bishop's Answer to this Accusation was, 'That he never had any intention to disturb the peace of the nation, or raise any Rebellion, but sent to the Duke of Bedford to come over in haste, to settle all things that were prejudicial to the peace; and though he had indeed written in the letter, that if he carried, we shall put the land in adventure by a field, such a brother ye have here, he did not mean it of any design of his own, but concerning the seditious assemblies of Masons, Carpenters, Tilers, and Plasterers, who being distastful by the late Act of Parliament against excessive wages of those trades, had given out many seditious speeches and menaces against the Great Men, which tended much to Rebellion; and yet the Duke of Gloucester did not use his endeavour, as he ought to have done in his place, to suppress such unlawful assemblies, so that he feared the King and his good subjects must have made a field to withstand them; to prevent which he chiefly desired the Duke of Bedford to come over.'

[L] The Bishop was acquitted.] The Committee, appointed by the Parliament for examining the Allegations and Answers, were, Henry Archbishop of Canterbury, Thomas Duke of Exeter, John Duke of Norfolk, Thomas Bishop of Durham, Philip Bishop of Worcester, John Bishop of Bath and Wells, Humphrey Earl of Stafford, Ralph Lord Cornwall, and Mr Alnwick, Keeper of the Privy-Seal; who, having thoroughly examined all the matters, acquitted the Bishop of Winchester, and by a formal award enjoined the two Princes to be firm friends for the future; and by such inducements wrought upon them, that they shook hands, and parted with all outward signs of perfect love and agreement; which gave mighty satisfaction to all people, both of the Clergy and Laity. And the King, by the advice of his Council, made a magnificent feast at Whitfuntide, to rejoice for this happy reconciliation (14). Speed tells us (15), the Duke and the Bishop swore friendship, the one upon his princehood, and the other upon his priest-hood.

[M] He received — the Cardinal's Hat.] The late King Henry V opposed Beaufort's promotion to the dignity of a Cardinal as long he lived; but in this reign, the King being very young, and the Duke of Bedford his friend, he was at liberty to obtain his ambitious purpose. The Regent staid some time at Calais to see the ceremony of his uncle's Inauguration; which being over, that Prince, taking the new Cardinal by his right hand, conveyed him with great respect to his lodging, and there entertained him, and the Lords with him, at a magnificent banquet (16).

[N] He was forbid to exercise the Legantine power, by a proclamation published in the King's name.] His return with such an increase of dignity and power was not at all pleasing to the Duke of Gloucester, who, as soon as he heard he was landed, caused a Proclamation to be published in the King's name, declaring, that Whereas the Most Christian King Henry VI, and his Progenitors, Kings before him of this Realm of England, have been heretofore possessed time out of mind with a special privilege and custom used and observed in this realm, from time to time, that no Legate from the Apostolic See shall enter this land, or any of the King's dominions, without the Calling, Petition, Request, Invitation, or Desire of the King; and forasmuch as Henry, Bishop of Winchester, and Cardinal of St Eusebius, hath presumed to enter as Legate from the Pope, being neither called nor desired by the King; therefore the King, by his Procurator Richard Caudray, doth protest, by this instrument, that it standeth not with the King's mind or intent, by the advice of his Council, to admit, approve, or ratify, the coming of the said Legate in any wise, in derogation of the rights and customs of this realm, or to allow and assent to any exercise of his Legantine power, or to any Acts attempted by him, contrary to the said laws (17).

[O] He was appointed — the Pope's Legate — against the Hussites, or Heretics of Bohemia.] These Heretics, as they were called, having thrown off their subjection to the Pope, not only fortified themselves in Bohemia, but began to make war upon their neighbours. Whereupon Pope Martin V sent Embassadors into Germany, to stir up the Catholic Princes against them, and at the same time appointed Cardinal Beaufort his Legate, granting him a tenth of the ecclesiastical revenues in England for the maintenance of the forces he should raise (18). In the Bull for this purpose, his Holiness implored him by the wounds of Christ,

Pope's intentions to the Parliament, he obtained a grant of money, and a considerable body of forces, under certain restrictions [P]. But, just as he was preparing to embark, the Duke of Bedford having sent to demand a supply of men for the French war, it was resolved in Council, that Cardinal Beaufort should serve under the Regent [Q], with the troops of the Crusade, to the end of the month of December, on condition they should not be employed in any siege (w). The Cardinal complied, tho' not without reluctance, and accordingly joined the Duke of Bedford at Paris (x). After a stay of forty-five days in France [R], he marched into Bohemia, where he conducted the Crusade [S], till he was recalled by the Pope [T], and Cardinal Julian sent in his place with a larger army (y). The next year, 1430, the Cardinal accompanied King Henry into France (z), being invested with the title of the King's Principal Counsellor (a), and had the honour to perform the ceremony of crowning the young monarch in the church of Nôtre Dame at Paris (b); where he had some dispute with James du Chastellier, the Archbishop, who claimed the right of officiating on that occasion (c). During his stay in France, he stood godfather to the Duke of Burgundy's son. He was present at the Congress of Arras for concluding a peace between the Kings of England and France, and had a conference for that purpose with the Dukes of Burgundy, between Calais and Gravelines; which had no effect, and was remarkable only for the Cardinal's magnificence [U], who came thither with a most splendid train (d). In the mean time the Duke of Gloucester took advantage in England of the Cardinal's absence to give him fresh mortification. For first, having represented to the Council, that the Bishop of Winchester intended to leave the King, and come back into England, to resume his seat in Council, in order to excite new troubles in the kingdom,

Christ, his zeal for the Church, and as he tendered his own salvation, to contribute his utmost assistance to extirpate those Heretics, who had so long withstood the Emperor and other Princes of Europe (19). The Cardinal had also some unusual powers in his commission; for he was allowed to relax the customary penance of those who had debauched Nuns; to dispense with matrimony in the fourth degree of consanguinity; to confer orders and benefices under the age prescribed by the Canons; and, in short, to supersede the discipline and constitutions of the Church in several other instances (20). M. Rapin conjectures (21), that the Pope might have another view besides that of extirpating Heretics. As he was inclined to favour King Charles of France, he might hope to weaken England by drawing from thence money and troops under pretence of a Crusade.

[P] The Parliament granted him a sum of money, and a considerable body of forces, under certain restrictions. The conditions, upon which the Cardinal's petition was granted, are dated at Westminster, June 18, 1429 (22). These were the chief: That the money, which the King's subjects give for the service of the Crusade, shall be raised by commissioners to be appointed by the King: That the Gold and Silver shall not be carried out of the Realm, but employed in merchandize: That the Cardinal shall raise in all but 250 Spear-men, and 2500 Bow-men, including therein all that are inclined to serve without pay: That the Pope shall impose no tax for this cause, either upon the Laity or Clergy, but shall be content with every person's voluntary contribution: That, before the departure of the troops, sufficient security be given to the Council for their return: That it shall be said expressly in the Proclamation of the Crusade, that the same is published by the consent of the King: That the person, who is to command those troops, as also all the officers, shall have their commissions from the King: That, in case the Crusade does not take place, the money received of the subjects shall be converted to no use, which has not the King's express approbation. All these articles are plainly so many precautions against the pretensions of the Popes, and to prevent the abuses of former Crusades.

[Q] It was resolved — that the Cardinal should serve under the Regent.] The CONVENTION between the King and the Cardinal, by which the latter engaged to serve six months in France, with the troops raised for the Crusade, under the command of the Duke of Bedford, is dated at Rocheber, July 1, 1429 (23). This shews that the Cardinal did not go to Germany till the year 1430, at the soonest; though Mechovius, and after him Spondanus, say he went thither in 1428. This mistake seems to have arisen from the date of Martin the Fifth's Bull, appointing the Cardinal of Winchester his Legate; which was dated March 25, 1427-8, but was not received by the Cardinal till June, 1429.

[R] He staid forty-five days in France. Polydore

Vergil informs us (24), that the Duke of Bedford, being joined by the forces under Cardinal Beaufort, resolved to hazard a general battle, and for that purpose marched against the enemy; but finding that King Charles declined as much as possible coming to an engagement, he returned with his army to Paris, and the Cardinal was at liberty to pursue his intended expedition.

[S] He conducted the Crusade. The author last cited tells us (25), the Cardinal did signal service to the Christian (he should have said the Papal) cause, during the few months he continued in Bohemia, and that he behaved with great gallantry in that Holy war. Quo ubi pervenit, cum omnia flagrare bello reperisset, rem Christianam pro virili parte fortiter juvare cepit, mansitque in Boemis aliquot per menses. — Ac ita Henricus, post egregiam sacro bello enervatam operam, domum incolumis rediit. M. Aubery represents the success of this expedition very differently. He tells us (26), the Germans raised three bodies of forces under the command of the Duke of Saxony, the Marquis of Brandenburg, and the Archbishop of Treves; which entering Bohemia at three different places were attacked and put to flight by the Bohemians; and that Cardinal Beaufort coming up, endeavoured in vain to rally them, and was forced to retreat with them, to avoid being taken prisoner.

[T] He was recalled by the Pope] This circumstance seems to confirm M. Aubery's account of the Cardinal's ill success in the Bohemian war. But it is not true, what that author adds (27), that he immediately returned into England, and raised fresh forces for the carrying on that war; which, instead of employing against the enemies of the Holy Sec, he turned against the King of France; and that the Pope thereupon wrote to him sharply, reproaching him for undertaking a Crusade against the first kingdom of Christendom. For it does not appear, that there was a second levy of troops in England for that Crusade; and, if there were, yet the Cardinal's serving in France evidently belongs to the first expedition.

[U] The conference was remarkable only for the Cardinal's magnificence. The old French writer (28), cited by M. Aubery (29), tells us, the English came with great pomp, and very richly dressed; and particularly the Cardinal of Winchester had ordered several rich tents and pavillions finely adorned to be brought thither, and a great quantity of gold and silver plate; and that he gave a most splendid entertainment to the Dukes of Burgundy, his great niece. Et quant est aux Anglois, ils y estoient venus en grande pompe et bou-bant, et moult richement habillez. Et par dessus ledit Cardinal de Winchester y avoit fait venir de moult riches tentes et paillions bien parez et aornez, et de tout ce qui y faillloit tant de vaisselle d'or et d'argent, comme d'autres besonges necessaires et delectables. Et fist à la dite Duchesse sa belle niece moult joyeuse chiere et reception, et la festoya tres-honorablement.

dom, and that his intentions were the more criminal, in that he made use of the Pope's authority to free himself from the obligations of assisting the King in France; he procured an Order of Council forbidding all the King's subjects of what condition soever to accompany the Cardinal, if he should leave the King, without express permission (e). The next step the Protector took against him, was an attempt to deprive him of his bishopric, as inconsistent with the dignity of Cardinal [W]; but the affair having been a long time debated in Council, it was resolved that the Cardinal should be heard, and the Judges consulted, before any decision (f). Being returned into England, he thought it necessary to take some precaution against these repeated attacks. Wherefore he prevailed with the King, thro' the intercession of the Commons, to grant him letters of pardon for all offences by him committed contrary to the statute of Provisors, and other acts of Præmunire. This pardon is dated at Westminster, July 19, 1432 (g). Five years after, he procured another pardon under the Great-Seal for all sorts of crimes whatever, from the creation of the world to the 26th of July, 1437 (h). Notwithstanding these precautions, the Duke of Gloucester, in 1442, drew up articles of impeachment against the Cardinal [X], and presented them with his own hands to the King, desiring that judgment might pass upon him according to his crimes. The King referred the matter to his Council; which, being composed chiefly of ecclesiastical persons, and consequently inclined to favour the Cardinal, deferred the examination thereof so long, that the Protector, grown weary of their delays, let fall the prosecution, and so the Cardinal escaped (i). This famous Prelate died the 11th of June, 1447 (k); having survived the Duke of Gloucester not above a month, of whose murder he was suspected to have been one of the contrivers. It is said, he expressed great impatience and uneasiness of mind at the approach of death, and died in a [W] The Protector attempted to deprive him of his Bishopric, as inconsistent with the dignity of Cardinal] There is extant in Rymer's Fœdera, &c. (30) the petition of the King's Attorney-General, praying that the Cardinal of Winchester may be deprived of his Bishopric, dated November the 6th, 1431. He supported his demand by the examples of Simon Langham and Robert Kilwardi, formerly Archbishops of Canterbury, who, being made Cardinals, did thereupon resign the Archbishopric. It appears likewise by this petition, that the Cardinal had obtained of the court of Rome an exemption from the Archbishop of Canterbury's jurisdiction, for himself, for the city, and for the whole diocese of Winchester. And this was what the Duke of Gloucester made a handle of against him, in order to convince the Council of the inconveniency there was in permitting Cardinals to enjoy Bishoprics in England.

(31) See Complete Hist.
390.

I. That the Bishop of Winchester had not only taken upon himself the dignity and title of a Cardinal, contrary to the express command of King Henry the Fifth, and in derogation to the Church of Canterbury: But,

II. Having forfeited his Bishopric thereby by the Act of Provisions, he had procured a Bull from the Pope to secure his Bishopric still to him, contrary to the laws of the realm, which made it Præmunire so to do.

III. That the said Cardinal, with John Kemp, Archbishop of York, had assumed the government of the King's person and the realm, which no subject could do without a treasonable usurpation.

IV. That the said Bishop had defrauded the King of his jewels. — This article, probably, was founded upon Beaufort's taking the Crown in pawn for the 20,000 l. he lent King Henry V.

V. That being Chancellor of England, he had against Law set at liberty the King of Scots, and forgiven him part of his ransom upon condition the said King should marry his niece.

VI. That the said Bishop had defrauded the King by taking the customs of wool, and other merchandizes, at the Port of Southampton. — Probably, he repaid himself this way the sums he had lent the King.

VII. That notwithstanding the said Cardinal neither hath, nor can have, any title to the Crown, yet he presumeth to take upon him the Royal Dignity, in summoning and calling persons before him, in derogation of the King's authority, being without his permission or command. — This article must refer to the Cardinal's behaviour in quality of the Pope's Legate.

VIII. That the said Cardinal had obtained a pardon from Rome, to exempt his diocese from paying of tenths to the State, and so had given both an ill example to the other Bishops to do the like, and laid the whole burthen upon the Laity, to the great discontent of the kingdom.

IX. That the said Cardinal had been a means of uniting the French and the Duke of Burgundy, and this latter with the Duke of Orleans, to the great damage of the Realm, and benefit of our adversaries the French.

X. That the said Cardinal, after communication had with our enemies, sent the Archbishop of York to the King, to persuade him to quit his right and title to the Crown and kingdom of France for certain years, and be content with writing himself Rex Angliæ, &c. to the great disgrace of the King and his Progenitors.

XI. That the release of the Duke of Orleans was brought to pass only by the mediation and procurement of the said Cardinal and the Duke of York, contrary to the will of King Henry the Fifth.

XII. That being Chancellor, he had, instead of promoting the good of the King, bought his lands and manors of him.

XIII. That the said Cardinal, by sending such Captains and Soldiers into France as he thought fit, hath been the cause that so much of Normandy and other parts are lost.

XIV. That the Cardinal hath sold commissions of Captains and other officers for money in France, whereby unfit persons have been put into the army, to the loss of the King's dominions there.

It is said the Duke of Gloucester was extremely incensed against Cardinal Beaufort for instigating (as was generally thought) certain persons to accuse and prosecute his Dukes for treason, witchcraft, and other notorious crimes; and that revenge for this injury put him upon taking a strict review of that Prelate's conduct for many years past, and of drawing up the above-recited articles; which amounted to no less than a charge of high-treason, and which, the Protector maintained, could not come within the intention of the Amnesties heretofore granted him by the King.

fort of despair [Y]. He lies buried under a fair monument on the south side of the high altar of the cathedral church of Winchester [Z]. Godwin tells us (l), that Cardinal Beaufort, in his youth, had a daughter named Jane, by Alice the daughter of Richard Earl of Arundel, and sister of the Archbishop of Canterbury; whom he afterwards gave in marriage to Sir Edward Stradling of Glamorganshire. He left an immense sum by will to pious and charitable uses, particularly (if Harpsfield is to be believed) 400,000 l. * to the prisons of London. He ordered ten thousand masses to be said for his soul. He distributed two thousand marks to the poorer tenants of the bishopric, and forgave the rest all that was due to him at the time of his death (m). Besides these benefactions, he founded a hospital near that of St Cross at Winchester, and settled an estate upon it of 158 l. 13 s. 4 d. per annum, according to the then valuation of money, besides the lands belonging to the college of Fordinbridge, for the maintenance of a master, two Chaplains, thirty-five poor men, and three nurseries (n). He left to almost every cathedral church and monastery in England, jewels and plate of a considerable value, and particularly to the church of Wells, of which he had been Dean, 283 ounces of gilt plate, and 148 l. in money (o). He is usually distinguished by the title of The rich Cardinal of Winchester; but in our publick records, he is every where stiled The Cardinal of England, doubtless because he was of Royal extraction. Tho' the generality of our historians give Beaufort the character of an ambitious, haughty, and turbulent Prelate, yet they seem to agree, that by his death the King lost one of his faithfulest and best counsellors, and that the state of affairs from that time grew every day worse and worse (p).

[Y] He died in a sort of despair.] Harpsfield tells us (32), that in his last sickness, being confined to his bed, he uttered such complaints as these: And must I then dye? Will not all my riches save me? I could purchase the kingdom, if that would prolong my life. What! is there no bribing of death? When my nephew the Duke of Bedford died, I thought my happiness and my authority greatly increased; but the Duke of Gloucester's death raised me in fancy to a level with Kings, and I thought of nothing but accumulating still greater wealth, to purchase at last the triple crown. Alas! how are my hopes disappointed! Wherefore, O my friends, let me earnestly beseech you to pray for me, and recommend my departing soul to God. Cum enim ex suprema ægritudine lecto affigeretur, ad hunc modum questus fertur. Cur ego tantis tandem copiis accumulata affluens, supremum diem obirem? Si vel ipsum regnum vitam meam redimere veleret, aut ingenio illud, aut pecunia comparare possem. Quid! An pecunia ad depellendam mortem nullas habet vires? Cum nepos meus Bedfordiensis Dux fato sanctus esset, putabam magnam felicitati et auctoritati meæ accessionem adjunctam; at post Glocestrensis obitum, parem me etiam regibus censebam, majoresque accumulare opes cogitabam, ut triplici illa tandem tiara pontificia potirem. Sed video insigniter me circumventum. Quare à vobis postulo, ut egressuram animam Deo veltris precibus commendetis. Next to the Historians, let us set down the Poet's description of Cardinal Beaufort's death, which is painted in such lively colours, that the reader, I am sure, will not be displeas'd with the length of the citation.

K. Henry. Ah! what a sign it is of evil life,
Where death's approach is seen so terrible!

War. Beaufort, it is thy Sovereign speaks to thee.

Card. Bring me unto my tryal, when you will.

Dy'd he * not in his bed? where shou'd he dye?

Can I make men live whe're they will or no?

Oh, torture me no more, I will confess —

Alive again? then shew me, where he is:

I'll give a thousand pound to look upon him —

He hath no eyes, the dust hath blinded them:

Comb down his hair; look! look! it stands upright

Like lime-twigs set to catch my winged soul:

Give me some drink, and bid th' Apothecary

Bring the strong poison that I bought of him.

K. Henry. O thou Eternal Mover of the Heav'ns,

Look with a gentle eye upon this wretch;

Oh, beat away the busie, meddling, fiend,

That lays strong siege unto this wretch's soul,

And from his bosom purge this black despair.

War. See how the pangs of death do make him grin.

Sal. Disturb him not, let him pass peaceably.

K. Henry. Peace to his Soul, if God's good pleasure be!

Lord Cardinal, if thou think'st on Heaven's bliss,

Lift up thy hand, make signal of thy hope.

— He dies, and makes no sign. — O God forgive him.

War. So bad a death argues a monstrous life.

K. Henry. Forbear to judge, for we are sinners all.

Close up his eyes, and draw the curtain close,

And let us all to meditation.

(*) Meaning the Duke of Gloucester.

SCENE the Cardinal's Bed-chamber (33).

Enter King Henry, Salisbury, and Warwick, to the Cardinal in bed.

K. Henry. How fares my Lord? Speak, Beaufort, to thy Sovereign.

Card. If thou best death, I'll give thee England's treasure, Enough to purchase such another Island,

So thou wilt let me live, and feel no pain.

BEAUFORT (JOAN) Queen of Scotland, was the eldest daughter of John Beaufort Earl of Somerset, (son of John of Gaunt) by Margaret, daughter of Thomas Holand Earl of Kent (a); and niece to the famous Henry Beaufort, Cardinal of St Eusebius, and Bishop of Winchester. The time and place of her birth are unknown. In February 1423 she was married, with great solemnity, in the church of St Mary Overrey in Southwark, to James the First, King of Scotland (b), who had been prisoner in England ever since the thirtieth of March 1404 [A]. Her portion was forty thousand marks.

marks (c). This match was procured by her uncle, the Bishop of Winchester above-mentioned, in order to strengthen and support his family by an alliance with the kingdom of Scotland (d). She set out, with the King her husband, for Scotland, in March 1423, being attended as far as Berwick by her father, and her uncle the Cardinal; and, on the twentieth of that month, arrived at Edinburgh (e). She was crowned with him the twenty-second of May 1424 (f). Through her merciful intercession with the King in 1427, she saved the life of Alexander Lord of the Isles, who had committed some acts of hostility; and in 1431, that of Archibald Earl of Douglas, who was suspected of treason (g). The sixteenth day of October 1430, she was delivered at Stirling of two sons at one birth; which were baptized by the names of Alexander and James. Alexander died young, but James lived to succeed his father (h). In the year 1437, she received an information of a conspiracy forming against the King her husband's life; upon which, she went post to him to Roxburgh, and informed him thereof (i). But, notwithstanding her precaution, the King was most cruelly murdered in the Dominican's abbey at Perth, by the faction of Walter, Earl of Athol, his uncle [B], on the twenty-first of February, 1436-7, in the thirteenth year of his reign; and was buried in the Charter-House at Perth, which he had founded. When the ruffians rushed into the room, the Queen, to her everlasting honour, so long shrowded the King from the assassins with her own body, that she received two wounds before she could be drawn off him. — She married to her second husband James Stewart, called the Black Knight, son to the Lord of Lorne, and dying in the year 1446, was buried at Perth, near the King her first husband (k). By her second husband, she had a son, named John, who was afterwards Earl of Athol (l).

man, and entirely governed by his ambitious and haughty brother, the Duke of Albany, who aspired to the Crown, and had starved to death the eldest Prince, David; the King resolved to put his younger son Prince James, out of that treacherous man's power, by sending him into France to be educated, and accordingly put him on board a vessel. The young Prince falling near the coast of Norfolk, and finding himself sea sick, went on shore for refreshment. But he was no sooner landed, than seized by some mariners of Clay, and brought to the King (*), who was so cruel as to confine him in the Tower. In vain did the Scotch Prince deliver King Henry a letter from the King his father, in case any accident should oblige him to land in his dominions. Henry only answered with a poor jest, telling him, There was no occasion to go to Paris to learn French, for he understood it himself, and would teach it him (1). The King of Scotland dying soon after, the Duke of Albany, and the other Regents of that kingdom, found it too much for their advantage to have the young King kept at a distance from his dominions, to attempt to ransom him; though they sent, for form-sake, Embassadors almost every year under pretence of soliciting his liberty (2). On the third of August 1413, he was removed from the Tower to Windsor castle (3): And in 1416 had leave to go and spend some time in his own kingdom, having given security for his return. Accordingly he came back; and in 1419 accompanied King Henry V into France, in order to send back 7000 Scots, that assisted the French there against the English, but they refused to obey his orders. At length, troubles arising in Scotland about the year 1423, the States of that kingdom agreed to send Embassadors, to treat of their King's ransom: And he was accordingly set at liberty, upon engaging to pay forty thousand pounds, namely, 10,000 marks within six months after his return to Scotland, and 10,000 marks every year till the whole was paid (4). But, in consideration of his marriage, 10,000 marks of that sum were abated (5). Though King Henry used him extremely ill, in barbarously imprisoning him, against all law and equity; yet it must be owned, that he took care to give him a princely education, and by procuring him the best masters in all sciences, rendered him a very accomplished person (6).

[B] He was most cruelly murdered ——— by the faction of Walter, Earl of Athol, his uncle.] This Walter was King Robert the second's eldest son by his second marriage, and was a most cruel, wicked, and subtle man. Having been told by a wizard, 'That before his death, he should be crowned in a great 'concourse of people,' he formed the project of taking off the King by poison, in order to seize his crown. But the plot being discovered, and the King having left suddenly, upon that account, the siege of Roxburgh, in which he was engaged, and repaired to Perth, where he lodged himself in the Dominicans abbey, near the walls of the town, for the safety of his person; Walter determined to murder him that very night: For that purpose he bribed one of the King's domestic servants, who gave him and his accomplices admittance into the King's chamber, where they executed their villainous design. But Walter was most severely punished, during three days, for his most detestable crime. The first day he had his body all disjointed by an engine fixed on a cart. The second day, he was put upon an high pillory like a throne, and had a red hot iron crown put on his head, with this motto, The King of all Traitors. The third day, he was dragged through the streets on a hurdle, bowelled, beheaded, and then quartered (7).

Derby, who had no issue by her (e): He died in the year 1504 (f). This good and pious lady performed, all her life-time, so many noble acts, and charitable deeds, that, as Stow expresses it (g); they cannot be expressed in a small volume. Avarice she hated (h), and therefore was daily dispensing all suitable relief and assistance to the distressed and the indigent. In particular, she kept constantly in her house twelve poor people, whom she provided with lodging, victuals, and clothes (i). She was also a mother to the Students in both the universities, and a Patroness to all the learned men of England (k). And she manifested her great regard for them, by her munificent foundations for the encouragement of learning. For, on the eighth of September 1502, she instituted two perpetual publick Lectures in Divinity, one at Oxford and the other at Cambridge (l); each of which she endowed with twenty marks a year [C]. In 1504, Octob. 30, she founded a perpetual publick preacher at Cambridge, with a salary of ten pounds a year [D], whose duty was, to preach at least six sermons every year, at several churches (specified in the foundation) in the dioceses of London, Ely, and Lincoln (m). She also founded a perpetual chantry in the church of Winburne-minster in Dorsetshire [E], for one Priest to teach Grammar freely, to all that would come, while the world should endure (n), with a stipend of ten pounds a year. But her noblest foundations were, the colleges of Christ, and St John, in Cambridge: The former, founded in the year 1505 (o), for one Master, twelve Fellows, and forty-seven Scholars [F]: The latter in the year 1508, for a master, and fifty Fellows and Scholars [G]. But this being just begun, or rather only designed, before her decease; was completed and finished by her executors, the chief of whom was John Fisher Bishop of Rochester. The charter of foundation bears date April 9, 1511 (p). And the college was opened July 29, 1516 (q). The worthy founders was eminent not only for her charity, but also for her exemplary piety, according to the manner of those superstitious times [H]. And after having lived sixty-eight years, an ornament to her sex, and a publick benefit to mankind, she departed this life at Westminster the twenty-ninth of June 1509, in the first year of her grandson King Henry the VIIth's reign (r); and was buried in the fourth-isle of the beautiful chapel, erected by her son King Henry VII, adjoining to Westminster-Abbey. Her monument, of black marble and touch-stone, is yet extant and entire; whereon lies her effigies of gilt copper, in robes doubled with ermine, and the head encircled with a coronet (s). Round the verge, on a fillet of brass, is an inscription (given in the note [I] below) which, as we are informed (t), was composed by the most renowned Erasmus.

[D] A perpetual publick preacher at Cambridge, &c. See a catalogue of all the preachers to the year 1708, before the Lady Margaret's funeral sermon, mentioned above. The institution hath been altered, by royal dispensation, from six sermons in three several dioceses (as mentioned above), to one sermon before the university, at the beginning of Easter-Term (7). The Lady Margaret did not appoint such a preacher at Oxford, as Mr Wood imagines (8).

[E] She also founded a perpetual chantry in the church of Winburne. Where her father and mother lay buried. See Sandford's and Stebbing's genealogical History (9).

[F] Christ's college — founded in the year 1505, &c.] It was built in the place where stood God's house, a small hostel erected by King Henry VI, wherein he had placed four Fellows, which he intended to augment to the number of sixty (10). The Countess of Richmond endowed her College with — the manors of Malton, Meldred, and Beach, and several other lands and rents, all in Cambridgeshire. — The manor of Ditesworth, with lands and tenements in Ditesworth, Kegworth, Hathern, and Wolton, in Leicestershire. — The abbey of Creke in Norfolk. — The manor of Royden in Essex, exchanged afterwards with King Edward VI for the revenues of Bromwell-Abbey. — And the impropriation of Manibire in Wales. King Edward VI added one Fellowship, upon a complaint made to him, that the master and the twelve fellows contained a superstitious allusion to Christ and his twelve Apostles. He also added three Scholarships, by the benefaction of J. Fisher, Bishop of Rochester, Sir Walter Mildmay, Richard Banting, and others, it contains at present fifteen Fellows, and fifty-six Scholars (11).

[G] The latter (St John's college) in the year 1508. It was built in the place where stood an hospital for Canons regular, erected by Nigel, second Bishop of Ely, in 1134, and converted afterwards, by his successor Hugh de Balsam, into a Priory, dedicated to St John the Evangelist (12). The founders endowed it, by her will, with the issues, profits, and revenues of her estate and lands, in the counties of Devon, Somerset, and Northampton, to the value of 400 l. a year, and upwards (13); besides the revenues of the Priory on which it was built, amounting to 80 l. 1 s. 10 d. ob. per ann. and a licence of mortmain for 50 l. a year more. But the King, as heir at law, suing for, and recovering the founders's estate (14), the original foundation of this college consisted only of part of the Countess of Richmond's estate at Fordham in Cambridgeshire; the revenues of the dissolved Priory on which it was erected; and the hospital of Ospring in Kent, valued at 70 l. a year, and procured by Bishop Fisher (15). The expence of new building the college amounted to betwixt four and five thousand pounds (16). This house, though so very small in it's beginning, is, by the munificence of several benefactors, particularly Archbishop Morton, and Archbishop Williams, become one of the largest and most considerable in the university, and consists at present of fifty-nine Fellows, and one hundred and fifteen Scholars (17).

[H] She was eminent for her exemplary piety. She used to rise about five o'clock in the morning, and from that hour till dinner-time, (which was then ten o'clock) she continued, almost without ceasing, in meditation and prayer; which she resumed again after dinner, as the curious reader may see in her funeral sermon (18). She also translated some books of devotion from French into English (19).

[I] Round the verge, on a fillet of brass, is an inscription. Which is as follows: *Margaretæ. Ricemondiae. Septimæ. Henrici. Marri OBarvi. Aviae. Quae. Stipendiâ. Constituit. Trib. Hoc. Coenobio. BEAUMONT (a) (LEWIS), Bishop of Durham in the reign of King Edward II, was descended from the royal blood of the Kings of France and Sicily (b), and thereby related to Queen Isabella (c). He was made Treasurer of Salisbury in the year 1294 (d), and from thence advanced to the See of Durham in 1317 [A]. It was with difficulty Pope John XXII consented to his consecration, for which he paid so large a sum of money to the Holy See, that he was never able entirely to discharge the debt it involved him in (e). As he was on the road to Durham, accompanied by two Cardinals [B], in order to be installed, he was attacked by a party of Scotch, headed by one Gilbert Middleton [C]; who, having plundered all their baggage, suffered the Cardinals to proceed, but carried the Bishop, and his brother Henry, prisoners to Mitford Castle, and obliged them to pay a large sum of money for their ransom, towards which the Prior of Durham was forced to sell the habits, plate, and jewels of the church. After this, Beaumont was consecrated at Westminster, on the feast of the Annuntiation 1318 (f). This Prelate vigorously defended the rights of his church, and recovered to it several estates, which had been alienated from it in the time of his predecessor Anthony Bek (g); the Judges passing this sentence in his favour, that the Bishop of Durham ought to have the forfeitures in war WITHIN the liberties of his church, as the King has WITHOUT [D]. In 1328, this Bishop had a dispute with the Metropolitan of York, concerning the right of visitation in the jurisdiction of Allerton; and whenever the Archbishop came thither to visit, the Bishop of Durham always opposed him with an armed force. After much litigation and expence, the matter was at last accommodated, the Archbishop appropriating the Church of Lek for the maintenance of the Bishop's table, with the reserve of an annual pension to himself, and another to the Chapter of York (h). Bishop Beaumont built a hall and kitchen at Middleham, and began a chapel, but did not live to finish it. He died at Brentingham in the diocese of York, September the 24th 1333, having sat fifteen years; and lies buried near the high-altar of his church, under a marble stone [E], ornamented with brass plates, which he had ordered to be made in his life-time (i). He was very avaritious, and at the same time very expensive [F]; of a handsome mein, but lame in both

[A] He was advanced to the See of Durham in 1317. There were several candidates for the vacant bishopric. The Earl of Lancaster made interest for one John de Kynardley, promising, in case of his election, to defend the See against the Scots. The Earl of Hereford pushed for John Walwayn, a Civilian. The King, who was then at York, would have promoted the election of Thomas Charlton, a Civilian, and keeper of his Privy-Seal: But the Queen interposed so warmly in behalf of her kinsman Lewis Beaumont, that the King was prevailed upon to write letters to the Monks in his favour. Those Religious, having previously obtained the King's leave to proceed to an election, rejected all these applications, and made choice of Henry de Stamford, Prior of Finchley, an elderly man, of a fair character and pleasing aspect, and a good scholar. The King would have consented to the election, had it not been for the Queen, who on her bare knees humbly intreated him, that her kinsman might be Bishop of Durham. Whereupon the King refused to admit Henry de Stamford, and wrote to the Pope in favour of Beaumont. At the same time the Monks sent the Bishop elect to the Pope's court for his Holiness's confirmation: But, before his arrival, the Pope, at the instances of the Kings and Queens of France and England, had conferred the Bishopric on Beaumont (1). And, to make Henry some amends, his Holiness gave him a grant of the Priory of Durham upon the next vacancy; but he did not live to enjoy it (2).

[B] He went to Durham in company with two Cardinals. Their names were Ganselmus and Lucas de Flisco. They were sent by the Pope to bring about a peace between England and Scotland. As their business required their presence in Scotland, Beaumont, who had received his Bulls for consecration, and intended to be introned at Durham on St Cuthbert's day, took the opportunity of their journeying northward, and, for the greater magnificence, set out in company with them (3).

[C] He was attacked by a party of Scotch, headed by one Gilbert Middleton. The Prior of Durham, it seems, had given him notice of his danger upon the road; but he slighted the advice, saying, that the King of Scots dared not attempt any such thing, and that the Prior only wanted to delay his consecration (4).

[D] The Judges passed sentence, that the Bishop of Durham ought to have the forfeitures in war within the liberties of his church, as the King had without. As this sentence of the Judges was a solemn confirmation of the military rights of the Bishopric of Durham, it may not be improper just to observe how far those privileges extended. The learned editor of Camden's Britannia informs us, that the Bishop of Durham antiently had his Thanes, and afterwards his Barons, who held of him by Knights Service, and that, on occasions of danger, he called them together in the nature of a Parliament, to advise, and assist him with their persons, dependants, and money, for the public service, either at home or abroad. When men and money were to be levied, it was done by writs issued in the Bishop's name out of the Chancery of Durham; and he had power to raise able men from sixteen to sixty years of age, and to arm and equip them for his service. He often headed his troops in person; and the officers acted under his commission, and were accountable to him for their duty. He had a discretionary power of marching out against the Scots, or of making a truce with them. No person of the Palatinate could build a castle, or fortify his manor-house, without the Bishop's licence. And as he had military power by land, so he had likewise by sea. Ships of war were fitted out in the Ports of the County Palatine by virtue of the Bishop's writs. He had his Admiralty-Courts; he appointed, by his Patents, a Vice-Admiral, Register, and Marshal or Water bailiff, and had all the privileges, forfeitures, and profits, incident to that jurisdiction (5). How far these privileges of the Bishopric have been since abridged, is not material to the present article.

[E] He lies buried — under a marble stone. The Inscription on it is this:

De Bello Monte jacet hic Ludovicus humatus, Nobilis ex fonte regum comitumque creatus.

[F] He was very avaritious, and at the same time very expensive. The Durham Historian (6) tells us, he was very eager after riches, but not much solicitous about the means of acquiring them; which was occasioned, he says, by a large family, and many superfluous fluous expences. His avarice and prodigality were such, that a certain person told him to his face, he never saw a man so diligent in accumulating, and so imprudent in disposing of wealth. His whole study was to extort money from the Priory and Convent. He obtained a Bull to appropriate to himself a fourth part of the revenues of the house, so long as the Scottish wars should last. Though the Prior made him frequent presents of horses, &c. he considered it as nothing, and usually dismissed his requests with this answer; 'You do nothing for me, nor will I do any thing for you: pray

' for my death; for so long as I live, your petition will not be granted.'

[G] He was so illiterate, that he could not read the Bull for his own consecration.] Meeting with the word Metropolitica, he hesitated a long while, and at last, not being able to read it, he cried out in French, Soit pour dié; that is, suppose it read; and coming to the word enigmaté, he was again at a loss, and said to the standers-by, Par saint Louis, il n'est pas curtois qui lege parolle ici uscrit; that is, By St Lewis it was very uncivil in the person who wrote this word here (7). B E A U M O N T (Sir JOHN), son of Francis Beaumont, one of the Judges of the Common-Pleas in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, and brother of the famous dramatick Poet Mr Francis Beaumont (a), was born, in the year 1582, at Grace-dieu, the family-seat in Leicestershire, and was admitted a Gentleman-Commoner of Broadgate's-hall in Oxford, the beginning of Lent-term 1596. After three years he left the university, and entered himself in one of the Inns of Court. But he soon quitted that situation, and retired to the place of his nativity, where he married a wife of the family of Fortescue [A]. In 1626, the second of King Charles I, he had the dignity of a Baronet conferred upon him. In his youth, he applied himself to the Muses [B] with good success,

(a) See the article BEAUMONT and FLETCHER.

[A] He married a wife of the family of Fortescue] One of that family, Mr George Fortescue, addressed the following verses to Sir John, in which the thought turns upon the near relation he bore to him.

When lines are drawn greater than nature, art Commands the object and the eye to part,
Bids them to keep at distance, know their place,
Where to receive, and where to give their grace.
I am too near thee, Beaumont, to define
Which of those lineaments is most divine;
And to stand farther off from thee, I chuse
In silence rather to applaud thy Muse,
And lose my censure; 'tis enough for me
To joy, my pen was taught to move by thee (1).

[B] He applied himself to the Muses.] He wrote The Crown of Thorns, a poem in eight books (2). I have not met with this piece, but find it celebrated by one Thomas Hawkins in a copy of verses prefixed to Sir John's poems. The lines are these:

Like to the Bee, thou did'st those flow'rs select,
That most the tasteful palate might affect
With pious relishes of things divine,
And discomposed sense with peace combine:
Which in thy Crown of Thorns we may discern,
Framed as a model for the best to learn,
That verse may virtue teach, as well as prose,
And minds with native force to good dispose,
Devotion stir, and quicken cold desires,
To entertain the warmth of holy fires.
There may we see thy soul expatiate,
And with true fervor sweetly meditate Upon our Saviour's sufferings, that, while Thou seek'st his painful torments to beguile
With well-tuned accents of thy zealous song,
Breath'd from a soul transfix'd, a passion strong,
We better knowledge of his woes attain,
Fall into tears with thee, and then again
Rise with thy verse, to celebrate the flood
Of those eternal torrents of his blood.

V O L. I. No. 52.

' of my father, who, whilst he lived, did ever intend to your Majesty these Poems: Poems, in which no obscene sport can be found (the contrary being too frequent a crime among Poets), while these (if not too bold I speak) will challenge your Majesty for their Patron, since it is most convenient that the purest of Poems should be directed to you, the virtuouslest and most untouched of Princes, the delight of Britain, and the wonder of Europe; at the altar of whose judgment bright erected flames, not troubled fumes, dare approach.' The Poem called Bosworth-Field is a description of the famous battle fought there between King Richard III and the Earl of Richmond afterwards Henry VII; and is esteemed by the best judges to be an excellent performance. The following Similies relish strongly of Poetry.

So when the winter to the spring bequeaths
The rule of time, and mild Favonius breathes,
A quire of Swans to that sweet music sings,
The air rebounds the motion of their wings,
When over plains they fly in order'd ranks,
To sport themselves upon Caister's banks (3).

(3) Bosworth-Field, &c. p. 123

So painful Bees with forward gladness strive
To join themselves in throngs before the hive,
And with obedience till that hour attend,
When their commander shall his watch-word send;
Then to the winds their tender sails they yield,
Depress the flow'rs, depopulate the fields (4).

(4) Page 130

The single combat between the Duke of Norfolk and the Earl of Oxford is described in the true spirit of heroic Poetry.

Here valiant Oxford and fierce Norfolk meet,
And with their spears each other rudely greet;
About the air their shiver'd pieces play;
Then on their swords their noble hands they lay;
And Norfolk first a blow directly guides
To Oxford's head, which from his helmet slides
Upon his arm, and biting thro' the steel Inflicts a wound, which Vere disdains to feel:
He lifts his faction with a threatening grace,
And hews the beaver off from Howard's face.
This being done, he with compassion charm'd Retires, asham'd to strike a man disarm'd:
But straight a deadly shaft sent from a bow (Whose master, tho' far off, the Duke could know)
Untimely brought this combat to an end,
And pierced the brain of Richard's constant friend.
When Oxford saw him sink, his noble soul
Was full of grief, which made him thus condole:
7 S Farewel,

success, as his poems still extant demonstrate. Ben. Johnson, Michael Drayton, and others,

Farewel, true Knight, to whom no costly grave
Can give due honour; wou'd my tears might save Those streams of blood, deserving to be spilt
In better service: Had not Richard's guilt
Such heavy weight upon his fortune laid,
Thy glorious virtues had his sins outweigh'd (5).

(5) Page 19.

I shall only add the four last lines, in which the death of Richard is very strongly painted.

His hand he then with wreaths of grass infolds,
And bites the earth, which he so strictly holds,
As if he wou'd have born it with him hence,
So loth he was to lose his right's pretence (6).

(6) Page 30.

A moderate Poet would have been contented with the circumstance of the King's biting the earth; but it belonged to a sublimer imagination to paint the reluctance with which he quitted his usurped possession even in death.

Sir John has given us the following translations from the Latin Poets, all extremely well done, viz. Virgil's Fourth Eclogue; Horace's Sixth Satire of the Second Book, his Twenty-ninth Ode of the Third Book, and his Second Epode; Juvenal's Tenth Satire, and Persius's Second Satire; Ausonius's Sixteenth Idyll, and Claudian's Epigram of the Old Man of Verona. As a specimen of our author's genius in this branch of Poetry, I shall select Horace's City and Country Mouse, which has been translated or imitated by our best Poets.

————— Long since a Country Mouse
Receiv'd into his low and homely house
A City Mouse, his friend and guest before;
The host was sharp, and sparing of his store,
Yet much to hospitality inclin'd;
For such occasions cou'd dilate his mind.
He chiches gives for winter laid aside,
Nor are the long and slender oats deny'd?
Dry grapes he in his lib'ral mouth doth bear,
And bits of bacon which half-eaten were;
With various meats to please the stranger's pride,
Whose dainty teeth thro' all the dishes slide.
The father of the family in straw
Lyes stretch'd along, disdainin' not to gnaw Bafe corn or darnel, and reserves the best
To make a perfect banquet for his guest.
To him at last the Citizen thus spake;
My friend, I muse what pleasure thou can't take,
Or how thou can't endure to spend thy time
In shady groves, and up steep hills to climb.
In savage forests build no more thy den;
Go to the City, there to dwell with men.
Begin this happy journey, trust to me,
I will thee guide, thou shalt my fellow be.
Since earthly things are tied to mortal lives,
And ev'ry great and little creature strives
In vain the certain stroke of death to fly, Stay not 'till moments past thy joys deny:
Live in rich plenty and perpetual sport,
Live ever mindful that thine age is short.
The ravish'd Field-Mouse holds these words so sweet,
That from his home he leaps with nimble feet.
They to the city travel with delight,
And underneath the walls they creep by night.
Now darkness had possess'd Heav'n's middle space,
When these two friends their weary steps did place Within a wealthy palace, where was spread
A scarlet cov'ring on an iv'ry bed:
The baskets, set far off aside, contain'd
The meats, which after plenteous meals remain'd.
The City Mouse with courtly phrase intreats
His country friend to rest in purple seats.
With ready care the master of the feast
Runs up and down, to see the store increas'd.

He all the duties of a fervent shows,
And tastes of ev'ry dish that he bestows.
The poor plain Mouse, exalted thus in state,
Glad of the change, his former life doth hate,
And strives in looks and gesture to declare
With what contentment he receives this fare.
But frait the sudden creaking of a door
Shakes both these mice from beds into the floor:
They run about the room half dead with fear;
Thro' all the house the noise of dogs they hear.
The stranger now counts not the place so good;
He bids farewell, and saith; The silent wood Shall me hereafter from these dangers save,
Well pleased with simple vetches in my cave (7).

(7) Page 41, &c.

Whoever will compare this with the original, will find it to be a very close and exact translation.

The rest of our author's pieces are either on religious subjects, as those on the Festivals, on the Blessed Trinity, &c. or of a moral kind, as the Dialogue between the World, a Pilgrim, and Virtue, Of the miserable state of Man, Of Sickness, &c. or political, as the Panegyric on the Coronation of King Charles, on The Prince's Journey and Return, &c. Among these there is one addressed to King James I, concerning the true form of English Poetry, in which the Rules of Versification are so judiciously laid down, and so well expressed, that I persuade myself the reader will not be displeas'd with the following extract thereof.

He makes sweet music, who in serious lines
Light dancing tunes and heavy prose declines.
When verses like a milky torrent flow,
They equal temper in the Poet show.
He paints true forms, who with a modest heart
Gives lustre to his work, yet covers art.
Uneven swelling is no way to fame,
But solid joining of the perfect frame;
So that no curious finger there can find
The former chinks or nails that fastly bind.
Yet most wou'd have the knots of stitches seen,
And holes where men may thrust their hands between.
On halting feet the rugged Poem goes,
With accents neither fitting verse nor prose.
The stile mine ear with more contentment fills
Of Lawyers pleadings, or Physicians bills:
For tho' in terms of art their skill they close,
And joy in darksome words as well as those;
They yet have perfect sense, more pure and clear
Than envious Muses, which sad garlands wear
Of dusky clouds, their strange conceits to hide
From human eyes; and, lest they should be spy'd
By some sharp OEdipus, the English tongue
For this their poor ambition suffers wrong.
In ev'ry language now in Europe spoke
By nations, which the Roman empire broke,
The relish of the Muse consists in rhyme;
One verse must meet another like a chime.
Our Saxon shortness hath peculiar grace,
And choice of words fit for the ending place,
Which leave impression on the mind as well
As closing sounds of some delightful bell.
These must not be with disproportion lame,
Nor shou'd an echo still repeat the fame.
In many changes these may be express'd,
But those that join most simply are the best:
Their form, surpassing far the fetter'd slaves,
Vain care and needless repetition saves.
These outward ashes keep those inward fires,
Whose heat the Greek and Roman works inspires.
Pure phrase, fit epithets, a sober care
Of metaphors, descriptions clear yet rare;
Similitudes contracted, smooth, and round,
Not vex'd by learning, but with nature crown'd;

Strong

others, have celebrated Sir John's poetical genius [C]. This gentleman died in the winter of 1628, and was buried in the church of Grace-dieu, leaving behind him three sons; John [D], who died without issue; Francis [E], afterwards a Jesuit; and Thomas, who succeeded to the honour and estate (b). He had likewise a son named Gervase, who died at seven years of age [F]. Mr Jacob has committed a strange blunder (c) in placing our Poet under the reign of King Richard III.

To easy use of that peculiar gift,
Which Poets in their raptures hold most dear,
When actions by the lively found appear.
Give me such helps, I never will despair,
But that our heads, which suck the freezing air,
As well as hotter brains, may verse adorn,
And be their wonder, as we were their scorn (8).

[C] Ben. Johnson, Michael Drayton, and others, have celebrated Sir John's poetical genius.] Some of their commendatory verses are prefixed to, and others follow after, his poems. Ben. Johnson's testimony is highly to our author's advantage.

This book will live; it hath a genius: This
Hence then, prophane: Here needs no words expence
In bulwarks, rav'lins, ramparts, for defence;
Such as the creeping common Pioneers use,
When they do sweat to fortify a Muse.
Tho' I confess a Beaumont's book to be
The bound and frontier of our Poetry,
And doth deserve all monuments of praise,
That art, or engine, on the strength can raise;
Yet who dares offer a redoubt a reare,
To cut a dyke, or stick a stake up, here,
Before this work, where envy hath not cast
A trench against it, nor a batt'ry plac'd?
Stay till she make her vain approaches; then,
If maimed she come off, 'tis not of men
This fort of so impregnable access,
But higher pow'r, as spight cou'd not make less,
Nor flatt'ry, but secured by th' author's name,
Defies what's crost to piety or good fame,
And like a hallow'd Temple, free from taint
Of Ethnicism, makes his Muse a Saint (9).

(9) On the honour'd Poems of his honour'd Friend Sir J. B. Bart.

Michael Drayton has dropped an obscure hint at the cause of our author's death, which is not easily to be understood.

Thy care for that, which was not worth thy breath, Brought on too soon thy much lamented death.
But Heav'n was kind, and would not let thee see
The plagues that must upon this nation be,
By whom the Muses have neglected been,
Which shall add weight and measure to their sin (10).

(10) To the dear Remembrance of his noble Friend Sir J. B. Bart.

BEAUMONT and FLETCHER. Two celebrated Dramatic Poets of the last age. These gentlemen were so closely united as authors, and are so jointly concerned in the applauses and censures bestowed on their Plays, that it is thought proper to connect their Lives under one article.

Mr FRANCIS BEAUMONT was descended from the antient family of his name, seated at Grace-dieu in Leicestershire (a), and was born about the year 1585 or 1586, in the reign of Queen Elizabeth (b). His grandfather John Beaumont was Master of the Rolls (c), and his father Francis Beaumont one of the Judges of the Common-Pleas (d). His mother was Anne, daughter of George Pierrepont, of Home-Pierrepont in Nottinghamshire (e). Our Poet had his education at Cambridge (f); but in what college, we are not told. He was afterwards admitted a student in the Inner-Temple (g): but it does not appear, that he made any proficiency in the knowledge of the Laws; on the contrary, it is probable, his devotion to the Muses was too great, to suffer his thoughts to be employed on so dry and severe a science. He died before thirty years of [D] — John.] This is the son, to whom we are obliged for the edition of his father's Poems, and who was himself no mean Poet, as appears by the following lines.

Here lives his better part, here shines that flame,
Which lights the entrance to eternal fame:
These are his triumphs over death, this spring
From Aganippe's fountains he cou'd bring Clear from all dross, thro' pure intentions drain'd;
His draughts no sensual waters ever stain'd.
Behold he doth on ev'ry paper strow
The loyal thoughts he did his Sovereign owe:
Here rest affections to each nearest friend,
And pious sighs, which noble thoughts attend (11).

(11) A Congratulation to the Muses, for the immortalizing his dear father by the sacred virtue of Poetry.

[E] — Francis.] This son likewise paid the tribute of verse to his father's memory; of which take the following stanzas as a specimen.

For shou'd I strive to deck the virtue high,
Which in these Poems, like fair gems appear,
I might as well add brightness to the sky,
Or with new splendor make the sun more clear.

Since ev'ry line is with such beauties graced,
That nothing farther can their praises found;
And that dear name, which in the front is placed,
Declares what ornaments within are found:

That name, I say, in whom the Muses meet,
And with such heat his noble spirit raise,
That Kings admire his verse, whilst at his feet
Orpheus his harp, and Phœbus casts his bays (12).

(12) Upon the following Poems of my dear father Sir J. B. Bart. deceased.

[F] — Gervase, who died at seven years of age.] This we learn from some verses of Sir John's upon the death of that son, whom he laments very pathetically.

Can I, who have for others oft compil'd
The songs of death, forget my sweetest child,
Which like a flow'r crush'd with a blast is dead,
And e're full time hangs down his smiling head.

Let his pure soul, ordain'd seven years to be
In that frail body, which was part of me,
Remain my pledge in Heav'n, as sent to show

age, in March 1615, and was buried, the ninth of the same month, in the entrance of St Benedict's chapel, within St Peter's Westminster (b). I meet with no inscription upon his tomb, but I find two epitaphs on him; one written by his elder brother Sir John Beaumont, and the other by the witty Bishop Corbet [A]. Our Poet left behind him one daughter, Mrs Frances Beaumont, who died in Leicestershire since the year 1700. She had been possessed of several Poems of her father's writing; but they were lost at sea in her voyage from Ireland, where she had lived some time in the Duke of Ormond's family (i). Besides the Plays, in which he was jointly concerned with Mr Fletcher, he wrote a little dramatic piece, intitled, A Masque of Gray's-Inn Gentlemen and the Inner Temple, a Poetical Epistle to Ben. Johnson [B], Verses to his Friend Master John Fletcher upon his Faithful Shepherdes [C], and other Poems, printed together in 1653, in octavo (k). Mr Beaumont was esteemed to accurate a judge of Plays, that Ben. Johnson, while he lived, submitted all his writings to his censure, and 'tis thought used his judgment in correcting, if not contriving, all his plots (l). What value he had for our Poet, appears by the verses he address'd to him [D].

Mr JOHN FLETCHER was son of Dr Richard Fletcher Bishop of London [E], and was born in Northamptonshire in the year 1576 (m). He was educated at Cambridge,

[A] Two epitaphs on him; one written by ——— Sir John Beaumont, the other by ——— Bishop Corbet. Sir John's is as follows:

An epitaph on my deare brother
FRANCIS BEAUMONT.

On death thy murderer this revenge I take:
I slight his terror, and just question make,
Which of us two the best precedence have,
Mine to this wretched world, thine to the grave.
Thou shou'd'st have followed me, but death, to blame,
Miscalc'd years, and measur'd age by fame.
So dearly hast thou bought thy precious lines;
Their praise grew swiftly, so thy life declines.
Thy Muse, the hearer's Queen, the reader's love, All ears, all hearts (but death's) could please and move (1).

Bishop Corbet's is this:

On Mr FRANCIS BEAUMONT.
(Then newly dead)

He that hath such acuteness, and such wit,
As wou'd ask ten good heads to husband it;
He that can write so well, that no man dare
Refuse it for the best, let him beware:

BEAUMONT is dead, by whose sole death appears,
Wit's a disease consumes men in few years (2).

[B] ——— A poetical epistle to Ben. Johnson. We learn from the title of the epistle, that it was written to that Poet from the country, before the author and Mr Fletcher came to London. In this piece Beaumont expresses the highest esteem and friendship for Johnson, especially in the following lines.

Banish't unto this home, fate once again
Bring me to thee, who canst make smooth and plaine
The way of knowledge for me, and then I,
Who have no good but in thy company, Protest it will my grateful comfort be T' acknowledge all I have to flow from thee.

The epistle is subscribed, The Maid in the Mill, and seems to have been sent to Ben with two unfinished comedies, written by Beaumont and Fletcher (3).

[C] Verses to his friend, Master John Fletcher, upon his Faithful Shepherdes. That Pastoral, which was written by Fletcher alone (4), having met with but an indifferent reception upon the stage, Beaumont address'd a copy of verses to him (5) upon that occasion, in which he ingeniously represents the hazard of writing for the stage, and finely fatirizes the audience's want of judgment, as follows:

Why thou'd the man, whose wit ne'er had a stain,
Upon the public stage present his vein,
And make a thousand men in judgment fit,
To call in question his undoubted wit,
Scarce two of which can understand the laws
Which they should judge by, nor the parties cause?
Among the rout there is not one that hath
In his own censure an explicit faith.
One company, knowing they judgment lack,
Ground their belief on the next man in black;
Others on him that makes signs, and is mute;
Some like as he does in the fairest sute;
He as his mistress doth, and he by chance:
Nor want there those, who, as the boy doth dance
Between the acts, will censure the whole play;
Some, if the wax-lights be not new that day:
But multitudes there are, whose judgment goes Headlong, according to the actor's cloaths.

Then having approved Fletcher's design of publishing his play, in order to convince the world how excellent a performance they had disliked upon the stage, he concludes with this severe reflection;

Besides, one 'vantage more in this I see;
Your censurers now must have the quality
Of reading, which, I am afraid, is more Than half your shrewdest judges had before.

[D] Ben. Johnson's verses address'd to Beaumont.

How I do love thee, Beaumont, and thy Muse,
That unto me do'st such religion use!
How do I fear myself that am not worth
The least indulgent thought thy pen drops forth!
At once thou mak'st me happy, and unmak'st;
And giving largely to me, more thou tak'st.
What fate is mine, that so itself bereaves?
What art is thine, that so thy friend deceives?
When, even there where most thou praifest me,
For writing better I must envy thee (6).

Cambridge (n), probably in Bennet-college, to which his father was by his last will and testament a benefactor (o). He wrote Plays jointly with Mr Beaumont; and we are told; he assisted Ben. Johnson in writing a Comedy called The Widow (p). After Beaumont's death, it is said, he consulted Mr James Shirley in the plotting several of his Plays [F]. Which these were, it is extremely difficult, if not impossible, for us to determine. His Faithful Shepherdes, which, it is certain, he wrote without the assistance of his colleague, is greatly commended by the Poets [G], though it's reception on the stage fell short of it's merit. Mr Fletcher died of the plague, in the forty-ninth year of his age, the first of King Charles I, an. 1625, and was buried the 29th of August in St Mary-Overy's church in Southwark (q). We have a Latin inscription under his picture by the ingenious Sir John Berkenhead [H].

Orders, which the Right Reverend Richard, Lord Bishop of London, desires to be assented unto, and carefully observed by every ecclesiastical officer, exercising ecclesiastical jurisdiction under him, within the diocese of London.

