

G E O R G E R.

G E O R G E the Second, by the Grace of God, King of Great Britain, France, and Ireland, Defender of the Faith, &c. To all to whom these Presents shall come, Greeting: Whereas Our Trusty and Well-beloved William Innys, William Meadows, John Walthoe, Thomas Cox, John and Paul Knapton, Samuel Birt, Daniel Browne, Thomas Longman and Thomas Shewell, Henry Whitridge, Richard Hett, Charles Hitch, Thomas Astley, Stephen Austen, Charles Davis, Richard Manby and Henry Shute Cox, Jacob and Richard Tonson, John Rivington, and Mary Cooper, Citizens and Booksellers of London, have, by their Petition, humbly represented unto Us, that they have for several Years past been at great Pains, and a very large Expence, in procuring and furnishing Books, and other Materials, to Gentlemen of Learning and Character, who have employed their utmost Attention and Diligence in compiling a very useful and extensive Work, intituled,

B I O G R A P H I A B R I T A N N I C A :

Or, The LIVES of the most Eminent PERSONS who have flourished in GREAT BRITAIN. and IRELAND, from the earliest Ages down to the present Times.

Which as it will not only prove of the highest Service to the learned World, but, as the Petitioners humbly conceive, is particularly calculated to extend and support the Reputation of the British People, by preserving the Memories of the most ILLUSTRIOUS PERSONS of all Ranks, and transmitting to Posterity the just Characters of and whoever else have been eminent among us, for Wisdom, Learning, Valour, and other laudable Accomplishments. The Undertakers therefore being desirous of securing to themselves the Fruit of so much Labour, and so great an Expence, as must necessarily attend the Publication of this beneficial Work, without any other Person interfering in their just Property, which they cannot procure without Our Royal Licence and Protection, for the sole Printing, Publishing, and Vending the said Work, in as ample Manner and Form as has been done in Cases of the like Nature. We, taking the Premises into Our Princely Consideration, and being graciously inclined to give Encouragement to all Works that may be of

are pleased to condescend to their Request; and do, by these Presents (as far as may be agreeable to the Statute in that Case made and provided) grant to the said William Innys, &c. their Heirs, Executors, Administrators, and Assigns,

Our Royal PRIVILEGE and LICENCE, for the sole Printing, Publishing, and Vending the said Work, during the Term of Fourteen Years, to be computed from the Date hereof; strictly forbidding and prohibiting all Our Subjects within Our Kingdoms and Dominions, to reprint or abridge the same, either in the like, or any other Volume or Volumes whatsoever, or to Import, Buy, Vend, Utter, or Distribute, any Copy thereof, reprinted beyond the Seas, during the aforesaid Term of Fourteen Years, without the Consent or Approbation of them the said William Innys, &c. their Heirs, Executors, Administrators, or Assigns, by Writing under their Hands and Seals first had and obtained, as they will answer the Contrary at their Peril. Whereof the Commissioners, and other Officers of Our Customs, the Master, Wardens, and Company of Stationers of London, and all other Officers and Ministers whom it may concern, are to take Notice, that strict Obedience be given to Our Pleasure herein signified.

Given at Our Court at Kenfington, the 26th Day of September, 1744, in the Eighteenth Year of Our Reign.

By His Majesty's Command,

THE advantages which learning has received, from the invention of Printing, are doubtless very great; but by extending the dominion of knowledge so much beyond it's former limits, there was a necessity introduced of compiling such general collections, as are now frequent under the names of BIBLIOTHEC'S, LEXICONS, DICTIONARIES, &c. We do not mean for the bare interpretation of words, for such were always common; but for the explanation of things, of which, indeed, there want not some examples among the Antients, but none that bear a very near resemblance, to those in use among the Moderns. For the state of literature in different ages, makes different methods, and different instruments, requisite for it's attainment; in contriving of which, able men become great benefactors to the Republick of Letters.

By degrees, however, the number of books of this sort have increased to such a height, as to be in danger of losing their utility; which evil was no sooner perceived, than some active and industrious men endeavoured to correct it, by applying the same remedy, in respect to these collections, which their authors, pretended to have used, with regard to the multitude of books written on the subjects their collections referred to. Thus, instead of Geographical, Poetical, or Historical Dictionaries, separately; they studied to give us all these in ONE. A great and useful design indeed, but much easier conceived than executed; and the bare attempting to execute it, brought in a new kind of writing on this subject: for besides Historical, which is become a very extensive term, we very soon found, that, in the opinion of the learned, Critical Dictionaries were also necessary.

We have already of each, and of all these kinds in our language, either originals or translations, and yet we presume to hope the favour of the publick, in regard to a new work of this sort, which we now present to the world, as in some measure more perfect than any hitherto published, the seeming boldness of which expression will be taken off, if the reader considers, it is the only reasonable motive that could induce us to undertake, or him to approve, it. But as, in so discerning an age as this, we cannot expect to be believed upon a bare assertion, we shall, in this Preface, give a succinct account of the origin, improvements, and censures of Historical Dictionaries, in order to shew on what grounds we judged this work to be necessary. We shall next explain the nature of this design, and thereby render it evident, that it differs from, and comprehends more, than any of this kind extant: And lastly, we will take the liberty of pointing out some of the uses to which it may be applied, and from whence it will appear highly requisite and useful to the study of British History.

I. The first Historical Dictionary, or rather the first attempt in that way, was the work of our learned and industrious countryman NICHOLAS LLOYD (a), Fellow of Wadham-college in Oxford, who spent thirty years in compiling it. Some indeed consider GESNER'S work (b) in this light, and consequently the abridgments of it; and others the Dictionary of CHARLES STEPHENS, from the materials collected by ROBERT STEPHENS his father (c). But whoever considers and compares the work of Mr LLOYD with these, will see it is a very different thing, and built upon a much broader foundation. To say the truth, if we regard the author's intention, we shall find this a very perfect and excellent work, and when we call it an attempt, we mean no more, than that the author confined his views to a part only, of what has been since considered as the subject of an Historical Dictionary; and not at all as an insinuation of his not coming up to what he promised, for it had been happy, as well for the publick as for themselves, if those who extended his plan had succeeded as well.

(a) The title of his book was, Dictionarium Historicum, Geographicum, Poeticum, Gentium, Hominum, Deorum, Gentilitium, Regionum, Insularum, Locorum, Civitatum, &c. ad Sacras & Profanas Historias Poetarumque fabulas intelligentas necessaria, Notamina, quo decet ordine, Complectens & Illustrans, &c. Oxon. fol. 1670.

It was printed again with great additions at London, 1686, folio.

(b) The title of Gesner's book was, Bibliotheca Universalis, sive Catalogus omnium Scripturum locupletissimus, &c. Tiguri 1545, in folio. Abridged by Lycosthenes, Simler, and Frisius.

(c) Published in 1596, in 4to, afterwards in 1621, 1628, 1633.

We stand indebted for the scheme of an Historical Dictionary, in it's utmost extent, to a French Ecclesiastick, LEWIS MORERI, who formed it before he was twenty-five years of age, and executed it before he was thirty (d). The publick has certainly great obligations to him on this account, and though he has been censured severely for daring beyond his strength, yet his name will live as long as his book, which is still in great vigour, and perhaps after all, he has been blamed with very little reason. As soon as he had taken Orders he was sent to Lyons, with directions to preach on the points controverted between Papists and Protestants, and finding this required an extensive knowledge of Civil and Ecclesiastical History, he composed for his private use a Common-Place Book, which at the instance of his friends he ranged in alphabetick order, and sent it abroad in one volume in folio, in 1674, with the title of An Historical Dictionary, or a Miscellany of Sacred and Prophan Learning.

(d) See the Preface to the Basle edition of 1731.

It will immediately occur to the candid and ingenuous reader, that there was nothing of vanity or self-conceit in this proceeding, the method he took was very agreeable to his purpose, and when converted into a Dictionary, if it proved defective, he was amongst the first who discovered and became sensible of it's defects. He thought himself obliged also to remove them, and his application to this was so assiduous, that it brought him into a kind of decay, which wore him away gradually, so that he died while his book was printing a second time (e), with the addition of another volume, which however appeared in 1681, by the care of the Sieur Perayre, who was Under-Secretary to M. Pomponne, Minister of State, with whom Moreri had also lived some time as his Chaplain, but quitted his house, that he might attend more closely to his Dictionary.

If we were to judge universally of the value of works by the number of impressions, there are very few that would stand in a rank superior to this of Moreri, as may be discerned by the following account of it's editions. I. At Lyons, 1674, in folio. II. At Paris, (though begun at Lyons) by the Sieur Perayre, and dedicated by him to the King, in two volumes, 1681. III. At Paris, printed exactly from the second, 1683, in two volumes. IV. At Paris, 1687, in two volumes. V. At Lyons, 1688, in two volumes, with some additional articles. VI. At Amsterdam, 1691, by the celebrated M. le Clerc, in four volumes, taking in the Supplement printed at Paris as a third volume, in 1689. VII. At Amsterdam, nearly a copy of the former, 1694, in four volumes. VIII. At Amsterdam, without any considerable alterations, 1698. IX. At Paris, by the care of M. Vaultier, 1699, in four volumes. X. At Amsterdam, by the care of M. le Clerc, 1702, in four volumes. XI. At Paris, by M. Vaultier, with large augmentations, 1704, in four volumes. XII. At Paris, by the same editor, 1707, in four volumes. XIII. At Paris, by the care of M. du Pin, 1712, in five volumes. In 1714, they printed a Supplement in one large volume at Paris, and in 1716, by the care of M. Bernard, at Amsterdam, a Supplement in two volumes, folio. XIV. At Paris, 1718, in five volumes. XV. At Paris, by the care of several eminent persons, 1724, in six volumes. XVI. At Basle in Switzerland, 1731, in six volumes. XVII. At Paris, 1732, in six volumes. XVIII. At Amsterdam, 1740, in eight volumes.

This was translated into English in 1694, but very indifferently, it was sent abroad again by Mr Jeremy Collier, and to this there have been several Supplements added. It has been also translated into German more than once, and into Low-Dutch, but whether the Slavonian version, which was intended by the late Czar Peter I, who employed several learned persons therein, was ever finished, is uncertain, nor can we assert, whether the Italian translation, for which Proposals were published in 1728, ever appeared or not. We may judge, however, from hence, how well the learned world in general was pleased with the design of this work, how little soever some criticks might be satisfied with the execution. The form was the object of censure, not the matter; and it was this general approbation, excited so many learned persons to contribute their endeavours to carry it to the highest degree of perfection, an honour that would never have been bestowed, but upon what was highly valuable in it's nature.

(f) Mélanges de Histoire & de Littérature par Vigneul-Marville, Paris, 1725. Vol. I. p 365.

Yet this vast success, instead of defending the Historical Dictionary from, seems to have drawn upon it the resentment of the criticks. The name of the Dictionnaire Bourgeois, or the Dictionary of the Vulgar (f), was given at once by way of character and contempt. M. Menage is said to have declared, he would never read it because it abounded with faults, and if he once got them into his head he should should not easily get them out again (g). He was a man of good sense and great learning, and therefore this decision of his has been greatly applauded; but might not one ask without offence, How he came to know there were abundance of faults in the book without reading it? or whether he could have acquired a tenth part of his learning, if he had constantly adhered to this rule, and read no books that were said to have faults in them. M. le Clerc (b) was a fairer judge, he asserted that there were a great many faults in MORERI's Dictionary, he owned that it was impossible it should be otherwise, he pointed out the principle sources of those errors, and afterwards, according to those rules, he corrected the book.

(g) Menagiana, p. 27. 28. Tom. I. Amsterdam, 1713.

(b) Parrhasiana, Vol. I. p. 396, & seq.

But when the judgments of the learned and unlearned had been sufficiently exercised upon this subject, a great genius undertook to examine it, and promised to place it in it's true light, by compiling a Dictionary of faults, in which all the mistakes in MORERI's great work should be corrected as well as exposed. The publick however thought, and that very justly, it was much too mean an employment for Mr Bayle, to compose a kind of table of the errata in MORERI's Dictionary, and therefore expressed a desire, that he would rather give them something of that kind which was entirely his own. He acquiesced in this decision, and in 1697, published his Historical and Critical Dictionary, which was received with general approbation by the best judges. In the execution of this work, he judged it requisite to give a plain, clear, succinct detail of facts in the text, and to illustrate this by a body of notes, which might serve by way of commentary, and give the reader satisfaction in those points, that in the text were but barely mentioned, and yet deserved a particular discussion.

This method of Bayle's was indubitably a great advantage, and this advantage in the hands of a man of extensive learning, lively imagination, and happy expression, appeared with all it's lustre. Our language was soon enriched with this treasure, and though the version had no very high reputation, yet the excellence of the original gave it such weight, that in a short time the price became excessive, and we have since seen the greatest eagerness in it's favour expressed by the publick, when that work was again translated. By this we may learn with certainty, that the method and expression of Mr Bayle were as much calculated to instruct and to please, as the design of MORERI, and that, by joining these, an author might hope to render an Historical and Critical Dictionary perfect; provided such a plan was laid down, as there was a reasonable prospect of filling up from authentick materials. This was the rock that MORERI and most of his editors split upon. They were for augmenting the number of their articles at all events, though the publick complained that many of their articles already were too short, void of authorities, uninteresting, and from these faults, altogether insipid and unpleasant: whereas Mr Bayle, confining himself to such articles only as he knew were either in themselves, or could be made by him, entertaining to every reader, left it in the power of none to charge him with haste, want of judgment, or inaccuracy.

It is not at all difficult, from the consideration of these particulars, to discern the causes, why notwithstanding all the pains taken about these noble and valuable works, they are both incomplete, and, which is worse, are like to remain so; every new edition of MORERI, with an increase of articles bringing an augmentation of errors, which, as M. LE CLERC long ago very judiciously observed, is an evil not to be cured, but by the joint labours of learned and industrious men in several countries, supported by a royal purse. The Dutch booksellers, after the decease of Mr Bayle, had a project for augmenting his performance, by procuring from the learned in different parts of Europe, select articles for that purpose, but it does not appear they have met with success, or if they had, we have reason to believe, it would have turned rather to their profit than the advantage of the publick, by swelling the bulk of that work, and leaving it still incomplete, which, though satisfactory enough to them, would scarce please any body else.

But after all, may not some method be found, without having recourse to these direct Supplements to MORERI or BAYLE, of compassing by degrees, what, by the universal voice of the learned world, is declared to be so much wanting? Is it not both very possible and very practicable, to compile, in the method of Mr BAYLE, in the several countries of Europe, complete Bodies of the Personal Histories of the great and eminent persons that have flourished in them? Would not such DICTIONARIES as these be, from the nature of this plan, in a great measure exempt from those inconveniences, which made both M. LE CLERC, and

and Mr BAYLE, despair of seeing any thing of this kind perfect? Would not the BRITISH, FRENCH, SPANISH, ITALIAN, GERMAN, and DUTCH BIOGRAPHIES, compose a body of this sort of History, abundantly more correct, and infinitely more useful, than any thing that hitherto has, or is hereafter likely to appear, under the form of SUPPLEMENTS to this or that DICTIONARY, undertaken either by one or more learned men in the same country, where they must be under insuperable difficulties, both as to the procuring and judging of their materials? And will not some honour arise, some proportion of glory be due to the country, where this design, so useful to learning in general, as well as so beneficial to that country itself, shall be first set on foot?

II. It was with this view, that the BIOGRAPHIA BRITANNICA was undertaken; it was in order to collect into one Body, without any restriction of time or place, profession or condition, the memoirs of such of our countrymen as have been eminent, and by their performances of any kind deserve to be remembered. We judged that this would be a most useful service to the publick, a kind of general MONUMENT erected to the most deserving of all ages, an expression of gratitude due to their services, and the most probable means of exciting, in succeeding times, a spirit of emulation, which might prompt men to an imitation of their virtues. This was the first and great motive to the attempting such a collection, towards which, indeed, we saw there were considerable materials ready prepared, though no sign of any such building's being ever traced, or that there had ever been a thought, either as to the expediency or possibility of erecting such a structure; a BRITISH TEMPLE OF HONOUR, sacred to the piety, learning, valour, publick-spirit, loyalty, and every other glorious virtue of our ancestors, and ready also for the reception of the WORTHIES of our OWN TIME, and the HEROES of POSTERITY.

We very soon saw and were apprized of the difficulty of our task, and of the skill as well as labour necessary towards performing it with any degree of elegance and exactness. We saw that multitudes of Lives were already written, in different manners and from different motives, which varied widely as to almost all the facts that are common to them, and which would not admit of any reconciliation. We saw that general characters, high-flown panegyrics, or outrageous satires, had very frequently appeared under the appellation of Lives, without any regular series of facts, with little or no respect to dates, and digested rather according to the whim and fancy of the writer, than in obedience to the laws which reason, and the practice of the best authors have established, in reference to this kind of writing. We saw that most general Collections were too short, and that many particular Lives were too prolix, that some were trifling, others tedious, and very many so carelessly and incorrectly written, as to be of very little, if of any, service, towards such a work as we proposed.

But instead of dismay, the consideration of these obstacles made us the more resolute, we were far from being insensible of the pains we were to take, but at the same time, the necessity of undertaking them grew more and more apparent; we foresaw that patience and industry were requisite to secure success in such a design; but we saw too, that if this work was long delayed, neither patience nor industry would be able to accomplish it. In this situation, the first thing to be considered was METHOD, and in respect to this we were determined to that of BAYLE, not from a blind and superstitious regard to the veneration the learned world have for his memory, and the high esteem they profess for his excellent performance in this way, but because it appeared to us the most natural, easy, and comprehensive, the best adapted to our purpose, and the most likely to give our readers satisfaction, and not at all the worse for his having invented, used, and thereby recommended it to the approbation of the learned.

The next thing that claimed our attention was the materials ready prepared, that is to say, the Collections already in the hands of the publick. Of the true value of which, it was necessary to form a right idea, to select from them whatever was conducive to our design, and carefully to avoid their errors, at the same time that we preserved their excellencies. We were thoroughly satisfied, that if we failed in these particulars, the publick would not hesitate at doing them justice at our expence, and therefore we were extremely nice in our scrutiny, and, as the general remarks we made on this subject, in the advertisement prefixed to this volume, have been very well received by the ablest judges, we flatter ourselves, that what we now offer more at large upon the same head, will not be disagreeable, as it leads to shew, as well the uses and value of each of these Collections, as the reasonableness, and even the necessity of embodying, as we have done, the substance of these separate Collections, with many new Lives, which entered into none of them, in the performance now offered to the world.

We must begin (though the work was never published, and there are but very few MS copies extant) with the Catalogue composed by JOHN BOSTON (i), a Benedictine Monk of the famous monastery of St Edmond's-Bury in Suffolk, in the reign of Henry IV (not Henry VI, as by the mistake of the Printer it stands in the learned Dr Gale's (k) Preface) who visited all the abbies in England, examined their libraries, made an Alphabetical Catalogue of the books they contained, noted the first lines, gave a succinct account of the authors, and a short censure of their writings, grounded on other mens judgments as well as his own, and very accurately marked in what libraries they were to be met with (l). He it was who gave the first example of that method, which succeeding writers pursued; but if we may venture to judge from another work of his, not altogether unlike this in it's kind (m), he was a more exact, and more considerate author, than most who have followed him, and therefore we have the more reason to complain, that so useful and curious a treatise is still withheld from the Publick.

Upon his plan, the celebrated JOHN LELAND, one of the most able, and, beyond comparison, the most industrious of our Antiquaries, composed his admirable Commentaries of British Writers, in four books, which of all the numerous, I had almost said numberless works, which for his country's honour he undertook, was by him left most perfect. As it now appears, we do not discern the distinction of books mentioned by various writers, but undoubtedly it is the same work they mention, and one of the most valuable extant (n). In it our author gives us a Literary History of Britain, from the times of the Druids, to the close of the XVth century, with his censure of the authors, and short catalogues, written with much learning, and no less modesty. He was Library-Keeper to King Henry VIII, and had from him a licence to examine the libraries of all religious houses in England, for which purpose he took many long and weary journies, purely to collect matter for this, and several other pieces relating to our History and Antiquities, which, had he lived to finish, he would have left little for others. But alas! he was first prevented by a phrensy, and before he was perfectly restored to his senses, was taken off by death, April 18, 1552 (o), to the irreparable loss of his country, and of the learned world.

JOHN BALE, a native of Suffolk, and some time Bishop of Ossory in Ireland, was the next who undertook a work of this nature; the first edition, printed most part of it at Ipswich, he published in 1549 (p), some years before Leland died, whose work he mentions in his Preface, and tells his readers that it was earnestly expected, but it does not appear he had then seen it, and from some other of his writings, it is evident he had not (q). But in his exile on account of religion, he had leisure to review and augment this work, which came out at Basil, A. D. 1557, and again, A. D. 1559, in folio, and therein he acknowledges his having borrowed largely from Leland. It would have done great honour to his book, if he had either copied his author exactly, or had imitated his manner, and spoken of the authors he mentions with like decency and temper. But from being a bigotted Papist, he became as violent a Protestant, and with great bitterness reflects upon most of those from whom he differed in opinion, and suffers his passions to transport him frequently, not only beyond the bounds of modesty, but truth. He goes above fifty years lower than Leland, and takes in a great many more authors, even within the compass of time common to them both; but he is not either so good a judge, or so exact a writer as the former. He is very apt to multiply books, and frequently converts the chapters of a book, into distinct treatises. He had many great helps and opportunities towards compleating his performance, and kept a very extensive correspondence for that purpose, which enabled him to add abundance of Scots and Irish Lives. He had in his own possession a large treasure of MSS. relating to our History, and it must be owned, there are many things in his book that are not to be found elsewhere; but then he is hardly to be relied on, especially where there is the least room to suspect he might be prejudiced, for there, as we shall in many instances shew, he had little or no command of himself, but allowed more to his temper than authorities; for he very seldom produces any voucher for what he says, though sometimes he could hardly expect to be believed without it. The very bad usage he met with from Papists,

(as the reader may see at large in his article) in some measure may excuse the man, but cannot at all operate in giving his book credit.

The next author of this sort in point of time is JOHN PITS, in every respect the opposite of JOHN BALE beforementioned (r). He was a Hampshire man, descended from parents in no great circumstances, his mother being sister to the famous Dr SANDERS, bred while a boy at Winchester school, removed from thence to Oxford, where, after studying two years, he imbibed Popish opinions, fled over to Flanders, resumed his studies at Douay, travelled from thence to Rome, and after receiving Priest's orders there, went to France, but troubles arising there, he withdrew into Lorraine, thence he went to Ingoldstadt in Bavaria, where he received his Doctor's degree, after this he returned a second time into Lorraine, and soon after left it, to go in quality of Confessor to the court of the Duchess of Cleves, and, upon her decease, he returned a third time into Lorraine, where he obtained a deanery, in possession of which he died about 1616 (s). It is evident from this account of his life, that he could not be very well qualified for the work he undertook, and indeed he has executed it very indifferently. He commends LELAND's performance highly, which, except as it is involved in BALE's book, he never saw, in the judgment of friends and foes (t). He abuses BALE plentifully, whose work with all it's imperfections he copies, and has added to them a multitude of faults of his own making. He brings down his account to 1614, when he finished his book, which however was not published till 1619, after the author's death, and one reason, we are told, for making it publick, was to bring BALE's book into disuse, by supplying the Romanists with another work of the same nature; and very probably, the preserving the memories of the exiles of that Church, might be another motive to the rendering it publick, which, for it's merits in other respects, it could scarce have deserved.

We have a very comprehensive Catalogue of the Scots writers, drawn up by THOMAS DEMPSTER of Mureik (u), an itinerant Professor of the Belles Lettres, who, after visiting different parts of Europe, and undertaking the instruction of youth at Paris and other places, retired at last into Italy, where he composed his Ecclesiastical History of the Scots Nation, which however is really no more than a hasty Catalogue of Authors, a very superficial account of their lives, and a very imperfect and incorrect detail of their writings. He was undoubtedly very zealous for the honour of his country, which prompted him to give a place in his Catalogue, to many that had no title thereto from their writings; he also made no scruple of borrowing great men from other countries, to make his Collection the more illustrious; thus, St ALBAN, Venerable BEDE, and Pope ADRIAN IV, were all Scots (w), if we trust to his book. It is this vain humour of his, that has contributed more than any thing else to sink the credit of his performance, which, in other respects, is little inferior to BALE's, and much superior to PITS's, for DEMPSTER was truly a man of learning, and, with regard to the Lives of his contemporaries, it seems to be a faithful, though not a judicious, Collection. He was a furious Papist, lived an exile for his religion, and therefore we may be sure, bestows no very good character on Protestant authors. Yet his love for his country somewhat qualifies this, and perhaps his book might have been more perfect, if he had lived to put the last hand to it, or if it had been so much as published by one of his countrymen; but it had not this good fortune, it was printed at Bononia in 1627, about two years after DEMPSTER's death, by one very affectionate to his memory, but an indifferent editor for all that.

The learned in Ireland have been more fortunate in an Historian, than either those of England or Scotland, for Sir JAMES WARE (x), a man of solid abilities, extensive knowledge, and indefatigable industry, one who had taken vast pains in other respects, in preserving and putting into order their History, both Civil and Ecclesiastical, as also their Antiquities, resolved to extend his care likewise to their writers, of whom he published a very accurate account in 1639, divided into two parts, the first containing the natives, the second such learned persons as though born in other countries, were benefited and passed their days in that island. This work has no imperfections, but such as were unavoidable at the time in which it was composed, and the worthy author spared no labour to correct most of these in a second edition, which he was actually preparing for the press at the time of his decease, in 1666. The world, however, has not been deprived of the great improvements made by him on this subject, the contents of which appear to advantage, in the third volume of the English translation of his Works, very lately published, published (y), and which altogether, fully justify the compliment paid him by Bishop NICHOLSON, who styles him the CAMDEN of Ireland (z). Had the works hitherto mentioned (LELAND's excepted) been penned like this, they would have been far more useful, and we should have been better able to have relied upon them, which now we cannot do, where any other materials lie within our reach. But had these books been ever so well executed, it is evident they could have supplied us only with the Memoirs of Men of Letters, so that how useful soever they might have been in that respect, they could not be said to bear any proportion to the advantages proposed from a book of this kind, which not only comprehends the substance of all these performances, and continues their subjects, upon a more extensive plan, down to our own times, but also takes in many other heads equally curious and useful, and much more agreeable and entertaining. But to proceed at present with the view of our materials.

(y) This History of the Irish Writers makes the entire third volume of the Translation of Sir James Ware's Writings, by Walter Harris, Esq; who has continued the History to the present time.

(z) Irish Historical Library, p. 20.

We have no Collection, which, from its title and plan, promises so much as FULLER's, who undertook to give us the Worthies of England, but he is far from performing this; his Lives are in effect no more than short characters, interspersed now and then with remarkable stories, which are not always to be depended upon, and there is very little new in him: BALE, FOX, and STOWE, are his principal authors, from whom he takes plentifully in this, as well as in his Church History. There are others who have passed harsher sentences than this on his labours; but our business is not to decry those who have gone before us, but barely to represent how far they are, or are not, helpful towards the filling up this design. Dr FULLER's foundation was broad, but the superstructure is not answerable; we may say the same of his Church History, and of his ABEL Redivivus, all of them proving him to be a fanciful, rather than a faithful, writer, very little concerned about dates or circumstances, and, if one might be indulged for once in his manner of speaking, rather desirous of making his readers merry than wise. It may be alledged however, that this was the humour of those times, and that he erred with numbers, which, though an indifferent, is yet some excuse.

As the taste for this kind of knowledge improved, some abler, and more accurate writers began to appear; among whom we may reckon the Oxford Antiquary ANTHONY WOOD, who, after penning with great care and industry the History and Antiquities of that famous Univerfity, undertook to give us the Writers also, for two centuries before, and the Prelates likewise who had been bred at Oxford within the same space. Some have censured this work in very coarse terms, and without question it is far enough from being perfect; the spleen of the author discovers itself frequently, the composition is by no means elegant, and there is an unusual bluntness and asperity in the language. Yet, with all these defects, it is out of comparison more useful and instructive than any thing that had appeared before. Authorities are here cited, which are absolutely wanting in FULLER and LLOYD, (another writer of Worthies) and though, from the Transcriber or Printer's faults, there are many mistakes, yet here are dates, and the Lives are ranged in an easy and intelligible method; so that we may truly affirm, one half of the learned men of this part of the island, have their names, the capital particulars of their lives, and a tolerable catalogue of their writings preserved, for that period to which his Collections relate. It was once hoped, we should have seen like attention shewn towards the learned men educated at Cambridge, and had the work been executed as it was designed, by the late reverend and excellent Mr BAKER, it must have been a masterly performance; since, with all the care and industry of WOOD, he had a fine genius, a piercing understanding, and wrote a most correct style, equally removed from the starched setness of a sententious writer, and from that luxuriancy of language that produces long and languid periods. But besides all these, he had still greater qualities, such as calmness of mind, candour of heart, and a most unsuspected integrity. We may justly therefore regret the loss of such a work, from such a man, but as his Collections are still preserved, we may yet hope to see their contents by some lucky accident or other. In the mean time Mr WARD's Lives of the Professors in Gresham-College, may serve as a specimen, how such Collections ought to be formed, so as to stand out of the reach of censure.

We might extend these remarks much farther, but that in some respects it would be a needless, in others an unpleasant task. The Lives of our POETS have been often, but never well, written; LANGBAIN is too concise, and his follower, who pretends to have improved him, has much mistaken his talent, and done very little honour to those he has attempted to celebrate. We have very few memoirs of PHYSICIANS, though scarce any nation has produced better; and as to DIVINES, the greatest part of their memoirs are rather funeral orations or panegyrics than narratives. Yet some single Lives we have, of a moderate compass, admirably well written; as for instance, WALTON's Life of Sir HENRY WOTTON, SPRAT's inimitable Life of COWLEY, and the Life of Sir WILLIAM TEMPLE by an intimate friend. Some great men have also left excellent materials, for representing their own actions in a fair and true light, such as the great Lord-Treasurer CECIL, the famous Chancellor CLARENDON, and the celebrated Earl of STRAFFORD, whose Letters do the highest honour to his memory, and shew him as much above the praises of his friends, as the malice of his enemies.

Upon the whole it is very apparent, that hitherto there has nothing appeared of the same nature with our design. Some plans have been too narrow, as shutting out all Lives of action except by accident; others too extended, by taking in the remarkable persons of other nations as well as our own; so that we have built upon no body's foundation, and are at liberty to make the most we can of the scheme we have chosen. In the next place we readily confess, and have spent some time in giving evidence against ourselves, that there is no want of materials, and that the blame must fall upon us, if they are not well put together. But granting we should be so fortunate as to succeed, it may very well be demanded, of what singular use and advantage will this work be? What will it afford beyond our former helps? Why should we add this to the many Dictionaries already published? To which we answer, that it will be of general advantage, that it will contribute vastly to facilitate the attainment of the most useful kind of knowledge, and that to make this more plainly appear, will deserve some farther observations.

III. It is very evident from this view of the work, that the title of it will be exactly fulfilled, that is to say, it will be a compleat Body of British Biography, and contain a much larger, and more methodical Collection of Personal History, than hitherto has ever appeared. In it the reader will find, not only our most famous Divines, and most eminent Scholars, with a clear and rational account of their works, but also the memoirs of our ablest Statesmen, our great Captains, our most illustrious Sea-men, and our worthiest Patriots. In short, all who have rendered themselves remarkable in publick posts, or deserve to be remembered for their private virtues, and these too in all ages, from the earliest accounts our Histories contain, down to the present times, so that it will equally serve, to give us just notions of the merit of our remotest ancestors, and of their posterity. It will be of use also to succeeding times, for this Body of Lives being once in the hands of the Publick, improvements will be continually made, and every man of genius, every person endowed with a generous and liberal spirit, will become more steady and more assiduous, as well as more eager in pursuit of knowledge and virtue, when he is sensible that his labours will not be buried in oblivion, but that whatever he gloriously atchieves will be faithfully recorded.

But the bare setting down of facts and dates, though in itself highly useful; and of great importance to History, is but half the merit of this work. For at the same time that the text is so full as copious, and, by the exactness of the authorities, much more correct than the articles of MORERI, the notes make a perpetual commentary, in the manner of BAYLE, in which all doubtful points are examined, disagreeing relations compared, and the truth, from thence, set in a clear light. By this means, abundance of historical passages that are scattered in works upon other subjects, in prefaces to books, or in loose pamphlets, are secured from being overlooked, and brought into their proper places, of which many instances might be given, if their number did not, in some measure, render it unnecessary. Thus, in the Life of Archbishop ABBOT, the reader will find many facts that relate to him, taken from authors very difficult to be met with, and extracts from some that are scarce to be had at all, by which all our General Historians are corrected, and the whole of that Prelate's life and administration, is fairly and fully set forth to publick view. In the article of Pope ADRIAN IV, our own and foreign writers are compared, and thereby several circumstances rectified, as to which our Ecclesiastical Historians were very widely mistaken. The article of ALLEYN the Player is very curious, and contains a multitude of circumstances, that, if they had not been drawn together for the use of this work, would never have appeared. Besides, in several articles there have been inserted papers from the closets of the curious, that hitherto had not seen the light; as in the article of Dr ANTHONY, the process of his Aurum Potabile at large, which was formerly reputed a medicine of great value; and, in the article of BALES the Writing-Master, there is the famous Lineal Cypher, invented by the Marquis of Worcester, which though mentioned by him in a work lately reprinted, yet the secret itself was first made publick here.

We may from hence perceive, that it enables us to see the most material points in our History, in all the several lights in which they have been placed by different authors, accompanied frequently with observations and remarks, that serve to explain and illustrate them, so as to clear up truth more effectually, than it was possible to do by any other method. As for instance; ARDEN's treason, of which our Historians speak so variously and so doubtfully, is, under his article, shewn to have been a state artifice of a great Minister, to whom this gentleman had given offence. The case of Archbishop ABBOT's killing the Keeper, is shewn in a different light from that in which it has been represented, either by friends or enemies, and it is plainly demonstrated, that it had nothing to do with his last suspension, though mentioned as the pretence for it, by some of our best Historians. The character of Lord-Chancellor BACON is vindicated from many calumnies, and his corruption as fairly stated from the best authorities. Many other instances might be given, even in the compass of this volume, but these are abundantly sufficient to prove the truth of this assertion, and to let the reader see, that never any work was better calculated to render our History perfectly intelligible, to throw light even on the obscurest passages, and to set matters of fact, as well as the characters of particular persons, in that point of view in which they ought to be considered, independent of the prejudices of times, and the prepossessions of many of our Historical Writers, who, from their being misled by passion, or for want of proper lights, have either fallen short of, or exceeded the truth.

By this means, the work before us becomes both a Supplement and a Key, not only to our General Histories, but to particular Memoirs, so that by comparing the characters of great men, as drawn by particular pens, with their articles in this Biographical Dictionary, we see how far they are consistent with, or repugnant to, truth. By it also we are enabled, where characters are omitted, to supply them, and to find distinct and particular relations of remarkable facts, which are barely mentioned, or but slightly described in other books; by it also we are enabled to recover or rectify dates, which are either omitted or mistaken, if they have any relation to considerable persons, as almost all memorable actions have; and whereas most Histories drop even the greatest men when no longer concerned in great affairs, we can here follow them in their retreats, and see how their private life agreed or disagreed, with the maxims owned by them in their more active scenes of life. We can also trace, by this means, the beginnings of their greatness, and learn the steps by which they rose to those high posts and employments, which gave them place in History, and be thereby enabled to apprehend more fully, and understand more clearly, what is said of them. We may add to this, that we have an opportunity likewise of seeing the families from which they rose, or which are descended from them, so that we are able to connect our Antient with our Modern History, and from thence discover an infinite number of curious and useful circumstances, which otherwise might escape our notice.

If, instead of considering it in this general manner, and in respect to the bulk of our History, we examine it more closely, and reflect on the relation it bears to the particular branches of that study, we shall find it of no less utility. For example, as to Ecclesiastical History; Bishop GODWIN has given us a very succinct detail of the succession of our Prelates in their respective Sees, and his work has been very accurately continued down to the present time. Yet even with respect to the most eminent men, these accounts are very short, and in all other Catalogues they are still shorter and less correct, so that frequently they raise our curiosity without satisfying it. But here we can immediately turn to the Lives of most of these Prelates, and take a view of their most considerable actions both before and after they were honoured with the mitre. We may say the same thing with respect to the Law, of which we have a like series of successions, but nothing more, whereas, in this work, almost all our Chancellors, our most distinguished Judges, and many other eminent men of that honourable and learned profession, have their memories preserved, and their principal actions recorded. We may affirm the like of our Ministers of State, the Generals of our armies, and our Sea-officers, to which we may add, those Orators who have distinguished themselves in either House of Parliament, where liberty of speech, as it is an excellence in our Constitution, contributes also to render this work particularly valuable, by introducing into British Biography, characters that will scarce be found in any foreign work of the same kind.

With respect to Men of Letters, we have been as careful as it was possible, and though we have not, as in some other Collections, preferred them to men who have passed their days in action, yet we have made it our study to represent their characters fairly and fully, and to gratify the reader with correct catalogues of their works. This we have done with respect to polite as well as grave writers, and have endeavoured to retrieve, as far as lay in our power, the memoirs of Philosophers, Physicians, Mathematicians, Chemists, &c. that have not been hitherto taken notice of in this manner. We have likewise given a succinct account of any disputes or controversies in which they were engaged, and where any opportunity offered, we have not failed to mention the substance of scarce treatises, and, where the subject required it, extracts from them, referring, at the same time, to the books, where farther satisfaction might be had on those heads. Where works have been published without a name, or where authors have thought fit to make use of disguised or fictitious appellations, we have given what light we could, and have supported what we say by proper authorities, agreeable to the design of making this a Critical as well as an Historical Dictionary. And with the same view we have sometimes corrected the mistakes of other writers, with as little prejudice as was possible to their reputation, being thoroughly sensible, that in many cases those mistakes were involuntary, and, at the time they wrote, perhaps not to be avoided.

As to the Lives of the remarkable persons that have flourished in Scotland and Ireland, it may not be amiss to observe, that due care has been taken to establish a correspondence with the learned in both those countries, which we hope will sufficiently appear in the articles included in this work. We have also been very diligent in comparing, where it was practicable, historical facts with records, which is the only means of recovering and ascertaining dates. We have likewise consulted those large collections of letters and papers published for fifty years past, and have also had recourse to several Collections that are not yet printed, by which means a multitude of useful and curious particulars have been brought to light, and very large chasms, in Collections of this kind formerly made, have been filled up, to a degree even beyond our expectations. The mention of this, leads us to make our acknowledgments to such as have favoured us with these communications, and whose names are mentioned in the course of this work where it is requisite, and where we were permitted to use that freedom. We likewise presume to desire the continuance of these favours, and that gentlemen will be pleased to be as early in their informations as possible, that they may come time enough to be useful.

The memoirs of such of our countrymen, as, either on account of their good or ill fortune, have spent the greatest part of their days in foreign parts, have been collected with all the care and circumspection possible, and no diligence has been wanting, to procure the best intelligence that could be had in such cases; and we hope it will appear, that many errors committed by foreign writers, in respect to such persons especially, have been rectified. With the view of doing the greater justice in this particular, we have consulted, as the reader will perceive by frequent citations from them, most of the Histories of Popes, Cardinals, and Religious Orders, published abroad; as well as the memoirs of foreigners who have resided in England, and such as have inserted particular parts of our History in their works, not to mention the several foreign Dictionaries, in which, for the most part, English Lives are remarkably defective, and persons of the same name are frequently confounded, which shews how much preferable our Plan is to one that might appear more general, but which, at the same time, must subject us unavoidably to the like mistakes. These observations arise naturally from the subject, and are most of them requisite to do justice to our readers and to ourselves, and to make it appear that a work of this importance, has been conducted throughout with mature deliberation, and that, being apprized of the many and great difficulties that lay in our way, we have not failed to use all the industry, and to employ all the skill that was in our power, to overcome and surmount them, not that we have the vanity to suppose we have been always successful, but there is reason to hope for some indulgence from the publick, when men have spared no pains or assiduity in it's service, which is all the excuse we have or desire to plead.

There are many other points relative to the several heads into which we have divided this Preface, that might have been examined, and would have contributed to prove the necessity as well as utility of a work like this, but we chose rather to leave these to the reflection of the learned and judicious peruser, than to expatiate too much on a subject, which we hope is already sufficiently clear. For the principal motives to an undertaking right in itself, being once placed in a true light, such as are well acquainted with the subject which they concern, easily enter into all their branches, and often penetrate farther than those who laid them down, and we are willing to leave this in the reader's power, rather than fatigue him with a multitude of observations and remarks, which, however just, however pertinent in themselves, become tedious and troublesome when carried beyond their proper bounds. This we thought necessary to mention, that those, who, in perusing this discourse, or the book to which it belongs, perceive many more advantages than are here pointed out, may not conceive they were wholly unknown or unattended to by us, but may rather be satisfied that we passed them by, to leave no room for the disagreeable imputation, of having exhausted a subject all lovers of British History are so well versed in, that with the greatest ease they are capable of reaching it's utmost recesses, without the assistance of a guide. Something, on the appearance of a Collection like this, after so many which at first sight seem of the same nature, it was absolutely requisite to say, in justice to ourselves and to the publick, which is enough to account for our prefixing this Preface, and the fear of displeasing our judges by saying too much, and detaining them too long, is the proper apology for not extending it farther, and will, in the eyes of equitable Criticks, excuse us for not inserting many things, that might otherwise be thought considerable omissions. In an age less learned, a longer Preface would have been not only tolerable but agreeable, but in this, when almost every reader enters into the method as well as matter of the books that come before him, it is enough to touch the principal heads of enquiry, and it would be too much to dwell on them for any time.

One thing however we must be permitted to mention before we can conclude, and that is, the care taken to bring all remarkable articles into our BIOGRAPHY at once, and under the same alphabet, so that the memorable facts throughout our whole History, the disputable points relating to Chronology, the circumstances attending every event of importance, as well as the characters and actions of the persons principally concerned in them, may be all readily found and represented to the reader, supported by proper evidence, and explained, by the comparison of what has been advanced concerning them by different writers. To have left out articles of note, would have been unpardonable in an HISTORICAL, and to have treated such articles superficially, unworthy a CRITICAL DICTIONARY; the fulfilling our Plan, after we were satisfied of it's being approved by the PUBLICK, became our indispensable duty, and to that we have constantly attended in the choice, and in the manner of treating our articles. If, therefore, they appear more numerous than might be expected, or the doing them justice requires a little more room than at first might be conceived requisite, let it be considered, how far the reputation of our country, the honour of our ancestors, the respect due to the memories of great men, and the vast importance of setting worthy examples before the eyes of posterity, are concerned. When we reflect seriously upon this, and on the cruelty, we might even say impiety, of sacrificing the glory of great characters to trivial circumstances, and mere conveniency, it might be justly apprehended, that the world would rather resent our timidity, if we should distrust their approbation of the liberty necessary to be taken in this respect, than censure us for doing at once, and in the easiest and most effectual manner, what, some time or other, must have been done, if we had been too scrupulous in the performance of what we undertook. Architects are seldom censured for small mistakes in their estimates, if the structure they proposed to erect, be but uniform and complete; besides, a palace finished at once, is always cheaper, as well as more beautiful, than when helped out by additional buildings, made necessary from the cramping of the first design.

We have now executed, in as narrow a compass as it is possible, what we proposed at the entrance of this Discourse, and therefore have nothing to do more than to conclude it. We have shewn how these kind of Dictionaries came first into use, and why they were received with such universal eagerness and avidity; in giving the History of MORERI'S performance, we have explained the causes which hindered that work from being carried to perfection, even by the most able and learned men in Europe; in our account of MR BAYLE'S design, we have described the manner in which he gave that superior value to an undertaking of this sort, and shewed how, instead of a Library for the Ignorant, it might be made the Treasure of the Learned; we have pointed out the reasons why it seems to be impossible, or at least impracticable, ever to carry either of these works to the highest degree of perfection, by a meer addition of Supplement after Supplement; we have proposed a new method of attaining this, and of giving the extent of MORERI'S plan, and the accuracy of BAYLE'S design, to one and the same work; lastly, we offer to the Publick this specimen of the possibility of such a performance, and should they honour the BIOGRAPHIA BRITANNICA with their approbation, it will very probably prove the means of exciting, in other countries, a desire to erect the same kind of general monument, to the memory of deserving persons, which would effectually justify what we have laid down on that head, and furnish a more complete Body of Personal History, than, as yet, the world has seen, or so much as expected.

AARON and JULIUS (Saints) suffered martyrdom together, during the persecution under the Emperor Diocletian, in the year 303 [A], about the same time with St Alban (a), the protomartyr of Britain (b) [B]. What their British names were, we are no where told; it being usual with the Christian Britons, at the time of baptism, to take new names from the Greek, Latin, or Hebrew. Nor have we any certainty as to the particulars of their death; only that they suffered the cruelest torments. They had each a church erected to his memory [C]; and their festival is placed, in the Roman Martyrology, on the first of July. They are here joined together in one article, because, like Saul and Jonathan, in their death they were not divided (c).

[A] AARON and JULIUS ——— suffered martyrdom together, in the year 303.] Venerable Bede, who mentions the martyrdom of these two saints (and of many others of both sexes, in different places, who were put to death with the cruelest torments) calls them Citizens of Urbs Legionum. Passi sunt ea tempestate Aaron & Julius, Legionum Urbis Cives, aliique utriusque sexus diversis in locis per plures, qui diversis cruciatibus torti, & inaudita membrorum discerptione lacerati, animas ad supernæ civitatis gaudia perfetto agone miserunt (1). Urbs Legionum, or the City of Legions, was a name given by the Romans to several cities of Britain; as Leicester, Exeter, and Caer-Leon, the metropolis of Wales: which last must here be meant, because the churches, dedicated to St Aaron and St Julius, were built in that city, and the bodies of the saints themselves interred there (2).

[B] ——— About the same time with St Alban.] That St Alban, nevertheless, claims the honour of the protomartyrdom, appears from the testimony of Matthew of Westminster; who, mentioning the martyrdom of St Alban under the year 303, adds, by way of corollary, that Aaron and Julius, and many others, both men and women, suffered at the same time in Britain; St Alban, however, being the protomartyr of the English, or the first who impurpled Britain with his blood. Eodem tempore passi sunt in Britannia Aaron & Julius, cum aliis pluribus viris & fœminis, qui ad desiderabile cœlestis Hierusalem gaudium per martyrium convolarunt; existente tamen beato Albano protomartyre, qui Britanniam primitivo sanguine purpuravit (3).

[C] They had each a church erected to his memory.] Giraldus Cambrensis, describing the city of Caer-Leon (4), tells us, the bodies of Aaron and Julius lie buried in that city, each of whom has a church dedicated to him; that of Julius graced with a choir of nuns, and that of Aaron with a famous order of canons. And Bishop Godwin tells us (5), that the remains of these churches, or chapels, were visible not very long since; the one situated on the east side, the other on the west side of the town, about two miles distant from each other.

ABBADIE (JAMES) was born at Nay in Berne, in the year 1658 (a), as there is good reason to believe, tho' some indeed say, that he was born in 1654 (b). He studied at Puy Laurent, at Saumur, at Paris, and at Sedan; at which last place, he received the degree of Doctor in Divinity. He intended to have dedicated himself very early to the ministry, but the circumstances of the Protestants in France, rendered it impracticable there, for which reason, he readily accepted the offer of the Count d'Espense, who had a considerable post in the service of the Elector of Brandenburg, who desired to carry him with him to Berlin, where the Elector intended to settle a French minister (c). It is not very clear, at what time he arrived in that city, but it is reasonable to suppose, that it might be either in 1680, or 1681. He resided there for many years with great reputation, and in high favour with the Elector Frederick William; making now and then a trip to Holland, on account of publishing his writings, which were received with great applause (d). At first, the congregation of French Refugees at Berlin was but thin, but after the revocation of the Edict of Nantes, numbers retired into Brandenburg, and were received with the utmost compassion; so that Dr Abbadie had a great charge, of which he took all imaginable care, and, by his interest, rendered them many services at court (e). In the spring of the year 1688, the Elector died, and our author then accepted of the proposal made him by the Marshal Schomberg, to go with him first to Holland, and then into England, with the Prince of Orange. In the latter end of the summer of the year 1689, he followed that great man into Ireland, where he remained till after the battle of the Boyne, which happened in July 1690, wherein his patron was killed, which occasioned his return to England (f): He became quickly afterwards, minister of the French church at the Savoy, but the air disagreeing with him, he went over again to Ireland, where he was promoted to the deanery of Killaloo, which he enjoyed for many years (g). His occasions, and especially the printing of his books, called him frequently into England, and Holland, in both places he was extremely beloved. He was strongly attached to the cause of his Royal Master, as appears by his elaborate defence of the Revolution, and his history of the Assassination Plot (h). He gave also very high proofs of his loyalty to King George the first, and would doubtless have shewn the like respect to his Son and successor, early in whose reign, viz. on the 25th of September, 1727, he departed this life at Mary-le-bon, near London, aged, according to some accounts, sixty-nine (i), according to others, seventy-three (k). He had great natural abilities, improved by a large stock of solid and useful learning; was a most zealous Protestant, and, without flattery, one of the most eloquent men of the age, in which he lived. His works, of which the reader will find an account in a note [A], bore

Mr Bayle commends this piece also, as one of the most perfect in its kind (2), and indeed, it has been always so esteemed as well by the Roman Catholic as the reformed divines. The Abbé Houteville, a late writer, speaks of it in these terms. 'The most shining of those treatises for defence of the Christian Religion, which were published by the Protestants, is that written by Mr Abbadie. The favourable reception it met with, the praises it received almost without example immediately after its publication, the universal approbation it still meets with, renders it unnecessary for me to join my commendations, which would add so little to the merit of so great an author. He has united in this book, all our controversies with the infidels. In the first part, he combats the Atheists; the Deists in the second; and the Socinians in the third: philosophy and theology, enter happily into his manner of composing, which is in the true method, lively, pure, and elegant, especially in the first books; for towards the end, he seems to have less fire. I see methinks there, a dryness which looks like the shore left by the ebb of the full tide of eloquence (3).' This work was translated into English, and into High Dutch, in which language it hath bore two editions with notes (4).

It was reprinted in Holland, and was also translated into English, but is at present so scarce, that it is known to very few. Besides these, he published several single sermons, and other little tracts, which it is not necessary to mention. In 1727, he sent abroad proposals for printing all his works, as well those already published, as many that he had by him ready for the press, in four volumes 4to. But before he could bring his design to bear, he was taken away by death (12).

A B B O T (GEORGE) Archbishop of Canterbury: A man, whose extraordinary abilities, high rank in the church, and influence in publick affairs, deserve that the circumstances of his life should be transmitted to posterity with the greatest accuracy and impartiality possible. He was born October 29, 1562, at Guilford, in Surrey, of very worthy parents (a); remarkably distinguished by their steady zeal for the Protestant Religion; for their living long, and happily together, and for their singular felicity in their children [A]. While his mother was pregnant with this son, she is said to have had a dream which proved at once an omen, and an instrument of his future fortunes. Her dream was this. She fancied she was told in her sleep that if she could eat a Jack, or Pike, the child she went with would prove a son, and rise to great preferment. Not long after this, in taking a pail of water out of the river Wey, which ran by their house, she accidentally caught a Jack, and had thus, an odd opportunity of fulfilling her dream. This story being much talked of, and coming to the ears of some persons of distinction, they offered to become sponsors for the child, which was kindly accepted, and they had the goodness to afford many testimonies of their affection to their godson while at school, and after he was sent to the university (b). Such were the good effects of his mother's dream [B]. When he was grown up to an age proper for receiving the first tincture of learning, he was sent with his elder brother Robert (of whom in a subsequent article) to the free-school, erected in their native town of Guilford, by King Edward VI; and having passed thro' the rudiments of literature, under the care of Mr Francis Taylor, who had then the direction of that school (c); he was in 1578 removed to the university of Oxford, and entered a student in Baliol College (d). On November 29, 1583, being then bachelor of arts, he was elected probationer fellow of his college; and afterwards proceeding in the faculty of arts, he entered into holy orders, and became a celebrated preacher in the university (e). He commenced bachelor of divinity in 1593, and proceeded doctor in that faculty, in May 1597: and in the month of September, of the same year, he was elected master of University College (f). About this time it was, that the first differences began between him and Dr Laud, which subsisted as long as they lived, and was the cause of great uneasiness to both (g). In the year following, which was 1598, he published a Latin work which did him great honour; and which was afterwards reprinted in Germany (h). On March 6, 1599, he was installed dean of Winchester, in the room of Dr Martin Heton, who was preferred to the bishoprick of Ely: Dr Abbot being then about thirty-seven years of age (i). Some writers say that he was also dean of Gloucester (k), but this is absolutely a mistake [C]. In 1600, he was vice-chancellor of the university of Oxford (l), and distinguished himself while in that high office, by the

[A] For their singular felicity in their children. Mr Maurice Abbot, was by trade a Clothworker, and settled at the town of Guilford, in Surrey, where he married his wife Alice March, and suffered for his steadfastness in the Protestant religion, through the means of Dr Story, who was a great persecuter of such persons in the reign of Queen Mary (1). But these storms being blown over, they passed the remainder of their days quietly, living together fifty-eight years. She deceased September 15, 1606, and he September 25, the same year, the former being eighty, and the latter eighty-six years of age (2). They left behind them six sons, of whom Robert the eldest, was then one of the King's chaplains, our author, George, had been thrice vice-chancellor of Oxford, and their youngest son Maurice, was at this time an eminent merchant of the city of London (3).

[B] Such were the good effects of his mother's dream. The story of this dream was first published by Mr Aubrey, in the year 1696 (4): he seems, from what he says in another work of his, to have enquired afterwards very carefully into the truth of it; which was attested to him by the minister, and several of the most sober inhabitants of Guilford (5); yet it must be owned, that it is not a little strange this dream should never be taken notice of before, especially considering the humour of the times in which the archbishop lived, and the proneness of Fuller and Lloyd, who have both written accounts of this bishop, to set down whatever carried in it any thing of the wonderful.

[C] That he was dean of Gloucester, is absolutely a mistake. This is very evident, from consulting the succession of the deans of Winchester, and Gloucester; Dr Abbot was installed dean of Winchester, March 6, 1599, as appears by the register (6), and on June 3, 1609, Dr Thomas Moreton, was installed on the promotion of Dr Abbot, to the see of Litchfield and Coventry (7); so that the latter plainly held this deanery nine years. As for that of Gloucester, Dr Griffith Lewis was succeeded therein, after he had held it seven years, by Dr Thomas Moreton, in 1607 (8), who was removed to Winchester, upon the promotion of Dr Abbot; from whence, I imagine, the mistake must have proceeded: Mr Bayle, in his article, has heightened this error, for he makes Dr Abbot succeed Dr Moreton, in the deanery of Gloucester (9), which was excusable in him, as a foreigner; but it is surprizing, to find such as write English histories, setting down false facts of this nature, merely through want of attention.

opinion he gave with respect to the setting up again the cross in Cheapſide, about which there were great diſputes, but in the end he carried his point againſt Dr Bancroft, then Biſhop of London, and afterwards Archbiſhop of Canterbury; which gained him great reputation as appears by a tract publiſhed on that ſubject (m) [D]. He likewiſe publiſhed the ſame year his ſermons on the prophet Jonah, which were received with great applauſe (n). In 1603, he was again choſen vice-chancellor of the univerſity, and diſcharged that office a ſecond time with general approbation (o). In the ſucceeding year 1604, that tranſlation of the Bible which is now in uſe was made by the direction of King James, and Dr Abbot was the ſecond of eight learned divines in the univerſity of Oxford, to whom the care of tranſlating the whole New Teſtament (excepting the Epistles) was committed (p). He likewiſe publiſhed this year an answer to Dr Hill's Reasons for upholding Popery (q). In 1605, he was a third time vice-chancellor (r). In the ſucceeding year, he is ſaid to have had a great ſhare in the troubles of Laud, who was called to an account by the vice-chancellor, Dr Ayry, for a ſermon of his preached before the univerſity (s); and that year likewiſe, he loſt his father and mother (t). In 1608, died his great patron Thomas Sackville, Earl of Dorſet, Lord High Treafurer of England, and Chancellor of the Univerſity of Oxford, ſuddenly at the council table, at whoſe funeral, Dr Abbot preached a ſermon, which was afterwards printed, and generally commended (u). After his deceaſe, Dr Abbot became chaplain to George Hume, Earl of Dunbar, and Treafurer of Scotland, one of King James's early favourites, and who had all along had a very high ſhare in his eſteem, and with him he went this year into Scotland, in order to aſſiſt in the execution of a very important deſign, for eſta bliſhing an union between the Churches in that kingdom, and this, wherein he behaved with ſo much prudence and moderation as gained him a very high character, and is thought to have been the firſt ſtep to all his future preferment (w) [E]. While he was at Edinburgh upon this occaſion, a proſecution was commenced againſt one George Sprot, Notary of Aymouth, for having been concerned in Gowry's conſpiracy eight years before, for which he was tried before Sir William Hart, Lord Juſtice General of Scotland, condemned and executed. A large account of this affair was drawn up by the judge, and a narrative prefixed thereto, by Dr Abbot, who had been eye-witneſs of all that paſſed, and this was publiſhed at London, in order to ſettle the minds of the people, with regard to that

[D] A tract publiſhed on that ſubject.] The cross at Cheapſide was taken down in the year 1600, in order to be repaired, and upon this occaſion, the citizens of London deſired the advice of both univerſities on this queſtion; Whether the ſaid cross ſhould be re-erected or not? and Dr Abbot, as vice-chancellor of Oxford, gave it as his opinion, that the crucifix with the dove upon it ſhould not be again ſet up, but approved rather of a pyramid, or ſome other matter of mere ornament, for the reaſons aſſigned in his letter. In this determination he acted conſiſtently with his own practice, when in his ſaid office he cauſed ſeveral ſuperſtitious pictures to be burnt at the market-place of Oxford, and among the reſt, one in which was the figure of God the Father, over a crucifix, ready to receive the Soul of Chriſt; and he profeſſes in this letter, that he was moved to ſuch proceedings by his own obſervation and experience. 'I remember, ſays he, in that college (Balliol) where I firſt lived, a young man was taken praying, and beating his breaſt, before a crucifix in a window; which cauſed the maſter and fellows, to pull it down, and ſet up other glaſs. Which example, makes me nothing doubt, but that the cross in Cheapſide hath many, in the twilight and morning early, who do reverence before it, beſides Campian, whoſe act is famous, or rather infamous, for it. And, I am informed, that ſo much hath been ſignified by the neighbours, or inqueſt, making preſentments concerning the circumſtances of this cauſe. By all which, I do conclude, that it is a monument of their ſuperſtition; a great inducement, and may be a ready way to idolatry; and that there can be no tolerable uſe of this matter, which may be able to countervail the dangers and obloquy ariſing upon the retaining of it; and ſo much the rather, becauſe it is perceived that many evil affected men do make their advantage from hence, to inſinuate into the minds of their credulous hearers, that it is a token of the return of their faith again into this land, ſince their monuments are not extinguished in the chief ſtreet of our greateſt city.' He afterwards deſires, that the reader would obſerve, he ſays, the magiſtrates are to redreſs ſuch enormities: 'For, continues he, I do not permit inferior men to run headlong about ſuch matters; and to rend, break, and tear, as well within, as without the churches; which was that which Luther reprehended, but the advice and conſent of ſuperior powers is 'to be had herein, that all things may be done decently and in order.' He held it therefore neceſſary, that they ſhould apply to the Archbiſhop of Canterbury (Whitgift) and to the Biſhop of London (Bancroft) for inſtructions (10). The iſſue of the matter was, that the cross only was erected again, without either the body, or the dove, which was agreeable in the main to the ſentiments of the vice-chancellor, and heads of houſes at Oxford.

[E] The firſt ſtep to all his future preferments.] There is no point in which all the writers who mention this Prelate, more clearly agree, than in this, that his journey to Scotland, brought him into that height of favour with the King, which ſo ſuddenly raiſed him in little more than three years, from Dean of Wincheſter, to Archbiſhop of Canterbury; yet it has ſo fallen out, that hitherto, his tranſactions in Scotland have lain ſo much in the dark, that it is a very difficult thing to diſcern how he merited by them, ſo high a ſhare of the Royal favour. To explain therefore this hitherto untouched point, and ſet this matter in a clear light, ſhall be the buſineſs of this note, the rather becauſe it will ſhew how unjuſtly this great man has been charged with unfriendlineſs to the eſta bliſhment of the Church of England, and coldneſs in regard to the Hierarchy. King James had ſuffered ſo much before his acceſſion to the Crown of England, from the ſpirit and power of the Preſbyterians in Scotland, that he was greatly ſet on reſtoring the ancient form of government by Biſhops, in that kingdom; the care of which was principally entrusted to the Earl of Dunbar, to whom Dr Abbot was now chaplain (11). That noble Lord, who is by all writers allowed to have been both the wiſeſt and beſt man of all the favourites of that nation, had proceeded ſo far in this matter two years before, as to obtain an act for the reſtitution of the eſtates of Biſhops, but the Preſbyterians made ſo ready a reſiſtance, that the conſequences which were hoped from the reſtoring of that order, were in the utmoſt danger of being diſappointed. But by the ſkill and prudence, the ſound ſenſe, and great moderation of Dr Abbot, theſe difficulties were removed, and the clergy of Scotland, who had reſuſed to admit the Biſhops for their moderators in their church ſynods, were brought to a better temper, and things put into ſuch a train, as afterwards produced the entire eſta bliſhment of the Episcopalian Order in Scotland; for which the King had been ſo long ſtruggling, that conspiracy; which had been hitherto looked upon as a very mysterious affair, and about the reality of which there had been very great doubts (*) [F]. The King knew struggling, and to so little purpose. The account given by the famous historian of the Church of Scotland, sufficiently proves the truth of what has been asserted. 'About the end of June (1608) says he, the Earl of Dunbar came from court, and with him two English Doctors, Abbot and Higgins. Dr Maxy, one of the King's chaplains came by sea. It was reported that no small sums of money were sent down with him, to be distributed among the ministers and some others. The English doctor seemed to have no other direction, but to persuade the Scots that there was no substantial difference in religion, between the two realms, but only in things indifferent, concerning government and ceremonies: and to report, that it was his majesty's will, that England should stand as he found it, and Scotland as he left it. But when he came to St Andrews, Mr Robert Howie, a man of a seditious and turbulent spirit, declaimed against the discipline and government of our Kirk; and then they uttered their mind in plain terms: no order was taken with so manifest a breach, after the last conference. This was the policy of the aspiring Bishops, to cry peace, peace, and to crave silence of their opposites; when, in the mean time, they minded not to be silent themselves, when they found occasion (12). This very clearly proves, that it was by a kind and moderate, not a haughty and severe, behaviour, that the English doctor, as he calls Dean Abbot, won so much upon the Scots ministers, as to bring them into a compliance with the King's desires; so that in two years afterwards, the Lord High Treasurer, Dunbar, who was entirely governed in this matter by the advice of his able chaplain, procured an act in the General Assembly, by which it was provided, 'That the King should have the indiction (or calling) of all General Assemblies. That the Bishops, or their deputies should be perpetual Moderators of the diocesan synods. That no excommunication, or absolution, should be pronounced without their approbation. That all presentations of benefices should be made by them; and that the deprivation or suspension of ministers, should belong to them. That every minister at his admission to a benefice, should take the oath of supremacy, and canonical obedience. That the visitation of the diocese, shall be performed by the Bishop or his deputy only. And finally, that the Bishop should be moderator of all conventions, for exercising or prophesying, which should be held within their bounds (13). All which were afterwards ratified and confirmed by authority of the parliament of that kingdom. Such were the merits of Dr Abbot in this respect, and so great justice was there done to them by his noble patron, the Treasurer, in the report he made to his majesty, of the Dean's behaviour in this respect, that, in conjunction with the service rendered his majesty, by giving his unquestioned testimony in the affair of Gowry's conspiracy, (of which a full account shall be given in the succeeding note) he was raised so high, and so firmly fixed in the esteem of his royal master, as that no opposition could prevent his arriving at the supreme dignity in his profession (14). As a proof of his advancing his fortune by this means, and not otherwise, it may not be amiss to transcribe the observation of a contemporary historian, after Dr Abbot was raised to the archiepiscopal dignity, who tells us, 'That the first preacher, and the first in that embassy, which King James sent into Scotland, to establish those neighbouring Churches, was he, whose eminency both for place and piety, is now worthily foremost in guiding our own; and whose blessed travels in that service, as they were acceptable to God, his majesty, and that nation; so are they a document to others, how powerful and admirably successful true learning is, where it is guided with true prudence; and where piety and the love of God's glory, is linked with charity and zeal of man's good (15).

[F] There had been very great doubts.] It is a difficult thing to give a clear account of this matter, within the short compass of a note; and yet the importance, as well as curiosity of the subject, very obscurely treated by most of our historians, as well as it's close connection with the history of Dean Abbot's life, render it absolutely necessary. This conspiracy was framed by John, Earl of Gowry, son to that Earl of Gowry, who had been executed for surprizing the King's person at Ruthen Castle, in 1584 (16); and carried on with great diligence and secrecy. The scheme was to invite the King, upon some pretence or other, to the Earl's house at Perth, and there to make sure of him. This design was executed on Tuesday August 5, 1600, when the King was brought thither by Mr Alexander Ruthen, brother to the Earl, accompanied by some persons of quality, under pretence of seeing some chymical experiment; and for this purpose after dinner, being brought to a chamber at the top of the house, Mr Alexander Ruthen shut the door, and suddenly fell to upbraiding the King with the death of his father, for which he was now to make satisfaction; and, after this speech, left him for some time to the mercy of the executioner, who refused to do that office, though Alexander returning had, if this man had not hindered him; but the King with much struggling got at last to a window, and cried out so loud, that the lords and gentlemen of his retinue heard him, and came to his assistance; the Earl himself was killed by Sir Thomas Ereskine, the captain of the King's guard, as he was going to help his brother, and Alexander Ruthen, was dispatched by Ramfay, one of the King's pages, who being well acquainted with the house, came by the back-stairs time enough to preserve his master (17). When the ministers of Edinburgh were desired to assemble the people, and give God thanks for this deliverance, they excused themselves, as not acquainted with the particulars; and when they were pressed only to make known to the people, that the King had escaped a great danger, and to excite them to thanksgiving: — they answered, that they were not very well satisfied, as to the truth of the matter; and that nothing was to be uttered in the pulpit, but that which might be spoke in faith (18). Upon this, the council ordered the Bishop of Ross to assemble the people, to declare the whole affair, and to make a prayer of thanksgiving, which was done accordingly (19). In November following, a parliament was held at Edinburgh, in which the estate of Gowry was confiscated, the whole family attainted; and the 5th of August established by act of parliament, for a day of thanksgiving in all succeeding times (20). After King James's accession to the throne of England, he appointed a weekly commemoration, by a Tuesday's sermon at court (21): and now, on the execution of this Sprot, an account of his share in the conspiracy was published, with a preface to the reader, subscribed by Dr Abbot, and full as large as the account itself (22). As this little tract is become very scarce, it may not be amiss to give some passages from it, in order to set this matter in a clearer light. 'There are few in this island, says he, of any understanding, but have heard of the traitorous, and bloody attempt of the Earl Gowrie and his brother, against the person, and life, of our most blessed Sovereign. Wherein albeit there were such evidences, and arguments, as that any man who would have taken notice thereof, might have been sufficiently informed therein, even at the very first, and afterward, by the clear depositions (for most pregnant circumstances) and ample attestations of many persons of honour, and quality; the parliament of that kingdom took full knowledge thereof, and accordingly proceeded to the forfeiting of the whole estate of that Earl, and of his heirs for ever: yet some humorous men, whom in that respect, I may justly term unthank-

(22) The Title of this Pamphlet runs thus, The Examinations, Arraignment, and Conviction, of George Sprot, Notary in Ayrmouth. Together with his constant and extraordinary Behaviour at his death, in Edinburgh, August 12, 1608. Written and set forth by Sir William Hart, Knight, Lord Justice of Scotland. Whereby appeareth the treasonable device betwixt John, Earl of Gowry, and Robert Logane, of Restalrig (commonly called Lesterig) plotted by them for the cruel murdering of our most gracious Sovereign. Before which treatise, is prefixed also a Preface, written by George Abbot, Doctor of Divinity, and Dean of Winchester; who was present at the said Sprot's execution. London, printed by Melch. Bradwood, for William Aspley, 1608, 4to. Containing 60 Pages, of which, the Preface makes 38.

so well the difficulties that were to be encountered in this northern nation, that it gave him very high ideas of the abilities of the man, who was able to overcome them; and therefore, when another set of men filled the King's head and heart with apprehensions, he had recourse to Dr Abbot, as the fittest person, to put things again into the right channel. The case was this, his majesty being engaged in the mediation of peace between the crown of Spain, and the United Provinces; by which the sovereignty of the latter, was to be acknowledged by the former: he demanded the advice of the convocation then sitting, as to the lawfulness of espousing the cause of the States (y). Upon this opening, they launched at once into the wide sea of politics, and instead of satisfying the King's scruples, excited new jealousies and apprehensions, as appears by a very singular

ful unto God, and undutiful to their King, out of fond imaginations, or rather, if you will, seditious suppositions of their own, did both at home and abroad, by whisperings and secret buzzings into the ears of the people, (who were better persuaded of them than indeed there was cause) employ their wits and tongues, to obscure the truth of that matter, and to cast an imputation where it was least deserved. Which, when God had permitted, for the space of some years to ranckle and fester in the bowels of those who were the authors of it; the same God, in his wisdom, at last meaning to cure them, if they would be cured, of that malady, discovered that in the same treason, although carried never so secretly, there were other confederates, of whom hitherto the world had taken no kind of knowledge. And albeit two of the persons interested in that business, were lately dead, and departed unto far greater torment, than all the earth could lay upon them, (unless they died repentant) yet it was apprehended, that a third party remained, who had foreknowledge of that conspiracy, and was able to utter much of the secrets of it: one George Sprot, a notary, inhabiting at Ayemouth, a place well known in that county. Which matter, or some part thereof, being made known to an honourable person, a most faithful servant to His Majesty (z3): first, by some words that fell from Sprot himself, and afterwards, by some papers found upon him; it was so wisely carried, and so prudently brought about, by the great care and diligence of that nobleman (God Almighty blessing the business) that so much was revealed, as followeth in this treatise, upon the acts to be seen, which are here set down at large, word for word, as they agree with the process original, and other examinations, that such as have been averfe, may at last receive satisfaction. Touching all which I shall say nothing, but only report that which befel upon the day of his death, when he suffered for that treason. Having then the sentence passed on him, upon Friday, August 12, 1608, in the forenoon, and publickly being warned to prepare himself to his end, which must be that after dinner, he most willingly submitted himself unto that punishment, which (as he then acknowledged) he had justly deserved. And being left to himself, till dinner time was expired, then came to him into that private place where he remained, some of the reverend bishops, diverse lords of the Session (z4), two of the English ministers, there employed by his majesty, with diverse other ministers of the town of Edinburgh. Before whom he first acknowledged and avouched his former confession to be true, and that he would die in the same; and then falling on his knees, in a corner of that room where he and they then were, in a prayer to God uttered aloud, he so passionately deplored his former wickednesses, but especially that sin of his, for which he was to die, that a man may justly say, he did in a fort, deject and cast down himself to the gates of Hell, as if he should there have been swallowed up in the gulph of desperation: yet, presently laying hold upon the mercies of God in Christ, he raised himself, and strangely lifted up his soul unto the throne of grace, applying joy and comfort to his own heart so effectually, as cannot well be described. In the admitting of this consolation into his inward man, he burst out into tears, so plentifully flowing from him, that for a time they stopped his voice. The sight, and hearing whereof, wrought so forcible an impression in those persons of honour, and learned men, who beheld him, that there was scarce any one of them, who could refrain tears in the place, as diverse of themselves that day did witness unto me (z5). ——— Afterward being brought to the scaffold where he was to die, he uttered many things, among which, I observed these: He acknowledged to the people, that he was come thither to suffer most deservedly; that he had been an offender against Almighty God, in very many respects; but that none of his sins was so grievous unto him, as that, for which he must die; wherein, notwithstanding he was not an actor, but a concealer only. That he was ingyred (involved) in it by the Laird of Raftalrig, and his servant, the Laird of Bour, both which, he said, were men that professed not religion. Whereupon, he exhorted men to take heed, how they accompanied with such as are not religious; because, said he, with such as make not profession of religion, there is no faith, no truth, no holding of their word, as himself had tried and found. But touching the treason, for the concealing whereof he was condemned, he added, that he was preserved alive to open that secret mystery which so long had lain hid. That God had kept him since that attempt of the Earl Gowrie, from very many dangers, but notably from one, when being in apparent hazard of drowning, he was strangely delivered; which, said he, was God's work, that I might remain alive unto this happy and blessed day, that the truth might be made known. And now I confess my fault, to the shame of myself, and to the shame of the devil; but to the glory of God. And I do it not either for fear of death, or for any hope of life (for I have deserved to die, and am unworthy to live) but because it is the truth, which I shall seal with my blood. My fault, said he, is so great, that if I had a thousand lives, and could die ten thousand deaths, yet I might not make satisfaction, that I should conceal such a treason against so gracious a King. These, and the like words, when he had spoken upon one side of the scaffold, he turned him to the second side, and afterward to the third (that all the people might hear) where he spake to the same purpose as formerly he had done (z6). ——— And here, being told (z6) Ibid. p. 24.---26. by the said ministers, and other persons of quality, that being so near his departure out of the world, it concerned him to speak nothing but the truth, and that upon the peril of his soul: he answered, that to the end that they should know that he had spoken nothing but the verity, and that his confession was true in every respect, he would (at the last gasp) give them some apparent token for the confirmation of the same. Then fitting himself to the ladder, the executioner cometh to him, and as the manner is, asking forgiveness of him; with all my heart, said he, for you do but your office, and it is the thing I desire; because, suffering in my body, I shall in my soul be joynted to my Saviour. Ascending up to the ladder, he desired the people to sing a psalm with him, which they did with many a weeping eye. He named the 6th psalm, and beginning, or taking it up himself, in every verse or line thereof, he went before the people, singing both loud and tunably unto the very end. Then once again confirming and avowing his former confession, he covered his own face, and, commending his soul to God, he was turned off the ladder; where hanging by the neck some little while, he three several times, gave a loud clap with his hands, that all the standers-by might hear, which was the sign or token (as it seemeth) which he a little before had said, that he would give at his last gasp, for the ratification and avowing of those things, which by his confession he had so many times declared and delivered. These things were done in the open sight of the sun, in the King's capital town, at the market-cross in Edinburgh, in the presence of diverse thousands of all sorts; of the nobility, of the clergy, of the gentry, singular letter written by him to Dr Abbot, upon this subject [G]. It does not appear what effect this letter of the King's produced, but in all probability it answered his majesty's end in writing it, as it is an incontestable proof of the confidence he had in the person it was written to. At least thus much is certain, that Dean Abbot, stood so high in the King's favour, that on the death of Dr Overton, Bishop of Litchfield and Coventry, which happened the latter end of April, 1609, his majesty thought of Dr Abbot for his successor, and he was accordingly consecrated Bishop of those united sees, on December 3, in the same year (z). But this, it seems, did not appear in the King's eyes a sufficient recompence, for the services rendered him by so able a man; and therefore, before he had sat a month in this bishoprick, he was translated to London, that see becoming void by the death of Dr Thomas Ravis, and he was accordingly removed thither on the 20th of January following (a). It was but a short time that he possessed both these bishopricks, and yet in that short time, he so remarkably distinguished himself by the diligent performance of his function, by constant preaching, and by expressing the utmost readiness to promote learning, and learned men, that he obtained a general good character, as appears from several memorials of those times (b) [H]. While the good Bishop was thus employed, a new opportunity offered of the King's testifying his esteem of, and confidence in, this worthy person, by the Archiepiscopal See of Canterbury's becoming vacant as it did, on the 2d of November, 1610, by the death of gentry, of the burgessees, of women and children, myself, with the rest of the English ministers, standing by, and looking on, and giving God the glory, that after so long a space as eight years and eight days (for so it was by just computation, after the attempt of Gowrie) he was pleased to give so noble a testimony unto that, which by some maligners, had been secretly called in question, without any ground or reason. I have reported at length, those particulars, which I heard and saw; which that honourable personage who wrote this treatise following, doth somewhat more briefly deliver, but yet both of us very truly, as thousands can witness (27).

[G] A very singular letter written by him to Dr Abbot, upon this subject.] This letter from the King, to Dr Abbot, was first published on occasion of the famous dispute between Dr Sherlock, Dean of St Paul's, and his adversaries, on his taking the oaths to King William III, after some hesitation, and grounding the defence of his conduct on (Bishop) Overall's Convocation Book (28). It is not necessary here, to enter at all into the merits of that dispute; but as the letter has a close connection with the history of the Archbishop's life, the reader will not be displeased to see it (29).

Good Dr Abbot,

I Cannot abstain to give you my judgment of the proceedings in the convocation, as you will call it; and both as rex in folio, and unus gregis in ecclesia, I am doubly concerned. My title to the crown, nobody calls in question, but they that neither love you nor me, and you may guess whom I mean; all that you, and your brethren, have said of a king in possession (for that word, I tell you, is no more, than that you make use of in your canon) concerns not me at all: I am the next heir, and the crown is mine by all rights you can name, but that of conquest; and Mr Solicitor, has sufficiently expressed my own thoughts, concerning the nature of Kingship; and concerning the nature of it, ut in mea persona, and, I believe, you were all of his opinion, at least none of you said any thing contrary to it, at the time he spoke to you from me: but you know all of you, as I think, that my reason of calling you together, was to give your judgments; how far a christian, and a protestant King, may concur to assist his neighbours to shake off their obedience to their own sovereign? Upon the account of oppression, tyranny, or what else you like to name it. In the late Queen's time, this kingdom was very free in assisting the Hollanders, both with arms and advice, and none of your coat ever told me, that any scrupled at it in her reign. Upon my coming to England, you may know that it came from some of your selves, to raise scruples about this matter; and albeit, I have often told my mind concerning jus regium in subditos, as in May last, in the star chamber, upon the occasion of Hales's pamphlet; yet I never took any notice of these scruples, till the affairs of Spain and Holland forced me to it. All my neighbours call on me to concur in the treaty between Holland and Spain, and the honour of the nation will not suffer the Hollanders to be abandoned, especially after so much money and men spent in their quarrel; therefore, I was of the mind to call my clergy together, to satisfy not so much me, as the world about us, of the justness of my owning the Hollanders at this time. This I needed not to have done, and you have forced me to say, I wish I had not; you have dipped too deep, in what all kings reserve among the arcana imperii; and whatever aversion you may profess against God's being the author of sin, you have stumbled upon the threshold of that opinion, in saying, upon the matter, that even tyranny is God's authority, and should be remembered as such. If the King of Spain should return to claim his old pontifical right to my kingdom, you leave me to seek for others to fight for it, for you tell us upon the matter beforehand, his authority is God's authority, if he prevail.

Mr Doctor, I have no time to express my mind further on this theory business; I shall give you my orders about it by Mr Solicitor, and until then, meddle no more in it, for they are edge tools; or rather like that weapon that is said to cut with one edge, and cure with the other: I commit you to God's protection, good Dr Abbot, and rest

Your good friend,

JAMES R.

[H] As appears from several memorials of those times.] While he was Bishop of Coventry and Litchfield, it appears that he solicited Archbishop Bancroft, to bestow a prebend upon Dr Thomas James, who was Sir Thomas Bodley's Librarian at Oxford (30). In the year 1610, Thomas Tisdale, of Glimpton, in Oxfordshire, Esq; bequeathed five thousand pounds to Dr George Abbot, then Bishop of London, Sir John Bennet, and Dr Aray, to purchase lands for the maintenance of seven fellows, and six scholars; which money was laid out in the purchase of two hundred and fifty pounds a year. Afterwards, Richard Wightwick, B. D. rector of East-Isle, in Berkshire, gave lands to the yearly value of one hundred pounds, for the maintenance of three fellows, and four scholars; upon which, the trustees before-mentioned, having repaired, and, in a manner, rebuilt Broad-Gate-Hall, in Oxford, procured in the reign of King James, upon their petition setting forth these facts, a charter of Mortmain, for seven hundred pounds per annum, to this new foundation, which was called Pembroke College (31), in respect to William, Earl of Pembroke, then Chancellor of the University; and for our Prelate's activity in accomplishing this affair, Dr Thomas Clayton, who was the first master of the new college, wrote him a very handsome letter of acknowledgment, which is still extant (32). In August, 1610, he consecrated the new church-yard on the west side of Fleet-Ditch, the ground of which had been given to the inhabitants of St Bride's parish, by the Earl of Dorset (33). His zeal, and indefatigable diligence, in the publick exercise of his function, were so remarkable, and the conduct of his private life so exemplary, as well as

Dr Richard Bancroft (c). The court Bishops immediately cast their eyes upon the celebrated Dr Lancelot Andrews, then Bishop of Ely, and pointed him out to the King, as one sufficiently qualified to take upon him the government of the Church; and they thought this recommendation joined to the King's known regard for the parts and piety of this eminent man, enough to secure his promotion to the Primacy (d); but either the King himself thought of the Bishop of London, or he was proposed to him by his old friend and patron, the Earl of Dunbar; and therefore, without taking the advice of those prelates, his majesty preferred Bishop Abbot to the throne of Canterbury, in which he was seated on the 9th of April, 1611 (e); and on the 23d of June following, was sworn of his majesty's most honourable privy council (f). Thus we see him, before he had arrived at the age of fifty, exalted to the highest dignity in the Church, and celebrated by one of his contemporaries, and a bishop too, for his learning, eloquence, and indefatigable diligence in preaching and writing, notwithstanding the great burthen that lay upon him, from the necessary attendance on the duties of his high office; especially presiding in the high commission court, which sat weekly at his palace, and his regular assisting at council, which, while his health permitted, he never failed (g). At this time, he was in the highest favour both with Prince and people; and appears to have had a principal hand in all the great transactions in Church and State; he was never esteemed excessively fond of power, or desirous of carrying his prerogative, as Primate of England, to an extraordinary height; yet as soon as he had taken possession of the archbishoprick, he shewed a steady resolution in the maintainance of the rights of the high commission court, and would not submit to Lord Coke's prohibitions (b). He likewise shewed his concern for the interest of the Protestant Religion abroad, by procuring his majesty's application to the States General, against Conrade Vortius, whom they called to the Professorship of Leyden (i); in which affair Sir Ralph Winwood was employed; and when it was found difficult to obtain from the States that satisfaction which the King desired, his Grace, in conjunction with the Lord Treasurer, Salisbury, framed an expedient for contenting both parties (k). In all probability this alarmed some of the warm churchmen at home, who were by no means pleased with the King's discountenancing abroad, those opinions which themselves favoured in both universities; but, whatever their sentiments upon this matter might be, Archbishop Abbot seems to have had as great concern for the Church, as any of them, when he thought it really in danger, as appears by a short and plain letter of his to Sir Ralph Winwood, about one Mr Amias, who had been appointed preacher in the English congregation at the Hague, of whom the Bishop says, that he was a fit person to breed up the captains and soldiers there in mutiny and faction, and, consequently, very unfit for his office (l). His great concern for the true interest of religion, made him a zealous promoter of the match between the Elector Palatine, and the Princess Elizabeth; and that Prince being here in the beginning of the year 1612 (m), his Grace thought fit to invite the nobility that attended him to an entertainment, at his archiepiscopal palace at Lambeth, where, though uninvited and unexpected, the Elector himself resorted, to shew his great respect for the Archbishop, and was so well pleased with his welcome, that when he feasted the members of the privy council at Essex House, he shewed particular respect to the Archbishop, and those who attended him. On the fourteenth of February following, the marriage was solemnized with great splendor, the Archbishop performing the ceremony on a stage erected in the middle of the royal chapel; and on the tenth of April, his Electoral Highness returned to Germany (o); but before his departure, he made a present of plate to the Archbishop, of the value of a thousand pounds, as a mark of the just sense he had of the pains his Grace had taken in the accomplishing his marriage; and as an additional mark of his confidence, he wrote to him from Canterbury, in relation to the causes of that discontent, with which he left England (p) [I]. The concern his majesty had shewn for removing Arminius first, and then Vortius, had given their favourers in Holland so much uneasiness, that the famous Hugo Grotius, the great champion of their cause, was sent over to England, to endeavour to mitigate the King's displeasure, and, irreproachable, that we find him celebrated by an eminent poet, for uniting the wisdom of the serpent, with the innocence of the dove (34); which was not only true of him then, but in the whole succeeding course of his life; wherein it may be truly said, that as his abilities raised him to preferment, so nothing but his rigid virtue and incorruptible probity, exposed him to those storms of envy and malice, which, however they might affect his fortune, could never shake his constancy, or prejudice his reputation.

[I] To the causes of that discontent, with which he left England.] The Prince Elector Palatine, a little before he left England, addressed himself to the King, in hopes of obtaining the enlargement of the Lord Gray, who had been a long time a prisoner in the tower; but this application so little pleased the King, that he told him roundly in answer, he marvelled, how he should become suitor for a man whom he neither knew, or ever saw; to which the Prince Elector answered, that this was true, but that he was recommended to him by his uncles, the Duke de Bouillon, Prince Maurice of Nassau, and Count Henry, who were well acquainted with him. In all probability, this, instead of giving the King satisfaction, filled him with new apprehensions; for his reply was in a very quick stile, Son, said he, when I come into Germany, I promise you not to importune you for any of your prisoners. This was so far from operating favourably in behalf of Lord Gray, that he was soon after more closely restrained, upon pretence of some private conversation he had with one of Lady Arabella's women, which proved after all to be no more than an amorous intrigue. These particulars we learn from a letter written by Mr Chamberlaine to Sir Ralph Winwood, dated May 6, 1613, and he adds, 'It is thought the Prince Palatine, went not away so well satisfied, being refused in divers suits and requests; and I hear that from Canterbury he wrote to the Archbishop, complaining, That the King did not use him like a son, but rather like a youngling, or child's youth, not to be regarded (35).

if possible, to give him a better opinion of the Remonstrants, as they began then to be called; and we have a very singular account of the man, and of his negotiation, from the pen of the Archbishop (q) [K]. In the spring of the year 1613, the affair of the Charterhouse was settled, and at the close of the month of June, his Grace, and the rest of the trustees, took possession of that place, pursuant to the will of Mr Sutton (r); and if this gave the Archbishop, as no doubt it did, great satisfaction, an affair that happened about the same time, disturbed him not a little. This was the famous case of divorce between the Lady Frances Howard, daughter to the Earl of Suffolk, and Robert, Earl of Essex, her husband; which has been always considered as one of the greatest blemishes of King James's reign, though the part acted therein by the Archbishop of Canterbury, added much to the reputation he had already acquired, for unshaken and incorruptible integrity [L]. The circumstances that attended this affair, might possibly lessen the King's favour to him in some respects, but he still retained a great share of it, as appears by the raising his brother to the see of Salisbury, in the year 1615 (s); but with Queen Anne, he stood always on the best terms possible (t). He made use of his interest with her majesty, when all other applications had failed, to engage her to recommend Mr George Villiers, so well known afterwards in the world, to his majesty's favour, for which at that time, the young man was so grateful as to call him father (u), and to desire his advice as to his behaviour, which the Archbishop very freely gave him; and it had been very conceive you will make some use, keeping these things privately to your self, as becometh a man of your employment. When his majesty told me this, I gave such an answer as was fit; and now upon the receipt of your letters, shall upon the first occasion give further satisfaction. All things rest there as they did, and I, as ready to do you all good offices, remain, &c.

GEORGE Cant.

[L] Unshaken and incorruptible integrity] This affair of the divorce, was by the King referred to a court of delegates, consisting of his Grace the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Bishops of London, Winchester, Coventry and Litchfield, and Rochester, Sir Julius Cæsar, Sir Thomas Parrey, Sir Daniel Dunn, Dr John Bennet, Dr Francis James, and Dr Thomas Edwards. This affair was drawn out into a great length, and many accidents happened in the course of it, which gave the Archbishop infinite disquiet. He saw plainly, that the King was very desirous the Lady should be divorced, and, on the other hand, he was in his judgment directly against the divorce. He laboured all he could to extricate himself from these difficulties, by having an end put to the cause some other way than by sentence, but it was to no purpose; for those who drove on this affair, had got too great power to be restrained from bringing it to the conclusion they desired. The Archbishop was told, that a predecessor of his, which was Archbishop Grindall, had suffered about Dr Julio's divorce, and so might he; but this, however, did not at all move him; on the contrary, he prepared a speech against the nullity of the marriage, which he intended to have spoken in the court at Lambeth, September 25, 1613, but he did not make use of that speech, because the King ordered them to deliver their opinions in few words. He continued, however, inflexible, with regard to his opinion, and therefore, when sentence was pronounced, the court was divided in the following manner (38)

The commissioners who gave sentence in the Lady Essex's behalf, were, very happy for him if he had always followed those councils [M]. Towards the close of the next year, the famous Antonio de Dominis, Archbishop of Spalato (w), took shelter here, from the persecution with which he was threatened by the Pope, for discovering his dislike both of the doctrine and discipline of the Church of Rome, and was very kindly received by his majesty, who was pleased to order the Archbishop to entertain him (x), which he did with generous hospitality, till he was otherwise provided for by the King. His Grace however thought himself sufficiently recompensed for the trouble given him in this affair, by this stranger's procuring for him the manuscript of Father Paul's excellent history of the council of Trent (y). In the spring of the year 1618, viz. on the second of March, our good Archbishop lost his brother the Bishop of Salisbury (z), and before his grief was well over for so near a relation, he met with fresh disturbance from the King's declaration for permitting sports and pastimes on the Lord's day, which was dated at Greenwich, May 4, 1618 (a). This declaration was ordered to be read in churches, and the Archbishop being accidentally at Croydon in Surrey when it came thither, had the courage to forbid it's being read, which however the King winked at, notwithstanding there were some about him, who let no opportunity slip of irritating him against this prelate (b). To justify his conduct in this matter, the Archbishop drew up the reasons which induced him to be against the sentence, which King James thought fit to answer himself, and wrote also a letter to him upon that subject, in which there are some things that are very singular, and therefore worthy the reader's notice. 'After that I had fully perused and rightly considered of all your papers, I found your principles so strange, and your doubts so far sought, that I thought it necessary, as I have already said, to set down unto you my observations upon them. But to conclude my letter with that plainness that becometh one of my quality; I must freely confess, that I find the grounds of your opposition so weak, as I have reason to apprehend, that the prejudice you have of the persons, is the greatest motive of breeding these doubts into you; which prejudice is the most dangerous thing that can fall in a Judge, for misleading of his mind. And the reason moving me to this apprehension, is partly grounded upon your last words to me at your parting from Windsor, and partly upon a line scraped out in your paper of doubts, for I am sure you think me not so blunt a secretary, but that I can read a line so scraped out. In your last speeches with me, you remember you told me, what assurance you had of the Earl's ability out of his own mouth, which you said you could not but trust, because he was so religious a nobleman. But when I told you of the other party's contrary affirmation, you remember how you used the word of iniquity, and how far your interlined line seems to have a harmony with this word, yourself can best judge. Now then if I would ask you what proof you have of the one's religion more than the other's, you must answer me by judging upon the exterior; and how deceivable that guess is, daily experience teaches us: but with a holy protestation, that I never knew any thing but good in the young Earl. Was not this the ground of master Robert Bruce's incredulity, because he knew the Earl of Gowry to be truly religious, &c. (39) This letter might and probably did trouble the Archbishop, however he persisted in the same conduct, and never could be brought to do any thing, that might appear so much as a tacit approbation of that sentence, as is most evident in the account given of this matter, and all the circumstances attending it, (at least in relation to the Archbishop) written by himself, and published within these few years (40).

[M] If he had always followed those councils.] We have this very remarkable passage from the Archbishop's own pen, in the discourse he wrote upon his disgrace, under the reign of King Charles. In that discourse he observes, that it was one of King James's maxims, to take no favourite but what was recommended to him by his Queen, that if she afterwards complained of this Dear One, he might answer, it is long of yourself, for you were the party that commended him unto me. Our old master, says the Archbishop, took delight strangely in things of this nature. He says that Queen Anne was graciously pleased to give him more credit than ordinary, and therefore when others had solicited her in vain, he was applied to; but for some time her majesty would not listen to his persuasions, or think of recommending Villiers, for which she often gave him these reasons. My Lord, you and the rest of your friends know not what you do, I know your master better than you all, for if this young man be once brought in, the first persons that he will plague must be you that labour for him, yea, I shall have my part also; the King will teach him to despise and hardly intreat us all, that he may seem to beholden to none but himself. Noble Queen (cries out the Archbishop after reporting this fact) how like a prophetes did you speak! The rest of the story being but short will appear best in the Archbishop's own words. 'In the end, says he, upon importunity, Queen Anne condescended, and so pressed it with the King, that he assented thereunto; which was so stricken while the iron was hot, that in the Queen's bed-chamber, the King knighted him with the rapier which the Prince did wear. And when the King gave order to swear him of the bed-chamber, Somerset, who was near, importuned the King with a message, that he might only be sworn a Groom; ——— but myself and others that were at the door, sent to her majesty that she would perfect her work, and cause him to be sworn a Gentleman of the chamber. There is a lord or two living that had a hand in this achievement; I diminish nothing of their praise for so happy a work, but I know my own part best; and on the Word of an honest man, I have reported nothing but truth. George went in with the King, but no sooner he got loose, but he came forth unto me in the privy-gallery, and there embraced me: he professed that he was so infinitely bound unto me, that all his life long he must honour me as his father. And now he did beseech me that I would give some lessons how he should carry himself. When he earnestly followed this chace, I told him I would give him three short lessons, if he would learn them. The first was, that daily upon his knees he should pray to God to bless the King his master, and to give him (George) grace studiously to serve and please him. The second was, that he should do all good offices between the King and the Queen, and between the King and the Prince. The third was, that he should fill his master's ears with nothing but truth. I made him repeat these three things unto me, and then I would have him to acquaint the King with them, and to tell me when I met him again, what the King said unto him. He promised me he would; and the morrow after, Mr Thomas Murrey, the Prince's tutor, and I standing together in the gallery at Whitehall, Sir George Villiers coming forth and drawing to us, he told Mr Murrey how much he was beholden unto me, and that I had given him certain instructions, which I prayed him to rehearse, as indifferently well he did before us; yea, and that he had acquainted the King with them, who said, they were instructions worthy of an Archbishop to give to a young man. His countenance of thankfulness for a few days continued, but not long, either to me or any other of his well-wishers. The Roman historian Tacitus hath somewhere a note, That benefits while they may be required seem courtcies, but when they are so high that they cannot be repaid, they prove matters of hatred (41).'

fat this year, to which were sent from hence in the beginning of the month of October four commissioners, and amongst them Dr Hall, Dean of Winchester, with whose health the climate of Holland disagreeing, he returned, and Dr Goad, the Archbishop's chaplain, was sent in his place (c). The end of this year proved as disagreeable to the Bishop as it's beginning; in Autumn, the Queen, his gracious mistress, falling ill of that distemper, which, after a tedious sickness, brought her to her end on the first of March following (d). The Archbishop himself began also to grow infirm, and finding himself less fit for the affairs of the world than he had been, resolved, while he had still strength, to enter upon a great and good design, which he had long meditated as a testimony of affection to his native town of Guilford, where, on the fifth of April 1619, he was present when Sir Nicholas Kempe laid the first stone of his hospital, which the Archbishop afterwards nobly endowed (e) [N]. It was towards the end of this year, that the Elector Palatine accepted of the crown of Bohemia (f), which occasioned great disputes in King James's councils, some desiring that his majesty should not interfere in this matter at all, from a foresight that it would produce a war in Germany; others again, believing that both natural affection to his son and daughter, and a just concern for the Protestant interest, ought to have engaged his majesty warmly to support the new election (g). The Archbishop agreed in sentiment with the last mentioned party, and not being able at that time to attend the privy council, he wrote his mind with great plainness and freedom to the Secretary of State [O]. The next year was in a great measure spent in debates and negotiations

[N] His hospital which he afterwards nobly endowed.] This hospital stands almost over-against Trinity Church, built of brick in a quadrangular form, with a noble tower at it's entrance, and four small turrets over the gate. His Grace endowed it with lands to the value of three hundred pounds per annum, one hundred pound of which was to be employed towards setting the poor to work, and the other two hundred pounds, for the maintenance of a master, twelve brethren, and eight sisters, who have blue cloaths, and gowns of the same colour, and two shillings and six pence a week, each. In the chapel, which is spacious and high roofed, there are two windows of painted glass, very well stained, representing the story of the patriarch Jacob and his family, and amongst the figures there are three angels holding scrolls, in which are these words,

Do pauperibus. Reddo Deo. Quid retribuam Domino? hic vota resolvam.

I give to the poor. I restore to God. What shall I return unto the Lord? here will I pay my vows.

On scrolls in several places of the windows are these words;

Clamamus Abba Pater (42).

This I take to be a kind of allusion to the Archbishop's name, which was sometimes written Abbat, as appears by the picture before his brother's life, in Dr Fuller's collection (43); but however, the allusion will hold in the Latin without this supposition. The twenty-ninth of October being the anniversary of the Bishop's birth is commemorated here, and the Archbishop of Canterbury for the time being, is the visitor of this hospital (44).

[O] He wrote his mind with great plainness and freedom to the Secretary of State.] This letter shall be here transcribed, not so much in proof of the matter of fact asserted in the text, as in respect to the work itself, for so it may be filed, tho' no more than a letter, since it contains a compendious system of the Archbishop's sentiments in religion and politics; so that if we were to spend ever so much time in the enquiry after these points, we should never be able to point them out so clearly, fully, and in a manner so much to the reader's satisfaction, as they are here (and in another letter hereafter cited) represented by the Archbishop's own pen (45).

To Secretary NAUNTON.

Good Mr Secretary,

I HAVE never more desired to be present at any consultation, than that which is this day to be handled, for my heart and all my heart goeth with it; but my foot is worse than it was on Friday, so that by advice of my physician I have sweat this whole night past, and am directed to keep my bed this day.

But for the matter; my humble advice is, that there is no going back, but a countenancing of it against all the world; yea so far as with ringing of bells and making of bonfires in London, so soon as it shall be certainly understood, that the coronation is past. I am satisfied in my conscience that the cause is just, wherefore they have rejected that proud and bloody man; and so much the rather, because he hath taken a course to make that kingdom not elective, but to take it from the donation of another man. And when God hath set up the Prince that is chosen to be a mark of honour thro' all Christendom, to propagate his gospel, and to protect the oppressed, I dare not for my part give advice, but to follow where God leads.

It is a great honour to the King our master, that he hath such a son, whose virtues have made him thought fit to be made a King. And methinks I do in this and that of Hungary, foresee the work of God, that by piece and piece the kings of the earth that gave their power unto the beast (all the word of God must be fulfilled) shall now tear the whore and make her desolate, as St John in his Revelation has foretold. I pray you therefore, with all the spirits you have, to put life into this business; and let a return be made into Germany with speed, and with comfort, and let it be really prosecuted, that it may appear to the world, that we are awake when God in this sort calleth us.

If I had time to express it, I could be very angry at the shuffling which was used towards my Lord Doncaster, and the slighting of his embassage fo, which cannot but touch upon our great master who did send him; and therefore I would never have a noble son forsaken for respect of them, who truly aim at nothing but their own purposes.

Our striking in will comfort the Bohemians, will honour the Palsgrave, will strengthen the union, will bring on the States of the Low-Countries, will stir up the King of Denmark, and move his own uncles, the Prince of Orange and the Duke de Bourbonville, together with Tremorville (a rich Prince in France) to cast in their shares; and Hungary, as I hope, (being in that same cause) will run the same fortune. For the means to support the war I hope providebit Deus: the parliament is the old and honourable way, but how assured at this time I know not; yet I will hope the best: certainly if countenance be given to the action, many brave spirits will voluntarily go. Our great master, in sufficient want of money, gave some aid to the Duke of Savoy, and furnished out a pretty army in the cause of Cleve. We must try once again what can be done in this business of a higher nature, and all the money that may be spared, is to be turned that way. And perhaps God provided the jewels that were laid up in the Tower, to be gathered by the mother for the preservation of her daughter; who, like a noble Princess, hath professed to her husband, not to leave herself one jewel, rather than not to maintain so religious and righteous a cause. You see that lying on my bed I have gone too far; but if I were negotiations upon this subject, in which the King took a great deal of pains with little effect (b). The Archbishop's declining state of health, making exercise a thing not only convenient but necessary for him, he was wont in the summer to make a tour into Hampshire for the sake of recreation, and being invited by the Lord Zouch to hunt in his park at Bramzill upon the edge of Berkshire, and not far from Hartford Bridge, his grace met there with the greatest misfortune that befel him in the whole course of his life; for hunting in this park on the twenty-fourth of July, he let fly a barbed arrow from a cross-bow at one of the deer, which unfortunately struck one Peter Hawkins, my Lord Zouch's keeper, who was quite out of the Bishop's sight, and had been warned more than once to keep out of the way, in the left arm, by which wound a large blood-vessel being pierced, he bled to death in an hour's time (i). This unforeseen accident threw the Archbishop into a deep melancholy, tho' he was not conscious to himself of the least inadvertency or indiscretion, neither did this wear off in time, but throughout his whole life he observed a monthly fast on a Tuesday, the day on which this fatal mischance fell out, and settled an annuity of twenty pounds on the widow, which soon procured her another husband (k). This affair made a very great noise, and there wanted not some to represent it in a sinister light to King James, but his majesty gave his judgment of the matter in a short and clear sentence, An angel, said he, might have miscarried in this sort (l). When he was afterwards informed of the legal penalties which his grace had incurred by this accident, he wrote him a consolatory letter with his own hand, in which amongst other things he told him, that he would not add affliction to his sorrow, or take one farthing from his chattels or moveables which were forfeited by law (m). The Archbishop immediately on this misfortune retired to his own hospital at Guilford, there to wait the decision of the great point as to the irregularity, which some imagined he had incurred, for it happened very unluckily that at this juncture, there were four Bishops elected but not consecrated, viz. Dr John Williams, lord keeper of the great seal, to the see of Lincoln; Dr John Davenant, to that of Salisbury; Dr Valentine Cary, to that of Exeter; and his old antagonist Dr William Laud, whose preferment, on this occasion, he had warmly opposed, to that of St Davids; and all, except Dr Davenant, scrupled the Archbishop's capacity to lay hands on them till he was cleared from all imputation as to this fact (n). The King being informed of this, directed, in the beginning of October following, a commission to the ten following persons, viz. the Lord Keeper; the Bishops of London, Winchester, and Rochester; the Elects of Exeter and St Davids; Sir Henry Hobart, Lord Chief Justice of the common pleas; Sir John Dodderidge, one of the justices of the King's bench; Sir Henry Martin, Dean of the Arches; and Dr Steward; to consider and resolve the three following questions (o). 1. Whether the Archbishop was irregular by the fact of involuntary homicide? The Bishop of Winchester, the two Judges, and the two Civilians, were very clear that he was not irregular; but the other five thought he was (p). 2. Whether that act might tend to scandal in a churchman? The Bishop of Winchester, the Lord Chief Justice Hobart, and Dr Steward, doubted; all the rest agreed, that a scandal might be taken tho' not given (q). 3. How his Grace should be restored, in case the King should follow the decision of those commissioners, who had found him irregular? All agreed that it could not be otherwise done than by restitution from the King, but they varied in the manner. The Bishop of Winchester, the Lord Chief Justice, and Dr Steward, thought it should be done by the King, and by him alone, in the same patent with the pardon. The Lord Keeper, and the Bishops of London, Rochester, Exeter, and St David's, were for a commission from the King directed to some Bishops. Judge Dodderidge, and Sir Henry Martin, were desirous it should be done both ways, for abundant caution (r). This return was made to his majesty on the tenth of November 1621 (s), and accordingly a pardon and a dispensation both bearing date at Westminster, the twenty-second of November, passed the great seal, by which his majesty absolved the Archbishop from all irregularity, scandal, or infamation, (if any was incurred) and declared him capable of all metropolitical authority, as if this accident had never happened (t). Such was the close of this business, after a great variety of proceedings, and many arguments published on both sides [P]. Yet all this could not satisfy the minds of

As the case was absolutely new, and such a one as naturally afforded room for talkative and busy men to display their abilities; there was nothing surprizing in the noise this accident made, or the various constructions put upon it by different people, according as their notions or their prejudices led them. The Archbishop being sensible of all this, either wrote himself, which is most probable, or caused to be written, a very short piece, under the title of an apology (46), which, on the eighth of October 1621, was sent to Sir Henry Spelman, who, on the nineteenth of the same month, returned an answer to it, which discovers full as much severity as learning. It is not very clear to whom this apology was addressed, or for whose satisfaction the answer to it was written; but it is very probable, that both were intended for the use of the Commissioners, appointed by the King, to inquire into the supposed irregularity of the Archbishop, of which his Grace had notice on the fifth of October, and the Commissioners applied themselves very closely to their business, from that time. Both these pieces are extant, in the posthumous works of Sir Henry Spelman, but these do not seem to have been the only pieces that were penned on this occasion; for we are told

(46) The whole title is, An Apology for Archbishop Abbot, touching the death of Peter Hawkins, the Keeper, wounded in the park at Bramzill, July 24, 1621, by an unknown hand, but from the title it seems to be the Archbishop's. Reliquiæ Spelmannianæ. p. 107.

of those who had scrupled his power of laying on hands, and therefore they petitioned the King, that they might not be compelled to wound their consciences by submitting to such a consecration; and, in compliance with their desire, the Bishop of Lincoln was consecrated in King Henry VIIIth's chapel, on the eleventh of November, by the Bishops of London, Worcester, Ely, Oxford, and Landaff; and the Bishops of Sarum, Exeter, and St David's, in the chapel of the Bishop of London's palace, on the eighteenth of November, by the same reverend Prelates (u). It does not appear, that his Grace was at all lessened, by the suggestions of his enemies, in the King's favour, or his courage in any degree abated, by the troubles he had met with (w). On the contrary, we find him, in the year 1622, opposing the Spanish match, which was a thing the King had set his heart upon, with the greatest firmness and spirit, and even venturing, under his hand, to give his sentiments on that subject in terms so vigorous and pathetick, that no pen can properly represent them but his own (x) [Q]. The King however remained fixed in his resolution, and the articles agreed on for the said marriage, were sworn to, in the presence of the Archbishop, and other great officers of state, notwithstanding which they never took effect (y). The Archbishop thenceforward assisted but seldom at council, being hindered chiefly by his infirmities (z), but in the King's last sickness he was called for, and attended with great constancy, and received the highest marks of the King's confidence, to the very last moment of his life, and was near him when he expired, on the twenty-seventh of March 1625 (a). At the coronation of King Charles I, the Archhishop, as his office required, set the crown upon his majesty's head, tho' he was extremely weak, and much troubled with the gout (b), but thenceforward he visibly declined in the King's favour, and the Duke of Buckingham, who was his declared enemy, watched for an opportunity to make the Archbishop feel the weight of his displeasure. This was at last taken, for his refusing to licence a sermon, preached by one Dr Sibthorpe, Vicar of Brackley in Northamptonshire, to justify and promote told by a reverend Prelate, that the fact was much discoursed of in foreign universities, especially amongst our neighbours the Sorbonnits, who disputed it three several times in their schools, and concluded the accident to have amounted to a full irregularity, which is an incapacity to exercise any ecclesiastical act of order or jurisdiction (48).

[Q] No pen can properly represent them but his own.] This letter from the Archbishop to King James is without date, but the subject points out plainly enough the time when it was written; and it is inserted here, to shew the Archbishop's principles in religion, in regard to which there cannot be a fuller testimony:

May it please your Majesty,

I HAVE been too long silent, and am afraid, by my silence, I have neglected the duty of the place it hath pleased God to call me unto, and your Majesty to place me in: but now I humbly crave leave, I may discharge my conscience towards God, and my duty to your Majesty; and therefore I beseech you freely to give me leave to deliver myself, and then let your Majesty do with me what you please. Your Majesty hath propounded a Toleration of religion, I beseech you to take into your consideration what your act is, what the consequence may be; by your act, you labour to set up the most damnable and heretical doctrine of the Church of Rome, the Whore of Babylon. How hateful it will be to God, and grievous to your good subjects, the professors of the Gospel, that your Majesty who hath often disputed, and learnedly written against those heresies, should now shew yourself a Patron of those wicked doctrines, which your pen hath told the world, and your conscience tells yourself, are superstitious, idolatrous, and detestable. And hereto I add what you have done, in sending the Prince into Spain, without consent of your council, the privy and approbation of your people; and although you have a charge and interest in the Prince, as son of your flesh, yet have the people a greater, as son of this kingdom, upon whom, (next after your Majesty) are their eyes fixed, and welfare depends; and so tenderly is his going apprehended, as (believe it) however his return may be safe, yet the drawers of him into this action, so dangerous to himself, so desperate to the kingdom, will not pass away unquestioned, unpunished. Besides, this Toleration which you endeavour to set up by your proclamation, cannot be done without a parliament; unless your Majesty will let your subjects see, that you will take unto yourself, ability to throw down the laws of your land at your pleasure. What dreadful consequences these things may draw afterward, I beseech your Majesty to consider, and above all, lest by this Toleration, and discountenancing of the true profession of the Gospel, wherewith God hath blessed us, and this kingdom hath so long flourished under it, your Majesty do not draw upon this kingdom in general, and yourself in particular, God's heavy wrath and indignation.

Thus in discharge of my duty towards God, to your Majesty, and the place of my calling, I have taken humble leave to deliver my conscience. Now, Sir, do what you please with me (49).

(49) Rushworth's Collections, Vol. I. p. 35.

This letter is likewise printed by Arthur Willson in his history, with this reflection, both on the King and the Archbishop. Thus did our Solomon in his latter time, (though he had fought with beasts at Ephesus, as one faith of him) incline a little too much to the Beast: yet he made his tale so good to the Archbishop of Canterbury, (what reservations soever he had) that he wrought upon the good old man, (afterwards) in the conclusion of the work, to set his hand as a witness to the articles (50). Upon this, another historian of the same reign takes upon him to insinuate, that this long letter to the King, was penned to please his disciples, and copies given to publish in print after his decease; for, says he, we never heard tidings of it till now, in our last days; for Abbot, Archbishop of Canterbury, Primate of all England, was the first man that signed to the postscript, which attested those articles of the marriage, and so did all the privy council. Then speaking of the excuse made by Mr Willson, for the Archbishop, this writer adds, I can tell him there were two other Bishops, John, Bishop of Lincoln, and Lancelot, Bishop of Winchester, men of far greater merit, and high esteem, and evener conscience, that subscribed with him (51). But in this fact he is mistaken, for Lancelot, Bishop of Winchester, did not sign, more willingly than the Archbishop. The apology of the other historian also was unnecessary, for the articles which the Archbishop apprehended, and wrote against, were private articles, as appears plainly from the whole transaction printed in Rushworth (52). But another great writer, gives quite another turn to this whole affair, for he owns that the letter came abroad, not in these last times, as Sanderfon calls them, but at the very time when it was supposed to be written, yet he denies that the Archbishop was the author of it, and suggests, that it was only fathered upon him, that it might make the greater impression upon the people (53).

- promote a loan, which the King had demanded. This sermon was preached at Northampton, in the Lent assizes 1627, before the Judges at Northampton (c), and it was transmitted to the Bishop, with the King's direction, to license it, which he refused to do, and gave his reasons for it; notwithstanding which, the sermon was licensed by the Bishop of London, (Dr Mountaigne) after many things had been corrected therein, from the lights given by the Archbishop's objections, for which however it was resolved that he should suffer (d). Discourses of this nature were so loud at court, that some of his Grace's friends overheard and reported them to him, upon which he thought fit to retire to his palace at Croydon, a month before his usual time. On the fifth of July, Lord Conway, who was then Secretary of State, made him a visit, and intimated to him, that the King expected he should withdraw to Canterbury, which the Archbishop declined, because he had a law-suit at that time with that city, and desired he might rather have leave to go to his house at Ford, five miles beyond Canterbury, which was yielded to (e); and on the ninth of October following, the King granted a commission to the Bishops of London, Durham, Rochester, Oxford, and Bath and Wells, to execute archiepiscopal authority, the cause assigned being no more than this, That the Archbishop could not at that time, in his own person, attend those services, which were otherwise proper for his cognizance and jurisdiction (f). Some writers have pretended, that his supposed irregularity, occasioned by the death of Peter Hawkins, was revived; but the commission which is extant on record shews the contrary, nor indeed was that affair ever thought of afterwards (g); but the Archbishop did not remain long in this situation, for the necessities of the times rendering a parliament necessary, his Grace was sent for about Christmas, and not only restored to his authority and jurisdiction, but, on his coming to court from his palace at Lambeth, was received when he quitted his barge, by the Archbishop of York and the Earl of Dorset, who conducted him to his majesty, where, having kissed the King's hand, he was desired not to fail the council table twice a week (h). His Grace sat in that parliament which began on the seventeenth of March following, and continued in the full exercise of his office ever after, of which it may not be amiss to take notice in this singular instance. On the twenty-fourth of August 1628, he consecrated Richard Montagu, to the see of Chichester, a man who had been remarkably busy in supporting the pretence of his irregularity, and at this consecration Dr Laud, then Bishop of London, assisted, which is the clearest proof that can be, that no doubts stuck longer as to his irregularity, even with those who loved him least (i). In parliament, the Archbishop maintained his credit in as high a degree as any of his predecessors, and it is more than probable, that the knowledge of this procured him such marks of respect, as were at this time afforded him by the court. When the Petition of Right, that great pillar of the English liberty, was under consideration, the Archbishop of Canterbury delivered the sense of the house of Lords thereupon, at a conference with the house of Commons, and at the same time, laid before them such propositions as their Lordships had agreed upon, for which, thanks were returned, in a set speech, by Sir Dudley Diggs (k). The interest of Bishop Laud was now so great at court, that he drew up a scheme of instructions, which having the King's name at the head of them, were, in the month of December 1629, transmitted to his Grace, under the pompous title, His Majesty's instructions to the most reverend father in God, George, Lord Archbishop of Canterbury, containing certain orders to be observed and put in execution, by the several Bishops in his province. These instructions his Grace communicated to his suffragan Bishops, in which, as Heylyn observes, he acted ministerially; but to shew that he still meant to exercise his own authority in his own diocese, he restored Mr Palmer and Mr Udnay to their lectureships, after the Dean and Archdeacon of Canterbury had suspended them, and, in other respects, softened the rigour of those instructions, which were contrived to enforce the particular notions of a prevailing party in the Church, which the Archbishop thought a burden too hard to be borne by the tender consciences of those who made the fundamentals of religion their study, and were not so zealous for forms (l). His conduct in this and other respects, is said to have made his presence unwelcome at court, and so indeed it seems to have been, for upon the birth of Charles, Prince of Wales, (afterwards King Charles II,) which happened on the twenty-ninth of May 1630, Laud, then Bishop of London, had the honour to baptize him as Dean of the chapel, notwithstanding that the Archbishop of Canterbury is the Ordinary of the court, and the King's household, wherever it is, are regarded as his parishioners; so that this was visibly as much a slight upon the Archbishop, as an act of favour towards his antagonist (m). The Archbishop however was proof against all such accidents as these, and went on doing his duty without fear or favour, and yet one of the last acts of his life plainly shews; that he was very far from being so indifferent towards the discipline and ceremonies of the Church of England, as some have represented him. This act of his was an order dated the third of July 1633, requiring the parishioners of Craysford in Kent, to receive the sacrament of the Lord's Supper, on their knees, at the steps ascending to the communion table (n). We may well stile this one of his last acts, since a month afterwards, viz. on the fourth of August in the same year, he deceased at his palace of Croydon, worn out with cares and infirmities, at the age of seventy-one. He was buried according to his own express direction, in the chapel of our Lady, within the church dedicated to the holy Trinity, in his native town of Guilford in Surrey (o) Soon after his decease, a noble monument was erected erected over his grave, with the effigies of the Archbishop in his robes, supported by six black marble pillars of the Dorick Order, raised on pedestals of books piled up (p). On this tomb there is a large Latin inscription in honour of the Archbishop, which having been already more than once in print, need only be referred to here (q). The facts related in this article, sufficiently prove that he was a man of great natural parts, and those sufficiently improved, for the worthy performance of whatever his high station in the Church required. He shewed himself in many circumstances of his life, a man of great moderation towards all parties, a steady friend to the Protestant religion, an honest though perhaps not an humble courtier, and one who was desirous that the clergy should have attracted the reverence and esteem of the laity, by the sanctity of their manners, and the uprightness of their behaviour, rather than have claimed them as necessarily annexed to their function. These notions of his, squaring little with the humour of some writers, has drawn upon him many reflections that he did not deserve [R]. The general historians of those times ran much into writing of characters, and that which Hammond l'Estrange bestowed upon the Archbishop, has been copied into various works. Dr Heylyn makes use of it to express what he did not care should fall from his own pen (r), though upon other occasions, he has treated that writer in his history very freely. Lloyd has copied that character without naming his author (s), and to say the truth, it is from thence, that most of the strokes of satire bestowed upon the memory of this great man have been stolen (t); and yet how little suitable that character is to the person for whom it was drawn, the reader will easily perceive from the piece itself, inserted for that reason at the bottom of the page [S]. He has not met with much better

[R] Reflections that he did not deserve.] Our old church historian tell us, 'That he forsook the birds of his own feather to fly with others, generally favouring the laity, more than the clergy, in causes that were brought before him (54).' One would imagine from hence, that this Archbishop had been a man of great severity in his government; whereas, another writer censures his Grace for his remissness in visitations (55); and as it is impossible that a man should be guilty of opposite offences at the same time, it may fairly be presumed, that he was guilty of neither; but that the bearing hard upon immoral clergymen in the high commission court, and his tenderness for good men, who were scrupulous about ceremonies, exposed the Archbishop to such censures from those who loved the former too well, and had too little pity for the latter. Mr Sanderfon strikes much deeper at the Archbishop's character, for in his history he tells us, 'That his Grace grew so much out of humour with the court, on the questioning his regularity, upon the accident of Peter Hawkins's death, that he refused, because he was not permitted to go to the altar, to attend the service of the council-table; saying to our author, Since they will have it so, that I am incapable of the one, I shall spare myself the trouble of the other (56).' He adds to this charge a much higher. He says, 'That the Archbishop fell upon down right Puritan principles, and had so many church and state male-contents visited him, that it produced a new sect, who were stiled Nicodemites, and his disciples; for which he gives this wife reason, That the Archbishop had constantly candle light in his chamber and study, making it midnight at noon-day (57).' The conclusion of his charge is the bitterest of all, and therefore I shall transcribe his own words. 'Here he began to be the first man of eminency in our Church, a ringleader of that faction, for I can name those then his private disciples, which lately appeared desperate profelytes (58).' These passages were first printed in another book, word for word (59), from whence it evidently appears, that Sanderfon wrote them both. Yet with respect to the charge, Fuller assures us, that Dr Barnard, the Archbishop's household chaplain, and near relation, knew nothing of this burning candle in his chamber and study (60); and as to the male-contents that resorted to him, the Archbishop has fully purged himself of that accusation, in the narrative of his troubles (61). This humour of inveighing against the Archbishop, was not confined to his own times, but has prevailed even amongst later writers. Mr John Aubrey having transcribed what is said of this Prelate on his monument, adds immediately; 'Notwithstanding this most noble character, transmitted to posterity on this Archbishop's monument, he was, though a benefactor to this place, no friend to the Church of England, whereof he was head, but scandalously permitted that poisonous spirit of Puritanism to spread all over the whole nation, by his indolence at least, if not connivance and encouragement; which some years after broke out, and laid a flourishing Church and State in the most miserable ruins; and which gave birth to those principles, which, unless rooted out, will ever make this nation unhappy (62).' I might easily add more instances of the same sort, but that I am persuaded the reader will think these sufficient, and therefore I shall conclude this note, with an observation of Fuller's. 'The truth is, says he, the Archbishop's own stiffness and averfeness to comply with court designs, gave advantage to his adversaries against him, and made him more obnoxious to the King's displeasure. But the blame did most light upon Bishop Laud, men accounting this a kind of filius ante diem, &c. As if not content to succeed, he endeavoured to supplant him, who might well have suffered his decayed old age to have died in honour: What needs the felling of a tree a falling? (63).'

[S] At the bottom of the page.] This historian writes thus. 'Not long after his return from Scotland, aged and self-fear, George Abbot the titular Archbishop of Canterbury, went to his everlasting home, August 4. A very learned man he was, his erudition all of the old stamp, stiffly principled in the doctrine of St Augustine; which they who understand it not, call Calvinism, therefore disliked by those who inclined to the Massilian and Armenian tenets. Pious, grave, and exemplary in his conversation. But some think a better Man than Archbishop, and that he was better qualified with merit for the dignity, than with a spirit answering the function, in the exercise whereof he was conceived too facile and yielding; his extraordinary remissness in not exacting strict conformity to the prescribed orders of the Church in point of ceremony, seemed to resolve those legal determinations to their first principle of indifferency, and led in such an habit of inconformity, as the future reduction of those tender conformed men to long discontinued obedience, was interpreted an innovation. This was the height of what I dare report his failings reached to: that he was a ringleader of that sect which lately appeared desperate profelytes, loth I am with a late author to affirm (64), warrant I have none, to leave so ill a favour upon his fame, nor can it be infallibly inferred from these men, their being then in favour with him. Their principles perhaps were entertained since his death, or if before, not then declared, and until such secrets be discovered, men may be mistaken in those they favour; the greatest sufferer of these times was so (65).' As injurious as this character is in some points, yet it is plain, that the author did not credit what Mr Sanderfon had asserted, and indeed, it is happy for this Archbishop's memory, that almost all his censurers have contradicted each other, and thereby afforded just room to posterity, to question the truth of what they have all advanced, especially when better quarter from the noble historian, tho' there is more of decency preserved in his animadversions, as the reader will perceive from the picture of our Archbishop drawn by his pen [T]. A later writer justly esteemed for his perfect knowledge of the English history, and not so much addicted to party, has done much more justice to the virtues and abilities of this great Prelate, and therefore we held it reasonable to annex his testimony to these memoirs [U]. His charity and publick spirit ought certainly to have been set in a clearer light, than hitherto they have been, by the friends to the Church; the rather, because a writer, remarkable for his keenness, has been pleased to assert (u), that marks of his benefaction we find none, in places of his breeding and preferment; which is at once an unjust and unchristian aspersion, as will appear in the notes [X]. In regard to his learning, succeeding ages may judge thereof, when it is considered, that in all their censures, they enter into the secrets of this Prelate's heart, and take upon them to publish to the world, what, if true, could be known only to God and himself.

[T] Drawn by his pen.] The Earl of Clarendon speaks of him thus. 'It was about the end of August in the year 1633, when the King (Charles I) returned from Scotland to Greenwich, where the Queen kept her court; and the first accident of moment that happened after his coming thither, was the death of Abbot, Archbishop of Canterbury, who had sat too many years in that see, and had too great a jurisdiction over the Church, tho' he was without any credit in the court from the death of King James, and had not much in many years before. He had been master of one of the poorest colleges (Baliol) in Oxford, and had learning sufficient for that province. He was a man of very morose manners, and a very four aspect, which in that time was called gravity; and under the opinion of that virtue, and by the recommendation of the Earl of Dunbar, the King's first Scotch favourite, he was preferred by King James to the bishoprick of Coventry and Litchfield, and presently after to London, before he had been Parson, Vicar, or Curate, of any parish-church in England, or Dean or Prebendary of any cathedral church; and was in truth, totally ignorant of the true constitution of the Church of England, and the state and interest of the clergy; as sufficiently appeared throughout the whole course of his life afterwards.'

'He had scarce performed any part of the office of Bishop in the diocese of London, when he was snatched from thence, and promoted to Canterbury, upon the never-enough to be lamented death of Dr Bancroft, that Metropolitan, who understood the Church excellently, and had almost rescued it out of the Calvinian Party, and very much subdued the unruly spirit of the Nonconformists, by and after the conference at Hampton Court, countenanced men of the greatest parts in learning, and disposed the clergy to a more solid course of study than they had been accustomed to; and if he had lived, would quickly have extinguished all that fire in England, which had been kindled at Geneva, or if he had been succeeded by Bishop Andrews, Bishop Overal, or any man who understood and loved the Church, that infection would easily have been kept out, which could not afterwards be so easily expelled.'

'But Abbot brought none of this antidote with him, and considered the Christian religion no otherwise, than as it abhorred and reviled Popery, and valued those men most, who did that most furiously. For the strict observation of the discipline of the Church, or the conformity of the articles or canons established, he made little enquiry, and took less care; and having himself made a very little progress in the antient and solid study of divinity, he adhered only to the doctrine of Calvin, and for his sake, did not think so ill of the discipline as he ought to have done. But if men prudently forbore a publick reviling and railing at the hierarchy and ecclesiastical government, let their opinions and private judgment be what it would, they were not only secure from any inquisition of his, but acceptable to him, and at least equally preferred by him: and tho' many other Bishops plainly discerned the mischiefs which daily broke in to the prejudice of religion, by his defects and remissness, and prevented it in their own dioceses as much as they could, and gave all their countenance to men of other parts and other principles; and tho' the Bishop of London, (Dr Laud) from the time of his authority and credit with the King, had applied all the remedies he could to those defections, and from the time of his being Chancellor of Oxford, had much discountenanced and almost suppressed that spirit, by encouraging another kind of learning and practice in that university, which was indeed according to the doctrine of the Church of England; yet that temper in the Archbishop, whose house was a sanctuary to the most eminent of that factious party, and who licensed their most pernicious writings, left his successor a very difficult work to do, to reform and reduce a Church into order, that had been so long neglected, and that was so ill filled, by many weak, and more wilful churchmen (66).'

[U] Testimony to these memoirs.] 'Archbishop Abbot, says he, was a person of wonderful temper and moderation; and in all his conduct, shewed an unwillingness to stretch the act of uniformity, beyond what was absolutely necessary for the peace of the Church; or the prerogative of the crown, any farther than conduced to the good of the state. Being not well turned for a court, tho' otherwise of considerable learning, and genteel education, he either could not, or would not, stoop to the humour of the times; and now and then by an unseasonable stiffness, gave occasion to his enemies to represent him, as not well inclined to the prerogative, or too much addicted to a popular interest; and therefore not fit to be employed in matters of government (67).'

[X] As will appear in the notes.] The Archbishop loved hospitality, and living as became a man of his rank, he tells us himself, that this was recommended to him by King James, and that he never forgot his majesty's injunctions upon that head (68), neither is it the Archbishop alone that mentions this, but even some who did not wish him very well, and who plainly intimate, that amongst the rest of his faults, he was thought to live too high, to have too much company, and to become thereby too popular (69). This hospitality of his, together with the troubles he met with, must have hindered him from growing rich, and, consequently, put it in some measure out of his power to shew his publick spirit in other respects, how much soever it might be his inclination. Yet some instances we find of his generosity in this way, at least enough to falsify Heylyn's reflection; for besides his noble and well-contrived charity at Guilford, he gave to the schools of arts in Oxford, one hundred pounds at one time, and fifty pounds at another (70). In 1619, he bestowed a large sum of money on the library of Baliol college, for augmenting the number of books, and repairing the building (71). He built a fair conduit in the city of Canterbury, for the convenience of the inhabitants (72). He likewise intended to have left a yearly revenue for the support of that conduit, if he had not been deterred by the ungrateful usage he met with from the Mayor and corporation (73). In 1624, he contributed to the founding of Pembroke college in Oxford (74). He discharged a debt of three hundred pounds owing from Baliol to Pembroke college (75). About the year 1632, he gave one hundred pounds to the library of University college (76). To the town of Guilford he left one hundred pounds, to be lent without interest to four poor tradesmen of that town, for two or three years. To the poor of that town, twenty pounds; to the poor of Lambeth, thirty pounds; to forty of his inferior servants, ten pounds each; besides forty pounds, to supply any forgetfulness towards such as had served him. All the books in his great study, marked with his name, to his successors for ever; besides some from his study at Croydon, to the Dean and Chapter at Winchester, and others to the Dean and Chapter of Canterbury (77).

thereof, from his writings upon various subjects, of the most remarkable of which, we have, for the reader's satisfaction, added a succinct account [2]. It may not be amiss to observe here, that there was another writer of both his names, who flourished somewhat later. This George Abbot wrote a paraphrase on Job, a vindication of the Sabbath, and a paraphrase on the Psalms. This last was printed in 1650, and it appears from thence, that the author was lately dead, and had been, while living, a member of the parliament then sitting (w). Another George Abbot, fellow of Merton college in Oxford, in 1622, and who took the degree of Bachelor of Law, in 1630 (x), was our Prelate's nephew, and the son of Sir Maurice Abbot, but it does not appear that he was a writer (y).

[1] Added a succinct account.] As to his works, we shall endeavour to give a list of them in the order of time in which they were written. 1. Questiones sex, totidem prælectionibus in Schola Theologica Oxoniæ, pro forma habitis, discussæ & disceptatæ anno 1597, in quibus è sacra Scriptura & Patribus, quid statuendum sit definitur. Oxoniæ 1598, 4to. It. Francofurti 1616, 4to. This second edition was published by the famous Abraham Scultetus. 2. Exposition on the Prophet Jonab, in certain Sermons preached at St Mary's Church in Oxford, London, 4to. 1600. And again 1613. 3. His Answer to the Question of the Citizens of London, in January 1600, concerning Cheap-side Cross, London 1611. Of this treatise we have before given a particular account. 4. The Reasons which Dr Hill hath brought for the upholding of Papistry, unmasked and shewed to be very weak, &c. Oxon. 4to. 1604. This Thomas Hill quitted the Church of England for that of Rome, and wrote this book to vindicate that change (78). 5. A Preface to the Examination of George Spots, &c. of which we have before given a large account. 6. A Sermon preached at Westminster, May 26, 1608, at the Funeral of Thomas, Earl of Dorset, late Lord High Treasurer of England, on Isaiah xl. 6. by George Abbot, Dr of Divinity, and Dean of Winchester, one of his Lordship's Chaplains, London, 4to. 1608. 7. Translation of a Part of the New Testament, with the rest of the Oxford Divines, printed in 1611. 8. Some Memorials touching the Nullity between the Earl of Essex and his Lady, pronounced September 25; 1613, at Lambeth, and the Difficulties endured in the same. This treatise makes fifty-six pages in twelves, and has the following remarkable attestation at the end of it. "This narration is wholly written with mine own hand, and was finished October 2, 1613, being the eighth day after giving the sentence. And I protest before Almighty God, that I have not willingly wrote any untruth therein; but have delivered all things fairly to the best of my understanding, helping myself with such memorials and notes, as I took from time to time, that if there was occasion, I might thus set down at large the truth to posterity ; when this case shall be rung from Rome gates, or the fact hereafter be questioned."

GEORGE Cant.

To this is added, Some observable things since September 25, 1613, when the sentence was given in the cause of the Earl of Essex, continued unto the day of the marriage, December 26, 1613, which appears also to have been penned by his Grace, or by his direction, and to it is annexed, The speech intended to be spoken at Lambeth, September 25, 1613, by the Archbishop of Canterbury, when it came to his turn to declare his mind concerning the nullity of marriage between the Earl of Essex and the Lady Frances Howard (79). 9. A brief Description of the whole World; wherein is particularly described all the Monarchies, Empires, and Kingdoms of the same, with their Academies, &c. by the Most Reverend Father in God, George, late Archbishop of Canterbury, London, 8vo. 1634. Of which work there have been many editions. 10. A short Apology for Archbishop Abbot, touching the Death of Peter Hawkins, dated October 8, 1621; of which we have already given an account. 11. Treatise of perpetual Visibility and Succession of the true Church in all Ages. London, 4to. 1624. His name is not to this book, only his arms impaled by those belonging to the see of Canterbury, are put before it. Dr Heylyn acquaints us with the reason of his writing it, but does not tell us why he did not own it (80). 12. A Narrative containing the true Cause of his Sequestration, and Disgrace at Court. In two Parts. Written at Ford in Kent 1627, (81). Bishop Hacket (82) assures us, that he had seen this manuscript in the Bishop's own writing, and had several of the facts contained in it from the Archbishop's own mouth. 13. History of the Massacre in the Valtoline (83). 14. His Judgment of bowing at the Name of Jesus. Hamburg 1632. 8vo. Besides many instructions to the Bishops of his diocese, speeches in parliament, letters, and other occasional compositions, too numerous to be mentioned here.

(79) These were printed all together under the title of, The Case of Impotency as debated in England, &c. Lond. 12mo. 1719. In the preface it is said, that the original manuscript, in Archbishop Abbot's own hand writing, is still in the hands of an eminent Lawyer.

ABBOT (ROBERT) brother to the former; was also born in the same town of Guilford, anno 1560 (a), and bred up under the same school-master there; till being sufficiently qualified for the university he was sent to Baliol College in Oxford, anno 1575. He took his Master of Arts degree in 1582; became a noted preacher there, also a constant lecturer at St Martin's Church, in the Quadrivium, and sometimes at Abingdon in Berkshire (b). His preferment was remarkably owing to his merit, particularly in preaching; notwithstanding the distinction which some have affected to make, between the talents and tempers of these two brothers; "That George was the more plausible preacher, Robert the greater scholar; George the abler statesman, Robert the deeper divine: gravity did frown in George, and smile in Robert (c):" such the qualities of this Robert evidently were; that upon the first sermon he preached at Worcester, he was made lecturer in that city, and soon after rector of All-Saints there; and upon a sermon he preached at Paul's Cross, he was presented to the rich benefice of Bingham in Nottinghamshire, by one of his auditors, John Stanhope, Esq; as Dr Featley has observed in his life (d). In 1594 he became no less eminent for some of his writings; particularly, against a certain Papist, on the Sacrament. He then took his degrees in divinity; that of Doctor being completed in 1597 (e). In the beginning of the reign of King James I, he was made chaplain in ordinary to him; and this King so well esteemed of his writings, that, with the second edition of Dr Abbot's book de Antichristo, in 1608, his majesty ordered his own commentary upon part of the Apocalypse to be printed: an honour, which that King did to no other of the great clerks in this kingdom. And, in truth, the Doctor's pen had now brought him also into general esteem, for what he had hitherto published in Defence of William Perkins's Reformed Catholic, against Dr William Bishop, now a secular priest, but afterwards, in the Pope's stile, a titular Bishop, of the Aërial Diocese of Chalcedon. It is my author's as-

- fertion, that Dr Abbot has herein given that William Bishop as great an overthrow, as Jewell to Harding, Bilson to Allen, or Reynolds to Hart (f). At the end of this excellent work is added a particular treatise, he soon after writ, intitled, The true ancient Roman Catholick; which he dedicated to Prince Henry; to whom it was so acceptable, that he returned him many thanks in a letter written with his own hand (g), and promised his assistance, upon the next vacancy, to advance him higher in the Church. And though by that Prince's untimely death the Doctor lost some hopes, yet, in course of time, his deserts found other friends to do him that justice. In 1609, he was unanimously elected master of Baliol College (h). Here it is observed of him, that he was careful and skilful, to set in this nursery the best plants; and then took such care to water and prune them, that in no plat, or knot, throughout the University of Oxford, there appeared more beautiful flowers, or grew sweeter fruit, than in Baliol College, while he was master (i). His diligent reading to his scholars, and his continual presence at publick exercises, both countenanced the readers, and encouraged the hearers. These regulations and improvements, he further wrought, by establishing piety, which had been much neglected; restoring peace, which had been long wanted; and making temperance more familiar among them, which had been too great a stranger in that society (k). In May 1610, we find him nominated by the King, among the first fellows of his majesty's Royal College at Chelsea, then newly founded, and designed as a kind of fortrefs for controversial divinity; being thus, as it were, engarrisoned, with the most able and select champions for the Protestant cause, against all assaults of Popery (l). In November the same year, he was made prebendary of Normanton, in the church of Southwell (m). Upon his preaching a sermon before the King, during his month of waiting at court, in 1612, when the news of Dr Thomas Holland's death was brought from Oxford, his majesty named him successor in the Theological Chair, usually called the King's Professor of Divinity; but he modestly refused the same, till his brother procured a mandate from the King for him to hold it. Some notable circumstances we meet with of him in this station [A]; and herein, he has had the character given him of a profound divine; most admirably well read in the fathers, councils, and schoolmen; and a more moderate Calvinian, than either of his two predecessors in the divinity-chair, Holland and Humphrey, were; which he expressed by countenancing the Sublapsarian way of predestination (n). Lastly, upon the King's perusal of his Antilogia, against the Apology for Garnet, and the same of his incomparable lectures in the university, upon the King's supreme power, against Bellarmine and Suarez, (printed after his death) his majesty, when the see of Salisbury fell void, sent his Conge d'Elire for him to the Dean and Chapter. Thus, as he set forward, one foot in the temple of virtue, his other, still advanced in the temple of honour (o), though indeed, but leisurely; which is imputed to his own humility, the obstruction of his foes, who traduced him for a Puritan, (though cordial to the doctrine of the Church of England) and the unwillingness of some friends to adorn the Church with the spoil of the University, and mar a Professor to make a Bishop (p). He was consecrated by his own brother the Archbishop, on December 3, 1615, in his chapel at Lambeth (q). Herein equalizing the felicity of Sefridus, some time Bishop of Chichester, who being a Bishop himself, also saw his brother, at the same Archbishop of Canterbury (r). Other bishopricks were voiced upon him; but the business of the nullity (before-mentioned, in his brother's life) made a nullity for a time, says my author, in his Grace's good intentions; insomuch, that King James, when the Doctor, newly consecrated Bishop of Sarum, came to do his homage, said pleasantly to him, Abbot, I have had very much to do to make thee a Bishop; but I know no reason for it, unless it were, because thou hast written against one; alluding to the name of the Popish priest before-mentioned (s). In his way to Sarum, he made a farewell oration at the university, with great applause. We have some fragments of it preserved, in the original Latin, by two authors (t); and a translation thereof, or epitome in English, by a third (u). His brethren, the heads of houses, and other Oxford friends, parted with him on the edge of his diocese with tears for grief; and the gentry of Sarum received

[A] Some notable circumstances, &c. in this station.] Among the rest, while he was Professor in the chair at Oxford, was, his preaching a sermon before the university; in which, he so significantly laid open the oblique methods then used by those who secretly favoured Popery, to undermine the Reformation; and Dr Laud, then present, was so notoriously suspected to be one who used those methods, as to have the said reflections applied by the whole auditory to him; that in great vexation he wrote to his patron, Dr Neal, then Bishop of Lincoln, (therefore about the year 1614) to know whether he should not make a direct reply to it. The passage Laud objected to, was, that Abbot should say, 'There were men, who, under pretence of truth, and preaching against the Puritans, struck at the heart and root of that faith and religion now established among us; which was the very practice of Parsons and Campian's counsel, when they came hither to seduce young students; who, afraid to be expelled, if they should openly profess their conversion, were directed to speak freely against the Puritans, as what would suffice: so these do not expect to be accounted Papists, because they speak only against Puritans; but because they are indeed Papists, they speak nothing against them: or if they do, they beat about the bush, and that softly too; for fear of disquieting the birds that are in it.' Hereupon, Laud, in his letter to the said Bishop of Lincoln, complains, 'That he was fain to sit patiently at the rehearsal of this sermon, though abused almost an hour together, being pointed at as the fat; yet would have taken no notice of it, but that the whole university applied it to him; and his friends told him, he should sink in his credit, if he answered not Dr Abbot in his own: nevertheless, he would be patient; and desired his Lordship to vouchsafe him some direction (1). But, as we hear not that Laud did answer it, the Bishop, might perhaps vouchsafe him rather directions to be quiet.

ceived him with those of joy. He soon observed the beautiful old cathedral to be much decayed, through negligence, and the covetousness of those who filled their purses, with that which should have stopped the chinks (x). Therefore he used such means with the prebendaries, as drew from them five hundred pounds, which he applied to the reparation of this church (y); and then laboured to repair the congregation, both by doctrine and discipline; visiting his whole diocese in person, and preaching every Sabbath-day, whilst his health would permit, which was not long; for that sedentary course, to which he had accustomed himself, by his close application to study, brought upon him the gravel and stone; with which, his hour-glass, contrary to others, the sooner ran out, by being stopped (z). But in all the bodily tortures of his last fit, his soul was at ease; and his heavenly hopes disposed him contentedly to resign all earthly enjoyments. He was so far from needing the advice of patience, to make the remainder of life supportable, that he gave it others. Even to the Judges, who in their circuit came to visit him on his death-bed, he spared not his christian admonitions; and besides his precepts, gave them his example, of the comforts that flowed from a clear conscience. And for the inhabitants; he mourned less to leave the world, than they to part with him; who had so much endeared himself to them, by diligence in his pastoral charge, by his hospitality, and bounty to the poor; and humble carriage to all (a). Having summoned his domesticks, with desire to declare his faith, he was persuaded to refrain, it being manifest in his writings. Thus, with exhortations, benedictions, and the pains of his disease, quite worn out, he lay a while slumbering; and at length, with eyes and hands uplifted for some space, gave up the ghost, on March 2, 1617, (and not, as some have mistaken, the year after) in the fifty-eighth year of his age, and before he had completely filled this see two years and three months; being one of the five Bishops which Salisbury saw in six years (b). He was buried over-against the Bishop's seat in the cathedral: having been twice married; the last time, with some displeasure to the Archbishop, about half a year after his promotion to the said see. He left one son, or more, and also one daughter named Martha (c), who was married to Sir Nathaniel Brent, Warden of Merton College in Oxford; and their daughter Margaret, married Dr Edward Corbet, Rector of Haseley in Oxfordshire; who gave some of the Bishop's MSS to the Bodleian Library, as may appear in the article set apart for the enumeration of his writings [B]. There was another Robert Abbot, a minister, and author also of several devout pieces; who though he was scarcely a writer before Bishop Abbot died, is yet here mentioned, that some readers may not confound him with this Bishop of Salisbury, as others have divided him into three distinct persons (d); because so many different livings

[B] Enumeration of his writings.] And first, those in print are, The Mirror of Popish Subtilties: discovering the Shifts which a cavelling Popish, in behalf of Paul Spence a Priest, hath gathered out of Saunders and Bellarmine, &c. concerning the Sacraments, &c. Dedicated to Archbishop Whitgift, London, 4to. 1594. 2. The Exaltation of the Kingdom and Priesthood of Christ. Sermon on the 110th Psalm. Dedicated to Bishop Babington, 4to. London 1601. 3. Antichristi Demonstratio; contra fabulas Pontificias, & ineptam Belarmini, &c. Dedicated to King James, London, 4to. 1603. and in 8vo. 1608. This is much commended by Scaliger (2). 4. Defence of the Reformed Catholic of Mr W. Perkins, against the Bastard Counter-Catholic of Dr William Bishop, Seminary Priest. Dedicated to King James: the first part, 4to. 1606. the second part, 4to. 1607. third part 4to. 1609. A most elaborate work, as one calls it (3); and another writes, that W. Bishop had answered all the said Reformed Catholic; then we should have had in Abbot's encounter, a whole system of controversies exactly discussed; and the truth of the Reformed Religion, in all points solidly confirmed, by scripture, fathers, and reason (4). From a small typographical error in one author, there is another also, who has made a great blunder about this book: for the former, mentioning 'Dr Abbot's two volumes against Bishop's (5)', (next to another book, which was written by his brother, the Archbishop) has, by not obliterating the last letter of the last word, and by neglecting to distinguish it as a proper name, in Italicks, given a foreigner occasion to make his said brother the Archbishop, author of a Treatise against Bishop's (6); which, as hath been truly observed, would be somewhat extraordinary in a Metropolitan. 5. The old Way; a Sermon, at St Mary's, Oxon. 4to. London 1610. Dedicated to Archbishop Bancroft, and translated into Latin by Thomas Drax. 6. The true ancient Roman Catholic: being an Apology against Dr Bishop's Reproof of the Defence of the Reformed Catholic. 4to. 1611. Dedicated to Prince Henry, as was before observed. 7. Antilogia: Adversus Apologiam, Andreae Eudæmon-Jobannis, Jesuitæ, pro Henrico Garnetto Jesuitâ pro- ditore. London, 4to. 1613. Dedicated to King James. The said apology was printed three years before (7); and further thereof, with the true name of its jesuitical author, may be seen elsewhere (8). 8. De gratiâ & perseverentiâ Sanctorum, Exercitationes habitæ in Academia Oxoniensi. Lond. 4to. 1618. & Francf. 8vo. 1619. Dedicated to Prince Charles. 9. In Ricardi Thomsoni, Angli-Belgici Diatribam, de amissione & intercessione Justificationis & Gratiæ, animadverso brevissimè. Also printed after his death; London, 4to. 1618: for he finished this book the last day of his life; and then, his brother the Archbishop, directed Dr Featley, the Bishop's domestic chaplain, to draw up, from his Grace's notes, the attestation which is affixed thereto. 10. De supremâ Potestate Regiâ, exercitationes habitæ in Academia Oxoniensi, contra Rob. Bellarmine & Francf. Suarez. Lond. 4to. 1619. Dedicated by his son, to George, Archbishop of Canterbury. He also left behind, many compositions in manuscript, as his Sermon at St Mary's In Vindication of the Geneva Bible from Judaism and Arianism (9); which Dr Howson opposed, till King James turned his edge from Geneva to Rome; and then, he as fiercely declared against the Pope; That he'd loosen him from his chair, though he were fastned thereto with a tenpenny nail (10). Our author also left other Sermons, which he had preached at Paul's Cross; and at Worcester; and some in Latin, at Oxford, &c. Lectures on St Matthew. Examination of Mr Bishop's Reproof of his Dedication, &c. to the Answer of his Epistle to the King. Preface to be inserted after the dedication of his book De Antichristo: besides Commentaries on some parts of the Old Testament. And a Commentary in Latin, upon the whole Epistle to the Romans; which is called an accurate work, in large Sermons upon every text; wherein he has handled all the controverted points of religion, and enclosed the whole magazine of his learning (11): and it is regretted, that the Church should be deprived of such a treasure, particularly that of Worcester; to which he seems to have bequeathed it, in his epistle to the sermons he dedicated to Bishop Babington: this work, in

ABBOT (MAURICE) or rather MORRIS, the youngest of six sons, born to Mr Maurice Abbot, of Guilford, by his wife Alice March, and brother to Robert and George beforementioned. He was bred up to trade, and became an eminent merchant in the city of London, but was more remarkably distinguished, by his applying himself to the direction of the affairs of the East-India company, and his earnest attention to whatever might promote the extensive commerce of this nation, or strengthen her foreign colonies. In this quality, we find him one of the commissioners employed in the negotiation and conclusion of a treaty with the Dutch East-India company, by which the Molucca Islands, and the commerce to them, is declared to be two thirds belonging to the Dutch East-India company, and one to the English. This treaty was concluded at London, on the seventh of July, 1619, and ratified by the King, the sixteenth of the same month, and is as remarkable a (a) transaction as any in that reign [A]. It was in consequence of this treaty, and in order to recover the goods of some English merchants, that Sir Dudley Diggs, and Maurice Abbot, were sent over into (b) Holland, in the succeeding year, 1620, but with what success does not appear. He was afterwards one of the farmers of the customs, as appears from a commission granted in 1623, to him and to many other persons, for administering the oaths to such persons, as should either desire to pass the seas from this kingdom, or to enter it from foreign countries (c). In the succeeding year, 1624, he was appointed one of the council, for settling and establishing the colony of Virginia, with very full powers for the government of that colony, as by that commission (d) appears [B]. On the accession of King Charles I, to the throne, Mr Abbot was the first person upon whom he conferred the honour of knighthood (e), and so great was his interest at that time in the city, that we find him chosen to the first parliament called in that King's reign, viz. in 1625, in conjunction with Sir Thomas Middleton, Sir Heneage Finch, and Mr Robert Bateman (f). In 1627, he was one of the Sheriffs of London, with Henry Garway; Sir Cuthbert Hacket, being then Mayor (g). About the year 1635, he erected a noble monument to memory of his brother, George, Archbishop of Canterbury, in his native town of Guilford (h). In 1638 he was Lord-Mayor of the city of London (i), and deceased on the tenth of January, 1640 (k), but as to any farther particulars, we have not been able to discover them, except that he was a great lover and encourager of trade, as well as very fortunate therein [C]. He had a son whose name was George, fellow of Merton college in Oxford, and who took the degree of Bachelor of Law, in 1630 (l).

[A] As any in that reign. The preamble of this treaty recites, That whereas there had been long and great disputes between the English and Dutch East India Companies, and that commissioners had met at London, in the year 1613, and at the Hague in 1615, for the accommodating these disputes, without effect, his Majesty and the States General had been pleased to grant full powers to certain commissioners on the part of his Majesty, and the States, as also the like full powers to several persons on the behalf of each of the companies, by whom a treaty was framed and concluded, in which the right of both parties to the trade of the Indies is freely acknowledged, free access is allowed to the servants of one company in all the forts and factories of the other; it is farther agreed that each company should furnish ten men of war, for the joint defence of their commerce, each from six to eight hundred tons, carrying 150 men, and thirty pieces of cannon. The fortresses on the islands of Banda and Amboyna, are therein settled, for the mutual benefit of both nations; and it is agreed, that their garrisons shall be maintained out of the customs and duties levied both on the English and Dutch: in a word, this appears to have been a kind of treaty of Coalition, which one would have imagined must have prevented for the future, any disputes in that part of the world, and secured the trade thereof to the Maritime Powers. In the ratification, his Majesty promises, that during the time for which this treaty was concluded, which was twenty years, he would not erect any other company, for carrying on the trade to the East Indies, than that with which this agreement was made (1).

[B] As by that commission appears. This commission, which was issued in virtue of two acts of parliament, one in the first year of the King, for preventing persons from going out of the kingdom without licence, and another in the third, for the better discovering and repressing Popish recusants, is directed to the Recorder of the City of London, the Receivers, and Collectors of the Customs, the General Supervisor and Comptrollers of the Customs in the Port of London, the head Searcher of the same Port, and to Sir John Wolstenholme, Abraham Jacob, Henry Garway, and Morris Abbot, (and thus he wrote his name himself) and to several other persons, empowering them to examine all persons going from or coming to this kingdom, and for granting them letters testimonial, as also for staying such as they should suspect, as well as for administering the oaths and other purposes (2).

[C] As well as very fortunate therein. This is particularly asserted in a dedication to Sir Maurice, when Governor of the Honourable Company of Merchants trading to the East Indies, by Mr Robert Ashley, the author of a translation mentioned in the margin (3).

ABLE or ABEL (THOMAS) Chaplain to Queen Catherine, consort of King Henry VIII (a), distinguished himself by his zeal in opposing the proceedings of that king, and in particular the divorce of his royal mistress. To this end he wrote a piece intitled, Traſtatius de non diſſolvendo Henrici & Catharine matrimonio, i. e. 'A Treatise proving ‘ proving that the marriage of King Henry and Queen Catherine ought not to be dissolved.’ He took his degree of bachelor of arts at Oxford, on the fourth of July, 1513 (b); and that of master of arts, on the twenty-seventh of June, 1516 (c). In the year 1534, he fell under a prosecution for being concerned in the affair of Elizabeth Barton, called the Holy Maid of Kent [A]. He was also one of those, who denied the King’s supremacy over the Church; for which he was apprehended and imprisoned, and afterwards hanged, drawn, and quartered in Smithfield, on the thirtieth of July, 1540. During his imprisonment, he was so closely confined, that the keeper of Newgate was committed to the Marshalsea prison, for suffering him to go out upon bail (d). Boucher gives him the character of a very learned man, and tells us, he used to teach the queen music and the languages (e).

[A] He was prosecuted for being concerned in the affair of Elizabeth Barton, the Holy Maid of Kent. Lord Herbert of Cherbury (1) gives us the following account of that impostor. ‘ Elizabeth Barton — had almost stirred up more than one tragedy: for being furnished by the Monks, to use some strange gesticulations, and to exhibit divers feigned miracles, accompanied with some wizardly unsoothsayings, she drew much credit and concourse to her; information that no mean persons, and, among others, Warham late Archbishop of Canterbury, and Fisher, Bishop of Rochester, and Sir Thomas More, gave some belief to her: so that notwithstanding the danger that was to give ear to a prediction of her’s, that Henry VIII should not live one month after his marriage with Mrs Bolen, she was cried up with many voices; Silvester, Darius, and Antonio Polioni, the Pope’s agents here, giving credit and countenance thereunto. But the plot being at last discovered, she was attainted of treason in the parliament, and executed with her chief accomplices shortly after; at which time she confessed their names, who had instigated her to these practices, and whom she had acquainted with her revelations.’ T

ACCA (St) (a) Bishop of Hagustald, or Hexam, in Northumberland [A], succeeded Wilfrid in that see, in the year 709. He was a Monk of the order of St Benedict, an Anglo-Saxon by birth, and had his education under the most holy prelate Bosa, Bishop of York; and from thence was taken under the patronage of Wilfrid, whom he accompanied in a journey to Rome. Here he improved himself in several things, relating to ecclesiastical usage and discipline; which (his historian tells us) it was impracticable for him to learn in his own country (b) [B]. This prelate ornamented his cathedral to a great degree of beauty and magnificence [C], furnished it with plate and holy vestments, procured a large collection of the lives of the saints, and erected a noble library consisting chiefly of ecclesiastical learning (c). About the year 732, Acca was driven from his see into banishment, but for what cause is unknown [D]. He was esteemed a very able divine,

[A] Bishop of Hagustald, or Hexam, in Northumberland. As this episcopal see has been now a long time extinct, the curious reader will not be displeas’d to see here a short account of it, as extract’d from our old English historians by Mr Camden. ‘ And now the whole Tine, being well grown, and still increasing, presses forward in one channel for the Ocean, by Hexam, which Bede calls Hagustald. This was the Axeldunum of the Romans, where the first cohort of the Spaniards were in garrison, as the name implies, as also it’s situation on a rising hill; for the Britons called such a mount Dunum. But take an account of this place from Richard it’s Prior (1). Not far from the southern bank of the river Tine, stands a town, of small extent indeed at present, and but thinly inhabited; but (as the remaining marks of it’s antient state will testify) heretofore very large and magnificent. This place is called Hextoldesham, from the little rivulet of Hextold, which runs by, and sometimes suddenly overflows it. In the year 675, Etheldreda, wife of King Egfrid, assigned it for an episcopal see to St Wilfrid; who built here a church, which, for the curiousness and beauty of the fabric, surpassed all the monasteries in England. — But the honour [of being an episcopal see] after the twelfth Bishop, was wholly lost, the Danith was prevailing. Afterwards it was only reckoned a manour of the Archbishops of York, till they parted with their right in an exchange made with Henry VIII (1).

[B] — Which — it was impracticable for him to learn in his own country. [Cam quo etiam Romam veniens (says Bede) multa illic que in Patria nequiverat ecclesie sanctorum institutioni utilis didicit, et suis subjeis tradidit (2).] From this assertion of Bede’s it appears, that the English and Roman churches were not yet brought to an uniformity in all points.

[C] He ornamented his cathedral to a great degree of beauty and magnificence. The author of a catalogue of the Bishops of Hexam, published by Wharton (3), has the following remark upon this prelate’s benefactions, which it may not be improper to set down. Lubens hec commemoro, ut precam gentis nostrae devotionem, et in sacris magnificentibus, Lectores intuantur:

neve ornamenta ecclesiarum pretiosa a primæwæ (inter nos) fidei simplicitate aliena babeantur. — I will mention these benefactions, that the readers may see the antient devotion of our nation, and it’s magnificence in sacred matters; and that rich ornaments of churches may not be thought foreign to the simplicity of faith among us.

[D] He was driven from his see into banishment, but for what cause is unknown. We learn this particular of the life of Bishop Acca from Richard, Prior of Hagustald (4). That author’s words are: Anno vero Dominicæ incarnationis 732 & regni Ceolwulf IV, & episcopatus sui 24, de sede sua fugatus est. — Qua autem urgente necessitate pulsus fit, vel quo diverterit, scriptum non reperit. Sunt tamen qui dicunt quod eo tempore episcopalem sedem in Candida inceperit & preparaverit. — In the year of Christ 732, the fourth of the reign of Ceolwulf, and the twenty-fourth of his promotion to the episcopacy, he was driven from his see. — But, what urgent necessity obliged him to withdraw, or to what place he retired, we are no where told. Some indeed pretend, he then laid the foundation of an episcopal see at Candida Casa or Withern. The supposition (here mentioned) of Acca’s founding the see of Candida Casa, during the time of his exile, cannot be true, since that bishopric was founded (or rather restored) before Bede finished his History, that is, before the year 731: as appears from Bede himself. ‘ At vero Provincie Northan-hymbrorum, cui rex Ceolwulf præest, quatuor nunc episcopi præsulatum tenent: Wilfrid in Eboracensis Ecclesia, Æthiwald in Lindisfaronsi, Acca in Hagustaldensi, Pethelm in ea quæ Candida Casa vocatur; quæ nuper, multiplicatis fidelium plebibus, in sedem pontificatus addita, ipsum primum habet antistitem (5).’ — In the province of Northumberland, over which King Ceolwulf reigns, there are now four Bishops governing their respective sees; Wilfrid in the Church of York, Æthiwald in that of Lindisfarne, Acca in that of Hagustald, and Pethelm in that called Candida Casa; of which he is the first Bishop, it having been lately taken into the number of episcopal sees, on account of the great increase of the faithful. [E] He divine, and was remarkably skilled in church-musick [E]. He wrote the following pieces: 1. Passiones Sanctorum, i. e. 'The Sufferings of the Saints.' 2. Officia sue Ecclesie, i. e. 'The Offices of his own Church.' 3. Epistole ad Amicos, i. e. 'Letters to his friends.' 4. Pro illustrandis scripturis ad Bedam, i. e. 'For explaining the scriptures, addressed to Bede (c).' He died in 740 [F], having governed the church of Hexam twenty-four years, under Egbert King of the Northumbrians (d). Simeon of Durham relates several miracles performed by the relics of St Acca [G].

[E] He was remarkably skilled in church-musick.] Bede informs us, that Acca retained in his service, during twelve years, an excellent finger named Maban; by the help of whose instructions, he revived the use of church-musick, and singing of anthems. This Maban, it seems, had been taught to sing by the successors of the disciples of St Gregory the Pope in Kent. Cantatorem quoque egregium, vocabulo Maban, qui à successoribus discipulorum beati Papæ Gregorii in Cantia fuerat cantandi sonus edoctus, ad se suosque instituendos accersit, ac per annos duodecim tenuit: quatenus & quæ illi non noverant, carmina ecclesiastica doceret; & ea quæ quondam cognita longo usu vel negligentia inveterare cæperunt, hujus doctrina præfium renovaret in statum (6).

(6) Beda, ubi supra, c. 20.

[F] He died in 740.] His body was buried with great solemnity in the church of Hagustald; and two stone crosses of exquisite workmanship were placed, the one at his head and the other at his feet. Three hundred years after, his sepulchre being opened, the burial-cloths, in which his body was wrapt, were found entire, and not in the least decayed; an argument (says an historian) of his great sanctity, and a proof of his never fading glory. In argumentum magnæ sanctitatis, & testimonium incommutabilis gloriæ ejus (7). There was found upon his breast a small wooden tablet in the form of an altar, made of two pieces of wood joined together with silver nails; on which was this inscription: Alme Trinitati. agie. Sophie. Sanctæ Mariæ (8).

[G] Simeon of Durham relates several miracles performed by the relics of St Acca.] For the reader's amusement I shall select one or two. A certain brother in the church of Hagustald, whose name was Aldred, resolved one day to separate the bones of St Acca, which had hitherto lain mixed with his ashes, and deposit them in a chest prepared for that purpose.