Dat. March the 8th, 1595. They are transcribed by Mr Collier (13). How far they were executed, is uncertain; for they run in a form of recommendation, rather than of command. Who was Bishop Fletcher's first wife, we are not told; but Anthony Wood informs us (14), that he took to him a second wife (a very handsome widow) called the Lady Baker, sister to George Gifford, the Penfioner; at which match, Queen Elizabeth, who highly disapproved the marriage of the Clergy, was much displeas'd. The loss of her Majesty's favour, it seems, occasioned the Bishop's death; for Camden tells us (15), that, 'Endeavouring to smother the cares of an unlucky match in the smok of tobacco, which he took to excess, and falling under the Queen's displeasure (who thought it enough for Bishops to be fathers of the Church) between the experiment and the misfortune, lost his life.' He died at his palace in London, the 15th of June 1596, and was buried in the cathedral church of St Paul's (16). He had a brother named Giles Fletcher, born likewise in Kent, educated at Eaton school, and elected scholar of King's college in Cambridge in 1565 (17); where he took the degree of Doctor of Laws, and distinguished himself as a learned man and an excellent Poet. Afterwards he was sent Commissioner into Scotland, Germany, and the Netherlands; and Ambassador to Russia. At length he was made Secretary to the city of London, and Master of the Requests. He wrote The History of Russia, &c. or, Of the Russian Commonwealth. Lond. 1591, 8vo. which book was quickly suppress'd; lest it should give offence to a Prince in amity with England. Afterwards it was reprinted in 12mo, An. 1643. Dr Giles Fletcher died in the parish of St Katherine, Coleman-street, in London, in the month of February 1610, leaving behind him a son of both his names, who took the degree of Bachelor in Divinity at Trinity college in Cambridge, and died at Alderton in Suffolk, in 1623, 'equally beloved of the Muses and the Graces.' He left also another son named Phineas Fletcher, of King's college in the same university, where he was accounted an excellent Poet. He was afterwards beneficed at Hilgay in Norfolk, and wrote several books; among which one is intituled, A Father's Testament writtten for the benefit of his particular Relations. Lond. 1670, 8vo. at which time the author had been dead several years (18).

[F] He consulted Mr James Shirley in the plotting several of his plays.] The editor of Beaumont and Fletcher's Works in 1711, thinks it very probable, that Shirley did likewise supply many that were left imperfect, and that the Players gave some remains, or imperfect plays, of Fletcher's to Shirley to make up: And it is from hence (he tells us) that in the first act of Love's Pilgrimage, there is a scene of an Ostler, transcribed verbatim out of Ben. Johnson's New Inn, Act 3. Sc. 1. which play was written long after Fletcher died, and transplanted into Love's Pilgrimage, after the printing the New Inn, which was in the year 1630. And two of the plays, printed under the name of Fletcher, viz. The Coronation and The Little Thief, have been claimed by Shirley to be his; it is probable, they were left imperfect by one, and finished by the other (19).

[G] His Faithful Shepherdes ——— is greatly commended by the Poets.] I have already given the reader some verses address'd by Beaumont to Fletcher, on occasion of the ill success of this play (20). Honest

Ben is very angry with the audience for their ill-treatment of it, and expresses himself with great acrimony upon this subject, in the following lines:

The wife and many-headed bench, that sits Upon the life and death of Plays and Wits, (Compos'd of Gamester, Captain, Knight, Knight's Man, Lady, or Puffin, that wears mask or fan;
Velvet or Taffata cap, rank'd in the dark
With the shop's Foreman, or some such brave spark;
That may judge for his six-pence) had, before
They saw it half, damn'd the whole play, and more:
Their motives were, since it had not to do With vices, which they look'd for, and came to.
I, that am glad thy innocence was thy guilt,
And with that all the Muses blood were spilt
In such a martyrdom, to vex their eyes,
Do crown thy murder'd poem, which shall rise
A glorified work to time, when fire,
Or moths, shall eat what all such fools admire (21).

----- His Shepherdes, a piece
Even and smooth, spun from a finer fleece;
Where softness reigns, where passions passions greet;
Gentle and high, as floods of balsam meet:
Where, dress'd in white expressions, fit bright loves,
Drawn; like their fairest Queen, by milky doves;
A piece, which Johnson in a rapture bid
Come up a glorified work, and so it did (22).

Sir John Berkenhead seems likewise to refer to Ben's testimony, when he sets fo extravagant a value upon this performance.

Thou always best: if ought seem'd to decline,
'Twas the unjudging rout's mistake, not thine.
Thus thy fair Shepherdes, which the bold heap (False to themselves, and thee) did prize so cheap;
Was found (when understood) fit to be crown'd;
At worst 'twas worth two hundred thousand pound (23).

There seems to be some allusion couched in the last line, at which I can give no guess.
[H] An inscription under Mr Fletcher's picture, by Sir John Berkenhead.] It is this (24):

Felicitæ ævi, ac Præfulis natus, comês Beaumontio; sic quippe Parnassus becps, FLETCHERUS unam in pyramidâ furcas agens:
Struxit chorum plus simplicem Vates duplex,
Plus duplicem solus; nec ullam tranfultit,
Nec transferendus: Dramatum æterni sales,
Anglo theatro, orbi, sibi, superstities.
FLETCHERE, facies absque vultu pingitur;
Quantus! vel umbram circuit nemo tuam.

opinion seems to be, that Beaumont's judgment was chiefly employed in correcting and retrenching the superfluities of Fletcher's wit [I]. But if what is reported of them by Mr Winstanley be true, the former had his share likewise in the execution of the Drama. For that author relates, that our Poets being once at a tavern together, in order to form the rude draught of a Tragedy, Fletcher undertook to kill the King; which words being over-heard by an officious waiter, had like to have brought on them a troublesome affair, had it not been presently discovered, that the plot was only against a dramatical King (r). The first Play that brought them into esteem was Philaster, or Love lies a bleeding: for before that, they had written two or three very unsuccessfully; as the like is reported of Ben. Johnson, before he wrote Every Man in his Humour (s). These authors had, with the advantage of Shakespear's wit, which was their precedent, great natural gifts improved by study. Their plots were generally more regular than Shakespear's, especially those made after Beaumont's death; and they understood and imitated the conversation of gentlemen much better, whose wild debaucheries, and quickness of wit in repartees, no Poet before them ever painted as they did. Humour, it is true, which Ben. Johnson derived from particular characters, they made it not their business to describe: but, in recompence of this defect, they described all the passions in a very lively manner, especially that of Love. Their faults consist chiefly in a certain luxuriance, or seldom knowing when to have done, and this notwithstanding the supposed rigour of Mr Beaumont's castigations; in frequent solecisms of speech, and great incorrectness in general; which last, indeed, is common to our authors with Ben. Johnson, and the immortal Shakespear himself. However, envy cannot deny, that their wit is great, and their expressions often noble; and that the absurdities they committed are rather the age's fault than theirs. Mr Dryden tells us (t), that Beaumont and Fletcher's Plays, in his time, were the most pleasing and frequent entertainments of the stage, two of theirs being acted through the year for one of Shakespear's or Johnson's; and the reason he assigns is, because there is a certain gaiety in their Comedies, and a Pathos in their most serious Plays, which suits generally with all men's humours: besides, Shakespear's language is a little obsolete, and Ben. Johnson's wit comes short of theirs. But however it might be when Mr Dryden wrote, the case is since altered: for though several of Beaumont and Fletcher's Plays still take their turn upon the English stage, and with good success, yet, at present (u), Shakespear seems to have gained the ascendant, more than two of his Plays being acted through the year for one of theirs.

This noble pair of authors have received incense from the pens of our most celebrated Poets [K]; and some of their Plays have had the honour to be selected, and altered for the

[I] Beaumont's judgment was employed in correcting and retrenching the superfluities of Fletcher's wit. Hence Mr Cartwright, extolling Fletcher's genius (25), and observing

(25) Cartwright's Plays and Poems, ubi supra.

That 'twas his happy fault to do too much;

adds,

Who therefore wisely did submit each birth
To knowing Beaumont, 'ere it did come forth, Working again until he said 'twas fit,
And made him the sobriety of his wit.

There are numberless passages among the commendatory verses to the same purpose.

[K] They received incense from the pens of the most celebrated Poets. I shall begin with Sir Aston Cockaine, who has these lines:

While Fletcher lived, who equal to him writ
Such lasting monuments of natural wit?
Others might draw their lines with sweat, like those That, with much pains, a garrison inclose;
Whilst his sweet fluent vein did gently run,
As uncontroul'd and smoothly as the sun (26).

(26) Among the Commendatory Verses, ubi supra.

Sir George Lisle, a kinsman of Beaumont's, celebrates both our Poets, addressing himself first to Beaumont.

I'll not pronounce how strong and clean thou writ'st,
Nor by what new hard rules thou took'st thy flights;
Nor how much Greek and Latin some refine,
Before they can make up six words of thine:
But this I'll say, thou strik'st our sense so deep,
At once thou mak'st us blush, rejoice, and weep.
Great father Johnson bow'd himself, when he (Thou writ'st so nobly) vow'd be envy'd thee *.

(*) See the remark [D].

A few lines after he says:

Behold! here's Fletcher too! the world ne're knew
Two potent wits co-operate 'till you;
For still your fancies are so wov'n and knit,
'Twas Francis Fletcher and John Beaumont writ (27). (27) Ibid.

Sir John Denham's testimony is very advantageous to the memory of Fletcher, whom he thus addresses:

----- I need not raise Trophies to thee from other men's dispraise;
Nor is thy fame on lesser ruins built,
Nor needs thy juster title the foul guilt
Of Eastern Kings, who, to secure their reign, Must have their brothers, sons, and kindred slain.
Then was wit's empire at the fatal height,
When labouring and sinking with it's weight,
From thence a thousand lesser Poets sprung,
Like petty princes from the fall of Rome.
When Johnson, Shakespear, and thy self did sit,
And sway'd in the Triumvirate of wit - - -
Yet what from Johnson's oil and sweat did flow,
Or what more easy nature did bestow
On Shakespear's gentler Muse, in thee full grown
Their graces both appear; yet so, that none
Can say, here nature ends, and art begins;
But mixt like th' elements, and born like twins,
So interweaved, so like, so much the same,
None this meer nature, that meer art can name.
'Twas this the antients meant; nature and skill
Are the two tops of their Parnassus hill (28).

(28) Ibid.

Nor is Fletcher less obliged to Mr Waller's excellent pen:

Fletcher, to thee we do not only owe
All these good plays, but those of others too:

Thy

the stage, by our best writers [L]. But they have not escaped the censures of the Critics, especially Mr Rymer the Historiographer, who has laboured to expose the faults, without taking any notice of the beauties, of Rollo Duke of Normandy, the King and no King, and the Maid's Tragedy [M]. Mr Rymer sent one of his books as a present to Mr Dryden, who,

Thy wit repeated does support the stage,
Credits the last, and entertains this age :
No worthies form'd by any Muse but thine
Could purchase robes to make themselves so fine.
What brave commander is not proud to see Thy brave Melantius in his gallantry ?
Our greatest Ladies love to see their scorn
Outdone by thine, in what themselves have worn.
Th' impatient widow e're the year be done
Sees thy Aspasia weeping in her gown.
I never yet the tragic strain assay'd,
Deterr'd by that inimitable Maid :
And when I venture at the comic file,
The Scornful Lady seems to mock my toil.
Thus has thy Muse at once improv'd and marr'd
Our sport in plays, by rendering them too hard.
So when a sort of lusty shepherds throw
The bar by turns, and none the rest outgo
So far, but that the best are measuring casts,
Their emulation and their pastime lasts :
But if some brawny yeoman of the guard
Step in, and tofs the axel-tree a yard
Or more beyond the farthest mark, the rest Despairing stand, their sport is at the best (29).

(29) Ibid.

Sir John Berkenhead prefers Fletcher to Shakespear :

Brave Shakespear flow'd, yet had his ebbsings too,
Thou always best *.

Again ;

Shakespear was early up, and went so drest
As for those dawning hours he knew was best ;
But when the sun shone forth, you two thought fit
To wear just robes, and leave off trunk-hose wit (30).

(30) Ibid.

Mr Cartwright gives the same preference to Fletcher compared with Shakespear ; for which reason I here once more cite him.

Shakespear to thee was dull, whose best jest lies
I' th' Ladies questions, and the Fool's replies ;
Old-fashion'd wit, which walk'd from town to town
In turn'd hose, which our fathers call'd the Clown ;
Whose wit our nice times would obfcurer call,
And which made bawdry pass for comical.
Nature was all his art ; thy vein was free
As his, but without his scurrility (31).

(31) Cartwright's Poems, &c. p. 273.

Whoever is conversant in the writings of Shakespear and Fletcher, need not be told, that it is extremely unjust to compliment the latter at the expence of the former ; and that, in truth, after all the fine things said of the two Poets in question, and making the most of Shakespear's faults, the preference lies greatly on his side ; whose sublimer beauties of sentiment and poetry Beaumont and Fletcher never could reach.

[L] Some of their plays have been altered for the stage by our best writers. Particularly The Maid's Tragedy, The Chances, and Valentinian ; by Mr Waller, the Duke of Buckingham, and the Earl of Rochester. The Maid's Tragedy was very frequently acted, after the Restoration, and with great applause. But the conclusion of the play, in which the King is killed, making it, upon some particular occasion, thought improper to be further represented, it was by private order from the court silenced. This put Mr Waller upon altering the catastrophe, or last act, as it is now printed in the edition of his poems, in 8vo, in 1711, and in all the subsequent editions. Upon which alteration the author of the Preface to the second part of Mr Waller's poems makes the following remark. 'Tis not to be doubted, who sat for the two brothers characters. 'Twas agreeable to the sweetness of Mr Waller's temper, to soften the rigour of the tragedy, as he expresses it ; but whether it be agreeable to the nature of tragedy itself, to make every thing come off easily, I leave to the Critics. The Duke of Buckingham, so celebrated for writing the Rehearsal, made the two last acts of the Chances almost new. His Grace, we are told (32), afterwards bestowed some time in altering another play of our authors, called Philaster, or Love lies a bleeding. He made very considerable alterations in it, and took it with him, intending to finish it in the last journey he made to Yorkshire in the year 1686. It is not known what is become of the play ; but the Preface-writer here cited tells us, he is very well informed it was, since the Revolution, in the hands of Mr Nevil Payn, who was imprisoned at Edinburgh in the year 1689. The alterations in Valentinian, by the Earl of Rochester, amount to about a third part of the whole ; but his Lordship died before he had done all he intended to it: The play was acted in 1684, and the same year published by Mr Robert Wolsey, with a preface, giving some account of my Lord and his writings. It is since printed at the end of his Lordship's poems in octavo. Besides these three, Mr Tate altered the Island Princess, and Mr Dryden revived the Prophets, with alterations and additions, after the manner of an Opera.

(32) Preface to Beaumont and Fletcher's Works, edit. 1711, p. 9.

[M] Mr Rymer has censured the faults of Rollo Duke of Normandy, the King and no King, and The Maid's Tragedy.] This he has done in a piece, intitled The Tragedies of the last Age considered and examined, by the practise of the Antients, and by the common sense of all ages: In a letter to Fleetwood Shepherd, Esq; (33). I shall here present the reader with the substance of this gentleman's criticisms on the three plays just mentioned.

(33) Printed in 1678. The motto is: — Clamant perillisse pudorem.

To begin with Rollo Duke of Normandy: His first objection lies against the fable or plot, as containing nothing either to move pity or terror, either to delight or instruct. 'It is indeed, says he, a history, and it may well be a history ; for never man of common sense could set himself to invent any thing so gross. Poetry requires the ben trovato, something handsomely invented, and leaves the truth to history ; but never were the Muses prophaned with a more foul, unpleasant, and unwholesome truth, than this which makes the argument of Rollo (34). Next to the story, our Critic quarrels with the moral, which he makes to be this ; He that sheds the blood of man, by man shall his blood be shed. 'But, if this be all, says he, where's the wonder? Have we not every day cried in the streets instances of God's revenge against murder more extraordinary, and more poetical, than all this comes to? If this be poetry, Tyburn is a better and more ingenious school of virtue than the Theatre (35). In the third place, he objects to the conduct of the fable ; he thinks it very odd to see the first four scenes pass, as if nothing extraordinary were toward, without any preparation, and immediately, without more ado, the two brothers, two Kings, are a fighting. The Antients would have made the earth tremble, and the sun start out of the firmament, at a fight so unnatural. Yet we make no more of them, but turn them out, like two cocks of the game, for the diversion of the rabble (36). He is extremely shocked to see Rollo fighting with his own brother and King, equal to himself, and attempting to poison him, without any remorse ; killing him in their mother's arms, without any provocation ; calling the Queen their mother Beldam, and with drawn sword threatening to kill both her and his sister, without any sense of honour or piety ; and he asks, Must we not imagine a legion of Devils in his belly (37), which brings him to consider the characters of this play. And here, to say no more of Rollo's character, he observes, that 'neither is Orto (his brother) a much more taking gentleman ; nothing appears in his cue to move pity, or any way to make the audience of his party (38). As for Gisbert, who, in the blank leaves before the beginning, and after the end of the book, made several

- (39) Page 39. bert and Baldwin, Chancellor and Tutor, 'they are devota capita; only come on the stage, to make Rollo the greater sinner by their murder (39).' Aubrey, who is to succeed to the Crown, 'is a good man, but the dullest good man that ever poet advanced to a throne by such extraordinary means; something shining and extravagant ought to have appeared in his character, and every step of his should have been attended with awe and majesty; whereas he appears a humble endeavour, speaks honestly to no purpose, and is braved and abused by rascals (40).'
- (40) Ibid. The characters of Sophia and Matilda, he thinks, are by no means supported (41); and as to Edith and the old Duchess, 'when in all reason one might expect that so violent grief and passions would choke them, they run chattering as if the concern were no more than a gossiping; theirs are not of the old cut, Cura leves loquuntur, ingentes stupent (42).' He concludes his reflections on this play with giving it as his opinion, that 'the success of it is chiefly due to the scenes for laughter, the merry jigg under the gallows, and where the tragedy tumbles into the kitchen among the scoundrels that never saw buskin in their lives before. There the Pantler and Cook give it that relish, which renders it the most followed entertainment of the town (43).'
- (41) Page 41, 42. The next tragedy censured by Mr Rymer is the King and no King. As to the fable or plot of this play, he owns, there 'appears in it some proportion, shape, and (at the first sight) an outside fair enough (44).' But, upon examination, it is quite otherwise: It is full of improbabilities, and those of the worst sort, because they contribute nothing to the wonder. 'What more improbable, he asks, than that the mother, whose business it was to contrive the death of the impostor, should never caution or inform her only daughter, who had the right to the Crown, that Arbaces was none of her brother, but her vassal; and so obstruct her love for him? Nor is it likely that Gobrias should not have reserved some means to let his son know the secret, that his son's conduct, and addresses to gain the Princess, might have been fashioned accordingly (45).'
- (42) Page 44. 'The characters are all improbable and unproper in the highest degree; besides that both these, their actions, and all the lines of the play run so wide from the plot, that scarce ought could be imagined more contrary. We blunder along without the least streak of light, 'till in the last act we stumble on the plot, lying all in a lump together; neither any tolerable direction to guide us thither; nor ought ingenious, just, or reasonable, that carries us from thence (46).'
- (43) Page 55. Mr Rymer comes next to particular characters. He asks, 'What find we in the son of Gobrias (Arbaces), that he must have the Princess, and the kingdom, for her portion, but that the knave his father will have it so (47)? He no sooner comes on the stage, but he lays about him with his tongue at so nauseous a rate, Captain Bessus is all modesty to him (48).'
- (44) Page 57. Then he behaves with such insulting cruelty to his prisoner the King of Armenia, that our Critic can afford him no better appellation than monster of a King (49).
- (45) Page 59. The indecent language this Prince uses to the Queen-mother, whom he calls witch and wobore, and to his father Gobrias, whom he loads with curses; the incestuous love he makes to his supposed sister Panthea; his drawing his sword at the Queen-mother, and other outrages, are the sum of our Hero's virtues (50). Besides, his drolling and quibbling with Bessus and his buffoons, and their breaking their little jests upon him, is, in Mr Rymer's opinion, a great indecorum (51).
- (46) Ibid. Nor is he better pleased with the character of Panthea, of whom he says, 'One might swear she had a knock in the cradle; so soft is she at all points, and so silly. No Linsley-wolsey Shepherds but must have more soul in her, and more sense of decency, not to say honour (52).'
- (47) Page 60. With respect to the Queen-mother, we might expect to find her a woman of great courage and resolution, after we had been told, that she was for removing the Usurper by poison, and bringing things into the right channel again; on the contrary, we find her the veriest Patient-Griffel that ever had lain by a Monarch's side. She comes but thrice on the stage; the first time she is rebuked by Gobrias
- 'with the same language that the vicar of Newgate might dispense to some sinner forlorn; then she is on her mary-bones to the impostor without reluctance. Lastly, when provoked with a drawn sword, and words more cutting, the proudest rant she could be raised to, was, Fire consume me, if ever I was a wobore (53).'
- (48) Page 70. Lastly, Mr Rymer finds great fault with the conduct of the incestuous love between Arbaces and Panthea, which he calls a canker in the heart of this tragedy (54).
- (49) Page 75. We come lastly to the Maid's Tragedy, of which he gives this general character, that 'nothing in history was ever so unnatural, nothing in nature was ever so improbable, as we find the whole conduct of this tragedy; so far are we from any thing accurate and philosophical, as poetry requires (55).'
- (50) Page 107. Let us hear what he says of the King. 'Our Poet gives to the great comical booby Callianax, the honour of a long name with a King * at the end of it, yet lets the King himself go without. But since he must be nameless, we may treat him with the greater freedom; and to tell my mind, certainly God never made a King with so little wit, nor the Devil with so little grace, as is this King Anonymus (56).'
- (51) Page 107. As for Evadne's part, he asks, 'Did Hell ever give reception to such a non-ster, or Cerberus ever wag his tail at an impudence so sacred (57)?' Mr Rymer instances in her speech to Amintor on the wedding-night, which begins with A maiden-head, Amintor, at my years! He says farther, with respect to this character; 'Had Evadne been the injured body's sister, and had married Amintor out of revenge, or had there been any foundation from circumstances for this sort of carriage, the character then might have been contrived plausible enough; but both the King's behaviour and her's, uncircumstanced as we have 'em, are every way so harsh and against nature, that every thing said by them strikes like a dagger to the soul of any reasonable audience (58).'
- (52) Page 112. Mr Rymer declares it as his opinion, that such immodest characters, as that of Evadne, 'ought not to stalk in tragedy on high shoes, but should pack down with the carriers into the province of comedy, there to be kicked about and exposed to laughter (59).'
- (53) Page 114. In the next place, our Critic is very severe upon the absurdity and injustice of the King's murder, whom, though a monster, 'the Poet (he says) cuts off, ere ripe for punishment, and by such unproper means, that to remove one guilty person he makes an hundred, and commits the deadly sins to punish a venial (60).'
- (54) Page 114. If the King must be killed, he thinks Amintor, as having received the highest provocations, the properest instrument of his punishment; for Melantius had no reason to be angry with any but his sister Evadne, nor had she any pretence to employ her hands against any life but her own (61).
- (55) Page 116. As for the other characters, he observes, that Callianax is an old humorous Lord, neither wife nor valiant, as himself confesses, and yet is intrusted with the strength and keys of the kingdom; whereas, in comedy, he would scarce pass for a good yeoman of the cellar. His daughter Aspasia, that gives name to this tragedy, makes also a very simple figure. Never did Amintors or Passor-Fido know any thing so tender; nor were the Arcadian hills ever watered with the tears of a creature so innocent. Pretty lamb! how mournfully it bleats! it needs no articulate voice to move our compassion; it seeks no shades but under dismal yew, and brouzes only on willow-garlands; yet it can speak for a kiss or so. — This Aspasia was a Lord's daughter, and bred at court, yet is in the presence and bed-chamber of the Lady that supplants her, and amongst her bride-maids, where she acts her part, and fawns upon the perjured man that forsakes her. And now cannot I be persuaded, that there is ought of nature or probability in all this. Much less would I think this a woman to handle a sword, and kick Amintor, as we see her do soon after. Nor can I conceive wherein consists that blessing, as she calls it, which she proposed to herself in being killed by his hands. This may be romance, but not nature (62).'
- (56) Page 123, 124. But of all the characters, that of Amintor, he thinks, is the most unreasonable. 'No reason (he says) appears why he was contracted to Aspasia, and less why he forsook her for veral remarks, as if he designed an answer to that gentleman [N].

Several of Beaumont and Fletcher's Plays were printed in quarto during the lives of the authors; and in the year 1645, twenty years after Fletcher's death, there was published in folio a collection of such of their Plays, as had not before been printed, amounting to between thirty and forty. At the beginning of this volume are inserted a great many commendatory verses, written by the most eminent wits of that age. This collection was published by Mr Shirley, after the shutting up of the Theatres, and dedicated to the Earl of Pembroke by ten of the most famous Actors. In 1679, there was an edition published of all their Plays in folio, containing those formerly printed in quarto, and those in the first folio edition. Several of the commendatory verses are left out in that impression. Lastly, in 1711, an edition of their Plays was published by Mr Tonson, in seven volumes in octavo, containing all the verses in praise of the authors, and supplying a large omission of part of the last act of the Tragedy of Thierry and Theodoret.

(63) Page 125. 'for Evadne, and least of all for his dissembling and bearing so patiently the greatest provocations that could possibly be given (63).' Mr Rymer finds great fault with the famous scene between Melantius and Amintor in the third act. Amintor having discovered to Melantius the whoredom of his sister Evadne, Melantius draws his sword, and is for fighting Amintor, who upbraids him with extorting the secret from him, and then raging at it. Yet Melantius persists, 'till Amintor is provoked to draw his sword, and then Melantius puts up. 'Harlequin and Scaramoutio (he tells us) might do these things: Tragedy suffers 'em not; here is no place for cowards nor bullies (64). 'Yet far more faulty is what follows: The counterturn has no shadow of sense or sobriety. Melantius has swaggered away his fury, and now Amintor is all agog to be fighting; for what? to get his secret back again (65).' Mr Rymer concludes thus: 'We may remember (however we find this scene of Melantius and Amintor written in the book) that at the theatre we have a good scene acted; there is work cut out, and both our Æsopus and Roscinius are upon the stage together. Whatever defect may be in Amintor and Melantius, Mr Hart and Mr Mobun are wanting in nothing. To these we owe for what is pleasing in the scene, and to this scene we may impute the success of the Maid's Tragedy (66).'

(64) Page 135. [N] Mr Dryden — made several remarks, as if he designed an answer to Mr Rymer.] These remarks, we are told (67), may be seen, under Mr Dryden's own hand, at the publisher's of the edition in 1711, who has printed them in the preface to that edition. I shall extract from them only what is immediately opposed to the objections in the last note. 'Tis evident, says Mr Dryden, those plays, which he (Mr Rymer) arraigns, have moved both those passions (terror and pity) in a high degree upon the stage. To give the glory of this away from the Poet, and to place it upon the actors, seems unjust. One reason is, because whatever actors they have found, the event has been always the same, the passions have been always moved; which shews, that there is somewhat of force and merit in the plays themselves, conducing to the design of raising those two passions. And suppose them ever to have been excellently acted, yet action only adds grace, vigour, and more life upon the stage, but cannot give it wholly where it was not before. But, secondly, I dare appeal to those, who have never seen them acted, if they have not found those two passions moved within them; and if the general voice will carry it, Mr Rymer's prejudice will take off his single testimony. This being matter of fact is reasonably to be established by this appeal; as if one man say 'tis night, when the rest of the world conclude it to be day, there needs no further argument against him that it is so. — Shakespeare and Fletcher have written to the genius of the age and nation in which they lived; for though nature, as he objects, is the same in all places, and reason too the same; yet the climate, the age, the dispositions of the people, to whom a Poet writes, may be so different, that what pleased the Greeks would not satisfy an English audience. — The faults, which he has found in the designs, are rather wittily aggravated in many places, than reasonably urged; and as much may be returned on the Greeks by one who were as witty as himself. Secondly, They destroy not, if they are granted, the foundation of the fabrick, only take away from the beauty of the symmetry. For example; the faults in the character of the King and no King are not, as he makes them, such as render him detestable; but only imperfections which accompany human nature, and for the most part are excused by the violence of his love; so that they destroy not our pity or concernment for him. This answer may be applied to most of his objections of that kind. And Rollo committing many murders, when he is answerable but for one, is too severely arraigned by him; for it adds to our horror and detestation of the criminal; and poetic justice is not neglected neither, for we stab him in our minds for every offence he commits; and the point which the Poet is to gain upon the audience, is not so much in the death of the offender, as the raising an horror of his crimes. That the criminal should neither be wholly guilty, nor wholly innocent, but so participating of both, as to move both pity and terror, is certainly a good rule, but not perpetually to be observed, for that were to make all tragedies too much alike; which objection he foresaw, but has not fully answered. I shall finish this extract with Mr Dryden's opinion of Mr Rymer's book. 'My judgment (says he) of this piece is, that it is extremely learned, but that the author of it is better read in the Greek than in the English Poets; that all writers ought to study this Critique, as the best account I have ever seen of the Antients; that the model of tragedy he has here given is excellent, and extremely correct; but that it is not the only model of all tragedy, because it is too much circumscribed in the plot, characters, &c. And lastly, that we may be taught here justly to admire and imitate the Antients, without giving them the preference, with this author, in prejudice to our own country.' T

BECKET (St THOMAS) [A], Archbishop of Canterbury, in the reign of King Henry

[A] BECKET (St THOMAS).] He was the great Goliath Saint of those times; and as his shrine out-did those of all the Martyrs that had gone before him, so his life and miracles have had more writers to record them, than the most glorious actions of our best of Kings. The following list of them is picked out of Leland, Bale, and Pits, together with some of our later authors. I. Herbert Bosenham, or Bosham, or de Hofcham (1), who was this Archbishop's secretary, and also present at the slaughter of him. II. Edward, a Monk of Canterbury (2), the Martyr's most intimate friend. III. Johannes Sarisburiensis (3), who accompanied Becket in his exile, but never countenanced his behaviour towards the King, being as sharp a writer VOL. I. No. 53.

against the encroachments of the Papal See, as any man of his time. IV. Bartholomæus Iſcanus, or Exonensis, Bishop of Exeter, where he died in 1184. V. E. a Monk of Evesham, who dedicated his book, or wrote it by way of epistle, to Henry, Abbot of Croyland. VI. William Stephens, or Fitz-Stephen, a Monk of Canterbury, and, for that reason, usually called Gulielmus Cantuariensis. He is said to have written three several treatises of the life, martyrdom, and miracles of St Thomas Becket; which, we are told (4), are now in the Cotton library. But that, which there carries his name, seems to have been penned by Johannes Carnotensis, who is the same person with Sarisburiensis above-mentioned (5), since, in the Henry II, and so famous for his martyrdom and miracles, was son of Gilbert, a Merchant, and some time Sheriff of London, and Maud or Matilda, a Saracen Lady (a) [B]; and was born at London in the year 1119 (b). He was educated in grammar learning at Merton-Abbey in Surrey; and, in his riper years, studied at Oxford, and afterwards at Paris. He soon grew into favour with Theobald, Archbishop of Canterbury, who sent him to study the Civil Law at Bononia in Italy, and, after his return, made him Archdeacon of Canterbury (at that time one of the richest benefices in England) Provost of Beverly, and a Prebendary of Lincoln and St Paul's. Nor was this all; for the Archbishop, looking upon Becket as a proper person to manage the interest of the Church at court, so effectually recommended him to King Henry II, that, in 1158, he was made High-Chancellor to that Prince [C], and Preceptor to his son, the young Prince Henry.

the Quadripartite History, what we have from him is often to be found, in the same words, in the life there ascribed to Fitz-Stephen. VII. Benedictus Petroburgensis, Abbot of Peterborough, who died in the year 1200. VIII. Alanus Teukensburienfis, Abbot of Teukensbury, who died about the same time. IX. Roger, a Monk of Croyland, who lived about the year 1214. 'Tis observed (6), that St Thomas's miracles were become so numerous in this writer's time, that he had matter for seven large volumes, in composing whereof he spent no less than fifteen years. X. Stephen Langton, a famous successor of Becket's in the See of Canterbury, whose work on this subject is said to be in the library of Bennet-college. XI. Alexander de Hales, so called from the monastery of Hales in Gloucestershire, where he was educated; one of the most eminent schoolmen of his age, and master to Thomas Aquinas, Bonaventure, &c. XII. John Grandison, or Grainston, who died in the year 1369. XIII. Quadrilogus, or the author of a book, intitled De Vita et Processu S. Thomæ Cantuariensis et Martyris super Libertate Ecclesiastica. It is collected out of four Historians, who were contemporary and conversant with Becket, viz. Herbert de Hofbam, Johannes Carnotensis, Gulielmus Canterburiensis, and Alanus Teukensburienfis, who are introduced as so many relaters of facts interchangeably. This book was first printed at Paris in 1495, and is often quoted by our Historians, in the reign of Henry II, by the name of Quadripartita Historia. XIV. Thomas Stapleton, the translator of Bede, in whose book De tribus Thomis (7), or Of the three Thomas's, our Saint makes as considerable a figure as either Thomas the Apostle, or Thomas Aquinas. XV. Lawrence Wade, or Wade, a Benedictine Monk of Canterbury, who lived and died we know not when, or where; unless perhaps he be the same person with XVI. An anonymous writer of Becket's life, who appears to have been a Monk of that church, and whose book is said to be in the library at Lambeth (8). XVII. Richard James, nephew of Dr Thomas James, some time keeper of the Bodleian library; a very industrious and eminent Antiquary, who endeavoured to overthrow the great design of all the above-mentioned authors, in his Decanonizatio Thomæ Cantuariensis et suorum (9), which, with other manuscript pieces by the same hand, is in the public library at Oxford. These are the principal writers of our Archbishop's life; besides whom, several other Historians have spoken largely of him; as John Bromton, Matthew Paris, Gervase, &c.

[B] Son of Gilbert, a merchant, and some time Sheriff, of London, and Maud or Matilda, a Saracen Lady] John Bromton, the Historian, who informs us (10), that his mother Matilda was a Saracen Lady of considerable quality, gives us likewise a long story of the extraordinary accidents, by which she came to be the wife of Gilbert. Though there is little of probability in the narrative, we shall set it down, for the reader's amusement, as briefly as possible. Gilbert, in his youth, took a journey to Jerusalem, attended only by one of his domestics, named Richard. As they were one day at their devotions in a church, among several other Christians, they were surprized by a party of Infidels, and carried to a prison belonging to a certain great Saracen Lord, where they were treated with great hardships and severities. Gilbert continued a year and half in this captivity, but suffered less than his companions, having the good fortune, by his excellent qualities, to gain the esteem and affection of his master, who often made him eat at his own table, and took a particular pleasure in asking him concerning the customs and manners of different people. This Lord's daughter was struck with the person and conversation of Gilbert; and, finding an opportunity of talking with him in private, she informed herself particularly of his country and religion, and the circumstances of his past life. Gilbert having satisfied her enquiries in relation to himself, and explained to her the doctrines of the Christian Religion, she told him, to his great surprize, that she was resolved to turn Christian, and to abandon her country and her father's house for the sake of that religion; but, as she had no knowledge of any other Christian but himself, she desired Gilbert that he would promise to marry her, in case they could make their escape. Our Merchant was confounded at this proposition; for, besides the difficulty of escaping, he was fearful lest this might be some snare laid for him; and therefore he answered her only in general terms, speaking always very advantageously of the Christian Religion, and telling her how happy she would be if God should inspire her to embrace it. Some time after, Gilbert and the other Captives found means to break their chains, and escape into the countries conquered by the Christians; and Gilbert returned into England. The Saracen young Lady no sooner heard of Gilbert's flight, than she resolved to follow him. And having disposed all things for that purpose, she left her father's house by night, and escaped into the land of the Christians, from whence she took shipping, in company with some English merchants and pilgrims, and arrived in England. When she came to London, being a stranger to the English tongue, she was quite at a loss how to find out the person she was in quest of; but passing accidentally by Gilbert's house, she was seen and known by his man Richard, who acquainted his master with the news of her arrival. Gilbert was extremely touched with the zeal and affection of the young Lady, and ordered Richard to conduct her to the house of a gentlewoman of his acquaintance, where she was treated with the greatest kindness and civility. In the mean time Gilbert, who was extremely desirous of promoting the fair Infidel's conversion, but unwilling to engage in marriage, having long since resolved to spend his life in the wars of the Christians against the Saracens, applied himself for advice to the Bishop of London, and some other Bishops; who, considering the circumstances of the affair, and perceiving the hand of God visibly concerned in it, were unanimously of opinion, that he should marry her, provided she should first receive baptism, and embrace the Christian Faith. Accordingly, the very next day, she was solemnly baptized in St Paul's church, and, immediately after the ceremony, married to Gilbert. Their nuptials were attended with the blessing of Heaven; for Matilda soon after conceived this son, pre-ordained to be Archbishop of Canterbury, and a Martyr for the liberties of the Church. And so you have Bromton's story.

[C] He was made High-Chancellor to King Henry II.] That Prince, as the Historians of his time remark, was of an haughty disposition, and had about him several persons, who gave him bad advice, and led him to enterprizes against the rights and authority of the Church. Archbishop Theobald, who had already been exposed to great persecutions in the reign of King Stephen, and fearing lest Henry should tread in the steps of his predecessor, resolved, if possible, to oppose the abilities and virtues of Becket, to the evil councils of the King's false friends. As his rank of Archbishop gave him free access to court, he took all opportunities of possessing the King with an high esteem

Becket, upon this promotion, laid aside the ecclesiastical habit and way of living, and affected both the dress and manners of a courtier [D]; discharging, at the same time, the duties of his station to the entire satisfaction both of the King and the people (c). In this character of Chancellor, he made a campaign with King Henry in his expedition into Toulouse, A. D. 1159; having in his own pay twelve hundred horse, besides a retinue of seven hundred knights or gentlemen; always forward in action, and commanding at the sieges of several strong places (d). In 1160, he was sent by the King to Paris, to treat of a marriage between Prince Henry, then but seven years old, and the Princess Margaret, the King of France's daughter, no more than three; in which negotiation Becket succeeded, and returned with the young Princess to England (e). He had not been Chancellor much above four years, when Archbishop Theobald died. The King, who was then in Normandy, presently cast his eyes upon the Chancellor, and, resolving to advance him to the See of Canterbury [E], sent over his agents to England, who managed the matter so with the Monks and Clergy, that Becket was elected [F], almost unanimously, no one opposing his election but Gilbert Foliot, Bishop of London. After the election, Becket, being at that time only Deacon, was ordained Priest, on Whitfunday 1162, by Walter, Bishop of Rochester; and, on Trinity Sunday following, he was consecrated, by Henry Bishop of Winchester, in the cathedral church of Canterbury; the young Prince Henry, and a great concourse of the Nobility, being present at the solemnity. He received his pall from Pope Alexander III, then residing in France; and, presently after his consecration, he sent messengers to the King in Normandy, with his resignation of the seal and office of Chancellor. This step not a little surprized and displeas'd the King, who, returning soon after into England, and being met at his landing by the Archbishop, received him with the usual salute, but at the same time with such a countenance, as plainly shewed he had not the same affection for him as formerly (f). This year, Becket, in the presence of the King and court, performed the ceremony of translating the relics of St Edward the Confessor to Westminster (g). Being now confirmed in the See of Canterbury, he betook himself to a quite different manner of life, and exchanged the [D] He affected the dress and manners of a courtier. Bromton tells us (12), he conformed himself in every thing to the King's humour, hunted with him, partook of all his diversions, and even observed the same hours of eating and going to bed. He gave into the pleasantries of the court, had numerous and splendid levees, and courted popular applause. When he rode on horseback, he used a silver bridle, and the expences of his table exceeded those of the greatest Nobles. Bishop Godwin (13) tells us the same thing, adding, that it was commonly said, 'the Chancellor had forgot ' he was an Archdeacon and an Ecclesiastic.' *Hanc tantam potentiam ut firmaret, seque Regi (qui adolescentie vix adhuc egressus erat) ac deinde proceribus et aulicis gratiorem redderet, Clericalem Amicum Consuetudinemque paulatim deposuit, et aulicam splendorem ac magnificentiam induit; ac ut regi se in omnibus accommodaret, iisdem se moribus aptavit, eadem epulandi dormiendique tempora sibi statuit; una sive in feriis sive in jocosis rebus semper adsuit; aulicum leporem et concinnitatem in omnibus affectavit; nihilque non fecit, quo vel gratiam principis, vel apud ceteros gloriam auramque popularum captaret. [E] The King—resolved to advance him to the See of Canterbury.] The King no sooner heard the news of Archbishop Theobald's death, than he cast his eyes upon Becket to succeed him. The Chancellor was then with that Prince in Normandy. When the King told him his design, Becket smiled, and, pointing to the secular habit he wore, said; 'Truly, Sire, you have pitched upon a very reformed and holy person to govern the first Church in England!' But, finding the King was in earnest, he is said to have replied, with great freedom and warmth; 'I assuredly know, Sire, that if God permits me to be Archbishop of Canterbury, I shall soon lose your Majesty's good graces, and that the love you now bear me will be converted into extreme hatred. For give me leave to tell your Majesty, that the attempts you have already made against the rights of the Church, give me cause to fear your Majesty will require some things of me, which I cannot in honour and conscience comply with; and my enemies will take occasion from thence to animate and incense your Majesty against me.' In this manner Becket is said to have predicted the ensuing breach between him and the King. But that Prince was so far from being displeas'd with Becket's freedom, that he immediately ordered some Lords of his court to accompany the Chancellor into England, and to acquaint the Clergy of the realm, and particularly the Chapter of Canterbury, with his Majesty's desire that Becket might be elected their Archbishop. The Chancellor, nevertheless, continued obstinate in his refusal to accept of this dignity, 'till the Cardinal of Pisa, the Pope's Legate in England, who was then with the King, convinced him of the expediency of complying with the King's desire for the good of the Church; after which he set out in a few days for England (14).

[F] He was elected.] The Lords, who accompanied Becket into England, produced their commission in presence of the Chapter of Canterbury; upon which several Bishops assembled in London to deliberate on the affair. But the Chapter, as well as the Bishops, were divided in their opinions. Some thought they could not elect a fitter person to support the rights of the Church against the encroachments of the State; whilst others objected, that the Chancellor being a courtier, his election would rather prejudice the Church, for they believed he would continue Chancellor after he was made Archbishop. They added, that it was an unworthy thing, and contrary to the divine laws, for a secular person, and one fitter to bear arms than the episcopal cross, to become at once a shepherd and bishop of souls. But the others replied, that it was no new thing in the Church for it's first dignities to be conferred on persons who were immediately before vested with secular employments; witness St Ambrose, who, from a Governor of a Province, became that great Archbishop of Milan, who shut the door of his church against an Emperor, and obliged him to do public penance for the crime he had committed. At length, after much dispute, Thomas was elected Archbishop of Canterbury, on the eve of Whitfunday, in the abbey of Westminster; and immediately after, by the authority of Prince Henry, who represented his father's person on this occasion, he was publicly discharged from giving any account of his administration in the office of Chancellor (15).

gaiety and luxury of a courtier for the gravity and austerities of a Monk (b) [G]. The same year he was present, with some of his Suffragans, at the Council of Tours [H] held under Pope Alexander III (i). Soon after his return into England, he began to exert himself with great vigour in defence of the rights and privileges of the church of Canterbury; for, besides prosecuting at law several of the Nobility, and others, for lands and possessions, he pretended they had usurped from that See (k), he laid claim to the custody of the castle and tower of Rochester, then in the hands of the crown; he demanded homage of the Earl of Clare for the manor of Tunbridge; and he excommunicated William, Lord of the manor of Aynsford in Kent, for disputing with him the right of patronage to that church (l) [I]. In all these instances he proceeded with such warmth and obstinacy, as greatly alienated the minds of the King and the Nobility from him; and, under this disadvantage, his conduct was severely censured, and all his actions represented in their worst light (m) [K]. Nor was it long before the King and Becket came to an open rupture. For Henry, endeavouring to recal such of the privileges of the Clergy, as he thought inconvenient to the State; and particularly, to subject Ecclesiastics guilty of murder, felony, and other high crimes, to the judgment of the Civil Courts [L], met with a violent opposition from our Archbishop, who stood firmly in defence

[H] He was present — at the council of Tours There was at that time a schism in the Church. About four years before, Cardinal Roland, Chancellor of the Holy See, had been canonically elected Pope under the name of Alexander III. But at the same time Cardinal Octavian was declared Pope by two Cardinals of his faction, whose example was presently followed by three other Cardinals, some Bishops, and several Senators, who employed all their power to support Octavian in his usurpation. This Anti-pope besieged Alexander several days in St Peter's Church, and obliged him at last to fly from Rome, and take refuge in France, where he was received with extraordinary honours. To put an end to this schism, he convened a council at Tours, where were present seventeen Cardinals, and a great number of Bishops, Abbots, and other Ecclesiastics. Among the most eminent Prelates, who assisted at this council, was our Archbishop of Canterbury, who was received, at his entrance into Tours, by the magistrates, and most of the members of the council; and the Pope, who had long desired to see him, shewed him very particular marks of his affection and esteem. In this assembly, Becket complained of the violent oppressions the Church laboured under, through the ambition and avarice of the laity, who daily invaded its rights and possessions, and procured several canons and decrees to be made in favour of Ecclesiastics (17).

[I] He excommunicated William, Lord of the manor of Aynsford in Kent, for disputing with him the right of patronage to that church. Having a right, as he pretended, to present to the vacant livings, in the towns which held of his See, he collated one Laurence, a Priest, to the rectory above-mentioned. Whereupon William de Ainsford, Lord of the manor of that parish, laying claim to the patronage of that church, drove Laurence out of possession by force of arms, for which violence the Archbishop immediately excommunicated William. The latter, lying under this sentence, applies to the King, who was highly displeased with the Archbishop for not acquainting him with the sentence before it passed; the King alledging, that it was part of the royal prerogative, that none of his officers, or other persons holding in capite of the crown, should be excommunicated without his knowledge and consent. Hereupon the King wrote to the Archbishop, desiring he would absolve William. But the Archbishop replied, that excommunication and absolution were no part of the King's prerogative, but solely under the direction of the Church. However, at length, he was prevailed upon to take off the censure (18).

[K] His actions were set in their worst light. The courtiers represented his austerity of manners as superstition: His zeal for discipline was called rigour and cruelty: His care to preserve the rights and revenues of the Archbishopric was imputed to covetousness: His contempt of popularity was construed a cynical affectation: On the other hand, his living up to the dignity of his station was censured for pride and ambition. In short, they persuaded the King, that, if the Archbishop went on in his encroachments, the prerogative must greatly suffer, and the crown in a manner sink under him. Hanc itaque mutationem excelsi maligna interpretatione conati sunt impii obfuscare, superstitioni ascribentes quod vitam ducebat arctiorem. Zelum justitiæ crudelitatem mentiebantur; quod Ecclesiæ procurabat utilitates avaritiæ attribuebant; contemptum mundani favoris venerationem gloriæ esse dicebant; curialis magnificentia fingebatur elatio — nihil jam ab eo vel dici vel fieri poterat quod non malitia malorum depravarat; adeo quidem ut regi persuaderunt, quod si archiepiscopi potestas procederet, regia dignitas proculdubio periret (19).

[L] Henry endeavoured to subject Ecclesiastics guilty of murder, &c. to the judgment of the civil courts. The Clergy at this time seem greatly to have abused the privilege of exemption from the civil courts, of which the King had lately received several complaints. To give an instance or two. A Burgher of Scarborough had complained to the King against a rural Dean for levying twelve shillings upon him, pronouncing his wife an adulteress, and enjoining her penance, without legal proof. The Dean was brought before the King, the Archbishop of York, the Bishops of Lincoln and Durham, and John, treasurer of York; and not being able to defend himself, the temporal Barons were ordered to sit with the Bishops upon the bench, and join in the sentence upon him. John the treasurer was of opinion, that if he restored the Burgher his money, and it was remitted to the discretion of his Bishop, whether he should be turned out of his office or not, there was no reason to punish him any farther. Upon which, Richard de Lucy, Justiciary of England, asked, What satisfaction the King should have for the breach of his laws? John answered, None, because the offender was a clerk. Whereupon the Justiciary and the Temporal Barons went out of the court, and refused to be present when Judgment was given (20). Again; the Judges being upon their circuit at Dunstable, one Simon Fitz-Peter informed the court, that Philip de Brock, Canon of Bedford, had spoken dishonourably of the King in public company. The King ordered this Brock to be prosecuted before the Archbishop; and the charge being proved against him, he endeavoured to excuse himself by alledging that the words were spoken in a passion. The King demanding judgment against him, the ecclesiastical court sentenced him to lose one year's profit of his prebend, and to be banished during that time. But this sentence was thought too favourable, and gave the King no satisfaction (21). Farther, a clerk in Worcestershire had debauched a Farmer's daughter, and afterwards murdered her father. The King required, that this man should defence of those immunities, and would not submit to the least infringement of them. The King, however, resolving to carry his point, convened a Synod of the Bishops at Westminster (n) [M]; but this assembly broke up without effect. At length, several of the Bishops being gained over by the Court, and the Pope interposing in the quarrel, Becket was prevailed on to acquiesce, and to submit to the King's pleasure (o). And, to bind the Clergy more strongly, the King summoned a Convention, or Parliament, at Clarendon [N], where several laws were enacted, relating to the privileges of the Clergy, called from thence, The Constitutions of Clarendon (p). After the breaking up of this assembly, Becket, repenting of his compliance, retired from court; and, by way of penance, suspended himself from officiating in the church, till he should receive absolution from the Pope, then at Sens (q). After this, despairing of the King's favour [O], he endeavoured to make his escape beyond sea; but, before he could reach the coast of France, the wind, turning against him, drove him back to England (r). Some pretend, the ship's crew, repenting their taking him on board, and fearing the King's displeasure, tacked about in the middle of the voyage, and brought him back to the English shore (s). He immediately repaired to Canterbury, where he found the King's officers plundering his palace; but, upon sight of the Archbishop, they desisted. The King, to prevent Becket's farther attempts to convey himself into France, summoned a Parliament at Northampton, which met in October 1165. Here the Archbishop was charged with failing in his duty and allegiance to the King [P]; and, his defence not being allowed, he was

should be tried in the civil courts. But Archbishop Becket, refusing to comply, ordered the malefactor to be kept in the prison of the Bishop of the diocese, and not to be put into the hands of the King's Justices (22). To give one instance more: Another clerk stole a silver chalice out of a church in London: The King would have had him prosecuted and punished in his own courts; but the Archbishop brought him before the ecclesiastical court, where he was sentenced to be degraded, and branded in the face with a hot iron (23). The King, provoked by these examples, insisted, that when any of the Clergy were apprehended for robbery, murder, felony, or any other high crimes of that nature, they should be tried in the King's courts, and undergo the same punishment with laymen. On the other hand, the Archbishop insisted, that when any clerk was charged with any of the crimes above-mentioned, he ought to be tried before ecclesiastical Judges in the Court Christian. And in case he was convicted, he was to suffer degradation, and be deprived of all his ecclesiastical preferments. And if, after he was thus stripped of his character, he happened to relapse into the former crimes, or broke any of the laws of the realm, he might then be delivered up to the King's justice, and receive his trial and punishment from the civil magistrate (24).

[M] The king convened a Synod of the Bishops at Westminster. In this assembly the King demanded, that the Clergy, when they were charged with any capital offence, might receive their trial in the courts of justice. But the Archbishop not giving his Highness satisfaction upon this head, the question was put to the Bishops, Whether, in consideration of their duty and allegiance to the King, and of the interest and peace of the kingdom, they were willing to promise a submission to the laws of his grandfather King Henry. To this the Archbishop, speaking for himself and the rest, replied, That they were willing to be bound by the antient laws of the kingdom, as far as the privileges of their order would permit (*). The King was highly displeased with this conditional clause, and endeavoured to bring the Bishops to an absolute promise, without any reservation whatsoever. But the Archbishop would by no means submit; and the rest of the Bishops adhered for some time to their Primate, excepting Hilary, Bishop of Chichester, who, through fear of the King's displeasure, told the King he was ready to observe the laws and customs of the kingdom bona fide. But the King would admit of no limitation or abatement of his demands; and so the assembly was dismissed (25).

[N] A Convention, or Parliament, at Clarendon. In this assembly Archbishop Becket declared, he had gone too far in his late engagement to the King, and that he thought himself obliged to retract his submission. The King was exceedingly angry at this receding from his promise, and threatened the Archbishop and his adherents with the utmost severities. To prevent this storm, the Bishops of Salisbury and Norwich, Robert Earl of Leicester, Reginald Earl of Cornwall, and two Knights Templars, came to the Archbishop, and, throwing themselves at his feet, intreated him not to carry things to extremity for fear of the consequences; and pressing him to wait upon the King immediately, and make a public acknowledgment of his submission. The Archbishop, over-ruled by the entreaties of these great men, waited on the King, and declared, in the presence of the Clergy and Laity, that he was ready to conform to the antient laws of the kingdom. He likewise gave his Suffragans liberty to join in the same declaration. Things being thus far adjusted, the King commanded all the Earls and Barons to withdraw, and prepare a draught of the laws of his grandfather King Henry. This being done, the draught was produced and read to the Bishops, who, having sworn implicitly to the observing of the King's laws, without enquiring into their contents, were not a little shocked at hearing them read. Then the King ordered the Archbishops and Bishops to put their seals to the instrument. And the rest being ready to comply, Archbishop Becket swore he would never put his seal, nor give any other marks of his consent to that draught; alledging, that he was made to believe his promise would be construed no farther than ceremony, and the paying the King a public respect before the great men of the kingdom. However it was now too late to offer such excuses, and the Archbishop was obliged to sign and seal the instrument; one copy of which was lodged in Becket's hands, another with the Archbishop of York, and a third among the records of the crown (26).

(26) R. Hoveden, ibid. Gervaf. ibid. M. Paris, ibid.

[O] He despaired of the King's favour. Soon after the Convention of Clarendon, Rotro, Archbishop of Roan, was dispatched by the Pope into England, to make up the breach between the King and the Archbishop. But the King would by no means consent to an accommodation, unless the Constitutions of Clarendon were confirmed by the Pope's Bull. This condition being refused, the King sent two of his Chaplains to Pope Alexander, to desire that Roger, Archbishop of York, might be made his Holiness's Legate for all England. But the Pope, being sensible this was intended to restrain the jurisdiction of the Archbishop of Canterbury, absolutely refused to comply with the request. Nevertheless, being desirous to gratify the King, and make up the breach, he proposed to make the King his Legate for England; but with this Proviso, that his Highness should not distress the Archbishop of Canterbury, or do any thing to his prejudice. The King's Agents returned with the commission, and Henry would gladly have accepted the Legantine power; but when he found it clogged with the above Proviso, he was highly exasperated, and sent back the instrument (27).

[P] He was charged with failing in his duty and allegiance to the King. It seems John, the King's Marshal, had claimed a manor or farm in the Archbishop's court, as an estate held of the church of Canterbury; and not having justice done him, as he pretended, he disclaimed the Archbishop's court; and, having sworn the failure of justice, according to the custom of those times, designed to remove the cause. The Archbishop alledged, that John had no reason to complain

In the next place, a suit was commenced against him, in the King's name, for five hundred pounds lent him, when he was Chancellor; and an account was demanded from him of the profits of the vacant abbeys and bishoprics, of which he had the custody during his Chancellorship (u). Under these difficulties, he consulted with the Bishops, who were divided in their opinions [R]. And now, having in vain declared his appeal to the Pope, and finding himself opposed, and at last, deserted by his brethren, and all hopes of accommodation at an end [S], he privately complain of hard usage; and that, when he disclaimed his court, instead of making oath upon the four Gospels, as the law required, he had sworn upon a Tropaz, or book of Old Church Hymns. However, John procured the King's writ, by which the Archbishop was required to answer his complaint in the King's court. The Archbishop did not make his appearance at the day, but sent four gentlemen to the King, with letters from himself, and the High-Sheriff of Kent, attesting the misinformation of John, and his defect of proof; and alledging sickness in excuse for his non-appearance. But this defence not being allowed, the Archbishop was cast in the court by the Barons, and most of the Bishops, then present, for having failed in his duty and allegiance to the King, in not appearing upon his Highness's writ (28).

[Q] He was sentenced — There was a dispute between the Bishops and Barons who should pronounce judgment, each of them endeavouring to excuse themselves, and decline the office. The Barons urged, that they were Laymen; that the Spiritual Lords were of the Archbishop's order, and that therefore the sentence was their business. To which the Bishops replied, that the sentence not being ecclesiastical, but secular, it belonged rather to the Temporal Lords. However, the King, being informed of the dispute, ordered the Bishop of Winchester to pronounce sentence, which he did, though with great reluctance (29).

[R] The Bishops were divided in their opinions. Gilbert, Bishop of London, desired the Archbishop to consider, 'how much he had been obliged and promoted by the King; that the juncture was cross and unfavourable; and that if he persisted in opposing the King, he would not only ruin himself, but involve the whole English Church in the misfortune; whereas his submission might very probably restore his affairs, and recover the King's favour.' Then Henry, Bishop of Winchester, delivered his opinion, and declared, 'That the measures, advised by the Bishop of London, tended to disable the Bishops from discharging their functions, and were destructive of the government of the Church: For, says he, if our Primate sets us such a precedent of irresolution and compliance, if a Bishop must give up his authority, and desert his charge, at the will and menaces of the Prince, what can we expect but that the government of the Church will be quite unhinged, and every thing managed by the arbitrary direction of the court; and then, as the Scripture says, It shall be as with the people, so with the priest.' Hilary, Bishop of Chichester, who valued himself upon his rhetoric, spoke next, and told the Archbishop, 'That, were not the times unfavourable, and the Church embroiled, he should have been of the opinion last delivered: But now, since the Canons had not strength to bear up against the present opposition, he conceived a rigid insisting upon the authority of the Church was very unreasonable, and that receding and giving way was the only proper expedient; that they ought to be governed by the juncture, and yield to the King's demands, lest, by persisting in their non-compliance, they might be forced at last to an involuntary and dishonourable submission.' Robert, Bishop of Lincoln, spoke much to the same purpose; and so did Bartholomew, Bishop of Exeter, who added, 'That, since the seas ran high, they ought to furl their sails, rather than perish in the storm; and that since the persecution was not general, but levelled at a single person, it was better that person, though their Primate, should suffer in some measure, than that the whole Church of England should be exposed to inevitable ruin.' Roger, Bishop of Worcester, being asked his opinion, told them, 'he should not venture to give his advice in the case: For, says he, if I should assert, that a Prelate ought to desert his charge for fear of the King's displeasure, and be frightened from doing his duty, I should speak against my conscience, and my own mouth would condemn me. But if I should propose any methods of resisting the King's will, I should expose myself to be informed against, to be thrown out of the King's protection, and treated as an Out-law; therefore I shall suspend my opinion, and declare on neither side.' Nigel, Bishop of Ely, was sick of a Palsy, and could not appear. And William, Bishop of Norwich, sent to excuse his absence; saying privately, 'That God had sent the Bishop of Ely a very happy excuse, and that he could have wished himself screened under the same misfortune (30).'

[S] Having in vain declared his appeal to the Pope, and finding himself opposed, and at last deserted, by the Bishops, and all hopes of accommodation at an end, &c. The day before he was to give in his answer to the charges brought against him, the greatest part of the Bishops came to him, and intreated him for the sake of the Church, and his own security, to moderate his terms, and resign to the King's pleasure, otherwise he must expect to be sentenced as a Traitor, for failing in his allegiance to his Sovereign, and breaking the ancient customs of the kingdom which he had sworn to keep. To this the Archbishop answered, 'That he owned himself inexcusable before God Almighty for taking so unlawful an oath; but since it was better to retract a promise, though never so solemnly made, than to perish by keeping it, he was resolved to disengage himself, and not incur a fresh guilt by his performance. I enjoin you therefore, says he, to follow me in my refusal, and not to encourage those proceedings which are inconsistent with the good government of the Church. To speak freely, it is scandalous in you, not only to desert me under these difficulties, but to join with the court, as you have lately done, and sit in judgment upon your spiritual father and Archbishop. I charge you, upon your Canonical Obedience, to desist from these practices; and, as for myself, I appeal for justice to the See of Rome (31).'

The Bishops, finding Becket inflexible, left him, and went to the King. The Archbishop likewise, after he had officiated at divine service, came to court, with his cross in his hand, and sat by himself in an anti-chamber, all the Bishops and Temporal Barons being called in to the King. The Archbishop of York, and the Bishops of London and Hereford, came to him, and advised him to deliver the cross. They told him, his carrying it himself would be construed an act of defiance; and that, unless he desisted, he would find the King's weapons much sharper than his own. Becket answered, 'That the King's instruments of punishment could only destroy the body; but the spiritual sword, if not avoided, would give a more fatal stroke, and send a man's soul to Hell (32).'

The Bishops reported this answer to the King, who was highly displeased with Becket's appealing to the Pope, and sent the Earls and Barons to him, to put him in mind of his oath at Clarendon, by which he had engaged to observe the customs of the realm, and submit to the Royal prerogative. But the Archbishop persisting in his appeal to the Pope, the King pressed the Bishops to join with the Barons, and proceed to sentence against him. The Prelates excused themselves, alledging the prohibition they had lately received from their Primate, who would not fail to excommunicate them for their disobedience. The King urged their allegiance to the Crown, and their oath at Clarendon, which Becket's prohibition ought not to overrule. Upon this they repaired again to the Archbishop, and represented to him the obligations they lay under by the Constitutions of Clarendon, one of which was, that the Bishops should be present at all trials of the great men, till the court came to pronounce sentence for the taking away life or limb. The Archbishop replied, 'That nothing which was promised at Clarendon ought to be wrested to the prejudice of the Church; and that if the contents of their oath were repugnant vately withdrew from Northampton, and travelled to Lincoln, disguised, and attended only by two servants; and, after a great deal of fatigue [T], he reached the coast, and, getting on board a vessel, arrived a Graveline in Holland; and from thence retired to the monastery of St Bertin in Flanders (w). The King immediately confiscated the revenues of the archbishopric (x), and, at the same time, sent embassies to the King of France, and the Earl of Flanders, to prevail with those Princes not to afford Becket shelter in their dominions. But, not succeeding at the French court [U], Henry sent a splendid embassy to the Pope [W], desiring his Holiness would send Legates into England, to accommodate matters repugnant to the doctrine of the Church, and the laws of God, it ought not to be kept. He told them, a Christian King, who had sworn to maintain the liberties of the English Church, could have no prerogative inconsistent with that engagement. And, as to themselves, if they had gone too far in their compliance at Clarendon, they ought not to persist in their mistake, and plead one fault in excuse of another; but should rather recollect themselves, and courageously endeavour to recover the ground they had lost (33). Upon this the Bishops came to a resolution not to sit in judgment upon the Archbishop. Nevertheless, to give the King some satisfaction, they promised to prosecute him in the court of Rome, and to get him deposed. And going in a body to the Archbishop, they told him, they had hitherto acknowledged and obeyed him as their Primate, but that, since he had so grossly failed in his duty to the King, and broke the laws he had sworn to observe, they could no longer consider him under that character; that they disclaimed his authority, and put themselves and their churches under the protection of the Pope, before whom they cited him to appear, to answer the charge they intended to bring against him (34). When the Bishops had made this remonstrance they withdrew, and sat by themselves, and the King ordered the Temporal Lords to proceed to sentence against the Archbishop. The Earl of Leicester having enlarged upon the Constitutions of Clarendon, and charged the Archbishop with high-treason in breaking them, was preparing, in the name of the rest, to pronounce sentence, when Becket rose up, and told them they were Laymen, and had no authority to sit in judgment upon their Archbishop. He charged the Earl of Leicester therefore not to be so hardy as to pronounce sentence against his spiritual father. He declared he had appealed to a higher court, which was enough to bar their proceedings, supposing he had been otherwise within their jurisdiction. Upon this, without staying for their sentence, he walked out of the court, and being pursued with reproaches of perjury and treason, he turned back, and with a stern look replied, That, were it not for the restraints of his character, and the regards of Religion, he should be ready to disprove the calumny, and defend his honour with his sword. The King, being informed of his going away, ordered proclamation to be made, that no man should outrage him or his retinue with ill language, or give him any disturbance (35).

[T] After a great deal of fatigue, &c.] He travelled all the way to Lincoln on foot, and from thence by water to a little solitary island, where he rested three days. From thence he bent his course eastward, in order to gain some port, where he might take shipping. After travelling eight days, he arrived at a small town dependent on the church of Canterbury, where his extreme weariness obliged him to stop for some time, lying concealed in a chamber belonging to an Ecclesiastic, to whom he discovered himself. Upon his arrival in Flanders, not being willing to make himself known, he travelled on foot through very rough ways, and in a very rainy season, 'till his strength being quite spent, he fell to the ground, and could walk no farther. His few attendants, with some difficulty, procured him a very bad horse, without bridle or saddle, upon which they laid their cloaks. In this equipage he was met by some soldiers, who, having heard of his flight, asked him, If he was not the Archbishop of Canterbury? He replied, with great presence of mind, This is not the equipage of an Archbishop of Canterbury. Upon which they let him pass. At Graveline, the inn-keeper where he lodged, having likewise heard that the Archbishop of Canterbury was fled from Northampton, and considering the manners and behaviour of his guest, fancied this must be he, and with this persuasion threw himself at his feet, and entreated his blessing. Becket, being satisfied of this man's sincerity, discovered himself to him without reserve, and was entertained with great respect and civility by him. From Graveline he continued his journey to St Omer, and there retired to the Monastery of St Bertin, where Godefcal the Abbot and the Monks received him very affectionately (36).

[U] Henry, not succeeding at the French court, &c.] The King's Embassadors were, Gilbert Foliot, Bishop of London, and William, Earl of Arundel. When they opened their commission, the French King, hearing Becket stiled the late Archbishop of Canterbury, seemed to be shocked, and asked, Who had deprived him? 'I am a King, says he, no less than your master, and yet I have no authority to deprive the least clerk in my dominions.' In short, the more earnest the English were to get the Archbishop driven out of France, the more Lewis seemed to espouse his cause. To this purpose he sent his Almoner to Pope Alexander, then at Sens, to request his Holiness, that if he had any regard for the honour of the Roman Church, or the friendship and assistance of France, he would give all the countenance possible to Thomas, Archbishop of Canterbury, and protect him against the tyrant of England (37). The King of France seems to have had a political view in protecting Thomas Becket. He was in hopes this quarrel between the King and the Archbishop would embarrass the publick affairs of England, that France might reap some considerable advantage thereby.

[W] The King sent a splendid embassy to the Pope.] The Embassadors were, Roger Archbishop of York, Henry Bishop of Winchester, Gilbert Bishop of London, Hilary Bishop of Chichester, and Bartholomew Bishop of Exeter; Guido Rufus, Richard Ivecestre, and John of Oxford, Clerks; William Earl of Arundel, Hugo de Gundevil, Bernard de St Valerie, and Henry Fitz-Gerald, with some others. They found the Pope and Cardinals at Sens in Champagne. Being admitted to an audience, the Bishops of London and Chichester opened the charge against Archbishop Becket with great vehemence and aggravation. They represented to his Holiness, that Becket had quarrelled with the King, his master, upon the most trifling occasion: That he was a person of too much heat, obstinacy, and singularity, and would make no allowances for the disadvantage of the times: That his proceedings were so indefensible and dangerous, they were forced to break with him: That, in order to blemish the reputation of the King, and of his brethren the Bishops, he had pretended danger when there was none, and withdrawn unnecessarily out of the kingdom. This speech was seconded by the Archbishop of York, and the Bishop of Exeter. The Earl of Arundel, though he was not scholar enough to understand what the Bishops had said in Latin, yet perceiving, by the countenances of the Pope and Cardinals, that their rugged manner was not relished, delivered himself in English with more smoothness and address. He acknowledged his Holiness's supremacy in the fullest manner; he put him in mind of the favours he had received from his master, and how firm he continued to his interest. As to Becket, he owned him to be a person of great abilities, and highly qualified for his station; but that he was, in the opinion of many, thought to insist a little too much upon niceties. He intreated his Holiness therefore to take this matter into his consideration, and pitch upon some expedient to put an end to this unhappy misunderstanding. The moderation of the Earl's harangue was very much applauded; and the Pope told him, that since they desired his Legates might decide the matter, he would take care to send them. The Bishop of London demanded of his Holiness with what powers the Legates were to be furnished? The Pope replied, He would matters between his Highness and the Archbishop (y). In the mean time, Becket came from St Bertin to Soissons, where the King of France paid him a visit, and offered him protection, and a maintenance suitable to his dignity. But the Archbishop declined the latter part of the offer, and soon after repaired to Sens, where he was honourably received by the Pope; into whose hands, at a private audience, he resigned the archbishopric of Canterbury [X]; but was presently restored to his character by the Pope, who promised to take care of him and his interest. From Sens the Archbishop removed to Pontigny, an abbey in Normandy; where he resided almost two years, spending his time in religious exercises (z). From hence he wrote an expostulatory letter to King Henry [Y], then at Chinon in Touraine; and another to his Suffragans, the Bishops of England [Z], acquainting them, that the Pope had annulled the Constitutions of Clarendon, give them a sufficient latitude in their instructions. But, said the Bishop of London, we desire they may be empowered to decide the matter without farther appeal. The Pope answered, That privilege is my glory, which I will not give to another. His Holiness likewise told the Ambassadors he expected the Archbishop in a few days, and desired they would wait his arrival. But the time set them by the King being expired, they took their leave, and returned to England (38).

[X] He resigned the Archbishopric of Canterbury into the hands of the Pope. He pretended his election was not canonical, and that his strength was not proportioned to the difficulty of the charge; upon which he took off his ring, and gave it to the Pope. Then the Archbishop withdrew, and left the Pope and Cardinals to consult upon the point. Some of the Cardinals were pleased with the resignation, and said they had now a fair opportunity of giving the King of England satisfaction, by putting a more acceptable person into the Church of Canterbury; and as for Becket, it would be no difficult matter to make provision for him another way. But the majority were of a quite different sentiment. They argued, that Becket had ventured his life and fortunes in defence of the spiritual authority, and that, if the Archbishop sunk in the contest, the rest of the Bishops of the Catholic Church would sink with him, and the Pope's power dwindle and be lost; it was therefore necessary to restore this Prelate to his post, and to stand by him, who had entered the lists in behalf of the whole Church (39).

[Y] He wrote a letter to King Henry. In the beginning of this letter he puts the King in mind, 'How faithfully he had served him in his Chancellorship; that he looked upon his Highness in a double capacity, both as his Sovereign and his spiritual Son; that, as his Sovereign, he was obliged to pay him a profound regard, and offer him his best advice; and as he was his spiritual Son, that relation obliged him to the exercise of discipline, when occasion required.' Afterwards he proceeds to suggest, 'That the Church of God consists of two orders, the Clergy and the Laity; that the government of the Church is intrusted with the first, and the management of secular affairs with the latter. Now since 'tis certain, says the Archbishop, that Kings receive their authority from the Church, and not the Church her's from them, but from our Saviour; for this reason your Highness ought not to direct the censures of the Church, to subject the Clergy to the secular courts, or to take cognizance of any ecclesiastical matters whatever.' After citing some texts of Scripture against unrighteous laws, and oppressing the poor in judgment, he goes on, and desires the King 'to hearken to the advice of his liege subject, the admonition of his Bishop, and the correction of his spiritual father. It is well known, says he, with what regard you have treated the Pope, and what suitable returns his Holiness has made your Highness. I entreat you therefore, as you tender the interest of your own soul, not to lessen the privileges of the Church of Rome, but permit her the same liberty in your kingdoms which she enjoys in other parts of Christendom; and that your Highness would remember the solemn promise you made, and the oath you took at your coronation to protect the Church of God in all her rights and privileges. I farther entreat your Highness to restore the Church of Canterbury to the condition it was in under your predecessors and mine; that you would return the towns, castles, and lordships, belonging to the Church, which you have seized and disposed of, and all other effects and estates, taken either from my Clerks, or the Laity, my tenants; and that you would permit me to return with safety and freedom to my See; which if you please to grant, you shall find me ready to serve you with all imaginable regard, fidelity, and affection, saving the duty I owe to God Almighty, the respect due to the Church of Rome, and the privileges of my order: But if your Highness shall think fit to refuse this my request, you will certainly feel the sad consequences of such a resolution, and draw down the divine vengeance upon your head (40).'

[Z] He wrote a letter to his Suffragans the Bishops of England. He begins his complaint against them in the language of the Scripture: 'Why do you not, says he, my beloved brethren, rise up with me against the wicked, and take my part against the evil doers? Do ye not know, that God will destroy those who seek to please men, and make flattery and interest their business? They shall be confounded, because God hath despised them. Your wisdoms must needs be sensible, that not to oppose error is to approve it; and that truth, by not being defended, is betrayed. This being considered, we are no longer justifiable in our forbearance towards the King, neither is this passive temper of any service to the Church of God. I look upon it therefore as a dangerous thing to let discipline sleep any longer, and to suffer the Church of God and the Clergy to be so exceedingly harassed by the King without censure and animadversion, especially since I have frequently endeavoured by letters, messages, and all other methods imaginable, to bring his Highness to a better disposition. And since all my advice and remonstrances have proved ineffectual, I have been forced upon a farther remedy, and, after imploring the divine assistance, have publicly condemned and annulled those unrighteous customs, which have so miserably embroiled and wasted the Church. We have likewise communicated all those who observe or defend them. And as to you Bishops, who have so unfortunately entered into engagements prejudicial to the Church, we have, by the divine authority committed to us, absolved you from the obligation. Who can make the least doubt, that Bishops, commissioned by our Saviour, ought to be looked upon as the instructors and fathers of Kings and Princes, no less than of the rest of the faithful? Is it not strange then, that the son should attempt to invert this relation, and to force his father under unreasonable engagements; notwithstanding he believes, at the same time, that this spiritual parent has an authority which will reach him both in this world and the other? That we may not therefore involve ourselves in the guilt of these practices, we have declared against the authority of those unreasonable Constitutions, and annulled the articles, especially these following: That there shall be no appeals made to the Apostolic See without leave from the King: That it shall not be lawful for any Archbishop or Bishop to depart the Kingdom, and attend the Pope upon his summons without the King's licence: That it shall not be lawful for any Bishop to excommunicate any person who holds of the King in capite, or put any of his ministers under an interdict, without leave from the King: That no Bishop shall call any person to account for perjury, or breach of promise: That Clerks shall be obliged to make their appearance in secular courts on prosecution: That the Laity shall have cognizance concerning pleas of tythes, and other ecclesiastical matters.' The Archbishop proceeds to acquaint the Prelates, that he had communicated John of Oxford for usurping the Deanry of Salisbury, contrary to his and the Pope's Mandate; also Richard de Ivesestre for adhering to the Anti-pope, against Clarendon, and released them from their obligation to observe them (a). From hence likewise he issued out excommunications against various persons, who had opposed, or violated, the rights of the Church (b). These letters and excommunications proved of no service to his interest, but rather tended to exasperate men's minds against him. The King especially was so provoked at Becket's excommunicating several of his great officers and immediate attendants, that he proceeded to far, as to banish, with circumstances of cruelty, all the Archbishop's relations (c) [AA]. He wrote likewise to the General Chapter of the Cisterrians, expressing his displeasure at their entertaining Becket, and threatening to seize all their estates in his dominions, unless they drove him from the abbey of Pontigny. Whereupon the Archbishop retired to Sens, and from thence, upon the King of France's recommendation, to the abbey of St Columba, where he was entertained four years (d). In the mean time, the Bishops of the province of Canterbury, justly dreading the ill consequences of this dispute to the peace and welfare of the Church, wrote a letter to the Archbishop [BB], acquainting him with their sentiments concerning his conduct; to which Becket returned an answer (e) [CC]. Matters standing thus, Pope Alexander sent two against Alexander III; likewise Richard de Lucy, and Jocelin de Baliol, for being concerned in drawing up the Constitutions of Clarendon; and Ralph de Broock, Hugo de St Clare, and Thomas Fitz-Bernard, for making seizure of the revenues of the Church of Canterbury. After which he concludes thus: 'As to the person of our Sovereign Lord the King, we have hitherto forbore to exert any censure, hoping that time and the Grace of God might bring him to recollection; though unless he quickly retrieves this wrong step, we shall be forced to make use of our authority against him (41).'

(41) Id. ib. p.

[AA] The King banished — all the Archbishop's relations. He spared neither age nor sex; for children in the cradle, and women in childbed, were involved in the sentence, and driven beyond sea. And, to aggravate the rigour of the punishment, these unfortunate exiles were compelled to take an oath, that they would travel directly to Pontigny, and shew themselves to the Archbishop. An order likewise was published in England, forbidding all persons to correspond with him by letters, sending him any money, or so much as praying for him in the churches (42).

(42) Gervaf. ubi
supra.

[BB] The Bishops of the province of Canterbury wrote a letter to the Archbishop. They acquainted him, they were in hopes he would have abated somewhat of his obstinacy. 'We were much pleased, say they, with the manner of your living beyond sea: 'Twas reported, there was no appearance of ambition about you; that you had embraced a voluntary poverty, spending your time in reading and prayer, and other spiritual exercises. This conduct, we hoped, might open a way to a reconciliation between the King and you. But now we understand, that you have threatened his Highness with the censures of the Church; which is the ready way to widen the breach, and render an accommodation impracticable. We therefore intreat you to alter your conduct, and not multiply provocations; to give over menaces, and try the effects of patience and humility; to commit your cause to God, and throw yourself upon the King's clemency. This is the most likely means to revive charity and good humour, and bring those you have disobliged to a more placable temper; whereas your present behaviour tends only to inflame and exasperate, and lays you under the imputation of ingratitude. For it is well known, how bountiful a patron the King has been to you, and from how slender a beginning he has raised you to the highest dignity. So great a favourite you was during your being Chancellor, that you was courted by the King's subjects from one end of his dominions to the other, and it was thought preferment but to please you. And least a secular employment should too much endanger your virtue, the King was willing to put you in a safer post: But this was only a transplanting from one rich soil to another, and removing you from an eminence in the State, to the highest station in the Church. To this post the King preferred you, notwithstanding the Empress his mother, the Nobility, and Clergy, endeavoured to dissuade him from it. But his Highness promised himself great things from your promotion, and that you would prove a considerable support to his government; if therefore you disappoint the King's expectations, and prove ungrateful to his bounty, how must your reputation suffer in the opi-

tion of the world?' From hence they proceed to suggest, that his obstinacy might endanger Pope Alexander's authority, and withdraw the King from his communion: That the King, in referring the difference to the English Church, had made a fair overture; and that to proceed to interdicts and excommunications, after such an offer, was against all equity, and all law ecclesiastical and civil. 'Now to prevent, say they, exerting your authority against the King and kingdom, to the disturbance of our dioceses, and the prejudice and disgrace of the Holy Roman Church; and to make your own confusion the greater; we appeal once more to the Pope; and we give you notice to be ready on Ascension-day next ensuing (43).'

[CC] The Archbishop's answer. He tells the Bishops, 'How much he was surprized at the contents of their letter, which, considering the unfriendly and satirical style in which it was written, he could scarce believe was dictated by general consent.' He was amazed; 'They should treat him with such roughness and disaffection, since he had exposed himself to so many hardships upon their account.' He advises them, 'To fear God rather than man, and to sacrifice their lives, if need be, for the interest of the Church; telling them, that, 'In the cause of God, they ought not to be afraid of persecution or displeasure from the court.' He cautions them, 'Not to confound the notions of Church and State, but to consider, that the powers of these two societies were distinct from each other.' He insists upon the vindication of 'his conduct in England,' and challenges them to prove 'the least instance of oppression at his hands.' He sets forth with great vehemency, 'the severity of the sentence passed on him at Northampton; how he was stripped of all his revenues, and persecuted in his friends and relations.' He treats their 'reproaching him with ingratitude,' and, 'that he was promoted to the See of Canterbury purely by the Royal favour, and against the inclination of the whole kingdom,' as a direct calumny, and challenges them 'to name but so much as one person that declared his dislike at his election.' As to their 'upbraiding him with the meanness of his birth and original station;' he replies, 'it was true, he was not descended from a long line of Princes; but that of the two, he had rather work out his own distinction, and derive his quality from virtue and merit, than be the degenerate issue of an illustrious family.' As to the charge of ingratitude, he tells them, 'the freedom he had taken with the King, in remonstrating against his late proceedings, was no failure of respect, but rather a service to his Prince,' and, 'that he must have answered for the King's mis-carriages, if he had been silent.' He adds, that 'in case he should be forced to make use of his authority farther, and come to the last extremity, the King could have no reason to complain, having already had sufficient admonition and warning of his errors.' As to the danger they suggest of 'the King's withdrawing himself and his subjects from the communion of the See of Rome,' he hopes, 'his Highness will never apply to so unhappy an expedient.' He tells them, 'the bare mention of such a thought carries infection with it, and may do dis-service to the people.' As to what they urged, that, 'the King was willing to remit the difference on

(f) Gervaf. ibid. Cardinals, William and Otho, into France, to adjust the dispute between the King and the Archbishop [DD]; but these Legates, finding both parties inflexible, gave over the attempt, and returned to Rome (f). The beginning of the year 1157, Becket was prevailed upon, by the Pope's agents, and several persons of distinction, to make a submission to the King of England, at an interview between that Monarch and the King of France, at Mount Miral in Champagne; but, at the same time, his obstinacy, in refusing to do it without any reserve, rendered it ineffectual, and the breach continued as wide as ever (g) [EE]. By this behaviour the Archbishop ruined all his interest both with the English and French Nobility; and the King of France immediately made him sensible of his displeasure, by withdrawing from him his pension. But he soon recovered that Monarch's favour (h) [FF]. And now Becket proceeding in his censures, the Pope, at the instance of King Henry, dispatched two other Legates to the English court, with letters to the King [GG] full of complaisance and respect (i). But this expedient failed likewise of success [HH], thro' the jealousy of the Legates (k). Things continued in this posture till the 'foot to the arbitration of the English Church,' he replies, 'in the first place, the Bishops had declared too much partiality against him, to be fit judges; and besides, he never read, that inferiors had any authority over their superiors, or Suffragans any right to be judges of their Metropolitans.' Towards the close of the letter, he makes a kind of application to the King, 'intreating him not think reformation any disadvantage to, or repentance any diminution of, the Royal dignity.' Lastly, he desires his Suffragans to pray for him, 'that his constancy may not sink under his afflictions, but that he may say, with the Apostle, that neither life, nor death, nor angels, nor principalities, nor any other creature, shall be able to separate him from the love of God (44).'

[DD] The Pope sent two Cardinals — to adjust the dispute between the King and the Archbishop They had a conference with the Archbishop near Gisors; from whence they repaired to the King of England, whom they found resolved not to make any farther proposals. King Henry complained to the Legates, that all the miseries and confusions of the war were occasioned by Becket, who, he said, had stirred up the King of France, and the Earl of Flanders, to attack him. But, when the Legates came to the King of France, that Prince cleared Becket of this imputation, and declared, he had always advised peace (45). Becket himself has given us an account of what passed at the conference between him and the Pope's Legates, in a letter addressed to his Holiness upon that occasion (46); to which the reader is referred.

[EE] He made his submission to the King of England — nevertheless the breach continued as wide as ever. A rumour had been spread, that the King intended to undertake the Crusade, provided the affairs of the Church were settled to his satisfaction. The prospect of this expedition made the Pope press an accommodation, and the Archbishop not unwilling to comply. When he came, therefore, into the presence, he threw himself at the King's feet, and was immediately raised by his Highness. He behaved himself in his address with great submission, intreated the King's favour to the Church of England, and attributed the past disturbances to his own misconduct. In the conclusion he made the King the umpire of the difference between them, saving the honour of God. The King of England was enraged at this clause of reservation, and said to the King of France, that whatever Becket did not relish, he would be sure to pronounce contrary to the honour of God. 'How-ever, added the King, to shew my inclination to accommodate matters, I will make him this proposition: I have had many predecessors, Kings of England, some greater, and some inferior to myself; there have been likewise many great and holy men in the See of Canterbury. Let Becket, therefore, but pay me the same regard, and own my authority so far, as the greatest of his predecessors owned that of the least of mine, and I am satisfied. And, as I never forced him out of England, I give him leave to return at his pleasure; and am willing he should enjoy his archbishopric, with as ample privileges as any of his predecessors.' Upon this, the whole audience declared aloud, that the King had gone far enough in his condescensions. And the King of France, being somewhat surprized at the Archbishop's silence, asked him, why he hesitated to accept such honourable conditions of peace? The Archbishop replied, he was willing to receive his See upon the terms his predecessors held it: But as for those customs, which broke in upon the canons, he could not admit them. When those who endeavoured to compose the difference, perceived things tending to a rupture, they pulled the Archbishop out of the presence, and pressed him to submit to the King's terms. But he, looking upon this as a betraying the cause of religion, rejected their advice. And thus the meeting broke up without effect (47).

[FF] He soon recovered the King of France's favour. When Becket found himself destitute of the means of supporting himself and his family, he resolved to dismiss his retinue, and go a begging. But, before he could put this fancy in practice, the King of France unexpectedly sent for him. The Archbishop thought, the business was to banish him the kingdom; in which opinion he was farther confirmed by the manner of his reception. For the King appeared disturbed, and he did not rise to him, according to custom. But, after a considerable silence, the King of France rose up hastily, burst into tears, and throwing himself at the Archbishop's feet, accosted him with these words: 'My Lord, you are the only discerning person; no body's eyes have been open upon this occasion, but your's. As for us, who advised you to waive the mention of God's honour, to humour a mortal man, we were all no better than stark blind. Father, I am sorry for what I have done: I treat your pardon, and that you would absolve me for my misbehaviour: And as for my person and kingdom they are both at your service (48).'

Whether the King of France repented of his behaviour towards Becket from a religious motive, or pretended to do so thro' policy, and for reasons of state, is not easily determined. However, the Archbishop was handsomely accommodated at Sens, and fared the better for the different interests of the French and English courts (49).

[GG] The Pope's letter to King Henry. Amongst other things, he acquaints the King, that he had furnished the Legates with full power to settle the matters in dispute between his highness and the Archbishop, and to determine any other difference, which should happen to arise. He informs the King farther, that he had restrained the Archbishop from exercising his authority to the disadvantage either of his Highness, or any of his ministers. And in case the Archbishop should pronounce any censure against the King or kingdom, his Holiness declares the sentence null and void. And, if necessity required, the King had the liberty of publishing the Pope's letter; otherwise he was earnestly desired to keep it secret. And, to give farther satisfaction, he orders the Legates to absolve those of the King's council and court, who lay under excommunication (50). Pope Alexander seems to have been apprehensive, least the King should break off from the communion of the Roman Church, or at least declare for the Anti-Pope, supported by the Emperor.

[HH] This expedient failed of success. The Legates were, Gratian, the late Pope's nephew; and Vivian, an Advocate in the Court of Rome. These men quickly agreed, as it was thought, the difference between the King and the Archbishop; the King consenting that Becket might return into England, and enjoy the revenues and jurisdiction of his See, saving the honour of the crown. The English court being now in France, Vivian had orders to go into England, to absolve those who were excommunicated; and Gratian was to use his interest with Archbishop Becket, to finish the agreement. But the King having occasion to rethe year 1169, when endeavours were again used to accommodate matters, at a second interview between the Kings of England and France; but to no purpose, the Archbishop refusing to comply, because Henry persisted in denying him the kiss of peace [II]. After this, Henry, fearing lest Becket should procure an interdict to be laid upon his dominions, ordered all his English subjects, above fifteen years of age, to take an oath, by which they renounced the authority of Archbishop Becket and Pope Alexander; but, tho' most of the Laity complied with this test of their loyalty, few or none of the Clergy could be induced to subscribe it (l). The next year, King Henry being returned into England, and having caused his son Prince Henry to be crowned at Westminster, (where the ceremony was performed by Roger, Archbishop of York, without any protestation made to save the privilege of the Archbishop of Canterbury, to whose See that office of right belonged;) Becket complained of this injury done him to the Pope, who suspended the Archbishop of York, and excommunicated the Bishops that assisted him, and lodged the instruments of these censures in Becket's hands (m). This year (1170), an accommodation was, at last, brought about between King Henry and Archbishop Becket [KK], upon the confines of Maine in Normandy; where the Archbishop (whether thro' pride or inadvertency) suffered the King to hold his horse's bridle, while he mounted and dismounted twice. After which, having taken leave of the French court, he prepared to return into England, accompanied by John, Dean of Salisbury (n). But the Archbishop of York, and the rest of the suspended and excommunicated Bishops, endeavoured to prevent his landing [LL]. He was received with great acclamations at Canterbury; where almost as soon as he arrived, he received an order from the young King, commanding him to absolve the suspended and excommunicated Bishops. But Becket refusing to comply [MM], the Archbishop of York, and the Bishops of London and Salisbury, immediately carried their complaint to the old King in Normandy; who was so highly exasperated at this fresh instance of obstinacy and disloyalty in Becket, that he could not forbear exclaiming, with great warmth, that, 'He was an unhappy Prince, who maintained a great number of lazy, insignificant persons about him, none of whom had gratitude or spirit enough to revenge him on a single, insolent Prelate, who gave him so much disturbance.' These words were heard by four gentlemen of the court, who immediately formed a design against the Archbishop's life; which they executed with great barbarity, in the cathedral church of Canterbury (o) [NN]. This eminent Prelate was murdered (or martyred) on the twenty-ninth move the next morning, the Legates began to suspect there might be a sinister meaning in the saving clause, and therefore refused to stand to the articles. Upon this, the King sent an expostulatory letter to the Pope; in which, having related the above-mentioned circumstances, he tells his Holiness, that, if he continued his partialities to Archbishop Becket, and did not restrain him from disturbing the kingdom with his excommunications, he should despair of justice from the See of Rome, and be forced to take other measures for the security and peace of his crown and dominions (51).

[II] The Archbishop refused to comply, for being denied the kiss of peace.] The King had descended so far, as to consent, without any clause of reservation, that the Archbishop should enjoy his See, with the privileges of his predecessors, and offered a thousand marks to defray the expence of his voyage into England. The Archbishop, who was present, replied, that he had been damaged to the value of thirty thousand marks, and that, without restitution, the guilt of injustice would remain. However, at the instance of the King of France, and the nobility of both kingdoms, he dropped his claim to the money, and submitted to the King's offer. And now, the terms being adjusted, Becket, in pursuance of the Pope's instructions, desired security for the articles. And when both the French and English court told him, such a demand was not to be insisted upon to a Sovereign; he said, he desired no more than that the King would do him the honour of the customary salute (osculum pacis) as a mark of his favour and friendship. King Henry replied, he should willingly have gratified this request, had he not once sworn, in a passion, never to salute the Archbishop on the cheek; nor should he bear him any ill will for the omission of this ceremony. The King of France, and the rest of the mediators, suspecting, probably, there might be some unfriendly reserve in the King of England's reply, left the Archbishop at his liberty, who refused not to accept the Articles, without the kiss of peace (52).

[KK] An agreement was, at last, brought about between King Henry and Archbishop Becket.] The Pope being informed, that the King was in England, sent a commission to the Archbishop of Roan, and the Bishop of Nevers, to go into England, to endeavour at an accommodation. Upon their acquainting the King with their instructions, he sent them word, they might spare themselves that trouble; for he designed quickly to be in France, and put a period to the dispute with the Archbishop, as they should direct. The King undertook the voyage accordingly, and the Archbishop waited upon him at the confines of Maine. Where the difference was finally adjusted, the King granting the Archbishop the enjoyment of his See, with all the privileges of his predecessors. He likewise gave him leave to animadvert upon the Archbishop of York, and the rest of the Prelates concerned in the late coronation (53).

[LL] The Archbishop of York, and the rest of the suspended and excommunicated Prelates, endeavoured to prevent his landing.] They were afraid, lest the Archbishop, upon his arrival, should publish the Pope's sentence against them. The ports, therefore, where they suspected he might land, were guarded; and they had persuaded Ralph de Broock, Reginald de Warene, and Gervase, High-Sheriff of Kent, to appear upon the coast in a military manner. These men were some of the Archbishop's greatest enemies, and were so hardy as to give out, that, if he set his foot upon the English shore, they would cut off his head. The Archbishop, being informed of their design, sent the Pope's letters of censure over the day before he embarked, and got them delivered to the Prelates concerned. The next day the Archbishop went aboard, and, arriving at the English coast, found a body of men armed upon the beach, and ready to attack him. The Dean of Salisbury, fearing some mischief, went ashore first, and charged them, in the King's name, and under pain of high-treason, not to offer any violence to the Archbishop, for that now all disputes between him and the King were at an end. Upon this, they laid down their arms, and suffered the Archbishop to pass (54).

[MM] He refused to absolve the suspended and excommunicated Bishops.] He told the officers, who brought the order, that it was not within the authority of an inferior jurisdiction to set aside the sentence of a superior court, and that the Pope's censures could not be reversed but by the Pope himself (55).

[NN] The assassins executed their design with great barbarity, in the cathedral church of Canterbury.] Their names were, Reginald Fitz-Urfe, William Tracy, Richard Briton, and Hugh Morvill (*). These men, having ninth of December 1171 (p) [OO]. The assassins deliberated, whether they should throw his body into the sea, or cut it in small pieces; but before they could resolve, the Prior and Monks withdrew it, and buried it in a vault in the cathedral. King Henry was extremely troubled at the news of Becket's death, and immediately dispatched an embassy to Rome, to purge himself from the imputation of being the cause of it [PP]. At the same time, several complaints came to the Pope upon this accident (q) [QQ]. Upon the death of the Archbishop, all divine offices ceased in the church of Canterbury for one year, wanting nine days; at the end of which, by order of the Pope, it was re-consecrated (r). Two years after, Becket was canonized, by virtue of Pope Alexander's bull, dated March 13, 1173 (s). The same year, a particular collekt was appointed to be used in all the churches of the province of Canterbury, for expiating the guilt of Becket's murder (t) [RR]. The next year, King Henry returning into England, went to Canterbury, concerted the assassination, went immediately on board, and landed at Dover. The next day, being the 29th of December, they came to Canterbury, and forced their way into the Archbishop's apartment. They told him, they came from the King, to command him to absolve the Bishops under censure. Becket replied in the same manner as he had done to the King's officers (56). This answer not satisfying them, they charged the Monks of Canterbury, in the King's name, to keep the Archbishop safe, that he might be forth coming; and then went away with a menacing air. The Archbishop told them, at parting, that he came not into England to abscond, neither would their threats make any impression upon him. The same day in the evening they returned to the palace, and, leaving a body of soldiers in the court-yard, rushed into the cloister with their swords drawn, and from thence into the church, where the Archbishop was at Vespers. And here calling out, where is the traitor? And nobody answering, they asked for the Archbishop. Upon which he moved towards them, and told them he was the person. He is said not to have shewn the least sign of fear upon this occasion. And when one of the assassins menaced him with death, he answered, 'He was prepared to die for the cause of God, and in defence of the rights of the Church. But, says he, if you must have my life, I charge you, in the name of Almighty God, not to hurt any other person here, either Clergy or Laity; for none of these have any concern in the late transactions.' Upon this they laid hands on him, and offered to drag him out of the church; but finding they could not do it without difficulty, they murdered him there. When he perceived their resolution, he stooped his head to their swords; and tho' he received several wounds before he was dispatched, he never gave a groan, nor offered to avoid a stroke. But one Edward Grimfere, a Clergyman belonging to the cathedral, perceiving one of the assassins aim a blow at the Archbishop's head, interposed his arm, and had it almost cut off (57). The assassins, after the murder, were afraid they had gone too far, and durst not return to the King's court in Normandy; but rather chose to retire to Knaresburgh in Yorkshire, a town belonging to Hugh Morvill. Here they continued till they found themselves the aversion and contempt of the country: For every body avoided their conversation, and would neither eat nor drink with them. At last, being tired with solitude and disregard, and struck with remorse of conscience, they took a voyage to Rome; and being admitted to penance by Pope Alexander III, they went to Jerusalem, and, according to the Pope's order, spent their lives in penitential austerities, and died in the Black Mountain. They were buried at Jerusalem, without the church-door, belonging to the Templars, and over them was put this inscription (58):

Hic jacent miseri, qui martyrizaverunt beatum Thomam, Archiepiscopum Cantuariensem.

'Here lie the wretches who assassinated St Thomas, Archbishop of Canterbury.'

If it be asked, how it came to pass, that these murderers were not brought to justice for their crime, as they might easily have been; the answer is, there was no law to punish with death any persons that had killed a clergyman, because the Clergy, by exempting themselves from the King's jurisdiction, had put themselves out of the protection of the law; and so Becket himself, who so violently opposed the secular power over the Clergy, and was by that means the cause that the blood of so many persons was unrevenged, prevented the deserved punishment of his own blood by the sword of Justice.

[OO] He was murdered (or martyred) on the 29th of December, 1171. His death, and the circumstances of the time and place, are recorded in the following distichs, preserved by John Bromton (59).

[PP] King Henry sent an embassy to Rome, to purge himself from the imputation of being the cause of Becket's death. The King's ambassadors, at their first entrance into Rome, were roughly treated, and refused an audience. But they found means at last to procure one, by a proper application of five hundred marks. When they came into the Consistory, they swore, in the King's name, that their master was ready to stand to the judgment of the Church concerning the death of the Archbishop. By taking of which oath, they prevailed with the Pope not to send out any interdict or excommunication against the King or his dominions (60).

[QQ] Several complaints came to the Pope upon this accident. The King of France wrote to his Holiness 'to draw St Peter's sword against King Henry, and to study some new and exemplary justice;' telling him 'the Universal Church was concerned in the discipline,' and putting him in mind of 'some miracles already said to be done at Becket's tomb.' This letter was seconded by one from Stephen Earl of Blois, who declares with great vehemence upon the barbarity of the murder, and uses all his elocution to press the Pope to revenge it. He likewise states the case in relation to the coronation of the young King by the Archbishop of York, telling his Holiness, 'he was present when the Archbishop complained of that matter to the old King, who, in his hearing, left the Archbishop of York, and his assistants, to Becket's mercy, to be punished as the Pope and he should think fit.' The Archbishop of Sens likewise wrote to the Pope upon the same subject, charging King Henry with the Archbishop's death, and moving for an interdict upon his dominions (61).

[RR] A Collekt — for expiating the guilt of Becket's murder. It was this: Adesto, Domine, supplicationibus nostris, ut qui ex iniquitate nostra reos nos esse cognoscimus, beati Thomæ martyris tui atque pontificis intercessione liberemur (62); i. e. 'Be favourable, O Lord, to our prayers, that we, who acknowledge ourselves guilty of iniquity, may be delivered by the intercession of Thomas thy blessed Martyr and Bishop.'

terbury, where he did penance, and underwent a voluntary discipline [SS], as a testimony of his regret for the murder of Becket (u). In 1221 Becket's body was taken up, in the presence of King Henry III, and a great concourse of the nobility and others, and deposited in a rich shrine, erected at the expence of Stephen Langton, Archbishop of Canterbury, on the east side of the church (w). Forty-eight years after his decease, the Doctors of the University of Paris had a warm dispute, whether he was saved or damned. The miracles, said to be wrought at his tomb, were so numerous, that Gervase of Canterbury tells us (x), there were two large volumes of them kept in that church. His shrine was visited from all parts, and enriched with the most costly gifts and offerings. As to the character of Archbishop Becket, it is variously represented by various authors. Most of those who wrote in his time, or near it, justify his conduct throughout, and make him a glorious martyr; while others, especially later writers, set his character in a very disadvantageous light. To assist the reader in forming his judgment, we shall throw together a few observations [TT], by which it will appear, that he was neither so great a Saint, as the former, nor so great a Sinner, as the latter make him.

[SS] King Henry did penance, and underwent a voluntary discipline. When he came within sight of the church, where the Archbishop was buried, he alighted off his horse, and walked barefoot, in the habit of a Pilgrim, till he came to Becket's tomb, where, after he had prostrated himself, and prayed for a considerable time, he submitted to be scourged by the Monks, and passed all that day and night without any refreshment, and kneeling upon the bare stones. Which done, he bestowed great benefactions upon the church of Canterbury (63).

[TT] Some observations. The contest between King Henry II and Archbishop Becket (we have seen) arose from hence: The King required, that Ecclesiastics, guilty of felony, murder, or other high crimes, should be punished immediately by the secular magistrate: This Becket opposed as a breach of the Canons, and an oppression of the liberties of the Church (64). Now, if we inspect the Codes, and examine the question by the Imperial Laws, we shall find that the Emperors left the Clergy to the jurisdiction of their Bishop, in matters relating to the Church; yet, when the State was concerned in the prosecution, no privilege of Orders could exempt them from the cognizance of the Civil courts (65). But, on the other hand, the English Constitution afforded several precedents in favour of the Archbishop's opinion: Particularly, King Alfred executed a Judge for trying and condemning a Clerk (66). And, in the contest between Archbishop Anselm, and the Kings William Rufus and Henry I, it was taken for granted, that none but the Pope had a right to try the Archbishop (67). And that these precedents were supported by the Constitution, appears evidently from the old law books, especially Bracton (68) and Fleta (69). To which may be added, that the trial of Clerks in the King's courts was expressly condemned by Pope Alexander III (70). But, allowing all this, the exemption of Clerks from the civil courts was no right inseparable from their Order, but only a privilege granted by the Crown, and therefore revokable by the same authority. From all which it follows, that however inexcusable the Archbishop's opposition might be in the beginning, after the Parliament of Clarendon had enacted, that Clerks should be tried in the King's courts, the Archbishop ought not to have insisted upon the former exemption. As to the other parts of his conduct, his first signing, and then renouncing, the Articles of Clarendon; his quitting the kingdom without the King's leave; his refusing to return to his See upon the best terms enjoyed by any of his predecessors; his breaking off the accommodation only for being denied the kiss of peace; and the like instances of rigour and inflexibility, are not to be defended. But then, as to any practices against the Crown, in abetting a foreign interest (with which he was charged), the King of France solemnly cleared him from any such imputation (71). And with these few remarks his character must be left to the mercy, or severity, of the reader.

BECKINGTON (THOMAS) [A], was born in the parish of Beckington [B] in Somersetshire (a), towards the end of the fourteenth century. He was probably educated in grammar-learning, at Wykeham's school near Winchester; and admitted Fellow of New-College in Oxford in 1408 (b); though some say he had also part of his education in Merton-college (c). However, he continued Fellow of New-College about twelve years, and took his Doctor of Law's degree (d). Within this period, most probably, he was presented to the rectory of St Leonard's, near Hastings in Suffex, and to the vicarage of Sutton-Courtney in Berkshire (e). He was also Prebendary of Bedwin, York, and Litchfield; Archdeacon of Buckingham (f); and master of St Catherine's hospital near the Tower in London. About the year 1429 he was Dean of the Court of Arches; and a Synod being then held in St Paul's church, London, which continued above six months, Beckington was employed, jointly with William Linwood, Official of the Court of Arches, and Thomas Brown, Vicar-General to the Archbishop of Canterbury, to draw up a form of law, according to which the Wicliffites or Lollards were to be proceeded against (g). Before our author was made Dean of the Arches, he was Advocate in Doctors-Commons (h). But these preferments were inconsiderable in comparison of the honours he was afterwards raised to.

[B] In the parish of Beckington. Some say Beckhampton; but it does not appear there is a parish so named in Somersetshire, but only Beckington. Beckhampton is in Wiltshire (5). Bishop Godwin thinks (6), that T. Beckington was not born in that parish, because he left the poor of it only five pounds in his will; and it is probable, he would have left them more, had it been his native place. Quis enim crediderit beneficentiam erga solum natale tam angustiis terminis coë- cedam? For, who could think that his charity towards the place of his nativity, should be confined within so narrow bounds? But this argument is not very conclusive. On the contrary it appears from the following verse cited by Leland (7), that he was really born there:

to. For having been tutor to King Henry VI (i), and written a book, wherein, in opposition to the Salique Law, he strenuously asserted the right of the Kings of England to the crown of France (k), he arrived to a great degree of esteem and favour with that Prince [C]. And, in consequence of that, was made Secretary of State, Keeper of the Privy-Seal, and at last Bishop of Bath and Wells (l). He was consecrated, October 13, 1443, in the new chapel of Eton-college, which was not yet finished; and was the first that officiated in that chapel (m). His character is thus represented, he was well skilled in polite learning and history, and very conversant in the holy Scriptures; a good preacher, and so generous a patron and favourer of all learned and ingenious men, that he was called the Mæcenas of his age (n). As for his works of munificence and charity, they were numerous. He finished Lincoln-college (o), which had been left imperfect by its founder, Richard Flemming, Bishop of Lincoln [D], and got the manor of Newton-Longville settled upon New-College Oxon, in 1440 (p). Moreover, he laid out six thousand marks upon the houses belonging to his See; built an edifice, called new-buildings, and the west side of the cloysters at Wells; and erected a conduit in the market-place of that city (q). By his will, which he made November 3, 1464, and procured to be confirmed under the Great-Seal [E], he left several legacies [F]. This generous person died at Wells, January 14, 1464-5, and was buried in his cathedral, where his monument is still to be seen (r). His panegyric was written by Thomas Chandler [G], Warden of New-College, who had been preferred by him to the Chancellorship of Wells (s). He doth not appear to have ever been Chancellor of the University of Oxford (t).

Of this we have as good proof as the nature of the fact requires, though there want not some who would rob us of this great man, in order to make him a native of Italy, or some other part of Europe (c), though

stance between Wermouth and Jarrow (for so these places are now called) is six miles or thereabouts, the country between them being bounded by the river Were on one side, and the river Tyne on the other (5). The former of these rivers falls into the sea at Sunderland, from which the monastery of St Peter stood but at a very small distance, and it was upon the lands afterwards given to this monastery that our author Bede was born, as appears from the Saxon paraphrase of his Ecclesiastical History (6). I say on the lands afterwards given to this monastery, because it appears from Bede's own writings, that it was not founded 'till the year 674, and consequently not till after he was born; and he particularly tells us, that this religious house stood on the north side of the river (7). But though he was born in the neighbourhood of Wermouth, yet it is certain that he resided in a monastery of St Paul's at Jarrow, which was situated near the river Tyne. Both monasteries, as they were erected by the advice of Abbot Benedict, so they were governed by him, and Abbots under him, during the course of his life, as appears from Bede's own account (8). These particulars may to some readers appear trivial; but as I do not find all of them taken notice of before, and as the accounts hitherto given of his birth and residence seem very perplexed for want of them, I thought my pains well bestowed in setting them in the clearest light I could, the rather, because some foreign authors have reproached us with want of care in writing the history of this learned man, who is justly esteemed so great an honour to our country.

the truth is, he never stirred out of England, and scarce out of the North; but notwithstanding our title to him is incontestible, yet the very controversy concerning him does his memory honour [B]. At the age of seven years, or about A. D. 679, he was brought to the monastery of St Peter, and committed to the care of Abbot Benedict; under whom, and his successor Ceolfrid, he was most carefully educated for twelve years, and he amply repaid the pains taken by them in that space, by writing their Lives, which have been preserved to our times (d). At the age of nineteen he was ordained Deacon, and thence forward taught and studied with incredible diligence, going from his books to his prayers, and from his prayers to his books; being admired by all who knew him, and considered by the Monks as their pattern (e). Yet the great praises he received no way abated his modesty, which was no less conspicuous than his learning. In the year 702, being then thirty, he was, by the express command of Ceolfrid his Abbot, ordained Priest (as he had been Deacon) by John of Beverly, then Bishop of Hagulfstad or Hexham, who had been formerly his preceptor (f) [C]. His amazing diligence and application, his comprehensive genius, his extensive and various learning, rendered him so remarkable, that his fame quickly passed the limits of this island, and diffused itself through the Continent, and more particularly at Rome, from whence Pope Sergius wrote in very pressing terms to his Abbot Ceolfrid, that Beda might be sent to Rome, where he wanted to consult him upon many important subjects (g). But notwithstanding this honourable invitation, Bede remained in his own cell, and there pursued his studies without interruption, and never took a journey to Rome, though that was in those days very far from being uncommon, and one cannot help wondering how he could avoid it [D]. But his great

[B] The very controversy concerning him does his memory honour.] The famous Hector Boëthius tells us, that there has been a great struggle between Italy and England for the honour of Beda's birth, and that the Historians of the first mentioned country contend that he was not only born at, but died, and was interred at Genoa, where his tomb was shewn in justification and support of this fact. But, says he, wherever he lived or died, it appears clearly from his own writings, and those of others, that he spent part of his youth in Italy, and his old age in Northumberland, residing frequently in the famous abbey of Mailros (9). Leland is very angry with Boëthius for this assertion, and takes a great deal of pains to prove that all the facts mentioned by Hector are absolutely false (10). But notwithstanding this, Dempster has thought fit to place him amongst the learned men of Scotland (11), where he says he lived for some time, though he confesses that he died in England. He cites what is said of him by Boëthius, and adds a great many authorities, to prove that there was a Beda who flourished at Genoa, and gives it as his own opinion, that there were two of this name who flourished about the same time, were of the same order, and wrote several treatises upon the same subjects, which he thinks gave occasion to this confusion; and that the only way to extricate ourselves from it is, to admit that there were two Beda's, one a native of England, and the other of Liguria. I do not find, however, that Dempster's opinion in this matter has been much followed, or even thought of, and yet it is much more worthy of notice than his and Boëthius's notion of his living in Scotland, for which I cannot find so much as the shadow of any authority. It is true, Beda says a great deal of the Scots in his Ecclesiastical History, and seems to be very well acquainted with their affairs; but instead of making for, this is directly against Dempster's opinion, in as much as the Scots mentioned by Beda were the Irish, not the British Scots, whom Beda looked upon as Schismatics to the things of this world; a strict obedience to the will of his Abbot, and a constant prosecution of his studies in such a way, as might most conduce to the benefit of his brethren, and the general advantage of the Christian world. Beda closely and constantly followed these instructions, for with respect to devotion and study, Alcuinus, his contemporary, in a letter to the Monks of Wyremuth and Jarrow, congratulates them on this very subject, and treats the life that Beda led, as a kind of model for other monks (15). His modesty and humility stand confessed not only in his writings, but from his actions; since he never desired to change his condition, or even affected the honours to which he might have attained in that condition. In regard to obedience it appears, that in taking Deacons and Priests orders, he submitted to the commands of his superiors, and did what they esteemed fittest for the service of the community to which he belonged. Yet he was very well known to, and much esteemed, by this great man when Bishop of York, and to Princes and persons of the highest quality; but he turned this acquaintance to their advantage, not his, by addressing to them many of his learned works; and, in fine, was just as modest and pains-taking a Monk as John of Beverly was a Bishop, and their memories may be truly said to have survived in consequence of their virtues.

[D] One cannot help wondering how he could avoid it.] We have this on the authority of William of Malmshury, a very careful and diligent author (16), one who was not apt to take things upon trust, and who, with regard to this very fact, gives us part of this Pope's letter to the Abbot Ceolfrid, directing him to send, as he was in duty bound, to Rome, Beda, a Monk and Priest of his monastery, who should, God willing, safely return to him again; the Holy Father being desirous to make use of his advice in affairs relating to the government of the universal Church. Our author speaks very cautiously of this; he says he cannot affirm that Beda ever went to Rome, but, continues he, that he was invited, and his presence much desired there, sufficiently appears by this epistle. That Sergius I and this Abbot Ceolfrid were contemporaries is certain, and that the Abbot held a close correspondence with that Pontiff, appears from our author's life of Ceolfrid, so that there is nothing absurd in this account at all (17). Yet it must be owned that a very great Critick seems to be of opinion, that this epistle is not genuine, and consequently that Beda was never invited to Rome (18). I must confess there is nothing said of any such letter (though many things of less importance are mentioned) in Beda's Life of Ceolfrid, or in his Ecclesiastical History, or at the close of his Epitome, where he gives a succinct account of himself and his writings. But this is no argument against the fact, considering his exemplary modesty, which hinders him from mentioning himself on almost any occasion. But that in obedience to this letter he was not sent to Rome, seems indeed a proof more difficult to be got over, since in those days the Monks were remarkably submis-

(12) [C] Who had been formerly his preceptor] This John of Beverly was a person every way of great character, and exemplary piety and learning. He became Bishop of Hexham in the reign of Alfrid, King of Northumberland, and afterwards was promoted to be Bishop of York (13). He had always a great affection for his disciple Beda, and kept a very close correspondence with him. It was probably from him that our author took his opinions in reference to the monastic state, and the duties of such as embraced it (14). The Bishop thought, that in all professions men ought to labour for their own maintenance, and for the benefit of the society. He was consequently against the great errors of this institution, which seems rather to promote ease and indolence than religious fervour, and assiduous application to study. He persuaded Beda, that the duties of that kind of life consisted in a fervent and edifying devotion, a strict adherence to the rule of the house, an absolute self-denial with respect great love for retirement and privacy, his assiduous application to his studies, and his warm affection for his country, most probably were his motives, and the great use his labours were of to his brethren, and to all the clergy in the Northumbrian kingdom, probably procured him an interest sufficient to excuse him from taking this journey, which would be the more credible, if it was certain that he never quitted his monastery, or went to reside at Cambridge, as some authors report he did (b) [E]. By remaining thus in his own country, and contenting himself with the pleasures of a monastick life, he gained time to make himself master of almost every branch of literature, that in those times it was possible for a man to acquire, and this he did, not with any view either to fame or preferment, but for the sake of becoming useful to society, and promoting the progress of the Gospel. It was from these noble and generous principles, joined to a zeal for the honour of his country, that he undertook to compile his Ecclesiastical History, in making collections for which he spent several years. It was in some sense a new work, for though there were Histories, as he himself informs us (i), from which he borrowed many things, yet with respect to a Church History, they had no notion of it; so that Beda was obliged to draw together the matters of which he composed it, from the Lives of particular persons, the Annals in their convents, and such Chronicles as were written before his time (k). He had also much assistance from the Prelates with whom he was acquainted, who shewed him very great respect, and who, without all doubt, were very ready to make such enquiries, and to obtain for him such accounts, as he judged requisite and necessary. For they might easily foresee, that a History like this, addressed to the then King of Northumberland, and (l) patronized by most of the Prelates in England, would have the greatest regard paid to it's authority, and become a kind of record in ecclesiastical affairs. We need not wonder therefore at the great communications, which, for the improvement of this work, he from all parts received, or at the manner in which it is written, since both were calculated for the service of the Church, and we have reason to believe, answered their purposes very effectually. It was from the same motives, that we find his History so highly commended in succeeding times (m); and even in ours, in which there is so great a difference of manners and customs, it continues to be of great use and great authority, even in the opinion of such, as justly condemn the superstitious legends that are inserted in it (n). So that taking all things together, there are few books have obtained a greater credit, or supported it longer, than this work of Beda's, by which he became generally known to the learned world in his own time, and by which his fame is like to be transmitted to latest posterity [F]. He published this History in 731, when, five to the Holy See; yet (besides what is said in the text) there appears one very clear and easy answer. Ceolfrid might have resolved to send him, and might have caused him to receive Priests orders for that purpose, and yet the design might be laid aside on that Pope's decease, which happened in September, 701 (19). To decide on this subject would be a very great presumption in me; I only state the question, and the reasons on both sides, which in some former accounts of this learned man have not been taken notice of at all.

[E] Went to reside at Cambridge, as some authors says he did.] This also is a point not very well cleared up by the Criticks, and therefore scarce mentioned by such as have written the Life of Beda heretofore. Fuller indeed hints at it in a line (20), but there is not a letter concerning it in later authors; Yet it is not so unfounded or unsupported a fact as not to deserve the least notice. Bale in his first edition, which the reader will find often quoted in this work, and which differs widely from what he published afterwards, positively affirms it (21). Dr John Allcock, Bishop of Ely, in a Constitution of his, printed by Richard Pynson, directed the prayers of the Church for the soul of Beda, as having been of the university of Cambridge. It is farther certain, that there was formerly between St John's college and St Sepulchre's church a little, low, round house, which went by the name of Beda's lodgings. These and many other arguments (few of greater weight) I find used by my author to establish this fact, and thereby the antiquity of the university of Grantchester or Cambridge (22); but the advocates for Oxford treat them with very great contempt, but assemble, on the other hand, as trivial arguments to prove the contrary, and more especially in regard to our author Beda, who, they affirm, neither did nor could study there, which, as they throw some light upon his history, deserve therefore to be remembered. It is evident, that to destroy the notion of his having either studied or taught at Cambridge, too great weight has been laid upon what himself says of his not going out of his monastery (23), which is certainly to be understood with great restriction: For we are to consider, that though his cell was at Jarrow, and consequently when he speaks of his monastery, we must generally understand that, yet even this is not to be done always; for this and the monastery at Weremouth having but one founder, Benedic't, who governed them both (tho' he had an Abbot in each of them under him) are frequently taken for one monastery, and no doubt though Beda resided at Jarrow, yet he sometimes went to Weremouth. Besides, he must certainly have been bred there in his youth, before his own monastery at Jarrow was finished. Add to all this, that it plainly appears from his own writings, that he spent part of the year 633, or 634, at York with Bishop Egbert (24), so that we must not allow the writers on either side in this controversy to mislead us. But his going out of his monastery is no proof that he went to Cambridge, though it must be allowed that he might possibly have gone there, had there been a university established there in his time. But upon the whole there is no conclusive proof at all, either way, which is the only thing that in reference to this point, after a review of so many authors, can be established.