Accordingly having brought out the relics, and laid them on St Michael's altar, he picked out the bones, and wrapping them in a linen napkin placed them in the chest. This done, he took up the chest, and went with it into the choir, where he intended it should stand, leaving a brother of his to watch the relics. This brother, being left alone, and having a strong desire to get into his possession a relic of so great a saint, resolved to search amidst the ashes, in hopes some little bone might inadvertently have been left behind. But first, that he might not proceed irreverently, he kneeled down, and repeated the seven penitential palms; then approaching the altar, he began to stir the ashes; when suddenly a flame bursting forth, as from the mouth of an oven, drove him back, and obliged him to desist from his attempt; convincing him at the same time, that it was not the will of God, that he should take away the minutest particle of such precious relics (9). Another miracle is as follows. One Edric, a presbyter, coming to the church of Hagustald, perceived a heap of earth lying near one of the altars; into which beginning to dig, he discovered a wooden box, and in it a leaden casket with an inscription, importing that some of the relics of St Acca were contained therein. The priest, having broke open the casket, found in it a little parcel of dust resembling ashes, and intermixed with a few bones; which he took away with him. It happened at that time he was acquainted with a pious but poor old woman of the town, who had been a long time blind; and it came into his thoughts to try the virtue of his relics in effecting her cure. Accordingly he steeped one of the Saint's bones in a little holy water; and having washed her eyes therewith, in about two hours time, through the merits and intercession of St Acca, she was restored to sight (10).

A D A M S (THOMAS) citizen and Lord-Mayor of London: a man of great eminence in his time, for his prudence and piety, his loyalty and sufferings, and his acts of munificence both in town and country. He was born at Wem in Shropshire, anno 1586, educated in the university of Cambridge, and bred a Draper in London (a). He was chosen, in the year 1639, Sheriff of that city (b); and was of so publick a spirit, that when his son-in-law brought him the first news of the said election, he immediately dismissed his particular business, and never afterwards personally followed his trade, but gave himself up to the city concerns (c). By his genius, he made himself such a master of the customs and usages, the rights and privileges of the city; and by his nature, was found to be a man of that wisdom and integrity, in the exertion of his knowledge, that there was no honour in the city whereof he was capable, to which he was not preferred (d). He was made Master of the Drapers company, Alderman of a ward, and President of St Thomas's hospital, which probably had been ruined, but for his sagacity and industry in discovering the frauds of an unjust steward (e). He was often returned a Burgess in parliament, tho' the iniquity of the times would not permit him to sit there: and in the year 1645, was chosen Lord-Mayor of London (f), in which office he was so far from self-seeking, that he made not those advantages which are usually made, by selling the vacant places (g). On account of his incorruptible loyalty to King Charles I, his house, while he was Lord-Mayor, was searched by the party then getting into power, with expectation of finding the said King. The year after he was cast into the Tower, there kept a prisoner, and, for several years, excluded from all publick offices and employments; they finding him a man who would not be moulded into their forms, nor make shipwreck of his conscience, to serve their interest (h). This constancy brought upon him, besides these troubles, the publick scoffs and detractions of the levelling faction, which yet others have cleared him of [A], and many writers, in verse as well as prose, have applauded his administration in this office. At length he became, and so continued for some years, the first among the twenty-six, the eldest Alderman upon the bench, that had served in the office of Lord-Mayor, to whom is given that that honourable title, of FATHER of the CITY (i). Nor received he only all his honours from the city, but his Prince also, with the greatest reason, conferred upon him the greatest whereof his station was capable. For such was his generous loyalty and affection to the said Prince, Charles II, that having in those perilous times remitted ten thousand pounds to him in his exile (k), and being deputed, at his majesty's joyful return to these realms, by the city, to go, tho' in the seventy-third year of his age, as their Commissioner, to Breda in Holland with General Monk (l), to congratulate and attend him home; he was, in consideration of his signal services, knighted at the Hague by the said King, and, a few days after his majesty's restoration, advanced to the dignity of a Baronet of England, on the thirteenth of June 1660 (m). His merit is still more extensive in the character of a benefactor to the publick, than that of having been one to his Prince; particularly at Wem, where he not only gave the house of his nativity for a free-school (n), that others might have their breeding where he had his birth; but did also liberally endow the same. He likewise founded an Arabic professorship at Cambridge, on condition that it were frequented with a competency of auditors (o); and notwithstanding the general jealousy, that this new Arabia (the happy, as all novelties, at first) would soon become desert; yet it thrived so well, that the salary of forty pounds per annum (p), was settled upon Mr Abraham Wheelock, fellow of Clare Hall, a man of great learning and industry, whose longer life would have probably much improved the Polyglott Bible. Nor were these munificent acts to bear the date of their commencement from that of his death; but the one began twenty, and the other above thirty years before it (q). Neither was their maintenance only settled for some term of years, but, as we usually say, for ever. By which means, he not only served his own, but succeeding generations. Nay, in that Arabic lecture, he served those remote eastern parts of the world; upon which account, at the desire of the said Mr Wheelock, he was at the charge of printing the Persian Gospels, and transmitting them into those parts. Thus he endeavoured to promote the Christian religion, by throwing a stone at the forehead of Mabomet, as himself was wont to express it (r). And thus was he serviceable in his generation, to the honour of God, the welfare of the city, and the benefit both of country and university. In private as well as publick charities he was also a conspicuous example. His hands being frequently open in his life-time, to objects of want and desert upon all occasions; and notwithstanding many great damages to his estate, he gave considerable legacies to the poor of several parishes, to hospitals, and ministers widows. Though he was a man of a fine and graceful presence, the virtues of his mind, exceeded the elegance of his form [B]. But one of the most shining virtues in his character was, his Christian courage, his fortitude and patience, under several years of bodily pain, many doleful losses he met with in his worldly goods, and some disastrous crosses in his near relations; such, as himself acknowledged, He could not have borne, were it not for the strength he received from those divine examples, wherewith he had been so conversant. In the losses and crosses here mentioned, my author last quoted is no further particular: but the disease, which, in his later years so much afflicted him, was the stone in his bladder. This, by a fall as he was stepping out of his coach (s), hastened his death, which happened on the (t) twenty-fourth of February, 1667, in the eighty-second year of his age. That stone was of such extraordinary magnitude, that it was found, when taken from him, to exceed twenty-five ounces in weight (u): and it is therefore preserved in the Laboratory at Cambridge (x). The worldly affairs in which his life had been so much engaged, left no reluctance in him to part with it: so truly had he learnt the principal part that can be acted by the wisest men, of familiarizing his thoughts in such manner to that dissolution allotted us all, as neither to be surprized at it's approach, nor unprepared for his resignation; of which he was so mindful many years before his death, that it was his frequent language, upon several occasions, Solum mihi superest sepulchrum. All my business now, is to fit me for the grave. Dr Hardy preached his funeral sermon in St Catherine Creechurch on the tenth of March following, before a numerous audience of the principal magistrates in the city, his children [C], and many relations; to all whom he concludes with excellent advice. The characteristical part thereof is lately reprinted (y), in which it appears, the death of Sir THOMAS ADAMS, was not accounted a single loss; but that it was, in this one person, manifold: for, passing by private losers, the King lost a loyal subject; the Church, a faithful son; the City, a prudent senator; and the whole publick, a than with his bountiful table) he fed not only his children and servants, but all who conversed with him; among whom I can truly say, I never went to him, but I did, or might, come away from him, bettered by his gracious and prudent discourse. Nor was he only, as I doubt too many are, a man of words; his goodness was not only at his tongue's, but his fingers ends. So that he was not only in respect of his words, a sweet and pleasing voice; but of his works, a burning and shining light (4).

A D A M S O N (PATRICK) Archbishop of St Andrews. He was born March 15, 1563, in the town of Perth, descended of mean, but very honest and indulgent parents (a), who willingly afforded him all the learning that they were able. As a proof of this, they sent him to the grammar-school in the place where they dwelt, thence he went to the university of St Andrews, where he passed through a course of philosophy, and attained the degree of Master of Arts (b). Their circumstances not allowing them to maintain him any longer there, he was constrained to return home, and think of some way of getting his bread. In order to this, he removed to a little village in Fife, where he taught school, and in a short time gained such a reputation, that many gentlemen in the neighbourhood sent their sons to be educated under him (c). In this condition he continued about four years, till Mr James McGill, of Rankellor, one of the senators of the college of justice, intending to send his eldest son into France to study the Civil Law, made choice of Mr Adamson, to be his tutor or preceptor (d). With this young gentleman he set out for Paris in the year 1566, which is the first date we meet with in the memoirs of his life. In the month of June, in the same year, Mr Adamson's loyalty involved him very unluckily [A]. Neither had he escaped so easily as he did, had not Queen Mary, Dowager of France, and Sovereign of Scotland, with some of the principal nobility in the kingdom, interested themselves in his behalf (e). As soon as he recovered his liberty, he retired with his pupil to Bourges, where he and young Mr McGill both entered students of Law. He was in that city during the massacre at Paris, and the same humour prevailing there, he narrowly escaped suffering martyrdom for the Protestant Religion, living concealed no less than seven months in a certain publick house, the master of which, for his charity to hereticks, was thrown from the top thereof and beat to pieces, though upwards of seventy years old (f). While Mr Adamson lay thus in his sepulchre, as he justly called it, he wrote two excellent pieces in Latin verse, which are still extant [B]. In the year 1573, he returned into Scotland, where he married a Lawyer's daughter, probably with an intent to have furthered his progress in that science; but finding no encouragement, and standing in need of a present provision, he entered into holy orders, and became minister of Paisley (g). In the year 1575, he was appointed one of the commissioners to confer on settling the jurisdiction and policy of the Church, by the General Assembly (h). In a General Assembly held the succeeding year at Edinburgh, he, together with Mr David Lindsay, was appointed to report their proceedings to the Earl of Moreton, then Regent (i). The same year, that great nobleman appointed

[A] Mr Adamson's loyalty involved him very unluckily The occasion was this, Mary Queen of Scots, being delivered on the 19th of June, 1566, of a Prince, afterwards James VI of Scotland, and First of England (1); Mr Adamson, to shew his loyalty, and it may be also to shew his genius for Latin poetry, wrote a very fine copy of verses, which he procured to be immediately printed and published. The title of this poem ran thus, Serenissimi & Nobilissimi Scottiæ, Angliæ, Franciæ, & Hiberniæ Principis, Henrici Stuarti Illustrissimi Herois, ac Mariæ Reginæ amplissimæ Filii Genethliacum (2). i. e. A Poem on the Birth of the most Serene, and most noble Prince of Scotland, England, France, and Ireland, Son of the most illustrious Hero Henry Stuart, and of the most potent Queen Mary. This poem was published on the 25th of June, but six days after the birth of the Prince, who was the subject of it; and therefore we may be sure, that it was both written and printed in some hurry; however, the giving the titles of France, and England, to his own Prince, so much alarmed the French court, that they instantly caused him to be arrested, and might perhaps have proceeded to greater severities, if immediate applications and all possible excuses had not been made to the ministry (3), which, however, did not hinder Mr Adamson's being closely confined for six months. The English court also were not less angry, but at length, with much ado, the matter was made up.

Perhaps the reader will not be displeas'd at being put in mind, that this was a sort of prophecy, which afterwards was verified; since he whom he then stiled Prince, was actually acknowledged as King by that very title, though our author never lived to see it.

[B] In Latin verse which are still extant.] Dr Mackenzie calls the French university, at which Mr Adamson studied, Bruges (4), I cannot tell why, since the Latin writer of the Archbishop's life, from whom he had his materials, tells us expressly that it was Bourges, which is indeed a French university, and capital of the dutchy of Berry. The poems mentioned in the text, were, a Poetical Version of the Book of Job, and the Tragedy of Herod, who was smote by an Angel. Of both these he immediately sent copies to Lyons and Paris, to be printed. That which he sent to Lyons was directed to Bouillius, and that which he sent to Paris was address'd to Lambinus, but the civil wars which quickly ensued hindered their being committed to the press; and it was not till long after, that the author recovered one of the copies, and that by the greatest accident that could be. For on the death of Lambinus, his papers falling into the hands of Dr Henry Blackwood, he discovered amongst them both these pieces, and immediately transmitted them to our author, who committed them to the press in 1572, and they were received with universal applause (5).

appointed him one of his chaplains, and on the death of Bishop Douglas, raised him to the Archbishoprick of St Andrews (k), a dignity which brought him nothing but trouble and uneasiness. On October 24, 1576, the General Assembly sat at Edinburgh, and, in their seventh session, required Mr Adamson to submit himself to the tryal and examination of the Assembly, and to receive the office of a Bishop with such limitations as they thought fit, which he refused to do, whereupon they forbad the chapter of St Andrews to proceed to any election. However, after the Assembly rose, the chapter met, and elected Mr Patrick Adamson, Archbishop. The next year, the General Assembly appointed commissioners to summon the Archbishop before them, to examine into the validity of his election, and to take cognizance of various charges brought against him (l). The clamour of the Presbyterian party ran very high against him, and now they began to vent those stories first, which afterwards their authors inserted in their histories, not only contrary to truth and justice, but even to probability, and inconsistent with each other [C]. The unfortunate Prelate vainly imagining, that by displaying his zeal for Religion, his great skill in the Scriptures, and his excellent vein in Latin Poesy, he should be able to sooth the passions of these angry men; composed a Catechism in Latin verse (m). This they saw and approved, but went on persecuting him for all that [D]. In 1578, he submitted himself to the General Assembly, which procured him a little quiet, and but a little, for in 1579 a new commission was issued out to enquire into fresh charges against him, whereupon the Archbishop retired to St Andrews, and for some years they continued disputing, the Archbishop being constantly treated as an enemy to the Church, and preserved from destruction only by the power of the court (n). In 1582, the Archbishop was seized with a grievous disease, and kept himself in the castle of St Andrews, which the author of the true History of the Church of Scotland calls decently, living like a fox in a hole (o). The physicians were at a loss what to call his distemper, and could afford him little or no relief. In his distress he took some simple medicine from an old woman, whose name was Alison Pearson, which did him good (p). One would have thought such a circumstance as this, could scarce have been rendered worthy the ears of posterity; yet such was the malice of the Archbishop's enemies, that they charged the old woman with witchcraft, and the poor Prelate with seeking to the devil to save his life. On this strange charge, the woman was committed to prison, but by the Archbishop's means, as they gave out, made her escape. However, four years afterwards, she was met with again at Edinburgh, and, at the instance of the Presbyterian ministers, was fairly burnt for saving the Archbishop's life (q) [E]. In 1583, King

[C] Inconsistent with each other. We have a good deal on this subject in Dr Mackenzie's account of our author, but the doctor does not take any great pains, to show that the scandalous things said of the Archbishop are inconsistent, and therefore cannot be true, neither is he at all particular in citing authorities. To readers well acquainted with Scottish history, this might not be necessary, but to other persons it makes his account very obscure. The gross of what was alledged against him, when he became Archbishop, was what follows. 'That his father's name was Constance, a baker in Perth, and under the name of Constance, he assisted as a minister in the first General Assembly of the Kirk of Scotland, in the year 1560. After this, having deserted his ministry, he went over to France to study the laws; but upon his return, he betook himself again to the ministry, and being baulked of the Archbishoprick of St Andrews, in the month of February, 1572, he preached at St Andrews; and in his sermon told the people, that there were Three sorts of Bishops, my Lord Bishop, my Lord's Bishop, and the Lord's Bishop. My Lord Bishop was in the time of Popery. My Lord's Bishop is now, when my Lord getteth the fat of the benefice, and the Bishop seweth for a portion out of the benefice, to make my Lord's right sure; and the Lord's Bishop is the true minister of the gospel (6).' For these particulars we are referred to Petrie and Calderwood, but very probably Dr Mackenzie never consulted those authors, since Petrie expressly cites (7) another writer, for what he says of the Archbishop, who ought therefore to be reputed the author of the first part of the story at least (8). That the Archbishop's name was really Constance, is not a suggestion of late date, for we find in the continuation of Hollinshed's Chronicle (9), that he is stiled Patrick Adamson, alias Constance, in his life-time, for that book was printed in 1587. But that he became a minister before he went to France, is expressly contrary to the Archbishop's own testimony in his preface, and it can scarce be believed, that he would dare to affirm a falsehood in the face of the whole Church. The story of his preaching, is likewise inconsistent with his own account of his return into Scotland, which he places in 1573, nay, which is worse, it is not to be reconciled to their own account of the matter; for if what one of their writers says be true, that out of mere pity to his necessity, Mr Andrew Haye procured him the church of Paisley; it is impossible that he should immediately after pretend to the highest ecclesiastical preferment in the kingdom, and this too, against such a person as Mr John Douglas, Rector of the university, and a man of extraordinary interest. But to put this matter out of dispute, it must be observed, that Mr Douglas was nominated to the Archbishoprick in 1571 (10), when, without all question, Mr Adamson was out of the kingdom, so that he could not be piqued at missing the Archbishoprick. How such stories came to be broached, is no hard matter to discover, since we find Calderwood telling us expressly, and with triumph, that when he opposed the Kirk, certain writers set him forth in his colours, which is neither better nor worse, than countenancing men of great spleen to write any thing that came into their heads, provided always the enemies of the Kirk were the objects of their invectives. The English histories at the same time, discover this to have been too much practised here, as the reader may find by consulting the article of AILMER, or of ARTHINGTON.

[D] Went on persecuting him for all that. The title of this work was, Catechismus Latino Carmine redditus, & in Libros quatuor digestus 1577 (11), i. e. The Catechism rendered into Latin Verse, and digested into four Books. This was written for the use of the young King, and was received with such universal applause, that Mr Robert Pont, who was both a minister and a Judge, and Mr James Lawson, both warm in the prosecution of our author, could not forbear publishing two very fine Latin poems in praise of that performance (12). It was also much admired in England, in France, and in the Low-Countries, where the author was already well known by his Latin translation of the Confession of Faith, which he procured to be printed, while he resided in France, at the hazard of his life.

[E] Fairly burnt for saving the Archbishop's life. Petrie mentions this story of the witch twice (13), once from the books of the General Assembly, and a

King James VI, coming to St Andrews, our Prelate, who was now pretty well recovered, preached before him, and maintained the dignity of his order with great spirit and elocution, and also disputed with Mr Andrew Melvin before the King, with great reputation (r). This drew upon him new calumnies, and fresh persecutions [F]. The King, however, was so well satisfied of the Archbishop's wisdom and loyalty, that he sent him his Ambassador to Queen Elizabeth, in which quality he resided for some years, at London. As to his conduct there, nothing can be more different, than the reports thereof by several authors. Thus much however is certain, that by his eloquent preaching, he drew after him such a concourse of people, and raised in their minds such a high idea of the young King his master, that Queen Elizabeth forbade him to enter the pulpit, during his stay in her dominions (s). But still the Bishops, and such Noblemen as were zealous for the interest of the Church, received our Bishop kindly, and treated him very respectfully, doing all that in their power lay to make the difficulties he laboured under, which were not a few, some way tolerable to him (t). There seems to be no reason to doubt, that the two things he principally laboured, were the recommending the King his master, to the nobility and gentry of England, and the procuring some support for himself, and the Episcopal party in Scotland, which was then in a very low state. In each of these designs, he had as much success as the situation of things at that time, and his own unlucky circumstances, would allow: his revenues were far from being large, and his skill in managing them was very indifferent. His enemies took occasion from thence, to represent him as an extravagant man, and a great dilapidator; his friends, with more humanity and truth, said, that he had spent too much time about other sciences, to be well skilled in œconomy. As to his intriguing with the Spanish Ambassador, or having any concern in that which was called Throgmorton's conspiracy, though they are charged upon him with great confidence (u) by some writers, yet it seems to be without any foundation; since it can scarce be imagined that the Spanish Ambassador, Mendoza, who was himself a zealot, or any of the violent Papists, who were dipped in those dark designs, should have any confidence in a Protestant Prelate, who had written with great force and freedom against their religion, and who was withal, a person needy in circumstances, and of a timorous disposition [G]. Soon after the execution of the first Earl of Gowry, viz. In the year 1584, the Archbishop was recalled, and sat in the Parliament, which was held about the end of August at Edinburgh. In that Parliament, several acts were made for settling the peace of the kingdom, and for establishing the King's authority in Ecclesiastical affairs (w). Yet this produced little effect, the ministers refused absolutely to pay obedience, and because the Archbishop preached often before the King, persons were encouraged to beat at the church doors in order to disturb him; and most outrageous second time, from a piece called the Historical Narration, but Calderwood tells us the story more plainly (14). 'Mr Patrick Adamson, called commonly Bishop of St Andrews, had kept his castle, like a fox in a hole, a long time, diseased of a great Feditie, as he himself called his disease. He sought cure of women suspected of witchcraft, namely of one who was apprehended, tried by the Presbyterie, and committed to the castle to be kept to farther trial, but suffered by him to escape: yet was she apprehended within three or four years after, and was executed in Edinburgh. He kept his castle since the assembly holden in April, 1582.' This is but one, out of many passages, wherein this heavy charge of applying to a witch, is over and over repeated, though the reader may please to observe, that it was then very customary, nor is it yet uncommon, for women in that part of the world, to pretend to great skill in curing chronic distempers, such as this of the Archbishop's seems to have been, since he was afterwards advised to go to the Spaw for cure.

[F] New calumnies and fresh persecutions. Let the reader take it in Mr Calderwood's own words. 'When the King cometh to St Andrews, he becometh a whole man, occupied the pulpit incontinent, declared before the King against the ministry and the lords, and their proceeding. He professed before, that he had not the gift of application, now he applyeth, but inspired with another spirit, than faithful ministers use to be. In his sermon he affirmed for certain, that the Duke of Lennox died a Protestant, having in his hand a scroll, which he called the Duke's Testament. A merchant woman sitting before the pulpit, and spying narrowly, affirmed that the scroll was account of four or five years old debt, which a few days before, she had sent to him. It is true, the Duke refused to take the sacrament out of a priest's hand, when he was dying, but had received it before, as was reported, out of the Bishop of Glasgow's hand (15).'

(15) Ibid. p. 141.

[G] Of a timorous disposition. Calderwood having reported the order made by Queen Elizabeth, for the Spanish Ambassador's quitting her kingdom, proceeds thus, 'Let the reader then judge what could move Mr Patrick Adamson to quake and tremble, when Francis Throgmorton was apprehended. What business could he have with the Spanish Ambassador? And upon what ground did he maintain, that liberty of conscience was expedient? Was it not because he was in working, and he was privy to it? And seeing the Duke of Guise was to be chief ring-leader of the invasion abovementioned, Who will believe that the Duke of Lennox was not privy to it? If he had stayed, by all appearance, this plot had been very far advanced (16).' Father Parsons, in one of his books, gives us some light into this embassy. For having first introduced a discourse concerning the excessive pride of the Presbyterian ministers in Scotland, he then makes the person into whose mouth he put it, proceed thus, 'And so, said I of late, to their most reverend and worthy Prelate and Primate, the Archbishop of St Andrews, with whom it was my luck to come acquainted in London, whither he was come by his King's appointment (as he said) to treat certain affairs with our Queen and council. And talking with him of this disorder of his ministry, he confessed the same with much grief of mind, and told me, that he had preached thereof before the King himself, detesting and accusing diverse heads thereof, for which cause, he was become very odious to them, and other of their faction, both in Scotland, and England. But he said, that as he had given the reasons of his doings unto our Queen, so meaneth he shortly to do the same unto Mr Beza, and to the whole Church of Geneva, by sending thither the articles of his and their doings; protesting unto me, that the proceedings and attempts of those factious and corrupt men, was most scandalous, seditious, and perilous, both to the King's person and to the Realm; being sufficient indeed to alienate wholly the young Prince from all affection to our Religion, when he shall see the chief professors thereof, to behave themselves so undutifully towards him (17).'

geous libels were every where scattered against him, in order to ruin his reputation, and make him odious to the people. To abate, if possible, this temper in the people, and to set things in a true light, the King caused a declaration to be made by the Archbishop of St Andrews, of the reasons which induced those laws, and obliged his majesty and his council to see them put in execution. This declaration was published in the month of January, 1685, and was so well received by all wise and discreet men, that in the month of February, it was reprinted at London with great applause, contributing highly to the Archbishop's reputation, who seemed now to be in a fair way of overcoming all his difficulties, as he certainly would have done, if the court had been more steady; this declaration having procured King James many friends in England (x) [H]. But things did not remain in this situation, for the Kirk faction being obstinate, and indefatigable, soon gained ground again, drawing in several great men to countenance them, and at last making use of open force, which so intimidated the King, that by a new declaration he disavowed that formerly mentioned (y). In the month of April, 1586, a provincial Synod was held at St Andrews, wherein the Archbishop was present, but he was soon accused, and, notwithstanding his defence, excommunicated, whereupon, a day or two after, he excommunicated Mr James Melvin, who was moderator at the Synod; and, in respect to his own excommunication, appealed to the King, and the States of the kingdom; however, this did him little good, for the mob being let loose upon him, he durst scarce appear in publick, in the city of St Andrews (z). At the next General Assembly held at Edinburgh in the same year, a paper containing the Archbishop's submission, dated May 20, 1586, was produced, whereupon, the Assembly absolved him from the excommunication, and the King and council directed that he should read a divinity lecture in St Servator's College at St Andrews (a). In 1587, complaint was made to the General Assembly, that the Bishop had suffered himself to be denounced rebel, and put to the Horn, that is, in plain English, outlawed, because he could not pay his debts, but upon the motion of the King's commissioners, all proceedings were stayed (b). In 1588, the Archbishop was again cited before the General Assembly, for marrying the Earl of Huntley to his Countess, without obliging the Earl to subscribe a confession of his faith, and he not appearing, a commission was granted to try him for that and other crimes objected to him (c). In the beginning of 1590, our Prelate published the Lamentations of the Prophet Jeremiah, in Latin verse, which he dedicated to the King, complaining of the hard usage he had met with. In the latter end of the same year, he published a translation of the Apocalypse, in Latin verse, which he also dedicated to the King (d), yet neither these, nor a moving copy of Latin verses, written to his majesty in his deep distress, procured him any favour (e). On the contrary, the King finding the Archbishop no longer of use to him, granted the revenue of his see to the Duke of Lenox, whereby the unfortunate Prelate with his family, came, in a literal sense, to want bread (f). At this very time, the Assembly intercepted Letters from Dr Bancroft, chaplain to the Archbishop of Canterbury, to our Archbishop Adamson, certifying him of the great respect the English clergy had for him, and blaming him for not taking sanctuary amongst his friends in that country (g). These letters never came to his hands, but the brethren taking advantage of the poor Prelate's miserable circumstances, and great weakness both in body and mind, procured his subscription to a most abject form of submission, and that, by giving him a poor collection for the immediate relief of his family's necessities (h). Thus he lingered out, till the latter end of the year 1591, his uncomfortable life, dying with very different characters from his countrymen, as the reader will see in the notes [I]. But as to what his enemies charitably asserted, of his being senseless

[H] This declaration procured King James many friends in England.] This declaration is still preserved at length, in Thinn's continuation of Hollinshed's history of Scotland (18), wherein the reader may peruse it, and therein find the true ground of that inveterate hatred, which was borne to our prelate by the presbyterian clergy; since, to say the truth, it is by far the boldest and strongest picture that was ever drawn, of their haughty behaviour towards their Prince, and towards his people. We need not therefore wonder, at the following account of the matter by Calderwood, which shews the spirit both of the man and his party.

The acts of parliament holden the last May, were so tossed among the subjects, and disliked by good men, that the court was forced to set Mr Patrick Adamson, that chief devisor, on work, to make a declaration of the meaning, and that in the King's name. This declaration came to light in January, and was after so greedily embraced by the English Bishops, that after the printing of it here, it was reprinted with an odious preface of alleged treasons prefixed unto it, and to preserve the memory of it, insert in the Chronicle of England, compiled by Hollinshed, and continued by Francis Thinne. Our Kirk was ever careful, and especially at the same time, to entertain the amity between the two nations, and deserved no such indignity at their hands. But let such a lying libel lie there, as a blur to blot their Chronicles (19).

[I] As the reader will see in the notes] In order to support what we have said in the text, we shall here set down three characters of him; the first by Calderwood, who tells us, that in the month of April 1591, he subscribed a long recantation, which he inserts in his history, and desired assistance for the support of his family. Afterwards he tells us, he sent to the Presbyterie at St Andrews, and desired to be absolved from the sentence of excommunication. 'The brethren doubting whether his desire proceeded from trouble of mind, or if it was a shift only to get some support, directed Mr James Melvill, and Mr Andrew Moncrief, to try him. As soon as he saw Mr James, he pulled off his cap, and cried, Forgive me, forgive me, for God's sake, Mr James, for I have many ways offended you. Mr James forgave him, and exhorted him to unfeigned repentance. When he was asked, if he acknowledged the validity of the sentence of excommunication pronounced against him. He interrupted Mr James, and cried pitifully, and often, Loose me for Christ's sake. At their report, the brethren with prayer and thanksgiving absolved him (20).' Archbishop Spotwood, gives somewhat a different account of this transaction, and a better character of our author. His words are fenfelefs in his laft moments, it is fo flagrant a falshood, that we have preferved an inftance of his having almoft in the article of death, the nobleft and moft pious fentiments [K]. are thefe (21). ‘ In this Affembly certain articles were prefented, fubfcribed by the Archbishop of St Andrews, allowing the prebyterial difcipline, and condemning the government epifcopal; which were afterwards imprinted, under the title of Mr Patrick Adamfon’s Recantation. The Bifhop lay bedfaft at the time, and was fallen into great neceffity by his own mifgovernment, whereof his adverfaries taking advantage, it was devifed, that he fhould be vifited by fome of the brethren, and defired to leave a teftimony under his hand, of his opinion of matters of difcipline. This being moved unto him, he faid, that he did not trouble himfelf with fuch thoughts at that time, and had never allowed of any other Bifhop in the Church, but St Paul’s Bifhop, which he would willingly fet his hand to. Upon this his answer, were thefe articles drawn up, and fubfcribed by him; whether he knew what was contained in them, or that he was induced thereto, by a poor collection that they gave him in the time, (for fo the report went) or otherwife, it is uncertain: but when it was told him that fuch a recantation was published in his name, he complained heavily of the wrong that was done him, and committing his caufe to God, ended his days in the year 1591. A man he was of great learning, and a moft perfwafive preacher, but an ill adminiftrator of the Church patrimony, which brought him to the mifery that is pitiful to think of. Diverfe works he left; of which fome are extant, which fhew his learning: but his Prelections upon the Epiftle to Timothy, which were moft defired, falling into the hands of his adverfaries were fuppreffed.’ Mr Wilfon, who published our Prelate’s works, talks of him in much ftronger terms (22): ‘ He was, fays he, a Prelate endowed with fuch excellent qualifications, both as to mind and body, that he was a miracle of nature; and rather feemed to be the immediate production of God Almighty, than born of a woman; being a profound Theologue, an incomparable Poet, an eloquent Orator, well feen in the Greek, and Latin languages: a Prelate of great prudence, experience, and wifdom, in the management of affairs, fkillful in the civil and canon-law; and of fo happy a memory, that he did not know what it was to forget any thing, that he had either heard or read; fo that the death of fuch a perfon, who was the glory of his country, and of the republick of letters, can never be too much lamented.’

[K] The nobleft and moft pious fentiments. We are told by the charitable Mr Calderwood, that Mr David Black, a man mighty in doctrine, and of fingular fidelity and diligence in the calling of the miniftry, came to Mr Patrick (fo he calls the Archbishop) in February, the year following, (1591) when he was drawing near his end, and found him, as he lived, fenfelefs (23). The following Latin verfes written a very little while before he breathed his laft, will fhew what frame of mind he was in, and what reafons Mr David Black had for departing, as Mr Calderwood fays he did, with a heavy heart.

Worn with thy exile in this painful life,
Prepare to quit thy plagues, contemn the cares
Of this low world, and speed thee from its snares.
Lo! the great God, who every good bestows,
Bids thee forfake thy body, and thy woes.
While the kind author of our happier fate,
His suffering Son, expands the heavenly gate.
O haste thee! haste thee! to thy native sky,
Leave here thy pains, to endless quiet fly.
This breathless trunk, this putrid fleshy cafe
Tho’ worms invade, and kindred clay embrace,
Shall hear th’ angelick trump; again arise,
And, thou refuming, bear it to the skies.
See the blest day, see how the Lamb appears!
Hard by his cross! O how his bleeding cheeks!
On these depending, speed thee in thy flight,
In thy new friends bow much wilt thou delight?
Dear God, in thee, in thee, O God most dear,
Whose name be mention’d still with holy fear,
My faith firm fix’d for ever shall abide,
Living I trust, and dying I confide.

ADDISON (LANCELOT), the fon of another Lancelot Addison, a clergyman, was born at Mauldiffeburne, in the parish of Crosby Ravenworth, in Westmorland (a), in the year 1632 (b), but the day is not certain. He received the first tincture of letters, in the grammar-school of Appleby, in the same county. Thence, in the year 1650, he was sent by his relations to Queen’s college in Oxford, where he became first a poor child on the foundation (c), but quickly distinguishing himself by his lively parts, and strict application to learning, he, on the twenty-fifth of January, 1654, was admitted to the degree of Bachelor of Arts (d); continuing still in the university, on the fourth of July, 1657, he became Master of Arts, and being then much taken notice of for his sprightly wit, was made choice of to be one of the Terræ Filii, for the A&T which was celebrated in 1658. But his loyalty getting the better of his prudence, he bore so hard in his oration, on the pride, hypocrisy, ignorance, and avarice, of those then in power, that he was compelled to make a recantation, and to ask pardon for the offence given, on his knees. Shortly after he retired from the university, out of disgust, in all probability, for the usage he had received (e). He chose for his retreat a village a village in the neighbourhood of Petworth, and spent his time in visiting such loyal gentlemen, as had seats in the county of Suffex, where with great zeal and steadiness he promoted amongst their youth (when it was most dangerous) principles of loyalty, and the tenets of the Church of England. On the restoration of King Charles II, the gentlemen of that county recommended him to Dr King, Bishop of Chichester, as a man of a found head and honest heart, one who had suffered much, and run the hazard of suffering much more, for his attachment to the constitution in Church and State. The Bishop received him kindly, and, in all probability, would have provided for him, if Mr Addison had not accepted the post of chaplain to the garrison of Dunkirk, contrary to his lordship's inclination (f). In 1662, when that place was delivered up to the French, Mr Addison returned to England, where he did not remain long, an offer being made him, of going chaplain to the garrison settled at Tangier, with which he closed, and went thither the next year. He continued there about seven years, during which space he improved, with the utmost care and diligence, the great abilities he received from nature, and that large stock of acquired knowledge, which he carried from the university. He was in great favour with the famous Earl of Tiviot, who was Governor, and Colonel Norwood, Deputy Governor, of that garrison, and employed by them in matters of great importance (g). In the beginning of the year 1670, having settled all things relating to his office in a regular and easy state, and taken all imaginable precaution, for the security of the Protestant religion in that garrison, he thought he might without offence make a voyage into England, in order to look after his private affairs, which he accordingly did, and was well received here by persons of the first distinction. He was made chaplain in ordinary to his majesty Charles II, soon after his coming over (h), yet his office of chaplain at Tangier, though he had no intent of quitting it, was conferred upon another, whereby Mr Addison was not a little streightened for a subsistence. In this situation of affairs, Mr Wood tells us, that a worthy Knight in the county of Wilts, took him under his protection, and bestowed on him the rectory of Milston near Amesbury, in Wilts (i), which is said to have been worth about one hundred and twenty pounds per annum. He also obtained the prebend of minor pars Altaris, in the cathedral church of Sarum, and on the sixth of July 1675, took the degrees of bachelor and doctor in divinity, at Oxford (k). His spiritual preferments, though they were not very considerable, enabled him to live decently and hospitably in the country. He discharged his duty in his parish with a conscientious diligence, and employed his spare time in studying and in writing for the support of true religion, and of the Church of England, of which he was a most dutiful son. He lived likewise in terms of the strictest friendship with the most eminent persons of his neighbourhood, who were equally edified by the innocence of his life, and charmed with his pleasing and instructive conversation. In 1683, the commissioners for ecclesiastical affairs, on account of his services at Tangier, and to make good his great losses by fire at Milston, bestowed upon him the deanery of Litchfield (l), in which he was installed the third of July in the same year (m). Mr Wood supposes that he was then Archdeacon of Coventry (n), but in that he was mistaken, for Dr Addison was collated to that archdeaconry, on the eighth of December 1684 (o), and held it with his deanery in commendam. In the convocation which met on the fourth of December, 1689, Dean Addison was present, and was one of the committee, appointed by the lower house, to acquaint the lords, that they had consented to a conference on the subject of an address to the King (p). It is said that he might have been made a Bishop after the Revolution, if he had not in this convocation, and elsewhere, manifested such a zeal for the Church, as gave a handle for misrepresenting him to those in power. He enjoyed however a just and general reputation grounded on the uprightness of his life, and on the many learned and useful treatises he had published, a distinct account of which, the reader will find in a note [A]. He departed this life

[A] A distinct account of which the reader will find in a note.] I. West Barbary: or, a short narrative of the revolutions of the kingdoms of Fez and Morocco, with an account of the present customs, sacred, civil, and domestick, by Lancelot Addison, Chaplain to his majesty in ordinary. Printed at the theatre in Oxford, and are to be sold by John Wilmot, 1671, in octavo, containing in the whole 226 pages, of which the revolutions in the kingdoms of Fez and Morocco take up seventy-one, and the description of West Barbary, and the rest. This book is dedicated To the most worthy and truly honourable Joseph Williamson, Esq; who from this and other dedications, appears to have been the author's great patron. The history is written with great plainness and perspicuity, but in a style visibly less pure than his subsequent productions, which, in all probability, might be owing to his long absence from his native country. Besides a curious detail of the revolutions in Barbary, and a very accurate account both of the country and of the inhabitants, there is in this little piece a multitude of curious particulars, related by the author on his own knowledge, which fully supports what he says in the preface, that his book was not composed from the accounts given him by others, but was the fruit of diligent observations, and many years enquiries (1).

II. The present state of the Jews, (more particularly relating to those in Barbary) wherein is contained an exact account of their customs, secular and religious; to which is annexed, a summary discourse of the Mishna, Talmud, and Gemara. By L. Addison, one of his majesty's Chaplains in ordinary, and the author of the late revolutions, and present customs, of the kingdoms of Fez and Morocco. London: printed by J. C. for William Crooke, at the Green Dragon without Temple-Bar, and to be sold by John Courtney, bookseller in Sarum, 1675, in octavo, containing 249 pages. This book is also dedicated to his former patron, under the title of, the Right Honourable Sir Joseph Williamson, Principal Secretary of State, &c. It is dated from Milston near Ambros-Bury, in Wilts, January 28, 1674-5. This treatise contains twenty-six chapters, exclusive of some considerations on the obstructions which at present hinder the conversion of the Jews, and the summary discourse mentioned in the title. The author himself acknowledges, that he composed this as well on the twentieth of April, 1703, in the seventy-first year of his age. He was twice married; first to Jane, daughter of Nathaniel Gulston, Esq; and sister to Dr William Gulston, Bishop of Bristol, by whom he had three sons, and as many daughters. His second wife was Dorothy, daughter to John Danvers of Shackerston, in the county of Leicester, Esq; who survived him, and by whom he had no issue. As to his offspring by his first wife, they were born in the following order. Jane, on the twenty-third of April, 1671, who died in her infancy. Joseph, on the first of May, 1672, of whom in the next article. Gulston, in April, 1673, who died governor of Fort St George, in the East-Indies. Dorothy, in May, 1674, who married first Dr Sartre, formerly minister at Montpellier, afterwards prebendary of Westminster, some time after whose decease, she became the wife of Daniel Combes, Esq; Anne, in April, 1676, who died young. Lancelot, in 1680, who was Fellow of Magdalen College in Oxford, and much admired in the university, for his great skill in the classicks (q). Dean Addison was buried in the church-yard of the cathedral of Litchfield, at the entrance of the west door. as the former piece, while he was abroad; but without question he revised it in England, since the disposition of it is perfectly regular, the stile natural and easy, and the whole interspersed with many learned remarks, and moral reflections. It is really strange, that this judicious and excellent treatise is so little known, for it is certainly one of the best that was ever composed on this subject; and tho' many have been written since, yet the merit of this is far from being effaced. For according to our author's motto. Alius alio plura invenire potest, nemo omnia.

(1) In this treatise, wherever our author relates a fact of his own knowledge, he adds such circumstances of time and place, as shew he trusted nothing to memory, which renders his observations much more valuable, than those of other travellers in those parts, who write avowedly from hearsay, or at best from recollection.

III. The primitive institution: or, a seasonable discourse of catechizing, wherein is shewn the antiquity, benefits, and necessity thereof; together with its suitability to heal the present distempers of the Church of England, by L. Addison, one of his majesty's Chaplains in ordinary, and the author of the present state of the Jews (2).

IV. A modest plea for the Clergy; wherein is briefly considered, the original, antiquity, and necessity, of that calling, together with the spurious and genuine occasions of their present contempt. London, 1677, octavo. In another edition the title suffered some little alteration, for we find it run thus; A modest plea for the Clergy; wherein is considered, the reasons why the Clergy are so contemned and neglected, by L. A. D. D. and Dean of Litchfield. The celebrated Dr Hickee, having met with the first edition of this book, reprinted it, together with Dr Heylyn's discourse on tythes, and a sermon on the sacerdotal benediction, by one Samuel Gibson, as proper antidotes to the Rights of the Christian Church, by Tindal. This piece came out in octavo, in the year 1709, and Dr Hickee, in his preface, declares, that he did not know whether the author of the first discourse, was a clergyman or a layman, but was inclined to think him a layman, which shews how easily the most learned men may be deceived.

V. The first state of Mahometism, or an account of the author and doctrine of that imposture. London, 1678, octavo. This book was printed the next year, under the title of The life and death of Mahomet, the author of the Turkish religion, &c. containing a hundred and thirty-six pages. The book is divided into twenty-four chapters, and the author's design therein, as he himself acquaints us, was to give a faithful account of the life and doctrine of Mahomet, stript of fable and prejudice. In 1687, the bookseller, William Crooke, sent it forth with a new and much more copious title, but as to the work itself, it was without alteration or addition.

VI. An introduction to the sacrament; or a short, safe, and plain way to the communion table, collected for, and rendered familiar to, every particular communicant, by L. Addison, D. D. 1681.

There was a second edition of the beforementioned book, in 1686, to which there was then added, The communicant's assistant; being a collection of devotions to that purpose, in 12mo, containing 153 pages.

VII. A discourse of Tangier, under the government of the Earl of Triviot, London, 4to 1685, second edition.

VIII. The Catechumen; or an account given by the young person to the minister, of his knowledge in religion, upon his first admission to the Lord's table. Recommended to the press, by two eminent divines of the Church of England. London, William Crooke, 1690, 12mo, containing one hundred pages. One of these eminent divines appears to have been Dean Addison himself, and the other was Dr Scot, and therefore it hath been presumed, that this book was not his; though it is ascribed to him in several catalogues (3).

IX. ΧΡΙΣΤΟΣ 'ΑΤΤΟ'ΘΕΟΣ; or, an historical account of the heresy, denying the godhead of Christ. London: for Robert Clavel, at the peacock in St Paul's Church-yard, 1696, 12mo, containing 107 pages. This is a most excellent book, comprehending in a very narrow compass the history of various heresies, clearly and fairly stated from original authors, for the use probably of such as were unable to read those authors in Greek or Latin.

X. The Christian's daily sacrifice duly performed; or a practical discourse teaching the right performance of prayer. By L. Addison, Dean of Litchfield. Printed for Robert Clavel, 1698, 12mo.

XI. An account of the Millennium, the genuine use of the two sacraments, viz. Baptism and the Lord's-supper, with the Christian's obligation frequently to receive the latter.

[B] The reader will find at the bottom of the page.] The following epitaph is on his tomb-stone in the church-yard.

ADDISON (JOSEPH) the son of Dean Addison, spoken of in the last article. He was born at Milston near Ambros-Bury, in the county of Wilts, of which place his father was then Rector, on the first of May, 1672; and being not thought likely to live, was baptized on the same day, as appears from the church register.

register [A]. When he grew up to an age fit for going to school, he was first put under the care of the reverend Mr Naish, at Ambros-Bury. He was afterwards removed to a school at Salisbury, taught by the reverend Mr Taylor, and thence to the Charter-House, where he was under the tuition of the learned Dr Ellis, and where he contracted an intimacy with Mr Steele, afterwards Sir Richard, which lasted as long as Mr Addison lived (a). He was not above fifteen when he went to the university of Oxford, where he was entered of Queen's College, in which his father had studied (b). He addicted himself at this time with such diligence to classical learning, that he acquired an elegant Latin style, before he arrived at that age in which lads usually begin to write good English. A paper of his verses in that tongue, fell by accident, in the year 1687, into the hands of Dr Lancafter, Dean of Magdalen College, who was so pleased with them, that he immediately procured their author's election into that house (c), where he took the degrees of Bachelor, and Master of Arts. His Latin poetry in the course of a few years was exceedingly admired in both the universities, and justly gained him the reputation of a great poet [B], before his name was so much as known in town (d). He was twenty-two years of age before he published any thing in our language, and then came abroad a short copy of verses addressed to Mr Dryden, which procured him immediately, and that very deservedly, from the best judges in that nice age, a great reputation, being as correct and perfect as any thing, which even himself afterwards produced (e). Some little space intervening, he sent into the world a translation of the fourth Georgick of Virgil, (omitting the story of Aristæus) exceedingly commended by Mr Dryden (f). He wrote also that discourse on the Georgicks, which is prefixed to them by way of preface in Mr Dryden's translation, and is allowed to be one of the justest pieces of criticism [C] in our own or in any other language (g). The next year he wrote several poems of different kinds, amongst the rest, one dated the third of April, 1694, directed to Mr H. S. [D] that is, Henry Sacheverell, who was afterwards so famous (h). The following year he began to have higher views, which discovered themselves

[A] From the church register.] One may justly wonder, that in the account given of Mr Addison in Wood's history of the Oxford writers, his true age should be set down (1), and yet that it should escape Mr Tickell (2). This is of some importance, because it changes the whole chronology of the life, and that too in favour of the author. He became a Demy of Magdalen College in Oxford, by merit, at the age of seventeen (3). Is not the bare relation of this the highest panegyrick on Mr Addison? It was here he became acquainted with Mr Sacheverell, who was exactly of his own age, and of a very promising genius too, since we find a translation of part of the first Georgick of Virgil, inserted in the Examen Poeticum, for the year 1693 (4), the same volume in which Mr Addison's first English verses appeared; and as Mr Addison's verses were addressed to Mr Dryden, so Mr Sacheverell's translation was dedicated to him. Those who remember Mr Addison at college, affirm, that his temper was the same it appeared ever afterwards, that is to say, his abilities were exceeded by nothing, but his modesty.

[B] The reputation of a great poet.] It is not very certain at what age our author wrote some of the Latin poems which have been published; however, they were certainly written very early, and they still retain that high esteem which was first conceived of them. They were published in the second volume of Musarum Anglicanarum Analecæ, seu Poemata quedam melioris notæ, seu hætenus inedita, seu sparsim edita (5). They were eight in all, but very probably they are not placed in the order of time in which they were written. 1. Pax Gulielmi Auspiciis Europæ reddita, 1697. i. e. Peace under the auspice of William restored to Europe. 2. Barometri Descriptio, i. e. A description of the Barometer. 3. ΠΥΓΜΑΙΟΓΕΠΑΝΟΜΑΧΙΑ, five Prælium inter Pigmæos & Græcos commissum, i. e. A battle between the Pigmies and the Cranes. 4. Resurrectio delineata ad altare Coll. Magd. Oxon. i. e. A Poem upon the Resurrection, being a description of the painting over the altar in Magdalen College at Oxford. 5. Sphæristerium, i. e. the Bowling-Green. 6. Ad D. D. Hannæ insignissimum Medicum, & Poetam, i. e. To Dr Hanne, an excellent Physician and Poet, an ode. 7. Machina gesticulantes, Anglice, A Puppet Show. 8. Ad insignissimum Virum D. T. Burnetum, Sacræ Theoriæ telluris auctorem, i. e. To the celebrated Dr Thomas Burnet, author of the Theory of the Earth, an ode (6). These poems have been translated into English, by Dr George Sewell, of Peterhouse, Cambridge. Mr Newcomb, and Nicholas Amhurst, Esq; both of Oxford (7).

would be equally tedious, and impertinent, to dwell in these notes on every little piece published by our author. It is a kind of charity to illustrate the beauties of an obscure author, but to us it appears a sort of detraction, to suppose that the worth of any of Mr Addison's poems, should be unknown to our readers. We will therefore confine ourselves to such parts of his works, as have any circumstances relating to them which ought to be preserved, as a kind of historical commentary, for the use rather of posterity, than of the present times. Mr Tickell, in his preface to the works of Mr Addison, expresses a kind of surprize, that Mr Dryden, who so readily owned the version of the fourth Georgick sent him by Mr Addison, should not take notice of his having communicated the Essay on the Georgicks, since it came from the same hand. Sir Richard Steele took occasion to vindicate Mr Dryden (8), by shewing, first, that the Essay upon the Georgicks, is the same with the preface prefixed to those poems, in Mr Dryden's translation of Virgil's works; which, (9) secondly, is owned to have come from a friend, whose name is not mentioned, because he desired to have it concealed (10). If any one should enquire, why Mr Addison was content the world should know he translated one of Virgil's Georgicks, and at the same time, desired to conceal his writing, what Mr Dryden placed as a preface to his translation of the Georgicks, it will be no difficult thing to satisfy him. The version was what many people had done, and any body might do, but the essay was an untried strain of criticism, which bore a little hard on the old professors of that art, and therefore was not so fit for a young man to take upon himself. In this light Mr Dryden's justice, and Mr Addison's prudence, are alike conspicuous. The former was above assuming unjustly the praise of other people's writings, and the latter was remarkable for keeping so strict a rein upon his wit, that it never got the start of his wisdom.

[D] Directed to Mr H. S.] Among all our author's poems, there is not one which is more properly an original, than this account of the greatest English poets, to Mr Henry Sacheverell, nor will a judicious reader find more pleasure in reading any of his works, than in perusing this. The judgment of a great poet on the writings of his predecessors, written in the dawn of his days, when, without doubt, he spoke more freely than he would have afterwards done, must always be considered as a curiosity. I should not however have stopt at this poem, had it not been to quote some lines from it, which, if carefully considered, seem to carry in them some memoirs of our author's life. Towards the conclusion of the poem he says (11),

themselves in a poem to King William, on one of his campaigns, addressed to the Lord Keeper (Sir John Somers). That judicious statesman received this mark of a young author's attachment with great humanity, took Mr Addison thenceforward into the number of his friends, and gave him, upon all occasions, signal proofs of a sincere esteem (i). He had been very pressingly solicited, while at the university, to enter into holy orders [E], which he seemed once resolved on, probably in respect to his father, but his great modesty inclining him to doubt of his own abilities, he receded from this choice (k), and having shewn an inclination to travel, his beforementioned patron, out of zeal for his country, as well as respect to Mr Addison, procured him from crown an annual pension of three hundred pounds, which enabled him to make a tour to Italy, the latter end of 1699 (l). His Latin poems dedicated to Mr Montagu, then Chancellor of the Exchequer, were printed before his departure in the Muse Anglicanae, and were as much admired abroad, as they could possibly be at home, particularly by the great Boileau [F], who spoke of them in very obliging terms, and who was known to be both an able judge, and one incapable of partiality (m). In 1701, Mr Addison wrote from Italy an epistolary poem (n) to (Montagu) Lord Halifax, this was very justly admired as a most finished piece in it's kind, and indeed some have pronounced it the very best of Mr Addison's performances (o) [G]. On his return, he published an account

Congreve whose fancy's unexhausted store
Has given already much, and promis'd more,
Congreve shall still preserve thy fame alive,
And Dryden's muse shall in his friend survive.

I'm tir'd with rhyming and wou'd fain give o'er,
But justice still demands one labour more:
The noble Montagu remains unnam'd,
For wit, for humour, and for judgment fam'd.
To Dorset he directs his artful muse
In numbers, such, as Dorset's self might use.
How negligently graceful he unreins
His verse, and writes in loose familiar strains.
How Nassau's godlike acts adorn his lines,
And all the hero in full glory shines.
We see his armies set in just array,
And Boyne's dy'd waves run purple to the sea.
Nor Simois choak'd with men, and arms, and blood,
Nor rapid Xanthus' celebrated flood,
Shall longer be the poet's highest themes, Tho' gods and heroes fought promiscuous in their streams.
But now to Nassau's secret councils rais'd,
He aids the hero whom before he prais'd.

Two remarks may be made on these lines; the first, that Mr Congreve about this time, had introduced Mr Addison to the acquaintance of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, as Sir Richard Steele informs us (12); the other, that Mr Sacheverell had not as yet any qualms about the Revolution, otherwise his friend would not have writ to him in these terms. This is very honourable for our author, since it makes it clear, that when he differed afterwards with this gentleman (13), he did not differ from himself, but adhered to those principles which Sacheverell had deserted.

[E] To enter into holy orders.] This conduct of Mr Addison, with respect to the priesthood, hath occasioned some dispute. Let us first support what is advanced in the text, viz. that he had once made a kind of resolution to go into orders. His own words will best prove this. He concludes the poem to Mr Sacheverell thus:

I've done at length, and now, dear friend, receive
The last poor present, that my Muse can give.
I leave the arts of poetry and verse,
To them that practise them with more success.
Of greater truths I'll now prepare to tell,
And so at once, dear Friend, and Muse, farewell (14).

Mr Tickell, speaking of these lines, adds, after telling us that he founded this resolution on the importunities of his father, the following account of his abandoning that design. 'His remarkable seriousness and modesty, which might have been urged as powerful reasons for his choosing that life, proved the chief obstacles to it. These qualities by which the priesthood is so much adorned, represented the duties of it as too weighty for him, and rendered him still more worthy of that honour, which they made him decline (15).'

Sir Richard Steele, speaking to Mr Congreve of this passage, says, 'These, you know very well, were not the reasons which made Mr Addison turn his thoughts to the civil world; and as you were the inducement of his becoming acquainted with my Lord Halifax, I doubt not but you remember the warm instances that noble Lord made to the head of the college, not to insist upon Mr Addison's going into orders; his arguments were founded upon the general pravity and corruption of men of business, who wanted liberal education; and I remember, as if I had read the letter yesterday, that my Lord ended with a compliment, that however he might be represented as no friend to the Church, he would never do it any other injury, than keeping Mr Addison out of it. The contention for this man in his early years, among the people of the greatest power, Mr Secretary Tickell, the executor for his fame, is pleased to ascribe to a serious visage, and modesty of behaviour (16).'
This last remark is equally ill-natured, and ill-founded. Sir Richard introduces Mr Addison's visage; but the seriousness Mr Tickell spoke of, was the quality of his mind. The gentleman accounts for Mr Addison's quitting his resolution; the knight talks of the pains other people took to prevent his following it (17). Both the accounts might be true, but there was no necessity for inserting either in the text of the life, though it would have been wrong, not to have acquainted the reader with so remarkable a passage.

(17) The reader will easily discern the truth of this observation, by comparing these passages.

[F] The great Boileau.] It is from Mr Tickell that we learn this circumstance in relation to Boileau, it is proper the reader should see his own words. 'His country owes it to him (Mr Addison) that the famous Monsieur Boileau, first conceived an opinion of the English genius for poetry, by perusing the present he made him of the Muse Anglicanae. It has been currently reported, that this famous French poet, among the civilities he shewed Mr Addison on that occasion, affirmed, 'That he would not have written against Perrault, had he before seen such excellent pieces by a modern hand. Such a saying would have been impertinent and unworthy Boileau, whose dispute with Perrault, turned chiefly upon some passages in the Antients, which he refused from the misrepresentations of his adversary. The true and natural compliment made by him, was, that those books had given him a very new idea of the English politeness; and that he did not question, but there were excellent compositions in the native language of a country, that possessed the Roman genius in so eminent a degree (18).'

(18) Tickell's preface.

[G] The very best of Mr Addison's performances.] This poem was translated by the Abbot Antonio Maria Salvini, Greek professor at Florence, into Italian verse; which translation is printed with the original, in Mr Tickell's quarto edition of Mr Addison's works (19). It is not to be wondered that this poem is in the highest esteem in Italy, since there are in it the best turned compliments on that country, that are perhaps to be found in any language. Add to this, that the Italians must naturally apprehend their force, as well or better than ourselves, on account of their familiarity of his travels, which he dedicated to his first patron, the Lord Somers [H]. He would have returned earlier than he did into England, had he not been thought of as a proper person to attend Prince Eugene, who then commanded for the Emperor in Italy, which employment he would have been well pleased with; but the death of King William intervening, caused a cessation of his pension, and his hopes (p). He remained at home a very considerable space of time (his friends being then out of the ministry) before any occasion offered, either of his farther displaying his great abilities, or of his meeting with any suitable reward, for the honour his works had already done his country. He was indebted to an accident for both. In the year 1704, the Lord Treasurer, Godolphin, happened to complain to the Lord Halifax, that the Duke of Marlborough's victory at Blenheim, had not been celebrated in verse in the manner it deserved; intimating that he would take it kindly, if his Lordship, who was the known patron of the poets, would name a gentleman capable of writing upon so elevated a subject. Lord Halifax replied with some quickness, that he was well acquainted with such a person, but that he would not name him; adding, that he had long seen with indignation, men of no merit maintained in pomp and luxury, at the expence of the publick, while persons of too much modesty, with great abilities, languished in obscurity. The Treasurer said very coolly, that he was sorry his Lordship had occasion to make such an observation, and that for the future, he would take care to render it less just than it might be at present; but that in the mean time, he would pawn his honour, whoever his Lordship should name, might venture upon this theme without fear of losing his time. Lord Halifax thereupon, named Mr Addison, but insisted that the Treasurer himself should send to him, which he promised. Accordingly, he prevailed upon Mr Boyle (afterwards Lord Carlton) then Chancellor of the Exchequer, to go in his name, to Mr Addison, and communicate to him the business, which he accordingly did in so obliging a manner, that he readily entered upon the task (q). The Lord Treasurer Godolphin, saw the poem before it was finished, when the author had written no farther than the famous simile of the Angel, and was so well pleased with it, that he immediately made him a Commissioner of Appeals, familiarity with the objects therein described. It may likewise be observed, that the opening of this poem is peculiarly graceful, and alike honourable, for the writer and the patron.

While you, my Lord, the rural shades admire,
And from Britannia's publick posts retire;
Nor longer her ungrateful sons to please,
For their advantage, sacrifice your ease;
Me into foreign realms my fate conveys,
Through nations fruitful of immortal lays;
Where the soft season, and inviting clime,
Conspire to trouble your repose with rhyme (20).

Lord Halifax had that year been impeached by the Commons in Parliament, for procuring exorbitant grants from the crown to his own use; and farther charged, with cutting down and wasting the timber in his majesty's forests, and with holding several offices in the Exchequer, that were inconsistent, and designed as checks upon each other; the Commons had likewise addressed the King, to remove him from his counsels and presence for ever (21). These were the causes of his retiring, and Mr Addison's address at this time is a noble proof of his gratitude, as the manner of it will be a lasting monument of his good sense. In four lines he has handled a topic, the nicest that could be, and in four more makes a transition to his subject naturally, and without precipitation.

[H] His first patron Lord Somers. In our author's dedication of his travels, to the Right Honourable John, Lord Somers, he takes an opportunity of paying his Lordship one of the finest and best turned compliments that ever entered a dedication, inasmuch, as in a single paragraph, the patron, the subject, and the client, are all connected with the greatest propriety in point of thought, and the greatest beauty in regard to style. 'I had, says he, a very early ambition to recommend myself to your Lordship's patronage, which yet increased in me, as I travelled through the countries, of which I here give your Lordship some account: for whatever great impressions an Englishman must have of your Lordship, they who have been conversant abroad, will find them still improved. It cannot but be obvious to them, that though they see your Lordship's admirers every where, they meet with very few of your well-wishers at Paris, or at Rome. And I could not but observe, when I passed through most of the Protestant governments in Europe, that their hopes, or fears, for the common cause, rose or fell with your Lordship's interest and authority in England (22).' In his preface, Mr Addison gave his reader plainly to understand what he was to meet with in the following pages. For having observed, that Burnet had in his travels, masterly and uncommon observations, on the religion and governments of Italy; that Laffells might be useful in giving the names of such writers as had treated of the several states through which he passed; that Mr Ray had published many valuable remarks in respect to Natural History; and that Mr Mifson particularly excelled in the plan of the country, he goes on thus: 'For my own part, as I have taken notice of several places and antiquities, that nobody else has spoken of, so I think I have mentioned but few things in common with others, that are not either set in a new light, or accompanied with different reflections. I have taken care particularly, to consider the several passages of the ancient poets, which have any relation to the places and curiosities that I met with; for before I entered upon my voyage, I took care to refresh my memory among the Classic authors, and to make such collections out of them, as I might afterwards have occasion for. I must confess, it was not one of the least entertainments that I met with in travelling, to examine these several descriptions as it were upon the spot, and to compare the natural face of the country with the landscapes the poets had given us of it (23).' Notwithstanding this introduction, this piece was not at first understood, and consequently could not succeed; but by degrees, as the curious entered deeper and deeper into the book, their judgment of it changed, and the demand for it became so great, that the price rose at last to five times its original value, before there was a second edition printed (24). It has ever since maintained its reputation, most of the virtuosi who have travelled through Italy since, having given it high commendations (25), and which is perhaps a sincere proof of their approbation, have chose to tread in the same track. It hath been translated into French, and makes usually the fourth volume of Mifson's travels in that language. The two great points laboured in these travels, are the recommending the Classic writers, and promoting the doctrine of liberty. These points had been before pursued in the Epistle to Lord Halifax, and therefore Mr Tickell has very justly and judiciously observed, that this poem may be considered as the text upon which the book of travels is a large comment (26).

Appeals, in the room of Mr Locke, who was promoted to be one of the Lords Commissioners for Trade, &c. (r). His poem intituled The Campaign (s), was received with loud and general applause; however, it may be doubted, what real benefit the Duke of Marlborough reaped from it, since, if on the one hand, it set his conduct in the fairest light, it introduced, on the other, a rival in fame; for in all probability, the poem will be admired [I], as long as the victory is remembered. In 1705, our author attended the Lord Halifax to Hanover (t); and in the succeeding year, he was made choice of for Under-Secretary to Sir Charles Hedges, then appointed Secretary of State. In the month of December in the same year, the Earl of Sunderland succeeding Sir Charles in that office, continued Mr Addison in the post of Under-Secretary (u). Operas being at this time much in vogue, many people of distinction and true taste, importuned Mr Addison to make a trial, whether sense and found, were really so incompatible as some admirers of the Italian pieces would represent them. He was at last prevailed upon to comply with their requests, and composed his inimitable Rosalind (w). This piece was inscribed to the Dutchess of Marlborough, and though it did not succeed on the stage, it has been, and everlastingly will be, applauded in the closet. The many, looked upon it as not properly an Opera, and the few joined with them in their opinion; for having considered what a number of miserable things had borne that title, they were scarce satisfied that so excellent a piece should appear by the same. About the same time, our author assisted the ingenious Sir Richard Steele, in his play called The Tender Husband (x), to which our author wrote a humorous Prologue (y). Sir Richard, whose gratitude was full as warm as his wit, surprized him with a dedication, which may be considered as one of the few monuments of praise, not unworthy of him to whose honour it was erected. In 1709, the Marquis of Wharton being appointed Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, carried over Mr Addison into that kingdom, in the quality of his secretary. Her majesty also was pleased, as a mark of her peculiar favour, to augment the salary annexed to the place of Keeper of the Records in that kingdom, and to bestow it upon him (z). While he was in Ireland, his friend Mr Steele published the Tatler [K], which appeared for the first time, on the 12th of April, 1709; Mr Addison discovered the author by an observation on Virgil, which he had communicated to him. This discovery led him to afford farther assistances, inasmuch, that as the author of the Tatlers well expressed it, he fared by this means like a distressed prince, who calls in a powerful neighbour to his aid (a), that is, he was undone by his auxiliary. Such was the superiority of Mr Addison's genius, and so true a taste the town then had of correct and fine writing. Upon the change in the ministry, our author being more at leisure engaged oftener in that work, until it's conclusion on the second of January, 1711 (b). Immediately after the Tatler was laid down, Sir Richard Steele formed the project of the Spectator, the plan of which he concerted with Mr Addison. The first paper appeared on the first of March, 1711, and in the course of that celebrated work, Mr Addison furnished the greater part of those papers which were most admired. It was finished on the 6th of September, 1712; and Mr Addison, to prevent any disputes, or mistakes, which might have otherwise happened, took care to distinguish his papers through the whole, by some letter in the name of the Muse CLIO [L].

When

[I] The poem will be admired. The Campaign is addressed to the Duke of Marlborough, and contains a short view of the military transactions in the year 1704, with a very particular as well as poetical description of the two great actions at Schellenberg, and Blenheim. Several other eminent writers employed their pens on the same subject, particularly Mr J. Phillips, and Mr Euken, who was afterwards Poet Laureat. However, Mr Addison's was by far the most admired (27), and some of his warmest friends have ventured to prefer this poem to the rest of his works, perhaps this is a partiality to the subject, rather than to the piece itself, which however fine, could not be the most excellent of Mr Addison's performances, because of it's natural irregularity. All things considered, without question, the Campaign is truly excellent, but excellent only with regard to it's subject. For though the world allowed Mr Addison to exceed others therein, yet no true judge of poetry will admit that he excelled himself.

[K] Mr Steele published the Tatler. It would be very improper to enter farther into the history of the Tatler, than as it concerns Mr Addison. Mr Tickell observes, and Sir Richard Steele confesses, that the paper was set on foot and dropt without Mr Addison's knowledge (28): of course the history of the Tatler belongs properly to another article. The papers written by Mr Addison, were not distinguished in this collection by any mark; but Sir Richard Steele, at the request of Mr Tickell, pointed them out to him (29), and not only so, but shewed him such as they were jointly concerned in; and these, as well as those, are printed in the second volume of Mr Addison's works. It must be allowed that many of these little essays are not only exquisite, but incomparable. It is impossible to be serious, while we read such of them as are humorous; or not to be grave on the perusal of such as are of an opposite cast. The images are so striking, the language so graceful, the turn so natural, the rallery so lively, and at the same time so innocent, that not to be charmed with these pieces, and to be absolutely without taste, must be for ever synonymous terms.

[L] Name of the Muse CLIO. The affinity between the Tatlers, Spectators, and Guardians, makes it unnecessary to enter minutely into the merit of such papers as Mr Addison contributed, in the carrying on the two last undertakings (30). In the Spectators, the character of Sir Roger de Coverly was his particular favourite. We are told by a gentleman, who was thought to be well acquainted with Mr Addison's affairs, that he was so tender of this character, as to go to Sir Richard Steele, on his publishing a Spectator, wherein he had made Sir Roger pick up a woman in the Temple Cloisters (31), and would not part with his friend, until he had promised to meddle with the old Knight's character no more. However, Mr Addison to make sure, and to prevent any absurdities, which the authors of subsequent Spectators might fall into, resolved to remove that character out of the way, or as he pleasantly expressed it to an intimate friend, killed Sir Roger, that nobody else might murder him (32). As to the marking of the Spectators, it was our author's own act and deed; but Mr Tickell, in his preface to his works, having expressed this in very strong terms, saying, that Mr Addison had here-

When the old Spectator was laid down, a new one appeared, which though written by men of wit and genius, did not succeed, and they had the good sense not to push the attempt too far. Without question, the original Spectator will be always esteemed, not only as excellent in its nature and execution, but as truly honourable to the times in which it was received with so much applause. Posterity must have a high idea of the manners and good sense of the British nation, when they are informed that twenty thousand of these papers were sometimes sold in a day (c). The Guardian, a paper in the same taste, and, which is saying much more, in the same spirit, entertained the town in the years 1713 and 1714; Mr Addison had a large share therein, and his papers were particularly relished (d): and he also wrote once or twice in the Lover (e). It was necessary to speak of these performances together, which has carried us somewhat out of our ordinary road. Let us return therefore, to the year 1713, in which appeared his famous Cato. He took up the design of writing a tragedy on that subject, when he was very young; he actually wrote it while he was on his travels; however, he retouched it while he was in England, without any formed design of bringing it on the stage (f). But some friends of his believing that it might be advantageous to the cause of liberty, he was prevailed on to make it fit for the stage, which he accordingly did, by adding the greatest part of the last act. When it appeared it was gazed on as a wonder, all parties applauded, it ran thirty-five nights without interruption; and, what was more to the author's reputation, the best judges declared in its favour when they had read it, with the same passion the pit had done when it was first seen (g). Mr Pope wrote the Prologue, which is sublime. Dr Garth the Epilogue, which is humorous. It was recommended by many excellent copies of verses prefixed to it, among which, the sincerity of Mr Steele, and the genius of Mr Eusden, deserve to be distinguished. Foreign nations have done this work of our author's as much honour as our own; and indeed, it is one of those few performances which cannot receive more honour than it deserves [M].

by removed the least possibility of mistake in the most undiscerning reader (33); Sir Richard Steele, who was extremely offended with that preface, remarked severely on this passage, and speaking thereof to Mr Congreve, uses these words. 'I have observed, that the editor will not let me, or any one else, obey Mr Addison's commands, in hiding any thing he desired should be concealed. I cannot but take further notice, that the circumstance of marking his Spectators, which I did not know until I had done with the work, I made my own act, because I thought it too great a sensibility in my friend; and thought since it was done, better to be supposed marked by me, than the author himself; the real state of which, this zealot rashly and injudiciously exposes. I ask the reader whether any thing but an earnestness to disparage me, could provoke the editor, in behalf of Mr Addison, to say that he marked it out of caution against me, when I had taken upon me to say, it was I that did it out of tenderness to him (34).' It must be allowed, that Sir Richard, in the concluding paper of the Spectator (35), had said all that could be expected, if not more, with respect not only to the distinction, but also in regard to Mr Addison's character particularly; there did not therefore seem to be the least occasion for these precautions, with respect to a man who was really as warm a friend as could be wished, and a much warmer than these cautious people seem to have any idea of.

[M] Cannot receive more honour than it deserves. As to the tragedy of Cato, we shall here present the reader with some circumstances relating to its first appearance. They are contained in a letter from Alexander Pope, Esq; to Sir William Trumbull, dated April 30, 1713. 'As to poetical affairs, I am content at present to be a bare looker on, and from a practitioner, turn an admirer, which is (as the world goes) not very usual. Cato was not so much the wonder of Rome in his days, as he is of Britain in ours; and though all the foolish industry possible has been used to make it thought a party play, yet what the author once said of another, may the most properly in the world be applied to him on this occasion.

Envy itself is dumb, in wonder lost,
And factions strive who shall applaud him most.

The numerous and violent claps of the whig-party on the one side of the theatre, were echoed back by the Tories on the other; while the author sweated behind the scenes with concern, to find their applause proceeding more from the hand than the head. This was the case too of the Prologue writer, who was clapped into a flanch whig, at almost every two lines. I believe you have heard that after all the applauses of the opposite faction, my Lord Bolingbroke sent for Booth, who played Cato, into the box, between one of the acts, and presented him with fifty guineas, in acknowledgment (as he expected it) for defending the cause of liberty so well against a Perpetual Dictator. The whigs are unwilling to be distanced this way, and therefore design a present to the same Cato, very speedily; in the mean time they are getting ready as good a sentence as the former, on their side: so betwixt them it is probable, that Cato (as Dr Garth expresses) it may have something to live upon after he dies (36). Immediately after the publication of this tragedy, there came abroad a pamphlet, intitled, Observations upon Cato. This was written by Dr Sewell, a very ingenious gentleman, and a good poet. The design of this piece was to shew, that the applause this tragedy had met with, was founded in merit; it is a very accurate and entertaining criticism, and contributed not a little to the securing our poet the hearts of his readers, as well as of his audience (37). We are not however to suppose that our author had no enemies, or that there were not enow, who either did not like that tragedy, or pretended not to like it. Amongst these, the formidable Mr Dennis had the courage to attack it. First in a pamphlet (38), and again in a subsequent work, wherein he employed no less than seven letters in pulling the tragedy to pieces; and saying whatever an ill-natured man, with a tolerable share of wit, might be able to say, against the best written piece in the world (39). Another gentleman, who called himself a scholar of Oxford, considered the play in quite a different light, that is, he considered it as a political piece, and endeavoured to serve his party, by turning the cannon upon the enemy. The title of his pamphlet was, Mr Addison turned Tory (40); and it is written with great spirit and vivacity. Dr Fiddes also took some exception at the following lines.

In spite of all the virtues we can boast,
A woman that deliberates is lost.

The doctor thinks these reflect on the fair sex (41), but this seems a very forced construction, the sentiment is just and natural, and all strokes of this sort ought to be considered not as censures, but as cautions. The best judges, however, declared unanimously on the side of Mr Addison, and, as occasion offered, vindicated

It was translated more than once into French, obtained two Italian versions, and has been either translated or imitated in the German language (b). But the greatest honour that was ever done thereto, was the putting the soliloquy of Cato, which is perhaps the noblest thing in our language, into a Latin dress, which might have been read with admiration, even by the critics in the court of Augustus. Fame has attributed this to the late Bishop Atterbury (i), and as it was superlatively fine, the world thought fame in the right, and so it proved. This excellent tragedy did not escape the minor criticks, as the reader will find in the notes, for we cannot think of perplexing the text with things, of which nothing but the fear of being thought ignorant could tempt us to take notice. Her majesty Queen Anne, was not the last in doing justice to our author, and his performance. She was pleased to signify an inclination of having it dedicated to her; but the author published it without a dedication, because, as it is said, he had proposed to dedicate it elsewhere, and by this method, he thought to avoid offending either his duty or his honour (k). If in the subsequent part of his life his leisure had been greater, we are told he would have written another tragedy, intituled, The Death of Socrates (l). But the honours due to what he had already performed, deprived posterity of this promised labour. Upon the death of the Queen, the Lords Justices appointed Mr Addison their Secretary, which took him off from a design he had formed, of composing an English dictionary, on the plan of a famous Italian one (m). There was some thoughts of making him Secretary of State at that time, but he was at pains to decline it (n), and accepted a second time, under the Earl of Sunderland, the post of Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland; he held it however but a very little time; for on the Earl's being removed, he was made one of the Lords of Trade (o). In 1716, he married the Countess of Warwick (p); and on the first breaking out of the rebellion, he published the Freeholder, which is a kind of political Spectator [N]. There were just fifty-five papers in all; the first was published on the twenty-third of September, 1715, and the last on the twenty-ninth of June, 1716. These pieces were exceedingly admired, and, which was more the author's aim, were of great use at the time they were written (q). He published also about this time, some little pieces of poetry, such as verses to Sir Godfrey Kneller on the King's picture, and another copy to the Princess of Wales, with the tragedy of Cato. In April 1717 (r), his majesty King George I, was pleased to appoint our author one of his Principal Secretaries of State. His health, which had been before impaired by an asthmatick disorder, suffered exceedingly by an advancement so much to his honour, but attended notwithstanding with very great fatigue. He bore it however with great patience, till finding, or rather suspecting, that it might be prejudicial to the publick business, he resigned his office (s). Having thus procured for himself a vindicated the merit of this tragedy, against all opponents. Mr Boyer translated it into French, the same year it was published; but very indifferently. Abbe du Bos made an excellent version, of which, however, only the three first scenes were printed (42). Abbot Salvini translated it into Italian, his translation was acted at Leghorn with prodigious applause, and he afterwards published it at Florence (43); it is not known whether Signior Valetta's translation was ever printed; he was a young Neapolitan nobleman, who did it purely for his amusement (44). The Jesuits at St Omer translated it into Latin, and caused it to be acted by their pupils there, with great magnificence. They likewise sent Mr Addison a copy of their translation (45). In France, a poet named Des Champs having seen this tragedy, wrote another with the same title, and dedicated it to the Duke of Orleans. This was first excessively cried up in France, then translated into English blank verse, and published with a parallel of that piece and the Cato of Mr Addison, wherein the preference was given to the French performance. However this was all the effect of pique, and the character of the French Cato could never be established (46). Mr Voltaire has commended and condemned Mr Addison by turns, and in respect to the Cato, he admires and censures it extravagantly. The principal character he allows superior to any before brought upon the stage; but for all the love scenes he will have them absolutely inspid; which may be allowed him when he shall prove another of his assertions, viz. that Cato was the first regular tragedy, that ever appeared on the English stage (47).

[N] A kind of political Spectator. The Freeholder is particularly mentioned in the text, because it was a work written by Mr Addison entirely, and upon his own plan (48). Some indeed have supposed, that he was assisted in this work by Mr Phillips (49). But there seems to have been no foundation for this report, since neither Mr Tickell says any thing of it, nor does it appear from the papers themselves, that they were written by different hands; for they are the most uniform, and, the greatest part of them, the most out of every man's way of writing but Mr Addison's, that can be imagined. There is one thing to be said in respect to the Freeholder, which, as it will certainly be said by posterity, I can see no reason why it should not be said here; The Freeholder is, without question, the most indubitable proof of the use a man of true wit, and reasonable application, may be of to any administration. The numerous pieces of Sir Roger L'Estrange, were all calculated either to make the people laugh, or to put them in a passion. Dr Welwood's periodical papers were all politicks, and, consequently, too dry for the generality of readers. During the reign of the Queen, polemick writings were not only sharp, but bitter, and their authors studied rather to make their adversaries feel the quickness of their reproaches, than to persuade them by sound arguments, much less to invite them, by moderate and gentle applications, to their different humours and ways of thinking. The Freeholder hath avoided all these faults, and, with an inexhaustible fund of humour, mingles sometimes the gravest reasonings, and at others the kindest expostulations. Beautiful descriptions, exquisite allegories, visions almost more than human; and, in fine, whatever might please, whatever could move, whatever seemed fitted to attract, is to be found in those inimitable essays; and one may speak it without fear of being contradicted by any man who reads them, that they are the best turned papers, with a view for the purpose for which they were written, that were ever penned. Mr Addison without question wrote them in consequence of his principles, out of a desire of removing prejudices, and from a strong inclination to settle the government, and make his country happy. The making him Secretary of State therefore, was but doing him justice for so extraordinary and well-timed a service, which more than balanced that deficiency, which he objected against his own performance, his being no speaker in the House of Commons.

vacancy from business, he grew better, and his friends were in hopes, that his health would have been thoroughly re-established. In these leisure moments he applied himself steadily to a religious work, which he had begun long before, the first part whereof, scarce finished, is preserved and printed in his works (t). He likewise intended to have paraphrased some of the Psalms of David (u); but a long and painful relapse broke all his designs, and deprived the world of this excellent person, on the seventeenth of June, 1719, when he was entering the fifty-fourth year of his age. He died at Holland-house near Kensington, and left behind him an only daughter, by the Countess of Warwick (w). After his decease, Mr Tickell, who had the author's commands and instructions, collected and published his works in four volumes in quarto. In this edition there are several pieces hitherto unmentioned, of which it is necessary we should speak. The first in order of time is the Dissertation upon Medals, which, though published after his death, yet the materials for it were collected in Italy, and he actually began to digest them into order, when at Vienna, in the year 1702 (x). These dialogues are every way worthy of Mr Addison; the design is just and useful, the manner correct, beautiful, and in the true taste of antiquity. All the elegance of Plato, all the good sense and masculine gravity of Tully, with a becoming air of humour, in which our author was truly an original, are discoverable in this little work. The editor took a great deal of pains in translating the Latin quotations, and the verses prefixed to it by Mr Pope, are as perfect in poetry, as the piece itself is in prose. In November, 1707, there came abroad a pamphlet under the title of, The present state of the war, and the necessity of an augmentation considered. It is now printed among Mr Addison's works (y), and I believe nobody who reads it will doubt that it is his. The spirit in which it is writ, the weighty observations contained therein, on the strength and interest of foreign nations, and the comprehensive knowledge, shewn of all things relating to our own, evince it the work of no ordinary hand. The Whig Examiner, came out on the fourteenth of September, 1710, for the first time (z). There were five papers in all attributed to Mr Addison. These are by much the severest things he ever wrote. Dr Sacheverell (a), Mr Prior (b), and many other persons are in them very harshly treated. The Examiner had done the same thing on the part of the Tories, and the avowed design of this paper was to make reprisals. In 1713, there was published a little pamphlet, intitled, The late trial and conviction of Count Tariff (c). It was intended to expose the Tory ministry, on the head of the French commerce bill; and is likewise a very severe piece. These are all that are included in Mr Tickell's edition, which were published in the life-time of Mr Addison, without his name; as also was the Drummer, or the Haunted House, a comedy, not taken notice of in this edition, but published afterwards as Mr Addison's by Sir Richard Steele [O]. Since his death, and the coming out of that edition, the following pieces

[O] As Mr Addison's by Sir Richard Steele.] The Drummer was first published without any author's name, but with a preface prefixed by Sir Richard Steele, wherein he tells us, that it had been some years in the hands of the author, and falling under his perusal, he thought so well of it, that he persuaded him to make some additions and alterations and let it appear on the stage. He owns that it was not well received, or at least, not so well received as it deserved, which he accounts for, by observing that the strokes therein are too delicate, for every taste in a popular assembly; and he adds, that his brother sharers were of opinion, that it was like a picture, in which the strokes were not strong enough to appear at a distance (50). Mr Tickell publishing Mr Addison's works in 1721, omitted this comedy, which Sir Richard Steele so much regretted, that he quickly after published a second edition of it, with an epistle to Mr Congreve thereto prefixed; in this epistle he asserts, that he recommended the play to the stage, and carried it to the press; he likewise tells us the price it was sold at, viz. fifty guineas. He refers himself to his former preface, for a proof of his zeal on that occasion, which he observes could flow from nothing else, than his affection for the author. For as to the share that any one else had in it, he is positive it very little exceeded that of an amanuensis. 'But indeed, continues he, had I not known it, at the time of the transaction concerning the acting on the stage and sale of the copy, I should, I think, have seen Mr Addison in every page of it; for he was above all men in that talent called Humour, and enjoyed it in such perfection, that I have often reflected, after a night spent with him apart from all the world, that I had had the pleasure of conversing with an intimate acquaintance of Terence and Catullus, who had all their wit and nature, heightened with humour more exquisite and delightful, than any other man ever possessed. They who shall read this play, after being let into the secret that it was written by Mr Addison, or under his direction, will probably be attentive to those excellencies, which they before overlooked, and wonder they did not till now observe, that there is not an expression in the whole piece, which has not in it the most nice propriety and aptitude to the character which utters it; there is that smiling mirth, that delicate satire, and genteel raillery, which appeared in Mr Addison when he was free among intimates; I say when he was free from his remarkable bashfulness, which is a cloak that hides and muffles merit, and his abilities were covered only by modesty, which doubles the beauties which are seen, and gives credit and esteem to all that are concealed. The Drummer made no great figure on the stage, though exquisitely well acted; but when I observe this, I say a much harder thing of the stage than of the comedy: 'When I say the stage in this place, I am understood to mean in general, the present taste of theatrical representations; where nothing that is not violent, and, as I may say, grossly delightful, can come on without hazard of being condemned or flighted.' Nothing can be more just than Sir Richard's sentiments on this matter (51). The Drummer may be perhaps established as a test of true taste, he who likes it, has it, he who disapproves this piece, hath it not. Experience justified Sir Richard's conjecture. This play which failed when inimitably acted at Drury-Lane, was, when much worse performed, loudly applauded at Mr Rich's house, merely because it was then known to be Mr Addison's. How honourable this for our author! how dishonourable to the audience! how happy was he to have his former writings read by better judges! The time in which he lived was worthy of Mr Addison, but if his writings should ever reach an age, so stupid or so barbarous as not to relish them, that will not alter their nature, they will still remain as excellent as before, though not in the eyes of those Goths and Vandals. But we deviate too far from our purpose, and yet to what purpose do we write, if it be not to defend the world from a decay of taste, and to preserve pieces have been ascribed to our author. Dissertatio de insignioribus Romanorum poetis, i. e. A Dissertation upon the most eminent Roman poets (d). This is supposed to have been written about 1692, is allowed to contain many useful observations, yet nobody has hitherto ventured to decide, whether it is, or is not, Mr Addison's. A Discourse on ancient and modern learning (e); the time when it was written uncertain, but probably as early as the former. It was preserved amongst the manuscripts of the Lord Somers, which, after the death of Sir Joseph Jekyl, being publicly sold, this little piece came to be printed, in 1739, and was as well received as it deserved. To these we must add, The Old Whig, No. 1. and 2 [P], pamphlets written in defence of the Peerage Bill, 1719. It is not easy to account for the not inserting of these papers amongst his works, unless we suppose that the publication of them following immediately the disappointment of that design, made it improper to discover how much our author had it at heart. It would lead us into too long a digression, should we consider here the occasion of those papers, which, however, shall be done in the Notes. Thus we have run through the history of this great man's life and writings, who as he was superior to most of his contemporaries in other things, so he particularly excelled them in this; that his performances are equally perfect [Q]; nothing puerile in the most early, nothing below his genius in the last; constant to his principles, and to his friendships; he died as he lived, esteemed and revered by the great [R], without raising

[P] The Old Whig, No. 1. and No. 2.] In the latter end of 1718, and in the beginning of the year 1719, the Peerage Bill began first to be talked of, and the scope of that bill was this. That instead of the sixteen Peers sitting in Parliament as Representatives of the Peerage of Scotland, there were for the future to be twenty-five hereditary Peers by the junction of nine out of the body of the Scotch nobility, to the then sixteen sitting Peers. That six English Peers should be added, and the peerage then to remain fixed; the Crown being restrained from making any new Lords, but upon the extinction of families. What was the real view of this extraordinary scheme, is what we have no business here to inquire into. It is sufficient for our purpose to observe, that it gave a great alarm to the nation, and many papers with great spirit were written against it; amongst the rest, one called the Plebeian, said to fall from the pen of a member of the House of Commons; and now known to have been written by Sir Richard Steele (51). To this several answers were published, and abundance of pieces written in support of this project, none of which, however, were very favourably received. At length came forth the Old Whig, No. 1. on the state of the Peerage, with remarks on the Plebeian. A 4to pamphlet (52), written with great perspicuity, in a nervous style, not without some severe reflections on the Plebeian. The author of that paper did not suffer it to remain long unanswered. In his second number he replied to all the arguments therein made use of, treating the author with a good deal of asperity, alledging amongst other things, that the pamphlet had a very proper title, the author, if he was a Whig, seeming so old as to have forgot his principles (53). There does not appear however, any thing in the first Old Whig, which betrays the author's knowledge of the Plebeian coming from Sir Richard Steele; neither is there any thing in the second Plebeian, which intimates the writer's having the least suspicion, that the Old Whig was Mr Addison's. Though there was at the latter end of the last mentioned paper, an intimation of it's author's superior dignity, and more thorough acquaintance with the secret of this affair. For the Old Whig first declared that his majesty had given his consent, which he styles an act of unparalleled goodness (54); of which fact the Plebeian doubted, or at least affected to doubt (55). The second Old Whig was written in support of the first, and in answer to the second Plebeian. It is a very judicious, and at the same time a very warm and very humorous pamphlet; from the very beginning of which it is apparent, that the author knew, or at least was resolved to consider Sir Richard, as the writer of the Plebeian (56). He styles him a perfect master in the vocation of pamphlet writing in one place, calls him little Dicky in another, tells him, he has made the most of a bad cause in a third, and advises him as a friend in the close, if he goes on in his new vocation, to take care that he be as happy in the choice of his subject, as he is in the talents of a pamphleteer. The fourth Plebeian contains an answer to the second Old Whig. It is written with much greater virulence than any of the rest of the papers; his conclusion is very remarkable. Authors, says he, in these cases are named upon suspicion, and if it is right as to the Old Whig, I leave the world to judge of this cause by comparison of this performance with his other writings; and I shall say no more of what is writ in support of vassalage, but end this paper by firing every free breast with that noble exhortation of the tragedian (57),

Remember, O! my friends, &c.

MR ADDISON'S Cato.

This is sufficient to shew Sir Richard's belief, nor hath any body questioned the truth of his conjecture. The Peerage Bill went off notwithstanding for that session, and Mr Addison died before it came on again, in the latter end of the same year. It may not however be amiss to observe, that December 7, 1719, on a motion in the House of Commons, for committing the Peerage Bill, it was carried in the negative, by 269, against 177 (58).

[Q] His performances are equally perfect] In the text itself, we have endeavoured to do some justice to our author's character, and especially to that distinguishing part thereof, the ease and readiness with which he wrote, notwithstanding the accuracy and correctness of all his writings. This, it may be, will be thought best supported by proof, which therefore we shall give in this note. The following Epigram (which is not inserted in his works) was written when he was a member of the Kit-Cat Club, extempore, and yet it has not only wit, but correctness to recommend it.

On the Lady MANCHESTER.

When haughty Gallia's dames that spread O'er their pale cheeks an artful red;
Beheld this beauteous stranger there,
In native charms, divinely fair;
Confusion in their looks they shew'd,
And with unborrow'd blushes glow'd (59).

A farther proof of the extraordinary facility, with which he produced even the most perfect of his performances, may be taken from what Sir Richard Steele says of his Cato; he tells us, that the last act was written in less than a week's time. 'For this,' continues he, was particular in this writer, that when he had taken his resolution, or made his plan for what he designed to write, he would walk about a room and dictate it into language, with as much freedom and ease as any one could write it down; and attend to the coherence and grammar of what he dictated (60).'

[R] Esteemed and revered by the great] To attempt the reckoning up the friends of Mr Addison, would be an endless labour; and yet, to say nothing of those who distinguished Mr Addison, at the same time that they were themselves persons of the first distinction, raising any enemies, except such as were so on account of party; and even these expressed their enmity with reluctance [S], such was their admiration of his virtues.

inction, would be an unpardonable omission. We have already taken notice of Lord Somers, whose friendship to our author continued without interruption as long as he lived. We have likewise mentioned Mr Addison's gratitude towards him in the dedication of his travels, after that Nobleman had been impeached in the reign of King William; and was actually when he dedicated to him in disgrace with Queen Anne. We are yet to remark, that as Mr Addison out-lived him, so in one of his Freeholders he paid such a tribute to his memory, as must endear his own to every man of honour (61). The celebrated Earl of Halifax maintained also an inviolable friendship throughout his whole life for our author; to whose reputation we can add nothing, except it be naming the illustrious foreigners who subscribed for his works, which not only does honour to him, but to our nation. They were the Queen of Sweden, his Royal Highness the Duke of Orleans Regent of France, the Great Duke of Tuscany, the Great Prince of Tuscany, the Duke of Modena, the Duke of Parma, the Prince of Modena, the Prince of Parma, the Doge of Genoa, the Duke of Guastalla, Prince Eugene, Cardinal del Giudice, Cardinal du Bois, and Marshal d'Estrees (62). To mention the great names of our own nation, would be to transcribe the lists of our nobility, and therefore we shall rest this point here, preferring that in few other lives it will be carried further.

[S] Expressed their enmity with reluctance. The author of a celebrated poem, intitled Faction Displayed, who died but lately, and was justly celebrated for giving an ingenious turn to his ill nature, began an early war upon our author. In that poem, he makes his patron Mountague, there characterized by the name of Bathillo, describe him thus;

On Addison we safely may depend,
A pension never fails to gain a friend;
Through Alpine Hills, he shall my name rebound,
And make his patron known in claffick ground (63).

Mrs Manley, in her sequel to the Atlantis, gives our author's character at large, under the name of Maro, what she says of him, is every way to his advantage, were it not for this ill-natured Apostrophe, on seeing him in Sergius's gallery. 'O pity, that politics and 'for did interest, should have carried him out of the 'road of Helicon, snatched him from the embraces of 'the Muses, to throw into an old withered statesman's 'arms, &c. (64).' This withered statesman, whom she had before called Sergius, is the same Lord Halifax, mentioned by the foregoing writer. But the severest attack that ever Mr Addison felt, was from the following verses, bright and piercing as lightning, and as fatally blasting.

ADRIAN IV. (Pope) was an Englishman, and the only one that ever had the honour of sitting in St Peter's Chair (a). His name was NICOLAS BREKESPERE (b), or BREKSPERE (c), or BREAKSPEAR (d), in Latin Hastifragus. He was the son of one Robert de Camera (e), a man of learning but poor (f); and was born at Langley (g) near St Alban's in Hertfordshire. His father having left his family, and taken the habit in the monastery of St Alban's, young Nicolas was reduced to the necessity of frequenting that house, and submitting to the lowest offices, for his daily support. After some time he desired to take the habit in that monastery; but being rejected by the Abbot Richard [A], he resolved to try his fortune in another country

[A] He was rejected by the Abbot Richard. Matthew Paris informs us, that young Breakspear was refused admission into the monastery of St Alban's for insufficiency, or want of learning. 'Qui cum examinatus & insufficiens inveniretur, dixit ei Abbas fatiis civilliter; Expecta, filii, & adhuc scolarum exerce, ut aptior habearis (1). — Who being examined, and found insufficient, the abbot, civilly enough, said to him; 'Wait, my son, and go to school a little longer, till 'you are better qualified.' Gulielmus Neubrigenfis tells quite another story. 'Ille vero (says that author) 'adolescens ingressus, cum propter inopiam scholis 'vacare non posset, idem monasterium quotidianè stipis gratia frequentabat. Unde pater erubuit, verbifque mordacibus socordiam ejus increpitans, omni

Peace to all such! but were there one whose fires,
True genius kindles, and fair fame inspires:
Blest with each talent, and each art to please,
And born to write, converse, and live with ease:
Shou'd such a man, too fond to rule alone,
Bear, like the Turk, no brother near the throne,
View him with scornful, yet with jealous eyes,
And hate for arts, that caus'd himself to rise;
Damn with faint praise; assent with civil leer;
And without sneering teach the rest to sneer:
Willing to wound, and yet afraid to strike,
Just hint a fault, and hesitate dislike;
Alike reserv'd to blame, or to commend,
A tim'rous foe, and a suspicious friend;
Dreading ev'n fools, by flatterers besieg'd,
And so obliging, that he ne'er oblig'd:
Like Cato, gives his little senate laws,
And sits attentive to his own applause:
While wits and templars ev'ry sentence raise,
And wonder with a foolish face of praise.
Who but must laugh, if such a man there be?
Who would not weep, if Atticus were he (65).

An author in Mist's Journal, gives the following account of this transaction. 'Mr Addison raised this 'author, i. e. Pope, from obscurity, obtained him 'the acquaintance and friendship of the whole body 'of our nobility, and transferred his powerful interest 'with those great men to this rising bard, who frequently levied by that means unusual contributions 'on the publick. — No sooner was his body 'lifeless, but this author, reviving his resentment, libelled the memory of his departed friend; and what 'was still more heinous, made the scandalous 'lick (66).' In answer to this, it is said, that the whole is false, that Mr Addison never introduced Mr Pope to any nobleman, or procured him the subscription of one gentleman; as to the libel, persons of integrity are appealed to, who saw and approved the foregoing verses, in no wise a libel, but a friendly rebuke, sent in the author's own hand to Mr Addison himself, and never made publick by him, until printed by Curl and others (67). There is indeed, a letter of the Bishop of Rochester's extant, wherein these verses are highly commended, but this is seven years after Mr Addison's death (68); and there is another letter of Mr Pope's to Mr Craggs, written near four years before Mr Addison's death, wherein most of the same thoughts appear in prose (69).

Leland has adopted the narrative of Matthew Paris (3): But Bale will have it, that he was rejected because he was a bastard (4). Pits affigns no reason for this repulse: but if the character he gives of young Breakspear be a true one, Abbot Richard deserves blame for rejecting a person, who would have done great honour to his house. country (b). Accordingly he left England, and went to Paris; where, tho' poor and destitute, he applied himself with great diligence to his studies, and laid in a wonderful stock of learning (i). But having still a strong propensity to a religious life, he quitted Paris, and went into Provence, where he became a Regular Cleric in the monastery of St Rufus [B]. Here he made such a progress in literature, and distinguished himself so remarkably for his piety, and strict observance of the monastic discipline, that, upon the death of the Abbot, he was unanimously chosen superior of that house (k); and we are told (l), that he repaired, or rather re-built, that convent. He did not long enjoy this abbacy: for the monks, growing weary of the government of a foreigner, accused him of certain pretended crimes before Pope Eugenius III; who, having examined the matter of their complaint, and heard Nicolas's prudent and modest defence of himself, declared him innocent. However his Holiness, being sensible of our abbot's great merit, and thinking he might be more serviceable to the Church in a higher station, gave the monks leave to choose another Head [C], and created Nicolas Cardinal-Bishop of Alba in 1146 (m). In the year 1148, Pope Eugenius sent him into Denmark and Norway, in quality of Apostolical Legate; where, by his diligent preaching and instructions, he converted those barbarous nations to the Christian faith (n). It is said, he erected the church of Upsal into an archiepiscopal see (o). The time of his legation being expired, he returned to Rome, and was received with great marks of honour by the Pope and Cardinals. And not many days after his return, Pope Anastasius, who succeeded Eugenius, being dead (p), our bishop of Alba was unanimously advanced to the papal chair, in November 1154, and took the name of ADRIAN (q). The news of this promotion reaching England, King Henry II sent Robert abbot of St Alban's, and three bishops, to Rome, to congratulate the new Pope on his election [D]; upon which occasion Adrian granted

[B] He became a Regular Cleric in the monastery of St Rufus.] He was not presently admitted to take the habit, but passed some time in recommending himself to the Monks by a diligent observance of all their commands. This obsequious behaviour, joined with the beauty of his person, and his prudent conversation, rendered him so acceptable to those Religious, that after some time they entreated him to take the habit of the Canonical Order. Est autem in illa regione Monasterium nobile Clericorum Regularium quod dicitur S Rufi. Ad quem locum ille veniens, & subsistendi occasionem ibidem inveniens, quibus potuit obsequiis iisdem fratribus se commendare curavit. Et quoniam erat corpore elegans, vultu jucundus, prudens in verbis, ad injuncta impiger, placuit omnibus, rogatusque Canonici Ordinis suscipere habitum, annis plurimis ibidem resedit (6).

[C] The Pope gave the Monks leave to choose another Abbot.] Utrique ergo parti (says Gulielmus Neubrigenis) pie & prudenter prospiciens; Scio, inquit, fratres, ubi sedes sit Satanæ; scio quid in vobis suscitaret procellam istam. Ire, eligite vobis patrem, cum quo pacem habere possitis, vel potius velitis: iste enim non erit vobis ulterius oneri (7). — The Pope, piously and prudently consulting the good of both parties, said; I know, brethren, where the devil makes his abode: I know what has raised this storm among you. Go, choose a superior, with whom you may, or rather will, live in peace: as for this man, he shall be no longer a burthen to you.'

[D] The King sent an embassy to Rome, to congratulate the new Pope on his election.] The Embassadors, according to Matthew Paris, were exposed to perils both by sea and land: for in their voyage they met with a violent storm, from which they narrowly escaped by invoking the assistance of St Margaret; and, after they came ashore, they were several times in danger of robbers, before they arrived at Beneventum, where the Pope then was. His Holiness received them with great marks of respect; and, when they had executed their commission, the three Bishops returned home, leaving Abbot Robert behind them (3). King Henry sent the Pope a letter by those Embassadors, the purport of which is as follows. After some compliments upon his advancement, the King proceeded to express his good wishes, and how desirous he was, 'that this prelate might answer the expectations of his station.' And here, in terms of great deference and respect, he chalked out a sort of plan, together with some general directions for his Holiness's conduct. He suggested to him, 'that since providence had transplanted him, as it were, into paradise, it was expected he should improve in proportion to the richness of the soil; and that, being raised to so high a station, it was his duty to act vigorously for the interest of Christendom, and so to govern the Churches of God, that all succeeding generations might esteem him an honour to the country, which gave him birth.' He proceeded to express his hopes, 'that that tempestuous spirit, which disturbs the air, and often beats strongest upon places of the highest situation, might never shake his Holiness, or make the eminence of his station an occasion of his greater ruin.' And 'since the superintendency of the universal Church belonged to him,' he entreated him 'to proceed immediately to the promotion of such Cardinals, as were both able and willing to share the burthen with him, and assist him in the government.' And here his Highness recommended to him 'to avoid being biased by any secular regards in his choice; not to be swayed by the motives of relation, quality, or wealth; but to pitch upon such men as feared God, and hated covetousness; such as were remarkable for their integrity, and most zealous for the salvation of men's souls.' And, 'since the unworthiness of the clergy is the greatest disservice to the church,' he besought his Holiness, 'to be very careful in the disposal of ecclesiastical preferments, that the patrimony of our blessed Saviour might not be invaded and misapplied by any unqualified person.' From hence the King proceeded to mention the calamitous condition of the Holy Land, and how miserably it was harassed by the incursions of the Infidels; and desired 'his Holiness would apply his thoughts to find out some serviceable expedient for that part of Christendom.' He put him in mind likewise of the declension of the Greek Empire, and expressed his hopes, 'that the universal Pastor would extend his care in proportion to his jurisdiction, and that every part of the Christian Church would share the blessings of his government; that since God had raised him to the top of spiritual grandeur, he would take care to shine forth in an exemplary conduct; that his government would be so commendable and just, as to become not only a general blessing in his life-time, but that future ages might be the better for his memory, and his native country might congratulate her own happiness in producing so glorious a prelate.' The King concluded very considerable privileges to the monastery of St Alban's [E]. The next year, King Henry having solicited the Pope's consent that he might undertake the conquest of Ireland, Adrian readily complied, and sent him a Bull for that purpose [F]. His indulgence to that prince was so great, that he even consented to absolve him from the oath he had taken not to set aside any part of his father's will [G]. This Pontif was soon made sensible of the cares and disquietudes attending so high a station ; and concluded his letter with desiring his Holiness's prayers for himself, his court, and his kingdom (9).

[E] Pope Adrian granted very considerable privileges to the monastery of St Alban's.] It was observed in the last remark, that, after the discharge of the embassy, the three bishops returned home, and abbot Robert staid behind at Beneventum. It seems, he thought this a favourable opportunity of recovering some dignities and privileges belonging to his abbey, which had been invaded by the Bishop of Lincoln ; and to this end he had brought with him several valuable presents for his Holiness, and among the rest three rich mitres, and some sandals, the workmanship of Christina Prioress of Markgate. In a conference he had with the Pope, his Holiness would only accept of the mitres and sandals on account of their excellent workmanship, but refused the other presents, saying in a jesting way ; I will not accept your gifts, because, when I desired to take the habit in your monastery, you rejected me. Sir, said the Abbot, we could by no means receive you, it being repugnant to the will of God, whose providence reserved you for greater things. The Pope replied ; I thank you for this polite and obliging answer; and added, Dearest Abbot, ask boldly whatever you desire ; I shall always be ready to serve St Alban, who am myself his disciple (*).

(*). 'Devotionem et urbanitatem ipsius commendavit, et jocose ait, Abnuo recipere munera tua, quia me aliquando ad alas religionis domus tue confugientem, et habitum monasticum charitative postulantiem, recipere renuisti. Cui Abbas: Domine, vos nequaquam potius recipere, voluntas enim Domini repugnavit, cujus prudentia vitam vestram direxit ad altiora. Et respondit Dominus Papa ; Eleganter et civiliter respondisti, et complacuit ei responsonis verbum ; et addidit, Abbas charissime, audester pete quod vis, non poterit beato Albano deesse sius Albanensis (10).' The Abbot hereupon distributed the rest of his presents among the Cardinals and the Pope's domestics, 'knowing (says my author) the insatiable avarice of the Romans.' Sciens ipsos Romanos esse insatiabiles sanguisugæ filios, pecunie sitibundos. One day, as he was in private conversation with the Pope, he let fall some hints concerning the various oppressions of the bishop of Lincoln, mingling his complaints with tears and sighs ; which so moved his Holiness, that he granted to the church of St Alban's the noble and singular privilege of being exempt from all episcopal jurisdiction, excepting that of the See of Rome ; with many other valuable liberties and immunities (11). Soon after abbot Robert's return, he dispatched two messengers to Rome with a pair of golden candlesticks, which he had promised the Pope when he was at Beneventum. Adrian received them very graciously, and deposited them in St Peter's church, in perpetual memory of the English Protomartyr St Alban. And, in return for this present, his Holiness sent, by the same messengers, to the church of St Alban's the relics of the Thebaean Legion, a fine pall given him by the Emperor, some sandals, a ring, and other donations to a considerable value (12).

[F] He sent King Henry a Bull for the conquest of Ireland.] That instrument is extant in Matthew Paris (13), Giraldus Cambrensis (14), Radulphus de Diceto (15), and in Rymers's Fœdera (16). To satisfy the curiosity of the meer English reader, I shall here give a translation of it. Adrian, bishop, servant of the servants of God, to his most dear Son in Christ, the illustrious King of England, sends greeting and apostolical benediction. Your Magnificence is very careful to spread your glorious name in the world, and to merit an immortal crown in heaven, whilst, as a good catholic prince, you form a design of extending the bounds of the Church, of instructing ignorant and barbarous people in the Christian Faith, and of reforming the licentious and immoral ; and, the more effectually to put this design in execution, you desire the advice and assistance of the holy See. We are confident that, by the blessing of God, the success will answer the wisdom and discretion of the undertaking. You have adverted us, dear Son, of your intended expedition into Ireland, to reduce that people to the obedience of the Chri- stian Faith ; and that you are willing to pay for every house a yearly acknowledgment of one penny to St Peter, promising to maintain the rights of those churches in the fullest manner. We therefore, being willing to assist you in this pious and laudable design, and consenting to your petition, do grant you full liberty to make a descent upon that island, in order to enlarge the borders of the Church, to check the progress of immorality, and to promote the spiritual happiness of the natives. And we command the people of that country to receive and acknowledge you as their sovereign lord ; provided the rights of the churches be inviolably preserved, and the Peter-pence duly paid. For indeed it is certain (and your Highness acknowledges it) that all the islands, which are enlightened by Christ the Sun of righteousness, and have embraced the doctrines of Christianity, are unquestionably St Peter's right, and belong to the jurisdiction of the holy Roman Church. If therefore you resolve to put your designs in execution, be careful to reform the manners of that people, and commit the government of the churches to able and virtuous persons ; that the Christian Religion may grow and flourish, and the honour of God and the salvation of souls be effectually promoted: so shall you deserve an everlasting reward in heaven, and leave a glorious name to all posterity. We may observe from the contents of this Bull, how far the Popes of that age stretched their pretensions with respect to the dominions of princes. For here we see Adrian very freely presenting King Henry with the crowns of the Irish Kings, and commanding their subjects to transfer their allegiance from their lawful Sovereigns to a foreign Invader. However King Henry, though encouraged by the Pope's Bull, postponed the Irish expedition, and made no attempts upon that island till about fourteen years after.

[G] He absolved King Henry from the oath he had taken not to set aside any part of his father's will.] The case was this : Geoffrey Plantagenet, late earl of Anjou, had issue, by the empress Maud, three sons, Henry, Geoffrey, and William. This prince, being sensible that his own dominions would of course descend to his eldest son Henry, and that the kingdom of England, and dutchy of Normandy, would likewise fall to him in right of his mother, thought fit to devise the earldom of Anjou to his second son Geoffrey. And, to make this settlement the more firm, he took an oath of the bishops and nobility, not to suffer his corps to be buried, till his son Henry had sworn to fulfil every part of his will. The earl being dead, Henry came to attend his father's funeral. But when the oath was tendered to him, he refused for some time to swear to a writing, the contents of which he was not pre-acquainted with. However being pressed with the scandal of letting his father lie unburied, he took the oath, tho' with great reluctance. After the funeral, the will was broken open and read ; and tho' the contents displeas'd Henry, he concealed his resentments for the present. But after his accession to the throne, upon his complaint to Pope Adrian that the oath was forced upon him, he received a dispensation from his Holiness, absolving him from the obligation he had laid himself under (17). The author, cited in the margin, would fain justify the King and the Pope in this affair, upon that loose maxim, that oaths extorted are not obligatory. Et quoniam extorta sacramenta vel vota non obligant, nisi forte ex subsequenti consensu convalescant, facile (ut dicitur) ab illo sacramento absolutionem imperavit (18). But if King Henry's oath was void of course, as this writer supposes, what occasion was there for the Pope's dispensation ? And if it remained in full force, it is hard to imagine which way the Pope could release it. Had the matter of the oath been unlawful, there would have been some sense in the absolution from it. But, in promising not to alter the disposition of his father's will, Henry only run the risk of suffering in his right, and swore to nothing but what was in his power to make good. This instance alone is sufficient to shew, that Adrian, tho' a man of good understanding and integrity, was none of the safest guides in matters of conscience. It may be proper to tell the reader, that, in consequence and he made warm complaints thereof to his countryman Johannes Sarisburiensis [H]. The rest of his life and actions, having no connexion with the civil or ecclesiastical history of Great Britain, shall be briefly thrown together in a note [I]. He died [K], September 1, 1159, in the fourth year and tenth month of his Pontificate, and was buried in St Peter's church, near the tomb of his predecessor Eugenius (r). The learned Editor of Camden's Britannia tells us (s), Adrian had been rector of Tydd in Lincolnshire; and Dr Cave informs us (t), that he left his mother to be maintained by the alms of the church of Canterbury. There are extant several letters written by Pope Adrian (u), and some homilies (w).

of this dispensation, Henry dispossessed his brother Geoffrey of the dominions of Anjou, allowing him only a yearly pension for his maintenance.

[H] He made warm complaints to Johannes Sarisburiensis. Baronius informs us (19), that, in the very first year of Adrian's reign, his countryman, and old friend, Johannes Sarisburiensis, or John of Salisbury, afterwards bishop of Chartres, paid him a visit; and that his Holiness complained to him in the strongest terms of the uneasiness of his station. He assured him, 'That all the former hardships of his life were mere amusement to the misfortunes of the popedom; that he looked upon St Peter's chair to be the most uneasy seat in the world, and that his crown seemed to be clapped burning on his head.'

[I] The rest of his life and actions shall be briefly thrown together. In the beginning of his pontificate, he boldly withstood the attempts of the Roman people to recover their ancient liberty under the consuls, and obliged those magistrates to abdicate their authority, and leave the government of the city to the Pope. In 1155, he drove the heretic Arnold of Bresse, and his followers, out of Rome. The same year, he excommunicated William King of Sicily, who ravaged the territories of the Church, and absolved that prince's subjects from their allegiance. About the same time, Frederic King of the Romans having entered Italy with a powerful army, Adrian met him near Sutrium, and concluded a peace with him. At this interview, Frederic condescended to hold the Pope's stirrup whilst he mounted on horse-back: After which his Holiness conducted that Prince to Rome, and in St Peter's church placed the imperial crown on his head, to the great mortification of the Roman people, who assembled in a tumultuous manner, and killed several of the Imperialists. The next year, a reconciliation was brought about between the Pope and the Sicilian King, that Prince taking an oath to do nothing farther to the prejudice of the Church, and Adrian granting him the title of King of the Two Sicilies. This Pope built and fortified several castles, and left the papal dominions in a more powerful and flourishing condition than he found them (20).

[K] His death. Gulielmus Neubrigenfis says nothing of the manner of Pope Adrian's death: but Matthew Paris tells us (21), he was poisoned out of spite by the Romans, because he had refused to consecrate a citizen's son a bishop, who was unworthy of that station. Post hos autem paucos dies, idem Papa Adrianus, quia cujusdam potentis civis Romani filium indignum, in episcopum, timore repressus divino, creare & consecrare noluit, preventus insidiis, potionatus, veneno infectus, & interfectus est. We have another account of his death in Bale, who tells us, upon the authority of Joannes Funicus, that Pope Adrian being one day walking with his attendants, a fly got into his throat, and, the furgeons not being able to extract it, he was suffocated (22). Fuller tells the same story with a small variation. 'As he was drinking (says that author) he was choaked with a fly, which, in the large territory of St Peter, had no place but his throat to get into: but since a fly stopped his breath, fear shall stop my mouth, not to make uncharitable conclusions from such casual-ties (23).' It is remarkable, that Platina is silent as to the manner of Pope Adrian's death; which surely he would not have been, had it really been attended with such extraordinary circumstances. And what shall we say to the silence of the learned Antiquarian Leland in this matter, but that he gave no credit to the reports concerning the manner of our Pontiff's death?

A D R I A N (DE CASTELLO,) Bishop of Bath and Wells in the reigns of Henry VII and VIII, and Cardinal-Priest of the Roman Church, was descended from a mean and obscure family called by the name of the Castelli, and born at Cornetto (a), a small town in Tuscany (b). Having distinguished himself by his parts and learning, he obtained several employments at the court of Rome. In 1488, he was sent by Pope Innocent VIII, in quality of his Nuntio extraordinary, to appease the troubles in Scotland: but, upon his arrival in England, being informed that his presence was no longer necessary in that kingdom, where the commotions had been ended by a decisive battle, he set himself to execute some other commissions, with which he was charged, particularly that of collecting the Pope's tribute or Peter-pence, his holiness having appointed him his Quæstor or Treasurer for that purpose. He stayed some months in England, and, during that time, had the address to insinuate himself into the good graces of Morton, Archbishop of Canterbury, who recommended him so effectually to the King, that his majesty thought fit to employ him as his agent for the English affairs at the court of Rome, and, as a recompence of his faithful services, promoted him first to the bishopric of Hereford, and afterwards to that of Bath and Wells (c). The Pope's bull, in virtue of which he was collated to the see of Hereford, is dated August the second, 1504. He received the temporalities of Bath and Wells at Rome, in consequence of the King's letters dated October the thirteenth, the same year: on the twentieth, he received the spiritualities from the Archbishop by his Proctors; and the same day was enthroned at Wells by his proxy, who was the celebrated historian Polydore Vergil, at that time the Pope's sub-collector in England, and afterwards appointed, by Adrian, Archdeacon of Wells. Our Prelate let out his bishopric to Farmers, and afterwards to Cardinal Wolfey, himself residing at Rome (d); where he built a magnificent palace, on the frontispiece of which he caused to be inscribed the name of his benefactor Henry VII, leaving it, after his decease, to that Prince, and to the Kings of England his successors. In the mean time, Alexander VI, who succeeded Innocent VIII, had appointed our Adrian his principal Secretary, and Vicar-General in spirituals, and temporals; and, as a farther mark of esteem and confidence, created him a Cardinal-Priest, with the title of St Chrysgonus, the thirty-first of May, 1503 (e). months after his creation, he narrowly escaped losing his life by poison [A], at a feast, to which he was invited, with some other Cardinals, by the Pope and his son Cæsar Borgia (f). Under the pontificate of Julius II, who succeeded Alexander, Cardinal Adrian, having taken some disgust, or because he distrusted that Pope, who was a declared enemy of his predecessor, voluntarily banished himself from Rome [B], and did not return 'till the holding a conclave for the election of a new Pope; into which, though it was already shut, he was admitted, by consent of the sacred college, and probably gave his voice for the election of Leo X (g). Soon after, he was unhappily privy to a conspiracy against that Pontif [C], into which he was the more easily led, by too fondly crediting the prediction of a Cunning-woman, or Fortune-teller, who had assured him, ' That Leo would be cut off by an unnatural death, and that he would be succeeded by ' an elderly man named Adrian, of obscure birth, but famous for his learning, and whose ' virtue and merit alone had raised him to the highest honours of the Church.' This prophecy, which our Cardinal foolishly and rashly applied to himself, was exactly verified in the election of Adrian VI, who succeeded Leo X. The conspiracy being discovered [D], Cardinal Adrian was condemned to pay twelve thousand five hundred ducats, and to give a solemn promise that he would not stir out of Rome. But, whether he was unable to discharge so heavy a fine, or apprehended farther severities, he withdrew privately from that city: whereupon, in a consistory held the sixth of July, 1518, he was declared excommunicated, and deprived, not only of the cardinalate and all his benefices, but even of his ecclesiastical orders (b). Near four years before this time, he had been removed from his office of the Pope's Collector in England, at the request of King Henry VIII, and through the instigation of Cardinal Wolfey [E]. heads

[A] He very narrowly escaped losing his life by poison. Pope Alexander having invited some of the most distinguished members of the sacred college to a sumptuous entertainment; his son Cæsar Borgia resolved to take this opportunity to remove out of the way such of the guests, whose grandeur and riches he chiefly envied; and to this purpose he prepared some poisoned wine: but the Cup-bearer, providentially mistaking one flaggon for another, administered the poisoned liquor to the wicked contriver of this black design, who drank it off without suspecting the mistake (1). For the particulars and consequences of this horrid attempt, which cost the Pope himself his life, the reader is referred to the historians, who have written the lives of Alexander VI, and his son Cæsar Borgia. As to what concerns Cardinal Adrian, who was present at this fatal banquet, and one of the destined victims of Borgia's inhuman malice, M. Aubery informs us (2), that having inadvertently tasted the poisoned wine, he was seized with most excruciating pains in his bowels, which brought on frequent convulsions, and afterwards a kind of lethargy; that he was obliged, for some ease and refreshment, to rowl himself quite naked in cold water poured on the floor of his chamber; that he escaped indeed with life, but not without casting his skin, which, through the violence of the poison, peeled off from all parts of his body.

[B] He voluntarily banished himself from Rome. This circumstance of the Cardinal's life, M. Aubery tells us (3), is not agreeable to the opinion of Raphael de Volaterra, who (4) extols his great skill and address, in constantly supporting the credit and reputation he had acquired at the court of Rome, and in always finding the means happily to extricate himself from the most dangerous conjunctures, and such as had proved fatal to others. But the express testimony of Paris de Grassi, master of the ceremonies, and what Guichardin remarks (5) of the King of France, who ordered Cardinal Adrian's name to be inserted, as having been one of those who had convened the synod of Pisa, prove plainly enough, that he met with no better treatment, under the pontificate of Julius II, than the other favourites of Alexander VI, and that he had some occasions given him of discontent, or at least that he did not think himself safe under the power of the new Pope. My author says farther, that his Holiness, not knowing to what he should ascribe the Cardinal's extreme fear and voluntary exile, began to imagine, that it might be owing to remorse of conscience for having made some attempt upon his authority or his life.

[C] He was unhappily privy to a conspiracy against Pope Leo X. I call it a Conspiracy, after M. Aubery, who informs us, that Cardinal Petrucci was the chief of the conspirators, and Adrian one of those, to whom he imparted the secret of his wicked designs, and whose indiscrete or malicious silence rendered them accomplices of his guilt (6). But, according to Polydore Vergil, this conspiracy was nothing more than the intemperate rage of an angry Cardinal, who was a perfect master of the Roman freedom of speech (7). The affair, as that historian relates it (8), was briefly this. The Pope had taken under his protection the inhabitants of Sienna, and deprived Cardinal Alfonso Petrucci, and his family, of the principality they had long enjoyed there, in order, as his Holiness declared, entirely to root out the seeds of faction, with which that city was disturbed. This proceeding highly incensed the Cardinal against the Pope, whom he charged with ingratitude, in thus repaying the assistance he had lent him, in bringing about his election: he complained openly of the injury done him, publicly expressed his detestation of that Pontif, and imprecated a thousand deaths on him. He happened once to vent his rage in the hearing of the Cardinals, Adrian, and Francis Volaterran, who reproved him severely, but did not think they had sufficient grounds for an information against him. However Petrucci, in the heat of his passion, went away from Rome, and soon after, upon an assurance of indemnity, returned; but still continued his resentment, and abusive language against the Pope; who was so exasperated thereby, that he ordered him to be apprehended, and thrown into prison, where soon after he died.

[D] The conspiracy being discovered. Let us hear M. Aubery. His Holiness, he tells us (9), having caused the three principal conspirators to be arrested, learned from their depositions, that the Cardinals Soderini (10) and de Castello were their accomplices, having been present at very secret conferences with them. A consistory was thereupon held, in which those two Cardinals, after much reluctance, especially on the part of the latter, were induced to make a public confession of their fault, and Adrian owned, he had heard Petrucci say, that he would kill the Pope, but that he paid no regard to what he said on account of his youth.

[E] He was removed from his office of the Pope's Collector at the request of King Henry VIII, and through the instigation of Cardinal Wolfey. Wolfey, aiming at the dignity of a Cardinal, employed Adrian as his Solicitor at the court of Rome; but finding that he betrayed him, and did him ill offices, he made use of his interest with the King, to get him turned out of his post. There is extant in Mr Rymer's Fœdera, &c. (11) a letter from Leo X, dated at Rome, October the thirty-first, 1514, in answer to one from King Henry to his Holiness. The Pope therein tells him, ' That ' he had condescended to remove the Cardinal from ' the office of Collector, for no other reason, but ' because the King had desired it; and that he would ' do even more for him, if it was not plain that he ' acted only at the instigation of another, and not of ' his own accord.'

heads of his accusation, drawn up at Rome, were; 'That he had absented himself from that city in the time of Julius II, without the Pope's leave; that he had never resided, as he ought to have done, at the church of St Chryfogonus, from which he had his title; that he had again withdrawn from Rome, and had not appeared to a legal citation; and that he had engaged in the conspiracy of Cardinal Petrucci, and had signed the league of Francis Maria, Duke of Urbino, against the Pope (i).' He was at Venice, when he received the disagreeable news of his condemnation (k); but what became of him afterwards, or when and where he died, we know not, though it is pretended he took refuge some where in Asia among the Turks (l). Cardinal Wolfey secured to himself the vacant see of Bath and Wells, which he had farmed of Adrian (m). There is to be seen, we are told (n), at Riva, a village in the diocese of Trent, a Latin inscription on one Polydorus Casamicus [F], the Pope's Janitor, written by Cardinal Adrian; at the end of which he deploras his own wretched condition, and exalts the happiness of his friend, whose death had put an end to his miseries. Polydore Vergil and M. Aubery give us a very advantageous idea of the manners and learning of this Prelate [G].

[G] An advantageous idea of the manners and learning of this Prelate.] Polydore Vergil highly extols him for his various and uncommon learning, his exquisite judgment in the choice of the properest words, and the truly classical style of his writings, in which he was the first, since the age of Cicero, who revived the purity of the Latin language, and taught men to draw their knowledge from the sources of the best and learnedest authors. Erant in eo plurimæ literæ, non vulgares, sed reconditæ, ac summum bono-

rum verborum delectu judicium; qui memoria nostra primus omnium, post illud disertissimum Ciceronis sæculum, suis scriptis mortales excitavit ad perfectas literas de doctissimorum autorum fontibus hauriendas, docuitque modum purè, nitidè, ac luculenter loquendi, sic ut, eo doctore, in præsentia ubique gentium Latinitas ab integro renascatur (11). He was of a gay and cheerful disposition; and, as if he would imitate Cicero in this point, as well as in purity of style, he took great pleasure in rallying or bantering, of which we have the following instance. Disputing one day about precedence with Cardinal Caruajal, who maintained, that, since he had been restored by the Pope to the Cardinalate, he ought to hold the same rank as if he had never been degraded from it; Adrian resolved at last to give him place, but not without one stroke of raillery upon his antagonist, to whom he said, making a low bow, Your most reverend lordship may go before me, if you please, since biscuit () has always been preferred to common bread*, reproaching him thereby with his former rebellion, and the disgrace he was forced to undergo, before he could be promoted a second time to the dignity of a Cardinal (12). ÆLFRED, ALFRIDE, ALDFRID, or ELDFRID, was the illegitimate son of Ofwi, King of Northumberland. He was educated as became the son of a King, and, as Beda tells us, studied amongst the Scots, and acquired a great knowledge in the scriptures, and in all solid and useful learning (a). On his return into his father's kingdom, he behaved himself with great wisdom and prudence, and it is particularly related of him, that he persuaded his brother-in-law, Peada, the son of Penda, King of the Mercians, to renounce Heathenism, and to embrace the Christian Religion. On the death of his father Ofwi, Egfrid, his brother, who succeeded in the throne, persecuted him with implacable malice, merely because he was a prince of great parts, and there had been some talk of raising him to the throne. To avoid his fury, Ælfred retired into Ireland, though some say into Scotland, where, conversing only with the learned, he led a philosophic kind of life; being distinguished from other private men only by the virtues of the mind (b). Yet even here, his brother could not let him rest, but most injuriously making war on those who had given him refuge, was slain in battle (c). Hereupon, the nobility of the kingdom of Northumberland unanimously invited Ælfred to take possession of the vacant throne, which he accordingly did, in the year 686 [A]. He found the kingdom in great confusion, and by his wisdom and piety soon brought it into order; eased the people of the oppressive taxes his brother had laid upon them, and, by a strict administration of justice, rendered them perfectly easy and happy. He distinguished himself by his learning as much after he became King, as he had done before; for which reason, not only scholars flocked to his court, but even the learned in other countries paid tribute to his abilities, by dedicating their books to him; as did the famous Scottish Abbot Adamanus, and Adelmus, Bishop of Sherburn (d). It is however admitted, that as he was no martial Prince, so his dominions were more straitened than they had been in the days of his ancestors. He is censured for persecuting

[A] Which he did in the year 686.] The life of this Prince certainly merits a place in this work, as well on account of his being a King of great fame, a man learned himself, and commended as an encourager of learning by venerable Bede, but chiefly, because he is taken notice of by foreign writers. There is an article of him in a late edition of Moreri (1); and shall it be said there are any more careful of the fame and credit of Englishmen, than we our selves are? It is true, this Prince was no King of England, he was

King only of a very small part of it. He did honour, however, to the whole, nay, and to Scotland, and Ireland too; in the former country he was educated, in the latter he long resided, and for his eminent virtues was admired and beloved in both. Some epistles to the learned men in both countries he left behind him, but it is not known whether they are still preserved or not. This however we know, that his learning, wisdom, and piety, is celebrated by many of our ancient authors, as the margin will shew (2).

cuting Bishop Wilfrid [B], in whose room he caused John, of Beverly, a man famous for piety and learning, to be consecrated Bishop of Hexham, in Northumberland, whom he afterwards exalted to the Archbishoprick of York. He governed with great reputation the kingdom of Northumberland, nineteen years, and dying on the 24th of December, in the year 705 (e), was buried at Drifeld. He married Cyniburg, or, as some call her, Kenburg, the daughter of Penda, King of Mercia, by whom he had Osrede, his son and successor; but in nothing like his father, the remembrance of whose virtues induced the people to make this son of his King, though he was at that time a child of eight years old (f).

[B] Persecuting Bishop Wilfrid. Most of our historians mention the differences between this Prince and Wilfridus, Archbishop of York, very concisely; and those who have written the life of this King, do it still more obscurely. The ecclesiastical historians, to whom it properly belongs, treat it, however, very copiously, and from them we shall give the reader a succinct account of it. This Wilfridus at the time of Alfred's accession to the throne, was beyond the seas, expelled from his archiepiscopal see of York, by the King's brother and predecessor. In the second year of this Prince, which was 687, Wilfridus returned with mandatory letters from the Pope, for his restoration. With these the King in part complied, for he promoted John, of Beverly, who was then Bishop of Hexham, to the Archbishoprick of York, and offered Wilfridus his bishoprick, which he accepted. There he sat quietly five years, but, in 692, he was again expelled, not so much by the King's will, as on account of disputes among the clergy. Upon this he went abroad again, applied himself a second time to the Pope, and, after thirteen years attendance, obtained a sentence in his favour; whereupon he returned into England, after Alfred had been dead some years (3).

His father, who was a very wise and religious Prince, believing that he saw in him a brighter and more promising genius than in his other children, sent him, while yet an infant, that is, in the fifth year of his age, to Rome, where Pope Leo IV, adopted him, and anointed him (b), which some assert to have been a regal unction, though others think he was only confirmed (c) [A]. His father in the decline of his life going to visit the holy see, took this favourite son of his along with him, whereby he had an opportunity of seeing and hearing many things, which made such strong impressions on him, as were not to be worn out during his whole life (d). On his return to England, his parents were no less tender of him than before, yet this tendernefs was not of much service to Ælfred (e), since it estranged him from learning, and consisted too much in the indulging of idleness, and a pursuit of youthful pleasures. On his father's death, he had an appanage bequeathed to him by will, but his brothers, who succeeded in the throne, put him off with fair words, so that his possessions remained narrow enough. However, as he had a very grave philosophick spirit, and began now to think of recovering the time he had lost in his nonage, he readily admitted these excuses, and would willingly have been content with his books and his ease (f). But it was not long he enjoyed even these small comforts, the Danes invading the

[A] Though others say he was only confirmed. There are many reasons why the anointing Ælfred to be King, is scrupled (1). 1. He was his father's younger son; and had three, at least, if not four, brethren between him and the crown. 2. He was but five years old, and therefore it is not likely that his father should intend him for a Vice-King. 3. Such an unction could have had no other consequence, than that of making him obnoxious to his brethren. But notwithstanding these exceptions, it seems pretty clear, that he was really anointed in order to vest him with a royal character. Many reasons have been offered in support of this opinion, but, for the sake of cutting things as short as possible, we will shew that the foregoing objections are not very cogent, and that there is indubitable authority on the other side. As to his distance from the throne, that is no objection at all, if the custom of the times, and his father's will, be considered (2); from both which it appears, that great Princes made all their sons Kings, and that this was what Æthelwolf both designed and in part effected. With respect to the second point, it is evident that a great part of Wales was conquered that year (3); and it is therefore very probable, his father intended, when he was of an age fit to govern, to make Ælfred King of Demetia, or South Wales (4), as he had before invested two of his other sons with royal titles. The last objection really answers itself, for the fact fell out so. The brethren of Ælfred grew jealous of him, and defeated him not only of the kingdom which his father intended him, but likewise of the small portion that Prince left him, after he had altered his former purpose (5). A multitude of authors speak of Ælfred's journey to Rome, and of his unction, yet there are two whose testimonies in many respects seem preferrable to the rest. The first of these is Affer, Bishop of Sherburn, who was intimate with King Ælfred, and who, in the memoirs he wrote of that Prince, and dedicated to himself, hath under the year 853, these words (6), The same year King Æthelwolf sent his son Ælfred to Rome, attended by many of the nobility and persons of lower rank, Leo IV, then possessed the Apostolick See, who anointed the said infant Ælfred as a King, confirmed him, and adopted him as his own son. This author, therefore, plainly affirms he was both crowned and adopted. The other writer is Æthelred, a Monk of the royal family, who lived very near these times, who says, that after Leo had consecrated him King, he, from that act, stiled him his son, as Bishops at the time of confirmation are wont to call those little ones their children (7). Robert, of Gloucester (8), says expressly, that he was crowned King, and that he was the first of our Princes who was anointed, which is also asserted by Thomas Rudborne (9). In this, however, they seem to be mistaken, for not only the Monk of Malmbury (10), who was well acquainted with these things, asserts, that in 790, Offa, King of Mercia, caused his son Egbert to be anointed King in his life-time: But also Gildas (11), the most ancient of our historians, speaks of unction as a thing common in his time amongst the British Princes. Hence it is clear, that he was not the first of our Kings, nor even the first of our Saxon Kings consecrated by unction. Sir Henry Spelman (12), after mentioning some of these authorities, concludes justly, that he was anointed King. But Alford (13), the Jesuit, seems to be more in the right, who alleges he was both anointed King, and confirmed by Pope Leo, and that, in respect to this second ceremony the Pope was his godfather.

the kingdom, he was constrained to abandon a contemplative for an active life, serving his brethren both with his counsels and in person, till at length they being all dead [B]. He in the two and twentieth year of his age, anno dom. 871, became King in his own right (g), which dignity, however, he assumed with much reluctance, not only on account of his love to a retired life, but also because he knew that the crown was a very heavy burthen, and that though it was adorned with jewels, yet it was at the same time lined with cares (h). He had scarce leisure to attend his brother's funeral, when he was forced to fight for the crown he had so unwillingly accepted. At Wilton he engaged the Danish army, and in the beginning of the battle had the advantage; but, in the pursuit, the Danes discovering his weakness, rallied, and drove him out of the field (i). We need not wonder at this, since besides their deficiency in numbers, the Saxons must have been excessively harassed, since there had been eight or nine battles that year (k). Soon after the engagement at Wilton, there followed a treaty, this, however, they observed but indifferently, roaming up and down, and pillaging wherever they came. At last they put an end to the kingdom of Mercia, and forced it's monarch not only to leave his dominions, but the island (l). The next year after this, they acted in such a manner as gave Ælfred to understand, that he had nothing to trust to but arms; for this reason he took pains to fit out a fleet, which was to guard the coasts, and keep these rovers from landing. Some effect this design of his produced, for a squadron of five Danish ships coming on the coast, one of them was taken (m). However, a great army of Danes, commanded by several of their Kings, marched as far as Grantbridge, and quartered thereabouts, the best part of the year, and the next summer they advanced to Werham; there King Ælfred met them with all the forces he could raise, but not finding himself strong enough to fight them, he concluded a peace, not without the interposition of money; if some of our historians deserve credit (n). However it was, a peace he made, and the Danes swore never to invade his dominions; but, according to their wonted custom, broke their faith in a few months [C]. The next year, being 876, the barbarous Danes committed new and greater hostilities, which compelled the

[B] Till at length they being all dead. It would have taken up too much room in the text, to have entered into the transactions of Ælfred in his noage. However, as the knowledge of them is in some measure requisite to the thorough understanding of several circumstances of this article, we shall say as much as is necessary of them in this note. His father Æthelwolf, according to the best accounts we have, had five sons and a daughter (14). Of these Æthelstan the eldest, was King of Kent, in his father's life-time, and died before him. Æthelbald, the second son, raised a rebellion against his father, when he came back from Rome, and that good natured Prince, to avoid any effusion of blood, consented to divide with him his dominions (15). He did not long survive this, but, before his death, he, by a full and distinct testament, endeavoured to settle all the claims of his children in such a manner, as might prevent their disturbing the publick peace. By this will, Æthelbald and Æthelbert, had his kingdoms divided between them; his private estate, he left to his younger sons Æthelred and Ælfred, together with what money was found in his coffers (16). As for his daughter, she married Burthred, King of Mercia, and being with her husband expelled her country by the Danes, went into Italy, and, after his death, lived a nun at Padua. Æthelwolf deceased in 858, when Ælfred was but ten years old (17). Æthelbald succeeded him, and governed two years and a half. On his demise, Æthelbert seized the crown, which he held for five years, during which space he was continually vexed by the Danes, against whom he fought with undaunted courage, though with unequal success. He died in 866 (18), and was succeeded by his brother Æthelred, who having reason to be dissatisfied with the King his brother's conduct, while he was a private man, solemnly promised his younger brother Ælfred, he would do him that justice which had been denied by the two former Kings, in giving him what his father had by will bequeathed him. On his accession, Ælfred demanded a performance of his promise, but the King excused himself on account of the troublesome times, but assured him, that if he kept every thing to himself at present, yet at his death he would leave him all (19). With this Ælfred was satisfied, for being inclined to follow his sports, fond of domestick pleasures, and extremely addicted to literature, he inclined rather to have led a retired life; but having given some proofs of his courage in the former King's reign, Æthelred would never part with him, but made use of him as his first minister, and general in chief of his armies. In this capacity it was, that he rashly engaging the Danish army, which was very numerous, and then lay near Reading, was in great danger of being totally defeated, had not the King come in to his assistance with a fresh body of men, which changed the fortune of the day, inasmuch, that the Danes lost the field, and therein one King, nine of their chiefs, whom the Saxons called Ears, and a prodigious number of common soldiers (20). This however, did not hinder the Danes from attacking and defeating the two brothers a fortnight after, followed very suddenly by another such disaster, wherein King Æthelred (21), received his mortal wound.

[C] Broke their faith in a few months. All our ancient historians, and especially those who lived in their times, unanimously agree in charging the Danes with most horrid acts of perfidy (22). Considering however, the pains taken by these authors, to justify their countrymen in all things, and their evident partiality in such points as regard the ancient Britons, we might well enough doubt their sincerity in this respect, if it was not confirmed by facts, and by the authority of foreign writers. To say the truth, the perfidy of the Danes was the result of their barbarism, from making it their constant practice to burn and destroy whatever they could not carry away: they were quickly straitened in their quarters, and thus being obliged to shift them often, they soon found themselves in such a situation as to have no means of subsistence, without obtaining it by force, from those with whom they had lately made peace. To these wrong steps of theirs, was owing the wretched condition in which this whole island then was; all it's best towns, many of it's finest monasteries, and the far greater part of it's villages, being but so many heaps of ruins. The want of cultivation also produced dreadful famines, and these, as usual, were followed with consuming plagues, as we read in Aferius, and other ancient writers (23): we need not wonder therefore that Ælfred was desirous of getting some time to breathe, or that being just seated on the throne, he should be willing to obtain a thorough knowledge of the state both of his dominions and his people: Instead therefore of attributing this treaty of his with the Danes, to indolence, or want of spirit, we ought to conclude it the effects of his foresight and great prudence, which inclined him to seek some means for restoring and strengthening his decayed state, before he engaged in fresh wars, with a fierce and barbarous people, who by continual accessions of new comers, thrived by fighting, and gained ground even by defeats.

the King to march against them, with what forces he could get together. He found them in Exeter, where, for some time, he held them besieged (o). While things were in this situation, his fleet successfully engaged part of the enemy's, though it consisted of a hundred and twenty sail, sunk many, and dispersed the rest, which attempting to gain some of the English ports, by a storm were driven on the coasts, and all miserably perished (p). This so terrified the Barbarians, that they once more made peace and gave hostages. However, in 877, having obtained new aids, they came in such numbers into Wiltshire, that the Saxons, quite tired out, could not be persuaded to make head against them. Many to avoid them fled out of the kingdom, not a few submitted themselves, and the rest suffering fear to supersede their duty, fled every man to the place wherein he might be best concealed. In this distress, Ælfred conceiving himself no longer a King, laid aside all signs of royalty, and, to secure his person, took shelter in the house of one who kept his cattle (q). While he remained in this retreat, a little adventure happened, of which several of our histories take notice. The good woman of the house having one day made some cakes, put them before the fire to toast, and seeing Ælfred sitting by, trimming his bow and arrows, she thought he would of course take care of the bread; but he, it seems, intent on what he was about, let the cakes burn; which so provoked the woman, that she rated him roundly, telling him he would be glad to eat them, and ought therefore to have looked after their toasting (r). The King however did not continue long in this wretched situation; for observing that a part of Somersetshire was so enclosed by the waters of the Parrett and the Thone, as to form a morass, which it was almost impracticable to force. He in the centre thereof, where there was about two acres of firm ground, built a fort, for the security of himself, his family, and the few faithful servants that repaired thither to him (s). This place he named Æthelingeay, or rather Æthelunga-ige, that is, the Isle of Nobles, now called Athelney (t) [D]. There he continued some months, fallying frequently out upon the Danes (especially when they thought themselves secure and lay carelessly) with incredible secrecy and success. After almost a year spent in this manner, understanding that some of his subjects had routed a great army of the Danes, killed their Chiefs or Kings, and taken their magical standard (u) [E]; he issued his letters to acquaint them with the place where he was, and to invite the nobility to come thither and consult with him. This they accordingly did, and shewed a great alacrity, when the King proposed taking the field with an army, and no longer acting only by stealth as it were, against the Enemy (w). However,

[D] Now called Athelney. The distress the King was in when he took shelter in this island, is very strongly painted by Asserius Menevensis, who very probably heard what he relates from the King's own mouth. We are told that St Neolas, his kinsman, predicted to him this misfortune. That wife and good man, it seems, discerning in the two first years of Ælfred's reign, a greater inclination to the employments and recreations of a private life, than to attend the affairs of state, and discharge the function of a King, took upon him to reprove Ælfred, and in the end, when he found his discourses wrought not much, foretold him, that the time was at hand, when God would severely chastize him for his negligence, and when he should have enough of that privacy, which he now seemed so much to covet (24). Among other singular accidents which befel him in this retreat, the following is much insisted upon by some of our historians, though not mentioned by Asserius. It happened one day in the winter, that the King having sent all his attendants out to search for fish and other things in the island, was left alone with his Queen in the fort. This leisure he employed, as he was wont, in reading, but was quickly disturbed by the voice of a poor man, who with great earnestness begged for somewhat to satisfy his hunger. Ælfred thereupon desired his wife to examine their cupboard, wherein the finding only one small loaf brought it to him, and told him it would scarce suffice his servants when they came home from fishing. The King, however, directed her to give half to the poor man, whose name was Nider, trusting as he said, that God would fend more. She did as he was directed, and the King returning to his book, read till he was sleepy, whereupon he went to his couch to slumber away his cares. In his sleep he had a very extraordinary dream. He thought he saw St Cuthbert, the famous Bishop of Holy Island, who told him, that God having punished the sins of the Saxons by the sword of the Danes, now pitied their calamities, and looking with an eye of favour on his late act of charity, had determined to restore him to his throne; and of the truth of this, the return of his servants with a large quantity of fish, should serve him as a token. The King waking called to the Queen, who was also fallen asleep, and told her his dream, which she no sooner heard, than she assured him she had dreamed the same thing. Immediately after his servants returned with a vast quantity of fish, which greatly encouraged the King, and put him upon those great and glorious undertakings, which restored the lustre of the Saxon diadem (25). We have omitted a great many miraculous circumstances, with which a certain author graces the story we have just now recited, and have followed Spelman in calling the lady who was with the King, his Queen, and not his mother, who died long before his father. But it may not be amiss to observe, that the Abbot of Rievall says, that the King directed his servant to bestow these alms, without mentioning any lady at all (26).

[E] Their magical standard. It will be proper to make use of Sir John Spelman's explication of this dark point. In this defeat, says he, there was taken that famous Danish standard, called Reafan, or the Raven, the great confidence of those Pagans. It was a banner, with the image of a raven, magically wrought by the three sisters of Hinguar and Hubba, on purpose for their expedition, in revenge of their father Lodebrock's murder, made they say, almost in an instant, being by them at once begun, and finished in a noon tide, and believed by the Danes to have carried great fatality with it, for which it was highly esteemed of them. It is pretended, that being carried in battle, towards good success it would always seem to clap the wings, and make as if it would fly; but, towards the approach of mischance, it would hang down, and not move. Whatsoever it was, the impostor was now betrayed; for being taken by surprise, they had lost their oracle, before they had time to consult with it (27). That this story, however fabulous, is no invention of our writer's, is evident from what we meet with in the history of the northern nations by Olaus Magnus, wherein there are very prolix accounts of the like nature (28). It should seem, that either the Danes redeemed this standard, or got another of the same sort wrought, since on one of the coins of Anlaf, King of Northumberland, there is a raven, which he bore in his banners (29), and from one of the coins of King Canute, it appears to have given original to a family, one of the Monetarii to that King, being called Resen (30).

However before they came to a final resolution, Ælfred, that his subjects might not hazard too much, exposed his own person in a most extraordinary manner. For putting on the habit of a harper, he went into the enemy's camp, where, without suspicion, he was every where admitted, and had even the honour to play before their Princes. This having furnished him with an exact knowledge of their situation, he returned with like secrecy to his nobility, whom he directed to go to their several homes, there to draw together each man as great a force as he could, with which, at a day prefixed, he was to come to the great wood, now called Selwood, in Wiltshire (x). This they punctually performed, and the Danes, with no small surprize, heard that King Ælfred, whom they looked upon as a fugitive, was about to attack them with a royal army. The King, taking advantage of the terror they were in, fell upon them, and totally defeated them at Æthendune, now Eddington (y). Those who escaped from this battle, possessed themselves of a neighbouring castle or fort, almost ruined, which they fortified immediately, and wherein they were quickly besieged by the victorious Saxons. After a long and close siege, the Danes were forced to surrender at discretion. But Ælfred dealt by them like a merciful Prince, giving up to such of them as should embrace the Christian religion the whole kingdom of the East Angles, on condition that they should oblige the rest of their countrymen to quit the island, and prevent, as far as in them lay, the landing of any more foreigners therein (z). For the performance of these articles he took hostages, and when, in pursuance of the treaty, Guthrum, the Danish Captain, or as some called him King, came with thirty of his chief officers to Ælfred, who lay then encamped at Aalre, now Auler, a small village in Somersetshire, to be baptized, the King answered for him at the font, gave him the name of Æthelstan, and adopted him for his son. He then entertained him and his friends twelve days, or, to speak in the stile of our Saxon ancestors, twelve nights, at his house at Wedmore or Wetmore, after which he dismissed them with royal presents (a). This certain advantage the Saxons got by the Danes turning Christians, that now they kept their oaths, and removing the next year from Chippenham to Cirencester, and about a twelvemonth after into the country assigned them, where for the present they sat down, and settled themselves very quietly (b). The same year a new swarm of Danes came up the river Thames, and wintered at Fullouham, now Fulham, but Ælfred was so well provided, that they thought proper to go off again, and try their fortunes in France (c). The Saxon fleet also performed great things at sea, and the King depending much thereon, spared neither pains nor cost to keep it constantly in good order (d). In 884, the Danes landed in Kent in great numbers, and laid siege to Rochester, but the inhabitants made so stout a resistance, that the King came time enough to their relief, forced the enemy to raise the siege, and return once more to France (e). A little after, his fleet had the good luck to beat a very considerable one of the Danes, destroyed thirteen ships, and, according to the King's orders, gave no quarter to any of the men on board (f). Yet within a short space after this, they themselves were defeated, but that defeat turned to their advantage, since it made them extremely vigilant for the future (g) [F]. Ælfred having now some leisure, resolved to repair, re-fortify, and re-people the antient city of London, which he had lately recovered from the Danes, and meant to keep as a frontier. Accordingly he re-edified it, placed a garrison therein, and established as the Governor thereof, Æthered, whom he had created Earl of Mercia, and to whom he gave his daughter Æthelfleda in marriage (h). This Earl was not only an excellent officer, but also a great statesman, and a very worthy man, for which reason, not only all the Saxons who had submitted to the Danes, but such also of the Danes themselves as began to learn the Saxon manners, submitted to him and settled in London, and the other places under his obedience (i) [G]. After some years of rest, Ælfred was called again into the field ;

[F] Extremely vigilant for the future. It may seem strange, that the King having so lately made peace with the Danes, and received them for his subjects, should be obliged to take so much pains to defend his country against them; for there is no doubt at all, that these very Danes were part of those who had submitted to King Ælfred. In order to clear this difficulty, we must enter minutely into the situation of the Danes under King Guthrum. We have still extant, two treaties, or articles of capitulation, between King Ælfred, and Guthrum King of the Danes (31). The first is very short, and appears to have been the articles agreed on, at the immediate surrender of the Danes, when they had not time to be very explicit. The latter is larger, and takes in all that the Danes bound themselves to, in consideration of the lands bestowed upon them by King Ælfred; and from thence it appears, that they had granted them the kingdoms of East Anglia and Northumberland, which, however, were still dependent upon Ælfred, who concurred with King Guthrum in his charters (32). But notwithstanding all these engagements, Guthrum was far from being true to the King; on the contrary, he executed what he had promised very slowly, received many new comers under his protection, and connived at their fitting out such pyratral fleets, as this was, to plunder King Ælfred's dominions; pretending, however, when any complaint was made, that they were a wild lawless crew, who for a while indeed had remained under his jurisdiction, but were now revolted, and therefore he was not accountable for their behaviour. This action happened in the dead of the night, so that the King's fleet was rather surprized than beaten, and all the use the enemy made of this little advantage, was to procure a new treaty with the King, who, for his own ease, was once again pleased to grant them peace (33).

[G] Under his obedience. The Danes had possessed themselves of London, in the time of his father, and had held it till now as a convenient place for them to land at, and fortify themselves in, neither was it taken from them but by a close siege (34). However, when it came into the King's hands it was in a miserable condition, scarce habitable, and all it's fortifications ruined. The King, moved by the importance of the place, and the desire of strengthening his frontier against the Danes, restored it to it's antient splendor. The method he took to fill it with inhabitants was altogether worthy of his consummate prudence. For observing that through the confusion of the

for the Danes being heartily beaten in the West of France, came with a fleet of two hundred and fifty sail on the East coast of Kent, and landing fixed themselves at Appletree. Shortly (l) after came another fleet up the Thames, consisting of eighty vessels, and having discharged the soldiers on board them, they built a fort at Middleton. Ælfred, in this situation, drew together a considerable army, but before he marched towards the enemy, he forced the Danes, settled in Northumberland and Essex, to give him hostages for their good behaviour (m). Then he moved towards the invaders, and very prudently chose a camp between their armies, thereby preventing their junction. A great body, however, moved into Essex, and from thence, crossing the river, came into Surrey, where at Farnham the King's forces met them, and defeated them (n). In the midst of these confusions, the Danes settled in Northumberland, in breach of their oaths, and, notwithstanding the hostages they had given the King, equipped two fleets, the one of a hundred, and the other of forty vessels, and, after plundering both the northern and southern coasts, sailing about, came to Exeter and besieged it (o). The King no sooner received information of their perfidious behaviour, than he resolved to march directly to Exeter, leaving behind him a great body of Welsh. Before his arrival, the Danes were possessed of the place, but he shut them up therein, and, notwithstanding they made many desperate sallies, kept them effectually blocked up. The body of the Welsh he had left behind him, believing it neither their interest nor their duty to be idle, marched to London and joined the citizens, they had not been long at London, before news came that Hæsten, one of the Kings of the Danes, was marched out with the bulk of his forces to forage, and had left his family and his riches at Beamsfleet, where he had built a fort, whereupon, they resolved immediately to attack it in his absence. In this expedition they had all the success they could wish, not only taking the place, with the wife and children of the Danish King, but also all the riches they had collected by many years rapine; Hæsten, when he received the news was so much troubled thereat, that he sent to Ælfred, then before Exeter, to beg a peace, which the good King granted him upon very reasonable terms, and which he, like a true Dane, broke as soon as it was concluded; particularly, he plundered the district belonging to Earl Æthered, though he had been godfather to one of this Prince's sons, and, after all, joining the other Danish army, he marched with them to Shobury in Essex, where they built another castle, thence passing the Thames with such as joined them from Northumberland, and the territories of the East Angles, they marched on to Severn, waisting all in their way. On the banks of this river, viz. at the Buttington in Montgomeryshire, Ælfred's generals gave them a check, and encamping on the other side of the river, hindered them from passing for many weeks (p). In the mean time, the King had brought those he besieged in Exeter to such extremities, that, having eat their horses, they were ready to devour each other. Despair therefore rendering them desperate, they sallied on the King's forces, but were beaten, though with great loss on the King's side. The remnant of this body of the Danes fled into Essex, to the fort they had built there, and to their ships (q). But before the King had any leisure to recruit himself, another Danish leader, whose name was Laf, came with a great army out of Northumberland, and destroyed all before him, marching on to the city of Werheal in the West, which some take to be Chester; there they remained the rest of that year, the next they invaded North Wales, which they plundered and destroyed, and when there was nothing more to be taken, they divided, one body returning into Northumberland, and another into the territories of the East Angles; whence proceeding into Essex, they seized upon a small island called Merefig (r). Thence, some time after, they parted, some sailing up the river Thames, and others up the Lee Road, where drawing up their ships, they built a fort about twenty miles from London, which proved a great curb upon the citizens: the Londoners, unable to bear this restraint with any patience, went in a great body and attacked the fort, but they were repulsed with considerable loss, which obliged the King about harvest time, to encamp with a body of troops in the neighbourhood of that city, in order to cover the reapers from the excursions of the Danes. While he was thus employed, Ælfred one day riding by the side of the river Lee, began to entertain an opinion, that by cutting certain trenches, the Danish ships might be laid quite dry; this therefore he attempted, and succeeded in it so well, that the Danes abandoned their fort, and marched away to the banks of the Severn, where having built a fortress, at a place called Quatbrig, they sat down and wintered. Such of the Danish ships as could be got off, the Londoners carried in triumph into their own road, and the rest they burnt and destroyed (s). During these three years, the English were not only vexed with the continual irruptions of this barbarous

the times, many, both Saxons and Danes, lived in a loose disorderly manner, without owning any government; he, commiserating their misfortune, necessity having first driven them to this way of life, offered them now a comfortable establishment, if they would submit and become his subjects. This proposition was even better received than he expected, for multitudes growing weary of a vagabond kind of life, joyfully accepted so unmerited an offer. These advantages were greatly improved by his son-in-law, the new Earl of Mercia, who so perfectly answered the King's intentions, and by his wisdom and mildness procured the people such advantages, that numbers of the more civilized Danes, made it their choice to retire into his territories, there to live by their industry, and enjoy the benefit of those laws, which Ælfred had made for the good of all his subjects (35).

(35) Roger. Hoved. p. 420.

barous people [H], but suffered likewise by a dreadful plague, which affected alike, both men and cattle (t). The Danes ever unquiet, in a short space, began again to invade the territories of the West Saxons, both by land and sea, but did more mischief as pirates, than as robbers; for having learned how to build long and large ships, they were in a manner masters at sea, and of consequence depopulated all the coast. Ælfred having long thought of the best method how to remedy these disorders, contrived to build still larger and better ships, than those used by the Danes, which having effected, he sent these galleys on the coasts of the isle of Wight, and of Devonshire, which were miserably infested by six piratical vessels. Ælfred's squadron performed all that could be expected, driving two of these pirate ships on shore, sinking three, and suffering one only to escape. But this was not performed without great loss on the King's side, especially of officers. Such of the Danes as landed when their ships ran on shore, were taken prisoners, and brought to the King at Winchester, where he gave judgment upon them, that they should be hanged as piratical murderers, and enemies to mankind (u). In the subsequent part of the King's life, viz. in the years 898, and 899, there happened nothing very remarkable [I], save, that the King employed that peace and leisure which he then had, in effectually establishing that government which with much care and pains he had framed, not more for the security of himself and successors, than for the ease and benefit of his subjects in general, of which constitutions here, as in their proper place, we think necessary to give a succinct account. Before the reign of Ælfred, though there were many Kings who took the title, yet was there none who could with propriety be called monarch of the English nation. For notwithstanding there was always after the time of Egbert, a Prince who held a kind of pre-eminence over the rest, yet had he no direct dominion over their subjects, as in the latter part of his reign Ælfred had, for to him, all parts of England, not in the possession of the Danes, submitted, and so did also a great part of Wales; neither was this great power attained by the sword, or through his ambition of ruling, but rather through the fame of his wisdom and mildness (w). We have already spoken of the laws he made, of which, though there remain but few [K], we have any assurance are truly his, yet are we well informed, that to his

In order to have a clear idea of these disturbances, it is necessary to observe, that Guthrum, King of the Danes, dying in 890 (36); King Ælfred took all the pains imaginable, to secure the obedience of his subjects, which they promised, and in 894 gave hostages (37); but when by the coming of numbers of their countrymen into this island, they thought themselves strong enough to escape punishment for perjury, they broke without scruple their agreement, and were as troublesome and cruel as any of the new comers. The King's contrivance in draining the river Lee, is thought to have produced that noble meadow lying between Hertford and Bow, for at Hertford, was the Danes fort, and thence, we may easily conceive, kept the inhabitants of London in continual terror by frequent excursions (38). Authors are, by no means agreed, as to the method the King pursued in laying dry the Danish ships, one author (39) tells us, that he did it by straitning the channel, which seems very improbable; but Henry of Huntington (40), with a greater appearance of truth, alledges, that he cut several canals, which exhausted it's water. His indefatigable endeavours not only to defend his kingdom against all invaders, but also to punish those perfidious Danes, who had submitted to him, succeeded so well, that he appointed Guthred (41) a Saxon, though of Danish original, King of Northumberland, and took all Essex from the kingdom of the East Angles, which had been yielded to the Danes, appointing one Birtheolf (42) to be Earl thereof, who proved a new and great check to his restless and pilfering neighbours, so long as he lived; but he, together with many other of Ælfred's prime nobility, was carried off by the plague, mentioned (43) in the text, and which seems to have been chiefly owing to the depopulation made by the Danes.

[I] There happened nothing remarkable. It would be both tedious and troublesome, to set down all that we find in modern writers, concerning Ælfred, and therefore we chuse to confine ourselves in this latter part of his life, where we have not the assistance of Asserius, to the Saxon Chronicle, and other ancient authors. The stories which we have relating to miracles and apparitions, seem to be the fabrick of later times, though some of them are disguised under the name of ancient authors. It looks like debasing the great actions of this excellent Prince, to intermix with them the dreams of monkish writers, who, taking occasion from lands granted to a monastery, or some such circumstance, frame such strange tales, as nothing but the excessive blindness of succeeding ages could render credible. What lesser exploits were performed in his time against the Danes, as they belong rather to the particular articles of those who performed them, or to the general history of those times, so we pretend not to insert them here, where the personal history of Ælfred is properly concerned; but whoever would see things of this nature in the fullest light, may consult Dr Walker's version of Sir John Spelman's life of Ælfred, where, in the notes and appendix, he will find matter sufficient to excise his curiosity.

[K] There are but few. There seems to be good reason to believe, that the complete body of laws formed by King Ælfred, is either lost, or else not distinguishable at this day, to which opinion we are led by many reasons. Several laws are mentioned as made by Ælfred, which are not extant among those laws that we have. In the Mirror of Justices, a book written in the reign of Edward I, or rather revised then by Andrew Horne; there is mention made of a body of his laws, and even of a collection of his judgments then in publick use, of which we know nothing at this day; though it appears by Harding's chronicle (44), that they were used in Westminster-Hall, in the reign of Edward IV. Mr Lambard, who published the laws we now have, takes notice in his epistle to the reader, that other laws of King Ælfred there were, which he was not without hopes of recovering. That all are not lost is owing in some measure to the industry of John Bromton (45), or whoever penned the chronicle which goes under his name, where we find them with those of other Saxon Kings. They consist of three distinct chapters, the first of which is entitled, the Laws of King Ælfred, the second is the shorter, and the third the longer treaty between him and the Danish King of the East Angles, who is therein called Godrinus. Before those which are filed the laws of Ælfred, and which are in number fifty-one, there is a preface (46), wherein the King recites many things concerning the excellency and use of laws, the apostolick canons, and the decalogue; in the close the King tells us, that he had collected out of the laws of his ancestor King Ina, out of those of Offa, King of Mercia, and of Æthelbert, the first Christian Saxon King, such as appeared to him most just and reasonable, and having communicated them to the learned men of his kingdom, he, with their assent, published them to be the rule of his people's actions. Some think that this his constitution we owe many of those advantages, which render our constitution dear to us; for instance, trials by juries (*) [L]. If we rely on Sir John Spelman's conjecture, his institutions were the foundation of what is called the Common Law, so styled, either on account of it's being the common law of all the Saxons, without respect to the different kingdoms in which they lived, or because it was common both to the Saxons and the Danes (y). It is indeed a disputed point, whether he was the first who divided the kingdom into shires; but it seems to admit of no dispute, that he settled those boundaries and lesser distinctions which remain at this day (z) [M]. In consequence of which he framed is a direct confutation of what Harding and others have written concerning King Ælfred's laws, viz. that they were collected from those of the Trojans, Greeks, Britons, Danes, &c. But to this two answers may be given, first, that these are not perhaps the laws to which those writers refer, but rather the compleater code, which, as we have remarked, is not extant that we know of. Secondly, it may be insisted on, that these very laws were so collected, because for this there is direct proof. King Ælfred asserts, that he collected from the laws of King Ina, and if we will believe King Ina (47) himself, his laws were many of them taken from the British constitutions, and those, if we will believe their authors, were excerpts from the Greek and Trojan laws. Without all question, these institutions are very wise, and well suited to the times and purposes they were given for. But Sir John Spelman (48) seems to be mistaken, when he asserts, that they were milder than the antient Saxon laws, to which this nation were obedient when in Germany, because the contrary appears by comparing them. What led Sir John into this opinion, was the commutations settled by these laws for capital offences. For though death was the punishment of many crimes, yet in most cases the offender might be redeemed for a certain sum of money. For the life and limb of every man, from the peasant to the prince, was valued at a certain rate; so that if any killed or maimed him, he was to make recompence according to that valuation. In case of slaughter, this fine was called wircgild; and, when paid, the King had one part, which was called frithbote, for the breach of his peace and the loss of his subject. The Lord had another stiled manbote, for the loss of his man; and the relations of the party slain had the other third, called magbote or cengild, for the injury they had sustained. If this fine was not paid, the kindred of the person slain, might punish him who slew him with death. If the offender fled, then his relations or townsmen paid the wircgild. In cases of maim, the punishment was according to Lex talionis, an eye for an eye, a tooth for a tooth, unless the offender was in a capacity of commuting with money at the settled price (49). Amongst these laws there is one only relating to inheritance, and that provides, that if a man left his land to his next relation, under a condition that he should not dispose of it, then he should be incapable of selling it, except to his next relation, even though the limitation was not expressed in writing, if proof could be made thereof by a lawful witness (50). It is very clear from this system of laws, that things were not yet in a very settled condition, since there are grievous penalties inflicted on such as fought in the King's house, in the presence of the Archbishop, in the Alderman's court, or in lesser judicatures (51). We may also discern that the manners of the people were very corrupt, from all which, as well as from the silence of these laws with respect to hundreds and tythings, we may well enough conclude, that this collection of ordinances was made pretty early in the King's reign, and before he had brought things to that regularity, which he afterwards did (52). The first treaty between King Ælfred and Guthrum, or Godrinus, King of the East Angles, consists of seven articles, all which relate to the peace of both their dominions, and consists of articles, for preventing the subjects of either Prince, from injuring the subjects of the other (53). The second treaty or capitulation, which in Mr Lambard's edition bears the title of Fœdus Edwardi & Guthrum, is however Ælfred's without all doubt, for Guthrum, or Godrinus, died ten years before Edward came to the crown. In the Saxon edition it consists but of twelve articles, but Bromton in his Latin translation makes them seventeen (54). They relate most of them to religious matters, and the whole drift of them seems to be, the reducing all the Danes settled in England, to the belief and practice of the Christian religion. Considered in this light they are certainly an excellent system, and one thing is very remarkable, that the priests were punished by these laws in the King's courts, besides suffering spiritual penance, according to the canon law (55), which is a plain proof, that the power to which the Pope afterwards pretended, of exempting the clergy from all secular jurisdiction, was not as yet heard of, or at least admitted. It also deserves notice, that by the eleventh law in the Saxon edition, and the sixteenth in the Latin, fortune-tellers, &c. are punished, and all people are forbid to entertain them (56), the Danes being especially addicted to sorcery, as all the northern Pagans were, and still are. Alford (57) the Jesuit hath published most of Ælfred's laws in his Annals, more methodically as he would have us believe, than elsewhere they are to be met with. But this is so far from being true, that the manner in which he has published them is by no means satisfactory. For in the first place they are divided into laws ecclesiastical and civil, so that Ælfred's first collection is distracted, so that no connection appears between the laws as they follow. But besides this, the Jesuit interposes his own commentary at every turn, in order to refute Spelman; so that the reader must redress the inaccuracy of the author, before he can apprehend any thing of the sense of Ælfred's laws. Alford takes the same step in relation to the treaties between Ælfred and Guthrum; and it is for this reason, that we did not mention his edition, when we spoke of those of Lambard and Bromton.