[F] Is like to be transmitted to latest posterity.] The title of this work, in the edition of Heidelbergh, in 1587, the oldest I have seen, is Ecclesiastica Historia Gentis Anglorum Libri quinque, Beda Anglofaxone auctore; i. e. 'Five Books of the Ecclesiastical History of the English nation, by Beda, an Anglo-Saxon.' There was indeed an edition of this work printed at Antwerp in 1550, and the Heidelbergh edition before-mentioned was followed by another at Cologne in 1601. It was printed again in folio with the Saxon Version, attributed to King Alfred, together with learned notes by Abraham Wheloc, at Cambridge in 1644. Francis Chiffet printed it in quarto at Paris in 1681, with his own notes, which are very curious, though in some particulars he is certainly mistaken, as will be hereafter shewn. Besides these, there was another edition undertaken by Dr Smith, Prebendary of Durham, which was published at Cambridge in 1722, in folio, by his son George Smith, Esq; with notes and dissertations. But before Printing was in use, all our old Historians had recourse to it, and copied from it, so that we often read the works of Beda in those of other men, which is the less wonderful, since, with regard to the period his History relates to, they could not find many other authorities, when, as himself informs us, he was fifty-nine years of age; but before he published this, he had written a multitude of other books, upon a vast variety of subjects, a catalogue of which he subjoined to this History, by which he had obtained so great and so established a reputation, that we find he was consulted by the greatest Prelates of that age; in their most momentous affairs, and particularly by Egbert Bishop of York, who was himself a very knowing and learned man, considering the times in which he lived (o). The strict friendship which subsisted between him and our author Bede, furnished the latter with an opportunity of writing him an epistle, which is very far from being the least considerable of his works, because it shews us at once the temper and character of both those great men, and affords us such a picture of the then state of the Church, as authorities, and amongst them none better than his. John Leland, one of the most considerable, and certainly one of the most capable, of our Antiquaries, has made great collections out of the manuscript copies of our author, which very plainly prove the authenticity of our present copies; and in his History of British writers, he has given a large commendation of this and other treatises of Bede's. We might cite many other authorities to the same purpose; but that we may not detain the reader too long, we will content ourselves with giving him Bishop Nicholson's critical account of this performance, which runs thus (25).

(25) English Historical Library, P. 35.

What we are at present concerned in, is, his Ecclesiastical History of this Island, in five books, which have had many impressions in Latin, the language wherein he penned them. It is plain he had seen and perused several chronicles of the English Kings before his own time, witness that expression, Unde cunctis placuit regum tempora computantibus, &c (26). But he first attempted an account of their Church affairs, and kept correspondence in the other kingdoms of the Heptarchy, the better to enable him to give a true state of Christianity throughout the whole nation. He treats indeed most largely of the conversion of Northumberland, and the progress of religion in that kingdom; but always intermixes what other relations he could borrow from books, or learn from such living testimonies as he believed to be credible. Some have censured his History as composed with too great partiality, favouring on all occasions the Saxons, and depressing the Britons. Such a charge is not wholly groundless. He must be pardoned for stuffing it here and there with thumping miracles, the natural product of the zeal and ignorance of his age, especially since so little truth was to be had of the Saints of those days, that there was a sort of necessity of filling up books of this kind with such pleasant legends, as the chat of the country, or a good invention, would afford a man. It is worth our observation, that none of the writers of his own life has mentioned one single miracle wrought by him, because they had enough of truth to relate; not but that we may boldly reckon him (as a foreign Minister is said once to have done) a much better Saint than any of those Thaumaturgi that we read of in his History. There was a paraphrase made of it in the English Saxon tongue, which has been printed, together with the original Latin text; but whether it was done by the famous King Alfred, or some other hand, we are not very certain (27). Mr Wheloc dares not be positive, yet thinks it very probable, that it was the work of that great monarch, to whom (in his title-page) he has confidently ascribed it. Sir John Spelman proves him the author from a distich in the front of that very manuscript, out of which Mr Wheloc afterwards published it, which runs thus.

Historicus quondam fecit me Bæda Latinum
Ælfred Rex Saxo transtulit ille prius.

A Saxon Garb King ÆLFRED to it brought.*

Our Prelate then cites the authority of the famous Dean Hickeys upon this subject, but in such a manner, that it is not easy to guess what weight it had with him. He mentions also the animadversions of Francis Junius (28), and some manuscripts of Bede's History in the Oxford libraries (where indeed there are many), and insists upon one in Corpus-Christi-college, which he asserts Wheloc never saw. He then closes his account of this Ecclesiastical History thus.

(28) Int. Cod. MSS. Junians, Oxon.

The book itself was translated into English by Thomas Stapleton, Doctor of Divinity in the university of Louvain (29). But (as on other occasions he has shewn himself too partially inclined to serve the interests of his own Church) we have here some times just cause to complain, that he does not deal fairly and honestly with us. Richard Lavingham (Prior of the Carmelite monastery at Bristol, and a mighty writer in Divinity about the latter end of the fourteenth century) is reported to have epitomized Bede's History, beginning with his work Britannia cui quondam Albion, &c (30). There's such an abstrait added in Wheloc's edition, with a continuation to the year 766, which perhaps may be the same; for though it does not begin with these words, Bede himself begins with such as are very like them; and to confound two writers, if they appear under the same cover, is no great transgression in my author. There's another anonymous continuer of this History who defends below the Conquest, and whose book (now in manuscript in the publick library at Oxford) is quoted by some of our most learned writers (31).

There are some things of importance that may be added to these remarks. It is highly probable, though the Bishop seems to insinuate the contrary, that the Latin verses speak nothing but the truth, in ascribing the Saxon version of Bede's History to King Alfred, and the great objection to it is easily answered; for though at first sight it may seem strange, and indeed absurd, to believe that so great a King should be the author of so many books and translations as pass under his name; yet when we consider that he had many learned men about him, of whose assistance he made use, or perhaps only revised and corrected their writings, the thing does not appear quite so improbable: To which we may add another observation, that the Saxon tongue arrived at the highest pitch of elegance in his time; that the translations ascribed to him are all penned in a very fine, and as near as can be in the same style, which seems to be an evidence of their having passed the hands of the same skilful corrector (32). As to the continuations of Bede's History, there are several; one of which, in three books, is added to Bede's History in the Heidelberg edition. It is also requisite to observe, that at the end of Bede's History there is an Epitome or Breviary; to which also there is an addition made by an unknown author, who continues the chronology from 731 to 761 (33). The translation made by Dr Stapleton is dedicated to Queen Elizabeth; and the design of that translation was to support the Popish religion, as appears plainly by a short treatise placed before it, bearing this title: 'Differences between the Primitive Faith of England, continued almost this thousand years, and the late pretended Faith of Protestants, gathered out of the History of the Church of England; compiled by Venerable Bede, an Englishman, about eight hundred years past (34).' It is no great wonder therefore, that an author who undertook his work with such a view, should prove no very faithful translator: But, however, the History of Bede, even as he has given it in English, might in many passages be shewn to be far enough from favouring the modern doctrines of the Church of Rome, of which we shall take occasion to say somewhat in another place. Indeed I think it would be a work of great use and honour to our country, if we had a new and correct translation of this History compared with the Saxon version, and enriched with notes; since it would afford a much better body of Civil as well as Church History, than is extant in our language, and would afford very fair opportunities of explaining and illustrating our Saxon laws, customs, and antiquities.

is no where else to be met with (p). This epistle was one of the last, and indeed probably the very last, of our author's writings, and in it he expresses himself with much clearness and freedom, as well in regard to the advice, which, at his request, he gave to that Prelate, as in reference to the many inconveniences, which he wisely foresaw must proceed from the humour that then prevailed, of multiplying religious houses, to the prejudice both of Church and State (q). It is, to say the truth, in every respect, a very well written and exact treatise, and therefore deserves to be as well known to the world as his History, to which, in some respects, it may serve as an appendix, both with regard to the matter it contains, and the manner in which it is penned, being in part historical, and in part an exhortation [G]. It appears from this epistle, that he was very much indisposed when he wrote it, neither is it at all improbable, that he began now to fall into

[G] Being in part historical, and in part an exhortation. We find in Leland, that this epistle of Bede was in some copies addressed to Egbert, Bishop of Holy Island; but that judicious writer suspected that it was a mistake (35). Yet John Bale transcribes the error without taking the least notice of the correction; but to make it agree better in point of time than it did before, he adds, that this Egbert flourished in 730; and tells us also, without any authority, that he wrote a letter of thanks in answer to Bede's epistle (36). Bishop Godwin copies these errors, the last only excepted; for he places the death of Egbert, Bishop of Holy Island, in 721, where it ought to be (37). It is however evident from the epistle itself, in which Bede says, that it was then about thirty years since the death of King Alfrid (38); that at the soonest it was written in 734, that is, thirteen years after the death of the Prelate to whom Bale will have it addressed, or four years after his death, as he himself has placed it, purely to avoid this difficulty. This Egbert, agreeable to what our author Bede advised him, assumed the title of Archbishop of York, though his predecessors had been content with that of Bishop. He succeeded Wilfred II in the year 732, and was equally distinguished by his birth, station, and learning. With respect to the first, he was of the blood royal; as to the second, he enjoyed the office of Archbishop and Metropolitan; and in reference to the third, his writings bear sufficient evidence, as well as the character bestowed upon him by William of Malmbury, and other ancient writers (39). Neither ought it to be at all considered as a diminution of his credit, that he was so desirous of having our author Bede's advice about the government of his church; since it is certain, that at this time he was looked upon as the honour of his country. But it is now time to come to the work itself. In this, amongst other heads of advice, he recommends the finishing St Gregory's model, to this Prelate, by virtue of which York was to have been a metropolis with twelve Suffragans (40). He insists upon coming up to this plan, the rather, because in some woody, and almost impassable, parts of the country, there were seldom any Bishops came either to confirm, or any Priests to instruct the people, and therefore he is of opinion the erecting new Sees would be of great service to the Church. For this purpose he suggests, the expedient of a Synod to form the project, and adjust the measures; and that an order of court should be procured to pitch upon some monastery, and turn it into a Bishop's See: And to prevent opposition from the religious of that house, they should be softened with some concessions, and allowed to chuse the Bishop out of their own society, and that the joint government of the monastery and diocese should be put into his hands. And if the altering the property of the house should make the increasing the revenues necessary, he tells him there are monasteries enough that ought to spare part of their estates for such uses; and therefore he thinks it reasonable that some of their lands should be taken from them and laid to the Bishoprick, especially since many of them fall short of the rules of their institution (41). And since 'tis commonly said, that several of these places are neither serviceable to God nor the commonwealth, because neither the exercises of piety and discipline are practised, nor the estates possessed by men in a condition to defend the country; therefore if the houses were some of them turned into Bishopricks, it would be a seasonable provision for the Church, and prove a very commendable alteration. And a little after he intreats Egbert to use his interest with King Ceolwulf, to reverse the charters of former Kings for the purposes above-mentioned: For it has sometimes happened, says he, that the piety of Princes has been over lavish, and directed amiss. He complains farther, that the monasteries were frequently filled with people of unfuitable practices; that the country seemed over-stocked with those foundations; that there were scarce estates now left for the Laity of condition; and that, if this humour increased, the country would grow dis furnished of troops to defend their frontiers (42). He mentions another abuse crept in of a higher nature: That some persons of quality of the Laity, who had neither fancy nor experience for this way of living, used to purchase some of the Crown-lands, under pretence of founding a monastery, and then get a charter of privileges signed by the King, the Bishops, and other great men in Church and State; and by these expedients they worked up a great estate, and made themselves Lords of several villages. And thus getting discharged from the service of the commonwealth, they retired for liberty, took the range of their fancy, seized the character of Abbots, and governed the Monks without any title to such authority; and, which is still more irregular, they sometimes don't stock these places with Religious, properly so called, but rake together a company of strolling Monks, expelled for their misbehaviour; and sometimes they persuade their own retinue to take the tonfure, and promise a monastick obedience: And having furnished their religious houses with such ill-chosen company, they live a life perfectly secular under a monastick character, bring their wives into the monasteries, and are husbands and abbots at the same time (43). Thus for about thirty years, ever since the death of King Alfrid, the country has run riot in this manner; in so much, that there are very few of the Lord-Lieutenants, or Governors of towns, who have not seized the religious jurisdiction of a monastery, and put their Ladies in the same post of guilt, by making them Abbeesses without passing through those stages of discipline and retirement that should qualify them for it; and as ill customs are apt to spread, the King's menial servants have taken up the same fashion: And thus we find a great many inconsistent offices and titles incorporated, the same persons are Abbots and Ministers of state, and the court and cloyster are unsuitably tacked together; and men are trusted with the government of religious houses, before they have practised any part of obedience to them. To stop the growth of this disorder, Bede advises the convening of a Synod; that a visitation might be set on foot, and all such unqualified persons thrown out of their usurpation. In short, he puts the Bishop in mind, that 'tis part of the episcopal office to inspect the monasteries of his diocese, to reform what is amiss both in head and members, and not to suffer a breach of the rules of the institution. 'Tis your province, says he, to take care that the Devil does not get the ascendant in places consecrated to God Almighty; that we mayn't have discord instead of quietness, and libertinism instead of sobriety. There is one thing more to be observed before we part with this epistle, which is, that it furnishes us with a very clear and direct proof, that our author was never at Rome; for, speaking of a custom there of marking the year from our Lord's death upon the candles (44) in their churches, he neither affirms it of his own knowledge, nor suffers it to pass without giving his authority, but clearly relies upon the testimony of the Monks with whom he had conversed, and who had been eye-witnesses of it, than which there cannot be a more full or convincing proof of his never having made any such journey.

into that declining state of health, from which he never recovered; since, if we may depend upon the large accounts that are still extant of his sickness and death, he was taken off by that kind of gradual consumption (r), which is frequently fatal to men of sedentary lives, who sacrifice in some measure their health, by their too strict attention to their studies, which those writers also agree, to have been truly the case of the learned and indefatigable Bede. William of Malmesbury (s) has preserved in his History, a very large account of the manner in which he died, which it plainly appears he took from a treatise that was written expressly upon that subject, by Cuthbert, one of Bede's disciples who attended him to the last; to Cuthwin, another of his disciples, who happened to be at a distance (t). It is from hence we learn, that in the last stage of his distemper he fell into an asthma, which he supported with great firmness of mind, though in much weakness and pain for six weeks together. In all this time, he did not in the least abate of his usual employments in the monastery, but continued to pray, to instruct the young Monks, and to prosecute the works that were still in his hands, that, if possible, they might be finished before he died (u). In all the nights of his sickness, in which, from the nature of his disease, he could get but little sleep, he sung hymns and praises to Almighty God; and though he expressed the utmost confidence in his mercy, and was able, on a review of his own conduct, to declare seriously, that he had so lived as not to be ashamed to die, yet he did not deny his apprehensions of death, and that dread which is natural to man at the approach of his dissolution (w). However, as he knew not the day and hour of his end, he was continually active to the last; and particularly careful about two works, the first was, the translation of the Gospel of St John into the Saxon language, for the benefit of the Church, and some passages he was extracting from the works of St Isidore, and therefore at these he wrought with great application. The day before his death he grew much worse, and his feet began to swell, yet he spent the night as usual, and continued dictating to the person who wrote for him; who observing his weakness, said, There remains now no more but one chapter, but it seems very irksome for you to speak; to which he answered, It is easy, take another pen, dip it in the ink, and write as fast as you can (x). About nine o'clock he sent for some of his brethren, to divide among them some incense, and other things of little value, which were in his chest. While he was speaking to them, the young man who wrote for him, and whose name was Wilberch, said; There is now, Master, but one sentence wanting, upon which he bid him write quick, and soon after the same young man said, It is now done, to which he replied, Well! Thou hast said the truth, it is now done. Take up my head between your hands, and lift me, because it pleases me much, to sit over-against the place where I was wont to pray, and where now sitting, I may yet invoke my Father. Being thus seated according to his desire, upon the floor of his cell, he said Glory be to the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, and as he pronounced the last word, he immediately expired. The Monk who wrote this account says positively, that this happened on Thursday the twenty-sixth of May, being the feast of Christ's Ascension, which clearly determines it to the year 735 (y). There have been, however, different opinions about the time of his death, and very warm controversies about it, as the reader may see in the notes, where we have given a more particular account of this matter [H].

[H] Where we have given a more particular account of this matter.] It is not at all wonderful, that with respect to facts of this nature at so great a distance in point of time, and for the settling of which so many antient, and many of them far enough from being accurate writers, are to be consulted, there should be some little difference or disagreement even amongst the most diligent and careful persons. But in reference to the matter now before us, there is the strangest and most unaccountable confusion, that for any thing I know ever happened about any matter of this nature, since there is a difference amongst writers of no less than thirty-seven years. The very learned Dr Cave mentions some who have placed the death of Venerable Bede in 729 (45), that is, two years before he published his History, which is very clearly brought down to the year 731; and it is impossible for any one to read it without perceiving this. Hermannus Contractus, Heptidanus, Segebertus Gemblacensis, and many others, fix his death in the year 731 (46), probably because his History ends there; but in the summary or chronology thereto annexed, he proceeds as low as the year 734, and we have shewn that his letter to Egbert, Archbishop of York, was certainly written in that year; so that this too is plainly an error. The Saxon chronicle, a book otherwise of great authority, and some other writers, and amongst the rest Griffith the Jesuit, who published his Annals under the name of Alford, fix his death to the year 734 (47), which is indeed somewhat nearer the truth; but it is very strange that most of these writers allow that he died upon Ascension-day. Cardinal Baronius thinks he lived to be one hundred and five, and several writers place his death in the years

762 and 766 (48), for reasons with which there seems to be no kind of necessity we should trouble the reader here. In regard to the date which we have fixed upon, viz. the 7th of the Calends of June, or the 26th of May, 735; it has not only the best authorities to support it, but may be also demonstrated to be the true date, from circumstances that will not admit of any mistake. But first, with respect to our authorities, we have the author of the Supplemental Chronology to Bede's history (49), Simeon of Durham (50), Roger Höveden (51), Thomas Stubbs (52), and many others, who are all clear in this point. As to the epistle of Cuthbert, which is transcribed or abridged by William of Malmesbury, the Historian of Durham, and many other authors, it does not indeed expressly fix the year, but it assigns the day clearly, viz. that it was the 26th of May, and the feast of Christ's Ascension, which agrees with the year 735, and with none other. The very learned John Leland observes, that Trithemius had extended the age of Bede to seventy-two, which he thought a mistake; and that he might avoid any error of the same kind, he very cautiously delivers his sentiment, which was, that he died at somewhat more than sixty (53). Yet John Bale, with this authority before his eyes, and with this farther circumstance, that Bede was fifty-nine when he published his History, which Leland also observes, falls into two very gross errors, affirming that he died in 734 at the age of seventy-two (54); which shews how cautious we ought to be in trusting to the dates of that author, who borrowed most of his facts in these antient lives from Leland; but, in transcribing them, forgets his modesty and exactness. In the preface, which Sir James Ware

His body was interred in the church of his own monastery at Jarrow, and the isle where he was buried, was much revered on that account, and numbers of people resorted thither to pray, more especially on the anniversary of his death (z). But in process of time his body was removed to Durham, and placed in the same coffin or chest with that of St Cuthbert, as we are informed by many of our antient Historians, and as is clear from a very antient Saxon poem, on the relics preserved in the cathedral of Durham (a). It is justly observed, that the Monks never forged any miracles of Bede, or pretended that he wrought any in his life-time, but to give some colour for removing his bones to Durham, they pretended that one Gamelus, a very prudent and pious Monk, was admonished by St Cuthbert in a dream, to travel through the North of England, and collect the relics of holy men, in order to their being interred with his in the church of Durham, that so they might be better preserved from the insults of sacrilegious hands, to stir up the piety of the faithful (b), which, without all doubt, was a device made use of for the service of the Monks at Durham, and answered their purpose very effectually, by rendering their church the most respected of any in the North of England. He had also many epitaphs written upon him, but none that were at all equal to his merit, or capable of doing justice to his memory, as has been rightly remarked by the learned Dr Hakewill (c), and was long before observed by William of Malmesbury (d). But how ill written soever these epitaphs may be, they at least serve to shew the good intention of their authors, and in how great repute the memory of Bede has been for learning and sanctity, from the times nearest his decease, down to our own [I]. It is very certain, that his great learning and unaffected piety, gained him, even amongst his contemporaries, a very high and general esteem, insomuch, that if we may believe some authors, his Homilies were read publickly in the churches in his life-time, which being a new and singular honour, there arose some difficulty, about the title that should be given him in the preface to those lectures, and as it was thought too much to stile him Saint while yet alive, the title of Venerable was fixed upon as more proper, or, at least, as less liable to objection (e). There are besides this, some very fabulous accounts given us of his acquiring this surname, so that on the whole it is become a disputable point, why he has been, both by antient and modern writers, constantly called Venerable Bede, into which we shall give the reader as much light as is in our power (f) [K]. The advantage he had, of being brought up by placed before those treatises of Bede, which he published, there are some other authorities and arguments offered in support of the date, to which we adhere: But as we apprehend the reasons already given are sufficient to satisfy the reader, we shall decline any thing farther on this head.

[I] From the times nearest his decease, down to our own.] It must be acknowledged, that poetry was in a very low condition at the time our author flourished, and even at his decease. We find in the collections made by the learned and laborious Leland, abundance of instances of this, which he had collected from various manuscripts of that age; and amongst these there are some of Bede's. There we find also the epitaph, which Malmesbury justly censures as highly unworthy of being placed on the tomb of so excellent a person, and which does no honour to the Monks of those times, since it plainly shews they could produce nothing better.

In Latin it runs thus (55).

Epitaph. Bedæ.

- ‘ Presbyter hic Beda requiescit, carne sepultus.
- ‘ Dona, Christe, animam in cœlis guadere per ævum,
- ‘ Daque illi Sophiæ debris fonte cui tam
- ‘ Suspiravit ovans intento semper amore.

In English thus.

- ‘ BEDA the Priest's remains, lie buried here.
- ‘ Grant him, O CHRIST, to drink from fountain
- ‘ clear,
- ‘ Of heavenly WISDOM, in thy presence plac'd,
- ‘ Which here on earth he thirsted so to taste.

Dr Hakewill, a very ingenious and learned man, who had undertaken to refute a common opinion, that the earth and all things thereon decayed, and that every thing declined daily, so that the dissolution of the world might be justly expected from its old age, produces this epitaph to prove this doctrine false with regard to Latin poetry; since this would not be borne with now, which then probably might be esteemed excellent. I will not say that he intended it, but certainly so it is, that his English translation affords as strong, or rather (in my judgment) a stronger proof in support of his argument, than the Latin before cited; and I can scarce make a question that the reader will be of this opinion when he has perused it.

Dr Hakewill's Translation (56).

- ‘ Presbyter Beda's coarse rests buried in this grave,
- ‘ Grant, Christ, his soul in Heaven eternal joys may
- ‘ have.
- ‘ Give him to be drunk the woll of wisdom, to
- ‘ Which with such joy and love he striv'd and breathed
- ‘ so.'

But as remarkable as this may be, I shall mention another epitaph on Bede which is more so. There is nothing amiss in the former but the harshness of the verse, from which, perhaps, the latter is not absolutely free; but then it abounds with more essential errors; it places the death of Bede at a wrong time; it makes him upwards of ninety when he died, and has been (so far as I can trace them) the source of most of the mistakes mentioned in the former note. This epitaph, the author and antiquity of which ought to add no great authority, is as follows (57).

Beda Epitaphium.

Beda Dei famulus, Monachorum nobile fidus, Finibus è terræ profuit Ecclesiæ;
 Solers iste Patrum scrutando per omnia sensum, Eloquio viguit, plurima composuit.
 Annos hac vitâ, ter duxit ritè triginta
 Presbyter officio, utilis ingenio.
 Jani septenis viduatus carne Kalendis Angligena Angelicam commeruit Patriam.

[K] We shall give the reader as much light as is in our power.] The reason mentioned in the text concerning the reading his homilies in his life-time, serves very well to satisfy superficial and hasty writers; and therefore one need not wonder, that Fuller searched no farther. Saint, says he, they thought too much, plain Bede too little, and therefore Venerable was a middle term, very luckily hit upon in his judgment and theirs.

Abbot Benedict, John of Beverly, and other great men, enabled him to make a quick progress in science, and his amazing diligence and application during the space of forty-three years, might very well afford him time to write a great number of books, upon very different subjects. He has himself given us a short and plain list of all the treatises he had composed before he published his Ecclesiastical History, of which we have already given an account, as well as of his epistle to Egbert Archbishop of York, which he certainly wrote after the publishing of that History; as he likewise did some other treatises, tho' not near so many as have been ascribed to him, which renders it a very difficult thing to give a clear account of his writings, as all who have meddled with this subject acknowledge, and as the reader will plainly perceive, by what we are obliged, from the nature of this work, to deliver in the notes (g) [L]. These his labours were so well received in his theirs (58). I do not intend to dispute any part of his argument with him, but barely the matter of fact; for in regard to this I am not satisfied, the authority he quotes being insufficient to prove he was so called in his life-time. But the contrary may be very easily and effectually made out. Albinus Flaccus, or Alcuinus, his contemporary and scholar, does not stile him Venerabilis, but Sacerdos, or Doctor eximius. Amalarius calls him Dominus, and Ufuardus plain Beda (59). But Marianus Scotus, and several authors, do not all scruple calling him Santus (60). Besides, the old epitaph quoted in the preceding note, plainly destroys this opinion, and shews that he enjoyed during his life no higher, indeed no other title, than that of Presbyter Bede. But besides this account of the matter, which is rational enough if it was true, we have two others equally fabulous and false, yet still worth relating. The first refers to his life-time, and lays the scene thus. When Bede was grown old, and through age blind, one of his young disciples carried him abroad to a place where there lay a great heap of stones, and told him he was surrounded by a great crowd of people, who waited with much silence and attention to receive his spiritual consolation. The good old man accordingly made a long discourse, which he concluded with a prayer, and the stones very punctually made their response, Amen, Venerable Bede (61). This very silly story is not only false in itself, but is founded also on two false notions concerning him. 1. That he had the title of Venerable in his life-time. 2. That he survived to extreme age, and was blind. The second fabulous tale refers this title to his death (62), when a young man, or, as this story reports, a Monk, studying for an epitaph got thus far,

Hæc sunt in fossa BEDÆ ossa.

His head not being well turned for Poetry, he could find no words to fill up this hiatus in his leonine, and, after tormenting himself to no purpose, fell asleep; but the next morning returning to his task, he, with infinite astonishment, found the line already completed, thus:

Hæc sunt in fossa Bedæ Venerabilis ossa.

In English,

Here, in the silent grave, are laid
The bones of Venerable BEDE.

Some authors vary this story a little, by telling us the young Monk wrote first, as an inscription for our author's tomb, this verse (63), Hæc jacet in fossa Bedæ Presbyteri ossa.

But in his sleep, being severely rebuked for injuring the fame of so good a man by so miserable a line, he was instructed to amend it thus:

Hæc jacet in fossa Bedæ Venerabilis ossa.

It is evident enough even from these idle and ridiculous stories, that those who contrived them were desirous of giving some reason or other for Bede's being stiled Venerable; and rather than put themselves to the trouble of searching for what might be satisfactory, they invented such fables as these, which surely injure his memory, much more than if they had left the subject wholly untouched. But the truth seems to be, that though he had not this title given him in this life, or immediately after his decease, yet the custom of calling him so is very antient, and was brought in by those who quoted his writings, who at first making use of this phrase, 'we find such and such things in the writings of the Venerable Priest Beda;' they began by degrees to let drop the word Priest, and so called him the Venerable Bede: An appellation; which, as a learned Popish writer says, he justly deserved, as well for his singular piety, as for his remarkable modesty (64). And a Protestant writer, of as great character, says, that he was one of the best and holiest of men, and thereby truly merited the title of Venerable (65).

[L] By what we are obliged, from the nature of this work, to deliver in the notes. The first catalogue of Bede's works, as we have before observed (66), we have from himself at the end of his Ecclesiastical History, which contains all he had wrote before the year 731. This we find copied by Leland (67), who also mentions some other pieces he had met with of Bede's, and points out likewise several that passed under his name, though in his judgment spurious. John Bale, in the first edition (68) of his book, which he finished in 1548, mentions ninety-six treatises written by Bede; and in his last edition (69) he swells these to one hundred and forty-five tracts; and declares at the close of both his catalogues, that there were numberless pieces of our author's besides, which he had not seen. Pits, according to his usual custom (70), has much enlarged even this catalogue; though, to do him justice, he appears to have taken great pains in drawing up this article, and mentions the libraries in which many of these treatises were to be found. I say nothing of the catalogues given by Trithemius, Dempster, and others; because much inferior to these. Several of Bede's books were printed very early, and, for the most part, very incorrectly; but the first general collection of his works appeared at Paris in 1544, in three volumes in folio. They were printed again, in 1554, at the same place, in eight volumes. They were published in the same size and number of volumes, at Basil, in 1563, reprinted at Cologne in 1612, and lastly at the same place in 1688. A very clear and distinct account of the contents of these volumes, the reader may find in the very learned and useful collection of Casimir Oudin (71). But the most exact and satisfactory detail of Bede's life and writings, we owe to that accurate, judicious, and candid Benedictine John Mabillon (72), to whom we are much indebted for what we have given the reader in relation to this great writer, in the text; with respect to his actions and course of life, his piety, zeal, learning, publick spirit, and indefatigable application. Neither has any critick exerted his skill more effectually than he, though largely, and with copious extracts interspersed. But the easiest, plainest, and most concise representation of Bede's writings, in reference to our design, occurs in the learned Dr Cave's justly esteemed performance (73); and therefore in his method, though with many additional remarks and elucidations, we shall proceed.

The works of Venerable Beda that are published.

This occurs in his own Index, in the other catalogues of his writings, and is the first treatise in the second volume of his works, in the Cologne edition of 1612.

II. De Temporum ratione; i. e. 'Of the Reason of times.'

This treatise occurs likewise in his own, and in all the other catalogues. It is a treatise of Chronology inhis own time, and for many ages after, that we find a great character bestowed upon him by ferred in the second volume of his works, page 43. There is, however, a later and more correct edition of this treatise printed in Germany (74), which deserves to be consulted whenever his works are reprinted.

III. De sex ætatibus Mundi liber; i. e. 'Of the Six Ages of the World.'

It appears plainly to have been written in 726, and is mentioned, though with some variation in the title, in his own catalogue. It is printed in the second volume of his works, page 103, and separately at Paris in 1507, in 4to. It was also printed at Cologne with notes, and a continuation by John Bronchorst.

IV. De Temporibus ad intelligendam Supputationem temporum S. Scriptura; i. e. 'Of the Account of Time, in order to the understanding Scripture Computations.'

This appears to be a shorter treatise on the same subject with the foregoing (II), and was apparently written before it, so that it is wrong placed in his works, vol. II. page 118; but being so placed, it seemed but requisite we should so place it here, that the amendment suggested might be the better understood. In short, instead of being a supplement to the larger treatise, that is rather a supplement to this.

V. Sententiæ ex Cicero et Aristotele; i. e. 'Sentences out of Cicero and Aristotle.'

This is not in his own, but occurs in some other catalogues, and has therefore found a place in his works, vol. II. page 166; but in the judgment of Oudin (75) it is very doubtful whether it ought to be ascribed to Beda: Yet if we consider that such a collection might be useful to his scholars, it will answer all objections.

VI. De Proverbiis; i. e. 'Of Proverbs.'

Of the same kind with the other; but as it stands in his works, vol. II. page 185, is strangely interpolated, and in that respect may well be denied to be the composition of Beda.

VII. De Substantia Elementorum; i. e. 'Of the Substance of the Elements.'

We do not find this in his account of his own works, and indeed it seems to be altogether unworthy of him, though printed amongst the rest of his writings, vol. I. page 323.

VIII. Philosophiæ libri 4; i. e. 'Four Books of Philosophy.'

This likewise occurs in the same volume of Beda's works, but beyond doubt is none of his, as appears by the preparatory introductions to each of the four books. The learned Casimir Oudin (76) inclines to think this treatise belongs to William de Conchis, who flourished about 1140.

IX. De Paschate seu Equinoctio; i. e. 'Of the keeping of Easter, or of the (vernal) Equinox.'

The learned have been more at a loss about this than about any other of the works of Beda. Baronius from an example given therein relating to 776, concluded from thence that Beda must have lived longer than that year. But the judicious Primate Usher being sensible this notion could not be maintained, thought this treatise was spurious, and ought to be rejected. But the assiduous Mabillon (77) discovered from an antient manuscript, that this example was interpolated by a transcriber, to accommodate it to the year in which he made his copy. It is to be found in the first volume of his works.

X. De divinatione Vitæ et Mortis; i. e. 'Of the foretelling Life and Death.'

XI. De Arca Noe; i. e. 'Of Noah's Ark.'

XII. De Linguis Gentium; i. e. 'Of the Languages of Nations.'

XIII. Oraçula Sibyllina; i. e. 'Sibylline Oracles.'

All of them very low and defpicable performances, and of which it may be at first sight very confidently pronounced, they are injuriously attributed to our author.

XIV. Historiæ Ecclesiasticæ gentis Anglorum, libri 5; i. e. 'The Ecclesiastical History of the English Nation.' Of which a large account has been given.

XV. Vita S. Cuthberti; i. e. 'The Life of St Cuthbert.'

There is scarce any of our author's writings so well attested as this. We find by his own catalogue, that he twice wrote this holy Prelate's life in verse and in prose. He mentions this again in his History (78), where he adds many particulars concerning him, which had before escaped his inquiries. It is to be found in the third volume of his works.

XVI. Vitæ SS Felicis, Vedasti, Columbani, Attalæ, Patricii, Eustasii, Bertolfi, Arnolphi, Burgondoforæ; i. e. 'Lives of the Saints, Felix, &c.'

We have reason to believe the first of these, viz. The Life of St Felix, might fall from the pen of Beda, but for the rest they certainly do not belong to him, but to others; as for instance, the Life of St Patrick to Probus, and that of Burgondofora, an Abbeſs, to an Italian Monk.

XVII. Carmen de Justino Martyrio; i. e. 'A Poem on the Martyrdom of Justin.'

We find this with those lives before-mentioned, in the third volume of our author's works; but there is no reason to believe this, any more than those, to be his, but quite the contrary.

XVIII. Martyrologium; i. e. 'A Martyrology.'

That such a work our author actually wrote, we have his own authority to prove (79); and that he took care to set down therein, not only the days of their births and sufferings, but the kinds of deaths also, and the judges by whom these cruel sentences were passed. But these very circumstances plainly shew the Martyrologium, published at Antwerp under the name of Beda, to be either spurious or interpolated. This indeed has been confessed by some Popish writers of unquestioned fidelity, who likewise own that most of the old Martyrologies are so treated. Yet we are assured that the genuine, uncorrupted work of Beda, is still in being, and even published (80). But as to the Martyrology in the third volume of Beda's works, we may safely affirm that it ought not to be ascribed, as it stands, to our author. But besides these, there is another Martyrology, which is by the judicious Mabillon ascribed to Beda, and published under this title, Martyrologium quod Beda heroico carmine composuit (81). It is the same which the manuscript bears from which it was printed, and which appears to have been copied within one hundred years after the author's decease. We see plainly from the work itself, that it must have been composed in the life-time of Beda, by a Monk of the monastery of Jarrow, and that it agrees exactly with his Ecclesiastical History (82). It is indeed true, that it does not occur, either in his own or in any other catalogue of his works, for which however some good reasons may be given, viz. as to the first, it appears by St Wilfrid's being inserted therein, that it was composed later than 731, and so could not be in Beda's catalogue, published with his History; as to the second, all the accounts of Beda's writings, leave an et cetera large enough for other pieces, capable of as authentic proofs as those are, already ascribed to this author.

XIX. De situ Hierusalem & locorum sanctorum; i. e. 'Of the Situation of Jerusalem and the Holy Places.'

This is confessedly taken out of a book written on the same subject by Adamnanus, is full of superfluous and fable, so as to have furnished such as have censured our author with most of their quotations, to discredit his writings; how equitably, the candid and judicious reader will judge.

XX. Interpretatio Nominum Hebræorum & Græcorum in Sacris Scripturis occurrentium; i. e. 'An Interpretation of the Hebrew and Greek Names which occur in the Holy Scriptures.'

Some ascribe this to other authors, particularly to one Remigius, a Monk, who lived in the Xth century (83). It is digested alphabetically, and must have been very useful in those times, when there were very few who could read the Scriptures in their original tongues.

XXI. Excerpta & Collectanea; i. e. 'Memorable Passages and Collections.'

Unworthy of Beda in all respects, says the great Dr Cave (84), but it may be his for all that. Young men make common places out of books they despise when they grow old.

XXII. In Hexameron, seu de Creatione sex Dierum Liber; i. e. 'A Treatise on the Hexameron, or Creation in six Days.'

XXIII. Explanatio in Pentateuchum & Libros Regum; i. e. 'An Explanation on the Pentateuch and Books of Kings.'

by the most eminent authors, as well as the most competent judges, who thought it a tribute

XXIV. In Samuelem Explanationum allegoricarum Libri quatuor; i. e. 'Four Books of allegorical Explanations upon Samuel.'

XXV. Explanationes in Esdras, Tobiam, Job, Proverbia, & Cántica; i. e. 'Explanations on Esdras, Tobias, Job, Proverbs, and Canticles.'

These are all contained in the fourth volume of Beda's works, and are allowed to be his, except only three books of Explanations upon Job, which have been fully proved, and that even from the authority of Beda himself, to belong to one Philip, a disciple of St Jerome's (85), who flourished much earlier than our author, and under his name they have been also published (86).

XXVI. De Tabernaculo ac Vasis & Vestibus ejus, Libri duo; i. e. 'Of the Tabernacle and Things appertaining thereto.'

We find this also in the fourth volume of Beda's Works, in all the catalogues, and no scruples have been raised against it; so that I think we may justly conclude it his.

XXVII. Commentaria in quatuor Evangelia & Acta Apostolorum; i. e. 'Commentaries upon the Four Gospels and Acts of the Apostles.'

XXVIII. De Nominibus Locorum, qui in Actis Apostolorum leguntur; i. e. 'Of the Names of Places which are mentioned in the Acts of the Apostles.'

These all occur in the fifth volume of his Works, and though some suspicions have been raised against the Commentaries upon Matthew and John, yet there appears to be good reason for believing them all his, except the last, which seems to be very justly attributed to Remigius (87), who is before mentioned in No. XX, and may be considered as ascribed to Beda by ignorant persons, who might find them amongst his manuscripts.

XXIX. Expositio in septem Epistolas canonicas; i. e. 'An Exposition upon the seven canonical Epistles.'

We find this work also in Beda's fifth volume, and there are no scruples at all moved about it's being genuine, and yet there is a circumstance in relation to this work, which deserves much consideration. We are informed by the accurate and learned Dr Cave, who seems to have been himself acquainted with this particular by the ingenious and industrious Mr Wharton, that this exposition has been hitherto constantly printed without it's Preface or Prologue, which still appears before an old MS. copy, in the library of Gonvil and Cajus College in Cambridge. This Prologue being transcribed by Mr Wharton, and transmitted to Dr Cave, is published by the latter (88), and shews very plainly from it's contents, the reason why it never came from the press in foreign countries, viz because it plainly proves Beda was a stranger to the supremacy of St Peter, and instead of discovering it in the Scriptures, collected from thence just the contrary.

XXX. Retractationes & Quaestiones in Acta Apostolorum; i. e. 'Retractions and Questions on the Acts of the Apostles.'

XXXI. Commentaria in omnes Epistolas S. Pauli; i. e. 'Commentaries upon all the Epistles of St Paul.'

We have this, as well as the former, in the sixth volume of Beda's Works. But it is necessary to say somewhat in explanation of these Commentaries. They are collections only out of the writings of St Augustin, who ought rather to be styled the author of these Commentaries than Beda, or whoever else drew them out of his writings and put them together. That Beda composed a work of this kind, or rather collected it, is very certain; but whether this be that work, is the true state of the question. Baronius inclines to ascribe it to one Abbot Peter, but the inquisitive Mabillon has very clearly shewn, that it belongs not either to this Abbot or our Beda, but to one Florus (89), so that when we have a correct edition of the Writings of Venerable Bede, these must be thrown out.

XXXII. Homiliae de Temporibus; i. e. 'Homilies for the Seasons.'

These make the whole seventh volume of his Works. XXXIII. Liber de Muliere forti; i. e. 'A Discourse of the strong Woman.'

XXXIV. De Officiis Liber; i. e. 'Of Morals one Book.'

XXXV. Scintillae sive Loci Communes; i. e. 'Sparks; or Common Places.'

These are to be met with elsewhere (90), as well as in the Works of Beda, where they occur in the seventh volume; but however they are very poor performances, and no proof of it's belonging to him.

XXXVI. Fragmenta in Libros Sapientiales & Psalmi versus; i. e. 'Fragments on the Books of Wisdom and the Psalms.'

XXXVII. De Templo Salomonis; i. e. 'Of Solomon's Temple.'

XXXVIII. Quaestiones in Octateuchum & quatuor Libros Regum; i. e. 'Questions on the Octateuch, and four Books of Kings.'

XXXIX. Commentarii in Boethii Libros de Trinitate; i. e. 'Commentaries upon Boethius's Books upon the Trinity.'

XL. Meditationis Passionis Christi per septem Dies Horas; i. e. 'Meditations on the Passion of Christ, for the seven (canonical) Hours of the Day.'

This, from the very title, appears to have been penned much later than the age of Beda, and can by no means be reconciled, either in matter or manner, to his writings.

There are besides an infinite number of small tracts; which are chiefly in the first volume of his Works, on Arithmetic, Grammar, Rhetoric, Astronomy, Chronology, Musick, the Means of measuring Time, of Meteors, &c. to discourse of all which would require; not a note, but a large volume. I shall therefore content myself with observing, that the writings of Beda were addressed to very different readers, for some were penned for the use of the young Monks who had scarce received the first tincture of letters, and others for the learned of that age; and in composing these, consequently a diversity of styles was necessary. It is therefore too hasty in some critics to conclude, from some pieces of our author's, that he had only a little, and that too, superficial, knowledge; they ought to consider the subjects on which, and persons for whom, he wrote, what disadvantages he laboured under, in acquiring such a variety of Science in this corner of the world, where he could have so very little assistance, and the generous use he made of it, in composing so many treatises for the instruction and improvement of youth, that his pains taken, and progress made, in literature; might become useful to succeeding generations.

But exclusive of all the treatises written by our author, and which have been published in the great Collections of his Works, there have been some, and those too not the least valuable, that have been sent abroad, either in other Collections of the writings of ancient authors, or by themselves, and of these it is necessary that we should give some account, which however shall be done with all the brevity possible.

The Works of Beda separately printed.

Acta S. Cuthberti; i. e. 'The Acts of St Cuthbert, in heroic verse.'

These were published by Henry Canisius (91), but there have been some doubts raised whether they are genuine, and not without reason.

Aristotelis Axiomata exposita; i. e. 'The Axioms of Aristotle explained.'

These have been twice published under the name of our author (92), and while this Philosophy was in great credit might be a useful book.

The Hymns of Beda have been published with notes by Cassander, but many of them are of doubtful authority, though some of them are found in the most ancient MSS. of our authors that are preserved in our publick libraries here or abroad, and they are all very near his time.

Epistola Apologetica ad Plegwinam Monachum; i. e. 'An Apologetic Epistle to Plegwin a Monk.'

This is a very learned and very judicious performance, as it both explains and defends the opinion of Beda, with respect to the Hebrew Chronology, which he maintained against the common opinion of the learned in his time; notwithstanding it was looked upon as a kind of Heresy, and therefore he desires that it might be shewn to one David, a Monk of York, who had expressed tribute due to his memory, in paying which they likewise did honour to themselves, as will appear from some instances, out of a much greater number that might have been given, which the reader will find we have collected upon that head, and which, if authorities are capable of securing and preserving, fame will certainly transmit the memory of this great man with honour, to ages at the remotest distance (b) [M]. But it must however be expressed a dissatisfaction at the reports he had heard of Beda's sentiments upon this subject.

Epistola ad Egbertum Eboracensem Antistitem de Christiani Persulis Officio, i. e. 'Of the Office of a Christian Bishop to Egbert Bishop of York.'

We have already given a large account of this work (93), and therefore need say nothing farther of it here.

Vita quinque Abbatum priorum Weremuthensium et Geruicenfium; i. e. 'The Lives of the Abbots of Weremouth and Jarrow.'

This history is comprised in two books, and was published with the two treatises before-mentioned by the very learned and judicious Antiquary of Ireland Sir James Ware, with a preface, containing various particulars relating to the life and writings of Beda, and illustrated with short and useful notes throughout (94), and again by Mr Wharton.

Epistola ad Albinum; i. e. 'An Epistle to Albinus.'

This was published by the famous Mabillon (95); but it is to be observed, that this Albinus, to whom Beda addresses himself, is not the celebrated Albinus Flaccus Alcuinus, but, as Ittigius (96) rightly observes, another of the same name, who was Abbot of the monastery of St Peter at Canterbury.

In principium Genesim usque ad nativitatem Isaac et Ismaelis reprobationem libri tres; i. e. 'Three Books (of Annotations) on the beginning of Genesis to the birth of Isaac, and the expulsion of Ishmael.'

In Canticum Habacuc liber; i. e. 'On the Song of Habacuc.'

These treatises of Beda, which are mentioned in his own catalogue of his works, were published by the learned and industrious Mr Wharton from three MSS. in the famous library in the archiepiscopal palace at Lambeth (97). The worthy editor gives a large account of these (and other pieces added to them) in an epistolary discourse addressed to the rev. Mr Archdeacon Bateley, dated Aug. 30, 1693; wherein he takes notice, amongst other things, that he published these Opuscula of Venerable Bede, to remove the complaint of our negligence in this respect, and that foreign writers might not boast, as they had hitherto done, of being the sole publishers of the works of Beda. He added to these the small treatises that had been before published by Sir James Ware, and which it seems were at that time become extremely scarce. But at the same time he shews that he was not transported, as some editors are, with such an affection for his author, as to conceive better of his works than they deserved; since he confesses that the Divines of the middle ages are by no means to be compared with the ancient Fathers in point of authority, or to the Moderns in respect to acuteness; but nevertheless they have their uses, and therefore such collections had been well received by the learned world, and amongst them none better than such of the works of Beda as had been before published.

The Works of Beda that still remain unpublished, are,

De Situ et Mirabilibus Britanniae liber; i. e. 'Of the Situation and Wonders of Britain.'

Vita S. Juliani; i. e. 'The Life of St Julian.'

This MS. is in the Bodleian library.

Vita S. Gregorii magni; i. e. 'The Life of St Gregory the Great.'

This is in the library of Merton-college; but, upon inspection, appears to be no other than a transcript of St Gregory's life by Paul Warnefrid (98).

De vita et virtutibus S. Augustini Anglorum Apostoli; i. e. 'Of the Life and Virtues of St Augustin, the Apostle of the English.'

MS. in the possession of Walter Cope.

Relatio de S. Laurentio Anglorum Archiepiscopo; i. e. 'A Relation of St Laurence, Archbishop of the English.'

MS. in the same place. This Laurence was the successor of St Austin before-mentioned, and the substance of this relation is to be found in our author's Ecclesiastical History (99).

Homiliarum in S. Lucam libri 2; i. e. 'Two Books of Homilies on the Gospel of St Luke.'

MS. in the publick library at Cambridge, Cod. 25. And in the Pembroke library, Cod. 213.

Homiliae in Evangelia; i. e. 'Homilies on the Gospels.'

MSS. in the library of Lincoln-college at Oxford, Cod. 18. Also at Baliol-college, Cod. 130. And at Merton, Cod. 227.

De Die Judicii liber; i. e. 'Of the Day of Judgment.'

MS. in Bennet-college, Cambridge, Cod. 284.

The following Writings of his are thought to be lost.

Epistolarum Liber; i. e. 'A Book of Epistles.'

Traclatus de mansionibus filiorum Israel; i. e. 'A Treatise of the Mansions of the Children of Israel.'

Epigrammatum Liber; i. e. 'A Book of Epigrams.'

De Vita et Passione S. Anastasii; i. e. 'Of the Life and Passion of St Anastasius.'

This, in Beda's own catalogue of his works, is said to have been before ill translated, and worse amended from the Greek, and by him therefore corrected and brought to the true meaning of it's original (101); but by whom it was written or translated is not expressed.

We have insisted more at large on the writings of Venerable Bede, because notwithstanding there have been several editions of them, as we have already shewn, yet neither those large collections, nor the other treatises in which some pieces of his are contained, are very common; so that it seemed the more necessary to give the reader a clear and complete view of all the writings this great man left behind him, such as are suspected, such as remain unpublished, and such as are supposed to be lost. By this means one great and valuable end of this work will be answered, viz. the seeing at one view, and without being obliged to have recourse to other books, what Beda did and wrote in his life-time, what remains to us of his writings, where they may be found, and how a farther account of any difficulties about them may be obtained, by consulting, as indicated in the margin, the remarks of the most eminent of our modern Critics.

[M] With honour even to ages at the remotest distance.] We will open these commendations of our author with the wise and weighty observations of Hermannus Conringius (102), a man of most extensive learning, and of as much judgment as any Critick of his age. 'It is, says he, worthy of notice, that in the sixth, seventh, and eighth centuries, there was scarce to be found throughout Italy, France, Britain, Spain, and, in a word, throughout the whole western Church, the name of a person who had written a book, but what either dwelt in, or at least was educated at some monastery. How much was Beda distinguished amongst the British Monks, who, to say the truth, was not only the most learned of them, but, the age in which he lived considered, the whole be acknowledged, that some late criticks of our own and foreign nations, but more particularly the French, have taken great liberties with his character; and have treated him as a man of superficial learning; vast, but indigested, reading; a collector rather than an author; of little judgment, though great industry; negligent in point of style as well as method, and void of all taste for criticism. He is also charged by some with being extremely credulous, and giving too easy a belief to the fabulous miracles reported in his time.

* whole western world. As for us Germans, we owe the first propagation of Christianity amongst us to those religious houses; and, to say the truth, we are likewise indebted to them for the cultivation of learning, and the improvement of all branches of literature, in the same manner as the English and Scotch received theirs in former times from the Roman Monks, who visited their countries.* This may serve to give us a just notion of the true merit of Beda, who is not to be commended as a writer much superior to those of the two last ages, but as an author who wrote much better than most men of his time, and took a great deal of pains to make the acquisition of knowledge very easy to his countrymen, who before his time found it hard to study to any purpose, even when they were ever so much inclined to it. Albinus, or Alcuinus Flaccus, in a letter of his directed to the Monks of Jarrow, addresses them thus

(103) Epist. xlix.

(103). ' Bearing in mind the example of the most worthy person of your times, Presbyter Beda, you ought to remember how he studied in his youth, how great a character he had amongst men, and how great a weight of glory he now sustains with God. His behaviour ought assuredly to awake your sleepy minds, be therefore assiduous you who are now intrusted with the care of teaching, open your books, read and explain their sense, and, like him, feed those who are under your care as he did, &c.' In the same manner Lilius Gregorius Gyraldus discourses in the fifth dialogue of his History of Poets, where he gives a large character and a high eulogium of Beda, who, he says, had learning enough to have distinguished him in any age, and that in one very dark and superstitious, he excelled all others. Folcardus (104), in his life of St John, Archbishop of York, takes occasion to speak of our author as his pupil; and says, that it is amazing how he became so perfect in all the branches of those sciences to which he addicted himself; whereby, as he assures us, he conquered all difficulties, and brought those of his own nation to frame right notions of the matters that most concerned them, so as that they were afterwards neither dull nor ignorant, but from the rude and boorish manners of their ancestors, began to be exceedingly civilized and polite through their desire of learning, of which he not only taught them the grounds while living, but in his works left them a kind of Encyclopædia for the institution of youth after his decease. Whoever it was that took upon him to continue Beda's History, has shewn an inclination to do justice to his memory (105), though he seems only to have transcribed William of Malmesbury. Indeed this custom of transcribing was very general in those times, so that commonly the same characters of eminent persons are given in the same words, under the name of various authors. In many also of the Abbey Chronicles, where there are short articles only entered, the same regularity (which shews their being copied from each other) appears. In one of these Chronicles I have observed, that in recording the death of Beda, he is stiled Saint as well as Venerable (106). But to proceed more methodically with our authorities; William of Malmesbury gives him a very extraordinary character, and tells us, that it was much easier to admire him in thought, than to do him justice in expression. He commends him also for his piety and learning, and laments the loss of his industry and abilities in the ages following; and observes, that history slept, and all notice of publick transactions were in a manner buried with him; for the English growing more indolent every day, all application to learning ceased for a long time over the whole island (107). Simeon Dunelmensis tells us, that it seems surprizing to some persons, that a man who lived in one of the most remote corners of the world, and never had an opportunity of travelling for his improvement in Science, or frequenting the schools of Philosophy, should distinguish himself by so uncommon an extent of learning, and the composition of so many books (108). Popes, observes, that he received the name of Venerable on account of his great skill in the Greek and Latin tongues, and his piety and modesty (109). Bale (110) assures us, that he was so well skilled in the writings of Pagan authors, that he had scarce an equal in that age, and that he learned Natural Philosophy and Mathematicks from the purest sources, the antient Greek and Latin writers themselves. He had so solid a knowledge of the mysteries and principles of the Christian Faith, considering the corruptions of the age in which he lived, that he was esteemed by many persons even superior to Gregory the Great himself, on account of his accurate skill in the Greek and Latin languages, but he certainly surpassed him in eloquence and copiousness of his stile. And I wish, says Bale, he had done so in the purity of his sentiments. In short, that there is scarce any thing in all antiquity worthy to be read, which is not to be found in Beda, though he travelled not out of his own country; and that if he had flourished in the times of St Augustin, Jerome, or Chrysostom, he would undoubtedly have equalled them, since even in the midst of a superstitious age he wrote so many excellent treatises; however he owns, that he cannot be acquitted of some errors, since he mentions several ridiculous stories as real facts in his History, from the too great regard which he paid to the Monks and the dialogues of Gregory. Pits (111) tells us, that he was so well versed in the several branches of learning, that Europe scarce ever produced a greater scholar in all respects. That even while he was living, his writings were of so great authority, that it was ordered by a Council held in England, and approved afterwards by the Catholick Church, that they should be publickly read in the churches. That he was remarkable from his earliest years for his piety and love of learning, and went always from prayers to his studies, and from his studies to prayers; so that his intense application furnished him with a compleat knowledge of Poetry, Rhetorick, Natural Philosophy, Metaphysics, Astronomy, Arithmetick, Musick, Geometry, Cosmography, Chronology, History, and the whole circle of the Liberal Arts, and all parts of Mathematicks, Philosophy, and Divinity; so that Pits is really of opinion, that the Christian world in that age, which was distinguished, says he, by a very great number of learned men, produced few comparable to him, and not one superior, as appears evidently from the testimony of several Historians, and the excellent books which he wrote in all parts of learning. Fuller, a fanciful writer, has left us two accounts of Beda; we will cite the most remarkable and singular of them, which, if it does not inform, will at least divert the reader. Thus it runs (112). ' Bede, and (because some nations measure the worth of the person by the length of the name) take his addition Venerable! He was born at Girwy (now called Jarrow) in this Bishoprick, bred under St John of Beverly, and afterwards a Monk in the town of his nativity. He was the most general scholar of that age. Let a Sophister begin with his Axioms, a Bachelor of Arts proceed to his Metaphysics, a Master to his Mathematicks, and a Divine conclude with his controversies and comments on Scripture, and they shall find him better in all, than any Christian writer in that age, in any of those arts and sciences. He expounded almost all the Bible, translated the Psalms and New Testament into English, and lived a comment on those words of the Apostle, Shining as a light in the world, in the midst of a crooked and perverse generation. He was no gadder abroad; credible authors avouching, that he never went out of his cell, though both Cambridge and Rome pretended to his habitation; yet his corpse after his death, which happened anno 734, took a journey, or rather was removed, to Durham, and there enshrined.' Hollinshed, Stowe, Speed, and the rest of our general Histories, treat his memory very respectfully.

time. On the other hand, there are some who blame him for giving into many singular opinions, and others are no less offended with his want of accuracy, and writing from very indifferent memoirs. We think ourselves obliged to report these exceptions to his character, with the same fidelity that we have shown, in repeating the praises that have been bestowed upon him, that the reader may be the better able to form a true opinion of his worth (i) [N]. But to perform this more effectually, and with the strictest regard

[N] The reader may be the better able to form a true opinion of his worth. Whoever considers the difference of their tempers, and the still greater difference between the times in which they wrote, will not be much surprized to find that Beda is not highly in favour with the famous Milton, who, after transcribing from him what appeared most valuable and fittest for his purpose, when he comes to the year 731, where Beda's History ends, he gives us this account of it (112).

(112) Milton's Works, Vol. II. p. 69, 70.

' In which peaceful state of the land, many in Northumberland, both Nobles and Commons, laying aside the exercise of arms, betook them to the cloyster, and not content so to do at home, many in the days of Ina, Clerks and Laics, men and women, halting to Rome in herds, thought themselves no where sure in eternal life 'till they were cloystered there. Thus representing the state of things in this island, Beda surceased to write, out of whom chiefly has been gathered, since the Saxons arrival, such as hath been delivered, a scattered story picked out here and there, with some trouble and tedious works, from his many Legends of Visions and Miracles; towards the latter end, so bare of civil matters, as what can be thence collected, may seem a Calendar rather than a History, taken up for the most part with succession of Kings, computation of years; yet those hard to be reconciled with the Saxon Annals. Their actions we read of were most commonly wars, but for what cause waged, or by what councils carried on, no care was had to let us know; whereby their strength and violence we understand, of their wisdom, reason, or justice, little or nothing; the rest superstition and monastical affectation; Kings one after another, leaving their kingly charge to run their heads fondly into a Monk's cowl, which leaves us uncertain whether Beda was wanting to his matter, or his matter to him. Yet from hence, to the Danish invasion, it will be worse with us, destitute of Beda. If this account of his most famous work attacks the character of Beda as an Historian, we shall find that

M. Du Pin (114), a famous French author, has censured almost all his writings in the lump; and though he throws in some slight commendations, yet it is very easy to perceive that he does it only with a view to defend himself from the imputation of treating with much freedom, one, whose name 'till then had been reputed Venerable. He tells us, that his stile is clear and easy, but without any purity, eloquence, or sublimity; that he wrote with a prodigious facility, but without art or reflection; and that he was a greater master of learning than of judgment, or a true critical taste: That he has collected whatever he could meet with, without any considerable choice or accuracy: That his Commentaries upon the Scriptures are only extracts from those of the Fathers, which he has connected together; and that his History is exact enough with regard to what happened in his own time, or just before it; but in other parts, he is not to be depended upon, since he made use of erroneous memoirs. In short, that what he has done in prophane Literature, is not very profound or exact, though his knowledge was considerable for the time in which he lived. There is another French writer, who, that he might deliver himself with greater freedom in respect to the characters both of dead and living authors, thought fit to conceal himself under the name of M. de Vigneul-Marville. Amongst others who have felt the strokes of his pen, Beda has not escapéd; and that the reader may see what drew upon him the distaste of this author, we shall translate the passage which concerns him, so as to give the author's sense in his own words (115).