[L] Trials by juries.] This is inferred from a law of Ælfred's, which obliged one of the King's Thanes to purge himself by twelve of his Peers, as the purgation of another Thane, was by eleven of his Peers, and one of the King's Thanes. He also is said to have devised the holding men to good behaviour, by obliging them to put in sureties; as also the calling a voucher to prove a property in goods at the time of sale, which, in the sale of horses, is actually revived by the statute of 31 Eliz. which is still in force (58). It certainly deserves admiration, that the difficulties which Ælfred had to struggle with, should prove the cause of so much good to this nation. For it was the mighty disorders occasioned by the barbarity of the Danes, and the corruption of the Saxons, that put the King upon making these laws, as we see plainly from the laws themselves, and yet they were so nicely contrived, and had such a connection with each other, that they were received and admired by posterity, and are the basis of the best laws which we have even at this time. So that even war and confusion afford good men opportunities of conferring benefits on their country, to which all the favours of providence, cannot invite men of narrow or ambitious spirits.

[M] Remain to this day.] The curious reader may meet with the principal arguments used on both sides of this controversy, in Mr Hearne's collection of discourses on British antiquities (59). What is ascribed to Ælfred, is not a bare division of the country, but the settling a new form of judicature, which he did thus: he divided his whole dominions into shires, settling their boundaries very exactly, then he divided each shire into three parts, called trythings, which, though now grown out of date, yet are there some remains of this antient division in the ridings of Yorkshire, the laths of Kent, and the three parts of Lincolnshire. Each trything was divided into hundreds, or wapen-takes, and these again into tythings, or dwellings of ten householders. Each of these householders stood engaged to the King, as pledge for the good behaviour of his family, and all the ten householders were mutually pledges for each other; so that if any one of the tything was suspected of an offence, if the Head-Boroughs, or Chiefs of the tything, would not be security for him, he was imprisoned, framed a book, called the book of Winchester, which contained a survey of the kingdom, and of which the Doomes-day-book still preserved in the Exchequer, is no more than a second edition (a). He likewise made use of this division for the proper distribution of justice so happily, that whereas he found the kingdom in the utmost confusion, and the people therein so indigent, and so given to rapine, that it was equally difficult to acquire wealth, or to keep it when acquired: yet before his death he brought all things into such order, as that never any kingdom was better governed, and so effectually tamed the covetous spirit that induces one man to take from another, that money or jewels might be left on the publick roads, and no passenger attempt to touch it (b). In the management of affairs of state, he, after the custom of his ancestors the Kings of the West Saxons, made use of the great council of the kingdom, consisting of Bishops, Earls, the King's Aldermen, and his Chief Thanes or Barons, these in the first part of his reign he convoked as occasion served, but when things were better settled, he made a law, that twice in the year at least, an Assembly or Parliament, if I may be allowed so to call it, should be held at London, there to provide for the well-governing of the commonwealth; from which ordinance his successors varied a little, holding such assemblies not in any place certain, but wherever they resided, at Christmas, Easter, or Whitsuntide (c). As to extraordinary affairs, and such emergencies as would not admit of calling great councils, the King acted therein by the advice of such Bishops, Earls, and officers in the army, as happened to be about his person (d). In respect to military concerns, there hath been already so much said, as makes it unnecessary to add much here. Let it however be observed, that though this nation could never boast of a greater soldier than he, since he fought fifty-six set battles by sea and land, and of these eight in one year (e): Yet was he so far from being of a cruel, blood-thirsty, or ambitious temper, that he never willingly made war on any, or refused to grant peace whenever it was desired (f). His troops he rendered by degrees invincible, through just and regular discipline, and appointed such methods of raising, recruiting, and distributing them in winter quarters, that his subjects and his militia were synonymous terms, every man who could bear arms being a foldier, and no man serving but in his turn, and according to law (g). His coasts he secured by guard-ships, making his navy his peculiar care (h). His frontiers were covered by castles well fortified, which, before his time, the Saxons had never raised. Add to all this, that his instructions and example raised numbers of able officers, whose abilities the King constantly cherished by proportionable rewards (i). In respect to other affairs, Ælfred was no less knowing and industrious, as appears by his repairing the cities throughout his dominions demolished by the Danes, erecting new ones, and adorning and embellishing such as were in a mean and low condition (k). One would think that a more distinct account might easily be given of this matter; but the truth is, that the writers who lived in and near his time, found it so difficult to mention them all, that they contented themselves with general expressions, excepting what they say of London and Winchester, the latter of which was the royal seat of the West Saxon Kings. However there is a certain circumstance preserved, whereby we may guess at the great things he performed in this way; since it is affirmed, that one sixth part of his clear revenues was applied to the payment of his workmens wages, who had besides meat and drink at the King's cost (l). Lucky accidents, and the painful researches of antiquaries, have justified this conjecture by various discoveries [N]. In respect to religious foundations, as this prince was exceedingly remarkable for his piety, so he excelled most of his predecessors in his care on this head. For besides re-edifying and restoring almost every monastery in his dominions, which

soned, and if he made his escape, the tything and hundred were fined to the King. Each shire was under the government of an Earl, under whom was the Reive, his Deputy, since, from his office, called Shire-reive, or Sheriff; and besides these, there were Wites, or Wife-men, who were a kind of Justices, who sat to hear causes in the county court, where such things were determined, as came by appeal from the inferior or hundred courts (60). It would draw this note into too great a length, should we insist on the many advantages flowing from these regulations; and besides, if we only consider, that by this method the King had security for every one of his subjects, for none was accounted a liege-man, or entitled to the protection of the laws, who did not belong to some tything or other; we cannot but confess, that it is the wisest plan of government, which is perhaps any where extant.

[N] Justified these conjectures by various discoveries. Afferius Menevensis, and Florence of Worcester (61), treating of this subject, break out thus: What can be said of the cities he restored, and of those built by him, where there were none before! plainly intimating, that it seemed to them an infinite work. Time hath discovered, that he was the founder of Shaftesbury, in Dorsetshire; for as William of Malmfbury informs us, there was dug out of the ruins of old walls, a stone with this inscription;

Ælfredus Rex fecit hanc urbem, regni sui 80 (62).

That is, A. D. 880. being the eighth of his reign, King Ælfred founded this city. The same author farther tells us, that it was much decayed in his time. He is also said to have been the founder of Middleton and Balford, in Kent, as also of the Devizes in Wiltshire, and of Ælfreton in Derbyshire. Malmfbury also being burnt and ruined by the Danes, he restored and re-built it (63). There is also a coin of his, which seems to intimate, that he did as much for the city of Norwich. This coin was first published by Speed (64), and has been since inserted in Sir Andrew Fountain's Tables. On one side is a head, which Mr Walker and Sir Andrew seem to think belongs to Ælfred, King of Northumberland, though it much resembles those of Ælfred the Great, published by Mr Walker himself. On the reverse is a monogram, which Mr Edward Thwaites, who wrote notes on those coins, ingeniously guessed to signify Civitas Northuicum (65). Now this seems plainly to prove, that this cannot belong to Ælfred of Northumberland, for as Mr Camden well observes, Norwich was not a place of great consideration in his time (66). It is therefore more probable, that Speed was in the right, and that this piece of money belongs to Ælfred the Great, and refers to his restoring that city.

either the prevailing poverty of the times, or the sacrilegious fury of the Danes, had brought to ruin, he built many, and improved more, besides other acts of munificence towards the Church, which were perhaps as useful and honourable to the full, though it would take up too much room to insist on them here (m) [O]. As to his founding the university of Oxford, it is a matter so warmly disputed, and has employed so many learned pens, that it by no means becomes us to decide it. Thus much, however, is certainly due on that head to King Ælfred, that he restored and settled that university, endowed it with revenues, and fought out and placed there the most famous professors in several sciences, as will be shewn in a note (n) [P]. A King who was so careful of his people, might well allow something to his royal magnificence, especially since in all he did of this sort, he was ever mindful of his subjects honour, as well as careful of their ease. He repaired all the royal palaces, which the confusion of the times before his reign had brought to decay, adorned the houses of pleasure in the country, and built many from the ground, in such places as were either tempting by situation, or stood so as that he thought the royal presence might be sometimes necessary thereabout (o). As he had always a very numerous court, and, above all things, took pleasure in seeing his nobility about him, so he struck out a method of doing all this without prejudice to the publick; which ought not to be forgotten. He framed three different households, each under a separate Lord-Chamberlain, these waited in their turns, a month every quarter, so that in the year, each of the King's menial servants was four months at court, and eight at home (p). In all other respects, he was extremely careful to keep up both the [O] Though it would take up too much room here. There never was a Prince more cautious than Ælfred, that no one part of his duty, should withdraw his attention from the rest. When his misfortunes compelled him to take shelter in the isle of Athelney, he built upon the two acres of firm ground which lay in the midst of the marshes, a strong fort, and on the other side of the narrow path which led to it, he built a redoubt, to prevent the enemy from making themselves masters of it. As soon as his victories had delivered him from an apprehension of retiring thither again, he demolished the castle, and with the materials restored an ancient monastery, which he adorned and beautified, as far as his own and the nation's circumstances, which scarce afforded either materials or workmen, would permit (67). When he had finished it, he was at a loss for persons to reside in it; this forced him to send for an Abbot out of Saxony, to invite several Monks from France, and, to make up the number, he added English youths, chusing rather to place there such as might be instructed in learning, than old lazy drones, who neither had, nor would acquire any (68). The next religious house he founded, was a nunnery in his new city of Shaftsbury, at the East gate thereof; this house he filled with nuns, who were all of them noble by descent, and made his daughter Æthelgeof, their Abbess (69). In conjunction with his Queen Ælfwith, he founded a nunnery at Winchester, and a little before his death, he designed, and laid the foundation of a monastery, called the New Monastery there (70): this house was very unluckily situated, for abutting on the cathedral, the King was forced to pay the Bishop a mark of gold, for every foot of land which he took in for the use of his monks, neither did this put an end to these difficulties, as will be seen in another place (71). He was a benefactor to the bishoprick of Durham, by confirming the grant made by Guthrum, King of Northumberland, of all the country between the Tine and Tise, to that church (72). He likewise granted much to the abbey of Glasterbury (73); and sent to the cathedral church of Sherburn, several precious stones, which were brought to him from the Indies (74). The abbey of Wilton, was a royal foundation before his time, for an abbeys and twelve nuns, he increased their number to twenty-six, on account of a victory he obtained over the Danes, in the neighbourhood of that place (75). There is also a charter of his extant, whereby he granted the profits of a wharf in London, to the cathedral church of Worcester (76). He took care besides all this, to send his alms constantly to Rome, as appears from various passages of the Saxon chronicle, wherein we find the names of the persons by him intrusted on such occasions (77). Yet it does not appear, that he was slavishly addicted to that court, but, on the contrary, that he supported the dignity of his crown and it's supremacy; though, according to the reigning opinion of those times, he willingly paid all possible marks of reverence and duty to the Bishops of that See, who, on the other hand, were never wanting in their compliments and addresses to him.

[P] As will be shewn in a note. Whoever desires to be fully acquainted with this controversy, may meet with a very succinct account thereof in Spelman's Life of Ælfred, and the very learned notes written thereupon, by the laborious Mr Hearne. There is also some curious things on this subject, in a discourse added by Mr Wise, to his edition of Aferius Menevensis. But the author who has insisted most fully on this, and all other controversies relating to Oxford, is the celebrated Anthony Wood, to whose account of this matter, little can be added. The schools erected by Ælfred at Oxford, were the Great Hall, the Lesser Hall, and the Little Hall. In the Great Hall was taught Divinity only, and on this foundation there were twenty-six scholars; in the Lesser Hall they taught Logick, Musick, Arithmetick, Geometry, and Astronomy, on this foundation there were also twenty-six scholars; in the Little Hall there was nothing taught but Grammar, however, there were twenty-six scholars also entertained here, as well as in each of the other foundations. The first Divinity professors were St Neotus, and St Grimbald. At the request of the former, it is said Ælfred erected these schools, and the latter he sent for from abroad, to preside in them. The first reader in Logick, Musick, and Arithmetick, was John, a Monk of St Davids, as the reader in Geometry, and Astronomy, was another Monk of the same name, who was companion to St Grimbald; and Affer, the Monk, read in Grammar, and Rhetorick (78). We have shewn in the text, how these schools were endowed, not by any grant of lands, but by an annual income out of the Exchequer, which, as well out of regard to the utility of these foundations, as from a deep respect for their first founder, was punctually paid by all the Saxon Kings, until, as some say, Harold (79), or, as others affirm, William the Conqueror, stopped and took them away (80). As to the time in which these schools were founded, it is not easily determined; very probably they were not all built at once, but rather by degrees, as the King's finances would allow, according to his established rule of so executing his new projects as not to prejudice his former designs. It is not however likely, that these schools were settled before he repaired London, and constituted his son-in-law Æthered, Earl of Mercia, because Oxford lay within his territories. There have also been some questions stirred as to these professors, the resolution of which cannot be expected here, but the inquisitive reader may be satisfied by consulting their several articles in this Dictionary. We shall close this note by observing, that Ælfred is universally acknowledged the founder of University College, at Oxford, and there is still a very ancient painting of this Prince in the master's lodgings, as there is a very old bust of him in stone over the door of the refectory in Brazen Nose College, in the same university (81).

dignity and the lustre of his court; but whether he made use of an imperial crown enriched with jewels, is a point which may admit of much dispute. To conclude his character as a King, than which there is not a brighter in the English, or perhaps in any chronicles, we shall take notice of the manner in which he settled his revenue, to which he strictly and constantly adhered throughout his life. In the first place, he divided it equally, assigning the first to sacred, the second to civil uses. The former he divided into four parts, one to be bestowed in alms upon the poor in general, another he destined for the support of the religious houses of his own foundation, a third was given to the publick schools, and the fourth employed in rebuilding or in relieving monasteries, and other publick foundations at home and abroad. The other moiety of his revenue was divided into three parts, one for the support of his household, another for the payment of his workmen, and a third for the entertainment and relief of strangers (7). In his private life he was the most worthy, the most industrious, and the most amiable man in his dominions, of so equal a temper, that after he had once taken the crown, he never suffered either sadness, or unbecoming gaiety, to enter his mind; but appeared always of a calm, yet chearful disposition, familiar to his friends, just, even to his enemies, kind and tender to all. And to this account, we should add two things, viz. A description of that care with which he watched over his time, as also the pains he was at in dividing it, which however, would take up too much room here (7) [Q]; and the evidences he gave of his great learning, which must likewise be referred to a note [R]. Taking all his qualifications together, remembering the many virtues he had,

[Q] Which however, would take up too much room here.] We have two accounts of this matter, which at first sight seem to differ widely, but when seriously considered, agree well enough. The first is, that of Afferius, who lived with the King, and wrote what he saw (82). He asserts, that the King dedicated one half of his time to the service of God. Whereas, William of Malmshury (83) asserts, that dividing his time into three parts, he devoted the first to God, the second to the affairs of his kingdom, and the third to his natural rest and refreshment. But as Afferius qualifies his account, by telling us, that the King's vow was with many necessary restrictions, it brings the matter pretty near the other calculation. This division of his time, was as we have noted, in consequence of a vow, and that vow was made not in the time of his distress, but immediately after he had finished his monastery at Athelney, when he was in full spirits, and in the flower of his age. Afferius gives us also a very singular account of the method he took for dividing his time, and keeping his account of it. He caused six wax candles to be made, each of twelve inches long, and of as many ounces weight, on these candles he caused the inches to be regularly marked, and having found that one of them burnt just four hours, he committed them to the care of the keepers of his chapel, who, from time to time, gave him notice how the hours went. But as in windy weather the candles were wasted by the impression of the air on the flame, he, to remedy this inconyeniency, invented lanterns, there being then no glafs to be met with in his dominions (84). That part of his time which he dedicated to sacred uses, he spent in hearing the publick offices of the Church, reading the scriptures and books of devotion, in meditation, and in writing. As to the publick affairs of his kingdom, he assisted regularly at councils, and performed every thing that was incumbent on him to do. At his leisure hours he conferred with men of learning, and such strangers as resorted to his court, of whom there were always not a few, or else he went to view his buildings, or, as the season of the year directed, to partake of those innocent diversions which were fit to recreate the mind of a man, and were at the same time not unworthy of a Prince, such as hunting, hawking, musick, in all which he was well skilled, and delighted much.

[R] Must likewise be referred to a note.] In order to give a full and perfect account of what Ælfred performed as a learned man, and a lover of learning, there would be at least as much room necessary, as we have employed in giving the memoirs of his life. If he had not been illustrious as a King, he would have been famous as an author; as, on the other hand, if we had no memorialis of his writings, he must have been sufficiently remembered to posterity, as a protector of the Muses. In all probability, the first rise of his love for letters, was occasioned by his journey to Rome, for at home he could see little that looked this way. He tells us himself, in an epistle prefixed to the translation of Gregory's Pastoral, that in those days there were very few on this side Humber, even amongst the clergy, who understood their own service, or could translate out of Latin into English, so much as an epistle (85). He was himself twelve years old (if there be no mistake in the MS.) before he could read his mother-tongue, and then he was allured to it by the Queen his mother. She had a book of Saxon poems which she often read to her sons, and perceiving they were mightily pleased therewith, she promised to bestow it on him who should first get it by heart; this task Ælfred undertook and performed, without instructor or assistant, and gave thereby an early and wonderful proof of his zeal and industry in acquiring knowledge (86). As his authority increased he made use of it to increase his skill in the sciences, for he invited to his court not only all the learned men that he could hear of in Wales, Scotland, or Ireland, but also sent into France, and other countries, for persons famous for their skill either in the arts, or in languages, with these he conversed, heard them interpret authors, and as Afferius Menevensis, who was himself one of them, tells us, whenever he had a vacant hour, he employed it in reading to others, or in hearing others read (87). He also forbid all men to execute the functions of magistrates, if they were not well versed in learning, and that this might not bear hard upon posterity, he compelled by a law such as had competent fortunes, to give their children proper education (88). For the furtherance of this, he built and endowed schools all over the kingdom, inspecting himself into the conduct as well of those who taught, as of such as were bred up in those places; by these methods, before the end of his reign (as we learn from himself) he furnished every pulpit in the kingdom with a good preacher, and had as learned a set of Bishops and superior Clergy, as any of his predecessors, who yet were famous in their time for their felicity in this respect. We shall the less wonder at this, when we consider the great proficiency to which the King himself arrived in all sorts of learning, for he was a good Grammarian, an excellent Rhetorician, an acute Philosopher, a judicious Historian, a skilful Musician, understood Geometry, was an able Architect, and the Prince of the Saxon Poets (89). Of all this he left ample testimony to posterity, in a multitude of admirable works, and elegant translations, some of which, and the titles of many more, are yet remaining, of which, as it becomes us, we shall here give a concise account, lest we should be thought to have been sparing in our pains, where the fame of so great a man, and so good a Prince, was concerned. Bale (90), and Pits (91), have each of them a catalogue of this King's works, neither of which are very exact; however, the deficiencies may be supplied from other writers. The first book mentioned by Bale, is Breviarum quoddam Collectum ex Legibus Trojanorum, &c. lib. 1. that is, A Breviary collected out of the Lawes of the Trojans, Greeks, Britons, Saxons, and Danes, in one Book. This seems to be that collection of

of laws which is now wanting, and perhaps many who know the credit of Bale and Pits, will think this but an indifferent proof, that ever there was fuch a work, let us therefore produce a better authority, which is that of Leland (92), who actually faw the book now in queftion, written in the Saxon tongue, at Chrif's Church in Hamphire. 2. Vifi-Saxonum Leges, lib. i. that is, The Law of the Weft Saxons, in one Book: Pits cites the firft line of it, and tells us, that it is in Bennet College library at Cambridge; it is in truth, that little fyftem of laws which is now extant, and of which we have already given an account (93). 3. Inftituta Quædam, lib. i. that is, Certain Inftitutes. This is not taken notice of in the firft edition of Bale, but it is mentioned by Pits, who cites the beginning of it, whence it fhould feem to be no other, than the fecond capitulation with Guthrum (94). 4. Contra Judices Iniquos, lib. i. that is, An Inveftive againft unjuft Judges, in one Book. That King Ælfred was very fevere againft fuch offenders is certain, fince Andrew Horne mentions the names of four, who with forty more were hanged by him in one year, for iniquitous practices in the execution of their office (95). 5. Acta Magistratum fuorum, lib. i. that is, Acts of his Magiftrates, in one Book. This perhaps is the book of judgments mentioned by Horne, and was, in all probability, a kind of Reports intended for the ufe of fucceeding ages. 6. Regum Fortunæ variæ, lib. i. that is, The various Fortunes of Kings, in one Book. 7. Diéta Sapientum, lib. i. that is, The Sayings of wife Men, in one Book. 8. Parabole & Sales, lib. i. that is, Parables and pleafant Sayings, in one Book. There feems to be fome doubt, whether this ought to be accounted a work of Ælfred's or not. There are various MSS. extant with this title, part of one is publifhed by Spelman in the life of this King (96), another fragment is to be found in a work of Dr Hicckes's (97), among Sir Kenelm Digby's MSS. there is another work of this fort, intitled, Ælfred's Proverbs (98). 9. Collections Chronicon, lib. i. that is, Collections of Chronicles, in one Book. 10. Epiftolæ ad Wulffigum Epifcopum, lib. i. that is, Epiftles to Bifhop Wulffig, in one Book. This book is mentioned by Pits, yet, in all probability, it is no more than the epiftle to Wulffig, Bifhop of London, prefixed to the tranflation of Gregory's Paftoral, by this King (99). 11. Manuale Meditationum, lib. i. that is, A Manual of Meditations. This was no other than a book of memoranda, and we have in another place given an account, how it came into the King's head to collect them. The King called it very fignificantly in Saxon, Hand-Book, becaufe he had it always in or at hand (110). As to his tranflations they were thefe, 12. Dialogus D. Gregorii, that is, A Dialogue of St Gregory's. Pits fays that there is fuch a book extant in Bennet college library in Cambridge, but that it appears to have been written by Wrebert, Bifhop of Chefter, yet fome, from a paffage in Afferius Menevenfis, think it was tranflated both by the Bifhop and by the King, for which we fhall account hereafter. 13. Paftorale ejuſdem Gregorii, lib. ii. that is, The Paftoral of Gregory, which ſome aſcribed to the aforeſaid Bifhop. In the prefatory epiftle before this work, addreffed to the Bifhop of London, the King himſelf expreſſly fays, That amidft the various and arduous affairs of his kingdom, he undertook this tranſlation, which may in Engliſh be called The Herdman's Book, rendering it ſometimes word for word, at other times more freely, according as he received the ſenſe from Pledgmond his Archbiſhop, Aſſor his Biſhop, and Grimbald, and John, his maj's Priests (101), for they conſtrued, and the King put their ſenſe into a florid drefs. This explains the whole affair perfectly, and we need be in no manner of doubt, how far theſe pieces belong to this Prince or to other men. 14. Horneftam Pauli Oroſii, lib. i. This tranſlation of Oroſius, is alſo attributed to another perſon (102). 15. Boetius de Conſolatione, lib. v. that is, Boetius's Conſolations of Philoſophy, in five Books. This ſome aſcribe to the Bifhop of Worceſter, others to Afferius Menevenfis. It was publifhed from Junius's tranſcript by Chriſtopher Robinſon, Efq; at Oxford, in 1698, in

8vo. Dr Plot tells us, King Ælfred tranſlated it at Woodſtock, as he found in a MS. in the Cotton Library (103). 16. Afferii Sententiæ, lib. i. that is The Sayings of Afferius, in one Book. 17. Martiana Leges, lib. i. that is, The Law of Queen Martia, widow of Guibelinus, in one Book. 18. Molmutina Leges, lib. i. that is, The Law of Malmutius, in one Book. Theſe laws were firſt tranſlated out of the Britiſh tongue, by Gildas, into Latin, and from this Latin tranſlation, King Ælfred made his verſion, as we are told by Ralph Higden (104), who alſo obſerves, that Ælfred wrote another piece on the Saxon laws, as alſo a third of Dane law, and out of theſe three collections of laws, Edward the Confeſſor framed his laws, and ſomething to the ſame purpoſe we read in Bromton (105). 19. Geſta Anglorum Bedæ, lib. v. that is, The Deeds of the Engliſh by Bedæ, in five Books, a copy of which is in the publick library at Cambridge, with this diſtich thereupon (106).

Mr Whelock, in 1644, publifhed this piece in folio. Whence it appears, that it is not ſo properly a tranſlation as a paraphraſe, as all the King's verſions were. 20. Æſopi Fabulæ, that is, Æſop's Fables, which it is ſaid he tranſlated from the Greek, both into Latin and Saxon. 21. Pfalterium Davidicum, lib. i. that is, David's Pfalter, in one Book. This was the laſt work the King attempted, death ſurprizing him before he had finiſhed it. It was however completed by another hand, and publifhed at London, in 1640, in 4to, by Sir John Spelman. Beſides all theſe, Malmſbury mentions his tranſlating many Latin authors (107), and the old hiſtory of Ely aſſerts, that he tranſlated the Old and New Testaments (108). Add to this, that John Fox, who had ſeen ſome memorialſ of Ælfred which are not now extant, ſpeaks of his Commentaries which he compiled under the title of the Story of Ælfred (109), and ſomething to the ſame purpoſe we meet with, in the old chronicle called Brute of England.

[S] Admired both by them and by foreigners.] A bare recapitulation of what our beſt hiſtorians have ſaid, would draw this note into an extravagant length, without exhauſting the praifes which they have beſtowed upon him. In the margin however we have cited a few authors, that our apology may not be altogether deſtitute of proof (110). To this we ſhall add, as the proper buſineſs of this work, ſome facts which prove what we have advanced in the text, that Ælfred in his life-time, was equally admired and applauded by his own ſubjects and foreigners. As to the former, we are to conſider, that at Ælfred's acceſſion to the throne, he found them ſo dejected that they had no courage to fight, and ſo exhauſted that they had ſcarce any thing to fight for. Yet in a few years he ſo revived their hopes, and ſo fixed their affections to his perſon, that they were ready to attend him in all ſervices, and to ſubmit to whatever laws he thought neceſſary for their government; from being a lazy and barbarous, they became an active and polite people, and, in conſequence of theſe improvements, grew a greater and more potent nation than they had ever been (111). We have ſeen in the text many inſtances of this fort, and there is one which we have hitherto omitted, and which comes in very properly here. This King made a vow that he would ſend alms to the diſciples of St Thomas, in the Eaſt-Indies, and he performed it (112), to the admiration not only of thoſe who were his contemporaries, and ſaw the precious ſtones, perfumes, and other valuable effects, brought back by his ſhips from thoſe Eaſtern climates, but alſo ſuch as lived in ſucceeding ages, when both the courage and the conduct neceſſary to the undertaking ſuch expeditions being wanting, the remembrance of it was the more revered. eight years, on the twenty-eighth of October, A. D. 900, as some writers inform us (1), though there is a great deal of variety in that point, even amongst our best historians [T]. There is likewise some discord about his place of interment, occasioned chiefly by accidents subsequent thereto (u) [U]. This King had to wife Ælswith, or Æthelwith, daughter to Earl Æthelred, by whom he had two sons and three daughters. Of these Edward, the eldest, succeeded him in the throne, and is by most of our historians called Edward the Elder, to distinguish him from the Confessor. His second son was Æthelward, the youngest of all his children, and bred a scholar. His eldest daughter Æthelfleda, as Sir John Spelman well observes, was a woman of more than feminine spirit, and possessed such a measure of her father's virtues, as enabled her to be very useful by her was the fame of this monarch for his knowledge in the art of navigation, and for his generous encouragement of all such as were arrived at any proficiency therein, that Oðher, a Dane or a Norman, who was excellently skilled both in the theory and practice of this noble art, repaired to the court of Ælfred, made him a tender of his services, and was actually employed, together with Wolstan an Englishman, in an attempt to discover the north-east passage. Of this voyage there was formerly an authentick account, in a MS. in Sir Thomas Cotton's library (113), which probably was the original of that still extant in Hackluyt's collection (114): but there is still a better account in being, which was given by the King's own pen, in his version of Orosius into Saxon; which account has been translated into Latin, and is to be seen in the appendix to Sir John Spelman's life, published by Mr Walker. The voyage of Abel, Patriarch of Jerusalem, into Britain, as it was wholly owing to, so it is a most noble testimony of the great virtues and extensive fame of this English monarch. Neither are we in any doubt concerning the fact, since it is related by Asferius, who saw and conversed with him, and read his letters credential (115). As for the European Princes, they had all correspondence with, and shewed a great esteem for Ælfred, particularly the Popes who lived in his time, as appears from the Saxon Chronicle, Malmfbury's, and other authentick histories.

[7] Even amongst our best historians.] The Saxon Chronicle (116) places his death six nights before the feast of All Saints, or on the twenty-sixth of October, A. D. 901. The Chronicle of Peterborough (117), which seems remarkably exact, places the death of this King, in A. D. 901. The Chronicle of Mailrofs (118), assigns the fifth of the Calends of November, A. D. 901, for the day of the King's death. Simeon of Durham (119) tells us, he died the fifth of the Calends of November 899. Ralph de Diceto (120) says nothing of his death, but he places the accession of his son Edward to the throne, in the year 900. Bromton (121) who takes the same method, says that Edward succeeded in 901. Ingulphus (122) fixes his death to the year 900. Ralph Higden (123) hath the same date. Alured of Beverly (124) seems to place his death in 899, or 900, for he says, that he ascended the throne in 871, and that he reigned twenty-eight years and an half. According to William of Malmfbury (125) he died in 901. Roger Hoveden (126) informs us, that the King deceased on the fifth of the Calends of November, A. D. 899. Florence of Worcester (127), and Matthew of Westminster (128), agree on the twenty-eighth of October, 901. Robert of Gloucester (129) tells us, he reigned eight and twenty years, and as he places the beginning of his reign in 872, he must consequently have died in 900. Mr Walker, who is very exact, thinks the most certain date to be the feast of S. Simon and Jude, A. D. 901, in the fifty-third year of his age.

[U] Occasioned chiefly by accidents subsequent thereto.] The very history of the corps of Ælfred, is not without great singularities. One would have thought so great, so learned, so pious a Prince, might have found rest in his first grave, but it happened otherwise. He was first buried in the cathedral at Winchester, but the Canons of that church having a spite to his memory, pretended that they were disturbed by his ghost, whereupon his son and successor, Edward, caused his body to be removed to the new monastery, which was left unfinished at his death. This story we have both in Malmfbury's (130), and in the larger history of Winchester (131). Here it rested till the dissolution of monasteries, when the pious Dr Richard Fox, Bishop of Winchester, caused the bones of all our Saxon King's to be collected, and put into chests of lead, with inscriptions upon each of them, shewing whose bones it contained, all which chests he took care to have placed on the top of a wall of exquisite workmanship, built by him to enclose the presbytery of the cathedral (132). Here one would have imagined they should have remained out of the reach of danger, so long as the wall stood, but it seems we have since had greater barbarians, than either Danes or Normans, who, for ought we know, never attempted to disturb the ashes of the dead, especially of Princes; whereas Sir William Waller, General of the parliament forces, after taking the city of Winchester, on the fourteenth of December, 1642, entered the cathedral, broke the glass windows, destroyed the fine monuments, threw down Bishop Fox's leaden chests, scattering most of the bones all over the church, and carried some of them in triumph to other places. Of these as many as could be collected, were brought to Oxford, and lodged in the Repository adjoining to the publick library (133). Henry of Huntington honoured the memory of this excellent Prince, with a copy of Latin verses (134), that comprize a just and elegant character of his many virtues; which induced the famous Leland to transcribe them into his account of Ælfred (135), and for this reason, we doubt not the reader's being well pleased to find them here.

Nobilitas innata tibi probitas honorem,
Arripotens Ælfrede, dedit; probitasque laborem;
Perpetuumque labor nomen; cui mixta dolore
Gaudia semper erant, semper spes mixta timori.
Si modo victor eras, ad crastina bella parabas.
Si modo victus eras, ad crastina bella parabas.
Cui vestes sudore jugi, cui sicca coram
Tincta jugi, quantum sit onus regnare probarunt:
Non fuit immensis quicumque per climata mundi
Cui tot in adversis vel respirare liceret;
Nec tamen aut ferro contritus ponere ferrum
Aut gladio potuit vitæ sibi laborem.
Jam post transactos vitæ, regnique dolores Christus ei sit vera quies, sceptrumque perenne!

Of these Latin lines we have a very close, and, considering the time in which it was written, a very harmonious version by Sir John Spelman, which, for the sake of the English reader, we have thought proper to annex (136).

*Thy true nobility of mind and blood
(O warlike Ælfred) gave thee to be good.
Goodness industrious made thee; industry
Got thee a name to all posterity.
'Twas mixt mixed hopes and fears, 'twixt joy and grief,
Thou ever felt'st distress, and found relief.
Victor this day, next day thou dost ne'ertheless
I'the field dispute thy former day's success.
O'ercome this day, next day for all the blow,
Thou giv'st or tak'st another overbrow.
Thy brows from sweat, thy sword from blood ne'er dry,
What 'twas to reign, so to us signify.
The world cannot produce so much as one
That through the like adversities has gone.
Yet found'st thou not the rest thou sought'st here,
But with a crown Christ gives it thee elsewhere.*

her advice to her brother King Edward. She married Æthered, Earl of Mercia, and, together with him, had the care of Æthelstan her nephew. Ælfred's second daughter was called Æthelgeow, or Æthelgora, who was Abbess of her father's new foundation at Athelney. His youngest daughter, called by some Ælfreda, by others Æthelwith, married Baldwin, Earl of Flanders (w). What care King Ælfred took in providing for these, and for all his relations, may be seen in an extract from his will, which we have placed in the notes (x) [W]. His fame and fortune considered, we need not wonder, that all our historians have been particularly careful, in transmitting the memory of his great achievements to posterity, or that many considerable persons, should compose special memoirs of his life. Amongst these the first was Asserius Menevensis, who wrote in the King's life-time, and dedicated his memoirs to Ælfred himself, as the reader may see in his article. Some would persuade us that St Neotus wrote also a life of Ælfred, the ground of which mistake we have shewn in the article beforementioned (y). In later times Sir John Spelman composed, in English, the life of this great Prince, which he deposited in MS. in the Bodleian library, where it remained a long time, before it was given to the publick in any shape; at last it came abroad in a Latin translation, by the ingenious Mr Christopher Wife, accompanied with a very ample comment, by the very learned and industrious Obadiah Walker, Master of University Colledge (z). This served only to raise a desire of seeing Sir John Spelman's life, as he left it, which after much expectation was gratified, by the laborious Mr Thomas Hearne, who embellished his edition with learned and curious notes (a). Besides these there is a life of Ælfred, or rather a parallel between the life of Ælfred, and that of Charles I, written by one Mr Powell, with great ingenuity and learning (b). But after all, it would be doing this nation a very acceptable service, if a person equal to the task, would, from these, and other vast helps which might easily be met with, compose a new life of Ælfred, inserting his laws and other pieces, in their proper places, and illustrating them, as well as whatever passages might require it, with copious dissertations. This would not only place one of the most glorious periods of our history in a proper light, but would also give us a very amiable view of our ancient constitution, which, the more it is considered, and the better it is understood, will appear to have been the best contrived, for promoting the glory of the Prince, and the good of the subject, that ever the world saw, or in all probability ever will see, unless some future Ælfred should arise, and reform all the errors that time and accidents have brought into our system.

[W] Which we have placed in the notes.] This testament was first published by Archbishop Parker, and hath been since very correctly printed by Mr Wise, at the end of Asserius de Rebus Gestis Ælfredi (137). It begins thus: I Ælfred, by the divine favour, by the pains and care of Archbishop Æthelred, and by the assent and consent of the nobility of West Saxony, King of the West Saxons, &c. He first recites the will of his father Æthelwolf, whereby the crown was entailed on his brothers Æthelbald, Æthelred, and on himself. He then proceeds to show the treaties into which he had entered with the last possessor, and how the crown came to be legally his. Then he disposes of his lands, which descended to him from his ancestors, to his eldest son Edward; afterwards he bequeaths many estates therein specified to his younger son; he then gives distinct estates to each of his three daughters. To Athelm, his brother's son, he gives certain lands, and the like to Æthelwald, another brother's son, and to Offert, his kinsman, several townships. To Alfwih he gives three towns, he bequeaths each of his sons five hundred pounds, and to Alfwih and his three daughters, four hundred pound, that is, a hundred pounds a piece. He gives to each of his squires a hundred marks. The same sum to each of his three relations beforementioned. To Æthelred, General of his forces, he gives a sword, and two thousand marks. To the Archbishop he gives a hundred marks. To three Bishops, of whom one is Asser, Bishop of Shireburn, an hundred marks each, to be distributed for himself and his father. He gives also two hundred pounds to fifty priests, fifty shillings to every religious person in his kingdom, fifty shillings, to be distributed to the poor, and fifty shillings to the church where he should be buried. These legacies he says would exhaust, in his opinion, all that he left behind him, but if it did not, he desires that the remainder might be employed to like uses. The latter part of his testament is spent in directing, that none should presume to hinder his grants from taking place; in entailing the several estates by him bequeathed, first to the heirs male of such as he left them to, and in case of failure, to his own relations, according to the limitations of his father's will; and many other things of a like nature, with many pious exhortations which conclude it. ÆLFREDUS, ALFRÉDUS, ELFREDUS, or ALUREDUS, son to King Æthelred the Unready, by Emma his Queen, daughter to Richard I, Duke of Normandy (a). He was half brother to King Edmund, surnamed Ironside, and brother of the whole blood to King Edward the Confessor. He must have been born in A. D. 1003, and was indubitably elder brother to Edward, though Speed (b), and most our of historians, expressly stile him the younger son of King Æthelred, by Emma. His father's misfortunes falling heavy, it was judged proper to send the two young Princes, Ælfred and Edward, into Normandy, there to be bred up, in the court of their uncle Duke Richard. Accordingly, in 1013, thither they were sent, under the care of Bishop Ælfhun (c). The Norman historians take notice of this, but they tell us, that King Æthelred himself fled into Normandy, from the fury of King Suanus the Dane, and returning with large succours, left behind him his sons Ælfred and Edward (d). After the death of Æthelred, Queen Emma marrying King Canutus, her sons remained still in the Norman court, and were there carefully educated (e) [A]. Duke Robert was as kind to them, as either his father or brother had

[A] Were there carefully educated.] There were Princes into Normandy. Æthelred had by his former Queen, Elgiva, six sons, and four daughters, most had been, and perceiving that they were now grown up and fit to govern, he made such preparations for invading England, as alarmed the Danish monarch, and induced him to avoid the storm, by giving them a part of the kingdom of England, rather than run the hazard of letting them land with a Norman army, which might have given them all. But there followed small fruit of this agreement; for their generous protector, Duke Robert, going to the Holy-Land, the Dane thought no farther of his treaty (f) [B]. On the death of Canutus, however, Alfred a brave active Prince, resolved to venture somewhat for the recovery of his right (as he apprehended it) the English crown (g). Accordingly he embarked with a considerable body of Norman troops, and arriving in England, had bid fair for dispossessing Harold, surnamed Harefoot, the son of Canutus, of the throne, if the basest treachery had not prevented him. Godwin, Earl of Kent, undertook to King Harold, for his destruction, and effected it thus. He pretended to join him, and to assist him in his design, but perfidiously drew him and his Normans into an ambuscade, where, after a slight resistance, he and they were made prisoners. This was done in the neighbourhood of Guilford, where the poor Normans were decimated, and the remainder decimated again, excessive cruelties being used, in putting them to death. As for Alfred, he was carried prisoner to the isle of Ely. At Gillingham (h), his eyes were put out, by the direction either of Earl Godwin, or of Bishop Livingus (i), then lately promoted from the Abbey of Tavistock, to the see of Kirton or Crediton, in Devonshire. This cruelty once executed, he was committed to the monks of the monastery at Ely, with a strict charge to be watchful over him (k). He soon delivered himself and them, from all farther apprehensions, by yielding to death, which some, however, suspect to have been violent (l) [C]. Some place this event most of them grown up and married (1). The Danes were continually harrasing this island by their invasions, and the King, though he wanted not either courage or conduct, was sometimes driven to hard shifts (2). These were causes sufficient, to move him to secure his youngest children, as well from any unkind usage from his offspring by his first marriage, as from all hazard of their falling into the hands of the Danes. Normandy, again, was the natural retreat of these young men, their mother being stiled, by way of eulogy, The flower of Normandy (3). With the Princes, went Ælfhun, Bishop of London, and their mother, Queen Emma, as also a choice guard of 140 men (4). Godwin in his book de Præfulibus, splits this Bishop Ælfhun, into two. In his account of the Bishops of London, he makes Alhunus, the twenty-ninth, and all he says of him, is, He educated the children of King Æthelred, and went with them into Normandy, A. D. 1013 (5). This is the truth, and accurate enough. But in the detail of the Bishops of Durham, he mentions Aldwinus, and tells us of him, that he bred up the Princes Alfred and Edward, and went over with them into Normandy, in A. D. 1017 (6). Here therefore is an error in time, as well as in fact. As for Æthelred, he lay with a Squadron of ships at the Isle of Wight, till he heard of the kind reception Queen Emma met with from her brother, and then he sailed also into Normandy, and remained some time there (7).

[B] Thought no more of his treaty.] The Norman writers assure us, that Duke Robert assembled a very great army, embarked his forces, and put to sea with a very gallant fleet, but being tossed by the fury of the winds and seas, and perceiving that it would be impossible to land in England, he, with great grief of mind, put into his own ports, and relanded his forces. However, Canutus, who was a wife Prince, seeing that by this attempt Duke Robert was in earnest, that his own subjects retained still such an affection for the old line of their Kings, as that it would be unsafe for him to bring an army into the field, resolved to have recourse to a negotiation, which he began, by sending two ambassadors into Normandy, with the proposals mentioned in the text. This must have happened some time before 1030, because then, Duke Robert went to Jerusalem (8). It was no difficult thing for Canute, to set aside the agreement made with Prince Ælfred, and to assign plausible reasons for so doing. All the children of Edmund Ironside, and their descendants, were before Ælfred in right, and so were all the sons of Æthelred, by his first wife, and their representatives; and as to the right of conquest, which was the best title Canutus had, the succession founded thereon, was limited by his contract with Emma, to the children of that marriage, and, consequently, belonged to Hardiknute (9). It is not impossible, that Queen Emma might influence her sons after the departure of Duke Robert, and induce them to wait some more favourable opportunity. This, however, is conjecture only, history, in this matter, affording no farther light.

[C] To have been violent.] The story of Ælfred's expedition, defeat, and death, is one of the most perplexed points in the English history. Most of our historians take as many circumstances as they have met with, digest them into a clear order, place two or three old chronicles in the margin, and then think they have saved themselves and their readers a great deal of trouble — only at the expence of a little truth. But as truth is all we aim at, we shall remark, I. the variations in point of time. 1. It is placed in 1036, by all the ancient abbey chronicles, and by the celebrated historians mentioned in the margin (10). Hence, we have ventured so to put it in the text. Besides, the Norman histories concur in this date, and the banishment of Emma the next year, in which all writers agree, seems a full proof that it really happened in that year, soon after the assembly at Oxford, when Harold was acknowledged King (11). 2. However, William of Malmfbury says, that it was immediately on the death of Harold, before Hardiknute, the son of Canutus and Emma, had assumed the government, and Bromton mentions the same time (12). If this date were to be taken, it would fix the fact to 1039. 3. A third date mentioned is the next year 1040, under the reign of Hardiknute, his brother-in-law (13). 4. Some again, place it after his death, in 1041, when the throne was vacant (14). And this variety, obliged honest Robert of Gloucester, to fix, 5. no date at all; though he tells the story at large. He begins thus,

Vor Alured, hys eldore brother, was erst aslawe here
With treason in Engeland, ychylle tell in wuch
mannere

Atyme, to speak wid hys moder, to Engelande he
com,

An much peple of Normandye myd hym hyder he nome, &c. (15).

II. There are as great, or greater, variety in the circumstances. For instance, some say Edward as well as Ælfred, came to visit their mother who was at Winchester; and that Earl Godwin, under pretence of carrying Ælfred to court, fell upon the Normans who accompanied him, and treated them cruelly (16). Others alledge, that Edward and Ælfred, were invited over by their brother Hardiknute, and that the murder was perpetrated by Godwin, and Bishop Livingus, without the King's consent (17). Others affirm, that Emma herself, had a hand in it, and that she intended also to have poisoned Edward, in order to secure all to her son Hardiknute (18). In opposition in 1036, others 1037. His body was buried in the church of Ely, and his death, in the opinion of the people, severely punished by God, in the strange death of Earl Godwin (m). As to the abilities of this young Prince, our historians agree, that they were very great. He had more fire, and much more grandeur of soul, than his brother Edward the Confessor, which was the true cause of his ruin. For Earl Godwin, having proposed to him his daughter in marriage, he rejected the motion with scorn, (which his brother Edward, afterwards closed with) and shewed such a confidence in his Normans, as gave the crafty Earl an opportunity of representing to the English nobility, that if this Prince became their sovereign, he would be always surrounded by foreigners. This destroyed that affection which the nation bore him, and defeated the inquiries afterwards made about his death (n). As to which, some suspicions fell upon his mother, Queen Emma; in all probability, they were ill-grounded, but it is certain, she was deeply in the Danish interest, and her son, King Edward the Confessor, on that account, more readily believed whatever calumnies were raised against her (o). The reason why this history of Ælfred's death is so obscured, and so diversly related, is the partiality of contemporary writers. The Saxon chronicle, otherwise the most accurate, as well as circumstantial history of these times, is altogether silent about the matter. The reason is plainly, because Earl Godwin was so deeply concerned, there being manifestly a bias, in other places, where facts are not concealed (p). In some abbey chronicles, there is but one line, which just relates the fact (q). In others, transcribed probably after the conquest, it is said, That those innocent souls, i. e. the Norman soldiers, who suffered in his cause, went to receive in heaven the just reward of their loyalty (r). But what seems most extraordinary, is that, in the celebrated Historia Eliensis, or History of the Monastery of Ely, where one might have expected the fullest account, there is not so much as a word, concerning the matter, doubtless, because the facts were no way honourable to the fraternity. Rapin's detail of this affair, is pleasant, and well contrived (s). — But the authorities are (very prudently) omitted.

tion to this, we are told, from an ancient book called Encomium Emmæ (19), that the traitor Godwin, to get the young Princes into his hands, caused forged letters to be sent them, as from their mother, desiring them to hasten into England, in order to prevent the usurper Harold, from seating and settling himself on the throne. Our historians transcribe this epistle without scruple, and Alford, or Griffith, hath translated it back into Latin, and published it in his annals (20). Without question, I ought to have transcribed it too, had it been genuine, but doubtless it is not, many circumstances contained therein, prove this, but I shall quote only the title, Emma, Queen only in name, to Edward and Alfred, her sons, sendeth motherly greetings (21). It is apparent, that whoever forged this letter, thought Edward the eldest son, and of consequence, this trick is of a much later date than it pretends to. All the rest of the tale, that Edward was gone into Hungary, and so Ælfred only came over is of a piece; intended plainly to set a gloss on the character of Queen Emma, who really deserved it at the hand of the clergy, having been exceeding bountiful to the Church. The Norman chronicles, which could have no bias, state the fact as we state it in the text (22). They say, that Edward, with a squadron of ships, and a considerable body of Normans on board, sailed from Harfleur, landed at Winchelsea, and meeting there with an unexpected resistance, were compelled to reembark, and return to Normandy. Nay, we are told particularly, that Giffard Count Longueville, and many other men of quality, attended Prince Edward in this expedition, which entirely destroys the story in the Encomium Emmæ, that Edward was gone into Hungary to see his cousins. We have likewise in the same history, the names of the Norman chiefs, who came with Prince Ælfred, viz. Jean de Harcourt, Almeric de Sez, the Count de Dreux, &c. many of these made their escape, when the wicked Godwin seized the innocent Ælfred, and with him, made prisoners about 1000, or 1200, men (23). These he decimated, but in a new manner, for instead of destroying one out of ten, as that term naturally implies, he saved but one of ten, and thinking even them too many, he decimated them again (24). Nor was his putting them to death less cruel, for some he beheaded, others he slew, and of those he saved, he sold some for slaves; which would seem acts of incredible barbarity, did not so many authors attest them (25). It is far from being clear from the accounts we have, that Ælfred was ever carried to

London; and yet it is reasonable, to believe he was there shipped for Ely, by the command of King Harold. The industrious Leland, from an ancient chronicle written by a monk of Perhor, has preserved an account of the place where this poor Prince had his eyes torn out, viz. Gillingham (26). There are in England several places of this name (27); but the Gillingham here meant, must be Gillingham St Mary, in Clavering Hundred in Norfolk (28). It seems those who had Prince Ælfred in custody, landed him at Yarmouth, conveyed him thence to Gillingham, which is nine miles, there put out his eyes, and then carried him to Ely, which is forty miles farther. The passage from the chronicle before mentioned, takes notice of the usage the Prince met there, which is confirmed by a prose note on Robert of Gloucester, and other authority, and it was this, They took part of his gut out at his navel, nailed it to a post, and by pricking him forced him to run round it, till his whole bowels were extracted (29). If this were so, we need not wonder that the Liber Eliensis is silent. Yet, as his being buried there is owned, his death ought by those monks to have been better accounted for. It is very remarkable, that Queen Emma, Godwin, and Livingus, then Bishop of Worcester, united their interests to set up Edward the Confessor, brother to Ælfred, who yet never loved any of them, or forgot the barbarous usage of his brother, as may be seen in all our histories. It is not perhaps so entertaining to the reader, to have facts laid before him in this broken and doubtful way, as when they are handsomely digested, and all difficulties thrown out. Yet that plainly turns true history into romance, and though it amuses can never instruct us. Whereas, in this method, besides the pleasure of seeing truth, and not an author's fiction, we have an opportunity of making many just and useful reflections. As in the present case, 1. We may discern the impossibility of stifling such facts as these, which appears by the accounts given by later writers of the murder of Ælfred, notwithstanding the silence of the Saxon chronicle. 2. We gain many lights into other parts of our history, by tracing this point home. We see why the Normans were so dear to Edward the Confessor, why he was so much afraid of Earl Godwin, why he was a little suspicious of his mother, &c. In short, this laborious method of comparing all our ancient authors, were it thoroughly pursued, would really make most things clear; whereas, the utmost the other method can do, is to make all things seem so. ÆTHELSTAN, ATHELSTAN, or ÆTHESTAN, the son of Edward, surnamed the Elder, the twenty-fourth King of the West Saxons, and of Edgina, the daughter of a shepherd (a), who, merely on account of the lowliness of her birth, is treated, by many ancient and by most modern writers, as a concubine; though the reader will see, that there are the strongest reasons to believe the contrary [A]. As to the year of his birth, it is not certain, but the circumstances thereof are curious, and well attested. His mother Edgina, when a girl, dreamt, that the moon shone out of her belly so brightly, that it illuminated all England. This dream, she innocently related to an old woman, who had nursed Prince Edward, in the court of his father, Alfred the Great. The old woman, struck with the thing, as well as with the extraordinary beauty of the girl, took her home, and kept her as her own daughter. Prince Edward, coming thither one day to see his nurse, took notice of the beautiful Edgina, fell in love with her, and had by her this son, whom, on account of his mother's dream, he named Æthelstan, i. e. The most noble (b). His grandfather Alfred, took extraordinary care of his education, recommending him, in his infancy, to the care of his daughter Ethelfleda; and, when he was grown a boy, to her husband Ethered, one of the greatest captains of the age in which he lived. When the young Æthelstan was grown big enough to be introduced at court, he was brought thither by his tutor, and the wife King Alfred was so pleased with the spirit, countenance, and behaviour, of the lad, that to keep my author's words, He blessed him for King, after his son Edward, by a kind of prophetic spirit (c), and then knighted him, giving him a purple robe, a belt set with jewels, and a Saxon sword, in a golden scabbard (d). After all this, who can think him a bastard? It is true, his father married two other wives besides Edgina, and had children by them both, as by Elfleda the daughter of Earl Ethelin, a son called Ethelward, a Prince of great hopes, in temper, and countenance, extremely like his grandfather Alfred, whom many think would have succeeded to the throne, had he survived. But he dying a few days after his father, and the rest of the sons of this King Edward the Elder, being in their infancy, Æthelstan, according to his grandfather's prediction, quietly succeeded, A. D. 924 [B]. He was solemnly crowned by Athelum, Archbishop of Canterbury, apud Regiam Villam, that is, At Kingston upon Thames, which place, was before called Moreford, but by reason of this, and several other Princes, making it their place of residence, which they did, that they might be nearer at hand to resist the Danes, assumed the name of Kingston, or King's Town (e). Æthelstan was scarce seated on his throne, before a dangerous conspiracy was formed against him, by a certain nobleman, called Alfred, whose intent was to seize the person of his sovereign at Winchester, and to put out his eyes: the plot discovered, and it's author apprehended, he steadfastly denied it, and the King, to shew his strict regard to justice, sent him to Rome, there to purge himself by oath, before the altar of St Peter. When he came thither, and had by oath protested his innocence, he fell down in a miserable agony, and being carried by his servants to the English school, died there the third day in great torment. Pope John X., denied his body Christian burial, until such time as he had acquainted King Æthelstan, at whose request it was afterwards granted (f). To this domestick treason, succeeded a war with Inguald, a Danish King, and Sithic, who, after killing his brother Neil, had possessed himself of Davenport, in Cheshire (g). This last Prince, who was King of Northumberland, being very powerful, Æthelstan, on a negotiation, consented to make an alliance with him, on his renouncing Paganism,

[A] There are the strongest reasons to believe the contrary. The vindicating this lady's honour, at such a distance of time, may seem a little strange, but as the great design of this work is to correct the faults of others, and to prevent, as far as may be, the reader from being imposed upon; it was thought proper to make this remark, and to justify it here in a note by authorities, as in the text we have endeavoured to do by reason. Bromton, who tells at large, the story of Æthelstan's birth, though he calls his mother not Edgina, but Edgiva, yet, speaking of the rest of the children of Edward the elder, he writes thus. Et ex alia Uxore sua genuit. Edwinum, &c. And by another wife, he had Edwin (1), which is a direct testimony, that the mother of Ethelstan was his wife. It is true, that there are some other very ancient writers, who do not stile her so, particularly, Simeon of Durham, whose words are these, 'Ex muliere nobilissima Egcuninna, filium suum primogenitum Æthelstanum, ex Regina autem sua Edgiva filios tres, &c. i. e. By a most noble lady Egcuninna, he had his eldest son. Ethelstan, but by his Queen Edgiva, he had three sons (2).' For this manner of writing it is easy to account, the mother of Æthelstan was dead before his father became King, and therefore, though she was Uxor, yet she was not Regina, nor could she be mulier nobilissima, any other way, than by marriage, since her father was a shepherd.

[B] According to his grandfather's prediction, quietly succeeded. All the ancient writers of our history agree in fixing this date, excepting only the Saxon chronicle, which places it a year later, viz. in 925 (3). However, as there is an apparent confusion in the MS. in the place where this passage occurs, we may well enough suppose there is a mistake. In the same book, however, we are informed, that Ælfwerdus, the brother of Æthelstan, died a little after his father, at Oxnaford. It is also said, that Æthelstan was elected King by the Mercians, which is a circumstance not taken notice of elsewhere: yet it must have been true, since the subsequent conspiracy was occasioned by a dispute at that election, grounded upon his birth, as Malmibury observes (4); at which also Rapin hints, though without citing his author (5). However, this election was in consequence of his father, King Edward's last Will and Testament; and this is another proof of his being his legitimate son, since it is hard otherwise to assign a reason, why he should specially call him to the succession, in preference to his other children, by his Queens. This circumstance, however, reconciles all the writers on this subject. For those who say he succeeded his father Edward, have in view this designation; the Saxon annals, Malmibury, and others, in speaking of his election, have an eye to his confirmation in the regal dignity, by the choice of the nobles at the assembly at Kingston, which choice plainly preceded his coronation.

Paganism, and to give him his sister Edgitha, to wife, which was performed (b). In a year's time however, Sithric died, and was succeeded by his sons, Anlaff and Guthfert. These young men, being zealots for their old religion, immediately broke with Æthelstan, who the next year drove them out of their dominions; whereupon, Anlaff fled into Ireland, and Guthfert to Constantine, King of Scots (i). This affair created him afterwards a great deal of trouble, for though at first he carried it with a high hand, and prepared to invade Scotland, to revenge the protection given to the fugitive Prince, yet he saw reason to accommodate this quarrel, and to make peace with Constantine, though a certain author tells us, that he defeated and took prisoners both that King, and Howel, King of Wales, but out of generous compassion set them at liberty, and restored them to their kingdoms, saying, there was more honour in making a King, than in being a King (k). If it was so, he did not get much by his generosity: for the King of Scots, burning with a desire of revenge, or else dreading the power of so formidable a Prince, concerted a league with many of his neighbours, though historians are not agreed in what they say, concerning the time when, or the Kings who entered into this alliance [C]. One of the most noted, was Anlaff whom we mentioned before, who returned out of Ireland, and collected an army in order to restore himself to the kingdom of Northumberland; though others alledge, that this Anlaff was not the son of Sithric, before mentioned, but another of the same name, King of Ireland, and of the Isles. Whoever he was, his army consisted of Danes, Norwegians, Scots, Picts, &c. and he was himself a brave man, and a skilful officer. With him and Constantine, joined Eugenius, King of Cumberland, and some other petty Princes; and, after four years preparations, they drew together a great army, and marched therewith to (*) Bruneford, in Northumberland, near which place Æthelstan had pitched his camp. While both armies lay here, Anlaff being desirous to surprize his enemy in his camp, went thither in the disguise of a harper, and having played from tent to tent, was at last, for his skill in music, brought to play before the King, which he did so harmoniously, that at his departure he had a considerable reward given him, which, scorning to take away, after he came out of the royal tent, he cut up a piece of turf with his knife, and hid the money under it, which being seen by a soldier, he observed him more narrowly, and discovered who he was; when he was gone, the soldier went and acquainted King Æthelstan, who chid him for not speaking sooner. But the soldier excused himself, by saying, that he formerly served in Anlaff's army, and had sworn fidelity to him, wherefore had he betrayed him, it might have induced a suspicion, that he would have betrayed also his present master. To prevent the bad effects of this, he advised the King to remove his tent, there being reason to believe that Anlaff would that night make some attempt to surprize his quarters. This advice was approved and followed, the event shewed with good reason; for in the midst of the night, Anlaff, with a chosen body of forces, broke into the camp, and cut to pieces a Bishop and his retinue, who had pitched their tents where the King's stood. But the confederates did not long enjoy the satisfaction resulting from this success. Æthelstan came down with his forces divided into two bodies, the first commanded by himself, which charged Anlaff and his troops; the other by Turketul, the King's chancellor, and near kinsman, who fell upon Constantine and Eugenius. The Scotch made a gallant defence until their King was slain, and then they broke, which so intimidated Anlaff's army, that they also fled, and left their King to retire as well as he could (l). This is said to have been one of the bloodiest battles ever fought in this island; but the circumstances relating to the loss of the allies are so various, that to avoid

[C] The Kings who entered into this alliance. As to the wars of King Æthelstan, especially against the Scots, it cannot be denied that there is a great deal of confusion, in what the ancient writers tell us about them. Simeon of Durham places the reduction of the Reguli, or little Kings, in 926, or the third year of this King's reign (6); whereas, Bromton places both that and the vision of St John of Beverly, of which we shall speak hereafter, a year after (7). This is the reason that we have expressed our selves so generally in the text. But there seems to be greater certainty, with respect to the invasion of Scotland by this Prince, in 934, or the eleventh year of his reign. For with regard to this, the Saxon chronicle and the best historians exactly agree (8). In this expedition the King meeting on the road with many pilgrims who had been at the shrine of St John of Beverly, and had there, as they said, been cured of lameness, blindness, and other diseases, he thereupon, ordering the army to march on, went himself in pilgrimage to the same shrine, and having besought the saint to afford him his assistance in the war which he had undertaken, he left his knife as a pawn for the due performance of the vows he there made. Some time afterwards, St John appeared to him in a vision, promised his assistance, and greatly encouraged the King, who having totally defeated the Scots, and obliged Constantine their King, to submit to him, thereupon, put up another petition to the saint, viz. That he would shew some sign that might convince the Scots their kingdom depended, jure divino, on that of England. In consequence of this prayer, he, with his sword, cut an ell deep into a rock, near to his camp at Dunbar, and left that chasm as an indubitable mark of his sovereignty over the country (9). Rapin ridicules this miracle, (and to make it more ridiculous still, says, he cut three ells instead of one) adding, that these things are unworthy of repetition (10). But, with submission to this critical author, this story however absurd, ought not to be forgot, since the stone at Dunbar is gravely insisted on by King Edward I, in his letter to Pope Boniface, wherein he states his right over the King and kingdom of Scotland (11). If at this time, we suppose he restored, under certain conditions, the crown to Constantine, King of Scots, then the rest of the history will run smoothly enough, since the great invasion made by Constantine, in conjunction with Anlaff, King of Ireland, happened exactly four years after this; nor can there be a more probable cause assigned, than this attempt of Æthelstan, to set up a divine right to other peoples countries, for so many Princes entering into a league against him.

avoid perplexing the text, we have thrown them into a note [D]. To perfect his favourite design, of making himself Supreme Lord of the island, and to attain the sole dominion over, not only the Saxon, but all the other nations also inhabiting therein: Æthelstan, with his victorious army, after this glorious victory, prepared to go immediately against the Welsh, or rather the ancient Britons. In the mean time however, the fame of his great exploits, induced Henry surnamed the Fowler, then Emperor, to demand one of his sisters in marriage for his son Otho; Hugo, King of the Franks, also desired another for his son; and Lewis, Prince of Aquitain, sent an embassy to desire a third for himself. On this occasion, greater presents were sent into England, than had ever been seen before, and the glory of Æthelstan's court, far exceeded that of any of his predecessors (m). He was no less successful in his expedition against the Welsh; for having beaten them in the field, he caused Ludwal, King of Wales, with all his petty Princes, to meet him at Hereford, where they did him homage, and promised to pay him a yearly tribute, of twenty pounds of gold, three hundred pounds of silver, and twenty-five thousand beeves, with as many hawks and hounds as he should demand. He likewise expelled the Britons, who had hitherto dwelt together with the English in Excester (Exeter), and forced them to retire into Cornwall, making the river Tamara, the boundary of his dominions on this side, as he had fixed the Vaga on the other (n). He governed henceforward in peace and glory, made many wise laws for the benefit of his subjects [E], and rendered himself the most admired Prince of the age in which he lived, on account of his wisdom, wealth, and the great extent of his dominions, which were much wider than those of Ælfred his grandfather (o) [F].

The

[D] We have thrown them into a note This great battle is the most remarkable thing which happened in King Ethelstan's reign, and indeed it is of the utmost consequence to the clearing of our history, to set this whole war in a proper light. In the first place then, we will unravel the difficulty about Anlaff, whom some make King of Northumberland (12), most historians, King of Ireland (13), and Buchanan, without naming him, King of the Danes (14). That he was a great and powerful Prince, may be inferred, not only from the great army he led against the Saxons on this occasion, but also from his coins which are still remaining (15), and of which we had a sight, whilst we were writing this note. That he was not King of Denmark we are satisfied, by inspecting the catalogue of their Kings, wherein we find, that Harold was at this time Monarch of that country (16). From the Irish historians it is clear, that he was no Prince of theirs (17), yet the authors who speak of him, are not however so much mistaken, as at first sight they may seem. Sitric, his father, was not only King of Northumberland, but held also, by conquest, part of Ireland, and many of the islands between it and Scotland (18), which dominions came also to his son, who came now with the forces he had raised in Ireland, and the Isles, to assert his right to Northumberland, which had been yielded by Alfred the Great, to his ancestors (19). On the whole therefore, Anlaff was King of the Danes in Ireland, and came from thence with his fleet into the Humber, where he debarked his army, and afterwards joined Constantine, King of Scots, the King of Cumberland, and his other allies, with whom he offered Ethelstan battle (20). Simeon of Durham places this battle in 937 (21), but the Saxon Chronicle (22), Bromton (23), and the best historians, in 938 (24). There is a long elaborate description of this fight, in the Chronicle beforementioned, as well as many other ancient authors, all of whom agree, that it was fought from morning till night, and that it was one of the most bloody that ever happened in England. They also agree, that five Kings and seven Dukes were here slain; but the Saxon Annals admit, that Constantine escaped, though he lost his eldest son (25); and Bromton says expressly, that both Anlaff and Constantine escaped (26). Buchanan's account of this battle is equally obscure and absurd, for he does not allow that Constantine was present, and yet admits, that discontent for this loss, induced him to resign the crown (27). If we may credit the Monks, another miracle was wrought in this battle in favour of Æthelstan, who dropping his sword in the field of battle, another fell from Heaven into his scabbard, at the prayer of Otho, Archbishop of Canterbury, which drawing from thence, he fought with the rest of the day (28).

[E] Many wise laws for the benefit of his subjects. The great fame of our Æthelstan, and indeed that which gave him principally a right in this work, arose from his laws, of which we have two editions; one by

Lambard, amongst the rest of the laws made by the Saxon Kings, and the other by Abbot Bromton in Latin (29). It would take up too much room to give even the heads of these laws, for they are very many, and very curious. Mr Selden speaks of them very respectfully (30), and indeed the perusal of them, lets us into the knowledge of the Saxon antiquities, and thereby renders the history, not only of those times, but also the grounds of our constitution as it still stands, clear and easy. For such as are not very well versed in the matter, or who find it difficult to understand the Latin of Bromton, which is indeed not over classical, they may have recourse to Dr Howel, who in this, as in all other things, hath treated the English history with great skill and impartiality (31). On account of these laws, this King is mentioned by all the authors who have written expressly of English writers; and to say the truth, Bale is more exact than usual, in the account he gives us of his writings. He wrote, says he, one book of ancient laws corrected, another of new ones, and a third, of constitutions for the government of the clergy. He likewise mentions his causing the Bible to be translated out of the Hebrew into the Saxon tongue, which Bale supposes to have been done by certain Jews, converted to the Christian faith (62). All the writers of his life, and indeed all the Monks who have written the lives of Bishops under his reign, commend Ethelstan, not only as a most religious, but as a most wise and learned Prince, favoured by, and a friend to, the Muses. Leland particularly tells us, that he found in the library of the monastery at Bath, some books which had been given by this Prince to the Monks. One of which, a treatise De synodis Pontificis, he brought from thence, and placed in the library of King Henry VIII, with this inscription (33).

Cujus nota mihi bibliotheca fuit.
Illo sublato, sexcentos amplius annos,
Pulvere delitui squallidus atque situ:
Donec me pietas magni revocavit ad auras
Henrici, digno restituitque loco.

*On me, great Ethelstan was wont to look,
And still his mark, declares me once his book.
More than six hundred years in wretched state,
With dust o'erspread, I mourn'd my change of fate.
'Till mighty Henry, urg'd his pious claim,
And I once more, a Monarch's book became.*

[F] Than those of his grandfather Ælfred. Buchanan speaking of the dominions of Æthelstan, says, 'Here the English writers, who are profuse in their own praises, do affirm, that Æthelstan was the sole Monarch of all Britain, and that the rest who had the name of Kings in Albion, were

The only blemish on his reign, is the supposed murder, or putting wrongfully to death, of his brother Edwin, which is in itself so improbable, and all things considered so slenderly attested, that it does not, as we apprehend, deserve a place in the text of this life, though for the thorough understanding it, we have placed an ample account thereof below (p) [G]. As to his person, we are told that he was of the ordinary size, were but precariously so, and his feudatories only, as taking an oath of fidelity to him, as the supreme Lord. A little after he says, 'These men being generally unlearned, do not in some places sufficiently understand their own writers, neither do they take notice that Beda, William of Malmshury, and Jeffery of Monmouth, do commonly call that part of Albion, Britain, over which the Britons ruled, viz. within the wall of Adrian, or when they stretch their dominions farthest, within the wall of Severus, so that the Scots and Picts are treated by them as foreigners, and people out of Britain. When therefore the English Historians read in their old writers, that the English reigned over all Britain, they understand these authors so as if they included Albion; whereas they, as I said before, circumscribe Britain within narrower limits (34).' It must be allowed, that this author gives a very graceful colouring to his own opinion, if indeed it was his opinion, after reading what the old English Historians say, which, without breach of charity, we may doubt, since nothing is clearer, than that the old authors he mentions, especially Jeffery of Monmouth (35), expressly say, that the Scottish princes, whom they call Kings of Albania, were subject to the British monarchs. As to King Æthelstan, all the writers of his reign speak of his subduing Scotland as far as Dunbar; but Simeon of Durham tells us, that in the year 934, which is the same year wherein he made that expedition with a land army, he, with his fleet, wasted all the coasts as far as Caithness (36), so that the English writers were not so wretchedly ignorant of the bounds of Albion, as Buchanan would represent them. With respect to the title of Æthelstan, it was this: King of the English, Scots, Cumberlanders, Danes, and Britons, and if we may give credit to charters (37), as well as to what our ancient historians say, he was not nominally only, but effectually so. Besides what was it that Constantine struggled for, so long and so obstinately? Buchanan himself admits, that Æthelstan formed no pretensions on his dominions. He fought therefore to avoid owning him for his Sovereign, and the true reason for his resigning the kingdom, and retiring amongst the Culdees, was probably this, that his resignation might make void his submission to Æthelstan, which is the more likely, considering he did it with the consent, perhaps from the direction, of the states, who assembled for this purpose at Abernethy (38). The impartial reader will observe, that we do not pretend to determine any thing, as to the rights of the British or Saxon Kings, over those of Scotland, we only endeavour to set such passages of history as have been wilfully obscured, in their true and natural light, to illustrate what is dark in one author, by what is more plainly said in another, and thereby to discover truth with certainty. Whereas in the accounts we have hitherto had of these ancient monarchs, facts have been placed in such an order, as might render them most consistent and pleasant in reading, with little or no regard to the authenticity of those authorities, whereon they were founded; which how much soever it may be for the reader's ease, contributes certainly very little to his instruction. We have said in the text, that the dominions of Æthelstan, were much wider than those of his grandfather Ælfred. It is necessary that according to our own rules, we should establish this fact. In the first place then, the Scots and Welsh who were but homagers to Ælfred, were tributaries to Æthelstan. Secondly, he dispossessed the Welsh, or Britons, of considerable tracts, which they still held in the West. Thirdly, he recovered Northumberland, which had been yielded to the Danes. And, fourthly, he was in full and peaceable possession of all these acquired advantages, at the time of his decease, and transmitted not the same only, but the possession to his brother and successor, Edmund.

[G] We have placed an account thereof below.] The business of Edwin's death, is a point the most obscure in the story of this King, and, to say the truth, not one even of our best historians, hath written clearly, or with due attention concerning it. The fact as commonly received is this. The King suspecting his younger brother Edwin, of designing to deprive him of his crown, caused him, notwithstanding his protestations of innocency, to be put on board a leaky ship, with his armour-bearer and page. The young Prince, unable to bear the severity of the weather, and want of food, desperately drowned himself; some time after, the King's cup-bearer, who had been the chief cause of this act of cruelty, happened, as he was serving the King at table, to trip with one foot, but recovering himself with the other, Sec. said he pleasantly, how brothers afford each other help; which striking the King with the remembrance of what himself had done, in taking off Edwin, who might have helped him in his wars, he caused that business to be more thoroughly examined, and finding his brother had been falsely accused, caused his cup-bearer to be put to a cruel death, endured himself seven years sharp penance, and built the two monasteries of Middleton and Michelness, to atone for this base and bloody fact (39). Dr Howel, speaking of this story, treats it as if very indifferently founded, and, on that account, unworthy of credit (40). Yet it must be owned, that all the ancient writers almost speak of it as a thing certain. Simeon of Durham writes, that in the year 933, King Ethelstan commanded, that his brother Edwin should be drowned in the sea (41). Abbot Bromton tells the story at large (42), and after him most of the later writers as usual, that is, with an addition of various circumstances, so that it cannot be said, this story is without foundation. Buchanan hath improved it very happily. Thus it runs in his writings. 'They, that is the English writers, make this Athelstan guilty of parricide, in killing his father and his two brothers, Edred and Edwin, whose right it was to succeed their father in his kingdom. Fame increases the suspicion, that Edward was violently put to death, because it attributes to him the title of martyr (43).' Buchanan cites no authority whatsoever for this, because indeed there could be no authority cited. Whatever he did by Edwin, most certainly Ethelstan did not murder Edred, since he not only survived, but succeeded him in the kingdom. As for the murder of his father, that is the pure effect of Buchanan's ignorance, he mistook Edward the Elder, who was really the father of Æthelstan, for Edward the Martyr, who began his reign in 975, that is, five and thirty years after Æthelstan was in his grave. Such is the accuracy, such the integrity, of this writer. In like manner Rapin gives us this story, without the least mark of doubt or hesitation (44), and yet we presume, there are some strong reasons against the credit of this whole story, and still stronger against that part of it, which alledges Edwin to have been unjustly put to death. Simeon of Durham, and the Saxon Chronicle, say no more, than that Edwin was drowned by his brother's command, in the year 933 (45). Bromton places it in the first, or at farthest in the second, year of his reign; and he tells us the story of the rotten ship, and of his punishing the cup-bearer (46). William of Malmshury, who is very circumstantial, says he only tells us what he has heard (47); but Matthew the Flower-gatherer (48), stamps the whole down as an indubitable truth. Yet these discordant dates are not to be accounted for. If he was drowned in the second, he could not be alive in the tenth year of the King. The first is the more probable date, because about that time there certainly was a conspiracy against King Athelstan, in order to dethrone him, and put out his eyes, yet he did not put the author of it to death; it is likely then that he should order his brother to be thrown into the sea upon bare suspicion? But the reader must remember, that we cite the same historians, who have told us this story, to prove that Æthelstan was unanimously acknowledged King, his brethren being too young to govern; one would think then, they could not be old enough to conspire. If we take the second date, the whole story is destroyed; the King could not do

of a merry countenance, his hair of a bright yellow, stooping a little in the shoulders. He was extremely brave, constant in his resolutions, secret in his councils, and courteous to all men, a great encourager of learning, and, if we credit Tindal (q), ordered the Bible to be translated into the Saxon tongue, for the use of his subjects. It does not appear that he was ever married; and as to the years of his reign, there is some dispute. For on the one hand we are told, that he reigned fifteen years and upwards, and that he died at Gloucester, the twenty-seventh of October, 940 (r); and on the other, that he reigned sixteen years, and deceased in 942 (s). Though it must be allowed, that these different accounts may be in some measure reconciled [H]. The fabulous writers of the life of Guy of Warwick, speak of a natural daughter of his, Leonada, who they say espoused Reynburne, son of the said Guy (t).

seven years penance, for he did not live so long; and as for the tale of the cup-bearer, and his stumbling at the King's table, the same story is told of Earl Godwin, who murdered the brother of Edward the Confessor. Lastly, nothing is clearer from history, than that Æthelstan was remarkably kind to his brethren and sisters, for whose fakes he lived single, and therefore one would think his brother had less temptation to conspire against him.

[H] May be in some measure reconciled. As to the death of this King, the Saxon Chronicle tells us, that he died on the twenty-seventh of October, 941 (49), and that he had then reigned fourteen years and ten weeks, which reckoning must necessarily place the beginning of his reign, in the month of July, 927, which is inconsistent with the account given in these Annals themselves, wherein it is placed in 925 (50), wherefore in this case, their authority is of no weight. Simeon of Durham tells us, that he died on the twenty-seventh of October, anno 940, in the sixteenth year of his reign, at Gloucester, and was buried at Malmesbury (51): with this account agrees that of Florence of Worcester, and of the best historians (52), yet Abbot Bromton tells us, he reigned eighteen years (53), if there be not a mistake either in the MS. or printed copy, which ought the rather to be suspected, because this is utterly inconsistent with his other dates. For he places the accession of Æthelstan, in 924, the accession of his brother Edred, in 947, he says that Edmund reigned after Æthelstan seven years, which plainly shews, that Æthelstan died in 940, and in the sixteenth year of his reign, as the other historians say. So that these discordances, are most certainly owing to errors committed by transcribers, and not to the authors themselves. E

AGARD (ARTHUR) a learned and industrious Antiquary (a), was the son of Clement Agard, of Toston in Derbyshire, by Eleanor, the daughter of Thomas Middleborough, of Egbafton in Warwickshire (b). He was born A. D. 1540, and educated in such a manner as to fit him for the practice of the Law, though it does not appear he was at either of our universities (c). In process of time, he became a clerk in the Exchequer-Office, and in 1570, attained the office of Deputy-Chamberlain of the Exchequer, under Sir Nicholas Throckmorton, Knt. which place, under many Chamberlains, he held forty-five years (d) [A]. The great love he had for English antiquities, led him to make large and laborious collections, and his office gave him an opportunity to acquire much skill in those branches of an Antiquary's study, which are most intricate, and attended with the greatest want of materials (e). A conformity of studies brought him to an acquaintance with the celebrated Sir Robert Cotton (f), with whom he held the strictest intercourse of friendship as long as he lived. Anthony Wood indeed tells us, that (g) while Mr Agard held his place in the Exchequer, he learned and received all his knowledge and learning in antiquities, from his faithful and dear friend Sir Robert Cotton. Which however is not over probable, because Mr Agard came into his office the same year, precisely, that Sir Robert Cotton was born (h). Such sometimes are the Oxford Antiquary's assertions! Besides Sir Robert Cotton, we find that Mr Agard had the most eminent and learned men in the kingdom, for his friends and acquaintance. There was in his days, though the time when it was erected is not clearly stated, a most illustrious assembly of learned and able persons (i) set on foot, who stiled themselves a Society of Antiquaries, and Mr Agard was one of it's most conspicuous members, as appears from discourses read therein, and since printed. We owe the publication of these very valuable essays, to the industrious Mr Hearne, who yet has given a very indifferent account of them and their authors in the preface (k), as we shall shew in the notes [B]. Besides the

[A] Under many Chamberlains he held forty-five years. When he came into it, Sir Nicholas Throckmorton was Chamberlain, viz. in 1570, from whence one may conjecture, this gentleman was raised thereto by his favour, which is the more likely, since Sir Nicholas was a man of great abilities himself, and loved to distinguish merit. He died on the 12th of February 1571 (1), and was succeeded by Sir Thomas Randolph, another learned and worthy Knight, who deceased on the eighth of June, 1590 (2). After him Sir Thomas West was Chamberlain. His successor, George Young, Esq; After him Sir Walter Cope, Knt. who had for his successor, Sir William Killigrew, Knt, in whose place came Sir John Poyntz, to whom our author was Deputy, at the time of his demise (3). Wood observes, that formerly this was a place of great honour and worth. I find that the fee was fifty-two pounds, three shillings, and four-pence, and thirteen pounds (4) for a livery, in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, and there were two Chamberlains. Those who bear their offices at present, are Sir William Ashburnham, and Sir Simeon Stewart, both Baronets, so that it seems this place still keeps it's credit. Indeed so does the Deputy's place, having the custody of many valuable records at this day, those particularly which Mr Agard spent so much pains about, for which his memory is still had in great honour there (5).

[B] As we shall shew in the notes. Mr Hearne published this book, in 1720, under the title of, A Collection of curious Discourses, written by eminent Antiquaries, upon several heads in our English Antiquities. Before it is a preface containing 134 pages, dated from Edmund-Hall, Oxon. March 26, 1720. In this preface, after a long account what sort of an assembly a Society of Antiquaries ought to be, he proceeds thus (6): In the time of Queen Elizabeth, and King James I, there was such a Society, made up of right learned Antiquaries, that used to meet together, and as they undertook great matters, so their performances were answerable to their undertakings; and had they went on, there is no doubt but by this time, we had had a compleat account published, of the most material things

five discourses in that collection, and another of a much older date (1); it is not known that our author Agard, hath more in print, though these are sufficient to justify what we have said of him, and to shew that in English antiquities, he had few equals, and perhaps no superior [C]. In the particular business of his office, he was not only expert, but understood it to the bottom, as is clear from his discovering Richardus filius Nigelli, to be the author of Dialogus de Negotiis Scaccarii, which generally goes under the name of Gervasius Tilburienfis (m), on which, (each supposing it his own) two modern antiquaries would have raised some reputation. But Mr Madox, who had been charged with borrowing it from Mr Anstis, professed his innocence, and owned, that the secret they contended about, had been long before known to our author, Agard, who communicated it to the famous Selden (n). The Dooms-Day Book, our author had made his chief and peculiar study, and that his labours might be useful to posterity, he composed a large and learned work, on purpose to explain it (o), under the title of Tractatus de usu & obscurioribus verbis libri de Domesday, i. e. A Treatise of the use, and of the true meaning of the obscure words in the Domes-Day Book. Which was preserved in the Cotton library, under Vitellius, No. 9. He likewise bestowed three years hard labour in compiling a book for the ease of his successors, and which was also for the conveniency of the publick. It consisted of two parts, the first, A catalogue of all such records as were in

in our history and antiquities. But it being suggested that the said society would be prejudicial to certain great and learned bodies, for that reason, the members thought fit to break it off. Nor were there wanting very powerful men, that proved enemies to them; and, among other things, they were pleased to alledge, that some of the society were not only disaffected to, but really of a quite different persuasion from, the Church of England. The reader sees, that here are facts, but no dates or authorities. The discourses Mr Hearne published, were bequeathed to him by the very learned Dr Thomas Smith, who died May 11, 1710, and who himself intended to have published them (7). This worthy person, in his life of Sir Robert Cotton, had long before given the publick a clear and distinct account of them (8). He fixes the rise of this society of Antiquaries, about 1590, he tells us, that the main point they aimed at, was to collect and bring into one place, all the MSS. coins, seals, &c. which were scattered through the kingdom; that the study of antiquity might not be the work (as it is) of a man's whole life; and then to get themselves incorporated by charter. It was proposed that a college, or publick building, should be erected at the expence of the friends to this undertaking, in which all the remains of the plundered libraries, of old monasteries, &c. should be deposited. That the society should be honoured with the Queen's name; consist of a president, and a certain number of fellows, who should reside in lodgings, adjoining to the intended college, and out of whom two should be annually chosen curators of the library, &c. that they should be subject to a quinquennial visitation, by the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Chancellor, the High Treasurer, the Lord High Admiral, the Lord Chamberlain, the Principal Secretary of State, and Chief Justice of England. It was this scheme, largely fet forth by Dr Smith, as having been warmly (though vainly) solicited by Sir R. Cotton, both in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, and King James, that alarmed, though without reason, the universities; and without knowing this, we must have framed a false notion of the thing. But, notwithstanding this disappointment, the society still continued: They met in term time only, sometimes at the lodgings of Mr Dethick, in the College of Arms, and at others, in some of the members houses. Their method was to state the question to be canvassed, then to summon the members to a place mentioned in the summons, and to collect from such as gave their opinions, their reasons and authorities in writing. Of such discourses, but whether of the respective authors penning, or collected by the member who officiated as secretary, is, I think, uncertain, Mr Hearne's collection consists. Of such amongst these, as were composed by Mr Agard, we shall treat in the next note, at present, let us conclude our account of this society. Under a Prince so fond of learning as King James, and who besides professed a personal respect for Sir Robert Cotton, one might have reasonably supposed this learned assembly should have met with encouragement, or at least protection. Yet, so it was, that their canvassing certain questions relating to the state, and government, gave such umbrage to this monarch and his council, that upon signification thereof to the society, they dissolved, or, to speak with greater propriety, discontinued their assemblies, about 1614 (9). What induced us to treat of this matter here, was, that Mr Agard's name stands first in the list of members, as given us by Dr Smith, and as there is abundant matter for Sir Robert Cotton's life, without introducing therein an account of this society, it could no where, in this work, come in more naturally. For though Sir R. Cotton, was the more considerable man, yet Mr Agard must have had a greater share in the erection of this useful assembly, since, at the time fixed by Dr Smith, Sir Robert Cotton was scarce twenty, and was of course a lover of antiquities, rather than an antiquary. It remains, that we add here, a list of the members of this society, which, from Dr Smith, Mr Hearne, and the assistance of a learned person, who desires to be concealed, we are able to render more ample, and more accurate, than any hitherto published.

Whoever considers this list attentively, will need not many words to convince him that scarce any other can be produced so honourable for this nation, or for the commonwealth of letters. Let us compare this society in 1590, with the French academy, which pretends to no higher antiquity than 1629 (10). Let us examine the design of each, and let us compare the figure made by the respective members of each body, and we shall know what to think of the state of learning in France, and in Britain, at that period. We may thence also borrow another piece of useful knowledge, how much we of this age stand indebted to these industrious inquirers, but for whom, our antiquities had been, by this time, rubbish, not worth the raking into.

[C] He had few equals, perhaps no superior. In order to support this, we shall add to what is said in the

the four treasuries belonging to his majesty; and the second, An account of all leagues, and treaties of peace, intercourses, and marriages, with foreign nations. Of this treatise he took such care, as shewed at once his prudence, and publick spirit. He deposited it with the officers of his majesty's Receipt, and took order, that the same should pass by inventory, as being for the good of the subject; and a proper index for succeeding officers (p). He likewise directed by his Will, that eleven other MS. treatises of his relating to Exchequer matters, should, for a small reward paid to his executor, be delivered up to the office. All the rest of his most valuable treasure of collections, containing at least twenty volumes, he bequeathed to his old friend, Sir Robert Cotton, in whose library, as many as remain, are yet to be found (q). For, notwithstanding his great industry, and his making so much use of his pen, his modesty would not allow him to publish any thing. After having thus spent his days in honour, and a learned tranquillity, he thought of death, before it came, and caused a monument to be erected for himself and his wife, near the chapter door in the cloister of Westminster Abbey, in which, dying on the twenty-second of August, 1615, he was some time in the same month interred. Mr Camden (r), to whom we owe this date, styles him, Antiquarius insignis, i. e. A most excellent antiquary, which is sufficient to establish his general character. The famous Mr Selden, in the index to his Titles of Honour, published the year before our author died, viz. 1614 (s), speaking of the author of Dialogus de Negotiis Scaccarii, says, I confess it was observed to me by Mr Agard, a man known to be most painful, industrious, and sufficient, in things of this nature. This is mentioned as an instance of his abilities in his profession, and, taking these testimonies together, we can hardly conceive too highly of Mr Agard's merit.

the text, the titles of Mr Agard's discourses which have been printed. 1. Opinion touching the antiquity, power, order, state, manner, persons, and proceedings of the high court of parliament in England. Published with the like essays of Sir John Dodderidge, Joseph Holland, Francis Tate, and William Camden, all members of the society before mentioned (11). But, since Wood informs us, that Bishop Barlow doubted whether this work was genuine, we will say no more of it (12). 2. On this question (13), Of what antiquity shires were in England? In this discourse, various ancient MSS. are cited, and Mr Agard inclines to think King Alfred was the author of this division, because it plainly appears the lesser divisions were made by that Prince. This discourse was delivered in Easter Term 33 Eliz. 1591. 3. On the Dimensions of the Lands of England (14). In which our author, with great judgment and learning, settles the meaning of these words, Solin, Hida, Carucata, Jugum, Virgata, Ferlingata, Ferlinges, from ancient MSS. and the authentick records in the Exchequer. This discourse was read on November 24, 1599. 4. Of the authority, office, and privileges, of Heraults (Heralds) in England (15). He gives it as his opinion, that this office is of the same antiquity with the institution of the Garter. In this discourse also he observes, that John, Earl of Bedford, caused a herald from certain rebels in Cornwall, to be hanged, because rebels are not entitled to the law of arms. 5. Of the antiquity and privileges of the houses or inns of court, and of chancery (16). In this very short discourse, our author observes, that in the more ancient times, i. e. before the making of Magna Charta; our lawyers and judges, were of the clergy. That in the time of Edward I, the law came to receive it's proper form, and that in an old record, the Exchequer was filed the mother court of all courts of record. At this time, he supposes, the lawyers began to have settled places of abode, but affirms, he knew of no privileges. The former discourse has no date, and this only Pasche 33, perhaps Easter Term, 1591. 6. Of the diversity of names of this island (17). We find in this discourse, that the first Saxons landing in this island, came here under the command of one Aelle, a King of theirs, and his three sons, in A. D. 435, and that the reason why it was called England, rather than Saxon-Land, was, because the Angles, after this part of the island was totally subdued, were more numerous than the Saxons. He likewise observes, that after this conquest, the name of Briton grew into distaste, and all valued themselves on being Englishmen. This was read June 29, 1604, and is the last discourse of Mr Agard, in the collection. E

AGELNOTH or EGELNOTH or ÆTHELNOTH, in Latin Achelnotus, Archbishop of Canterbury, in the reign of Canute the Great, succeeded Livingus in that see in the year 1020 (a). This Prelate, surnamed the Good, was son of Earl Agilmer, and, at the time of his election, Dean of Canterbury. After his promotion, he went to Rome, and received his pall from Pope Benedict VIII. In his way thither, as he passed through Pavia, he purchased, for an hundred talents of silver, and one of gold, St Augustin's arm, which was kept there as a relic, and sent it over to England, as a present to Leofric Earl of Coventry (b). Upon his return, he is said to have raised the see of Canterbury to it's former lustre. He was much in favour with King Canute, and employed his interest with that monarch to good purposes. It was by his advice, the King sent over large sums of money for the support of the foreign churches; and Malmesbury observes (c), that this Prince was prompted to acts of piety, and restrained from excesses, by the regard he had for the Archbishop. King Canute being dead, Agelnoth refused to crown his son Harold [A], alledging that the late King had

[A] Agelnoth refused to crown King Harold. After the decease of Canute, who died at Shaftsbury, and was buried at Winchester, the kingdom was divided about the succession. The Danish interest at London, and elsewhere, declared for Harold Harefoot, son of Canute and Elgiva of Northampton. The English disapproved this choice, and were inclined to set up Edward son of King Ethelred; or, if that point could not be carried, they desired that Hardicanute, son of Canute by Queen Emma, might be the person. Edward's party was quickly found too weak to continue the competition. At last the two had enjoined him to set the crown upon none but the issue of Queen Emma (d); that he had given the King a promise upon this head, and that he was resolved to be true to his engagement. Having declared himself with this freedom, he laid the crown upon the altar, with an imprecation against those Bishops who should venture to perform the ceremony. Harold, who was greatly chagrined at this disappointment, endeavoured, both by menaces and large offers, to prevail upon the Archbishop, but in vain; and whether he was afterwards crowned by any other person, is altogether uncertain. Agelnoth, after he had sat seventeen years in the see of Canterbury, departed this life, the 29th of October, 1038, and was succeeded by Eadsius King Harold's chaplain (e). At this time (as an historian observes) the Monks of the church of Canterbury lived with the latitude of Prebendaries [B]. This Archbishop was an author, having written; 1. A Panegyric on the blessed Virgin Mary. 2. A Letter to Earl Leofric concerning St Augustin. 3. Letters to several persons (f).

Danish brothers agreed to the expedient of a composition. Hardicanute had all the counties which lay south of the Thames, and Harold the rest. This contest being finished, Hardicanute set sail for Denmark; where spending too much time, and not returning at the invitation of the English, his subjects thought themselves disengaged, and suffered Harold to seize the whole kingdom. Queen Emma, Hardicanute's mother, was banished, and forced to retire into Flanders, where she was honourably entertained by Earl Baldwin (1).

Being elected fellow, he thereupon went into Holy Orders, and distinguished himself as a polite and learned preacher. Afterwards he travelled abroad, and was introduced to the acquaintance of the famous Cardinal Bellarmin [A]. After his return, he was made chaplain in ordinary to Queen Elizabeth, and, in 1600, took the degree of doctor of divinity. About that time he obtained the rectory of Islip, near Oxford, and soon after was elected Principal of St Edmund's Hall. He was likewise chaplain in ordinary to King James I; and is said to have had a considerable share in the translation of the New Testament appointed by that King in 1604 [B]. He died at Islip, the 6th of February 1609-10, aged forty-three, and was buried in the chancel of the parish church. He was well accomplished in most kinds of learning, profoundly read in the fathers and school-divinity, and a great critic in the languages (a).

[A] He was introduced to the acquaintance of Cardinal Bellarmin.] Mr Wood tells us, that the Cardinal, one day, pointing to the picture of Dr William Whitaker, of Cambridge, which hung up in his library, said to Mr Aglionby, that he was the most learned Heretic that he ever read (1). This Dr Whitaker had distinguished himself by his controversial writings against the Papists.

[B] He is said to have had a considerable share in the translation of the New Testament, appointed by King James I, in 1604.] Mr Wood mentions no authority for this assertion, nor is Dr Aglionby's name to be found in the list of the translators (2). It is not unlikely that he might be assisting in the translation, pursuant to the rules agreed upon by the translators; one of which was, that letters be sent from every Bishop to the rest of his clergy, putting them in mind of the translation in hand, and charging those, who have skill in the languages, and have bent their studies that way, to send their observations to the committees, either at Westminster, Cambridge, or Oxford.

AIDAN, or AIDANUS, was the son of Goran, or Goranus, King of Scotland [A]. He was very young at the time his father was murdered by conspirators, of whom Donald of Athol was the chief. This happened in the year 535. Eugenius, the nephew of the last King, and the cousin of Aidanus, succeeded in the throne (a). He had served long under the celebrated Arthur King of the Britons, and as he was a good officer, so he was also a wise Prince, but withal, a man of great art, inso-much, that he dissembled all concern for his uncle's murder, and even took into his favour Donald of Athol, who was the prime author of it (b). This so much alarmed the Queen Dowager, that notwithstanding he made a great shew of friendship towards her and her family, yet she took the first opportunity of retiring with her two sons, Reginan and Aidan, then about seven years old, into Ireland, where they were very kindly received by Tuathalius, the reigning King (c). There the Queen and her eldest son died, but Aidanus continued there, not only during the long reign of Eugenius, but also during that of his brother Congallus, that is, throughout the space of forty-eight years. But this last mentioned King, considering the wrong done to the right heir of the crown, directed the famous St Columb to bring him home, which that good man performed. But when they arrived in Scotland, they understood that the King was dead, and that the Scots had set his brother Kennatillus upon the throne, Columb however, having first assisted at the burial of the deceased Prince, went afterwards with Aidan to court,

[A] Aidanus son of Goranus, King of Scotland.] The name of this Prince is variously written; in the histories of Boethius, and Buchanan, he is called Aidanus (1), but Bede calls him Aedan (2); in the Saxon annals, his name is written Aegthan (3), Jeffery of Monmouth, calls him Adan (4). But these are trivial differences, or at least would be thought so in any other history than ours. As to the facts, and even as to the dates, all the old historians agree perfectly well. It was therefore thought proper to insert this life in this dictionary, in order to shew that our ancient history is not so uncouth, so uncertain, or so inconsistent, as some would persuade us. It is indeed, a little strange, court, where, to the surprize of all men, the new raised King received them with much civility and kindness, telling Aidanus, he should for the present assist him in governing the kingdom, which would shortly become his, to whom of right it pertained (d). This fell out accordingly, for the King, being old and infirm, died, as he had foreseen, and our Aidan succeeded in his stead, according to Hecstor Boetius, in the year 578. He was crowned King of Scotland in the Marble Chair, by the hand of St Columb, who made a noble oration on that occasion, exciting the Prince to justice, and the people to obedience. Immediately after his coronation, Aidan went into Galloway, where he reduced certain robbers, who had done great mischief. He then instituted annual assizes in Galloway, Lochabar, and Caithness (e). But these works of peace were suddenly interrupted; some of the young nobility quarrelled at a hunting match, and bloodshed following, those who were most guilty, or at least most afraid, retired into the dominions of Brudeus, King of the Picts. Aidan, in virtue of a treaty with that Prince, often demanded them, and was as often refused. At length he entered his country, and carried off a great number of prisoners, with abundance of cattle. The Pictish Prince resenting this, made also an inroad, and did great mischief in Galloway. In the end, a general engagement happened, wherein the Picts were routed with great slaughter, the Scots also losing many men, and amongst them, the King's son Arthur. This battle was fought in the neighbourhood of Dunkell. St Columb hearing of this war, came to the King, and upbraided him with his too great readiness to shed blood, which made that Prince so uneasy, that he would not part with that excellent man, till he had promised him to negotiate a peace, which he did with success (f). The Saxons were now possessed of England, having driven the Britons into Wales. Ethelfrid who reigned then in Northumberland, was a most crafty, and withal a most ambitious Prince. He projected the conquest of the Pictish kingdom, but perceiving himself too weak to effect it, he excited Brudeus to break the peace with the Scots, hoping by this means to weaken him, and thereby obtain a more easy prey. Aidan being informed of these negotiations, concluded a league offensive and defensive, with Maelgwyn, King of the Britons (g). The Saxons, as soon as they were acquainted with this, determined to invade the British territories, that thereby they might draw the Scots out of their own country, and have them at the greater disadvantage. This policy of theirs succeeded, for Aidan, like a just Prince, marched instantly to the assistance of his allies, and joining the British army, offered Ethelfrid and Brudeus battle, which however they declined for two reasons. One was, that they might the more weary the Scots; the other, that they might give time to Ceuline, King of the West Saxons, to join them: Aidan, and his confederates being aware of their intention, resolved to attack Ceuline, before his junction should render them too powerful; this they performed with great bravery, and having forced their camp, cut to pieces a very considerable number of their enemies, amongst whom was Cutha, the King of the West Saxon's son. This however, did not hinder the remainder from joining their friends, and offering Aidan battle a second time. In this engagement, though he behaved gallantly, yet he was very unfortunate, for he lost his son Griffin, and his nephew Brennius, who was Thane or Earl of Man. But this was far from being bloodless victory to the Saxons and Picts, who besides a great number of private men killed, had both their Princes wounded, Ethelfrid losing one of his eyes, and Brudeus receiving a deep cut in his hip (b). The next summer, Ethelfrid joined the Picts early, and with a numerous army invaded Galloway. Aidan was more ready to receive them than they expected, and taking advantage of their straggling about the country, he cut off several of their parties, and perceiving that these losses made them keep close in their camp, he marched silently by it in a dark night, and joined the Britons. After this they encamped in a narrow valley in Anandale. There the Saxons and Picts surrounded them with a great army, and seizing all the passages, persuaded themselves, they should easily and totally rout their enemies. Aidan consulting, as well with Constantine and Menrein, the British Generals, as with Callan and Murdach, his own Generals, they made a shew of strongly fortifying their camp, as if therein they meant to wait for their attack, and when they had so done, lighting up a multitude of fires, they decamped in the night, and passing certain rivers, the Saxons deemed not fordable, suddenly entered Northumberland, and destroyed all the country with fire and sword. This compelled the Saxons and Picts to follow them, and soon after their arrival in the same country, a pitched battle ensued, wherein, after an obstinate engagement, the Saxons and Picts were totally routed with prodigious slaughter, Ceuline, King of the West Saxons, strange, that we admit without scruple, such historical fragments, as yet remain of the ancient Kings of Attica, and take pains to settle the succession of the first Kings of Macedon, though neither of their kingdoms in those times, could exceed the bounds of one of our counties (5), and yet give up our own history as dark and fabulous, though at the distance of many ages from those times, and infinitely clearer, more rational, and better supported, than either the Greek history before the Peloponnesian war, or that of Rome, before the expulsion of her Kings. He must certainly be a critical and sharp-sighted reader, who in this history of Aidan, wherein is touched the state of every one of the nations then settled in the British islands, can discern any thing of absurdity or of fable. And why we should give up the actions of all our ancestors to oblivion, in order to find leisure to decypher the antiquities of other people, is a thing for which no good reason can be assigned. It must be granted, that before the publication of our ancient histories, transactions of such antiquity might appear very dubious, but they cannot be thought so now, when confirmed by so many different authorities, and such a variety of facts.

Saxons, being killed upon the spot, with several other persons of distinction. After this great victory, King Aidan caused all the spoil, which they had brought out of Galloway, and which now fell into his hands, to be restored to the right owners. This done, he gave a tenth of the remaining booty, to be distributed in alms, the rest was equally divided amongst the Scottish and British soldiers. All the trophies of this conquest, he caused to be transported to the island of Colmkill, to St Columb, there to remain in his abbey (i). After this, he governed his kingdom in peace about eleven years, and then Ethelfrid prevailed on the Picts to renew the war. Aidan, though he was very old, marched to the place where the British army should have joined him, but his allies failing him, gave his enemies a great advantage over him, so that attacking him with a superior army, they cut the greatest part of his forces to pieces, the King himself narrowly escaping. In this battle fell Theobald, King Ethelfrid's brother, which shews that it was no easy victory. However, it's consequences were so fatal, that the thoughts of them, and the news of St Columb's death, brought the good old King in sorrow to his grave, in the year 606. when he had reigned thirty-two years, and lived 78 (k). There are certain circumstances in this King's history [B], which because they are not mentioned either by the Scotch or English historians, we have thought proper to insert in the notes, being unwilling to place any thing in the text, which is not perfectly clear and certain.

[B] Certain circumstances in this King's history. St Adamnanus, in his life of St Columbanus, or Columb, tells us, how he prophetically marked out to the King, Aidan, which of his sons should succeed him in the kingdom. This story is preserved in the history of Scotland, printed in the first volume of Hollinghead's collection, but very imperfectly, because of his absolute want of skill in the ancient Scottish language (b). The fact in few words stands thus. About the year 584, King Aidan was in the Isle of Man, and there presented his sons to St Columb. They were in number eight, viz. Arthur, Eochod Finn, i. e. the White, Domangard, Eochod Buidhe, i. e. Yellow, (Hollinghead calls him Eugenius, and tells us he was also called Brudus) Tuathalius, Boetan, Conang, and Gartnrad. St Columb, passing by the three eldest, laid his hand on Eochod Buidhe, or

Eugenius the Yellow. This son, said he, and his heirs, shall be heirs of your kingdom, for the other three shall fall in battle against your enemies, which came accordingly to pass (7). The Irish Chronicles, take notice, that in 590, King Aidan passed over into that country, and was present at a council held there, which is very probable, since he had lived so many years in Ireland, and it is very likely married there (8). Bede gives a very circumstantial account, of the great defeat King Aidan received from Ethelfrid, King of Northumberland, which he tells us happened in the year 603, at a place called Deg-fastane, the defeat being so total, that to this day, says he, that is, to the year 731, the Scots have never dared to enter Britain, or offer battle to the English, which circumstance is also taken notice of in the Saxon Annals, where this battle is placed in the same year (9). E

A I D A N, Bishop of Lindisfarne, or Holy Island, in the VIIth century, was originally a Monk in the monastery of Hii or Iona [A], one of the islands called Hebrides (a). In the year 634, he came into England, at the request of Ofwald King of Northumberland [B], to instruct that Prince's subjects in the knowledge of the Christian religion [C]. At his coming to Ofwald's

[A] He was a Monk in the monastery of Hii or Iona. Let us hear venerable Bede. 'Monachus ipse Episcopus Aidan, utpote de insula quæ vocatur Hii destinatus: cujus monasterium in cunctis pene Septentrionalium Scottorum & omnium Pictorum monasteriis non parvo tempore arcem tenebat, regendisque eorum populis præerat: quæ videlicet insula ad jus quidem Britannicæ pertinet, non magno ab ea freto discreta; sed donatione Pictorum, qui illas Britannicæ plagas incolunt, jamdudum monachis Scottorum tradita, eo quod illis prædicantibus fidem Christi perceperint (1). — Bishop Aidan was himself a Monk, being sent on this mission from the island Hii, the monastery of which place had for a long time a jurisdiction over all the monasteries of the northern Scots and Picts. The island itself was subject to Britain, from which it was separated only by a small arm of the sea: but by donation of the Picts, who inhabit those parts of Britain, it had been given to the Monks of Scotland, as an acknowledgment of their conversion by the preaching of the latter.'

[B] He came into England at the request of Ofwald King of Northumberland [This Prince, being sensibly affected with the advantages of Christianity, and desirous his subjects should partake of the same privilege, had sent into Scotland for some person of learning and character to instruct them. The Scotch clergy immediately dispatched away a Missionary (2) for that purpose. But this ecclesiastic, being of a rugged and severe disposition, was greatly disliked by the English; inasmuch that finding himself unsuccessful in his mission, he returned home, and reported to his countrymen, that the English were an untractable people, bigotted to Paganism; and that it was impossible to convert them. Aidan, who was present, turning himself to the Priest, said: 'Your want of success, brother, seems to me to be owing to your want of condescension to the weakness of your unlearned hearers; whom, according to the apostolical rule, you should first have fed with the milk of a milder and less rigid doctrine, till, being nourished by degrees with the word of God, they were become capable of relishing the more perfect and sublime precepts of the Gospel.' Videtur mihi, frater, quia durior justo indoctis auditoribus fuisti, & non eis juxta apostolicam disciplinam primo lac doctrinæ mollioris porrexisti, donec paulatim entriti verbo Dei, ad capiendâ perfectione & ad faciendâ sublimiora Dei præcepta sufficerent (3). This discrete and judicious speech was highly applauded by the assembly, and it was unanimously resolved that Aidan deserved the honour of the episcopal character, and was the best qualified to convert the English. Whereupon he was presently consecrated, and sent upon that employment (4). It may be thought strange, perhaps, that King Ofwald should send into Scotland for a missionary to instruct his subjects in the Christian religion; and that he did not rather re-call Paulinus, who had been driven from the see of York (5), or employ the ministry of James, whom Paulinus had left in Northumberland. But it must be considered, that Ofwald had been instructed in religion by the Scotch, and had imbibed an aversion for the missionaries sent from Rome, on account of the diversity of sentiments between the Scotch and the Romanists, in relation to the celebration of Easter (6), and the tonsure of priests.

[C] — to instruct the Northumbrians in the knowledge of the Christian religion. The kingdom of Northumberland had received the Christian faith by the preaching of Paulinus, Archbishop of York, in the reign of King Edwin, who died in 633. But that Prince being slain in battle, and the desolation, to which Northumberland was exposed, having obliged Paulinus to quit the kingdom, the Northumbrians returned in crowds to idolatry. Anfrid and Ofric, Kings of Deira and Bernicia, followed the example of their subjects, though they had embraced the Christian religion in Scotland. And thus the knowledge of the true religion was almost extinguished

Oswald's court, he prevailed upon the King to remove the episcopal see from York, where it had been settled by Gregory the Great, to Lindisfarne or Holy Island [D]. He was very successful in his preaching; in which he was not a little assisted by the pious zeal of the King, who, having lived a considerable time in Scotland, and acquired a sufficient knowledge of the language, was himself Aidan's interpreter, and explained his discourses to the nobility, and the rest of his court (b). After the death of Oswald, who was slain in battle, Aidan continued to govern the Church of Northumberland, under his successors Oswin and Oswi, who reigned jointly; the former in the province of Deira, the latter in that of Bernicia. Bede tells us a remarkable story concerning King Oswin and Bishop Aidan [E]. This holy Bishop, having foretold that Prince's untimely death, was so afflicted for his loss, that he survived him but twelve days, and died in August 651, after having sat sixteen years (c). Bede gives him an extraordinary character [F], but at the same time takes notice, that he was not altogether orthodox in keeping of Easter [G], in which he followed the custom of the Scots, Picts, and Britons (d). The same in that country; and this wretched state continued near two years, till Oswald mounted the throne in 634 (7).

[D] He prevailed with the King to remove the episcopal see from York — to Lindisfarne or Holy Island.] Bede tells us, Lindisfarne is not really an island, but part of the main land; and that, by the flux and reflux of the sea, it is twice a day surrounded with water in the manner of an island, and as often left dry. Qui videlicet locus accedente & recedente reamare bis quotidie inflat insula maris circumluitur undis, bis renudato littore contiguus terræ redditur (8). It is a peninsula, joined to the coast of Northumberland by a very narrow neck of land, and called Holy Island from it's being inhabited chiefly by Monks (9). But though the episcopal see was small, it's jurisdiction was very extensive: for the Bishops of Lindisfarne presided over the whole kingdom of Northumberland, according to the received discipline of the ancient English Church, in which there was but one Bishop to each kingdom. Quantumvis autem arcta fuerat Sedes, Diocesis erat latissima: toti siquidem Northumbrorum regno episcopi Lindisfarfarnenses præverunt, juxta disciplinam apud antiquos usque ad Theodori archiepiscopi tempora receptam, qua singulis regnis singuli episcopi præsidebant (10). The author, now cited, tells us, that Aidan and his successors, as far as Wilfrid, neither knew nor affected the metropolitan dignity, though they succeeded to the rights of Paulinus, Archbishop of York, who had received the pall, and obtained the title of Metropolitan. Nor had they any intercourse with the Roman Pontiff: for, besides that they acknowledged no foreign Bishops superior to themselves, they celebrated Easter (*) in a manner different from the Church of Rome. Paulino itaque in ditione successerunt, neutquam tamen in dignitate. Paulinus enim Pallio utebatur, & Metropolitanum titulum, quamvis nondum sibi constituit suffraganeis, obtinuit. Aidanus autem, ejusque ad Wilfridum usque successores à Scotia prodeuntes, metropolitanam dignitatem nec noverunt quidem nec affectarunt; cumque Romano pontifice, qui istam Paulino dignitatem contulerat, nil commune habuerunt. Præterquam enim quod nullos externæ gentis episcopos sibi superiores agnovissent, diem Paschalem ritu adhib. alieno, a quarta decima scilicet luna calculum ducentes, celebraverunt (11).

[E] A remarkable story concerning King Oswin and Bishop Aidan.] King Oswin had given Bishop Aidan a fine horse. Some time after, the Bishop happening to meet a poor man upon the road, who begged his charity, dismounted and gave him the horse with it's rich housings. The King hearing this was displeased, and, the next time the Bishop came to dine with him, accosted him in the following manner: My Lord, why were you so prodigal of my favour, as to give away my pad to a beggar? If there was a necessity of setting him on horse-back, could you not have furnished him with one of less value; or if he wanted any other relief, you might have supplied him another way, and not have parted so easily with the present I made you. To which the Bishop replied; Your Majesty seems not fully to have considered the matter: for otherwise you would not set a greater value on the son of a mare than on a son of God (12). Upon this no more passed, and they sat down to dinner. Not long after, the King coming from hunting when the Bishop was at court, and remembering what had passed between them, laid by his sword, and, falling at the Bishop's feet, desired he would not take amiss what he had formerly said about the pad. The Bishop, being disturbed to see the King in that posture, raised him up, and desired him not to trouble himself about that matter. And now the Bishop appeared with a melancholy air, and wept very much; and being asked the cause of his tears by one of his Priests, he told him, he foresaw that Oswin's life was but short; for in my life (says he) I never saw so humble a Prince before. His temper is too heavenly to dwell long among us; and indeed the nation does not deserve the blessing of such a governor. The Bishop proved a true Prophet: for the King was soon after treacherously slain; and, about a fortnight after, Aidan himself died, and, as Bede expresses it, received the reward of his pious labours in Heaven. De seculo ablatu, perpetua laborum suorum a domino præmia recepit (13).

[F] Bede gives him an extraordinary character.] Scripti hæc de persona (says that historian) & operibus viri præfati — quæ laude sunt digna in ejus actibus laudans, atque ad utilitatem legentium memoriæ commendans: studium videlicet pacis & caritatis, continentiæ & humilitatis; animus iræ & avaritiæ victorem, superbiam simul & vanæ gloriæ contemptorem; industriam faciendi simul & docendi mandata cœlestia; solertiam lectionis & vigiliarum; auctoritatem sacerdoti dignam redarguendi superbos ac potentes, pariter & infirmos consolandi ac pauperes recreandi vel defendendi clementiam. Qui, ut brevier multa comprehendam, quantum ab iis qui illum novere didicimus, nil ex omnibus quæ in Evangelicis vel Apostolicis five Prophetis literis facienda cognoverat, prætermittere, sed cuncta pro suis viribus operibus explere curabat (14). — These things have I written concerning the person and actions of the aforesaid Prelate, giving due praise to that part of his conduct which deserved it, and transmitting it to posterity for the use of the readers: namely, his concern for peace and brotherly love, for moderation and humility; his entire freedom from resentment and avarice, from pride and vain-glory; his readiness both to obey and teach the divine commands; his diligence in reading and watching; his true sacerdotal authority in restraining the proud and the powerful, and, at the same time, his tenderness and compassion in comforting the afflicted, and relieving or defending the poor. To say all in a few words, as far as we have been informed by those who personally knew him, he took care to omit no part of his duty, but, to the utmost of his abilities, performed every thing commanded in the writings of the Evangelists, Apostles, and Prophets.

[G] — but at the same time takes notice, that he was not altogether orthodox in keeping of Easter.] Quod autem Pascha (Bede goes on) non suo tempore observabat, vel canonicum ejus tempus ignorans, vel suæ gentis auctoritate ne agnitionem sequeretur devictus, non adprobo, nec laudo (15). — But I do not approve or commend his keeping of Easter improperly, whether it was that he was ignorant of the time prescribed by the canons, or, if he did know it, was kept from following it by the custom and practice of his nation. However Bede apologizes for Bishop Aidan even in this point; for he adds: In quo tamen hoc adprobo, quia in celebratione sui Paschæ non aliud corde tenebat, venerabatur, & predicabat, quam quod nos, id est, redemptionem generis humani per passionem, resurrectionem, ascensionem

[H] Bede aſcribes three miracles to Biſhop Aidan.]

I. A certain Prieſt, named Utta, was ſent by King Ofwi to Canterbury, to conſult into Northumberland his betrothed wife, the Princeſs Eaſſeda, daughter to King Edwin. This Prieſt, who was to go thither by land, but to return by ſea, addreſſed himſelf to Biſhop Aidan, deſiring his prayers for the ſucceſs of his voyage. The good prelate having bleſſed him, and commended him to God, told him, he foreſaw there would ariſe a violent ſtorm, whereby his veſſel would be in great danger; and at the ſame time gave him a viol of holy oil, bidding him, when occaſion ſhould require, to pour it into the ſea, which would thereby be preſently rendered calm. Utta followed the good Biſhop’s directions, and by that means ſaved himſelf, and all that were in the ſhip with him, from impending deſtruction. Bede ſays, the truth of this miracle was confirmed to him by a prieſt named Cynimund, who had the ſtory from Utta’s own mouth (17). II. The army of the Mercians, commanded by Penda, having committed great deſtroyments in Northumberland, and penetrated as far as the royal city of Bebbanburg, began to ſet it on fire: at which time Biſhop Aidan, being in the iſland Farne, about two miles diſtant from the city, and ſeeing the flakes of fire brought by the wind, and the ſmoak riſing above the walls, immediately lifted up his hands and eyes to heaven, and with tears ſaid, Behold, Lord, what miſchief Penda does! Whereupon, the wind preſently changing, the flames were driven from the city upon the incendiaries, many of whom periſhed, and the reſt were glad to retreat from a city, which they ſaw to be thus miraculoſly defended (18). III. This good Biſhop being in one of the royal villas, not far from the abovementioned city, and finding himſelf near his death, ordered a tent to be pitched for him cloſe to one of the walls of the church: which being done, he retired thither, and there gave up his laſt breath. It happened ſome years after, that Penda, King of the Mercians, having ſet fire to this church, it was entirely conſumed, all but a wooden buttreſs or beam, cloſe to which Aidan’s tent had been placed. This miracle being greatly celebrated, the church was rebuilt, and the ſame piece of timber employed as a buttreſs to the new fabric. But ſome time after, this church, through negligence, was again deſtroyed by fire; and being once more re-built, the miraculous beam was no longer placed on the outside of the church, but was laid up within it; where it became an object of the people’s veneration, and was inſtrumental in curing many diſeaſes and infirmities (19).

A I L M E R, or Æ T H E L M A R E, Earl of Cornwall and Devonſhire, in the reign of King Edgar (a): it is not known of what family he was. His authority and riches were great, and ſo alſo in appearance was his piety. He founded the abbey of Cerne, in Dorſetſhire; and had ſo great a veneration for Eadwald, the brother of St Edmund the Martyr, who had lived a hermit in that county, near the ſilver well, as they called it; that with the aſſiſtance of Archbiſhop Dunſtan, he tranſlated his relics to the old church of Cernel (b). In 1005, he founded the abbey of Eynesham in Oxfordſhire, as alſo the priory of Bruton in Somerſetſhire, both for Monks of the Benedictine order (c). In 1013, when Suane, King of Denmark, over-run the greateſt part of England, and forced King Æthelred to ſhut himſelf up in Wincheſter, Earl Ailmer thought fit to ſubmit himſelf [A], and to make terms with the conqueror, to whom he gave hoſtages (d). In 1016, when Canute, the ſon of Suane, invaded England, and found himſelf ſtoutly oppoſed by that valiant Saxon Prince, Edmund Ironſide, the ſon of Æthelred, this Earl Ailmer [B], with that arch-traitor, Eadric Streone, Earl of Mercia, and Earl Algar, joined the Dane againſt their natural Prince, which was one great cauſe of the Saxons ruin (e). He did not long ſurvive this; and we find mentioned in hiſtory only one ſon of his, whoſe name was Æthelward, Earl of Cornwall, who followed his father’s maxims, and was properly rewarded for it. For in 1018, Canute reaping the benefit of their treaſons,

[A] Thought fit to ſubmit himſelf.] In the Saxon Chronicle we are told, that in the year 1013, in the month of July, King Suane came with his navy to Sandwich, thence he failed along the coaſt to the mouth of the Humber, and afterwards by the Trent to Gainſborough; there he landed with his ſon Canute, and a very numerous army. The neighbouring country being reduced, he divided his forces; part he left under the command of his ſon to guard his ſhips, and the hoſtages he had received; and with the reſt he marched ſouthward. The city of Oxford, on his approach, ſurrendered, ſo did Wincheſter; which encouraged him to march eaſtward, in hopes of taking the city of London. In this he miſcarried, King Æthelred being there in perſon, who had the better of the Danes in a very bloody engagement. Upon this Suane retired to Wallingford; from thence croſſing the Thames, he marched to Bath, where this Æthelmare, and many other Lords of his party, met him, gave hoſtages for their fidelity, and aſſiſted him in carrying his ſpoil to his ſhips (1). This rivetted the chains of the nation; and for this horrid treachery, which however ſhewed his exceſſive power, he obtained the ſurname of Great. The ſame Chronicle places the death of his ſon Ethelward in the year 1017, and calls him expreſly the ſon of Ethelmare the Great (2).

[B] This Earl Ailmer.] Some Antiquaries would have us believe, that the Aylmers of Aylmer-Hall, in the county of Norfolk, are deſcended from this Æthelmare, becauſe they bear in their arms four choughs; and for their creſt, on a ducal coronet, a Corniſh chough’s head and neck, wings diſplayed (3). This notion, however, ſeems a little unreaſonable, Æthelmare being apparently no ſurname; and Duke again, a title unknown to the Saxons. In another article, we ſhall treat of a Saxon Biſhop of the ſame name, which ſhews that it was common; and conſequently, that there is no referring the ſurname of Aylmer to this or that treasons, and perceiving that the traitors were no longer useful, he caused the infamous Eadric Streone, and this Earl Æthelward, to be both put to death (f).

that particular man amongst the Saxons, who bore this name; neither in this case is there the least reason for it, the Aylmers of Norfolk being certainly a very an-tient and honourable family, standing in no want of these fabulous pretensions, as will be shewn in a proper place. E

AILRED (a), ETHELRED (b), or EALRED (c), Abbot of Revesby in Lincolnshire, in the reigns of King Stephen and King Henry II, was born of noble parents (d), in the year 1109, and educated in Scotland, together with Henry, son of David King of Scots (e). Upon his return into England, he took the habit in the Cistercian monastery of Revesby aforesaid; where his extraordinary piety and learning soon raised him to the dignity of Abbot [A]. His great love of retirement, and a life of contemplation and study, induced him to decline all offers of ecclesiastical preferment, and even to refuse a Bishopric. He was particularly fond of reading St Austin's works, especially that author's confessions; and he was a strict imitator of St Bernard in his writings, words, and actions (f). He left behind him several monuments of his learning [B], in the writing of which, he was assisted by Walter Daniel, a Monk of the same convent (g). This Abbot died January the 12th 1166, aged fifty-seven years (h), and was buried in the monastery of Revesby, under a tomb adorned with gold and silver (i). And, we are told, he was canonized on account of some miracles said to have been wrought by him after his death (k).

AINS WORTH (HENRY) an eminent Nonconformist Divine, who flourished the latter end of the XVIth, and in the beginning of the XVIIth century. It is very much to be regretted, that we are able to say very little of so great a man, for we know not so much as where, or when he was born, or any thing more of him than this, that about the year 1590, he distinguished himself amongst the Brownists, to whom he adhered, and on that account endured a share in their persecutions (a). His great skill in Hebrew learning, and his excellent commentaries on the Holy Scriptures, which are still highly and justly esteemed [A], gained him a vast reputation (b). However, the discredit his sect

[A] Which are still highly and justly esteemed. His annotations on several books of the Bible were printed at several times, and in several sizes. Those on the Psalms in quarto, in 1612; those on the five books of Moses, in two volumes in quarto, in 1621; all these together, bound in three quarto volumes. At length, 1627, his annotations were printed in one volume in folio, and again in 1639, which edition is become so very rare, as to be inserted in all the catalogues of scarce books (1). It will not therefore be amiss to give an account of it's contents. It's title runs thus: 'Annotations upon the five books of Moses, the book of the Psalms, and the Song of Songs, or Canticles. Wherein the Hebrew words and sentences are compared with, and explained by, the ancient Greek, and Chaldee versions, and other records and monuments of the Hebrews; but chiefly, by conference with the holy scriptures, Moses his words, laws, and ordinances, the sacrifices, and other legal ceremonies heretofore commanded by God to the Church of Israel, are explained; with an advertisement, touching some objections made against the sincerity of the Hebrew text, and allegation of the Rabbins in these annotations; as also tables, directing unto such principal things as are observed in the annotations upon each several book. By Henry Ainsworth. London, printed by M. Parfons, for John Bellamy, 1639.' In this edition, the first thing that occurs is a preface or discourse, on the life and writings of Moses, which is subscribed by the author; then follow the five books of Moses, translated literally from the Hebrew, with annotations chiefly from Rabbinical writers; and by comparison of texts. At the end of the Pentateuch, there is a little treatise, intitled, An advertisement, touching some objections made against the sincerity of the Hebrew text, and allegation of the Rabbins in the former annotations; to which are added some other short dissertations. Then follow, annotations upon the book of Psalms; to which is prefixed, an excellent Life of David, extracted from, and in the words of, scripture. Lastly, we have the Song fect were then in, drew upon him such dangers and troubles, that after struggling with them for some years, he at length quitted his country, and retired into Holland, where most of the eminent Nonconformists, who had incurred the displeasure of Queen Elizabeth's government, had taken refuge before. At Amsterdam Mr Johnson and he erected a church, of which our Ainsworth was the doctor or teacher (c). In conjunction with Johnson, he published a confession of faith of the people called Brownists, in the year 1602, not much different in doctrine from the harmony of confessions; but being men of warm spirits, they split into parties about some points of discipline; Johnson excommunicated his own father and brother for trifling matters, after having rejected the mediation of the Presbytery of Amsterdam. This divided the congregation, inasmuch that Mr Ainsworth and half the congregation excommunicated Johnson, who after some time, returned the same compliment to Ainsworth. At length the contest grew so hot, that Amsterdam could not hold them: Johnson and his followers removed to Embden, where soon after he died, and his congregation dissolved (d). Nor did Mr Ainsworth and his followers live long in peace; for soon after he left them, and retired to Ireland, where he continued some time; but when the spirits of his people were quieted, he returned to Amsterdam, and continued with them to his death (e). If we may believe Dr Heylyn, the contentions at Amsterdam were some of them of an odd nature, and which sufficiently shew how great obedience some men expect, who yet are not much inclined to pay it, either to the Church or to the State (f) [B]. His learned writings were received with respect, even by his adversaries, who while they refuted his singularities, paid a proper regard to his abilities, particularly that worthy Bishop of Exeter, Dr Hall, who wrote with great strength of reason against the Brownists (g). But nothing it seems could reclaim him, or incline him to return home; but as he lived, so he died in exile, though with some remarkable circumstances, which have been remembered by several authors, notwithstanding the year in which they happened is not recorded. His demise was sudden, and

Song of Solomon, with a literal translation from the Hebrew in prose, and another in verse, as also annotations. This learned work was translated into Dutch, as the reader will see in the margin; and his commentary on the Song of Solomon, into German verse. All the modern writers on the scriptures, cite him frequently; and the authors of Moreri's dictionary are pleased to leave it doubtful, whether the learned Lightfoot did not borrow much of what he has written on the scriptures from this excellent work (2).

[B] Either to the church, or to the state. We cannot have the differences at Amsterdam set in a clearer, though perhaps they may be placed in a little too strong a light, than by Dr Heylyn; he lived near those times, and took care to be perfectly informed, as to the things of which he wrote, though it may be, his distaste to all sectaries might sharpen his manner of delivering them, for which the judicious reader will make allowances. 'Worse fared it with the brethren of the separation, who had retired themselves unto Amsterdam in the former reign, than with their first founders, and forefathers, in the Church of England; for having broken in sunder the bond of peace, they found no possibility of preserving the spirit of unity; one separation growing continually on the neck of another, till they were crumbled into nothing. The brethren of the first separation had found fault with the Church of England for reading prayers and homilies, as they lay in the book, and not admitting the presbytery to take place amongst them. But the brethren of the second separation take as much distaste against retaining all set forms of hymns and psalms, committing their conceptions both in praying and prophesying, and singing of psalms, to the help of memory; and then subjoin this maxim, in which all agreed, that is to say, that there is the same reason of helps in all the parts of spiritual worship, as is to be admitted in any one, during the performing of that worship. Upon which ground, they charge it home on their fellow-separatists; that as in prayer, the book is to be laid aside, by the confession of the antient brethren of the separation, so must it also be in prophesying and singing of psalms; and therefore, whether we pray, or sing, or prophesy, it is not to be from the book, but out of the heart. For prophesying, next they tell us, that the spirit is quenched two manner of ways, by memory as well as reading. And to make known how little use there is of memory in the act of prophesying or preaching, they tell us, that the citing of chapter and verse (as not being used by Christ and his apostles in their sermons or writings) is a mark of Antichrist. And as for psalms, which make the third part of spiritual worship, they propose these queries: 1. Whether in a psalm, a man must be tied to metre, rhyme, and tune? and whether voluntary be not as necessary in tune and words, as well as matter? and 2. Whether metre, rhyme, and tune, be not quenching the spirit? according to which resolution of the new separation, every man, when the congregation shall be met together, may first conceive his own matter in the act of praising; deliver it in prose or metre, as he lists himself; and in the same instant, chant out, in what tune soever, that which comes first into his own head, which would be such a horrible confusion of tongues and voices, that hardly any howling or gnashing of teeth can be equal to it. And yet it follows so directly on the former principles, that if we banish all set forms of common prayer (which is but only one part of God's publick worship) from the use of the Church, we cannot but in justice, and in reason both, banish all studied and premeditated sermons from the house of God, and utterly cast out all King David's Psalms, (whether in prose or metre, that comes all to one) and all divine hymns also into the bargain. Finally, as to forms of government, they declared thus (or to this purpose at least, if my memory fail not) that as they which live under the tyranny of the Pope and Cardinals, worship the very beast itself; and they which live under the government of Archbishops and Bishops, do worship the image of the beast; so they which willingly obey the reformed Presbytery of Pastors, Elders, and Deacons, worship the shadow of that image. To such ridiculous follies are men commonly brought, when once presuming on some new light to direct their actions, they suffer themselves to be misguided by the ignis fatuus of their own inventions. And in this posture stood the brethren of the separation, anno 1606, when Smith first published his book of the present differences, between the churches of the separation, as he honestly calls them. But afterwards there grew another great dispute between Ainsworth and Broughton, whether the colour of Aaron's linen ephod were of blue, or a sea-water green; which did not only trouble all the Dyers in Amsterdam, but drew their several followers into fides and factions, and made good sport to all the world, but themselves alone. By reason of which divisions and subdivisions, they fell at last into so many factions, that one of them in the end, became a church of himself; and having none to join in opinion with him, baptized himself, and thereby got the name of a Se-baptist; which never any sectary or heretick had obtained before (3). As to these particular differences between our author Ainsworth and Mr Johnson, they were made the subject of various books and pamphlets in those days, some of which are come down even to our times, as the reader will perceive by the book cited in the margin (4).

and not without suspicion of violence; for it is reported, that having found a diamond of very great value in the streets of Amsterdam, he advertised it in print; and when the owner, who was a Jew, came to demand it, he offered him any acknowledgment he would desire; but Ainsworth, though poor, would accept of nothing but a conference with some of his Rabbies, upon the prophecies of the Old Testament, relating to the Messias, which the other promised; but not having interest enough to obtain it, it is thought he was poisoned (b). It was certainly a great misfortune, that the obstinacy of his own spirit, and the rigorous administration in the Church, shut out so able a man from the publick exercise of his ministry; for he was indisputably a person of profound learning, exquisitely versed in the Scriptures, and deeply read in the works of the Rabbins. Besides, he had a strong understanding, quick penetration, and wonderful diligence. It is true that these excellent qualities were somewhat allayed by the hastiness of his temper, his contempt for ecclesiastical governments, his proneness to maintain disputes about small things, and his rashness in separating, not only from the Church, but his own Nonconformist brethren in Holland. This was a grievous prejudice to the Protestant cause in general; and gave a signal advantage to the enemies of the Puritans here in England in particular. Though our author was much considered in his life-time [C], in his own country, and several of his books were more than once reprinted after his death, yet through a prevailing contempt for men of his sentiments, and too cold a reception of that kind of learning, which rendered him famous, his works are now more known and valued abroad than here; in so much, that it is not easy to produce an English writer oftener quoted, or with greater testimonies in favour of his merit, than we find bestowed on Dr Ainsworth; and this by the learned of all countries, and at a considerable distance in time, and of all sects and opinions (i). A higher testimony of the veneration he has acquired by his writings, cannot well be expected, than that which occurs in all the late editions of Moreri's dictionary; and even in the last, wherein with great pains they distinguish between Henry Ainsworth, the able commentator on the Scriptures, and Henry Ainsworth the Herefiarch, who was one of the chiefs of the Brownists in the reign of Queen Elizabeth; and very gravely tell us, that we must have a care not to confound them; nevertheless, nothing is more certain, than that these two Henry Ainsworth's were the same man. There was indeed another writer, whose Christian name was William, whose works have some affinity with those of our author, and are therefore sometimes ascribed to him (k), but this William Ainsworth lived considerably later; and besides him there was one Mr Samuel Ainsworth, a Nonconformist minister in Northamptonshire, who was also an author (l). After the decease of our Dr Ainsworth, his congregation at Amsterdam made choice of Dr Carre for their pastor, who was author of the marginal references to the Bible, and several other treatises (m).

[C] Much considered in his life-time.] He published occasionally several treatises, many of which made a great noise in the world, as particularly his book, intitled, A Counter-Poison against Bernard and Crashaw, 4to, 1612; this piece is often cited, and the principles therein advanced, refuted by Bishop Hall, though he did not write expressly against Ainsworth, but against Smith and Robinson, two ministers amongst the Brownists; yet whenever he mentions Ainsworth, he always owns him for the greatest man of his party; and speaking to those he wrote against, calls him your Doctor, your Chief, your Rabbi (4). Another work of Ainsworth's was intitled, An Animadversion to Mr Richard Clyfton's advertisement, who, under pretence of answering Charles Lawne's book, hath published another man's private letter, with Mr Francis Johnson's answer thereto; which letter is here justified, the answer thereto refuted, and the true causes of the lamentable breach that hath lately fallen out in the English exiled Church at Amsterdam, manifested: printed at Amsterdam, by Giles Thorp, A. D. 1613, quarto. About the same time he wrote a Treatise of the Communion of Saints: and two years after another book, intitled, A Treatise of the Fellowship that the Faithful, &c. have with God, his Angels, and one with another, in this present life, 1615, 8vo. In the same year appeared likewise, The trying out of the truth between John Ainsworth and Henry Ainsworth; the one pleading for, the other against, Popery, 4to. He wrote likewise a small piece, often printed in 12mo. called, An Arrow against Idolatry, which is highly and justly commended by a late writer (5). To these we may add, a treatise, intitled, Certain Notes of Mr Ainsworth's last Sermon on 1 Pet. ii. 4, 5. 1630, 8vo. whence it may be gathered, that he died some little time before. E

AIRAY (HENRY) Provost of Queen's college in Oxford, was born in Westmoreland, educated in Grammatical learning by the care of Bernard Gilpin, usually called the Northern Apottle, and by him sent to St Edmund's Hall in Oxford, in the year 1579. He was then nineteen years of age, and was maintained at the university by Gilpin, who left him a handsome legacy by his last will, bearing date the 27th of October, 1582. Mr Airay soon removed from St Edmund's Hall to Queen's college, where he became Pauper Puer Serviens. In 1583, he took his bachelor's degree, and was made Tabardus, or Tabardarius [A]; and in 1586, he commenced Master of Arts and Fellow. About this time he went into orders, and became a constant and zealous preacher in the university, particularly in the church of St Peter in the East, adjoining to Queen's college. In 1594, he took the degree of Bachelor in Divinity, and four years after was

[C] A Treatise against bowing at the name of Jesus.] Thomas Beacon, an old Calvinist, had long before written on the same subject; and, about Airay's time, Dr William Whitaker, and Mr Andrew Willet did the like (3).

AIRAY (CHRISTOPHER) Vicar of Milford in Hampshire, was born at Clifton in Westmoreland [A]; and admitted a student in Queen's college in Oxford, in Michaelmas Term, 1621; where having passed through the servile offices (a), and taken the degree of Master of Arts, he was elected a Fellow. Soon after, agreeably to the statutes of that house, he went into Holy Orders, and, in 1642, took the degree of Bachelor of Divinity. He wrote Fasciculus præceptorum Logicalium in gratiam juventutis Academicæ compositus, i. e. A Collection of the Rules of Logic, for the use of the Students in the University (b); besides some other pieces, which the Oxford Antiquarian (c), who gives us this account, had not seen. He died the eighteenth of October, 1670, and was buried in the chancel of his church of Milford. His epitaph [B] may be seen below.

[A] He was born at Clifton in Westmoreland.] Mr Wood does not tell us, whether Mr Christopher Airay was any way related to Dr Henry Airay, whose article we have given above; though one would be apt to suspect he was, when we consider that, besides the similitude of name, they were both born in the same county, had their education in the same college, and proceeded in the same course of study.

ALAN (OF LYNN) in Latin Alanus de Lynna, a famous divine in the XVth Century, was born at Lynn, in the county of Norfolk, and educated in the university of Cambridge; where he applied himself diligently to the study of Philosophy and Divinity, and, having taken the degree of Doctor (a), became an eminent preacher. Bale, who gives Alan an advantageous character (b), yet blames him for using allegorical and moral expositions of Scripture [A]. But he is particularly famous for the great pains he took in making Indexes to most of the books he read [B]. Alan flourished about the year 1420 (c), and wrote several pieces, particularly 1. De vario Scripturæ sensu, i. e. Of the different senses of Scripture. 2. Moralia Bibliorum, i. e. The Morality of the Scriptures. 3. Sermones notabiles, i. e. Remarkable Discourses. 4. Elucidarium Scripturæ, i. e. A Method of interpreting Scripture. 5. Prælectiones Theologicæ, i. e. Lectures on Divinity. 6. Elucidationes Aristotelis, i. e. Explications of Aristotle (d). At length he became a Carmelite, in the town of his nativity, and was buried in the convent of his order (e).

[A] Bale — blames him for using allegorical and moral expositions of scripture.] Unum hoc in signe malum cum cæteris suarum factionum habebat commune. Quæcumque historicè scripta erant in utroque Dei Testamento, per allegorias & morales (ut vocant) expositiones ad animæ negotium & humanæ justitiæ opera traxit (1). — He had this great fault in common with those of his stamp. He allegorized the historical parts of the Old and New Testament, and applied them to the business of the soul, and the moral actions of men. Pits, on the other hand, commends the method he took to explain the Holy Scriptures; which was, by comparing them with themselves, and having recourse to the ancient fathers of the Church. In quo conatu, optimam viam secutus, alia cum aliis sacræ scripturæ loca conferens, & ad antiquos ecclesiæ patres, sanctosque recurrens doctores, nihil temere suoque solius ingenio nixus, interpretatus est (2).

[B] He made indexes to most of the authors he read.] Particularly, Josephus, Origen, Hilary, Eusebius, St Jerom, St Ambrose, St Augustin, St Basil, St Chrysostom, St Cyril, Cassian, Johannes Damascenus, St Gregory, Rabanus, Remigius, Cassiodorus, Bede, Aleuinus, Haymo, Hugo, Anselm, St Barnard, Gerard of Laodicea, Beletus Blefensis, Thomas Aquinas, Ægidius, Duns Scotus, Alexander Neckam, Gorham, Baconthorp, Berthorius, and Philip Ribotus. The indexes to all these authors Bale himself saw in the library of the Carmelites at Norwich (3). The use, and necessity, of indexes, is well set forth by Dr Fuller (4). An index (says he) is a necessary implement, and no impediment of a book, except in the same sense wherein the carriages of an army are termed impedimenta.

pedimenta. Without this, a large author is but a labyrinth, without a clue to direct the reader therein. I confess, there is a lazy kind of learning, which is only indical; when scholars (like adders, which only bite the horse-heels) nibble but at the tables, which are calces librorum, neglecting the body of the book. But though the idle deserve no crutches, (let not a staff be used by them, but on them) pity it is, the weary should be denied the benefit thereof, and industrious scholars prohibited the accommodation of an index, most used by those, who most pretend to contemn it.

[C] A L A N, abbot of Tewkesbury.] In Baronius (5) he is styled Abbas Deoces; which is a mistake, arising perhaps from hence, that, in the Vatican copy which that author made use of, he found written Deoces, instead of Theoces, or, as we now say, Teukeburienfis.

A L A N, A L L E N, A L L Y N (W I L L I A M) Cardinal-Priest of the Roman Church. He was the son of John Allen, by Jennet Lyfter, sister to Thomas Lyfter, of Westby in Yorkshire (a), was born at Rossal in Lancashire, some time in the year 1532. His father was a gentleman of good family, and some fortune [A], who took care of his education till such time as he reached his fifteenth year, and then sent him to Oxford (b), where, in 1547, he was entered of Oriel college, and had for his tutor, Morgan Phillips, or Philip Morgan, a very famous man, and a zealous Papist (c), under whom he studied with great success, adding himself especially to Logick, and Philosophy, in which, he became such a proficient, that he was unanimously elected fellow of his college in 1550 (d), in which year also, he took the degree of Bachelor of Arts (e). In an act celebrated July the sixteenth, he went out junior of the act, having compleated his degree of Master of Arts, with great reputation (f); being at that time esteemed an honour to the university on account of his great parts, learning, and eloquence. In 1556, he became Principal of St Mary's Hall, and in that, and the year following, one of the Proctors of the university (g), being then but twenty-four years of age. In 1558, he was made canon of York (h), but on Queen Elizabeth's coming to the crown, he, as a zealous Catholick, lost all hopes of preferment, and therefore, in 1560, withdrew out of his native country (i), and retired to Louvain in the Spanish Netherlands, where an English college was erected, of which he became the principal support [B]. At this time, there were several persons of great learning, and some of the boldest champions of the Popish cause, resided in this place, with whom Allen conversed, and by the politeness, as well as strength of his genius, grew quickly into great esteem. To this, it is said, the gracefulness of his person did not a little contribute, for, with a majestick presence, he had an easy, affable, deportment, and, with the greatest severity of manners, a mildness in speech and behaviour, which drew the affection of all who conversed with him (k). Here he began to write in support of the Catholick cause, and his first piece was against a work written by the learned Bishop Jewell, on the subject of Purgatory and Prayers for the dead (l) [C]. The method he made

[A] A Gentleman of good family, and fortune.] So an eminent writer, and his contemporary, informs us: His words are these, Natus ille in comitatu Lancastrensi honesta familia, & quæ aliquot clariores cognatione complexa i. e. He was born in Lancashire of a reputable family, allied to some of a bigger degree (1). Pits improves this, according to his wonted manner, for he tells us, that he was nobilibus ortus parentibus (2), which must signify, born of honourable parents at least. The author of his life, tells us, that he was descended from the Allens of Staffordshire, and that his grandfather, George Allen, settled at Rossal in Lancashire, because an uncle of his, who was Abbot of Delawise, demised to him diverse lands there, belonging to his monastery (3). Wood, rightly observes, that the arms Cardinal Allen bore, viz. Argent three Conies passant fable (4), are not the arms of the Allens of Staffordshire, nor indeed, that I can find of any other family (5) of that name; perhaps it was assigned him abroad, on account of the dangers he had run in the service of the Catholick cause, and the fierceness with which his enemies had pursued him; but this is submitted to the reader as a mere conjecture.

[B] Of which he became the principal support.] The reason why the English fugitives inclined to settle in the Low Countries, was chiefly on account of it's vicinity to their own country, whereby they had an opportunity of applying, as occasion required, to their friends for relief. The Spanish government also having already an eye towards Britain, encouraged such learned Catholicks as fled from thence, to settle in those provinces, and especially at Louvain, where there was a flourishing university, and other conveniences (6). Of this, the government in England had early intelligence, and took great care to break off all correspondence between these fugitives, and the relations they had left behind them. There are still some writings in the Paper Office, which contain the names of persons punished for sending money to Louvain, as also an account of the sums they sent (7). However, Dr Harding, Dr Bullock, and other eminent persons remaining there, our author Allen, when he went abroad, thought it the properest place for him to reside in, and renew his acquaintance with his studies (8).

[C] On the subject of purgatory, and prayers, for the dead.] Of all who have written against the Papists, there is none whose works have been better received than those of Bishop Jewell, nor of all the subjects which he handled, was there one wherein he seemed to have reasoned with greater force, than on this, which Allen undertook to answer. The title of his book ran thus. A Defence of the Doctrine of Catholicks, concerning Purgatory, and Prayers for the Dead: It was printed at Antwerp, in 1565, in 8vo (9). The strength of our author's argument lies in this position, that a middle state is what most Protestants own, and that therefore it is more reasonable to believe, as the Church teaches concerning it, than to think at random in this respect. He likewise takes pains to shew that prayers for the dead, were in use in the earliest ages of the Church, and, at the same time, omits nothing that may move the passions, and incline the reader to believe, that as the practice of antiquity, so reason and good-nature also were on his side of the question. This treatise made a great noise in England, and was answered by Mr William Fulke (10), to whom, in process of time, Dr Richard Bristow wrote a reply, printed at Louvain, 1580, whereupon, Dr Fulke thought himself obliged to write a rejoinder, which came out the next year (11).

made use of in this work, was very proper to captivate the judgment of the reader; and his style, which was remarkably pure, and flowing, made his performance still the more dangerous. The chiefs of the party then abroad, conceived the greatest hopes of this new disputant, and, as a mark of their confidence, put under his care a young man, of an honourable family, who was come to study at Louvain. The care he took of this young pupil, and his application to his other studies, had such an effect upon his health, that his physicians were of opinion, nothing could restore it, but the enjoying for a season his native air. On this account, though his coming into England was attended with great danger, our author ventured over about 1565 (m). He went first, as the doctors had advised him, into Lancashire, where he was born, and there, without any regard to his safety, he laboured to the utmost of his power in making converts, and in dissuading such as were already Catholics, from going to Heretical Conventicles, that is, from going to the established Church (n). In order to carry his point the more effectually, he wrote and distributed several little pieces, which were afterwards printed, but by these endeavours rendering himself obnoxious to the government, so strict a search was made after him by the magistrates, that he was forced to retire out of that county (o), into the neighbourhood of the city of Oxford, where he concealed himself some time. In this retreat, he wrote a kind of apology for his party, under the title of Brief Reasons concerning the Catholick Faith (p). Some indeed say, this was written at the house of the Duke of Norfolk, in Norfolk, where it is certain our author was some time concealed, though he returned afterwards into the neighbourhood of Oxford again, where he distributed copies of this performance, to fix the minds of such as wavered between the two religions; and to draw over such as already doubted their safety, while remaining in the established Church (q). Such success attended these his endeavours, that though the conveniency of a ship going to the Netherlands (r) offered, yet he refused to make use of it, and chose rather to continue in this dangerous situation, promoting, as far as in his power lay, the doctrine of Popery, and the spiritual jurisdiction of his Holiness, and such as derived their authority from him. With this view, he ventured to establish a correspondence with some of his old friends in the university, and amongst the rest with a person formerly a Papist, but then of the established Church, and one, of whose preferment his family had great hopes. This man, our author by his unwearied applications drew back to his former opinions, which so exasperated his relations, that they persecuted Allen with extraordinary diligence, inasmuch, that he was forced to fly towards London, and not long after, with some difficulty, made his escape into Flanders, in 1568 (s), having remained in England three years. In all probability he had some great friends here, who, in respect to their former acquaintance with him, were well enough pleased at his withdrawing a second time beyond sea. Amongst whom, we may reckon Sir Christopher Hatton (t), afterwards Chancellor, who received part of his education in St Mary's Hall at Oxford, while our author was Principal thereof; on which account, Sir Christopher had a great tenderness for Allen's person, and Allen, on the other hand, had so high an esteem of him, as to raise his reputation to the greatest height abroad, which occasioned some invidious reflections at home (u). After our author came a second time into the Spanish Low-Countries, he went to Mechlin (w) in the Dutchy of Brabant, where he read a divinity lecture in a certain monastery there, with great applause, thence he went to Doway, where he became Doctor in Divinity (x), and laboured very assiduously in establishing a seminary there for the support of English scholars, and, because this was looked upon with an evil eye by the government in England, he afterwards wrote a book in defence of such establishments, of which the reader will find notice taken in our account of his writings. While he was thus employed, he became canon of Cambay (y), a very considerable and honourable preferment, conferred on him purely to reward his zeal in the service of the Catholick Church [D]. In this seminary of Doway, many books were composed to justify the Popish Religion, and to answer the books written in defence of the Church of England, which occasioned Queen Elizabeth's issuing a proclamation, forbidding such books to be either sold or read (z). In 1569, our author Allen appointed one Bristow, who became afterwards a very eminent man, moderator of studies at Doway (a), which Bristow, in all probability, was the person Allen drew over to his opinions, when he was in England, as is before mentioned. Not long after, Dr Allen was appointed canon

[D] To reward his zeal in the service of the Catholick Church.] All who are admitted to this dignity, are obliged to prove their descents, that is, to show that for so many generations they have been gentlemen. We learn from a celebrated Popish writer, a very extraordinary circumstance concerning our author Allen's mission in England, the report of which, might very possibly contribute somewhat to his obtaining this preferment. The author having told us the reason of his going over to England, proceeds thus: Neither did he lead there an idle or supine life, but, like a brave and bold soldier, disguised in name and in habit, he sallied by stealth into the enemies quarters, recovering from them many whom they had seduced, which grievously provoked them, and occasioned much pains to be taken in order to apprehend him: once he very narrowly escaped, for the person employed to seize him who knew him well, and had actually supped with him the same night, had such a mist before his eyes, when he came to execute his design, that he passed by him without knowing him (12). It may not be amiss to observe here, because Wood takes no notice of it, that the pupil of whom Allen took such care as to endanger his own health, was Mr Christopher Blount, afterwards Sir Christopher Blount, who was concerned in the Earl of Essex's insurrection (13).

of Rheims, through the interest of the Guifes (b), and to this city, he transferred the feminary which had been settled at Doway. The reason which induced this alteration, was, because the then governor of the Netherlands, Don Lewis de Requesens, had obliged the English fugitives to withdraw out of his government (c). Hence forward, Dr Allen was esteemed the chief of his party, and indeed, he laboured incessantly to do it service, by writing various treatises, in defence of the doctrines, and not a few, by way of apology, for the practices of the Papists, by licensing, and recommending many books written by others, and by many journeys into Spain and Italy. By these his labours, he procured a feminary to be established at Rome (d), and two others in Spain. (e), wherein English students were not only educated in all sorts of learning, but were also maintained and provided for. At home, Dr Allen was justly reputed a capital enemy of the state (f), all correspondence with him was looked on as the highest kind of treason, and Thomas Alfield, a Jesuit, was actually executed for bringing certain books of our author's writing into England [E]. The celebrated Robert Parsons, the Jesuit, was Dr Allen's great friend, and counsellor (g), and very probably, put him upon that desperate project, which, if it had succeeded, would have overwhelmed the English, and which, as it miscarried, did in a manner enervate the Spanish monarchy. For many years there had been differences, discontents, and even actual injuries committed, between the English and the Spaniards; but now Dr Allen, and the fugitive Noblemen from England, persuaded King Philip the second, openly to undertake the conquest of their native country (h). To facilitate this, the Pope, who then was Sixtus V, was prevailed upon to renew the excommunication, thundered against Queen Elizabeth, by his predecessor, Pope Pius V (i). While this was in agitation, Sir William Stanley, who commanded a very considerable garrison of English and Irish in the important town of Daventer, basely betrayed it to the Spaniards, and went with his whole regiment of 1200. men into that service (k). Rowland York, who had been also intrusted with a strong fort in the same country, acted in the like infamous manner, which not a little astonished the States General of the United Provinces, and brought no small scandal on the English nation (l); yet Dr Allen wrote a treatise in defence of this base proceeding, and sent several Priests to Stanley, in order to instruct those he had drawn over to the King of Spain's service (m), as the reader will see in the notes [F]. To give the greater weight to these his writings, our author, Allen, on the twenty-eighth of July, 1587, was created Cardinal, by the title of St Martin in Montibus (n), and soon after, the King of Spain, gave him an Abbey of great value in the kingdom of Naples, with strong assurances of much greater preferment, which was afterwards performed. In April, 1668, he composed that

[E] Bringing certain books of our author's into England] The college of Doway, was settled through the prudence and care of Dr Allen, who procured a pension from the Pope, for the support of such as led a collegiate life there. Of these, there were usually eight or ten doctors, who officiated as professors: Of whom, some explained the Holy Scriptures, others taught scholastick divinity, but the studies principally encouraged there, were the canon-law, and controversy. Here also, such as were appointed thereto, wrote books against heresy, defended the religion, and the practices of Catholics, against the aspersions of their enemies, and also collected memoirs of the sufferings and deaths of such as were styled martyrs for the Catholick Faith. In the direction of this college, Dr Allen officiated as president, and behaved with so much mildness, wisdom, and circumspection, that he was universally revered and beloved (14). He likewise revised and approved such books as were written there, during the time that he presided, as appears particularly by his testimony prefixed to Richard Britton's brief Treatise of diverse sure and plain Ways to find out Truth, in this doubtful and dangerous Time of Heresy, to which book, Dr Allen's licence bears date, April 30, 1574 (15). He likewise licensed some of the books of Robert Parsons, and of many others. As to this Jesuit, whose name was Thomas Alfield, and who, in the text, is said to have died for bringing in some of our author's books; there is still among the papers of the Lord Treasurer, Burleigh, a brief of the treasonable expressions extracted out of Dr Allen's books, in order to ground his indictment. These expressions are most of them contained in a treatise written by Dr Allen, intituled, The Defence of the twelve Martyrs in one Year (16), which is not mentioned either by Pits, or Wood, in their catalogues of his works. In order to give the reader some notion of our author's style, and manner of writing, as also, because this book is so scarce, that 'tis hardly to be met with, we shall transcribe a paragraph or two from the indictment. 'The bond and obligation we have entered into for the service of Christ, and, the Church, far exceedeth all other

' duty, which we owe to any human creature. And therefore, where the obedience to the inferior hindreth the service of the other, which is superior, we must, by law and order, discharge our selves of the inferior. The wife, if she cannot live with her own husband, being an infidel, or an heretick, without injury, or dishonour to God, she may depart from him, or, contrariwise, he from her, for the like cause, neither oweth the innocent party, nor can the other lawfully claim, any conjugal duty, or debt in this case. The bond-slave, which is in another kind, no less bound to his lord and master, than the subject to his sovereign, may also, by the ancient Imperial laws, depart, and refuse to obey or serve him, if he become a Heretick Yea, ipso facto, he is made free. Finally, the parents that become Hereticks, lose the superiority and dominion they have by the law of nature, over their own children. Therefore, let no man marvel, that in case of heresy, the sovereign loseth the superiority over his people, and kingdom.' The indictment charges, that the author did hereby intend, that Queen Elizabeth, by reason of her heresy, had fallen from her sovereignty. It likewise charges Thomas Alfield, with bringing the said traitorous books of William Allen, into her majesty's dominions, and there publishing them on the 10th of September, in the twenty-sixth year of her reign, that is, in 1584 (17). For which facts he was executed at Tyburn, the 6th of July, 1585 (18).

[F] As the reader will see in the notes.] This event happened in the winter of 1587. Sir William Stanley had been before in the service of the King of Spain, but deserted from him, and served with reputation in Ireland. The Earl of Leicester, made him governor of Daventer, not only without, but against the consent of the States, who always suspected him, and who, after the Earl was gone into England, would willingly have removed him. Stanley having made an agreement with Count Taxis, admitted him with a small body of troops into the place, and having thus reduced it to the King of Spain's obedience, he was left there governor, with such of his Irish that work which rendered him most famous abroad, and infamous at home. It consisted of two parts, the first explaining the Pope's bull, for the excommunication and deprivation of Queen Elizabeth; the second, exhorting the nobility and people of England to desert her, and take up arms in favour of the Spaniards (o). Of this book the reader will find a farther account in the notes [G]. It is sufficient to say, that it was by far the severest piece ever written against an English Prince, and very capable, considering the then situation of things, of producing mischievous effects. Many thousand copies were printed at Antwerp, in order to have been put on board the Armada, that they might have been in readiness to have been dispersed by the Papists all over England, upon the first landing of the Spaniards. But, on the failing of this enterprize, all these books were so carefully destroyed, that very few were preserved (p). Of these, one, as soon as it was printed, was transmitted by some of the Lord Treasurer's spies, to the English council, and Queen Elizabeth, thereupon, sent Dr Dale into the Low Countries, to complain of such a proceeding to the Prince of Parma, who affected to preserve great measures towards her Majesty. He heard this complaint with a great deal of phlegm, and answered, that as he knew of no such book, he could not say any thing to its contents (q). After the Armada was destroyed, Philip Howard, Earl of Arundel, who had been three years in prison under a charge of high-treason, was brought to his trial and the great crime charged upon him, was his correspondence with Cardinal Allen, which being proved, he was found guilty by his Peers (r). In the same year, the King of Spain promoted our author, as he had promised him, to the Archbishoprick of Mechlin in Flanders (s), where he would have had him constantly resident, in order to his more effectually cherishing the Popish and Spanish interests in England. But the Pope having a high opinion of the Cardinal's merit, and finding him of great use in consistories, would not suffer him to leave Rome (t), where, however, he laboured as earnestly as ever, in the service of his countrymen, and the Catholick Faith. Some have asserted, that he and one Sir Francis Inglefield, assisted Father Parsons in composing his traitorous book concerning the succession (u), which he published under the name of Doleman, and which was of so dangerous consequence, that it was made capital by law, for any person to have it in his custody (w). Yet others affirm, that he had no hand in it, but, on the contrary, was very little pleased with this treatise (x), as tending to perpetuate those dissensions, which for so many years had torn and distracted his native country. The remainder of his life he spent at Rome in great honour and reputation, living in much splendor, and using all his interest for the comfort and maintenance of such poor Catholicks as fled out of England (y). As for the administration here, they had several spies upon him, and it appears by the papers of the Treasurer Burleigh, that he had constantly very distinct accounts of every step the Cardinal took (z). In the last years of his life, he is said to have changed his sentiments, as to government, and to have been heartily sorry for the pains he had taken in promoting the invasion of England by the Spaniards; nay, we are told by a very eminent Popish writer, that when he perceived the Jesuits intended nothing but desolating and destroying his native land, he wept bitterly, not knowing how to remedy it, much less how to bridle their insolence (a). This conduct of his, drew upon him forces as adhered to him. As for Rowland York, whom the Earl of Leicester intrusted with a strong fort, to bridle the Spanish garrison in Zutphen, he sold it to the same Count Taxis, who commanded that Spanish garrison (19). The treatise written by our author, in defence of this action, was first printed in English, in the form of a letter, and afterwards in Latin, under the title of Epistola de Daventria Ditioe. Cracov. 1588. In this epistle it is alledged, that Sir William Stanley was no traitor, because he had only delivered to the King of Spain, a city which was his own before, and all Englishmen in the service of the States, are exhorted to follow his example (20).