(115) Mélanges d'Histoire & de Littérature, Paris 1725, 12mo, Tom. III. p. 283, 284, 285.

' As we do not pretend to give a dictionary, we shall not repeat here either the Life or the History of Beda, which may be found elsewhere, but shall be content with collecting some circumstances relating to him, that are not so well known. Beda had some particular sentiments which have found but few partizans. He thought, for instance, that Joseph

' the husband of the virgin Mary was a farrier, contrary to the common opinion. When he speaks of the Magi, or wise men, who went to worship our Saviour, he is very particular in the account of their names, age, and description, and the offerings which each of them made to Christ. He tells us, that Melchior was old, and had grey hair, with a long beard, and that it was he who offered gold to our Saviour, in acknowledgment of his sovereignty; that Gaspar, the second of the Magi, was young and had no beard, and that it was he who offered frankincense, in order to recognize the divinity of our Lord; and that Balthazar, the third, was of a dark complexion, and had a large beard, and offered myrrh to our Saviour's humanity. He is likewise very circumstantial in the description of their dresses. Perhaps this account of our author's gave occasion to the pictures which represent that subject, or was taken from them. Father Pezron, who has taken such pains, after Isaac Vossius and Father Morin, to support the chronology of the Septuagint, which represents the world about two thousand years older than the common account, tells us, that our author was the first who endeavoured, in the Western Church, to maintain the shorter calculation of the Hebrew text; whereas, before him, that Church, as well as the Eastern, had embraced the Chronology of Eusebius, which reckons 5199 years before Christ, especially after the time that St Jerome had translated the Chronicon of that celebrated writer. Archbishop Usher, in his Sacred Chronology, observes, that Beda was considered as an Heretick, on account of this innovation, or, which is equivalent to it, because he ventured to assert, that our Saviour did not appear in the flesh, in the sixth millenary of the world. However his computation was received afterwards, and scarce any other was admitted in the West, till the three learned men abovementioned, appeared in defence of the contrary opinion. We shall, in the succeeding note, shew, that as great men, and as good judges as any of these, entertained a different opinion of our author and his writings. But, in the mean time, it may not be amiss to hint to the reader's consideration, a few remarks upon these criticisms, in the order in which we have placed them. As to Milton, he blames Beda's History for faults, to which the first Histories of every country must be always liable, and from which, therefore, there was no reason to expect that his should be exempt. The errors he condemns in him, are not so much his, as those of the age in which he lived, and which, the circumstances of his life considered, it was impossible for him to avoid. That there was so little of Civil History in Beda's book, was indeed a misfortune to Milton, but no fault in the author, who proposed to write an Ecclesiastical History, without any mixture of the Civil, farther than was requisite to make it understood; so that he is censured, not for writing amiss upon his own plan, which certainly did not require an account of the motives and causes of wars, and other political transactions; but because his work was not so agreeable to Milton's plan, as he could have wished it. Yet at parting, he expresses a concern for the loss of so good a guide, as he very well might, for if we make the just allowances to Beda, which ought to be made from the circumstances under which he wrote, he may be very truly stiled, one of the best and most faithful of our ancient historians. Du Pin censures him a little unjustly, for want of considering what his aim was in those writings, with which he finds so many faults. He says that Beda's Commentaries were little better than collections from the Fathers; but the truth is, that Beda intended them for nothing better, and Du Pin himself admits, that the ancient Fathers were more happy in their explanations of the Scriptures, than the writers of those times; so that in making these collections, Beda, upon his own principles, must be allowed to have shewn a critical taste, for the want of

to justice, we find it likewise requisite to observe, that some of the greatest and ablest men of the last and of the present age, have entertained a very high opinion of his learning, judgment, and exactness, as well as of his piety, great regard for true religion, and having had very just notions, as to several of those points which are now controverted between Papists and Protestants (k), and who therefore look upon the collecting and publishing his works, as a thing equally honourable for this nation, useful to the learned world, and advantageous to the Christian faith (l). So that if we esteem the memory of Venerable Bede, in some measure unfortunate, from the number of censurers he has found among the moderns; we must at the same time allow, that there have not been wanting men of equal abilities, and equal reputation, who have vindicated his writings, and supported his right to that fame, which he has so long enjoyed, and which, if their arguments have any weight, will still remain very little diminished, if not absolutely entire (m) [O].

of which, however, he is by this very writer condemned. As for the faults in his style, they will not appear very great, if compared with contemporary writers, and to compare him with others is unjust. The greatest admirers of Bede, do not pretend to set him upon a level in point of style, method, or literature, with the great men of the last century, who, as they had many advantages over him in point of education, might well surpass him in most parts of learning; but the admirers of Bede say, that considering the situation of this country at that time, and the low estate of letters therein, it was amazing that this man should make so great a progress in the languages and sciences, and write so great a number of books upon such different subjects, before he was threescore. Even supposing they are not so correctly written as is usual in our times, since the critics have exercised their trade, and thereby introduced a kind of reformation in learning. But it is a little singular, to hear a French writer complain of Bede's writing from erroneous memoirs. It may be so, but how came he to know it? We shall in the next note shew, that the greatest masters in English History, men of probity, candour, and capacity, knew nothing of this, and Milton himself confesses, that he travelled with much worse guides after he parted with Bede. The last of these critics was a Carthusian Monk, Dom Bonaventure d'Argonne, who took the Nomme de Guerre of Vigneul-Marville (116), to prevent being called to an account, for what he thought fit to publish in his Miscellanies. The very account he gives of Bede shews, he understood very little of his subject. He takes it for granted, that King Sigebert erected the university of Cambridge, which is alone sufficient to shew, how indifferent a judge he must prove of Bede's historical Writings (117). He blames our author for the singularity of his opinions, and yet in the singularity of his own opinions, consists the chief merit of his book. He criticises some passages in our author's Writings, without quoting them, which is indeed his method, but very unfair, and which no writer of that kind ever used but himself. Yet we may safely affirm, that these singular opinions, for which he censures him, were not Bede's, but copied by him from other books; so that his objection falls to the ground with respect to Bede, whatever becomes of the notions that he labours to expose. As to what he says of Bede's being the first who declared in favour of the Hebrew Chronology; it is indeed a proof of his being singular in his opinions, but it is a proof at the same time, of his great learning, penetration, and good sense. If he had ever looked into our author's epistle to Plegwin, he would have found, that he discourtes there in support of his own opinion, with as much learning, penetration, and critical skill, as any of the moderns, and gives very just reasons why he had taken so much pains upon this head. He says that it gave him great concern, and in some measure moved his indignation; when he heard the common people continually asking, When the world would be at an end? or, When the last day was to come? which demands he shews plainly, were founded upon the mistaken opinion of the time of Christ's coming, which therefore he endeavoured to explode, and in the close of his epistle, he is so far from taking any merit to himself from his discoveries upon this subject, that he very fairly and candidly confesses, that he had delivered no more than was consistent with the Hebrew verity, explained by Origen, published by Jerome, commended by Augustin, and confirmed by Josephus, than whom, in such matters, he professes he knew none more learned; at the same time he passes a very just censure upon Eusebius, and recommends the study of the Hebrew tongue, as the most effectual means of coming at the true sense of the Scriptures (118). Whoever considers this attentively, and at the same time reflects on the number of great men, who, in all succeeding ages, have acquiesced in, and defended, Bede's opinions in this respect, not indeed upon his authority, but upon the same authorities which induced him to publish it, against the common sentiment in his time, will feel just reason to entertain a better opinion of our author's learning, judgment, and capacity, than from the accounts given of him by these critics, who very plainly shew, that they had more regard for their own reputation, than for those of other men; for though it becomes such writers to deal freely and justly with the authors they mention, yet it is surely their duty, not to censure without evidence, or condemn upon slight grounds.

[O] Very little diminished, if not absolutely entire. We are in this note to produce the authorities in favour of Bede; and first, with regard to his History, we will not have recourse to Church-writers, however eminent, because they may possibly be esteemed some way prejudiced in his favour; but to such judges of our antiquities, whose very names are never mentioned but with reverence. As for instance, the famous Camden, who knew as well as any man the merit of our ancient Historians, and the contents of their writings speaks, of Bede thus (119). 'In this monastery of St Peter, Bede, the singular light of our England, who by his piety and learning justly obtained the surname of Venerable, spent his days, as himself tells us, in meditating on the Scriptures, and, in the midst of a barbarous age, wrote many learned works.' In the same learned work he frequently cites Bede, and never without paying the utmost regard to his authority. In another work of his he has these words (120). 'The reverend Bede, whom we may more easily admire than sufficiently praise, for his profound learning in a most barbarous age, when he was in the pangs of death, said to the standers-by, I have so lived among you, that I am not ashamed of my life; neither fear I to dye, because I have a most gracious Redeemer.'

The famous Mr Bolton, author of that learned piece of British History, intitled, NERO CÆSAR, gives us this character of our author (121). 'Indifferency and even dealing are the glory of Historians, which rule Venerable Bede reputed so sacred and inviolable, that albeit he much detested the opinion of Aidan, the Scot, according to which he celebrated the high feast of Easter, otherwise than that church did, whereof Bede was a member, within exact obedience; nevertheless he durst not as an Historian, but with all candour and freedom possible, deliver Aidan's praises; yea he makes profession, that he did not only detest him as a Quartodeciman; though he were not a Judaizing Quartodeciman (for that he kept Easter in honour of Christ's resurrection upon the next Sunday after the fourteenth day of the Moon, and not indifferently upon the next day of the week, what day soever it was). But he did also write of purpose against Aidan's opinion therein, as himself professeth, citing Aidan's own books. Bede nevertheless, coming by the order and necessity of this talk to memorize the truth of things, his closing words, full of faintly gravity and sincere conscience, are, (122); These things I have wrote concerning the person and actions of the man before-mentioned, not in

It may appear somewhat strange, that hitherto in treating the history of Bede, I have taken no notice at all of his being of the order of St Benedict, which is indeed a point, I find myself obliged to clear up before I leave it. It must be confessed, that many great and learned men, from whom I can scarce take the liberty to differ, are very clear in this point, and make no kind of scruple of calling Beda a Benedictine (n). Upon what grounds they do this, the reader may in some measure satisfy himself from Reynerus, who has written expressly, and with much labour and learning on the subject (o). But I must confess he does not quite satisfy me. Our author himself seems to have been the most capable of setting us right on this head, and his absolute silence makes one suspect, that the fact is not so clear as these writers would make it, for had it been so, one can scarce doubt that in some or other of his works, Venerable Bede would have told us he lived under the rule of St Bennet. St Gregory the Great approved the rule of St Benedict about 595, and in succeeding times there is no doubt to be made, that (except Carlisle) all our cathedral priories, and most of the rich abbies in the kingdom, were of this Rule, which has given the stronger colour and appearance of truth, to what is delivered by the great favourers of this religious order (p). It is very certain that we had Monks in Britain, not only before the establishment of St Benedict's rule, but even before he was born. Yet I think this does not much affect the present argument, for we are not concerned

' the least commending or approving what he thought about the observation of Easter, in which he was mistaken, &c. but as a faithful Historian, simply describing whatever was done by him, or by his means, and praising in his actions whatever appears praiseworthy, &c. According to which rule he doth sincerely discharge his duty, commending Aidan not only for learning and eloquence, (which are common as well to the good as bad) but for his charity, peacefulness, humility, for a mind which neither wrath nor covetousness could overcome, and for many other qualities characteristic and proper to a most worthy man; and finally, (which is a principal point of equanimity) he doth diligently extenuate and allay the ill conceit which might be conceived against Aidan, for his doctrine and practice in that article, but doth not in no sort extenuate his praises; concluding with one of the fullest that perhaps we shall find of any Saint in the world, which is (123), ' That he omitted nothing that he knew from the writings of the Evangelists, Apostles, or Prophets, was to be done, but endeavoured to fulfil all things to the utmost of his power.' To these we might add the many testimonies in his favour in the works of the learned Selden (124), as well as the commendations bestowed on him by that great Antiquarian, Sir Henry Spelman (125), and which might alone establish his reputation; and the character given him by the most learned Stillingfleet (126), if what we have already done were not more than sufficient; for if those writers last-mentioned have not authority to fix the credit of any writer of our History, it will be in vain for us to look farther, or to hope to succeed by the addition of a multitude of names less known, and less considered. I shall oppose to the two French writers, two of their own countrymen, who without offence, I may have leave to say were much greater men than themselves, and indeed not at all inferior to any their nation has produced, either in the last age, or in the present. The first of these is M. Colomes, better known to the world by his Latin name of Colomesius, a clergyman of the Church of England, and keeper of the library at Lambeth, who expresses himself thus (127). ' I have wondered more than once, that as there are so many manuscript treatises of Beda's to be found in England, why hitherto no Englishman, who must be much more capable of doing justice to his countryman than any stranger, has never taken the pains to publish them.' He then, for the common benefit of the republick of letters, gives his reader various notices, of what he thought might be useful in case such a design should ever be undertaken; from whence it appears, that he thought every fragment of Beda's valuable, and that it would be an injury to the learned world, if so much as a single line of his should be lost; which argues a better opinion of our author than was entertained by M. Du Pin, who does not appear at all better versed in our Venerable Beda's writings, or to have considered them with greater attention. The other French writer I shall produce is Mabillon, whose learning, judgment, and diligence, have made him known and esteemed; whose modesty, candour, and plain-dealing, have rendered him admired and beloved by the whole republick of letters. But I shall not quote his elogy of Bede, for in that he might be supposed either to have some prepossession in favour of his author, or his order; but a practical treatise of his, written for the use of the young Benedictines of his own society, in which we may be sure he spoke his mind, and nothing more or less than his real sentiments (128). ' The Monks, says he, that were sent by St Gregory into England, built monasteries there for the cultivating virtue and learning at the same time. It was in that of St Peter at Canterbury, that Benedict Bishop, became acquainted with the monastick discipline, which he afterwards established in the two monasteries which he founded, where the Venerable Beda made profession of all the sciences, which he taught to his brethren in his monastery, and even to the Seculars in the church of York. St Adelme and many others followed his example.' He proceeds afterwards to shew how this discipline and learning spread over the whole kingdom; from whence, as he observes, it was transported into Germany by St Boniface, and thence again to the most distant countries; such were the consequences of Beda's learning and great application in the judgment of one who knew so well what he said. But in another part of the same work, he explains himself more fully as to the conduct of Venerable Bede (129). ' It signifies nothing, says he, to say that Monks are not designed to teach others, but to weep and lead a life of continual penitence. The principal end of their study does indeed terminate solely in their proper utility, and their particular advancement; and if it so happens, that the Church and Divine Providence engages them to instruct others, that is by no means the great end they ought to propose in their study, but that of instructing themselves, of edifying themselves, and obtaining to themselves the knowledge of heavenly truth, that they may be the more capable of sustaining the difficulties of a religious life, and of profiting by its advantages. We have an illustrious example in Venerable Bede, amongst many others, who applied more to all sorts of studies, and even to the teaching of others, than he? Yet who was more closely attached to the exercises of piety and religion than he? To see him pray, it seemed as if he had left no time to study, to behold the number of his books and writings, would incline us to believe he did nothing else; for notwithstanding he was continually employed in study, and the care of teaching his brethren, and even the Seculars, he was nevertheless most exact in discharging the duties of his religious profession, inasmuch, as he says himself, that amongst the distractions and hindrances, or rather among the employments, of a religious state and divine offices (130); Inter observantias disciplina regularis et quotidianam in Ecclesia cantandi curam; or as he elsewhere expresses himself (131), Innumera monasticae servitutis retinacula, he placed his whole delight in studying, in teaching others, or in writing, Semper aut discere, aut docere, aut scribere, dulce habui. Would to God our monasteries were full of such men of letters!

about the British Monks, of whom Beda himself gives us a large account (g), but with the English Monks, or rather Saxon Monks, who were brought in and settled by St Austin, the great converter of this nation. But in regard to the rule of St Bennet, we are told, and told with great confidence too, that it was introduced by St Wilfrid about 666 (r), but if this had been really so, can we possibly imagine that Beda, who wrote his History with so much care, and who is also supposed of the same order, should omit this particular? As for the Bull of Pope Constantine, requiring the Monks of Evesham to conform strictly to this rule in 709, there are many, and some very strong, reasons to suspect that it is absolutely a forgery; but if it were genuine, it would not make much for the antiquity of the Benedictine rule, since it admits it scarce practised in England before that time. It was long after this Bull, that the two monasteries of St Peter and St Paul at Weremouth and Jarrow were founded, and yet Beda himself shews, that Benedict Bishop had been for some time abroad, had taken the habit in a foreign abbey, and brought over some kind of orders and regulations; but that these were not the rule of St Bennet in it's full extent, we may be sure, because, if it had, Beda would certainly have said so (s) [P]. Yet if, after all, nothing farther were expected, than that we should admit Benedict Bishop (for that was his cognomen) brought some kind of regulation from France, which was taken from the rule of St Bennet, and that these monasteries should be from thence reckoned in some measure Benedictine; I do not see how or why it should be denied. But in a stronger or stricter sense than this, it never can be admitted. For in the general, and as far as we can see, in the first regulation of the English Monks, by Archbishop Cuthbert, at Clovesho in 647, there is nothing said of St Benedict or his rule, which would have been impossible, if that rule, in it's full extent, and under it's founder's name, had ever been introduced here (t). By those constitutions at Clovesho the Monks undoubtedly governed themselves, till harassed, dispersed, and in a manner extirpated by the Danes, who, except Glaftenbury and Abingdon, scarce left a convent of Monks in the kingdom, which was the case in the days of Ælfred the Great (u). But it may be demanded, if this was so, how came Weremouth and Jarrow to become cells of the Benedictine monastery at Durham? and indeed the answer to this question, brings the whole affair to a natural and satisfactory conclusion. The secular Canons were turned into Benedictine Monks by William de Carlepho, Bishop of Durham, in the eighteenth of William the Conqueror (w), and these two small monasteries being, from the reviving the monastick state by St Dunstan, occupied by black Monks, they were put under the jurisdiction of the great Benedictine abbey of Durham (x), whence the opinion grew, that as Beda was a Monk at Jarrow, he was consequently a Benedictine.

[P] Because if it had, Beda would certainly said so. This argument is so much the stronger, because the History left by Beda of the foundation of these two monasteries is very large and full; containing every circumstance that has the least relation to the erecting, endowing, and settling those religious houses. The dates likewise are very exact, so that it clearly appears that Benedict, after his return from Rome with a vast provision of all things necessary for the furnishing a convent, obtained a Grant from King Egfred, in the fourth year of his reign, and in the year of Christ 674 (132). He then considered the time this monastery of his would require before it was finished, and computed that it would be four years. He went next over to France, from whence he brought Masons who were able to build after the Roman manner; and when he saw the work pretty far advanced, he sent agents thither to bring over people who could make glass; and Beda observes, that these people not only furnished whatever was wanting for this monastery, but likewise instructed the English, and so brought the art of glass-making, which was till then unknown, into this island. Whatever he wanted, and could not obtain in France, he sent for into other countries, and particularly to Rome; so that when the house was finished, he found himself much better provided with every thing necessary for a monastery, than when he had first propounded the building of one to King Egfred; and in this respect Beda is very particular in shewing us what the nature of these provisions were, whence this point with relation to the rule of St Benedict seems to be absolutely cleared up, that is to say, it is manifest they had heard nothing of it, and consequently could not think themselves bound to obey it; in proof of which we will here set down Beda's own words (133). 'In the first place, says he, he brought with him an innumerable quantity of books of all kinds. Secondly, He drew together, by the favour of many of the English churches, a vast store of relics of the Apostles and Martyrs of Christ. Thirdly, He brought into and established in his monastery, the order of chanting and psalm-singing after the manner of the Roman Church; for he desired; and obtained from Pope Agatho, John, Abbot of the monastery of St Martin, and arch-chantor of the church of the blessed apostle St Peter, and brought him over with him to be the teacher and instructor of the British monasteries; who coming hither, not only taught them the Roman methods of performing divine service viva voce, but also left several writings on this subject, which are still preserved in the library of the monastery. Fourthly, Benedict obtained from the same venerable Pope, by the consent and desire, and even at the request, of King Egfred, a privilege or exemption of the said monastery. And fifthly, He brought pictures and images of the Saints for adorning the walls of the church, that even such as were ignorant of letters might not be able to turn their eyes on any side, without drawing some instruction from what they saw.' This is Beda's account of the matter, which agrees exactly with what he says in another place of this John, Abbot of St Martin (134), who brought with him the acts of a Synod held some time before at Rome, and was instructed to enquire into the faith of the English churches, of which he carried over ample testimonials; and dying in his journey back to Rome, was buried in the church of the abbey of St Martin at Tours. But neither in the former or the latter passages is there one word of his bringing the rule of St Benedict into this kingdom; and had it been known and observed here before, there had certainly been no occasion for his coming at all. It is indeed true, that some of the most learned writers of the Church of Rome, have produced many probable and plausible arguments in favour of the contrary opinion; but in answer to these positive facts they have hitherto said nothing, or at least nothing that can give a reasonable and unprejudiced person satisfaction (135). Thus we have given the reader, in as narrow a compass as it was possible, the History of Venerable Beda and his writings; and, as far as we were able, have set the disputes that have been raised about them in a clear light, so as to make whatever relates to this famous Light of the English Church perfectly intelligible. family, and born some time in the year 1570 (a), at Black Notley in Essex, and being a younger son, was by his father designed for the Church. It was with this view, that he was sent to Emanuel-college in Cambridge, where he was placed under the care of Dr Chadderton, who was for many years head of that house (b), where he made great progress in his studies, and went early into Holy Orders, which he received from the Suffragan Bishop of Colchester, who valued himself very much afterwards upon that head (c). In 1593 he was chosen Fellow of his college, and in 1599, took his degree of Bachelor in Divinity (d). He removed from the university to St Edmundsbury, in Suffolk, where he had a church, and by an assiduous application to the duties of his function, came to be much taken notice of by many gentlemen who lived near that place. He continued there for some years, till an opportunity offered of his going with Sir Henry Wotton, whom King James had appointed his Ambassador to the State of Venice, which was about the year 1604, and thither Mr Bedell attended him as his Chaplain (e). While he resided in that city, he became intimately acquainted with the famous Father Paul Sarpi, Divine to the State, who took him into his entire confidence, taught him the Italian language, of which he became a perfect master, and translated into that tongue the English Common-Prayer Book, which was extremely well received by many of the clergy there, especially by the seven Divines appointed by the Republick to preach against the Pope, during the time of the Interdict, and which they intended for their model, in case they had broke absolutely with Rome, which was what they sincerely desired (f). In return for the favours he received from Father Paul, Mr Bedell drew up an English Grammar for his use, and in many other respects assisted him in his studies. He continued eight years in Venice, during which time, he greatly improved himself in the Hebrew language, by the assistance of the famous Rabbi Leo, who taught him the Jewish pronunciation, and other parts of Rabbinical learning, and by his means it was that he purchased a very fair manuscript of the Old Testament, which he bequeathed, as a mark of respect, to Emanuel-college, and which, it is said, cost him it's weight in silver (g). He became acquainted there likewise, with the celebrated Antonio de Dominis, Archbishop of Spalata, who was so well pleased with his conversation, that he communicated to him his secret, and shewed him his famous book de Republica Ecclesiastica, which he afterwards printed at London (h). Bedell took the freedom which he allowed him, and corrected many misapplications of texts of Scripture, and quotations of Fathers, for that Prelate being utterly ignorant of the Greek tongue, could not but be guilty of many mistakes, both in the one and the other, and if there remain some places still, that discover his ignorance of that language too plainly, yet there had been many more, if Bedell had not corrected them. But no wonder, if, in such a multitude, some escaped his diligence. De Dominis took all this in good part from him, and entered into such familiarity with him, and found his assistance so useful, and indeed so necessary to himself, that he used to say, He could do nothing without him (i). At Mr Bedell's departure from Venice, Father Paul expressed great concern, and assured him, that himself and many others would most willingly have accompanied him, if it had been in their power. He likewise gave him his picture, a Hebrew Bible without points, a small Hebrew Psalter, in which he wrote some sentences expressing the sincerity of his friendship. He gave him also the manuscript of his famous History of the Council of Trent, with the Histories of the Interdict and Inquisition, all written by himself, with a large collection of letters, which were written to him weekly from Rome, during the dispute between the Jesuits and Dominicans, concerning the efficacy of Grace, which it is supposed are lost (k). Such were the testimonies he brought home of his wife conduct in Italy [A]. Upon his returning

[A] Such were the testimonies he brought home of his wife conduct in Italy.] We stand indebted for the principal passages in the text to the life of this excellent person, written by the late Bishop Burnet, who had his materials from one Mr Clogy who had been minister at Cavan, and lived long in Bishop Bedell's family (1); and it must be owned they have lost nothing by the Bishop of Salisbury's putting them together, who was certainly as happy in this way of writing as any one who ever practised it in our language. The account he gives us, of Mr Bedell's manner of living while at Venice, is very curious, as well as very entertaining. He happened to reside there at a very critical season, when the Republick lay under the Interdict of Pope Paul V, for making some laws in the nature of our statutes of mortmain, and for punishing two lewd Friars (2). This Interdict however was obeyed by none but the Jesuits, Capuchins, and Theatines, who were banished the State for that reason. The rest of the Clergy were kept firm to the interest of their country, by Father Paul and the Divines who assisted him, and who would have been glad if this quarrel had been pushed to extremities, that they might have had an opportunity of quitting a Church, to the corruptions of which they were no strangers (3). How this design was defeated, and this quarrel ended, the reader may learn in another article, to which it more properly belongs; at present we are to confine ourselves to what particularly relates to Mr Bedell, whose intimacy with Father Paul was so great, and his credit with him so well established, that after an attempt made to assassinate that worthy person, when the Republick assigned him a guard, and ordered that nobody should be admitted to speak with him, till they had undergone a strict examination, Mr Bedell alone was excepted, and was admitted with the same freedom as before, whenever he thought fit. If we consider the character and condition of Father Paul at that time, upon whose pen the State depended, much more than upon her own power, this will appear very extraordinary (4). But besides this, a passage fell out during the Interdict, that made greater noise than perhaps the importance of it could well amount to, but it was suited to the Italian genius. There came a Jesuit to Venice, Thomas Maria Caraffa, who printed a thousand Theses of Philosophy and Divinity, which he dedicated to the Pope, with turning to England, he immediately retired to his charge at St Edmundsbury, without aspiring to any preferment, and went on in his ministerial labours. It was here he employed himself in translating the Histories of the Interdict and Inquisition (which he dedicated to the King); as also the two last books of the History of the Council of Trent into Latin, Sir Adam Newton having translated the two first (l). He lived there in a private and obscure condition, until Sir Thomas Jermyn taking notice of his abilities, presented him to the living of Horingheath, A. D. 1615. But he found difficulties in obtaining institution and induction from the Bishop of Norwich, who demanded large fees upon this account. Mr Bedell was so nice in his sentiments of Simony, that he looked upon every payment as such, that exceeded a competent gratification, for the writing, the wax, and the parchment, and refused taking out his title upon other terms, but left the Bishop and went home (m). However, in a few days, the Bishop sent for him, and gave him his title without fees, and he removed to Horingheath, where he continued unnoticed twelve years, although he gave a singular evidence of his great capacity, in a book of controversy with the Church of Rome, which he published and dedicated to King Charles I, then Prince of Wales, in 1624 (n). However neglected he lived in England, yet his fame had reached Ireland, and he was, in 1627, unanimously elected Provost of Trinity-college in Dublin (o). But it was with difficulty he was prevailed on to accept the charge, until the King laid his positive commands on him, which he cheerfully obeyed, and on the sixteenth of August that year, he was sworn Provost. At his first entrance upon this scene, he resolved to act nothing, until he became perfectly acquainted with the statutes of the house, and the tempers of the people whom he was appointed to govern, and therefore carried himself so abstractedly from all affairs, that he passed some time for a soft and weak man, and even Primate Usher began to waver in his opinion of him. When he went for England some few months after, to bring over his family, he had thoughts of resigning his new preferment, and returning to his benefice in Suffolk. But an encouraging letter from Primate Usher put an end to this design. He returned with his family, and applied himself to the government of the college, with a vigour of mind peculiar to him (p). His first business was, to compose divisions among the Fellows, to rectify disorders, and to restore discipline; and as he was a great promoter of religion, he catechised the youth once a week, and divided the Church-Catechism into fifty-two parts, one for every Sunday, and explained it in a way so mixed with speculative and practical matters, that his sermons were looked upon as learned Lectures of Divinity, and excellent exhortations to virtue and piety. He continued about two years in this employment, when, by the interest of Sir Thomas Jermyn, and the application of Laud, Bishop of London, he was advanced to the Sees of Kilmore and Ardagh, and consecrated on the thirteenth of September 1629 (q), at Drogheda, in St Peter's church, by James, Archbishop of Armagh; Robert, Bishop of Down and Conner; Theophilus, Bishop of Dromore; and James, Bishop of Clogher; in the fifty-ninth year of his age. In the letters for his promotion, the King made honourable mention of the satisfaction he took in the services he had done, and the reformation he had wrought in the university (r). Having thus entered on a different course of life, he found his dioceses under vast disorders, the revenues wasted by excessive dilapidations, and all things exposed to sale in so fordid a manner, that it was grown into a proverb, The cathedral of Ardagh, and the Bishop's houses, were all flat to the ground; the parish churches all in ruins; and the insolence of the Popish clergy insufferable; the oppressions of the ecclesiastical courts excessive; and pluralities, and non-residence, shamefully prevailing (s). He had the courage, notwithstanding all the difficulties that lay in his way, to undertake a thorough reformation; and the first step he took was, to recover part of the lands of which his Sees had been despoiled by his predecessors, that he might be in a condition to subsist, while he laboured to reform other abuses. In this he met with such success, as encouraged him to proceed upon his own plan, and to be content with nothing less, than an absolute reformation this extravagant inscription: PAULO V VICE DEO Christianæ Republicæ Monarchæ invictissimo & Pontificæ Omnipotentie conservatori accerrimo. 'To Paul the Vth, the Vice God, the most invincible Monarch of the Christian commonwealth, and the most zealous asserter of the Papal omnipotency.' All people were amazed at the impudence of this title; but when Mr Bedell observed, that the numeral letters of the first words, Paulo V. Vice-Deo, being put together, made exactly 666, the number of the beast in the Revelation, he communicated this to Pope Paul and the seven Divines, and they carried it to the Duke and Senate. It was entertained almost as if it had come from Heaven, and it was publickly preached over all their territories, that here was a certain evidence that the Pope was Antichrist. And it is likely this was promoted by them more, because they found it took with the Italians, than they could build much upon it. The noise that this made over all Italy made the Pope so uneasy, that he was forced to devise one of the strangest fables that was ever heard of to put it out of the peoples heads; for he caused it to be given out, that Antichrist was actually born in Babylon, was descended from the tribe of Dan, and that he was gathering a vast army, with which he intended to come and destroy Christendom; and with this piece of false news, the other conceit, says Bishop Burnet, was choked (5). When Mr Bedell came over, he brought along with him the Archbishop of Spalata, and one Despotine a Phygeian, who could no longer bear with the corruptions of the Roman worship, and so chose a freer air. The latter lived near him in St Edmundsbury, and was by his means introduced into much practice, which he maintained so well, that he became eminent in his profession, and continued to his death to keep up a constant correspondence with our author.

reformation of those, which he esteemed capital and enormous abuses (r) [B]. Upon the coming over of the Lord-Deputy Wentworth, in 1633, his Lordship of Kilmore had the misfortune to fall under his displeasure, for setting his hand to a petition which was for redress, in some respect, of grievances; and so high and open was the Lord-Deputy's testimony of this displeasure, that the Bishop did not think fit to go in person to congratulate him (as others did) upon his entering into his government (u). It is however very improbable, that he should write over to Sir Thomas Jermyn and his friends in England, or procure, by their interest, injunctions to the Lord-Deputy, to receive him into favour, because this suits very ill with the character, either of the men or of the times (w). On the contrary, it appears from his own letter to the Lord-Deputy, that it was he, not the Bishop, who had complained in England; that he meant to justify himself to the Deputy, and expected, on that justification, he should retract his complaints. One may safely affirm, from the perusal of this single epistle, that our Prelate was as thorough a statesman as the Deputy, and that he knew how to become all things to all men, without doing any thing beneath him, or inconsistent with his dignity. This conduct had it's effect, and in three weeks, it appears he stood well with the Deputy (x), and probably without any interposition, but his own letter beforementioned. He then went on cheerfully in doing what he thought was his duty, and for the benefit of the Church, in which he met with an opposition that might have been well expected, and a success much superior to what could have been hoped for (y). His own example did much; he loved the Christian power of a Bishop, without affecting either political authority or pomp; whatever he did was so visibly for the good of his flock, that he seldom failed of being well supported by his clergy, and such as opposed him did it with visible reluctance; for he had the esteem of the good men of all parties, and was as much revered as any Bishop in Ireland (z) [C]. Amongst other extraordinary things he did, there was none more worthy of remembrance, than his removing his Lay-Chancellor, sitting in his own courts, hearing causes, and retrieving thereby the jurisdiction which antiently belonged to a Bishop. The Chancellor upon this filed his bill in equity, and obtained a decree in Chancery against the Bishop, with one hundred pounds costs (a). But by this time, the Chancellor saw so visibly the difference between the Bishop's sitting in that seat and his own, that he never called for his costs, but appointed a Surrogate, with orders to obey the Bishop in every thing, and so his Lordship went on in his own way; such a singular power has a true spirit of religion, untainted

[B] An absolute reformation of those which he esteemed capital and enormous abuses. The first of these he undertook was Pluralities, by which one man had the cure of souls in so many places, that it was impossible to discharge his duty to them all, or to perform those vows made at ordination of feeding and instructing the flock committed to him. To this end he convened his Clergy, and, in a sermon, laid before them, both out of Scripture and Antiquity, the institution, nature, and duties of the ministerial employment, and after sermon discoursed to them upon the same subject in Latin, and exhorted them to reform that intolerable abuse: To prevail on them the better, he told them he resolved to shew them an example in parting with one of his Bishopricks, and accordingly he voluntarily resigned Ardagh in 1633, although he had been at considerable charge in recovering the revenues of it, and although he was able to discharge the duties of both, being contiguous and small, and the revenues not exceeding a competency; it was conferred on Dr Richardfon the same year. The efficacy of his discourse, and the authority of his example, made such an impression on his Clergy, that they almost all freely relinquished their pluralities, which pleased him the more, since he had no authority to compel them to it. The Dean was the only person who did not submit, but he exchanged his Deanery with another, being ashamed to live in a diocese, where he would not submit to such terms as both Bishop and Clergy had agreed to. The next part of his project was to oblige his Clergy to residence, and this met with great difficulties. King James, upon the reduction of Ulster after Tyrone's rebellion, had assigned glebes to all the Clergy, and had obliged them to build houses thereon after a limited time. But the commissioners appointed to allot these glebes had taken no care of the conveniencies of the Clergy, so that in many places the lands allotted for glebes were not within the parish, and often lay divided in parcels; in consequence of which, if they built houses on these glebes, they would be obliged to live out of their parishes, and it would be inconvenient to have houses remote from their lands. To remedy this, the Bishop, who had lands allotted him in every parish, resolved to make an exchange with them, and to assign them more convenient portions of equal value. To this end he procured a commission from the Government, to some gentlemen to examine and settle the matter, which was brought to a conclusion with the universal satisfaction of the whole Diocese. But a Great Seal being necessary for the determination and confirmation of what was then agreed on, a person was sent over to England to procure it; yet before that could be done the rebellion broke out, which put a stop to this and other good designs (6).

[C] Was as much revered as any Bishop in Ireland. We are warranted in saying this by all the writers of those times, and there is no question to be made that he deserved it. He was as strict in his own behaviour, as in the accounts he took of the conduct of his inferior Clergy. His ordinations were publick and solemn, he preached and gave the Sacrament on such occasions himself. He never gave Priests orders till a year after a man had been made Deacon, that he might know how he had demeaned himself in that time. He wrote certificates of ordination and other instruments with his own hand, and suffered none who received them either to pay fees, or to give any thing to his servants. When he had brought things to a fit temper, and saw that his Clergy were very willing to assist him in the great work of reformation, he convened a Synod in September 1638, in which he made many excellent canons that are still extant, and will always do honour to his memory (7). Offence was taken at this by some who were in power, and who perhaps were jealous of his great abilities. They questioned the legality of the meeting, and some talk there was of calling him in question for it, either in the Star-Chamber or High-commissioned Court; but his Archdeacon, Thomas Price, who was afterwards Archbishop of Cashel, gave such an account of the matter as satisfied the State. The famous Primate Usher gave a fine picture of the man upon this occasion; for, when some were very earnest for sending for him up to answer for himself, the Primate said very calmly, You had better let him alone, for fear, if he should be provoked, he should say much more for himself than any of his accusers can say against him. This had it's effect, and those who were weak enough to make the complaint, were so wise as not to call him to an answer (8).

untainted with secular views (b)! Our Bishop was no persecutor of Papists, and yet the most successful enemy they ever had; and if the other Bishops had followed his example, the Protestant religion must have spread itself through every part of the country. He laboured to convert the better sort of the Popish clergy, and in this he had great success. He procured the Common-Prayer which had been translated into Irish, and caused it to be read in his cathedral, in his own presence, every Sunday; having himself learned that language perfectly, though he never attempted to speak it (c). The New Testament had been also translated by William Daniel, Archbishop of Tuam, but our Prelate first procured the Old Testament to be translated by one King, and because the translator was ignorant of the original tongues, and did it from the English, the Bishop himself revised and compared it with the Hebrew, and the best translations (d). He caused likewise some of Chrysostome's and Leo's Homilies, in commendation of the Scriptures, to be rendered both into English and Irish, that the common people might see, that in the opinion of the ancient Fathers, they had not only a right to read the Scriptures as well as the clergy, but that it was their duty so to do (e). He met with great opposition in this work, from a persecution against the translator, raised without reason, and carried on with much passion by those, from whom he had no cause to expect it. But this did not hinder his persisting in his design; he supported Mr King as far as he was able (f), and he got the translation finished, which he would have printed in his own house, and at his own charge, if the troubles in Ireland had not prevented it; and as it was, his labours were not useless, for the translation escaped the hands of the rebels, and was afterwards printed at the expence of Robert Boyle, a man born for the good of his country and of mankind (g). The Bishop was very moderate in his sentiments, and in his methods of enforcing them; he loved to bring men into the communion of the Church of England, but he did not like compelling them; and it was his opinion, that Protestants would agree well enough, if they could be brought to understand each other. These principles induced him to promote Mr Drury's design, of endeavouring to reconcile the Lutherans to the Calvinists, a project which had been encouraged by many other worthy persons, and towards which he subscribed twenty pounds a year, to defray the expences of Mr Drury's negotiations (h). He gave another instance, not only of his charity towards, but his ability in, reconciling those of other communions, to the Churches of England and Ireland. There were some Lutherans at Dublin, who, for not coming to church and taking the sacrament, were cited into the Archbishop's Consistory, upon which they desired time to write to their Divines in Germany, which was given them, and when their answers came, they contained some exceptions to the doctrine of the Church, as not explaining the presence of Christ in the sacrament, suitable to their sentiments; to which Bishop Bedell gave so full and clear, and withal so moderate and charitable an answer, as entirely satisfied their objections, inso-much, that those Divines advised their countrymen to join in communion with the Church, which they accordingly did (i). In this mild and prudent way our Prelate conducted his charge, with great reputation to himself, and with the general approbation of all good men, who were perfectly pleased with the Doctrine he preached, at the same time that they were highly edified by his excellent example [D]. When the barbarous and bloody

Rebellion

[D] That they were highly edified by his excellent example] There was a firmness and consistency in his conduct, which appeared clearly in every thing he did. He went constantly to common-prayer in his cathedral, and often read it himself, and assisted in it always with great reverence and affection (g). He took care to have the publick service performed strictly according to the rubrick; so that a Curate of another parish being employed to read prayers in the cathedral, and adding somewhat to the collects, the Bishop observing he did this once or twice, went from his place to the reader's pew, and took the book out of his hand, and, in the hearing of the congregation, suspended him for his presumption, and read the rest of the office himself. He preached constantly twice on a Sunday in his cathedral, on the Epistles and Gospels for the day, and catechised always in the afternoon before sermon; and he preached always twice a year before the Judges when they made the circuit. His voice was low and mournful, but as his matter was excellent, so there was a gravity in his looks and behaviour that struck his auditors. He observed the rubrick so nicely, that he would do nothing but according to it; so that in reading the psalms and the anthems, he did not observe the common custom of the minister and people reading the verses by turns, for he read all himself, because the other was not enjoined by the rubrick. As for the placing of the communion-table by the east wall, and the bowing to it, he never would depart from the rule of conformity prescribed by the law; for he said, that they were as much Non-conformists who added of their own, as they that came short of what was enjoined, as he that adds an inch to a measure

disowns it for a rule, as much as he that cuts an inch from it; and as he was severe to him that added words of his own to the collect, so he thought it was no less censurable to add rites to those that were prescribed. When he came within the church, it appeared in the composedness of his behaviour, that he observed the rule given by the preacher, of keeping his feet when he went into the house of God; but he was not to be wrought on by the greatness of any man, or by the authority of any person's example, to go out of his own way, though he could not but know that such things were then much observed, and measures were taken of men by these little distinctions, in which it was thought the zeal of conformation discovered itself. He preached very often in his episcopal habit, but not always, and used it seldom in the afternoon; nor did he love the pomp of a choir, nor instrumental music, which he thought filled the ear with too much pleasure, and carried away the mind from the serious attention to the matter, which is indeed the singing with grace in the heart, and the inward melody with which God is chiefly pleased. And when another Bishop justified these things, because they served much to raise the affections; he answered, that in order to the raising the affections, those things that tended to edification ought only to be used, and thought it would be hard otherwise to make stops, for upon the same pretence an infinity of rites might be brought in. And the sense he had of the excesses of superstition, from what he had observed during his long stay in Italy, made him judge it necessary to watch carefully against the beginnings of that disease, which is like a green-sickness in religion.

† He never used the Common-Prayer in his own family,

(g) Life of Bishop Bedell, p. 145.

Rebellion broke out in October 1641, the Bishop did not at first feel the violence of its effects, for even those rebels, who in their conduct testified so little of humanity, professed a great veneration for the Bishop, and openly declared, he should be the last Englishman they would drive out of Ireland (k). His was the only English house in the county of Cavan that was unviolated, notwithstanding that it, and its out-buildings, the church, and the church-yard, were filled with people who fled to him for shelter, whom, by his preaching and prayers, he encouraged to expect and endure the worst with patience. In the mean time, Dr Swiney, the Popish titular Bishop of Kilmore, came to Cavan, and pretended great concern and kindness for Bishop Bedell. Our Prelate had converted his brother, and kept him in his house till he could otherwise provide for him, and Dr Swiney desired likewise to lodge in his house, assuring him, in the strongest terms, of his protection. But this Bishop Bedell declined, in a very civil and well wrote Latin letter, urging, the smallness of his house, the great number of people that had taken shelter with him, the sickness of some of his company, and of his son in particular, but above all, the difference in their ways of worship, which could not but be attended with great inconveniency (l). This had some effect for a time, but about the middle of December, the rebels, pursuant to orders they had received from their Council of State at Kilkenny, required him to dismiss the people that were with him, which he absolutely refused to do, declaring that he would share the same fate with the rest. They signified to him upon this, that they had orders to remove him, to which he answered in the words of David, Here I am, the Lord do unto me as seemeth good to him, the will of the Lord be done: Upon this they seized him, his two sons, and Mr Clogy who had married his step-daughter, and carried them prisoners to the castle of Cloughboughter, surrounded by a deep water, where they put them all, but the Bishop, in irons. They did not suffer any of them to carry any thing with them, and the moment the Bishop was gone, Dr Swiney took possession of his house and all that belonged to it, and said Mass in the church the Sunday following (m). After some time the rebels abated of their severity, took the irons off the prisoners, and suffered them to be as much at their ease as they could be in so wretched a place, for the winter was very rigorous, and the castle being old and ruinous, they would have been exposed to all the severity of the weather, if it had not been for an honest Carpenter who was imprisoned there before them, and who made use of a few old boards he found there, to mend a part of the roof, the better to defend them from the snow and sleet (n). While thus confined, the Bishop, his sons, and Mr Clogy, preached and prayed continually to their small and afflicted congregation, and upon Christmas-day, his Lordship administered the sacrament to them. It is very remarkable, that as rude and barbarous as the Irish were, they gave them no disturbance in the performance of divine service, and often told the Bishop, they had no personal quarrel to him, but that the sole cause of their confining him was, his being an Englishman (o). After being kept in this manner for three weeks, the Bishop, his two sons, and Mr Clogy, were exchanged for two of the O'Rourkes; but though it was agreed that they should be safely conducted to Dublin, yet the rebels would never suffer them to be carried out of the country, but sent them to the house of Dennis Sherridan, an Irish Minister, and convert to the Protestant religion, to which, though he steadily adhered, and relieved many who fled to him for protection, yet the Irish suffered him to live quietly among them, on account of the great family from which he was descended (p). While our Prelate remained there, and enjoyed some degree of health, he every Sunday read the prayers and lessons, and preached himself, though there were three Ministers with him. The last Sunday he officiated was the thirtieth of January, and the day following he was taken ill. On the second day it appeared his disease was an ague, and on the fourth apprehending a speedy change, he called for his sons and his sons wives, spoke to them a considerable time, gave them much spiritual advice, and blessed them (q), after which he spoke little, but slumbered out most of his time, only by intervals he seemed to awake a little, and was then very cheerful. At last, on the seventh of February 1641, about midnight, he breathed his last, in the seventy-first year of his age, his death being chiefly occasioned by his late imprisonment, and the weight of sorrows which lay upon his mind (r). The only care now remaining to his friends was, to see him buried according to his desire, and since that could not be obtained but by the new intruding Bishop's leave, Mr Clogy, and Mr Sherridan went to ask it, and Mr Dillon was prevailed with by his wife, to go and second their desire. They found the Bishop lying in his own vomit, and a sad change in that house, which was before a house of prayer and of good works; but was now a den of thieves for he thought it was intended to be the common worship of Christians in their publick assemblies, and that it was not so proper for private families. He was so exact an observer of Ecclesiastical rules, that he would perform no part of his function out of his own diocese, without obtaining the Ordinary's leave; so that being in Dublin when his wife's daughter was to be married to Mr Clogy, and they both desired to be blessed by him, he would not do it till he first took out a licence for it in the Archbishop of Dublin's Consistory. We may from these instances gather his true notions as to Church power, in which he seems to have been as much in the right as any man of his age, and to have distinguished as acutely about the possession and exercise of it, as it was possible for man to do, and, as we see, his precept and practice went together; and he never did that in another diocese, which he would have taken amidst if another Clergyman had done it in his; so great a friend he was to decency and order in all things.

thieves and a nest of uncleanness. The Bishop, when he was awakened out of his drunkenness, excepted a little to it, and said the church-yard was holy ground, and was no more to be defiled with Hereticks bodies; yet he consented to it at last. So on the ninth of February he was buried, and according to the direction himself had given, next his wife's coffin (s). The Irish did him unusual honours at his burial, for the chief of the rebels gathered their forces together, and with them accompanied his body from Mr Sherridan's house to the church-yard of Kilmore, in great solemnity, and they desired Mr Clogy to bury him according to the office prescribed by the Church. But though the gentlemen were so civil as to offer it, yet it was not thought advisable to provoke the rabble so much, as perhaps that might have done, so it was passed over. But the Irish discharged a volley of shot at his interment, and cried out in Latin, Requiescat in pace ultimus Anglorum, 'May the last of the English rest in peace;' for they had often said, that as they esteemed him the best of the English Bishops, so he should be the last that should be left among them (t). What came from Edmund Farilly, a Popish Priest, at the interment of the Bishop, is too remarkable, and is too well attested, to be passed over, who cried out, O sit anima mea cum Bedello, 'I would to God my soul were with Bedell's (u).' Our Prelate had long before prepared for death, as appears by his will, dated the fifteenth of February 1640, in which there are several legacies, that shew he had recollected all the memorable passages of his life before he made it, and seriously considered the several blessings which God had bestowed upon him (w) [E]. He married a lady of the antient and honourable family of L'Esrange, who was the widow of the Recorder of St Edmundsbury, a woman exemplary in her life, humble and modest in her behaviour, and singular in many excellent qualities, particularly in an extraordinary reverence to him (x). She bore him three sons and a daughter. One of the sons and the daughter died young, only William and Ambrose survived, for whom he made no provision, but a benefice of eighty pounds a year for the eldest and worthy son of such a father; and an estate of sixty pounds a year for the youngest, who did not take to learning. This was the only purchase he made (y). His wife died three years before the rebellion broke out, and he preached her funeral sermon himself, with such a mixture both of tenderness and moderation, that it drew tears from all his auditors. He was an enemy to burying in the church, thinking that there was both superstition and pride in it, and believing it was a great annoyance to the living, to have so much of the steam of dead bodies rising about them. One of the Canons in his Synod was against burying in churches, and he often wished that burying-places were removed out of all towns. He chose the least frequented place of the church-yard of Kilmore for his wife to lie in, and by his will ordered, that he should be placed next to her, with this inscription:

That is,

'The Remains of William, heretofore Bishop of Kilmore.'

It is justly observed by Bishop Burnet, that the word Depositum, cannot, strictly speaking, bear an English translation, because it signifies somewhat given to another in trust; so that Bishop Bedell meant to express thereby, that he considered his burial as committing a trust to the earth, until such time as it should be called upon to give up it's dead (z). Thus lived and died this great and good man, whose behaviour in his publick character did honour to his high office in the Church, and whose private life was perfectly consistent with the doctrine he taught. His actions were such as rendered him beloved and esteemed while he lived, and the report of them will ever secure the highest reverence for his memory.

[E] The several blessings which God had bestowed upon him. This preparation for his death was a very discreet act, and probably was the effect of his great foresight, which shewed him the dangers of the Protestants in Ireland, when few besides conceived of them in that light; and this made him always thoughtful and concerned. It certainly redounds to his honour, that out of his narrow fortune (which in the next note will appear) he should define somewhat to every place unto which he had any relation; a sure sign that he was mindful in his highest fortunes, not of his progress only, but beginnings. To the parish church of Black Notley in Essex, where he was baptized, he bequeathed a bell. To the library of Emanuel-college in Cambridge, where he was educated, and where he had been Scholar and Fellow, he left his Hebrew manuscript Bible, the four Evangelists, and Euclid's Elements in Arabick. To Trinity-college in Dublin, of which he had been Provost, he gave his manuscript Priscian, with four more of his manuscripts. To Primate Usher his manuscript Irish Psalter; and he also bestowed five pounds upon his church of Kilmore, for paving the chancel with hewn stone (10). Besides these legacies, he gave directions in his will about his interment, as the reader will see in the text. It may not be amiss to observe in this place, that the church of Kilmore, mentioned in his will, is a small parish church, contiguous to the episcopal house; for in this Bishoprick, as we are informed by the worthy editor of Sir James Ware's works, there are neither Cathedral, Chapter, Canons, or Prebendaries. We have seen how this Bishop, out of pure conscience, quitted the See of Ardagh, which before his time had been annexed to the See of Kilmore, but after his decease they were united again in favour of Dr Robert Maxwell, our Bishop's successor; but in 1692, upon the deprivation of Bishop Sheridan, they were again divided, Dr Smith being made Bishop of Kilmore, and Dr Burgh of Ardagh; but the latter dying within the year, the Sees were again united, and have continued so ever since (11).

memory [F]. The country, and the times in which he lived, required, above all others, such examples, and the respect paid him by the Irish sufficiently shews, what might have been done amongst them, if all, or the greatest part of the Protestant clergy, had been such as he was; and therefore the diligence of those can scarce be sufficiently commended, who have secured to posterity so ample an account, of so worthy and so excellent a person.

[F] Will ever secure the highest reverence for his memory. It is requisite that the reader should be put in mind, before we come to that copious account, which is still preserved, of his daily behaviour, that it was not taken from common fame and from different persons, at a great distance of time after his decease, for then it might have been looked upon, rather as a picture drawn by such as were strongly affected by the obligations they had to him, or the affection they had for him; but these accounts were drawn up by Mr Clogy, who lived in the Bishop's family, was the companion of all his fortunes, the faithful witness and sincere admirer of all his virtues; one who committed to writing, while fresh in his memory, those things that Bishop Burnet long afterwards published in print, while that gentleman was living, to testify the truth of them, and while many others were also able to vouch the same facts. It was therefore reasonable for him to introduce as he does the character he gives him with this observation, viz. 'That he was one, in whom so many of the greatest characters of a primitive and apostolical Bishop did shew themselves so eminently, that it seemed fit that he should still speak to the world though dead, both for convincing the unjust enemies of that venerable order, and for the instruction of those that succeeded him in it; since great patterns give the easiest notions of eminent virtues, and teach in a way that has much more authority with it, than all speculative discourses can possible have. And as the lives of the primitive Christians are a speaking apology for their religion, as well as a direction to those that grew up, so it is to be hoped that the solemn, though silent language, of so bright an example, will have the desired effect both ways, and then my (12) author will have a noble reward for his labours.' The person whom Bishop Burnet here styles the author, is Mr Clogy, before-mentioned, who, he affirms, had a much greater hand in the work than himself; and this it was the more necessary for him to do, because otherwise the reader could not have told so well, what to think of the numerous particulars contained in the following character, which is indeed long and large, but so curious, and so well put together, that it is impossible it should seem tedious. He was tall and graceful, and had something in his looks and carriage that created a veneration for him. His deportment was grave, without affectation. His apparel decent with simplicity; he wore no silks, but plain stuffs; had a long and broad beard, grey and venerable hair. His strength continued firm to the last, so that the week before his last sickness, he walked as vigorously and nimble as any of the company, and leaped over a broad ditch, inasmuch that his sons, who were amazed at it, had enough to do to follow him. He never used spectacles. By a fall in his childhood he had unhappily contracted a deafness in his left ear. He had great strength and health of body, except that a few years before his death he had some severe fits of the stone, occasioned by his sedentary life, which he bore with wonderful patience. The remedy he used for it was to dig in the garden (in which he much delighted) until he heated himself, and that mitigated the pain. His judgment and memory remained with him to the last. He always preached without notes; but often wrote down his meditations after he had preached them. He shewed no other learning in his sermons but in clearing the difficulties of his text, by comparing the originals with the most antient versions. His style was clear and full, but plain and simple. He read the Hebrew and Septuagint so much, that they were as familiar to him as the English translation. He had gathered a vast heap of critical Expositions, which, with a trunk full of other manuscripts, fell into the hands of the Irish, and were all lost except his great Hebrew manuscript, which was preserved by a converted Irishman, and is now in Emanuel college in Cambridge. Every day after dinner and supper a chapter of the Bible was read at his table, whether Papists or Protestants were present, and Bibles were laid before every one of the company, and before himself either the Hebrew or Greek, but in his last years the Irish translation; and he usually explained the occurring difficulties. He wrote much in controversy, occasioned by his engagements to labour the conversion of those of the Roman communion, which he looked on as idolatrous and antichristian. He wrote a large treatise on these two questions: 'Where was our religion among Luther? And what became of our ancestors who died in Popery?' Archbishop Usher pressed him to have printed it, and he resolved to have done so; but that and all his other works were swallowed up in the Rebellion. He kept a great correspondence not only with the Divines of England, but with others over Europe. He observed a true hospitality in house-keeping; many poor Irish families about him were maintained out of his kitchen; and in Christmas the poor always eat with him at his own table, and he had brought himself to endure both their rags and rudeness. At public tables he usually sat silent. Once at the Earl of Strafford's table, one observed, that while they were all talking he said nothing. The Primate answered, 'Broach him, and you will find good liquor in him.' Upon which the person proposed a question in Divinity, in answering which the Bishop shewed his abilities so well, and puzzled the other so much, that all at last, except the Bishop, fell a laughing at the other. The greatness of his mind, and undauntedness of his spirit, evidently appeared in many passages of his life, and that without any mixture of pride, for he lived with his Clergy as if they had been his brethren. In his visitation he would accept of no invitation from the gentlemen of the country, but would eat with his Clergy in such poor inns, and of such coarse fare, as the places afforded. He avoided all affectation of state in his carriage, and, when in Dublin, always walked on foot, attended by one servant, except on public occasions, which obliged him to ride in procession among his brethren. He never kept a coach, his strength suffering him always to ride on horseback. He avoided the affectation of humility as well as pride, the former often flowing from the greater pride of the two. He took an ingenious device to put him in mind of his obligations to purity: It was a flaming crucible, with this motto, 'Take from me all my Tin,' the word in Hebrew signifying Tin, being Bedil, which imported that he thought every thing in him but base alloy, and therefore prayed God would cleanse him from it. He never thought of changing his See, but considered himself as under a yoke to it that could not easily be dissolved; so that when the translating him to a Bishoprick in England was proposed to him, he refused it; and said, he should be as troublesome a Bishop in England as he had been in Ireland. He had a true and generous notion of religion, and did not look upon it as a system of opinions, or a set of forms, but as a divine discipline that reforms the heart and life. It was not leaves but fruit that he sought. This was the true principle of his great zeal against Popery. He considered the corruptions of that Church as an effectual course to enervate the true design of Christianity. He looked on the obligation of observing the Sabbath as moral and perpetual, and was most exact in the observation it (13).