[G] Of this book the reader will find, &c.] The first part of this book, was intitled, A Declaration of the Sentence of Sixtus V. wherein it is maintained, that, by virtue of the Pope's bull, Queen Elizabeth was accurst, and deprived of her crown; the invasion and conquest of her kingdoms committed to the King of Spain, to execute the same with his armies both by sea and land, and to take the crown to himself, or to limit it to such a potentate as the Pope and he should name. The title of the second part was, An Admonition to the Nobility and People of England, and in the title, our author is called the Cardinal of England (21). The chief points insisted on in this book, are these. The Queen is called the pretended Queen, and the present Usurper. She must be deprived of the administration of the kingdom. She is an Heretick, a Schismatick: Usurping the kingdom against all right; as for the other causes, so because she had not the consent of the great Bishop of Rome. That she moved the Turk to invade Christendom. She had set at sale, and made a market of laws and rights. Some of her facts make her incapable of the kingdom. Some others make her unworthy of life. That therefore Pope Sixtus V. had renewed the excommunication against her, and deprived her of her title and pretences to the kingdom of England, and Ireland, and declared her illegitimate, and an usurper, and absolved all her subjects from the oath of fidelity to her. And then he charged all persons to withdraw their aid from her; that worthy punishment might be taken of her. And that they join themselves with the Duke of Parma. Also, it was proclaimed lawful to lay hands upon the Queen; and a very great reward was promised to them that did so. And a safe conduct was then given to as many as would bring warlike provisions to the Spanish camp; and to all who would assist that enterprize, the Pope doth by indulgence give full pardon, and plenary remission of all their sins, &c. In the same book he says, that he was made Cardinal on purpose to succour and serve his nation at this time, and promises that all imaginable diligence shall be used to preserve and protect all Catholicks, and all such as should come in and submit themselves to the Prince of Parma. Notwithstanding all this, many Papists were of opinion, that the Cardinal was in a manner compelled to take this book upon himself, and that in reality, it was either written, or altered, by Father Parsons and other Jesuits (22). Nay, it is pretended, that the Cardinal himself in his life-time protested as much, and it is certain, that after his death, the Jesuits pretended to father upon him many things, of which he was ignorant. The truth is, the contents of this book was universally disliked by all sober Catholicks (23), as well as Protestants, and therefore it is no wonder, there is such shifting it from one to another.

him the ill will of that powerful society, who, notwithstanding all the pains he had taken, all the books he had written, all the reputation and rewards he had acquired, gave out that he was a good simple man, but not of any esteem or reckoning in state affairs, handled in the Pope's consistory, a man of weak judgment, shallow wit, and small advice, never used but a little for matters of learning, and that in positive only, not in any school point (b). On his death-bed he was very desirous of speaking to the English students then in Rome, which the then Father Rector, a Jesuit, prevented, as fearing he should have persuaded them to a loyal respect for their Prince, and a tender regard for their country (c). He is generally said to have died of a retention of urine, but it was shrewdly suspected, that he was poisoned by the Jesuits, which suspicion was attended with such probable circumstances, that the reverend Fathers themselves admitted his being poisoned, but then they charged it on his antagonist, the Bishop of Cassana, whom they liked not, and who it was thought, on his demise, would have been made a Cardinal (d). As for our author, his decease happened on the sixth of October, 1594, in the sixty-third year of his age (e). He was buried with great pomp, in the chapel of the English college at Rome, where a monument is erected to his memory, with an inscription, which the reader will find in the notes [H]. Upon the death of this memorable person, the Jesuits, as a Priest of the Church of Rome tells us, openly triumphed, insulted over the dead corps, giving out, among other calumnies against him, that he was well gone, and that God had taken him away in good time. For if he had lived but a little while longer, he would have disgraced himself, shamed his country, and lost the credit which he had gotten (f); yet they shortly after, for many reasons, altered their tone, and when they found how little credit these discourses met with, magnified the Cardinal's memory, as if he had lived a Saint, and died a Confessor [I]. Without all question, it is a very hard task, to give this eminent person his true character; however, since it is our province, we cannot be blamed for attempting it, especially if it be considered, that we offer nothing but what is supported by authority. If we consider him as an English subject, writing, advising, and acting against his Prince, we must look upon him as a busy, enterprising, and dangerous rebel, labouring continually the destruction of his Prince, and her people, equally ready to persuade foreigners to invade, or subjects to rise up in arms, which is the picture drawn of him by Camden (g). If, on the other hand, we look on him in the light of a zealous Papist, and as one convinced in his conscience, that what he did was agreeable to the doctrines of the Church, then we cannot deny him the title of an active, learned, and industrious person; and if we may credit what should seem to be the strongest evidence, far from being an enemy, in the latter part of his life especially, either to his country, or to his lawful Sovereign Queen Elizabeth (h) [K].

Lastly,

[H] An inscription which the reader will find in the notes.

Cardinali Angliæ, qui extorris patria, perſunctus Laboribus diuturnis, & Orthodoxa Religione tuenda, sudoribus multis in ſeminariis ad ſalutem patriæ inſtituendis, fovendis, periculis plurimis ob eccleſiam Romanam, opera, ſcriptis, omni corporis & animi contentione deſenſam, hic in ejus Gremio, Scientiæ, Pietatis, Modestiæ, Integritatis fama & exemplo charus, occubuit 17 Kal. Novembris, Anno Ætatis 63, ſalutis humanæ 1594 (24). That is:

In the name of the Holy Trinity.

To the memory of William Alan, a Lancaſtrian, in the Holy Roman Church, Cardinal of England, who, driven from his country, worn out with daily Labours, ſupporting the Orthodox Religion, ſtriving inceſſantly in the founding Seminaries, for promoting the ſpiritual Safety of his Country, cheriſhing when founded, expoſing himſelf to many dangers by ſerving the Church of Rome, in Actions, Writings, and by the whole forces of his Soul and Body, here in it's Boſom, endeared by the Fame and Example of his Wiſdom, Piety, Modesty, and Integrity, he died the 17th of the Kalends of November, in the 63d year of his Age, and of Man's Salvation 1594.

[I] As if he had lived a Saint, and died a Confessor. In order thoroughly to understand this perplexed affair, the reader must observe, that a little before the Spanish invasion, in 1588, it was thought necessary, to have some Englishman promoted to the rank of a Cardinal. The candidates were Dr Lewis, Bishop of Cassana, and our Dr Allen, and much interest was made on both sides, but at length the Jesuits being exceedingly apprehensive of Bishop Lewis's coming to that honour, it was procured for him of whom we are writing. However afterwards, when the Cardinal did not go all their lengths, they treated him as injuriously, as ever they had done any of their greatest enemies; yet growing again apprehensive, that Bishop Lewis might put on that hat which Allen had left, they began to observe, in all companies, that the deceased Cardinal was a perfect saint, that he was justly admired by several Popes, respected by all the Princes of Europe, who either knew or heard of him; that his whole study was for the good of his country, and the maintenance of the Catholick religion, and that yet the Bishop of Cassana had made it the business of his life, to disturb and disquiet so holy, and so excellent a man (25).

[K] To his lawful sovereign Queen Elizabeth The clearest proof that can be of this, we find in a letter amongst the MSS. of the Lord Burleigh, thus endorsed by that Lord's own hand. Cardinal Allen from Rome, to Richard Hopkins, fugitive, August 14, 1593. It runs thus (26):

Good Mr Hopkins,

YOURS of the tenth of July, came safely to my hands, and gave me knowledge of a certain overture made to you, by one, that might seem to do it by some secret commission of treaty of an accord between England and Spain, with desire of my sense therein, either of my self or with the Pope, upon some reasonable conditions, for toleration of the Catholick religion in our country. Which argument, how grateful it should be unto me, you that of old knew so well my opinion and desire in that cause, may easily deem. And after a little pause of mind upon so sudden and unwonted news, I could think no otherwise, but that God himself hath stirred up in their hearts this motion, for the saving of that realm from the present fears, and dangers, and perplexities it is fallen into. And thereby also a special [favour] offered at length unto me, once ere I die, not only to give the willing, desired comforts, I owe unto my afflicted Catholick friends

Lastly, taking him merely as an author, he was unquestionably for matter, method, wit, learning, language, one of the most considerable writers of his age, as the greatest of his enemies, and the best critics, have allowed [L]. It seems strange, that many of our writers of controversy, and some not unlearned, have treated this our author as a Jesuit (i), whereas in all controversies between that order and the secular Priests, the latter always gloried in Cardinal Allen, as a man to whom no Jesuit could justly be compared in any respect [M]. In the close of this life it is proper to remark, that at Rome, and every where abroad, Cardinal Allen was styled Cardinal of England, regarded as the Protector of the nation, and honoured with extraordinary respect. He had about him several persons of some distinction, particularly Mr Fitzherbert, who wrote a large account of his life, which was never printed, as well as the epitome of that life, from which most of the facts mentioned in this article are taken; Mr Thomas Hefket, his nephew; Mr Banes, who had lived long in Poland; with many others. To maintain his magnificence, he had a revenue of 15,000 crowns per annum, then computed at 4,500 pounds of our money (k). But when it appeared that all this had wrought little, and that there was no hopes of reducing England, either by fraud or force, less care was taken of English Priests, and few of them were raised even to the degree of Bishops. But in the reign of King Charles II, when it was again thought probable at Rome, that something might be done for promoting the Catholic cause in Britain, Philip Thomas Howard, younger brother to the Duke of Norfolk, was created Cardinal, and sometimes called the Cardinal of England (l), as our Cardinal Allen had been before.

friends and brethren, but therein also to serve most faithfully and profitably, even my very enemies, though otherwise than through these unfortunate differences and debates in religion, [our Lord God forgive the author thereof] I know I have none; or to do to the one or the other, and above all to my native country, most dear unto me, so much good as an unfeigned peace would bring, I would travel to the last drop of my blood. I thank God, I am not so estranged from the place of my birth, most sweet, nor so affected to foreigners, that I prefer not the weal of that people above all mortal things; whereof if it pleased the Queen's majesty or council to take a sure taste, I desire no more, but that they would confidently use and command me in this matter. And in truth, upon the receipt of your letter, I had not slept before I had dealt with his Holiness, if the party that made the motion unto you, had brought any warrant in the world from any in authority, or any sufficient proof or attestation of their contentment therein. Which might have been [as yet it may be] kept as close as themselves would require. That they do did not, if they meant any matter indeed I marvel. And you did well and wisely to stand on that point which I cannot, in reason nor honour, attempt a thing of that weight and quality with the Pope; much less bring our purpose to pass, either with him or the King. With whom also, not only by his Holiness's mediation, but by myself, in matters concerning our country and religion, I may perhaps do more than I need now to say. And whatsoever I can do with either of them, I would employ in this cause myself to the uttermost. Though, to say the truth, if the Pope were a temporal Prince only, being no less injured [tho' in another kind] than the King himself, his person were not so fit to be a moderator of this pretended peace. But being a spiritual person, and the common and most loving father of all Christians, and attending above all human respects the service of God, and the advancement of religion, without all formalities and punctos of worldly humour, I am assured he will embrace this cause with all hearty affection. For I know many ways his most tender heart and desire towards our country's weal, both in God and in the world, &c.

[L] And the best critics have allowed.] In this note we shall give an account of such of his writings as we have not already mentioned. Such as, A Defence of the Lawful Power and Authority of the Priesthood to remit sins. To which is added two other tracts, The Peoples Duty in confessing; and An Explanation of the Doctrine of the Catholick Church, with respect to Indulgencies. Printed at Louvain, 1567, in 8vo (27). De Sacramentis in genere, de Sacramento Eucharistiae, & de Missae Sacrificio, Libros tres. i. e. Of Sacraments in general, of the Eucharist, and of the sacrifice of the Mass, three Books. Addressed to Pope Gregory XIII. Printed at Antwerp, 1576 (28). Of the Worship due to Saints, and their Relicks. A true, sincere, and modest Defence of Christian Catholics, that suffered for their faith at home and abroad. Against a false, seditious, and slanderous Libel, intitled, The Execution of Justice in England: wherein is declared, how unjustly the Protestants do charge Catholics with Treason; how untruly they deny their persecution for religion; and how deceitfully they seek to abuse strangers about the cause, greatness, and manner of their Sufferings; with diverse other matters pertaining to this Purpose.

Printed without the name of the place, in 1583 (29). The book to which this was an answer, was penned by Lord Burleigh himself, and the original, under his own hand, is yet preserved (30). As for this piece of Cardinal Allen's, it is esteemed the very best of all his writings; it consisted of nine chapters, wherein as much is said for his cause, and as great learning shewn in defending it, as it would admit. Of this discourse it is, that the learned Edmund Bolton, author of Nero Caesar, gives this character, a princely, grave, and flourishing piece, of natural and exquisite English, is Cardinal-Alan's apology (31). Besides these, he wrote some other little treatises, which were published without his name, and therefore cannot certainly be known to be his. To the last mentioned book, an answer was written by John Stubbe of Lincoln's-Inn (32), by direction of the Lord Treasurer, and another by Bishop Bilson (33).

[M] Could justly be compared in any respect.] If only the common writers of pamphlets (34), following honest John Stowe (35), had styled our author a Jesuit, I should have looked on it as a mere term of reproach, and not strictly to be taken, but since Mr Strype (36), who should have known better, calls him so, it is necessary to cite the following short proof of the contrary, from an author of undeniable credit in such a dispute, I mean Father Watson, the great champion of the secular Priests against that order (37). 'It is, says he, a very mean occupation, and but coarse stuff, that the Jesuits can and will not make a commodity of one way or other. For who knowing what number of learned there are in the world, of Dominicans, Franciscans, Augustines, Benedictines, Carthusians, &c. that I may omit sundry Cardinals, Bishops, Deans, Canons, and others, secular Priests, yea of our own nation, as Dr Allane, Dr Sanders [though too much jesuited] Dr Harding, Dr Stapleton, Dr Gifford, Dr Parkinson, Dr Ely, and a whole score twice told, now in esse, of secular Priests, whom no English Jesuit is able to hold tack withal, yet have these Machiavels got such a general fame and report to fly abroad of them, as though there were not one of any talent in the world to be found, unless he were a Jesuit.' And in another part of the same work, this author tells us, that Pope Gregory XIII, made use of this phrase to his Cardinals, Venite Fratres mei, ostendam vobis Alanum: as much as to say, continues he, I will shew you a man in Anglia born, to whom all Europe may give place, for his high prudence, reverend countenance, and support of government (38). But whoever would see a still more ample character of this our Cardinal, may consult a forcign writer, mentioned in the margin, who will give him full satisfaction (39).

AARON.

A L B A N (St) is famous for having been the first Christian (a), who suffered martyrdom in this island; for which reason he is usually styled the St Stephen, or protomartyr, of Britain [A]. He was born at Verulam, of Pagan parents [B], and flourished towards the end of the third century. In his youth he took a journey to Rome [C], in company with Amphibalus, a Monk of Caer-Leon [D], and served

[A] He is styled the — protomartyr of Britain.] This is the usual appellation given him by our old historians. Thus Matthew of Westminster (1) calls him Anglorum sive Britonum promartyrem, 'the protomartyr of the English, or Britons:' where, at the word Britonum, some critic has put the following remark, which, in the printed books, has crept from the margin into the text. Quod solum verum est; quia certum est, eum Britonem, non Anglicum extitisse: unde male dicitur, Anglorum protomartyrem. i. e. 'Which alone is true; because it is certain he was a Briton, and not an Englishman: so that he is improperly called the protomartyr of the English.' For this reason Thomas Walsingham, in describing the common-seal of the convent of St Albans, retains only the proper appellation. In quo (says he) vetustissimo opere imago gloriosæ protomartyris Britannorum Albani figurabatur, tenens in manu palmam (2). i. e. 'In which most antient piece of workmanship, the image of St Alban, the protomartyr of the Britons, was figured, holding a branch of palm in his hand.' Venantius Fortunatus, in celebrating the praises of the martyrs, writes thus of St Alban:

The great St Alban fruitful Britain bore.

Notwithstanding which testimonies, Thomas Dempster (4) contends, that this Saint was by birth a Scotchman, though he suffered martyrdom in Britain; and for this he cites the following distich of Hartmannus as quoted by Canisius.

Scotia se Albano felicem martyre clamat, Victima qui Christo prima Britanna fuit.

The Church to Scotland martyr'd Alban ow'd, Who first for Christ in Britain shed his blood.

The learned Usher sought in vain to find these verses in the books of Canisius; and therefore builds no more upon them, than upon another confident assertion of Dempster's in the same place, that he had met with a small treatise written by St Alban, intitled Christianorum Puritas, which, the Archbishop will venture any wager, neither that historian, nor any other writer, ever saw. Verum quum in tomis Canisiani hoc frustra quaesiverim, non magis hic apud me fidem suam liberat, quam in illo quod in eodem ipso loco non minori confidentia asseverat, pervenisse ad se Albani opusculum inscriptum Christianorum Puritas; cuiusmodi libellum neque ab illo, neque a mortalium omnino quoquam, conspectum fuisse unquam, quovis pignore ausim contendere (5). The title of Protomartyr is likewise given to St Alban in an antient inscription, found by some workmen, who were repairing the east end of the church of St Albans, in the year 1257. These labourers, in opening the ground between the shrines of St Oswin and St Wulfstan, found certain leaden sheets containing relics, which, by the following inscription on a plate of lead, appeared to be those of the martyr. IN HOC MAUSOLEO INVENTUM EST VENERABILE CORPUS SANCTI ALBANI PROTOMARTYRIS ANGLORUM (6). i. e. In this Mausoleum is found the venerable body of St Alban, the Protomartyr of the English. I shall only add part of the hymn, which used to be sung on the festival of this Saint:

Ave Protomartyr Anglorum, Miles Regis Angelorum,
O Albane, flos martyrum (7).

i. e. Hail, Protomartyr of the English, Soldier of the King of Angels, O Alban, Flower of the Martyrs!

[B] He was a native of Verulam, &c.] This town was antiently called Werlamcester or Watlingacester;

the former name being derived from the river War-lame, which ran on the east side, the latter from the Roman high-way called Watlingstreet, which lay to the west (8). Tacitus calls it Verulamium, and Ptolemy Urolanium. The situation of this place was close by the town of St Alban's in Hertfordshire, which takes its name from our protomartyr. There is nothing now remaining of old Verulam but ruins of walls, chequered pavements, and Roman coins, which are now and then dug up. It is conjectured from the situation, that this was the town of Cassivelaunus, so well defended by woods and marshes (9), which was taken by Cæsar. In Nero's time, it was esteemed a Municipium (10), or town, whose inhabitants enjoyed the rights and privileges of Roman citizens (11). It was entirely ruined by the Britons, during the war between the Romans and Boadicea Queen of the Iceni. Afterwards Verulam flourished again, and became a city of great note. About the middle of the fifth century, it fell into the hands of the Saxons. But Uther the Briton, from his serpentine subtilty surnamed Pendragon, recovered it, with much difficulty, after a very long siege. Alexander Nequam or Neckam, who was born at Verulam in the thirteenth century, mentions this revolution, as also the martyrdom of St Alban (whom he improperly styles a citizen of Rome) in the following verses (12):

Urbs insignis erat Verolamia, plus operosæ
Arti, naturæ debuit illa minus.
Pendragon Arthuri patris hæc obsessa laborem
Septennem sprevit cive superba suo.
Hic est martyrii roseo decoratus honore
Albanus, civis, inclyta Roma, tuus.

*To antient Verulam, a famous town,
Much kindness art hath shew'd, but nature none.
Great Arthur's sire, Pendragon's utmost pow'r,
For seven long years did the proud walls endure.
Here holy Alban, citizen of Rome,
Obtain'd the happy crown of martyrdom.*

After Uther's death, Verulam fell again into the hands of the Saxons: but by frequent wars it was at last entirely ruined, and is now converted into corn-fields (13). Segetes est, ubi Troja fuit.

[C] He took a journey to Rome.] Leland tells us, that, at the time when Alban flourished, learning, and the polite arts, had been lately introduced by the Romans into Britain, which was now become a province of the empire; and that the youth of quality and distinction used to travel to Rome for improvement in knowledge and the sciences. Eo tempore, quo floruit Albanus, bonæ literæ, beneficio magno Romanorum, in Britannia jam in provinciam redacta, enituerunt; usque adeo ut nobiles votis omnibus eloquentiam, unâ cum receptis artibus, insigniter excolerent. Utque felicius hæc sibi ornamenta compararent, ipsos scientiarum fontes, nempe Romanos, de more petebant (14).

[D] Amphibalus, a Monk of Caer-Leon.] In an antient book of the Acts of St Alban and St Amphibalus, the latter is said to have been a Roman by birth, and to have passed into Britain in the time of Diocletian's persecution (15). But Giraldus Cambrensis (16) and Ranulphus Cestrensis (17) affirm, that he was born at Caer-Leon, the metropolis of Wales; and Rudburn (18) and the author of the little Winchester History (19) tell us, he was a Monk, and promoted to the clerical office in the cathedral of that city. Johannes Caius (20) likewise informs us, that Amphibalus was a native of Caer-Leon; and adds, that he was Rector of the university of Cambridge. However it be, it is certain he was instrumental in the conversion of St Alban, and was himself afterwards crowned with martyrdom. See more of him in the sequel of this article.

served seven years as a soldier in the armies of the Emperor Diocletian. Being returned home, he settled in the town of Verulam, where he lived highly esteemed by his countrymen, till the persecution under the above-mentioned Emperor (b). In the mean time, through the example and instructions of Amphibalus, he renounced the errors of Paganism, in which he had been educated, and became a thorough convert to the Christian religion (c). He was put to death in the year of Christ 303 [E], during the tenth and last general persecution of the Church. The story of his martyrdom is very briefly and obscurely related by Gildas, but more circumstantially and at large by venerable Bede, the substance of whose narrative is as follows: being yet a Pagan (or at least it not being known that he was become a Christian) he entertained the above-mentioned Amphibalus (d) in his house. The Roman Governor being informed that he harboured a Christian, sent a party of soldiers to apprehend him. But Alban, putting on the habit of his guest [F], presented himself to the officers in his stead, and was carried before that magistrate. The noble freedom with which he behaved [G], and the declaration he made of his conversion to Christianity, so enraged the Judge, that he ordered him immediately to be beheaded. In his way to execution, he was stopped by a river, over which was a bridge, so thronged with spectators, that it was impossible to cross it. The Saint, impatient for the crown of martyrdom, approached the brink, and lifting up his eyes to Heaven, the stream was miraculously divided [H], and afforded a passage for [E] He was put to death in the year of Christ 303.] The date, assigned by Bede (21), is the year 286; in which he is followed by the Anglo-Saxon Annals, and by the Latin Annals ascribed to Afferius Menevensis; by Thomas Rudburn the elder, in his Lesser Chronicle; by Johannes Timuthensis, and by Capgrave in his Life of St Alban; by the Salisbury Breviary, and others. There is no great variation between this account of time, and the computations of Matthew Paris and Matthew of Westminster. For the former tells us, the relics of St Alban were discovered by King Offa 507 years after that Saint's death, 344 years after the arrival of the Angles in Britain, on the kalends of August, the first indiction; that is, in the year of Christ 793, from which the indictions began to be reckoned. The latter informs us, that his tomb was discovered on the Octave of St Stephen, the beginning of the year 1257, nine hundred and seventy years after his death. Here may properly be inserted the following computations, made by a Monk of St Alban's, who lived about the middle of the thirteenth century. 'From the incarnation of our Lord, to the passion of St Alban, are elapsed 286 years; and from the passion of St Alban, to the arrival of Germanus, Bishop of Auxerre, in Britain, 163 years: which put together make 449 years. From the arrival of St Germanus, to the translation of St Alban, under the illustrious King Offa, are 344 years: add these to the former, and they become 793. From this translation, to that which was made in the reign of King Henry I, under the Abbot Geoffrey, are 336 years. All these put together make 1129 years. From this last translation, to the discovery of the said martyr's Mausoleum, under Abbot John, on the octave of St Stephen, are 127 years. These added to the foregoing make the whole 1256. And at this time, viz. in the year of our Lord 1257, are elapsed 970 years from the martyrdom of St Alban, counting the beginning of the year from the feast of the Circumcision, and not from that of the Annuntiation.' William Caxton, and after him Johannes Major, in his Scottish History, refer the martyrdom of St Alban to the year of Christ 226, which is full fifty-eight years before the beginning of Diocletian's reign. According to some of the Winchester Annals, St Alban suffered in the year 296; according to others, in the year 305. Stowe's Chronicle places his martyrdom in 293; and Wendover's in 304, which that writer calls the nineteenth of Diocletian. The truth of the case is; St Alban was martyred during that dreadful persecution, which, according to Orosius and others, lasted ten years. But it appears from Eusebius, that this flame broke out in the year of Christ 303, being the nineteenth of Diocletian; and though in other provinces it continued to rage during the space of ten years, yet in Gaul and Britain, where Constantius Augustus resided, it ceased the very succeeding year. And therefore the martyrdom of St Alban is properly reckoned among the events of the year 303 (22).

(22) Ufferius, ubi supra. p. 88.

[F] He put on the habit of his guest.] The garment of Amphibalus, which Alban, upon this occasion, put on, is called by Bede, and in antient writers, Caracalla; which is rendered, by the Saxon interpreter of Bede, a monkish habit. This Caracalla was a kind of cloak with a cowl, as appears from St Jerom (23) and Eucherius (24), who, describing the Ephod, or sacerdotal garment of the Jewish Priests, tell us, it was made, in modum Caracalla, after the manner of the Caracalla, or monkish dress, sed sine cucullo, but without a cowl. Hence the diminutive Καρακάλλιον, in the Greek-Latin Glossary ascribed to Cyrill, is explained by Cuculla. Thomas Walsingham relates (25) that this garment was preserved in the Church of Ely, in a large chest, which was opened in the reign of Edward II, A. D. 1314. They found therein a woollen garment, so big that it filled the chest from top to bottom; and on the upper part of it were perceived some spots of blood, as fresh as if it had been newly stained therewith. This historian says hereupon, that it is plain, this garment was the same which St Alban, at the time of his conversion, received from his master St Amphibalus, as a mark of the new religion he had embraced, and the same in which the martyr afterwards suffered death. Thomas Rudburn, who reports the same story (26), goes farther, and tells us, there was found with the garment an ancient writing in these words: This is the Caracalla of St Amphibalus, the Monk, and Preceptor of St Alban; in which that protomartyr of England suffered death, under the cruel persecution of Diocletian against the Christians.

[G] He behaved with a noble freedom.] It happened at the time when Alban was brought before the Judge, that magistrate was standing by an altar, and offering sacrifice to his gods. When he saw Alban, and perceived the cheat he had put upon him, he ordered him to be dragged before the images of his gods, saying to him; Because you have chosen to conceal a sacrilegious person and a blasphemer, rather than deliver him up to suffer the just reward of his blasphemy, the punishment due to him shall be inflicted on you, if you refuse to comply with the ceremonies of our religion. Alban, not in the least terrified with these threats, boldly declared he would not obey the Judge's commands. The Magistrate then asked him, of what family he was? Alban replied; To what purpose do you enquire of my family? if you would know my religion, I am a Christian. Then the Judge asked him his name; to which he answered, My name is Alban, and I worship the only true and living God, who created all things. The Magistrate returned; If you would enjoy the happiness of eternal life, delay not to sacrifice to the great gods. Alban answered; The sacrifices you offer are made to devils; neither can they help the needy, or grant the petitions of their votaries. The Judge was now enraged beyond measure, and commanded the holy confessor to be beaten, in hopes thereby to shake his constancy: but finding all means ineffectual, he ordered him to be taken away, and led to immediate execution (27).

[H] The stream was divided.] Neither Bede, nor the other antient writers of the Acts of St Alban, have told us the name of this river. In a few copies of Gildas, it is true, the word Tameis or Tamenis appears: but it is not to be found in the manuscript of that author in the publick library of Cambridge. Nor can it be admitted, unless we suppose Gildas to have given the name for himself and a thousand persons. This miracle converted the executioner [I] upon the spot, who threw away his drawn sword, and, falling at St Alban's feet, desired he might have the honour to die with him, or rather for him. This sudden conversion of the headsman occasioning a delay in the execution, St Alban walked up to a neighbouring hill, where praying for water to quench his thirst, a fountain sprung up under his feet. Here he received the crown of martyrdom [K], on the tenth of the kalends of July. The executioner was a signal example of divine vengeance; for, at the instant of the stroke given to the Saint, his eyes dropped out of his head [L]. The behaviour of St Alban at his death, and the miraculous circumstances attending it, were instrumental in converting many of the spectators to Christianity [M]. Between four and five hundred years afterwards, Offa, King of the Mercians, built a very large and stately monastery, to the memory of St Alban, in the place where he suffered martyrdom [N]. The story of this Saint's death, particularly the miraculous circumstances attending it, are by many looked upon as fabulous, and without foundation; whilst others think there is no reason to disbelieve the miracles recorded of St Alban. [O]. St Amphibalus himself afterwards suffered martyrdom name of Tamefis to the Coln, because that river empties itself into the Thames. For the Coln runs through part of Hertfordshire, between old Verulam and new St Albans (28).

[I] This miracle converted the executioner. Capgrave calls the foldier, who was to have beheaded St Alban, by the name of Heraclius (29); and the author of the Acts of St Alban and St Amphibalus (30) gives him that of Araclius. This man had the honour to bury St Alban with his own hands, and afterwards to tread in his steps. He is celebrated by Robert of Dunstable (31) in the following verses:

Improba dispolos convulsio dissipat artus;
Horribilis Lethi forma, furoris opus.
Nec moritur Sontum tot Sancti mortibus ira;
Sed metit, exitiū meta, machæra caput.
Fit de terreno celestis milite miles,
Dum fovet invicta strenuitate fidem,
Albani callem virtutis odore fecutus,
Fit bravo confors, sicut agone comes.

This foldier is placed in the Roman martyrologies together with St Alban.

[K] Here he received the crown of martyrdom. The place, where he was beheaded, was called, in the Anglo-Saxon language Holm-hurst. Hurst signifies a Wood; and an ancient author, quoted by Archbishop Usher, tells us, he had seen the place; and that it was overgrown with trees. Vidi locum repleri arborum densitate, in quo martyr invictus quondam pro Christo sententiam subiit capitalem. In after-times, it obtained the name of Derfawold Wood, and was the spot; whereon the town of St Albans was built (32).

(32) Id. ib. p. 87.

[L] The executioner's eyes dropped out of his head. This miracle is recorded in the martyrologies of Bede, Ado, Rabanus, and Notherus, under X Kalend. Julii. To which may be added the following verses of Erric of Auxerre (33):

(33) Erric. Antistod. de vita Germani. l. iii.

Millia pœnarum Christi pro nomine passus;
Quem tandem rapuit capitis sententia casti.
Sed non Licitori cessit res tuta superbo;
Utque caput sancto, ceciderunt lumina sævo.

(34) Camden, ubi supra, col. 352.

Thus translated into English (34):

After a thousand sufferings for the faith,
When judg'd at last to end them all with death;
The bloody Licitor did just Heaven surprise,
And as the saint his head, the villain lost his eyes.

[M] Many of the spectators were converted to Christianity. One of them, being more sensibly touched than the rest, delivered himself to this effect. He told them, 'That if St Alban had proved his belief by meer rhetoric, he should not have wondered if his countrymen had paid no regard to his discourse: for why should they listen to a persuasion, which stood condemned by the constitutions and religious customs of their ancestors? But since he wrought miracles in attestation of his doctrine, not to submit to such irresistible evidence, was, in effect, to stand out against the omnipotence of God;

for, that God was the author of those wonderful effects, was past dispute.' With what colour of sense then (adds he) can we dispute the truth of those doctrines, thus supernaturally attested? For when was ever any thing of this kind performed by our deities, or heard of in our religion? And besides all this, the character of the man was admirable. His patience and constancy, his temper and devotion, were particularly remarkable; inasmuch that, all things considered, his behaviour seems almost as great a miracle as any of the rest. When he was insulted, he showed no uneasiness, nor indeed seemed to have any passion about him but that of pity. And when he was brought to the place of execution, he discovered as much pleasure in his countenance, as if he had been going to an entertainment. Who, upon reflexion, does not easily perceive, that Alban was supported by more than human assistance? And if such greatness and constancy be the peculiar marks of divine favour, we may certainly conclude, that such blessings are bestowed only on the virtuous and devout. And therefore the best service we can do ourselves and our country, is to embrace St Alban's principles, and imitate his example. This discourse being well received by the auditors, they unanimously declared for the Christian religion; and wanting a person to instruct them more fully, and assist them in religious offices, they went in quest of Amphibalus, who had converted St Alban. This Monk, having escaped the fury of his persecutors, was retired into Wales, where he preached with wonderful success; and converted great numbers to the Christian faith: The men of Verulam abovementioned, being about a thousand in number, travelled into Wales, where they all received baptism at the hands of St Amphibalus (35).

(35) Hertsfield, Hist. Ecd. Ang. c. 10. Ufserius, ubi supra, p. 84.

[N] Offa, King of the Mercians, built a monastery in the place where St Alban suffered martyrdom. This foundation was made in the year 795. That King, and several of his successors, bestowed large possessions on this religious house, and obtained ample privileges for it from several Popes. Particularly, it was exempt from paying the apollitical duty called Romefoot or Peter-pence: it's Abbot, or Archdeacon acting under him, had episcopal jurisdiction over all the clergy and laity residing on any of the lands belonging to the monastery; and Pope Adrian IV, who was an Englishman, and born near Verulam, granted to the Abbot of this monastery, that as St Alban (these are the words of the privilege) is well known to be the protomartyr of the English nation, so the abbot of his monastery should, at all times, be reputed the first in dignity of all the Abbots. The church of this monastery is still in being, and is much admired for it's largeness, beauty, and antiquity. When the Monks were turned out, it was purchased by the townsmen for four hundred pounds, and converted into a parochial church (36).

(36) Camden, ubi supra.

[O] The story of this Saint's death — is by many looked upon as fabulous — whilst others think there is no reason to disbelieve the miracles recorded of St Alban. Our great Milton, in his History of England (37), seems to give very little credit to the narrative of Bede and others. His words are, speaking of St Alban; The story of whose martyrdom, fabled and worse martyred with the fubling zeal of some idle fancies, more fond of miracles, than apprehensive of truth, deserves no longer digestion. Let us now hear Mr Collier. 'As for St Alban's miracles, being attested by authors of such antiquity and credit, I do do not see why they should be questioned. That miracles were wrought in the Church at that time of day, is clear from the writings of the antients. To suppose there are no miracles but those in the Bible, is to believe too little. To imagine that God should exert his omnipotence, and appear supernaturally for his servants, in no place but in Jewry, and in no age since the Apostles, is an unreasonable fancy. For since the world was not all converted in the Apostles time, and God designed the farther enlargement of his Church, why should we not believe he should give the Pagans the highest proof of the truth of Christianity, and honour his servants with the most undisputed credentials? Now if this is very reasonable to suppose, why should St Alban's miracles be disbelieved, the occasion being great enough for such an extraordinary interposition? For by this means the martyr must be mightily supported, the British Christians fortified against the persecution, and the Pagans surprized into a conversion (38).

[P] St Amphibalus — suffered martyrdom.] We have seen in the remark [M], that a thousand of the inhabitants of Verulam were converted and baptized by this Saint. The rest of the burghers who continued Heathen, being vexed at the loss of so many of their townsmen, took arms, and went after them into Wales; where they inhumanly fell upon them, and cut them in pieces. As for St Amphibalus, who had instructed and baptized them, they brought him away with them, and stoned him to death at Ruddurn (39); in which town Thomas Ruddurn the historian (who was born there, and wrote in the fifteenth century) affirms there were two knives found of an extraordinary size, supposed to have been used upon that occasion (40). It is remarkable, that the martyrdom of St Amphibalus is not mentioned by Gildas, Bede, or in any of the ancient martyrologies; but Matthew Paris, and other historians, vouch the matter of fact from a book of great antiquity in St Alban's monastery. As to the name Amphibalus; it came originally from Geoffrey of Monmouth's British History (41); though the learned Archbishop of Armagh is of opinion, it was not the real name of St Alban's instructor, but belonged more properly to the Caracalla or garment mentioned above (42), than to its owner (43); αμριβαλλειν signifying in the Greek language the same as induere, or accingere fc. vestem.

ALBANACT, or ALBANAK, the son of Brutus or Brito, from whom this island is said to have received the name of Britain (a). Many very learned men deny the existence of him and his supposed father. It is necessary however, to the thorough understanding of our antient history, to be acquainted with what it reports of him, and that is briefly this [A]. Brutus, King of this whole island, had by his wife Ignoge, three sons, Loclin, Kamber, and Albanact (b). To the eldest, he gave the middle and best part of the island, called from him Loëgria; to the second, Kamber, the country on the other side of Severn; and to the youngest, Albanact, all the land on the other side the Humber. This was some time before his death, which happened in the year before Christ 1114 (c), when all the young Princes were at their respective governments. For some years they all three governed their countries in peace and prosperity; but at length, Humber, King of the Huns, invaded the dominions of Albanact with a great army, slew him, and drove his people to fly for shelter to Loclin, who, equally stung with his brother's loss, and the insult offered to himself, drew together all his forces, and gave battle to the invader, who was now in his territories, defeated him, and in the flight forced him into a river, in which he was drowned, whence it received his name, and hath never since been otherwise called than Humber (d). This fell out about 1104 years before Christ (e); and from this King Albanact, the northern part of this island was called Albany, as it is by its natives to this day. Our antient historians, who relate these facts, some of whom are mentioned in the margin, agree pretty well in their dates, and in their relation, and so they well might, if as some say they all transcribed the work of him who is first mentioned. But as this does not appear, so we think no consequences should be drawn from an unproved assertion [B]. The old Scots historians (f) did not much oppose this account

[A] And that is briefly this. It is not our intention, in this article, to enter into the great controversy which hath divided, nay, and well nigh confounded, our best Antiquaries, viz. whether any credit is due to the story of Brute? In doing this, we should anticipate his article, and rather bewilder than inform the reader. Our present business therefore, shall be to examine this story of Albanact; and to enquire if the arguments alledged to prove it fabulous, be more weighty, than those which have been, or may be, urged for it as a true history. To this enquiry, we have been led by several inducements. One was the fitness of discussing such points in this work, it being hard to think of another, into which they would so properly fall. A second reason was, the shewing foreigners that these matters are not altogether so void of light, as some who have skimmed the British history would persuade them. To which we may add an inclination to demonstrate the folly of rejecting without consideration, as fabulous, all that relates to very antient times. It is morally certain, that the dread of credulity, hath betrayed more people into it, than ever it kept from leaning thereto. An age or two ago, a man would have been laughed at for advising recourse to Turkish histories, in order to correct those we have of that nation's rise, progress, and present state, yet now many excellent authors confess it to be necessary (1). But if we reflect on what would have been said, if at that time one had mentioned the memoirs of a Tartar Prince (2), and his skill in Astronomy, it will not appear so amazing a paradox, should we even venture to assert, there is more wisdom in doubting the truth of the old British history, than in believing it wholly false and fictitious. For while we only doubt we are ready at any time to review old arguments, or to hear new evidence; whereas a thing once declared fabulous, is thenceforward condemned to oblivion. All who are well read, especially in oriental history, know of how great consequence this advice is; and that without it, we had never known more of the famous Timur, who subdued a larger empire than Alexander, than our immediate ancestors, who called him Tamerlane, and reported him a lame blacksmith (3). Some such introduction as this was necessary, not to this article of Albanact only, but to several others of as antient date; and therefore this preface, once for all, may suffice to gain attention to the narrative itself, though not absolutely certain, and to render the notes less tedious, which expose the grounds of these disputes. It may indeed be objected, that all such disputes are frivolous, to which we answer, that concerns not us, very great men have engaged in them, and have so far introduced them into all our histories, as to make it our duty to clear them the best we may.

[B] An unproved assertion. The grand argument against this part of the British history is; that it has no foundation but in one author's writings, viz. Geoffrey of Monmouth. Now those who say this, beg the question, because they affirm other authors transcribe his book, who perhaps never saw it. Geoffrey relates the death of Brutus, the division of his kingdom, the invasion of their country's receiving the name of Albany; but Buchanan is very angry with it, and will by no means allow that this is any thing better than a fable (g). Of which however we shall prove he was a most incompetent judge. On his authority, succeeding authors have treated this narration with extraordinary contempt. We decide nothing, but for the reader's satisfaction, and to place this controversy in a true light, we will fairly state the arguments on both sides, that the judicious peruser may frame his conclusion according to reason and evidence [C].

vafion of Humber, the death of Albanact, and Locrin's victory, but without a date (4). Henry of Huntingdon relates the coming of Brutus, which he fays he met with in feveral authors (5). But he fays nothing of Albanact; fo that it feems many writers had touched this fubject before Geoffrey, with whom this Henry was contemporary (6). The Chronicle of Godfow is the work of various writers; it makes no mention of Geoffrey, though the hiftory does, indeed correpond with his, except in dates, which are carefully placed here (7), though omitted as I have faid by Geoffrey. Alured of Beverly is noted by the induftrious Leland (8), to have taken moftly out of Geoffrey's Britifh hiftory, yet himfelf fays nothing of this, he fpeaks of antient books he had read, and particularly of a Britifh hiftory (9) he ufed, but does not fay it was Geoffrey's. In all probability it was not, for Alured has many things not to be found in Geoffrey of Monmouth. But the faireft and fullft proof that can be had, or indeed defired, that the ftory of Albanact refs to this fufpected author, is the testimony of Giraldo Barry, or as he has been commonly called Giraldo Cambrenfis, who, in his defcription of Wales (10), delivers this whole ftory as it ftands in our text; though immediately after he calls Geoffrey a fabulous writer, and treats him with the utmoft indignity. Hence it is moft evident, that this hiftory was found elfewhere than in Geoffrey's writings, and fo it is afferted by Leland (11), in a tract, or rather in hiftorical collections for a tract, to prove the fuperiority of the Kings of England over Scotland. In thefe notes it is faid, that Albanact's ruling over Scotland, and leaving it his name, ftood in many antient Chronicles then in being. This however was no more than had been affirmed long before by Edward I, to the Pope, in a letter, wherein this poffeffion and right of Albanact is ftated as a thing notorious and indubitable (12). But after all, this ifland was very populous when the Romans came firft hither under Cæfar, fo that it muft have been long inhabited. We have no account of thefe inhabitants from other authors; the antient Bards retained thefe remains and ruins of old hiftory, which, on a nice enquiry, will be found a thing customary in all nations, even the moft barbarous. Here are various hiftorians, who have (as the Greeks did) turned their verfe into profe: here is a royal letter too, in fupport of it's authority; and if, after all, darknefs is welcomer than fuch a light, why no body is bound to take it. The ftory, with it's proofs, is propofed; and if they are not fufficient to procure it credit, they are at leaft fuch as ought to fecure it a place in this Dictionary, that it may abide the censure of the publick.

[C] According to reason and evidence. The point here to be difcuffed is, whether Scotland was called Albania, or Albany, from Albanact? Buchanan defpizes this etymology, and treats the ftory as a fable. To ftate his reasons fairly, they are thefe (13). 1. This account depends on the ftory of Brute, which he efteems a ridiculous fable, and the invention of the Monk of Monmouth. 2. He fays the derivation of Albania from Albanactus is not grammatical (14). 3. He can give us the true derivation. Albany is from Albion, the old name of the whole ifland, which was fo called, not from the whitenefs but height of it's mountains (15). To thefe particulars, plain and eafy answers may be given 1. The overturning the Monk of Monmouth's hiftory, will not prove the ftory of Brute a fable (16). Our ballads relate many fictions about Rofamond, yet there was certainly fuch a woman. But Buchanan, I believe, never read Geoffrey, though he quotes him, for he banter him about one Tintagol a giant, of whom the Monk of Monmouth fays not a word. 2. As to the grammatical criticifm, we muft obferve, that Albanactus is a Britifh name latinized, fo is Albania; now how faulty foever the derivation may be according to the Roman uſage, that does by no means ſhew that the Britifh name of the man might not be the ground of the Britifh name of the country. I ſhall prefently ſhew Buchanan knew better. 3. It is a conjecture only, that Alp and Alb, fignify high; and befides he owns the old cuſtom was to name places from perfons, as Knock-Fergus, i. e. the Rock of Fergus (17), from his being loſt there. But to thefe we may add ſome poſitive arguments in favour of the Britifh account. 1. Buchanan (18) owns the Britifh language prevailed originally through the ifland; and that in this language, Scotland is called Albin, and the Scots-Albinich, which is precifely what the Britifh author called them, whom the Monk of Monmouth tranſlated. 2. He can give us no counter hiftory to this, for Fergus, the firſt King of Scotland, came thither as he fays (19), three hundred and thirty years before Chriſt, in the reign of Coil, a Britifh King, which is agreeable to the Britifh hiftory he fo much condemns. 3. This name of Scotland correponds with all the other appellations impoſed by the Britons, whence we are fenſible the Roman or Latin names were framed not more elegantly than this. On the whole, Buchanan ſhews himſelf infinitely a better Philoſophiſt, than he is an Antiquary; and if this controverſy ſhould be determined according to his rule, that Britifh names are to be accounted for from the Britifh tongue, and not from the Greek and Latin; as alfo in conſequence of his confeſſions, without doubt this old derivation will appear both natural and probable. Heſtor Boethius, whom Buchanan owns to have been a learned man, was aware of this, and did not therefore diſpute the point. But what is ſtill more to the purpoſe, the very learned Biſhop Leſley, who was ſcarce inferior to Buchanan, even in his Latin ſtyle; and in politicks and antiquities much his ſuperior; a prelate who reſided long in England, converſed with our Antiquaries; and who, notwithstanding, had no great reaſon to be in love with our nation, agrees exactly with us in this etymology (20). The hiftory of Brute and his ſons, does not appear at all incredible to him; and he fays expreſly, that the original of Albany is Albanact. It may not be amiſs to obferve, that Shakeſpeare has introduced Albanact into one of his plays (21), probably to familiarize the name to his countrymen, and to preſerve the memory of the ſole ſovereignty of Brute. he appointed him to be Lord President of Wales, and afterwards Lord High Chancellor of England. He founded a school at Kingston upon Hull, and a chapel on the south side of the church, in which his parents were buried. He built the beautiful and spacious hall belonging to the episcopal palace at Ely, and made great improvements in all his other palaces. Lastly, he founded Jesus-College in Cambridge [B] for a master, six fellows; and as many scholars (d). This prelate wrote several pieces; particularly these following: 1. Mons Perfectionis. i. e. The mount of perfection. 2. In Psalmis penitentiales. i. e. On the penitential Psalms. 3. Homiliæ Vulgares. i. e. Vulgar homilies. 4. in fasting and abstinence, and in mortifying the corrupt desires of his flesh.

[B] He founded Jesus-College in Cambridge.] This house was formerly a nunnery dedicated to St Radigund: but the building being greatly decayed, and the revenues come to nothing, the Nuns had all forsaken it, except two; whereupon Bishop Alcock, obtaining a grant thereof from the King, converted it into a college, and dedicated it to the honour of the Holy Trinity, the Blessed Virgin, and St Radigund (2). This is Bishop Godwin's account of the matter. But Camden (3), and others tell us, that the Nuns of that house were so notorious for their incontinence, and so generally complained of, that King Henry VII, and Pope Julius II, consented to it's dissolution. And agreeably hereto, Bale (4) calls this nunnery spirituum meretricum cœnabium, i. e. a community of spiritual harlots.

[C] He was buried in the chapel he had built at Kingston upon Hull.] He had a very stately monument erected over him, which, in Bishop Godwin's time, was greatly defaced, and almost destroyed. That author hints to the members of Jesus-College, how commendable it would be in some one of the great men daily produced from that foundation, to reiterate the sepulchral honours due to their founder and patron. Inter tot præclaros viros quot ex hoc collegio prodierunt & prodeunt quotidie, quam vellem non decisset qui patrono de se optatè merito tumuli honorem debitum restitueret (5).

A L C R E D , A L C R E D U S , or A L R E D U S , King of Northumberland. He was lineally descended from Ida, the first King of the Bernicii, and was born about the year 740 (a). When he attained to man's estate, he saw his country miserably distracted, partly through the vices of their Kings, and partly through the madness of the people. Osulf, who succeeded on the voluntary resignation of his father, and who was the lawful heir of the kingdom of Northumberland, perished by a conspiracy in his own family, in the year 758 (b). In his stead, Æthelwold, who is also called Moll, succeeded by a popular election, for it does not appear, that he was so much as of the royal family (c). This it seems by no means pleasing to many of the great Lords of the kingdom, especially such as were of the royal blood; and therefore Oswin, a person of great interest in his country, took up arms against him, but with very little success; for his army being totally routed, he was himself also slain, at a place called Edwin's Cliff, in the month of August 761 (d). This however did not hinder Alcred from asserting his right to the crown, in which he proved successful, for as some of our historians tell us, he procured Æthelwold to be fraudulently slain near Durham, in 765 (e). Roger Hoveden says King Æthelwold lost his kingdom at Wincanheale, in the latter end of October that year (f); and the Saxon Chronicle intimates, that after six years reign he resigned (g). However it was, Alcredus at this time ascended the throne, which proved no easy feat to him (h). In 768 died Elbert, King of Northumberland, in the cloister which he had chosen for his retreat. The same year King Alcred married his Queen Osgerna (i). He seems to have lived upon good terms with his neighbours, and to have taken some pains in cultivating a friendship with foreign Princes (k). However he was as far from pleasing his subjects as any of his predecessors, insomuch, that about Easter, in the year 774, he was compelled to fly from York, with a very small number of dependents, who chose rather to follow his fortunes, than to desert his person (l). He retired first to the strong city of Bebba, which is thought to be the town now called Bamborough in Northumberland, and finding himself not safe there, he sought the protection of Cynoth, King of the Picts, who treated him kindly (m). Two of our antient historians assert, that this King Alcred was deposed by the unanimous consent of all the Princes of the royal family, and other great Lords of his kingdom (n), which hath drawn some to consider this as an instance of deposing a King for male-administration [A]. Those who expelled him, either recalled out of banishment, or took

[A] An instance of deposing Kings for male-administration.] Amongst the state tracts, written in the reign of King William, there is the speech of the Right Honourable Thomas, Earl of Stamford, at the general quarter sessions, held for the county of Leicester at Michaelmas, 1691, his Lordship being then Custos Rotulorum for that county. The intent of this speech is to vindicate the Revolution; wherein his Lordship having run through all the instances of depositions of Princes in France, Spain, and Scotland, proceeds thus. 'As for England, I will mention some few before the Conqueror (vulgarly so called) who were Archigallo, Emerian, Vortigern, Sigebert, King of the West Saxons, Beornred, and Alwed, King of Northumberland; all these were deprived of their thrones for their cruel and evil government, and others more worthy put in their stead (1). This must be founded on what we are told by Simeon of Durham, who in his history, under the year 794, writes thus ' Alcredus Rex consilio & consensu suorum omnium, reges familie ac principum destitutus societate, exilio imperii mutavit majestatem. i. e. King Alcred, by the common council and consent of his subjects, being deserted by his Princes, and even those of the Royal Family, changed his royal state for an inglorious exile (2). Roger Hoveden transcribes this account literally (3); though by a different manner of pointing, it has somewhat a different sense given to it in Sir Henry Savil's edition. It is very remarkable, that Simeon of Durham hath exactly the same story of another King of Northumberland: for under the year 796, having related the murder of King Æthelred, he goes on thus: ' Ostald vero patricius à quibusdam ipsius gentis principibus in regnum est constitutus, & post xxvii dies out of prison Æthelred, the son of Æthelwold, and set him upon the throne. In 778, they expelled him, and crowned Alfwold of the blood royal, who governed the kingdom ten years (o). It is not certain how long Alcred lived in exile, or where he died; but in all probability, it was before this Prince came to the throne, who was his near relation, and who took his two sons, Ofred and Alcmund, into his protection. He was an excellent Prince, and, as our historians say, exceedingly pious (p). Yet in 788, or as the Saxon Chronicle has it in 789, towards the end of September, he was treacherously murdered by one Siga, a powerful nobleman (q); who some years after, stung with remorse, laid violent hands on himself (r). To him succeeded his nephew, Ofred, the son of Alcred, who in less than a year was betrayed and driven into exile; and Æthelred, the son of Æthelwold, being a second time recalled from banishment, again mounted the throne (s). Ofred having still some friends, in 792 returned out of the Isle of Man, then called Euphania, and endeavoured to dethrone his competitor; but being betrayed, he was defeated, and delivered up into the hands of Æthelred, who caused him to be put to death; though he suffered his body to be royally interred at Tinmouth (t). In 794, King Æthelred was murdered by his people, and was succeeded in the kingdom by Eardwulf (u); though Roger Hoveden says, that Osbold succeeded him, and was deposed and banished in twenty-seven days (w): to whom succeeded Eardwulf, who held the kingdom, not without much trouble, many years; and in 800, procuring Alcmund, the younger son of Alcred, to be put into his hands, by those who had the care of him, he caused him and all his attendants to be put to death (x); thereby putting an end to the family of Alcred, and all its pretensions. But such was the prudence, piety, and integrity, of this young Prince, that though he was thus cut off, by a sudden and violent death, in the bloom of his youth, and without any fault of his own, yet many years after his decease, he was, for the same of his virtues, reputed a saint; and, as such, had the nineteenth day of March appointed for his festival (y). There was also another saint of his name (z), of whom, to avoid multiplying articles, we will say somewhat in the notes, that we may omit nothing curious or instructive; and which, at the same time, has any relation to the British history [B].

omni regie familie ac principum est societate destitutus, fugatusque & de regno expulsus, atque ad insulam Lindisfarnensem cum paucis secessit, & inde ad Regem Pictorum cum quibusdam à fratribus navigio pervenit (4). i. e. One Osbold, a nobleman, was by some of his own party exalted to the throne; but being deserted by all of the royal family, and by the great men, in twenty-seven days space he was compelled to fly, with a few of his followers, out of the kingdom, retiring into Holy Island; and thence he passed in a bark, with some of his brethren, into the dominions of the King of Picts. Neither is this all the instances of that nature to be met with in the Chronicle of the Northumbrian Kings (5). On the contrary, there are several others both before and after him; inasmuch, that it is certain that the people in those days made very free with their monarchs, or rather their chiefs, made free with them, as was the case also in Scotland.

[B] Has any relation to the British history. It is surprizing, that Alford (6) the Jesuit, should particularly relate the martyrdom and canonization of this St Alcmund, and yet say nothing of another Saint of the same name, who seems to have been much more famous. He was also a Northumbrian, and flourished about the same time with this other Alcmund; whence I have sometimes inclined to doubt, whether the latter was not supplanted by the former. This other Alcmundus was Bishop of Hexham in Northumberland; and Richard the Prior in his celebrated history of that church tells us (7), that he became Bishop of that See in 767, being the second year of the reign of King Alcred, and that he died in 781, being the fourth year of King Elfwald; when he had held the See upwards of twelve years, or, as he says in another place, thirteen years (8). But Simeon of Durham gives us a very large account of his declaring himself a Saint (9), which, for its singularity, deserves to be taken notice of. The body of Bishop

Alcmund was, it seems, deposited by that of his predecessor St Acca. But two hundred and fifty years after he was buried, he appeared to one Dregmus, a very pious man, and desired him to go to one Ælfred, a priest at Durham, and with his help to remove his body into a more honourable place. Dregmus hereupon asked him who he was? I am, said he, Alcmund Bishop of Hexham, and my body lies next to that of St Acca, my predecessor. Upon this his corps was taken up the next day; but so many people crowded to see it, that it was too late to deposit it in the place designed for it, and therefore it was laid in the porch of St Peter for that night, being watched by a great company of Monks and Priests. Towards morning all of these, except one, fell fast asleep; whereupon he taking this opportunity, stepped to the shrine, and withdrew a middle bone of one of St Alcmund's fingers. The next day, when, after singing various hymns, they attempted to move the corps to the high altar, where it was to remain; they found, to their great amazement, that it was impossible to stir it. The priest, who took the finger-bone with no other intent than to place it in the church of Durham, as a relic of St Alcmund; and not in the least suspecting that he was the cause of this wonder, besought the people to apply themselves to God in prayer, that he would be pleased to permit the Saint to declare what the reason was, why his body could not be moved. Accordingly, that night St Alcmund appeared to the man whom he visited first, and said, with a stern countenance, What is it you would do? would you carry me maimed into that church where I served God and St Andrew whole; adjure you all the people to-morrow, that they restore what they foolishly took away, otherwise my body cannot be moved: at the same time he stretched out his hand and shewed the maimed finger. This being accordingly done, the priest delivered the bone, and the body was carried and interred behind the altar. E

ALCUINUS, or ALBINUS (FLACCUS), a famous writer in the VIIIth century, was born in Yorkshire, or (as others tell us) not far from London (a). He had his education first under venerable Bede, and afterwards under Egbert, Archbishop of York, who made him keeper of the curious library which he had founded in that city (b). Alcuinus flourished about the year 780, was deacon of the church of York, and at last abbot of the monastery of Canterbury. In 793, he went over into France, being invited thither by Charlemagne, to assist him in opposing the heresy of Felix, Bishop

Bishop of Urgel [A], and the canons of the false synod of Nice (c). He was in high esteem with that Prince, who not only honoured him with his friendship and confidence, but became his pupil likewise, being instructed by him in rhetorick, logick, mathematicks, and divinity (d). The year following, he attended Charlemagne to the council of Francfort, and, upon that Prince's recommendation, was admitted a member of that council. The same Prince gave him the abbies of Ferrara, St Jodocus, and St Lupus. In 796 he earnestly requested leave to retire from secular affairs; which was refused him. In 798, he drew his pen against Felix, Bishop of Urgel, and confuted his errors in seven books. In 799, being invited by Charlemagne to accompany him in his journey to Rome, he excused himself on account of his infirmities and old age. In 801, Charlemagne being returned from Italy, and newly declared Emperor, Alcuinus took the opportunity of congratulating him on his election, and pressed his suit so earnestly, that at length he obtained leave to retire from court, to the abbey of St Martin at Tours, which the Emperor had lately given him. Here he spent the remainder of his life in an honourable retreat, and employed himself in educating the youth in the school which he had founded in that city. The Emperor in vain endeavoured by repeated letters to re-call him to court. He died at Tours, on Whitfunday in the year 804 (e). He was a man of singular piety and learning, and the best English divine (according to William of Malmfbury) after Bede and Aldhelme (f). France was indebted to Alcuinus for the flourishing state of learning in that kingdom [B]. He wrote a great number of books [C],

[A] The heresy of Felix, Bishop of Urgel] Hear what Mr Du Pin says of this Heresiarch and his doctrine. Towards the end of the VIIIth century, there arose in the West a dispute about the mystery of the incarnation. Felix, Bishop of Urgel, in Catalonia, being consulted by Elipand, Bishop of Toledo, whether Jesus Christ, as man, ought to be called the adoptive or natural son of God, answered, that in that quality he ought only to be called his adoptive son. He wrote in defence of this opinion, and endeavoured to spread it, not only in Spain, but also in France and Germany. He was opposed by the Bishops, who, in a council held at Ratisbon in 792, condemned that error, together with it's author, who was sent to Rome to Pope Adrian. The Pope confirmed the judgment of the synod, and obliged Felix to retract. Nevertheless some Spanish Bishops persisted in that opinion. Felix himself espoused it anew, and Elipand defended him in a letter, which was condemned by Pope Adrian, then by a synod held in Italy, and, lastly, by the council of Francfort in 794, consisting of three hundred Bishops. The question was debated in that council, and it was decided, that Jesus Christ, as man, ought to be called the proper, and not the adoptive, son of God. This council informed Elipand, and the other Spanish Bishops, of their decision; and Charlemagne joined his authority with that of the council, to oblige them to renounce their opinion. This affair was likewise examined at Rome, under Pope Leo III, in a council of fifty-seven Bishops, held in 799. They confirmed the judgment given by Adrian, against the error of Felix, Bishop of Urgel, and anathematized him as an heretic. The same year Charlemagne sent for Felix to Aix la Chapelle, and gave him permission to defend his opinions before the Bishops. Alcuinus replied to him, and confuted him; whereupon he gave up his opinion, and embraced that of the Church. He was followed by his disciples, and that question occasioned no farther controversy in the Church (1).

[B] France was indebted to Alcuinus for the flourishing state of learning in that kingdom.] Ei quicquid politicioris literaturæ isto & sequentibus sæculis Gallia ostentat totum acceptum referri debet. Ei Academiæ Parisiensis, Turonensis, Fuldenfis, Sueffionensis, aliæque plures originem & incrementa debent; quibus ille, si non præsens præfuit, aut fundamenta posuit, saltem doctrina præluxit, exemplo prævit, & beneficiis à Carolo impetratis adauxit (2). — France is obliged to Alcuinus for all the polite learning it boasted of in that and the following ages. The universities of Paris, Tours, Fulden, Soissons, and many others, owe to him their origin and increase; those, of whom he was not the superior or founder, being at least enlightened by his doctrine and example, and enriched by the benefits he procured for them from Charlemagne. A German poet, cited by Camden (3) mentions the service Alcuinus did France, by introducing literaturæ into that kingdom. His verses are these:

Quid non Alcuino, facunda Lutetia, debes?
Instaurare bonas ibi qui feliciter artes,
Barbariemque procul solus depellere cœpit.

No smaller tokens of esteem from France
Alcuinus claims, who durst himself advance

'Twas he transported Britain's richest ware,
Language and arts, and kindly taught them there.

[C] He wrote a great number of books.] An edition of them was published by Du Chesne at Paris in 1617, consisting of the following pieces. 1. Interrogationes & Responiones, seu Liber Quæstionum, in Genesim. i. e. Questions and answers on the book of Genesis. 2. Dicta super illud Genesios, Faciamus hominem ad imaginem nostram. i. e. A Manual, or short pious exposition on the seven penitential Psalms, on the 118th Psalm, and on the gradual Psalms, dedicated to Arno, Archbishop of Saltzburg. It was printed separately at Paris in 1547, in 8vo. but without the preface, which was first published by Lucas Dacherius (4). 4. De Psalmorum usu liber. i. e. Of the use of the Psalms, together with divers forms of prayer fitted for daily use. This book is dedicated to Fredegisus his scholar. 5. Officia per ferias. i. e. Offices for each day, or Psalms disposed according to the days of the week, together with Orations, Hymns, Confessions, and Litanies. 6. Epistola de illo Cantici Cantorum loco, Sexaginta sunt Reginae, &c. i. e. An epistle concerning that passage in Solomon's Song, (vi. 8.) There are threescore Queens, &c. 7. Epigrams on the revision and correction of the whole Bible. In Du Chesne's edition of Alcuinus's works, we are told, that our author, by order of Charlemagne, undertook to correct the whole text of the Vulgate Bible; which work is still to be found in the library of Vauxcolles, with the epigrams here mentioned (5). 10. De Fide SS. Trinitatis libri tres, ad Carolum Magnum, cum invocatione ad S. Trinitatem & Symbolo fidei. i. e. The former abjured his heresy in the Synod of Aix, in the end of the year 799: nevertheless, being deposed from his see, he was banished for life to Lyons. Elipand also, convinced of his error by the writings of Alcuinus, died piously in the year 808. There is also a Confession of Faith, sent by Felix to the clergy and people of Urgel, after he had abjured his heresy in the Synod of Aix (6). 18. Epistola ad filiam in Christo charissimam. i. e. A letter to his dearly beloved daughter in Christ. 19. De Divinis Officiis Liber, five Expositio Romani Ordinis. i. e. A Treatise concerning Divine Offices, or an Exposition of the Roman Office. This passes for the genuine work of Alcuinus, and has been often cited under his name by the writers, who have treated that subject; and in Du Chesne's edition of this author, it is enlarged with the addition of twelve entire chapters. Nevertheless Dr Cave (7) is of opinion it is not Alcuinus's, but was written after the year 1000. 20. De Ratione Septuagesimæ, Sexagesimæ, & Quinquagesimæ, Epistola. i. e. A Letter concerning Septuagesima, Sexagesima, and Quinquagesima, written to the Emperor Charlemagne. 21. De Baptismi cæremoniis, ad Odinum presbyterum, Epistola. i. e. A Letter to the presbyter Odwin concerning the ceremonies of Baptism. This is followed by another piece on the same subject, entitled De iisdem cæremoniis: but Father Sirmund has justly taken it from Alcuinus, and restored it to its true author Amalarius of Triers (8). 22. De Confessione peccatorum, ad pueros Sancti Martini. i. e. A Letter to the Youths of the Abbey of St Martin's, concerning Confession of Sins. 23. Sacramentorum Liber. i. e. A Book of Sacraments, Colon. 1571. 24. Homiliæ tres. 1. De Silentio in quo missum est incarnatum verbum. 2. In Nativitatem B. Mariæ. 3. In Festo omnium Sanctorum. i. e. Three Homilies; the first on the Incarnation, the second on the Nativity of the blessed Virgin, and the third on the Feast of All Saints. These homilies are spurious, being taken out of Paulus Diaconus's Homiliarium. The third of them is the thirty-seventh among those on the Saints, under St Augustin's name (9). 25. Vita Antichristi, ad Carolum Magnum. i. e. The Life of Antichrist, dedicated to Charlemagne. 26. De Virtutibus & vitiis ad Comitem Widonem Liber. i. e. A Discourse concerning the Virtues and Vices, addressed to Count Wido. 27. De Septem Artibus Liber. i. e. A Treatise concerning seven Sciences. This piece is imperfect, there remaining no more than two chapters, viz. those on Grammar and Rhetoric, with a transition to Logic. The Grammatica was published separately at Hanover in 1605. The Rhetorica & de Virtute Dialogus came out at Paris in 1599. And the Dialectica or Logic, being a dialogue between Charlemagne and Alcuinus, was published, together with the Grammar, at Ingolstadt in 1604 (10). 28. Disputatio Regalis. i. e. The Royal Disputation, being a dialogue between Pipin, afterwards King of Italy, and the author. 29. Scriptum de vita Sancti Martini Turonensis. i. e. The Life of St Martin of Tours. 30. De Transitu Sancti Martini Sermo. i. e. A Sermon on the Death of St Martin. 31. Vita S. Vedasti Episcopi Atrebatensis. i. e. The Life of St Vedast Bishop of Arras, written in the year 795. 32. Vita beatissimi Richarii presbyteri. i. e. The Life of St Richarius or Riguiër the Priest. 33. De Vita S. Willebrordi Trajectensis Episcopi Libri duo. i. e. The Life of St Willebrord Bishop of Utrecht, in two Books; one in prose, the other in verse. 34. Epistolæ 115. i. e. One Hundred and fifteen Letters. 35. Poemata & Versus de pluribus Sanctis. i. e. Poems and

Verses on several Saints. The pieces hitherto mentioned were published all together by Andrew du Chesne: but since that edition of Alcuinus's works, other pieces have been published under the same author's name; as, 36. Libri quatuor Carolini de Imaginibus. i. e. Four Caroline Books concerning Images. These are said by Roger Hoveden (11) to have been written by Alcuinus under the name of the Emperor Charlemagne. They were written against the worship of images, a little before the council of Francfort, and published during the session of that council under the Emperor's name; who in the preface expressly declares, he undertook that work out of a zeal for God and truth. Dr Cave is of opinion, they are the genuine work of that Emperor, who might possibly be assisted in composing them by Alcuinus (12). 37. Confessio fidei. i. e. A Confession of Faith. This is a Collection taken out of the writings of St Augustin, and divided into four parts. It was published under Alcuinus's name by Chifflet, at Dijon, 1654, in quarto, among several tracts of other writers. M. Daillé, in a tract of his published at Roan in 1675, has endeavoured to prove, that this Confessio fidei is a spurious piece, and falsely ascribed to Alcuinus. F. Mabillon has written a long dissertation (13) in defence of the genuineness of the piece in question. However he owns very candidly, he has not absolutely proved his assertion, but only rendered it highly probable. 38. Commentarius brevis in Cantica Canticozum. i. e. A short Commentary on the Canticles or Solomon's Song. London, 1638, 4to. This piece was published by Patricius Junius, with the commentary of Gilbert Foliot. 39. Breviarium fidei adversus Arianos. i. e. A Summary of faith against the Arians. Sirmundus published it at Paris in 1630, without a name; but Chifflet restored it to Alcuinus (14). 40. Homilia de Purificatione B. Mariæ Virginis. i. e. An Homily on the Purification of the Virgin Mary; falsely ascribed to St Ambrose, but restored to Alcuinus by M. Baluze (15). 41. Epistolæ duo & Sermo ad Carolum M. i. e. Two Letters and a Discourse addressed to Charlemagne, published by M. Baluze (16). 42. Epistola & Prefatio ad Libros septem in Felicem Orgiletanum. i. e. An Epistle and Preface to the seven Books against Felix, Bishop of Urgel. It was wanting in the printed copies, and was first published by M. Baluze (17). 43. Epistolæ tres. i. e. Three Letters, brought to light by Dache-rius (18). 44. Epistolæ xxvi. i. e. Twenty-six Letters, published by Mabillon (19). 45. Carmen de Cuculo. i. e. A Poem on a Cuckoo, and two other poems, published by Mabillon (20). 46. Poemata duo. i. e. Two Poems, the first a short one in heroic verse, the other a long one in elegiac, both of them chiefly on the argument of the books of the Old and New Testament; published by Lambecius (21). 47. Hymnus & Epigrammata tres in S. Vedastum. i. e. An Hymn and three Epigrams on St Vedast, published by Lambecius (22). 48. Homilia in die Natali S. Vedasti. i. e. An Homily on the Birth-day of St Vedast, published by Bollandus (23). 49. De Pontificibus & Sanctis Ecclesiæ Eboracensis. i. e. Of the Bishops and Saints of the church of York. This is an heroic poem, containing near 1700 verses. It was copied from two manuscripts, one at Rheims in France, and the other at St Theodorick near Rheims; and sent by Mabillon to Dr Gale, Dean of York, who published it under Alcuinus's name (24). But Oudin (25) is of opinion, it was not written by Alcuinus, because the poetry is very barbarous, and inferior to that of his other poems. That writer ascribes it to a Benedictine Monk, named Frigidodus, who lived about the year 960. Dr Gale assures us (26), he had by him several epistles of Alcuinus, which were never published. Besides the works of Alcuinus above-mentioned, he wrote some pieces, which are lost; namely, 50. Commentarius in Proverbia. i. e. A Commentary on the Book of Proverbs. 51. Commentarius in quatuor Epistolas S. Pauli, viz. ad Ephesios, ad Titum, ad Philemonem, & ad Hebræos. i. e. A Commentary on four of St Paul's Epistles, viz. those to the Ephesians, to Titus, to Philemon, and to the Hebrews. 52. De Orthographia liber. i. e. A Treatise of Orthography. 53. De musica Liber. i. e. An Essay on Musick.

ALDHELM or ADELM (St.), Bishop of Shireburn in the time of the Saxon heptarchy, is generally said to have been the son of Kenred or Kenter, brother of Ina King of the West Saxons (a) [A]. He was born at Caer-Bladon, now called Malmbsury [B] in Wiltshire, and had his education partly abroad in France and Italy, and partly at home under Maïldulphus an Irish Scot, who had built a little monastery, where the town of Malmbsury now stands. After Maïldulphus's death, Aldhelm succeeding him did, by the help of Eleutherius, Bishop of Winchester, to whom the ground of right belonged, build there a very stately monastery [C], of which himself was the first Abbot. Upon the death of Hedda, Bishop of the West Saxons, that kingdom being divided into two diocesef, namely, Winchester and Shireburn, King Ina promoted Aldhelm to the latter, comprehending Dorsetshire, Wiltshire, Devonshire, and Cornwall (b). It is said, he was consecrated at Rome by Pope Sergius I, and that he had the courage to reprove the holy Father for having a bastard [D]. This prelate, by the direction of a diocefan fynod, wrote a book against the mistake of the Britons concerning the celebration of Easter; in which he charged the British Church with many singularities, which kept them from the Saxon communion. This book, Bede tells us (c), reconciled many of the Britons, who were subject to the West Saxons, to the Catholick usage in that point. He likewise wrote a book, partly in prose, and partly in hexameter verse, in praise of virginity (d), dedicated to Ethelburga, Abbess of Barking (e), and published among Bede's Opuscula (f). Aldhelm wrote several other pieces, mentioned by Bale and William of Malmbsury [E]. Bede gives him the character of an universal scholar and

[A] He is generally said to have been the son of Kenred or Kenter, brother of Ina King of the West-Saxons.] Let us hear William of Malmbsury concerning the family of St Aldhelm. Ferunt quidam (says that historian) incertum unde id assumpserint, fuisse nepotem Inae regis West-Saxonum ex fratre Kentero. Nobis pro vero arrogare non libuit, quod videtur magis opinionio quadrare volatice, quam veritati historice. Siquidem ex chronicis constat quod Ina nullum fratrem praeter Inigildum habuerit, qui paucis ante ipsum annis decessit. Postem & illud objicere, quod Aldhelmus non minor septuagenario decedens, Inam plus xviii annis superitem reliquerit, idemque rex postea tot annos viridi adhuc aeo Romam ierit. Convenit ut patris juvenis nepotem septuagenarium haberet, qui de fratre minoris aetatis natus fuisset? — Qui legit manuale librum regis Elfredi, reperiet Kenterum beati Aldhelmi patrem non fuisse regis Inae germanum, sed archissima necessitudine consanguineum (1). — Some report, upon what authority I know not, that he was nephew of Ina King of the West-Saxons, being the son of his brother Kenter. I would not assume for true, what looks more like a flying rumour, than a matter of fact. For it is evident from history, that Ina had no other brother than Inigild, who died a few years before him. I might also object, that Aldhelm, being not less than seventy years old when he died, left Ina, who survived him eighteen years, and that the same King, after so many years, went to Rome in the vigour of his age. Is it possible, that the uncle in the flower of his youth should have a nephew seventy years of age, and the son of his younger brother? Whoever reads King Elfred's manual, will find that Kenter the father of St Aldhelm was not the brother of King Ina, but only very nearly related to him by blood. I shall leave the matter to rest upon the authority and reasoning of William of Malmbsury.

[B] Caer-Bladon, now called Malmbsury.] This town was built by Dunwallo Mulmutius King of the Britons, and by him called Caer-Bladon. After it had been destroyed by the wars, there rose out of it's ruins a castle called by the Saxons Ingelborne; which was known by no other name for a long time, till Maïldulphus an Irish Scot, a great scholar, and eminent for his devotion and strictness of life, being delighted with the pleasantness of the wood under the hill, upon which the castle stood, lived there a hermit. Afterwards instituting a school, and with his scholars devoting himself to a monastic life, he built a little monastery. From this Maïldulphus the town of Ingelborne began to be called Maïldulfsburg, and by Bede Maïdulfs Urbis Maïdulfs town: which name in length of time was changed into that of Malmbsury (2).

[C] Aldhelm built a very stately monastery.] King Ethelstan enriched this monastery with ample donations, and chose it for the place of his burial. After the Monks had been in possession of it for the space of 270 years, they were turned out in the year 956

by the command of King Edwy, and secular priests put in their room; but they were restored by King Edgar. This religious house was famous for it's wealth, and for having produced several learned men, especially William of Malmbsury, to whose learned industry the civil and ecclesiastical history of England are greatly indebted. King John gave the Monks leave to raze the castle for the enlargement of the abbey, which exceeded all the rest in Wiltshire both for riches and honour, it's Abbot fitting in Parliament as a Peer of the Realm. At the dissolution of the monasteries in the reign of Henry VIII, the abbey of Malmbsury was purchased for a large sum of money by one Stump, a rich clothier, for the use of the inhabitants, who converted it into a parish church (3).

[D] He had the courage to reprove the Pope for having a bastard.] Memoriae traditum (says Bishop Godwin) dum ibi loci haereret, approbationem pontificiam expectans, sanctissimum illum patrem, verum jam patrem, nova prole auctum; & luxuriam hominis reprehendere coram ausum novitium hunc episcopum (4). — It is reported, that, whilst he was carried at Rome in expectation of the Pope's approbation, the most holy Father, now a father indeed, had a child born to him; and that this new Bishop had the courage to reprove him to his face for his incontinency. But Bale gives this story a quite different turn, and reproaches Aldhelm for not discharging his conscience. Unum hoc in eo defendendum (says he) occurrit, quod cum Sergio Primo Pontifice Romano longam consuetudinem habens (cujus interem non ignorabat incestum) cauterio perusum avehebat conscientiam (5). — One thing only is blameable in him, that having had a long intimacy with Pope Sergius I, (whose incontinency in the mean time he was not a stranger to) he brought away his conscience scared with a hot iron.

[E] He wrote several other pieces.] 1. De octo vitiis principalibus. i. e. Of the eight principal Vices (6); or, as it is otherwise called, De pugna octo principalium virtutum. i. e. Of the fight of the eight principal virtues (7). It is extant in the Bibliotheca Patrum of Canisius (8). 2. Aenigmatum Versus mille. i. e. Aenigmas consisting of a thousand Verses, written in imitation of the poet Symphorius (9). This, with the other works in verse of St Aldhelm, were published by Martin Delrio at Mentz, in 1601, in 8vo (10). 3. A book, addressed to a certain King of Northumberland named Alfrid, containing the following chapters: De Septenarii numeri dignitate, collecta ex veteris & Novi Testamenti floribus & disciplinis philosophorum. i. e. Of the dignity of the number Seven, collected from the flowers of the Old and New Testament, and from the doctrines of the philosophers. De Ammonitione fraternae charitatis. i. e. and an elegant writer (g). The monkish authors, especially William of Malmfbury (h), have ascribed several miracles to St Aldhelm: particularly they tell us, that a Carpenter having cut a beam for his church too short, the saint by his prayers stretched it out to the full proportion; and that he hung his garments upon the rays of the sun, which miraculously supported them, to the admiration of all the beholders (i). He was the first Englishman that ever wrote in Latin, and that introduced poetry into England [F]. He preferred musick to all other worldly delights, and played skilfully on all sorts of instruments (k). The Popish writers pretend, he used frequently to put his virtue to a dangerous trial, by lying all night with a young woman, yet without violation of his chastity (l). St Aldhelm lived in great esteem till his death, which happened May the 25th 709. A meadow near the town of Malmfbury is called from him St Aldhelm's Mead; and before the Reformation they had several other memorials of him, as his Pfalter, the robe wherein he said Mass, and a great bell in the abbey-steeple called St Aldhelm's Bell (m).

minus infundunt hilaritatis quam vellent hi qui reum incuriosi verba trutinant; judices importuni, qui nesciant quod secundum mores gentium variantur modi dictaminum. Denique Græci involute, Romani splendide, Angli pompaticè dictere solent. Id in omnibus antiquis caris est animadvertere. Moderatius tamen se agit Aldelmus, nec nisi perraro & necessario verba ponit exotica. Allegat catholicos sensus sermo facundus, & violentissimas assertiones exornat color rhetoricus. Quem si perfecte legeris, & ex acumine Græcum putabis, & ex nitore Romanum jurabis, & ex pompa Anglum intelliges (13). — There is less gaiety in his discourses, than those desire, who are more careful of style than matter; unreasonable critics, who forget that the mode of speaking differs according to the different manners of people. Thus the language of the Greeks is involved and obscure, that of the Romans splendid and elegant, that of the English pompous and swelling. This is remarkable in all the antient writings. As for Aldhelm, he is very moderate in his style, and never introduces foreign terms but upon necessity. His Catholic meaning is clothed with eloquence, and his most vehement assertions adorned with the colours of Rhetoric. If you read him with attention, you will take him for a Grecian by his acuteness, a Roman by his elegance, and an Englishman by the pomp of his language.

[F] He was the first — that introduced poetry into England.] This he says of himself in one of his treatises on metre: 'Hæc de metrorum generibus & schematicis pro utilitate ingenii mei habes, multum laboriose, nescio si fructuose, collecta, quamvis mihi conficius sum me illud Virgilianum posse jactare,

' Primus ego in patriam mecum, modo vita superfit,
' Aonio rediens deducam vertice Musas (14).

(14) Apud W. Malmfb. ubi supra.

— These things have I written concerning the kinds and measures of verse; collected with much labour, but whether useful I know not; though I am conscious to my self I have a right to boast as Virgil did:

' I first, returning from th' Aonian hill,
' Will lead the Muses to my native land.'

His historian tells us, he made an excellent use of his skill in English poetry; which was, to polish the barbarous manners of the people, and to bring them to a better sense of religion. Commemorates Elfredus carmen triviale, quod adhuc vulgo cantatur, Aldelmum fecisse; adjiciens causam, qua probet rationabiliter tantum virum his quæ videntur frivola instituisse: populum eo tempore semi-barbarum, parum divinis sermonibus attentum, statim cantatis missis domos cursitare solitum; ideoque sanctum virum super pontem quæ rura & urbem continuat, abeuntibus se opposuisse obicem, quasi artem cantandi profectum. Eo plus quam semel factò, plebis favorem & concursum emeritum. Hoc commentò, sensim inter ludicra verbis scripturarum insertis, cives ad sanitatem reduxisset; qui si severe & cum excommunicatione agendum putasset, profectò proficisset nihil (15). — Elfred informs us, that Aldhelm made the ballad, which is still commonly sung, adding a probable reason why so great a man busied himself about such trifles; namely, that the people were half barbarians, little attentive to religious discourses, and accustomed to run home immediately after singing of mass; wherefore the holy man, placing himself upon a bridge that joined the town and country, used often to stop them, professing himself skilled in the art of singing. By this means he gained the favour of the populace, who flocked about him; and insensibly mixing words of scripture with ludicrous matters, he brought the towns-men to a right way of thinking; whereas, if he had thought proper to use severity, or have proceeded to excommunication, he would have met with no success. ALDHUN, the first Bishop of Durham, succeeded Elffig in the bishopric of Lindisfarne or Holy Island (a), in the year 990, being the twelfth of the reign of King Ethelred. He was of a noble family, but, according to Simeon of Durham, more ennobled by his virtues and religious deportment [A]. He sat about six years in the see of Lindisfarne, during which time, that island was greatly exposed to the incursions of the Danish pirates. This made him think of removing from thence; though Simeon of Durham says, he was put upon it by an admonition from Heaven (b). However, taking with him the body of St Cuthbert, which had been buried there about 113 years, and accompanied by all the Monks and the rest of the people, he went away from Holy Island; and, after wandering about some time, at last he settled with his followers at Dunelm, now called Durham; where he gave rise both to the city and cathedral church.

[A] He was of a noble family, but — more ennobled by his virtues and religious deportment.] Erat autem idem antistes profapia nobilis, sed placita Deo conversatione multo nobilior, habitu, sicut omnes predecessores ejus, & actu monachus probabilis. Cujus probitatis laudem a majoribus sibi traditam indigenæ pene omnes, ac si eum viderent, prædicare solent (1). — He was noble by birth, but much more so by his religious behaviour: a Monk, as all his predecessors were; and that not only in the external garb, but in the real virtues of that character. The fame of his goodness has reached posterity, and is still celebrated by the inhabitants of his diocese, as if he was now alive and conversant among them.

church [B]. He had a daughter named Ecgfrid, whom he gave in marriage to Uctred, son of Walthoef Earl of Northumberland, and with her six towns belonging to the episcopal see (c); upon condition that he should never divorce her. But that young Lord afterwards repudiating her [C], Aldhun received back the church lands he had given with her (d). This prelate educated King Ethelred's two sons, Alfred and Edward; and, when their father was driven from his throne by Swane King of Denmark, he conducted them, together with Queen Emma, into Normandy, to Duke Richard the Queen's brother (e). This was in the year 1017, a little before Bishop Aldhun's death. For the next year, the English having received a terrible overthrow in a battle with the Scots, the good Bishop was so affected with the news, that he died a few days after [D], having enjoyed the prelacy twenty-nine years (f). Radulphus de Diceto (g) calls this Bishop Alfbunus, and Bishop Godwin (b) Aldwinus.

[B] He gave rise both to the city and cathedral church of Durham.] Before Aldhun's arrival, the town of Dunelm, or Durham, consisted only of a few scattered huts or cottages. The spot of ground was covered with a very thick wood, which the Bishop, with the assistance of the people that followed him, made a shift to cut down, and clear away. After he had assigned the people their respective habitations by lot, he began to build a church of stone; which he finished in three years time, and dedicated it to St Cuthbert, placing in it the body of that Saint. From that time the episcopal see, which had been placed at Lindisfarne by Bishop Aidan, remained fixed at Durham; and the cathedral church was soon endowed with considerable benefactions by King Ethelred and other great men (2). Durham, in Latin Dunelmum, (Bishop Godwin tells us) was so called from Dun, which in the Saxon language signified a mountain, and Holm which signified a river-island; because the river Were surrounds on all sides the mountain on which the city stands (3).

(3) Godwin, ubi supra.

[C] That young lord repudiated Aldhun's daughter] Malcolm King of Scotland, having invaded the northern parts of England, laid siege to Durham. Walthoef Earl of Northumberland, being an old man and not able to make head against the enemy, shut himself up in the royal city of Bebbanburg. But his son Uctred, at that time married to Ecgfrid, putting himself at the head of the Northumbrians and Yorkshire-men, fell upon the Scots, and gave them a total overthrow, Malcolm himself narrowly escaping by flight. King Ethelred hearing of this victory sent for Uctred, and, as a reward of his valour and conduct, gave him the earldom of Northumberland, though his father was not yet dead; and annexed to it that of York. The young Earl was scarce invested with these new honours, when he repudiated his wife (4). Simeon of Durham assigns no reason for this divorce:

but it is very probable, Uctred now thought himself too great a man to be son-in-law to a Bishop, and that he aspired after a nobler alliance: for having first married the daughter of a rich citizen named Stry, and thereby (probably) acquired a considerable increase of wealth, he soon got rid of her by divorce, and obtained in marriage Elfgiva the daughter of King Ethelred (5). As for Ecgfrid, she was married to a Thane in Warwickshire named Kilvert: but being divorced from this second husband, she returned to Durham, and there shut herself up in a convent during the rest of her life (6). Our author places the siege of Durham, mentioned in this remark, in the year 969; whereas Aldhun did not remove from Lindisfarne till about 996; which two dates are utterly irreconcilable. It is not easy to say whence this chronological mistake arose, whether from the negligence of the author, the copyist, or the printer. It is certain that Aldhun's daughter was not married to Uctred till after her father's settlement at Durham, nor was she divorced from him till after the above-mentioned siege.

[D] The Bishop was so affected with the news, that he died a few days after.] When he heard of the dreadful slaughter of the English, he fetched a deep groan, and cried out; 'Wretch that I am! Why have I lived to this time? Was it to see the destruction of my people? O holy confessor Cuthbert, beloved of God! if ever I have done any thing pleasing in thy sight, now reward me by not suffering me to survive the slaughter of thy people.' O me, inquit, miserum! ut quid in hæc tempora servatus sum? an ideo huc usque vixi, ut tantam viderem cladem populi? O, inquit, sanctissime, O dilecte Deo confessor Cuthberte, si quid unquam tibi placitum feci, nunc queso mihi vicem repende. Illam dico vicem, ut tuo populo mortuo non sim ego diutius superstes (7).

A L D R E D, Archbishop of York in the reigns of Edward the Confessor, Harold, and William the Conqueror, was a Monk of Winchester, afterwards Abbot of Tavistock, and from thence promoted to the see of Worcester in the year 1046 (a). Four years after his consecration, he took a journey to Jerusalem, through Hungary; a thing which no English Bishop had attempted before him (b). Being returned into England, he was sent by King Edward on an embassy to the Emperor Henry II [A]. He stayed a whole year in Germany, and learned many things relating to Church discipline, the practice of which he afterwards introduced into England (c). He had the administration of the see of Wilton three years, during the absence of Bishop Herman [B]; and

[A] He was sent by King Edward on an embassy to the Emperor Henry II.] The design of this embassy was, to desire the Emperor to send letters and Ambassadors to Solomon King of Hungary, to prevail with him to send home Prince Edward, son of Edmund Ironside, whom King Edward had designed for his heir (1). For King Edmund having left two sons, Edmund and Edward, King Canute, for fear they should disturb him in the possession of the throne, sent them into Denmark, under pretence of travelling, but with a secret intention of having them murdered. The person, with whom he had intrusted the young Princes, knowing his design, instead of carrying them into Denmark, conducted them to the King of Sweden, whom he acquainted with the King of England's design. The Swedish King received them with great kindness: but, being cautious of disobliging Canute, he sent the young Princes to the court of Hungary, where Solomon willingly took upon himself the care of their education. That Prince married one of his daughters to Edmund, and gave his sister-in-law, the Emperor's daughter, to Edward. Edmund died soon after his marriage; but Edward had several children (2). The Emperor complied with the intention of Aldred's embassy; and accordingly Edward, with his wife Agatha, his son Edgar, and his daughters Margaret and Christina, arrived in England in 1057. But Prince Edward dying soon after his arrival disappointed the Confessor's intention (3).

[B] He had the administration of the see of Wilton three years, during the absence of Bishop Herman] This Herman was a Flanderkin, and had been chaplain to King Edward, who advanced him to the Bishopric of Wilton. The revenues of that Bishopric being but small, Herman petitioned the King for leave to fix the episcopal see in the convent of Malmfbury: but Edward, by the advice of his nobles, refusing his consent, Herman in disgust threw up his Bishopric, and retiring into France lived three years in a monastery: in the mean time Aldred had the care of his see. But Herman disrelishing the monastick life, and hearing that the Bishop of Sherburn was dead, and of that of Hereford four years, after the death of Leofgar in 1056 (d). In the year 1061, Kinsius Archbishop of York being dead, Aldred was advanced to that see and, with the King's consent, held the bishopric of Worcester in commendam [C], as four of his predecessors had done (e). Soon after, he went to Rome for his pall, accompanied by Tosti Earl of Northumberland, Giso Bishop of Wells, and Walter Bishop of Hereford. But Pope Nicolas II, being informed of his simoniacal practices, not only refused to confirm him in the archbishopric, but deprived him likewise of all he enjoyed before. Thus disappointed, he left Rome with his three companions: but as they were travelling over the Alps, they were set upon by a band of robbers, who plundered them of every thing but their cloaths; so that they were obliged to return to Rome, to get a farther supply for their journey. Then Earl Tosti interposing, partly by intreaties, and partly by threats [D], prevailed upon the Pope to confirm Aldred, and give him the pall; which he did, on condition that prelate should resign the see of Worcester (f). Being quietly seated in his chair at York, he began to do some good things: for he built a common hall for the Canons to dine in; he finished the hall at Beverly, begun by his predecessor, but left imperfect; he re-built the new cathedral church at Gloucester, which had been destroyed by the Danes; lastly, he obliged the clergy of his province to wear a decent and uniform habit, whereas before they were not distinguishable from the laity. The see of York having been greatly reduced by the persecution of the Barbarians, Aldred, with the King's consent, retained twelve towns or manours belonging to the see of Worcester for his own use (g) [E]. And now this prelate began to discover himself to be a mere worldling and an odious time-server. For no sooner was his patron King Edward dead, but he assisted Harold, son of Earl Godwin, to obtain the crown. Afterwards, when William the Norman had succeeded in his invasion, and Stigand Archbishop of Canterbury had refused to crown him, Aldred fell in with the stream, and performed the ceremony; only exacting an oath from the Norman, that he would love and protect the English equally with his own natural subjects (h). But when afterwards he found that the Conqueror little regarded this oath, he thundered out an excommunication against him (i). Soon after, the Danish invasion coming on, and the citizens of York, with the Northumbrians and others, declaring for Prince Edgar Atheling's title, Aldred sickened at the news, and died, September 10, 1069, just before the Danes landed; and was buried in the cathedral church of York (k). This Archbishop was the last Englishman promoted to the see of York; his successors being of Norman race (l). I shall give the reader a taste of this prelate's spiritual pride and priestly arrogance, in two stories; the one from his panegyrist Stubbs [F], who relates it which see the King had formerly promised him he would annex to that of Wilton, he returned into England; and the King keeping to his promise, Herman held the united sees of Wilton and Sherburn till the ninth year of William the Conqueror, when the episcopal seat was fixed a Sarum or Salisbury (4).

[C] He held the Bishopric of Worcester in commendam.] William of Malmbury charges the Archbishop with obtaining this commendam simoniacally. Hic simplicitati Edwardi illudens, moremque antecessorum pecunia magis quam ratione allegans, Archiepiscopatum Eboracensem non intermissa priori sede suscepit (5). There is some obscurity in this passage: but the sense of it seems to be; that Aldred, abusing the easy disposition of the King, found means to retain the see of Worcester, rather by the force of money properly applied, than by virtue of the precedent he alleged.

[D] ——— By threats.] The Earl was of a fiery disposition, and upon this occasion played the bully for his friend. He went to his Holiness, and railed plentifully at him. He told him, his excommunication would strike no terror into distant nations, if it could not frighten a band of robbers in the very neighbourhood of Rome. He demanded restitution for the loss he had sustained; otherwise he might depend upon it, when the King of England came to hear of this usage, he would withdraw the tribute due to the holy chair. The thunder of these threats (says Malmbury) frightened the Pope into compliance. Tostinus quippe gravibus verborum contumeliosis Apostolicum aggressus, in sententiam sibi placitam reduxit. Parum metuendam à longinquis gentibus ejus excommunicationem, quam propinquis latrunculi deriderent. In supplices ferere, in rebelles parum valere. Aut sua sibi per ejus auctoritatem reddenda, quæ per fraudulentiam constaret amissa; aut futurum, ut hæc rex Anglorum audiens, tributum S. Petri merito Nicolao subtraheret: se non deserturum rerum veritati exaggeranda. Hoc minarum fulmine Romani tertiti Papam flexerunt, ut Aldredo Archiepiscopatum redderet & pallium (6). Stubbs says nothing of Earl Tosti's threats, but imputes the Pope's change of mind to the motions of pity; and the intercession of the whole court. Itaque Papa Nicholau super eum pietate commotus, & totius curiæ intercessione pro eo exoratus, Archiepiscopatum ei dato pallio confirmavit (7). The same author has preserved part of the preamble of the Pope's Bull of confirmation, as follows: Nicholau Episcopus Servus Servorum Dei, dilecto Confratri & Coepiscopo Aldredo Eboracensi Archiepiscopo Apostolicæ benedictionis privilegium & Salutem, & per eum suæ ecclesiæ suisque successoribus canonice promovendis imperpetuum. Quia divinitatis occulta dispensatio est, &c. (8).

[E] He retained twelve towns or manours belonging to the see of Worcester for his own use.] This is what his panegyrist Thomas Stubbs tells us: but if John Bromton is to be believed, his conduct in this affair merits the highest censure. For, according to that historian (9), he detained those possessions by violence and injustice; and, the better to cover his rapine, he nominated Wolstan, Prior of Worcester, to that see, agreeably to the Pope's Bull, which gave him the power of appointing his successor therein. This Wolstan, being a plain easy man, and owing his advancement to Aldred, did not attempt, during the life of the Archbishop, to recover the twelve manours unjustly transferred to the church of York: but no sooner was Aldred dead, than Wolstan defended the rights of the church of Worcester, and recovered the possessions which had been dismembered from it.

[F] Two stories; the one from Stubbs.] As the Archbishop's officers were, one day, bringing a great quantity of provisions to his palace at York, they were met upon the road by the high-sheriff of the county, who stopped them, and asked them to whom they belonged. The men answered, they were servants of the Archbishop, and were carrying those provisions for his use. The high-sheriff, despising the Prelate and his servants, ordered the officers who attended him to seize upon the carriages and provisions, and carry them to the King's granary in the castle of York. The Archbishop hearing of this, sent several of his clergy and citizens to demand restitution of the high-sheriff, and to threaten him with excommunication if he refused it. But that officer disregarding his threats, the Archbishop posted up to London, and went, attended by a numerous train of Bishops and other ecclesiastics, clerastics, to Westminster, where the King then was in council. The monarch no sooner cast his eyes upon the Prelate, than he rose up to salute him as usual; which the latter put by with his crozier, and taking no notice of the King's standing, nor of his crowd of courtiers, he addressed himself to him in these words: 'Hear me, William; when thou wert an alien, and God had permitted thee, for our sins, and through much blood, to reign over us, I anointed thee King, and placed the crown upon thy head with a blessing: but now, because thou deservest it not, I will change that blessing into a curse against thee, as a persecutor and oppressor of God and his ministers, and a breaker and contemner of those oaths and promises, which thou madest unto me before the altar of St Peter.' The King astonished at these menaces threw himself at the Archbishop's feet, and humbly begged to know by what offence he had deserved so severe a sentence. The noblemen in the presence were irritated to a high degree at the Prelate's arrogance, in suffering the King to lie at his feet without raising him. But the Archbishop turning to them said; 'Let him alone, gentlemen, let him lie; he does not fall down at my feet; but at the feet of St Peter.' After some time he thought fit to raise the King, and told him his errand. The Conqueror was too much frightened to deny his request. He gave him rich gifts, and dispatched an express to the high-sheriff for the restitution of his goods, which were punctually restored, to the value of a sack-tring, usque ad ligamen sacci (10).

[G] ——— The other from William of Malmfbury.] Urfus, Earl of Worcester, had built a castle to the prejudice of a neighbouring monastery: for the ditch of the said castle took off part of the church-yard belonging to the Monks. Aldred had often by letters admonished the Earl to do justice to the Monks. But finding intreaties would not do, he went to Urfus in person, and demanded whether it was by his appointment that this encroachment was made. The Earl not denying the fact, the Prelate cried out;

Hightest thou Urfe (11);
Have thou God's curse.

This curse, says my author, seemed to take effect: for Urfus died soon after, and Roger his son enjoyed his father's honour but a very short time; for, having slain one of the King's officers; he was forced to fly his country (12).

ALDRICH or ALDRIDGE (ROBERT), called in Latin Aldrisius, was Bishop of Carlisle in the reigns of King Henry VIII, King Edward VI, and Queen Mary (a). This prelate was born at Burnham in Buckinghamshire, educated in grammar learning at Eaton school, and elected scholar of King's college in Cambridge in the year 1507; where he took the degree of Master of Arts, and was about that time styled by Erasmus, in one of his epistles, blande eloquentiæ juvenis (b). Afterwards he became Proctor of the university, school-master of Eaton, fellow of that college, and at length Provost. In 1529 he retired to Oxford, where he was incorporated Bachelor of Divinity, March 15, 1529 (c); and the next year, performing his exercises for the degree of Doctor in that faculty, he was licensed to proceed, in April 1530 (d). About the same time he was made Archdeacon of Colchester. In 1534, May 7, he was installed Canon of Windsor; and the same year he was appointed register of the most noble order of the Garter (e), in the room of Dr Richard Sydenore, Archdeacon of Totness (f). July 18, 1537, he was consecrated Bishop of Carlisle, in the room of Dr John Kyte deceased: from which time to that of his death, though there were many changes both in Church and State, yet (Mr Wood tells us) he ran through all, and consequently complied with all (g). Bishop Aldrich wrote several pieces, particularly these following: 1. Epistola ad Gulielmum Hormannum. i. e. A Letter to William Horman. 2. Epigrammata varia. i. e. Various Epigrams. 3. Several Resolutions concerning the Sacraments. 4. Answers to certain Queries concerning the Abuses of the Mass. He wrote also Resolutions of some questions relating to Bishops and Priests, and other matters tending to the reformation of the Church begun by King Henry VIII. John Leland, the antiquarian and poet, who was his familiar acquaintance, has celebrated him for his admirable parts and learning [A]. This prelate died March 25, 1555, at Horn-Castle in Lincolnshire, which was a house belonging to the Bishops of Carlisle [B].

[A] John Leland — has celebrated him in the following verses.]

[B] Horn-Castle in Lincolnshire was a house belonging to the Bishops of Carlisle.] Among other alienations of the church-lands in the reigns of Henry VIII and Edward VI, a licence, dated November 1, 1552, was granted to the Lord Bishop of Carlisle, empowering him to sell to the Lord Clinton, Lord Admiral of England, Socam sive dominium suum de Horn-Castle cum omnibus pertinentiis in Com. Lincoln. in villis, campis, sive parochiis de Horn-Castle, Overcompton, Nethercompton, Asbby, Maring, Wilsby, Halibam, Conisby, Boughton, Fimbleby, Moreby, Meckham & Innerby in com. prædicti. to have the same to him and his heirs, tenend. de domino rege, &c. There was likewise a licence granted to the Dean and Chapter to confirm the said conveyance. And for all these lordships the purchaser was only to pay the yearly rent of twenty-eight pounds to the Bishop (2).

ALDRICH (HENRY) an eminent philosopher, poet, and divine, in the XVIIth, and beginning of the XVIIIth century, was the son of Henry Aldrich of Westminster, Gent. He was born there in the year 1647 (a), and educated in the college-school in that city, under the famous R. Busby. In act-term 1662, he was admitted into Christ-church-college Oxon, of which he was, soon after, elected student (b). He took the degree of Bachelor of Arts, May 31, 1666 (c), and that of Master, April 3, 1669 (d). Entering soon after into holy orders, he distinguished himself by his knowledge in every branch of divine and human learning, and became a famous tutor in his college. On the fifteenth of February, 1681, he was installed Canon of Christ-church, in the second stall (e); and the second of March following, accumulated the degrees of Bachelor, and Doctor in Divinity (f). He bore his part in the controversy with the Papists during the reign of King James II [A], upon which, and other accounts, his merit became so conspicuous, that when, at the Revolution, J. Massy the Popish Dean of Christ-church fled beyond sea, his deanry was conferred upon Dr Aldrich; who was therein installed the seventeenth of June, 1689 (g). In this eminent station he behaved in the most worthy and exemplary manner; and promoted learning, religion, and virtue, with great application and zeal, in that noble college over which he happily presided. A great deal of it's present lustre and beauty it owes to his skilful and ingenious hand; for it was he who designed the beautiful square, called Peckwater-Quadrangle, which is esteemed a regular and compleat piece of architecture (h). Like his excellent predecessor Bishop Fell (i), he published yearly some piece of an ancient Greek author [B], for a new-year's-gift to the students of his house. He wrote likewise a system of logic, and some other things [C]. The revising of the manuscript of Lord Clarendon's History of the Rebellion, was committed to his care, jointly with Bishop Sprat; but it doth not appear that they made any additions, or considerable alterations in it, as has been asserted by a late writer, Mr Oldnixon (k). Besides his preferments abovementioned, Dr Aldrich was also Rector of Wem in Shropshire (l). He was chosen Prolocutor of the convocation, in 1702. This worthy person died at Christ-church, on the fourteenth of December, 1710. As to his character: he was a most universal scholar, and had a taste for all sorts of learning, especially architecture. Having never been married, he appropriated his income to works of hospitality, and beneficence, and in encouraging learning to the utmost of his power, of which he was a most munificent patron, as well as one of the greatest men in England, if considered as a Christian or a gentleman. He had always the interest of his college at heart, whereof he was an excellent governor [D]. And, as he was remarkable for modesty and humility, concealing his name to those several learned tracts he published, so at his death he appointed to be buried without any memorial in the cathedral; which his thrifty nephew complied with, depositing him on the south side of Bishop Fell's grave, December 22; eight days after his decease; which happened in the sixty-third, or sixty-fourth year of his age (m).

[A] He bore his part in the controversy with the Papists, during the reign of King James II. The tracts he then published were, 1. A Reply to two Discourses lately printed at Oxford, concerning the Adoration of our blessed Saviour, in the holy Eucharist. Oxford, 1687, 4to. It was an answer to O. Walker's Two discourses concerning the Adoration of our blessed Saviour in the Eucharist. And he writing Animadversions upon the Reply to two Discourses, &c. Dr Aldrich published 2. A Defence of the Oxford Reply to two Discourses lately printed at Oxford, &c. From the Exceptions made to it in the second Appendix to a Compendious Discourse of the Eucharist. Oxford, 1688, 4to. This second Appendix was written by Obadiah Walker, and The Compendious Discourse, &c. by Abraham Woodhead (1). Bishop Burnet ranks our author among those eminent English clergymen, who 'examined all the points of Popery with a solidity of judgment, a clearness of arguing, a depth of learning, and a vivacity of writing, far beyond any thing that had before that time appeared in our language (2).'

[B] He published yearly some piece of an ancient Greek author. We have not been able to get an account of what he published of that kind, except these following pieces. 1. Xenophontis Memorabilium libri quatuor. Gr. & Lat. Oxon. 1690, 8vo. 2. Xenophontis Sermo de Agésilao. Gr. & Lat. Oxon. 1691, 8vo. 3. Aristæa Historia LXXII. Interpretum. Gr. & Lat. Oxon. 1692, 8vo. 4. Xenophontis de Re Equestri lib. Gr. & Lat. Oxon. 1693, 8vo. 5. Epiætetus &

Theophrastus. Gr. & Lat. Oxon. 1707, 8vo. 6. Platonis, Xenophontis, Plutarchi, Luciani, Symposia. Gr. Oxon. 1711, 8vo. This last was published after his decease. — He composed also Bishop Fell's epitaph, and some others, which are expressed in a very polite and elegant manner (3).

[C] He wrote likewise a system of Logic, and some other things. It was printed under the title of Artis Logicæ Compendium. Oxon. 1691, 8vo. in six sheets; and reprinted several times since, with variations and additions. The learned author composed it for the use of his noble pupil, Frederic-Christian Howard, son to Charles Earl of Carlisle. — He also printed Elements of Geometry, in Latin, in a large thin octavo; probably for the use of some of his friends, or pupils: for it was never published. — And likewise, had a hand in Gregory's Greek Testament, printed at Oxford in 1703, fol. — Some of his notes are printed in the new edition of Josephus, by Havercamp.

[D] Whereof he was an excellent governor. This part of his character is well expressed by the author of the dedication to his edition of the Symposia, in the following elegant words. — Qui in omni vitæ cursu præclarum aliquid vel benignum alumnis suis paravit. — Qui patronus fuit munificentissimus; amicus amicitiosissimus; mortalium, pene dixerim, optimus; illum denique opum honorum contemptorem animum, omnium scientiarum omnium virtutum capacem, cælo (unde præfatus fuit) redditum, jurat, & jurabit usque, plausu & gratulationibus prosequi. C

ALDULPH or ARDULPH or EARDULPH, King of Northumberland, in the time of the Saxon heptarchy, succeeded King Oswald, and was inaugurated in St Peter's church at York, the twenty-sixth of May 796 (a). King Ethelred, the immediate predecessor of King Oswald, the better to secure himself on the throne, had banished several of the principal Northumbrian Lords, and among the rest Aldulph, whom he suspected of carrying on designs against his person and crown. But the malecontent malecontent party prevailing, and King Ethelred being assassinated, Oswald was elected in his room. This Prince reigned but twenty-seven days, being driven out by the opposite faction, who placed Aldulph on the throne. Two years after his accession, a conspiracy being formed against him by the murderers of the late King Ethelred, at the head of whom was one Wada; King Aldulph engaged them in a place called by the Anglo-Saxons Billingaboth near Walalege; and many being slain on both sides, Wada and his forces were put to flight, and the King obtained a glorious victory (b). In the year 801, this Prince led an army against Kenwolf King of the Mercians, who had afforded shelter to his enemies: but, through the interposition of the Bishops and Nobles on both sides, the two Monarchs were reconciled, and made a league of the most firm and lasting friendship (c) [A]. Aldulph had the address to maintain himself upon the throne by the help of the most powerful faction of the two, which at that time divided the kingdom of Northumberland. Nevertheless the other made several attempts from time to time to advance itself. Alcred, who had swayed the sceptre of that kingdom, had left a son named Alcmund, who was at the head of this last party. This Prince beginning to grow formidable, Aldulph, who judged it necessary to sacrifice him to his own safety, caused him to be privately murdered. His death being looked upon by the opposite party as a martyrdom, Alcmund was placed in the number of the faints; and this furnished the King's enemies with a pretence to take up arms, and to put themselves under the command of a Lord named Aldrick. This rebel being overcome and slain in battle, the malecontents continued some time without making any fresh attempt. But the face of affairs soon changed: the party opposed to the King became so powerful, that this Prince was forced to save himself by flight, and take refuge in the court of Charlemagne, where the English were always well received. Nor did Aldulph ever recover his crown: for, two years after, the kingdom of Northumberland submitted to the power of Ecbert King of Westex; which put an end to the Heptarchy (d).

I find an A L D U L P H Bishop of Lichfield in the reign of Offa King of the Mercians; whom I mention for no other reason, but because in his time the see of Lichfield was erected into an Archbishopric [B].

[A] The two monarchs — made a league of the most firm and lasting friendship. Simeon of Durham quotes a tetrastick, which he says was fulfilled by this treaty of peace between the two Kings. It is this:

Gratius astra nitent, ubi nothus
Definit imbriferos dare sonos;
Lucifer ut tenebras pepulerit,
Pulchra dies roseos agit equos (1).

That is,

*When the moist south no longer blows,
Each star its grateful radiance shows;
When Lucifer dispels the night,
The day holds forth its rosy light.*

[B] In Bishop Aldulph's time, the see of Lichfield was erected into an Archbishopric. King Offa being successful in his wars, and making the greatest figure in the Heptarchy, resolved, in the year 765, upon the erecting Lichfield into an Archiepiscopal see. Lambert, Archbishop of Canterbury, made use of all his interest to prevent the dismembering his jurisdiction; and, the contest being brought before the court of Rome, the Archbishop urged the grant of Gregory the Great, to the see of Canterbury. However, King Offa prevailed in his application, and obtained of Pope Adrian I, that all the Bishops within the kingdom of Mercia should be suffragans to the Bishop of Lichfield as their Metropolitan (2).

A L E X A N D E R, Bishop of Lincoln in the reigns of Henry II and Stephen, was a Norman by birth, and nephew of the famous Roger, Bishop of Salisbury, who first made him Archdeacon of Salisbury, and afterwards, by his interest with the King, raised him to the mitre (a). Alexander was consecrated at Canterbury, July 22, 1123. Having received his education under his uncle the Bishop of Salisbury, and been accustomed to a splendid way of living, he affected show and state, more than was suitable to his character, or consistent with his fortunes. This failing excepted, he was a man of worth and honour, and every way qualified for his station [A]. The year after his consecration,

[A] He affected splendor more than was consistent with his character or fortunes. This failing excepted, he was a man of worth and honour, and every way qualified for his station. Henry of Huntingdon, who dedicated his history to Bishop Alexander, calls him, in the preface, Florem & cacumen regni & gentis, The flower and top of the kingdom and nation. The same author has preserved the following flattering verses on this Bishop.

Splendor Alexandri non tam renitefcit honore,
Quam per eum renitefcit honor; flos namque virorum,
Dando tenere putans, thesauros cogit honoris;
Et gratis dare festinans, ne danda rogentur,
Quod nondum dederit, nondum se credit habere.
O Decus, O morum directio, quo veniente,
Certa fides, hilaris clementia, cauta potestas,
Lene jugum, doctrina placens, correctio dulcis,
Libertatque decens venere, pudorque facetus.
Lincolniæ gens magna prius, nunc maxima semper;
Talis & ille diu sit nobis tutor honoris (1).

Which may be thus rendered into English:

*Honour, which us'd to dignify a name,
Is dignify'd by Alexander's fame.
In bounty rich, in using riches wise,
His treasure only in bestowing lies.
His charity prevents the suppliant's moan;
Nor ought, but what he gives, he calls his own.
O Glory, and exemplar of the state!
On thee the Graces and the Virtues wait;
Unerring faith, and chearful clemency,
With cautious pow'r, and decent liberty;
The yoke ungalling, and correction sweet,
Doctrine that ever charms, and modest wit.
Lincoln, thy envied glories higher rise,
And Alexander lifts thee to the skies.
Late may he lay in dust his honour'd head,

consecration, his cathedral church at Lincoln having been accidentally burnt down, he re-built it, and secured it against the like accident for the future by a stone roof (b). This prelate increased the number of Prebends in his church, and augmented it's revenues with several manours and estates. In imitation of the Barons and some of the Bishops, particularly his uncle the Bishop of Salisbury, he built three castles; one at Banbury, another at Sleaford, and a third at Newark. He likewise founded two monasteries; one at Haverholm, for regular Canons and Nuns together, the other at Tame for White-Fryars (c). When King Stephen resolved to take the castles from the Barons [B]; that of Newark held out against the King's officers, but was forced at last to surrender. As for the Bishop himself, after seven months imprisonment, and being kept to very slender diet, he with difficulty obtained his liberty (d). From that time he applied himself to the governing and ornamenting his church, which he rendered the most stately and flourishing of any in England. He went twice to Rome, in the years 1142 and 1144. The first time, he came back in quality of the Pope's Legate, for the calling a Synod, in which he published several wholesome and necessary canons. In August, 1147; he took a third journey to the Pope, who was then in France; where he fell sick through the excessive heat of the weather, and returning with great difficulty to England, he died in the twenty-fourth year of his prelatey (e). About a year before his death, he received a letter from the famous St Bernard [C], who seems to have been pretty well acquainted with his temper and character.

I call these verses flattering; because, as an historian, Huntington seems to have drawn a more faithful picture of this Prelate, acknowledging his virtues, and not dissembling his faults: for thus he described him after his death. 'Nutritus in summis deliciis à Rogero avunculo suo Salisberiensis episcopo, majores inde animos contraxit quam opportunum esset suis. Siquidem præterire volens principes cæteros largitione munerum & splendore procuratorum, cum proprii reditus ad hoc non sufficere possent, à suis summo studio carpebat, unde egestatem suam nimietate prædicta comparatam complere possit; nec tamen complere poterat, qui semper magis magnificentie dispersebat. Fuit autem vir prudens, & adeo munificus, ut à curia Romana vocaretur magnificus (2). — Having been educated in luxury and pleasure under his uncle Roger, Bishop of Salisbury, he entertained higher thoughts than were suitable to his rank and fortunes: for, vying with the nobles in liberality and splendor, and his income not being sufficient to support his expences, he was forced to rack his tenants, for money to supply his wants occasioned by his prodigality; which yet he could not fully supply, inasmuch as his profuseness continued daily to increase. However he was a prudent man, and so bountiful, that he was styled by the court of Rome the Magnificent.'

[B] King Stephen resolved to take the castles from the Barons.] As a comment on these words, we shall transcribe a short account of this matter from one of our historians. 'Stephen, having now gotten a little respite from his enemies, began to consult with himself how he might ease himself of such troublesome contents with his subjects; and because he now found, that the castles he had permitted his nobility to build, were the greatest impediments of his peace at home, and the readiest harbour of rebels, he resolved to forbid, that any should be built hereafter, and demolished some of the most dangerous lately erected; and to this end called a great council at Oxford. Here some of his lords, who much envied the magnificent and stately castles erected by the clergy (whose buildings both in number and strength much exceeded those of the nobility) but especially the Bishop of Salisbury, who had built several great castles at Salisbury, the Devizes, Sherburn, Malmesbury, and (3) Newark; whispered into the King's ears, who was very jealous and suspicious of such designs, That these fortresses were intended for the reception of the Emperor Maud and her party: and by their surmises so wrought upon the King's fears, that he sent for the Bishop of Salisbury to Oxford. The Bishop, foreseeing the danger impending, would have excused himself from his attendance upon the King, by reason of his great age; but that plea would not be allowed, he must go. The Bishop therefore taking with him his nephews Alexander Bishop of Lincoln, and Nigell Bishop of Ely, with a retinue of well-armed men, went to Oxford; where at his first coming, his servants going to take them up lodgings, happened into a quarrel with the servants of the Earl of Britain, and killed one of them in the fray, the nephew of the Earl being dangerously wounded. This being brought to the King's ears, he calls for the Bishop, and demands satisfaction for the breach of peace made by his servants in his court, which was this, that he should immediately yield up the keys of all his castles to him, as pledges of his fidelity. The Bishop refused to do it; whereupon he commanded the Bishops of Salisbury and Lincoln to be seized upon, and kept under a guard. The Bishop of Ely had made his escape, and got into the castle of the Devizes. The King presently took into his hands by force the castles of Salisbury, Sherburn, and Malmesbury; and after three days assault, that of the Devizes was surrendered to him, whither he sent the two Bishops prisoners, and seized the Bishop of Salisbury's treasure, which amounted to forty thousand marks (4).'

[C] He received a letter from the famous St Bernard.] Among other things, St Bernard, in his letter, cautions him not to be dazzled with the lustre of secular grandeur, nor to look upon any worldly advantage as permanent; nor value his fortune more than himself: to guard against the flattery of prosperity, for fear of a turn of misfortune which will last longer: not to be charmed with the transient satisfactions of life; for that scene will quickly be shut up, and make way for another both lasting and uncomfortable. He advises him not to deceive himself with any distant prospect of death: for such delusive hopes lead directly to danger and surprize, and are the likeliest way to hurry a man into the other world without preparation (5).

ALEXANDER NEQUAM, or NECKHAM. See NECKHAM.

ALEXANDER (WILLIAM) an eminent nobleman, statesman, and poet of Scotland, in the reigns of King James, and King Charles I. His surname is said by the historians of his own country, to have been taken from the proper name of his predecessor Alexander Macdonald; who holding, under the family of Argyle, the lands of Menstrie, this became the place of his residence. Andrew Alexander, in the reign of James V, is observed to be the first who is mentioned in the records of Scotland. He, by Catherine Graham his wife, had Alexander his son and heir; who obtained a grant from Archibald, master of Argyle, of the said lands of Menstrie, to himself and Elizabeth Douglas his wife, in life-rent, and to Andrew Alexander their son, in fee, which which was ratified under the great seal in 1529; whose heir and successor, was this William Alexander (a). He was born in the year 1580, as we compute from an inscription quoted towards the end of this narrative. He soon appeared such a promising youth, that the beams of those bright endowments of nature, which shone out, and gilded his dawning years, made his friends desirous of improving them to the height of excellence, by a liberal education; and so much was he distinguished for both, that they recommended him, in the quality of a tutor, or rather companion, to the Earl of Argyll in his travels. After some time spent in foreign parts, he returned to Scotland, and betook himself a while, it seems, to a rural retirement. There he finished his poetical complaint, of the unsuccessful address he had made to his first mistress; which he intitled Aurora. For he had, before he went abroad; and three lustres were expired, as he expresses it himself (b), or was fifteen years of age, seen some rare beauty, who had smitten him so deeply, that neither the diversion of travel, nor the sight of so many fair foreigners, as he calls the river Loir to witness he had there met with, could remove his affection (*). Wherefore now, after his return, this courtship was revived, and he wrote above an hundred sonnets, &c. upon it; till matrimony disposing of her to another person, he also had recourse to the same, as a remedy to wean his passion for the former object. For he tells us, that the lady so unrelenting to him, had matched her morning to one in the evening of his age (c). That himself should now change the myrtle-tree for the laurel, and the bird of Venus for that of Juno (d). That he was at last bound to one, whereby he should escape bondage from all others. That the torch of Hymen had burnt out the darts of Cupid; and that he had thus spent the spring of his age, which now his summer must redeem (e). Now therefore it was that he removed to the court of King James VI, and lived there in the capacity only of a private gentleman (f), but with the character of a learned and accomplished one. He still found occasion to exercise his poetical talents, from the recommendation they made of him even to the King, who might be the readier to encourage those studies in another, which he had so publickly professed himself. Further notice of, and perhaps acquaintance with him, might be promoted by the situation of his abode; being so commodious for those sports, wherewith his majesty was wont, in his journies of pleasure, there to divert himself. But the poetry to which Mr Alexander now turned his pen, was that solid and sublime species of it, which would hold up the clearest mirror to Princes and Potentates; which would best animate the lifeless precepts of philosophy, and render it's gravest lessons most agreeably affecting; for the better government, not only of a people in general, but the passions and appetites of the governors themselves; by the most sovereign precedents, and harmonious precautions, of the uncertainty of life, and the insufficiency of it's felicities, the vanity of grandeur, the corruption of power, and burden of riches. To this purpose he formed himself, somewhat after the plan of the antient Greek and Roman tragedies, at least in their choruses between the acts; not so much to have his dramattick compositions personated in mimicry upon the narrow stage of a play-house, as to be really and more extensively acted in human life, by those who bore the parts of the greatest actors in the common theatre of mankind. And to this effect, we find a tragedy of Mr Alexander's published, upon the story of Darius, at Edinburgh, in 1603. The choice of his measure in this (as in his other plays) is alternate rhyme, which I leave the critics to defend (g) and decry (h); and as to his style, if it is not always pure, our author has modestly pleaded his country, and allowed the preference to our dialect, in the preface thereof. It was the year after, published again at London, with some verses before it in praise of the author, by J. Murray, and Walter Quin, who has here also an anagram upon the name of William Alexander, which has been reprinted elsewhere (i). But that preface is not here revived; and there are two poems of our author's at the end of this edition, which were never afterwards printed again; the one, congratulating his majesty upon his entry into England; the other, written shortly after, upon the inundation of Doven, a water near our author's house, upon which, his majesty was wont to recreate himself with the pastime of hawking. As it contains a fine compliment, we shall here subjoin the sense of it [A], and proceed to observe, that the same year this play was reprinted in England, was published here his Aurora, also in quarto, 1604; which, as it was the fruit of, he made an oblation to Beauty, by dedicating it to Agnes Douglas, Countess of Argyll. But these poems were never after reprinted, though bound up with the succeeding augmentation of his plays. In the same year last mentioned, his Parænesis to Prince Henry, was here also published; therefore how truly it's publication was deferred till after the death of that Prince, lies upon Mr Langbain to reconcile (k); in which, among other noble instructions, he shews, how the happiness of a Prince depends on his choice of a council; such, as can throw off private grudges, regard publick concerns, and will not, to betray their feats, become pensioners. Further shews, the use of [A] Subjoin the sense of it.] Intimating, as if those waters had forsaken their banks, upon his majesty's leaving the kingdom; and, in spreading over the plains, strove, by a licentious greatness, to recover respect; which served but to make the inhabitants more feelingly mourn their loss of such a ruler, as had kept all things among them in bounds and regularity:

so that they, like the Antipodes, while he is shining day upon England, are beginning their night; which makes his Muse droop with sorrow: but, if his Phœbus would deign to shine upon her, she might raise her flight, to build amidst his rays. And so she did not long after, as may above appear.

histories, and how the lives of great men are to be read with greatest profit: lays open the characters of vicious Kings; those abandoned to avarice, to flattery, and, the most contemptible of all, to effeminacy and lust: displays the glories of martial accomplishments; and hopes, if the Prince should ever make an expedition to Spain, that he might attend him, and be his Homer to sing his acts there. Whether the author was yet arrived in England, does not appear, by any of these writings; and whether he published any more, separately, till the year 1607, we have not yet directly learnt. But in this year came out his three other plays, which with that beforementioned, are intitled, The Monarchick Tragedies; Cræsus, Darius, The Alexandrian, Julius Cæsar; newly enlarged (*). By William Alexander, Gentleman of the Prince's privy chamber: and with them are bound the poems aforesaid. These plays are dedicated to King James, in a poem of thirteen stanzas, and have a copy by Sir Robert Ayton before them, expressing, that the King himself had graced our author's labours with his glorious name; so that, patron, subject, style and all, make him the Monarchick Tragedian of our island. And though indeed those plays, for the reasons before given, must, to all royal readers of them, administer a kind of terrible pleasure; yet his majesty is said, not only to have been delighted with our author's conversation, but his works (l); and to have called him his Philosophical Poet. Inasmuch, that no stream appears to have more visibly wasted him to those honours wherewith he was a few years afterwards graced, than what thus flowed through his own hand, from the fountain of the Muses. We might be endless in giving instances of his fine sense out of these plays; but, to those who have not read him, a few may be here acceptable, and enough to shew his preference of Merit to Dignity; his grief that it is not made a guide in the choice of Favourites; his thoughts on the wretched condition of Ministers, with that of Kings themselves; and lastly, who is to be accounted the greatest Conqueror; as may be seen below [B]: and we shall refer to other topics, gathered out of him, in a collection from our old poets, lately published (m). Besides those authors beforementioned, others have celebrated these performances; as John Davis of Hereford, who, in a book of Epigrams, published about the year 1611, has one to Mr William Alexander of Menstrie, in praise of these tragedies (n), wherein, though a stranger to his person, he thinks himself obliged in justice to applaud his writings; as having made himself thereby, a Sovereign even over Monarchs; and thinks, Alexander the Great had not gained more glory with his sword, than this Alexander has acquired by his pen. Michael Drayton calls him my Alexander, whose name he would ever have known to stand by his; yet attempts but to shew the friendship that was between them, not the merit of his numbers, which were brave and lofty, so like his mind was his muse (o). We are informed, that not long after, was first published, the supplement he wrote to complete the third part of Sir Philip Sidney's celebrated Romance; and that it is to be found in the true fourth, as well as the subsequent editions thereof, with the initial letters of his name (p); though Anthony Wood only mentions it in the eighth,

[B] May be seen below. And first, having spoken of hereditary honours, and the borrowed feathers of titles, that fall by succession, and not by desert; and having shown his scorn, to beg his worth from dead mens names, or gain credit only by his coat, he proceeds thus, upon

MERIT.

What comfort's this, to have the highest seat,
And all the blis that majesty imparts;
If those, whom only we excel in state,
Be our superiors in far better parts?
More than a crown, true worth should be esteem'd;
One, fortune gives, the other is our own;
By which, the mind, from anguish is redeem'd;
When Fortune's goods, are by herself o'erthrown (1).

FAVOURITES.

O, more than happy ten times, were that King!
Who were unhappy but a little space,
So that it did not utter ruin bring,
But made him prove, a profitable thing!
Who, of his train, did best deserve his grace;
Then cou'd, and wou'd, of those, the best embrace:
Such vultures fled, as follow but for prey,
That faithful servants might possess their place:
All gallant minds, it must with anguish sting,
While wanting means their virtue to display.
This is the grief, which bursts a gen'rous heart;
When favour comes by chance, not by desert (2).

MINISTERS.

Although we cou'd, to quit our state, consent,
Us, from suspicion, nought but death could purge:
Still greatness must turmoil, or else torment;
If borne, a burden; if laid down, a scourge (3).

KINGS.

And while they live, we see their glorious actions,
Oft wrested to the worst; and all their life
Is but a stage of endless toil and strife;
Of tumults, uproars, mutinies, and factions.
They rise with fear, and lie with danger down;
Huge are the cares that wait upon a crown (4)!

(4) Darius, Act v, in chorus.

THE CONQUEROR.

O! what a great indignity is this?
To see a conqueror to his lust a slave!
Who wou'd the title of true worth were his,
Must vanquish vice, and no base thoughts conceive:
The bravest trophy ever man obtain'd,
Is that, which o'er himself, himself hath gain'd (5).

(5) Ibid. Act. iii.

Then let us live, since all things change below,
When rais'd most high, as those who once may fall;
And hold, when by disasters brought more low,
The mind still free, whatever else be thrall:
Those, Lords of fortune, sweeten ev'ry state,
Who can command themselves, though not their fate (6).

(6) Jul. Cæsar, p. ult.

as perhaps having only that at hand, when he made this remark (g): an exercise for his Muse, still in a kind of poetry, though not in verse. In the month of July, 1613, the same year that supplement was printed, we find Mr Alexander mentioned, to have been sworn one of the Gentlemen Ushers of the Presence to Prince Charles (†). But now his Muse laboured with a more solemn birth than any of her tragick productions, and brought forth a fruit unusual to the soil of courts, which gave him the title of a Divine Poet; being a sacred poem, as large as all his others, called Dooms-Day; or, the Great Day of the Lord's Judgment. It was printed at Edinburgh in quarto, 1614, and afterwards in the folio edition of his works; also again by itself, in a quarto edition at London (p). It is divided into twelve hours, as the author calls them, or books; and the first book was, a few years since, reprinted in octavo, with intention to give us the remainder of his poetical writings in a correct edition. The editor, A. Johnson, tells us, that having communicated the author's whole works to Mr Addison, for his perusal; he said, in approbation of them, That he had read them over with the greatest satisfaction; and gave it as his judgment, 'That the beauties in our antient English poets, are too slightly passed over by the modern writers; who, out of a peculiar singularity, had rather take pains to find fault, than endeavour to excel (s).' In the year abovementioned, the King, looking on him as a wise man, made him Master of the Requests, and conferred upon him the honour of knighthood (t). And now begins the other part of his character; the man of business, title, and great undertaking; for little more of the Poet appears, except that two years after, came forth a new edition of his plays, in a pocket volume (u). Thus, as it is hard to reside long in courts, without imbibing some of the tincture which prevails there, our Philosophical, our Divine Poet, seems, upon these promotions, to have turned Politician! and instead of enlarging his flowery acquisitions on the banks of Parnassus, grew ambitious of spacious dominions in Terra Firma; having projected the settlement of a large colony, and making great plantations at Nova Scotia in America, at his own expence, and that of such adventurers as should be engaged in the undertaking. His Majesty made him a grant of that country by his royal deed, on the twenty-first of September, 1621 (x), and did intend to erect an order of Baronets, for encouraging and supporting so grand a work; but, to the jealousies which began to disturb the two or three last years of his reign, the suspension thereof is ascribed, till a more favourable conjuncture of affairs should offer; which that King did not live to see. But his son, King Charles I, on his coming to the crown, was very forward to countenance and prosecute the same; which, as it was schemed or painted out, especially in the pamphlet which Sir William himself published, to encourage adventurers, promised mighty advantages to the nation. This pamphlet he now set forth, is intitled, An Encouragement to Colonies; quarto, London, 1625, and the same was published again with an additional title, or another on the same subject, five years after (y). The King was won by these representations, that he made Sir William Alexander Lieutenant of New Scotland, and founded, in the said first year of his reign, the order of Knights Baronet in Scotland, whose aid was appropriated for the said plantation and settlement, upon the consideration of each having a liberal portion of land allotted him there. The number of these Baronets were not to exceed one hundred and fifty; and they were endowed with ample privileges, pre-eminence, &c. as that, the title should be heritable, and they take place before all Knights, called Equites Aurati; all lesser Barons, commonly called Lairds; and before all other gentlemen, except Sir William Alexander, his Majesty's Lieutenant of Nova Scotia; who (with his heirs, their wives and children) is not only excepted, in each of their letters patents, granted to the Knights his companions; but likewise the charter granted to himself by the King, in the year aforesaid, did bear expressly this exception and provision. Further, that they should have place in all his Majesty's and his successors armies, near and about the royal standard, for the defence thereof; with other honourable distinctions of title and precedency, to them, their wives, and heirs. But none of them to be created Baronets, either of Scotland, or Nova Scotia, till he had first fulfilled the conditions designed by his Majesty, for the good and increase of that plantation; and till he had confirmed the same to the King, by his Majesty's Lieutenant there. These patents were ratified in parliament, and registered in the books of Lyon, King of Arms, and the Heralds: but after Sir William sold Nova Scotia to the French, they were drawn up shorter, and granted in general terms, with all the privileges, &c. of former Baronets; and it is now become an honourable title in Scotland, conferred at the King's pleasure, without limitation of numbers. For a fuller view of the first form of these patents, with the armorial ensigns granted to the order, and the badge thereof, which they wore about their necks in an orange coloured ribbon; as also of the arms, supporters, and motto, of Sir W. Alexander himself, we refer to the volumes containing the same (z). He had now further given him, a peculiar privilege of coining small copper money; a grant which was inveighed against, even at that time with great bitterness (a); and indeed the whole enterprize, at least as to Sir William's aims and ends, has had but an ill-favoured representation made of it, by some of his own countrymen, and especially in a Work, otherwise designed to honour both them and him [C]. But such like reflections are the usual

[C] A work, otherwise designed to honour both them and him.] For, not to mention here, the private schemes and proposals of the author, Sir Thomas Urquhart, being a prisoner of war; for restoring him to his usual attendants upon great attempts, when they are not brought to successful conclusions. The King however continued his encouragements to Sir William; and being fully satisfied of his abilities and fidelity, was pleased in the year 1626, to make him Secretary of State for Scotland (b), in the place of the Earl of Hadding-toun; and afterwards, in September 1630, a Peer of that kingdom, by the title of Viscount Stirline (c); and in this quality, he had the compliments paid him of his countryman, Dr Arthur Jonston, the King's physician, a noted Latin poet, in an epigram, turning much upon the sense of that beforementioned; and also in a panegyric epistle, too long to be here recited (d). In less than three years after this, the King advanced him to the honour of Earl of Stirline, by his letters patent bearing date the fourteenth of June, 1633, at the solemnity of his Majesty's coronation, in the palace of Holyrood house. His lordship discharged that office of Secretary of State, with universal reputation near fifteen years, even to the time of his death; which happened on the twelfth of February, 1640 (e); having, three years before, permitted a new edition of his poetical works, or the greatest part of them, to be published: that is to say, 1. The Four Monarchick Tragedies. 2. Doomsday; before which there are some verses by William Drummond; as in Drummond's book of poems, there are also others to, and by our author (f). 3. The Parenesis, to Prince Henry. 4. and lastly, Jonathan; an Heroick Poem intended, the first book: which was now, I think, first published. These three poems are written in the Ottavo Rima of Tasso; or, as his friend Drayton describes it, A stanza of eight lines; six interwoven, and a couplet in base (g). The author's style and versification are much polished in this edition, especially of the plays; and the plans, with the subject matter, improved in some of them. The whole is fronted with a new title (b), and the dedication aforesaid, to King James, prefixed; which if Langbain had observed more than he did the date of the book, he had not said it was addressed to King Charles (i). Before one copy of this edition, a good effigies of the author has been found, though missing in many. It was engraved by W. Marshall; and is one of his best performances. It represents his lordship in a close-bodied coat; a full ruff about his neck, and the badge of his new-created order hanging at his breast. Liveliness and gravity are well tempered in his countenance: his hair is short, and well curled; and his beard tapering gradually to a point, according to the fashion of the times. The oval frame is encompassed with two olive branches; and the inscription in it, is, Vera Effigies Gulielmi Comitiss de Sterlin. Etatis sue 57. So that, he was threescore years of age at the time of his death, three years after the said publication his liberty and estate at Cromarty; nor other strange singularities in the said work; it contains chiefly, the praises of such Scotmen who had been famous in arms and arts, since the year 1600: Therefore a kind of continuation of Dempster, how little soever thereof appears in the title (7). Herein, having mentioned Sir William Alexander (afterwards created Earl of Stirline) with applause; as the first, who of late, had been famous for English poetry, and named some of his works; he yet goes on thus (8): 'The purity of this gentleman's vein was quite spoiled by the corruptness of his courtiership, and so much the greater pity; for, by all appearance, had he been contented with that mediocrity of fortune he was born to, and not aspired to those grandures of the court, which could not without pride be prosecuted, nor maintained without covetousness; he might have made a far better account of himself. It did not satisfy his ambition to have a laurel from the Muses, and be esteemed a King among Poets, but he must be King of some new-found-land; and, like another Alexander indeed, searching after new worlds, have the sovereignty of Nova Scotia! He was born a Poet, and aimed to be a King; therefore would he have his royal title from King James, who was born a King, and aimed to be a Poet. Had he stopped there, it had been well; but the flame of his honour must have some oyl wherewith to nourish it: like another King Arthur, he must have his knights, though nothing limited to so small a number! For how many soever, who could have looked out but for one day, like gentlemen, and given him but one hundred and fifty pounds sterling, (without any need of a key for opening the gate to enter through the temple of virtue, which, in former times, was the only way to honour) they had a scale from him, whereby to ascend unto the platforms of virtue; which they, treading under feet, did slight the ordinary passages; and, to take the more sudden possession of the temple of honour, went upon obscure by-paths of their own, towards some secret angiports and dark postern-doors, which were so narrow, that few of them could get in, until they had left all their gallantry behind them: Yet, such being their resolution, that in they would, and be worshipful upon any terms; they misregarded all formerly-used steps of promotion, accounting them but unnecessary; and most rudely rushing in unto the very sanctuary, they immediately hung out the orange colours, to testify their conquest of the honour of Knight Baronet. Their King nevertheless, not to stain his royal dignity, or to seem to merit the imputation of selling honour to his subjects, did, for their money, give them land, and that in so ample a measure, that every one of his Knight Baronets had, for his hundred and fifty pounds sterling, heritably disposed unto him, six thousand good and sufficient acres of Nova Scotia ground; which, being but at the rate of six-pence an acre, could not be thought very dear; considering how prettily, in the respective parchments of disposition, they were bounded and designed; fruitful corn-lands, watered with pleasant rivers, running along most excellent and spacious meadows; nor did there want abundance of oaken groves, in the midst of very fertile plains (for if they wanted any thing, it was the scrivener, or writer's fault; for he gave orders, as soon as he received the three thousand Scots marks, that there should be no defect of quantity, or quality, in measure, or goodness of land) and here and there most delicious gardens and orchards; with whatever else, could in matter of delightful ground, best content their fancies; as if they had made purchase among them of the Elysian-fields, or Mahummed's paradise. After this manner, my Lord Stirline, for a while, was very noble; and, according to the rate of sterling money, was as twelve other Lords, in the matter of that frankness of disposition, which not permitting him to dodge it upon inches and ells, better and worse, made him not stand to give to each of his champions, territories of the best, and the most; and although there should have happened a thousand acres more to be put in the charter, or writing of disposition, than was agreed upon at first, he cared not; half a piece to the clerk, was able to make him dispense with that. But at last, when he had enrolled some two or three hundred knights; who, for their hundred and fifty pieces each, had purchased amongst them, several millions of Neocalcedonian acres, confirmed to them and theirs for ever, under the great seal; the affixing whereof, was to cost each of them but

tion of his plays and this print, as is abovementioned. We have before referred to a criticism made on these plays; how judiciously, an ordinary critick may perceive [D]. But here the issue of his brain, gives us an easy transition to that of his body. He left by his wife Janet, the daughter and heir of Sir W. Erskine, 1. William Lord Alexander, his eldest son; who dying his Majesty's Resident in Nova Scotia, during the life-time of his father, his son William succeeded his grandfather in the earldom, but died about a month after him. 2. Henry Alexander, Esq; afterwards Earl of Stirling. This is the son, who, according to two authorities here followed (k), married a daughter of Sir Peter Vanlore, Alderman of London; and had a son, from whom the present Earl is descended. 3. Sir Anthony; but this is the son, who, according to the order of descent, married, if we adhere to another, not the daughter, but the granddaughter of that Vanlore, and not Vanlore, as his name in the said account is erroneously spelt; which account is underneath transcribed [E]. 4. John: and two daughters; the Lady Margaret, and Lady Mary; both married, and the latter had issue.

‘ thirty pieces more; finding that the society was not like to become any more numerous, and that the ancient gentry of Scotland esteemed of such a whimsical dignity as of a disparagement, rather than addition to their former honour; he bethought himself of a course more profitable for himself, and the future establishment of his own state; in prosecuting whereof, without the advice of his knights, (who represented both his houses of parliament, clergy and all) like an absolute King indeed, disposed heritably to the French, for a matter of five or six thousand pounds English money, both the dominion and propriety of the whole continent of that kingdom of Nova Scotia; leaving the new Baronets to search for land amongst the Selenites in the Moon, or turn Knights of the Sun; so dearly have they bought their Orange Ribband, which (all circumstances considered) is, and will be no more honourable to them, or their posterity, than it is, or hath been profitable to either.’

[D] A criticism made on these plays; how judiciously, &c. As it is sufficiently censured in Mr Addison's judgment of them beforementioned, we shall only point out a few mistakes of this critick, said to be Mr Charles Gildon, who published a sort of epitome and continuation of Langbain, before cited. One of his mistakes is, the intention of our author; who never designed to creep after any model of the antients, as to unities of action, or other rules of the drama. He calculated them not for the amusement of spectators, or to be theatrically acted, so much as for readers of the highest rank; who, by the wisest counsels and cautions that could be drawn from the greatest examples, of the ill effects of misgovernment, and confident reliance upon human grandure, might be taught to amend their own practices, to moderate their own passions and their power over all in subjection to them: and if they have but this end with such readers; to term them historical dialogues, or any thing else, can be no discredit to them, from any others. He owns my Lord is a very good historian; and his Lordship has enough in his own writings to prove himself a better poet than many whom this critick has more extolled. We shall offer but another of his mistakes; and that's an egregious one: for having told us, my Lord seems often to have a peculiar fancy to punning; he cannot give two instances of it, without owning he has wronged my Lord in the reader's judgment; because it was the vice of the age, and these punning fits come not often upon him (9). There's a critick for ye! But, to return his own words, enough of these ridiculous quotations.

[E] Which account is underneath transcribed. From a letter written to the Lord Deputy of Ireland, afterwards Earl of Strafford, by G. Garrard, afterwards master of the Charterhouse, and dated December 16, 1637, wherein these are his words. ‘ A grandchild of Vanlove's, rich Vanlove, was to be married to a son of Sir Thomas Read's; he who lay some years in the Fleet, and spent but eighteen-pence a week: he lives now at Brocket-Hall near Hatfield. Read hath estates upon this second son of his, 1500 l. a year, and the match was intended with Mrs Vanlove, who had a portion of 4000 l. and 400 l. a year, after the death of her father, young Peter. Monday the 11th of this month, they were to be married. The day before, in the afternoon, she sends to speak with one Mr Alexander, a third son of the Earl of Sterling, Secretary of Scotland here; he comes, finds her at cards, Mr Read sitting by her; she whispers him in the ear, asking him if he had a coach (he was of her acquaintance before) he said, yes: she desired Mr Read to play her game, and went to her chamber, Mr Alexander going along with her. Being there, she told him, that to satisfy her friends, she had given way to marry the gentleman he saw, but her affection was more to him; if his was so to her, she would instantly go away with him in his coach, and be married. So he carried her to Greenwich, where they were married by six that evening (10).’ G

ALEYN (CHARLES) an elegant historical Poet, in the reign of King Charles I; whose works, though written above an hundred years since, do still, as they did, when a certain author wrote of them (a), live in fame and reputation [A]. He received his education in Sidney-college Cambridge; and afterwards settling in London, was entertained in the quality of an usher, by Thomas Farnaby, the famous Grammarian and Commentator, at his great school in Goldsmith's Rents, near Redcross-street, in the parish of St Giles's Cripplegate (b). In the former part of King Charles the First's reign, he exercised his genius upon a very heroical and renowned subject; the two most glorious victories obtained by the English in France, under the auspicious banners of King Edward III, and his martial son, the Black Prince; which, at the instance of some noble favourers, he published in two poems, anno 1631 [B]. After he left Mr Farnaby's school

[A] Do still live in fame and reputation. For we have lately had several of his select thoughts revived, in a good collection drawn out, by way of common place, from many ingenious poets who flourished in the two last centuries (1). By which revival it appears, as well as from many other parts of his poems themselves, not extracted into the said work, that the author really is, according to the general character which has been given of him, very pithy and sententious (2).

[B] He published in two poems, anno 1631. But finding encouragement to make many improvements and enlargements thereof, he published the second edition of those poems, by the title of The Battailles of Crescey and Poitiers, under the fortunes and valour of King Edward the third of that name, and his sonne Edward, Prince of Wales, named the Black. By Charles Aleyn. Printed by Thomas Harper, &c. 8vo. 1633. Both poems are written in stanzas of six lines; four alternate, with a distich in base, and comprized in an hundred and twenty-five pages. They are dedicated by the author, To the honourable, and truly generous the Lord of Colerane; to whose munificence the publick seems obliged for this edition, by that expression of the author's to him, wherein he says, This piece stands an humble tabernacle, sacred to honour; and shall in this be advantaged, that it must be entred by the temple in Cripplegate, he was recommended into the family of Edward Sherburne, Esq; Clerk of the Ordnance, who lived in that neighbourhood, to be domestick tutor to his son, afterwards Sir Edward Sherburne (c), who succeeded his father in the office of Ordnance; and was Commissary-General of the artillery to King Charles, at the battle of Edgehill, &c. and likewise of note for some poetical performances of his own. How long our author continued in this situation we know not, before his Muse brought forth another elaborate poem, in honour of King Henry VII, and that important battle, which gained him the crown of England. This work was published, with some commendatory poems before it (as the other had been) in the year 1638 [C]; and by the judicious deliberation he took

'temple of your virtue.' There are five copies of verses prefixed, in praise of him and his work; by Thomas May, John Hall, John Lewis, Gilb. W. and Henry Blount. The first is written in Latin, and shews how much of his glory King Edward owes to Charles Aleyn. The second commends his justice and truth; and tells him, his art shall teach succeeding ages how to write. The third wishes his hopes may not live, if he can judge which is more rare, the acts of those brave heroes, or his expression of them. The fourth says, that men trained in war, scarce know which has acted best, the sword or pen; that the author writes so clearly, that he who reads the book, shall see the battles; and that he paints the wounds, groans, and death of the enemy, in such strong colours, as would make a coward faint to read them. And the last, having told him that his Bayes, and Edward's sword, mutually advance each other; says, that his readers will best praise his battles, with fearful tremblings, and their hair on end. After these encomiums, we may be expected to shew out of the author's own performance, as far as a little taste at least will do it, how far he has deserved them; and the rather, because his poems are grown more scarce than they deserve to be. In the first place then, see how the brave Black Prince spirits up his army at the battle of Crefsy.

Couragious Edward spurs their valour on,
And cheers his sprightly soldiers: where he came,
His breath did kindle valour, where was none;
And where it found a spark, it made a flame.
Armies of fearful Harts will scorn to yield,
If Lions be their Captains in the field (3).

(3) Battle of Crefsey, p. 35.

Then in the engagement, see how, by his showers of arrows, the enemies drop, like ripe grapes by a storm of hail.

As when the colder region of the air
Moulds rain to hail-shot, the relenting tree
Of the plump god, lusty before, and fair,
Lofeth her rubies with heaven's battery;
Thus fell the foe: for shoot, tho' in the dark,
'Tis hard to miss, when the whole field's a mark (4).

(4) Id. p. 42.

But after the engagement, see what pitiful spectacles the French were;

Here a hand sever'd, there an ear was cropp'd;
Here a chap fal'n, and there an eye put out;
Here was an arm lopp'd off, there a nose dropp'd;
Here half a man, and there a less piece fought:
Like to dismember'd statues they did stand,
Which had been mangled by time's iron hand (5).

(5) Id. p. 50.

And then, what a condition the English pikes and lances were in.

The artificial wood of spears was wet
With yet warm blood; and trembling in the wind,
Did rattle like the thorns which nature set
On the rough hide of an arm'd porcupine:
Or looked like the trees which dropped gore,
Pluck'd from the tomb of slaughter'd Polydore (6).

(6) Id. p. 49.

Out of his second poem, on the battle of Poitiers, we shall only offer this touch upon the Black Prince.

And now my fancy sees great Edward rise, Mars his Enthusiast: his actions were Raptures of valour, and deep extacies
Of man above himself; for drawing here;
His spirits from their matter, passed more
Himself, than he surpass'd the world before.

He, on the stage of Aquitaine, did play
That part, which none beside can personate:
In ev'ry course, or found, or made a way,
And prostrates, as infallible as fate.
Like to death's harbinger his passage made;
And there death lodged, where he lodg'd his blade (7).

(7) Battle of Poitiers, p. 31.

In these two poems, it may be here further observed, that a man of copious reading might easily point out many fine sentiments, which the author has happily translated, both from the antients and moderns. And not only from some Latin poets, but even from some of our most celebrated English authors in prose; if that may be called prose in them, which passes for poetry, as turned by him into rhyme and measure. For Mons. Dacier would dispute it; and argue, that a poem transposed, would still be poetry; and that a true piece of prose, will still continue such, through all the disguise of versification: for that, it is the thought, and not the structure of the words, which makes it one or the other (8). Which may be more true, in the general story of a poem, or some select, than in every single sentiment. For there are few poems so continually upon the stretch of metaphors, hyperboles, and the language of the gods, as not to descend in some parts, to the diction of meer mortal men. Thus that pathetic apostrophe to Death itself, in Sir Walter Raleigh's History of the World (9), has been quoted and admired as one of the finest pieces of prose upon that subject, in any antient or modern author (10); yet those words, transplanted into a dramatic poem, have been applauded on the theatre, as fine poetry (11). Thus that beautiful assemblage of ideas, accounting for the fears of death, in one of Nat. Lee's tragedies (12), has been prescribed as a good poetical preservative against those fears, by a critical writer just before quoted (13); and yet, when Sir Francis Bacon first wrote those very words, he never dreamt of writing poetry; nor have they been taken ever since, as they stand in his book, for any other than good prose (14). And thus might we produce, but that it may be thought too tedious or minute, half a dozen, if not half a score distichs from this last poem of our author, Charles Aleyn's, the Battle of Poitiers, which are visibly verified from Lord Bacon's prose, chiefly in his book before-mentioned. Not but our poet has many elegant thoughts and sentences of his own; so that it appears the foreign helps to invention, which he, as other able poets, made use of, proceeded rather from the want of industry, to cultivate his own cogitations, and reap in the fruits of his own harvest, than any sterility in the field of his fancy. All we shall here further observe of these two poems is, from a Manuscript Continuation of them; containing the reigns of Richard II, Henry IV, and Henry V (15), which has been before cited and made use of in another work (16). This learned author, whoever he was, says, in the entrance of those poems, that he forbears to recount the glories of King Edward the Third's reign, Crefsy and Poitiers, because they were already drawn by a happy pen.

[C] This work was published, &c. in the year 1638] Under the following title; The Historie of that wise and fortunate Prince, Henrie, of that name the seventh, King of England. With that famed battaile, fought between the said King Henrie, and Richard III, named Crook-back, upon Redmore, near Bosworth. In a poem by Charles Aleyn, 8vo. printed for Thomas Cotes. This poem, in his publications, we may not expect to meet with much more of his labours, though something more of his in print does appear [D]; since we are informed he was so soon after called to his last rest: for it is said that he died about the year 1640; and that he was buried in the parish of St Andrew's Holbourn (d).

poem, as the others, is written in stanzas of six lines; and contains an hundred and fifty-six pages. It is licensed by Dr Thomas Wykes; who says in his Latin Imprimatur, that he has read over this historical poem, and judges it worthy of being made publick. Among the verses to this prefixed, there is one copy, to his ingenious friend, Mr Charles Aleyn, on his learned poem, by Edward Sherburne, his pupil beforementioned; in which he tells our author, that his words yield Henry more honour than did his own weapons; and there is another poem or epigram by his friend Edward Prideaux; which, because short and shining, must here obtain a place.

When Fame had said thy Poem should come out Without a Dedication; some did doubt
If Fame in that had told the truth; but I,
Who knew her false, boldly gave Fame the lye:
For I was certain, that this Book, by thee,
Was dedicated to Eternity.

As this poem is longer than the other two, it is fuller fraught with variety of matter, actions, and characters; and also richly adorned with many flowers of rhetoric; allusions; historical, poetical, and philosophical; and many general and comprehensive maxims, moral and political: so that it is animating or instructive in most parts; and as for versification, it may vie in elegance with several contemporary performances, which have happened to acquire greater fame. If his cadence is not always smooth, 'tis generally to make way for something that is nervous and masculine; which was more regarded by the poets in that age; and before our modern refiners sacrificed strength to softness, and sense to meer sound. Many quotations having been made from this work, we shall content ourselves here with one stanza, of several he has written upon Empson and Dudley, those two voracious instruments of Henry's avarice, as a short specimen of his genius in this poem: and what may casually incite the curiosity of some ingenious reader, knowing in our English history, to peruse and consider the poem itself, and those beforementioned, with intention, if they shall be found deserving it, of reviving them together, with some good historical illustrations.

And as the lower orbs are wheel'd about,
Rapt by the motion of the orb above:
So were inferior agents soon found out,
Which mov'd and turn'd, when He began to move:
For 'tis observ'd; that Princes sooner get Men for their humour, than their honour fit (17).

[D] Something more of his in print does appear. Besides those three poems, there are in print some little copies of commendatory verses ascribed to him, before the works of other writers, especially some noted dramatic poets of his time; and particularly, before the earliest editions of some of Beaumont and Fletcher's plays. And there was published, The History of Eurialus and Lucretia, by Charles Aleyn, the year before (18) that, in which he is reported as above to have died. It is a translation; and the story is to be found among the Latin epistles of Æneas Sylvius. G

A L L A M (A N D R E W) a writer in the XVIIth century, was the son of Andrew Allam, a person of mean rank, and born at Garfington near Oxford, in April 1655. He had his education in Grammar learning at a private school, at Denton, in the parish of Cudeston, near his native place, under Mr William Wildgoose of Brazen-nose college, a noted schoolmaster of that time. He was entered a batteler of St Edmund's hall, in Easter term 1671. After he had taken his degrees in arts; he became a tutor, moderator, lecturer in the chapel, and at length vice-principal of his house. In 1680, about Whitfuntide, he entered into holy orders; and, in 1683, was made one of the masters of the schools. His works that are extant are: 1. The learned Preface or Epistle to the Reader, with a dedicatory Epistle in the printer's name, prefixed to The Epistle Congratulatory of Lyfmacbus Nicanor, &c. to the Covenanters of Scotland, &c. Oxon. 1684. 2. The Epistle containing an account of Dr Cofins's life, prefixed to the Doctor's book intitled, Ecclesiæ Anglicanæ Politeia in tabulas digesta. Oxon. 1684. fol. 3. The Preliminary Epistle, with a review and correction of the book intitled, Some plain Discourses on the Lord's Supper, &c. written by Dr George Griffith, Bishop of St Asaph. Oxon. 1684, 8vo. 4. Additions and Corrections to a book intitled, Angliæ Notitia, or The present State of England [A]. 5. Additions to Helvicus's Historical and Chronological Theatre [B]. Mr Allam laid the foundation of a work intitled, Notitia Ecclesiæ Anglicanæ, or an History of the Cathedral Churches, &c. of England. But death prevented his completing this design. 6. He likewise translated the Life of Iphicrates, printed in the English version of that author by several gentlemen of Oxford. Oxon. 1684, 8vo. 7. Lastly, He assisted Mr Anthony Wood in compiling his elaborate work of the Athenæ Oxonienses, or History of the Oxford Writers; and is mentioned by that author with great commendation and respect

[A] Additions and corrections to a book intitled, Angliæ Notitia, &c. They appeared in the edition of that book, printed at London in 1684. But the author of the Notitia never thought fit to acknowledge the assistance he had received from Mr Allam (1).

[B] Additions to Helvicus's Historical and Chronological Theatre. He intended to have finished a supplement to that work, from 1660 to 1683, but was prevented by death. His additions, as far as they went, were printed with that author at London 1687, fol. But whereas there was a column in the edition of 1687, intended to contain the names of the most famous Jesuits, from the foundation of the order to the year 1685, this (Mr Wood tells us) was not done by Mr Allam; nor that passage under 1678, which runs thus; Titus Oates discovers a pretended Popish plot (2).

respect [C]. He died of the small-pox, the 17th of June 1685, and was buried in the church of St Peter in the East at Oxford (a).

[C] He assisted Mr Anthony Wood, --- who speaks of him with great commendation and respect. He was a person (says that author) of eminent virtues, was sober, temperate, moderate, and modest even to example. He understood the controversial writings between Conformists and Nonconformists, Protestants and Papists, far beyond his years, which was advanced by a great and happy memory. And I am persuaded, had he not been taken off by the said offices (namely those of tutor, moderator, &c.) he would have gone beyond all of his time and age in those matters. He understood the world of men well, authors better; and nothing but years and experience were wanting, to make him a compleat walking library (3). T (3) Id. ib.

A L L E N (JOHN) Archbishop of Dublin, in the reign of King Henry VIII, was educated in the university of Oxford; from whence removing to Cambridge, he there took the degree of Bachelor of Laws (a). He was sent by Dr Warham, Archbishop of Canterbury, to the Pope, about certain matters relating to the Church. He continued at Rome nine years, and was created Doctor of Laws, either there, or in some other university of Italy. After his return, he was appointed Chaplain to Cardinal Wolsey, and was commissary or judge of his court as Legate à latere; in the execution of which office he was suspected of great dishonesty, and even perjury. He assisted the Cardinal in visiting, and afterwards suppressing, forty of the smaller monasteries, for the erection of his college at Oxford, and that at Ipswich. The Cardinal procured for him the living of Dalby in Leicestershire, though it belonged to the master and brethren of the hospital of Burton Lazars. About the latter end of the year 1525, he was incorporated Doctor of Laws in the University of Oxford. On the 13th of March 1528, he was consecrated Archbishop of Dublin, in the room of Dr Hugh Inge deceased; and about the same time was made Chancellor of Ireland. He wrote; 1. Epistola de Pallii significatione activa & passiva; penned by him at the time when he received the archiepiscopal pall. 2. De Consuetudinibus ac Statutis in tutoriis causis observandis. He wrote also several other pieces relating to the Church. His death, which happened in July 1534, was very tragical [A]. For being taken in a time of rebellion by Thomas Fitz-Gerald, eldest son to the Earl of Kildare, he was, by his command, most cruelly murdered, being brained like an ox, at Tartaine in Ireland [B], in the fifty-eighth year of his age (b).

[A] His death --- was very tragical. It is construed by some, whom Mr Wood (1) calls precise writers, as a judgment on him for being concerned in the dissolution of Daventry priory in Northamptonshire, being one of the forty, which were suppressed for the erection of the Cardinal's college at Oxford.

[B] He was most cruelly murdered --- at Tartaine in Ireland. The place, where the murder was committed, was afterwards hedged in, overgrown, and unfrequented, in detestation of the fact (2). T (2) Wood, ibid.

A L L E N or A L L E Y N (THOMAS), a famous mathematician in the XVIth century, was born at Uttoxeter in Staffordshire the twenty-first of December 1542, being descended, through six generations, from Henry Allen or Alan, Lord of the manour of Buckenhall in the said county. He was admitted scholar of Trinity-college in Oxford, the fourth of June 1561, Fellow in 1565, and two years after Master of Arts. Being much inclined to a retired life, and averse from entering into holy orders, he quitted the college and his fellowship, and retired to Gloucester Hall, in 1570; where he followed his studies closely many years, and at length became an eminent antiquary, philosopher, and mathematician [A]. Being thus accomplished with various sorts of learning, he was several times invited to the houses of Princes and Noblemen, not only of this nation, but of others [B]. Robert Earl of Leicester, the great favourite in Queen Elizabeth's

[A] He became an eminent Antiquary, Philosopher, and Mathematician. The author of his funeral oration (1) calls him not only the Coryphaeus, but the very soul and sun of all the Mathematicians of his time. Mr Selden (2) tells us, he was 'omni eruditionis genere summoque judicio ornatissimus, celeberrimæ Academicæ Oxoniensis decus insignissimum. i. e. A person of the most extensive learning and consummate judgment, the brightest ornament of the famous university of Oxford.' And Camden (3) says, he was 'Plurimis optimisque artibus ornatissimus. i. e. Skilled in most of the best arts and sciences.' Mr Wood (4) gives him the character of an excellent man, the father of all learning and virtuous industry, an unfeigned lover and furtherer of all good arts and sciences. The same author, having searched in the chapel of Trinity-college for an epitaph on Mr Allen's grave, but having found none, gives us, instead thereof, part of his character transcribed from a certain manuscript, in the library of the said college, running thus. 'Vir fuit elegantium literarum studiosissimus, Academicæ disciplinæ tenacissimus, apud Saxones & Academicos semper in magno pretio, eorumque qui in ecclesiâ Anglicana atque in Universitatē Oxoniensī pro meritis suis ad dignitates aut prefecturas subinde provesti fuerunt. Fuit sagacissimus observator, familiarissimus conviva, &c. i. e. He was a man of diligent application to polite literature, strictly tenacious of academical discipline, always highly esteemed both by foreigners, and those of the university, and by all in the Church of England, and the university of Oxford, whose merits had raised them to the highest dignities and stations in either. He was a sagacious observer, an agreeable companion, &c.'

[B] He was invited to the houses of Princes and Noblemen, not only of this nation, but of others. He was often courted to live in the family of Henry Earl of Northumberland, a great friend and patron of the Mathematicians; which invitation he partly embraced, and spending some little time at the Earl's house, he there became acquainted with those celebrated Mathematicians Thomas Harriot, John Dee, Walter Warner, Nathaniel Torporley, &c. He was also strongly solicited by Albertus Laski, Count or Prince of Sirade in Poland (who was in England in 1583) to go with him into that country, and reside there, with a promise of preferment. But Allen, being fond of retirement, and an academical life, declined the Count's offer, and, like a true Philosopher, despised riches and greatness (5).

[C] The

(5) Wood, ubi supra.

Elizabeth's reign, had a particular esteem for Mr Allen [C], and would have conferred a bishopric on him; but his love of a retired life made him decline the offer. He was also highly respected by other famous men, of his time, as Sir Thomas Bodley, Sir Henry Savile, Mr Camden, Sir Robert Cotton, Sir Henry Spelman, Mr Selden, &c. (a). His great skill in the mathematics made the ignorant and vulgar look upon him as a magician or conjurer. He was very curious in collecting scattered manuscripts relating to every faculty, particularly history, antiquity, astronomy, philosophy, mathematics, &c. These collections have been quoted by several learned authors, and mentioned to have been in the Bibliotheca Alleniana: but they are now lost in obscure hands. His works are: 1. Claudii Ptolemei Pelusensis, de Astrorum judiciis, aut, ut vulgo vocant, quadripartite constructionis liber secundus; cum expositione Thomæ Alleyn Angli-Oxonienfis. i. e. 'The second Book of Claudius Ptolemy of Pelusium, concerning the judgment of the stars, or, as it is commonly called, of the Quadripartite construction, with the Exposition of Thomas Allen of Oxford.' 2. Claudii Ptolemei de Astrorum judiciis lib. tertius cum Expositione Tho. Alleyn, &c. [D]. Our author likewise wrote notes on many of Lilly's books, and some on John Bale's book De Scriptoribus maj. Britannie. Having lived to a great age, he died at Gloucester-Hall the thirtieth of September 1632 (b) [E].

(a) See the Remark [A].

(b) Wood, Athen. Oxon. Vol. I. col. 574. 575.

[C] The Earl of Leicester --- had a particular esteem for Mr Allen.] The Earl's intimacy with Allen, and the abovementioned John Dee, exposed him to the calumnies of the author of a book intitled, Leicester's Commonwealth; in which it is said, that they (meaning the Earl, &c. whom he brands with the name of Attheists) used the art of figuring and conjuring, for procuring the said Earl's unlawful designs, and that also by their black art, they endeavoured to make a match between Queen Elizabeth and him. This is plainly a foolish and malicious charge. However, it is certain, the Earl placed such confidence in Allen, that nothing material in the state was transacted without his knowledge; and that the Earl had constant information, by letter from Allen, of what passed in the university (6).

[D] Claudii Ptolemei Pelusensis, &c.] Mr Wood (7), who saw these two pieces in manuscript, tells us, they fell into the hands of William Lilly, the famous Astrologer, who gave them to Elias Ashmole, Esq; in 1652. One of these copies was transcribed from the original given by Mr Allen to Sir Thomas Aylesbury: the other was in the possession of John Huniades, the great chymist, who gave it to Lilly.

[E] He died at Gloucester-hall the 30th of September, 1632.] The day after his death, an oration was delivered, in praise of the deceased, by Mr William Burton (8) of that house, in the common refectory, before the Vice-chancellor, heads of colleges and halls, and many of the university then present; all of whom accompanied the body to Trinity-college, where, after another oration spoken by Mr George Bathurst, it was solemnly interred. Mr Allen left his curious collection of manuscripts to Sir Kenelm Digby, who gave them to the Bodleian library. Some of them, Mr Wood tells us (9), had, about the time of Allen's death, fallen into the hands of Mr Richard James, of Corpus-Christi college, and were by him deposited in the Cotton library; and others were in the possession of Sir Thomas Aylesbury, Master of the Requests. His picture, painted to the life, he gave to the President of Trinity-college, and his successors, to remain in the said President's dining-room for ever. Another copy he gave to the Cotton library, and a third to his old friend Dr Thomas Clayton, head of Pembroke college.

ALLEN (THOMAS) a learned divine, was born in the King's school at Worcester, and from thence removed to Brazen-nose college in Oxford, at sixteen years of age, anno 1589. He made a great progress in philosophy, and became a most noted disputant. He was elected a Probationer-fellow of Merton-college, in 1593. Afterwards he went into holy orders: but, instead of frequent preaching, he applied himself to the more abstruse and critical parts of learning. This recommended him to the esteem of Sir Henry Savile, by whose interest he obtained a fellowship of Eton-college. He wrote Observations in Libellum Chrystomi in Efsaiam. i. e. Observations on St Chrystom's book upon Iffaiab [A]. He died in 1636, and was buried in Eton-college chapel (a) [B].

[A] He wrote Observations, &c.] This piece is printed in Sir H. Savile's edition of St Chrystom's works, Vol. VIII. p. 139, &c. Sir Henry was assisted by Mr Allen, in his annotations on St Chrystom's homilies, on St Matthew, and the other Evangelists, as he acknowledges in his preface to those annotations, in which he styles our author 'Vir doctissimus, Græcarum literarum non minus quam Theologiae peritissimus. i. e. A very learned man, and no less skilled in the Greek learning than in Divinity (1).'

[B] He was buried in Eton-college chapel.] Over his grave was placed a flat stone, having the following inscription carved on a brass plate fixed thereto. 'Tho-

'mas Allenus Wigornienfis, vir pietate insignis, Theologiae præstantissimus, multarum optimarum linguarum variazque eruditionis callentissimus, in collegium hoc (in quo diu focus vixit) in collegia insuper alia, locaque in quibus aliquam vitæ suæ partem posuit pie munificus, hic jacet. Obiit die decimo mensis Octobris, an. 1636. i. e. Here lies Mr Thomas Allen of Worcester, a man of exemplary piety; an excellent Divine, well skilled in many of the best languages and various branches of literature, a pious and munificent benefactor to this college, and to other colleges and places in which he spent any part of his life. He died the 10th of October, 1636 (2).'

ALLEIN (RICHARD) was the son of a clergyman of the same name, Rector of Dichey in Somersetshire, which preferment he held fifty years (a). Our Richard was born at the aforesaid place, in the year 1611 (b). The first part of his education under his father, fitted him for the university in 1627 (c). In that year he was entered a Commoner of St Alban's Hall in Oxford, where he took the degree of Bachelor of Arts (d). Thence he removed it seems, to New Inn, where having received his Master's degree (e); and then taking holy orders he became assistant to his father, and carried on the work of the ministry in his own country (f). His father inclining to what is called Puritanism, he fell naturally into those opinions, and being a man of great zeal and competent learning he

he came early to be much considered. In the month of March, 1641, he succeeded Richard Bernard in the rectory of Batcomb, in Somersetshire, where that divine had continued twenty-eight years, having for his predecessor Dr Bifs, who lived in the days of the Reformation (g). Mr Allein discharged his duty here, with much industry and fidelity, and being a zealous Covenanter, had now and then some disturbance from the King's forces in those parts. He was however a great enemy to that enthusiastick spirit which broke out in this country, on the ruin of the established Church, as appears by his subscribing a representation, intitled, The Testimony of the Ministry of Somersetshire, to the truth of Jesus Christ, and to the solemn League and Covenant, which was printed in 1648 (b). His industry and affection to the Cause, procured himself and his father to be constituted Assistants to the Commissioners, appointed by parliament for the ejecting scandalous ministers (i). This was in 1654, and Mr Wood tells us, that they acted in this capacity with feverity enough (k). However, upon the Restoration, Mr Allen shewed a disposition to yield obedience to the government, but could not, it seems, come up to the terms of conformity, which occasioned his being ejected from his living, after he had held it upwards of twenty years (l). After this misfortune he continued to exercise his function privately, preaching sometimes at his own house, and at other times at the houses of gentlemen in the neighbourhood. Once he was apprehended at the seat of Mr More, who had been a member of parliament, and who had invited him thither to preach to his family, and to some of his neighbours. The penalty was five pounds, which that gentleman very honourably paid for Mr Allen, though he went to prison for his own fine (m). But if this made him cautious, it did not however make him indolent, he went still on in the way of his profession, notwithstanding that he was often summoned to quarter-sessions, and there severely reprimanded for keeping a conventicle (n). However, he was not imprisoned as other ministers were, because, as it was generally supposed, his great learning, piety, and unblameable life, had gained him so high a reputation, that it would have been a very unpopular thing, to have sent a man of his character to a county-goal (o). After the five miles act took place, he was obliged to leave Batcomb, and to retire to Froome-Selwood, where he lodged at the house of Mr Smith, and continued there in the constant exercise of his ministry, notwithstanding the dangers to which he was exposed (p). At length he gave way to fate, on the twenty-second of December, 1681, being upwards of sixty-four years of age (q). He was distinguished for his plain, practical, and pathetic manner of preaching; for his great delight in the duties of the pastoral office, such as catechizing, visiting the sick, and instructing the ignorant. His writings also, of which in the notes we shall give a particular account, were much esteemed, and often printed [A]. As he chose to leave his living rather than strain his conscience, so his Nonconformity was no way tinctured, either with spleen to the established Church, or disloyalty to his Prince. On the contrary, he lived in a fair correspondence with the clergy in his neighbourhood, and had much respect paid him by the gentry of his acquaintance, tho' of opposite sentiments (r). The reverend Mr Richard Jenkins, M. A. and Vicar of Froome-Selwood, preached his funeral sermon, and therein gave full and fair testimony to his piety, meekness, and moderation (s), of which he was the better judge, from his long acquaintance with him, and frequent visits to him, in his last sickness. However, the meek and charitable Anthony Wood, to destroy, as far

[A] Much esteemed and often printed.] The first (1) work he published so far as I know, or can learn, was, A Letter to a Friend, proving, 1. That valid ordination ought not to be repeated, and, 2. That ordination by Presbyters is valid. Addressed to Mr John Humfrey, 1661, 4to. but as this hath not his name, we begin with 1. Vindicia Pietatis, Or, a Vindication of Godliness in the greatest Strictness, and Spirituality of it, from the Imputations of Folly and Fancy. Mr Wood says, that it was printed in 8vo. in the year 1664, and again 1669. He then speaks of Directions for attaining and maintaining of a godly Life, as if they had been added to the last edition. The godly Man's Portion and Sanctuary, being the second part of Vindicia Pietatis: Mr Wood makes a distinct book (2), but the edition I have varies from all these. It consists of two parts, the Vindicia Pietatis, and the Directions for a godly Life, printed together at London, without a Printer's name in 1665, with a dedication to the inhabitants of the parish of B— in the county of S— i. e. Batcomb in the county of Somerset. The godly Man's Portion, is joined thereto; but is printed in 1663, whence I conceive, the first edition to have been in that year, if not in the year before it. The reason the book is without the Printer's name, is, because it was not licensed. On its publication the book was greedily bought up, and the King's bookseller having notice where there was a parcel of them lodged for sale, caused them to be seized; in consequence of which, they were sent to the King's kitchen, there to be employed for other purposes than reading. Thence however, he took care to purchase them at the rate of waste paper, bound them up and sold them. But this artifice being discovered, he was brought on his knees at the council-table, and the books sent once again to the King's kitchen, there to be bisk'd, that is, struck over with ink, so as to be illegible (3). 2. Heaven opened, or a brief and plain Discovery of the Riches of God's Covenant of Grace. Mr Wood calls this the third part of the Vindicia Pietatis (4), but it is not so stiled in the edition I have, which is printed in 1665, with a preface to the reader, wherein it is said, that the author intended to have added it to his other book, but that he found it growing to too great a bulk. 3. The World conquered, or a believer's Victory over the World laid open, being the fourth Part of Vindicia Pietatis, London, 1668, 8vo. All which pieces Mr Wood says, were printed together in 1671, under the title of the Works of Mr Allen, in four Parts (5). 4. Godly Fear, or the Nature and Necessity of Fear, and its Usefulness, &c. London, 1674, 8vo. This is no more than a collection of sermons on several texts. 5. A Rebuke to Backsliders, and a Spur for Loiterers, in several Sermons lately preached to a private Congregation, London, 1677, 8vo. There was another edition in 1684, which is said in the title page to have been published for the awakening a sleepy Age. From the preface to this book it appears, that the author when he wrote it was sickly, and in a declining state of health. 6. A Companion for Prayer, or Directions for improvement in Grace, and practical Goodness, in Times of extraordinary danger, London, 1680, in 12mo. 7. Instructions about Heart-work, what is to be done on God's part and ours, for the Cure and keeping of the Heart, that we may live in the Exercise and Growth of Grace here, and have a comfortable Assurance of Glory to Eternity, London, 1681, 8vo. — This is a posthumous work, and before it there is an epistle to the reader by Dr Annesley. Wood places the first edition of this book in 1682 (6), but therein he is certainly mistaken (7). The second edition came out in 1684, and then his Companion for Prayer was added to it by way of appendix. He also wrote A brief Character of Mr Joseph Allen, which makes the third chapter in the account of his life published in 1672. He was related to our author, and several pieces written by Joseph, are inserted in the works of Richard Allein, as the reader may see by consulting the notes upon that life, in this work. E

A L L E I N (JOSEPH) the son of Mr Tobias Allein, was born in the Devizes in Wiltshire, in 1633 (a). An extraordinary tincture of religion discovered itself in all his actions, even in his childhood, insofar that at eleven years of age he was much addicted to private prayers, and on the death of his brother Edward, who was a worthy minister of the gospel, he earnestly intreated his father, that he might receive such an education as might fit him for the same work. In the space of four years he acquired a competent knowledge of the Latin and Greek tongues, and was by his master declared fit for the university (b). His father kept him however some time at home, where he was instructed in Logick, and at the age of sixteen, was placed in Lincoln college at Oxford. There he continued to the eighth of November 1651, when he was admitted of Corpus Christi college, a Wiltshire scholarship being then vacant. He was very remarkable while at college, for his great assiduity in his studies, a settled gravity in his temper, and a chearful readines to assist others. He might in a little time have attained a fellowship, which he declined for the sake of the office of Chaplain, being exceedingly pleased with the opportunity this gave him of exerting his gifts in prayer. In July 1653 (c), he was admitted Bachelor of Arts, and became a tutor. In this arduous employment, he behaved himself with equal skill and diligence, several of his pupils becoming very eminent Nonconformist ministers, and not a few attained to good preferment in the established Church (d). In 1655, being then in the one and twentieth year of his age, he became assistant in the ministry, to Mr George Newton, in Taunton Magdalen, in Somersethire. There, on the fourth of October in the same year, he married his beloved wife, and settled himself in the world (e). His income was very small, at first not above forty, never above eighty pounds a year, which however was somewhat increased by the pains of his wife, who kept a boarding-school (f). During seven years that he lived in this manner, he discharged his pastoral duty with incredible diligence, for besides preaching and catechizing in the church, he spent several afternoons in a week, in visiting the people of the town, and exhorting them to a religious life. These applications were at first, far from being welcome to many families; but his meekness, moderation, and unaffected piety, made him by degrees the delight of his parishioners (g). He was deprived in 1662, for Nonconformity. He preached however privately, generally six or seven, sometimes fourteen or fifteen times a week. His zeal and industry in this course, brought him at length into trouble, so that on the twenty-sixth of May, 1663, he was committed to Ivelchester jayl, where at that time, there were seven ministers, and fifty Quakers, confined in one room, where they suffered great hardships; however, they still continued to preach till the assizes (h). These were held before Mr Justice Foster, and at them, viz. on the twenty-fourth of August, he was indicted for preaching on the seventeenth of May preceding, of which indictment he was found guilty, sentenced to pay a hundred marks, and to remain in prison till his fine was paid. At the time of his receiving sentence, he said; That he was glad that it had appeared before his country, that whatsoever he was charged with, he was guilty of nothing but doing his duty; and that all that did appear by the evidence was, that he had sung a psalm, and instructed his family, others being there, and both in his own house. He continued in prison a whole year wanting three days, which broke his constitution (i). However, when he was at liberty, he applied himself to his ministry as earnestly as ever, which brought upon him a grievous sickness. The five miles aft taking place, he retired from Taunton to Wellington, where he continued but a small time, Mr Mallack, a merchant, inviting him to lodge at a house of his at some distance from Taunton (k). In the summer of 1665, he was advised to drink the waters near the Devizes, for his health. But before he left Mr Mallack's house, viz. on the tenth of July in that year, some friends came to take their leaves of him; they were surprized praying together, and for this were sentenced to sixty days imprisonment, which himself, seven ministers, and forty private persons, suffered in the county jayl. This hindered his going to the waters, and his disease returning, he lost another summer (l). At length, in 1667, he went, but was far from receiving that benefit he expected. After some time he went to Dorchester, where he grew better, but applying himself again, to preaching, catechizing, and other duties, his distemper returned with such violence, that he lost the use of his limbs. His death was then daily expected, but by degrees he grew somewhat better, and at length went to Bath, where the state of his health altered so much, that his friends were in hopes he would have held out several years, but growing suddenly worse again, he finished his life there, in the month of November, 1668, being then somewhat above thirty-five years old (m). He was a man of great learning, and greater charity, zealous in his own way of worshipping God, but not in the least bitter towards any Christians who worshipped in another manner (n). He preserved a great respect for the Church, notwithstanding all his sufferings, and was eminently loyal to his Prince, notwithstanding the severities of the times. His writings breathe a true spirit of piety, for which they have been always and deservedly esteemed [A]. Anthony Wood has treated (o) his memory very rudely [B], and betrayed that spleen he had against the Nonconformists, in speaking ill of one, who spoke ill of no man. The body of our author lies interred in the chancel of the church of Taunton St Magdalen, and on his grave-stone stand the following lines (p).

Here Mr Joseph Allein lies,
To God and you, a sacrifice.

[A] His writings are deservedly esteemed] The most remarkable of his printed books were these which follow. 1. A most familiar Explanation of the Assembly's Shorter Catechism. Wherein their larger answers are broken into lesser parcels, thereby to let the light by degrees into the minds of learners, 8vo. 1656, with two appendixes. 2. A Call to Archbishops, being an earnest motive to the ejected ministers to continue in their ministry, 4to. 1664. This was written during his imprisonment, and the intent of it was to stir up his Nonconformist brethren, to preach and pray, notwithstanding the severities they laboured under (1). It is very probable this might give offence, though in writing it he discharged his conscience. 3. An Alarm to the unconverted, published in 8vo. in 1672, as also in 12mo; at which time there were twenty thousand of them sold. It was afterwards printed under the title of A sure Guide to Heaven, in 1675, and with this title, there have been fifty thousand fold (2). However, in 1720, there was a large impression published with the first title, An Alarm to unconverted Sinners. It has a long epistle before it by Richard Baxter, and a shorter by our author's friend Richard Allein. I have been very careful in examining all the editions of this book, and find most of them vary in some particulars. There was an edition in 12mo. 1689, with a preface To the reader that would be safe and happy, which differs from both these prefaces. Mr Wood tells us, it was printed under the title of A true Way to Happiness, but as he makes this a different book from the Sure Guide to Heaven, and yet the same with the Alarm to unconverted Sinners (3), he is certainly mistaken. 4. Christian Letters full of spiritual Instruction, 8vo. London, 1672. They are forty in number, and were afterwards added as an appendix to his life. In 1677, there was another edition with five new letters. Amongst these, several are directed to his wife, and the rest to his friends, and to his flock; most of them during his imprisonment at Ivelchester. 5. Cases of Conscience, &c. London, 1672, 8vo. These are added to the last edition of the Alarm to unconverted Sinners. 6. Remains, being a Collection of sundry Directions, Sermons, sacramental Speeches, and Letters, not heretofore published, 8vo. 1672. Besides these, he wrote several little practical pieces, which are inserted in the books of Mr Richard Allein. Such as the Synopsis of the Covenant (4). A Form of Words, expressing a Man's Covenant with God, &c. (5). Besides these, he left behind him imperfect, a Body of Natural Theology, under eight heads, written in a good Latin stile, wherein were laid down; first, the Christian Doctrine, and then by way of annotation was added, the testimonies of the ancient Philosophers (6). One section of this, viz. De Providentia, was fitted for the press, and licensed, but Anthony Wood says, that being Latin and Greek, and such books having too few buyers in England, there were none yet found, who would be at the charge of printing it (7). To this account of his writings, we may add what is very often printed with them, the life and death of that excellent minister of Christ, Mr Joseph Allein, &c. This was first printed in 8vo. 1671. It consists of several parts, 1. An introduction written by Mr Richard Baxter. 2. A brief relation of what passed at his childhood, and at the university, by an eye-witness. 3. A short character of him by Mr Richard Allein. 4. An account of his godly life and practice, by the Reverend Mr Newton, to whom he was assistant. 5. A further account of his ministry, by an intimate friend. 6. A narrative of his life by his widow, Mrs Theodosia Allein. 7. Some notes by a person, in whose house he lodged. 8. His charafter, under the title of, A Compleat Picture of a Gospel Minister. 9. A few additions to this character, by Mr Richard Fairclough. The second and eighth, were written by ministers of the Church of England. There is likewise annexed a funeral sermon, preached by Mr George Newton, from Luke xxiii. 28 (8).

[B] Anthony Wood has treated his memory very rudely.] Most of the facts mentioned in his article, are taken out of the life of Joseph Allein, mentioned in the foregoing note, and all the Oxford Antiquary has done, is to give them a malicious turn. He says, he desired the office of chaplain, though inferior in value to a fellowship, that he might shew his excellencies in publick twice in a day (9). A minister of the Church of England, who knew him at college, says his prayers were grave, succinct, and premeditated, and (10) therefore, the times considered in which he executed this office, one may safely say, the college was the better for it, nor do we know whether he did not take this place to prevent the ill use that some fiery enthusiast might have made of it. After mentioning his call to Taunton, Wood says (11), our author Joseph, received another call to take to wife, a fair and holy sifter, which being effected, he would as in jest complain to an intimate friend of his, of the inconveniences of marriage, viz. that whereas he used to rise at four of the clock in the morning, or before, his loving spouse would keep him in bed till about six; also, whereas he used to study fourteen hours in a day, she would bring him to eight or nine. And lastly, that whereas he used to forbear one meal a day, at least for his study, she would bring him to his meat, &c. Mr Wood cites no authority for this, and therefore one would suppose he had been told it; but the truth is, that in the second chapter of Mr Allein's life, we are told, that an intimate friend of his, having written to him to know the inconveniences of marriage, he, in a familiar answer, wrote back what Mr Wood has mentioned (12), but how this can be called his complaint, is not easy to be understood. Our Oxford writer tells us, that he had a third call for the propagation of the Gospel, and that he would by all means go into China to fulfil it, but was dissuaded from it by the brethren (13). All which is built on some expressions which fell from Mr Allein at the time he was ejected, when he said, that if he found it impracticable to discharge the work of the ministry in his own country, he would go and preach Christianity in China. This was only a declaration of the duty he thought incumbent upon him of preaching (14), but he actually formed another design, which Mr Wood does not mention; and that was, to go and preach in Wales, which nothing but his sickness hindered (15). After having taken his materials from the life of Joseph Allein, he gives this account of it. From which acting Farce or Life, especially that ridiculous discourse of Theodosia, the reader may easily understand what a grand zealot for the cause this our author Joseph Allein was, and how his life was spent, in actions busy, forward, (if not pragmatical) and meddling without intermission. The said Theodosia, a prating gossip, and a meer Xantippe, finding Joseph Allein to be a meer scholar, and totally ignorant of women's tricks, did flatter, sooth him up, and woo, and soon after married and brought him to her lure (16). Much more to the same purpose, we meet with in this author, whose account is thus censured by Dr Calamy. 'Wood, the Oxonian, fancied himself among his boon companions passing away the tedious minutes of the lingering glass, in it's circular returns with a wanton tale, when he composed that farce to which this good man's name is prefixed (in his Athenæ Oxonienses) but it is no disgrace at all to any one

A L L E S T R Y or A L L E S T R E E (RICHARD), Provost of Eton-college in the reign of King Charles II, was the son of Mr Robert Allestry, a gentleman of an antient family in Derbyshire [A], and was born in March 1619, at Uppington near the Wreken in Shropshire (a). He was educated first at a country free-school in the neighbourhood, and afterwards at one of greater note at Coventry (b), where Philemon Holland the translator taught (c). In 1636, being then seventeen years of age, he was carried by his father to Oxford, and entered a commoner in Christ-church, under the tuition of Mr Richard Busby (d). Six months after his settlement in the university, Dr Fell, Dean of Christ-Church, observing the parts and industry of young Mr Allestry, made him a student of that college; where he applied himself to academical learning with uncommon improvement and success. After he had taken the degree of Bachelor of Arts, he was chosen Moderator in Philosophy; which office he continued to discharge, till the disturbances of the kingdom interrupted the studies and repose of the university. In 1641, Mr Allestry, among other Oxford scholars, engaged in the King's service, and continued therein, till Sir John Biron (e), who was sent with a party of horse to countenance and support the scholars in arms, withdrew from Oxford; whereupon he returned, with many others, to his gown and his studies. Soon after, a party of the rebels having entered Oxford, and plundered the colleges, Mr Allestry narrowly escaped being severely handled by them [B]. In October following, he took arms again, and was present in the battle fought between King Charles and the rebels, under the command of the Earl of Essex, in Keinton-field in Warwickshire: after which, understanding that the King designed immediately to march to Oxford, and take up his residence at the deanery of Christ-church (f), he hastened thither to prepare for his Majesty's reception; but in his way was taken prisoner by a party of horse from Broughton-house, which was garrisoned by the Lord Say for the parliament. His confinement was very short, the garrison surrendering itself to the King's forces, who summoned it in their march. And now Mr Allestry settled himself again to his studies, and in the next spring (g) took his degree of Master of Arts; and the same year his life was greatly endangered by a peccant distemper, which raged in the garrison of Oxford. Soon after his recovery, he entered a third time into his Majesty's service, and carried a musket in a regiment formed out of the Oxford scholars [C]. In this service he continued till the end of the war, and then went into holy orders, at a time when he had no prospect of worldly advantage. He was tutor to several young gentlemen and students, and discharged the office of Censor of the college. He bore a part in that signal test of loyalty; which the university of Oxford gave in their decree and judgment against the Solemn League and Covenant; for which, in July 1648, he was proscribed and expelled the university by the parliament visitors [D]. Being thus driven from Oxford, he retired into Shropshire, and

[A] Mr Robert Allestry, a gentleman of an antient family in Derbyshire.] The estate of the family having been considerably diminished by the profusion of his ancestors, this gentleman was reduced to serve Sir Richard Newport, afterwards created Lord Newport, Baron of High Arcol, in the quality of his steward; and being married, he left that service, and settled at Uppington near the Wreken in Shropshire (1).

[B] Mr Allestry narrowly escaped being severely handled by the rebels.] The occasion was this. Some of the rebels, having attempted to break into the treasury of Christ-Church, and after a day's labour having forced a passage into it, met with nothing but a single groat, and a halter, at the bottom of a large iron chest. Enraged at their disappointment, they went to the deanery; where having plundered as much as they thought fit, they put it all together in a chamber, locked it up, and retired to their quarters, intending the next day to return and dispose of their prize. But when they came, they found themselves again disappointed, and every thing removed out of the chamber. Upon examination it was discovered that Mr Allestry had a key to the lodgings, in the absence of the Dean and his family; and that this key had been made use of upon this occasion. Whereupon he was seized; and, notwithstanding all the defence he could make, would probably have been very severely handled by the rebels, had not the Earl of Essex called away the forces on a sudden, and by that means rescued him from their fury (2).

[C] He carried a musket in a regiment formed out of the Oxford scholars.] The exigency of the King's affairs requiring the aid of all his loyal subjects, a regiment was raised out of the Oxford scholars, who served as volunteers without pay or reward, and performed all duties not only in the garrison, and sallies for the defence of it in case of attacks or sieges; but were also commanded upon parties abroad, and endured the fatigue of marches, and the inconvenience of bad quarters; differing in nothing from mercenary soldiers, except in their civility and justice to the country people while they staid with them, and paying them at their departure: things so unusual, that when, upon leaving their quarters, they offered their landlords money, they believed it was done in jest and to abuse them, but were convinced of the contrary by it's being left with them. In this regiment Mr Allestry bore arms, being forward upon all occasions to put himself upon action, and thinking it no disgrace, though a Master of Arts and Fellow of a College, to perform the duties of a common soldier. Nor did he in the mean time neglect his studies, frequently (as our author expresses it) holding his musket in one hand and book in the other, and making the watchings of a soldier the lubrications of a student (3).

[D] He was proscribed, and expelled the university, by the Parliament visitors.] Soon after the decree of the university against the Solemn League and Covenant, visitors were sent down by the pretended Parliament to require the submission of that body to it's authority. Those who could prostitute their allegiance to their Prince, and oaths to the university, and comply with the lust of the usurpers, were received into favour: all others, however deserving, were without farther regard proscribed; which was done by writing their names on a paper, and affixing it on the door of St Mary's Church; signifying therein, that such persons were by the authority of the visitors banished the university, and required to depart the precincts thereof within three days, upon pain of being taken for spies of war, and proceeded against accordingly. By which practice was entertained as Chaplain to the honourable Francis Newport, Esq; (b); and, upon the death of Richard Lord Newport (i) that gentleman's father, he was sent over into France to clear accounts, and take care of that nobleman's effects. Having dispatched this affair with good success, he came back to his employment, and continued in it till King Charles II's march into England with the Scotch army, and his miraculous escape at Worcester: at which time, the managers of the King's affairs wanting an intelligent and faithful person to send over to his Majesty, Mr Allestry was desired to undertake the journey; which accordingly he did, and having attended the King at Roan, and received his dispatches, he returned into England. Here he found his friends Mr Dolben and Mr Fell (k), who had likewise been banished the university, residing privately there, and performing the offices of the Church of England to the Loyalists: whereupon he joined them, and continued with them, 'till Sir Anthony Cope, a loyal young gentleman of considerable quality and fortune in Oxfordshire, prevailed upon him to live in his family; where he continued several years, with liberty of going or staying as occasion required: and by this means he was enabled, without being taken notice of, to convey messages to the King from his friends. After several difficult journies successfully performed, he was sent over, in the winter before his Majesty's Restoration, into Flanders; from whence returning with letters, he was seized, upon his landing at Dover, by a party of soldiers; but had the address to secure his letters, by conveying them to a faithful hand. Being guarded up to London, he was examined by a committee of the Council of Safety, and sent prisoner to Lambeth-house (l), where he contracted a dangerous sickness. After six or eight weeks confinement, he was set at liberty [E], and returned into Oxfordshire; from whence, after a short stay, he went into Shropshire to visit his relations [F]. Soon after the Restoration, Mr Allestry was made a Canon of Christchurch, and readily concurred in repairing the injuries and decays that church and college had suffered during the Usurpation. At the same time he undertook one of the lectureships of the city of Oxford, with a view to instil principles of loyalty into the minds of the citizens, which had been poisoned by the contrary infusions of schismatical teachers: yet he never received any part of the profits, but constantly distributed it among the poor. He took the degree of Doctor in Divinity, on the third of October, 1660 (m), and was appointed one of the King's Chaplains in Ordinary; and soon after, upon a vacancy (n) of the Divinity-chair, he was chosen Regius Professor. In 1665, the King conferred upon Dr Allestry the Provostship (o) of Eton-college [G], which he held to his death. In 1679, finding his health, and particularly his sight, much impaired, he resigned the professorship of divinity, and had the satisfaction to be succeeded therein by Dr Jane, of whose abilities he had perfect knowledge. And now, the decay of his constitution terminating in a dropsy, he removed to London, to be nearer the advice of physicians: but, medicines proving ineffectual, he died [H] in January 1680-1, and practice often repeated, the men of the greatest hopes and merit in the university were spoiled of all things, and not suffered to breathe the common air; so that, within the compass of a few weeks, Oxford was purged of it's most loyal members, in whose room succeeded an illiterate rabble, swept from the plough-tail, from shops and grammar schools, and the dregs of the neighbour university. In this diffusive ruin Mr Allestry had an early share; and though he had the care of several persons of quality his pupils, and accounts of his own and theirs to make up, he with difficulty obtained of Lieutenant-Colonel Kelsey, governor of the town, a short respite, for settling his affairs, and doing justice to those for whom he was concerned; the visitors utterly refusing his request, for this reason, as Dr Rogers one of their number was pleased to phrase it, because he was an eminent man (4).

(4) Ibid.

[E] He was set at liberty. The means of his enlargement were owing to the prospect of an approaching revolution: for some of the heads of the Republican party, seeing things tend towards his majesty's restoration, were willing by kindnesses to recommend themselves to the loyal party, in case matters should take that turn. Among these was the Earl of Shaftsbury, who used to value himself that Mr Allestry owed his preservation to him (5).

(5) Ibid.

[F] He went into Shropshire to visit his relations In his return from thence, designing to visit his worthy friend Dr Hammond at Westwood near Worcester, he had the mortification to meet, at the gate, the body of that great man carrying to his burial. This circumstance deserves the rather to be mentioned, because that eminent light of the English Church gave, at his death, this testimony of his esteem for Mr Allestry, that he left him his valuable library of books, well knowing that in his hands they would be useful weapons for the defence of that cause he had during life so vigorously asserted (6).

(6) Ibid.

[G] The King conferred upon Dr Allestry the Provostship of Eton-College. It was with some difficulty

he was prevailed upon to accept of this benefice: but the consideration that great interest was made for it by a lay-man, who might possibly succeed upon the advantage of his refusal, induced him to comply with his majesty's gracious offer. For the Provost of Eton being actually parson of the parish, and presented to the Cure, and instituted by the Bishop of Lincoln the Diocesan, nothing (he thought) could be more sacrilegious and irregular than such an usurpation of a lay-person; nor any thing a greater disservice to the Church, than by an unseasonable modesty to make way for it. Upon these motives it was, that Dr Allestry became Provost of Eton-College; and for the same reason it was, that, during his life, he continued so, never hearkning to any offer of preferment, which might occasion a vacancy. And it may be truly said, that this was the greatest secular care which attended him to his last moments, it being his dying request to his friends, to interpose with the King, that he might be succeeded by a person lawfully qualified, and who would promote the welfare of the college (7). It is remarkable, that his wishes were answered: for Dr Zachariah Cradock of Cambridge, who had been installed Canon Residentiary of Chichester, succeeded him in the Provostship, being elected thereto by the fellows; so that Mr Waller the Poet, who, according to Anthony Wood, struggled hard for it, was disappointed (8).

(7) Ibid.

[H] His death. Having taken a private lodging in London, he submitted to the methods prescribed by his physicians, more out of compliance with the request of his friends, than in expectation of a cure; in the mean time settling his temporal concerns, and employing the intervals his sickness allowed in attending to the offices of the Church constantly read to him, and his private devotions. In his last moments he received the Eucharist, having desired those friends of his who were in town to communicate with him; namely, the Archbishop of York, the Bishop of London, the Bishop of Lincoln, the Bishop of Exeter, the Bishop of St Asaph, the Reverend Dr Busby; and Mr Fell

Which may be thus translated : Here lies RICHARD ALLESTREE, Regius Professor of Divinity at Oxford, Canon of Christ-Church, and Provost of this College of Eton ; in the separate discharge of which offices he discovered abilities superior to the execution of them all together : in disputations invincible, an orator in the pulpit, skilful in the management of affairs, of great integrity and piety : he declined the episcopal character as industriously as others seek it ; thinking it a more worthy employ to defend, instruct, and adorn the Church, than to govern it. Exhausted at length with constant labour and study, this valuable man was taken away by too early a death, January 27, 1680, in the 60th year of his age. In his lifetime he erected to himself a noble monument, in building from the ground, at his own expence, the west side of the adjacent Quadrangle (10). His heirs erected this small monument to his memory.

[K] An extract of Dr Allestry's character. ' His mind, that nobler part of him, was composed by an extraordinary indulgence of nature ; those faculties, which in others use to be single, and are thought necessarily to be so, were united in him. Memory, fancy, judgment, elocution, great modesty and no less assurance, a comprehension of things and fluency of words ; an aptness for the pleasant, and sufficiency for the rugged parts of knowledge ; a courage to encounter, and an industry to master all things, make up the character of his happy genius. — From his first childhood he had a strong impression of piety, and the duties owed to God and men. — In his constitution he had a great deal of warmth and vigour, which made him apt to take fire upon provocation ; but he was well aware of it, and kept a peculiar guard upon that weak part : so that his heat was reserved for the great concerns of the honour of God, and the service of his Prince and country, wherein he was altogether indefatigable, and in the most dismal appearances of affairs would never desert them, nor despair of their restoration. There was not in the world a man of clearer honesty and courage ; no temptation could bribe him to do a base thing, or terror affright him from the doing a good one. This made his friendships as lasting and inviolable as his life ; without the dirty considerations of profit, or sly reserves of craft ; not the pageantry of ceremonious address, or cold civility ; much less the servile flatteries of obsequious flattery. — His conversation was always cheerful and entertaining, especially in the reception of his acquaintance at his table, and friendly visits. — He was exceeding tender of saying any thing that might administer offence, or reflect upon any one's reputation. — There was no person who more literally verified the saying of the Wise Man, that much study was a weariness of the flesh. After his day's work, he was used to be as faint and spent, as if he had been labouring all the time with the scythe or flail ; and his intention of thought made such waste upon his spirits, that he was frequently in hazard, while at study, to fall into a swoon, and forced to rise from his seat and walk about the room for some time before he could recover himself. — His contempt of the world was very extraordinary, as in his large and constant charities, both by settled pensions to indigent persons and families, and occasional alms, so also his bounteous hospitality. — But the uncontrollable proof of contempt of the world, is, his dying poor ; he having never during his life purchased an inch of ground, nor any annuity, or lease, to the value of a penny ; nor did he take care to renew the patrimonial estate which he held by a lease for life (11). — His greatest treasure was his library, which was indeed a considerable one, both for the number of books and choice of them ; but these he disposed of by deed before his death to the university of Oxford for the use of his successors in the chair. — Though he hung thus loose from the world, he neither was negligent in secular affairs, nor unskilful in the management of them ; which was made manifest by his dextrous discharge of the private trusts committed to him in behalf of his dead friends, and the administration of his public employments. He was for several years treasurer of Christ-Church, in a busy time of their repairing the ruins made by the intruding usurpers ; and amidst the necessary avocations of study, found leisure for a full discharge of that troublesome employment. — In the management of the business of the chair of divinity, as he performed the scholastic part with great sufficiency in exact and dextrous untying the knots of argument, and solid determination of controverted points, so he was not oppressed by the fame of any of his most eminent predecessors : his prudence was very remarkable in the choice of subjects to be treated on ; for he waited not time and opportunity in the barren insignificant parts of school-divinity, but insisted on the fundamental grounds of controversy between the Church of England and the most formidable enemies thereof. — By his judicious care herein, though he found the university in a ferment, and a great part of it's growing hopes sufficiently seasoned with ill possessions, he so brought it to pass, that during the whole tract of seventeen years that he held the chair, there was no factious bandying of opinions, nor petulant sidings on account of them ; which things disturbed the peace of the last age, and helped forward to inflame those animosities, which ended in the execrable mischiefs of the civil war (12).'

[L] He was a considerable benefactor to Eton-college. The west side of the outward court of the college was built from the ground, and finished, at Dr Allestry's single expence. And whereas, at his coming to Eton, he found the society greatly in debt, by an ill custom introduced by the pretended saints of the late times, who at the year's end divided whatever money remained after the ordinary payments were made, incidental charges and debts contracted being still thrown off to the future year ; which in time grew to such a bulk as endangered the college's becoming bankrupt : to remedy this evil, Dr Allestry, by an exemplary retrenchment of his own dues, prevailed on the society to do the like ; inasmuch that tation of the school, which he found in a very low condition. There are extant Forty Sermons (r) [M] of Dr Allestry's, whereof the greatest part were preached before the King, and upon solemn occasions. It is much to be regretted, that he could not be prevailed upon to publish his Lectures [N], which, when first delivered, were heard with the greatest satisfaction and applause. Mr Wood mentions a small tract (s) written by Dr Allestry, intitled, The Privileges of the University of Oxford in point of Visitation, in a Letter to an honourable Personage (t) [O].

within a few years, the college paid off above a thousand pound debt, and expended above two thousand pounds in repairs. Another considerable service he did the college and school, as also King's-college in Cambridge, whose seminary it is, was this; that whereas formerly the fellowships of Eton were generally disposed of to persons of foreign education, the King was pleased, at the instance of Dr Allestry, joined with the petition of the Provost and Fellows of King's-college, to pass a grant under the broad seal, that for the future five of the seven fellows should be such as had been educated at Eton-school, and were fellows of King's-college; which has ever since took place (13).

[M] His sermons.] The first eighteen sermons in this collection were originally published on a charitable account. For his ingenious kinsman Mr James Allestry the bookseller (*), from a plentiful fortune being by the fire of London reduced to great poverty, Dr Allestry, besides other assistances, bestowed upon him the copies of these eighteen sermons, to make some reparation of his losses. Afterwards twenty-two more were added to them, being as many as were thought necessary to make up a volume. 'The variety of auditors (says my author) for whom they were first designed, makes them not to be all of the same fineness of spinning and closeness of texture: but in them all there will appear the same spirit of persuasive rhetoric and ardent piety, whereby though dead he yet speaketh (14).'

[N] He could not be prevailed upon to publish his lectures.] Having, a little before his death, communicated to the Bishop of Oxford several particulars concerning his intentions for the disposal of his goods and papers; the Bishop observed, that there was no mention made of his lectures, and knowing how his modesty, during his life, had resisted all importunities for the publishing of them, suspected that the same motive might be more prevalent at his death: therefore he wrote to Dr Allestry, requesting that his lectures might be preserved, which had cost him so much study and labour, and would be proportionably useful to others. The Doctor's answer by letter bearing date January 19, 1680, was; That having not had opportunity to revise what he had written, which was not every where consistent with his present imaginations, though in nothing material, yet in some particulars which he should have better examined, especially divers of the Act-Lectures, which being upon the same head, the thread of them was not right nor didactical, and Nectarius's Penitentiary, not expounded the same way in one place as in another, and the first blundering and not true: therefore he adds, that if the Bishop had not writ, and for that he himself would not go out of the world without satisfying him in every thing, he had resolved to have sent for his papers and burnt them; but now he gave them up all to the Bishop upon this inviolable trust, that nothing of them should be published as a scheme of his, but to be made use of to serve any other design the Bishop should think fit. Dr Allestry's words are here transcribed, because the plainest account of things is always the most satisfactory (15).

[O] A small tract — intitled, The Privileges of the University of Oxford, &c.] Upon the publication of this piece, William Prynne came out with his University of Oxford's Plea refuted, &c. and in answer to that R. Waryng wrote An Account of Mr Prynne's Refutation, &c. and Mr Bagshaw senior published his Short Censure, &c. Mr John Fell, one of the fellows of Eton-college, was by some taken to be the author of this pamphlet concerning the University's Privileges (16).

ALLESTRY (JACOB), a Poet [A] of the last century, was the son of James Allestry, a bookseller of London, who lost most of his substance in the dreadful fire, which happened there in the beginning of September 1666. He was educated at Westminster-school, entered at Christ-church in Oxford in the Act-Term 1671, being then eighteen years of age, and the next year was elected student of that college. Afterwards he took the degrees of Bachelor and Master of Arts, was Music-reader in 1679, and Terra Filius in 1682; both which offices he executed with very great applause, being then

[A] A Poet.] He wrote several pieces of poetry; one of which intitled, What art thou, Love! was printed in a book intitled Examen Poeticum (1). We shall transcribe it, as a specimen of his talent.

What art thou, Love! whence are those charms!
That thus thou bear'st an universal rule!
For thee the soldier quits his arms,
The King turns slave, the wife man fool.

II.

In vain we chafe thee from the field,
And with cool thoughts resist thy yoke:
Next tide of blood, alas! we yield,
And all those high resolves are broke.

III.

Can we e're hope thou shou'd'st be true,
Whom we have found so often base?
Cozen'd, and cheated, still we view,
And fawn upon the treacherous face,

IV.

In vain our nature we accuse,
And doat, because she says we must:
This for a brute were an excuse,
Whose very soul and life is lust.

V.

To get our likeness! what is that?
Our likeness is but misery:
Why shou'd I toil to propagate
Another thing as vile as I?

VI.

From hands divine our spirits came,
And Gods, that made us, did inspire
Something more noble in our frame,

He had also the chief hand (as Mr Wood had been informed) in the Verfes and Pastorals, which were spoken in the Theatre at Oxford, May 21, 1681, by Mr

then esteemed a good Philologist and Poet. He died [B], the fifteenth of October 1686, and was buried in the church of St Thomas at Oxford, near the east end of the chancel (a).

Mr William Savile, second son of the Marquis of Halifax, and George Cholmondley, second son of Robert Viscount Kellis (both of Christ-Church) before James Duke of York, his Duchesse, and the Lady Anne. Which Verses and Pastorals were afterwards printed in the above-mentioned Examen Poeticum.

[B] He died.] This person, James Allestry (to use Mr Wood's own words) being exceedingly given to the vices of Poets, his body was so emaciated and worn away by his juvenile extravagances, that he retired to an obscure house in Fifth-Row, in St Thomas's Parish, in the suburbs of Oxford; where he continued incognita, under the care of a nurse, about seven weeks, and then died in a poor condition, and of a loathsome distemper. His body was carried to it's burial by four poor men (3).

ALLEY (WILLIAM), Bishop of Exeter, in the reign of Queen Elizabeth (a), was born at Great Wycomb in Buckinghamshire, and educated at Eton-school. He was removed from thence to King's-college in Cambridge, in the year 1528, and took the degree of Bachelor of Arts in that university. Soon after, he went to Oxford, where he spent some time in academical studies. Afterwards he married, was presented to a benefice, and became a zealous Reformer. Upon Queen Mary's accession to the crown, he quitted his cure, and travelled from place to place in the north parts of England, where he was not known; gaining a comfortable subsistence for himself and his wife, by practising physic, and undertaking the instruction of youth. When Queen Elizabeth mounted the throne he came to London, where he acquired such reputation by reading the Divinity-Lecture at St Paul's, that he obtained the bishoprick of Exeter, and was consecrated to that see, July 14, 1560. In November 1561, he was created Doctor of Divinity in the university of Oxford. He wrote: 1. The Poor Man's Library, being a Rhapsody or Miscellany in two volumes; the first containing seven lectures upon the first epistle of St Peter, read publicly in St Paul's cathedral in London, anno 1560; the second consisting of five lectures upon the same epistle, read in the same place. Lond. 1571, fol. 2. An Hebrew Grammar: but whether it was ever printed is uncertain. When the version of the Bible was undertaken by the command of Queen Elizabeth, this Bishop translated the Pentateuch. He died the fifteenth of April 1570, and was buried at Exeter in the middle of the choir [A]. He left behind him one son, who was Archdeacon of Cornwall.

ALLEYN (EDWARD) a celebrated Comedian in the reigns of Queen Elizabeth, and King James I, and a laudable benefactor, by his charitable foundation of a college in the county of Surrey; which flourishes with great improvements to this day. He was born of reputable parents, who lived in good fashion and credit. There is a picture in the said college, which has long passed for that of his father, with the age of fifty-nine inscribed upon it: 'tis attired in the genteel garb of his time, but was indeed painted for his father-in-law; as a curious and ingenious member of the said college has very lately informed me (a). His father has been also reported to have had some estate in Yorkshire: it is certain that his son died possessed of lands in that county, of his own purchasing; as may be seen under his own hand (b). But he was born in the city of London; in the parish of St Botolph, without Bishopsgate; on the first day of September, anno 1566, as we collect from a memorandum of his own writing [A]; and more particularly according to Dr Fuller, near Devonshire-house, where now, says he, is the sign of the Pye (c). The same author adds, that he was bred a Stage-player; which is not improbable, though in his younger days, his father might be in good circumstances, if his son proved intractable to a more severe education, or serious course of life. For it does not appear, by what he has left of his writing, that he had ever engaged himself very deeply in scholastic studies; though he was, as may be gathered from the several testimonies which have been given of him, a man of excellent natural parts; flexanimous genius, corporal agility, lively temper, faithful memory, fluent elocution; and in person, as appears by the picture preserved of him (d), of a stately port and aspect; all which might well induce a young man, to initiate and exert himself in that gay and popular profession. And indeed there are not wanting other authorities, whereby it seems to be confirmed, that he was engaged betimes in that vocation. For if before Christopher Marloe, the poet, died, Alleyn did not only act in several of his tragedies, but was arrived to that superlative degree, of being inimitable, or peerless therein; as it has been asserted in some verses we shall presently recite (e), it may be concluded, that Alleyn was upon the stage, some time before the year 1592, in which year the said poet Marloe died; as it may be found among the manuscript papers of the Lord Keeper Puckering, still in being (f). For he had then so captivated the town, and so monopolized the favour of his audience, by those agreeable varieties he could so readily command, in his voice, countenance, and gesture; and so judiciously adapt to the characters he played, as even to animate the most lifeless compositions, and so highly improve them, that he wholly engaged those who heard and saw him, from considering the propriety of the sentiments he pronounced, or of the parts he personated; and all the defects of the poet, were either beautified, palliated, or atoned for, by the perfections of the player. And thus much is intimated in a little curious tract, written by a noted satirist of those times [B], and printed but the year following that beforementioned; as well as by the attestations of several succeeding authors. And not only in prose but in poetry, we find some exalted commendations of him as an actor, by those who also knew, and could best judge of him [C]. Thus have many writers for, and concerning the stage, bestowed some fine general characters upon him, for his singular and surpassing qualifications in that sphere, of assimilate life; but for any historical particulars of his own real and proper life, (which surely must have produced, in a man of his figure, fortune, publick character, prudent œconomy, and long conversation with persons of distinction, some, worthy of preservation) except what his foundations and endowments have, of themselves, forced into publick view and record; or may be gleaned from some detached notes and minutes he left of his own private affairs, it is much that none among those, who were nearly concerned, and lived near enough in time, to have compassed sufficient materials, ever compiled some such monument to his memory, as might have done justice to gratitude, service to virtue, honour to their founder, credit to his profession, and every other way have answered the expectations of the world. Some corporations indeed, have secreted the generous and exemplary acts of their founders from publication; and we hear too often, that the superintendants of other charitable institutions, have prescribed themselves also a rule of reservation as to those particulars; and chose rather to bury in oblivion all honours which might be paid to their donors, than hazard the censure, or suspicion,

'age (1).' From whence might, and should be rectified, the erroneous date of his age upon his tomb-stone; and also that, which seems to have been thence copied, upon his picture.

[B] By a noted satirist of those times, &c. This was Thomas Nashe; one of the most comical, bantering authors of his age; who having had several publick controversies with Dr Gabriel Harvey, and his two brothers, of Saffron-Walden, the said Doctor published a pamphlet (2), in which he exposes that Thomas Nashe, and his acquaintance Robert Greene, very plentifully. Nashe smartly replied upon him, in a tract, now grown very scarce; which contains many curious particulars, touching several learned and ingenious men in those days, and it was published the next year after Dr Harvey's; who having had some epistolary correspondence with Edmund Spenser; this famous Poet used modestly to subscribe himself at the end of his letters, Inmerito; intimating, as if he thereby acknowledged himself unworthy of the esteem, or compliments, his said correspondent paid him. Nashe turns this word upon the Doctor thus: 'Signior Inmerito; so called, because he was, and is, his friend undeservedly, was counterfeitedly brought in, to play a part in that his enterlude of epistles, that was hit at; thinking his very name, as the name of Ned Allen, on the common stage, was able to make an ill matter good (3).² Thus we see how early this our player was famous upon the Theatre. But he usually played in the most excellent dramatic pieces; and even the capital parts in them. He certainly was one of the original actors in the renowned Shakespear's plays; and of this Poet's writing, there were no less than twelve publickly known, and probably acted so early, as 1598, as from certain contemporary writings it may be certified. In some of Ben. Jonson's plays he was also a principal performer; but what characters he personated in the plays of either of those Poets, is difficult now distinctly to nominate, through the inaccuracy of their editors; who printed not the names of the players opposite to the characters they performed, as the modern custom is; but either gave us one general list of actors to the whole set of plays, as in the old folio edition of Shakespear; or divided one from the other; setting the Dramatis Personæ before the plays, and the catalogue of performers after them; as in Jonson's (4). As to the distinction therefore of master Alleyn's talents; all we can add, is from Dr Fuller, and others, in a general manner. We are informed by him, that Alleyn 'made any part, especially a Majestic one, become him (5);' for which indeed, the portly and graceful figure of his person seemed well adapted. Another author says, 'He was an ornament both to Black-Friars, and to his profession (6).'² And 'he was as well famous for his honesty, as for his acting,' according to Sir Richard

Baker (7). This last author, who had doubtless been a spectator and auditor of him on the stage, also calls Alleyn and Burbage, 'The best actors of our time;' and adds, 'What plays were ever so pleasing, as where their parts had the greatest part (8)!' And in another more noted work of his, joining our Edward Alleyn with Richard Burbage again, he says, 'They were two such actors as no age must ever look to see the like (9).'²

[C] In poetry we find some exalted commendations of him as an actor, by those who also knew and could best judge of him. Namely, by Ben. Jonson (*); who, though generally avaritious of praise himself, and therefore often parsimonious of it to others, thus, generously addresses master Alleyn.

If Rome, so great, and in her wisest age,
Fear'd not to boast the glories of her stage;
As, skillful Roscius, and great Æsop; men,
Yet, crown'd with honours, as with riches, then;
Who had no less a trumpet to their name
Than Cicero; whose ev'ry breath was fame:
How can so great example die in me,
That Alleyn, I shou'd pause to publish thee?
Who, both their graces, in thyself, hast more Outstrip'd, than they did all who went before.
And, present worth, in all, dost so contract,
As others spake, but only thou dost act.
Wear this renown: 'tis just, that who did give
So many Poets life, by one shou'd live (10).

Also Thomas Heywood beforementioned, who both wrote for, and acted on the stage; setting forth in print, an old play of Marloe's, has, in his prologue thereto, spoken of that poet, and this player, as follows,

We know not how our play may pass this stage;
But by the best of Poets in that age,
The Malta Jew had being, and was made;
And he, then, by the best of actors play'd.
In Hero and Leander (11), one did gain
A lasting memory: in Tamerlane,
This Jew, with others many, t'other wan
The attribute of Peerless; be'ng a man, Whom we may rank with, doing no man wrong,
Proteus for shapés, and Roscius for a tongue (12).

ſuſpicion, of being unproportionable partakers of the donation: and therefore may have ſhown themſelves averſe to the encouragement of any ſuch memorialiſts, as were ambitious of transmitting the merits of their benefactors, in the moſt efficacious manner to poſterity; as if they looked upon the pens of Biographers, but as the probes and lancets of Surgeons, uſually addicted to the fearful friendlineſs of ſearching to the bottom, and letting out corruptions. In ſome of thoſe communities, the miſapplication of ſuch publick charities, has been ingeniouſly reflected on by Mr Selden (g); as the ſhynefs of ſuch communication has been cenſured, the ill conſequences diſplayed, and the cauſes detected by others (h). And thus much upon that topick is the rather obſerved in this place, becauſe as we are made moſt ſenſible of the virtue or value of ſome things, by a knowledge of their oppoſites, ſo the dark conduct or comportment in thoſe ſocieties, may ſerve here as a foil, to heighten the luſtre of that at Dulwich College, founded by this our famous Player, Edward Alleyn, as we are about to relate. For by the uſeful anecdotes and other material pieces of intelligence, which have been moſt candidly and obligingly imparted to us, out of the founder's own papers, and other antiquities in his college, by the preſent worthy maſter thereof, we have been much aſſiſted, to clear the ſaid founder from that obſcurity in which he has been ſo long clouded, diſcharge him of ſome miſrepreſentations wherewith he has been unjuſtly diſguiſed, and produce him in a fairer and ſtronger light, at leaſt than he has yet appeared in, to the publick. To this end, we have been principally deſirous of learning, by what means the ſaid founder was enabled, or was ſufficiently enriched, to undergo the expence of erecting ſuch a commodious edifice, and ſo liberally to endow it, for the handſome and decent maintenance of ſo many perſons. And thus much we may gather in anſwer to that queſtion; that beſides ſome paternal inheritance, whatever it was, which might deſcend to him, and lay ſome foundation to his future aſſluence; it is preſumed, that the benefits he made even by acting of plays, muſt, to a man of his provident and managing genius, and one who drew ſuch numerous audiences to the plays he acted in, being accounted the Protodramatiſt of his time, have alſo conſiderably improved his fortune. But he was not only an actor of plays; he was likewiſe maſter of a playhouſe of his own building, and over a company of players of his own conſtituting [D], by which he is ſaid to have amaſſed no ſmall treaſure. He was alſo keeper of the King's wild beaſts, or maſter of the royal bear-garden (i); either one or both of thoſe ſituated on the bank-ſide in Southwark; for there were two, which ſeem to have been reſorted to by great numbers of beholders (k): and the profits which accrued from theſe rough games, are reported to have amounted ſometimes, to no leſs than five hundred pounds per annum. But a little before his death, he ſold his ſhare and patent, as we are informed, to his laſt wife's father, for five hundred and fourſcore pounds (l). But matrimony itſelf has often empowered men, ſo diſpoſed, to perform as expenſive acts of liberality; and he was twice or three times married [E], to women,

[D] Maſter of a play-houſe of his own building; and a company of players, &c. This was the Fortune Play-houſe near Whitecroſs-Street, by More-Fields, which Mr Alleyn built, or perhaps rebuilt; for there is mention made by Mr Prynne, of the fearful burning to the ground of the Fortune Play-houſe (13), by ſome unknown accident; and alſo of it's being lately re-edified and enlarged (14). There is a tradition in the neighbourhood where this theatre ſtood (on the ground whereof, the founder's ſucceſſors have built many tenements) that in demolishing the old houſe, or digging to lay the foundation of the new one, which was rebuilt in it's place, there was found a conſiderable treaſure of money. If this happened while Mr Alleyn was proprietor there, it might fall, or the greateſt part of it, to him. There is an author who ſpeaks of him and this houſe in theſe words. 'He was maſter of a company of his own, for whom he built the Fortune Play-houſe from the ground; a large round brick building (15);' and a little further, that herein, as in others of their play-houſes, 'They alſo ways acted by day light (16).' And at this time, as well as long after, they had neither women actors, nor ſcenes. For, upon Sir William Davenant's firſt opening, by virtue of his patent, the Duke of York's Theatre in Lincoln's-Inn-Fields, in the ſpring of the year 1662, with one of his own plays, the Siege of Rhodes, then ſcenes made their firſt appearance upon the Engliſh ſtage (17); and about the ſame time, ſeemingly alſo by him, were actreſſes firſt introduced; and they grew ſo expert, not only in their own parts, but thoſe of the actors, that before the end of King Charles the Second's reign, ſome plays (and particularly the Parſon's Wedding) were repreſented all by women; as in his father's reign, and before, they were all by men (18). When the Fortune Play-houſe was in vogue, there were four more companies, which all got money and lived in reputation. And one of my authors laſt quoted, to the queſtion, How five companies could then be maintained by the town, when in his time, two could hardly ſuſſiſt? Anſwers, 'That though the town was then, perhaps, not much more than half ſo populous as now; yet then the prices were ſmall, there being no ſcenes, and better order kept among the company that came; which made very good people think a play an innocent diverſion for an idle hour or two; the plays themſelves being then more inſtructive and moral. Whereas of late, the play-houſes are ſo extremely peſtered with viſard-maſks, and their trade, occaſioning continual quarrels and abuſes, that many of the more civilized part of the town are uneaſy in the company, and ſhun the Theatre, as they would a houſe of ſcandal. It is an argument of the worth of the plays, and actors of the laſt age; and eaſily inferred, that they were much beyond ours in this; to conſider, that they could ſupport themſelves merely from their own merit, the weight of the matter, and goodneſs of the action; without ſcenes and machines: Whereas the preſent plays, with all their ſhew, can hardly draw an audience; unleſs there be the additional invitation of a Signior Fideli, a Monsieur L'Abbé, or ſome ſuch foreign regale expreſſed in the bottom of the bills (19).'

[E] He was twice or three times married. They have had a conſtant tradition at Dulwich-college, that the founder had three wives; but among their records, they can find only the names of the two laſt. The former of theſe was named Joan Woodward, and ſhe was the daughter of that gentleman whoſe portrait beforementioned, has been miſtaken for the founder's father's. There is a ſeal-ring upon one of his fingers, which, on a curious inſpection, made by the gentlemen in that college who has obliged us with this information, diſcovered to him the ſaid miſtake; for he found it to contain the ſame coat of arms with that of the founder's ſaid wife, which is impaled with his own, upon his tomb, viz. In the firſt coat, he bears ar-whose dowries, they leaving no issue to inherit, might probably contribute to the charge of this benefaction. Thus the means whereby he was furnished to establish it, may various ways be derived; seeing there are so many channels, through which the streams of fortune might at length concur, and centre in this fountain. But for the motives to this eminent act of beneficence, we have good reason to believe, they have been much misgrounded, or derived from a very false and foolish pretence, greatly detracting from their true deserts. For to whom should this humane, charitable, and pious foundation be ascribed, as it has with most injurious absurdity been related, but, in effect, to the Devil [F]! As if he were such a novice in spiritual warfare, as to drive an engineer out of one of his own batteries, over to the enemy, to raise a fortification against himself! But we hope this idle tradition, without any authority applied to this founder, has been sufficiently refuted, in the animadversions it has hereunder occasioned. And we are persuaded, if the author who fathered it upon him, had been in any degree conversant gent; a Chevron, between three Cinquefoils, Gules: In the second coat; he bears Gules; a Lion Passant, Or; on a chief Azure; Fleurs-de-Lys of the second. It also appears among some of the founder's memorandums, that he was married to this wife on the 22d day of October 1592: They lived above thirty years in harmony together; and when she died, on the 28th of June 1623, aged fifty-one years, he directed, in the memorials of her, which he caused to be inscribed upon her tomb, &c. that she should be called, his religious and loving wife (20). His last wife, who survived him, was Constance, the daughter of that Mr Hinchtow, to whom the founder sold, a little before his death, his share and patent of the bear-garden, as is above observed in the text. There appears also upon one of the organ pipes in the college chapel, the founder's arms, impaled with another coat, viz. Azure; a Wolf Rampant, Ermin; which is very probably supposed to belong to the family of Hinchtow (21).

[F] To whom should this pious foundation be ascribed, &c. but, in effect to the devil. My author, Mr Aubrey; or his editor; but it may be rather thought the former, who has so much laid open his own credulity himself (22), that there needs no more be said of it; speaking of Dulwich-college, founded by Mr Alleyn, says, 'The tradition was, that playing a dæmon, with six others, in one of Shakespear's plays; he was, in the midst of the play, surprised by an apparition of the devil; which fo' worked on his fancy, that he made a vow, which he performed at this place (23).' Enquiring once of the oldest actor of our time, the late Mr John Bowman, what he had heard, or thought of this story, he pleasantly answered to this effect: That we had been pretty even with the father of lies, in having so often belied him with frequenting of plays; for he thought it very inconsistent with any probability, that the devil should make his personal appearance at the play-house, and never go into the boxes, but always expose himself on the stage; and then, only to disconcert his humble imitators in a dance; thump the musick out of tune with his cow-heels; make the peoples hair stand an end, and drive them away in confusion; before they had made any assignation for their less innocent entertainments: and so make his friends curse him for his unseasonable disturbance, worse than ever his enemies did. Then, as for this foolish tradition in particular, it had made the devil such an egregious fool, as to frighten a man out of a vain course of life, into a religious one! where he draws a train after him, from generation to generation, out of a destitute, or perhaps disorderly course, and teaches them to attach themselves to the love of God, and renounce the Devil himself and all his works! Sure he never was such a wretched politician, as to conspire so against his own interest, the diminution of his own votaries; as many might otherwise have been; and thereby, if he should make a practice of such plots, the destruction of his own kingdom of darkness! If the Devil has, by this tradition, suffered in his character, the inconfutance of it, may, upon these considerations, clear him from being master Alleyn's prompter to good works; and suggest to us, some more sublime motive to his making this oblation of his fortune to the service of God, than being terrified to it, by any apparition of the Devil. — But, let us look into matter of fact, and we shall find master Alleyn no ways concerned in, or affected with this tradition. The story was stale, long before he left the stage. It seems to have some little relation to a play that was acted in Queen Elizabeth's time; but no play of Shakespear's; therefore the account in Mr Aubrey is faulty. The first hint we have met with of it, is, in an old pamphlet printed in the beginning of her successor's reign; wherein Lucifer, prowling about the town in disguise, meets with a Debauchee in a house of ill repute; of whom giving some description, he says, 'He had a head of hair, like one of my devils' in Doctor Faustus; when the old theatre cracked, and frightened the audience (24).' Here the audience appear to have been more alarmed by the cracking of the old house, while some harmless devils were performing their parts in that play, than by any supernumerary devil appearing in it; but if there was one, we may account naturally enough for that. Mr Prynne makes a great enlargement upon this narrow ground; but as he quotes no authority, and disagrees in the play-house where it happened, he is exceptionable too; where he mentions, 'The visible apparition of the Devil upon the stage at the Bell-Savage play-house, in Queen Elizabeth's days, to the great amazement both of the actors and spectators, whilst they were there, profanely playing the history of Faustus; the truth of which, I have heard from many now alive, who well remember it; there being some distracted with that fearful sight (25).' So that the Devil appeared in one of Shakespear's plays, as we find in Aubrey; and in a play that was not one of his, according to the Black Book; and in a play-house that was not the Old House, according to Prynne: But still in Queen Elizabeth's days; and no mention made of Mr Alleyn by either of these two last authors, who both mention the event, and lived in his own time. Nor is it to be believed that ever any such tradition was subsisting of Mr Alleyn, when Mr Prynne was accumulating his said unweildy bundle of invectives against stage-players: For as he was many years scraping up materials, and muddling in them, he could not have been ignorant of such an extraordinary incident; nor would he have been silent, in what might have so directly served his purpose; but would, to be sure, have made a triumphant example of such a notable convert. In the reign of King Charles II, the town was alarmed again with such another visitation, as the aforesaid Mr Bowman has also informed me: and, I think it was at the house in Dorset-Gardens; where in a dance of devils again, there appeared one too many; some comical fellow among the comedians, having got into such a horrid dress, as made him a much more infernal figure than the rest, and so unexpectedly started up among them, that they took him for the Devil indeed, were struck with a kind of pannick, which soon infected the audience, and dispersed it in consternation. And after the like manner, may all the other apparitions of the Devil on the stage be probably accounted for. But lastly, to put it beyond all doubt, that the Devil never appeared in any play, or any play-house, that deterred Mr Alleyn from repairing to them; or that he was, by any other cause or means, induced to withdraw or abstain from them, even to the latter part of his life; we find he resorted to, and carried on the business of his own play-house in London, even after he had built, and was settled in his college at Dulwich; and this is to be proved by no less authority than a memorandum he left written in his own hand; wherein it appears, that having one day received the profits of a play acted in that house, at which there was a very slender audience, he entered it down, that his whole receipt amounted to no more than three pounds and some odd shillings (26).

converfant with his private papers, he would have found reason to attribute this dedication of his substance to the poor, not to any sudden turn of mind, but to a constituent principle, maturely settled and grounded upon the strongest basis of piety and benevolence. For therein he appears, by many expressions, a man who had been habituated to devotion; infomuch, that when he came to town about his secular affairs, he would, as if it were the chief part of his business, make it in his way to call at some church or other, and partake of the divine service (m). So that the stage was so far from having presented any cause of remorse, that it seems to have rather proved a school of religion to him; where he had imitated imaginary characters of virtue, till he determined, now providence had enabled him, to become himself imitable in real ones. And we may conclude, by those ejaculations he makes, acknowledging so devoutly, cordially, and constantly, as at the ends of his quarterly accounts, &c. all he was possessed of to be the Gift of God (n), that he had deliberately resolved upon the most grateful and acceptable ways of restoring it, through the hands of innocent and indigent Men. Then having resolved also, as we see by the event, to make himself an uncommon example, in preferring time present, and not postponing it; which adds a great lustre to the act; in not trusting the execution of it to the hearts, hands, and eyes of others; not to any posthumous direction, but to his own; while he was living in health and strength, and before he was forty-eight years of age; well knowing that the life of a gift, is then most perfectly itself, when made in the life of the giver. In this consideration it will follow, that necessity, in order to his putting those resolutions in practice, obliged him to withdraw from the lesser stage, that he might perform the part he had cast off for himself, upon the great and real theatre of the open world. If any secondary motives were to be admitted, they might arise from the thoughts of being a leading pattern, the first of his profession, who had adorned his country with such a monument of munificence; or from the hopes of inspiring an emulation in some theatrical descendants or other, who might be as fortunate as himself, in like manner to advance their character and calling into higher repute; or from several other inducements, more probable than that senseless one, before exploded and rejected. But from his motives, to proceed to his execution of this work. He began the building of his college at Dulwich in Surrey, on the borders of Kent, about five miles southward of London-bridge, after the design and direction of Mr Inigo Jones, who was a witness to his deed of settlement, so early, that it appears to have been in some forwardness in 1614, the year in which he is commonly thought to have first set about it; as we learn with other particulars of this college at Dulwich, from one of his own acquaintance, who has given the first printed account of it [G]. It has been presumed, that eight or ten thousand

[G] Particulars of this College at Dulwich, from one of his own acquaintance, who has given the first printed account of it.] This is Mr Edward Howes, who, in his edition and augmentation of Stowe's Chronicle, having given some account of Mr Sutton's hospital, which may be perceived to be written in the middle of the year 1614, by his mentioning the death of Henry (Howard) Earl of Northampton, proceeds in these words: 'Edward Allen, alias Allein, of Dulwich, Esq; at this time builded a very fair hospital at Dulwich in Surrey, for six poor men, and six poor women, and for twelve poor children, from the age of four to six, to be there kept and maintained, and taught, till they come to the age of fourteen, or sixteen years; their schoolmaster to have his diet, lodging, and a competent stipend. He intends also to have a master to reside in the same hospital, whose name shall be Allen, or Alleyne; and by that name, to be chosen to that government of his hospital for ever; as the place shall grow vacant. This said founder told me, that he intends, and also forthwith, to build thrice twelve poor folks lodgings (*) in London, viz. Twelve lodgings, or rooms, in three several parishes; and give unto every of them some maintenance. Within two years, this house will be finished, and the poor in possession; and then, there is more to be said of it: in the mean time, thus much deserves thanks and memory (27).' For it is, as this author above describes, a very fair hospital; containing the chapel, master's apartments, &c. in the front, and the lodgings of the other inhabitants, &c. in the two wings; whereof that on the east side was handsomely new built, in 1739, at the expence of the college. Among the observables therein, they have a little library of books; and had a good collection of plays given by old Mr William Cartwright, an excellent comedian, and acquaintance of the founder's; he was also a bookseller, and lived at the end of Turnstile-alley by Lincolns-inn-fields (28). He published the learned Vindication of Actors, hereafter quoted, written by Thomas Heywood, Fellow of Peter-house Cambridge; who was also a noted actor, and had an entire hand, or main finger, in writing two hundred and twenty plays, as we have it under his own pen (29). He had long before published that vindication himself, under a title somewhat different (30), for which he was called the Atlas of the stage; and having improved and enlarged it, it was soon after his death published, by the said Mr Cartwright, without date, but in Oliver's time, as we take it; by the discouragements mentioned of his profession, in his dedication, under the two first letters of his name, to Henry Marquis of Dorchester. But to return; not far from the library, there is in the west wing, a long gallery full of pictures; whereof, the best were those left by the founder himself; to which were added also Mr Cartwright's collections, and among them a curious picture of London, from a view said to be taken by Mr John Norden, the Topographer, in 1603, with the representation of the City-procession on the Lord-Mayor's day (31). The founder's picture is at full length, in a robe or gown; but the resemblance of his face is said to have been drawn when he lay dead in his coffin. And there is a portrait also of his former wife; besides, Mary Queen of Scots, Henry Prince of Wales, Sir Thomas Gresham (32), and both the Cartwrights, elder and younger, with many other persons of note; as appears by an old catalogue preserved of them: but the little pictures of the Kings of England, are, I think, discreetly enough hung in no very good light. The present master's picture is also painted at full length, by Mr Charles Stoppelaar, lately a player; but it is not exposed in that gallery. There was a list of the members of this college printed, as they stood near thirty years since; in which the said master appears then to have been warden (33): So that he has been, about the last half of his life, in promoting the advantage of his college, no less famous, for the vigorous activity of his mind, than in the former part of it, he was, for that of his body. By the list of the present members it appears, their names and offices are—James Allen, Esq; Master; Joseph Allen, Warden; John Hilary, Preacher; Thomas Gregory, School-master; Thomas Waterhouse, Usher; Samuel Tankfield Hawkes, Organist. It has been formerly published (34), what their salaries pounds were expended by him upon this college, chapel, &c. before the buildings and gardens were finished, which was about the year 1617; for then he began (o), on the twenty-ninth of September, to keep a Diary of all such collegiate accounts, proceedings, and occurrences, or other personal and domestick affairs, as might assist his memory, by recurring to any past particulars he had registered, or administer hints in his mind, of making future regulations in his plan or model of that fellowship or society, he was now incorporating to participate of his Christian hospitality. And in leaving that Diary behind him, he gave his successors opportunity of seeing, not only how the settlement began, but, by the daily occasion he so enjoyed himself, of noting down so many little events, transactions, and observations, also of better seeing how he was pleased with the progress that was made, and what his inclinations were in carrying the government on, than if he had left them, without such experience, an whole volume of meditations on the subject. And indeed, his inclinations have been so well regarded, and his foundation so greatly improved, beyond whatever he could have expected; even, as it is credibly reported, almost to the doubling of the revenue he settled upon it, especially within about these thirty years last past, by the prudent and faithful management, of the present most valuable master this college ever had since the founder; that if other trustees, managers, directors, and heads of houses, had done the like, we should have met with sublime encomiums, as frequently, as we do with severe censures of such publick donations. But after the founder had built this college, he met with some difficulties in obtaining a charter for settling his lands in mortmain; that he might more absolutely endow it, as he proposed, with eight hundred pounds per annum; for the support and maintenance of one master, one warden, and four fellows; three whereof to be ecclesiasticks, and the other a skilful organist; also six poor men, as many women, besides twelve poor boys; to be educated in good literature, till the age of fourteen or sixteen years, and then put forth to honest trades and callings. That obstruction arose from the Lord Chancellor Bacon; who, though otherwise of a generous spirit, would have had King James settle part of those lands for the support of two academical lectures, which were then proposed to be founded by two of his friends; and he wrote a letter to the Marquis of Buckingham, dated from York-house in the Strand, August 18, 1618, intreating him to persuade his Majesty to that purpose [H]. But at length Mr Alleyn's benefaction was allowed to be made entirely in his own way; and it appeared so above competition and objection, that it obtained the royal licence, and he had full power and liberty given him to establish his foundation, by his Majesty's letters patent, under the great seal, bearing date at Westminster, the twenty-first of June, 1619 (p); by virtue whereof, Master Alleyn did, in the chapel of the said new hospital at Dulwich, called The College of God's Gift, on the thirteenth of September following, publicly and audibly read, and publish one writing quadrupartite in parchment; dated the said day and year; whereby he created, established, and confirmed the said college, according to the power and authority above (q). When he had read and published the said writing, he subscribed it with his name, and fixed his seal to every part of the quadrupartite writing, in the presence of many honourable persons; then ordered those writings to four several parishes [I]. were, and what the allowance of the poor men and women; which we do not repeat, because as the revenue is considerably increased, the salaries and allowances are likewise.

[H] Intreating him to persuade his majesty to that purpose.] This letter written by the said Lord Chancellor Bacon, to the Marquis of Buckingham, is as follows.

Now write to give the King an account of a patent I have stayed at the seal. It is of licence to give in mortmain eight hundred pound land, though it be of tenure in chief, to Allen that was the player, for an hospital. I like well, that Allen playeth the last act of his life so well; but if his majesty give way thus to amortize his tenures, his courts of wards will decay; which I had well hoped should improve. But that which moved me chiefly, is, that his majesty, now lately, did absolutely deny Sir Henry Savile (35), for 200 l. and Sir Edward Sandy's (*), for 100 l. to the perpetuating of two lectures; the one in Oxford, the other in Cambridge; foundations of singular honour to his majesty, and of which there is great want; whereas hospitals abound, and beggars abound never a whit the less. If his majesty do like to pass the book at all; yet, if he would be pleased to abridge the 300 l. to 500 l. and then give way to the other two books for the university, it were a princely work: and I would make an humble suit to the King, and desire your Lordship to joyn in it, that it might be so (36).²

There was a remark made on this letter, by the first editor of it, with some others of the said Lord

Bacon's, which is here transplanted in this edition, to the bottom of the page; part whereof, which concerns the said letter, is as follows. 'It were to be wished this observation did not hold true to this day: for though the foundations of hospitals are to be commended, which Sir Francis Bacon hath done, both in this letter (37), and other his writings (38), yet it shews that some more adequate remedy for supporting the poor, than what arises from these charities, or even from the laws enacted for their relief, was then, and yet is to be desired. And as the defect thereof, is no small reproach to the government of a country, happy in it's natural product, and enriched by commerce; so it would be an act of the greatest humanity, to provide for the poor; and that idleness and beggary, the successive nursery of rogues, might as far as possible be extirpated (39).'

[I] Fixed his seal, in presence of many honourable persons; then ordered those writings to four several parishes.] Those honourable persons were, Francis, Lord Verulam, Lord Chancellor; Thomas, Earl of Arundel, Earl Marshal of England; Sir Edward Cecil, second son to the Earl of Exeter; Sir John Howland, High-Sheriff of Suffex and Surrey; Sir Edward Boyer of Camberwell, Sir Thomas Grymes of Peckham, Sir John Bodly of Strettham, Sir John Tonstall of Cashalton, and divers other persons of great worth and respect. The parishes in which the said writings were deposited, were, St Botolph's without Bishopgate, St Giles's without Cripplegate, St Saviour's in Southwark, and the parish of Camberwell in Surrey. And the contents, or heads of the said statutes, or quadrupartite writings, containing the laws and rules of this foundation, are as follow, lofty state, or superior distance, he lived in this community, and how affably he condescended rather to a kind of equality in it, may be gathered from the words of one of his contemporaries and acquaintance; who, speaking of some eminent players deceased, goes on thus: 'Among so many dead, let me not forget the most worthy, famous Mr Edward Alleyn, who in his life-time erected a college at Dulwich, for poor people, and for education of youth. When this college was finished, this famous man was so equally mingled with humility and charity, that he became his own Pensioner; humbly submitting himself to that proportion of diet and cloaths, which he had bestowed on others (r).' And how perfectly satisfied he was with this distribution and settlement of his substance, may plainly appear, by this memorial of his own writing, which is preserved among his papers, ——— 'May 26, 1620, my wife and I acknowledged the fine at the common-pleas bar, of all our lands to the college: Blessed be God, that hath given us life to do it (s).' Many other like circumstances might be picked out of his papers and his Diary aforesaid, which might further confirm, if it were further needful, his hearty benevolence to this work; which Diary ending on the twenty-ninth of September, 1622, comprehended just five years (t). We are informed also, there remains no book of his account after that time. His wife, with whom he had so long affectionately lived, died about six months after, in the year 1623, as is before observed; and he might find it inconvenient, as the college had been used to the inspection and government in some part or degree also of a mistress, to live the remainder of his life a widower; for we find that within about a year or two afterwards, he married his last wife Constance, also beforementioned (*). Some improbable stories have been raised upon this occasion, but the lightest handling will prevent their growth [K]. She seems to have been well pleased with the course of life he had preferred, and to have lived with him, for the short time they lived together, also in conjugal harmony, by the sums of money he left her in his will, besides jewels, &c. as may be seen in the extract thereof, here subjoined [L]. He died on the (u) twenty-fifth, not the twenty-first of November, 1626; and

[K] The lightest handling will prevent their growth. 'Tis said in a work (before quoted) whether by the author, or his editor, is not distinguished, that, 'Notwithstanding all the solemnity of this deed, the founder lived to change his mind, upon a second marriage; when he was very desirous of revoking his charity, but was not suffered. In his original endowment he has excluded all other augmentation, from future benefactions; and has constituted the church-wardens of St Giles's without Cripplegate, St Mary-Overy's, and St Botolph's Bishopsgate, visitors; who, upon any disagreement, which they cannot compromise, are referred to their dernier resort, the Archbishop of Canterbury (41).' As to that assertion of his revoking; it appears nothing more than an envious or malicious suggestion, for which there is no authority produced, or to be found. And there appears enough by what has been already said, and what hereafter follows by the founder himself, in his own Will, which was made some time after his marriage, and not a fortnight before his death; that he was so far from ever having had any thoughts of repenting or revoking his charity, that he appears there, augmenting it to his last gasp. And as for his excluding all other augmentation; 'There is no such thing to be found or intimated in his statutes; indeed he had thereby excluded himself from all power of making any additional members, or augmenting them, their number being fixed and limited, both by the letters patent, and the deed of incorporation; as the late Lord Chancellor King expounded and decreed, in a trial concerning the members of the said college (*).' But as to what the late Sir John Lade has been heard to report; it is much more incredible, and impossible, than any other tale, which has been ever spread of the Founder. As if, after he had appointed himself to be the first master of his own college, and restrained all the masters by statute to be unmarried, he should alter his own resolution of celibacy, and therefore was, upon his marriage, deprived of his office by Archbishop Abbot; to whom, when Archbishop Laud succeeded, being better skilled in civil and canon-law, he declaring that no founder could commit any offence against statutes of his own devising, did, as soon as possible, restore him (42). But, the founder could make no resolution of celibacy, being married when he made the statutes; nay the first Master and Warden he chose himself, and were his successors, were married men: so that the misapplication of that story to the founder, might arise from the objection therefore made to them by the society; but it was overruled by the Visitor, and the Archbishop himself. But chronology will quite clear the founder of such expulsion and restoration; for Laud was not Archbishop of Canterbury till September, in the year 1633, which is almost seven years after the death of master Alleyn.

[L] The extract thereof here subjoined (43). His Will is dated the 13th of November, 1626, wherein he appoints his burial to be performed without any vain funeral pomp or shew in Christ's chapel, in God's Gift college, by him founded. And after his just debts paid, paid, so speedily as may be, after his decease, he, the said Edward Alleyn and Matthias Alleyn, a person by him put in trust, for and in assurance of one thousand five hundred pounds, to and for his dear and loving wife, Constance Alleyn, after his death, have by two several deeds dated the 20th of June last, set over unto Sir Nicholas Carew of Beddington, and Sir Thomas (44) Crymes of Peckham in Surrey, Knights, &c. One capital messuage, or inn, called the unicorn, in St Saviour's parish in Southwark, in the county of Surrey, and all other messuages and tenements there: and also certain tenements called the Barge, the Bell, and the Cock, on the bank-side, in St Saviour's parish aforesaid. And for further assurance of the said 1500 l. to his said wife, has acknowledged a statute of 2000 l. bearing the same date to Sir Nicholas and Sir Thomas aforesaid; who also covenanted, in a pair of indentures of defeizance, that if the said sum were paid her by his executors, within three months after his decease, the said statute should be void, with the two deeds of assignment, or to reassign them to such persons as the testator should appoint: so desires his executors would first of all satisfy her, and then that the two Knights would reassign the two leases to his executors. And in testimony of his further love to his wife, leaves her for her present use, one hundred pounds more, which he had already, on the 26th of September last, delivered for her to Sir T. Crymes; and gives her moreover, all her jewels and other ornaments, whereof she is possessed. Item, He gives to the corporation of God's Gift-college, his seal-ring with his arms, to be worn by the master and his successors; and appoints a common seal to be made for the college; both to be repaired by the college as oft as they need; also all his books and instruments, with the pictures, hangings, and other furniture therein. And all the furniture in the twelve poor scholars chambers, together with several parcels and sets of his own household linnen, and other utensils; all the implements of husbandry, and two teams of horses and oxen. Item. He wills that his executors within two years after his decease, shall build ten almshouses, in the parish of St Botolph without Bishopsgate, London, for ten poor people of that parish, to be members of the aforesaid college; and likewise, ten other houses in St Saviour's parish in Southwark aforesaid, for other ten poor people of that parish, to be likewise members of the said college; which said twenty poor people being placed in their several houses, shall have such maintenance, as in the statutes of the foresaid college is appointed. Item. He gives to Thomas Alleyn, the son of John Alleyn, late of Willen, in the county of Bucks, being his cousin, and next heir at common law, 50 l. Item. To Edward Alleyn, jun. of Newport, 20 l. and to his two sisters, Elizabeth Newman, and Anne Ashpoole, 20 l. a-piece. To his aunt, Jane Waldock, of Water-Eaton, 10 l. To Anne Alleyn, wife of John Harrison, Clerk, 20 l. Item. He wills his copy-hold Lands in Lambeth-Marsh, to Edward Alleyn, his god-son, and his heirs male; and for want of such issue, to John Alleyn, the son of Matthias Alleyn, and his heirs for ever. Item. To Sir Francis Calton, Knt. 100 l. and forgives 20 l. he owes him. Item. To Elizabeth Cutler, his late wife's god-daughter, 10 l. Item. To Hannah Pickerly, 10 l. Item. To Elizabeth Ruffell, a young girl in his house, 10 l. Item. To all the rest of his household servants, in his service at his death, so many pounds a piece, as they have been years in his family, besides their wages. Item. To the church-wardens of St Botolph's aforesaid, and their successors, a tenement in Dulwich, with the appurtenances, called the Blue-house, for the use of the poor of the said parish, to be by them disposed of, as in the statutes of the said college is set down. And after these legacies, &c. are paid; the two leases assigned to those Knights, shall remain as an augmentation to the college, over and above what is assured thereto in the statutes. Item. He gives (after his legacies paid) to his two executors, their heirs and assigns for ever, all his lands in Yorkshire, which he lately purchased of George Cole, Esq. And also, after his funeral expences, debts, &c. are discharged, all the residue of his goods, chattles, cattles, and ready moneys whatever, to Thomas Alleyn, and Matthias Alleyn, his kinsman; whom, by this his last will, he constitutes his sole executors; charging them, as they shall answer it before the face of the Almighty, that they punctually, as far as they possibly may, perform and execute the same, &c. Signed, sealed, &c. the day and year above-written; and the Probate is dated on the 13th of December following. G

A L L I X (PETER) a very learned and eminent Divine of the Church of England, though a native of the kingdom of France, and well known in the republick of letters by his numerous, and his excellent writings. He was born some time in the year 1641, at Alençon (a), and having received a liberal education, which highly improved his great natural parts; he became minister of the Reformed Church at Rouen, where, before he was thirty-five, he distinguished himself by publishing some very learned and curious pieces [A], by which he acquired a great reputation (b). It was owing to this that he

[A] Some very learned and curious pieces.] At the time our author came abroad into the world, the controversy about the Eucharist was very warm; and the ablest Protestant Divines were employed in writing on that subject. His earliest performance was intitled, I. Réponse à la Dissertation sur Bertram & Jean Scot, ou Erigene qui est à la fin du premier Tome de la Perpetuité de M. Arnaud. i. e. An answer to a dissertation on Bertram and John Scot, which is at the end of the perpetuity of the faith by Mr Arnaud. This short treatise of our author, is at the close of John Claude's answer to M. Arnaud's book (1). As for the dissertation, in answer to which it was written, the author of it was, Father Anselm Paris, Canon Regular of St Genevieve (2), who replied to him in another book, intitled, Créance de l'Eglise Grecque sur la Transubstantiation (3), i. e. The faith of the Greek Church as to Transubstantiation. To clear up this matter our author published, 1672, 12mo. i. e. Ratramn, or Bertrand, the priest, on the body and blood of our Lord, in Latin and French. The design of our author in publishing this version, was to shew that Bertrand differed in his sentiments on this subject, from the Church of Rome, as appears by an advertisement prefixed to the book. James Boileau published another translation of this antient author (4), with a long preface, in order to prove his opinions did not deviate at all from those of the Romish Church.

III. Dissertatio de Trifagii origine Autore P. A. V. D. M. (Petro Allix Verbi Dei Ministro) Rothomagi 1674, 8vo. i. e. A dissertation on the first rise of the trifagium or doxology; by Peter Allix, &c. The learned Bayle, in an epistle of his, to Dr Theodore Janson, takes notice of this work, ascribes it to our author, and mentions a mistake committed by Maimbourg, in ascribing it to another person (5).

was called from Rouen to Charenton, which was the principal church the Reformed had in France, the village in which it stood lying little more than a league from Paris, at the confluence of the rivers Seine and Marne, and whither the most considerable persons in France, of the Protestant religion, constantly resorted (c). We are therefore to consider this removal of our author, as the highest testimony of respect that could be paid him by those of his communion, in the circumstances in which they then were. As he was now in the zenith of preferment, and saw himself in a condition of doing great service to the Church, he applied himself to the task with all imaginable zeal, and preached several most excellent sermons in defence of the faith, against the artful attempts of the Bishop of Meaux, who was then labouring to overturn the reformed religion, by seeming concessions to its professors (d). Some of these sermons were afterwards printed in Holland, and met with deserved commendations from the famous Bayle, who testified a very high esteem for the learning and abilities of their author (e) [B]. Upon the revocation of the edict of Nantes, Mr Allix found himself obliged to quit France, as well as the work of the ministry in that kingdom, and had prepared a most moving and pathetic discourse, which he intended to have delivered as his farewell to his congregation, which however he was obliged to omit, though the sermon was afterwards printed, and deservedly admired (f) [C]. This edict was revoked, and the reformed religion banished France in 1685, on which our author resolved to follow the advice of his friends, and retire into England, which accordingly he did, either in that or the following year. He met here with a most favourable reception; on account of his extensive learning, and more especially his singular knowledge in ecclesiastical history, for which he was particularly esteemed (g). On his first coming, he applied very closely to learning our language, which he attained to a surprizing degree of perfection, as appeared by a book he published in defence of the Christian religion, and which he dedicated to King James

Christ, &c. The precise date of this small treatise does not appear, but that it was much esteemed, reprinted by the learned Crenius; and that he was in some measure mistaken as to its author, we learn from an epistle of Mr Bayle, to that industrious editor on this subject (6).

V. Dissertatio de Tertulliani vita & scriptis, 8vo. i. e. A Dissertation on the life and writings of Tertullian. There is an abridged translation of this very learned and accurate performance, at the close of the French version of Tertullian's Apologetic, by M. de Giry (7). It was also printed together, with the following dissertation, on the authority of certain councils, by Crenius; as appears from the epistle beforecited.

VI. Dissertatio de Conciliorum quorumvis definitionibus ad examen revocandis, 8vo. According to all circumstances, these curious and elegant performances, were all of them sent abroad in 1680, or thereabouts, and must have contributed to raise the author's character exceedingly, by shewing his solid and extensive learning, especially in points of ecclesiastical history, and criticism (8). It may not be amiss to mention another larger work of his in this note, because we cannot otherwise introduce it in proper order of time, though it was not published till after his being called to Charenton.

VII. Anastasi Sinaitæ anagogicarum contemplationum in Hexahemeron, liber xii. hactenus desideratus, Græcè & Latine ex versione & cum notis Andrea Dacerii. Præmissâ Expositulatiô de S. Joannis Chrysostomi Epistola ad Cesarium à Parisiensibus Theologis nuper suppressa. Londini 1682, 4to. i. e. Anastasis his twelfth book of contemplations, on the six days work of the creation; which has been hitherto so much desired, in Greek and Latin, from the version, and with the notes of Andrew Dacer. To which is prefixed, an expositulatory preface, in relation to an epistle of St John Chrysostom to Cesarium, lately suppressed by some Parisian Divines. This Anastasis was Archbishop of Antioch, about the year 561. The first eleven books of these Contemplations had been long before published

(9), and these were earnestly desired, to render his work complete. The Papists were at that time very assiduous in publishing the Christian Fathers, and the most learned Protestants took care to examine their editions; and to give the world early notice of any attempt to conceal, or to obtrude, under colour of publishing these valuable monuments of antiquity.

[B.] Learning and ability of their author. I have not been able to discover when these Sermons of our author were first published, but the second edition of them bore this title.

VIII. Douze Sermons de P. A. Ministre du S. Evangile sur divers textes: A Rotterdam chez Reinier Leers, 1685, 12mo. i. e. Twelve Sermons by Peter

Allix, Minister of the Holy Gospel, upon several Texts. Of these sermons Mr Bayle gives the following account (10). 'I shall only say, in reference to these discourses, that they turn all of them on matters of great importance; and that in the first four, the author labours to establish the true principles on which an answer can be grounded, to the Pastoral Advertisement, addressed to those of the Religion by the Clergy of France, in 1682. It is with this view, that it is shewn with great force of argument, that every man is obliged to examine attentively, the doctrine taught him by his Pastors, and to reject whatever appears to him false. In them, the words, Thou art Peter; and upon this Rock, &c. are explained with wonderful perspicuity, and are set in very new and singular lights. In them also we find explained, the promise made by JESUS CHRIST to his disciples, that he would send them a spirit, that should conduct them in all truth, and it is shewn that this does not prove the Church should be infallible. The nature of the Church is treated in the eleventh sermon, and one may venture to say, that it is one of the most important places in the book. One may also without hazard assert, that the sermons on the Descent of Christ into Hell, on the Sin against the Holy Ghost, on the Miseries of final Impenitence, on the taking away the Cup, on the Incarnation of the Word, &c. contain a thousand beautiful passages, equally strong in sentiment, and delicate in their turn and expression.' Such an eulogium from such a writer, is sufficient to establish the character of any author, above the reach of minor critics.

[C.] Afterwards printed, and deservedly admired. Before the publication of this sermon, appeared another small work of his, viz.

IX. Les Maximes du vrai Chrétien, i. e. The maxims of a good Christian. This was joined to another treatise, intitled, Bonnes & saintes pensees pour tous les jours du mois. Amsterdam 1687, i. e. Good and holy thoughts, for all the days in the month. He was before this time, withdrawn from France, and therefore at liberty to send into the world in print, what, without danger to himself, and to his congregation, he could not have delivered at Charenton. This work was intitled,

X. L'Adieu de Saint Paul aux Ephesiens, Sermon sur les Versets 26, 27, 28, du xx Chapitre des Actes (11). Amsterdam 1688, 12mo. i. e. St Paul's farewell to the Ephesians, a sermon upon Acts xx. 26, 27, 28. In this, he represents the necessity of supporting temporal and spiritual afflictions with patience and resignation, and the duty of professing the Faith, and adhering to it with constancy, in perillous as well as peaceable times.

James II in very respectful terms, acknowledging at the same time, not only his personal obligations to that Prince (b), but also his kindness and charity to the distressed refugees in general, which is a very singular and remarkable piece of history [D]. He was very soon complemented here with the degree of Doctor in Divinity, and in 1690, he had the treasurer-ship of the church of Salisbury (i) given him, but I do not find that he was ever Canon of Windsor, as is asserted in some foreign memoirs. It was proposed that he should have published here an authentick History of the Councils, for which laborious and important work, unquestionably there never was any man better qualified, but by some accidents intervening, and for want of encouragement, this great and useful undertaking miscarried (k). He wrote and published however several treatises relating to ecclesiastical history, equally learned and entertaining, which were wonderfully well timed, and very useful to the Protestant cause, which was then attacked by the arts of Romish Priests, as well as by the arms of Popish Princes. These pieces were remarkably well received, and Dr Allix became in as great credit here, as ever he had been in France (l), for his ingenious and solid defences of the reformed religion, from reason and authority, from the practice of early ages [E], as well the precepts of the Gospel. In the year 1699, he wrote

XI. Reflections upon the Books of the Holy Scripture, to establish the Truth of the Christian Religion. In Two Volumes, London 1688. This treatise we find licensed for the press by Dr H. Maurice, Chaplain to Dr William Sancroft, then Lord Archbishop of Canterbury, January 12, 1687-8. There is a large extract from the first edition of the first volume of this work, and a good character given of it in a Litterary Journal published jointly by Messieurs Le Clerc and La Croze (12). But the whole was completely published in English, on account of the countenance the author met with from King James, to whom he wrote the following dedication, which however is missing in some copies.

(12) Bibliothèque Universelle & Historique, Tom. V. p. 305.

Great Sir,

THE gracious acceptance which your Majesty was pleased to allow the first volume of my reflections upon the Holy Scriptures, to establish the truth of the Christian religion, encouraged, and almost necessitated me to the further presumption of laying these two volumes at this time at your Majesty's feet. Your Majesty did me the honour to say, That you were pleased to see Divines apply themselves to the clearing of subjects so important. And after this judgment given by so great a Prince, which is so evident a demonstration of your zeal, for the fundamental truths of the Christian religion, it had been unpardonable in me, not to have gone on with the work; and I had reason then to consecrate it wholly to your Majesty, who, I was assured, would approve of my intentions, and for that reason would pardon the imperfections of the performance. As your Majesty continues still to give such illustrious instances of your clemency, and royal protection, to those of our nation, so I confess, Sir, I thought myself under an obligation to lay hold upon this opportunity of publishing what all those, who find so sure a protection in your Majesty's dominions, feel and think as much as myself upon these new testimonies of your royal bounty. When your Majesty had taken us into your particular care, and had granted us several privileges, and so made us sharers in all the advantages, which those who live under your government enjoy; your Majesty did yet something more, and inspired all your subjects with the same compassion toward us, with which your royal breast was already touched. You saw our miseries, and resolved to give us ease; and this generous design was executed, and your royal clemency diffused in the hearts of all your subjects. The whole world, Sir, which has received upon all it's coasts, some remainders of our shipwreck, is filled with admiration of the unexampled effects of your Majesty's clemency. There is no place so barbarous, where the renown of that mercy, which has been so gloriously extended towards us, has not been carried; and the remembrance will be ever dear to the remotest ages of posterity. We must, Sir, be wholly insensible, if we had not all of us the highest sense of so great a bounty; and we should justly appear to the whole world, to be unworthy of this your Majesty's paternal care; if notwithstanding that low condition, to which we are now reduced, we should not prostrate ourselves before your august throne, with the humblest demonstrations of thankfulness. When God showers down the greatest blessings upon mankind, he requires this just tribute, which is also their greatest honour, by opening to them an access unto the throne of glory. And this sacred pattern we crave leave to follow, when we solemnly pay the like tribute to your Majesty, who can receive nothing from us again, that can answer the greatness, or the number of those favours, which have so very much exceeded all our desires. I could wish, Sir, that this work which I now present to your Majesty, might be so happy as to pass to posterity with this character of our acknowledgment; and that it might stand as a faithful record for ever, to perpetuate the memory of that lively sense of your bounty, which is imprinted on all our hearts. If this could be hoped for, it must be wholly owing to your Majesty's glorious name, which latest ages will receive with reverence. But, Sir, though I dare not hope that these reflections can obtain that honour, yet our age at least may see, that they bear these publick marks of gratitude for all your Majesty's royal favours. This, Sir, is my whole aim, in the dedication of this work to your Majesty; and may your sacred Majesty be pleased to approve of these poor testimonies of our thankfulness in general, and to look upon them as instances of mine in particular; and of that profound respect, with which I am,

S I R,

Your Majesty's most dutiful,

London, May

and obedient subject and servant,

P. A L L I X.

[E] From the practice of early ages. It appears plainly, that soon after Dr Allix's coming over to England, he was acknowledged both here and abroad, for the most learned and accurate writer in defence of the Protestant religion, that his country had produced; of which abundant proofs might be given, if the testimony of Bayle, and the authorities cited in the last note (where we report the elogia bestowed on him) were not more than sufficient. But the particular manner in which he galled the Roman Church, was by attacking her with her own weapons, and proving that, while she treated others so freely with the opprobrious name of Hereticks; she had herself invented new articles of faith (13). In support of this charge, he published the following treatise that had been sent him from Paris.

XII. Determinatio F. Joannis Parisiensis de modo, existendi Corpus Christi in Sacramento Altaris, alio quam fit ille quem tenet Ecclesia. Nunc primum edita ex M. S. Cod. S. Victoris Parisiensis; cui prefixa est Præfatio Historica de Dogmate Transubstantiationis. Londini 1686, 8vo. i. e. The determination of brother John Paris, Jacobin, as to the mode of our Lord's Body, existing in the sacrament of the altar; different from that, held by the Church. Now first printed from a MS. at St Victor's in Paris; to wrote a very learned book in defence of the Trinity, which had very considerable effects, and has been always looked upon as a piece of great value in respect to Hebrew literature [F]. He wrote besides the works already mentioned, several other learned and which is prefixed, an historical preface, as to the Doctrine of Transubstantiation. This historical preface, is entirely the work of our author, in which he incontestably proves, that this point of Christ's presence in the sacrament, was quite unsettled in the earliest ages of the Christian Church, and never considered as an article of faith, even in the Church of Rome, till declared so, for particular reasons, by the council of Trent (14).

XIII. Some remarks upon the ecclesiastical History of the Antient Churches of Piedmont, by P. Allix, D. D. London 1690. 4to. This treatise was licensed for the press, September 23, 1689. by Dr Z. Ilham, Chaplain to Dr Henry Compton, Lord Bishop of London. Our author dedicates this work to King William, and pays him very high compliments on his zeal for the Protestant Religion; to support and defend which, he tells him, God had raised his majesty up in that critical conjuncture. The design of this very learned and accurate performance, was to refute what the Bishop of Meaux had advanced on this subject, in his famous book, intitled, The History of the Variations of the Protestants in Matters of Faith (15). A book that did then, and has since, done more hurt to the Protestants, than any thing else that has been published on that side. The aim of our author in this admirable performance (which contains twenty eight chapters) was to shew the true state of the case, with respect to the succession of doctrines, in several parts of Italy, but more especially in the vallies of Piedmont from the second century; which with great labour and industry he collected, and with laudable candour and ingenuity, has published to the world, by which it plainly appears, that he did not intend to amuse them with an affected display of learning, but to vindicate the truth, by setting the History of these Churches in it's proper light. It was by doing this, that he has fully proved the Romish Prelate's book can affect none, but such as do not inquire into the truth of the facts he reports; and proves farther, that all inquiries of this nature, are injurious to the Popish cause, in as much as they tend to render it evident, that the errors and power of the Romish Church, had in all ages, contrary to what they would persuade the world, been detected and opposed. It was in prosecution of the same view, and to continue what he had so happily begun, that he sent abroad,

XIV. Remarks upon the Ecclesiastical History of the Antient Churches of the Albigenes. By Peter Allix, D. D. Treasurer of the Church of Sarum, London 1692. 4to. This treatise the Author dedicated to the Queen, i. e. to Queen Mary, daughter to his first patron King James; and in that dedication, he lays open the design of this treatise, and the reasons of his submitting it to her majesty's view, very fairly and freely. In the book itself, there is all the good sense and sound learning, that the severest critick could expect upon the subject. In it he very strenuously and judiciously defends the Albigenes from the charges of heresy and schism, which the bishop of Meaux had brought against them, and with great force retorts upon him his own arguments; by shewing, that a constant and vigorous opposition of the power of the Church of Rome, founded not only on a disavowal of her authority, but on a difference from her also in opinion, is far from proving either heresy or schism in the opponents, but rather shews persecution on one side, and a great zeal for truth on the other. He examines likewise, in the course of his remarks, abundance of curious and important questions, with much freedom, learning, and impartiality, traces the progress of the sentiments maintained by the Albigenes into Spain, and discovers how far, and in what degree, the same notions were diffused here in England, by the famous Wickliff and his disciples. By way of appendix, there are added to this work, an extract of several trials of pretended hereticks, taken from the Register of Sarum; which serve to confirm the facts laid down in the discourse itself, as to the conformity of the religious sentiments of the Albigenes, with those of the Lollards; a kind of reproachful term bestowed on the Wickliffites here, as Hugonot was on the professors of the Protestant Religion in France.

VOL. I. No. 11.

[F] A piece of great value in respect to Hebrew literature.] Our learned author having already distinguished himself by his excellent treatises, in support of the Christian Religion in general, and of the Protestant Religion in particular; now thought it highly requisite to draw his pen in vindication of the Holy Trinity, against the Unitarians, which he did in that very learned work, of which we propose to give an account in this note.

XV. The Judgment of the Antient Jewish Church, against the Unitarians in the Controversy upon the Holy Trinity, and the Divinity of our blessed Saviour: With a Table of Matters and a Table of Texts of Scripture occasionally explained. By a Divine of the Church of England, London 1689. 8vo. In order to understand clearly, the nature and design of this work, it is requisite to observe, that the Unitarians, in answer to Bishop Bull's excellent vindication, had published several treatises, in which they asserted that Justin Martyr, who lived 140 years after Christ, was the original author of the notion of our Saviour's divinity, and consequence of the Trinity. To establish this paradox, they maintained, I. That since the Jews had asserted the Messiah to be no more than man, as appears from the dialogue between Justin Martyr and Trypho the Jew, it must necessarily follow, that all the Jewish authors, cited by Dr Bull, against the opinion of the Socinians, must have lived after the publication of the gospel. II. That the books of the Jews, which he cites against the Socinians, are the pious frauds of some Christians, who have lived since Justin Martyr; and this is believed to be particularly true of the books of Philo the Jew, and of that of Wisdom. III. That the Jews could not speak of the Trinity, or of the Divinity of the Messiah, because they knew nothing of either; and therefore we must necessarily suppose, that whatever is found in their works, and which seems to favour these doctrines, must have been inserted by Christians, who lived after the time of Justin Martyr. IV. In fine, that if after all there be any thing, either in the Scripture, or in the writings of the antient Jews, conformable to these doctrines, it very probably proceeded from the Platonicks, from whose writings the Jews and Christians borrowed many notions, which they mingled with the doctrines of the gospel, in order to render them more acceptable to the Pagans. The great design therefore of our author's book is, to refute these assertions; and not only so, but to examine the matter to the bottom, and to prove that the antient Jewish Church had, with respect to the Trinity, and the Divinity of the Messiah, the very same ideas at the bottom, that the Christian Church hath at this day, only less clear and less exact. This was a great undertaking, and required a most extensive knowledge in Greek and Hebrew literature, which every body must allow our author has shewn, and managed this whole controversy with equal perspicuity and erudition (16). It seems he had before written in support of Bishop Bull, but without putting his name to the treatise, and therefore I have not been able to discover it's title.

These treatises created the doctor a great many enemies, and amongst the most furious, Mr Stephen Nye, rector of Hormhead, who wrote an answer, in which, amongst other things, he says what follows (17). 'If I have not here answered with all the respect and tenderness that I would, the doctor is to thank himself for it, as having given a provocation that could not be dissembled. He has now written two books, one after another, professedly against Mr N. imputing to him several books, that were written not by Mr N. but by Mr S. and some others I could name, as has been all along known to several gentlemen, and to some bookfellers; and at the time that Dr A. published the Judgment, it was so commonly known, that his forwardness and rashness in libelling and delating Mr N. to the whole nation, and to his superiors, as the undoubted author of them, admits no excuse. Of so many, eminent for learning and dignity, as have written against those books; though without doubt they had heard the cackle of report, concerning Mr N. and other reputed authors of Mr Firmin's prints, as well as Dr A. yet in their answers, none of them charged those books on and ingenious treatises on curious and important subjects, so that he was for upwards of thirty years, an active as well as illustrious member of the Republick of Letters, and a very able, as well as affectionate defender of the established Church. Some of these pieces exposed him to very severe censures, and amongst the rest from Mr Bayle (m), who had formerly complimented him so highly, but considering the subject, and the impossibility of writing about it with certainty, our author's mistakes ought not to have drawn upon him any severe usage, or contemptuous language [G]. One would have

* Mr N. or the other supposed writers, save only this stranger; who of a Refugee for religion, was not ashamed to turn Informers. He that will take on him the infamous character of an Informers, is ready without doubt to go much farther, if circumstances and opportunity invite him. Every body knows what Name is intended by Mr N. Should not an advised and an honest man have first enquired, whether there be not more persons of that name; that if perhaps there be, he might avoid doing wrong to innocent persons, by an indefinite, uncertain signification, what particular person he meant? When those books to which Dr A. points were written, there were no fewer than three Mr N's clergymen, all of them beneficed within forty miles of London, and two of them acquaintances of Mr Firmin. The Informant therefore should have some way notified, which of the Mr N's he intended to accuse, and wished to see a publick sacrifice. I can tell him, there are divers witnesses among the Socinians themselves, that will at any time assure Dr A. or any other, that neither of the Mr N's, friends of Mr Firmin, were ever in the sentiments of Socinus. Though it be true also, that they disapproved, and opposed the Tritheism of some modern writers, that contended for a Trinity of distinct (infinite) Beings, Minds, and Spirits, which might bring on them the imputation of Socinianism, with a great number of other foolish calumnies, from their adversaries, or from the Tritheistick party.

But when such an imputation or report was up: I pray how, would it recommend the books of Dr A. to tell every body (or the whole nation) that they are written against Mr N. more than if he had said, they are written against some anonymous pamphlets, that are gotten into too much credit and reputation?

I have heard it confidently reported, that Dr A. himself, is author of one of Mr Firmin's principal books: The Defence of the brief History of the Unitarians: and some gentlemen of his nation (Refugees also for religion) say, Dr A. was always reputed a Sabellian. I believed both these reports, and so did many others: he has convinced me by the Judgment, it was a slander, or at best a mistake; for he is a Tritheist. It will be a new warning to me, and ought to be to him, not to publish flying reports, for certain News; especially to a whole nation, and to the possible prejudice of persons who never wronged me.

[G] Any severe, or contemptuous language.] In this note, we propose to give a succinct account of the remaining pieces published by our author, in their natural order, which will afford us ample opportunity of explaining, proving, and justifying, what has been already delivered in the text, and particularly, allow us occasion to shew how he came to lose in some measure, the good graces of Mr Bayle, though there never happened any open breach between them.

XVI. De Messia duplici adventu Dissertationes duæ adversus Judæos. Londini 1701, 12mo. i. e. Of the two Advents of the MESSIAH, in as many Dissertations against the Jews. It was this treatise, that hurt the author with many people, on account of some extraordinary things that are advanced in it. He had, for example, mentioned some computations, according to which, the second coming of Christ was fixed to the year 1720, or to 1736, at the latest: in this, no doubt, he was mistaken, and deceived, but what then? Can it be truly asserted, that other learned men never err in their speculations; or, if they do, is he bound to be more perfect, or exact? If mens failings in computations draw any imputation on the principles of science, it may be doubtful, whether there be any certainty in the world? But in regard to our author, the apology for him, is soon made. He did not pretend to prophecy, or revelation, he did not set up for new lights, or supernatural gifts, but proceeding on such grounds, as had been thought sure by some as great men as ever this church, or nation bred; he was so unlucky, to apply their principles wrong, or mistook for principles, what in reality were no more than conjectures, by which he came to advance, as things probable, what, in effect, experience has proved false. But does this small fault affect his other learning? Must we ruin the fair structure of his reputation, after all the pains he took to raise it, because one stone is misplaced? Shall we suppose he knew nothing, because he did not know when the day of judgment was to come? No surely, this would be too hard measure. Let us admit he had weaknesses, but let us still be just to his known merits, and grateful for the service he has done us in his other learned works.

The true cause why Bayle expressed some contempt on the subject of this treatise, was, his being engaged in a dispute with M. Jurieu, who doubtless had used him very ill, and deserved all the severity he met with from him. This M. Jurieu, had set up for an expounder of prophecy, and even for a kind of Prophet, in which he notoriously failed. It was impossible for such an adversary as Bayle, to overlook an opportunity like this of triumph, and it was as impossible for him to use it, without involving more or less, all, who by giving that turn to their studies, seemed in any degree to countenance Jurieu. It was this that engaged him to write the article of Frederick Braunbom, a German Enthusiast, in order to have an opportunity of falling on Jurieu, and to avoid the glare of personal reflection, on almost all such as had written on like subjects. Upon this occasion he brings in our author, notwithstanding Jurieu's want of success, says he, Dr Allix has taken the field, to assure us, that Antichrist will be extinct in 1716, in 1720, or, at the latest, in 1736 (18). But to proceed with the catalogue of our author's writings.

XVIII. Nestarii Patriarchæ Hierosolymitani Confutatio Imperii Papæ in Ecclesiam. Londini. 1702, 8vo. i. e. Nestarius Patriarch of Jerusalem, his Confutation of the Pope's Authority in the Church. This was a translation made by our author into Latin, from the Greek original printed in 1672, in Moldavia, it was a pretty large octavo, and contained abundance of curious facts, more especially as to the claim made by both Churches, to the proof of their Orthodoxy by miracles, which it is on both sides supposed, God will never work in favour of any but the true Church (20).

Londini 1706, 8vo. i. e. Augustus Herman Francke's Introduction to the reading of the Holy Scriptures, published by Dr Allix. Our author only wrote a short preparatory recommendation to this book, in order to make it known here in England, and to certify it's usefulness and worth.

[H] Many

have imagined that these curious and laborious works, would at least have done honour to the orthodoxy of their author, and have secured him from the opprobrious imputation of Herefy, but the fact is quite otherwise, for a vehement English writer charges him with Tritheism (n), and a collection of lives lately published abroad, leaves his memory under the reproach of Socinianism, than which, without question, there never was a charge more groundless or incredible (o). Our learned author however, continued steady and fixed to his principles, and was so well known to be a zealous defender of the doctrine of the Church of England on that subject, that the famous Mr Whiston thought proper to consult him, when he first proposed writing in support of his own opinions, as appears by what himself delivers on this subject, in one of his most remarkable pieces (p). But our author conceiving this account of that conversation somewhat disingenuous, thought it requisite to give himself a short relation of that affair, to which he adds many things equally curious and important (q) [H]. He enjoyed a very uncommon share of health and spirits, as appears by his latest writings, in which there is not only all the erudition, but all the quickness and vivacity that appeared in his earliest pieces. Those who knew him found the same pleasure in his conversation, that the learned will always find in his productions, for with a prodigious share of learning, he had a wonderful liveliness of temper, and expressed himself on the dryest subjects with so much sprightliness, and in a manner so out of the common road, that it was impossible to flag or lose one's attention, to what was the subject of his discourse. He was consulted by the greatest men of his age, on the deepest and most intricate parts of learning, and was acknowledged for a genius of the first order, by those whom the world have esteemed, not only the most capable but the most unbiassed critics (s) [I]. It was not any single

[H] Many things equally curious and important.] This little treatise of our author, which is now become extremely scarce, bears the following title: XXIII. Remarks upon some places of Mr Whiston's books, either printed or in manuscript. By P. Allix, D. D. Lond. 1711, 8vo. The account he gives us of his conversation with Mr Whiston is very particular, and very worthy of the reader's notice; and therefore, as well as in regard to the scarceness of this tract, which is but a pamphlet, I will give the whole passage in the author's own words, esteeming it a very entertaining part of his personal history. (*) The late Dr Payne, as Mr Whiston faith, (for I think they both joined in the question) having asked me, Whether the Holy Spirit was addressed to in the publick prayers of the primitive Church? I answered, that if they had ever read the works of St Basil the Great, they would have found a satisfactory answer to their question; for that he had writ a large discourse on that very subject, in which, he not only supposes, that all their publick prayers were directed to the Father by the intercession of the Son in the holy Spirit; but proves likewise, that the Deity of the Spirit, was generally supposed by the Church, in that form, though it was not formally directed to him alone. I advised him to read that piece of St Basil, who had a natural occasion of examining this matter, by the complaint which was made against him; that in the Doxology he used indifferently, these words: Glory be to the Father, with the Son, and in, or with, the Holy Ghost. And indeed, St Basil writing near fifty years after the rise of Arianism (which gave the hint to Macedonius, Bishop of Constanti-nople, to deny the Divinity of the Holy Ghost, and to do all he could to support his herefy) had solidly defended the sense of the primitive Church, in all times, and places, concerning the Deity of the holy Spirit; and confuted all the arguments of the Macedonians. This is the substance of that conversation; and, I am sure, the Divines, and Ministers, who were there, and then present, little thought, I had therein given any occasion for such a charge as Mr Whiston has now, at the distance of twelve or thirteen years, publicly brought against me. He has given me indeed, the title of The very learned Doctor, &c. But, as he doubtless has his reasons for what he does, I suppose, he might design at the same time, that it should serve for the justification of himself. Timeo Danaos & Dona ferentes. Some months ago, one of Mr Whiston's friends told me, he had heard from Mr Whiston, such an account of that conversation, as he has since printed. I then told the gentleman the whole truth of the matter, and what then passed between us: but I thought it of so little importance, that tho' Mr Whiston came afterwards to visit me, in company with some friends of his, I did not think it necessary to take any notice of it, after the explanation I had given his friends, and which in all probability came to his ears; especially, since I could not have done it, without blaming him for his incivility, in making his own use of what I had said, by changing the state of the question, and sup- pressing a part of my answer: an incivility so much the greater, because I had referred them to St Basil's book, de spiritu Sancto, for an account of my sentiments about the question they proposed. I have had several opportunities of conversing with Mr Whiston, and I am satisfied he never looked upon me, as one who inclined in the least to his opinions. I thought him a studious man, and had a respect for him as such; and he will do me the justice to acknowledge, that I always spoke my mind to him very freely and sincerely; but that I never approved of the liberties he took, which indeed were more than could be well born with.

[I] Not only the most capable, but the most unbiassed critics.] One need scarce either consult or quote on this occasion any other than M. Bayle, who in all his pieces publick and private, does him the utmost justice, and applauds his learning, candour, and abilities, with a zeal, that evidently proves his commendations were sincere, and proceeded entirely from the warmth of his heart. I may I think take the liberty of observing, that Bayle and he were in opposite sentiments in regard to very many, or perhaps to most things, so that his applauding him was purely out of love to truth, and from that strict regard to justice, which is incident to men of true science. An accident happened in the beginning of our author's reputation, which afforded sufficient testimonies of the esteem and regard shewn towards him by other learned men. In the year 1683; came out at Amsterdam, a book with the following title, L'Ouverture de l'Épître de St Paul au Romains par l'explication du vers et 27 du chap. iii. & un Lettre en forme de Traité touchant la justification & la lecture des Peres, 12mo. i. e. An Opening of the Epistle of St Paul to the Romans, by the Explanation of chap. iii. 27, of that Epistle, together with a Letter in form of a Tract, on Justification and the reading of the Fathers. Mr Bayle, it seems, had been informed that Mr Allix handed it to the press, on which he inadvertently mentioned him as it's author. But the book giving great offence, Mr le Clerc wrote to Mr Bayle on the subject, who in his answer gives the highest character of our author, confesses his mistake, and owns the work to have fallen from the pen of M. le Cene (21). In another letter to the celebrated Mr Lefant he says the same thing (22); which shews how uneasy those learned men were, for fear any imputation should light on a character hitherto unspotted. Mr Bernard in his Litterary Journal, speaks very respectfully of Dr Allix; so does M. le Clerc in some pieces of the like kind, and so also does the learned Abbé Houtteville, in his copious discourse on such as have defended the Christian branch of literature, or a few related to each other, that could occupy his thoughts, but the whole circle of sciences which fall under the cognizance of a general scholar, and found divine. All these he had not only tasted but digested, as appears by his excellence in different, and almost opposite studies. His sermons shew him to have been an admirable orator, and at the same time a profound scholar. The several antient authors he published testify his skill in criticism, and his perfect acquaintance with antiquity. His treatises on ecclesiastical history, discover a prodigious fund of reading, an exact comprehension of his subject, and his sincere zeal for the Protestant religion. He laboured also to serve it by the tracts he rescued from dust and oblivion, to shew (as they effectually did) that the charge of novelty on which the Papists insisted so loudly, was not barely unreasonable, but at the same time groundless. His thorough acquaintance with Hebrew and Rabbinical learning, with whatever depends thereupon in Greek and other languages, was displayed in his laborious performance in defence of the doctrine of the Trinity, in which his sincerity is as conspicuous as his learning. If in the prosecution of these deep and recondite studies, he somewhat mistook his way, and erred a little in his computations, it was no more than had befallen the greatest men who have travelled this road before him, particularly Joseph Mede, and Bishop Lloyd, neither have these examples convinced other ornaments of the commonwealth of letters that the roads are impassable, since the very learned Dean Prideaux, and the indefatigable Sir Isaac Newton, have devoted many of their hours to like inquiries. Our author continued his application to the last, and having spun out the thread to an extraordinary extent, died at London, February 21, 1717, in the seventy-sixth year of his age, leaving behind him the reputation of a man, equally assiduous in the right discharge of all the offices of publick and private life, and every way as amiable for his virtues and social qualities, as venerable from his uprightnes and integrity, and famous for his various and profound learning.

nature, but that it seems to so little purpose, since the world will always see enough in his writings, to justify his learning, prudence, and application. E

A L M A R U S, E L M A R U S, E L M E R U S, Æ L M E R U S, was Abbot of the monastery of St Austin at Canterbury, at the time when Ælfegus, or as he is commonly called Alphage, the Archbishop was barbarously murdered by the Danes, in the year 1011 (a). At this time, our historians report the city to have been betrayed, by one Elmerus an Archdeacon (b). As for our Almerus, the Danes suffered him to go at liberty, and in the year 1022, being according to the Saxon Chronicle, the sixth of King Canutus's reign, Almerus became Bishop of Sherburn (c) [A] in Dorsetshire, which bishoprick was afterwards transferred to Salisbury. Godwin hath his name in his account of the Bishops of that see, but he tells us, that besides his name he knew nothing concerning him (d), which is highly probable, for he makes him to have sat there, in 1009, and cites no authority in support of that date. Elmerus it seems did not incline either to leave his abbey, or to become a Bishop; however, he prevailed upon at last to take upon him that dignity, and when he had so done, he discharged it with great constancy and vigour, till such time as it pleased God to render him quite blind. Upon this he resigned his bishoprick, much more readily than he had accepted it, and returning back again to his abbey, lived there in a cell in the infirmary, in great innocency and devotion to his last hour (e). There is one thing very remarkable related of him, and it is this, One day as the boy who attended him was bringing him his dinner, a kite came suddenly down, and carried away the victuals in it's talons. The boy amazed at so odd and so unexpected an accident, first told Almerus, and then went back to the kitchen for more meat. Almerus resolved within himself not to eat flesh, unless the kite brought back the flesh it had taken, supposing that this was a sign of it's being unlawful. The boy who knew nothing of this, was surprized a second time; for, before he got to the kitchen door, the kite stooping again, dropped the victuals into his platter; he returning, reported the thing to Almerus, who giving thanks to God, sat down to his dinner without scruple. When he came to die, he directed that he should be buried, not as a Bishop, but as a Monk, which was accordingly done (f). He was interred in the church of the monastery, before the altar of St John, and his memory held in great veneration, though our author tells us, that without the authority of the Holy See, they could not pay their devoirs to him as a saint (g).

[A] Almarus became Bishop of Sherburn.] The great Patron of this Bishop was King Canutus, who though in his father's life-time, and even some years afterwards, he was fierce and cruel towards the English; yet when he was seated on the throne, and established by force of arms, he endeavoured to gain the people's affections by a milder and more moderate behaviour. Inasmuch, as the cruel slaughter made at Canterbury, and especially the martyrdom of Archbishop Alphage, had rendered the Danes odious; Canutus thought proper not only to translate the body of the martyr, with all imaginable respect and magnificence, which he performed eleven years after his death (1), but also took the Monks at Canterbury under his special protection, which accounts for his extraordinary kindness to our Bishop

Almar. This parade of piety, however it might deceive the people of that age, is, not without cause, treated as downright hypocrisy by later historians; who by comparing the actions of this Prince, have discovered most of his politick contrivances were glossed with such sanctified pretences; in spite of which, he remained ambitious and rapacious to the last (2). It should seem that our Bishop had not very different thoughts, since he so unwillingly accepted so great a dignity, and so readily resigned it, when his infirmity gave him an opportunity of so doing (3). His humility and greatness of soul, ought to commend his name to posterity, as a pious and worthy man, which is full as much to his honour, as if he had been a Romish Saint. E

ALPHERY (ΜΙΚΕΡΗΡ) born in Russia, and of the imperial line (a). When that country was torn to pieces by intestine quarrels, in the latter end of the XVIth century, and the royal house particularly was so severely persecuted by impostors (b), this gentleman and his two brothers were sent over to England, and recommended to the care of Mr Joseph Bidell, a Russia merchant. This gentleman, when they were of age fit for the university, sent them all three to Oxford, where the small-pox unhappily prevailing, two of them died thereof. We know not whether this surviving brother took any degrees or not, but it is very probable he did, since he entered into holy orders, and, in the year 1618 (c), had the rectory of Wooley in Huntingdonshire, a living of no very considerable value, being rated at under ten pounds in the King's books (d). Here he did his duty with great cheerfulness and alacrity, and notwithstanding he was twice invited back to his native country, by some who would have ventured their utmost to have set him on the throne of his ancestors; yet he chose rather to remain with his flock, and to serve God in the humble station of a parish Priest. Yet in 1643, he underwent the severest trials from the rage of the Phanaticks, who not satisfied with depriving him of his living, insulted him in the most barbarous manner. For having procured a file of musqueteers to pull him out of his pulpit, as he was preaching on a Sunday, they turned his wife and small children out into the street, into which also they threw his goods. The poor man in this distress, raised him a tent under some trees in the church-yard, over-against his house, where he and his family lived for a week. One day having got a few eggs, he picked up some rotten wood and dry sticks, and with these made a fire in the church porch in order to boil them, but some of his adversaries, to show how far they could carry their rage against the Church, for this poor man was so harmless they could have none against him, came and kicked about his fire, threw down his skillet, and broke his eggs (e). After this having still a little money, he made a small purchase in that neighbourhood, built him a house, and lived there some years. He was encouraged to this by a Presbyterian Minister who came in his room, who honestly paid him the fifth part of the annual income of the living, which was the allowance made by parliament to ejected ministers, treated him with great humanity, and did him all the services in his power. It is a great misfortune, that this gentleman's name is not preserved, his conduct in this respect being the more laudable, because it was not a little singular. Afterwards, probably on the death or removal of this gentleman, Mr Alphery left Huntingdonshire, and came and resided at Hammersmith, till the Restoration put him in possession of his living again. He returned on this occasion to Huntingdonshire, where he did not stay long, for being upwards of eighty, and withal very infirm, he could not perform the duties of his function. Having therefore settled a curate, he retired to his eldest son's house at Hammersmith, where shortly after he died, full of years and of honour (f). It must be owned that this article is very imperfect, but the singularity of a Russian Emperor's being a country minister in England, will, we hope, atone for those deficiencies, which it was not in our power to prevent. ALREDUS, ALFREDUS, or ALUREDUS, of Beverley, an antient English historian; he is said to have had his education in the university of Cambridge, where he acquired not only great skill in divinity, but became also an able philosopher, and a good historian (a). He returned afterwards into his own country of Yorkshire, where he became a secular Priest, one of the Canons, and Treasurer of the church dedicated to St John of Beverley (b). Bale, and after him, Pits, positively affirm, that he flourished under King Stephen, and that he continued his Annals to the year 1136 (c). Vossius, though a foreigner, comes nearer the truth, he tells us that he flourished in the reign of Henry I, and that he died in the year 1126, in which year also according to him, he ended his Annals (d). The history he wrote however agrees with none of these, it ends in the twenty-ninth of Henry I, and consequently he died in all probability, in the year 1128, or 1129 (e). He was, as we may gather from the preface to his work, a man devoted to his studies, and rather in narrow circumstances than rich. He intended at first no more than an abridgment of the British history, that is, the history of the antient Britons, which was at that time much talked of, and some time afterwards published more at large by Jeffrey of Monmouth. But when our author had gone through this, a desire of pursuing the thread of his story led him to add the Saxon, and then the Norman history, so that at length he brought it down to his own times (f). This for any thing that appears, was the only piece he wrote, notwithstanding a crowd of great authorities, which assert him to have been the author of four other books, a gross mistake, as we hope to prove to the satisfaction of every reader in the notes [A]. [A] To the satisfaction of every reader in the notes.] As we are greatly obliged to Bishop Bale for his collections concerning British writers, notwithstanding they are very full of errors, so we ought certainly to be very careful how we charge him with greater defects than really are in his writings: As to our author, we shall state the case fairly, and with many circumstances, omitted even by the industrious Mr Hearne, who was not aware that Bale had given more than one account of Alfred of Beverley. The first edition of this writter's history of British authors, was printed in 4to. in 1548, and therein his account of Alfred of Beverley is very short; all he says of his works, being comprised in the following lines which I cite, because the book is extremely scarce, in his own words. 'De variis e-

ment of our history from Brutus to Henry I, is one of the most valuable pieces that has escaped the rage of time, and the indiscretion of the first reformers. It is written in a concise, elegant, Latin style, with great perspicuity, and a more than ordinary attention to dates and authorities. One may without straining the compliment, call Alured of Beverley our English Florus, his plan being nearly the same, neither is he less happy in it's execution. One may justly wonder that so judicious a person as Leland, did not give him a place amongst the British writers, especially since it appears from another work of his, that he had seen our author's history (g). The true reason seems to have been, that Leland considered him only as the author of an abridgment of Jeffrey of Monmouth's British history, which mistake (for the greatest men may sometimes mistake) was owing to the hurry with which he read this book. Otherwise he could not but have seen, that our author is not a bare transcriber of the British history, and secondly, that he went much farther than the author he is said to have copied; after all it is very doubtful, notwithstanding the positive assertions of so many great men, whether Alured ever saw that version of the British history, which we now have of Jeffrey of Monmouth, many circumstances making it probable, that it was not published before our author wrote his Compendium, as will be shewn in another place (h). If he had, it is not easy to assign a reason, why he should not mention his author, since in this respect he is very exact in other places, and even here, he calls it the British history, and says very candidly at the conclusion, that he only transcribed what he met with therein, and that he could not pretend to account for the silence of the Latin writers, and even of the English ones concerning the acts of King Arthur, who fought not only against the Pagans in Britain, but also against the Romans themselves in Gaul (i). If this had really been Jeffrey of Monmouth's translation, why should he have concealed it, rather than Henry of Huntington who abridges the same history, and adding it by way of appendix to his own, doth not dissemble whence he took it. The manuscripts of this work were always scarce, and very few who mention it had seen it. Mr Joscelin, in his catalogue of the writers of English history whose works he had met with, gives us some account of him, but then it appears plainly that he trusted to Bale, and did not consult the MS. itself (k), which he assures us was in the hands of Mr Netleton. I do not find that the industrious Stowe had ever met with this history, otherwise I think he would certainly have quoted it, as would later compilers of our general history, if at any time it had come to their hands. The MS. from which Mr Hearne published it at Oxford in 1716, belonged to the famous Thomas Rawlinson, Esq; (l) and Mr Hearne himself acknowledges, that it was the only one he ever saw. The title he gave it was, The Annals of Alured of Beverley, to which I conceive he was inclined, on account of his books being quoted by this title, by some antient writers, and indeed the title is proper enough, though the book is not divided after the manner of the Abbey Chronicles, but inasmuch as dates are constantly preserved, and as the latter part is particularly exact, as to the years of the Kings reigns in which the facts therein recited fell out, it may well enough be stiled Annals. John Withamsted, a very antient writer, speaking of our author, says, that he wrote a Chronicle of what happened from the settlement of Brutus, to the time of the Normans, in which also he treated of the cities antiently founded in this kingdom, and set down the names by which London, Canterbury, and York, were called in old times, when the Britons inhabited them (m). This authority is much to the honour of our historian, for Withamsted flourished in the XVth century, and was a man of a critical turn, as appears by his attacking the history of Jeffrey of Monmouth. This testimony agrees exactly with the ‘ history of the various events, and of the several successions from the origin of the Britons to his own times, in one book. Of the nature of things, one book; as to the rest of his writings I have been able to learn nothing, though I have made a strict enquiry (1).’ He farther tells us, that he supposed him to have flourished in the reign of William the Conqueror, about the year 1086. But afterwards, as if from better informations, he gives us the following catalogue of his works: ‘De floratione Galfredi, Lib. v. Brytannia major, quae nunc Anglia. De Gestis Regum Angliae, Lib. 1. Finito Regno Brytonum, Brytanniae. De gestis Regum Brytanniae, Lib. 1. Aggressus sum Laborem, itaque mihi. Historiam ampliozem, Lib. 1. in Diebus silentii nostri occur. Vitam D. Joannis Archiepiscopi, Lib. 1. & alia quaedam. i. e. Extracts from Geoffrey, five books, beginning: Brytannia major, &c. Of the Acts of the Kings of England, one book. Of the Acts of the Kings of Britain, one book. A larger history in one book. The Life of Archbishop John, in one book, and some others (2).’ Pits transcribes this account verbatim (3), and therefore, if we can account for Bale's mistake, we account for his at the same time, as also for Mr Joscelin's, mentioned in the text, who likewise transcribes Bale exactly (4). In the first place it must be observed, that so much of Alfred's work as relates to the Britons, is comprised in five books, but that these were called by the author himself, extracts from Jeffrey is impossible, because though he mentions Caesar, Trogius Pompeius, Eutropius, Lucan, Beda, and many others, yet he never mentions Jeffrey, but calls the book from whence he took the facts he sets down, the British History, which without doubt, is the same that Jeffrey translated, though our author adds many things from other writers; but the first words of this treatise properly speaking are, Primus in Britannia regnavit Brutus (5). The sixth book in Mr Hearne's edition begins with the words, Bale assigns for the beginning of the history of the English Kings, viz. Finito Regno Britonum, Britanniae Regnum ad Anglos est translatum (6), which plainly shows that it is in fact the same treatise. As to the third book mentioned by Bale, it is certainly the ninth of the annals, of which our author speaking in his preface, makes use of these words, Aggressus sum itaque laborem mihi quidem difficilem, &c. (7), which therefore Bale makes the beginning of it. The larger history is nothing more than a short preface, which Alfred set before his work, in order to show the occasion of his writing it, which begins with, In Diebus Silentii nostri, &c. (8), so that here, all these four different works are fairly thrown to be no more than several parts of Alfred's Annals, as we have it now in print, and as for the remaining book mentioned by Bale, it will be accounted for in the next Note.

the book as we now have it, and therefore I make no question, but that this piece, with the history of St John of Beverley, are all that fell from the pen of our author. As to this history of St John of Beverley, it is also in being, and it is a loss to the learned world that we have it not printed [B]. To this edition Mr Hearne has added some notes, and a very compleat index, he has also prefixed a preface, wherein he vindicates his author from the charge of plagiarism, under which he has so long laboured (n). To this there are some objections made by Mr Aaron Thompson, in his preface to the English translation of Jeffrey of Monmouth's British history (o), to which, as also to some remarks of Bishop Nicholson (p), we have given answers in their proper place [C]. On the whole, if ever any epitome of British history, deserved particularly well of the publick in general, and of readers of a nice taste in particular, we may safely say this history of Alfred's is it. For though Huntingdon, Hoveden, Malmibury, and other writers, have prefixed summaries of antient history to the accounts they have left us of their own times, yet are none of them either in point of accuracy or elegancy, to be compared with this history, which well deserves to be translated, and if it might be hoped for, continued with the same spirit down to later times.

[B] It is a loss to the learned world it is not printed.] We have no account at all of this piece of our author's, farther than the short title abovementioned, either in Bale, Pits, or Mr Hearne's preface to our author's history, yet the book itself is in the Cotton Library, though not set down in the catalogues as being contained in a volume of tracts. I shall set down the title at large, in which the reader will perceive that this is quite a different thing from what he might expect, which will serve to support what has been advanced in the former note, concerning the carelessness of Bale and his transcribers. 'Libertates Ecclesie S. Johannis de Beverlik, cum Privilegiis Apostolicis, & Episcopalis, quas Magister Aluerudus Sacrista ejusdem Ecclesie, de Anglico in Latinum transtulit. In hoc tractatulo dantur Cartæ Saxonice R. R. Adalanti, Eadwardi Confessoris, & Willelmi, quas fecerunt eidem Ecclesie, sed ab imperito Exscriptore mendose scriptæ. i. e. The Liberties of the Church of St John of Beverley, with the Privileges granted by the Apostolick See, or by Bishops, translated out of Saxon into Latin, by Master Alured, Sacrist of the said Church. In this Treatise are contained the Saxon Charters of the Kings Adalstan, Edward the Confessor, and William (the Conqueror) granted by them to this Church, but through want of Skill in the Transcriber, are full of Mistakes (9).' Thus it appears, that this is not a life of St John of Beverley, but a collection of records.

[C] We have given answers in their proper place.] Mr Thompson, out of zeal for the credit of Jeffrey of Monmouth, maintains that our Alfred, according to the common opinion, really transcribed his book, or abridged it. But foreseeing the dates were against him, all antient authors placing Jeffrey later in point of time than our author, he ventures to assert, that Jeffrey's history was published some time between the years 1123 and 1128, because, says he, Alfred copied it in this last year (10). By this method a man may prove any thing, for in short he does nothing more than suppose what he should prove to be true, and then offers his supposition as a proof to his readers. I will in few words, show first, that his supposition is groundless, and secondly, that there is good authority to prove (11), our author was not thought a transcriber, by writers, who flourished in the reign of Edward III. Henry of Huntingdon published his history late in the reign of Henry I, yet it is confessed

he did not meet with Jeffrey's book till after that publication (12). William of Malmesbury, who also wrote before Jeffrey, as Jeffrey himself confesses, is not said to have published his history so early, as Mr Thompson places the publication of Jeffrey's. We know that Malmesbury wrote a sequel to his history, which begins in the twenty-sixth year of Henry I, that is, in 1125, and before this time it is certain, that Jeffrey's book had not seen the light (13). Besides, Jeffrey was made Bishop of St Asaph, in 1551 (14); is it reasonable to suppose that his friends were so long before they thought of him, when his book had been in vogue 20 or 30 years? Add to this, that Jeffrey himself plainly overturns this supposition, by the compliment he pays to Robert Earl of Gloucester, in his dedication, which I shall transcribe from Mr Thompson's own translation (15): 'To you therefore, Robert Earl of Gloucester, this work humbly sues for the favour of being so corrected by your advice, that it may not be thought the poor offspring of Jeffrey of Monmouth, but when polished by your refined wit and judgment, the production of him who had Henry the glorious King of England for his father, and whom we see an accomplished scholar, and philosopher, as well as a brave soldier, and expert commander; so that Britain with joy acknowledges, that in you, she enjoys another Henry.' Does not this passage clearly intimate that King Henry was then dead? Now that Prince deceased in 1135 (16), and our author finished his history in 1128. So much for Mr Thompson's supposition. Ralph Higden in his Polychronicon, cites Jeffrey sometimes, Alfred sometimes, and sometimes he quotes them both together (17), would he have done this, if he had thought Alfred a mere transcriber, and if he was not thought so almost 400 years ago, why should we think him so now. Bishop Nicholson says, that probably all the four treatises ascribed to our Alfred might well be filed, Desfontaines Galfredi, i. e. Extracts from Jeffrey (18), but this was only that Prelate's guess, who had a mighty knack at characterizing authors he never saw, and we have fully proved that he guessed wrong; and to do him justice, what he afterwards says, fully proves that he much doubted whether Alfred ever saw Jeffrey's book at all, and for this good reason, because he was as early a writer as himself (19). This the Bishop suspected, and we apprehend is now put out of question by Mr Hearne's publication of his work. E

A L S O P (VINCENT) a Northamptonshire man, educated in St John's college in Cambridge, where he took the degree of Master of Arts (a). He received Deacons orders from a Bishop, after which he went down into Rutlandshire, and settled at Oakham, where he was an assistant to the master of the free-school. As he was a man of sprightly pleasant wit, he fell there into indifferent company, but was reclaimed by the frequent admonitions of the reverend Mr Benjamin King (b). He afterwards married that gentleman's daughter, and becoming a convert to his principles received ordination in the Presbyterian way, not being satisfied with that which he had from the Bishop [A].

[A] With that which he had from the Bishop.] As this is a very remarkable passage, it may not be amiss to cite Dr Calamy's account, in his own words. 'I have been informed, says he, by a very worthy person, that he had it from Mr Benjamin King of Okeham in Rutland, (who was Mr Alstop's father-in-law) that the said Mr Alstop was ordained by a Bishop; and not being satisfied with that ordination, was afterwards ordained by Presbyters. I cannot question the truth of this passage, when I consider the way of it's conveyance, and therefore, I suppose the reason of it must be this, That the Bishop only admitted

He was settled at Wilbee in the county of Northampton, whence he was ejected in 1662, for Nonconformity (c). After this he ventured to preach sometimes at Oakham, and at Wellingborough where he lived, and was once six months in prison for praying by a sick person (d). A book he writ against Dr Sherlock in a humorous style, made him well known to the world, and induced Mr Cawton, an eminent Nonconformist in Westminster, to recommend him to his congregation for his successor. On receiving this call, he quitted Northamptonshire and came to London, where he preached constantly, and wrote several pieces which were extremely well received by the publick (e). His living in the neighbourhood of the court, exposed him to many inconveniences; however he had the good fortune to escape imprisonment and fines, by an odd accident, which was, the informers not knowing his Christian name, which for this reason he studiously concealed (f). Wood, who mentions him more than once, took his name to be Benjamin, probably from the sameness of Ben and Vin, in their sound. His sufferings however ended with the reign of Charles II, or at least in the beginning of the next reign, when Mr Alfop's son engaging in treasonable practices, was freely pardoned by King James (g). After this our divine went frequently to Court, and is generally supposed to have been the person who drew the address to that Prince, for his general indulgence [B]. After the Revolution, Mr Alfop gave very publick testimonies of his affection for the government, yet upon all occasions he spoke very respectfully of King James, and retained a very high sense of his clemency, in sparing his only son (h). The remainder of his life he spent in the exercise of his ministry, preaching once every Lord's Day, had a Thursday lecture, and was besides one of the lecturers at Pinner's-hall (i). He lived to be a very old man, and preserved his spirits to the last [C]. On grave subjects he wrote with a becoming seriousness; but where wit might properly be shewn, he displayed his to great advantage (k). Anthony Wood indeed represents him as a man of mean parts, and meer pretender to genteel raillery (l). But Dr South, who was full as good a judge of men as Wood, understood wit and language much better, and was by no means partial to the Nonconformists, allows our author his due praise (m). Mr Alfop died full of days, on the eighth of May, 1703 (n). His funeral sermon was preached by Mr Slater, and his memory will be always preserved by his own learned and elegant writings. Of these the most remarkable are, 1. Antifozzo: in vindication of some great truths opposed by Dr William Sherlock, 8vo, 1675. 2. Melius Inquirendum: in answer to Dr Goodman's Compassionate Enquiry, 8vo, 1679. 3. The Mischief of Impositions: in answer to Dr Stillingfleet's Mischief of Separation, 1680. 4. Duty and Interest united in Praise and Prayer for Kings, September 8, 1695. 5. Practical Godliness, the Ornament of Religion, 8vo, 1696. 6. God admitted him into Deacons Orders, and upon this supposition, he might think that ordination defective, so as to need something farther, in order to his being capacitated for some ministerial acts, which Deacons are not called to. And yet, at the same time I am very sensible, that some of the ejected ministers had no other ordination than that, and thought it to be sufficient. Allowance may be very well made for different sentiments in such things as these, among persons of worth and eminence (1).

[B] Drew the address to that Prince for his indulgence.] This address is now become so scarce, as to be a kind of curiosity, and therefore, I think it cannot be amiss to reprint it here from an authentick copy. It was presented by the following ministers, Mr Hurst, Mr Chester, Mr Slater, Mr Cox, Mr Roswell, Mr Turner, Mr Franklin, Mr Deal, and Mr Reynolds. The title was; The Humble Address of the Presbyterians; and thus it ran.

May it please your Most Sacred Majesty

TO believe the thankfulness of our hearts, beyond any expressions of our lips or pens, for your most gracious declaration of liberty for us, in the worship of God, which we trust we shall ever value above our property, as that, without which we could enjoy nothing which we could call our own, without the greatest uneasiness imaginable: But your majesty having in the same declaration also secured that unto us both by your royal word and act: What could your majesty have done more for us? Or what is left for us further to ask of the King? And so far as it hath pleased your most excellent majesty, to give this safe port to your poor subjects, so long tossed with tempests, and justly to believe that loyalty is not entailed to a party, as we hope we shall ever justify the credit which your majesty's charity in that point hath given us; so we shall not cease to bow our knees to the God whom we serve, and by whom Kings reign, beseeching him to recompense this royal favour to your majesty, with length of days, uninterrupted health, felicity in your royal relations, success in your great councils and affairs, and finally, with the most glorious liberty of the sons of God, heartily crying, as with one voice, Let the King live for ever. Subscribed on the behalf of ourselves and the rest of our persuasion.

The King's Answer.

Gentlemen,

I Have already found two good effects of my declaration; the easing and pleasing my subjects you spake of, and my restoring to God, the empire over conscience: it has been my judgment a long time, that none has, or ought to have, any power over the conscience but God. I understand, there are some jealousies among my subjects, that I have done this in a design: But you look like gentlemen of too great ingenuity to entertain any such suspicion. Gentlemen, I protest before God, and I desire you to tell all manner of people of all persuasions, as you have opportunity to converse with them, that I have no other design than that I have spoke of. And, gentlemen, I hope to live to see the day, when you shall as well have Magna Charta for the liberty of conscience, as you have had for your properties. And now, gentlemen, do you so preach to your hearers as they may be good Christians, and then, I do not question but they will be good subjects (2).

[C] Preserved his spirits to the last.] We owe also this particular to Dr Calamy, who delivers himself in these words. 'I was very strictly examined by him before my ordination; at which time it falling to my lot to make and defend a Latin Thesis, upon this question, (which he himself gave me) An Christus Officio Sacerdotali fungatur in Caelis tantum? He (for argument's sake, as is the way of the schools) opposed me with all the vigour, smartness, and fluency of a young man, though he was then considerably advanced in years. This was in the year 1694, when Mr Joseph Bennet, Mr Tho: Reynolds, Mr Joseph

AMBROSE (ISAAC), a noted Presbyterian Teacher in the times of the Usurpation, and author of several pieces [A], was a clergyman's son, and descended from the Ambroses of Ambrose-hall, in Lancashire. In the beginning of the year 1621, he was admitted a Batteler of Brazen-nose-college in Oxford, where he took the degree of Bachelor of Arts. Afterwards he took holy orders, and officiated in some little cure in his own country. Being in very low circumstances, he was often obliged to the bounty of William, Earl of Bedford, for the relief of himself and his family; and, Mr Wood thinks, that Lord procured him to be inserted in the list of his Majesty's preachers appointed for the county of Lancaster. Afterwards, upon the change of the times in 1641, he left the Church of England, and went over to the Presbyterian party, took the Covenant, and became a preacher of the Gospel at Garstang, and afterwards at Preston in his own country. He was very zealous and very active against the clergy of the established Church; especially when he was appointed assistant to the commissioners for ejecting such whom they then called scandalous and ignorant ministers and school-masters. It is said, he died suddenly of an apoplexy (a).

[A] He wrote several pieces. I. Prima, Media, and Ultima, or, The First, Middle, and last Things; wherein are set forth; I. The Doctrine of Regeneration, or the New Birth. II. The Practice of Sanctification, in the Means, Duties, Ordinances, both private and public, for Continuance and Increase of a godly Life. III. Certain Meditations of Man's Misery, in his Life, Death, Judgment, and Execution; as also of God's Mercy in our Redemption and Salvation. The Prima and Ultima, were printed at London, in 1640, in quarto. The Media, taken chiefly out of the writings of the most eminent practical Divines, was first printed at London (with the Prima and Ultima) in 1650, in quarto; and afterwards in 1659, in quarto. To which is added, a Sermon on Redeeming the Time, preached at Preston, January 4, 1657, at the funeral of Lady Margaret Houghton. The authors, whom he abridges in the Media, were mostly Separatists. The book was licensed by Mr Charles Herle, and recommended to the world by John Angier, Thomas Johnson, and John Waite, B. D. in their respective epistles prefixed to it. At length all three were printed together at London, in 1674, in a large folio, with a print of the author, aged fifty-nine. The book was reprinted in 1682, and again in 1689, both editions in folio. 2. Looking upon Jesus. A View of the everlasting Gospel, or the Soul's eyeing of Jesus as carrying on the great Work of Man's Salvation. London, 1658, 4to. In the penning of which piece, Mr Wood tells us, he took great delight, it being a subject, as the author himself complains, almost wholly neglected by others. 3. War with Devils, Ministration of, and Communication with, Angels; printed with the former. At the end of this treatise are subjoined two letters, the first written by Richard Baxter, dated London, November 29, 1661; and the other by William Cole, dated Preston, October 8, 1661 (1).

AMBROSIUS AURELIANUS (a), or AURELIUS AMBROSIUS (b), a famous General of the antient Britons, and afterwards King, was of Roman extraction [A], and commonly supposed to be son of one of the Kings, elected by the Britons after the Romans had left the island (c). He was educated at the court of Aldroen King of Armorica; who, at the request of the Britons, sent him over (d), at the head of ten thousand men, to assist them against the Saxons, whom Vortigern their King had invited into Britain (e). Ambrosius's success against the Saxons was so considerable, that the Britons chose him for their King (f), obliging Vortigern to yield to him all the western part of the kingdom, divided by the Roman high-way called Watling-street. Some time after, the Britons being discontented with Vortigern, and having withdrawn their allegiance from him, that unhappy Prince retired to a castle in Wales; where being besieged by Ambrosius, and the castle taking fire, he perished in the flames (g), and left his rival sole monarch of Britain (h), who now took upon him the imperial purple after the manner of the Roman Emperors. [A] He was of Roman extraction. ‘ Common opinion (says Mr Milton) but grounded chiefly on the British fables, makes this Ambrosius to be the younger son of that Constantine, whose eldest was Constance the Monk: who both lost their lives abroad usurping the empire. But the express words both of Gildas and Bede assure us, that the parents of this Ambrosius, having here borne regal dignity, were slain in the Pictish wars and commotions in the island (1).’ Gildas's words here referred to are these: ‘ Duce Ambrosio Aureliano viro modesto (qui solus fortè Romanæ gentis tantæ tempestatis colli-

[B] It is said, Ambrosius built Stone-henge near Salisbury in Wiltshire. Geoffrey of Monmouth fables, that Ambrosius, coming to a monastery near Caer-caradoc, now Salisbury, where the three hundred British Lords massacred by Hengist lay buried, and resolving to perpetuate the memory of this action by some remarkable building, ordered his workmen to prepare a large quantity of stones and other materials. But having, at the instigation of Tremounus Archbishop of Caer-leon, consulted the famous Merlin, that magician advised him to send over to Ireland for certain great stones, which were called Chorea Gigantum. i. e. The Giant's Dance, and which were to be found placed in a circle on a hill called Killair; having been brought thither by certain giants from the farthest borders of Africa, at the time when that country was inhabited by giants. Whereupon Uther Pendragon, Ambrosius's brother, and a body of forces, were sent into Ireland to fetch these stones; but were opposed in their attempt by Gillomanus King of the country, who at first derided the folly of the Britons in undertaking so ridiculous an expedition, but afterwards resolved to frustrate their design. Nevertheless the Britons, having vanquished that Prince in battle, found means to bring away the stones, though not without great difficulty, and through the direction and assistance of Merlin, who had accompanied them. These wonderful-stones, by order of Ambrosius, were placed over the graves of the British Lords, and are what is now called Stone-henge (4). (6) Girald. Cambrensis. Topograph. distinct. 2. c. 13.

Giraldus Cambrensis mentions this British fable. 'Juxta Britannicam historiam (says he) lapides istos Rex Britonum Aurelius Ambrosius, divina Merlini diligentia, de Hibernia in Britanniam advehi procuravit; & ut tanti facinoris egregium aliquod memoriale relinqueret, eodem ordine & arte quæ prius, in loco constituit, ubi occultis Saxonum cultus Britannicæ flos cecidit, & sub pacis obtentu, nequitiæ telis, male tua regni juvenus occubuit (6). — According to the British history, Ambrosius King of the Britons, by the advice and assistance of the enchanter Merlin, procured these stones to be brought from Ireland into Britain; and that he might leave some remarkable monument of so base an action, he ranged them in the same order, in which they had been disposed before, on the very spot, where the flower of the British youth, not suspecting any treachery, fell by the concealed daggers of the Saxons, under the pretence of peace and friendship.' Polydore Vergil assigns another origin of Stone-henge. He tells us, it was erected by the Britons as a monument to their General Ambrosius, on the place where he fell in battle, to perpetuate the memory of his glorious actions, and services done to his country. Britannus duci suo Ambrosio de republica bene merito magnificentum posuit sepulchrum, factum ad formam coronæ, ex magnis quadratis lapidibus, eo loco ubi pugnando ceciderat; ut tanti ducis virtus ne oblivione eorum, qui tunc erant, aut reticentia posterorum insensata esset (7). And in John of Tinmouth (8), the place, which is now called Stone-henge, is styled 'Mons Ambrosii, Ambrosius's Hill.' I shall only observe, that both these stories are rejected by our best antiquarians, though they are by no means agreed as to the true origin of that famous piece of antiquity.

[C] He distinguished himself by his valour and conduct against the enemies of his country. Some time after the ravage and burning of the island, the Saxons gave over pursuing the Britons, and marched back to their head-quarters. But, the enemy being out of fight, the Britons began to recover their spirits, to peep out of their hiding-places, and draw into a body. And having resolved upon an attempt to recover their country, they unanimously, in the first place, implored the protection of heaven: then, under the conduct of Ambrosius, they marched up into the country, gave the enemy battle, and providentially defeated them. After this victory, the fortunes of the Britons and Saxons were various, and seemed to hang in suspense, until the battle of Banneston near Bath, in which the Saxons were entirely routed, about forty-four years after their arrival in Britain. At ubi hostili exercitus, exterminatis dispersisque insula indigenis, domum reversus est, ceperunt illi paulatim vires animosque resumere, emergentes de latibus quibus absiti fuerant, & unanimò consensu auxilium cælestis precantes, ne usque ad interuentionem usquequaque deleverunt. — Hac ergo duce (sc. Ambrosio Aureliano) viris capessunt Britones, & victores provocantes ad prælium, victoriam ipsi, Deo favente, suscipiunt. Et ex eo tempore nunc civis, nunc hostes vincebant, usque ad annum obsessoris Badonici montis, quando non minimas eisdem hostibus strages dabant, quadragesimo circiter & quarto anno adventus eorum in Britanniam (9).

[D] He regulated the affairs of the Church. After the Britons had defeated the Saxons, and obliged them to retire a good way Northward, Ambrosius is said to have convened the Princes and great men at York; where he gave orders for repairing the churches destroyed by the Saxons, and restoring the exercise of religion to its former lustre (10). This, though reported by Geoffrey of Monmouth, a writer of no great credit, yet, in the opinion of the learned Dr Stillingfleet (11); is agreeable enough to probability. Besides, it is confirmed by Matthew of Westminster (12), who highly applauds the great zeal of Ambrosius in repairing the churches, encouraging the clergy, and restoring the honour of religion. The Monmouth historian adds (13), that, in a council of the Britons, Ambrosius gave directions for two metropolitans to supply the vacancies of York and Caer-leon, Sampson being promoted to the former, and Dubricius to the latter. Hector Boethius likewise tells us (14), that Ambrosius restored the churches, re-called the clergy, and established the exercise of true religion; that he broke in pieces the images of the Heathen gods, and severely punished their Priests. And he adds, that some of the Saxons, whom this Prince had permitted to remain in Britain, though they outwardly professed themselves Christians, yet continued privately to offer sacrifice to their idols; which thing being discovered, their Priests were seized, and scourged, and all of them without pity burnt at the stake. Christi Tempia Ambrosii præ operâ restituta; Pontifices Sacerdotesque suas sunt vocati in sedes; vera religio undique culta; idorum gentilium statuae effractæ; qui gentilium succedentes inventi in Britannia, divi supplicii affecti — Verum Saxonum nonnulli in Britannia Ambrosio permittebant remanentes, Christianam ementientes religionem, clam idolis litabant: quæ re comperta, capti sacrificuli, cæsi loris, ullâ sine commiseratione ad unum sunt cremati. Here may be inserted the following unpublished verses of Gotfrid of Viterbo (15), in which, at the same time that he celebrates Ambrosius for restoring peace to his country, and regulating affairs both in Church and State, he accuses him of a persecuting spirit, and of favouring Jews and Heretics, particularly the Manicheans.

which were in extreme disorder occasioned by those wars (l). The Monmouth historian, who gives this Prince a very advantageous character [E], tells us, he was poisoned at Winchester by one Eopa a Saxon, disguised as a physician, and hired for that purpose by Pascentius one of the sons of Vortigern (m): but the generally received opinion is, that he was killed in a battle, which he lost, in the year 508, against Cerdick, one of the Saxon Generals [F].

[E] Geoffrey of Monmouth gives Ambrosius a very advantageous character. Let us cite that historian's words. 'Tanta virtus & audacia viro inerat; quod cum Galliarum partes frequentaret, non erat alter qui cum illo congredi auderet. Nam si congressum fecisset, vel hostem ex equo prosternebat, vel hastam in frustra confringebat. Præterea largus erat in dandis, sedulus in divinis obsequiis, modestus in cunctis, & super omnia mendacium vitans. Fortis pedes, fortior eques, & ad regandum exercitum doctus (16).
—— He was a man of such bravery and courage, that, when he was in Gaul, no one durst enter the lifts with him: for he was sure to unhorse his antagonist, or to break his spear into shivers. He was moreover generous in bestowing, careful in the performance of religious duties, moderate in all things, and more especially abhorred a lie. He was strong on foot, stronger on horseback, and perfectly qualified to command an army.

[F] He was killed in a battle, which he lost — against Cerdick, one of the Saxon Generals.] This battle was fought near a place, thence called by the Saxons Cerdick's-ford, afterwards Cerdelford, and now by contraction Chardford. Here the Britons and Saxons engaged; and the former giving ground, Ambrosius, now grown old and infirm, endeavoured in vain to rally them; and in the fury of his despair threw himself into the midst of the enemy, where his glorious life was crowned with an honourable death (17). Upon this occasion the historians give Ambrosius the name of Nazaleod or Natanleod. It is true, this appellation has induced many to believe, that Ambrosius is not here meant, but some other British King. But the opinion of Camden (18), and other good authors, who make Ambrosius and Nazaleod to be the same, is to be preferred. For it is agreed by the best historians, that this Prince was slain in fight. But, from the beginning of his reign, we find no battle, in which a British Monarch was killed, but that of the year 508, in which Ambrosius fell. And this Prince was too remarkable for historians to neglect mentioning his death, if it happened on any other occasion.