B E D E R I C (H E N R Y) a celebrated preacher in the XIVth century, was a monk of the order of St Augustin at Clare; and surnamed de Bury, because he was born at St Edmund's-bury in Suffolk (a). Having from his youth shown a quick wit, and a great inclination to learning, his superiors took care to improve those excellent faculties, by sending him not only to our English, but also to foreign, universities: where closely applying himself to his studies, and being a constant disputant, he arrived to such fame, that at Paris he became a Doctor of the Sorbonne (b). Not long after he returned to England, where he was much followed, and extremely admired, for his eloquent way of preaching. This eminent qualification, joined to his remarkable integrity, uprightness, decent behaviour, prudence, and dexterity in the management of affairs, so recommended him to the esteem of the world, that he was chosen Provincial of his order throughout England: in which station he behaved in a very commendable manner. He writ several things [A]. But he is censured by one author [B], for having asserted and maintained, that the virgin Mary was conceived in original sin. He flourished about the year 1380, in the reign of King Richard II.

[B] But he is censured by one author, for having asserted and maintained, that the Virgin Mary was conceived in original sin.] That author's name is Petrus Vincentinus (1). The trifling opinion here mentioned has occasioned very long and warm disputes among those patrons of nonsense, the members of the Church of Rome. The Dominicans, a very considerable Order amongst them, affirmed, That she was conceived in original sin. But the Franciscans, who were more popular, took it into their heads to maintain the contrary (2). The first inventor of her immaculate conception was the famous John Duns, surnamed Scotus, and Doctor Subtilis, who died in the year 1308 (3). Since which time great numbers of books have been written for and against that opinion. Montfaucon relates (4), that, when he visited Italy, Signor Belcredidi of Pavia had a library full of books in behalf of that groundless notion, and most of them written by Franciscans.

B E H N (A P H A R A) [A], a celebrated Poetess of the last age, was a gentlewoman by birth, being descended from a good family in the city of Canterbury (a); and was born some time in the reign of King Charles I, but in what year is not known. Her father's name was Johnson; whose relation to the Lord Willoughby drew him, for the advantageous post of Lieutenant-General of Surinam, and six and thirty islands, to undertake a voyage, with his whole family, to the West Indies; at which time our Poetess was very young. Mr Johnson died at sea in his passage thither; but his family arrived at Surinam (b) [B], where our Poetess became acquainted with the story, and person, of the American Prince Oroonoko [C], whose adventures she has so feelingly described in the celebrated novel of that

[A] APHARA.] This is the true spelling, as appears by her epitaph (1), and not Afra, as it is usually written. Langbaine (2) calls her Mrs Afræa Behn; but Afræa is only a fictitious name, used by her in her Epistolary Correspondence.

[B] She arrived at Surinam.] In her History of Oroonoko (3) she has given us the following description of her habitation in that country. ' As soon as I came into the country, the best house in it was presented me, called St John's Hill: It stood on a vast rock of white marble, at the foot of which the river ran a vast depth down, and not to be descended on that side; the little waves still dashing and washing the foot of this rock, made the softest murmurs and purlings in the world; and the opposite bank was adorned with such vast quantities of different flowers eternally blowing, and every day and hour new, fenced behind 'em with lofty trees of a thousand rare forms and colours, that the prospect was the most ravishing that sands can create. On the edge of this white rock, towards the river, was a walk, or grove, of orange and lemon-trees, about half the length of the Mall here *, whose flowery and fruit-bearing branches met at the top, and hindered the sun, whose rays are very fierce there, from entering a beam into the grove; and the cool air that came from the river made it not only fit to entertain people in, at all the hottest hours of the day, but refresh the sweet blossoms, and made it always sweet and charming; and sure the whole globe of the world cannot shew so delightful a place as this grove was: Not all the gardens of boasted Italy can produce a shade to outvie this, which nature had joined with art to render so exceeding fine; and 'tis a marvel to see how such vast trees, as big as English oaks, could take footing in so solid a rock, and so little earth, as covered that rock.' Mrs Behn indeed speaks wonders of the whole continent of Surinam, with this reflection upon it, ' that certainly, had his late Majesty † of ' sacred memory but seen and known what a vast and charming world he had been master of in that continent, he would never have parted so easily with it to the Dutch (4).'

[C] She became acquainted with the person and story of the American Prince Oroonoko.] She herself tells us (5), ' she had often seen and conversed with that great man, and been a witness to many of his mighty actions; ' and that at one time ' he and Clemene (or Imoinda his wife) were scarce an hour in a day from her lodgings; that they eat with her, and that she obliged them in all things she was capable, entertaining them with the lives of the Romans, and great men, which charmed him to her company; and her, with teaching her all the pretty works she was mistress of, and telling her stories of Nuns, and endeavouring to bring her to the knowledge of the true God (6).' She tells us likewise (7), that Oroonoko used to call her his Great Mistress, and that ' her word would go a great way with him.' This intimacy between Prince Oroonoko and our Poetess occasioned some reflections on her conduct, from which the authress of her Life has justified her in the following manner. Speaking of the unfortunate story of Oroonoko, ' Here, says she (8), I can add nothing to what she has given the world already, but a vindication of her from some unjust aspersions I find are insinuated about this town in relation to that Prince. I knew her intimately well, and I believe she would not have concealed any love-affair from me, being one of her own sex, whose friendship and secrecy she had experienced; which makes me assure the world there was no affair between that Prince and Allraza, but what the whole plantation were witnesses of; a generous value for his uncommon virtues, which every one that but hears 'em finds in himself, and his presence gave her no more. Besides, his heart was too violently set on the everlasting charms of his Imoinda, to be shook with those more faint

(†) K. Charles I.

(c) She the remark [H]. that name (c). After her return to England, she was married to Mr Behn, a merchant of London, but of Dutch extraction. King Charles II, to whom she had given an entertaining and just account of the colony of Surinam, thought her a proper person to be intrusted with the management of some important affairs, during the Dutch war; which occasioned her going into Flanders, and residing at Antwerp (d). Here, by her intrigues, she discovered the design, formed by the Dutch, of sailing up the river Thames, and burning the English ships in their harbours [D]; which she communicated to the Court of England: but, her intelligence (though well grounded, as appeared by the event) being only laughed at and slighted, she laid aside all farther thoughts of state affairs, and amused herself, during the rest of her stay at Antwerp, with the gallantries of that city (e) [E]. After some time, she embarked at Dunkirk for England, and in the passage

(in his eye) of a white beauty; and Astræa's relations there present, had too watchful an eye over her, to permit the frailty of her youth, if that had been powerful enough.

[D] She discovered the design of the Dutch — to burn the English ships in their harbours. She made this discovery by the intervention of a Dutchman, whom her life-writer calls by the name of Vander Albert. This Vander Albert, who, before the war, in her husband's time, had been in love with her in England, as soon as he heard of her arrival at Antwerp, and the public posts he was in would give him leave, paid her a visit; and, after a repetition of all his former professions for her service, pressed her to let him, by some signal means, give her undeniable proofs of the vehemence and sincerity of his passion; for which he would ask no reward, 'till he had by long and faithful services convinced her that he deserved it. This proposal was so suitable to her present aim in the service of her country, that she accepted it, and employed Albert in such a manner, as made her very serviceable to the King. The latter end of the year 1666, he sent her word by a special messenger, that he would be with her at a day appointed; at which time he revealed to her, that Cornelius De Wit, who, with the rest of that family, had an implacable hatred to the English nation and the House of Orange, had, with de Ruyter, proposed to the States the expedition above-mentioned. This proposal, concurring with the advice, which the Dutch Partisans in England had given them of the total neglect there of all naval preparations, was, he told her, well received, and would certainly be put in execution, as a thing neither dangerous nor difficult. Albert having discovered a secret of this importance, and with such marks of truth, that she had no room for doubt, as soon as the interview was at end, she dispatched an account of what she had discovered to England (g).

(g) Ibid. p. 6—9.

[E] She amused herself with the gallantries of Antwerp. Besides Vander Albert, mentioned in the last remark, Mrs Behn had another lover at Antwerp, a Dutchman likewise: of whom she herself gives the following humorous account in one of her letters (10): 'My other is about twice his (Albert's) age, nay and bulk too, though Albert be not the most Barbary shape you have seen; you must know him by the name of Van Bruin, and he was introduced to me by Albert his kinsman, and obliged by him to furnish me in his absence with what money and other things I should please to command, or have occasion for, as long as he staid at Antwerp, where he was like to continue some time about a law-suit then depending. He had not visited me often before I began to be sensible of the influence of my eyes on this old piece of worm-eaten touchwood; but he had not the confidence (and that's much) to tell me he loved me, and modestly, you know, is no common fault of his countrymen. — He often insinuated that he knew a man of wealth and substance, though stricken indeed in years, and on that account not so agreeable as a younger man, that was passionately in love with me, and desired to know whether my heart was so far engaged, that his friend should not entertain any hopes. I replied, that I was surprized to hear a friend of Albert's making an interest in me for another; that if love were a passion I was any way sensible of, it could never be for an old man, and much to that purpose. But all this would not do; in a day or two I received this eloquent epistle from him.' Here Mrs Behn inserts a translation of Van Bruin's letter, which was wrote in French, and in a most ridiculous

style, telling her, he had often strove to tell her the tempests of his heart, and with his own mouth scale the walls of her affections; but terrified with the strength of her fortifications, he concluded to make more regular approaches, and first attack her at a farther distance, and try first what a bombardment of letters would do; whether these carcasses of love, thrown into the sconces of her eyes, would break into the midst of her breast, beat down the court of guard of her aversion, and blow up the magazine of her cruelty, that she might be brought to a capitulation, and yield upon reasonable terms (11). He then considers her as a goodly ship under sail for the Indies; her hair is the pennants; her forehead the prow; her eyes the guns; her nose the rudder, &c. He wishes he could once see her keel above water! and desires to be the pilot, to steer her by the Cape of Good Hope for the Indies of Love (12). Our Poetess returned a suitable answer to this ridiculous letter. She rallies him on his setting out for so unprofitable a voyage as Love, and humorously reckons up the expences of the voyage; as Ribbons and hoods for her pennants; diamond-rings, lockets, and pearl-necklaces for her guns of offence and defence; silks, holland, lawn, cambric, &c. for her rigging, &c (13). This produced another letter, in the same stile, from Van Bruin; in which, to show her that what she proposed had not terrified him, he tells her, he sends her Cart-blank to fill up herself, promising to visit her that evening, to sign articles, and put a new garrison into the fort (14). Though Mrs Behn had no need of answering this, being threatened with so speedy a visit, yet, for the diversion of herself and her acquaintance, she sent him another billet; in which, seeming to encourage his passion, she tells him, she fears that deducing tongue of his will quite remove all her objections; but that she defers proposals of articles, 'till their Plenipo's meet, and proceed regularly on these preliminaries at the place of conference; which, says she, is agreed on all hands to be the abode of your most happy Astræa (15). This letter, we may imagine, soon brought her Hogen-mogen lover (as he calls him) to her apartment. The other part of his courtship she tells her friend could not easily be described. 'But imagine to yourself, says she (16), an old, over-grown, unwieldy Dutchman, playing awkwardly over all that he supposed would make him look more agreeable in my eyes. Age he found I did not admire; he therefore endeavoured to conceal it by dress, peruke, and clumsy gaiety. Respect he was informed I expected from a lover; which he would express with such comical cringes, such odd sort of ogling, and fantastick addresses, that I could never force a serious face on whatever he said; for let the subject be ever so grave, his person and delivery turned it into a farce. There was no piece of gallantry he observed performed by the young gentlemen of the city, but he attempted in imitation of them, even to poetry; but that indeed was in his own language, and so might be extraordinary for aught I know.' In this manner, Mrs Behn tells us, she diverted herself with Van Bruin, in Albert's absence, 'till he began to assume and grow troublesome on her bare permission of his addresses; so that, to rid herself of him, she was forced to disclose the whole affair to Albert, who was so enraged, that he threatened the death of his rival; but was pacified by his mistress, and contented to upbraid the other with his treachery, and to forbid him the house (17). 'But this, says our Poetess (18), produced a very ridiculous scene, and worthy of more spectators: For my Nestorean lover would not give ground to Albert, but was as high as he, challenged passage was near being lost; for the ship, being driven on the coast, foundered within sight of land: but, by the assistance of boats from the shore, they were all saved, and Mrs Behn arrived in London. The rest of her life was entirely dedicated to pleasure and poetry (f). Besides publishing three volumes of Miscellany Poems [F], she wrote seven- (f) Ibid. p. 38—

“ him to snick-or-see for me, and a thousand things
“ as comical; in short, nothing but my positive com“ mand could satisfy him, and on that he promised “ no more to trouble me. Sure, as he thought, of “ me, he was thunder-struck, when he heard me not “ only forbid him the house, but ridicule all his ad-

“ full of despair, went away, not only from my lodg“ ings, but the next day from Antwerp, leaving his “ law-suit to the care of his friends, unable to stay in “ the place where he had met with so dreadful a de“ feat.” Thus far we have an account of Mrs Behn's gallantries at Antwerp from her own pen. The authors of her Life has given us a farther account of her affairs with Vander Albert, in which she contrived to preserve her honour, without injuring her gratitude.
There was a woman at Antwerp, who had often given Astræa warning of Albert's fickleness and inconstancy, assuring her, he never loved past enjoyment, and sometimes changed even before he had that pretence; of which she herself was an instance, Albert having married her, and deserted her on the wedding-night.
Our Poets took the opportunity of her acquaintance with this lady, whose name was Catalina, to put an honest trick upon her lover, and at the same time do justice to an injured woman. Accordingly she made an appointment with Albert, and contrived that Catalina should meet him in her stead. The plot succeeded, and Catalina, infinitely pleased with the adventure, appointed the next night and the following, till at last he discovered the cheat, and resolved to gratify both his love and his revenge, by enjoying Astræa even against her will. To this purpose he bribed an elderly gentlewoman, whom Mrs Behn kept out of charity, and who was her bedfellow, to put him to bed dressed in her night-cloaths in her place, when Astræa was passing the evening at a Merchant's house in the town.
The Merchant's son and his two sisters waited on Astræa home; and, to conclude the evening's mirth with a frolic, the young gentleman proposed going to bed to the old woman, and that they should all come in with candles, and surprize them together. As it was agreed, so they did; but, no sooner was the young spark laid in bed, than he found himself accosted with unexpected ardour, and a man's voice, saying,
Have I now caught thee, thou malicious charmer!
Now I'll not let thee go till thou hast done me justice for all the wrongs thou hast offered my doating love.
The rest of the company coming in, were extremely surprized to find Albert in Astræa's bed, instead of the old woman, and Albert no less to find the young spark instead of Astræa. In conclusion the old woman was discarded, and Albert's fury at his disappointment appeared by a promise from Mrs Behn of marrying him at her arrival in England. But Albert, returning into Holland to make preparations for his voyage to England, died of a fever at Amsterdā (19).

[F] She published three volumes of Miscellany Poems.
The first in 1684, the second in 1685, and the third in 1688. They consist of songs, and other little pieces, by the Earl of Rochester, Sir George Etherege, Mr Henry Crisp, and others; with some pieces of her own. To the Second Miscellany is annexed a translation of the Duke de Rochefoucault's Moral Reflexions, under the title of Seneca Unmasked.

[G] Her Plays.] They are as follows: I, II. The Rover, or the Banish'd Cavalier, in two parts, both Comedies; acted at the Duke's Theatre, and printed, in quarto, in 1677 and 1681. The second part is dedicated to his Royal Highness the Duke. These Plays are taken, in a great measure, from Killigrew's Don Thomaso, or the Wanderer. III. The Dutch Lover, a Comedy; acted at the Duke's Theatre, and printed, in quarto, in 1673. The plot of this play is founded on a Spanish Romance, written by Don Francisco de las Coveras, intitled, Don Fenise. IV. Abdelazar, or the Moor's Revenge, a Tragedy; acted at the Duke's Theatre, and printed, in quarto, in 1671. It is taken from an old Play of Marlo's, printed in 1661, intitled, Lust's Dominion, or the Lascivious Queen; a Tragedy.

V. The Young King, or the Mistake, a Tragi-comedy; acted at the Duke's Theatre, and printed, in quarto, in 1683. It is dedicated to some gentleman, her particular friend, under the name of Philaster. The design of this Play is taken from the story of Alcarnenes and Menalippa, in Calprenede's Cleopatra. VI. The Round-heads, or the Good Old Cause, a Comedy; acted at the Duke's Theatre, and printed, in quarto, in 1682. It is dedicated to Henry Fitz-Roy, Duke of Grafton. Great part of the dialogue of this Play is taken from John Tatham's Rump, or A Mirror of the Times. VII. The City-Heiress, or Sir Timothy Treat-
All, a Comedy; acted at the Duke's Theatre, and printed, in quarto, in 1682. It is dedicated to Henry Earl of Arundel, and Lord Mowbray. This Play was very well received, but most of the characters are borrowed, as those of Sir Timothy and his nephew, from Sir Bounteous Progress and Folly-wit, in Middleton's Mad World my Masters; and those of Sir Anthony Merrywell and his nephew Sir Charles, from Durazzo and Caldoro, in Messenger's Guardian. VIII. The Town-Fop, or Sir Timothy Tawdry, a Comedy; acted at the Duke's Theatre, and printed, in quarto, in 1677. This Play is founded on a Comedy, written by George Wilkins, intitled, The Miseries of enforced Marriage. IX. The False Count, or a new Way to play an old Game, a Comedy; acted at the Duke's Theatre, and printed, in quarto, in 1682. Isabella's being deceived by the Chimney-sweeper, is borrowed from Moliere's Precieuses Ridicules. X. The Lucky Chance, or An Alderman's Bargain, a Comedy; acted by the King's company, and printed, in quarto, in 1687. It is dedicated to Hyde Earl of Rochester.
This Play was greatly decried by the Critics. The incident of Gayman's enjoying the Lady Fulbanck, and taking her for the Devil, is borrowed from Alexander Kickshaw and the Lady Aretina, in Shirley's Lady of Pleasure. XI. Forced Marriage, or the Jealous Bride- groom, a Tragi-comedy; acted at the Duke's Theatre, and printed, in quarto, in 1671. XII. Sir Patient Fancy, a Comedy; acted at the Duke's Theatre, and printed, in quarto, in 1678. The character of Sir Patient is borrowed from Moliere's Malade Imaginaire; and those of Sir Credulous Easy, and his Groom Curry, from Sir Amphibus and Trebasto, in Broome's Damois- elle. XIII. The Widow Ranter, or the History of Bacon in Virginia, a Tragi-comedy; acted by the King's company, and printed, in quarto, in 1690.
It is uncertain from whence she had the History of Bacon; but the catastrophe seems founded on the story of Cassius, who died by the hand of his freed-man.
This Play was published, after Mrs Behn's death, by one G. J. her friend. XIV. The Feign'd Courtizan, or A Night's Intrigue, a Comedy; acted at the Duke's Theatre, and printed, in quarto, in 1679. It is dedicated to the famous Mrs Ellen Gwin, King Charles's mistress; and is esteemed one of Mrs Behn's best Plays. XV. The Emperor of the Moon, a Farce; acted at the Queen's Theatre, and printed, in quarto, in 1687. It is dedicated to the Marquis of Worcester.
The plot is taken from an Italian piece, translated into French, under the title of Harlequin Empereur dans le monde de la Lune, and acted at Paris above eighty nights without intermission. XVI. The Amorous Prince, or the Curious Husband, a Comedy; acted at the Duke of York's Theatre, and printed, in quarto, in 1671. The plot is borrowed from the Novel of the Curious Impertinent, in Don Quixote. XVII. The Younger Brother, or the Amorous Jilt, a Comedy; published, after her death, by Mr Gildon. It was taken from a true story of Colonel Henry Martin and a certain Lady. — Mrs Behn's Plays, all but the last, were published together in two volumes, 8vo. But the last edition of 1724 is in four volumes, 12mo, including the Younger Brother.

[H] Her Histories and Novels.] They are extant in two volumes, 12mo, London 1735. 8th edition; published by Mr Charles Gildon, and dedicated to Simon Scroop, Esq; to which is prefixed The History of

History of Oracles, and Plurality of Worlds; to which last she annexed an Essay on Translation, and Translated Prose [I]. The Paraphrase of Cenone's Epistle to Paris, in the English translation of Ovid's Epistles, is Mrs Behn's [K]; as are, the celebrated Love-Letters between a Nobleman and his Sister, Lond. 1684 (g). Her wit gained her the acquaintance and esteem of the Poets of that time, as Mr Dryden, Mr Southerne, Mr Charles Cotton, and others; and, at the same time, the love and addresses of several gentlemen; one in particular, with whom she corresponded under the name of Lycidas (h) [L]. Mrs Behn died, after a long indisposition, the 16th of April 1689, and the Fair Sex. The Histories and Novels are as follows: I. The History of Oroonoko, or the Royal Slave. This was a true story, the incidents of which happened during her residence at Surinam (20). It gave birth to Mr Southerne's celebrated Play of Oroonoko. That Gentleman, in the Epistle Dedicatory of that Play, speaking of his obligation to Mrs Behn for the subject, says, 'She had a great command of the Stage; and I have often wondered that she would bury her favourite Heroe in a Novel, when she might have revived him in the Scene. She thought either that no Actor could represent him, or she could not bear him represented; and I believe the last, when I remember what I have heard from a friend of her's, that she always told his story more feelingly than she writ it.' II. The Fair Jilt; or, The Amours of Prince Tarquin and Miranda. This is likewise a true story; to a great part of which, she tells us (21), she was an eye-witness; and what she did not see, she learned from some of the actors concerned in it, the Franciscans of Antwerp, where the scene is laid. III. The Nun; or, The Perjured Beauty; a true Novel. IV. The History of Agnes de Castro. V. The Lover's Watch; or, The Art of making Love. It is taken from M. Bonnecourse's La Montre, or The Watch. It is not properly a Novel. A Lady, under the name of Iris, being absent from her lover Damon, is supposed to send him a Watch; on the dial-plate of which the whole business of a lover, during the twenty-four hours, is marked out, and pointed to by the dart of a Cupid in the middle. Thus, Eight o'clock is marked Agreeable Reverie; Nine o'clock, Design to please nobody; Ten o'clock, Reading of Letters, &c. To which is added, as from Damon to Iris, A Description of The Case of the Watch. VI. The Ladies Looking-Glass to dress themselves by. Damon is supposed to send Iris a Looking-Glass, which represents to her all her charms, viz her Shape, Complexion, Hair, &c. This likewise, which is not properly a Novel, is taken from the French. VII. The Lucky Mistake; a new Novel. VIII. The Court of the King of Bantam. IX. The Adventure of the Black Lady. The reader will distinguish the originals from the translations, by consulting the 2d and 3d Tomes of Le Recueil des pieces gallantes, en prose et en vers. Paris, 1684, 8vo.

[J] Her Translation of M. Fontenelle's — Plurality of Worlds; to which is annexed, An Essay on Translation and Translated Prose. This Translation is in general a pretty good one, though there are some mistakes in it, occasioned by her want of sufficient skill in Philosophy. In the Essay on Translation, &c. annexed to it, she censures M. Fontenelle on several accounts, and occasionally answers some objections made to several passages of Scripture; as, that of the Sun's standing still at the command of Joshua; the measure and dimensions of Solomon's molten-brass Sea, and the time of King Solomon's reign; as these passages relate to Astronomy, Geometry, and Chronology. But in handling these points, Mrs Behn shews she is out of her sphere, and engaged in a kind of writing, for which nature had not formed her. In this Essay she endeavours likewise to prove, that the French is of all languages the most difficult to be translated into English.

[K] The Paraphrase of Oenone's Epistle to Paris, in the English Translation of Ovid's Epistles, is her's. In the preface to that work, Mr Dryden pays her this handsome compliment: I was desired to say, that the author, who is of the Fair Sex, understood not Latin: But if she does not, I am afraid she has given us occasion to be ashamed who do. The following passage, transcribed from this Epistle, will afford the reader a proper specimen of Mrs Behn's poetical talent.

My easy faith, and lead my heart astray?

I might some humble Shepherd's choice have been,
Had I that tongue ne'er heard, those eyes ne'er seen;
And in some homely cot, in low repose,
Liv'd undisturb'd with broken vows and oaths;
All day by shaded springs my flocks have kept,
And in some honest arms at night have slept.
Then, unupbraided with my wrongs, thou'dst been Safe in the joys of the fair Grecian Queen.
What Stars do rule the Great? No sooner you Became a Prince, but you were perjur'd too.
Are crowns and fallshoods then consistent things?
And must they all be faithless who are Kings?
The Gods be prais'd that I was humble born,
Ev'n tho' it renders me my Paris' scorn.
And I had rather this way wretched prove,
Than be a Queen, and faithless in my love.
Not my fair rival wou'd I wish to be,
To come prophand by others joys to thee.
A spotless maid into thy arms I brought,
Untouch'd in fame, ev'n innocent in thought:
Whilst she with love has treated many a guest,
And brings thee but the leavings of a feast:
With Theseus from her country made escape,
Whilst she miscall'd the willing flight a rape:
So now from Atræus' son with thee is fled;
And still the rape hides the adulterous deed.
And is it thus great ladies keep entire
That virtue they so boast, and you admire?
Is this a trick of Courts? Can ravishment Serve for a poor evasion of consent?
Hard shift to save that honour priz'd so high,
Whilst the mean fraud's the greater infamy!
How much more happy are we rural maids,
Who know no other palaces than shades;
Who want no titles to enslave the eroud,
Left they should babble all our crimes aloud;
No arts our good to shew, our ills to hide;
Nor know to cover faults of love with pride (22)!

[L] — One in particular, with whom she corresponded under the name of Lycidas. Eight of her love-letters to that Gentleman are printed in the Life and Memoirs, &c. prefixed to her Histories and Novels

(23). They are full of the most passionate expressions of love for her dear Lycidas, who, at the time of her writing these letters, seems to have lost much of the passion he once had for her, and to have returned her love with great coldness and indifference. 'I may chance, says she, in her last letter (24), from the natural inconstancy of my sex, to be as false as you would wish, and leave you in quiet: For as I am satisfied I love in vain, and without return, I am satisfied that nothing, but the thing that hates me, could treat me as Lycidas does; and 'tis only the vanity of being beloved by me can make you countenance a softness so displeasing to you. How could any thing, but the man that hates me, entertain me so unkindly? Witness your passing by the end of the street where I live, and squandering away your time at any coffee-house, rather than allow me, what you know in your soul is the greatest blessing of my life, your dear, dull, melancholy company; I call it dull, because you can never be gay or merry where Astræa is. How could this indifference possess you, when your malicious soul knew I was languishing for you? I died, I fainted, I panted for an hour of what you lavished out, regardless of me, and without so much as thinking on me!'

Mrs Apharra Behn died Aprill the 16, 1689.

Here lies a proof that wit can never be Defence enough against mortality.
Great Poets, O thy stupendous lays
The world admires, and the Muses praise.

Revived by Thomas Waine in respect to so bright a genius.

No person of the least taste or judgment can possibly believe, what was maliciously suggested by the envious of her own sex, that the author of this epitaph was, in reality, the author of most of those pieces which go under Mrs Behn's name.

[N] Her character. Mr Langbaine, her contemporary, thinks 'her memory will be long fresh among all lovers of dramatic poetry, as having been sufficiently eminent, not only for her theatrical performances, but several other pieces both in prose and verse, which gained her an esteem among the wits, almost equal to that of the incomparable Orinda, Mrs Catherine Philips. — Most of her Comedies, continues he, have had the good fortune to please; and though it must be confessed that she has borrowed very much, not only from her own countrymen, but likewise from the French Poets, yet it may be said in her behalf, that she has often been forced to it thro' haste; and has borrowed from others stores, rather of choice than for want of a fund of wit of her own, it having been formerly her unhappiness to be necessitated to write for bread, as she herself has published to the world (1). 'Tis also her commendation, that whatever she borrows she improves for the better; a plea which our late Laureat (*) has not been ashamed to make use of (†). If to this her sex may plead in her behalf, I doubt not but she will be allowed equal with several of our Poets her contemporaries (25). There are several encomiums on Mrs Behn prefixed to her Lover's Watch. Among the rest Mr Charles Cotton, author of Virgil Travestiy, &c. compliments her in the following lines.

But on all themes your power is the same.
Of buskin and of sock you know the pace,
And tread in both with equal skill and grace.
But, when you write of love, Astraea, then Love dips his arrows where you wet your pen.
Such charming lines did never paper grace,
Soft as your sex, and smooth as beauty's face.

But why should you, who can so well create,
So stoop, as but pretend you do translate?
Cou'd you, who have such a luxurious vein,
As nought but your own judgment cou'd restrain,
Who are yourself of poesy the foul Descend so low
To make an author, that before was none?
Yet we can trace you there, in cy'ry line;
The texture's good, but some threads are too fine:
We see where you let in your filver springs,
And know the plumes, with which you imp'his wings (26)

It seems this gentleman thought it too great a condescension in Mrs Behn to meddle with translation. Mr Charles Gildon, who was intimately acquainted with our Poets, speaks of her with the highest encomiums. 'Poetry, says he (27), the supreme pleasure of the mind, is begot, and born in pleasure, but oppressed and killed with pain. This reflection ought to raise our admiration of Mrs Behn, whose genius was of that force, like Homer's, to maintain it's gaiety in the midst of disappointments, which a woman of her sense and merit ought never to have met with. But she had a great strength of mind and command of thought, being able to write in the midst of company, and yet have her share of the conversation, which I saw her do in writing Oroonoko, and other parts of the following volumes; in every part of which, Sir, you'll find an easy stile, and a peculiar happiness of thinking. The passions, that of Love especially, she was mistress of; and gave us such nice and tender touches of them, that, without her name, we might discover the author, as Protogenes did Apelles by the stroke of his pencil.' To this character of Mrs Behn may very properly be added that given of her by the authres of her Life and Memoirs (28), in these words: 'She was of a generous and open temper, something passionate, very serviceable to her friends in all that was in her power, and could sooner forgive an injury than do one. She had wit, honour, good humour, and judgment. She was mistress of all the pleasing arts of conversation, but used 'em not to any but those who love plain dealing. She was a woman of sense, and by consequence a lover of pleasure. — For my part I knew her intimately, and never saw aught becoming the just modesty of our sex, though more gay and free than the folly of the precise will allow.' — This respects only her moral character, and may be strictly true. But how far she may deserve the high encomiums bestowed on her as a writer, and what abatements it may be necessary to make in settling her true merit, the reader of her works will easily judge. Her Novels, Oroonoko excepted, are chiefly translations: Her Poetry is none of the best; and her Comedies, though not without wit and humour, are full of the most indecent scenes and expressions. T

BEK, or BEC, or BEAK (ANTHONY) Bishop of Durham in reigns of Edward I and II, was advanced, with the King's consent, from the archdeaconry of Durham to the bishoprick, in the room of Robert de Insula (a). Of the extraction and education of this Prelate I find no account. He was elected by the Monks on the ninth of July 1283, and consecrated, in the presence of the King and several of the Nobles, by William Wicwane Archbishop of York, on the ninth of January following (b). At the time of his consecration, the Archbishop, having had a dispute, during the vacancy of the See, with the Chapter of Durham, obliged the Prior to go out of the Church; and the next day enjoined the new Bishop, upon his canonical obedience, to excommunicate the Superior and several of the Monks: but Bek refused to obey the Archbishop, saying, 'I was yesterday consecrated their Bishop, and shall I excommunicate them to day? no obedience shall force me to this (c).' He was enthroned on Christmas-eve 1285; upon which occasion a dispute arising between the Prior and the Official of York about the rite of performing that ceremony, the decision of it was deferred; and in the mean time Bek was installed by his brother Thomas Bek Bishop of St David's (d). This Prelate had a long dispute with the Monks of Durham; which proved very detrimental to the revenues and privileges of the See [A]. He is said to have been the richest Bishop (if we except Wolfey) that had ever held the See of Durham: for, besides the revenues of his bishoprick, he had a temporal estate of five thousand marks per annum; part of which, we are told, he gained by unjustly converting to his own use an estate, which he held in trust for the natural son of the Baron of Vefcey [B]. He procured the translation of the body of St William formerly Archbishop of York, and was at the whole expence of the ceremony, which was solemnly performed in the church of York (e). He assisted King Edward I, in his war against John Baliol King of Scotland, and brought into the field a large body of forces [C]. In the year 1294, he was sent Embassador from King Edward to the Emperor of Germany, to conclude a treaty with that Prince, against the increasing power of France (f). In 1295, the Pope having sent two Cardinals on an embassy to the English Court, this Prelate was pitched upon to answer them in the King's name [D]. He had the title of Patriarch of Jerusalem conferred on him by the Pope in 1305 (g); and about the same time received from the King a grant of the principality of the Island of Man (h). An act passed, in this Bishop's time, in the Parliament of Carlisle, Anno unskilful person, and in all respects unqualified for the government of so considerable a convent, he obtained of his Holiness the sole management of its revenues and jurisdiction; and accordingly sent down certain of his officers to Durham to execute his orders. But the Monks refused to admit them, and appealed to the Pope; whereupon the Bishop's officers excommunicated the Prior and all the Monks. These proceedings so displeased the King, that he laid a severe fine on the officers, and ordered the Bishop himself to appear in his courts, and answer for what he had done. But Bek, without regarding the King's summons, or asking his leave, set out for Rome; which so incensed the King, that he confiscated the revenues of his bishoprick, and turned out the Chancellor, Justiciaries, and other public officers of the principality of Durham. He wrote likewise to the Pope in favour of the Prior, who presented the letter with his own hand; and his Holiness having examined him, and found the Bishop's complaint against him to be groundless, restored him to his office; but he died before he could return into England. As to Bek, the King's resentment against him did not stop here; for he seized on several castles, which, by the condemnation of Baliol, King of Scots, and others, had devolved to the Bishops of Durham, as Counts Palatine; among which were Werkam in Tivendale, Perth, and the Church of Simonburne; nor were they recovered to the Church of Durham till the time of his next successor but one, Lewis Beaumont (1). This affair will receive farther light from Mr Camden, who, reciting the privileges of the Bishoprick of Durham, says as follows: 'The Bishops have also had their royalties, so that the goods of outlaws were forfeited to them, and not to the King; nay the common people, insisting upon privilege, have refused to go to the wars in Scotland under the King. For they pleaded (these are the words of the history of Durham *) that they were hali-werke folkes, i. e. registered or enrolled for holy work; that they held their lands to defend the body of St Cuthbert, and that they ought not to march out of the confines of their bishoprick, namely beyond the Tine and the Tees, either for the King, or for the Bishop. But Edward the first abridged them of these liberties. For he (voluntarily) interposing himself as a mediator between Anthony Bec Bishop, and the Prior, who had then a sharp contest about certain lands, and at last would not stand to his determination, seized (as my author says) the liberty of the Bishoprick into his own hands; and then were many things searched into, and their privileges abridged in many particulars. However, the church recovered its rights afterwards (2).' Bishop Bek extricated himself at length out of this troublesome affair, and was entirely restored to the King's favour.

[B] He converted to his own use an estate, which he held in trust for the natural son of the Baron of Vefcey.] Camden informs us (3), that William de Vefcey, whose lawful son John died in the Welsh wars, gave some of his lands in Ireland to King Edward, on condition that his natural son William de Kildare, might inherit his estate; and made Anthony Bec, Bishop of Durham, his feoffee in trust for the use of his son; who did not acquit himself over fairly in that part of his charge relating to Alnwick (in Northumberland), Eltham in Kent, and some other estates, which he converted to his own use. The same Antiquarian tells us (4), the Bishop gave the castle of Eltham, which belonged to the Vefcies, to Queen Eleanor; and elsewhere (5), that the said Bishop, basely betraying his trust, alienated the inheritance (of Alnwick-castle) selling it for a present sum of money to William Percy; since which time it has always been in the possession of the Percies.

[C] He brought into the field a large body of forces.] Knyghton informs us (6), that some English merchants having been plundered and murdered in the port of Berwick by the Scotch, King Edward summoned the King of Scots to appear before him at Newcastle upon Tyne, to answer for this and other outrages committed by his subjects. But Baliol slighting the summons, Edward marched against him with four thousand horse and thirty thousand foot; and was joined by the Bishop of Durham at the head of five hundred horse and a thousand foot, consulting chiefly of Welsh and Irish. Robert de Graystanes tells us (7), the Bishop had of his own family twenty-six standard-bearers; and adds, that he looked more like a Lay-Prince, than a Priest or a Bishop; ita ut magis crederetur Princeps Laicus, quam Sacerdos aut Episcopus. Let us hear Leland; King Edward, says that Antiquarian (8), was the batel in Fawkirik yn Scotland upon S. Maria Magdalena day in the yere of our Lorde 1295, where Wyl-liam Waleys, their Capitayne ran a way. Anthony de Bek, Bisshop of Duresme, had this batail such a retinew, that in his company were thirty two baners.

[D] This Prelate was pitched upon to answer the Pope's Legates in the King's name.] The design of the embassy was to reconcile the differences, and establish peace between the Kings of England and France. The two Legates (Beraldus, Bishop of Alba, and Simon, Bishop of Præneste) having declared, in the King's presence, the subject of their embassy, the Bishop of Durham rose up, and answered them in the French language. He told them, 'that tho' every Christian and good Catholic ought to wish for peace, on account of the blessings which attend it, and the extreme mischiefs consequent on war and discord; yet that this consideration ought not to induce any Prince to break his word or promise; that his Highness had concluded a treaty with the Emperor of Germany, by which he was obliged not to make peace without that Prince's consent.' The Cardinals hereupon requesting, that the King would dispatch messengers to the Emperor upon this subject, and in the mean time grant a truce, during which negotiations might be carried on for bringing about a peace, the next day was appointed for returning a farther answer; which being come, and the Council assembled, the Bishop of Durham again spoke in French to the following effect: 'That the King, out of reverence to the Holy See, and in consideration of the high station and quality of the Legates, freely granted their request of sending embassadors to the Emperor; that, it being notorious to all the world, that the forces of the King of France were ready to act against his Highness both by sea and land, it would not be safe for him to disarm himself till the enemy did the like; that when he was assured the King of France had suspended his military preparations, his Highness would do so too; but not before (9).' The event of this business not being material to the history of Bishop Bek, I shall say no more of it. The probable reason of his being chosen to deliver the King's mind upon this occasion may be, either his superior talent of speaking, or his knowledge of the French language, or perhaps both.

1307, to prevent the Bishop of Durham, or his officers, from cutting down the woods belonging to the bishoprick (i). This Prelate expended large sums in building. He fortified the Bishop's seat at Aukland, and turned it into a castle [E]. He built, or enlarged, the castles of Bernard in the bishoprick of Durham; of Alwick in Northumberland (k); of Gainford in the bishoprick of Durham; of Somerton in Lincolnshire, which he gave to King Edward I; and of Eltham in Kent, which he gave to Queen Eleanor (l). He founded the priory of Alvingham in Lincolnshire, the revenue of which, at the dissolution, was valued at 141*l.* 15*s.* per annum. He founded likewise a collegiate church, with a Dean and seven Prebendaries, at Chester upon the Street, in the bishoprick of Durham (*). This Bishop gave to the church of Durham two pictures, containing the history of our Saviour's nativity, to be hung as an ornament over the great altar on the festival of Christmas (m). He died at Eltham the third of March 1310, having sat twenty-eight years, and was buried in the church of Durham near the east front, contrary to the custom of his predecessors, who, out of respect to the body of St Cuthbert, were never laid within the church (n). Bishop Bek was of a martial disposition, magnificent and expensive, extremely active, and remarkably chaste [F].

I find another ANTHONY BEK or BEEK, who was Bishop of Norwich in the reign of Edward III, being advanced to that See by the Pope's collation in 1337. This Prelate had borne some office in the Court of Rome, and is remarkable chiefly for the opposition he made to Archbishop Winchelsea intending to visit the diocese and Chapter of Norwich, and for the manner of his death, which was by poison given him by one of his own domestics (o).

I find likewise two THOMAS BEKS; the one promoted to the See of Lincoln in the reign of Edward II, Ann. 1319; who sat so short a time, that he is seldom reckoned among the Prelates of that See. Bishop Godwin thinks, he was the same Thomas Bek, Archdeacon of Dorchester, who, in 1278, was appointed High-Treasurer of England, and that he was brother to Anthony Bek Bishop of Durham (p). But the last is probably a mistake: for it appears by the present article (q), that that Prelate's brother was Bishop of St David's. This latter (Thomas Bek) was consecrated in 1280, and founded two colleges, one at Aberguilly, and another at Landewy-brevy (r). In 1286, a large subsidy was granted to this Bishop; to be levied on the whole diocese, for the transacting certain affairs relating to the clergy with Giffard the Pope's Nuntio in England (s).

[E] He turned the Bishop's seat at Aukland into a castle.] Bishop Godwin adds (10), that he built therein a very spacious hall, supported with pillars of black marble spotted with white; a large parlour, with other adjacent buildings; and a very fine chapel, in which he placed a Dean and Prebendaries, assigning for their habitation a large court, or quadrangle surrounded with buildings, on the West side of the castle. Aedes Auklandenses convertit in castrum, ubi aulam construxit magnae amplitudinis, quam columnis ornavit ex nigro marmore maculis candentibus variegato; et conclave fatis amplum, cum aliis aedificiis vicinis; nec non capellam pulcherrimam, in qua Decanum collocavit et Prebendarios, area quadrata (aedificiis à se porro constructis circumdata) pro habitaculo iis assignata, in occidentali parte ejusdem castr.

[F] He was of a martial disposition, magnificent and expensive, extremely active, and remarkably chaste.] Robert de Graystones shall fill up the outlines of this character. That historian tells us, Bishop Bek was courageous, and, next to the King, the best skilled of any one in military affairs; and more conversant in matters of state, than in the duties of his function. But though he was fond of a retinue of soldiers about him, he affected a seeming indifference towards them; and shewed no concern that the greatest nobles bent the knee to him, and officers of the army waited upon him standing, whilst he himself sat. He thought nothing too dear, which might serve to augment his grandeur. As an instance of which, my author tells us, he once paid at London forty shillings for forty fresh herrings, which were thought too dear by the rest of the nobility then assembled in Parliament. Another time, he bought a parcel of very dear cloth, of which he made housings for his horses, for no other reason, but because somebody had said, he did not believe Bishop Anthony would venture to buy it. He was so impatient of rest, that he never took more than one sleep, saying, it was unbecoming a man to turn from one side to the other in bed. He was perpetually either riding from one manor to another, or hunting, or hawking. Though his expences were very great, he never wanted money. He always rose from his meals with an appetite; and his continence was so great, that he never looked a woman full in the face: Whence, in the translation of St William of York; when the other Bishops declined touching the Saint's bones, through a consciousness of having forfeited their virginity, he alone boldly handled them, and assisted the ceremony with due reverence. Erat autem iste Antonius magnanimus, post regem nulli in regno in apparatu, gestu, et potentia militari secundus; magis circa negotia regni quam circa episcopalia occupatus.

Et quamvis gauderet militum conspici agmine, erga tamen eos sic se habuit, quasi eos non curasset: Comites et Barones regni majores sibi genuflectere, et eo sedente milites quasi servientes diutissime coram eo assere parvipendens. Nil ei carum erat, quod ejus gloriam magnificare posset. Pro XL balecibus recentibus XL solidos Londoniæ semel solvit; aliis magnatibus tunc in Parlamento ibi consentibus pro nimia caristia emere non curantibus. Pannum maximi pretii comparavit; et ex eo co-operturas palefridis suis fecit; eo quod quidam dixit se credere quod Episcopus Antonius id emere non audebat. Quies impatiens vix ultra unum somnum in lecto expectans, dixit illum non esse hominem, qui in lecto de latere in latus se verteret. In nullo loco mansurus, continuè circumbat de manerio in manerium, de Austro in Boream; et equorum, canum et avium sectator. Et cum esset sumptuosus in multis, nunquam tamen egens erat; sed usque ad mortem omnia ei abundabant. Ad satietatem vix comedit; castissime vixit, vix mulierum faciem fixis oculis aspiciens. Unde in translatione S. Willelmi Eboracensis, cum alii Episcopi ossa ejus timerent tangere, remordente eos conscientia de virginitate amissa, iste audacter manus imposuit; et quod negotium poposcerat reverenter egit (11).

BEKINSAU (JOHN), author of a book intituled De Supremo et absoluto Regis Imperio [A], was born at Broadchalke in Wiltshire [B]. He had his education in grammar learning at Wykeham's school near Winchester: from whence he was sent very early to New-college in Oxford; where, having served two years of probation, he was admitted Perpetual Fellow in the year 1520. In 1526 he took the degree of Master of Arts, being that year (as one of the University Registers informs us) about to take a journey beyond the seas for the sake of study [C]. In his college he distinguished himself by his extraordinary skill in the Greek language. In 1538 he resigned his fellowship, and married. What preferment or employment he had afterwards is uncertain. He was familiarly acquainted with, and highly esteemed by, the most learned men of the nation, particularly the famous Antiquary and Historian John Leland, who has bestowed an Encomium on him [D]. He was in good esteem with King Henry VIII, and King Edward VI. When Queen Mary came to the crown, and endeavoured to destroy all that her father and brother had done towards the Reformation of the Church, Bekinsau wheeled about with the times, and became a zealous Roman Catholic. After Queen Elizabeth's accession, when Protestantism again took place, he retired to an obscure village in Hampshire called Sherbourne; where he spent the remainder of his life in great discontent, and was buried in the church of that place, the twentieth of December 1559, aged about sixty-three years; leaving behind him this character among the Roman Catholics, that, as he was a learned man, so might he have been promoted according to his deserts, if he had been constant to his principles (a).

[A] He was the author of a book intituled, De Supremo et Absoluto Regis Imperio.] This piece is a defence of the King's Supremacy against the claims of the Church of Rome, and is dedicated by the author to King Henry VIII. He did not venture to publish it, till he saw that the Pope's power was wholly exterminated in England. It was printed at London in 1546, in octavo, and afterwards in the first volume of Monarchia Romani Imperii, &c. by Melchior Goldast Hamensfeldius, at Francfort 1621, in folio (1).

[B] He was born at Broadchalke in Wiltshire.] His father, John Bekinsau, descended of an antient and genteel family, was a native of Bekinsau in Lancashire, but resided chiefly in Hampshire (2). How our author came to be born in Wiltshire, we are not told.

[C] He intended to travel for the sake of study.] It is not certain, from the university register, whether our author ever put his intention of travelling in execution. But Anthony Wood informs us (3); he found it entered upon record (4), that John Beconsau, second son of John Beconsau, of Hartly-Wespell, in Hampshire (born at Beconsau in Lancashire), was reader of the Greek lecture at Paris, and afterwards came over, and died at Sherbourne in Hampshire.

BELGRAVE (RICHARD) (a), a writer of the XIVth century, of the antient family of the Belgraves in Leicestershire [A], was born at the town of Belgrave, about a mile from Leicester (b) [B], and educated in the university of Cambridge, where he applied himself with great diligence, and the like success, to his studies, and afterwards took the degree of Doctor of Divinity (c). He entered himself into the Order of Carmelite Fryars (d), and distinguished himself by his great skill in the Aristotelian Philosophy [C], and School Divinity. However he was more remarkable for the strength and subtilty

[A] Of the antient family of the Belgraves.] Of this family the first that I find, says Burton (1), was William Belgrave, to whom Robert Blanchmaines, Earl of Leicester in the reign of Henry II, gave land in Belgrave; a pleasant place and fruitful soil, about a mile distant from Leicester; which family according to the custom of those times, took their name from thence (2), and hath since spread itself into many branches, some yet in being in this county: And of this family Burton informs us, was this Richard de Belgrave.

(2) See the latter end of note [B].

[B] Was born at the town of Belgrave, about a mile from Leicester.] We have ventured in this to contradict the common account (*), of his being born in or near the city of Chichester in Suffex; though so mentioned by Pits and copied by Dugdale (3); the reason for which alteration, we shall however submit to the reader's judgment.— Burton (4), far from an inaccurate writer, expressly says, he was born at Belgrave, and Fuller also remarks, that Pits makes him born at Chichester in Suffex, and Burton at Belgrave in Leicestershire, whom I rather believe, says he, because he wrote a particular description of this county.

Now surely the more is the exactness of the author, the less the extent of his subject, especially making it his set work (what was Pits's by-work) to observe the natives of this shire (†).— Besides, it was particularly the custom of those times, for Clergymen of note to receive local names, that is, names derived from the town, village, or place of their birth, or abode:— Which practice continued long in vogue, till the days of King Henry the sixth, and then says Fuller (5), de such a place begun to be left off, but was not wholly laid aside till a great while after.—

(5) Fuller's Worthies, p. 45.

[C] Distinguished himself by his great skill in the Aristotelian Philosophy.] This must be understood of his reading and studying it privately by himself; for the first that read Aristotle publicly in the schools at Cambridge, was, we find, a brother of his order, and not unlikely, a contemporary and companion, so that Belgrave's great knowledge in it, might probably induce Bampton (for that was the Monk's name) to introduce it, and read it afterwards publicly in the schools.— But as we have thus cursorily mentioned Bampton, as introducer of the Aristotelian Philosophy into the schools, it may not be disagreeable to the reader to have a little farther account subtily of his lectures, than the elegance of his style, the study of polite literature being generally neglected in that age. Pits (e) gives him the character of a man of eminent integrity and piety. He flourished in the year 1320, under the reign of King Edward II, and wrote, among other works, Theological Determinations, in one book, the subject of which was, Utrum Essentia Divina possit videri? Whether the Divine Essence could be seen (f)? and Ordinary Questions, in one book.

BAMPTON (JOHN), wrote also de Bampton and de Baunton, &c. D. D. was born at Bampton in the West of England, which place, as well as his name, we find variously written, his name being also local (6). The particular time of his birth is uncertain, he flourished about the year 1340; studied at Cambridge, where he took his Doctor's degree in Divinity, was also, as we before hinted, a Monk of the order of Carmelites (7), &c. He was a great lover of learning, and excellently well learned for the times in which he lived, had a very acute wit, and was a great and skilful logician, or disputant, for he well knew how to urge and how to evade all the subtilties of sophistical arguments; of which particular he wrote several pieces, as Bale (8) informs us in his Centuries, besides some other things, viz. Opusculum octo Quæstionum de Veritate Propositionum, Lib. I. A small work containing eight Questions of the truth of Propositions, of which Pits wittily says, Quæro de Veritate illius Quæstionis, concerning the truth of which question I doubt; that is (I presume) whether he wrote such a book (9): Also Lecturæ Scholasticæ in Theologia, Lib. I. Scholastic Lectures in Divinity What particular monastery he was of, when he died, or where buried we know not (10).

BELING (RICHARD) descended of an antient English family, though long settled in Ireland, was born in the year 1613, at Belingstown, in the barony of Balrothery, and county of Dublin, the antient seat of his family, which was of considerable rank in the English Pale [A]. Another branch of that family was settled at Stradbally in the barony of Castlenock in the same county; and in antient lists are to be seen, the numbers of archers on horseback, which these two families sent to the aid of the State, in the reigns of Henry VIII and Queen Elizabeth, in obedience to the Chief Governor's summons to General Hostings. He was the son of Sir Henry Beling, Knt. and was educated in his greener years at a grammar-school in the city of Dublin, but afterwards put under the tuition of some priests of his own religion, which was Popish, who so well cultivated his good genius, that they taught him to write in a fluent and elegant Latin style, as appears by several of his pieces hereafter mentioned. Thus grounded in the polite parts of literature, his father removed him to Lincoln's-Inn, to study the municipal laws of his country, where he abode some years, and returned home a very accomplished gentleman: But it does not appear that he ever made the Law a profession. His natural inclinations turning him to arms, he early engaged in the rebellion of 1641, and though but about twenty-eight years old, was then an officer of considerable rank. For in February (a) that year, he appeared at the head of a strong body of the Irish before Lismore, and summoned the castle to surrender: but the Lord Broghill, who commanded in it a small body of 100 new raised forces, slighted the summons, and another party coming to his aid, Mr Beling thought fit to draw off, and quitted the siege. He afterwards became a leading member, in the supreme council of the confederated Roman Catholics at Kilkenny, to which he was Principal Secretary; by whom he was sent Ambassador (b) to the Pope and other Italian Princes in 1645, to crave aid for the support of their cause. He brought back with him a fatal present in the person of the Nuncio, John Baptist Rinuccini, Archbishop and Prince of Fermo [B]; who was the occasion of reviving the distinctions between the old Irish of blood, and the old English of Irish birth, which split that party into factions, prevented all peace with the Marquis of Ormond, and ruined the country which he was sent to save. When Mr Beling had fathomed the mischievous schemes of the Nuncio and his faction, and perceived that they had other views, than merely to obtain a toleration for the free exercise of their religion, as in the beginning they pretended, no body was more zealous than he in opposing and clogging their measures, or in promoting the peace then in agitation, and submitting to the King's authority, which he did with such heartiness and sincerity, that he became very dear to the Marquis of Ormond, who intrusted him with many negotiations [C] both before and after the Restoration, which [A] Which was of considerable rank in the English Pale. The English Pale was those parts of Ireland extended about Dublin, which in the reign of Henry II were possessed and fortified by the English, comprehending sometimes larger, and sometimes less districts, as the English or Irish power in different ages prevailed. But the counties of Louth, Dublin, Meath, Kildare, and Carlow, being for the most part obedient to the English laws, went under the more immediate denomination of the Pale. The word seems to be taken from the English Pales, the materials with which Deer Parks and other inclosures were surrounded, as if the English were separated from the Irish by such inclosures. Since the reign of King James I the English laws have obtained obedience through all Ireland, and therefore the notion of the Pale is antiquated (1).

an Archbishoprick and Principality in Italy, in the Marquisate of Ancona, subject to the Pope.

[C] Intrusted him with many negotiations. Mr Beling was commissioned by the Marquis of Ormond in 1647 to transact the junction of the Irish army with his, before the surrender of Dublin to the Parliament party; and after the Restoration the Marquis, then created Duke, employed him three several times to the Synod of the Romish Clergy, assembled by connivance at Dublin in 1666, to prevail on them to sign a remonstrance of their loyalty, which he himself had subscribed in the year 1662. But he had no fruits from these negotiations, the Synod abruptly breaking up before they could be prevailed upon to come to any conclusions. See this whole transaction in Peter Walth's Loyal Formulary, or History of the Irish Remonstrance.

which he executed with great fidelity and sufficiency. When the Parliament army had subdued the Irish, Mr Beling retired to France, where he continued several years, and in that time employed himself in writing several books in Latin, in opposition to such writers of the Romish party, who had endeavoured to clear themselves from being the instruments of the rebellion, and to lay the blame thereof on the severity of the English government. His account of the transactions of Ireland during the period of the rebellion, is esteemed by judicious men as the best piece for credit of any written by the Romish party; and yet he is not free from a partiality to the cause he was at first embarked in, and his credulity has been taxed in the case of Father Finachty [D]. He returned home upon the Restoration, and was repossessed of his estate, by the favour and interest of the Duke of Ormond. He died in Dublin in September 1677, and was buried in the church-yard of Malahidert, about five miles from that city, where he hath a tomb walled in, but without any inscription to his memory that is apparent or legible. He was father to Sir Richard Beling, Knt. Secretary to Catherine, Queen to King Charles II, which Sir Richard, marrying a lady of the name of Arundel, who was an inheritrix of a great estate, his children were obliged to take the name of the mother's family. Mr Beling in his youth; and while he was a student in Lincoln's-Inn, writ and added a sixth book to the Arcadia of Sir Philip Sidney, which was printed with that romance, Lond. 1633, fol. to which he put only the initial letters of his name. During his retirement in France, he writ in Latin in two books, Vindiciarum Catholicorum Hiberniæ, lib. ii. under the feigned name of Philopater Irenæus; the first of which gives a pretty accurate history of Irish affairs, from 1641 to 1649; and the second is a confutation of an epistle written by Paul King, a Franciscan Fryar, and a Nunciotist, in defence of the Irish rebellion. This book of Mr Beling's being answered by John Ponce, a Franciscan Fryar also, and a most implacable enemy to the Protestants of Ireland, in a tract intitled, Belingi Vindiciæ eversa, our author did not fail of a reply, which he sent abroad under the title of Annotationes in Johannis Poncii librum, cui titulus, Vindiciæ Eversa: accesserunt Belingi Vindiciæ, Parisiis 1654, 8vo. He writ also a vindication of himself against Nicholas French, titular Bishop of Ferns, under the title of, Innocentiæ suæ impetitæ per Reverendissimum Fernensem vindiciæ, Parisi. 1652, 12mo, dedicated to the clergy of Ireland; and is reported to have written a poem called The Eighth Day, which has escaped our searches.

[D] In the case of Father Finachty. Father Finachty was an ignorant Romish Priest, who both before and after the Restoration travelled about Ireland and England, pretending to dispossess people of Devils, and of healing all diseases by his touch, insomuch that he was followed by multitudes. Mr Beling often declared, that in his conscience he believed Finachty had a wonderful gift from God of curing by exorcisms and prayers; yet he could not say, that he, who had undergone his operations for the Gout, was perfectly cured, but thought his fits were easier than before. This man was afterwards discovered for an impostor, and afforded no small mirth to people against Mr Beling and others, who had given too much credit to this juggler. See the Irish Remonstrance, from page 710 to page 735, a full account of this pretender to miracles, and the manner how he was detected.

BELMEIS or BEAUMES (RICHARD DE) I (a), Bishop of London in the reign of Henry I, was advanced to that See through the interest of Roger Montgomery Earl of Shropshire (b), and consecrated [A] 26 July 1108 (c). Immediately after his consecration, he was appointed by the King, Warden of the Marches between England and Wales, and Lieutenant of the county of Salop; which offices he held about three years, residing for the most part of the time at Shrewsbury (d). This Prelate expended the whole revenues of his bishopric on the structure of St Paul's cathedral in London [B]; but despairing ever to finish it, and growing tired of so much labour and expence, he turned the stream of his liberality another way; and, exchanging the manor of Landisworth for a place in the diocese of London called St Osth de Chich, he built there a convent of Regular Canons (e) [C]. Being seized with a dead palsy, and thereby dis-

[A] His consecration. He was consecrated by Anselm, Archbishop of Canterbury, in his chapel of Pagenham, after having made the profession of canonical obedience to that Prelate. The King, it seems, impatient of delay, desired he might be immediately consecrated, though out of the metropolitan church, because, knowing his address in the management of secular affairs, he intended to employ him as soon as possible in the western parts of England. Rex enim moræ impatiens Ricardum cito (quævis extra ecclesiam metropolitanicam) consecrari petiit, utpote qui illum in secularibus multum valentem ad negotia sua apud occidentales Angliæ fines gerenda statim transmissurus erat (1). Simeon of Durham tells us (2), the Archbishop was assisted in the ceremony by the Bishops of Winchester, Salisbury, Chichester, and Exeter; and that Richard, in imitation of his predecessors, made a handsome present, on the day of his consecration, to the cathedral church of Canterbury.