A M E S (WILLIAM) a Divine in the reigns of King James and King Charles I, famous for his casuistical and controversial writings; but much more so abroad, than in his native country; for he lived many years in foreign parts, and there ended his days: yet as foreigners, who therefore have endeavoured to give account of him and his works, have done it so imperfectly, and Bayle among the rest; we shall attempt to say something of him more complete. He was descended from the antient family of that name, which remains in Norfolk and Somersetshire, and was born in the year 1576. He was educated at Christ-Church-college in Cambridge, under the famous Mr William Perkins, who died in 1602; from whom, probably, imbibing some Calvinistical tenets, he became afterwards very distinguishable for maintaining the same; insomuch, that he gave some disgust to certain persons in that university, while he was therein fellow of the college aforesaid. One instance whereof is given us by Dr Fuller (a), who informs us, 'That about the year 1610-11, this Mr Ames, preaching at St Mary's, or, to use his own expression, having the place of a Watchman for an hour in the tower of the university (b), took occasion to inveigh against the liberty taken at that time; especially in those colleges which had Lords of Misrule, a Pagan relique; which, he said, as Polydore Vergil has observed (c), remains only in England. Hence he proceeded to condemn all playing at cards and dice; affirming, that the latter in all ages was accounted the device of the Devil; and that as God invented the one and twenty letters, whereof he made the Bible, the Devil, faith an author (d), found out the one and twenty spots on the die; that canon law forbade the use thereof, seeing, Inventio Diaboli, nullâ consuetudine potest validari (e). His sermon, continues our author, gave much offence to many of his auditors; the rather because in him there was a concurrence of much Nonconformity; insomuch, that to prevent an expulsion from Dr Val. Cary, the Master, he fairly forsook the college, which proved unto him neither loss nor disgrace; being, not long after, by the States of Friesland, chosen Professor of their university.' It may not be improbable, that upon the rigour wherewith Archbishop Bancroft pressed Conformity on the Puritans, for their separation from the Church, many learned men of them retired into the Low Countries; where English churches were erected, after the Presbyterian model, and maintained by the States according to the treaty with Queen Elizabeth, as the French and Dutch churches were in England. But that 'the reverend and learned Dr William Ames, one of the most acute controversial writers of his age,' as a late author styles him (f), settled with the English church at the Hague, before that Archbishop's death; or, as he writes more expressly in another place, that he fled from the persecution of that Archbishop, and became minister of the English church there (g), does not strictly fort with chronology; because the Archbishop appears by his monumental inscription (h), to have died some months before that sermon above was preached by Mr Ames, at St Mary's. And Bayle says, he published his book in favour of Puritanism the same year in

in England. It might not however, be long after, that he went to the Hague; for in 1613, his dispute with Grevinchovius, Minister at Rotterdam, appeared in print. From thence we are told, he was invited by the States of Friesland, to the divinity chair in the university of Franeker; which he filled with universal reputation for many years. He was at the synod of Dort in 1618, and informed King James's Ambassador, from time to time, of the debates of that assembly (i). After he had been at least twelve years in the Doctor's chair at Franeker, he resigned his professorship, and accepted of an invitation to the English congregation at Rotterdam, the air of Franeker being too sharp for him, who was troubled with such a difficulty of breathing, that he concluded every winter would be his last. Besides, he was desirous of preaching to his own countrymen, which he had refused for many years. He held many publick disputes, published many learned books, and was a very popular man in all this time; but as his writings were published abroad, and it is difficult to come at the first editions, so as to mention them distinctly, according to the course of publication, we shall cast them in a note together at the latter end. Upon his removal to Rotterdam, he wrote his Fresh Suit against Ceremonies, but lived not to publish it himself; for his constitution was so shattered, that the air of Holland did him no service, upon which he determined to remove to New England; but his asthma returning, at the beginning of the winter, put an end to his life at Rotterdam; where he was buried on the fourteenth of November, N. S. 1633 (*). Next spring his wife and children embarked for New England, and carried with them his valuable library of Books, which was a rich treasure to the said country at that time. He was a very learned Divine, concludes my last cited author; a strict Calvinist in doctrine, and of the persuasion of the Independents, with regard to the subordination and power of Classes and Synods (k). The same year he died, the last book he wrote aforesaid was published, we suppose at Rotterdam, for no place is mentioned. The editor informs us, that 'with the coming forth of this book into the light, the learned and famous author, Dr Ames, left the light, or darkness rather, of this world. And though his name, in this controversy, was hitherto concealed, yet that which was generally but imagined before, (that the Reply, and this Fresh Suit, to Dr Burgefs's Rejoinder, were his work) is now certainly known to be his. It pleads truth succinctly and perspicuously, as indeed his vein in all his writings and discourses did most admirably lead him to do. Concluding, that he shewed himself a pattern of holiness, a burning and shining light, a lamp of learning and arts, a champion for truth, especially while he was, for the space of twelve years at least, in the Doctor's chair at Franeker, &c. (l)'. After this advertisement follows a copper print of him, in a little black silk cap, thin piqued beard, ruff about his neck, and a cloak over his shoulder. The inscription round it mentions him to be fifty-seven years of age, in the year aforesaid of his death. On the back of this picture is a testimony by S. O. asserting, 'That the Doctor's books are famous in all Europe; upon which many have come to him out of Hungary, Poland, Prussia, and Flanders, to be educated; as sundry students in our land, can testify: and I myself, and divers others have heard them affirm, they would not have stayed there, but for the liking they had of him.' Of these works, there is also in this book a catalogue; which, because short and imperfect, we shall, in a note below, enlarge [A]; and conclude with mentioning

Twisse (1); and a few other scattered pieces, not mentioned in any catalogue of his books. His Latin works were reprinted in an uniform edition, with a preface by Matthias Nethenus (2). A year after his death, John Canne, the leader of the English Brownists at Amsterdam, published a treatise, in answer to Dr Ames, Mr Daryl, and Mr Bradshaw (3). But several other books there are in print, which maintain the Doctor's tenets, and build themselves much on his authority; as that, published the same year by Caspar Streso, intitled, Respons. pro Amesio, ad Disputationem J. Bodsacci (4); and more particularly another, written not long after his death, by an English preacher at Amsterdam, in reply to some approver of promiscuous baptism; where much distinction seems paid to Dr Ames, for his not allowing thereof; also shewing his fitness for the pastoral office; his judgment of the power by which the Church ought to be governed, and his opinion of synods and classes; wherewith the said author confirms his own arguments. Herein is also some justification of Dr Ames, for his removal from Franeker to the English assembly at Rotterdam; and an account of what works he was author of: which, had it been now at hand, might have perhaps some how improved the catalogue above.

mentioning two or three authors more of the name, to prevent their being confounded with him [B].

[B] To prevent their being confounded with him. One of them, named also William Ames, was a Divine, and publisher of some tracts; but, indeed, later in time; he was a Master of Arts, and in 1651, preached a sermon before the Lord-Mayor of London, John Kendrick, which was soon after printed (5). Whether this was son of the former, we are not positive; nor whether he was the same with that William Ames, who was a Quaker, at Amsterdam, and publisher of many books; from 1657, to 1677, and after; fourteen whereof, written in Dutch, may be more particularly seen in the author who has taken the pains to preserve their titles (6). Another of this surname, was Edward Ames, styled Bishop of Cork and Ross, and author of two sermons, called The Protestant Peace-maker; with a Postscript or Notes on Mr Baxter's, and some other late writings for peace, 4to. Lond. 1682 (7). But that he was Bishop of the said See at this date of that work, does not clearly appear in the succession of Irish Bishops: for Dr Edward Wetenhall is said to have held the same, from 1678, to the year 1699, and then was succeeded by Dr Dive Downes (8).

Hist. of Ireland. edit. fol. 1714, under the Archbishops

A N D E R S O N Sir (EDMUND) is said by the Oxford antiquary, to have been a younger brother of a genteel family, in the parish of Broughton in Lincolnshire (a). Another writer says, it was at Flixborough in Lincolnshire (b). However the family which was originally from Scotland, had first retired into Northumberland, and from thence passed into Lincolnshire (*), where Thomas Anderson, Esq; father to our Edmund, must have been possessed of a very considerable estate, since he left this younger son of his a thousand pounds to begin the world with, which in those days was a very considerable sum (c). After perfecting his grammatical studies in the country, he spent some time at Oxford, in Lincoln-college, from whence he removed to the Inner Temple, where he read law with great assiduity, and in due time became a Barrister. In the ninth of Queen Elizabeth, he was both Lent and Summer reader; and in the sixteenth of the Queen, Double reader (d). Notes of which readings, are yet extant in MS (e). In the nineteenth of Queen Elizabeth, he was appointed the Queen's Serjeant at Law. Some time after, but the date I no where find, he became Judge, or, as I take it, one of the Justices of Assize. For in 1581, he went the Norfolk circuit, and at Bury exerted himself against the famous Browne, who was the author of those opinions, which were afterwards maintained by a sect, called from him Brownists. For this conduct of Judge Anderson, Dr Edmund Freke, then Bishop of Norwich, wrote a letter to the Treasurer Burleigh, desiring that the said Judge might receive the Queen's thanks, which it is very probable he had, because our Judge ever afterwards distinguished himself, as we shall see, in the support of the Established Church (f). In the spring of the year 1582, he was advanced to the dignity of Lord Chief Justice of the Common-Pleas, and took his place there, on the fourth day of May, in a manner so particular, that one cannot doubt the reader's being pleased with the account thereof inserted in the notes [A]. In the year following he received the honour of knighthood. In 1586, he was appointed one of the Commissioners for trying Mary, Queen of Scots, and on the twelfth of October the same year, he sat in judgment upon her, and on the twenty-fifth of the same month, he sat again in the Star-chamber, when sentence was pronounced against that Queen (g). In 1587, he sat in the Star-chamber on Secretary Davison, who was there charged with issuing the warrant for the execution of the Queen of Scots, contrary to Queen Elizabeth's command, and without her knowledge. After the cause had been heard, Sir Roger Manwood then Chief Baron of the Exchequer, gave his opinion first, wherein he extolled the Queen's clemency, which he said Davison had inconsiderately prevented, wherefore he was for fining him ten thousand pounds, and imprisonment during the Queen's pleasure. Our Chief Justice spoke next, he said that Davison had done Justum, non Juste, that is, He had done what was right, not in a due manner; otherwise

[A] Inserted in the notes. This account is taken from a letter, written by Fleetwood, Recorder of London, to the Lord Treasurer (Burleigh) that part of it which relates to our Sage in the law, ran thus. 'On Saturday in the morning, my Lord Chancellor did awhile stand at the Chancery bar, on the side of the hall. And soon after that the Justices of the Common-Pleas were set, his Lordship came to the Common-Pleas, and there fate down. And all the serjeants standing at the bar, my Lord Chancellor called Anderson by name, declared unto him her Majesty's good likings and opinion of him, and of the place and dignity her Majesty had called him unto. And then my Lord Chancellor made a short discourse, what the duty and office of a good Justice was. And in the end, his Lordship called him up into the midst of the court; and then Mr Anderson kneeling, his commission was read: and that done, his Lordship took the patent into his hand; and then the clerk of the crown, Powle, did read him his oath. And after, he himself read the oath of Supremacy, and so kissed the book. And my Lord Chancellor took him by the hand, and placed him upon the bench. And then Father Benloos, because he was antient, did put a short case. And then Serjeant Fleetwood put the next. To the first,

' my new Lord Chief Justice did himself only argue. ' But to the next that Fleetwood put, both he and the residue of the bench did argue. And I assure your Lordship, added the Recorder, he argued very learnedly; and with great facility delivered his mind. And this one thing was noted in him, that he dispatched more orders, and answered more difficult cases, in that one forenoon, than were dispatched in a whole week in the time of his predecessors.' The Recorder farther remarks in this letter, another singularity in these words. ' My Lord, under Benedicite, there runneth a marvellous speech over all London, that greater sums of money were offered (to whom I know not) than I may well write of, by one of the Exchequer; and all was for this office of Lord Chief Justice. If it were true, the party did not well; if it were not true, the first reporters were much to blame, to scandalize such an officer of her Majesty; by which means he is grown into a greater discredit, than may be in a short time easily forgotten.' Adding (to the Lord Treasurer's honour) ' That it was almost in every man's mouth, that his Lordship, after that he had understanding of the offering of such a mass of money, was the means of keeping him from that cushion;' concluding, ' Truly, my Lord, it was well done (1).'

otherwise he thought him no bad man (b). As this was a very busy reign, and as our Chief Justice was held one of the most learned sages of the law, he had much employment therein; it being the peculiar policy of Queen Elizabeth's administration, to do all things with the greatest form, and where the matter would admit of it, with all the countenance from the law that could be given. For this reason, in the proceedings against those, who endeavoured to set up the Geneva discipline, in a manner by force, Lord Chief Justice Anderson was frequently made use of, and as he discharged his trust with great zeal, so in the case of Udal, a Puritan minister, who was confined in the year 1589, tried and condemned the year following, our Judge is severely censured by Mr Peirce (i), as one who endeavoured to trick that worthy man out of his life, with what reason the reader will judge from the account given in the note [B]. It is highly probable, that the Judge himself was sensible of the ill will his proceedings against these sort of people drew upon him, but it does not appear that it gave him any great pain; since in 1596, we have an account of his going the northern circuit, wherein he behaved himself exactly in the same way [C], declaring in his charges, that such persons as opposed

[B] From the account given in the note. We shall, as it is our duty, set down the whole of this matter fairly, and in our author's own words. On the 13th of January, 1589-90, Mr Udal appeared at the Lord Cobham's house, before the Lord Cobham, Lord Buckhurst, Lord Chief Justice Anderson, Dr John Young, Bishop of Rochester; Mr Fortescue, Mr Egerton, the Queen's Solicitor; Dr Aubery, and Dr Lewin. I am careful to set down their names, that they may be remembered as they deserve. The Bishop asked him whether he had the allowance of the Bishop of the diocese to go to Newcastle? Udal told him, there was no Bishop at that time in that diocese. Then, says the Bishop, you should have gone to the Archbishop; but, says Udal, there was no Archbishop at York neither. This matter then dropped; though afterwards Mr Fortescue, thinking he would cramp him, brought it about again. You are, says he, very cunning in the law; I pray you, by what law did you preach at Newcastle, being forbidden at Kingston? To which Udal answered, he knew no law against it, seeing it was the official, Dr Hone, who silenced him, whose authority reached not out of his Archdeaconry. And so there was an end of that matter, which was too impertinent to have been started; but only as they would have been glad of any occasion of worrying him; then the Lord Chief Justice Anderson told him, he was called thither to answer concerning certain books, thought to be of his writing. He told them, if it was any of Martin's books (as my Lord Chamberlain's letters imported) he had cleared himself at Lambeth a year and a half before, from being the author of them. Then was he questioned, whether he was the author of the Demonstration, or the Dialogue; to which he refused to answer. When he was asked why he would clear himself of Martin and not of these: he said, because he would not be thought to handle the cause of discipline as Martin did; but he thought otherwise of the books now mentioned, and cared not, though they should be fathered upon him. He said likewise, he thought the author, for any thing he knew, did well; and he knew he was inquired after to be punished, and therefore he thought it his duty to hinder the finding him out, which he could not better do than this: for if every one suspected denied it, the author, at length, must needs be found out. The Lord Anderson then urged him: Why dare you not confess it, if you be the author of it? Dare you not stand to your own doings? to this he thus answered: I professed before that I liked of the books, and the matter handled in them, but whether I made them or no, I will not answer; neither if any other book of that argument whatsoever, goeth without name, if you should ask me for the reasons alledged before. Besides that, if I were the author, I think that by law, I need not answer. That is true, says Anderson, if it concerned the loss of your life. Oh barbarous wickedness! to urge and screw him by such arts as these to witness against himself, and to insinuate the matter did not touch his life, when the design was to try him for his life, as they afterwards did and condemned him. Well, Udal answered him thus: I pray your Lordship, doth not the law say generally; No man shall be put to answer without presentment before justices, or matter of record, or by due process, and writ original, &c. A. 42. Edw. 3. cap. III. that is law, says Anderson, and it is not Law. I understand you not, my Lord, says Udal: 'tis a statute which is in force, if it be not repealed; and so that Lord's mouth was stopped for a while, and he was relieved by some of his auxiliaries (2).

As to the case of Mr Udal, the reader will find it at large, under his article in this Dictionary; but as to what relates to the Lord Chief Justice Anderson, it is but reasonable to discuss that matter here. All that is said above is taken from Udal's trial, which was published by himself or his friends, and therefore it might be questioned, whether this be strict evidence against the Chief Justice. But admit it were so; he sat here as one of the Queen's commissioners for ecclesiastical causes, and therefore, what he says must be considered as said in that capacity. The answer, with respect to the statute, is very obscure. Another writer, who pretends to transcribe Mr Peirce (3), tells us, the Lord Chief Justice answered, That is law if it be not repealed; this is clear and plain, and in favour of the prisoner. As to the exclamation in the foregoing account, it seems to be not altogether well founded; and, without breach of charity, one may venture to say, that it has no foundation at all. For it stands on this supposition; that the Chief Justice then knew, that there was an intention to try Udal for his life; a thing altogether improbable. This examination was in January, and he was not tried till the 24th of July following. Mr Neal indeed, would help this matter a little better out; for he, instead of Peirce's exclamation, inserts this reflection: And yet the Justice tried and condemned him for his life (4), which is a direct falsehood, inasmuch, as the Judges who tried him, were Baron Clarke and Serjeant Puckering; neither was he condemned when he was convicted, but at the Lent assizes following; and then by Serjeant Puckering, and not Sir E. Anderson; so that on the whole, though this case may prove that our Chief Justice was a vehement man against Puritans, yet it proves nothing as to his endeavouring to take away Udal's life.

[C] Behaved himself exactly in the same way. After the business of Hacket and Coppinger, which in those days was thought the first stirrings of rebellion, in favour of the Geneva discipline, the Judges were very severe upon Separatists; and our Chief Justice, to whom the law was a guide in all things, certainly carried this matter pretty far: we have still remaining the following account of his proceedings at Lincoln assizes, which, as a proof of our impartiality, we shall set down at large. Since my Lord Anderson hath obtained to ride this circuit, the ministry is grown into intolerable contempt; which is universally imputed unto him, both by those that would, and those that would not have it so. I am not ignorant how dangerous it is to speak the truth of mighty men, and how unlawful it is, by the word of God, to malign the rulers of the people. Neither, I thank God, have I any affection to blot paper with depraving words; and therefore, I will report to you what is done and no further. My Lord Anderson, in his first and second charge at Lincoln, insinuated with wonderful vehemency, that the country is troubled with Brownists, with Disciplinarians, as he called them; and erectors of Presbyteries. I speak the truth to you, Sir, having been at Alford these fourteen years, I never heard of any Brownist, but only one Thomas Man, who presently fled upon his schism: nor do know any minister or other in all this country, that doth so much as favour the erecting of a presbytery. Neither are the people made acquainted opposed the Established Church, opposed her Majesty's authority, who was Supreme in cases as well ecclesiastical, as civil, and were, in that light enemies to the state, and disturbers of the publick peace; wherefore of such he directed the grand-juries to enquire, that they might be punished (k). He was indeed a very rigid lawyer, one who governed himself entirely by statutes, and thought only that to be right which was law. This appeared very signally in his conduct at the trial of Henry Cuffe, who was Secretary to the Earl of Essex, where the Attorney-General charging the prisoner syllogistically, and Cuffe answering him in the same style, L. C. J. Anderson said smartly, I sit here to judge of Law, and not of Logick, and directed Mr Attorney to press the statute of Edward III, which was that on which Mr Cuffe was indicted (l). His sternness made him more feared than loved; however, as an able lawyer, and a Judge of great experience, he kept his post, in the execution of which he was reputed severe and strict in the observation of what was taught in courts, and laid down as law by Reports; but this ought to be considered as a vulgar opinion, only grounded on his known attachment to the constitution, and his high notions of the reasonableness of our laws, for otherwise we have his express declaration to the contrary, and that he neither expected precedents in all cases, nor would be bound by them where he saw they were not founded upon justice, but would act as if there were no such precedents (m) [D]. His steadiness was so great, that he valued no interest at court, nor would be driven from what he thought right, by any authority whatever, as manifestly appeared in the case of Cavendish, wherein he defied the powerful Earl of Leicester, and got the better of Queen Elizabeth in a point of prerogative (n) [E]. Neither was it in his own case alone acquainted with the controversy of discipline, in all Lindsey coast, that I can perceive. For men have enough to do, to stand by that religion which her blessed Majesty hath approved unto us, by her express laws. Nevertheless, the ill affected people, upon the occasion of these two charges, do think all religion will be made Brownism. And this judge, with so much wrath, so many oaths, and such reproachful revilings upon the bench, carrieth himself, that there is offence taken at it by persons of principal credit and note, throughout all the circuits. If he take information from covert Papists of the state of the Church there, how lamentable shall our case be. There have been assays given to extend the statute of recusancy, to those that go to hear sermons elsewhere, though at other times they frequent their own church, and hear divine service most dutifully. In his charge this last time, he called the preachers knaves; saying that they would start up in the pulpit, and speak against every body. And whereas, there was the last Lent obtained by Lord Clinton, and the Deputy-lieutenants, for those parts, with other Justices, the Bishop's allowance, with certain conditions for a meeting to be held at Lowth, to spend the whole day in the hearing of the Word, wherein men might fast if they would; and thereupon certain preachers being moved by them, preached there; he urged thereupon, the statute for conventicles, and animated the grand-jury accordingly; affirming that he would complain to her Majesty of any, (though never so great) which should shew themselves discontented with the jury for any such matter. The demeanor of him and the other judge, as they sit by turns upon the jail, is quite opposite. And those who are maliciously affected, when Mr Justice Clinch sitteth upon the jail, do labour to adjourn their complaints (though they be before upon the file) to the next assize. And the gentlemen, in the several shires, are endangered by this means to be cast into a faction. The best is, that there is little faction likely to grow among the ministers hereby. For howsoever they differ otherwise, they hold this to be the common cause; and do heartily with a more christian proceeding. Now the reason why a faction is like to grow in the one, and not in the other, is very evident; and that is this; that there are very few in the ministry which are Papists in their hearts. And the most must needs love the common cause of religion: for the other sort you are wise enough to consider the difference. These passages are taken from a letter, written by a person unknown of the clergy, to a person of quality (5). Mr Neal, in his history of the Puritans, citing a passage from this letter, quotes Strype simply in his margin (6), which must naturally mislead the reader, because there is not one word said of it's being only a citation in Strype. This is a material thing. For if the Chief Justice was violent on the one hand, this letter-writer is no less partial on the other; and therefore it was necessary to distinguish, that this was a charge brought against the Chief Justice, and not any conclusion of Mr Strype's founded on hearing the evidence on both sides.

[D] Would act as if there were no such precedents. This fact we learn from the Reports in his time, published by Mr Goldesborough. 'The case of the Refcetit was moved again; and Shuttleworth said, that he cannot be received, because he is named in the writ, and said that he had searched all the books, and there is not one case, where he which is named in the writ, may be received. Anderson. What of that? Shall not we give judgment because it is not adjudged in the books before? We will give judgment according to reason, and if there be no reason in the books, I will not regard them (7).'

[E] Got the better of Queen Elizabeth in a point of prerogative. The case was this, one Mr Cavendish, who was a creature of the Earl of Leicester's, had procured by his interest the Queen's letters patents, for making out writs of Superfedeas upon Exigents in the court of Common-Pleas, and a message was sent to the Judges to admit him to that office, with which, as they conceived, the Queen had no right to grant any such patent, they did not comply. Upon this, Mr Cavendish, by the assistance of his patron, obtained a letter from the Queen to quicken them, which however did not produce what was expected from it. The courtier however pursued his point, and obtained another letter under the Queen's signet and sign manual, conceived in the following terms: 'Trufty and well beloved, we greet you well: Whereas we granted to our trufty and well beloved servant Richard Cavendish, Esq; by our letters patents, under our great seal of England, the making, and writing of all Superfedeas upon Exigent, issuing out of our Court of Common-Pleas, and have divers times sent unto you for his admittance into the said office, as well by message delivered by persons near about us, as otherwise, which nevertheless hath been neglected; in consideration whereof, we, for that our said servant was to depart into the Low Countries for a season, gave commandment for the sequestration de les profits of the said office, until our further pleasure therein should be declared, wherefore for that we look for some more dutiful regard to be had by you of our prerogative royal, we have thought good to signify our further pleasure unto you in this behalf, which is, that our said servant be no longer withholden from the benefit and use of our said grant: and these are therefore to will and command you, and every of you, that immediately, upon the sight thereof, without any further delay, you cause present payment to be made unto him, or to his assign, of all the foresaid profits, since the day of our said grant upon bond, with condition, that if from time of his admission into the said office, he, his deputy or deputies, shall by virtue of our said grant, hold and enjoy the same; without lawful eviction or recovery thereof, out of the hands of him or his deputy or deputies, by any other pretended title to the making and writing alone that he shewed this firmness, but in concurrence with his brethren, he remonstrated boldly against such acts of power as were but too common in those days, and that too with effect, as appears by that memorable remonstrance recorded by him in his Reports, and which ought to claim a place in our history [F]. On the accession of King James I, he was continued in his office by that Monarch (o), and held it in all upwards of twenty-four years, to the time of his death, which fell out at London, August 1, 1605 (p). His body was interred on the fifteenth of September following, at Eyworth in Bedfordshire, with great funeral pomp; and in his office he was succeeded by Sir Francis Gawdy (q). His works are still, and have been always, esteemed by lawyers; and therefore an account is given of them in a note [G]. Our Chief Justice married (r) Magdalen, daughter of Nicholas Smith of Annables in Hertfordshire, by whom he was remarkably happy in his issue, which were three sons, Edward, Francis, William, and six daughters, two of which died young. Of those that survived, Elizabeth married Sir Hatton Farmer, Knt. ancestor to the present Earl of Pontefract; Griselda espoused Sir John Sheffield, Knt. from whom descended the late Duke of Buckinghamshire. Catherine became the wife of Sir George Booth, Bart. ancestor to the Earls of Warrington; and Margaret, by Sir Thomas Monson, Bart. established the family of the Lords Monson. As for the sons, Edward the eldest died without issue. Francis the second son was knighted by Queen Elizabeth, and his youngest son by his second wife, Sir John Anderfon, of St Ives, in the county of Huntingdon, was created Baronet in 1628 (s). William, the Chief Justice's youngest son, left one son Edmond, who was created Baronet by King Charles II, and his family still flourishes at Kiln-wick Piercy, in the east riding of Yorkshire (t). ' the said writs, that then the said obligation to be void, &c. And furthermore our will and pleasure is, and thereunto we will and command you, that upon our said servant offering of himself unto you in our said court, this next term, you presently, without any further delay, admit him unto the use, execution, and profits, of the said office, according to our said grant, for that we be nothing ignorant, that if any of your clerks, have any such title or interest as they pretend, both our laws lie open for their remedy, and also they be persons both for wealth and skill, able to recover their own right if any such be: in consideration whereof, we look that you and every of you, should thankfully fulfil our commandment therein, and then our letters shall be your warrant, &c. Given under, &c. the twenty-first day of April, 1587, ann. 29 Eliz.' This letter was delivered in the presence of the Lord Chancellor and the Earl of Leicester, in the beginning of Easter term in the said year, and the Judges desired time to consider of it, and then answered, that they could not comply with the letter, because it was inconsistent with their duty, and to their oaths of office. The Queen upon this appointed the Chancellor, the Lord Chief Justice of the Queen's Bench, and the Master of the Rolls, to hear this matter, and the Queen's Serjeant having set forth her prerogative, it was shewn by the Judges, that they could not grant offices by virtue of the Queen's letters, where it did not appear to them that she had a power to grant, and that as the Judges were bound by their oaths of office, so her Majesty was restrained by her coronation oath, from such arbitrary interpositions, with which her Majesty was satisfied (8).

[F] Claim a place in our history.] The Chief Justice tells us in his Reports, that many people being committed to different prisons without good cause, and being released by the courts of King's Bench and Common-Pleas, notwithstanding the endeavours of great men to the contrary, it was resolved to endeavour the obtaining some remedy, and with this view the Judges drew up the following paper. ' We her Majesty's Justices of both the Benches, and Barons of the Exchequer, desire your Lordships, that by some good means, some order may be taken, that her Highness's subjects may not be committed nor detained in prison by commandment of any Nobleman or Counsellor, against the laws of the realm, either else to help us to have access to her Majesty, to the end to become suitors to her for the same. ' For divers have been imprisoned, for suing ordinary actions and suits at the common law, until they have been constrained to leave the same against their wills, and put the same to order, albeit judgment and execution have been had therein to their great losses and griefs. ' For the aid of which persons, her Majesty's writs have sundry times been directed to divers persons, having the custody of such persons unlawfully imprisoned, upon which writs no good or lawful cause of imprisonment, hath been returned or certified: whereupon according to the laws, they have been discharged from their imprisonment.

' Some of which persons so delivered, have been again committed to prison in secret places, and not to any common or ordinary prisons, or lawful officer, as Sheriff, or other lawfully authorized, to have, or keep a goal; so that upon complaint made for their delivery, the Queen's courts cannot learn to whom to direct her Majesty's writs, and by this means justice cannot be done.

' And moreover divers officers, and Serjeants of London, have been many times committed to prison, for lawfully executing her Majesty's writs, sued forth of her Majesty's courts at Westminster, and thereby her Majesty's subjects and officers so terrified, as they dare not sue, or execute her Majesty's laws, her writs and commandments.

' Divers others have been sent for by Pursuivants and brought to London from their dwellings, and by unlawful imprisonment have been constrained, not only to withdraw their lawful suits, but have also been compelled to pay the Pursuivants bringing such persons, great sums of money.

' All which upon complaint, the Judges are bound by office and oath, to relieve and help, by and according to her Majesty's laws.

' And where it pleased your Lordships to will divers of us, to set down in what cases a person sent to custody by her Majesty, her council, some one or two of them are to be detained in prison, and not delivered by her Majesty's Courts or Judges, we think that if any person be committed by her Majesty's commandment from her person, or by order from her Council-board, or if any one or two of her council commit one for high-treason, such persons, so in the case before committed, may not be delivered by any of her courts without due trial by the law, and judgment of acquittal had.

' Nevertheless the Judges may award the Queen's writs, to bring the bodies of such persons before them, and if upon return thereof, the causes of their commitment be certified to the Judges as it ought to be, then the Judges in the cases before ought not to deliver him, but to remand the prisoner to the place from whence he came.

' Which cannot conveniently be done, unless notice of the cause in generality, or else especially, be given to the keeper or goaler that shall have the custody of such prisoner.

' All the Judges and Barons, &c. did subscribe their names to these articles, Easter Term 34 Eliz. and deliver one to the Lord Chancellor, and one other to the Lord Treasurer, after which time, there did follow more quietness than before, in the causes beforementioned (9).

[G] An account is given of them in a note.] As to the writings of this great lawyer, besides his readings, which

A N D R E W S (LANCELOT), an eminent Divine, and Bishop of Winchester in the reigns of James I and Charles I, was born at London, in 1565, in the parish of All-Hallows Barking, being descended from the ancient family of the Andrews's in Suffolk (a) [A]. He had his education in grammar-learning, first in the Coopers free-school at Ratcliff under Mr Ward; and afterwards in Merchant-Taylors school at London, under Mr Mulcafter. Here he made such a proficiency in the learned languages, that Dr Watts, Residentiary of St Paul's and Archdeacon of Middlesex, who had lately founded some scholarships (b) at Pembroke-hall in Cambridge, sent him to that college, and bestowed on him the first of those exhibitions. After he had been three years in the university, his custom was to come up to London once a year, about Easter, to visit his father and mother, with whom he usually stayed a month; during which time, with the assistance of a master, he applied himself to the attaining some language or art, to which he was before a stranger: and by this means, in a few years, he had laid the foundations of all the arts and sciences, and acquired a competent skill in most of the modern languages. Having taken the degree of Bachelor of Arts, he was, upon a vacancy, chosen fellow of his college [B]. In the mean time Hugh Price, having built Jesus-college in Oxford, and hearing much of the fame of young Mr Andrews, appointed him one of his first fellows (c) on that foundation. Having taken the degree of Master of Arts, he applied himself to the study of divinity, in the knowledge of which he greatly excelled; inasmuch that, being chosen Catechist in the college, and having undertaken to read a lecture on the Ten Commandments every Saturday and Sunday at three o'clock in the afternoon, great numbers out of the other colleges of the university, and even out of the country, duly resorted to Pembroke-chapel, as to a divinity lecture. At the same time, he was esteemed so profound a Casuist, that he was often consulted in the nicest and most difficult cases of conscience. And now his reputation being spread far and near, Henry Earl of Huntingdon prevailed upon him to accompany him into the North, of which he was President; where, by his diligent preaching, and private conferences, in which he used a due mixture of zeal and moderation, he converted several Recufants, Priests as well as others, to the Protestant religion. From that time he began to be taken notice of by Sir Francis Walsingham, Secretary of State to Queen Elizabeth (d). That Minister, who was unwilling so fine a genius should be buried in the obscurity of a country benefice, his intent being to make him Reader of controversies in the university of Cambridge, assigned him for his maintenance the lease of the parsonage of Alton in Hampshire (e), and afterwards procured for him the vicarage of St Giles's Cripplegate in London. Afterwards he was chosen a Prebendary and Residentiary of St Paul's, as also Prebendary of the collegiate church of Southwell. Being thus preferred to his own contentment, he distinguished himself as a diligent and excellent preacher, and read divinity lectures three times a week at St Paul's, in term time. Upon the death of Dr Fulke, he was chosen Master of Pembroke-hall, of which he had been scholar and fellow: a place of more honour than profit, since he spent more upon it than he received from it, and was a considerable benefactor to that college [C]. He was appointed one of the Chaplains in ordinary to Queen Elizabeth, who took such delight in his preaching; that she first made him a Prebendary of Westminster, in the room of Dr Richard Bancroft promoted to the see of London; and afterwards Dean of that church, in the room of Dr Gabriel Goodman deceased (f). Dr Andrews soon grew into far greater esteem with her successor King James I, who not only gave him the preference to all other Divines as a preacher, but likewise made choice of him to vindicate his sovereignty against the virulent pens of his enemies [D]. That King promoted him to the bishoprick of Chichester,

[A] He was descended from the ancient family of the Andrews's in Suffolk. His father, who had spent most part of his life at sea, was, in the decline of his years, chosen master of the Trinity-House at Deptford (1).

[B] He was, upon a vacancy, chosen fellow of his college. There being at that time but one vacant fellowship, and Mr Dove (afterwards Bishop of Peterborough) being then a scholar of the house, and well approved of by the society; the master and fellows put the two young gentlemen to a trial before them in some Academical exercises: upon the performance whereof, they preferred Mr Andrews, and elected him into the fellowship. However, being unwilling to lose Mr Dove, for whom they had a great esteem, they made him an allowance for his present maintenance, under the title of Tanquam Socius (2).

[C] He was a considerable benefactor to Pembroke-Hall. When he first became master of that college, he found it in debt, being then of a very small endowment: but, by his care and management, he left above eleven hundred pounds in the treasury, towards improving the college estate. By his last Will and Testament, he left to that college one thousand pounds, to purchase lands for two fellowships, and other uses; three hundred volumes in folio to the library, of such books as were not there before; and lastly, a gilt cup, basin, and ewer, exactly like those given three hundred years before to the college by the pious founders (3).

[D] King James ——— made choice of him, to vindicate his sovereignty against the virulent pens of his enemies. His Majesty having, in his Defence of the Rights of Kings (4), asserted the authority of Christ

Chichester, to which he was consecrated November 3, 1605 (g). At the same time he made him his Lord Almoner; in which place of great trust he behaved with singular fidelity, disposing of the royal benevolence in the properest manner, and not making those advantages to himself that he might legally and fairly have done (h). Upon the vacancy of the bishopric of Ely, he was advanced to that see, and consecrated September 22, 1609 (i). He was nominated one of his Majesty's Privy Counsellors of England; and afterwards of Scotland, when he attended the King in his journey to that kingdom. After he had sat nine years in that see, he was advanced to the bishopric of Winchester, and deanery of the King's chapel, February 18, 1618 (k); which two last preferments he held till his death. There is a pleasant story related of him, while he was Bishop of Winchester, in the Life of Mr Waller the Poet [E]. This great prelate was in no less reputation and esteem with King Charles I, than he had been with his predecessors. At length he departed this life, at Winchester-house in Southwark, September, 25, 1626, in the seventy-first year of his age; and was buried in the parish-church of St Saviour's Southwark; where his executors erected to him a very fair monument of marble and alabaster, on which is an elegant Latin inscription [F], written by one ftian Princes over causes and persons ecclesiastical, Cardinal Bellarmin, under the name of Matthew Tortus, attacked him with great vehemence and bitterness. The King set bishop Andrews to answer the Cardinal; who did it, with great spirit and judgment, in a piece entitled, Tortura Torti: five, ad Matthæi Torti Librum Responſio, qui nuper editus contra Apologiam Serenissimi Potentissimique Principis Jacobi, Dei Gratia Magnæ Britannæ, Franciæ, & Hiberniæ Regis, pro Juramento Fidelitatis, i. e. Tortus put to the Torture: Or, An Answer to Matthew Tortus's Book lately published against the Apology for the Oath of Allegiance, written by the most serene and powerful Prince James by the Grace of God King of Great Britain, France, and Ireland. It was printed at London by Roger Barker, the King's printer, in 1609, in quarto, containing 402 pages, and dedicated to the King. The substance of what the Bishop advances in this treatise, and with great strength of reason and evidence evinces, is, that Kings have power both to call Synods and confirm them; and to do all other things, which the Emperors heretofore diligently performed, and which the Bishops of those times willingly acknowledged of right to belong to them. Ut consistat ad huc potestas sua regibus, qua & Synodos convocare & confirmare possent; & obire reliqua omnia, quæ & olim qui Imperatores diligenter obierunt, & qui tum episcopi libenter agnoverunt (5). Casaubon (6) gives this book of Bishop Andrews's the character of being written with great accuracy and diligence. Exactissimæ fidei & diligentiæ scriptum.

[E] A pleasant story related of him, while he was Bishop of Winchester, in the Life of Mr Waller the Poet. That gentleman going to see the King at dinner, over-heard a very extraordinary conversation between his Majesty and two Prelates, the Bishop of Winchester, and Dr Neale, Bishop of Durham, who were standing behind the King's chair. 'His Majesty asked the Bishops; My Lords, cannot I take my subjects money when I want it, without all this formality in Parliament? The Bishop of Durham readily answered; God forbid, Sir, but you should; you are the breath of our nostrils. Whereupon the King turned, and said to the Bishop of Winchester; Well, my Lord, what say you? Sir, replied the Bishop, I have no skill to judge of Parliamentary cases. The King answered; No put-offs, my Lord; answer me presently. Then, Sir, said he, I think it lawful for you to take my brother Neal's money, for he offers it. Mr Waller said, the company was pleased with this answer, and the wit of it seemed to affect the King. For a certain Lord coming in soon after, his Majesty cried out, O my Lord, they say you lie with my Lady. No, Sir, says his Lordship in confusion; but I like her company, because she has so much wit. Why, then, says the King, do not you lie with my Lord of Winchester there? (7) ?

i. e. Reader, if thou art a Christian, stay; it will be worth thy tarrying, to know how great a man lies here. A member of the same Catholic Church with thy self; under the same hope of a happy resurrection; and in expectation of the same appearance of our Lord Jesus: the most holy Bishop LANCELOT ANDREWS; born at London; educated at Cambridge; one of the Scholars, Fellows, and Masters of Pembroke-Hall, and inferior to none: an infinite treasure, an amazing oracle, of languages, arts and sciences, and every branch of human and divine learning: an incomparable bulwark of the Orthodox Church of Christ, by his conversation, writings, prayers, and example. He was chaplain in ordinary to Queen Elizabeth; Residentiary of St Paul's in London; Dean of St Peter's Westminster; Bishop, first of Chichester, then of Ely, and lastly of Winchester; Almoner to King James, Privy-Counsellor of both kingdoms, and Dean of the Royal Chapel. He merits eternal admiration, for his indefatigable application to his studies, his consummate experience and skill in affairs, his constant piety towards God, his liberality and charity to the poor, one of his Chaplains. Besides the Tortura Torti already mentioned (1), Bishop Andrews wrote A Manual of private Devotions and Meditations for every Day in the Week, and A Manual of Directions for the Visitation of the Sick; besides Sermons [G], and several Traacts in English and Latin, published after his death [H]. He had a share in the translation of the Pentateuch, and the historical Books from Joshua to the first book of Chronicles exclusively (m). The character of Bishop Andrews, both publick and private, was in every respect great and singular. The author of his Life, so often referred to, celebrates in particular his great zeal and piety [I], his charity and compassion poor, his uncommon affability and humanity to those about him, and his unshaken integrity towards all. Full of years and reputation, to the regret of all good men, he died, a bachelor, and exchanged this life for a crown of glory; in the second year of King Charles, the seventy-first of his age, and that of Christ 1626. Reader, farewell, and give glory to God.

[G] His sermons.] In the volume of his sermons, dedicated to King Charles I, there are seventeen on the Nativity, preached on Christmas-day; eight upon Repentance and Fasting, preached on Ashwednesday; six preached in Lent; three on the Passion, preached on Good-Friday; eighteen on the Resurrection, preached upon Easter-day; fifteen on the sending of the Holy Ghost, preached upon Whit-sunday; eight preached on the fifth of August; ten on the fifth of November, and eleven on several occasions. They were published by the direction of his Majesty, and under the care and inspection of Dr William Laud, then Bishop of London, and Dr John Buckeridge, Bishop of Ely; the latter of whom preached Bishop Andrews's funeral sermon. 'When the author died, (say these editors in their dedication to the King) your Majesty thought it not fit his sermons should die with him. And though they could not live with all that elegance, which they had upon his tongue, yet you were graciously pleased to think a paper-life better than none. Upon this, your Majesty gave us a first charge, that we should overlook the papers (as well Sermons as other Tractates) of that reverend and worthy Prelate, and print all that we found perfect. Had they not come perfect, we should not have ventured to add any limme unto them, lest mixing a pen farre inferior, we should have disfigured such compleat bodies. Your Majesty's first care was for the presse, that the work might be publick. Your second was for the work itself, that it might come forth worthy the author; which could not be, if it came not forth as he left it. In pursuance of these two, we have brought the work to light, and we have done it with care and fidelity; for as the sermons were preached, so are they published. When he preached them, they had the general approbation of the court, and they made him famous for making them. Now they are printed, we hope they will have the general liking of the church, and enlarge and increase his name to them that knew not him.' Dr Fuller tells us, Bishop Andrews was an unimitable preacher in his way, and such plagiarizers who have stolen his sermons could never steal his preaching, and could make nothing of that, whereof he made all things as he desired. Pious and pleasant Bishop Felton (he adds) his contemporary and colleague, endeavoured in vain in his sermons to assimilate his style, and therefore said merrily of himself: 'I had almost marred my own natural treat by endeavouring to imitate his artificial amble (8).' But however admired Bishop Andrews's sermons were in that age, they are not in such esteem with the critics of the present. For, notwithstanding the learning and good sense with which they abound, yet the affectation in the style, and composition, makes them no longer read with pleasure. Even a contemporary author (9) censured them as affected and surcharged with verbal allusions. And a modern writer tells us, that 'Bishop Andrews, and the most eminent Divines in the beginning of the last century, reduced preaching to punning, and the eloquence of the chair to the buffoonry of the stage (10).'

[I] His great zeal and piety.] These were distinguishable in his private and secret devotions, in which he daily spent many hours; and in his public prayers with his family. His chapel, in which he had monthly communions, was so decently and reverently adorned, and the behaviour of himself and his family so pious and exemplary, that many, who came thither (even through accident) in the time of divine service, were greatly affected therewith, and excited to the like reverend deportment; and some even compassion [K], his fidelity and integrity [L], his gratitude and thankfulness [M], his munificence and bounty [N], his hospitality [O], his humanity and affability [P], his modesty [Q], his diligent application to study [R], and his talents as a preacher and a writer [S]. even desired to end their days in Bishop Andrews's chapel (14).

(14) Life, &c.

[K] His charity and compassion.] These he practised even before he came to great preferments, extending his charity in a liberal manner to the relief of poor parishioners, and prisoners; besides his constant Sunday alms in his parish of St Giles's. But when his means became greater, his charity increased in a large proportion. And one thing in his manner of relieving the distressed, is remarkable, that he always gave strict charge to his servants, whom he entrusted with the distribution of his bounty, not to acknowledge from whence the relief came, but give it as from a benefactor unknown. His private alms alone, in his last six years, amounted to upwards of 1300*l.* Nor did his charity end with his life: for, by his last Will, he left 4000*l.* to purchase 200*l.* per annum, in land, to be distributed quarterly in the following manner: to aged and decayed poor men, especially sea-faring men, fifty pounds; to poor widows, the wives of one husband, fifty pounds; to the binding of poor orphans apprentices, fifty pounds; and to the relief of poor prisoners, fifty pounds. He left besides, to be distributed presently after his death, among maid-servants of honest report, and who had served one master or mistress seven years, the sum of two hundred pounds. Lastly, a great part of his estate, which remained after the expenses of his funeral and his legacies were discharged, he left to be distributed among his poor servants (15).

(15) Ibid.

[L] His fidelity and integrity.] He was ever careful to keep in good repair the houses of all his spiritual preferments, and spent much money that way; as, upon the vicarage-house of St Giles's, the prebendal and deanry houses of Westminster. He expended upon the episcopal palace of Chichester above 420*l.*; upon that of Ely above 2440*l.*; and upon that of Winchester 2000*l.* But his fidelity and integrity were most discoverable in his pastoral care and government of his dioceses. He filled the vacant preferments, which were in his own gift, with the ablest and best men; and often conferred benefices on men of character and learning, who stood in need of them, without any solicitation or request on their part. So that what was once said of St Chrysofom, may be fitly applied to Bishop Andrews: In administratione Episcopatus præbuit se fidelem, constantem, & vigilantem Ministrum Christi. Nor was he less faithful in the discharge of those temporal offices, with which he was vested. Not to mention here his conduct as head of Pembroke-hall (16), his regulation of Westminster college and school sufficiently speak for him. To which may be added, that, whereas by virtue of his deanry of Westminster, his mastership of Pembroke-hall, and his Bishopric of Ely, the election of scholars into the school of Westminster, and from thence to the two Universities, as also of many scholars and fellows in Pembroke-hall, some in Peterhouse, and some in Jesus-college, was in his power and disposal; he waded all letters of recommendation from great persons, and, setting aside all favour and affection, chose only such as in his judgment were fittest (17).

(16) See the remark [C].

(17) Ibid.

[M] His gratitude and thankfulness.] Of this virtue there were divers instances. Among the rest, he gave the living of Waltham in Hampshire to Dr Ward, son of his first school-master. And he always retained so high an esteem for his other school-master Mr Mulcaster, that he used to place him at the upper end of his table, and, after his death, caused his picture to be hung up over his study-door. After much enquiry concerning the kindred of Dr Watts, who had bestowed on him his first scholarship at Pembroke-hall, he found but one; to whom, being a scholar, he gave preferments in that college; and at his death ordered, by his Will, that out of the scholarships of Dr Watts's foundation, the two fellowships, which he himself had founded at Pembroke-hall, should be supplied, if such scholars should be found qualified for them (18).

(18) Ibid.

[N] His munificence and bounty.] After he became a Bishop, he never visited either of the Universities, but he left fifty or an hundred pounds to be distributed among poor scholars. And when King James honoured the university of Cambridge with his presence in 1617, Bishop Andrews, who was present with His Majesty at the Philosophy-A&T, sent, at his departure, to four of the disputants, forty pieces of gold, of two and twenty shillings a piece, to be divided equally among them. To these instances may be added the magnificent entertainment he gave his said Majesty at Farnham Castle, where in the space of three days he spent three thousand pounds (19).

(19) Ibid.

[O] His hospitality.] His table, which was always plentifully and elegantly furnished, was open to all persons of quality and worth, especially scholars and strangers. And his behaviour to his guests was so courteous, and his discourse so gravely facetious, that those whom he entertained would often profess they never came to any man's table, where they received better satisfaction, and that, in respect to the plenty they found there, his Lordship kept Christmas all the year (20).

(20) Ibid.

[P] His humanity and affability.] These were conspicuous, not only in his behaviour towards his guests (as mentioned in the last remark) but in his general conversation; for which he was justly admired by the most famous scholars both at home and abroad: such as (to omit those of our own nation) Casaubon, Cluverius, Vossius, Grotius, Du Moulin, Erpenius, and others (21).

(21) Ibid.

[Q] His modesty.] This was so great, that, though the whole world took notice of his deep and profound learning, yet he was so far from acknowledging it, that he would often complain of his defects, professing that he was but inutilis servus, nay inutile pondus. Being promoted to the Bishopric of Chichester, he was so sensible of his insufficiency to undergo such a charge, that he caused to be engraven about the episcopal seal these words of St Paul, 'Et ad hæc quis idoneus? i. e. And who is sufficient for these things?' 2 Cor. ii. 16. (22).

(22) Ibid.

[R] His diligent application to study.] This can scarce be paralleled, if we consider him from his childhood to his old age. Never any man spent so much time in study as this reverend Prelate. From the hour he rose (his private devotions finished) to the time he was called to dinner, which was not till twelve o'clock at the soonest, he kept close to his books, nor would be interrupted by any that came to speak with him, or upon any occasion, public prayer excepted. And he was so displeas'd with scholars, who attempted to speak with him in a morning, that he would say, he doubted they were no true scholars that came to him before noon. He would spend two or three hours after dinner, in conversing with his guests, or in dispatching his own temporal affairs, or those belonging to his episcopal jurisdiction; and having got rid of these and the like avocations, he would return to his study, where he usually spent the rest of the afternoon, until bed-time. Nor was he less diligent in his application to study even at that time of life, when it might be expected he would have taken some respite from his former pains (23).

(23) Ibid.

[S] His talents as a preacher and a writer.] He had such a dexterity at preaching, that some would say of him, he was quick again as soon as delivered: so that he was truly styled Stella Prædicantium, and an angel in the pulpit (24). And as to his acuteness and profundity in controversial writing, he so excelled all others of his time, that neither Bellarmine, nor any other of the Romanists, were ever able to answer what he wrote (25): so that, as his sermons were inimitable, his writings were unanswerable (26).

(24) See more of his character as a Preacher in the remark [G].

[T] He hated three vices more especially, Usury, Simony, and Sacrilege.] With respect to the first of these vices, he was so far from it himself, that, when his friends stood in need of such money as he could spare, he lent it them freely without interest. As to Simony, it was so detestable to him, that for refusing to admit several persons to livings, whom he suspected to be simoniacally preferred, he suffered much by suits of law; choosing to be compelled, against his will, by him, that, in his presence, he refrained from that mirth and levity, in which he indulged himself at other times (u). What opinion my Lord Clarendon had of him, appears from hence, that, in mentioning the death of Dr Bancroft Archbishop of Canterbury, he remarks, that 'if he had been succeeded by Bishop Andrews, or any man who understood ' and loved the Church, that infection would easily have been kept out, which could not ' afterwards be so easily expelled (o).' Our great poet Milton thought him worthy of his pen, and wrote a Latin elegy on his death (p). His style and manner of writing, however admired in that age, are very exceptionable in the opinion of the best critics of the present (q).

by the law, to admit them, rather than voluntarily to do that which his conscience made a scruple of. So that what was said of Robert of Winchelsea, Archbishop of Canterbury, may be applied to Bishop Andrews: 'Beneficia ecclesiastica nunquam nisi doctis contulit; precibus & gratia nobilium fretos & am-bientes semper repulit. i. e. He never conferred ecclesiastical preferments on any but men of learning, and always rejected those, who sought for them by 'the favour and recommendation of great men.' His abhorrence of Sacrilege appeared from hence, that when the Bishoprics of Salisbury and Ely were offered him upon terms favouring that way, he utterly rejected them. And when he was Bishop of Winchester, he refused several large sums for the renewing of some leases, because he conceived such renewal would be prejudicial to his successors (27). T

(27) Ibid.

A N D R E W S, or as himself wrote it, A N D R E W E (EUSEBIUS) a gentleman of a good family feated in Middlesex (a). He was, when young, brought into the family of Lord Capel, to whom he was afterwards Secretary. By the direction of his patron he applied himself to the Law, and became a Barrister of Gray's-inn, as many authors tell us (b), though there seems to be good authority to prove his being of Lincoln's-inn (c). However, in the year 1642, he quitted the gown, in order to take up arms for his Majesty King Charles I, whom he served in the honourable post of a Colonel, with great loyalty and courage, till the surrender of Worcester in 1645; when, supposing the King's affairs not to be retrieved, he returned privately to London, in order to take some care of his own (d). He practised for some time privately, and it seems was a man of such capacity, and of so steady a loyalty, that the Parliament, or rather those who directed it, caused spies to be placed upon him, from almost his first coming to town, to the day of his death, or at least of his apprehension (e). But these spies finding nothing to report of Colonel Andrewe, but his good affection to the royal cause, it was thought proper to push him and several others, since they would not of themselves, take methods for their own ruin [A]. With this view, in the spring of the year 1649, one Mr John Barnard, who had been Major to Colonel Andrewe's regiment, and who, for his sober behaviour and great parts, had been much in his favour (f), informed the Colonel, that some of the Reformadoes, that is, reduced officers in the Parliament's service, were sorry for what they had done, and inclined to return to their duty, and promote, as far as in their power lay, the service of King Charles II. The same person brought to the acquaintance of Colonel Andrewe, Captain Holmes, and one Mr John Benfon, who were in the same situation with himself (g). When they were together, Major Barnard proposed an attempt

[A] Since they would not of themselves take methods for their own ruin.] This practice of setting on foot plots, in order to take off such persons, as are esteemed dangerous to any government, might have been in danger of wanting a proper name, if we had not been informed, that at this time it was called in England TREPPANING. The author who tells us this, tells us also, the import of this phrase. Trepan, says he, was a word newly heard in England, being a denomination of a lewd sort of people, who prostitute strumpets under pretence of their being their wives; and having apprehended persons of estates, by a sign given in the fact, prosecuted them at law, to the recovery of great damages (1). Thus we see the original of this term, and how it came to be applied in a political sense. Colonel Andrewe, in a petition presented by him to parliament, gives us so very just a description of his case, that it will be proper to make use of his own words. After the title of the petition, he proceeds thus: 'That your petitioner hath been by a confederate pack of setters wrought into actions, which, abstracted from their circumstances, render him liable to your justice; and this done not without their further hope, that your petitioner, as they supposed, had interest to have drawn divers persons of quality and fortune into the same entanglement. That failing of that part of their aim, the said confederates did betray your petitioner to the Council of State, &c. (2).' A very intelligent person assures us, that Bernard and Pits, two of the witnesses against Mr Andrewe, were suborned by Serjeant Bradshaw, and Sir Henry Mildmay (3). But if these were all calumnies, there is a clear proof of the truth of this fact, which arises thus: Colonel Andrewe, who was a man of spirit and spoke freely, fairly charged it upon Bradshaw at one of his examinations; who, instead of denying it, pretended to justify it by the example of other States (4). Yet was this no better than an evasion, for under no legal government was there ever men employed to make plots, tho' spies have been encouraged to detect them. This policy however was found of such use to that government, that it was practised as long as it subsisted; what the fate was of the person principally employed in decoying Colonel Andrewe, the reader will see at the end of this article, and if he inclines to be better acquainted with the whole affair, he may meet with a very circumstantial account of it, written by Mr Beukley, who assisted Colonel Andrewe in his imprisonment, in the State Trials (5). There is besides a passage in a book written by a person too honest to deceive, and too well informed to be himself misled, I mean Dr Bates, who was physician to O. Cromwell; there is, I say, a passage in a work of his, which too nearly concerns this matter to be omitted: for having related the various means made use of to weaken the Royalists, he says, 'There were also, a kind of Duckoys and Trepans, of all men the most accused, whose chief study was to teaze the most hot-headed and choleric, and who drew them thereby into capital snares, and when they had thus caught them, informed against them, that they might be brought to a trial, or oppressed them with secret calumnies. Colonel Andrewe thus circumvented lost his head: nor was the president Bradshaw ashamed openly to declare in court, that by counterfeit letters, he had corresponded with him in the name of the 'King' (6).

attempt upon the Isle of Ely, which he knew Colonel Andrewe had formerly meditated, when in the service of King Charles I. At the same time he told the Colonel, that Sir John Gell, who had been formerly a Colonel in the Parliament service, and who was known to have a great interest in his country, would assist in such a design. After some discourse, the eighteenth of October was mentioned as a proper day for the enterprize, because it was the fair day (b). Some time after this, Captain Holmes brought instructions from Sir John Gell, to draw a petition for the payment of his arrears, which Mr Andrewe performed. Soon after he had a conference with Sir John, whereby he found all that had been reported to him of that gentleman, true. This gave him a greater confidence in the people who had hitherto transacted with him, inasmuch, that he ventured to make a journey into Cambridgeshire, on purpose to see how far his scheme of surprizing the Isle of Ely, might be practicable upon a proper occasion (i). On his return however, finding the steps taken by his Confederates no way answerable to their promises, or his own expectations, and finding also that he was within the compass of a new law, which required all such as had not taken the Protestation, the Solemn League and Covenant, the Negative Oath, or subscribed a late engagement, to quit the kingdom by a day prefixed, he turned his thoughts solely to the providing for this retreat, which was, strictly speaking, an exile (k). With this view he entered into a treaty with Sir Edmund Plowden, who was proprietor of New Albion, resolving to fix himself in that plantation. But on Saturday the sixteenth of March, Major Barnard, and Captain Benson, came to make him a visit, wherein they told him in general terms, that there was a great design on foot, and that he should have immediately very considerable advantages, if he would go over to the King in Holland, and manage what was necessary there for the service of those concerned. To which the Colonel assented, provided the money that was promised appeared to be ready (l). Not long after, the same persons came again, assuring him, that there were several persons of quality and great estates, in the counties of Kent, Buckingham, and Dorset, who would draw near the town in order to further the design, provided those they were to treat with entered into an engagement, which engagement, according to their instructions, and at their requests, he drew, and promised to move Sir John Gell to sign and seal it, as he himself did (m) [B]. Colonel Andrewe accordingly mentioned it to Sir John, who absolutely refused to comply with his desire, but told him in general, that he was well affected to the King, and begged him to tell his Majesty as much, in case he went over to Holland (n). On Monday following, Major Barnard appointed the Colonel to meet the gentlemen of the several counties beforementioned, at a certain place; but when the Colonel came there, he found nobody but Major Barnard, who produced to him certain letters, written as from the aforesaid gentlemen, and requiring him, the Major, to come to them immediately. Thus from time to time they trifled with the Colonel, in hopes of gaining by his means Sir John Gell's subscription, and actually drew Mr Andrewe as far as Gravesend, upon an assurance, that if he did not receive two hundred pounds there, he should have his subscription delivered up to him. But waiting for the performance of these fair promises, he was, on the twenty-fourth of March, apprehended at Gravesend, by Major Parker, who brought him prisoner to London (o). The next day he was examined by the Lord President Bradshaw, Sir Henry Mildmay, and Thomas Scott, Esq; who were a Committee from the Council of State. The questions they put to him were so nice and particular, that the Colonel saw he was betrayed, and that they knew every step he had taken for four years together. He told them as much, and they did not deny it, but pressed him to make a full and free confession. Accordingly he drew a narrative of the whole affair, and laid it before them, which did not hinder their committing him on Sunday the thirtieth of March, to the Tower, for high-treason (p). From that time forwards he petitioned them frequently, but to no purpose, continuing a close prisoner for three months compleat, notwithstanding he also presented a petition to Parliament (q). In the beginning of August 1650, he was brought before the High Court of Justice, where he was prosecuted upon his own narrative before Bradshaw, at whose instance he had drawn it. The Attorney-General, Prideaux, treated him with very bad language, nor was it

[B] To move Sir John Gell, to sign and seal it as he himself did. The judicious reader will easily perceive, that those who set this matter on foot, had more in view than the bare destruction of Colonel Andrewe, and therefore it is necessary to explain a little what that design was. It is, in the first place, to be remarked; that immediately after the murder of the King, the affairs of the parliament were in a very doubtful posture, and grew worse for some time. The Scots had actually owned King Charles II, and were preparing to restore him: Sir Thomas Fairfax had laid down his commission in discontent; but that which gave them most pain, was the general defection of the Presbyterians, who had shown a general abhorrence of the proceedings against the King, and many of their ministers had given broad indications of their wishing well to the King of Scots. This plot therefore was laid, to destroy the wisest and wariest of that party; Sir John Gell, whom it was presumed Colonel Andrewe might draw in, and then, as Major Barnard actually told the Colonel, Sir Guy Palmes, Sir John Curson, Sir Thomas Whitmore, and several other persons of distinction would join them, on Sir John Gell's first motion. If therefore this plot had taken, the whole Presbyterian interest had been undone (7), as it was, the imprisonment of Sir John Gell, and the forfeiture of his estate, intimidated his friends, and made way for an event, those who projected this plot, never thought of; the turning out of the parliament by Cromwell, to whose power Bradshaw was as great an enemy, as ever he had been to the King's, and actually served as far as he could, such of the royalists as escaped the high court of justice, when power fell into other hands (8).

without some difficulty, that he procured leave to offer any thing to the court; but he could not obtain permission to put in his answer in writing, which is exactly transcribed in the notes (r) [C]. After this he offered to put in a second and a third answer of the same date, but not being permitted, he made a noble defence by word of mouth, grounded chiefly on the illegality of the court, and which may perhaps be styled, as eloquent an oration as is to be met with in our own, or any foreign language. To all which, Mr Attorney-General Prideaux made the following short answer, viz. That the Court was not at leisure to take notice of his law cafes, but of his confession. That he had an affection to act, though nothing acted, which was sufficient treason, and for that affection he deserved death (s). On this the court pronounced sentence against him, that he should be hanged, drawn, and quartered. The Colonel upon this, offered his reasons at large against such a proceeding, but to no purpose; and the only favour granted him was this, that upon his petition, the parliament passed an act, authorizing the High Court of Justice to issue their warrant for their beheading him according to his petition (t). This was accordingly executed on a scaffold on Tower-hill, upon the twenty-second of August, 1650. He died with great resolution, as appears by the speech he made to the people, of which the reader will find an extract in the notes [D]. He left behind him

The Humble Answer of Eusebius Andrewe, Esq; in his Defence, to the Proceeding against him, before the Honourable High Court of Justice, presented the 16th Day of August, 1650.

THE said respondent (with the favour of this honourable court) reserving, and praying to be allowed the benefit and liberty of making further answer; offereth to this honourable court. First, that by the statute or charter, stiled Magna Charta, which is the fundamental law, and ought to be the standard of the laws of England, confirmed above thirty times, and yet unrepealed; it is in the 29th chapter thereof, granted and enacted. 1. That no freeman shall be taken or imprisoned, or be disseised of his freehold or liberties, or free custom, or to be outlawed, or exiled, or be any otherwise destroyed; nor will we pass upon him, or condemn him, but by a lawful judgment of his peers, and by the laws of the land. 2. We shall sell to no man, nor defer to any man justice or right. Secondly, that by the statute of 42 of Edward III, cap. 1. — 1. The great charter is commanded to be kept in all points; and 2. It is enacted, that if any statute, be made to the contrary, that shall be holden for none; which statute is unrepealed. The respondent observeceth, that by an act of the 26th of March, 1650, entitled, an act for establishing an high court of justice; power is given to this court, to try, condemn, and cause execution of death to be done upon the freemen of England; according as the major number of any twelve of the members thereof shall judge to appertain to justice. And thereupon the respondent doth humbly infer, and offereth for law: that the said act is diametrically contrary unto, and utterly inconsistent with, the said great charter, and is therefore by the said recited statute, to be holden for none. That it can with no more reason, equity, or justice, hold the value and reputation of a law (the said statutes before recited, being in force) than if contrary to the second clause in the 29th chapter of Magna Charta; it had been also enacted, that justice and right shall be deferred to all freemen, and sold to all that will buy it. Thirdly, that upon premising by the petition of right, 3. Car. That contrary to the great charter, trials and executions had been had and done against the subjects, by commissions, martial, &c. It was therefore prayed, and by the commission enacted; that, 1. No commission of the like nature might be thence forth issued, &c. And that done, 2. To prevent, lest any of the subjects should be put to death, contrary to the laws and franchise of the Land. The respondent humbly observeceth, and affirmeth; that, this court is (tho' under a different stile) in nature, and in the proceeding thereof, directly the same with the commission martial; the freemen thereby, being to be tried for life, and adjudged by the major number of the commissioners sitting, (as in courts of commissioners martial was practised, and was agreeable to their constitution) and consequently against the petition of right; in which he and all the freemen of England (if it be granted there be any such) hath, and have right and interest, and he humbly claims his right accordingly. Fourthly, that by the remonstrance of the 15th of December, and the declaration of the 17th of January, 1641. The benefit of the laws and ordinary courts of justice, are the subjects birth-rights. By the declarations of the 12th of July, and 16th of October, 1642. The preservation of the laws, and the due administration of justice, are owned to be the justifying cause of the war; and the ends of the parliament's affairs, managed by their swords and councils: and God's curse is by them imprecated, in case they should ever decline those ends. By the declaration of the 17th April, 1646, promise was made not to interrupt the course of justice in the ordinary courts thereof. By the ordinance or votes of non-addresses, January 1648, it is assured on the parliament's behalf, that though they lay the King aside, yet they will govern by the laws, and not interrupt the course of justice, in the ordinary courts thereof. And thereupon the respondent humbly inferreth, and affirmeth, that the constitution of this court, is a breach of that publick faith of the parliament; exhibited and pledged in the declarations and votes to the freemen of England. And upon the whole matter, the respondent (saying as aforesaid) doth humbly affirm for law, and claim as his right. 1. That this court in defect of the validity of the act, by which it is constituted, hath not power against him, or to press him into a further answer. 2. That by virtue of Magna Charta, the petition of right, and the before recited remonstrance and declarations, he ought not to be proceeded against by this court, but by an ordinary court of justice, and to be tried by his peers. And prays that this present answer and salvo may be accepted and registred, and that he may be tried by his peers accordingly (9).

Eus. Andrewe.

(9) State Tryals, Vol. VII. p. 329, 330.

The intent of transcribing this paper, is to show the temper and spirit of Colonel Andrewe, whose reasons were fatal to the high court of justice, tho' of no service to him. For upon publication of them, and the concurring judgment of all lawyers, this court grew to be so universally detested, and the grounds of it's illegality were so openly discussed, that the powers then in being, found it absolutely necessary to lay it aside.

[D] The reader will find an extract in the notes.]

Colonel Andrewe was attended in his last moments by Dr Swadling, the sequestred minister of St Botolph Aldgate, who had been permitted to visit him for three days before, in which space, he had seen so much of the Colonel's disposition; that immediately before he suffered, the doctor told him, he had been rather his scholar than his instructor, and gave thanks for the many Christian discourses they had had together (10). Mr Andrewe, after he had been some time on the scaffold, turned to the people and made a long speech, some paragraphs of which deserve the reader's notice (11). As for my accusers, said he, or rather betrayers, I pity, and am sorry for them, they have committed Judas his him an only daughter, Mavilda Andrewe, to whom he bequeathed a great deal of good advice, and a very narrow fortune (u). At his condemnation, one of his judges was heard to say, Alas poor Innocent! As for the rest of the persons concerned with him, they met with different fates. Sir John Gell had behaved so wisely, that they could not touch his life. However they condemned him to perpetual imprisonment, and to lose all his estate (w). Captain Ashley was sentenced to be beheaded, but was pardoned by the Parliament. Captain Benson was sentenced to be hanged, and was accordingly executed on the seventh of October, 1650 (x). Major Barnard, the evidence who had drawn all these gentlemen into this snare, had for his reward three hundred pounds in money, and a troop of horse (y). But this did not hinder his receiving a more proper gratification four years afterwards, when, for robbing Colonel Winthorp's house at Westminster, he suffered an infamous death at Tyburn (z).

' his crime; but I wish and pray for them Peter's
' tears, that by Peter's repentance, they may escape
' Judas his punishment, and I wish other people so ' happy, they may be taken up betimes, before they ' have drunk more blood of Christian men possibly ' less deserving than myself. It is true, there have ' been several addresses made for mercy, and I will ' put the obstruction of it, upon nothing more than ' my own sin, and seeing God sees it fit (I have ' not glorified him in my life) I might do it in ' my death, which I am content to do. I profess,
' in the face of God, particular malice to any one ' of the state or parliament, to do them a bodily ' injury, I had none. For the cause in which I had ' a great while waited, I must needs say, my en' gagement or continuance in it, hath laid no scruple
' upon my conscience, it was on principles of ' law: the knowledge whereof I profess, and on ' principles of religion, my judgment satisfied, my ' conscience rectified, that I have pursued those ways,
' for which, I bless God, I find no blackness upon
' my conscience, nor have I put it into the bead-
' roll of my sins. I will not presume to decide con' troversies; I desire God to honour himself in pro-
' pering that side that hath right with it, and that ' you may enjoy peace and plenty, when I shall
' enjoy peace and plenty, beyond all you possess
' here; in my conversation in the world, I do not ' know where I have an enemy with cause, or that ' there is such a person to whom I have a regret;
' but if there be any, whom I cannot recollect un' der the notion of Christian men, I pardon them,
' as freely, as if I had named them by name; I
' freely forgive them, being in free peace with all ' the world, as I desire God, for Christ's sake to ' be at peace with me. For the business of death,
' it is a sad sentence in itself, if men consult with
' flesh and blood. But truly, without boasting I say
' it, or if I do boast, I boast in the Lord, I have ' not to this minute, had one consultation with the ' flesh, about the blow of the ax, or one thought ' of the ax more than as my passport to glory.
' I take it for an honour, and I owe thank-
' fulness to those under whose power I am,
' that they have sent me hither, to a place however
' of punishment, yet of some honour to die a death,
' somewhat worthy of my blood, answerable to my
' birth and qualification; and this courtesy of theirs,
' hath much helped towards the pacification of my ' mind. I shall desire God, that those gentlemen

' in that sad bead-roll, to be tried by the high ' court of justice, that they may find, that really
' there is, that is nominal in the act, an high court ' of justice, a court of right justice, hath in it's ' righteousness, though not in it's severity, no more
' clouded with the testimony of those who sell blood
' for profit. Father, forgive them, and forgive me, ' as I forgive them. I desire now that you will ' pray for me, and not give over praying till the ' hour of death, not till the minute of death, for ' the hour is come already; that as I have a very ' great load of sins, so I may have the wings of ' your prayers, to help those angels that are to con' vey my soul to Heaven; and I doubt not, but I ' shall there see my Saviour, my gallant master the ' King of England, and another master whom I much
' honoured, my Lord Capel; hoping this day to see
' Christ in the presence of the Father, the King
' in the presence of him, and my Lord Capel in ' the presence of them all, and myself there to re' joice with all other saints and angels forevermore.
—He gave the executioner three pounds, being all he had. Before he lay down upon the block, he spoke again to the people thus, There is not one face that looks upon me, though many faces, and perhaps different from me in opinion and practice, but (methinks) hath something of pity in it, and may that mercy which is in your hearts, fall into your own bosoms when you have need of it; and may you never find such blocks of sin to stand in the way of your mercy; as I have met with. I beseech you join with me in prayer. Then he prayed (leaning on the scaffold) with an audible voice for about a quarter of an hour; having done, he had some private conference with Dr Swadling, then taking leave of the Sheriffs, his friends, and acquaintances, saluting them all with a courteous valediction, he prepared himself for the block, kneeling down said, let me try the block, which he did, after casting his eyes up, and fixing them very intently upon Heaven, he said, when I say Lord Jesus receive me, executioner, do thine office. Then kissing the ax he laid down, and with as much undaunted and yet Christian courage as could be in man, did expose his throat to the fatal ax, his life to the executioner, and commended his soul into the hands of God, as into the hands of a faithful and merciful Creator, through the meritorious passion of a gracious Redeemer; saying the forementioned words, his head was smitten off at one blow. E

ANNAND (WILLIAM), Dean of Edinburgh in Scotland, the son of William Annand, minister of Air, the Head-burgh Royal of the shire of Air, in the diocese of Glasgow, was born at Air in 1633. Five years after, his father was obliged to quit Scotland with his family, on account of their loyalty to the King, and adherence to the episcopal government established by law in that country. In 1651, young Annand was admitted a scholar in University-College in Oxford; and though he was put under the care of a Presbyterian tutor, yet he took all occasions to be present at the sermons preached by the loyal divines in and near Oxford. In 1656, being then Bachelor of Arts, he received holy orders from the hands of Dr Thomas Fulwar, Bishop of Ardfert, or Kerry, in Ireland, and was appointed preacher at Weston on the Green, near Bicester, in Oxfordshire, where he met with great encouragement from Sir Francis Norris, Lord of that manor. After he had taken his degree of Master of Arts, he was presented to the Vicarage of Leighton-Buzzard in Bedfordshire; where he distinguished himself by his edifying manner of preaching, till 1662, when he went into Scotland, in quality of chaplain to John Earl of Middleton, the King's High-Commissioner to the Church of that kingdom. In the latter end of the year 1663, he was instituted to the Tolbooth church, at Edinburgh, and from thence was removed some years after to the Trone church of that that city, which is likewise a Prebend. In April 1676, he was nominated by the King to the Deanry of Edinburgh; and in 1685 he commenced Doctor of Divinity in the university of St Andrew. He wrote several pieces, particularly those mentioned below [A]. Dr Annand died the 13th of June 1689, and was honourably interred in the Grey-friers church in Edinburgh (a) [B].

ANNESLEY (ARTHUR) Earl of Anglesey, and Lord Privy-Seal, in the reign of King Charles II. He was the son of Sir Francis Annesley, Baronet, Lord Mount Norris, and Viscount Valentia in the kingdom of Ireland: By his first wife Dorothy, daughter of Sir John Phillips, of Picton castle in Pembroke-shire (a). He was born on the 10th of July 1614, in Fifth-Shamble-street in the city of Dublin, and was publicly christened on the 20th of the same month, in the parish church of St John in the same city, the Lord Chichester, then Deputy of Ireland, being his Godfather, from whom he received the name of Arthur (b). He continued in Ireland till he was ten years old, and was then removed into England, where he remained about six years, and was then sent to the university of Oxford. There he became a Fellow-Commoner in Magdalen-college, where he was placed under the care of an experienced tutor in 1630, he pursued his studies in this place three or four years, enjoying, during that space, the friendship and conversation of Dr Frewen, then President of that college, afterwards Archbishop of York, the celebrated Dr Hammond, and several other eminent persons, himself being always considered as a young Man of great hopes, and an honour to his college (c). Sir Peter Pett affirms, in a book addressed to the person of whom we are speaking, that he performed his exercise for a degree in that university with general applause (d), but of this Anthony Wood takes no notice. In 1634 he was removed to Lincoln's-Inn, where he studied the Law with great success, till his father thought fit to send him to travel (e). He made the tour of Europe, and continued some time at Rome, whence he returned into England in 1640 (f). He was elected Knight of the shire for the county of Radnor, in that parliament, which sat at Westminster the 3d of November, in the same year, but he quickly lost his seat by a vote of the house that Charles Price, Esq; was duly elected for that county. In the beginning of the civil war, Mr Annesley inclined to the royal cause, and actually sat in the parliament held at Oxford 1643 (g), but afterwards he reconciled himself so effectually to the parliament, as to be taken into their favour and confidence; his estate and quality, but above all, his great abilities, and general reputation, rendering him every way fit for the offices with which they entrusted him. The first of these was going as commissioner into Ulster in the year 1645, by authority, under the great Seal of England (h). It was certainly a very difficult task, that Mr Annesley and his fellow commissioners undertook, considering the Scotch forces under General Monroe, had been long in possession of those parts, and had brought the English interest very low. However, Mr Annesley, who was not then much above thirty years of age, managed all things so dexterously, and with so perfect a judgment, both in civil and military affairs, that the great rebel Owen Roe O'Neil was disappointed in his designs, both on this province and that of Connaught. The Popish Archbishop of Tuam, who was the great oracle of his party, and whose councils had hitherto been very successful, was not only taken prisoner, but his papers seized, and his foreign correspondence discovered, whereby all the designs of the rebels were broken, and vast advantages accrued to the Protestant interest (i) [A]. The parliament had sent commissioners to treat with

[A] Vast advantages accrued to the Protestant interest. It ought not to be ascribed to any defection from his loyalty, that Mr Annesley accepted of this commission. In those times of confusion, a desire of rendering service to the English nation, and to the Protestants of Ireland, might well induce a man to do any thing within the bounds of his duty, to answer so laudable a purpose. How well, in so nice a conjunction, he fulfilled all that could be expected from his fidelity to the parliament, and this without wounding in the least his duty to his Majesty, King Charles I, appears sufficiently from the publick histories of those times (1); but never so pathetically as in his own words, in a paper addressed to King Charles II, in answer to a complaint of the Duke of Ormond's. Having taken notice, that the Duke had, in his paper, ma-

the Marquis of Ormond, for the delivery up of Dublin, but without success; but the state of affairs making it necessary to renew their correspondence with him, they made choice of a second committee, consisting of men, who in their judgment, were more agreeable to him, and at the head of this commission Mr Annesley was placed (k). These commissioners landed at Dublin on the 7th of June 1647, and were so successful in their negotiations, that in a few days a treaty was concluded between them and the Lord Lieutenant; it was signed on the 19th of that month, and very soon after, Dublin was put into the hands of the parliament. This was certainly a very signal service, not only to those who employed him, but to the whole Protestant interest in Ireland, which was then on the very point of being extinguished. However, after the commissioners assumed the supreme power, he was not able to hinder them from doing many things against his judgment, and therefore ought not to be blamed for those irregularities, which were such as the times seemed to require, though they could not excuse (l). [B].

liciously insinuated, that they were of opposite parties in the Irish wars, he goes on thus. 'The Earl (for Mr Annesley was then Earl of Anglesey) was (under the authority his late Majesty had entrusted both houses of parliament with, for ordering and governing the affairs in Ireland, after the horrid rebellion began) instrumental there, to preserve the British and Protestant interest, countries, and garrisons, from being swallowed up by Owen O'Neill's barbarous army; or falling into the bloody Irish hands. He also held correspondence with, and offered assistance to, the then Marquis of Ormond, to preserve the English and save the city of Dublin, and other English garrisons and quarters, from the treacherous Irish, who broke all faith with the Marquis. He likewise sent to the Marquis, the late King's Majesty's positive prohibition in writing, against making any peace, or having at all further dealing with the Irish; and used his most earnest persuasions herein, foreseeing it would be destructive to the English, and mischievous to the late King; and still offered assistance to the Marquis, to encourage him in vigorously opposing the Irish, and to enable him to disappoint their treachery, and the consequence of their faith-breaking (2).' As to that letter of the King's, it was dated the 11th of June 1646, and was transmitted to the Lord Lieutenant, inclosed in a letter from Mr Annesley, General Monroe, and Colonel Beale, dated the 22d of June. To this letter the Marquis of Ormond wrote the following answer, which shews how early a distaste he had to Mr Annesley, and on what causes.

(2) True Account of the whole proceedings betwixt his Grace the Duke of Ormond and the Earl of Anglesey, Lond. 1682. fol. p. 9.

WE do acknowledge the receipt of a letter from you, dated the 22d of June last, which came to us by the conveyance of Sir Theophilus Jones, Knt. not long after the date thereof; and in the said letter, we found enclosed one signed by his Majesty, bearing date the 11th of June; as also one directed to the Lord Polliott. To that signed by his Majesty, our answer had been long since sent; but that as well by your several letters (wherein you declare in effect, that no dispatch from us shall be permitted to pass by you to his Majesty, unless you be made acquainted therewith) as by other printed papers, and several concurring circumstances, we find so little hope of receiving his Majesty's free pleasure, touching his affairs and servants here, that we have great cause to fear, even the safety of any messengers of trust we should send. But as soon as it shall please God to afford us clear and uninterrupted ways of address to his Majesty, we hope to give him fitting accounts of all his commands, directed to us his Lieutenants, which title (by the way we hold fit to observe unto you) his Majesty is pleased to give us, though you in the several letters directed by you unto us, are not pleased so to stile us. The letter to the Lord Polliott was delivered to him unbroken open, as we believe he would have told you before you receive these our letters: though we conceive we might in all respects have justified the perusal thereof, better than any subject (not authorized in that behalf by his Majesty) can justify the attempting to look into the contents of any dispatches sent to his Majesty, and better than we could justify the imparting such our dispatches to you. And so we remain; from his Majesty's castle of Dublin, the 18th of July, 1646 (3).

ORMOND.

Duke of Ormond, tells us, that by this treaty the Protestants were to be secured in their estates, all who had paid contribution to be protected in their persons and fortunes, all who had a mind to go with the Marquis out of Ireland, to have passes; and the Popish recusants who had not adhered to the rebels, to be encouraged to continue in their habitations, and in enjoyment of their estates, in confidence of the favour of the parliament, according as they should demean themselves in the present service. It was likewise stipulated, that the Marquis should receive the sum of 13877 l. 13 s. 4 d. which he had borrowed for the use of the garrison. Of this, 3000 l. was to be paid down, and bills of exchange were to be given him for the rest, drawn on sufficient men in France or Holland; one moiety at fifteen days after fight, and the other at six months. But the Historian says, the commissioners were not so exact in this respect as they ought to have been. The 3000 l. in money was not brought, and the Marquis was forced to leave his Lady in Dublin to receive it, and discharge the debts to which they were assigned. Bills were indeed brought for the rest, but not accepted; and he was forced to send Theodore Schout and Peter Wybrants, two Dublin merchants, to Holland, to see the first accepted and paid. The commissioners indeed passed their words, that he should be no sufferer, for want of acceptance of the bills, and that he might depend upon the honour and faith of the parliament. He acquiesced with a seeming readiness in those assurances, but found by experience, that bodies of men are not the most religious observers of their word. The bill for the first half was indeed paid; but the treasurers of goldsmith's hall, who had drawn the second on their correspondence in Holland, had, before it was presented, taken care by letters of advice, to forbid the acceptance of it, so that it was returned protested. In vain were the parliament, and the committee of Derby-house, solicited by the Marquis himself, during near six months stay that he made in England, and by Sir George Lane and others afterwards; they paid only some part of it at last to Mr Maule, a friend of Sir John Clotworthy's, and others of his creditors, who had an interest in them, without his consent; but after all that they did in this respect, out of regard to others 1515 l. still remained, and was never paid in any manner. The Marquis of Ormond had put off the delivery of the Regalia, till July 28, in hopes of getting time to receive from England a permission to carry men into foreign service, and to take measures for their levies and transportation. The commissioners did not care he should continue there so long; and to make his stay uneasy, they, on July 14, placed guards on Lord Taaffe, Col. John Barry, and Miles Power, and issued orders for apprehending Sir Edmond Verney, the Colonels George Vane, Edward Hammond, and others. When the Marquis complained of this breach of the articles, they did not offer to assign a reason for their proceeding, but told him, they were competent judges, and would allow no body else to judge of their actions. On the 16th, they gave him notice to remove with his family from the castle, and deliver the Regalia within four days. He found that they were uneasy whilst the castle continued in his possession, and was guarded by his own soldiers, pursuant to the stipulation in that behalf; and therefore as his remove at that time was inconvenient, he accommodated the business with them, by consenting to leave immediately the securing of the castle to them, and deferring the ceremonial part of quitting the sword till the set time (4). We have an account somewhat different from this, in the paper referred

Mr Annesley, not liking his situation, returned speedily home, where he found all things in confusion, the government being on the very point of dissolution, which however did not discourage him from doing all that lay in his power to serve his country; and though he did this without effect (m), yet sure it is very unjust to charge him with it as an offence, as Wood does, who represents him as an absolute time-server (n), though he was one of the secluded members, and as eminent for opposing the illegal things done after the murder of the King, as any man in the nation, who had not born-arms in his service. After the death of Cromwell, when the Rump resumed their old power, Mr Annesley, though he doubted whether the parliament was not dissolved by the death of the King, resolved to get into the house if it was possible, in which good design he got several worthy gentlemen to concur with him, but with little success, though managed with great wisdom and spirit, such as sufficiently declared what his real sentiments were, and how much he had the re-settling of the constitution at heart (o). In the confusions which followed, he had little or no share, as being too well known to be trusted either by the Rump, or the army; and besides, shrewdly suspected of knowing at least of Sir George Booth's insurrection, if not concerned in it. But when things began to take a better turn, by the restoring the secluded Members to their seats, February 21, 1660, Mr Annesley began again to make a figure, and to appear in his old character, that of a true patriot (p). In this he appeared with such lustre, that he was chosen President of the new council of state, having at that time a correspondence with his Majesty, King Charles II, then in exile; which cost him the life of his dear brother who was drowned, stepping into a packet-boat with letters for his Majesty (q) [C]. Immediately after the Restoration, viz. on the twentieth of April 1661, he ferred to in the former note, which it will be likewise necessary for the reader to see, as it contains abundance of curious particulars, and relates strictly to the personal history of this illustrious nobleman. 'After the peace made by the Lord Lieutenant (notwithstanding the informations beforementioned) with the Irish confederate rebels, and their shameful and treacherous breach of it, with design and endeavour to surprize the Marquis, and all the English garrisons in Leinster; and after they had so handled their business, as to get the commissioners of parliament to be rejected and sent away by the Marquis; he the said Earl, (then Mr Annesley) upon a second invitation of the Marquis to the parliament, (upon the Irish rebels continued breaches and treacheries) went again for Ireland, after he had used all his intercessit to persuade them to send again, though they were very unwilling; and it was much opposed by reason of the former unexpected disappointment; and was the chief employed in commission from the parliament, with an army of horse and foot, furnished with all things necessary to deliver the Marquis and English from the Irish treacheries and designs, and to receive the city of Dublin, and other garrisons, into the parliament's custody, who were trusted, and able to preserve the fame for the Crown, if we could agree upon articles for that purpose, which, by the blessing of God, the Earl did, to the Marquis, and the late Lord Chancellor, Eustace, (whom the Marquis chiefly trusted therein) their great satisfaction, as well as his own, and the English and Protestants. And after he and the rest of the commissioners had received the city of Dublin, and other garrisons, and conveyed the Marquis with the honour due to his quality, to the Sea-side, to take shipping for England, as the articles gave leave; and had spent some time to lay the foundations, which after happily succeeded, for the total reduction of the Irish, and breaking their cursed confederacy, and powerful treachery, and final subduing them to the crown of England, with the forfeiture of all their estates, for the satisfaction of adventurers, and soldiers, and the vast increase of the revenue of the crown; the Earl returned for England, as he had leave to do, before he went. Where, by his interest in parliament, he secured to the Marquis, the 13,000 l. &c. agreed by the articles for the surrender of Dublin, &c. to be paid to him, though much endeavour was used by the Lady Viscountess Moore, and others, upon legal pretences to deprive him of it; so that he lost not one penny of it, and then the said Marquis thought, and held the said Earl his real friend, and a punctual performer of publick faith (5).'

must be perfwaded that such as were then entrusted with the executive part of the government, must have had a considerable, if not the largest, share in completing that work. However, let us hear what Mr Wood says. After taking notice of Mr Annesley's going to Ireland, he proceeds thus. 'He returned into England, complied with the parliament, Oliver Cromwell, and his party, took the oath called the Engagement, as before he had the Covenant: but when he saw that King Charles II, would be restored to his kingdoms, he then, when he perceived it could not be hindered, struck in, and became instrumental for the recalling of him home, as many of his perfwasion did, and thereupon, they footed themselves up, and gave it out publicly, that they were as instrumental in that matter, as the best of the royal party; nay, they stuck not to say, that if it was not by their endeavours, his Majesty would not have been restored. At that time, he was made a privy counsellor, and to shew his zeal for his Majesty's cause, he procured himself to be put in among the number of those justices, or judges, to sit first at Hicks's-Hall, and afterwards at the Old Baily, on the Regicides, where one of them, named Adrian Scrope, did reflect upon him, as it was by all there present supposed, and on others too, as having before been misled, as well as himself (6)'. The falshood of almost every fact, advanced in this charge, might be demonstrated from the most authentic pieces published at that very time, such as the pamphlet, entitled, England's Confusion: Or, a true and impartial Relation of the late Travellers of State in England, written by one of the few Englishmen that are left in England: in which, among other things, there is a very warm letter to William Lenthall, Speaker to the Rump, from Mr Annesley, expostulating with him, on account of his being excluded the House, for not taking the Engagement (7), which Wood affirms he had taken. Clement Walker, in his four parts of the History of Independency, gives a large account of Mr Annesley's active endeavours against the usurped powers, when they were in the zenith of their authority. His very fitting in judgment on the Regicides, which Mr Wood so basely misrepresents, was an act of the greatest honour and loyalty. He foresaw, that some of those unhappy men would plead the authority of parliament, to justify that execrable action; and indeed, General Harrison did so, upon which, Mr Annesley rose up, and in an excellent speech, shewed all who were present, the vanity of that pretence; explained the nature of the quarrel between King and Parliament at the beginning, and the difference between subjects struggling for their just liberties, and wickedly deposing, or murdering their lawful Prince, which he proved no parliament could sanctify; and also that in the present case, this infamous action was not abetted by an eighth part of the House of Commons, the House of Lords being ejected, so that the odium of it, could not with any colour of reason be

[C] With letters for his Majesty.] It cannot be supposed, that these dispatches were of ordinary importance, which were committed to the care of young Mr Annesley; and besides, whoever considers the cautiousness of Monk, and the little weight that declared royalists had at the time of the dissolution of the Rump, he was raised to the dignity of a Baron of England, by the title of Lord Annesley of Newport Pagnel, in the county of Bucks; as also of an Earl, by the style of * * * * * * * which some little time afterwards was changed for that of Anglesey (r). In the preamble of the patent, notice is expressly taken of the signal services rendered by him in the King's Restoration (s); nay some tell us, that his Lordship might then have been Prime-Minister if he had not declined it (t) to avoid envy; however he had always a considerable share in the King's favour; and was heard with great attention at council, and in the house of Lords. He certainly shewed his extreme detestation of the King's murder, by his sitting in judgment on the Regicides at Hick's-Hall, and the Old-Baily, though the Oxford Historian reflects upon this, insinuating that he had been as deep in those matters as the persons then tried, which is a palpable falsity (u). Many reflections of this sort he bore in his life-time with great constancy, or rather indifference, being desirous of discharging his duty to his King and Country without hurting others, and without being sollicitous of making great advantages to himself, yet as he served a generous master, he received from him offices both of profit and of trust. In 1667 he was made Treasurer of the Navy; and on the fourth of February 1671-2, his Majesty in council was pleased to appoint the Duke of Buckingham, the Earl of Anglesey, the Lord Holles, the Lord Ashley Cooper, and Mr Secretary Trevor, or any three of them, to be a committee, to peruse and revise all the papers and writings, concerning the settlement of Ireland, from the first to the last, and to make an abstract of the state thereof in writing (w). And accordingly, on the twelfth of June 1672, they made their report at large, which was the foundation of a commission, dated the first of August 1672, to Prince Rupert, the Dukes of Buckingham and Lauderdale, Earl of Anglesey, Lords Ashley and Holles, Sir John Trevor, and Sir Thomas Chickley, to inspect the settlement of Ireland, and all proceedings in order thereunto. And this was followed by another commission of the seventeenth of January 1672, to Prince Rupert, &c. whereunto the Duke of Ormond, the Earl of Shaftsbury, and the Lord Treasurer, Clifford, were added to inspect the affairs of Ireland, viz. the acts of settlement and explanation, and the execution of them, and the disposing of forfeited lands, and the state of his Majesty's revenue, &c. After which, by reason of his singular prudence and fidelity, he had the great office of Lord Privy-Seal conferred on him the twenty-second of April 1673 (x), and all this, notwithstanding a great variety of attempts made to prejudice him, as well in the King's, as in the publick opinion; all which he not only effectually defeated by clearly exposing them, and manifesting his own innocence, but also turned them to his advantage, so as to rise more by the intrigues of his enemies, than by any art of his own (y). The long experience his Lordship had of men and things, rendered him so true a judge of merit, that he could discover it in men of all persuasions, and his freedom from prejudice such, that he could hate it in none, how different soever from himself in religious, or political opinions (z). This noble disposition, rendered him liable to a formidable attack, during the time of the Popish plot; when to have behaved with decency towards the Roman Catholics of any rank, was sufficient to stigmatize the sincerest Protestant, with the dangerous character of being a favourer of Papists. One Dangerfield, whose name will be transmitted to late posterity, as a discoverer of plots, true and false, on the twentieth of October 1680, charged his Lordship in an information delivered upon oath, at the Bar of the House of Commons, with endeavouring to stifle evidence, with relation to the Popish plot, and to promote the belief of a Presbyterian one, with many other things alike probable, or rather alike improbable, yet so far credited at that time as to receive countenance from the house (a). The trouble he received from this base attack, did not hinder him from speaking his opinion freely of those matters in the House of Lords, particularly in relation to the Irish plot, of which he declared his absolute disbelief, when few durst own they suspected it (b), notwithstanding the apparent marks of imposture in the accounts given of it [D]. His charity for men of all religions, did not however abate either his zeal for thrown on that parliament which began the war (8). The Earl of Clarendon, in his history, hath done right to this noble person, as far as his knowledge extended. But perhaps, the reader will be best satisfied from what the Earl of Anglesey himself said, of his transactions in those times, in the memorial to King Charles II, which has been more than once mentioned. He therein affirms, the part he acted, was 'To preserve the Church in it's legal establishment to the last, to defend the King and the Laws, against Usurpation, and arbitrary Government, to adventure his Estate and Life, to save his from execrable Murder, and never to sit still, till he and his friends, His late Majesty's, and Your faithful subjects, had compassed your Majesty's happy Restauration, with the apparent and imminent Hazard of their Lives; whereof, the said Duke, i. e. Ormond, had vast Benefits without Danger (9).

[D] Marks of imposture in the accounts given of it. The House of Commons voted nem. con. that there was an Irish plot, and in the House of Peers, the Earl of Anglesey, was the single Lord who dissented from a vote to the same purpose. His sense of things at that time, exposed this noble Lord to great inconveniences, for the House of Commons ordered Dangerfield's information of the 20th of October, 1680, to be printed, wherein the Earl was charged with encouraging Dugdale to recant what he had sworn, and promising to harbour him in his house, and that his Lordship's Priest should accompany and watch him (10). If this was true, then the Earl of Anglesey was a Papist, which is not over credible, for many reasons; and amongst others, for this, that the very witness he is here sworn to have tampered with, had before sworn in his narrative, concerning the Popish plot, that if the designs of the Papists had succeeded, Sir William Gage, was to have been Lord Privy-Seal (11). So that we must suppose, not only that the Earl of Anglesey conspired against the King and the Constitution, but also against himself; and that while he, as a Papist, was doing all this for the Papists, they were contriving to give his post to another, the Protestant cause, or his affection for the true interest of his country. The Earl of Castlehaven, thought fit in the year 1680 to write his Memoirs, wherein he took a great deal of pains, to represent the general rebellion in Ireland, in the lightest colours possible, and as if it had been far from universal at first; and that it was made so, at least as much by the measures pursued by such as ought to have suppressed them, as by any ill intention of the Catholics concerned in it (c). The Earl of Anglesey having received those Memoirs from their author, thought fit to write some animadversions upon them, which he did in a letter to the Earl of Castlehaven, wherein he takes notice of abundance of remarkable passages in those distracted times; and, as his subject led him, delivered his opinion freely in respect to the Duke of Ormond, and his management of affairs in that kingdom (d). This letter to the Earl of Castlehaven was written in August 1680, but was not published till 1681. The Duke of Ormond, about a year afterwards, expostulated with the Lord Privy-Seal, on this subject, by letter, to which the Earl replied; and there the matter rested, as the reader will be informed in the notes [E]. In 1682, when the nation was in a high ferment; the Earl drew up a

(d) The title of his book was, A Letter from a person of honour in the country, written to the Earl of Castlehaven; being Observations and Reflections upon his Lordship's Memoirs, concerning the Wars of Ireland. London: Printed for Nath. Ponder, at the Peacock in the Poultrey, 1681.

another, who could do nothing for them at all. But this was not all, for the zealous Earl of Essex charged him in the House of Lords, with being prayed for by name, in the mass-houses in Ireland; to which the Earl of Anglesey answered, that he believed it was not so; but if the Jews in their Synagogues, or the Turks in their Mosques, would pray for him unasked, he should be glad to be the better for their devotion (12). This spleen against the Earl rose at last so high, that Sir William Jones, when he was proposing to the House of Commons attacking several of the King's Ministers, was pleased to glance at Anglesey, in these words: 'There is another in the council, a Nobleman too, among the King's Ministers, and a Lawyer, but if we cannot reach him, do not impeach him (13).' These were strange times to live in, when the then Earl of Halifax, who always opposed Popish councils, was judged an enemy to his country for promoting them; and the Earl of Radnor, was thought to decline in his zeal for the Protestant Religion, merely because he could not swallow all the absurdities which were grafted on the Popish plot (14). It was however particularly hard on the Earl of Anglesey, to be suspected as a favourer of Popery, since he was before in disgrace with the warm churchmen, on suspicion of his favouring the Nonconformists. Besides, in all his conduct both before and after the Restoration, he manifested a high dislike of the Papists, as a party, though he was very kind and civil to such as he judged worthy men amongst them; nor did he alter his conduct, even after all this clamour, but persisted in his old opinion, that there might be good men among the Papists, though in that respect they were not good Papists; and this he labours hard to prove, in that book which goes under the title of his Memoirs. Sir P. Pett informs us, that the Earl, when Mr Annesley, disobliterated the Popish party excessively, by the pains he took to defeat their schemes, and to secure the person of General Lambert, one of the King's Judges, and who opposed to the last, the return of King Charles II, and yet, was at the bottom a jesuited Papist, of which one circumstance appeared; for being condemned to perpetual imprisonment, a little before the Popish plot broke out, an application was made to the King for procuring his discharge, and an eminent Popish Peer offered to be security for his peaceable behaviour (15). However this matter might be, certainly, if the whole tenor of a man's life and conduct could prove any thing, it ought to be believed, that the Earl of Anglesey was any thing rather than a Papist. The truth seems to be, that he was a man of so much moderation, as to be in the good graces of no party, though in the time of their distress, he was tender towards the sufferers of all parties.

[E] As the reader will be informed in the notes.] As these letters are very curious, and yet are not to be met with in the large account of the dispute between these two noble persons; the reader will be doubtless well pleased to meet with them here. That from the Duke to the Earl of Anglesey, was dated from Dublin, November 12, 1681, and ran thus.

My Lord,

IT is now, I think, more than a year, since I first saw a little book, written by way of letter, called Observations and Reflections, on my Lord of

Castlehaven's Memoirs: wherein, though there are some things that might lead the reader to believe that your Lordship was the author, yet there were many more I thought impossible should come from you; for it affirms many matters of fact positively, which are easily and authentically to be disproved; and from those matters of fact, grossly mistaken, it deduces consequences, raises inferences, and scatters glances injurious to the memory of the dead, and the honour of some living. Among those, that, by the blessing of God, are yet living, I find myself worst treated. Twenty years after King's Restoration, and forty after the beginning of the Irish Rebellion, as if it had been all that while reserved for me, and for such times as these, we are fallen into, when calumny (though the matter of it be never so groundless and improbable) meets with credulity; and when liberty is taken to asperse men, and represent them to the world, under the monstrous and odious figures of Papists, or popishly affected; not because they are so thought, by those that employ the representers, but because they are known to be too good Protestants, and too loyal subjects, to join in the destruction of the Crown and Church: besides, the treatise came forth, and must have been written, when I had but newly received repeated assurances of the continuance of your friendship to me; wherein, as in one of your letters you are pleased to say, you had never made a false step; for these reasons, I was not willing to believe that book to be of your Lordship's composing, and hoped some of the suborned libellers of the age, had endeavoured to imitate your Lordship, and not you them: But I was, in a while after, first, by my son Arran, and afterwards by the bearer, Sir Robert Reading, assured your Lordship had owned to me, that the piece was your's, but professed the publication to be without your order; and that you did not intend to do, or think that you had done, me any injury, or prejudice: if your Lordship really thought so, the publication might have been owned, as well as what was published; but then let the world judge, whether pen, ink, and paper, are not dangerous tools in your hands? When I was thus assured your Lordship was the author, it cost me some thoughts how to vindicate truth, my master the late King, myself, my actions, and family, all reflected on, and traduced by that pamphlet: I found myself engaged in the service of our present King, and that in a time of difficulty and danger, and in such times, for the most part, it has been my lot to be employed in publick affairs; and though I had not been so taken up, yet I well knew that writing upon such occasions is no more my talent, than it is my delight; and, to say truth, my indisposition to the exercise, might help to persuade me, that the book, though honoured with your Lordship's name, would, after it had performed it's office in Coffee-houses, and served your Lordship's design in that conjuncture, expire, as writings of that nature and force usually do: and herein I rested without troubling myself, or any body else, with animadversions on your Lordship's mistakes, which are so many, and so obvious, that I wonder how you could fall into them. I will add to this, that I have been in expectation, that by this time your Compleat History would have come forth; wherein, if I may judge by the pattern, I have just cause to suspect, that very particular Remonstrance, dated April the twenty-seventh, the same year, and presented it to his Majesty. It was very warm and very loyal; it and yet was far from being well received, for reasons of which the reader will be able to judge, from the extracts we have that neither the subject, or myself, will be more justly dealt with, than in that occasional essay; and, I would have been glad to have seen all my work before me, in case I should think fit to make a work of it. The delay of your publishing that history, and the consideration of your Lordship's age and mine, are the occasions of this letter; whereby, I inform you, that as no man now alive is better able than I am, to give an account of the principal transactions during the Rebellion in Ireland; so no man is possessed of more authentick commissions, instruments, and papers, all which, or transcripts of them, you might have commanded before you set forth your reflections. But, possibly, to have stayed for them, might have lost you a seasonable opportunity of publishing your abhorrence of the Irish Rebellion, and your zeal against Popery: what your Lordship might then have had, you may yet have, because I had rather help to prevent than detect errors, but then, I must first know to what particular part of your history you desire information, and how you deliver those parts to the world, and to posterity. If after this offer, your Lordship shall proceed to the conclusion, and publication of your history, and not accept of it, I must, before-hand, appeal from you, as from an incompetent judge of my actions, and a partially engaged and unfaithful historian.

ORMOND.

The Earl of Anglesey's answer was as follows.

My Lord,

YOUR Grace's of the 12th of November, I received towards the end of that month, and was not a little surprized, after being threatened above a year, with your Grace's answers, to the Observations and Reflections on my Lord Castlehaven's Memoirs, which your Grace takes notice you had seen above a year before, to find them only most satyrically burlesqued, and my intentions in the writing of them, most unnaturally misinterpreted, and misjudged, without giving instance of any one particular, which could so much transport your Grace, or interest you to judge of a letter of mine to another, with so invective heat and mistake. Your Grace's letter, therefore, consisting only of generals, I can no otherwise adapt my answer, (after a most serious revision of my book upon this occasion) but by giving the reverse of your Grace's strained and erroneous affirmatives, by my plain and true negatives; till your Grace shall administer occasion, by communicating the particular animadversions, your Grace hath been so long (as I hear) about. The reasons leading your Grace to believe it impossible I could be the author of that discourse, I cannot admit, though they import a fair opinion of me; and that in the beginning of your letter, your Grace had better thoughts than when your hand was in and heated. I do therefore absolutely deny, that I affirm any matter of fact, positively in that book, which are easily, or authentically (or at all) to be disproved. Or that, from those matters of fact, grossly mistaken, it deduces consequences, raises inferences, and scatters glances injurious to the memory of the dead, and the honour of some living; among which, your Grace finds your self worst treated. This being so, your Grace's unjust inferences from the time of it's writing, and the misjudging the design of the author, give no countenance, or occasion, to your Grace's rhetorical character of the times, though I joyn in all, but the opinion your Grace seems to have taken up, that there is a plot (other than that of the Papists) to destroy the Crown and Church; a discovery worthy the making, if your Grace knows and believes what you write; but how I am concerned to have it mentioned to me, I know not, your Grace can best tell what you intend to insinuate thereby. These are your Grace's reasons, why you were not willing to believe that book of my composing; yet you cannot leave me without a sting, in your expressing the hopes which succeeded them, viz. That some of the seditious libellers of the age, had endeavoured to imitate me, and not I them. Whether I should imitate seditious libellers, or they me, would be all one for my reputation; because I were grossly criminal in the first, and must have been so before in your Grace's opinion, or they could not imitate me in the second: your Grace will want instances in both, except this of your own making; and therefore, there must be some other reason why your Grace did not believe (if really you did not) that discourse to be of my composing. But this admitted for truth, (as it is undoubtedly) your Grace, in the next place, calls the world to judge, whether pen, ink, and paper, are not dangerous tools in my hands. I remember the times, when they were serviceable to the King's Restoration, and constant service of the crown, or craved in aid by your Grace, that you did not account them so: and it is much to my safety, that they are not so in your Grace's hands, though I find them as sharp there, as in any man's alive. Your Grace being at length assured I was the author, your next care was to spend some thoughts to vindicate truth, the late King, yourself, your actions, and family, all reflected upon and traduced (as your Grace is pleased to fancy) by that pamphlet. But your Grace had no cause to trouble your thoughts with such vindications, unless you could shew, where in that book they are reflected upon and traduced, no such thing occurring to me, (upon the strictest revision) nor ever shall be objected to me with justice and truth. After your Grace hath brought it to the Coffee Houses, (where I believe it never was, till your Grace preferred it to that office) and where you have doomed it to expire, as writings of that nature and force use (you say) to do, (for which I shall not be at all concerned) you rested, without troubling yourself or any body else with animadversions upon my mistakes, which your Grace is pleased to say, are so many and so obvious, (though you name none, nor do they occur to others) that you wonder how I could fall into them. If your Grace believes yourself in this, you seem to have forgot the long time you spent in considering and animadverting upon that despicable pamphlet, with your labours whereon I was threatened by some of your Grace's relations for many months; and your Grace hath redeemed the delay, by the virulent general reflections you have now sent me, which yet I doubt not will evaporate or shrink to nothing, when your Grace shall seek for instances to back them, whereof if you can find any, I claim in justice they may be sent me. Your Grace adds, that you have been in expectation, that by this time my compleat History would have come forth, wherein (if you may judge by the pattern) your Grace faith, you have just cause to suspect, that neither the subject, nor yourself, will be more justly dealt with than in that occasional Essay; and therefore, offer me all the helps of authentick commissions, transactions, and papers, your Grace is possessed of, whereof you inform me none hath more. This is an anticipating jealousy, which no man living can have ground for, and when my history shall be compleated, (which is now delayed for those assistances your Grace is so well able, and so freely offers to afford me) though my weakness may be exposed, my integrity and impartiality shall appear, and your unjust suspicion will, I doubt not, cease, if truth may be welcome to you, and not accounted one of the dangerous instruments in my hand; by which having incurred your anger and enmity in the first Essay, I have slender hopes to be more acceptable in the second; though I resolve to hold to the first approved law of a good and faithful historian, which is, that he should not dare to say any thing that is false; and that he dare not but say any thing that is true; that there be not so much as suspicion of favour or hatred in his writing. And this might give a superfluous to your Grace's unreasonable appeal before a Gravamen, though I never have made out of that piece (e) [F]. It was not however thought proper to remove him from his high office on this account, and therefore in the month of June 1682, the Duke of Ormond, then Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland, was prevailed upon to exhibit a charge against the Lord Privy-Seal, on account of his reflections on the Earl of Castlehaven's Memoirs. This produced a sharp dispute between those two Peers, which ended in the Earl of Anglesey's losing his place of Lord Privy-Seal, though it certainly raised his reputation; his very enemies being forced to confess, that he was both hardly and unjustly treated (f) [G]. After this misfortune, which happened in August 1682, his Lordship remained

‘ ver intended, by relating the truth of things past, to become a judge of your Grace's or any other man's actions, but barely Res gestas narrare, for the information, correction, and instruction of this age and posterity. Your Grace desiring to know to what particular parts of my history I would have information, I shall at present only mention these. The intrigues of the cessation and commissions for them, and the two peaces of 1646 and 1648, forced upon the King by the rebellious Irish. The grounds and transactions about depriving Sir William Parsons from being one of the Lords Justices, and then dismissing him; Sir Adam Loftus, Vice-Treasurer; Sir John Temple, Master of the Rolls; Sir Robert Meredith, Chancellor of the Exchequer, &c. from the council table. The mystery of Glamorgan's peace and his punishment, the several ungrateful expulsions of your Grace, by the confederate Roman Catholics. The passages concerning the parliament's present of a jewel to your Grace. The battles, reliefs, sieges, and chief encounters, in your Grace's time. The proceedings between your Grace and the Roman Catholic Assembly of the clergy in 1666, with the commission for their sitting. The plot for surprizing the castle of Dublin, in which Warren and others were concerned with the examinations and what offenders were executed, &c. and any thing else your Grace judgeth of import, to have conveyed to posterity. Other parts of the history shall be proposed to your Grace in my progress, and before I put my last hand to it, with a resolution, that though I may have been sometimes mistaken in judgment, yet as I never did promote the report of a matter of fact, which I knew to be false, so I never would. Which I am induced the rather to mention, because your Grace saith, you had rather help to prevent than to detect errors (16).’

[F] From the extracts we have made out that piece.] This Memorial was intituled, The Account of Arthur Earl of Anglesey, Lord Privy-Seal to your most excellent Majesty, of the true State of your Majesty's Government and Kingdoms, April 27, 1682. In one part whereof he says, The fatal cause of all our mischiefs present, or apprehended, and which, if not by wisdom antedated, may raise a fire, which may burn and consume to the very foundations, is the unhappy perversion of the Duke of York (the next heir to the crown in one point of religion); which naturally raises jealousy of the power, designs, and practices, of the old enemies of our religion and liberties, and undermines and cmafculates the courage and constancy, even of those and their posterity, who have been as faithful to, and suffered as much for, the crown, as any the most pleased, or contented in our impending miseries can pretend to have done (17), and concludes in these words, Though your Majesty is in your own person above the reach of law, and sovereign of all your people, yet the law is your master and instructor how to govern; and your subjects assure themselves, you will never attempt the enervating that Law by which you are King, and which you have not only by frequent declarations, but by a solemn oath upon your Throne, been obliged in a most glorious presence of your people to the maintenance of; and that therefore, you will look upon any that shall propose or advise to the contrary, as unfit persons to be near you; and on those who shall persuade you it is lawful, as sordid flatterers, and the worst and most dangerous enemies you and your kingdoms have. What I set before your Majesty, I have written freely, and like a sworn faithful Counsellor; perhaps not like a wise man, with regard to myself, as they stand; but I have discharged my duty, and shall account it a reward, if your Majesty vouchsafe to read, what I durst not but write, and which I beseech God to give a blessing to (18).

[G] That he was both hardly and unjustly treated.]

The Earl of Anglesey himself caused a distinct narrative of the whole affair, relating to his dispute with the Duke of Ormond, before the Privy-Council, and his being thereupon deprived of the Privy-Seal, to be printed for the satisfaction of the world. The sum of the matter was this, On the 17th of June, 1682, James Duke of Ormond, then Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, and Lord Steward, represented to his Majesty in Council, the injuries he supposed to be done him by the Lord Privy-Seal, in his book published against the Earl of Castlehaven's Memoirs. This representation being read openly before the Council, then sitting at Hampton-Court, his Majesty declared, that he would hear the matter thereof in Council, and did order that a copy of the said representation should be delivered to Anglesey, and that he appear and make answer thereunto, at a Council to be holden at Whitehall, on the 23d of the said month. In obedience to this, Anglesey, though much troubled with the gout, appeared, made a short speech to his Majesty, in vindication of himself, banded the matter with Ormond, and then put in his answer to Ormond's representation, or complaint against him. These things being done, another Council was held July 13, at which time, Ormond delivering a paper to the board, containing several charges against him, it was then ordered, that a copy of it should be sent to Anglesey, and that he return an answer thereunto on the 20th of the said month at Hampton-Court. But no Council being then held (notwithstanding Anglesey had made answer to Ormond's particular charges against him the next day) the matter was deferred till the 27th of the said month. Another Council being therefore held there the same day, the charges and answers were debated; which done, and the Lords concerned being withdrawn, this resolution passed by the Council on Anglesey's letter to the Earl of Castlehaven, viz. That it was a scandalous libel against his late Majesty, against his now Majesty, and against the Government. When the parties, or Lords concerned, were called in again, the Lord Chancellor only told Anglesey, that the King conceived him faulty in the clause, p. 32, of the said letter to the Earl of Castlehaven, wherein the committees of the Parliament of Ireland were mentioned, as having been in the intrigues of the Popish faction at Court. After which a farther hearing was appointed, to be on the 3d of August following, but Anglesey continuing extreme ill of the gout, and finding himself prejudged by the resolution of the Council, on the 27th of July, he wrote a letter on the 2d of August to his Majesty; which being openly read in Council the next day, he did in some manner (as it was said) resent it, for some passages therein, yet nothing appeared inferred to be done thereupon. Afterwards the Earl of Castlehaven, (James Touchet) was called in several times, and questioned about his Memoirs; which he acknowledging to be his, the said book in conclusion, was by his Majesty and Council judged to be a scandalous libel against the Government. On the 9th of the said month of August 1682, the Privy-Seal, by command from his Majesty, was taken away from Anglesey, by Sir Lionel Jenkins, Principal Secretary of State, without any farther hearing, and was given to George Marquis of Halifax (19). From these circumstances, even Wood could collect that this noble Earl was hardly treated, yet he could not prevail upon himself to say as much, but sets it down as a report, he was moved many thought unjustly. A more candid and much better informed writer, tho' he as seldom allows his heroes to be wrong as any man living, yet upon this occasion swayed mained pretty much at his country seat at Blechingdon, in Oxfordshire, where he devoted his time to his studies, and meddled very little with publick affairs, yet did he not entirely abandon business, much less discover any pique or disrespect towards the Royal Family, on account of what he had suffered; but behaved with so much temper and duty, that, without betraying or even dissembling his principles, he recovered the favour of King James II, so that it is generally believed he would if he had lived a month longer have been declared Lord Chancellor of England (g). But this, as we have observed, was prevented by his death, which happened April the 6th 1686, at his house in Drury-Lane, without any long sickness, by a quinsy, in the seventy-third year of his age, leaving behind him a numerous posterity (h) [H]. It is not easy to say any thing worthy of so great a man's character, and yet something is necessary to compleat the design of this life, and to give the reader some idea of the mind of this great man, as well as his fortune. As he had an excellent and universal education, becoming the heir of a noble family, so he was always remarkably prone to learning, and to the encouragement of learned men. He was well read in the Classics, and perfectly versed, not only in the Greek and Roman history, but in the spirit and policy of those famous nations. His intercourse however with foreign writers, did not hinder him from retaining a superior passion for all the branches of learning, which had any respect to his country. He had studied the laws with such diligence, as to be stiled and esteemed a lawyer, even by the most conceited lawyers of his time (i). In history he was a very great critick, and with respect to records, and whatever else fell under the consideration of a judicious antiquary, no man of his time deserved greater reputation than he; he was also well versed in the civil and cannon law, understood Church history perfectly, and was a great Divine. His writings, which are extant, will fully support all that has been hitherto said; and the world would have still higher proofs of his Lordship's great learning and abilities, if the largest and most valuable of all his works had not been unluckily lost, or, as some say, injuriously destroyed (k). However, as Anthony Wood, who never speaks well of this nobleman, but against his will, allows that he had a smooth, sharp, and keen pen, I presume no-body will doubt it (l) [I]. As to the aspersions by the weight of evidence, he tells the story fairly and plainly thus. Lord Anglesey had for many years enjoyed the post of Lord Privy-Seal, a post much envied, and which the Earl of Halifax, Mr Edward Seymour (who was thought to stand fairest for it) and others, thought very convenient for themselves. The King did not care to remove an old servant without some pretence; so that when the Duke of Ormond came over, the affair of the letter was revived, and a complaint was presented against the author of it to the Council. The matter was there examined, so far as it affected the memory of the late King; for nothing personal to the Duke of Ormond ever came under their consideration. As the expediency of the cessation in 1643, was the chief subject of the debate, and as that matter has been fully cleared up in this history, I have no occasion to enter farther into this dispute, which ended in what was probably resolved before, the dismissal of the Earl of Anglesey from the Council board, and removing him from the charge of the Privy-Seal (20).

[H] Leaving behind him a numerous posterity.] His lordship married Elizabeth, one of the daughters and coheirs of Sir James Altham, of Oxei in the county of Hertford, Knight, one of the Barons of the court of Exchequer, a Lady of exemplary prudence and piety, who died April 12, 1692; and by her he had seven sons, and six daughters; of the sons, four died young. James succeeded his father in his honours. Altham, was created Baron of Altham in the kingdom of Ireland, by patent dated 14 Feb. 1680. Richard the third son, succeeded to the title of Altham, by the demise of his brother without issue, and his posterity are now Earls of Anglesey also: for the daughters, Dorothy married Richard Power, Earl of Tir-oen in the kingdom of Ireland. Elizabeth became the wife of Alexander Macdonald, second son to the Earl of Antrim in the kingdom of Ireland. Frances, the third daughter, to Francis Windham, Esq; of Felbridge in the county of Norfolk, and afterwards to John Thompson, Baron of Haversham in the county of Bucks; Philippa, the fourth Daughter, was first the wife of Charles Lord Mohun, and afterwards to Thomas Coward, Esq; Serjeant at Law. Lady Anne, the fifth daughter, married Mr Baker; and Lady Bridget died young (21).

[I] I presume no body will doubt it.] The reader may judge himself of this, from the extracts we have given him. His Lordship published in his lifetime the following pieces. 1. The Truth unveiled, in behalf of the Church of England; being a Vindication of Mr John Standish's Sermon, preached before the King, and published by His Majesty's Command, London, 1676, 4to. To which is added, A short Treatise on the Subject of Transubstantiation. 2. A Letter from a Person of Honour in the Country, written to the Earl of Castlehaven, being Observations and Reflections on his Lordship's Memoirs, concerning the Wars of Ireland, London, 1681. 8vo. 3. A true Account of the whole Proceedings between James Duke of Ormond, and Arthur Earl of Anglesey, before the King and his Council, &c. London, 1682, Folio. 4. A Letter of Remarks upon Jovian, London, 1683, 4to. Besides these, he wrote many other things, some of which were published after his decease; as 5. The Privileges of the House of Lords and Commons, argued and stated in two Conferences between both Houses, April 19th, and 22d, 1671. To which is added, A Discourse, wherein the Rights of the House of Lords are truly asserted. With learned Remarks on the seeming Arguments, and pretended Precedents, offered at that time against their Lordships: Written by the Right Honourable Arthur Earl of Anglesey, Lord Privy-Seal. These conferences were principally managed by the Earl, and were concerning a bill for impositions on merchandize, &c. And a resolution, the Commons in a conference communicated to the Lords, that there is a fundamental right in that house alone, in bills of rates and impositions on merchandize, as to the matter, the measure, and time. Whereupon the Lords in parliament, on full consideration thereof, and of the whole conference, came to this resolution, nem. con. That the power exercised in the House of Peers, in making the amendments and abatements in the bill entitled, An act for additional imposition on several foreign commodities, and for encouragement of several commodities and manufactures of this kingdom, both as to matter, measure, and time, concerning the rates and impositions on merchandize, is a fundamental, inherent, and undoubted right of the House of Peers, from which they cannot depart. This resolution produced another conference, which the Earl began, and asserted the right of the House of Lords, in learned remarks on the said two conferences. (6). The King's right of indulgence in spiritual matters, with the equity thereof asserted. London 1688. 4to. This was published by Henry Care, the year before that in the title page. as persons thrown on his memory, by a reverend Prelate his contemporary, they would have deserved a more particular consideration, if it had been usual for that conscientious writer, to have given good characters of any of his acquaintance, or to have avoided characterizing such as he had little or no acquaintance with; however as this work ought not to contain either apologies or panegyrics, the words of that grave Author ^(m) are set down in the notes, with only a few remarks submitted to the censure of the peruser [K]. We will conclude our account of this noble person, with observing, that he was one of the first English Peers, who distinguished himself by collecting a fine library, which he performed with great care, as well as at a large expence, and as he was desirous that so noble a collection might not be quickly dissipated, but remain in his family, he caused it to be disposed in a manner suitable to it's worth, in a particular apartment in Anglesey house (n). But these precautions proved fruitless, as his Lordship's good intentions likewise did; his books within a few months after his decease being exposed to publick sale by Mr Millington, a famous auctioneer (o). Yet this sale was attended with an accident, which will hinder it's being ever forgot, I mean the discovery of the Earl's famous Memorandum in the blank leaf of an ΕΙΧΩΝ ΒΑΣΙΛΙΚΗ, or the pourtraiture of his sacred Majesty in his solitudes and sufferings, in order to disabuse the world as to the true author of that book, who according to that memorandum was not King Charles I, but Bishop Gauden, which produced a long controversy managed by various hands, and in several books. To enter into a particular detail of so perplexed an affair, would take up too much room, but the reader will find the original memorandum, and some remarks thereupon, which are not to be met with elsewhere, in the notes [L]. As this noble family of Anglesey, had a very honourable beginning in London 1693. 8vo. This was written in answer to a book we have often cited, entitled, The happy future state of England, penned by way of letter to the Earl of Anglesey by the said Sir Peter Pett, who was Advocate-General of England, a very learned person, and a great admirer of our noble author. Besides these some very valuable pieces have been lost, particularly, The history of the late commotions and troubles of Ireland, from the Rebellion in 1641, till the Restoration of the King in 1660, which contained all the treaties, negotiations, sieges, battles, and other memorable transactions during that time. Besides certain large and learned discourses against the errors of Popery written in his lordship's younger years, and which many of his friends would have persuaded him to have published at the time of the Popish plot, but this, by the advice of Sir P. Pett, he declined.

[K] Submitted to the censure of the peruser] The character referred to in the text, is to be found in the Bishop of Salisbury's history of his own times, where it runs thus, 'Another man very near of the same sort, who passed through many great employments, was Annesley advanced to be Earl of Anglesey; who had much more knowledge (than Shaftsbury) and was very learned, chiefly in the law. He had the faculty of speaking indefatigably upon every subject; but he spoke ungracefully; and did not know that he was not good at raillery for he was always attempting it. He understood our government well, and had examined far into the original of our constitution. He was capable of great application; and was a man of a grave deportment; but stuck at nothing, and was ashamed of nothing. He was neither loved nor trusted by any man on any side; and he seemed to have no regard to common decencies; but sold every thing that was in his power; and sold himself so often, that at last the price fell so low that he grew useless. — His Lordship afterwards adds, 'these five whom I have named last, viz Shaftsbury, Anglesey, Hollis, Manchester, Radnor, had the chief hand in engaging the nation in the design of the Restoration. They had great credit chiefly with the Presbyterian party, and were men of much dexterity. So the thanks of that great turn was owing to them: and they were put in great posts by the Earl of Clarendon's means. By which he lost most of the Cavaliers, who could not bear the seeing such men so highly advanced, and so much trusted (22).' It seems that in the Bishop's opinion this noble Lord was a man of great parts, deep knowledge in the law, and was perfectly acquainted with our constitution. It is likewise owned that he had a large share in the King's Restoration, and for that reason, the Earl of Clarendon thought it necessary he should have a large share in the administration. These concessions without farther help destroy the probability, and indeed, I think, in a good measure, the possibility, of the cruel reflections contained in the character having any grounds in fact. For how can it be imagined, that a bad man, bad to such a degree as to preserve no regard for decency, should preserve the King's confidence and the highest employments for two and twenty years together, and at last rise in reputation by being removed? Is it possible to believe that Parliaments which went such lengths, and upon such slight grounds as they did against the Earl of Danby, and other ministers, should not attack a man who minded nothing but getting, without any respect to virtue or even to appearances! can it be supposed that if this was really the case, the Rev. Prelate could not have added instances to his accusation, or ought we in justice or charity to give any credit to what he says without them? But after all, this, like most parts of the Bishop's book, is capable of being refuted by better authority. He charges the Earl with being a corrupt man. Now, he had two offices in which this must have appeared. He was Vice-Treasurer of Ireland for many years, and at last a committee was appointed to inspect the management of the treasury in that kingdom, with a design, if possible, to fix a charge upon this very nobleman, and yet they were forced to acquit him, as his antagonist the Duke of Ormond informs us in a representation he made to the King, in which also he suggests, that from the satisfaction his Majesty received from this enquiry, as to the honour and integrity of the Earl of Anglesey, he was induced to trust him in the high office of Lord Privy-Seal (23). In this office again if he had been really a man inclined to corruption, he must certainly have had great opportunities, and yet, when his enemies had gained credit enough to strip him of it, we have seen what a poor pretence was made use of for that purpose, when 'if the Bishop's story had been true, they must have had many just and even legal causes to have assigned for his removal, in their power. Then again, as to his being inconsiderable before his death, Anthony Wood, who cared as little for the Earl of Anglesey as Bishop Burnet, owns that he stood well with King James II, and that in this particular he was not misinformed, I can prove from a passage in the Earl's own diary. 'March 8, 1685, Spent most at home in business, and Duty; (i. e. prayer) in the evening was private with the Lord Sunderland, my good friend; and then was with the King a full hour at Mr Chiffinche's, who was very kind, free, and open in discourse, said he would not be priest-ridden: Read a letter of the late King, said I should be welcome to him (24).' In short, from the Restoration to the day of his death, the Earl of Anglesey was barely four years out of employment, most of which he spent in retirement, and died, when every body expected he should have been Chancellor, the highest office to which the King could raise him, and yet the good Bishop tells us, he was fallen so low as to be both contemptible and useless (25).

[L] Which are not to be met with elsewhere, in the notes.] To begin this note regularly we must produce the paper itself, which Mr Millington shewed to some people, and which ran in these words. 'King Charles II, and the Duke of York, did both (in the last sessions in this worthy person, so it has flourished ever since, and produced some very great men and true patriots. James, who succeeded his father in 1686, deceased in 1690, and was succeeded by his son James, who married her Grace the late Duchess of Buckinghamshire. He died in the beginning of the year 1702, and was succeeded by his brother John Earl of Anglesey, who was Vice-Treasurer, Receiver-General, and Paymaster of the forces in Ireland. He deceased in the year 1710, and was succeeded by his brother Arthur, who, while he sat in the House of Commons in Ireland, distinguished himself by the weight and eloquence of his speeches, and was always heard after his accession to the title of Earl of Anglesey, with the utmost attention and respect in the British House of Peers. On the death of Queen Anne, he was made choice of by King George I, to be one of the Lords Justices till he arrived from Hanover; after which he was made one of his Majesty's Privy-Council, and on the third of January 1714-15, (with Henry Hyde, then Earl of Rochester) again made Joint-Treasurer of Ireland, and Treasurer at war. On the death of the Duke of Manchester, he was on the ninth of February 1701-2, in full senate unanimously elected High Steward of the university of Cambridge, where he had his education; and had been one of their representatives in three several Parliaments, whilst he was a Commoner. He deceased the

ANGLESEY.

On the first publishing of this memorandum, it made a very great noise, and, as we say in the text, abundance of books were wrote about it. It would take up more room than we have to spare to examine the whole of this controversy, but one branch of it seems particularly to require our notice, viz. Whether this memorandum ought to be esteemed genuine? against which several arguments have been produced. First it is to be observed that this was written while the Earl of Anglesey was Lord Privy-Seal, and he was wont to subscribe Anglesey P. S. C. The King and the Duke of York were living, and therefore in decency he would have wrote his Majesty and his Royal Highness. If to this it be replied, that he used Charles II and Duke of York for the sake of exactness, this can never be admitted, because he styles Dr Gauden, Bishop of Exeter, though he died Bishop of Worcester. Add to this, that the memorandum itself is not dated, though it must have been written either in 1675 or 1676 (27). There is however another circumstance, which has never yet been taken notice of with respect to this memorandum, and which seems to affect the credit of it in a very sensible manner. It has been shewn before, how Sir Peter Pett came to write so long a letter to the Earl of Anglesey. In this very letter Sir Peter hath this passage. 'My Lord, there is another kind of power inherent in you, and that you cannot part with, such a power as King Charles I, in his Eikon Basilike affixes to the character of his favourite, when he says he looked on the Earl of Strafford as a Gentleman whose great abilities might make a Prince rather afraid, than ashamed to employ him in the greatest affairs of state. Your very reputation for power is power, for that engageth those to adhere to you, who want protection (28).' Though this book was published two years after the Earl of Anglesey's death, yet it was printed long before, and the Earl had it in his study. He also wrote an answer to it, which he designed should have been printed and bound up with it, and in this answer he takes particular notice of a very remarkable passage in the letter, freely differing from Sir Peter in many of his sentiments, and sometimes correcting his mistakes, as for instance in the following passage of the Earl's answer. 'It here occurs to me to observe to you, that after an erratum of the prefs in p. 38 of your Discourse: Namely, where you are referred to p. 325 in the Advocate of Conscience Liberty, instead of p. 225, you make the last letter of D'Osia's to be from Rome, Anno 1596, and I suppose you happened to do so, by casting your eye on the old date of the last letter but one, printed in the volume of his letters in folio of the Paris edition, Anno 1625, and finding it to be Anno 1596. But it came not into your mind then, to observe that the last of his letters as they are ranged in order was the 199th and in the end of book 9th, and which was to Villeroy from Rome, March 6th, Anno 1604, and in which year he died, as you rightly refer to his epitaph to shew (29). Yet as nice and circum-spect as this shews the Earl to have been, we find no notice at all taken of this passage cited from the King's book, but his friend is left in his error if it was one, though he sets him right in twenty things of less consequence in his answer to his letter, which takes up 350 pages in octavo. There are only two things that can be said in answer to this, viz. That either Lord Anglesey had acquainted his friend with this before, and therefore a repetition was needless, or else that the Earl thought it inexpedient to publish such a thing to the world. But whoever considers the matter a moment, will discern that neither of these excuses can be admitted. For if Sir P. Pett knew or believed the book not to be the King's, his citation and application of the character of the Earl of Strafford from thence would have been impertinent. On the other hand, who can hesitate at believing that the Earl would as soon have published this fact, having so fair an opportunity in his printed letter to Sir P. Pett, as leave it in a memorandum, when that memorandum was designed for the undeceiving others in that point? To such as are unacquainted with the books cited in this note, there may appear some deficiency in this argument, but whoever takes the pains to read the folio letter and the octavo answer, will gain so thorough an acquaintance with the temper and disposition of the writers, as will convince him that on such a point as this, one or other of them could not have been silent, if the fact mentioned in the memorandum had fallen within the compass of his knowledge. It is very true that Bishop Burnet tells pretty near the same story, for he affirms, that, in 1673, the Duke of York told him the book was not his Father's, but was written by Dr Gauden, who after the Restoration brought the Duke of Somerset and the Earl of Northampton to the King and himself, and vouched their knowledge of it's being of that Doctor's writing, and this the Bishop tells us was the reason that Gauden obtained the bishoprick of Exeter, notwithstanding he had taken the Covenant, and was opposed by Bishop Sheldon, and others, for that reason (30). It happens unluckily for this story, that the Duke of Somerset, after a long illness, was at rest in his grave before Dr Gauden was made a Bishop; and it is also observable, that the Earl of Southampton was dead too, before the story was told by the Duke of York to the Bishop. Besides this there are two other unlucky circumstances, one that the Bishop did not believe the Duke himself, because having inquired of the Earl of Louthian, a zealous Presbyterian, who knew King Charles I. very well and lov'd him very little, about this very matter, the Earl told him he was sure it was the King's book, because he had often heard his Majesty deliver periods of it in his discourse (31). The other unlucky circumstance is, that the Bishop has hinted a reason why no body else ought to believe the Duke, and which would destroy the credit of the Earl of Anglesey's memorandum if it were really his; for the Rev. Prelate informs us, that the Duke of York told him this story of Dr Gauden, on his pressing him with passages against Popery out of his Father's book. If these Brothers were both Papists, as the greatest part of the world supposes they were then is there no great reason reason to wonder they should desire the book in question to be ascribed to any body rather than King Charles I. But we may be left to wonder after all, how the Earl of Anglesey should forget that Dr Gauden was

Bishop of Worcester, as well as Exeter; when there is good reason to believe, that it was in consequence of this noble Earl's solicitations Dr Gauden was translated from this Bishoprick to that (32).

(32) Life of Dr John Barwick, p. 566, in the notes.

ANNESLEY or ANELEY, (SAMUEL) a very eminent Non-Conformist Minister. He was the son of John Aneley, of Hareley, in Warwickshire; where his family were possessed of a pretty good estate (a) [A]; and was born about the year 1620, and his father dying when he was four years old, the care of his education devolved on his mother, who was a very prudent and religious woman (b). In Michaelmas term 1635, he was admitted a Student in Queen's College at Oxford (c), where at the usual times, he took the degrees of Bachelor, and Master of Arts (d). While he was in the University, he was particularly remarkable, for temperance and industry. He commonly drank nothing but water, and though he is said to have been but of slow parts, yet he supplied this defect in nature, by prodigious application (e). He was from his youth inclined to the Ministry, and his desires we are told were much fortified by a dream of his, which was, that being a minister, he was sent for by the Bishop of London, who condemned him to be burnt for a Martyr (f). In all probability this dream which he had in his childhood, might be owing to his reading the writings of John Fox, which in those days were put into most young people's hands. There is some dispute as to his receiving Holy Orders, that is to say, whether he had them from a Bishop, or according to the Presbyterian way, and as there is authority on both sides, the point must be discussed in a note [B]. In 1644, he became chaplain to the Earl of Warwick, then Admiral of the Parliament's fleet (g). In process of time his own behaviour, and the great interest he had with such as were then in power, procured him a very good establishment at Cliffe in Kent (h). Here he succeeded Doctor Griffith Higges, who was ejected for his loyalty. This was a very considerable living, having not only a revenue of between three or four hundred pounds per annum, but being also a Peculiar, a great jurisdiction belonged to the incumbent, who therefore holds a court, wherein all things relating to wills, marriage contracts, &c. are decided (i). The people of the parish were it seems extremely fond of Dr Higges, and therefore treated his successor but very roughly, whereupon Mr Annesley told them, 'That if they conceived him to be biased by the value of so considerable a living, they were exceedingly mistaken; that he came amongst them with an intent to do good to their souls, and that he was resolved to stay, how ill soever they used him, till he had fitted them for the reception of a better minister; which, whenever it happened, he would leave them, notwithstanding the great value of the living (k).' On the twenty-sixth of July 1648, he preached the fast sermon before the House of Commons, which by their order was printed (l) [C]. About this time also he was honoured with the title of Doctor of Laws, by the University of Oxford (m), which has given occasion to some very severe reflections [D]. The same year, viz. the twenty-fifth of August,

[A] Possessed of a good estate.] It was the misfortune of this gentleman, to live in such times, as, generally speaking, engage men to become of some party or other, which is sure to expose them to the hatred of all parties except that of which they are. This is the true reason why there is scarce a fact which relates to him uncontroverted. In the first place there is no small doubt about his name. Certain it is that he himself wrote it Annesley (1); and Dr Calamy assures us, that Arthur Annesley, the first Earl of Anglesey, was his relation (2). Yet the Oxford Antiquary tells us, that he was entred of the university of Oxford by the name of Samuel Aneley (3), the son of John Aneley, and he cites the register in support of this (4). He adds, that our author wrote himself afterwards, and was called by the name of Annesley because it was a noble name (5). In order to have given some light into this matter, I have enquired after the Family of Aneley, but I cannot find that there is such a one in Warwickshire, or at least if there be such a one it can be of no great note, neither to say the truth do I find that there is any family of the Annesley's settled there (6). Yet after all, as Mr Wood allows our author to have been a man of probity, I cannot but suppose he wrote his name as it should be.

[B] Must be discussed in a note.] We have it on the authority of Mr Wood, that our author took holy orders from a Bishop (7). Doctor Calamy informs us, that he had Presbyterian ordination, and he proves it by a certificate dated the 18th of December, 1644, subscribed by seven Presbyterian ministers. By this certificate it appears, that the intent of his ordination was that he might officiate as a chaplain in a Man of War call'd the Globe (8). At first sight these facts seem to be directly opposite, yet I cannot avoid informing the reader that it is not absolutely impossible both may be true. I say this because there were in those days instances of persons, who, notwithstanding their being ordained by Bishops, desired to be re-ordained by Presbyters. Yet I cannot think that this was our author's case, for this plain reason, that he was but just of age to receive orders when he took this certificate.

[C] Which by their order was printed.] It was this sermon that raised Dr Annesley so many enemies who have pursued him even beyond the grave. His text was Job xxvii. 5, 6. God forbid that I should justify you: Till I die, I will not remove my integrity from me. My righteousness I hold fast and will not let it go, my heart shall not reproach me so long as I live (9). In this sermon he inveighed against the King, then a prisoner in the Isle of Wight, excited the Parliament to do justice upon him instead of treating with him any more, and at the same time highly extolled the Covenant. It is plain that the House were very well pleased with his discourse, by their ordering it to be printed; neither can it be denied, that Dr Annesley took the Engagement and went all the lengths with the party, which is the grounds of Mr Wood's bitterness against him (10).

[D] Some very severe reflections.] Mr Wood says that our author had the degree of Doctor of Laws to qualify him the better for holding his courts as Rector of Cliffe in Kent (11). Dr Calamy gives quite another reason, he says that the Earl of Warwick having several chaplains who were Doctors, was desirous that Mr Annesley should be a Doctor too (12). As they disagree in this, so they do in every thing else; for Wood asserts, that Dr Annesley's contemporaries

he went to sea with his Patron the Earl of Warwick, who was employed in giving chase to that part of the English navy which went over to the then Prince, afterwards King Charles the II (n). The Doctor continued at sea till the tenth of December in the same year, when he returned to London (o). Some time after this, he quitted his Kentish living, much against the will of his parishioners, that he might keep the promise he had made them, when they were in another disposition (p). In 1657, he was nominated by Oliver Lord Protector, Lecturer at St Paul's (q), and afterwards, viz. in 1658, was presented by Richard Lord Protector, to the Vicarage of St Giles's Cripplegate (r). But this presentation growing quickly useless, he in 1660 procured another from the trustees for the maintenance of ministers (s), being also a commissioner for the approbation and admission of Ministers of the Gospel, after the Presbyterian manner (t). His second presentation growing as much out of date as the first, he, before the end of the year, viz. August the twenty-eighth 1660, obtained a third presentation of a more legal stamp from King Charles the II (u). Yet even this did not keep him there long, for in 1662 he was ejected for Non-conformity (w). It is said that the Earl of Anglesey, who was his near relation, took some pains to persuade him to conform, and even offered him a considerable preferment in the Church, in case he would have complied with his request (x), but the Doctor refused, and continued to preach privately during that King's reign, and so long as King James the II sat on the throne. His Non-conformity we are told created him troubles, but no inward uneasiness (y). His goods were distrained for keeping a Conventicle, but Dr Calamy remarks it as the Judgment of God, that a Justice of Peace died, as he was signing a warrant to apprehend him (z). As he had a very strong constitution, so he laboured earnestly in the work of his ministry for no less than fifty-five years (a). At last, in the year 1696, he was attacked by a painful distemper, which after seventeen weeks intolerable torture, put an end to his life the last day of that year (b). He had the reputation of being a warm pathetic preacher, as well as a pious, prudent, and very charitable divine, laying by the tenth part of his income, whatever it was, for the use of the poor [E]. His funeral sermon was preached by Dr Daniel Williams, and as to his writings they are mentioned in the notes [F].

aries in Queen's Coll. looked upon the giving him this degree as the most scandalous thing in nature, because they knew he was utterly unacquainted with law; nay, he tells us that some of the gravest fellows there, particularly Dr Barlow, said often in his hearing, that if this gentleman could then have told what the Pandects were, he should freely have had their vote to go out Doctor of Laws. But so it was, continues Wood, that for his money, and favour of those in authority, he had that degree conferred upon him, as others then had degrees in other faculties that knew little or nothing of learning, to the great disgrace of the university (13). The Oxford Antiquary was so fond of this story, that he put it not only into his history of Oxford writers, but also into his account of the graduates of Oxford (14), and it has been transcribed by Dr Walker, without losing any of his circumstances (15). Dr Calamy complains heavily of this, tho' he has passed a severe censure on Dr Higgs, the Doctor's predecessor at Cliffe, with as little reason (16). The truth of the matter is, that this degree was bestowed at the command of Philip Earl of Pembroke, Chancellor of the university, who acted there with boundless authority, and therefore these are usually stiled the Pembrokean Creations, and, as Wood says, were in general scandalous enough.

[E] For the use of the poor.] Dr Calamy's character of him is so full, that it deserves to be transcribed (17). He had, says he, a large soul and a flaming zeal, and his usefulness was very extensive. He had the care of all the churches upon him, and was the chief instrument in the education and subsistence of several Ministers, whose useful labours the church had otherwise wanted. He was the main support of the morning lecture, for which so many have cause to be thankful to God, and after the death of old Mr Care, he took the care of it upon himself; in the last 30 years of his life, he had great peace of mind from the assurance of God's covenant love. For several years indeed before that he walked in darkness and was disconsolate, which is no unusual thing with such as are converted in their childhood, whose change being not so remarkable as that of many others, is therefore the more liable to be questioned, but in his last illness, he was full of comfort. To this character of Dr Calamy, let us add our author's Will, because it is very short, and at the same time very remarkable (18).

In the name of God, Amen. I Dr Samuel Annesley of the Liberty of Norton Folgate, in the County of Middlesex, an unworthy Minister of Jesus Christ, being through mercy in health of body and mind, do make this my last will and testament concerning my earthly pittance. For my soul I dare humbly say, it is, through Grace, devoted unto God otherwise than by legacy, when it may live here no longer: And I do believe that my body, after it's sleeping a while in Jesus, shall be re-united to my Soul, that they may both be for ever with the Lord.

Of what I shall leave behind me, I make this short disposal: My just debts being paid, I give to each of my children one shilling, and all the rest to be equally divided between my son Benjamin Annesley, my daughter Judith Annesley, and my daughter Ann Annesley, whom I make my Executors of this my last will and testament, revoking all former, and confirming this with my hand and seal this 29th day of March, 1693.

SAMUEL ANNESLEY.

[F] They are mentioned in the notes.] He hath not left much in print. He published a sermon before the house of Commons in 1648. Two sermons he preached at St Paul's about Communion with God, in 1655. A Sermon at St Laurence Jewry, to the Gentlemen Natives of Wiltshire, Nov. 9, 1654. He hath a Sermon in the Morning Exercise at St. Giles's, on the Covenant of Grace. He published the Morning Exercise at Cripplegate in 1661. And hath a Sermon there which begins the whole; upon being universally and exactly conscientious. He also published and prefaced the Supplement to the Morning Exercise at Cripplegate, anno 1674, and begins it with a Sermon upon Loving God, with all our Hearts, and Souls, and Minds. He hath also a Sermon in the Morning Exercise against Popery, against Popish Pardons and Indulgences. He afterwards published and prefaced the Continuation of Morning Exercise Questions, in 1683; and begins it with a Sermon shewing how the adberent Vanity of every Condition, is most effectually abated by serious Godliness: And in 1690, he published and prefaced the fourth Volume of Casistical Morning Exercises; which he begins with a Sermon shewing, how we may give Christ a satisfactory Account, why we attend upon the Ministry of the Word. He wrote likewise the Life of Mr Thomas Brand, which was published with his Funeral Sermon. A Funeral Sermon for Mr William Whitaker; and besides all these, he wrote a Preface to Mr Richard Allein's Instructions about Heart Work: And joined with Dr Owen in a Preface to Mr Eliza Coles's Practical Discourse of God's Sovereignty.

A N S E L M, Archbishop of Canterbury in the reigns of William Rufus and Henry I, was an Italian by birth, being born in the year 1033, at Aoft, a town at the foot of the Alps, belonging to the Duke of Savoy. He was descended of a considerable family: his father's name was Gundulphus, and his mother's Hemeberga (a). After he had gone through a course of studies, and travelled for some time in Burgundy and France, he took the monastic habit in the abbey of Becc in Normandy, of which Lanfranc, afterwards Archbishop of Canterbury (b), was then Prior. At that time Anselm was no more than twenty-seven years of age. Three years after, when Lanfranc was made Abbot of Caen, Anselm succeeded him in the priory of Becc; and when Herluin, Abbot of that monastery, died, Anselm was promoted to the abbacy. About the year 1092, Anselm came over into England, being invited thither by Hugh Earl of Chester, who requested his assistance in his sickness. Soon after his arrival, William Rufus, falling sick at Gloucester, and being pressed to fill up the See of Canterbury, which had been vacant above four years [A], thought fit to nominate Anselm; who with much difficulty was prevailed upon to accept that dignity [B]. Before his consecration, he gained a promise from the King for the restitution of all the lands, which were in the possession of that see in Lanfranc's time. And thus having secured the temporalities of the archbishopric, and done homage to the King, he was consecrated with great solemnity on the fourth of December 1093 (c). Soon after his consecration, the King intending to wrest the duchy of Normandy from his brother Robert, and endeavouring to raise what money he could for that purpose, Anselm made him an offer of five hundred pounds; which the King thinking too little refused to accept, and the Archbishop thereby fell under the King's displeasure [C]. About that time, he had a dispute with the Bishop of London, touching the right of consecrating churches in a foreign diocese (d) [D]. The next year, the King being ready to embark for Normandy, Anselm

[A] The See of Canterbury had been vacant above four years.] Archbishop Lanfranc died in May 1089, and Anselm succeeded him in December 1093. During the vacancy of the See, the profits were returned into the Exchequer. The King, it seems, at that time, was much influenced by one Ranulph, a Clergyman, who, tho' a Norman and of mean extraction, had a great share in the King's favour, and at last rose to the post of Prime Minister. This man, having gained the King's ear by flattering his vices, misled him in the administration, and put him upon several arbitrary and oppressive expedients. Among others, one was, to seize the revenues of a church, upon the death of a Bishop or Abbot; allowing the Dean and Chapter, or Convent, but a slender pension for maintenance (1). But the King, falling sick, began to be touched with remorse of conscience, and to recollect the mismanagements of his reign. Among other oppressions, he was particularly afflicted for the injury he had done the Church and Kingdom in keeping the See of Canterbury, and some others, vacant. The Bishops and other great Men took this opportunity to entreat the King to fill up the vacant Sees; and Anselm, who then lived in the neighbourhood of Gloucester, being sent for to court, to assist the King in his illness, was pitched upon by the King as a proper person, and accordingly nominated to the See of Canterbury (2).

[B] He was with much difficulty prevailed upon to accept that dignity.] He expressed great uneasiness at this promotion; and when he was hurried into the King's presence, to receive investiture by delivery of the pastoral staff and ring, he made all the decent opposition imaginable. The Bishops expostulated with him upon his refusal, telling him, 'That his modesty was no better than a plain desertion of his duty; that things were in the utmost confusion; that all sorts of disorders prevailed in the Church, and Christianity was almost exterminated by the licentiousness and tyranny of the administration: that, since the remedy of these evils was now in his power, the declining to make use of it was hardly reconcilable to conscience, or the character of an honest man; and that the preferring his own ease and quiet to the public service of religion, was a very indefensible motive.' Anselm, in excuse of himself, alledged, 'That he had not health and vigour sufficient for so weighty a charge; that his inclination was entirely for the cloyster, and that he had always declined concerning himself in secular affairs.' He desired therefore, 'They would not endeavour to drag him out of his repose; and force him upon his aversion.' He added, I am Abbot of a Monastery in a foreign dominion; I am bound to canonical obedience to the Archbishop of that province; I owe allegiance to the Prince of the country; and am likewise obliged to assist my convent to the best of *my power. Things standing thus, I am not at liberty to quit the monastery without the consent of the Monks, nor to disengage from my Prince without his permission; nor to withdraw myself from the jurisdiction of my spiritual father the Bishop, unless he is pleased to discharge me. Finding him persist in his refusal, they forced him into the King's presence, who asked him in a very pathetic manner, 'Why he endeavoured to ruin him in the other world; which would infallibly follow, in case he died before the archbishoprick was filled.' When no arguments could prevail, the Bishops and those who were present clapped the pastoral staff into his hands, shouted for his election, and bore him by force into the church, where Te Deum was sung upon the occasion. But, notwithstanding all this solemnity, Anselm would not acquiesce, till the King had written to the Duke of Normandy, the Archbishop of Roan, and the Monastery of Becc, and procured him a discharge from the obligations above-mentioned (3).*

[C] The Archbishop thereby fell under the King's displeasure.] When the King heard of the intended sum, he was pleased at first; but afterwards some of the courtiers, disaffected to the Archbishop, representing it as too trifling an acknowledgment, he refused to accept it. This temper of the court surprized Anselm, who thereupon went to the King, and addressed him in this manner: 'Sir, I intreat your Highness would be pleased to accept the present I sent you; it will not be the last acknowledgment your Archbishop will make you: And I humbly conceive, 'tis both more serviceable and more honourable for your Highness to receive a lesser sum from me with my consent, than to extort a greater by force and violence; for voluntary payments will be more frequent in their return. If your Highness allows me the freedom and privilege of my station, my person and all that belongs to me will be at your service; but if I am treated like a slave, I shall be obliged to stand off, and keep my fortune to myself.' This frank declaration greatly disgusted the King, who bid him take his Money and be gone. The Archbishop, not being in a condition at that time to double the sum, as the King expected, without racking his tenants, desisted after a second offer, and gave the Money to the poor (4).

[D] He had a dispute with the Bishop of London about the right of consecrating churches in a foreign diocese.] The Archbishop was preparing to consecrate a church, in one of his manours, built by his predecessor Lanfranc. The town, called Berga, lay within the diocese of London; the Bishop of which See sent down two Prebendaries to claim the right of consecration. Upon this the Archbishop consulted Wulfstan Bishop of Worcester, who, being the only English or Saxon Bishop then living, was thought the best qualified to pronounce upon the controversy. This prelate giving his

Anselm waited upon him, and desired his leave to convene a national Synod, in which the disorders of the Church and State, and the general dissolution of manners, might be remedied: but the King refused his request, and even treated him very roughly; whereupon the Archbishop and his retinue withdrew from court (e) [E]. Another cause of discontent between the King and the Archbishop, was, Anselm's desiring leave to go to Rome, to receive the pall from Pope Urban II, whom the King of England did not acknowledge as Pope, being more inclined to favour the party of his competitor Guibert. This misunderstanding occasioned great disputes; and, to put an end to the controversy, a council or convention was held at Rockingham castle [F]; the issue of which was, that the majority of the Bishops, being either gained or over-awed by the Court, threw up their canonical obedience, and renounced Anselm for their Archbishop [G]. Hereupon Anselm desired a passport, to go beyond the sea, till the present misunderstandings could be made up. But the King absolutely refused this request, and would only consent, that there should be a kind of truce or suspension of the affair from March to Whitsuntide [H], during which interval the difference was to sleep. But, long before the expiration of this term, the King broke through the agreement, banished several clergymen who were Anselm's favourites, and miserably harrassed the tenants of his see. Whitsuntide being come, and the Bishops having in vain endeavoured to soften Anselm into a compliance; the King, with the advice of opinion in favour of the Archbishop's pretensions, Anselm went on with the consecration, performed divine service, and executed other parts of his function, in all the towns belonging to the See of London, without moving for the consent of the diocesan (5).

Our Prelate began to reflect, that the King's displeasure towards him might prevent his acting in his station with advantage to the Church and Kingdom. Wherefore he applied to the Bishops, to entreat the King to receive him into favour. But the King being inexorable, the Bishops advised him to make his Majesty a fresh offer of five hundred pounds, with a promise of as much more as soon as it could be raised. To which Anselm replied, 'That this method might prove very unfortunate; that the King might probably be angry again e'er long, upon the same prospect; that the tenants of the archbishoprick had been miserably harrassed since the death of his predecessor; and that to take any more from them would be their utter undoing.' Besides, says he, God forbid I should do any thing to make the world believe my Sovereign's favour is mercenary. I owe the King allegiance, and ought to be tender of his honour. How then can I be true to these engagements, if I go about to bring an ill report upon his justice, and offer to buy his friendship with a little money, like a horse in a fair? At this rate royal favour would be valued no higher than the proportion of the sum. But far be it from me to undervalue a thing of that dignity, and to put so paltry a consideration in balance against it. Your way therefore will be, to persuade the King not to set a price upon his reconciliation, but to receive me upon frank and honourable terms, and treat me as his spiritual Father: And for my part I am ready to pay him the duty of a subject. But as for the money, since he was pleased to refuse it, I have given it to the poor, and have now nothing to offer of that kind. This being reported to the King, he appeared very angry, and declared, 'He would never look upon Anselm as his ghostly Father; that he hated his prayers and benedictions, and therefore he might go whither he pleased.' Upon this, says Eadmer (6), who was one of Anselm's retinue, we withdrew from Court.

(6) Ubi supra.

[F] A council — was held at Rockingham Castle. In this assembly, Anselm, opening his cause, told them with what reluctance he had accepted the Archbishoprick; that he had made an express reserve of his obedience to Pope Urban; and that he was now brought under difficulties upon that score. He therefore desired their advice how to act in such a manner, as neither to fail in his allegiance to the King, nor in his duty to the holy See. The Bishops were of opinion, he ought to resign himself wholly to the King's pleasure. They told him, there was a general complaint against him, for intrenching upon the King's prerogative; and that it would be precedence in him to wave his regard for Urban; that Bishop (for they would not call him Pope) being in no condition to do him either good or harm. To this Anselm returned, that he was engaged to be no farther the King's subject than the laws of Christianity would give him leave; that as he was willing to render unto Cæsar the things that were Cæsar's, so he must likewise take in the other part of the precept, and give unto God that which was God's. Hereupon William Bishop of Durham, a court prelate, who had inflamed the difference, and managed the argument for the King, insisted, that the nomination of the Pope to the subject was the principal jewel of the crown, and that by this privilege the Kings of England were distinguished from the rest of the Princes of Christendom (7).

[G] The Bishops renounced Anselm for their Archbishop. The King would have had them gone farther, brought him to his trial, and deposed him in the council. But the Bishops refused to carry their resentment against him so far. As for Anselm, when he heard that his suffragans had disclaimed him, he complained greatly of their ill treatment of him, and demanded the regard due to a Metropolitan. In a letter, which he wrote to the Irish Bishops about that time, he expresses the great uneasiness this usage gave him, and desires they would put up their prayers on his behalf, 'That God would inspire him with fortitude and resolution, to preserve the government of the Church, and appear boldly against disorder and licentiousness.' And in the close of the letter, If these happen, says he, any difficulty in your country about the consecration of Bishops, or any other matter relating to ecclesiastical discipline, I desire you would inform me of the case, and take the assistance of the best advice I can give you (8). It is remarkable, that when the King applied to the temporal nobility, to engage them to follow the example of the Bishops, and disclaim Anselm, they unanimously refused to do so; and this generous declaration of the Barons in favour of the Archbishop, made the servile compliance of the Bishops appear the more scandalous and unjustifiable (9).

[H] A truce, or suspension of the affair, from March to Whitsuntide, was agreed upon] During this interval, Walter, Bishop of Alba, was sent by Urban into England, attended by two clergymen, who officiated in the King's chapel. These ecclesiastics had been privately dispatched to Rome, to enquire into the late election, and examine which of the two pretenders, Guibert or Urban, was canonically chosen. These agents, finding the right lay in Urban, applied to him, and endeavoured to persuade him to send the King the Archbishop of Canterbury's pall. This was the King's point; who thought, by getting the pall into his possession, he should be able to manage the Archbishop (10). The Pope complied so far, as to send the Bishop of Alba to the King with the pall, but with secret orders concerning the disposal of it. This prelate, arriving at the English court, discoursed very agreeably to the King, making him believe the Pope was entirely in his interest. Whereupon William ordered Urban to be acknowledged as Pope in all his dominions. After he had thus far gratified the See of Rome, he began to treat with the Legate about the deprivation of Anselm; but was greatly disappointed, when that prelate assured him the design was impracticable. However it was now too late to go back; and therefore, to set the best face upon the matter, he resolved, since he could not have his revenge upon Anselm, to drop the dispute, and pretend himself reconciled (11).

of his great men, received him into favour upon his own terms; and, because Anselm persisted in refusing to receive the pall from the King's hands, it was at last agreed, that the Pope's Nuntio, who had brought the pall into England (f), should carry it down to Canterbury, and lay it upon the altar of the cathedral; from whence Anselm was to receive it, as if it had been put into his hands by St Peter himself. Things being thus adjusted, the Archbishop went to Canterbury, and received the pall with great solemnity, the June following (g). And now it was generally hoped, that all occasion of difference between the King and the Archbishop was removed: but it appeared soon after, that the reconciliation on the King's part was not sincere. For William, having marched his forces into Wales, and brought that country to submission, took that opportunity to quarrel with Anselm, pretending he was not satisfied with the quota the Archbishop had furnished for that expedition (h) [I]. Finding therefore his authority too weak to oppose the corruptions of the times, he resolved to go in person to Rome, and consult the Pope. But the King, to whom he applied for leave to go out of the kingdom, seemed surprized at the request, and gave him a flat denial (i) [K]. Notwithstanding which, the Archbishop resolved upon the voyage [L], and accordingly embarked at Dover. But when the King heard that he had crossed the channel, he seized upon the archbishopric, and made every thing void which Anselm had done (k). The Archbishop got safe to Rome, and was honourably received by the Pope. After a short stay in that city, he accompanied the Pope to a country seat near Capua, whither his Holiness retired on account of the unhealthfulness of the town. And here Anselm wrote a book, in which he gave an account of the reason of our Saviour's Incarnation. The Pope wrote to the King of England in a strain of authority, enjoining him to re-estate Anselm in all the profits and privileges of his See. Anselm likewise wrote into England upon the same subject (l). As for the King, he endeavoured to get Anselm discountenanced abroad, and wrote to Roger Duke of Apulia, and others, to that purpose (m). But he had not credit enough, it seems, to gain his point: for Anselm was treated with all imaginable respect wherever he came [M]. This famous Archbishop was very serviceable to the Pope in the council of Bari, which was held to oppose the errors of the Greek Church, with respect to the procession of the Holy Ghost (n). In this Synod, Anselm answered the objections of the Greeks, and managed the argument with so much judgment, learning, and penetration, that he silenced his adversaries, and gave general satisfaction to the Western Church. This argument was afterwards digested by him into a Tract [N], and is extant among his other works (o). In the same council Anselm

[I] The King quarrelled with Anselm, pretending he was not satisfied with the quota he had furnished for the Welsh expedition.] The King complained, that the Archbishop had failed in his proportion, and that his men were neither well accoutred, nor fit for the service. He even threatened to have him tried for a misdemeanour, and ordered him to be ready to make his appearance upon the first summons. Anselm thought silence the best expedient upon this occasion, and therefore returned no answer to the King's message (12).

[K] The King, to whom he applied for leave to go out of the kingdom — gave him a flat denial.] He added, 'That he did by no means understand the reason of such a voyage; that he could not think Anselm so far guilty of any crime, as to stand in need of the Pope's absolution: and, as for consulting him, he had that good opinion of the Archbishop's judgment, that he thought him every jot as well qualified to give the Pope advice, as to receive any from him.' Anselm renewed his petition in vain; and despairing to obtain the King's leave, he sent for the Bishops of Winchester, Lincoln, Salisbury, and Bath, who were then at court, and told them, 'That it belonged more particularly to their office, to advise here to the interest of religion: If therefore they would stand by him, upon this occasion, and be firm to the service of the Church, he would lay his intentions before them, and be governed by their advice.' They desired a little time for deliberation; and having consulted together, they returned to him with the following answer: 'My Lord, we know you to be a very religious and holy man, and that your conversation is wholly in Heaven; but as for ourselves, we must confess, our relations and secular interest are a clog upon us, inasmuch that we cannot rise up to those seraphic flights, nor trample upon the world with the noble contempt that you do. If you please to stoop to our infirmities, and content yourself with our methods and management, we will solicit your cause with the same heartiness we do our own, and assist you to the utmost of our power. But if you are all spirituality, and have nothing but the Church in view, all we can do is to preserve our former regards to you, and that with a reserve of acting nothing, which may

'intrench upon our allegiance to the King.' After this conference with the Bishops, the King sent another message to him, expostulating with him upon breach of duty in leaving the kingdom without the royal permission. Whereupon Anselm went to court, and, according to his customary privilege, seating himself at the King's right-hand, would have entered upon his justification: But the King persisted in his denial of leave, and the Archbishop left the court, resolved upon his voyage (13).

[L] The Archbishop resolved upon the voyage.] At his parting from the court, he told the King, 'He was now just ready to set forward; that if he could have gained his permission, he conceived it might have been more serviceable to his Majesty, and more satisfactory to all good people: But since it proved otherwise, he must acquiesce in the misfortune, and should always have the same regard for the welfare of the King's soul: That now, not knowing when he should wait upon his Highness again, he was ready to recommend him to God Almighty, and to dismiss him with the same solemnity of good wishes that were owing from a spiritual father to a son, he had so great an affection for; and which a King of England ought to receive from an Archbishop of Canterbury.' And therefore, unless your Highness rejects it, says he, I am ready to give you my blessing. The King replying, he did not refuse it, Anselm rose up, and making the sign of the cross over the King's head, who bowed at that ceremony, took his leave; the King and all the court admiring the resolution and unconcernedness of his behaviour (14).

[M] Anselm was treated with all imaginable respect wherever he came.] Finding his preaching had a good effect on his audiences in Italy, he desired leave of the Pope to resign his Archbishopric, believing he might be more serviceable to the world in a more private station. The Pope would by no means consent to such a step, but charged him, upon his obedience, never to drop his title, or quit his station (15).