[B] He expended large sums of money on the structure of the cathedral church of St Paul's. He purchased several adjoining houses of the owners, which he pulled down, and converted the ground they stood upon into a church-yard, which he surrounded on all sides with a very high wall. Bishop Godwin thinks this wall remained entire in his time, though no part of it was to be seen by reason of the houses, with which it was on all sides covered. Ille vero ad ecclesiæ suæ structuram totus intentus, ædificia quàmplurima ipsi vicina à possessoribus redemit; quibus demolitis, areas illarum in cæmeterium convertit, quod muro valde excelso circumdique. Vix tamen hic murus, quamquam integer adhuc ut puto, comparat usquam, à domibus hodie usque quæ constructus (3). Notwithstanding the large sums expended by this Bishop of London, and his successors, on the fabric of St Paul's, it was not finished (as Dugdale in his History of that cathedral informs us) till near two hundred years after his death, viz. about the year 1312, being that year paved with good firm marble (4).

[C] He built a convent of regular Canons at St Osth de Chich. This place is in the county of Essex. Let us hear our great Antiquarian: 'Below this town qualified for the exercise of his episcopal functions, he intended to have resigned his bishopric, and to have spent the remainder of his life in the monastery of his own foundation: but whilst he delayed his purpose from day to day, he was prevented by death (f), which took him out of this life, Jan. 16, 1127 (g); and he was buried in the convent of St Osih (b).

town (Colchester), where the Coln empties itself into the sea, lies the little town of St Osih; the former name was Chich; the present it received from the holy virgin St Osih, who, devoting herself entirely to the service of God, and being stabbed here by Danish pirates, was by our ancestors esteemed a Saint. In memory of her, Richard, Bishop of London, about the year 1120, built a religious house; and filled it with Canons regular. This was made an Honour by act of parliament in the 37th year of King Henry VIII, and is the chief feat of the right honourable the Lords Darcy, styled Lords of Chich, and advanced to the dignity of Barons by Edward VI (5).

BELMEIS or BEAUMES (RICHARD DE) II, Bishop of London in the reign of King Stephen, was nephew of Richard de Belmeis, Bishop of London in the preceding reign (a), by that Prelate's brother Walter de Belmeis. Before he came of age, he was appointed by his uncle Archdeacon of Middlesex: but the Bishop was prevailed upon by William, Dean of London, his nephew by his sister Adeline, and by the Prior of Chich, to commit the administration of the archdeaconry, during Richard's minority, to Hugh one of his Chaplains. It was with no small difficulty, that Richard afterwards recovered his archdeaconry out of the hands of this faithless guardian (b) [A]. In the beginning of October 1151, he was advanced to the See of London, in the room of Robert de Sigillo (c), and consecrated at Canterbury by Archbishop Theobald, in the presence of all the Bishops of England, excepting Henry of Winchester, who excused his absence, and approved the choice of Richard, in a letter to the Archbishop (d) [B]. This Prelate died [C] 4 May 1162 (e), leaving behind him a reputation for singular eloquence (f). Wharton tells us, he had seen a seal of this Bishop's, with this inscription round it; Ricardus Lundoniensis Episcopus Secundus (g).

[A] It was with some difficulty he recovered his Archdeaconry out of the hands of Hugh. His uncle Richard being dead, Gilbert Universalis succeeded to the Bishopric of London. And now our Richard's years and merits qualifying him for the episcopacy, he called upon Hugh to deliver up his trust; but this ecclesiastic, finding himself in favour with the present Bishop, and making light of the solemn oath he had taken to resign, invented a thousand frivolous excuses to delay the resignation. At length, Universalis being dead, and Richard having appealed to the Pope, his Holiness sent letters to the Bishops of Lincoln and Hereford, directing them to examine into the matter; who having heard the case, and taken Richard's allegations, divested Hugh, and restored Richard to his just rights. Traitu temporis episcopo Ricardo rebus humanis exempto, Gilebertus Universalis in episcopatum successit. Advenit etiam tempus, quo Ricardus de Belmeis, suffragantibus annis et meritis exigentibus, passus etiam in episcopum sublimari. Capellanus Hugo sepe conventus ut Ricardus restitueret archidiaconatum, velut immemor sacramenti fideique transgressor, consilium suum in alterius mutavit injuriam. Nam in oculis episcopi Lundoniensis se videns gratiam invenisse, frivolas semper invenit occasunculat. Universalis defuncto, sua spes omnis cum episcopo sepelitur. His in audientia communi propositis, dominus papa literas direxit episcopo tam Lincolnienis quam Herefordensis. Quibus de causis cognoscitibus, susceptis Richardi probationibus, Hugo spoliatus est, Ricardus in integrum restitutus (1).

[B] The Bishop of Winchester excused his absence, and approved the choice of Richard, in a letter to the Archbishop. This letter is preserved by Radulphus de Diceto (2), and is as follows: Temporis brevitas, improrsisa vocatio, transitus suspecti, improba predonum molestia, medicamenti sollicitudo adhibita, excusabiles paternitati vestrae nos reddunt. Electioni vero factae et consecrationi faciunde benignum ex affectu praebemus assensum. Quoniam quidem persona et moribus pollet, et industria viget, et scientia floret, credimus quod in domo Dei plantata, adjuvante divinitate, florebit et faciet fructum; i. e. 'The shortness of the time, the unexpectedness of the summons, the danger of travelling, the annoyance of robbers, and my want of health, will excuse me to your fatherhood. However, I give my unfeigned assent to the election already made, and the consecration which is to be performed. And whereas the person chosen is of unquestionable morals, industry, and learning, I am persuaded, that, being planted in the house of God, he will, by the blessing of Heaven, flourish and bring forth fruit.' A testimony so advantageous to the character of this Bishop ought not to be suppressed. And by the way, we may observe from this letter, that the highways at that time must have been infested with robbers in a most extraordinary manner; otherwise a Bishop, who could no doubt have commanded a numerous retinue, would not have alledged the danger of travelling upon that account, as one justifiable reason of his absence.

[C] His death. The latter part of his life (says an Historian) was full of affliction; for being several years unable to speak, he at last died in a wretched condition. Cujus novissima plena erant mœrore; obmutescens enim plurimis annis, tandem tristi sine perit (3). The reader must explain this for himself as well as he can, since the other Historians of those times say nothing of the manner of this Bishop's death, nor afford us any light into the passage here cited. All that we can collect from it is, that the distemper, of which he died, had deprived him of the use of speech for several years before his death.

BELMEYS (JOHN), commonly called Joannes Eboracensis, or John of York, an eminent Divine in the XIIth century (a), was born of a good family (b). After having happily laid the foundations of learning in his own country, he travelled abroad, and visited the most famous universities of France and Italy; where he acquired the reputation of being the most learned man of his time [A]. studies, he returned home, and was made a Canon, and Treasurer of the cathedral church of York: but he soon quitted this post, and went back again into Italy (c). He lived a considerable time at Rome, and had the honour of conversing familiarly with Pope Adrian IV, who was an Englishman by birth. Alexander III, who succeeded Adrian in 1159, made him Bishop of Poitou in France [B], and he was consecrated at the abbey of Dole in the diocese of Berry (d). He sat there twenty years, thirty weeks, and one day, and was from thence translated to the archbishopric of Lyons, and became thereby Primate of all France [C]. He was Archbishop of that city ten years and twenty-nine weeks (e). It is said, he returned into England, in 1194, being then a very old man (f): but we are not told, when or where he died. Bale informs us, that he vehemently opposed Archbishop Becket in the contests he had with King Henry II [D], and that he was very expert at controversial writing (g). His works, which are but few, are mentioned below [E].

Greek, Latin, and Hebrew). The person I mean is, John, Treasurer of York."

[B] He was made Bishop of Poitou in France.] Radulphus de Diceto (2) places this event in the reign of Richard I, under the year 1194; but if Belmeys was advanced to that See by Pope Alexander III, as the same historian tells us, this chronology must be wrong; for Adrian IV, the immediate predecessor of Alexander, died in 1159, and Alexander sat but twenty years or thereabouts (3). And therefore the latter must have been dead in 1180 or 1181, which is thirteen or fourteen years earlier than this date.

[C] He was translated to the Archbishopric of Lyons.] He was elected Archbishop of Narbonne; but before he could procure his Pall from Rome, Pope Lucius III, at the request of the Clergy of Lyons, translated him to that See. Electus est in archiepiscopum Narbonensem. Dum autem Romam Pallium petiturus properaret, anno Domini 1181, a Clero Lugdunensi petitur, et a Lucio Papa tertio constituitur archiepiscopus Lugdunensis, et Galliarum Primas (4).

(4) Pits, de Illust. Angl. Scriptor. an. 1194.

[D] He vehemently opposed Archbishop Becket in the contests he had with King Henry II.] He could not endure the arrogance of that Prelate, and the furious zeal with which he opposed the King; but, without regarding the character he bore of Primate of England and Legate of the Holy See, he boldly reproved him for it, both in person and in his writings. Elatam ar- rogantiam in Thoma archiepiscopo Becketo, atque ejus in regem debacchationes iniquas sustinere non poterat; sed in faciem objiciens, honestis salibus reprehendit. Net id oblitit, quod esset Anglorum Primas, aut à Romana sede Legatus; sed ingenue ac valide illum et voce et scriptis insectabatur (5).

[E] His works.] Leland could not find any thing certainly written by Joannes Eboracensis. He complains of the injuries of time, which have deprived us of the works of so learned a man; and he wishes he had it in his power to search all the libraries of Poitou, that he might bring something of his to light. Sed vide quid tempus edax rerum et invidiosa vetustas faciant: nam nihil à tanto viro, quod sciam, scriptum extat; et nihil ipsum scripsisse adfirmare non res levis, sed stulti judicii est. Quam ego nunc vellem omnes Picardensium bibliothecarum furculos excutere, ut aliquid saltem à tam docto viro scriptum in lucem eruerem! Afterwards he tells us, he had met with a book, intitled, Aurea Joannis Eboracensis Historia; i. e. 'The Golden History of John of York;' but that he could not pretend to affirm, that the writer of it was the same with our author. He observes, that this book contains many remarkable particulars concerning William the Conqueror, and that the Scale Chronicon ascribes it to a certain Vicar of Tillemuth, or Timmouth, without mentioning his name. Nec tamen temere diffinio hunc esse Joannem, cujus vitam præposui. In eo opere multa quidem et præclara de Gulielmo magno, rege Anglorum: Scale chronica attribunt auream Historiam cuidam, suppresso nomine, Tillemuthensis ecclesie vicario (6). In John Leland's Collectanea we have some extracts out of the Scale Chronicon here mentioned; and that which he refers to concerning the book in question is as follows. The Vicar of Tillemouth did write an Historie, thus intituled, Historia Aurea, wherein is much to be seene of Kinge William Conquerors Cumming yn to Englande. The Antiquary's marginal note upon this passage is this: 'The bookes of the Gestes of Lindisfarne, Chester, and Derham, make much mention of historia aurea Joannis Eboracensis. Therefore loke wether they be both one or no (7).'

BENBOW (JOHN) Vice-Admiral of the Blue Squadron, and one of the most eminent English seamen mentioned in our Histories. He was born about the year 1650, and was descended of a very antient, worthy, and honourable family in Shropshire (a), though his father, Colonel John Benbow, and most of his relations, were brought very low by their loyal adherence to the cause of King Charles I, and by the readiness they shewed to assist King Charles II, for the recovery of his rights, when he advanced with the Scots army as far as Worcester, from which accidental poverty, some have represented this Admiral as of mean parentage, directly contrary to truth, as the reader will see in the notes [A]. His father dying when he was very young, left this son John no other provision

[A] Directly contrary to truth, as the reader will see in the notes.] In order to clear up this point a little, and satisfy the world as to the fact asserted in the text, it will be necessary to give some account of this gentleman's father and uncle, and the circumstances I mention are such as will not take up a great deal of room, or by their dryness fatigue or disgust the reader. When the civil wars broke out, King Charles I, relying strongly on the affection of the inhabitants of this country, repaired in person to Shrewsbury, and entered that city on the 20th of September, 1642, and the same day made publick declaration that he did not carry on this war from a thirst of blood, of conquest, or of power, but from a desire of preserving his own just rights, and those of his people; since he was determined, if God gave him success therein, to provision than that of the profession to which he was bred, viz. the sea, a profession to which he had naturally a great propensity, and in which he succeeded so happily, that before he was thirty he became Master, and in a good measure owner, of a ship called the Benbow-Frigate, employed in the Mediterranean trade, in which he had probably acquired a good estate, if an accident that happened to him in the last voyage he made, had not given a new turn to his fortunes, and brought him to serve in the British navy, with equal reputation to himself, and good fortune to his country, to which he rendered many, and those very important, services. In the year 1686, Captain Benbow, in his own vessel beforementioned, was attacked in his passage to Cadiz by a Sallee Rover, against whom he defended himself, though very unequal in the number of men, with the utmost bravery, till at last the Moors boarded him, but were quickly beat out of the ship again, with the loss of thirteen men, whose heads Captain Benbow ordered to be cut off, and thrown into a tub of pork pickle. When he arrived at Cadiz he went ashore, and ordered a Negro servant to follow him, with the Moors heads in a sack. He had scarce landed, before the officers of the revenue enquired of his servant, What he had in his sack? the Captain answered, Salt provisions for his own use. That may be, answered the officers, but we must insist upon seeing them. Captain Benbow alledged, that he was no stranger there, that he did not use to run goods, and pretended to take it ill that he was suspected. The officers told him that the Magistrates were sitting not far off, and that if they were satisfied with his word, his servant might carry the provisions where he pleased, but that otherwise it was not in their power to grant any such dispensation. The Captain consented to the proposal, and away they marched to the Custom-House, Mr Benbow in the front, his man in the centre, and the officers in the rear. The Magistrates, when he came before them, treated Captain Benbow with great civility, told him they were sorry to make a point of such a trifle, but that since he had refused to shew the contents of his sack to their officers, the nature of their employments obliged them to demand a sight of them, and that as they doubted not they were salt provisions, the shewing them could be of no great consequence one way or the other. I told you, said the Captain, sternly, they were salt provisions for my own use. Cæsar, throw them down upon the table, and, gentlemen, if you like them they are at your service. The Spaniards were exceedingly struck at the sight of the Moors heads, and no less astonished at the account of the Captain's adventure, who with so small a force, had been able to defeat such a number of Barbarians. They sent an account of the whole matter to the Court of Madrid, and Charles II, then King of Spain, was so much pleased with it, that he would needs see the English Captain, who made a journey to Court, where he was received with great testimonies of respect, and not only dismissed with a handsome present, but his Catholick Majesty was also pleased to write a letter in his behalf to King James, who upon the Captain's return gave him a ship, which was his introduction to the royal navy. After the

be as tender of the privileges of Parliament as of his own prerogative. Upon this declaration the Lords Newport and Littleton, with the greatest part of the Gentry of the country, came in and offered his Majesty their service (1). Among these were Thomas Benbow, and John Benbow, Esqrs. both men of estates, and both Colonels in the King's service. After the King's affairs fell into confusion, such gentlemen as had served in his army retired to their own countries respectively, and lived there as privately as they could: But though their interests were much reduced, and their fortunes in a great measure ruined, yet their spirits remained unbroken, and they acted as cheerfully for the service of King Charles II, as if they had never suffered at all by serving his father (2): So much a better principle is loyalty than corruption. When therefore that Prince marched from Scotland towards Worcester, the two Benbows, amongst other gentlemen of the county of Salop, went to attend him, and after fighting bravely in the support of their Sovereign, were both taken prisoners by the rebels. That unfortunate battle was fought September 3, 1651, and soon after a Court-Martial was settled at Chester, wherein Colonel Mackworth sat as President, and Major-General Mitton, and other staunch friends to the Cause, assisted; by whom ten Gentlemen of the first families in England were sentenced to death for barely corresponding with his Majesty, and five of them were executed (3). They then proceeded to try Sir Timothy Featherstonhaugh, Colonel Thomas Benbow, and the Earl of Derby, for being in his service. They were all condemned, and, in order to strike the greater terror in different parts of the country, the Earl of Derby was adjudged to suffer death on the 15th of October at Bolton. Sir Timothy to be beheaded on the 17th at Chester, and Colonel Thomas Benbow to be shot on the 19th at Shrewsbury: All which sentences were severally put in execution, which I think sufficiently shews that the Benbows were then, or had been lately, a very considerable family in Shropshire (4); for otherwise the Colonel would hardly have been sent out of the world in so good company. As for Colonel John Benbow, he made his escape after a short imprisonment, and lived privately in his own country 'till after the Restoration, when he was far in years, and yet so much to seek for a livelihood, that he was glad to accept of a small office belonging to the Ordnance in the Tower, which just brought him an income sufficient to subsist himself and his family without danger of starving. In this situation he was, when a little before the breaking out of the first Dutch war, the King came to the Tower to examine the magazines; there his Majesty cast his eye on the good old Colonel, who had now been distinguished by a fine head of grey hair for twenty years. The King, whose memory was as quick as his eye, knew him at first sight, and immediately came up and embraced him. My old friend, Colonel Benbow, said he, what do you here? I have, returned the Colonel, a place of fourscore pounds a year, in which I serve your Majesty as cheerfully as if it brought me in four thousand. Alas! said the King, Is this all that could be found for an old friend at Worcester? Colonel Legge, bring this Gentleman to me to-morrow, and I will provide for him and his family as it becomes me. But, short as the time was, the Colonel did not live to receive, or even to claim the effects of this gracious promise; for the sense of the King's gratitude and goodness so overcame his spirits, that, sitting down on a bench, he breathed his last (5), before the King was well out of the Tower. It may be easily imagined, that as our Mr Benbow was then very young, he must have suffered very much by losing his father, before he felt any effect of the King's promises: But it is not at all probable that he was ever a Waterman's boy, as some writers have asserted.

(5) From the information of the late Paul Calton, Esq;

the Revolution he was constantly employed, and frequently, at the request of the merchants, was appointed to cruise in the channel, where he did very great service, as well in protecting our own trade, as in annoying and distressing that of the enemy. He was likewise generally made choice of for bombarding the French ports, in which he shewed the most intrepid courage, by going in person in his boat to encourage and protect the engineers, who, for that reason, were very solicitous that he should command the efforts whenever they went upon those hazardous enterprizes, in which they knew he would not expose them more than was absolutely necessary, and that he would put them upon running no sort of danger, in which he did not willingly take his share. It is certain, that several of those dreadful bombardments had great effects, spoiled several ports, and terrified the French to the last degree, notwithstanding all the precautions their Government could take to keep up their spirits [B]. The vigour and activity of Captain Benbow, in every service on which he was employed, recommended him so effectually to his royal master King William, who was both a good judge of men, and always willing to reward merit, that he was very early promoted to a flag, and intrusted with the care of blocking up Dunkirk; the privateers from thence proving extremely detrimental to our trade during all that war (b). In 1695, we find him thus employed with a few English and Dutch ships, when the famous Du Bart had the good luck to escape him, with nine sail of clean ships, with which he did a great deal of mischief, both to our trade and to that of the Dutch. Rear-Admiral Benbow, however, followed him as well as he could, but the Dutch ships having, or pretending to have, no orders, quitted him, which hindered him from going to the Dogger-Bank as he intended, and obliged him to sail to Yarmouth roads, into which he was hardly come, before he received advice, that Du Bart had fallen in with the Dutch fleet of seventy merchant-men, escorted by five frigates, and that he had taken all the latter, and thirty of the vessels under their convoy; which might probably have been prevented, if the Rear-Admiral had failed, as he intended, to the Dogger-Bank, and could have persuaded the Dutch to have continued with him (c). As it was, he safely convoyed a great English fleet of merchant-men to Gottenburgh, and then returned to Yarmouth Roads, and from thence to the Downs for a supply of provisions. He afterwards resumed his design of seeking Du Bart, but his ships being much cleaner than the Rear-Admiral's, he escaped him a second time, though once within sight of him; but however he secured three rich English East-India men, that came north about, and brought them safe home (d). In 1697, he sailed, the tenth of April, from Spithead, with seven third-rates and two fire-ships, and after some time returned to

Portsmouth

[B] All the precautions the Government could take to keep up their spirits. In cases of this nature it is always right to have recourse to facts, that the reader may be satisfied as he proceeds, of the truth of what is asserted, and therefore it is requisite that we should give some accounts of the nature and effects of those bombardments. We have made choice of that of St Maloes, both because it was the most extraordinary, and because Commodore Benbow had the command of the squadron by which it was performed (6). On the 13th of November, 1693, Commodore Benbow, in conjunction with Captain Phillips, with a squadron of two men of war, four bomb-vessels, and ten brigantines and well-boats, sailed for St Maloes, where they arrived on the 16th, and about four in the afternoon anchored before Quince-port. Three of the bomb-vessels, with the brigantines and well-boats, bore in and anchored within half a mile of the town; about eleven they began to fire, and continued firing 'till four in the morning, when they were constrained to warp to prevent grounding. On the 17th they went in again, and threw seventy bombs that day. They continued firing on the 18th, but with frequent intermissions, which made the inhabitants believe they were about to withdraw. However they landed on an island near the town, and burnt a convent. On the 19th, being Sunday, they lay still 'till the evening, when, by the favour of a fresh gale of wind, a strong tide, and a very dark night, they sent in an extraordinary fireship of about 300 tons burthen (7), (which the French will have to be a monstrous machine) and which was intended to have reduced the town to ashes, and indeed would have done it but for an unforeseen accident, the struck upon a rock within pistol-shot of the place, where they intended to have moored her. The Engineer who was on board did all he could to get her off, but to no purpose. At last, finding the vessel beginning to open, and fearing the might sink, he set fire to her. The sea-water, which had penetrated in many places, prevented the carcasses from taking fire. The explosion however was terrible beyond description; it shook the whole town like an earthquake, broke all the glass and earthen ware for three leagues round, and struck off the roofs of three hundred houses. The most extraordinary thing of all was this, that the captain of the vessel, which weighed two hundred weight, was carried over the walls, and beat a house it fell upon down to the ground. The greatest part of the walls towards the sea also fell down; and if there had been a sufficient quantity of land-forces on board, the place might have been taken and pillaged. As it was they demolished Quince-fort, carried off eighty prisoners, and frighted most of the people out of the town (8). The French writers say, that this was one of those dreadful machines stiled Infernals, which the Dutch made use of to destroy the bridge over the Scheldt, when the Prince of Parma besieged Antwerp in the year 1585. The reader will observe by the following description, that it was in fact a fireship, contrived to operate, when moored close to the town walls. It was a new ship of about 300, or as the Marquis de Quincy says, 350 tons. At the bottom of the hold were one hundred barrels of powder; these were covered with pitch, sulphur, rosin, tow, straw, and faggots, over which lay beams bored through to give air to the fire, and upon these lay three hundred carcasses filled with granadoes, chain-shot, iron bullets, pistols loaded and wrapt in linen pitched, broken iron bars, and the bottoms of glass bottles (9). There were six holes or mouths to let out the flames, which were so vehement as to consume the hardest substances, and could be checked by nothing but the pouring in of hot water. The French report, that the Engineer who contrived this vessel was blown up in it, because they found the body of a man well dressed upon the shore. and in his pocket-book a journal of the expedition; he was however only a Mate to one of the vessels. This expedition was well timed and well executed; it struck a pannick into the inhabitants of St Malo's, where the most troublesome of the French Privateers were fitted out, and it served to awake the whole nation from their golden dreams of the Empire of the Sea, by shewing them what a very small squadron of English ships could do, when commanded by men of resolution and experience.

Portsmouth for provisions; after which he had the good fortune to join the Virginia and West-India fleets, and saw them safe into port. He then repaired to Dunkirk, where he received, from Captain Bowman, two orders or instructions from the Lords of the Admiralty, one to pursue M. du Bart, and to destroy his ships, if possible, at any place, except under the forts in Norway and Sweden, the other to obey the King's commands, pursuant to an order from his Majesty for that purpose (e). On the thirtieth of July, Rear-Admiral Vandergoes joined him, with eleven Dutch ships, when he proposed, that one of the squadrons should be so placed, as that Dunkirk might be south of them, and the other in or near Ostend road, that if Du Bart should attempt to pass, they might the better discover him; but all the answer he received from the Dutch Commander was, that his ships being foul, they were not in a condition to pursue him. Rear-Admiral Benbow being disappointed in this project, immediately formed another, for, observing; in the beginning of August, that ten French frigates were hauled into the basin to clean, he judged their design to be, what it really proved, to put to sea by the next spring-tide; and therefore, as his ships were all foul, he wrote up to the Board to desire, that four of the best sailors might be ordered to Sheerness to clean, and that the others might come to the Downs, not only to take in water, which they very much wanted, but also to heel and scrub, which he judged might be done, before the next spring-tide gave the French an opportunity of getting over the bar. But this was not then thought advisable, though he afterwards received orders for it, when the thing was too late. By this unlucky accident, the French had an opportunity given them, of getting out with five clean ships, which however did not hinder the Admiral from pursuing them as well as he was able, and some ships of his squadron had the good luck, to take a Dunkirk privateer of ten guns and sixty men, which had done a great deal of mischief (f). This was one of the last actions of the war, and the Rear-Admiral soon after received orders, to return home with the squadron under his command. It is very remarkable, that as the disappointments we met with in the course of this war, occasioned very loud complaints against such as had the direction of our maritime affairs, and against several of our Admirals, there was not one word said, in any of the warm and bitter pamphlets of those times, to the prejudice of Mr Benbow. On the contrary, the highest praises were bestowed upon him in many of those pieces, and his vigilance and activity made him equally the darling of the seamen and the merchants; the former giving him always the strongest marks of their affection; and the latter frequently returning him thanks for the signal services he did them, and for omitting no opportunity that offered, of protecting their commerce, even in cases where he had no particular orders, to direct or to require his service (g). But we are to consider these passages, as instances only of his merit, and their gratitude, and not imagine them in any degree owing to his affecting popularity, which was by no means the case. He was a plain downright sea-man, and spoke and acted upon all occasions, without any respect of persons, and with the utmost freedom [C]. After the concluding of the peace

[C] Without any respect of persons, and with the utmost freedom.] At this time the nation was distracted by factions, and in most publick offices there was a great deal of that sort of influence, which however useful it might be to private families, was very fatal to the publick, and in nothing more so than in the management of the Navy, which occasioned very loud and general complaints throughout the kingdom. The Earl of Torrington, who was at the head of the Navy, immediately after the Revolution found ways and means to gain so strong an interest in the fleet, that it was judged by many inconsistent with the publick safety. After this Admiral Russel, who in process of time was created Earl of Orford, came to have the direction of our Naval affairs, and in point of influence followed the same steps with his predecessor (10). It does not at all appear that our Rear-Admiral was much obliged to either of these great persons, but rather owed his flag to his own merit and the general voice of the seamen, which was the reason that he never attached himself to any party; and, to say the truth, Politicks were never his study; so that if he wanted the support of any faction, he stood likewise unexposed to opposition, both sides treated him civilly, considered him as a good and useful officer, and as a able sea-man (11). The King consulted him about a famous question of those times, which was as to the expediency of preferring Tars, as they were called, or Gentlemen in the Navy; and though Mr Benbow considered himself, and was considered by all the world as one of the former, yet he told the King it was safest to employ both, and that the danger lay in preferring Gentlemen without merit, and Tars beyond their capabilities (12). He interested himself upon all occasions in favour of the sailors, and as he always used them well while a private Captain, so, after he was promoted to the rank of a Flag-Officer, he was constantly their patron, which made him much beloved by them. He very seldom interested himself in preferments, and where it was in his own power to bestow them, he always considered long service and merit. His acquaintance with the Merchants, and having been bred in their service, gave him a great concern for commerce, and therefore he always preferred securing our own merchantships to the making prizes; he was a great enemy to Privateers, because he thought they ruined discipline, and after a war was over seldom failed of producing Pirates. He never had any great interest at Court, nor did he affect it; but when his judgment was asked he gave it very freely, and sometimes gave it unasked to the Lords of the Admiralty (13). He had a very high notion of the English Naval power, and always thought that we were a great over-match for the French. He had a better opinion than most other seamen of the bombarding the coasts of France; and it was observable, that none of those expeditions succeeded so well as that under his direction. He knew the importance of destroying Dunkirk, and therefore he was for encouraging all attempts for that purpose, in which he exposed his person very freely; but it appears from several papers, that he had no great opinion of blocking up that Port, especially with large ships, and therefore more than once proposed the keeping a convenient number of light clean frigates constantly upon that station. He sometimes differed with the Dutch, but never quarrelled with their commanders, imputing their slowness to their orders, and the bad condition of their ships to some disorders in their Government. On the other hand, the Dutch had a very good opinion of him, and spoke of him as a very vigilant and active officer in their Gazettes and publick papers. He looked upon discipline as a point of the greatest consequence, especially amongst officers, and in this there were many who thought him a little too severe, of Ryfwyck, and even while the partition treaties were negotiating, King William formed a defign of doing fomething very confiderable in the Weft-Indies, in cafe his pacifick views fhould be difappointed, or Charles II of Spain, fhould die fuddenly as was daily expected. There were indeed many reafons, which rendered the fending a fquadron at that time, into thofe parts, highly ufeful and requifite. Our colonies were in a very weak and defencelefs condition, the feas fwarmed with pirates, the Scots had eftablifhed a colony at Darien, which, very unluckily for them, gave the Englifh little fatisfaction, at the fame time that it provoked the Spaniards very much (b). King William himfelf fixed upon Rear-Admiral Benbow to command this fquadron, which proved but a very fmall one, as confifting only of three fourth rates; and when he went to take upon him his command, he received private inftructions from the King, to make the beft obfervations he could on the Spanifh ports and fettlements, but to keep as fair as poffible with the Governors, and to afford them any affiftance he could if they defired it. He was likewife inftructed to watch the galleons, for the King of Spain, Charles II, was then thought to be in a dying condition (i). Rear-Admiral Benbow failed in the month of November, 1698, and did not arrive in the Weft-Indies till the February following, where he found things in a very indifferent fituation. Moft of our colonies were in a bad condition, many of them engaged in warm difputes with their Governors, the forces that fhould have been kept up in them for their defence, fo reduced by ficknefs, defection, and other accidents, that little or nothing was to be expected from them; but the Admiral carried with him Colonel Collingwood's regiment, which he difpofed of to the beft advantage in the Leeward Iflands (k). This part of his charge being executed, he began to think of performing the other part of his commiffion, and of looking into the ftate of the Spanifh affairs, as it had been recommended to him by the King: and a proper occafion of doing this very fpeedily offered; for being informed, that the Spaniards at Carthagen a had feized two of our fhips, with an intent to employ them in an expedition they were then meditating againft the Scots at Darien: He, like a brave and publick spirited Commander, as he really was, refolved to prevent it, and reftore thofe fhips to their right owners. With this view he ftood over to the Spanifh coaft, and coming before Bocchonica caftle, he fent his men afhore for wood and water, which though he afked with great civility of the Spanifh Governor, he would fcarce permit him to take; this highly nettled the Admiral, who thereupon fent his own Lieutenant to the Governor, with a meffage importing, that he not only wanted thofe neceffaries, but that he came likewife for three Englifh fhips that lay in the harbour, and had been detained there for fome time, which, if not fent to him immediately, he would come and take by force. The Governor answered him in very refpectful terms, that if he would leave his prefent ftation, in which he feemed to block up their port, the fhips fhould be fent out to him. With this request the Admiral complied, but finding the Governor trifled with him, and that his men were in danger of falling into the country diftemper, which they doubted the Spanifh Governor forefaw, he fent him another meffage, that if, in twenty-four hours the fhips were not fent him, he would come and fetch them, and that if he kept them longer than that time, he would have an opportunity of feeing, the regard an Englifh officer had to his word. The Spaniards however did not think fit to make the experiment, but fent out the fhips within the time, with which the Admiral returned to Jamaica. There he received an account, that the Spaniards at Porto-Bello, had feized feveral of our fhips employed in the fave trade, on the old pretence, that the fettlement at Darien was a breach of peace. At the defire of the parties concerned, the Admiral failed thither alfo, and demanded thefe fhips, but received a furlly answer from the Admiral of the Barlovento fleet, who happened to be then at Porto-Bello. Rear-Admiral Benbow expoftulated with him on this head, infifting, that as the fubjects of the crown of England had never injured thofe of his Catholick Majefty, he ought not to make prize of their fhips for injuries done by another nation. The Spaniards replied fhrewdly, that fince both crowns ftood on the fame head, it was no wonder that he took the fubjects of the one crown for the other. After many altercations however, and when the Spaniards faw that the colony at Darien received no affiftance from Jamaica, the fhips were, with much to do, reftored (l). The Admiral, in the mean time, failed in queft of one Kidd a pirate, who had done a great deal of mischief in the Eaft and Weft-Indies, and of whom, hereafter, we fhall in the notes fpeak more largely. On his return to Jamaica, towards the latter end of the year, he received a fupply of provifions from England, and foon after, orders to return home, which he did with fix men of war, taking New England in his way, and arrived fafe (m), bringing with him from the plantations, fufficient testimonies of his having difcharged his duty, which fecured him from all danger of censure, though the

but he very early forefaw the mifchiefs that muft follow from any relaxation of difcipline amongst commanders, and that it would have confequences very fatal to the publick fervice (n). He was the more ftrict in this refpect, becaufe he was never wanting in his own example, fpendng his whole time in his duty; and when others alledged, that there muft be fome leifure for amufement, diverfion, and going afhore to their friends, and about bufinefs, his answer was, Why fhould people who have other bufinefs, or love being on fhore, think of going to fea. But this conduct, however right in itfelf, raifed him many enemies, and indeed all the enemies he had; and which, as will appear in the fequel, proved fatal to his life.

House of Commons expressed very high resentment, at some circumstances that attended the sending this fleet. But in regard to the Admiral, the greatest compliments were paid to his courage, capacity, and integrity, by all parties, and the King, as a signal mark of his kind acceptance of all his services, granted him an augmentation of arms, which consisted in adding to the three Bent Bows, he already bore, as many Arrows, which single act of royal favour, sufficiently destroys the foolish report of his being of mean extraction (n). His conduct in this expedition raised him so much in the King's esteem, that he consulted him as much or more than any man of his rank, and yet without making the Admiral himself vain, or exposing him in any degree to the dislike of the Ministers [D]. It may be easily imagined, that in the time the Rear-Admiral spent in the West-Indies, the face of affairs was much changed, indeed so much they were changed, that the King was forced to think of a new war, though he was sensible the nation suffered severely from the effects of the old one. His first care therefore was, to put his fleet into the best order possible, and to distribute the commands therein, to officers that he could depend upon; and to this it was, Mr Benbow owed his being promoted to the rank of Vice-Admiral of the Blue (o). He was at that time cruising off Dunkirk, in order to prevent, what was then much dreaded here, an invasion. There was as yet no war declared between the two crowns, but this was held to be no security against France, and it was no sooner known that they were fitting out a stout squadron at Dunkirk, than it was firmly believed, to be intended to cover a descent. Vice-Admiral Benbow satisfied the Ministry, that there was no danger on this side, and then it was resolved to prosecute, without delay, the projects formerly concerted, in order to disappoint the French in their views upon the Spanish succession; and to facilitate this, it was thought necessary to send, immediately, a strong squadron to the West-Indies. This squadron was to consist of two third-rates, and eight fourths, which was as great a strength as could be at that time spared, and it was thought perfectly requisite, that it should be under the command of an officer, whose courage and conduct might be relied on, and whose experience might give the world a good opinion of the choice made of him for this command, upon the right management of which, it was believed the success of the approaching war would in a great measure depend (p). Mr Benbow was thought on by the Ministry, as soon as the expedition was determined, but the King would not hear of it. He said that Benbow was in a manner just come home from thence, where he had met with nothing but difficulties, and therefore it was but fit, some other officer should take his turn. One or two were named and consulted, but either their health

[D] In any degree to the dislike of the Ministers] It has been before owned, and indeed there could have been no justice done this Gentleman's character without owning it, that he was no Politician or Courtier, and surely he was still less a pretender to Patriotism or Popularity; but yet such a charm there is in truth, and a conscientious regard to duty, that he came home in the good graces of all parties, without having in the least studied to oblige any of them. It must be confessed, that many accidents concurred to render this expedition of his so remarkable; but it may be likewise averred, that it was his conduct turned them all to his advantage. His care and diligence in visiting the Plantations, and not barely visiting them, but inquiring into their wants, and yielding them all the assistance and relief that was in his power, gained him a great reputation in the West-Indies, and with all who had any concerns in that part of the world. His vigilance in pursuing Pirates, and his recovering so many ships out of the hands of the Spaniards, recommended him to the Merchants. The whole nation of Scotland thought themselves obliged by the pains he took to thwart the Spanish expedition against Darien; and nothing could be more grateful to the people of England than the spirit he had shewn in supporting the honour of the English Flag. We have a strong proof of his disinterested zeal for justice, and concern for the honour of his country, in the readiness with which, at the request of the Governor of one of our Colonies, he went to expostulate with a Danish commander for giving shelter to, and entering into commerce with, Pirates, contrary to the strict rules of honour, as well as to the law of nations. The fact is very clearly set down by one who was well acquainted with it, and is remarkable enough to deserve our notice (15). 'At the request of the President of the Council of Nevis, he failed to the island of St Thomas, inhabited chiefly, if not altogether, by subjects of Denmark, and demanded by what authority they bore the flag of that nation on Crab Island, since it appertained to the King of England, his master. He also let the Governor know, that it was not agreeable to the law of nations to trade with Pirates (it being evident that he had suffered great part of Kidd's effects to be landed at that port), and demanded of him all subjects of England who were non-resident there. The Governor seemed surprized at his making any objections to the Flag, and insisted that the island whereon it flew was actually the King of Denmark's. The Port he said was free, and since the Brandenburg Factors had received part of Kidd's effects, he could by no means molest, but, on the contrary, was obliged to protect them. He averred, that there were not any of the subjects of England on the island, Captain Sharpe, a noted Pirate, only excepted, who was confined for misdemeanors, and having sworn allegiance to the King of Denmark, could not justifiably be delivered up, so that the Rear-Admiral was obliged to desist, for his instructions did not empower him to act in an hostile manner.' Some other men, when vested with such a command, might have taken it ill from a provisional Governor of a little Colony, to be thus directed in the discharge of their duty; but the Vice-Admiral had quite another notion of things, and neither pretended to knowledge that he had not, nor thought himself above taking the opinion, or following the advice, of such as he had reason to judge might have a better opportunity of understanding things than he. There had happened in his absence a considerable change in King William's ministry, but that no way affected the fortune of our Commander, for as he was the creature of no Ministry, so, as it was very natural, every administration was very well pleased to reap the benefit of his services; and this was the reason, that when it soon after appeared requisite, and even absolutely necessary, to send another squadron into those seas, as well to look after our own affairs, as to be in a condition to attack the French whenever a war broke out, the new Ministry immediately thought of Mr Benbow, as a man not only well qualified for that service, but whose reputation was so well established, that they ran no kind of hazard in recommending him to that post, though it was then judged, and with good reason, a thing of the last consequence, and upon which the success of the war might in a great measure depend, or at least the length of it, in case we had been so lucky as to have seized the galleons (16).

health or their affairs were in such disorder, that they most earnestly desired to be excused (q). Upon which the King said merrily to some of his Ministers, alluding to the dress and appearance of these gentlemen, Well then, I find we must spare our Beaus, and send honest Benbow. His Majesty accordingly sent for him upon this occasion, and asked him, Whether he was willing to go to the West-Indies? assuring him if he was not, he would not take it at all amiss if he desired to be excused. Mr Benbow answered bluntly, that he did not understand such compliments, that he thought he had no right to chuse his station, and that if his Majesty thought fit to send him to the East or West-Indies, or any where else, he would cheerfully execute his orders as became him (r). Thus the matter was settled in very few words, and the command of the West-India Squadron conferred, without any mixture of envy, on our Vice-Admiral Benbow. To conceal the design of this Squadron, but above all, to prevent the French from having any just notion of it's force, Sir George Rooke, then Admiral of the fleet, had orders to convoy it as far as the Isles of Scilly, and to send a strong Squadron with it thence, to see it well into the sea, all which he punctually performed; so that Admiral Benbow departed in the month of October 1701, the world in general believing that he was gone with Sir John Munden, who commanded the Squadron that accompanied him into the Mediterranean; and to render this more credible, the Dutch Minister at Madrid was ordered to demand the free use of all the Spanish ports, which was accordingly performed (s). As soon as it was known in England, that Vice-Admiral Benbow was sailed with ten ships only for the West-Indies, and it was discovered that the great armament at Brest was intended for the same part of the world, a mighty clamour was raised here at home, as if he had been sent to be sacrificed, and heavy reflections were made upon the inactivity of our grand fleet (t); whereas, in truth, the whole affair had been conducted with all imaginable prudence, and the Vice-Admiral had as considerable a Squadron, as, all things maturely weighed, it was, in that critical juncture, thought possible to be spared (u). It is certain, that King William formed great hopes of this expedition, knowing well, that Mr Benbow would execute, with the greatest spirit and punctuality, the instructions he had received, which were, to engage the Spanish Governors, if possible, to disown King Philip, or in case that could not be brought about, to make himself master of the galleons (w). In this design it is plain that the Admiral would have succeeded, notwithstanding the smallness of his force, if his officers had done their duty; and it is no less certain, that the anxiety the Vice-Admiral was under about the execution of his orders, was the principal reason for his maintaining so strict discipline, which proved unluckily the occasion of his coming to an untimely end. Yet there is no reason to censure either the King's project, or the Admiral's conduct, both were right in themselves, though neither was attended with the success they deserved, which is too often the case, even of the best concerted expeditions [E]. The French had the same reasons that we had, to be very

[E] Which is too often the case, even of the best concerted expeditions.] We need not wonder that great complaints were made, as to the management of these affairs at this juncture, when we find that even so great a man as Bishop Burnet is pleased to say of the transactions of this year, 'That our fleets lay all this summer idle in those seas, while the French had many Squadrons lay in the Spanish Ports, and in the West-Indies (17).' He did not certainly consider, that as yet there was no war declared; that the French King had procured a Neutrality in Germany; that things were far from being settled between us and our Allies abroad, and the minds of the people and their representatives much farther from being settled at home; so that the only use that could be made of the fleet, was to amuse the French and Spaniards, to disturb and distract their measures, and to put things into the best method for acting when war should be actually declared. But to make this matter still clearer, we will give the reader a paragraph from a very popular pamphlet published at that time, in which this matter is set in the strongest light that angry people could represent it (18). 'A new war, says he, I believe to be unavoidable, and we are much beholden to the last Parliament that we are not entered into it already; and so become the Fight-alls, the Pay-alls, and the Loose-alls of Europe, as we have hitherto been. But if we have a war managed as was the last, we had better spend a little money in bombs and chains to secure our ships in harbour, than to send them abroad to lose our money, lose our reputation, and not secure our trade. I cannot persuade myself that the Parliament of England will ever more send the native strength of their country abroad in other peoples quarrels, and to be at the charge of levies, cloathing, arms, and transportation, to put their own liberties in danger at home by a standing army, when they have done the business of our Allies abroad. The men we lost, and the money we spent in the late war, as also how hard it was to get them disbanded, in opposition to the interest of men that wanted them to support their titles to their illegal grants and ill-gotten gain, is too fresh in our memories ever to bring ourselves under the like hardships. I foresee now, that the war will be at sea, and we have but a very ill omen of success from the last summer's expedition of our fleet; our modern Whigs, in their Legion letters, and Kentish Petition, exclaimed against the Parliament, because they raised no more money. But I hope those folk, if they have any brains or honesty, are now sensible of their groundless complaint. When they find how little has been done for what was there raised, they gave one million five hundred thousand pounds for the fleet for this summer's expedition; and what has been the effect, the whole fleet went to convoy Benbow in his way to the West-Indies, and while they were gone, our modern Whigs boasted of the conduct, and built castles in the air, to hold the money they would bring home in the Spanish galleons; but in a short time we found them all at Spithead, except a few ships that proceeded with Benbow to the West-Indies, where, if they be not Talma-bed, they have good fortune. Would it not have tended much to the good of the Empire, and to the strengthening of the confederacy for England, to have had a good Squadron this summer in the Straights, which might have animated the Neapolitans in the Emperor's interest, and so disheartened the French party, that in all probability Naples had been in the Emperor's hands.' At this distance of time we can see plainly there is very little, either of sense or honesty, in these objections. In the beginning of the paragraph a new war is unavoidable, yet, in the speaker's judgment, (for this pamphlet is a dialogue) unnecessary; but the fleet's inactivity is a crime for all this, and sending Benbow a crime likewise; but, worst of all, our not sending very attentive to what passed in the West-Indies, and it must be acknowledged, that they prosecuted their designs with great wisdom and circumspection, and, which is very extraordinary, they so contrived, as to send for this purpose a force much superior to ours (x), which however would have availed them little, if Admiral Benbow's officers had been of the same stamp with himself. But it so fell out, that he shewed much more conduct than even his friends expected, and they less courage than any Englishman ever did, which gave that advantage to the French, their own schemes, though closely laid, could never otherwise have obtained [F]. Admiral Benbow's squadron, consisting of two third and eight fourth-rates, arrived at Barbadoes on the third of November 1701, from whence he sailed to the Leeward-Islands, in order to examine the state of the French colonies and our own. He found the former in some confusion, and the latter in so good a situation, that he thought he ran no hazard in leaving them to go to Jamaica, where, when he arrived, his fleet was in so good a condition, the Admiral, officers, and sea-men, being most of them used to the climate, that he had not occasion to send above ten men to the Hospital, which was looked upon as a very extraordinary thing (y). There he received advice of two French squadrons being arrived in the West-Indies, which alarmed the inhabitants of that island and of Barbadoes very much. After taking care, as far as his strength would permit, of both places, he formed a design of attacking Petit Guavas, but before he could execute it, he had intelligence, that Monsieur Du Caffé was in the neighbourhood of Hispaniola, with a squadron of French ships, with an intent to settle the Affiento in favour of the French, and to destroy the English and Dutch trade for Negroes (z). Upon this he detached Rear-Admiral Whetstone in pursuit of him, and on the eleventh of July 1702, he sailed from Jamaica, in order to have joined the Rear-Admiral, but having intelligence that Du Caffé was expected at Leogane, on the north side of Hispaniola, he plied for that port, before which he arrived on the twenty-seventh. Not far from the town he perceived several ships at anchor, and one under sail, who sent out her boat to discover his strength, which coming too near was taken; from the crew of which they learned, that there were six merchant ships in the port, and that the ship they belonged to was a man of war of fifty guns, which the Admiral pressed so hard, that the Captain seeing no probability of escaping, ran the ship on shore and blew her up. On the twenty-eighth the Admiral came before the town, where he found a ship of about eighteen guns hauled under their fortifications, which however did not hinder his burning her. The rest of the ships had sailed before day, in order to get into a better harbour, viz. Cul de Sac. But some of our ships between them and that port, took three of them and sunk a fourth (a). The Admiral, after alarming Petit Guavas, which he found it impossible to attack, sailed for Donna Maria Bay, where he continued till the tenth of August, when, having received advice that Monsieur Du Caffé was sailed for Carthagena, and from thence was to sail to Porto Bello, he resolved to follow him, and accordingly sailed sending a fleet to the Mediterranean, though the sending and keeping fleets there in the last war, is most bitterly inveighed against through the whole pamphlet.

[F] Their own schemes, though closely laid, could never otherwise have obtained. It is impossible to form a right judgment of the conduct of Admiral Benbow in this expedition, without knowing what measures were taken, with respect to the affairs of the West-Indies, by the French, who, as soon as they resolved to accept the Will of Charles II, in favour of the Duke of Anjou, immediately projected the sending a squadron, with all sorts of necessaries, to the Spanish West-Indies; and the person they made choice of for this command was M. Du Caffé, Governor of St Domingo; but before he could be sent upon this service, it was requisite to have the consent of the Spaniards, who, though they could not but be sensible of their own weakness, had notwithstanding so strong an aversion to the French, that it was foreseen they would make a great difficulty of accepting their assistance; and therefore M. Du Caffé was dispatched to Madrid to settle all these points, which in some time, and with much pains, he did (19). But after the Spanish nobility had once given their consent, that this squadron should be received in the Spanish ports of America, they were continually pressing the French to have it sent thither. The French ministry foresaw what would come to pass, and therefore had taken care to have a squadron ready at Brest, consisting of five ships of the Line, and several large vessels laden with arms and ammunition, which, under the command of the Marquis de Coetlogon, in the month of April, 1701, sailed for the Spanish West-Indies; and on the 20th of October the Count de Chateau Renaud sailed with fourteen ships of the Line, and sixteen frigates, to meet the galleons that were supposed to be already departed from the Havanna, under the escort of the Marquis de Coetlogon; and after all this, M. Du Caffé likewise failed with his squadron; from whence the English reader will easily see, that as Admiral Benbow received no supplies, he was like to have been crushed by the superior power of the enemy, and that extraordinary diligence which was used to strengthen and support them (20). Yet the French authors themselves own, that all the great projects they had formed for attacking Jamaica and the Leeward Islands, and even for driving the English out of most of their possessions in America, were entirely disappointed and defeated; and instead of finding themselves in any condition of executing them as they expected, they were obliged to act upon the defensive; and the Dutch writers of those times expressly say, after all their blustering, the English Admiral, with a small squadron, remained a long time master in those seas, alarmed and insulted the French settlements in Hispaniola, took a great number of prizes, and so effectually protected the British commerce, that, notwithstanding the great superiority of the French, they were not able to do any thing considerable (21). These testimonies sufficiently shew what mighty things the naval force of this country is able to perform when conducted by an active and experienced officer, who has the interest of his country at heart, and on whom our colonies can safely place their dependence. This was certainly the case with respect to our Admiral, who never had any differences with the Governors in the West-Indies, or disputes with the inhabitants or merchants, which after his death proved so fatal to the service in that part of the world, as the reader may find not only in our general and naval Histories, but also in the representations from the House of Lords, and in the addresses and votes of the House of Commons, complaining of the bad behaviour of several subsequent Commanders, whence it may be easily conceived how great a loss the public had, by the untimely death of this brave and worthy officer.

failed that day for the Spanish coast of Santa Martha (b). On the nineteenth of August in the afternoon, he discovered ten sail near that place, steering westward along the shore under their top-sails, four of them were from sixty to seventy guns, one a great Dutch built ship of about thirty or forty, another full of soldiers, three small vessels, and a sloop. The Vice-Admiral coming up with them, about four the engagement began. He had disposed his line of battle in the following manner, viz. the Defiance, Pendennis, Windsor, Breda, Greenwich, Ruby, and Falmouth. But two of these ships, the Defiance and Windsor, did not stand above two or three broad-sides before they loosed out of gun-shot, so that the two sternmost ships of the enemy lay on the Admiral, and gauled him very much, nor did the ships in the rear come up to his assistance with the diligence they ought to have done (c). The fight lasted however till dark, and though the firing then ceased, the Vice-Admiral kept them company all night. The next morning at break of day he was near the French ships, but none of his squadron except the Ruby was with him, the rest being three, four, or five miles a-stern.

(c) Burchet's Naval History, p. 594.

Notwithstanding which, the French did not fire a gun at the Vice-Admiral, though he was within their reach. At two in the afternoon the French drew into a line, though at the same time they made what sail they could without fighting. However the Vice-Admiral and the Ruby kept them company all night, plying their chase guns. Thus the Vice-Admiral continued pursuing, and at some times skirmishing with the enemy, for four days more, but was never duly seconded by several of the ships of his squadron (p).

The twenty-third, about noon, the Admiral took from them a small English ship, called the Anne Galley, which they had taken off of Lisbon; and the Ruby being disabled, he ordered her to Port Royal. About eight at night the whole squadron was up with the Vice-Admiral, and the enemy not two miles off. There was now a prospect of doing something, and the Vice-Admiral made the best of his way after them, but his whole squadron, except the Falmouth, fell a-stern again. At two in the morning, the twenty-fourth, the Vice-Admiral came up with the enemy's sternmost ship, and fired his broad-side, which was returned by the French ship very briskly, and about three the Vice-

Admiral's right-leg was broken to pieces by a chain-shot (q). In this condition he was carried down to be dressed, and while the surgeon was at work, one of his Lieutenants expressed great sorrow for the loss of his leg, upon which the Admiral said to him, I am sorry for it too, but I had rather have lost them both, than have seen this dishonour brought upon the English nation. But, do ye bear, if another shot should take me off, behave like brave men and fight it out (r). As soon as it was practicable, he caused himself to be carried up, and placed, with his cradle, upon the quarter-deck, and continued the fight till day. They then discovered the ruins of one of the enemy's ships, that carried seventy guns, her main-yard down and shot to pieces, her fore top-sail-yard shot away, her mizen-mast shot by the board, all her rigging gone, and her sides tore to pieces. The Admiral, soon after, discovered the enemy standing towards him with a strong gale of wind. The Windsor, Pendennis, and Greenwich, a-head of the enemy, came to the leeward of the disabled ship, fired their broad-sides, passed her, and stood to the southward. Then came the Defiance, fired part of her broad-side, when the disabled ship returning about twenty guns, the Defiance put her helm a-weather, and run away right before the wind, lowered both her top-sails, and ran in to the leeward of the Falmouth, without any regard to the signal of battle. The enemy seeing the other two ships stand to the southward, expected they would have tacked and stood towards them, and therefore they brought their heads to the northward, but when they saw those ships did not tack, they immediately bore down upon the Admiral, and ran between their disabled ship and him, and poured in all their shot, by which they brought down his main top-sail-yard, and shattered his rigging very much, none of the other ships being near him, or taking the least notice of his signals, though Captain Fogg ordered two guns to be fired at the ship's head, in order to put them in mind of their duty. The French, seeing things in this condition, brought to, and lay by their own disabled ship, remanned, and took her into tow (s). The Breda's rigging being much shattered, she was forced to lie by till ten o'clock, and being then refitted, the Admiral ordered the Captain to pursue the enemy, then about three miles to the leeward, his line of battle signal out all the while, and Captain Fogg, by the Admiral's orders, sent to the other Captains, to order them to keep the line and behave like men. Upon this Captain Kirkby came on board the Admiral, and told him, He had better desist, that the French were very strong, and that from what passed he might guess, he could make nothing of it. The brave Admiral Benbow, more surprized at this language, than at all that had hitherto happened, said very calmly, that this was but one man's opinion, and therefore made a signal for the rest of the Captains to come on board, which they did in obedience to his orders, but when they came, they fell too easily into Captain Kirkby's sentiments, and, in conjunction with him, signed a paper, importing, that, as he had before told the Admiral, there was nothing more to be done, though at this very time they had the fairest opportunity imaginable of taking or destroying the enemy's whole squadron; for ours consisted then of one ship of seventy guns, one of sixty-four, one of sixty, and three of fifty, their yards, masts, and in general all their tackle in as good condition as could be expected, the Admiral's own ship excepted, in which their loss was considerable, but in the rest they had eight only killed and wounded, nor were they in any want of ammunition necessary to continue the fight. The enemy, on the other hand, had but four ships of between sixty and seventy guns, one of which was entirely disabled and in tow, and all the rest very roughly handled; so that even now if these officers had done their duty, it is morally certain they might have taken them all (t). But Vice-Admiral Benbow, seeing himself absolutely without support, (his own Captain having signed the paper beforementioned) determined to give over the fight, and to return to Jamaica, though he could not help declaring openly, that it was against his own sentiments, in prejudice to the publick service, and the greatest dishonour that had ever befallen the English navy (u). The French, glad of their escape, continued their course towards the Spanish coasts, and the English squadron soon arrived safe in Port-Royal harbour, where, as soon as the Vice-Admiral came on shore, he ordered the officers who had so scandalously misbehaved, to be brought out of their ships and confined, and immediately after directed a commission to Rear-Admiral Weston to hold a Court Martial for their trial, which was accordingly done, and upon the fullest and clearest evidence that could be desired, some of the most guilty were condemned, and suffered according to their deserts (w) [G]. [G] The most guilty were condemned, and suffered according to their deserts.] The Vice-Admiral, upon his arrival at Jamaica, thought it a thing of the last importance to secure the ships under his command, by bringing those officers immediately to a trial whose fidelity he had so much reason to suspect; and therefore he issued a commission to Captain Whetstone, whom he had appointed Rear-Admiral of his squadron, to hold a Court-Martial for the trial of the offenders, which he accordingly did, and nobody made the least scruple of acting under that authority, though it has been doubted whether he had a power to grant such a commission; and Mr Secretary Burchet is very clear he could not, for he says expressly, that he had no authority to delegate his power to another; but the Admiral it seems thought otherwise, and believed it more agreeable to the rules of justice and common-sense, to delegate his power to another, than to act as judge, party, and witness himself; and I believe most people, who consider the case, will be rather of the Admiral's than of the Secretary's opinion, who, though he probably intended no more than to censure poor Vice-Admiral Benbow for preferring justice and humanity to form, yet, if his censure hath any force, it falls upon the Queen and the whole nation, by whom the proceedings of that Court-Martial were ratified, and the criminals put to death upon their sentence. But be that as it will, the Court-Martial thus appointed was held on board her Majesty's ship the Breda, in Port-Royal Harbour, on the 8th, 9th, 10th, and 12th days of October, 1702, wherein the following gentlemen sat.