[N] This argument was digested by him into a Tract.] Baronius's remark upon this discourse of Anselm's deserves to be remembered. He takes notice,

- generously interposed, and prevented the Pope from pronouncing sentence of excommunication against the King of England, for his frequent outrages on religion (p). After the Synod of Bari was ended, the Pope and Anselm returned to Rome, where an Ambassador from the King of England was arrived, in order to disprove Anselm's allegations and complaints against his master [O]. And, the better to effect his purpose, he tried the interest of his purse; and partly by presents, and partly by promises, he bribed the court of Rome to desert Anselm (q) [P]. The Archbishop, perceiving how matters went, would have returned to Lyons, but the Pope would not part with him; and, to sweeten him after his disappointment, lodged him in a noble palace, where his Holiness made him frequent visits. About that time, the Pope having summoned a Council to sit at Rome [Q], Anselm had a very honourable seat assigned him and his successors; this being the first time of an Archbishop of Canterbury's appearing at a Roman Synod (r). When the Council broke up, Anselm immediately left Rome, and returned to Lyons, where he was entertained for some time by Hugo the Archbishop. He staid there till he heard the news of King William's and Pope Urban's death, which happened not long after (s). Henry I, the new King of England, having restored the Sees of Canterbury, Winchester, and Salisbury, which had been seized by his predecessor; Anselm was solicited to return into England; and being come as far Clugny, an Agent from the King met him with a letter inviting him to return to his archbishopric [R]. In this letter the King excused himself for not staying till Anselm's return, and being crowned by another Prelate. The Archbishop, being arrived in England, was received with extraordinary respect by the King and the people. And thus far matters went smoothly enough. But when it was required of Anselm, that he should be re-invested by the King, and do the customary homage of his predecessors, he refused to comply, alledging the canons of the late Synod at Rome about investitures (t) [S]. The King was greatly disgusted at Anselm's non-compliance: however, not being well settled on the throne, he was unwilling to come to a rupture. It was agreed therefore that the dispute should rest till the Easter following; and in the mean time both parties were to send their agents to Rome, to try if they could persuade the Pope to dispense with the canons of the late Synod in relation to investitures. About this time Anselm summoned a Synod to meet at Lambeth [T], on occasion of the King's that the Archbishop, in this tract, does not make use of the authorities either of the Greek or Latin fathers: not of the Latins, because the Greeks accepted against their testimony, as being friends and parties; nor of the Greeks, because, when they were cited against them, they used to object against the credit and authenticity of the copy. Anselm therefore, trusting to the goodness of the cause, took none of these auxiliaries into the service, but had recourse solely to the Scriptures, and confuted his adversaries from thence (16).

[O] The English ambassador endeavoured to disprove Anselm's allegations, and complaints against his master.] This minister told the Pope, that his master was surprized at his Holiness's order for re-instating Anselm in his Archbishopric, since he had positively acquainted that Prelate what he must expect, in case he quitted the realm without his Majesty's leave. The Pope asked the Ambassador, if he had any thing farther in his instructions against Anselm? He answered, nothing. 'Could you then (said the Pope) think it worth your while to take so long and tedious a journey, only to acquaint me, that your Primate has been deprived of his See for appealing to St Peter's chair? If you have any regard for you master, return and tell him, that unless he will venture the highest censure of the Church, his method will be forthwith to restore Anselm to all his rights and properties.' The Ambassador, being shocked with this answer, told the Pope, he had something farther to communicate; and desired a private audience, in which he found means to soften his Holiness, and prevail upon him to relax a little in his demands (17).

[P] The English Ambassador bribed the Court of Rome to desert Anselm.] This story is modestly told by Eadmer (18) in a few words. But William of Malmbury enlarges with more freedom upon the prevarication of the Court of Rome. He tells us (19), the Pope was under some difficulty and irresolution about the matter; that for some time his Holiness hung in suspense between conscience and interest, but was at last overbalanced by the consideration of a good present. And here Malmbury declaims with a great deal of honesty and satire against the prevalence of money; and frankly acknowledges, that it was scandalous in a person of his Holiness's station and character to prostitute his honour and conscience, and depart from justice for the sake of a little pelf.

[Q] The Pope summoned a council to meet at Rome.]

When the canons of this council were agreed on, and drawn up, the Pope ordered Reingerius, Bishop of Lucca, to publish them to the assembly. This Prelate, after he had gone through part of his commission, seemed on a sudden to be greatly disturbed; and breaking off the reading of the canons, he cried out: 'What will become of us? We are loading the people with new precepts and articles of duty; but do not relieve those, who apply to us for protection. The whole world is surprized at this conduct, and complains, that the head of the Church does not sympathize with the members.' Then he expressly mentioned Anselm's case, and remonstrated against the delays in doing him justice. Here the Pope interposed, and desired him to forbear, with a promise that matters should be rectified. Reingerius, being a man of warmth and zeal, replied, 'twas fit it should be so; for God would not pass over the neglect: and when he had said this, he went on with the publication of the canons (20).

[R] The King sent him a letter, inviting him to return to his Archbishopric.] The learned reader will find King Henry's letter to Anselm, in the collection of that Prelate's letters (21), and in Mr Collier's collection of Records, N. 14. at the end of his Ecclesiastical History, Vol. I.

[S] Anselm alledged the canons of the Synod of Rome about investitures.] This Synod excommunicated all lay persons, who should give investitures for abbies or cathedrals; and all ecclesiastics, who should receive investitures from lay hands, or came under the tenure of homage for any ecclesiastical promotion, were put under the same censure (22).

[T] Anselm called a Synod at Lambeth.] The King being generally censured for intending to marry the Princess Maud, who was supposed to have embraced a religious life, that Lady applied herself upon this occasion to Archbishop Anselm, and desired his advice. The Archbishop objected the common report to her, and declared, that no motive whatsoever should prevail with him to disengage her from her vow to Almighty God. The Princess denied there had been any such engagement, and alledged that, though she had indeed worn a veil, it was against her inclination, being forced thereto by her aunt Christian, who had put a piece of black cloth about her head, to prevent her being violated by the Normans. She added, that her father, seeing her veiled, broke out into a passion, and tore the veil in pieces, protesting that he designed her

King's intended marriage with Maud or Matilda, eldest daughter of Malcolm King of Scotland. In this Synod it was determined, that the King might lawfully marry that Princess, notwithstanding she was generally reported to be a Nun, having worn the veil, and had her education in a religious house (u). Soon after this marriage, Anselm was of signal service to King Henry against his brother the Duke of Normandy [U], who had invaded England, and landed with a formidable army at Portsmouth. For the Archbishop not only furnished the King with a large body of men, but was very active likewise in preventing a revolt of the great men from him (w). The agents, sent by the King and the Archbishop to Rome, being returned, brought with them a letter from Pope Paschal to the King (x), in which his Holiness absolutely refused to dispense with the Canons concerning investitures. The King, on his part, resolved not to give up what for some reigns had passed for part of the royal prerogative. And thus the difference was kept on foot between the King and Anselm. In this dispute the majority of the Bishops and temporal nobility were on the Court side; and some of them were very earnest with the King, to break entirely with the See of Rome (y). However it was not thought adviseable to proceed to an open rupture without trying a farther expedient; and therefore fresh agents were dispatched by the King to Rome, with instructions to offer the Pope this alternative; either to depart from his former declaration, and relax in the point of investitures, or to be content with the banishment of Anselm, and to lose the obedience of the English, and the yearly profits accruing from that kingdom. At the same time Anselm dispatched two Monks, to inform the Pope of the menaces of the English Court. But the King's Embassadors could not prevail with the Pope to recede from his declaration; his Holiness protesting he would sooner lose his life than cancel the decrees of the Holy Fathers (z) [W]: which resolution he signified by letters to the King and Anselm. Soon after, the King, having convened the great men of the kingdom at London, sent Anselm word, that he must either comply with the usages of his father's reign, or quit England. But, the agents disagreeing in their report of the Pope's answer (aa), Anselm thought proper not to return a positive answer till farther information. And thus the controversy slept for the present (bb). The next year a national Synod was held under Anselm at St Peter's Westminster; at which the King and the principal nobility were present (cc). The year following the King was pleased to relent, and desire Anselm to take a journey to Rome, to try if he could persuade the Pope to relax. Anselm, at the request of the Bishops and the Barons, undertook the voyage (dd). At the same time the King dispatched one William Warelwast to Rome. This agent, arriving there before Anselm, solicited for the King, his master: but to no purpose; for the Pope persisted in refusing to grant the King the right of investiture. But at the same time his Holiness wrote a very ceremonious letter to the King of England, entreating him to waive the contest, and promising all imaginable compliance in other matters (ee). Anselm, having taken leave of the Court of Rome, returned to Lyons, where he received a sharp and reprimanding letter from a Monk, acquainting him with the lamentable condition of the province of Canterbury [X]. During the Archbishop's stay at Lyons, the King sent her for marriage, and not for a nunnery. Anselm thought this case too weighty to rest upon his single judgment, and therefore brought it before the Synod of Lambeth; in which, the truth of the Princess's allegations being sufficiently proved, the assembly was of opinion, that the Princess Maud was under no necessity of being a nun, but might dispose of her person as she thought fit. Accordingly that Lady was married to the King. And, to prevent calumny and misreport, when the wedding was solemnized, and a great concourse of the nobility and people were assembled about the church, Anselm, seating himself higher than the rest, gave them an account of what had been decreed in the Synod, and demanded if they had any thing to object to it? Whereupon they unanimously cried out, that the matter was rightly settled (23).

[U] Anselm was very serviceable to King Henry, against his brother the Duke of Normandy. That Duke, being disappointed in his expectations from the English, was contented to sign an agreement; by which he renounced his pretensions to the crown, and accepted a yearly pension of three thousand marks in lieu of it. And this he did the more readily, because he was well assured that Anselm would excommunicate him for an invader, in case he refused to comply (24).

[W] The Pope declared, he would sooner lose his life, than cancel the decrees of the holy fathers. It is remarkable, that the agents disagreed in their report of the Pope's answer. The Bishops, sent by the King, declared, that his Holiness, at a private audience, had given them assurance, that, provided the King managed in other points to the satisfaction of the Court of Rome, he would indulge his Highness in the privilege of investitures, and not excommunicate him for giving Bishops and Abbots the pastoral staff: that the reason why this favour was not expressed in the Bull, was, that it might not come to the notice of other Princes, who would be apt to insist upon the same privilege. On the other hand, Anselm's agents protested, that the Pope had given no answer by word of mouth in contradiction to his own letters. To this the King's Ambassadors replied, that the matter was secretly concerted, and without the privacy of Anselm's agents. This disagreement between the agents occasioned a division among the great men. Some maintained, that the testimony of the Monks ought to be received, and that the Pope's hand and seal were not to be questioned. Others were of opinion, that the evidence of three Bishops ought to be taken before that of a scroll of parchment blacked over with ink, with a bit of lead at the end of it (25).

[X] A letter from a Monk, describing the lamentable condition of the province of Canterbury. This Monk, whose name Eadmer does not mention, tells the Archbishop, 'That all places were over-run with violence and injustice, that the churches were harassed and oppressed, the poor plundered, and the consecrated virgins violated: that if the Archbishop had maintained the ancient discipline, this disorder had not happened: that his quitting the kingdom gave great advantages to the enemies of religion: that he, who has undertaken the management of the helm, ought by no means to quit the vessel at the approach of a storm, but keep faster to his post than ever: that 'tis possible, at the great day he may be ashamed of his excessive caution, when he shall see so many brave governors of the Church, who stood by their flocks in time of danger. How glorious then will be the memory of the holy Bishop sent another embassy to Rome, to try if he could prevail with the Pope to bring Anselm to a submission. But the Pope, instead of being gained, excommunicated some of the English court, who had dissuaded the King from parting with the investitures. However his Holiness declined pronouncing any censure against the King (ff). Anselm, perceiving the Court of Rome dilatory in its proceedings, removed from Lyons, and made a visit to the Countess Adela, the Conqueror's daughter, at her castle in Blois. This lady enquiring into the business of Anselm's journey, he told her that, after a great deal of patience and expectation, he must now be forced to excommunicate the King of England. The Countess was extremely concerned for her brother, and wrote to the Pope to procure an accommodation. The King, who was come into Normandy, hearing that Anselm designed to excommunicate him, desired his sister to bring him with her into Normandy, with a promise of condescension in several articles. To this Anselm agreed, and waited upon the King at a castle called L'Aigle, where the King restored to him the revenues of the archbishopric, but would not permit him to come into England, unless he would comply in the affair of the investitures: which Anselm refusing to do continued in France, till the matter was once more laid before the Pope (gg). And now the English Bishops, who had taken part with the Court against Anselm, began to change their minds, as appears by their letter directed to him in Normandy [Z]. In this letter, after having set forth the deplorable state of the Church, they press him to come over with all speed, promising to stand by him, and pay him the regard due to his character: it is subscribed by Gerrard Archbishop of York, Robert Bishop of Chester, Herbert Bishop of Norwich, Ralph Bishop of Chichester, Samson Bishop of Worcester, and William Elect of Winchester (bb). Anselm expressed his satisfaction at this conduct of the Bishops, but acquainted them that it was not in his power to return, till he was farther informed of the proceedings of the Court of Rome. In the mean time, being informed, that the King had fined some of the clergy for a late breach of the canons [Z], he wrote to his Highness to complain of that stretch of his prerogative [AA]. At length the Embassadors returned from Rome, and brought with them a decision more agreeable than the former: for now the Pope thought fit to make some advances towards gratifying the King [BB]; and though he would not give up the point of investitures, yet he dispensed so far as to give the Bishops and Abbots leave to do homage for their temporalities (ii) [CC]. The King, who

* St Ambrose, who maintained the authority of his character to the Emperor Theodosius's face, and refused him entrance into the church, till he had qualified himself by repentance? What change in affairs might not such holy zeal, such heroic fortitude, produce? He proceeds to tell the Archbishop, That the blackest prospect of torture and death could not have excused his withdrawing himself? What therefore could be said, when this was not his case? His liberty had not been taken from him, nor his person insulted: he seemed to have been frightened out of the kingdom by the menaces of a single courtier; and by thus going had left open the gates to the enemy, and let in the wolves upon the sheep. He takes the freedom to acquaint the Archbishop, That his conduct had proved a very unfortunate precedent; that the courage of his suffragans was sunk by their Primate's cowardice. Indeed what is to be expected, when a General quits the field? He therefore exhorts Anselm to return immediately to his province, where he will find a great many persons ready to espouse the interest of religion, and stand by him (26).

[Y] The letter of the English Bishops, directed to Anselm in Normandy.] This letter is extant in Eadmer (27), and in Mr Collier's collection of Records, No. 15, at the end of his Ecclesiastical History, Vol. I.

[Z] The King had fined the Clergy for a late breach of the canons.] Eadmer, in enumerating several grievances relating more particularly to the Church, tells us (28), that the Priests and secular canons, who had been enjoined celibacy by the late synod of London, had taken the opportunity of Anselm's absence to break through the injunction, and many of them were married. The King, who took every method of collecting money, made his advantage of this behaviour of the clergy, and forced them to fine for the liberty they had taken.

[AA] The Archbishop wrote to the King, to complain of the stretch of his prerogative.] In his letter, he remonstrates, that the Prince's interposing so far in ecclesiastical matters was unprecedented in the Church of God: that the correction of Priests for violation of the canons belonged only to their respective Ordinaries. He therefore intreats the King not to break in upon the government of the Church, telling him, that the money, raised by so indefensible an expedient, would prove unserviceable to his purpose, and endanger his soul. Lastly, he desires his Highness to remember, that he had taken him into his protection, and restored him to the profits and privileges of his Archbishopric; and that the punishing the misdemeanors of the clergy was a peculiar branch of his jurisdiction; the spiritual administration and authority being more essential to his character, than any temporal privilege and property whatever (29).

(29) Id. ib. p. 85.

[BB] The Pope thought fit to make some advances towards gratifying the King.] In a letter, which Pope Paschal wrote upon this occasion to Anselm, he tells him, That he imputes the King's tractableness and good disposition to the effect of his (the Archbishop's) prayers. He desires him Not to be surprized at his condescensions to the English court; that it was only done out of a pious motive to recover them from their error, and fix them more firm to their duty: that he who would lift another up must necessarily stoop his own body: that this bending posture, though it may seem to tend towards a fall, does by no means throw a man off his legs. His Holiness therefore Absolves those, who lay under excommunication about the matter in dispute, and gives Anselm leave to communicate with such as had received investitures from the crown (30).

(30) Id. ib. p. 77.

[CC] The Pope would not give up the point of investitures, but dispensed so far as to give the Bishops and Abbots leave to do homage for their temporalities.] As the dispute concerning the right of investiture is the most material circumstance in the life of Archbishop Anselm, I shall here give the reader the state of the question, as it is drawn up by a judicious and accurate historian. 'I begin (says our author (31)) with laying it down as a fact, which appears to me incontrovertible, that from the reign of Charlemagne, sovereign Princes took upon them to give the investiture of the greater benefices by the ring and pastoral staff. Gregory VII was the first who endeavoured to take from them this right, towards the end of the XIth century. The Popes, his successors, continued the prosecution of this design with the same zeal. It must be allowed, that Princes themselves gave but too frequent occasions to the Popes to cry out against the abuses of this prerogative. Under pretence that the Bishops and Abbots could who was highly pleased with this condescension in the Pope, sent immediately to invite Anselm into England: but the messenger finding him sick, the King himself went over into Normandy, and made him a visit at the abbey of Becc; where all differences between them were perfectly adjusted. And now Anselm, being recovered from his sickness, embarked for England, and, landing at Dover, was received with extraordinary marks of welcome. To omit other circumstances of respect, the Queen herself travelled before him upon the road, to provide for his better entertainment (kk). From this time very little remarkable happened in the life of this famous Archbishop, excepting only his contest with Thomas elected Archbishop of York, who endeavoured to disengage himself from a dependency upon the see of Canterbury (ll) [DD]. Before the termination of this dispute, Anselm died at Canterbury, in the seventy-sixth year of his age, and the seventeenth of his prelacy, on the twenty-first of April, A. D. 1109. This great Prelate was author of several pieces. The largest edition of his works is that published by Father Gerberon (mm). It is divided into three parts. The first of these, containing Dogmatical Tracts, is entitled Monologia [EE]. The second part contains practical and devotional Tracts. The third part takes in Anselm's Letters in four books.

could not take possession of their benefices before they had received the investiture of them, they publicly sold the bishoprics and abbays to the highest bidder. I say, they sold them: for, though the elections might seem to be agreeable to the canons, the sovereigns nevertheless were masters of them, since they had it in their power to refuse investiture to those who were not agreeable to them. By this means they were sufficiently enabled to procure the election of those whom they recommended, there being no ecclesiastic who desired to be a Bishop or an Abbot, without enjoying the temporalities annexed to the benefice. In order therefore to be chosen, it was necessary to have the consent of the Prince; after which the Bishop or Abbot, even before consecration, received the investiture in the manner already mentioned. Besides that simony had too often a place in elections made after this manner, there was another reason which seemed to justify the Popes in their endeavours to abolish the investitures. This was, that Princes, by investing ecclesiastics in a manner different from that which was practised with respect to the laity, and even before their consecration, seemed to assume the privilege of conferring on them the character. This the Popes called a manifest usurpation upon the rights of the Church. Indeed one cannot but discover something like it in this practice, on account of the two characters which were confounded in the Bishop elect, namely that of a minister of the Church, and that of a temporal Lord of lands annexed to the benefice. If the Popes and the Princes had acted fairly, they would carefully have distinguished these two characters: on the contrary, they found their respective advantages in confounding them. Hence Princes got the elections into their power, and hence also the Popes took occasion to dispute with Sovereigns the right they were in possession of. And therefore all the contests between Princes and the Popes upon this subject arose, properly speaking, from this confusion. The former said, they could not suffer any person to possess lands dependent on their crown, without having received the investiture thereof from their hands. The Popes on their side maintained, that it was not reasonable that Princes should interpose in elections, or confer a character, which it belonged to the Church alone to give. Both parties were equally distant from the true state of the question. It was very possible for a man to be a Bishop or an Abbot, without holding lands of the crown; in which case Princes could pretend to nothing. On the other side, Princes could receive no prejudice by the spiritual character's being conferred without their consent, since they had it in their power to take their own precautions, before they put the Prelates in possession of the temporalities. But it was impossible to reduce them to this point, in the disposition they were in of making no concessions on either side. Thus it plainly appears, that the temperament, which Paschal II and Henry I followed, was a very reasonable one, and no ways prejudicial to the rights of the Church or the King.

[DD] He had a contest with Thomas, elected Archbishop of York, who endeavoured to disengage himself from a dependency on the See of Canterbury.] Thomas, elect of York, not moving for his consecration at Canterbury so soon as was expected, Anselm put him in mind of this delay in a letter, in which he acquainted him, that, according to the canons, a Bishop's see ought not to be vacant above three months. He enjoins him therefore to come to Canterbury, within a time prefixed for that purpose; and in case he shall fail to make his appearance, Anselm declares, that the jurisdiction of the province of York belongs to himself, and that he shall manage accordingly (32). Thomas making dilatory excuses, and sending an unsatisfactory answer, Anselm wrote to Pope Paschal to stop his Fall, till his Holiness should be informed by letter, that Thomas had received his consecration, and made the customary profession of canonical obedience to the Archbishop of Canterbury (33). The Pope wrote him an answer, and promised to satisfy his request (34). It seems, Thomas and the Chapter of York were in concert to throw off the usual acknowledgment to the See of Canterbury, and set up for an independent province. They conceived the present juncture, if rightly managed, very favourable to their design. For now Anselm was grown old, and not likely to live much longer; and therefore if Thomas could invent any colourable delays, and put off his consecration till after Anselm's death, the point might probably be carried: for it was believed the See of Canterbury would not immediately be filled; and if Thomas was consecrated during the vacancy, the profession of canonical obedience might be slipped, there being no Archbishop of Canterbury to demand it of him. Anselm saw through this design; and therefore, finding himself near his end, he endeavoured to countermince the Elect of York, and secure the rights of his own See to posterity. To this purpose he wrote another letter to Thomas, in which he commands him, in the name of God, not to presume to execute any part of his episcopal office, till he shall have returned to his duty, and made the customary submissions to the See of Canterbury. At the same time he wrote to all the Bishops, enjoining them, under pain of excommunication, not to consecrate him themselves, nor communicate with him in case he should be consecrated by any foreign prelate (35). Anselm died before the termination of this affair. After his death, the Bishops unanimously resolving to obey his last directions, and the King concurring in opinion with them, Thomas thought fit to comply; and having made his submission to the See of Canterbury, was consecrated Archbishop of York. This made the clergy say among themselves, that Anselm was now become a kind of Guardian Angel to the Church (36).

[EE] The first, containing dogmatical tracts, is intituled Monologia. It is so called, because it is thrown into the form of soliloquy and meditation, and represents a person, who reasons with himself in search of divine truths, and explains them in order as they are discovered. It begins with a treatise concerning the existence of God, of his attributes, and of the holy Trinity. In this division the author treats likewise of the fall of the Devil, of Original Sin, and of the reasons why God created man. He examines likewise the liberty of the will, and shews the consistency of this freedom with the divine Prescience (37).

I shall give the reader a more particular list of this author's works in the remark [FF], and shall subjoin the learned Mr Du Pin's judgment concerning them [GG]. As to the character of Archbishop Anselm, it may be partly collected from the circumstances of his life above recited. He has been much praised for the resolution he shewed in the disputes he had with William Rufus and Henry I. Where he believed the rights of the Church, and the interest of religion, concerned, no greatness, no menaces of Princes, nor prospect of danger, could discourage him in the pursuit of his point [HH]. Malmfbury tells us (nn), he was a person of great strictness and self-denial: his temper and sedateness were such, that, after he turned Monk, he never was heard to utter the least reproachful word. This Archbishop was the first who restrained the English clergy from marrying [II]. He was canonized in the reign of Henry VII, at the instance of Cardinal Morton, then Archbishop of Canterbury (oo). Johannes Sariburiensis, who wrote the Life of Archbishop Anselm, has recorded several miracles said to be wrought by him. Particularly he tells us, that a Flemish nobleman was cured of a Leprosy by drinking the water, in which Anselm had washed his hands in celebrating the Mass: that he extinguished fires, calmed tempests, and healed diseases, only by making the sign of the cross: that he rescued a hare, which had taken refuge under his horse's feet, by commanding the dogs not to pursue her any more: that two soldiers were cured of an ague, by tasting the crumbs of some bread he had been eating: that [GG] M. Du Pin's judgment concerning Anselm's works. 'We do not find (says that learned critic) any ecclesiastical writers before St Anselm, who wrote after so scholastic a manner, started so many metaphysical questions, or argued with the appearance of so much logic and acuteness as he has done. He is also the first, who composed long prayers in the form of meditations. His letters are written in a less elaborate style, neither are they so correct as his other works. His exhortations are plain Homilies, interspersed with a great many mystical notions, in which there is neither much rhetoric nor morality. He does not seem to have been a great master in Positive Divinity: however he had read St Augustin's works, and borrowed many principles from them, which he makes use of in his reasonings upon subjects of Divinity (41).

[HH] No prospect of danger could discourage him from pursuing his point. This is evident from the whole history of his life, particularly his contest with King William Rufus, about the acknowledging Pope Urban, and with King Henry I, about the right of Investitures. As to the former of these disputes, tho' Fox (42) blames him for his opposition to the King, yet Anselm seems to have had the right side of the question. For if we consider the constitution of the English Church in that age, we shall find, that the Pope had at least a patriarchal power in England; and consequently the English Bishops were obliged to pay him a suitable acknowledgment. This patriarchal power resulting from the privilege of his See, the King had no right to deprive him of it, or to discharge Anselm from acknowledging him under that character of superiority. But tho' the Archbishop was right in the principles upon which he acted in this affair, it is possible he might be too obstinate in other cases of less consequence; as, in his refusing to gratify King William Rufus with the payment of a thousand pounds. Upon the whole, tho' the prejudices of the age he lived in might mislead him in some points, yet he seems to have been a person of great probity and conscience.

[II] Archbishop Anselm was the first, who restrained the English clergy from marrying. This was done in the national Synod held at Westminster, that, by praying to God, he produced a spring of excellent water at the very top of a hill, for the relief of certain villagers; and that a ship, in which he sailed, having a large hole in one of her planks, nevertheless took in no water so long as the holy man was on board. The same author tells us, that this holy Archbishop continued to work miracles after his death: particularly that a Monk of the church of Canterbury was restored to health by paying his devotions at the tomb of St Anselm: that one born blind, deaf, and dumb, received sight, hearing, and speech, by the same means: that a soldier was cured of a dropfy by winding the Saint's girdle about his body; and that the same girdle was successfully applied to the assistance of women in childbirth (pp).

ANTHONY or ANTONY, (Dr FRANCIS) a very learned Physician and Chemist of the last century. His father was an eminent Goldsmith in the city of London, and had an employment of considerable value in the Jewel-Office under the reign of Queen Elizabeth (a). This son of his was born April 16, 1550; and having been carefully instructed in the first rudiments of learning while at home, was about the year 1569, sent to the university of Cambridge, where he studied with great diligence and success, and some time in the year 1574 took the degree of Master of Arts (b). It appears from his own writings, that he applied himself for many years that he studied in that university, to the theory and practice of Chemistry, with sedulous industry, and made no small progress (c). It is not at all clear from any memoirs that have reached our hands, when he left Cambridge, and came up to London; but it seems highly probable, that it was not before he attained the age of forty. He began soon after his arrival to publish to the world the effects of his chemical studies, and in the year 1598, sent abroad his first treatise, concerning the excellency of a medicine drawn from gold (d); but not having taken the necessary precautions of addressing himself to the College of Physicians, for their licence, he fell under their displeasure, and being some time in the year 1600, summoned before the President and Censors, he confessed that he had practised Physick in London for somewhat more than six months, and had cured twenty persons, or more, of several diseases, to whom he had given purging and vomiting physick, and to others, a diaphoretick medicine, prepared from gold and mercury, as their case required; but withal acknowledged that he had no licence, and being examined in several parts of physick, and found inexpert, he was interdicted practice. About a month after he was committed to the Counter-prison, and fined in the sum of five pounds propter illicitam Praxin, that is for prescribing physick against the statutes and privilege of the College, but upon his application to the Lord Chief Justice, he was set at liberty, which gave so great umbrage to the College, that the President and one of the Censors waited on the Chief Justice, to request his favour in defending and preserving the college privileges; upon which Mr Anthony submitted himself, promised to pay his fine, and was forbid practice (e). But not long after he was accused again for practising physick, and upon his own confession was fined five pounds; which fine, on his refusing to pay it, was increased to twenty pounds, and he committed to prison till he paid it, neither were the College satisfied with this, but commenced a suit at law against him in the name of the Queen, as well as of the College, in which they prevailed, and obtained judgment against him; but after some time, were prevailed upon by the intreaties of his wife, to remit their share of the penalty, as appears by their warrant to the keeper of the Prison for his discharge, dated under the college seal, the sixth of August, 1602 (f). After his release, he seems to have met with considerable patrons, who were able to protect him from the authority of the College; and though Dr Goodall tells us, that this learned society thought him weak and ignorant in physick, yet it seems there were other learned bodies of another opinion; since after all these censures, and being tossed about from prison to prison, he became Doctor of Physick in our own universities (g). This did not hinder new complaints being brought against him, by Dr Taylor, and another Physician, who grounded their proceedings chiefly on his giving a certain Nostrum, which he called Aurum potabile, or potable gold, and which he represented to the world, as an universal medicine. There were at this time also several things written against him, and his manner of practice, insinuating that he was very inaccurate in his method of philosophizing, that the virtues of metals as to physical uses were very uncertain, and that the boasted effects of his medicine were destitute of proof. Dr Anthony, upon this, published a very learned and modest defence of himself and his Aurum potabile in Latin, written with great decency, much skill in chemistry, and with an apparent knowledge in the theory and history of physick. This book which he published, in 1610 [A], was printed at the university press of Cambridge, and had a very

[A] Which he published in 1610.] The title of this book at large runs thus, *Medicina Chymica, et veri potabilis Auri assertio, ex Lucubrationibus Fr. Antonii Londinensis, in Medicina Doctoris. in the true potable Gold made by Francis Anthony of London, Doctor in Physick. After the Dedication, there follows a very short Preface, wherein the author tells his readers, That after inexpressible labour, watching, and expence, he had, through the blessing of God, attained all he fought for in his enquiries. But now a very florid dedication to King James prefixed. He likewise annexed such certificates of cures, under the hands of several persons of distinction, and some too of the Faculty, that it very plainly appeared, he did not by any means deserve to be treated as an ignorant emperick, or a mere pretender to Chymistry. His book however was quickly answered, and the controversy about aurum potable grew so warm (b), that he was obliged to published another apology in the English language, which however was also translated into Latin, and is still in great esteem abroad (i), yet here at home it was far enough from answering the Doctor's expectation, for it did not at all abate the opposition formed against his practice by the Faculty, or allay that bitterness with which his opponents treated his arguments and writings [B]. But, considered in another light, when he should have reaped the fruits of his labour, he complains that some envious person had sown tares with his wheat, whence he was under a necessity of writing this apologetical discourse, wherein his intention was to prove, that himself was no impostor, and that there were both truth and certainty in that science, which had particularly engrossed his studies. This treatise is but very short, but withal very methodical, and extremely fit to remove those prejudices which his enemies had very industriously infused into the minds of the learned, for chiefly to them this Latin discourse related. It is divided into seven chapters. In the first he enquires whether there be such a thing as potable gold? In this chapter he displays his great reading, and perfect acquaintance with the writings of the most eminent Philosophers, Physicians, and Chymists. He cites from their own works their testimonies pro and con in this matter, and in the end concludes from their concurring sentiments (under certain restrictions), That there are very great virtues in metals, and there may possibly be discovered an aurum potable, or potable gold, of excellent use in medicine. In the second chapter he endeavours to prove in the rational way, that there really are great virtues both for preserving health and curing diseases in the mineral kingdom. The third chapter explains the superior virtues of gold. In this chapter also he obviates an objection, which he supposes might be raised from the extravagant promises of the Spagyric Philosophers, observing justly, that lyes are not to prejudice the truth, and that tho' many may have failed in their operations on this metal, or may have boasted of more than they could perform; yet this is no proof that others might not arrive at what they sought, or might not make discoveries which these men had no acquaintance with. In the fourth chapter he treats of the great mystery of dissolving and distilling Gold. This is the most laboured part of the treatise, and herein the author very fairly and accurately relates the whole process of his aurum potable, concealing only the method by which it is dissolved, and in which he assures us, he made use of no corrosive liquors, whence all those mischievous consequences flow, which have justly brought many metalline preparations into disrepute. After all he affirms, that his medicine is a kind of extract or honey of gold, capable of being dissolved in any liquor whatsoever, whence he thinks it may justly be stiled potable. Here again he mentions the common objection, that there is an affinity between the aurum potable and the Philosopher's Stone, whence the discovering of either is judged to be impracticable. In answer to this, he does not deny the transmutation of metals, but he shews that there is a real distinction between the operation of which he speaks, and the so much talked of transmuting powder or Philosopher's Stone, and that the possibility or impossibility of finding the one, doth not either infer or conclude the possibility or impossibility of finding the other. The fifth chapter is spent in offers to his adversaries of shewing the whole operation to proper and unsuspected witnesses. This he presumes will take away all doubts and jealousies, and silence all suspicions and evil insinuations. In the sixth chapter he labours to prove, That aurum potable may well be called the Universal Medicine. He describes it's manner of acting, it's power of preserving health, of cherishing the natural heat, comforting the bowels, invigorating the blood, promoting secretions and evacuations, after which, he shews how it acts in assisting nature to free the human body from diseases. The last chapter enumerates the several distempers which this aurum potable cures. Such as frequent and dangerous vomitings, all sorts of fluxes, stoppages of urine and diabetes, putrid and epidemick fevers; nay, even the plague itself, as he asserts to have been demonstrated by experience in the Plague which depopulated the city of London in the year 1602. He also insists on it's curing palsies, and assures us, that though it be an anodyne, yet it is without any stupifying quality. He then adds four certificates, the first is signed by Thomas (it should be George) Lewkner, Doctor of Physick (1). It relates to a cure performed on the Doctor's daughter-in-law; by the Bishop of Winchester's recommending the aurum potable. She had been long in a declining way, and at the time the aurum potable was exhibited in convulsions; yet in the space of half an hour, all these extraordinary symptoms ceased, and she was able to eat flesh, which in the space of a month she had not tasted. The second is dated at Barkhamstead, the 13th of August, 1609, and is subscribed H. Cary. In it we are told, that a new disease had then lately shewed itself in Hertfordshire, which occasioned such pains in the head, stomach, and bones, as threw the patient into a kind of phrensy, but upon giving a small quantity of the aurum potable, the symptoms ceased, or if it was given in time, they were prevented. From this letter we learn the price of the medicine, which was five shillings an ounce. The third is subscribed by Walter Hastings, it is dated December 10, 1609, from Kirby. The last is from Lewis Lewkner, whom I take to have been Sir Lewis Lewkner, brother to Dr George Lewkner (2): It is dated January the 7th, the same year with the rest, and contains an account of a wonderful cure performed on the Countess of Dorchester. This our author's book was answered the next year after it was published, by Dr Matthew Gwinne, of the College of Physicians, London. The title of his work ran thus, Aurum non Aurum, sive Adversaria in assertorem Chymie, sed vere Medicinæ desertorem Franciscum Anthonium. Lond. 1611. 4to. i. e. Gold not Gold, or Remarks on the Treatise written by Francis Anthony, a Defender of Chymistry, but a deserter of True Physick (3). Besides this book of Dr Gwinne's, there were other treatises written by the learned against Dr Anthony's discourse on his aurum potable. Amongst the rest Dr John Cotta, of whom we shall make large mention in the next note, wrote a full and direct answer, which, by the persuasion of our author's friends, he was prevailed upon to lay aside, though on the reviving the dispute it was afterwards published (4).

[B] That bitterness with which his opponents treated his arguments and writings.] The English Treatise published by Dr Anthony, was called an Apology in defence of his Medicine, stiled Aurum Potabile. Lond. 1616, 4to. In this treatise was involved most of the arguments printed in the Latin discourse, but with great variations, and some additions, particularly in the rational proofs of the universality of this medicine. For instance, he observes that the very best Physicians allow to certain medicines several and separate virtues, whence he would conclude, that it is possible there may be a medicine having still more virtues than any they are acquainted with; nay, which may indeed have them all. He observes farther, That all diseases are no more than so many perturbations of the natural temper of the human frame, and therefore, if any medicine can be contrived of so friendly a nature to the temperament of the human body, as to support it when taken in health, and assist in restoring it if altered by accident, then will this medicine deserve to be stiled universal. A third reason he offers, is from the cordial nature of gold, which he supports from the authorities of various eminent writers, and from the known and undeniable qualities of his potable gold. Many other things he says of the same kind, and in the close, adds a much larger collection of certificates of great cures. Amongst these there are two, which seem to bear a little hard on one Dr Cotta, a Physician at Northampton, in as much as they say, That a patient of his, Sir William Samuel, had been cured by aurum potable, after he had been

it proved very advantageous to him, for it procured the general good-will of ordinary readers, and contributed exceedingly to support and extend his practice, notwithstanding all the pains taken to decry it. Yet what chiefly contributed to maintain his own reputation, and thereby reflected credit on his medicine, was his unblemished character in private life. For our Dr Anthony was a man of unaffected piety, untainted probity, of easy address, great modesty, and boundless charity; which procured him many friends, and left it not in the power of his enemies to attack any part of his conduct, except that of dispensing a medicine, of which they had no opinion (k). It is not either in our inclination, or agreeable to the design of this work, to enter deeply into this controversy, but it may not be amiss to observe, that though much has been said to discredit the use of gold in medicine, yet some very able and ingenious men, have written very plausibly in support of those principles on which Dr Anthony's practice was founded; an instance of which we shall give in the notes, from a deservedly admired, and altogether unsuspected author [C]. It is very natural for the curiosity of the world to be raised by the high pretences of chemical writers, who at the same time affect a very mysterious secrecy, for which reason, it will not be thought improper, since it so happens that we have it in our power, to reveal this boasted medicine, and give the true process of our author's Aurum potabile, which is accordingly placed in the notes [D]. The age in which Dr Anthony flourished was very favourable to his notions, a long time under Dr Cotta's care, and had by his directions taken a great deal of physick. This Doctor being naturally a warm man, and having a ready wit, no sooner saw this Apology attended with these certificates, but he set pen to paper, in order to vindicate himself in his practice. Whoever reads Dr Cotta's writings, will acknowledge the justness of the character here given him, and yet this angry gentleman did not immediately send abroad his performance, as might naturally have been expected from a man of his temper. He finished his treatise in 1616, the same year that Dr Anthony published his Apology. He then shewed it to some Doctors at London, from whence he sent it to Oxford to be printed, with a dedication prefixed, to the gentlemen of the Faculty in that university. But Dr Anthony's friends applying themselves to Dr Cotta, and assuring him, that he should receive full satisfaction for the injury supposed to have been done to his character as a Physician, the work was stayed at the press, and a treaty of accommodation was set on foot. It appears to have lasted about seven years, and then the quarrel broke out afresh. Upon this Dr Cotta published his long considered piece, under the following title, Cotta contra Antonium, or an Ant-Antony, or an Ant-Apology, manifesting Dr Anthony his Apology for Aurum potabile, in true and equal balance of right reason to be false and counterfeit, by John Cotta, Doctor in Physick. At Oxford, printed by John Liebfeld and James Short, for Henry Cripps, Anno Dom. 1623, 4to. This work consists of ten chapters, is written in a passionate, wafish stile, embroidered with variety of quotations, and interspersed both with Latin and English verses. Here we find great pains taken to refute Dr Anthony's reasons, to enervate his proofs, and to draw both the credit of the medicine and of the physician into question. As this answer was published in the very year Dr Anthony died, it could not be replied to. However, there is no reason to think that it much prejudiced the reputation of the Aurum potabile, the whole being rather a play upon words, and a display of what it's author thought wit, than a clear and intelligible answer to the book which Dr Anthony had published. Besides, Dr Cotta requires what was very unreasonable, a discovery of the dissolving liquor, wherein lay the whole secret, otherwise he said, it would not be plain, that no corrosive ingredient were used; whereas Dr Anthony rightly noted, that this might be easily known from the effects of the medicine. Besides, the pains taken, as Dr Cotta confesses, by some worthy and eminent Doctors of London, and some illustrious and learned Doctors of Oxford, to hinder his treatise from being published, must have flowed, either from a sense of Dr Anthony's being in the right, or from an apprehension that this piece would not prove him in the wrong, either of which destroys the credit of this censure. On the whole, we may rest satisfied, that the grand objection about the dissolving liquor, ought not to have any great weight. The following note will shew, that there really is such a liquor, and that Dr Anthony's might be a useful, nay, and an excellent medicine, notwithstanding all that Cotta and his other adversaries said against it. Tho' on the other hand, it is highly likely, that the inventor and his party, carried the thing too far; however, between them both, the medicine seems now to be lost, tho' this article will remain a proof, That Dr Anthony first asserted, the possibility of making an Aurum potabile in England.

[C] A deservedly admired and altogether unsuspected author.] This author is the famous Robert Boyle, Esq; who speaking of certain preparations from gold, that were made by two foreign Physicians, proceeds thus (5), 'Tho' I have been long prejudiced against the pretended aurum potabile, and other boasted preparations of gold, for most of which I have still no great esteem; yet I sav such extraordinary and surprising effects from the tincture of gold I speak of, upon persons of great note, with whom I was particularly acquainted, both before they fell desperately sick, and after their strange recovery, that I could not but change my opinion for a very favourable one, as to some preparations of gold. But tho' this simple medicine can only be made in small quantities, and that too not without a great deal of pains and time, I can speak thus circumstantially of it, because by the kindness of the artists, and the pains I had bestowed in working upon the same subject they use for their menstruum, I so far knew and partly saw the preparation of it, as to apply what has been said to the present occasion. There is here but a single ingredient associated to the gold, and that comes from above, and is reputed one of the simplest bodies in nature, two or three ounces of which may be taken altogether unprepared without the least inconvenience. Yet the dose of this almost insipid medicine that was given to one old courtier in a violent apoplexy, after other remedies had by skilful men been used in vain, was but six or eight drops. In another very ancient and corpulent person the dose was greater; the tincture being then more unripe and diluted: But the effect was as sudden, tho' the patient were not bled; and tho' there was not in either of these cases any remarkably sensible evacuation made. The two persons thus recovered are yet alive. The same medicine a while after saved the life of another gentleman whom I knew, that having lain above twenty-two days sick of an ill-conditioned fever, was condemned by three Physicians; one whereof told me, That he could not out-live the next morning; yet upon taking a large dose of this tincture he was presently relieved; and from that time found a sensible amendment, and afterwards recovered his health, which he now enjoys, tho' he was then reputed to be fourscore years old. I could relate some other odd effects of this remedy; but the present may suffice to alleviate a prejudice against medicines, made of so fixed and supposed unalterable a metal as gold.'

[D] Accordingly placed in the notes.] This account of Dr Francis Anthony's method of making his aurum potabile was transcribed from his own manuscript, which was once in the possession of a Chemist well known to the author of this life from whom he had it. The secret was long in Dr Anthony's family, and very beneficial to them, but in all probability lost it's credit by being given in too great doses, or by unskilful hands.

notions, since Chemistry was then full as much admired, though perhaps not so well understood as at present. He had therefore a very extensive and beneficial practice, which enabled him to live hospitably at his house in Bartholomew-Close, and to be very liberal in his alms to the poor. He died on the twenty-sixth of May, 1623, in the seventy-fourth year of his age (l), and was buried in the church of St Bartholomew the Great, in the isle which joins to the north side of the chancel, where a handsome monument has been erected to his memory, with a very remarkable inscription (m) [E]. Our author was twice married, and by his last wife, whose name was Elizabeth, he had two sons, John and Charles, both Physicians; the former sold his father's Aurum potable, and lived by it very handsomely, the latter settled in the town of Bedford, where he attained the character of a learned, honest, and industrious man in his profession (n).

hands. The reader hath in this note, the whole of Dr Anthony's receipt without the smallest alteration or omission.

There seems to be no reason at all, why we should imagine the mineral kingdom less useful to mankind than the vegetable or animal, and such as have treated our doctrine with contempt, have had a large share of that credulity, which they imputed to others. The sulphurs of metals, if it be possible to extract them, must be very efficacious for medicinal purposes, because we see them frequently produce very deadly and dangerous consequences when roughly treated. The vigour of such preparations when rightly directed, will be proportionate to the force of their poisons when not artificially managed. But we are not only taught this by the light of reason, and the authority of Spargyrick philosophers. Experience has shewn us, that out of lead many profitable medicines are made, more out of iron, and from copper, or vitriol which is but the rust of copper, most of all; I mean most of all that are in common use. If from most or from all other metals medicines are made, why should it appear so strange, that we attempt something of the same kind from gold; or what reason is there to conceit, that all the learned and great men who have written so much, and in such strong terms of the virtues of gold, should be either cheated themselves or intend to cheat others?

According to the ablest writers on these subjects, the great difficulty in making gold useful in medicine, consists in opening it to such a degree, as that it's sulphur may become active, and work upon the humours in the human body. To open it there are required a liquor and a salt which together compose the menstruum. Both these may be prepared after the following manner.

The Philosophick Vinegar.

Take 6 gallons of the strongest red wine vinegar, and set as many Stills at work at a time as your Balneum will hold. Throw away the first pint that comes over, wash and wipe the Still, and then put in that which was distilled, putting away always the first pint for 5 times, so out of a gallon you shall have 3 pints, and out of the whole 6 gallons 10 quarts of spirit of vinegar, which keep in glass bottles well corked with a leather over it.

The Philosophick Salt.

Take an iron pan, like a dripping pan, and having made it red hot, put into it as much as you will of block-tin, and stir it continually, until it turns to a kind of ashes or calx, and keep the fire up to a good height all the time, which may be half a day or fifteen hours, some of these ashes will look red, which is a sign the operation is well performed. These ashes thus obtained keep in a glass close covered.

The Process for dissolving Gold.

Take 4 ounces of these ashes, and of the spirit of vinegar 3 pints, put them in a glass like an urinal, and let the ashes be put in first. Lute the vessel, set it in a hot bath for 10 days, then take it out and set it to cool, shaking it every 2 hours, and in three days all the dregs will fall to the bottom. Let that which is clear be drawn off into a glass basin by 2 or 3 woollen threads, then distill it; to this distilled water put 4 ounces of fresh ashes, put also a quart of spirit of vinegar on the first ashes; lute the glass as before, set it in a hot bath, and let it digest 10 days, filtre this and distil as before; thirdly, put on that ashes a pint of spirit of vinegar, set it in the hot bath 10 days filtre and distil it, after the third infusion throw away the ashes. Take this distilled water, pour it on fresh ashes, keeping the weight and order in infusions, filterings, and distillations 7 times, then the spirit will be well impregnated with the salt and you have the menstruum sought.

Take an ounce of pure gold in the ingot, file it into small dust, put it into a crucible with as much white salt as will near fill the pot, and let it stand in a moderate heat 4 hours, then take it out and grind it on a Painter's stone, return it from thence to the crucible, calcine and grind it again 4 or 5 times till it looks red and blue, and then it is fit for use. Put it next into a glass basin, pour upon it scalding hot water, stir and decant it, till the water when settled has no taste of salt, which will take 2 or 3 days. By this operation you will have 16 or 17 grains of a very fine white calx, which will swim on the top of the water, and may be easily blown over into another basin, and the water being evaporated by a gentle heat, it will remain a white powder. By repeating the calcination and grinding, the whole ounce of gold may be reduced into such a calx.

Take an ounce of this calx, put it in a urinal, pour upon it half a pint of the menstruum, lute it close and set it in a hot bath six days, shaking it often every day, let it cool 3 days and then pour it gently off. Take this liquor, put it into a glass Still, and with a gentle fire, evaporate it, till it becomes of the consistency of honey, then remove the fire, take out the contents, put them into a glass basin, and with the bottom of another round glass, grind them to powder. Put this powder into a urinal containing about a pint, and add somewhat more than half a pint of rectified spirit of wine; set it in a cold place for 10 days, shaking it often for the first 7 days, but afterwards let it stand without shaking and the tincture will appear of a fine red. By putting a bare half pint of rectified spirit of wine on the dregs, a second tincture may be drawn, and if this be very high coloured you may draw a third. Put all these coloured liquors together, distil them, and there will be left behind a clammy substance of the consistence of honey, one ounce of which put into a quart of pure canary wine, is my Aurum potable.

Sacred to the Memory of the worthy and learned Francis Anthony, Doctor in Physick.

There needs no Verse to beautify thy Praise,
Or keep in memory thy spotless Name,
Religion, Virtue, and thy Skill did raise
A threefold Pillar to thy lasting Fame.
Though pois'nous Envy ever fought to blame,
Or hide the Fruits of thy Intention;
Yet shall all who commend that high design
Of purest Gold to make a Medicine,
That feel thy Help by that thy rare Invention.

He died the 26 May 1623; his Age 74, his loving Son John Anthony, Doctor in Physick, left this Remembrance of his Sorrow. E

A R A B E L L A (STUART), commonly called the Lady Arabella, so often talked of for a Queen, that custom seems to have given her a right to an article in this manner under her Christian name, as that by which our historians distinguish her. She was the daughter of Charles Stuart, Earl of Lenox, who was younger brother to Henry Lord Darnley, father to King James VI of Scotland, and first of England; by Elizabeth, daughter of Sir William Cavendish, Knt (a). She was born as near as can be computed, in the year 1577, and educated at London, under the eye of the old Countess of Lenox, her grand-mother. She was far from being either beautiful in her person, or from being distinguished by any extraordinary qualities of mind (b), and yet she met with many admirers, on account of her royal descent, and near relation to the Crown of England [A]. Her father dying in the year 1579, and leaving her thereby sole heirs, as some understood of the House of Lenox, several matches were thought of for her at home and abroad (c). Her cousin, King James inclined to have married her to Lord Esme Stuart, whom he had created Duke of Lenox, and whom before his marriage, he considered as his heir, but this match was prevented by Queen Elizabeth, though it was certainly a very fit one in all respects (d) [B]. As the English succession was at this time very problematical, the great Powers on the Continent formed many designs about it, and thought of many husbands for the Lady Arabella, such as the Duke of Savoy, a Prince of the house of Farnese, and others (e). In the mean time this Lady had some thoughts of marrying herself at home, as a celebrated writer informs us, to a son of the Earl of Northumberland's (f), but it is not credible that this took effect, though he says it did privately [C]. The very attempt procured her Queen Elizabeth's displeasure, who confined her for it. In the mean time her title to the crown, such as it was, became the subject, amongst many others, of Father Persons's famous book, wherein are all the arguments for and against her, and which served to divulge her name and descent all over Europe (g), and yet this book was not very favourable to her interest [D]. On the death of the Queen some malecontents framed

[A] Royal descent and near relation to the Crown of England. In this note we shall inform the reader, how this Lady stood allied to both the Royal Families. In the first place it must be observed, that the Earls of Lenox, of the name of Stuart, were descended from Walter, the second of that name, High-Steward of Scotland, ancestor also to the Royal Family. Matthew Stuart, Earl of Lenox, in the reign of King James V, of Scotland, distinguished himself in the French service in Italy, where he gained great reputation. Coming into Scotland after that King's death, he, through the intrigues of Cardinal Beaton, came to be embarrassed with those who had the administration of affairs at home, and was also upon such bad terms with the house of Guise, who governed all in France, that he found himself obliged to retire into England in the year 1543, and to put himself under the protection of King Henry VIII, who afforded him a most kind and gracious reception, and some time afterwards married him to his niece, Lady Margaret Douglas, daughter to Margaret Queen of Scotland, by Archibald Douglas, Earl of Angus, her second husband. By this Lady Margaret Douglas, Matthew Earl of Lenox had two sons, Henry, Lord Darnley, father to James VI, King of Scotland, who was murdered in the said Earl's life-time, and Charles, who, on the death of Matthew, Earl of Lenox, in 1571, succeeded him in his title, and who dying in 1576, in the 21st year of his age, left behind him this Lady Arabella, or rather Arbella his only child (1). Thus it appears, that by her father's side she was first cousin to King James VI, and nearly allied to Queen Elizabeth, as being descended in the fourth degree from Henry VII, grandfather to the said Queen.

[B] A very fit one in all respects. The person proposed by King James for the husband of this young Lady, was her cousin, being the son of John, Lord Aubigny (2), brother to Matthew, Earl of Lenox, grandfather to the Lady Arabella. It is true, the title of Lenox, belonged of right to Lord Robert Stuart, the uncle of this nobleman, and his father's elder brother, but he willingly resigning his claim, King James VI created Esme, Lord Aubigny, Duke of Lenox (3), and looking upon him as the heir male of his family, he would willingly have married him to this Lady Arabella, his nearest relation. But Queen Elizabeth, who did not care to see her heirs multiplied in her life-time, refused to consent to this marriage, under pretence that the Duke of Lenox was a Papist, which however was false, and this refusal of her's, gave King James very great distaste (4).

[C] Though he says it did, privately. The account Thuanus gives us of this matter, runs thus, Angli

quidam Proceres, &c. 'Some English Lords, and other persons, on whom Elizabeth had conferred honours, either out of favour, or as a reward for their services, seeing a new King and a foreigner, coming from Scotland, and fearing that by this change, they should be deprived of those dignities, which they expected, resolved among themselves to kill the King, after which Arbella, who, during the reign of Queen Elizabeth, had been secretly married to the son of the Earl of Northumberland, and was for that reason put into prison, and had been since set at liberty, and was present at the Queen's funeral, was to be made Queen, and to be married to the Duke of Savoy with the consent of Philip III, i. e. King of Spain (5).

[D] Was not very favourable to her interest. The book referred to in the text, states at large the arguments for and against Lady Arabella's claim to the English succession. First her descent is set down, which having been cleared in a former note, need not be repeated here. Secondly, saith that author, it is alledged in her behalf, That she is an English woman, born in England, and of parents who at the time of their birth were of English allegiance, wherein she goeth before the King of Scots, as hath been seen; as also in this other principal point, that by her admission no such inconvenience can be feared of bringing in strangers, or causing troubles or sedition within the realm, as in the pretence of the Scottish King hath been considered: And this, in effect, is all that I have heard alledged for her. But against her, by other competitors and their friends, I have heard diverse arguments of no small importance and consideration produced; whereof the first is, that which before hath been alledged against the King of Scotland, to wit, That neither of them is properly of the house of Lancaster. The second impediment against the Lady Arbella, is the famous testament of King Henry VIII, and the two acts of parliament for authorizing the same; by all which it is pretended, that the house of Suffolk is preferred before this other of Scotland. A third argument is, For that there is yet living one of the house of Suffolk, that is nearer by a degree to the stem, to wit, Henry VII, (to whom, after the decease of her Majesty that now is, we must return) than is the Lady Arabella, or the King of Scots, and that is the Lady Margaret, Countess of Derby, mother to the present Earl of Derby, who was daughter to Lady Eleanor, daughter of Queen Mary of France, that was second daughter of King Henry VII; so as this Lady Margaret, Countess of Derby, is but in the third degree from the said Henry, whereas both the King of Scotland and Arbella, in the fourth; and consequently, she is next in proximity framed an odd design of disturbing the publick peace, and amongst other branches of their dark scheme, one was to seize the Lady Arabella, and to cover their proceedings by the function of her title, intending also to have married her to some English Nobleman, the more to increase their interest, and the better to please the people (b). But this conspiracy was fatal to none but it's authors, and those who conversed with them; being speedily defeated, many taken and some executed. As for the Lady Arabella, it does not appear that she had any knowledge of this engagement in her behalf (i), whatever it was, for domestick writers are perplexed, and foreign historians run into absurdities when they endeavour to explain it [E]. She continued at liberty, and in some kind of favour at court, though her circumstances were narrow till the latter end of the year

pinquity of blood, and how greatly this propinquity hath been favoured in such cases, though they were of the younger Line, might be proved from many examples. Fourthly, lastly, and most strongly of all, they do argue against the title of the Lady Arabella, affirming, that the descent is not free from bastardy, which they prove first, for that Queen Margaret, soon after the death of her first husband, King James IV, married secretly one Stuart, Lord of Annandale; which Stuart was alive long after her marriage with Douglas; and consequently, this second marriage with Douglas (Stuart being alive) could not be lawful; which they do prove also another way, for that they say, it is most certain, and to be made evident, that the said Archibald Douglas, Earl of Angus, had another wife also alive, when he married the said Queen: which points they say were so publick, as they came to King Henry's ears; whereupon, he sent into Scotland, the Lord William Howard, brother to the old Duke of Norfolk, and father to the present Lord Admiral of England, to enquire of these points, and the said Lord Howard found them to be true, and so he reported, not only to the King, but also afterwards many times to others, and namely, to Queen Mary, to whom he was Lord Chamberlain, and to diverse others, of whom many, be yet living, which can and will testify the same, upon the relation they heard from the said Lord William's own mouth; whereupon, King Henry was greatly offended, and would have hindered the marriage between his said sister and Douglas, but that they were married in secret, and had consummated their marriage before this was known, or that the thing could be prevented, which is thought was one especial cause and motive also to the King afterward, to put back the issue of his said sister of Scotland, as by his forenamed testament is pretended; and this touching Arabella's title by propinquity of birth (6). — In another part of his book, speaking of the interest of the several competitors, he delivers himself thus. 'I do not know to whom the Protestant party is particularly devoted at this day, more than to the rest, though the house of Hartford was wont to be much favoured by them; but of later years, little speech hath been thereof, but rather of Arabella for whom the Lord Treasurer is said especially to be at this present, though for himself, it be held somewhat doubtful, whether he be more fast to the Protestant, or to the Puritan; but if the Protestant party should be divided, then their forces will be the less (7)'. At the close of his book, he delivers the following judgment of her pretensions. — 'As for Arabella, in that she is a young Lady, she is thereby fit to procure good wills and affections, and in that she is unmarried, she may perhaps by her marriage join some other title with her own, and thereby also friends. But of herself, she is nothing at all allied with the nobility of England; and except it be the Earl of Shrewsbury, in respect of friendship to his old mother-in-law, that is, grandmother to the Lady, I see not what Nobleman in England hath any band of kindred, or alliance, to follow her. And as for her title, it seemeth as doubtful as the rest, if not more, as by that which hath been said before, hath appeared. And for her religion, I know it not, but probably it can be no great motive, either against her, or for her, for that, by all likelihood, it may be supposed to be as tender, green, and flexible yet, as is her age and sex, and to be wrought hereafter, and settled according to future events and times (8)'. — The reader must observe, that this book was published in the year 1594, the dedication to the Earl of Essex, being dated the last day of the preceding year.

[E] When they endeavour to explain it.] The great Cardinal D'Ofat, in a letter of his to King Henry IV, of France, dated from Rome, October 26, 1601, gives a long and distinct account of several schemes then on foot, for disposing of the English succession to any body, rather than King James VI, of Scotland. He observes, that the Pope first thought of the Duke of Parma, as being of his own family, and fought to advance him, under colour of his descent, from a bastard of King Edward IV. In case, however, this was found impracticable, his Holiness was content to join his interest, with that of the Lady Arabella; but inasmuch as the Duke of Parma was married, he was for permitting his brother Cardinal Farnese, to espouse the Lady, and, in her right, to become King of England. He then speaks of Father Persons's book, and sets it in it's true light; but seems to give a little too much into that wild notion, that a rebellion might be raised in England, in support of the Cardinal's pretended title (9). — I cannot help taking notice, that the celebrated M. Amelot, in a note of his on this letter, makes a great mistake, though he was a learned and judicious writer. He tells us, 'That in the Lady Arbella's party, were all those English Lords, who had been the judges of Queen Mary, and who, fearing lest the King of Scotland her son, should revenge her death upon them, if ever he succeeded to the Crown of England, intended to marry Arbella with the Earl of Hertford, to exclude King James from the succession (10)'. — The authors of the General Dictionary, having cited this passage, say, This is probable enough, though Amelot quotes no authority for it (11). But with their leave, the fact is absolutely false, none of Queen Mary's judges were of Arabella's party, but on the contrary, many amongst the Papists were the Lady Arabella's friends. The truth of the matter was this, Sir Walter Raleigh, on King James's coming to the crown, drew up a memorial, wherein he charged Cecil, afterwards Earl of Salisbury, and Lord High-Treasurer of England, with having, in conjunction with his father, a deep concern in the murder of the Queen of Scots. By this step, he hoped to establish his own, and to destroy Cecil's credit. But he was mistaken, the King continued to confide in his rival, and forbid Raleigh's attendance (12). This threw him into that conspiracy, which was fatal to him, and according to the charge of the Attorney-General, against Raleigh at his trial, it seems the plot was to seize the person of the King, to set up the Lady Arabella, with the title of Queen, and to govern the kingdom in her name, by assistance from Spain. Raleigh denied all this, and with respect to him, there was no sort of proof, or even colour of proof. At this trial, Lord Cecil delivered himself thus in court. Here hath been a touch of the Lady Arabella Stuart, a near kinswoman of the King's. Let us not scandal the innocent by confusion of speech, she is as innocent of all these things as I, or any man here, only she received a letter from my Lord Cobham to prepare her, which she laughed at, and immediately sent it to the King. Then the Earl of Nottingham, who stood by the Lady Arabella, said, The Lady doth here protest upon her salvation, that she never dealt in any of these things, and so she willed me to tell the court. This was further confirmed by Lord Cecil, who, when the Earl of Nottingham had done speaking, proceeded thus. The Lord Cobham wrote to my Lady Arabella, to know if he might come and speak with her, and gave her to understand, that there were some about the King, that laboured to disgrace her. She doubted it was but a trick. But Brook, Lord Cobham's brother, saith, that my Lord moved him to procure Arabella to write to the King of Spain, but he affirms, that he never did move her, as his brother devised (13).

1608, when some way or other she drew upon her King James's displeasure (k). However, at Christmas, when there was much mirth and good-humour at court, she was again taken into favour, had a service of plate presented to her of the value of two hundred pounds, a thousand marks given her to pay her debts, and some addition made to her annual income (l). This seems to have been done, in order to have gained her to the interest of the court, and to put the notions of marriage she had entertained out of her head, all which however proved ineffectual; for in the beginning of the month of February 1609, she was detected in an intrigue with Mr William Seymour, son to the Lord Beauchamp, and grandson to the Earl of Hertford, to whom, notwithstanding, she was privately married, some time afterwards (m). Upon this discovery, they were both carried before the Council, and severely reprimanded, and then dismissed. In the summer of the year 1610, the marriage broke out, whereupon the Lady was sent into close custody, at the house of Sir Thomas Parry, in Lambeth; and Mr Seymour was committed to the Tower for his contempt, in marrying a Lady of the Royal Family, without the King's leave (n). It does not appear that this confinement was attended with any great severity to either, for the Lady was allowed the use of Sir Thomas Parry's house and gardens, and the like gentleness, in regard to his high quality, was shewn to Mr Seymour [F]. Some intercourse they had by letters, which after a time was discovered, and a resolution taken thereupon to send the Lady to Durham, a resolution which threw her into deep affliction. Upon this, by the interposition of friends, she and her husband concerted a scheme for their escape, which was successfully executed in the beginning, though it ended unluckily (o). The Lady, under the care of Sir James Crofts, was at the house of Mr Conyers, at Highgate, from whence she was to have gone the next day to Durham, on which she put a fair countenance now, notwithstanding the trouble she had before shewn. This made her keepers the more easy, and gave her an opportunity of disguising herself, which she did on Monday the third of June, 1611, by drawing over her pettycoats a pair of large French-fashioned hose, putting on a man's doublet, a peruke which covered her hair, a hat, black cloak, russet boots with red tops, and a rapier by her side. Thus equipped, she walked out between three and four with Mr Markham. They went a mile and half to a little inn, where a person attended with their horses. The lady by that time she came thither, was so weak and faint, that the hostler, who held the stirrup when she mounted, said that gentleman would hardly hold out to London. Riding however so raised her spirits, that by the time she came to Blackwall, she was pretty well recovered; there they found waiting for them two men, a gentlewoman, and a chambermaid, with one boat full of Mr Seymour's and her trunks, and another boat for their persons, in which they hastened from thence towards Woolwich. Being come so far, they bid the watermen row on to Gravesend; there, the poor fellows were desirous to land, but for a double freight were contented to go on to Lee, yet being almost tired by the way, they were forced to lie still at Tilbury, whilst the rowers went on shore to refresh themselves; then they proceeded to Lee, and by that time the day appeared, and they discovered a ship at anchor a mile beyond them, which was the French bark that waited for them. Here the lady would have lain at anchor expecting Mr Seymour; but through the importunity of her followers, they forthwith hoisted sail and put to sea. In the mean time Mr Seymour, with a peruke and beard of black hair, and in a tawny cloth suit, walked alone without suspicion, from his lodging out at the great west door of the Tower, following a cart that had brought him billets. From thence he walked along by the Tower-wharf, by the Warders of the south gate, and so to the iron gate, where one Rodney was ready with a pair of oars to receive him. When they came to Lee, and found that the French ship was gone, the billows rising high, they hired a fisherman for twenty shillings, to put them on board a certain ship, that they saw under sail. That ship they found not to be it they looked for, so they made forwards to the next under sail, which was a ship from Newcastle. This with much ado they hired for forty pounds, to carry them to Calais, and

[F] In regard to his high quality was shewn to Mr Seymour.] This gentleman was the second son of the Lord Beauchamp, eldest son and heir to the Earl of Hertford, by the lady Catharine, who was the eldest surviving daughter of the Lady Frances Duchess of Suffolk, daughter of Mary Queen Dowager of France and younger daughter to King Henry VII. Thus this gentleman was very nearly allied to the Royal Family, and a sort of title of his Grandfather's to the crown, is mentioned in Persons's Book before taken notice of (14). But that ever there was a design of marrying the Lady Arabella to the old Earl of Hertford, as Mr Amelot asserts is scarce credible, but is very likely this was mistaken, for the very match which took effect, since the plain design of it was to unite the claims of the Lady Arabella, with those of the house of Hertford, and very probably, the relation this had to Lord Cobham's scheme mentioned in the last note, might alarm the court, and this will still appear the more likely, if we consider what is said, in a subsequent proclamation on the commitment of these noble persons. At the coming of Mr Seymour to the Tower, Mr Melvin, a Minister, a prisoner there for Nonconformity, saluted him in this elegant distich.

Communis tecum mihi Causa est Carceris, Arabella tibi Causa est, Araque Sacra mihi (15).

The wit consists in the allusion, grounded on the Lady's name, signifying in Latin, a fair Altar, and Melvin being committed for the cause of God's Altar, at least in his own opinion. This renders it almost impossible to translate these lines into English, without injuring either the sense or the spirit, which is the best excuse that can be made for the following attempt.

From the same Cause, my Woe proceeds and thine,
Your A L T A R lovely is, and sacred mine.

and the Master performed his bargain, whereby Mr Seymour escaped, and continued in Flanders. On Tuesday in the afternoon, my Lord Treasurer being advertized that the Lady Arabella had made an escape, sent forthwith to the Lieutenant of the Tower, to set strict guard over Mr Seymour, which he, says my author, promised, after his yaere manner, he would thoroughly do, that he would (p); but coming to the prisoner's lodgings, he found, to his great amazement, that he was gone from thence one whole day before. A pink being dispatched from the Downs into Calais road, seized the French bark, and brought back the Lady and those with her (q), but before this was known, the proclamation issued, which the reader will find in the notes [G]. As soon as she was brought to town, she was, after examination, committed to the Tower, declaring that she was not so sorry for her own restraint, as she should be glad if Mr Seymour escaped, for whose welfare, she affirmed she was more concerned than for her own (r). Her aunt, the Countess of Shrewsbury, was likewise committed, on suspicion of having prompted the Lady Arabella, not only to her escape, but to other things, it being known, that she had amassed upwards of twenty thousand pounds in ready money (s). The Earl of Shrewsbury was confined to his house, and the old Earl of Hertford sent for from his feat (t). By degrees things grew cooler, and though it was known that Mr Seymour continued in the Netherlands, yet the court made no farther applications to the Arch-Duke about him (u). In the beginning of the year 1612, a new storm began to break out, for the Lady Arabella, either pressed at an examination, or of her own free will, made some extraordinary discoveries, upon which some quick steps would have been taken, had it not shortly after appeared, that her misfortunes had turned her head, and that, consequently, no use could be made of the evidence of a person out of her senses (w). However, the Countess of Shrewsbury, who before had leave to attend her husband in his sickness, was very closely shut up, and the court was amused with abundance of strange stories, which wore out by degrees, and the poor Lady Arabella languished in her confinement till the twenty-seventh of September, 1615, when her life and sorrows ended together (x), as is well observed in an elegant epitaph, written by a right reverend author [H]. Even in her grave this poor lady was not at peace, a report being spread that she was poisoned, because she happened to die within two years of Sir Thomas Overbury (y). A writer of great reputation has put this circumstance in much too strong a light, for it was a suspicion at most, and never had the support of the least colour of proof (z) [I]. As for her husband, Sir William Seymour, he Whereas we are given to understand, that the Lady Arabella and William Seymour, second son to the Lord Beauchamp, being for divers great and heinous offences, committed the one to the Tower of London, and the other to a special guard, have found means by the wicked practices of diverse lewd persons, as namely, Markham, Crompton, Rodney, and others, to break prison, and make escape on Monday the third of June, with an intent to transport themselves into foreign parts. We doe hereby straightly charge and command all persons whatsoever, upon their allegiance and duty, not only to forbear to receive, harbor, or assist them in their passage any way, as they will answer for their perilles, but upon the like charge and pain, to use the best means they can for their apprehension and keeping them in safe custody, which we will take as an acceptable service. [H] In an elegant Epitaph, written by a Right Rev. author.] The prelate hinted at, was Dr Richard Corbet, Lord Bishop of Norwich. His verses are supposed to be spoken by herself, and the last line alludes to her being buried in Westminster-Abbey.

On the Lady Arabella.

How do I thank thee, death, and blest thy power,
That I have past the guard, and escap'd the Tower!
And now my pardon is my Epitaph,
And a small coffin my poor carcase hath;
For at thy charge, both soul and body were Enlarg'd at last, secur'd from hope and fear.
That amongst Saints, this amongst Kings is laid,
And what my birth did claim, my death hath paid (17).

[I] Had not the support of the least colour of proof.] The author here meant, is the celebrated Sir Bulstrode Whitlock, whose Memorials of English Affairs, from the supposed expedition of Brute, to the end of the reign of King James I, were published by the famous William Pen, with a commendatory preface by Dr Wellwood. He having under the year 1616, given a long account of the poisoning Sir Thomas Overbury, and the suspicion there was, that Sir Thomas had a hand in poisoning Prince Henry, immediately adds, 'The Lady Arabella, Daughter to Charles Stuart, younger brother to the King's father, having married Sir William Seymour, Son of the Lord Beauchamp, and grandchild to the Earl of Hertford, both allied to the crown, and committed to the Tower, designed an escape by disguises. But the poor Lady fearful, and staying beyond the hour at which they were to meet; her husband went to sea without her, leaving notice for her to follow; but she was apprehended, and brought back to the Tower where she died; which set mens tongues and fears on work, that she went the same way (18).' It is plain all these facts are assembled under a wrong year, viz. The year after the Lady was dead, and that no notice is taken of the distance of time in which they happened, though there was no less than four years between her imprisonment and her death. What is still more remarkable, and which indeed shews this to be an unfounded calumny, is the consideration of the time of her death, which was after the murder of Sir Thomas Overbury was discovered, and consequently at a time, when practices of that sort in the Tower were least likely to be undertaken, and that she had been well treated before, appears from the Earl of Somerset's Trial, wherein he alledged, Sir William Wade was removed from being Lieutenant of the Tower, for allowing her a key, by which she might have made her escape (19).

(18) Whitlock's Memorials, p. 295.

This report was at first in all probability, occasioned by the precaution usually taken by the Court in cases of this nature; for it appears, that as soon as the death of this Lady was known, the Secretary of State directed his warrant to this effect.

To my very loving friend the President of the College of Physicians in the City of LONDON.

AFTER my hearty commendations: whereas the Lady Arabella is lately deceased in the Tower, soon after her decease, procured leave to return, distinguished himself by loyally adhering to the King during the civil wars, and, surviving to the time of the Restoration, was restored to his great grandfather's title of Duke of Somerset, by an Act of Parliament, which entirely cancelled his attainder; and on the giving his royal assent to this act, King Charles II, was pleased to say in full Parliament, what perhaps was as honourable for the family, as the title to which they are restored. His words were these, As this is an Act of an extraordinary nature, so it is in favour of a person of no ordinary merit, he has deserved of my father, and of myself, as much as any subject possibly could do; and I hope this will stir no man's envy, because in doing it, I do no more than what a good master should do for such a servant (a). By his lady Arabella, this noble person had no issue, but that he still preserved a warm affection for her memory, appears from hence, that he called one of his daughters by his second wife, Frances, daughter and co-heiress of Robert Devereux Earl of Essex, Arabella (b) Seymour.

Your loving friend,
RALPH WINWOOD.

According to the King's command, some Physicians of the College met at the Tower, and upon a diligent inspection of the Body of the Lady Arabella, were of an opinion, that the cause of this noble Lady's death, was a long chronical sickness; that the species of her disease was a Cachexie, which daily increasing (partly by her own neglect, and partly by her aversion to medicine) did at length bring her into a confirmed indisposition of her liver and extream leanness, from which causes death must needs ensue. This testimony was signed by the President, Register, and four Fellows of the College (20).

ARBUHNOT, a noble family in Scotland. This name was formerly spelt otherwise than at present, for we find that Duncan de Aberbothenoth, was witness to a grant of King Alexander II, to the abbey of Aberbroth, in 1242 (a). His direct descendant Sir Robert Arberthnat, was, on the sixteenth of November 1641 (b), created Viscount of Arbuthnat, which honour is enjoyed by his descendant to this day (c); the present Viscount of Arbuthnat, who is less distinguished by his rank than by his virtues, being especially remarkable for unaffected piety, and unblemished probity.

ARBUHNOT (ALEXANDER) Principal of the university of Aberdeen. He was the son of the Baron of Arbuthnat, and was born in the year 1538 (a). He studied in the university of Aberdeen, and having perfected himself in humanity and philosophy, his relations sent him to study the Civil Law in France, where he was five years under the care of the famous Cujacius. Having taken the degree of Licentiate, he returned home in the year 1563, and appeared very warmly in support of the Reformed Religion (b). At this time Queen Mary was resident in her kingdom, but the Earl of Murray having the supreme direction of all things, the Reformed Church of Scotland was in a very flourishing condition (c). The friends of Mr Arbuthnot prevailed upon him to take orders, and whether he received them from a Bishop or from Presbyters is uncertain. In 1658, he assisted as a member of the General Assembly, which was held in the month of July at Edinburgh (d). By this Assembly he was intrusted with the care of revising a book which had given offence, and directed to report his opinion of it [A]. A little after, he was appointed Minister of Arbuthnat and Logy-Buchan (e). The year following, viz. 1569, on a visitation of the King's-college at Aberdeen, Mr Alexander Anderson, Principal; Mr Andrew Galloway, Sub-principal; and three Regents were deprived. Their sentence was published on the third of July, and immediately thereupon Mr Arbuthnot was made Principal of that college (f). He was a member also of the General Assembly which sat at St Andrews in the year 1572 (g). At this time there was great stir about a certain scheme of Church government, which was called the Book of Policy. It was, in short, an invention of some statesmen, to restore the old titles in the Church, but with a purpose to retain all the temporalities formerly annexed to them, amongst themselves (h). The Assembly being apprized of this, appointed the Archbishop of St Andrews, and nineteen other Commissioners, of whom Mr Arbuthnot was one, to confer with the Regent in his council, but these conferences either

[A] Directed to report his opinion of it.] This book was entituled The Fall of the Roman Church. It was printed by one Thomas Bassenden, printer in Edinburgh. The exception taken at it, was, that the King had the stile of the supreme head of the Church; at the same time there was another complaint against this Bassenden, for printing a lewd song at the end of the Psalm book. On these matters an order was made, forbidding the printer to

vend any more of his books till the offensive title was delated, and the lewd song castrated. The Assembly also made an order, that no book should be published for the future, till licensed by commissioners of their appointment (1). Hence it appears, that the clergy in all countries have the like appetite for power, and that they are naturally desirous of dictating in all points of literature.

either came to nothing, or, which is more probable, were never held (i). In the General Assembly which met at Edinburgh the sixth of August, 1573, Mr Alexander Arbuthnot was chosen Moderator (k). It was a very busy meeting, and the Church exerted her power in a very extraordinary manner (l) [B]. In the next Assembly, which met at Edinburgh the sixth of March 1574, there was a charge brought against George Bishop of Murray, for committing fornication with the Lady Ardsrofs (m). He desired three or four days to prepare his defence, but not appearing at the end of this space, a commission was granted to Mr Arbuthnot, and other Members, to cite before them the Chapter of Murray, in order to question them for their certificate of life and manners, given to George Douglas their Bishop beforementioned (n). In the same Assembly, Arbuthnot was named one of the commissioners for settling the jurisdiction of the Church, which seems to be no more than had been before done about the book of policy (o). This thorny business required much time and pains, but at last however some progress was made therein, and a plan of jurisdiction was struck out. In the General Assembly, which met at Edinburgh the first of April 1577, Mr Alexander Arbuthnot was again chosen Moderator. At this time the Assembly were persuaded, upon some specious pretences, to appoint a certain number of their members to confer in the morning with their Moderator, in order to prepare business (p). This Committee had the name of the Congregation, and in a short time all matters of importance came to be treated there, and the Assembly had little to do but to approve their resolutions (q). At the close of this Assembly Mr Arbuthnot with other Commissioners was appointed to confer with the Regent, on the plan of Church policy before mentioned (r). In the General Assembly held at Edinburgh the twenty-fifth of October 1578, he was again appointed of the Committee for the same purpose, and in the latter end of the year, actually conferred with several Noblemen, and other Lay-Commissioners, on that important business (s). In 1582 Mr Arbuthnot published Buchanan's History of Scotland, in which though he acted only as an Editor, yet it procured him a great deal of ill-will, and in all probability gave his Majesty King James VI, an ill impression of him (t). The practice of managing things in Congregation still subsisting, the King forbid Mr Arbuthnot to leave his college at Aberdeen, that he might not be present in the Assembly, or direct as he was wont to do those Congregations which directed that great body (u). This offended the ministers very much, and they did not fail to remonstrate thereupon to the King; however he remained firm, and they were forced to be content, what impression this might make upon his mind, being a very meek and humble man, assisting others at their request, and not through any ambition of his own is uncertain, but a little after he began to decline in his health, and on the twentieth of October 1583, departed this life in the forty-fifth year of his age, and was buried in the college church of Aberdeen (w). His private character was very amiable, he was learned without pedantry, and a great encourager of learning in youth, easy and pleasant in conversation, had a good taste in poetry, was well versed in philosophy and the mathematics, eminent as a lawyer, no less eminent as a Divine, neither wanted he considerable skill in Physick. In his publick character he was equally remarkable for his moderation

[B] The Church exerted her power in a very extraordinary manner.] This was esteemed the 25th General Assembly of the Church of Scotland; there were present many Earls and others of the nobility, some Bishops, Superintendents, &c. John Douglas Bishop of St Andrew's had a long charge brought against him, consisting of various heads, as, That he had admitted a Popish Priest into the ministry, to whom the Superintendent of Lothian had prescribed certain injunctions, which he had not obeyed. That he, the Bishop, had not visited or preached for half a year; that he had collated a person suspected of Popery to a benefice; that he had suffered Exercise (the same thing which in England was called prophesying) to decay through his neglect; that he had admitted into the Church, many who were incapable, and not properly examined. To this accusation he answered, That he had not admitted the Priest mentioned in the charge, till he had publicly abjured Popery. The Assembly however ordered the Priest to satisfy the injunctions prescribed in Lothian, and in the mean time not to exercise his function. As to his visiting and preaching, the Bishop alledged he had done both while he was able; and as to the other heads of complaint, he pleaded either ignorance or inability. James Patoun was accused of having accepted the Episcopal Office, and yet declining to execute it. He was accused of being guilty of simony, in respect to his practices with the Earl of Argyle, and even of perjury, since contrary to his oath he gave receipts, where the Earl received the money. Alexander Gordon, Bishop of Galloway, was charged with exciting the subjects in the city of Edinburgh to rebellion, and with refusing to pray for the King. That being forbidden by the General Assembly, to meddle with the parish of Holyrood-house, he had nevertheless compelled the people to receive the sacrament from him. That notwithstanding he had sworn to obey the King and his Regent, yet nevertheless he had owned another authority, and persuaded the people so to do, and had given thanks in the pulpit, for the barbarous murder of Matthew Earl of Lenox the late Regent; he pleaded that all this was pardoned by the late act of pacification: to which the Assembly replied, The States had not absolved him who was a Bishop from the censure of the Church in Talibus, so he was ordained, under the pain of excommunication, to make publick repentance three several sundays, one in the Church of Edinburgh, another in Holyrood-house, and the third in the Queen's College church. Robert Poul was accused, That being commissioner to visit Murray, he resided not there, nor hath visited churches these two years, except the chief four he hath visited once. He alledged want of leisure, because he was ordained to attend the College of Justice; whereupon the Superintendent of Lothian moveth the question, Whether it be lawful by the word of God, that the administration of the word and sacraments, and the administration of criminal and civil Justice be so confounded, that one man may occupy both the charges? it was answered, it is neither agreeable with the word of God, nor practice of the primitive Church. These are some of the extraordinary things done in that Assembly; as for the rest, they may be found in the ecclesiastical historians mentioned in the margin (2).

deration and abilities, which gained him such a reputation, as drew upon him so many calls for advice, as made him at last very uneasy. As Principal of the College of Aberdeen, he did great service to the Church in particular, and to his country in general, by bringing over many to the former, and reviving that spirit of Literature which was much decayed in the later (*). These employments took up so much of his time, that we have nothing of his writing, save a single book of which some account will be given in the notes [C]. His countryman and contemporary Andrew Melvil (y) wrote an elegant epitaph on this worthy person, which alone would have been sufficient to have preserved his memory, as it certainly gives a just idea of his character.

It was esteemed a very learned and elegant performance, as appears by a fine copy of Latin verses (3) on it's publication, by Mr Thomas Maitland, who was equally admired as a poet and a critic. E

A R D E N (E D W A R D) descended of a most ancient and honourable family; seated at Parkhall, in Warwickshire (a) [A]. He was born in the year 1532, and his father dying when he was an infant of two years old, before he inherited the estate of the family, he became the ward of Sir George Throkorton, of Coughton, whose daughter Mary he afterwards married (b). In all probability, it was his engagements with this family, and being bred therein, that made him so stiff a Papist as he was (c). However that be, succeeding his grandfather Thomas Arden, Esq; in 1562, in the family estate, he married Mary (Throkorton) and settled in the country (d), his religion impeding his preferment, and his temper inclining him to a retired life. His being a near neighbour to the great Earl of Leicester, occasioned his having some jars with him, who affected to rule all things in that county (e). Some persons therein, tho' of good families, and possessed of considerable estates, thought it no discredit to wear that nobleman's livery (f), which Mr Arden disdained. In the course of this fatal quarrel, excessive insolence on one side, produced some warm expressions on the other; infomuch, that Mr Arden openly taxed the Earl with his conversing criminally with the Countess of Essex, in that Earl's life-time; and also inveighed against his pride as a thing the more inexcusable in a nobleman newly created (g). These taunts having exasperated that Minister, he projected, or at least forwarded, his destruction [B]. Mr Arden had married one of his daughters to John Somerville, Esq; a young gentleman of an old family, and good fortune, in the same county (h) [C]. This Mr Somerville was a man

[A] Seated at Parkhall in Warwickshire. This family may well be styled ancient, since it was seated hereabouts before the Conquest. Turchillus in the reign of William Rufus, assumed, in imitation of the Normans, the surname of the family, de Arden, because his estate lay in the wood lands (1). Mr Camden, and many of our authors after him, write this name Arden (2), and it is true, that some branches of this family wrote it so (3). However, Mr Dugdale, who was best acquainted with these things, always writes it Arden, and so this gentleman himself wrote (4). Parkhall had been for three hundred years the seat of the Ardens, and they had attained all the honours, which really give lustre to any English line. In the twelfth of Henry II, Henry de Arden was certified to hold five knights fees of the Earl of Warwick, and his brother Hugh as many (5). In the forty-eighth of Henry III, Thomas Arden had summons to attend the King in a Welsh expedition, which he did, but siding afterwards with the rebellious barons, was undone (6). However, in the third of Edward III, Sir Robert de Arden was allowed to fortify his house, and died possessed of a large estate (7). In the forty-eighth of Edward III, Henry de Arden of Parkhall, was constituted conservator of the peace, knighted the next year, and was knight of the shire in the first of Richard II (8). Robert de Arden, in the sixteenth of Henry VI, was sheriff of this county and Leicestershire (9). But in the thirtieth of Henry VI, he was attainted for siding with the house of York (10). His son Walter, married the daughter of John Hampden, Esq; of Hampden in Buckinghamshire (11). His son John Arden, married Alice daughter of Richard Bracebrigge, Esq; of Kingsbury, in Warwickshire, and was squire of the body to Henry VII (12). His son Thomas, married the daughter of Thomas Andrews, Esq; by whom he had many children (13). Of these the eldest, William, married Elizabeth the daughter of Edward Conway, Esq; by whom he had our Edward, his only son (14). This Edward, though his grandfather was living at his father's decease, became the ward of Sir George Throkorton (15), whose daughter he married, and not Sir Robert's as it stands in the pedigree drawn by Dugdale.

[B] Forwarded his destruction. The warm expressions of Mr Arden mentioned by Camden, are proofs of his aversion, but they give us no light into the causes of his extraordinary hatred against the Earl of Leicester. In all probability, it was owing to his love for his wife's family, who were grievously persecuted by that haughty Peer. Her brother, Sir Nicholas Throkorton, was, in the opinion of the generality of the world, poisoned at this Earl's house, in 1571 (16). Another brother, Sir John Throkorton, Chief Justice of Chester, he persecuted till he broke his heart; and pursued not only all such as were related to, but also such as had a friendship for, this family, with implacable vengeance (17). Probably this drew some marks of his displeasure on Mr Arden, for we shall see hereafter, the whole family was caught in one net, and all brought to ruin together (18). It seems clear from the stories of those times, that the Throkortons were a stirring family; infomuch, that Camden remarks on the death of Sir Nicholas, after mentioning the common fame of his being poisoned, that however he died, he certainly died in a critical season, for himself being engaged in dangerous undertakings (19). Add to this, that Mrs Arden, who was a Throkorton, was made a deep sharer in her husband's sufferings.

[C] Of an old family in the same county. The Somervilles are a Norman family, and came over with the Conqueror (20). The Somervilles of Edfton, in Warwickshire, are a branch of the Gloucestershire family of the same name, who have flourished several hundred years at Aston Somerville, in the said county (21). This John Somerville came to his estate in 1576, and about the same time, married Margaret Arden, being then in his eighteenth year (22). He was of a warm fiery disposition, as all writers agree, and Dugdale's account of the matter, is, that his priest, Hall, wrought upon his zeal for religion, and his hot temper, till he fell into this humour, which he did not deny. He came up to town in a passion, acted like a man distracted, and owned a design to kill the Queen, as soon as pressed thereto, after his apprehension (23). But the best account duly weighed, is that of Lord Burleigh, which runs thus (24). To this number, they may, if they seek number, also add a furious of a hot rash temper, and by many thought a little crazy. He was drawn in a strange manner to plot (if it may be so called) against the Queen's life; and thus the treason is alledged to have been transacted. In the Whitsun-Holydays, 1583, he with his wife was at Mr Arden's, where Hugh Hall, his father-in-law's priest, persuaded him that Queen Elizabeth being an incorrigible heretick, and growing daily from bad to worse, it would be doing God and his country good service to take her life away. When the holidays were over, he returned to his own house with his wife, where he grew melancholy, and irresolute. Upon this, his wife writes to Hall, her father's priest, to come and strengthen the man. Hall excuses his coming, but writes at large, to encourage Somerville to prosecute what he had undertaken. This letter had it's effects, Somerville set out for London, but got no farther than Warwick, where, drawing his sword and wounding some Protestants, he was instantly seized. While he was going to Warwick, his wife went over to her father's and shewed him and her mother Hall's treasonable letter, which her father threw into the fire; so that only the hearsay of this letter, could be alledged against him and his wife, by Hall who wrote it, who was tried and condemned with them (i). But to return to Somerville. On his apprehension, he said somewhat of his father and mother-in-law, and immediately orders were sent into Warwickshire for their being seized, and imprisoned (k). October 30, 1583, Mr Somerville was committed to the Tower for high-treason. November 4, Hall the priest was committed also; and on the seventh of the same month, Mr Arden (l). On the sixteenth, Mary the wife of Mr Arden, Margaret their daughter, wife to Mr Somerville, and Elizabeth, the sister of Mr Somerville, were committed (m). On the twenty-third Mr Arden was racked in the Tower, and the next day Hugh Hall the Priest was tortured likewise (*) [D]. By these methods some kind of evidence being brought out, on the sixteenth of December Edward Arden, Esq; and Mary his wife; John Somerville, Esq; and Hugh Hall the Priest, were tried and convicted of high-treason at Guildhall, London (n), chiefly on Hall's confession, who yet received sentence with the rest. On the nineteenth of December, Mr Arden and his son-in-law Somerville, were removed from the Tower to Newgate, for a night's time only (o). In this space, Somerville was strangled by his own hands, it was given out, but, as the world believed, by such as desired to get him silently out of theirs (p). The next day, being December 20, 1583, Edward Arden was executed at Smithfield with the general pity of all spectators. He died with the same high spirit he had shewn throughout his life. After professing his innocence, he owned himself a Papist, and one who died for his religion, and want of flexibility, though under colour of conspiring against the State. He strenuously insisted, that Somerville was murdered, to prevent his shaming his prosecutors, and having thus extenuated things to such as heard him, he patiently submitted to an ignominious death (q). His execution was according to the rigour of the law, his head being set (as Somerville's also was) upon London Bridge; and his quarters upon the city gates, but the body of his son-in-law was interred in Moor-fields (r). As for Mrs Arden, she was pardoned, but the Queen gave the estate which fell to her, by her's, and her husband's attainer, to Mr Darcy. As for Hugh Hall, the Priest, he was pardoned too, but Leicester doubting his secrecy, would have engaged Chancellor Hatton to have sent him abroad; which he refusing, new rumours, little to that proud Earl's honour, flew about (s). Hollingshead, Stowe, and such writers, treat Mr Arden as a Traitor fairly convicted, and so have others who knew much better (t); but Camden was too honest to write thus, and there is good authority to incline our belief, that he died for being a stout Englishman, rather than a bad subject (u) [E]. His son and heir Robert Arden, Esq; being furious young man of Warwickshire, to increase the Kalendar of the Pope's martyrs, who of late was discovered, and taken in his way, coming with a full intent to have killed her Majesty.

[D] Was tortured likewise.] I take this from a Diary of what passed in the Tower of London, from the 15th of June, 1580, to the 21st of June, 1585, written in Latin, added to Sanders's book De Origine & Progressu Schismatis Anglicani. In the preface there is a succinct account of the instruments of torture, which were these, 1. The dungeon, which was without any light, twenty feet under ground. 2. A narrow room, in which a prisoner could scarce stand upright, called thence Little-cave. 3. The rack, an engine with pulleys, whereby men were disjointed. 4. Scavenger's daughter, so called, it is supposed, from the inventor, it was a circle of iron, whereby the patient's Head, Hands, and Feet, were grievously stretched. 5. Hand-screws. 6. Irons for the Arms. 7. Irons for the Legs. And in the Diary, the days are set down, on which the several prisoners mentioned therein, are said to have been racked, &c. The Papists made loud complaints of their treatment, to all the Christian world; attesting that 1. They were persecuted purely for conscience sake. 2. That they were driven to confess, by grievous tortures. In answer to these books, the Treasurer Burleigh, caused to be written what Mr Strype calls a State Book, cited above, which treats the first point; and soon after came forth a second piece intitled, A Declaration of the favourable dealing of Her Majesties Commissioners, &c. (25): wherein it is said, 'That none of them had been put to the rack, or torture, no not for treason, or partnership of treason, or such like, but where it was first known, or evidently probable, by former detections, confessions, or otherwise, that the party so racked or tortured was guilty, and did know and could deliver the truth of the things wherewith he was charged.' Which the Reverend Mr Strype, seems to think a full justification of the practice. Indubitably it shews there was such a practice. Nay, we are farther told by Whitlock, in his Memorials, that Queen Elizabeth, disliking the thing, or fearing it might be abused, forbid the putting men to the torture, on any pretence whatsoever (26). Yet we know that Mary Queen of Scots, objected to the evidence made use of against her, because it was extorted by these methods, which have been, God be praised, long out of date.

[E] A stout Englishman, rather than a bad subject.] In this note, I shall fairly state the evidence in favour of this judgment, and against it. The annalists, and publick writers in those times, treat Mr Arden as a notorious traitor, they could do no otherwise. Lord Burleigh's being bred in one of the Inns of Court, proved a very wife and fortunate person, in-much, that by various suits he wrung from Edward Darcy, Esq; the grantee (x), most of his father's estates (y), and by marrying Elizabeth daughter of Reginald Corbet, Esq; one of the Justices of the King's Bench, he restored the credit and splendor of this ancient family, and was so happy to see Henry Arden, Esq; his eldest son knighted by King James, and married to Dorothy the daughter of Basil Feilding, of Newnham, Esq; whose son became Earl of Denbigh. The drawing this embarrassed account out of obscurity, cannot but be grateful to our curious readers, and will answer one great end of this work, the elucidating dark passages in English history, by a comparison of lights, a thing not to be expected in general collections, or even in the accounts of particular reigns.

Burleigh's pamphlet, Apology, or State Book, charges him also (27). Immediately after the account of Somerville, he proceeds: The attempt not denied by the traitor himself, but confessed, and that he was moved thereto in his wicked spirit, by incitements from certain seditious and traitorous persons, his kinsmen and allies, and also by often reading sundry seditious vile books, lately published against Her Majesty. There is yet something stronger than this, viz. A confession of the Papists themselves, in a book called, Important Considerations: written and published by the secular Priests. Therein we read ' Mr Arden, and Mr Somerville, were convicted by the laws of the land, to have purposed and contrived how they might have laid violent hands upon Her Majesties sacred person. Mr Somerville's confession therein, was so notorious, as it may not be either qualified or denied (28). Yet, immediately after their death, all unprejudiced people doubted this business. Father Persons's Green-coat, instantly interposed thus (29). ' What say you, to the device he had of late to intrap his well deserving friend, Sir Christopher Hatton, in the matter of Hall, his Priest, whom he would have had Sir Christopher to send away, and hide, being touched, and detected in the case of Arden; therefore to have drawn in Sir Christopher himself, as Sir Charles Candish can well declare, being accessory to this plot, to overthrow Sir Christopher.' In the copy I have, there is a marginal note in MS. in an old hand, referring to Dugdale and Camden. It appears from Strype, that the mouths of the people were open on this subject (30). Camden modestly, and plainly says (31), ' That the head of Somerville was turned by certain Popish libels to such a degree, that breathing nothing but slaughter, he came up to town to kill the Queen, and, like a mad man, fell to cutting and hacking all he met. Being apprehended, he owned the design he had to kill the Queen. Upon this, himself, and, in consequence of his confession, Edward Arden, his Father-in-law, a gentleman of ancient family in Warwickshire, Mrs Arden, the wife of Mr Somerville, and Hall, a Priest, were convicted as accomplices. Three days after, Mr Somerville was found strangled in prison, the next day, Mr Arden was hanged and quartered, the Woman and Priest were spared. Such was the fate of this gentleman, who was generally thought to have fallen a victim to Leicester's resentment; being circumvented by a Priest, whose evidence destroyed him. Certain it is, Leicester hated him not without cause, because he opposed him all he could, openly inveighing against him as an adulterer, and an upstart.' Dugdale says, the inhabitants of Warwickshire who lived in those days, thought him murdered by Leicester (32); and the author of that nobleman's life, does not deny it was so (33). The authors who mention this fact, are, State Writers, Papists, or impartial Historians. The first were bound to defend it, whatever they thought of it; yet they own Somerville to have been crazy. The secular Priests flattered the government, and write on this head very artfully. Arden protested his innocence, as all the Popish writers attest. The moderate impartial Historians own without scruple, he died unjustly, and therefore we may well suppose it true. However, to clear this matter up as much as possible, let us consider a little, first, what appears as to the fact itself, and next, what credit is due to such as affirm Mr Arden to have died justly. It is suggested, that Leicester prompted the Priest, Hall, he inspired Mr Somerville with seditious notions, and thus the whole family were involved. Now all agree, that Hall was the author and mover of this treason, that he confessed and was pardoned; and Somerville, who was touched in the head, made a free confession, and was in all respects more worthy of a pardon, was destined to a shameful death, and was perhaps cruelly murdered. This has a bad aspect, and does not look like a free course of justice. Somerville was apprehended as he came, this looks as if they watched for him: But what seems to put the matter out of all doubt, is the timing of this business, just when the two Throkmortons were apprehended for conspiring to set the Queen of Scots at liberty. So that here were a gentleman and his wife, their daughter, their son-in-law, and two nephews, with Mr Somerville's maiden sister, all clapped into the Tower at once, and Mrs Arden saw her husband, and nephew, Francis Throkmorton, tortured in one day, executed within a few weeks of each other, and her husband's estate given to my Lord Leicester's creature. Does not this look like revenge on the Throkmortons whom that Earl openly persecuted? Now as to the writers. In the common chronicles we look not for the springs of action, but bare acts; we read there that Lord Robert Dudley was made an Earl, Master of the Horse, Knight of the Garter; but not a word of his murdering his wife, or Mr Arden, that would not suit the book. As to Lord Burleigh, he admits Somerville was mad. And Camden, who wrote by his directions, thought Arden a sacrifice; and, all things considered, so may we. It is one thing to write, or publish an apology, or, as Strype bluntly calls it, a State Book, as Lord Burleigh's was, and another to frame an impartial history like Camden's. That wise Nobleman did what was fit for the times in the first, and suffered what was fit for the knowledge of posterity, to be recorded in the second.

ARGALL (JOHN), author of two tracts, the one intitled De vera penitentia (a), the other Introductio ad Artem Dialecticam (b) [A], was the third son of Thomas Argall by Margaret his wife, daughter of John Talkarne of the county of Cornwall. He was born in London, and entered a student in Christ-church in Oxford towards the latter end of Queen Mary's reign. He took the degree of Master of Arts in 1565, and was Senior of the Art celebrated the eighteenth of February the same year. Afterwards he applied himself to the study of divinity, and, having taken holy orders, obtained the living of Haleworth in Suffolk. Being at a feast at Cheston, a mile distant from that

A R L O T T A, mother to William furnished the Conqueror. In ancient historians we find her called by very different names; Abbot Bromton calls her Arlet, and so does the ancient chronicle of Normandy (a); Knyghton, Arlec (b); another ancient writer Herleva (c), which one would think was her true name, most of the French historians, especially moderns, calling her Herleve. But writers are better agreed as to her family; for they say, in general, that she was a Tanner's daughter. A French author of great integrity however, reports the matter differently in all respects. He says her name was Helena, and that she was not the daughter of a Tanner, but of one Foubert, valet de chambre to the Duke of Normandy, which Foubert was the son of a Tanner (d). That she was within one descent at least of a person of that trade, appears clearly, from an insult offered to her son, when he was besieging the city of Alençon (e). Two and thirty of the inhabitants, when he came first before the place, brought certain raw hides, and tanned, or made a shew of tanning, them on the wall in his presence, as well in contempt of his power, as in derision of his birth (f). Afterwards when he became master of the place, he caused the hands and feet of those men to be cut off (g), which shews how much he was touched by this outrage. If this lady was really the daughter of the Duke's valet de chambre, yet she was bred with her grandfather the Tanner, at Falaife, an ancient, strong, and pleasant town, in the Lower Normandy. There the Dukes of that country had a palace, to which they resorted in times of peace for pleasure; and were wont to make it their constant residence in time of war, on account of it's strength. At this castle Duke Robert was in the year 1022, and being a prince of a very debonnaire disposition, was present at a place where the young maidens of the town were dancing, and there he saw the fair Arlotta, and being charmed either with her beauty or behaviour, fell desperately in love with her (h). She was brought to his bed that night, and our gravest historians, such as Bromton (i), and Knyghton (k), tell us, that when she had undrest herself, she tore her shift from the bosom down to the bottom, for which she gave this reason, That it was neither decent nor fit, that what had touched her legs, should come near the mouth of her lord (l). From this intercourse she became with child, and during her pregnancy, had a very extraordinary dream. Malmesbury, Knyghton, and other authors say, that she fancied her bowels dilated themselves over all Normandy and England (m). But Bromton and others tell us, that she saw in her sleep a tree come forth from her womb, the branches of which over-shaded Normandy (n). At the birth of the child there happened a very odd circumstance; through haste or carelessness, he was suffered to fall upon the ground, whence he took up, some say, a handful of straw (o), others of dust, which occasioned the midwife to predict, that he would be a King (p). Certain it is, that the Duke was so much taken with her company, that he kept her about him as if she had been his wife (q) [A]; till the year 1030, when he took a resolution of going to Jerusalem: a thing not infrequent in those days, in which it passed for a kind of penance. But authors seem to have a high opinion of this Prince's piety, when they gravely write, that it was to expiate his criminal conversation with Arlotta, which induced him to take so fatiguing a journey (r). Others think they have found a more probable cause, viz. regret for his brother Richard's death, whom he is said to have poisoned. However it was, at his departure, he caused his nobility to swear fealty to his son William, then a child about seven

[A] As if she had been his wife. As for this Duke of Normandy, who is usually called Robert II, the founder of the sovereignty, being styled by the French writers Robert I, though his name be commonly written Rollo, he is, by antient authors, called Rodbert, and was very remarkable for his facetious humour, as well while he continued Duke of Normandy, as in his journey to the Holy Land, which,

if the account most writers give us of his manner of living on the road be true, might with as great propriety be styled a ramble for pleasure as a pilgrimage (1). In the text we have followed the generality of Historians, and those who are most in esteem, yet there want not some authors, who tell us; the Duke took his Herleva, not from her father nor grandfather, but from the arms of a gentleman, who had seven years old (s); and having appointed the Earl of Brittany to be his guardian (notwithstanding he had set up a title to the duchy) and recommended him to the protection of the King of France, he set out on that expedition, from which he never returned, dying at Nice in Bythynia (t). His son William, on account of his birth, was surnamed the Bastard; which he was so far from esteeming a reflection, that he sometimes used it himself. As for Arlotta, she married, some say in the Duke's life-time, but most writers, after his decease, a Norman gentleman whose name was Herlaine, who had but a very small estate (u). Her son paid her always a great deal of respect, and took especial care of her children by her husband, which were three (w). 1. Eudo, or Odo, who, while a very young man, was made bishop of Bayeux, and, after his brother became King of England, Earl of Kent (x). 2. Robert Earl of Mortagne, or as is generally written by our English authors, Moreton, made by his brother Earl of Cornwall (y). 3. Emma, who married the Count D'Aumale, though some of our English authors call him Earl of Avranches, but this I conceive to have been rather his surname: by which nobleman she had a son, Hugo de Abrincis, whom the Conqueror made Earl of Chester (z).

had made choice of her for his mistress (2). Whether this be, or be not true, is not easily determined; nor indeed do we think it very necessary to determine. But as to her marriage, if that really happened before the Duke left Normandy, then we cannot but conclude that it was with his consent; and that Arlotta behaved well towards her husband, and maintained a tolerably fair character, we may deduce from the respect paid her by her son, and the great care he took of the rest of her children. E

ARMSTRONG (Sir THOMAS) who suffered for rebellion in the time of King Charles II. He was descended of an ancient and loyal family, and his father being in the King's service abroad, he was born at Nimeguen in Holland (a), but the time cannot be certainly discovered. As he grew up, he discovered a vigorous, martial disposition, which recommended him to the acquaintance and esteem of many persons of quality, who looked upon him as a man of a warm heart, and a good head. He was a very stirring and active Royalist during the exile of King Charles II, which exposed him to the malice of the Protector, Cromwell, who caused him to be confined a year in Lambeth-house, which in those times was a prison (b). He suffered greatly in this imprisonment, for the Royalists were at that time so exhausted, that how warm soever their charity might be in their hearts, it's effects were but cold, and therefore Mr Armstrong was very near sinking under this misfortune, when by some accident or other, he recovered his liberty (c). This usage, hard and cruel as it was, could neither break his spirits, nor abate his loyalty, which induced the principal friends the King had in his dominions, to make choice of him to go to his Majesty, then at Brussels, with bills of exchange of great value, and other papers of still greater importance, which commission he executed with such diligence and discretion, that he not only put the bills and papers safely into the King's hands, but brought home and delivered as safely the answers with which he was entrusted. But the Protector had so good intelligence, that within a week after he came back, he was seized and sent to the Gatehouse, where he suffered another sharp imprisonment, and was in great danger of losing his life (d). This service was so acceptable to the King when performed, that he conferred on him the honour of knighthood, and yet the remembrance of it was so far from being of any service to him in his troubles, that notwithstanding the merciful disposition of the King his master, it was thought one principal reason for taking away his life [A]. After this he was again imprisoned in the Tower, and obtained his liberty only by the death of the Protector, and on his obtaining it, returned to the service of his master, and was one of those distinguished Royalists, that signed that excellent address to the Lord General Monk, that operated so strongly in favour of the Restoration (e) [B]. On the King's return

At first sight this must appear extremely odd and strange to the reader, but it is no very difficult matter to clear it up. It is well enough known, that the Protector had abundance of spies, and that his Secretary, Thurloe, was esteemed the greatest master of intelligence that ever filled that office. But the greatest feats done in that way, were by corrupting Royalists, whom their necessities made dishonest. One Manning, who was about the King's court, was detected and shot in the Duke of Newburg's country for his treachery, and was actually caught in the fact of writing a letter to England (1). Sir Richard Willis was another loyalist, who acted the same part, and was always imprisoned by Cromwell, to hide their intelligence on the discovery of the plots in which he was engaged (2). The Duke of Buckingham was deeply suspected of behaving in this manner (3), and the great Chancellor Clarendon, openly charged with it by some persons of tolerable credit (4). We need not wonder therefore, if the King, upon some suggestion of that sort, might be brought to suspect Sir Thomas Armstrong, and on his being detected in the conspiracy for which he suffered, allow himself to believe his old suspicions were just, though they might have been stifled and forgot before that unhappy affair re-called them to his memory. Bishop Burnet tells us this story in very strong terms, and therefore it will be requisite to give it in his own words. Speaking of the severity with which Sir Thomas was treated, he says (5), 'The King had published a story all about the court, and had told it to the foreign ministers, as the reason of this extreme severity against Armstrong. He said that he was sent over by Cromwell to murder him beyond sea, and that he was warned of it, and challenged him on it, and that upon his confessing it, he had promised never to speak of it any more as long as he lived: So the King counting him now dead in law, thought he was free from that promise.' We shall hereafter have occasion to mention this subject again, when we come to speak of Sir Thomas Armstrong's dying speech; and we shall then shew, that the Bishop's story is inconsistent with that speech, notwithstanding he appeals to it.

[B] That operated so very strongly in favour of the Restoration. Upon General Monk's coming to London, it was found requisite, in order to accomplish his great design of settling the nation without effusion return he was taken into great favour, was employed in many services of importance, promoted to the rank of Lieutenant in one of the troops of horse-guards, and was Gentleman of the Horse to his Majesty (f). The heat and vehemence of his temper, betrayed him however into some excesses, and particularly into one which was extremely fatal to his reputation, and, but for the King's favour, might have been fatal also to his life. This was the killing one Mr Scroop in a play-house quarrel (g), which misfortune rendered it necessary, or at least expedient, for him to leave the kingdom, but he did it in an honourable way, and as an attendant upon the King's natural son, Mr James Crofts, afterwards so well known to the world, by the title of Duke of Monmouth. He served with him in Flanders with great reputation, and there acquired such a degree of military skill, as made him considered as an active and accomplished officer, which made him the more dear to those noblemen of a martial disposition, who attached themselves to that Duke (b). After the war was over he returned to England, and stood in all appearance in as high favour, and as great credit with the King, as ever. But this did not continue long, for the times growing troublesome, and factions arising both in the Court and Country, he had the misfortune to fall into such measures as disobliged his master, drew upon him at first his coldness and displeasure, and ended at last, in removing him from all his places, and in his total dismissal from Court. The long intercourse of friendship he had had with, and his great dependance on, the Duke of Monmouth, proved the first cause of his troubles, and in the end that of his ruin; he was naturally warm and zealous in whatever cause he engaged, and when the Court pushed the Duke extremely, in order to detach him from the party he had embraced, Sir Thomas Armstrong was indefatigable in his services and shewed so much vigour and constancy in his attachment to that unhappy Duke, as made him considered as one of his principal advisers (i) [C]. In the conferences that afterwards happened between that Duke, the effusion of blood, that all parties should make public declarations that this was their desire; that they were truly sensible, as well as heartily weary of the mutations in government to which they had been exposed, and that there was nothing they so ardently desired, as the meeting of a free and constitutional Parliament. The Royalists among the rest, declared their sentiments in the paper here referred to, and which, as it is very short, I think it may not be amiss to insert (6).

(6) Kennet's Chronicle, p. 121.

A Declaration of the Nobility and Gentry that adhered to the late King, in and about the City of London.

AFTER the miseries of a civil war, and the many and fruitless attempts towards settlement upon several interests, and imaginary forms of government. It having pleased Almighty God, by unexpected and wonderful means, to give these nations a probable hope of being restored to those laws and privileges, which have been transmitted to them from their ancestors; we do declare, that we think ourselves obliged, next to Divine Providence, to attribute this gracious work to his Excellency the Lord General Monk, who as he had the courage to assert the public liberty, and the prudence to carry it on against so many difficulties, has also had the happiness to lead us thus far through the wilderness of confusion, without passing the red sea of blood; and because the enemies of the public peace have endeavoured to represent those of the King's party, as men implacable, and such as would sacrifice the common good to their own private passions: we do sincerely profess, that we do reflect upon our past sufferings from the hands of God, and therefore do not cherish any violent thoughts or inclinations, to have been any way instrumental in them. And if the indiscretion of any spirited persons, transports them to expressions contrary to this our sense, we utterly disclaim them; and desire that the imputation may extend no farther than the folly of the offenders. And we farther declare, that we intend by our quiet and peaceable behaviour, to testify our submission to the present power, as it now resides in the council of state, in expectation of the future Parliament, upon whose wisdom and determinations, we trust God will give such a blessing, as may produce a perfect settlement both in Church and State.

And as his Excellency hath not chosen the fandy foundations of self-government, but the firm rock of national interest, whereon to frame a settlement: it is our hope and prayer, that when the building comes to be raised, it may not, like Rome, have the beginning in the blood of brethren; nor like Babel to be interrupted by the confusion of tongues; but that we may all speak in one language, and be of one name; that all mention of parties and factions, and all rancour and animosities may be thrown in and buried like rubbish under the foundation.

This declaration was subscribed by the Marquis of Dorchester, and about seventy more of the nobility and gentry, that had been in the King's service; and therefore it is a very clear testimony in favour of Sir Thomas Armstrong, who subscribed among the rest, that he was at this time considered as a very hearty friend to the constitution, and as a very loyal servant to the King his master.

[C] As one of his principal advisers.] The Duke of Monmouth, by the arts of the Earl of Shaftesbury and some other men of the same stamp, had been drawn not only to differ with the court, and to give his father, King Charles II, a great deal of uneasiness and disturbance, but had also had recourse to a abundance of popular artifices, in order to ingratiate himself with the people. At the time of the Oxford Parliament, there was an attempt made by the Earl of Shaftesbury, to have procured an alteration in the succession, in the Duke's favour. This, tho' a thing of great consequence, and in a great measure the basis of all his subsequent proceedings, is very little known, and therefore it will contribute not a little to the clearing up the Duke's, and Sir Thomas Armstrong's designs to set this matter in a full light. On March 24, 1680-1, the Earl of Shaftesbury demanded an audience of the King, then at Oxford, on pretence of a letter he had received, containing an expedient for settling the nation, and supplying the exclusion bill, to which his Majesty had shewn himself excessively averse (7). The Earl was accordingly introduced to his Majesty, and his expedient proposed, which was to settle the crown on the Duke of Monmouth. The King surprized, told the Earl he wondered, that after so many declarations to the contrary, he should press him upon that subject. That if either with conscience, or justice, or nature, he could do such a thing, he would have done it before. It being reasonable that, if he ever had a child of his own legitimate, he would much rather have him reign than his brother, or any of his brother's children. That his Majesty was none of those that grew more timorous with age; but that rather he grew more resolute, the nearer he was to his grave. At that word, the loyal Earl was mightily concerned, and cried out, that it chilled his blood to hear of such an expression; telling the King, how earnest the whole nation was for his preservation, that in him were comprized all their safeties, lives, liberties, and religion, and their all. Yes, answered his Majesty, and yet my Lord, I am the Earl of Shaftesbury, the Lord Howard, Lord Grey, and others, Sir Thomas Armstrong was very busy and assiduous, as appears by all the trials in reference to what was then called a plot, and was in reality a design against the government, which was in agitation for several months, but whether it was or was not to be attempted by force, is not extremely clear (k). The share which Sir Thomas Armstrong was supposed to have in it, was chiefly with respect to the guards, which as he had commanded, he was thought to be best acquainted with, and therefore, whenever the design of surprizing them came upon the carpet, he was principally consulted. It was said by the Attorney-General, at the trial of my Lord Ruffel, that Sir Thomas Armstrong was one of the Council of Six (l), but there was no proof of it. The matter of fact which bore hardest upon him, and which induced the government to pursue him with so much eagerness as they did, was the positive proof of his being present at the fatal meeting at Mr Sheppard's, in the latter end of October, 1682, at which meeting, a design of rising in Dorsetshire was talked of, in which Mr Trenchard had promised to assist, but then declined it, to which it seems Sir Thomas Armstrong was no stranger (m). He likewise was said to have seen a declaration, or representation of grievances, that was produced and read at this meeting, and those who discovered this plot affirmed, that he proposed the attacking the guards, and, in company with the Duke of Monmouth and Lord Grey, went to view them at the Savoy and the Meuse, and on their return reported, that the guards were very remiss in their places, and not like soldiers, and the thing was feasible if they had strength to do it (n). The Lord Ruffel himself afterwards owned, that there was some such discourse as this, but that it was a supposition only, a bare enquiry, whether the thing was possible, and not any formed or settled design [D]. But the Court had no sooner received informations of this nature against Sir Thomas, than they took all imaginable only arbitrary man in the kingdom. But assure yourselves, I intend to take a greater care of my own preservation, and that of my people, than any of you all, that pretend to so much concern for the security of my person: and yet as careful as I am of my own preservation, I would much sooner lose this life, of which you pretend to be such watchful preservers, than ever part with any of my prerogatives, or betray this place, the laws, or the religion, or alter the true succession of the crown; it being repugnant both to conscience and law. For that matter, replied the Earl, let us alone, we will make a law for it. But the King told him, My Lord, if this is your conscience, it is far from being mine, for this cannot be done without overthrowing all religion and law. And in fine, assure yourselves that, as I love my life so well as to take all the care in the world to keep it with honour, so I do not think it of so great value, after fifty, to be preserved with the forfeiture of my honour, conscience, and the laws of the land. But this flat declaration did not either satisfy the Duke or discourage the Earl who prompted him. On the contrary, they prosecuted their intrigues with greater eagerness and openness than ever. The Duke for that purpose, thought it necessary to make a tour through several parts of England, under colour of horse-races and other diversions, which alarmed the court exceedingly. An eminent historian prefaces his account of what happened in 1683, by saying (8), 'The Duke of Monmouth had been the last summer diverting himself in the country, with Sir Thomas Armstrong in his company: In his return toward London, he was taken into custody of a Serjeant at Arms at Stafford. The Duke received the message with great presence of mind, and went along with the Serjeant to London; and offered himself to Mr Secretary Jenkins to be examined, provided there were others of the council present; but the Secretary refusing to let any of the Lords attend, the Duke would not be questioned by him; so the Secretary ordered a second warrant to be drawn, for the Messenger's keeping him in longer custody, which he did from Saturday till Monday, and then the Duke was bailed before Judge Raymond: His bail were the Earl of Clare, the Lord Grey, the Lord Ruffel, William Levifon Gower, Esq; and John Offley, Esq; The first day of the term he made his appearance at the King's Bench Bar, according to his recognizance, and cleared his bail.' In all this troublesome affair, and in all the transactions the Duke of Monmouth was engaged in with his party, Sir Thomas Armstrong was constantly concerned, and carried most of his orders and messages.

[D] The thing was possible, and not any formed design.] It is necessary upon this occasion, to give a succinct account of this contrivance, against King Charles II's government, in which this gentleman was unluckily involved, the rather, because most of our

historians make themselves parties in their relations, and either wholly justify the court, or else declare the whole story of this design a forgery (9). Of these neither is to be done, because neither can be done with truth. But in regard we have not much room to spare, and as we shall be obliged to touch this subject again under various articles, we shall be very short here. The views of those who were involved in this unhappy plot, appear to have regarded three different objects; by blending and confounding these, the court lawyers endeavoured to represent all as equally guilty, of which, as they fell short in proof, it afforded room to suggest that none were guilty at all. In the first design, which was for a sort of general insurrection, in order to obtain a redress of grievances, all the Lords, and Sir Thomas Armstrong, were concerned. The second project, was the killing the King and Duke, in their passage from Newmarket London, from a malt-house that stood upon the road, and from it's being called the Rye-house, gave name to the plot. The third design was in consequence of this, for a fire happening at Newmarket, which obliged the King to leave that place suddenly and go to Cambridge, upon this, those desperate people who were in the Rye-house design, were for proceeding still, and for attacking the King and Duke in their passage to London. It is necessary to observe, that there is some confusion in the accounts we have, about the design of attacking the guards, for amongst the Lords and other persons of distinction, it had been talked of, but among the second sort of people who were engaged in the Rye-house scheme, it had been really agreed on. Bishop Burnet who certainly knew this matter as well as any man, and very probably had all he says about it, from the mouth of Lord Ruffel, gives the following account of the conversation at Sheppard's, which was fatal to that Lord, and to Sir Thomas Armstrong (10). 'The Duke of Monmouth, says he, gave an appointment to Lord Shaftesbury, or some of his friends, to meet him, and some others that he should bring along with him, at Sheppard's, a wine merchant in whom they had an entire confidence. The night before this appointment, Lord Ruffel came to town on account of his uncle's illness. The Duke of Monmouth went to him, and told him of the appointment, and desired he would go thither with him: he consented the rather, because he intended to taste some of that merchant's wine. At night they went with Lord Grey, and Sir Thomas Armstrong. When they came, they found none there, but Rumfey and Ferguson, two of Lord Shaftesbury's tools that he employed: Upon which they seeing no better company, resolved immediately to go back. But Lord Ruffel called for a taste of the wines, and while they were bringing it him up, Rumfey and Armstrong fell into a discourse of surprizing the guards. Rumfey fancied it might be easily done: Armstrong, that had commanded imaginable pains to get him into their hands, but he having timely notice of the discoveries made against him, made his escape, and concealed himself for some time in England, during which he was so uneasy, that Mr Hampden, who visited him, was of opinion, he would then have discovered any thing to save his life, but either Mr Hampden was mistaken, or Sir Thomas changed his sentiments afterwards, and that in a very great degree, since he shewed infinitely more courage when in custody, and even to his last breath, than any who were engaged with him in that weak and rash design (o). After some time spent, with as much secrecy as possible in England, he withdrew into Holland, and passed by the name of Mr Henry Lawrence, and there thought himself safe, but Mr Chudleigh, King Charles's Minister there, obtaining a warrant from the States, for apprehending such of the conspirators as had fled from England; he was seized at Leyden by the Schout of that place, an officer not unlike our Sheriff, who delivered him up to the King's Minister for a present of five thousand guilders, which is about five hundred pounds of our money (p), and he was then put on board the King's yacht called the Catharine, Captain Davies, Commander, in order to be sent to England. He must have been in great confusion, otherwise he might certainly have preserved his life; since, as he was a native of Holland, the States, if they had been informed of it in time, would undoubtedly have protected him (q); but he was hurried on board by the great industry of the Minister, who was very desirous of making his court at home, by giving so strong a proof of his zeal and diligence, as he knew the seizing of Sir Thomas Armstrong would be accounted. While this unfortunate gentleman was in Holland, an indictment was preferred against him in London, for high-treason, upon which he was outlawed, and upon his being brought home, it was resolved to proceed against him upon this outlawry, without allowing him the benefit of a trial (r). It was with this view, that immediately on his arrival in England, a warrant was granted for his commitment to Newgate, by Sidney Godolphin, Esq; Secretary of State (afterwards Earl of Godolphin, and Lord High-Treasurer of England). This warrant was dated 10 June, 1684 (s), and upon the fourteenth of the same month, he was carried up to the King's-Bench-Bar at Westminster, where Sir Robert Sawyer, then Attorney-General, moved the court for an award of execution upon the outlawry. The Lord Chief Justice Jefferies on his motion ordered Sir Thomas Armstrong to be arraigned on the outlawry, and demanded of him what he had to say, Why execution should not be awarded: he pleaded the statute of 6 Ed. VI, by which it was provided, that if a person outlawed, who was beyond the seas, rendered himself to the Chief Justice of England within one year, he might traverse the indictment, or appeal, and have the benefit of a trial, which he claimed, by rendering himself there at the bar within the year. The Lord Chief Justice however, being of opinion that his case was not within the statute, because he did not yield himself voluntarily, but was brought to the bar in custody, was for awarding execution. Sir Thomas demanded council upon the point of law, which was refused him. He then observed, that the King had been pleased to offer Holloway the benefit of a trial, if he desired it, who was exactly in the same case with himself. To this the Lord Chief Justice answered, that what was done for Holloway, was purely through the grace and mercy of the King, who might extend the same favour to him if he thought fit, but that this was not the business of a court of law (t). The Attorney-General interposed, and said, that the prisoner deserved no indulgence or mercy from the King, because it had appeared by the evidence given on the late conspiracy, that after the fire at Newmarket had disappointed the Rye-house scheme of killing the King, this gentleman was one of the persons, that actually engaged to go, upon the King's hasty coming to town, and to destroy him by the way (u). The Lord Chief Justice interrupted the Attorney upon this, and told him, that they could not consider evidence but the outlawry, upon which he awarded execution on the Friday following. There were many circumstances of apparent hardship in Sir Thomas's case. At the time he was taken he was stripped of his money, so that when the Privy-Council offered to hear Lawyers on his behalf, he could not procure Council, having no money to fee them (w). He was in a manner hurried out of his life, for on the tenth of June, 1684, he was committed to Newgate; on the twelfth he was brought before the Council: this proceeding at the King's-Bench-Bar, was on the fourteenth, and the day fixed for his execution was the twentieth. He was loaded with irons in Newgate, where he was closely confined, and ill treated, the jaylor striking his daughter, Mrs Catharine Armstrong, while on her knees asking him blessing (x). His other daughter, Mrs Matthews, was committed by the Lord Chief Justice in court, for expressing some impatience at her father's usage, but she was afterwards discharged without paying fees (y). The worst of all was, the brutal manner in which the Chief Justice himself behaved, for, upon upon Sir Thomas's saying that he ought to have the benefit of the law, and that he demanded no more, Jefferies, with great great indecency, answered, That you shall have, by the grace of God. See that execution be done on Friday next, according to law. You shall have the full benefit of the law (z). Yet the point on which the prisoner depended, and

The chief reason why the King suffered this gentleman to be so hardly treated, was expressed by the Attorney-General, as has been before shewn; but there were besides some other reasons, with which we shall not leave the reader unacquainted [G]. [E] Paper tendered to the Chief Justice, and Attorney-General. This paper was presented by the Lady Armstrong, on the behalf of her husband, to the Lord Keeper North, the Lord Chief Justice Jeffries, and Sir Robert Sawyer; and ran in the following terms (11), viz. 'My Lord, I am informed, that, by the common law of England, any man that was out-lawed in felony or treason, might bring a Writ of Error, to reverse his outlawry; which was to be granted, ex Debito Justitiæ. Tho' it may be the manner of suing for such a Writ of Error to the King, might be by way of petition, (as in a petition, or Remonstrance de Droit, for lands, &c.) and so it was resolved, in Ninian Melvin's Case, Co. 4. Inf. 215.

'Next, by the common law, if any man were in England, at the time of the Exigent awarded, and went out of the realm after that, and before the outlawry pronounced, he could never assign that for error, that he was beyond-sea at the time of the pronouncing the outlawry; and the reason is, because he was here at the time of the awarding of the Exigent, and might reasonably have notice of it.

'On the other side, if any were out of England, during the whole process and pronouncing of the outlawry, it was never yet a doubt, but that was an error, and might be assigned for error, either by the party, or his heir, at the common law, and so continues to this day; and was not long since adjudged in O'Kerney's case, the Irishman, who came in about two years after the outlawry.

'Then comes the Statute of 5 and 6 Edw. VI. Cap. ii. and enlarges the law for the benefit of the outlawed person, and gives him liberty to assign for error, That he was beyond-sea, at the time of the outlawry pronounced; which he could not do by common law before the statute: and so continues.

'Then comes the proviso, and says, That he must come in within a year, and render himself to be entitled to the benefit of that Act; which was, to assign for error, that he was beyond-sea at the time of the outlawry pronounced.

'So that, my Lord, upon this short state of the law, and my husband's case, he being beyond-sea all the time of the process, and at the time of the outlawry pronounced; it is conceived, he is well entitled to assign this for error at the common law, without any aid of the statute, though the proviso in that statute should be ruled against him: which (with submission) is the opinion of many learned persons in the law, That he is within the intent and meaning of that proviso, for many reasons, too long to trouble your Lordship with now.

'Therefore, I do hope, that this case of my husband, being the first case that any man was executed upon an outlawry, (that did not desire it) (12), may have that weight with your Lordship, that it deserves; and do hope, that your Lordship will fo advise the King, in matter of law, (whose Council you are) that my husband may have a Writ of Error granted him, and Council assigned him to argue these points, as the law has allowed to criminals in capital cases, with whatsoever else shall appear upon the record of outlawry produced, which as yet my husband, or any for him, never saw!

[F] Where prisoners have been admitted to trial. The statute of which this gentleman claimed the benefit, was as clear and express as any thing could be, as may appear by the following clauses read at his trial (13). 'All process of outlawry hereafter, to be made and had within this Realm, against any offenders in treason, being resistant or inhabitant out of the limits of this realm, or in any the parts beyond the sea, at the time of the outlawry produced against them, shall be as good and effectual in the law to all intents and purposes; as

'if any such offenders had been resident and dwelling within this realm, at the time of such process awarded, and outlawry pronounced.

'Provided always, and be it enacted by the authority aforesaid, That if the party so hereafter be outlawed, shall within one year next after the said outlawry pronounced, or judgment given upon the said outlawry, yield himself unto the Chief Justice of England, for the time being, and offer to traverse the indictment or appeal, whereupon the said outlawry shall be pronounced as is aforesaid: That then he shall be received to the said traverse, and being thereupon found not guilty, by the verdict of twelve men, he shall be clearly acquitted and discharged of the said outlawry, and of all penalties and forfeitures by reason of the same, in as large and ample manner and form, as though no such outlawry had been made? any thing herein contained to the contrary, in any wise notwithstanding.'

Yet it does not appear, that ever this point was fully and clearly settled till very lately, and that in the following case (14). King and Johnson, Mich. 2 Geo. II. B. R. the prisoner, was allowed to be within the benefit of the proviso; and though he had escaped out of prison, and was re-taken in England, was admitted to prove himself beyond-sea, at the time of the outlawry; and, upon proving that he was then at Middleburgh in Zealand, his outlawry was reversed, and he admitted to a trial and acquitted: and on this occasion Armstrong's case was declared a precedent not fit to be followed.

[G] We shall not leave the reader unacquainted. There are three causes assigned for the King's severity, towards the unfortunate Sir Thomas Armstrong. I. That he had been employed by Cromwell, to assassinate him while abroad, which it seems had come to Sir Thomas Armstrong's ear; but as we shall see in the next note, it is far from being certain, either that the King actually believed this, or that Sir Thomas thought he believed it. II. The reason assigned by the Attorney-General, which was, that he was deep in the design against his person; and of this, the Lord Howard gave the following account upon oath. 'Upon reflection, I am apt to think, that from this time (October 1683) and not before, the design of way-laying the King, in his return to London, was first meditated, and I am the more confirmed in this opinion, from the consideration of the behaviour of the Duke of Monmouth, and the Lord Grey, who seemed to be very big of expectation, of some great thing to be attempted upon the day of the King's coming from Newmarket; upon which day Sir Thomas Armstrong was not to be found, till the King's coaches were come into town, and I do verily believe, he was to have headed the party.' Col. Rumsley, as soon as he heard of Armstrong's being taken, made oath in these words: 'Sir Thomas Armstrong did come to me the Sunday night after the fire at Newmarket, and told me that he just came from Ferguson; and notwithstanding the King and Duke were to return so soon, yet Ferguson did not doubt by that time to have men ready to do the business, and desired me to go with him to Ferguson's lodgings in his coach, which I did. When I came there, Ferguson told me the same, but that they wanted money. Upon which Sir Thomas desired me to lend some, and he would see me repaid; and added, that if he had been in stock, he would have done it himself.' Bishop Sprat, who by order of the King wrote the History of this Conspiracy, having mentioned these facts, proceeds thus very probably by his Majesty's direction (15). 'After this, the King could not think himself in the least bound to go out of the way of the law, for shewing any distinguishing act of grace to Sir Thomas Armstrong, especially when it is manifest there was scarce a man living, who had more personal obligations to his Majesty, than he had, and twentieth of June, about nine in the morning, the Sheriffs of London and Middlesex came to Newgate, and demanded their prisoner, who was immediately put into a sledge, and drawn to the place of execution, attended by a numerous guard. He employed the time he was drawing to Tyburn, in reading The Whole Duty of Man, till he came within sight of the gallows, and then he laid it by, and with lifted-up hands and eyes, addressed himself to Heaven, till he came beneath the tree, where he remained about a quarter of an hour in the sledge; before he ascended the cart that stood ready for him, he desired the Sheriff to admit Dr Tenison to come to him, and having delivered a paper to the Sheriff, the Doctor kneeled down with the prisoner, and prayed with him about a quarter of an hour, during all which time, the prisoner preserved a becoming and heroic countenance, little daunted with the terror of that fate he was in view of; but rising from his devotions, he pulled off his cravat and hat, which he gave to his servant who attended him, and had followed him by the sledge side, when kneeling down himself, he prayed for a short time with fervency and devotion, begging pardon of his God for those manifold and crying sins he had been too often guilty of, and concluded with a resignation of himself to the God of Heaven and Earth, before whose judgment-seat he was forthwith to appear, desiring that the whole world would forgive him, with whom he hoped he died in peace and charity. Having thus ended these devotions, he again stood up, and putting off his perriwig, he had a white cap delivered to him, which he put on; and being soon after tied up, the chief of his discourse was addressed to a gentleman who stood by him; and after a short space, holding up his hands, he again renewed his prayers; his visage little changing all the time, till the very moment the cart drew away; the executioner having pulled the cap over his eyes, he continued his prayers all the time, and even whilst he hung, as long as life was in him, and he had the command of his lips: after he had hung about half an hour, and the executioner had divested him of his apparel, he was cut down according to his sentence, his privy members burnt, his head cut off and shewed to the people as that of a traitor, his heart and bowels taken out, and committed to the flames, and his body quartered into four parts, which, with his head, were conveyed back to Newgate, to be disposed of according to his Majesty's pleasure; and were afterwards publicly exposed (b), his head being set upon Westminster-Hall, between those of Cromwell and Bradshaw, one of his quarters upon Temple-Bar, two others at Aldersgate and Aldgate, and the fourth was sent down to Stafford, for which town he had served in Parliament (c). The paper he delivered to the Sheriffs, contains in it several curious particulars worthy of notice, and as it has been very imperfectly printed elsewhere, we have preserved it in the notes (d) [H].

and yet no man had made more ungrateful returns for them than he had done. Nor could his Majesty forget how many other persons, and some very near his Majesty, Sir Thomas Armstrong had been the chief instrument of perverting, upon which account, his Majesty had reason to look on him as the author of many more treasons besides his own. This seems to be clear and satisfactory, and is most like to have been the true ground of the King's proceeding. III. But Bishop Burnet, gives quite another turn to this; he says (16), The Court had a mind to proceed in a summary way with him, that he should, by the hurry of it, be driven to say any thing that could save him. This is visibly that Prelate's own conjecture, and the reader, will not think it very probable; if he considers, that Sir Thomas Armstrong, who was the last person executed for this conspiracy, could therefore say very little that was not known before; and that he never appears to have had the least offer of mercy made him.

(17) From a MS. belonging to the late Mr Grainger of the India House.

I THANK Almighty God, though I have had but a short time allowed me, I find myself prepared for death, and my thoughts set on another world; and I trust in God's mercy, I am well weaned from setting my heart on this: Yet I cannot but give so much of my little time to set down in writing, my answers to some calumnies raised since my close imprisonment, as well as what Mr Attorney accused me of at the bar. I was told a very great person said, I was a spy of Cromwell's. I was sent from England by the best and considerablest friends the King had then, with bills of exchange, and letters of very great importance, to his Majesty at Brussels; I appeal to his Majesty if I delivered them not safe, and his answer to them, when I returned; which I had not been above six days, but I was clapped up a close Prisoner in the Gatehouse, and in extreme danger of my life, for that journey. Before this, I had been a year in Lambeth house a prisoner; and after a prisoner in the Tower, when the Usurper died, and near starving in every one of them: very ill treatment for a spy and a pensioner! My Lord of Oxford, and many others of quality, will, I think, testify my innocence in this point. I protest before God, I was never a spy or pensioner to Cromwell or any other man. On Saturday last, I was brought down to the King's-Bench-Bar, on an outlawry for high-treason: I was asked what I had to say for myself, that judgment of death should not pass? I answered, that I was beyond sea when the outlawry came out; I thought the law allowed a writ of error to reverse it: I prayed I might be allowed a trial for my life according to the laws of the land; I urged the statute of Edward VI, which was express for it; but it signified nothing: I was condemned and made a precedent, though Mr Holloway a little before had offered him. I cannot but think all the world will conclude my case very different: And why was it refused me? Mr Attorney accused me there, for being one of those that were to kill the King, as soon as he came back from Newmarket after the fire. I take God to witness, I never was in any design to take away the King's life: neither had any man the impudence to propose so base and barbarous a thing to me: neither was I ever in any design to alter the government of England. What I am accused of, I know no otherwise than by reports and prints: which I take to be uncertain, so that it cannot be expected I should make particular answers to them. If I had been tried, I could have proved my Lord Howard's base reflections upon me, to be a notorious falsehood: for there are at least ten gentlemen, besides all the servants in the house, can prove I dined there that day.

I have lived and now die of the reformed religion, a true and sincere Protestant, and in the communion of the Church of England. I have found the great comfort of the love and mercy of God, in and through my Blessed Redeemer, in whom I only trust; and I do verily hope, I am going to partake of that fulness of joy, which I believe is in his presence; the hopes whereof do infinitely please me. I thank

God,

We are informed by Bishop Burnet, that he prepared another paper (e), but thought fit to lay it aside, for reasons with which that Prelate seems to have been well acquainted; and which are likewise of such a nature, as that they deserve to be considered [I]. The characters given of him are very different, and yet it is very hard to say, whether his friends or enemies have used him worst, which shews how dangerous a thing it is, to rely on such writers as are entirely governed by party, and are influenced in what they relate, not by facts but notions. It is however requisite that the readers should see these characters, that he may be able to judge for himself, as to the truth of this observation [K]. After the Revolution, all the proceedings on the Rye-house conspiracy were

‘ God, I have no repining at my heart for the condition my sins have most deservedly brought me to: I have deserved much worse at the hands of God: so that I cheerfully submit to this punishment, as being taken off, but a small time sooner. I do freely forgive all the world, even those concerned in taking away my life. As for the sentence of death passed upon me, I cannot but think it a very hard one; being denied the law of the land as I think. To conclude, as I never had any design against the King’s life, or the life of any man; so I was never in any design to alter the government. I die in charity with all the world; and therefore, I heartily pray God to bless the Church of Christ every where, these poor nations, and the King’s Majesty; and I heartily commend my soul to God’s infinite mercy, thro’ my blessed Saviour Jesus Christ.’

[I] They deserve to be considered. In the first place, it is very evident from the drift of Sir Thomas’s speech, which is very serious, solemn, and well suited to the occasion, that he does by no means come up to what Bishop Burnet asserts was his meaning. For after the story transcribed from him in a former note (18), as to what the King should say of his being employed by Cromwell to murder him, that relate proceeds thus, (19) Armstrong took this heavily, and in one paper which I saw written in his own hand, the resentments upon it were sharper than I thought became a dying penitent. So when that was represented to him he changed it: and in the paper he gave the Sheriffs he had softened it much. But yet he shewed the falsehood of that report. One cannot but stand amazed at this, when one considers the speech itself, in which, as the reader sees, there is not one word about his being charged with a design of killing the King when he went to him at Brussels, or any thing like it. All that it appears from his speech Sir Thomas Armstrong had heard, was his being charged with acting as a spy for Cromwell, which was (as he says) reported of him by a very great person, but plainly not the King, for it is to the King he appeals for his justification in this very point. As to another observation of the Bishop’s, that it was this passage in Armstrong’s speech, that hindered the court from ordering observations to be made on it, as had been made on other speeches; it is a very unnatural conjecture, since if the King had told such a story, he would certainly have justified, or else have directed Bishop Sprat to have mentioned it in that part of his history of the conspiracy, in which he particularly mentions the case of Armstrong. As to the real cause of the court’s publishing no reflections on this speech, I really conceive it to have been the modesty, plainness, and loyalty of the discourse, that hindered it’s being animadverted upon. Sir Thomas Armstrong disavows the knowledge of any design against the King’s life, but says nothing of the discourse about the guards. He thought, like Lord Russell, that attacking the guards, because not established by act of Parliament, was neither levying war, or compassing his death in the eye of the law. He likewise affirms, that he was in no conspiracy for subverting the government. One would suppose therefore, the Duke of Monmouth was in no such schemes either, and that this was what provoked the Earl of Shaftesbury to withdraw to Holland, as finding his friends differing from each other’s opinion, and pursuing various ends, which he knew must issue in disappointing them all. It should seem therefore on the whole, if we give entire credit to Sir Thomas’s speech (as indeed we ought) I say it should seem as if the Duke of Monmouth and his friends, had formed some such design as proved fatal to Robert, Earl of Essex, in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, and this justifies the distinction we made before, of the stages and several schemes of those who were involved in this unlucky contrivance. But with respect to Sir Thomas’s complaint as to his hard treatment, take it in any light and it must be allowed to be well founded: The offering Holloway his trial in the same condition, makes the case still harder, and if the Attorney-General’s proofs were so clear, that made it no less hard; as on the other hand, if Sir Thomas could have falsified Lord Howard’s evidence, that made it hardest of all. But what shews there was some particular rancour against Armstrong, was the indicting Mr Joseph Hayes (20) for remitting him one hundred and fifty pounds when in Holland though outlawed, and trying him for high-treason, in which, however the proof failed, Mr Hayes was acquitted.

(20) State Trials, Vol. III. p. 1067.

[K] As to the truth of this observation. It was a point of great consequence to the government, to convince the nation of the truth of this conspiracy, and therefore the King not only published a very solemn declaration, in which he set forth most of the particulars, and ordered it to be read in churches, that the people in all parts of his dominions might be thoroughly informed of what it was desired they should know, but afterwards desired Dr Sprat, Bishop of Rochester, to write the history of it, which he did with so much accuracy and elegance, that, except it be that of Cataline, there is not perhaps a more finished piece of this kind extant. His Lordship is particularly nice in his characters, and that which he has given to Sir Thomas Armstrong is conceived in the following words. ‘ Sir Thomas Armstrong a debauched atheistical bravo, one of those, who, with an hypocrisy peculiar to this age, would have passed for the most forward reformers in Church and State, whilst they themselves, both in their practice and opinions, were the greatest corrupters of virtue and all good manners (21).’ Throughout the whole of that history, his Lordship represents him as the most steady, and the most daring of all who were concerned in this design; and at the very last, when all their schemes were broken, insisting, that if but a thousand men could be got together, with the Duke of Monmouth at their head, there might still be something done, adding, that at the worst it was better to die like men, than to be hanged like dogs (22). —

(21) Hist of the Rye-house plot, p. 22.

There is plainly in this character, a mixture of great as well as bad qualities, and if we consider the view with which the Bishop wrote, and his being immediately under the influence of the King, for his history was finished in the reign of Charles II, tho’ published in that of King James; I say, if we consider this, we cannot but allow, that whoever reads this character, will have no mean or despicable opinion of the gentleman on whom it is bestowed. But let us now see what Bishop Burnet says of him, who professed a perfect acquaintance with all who were concerned in this affair, which he treats more at large, and with apparently greater labour than any other transaction mentioned in his first volume. ‘ Sir Thomas Armstrong, says he, was trusted in every thing by the Duke of Monmouth, and he having led a very vicious life, the court hoped, that he not being able to bear the thoughts of dying, would have discovered every thing. He shewed such a dejection of mind while he was concealing himself, before he escaped out of England, that Hampden, who saw him at that time, told me, he believed he would certainly do any thing that would save his life. Yet all were disappointed in him, for when he was examined before the council, he said he knew of no plot but the Popish plot, he desired he might have a fair trial for his life, which was all he asked (23). — His carriage during his imprisonment and at his death, was far beyond what could have been imagined, he turned himself wholly to the thoughts of God, and of another state, and was praying continually. He rejoiced that he was brought to die in such a manner, he said it was scarce possible for him to have been awakened into a due sense of his sins, by any other method. His pride, and his resentments, were then were taken up with great warmth, and an enquiry was set on foot, to discover who were the promoters of the deaths of Lord Ruffel, Colonel Sidney, and Sir Thomas Armstrong, which, without regard to the form of law that attended them, were in those days styled murders. Dame Catharine Armstrong, who was the Earl of Clarendon's niece (f), shewed a great deal of zeal in prosecuting such as had been concerned in bringing her husband to an ignominious end, and for that purpose, presented on the twelfth of November, 1689, a petition to the House of Commons, in the name of herself and her daughters; upon which a Committee was appointed to examine the matter, and to make their report to the House (g). They came also the same day to a resolution, that it should be an instruction to the same Committee, that they should enquire, who were the Judges that gave the sentence against Sir Thomas Armstrong, who were the prosecutors of him, and who had his estate, and how the petitioners may have reparation; and also to examine, what proceedings were in order to a Writ of Error by him desired, and how it came to be denied, and by whom. This affair being taken up with so much heat, and the committee being particularly directed to make their report with all convenient speed, one might naturally expect this inquiry would have been attended with consequences of an extraordinary nature. The report indeed, which was made on the nineteenth of November, promised as much. It was made by Mr Christy, who informed the House, that upon a full enquiry, the Committee had come to the resolutions mentioned in the notes [L]. There was about the same time an inquiry set on foot in the House of Lords, to inspect who were the advisers and prosecutors of the murders of Lord Ruffel, Colonel Sidney, Sir Thomas Armstrong, Alderman Cornish, and others, before whom several persons were examined, and amongst them Dame Catharine Armstrong, widow of Sir Thomas, Mrs Jane Matthews, and Mrs Catharine Armstrong, his daughter, but they proved no more, than the refusing the writ of error, and the bad usage Sir Thomas had met with, so that it was not looked upon as sufficient evidence to ground any parliamentary proceeding upon, in regard to Sir Thomas, though the other attainders were reversed (b). On the twentieth of January, 1689, Mr Christy reported from the Committee to whom the bill for reversing the attainder of Sir Thomas Armstrong was committed, that they had made some amendments to the bill, had discovered who were his prosecutors, and what losses were sustained by his family, upon which Sir Richard Holloway, Sir Francis Wythins, the executors of the late Lord Jefferies, the executors of the late Mr Justice Walcot, Mr Graham, and Mr Burton, were ordered to attend the House, and Mrs Matthews being called in and examined, charged Sir Robert Sawyer, who at the time of the prosecution was Attorney-General, and then a member of the House, with being one of the prosecutors of her father, upon which, after she was withdrawn, he was heard in his place, as to what he was able to offer in his own defence, and then withdrew (i). The House upon a debate resolved, that his name should be added to the rest of the prosecutors of Sir Thomas Armstrong, and at the same time expelled him the House. On the twenty-fifth of the same month, Sir Francis Wythins, Sir Richard Holloway, Mr Graham, and Mr Burton, were examined, and the executors of the late Lord Jefferies were likewise called in, and asked what they had to say, Why reparation should not be made out of the estate of the late Lord Jefferies to the family of Sir Thomas Armstrong, for the losses they had sustained by his attainder. No persons appearing as executors to the late Mr Justice Walcot, the House was acquainted that he died intestate, and that he had not left an estate sufficient to pay his debts (k). After all these persons had been heard and withdrawn, Mr Blaney was called in, who gave the House a large account of the proceedings in the court of King's-Bench, on the awarding execution against Sir Thomas Armstrong upon the outlawry. The House then proceeded upon the amendments made by the Committee to the bill, and after inserting the name of Sir Robert Sawyer, Knt. as a prosecutor, they resolved, that the sum of five thousand pounds should be paid by the Judges and prosecutors of Sir Thomas Armstrong to his widow and children, as a recompence for the losses they had sustained, by reason of his attainder, and upon a debate, the bill was recommitted to the same Committee (l). But notwithstanding all these vigorous resolutions, there followed nothing from them, for the session of Parliament soon after ended (m); and so the bill was lost; and a new Parliament being called in the succeeding year, in which there was nothing done in matters of this nature; so that the attainder remained in full force, and the family of Sir

' so entirely conquered, that one who saw him, said to me, that it was not easy to think it was the same person whom he had known formerly; he received the sacrament, and died in so good a temper, and with so much quiet in his mind, and in so serene a deportment, that we have scarce known in our time a more eminent instance of the grace and mercy of God (24).' It is I think hard to decide, which of the two Prelates used him worst.

[L] The resolutions mentioned in the note. The resolutions to which the Committee came, were these that follow, viz.

' I. That Sir Thomas Armstrong's plea ought to have been admitted according to the statute of

Edw. VI. and that the execution of him, upon the attainder by outlawry, was illegal and a murder, by pretence of justice.

' II. That the executors and heirs of Sir Thomas Armstrong, ought to have a reparation of their losses, out of the estates of those that were his judges and prosecutors.

' III. That a Writ of Error for the reversal of a judgment in felony or treason, is the right of the subject, and ought to be granted at his desire, and is not an Act of Grace or Favour, which may be denied or granted at pleasure.'

To all which Resolves the House agreed.

Sir Thomas Armstrong under all the difficulties brought upon them by it, till in the sixth of William and Mary, it was reversed upon a writ of error (n) in the King's-Bench, in which the error assigned was, that the record of the outlawry did not mention where the court of Hustings was held, in which he was outlawed, the words pro civitate London; being omitted. Of this error Sir Thomas himself might have taken advantage, if he could have obtained such a writ, but the doctrine in law then was, that a writ of error was a writ of grace, and therefore the Lord Keeper North said, it was not in him, but in the King to grant it; so that the subject gained this advantage, by the parliamentary enquiry beforementioned, viz. that the House of Commons by their resolution established the contrary doctrine, That a writ of error is a writ of right, and not of favour, which may be granted or denied at pleasure (o).

The House being at the same time acquainted, that the Committee had received an account, that at the time of his decease, Sir Thomas Armstrong stood possessed of 300*l.* per annum real estate, bonds and securities for 4800*l.* and an annuity of 500*l.*

Ordered,

‘ That leave be given to bring in a bill to reverse the attainder of the said Sir Thomas Armstrong, and to make reparation to his widow and children, out of the estates of the judges and profecutors, and that the Bill do pass without fees (25).’

ARNULPH or EARNULPH or ERNULPH, Bishop of Rochester in the reign of King Henry I, was a Frenchman by birth, and for some time a Monk of St Lucian de Beauvais. Observing some irregularities among his brethren, which he could neither remedy nor endure, he resolved to quit the monastery; but first he took the advice of Lanfranc Archbishop of Canterbury, under whom he had studied in the abbey of Bec (a). That Prelate, who was well acquainted with his merit, invited him over into England, and placed him in the monastery of Canterbury, where he lived till Lanfranc's death. Afterwards, when Anselm came into that See, Arnulph was made Prior of the monastery of Canterbury [A], and afterwards Abbot of Peterborough (b) [B]. In 1115, he was consecrated Bishop of Rochester, in the room of Radulphus or Ralph, removed to the See of Canterbury [C]. He sat nine years and a few days, and died in March 1124, aged eighty-four (c). This Prelate wrote a book concerning the foundation, endowment, charters, laws, and other things relating to the church of Rochester [D]. There are extant besides, Tomellus, five Epistola Ernulfi

[A] He was made Prior of the monastery of Canterbury.] Part of the cathedral church of Canterbury, built by Archbishop Lanfranc, being fallen to the ground, Arnulph re-built it, and beautified it with fine glass windows, a pavement of marble, and a painted roof; insomuch, that it exceeded all the churches in England in magnificence. This we learn from William of Malmfbury. Cantiae dejectam priorem partem ecclesie, quam Lanfrancus ædificaverat, adeo splendide erexit, ut nihil tale possit in Anglia videri, in vitrearum fenestrarum luce, in marmorei pavimenti nitore, in diversicoloribus picturis, quæ mirantes oculos trahunt ad fastigia lacunarum (1).

[B] — and afterwards Abbot of Peterborough.] Malmfbury tells us, he increased the number of monks in that monastery, and regulated their behaviour: he likewise cleared away the rubbish of the old convent, which was fallen into ruins, and had almost built a new one; but a sudden fire destroyed all he had done, and, before he could repair the damage, he was removed to the See of Rochester. In Burgo Monachorum numerus auctus, religio bonis moribus confuta; Ædium veterum ruderibus deturbatis, nova fundamenta jacta, culmina erecta. Eaque omnia cum vorax ignis absussisset, meditantî reficere, bonos pontificalis impetratus (2).

[C] He was consecrated Bishop of Rochester.] On the day of his election, he related to the monks of Rochester a vision he had had a few days before, acquainting him with his approaching election into that See. The story is told us by a contemporary writer as follows. ‘ Qui omni favore a suis acceptus, ipso die electionis sue dixit nobis: “ Sciebam, inquit, Fratres, ante paucos dies me licet indignum ad celsitudinem hujus ordinis in proximo promovendum. Apparuit enim mihi dormienti, cum adhuc essem in loco meo, pater Gundulfus annulum magni ponderis mihi offerens. Cumque ad gravitatem ipsius imbecillitas mea non sufficere videretur, me ad onus ejus stupidum et accipere renuente, tem increpavit, et post increpationem annulum me recipere coegit; deinde non apparuit.” Hæc ille, Nos autem qui præsentibus ab eo hæc audivimus, intelleximus postea non fantasticam esse illusionem, quam vir sanctus in somnis viderat; quia postmodum factus Rossensis Episcopus, eundem annulum. re-cepit, quem Gundulfus Episcopus vivens Radulfo ad huc abbati sed futuro Episcopo dederat (3). — Arnulph being received by the Monks with all marks of respect, said to us on the very day of his election: “ Brethren, I had assurance given me a few days ago, that, unworthy as I am, I should soon be raised to the dignity now conferred upon me. For as I slept one night, Gundulfus (*) appeared to me, offering me a ring of great weight; which being too heavy for me, I refused to accept it: but he, chiding me for my stupidity in rejecting his present, obliged me to receive it, and then disappeared.” This he related to us; and we were convinced it was no fantastical illusion, which the holy man had seen in his sleep, since, being made Bishop of Rochester, he received that very ring, which Bishop Gundulfus, when alive, had given to Ralph, then an Abbot, but afterwards Bishop.’ Malmfbury tells us, that, tho' the long life of Gundulfus, and the care he took of his church, had scarce left any thing for his successors to do, yet that Arnulph made daily improvements in his Sec. Ibi quavis omnia jam facta viderentur (prævenerat enim vivacitas Gundulphi omnium successorum diligentiam) tamen semper aliquid comminisci, ubi virtus emittescere posset; firmare antiqua, moliri recentia (4).

[D] He wrote an history of the church of Rochester.] It is generally known by the name of Textus Rossensis, and is preserved in the archives of the cathedral church of Rochester. Mr Wharton, in his Anglia Sacra (5), has published an extract of this history, under the title of *Ernulphi Episcopi Rossensis Collectanea de Rebus Ecclesie Rossensis, a Prima Sedis Fundatione ad sua Tempora. [E] Tomellus, sive Epistola, &c.] This letter was written in answer to a question proposed to Arnulph by Walkelin, in a conversation which they had at Canterbury upon this subject; Whether a woman, who had committed adultery with her husband's son by a former wife, ought to be separated from her husband. Arnulph maintained the affirmative, and Walkelin the negative. In this letter Arnulph endeavours to shew, that all the passages of Scripture, in which divorce is prohibited, are to be understood of a voluntary separation between persons not guilty of adultery. And in confirmation of his own opinion, he alleges farther, that it was the practice of the ancient Church to prohibit the use of marriage for ever to adulterers. He asserts, that there is no injustice in separating a man from his wife for a crime, in which he himself is no way concerned (7).

[F] Epistola Solutiones quasdam continens, &c.] This Letter is an answer to five questions proposed by Lambert. The first is, ' Why the Eucharist was then given in a manner different, and almost contrary to that which Christ practised; it being the custom at that time to administer the Host dipped in wine, whereas our Saviour gave the bread and wine separately?' Arnulph replies, that our Saviour prescribed to mankind, what was necessary for the obtaining salvation, without mentioning the particular manner and circumstances of his injunctions: and that this is the reason why several practices, which were in use in the Primitive Church, had been a long time discontinued. The second question is, ' Why a third part of the Host is put into the chalice?' He answers, that this custom was introduced, that the Bishop, or Priest, who celebrated, might communicate of that part, which he put into the chalice, and distribute the two others to the Deacon and Subdeacon, who were present. He adds a mystical reason for this practice; namely, that the body of Jesus Christ, which is offered upon the altar, is the sacrament or figure of the mystical body of Christ, which is composed of three orders, Superiors, Virgins, and Married Persons; or because it represents the mystery of the Trinity; or the three estates of our Saviour, his mortality, his death, and his resurrection. The third question is, ' Why the blood of Christ is received separately from his body, and why it is administered without the body?' The answer is, that those who receive the Sacrament in both kinds separately, do it in imitation of our Saviour; and that tho' the body of Christ is received entire under each species, yet each species is received separately; because our Saviour has distinguished these two things, in order to represent to us, by the bread, his body such as it appeared, solid and entire; and, by the wine, his blood which was shed upon the cross. The fourth question is, ' Whether Jesus Christ is received, in the Eucharist, without a soul or animated?' Arnulph answers, that such kind of questions are usually proposed by persons, who affect to appear learned, and endeavour to lay snares for the faith of the simple and unlearned, who believe with humility all that the Holy Ghost has taught them: that it is folly to pretend to dive into the incomprehensible mysteries of our religion; and that it is certain, that the substance of bread and wine are changed into the body and blood of Christ, tho' it appears to the sense to be only bread and wine, and has all the qualities of those substances. The fifth and last question is concerning the sense of those words of the Prophet Joel, ch. ii. ver. 14. Who knoweth if he will return and repent, and leave a blessing behind him, &c.? Arnulph answers, that the change of God's determination consists in the remission of sin, which he grants to those who repent; and that the meaning of the words, leave a blessing behind him, is, that he will bless those who follow him (8).

[G] Bale confounds our Arnulph with Arnoul Bishop of Lisieux, Arnoul Abbot of Bonneval, and Arnulphus the Presbyter.] That author tells us, that Arnulphus went to Rome, where, inveighing strongly against the vices of the Bishops, particularly their lewdness, grandeur, and worldly-mindedness, he fell a sacrifice to the rage and resentment of the Roman Clergy, who caused him to be privately assassinated. Quod cum fecisset tandem Romae, Christianae religionis propugnator egregius, in ejus necem Scribarum & Pharisaeorum Clerus conspirabat. Praetatorum enim vitia insectabatur acerbè: in eorum impudicitias atque libidines perfortiter invehebat: histronicas illorum pompas arguebat, & in corradendis divitiis immoderata improbabat studia. Illorum igitur insidiis tandem atrociter maclabatur (9). But this is confounding him with Arnulphus the Presbyter, who, as Platina tells us, was destroyed by the treachery of the Roman Clergy, in the time of Pope Honorius II, for remonstrating with great severity against the corruptions of the Court of Rome. Nor could this possibly be true of our Arnulph, in the time of that Pope: for this Bishop of Rochester died before Honorius II was raised to the Pontificate. As to the works ascribed by Bale to Arnulphus, such as De Operibus sex dierum, &c. they were written either by Arnoul Bishop of Lisieux, or by Arnoul Abbot of Bonneval. T

ARNWAY (JOHN) was descended of a very good family in the county of Salop, from which he inherited a considerable estate (a). He was born in 1601, educated in Grammatical learning in his own country, and in 1618 became a Commoner of St Edmund's Hall, in Oxford, where he remained till he had taken his degrees in arts, and had also received holy orders (b). He then went down again into Shropshire, where, in process of time, he obtained the Rectories of Hodnet and Ightfield, which he enjoyed to the breaking out of the civil war (c). He was a man of much learning and very extensive charity, so that though his income was very considerable, yet he laid up very little. It was his custom to cloath annually twelve poor people according to their station, and every Sunday he entertained as many at his table, not only plentifully, plentifully, but with intimacy and respect (d). His loyalty to his Prince, being as warm as his charity towards his neighbours, he raised and clothed eight troopers for his service, and besides preached warmly against rebellion (e). The Parliament having a garrison in the town of Wem, a detachment was sent from thence to plunder him, which they did most successfully leaving him nothing, and besides terrifying him with the cruellest insults (f). In 1640 he repaired to Oxford, to serve the King in person, having no longer any estate to serve him with. There he was created Doctor in Divinity, and had also the Archdeaconry of Coventry given him, on the promotion of Dr Brownrigg to the bishoprick of Exeter (g). His former misfortunes did not hinder Dr Arnway from being as active afterwards in the King's service, which subjected him to a new train of misfortunes, his estate being sequestred, and himself imprisoned (h). At length after the King's murder he obtained his liberty, and like many other loyalists was compelled by the laws then in being to quit his native country, and retire to Holland. There he continued some time at the Hague, where in 1650 he published two little pieces (i). The first entitled, The Tablet: or, the Moderation of Charles I, the Martyr. In which he wipes off all the aspersions that were thrown on that Prince's memory by Milton and his associates. The second is called An Alarm to the Subjects of England, in which he certainly did his utmost to picture the oppressions of the new government, in their true colours; and in this work he tells us some very remarkable things of himself [A]. His supplies from England failing, and his hopes in that country being also frustrated, he was compelled to accept an offer that was made him of going to Virginia, where, oppressed with grief and cares, he yielded to fate in 1653, leaving behind him the character of a pious, upright, and truly constant man (k).