Colonel Richard Kirkby, Commander of the Defiance, was tried upon a complaint exhibited by Arnold Browne, Esq; Judge-Advocate, for cowardice, neglect of duty, breach of orders, and other crimes, committed by him in a fight at sea, commencing the 19th of August, 1702, between the honourable John Benbow, Esq; Vice-Admiral of the blue squadron, Admiral and Commander in chief, &c. and M. du Casse, with four French ships of war, which continued until the 24th of August inclusive. The witnesses sworn in the behalf of the Queen were the honourable John Benbow, Esq; Captain Samuel Vincent, Captain Christopher Hogg, eight Lieutenants, five Masters, and five inferior officers, in all twenty-one, who in general deposed, 'That the said Richard Kirkby led the van in the line of battle the 19th of August, about three in the afternoon, the signal of battle being out, the Admiral was forced to send his boat on board of Kirkby, and command his making more fail, and get a-breadth of the enemy's van, for he was resolved to fight them; but the said Kirkby did not fire above three broadsides, then looped up out of the line, and out of gun-shot, leaving the Admiral engaged with two French ships 'till dark, and the said Kirkby receiving no damage, that his behaviour caused great fear of his desertion. At night the said Kirkby fell a-stern, leaving the Admiral to pursue the enemy. That on the 20th, at day-light, the Admiral and Ruby were within shot of all the enemy's ships; but Colonel Kirkby was near three or four miles a-stern: The Admiral then made a new line of battle, and took the van himself, and sent to each ship, with a command to the said Kirkby to keep his line and station, which he promised to do, but did not, keeping two or three miles a-stern, though the signal for battle was out all night. The French making a running fight, the Admiral and Ruby plied the enemy with their chace-guns 'till night. That the 21st day, at light, the Admiral was on the quarter of the second ship of the enemy's rear, and the Ruby on the broadside very near, who plied him warmly, and met the same return, by which he was so much disabled, though the Admiral came in to his assistance, that he was forced to be towed off, and this prevented the Admiral's design of cutting off the enemy's sternmost ship. This action lasted two hours, during which time the said Kirkby lay broadside of the sternmost ship, as did also the Windsor, John Constable, Commander. The Admiral then commanded the said Kirkby to ply his broadsides on him; but this having no effect, the second time he commanded the same, but he fired not one gun; nay his own boatwain and seamen repeated the Admiral's command to him, but were severely used, and threatened that he would run his sword through the boatwain; and had the said Kirkby done his duty, and Captain Constable done his, they must have taken or destroyed the French ships. The Admiral, though he received much damage in his sails, rigging, yards, &c. yet continued the chace all night. That the 22d in the morning, at day-light, the Greenwich was three leagues a-stern, and the Defiance, Colonel Kirkby, with the rest of the ships, three or four miles, the Falmouth excepted, whose station was in the rear. That the said Captain Samuel Vincent seeing the behaviour of him, and the rest, came up with the Admiral, and sent his Lieutenant on board, desiring leave to assist him, which was accepted, the said Kirkby never coming up, and by his example the rest did the same, as if they had a design to sacrifice the Admiral and Falmouth to the enemy, or desert. The enemy were now about a mile and a half a-head. Standing into the shore with a small breeze at west, fetched within Sambey, the Admiral firing at the sternmost 'till night, and continuing the pursuit, and a Flemish ship that was in M. Du Casse's company, on board of which were all the French and Spanish new Governors, and other officers, made her escape. That the 23d in the morning, at day-light, the enemy bore north-west, distant about four or five miles, the Admiral and Falmouth pursuing; but the said Colonel Kirkby, with the rest of the ships, being three or four miles a-stern (though there was not a ship both before and after the battle but failed better than the Admiral's). About seven in the evening, it having been some time calm, a gale of wind sprung up; the Admiral writers (according to their usual custom) have given quite another turn to this transaction, and

and Falmouth were about two miles from the enemy, and at eight the said Kirkby and his separate squadron were fair up with the Admiral; and this day the Admiral sent away the disabled Ruby, George Walton, Commander, to Port-Royal, and under his convoy the Anne-Galley, retaken from the French. That the 24th in the morning, about two o'clock, the Admiral came up, with the sternmost of the enemy, within call, and the Falmouth pretty near, but the said Colonel Kirkby, with the rest of the ships, according to custom, were three or four miles a-stern. The Admiral and Falmouth engaged the said ship, and at three the Admiral was wounded, his right leg being broke, but commanded the fight to be vigorously maintained; and at day-light the enemy's ship appeared like a wreck, her mizen-mast shot by the board, her main yard in three or four pieces, her foretop-mast-yard the same, her stays and rigging all shot to pieces. Soon after day the said Kirkby, with the rest of his ships, being to windward of the said disabled ships, he the said Kirkby, with the rest of his separate squadron, fired about twelve guns at the said ship, and fearing a smart return from her, he lowering his mizen-yard, his top-sails on the caps, set his sprit-sail top-sail, and fore-top-sail stay-sail, and having waired his ship, set his sail, and ran away before the wind from the poor disabled ship, the rest following his said example, tho' they had but eight men killed on board them all (except the Admiral). The other three French men of war were at this time of action about four miles distant from their maimed ship; whereupon the enemy seeing the cowardice of the said Colonel Kirkby, and the rest of the English ships, in a squall bore down upon the Admiral, who lay close by the disabled ship, and having got in their sprit-sail-yard, gave him all their fire, and running between him and the disabled ship, remanned her, and took her in tow. The Admiral's rigging being very much shattered, was obliged to lie and rest 'till ten o'clock, and then continued the pursuit, and the rest of the Fleet following in the greatest disorder imaginable. The Admiral commanded Captain Fogg to stand a-breast of the enemy's van, and then to attack him; and having then a fine steady gale, the like not happening during the whole engagement, and further ordered that he should send to all the rest of the Captains to keep the Line of battle, and behave themselves like Englishmen: And this message was sent by Captain Wade, then on board the Breda. That the said Colonel Kirkby on the receipt of this message, and seeing the Admiral's resolution to engage, came on board him, who then lay wounded in a cradle, and without common respect of enquiring after his health, he the said Kirkby expressed these words following, viz. That he wondered the Admiral should offer to engage the French again, it being not necessary, safe, nor convenient, having had six days trial of their strength, and then magnified that of the French, and lessened that of the English. But the Admiral, being surprized at his speech, said, It was but one man's opinion, and that he would have the rest of the Captains; and accordingly ordered the signal to be made for all the Captains to come on board, and at this time the Admiral and the rest of the ships were to windward, and within shot of the enemy, and had the fairest opportunity that in six days presented to chase, engage, and destroy the enemy. That the said Colonel Kirkby had endeavoured to poison the rest of the Captains, forming a writing under his own hand, which was cowardly and erroneous; the substance of which was, not to engage the enemy any more. He the said Colonel Kirkby brought it to the Admiral, who reproved him for it, saying, It would be the ruin of them all; upon which he the said Colonel Kirkby went away and writ another in the following words.

It is the opinion of us whose names are under-written,

I. Of the great want of men in number, quality, and the weakness of those they have.

II. The general want of ammunition of most forts.

III. Each ship, masts, sails, and rigging, being all in a great measure disabled.

IV. The winds are so small and variable, that the ships cannot be governed by any.

V. Having experienced the strength of the enemy, in six days battle, following the squadron, consisting of five men of war, and a fireship under the command of M. Du Casse, their equipage consisting in guns from sixty to eighty, and having a great number of seamen and soldiers on board for the service of Spain.

For which reasons above-mentioned we think it not fit to engage the enemy at this time, but to keep them company this night and observe their motion, and if a fair opportunity shall happen of wind and weather, once more to try our strength with them.

That during the six days engagement he never encouraged his men, but by his own example of dodging behind the mizen-mast, and falling down on the deck on the noise of shot, and denying them the provisions of the ship, the said men were under great discouragement. That he amended the master of the ship's journal of the transactions of the fight according to his own inclination.

All which being proved as aforesaid,

The said Col. Richard Kirkby denying the whole, excepting the pretended written consultation, which being shewed to him, he owned his own hand and name thereto. He brought several of his men to give an account of his behaviour during the fight, but their testimonies were insignificant, and his behaviour to the Court and witnesses most unbecoming a gentleman; and being particularly asked by the Court, Why he did not fire at the enemy's sternmost ship, which lay point-blank with him the 21st of August? He replied, Because they did not fire at him, for they had a respect for him; which words, upon several occasions during the trial, he repeated three several times.

Whereupon due consideration of the premises, of the great advantages the English had in number, being seven to four, of guns two hundred and twenty-two more than the other, with his acts and behaviour as aforesaid, and more particularly his ill-timed paper or consultation as afore recited, which obliged the Admiral, for the preservation of her Majesty's fleet, to give over the chase and fight, to the irreparable dishonour of the Queen, her crown and dignity, and come to Port-Royal, in Jamaica. For which reasons the Court was of opinion, that he fell under the eleventh, twelfth, fourteenth, and twentieth articles of war, and adjudged accordingly, That he should be shot to death; but further decreed, that the execution of Col. Kirkby be deferred till her Majesty's pleasure be known therein; but he to be continued a close prisoner 'till that time (22). Captain Constable, who commanded the Windsor, was next tried; and it fully appeared that he followed the example of Col. Kirkby in every respect, except personal cowardice, for he remained upon the quarter-deck, encouraged the men, gave them rum, and took so much of it himself, that he was drunk most part of the action. He acknowledged his hand to the paper, but said he signed it at the request of Colonel Kirkby. The sentence passed upon him was, That he should be cashiered, rendered incapable, and sent home a prisoner. Captain Cooper Wade, Commander of the Greenwich, came next to his trial, and against him it was proved, by sixteen witnesses, that he never kept the Line of battle, fired all his shot away, as never being within reach of the enemy. That being told so by his Lieutenants, he said, It must be so, that if they did not fire, the Admiral would not believe they fought. It also appeared, that he censured the Admiral's conduct during the engagement, and that best part of the time he was in drink. He behaved very well upon his trial, said he had been misunderstood with respect to the Admiral's conduct, for that he did not believe any and have endeavoured to make the world believe, that the bravery of his men, and the conduct of Commodore Du Casse, enabled him to beat an English squadron of superior force, and that if he had been apprised of the shattered condition to which he had reduced them, he might have pursued and taken several, if not all the ships of which it consisted (x). But Du Casse himself, who was both a brave officer and an able sea-man, was far enough from treating things in this way, and candidly acknowledged, that he had a very lucky and unlooked-for escape [H]. As for Vice-Admiral Benbow, though he so far recovered from the fever induced by his broken leg, as to be able to attend the trials of the Captains who deserted him, and thereby vindicated his own honour, and that of the nation: Yet he still continued in a declining way, occasioned partly by the heat of the climate, but chiefly from that grief which this miscarriage occasioned, as appeared by his letters to his lady, in which he expressed much more concern for the condition in which he was like to leave the publick affairs in the West-Indies, than for his own (z). During all the time of his illness, he behaved with great calmness and presence of mind, having never flattered himself, from the time his leg was cut off, with any hopes of recovery, but shewed an earnest desire, to be as useful as he could while he was yet living, giving the necessary directions for stationing the ships of his squadron, for protecting the commerce and incommoding the enemy. He continued thus discharging his duty to the last moment, for dying of a sort of consumption, his spirits did not fail him till very near his end, and his senses were very found to the day he expired, which was the fourth of November, 1702. His royal Mistress spoke of his loss, when she heard of it, with great tenderness and concern; and it may be truly said, that no man of his rank was more sincerely regretted by the bulk of the nation; so that one cannot help wondering at the singular method taken by a certain historian, to sink the names of those offenders, who so justly suffered for betraying so brave a man; and at the same time, treating the Vice-Admiral's character with apparent marks of disrespect (f) [I]. The Vice-Admiral's man living could act better, or more for the honour of his Queen and nation, than Admiral Benbow did, and therefore he put himself upon the mercy of the Court, who adjudged him, as well as Colonel Kirkby, to be shot. Captain Vincent and Captain Fogg were tried for signing the paper, which the reader has seen. They said, that seeing themselves deserted by the Captains Kirkby, Constable, Wade, and Hudson, they were afraid of being made prisoners; as also that those Captains would have gone over to the enemy, and that by signing the paper they hoped to hinder them from becoming desperate. Vice-Admiral Benbow coming into Court, said, That during the six days fight, Captain Fogg behaved like a true Englishman: That Captain Vincent also came in to his assistance when deserted by all the other ships; and that, if it had not been for his coming to his relief, he had fallen into the hands of M. Du Casse. The Court thought, however, that by signing this paper these Gentlemen fell under the twentieth article of war, and therefore directed they should be suspended, but that the suspension should not take place till the Lord High-Admiral's pleasure was known; and immediately after their coming home the suspension was taken off. As for Captain Thomas Hudson, he died on board his ship in Port-Royal harbour before he could be brought to a trial (23). The true design of Colonel Kirkby, who was the ring-leader of this business, was to have let the Admiral fall into the hands of the French, and then have thrown the blame of all that happened upon his rashness and ill conduct; and the reason of his bearing this ill-will to that gentleman, and meeting with such concurrence in other officers, was the strictness of the Admiral's discipline, who thought that men would never behave well, if not encouraged to it by the example of their officers. There was great intercession made to the Queen, in favour both of Kirkby and Wade, but to no effect, for warrants for their execution were lodged in all the ports, and they were shot the same day they came into Plymouth; both of them, behaving in their last moments with much decency and courage (24).

[H] He had a very lucky and unlooked-for escape. The French never had a braver officer or better seaman in their service than this M. Du Casse, who was too much a man of honour to lessen another officer's merit. Admiral Benbow boarded his ship thrice, in which he received a shot in the arm, and a wound in the face; and, if he had been well seconded, would infallibly have carried that ship. This M. Du Casse was so sensible of, that soon after his arrival at Carthagena, he wrote the Admiral a letter, the original of which is still in the hands of the family, and the translation follows (25).

S I R,

I Had little hopes on Monday last but to have supped in your Cabin, it pleased God to order it otherwife; I am thankful for it. As for those cowardly Captains who deserted you, hang them up, for by — they deserve it.

Your's,

DU CASSE.

It is very remarkable, that the day mentioned in this letter was Monday, August 24, the very day that the pretended consultation was signed, in which the strength of the enemy was so much magnified, and therefore we need not wonder, that all impartial writers have treated this affair with respect to Colonel Kirkby, and of his associates, as one of the basest and most dishonourable that ever happened in our Navy. The author of the History of our Colonies, speaking of this matter, says (26), 'This sentence was certainly very just, for during the whole course of the wars between England and France, never did two Englishmen bring such dishonour upon their country as Kirkby and Wade, through their cowardice and treachery; besides the great profit that they hindered the nation from receiving by the destruction of M. Du Casse and his squadron, which perhaps would have prevented the French in all their designs on the West-Indies, and forwarded the reduction of the Spanish dominions there: But this fair opportunity was lost, and, without the gift of Prophecy, we can foresee, we shall not soon have such another.'

[I] Treating the Vice-Admiral's character with apparent marks of disrespect. In order to state this matter fairly, it will be necessary first of all to give the passage from Mr Burchet's History at large, that the reader may be the better able to judge of our remarks (27). 'The twentieth of September the York and Norwich arrived at Jamaica, bringing a necessary supply of stores and provisions; and as soon as the Vice-Admiral could have matters got in readiness for trying at a Court-Martial the Captains who had so scandalously failed in the performance of their duty, he ordered Rear-Admiral Whetstone to examine thoroughly therewith, chusing rather so to do (though the Admiral had not authority to delegate his power to another), than to sit as President of the Court himself; and after several days were spent in examining witnesses, and hearing what the prisoners could alledge in their own justification, the Captains of sister made a present of his picture to the corporation of Shrewsbury, who caused it to be hung up in their town-hall, where it remains as a testimony of the regard his countrymen have, for the memory of so worthy a man, so gallant an officer, and so true a patriot, who manifested his love to his country, not by fair professions and fine speeches, but by spending his whole life in her service. The Vice-Admiral left behind him a widow and several children of both sexes, but his sons dying without issue, his two surviving daughters became coheiresses, of whom the eldest married Paul Calton, Esq; of Milton near Abingdon in Berks, the gentleman so often mentioned in the course of this article, and who deceased very lately at his seat beforementioned. He was a person of great reading and general knowledge, very communicative, and had a great desire that the memory of his worthy father-in-law, should be transmitted to posterity with due honour, and with a just regard to truth. It is certain, that but for his attention in this respect, the Publick had been deprived of the most curious circumstances relative to the actions of this great man, and known nothing more of him, than had been preserved in the traditional recitals of sailors, who are remarkably fond of claiming Benbow as their own, and are sure to mention him upon every dispute, where the virtue of the Tars is called into question. Benbow and Shovell are their favourites, they were sailors, rose by being sailors, and were proud of being sailors much more than of their Flags. Men, who by a long course of obedience learned how to command, and who directed such as served under them, as much by example as orders. In fine, men distinguished in and by their profession, and who, after many years employment, left behind them, small fortunes and great reputations.

‘ the Defiance and Greenwich received sentence of death, which was not put in execution until they arrived in the Bristol at Plymouth, aboard which ship they were shot, for the orders sent from hence did not come time enough to Jamaica. The Captain of the Windsor was cashiered, and sentenced to be imprisoned during her Majesty’s pleasure. He who commanded the Pendennis died before the trial, otherwise he would in all probability have received the same sentence as those of the Defiance and Greenwich; and the Vice-Admiral’s own Captain, with the Commander of the Falmouth, were suspended for signing to the paper drawn up and delivered by the others; wherein they gave their reasons for not renewing the engagement: but he having represented that those two gentlemen had behaved themselves very well in the action, the Lord High-Admiral was pleased to send orders for their being employed again. As I have forbore mentioning the names of those two unhappy gentlemen, who suffered (one of whom on other occasions had distinguished himself) more for the sake of their relations than any other consideration; so thus much may be observed as to Vice-Admiral Benbow’s conduct, that although he was a good seaman and a gallant man, and that he was qualified in most respects to command a squadron, especially in the West-Indies, in which parts of the world he had had long experience; yet when he found his Captains so very remiss in their performance of their duty, I think he ought, in point of discretion, to have summoned them (and even that at first) on board his own ship, and there confined them, and placed their first Lieutenants in their rooms, who would have fought well, were it for no other reason than the hopes of being continued in their commands had they survived.’ It has been shewn in the former note, on what motives Vice-Admiral Benbow acted in granting a Commission for trying these officers, and how little reason there was for insinuating the illegality of a proceeding justified by the whole nation, and which could only serve to help other bad men to a means of taking shelter under the Law against Justice. But it is still more extraordinary, that the author of such a History should think himself under any obligation to suppress the names of criminals out of regard to their families. Were they better men than the Duke of Monmouth, Sir Thomas Armstrong, Sir John Fenwick, or any other, whose names are mentioned by all writers? Is there any instance of tenderness of this kind? or is it reasonable there should be any? Was there any doubt of their being guilty, or that their punishments were greater than they deserved? Why then should this gentleman desire that their names should be concealed, at the same time that he bears so hard upon the memory of the brave Admiral Benbow? Let us see next what ground there is for the reflection he makes, which at the bottom amounts to this, that if the Admiral had understood his duty, and performed it, the engagement had ended otherwise than it did. But what probability is there of this? the reader has seen that Colonel Kirkby had such an influence over all the rest of the Captains, as to prevail upon them to sign his paper, which was as stupid and foolish, as it was base and cowardly. It was natural therefore for him to provide for his own safety, and the safety of the Queen’s ships, since after such behaviour he might very well apprehend, as he really did, they would retire, and leave the Breda disabled, as she was to fall into the hands of the French, which if they had done, there was no doubt those officers would have escaped the hands of justice; as it was, there were great endeavours used to save them, as appears by the following account taken from an author who wrote at this very time, and set down things just as they occurred, and who had not, it seems, any scruples about inserting the names of men, who, by shewing so little concern for, were so indifferently intitled to the pity of their country. ‘ On the 14th of April, says he (29), came in the Bristol man of war from Jamaica, which brought prisoners from thence, Captain Kirkby, Captain Wade, and Captain Constable, of whom the two former were shot to death on the 16th on board the said ship, in pursuance of the sentence given against them by the Court Martial held at Jamaica in October, 1702, for their cowardice, breach of orders, and neglect of duty, in the fight between the brave Admiral Benbow and M. Du Caffé. We were for some months strangely amused, as if after all the guilt of these Commanders, they would at last be pardoned; but the event made it plainly appear to the contrary, much to the reputation of the Government.’ E

BENBOW (JOHN) son to the Vice-Admiral beforementioned. He was intended by his father for a sea-man, and educated accordingly. His misfortunes began very early, viz. in the same year his father died in the West-Indies; by being shipwrecked on the coast of Madagascar, where, after many dismal and dangerous adventures, he was reduced to live with, and in the manner of, the natives, for many years, and at last, when he least expected it, he was taken on board by a Dutch Captain, out of respect to the memory of his father, and brought safe to England, when his relations thought him long since dead (a). He was a young gentleman naturally of a very brisk and lively temper, but by a long series of untoward events, came to alter his disposition entirely, so as to appear, after his return, very serious, or rather melancholy, and did not much affect speaking, except amongst a few intimate friends. But the noise of his remaining so long, and in such a condition, upon the island of Madagascar, induced many to visit him, and to enquire into the circumstances of the life he led there, whom he civilly received, and readily satisfied their curiosity, though otherwise distinguished (as has been said) by his taciturnity, but he always looked upon his preservation there, and his escape from thence, as such signal instances of the favour of providence, that he did not judge himself at liberty to conceal them. But notwithstanding his freedom in communicating this part of his history, very few particulars relating to it can now be recovered [A]. It is very probable, the world might receive full satisfaction in this, as well as many other respects, if a large work he composed on the subject, intitled, A complete Description of the south Part of the Island of Madagascar, in reference to the Soil, Climate, Produce, Animals, and Inhabitants, with Remarks on the Coasts, Harbours, and Commerce of that Island, and the Improvements of which they are capable, could be met with. This was a large and very comprehensive book, containing a multitude of very curious circumstances, which occasioned it's being often borrowed by some or other of his acquaintance, in whose custody (if yet remaining) it is to be found; for notwithstanding the strictest search made immediately after his decease, and the closest enquiries by the family since, they have been able to obtain no account of it whatever. But if, upon this notice, any gentleman should be able to discover it, there is no question than even now the publication of it would be very acceptable to the world, for though the facts are of an old date, they are still so extraordinary as to deserve memory, and the description of the country, and it's natural and civil history, would not only afford much entertainment, but be highly useful, as the learned world has not at present any accurate account of this island, or that can be depended on. Our author lived several years after his return to England, but passed his days in privacy, and died without issue.

[A] Very few particulars are to be recovered] All we know with any certainty, as to his affairs, amounts only to this. He failed in quality of fourth mate on board the Degrave East-Indiaman, which lay in the Downs when his father proceeded on his last expedition. She passed through February 19, 1701, bound for Fort St George, and thence to Bengal. She was a very fine vessel of 700 tons and 52 guns, and performed this voyage happily; but at Bengal the Captain died, the first mate soon followed him, by which the command devolved on the Captain's son, who was second mate, and Mr Benbow succeeded in his place. From Bengal they sailed for the Cape of Good Hope; but in going out of the river the ship ran a-ground and stuck fast; she floated again the next high tide, and put to sea with little or no damage as they then imagined, but they soon after found her so leaky, that they were forced to keep two chain-pumps continually going; in this condition they sailed two months before they reached the island of St Maurice, inhabited by the Dutch, who received them very kindly, gave them all the assistance in their power, permitting them to set up a tent on shore, into which they brought most part of their cargo, having unladen the ship in order to search for the leak, which however they could not find. After about a month's stay at the island of St Maurice, and taking about 50 Lascars or Moorish seamen, they sailed directly for the Cape of Good Hope; they had then about 170 hands on board, and though the Lascars could not do much in point of navigation, yet they were of great use, as they eased the English seamen of the labour of pumping; yet after all, it was fatal for them that this rash resolution was taken of putting to sea before they had stopped, or even discovered the leak; for in a few days time it gained so much upon them, that notwithstanding they pumped day and night, it was as much as they could do to keep the vessel above water, tho' they were still 600 leagues from their intended port. The crew thereupon acquainted Captain Young, that for the common safety it would be best to run the ship ashore on the nearest land, which was that of Madagascar, which he accordingly did; but, in spite of all the care he could take, the ship was wrecked and broke to pieces, and he, who was the last man in her, obliged to throw himself into the sea, in order to swim on shore as well as he could, which with difficulty he performed. They were quickly made prisoners by the King of that part of the island, who carried them 50 miles up into the country, where they found one Captain Drummond and one Captain Stewart, with a few of their ship's crew, and who soon let them into a perfect knowledge of their condition, by assuring them that the King intended to make them serve in his wars, and never permit them to return to Europe, which struck them with the utmost consternation. In this distress the Captains Drummond, Stewart, and Young, held a consultation, in conjunction with Mr Prat and Mr Benbow, in which Captain Drummond proposed as the only expedient by which they could only recover their liberty, to seize the Black King, and march off with him prisoner into some other province of the island where ships frequently came. Mr Benbow warmly espoused this proposal, and assisted with great courage in the execution of it, which was performed with more ease than was expected; and the King, his son, and the Queen, were made prisoners, but the Queen was released by Capt. Young out of mere pity. It is not very easy to conceive a bolder enterprize than this, where between 50 and 60 white people, and not above half of these armed, carried off a Black Prince out of the midst of his capital, and in the sight of some hundreds, nay some thousands of his subjects better armed than themselves; who were notwithstanding restrained from firing by Captain Young's threatening to kill their King if they did. Afterwards, however, they managed the thing strangely, for, upon a proposal by the Negroes to give six guns for their King, it was agreed to upon a supposition that they would then follow them no further, and this notwithstanding Mr Benbow opposed it, and shewed them the consequences with which it must be attended. The King set free, they still continued to follow them; at last it was agreed to give up the Prince too, in hopes that would put an end to the pursuit, taking three people, whom the Blacks told them were their principal men, as hostages, two of whom made their escape, and then the Blacks not only pursued, but began to fire, which hitherto they had not done. The weakness of their own conduct, and the wisdom of Mr Benbow's advice, was now visible; and as it appeared that they had nothing for it but fighting, they began to dispose their little army in order of battle, their 36 armed men were formed into four bodies under the three Captains and Mr Benbow; but after an engagement, lasting from noon 'till evening, it was agreed to treat. The Negroes demanded their arms, promising to let them go. This proposition was vigorously opposed by Mr Benbow; and when it came to be put in execution, the Captains Drummond and Stewart, and some of their crew, refused to deliver their arms, and marched off unperceived in the dark, accompanied by Mr Benbow, and got safe to Port Dauphine, while all the rest were cruelly murdered, except one boy, whom they preserved and made a slave.

BENDLOWES (EDWARD), author of some poetical pieces [A], was son and heir of Andrew Bendlowes, Esq; [B], and born in the year 1613 (a). This gentleman was carefully educated in grammar-learning, and, at sixteen years of age, admitted a Fellow-Commoner of St John's-college in Cambridge, to which he was afterwards a benefactor. From thence he went with a tutor to travel, and having gone through several countries, and visited seven Courts of Princes, he returned home a most accomplished gentleman both in behaviour and conversation, but a little tinged with the principles of Popery. Being very imprudent in the management of his worldly concerns, he made a shift, (tho' he was never married) to squander away his estate (which amounted to seven hundred, or a thousand pounds a year) on poets, musicians, buffoons, and flatterers, and in buying curiosities. He gave a handsome fortune with a niece named Philippa, who was married to — Blount, of Maple-Durham in Oxfordshire, Esq; [C], and having besides engaged himself for the payment of other mens debts, which he was not able to discharge, he was put into prison at Oxford: but, being soon after released, he spent the remainder of his life, which was eight years, in that city. He was esteemed in his younger days a great patron of the poets, especially Quarles, Davenant, Payne, Fisher, &c. who either dedicated books to him, or wrote epigrams and poems on him. His flatterers used to style him Benevolus, by way of anagram on his name, in return for his generosity towards them. Towards the latter end of his life, he was drawn off from his inclination to Popery, and would often take occasion to dispute against the Papists and their opinions, and particularly disliked the favourers of Arminius and Socinus. This gentleman, reduced, through his own indiscretion, to great want, died at Oxford, the eighteenth of December 1686, aged seventy-three years. He was buried in the north isle of St Mary's church; and the expences of his funeral were defrayed by a contribution of several scholars, to whom he had been particularly known. His picture hangs in the gallery belonging to the publick library of Oxford.

[A] He was author of some poetical pieces.] Anthony Wood mentions the following (1). I. Sphinx Theologica, seu Musica Templi, ubi discordia concors. Camb. 1626, in octavo. II. Honorifica armorum cessatio, sive Pacis et Fidei Associatio. Febr. 11, ann. 1643, in octavo. III. Theophila; or, Love-Sacrifice; a divine poem. Lond. 1652, in folio, with the author's picture before it. Several parts of this poem were set to Music by Mr John Jenkyns, an eminent Musician, whom Mr Bendlowes patronized; and a whole canto of it, consisting of above 300 verses, was turned into elegant Latin verse, in the space of one day, by the ingenious Mr John Hall of Durham. IV. A Summary of Divine Wisdom. Lond. 1657, in quarto. V. A Glance at the Glories of sacred friendship. Lond. 1657, printed on one side of a large sheet of paper. VI. De Sacra Amicitia; printed with the former in Latin verse and prose. VII. Threnobriambenticon; or, Latin Poems on King Charles the Second's Restoration. Lond. 1660; printed on a side of a large sheet of paper. A few were printed on white satin; one copy of which, in a frame suitable to it, he gave to the Public Library at Oxford. VIII. Oxonii Encomium. Oxon. 1672, in four sheets in folio. It is mostly in Latin verse. IX. Oxonii Elegia. Oxon. 1673; printed on one side of a large sheet of paper. It consists of twelve stanzas, and is followed by 1. Oxonii Elegia. 2. Academicis Serenitas. 3. Academicis Temperantia. 4. Studiofis Cantela, and some other pieces. X. Magia Caelestis. Oxon. 1673. It is a Latin poem, printed on one side of a large sheet of paper. The three last-mentioned pieces were composed at Oxford. XI. Echo veridica joco-seria. Oxon. 1673, printed one one side of a large sheet of paper. It is a Latin poem, chiefly against the Pope, the Papists, Jesuits, &c. XII. Truth's Touch-stone, consisting of an hundred distichs, printed on one side of a long sheet of paper, and dedicated to his niece Mrs Philippa Blount. XIII. Annotations for the better confirming the several truths in the said poem; uncertain, when printed. XIV. Mr Bendlowes wrote a Maniffa to Richard Fenn's Panegyricon Inaugurale, intided, De celeberrima et florentiss. Trinobantiados Augusta Civ. Praetori, reg. senatui populoque. Lond. 1673, in quarto; in the title of which piece he styles himself, Turmæ Equestris in Com. Essex. Praefectus. These writings (our Antiquarian informs us) acquired Mr Bendlowes the name of a Divine Author.

Unless we are to conclude from these words, that one or both of them were dead, or that they were themselves so reduced in their circumstances, that they were not able to relieve the wants of their uncle. To this purpose he travelled to Rome in the year 653, where he acquired an exact knowledge of ecclesiastical discipline, which, upon his return home, he laboured to establish in Britain. In 665, he took a second journey to Rome [B]; and after some months stay in that city, he received the tonsure in the monastery of Lerins, where he continued about two years in a strict observance of the monastick discipline. He was sent back by Pope Vitalian, in company with Theodore of Tarsus, lately consecrated Archbishop of Canterbury [C], and an Abbot called Adrian. Upon his return, he took upon himself the government of the monastery of Canterbury, to which he had been elected in his absence. Two years after, he resigned the abbey to Adrian, and went a third time to Rome, and returned with a very large collection of the most valuable books. Then he went to the court of Egfrid King of Northumberland, who had succeeded Oswy. That Prince, with whom he was highly in favour, gave him a tract of land on the east side of the mouth of the river Were; where he built a large monastery, called, from it's situation, Wermouth (c); in which, it is said, he placed three hundred Benedictine Monks (d). The church of this convent was built of stone after the Roman architecture, and the windows glazed, by artificers fetched from France, in the year of Christ 674, and the fourth of King Egfrid; and both the monastery and the church were dedicated to St Peter. In 678, Benedict took a fourth journey to Rome, and was kindly received by Pope Agatho. From this expedition he returned laden with books, relics of the Apostles and Martyrs, images, and pictures [D]; and, with the Pope's consent, he brought over with him John, Arch-Chanter of St Peter's, and Abbot of St Martin's, who introduced the Roman manner of singing mass. In 682, King Egfrid gave him another piece of ground (e), on the banks of the Tyne, four miles from Newcastle (f); where he built another monastery called Girwy or Jarrow [E], dedicated to St Paul, and placed therein seventeen Monks

‘and country, for the sake of Christ and his Gospel, that he might receive an hundred fold, and enjoy eternal life: he refused to marry, that he might follow the spotless and virgin lamb in the kingdom of heaven; neither would he beget mortal children after the flesh, being predestinated by Christ to bring up everlasting sons, through the doctrine of the Spirit, who should inherit the celestial life.’ Bede acquaints us here, that Benedict, at the time when he renounced the world, was in the service of King Oswy; cum esset minister Oswii regis: but he does not expressly tell us what that service was. Leland pretends he served that Prince in his army, and gave extraordinary proofs of his valour, often returning home laden with the spoils of the enemy. Juvenis audacissimi animi sub Oswio Transbrinæ provinciæ rege militavit; unde non raro ad inimicis gloriam et spolia optima reportavit (2). It is remarkable, that Bale, Pits, and other authors, make no mention of this circumstance, for which there seems to be no better foundation than these words of Bede just now cited; despexit militiam cum corruptibili donativo terrestrem, ut vero regi militaret. But whoever considers the whole passage, will have reason to think that it is no other than a figurative expression, the more strongly to paint his great self-denial, in renouncing all worldly advantages for the mortified state of religion. So that we may venture to say, our judicious antiquary is mistaken in supposing Benedict to have been a soldier in his youth.

(2) Comment. de Script. Brit. c. lxviii.

[B] He took a second journey to Rome.] Bede informs us, that Alcfrid, one of the sons of King Oswy, designing to take a journey to Rome out of devotion, had made choice of Benedict to accompany him; but though the King thought fit to forbid the young Prince's journey, and obliged him to continue at home, Benedict would not be disappointed, and therefore prosecuted the intended voyage with the utmost expedition (3).

(3) Bede, ibid.

[C] Theodore of Tarsus, lately created Archbishop of Canterbury.] Ecbert, King of Kent, had sent Uighard, a person sufficiently instructed in ecclesiastical matters by the disciples of St Gregory, to Rome, to be ordained a Bishop; rightly judging, that himself and his subjects would be more perfectly instructed in the Christian Faith and mysteries, by a Prelate of their own nation and language, than by a foreigner with the help of an interpreter. Uighard being come to Rome, before he could receive the episcopal character, was seized with a mortal distemper, of which he died. Hereupon Pope Vitalian made choice of Theodore of Tarsus, an Ecclesiastic of great learning and abilities, whom he consecrated Archbishop of Canterbury, and sent into Britain, together with an Abbot named Adrian, as his colleague and adviser. At the same time he prevailed with Benedict, who was then at Rome, to accompany the new Prelate in his journey, both as his conductor and his interpreter (4).

(4) Bede, ubi supra, 294.

[D] — and pictures] He brought over those of our Saviour, the Virgin Mary, and the Apostles; and pictures of several events in the Gospel History, and of the visions of St John in the Apocalypse; all which he hung up in his new church dedicated to St Peter. He had a farther and a better view, than that of mere ornament, in this; intending hereby to affect the minds of the spectators with an awful sense of religion, by presenting to their eyes lively representations of the amiable aspect of our Saviour and his Saints, the glories of his Incarnation, and the terrors of the last judgment. Quatenus intrantes ecclesiam omnes etiam literarum ignari, quaquaversum intenderent, vel semper amabilem Christi Sanctorumque ejus, quamvis in imagine, contemplerentur aspectum; vel Dominicæ Incarnationis gloriam vigilantiori mente recolerent; vel extremi discrimen examinis quasi coram oculis habentes, districtius se ipsi examinare meminissent (5). If the Church of Rome had always restrained the use of pictures and images, in places of divine worship, to the same pious ends, there would not have been such reason to object the idolatrous abuse of them to that Church.

(5) Id. ibid. p. 295.

[E] He built another monastery, called Girwy, or Jarrow.] Camden tells us (6), there is still to be seen the following inscription, which is fairly legible on the church-wall of the town of Jarrow.

i. e. The dedication of the church of St Paul, the ninth of the Calends of May, in the sixteenth year of King Egfrid, and the fourth year of Ceolfrid Abbot, and (with the divine assistance) founder of the said church. In this inscription (the right reverend editor tells us) the XVI should be XV. For King Egfrid reigned no more than fifteen years; and so Sir James Ware has given it in his notes upon Bede's History of the Abbots of Weremuth. But it ought not to be inferred from the inscription, that Ceolfrid was the founder of this monastery, since it appears from Bede's account, that he was only constituted first Abbot of the place by Benedictus Biscepius, who sent him thither, with a colony of about seventeen Monks, from Weremuth (7). William of Malmesbury mistook the situation of this second monastery, when he wrote thus concerning Benedict. Hic Wiræ annis utraque ripas (qui apud Northumbros non incelebris fama habetur) monasterii prætexuit, sub apostolorum Petri et Pauli nomine charitatis et regulæ unione non discrepantibus (8); i. e. Monks under an Abbot named Ceolfrid. About the same time, he appointed a Presbyter named Easterwinus to be Joint-Abbot with himself of the monastery of Weremouth [F]: soon after which, he took his fifth and last journey to Rome, and, as before, came back enriched with a farther supply of ecclesiastical ornaments [G]. He had not been long at home before he was seized with a dead palsy, which put an end to his life on the twelfth of January 690. His behaviour during his sickness was truly Christian and exemplary [H]. He was buried in his own monastery of Weremouth (g). Leland will tell us the fate of Benedict's two monasteries [I]. He wrote some pieces mentioned below [K]. The famous historian Bede, who wrote the Lives of four of the Abbots of Weremouth and Jarrow (h), was one of the Monks in those convents, and pronounced an homily on the death of Benedict, which is still extant among that author's Homilies (i). This historian gives us a character of our Abbot in the words of St Gregory [L]. His body was purchased

' the banks of the famous river Wye in Northumberland with monasteries, dedicated to St Peter and St Paul, united by the ties of brotherly love, and ' profession of the same rule.' This Historian supposes both Benedict's monasteries to have been built on the opposite banks of the same river; whereas that of Girwy or Jarrow was at the mouth of the Tyne, some miles distant from that of Weremouth. The harmony and union which, William of Malmesbury tells us, subsisted between the two convents, was what the pious founder had chiefly in view, as we learn from Bede. ' Monasterium Beati Pauli Apostoli construxit, ea duntaxat ratione, ut una utriusque loci pax et concordia, eadem perpetua familiaritas conservaretur et gratia; ut sicut, verbi gratia, corpus a capite per quod spirat non potest avelli, caput corporis sine quo non vivit nequit oblivisci, ita nullus hæc monasteria primorum apostolorum fraterna societate conjuncta aliquo ab invicem temptaret disturbare conatu

(g) Bede, ubi supra, p. 296.

(9). — He built the monastery of St Paul with this view only, that union and agreement, and the same friendly intercourse, might perpetually subsist between the two societies; that, in like manner as the body cannot be torn away from the head by which it breathes, nor the head forget the body by which it lives; so no one might endeavour to separate from each other, or disturb the union which subsisted between these monasteries dedicated to the two chief Apostles, and joined together in brotherly society.'

[F] He appointed Easterwinus to be Joint-Abbot with himself of the monastery of Weremouth.] His frequent journeys into foreign countries, and the uncertainty of the time of his return, made it necessary that he should have an associate in the government of his monastery. And in this, Bede assures us (10), he followed the example of St Peter himself, who (as histories inform us) appointed two subordinate Popes at Rome, for the better government of the Church. Nam et beatissimum Petrum Apostolum Romæ Pontifices sub se duos per ordinem ad regendam ecclesiam constituisse causa instante necessaria tradunt historiae. He instances likewise in the famous St Benedict, who, as St Gregory writes concerning him, set twelve Abbots at one time over his disciples.

(10) Ibid.

[G] He came back enriched with a farther supply of ecclesiastical ornaments.] These chiefly consisted of books and pictures. Among the latter were some which represented the connexion between the Old and New Testament; such as, Isaac bearing the wood with which himself was to be sacrificed, and Jesus Christ bearing the cross on which himself was to suffer; also the serpent erected by Moses in the wilderness, and the Son of Man hanging on the cross. He brought over likewise two silken palls of exquisite workmanship, with which he afterwards purchased of King Alfrid, who succeeded Eadfrid, a piece of land on the south-side of the mouth of the Wye (11).

(11) Bede, ibid. p. 297.

[H] His behaviour during his sickness was truly christian and exemplary.] Bede is very copious in describing the circumstances of Benedict's sickness and death; but we shall abridge his narrative. Though his distemper lasted full three years, he bore it with a most wonderful patience and resignation. Those nights, in which he could not sleep through the violence of his disease, he spent in hearing the book of Job, or some other parts of Scripture, read to him, and in singing of psalms with two of the Monks. He was particularly careful to provide for the future welfare of his monasteries. And to this purpose he exhorted the Monks to a strict observance of the rule he had taught them; which was not, he said, the offspring of his own thought and judgment, but composed of the best institutions he had met with in seventeen monasteries that he had visited in his frequent travels. ' Neque enim putare habetis, inquit, quod ex meo hæc quæ vobis statui decreta indoctus corde protulerim. Ex decem quippe et septem monasteriis, quæ inter longos meæ crebræ peregrinationis discursus optima comperi, hæc universa didici, et vobis salubriter observanda contradidi.' He advised them carefully to preserve the library he had collected for the instruction of the Church, and not suffer it to be dissipated. But what he most earnestly recommended to them was, that, in the choice of his successor, they would regard the moral character and abilities of the candidate, and not his birth and family; wishing that the place whereon the monastery stood might rather become a desert, than be governed by an unworthy person. ' Et vere, inquit, dico vobis, quia in comparatione duorum malorum tolerabilius mihi multo est totum hunc locum in quo monasterium feci, si sic judicaverit Deus, in solitudinem sempiternam redigere, quam ut frater meus carnalis, quem novimus viam veritatis non ingredi, in eo regendo post me abbatis nomine succedat.' On the night, in which the good Abbot died, the Monks assembled in the church of the monastery, and continued praying and singing of psalms 'till he expired. 'And thus (says his Historian) this holy soul, long tried and purified in the fire of a happy affliction, escaped from the earthly prison of the body, and took it's flight to the glories of everlasting felicity.' Et sic anima illa sancta longis flagellorum felicitum excoccta atque examinata flammis; luteam carnis fornacem deserit, et supernæ beatitudinis libera pervolat ad gloriam (12).

(12) Ibid. p. 297, 298, 299.

[I] Leland will tell us the fate of his two monasteries.] They were plundered and set on fire by the Danes, about the time of Egbert or Oswulph King of Northumberland; and what these barbarous invaders left of them was afterwards destroyed by the Normans, who came in with William the Conqueror. But not long after, three Monks of Evesham, the chief of whom was Aldwinus, going into Northumberland, in order to restore there the monastic life, among others repaired the convents of Weremouth and Jarrow, though in a very slight manner. And but lately (says Leland, who lived about the latter end of Henry VII) they were inhabited by three or four Monks from the monastery of Durham. The greatness and magnificence of these buildings may be inferred from the vast heaps of ruins, which our Antiquary himself saw, not without admiration, and a melancholy reflection on the transitory condition of the greatest things on earth. Ingentes tamen utrinque ruinæ maximorum olim ædificiorum manifesta indicia etiam nunc extant, quas ego nuper non sine admiratione aspexi, rerum vicissitudines tantarum deplorans (13).

(13) Leland, ubi supra.

[K] He wrote some pieces.] Leland ascribes to him only a treatise, intitled, De Consonantia Regule Monasticæ Vitæ; i. e. 'Of the Agreement of the rule of the Monastic Life.' Bale and Pits give this book the title of Concordia Regularum; i. e. 'The Harmony of the Rules.' And the last-mentioned author informs us, that the design of this book was to prove, that the Rules of all the Holy Fathers tallied exactly with that of St Benedict, Founder of the Benedictines. He wrote likewise Exhortationes ad Monachos; i. e. 'Advice to the Monks.' De suo Privilegio; i. e. 'Concerning his own Privilege.' And De celebratione Festorum totius anni; i. e. 'Of the celebration of the Festivals throughout the year.'

 ——— To use the words of the holy Pope Gregory, in which he celebrates an Abbot of the same name; he was a man venerable for his conduct, a Saint both in name and life; from his very infancy as wise as the aged, and addicted to no sort of worldly pleasure. This character, to be sure, did not appear a just one to the Bishop of Ossory, who censures him severely for being the first who imported Glaziers, Painters, Architects, and other Artificers, subservient to the pleasures of mankind; from whence one may see (says he); how delicate and luxurious these Holy Fathers were from the very beginning. Vitriarios, Piiores, Architestos, et id genus alios ad voluptatem artifices, in Angliam omnium primus ex transmarinis provinciis advevit. Quibus videre licet, quam curiosi, molles ac petulantibus fuerint hi sancti Patres, a prima statim origine (15). Fuller is not behind in the severity of his judgment on our Abbot. 'He left religion in England (says that author) braver, but not better than he found it. Indeed, what Tully said of the Roman Lady, that she danced better than became a modest woman, was true of God's service, as by him adorned; the gaudiness prejudicing the gravity thereof. He made all thing according (not to the pattern in the Mount with Moses, but) the Precedent of Rome; and his convent, being but the Romish Transcript, became the English Original, to which all the monasteries in the land were suddenly conformed (16).'

BENEDICT, Abbot of Peterborough in the XIIth century, was originally a Benedictine Monk in the monastery of Canterbury, afterwards Prior of that house (a), and from thence, in the year 1177, advanced by King Henry II to the abbacy of Peterborough, in the room of William Watervill, who had been deposed by the Archbishop of Canterbury (b). Benedict had studied at Oxford, and taken the degree of Doctor in Divinity; and became intimately acquainted with the famous Archbishop Becket. After that Prelate's death, he wrote an History of his Life and Miracles [A]. He has the general character of a very learned man (c); though the Bishop of Ossory bestows very hard words upon him, and can afford him no better an appellation than that of a wild impostor, for no other reason, as appears, but because he wrote the Life of Becket (d). Bishop Nicholson tells us (e), he died in the year 1200.

[A] He wrote an History of the Life and Miracles of Archbishop Becket. Bale and Pits speak of two pieces, which probably are but one and the same; the first, intitled, Vita Thomae Cantuariensis; i. e. 'The Life of Thomas Archbishop of Canterbury;' the other, Miracula Thomae Martyris; i. e. 'The Miracles of Thomas the Martyr.' Leland, who mentions only The Life of Becket as written by our author, gives it the character of an elegant performance (1). But Bale treats it as a mere heap of lies and forgeries, in order to palm Becket on the multitude for a first rate Saint, and intercessor with God. Ut pro magno ecclesiae Martyre Becketus coleretur, et ut sanctissimus ad Deum patronus vulgo haberetur, accessit hic quintus vel sextus, sed non ultimus, fucatae ejus sanctimoniae testis, confictis mille mendaciorum signis, miraculorum loco (2). Nor is this author's spleen confined to Benedict, but extends itself to the Monks of those times in general, whom he represents as a set of meer debauchees and impostors, concealing their vices under a mask of piety, and cheating the people with the most diabolical illusions. His diebus pessimis, ventri indulgentes monachi et hypocritae, praestigiis plusquam diabolicis mundum illudebant (3). Dr Cave tells us (4), that the author of the Quadrilogus transcribed a great part of Benedict's Life of Becket into the third and fourth books of his work. This Quadrilogus, or De Vita et Processu S. Thomae Cantuariensis et Martyris super Libertate ecclesiastica (Bishop Nicholson tells us), is collected out of four Historians, who were contemporary and conversant with Becket, in his height of glory, and lowest depression; namely, Herbert de Hostians, Johannes Carnotensis, William of Canterbury, and Alan of Teufsbury; who are brought in as so many several relaters of matters of fact, interchangeably (5). Here is no mention of our Benedict in this list; so that either the Doctor is mistaken in his assertion, or the Bishop is not exact in his account of the authors, from whence the Quadrilogus was compiled. The reader will find a long catalogue of authors, who have recorded the Life and Actions of that Arch-Saint in the article BECKET (THOMAS). T

BENEFIELD (SEBASTIAN), an eminent Divine of the XVIIth century, was born, August the 12th, 1559, at Prestonbury in Gloucestershire. He was educated at Oxford, being admitted, at seventeen years of age, a Scholar of Corpus Christi college, August the 50th, 1586; and Probationer-Fellow of the same house, April the 16th, 1590. After he had taken the degree of Master of Arts, he went into holy orders, and distinguished himself as a preacher. In 1599, he was appointed Rhetorick-Reader of his college, and the year following was admitted to the reading of the Sentences. In 1608, he took the degree of Doctor in Divinity, and five years after was chosen Margaret-Professor in that university. He filled the Divinity-Chair with great reputation, and after fourteen years resigned it. He had been presented, several years before, to the rectory of Meysley-Hampton near Fairford in Gloucestershire, upon the ejection of his predecessor for Simony; and now he retired to that benefice, and spent there the short remainder of his life (about four years) in a pious and devout retreat from the world. Dr Benefield was so eminent a Scholar, Disputant, and Divine, and particularly so well versed in the Fathers and Schoolmen, that he had not his equal in the university. He was strongly attached to the opinions of Calvin, especially that of Predestination; inasmuch that Humphry Leach (a) calls him a downright and doctrinal Calvinist. He has been branded likewise with the character of a Schismatic: but Dr Ravis, Bishop of London, acquitted him of this imputation, and declared him to be free from Schism and much abounding in Science. He was remarkable for strictness of life and sincerity; of a retired and sedentary disposition, and consequently less easy and affable in conversation. We shall mention his Works in the remark [A]. BENIGNUS (St) Archbishop of Armagh in Ireland, was the immediate successor of St Patrick in that See, Anno 455; though it must be confessed, this is a point that has afforded some controversy [A]. Writers differ as to his name, some call him Stephen (a), some Beneneus (b), others Beona (c), and by an Irish termination of the word Benin, in Latin Benignus. It is probable St Patrick baptized him by the name of Stephen, and that he obtained the nick-name of Benin from his incomparable sweet disposition, and his great affection to St Patrick, the word Bin, in the Irish language, signifying sweet; and that from thence the other names flowed. He was the son of Sefgnen, a man of wealth and power in Meath, who in the war in 433, hospitably entertained St Patrick in his journey from the port of Colp [B], where he landed, to the Court of King Leogair at Tarah, and, with his whole family, embraced Christianity and received baptism. The youth grew so fond of his father’s guest, that he could not be separated from his company; St Patrick took him away with him at his departure, and taught him his first rudiments of learning and religion: Benin profited greatly under such a master, and became afterwards a man eminent for piety and virtue, whom St Patrick thought worthy to fill the See of Armagh, which he resigned to him in 455. Benin died in 468, on the ninth of November, having also resigned his See three years before his death. The writers of the dark ages, however different they are to one another in other particulars, yet in the main agree as to the succession of St Benin in the government of the See of Armagh [C]. However

[A] A point that has afforded some controversy] The greatest successor (1) of St Patrick that ever sat in the See of Armagh, has taken some pains to state this controversy in it’s full extent, and with such learning and judgment, that his arguments can admit of no reply. He shews, that what has misled Campian (2) and other writers (3), in placing St Senan in the succession to the See of Armagh immediately after St Patrick, was a misconstruction of a prophecy of St Patrick in a Poetical life of St Senan, published by John Colgan (4) out of an antient MS. of the Franciscan Fryers of Kilkenny. The Prophecy runs thus:

Nascetur vobis parvulus, Futurus Dei famulus, Qui et Senanus nomine;
In meo stabit ordine, Mihi, Deo propitio, Succedens Episcopio.

To you an infant shall be born,
A future minister of God;
Who call’d Senanus shall adorn
This place of my abode;
And by the grace of God shall be Succeeding Bishop after me.

Usher shews from several authorities, but more particularly from a MS. Life of St Brigid, that St Senan governed the See of Inis-Catty in the river Shannon, and not that of Armagh; and that the Prophecy related to his succession in the former of these Sees, and not in the other: For St Patrick made it his constant practice where he established an episcopal See, to govern it himself for some time, and then to appoint a successor, who from his example might know the nature of the government he was desirous should be exercised; and this was what he did at Inis-Catty, and the same he pursued at Armagh, which he resigned to Benignus thirty-eight years before his death. By comparing the Ulster Annals with those of Munster, which Usher (5) has done with great exactness, it is impossible that St Senan should have been Archbishop of Armagh immediately after St Patrick; but to enter into Usher’s Chronology and reasons upon this occasion, would swell this note to too great length, which would fatigue the reader, whom therefore I shall refer to him for full satisfaction, and only observe, that the most correct writers (6) of the Life of St Patrick have made Benignus the immediate successor of St Patrick in the See of Armagh. The same reasons serve to clear the point, not only as to St Senan, but as to Secundin or Sechnal (who was Bishop of Dunshaghlin in Meath), and to Sen-Patrick, who are by the Pfalter of Cashel both placed in the See of Armagh before St Benignus, the first of whom died in 448, when, past question, St Patrick himself governed that See, and the other in 458, three years after the advancement of Benignus.

[B] From the port of Colp.] Colp, antiently called Portus-Colbdi, is a little port at the mouth of the river Boyne, near Drogheda, which, according to the Irish Historians (7), took it’s name from Colptha, the brother of Heremon, King of Ireland, who was drowned here about the year of the world 3500. At the hill of Tarah was the palace of the supreme Monarchs of Ireland.

[C] The writers of the dark ages agree in the succession of Benin to the See of Armagh.] So say Probus, Tirechan, and Jocelin, as quoted above in the text; the latter of which writers is very express and full in that particular: Having first given an account of the father, he proceeds, ‘ Habebat vir ille filium quem there is some discordance among them as to the place of his death and burial, which will be shewn in the remarks [D]. William of Malmesbury has given us this barbarous epitaph, which he says was inscribed on his monument at Ferlingmore, near Glastonbury, in England.

Hoc Patris in lapide Beonæ St ossa locata ;
 Qui Pater extiterat Monachorum hic tempore prisco.
 Hunc fore Patricii dudum fortasse ministrum Fantur Hiberniginæ, & Beonam de nomine dicunt.

*Father Beonna's bones in this tomb lie ;
 Of old the Father of the Monks hereby ;
 Disciple to St Patrick so much fam'd,
 The Irish say he was a Beon nam'd.*

(d) Primord. p. 377. But Usher is of opinion (d), that Beonna mentioned in this epitaph was a different person from our Benignus ; especially if what the Tripartite writer of the Life of St Patrick says be true, viz. that his remains were deposited with great honour at Armagh ; which passage, I must observe, is not to be found in the printed Tripartite Life, said to be written by St Evin. Some writings are ascribed to him, of which an account may be seen in the notes [E].

quem sanctus undâ salutari abluens ac nomen ei ex re adaptans nominavit Benignum ; et verè sicut vocabulo, sic et vitâ et moribus erat Benignus, dilectus Deo et hominibus in terrâ et cælo gloria et honore dignus. Hic S. Præfatis lateri firmiter adhæsit, nec ab illo avelli ullatenus potuit. Cum enim Sanctus quieti membra daturus, lecto se recipisset, ille purissimus puer a patre et matre fugiens, ad pedes Sancti se projecit, ipsosque ad pectus suum suis manibus constringens, crebròque deofculans ibidem paufavit. In crastinum cum Sanctus procinctus ad iter uno pede in sandalibus, altero in terrâ posito, vehiculum ascenderet, puer pedem illius strictis manibus apprehendit, obsecrans et adjurans ne se relinqueret. Et cum illum amovere a sancti vestigiis, et secum retinere vellet uterque parens, puer cum magno fletu et ejulatu clamavit, dicens, recedite, quæso, recedite, dimitte me ut pergam cum meo spirituali patre. Sanctus vero in tenello corde et corpore devotionem tantam intuens in nomine Domini illum benedixit, secum illum levari in vehiculum jubens ; ipsum successorem ministerii sui, sicut et fuit, fore prædixit. Idem namque Benignus in Regimine Pontificatus primatusque totius Hiberniæ successit S. Patricio, virtutibus et miraculis clarus quiescit in Domino. — Sefgen had a son, whom St Patrick baptized, and, adapting his name to his disposition, called him Benignus ; and, in truth, his life and temper made good the name ; for he was gentle and good natured, beloved by God and men, and worthy of glory and honour both in this world and the next. This youth stuck close to the side of the Prelate, and could by no means be kept asunder from him : For when the holy man was going to take his rest, this most pure child running from his father and mother, cast himself at his feet, and pressing them with his hands to his breast, and imprinting many kisses thereon, rested with him. On the morrow, when St Patrick was prepared for his journey, and ready to get into his chariot, the boy laid hold of his foot, beseeching and adjuring him not to leave him behind ; and when both his parents would have separated him from their guest, and retained him with them, the lad, with tears and lamentations, begged them to let him go with his spiritual father. The Saint, seeing such great devotion in so tender a heart and body, blessed him in the name of the Lord ; and, taking him up in his chariot, prophesied, That he should be the successor of his ministry, as indeed he was : For this same Benignus succeeded St Patrick in the Government of his Bishoprick and Primacy of all Ireland ; and, at length, being celebrated for his great virtues and miracles, he rested in the Lord.

[D] Some discordance among them as to his burial, which will be shewn in the remarks.] The Annals of Inisfall say he died at Rome in 467 or 468, November the 9th. Others say at Ferlingmore near Glastonbury ; concerning which may be seen this passage in a catalogue of the reliques of the Abbey of Glastonbury in the Cotton library (8). In the coffin of St Benignus, an Irish Bishop and Disciple of St Patrick, are contained his reliques entire, except his head and teeth, which are wanting. He took a journey to this place for the love he bore to St Patrick. The Lord hath often manifested, by the many discoveries of the virtues of St Benignus, in what a high degree of favour he stood with God ; his miracles wrought at Ferlingmore bear witness to this truth. His prayers produced a large river, and from his sapless staff sprung an huge tree, green and bearing leaves. He led an eremitical life in an island near Glastonbury, called Ferlingmore, and there made a good end ; and after a revolution of many years was honourably translated to Glastonbury. (viz.) in the year 1091, as appears in John of Tinmouth (9) ; but Usher (10) observes, that if what the author of the Tripartite Life of St Patrick expressly affirms, that he was buried at Armagh, be true, that then the Benignus of Glastonbury, and the Benignus of Armagh, must be two different persons, as is observed in the text.

[E] Some writings ascribed to him, of which an account may be seen in the notes.] These are,

I. A Book partly in Latin, and partly in Irish, on the virtues and miracles of St Patrick ; to which Jocelin (11) confesses he was indebted.

II. An Irish Poem, wrote on the Conversion of the people of Dublin to the Christian Faith.

III. The Munster Book of Reigns, called by some Leabhar Bening, or Bening's Book, and by others Leabhar na Geart, qu. d. the book of Genealogy, which is ascribed to him by Dr Nicholson (12), Bishop of Derry.