[A] He tells us some very remarkable things of himself.] Both these books were reprinted in England, in an octavo volume, A. D. 1661, by the care of William Rider, of Merton College, who married a relation of our author's. But notwithstanding this they are grown exceeding scarce, and therefore, I think it necessary to transcribe such passages as relate to his own affairs. In his preface to the reader, before his Alarm to the Subjects of England, he says, 'He quitted a large fortune, of which he did not repent in his extremest penury, to serve that good Prince King Charles I, and was as ready to hazard himself to enthroned his son.' In another place he writes thus (1), 'Tho' I was urged with drawn swords and bloody halberds, to serve the idol (meaning the Covenant) I yet infinitely more blest God for the deliverance of my soul from the idolatry thereof, than of my body from the peril of imprisonment, navigation, sickness, and the desert wherein I sojourn; the three first of which I escaped very narrowly. They offered me restitution of 400 l. per annum, sweetened with the commendation of my abilities, to bow to it, in

'swallowing the oath and covenant; but Christ's rejection of hec omnia dabo, teaching me not to sell myself to work wickedness, but to abhor presentations upon simoniacal contracts; I replied, I had rather cast my stuff and tackling all overboard, to save my passenger and pinnacle (soul and body), than sink my passenger and pinnacle to preserve my stuff and tackling.' And again (2), 'Not to speak of their other hard usage, granting me not a Bible of my library to comfort me, not a sheaf of my means to nourish me, not a fuit of my cloaths to cover me, nor use of common air to refresh me; but banishing me the country because I would not be perjured with them; they haled me out of prison in the dead of the night, to tax me of Papistry, the undeserved livery they gave to all true subjects and good Christians, who, had their minds been unsettled in religion, haply might have thought the furthest remove from them, the nearest approach to God; and so have been sooner turned by their oppression than by the arguments of Bellarmine.'

ARTHINGTON (HENRY), a gentleman of a good family in Yorkshire, who, towards the latter end of the reign of Queen Elizabeth, engaged in some seditious practices against the government (a). He was a man of moderate sense and learning, zealously addicted to the Geneva discipline, and was engaged for several years, in distributing books in defence of a farther reformation, and containing severe reflections on the Lords of the Privy Council, the Judges, and other Magistrates. In the prosecution of his designs, he became acquainted with Mr Edmund Coppinger, a younger brother of a good family, and sworn servant to Queen Elizabeth, who was as far gone as himself in Fanatical opinions, and who was continually representing to him the necessity of a thorough reformation in Church and State (b). This acquaintance of theirs lasted several years, till by frequent conversations, hearing warm sermons, and praying together, they had greatly heated their imaginations, in consequence of which, they began to believe themselves very extraordinary persons. About the latter end of the year 1590, Coppinger informed Mr Arthington, and Mr Lancaster, a School-master, that he had a desire to marry a certain widow, intreating them to fast and pray with him to obtain success in this design; which they did. A little after Coppinger came to them again, and told them, that God had shewed him a secret mystery, and that he knew a way to bring the Queen to repentance, and to cause all her Counsellors and Nobles to do the like immediately, otherwise he should prove them traitors that refused. Mr Arthington disliked this discourse, told him the thing was impossible, for that all motions of the heart depended on God alone. This however did not cure him, for in January 1590-91, he came again to Mr Lancaster's house in Shoe-lane, where Mr Arthington lodged, and there discoursed of his extraordinary calling, and of the means of trying whether such calls came from God or not. Arthington and Lancaster told him that they were but ordinary men, no fit counsellors for him on such occasions, and therefore desired he would apply himself to some godly ministers, and not trouble them with his secrets. But by degrees, Arthington was brought to have a better opinion of these manifestations, by means of a letter he received from one Mr Penry, a non-

He was at that time in Scotland, where seditious books were privately printed, and sent thence to be distributed in England, and in an epistle to Arthington, his correspondent, he signified that reformation must shortly be introduced in England. Arthington taking Penry for a prophet, believed this, and perceiving Coppinger's pretended revelation tended the same way, he suffered him to talk more freely of his calling, but declined being informed of the particular means which was to be used, for bringing this great design about. Some time in Easter term 1591, Coppinger became acquainted with Hacket, and soon after introduced Arthington also to his acquaintance. They dined together at one Lawfon's house near Paul's Gate, where Arthington was well pleased with the conversation; however he went down again into Yorkshire, and did not return to London till the beginning of Trinity term (d). Then Coppinger came to him to his lodgings, and magnified Hacket as the holiest man that had ever lived except Christ; which Arthington heard with dislike. At last however he was prevailed on to visit him, and to hear his long prayers, which appeared to him so divine, sweet, and heavenly, that he was thereby drawn to have great admiration for him, as he expressed himself. But that which struck him most, was Hacket's beseeching God to confound him, if he did not seek his honour and glory, in all things he did, and he seeing that notwithstanding this Hacket remained sound and well, he concluded he must be a most holy man. Coppinger farther informed Mr Arthington, that Hacket was grievously tormented by forcerers and devils, insomuch, that he endured as cruel tortures, as if he were in Hell, which being also affirmed by Hacket with prodigious oaths, Arthington at last believed. He also caught by infection, his master's method of cursing and making horrid imprecations against himself, believing that he felt within him motions of the spirit, which he conceived were to be implicitly obeyed, on pain of damnation (e). In consequence of these notions, he wrote a letter to the Queen, wherein he accused a great Counsellor of treason, offering to prove him a traitor in her presence, by a new sort of tryal, as appears by part of his own letter cited in the note [A]. He was now in a manner wholly at Hacket's devotion, who wrought upon his mind very cunningly, and drew him from one thing to another, without his knowing on what grounds he acted, or what his real intention was. On Sunday the eleventh of July, 1591, Arthington made a long prayer in the presence of Hacket, wherein he besought God to preserve the Queen; upon this Hacket turned away his face, and did not look upon him again, until he prayed for other things. After prayers were over, Hacket cast his arms about Arthington, told him that he loved the Queen, as well as he, or Coppinger, desiring him not to be offended at this behaviour, which he said God had commanded. Coppinger also told him, that the Queen might be prayed for, but not as a Sovereign, for that she was not to reign but this man Hacket, and yet she should live better than ever she did, though governed by another (f). On Thursday the fourteenth, Arthington penned his Prophecy of Judgments against England, the matter of which the reader will meet with in the notes [B]. Coppinger also drew up

[A] Cited in the note.] These new prophets, by virtue of that extraordinary power which they fancied to be committed to themselves, deprived all such of her Majesty's Counsellors as were disagreeable to them, that is to say, deprived them in the opinion of their hair-brained disciples, calling them thenceforward, the Late Lord Chancellor, the Late Lord Treasurer. This last was the famous William Lord Burleigh, particularly hated by these Enthusiasts, and indeed by all the enemies of Queen Elizabeth. It was of this great Counsellor that Arthington complained to her by a letter, in which he charged him to be the most dangerous enemy that was discovered since her Highness's reign, adding, If your Majesty cannot judge him to be so bad as I report him, yet give me leave in your sacred presence to fight the combat of prayer with him, wherein if it please him, I will first begin to pray against myself, that if he be not as deeply guilty as I have charged him, then that God's vengeance may presently consume me both soul and body into Hell for ever, which if it come to pass the victory shall be his, and he return an innocent: But if he see me leap up for joy, as one that hath discovered him to be a traitor, then if he dare fall down in like sort, and make the same prayer, That the like vengeance may fall upon himself, if he be deeply guilty as I have charged him, and if God's vengeance fall not upon him before he depart out of her presence, let me be hanged, drawn, and quartered, for labouring to impeach a Counsellor's credit; but if he dare not thus enter the lists with me before her Majesty, let him be holden guilty (1).

[B] The reader will meet with in the notes.] We have one extract of this prophecy drawn by order of the Privy Council, which contains all the matter of it, and only wants some of the blasphemous expressions.

It is entitled, A PROPHECY OF JUDGMENTS against England. In this prophecy he first setteth down the third commandment, inferring what plagues shall light on himself if he offend therein. Then cometh he to his nine several assertions, adding to every one of them, The Lord to confound him, viz. That if he think not himself to be the vilest sinful wretch living: If he take not himself to be the most ignorant in God's Book, of any man that hath professed the gospel so long: If he acknowledge not himself most unfit, and unworthy of all men to serve the Lord Jesus: If nevertheless, he be not extraordinarily called to do the message of God more faithfully than any preacher in England hath hitherto done: If the scripture do not justify extraordinary callings before the end of the world: If he know not two persons within the city of London, that have greater extraordinary callings than himself, viz. Edmund Coppinger, and William Hacket: If the former be not a prophet raised up of the Lord, to bring a message of great mercy to the land, if all the people truly repent of their sins: If the latter be not the holiest man, and of the greatest power, to bring fearful judgments upon the whole earth that ever was born, Christ Jesus excepted: If the said Hacket (as the messenger of God's vengeance, where mercy is refused) do not bring such plagues upon this realm of England, the like whereof was never seen: In these, and in every of these several cases he prayeth, The Lord to confound him.

Whereupon he inferreth, that having thus denounced to many fearful woes against his own soul, as would sink it into the bottomless pit of Hell, if he were guilty in any one of them. Then thereupon, with cheerfulness, he cometh to declare his message to England, accusing it to be the most rebellious, though it have been most blessed, of all nations. Then up a life of Hacket, which Arthington wrote over again fair, sitting up for that purpose all night; and annexed it to his prophecy; the same day they penned a joint letter to Mr Thomas Lancaster, a school-master [C], signed by Coppinger as the Messenger of Peace, and by Arthington as the Prophet of God's Judgments, though it seems Arthington did not well know, why he stiled himself so. For on Friday the fifteenth of July, Coppinger having sent for Arthington out of his bed, declared to him, that he had had a revelation, which assured him that he was Prophet of Mercy, and Arthington Prophet of Judgment; that Hacket was King of Europe, and that they were to go before him, and separate the sheep from the goats. Arthington the more readily credited this, because he found a mighty burning in himself, which he interpreted a commencement of the angelick nature (g). Their first exploit was to go together to the house of a gentleman in the city, between six and seven in the morning, to appoint him chief governor under her Majesty, but he would have nothing to do with them, nor would he suffer them to pray. Then they went to Woodstreet-Compter to Mr Wigginton, a Minister, with whom they had a long conference; then they left him and went to Hacket's chamber, at the house of one Walker, at Broken Wharf. By this time he affirmeth the city of London, and the courts of justice at Westminster, and the counterfeit worship of God with crosses and surplices, to be worse than Sodom and Gomorrah, or the purple Whore of Rome, or else desireth to be confounded. Nay, he preferreth Rome before London; because at Rome they sin only of ignorance. Of her Majesty he saith, she is at least guilty of the common sins, but most abused (of any Prince that ever was) by those whom she hath most advanced.

Then he speaks to three great Counsellors (2) C. C. T. daring them to proteit for their innocencies against themselves, as deeply as he hath done, and then, if they be not swallowed up quick, he is contented to be hanged up in chains at Paul's Cross. Then he threatneth them, That they three shall be otherwise detected e'er long, and all those that are then partakers, when her Majesty shall reign and live to see better days, if God give her true repentance. Then he saith, he will leave all other of the clergy (as sufficiently detected already) save such as pretend to seek reformation, (who he saith) are as guilty (in two points) as any of the other. The first point, for not crying out continually against Archbishops, Bishops, Deans, Archdeacons, and others, as wicked usurpers in the house of God. The second, for not crying out against the magistrats of this land, because they keep out the Eldership out of the Church, and maintain in their room officers and offices of Antichrist: Hereupon gathering thus: How can God spare this land any longer, wherein both the magistrats and messengers of God have dealt so unfaithfully in the Lord's service? Adding, That the fearful judgments of God shall be sure to fall on the reprobate: being already prepared and put into the hands of the mighty messenger of God, William Hackett, to be poured out upon this great city of London, and upon all places where repentance followeth not this publication. Then he goeth about to prove all such preachers to be idolaters, or consenting to idolatry, which practise or consent, and suffer others to use surplices and crosses, because (he saith) they are marks of Antichrist, preferring herein the Papiests afore them as sinning herein only through ignorance, seeking also to aggravate their faults in this behalf, for that they are all hypocritical idolaters, in that (nevertheless) they profess reformation: Whereunto he addeth (he saith) a secret: That this their halting and hypocrisy hath so hardened God's heart against their requests, for bringing in the discipline, that for this unfaithful and unsingle walking in their function, he hath hitherto denied it. Neither shall any of them, or all of them together, have that honour given, to bring in reformation: For (saith he) I tell you truly, The Almighty God hath put his cup of vengeance into his trusty and faithful servant's hand William Hackett, to pour it down shortly, upon every wilful and obdinate sinner that doth not repent upon the notice hereof, or else the Lord confound me. Lastly, he giveth charge to have this prophecy, together with the incredible (but most certain) history of the holiest servant of God, William Hackett, that ever hath been, is, or shall be born, (Christ Jesus only excepted) with all speed possible, printed and published together, as in substance true (saith he) or else the Lord confound me: This wise prophecy is thus subscribed: By your most unworthy servant, but yet a faithful prophet of the Almighty Jesus, or else his wrath confound me't Henrie Arthington (3).

[C] Mr Thomas Lancaster, Schoolmaster.] This whole affair relating to Hacket, Coppinger, and Arthington, hath made so much noise abroad as well as at home, and is so imperfectly treated by most of the authors who have touched thereupon, for want of seeing the original and authentick account published by Queen Elizabeth's order, that it is become necessary to preserve with all imaginable care the original papers, which manifest the real spirit and true design of these dangerous impostors. For this cause we give our readers this Letter to Mr Lancaster, as the fullest testimony of the characters of these new prophets.

(4) Conspiracy for pretended Discipline, P. 32—41.

If this letter be not indited by the HOLY GHOST, who hath appeared (in a far greater measure) to sinful wretches, in the end of the world, even to us, whose names are here underwritten, and to a third person, in calling above all callings whatsoever (the Lord Jesus excepted), The Lord confound us two with vengeance from Heaven, and carry us (with all violence) into the bottomless pit.

If we have not taken the name of God in vain, it standeth you upon, to read this letter with fear and trembling, with joy and gladness; with fear, that the Lord shall wooe you to do him service; with joy, that he offereth you honour if you accept it. We two are messengers from Heaven, who have a good captain to guide us; who have received immediate callings from God, to call the whole world to repentance, and amendment of life: Otherwise they are to fear, that Christ Jesus his second coming in glory, will be to them as a thief in the night. If I Edmund Coppinger do not prefer you before any one man in the land whatsoever, for your wise, holy, loving, and righteous course, both in the general calling of a Christian, and in your particular calling, The Lord confound me body and soul. The reason why I chuse you first, is, because in your house, in your presence, and under God, (partly by your means) I had my first extraordinary calling, though thereof (as of all other things) the whole honour and glory be the Lord's. And of the same mind is my brother Arthington. In token of our extraordinary love to you, we deal as we neither have, or will do with any other; for we command in the name of the Lord, all creatures upon the earth, and they must obey. But with you we will dispense thus far, that it shall be your choice to come and take a new calling (for a time, wherein we would use you) or refuse it. So wishing to commend us and yourself to God, before you answer us, which we expect in word and not in writing, &c.

The Messenger of Mercy to the world if they accept me.

Edm. Coppinger.

I avouch whatsoever my brother hath written to be most true; and further I protest, That you are a more holy man than any preacher in London, or throughout the whole land, or else the Lord confound me. If it please you to come and see me joyful, you may hope this is true.

The Prophet of Judgment to the whole World, where mercy is rejected.

time it was eight o'clock, however Hacket was a-bed, which did not hinder Coppinger from kneeling down at the bed's feet, and making a long prayer. Arthington joined with them, Hacket came twice out of his bed in his shirt, and prayed likewise, which done, he went to bed again. Coppinger began to pray again, but Arthington interrupted him, and commanded him to arise and anoint the King with the Holy-Ghost. Coppinger presently rose, kissed the boards thrice where Hacket's feet had stood, and then reverently approaching him in bed, was going to lay his hand upon him, but Hacket said, You shall not need to anoint me, for I have been already anointed in Heaven by the Holy Ghost. Then they both demanded what his pleasure was to have done, upon which he said, Go your way and tell them in the city, that CHRIST JESUS is come with his fan in his hand to judge the earth, and if any man ask you where he is, tell him he lies at Walker's house, by Broken Wharf; and if they will not believe it, let them come and kill me if they can, for as truly as CHRIST JESUS is in Heaven, so truly is he come to judge the world (b). Coppinger upon this ran down stairs, and made proclamation before Arthington could get to him, afterwards they went together towards Cheapside, by Watling-street, and the Old Change, crying out, Christ is come &c. To this Arthington added, Repent England, repent; threatening also strange judgments against the city of London [D]. When they came near the cross, which then stood in Cheapside, the croud was so great they could not move along; so they got up into an empty cart, wherein they declared out of a paper the office and calling of Hacket, how he represented Christ by taking a part of his glorified body, by his principal spirit, and by the office of severing the good from the bad, with his fan in his hand, and of establishing the Gospel in Europe, that they were two prophets, one of Mercy, the other of Judgments, called to assist him in this great work, wishing confusion and damnation to themselves, if all they spake was not true, much more to this purpose they said, and at the same time spake with great heat and violence against two Lords of the Queen's Council, doing all they could to inflame the people, and raise a rebellion. This was between ten and eleven in the morning, and they hoped before noon to have gone through the whole city, but the great croud in the streets rendered it impossible. A gentleman who had some acquaintance with Coppinger, made him get out of the cart, and go into the Mermaid Tavern, in Cheapside, into which Arthington followed him. Then they went by back lanes to Coppinger's lodgings, Arthington proclaiming as he went along, Repent England, &c. they found the doors shut against them, whereupon Arthington went to Hacket's lodgings. He was abroad when Arthington came, but soon after returned, and as soon as Arthington saw him, he said, there cometh the king of the whole earth, for which Hacket reproved him, telling him he was too outrageous. A paper was taken out of Arthington's sleeve, which he said he was glad of, for it was an epistle to the Queen, which she would not receive, and therefore she was no longer Queen, but deprived of her dignity. About one o'clock they were apprehended and conducted to the Lord Mayor's, where several Privy Counsellors were met, to whom Arthington refused to shew the least respect, but when Hacket came into the room, he fell down on the ground, and grovelled at his feet. He was so far from perceiving his error, or believing that he was deceived, that he continued to assert the truth of Hacket's mission, and of the revelations made to Coppinger and himself. He was also thoroughly persuaded Hacket would shortly be released, and that he and his fellow-prophet, should go abroad with him, in order to take possession of his kingdoms, and to perform their offices. As often as any of his friends conferred with him, and sought to shew him the folly of his discourse, he would answer with a smile, You think that we have incurred the danger of the laws herein, and that we therefore shall be put to death, but as sure as God is in Heaven, the sword shall not come near to hurt us, neither shall any man be able to touch the least hair of our heads (i). He did not recede in the least from these strange notions, even after he had heard that Hacket was tried and condemned, but in the afternoon of Wednesday the twenty-eighth of July, when he was assured that Hacket was actually hanged, drawn, and quartered, he presently discerned his own delusion and great danger. Upon this he wrote in the most humble manner, to the Chancellor, and to the Treasurer, beseeching them to pardon the injuries he had done them, and afterwards he wrote to the body of the Council, giving the best account he was able of the whole business, beseeching them to intercede with her Majesty for him, that he might not be proceeded against as his companions had been. As for Coppinger, he a little after he was apprehended, ran absolutely distracted, and never recovered his senses, but obstinately refusing all nourishment, died of hunger the day after Hacket was executed. It was thought proper to detain Arthington some time in Wood-street Compter, in order to discover whether his repentance was sincere, as also whether there was no danger of his relapsing

[D] Threatning also strange judgments against the city of London. This judgment against London Arthington said, he gathered out of Hacket's history, and it was to happen thus. Men were to be seized with a sudden, furious, and bloody rage, and should there kill and butcher one another like swine all the day long, and that none should have either reason or compassion enough to interpose and stop so horrid a massacre. It is to be observed, that Arthington's inspirations were no more than repetitions of what he had heard Hacket say, and that he stiled himself a prophet in consequence of his publishing his master's revelations (5).

relapsing into his enthusiastick fit. But he remaining perfectly sober and sensible, the Queen was pleased to extend her mercy towards him, by granting him a pardon (k). He published a retractation under his hand, and, as an Ecclesiastical Historian (l) informs us, had the good luck to recover his reputation so far, as to be thought an honest and sincere, though a warm and weak man. What afterwards became of him, or when or where he died does no where appear. The conduct of these Enthusiasts, did not only kindle a great flame at that time, but have left such heat in the embers of their conspiracy, as at this day is scarce extinguished. The writers against the Dissenters never fail mentioning Hacket's insurrection, as a charge upon them, and the Apologists for the Puritans as constantly treat this as a gross calumny invented at first to countenance a most violent persecution, which was set on foot against them, and ever since kept up to hinder the abating of that prejudice, which hath been so carefully infused into the vulgar, against their principles and practices. This is a very dark and perplexed affair, there being what may well enough be stiled evidence on both sides. We pretend not therefore to decide upon this point; but to render this account of Hacket's conspiracy as compleat as we could, have added some particulars relating to this dispute in the notes [E], on which the reader may perhaps pass judgment; or if he thinks farther information necessary, will find it sufficiently indicated where that may be met with.

[E] Some particulars relating to this dispute in the notes.] Dr William Nichols charges the Puritans roundly with abetting this design. Some of the Puritans of these times, says he, were so mad as to attempt a rebellion for the sake of the discipline, and by the solicitation of some enthusiastical men, Hacket, Coppinger, and Arthington, were to stir up the people to take arms against the Queen on that behalf (6). Mr Peirce, who answered the Doctor's book, denieth this charge, and cites Fuller, the Church Historian, as an irrefragable witness in favour of the Puritans (7). That author says, This business of Hacket happened unreasonably for that party, true it is, they as cordially detested his blasphemy as any. And such as loved Hacket, the Nonconformist, abhorred Hacket the heretick, after he had mounted to so high a pitch of impiety. Mr Neale in his late history of the Puritans; complains loudly of the injustice done them, in representing them as having any thing to do with these enthusiasts (8). The Rt. Rev. author who has answered his book, endeavours however to pin down the charge on Cartwright and Udall, two of the most famous Nonconformist ministers in those times (9): But none of these writers seem to have considered the only authentick account of this whole affair, the title of which runs thus, Conspiracy for pretended Reformation, viz. Presbyterian Discipline. A treatise discovering the late designments and courses held for advancing thereof, by William Hacket, Yeoman; Edmund Coppinger, and Henry Arthington, Gent. out of others depositions, and their own letters, writings, and confessions upon examination: Together with some part of the life and conditions, and the two inditeiments, arraignment, and execution of the said Hackett: Also an answer to the calumniations of such as affirm they were madmen; and a resemblance of this action unto the like which happened heretofore in Germany, ultimo Septembris, 1591. This was written by Dr (afterwards Archbishop) Bancroft, by direction of the Council, and was published by authority. The very title shews that his intention was, to represent this conspiracy as if it had been concerted for the establishing Puritanism. In the course of his account he shews, that Arthington had a correspondence with Mr Penrie a zealous minister, who was not long after executed, and that Hacket was in partnership with one Wigginton, a minister, as a maltster. There are likewise in the same piece several letters to Puritan ministers, and a long examination of Wigginton's, wherein he acknowledges his being privy to Hacket's pretences both to prophecy and to power. This shews what the notions of men at the helm were concerning this extraordinary transaction, in which, if the Puritans had no concern, they were without all doubt very grievously injured, since in this account of the matter published, by the Queen's authority, they are insinuated to be the excitors and promoters of this disturbance. ARTHUR (King of the Britons) of whom tho' the common opinion be, that nothing with certainty can be affirmed [A], from his birth to his death, yet is it but just, that what is related of him should be told, as also, what is said for and against it. Here therefore we shall report chiefly from Geoffrey of Monmouth, the common story

[A] Nothing with certainty can be affirmed.] After allowing that nothing can be more dubious than the history of Arthur is generally esteemed, some readers may think his life might be as well omitted. Now as the same objection may be made to several other articles taken from our antient history; it will be proper to return an answer once for all. In the first place then, one can see no reason, why we should be at so much pains, to read and to understand the fabulous history of other nations, and yet absolutely reject our own. What pains have the learned taken with the fables both of Greeks and Latins; and with what solemnity of late years, especially, have we seen the oriental romances, which in their kind exceed all others, commented upon, and thereby rendered useful to the judicious reader. By what figure in rhetoric shall we distinguish between the wisdom shewn in these labours, and the folly of dwelling on the less credible history of this island? If under the former there may remain truths of great importance, why may not something of the same kind be buried under the latter? But farther still, what if the understanding these fables contribute not a little to the understanding true history. For how fabulous soever a story may be, yet if once it gain credit, and pass in the opinion of men for undoubted truth, it's circumstances will in time become so intermixed, even with the most authentick relations, that without a thorough understanding the one, there will be no such thing as coming at the true sense of the other. On this account therefore the reading of fabulous history is necessary to avoid the believing fables; since if we should once grow so nice, as to think it not worth our while to peruse any thing branded with the name of fiction, it might become the means of our receiving, under the name of true history, the meanest and most absurd fictions for want of knowing their origin. Add to all this, that as in the case of all extremes, so here excessive incredulity becomes credulity itself. For if from an apprehension of being thought less critical in taste than others, we should reject the authority of all authors whose credit have been questioned, or resolve to give up all facts, with respect to which there have been any doubts, we evidently embrace the error we endeavour to shun, and by affecting criticism lose all the advantages deducible from that kind of knowledge; let us therefore be content, especially in such a work as this, to hear whatever our forefathers thought worth the leaving; to examine fairly both sides of the question, and then decide freely as the weight of evidence inclines us. It is indeed one great use of a dictionary like this, that it assembles in little room a multitude of passages relating to the same matter, and yet lying scattered in a variety of authors, whereby the reader in a few minutes becomes possessed of that knowledge, which cost the author much pains and time to acquire.

story of Arthur and his exploits, and in the notes, we shall shew what is supported, what refuted, by more credible historians [B]. As to his birth, he is said to have been

[B] What supported, what refuted, by credible historians. The history of Arthur in the text, is taken avowedly from Geoffrey of Monmouth, who in his British history treats copiously of the actions of this Prince. As to the credit of this author, which hath suffered violent attacks, we must refer the reader to his article. Here we are to meddle only with the history of one King, tho' at the same time it must be acknowledged that this very history drew the most severe censures upon our author; who, as his antagonist tells us, was on this very account named Jeffrey Ap Arthur; because taking the fables of the ancient Britons concerning King Arthur out of the old romances, increasing them with his own additions, and giving them the varnish of the Latin tongue, he clothed them with the honourable name of History (1). A harsh judgment this, which however many ages after was supported by Polydore Vergil (2), and since his time by Mr Milton (3), and many others (4), who have carried it so far, as to doubt very much whether there really ever was such a person as Arthur or not. We will state briefly some of the principal arguments urged by them, and then we will shew what has been said in answer. I. If, say they, there had been such a King as Arthur, a Prince so warlike and so great a conqueror, how can we suppose that Gildas and Bede should take no notice of him, when they expressly name Ambrosius and other British Kings, whose actions it is confessed were inconsiderable in respect of those reported of Arthur. II. The history of Arthur is no way reconcilable to the authentick histories of those times. For whereas it is asserted therein, that the dominion of Arthur extended not only over all this island, but over a great part of the continent, it is manifest from these, that several Saxon kingdoms were actually set up in England (5), so that the smallest part of this story cannot be true. III. The great deeds of Arthur, as related by his historian, are incompatible with the histories of foreign nations; and since those histories are undoubtedly authentick, it follows that this is fabulous. IV. The inconsistency of this story with others, is not greater than it's inconsistency with itself. For whereas Geoffrey of Monmouth makes Arthur so great a conqueror, yet Karadoc, whom Geoffrey owns to be a good writer (6), says expressly, that Melvas, who was Prince of that country now called Somersetshire, kept his Queen from him a whole year in the town of Glaston, and was at last prevailed upon to restore her by the intreaty of Gildas, when Arthur had tried his power in vain (7). V. It is alledged that the whole of this tale rests on the authority of Geoffrey of Monmouth, who in comparison of the times of which he writes is a modern, and flourished about the year 1150. From him all later writers have copied; and therefore nothing taken from them can strengthen his authority. On the other side it is urged, that the omitting the name of Arthur in Gildas's letter (8), is so far from being any proof of his non-existence, that it is really a circumstance very favourable to his character. For Gildas writing only of the causes why the Britons were delivered up to be slaughtered by their enemies the Saxons, characterizes only the bad Princes living at the time he wrote, which appears to have been a little after Arthur's death. The very first Prince whom he upbraids for his tyranny, is Constantine the successor of Arthur; and one of the facts for which he upbraids him, is for the murder of two young Princes of the royal family; these Princes Geoffrey of Monmouth tells us, were the sons of Modred, the nephew of Arthur; and he relates their murder in the same manner as it is related by Gildas (9). But if there is no mention of Arthur in this author, he is however named by Nennius (10) a most ancient writer (11), so that this objection falls to the ground. It is also alledged, that tho' foreign historians do not speak of Arthur in the stile of Geoffrey of Monmouth, that is, as a mighty conqueror; yet nothing can be clearer than that they acknowledge there was such a Prince, and that he did also perform great things. Buchanan is very severe in his censure of Geoffrey, but the history himself gives us of Arthur, is such a one as does him very great honour. Let us hear one sentence only of it. 'To speak briefly of his famous actions, says Buchanan, this is manifest, that he wholly subdued the forces of the Saxons, and restored peace to Britain; afterwards going over to Brittany in France, he entrusted the kingdom to Modred, his nephew; but as to his exploits in Gaul, we have no certainty of them.' A little after he gives us his character. 'This, says he, is certain, Arthur was a great man and very valiant, one who expressed his sincere love to his country in freeing it from bondage, reforming corruptions in religion, and restoring the true worship of God' (12). Add to this, that in the neighbourhood of Edinburgh there is a very high hill, the top of which is stiled Arthur's seat, from a tradition that Arthur surveyed the country from hence (13). The tradition of a people in favour of themselves is a slight proof, but a tradition to their own dishonour, cannot well be accounted for, if it be not founded in truth. As to the Saxon kingdoms founded in or before his time, Arthur might suppose himself supreme Lord of the island from their submission; in after-times Alfred and Ethelstan, were held Monarchs of England, tho' the Danes had erected several principalities here, which is a parallel case. As to the foreign conquests of Arthur no body contends for them, they are fictitious circumstances added to his history, but surely they cannot take away what was real. The supposed inconsistency between the account given also by Geoffrey of Monmouth, and that written by Karadoc, his contemporary, may prove, that there is some diversity in the records relating to the actions of this Prince, but then certainly it proves that such a Prince there was. For tho' one, or both of these authors should be mistaken, it cannot from thence be inferred that the history of Arthur is a fable; the utmost that can be deduced is, that some of the circumstances of his story are doubtful, which may be affirmed of the Princes of the last age. The resting of this story on the authority of Geoffrey of Monmouth, is a point by no means to be admitted; Nennius, who flourished many ages before him, had recorded several particulars relating to Arthur (14). Henry of Huntingdon touches the principal points in his history (15); William of Malmesbury also, in his introduction to his history, had given a concise account of his reign (16); and as we shall see in the subsequent note set down in another work, some particulars relating to Arthur, which Geoffrey of Monmouth never knew, and this from unquestionable authority. King Edward I, in a letter written to Pope Boniface VIII, asserts positively, that Arthur, King of the Britons, a most renowned Prince, subdued Scotland when in rebellion against him, and almost destroyed the whole nation. He says farther, that the King of Scots attended King Arthur at the city of Legions, did homage for his kingdom, and carried King Arthur's sword before him (17). Leland alleges, that Caire Arture in Wales, is a plain proof there was such a person, as also Arthur's gate in Montgomery (18). After all, Geoffrey of Monmouth is not the author of his book, but the translator only; tho' some have affected to doubt whether there really was any such book written in the British tongue, yet in a manuscript history of British affairs, written a hundred years ago by Mr John Lewis, it is expressly said by the author, that he had the very original of the British history, written in the British tongue; as he concludes from this circumstance. That in his manuscript, Geoffrey's preface was wanting, and the preface to his book was the second chapter in Geoffrey's translation, being the description of Britain (19). Besides, Giraldus Cambrensis puts it out of dispute, that Geoffrey was under no necessity of forging. For he tells us expressly, that even in his time the Welsh bards, and songsters, could recite from their ancient and authentick books, the genealogy of their Princes, which they pushed not only as high as Arthur, but to Æneas (20). On the whole, if the history given us by Geoffrey contains many things which are not strictly true; he ought not to be reproached for them, because he pretends to no greater authority than he really had, viz. that of the old British book; which whether it's contents were true or false he was certainly commendable been the son of Uther Pendragon, King of the Britons, by Igera, the wife of Gorlois, Duke of Cornwall. This lady is held to have been in her time the greatest beauty in Britain, and we are told, that Uther Pendragon enjoyed her by the help of Merlin's skill in magick, who gave this amorous Prince the form of Gorlois, so that Igera taking him for her husband, received him readily to her bed, and had by him Arthur (a). But though he was begotten in adultery, he was born in wedlock; for soon after this transaction, Uther Pendragon killed Gorlois, and married his widow Igera, who was brought to bed of Arthur in 501 (b). This story is in itself very incredible, but if we admit the commentary of Buchanan, it becomes as clear, and as intelligible, as we could wish. He says, that the King lay with the Duke of Cornwall's wife in that Duke's life-time, and marrying her after his decease, the story of the magical interview, was invented to restore the splendor of the lady's honour, and make way for the King's owning Arthur for his son (c). Uther Pendragon had also by the same lady a daughter called Anne, and dying in the year 516, Arthur ascended the throne in his place, though he was then but fifteen, or, as Buchanan says, eighteen years old (d). At this time the Saxons committed horrid devastations in Britain, under the command of Colgrin their Duke, wherefore Dubricius, Archbishop of Caerleon, solemnly crowned Arthur, at the request of the Nobles and the people, who immediately prepared to take the field against the Saxons. His generosity, personal bravery, and great zeal for the glory of the Britons, procured him quickly a competent army, with which he routed Colgrin and all his forces, consisting of Saxons, Scots, and Picts, on the banks of the river Douglas, but not without very considerable loss on his own side (e). Upon this, Colgrin retired with the remains of his army into York, where Arthur besieged him, and while he lay before the place, Cadur Duke of Cornwall, defeated Baldulph the brother of Colgrin, who with six thousand men came to his relief. The King however could not take York, for Cheldric, or Cerdic, King of the Saxons, landing in Albania, i. e. Scotland, with a prodigious number of men, from on board a fleet of six hundred sail, marched towards the Britons, whereupon, by the advice of his council, Arthur raised the siege of York, and marched to London. On his arrival in that city, he called a general assembly, wherein the state of affairs having been thoroughly debated, it was agreed to send Embassadors to Hoel King of Armorica, i. e. Brittany, who was Arthur's sister's son, to intreat his assistance, which being accordingly done, Hoel himself embarked with fifteen thousand men, and landing at Southampton, then called the Port of Hamo, quickly found his uncle, who received him with all the affection and respect imaginable (f). Immediately after this junction, Arthur and his kinsman marched to oblige the Saxons to raise the siege of Kaerlind coit, now called Lincoln. The Saxons upon their approach, instantly rose from before the place, that with the greater conveniency they might fight the Britons. The battle was bloody and obstinate, but at last the Saxons were overthrown with the loss of six thousand men, part killed, and part drowned in the rivers. The remains of the army retired to the woods of Caledon, which most probably are Celidon woods in Lincolnshire, where they made a brave stand, but being surrounded by the Britons, were at last obliged to surrender upon articles, viz. That they should leave behind them all their booty, retire peaceably to their ships, and transport themselves back again into Germany (g). For the performance of these articles they gave hostages, and were then suffered to retire in order to embark quietly. But in their voyage repenting of what they had done, they landed at Totness, burnt all the country as far as the Severn sea, slaughtered the peasants, ruined the villages, and at length laid siege to the city of Badon, i. e. Bath in Somersetshire. When this news was brought to King Arthur, who was on the point of marching against the Scots and Picts, he instantly ordered the Saxon hostages to be put to death, and then marched to the relief of the besieged city. When he drew near it, himself first made a speech to the army, and then the Archbishop Dubricius harangued them likewise, and gave them his blessing. On the day of battle, Arthur put on an excellent coat of mail, a golden helmet, with the figure of a dragon upon the top thereof, across his shoulder hung his shield, called Pridwen or Prywen, wherein was pictured the virgin Mary, bearing the child Jesus in her arms: he had likewise by his side his sword called Caliburn (h), and in his right-hand he bore his lance Rou. Thus equipped he attacked the Saxons, who were drawn up in the form of a wedge. The battle lasted from morning till evening, when the Saxons withdrew to the top of a high hill, and there encamped. The next day Arthur attacked them again, but they made a gallant defence, till the greatest part of the day was worn out, which so enraged Arthur, that he threw himself among the foremost ranks, and with great hazard to his person, performed there incredible feats of valour, for he slew with his own hand four hundred and seventy men. The Britons encouraged by the example of their Prince, forced the Saxon camp on all hands, and put many thousands ly commendable for publishing; and as to the fictions contained in it, they are not at all more glaring than those in other histories of the same standing; and therefore, tho' they ought to have no credit themselves, yet they cannot impeach the credit of the true history mixed with them. To conclude, if Camden doubts the credit of Geoffrey of Monmouth; he in other places supports the history of Arthur (21). If Milton doubts whether there ever was such a Prince; Leland the great antiquary hath written a treatise expressly in support of his history; and the great Primate Usher (22) thought the objections brought against the story of his actions, but of very little weight.

thousands of them to the sword (i), amongst whom fell Colgrin and Balduph. But as for Cedric he carried off the remains of his army, and endeavoured to recover his ships. After the important victory at Badon, Arthur received advice, that the Scots and Picts had besieged the city of Aclud, which is thought to be Dunbritton in Scotland, where he left his nephew Hoel sick, at the time he marched back against the Saxons. To his assistance therefore, the generous British Prince marched with all the alacrity imaginable, leaving Cadur Duke of Cornwall, to pursue the Saxons. On his approach, the Scots and Picts not only raised the siege, but fled precipitately to Lough Lomond, where they endeavoured to fortify themselves in the islands, but Arthur having quickly equipped a fleet, obliged them to surrender, and out of his great clemency pardoned them (k).

(k) Id. lib. ix. c. 6.

In the mean time, Cadur Duke of Cornwall, taking a circuit round the Saxons, and thereby giving them time to collect themselves into a body, and to refresh after their fatigues, suddenly seized and carried away their ships, and then marched in quest of them, who perceiving their desperate condition, retired into the isle of Thanet, where Cadur blocked them up with their own ships, and after killing their commander Cedric in fight, forced them to surrender upon articles, and to give hostages once more for their departing out of the kingdom (l). This done, Cadur rejoined the King, who kept his Christmas at York, where he destroyed the temples of the Pagans, restored the Christian churches, and appointed Pyramus, his chaplain, Archbishop of this See (m). He also promoted Augufel to the sovereignty over the Scots (n), rewarded other persons of distinction, and took himself to wife Guanhumara, a lady descended from the Romans, of exquisite beauty, bred up in the family of Cadur Duke of Cornwall (o). The next summer he fitted out a fleet, and therewith invaded Ireland, of which Guillamurius was the chief King, who, to oppose him, drew together a numerous army, which Arthur defeated, and made him prisoner; upon this all the petty Princes in the island submitted. Then he sailed to Iceland, which he likewise subdued, and received the submissions of Doldavius King of Gothland, and Gunfavius King of the Orkneys, whom the very terror of his arms had reduced to obedience (p). After this he returned into Britain, and governed here twelve years in peace, with such magnificence and splendor, that all Europe was amazed thereat, and the greatest potentates stood in fear of him.

At length, Sichelin King of the Norwegians dying, and leaving his kingdom to Lot, Arthur's brother-in-law, the people of Norway notwithstanding set up Riculf. On this pretence therefore, Arthur invaded that kingdom, defeated the Norwegians, killed Riculf, conquered Norway and Dacia, that is, Denmark, and having given the whole to Lot, proceeded with his victorious army to invade Gaul, then a province, as our historian tells us, of the Roman Empire. The greatest part of the country he quickly subdued, blocked up the Roman governor in Paris, and reduced him to such straits there, that he was on the very point of starving. In this distress he challenged Arthur to a single combat, which he was too gallant a man to refuse, whereupon a bloody duel ensued, in which at first Arthur had the worst, but at length he conquered and killed Follo, upon which, Paris surrendered. He spent however nine years in conquering the rest of France, after which he returned to that city, and kept a royal court, bestowing Neustria, afterwards called Normandy, upon his Butler, Bedver, and the rest of the provinces upon his domesticks (q). Upon the approach of the feast of Pentecost, Arthur determined to call a great assembly of the most noble of his subjects, which he appointed to be held at Caerleon in Montgomeryshire, because standing on the river Usk, near the Severn sea, it was both pleasant and commodious, for the coming and going of those who were invited. Accordingly there assembled Augufel, King of Scotland, the King of North-Wales, the King of South-Wales, Cadur, now called King of Cornwall, the Archbishops of London, York, and Caerleon, with a multitude of British Princes; there came likewise Guillamurius King of Ireland, Malvasius King of Iceland, Doldavius King of Gothland, Gunfavius King of the Orkneys, Lot King of Norway, Aschillius King of the Dacians, &c. At this time he was solemnly crowned, the Kings of Scotland, Cornwall, North and South-Wales, carrying four golden swords before him (r). Not long after this, the Romans demanded tribute, which Arthur, by the advice of his council, not only refused, but resolved to make war upon them. A mighty army he gathered, and marched to Southampton where he embarked, leaving the government of Britain to his nephew Modred, the son of Lot, by his sister Anne, beforementioned. But while he was a coasting about the island, he had news brought him, that a Spanish giant had forcibly taken away Helena, the daughter of his nephew Hoel, Duke of Brittany, whom he had carried to mount St Michael in Cornwall [C];

[C] Mount St Michael in Cornwall.] William of Malmesbury, in his Antiquities of Glattenbury, gives us a very circumstantial account of King Arthur's carrying one Ider, a Prince of the blood royal, to try his valour at a certain mount, called Brentenol, where he behaved very gallantly; but falling, through weariness, at length into a swoon, Arthur left him there for dead, which proved the cause of his really breathing his last in that place through want of help; to expiate which involuntary offence, Arthur gave to the monastery of Glattenbury, lands sufficient for the maintenance of twenty-four Monks to pray for the soul of Ider; and also bestowed on them gold and silver vessels, and other ecclesiastical ornaments (23). The same author in his catalogue of gifts made to the monastery hath these words. 'Imprimis Rex Arthurus tempore Britonum dedit Brentemaris, Poweldon, cum multis aliis terris in confinio sitis, pro anima Ider, ut supra tactum est, quas terras per Anglos, tunc Paganos, supervenientes ablatas; iterum post eorum conversionem ad fidem restituerunt cum pluribus aliis. i. e. thither the King pursuing him, slew him in single combat (s), after which he proceeded in the war he had first designed, and having therein triumphed over all the forces of the Roman empire, and slain with his own hand Lucius Tiberius, their General, as he was passing the Alps in order to go to Rome, he received advice, that Modred his nephew had revolted, and had married Guanhumara his Queen (t). This, says our historian, obliged him to desist from his enterprize against Leo, King of the Romans; wherefore, sending Hoel King of Britany with a great army to secure the peace of Gaul, he, with the rest of his forces, sailed for Britain. Modred, knowing the badness of his cause, endeavoured to fortify himself by many and great alliances; with this view he once more called in the Saxons, and also invited, by promising great sums of money, the Scots, Picts, and Irish, to fight under his banner. At length, having assembled eighty thousand men, he led them down into Kent, to oppose his uncle, who he knew intended to land there. He could not however prevent Arthur's coming on shore, but he presently engaged him, and after a bloody battle, in which many of the King's friends fell, was defeated and forced to fly to Winchester. As for the Queen, she retired to the city of Caerleon, and there became a Nun (u). King Arthur pursued his nephew to Winchester, and there a second time engaged him, beat him, and forced him to fly towards Cornwall. There, on the banks of the river Camel, Modred made a stand again with sixty thousand men, with whom Arthur fought a third battle, wherein after thousands had been slain, and amongst them, many of the most honourable persons on both sides, at length, Modred himself was killed, and his army totally routed. In this engagement however, our hero Arthur received several wounds, which forced him to retire into the island of Avalon, where, feeling himself extremely weak, he resigned the crown to Constantine, the son of Cadoc Duke of Cornwall, and a few days after died, A. D. 542. (w). It is necessary to add a little sober truth to this romantick story, and therefore let us conclude this article with observing, that Henry II, who was the first of the Plantagenet line, being in the last year of his reign at Pembroke, and hearing there a Welsh bard singing to his harp, the story of our Arthur, concluding with an account of his death and burial, in the churchyard of Glastenbury, between two pyramids [D]; the King instantly gave orders that the matter should be inquired into, and the body dug up. This was done as the King directed, and at the depth of seven feet, was found a vast stone, whereon was fastened a leaden cross, with this inscription on the inside: Hic Jacet Sepultus Inclutus Rex Arturius in Insula Avalonia, i. e. Here lieth the famous King Arthurbur, buried in the Isle of Avalon. Digging still lower, they found the King's body in the trunk of a tree, his beautiful Queen lying by him, with long flowing hair, in colour bright as gold, which however sunk into dust when touched. The King's bones were very large sized, and in his skull there were ten wounds or more, all cicatrized, except that of which he died. This discovery was made in the year 1189, as Giraldus Cambrensis tells us, who saw these bones, and examined the whole matter carefully (x). There was also a table containing this story, set up in the monastery of Glastenbury, and the leaden cross with the inscription, remained there till the dissolution of the monastery, where it was seen by the great antiquary, Leland (y), but what is become thereof since, does not appear.

King Arthur in the time of the Britons gave Bren-temar, Poweldon, with many other lands in the neighbourhood for the soul of Ider, as is before-mentioned, which lands on the coming of the English, then Pagans, were taken away; and after their coming to the knowledge of the faith restored with many others (24). It is to be observed, that this fact does not rest at all on the credit of Geoffrey of Monmouth, or of his original author, but was taken from the records of the Abbey of Glastenbury.

[D] Between two pyramids. As to the discovery of King Arthur's body, we have not only the testimony of Giraldus Cambrensis, who was an eyewitness of it (25), but we have also a very long account in Bromton's Chronicle, who takes occasion from thence to speak of various circumstances relating to the history of King Arthur, from other authorities than that of Geoffrey of Monmouth. For instance, he tells us, that in certain Chronicles it was noted, that Arthur having again and again vanquished Cerdic the Saxon, and finding that he still brought new armies into the field, being quite tired out, he granted him Hampshire and Somersetshire, where he established the kingdom of the West Saxons. He says likewise, that in the English Chronicles, it was recorded, that when Modred rebelled against his uncle, he purchased the assistance of Cerdic by a new grant, and as it should seem, by releasing him from all homage. For thereupon Cerdic was crowned after the custom of the Pagans at Winchester, and Modred at London. This writer reduces the victories gained by Arthur over the Saxons to nine, whereas all other authors reckon them twelve; he fixes however the last of them at Lansdown. He also fixes the Year in which King Arthur's body was found to the 13th of the reign of Henry II, and to the year of our Lord 1180 (26). He differs in this from another very authentic account of this fact, not in any circumstance, but in the date, which in the Annals of Margan is 1191. Therein it is said, that digging under the two pyramids to bury a Monk, there was first found the body of a woman, after that the body of a man, and a great way below both the stone and cross, bearing the inscription mentioned in the text, under which lay the body of King Arthur. The first is supposed to be the body of his Queen, and the second that of his nephew Modred (27). Not to tire the Reader, let us shut up this matter with one observation more; which is, that in the larger History of Winchester, we are told, that Arthur yielded in the second year of his reign to Cerdic the Saxon, Hampshire, Surrey, Wiltshire and Somersetshire, to which Modred when he rebelled, added Dorsetshire, Devonshire, and part of Cornwall. The author of this history, is so far from transcribing Geoffrey of Monmouth, that he inveighs bitterly against his work, and therefore must have taken these passages from what he thought better authority (28).

1187 (a). In right of his mother he was heir apparent to the Dukedom of Britany, and to many Lordships, and on this account he was left under the care of his mother, notwithstanding the relation he had to the Royal Family of England [A]. The Lady Constantia did not long remain a widow, but took for her second husband the Earl of Chester (b), however she had still the care of her son, and in all probability was well treated, and her son for some years beloved, and cared for by her brother-in-law King Richard, who had so great a respect to the right of succession, and such an affection for his young nephew, that in the year 1190, in a letter directed to the Pope, and dated from Messina in Sicily, on the eleventh of November (c), he declares his dearest nephew Arthur his heir, in case he died without issue by his Queen, and also by an article in his treaty with Tancred King of Sicily, he stipulated that this nephew, Arthur, when he grew up, should take to wife the daughter of the King of Sicily. The next year after he provided by a treaty with the King of France, that the Dukedom of Britany should be for ever held of the Duke of Normandy, and that the Duke of Normandy should answer to the King of France for both Dukedoms (d). Yet in the year 1199, when this Prince was so unfortunate as to receive a mortal wound before the castle of Chalus, he devised to his brother John the kingdom of England, and all his other dominions, caused such as were present to swear fealty to him, directing also that his castles should be immediately put into his hands, with three fourths of his treasures (e). In all probability, it was the Queen-mother Eleanor who persuaded King Richard to take this step in disinheriting his nephew Arthur, who was then but twelve years old, neither are our ancient historians silent, as to the motives which induced the old Queen to act in this manner. She was, as all writers agree, a proud, ambitious woman, and the Lady Constantia, Duchess of Britany, having also a very high spirit, the Queen foresaw that in case her son ascended the throne, she should thence forward have little or no credit, which made her, to the utmost of her power, promote her son John's claim, against that of her grandson Arthur's. Several of the Norman, and most of the English Lords, stuck to the first mentioned Prince, who, very shortly after caused himself to be invested Duke of Normandy, and declared King of England. The inequality indeed was great between the competitors, for King John was in the prime of life, being in his thirty-third year, whereas Arthur was not much above twelve (f). Yet there wanted not some persons of distinction, who, out of pure respect to justice, espoused his quarrel, Thomas Desmures, governor of the city of Angiers, rendered it with the castle to Duke Arthur, and the Barons and great men of Anjou, Tourain, and Main, having met together, recognized the young Prince for their Lord, whom his mother brought to the city of Tours, and there delivered him to Philip King of France, who solemnly received him, and all his dominions, under his protection (g). This so provoked his competitor John, that he immediately attacked the city of Main, and having reduced it, treated the inhabitants with great severity, for the affection they had shewn to Duke Arthur. After this exploit, John went over into England to be crowned, while Arthur remained in the court of King Philip, who gave him strong assurances of his favour and assistance (h). In pursuance of these promises, King Philip committed many hostilities in the countries belonging to King John, and having raised a considerable army in the summer, he in the beginning of the month of August knighted his pupil Arthur, and received his homage for Anjou, Poictou, Tourain, Main, Britany, and Normandy, so that he seemed now absolutely engaged in the cause of the young Prince. King John returning into Normandy, first sought to have entered into a treaty with King Philip, and being disappointed therein, prepared the best he could to resist his enemies. In the beginning of the month of October, the King of France took the castle of Balun, and put a garrison into it. This highly offended William de Roche, whom the Latin writers call de Rupibus, who commanded the forces of Duke Arthur, inasmuch that after having expostulated, to no purpose, with King Philip, he reconciled the young Prince to his uncle, to whom he delivered the city of Mans, of which he was governor, and put Duke Arthur and his mother Constance into the King's hands. Things did not long continue in this condition,

[A] Royal Family of England] His father Geoffrey, fourth son to Henry II, King of England, was born on the 23d of September 1158 (1), and his father, King Henry, while he was yet a child, declared he should marry Constantia heirs of Britany, who was also a child, and under colour of this marriage reduced the whole Duchy under his obedience (2). In the year 1186, he had the misfortune to fall off his horse at a tournament in Paris, and being trampled under feet, was so terribly bruised that he died, leaving by his wife, Constantia, an only daughter Eleanor, to whom Philip King of France claimed to be guardian, which was disputed by King Henry of England, and in the interim Constantia was delivered of Arthur (3). That on the demise of Richard I, Arthur should claim his succession in England and in France, appears highly reasonable from this account of his birth. On the other hand, he had some other pretensions at least to friends and favourers, derived to him from his mother, for her mother was Margaret, sister to William King of Scotland, and niece to Edgar Atheling, right heir to the Crown of England of the Saxon line (4).

dition, for the lady Constantia, and those about her, suspecting King John intended to imprison her son, made haste away with him to the city of Angiers, where, by virtue of a dispensation from the Pope, lady Constantia quitted her second husband the Earl of Chester, and married Guy de Tours (i). In the beginning of the next year, there were some negotiations between the Kings of France and England, which at length ended in a peace, wherein Duke Arthur was included, and the two Kings having an interview near the city of Vernon, Arthur, by consent of the French King, did homage to his uncle for the Dukedom of Britany, and this ceremony over returned with King Philip to Paris, as having no great confidence in King John (k). In the year 1201, that King returned into Normandy, and, on an invitation from King Philip, went to Paris, where he was kindly received, though after his return into Normandy, some disputes grew between them. In 1202, the King had another interview, at which Philip haughtily required King John, to yield to his nephew all that he possessed in France without exception, and this extraordinary demand occasioned a war. In the course of these disputes Duke Arthur, with a considerable army, entered Poictou, and having subdued it, with the countries of Tourain and Anjou, he suddenly came with his forces before the castle of Mirabeau, where Queen Eleanor, his grandmother, at this time had her residence. The success of this young Prince, had drawn numbers into his service, so that he attacked the place with a great army, and made himself master of all but the middle tower where the Queen was; in this distress she wrote to her son John, earnestly beseeching him to come to her assistance. The King extremely alarmed at his mother's danger, marched night and day to afford her relief, inasmuch that he appeared before Mirabeau at a time when he was not expected, and taking advantage of the enemy's confusion, he attacked, and entirely defeated them. This was on the first of August, 1202, as appears by King John's letter to the Barons of England, wherein he gives them a full account of this victory, and of his taking his nephew Arthur, and many other noble prisoners. This blow was fatal to our young Prince, and to his family. He had been a little before contracted to the King of France's youngest daughter, but now all hopes of his consummating that marriage were lost, his only sister, Eleanor, named, by the common people, the damsel of Britain, fell likewise into the hands of King John, who sent her over into England, where she remained a prisoner many years in the castle of Bristol (l). As for Duke Arthur, the King sent him to the castle of Falais, under the custody of his chamberlain Hubert, and not long after the King went thither himself. There it is said he treated his nephew very gently, intreated him to lay aside all thoughts of adhering, as hitherto he had done, to the French King, exhorting him rather to depend, as he ought, on him his uncle and sovereign, to these speeches the young Prince somewhat anadvisedly answered, that he was the lawful heir, not only of his uncle Richard's French dominions, but of the crown of England also, which if he did not yield to him, he should not long wear in peace. This answer was certainly bold enough, but as it came from a boy scarce turned of fifteen years of age, it ought not to have provoked the King so much as it seems it did, who thereupon caused him to be removed to the castle of Rouen, where, under the custody of Robert de Vypont, he was much more closely confined than before (m). After this King John returned into England, where he continued not long before he entertained strange thoughts with respect to his unhappy nephew. He was it seems so apprehensive of the claim that he, and his descendants, might have to the dominions of King Richard, that he resolved to have Arthur's eyes put out, and to have him farther deprived of the power of begetting children. From this barbarous project however he was dissuaded, either by his chamberlain Hubert, or by his mother Queen Eleanor, who began now (when it was too late) to express a great tenderness for her unhappy grandson, for whose misfortunes it is said she not long after broke her heart (n). But though the King was diverted from one cruel design, it hath been always strongly suspected that he put another in practice, since in the spring of the next year, Duke Arthur disappeared, and was never more seen (o). The French authors in general, and not a few English writers, charge King John expressly either with committing, or commanding the murder; and though some very learned men have taken no small pains to free that Prince's memory from so foul a stain, yet so weak are their arguments, that, to any impartial reader, they must rather prejudice than promote the opinion they maintain [B]. [B] The opinion they maintain. The Honour of King John in this particular, is best supported in that chronicle which passes under the name of Speed, but is in truth the work of several hands, this reign particularly being written by the learned Dr Barkham (5). 'As the tongues of parasites, says he, are no true scales to weigh the worth and virtues of great men; so neither ought we to judge of their (or any man's) blemishes, by the deforming pencils of envy or rancour; with one of which, no eminency, either of place or virtue, was ever unattended. And that this bloody aspersions on the King, came from no other fountain but malignity; such as then lived, and might therefore best know the truth, and were also (as Monks generally were) his most bitter taxers, and therefore far from salving his infamy with partial falsehood, can but witness. It was (saith one) (6) by certain persons avowed, that Arthur attempting to escape secretly out of hold, was by casualty drowned in the river Seyne (on which the castle of Roan is seated); and yet the Frenchmen, the King's mortal enemies, (and therefore plenary credit not to be given them) give it out that he was murdered by the King's command, yea and by his own hands; thus by the malice of slanderers, England's King became not a little

John, has given us an admirable picture of this transaction, wherein (so far as we can gather from history) he presents to the eyes of his audience the true characters of those illustrious persons he introduces, inasmuch that whoever reads this play, after consulting our best historians, will read it with double pleasure, as perceiving thence, after how exquisite a manner this great genius hath united truth and poetry (p) [C]. Some authors inform us, that Constantia, Duchess of Brittany, and mother of Arthur, appealed King John before Philip, and the Peers of France, for the murder of her son, Arthur (q). Yet this admits of some doubt, since Roger Hoveden who lived in those times, and who concludes his history the year before the battle of Mirabell, mentions the death of Constantia (r), and there are other authors who agree in the same date. But that such a suit was commenced against King John, and judgment given thereupon is certain (s), as also that the famous John de Courcy, Earl of Ulster in Ireland, openly called him traitor, murderer, and refused to pay him any obedience on account of

of little defamed, with whom other the approved authors accord, (though differing in the manner of his death) that this imputation sprang only from the French emulation, as since it hath been kept on foot, only by French and Italianate spirits, one of which hath not blushed to charge King John with murdering of his own brother King Richard (7), and another with killing Arthur's sister, who yet out-lived him twenty-four years (8); so shamelessly will the pen blur the truth of actions, where it is once dipped in gall against the person. Stripped of the Doctor's fine language, there is not either argument or authority in any thing he says. Parafites seldom speak evil of princes, and as to the only author he cites in King John's favour, I mean Matthew Paris, he says in his larger history (9), which is also most authentick, what does not make for the Doctor's purpose at all. 'Sed non multo post, idem Arthurus subito evanuit, modo fere omnibus ignorato, utinam non ut fama refert invida. i. e. Not long after this, Arthur suddenly vanished in a manner few are acquainted with, not I hope as spiteful report speaks!' Trivet whom he likewise cites, says only that King John was scandalized about his death (10), which is no proof that he did not kill him. Then as to charging King John with the murder of Duke Arthur's sister, he is not quite so clear of it as might be wished, she was his lawful Sovereign after the death of her brother, and yet he kept her a close prisoner so long as he lived, and left her in that prison where she died (11). If only French writers reported that he murdered his nephew, we might be inclined to suspect their authority, but it is in truth affirmed by all sorts of writers foreign and domestick. It is asserted in the old Chronicles of Normandy, that the King caused him to be drowned (12), and from thence I suppose the French writers borrowed it, as we shall hear more at large hereafter. Thomas Sprott, who wrote in the reign of Henry III, son to King John tells us roundly, 'Ite interfecit Arturum Nepotem suum, i. e. This Man murdered his nephew Arthur' (13). In those days very probably it was not safe to say more. However, an author whose works are still preserved in the library of Trinity College in Cambridge, tells the tale out. 'Dum adhuc esset in Aquitanum comprehensum puerum, (scilicet Arthurum Nepotem suum) dolo tenuit & occidit per manum Armigeri sui Petri de Malo Lacu, cui postea heredem Baronie de Mulgrefse dedit uxorem. i. e. While he was in Aquitain, he seized the young Man, (Arthur his nephew) kept him basely, and caused him to be slain by the hand of his Esquire, Peter de Malo Lacu, to whom afterwards he gave the heiress of the Barony of Mulgrefse to wife.' This seems to be the truth, and therefore I publish it. The Chronicle of Godstow Abbey places the fact in a worse light, for he tells us, that on the day of April 1203, King John having taken his nephew in battle, directed some of his knights to go and murder him in prison, but they refusing, himself entered the place where Arthur was, and drawing his sword, thrust the lad through as he was upon his knees (15). This murder is reported after another manner by Rapin (16), there want not, says he, some historians who write that John caused him to be put into a boat in a very dark night, at the foot of the Tower where he had been kept prisoner, where he stabbed him with his own hands, and then ordered the body to be carried some leagues below Rouen, and there thrown into the Sein. These discordant accounts of the murder are very far from defraying the credit of each other, because such murders as this was must be secret in it's nature, and consequently though the fact was ever so certain, there would be various reports about it. The thing however was so flagrant, that King John, as Duke of Normandy, was charged with it before his Peers at Paris; and, on his non-appearance, condemned to lose all the lands he held in France. Camden tells us (17), that he offered to appear if he might have had a safe conduct, which however was refused him, on account perhaps of the nature of the crime with which he was charged. Dr Barkham in his before-mentioned history, is pleased to say, that the King might have justified his putting his nephew to death, whom he took in open arms fighting against him his Sovereign (18). This however is odd doctrine, considering who Arthur was, and how indisputable his title to those lands for which he fought. On the whole therefore, how much partiality soever there may be in the Monkish writers against King John in other respects, in this they seem to have done him no great wrong; and if he was innocent, he shewed little care to do himself right, otherwise he might certainly have given a clearer account of this affair, or at least he might have told where his nephew was buried.

[C] This great genius hath united truth and poetry.] The whole Tragedy of the Life and Death of King John, is truly beautiful. In this note, however, I shall meddle with nothing, but what relates to the story of Arthur. In the first place, I must remark the wisdom, as well as justice of the poet, in making John thought by every body, nay even by himself, an intruder, and no lawful possessor either of the Crown of England, or of the Duchy of Normandy. In this he kept close to history, for in reality he was never owned for such, but by those who found it their interest. Hubert, Archbishop of Canterbury, as appears by his oration (19), which is still extant, would have made him an elective King. If so, this would serve his purpose only in England, in France the title of Duke Arthur was clear, he claimed the French dominions as heir to his Uncle Richard, and the great lords in those countries, who were the best judges of the rule of descent, acknowledged his title. On this ground, Constance, throughout the Play, refuses all kind of treaty with King John, which is consistent with her character, tho' not exactly agreeable to history. The quarrels between her and Queen Eleanor, are founded on the testimony of credible authors, and, as far as we can judge at this distance of time, the poet makes her say nothing, but what we may well suppose she might have said. The reproaches thrown on Philip King of France, for owning and disowning the cause of Arthur, just as his interest led him, are just and grounded in reason. The character of Arthur, was entirely in his own hands, he was at liberty to give that young Prince what manners he pleased, provided only he gave him spirit, of which our histories assure us he had a large share. The scenes between the Prince and Hubert are strong and lively, agreeing perfectly well with the account given us by Coggeshal. It may not be amiss, to note here, that this Hubert, Chamberlain to King John, is the famous Hubert de Burgh, of whom the reader may see more in another place. As to the manner of Arthur's death, Shakespear might take what tale he liked best; and accordingly, he has taken that which least injured the memory of King John, whom he treats as a lawful Prince in the latter part of the Play. On the whole therefore, as the force of his genius strikes us at first sight, so a reverence for his deep judgment and great knowledge in English history, must necessarily arise from an attentive consideration of this, and indeed of all his performances of this kind. E

ARVIRAGUS, an ancient British King, flourished in the time of the Emperor Domitian [A], when Sallustius Lucullus was Lieutenant for the Romans in Britain (a). The British historians, especially Geoffrey of Monmouth, place him in the reign of the Emperor Claudius, whose enterprize against Britain he is said to have opposed. The account we have of Arviragus in that author is generally esteemed to be fabulous: however the substance of it is as follows: Kymbelinus, when he had governed Britain ten years, begat two sons, the elder named Guiderius, and the younger Arviragus. Kymbelinus being dead, Guiderius, who succeeded him, resolved to shake off the Roman yoke, and began with refusing to pay the usual tribute: whereupon the Emperor Claudius undertook an expedition into Britain (b) [B]. In a battle which ensued between the Romans and the Britons, Guiderius was treacherously killed by Leuis Hamo, a Roman [C]: whereupon Arviragus, putting on his brother's habillements, and heading the Britons, gained a victory over Claudius (c) [D]. But being soon after besieged

Non cedit Veiento; sed ut fanaticus œstro
Percussus, Bellona, tuo, divinat, &, ingens
Omen habes, inquit, magni clarique triumphi.
Regem aliquem capies, aut de temone Britanno Excidet Arviragus (1).

Some captive King thee his new Lord shall own;
Or, from his British chariot headlong thrown,
The proud Arviragus come tumbling down.

The author of the Chronicle of Dover (2) understands this passage as addressed to Nero; I suppose, because the poet introduces the story, of which they are a part, with these lines:

Cum jam femianimum laceraret Flavius orbem Ultimus, & calvo ferviret Roma Neroni (3).

(2) Chron. Dover. apud Leland, Collectan. Vol. II. p. 50.

(3) Juv. ib. ver. 37.

When he, with whom the Flavian race decay'd,
The groaning world with iron scepter sway'd,
When a bald Nero reign'd, and servile Rome
obey'd. Ibid.

But this is a plain description of the Emperor Domitian, who was the last and worst of the Flavian family, and is here called calvus Nero (a bald Nero) both on account of his cruelty, in which he resembled that Emperor, and his baldness, by which he was distinguished from him. Let us add, that the above-mentioned compliment would have been a very insipid piece of flattery to Domitian, unless Arviragus were a considerable Prince then living, and an enemy to the Romans. And therefore there is no ground for the opinion of Alford (4), who contends, that Arviragus is the same as Caracallus, who was conquered by Claudius, and that Juvenal uses the name by a poetical licence, tho' he lived long before. The probability of the case seems to be, that, in Domitian's time, after the recalling Agricola, and taking away the life of Sallustius Lucullus his successor, the Britons took up arms under Arviragus. And the learned Primate of Armagh (5) mentions an old British coin in Sir R. Cotton's Collections, with these letters on it,

(4) Annal. Eccl. ad an. 45. p. 9.

from whence he thinks his true name was Arivogus, which the Romans changed to Arviragus. The Britons being now up in arms, as far as we can learn, were not repressed till the Emperor Adrian came over in person, and built the first wall, to keep them out of the Roman Province. For, before this time, Spartian (6) tells us, the Britons could not be kept in subjection to the Roman power. So that here was a fit season, in Domitian's time (Agricola being re-called in the beginning of that Emperor's reign) for such a King as Arviragus to appear at the head of the Britons, and it was then a suitable compliment to Domitian to wish him a triumph over Arviragus.

[B] The Emperor Claudius undertook an expedition into Britain.] He was attended in this expedition (says the Monmouth historian) by the commander of his army, who was called in the British tongue Leuis Hamo; by whose advice the succeeding war was to be carried on. This man therefore, arriving at the city of Portcestre, began to block up the gates with a wall, and denied the citizens all liberty of passing out. For his design was, either to reduce them under subjection by famine, or to kill them without mercy (7). Guiderius, upon the news of Claudius's coming, assembled all the soldiery of the kingdom, and marched to meet the Roman army, which he attacked with great eagerness, doing more execution with his own sword, than the greater part of his soldiers (8).

(7) Galfrid. Monumeth. Hist. Brit. lib. iv. c. 12.

(8) Ibid. c. 13.

[C] Guiderius was treacherously killed by Leuis Hamo.] Claudius was now just upon retreating to his ships, and the Romans very near routed, when the crafty Hamo, throwing aside his own armour, put on that of the Britons, and as a Briton fought against his own men. Then he exhorted the Britons to a vigorous assault, promising them a speedy victory. For he had learned their language and manners, as having been educated among the British hostages at Rome. By this means he approached by little and little to the King; and seeing his opportunity of access, he stabbed him while under no apprehension of danger, and then escaped through the enemies ranks, to return to his men with the news of this detestable exploit (9).

(9) Ibid.

[D] Arviragus — gained a victory over Claudius.] The Britons, knowing nothing of Guiderius's death, fought courageously, under the conduct of Arviragus, and killed no small number of the enemy. At last the Romans gave ground, and dividing themselves into two bodies basely quitted the field. Claudius, with one part, to secure himself, retired to his ships; but Hamo to the woods, because he had not time to get to the ships. Arviragus, thinking that Claudius fled along with Hamo, pursued him with speed, nor left off harassing them from place to place, till he overtook them upon a part of the sea-coast, which from the name of Hamo is now called Southampton. There was at the same place a convenient haven for ships, and some merchant-ships at anchor. And just as Hamo was attempting to get on board them, Arviragus came upon him unawares, and forthwith killed him. And ever since that time the haven has been called Hamo's port (10).

besieged by that Prince in the city of Winchester, he made his submission to the Romans, and, in consequence of the treaty, married the Emperor's daughter Genuiffa (d) [E]. Matters being thus accommodated, Claudius returned to Rome, and left to Arviragus the government of the British Islands (e). After the departure of the Romans, Arviragus became a very powerful Prince; and this so elevated him with pride, that he disdained any longer subjection to the Romans, and assumed to himself an independent authority. Whereupon Vespasian was sent against him into Britain [F]; and, upon the arrival of this General, a great battle was fought, in which neither side got the victory: but, the morning after the fight, by the mediation of Queen Genuiffa, the two leaders were reconciled; Vespasian returned to Rome, and Arviragus remained in Britain. This monarch lived to a good old age, governing his kingdom in peace, confirming the old laws of his ancestors, enacting new ones, and liberally rewarding persons of merit: so that his fame spread all over Europe; and he was both loved and feared by the Romans, and became the subject of their discourse more than any King of his time. After his death, he was buried at Gloucester, in a certain temple, which he had built and dedicated to the honour of the Emperor Claudius (f). This is the substance of Geoffrey of Monmouth's narrative. There is an old tradition, that, in the time of this British King, Joseph of Arimathea came over into Britain, and planted the Gospel here [G].

A R U N D E L

[E] He made his submission to the Romans, and married the Emperor's daughter Genuiffa.] Claudius having employed variety of engines against the city, Arviragus assembled his troops, and opened the gates, to march out and give him battle. But just as he was ready to begin the attack, Claudius, who feared the boldness of the King, and the bravery of the Britons, sent a message to him with offers of peace; as chusing to reduce the Britons by wisdom and policy, rather than hazard a battle. To this purpose he offered a reconciliation with him, and promised to give him his daughter, if he would acknowledge the kingdom of Britain subject to the Roman State. The nobility hereupon persuaded Arviragus to lay aside thoughts of war, and be contented with Claudius's promise; representing to him, that it was no disgrace to be subject to the Romans, who enjoyed the empire of the whole world. By these and many other arguments he was prevailed upon to hearken to their advice, and so made his submission to Cæsar. Which done, Claudius sent to Rome for his daughter, and then, with the assistance of Arviragus, reduced the Orkney and the Provincial Islands under his power (11). As soon as the winter was over, those who were sent for Claudius's daughter, returned with her, and presented her to her father. The damsel's name was Genuiffa, and so great was her beauty, that it raised the admiration of all who saw her. After her marriage to the King, she gained such an ascendant over his affections, that he in a manner valued nothing but her alone: insomuch that he was desirous to have the place honoured where the nuptials were solemnized, and moved Claudius to build a city in memory of so great and happy a marriage. Claudius consented thereto, and commanded a city to be built, which after his name was called Kaerglou, that is, Gloucester, being situated on the confines of Demetia and Loegria, upon the banks of the Severn. But some say, it derived its name from Gloius, who was born to Claudius there, and to whom, after the death of Arviragus, fell the Dukedom of Demetia (12). This story of Arviragus's marriage must be a mere fiction, if Claudius had no daughter named Genuiffa. But the Roman Historians, who should best know, mention only three daughters of that Emperor, named Claudia, Antonia, and Octavia.

[F] Vespasian was sent against Arviragus into Britain.] As Vespasian was just arrived at the haven of Rutupi, Arviragus met him, and hindered him from entering the port. For he had brought so great an army along with him, as was a terror to the Romans, who for fear of his falling upon them durst not come ashore. Upon this Vespasian withdrew from that port, and shifting his sails arrived at the shore of Totness. As soon as he was landed, he marched directly to besiege Kaerpenbuelgoit, now Exeter; and after lying before the town seven days, he was overtaken by Arviragus and his army, who gave him battle (13).

[G] An ancient tradition, that, in the time of Arviragus, Joseph of Arimathea came over into Britain, and planted the Gospel here.] Though it will appear presently that this tradition has really nothing to do with King Arviragus, yet since the pretended coming of Joseph of Arimathea into Britain has been ascribed to the times of that Prince, and Arviragus is supposed to have been a benefactor to that Missionary and his companions, I think proper to take notice here of so remarkable a piece of ecclesiastical antiquity. The tradition in question is to be found in William of Malmesbury's Book Of the Antiquity of the Church of Glasfenbury. That writer, after some prefatory discourse to Henry of Blois, nephew to King Henry I, and at that time Bishop of Winchester and Abbot of Glasfenbury, proceeds in his narrative of the antiquities of that church in the manner following. 'After the glorious Resurrection and triumphant Ascension of our blessed Saviour, and the Descent of the Holy Ghost, the success of the Gospel began to spread, the number of believers increased daily, and all of them maintained such a friendly and charitable correspondence, that they seemed to have but one heart and one soul. The Jewish Priests, with the Scribes and Pharisees, growing envious at the progress of Christianity, stirred up a persecution against the Church, murdered the Protomartyr St Stephen, and made the country too troublesome for the rest. Thus the storm blowing hard in Jewry, the disciples dispersing went off into several countries, according to their respective commissions, and, as they travelled along, preached the Gospel to the Gentiles. Among these holy men, St Philip (as Freculphus relates, lib. ii. cap. 4.) arriving in the territories of the Franks, converted a great number of them: and being desirous to enlarge his Master's kingdom, he picked out twelve of his disciples, and dispatched them to preach the Gospel in Britain; Joseph of Arimathea, as it is said, being one of the number, and constituted a superior to the rest. These holy Missionaries coming into Britain, in the year of our Lord 63, and in the 15th of the blessed Virgin's Assumption, published the doctrine of Christ with great industry and courage. But the barbarous King and his subjects being somewhat alarmed at so unusual an undertaking, and not relishing a persuasion so different from his own, refused to become a proselyte; but in consideration of the length of their journey, and being somewhat charmed with their unexceptionable behaviour, gave them a little spot of ground, surrounded with fens and bushes, to dwell in. This place was called Ynswitrin by the natives, and situated upon the confines of his dominions. Afterwards two other Pagan Kings, being affected with their remarkable sanctity, gave each of them a certain proportion of ground, and, at their request, settled twelve Hides of land on them, by instruments in writing, according to the custom of the country: from whence it is supposed the twelve Hides, now part of the Abbey's estate, had their denomination (14). Malmesbury proceeds to relate the occasion and manner of these Missionaries building a church, which, he says, was the first in the island. The place where it was built was afterwards called Glasfenia or Glasfenbury; and the King, who was thus kind to Joseph of Arimathea and his companions, is said to be Arviragus:

Glastonix bis sex Hidas dedit Arviragus Rex (15).

I shall not enter upon the question concerning the authenticity of this tradition, any farther than to shew, that, at the time of Joseph's supposed arrival, there could be no such British King as Arviragus is said to have been. For, according to the tradition, Joseph of Arimathea came into Britain in the year of our Lord 63. Now the more southern parts of the island, where Glastenbury stands, were seized by the Romans, and formed into a province, before that time. For, as Tacitus reports (16), the hithermost part of Britain was gained and planted by Aulus Plautius and Ostorius Scapula, and several colonies of the veteran troops were fixed there. Now between these two governors, and Suetonius Paulinus, were Didius Gallus and Veranius; and probably the Belgæ were subdued by Vespasian, who commanded under Plautius, of whom Suetonius relates (17), that he conquered here two powerful nations, above twenty towns, and the Isle of Wight. By which we may conclude his expeditions lay westward. Now the Belgæ and Danmonii were the two powerful nations that way; and in all the progress of the war against the Britons afterwards, we find no care taken by the Roman Generals to secure themselves against the Belgæ, as they did against the Brigantes and Silures, among whom Caractacus commanded: so that there could be no such British King at that time among the Belgæ, as Arviragus is supposed to have been. For had there been such a Prince among that people, we cannot suppose that, when Ostorius marched northward against the Cangi or Cheeshire-men (18), he would have fixed his garrisons on the Severn and the Avon, to secure the province. For, had there been such a British King as Arviragus among the Belgæ, what would the fortifying the Severn have signified, when the enemies to the Romans lived on the Roman side?

ARUNDEL (THOMAS), Archbishop of Canterbury in the reigns of Richard II, Henry IV, and Henry V, was the second son of Robert Fitz-Alan, Earl of Arundel and Warren, and brother of Richard Earl of Arundel, who was afterwards beheaded. He was but twenty-two years of age, when, from being Archdeacon of Taunton, he was promoted to the Bishopric of Ely [A], by the Pope's provision [B], and consecrated at Otford, April 6, 1375, in the fiftieth year of King Edward III. He was a considerable benefactor to the church and palace of that See; and, among other donations, he presented them with a very curious table of massy gold, enriched with precious stones; which had been given to Prince Edward by the King of Spain, and sold by the latter to Bishop Arundel for three hundred marks. In the year 1386, the tenth of Richard II, this prelate was made Lord High Chancellor of England (a); but resigned that post upon his advancement afterwards to the See of Canterbury (b). After he had sat a little more than fourteen years in the See of Ely, he was translated to the Archbishopric of York, by virtue of the Pope's Bull, dated April 3, 1383 (c), and received the Pall the fourteenth of September following. He expended a very large sum of money in building a palace for the Archbishops of that See; and, besides other rich ornaments, he gave to that church several pieces of silver-gilt plate. In 1393, being then Chancellor, he removed the Courts of Justice from London to York [C]; and, as a precedent for so doing, he alledged the example of Archbishop Corbridge, who had taken the same step eighty years before (d). The See of Canterbury being vacant by the death of Dr William Courtney, Archbishop Arundel was translated thither by a papal provision. The Bull of translation was published at Canterbury the eleventh of January, 1396. The Crozier was delivered into his hands by Henry Chelenden, Prior of Canterbury, in the presence of the King, and a great number of the nobility. On the tenth of February following, he received the Pall, and on the nineteenth

[A] At twenty-two years of age — he was promoted to the Bishopric of Ely.] This is, I believe, the only instance of so young a prelate in all the English History. The King, it seems, had designed another person for that See, but could not carry his point. For, hearing of the death of Dr John Barnet Bishop of Ely, he wrote a very pressing letter to the Chapter, desiring them to elect his Confessor, John Woodroof. But the Monks, disregarding the King's recommendation, met together, and unanimously chose one Henry Wakefield. The Pope thought fit to set aside this election, and, by virtue of his apostolical authority, declared Thomas Arundel, Archdeacon of Taunton, Bishop of Ely. Bishop Godwin mentions this new prelate's age with an ironical sneer. 'Pontifex [says he] ex plenitudine potestatis Episcopum Eliensem declaravit, annosum quendam, quemque virum facile credas gravissimum, Thomam Arundellum, Roberti Comitis Arundellæ et Warrenæ filium, Tauntonensem archidiaconum, cum jam (6 capularum senem) ætatis annum explevisset fere vicefimum secundum, et subdiaconus nuper factus esset (1). — The Pope, by his own authority, advanced to the See of Ely a person of great age and weight, namely Thomas Arundel, son of Robert Earl of Arundel and Warren, and Archdeacon of Taunton, when he was just stepping into his grave, being then very near two and twenty years of age, and lately made a Subdeacon.'

[B] — By the Pope's provision.] The reality of this papal provision, in favour of Arundel, is disputed. For Godwin tells us (2), some writers are of opinion, he was canonically elected, because at that time the papal provisions were prohibited in England by authority of Parliament. It is true, the Statute of Provisors, whereby the Pope's authority in filling up the vacant bishopricks was taken away, is by the Statute-Books assigned to the year 1350 (3), twenty-five years earlier than the time in question. But it is certain the Pope still continued to exercise that power, since it was found necessary to confirm that Act with new penalties, in the year 1390 (4). To which may be added, that tho' the State was willing to get rid of this encroachment of the See of Rome, the Clergy were not so ready to part with it: for when the Statute abovementioned was confirmed, the Archbishops and Bishops made a solemn protestation in open Parliament, that they would not assent to any law, which should restrain the Pope's authority (5). But if there could be any doubt in this matter, the present article affords us two other unquestionable instances of the exercise of this power in the translations of Arundel to the Sees of York and Canterbury.

[C] He removed the Courts of Justice from London to York.] This he did, in order, as he said, to mortify the insolence and pride of the Londoners, with whom the King was at that time highly displeased. But whatever he might pretend, the Londoners affirmed, he did it only to gratify and enrich the inhabitants of York. Our author adds, that this design did not take place long: for after one or two Terms, the Courts returned to their old place. *Summa Angliæ Tribunalia Londino Eboracum traduxit, eo pacto optime dicens castigari Londinensium proteritiam atque superbiam, quibus rex ea tempestate suis admodum insensus. — Quicquid vero ille obtenderet, Eboracenses suos juvandi et locupletandi gratia hæc ipsum motum Londinenses affirmabant. teenth was enthroned with great pomp at Canterbury (e). It is observable, that this was the first instance of the translation of an Archbishop of York to the See of Canterbury (f). He was scarce fixed in that See, when he had a contest with the University of Oxford about the right of visitation [D]; which was determined by King Richard, to whom the decision was referred, in favour of the Archbishop (g). At his Visitation in London, he revived an old constitution, first set on foot by Simon Niger, Bishop of London; by which the inhabitants of the respective parishes were obliged to pay to their Rector one half-penny in the pound out of the rent of their houses (b). In the second year of his translation, a Parliament was held at London; in which the commons, with the King's leave, impeached the Archbishop, together with his brother the Earl of Arundel, and the Duke of Gloucester, of high-treason [E], for compelling the King, in the tenth year of his reign, to grant them a commission to govern the kingdom (i). The Archbishop was sentenced to be banished, and had forty days allowed him to prepare for his exile; within which time he was to depart the kingdom on pain of death (k). Being thus driven from his country and his See, he retired first into France, and then to the Court of Rome, where Pope Boniface IX gave him a very friendly reception, and wrote a letter to King Richard, desiring him to pass by the offence, and receive the Archbishop again into favour. But not meeting with success, his holiness resolved to interpose his authority in favour of Arundel. Accordingly he nominated him to the Archbishopric of St Andrews, and (which was a more disobliging stroke) declared his intention of giving him several other preferments in England, by way of provision (l). The King, being informed of the Pope's design,

[D] He had a contest with the University of Oxford about the right of visitation. The Canonists and Civilians of Oxford, being uneasy at some Statutes made to the disadvantage of their profession, preferred a complaint against the University to the Convocation then sitting at London. Their Delegate for this business was Michael Sergeaux Doctor of Laws, who set forth, that the University of Oxford had procured a Bull to exempt themselves from the jurisdiction both of their Diocesan and Metropolitan: that this Bull was rather a disservice than an advantage to that learned body, as it deprived the members of a remedy, in case of any injustice done to them by the Chancellor. This faculty therefore intreated the Archbishop, since he had an undisputable right to visit their University, that he would exert his authority, and revoke the Chancellor's pretended exemption. It was called a pretended Exemption, because, as Sergeaux alledged, the Bull had neither the Pope's seal, nor the subscription of any public Notary, to prove it authentic. Notwithstanding this objection, Dr Hyndman, the Chancellor, who was present in the Convocation, insisted upon the instrument, and entered a protest against any farther proceedings. After the breaking up of the Convocation, the Archbishop, designing to visit the University, was informed, that the Chancellor and Proctors were resolved to insist upon the Pope's Bull, and oppose the visitation. Whereupon a writ was issued out by the King's order, directed to the Chancellor and Students, requiring them not to oppose the jurisdiction of their Ordinary and Metropolitan, to renounce the Bull in form, and to send their act of renunciation to the King. It does not appear, that this writ was obeyed, or the Bull given up. However that some kind of submission was made, is very probable, since the Archbishop went to Oxford the May following, with a design to visit. It is true, he was opposed in the exercise of this jurisdiction; but it was upon a new plea: for now the University, waving their former privilege, pretended they were visitable by the crown only, and not by the Archbishop. This created a new dispute; which being at last referred to the King, his highness gave the cause against himself, and decided in favour of the Archbishop. But, notwithstanding this sentence, the visitation did not go on at that time (7).

[E] The Commons — impeached the Archbishop — of high-treason. The chief article of the charge was, that being Bishop of Ely and Lord Chancellor, he was traiterously aiding, procuring, and advising, in making a commission directed to Thomas Duke of Gloucester, Richard Earl of Arundel, and others, and procured himself, as one of the chief ministers of State, to be put into the said commission; which commission was apparently prejudicial to the King's prerogative and dignity; and that the said Thomas put the said commission in execution (8). The King, to whom the commons applied for leave to carry on the prosecution against the Archbishop, told them, that, in regard the impeachment concerned so great a person and a peer of the realm, he would be farther advised. But the commons resolving not to give over, and pressing the King farther, his highness replied, that the Archbishop had confessed to him before several Lords, that he had been guilty of imprudence in executing that commission, and threw himself upon the King's mercy. However, this not satisfying the commons, the King consented to the impeachment; and the Archbishop was adjudged a traitor, by the Lords Temporal, and Sir Thomas Piercy Proctor for the Bishops and Clergy (9). It will not be improper to observe, that Archbishop Arundel, though in the Parliament-House at his first impeachment, yet was absent the next day when sentence was pronounced against him. It seems, the King had commanded him not to come into the house, having first made him a promise of his friendship, and given him his oath that the Lords should do nothing to his prejudice (10). I shall subjoin Mr Collier's remarks upon this impeachment. 'This case affords another precedent of a Bishop's being tried by his Peers, it being plain by the Record, that judgment was given by the House of Lords; and that the Lords proceeded not in a legislative, but in a judicial way, is evident by the commons being only prosecutors in the case; whereas, had the Archbishop been found guilty by a bill of attainder, the votes of the commons would, have been necessary. And whereas none of the commons are concerned as judges in this trial, excepting Sir Thomas Piercy, who represented the Bishops and Clergy; we may observe from hence, in the second place, that the Bishops withdrawing from the House of Lords in causes of blood was only a voluntary absence, occasioned by the restraint of the Canons. Their retiring, I say, was a compliance with the discipline of the Church, and not any necessity forced upon them by the civil constitution. For now we see, since they had appointed a Lay-Proxy, their right of judging in criminal matters is not questioned. For the record informs us, that Sir Thomas Piercy, Proxy for the Prelates, gave judgment with the Temporal Lords against the Archbishop. Now this gentleman was no more than a commoner, and acted only upon the strength of his representation. If therefore the Bishops had been barred by the constitution from being judges in capital causes, Sir Thomas Piercy's powers would have been contested, neither would he have been allowed an equal share with the Temporal Peers in pronouncing this sentence: for a delegation cannot reach beyond the right of the principal, nor can any proxy have more authority than the person he represents (11).' It may be necessary, for the better understanding this last remark, to observe, that Sir Thomas Piercy, as Proctor for the Clergy, not only concurred in giving judgment against the Archbishop, but likewise in passing sentence on the Earl of Arundel, who was beheaded.

design, wrote an expostulatory letter to him [F]; which had so good an effect upon his Holiness, that he not only withheld the intended favours from Arundel, but likewise, at the King's request, promoted Roger Walden (m), Dean of York; and Lord Treasurer of England, to the See of Canterbury. That Prelate was installed the twenty-fifth of March, 1398 (n); but was soon obliged to quit his new dignity: for, the next year, Archbishop Arundel returned into England with the Duke of Lancaster [G], afterwards King Henry IV; upon whose accession to the throne, the Pope revoked the Bull granted to Walden, and restored Arundel to his See (o). Among the articles of misgovernment brought against King Richard, one was his usage and banishment of this Prelate [H]. The throne being vacant by Richard's resignation, and the

‘ Thomas, for his treasonable conspiracy against our crown and royal dignity, has been sentenced only to perpetual banishment; whereas, had he been dealt with answerably to his demerits, he ought to have suffered the punishment of high-treason: but in consideration of his character, and out of regard to religion, we have thought fit to grant him his life, and abated of the rigour of the law. But, since his going beyond sea, both ourself and our subjects are much surprized at the turn of his fortune: for we are informed, he has been invited to your Holiness's court, countenanced in his misbehaviour, taken into your protection, and put in hopes of recovering his See, or at least of being promoted in our kingdom to benefices of greater value than those he enjoyed before. How destructive such unaccountable favours as these must be to our dignity and government, and to what apparent danger it may expose us, is easy to imagine. For which reason, we are resolved not to bear with such treatment, tho' the whole world were of a different opinion. For we are thoroughly acquainted with this man: We know him to be of a turbulent seditious temper; who, if he were permitted to live in our dominions, would return to his old practices, poison our subjects with misreporting the administration, and endeavour to undermine our government. For it is probable he would use sufficient precaution not to fall under the lash of the law. We desire therefore, that your Holiness would prevent these opportunities of mischief, and not shock our interest and inclinations by such favours. For should such measures be put in execution, it is possible they might create such misunderstandings between the Crown and the Mitre, as it might prove difficult to remove. For, to speak plainly, we cannot take that person for our friend, who caresses our enemies, and takes them by the hand in so loving a manner. However, if you have a mind to provide for him otherwise, we have nothing to object; only we cannot allow him to dip in our dish. We heartily desire you would take this matter into serious consideration, as you tender our royal regards, and expect a compliance with any future request your Holiness may make to us (12).’

[G] He returned into England with the Duke of Lancaster.] The Nobility, Gentry, and Commons of England, having been for several years intolerably oppressed and slighted by King Richard and his favourites, contrived to fettle the Crown on another head, which might govern them with greater prudence and lenity. The person, whom they pitched upon as fittest to sway the scepter, was Henry of Bolingbroke, Duke of Lancaster and Hereford; who, being the Son of John of Gaunt Duke of Lancaster, fourth son of Edward III, was nearly allied to the Crown. I shall not enter into the particulars of this conspiracy against King Richard, which ended in placing the Duke of Lancaster on the throne; but shall confine my self to that part of it, in which Archbishop Arundel was concerned. The Duke of Lancaster, it is well known, had been banished by King Richard, and was in France when he was solicited by the nobility and others to take the crown. This their request they drew up in a letter, and sent it over by faithful messengers to Archbishop Arundel, who was then in Britany, desiring him to be their advocate upon this occasion with the Duke. The Archbishop, being a fellow-sufferer, gladly accepted the office, and went with the messengers to the Duke at Paris; where they delivered the letters from the Nobles and Commons of England, and the Archbishop seconded them with the best arguments reason could invent, or rhetoric urge. He represented to the Duke the present miserable state of the English nation: ‘ That it was utterly ruined by the mismanagement of public affairs; in which though the King himself were not actually concerned, yet, so long as he employed and supported unfit ministers, he could not be thought fit to govern: that it was far more intolerable to be slaves to ignoble persons, than to the King; and therefore, so long as the King continued to maintain the pride and tyranny of such persons over his subjects, it could be no crime to depose him: that the present state of the nation was so disordered, that nothing but immediate help could save it from entire destruction; for the antient courage of the English was sunk into effeminacy, the men of bravery and conduct either put to death or banished, the nobility contemned and slighted, the gentry abused, and the commons oppressed with heavy taxes, not to support the government, but the pride and avarice of their fellow-subjects.’ The Archbishop added, ‘ That the nation placed all their hopes in him (the Duke) and expected the redress of their grievances only at his hands, both on account of his personal courage and achievements, and the near relation he stood in to the crown; and therefore he was bound in honour and duty to answer the reasonable expectations of his country-men, especially as they had resolved to stand by him in the attempt; which could hardly prove unsuccessful, where so much affection, power, and interest were united.’ The Duke of Lancaster did not immediately close with this inviting offer, but objected to the Archbishop the unlawfulness of the design; to which Arundel thus replied: Examples of casting a King out of his state are not rare (as you affirm) nor long since put in practice, nor far hence to be fetched. The Kings of Denmark and Sweden are oftentimes banished by their subjects, oftentimes imprisoned and put to their fine. The Princes of Germany, about an hundred years past, deposed Adolphus the Emperor, and are now in hand to depose their Emperor Wenceslaus. The Earl of Flanders was a while since driven out of his dominions by his own people, for usurping greater power than appertained to his estate. The antient Britons chased away their King Caractacus, for the lewdness of his life, and cruelty of his rule. In the time of the Saxon Heptarchy, Bernredus King of Mercia, for his pride and stoutness towards his people, was by them deposed. Likewise Alcredus and Ethelbertus, Kings of Northumberland, were for their disorders expelled by their subjects. Since the conquest of the Normans, the Lords endeavoured to expel King Henry III, but they were not able; yet were they able to depose King Edward II, and to constitute his young son Edward King in his stead. These are not all, and yet enough to clear this action of rareness in other countries, and novelty in ours (13). The event of this negotiation is too well known, to need mentioning in this place.

[H] One of the articles — against King Richard was, his banishment of Arundel.] To give a better colour to their proceedings, the Lords drew up a charge of male-administration, digested into thirty-three articles. These articles were publicly read in the Parliament-house, and alledged as a sufficient ground for deposing King Richard. What relates to his treatment of our Archbishop is contained in the thirtieth and thirty-third articles. The 30th article complains, ‘ That the said King having persuaded Thomas Arundel Archbishop of Canterbury, and his spiritual father, to absent himself from the Parliament-house, dealt insincerely with the said Archbishop, took advantage of his absence, and, without any legal process of law, adjudged him to per-the Duke of Lancaſter's title being allowed in Parliament, Archbiſhop Arundel took that Prince by the hand, and led him to the throne; where when he was ſeated, the Archbiſhop made a kind of ſermon or oration to the aſſembly [I] He had the honour to crown the new King; and, at the Coronation-dinner, ſat at his right hand; the Archbiſhop of York being placed at his left (p). In the firſt year of King Henry's reign, this Archbiſhop ſummoned a Synod [K], which ſat at St Paul's (q). Harpſfield, and the Councils from him, have miſtaken this Synod for one held during the vacancy of the See [L]. This Prelate, by his courage and reſolution, preſerved ſeveral of the Biſhops, who were in King Henry's army, from being plundered of their equipages and money [M]. The next year, the Commons having

'petual baniſhment.' The 33d article reports this grievance more at large, and ſets forth, 'That, after one of the knights for the county had wrongfully impeached the Archbiſhop of Canterbury of high-treaſon, the ſaid Archbiſhop immediately ſtood up, and offered to answer to the charge in Parliament, and deſired the King would permit him the liberty to make his defence: that the King, out of a deſign to ruin the Archbiſhop, adviſed him to wave his defence, to reſerve himſelf for a better opportunity, and forbear coming to the houſe five or ſix days; promiſing him withal, that he ſhould receive no prejudice by his abſence; and yet the ſaid King, in the Parliament above-mentioned, procured a ſentence of baniſhment againſt the ſaid Archbiſhop, without calling him to his answer, or allowing him the benefit of the law.' The ſame article charges the King with farther inſtances of inſincerity; viz. 'That he promiſed him, that, upon his going down to Southampton in order to quit the kingdom, the Queen ſhould intercede for the reverſing the ſentence; and in caſe the ſaid Archbiſhop ſhould be forced to depart the kingdom, the King engaged to re-call him before the Eaſter following; notwithstanding which promiſe, ſolemnly ſworn upon the croſs of St Thomas of Canterbury, the King forced the Archbiſhop to quit the kingdom, and abſolutely deprived him of his See (14).'

[I] He made a kind of ſermon or oration in the Parliament-houſe.] His text was: And when Samuel ſaw Saul, the Lord ſaid unto him, behold the Man, whom I ſpoke to thee of; this ſame ſhall reign over my people, 1 Sam. ix. 17. In theſe words (ſays the Archbiſhop) God Almighty deſcribes the qualifications of a governor: and ſince they may be truly applied to our preſent Prince, they afford us a very comfortable proſpect. For now we have no reaſon to fear that threatenings denounced againſt the Jews by the prophet Iſaiah; I will give children to be their princes, chap. iii. 4. For God has been pleaſed in his wrath to remember mercy, to viſit his people, and not, as formerly, to ſuffer babes to rule over us. To thoſe Princes, who have lately governed us, thoſe words of St Paul may be applied without ſtraining the compariſon, When I was a child, I ſpoke as a child, I underſtood as a child, I thought as a child, 1 Cor. xiii. 11. Firſt, as to ſpeech, 'tis certain a child is very inſignificant and variable: truth and falſehood are almoſt indifferent to him; he is forward to promiſe, but quickly forgets the performance. Theſe qualities are very unfortunate in a Prince, neither is it poſſible for a kingdom to be happy, where the crown is no better furniſhed. But, cum vir dominatur populo, when the people have a man to reign over them, there will be none of theſe defects in the adminiſtration. For it is the property of a man to govern his tongue and guard his language. This is our caſe; we have now a man to reign over us, of whom I hope that ſaying of the ſon of Sirach may be verified; Happy is the man that hath not ſlept with his tongue. The Archbiſhop proceeds to comment on the above-mentioned text of St Paul, and upon theſe words, I underſtood as a child, he obſerves, that a child reliſhes nothing but what pleaſes his humour, and flatters his weakneſs: as for remonſtrance and plain-dealing, ſuch freedoms are always unacceptable. Then he goes on: 'But ſuch has formerly been the miſfortune of this kingdom; for truth was in a manner clapt under hatches, and no man had the courage to deliver his thoughts. From whence it is plain, the ſcepter was in a child's hand: for a man carries his thoughts farther, and has a more abſolute command over his paſſions. And to come to the advantage of our preſent circumſtances, now, by God's aſſiſtance, that of the ſon of Sirach, Bleſſed is the man, who is ſtayed upon wiſdom, may juſtly be affirmed of this royal perſon. For as a child is fond of trifles and flattery, ſo a man loves truth and prudent advice. In the laſt place, the Apoſtle tells us, I thought as a child. And what are the thoughts of a child? A child follows only the ſollicitations of appetite. Thus, when a child governs, reaſon is diſcarded, humour is abſolute, and will carries all before it. But, where caprice reigns, and reaſon is forced to retire, the adminiſtration muſt needs be unſteady and ill directed. But now, having a man at the helm, we are reſcued from the danger of ſo unhappy a conduct. The Prince, who now rules over us, being a man both in age and underſtanding, will readily acknowledge the proper buſineſs of his ſtation, and make no ſcruple to ſay, I come not to do my own will, but the will of him that ſent me, that is, God's will. And therefore we may promiſe ourſelves, that he will be ſtaid upon wiſdom: that he will ſeriously conſider the providence of God, and govern his practice by the rules of religion; in ſhort, that he will conduct the adminiſtration in ſuch a manner, that the promiſe in holy ſcripture may not be unapplicable to his government, A King ſhall reign in righteouſneſs, and do judgment and juſtice in the earth (15).

[K] He ſummoned a Synod.] King Henry ſent the Earls of Northumberland and Weſtmoreland to this Synod, not to preſs any ſubſidy, but only to deſire the prayers of the clergy for the proſperity of the King and Nation. Reſtitutionis ejus anno primo Synodum indixit, quo acceſſerunt Northumbriae & Weſtmerlandiae Comites, dicentes, a rege quidem miſſos ſeſe, ſed munus ſolium haudquaquam apportare; ſiquidem ideo ſe venire, non ut pecunias flagitent, ſed orationes eorum, pro ipſo, regnique incolumitate fundendas (16). But this diſintereſted Prince, who ſeemed at this time to deſpiſe money, was ſo changed before two years were ended, that he reſuſed a voluntary offer made him by the clergy of a tenth of their revenues, and demanded a larger ſum. Hic tantum pecuniarum contemptor, ante elapſum biennium ita mutatus eſt, ut annui cenſus ſimplicem decimam in proxima Synodo oblatam ultro, aſpernaretur, multo majora poſtulans (17).

[L] Harpſfield — miſtook this Synod for one held during the vacancy of the See.] That author tells us (18), that, during the exile of Arundel, a Synod was held at Canterbury; that it was ſummoned by the Prior and Chapter of Chriſt's Church; and that the King ſent the Earls of Weſtmoreland and Northumberland to this convocation, with the meſſage above-mentioned (19). But Harpſfield is undoubtedly miſtaken: for, firſt, Walden being Archbiſhop of Canterbury that year, the Prior and Chapter could have no pretence to ſummon a convocation. In the next place, the circumſtance of King Henry's ſending the Earls of Weſtmoreland and Northumberland is a proof that Arundel was reſtored; ſince that Prelate came over with the Duke of Lancaſter, and crowned him upon his ſeizing the government.

[M] He prevented ſeveral of the Biſhops — from being plundered of their equipages and money.] Walingham (20) informs us, that the King having marched his army into Yorkſhire, and ſettled the northern parts, projected an expedition againſt the Welch, who had lately made depredations upon the Engliſh; but, his exchequer being low, he wanted money to ſubſiſt and pay his troops. That the deſign might not be dropt upon this account, ſome of the officers ſuggeſted an expedient to the King. They told him, there were ſeveral Biſhops in the army in a condition to ſupply his Highneſs: that theſe Prelates ought to be ſent home on foot, and their equipages and money taken from them for the public ſervice. The Archbiſhop of Canterbury, being preſent when the having moved, that the revenues of the Church might be applied to the service of the public, Archbishop Arundel opposed the motion so vigorously [N], that the King and Lords promised him, the Church should never be rifled in their time (r). After this, he visited the University of Cambridge; where he made several statutes, suppressed several ill customs, and punished the Students for their misbehaviour. And, when the visitation was ended, at the request of the University, he reserved all those matters and causes, which had been laid before him, to his own cognizance and jurisdiction (s). In the year 1408, Arundel began to exert himself with vigour against the Lollards or Wickliffites (t). To this end, he summoned the Bishops and Clergy at Oxford, to check the progress of this new sect, and prevent that University's being farther tainted with their opinions (u). But the doctrines of Wickliff still gaining ground in that seat of learning, the Archbishop resolved to visit the University, and apply some farther remedy. Accordingly he went down, attended by the Earl of Arundel, his nephew, and a splendid retinue. When he came near the town, he was met by the principal members of the University, who told him, that, if he came only to see the town, he was very welcome; but if he came in the character of a Visitor, they refused to acknowledge his jurisdiction. The Archbishop, resenting this treatment, left Oxford in a day or two, and wrote to the King on account of his disappointment. After a warm contest between the University and the Archbishop, both parties agreed to refer the dispute to the King's decision; who, governing himself by the example of his predecessors (w), gave sentence in favour of the Archbishop [O].

the motion was made, replied, That if any of the soldiers offered to plunder his retinue, they might expect to be well drubbed for their pains. This resolution of the Archbishop checked the intended outrage, and made the officers desist. This is Walsingham's account of the matter. The author of the Life and reign of Henry IV (21) relates the same story with this difference, that the King was advised to seize the lands and treasures of the Bishops, not their equipages; for he says nothing of their being in the King's army. That writer adds, that 'though the King was not forward to meddle with the church-men, yet this advice put him in mind of the riches and plenty of the clergy; which being bestowed on persons, whose best character it is to be despisers of the world, might best be spared at this juncture; and thereupon, though he would use no force, yet he dealt with the Archbishop to procure him a supply in this exigency, and so prevailed with him, that, calling a Synod of the clergy, he obtained a tenth of them for him; and the King sent the Prince, with his army, into Wales.'

[N] Arundel vigorously opposed the motion for applying the revenues of the Church to the service of the public. On the 6th of October, 1404, the King held a Parliament at Coventry. It was called Parliamentum Indoctum, or the Lack-learning Parliament, because it was composed of none but illiterate persons, all others, especially Serjeants and Barristers at Law, being, by the King's express direction, excluded (22). M. Rapin thinks, there is room to doubt whether these orders were so positive as is affirmed. However he is of opinion, the court took care, upon this occasion, that such persons chiefly should be elected, as were least likely to be prejudiced in favour of the clergy; and that for reasons, which will presently appear (23). When the Parliament met, the Lord Chancellor laid before them the necessities of the public; that the Scots and Welsh, the French and Flemings, were ready to invade the kingdom; that the Exchequer was greatly exhausted, and the King's revenues unable to furnish the necessary defence. The Commons hereupon remonstrated, that the clergy had engrossed a great part of the wealth of the kingdom; that they lived in idleness, and contributed very little to the public advantage: whereas the laity hazarded both their persons and fortunes in the service of their country. They therefore were of opinion the King should seize the revenues of the Church, and apply them to the public service of the nation. Archbishop Arundel, who was present at the motion, rose from his seat, and repressed, 'That the Clergy had always contributed more to the public service than the Laity, and had more frequently granted the crown a tenth, than the others had done a fifteenth; and though they did not serve the King in person in his wars, yet they sent their tenants to assist him, and were at least as serviceable to him by their incessant prayers for his success, as the Laity were by their arms.' The Speaker of the House, Sir John

Cheney, took up the Archbishop, and publicly declared, he thought the prayers of the Church a very slender supply, and that their lands would do the Church and nation more good. This answer fired the Archbishop, who, getting up, declared with warmth, 'That the King and kingdom could not expect to thrive, so long as the prayers of the Clergy were despised.' And as for you, Sir, continued he, turning to the Speaker, who take the liberty to rally the functions of the Clergy, I believe you will find it no easy undertaking to invade the rights and possessions of the Church. Then, perceiving the King, who was present at the contest, inclining to favour the design of the Commons, he went up to him, and, on his knees, besought him to consider the oath he had taken at his coronation, to maintain the rights of the Church, and afford the Clergy his favour and protection. Whether the King was really affected with the Archbishop's discourse, or began to see the difficulty of the enterprize, he bad him rise and go to his place; assuring him, he was fully resolved not to hearken to these new measures, but to leave the Church rather in a better condition than he found it. Arundel, encouraged by this promise, turned to the Commons, and let them know, he saw through the whole design, telling them, 'That their wicked advice was intended more for their own, than the King's advantage.' You, Gentlemen, says he, and others governed by the same views, have persuaded the King and his predecessors to seize the revenues of the Friars alien, on pretence of augmenting the royal revenues, but in reality to get them into your own hands: for you have defeated the crown of those estates, and begged them for your selves. And the same would be the case, should the King comply with this execrable project: he would not be a farthing the richer in a year's time. This courage in the Archbishop, and the King's declaration, silenced the Commons, and put a stop to the design for the present. However Arundel thought it best to secure a party in the House of Lords against the intended bill, in case the project should be revived. At last the Commons themselves asked the Archbishop's pardon, admired his resolution, and confessed the injustice of their expedient (24).

[O] — After a warm controversy between the university and the Archbishop, &c.] The heads of the university were sent for up to court, and the Chancellor and Proctors turned out of their office. The students were so far disconcerted by these rigours, that they discontinued the public lectures, and were even upon the point of breaking up, and dissolving their body. The King, being informed of what passed, sent them a reprimanding letter at first, but afterwards was pleased to treat them more gently. His Highness's award in favour of the Archbishop was confirmed by act of Parliament (25). And to fortify himself still farther, Arundel procured a Bull from the Pope, to revoke the exemption granted to the university by Boniface. But this Bull of revocation was afterwards voided by Sixtus IV, who, as much as in

Soon after this controversy was ended, a Convocation being held at St Paul's in London, the Bishops and Clergy complained of the growth of Wicklevitism at Oxford [P], and pressed the Archbishop to visit that University. Hereupon Arundel wrote to the Chancellor and others, giving them notice, that he intended to hold a visitation in St Mary's Church. His Delegates for this purpose were sent down soon after, and admitted by the University; who, to make some satisfaction for their backwardness in censuring Wickliff's opinions, wrote to the Archbishop, and asked his pardon (x): after which they appointed a Committee of twelve persons, to examine heretical books, particularly those of Wickliff. These Inquisitors into heretical pravity, having censured some conclusions extracted out of Wickliff's books, sent an account of their proceedings to the Archbishop, who confirmed their censures, and sent an authority in writing to some eminent members of the University, empowering them to enquire into persons suspected of heterodoxy, and oblige them to declare their opinions. These rigorous proceedings made Arundel extremely hated by the Wickliffites, who would sometimes compliment him with a cursing letter. However he went on with the prosecution, and not only solicited the Pope to condemn the above-mentioned conclusions, but desired likewise a Bull for the digging up Wickliff's bones. The Pope granted the first of these requests, but refused the other, not thinking it any useful part of discipline to disturb the ashes of the dead (y). Arundel's warm zeal for suppressing the Lollards, or Wickliffites, carried him to several unjustifiable severities (z) against the heads of that sect, particularly against Sir John Oldcastle, Lord Cobham (z); and induced him to procure a Synodical Constitution, which forbade the translation of the Scriptures into the vulgar tongue [R]. This great Prelate died at Canterbury, after having sat seventeen years, the twentieth of February, 1413. The Lollards of those times pretended to discover the immediate hand of Heaven in the manner of his death [S]. He was buried in the cathedral church of Canterbury, near the west end, under a monument erected by himself in his life-time. He was a considerable benefactor to that church: for he built the Lanthorn Tower, and great part of the Nave; and gave a ring of five Bells, called from him Arundel's Ring, and distinguished by the names of Trinity, Mary, Gabriel, Blasius, and John (aa). He gave likewise to that church several rich vestments, a mitre enchafed with jewels, a silver gilt crozier, a golden chalice for the high altar, and another to be used only on St Thomas Becket's day. He gave also the church of Godmersham, out of the income of which, he ordered six-shillings and eight-pence to be given annually to every Monk of the convent, on the aforesaid festival. Lastly, he gave several valuable books, particularly two Missals, and a collection in one volume of St Gregory's works, with Anathema to any person, who should remove it out of the church (bb). Archbishop Arundel seems to have been a person of great natural capacity, well improved by study and experience; but is de-him lay, restored the university to their former immunities (26). As to the King's decision, in case the University did not abide by it, but disturbed the Archbishop or his successors in their visitation, they were to forfeit a thousands pounds, and their franchises to be seized, and remain in the King's hands, till they submitted to the award (27).

[P] The Bishops and clergy complained of the growth of Wicklevitism at Oxford] An University, they said, which was formerly the seat of learning and virtue, a support of the Catholic Faith, and a place of exemplary obedience and good behaviour: but now the Students were strangely degenerated, strove to distinguish themselves by contumacy and rebellion, and made it their business to sow tares among the wheat. They added further, that this heterodox party in the University had robbed the treasury, and, without the priority of the Doctors and Masters, made use of the public seal to give a recommendation to Heresy (28).

[Q] He was carried to several unjustifiable severities against the Lollards.] It cannot be denied, that the Lollards had given the Archbishop great provocation (if any could be great enough) for persecution. They attacked him in the authority of his character, and struck directly at the rights and possessions of the Church. It is true, they had began a reformation in religion, but maintained withal several gross and capital errors (29). But on the other side, the persecuting these people to the stake, was carrying the rigour of discipline too far; and acting in a manner not suitable to Christian charity, and the tenderness of the episcopal character.

[R] He procured a synodical constitution, which forbade the translation of the Scriptures into the vulgar tongue.] Let us hear what Bishop Godwin says of this matter. 'Cumque nihilo fecius istorum hominum crescere indies numerum conspiceret; ut caliginem offunderet oculis eorum, ne illos defigere posset amplius in pravis illis superstitionibus quæ in ecclesiam jam olim paulatim irrepserant; Scripturas

' sacras in vernaculam Anglicanam converti, vel conversas legi vetuit in Synodo; cum non ita pridem in funere Annæ Reginæ concionatus, haud alio nomine eam magis laudaverit, quam quod Evangelia in Anglicanum idioma conversa assidue lectaret (30). — And observing that the number of these Sectarists daily increased, that he might in some measure put a stop to those erroneous opinions and practices, which had by degrees crept into the Church, he forbade, by a synodical decree, the translating the Scriptures into the vulgar tongue, or the reading them when translated: Arundel, I say, did this; who not long before, in a sermon preached at the funeral of Queen Anne, commended her for nothing more than her daily reading the Scriptures translated into English.' Let us see how Mr Collier endeavours to vindicate the Archbishop from this charge of inconsistency. 'To this it may be answered, that the Archbishop's constitution declares only against a translation made by a private hand; and that no version of the Holy Scriptures should be used till it was allowed by a provincial Synod, or at least by the Bishop of the Diocese (31). Now without doubt the Archbishop was so far in the right, as not to allow every private person the liberty of translating the Scriptures. To have done otherwise might have been a dangerous permission. It might have opened a passage to heresy and error, put it in the power of ignorant and designing men to corrupt the holy text, and poison the fountain of life (32). With submission to this ingenious author, this does not amount to a justification of Arundel. For what difference is there between obliging the people to receive such a translation or interpretation of the Scriptures as the Church shall think fit, and withholding the use of it entirely from them; since in both cases the people must pin their faith upon the Church's sleeve?

of an inflammation in his throat. It is pretended, he was struck with this disease, as he was pronouncing sentence of excommunication and condemnation on the Lord Cobham; and from that time, notwithstanding all the assistance of medicines, he could swallow neither meat nor drink, and so was starved to death. The Lollards imputed this lamentable end to the just judgment of God upon him, both for his severity towards that sect, and forbidding the Scriptures to be translated into English (34). Bishop Godwin tells us the same. Justo Dei judicio factum ferunt, ut is qui verbum Dei, animæ pabulum, subtraxerat popularibus; clausis per anginam aut morbum aliquem consimilem faucibus, aliquantò ante mortem tempore, nec verbum potuerit fari, nec cibi vel minimum deglutire, adeoque mutus factusque tandem enecatus inedia interierit (35). ASAPH (St) gave his name to the Episcopal See of St Asaph in Wales (a). He was descended of a good family in North-Wales, and became a Monk in the convent of Llan-Elvy, over which Kentigern the Scotch Bishop of that place presided [A]. That Prelate, being recalled to his own country, resigned both his convent and cathedral to Afaph, who demeaned himself with such sanctity, that after his death Llan-Elvy lost it's name, and took that of the saint. He was a diligent preacher, and had frequently this saying in his mouth; They who withstand the preaching of God's word, eny man's salvation. St Asaph flourished about the year 590, under Carentius King of the Britons. He wrote the Ordinances of his church, the Life of his master Kentigern, and some other pieces. The time of his death is not certainly known (b). Bale tells us, he was the first who received unction from the Pope [B]. After his death, the See of St Asaph continued vacant above five hundred years, till Geoffrey of Monmouth was placed therein [C].

[A] He became a Monk in the convent of Llan-Elvy, over which Kentigern — presided.] Capgrave, who tells us this (1), gives Afaph a very advantageous character. His words are these: 'Erat in prædicta literatorum multitudine Afaph quidam genere & specie clarus, ab ipso pubertatis flore virtutibus et doctrina fulgens, qui vitam magistri in omni sanctitate et abinentia sequi fatebatur. — Amidst this great number of learned men was one Afaph, descended of a good family, and eminent, from his very youth, for his virtues and learning; who diligently followed his master's example in all holiness and godliness of living.'

[B] Bale pretends, he was the first who received unction from the Pope.] Primus hic erat, (says he) qui a Romano Pontifice Unctionem accepit (2). It is not easy to say what our author's meaning is in these words. Pits, who is very ready to steal from Bale, especially whatever may seem of advantage to the papal cause, has entirely dropped this circumstance.

ASCHAM (ROGER) was born at Kirby-Wiske, near North-Allerton, in Yorkshire, about the year 1515 (a), his father's name was John Ascham, a man of a moderate fortune, but of a very extraordinary character, both for his understanding, and probity, and Steward to the noble family of Scroop; his mother's name was Margaret, descended of a genteel family, and allied to several persons of great distinction. Besides this Roger, these good people had two other sons, Thomas, and Anthony, and several daughters. As they lived in great credit in their country, so their conduct was very exemplary; the education of their children their principal concern, and their behaviour towards their neighbours equally honest and courteous; by which means they were universally beloved, and many honourable persons interested themselves in providing for their children. One thing is so remarkable of them, that it ought not to pass unmentioned; after living together forty-seven years in the greatest harmony, and with the most cordial affection, the good old people died the same day, and almost in the same hour (b). As for him of whom we are speaking, their third son Roger, some time before his father's death he was taken into the family of the Wingfields, and at the expence of the then Sir Anthony Wingfield, studied with his two sons under the care of Mr Bond. The brightness of his genius, and his great affection for learning, very early discovered themselves, by his eager reading all the English books which came to his hands. This propensity for study was encouraged by his generous benefactor, who when he had attained the elements of the learned languages, sent him, about the year 1530, to St John's-college in Cambridge (c). It was extremely happy for Mr Ascham, that at this time, St John's-college was one of the most flourishing in the university. It's master, Nicholas Medcalf, a great encourager of learning, and a most generous patron to such as addicted themselves thereto; his tutor, Mr Hugh Fitzherbert, had not only much knowledge, but also a most graceful and insinuating method of transfusing it into his pupils, amongst whom were very many, who, in process of time, became the greatest and the brightest men of the age (d). No wonder then, that to a genius naturally prone to learning, Mr Ascham added a spirit of emulation, which, together, induced him to study so hard, that while a perfect boy, he made a prodigious progress in polite learning, and became exceedingly distinguished, even amongst those who were the most eminent wits in the university [A]. He took his first degree of Bachelor of Arts, on the

[A] The most eminent wits in the university.] At first Mr Ascham applied himself to teaching Greek for the sake of learning it thoroughly himself; to which course he was advised by his great friend

Mr Robert Pember, who told him, that he would acquire more knowledge by reading to a boy a single fable out of Æsop, than by hearing others read Latin lectures on the whole Iliad (1). The same gentleman, the twenty-eighth of February, 1534, when he was but eighteen years of age, and on the twenty-third of March following, was elected fellow of his college by the interest of the master (e), though Mr Ascham's propensity to the Reformed Religion, had induced him to speak a little indiscreetly, and thereby put Dr Medcalf to no small trouble, in carrying his good intention into act, as our author himself tells us. These honours served only to excite him to still greater vigilance in his studies, particularly in that of the Greek tongue, wherein he attained an excellency peculiar to himself, and read therein, both publickly for the university, and privately in his college, with universal applause. At the commencement held after the feast of St Peter and St Paul, in 1536, he was inaugurated Master of Arts, being then twenty-one years old (f). By this time many of his pupils came to be taken notice of for their extraordinary proficiency, in so much, that William Grindal who was one of them, at the recommendation of Mr Ascham, was made choice of by Sir John Cheeke, to be tutor to the lady Elizabeth. One may justly wonder, that he did not accept at this time of so great an honour himself; but it seems he was so delighted with an academical life, that he was not very desirous of changing it for one at court (g). His affection for his friends, though it filled him with a deep concern for their interests, and a tender regard for their persons, yet could not induce him to give up his understanding, especially in points of learning. For this reason he did not go immediately into the new pronunciation of the Greek, which his intimate friend, Sir John Cheeke, laboured, by his authority, to introduce throughout the university (h); yet when he had thoroughly examined, he came over to his opinion, and defended the new pronunciation with that zeal and vivacity, which gave a peculiar liveliness to all his writings. In July 1542, he supplicated the university of Oxford, to be incorporated Master of Arts, but whether he was or was not incorporated, does not appear by the register (i). To divert him after the fatigue of severer studies, he addicted himself to archery, which innocent amusement, drew upon him the censure of some envious persons. Whereupon he set himself to shew the expediency of such sort of divertisements in general, and the innocency and usefulness of shooting with the long-bow, in particular, in a small treatise, intitled, Toxophilus; which book he published in 1544, and dedicated it to King Henry VIII, then about to undertake his expedition against Boulogne. This work was very kindly received [B], and the King, at the recommendation of Sir William Paget, was pleased to settle a small pension upon him, which, after that Prince's death, was for some time discontinued, but at length restored to him, during pleasure, gentleman, directed him in his choice of Latin authors. By degrees he became himself so perfect a judge, both of sentiment and stile, that he lost no time in the perusal of mean or unprofitable books. Cicero and Cæsar he studied, especially, for the sake of their language; and whosoever considers his letters attentively, will find that he rarely makes use either of words or of phrases, but what are to be found in them. Among the philosophers he read, chiefly Plato and Aristotle, Thucydides and Herodotus, were his favourite historians; Demosthenes and Isocrates, the orators he studied most (2). On these two last mentioned authors, he read privately to his pupils, as he did likewise on the best and most famous of the Greek poets. By this means, he came to excel in Philology, of which there cannot be a stronger testimony, than his excellent letter to Hubert Languet, in defence of the new pronunciation of the Greek tongue (3), of which it is hard to say, whether the critical knowledge contained therein, or the elegance of the stile in which it is written, ought most to commend it. There is extant in the Oxford edition of his letters, Languet's answer (4), which is also well worth reading, by such as are desirous of understanding thoroughly that controversy, and the reasons which induced Sir John Cheeke, and Sir Thomas Smith, to support that which is now stiled the English pronunciation of the Greek.

[B] This work was very kindly received] The title of the book mentioned in the text, as it stands in the copy I have before me is this, Toxophilus. The Schole or Partitions of shooting containyd in two Bookes, written by Roger Ascham, 1544. And now newly perused. Pleasaut for all gentlemen and Yomen of England, for theyr Pastime to reade, and profitable for their Use to followe both in Warre and Peace, Anno 1571. Imprinted at London in Flete-streat, near to Saint Dunstons Church, by Thomas Marfhe. Before it stands a copy of Latin verses by Dr Walter Haddon. This second edition hath a dedication prefixed to it, addressed to all the gentlemen and yeomen of England; though, as is observed in the text, the first edition is dedicated to King Henry. There is among our author's letters, one addressed to his patron Gardiner, Bishop of Winchester, wherein he speaks out plainly, what his design was in writing that book, and what he aimed at by writing it. As to the first, he acknowledges his intention was to introduce an easy and natural stile, in the writing of English prose, instead of that forced and frothy language, which was the foible of most writers of his time. With respect to the second, he owns that he had at that time a desire of travelling into Italy, and was in hopes of obtaining, by the dedication of his book to the King, a pension, which might enable him to fulfil his desire (5). Without all doubt, this little treatise may still be stiled a master-piece in it's kind, whether we consider the manner in which he handles his subject, or the matter which his book contains (6). His words are always suited to the nature of his discourse, never rising above, never sinking beneath it, but so naturally expressive of their author's sentiments, that the reader is never at a loss, as he never can be displeas'd with their meaning. Much learning he does indeed shew, where one would little expect it; but this he does so modestly, with such a graceful propriety, and so much to the peruser's advantage, that it is impossible to mistake that for pedantry, which is the pure effects of superior knowledge. So perspicuous, so natural his method, that if for no other reason yet for this, I should be glad to see it taken out of it's black letter'd garb, and put into the hands of young gentlemen at the university. But there is another reason, which renders this still more desirable. It abounds with fragments of English history, curious in themselves, and so lost in the ocean of our histories, that should they be at any time revived, they would certainly have all the charms of novelty. It would be unjust to conclude this note without remarking, That as this treatise gave the first rise to our author's fortunes, so it was the review of it by Bishop Gardiner, which restored them when the author thought them shipwrecked by the death of King Edward; for in his letter to the Bishop of Winchester, he takes notice of it's being perused and approved by the lords of the council, and being the means of introducing it's author into their favour (7).

(7) Ascham. Epist. l. ii. ep. 25. [C] His pleasure, by Edward VI, and confirmed by Queen Mary, with an addition of ten pounds per annum (k). Among other accomplishments, he was remarkable for writing a very fine hand, for which reason he was made use of to teach that art to Prince Edward, the Lady Elizabeth, the two brothers Henry and Charles, Dukes of Suffolk, and several other persons of distinction, and for many years wrote all the letters of the university to the King, and to the great men at Court (l). The same year that he published his book he was chosen university orator, in the room of Mr John Cheeke, an office which suited him extremely well, as gratifying his strong passion for an academical life, and affording him frequent opportunities of displaying his superior eloquence in the Latin and Greek tongues (m). In 1548, on the death of his pupil, Mr Grindal, he was sent for to Court, in order to instruct the Lady Elizabeth in the knowledge of the learned languages, which duty he discharged for two years, with great reputation to himself, and with much satisfaction to that illustrious person (n). For some time he enjoyed as great comfort and content at Court as he had done at College, but at length, on account of some ill-judged and ill-founded whispers, Mr Ascham took such a distaste at some in the Lady Elizabeth's family, that he left her a little abruptly, which he afterwards heartily repented, and took great and not unsuccessful pains, to get himself restored to her good graces (o). On his returning to the university, he resumed his studies, and the discharge of his office of publick orator, his circumstances being at this time pretty easy [C], by reason of considerable assistances from lovers of learning, and a small pension allowed him by King Edward (p). In the summer of 1550, he went into Yorkshire to visit his family and relations, from whence he was recalled to Court, in order to attend Sir Richard Morysine, who was then going Ambassador to the Emperor Charles V. In his journey to London, he went to visit the Lady Jane Gray, at her father's house at Broadgate in Leicestershire, with whom he had been well acquainted at Court, and for whom he had already a very high esteem. At this visit it was, that he surprized her reading Plato's Phædo in Greek, in the absence of her tutor Mr Aylmer, in the article of whose life, a full account is given of their conversation and it's effects (q). In September following, he embarked with the beforementioned Ambassador for Germany, where he remained three years, and during that space, left nothing omitted which might serve to perfect his knowledge of men as well as books (r). As he travelled with an Ambassador, he thought it became him to make Politicks some part of his study, and in this he succeeded perfectly well, as appears from a short but very curious tract [D] which he wrote, concerning

[C] His circumstances being pretty easy. Among our author's first patrons, are to be reckoned the following illustrious persons, viz. Edward Lee, Archbishop of York, a Prelate distinguished no less by his extraordinary learning, untainted integrity, and extensive beneficence, than by his exalted station: He took our author early under his care, and besides many other services, which in respect to his merit he render'd him, was pleas'd to allow him an annual pension out of his pocket. Among our author's letters, there are extant several to this Archbishop full of profound acknowledgments, and of panegyrics in the strongest and sweetest strain (8). This prelate died in 1544, when Mr Ascham was in the thirtieth year of his age (9). He was also much cared for by the Duchess of Suffolk, and had in some measure her sons, Henry and Charles, entrusted to his care (10). Anne, Countess of Pembroke, and sister to the Marquis of Northampton, was another auspicious patroness and his pupil in the Latin tongue, as appears by two letters still extant in that language to that noble lady (11). To these we may add the Chancellor Wriothesley, Sir John Cheeke, and many others (12). To all of whom, Mr Ascham was peculiarly grateful, for a due sense of obligation was in him a predominant virtue, and no doubt, this thankfulness in his temper, was no inconsiderable help to his promotion. All the stations of life he occupied, were discharged with decency and honour, but he seems to have shone most in his post of publick orator at the university, where he distinguished himself with a zeal equally laudable and happy; for as a certain humorous writer expresses himself, he did good service in the hindring those sacrilegious persons who had dined upon the Church from supping on the Universities (13). This ought to be remembered to his everlasting honour, for many reasons, but for this especially, that it may provoke others to a like diligence, and a like respect for those luminaries of science which once eclipsed, we should soon fall into more than Egyptian darkness.

[D] A short and very curious tract. The title of this treatise runs thus. A Report and Discourse, written by Roger Ascham, of the Affairs and State of Germany, and the Emperor Charles his Court, during certain Yeares, while the said Roger was there. At London, Printed by John Daye, dwelling over Aldersgate. Cum Gratia & Privilegio Regiæ Majestatis per Decennium. My copy is without a date, nor does Anthony Wood mention when it was printed, though he mentions the book. This treatise is written in the form of a letter, addressed to John Aitley, in answer to one of his which is prefixed; he was a domestick of the lady Elizabeth, and his letter bears date the 19th of October 1552. The answer must have been written the same year, since there is no mention therein of King Edward's death, which happened the next. It is without compliment to Mr Ascham, one of the most delicate pieces of History that ever was penned in our language, and shews it's author to have been a man as capable of shining in the cabinet as in the closet. He first tells his friend, that the Emperor Charles V, was in peace with all the world in the year 1550, and yet at the time he was writing, which as we have shewn, was in the latter end of 1552, found himself so pressed by open, and so embarrassed by secret enemies, that after flying out of Germany, he was now in a manner at his wit's end, and knew not what to do. The plan therefore that he proposes to himself, is to enter into and to explain the causes of these disorders, the consequences of them, and the characters of those from whom they chiefly proceeded. Previous to this, he makes some observations on the various methods of writing history, and the several kinds thereof. In the course of it he renders unknown things clear, by comparing them with such as are perfectly known, and throughout the whole, writes nothing which he knew not to be true of his own experience, or from the authority of such as either in respect to their offices, or characters, were not above all suspicion. On the whole, this short piece gives the clearest and most distinct account of the motives which led to one of the greatest events in that age, viz. The Emperor's resignation, and contains such a number of curious facts, with such natural and pertinent reasonings upon them, as can scarce be found within the same compass in our own, or perhaps in any other modern language. This is by much the scarcest and the least known of all our author's writings, and concerning Germany, and of the affairs of Charles V. He was also of great use to the Ambassador, as well in the management of his publick concerns, as in being the companion of his private studies (s), which were for the most part in the Greek language, wherein he read Herodotus, Sophocles, Euripides, and Demosthenes, three days in a week, the other three he copied the letters which the Ambassador sent to England (t). While he was thus employed, his friends in England procured for him the post of Latin Secretary to King Edward, for which he was in a particular manner obliged to the kind intercession of Sir William Cecil, Secretary of State (u). But whatever satisfaction resulted to him from hence, he did not enjoy it long, being recalled on account of the King's death, whereby, for the present, he lost all his places, together with his pension, and, which was worse, all expectation of obtaining any farther favours at Court. In this sad situation he was at first in a manner hopeless, and therefore retired to the university, merely to indulge his melancholy (w). But the prospect quickly became more promising, his friend the Lord Paget mentioned him to Stephen Gardiner Bishop of Winchester, Lord High Chancellor, who very frankly received him into his favour, notwithstanding Mr Ascham remained firm to his religion, which was so far from being a secret to the Bishop, that he had many malicious informations given him on that head, which however he treated with contempt, and abated nothing in friendship to our author on that account [E]. He in the first place procured him the re-establishment of his pension, which consisted of but ten pounds a year, with the addition of ten pounds a year more; he fixed him in the post of Latin Secretary to the King and Queen, and by her majesty's interest and his own, kept him in his fellowship of St John's, and in his place of orator to the university, to Midsummer 1554 (x). He was likewise well known to, and in great credit with, Cardinal Pole, who though he wrote elegantly in the Latin tongue, yet he would sometimes make use of Mr Ascham's pen, and particularly in translating his speech to the Parliament, which he made as the Pope's Legate, and of which translation he sent a copy to the Pope (y). On the first of June 1554, he married Mrs Margaret Howe, a lady of a good family, and with whom he had a very considerable fortune, of whom he himself gives an excellent character, in one of his letters to his friend Sturmius (z). His favour with Queen Mary's ministers lasted as long as they were in power, and he was even so happy, as to enjoy the countenance of the Queen herself, who conversed with him often, and was much pleased with his company (a). On her death however he was far from losing any of his preferments, that, on the contrary, having been previously reconciled to the Lady Elizabeth, he was immediately distinguished by her, on her accession to the throne. Thenceforward to the day of his death he was always constant at Court, very fully employed in the discharge of his two great offices, the one of Secretary for the Latin tongue, and the other of Tutor to her Majesty in the learned languages, wherein he read some hours with her every day. This interest of his at Court, would have procured a man of a more active temper many considerable advantages; but such was either Mr Ascham's indolence, or disinterestedness, that he never asked her Majesty any thing, either for himself or his family, though he received several considerable benefactions without asking, particularly the Prebend of Westwarg in the church of York, in 1559, which he held to his death (b). Yet how cold soever he was in regard to his own affairs, he was very far from being negligent in those of his friends; for whom he was ready to do any good office in his power, and in nothing readier than in parting with his money, though he never had much to spare. He was always in company with the greatest men of the Court, and having once in conversation heard the best method of educating youth debated with some heat, he from thence took occasion, at the request of Sir Richard Sackville, to write his Schoolmaster, which he lived to finish, but not to publish [F]. His application to study rendered him infirm throughout his whole even among the copies that are now and then to be met with, there is hardly one perfect.

[E] Abated nothing in his friendship to our author on that account. One cannot help being astonished at Mr Ascham's good fortune under the reign of Queen Mary, considering that he never made any secret, not only of his being a Protestant, but of his being zealously so, while in the mean time, his friend and patron, Sir John Cheeke, was in the Tower for his religion, and converted by this sole argument, Chuse whether you will sign yourself a recantation, or have a warrant signed for your execution (14). The former of which he chose; and there is amongst Mr Ascham's letters, that very one which was written by or for Sir John Cheeke, upon this occasion (15). This was owing in all probability to two causes, the innocency of his life, and the usefulness of his pen. The former made it unreasonable to proceed harshly against him, and the latter considering that Queen Mary's ministry were most of them men of great parts and learning, made his service appear more necessary than it would have done at another time. How well he answered their expectations, may be gathered from the many letters of his

which are extant, and how assiduous he was in the discharge of his duty, may be understood from this instance; that in the beginning of the reign of Philip and Mary, he wrote in three days seven and forty letters to persons of such high rank, that the lowest in dignity was a Cardinal (16). His duty and diligence answering so fully the character which Lord Paget had given him, and his other patrons, Pole and Gardiner, being the Queen's chief ministers so long as she lived, we may thence gather, that a man of Ascham's prudence, was pretty safe even in those troublesome times. Yet neither his complaisance, nor the care he had of his own safety, could divorce him from his Protestant friends; he took care to maintain his interest with the lady Elizabeth, when it was dangerous to seek such an interest, and he lived in such strict friendship with Sir William Cecil, as contributed not a little to his prosperity in the succeeding reign.

[F] He lived to finish but not to publish. This work of his, which is that whereby he is chiefly known to posterity, bears in it's original edition this title. The Schoolmaster. Or a plain and perfitte Way of teaching Children to understand, write, and speak whole life, and at last he grew so weak, that he was unable to read in the evenings or at night; to make amends for which he rose very early in the morning. The year before his death he was seized with a hectic, which brought him very low, and then, contrary to his former custom, relapsing into night studies, in order to compleat a Latin poem with which he designed to present the Queen on the new year, he, on the twenty-third of December 1568, was attacked by an aguish distemper, which threatened him with immediate death. He was visited in his last sickness by Dr Alexander Nowell, Dean of St Paul's, who found him perfectly calm and chearful, in which disposition he continued to the thirtieth of the same month, when he expired (c). On the fourth of January following, he was interred according to his own directions, in the most private manner, in St Sepulchre's church, his funeral sermon being preached by the beforementioned Dr Nowell. He was universally lamented, and even the Queen herself, not only shewed great concern, but was also pleased to say, that she had rather have lost ten thousand pounds than her tutor Ascham. His character is very well drawn by Buchanan in the following short epigram, which he consecrated to the memory of his friend.

His only failing was too great a propensity to dice and cock-fighting, which the learned Bishop Nicholson would persuade us to be an ill-grounded calumny (e); but as it is mentioned by Camden (f), as well as some other contemporary writers (g), we dare not omit it. Certain it is, that he died in very indifferent circumstances, as may appear from these two instances. First, the address of his widow to Sir William Cecil, in her dedication of his Schoolmaster, wherein she says expressly, that Mr Ascham left her a poor widow with many orphans, and this only to comfort them, that, as his relations, they would be under the protection of that honourable person to whom she addresses herself. Secondly, it appears from Dr Grant's dedication of Ascham's letters to Queen Elizabeth, wherein he most pathetically recommends to her his pupil, Giles Ascham, the son of our author, telling her, that he had lost his father who should have taken care of his education, and that he was left poor and without friends, having indeed a speaking the Latin Tong, but especially purposed for the private bringing up of youth in Gentlemen and Noblemens Houses, and commodious also for all such as have forgot the Latin Tong, and would by themselves, without a Scholemaster, in short Time, and with small paines, recover a sufficient Habilitie to understand, write, and speake Latin, by Roger Ascham, Ann. 1571. At London, Printed by John Daye, dwelling over Aldersgate. Cum Gratia & Privilegio Regiæ Majestatis per Decennium. Notwithstanding this date in the title page, the colophon tells us, it was printed in 1573. This work is now well known to the world by Mr Upton's edition, illustrated with notes (17), which is now out of print; and while I am writing is said to be in the press: The occasion of the author's composing this book, is briefly touched in the text, but it may not be amiss to insist a little more particularly upon it here. When the great Plague was at London, in 1563, Queen Elizabeth lay at her castle of Windsor, where it so fell out, that on the 10th of December there dined in Sir William Cecil's lodgings, Sir William Petre, Sir J. Mason, Dr Wootton, Sir Richard Sackville, Treasurer of the Exchequer; Sir Walter Mildmay, Chancellor of the Exchequer; Mr Haddon, Mr Astley, Master of the Jewel-house; Mr Hampton, Mr Nicasius, and our author. At dinner Secretary Cecil happened to say that he had heard strange news that morning: viz. That several scholars at Eaton, had run away on account of their master's severity, which he condemned as a very great fault in such as had the education of youth. Sir William Petre maintained the contrary, and being a severe man in his temper, pleaded warmly in defence of the rod. Dr Wootton, in a soft voice and with smooth words, supported what the Secretary had said; Sir John Mason merrily bantered both sides, without adhering to either. Mr Haddon seconded Sir William Petre, and, in defence of what he advanced, observed, that the best school-master then in England, was the greatest beater. This provoked our author to speak; who said, that if it was so, it was owing to the boy's parts, and not to their master's beating, which he was sure did often harm and seldom, if ever, good. Sir William Cecil being mightily pleased with what Mr Ascham said, engaged into discourse more largely upon the subject; to which also Sir Walter Mildmay, Mr Astley, and the rest, spoke a little, only Sir Richard Sackville said not a word. After dinner Mr Ascham went to the Queen, with whom he read one of the orations of Demosthenes: Sir Richard Sackville coming up, and finding him in the Queen's privy-chamber, as soon as company came in, took him aside to a window; there he told him, that though he spoke nothing, he would not have been from that dinner for a great deal of money; that he knew to his cost, the truth of what Mr Secretary Cecil had said, since the beating of such a school-master at fourteen, had given him an aversion to learning, which he said should make him the more careful of his grandson Robert Sackville. On this account he proposed to Mr Ascham, that he should fix upon a good school-master, and send his own son Giles, to be bred up together with his grandson under his care, by those rules, which, as Sir Richard said, he thought our author could draw up the best of any man (18). This is the accident gave birth to Ascham's School-master, a book that will be always useful, and everlastingly esteemed on account of the good sense, judicious observations, excellent characters of antient authors, and many pleasant and profitable passages of English history, which are plentifully sprinkled therein.

mother who had the will, but not the means of affording him such breeding, as the son of such a father deserved. Besides this son he had two others, Dudley and Sturmur, of whom we know little. But as for Giles Ascham, Lord Burleigh took him under his protection, by whose interest he was commended to a scholarship of St John's, and afterwards by the Queen's mandate, to a fellowship of Trinity-college in Cambridge, and was celebrated, as well as his father, for his admirable Latin stile in epistolary writings (b) [G].

[G] Admirable Latin stile in epistolary writings. As to the Epistles of our author, which were also a posthumous work, collected however very soon after his death by Mr Grant, master of Westminster school, in order to recommend his son, as we have in the text noted, to Queen Elizabeth's favour, let their character be first seen by Bishop Nicholson's account of them, and of their author, and then we will speak of their several editions. 'These letters,' says that learned Prelate, have, chiefly on account of their elegance, had several editions. The author was some time an instructor in the Latin tongue, and afterwards Latin secretary to King Edward VI, Queen Mary, and Queen Elizabeth; and in this latter station, was frequently employed to translate several letters of the then English ministers of state, to foreign Princes, Ambassadors, and other great men. In these we have all the fine variety of language that is proper; either for rendering a petition or complaint the most agreeable, and withal a very great choice of historical matter that is hardly preserved any where else. Together with the author's own letters, we have a good many that are directed to him, both from the most eminent foreigners of his time, such as Sturmus, Sleidan, &c. and the best scholars, as well as the wisest statesmen of his own country. And the publisher of these, assures us, that he had

'the perusal of a vast number of others in the English tongue, which were highly valuable. His attendance on Sir Richard Morrison, in his German embassy, gave him an intimate acquaintance with the affairs of that country, and the extraordinary freedom and familiarity, with which the two Sister Queens treated him here at home, afforded him a perfect knowledge of the most secret mysteries of state in this kingdom; so that were the rest of his papers retrieved, we could not perhaps have a more pleasing view of the main Arcana of those reigns, than his writings would give us (19).' Mr Grant's first edition came out in 1576; there was another in 1577; a third in 1578; a fourth in 1590, all at London, in 8vo. There were two editions at Hanau, one in 1602, the other in 1610; also one at Nurembergh in 1611. The last and best edition is that of Oxford in 1703, published by the celebrated Mr Elstob, who has added from MSS many letters, which were not in the former editions; but hath omitted Mr Ascham's Poems, which are to be met with in the rest. Mr Wood mentions another work of our author's, intitled Apologia contra Miffam, &c. i. e. An Apology against the Mass, &c. said to be printed in 1577, in 8vo (20). Some writers mention a treatise de Imitatione, but that is included in the last edition of his Letters (21). E

ASCOUGH (a) (WILLIAM) Doctor of Laws, and Bishop of Salisbury in the reign of King Henry VI, was descended from a very antient family seated at Kelsey in Lincolnshire (b) [A]. He was consecrated to the aforementioned See in the chapel of Windfor, July 20, 1438: soon after which he was appointed the King's Confessor, this being the first instance of a Bishop's discharging that office. The most remarkable particular concerning this Prelate was the tragical manner of his death. For after he had fat near twelve years, the famous rebel Jack Cade and his followers, coming to Edington in Lincolnshire, where the Bishop then was, and being joined by several of that Prelate's own tenants, fell upon his carriages and plundered them, taking away no less than ten thousand marks in money. The next day they assaulted the Bishop himself, whilst he was officiating at the altar, and dragged him away to a neighbouring hill, where they barbarously murdered him [B] by dashing out his brains: then tearing his bloody shirt in pieces, to be preserved in memory of the action, they left his body naked on the place. This massacre happened the 29th of June 1450 (c).

[A] He was descended from a very antient family, seated at Kelsey in Lincolnshire. Dr Fuller (1) collects this chiefly from Bishop Ascham's arms, which, he says, he saw at Salisbury, 'With allusion to the arms of that house, and some episcopal addition.' This likeness, the Doctor tells us, 'Is with him a better evidence, than a sameness of arms would have been, knowing (as he expresses it) that the clergy in that age delighted to disguise their coats from their paternal bearing.'

Protegat optantibus hunc DIADEMA Deus.

By people's fury MITRE thus cast down,
We pray henceforward God preserve the CROWN.

Bishop Godwin is at a loss for the reason of this cruel treatment. Illi quam ob causam inoffensi non habeo compertum (3). But Dr Fuller conceives it was 'Because he was learned, pious, and rich, three capital crimes in a clergyman (4)'. The last mentioned circumstance is sufficient to account for this horrid tragedy: for it is more than probable they murdered the good Bishop, the better to secure the riches they had robbed him of. ASGILL (JOHN), a late ingenious and eminent writer, was descended of parents in a middle state of life, who gave him a good education, and then sent him to London, in order to acquire some knowledge of the Laws, whereby he might gain his living. The natural quickness of his genius, joined to the good fortune he had of rendering himself agreeable to the gentlemen of Lincoln's-Inn, proved the means of recommending him to Mr Eyre, a very eminent Lawyer, and one of the Judges of the King's-Bench, in the reign of King William (a). Under so able a master, he quickly acquired a competent knowledge of the Laws, and was thereupon called to the bar, and was soon taken notice of, as a rising man in his profession (b). His talent for politicks, and a very uncommon vein of wit and humour, which was discovered in two pamphlets he published in the year 1698, drew the eyes of the world still more upon him, and acquired acquired him the universal character of a person of extraordinary though singular genius [A]. Dr Barebone, the famous projector, who built the new square in Lincoln's-Inn, and who, by a multitude of schemes, had brought his affairs into a very perplexed situation, made choice of Mr Asgill, first for his friend and counsel, and afterwards for his executor, for a very odd reason (c), of which the reader may be informed in the notes [B]. His own affairs were a good deal embarrassed before he took upon him this trust, which served to increase his difficulties not a little, so that upon the act for resuming forfeited estates in Ireland, passing in the year 1699, and appointing Commissioners to hear and determine claims, he resolved to go over into that island (d). Before his departure, he published that strange treatise on The Possibility of avoiding Death, which made him so well known to the world, and which will hinder his being ever forgot. A treatise so amazing as to its matter, and dressed out in such an unusual manner, that in all probability

[A] A person of extraordinary though odd genius. Of this he afforded the world sufficient evidence, in the two pamphlets mentioned in the text. The first was entitled, Several assertions proved, in order to create another species of money than gold and silver; the second, An essay on a registry for titles of lands, London, 1698, 12mo. This, though written in a humorous stile, must be allowed to be as sensible a piece as was perhaps ever written on that important subject, and is become extremely scarce. It may not therefore be amiss to give the reader a specimen, as well of this piece, as of our author's method of handling grave subjects in a merry way. His fourth assertion runs in these words, That all objections made against such registry, on account of reducing the practice of the Law, are one good reason for it, which he thus proves. 'The practice of the Law in civil causes is divided into three sorts; first, the transferring of titles, which is called Conveyancing. Secondly, the shewing forth and defending these titles in forms of Law, and this is called Pleading. Thirdly, the arguing upon these conveyances and pleadings (when they come in contest) before the Judges, and this is called, Practice at the bar. So that the practice of the two latter, doth arise from the errors or uncertainties of the former. Were the titles of lands, once made certain, (which they may be by a registry, and no otherwise) I know what I think of the future gains of the Law: the profit of the Law arises from the uncertainty of property, and therefore as property is more reduced to a certainty, the profit of the Law must be reduced with it, the fall of one must be the rising of the other. Actions of slander and battery, and causes on the crown side, would scarce find some of the circuteers perriwigs, and yet (if we observe evidence) they stand obliged to disputes in titles for many of these. Thief and whore, kick and cuff, are very often the effect of forcible entries, trespasses, and serving of process, in which the title comes frequently in question. But the reducing this part of the practice of the Law, are things not seen as yet. The proximus ardet will fall upon the conveyancers, and that not by altering the forms of legal conveyances, or taking them out of their hands, or putting any stop to the dealing in lands, (for that will be increased) but by exposing their manner of practice in this conveyancing part of the Law. For as it was numbered among the sins of one of the Kings of Israel, that he made priests of the meanest of the people; so it is the misfortune of the people of England, that conveyancers are frequently made out of old attornies or noblemens lease-makers sumpt up in bar gowns. Two qualifications are necessary to a compleat conveyancer. First, that he be incapable of dispatching business so fast as he should; secondly, that he doth not dispatch it so fast as he can. Not to speak of bantering their clients with their seeming care and caution in delaying their business, shewing great trunks of old writings in their chamber, calling to their clerks (before them) for one Lord's settlement, and another Lady's jointure, to tell what great clients they have: and when they come to be paid, they reckon their fees by longitude and latitude. I have seen an original mortgage of one skin bred up by a scrivener (in six years) to one and twenty, by assigning it every year, and adding one skin to every assignment, by recitals and covenants. As cows after three years old have one wrinkle added to each horn for every year after, which shews their age; and I am informed, that one deed of sixty skins, was heaved out of a conveyancer's office the other day. At this rate in a little time, the clients must drive their deeds out of their lawyers chambers in wheel-barrow. These assignments and re-assignments of securities, have been a pretty sort of perquisites, especially, if they have but an old judgment or statute kept on foot, these are certain annual incomes. I knew two Serjeants at Law (usurers) made it their common practice every long vacation, to swap securities with one another, to make their mortgagees pay for the assignments; and (doing this without advice of counsel) they once merged an old term, and thereby spoiled their title to secure their fees; which (as to them) answers the character given of these graduates by a foreign historian, Est in Regno Angliæ Genus Hominum doctissimum indolissimum communiter vocat, The learned Serjeants at Law: Now I cannot think but these conveyancers and assigners, would be ashamed to produce such things to a registry; and that therefore, they must either abbreviate their conveyances, or lose their practice. But whether this registry will make these reductions: 1. Of the length of conveyances. 2. The uncertainties of titles: and, 3. By consequence, the other practice in the Law, I cannot tell: however, I hope it, and believe some of them fear it. But if the cries of Monks and Friars had been regarded, we had never heard of the dissolution of monasteries; and if the clamours of Masters of Request, Clerks, and Escheators, had prevailed, the court of wards and liveries had been standing to this day; and yet perhaps, most of these had either purchased their places, or were bred up to that part of the Law only (1). This excellent pamphlet is amongst many other curious pieces preserved in the large collection of State Tracts in the reign of King William III (2), where we also find another treatise in answer to some objections made to such registry, which by the stile should seem to be Mr Argill's also, only his name is not prefixed, as his manner was to every thing he published (3).

[B] Of which the reader will be informed in the notes. Dr Barebone was not only a schemist, but a humorist, which the following story will illustrate; he had drawn a gentleman in the city into a building project there, by which he lost a considerable sum of money. To make him amends, he engaged him in another scheme of building in the fields, where he buried the remainder of his fortune. Whether the gentleman had really any foul play, or whether his misfortunes rendered him suspicious, so it was, that meeting Barebone in Leicester-Fields, he clapt his hand upon his sword, and bid him draw, Draw, said the Doctor calmly, why, where would you have me draw you, I have already drawn you from one end of the town to the other (4). Such was the man who fixed upon Mr Asgill for his executor, and the sole cause he assigned for it was, That he should never pay his debts. As soon therefore as the testator was dead, Mr Asgill summoned his creditors to Lincoln's-Inn Hall, where he produced the Will, and to avoid drawing things into length, or feeding them with false expectations, he made them a very laconick speech. You have heard, gentlemen, the Doctor's testament, and I will religiously fulfil the will of the dead. The gentleman who furnished these memoirs rightly observes, that the Doctor and the Counsellor resembled each other strongly, and that there was not perhaps, such another pair in the three kingdoms. It may not be amiss to observe, that his being Dr Barebone's executor, gave him an interest in the borough of Brambet, for which he sat as Burgess in several Parliaments (5).

[C] It

(c) Ibid., p. 40, 41. bility it will be ever read, though never believed (e) [C]. On his arrival in Ireland, the favour of the Commissioners, and Mr Asgill's own merit, got him into excellent practice, the whole nation almost was then engaged in law-suits, and among these, there were few considerable in which Mr Asgill was not retained on one side or other; so that in a very short space of time, he became master of a considerable fortune, which, however, instead of making him happy, became his ruin. He purchased a large estate for the life of Nicholas Brown, Esq; commonly called Lord Viscount Kinmare (f), having been so created by King James II. This estate, which was worth about three thousand five hundred pounds a year, he bought for a very small consideration, in trust, as it was suggested, for the family of that unfortunate Lord. The interest this estate gave him occasioned Mr Asgill's being elected a member of the House of Commons in Ireland, an honour which he did not long enjoy. He was in Munster when the sessions began, and before he could get to Dublin he was informed, that, upon a complaint, the House had voted his book to be a blasphemous libel, and had ordered it to be burnt; however, he ventured to take his seat in the House, where he sat just four days, when he was expelled for his performance (g). We have an account of this matter given by himself, which is a very fair one, and will certainly divert the reader [D]. His affairs made him

(f) MS. Memoirs of Mr Asgill, p. 3. Defence on his expulsion, p. 41.

[C] It will be ever read, though never believed. The title of this treatise was, An Argument, proving, That according to the Covenant of eternal Life revealed in the Scriptures, Man may be translated from hence into that eternal Life, without passing through Death, although the Human Nature of Christ himself, could not be thus translated till he had passed through death. It was printed originally in the year 1700, and has been privately reprinted several years since. To give the reader any notion of this piece, in any other than its author's words is impossible. Thus then he speaks of it himself. 'To them that knew not the reason, it looked like a whim, for the man in the gospel to walk about the streets with his bed upon his back on the sabbath-day, while the rest of the people were at their devotion, and perhaps it may seem more odd in me, to bolt out an argument in Divinity (as a bone of contention) into the world, at a time when the rest of mankind are so deeply engaged in secular affairs. But he that regardeth the wind: will never sow; and he that waiteth for times and seasons will never do business. And as that seeming whimsical man said to them that reproved him, He that made me whole, the same said unto me, take up thy bed and walk: so say I to them that affront me, He that revealed this unto me, the same bad me tell it abroad, as a watch-word to be given out from one to another (every man to his fellow) as fast as he receives it: Let him that heareth, say come! And having thus delivered my part of the message, I look upon myself to have no more to do with it afterwards than you have. But hereby I shall know, whether this doctrine be mine or no. If it be mine, it will sink and fall and die, but if it be his, that I think it is, it will kindle itself like a firebrand from one to another, till it hath set the world in arms against death. And having thus left the decision of the truth of it to the success, I begin to feel myself more easy under it. And as the four leprous men said to one another in the gate of Samaria; if we sit here we are sure to die with famine, and if we go into the camp of the Syrians, we can but die by the sword: so I have said to myself, if I submit to death, I am sure to die, and if I oppose it, I can but be killed and die. And should I be baffled in this essay, I can lose nothing by it, but that little credit with the world which I value not, in comparison of this attempt. And as those four desperate men venturing themselves upon this resolution, did thereupon find, that they had been before more afraid than hurt; so in making this sally against death, methinks I have discovered it to be rather a bugbear than an enemy. And therefore as they having filled themselves with plunder, thought it their duty to go, and tell the news to them that were ready to perish: So I cannot satisfy myself to eat my morsel alone, without communicating to them, who I know with myself must, by reason of death, be all their life-time subject to bondage. And as their glad tidings of plenty was nevertheless welcome to the King and people of Israel, for being brought to them by men poor and miserable; so if my news be true in itself, why should it fare the worse for being told by the greatest of sinners? And perhaps this qualifies me to be the messenger, lest one more holy should seem to be honoured with it for his own personal sanctity. I remember a sudden retort once given me by a Lady, (to whom I excused this my emulation by the example of Enoch), but you are not so good as he was; for Enoch walked with God. And this might have puzzled me, had not Paul (in his list of worthies) counted upon the translation of Enoch, as done by faith: By faith Enoch was translated, that he should not see death. Why then, if I have as good a faith for this purpose as he had, I am in this point (quoad hoc) as good a man as he was, though I fall short of him, in all his other qualities. Nor is it to be expected, that any assembly of divines should be employed in such a business as this. They inclose themselves within the pale of their own Church, and whoever breaks through that fence, is prosecuted as a trespasser upon their jurisdiction. And thus the Jewish priests excommunicated a layman for teaching them religion, Thou wast altogether born in sin, and dost thou teach us? and they cast him out. But he that had opened his eyes took him in. And such an exchange I should reckon no great misfortune. But is it not a shame, that this Enoch in the beginning of time, so long before the receipt of the promise, should attain to that faith in Christ, which we, that have seen him crucified before our eyes, think a sin to offer at? But having been tempted to commit this sin (like a true mother child of my grand parent Eve) I would tempt my friends to do so too. And all I ask of them is this; having abstracted the study of seven years recluse into less than two hour's reading, I only desire the perusal of it at a time of leisure, when men and women design to be serious, and think most for themselves. And then I flatter myself, that they will find it not the most unpleasant hour that ever they spent in their life. For this I know, that nothing is more pleasant to us than news; and what I have said, was never said by man before. And this I know, that (notwithstanding the defection of our natures) nothing is more pleasant to man than truth. And what I have said is true. And a truth that all the gainers shall not be able to resist, though it be in contradiction to the most received truth in the world. That all men must die (6). It is scarce to be conceived how great a noise this small tract raised, and how general an outcry was made against it's author. The Rev. Dr Sacheverell mentioned it among other blasphemous writings, which induced him to think the Church in danger (7), the poets too were very hard upon Mr Asgill, and what is not a little strange, almost all the world concluded that Mr Asgill must be an Atheist, because he had taken so much pains about religion. The truth seems to be, that he was a violent Enthusiast, and having studied the Scriptures in his mother tongue, and without consulting any commentators, in consequence of which, he frequently mistook their meaning, this led him to believe so much, that those who believed less, in order to vindicate themselves, would needs have it, that he did not believe at all. To support what has been said, as well as to gratify the curiosity of the reader, it will be necessary to add, in other notes, a specimen or two of that wit, which Mr Asgill's book occasioned.

[D] Will certainly divert the reader. This we find in a tract of the author's, published in the year 1712. Having, says he, condemned and executed the him very uneasy in Ireland, where he involved himself in various suits, with the unfortunate Lord Kinmare's family, notwithstanding he married his daughter, a lady of distinguished beauty and merit, and for whom Mr Asgill had a most tender affection (b). In order to deliver himself from these troubles, he disposed of part of his interest, which created fresh disputes, and a new train of law-suits. His expulsion seems to have been in the year 1703, and in 1705 he returned into England, where he was chosen a member for the borough of Bramber in the county of Suffex, and sat without dispute or interruption for several years (i). But in an interval of privilege in 1707, being taken in execution at the suit of Mr Holland, he was committed to the Fleet. The House meeting in November, Mr Asgill applied, and on the sixteenth of December he was demanded out of custody by a Serjeant at Arms with the mace, and the next day took his seat in the House. Between his application and his discharge, complaint was made to the House, of the treatise so often mentioned, and a Committee was appointed to examine it. Of this Committee, Edward Harley, Esq; was Chairman, who made a report, that the book contained several blasphemous expressions, and seemed to be intended to expose the Scriptures. Thursday the eighteenth of September, 1707, was appointed for him to make his defence, which he did with infinite wit and spirit, but inasmuch as he still continued to maintain the assertions he had laid down in that treatise, he was expelled (k) [E]. Many have surmised, and indeed Mr Asgill himself was of opinion, that though his book was made the handle, yet his circumstances were the true cause of his being thus severely treated. It was indeed the first session of the first Parliament of Great Britain, and the memoirs I have suggest, that several of the north British members were scandalized at a person's sitting in the House, and disposing of other folk's property, who, by his lying in prison, had visibly no property of his own (l). Thenceforward Mr Asgill's affairs grew worse and worse. He retired first to the Mint, and then became a prisoner in the King's-Bench, removed himself thence to the Fleet, and

' the book without hearing me, there was nothing left between that, and my expulsion, but to prove me the author; which no one can think I intended to do down, when I had published it with my name to it. Yet as it happened, I had then an opportunity to put them upon the proof of it. The Printer having sold off his first edition, broke the press. And the demands for more putting him upon a second, he committed in that, above thirty errata's from the first. And my accuser in Ireland, (who, I hear, is since promoted to be Secretary to the French prophets) having one of this second edition in his hand, demanded of me a categorical answer, whether I was the author? To which I replied, that I was author of a treatise written upon that argument; but that if I must be categorical, what he then shewed me, was not a print from my copy. And therefore, since he had accused me of (a crime higher than high-treason) blasphemy; I did demand it, as the justice of the house, that they would not admit any less evidence to convict me of this crime, than if I stood indicted of high-treason. Upon this, up stood two volunteer evidence. The first a gentleman of the Law, who at my coming to Ireland (about three years before) had invited me to dine with him at his own house (where I never was either before or after). And his evidence was, That there was then some jocular discourse about a book. The other was a member (with whom I had a suit of law) and his evidence was, That I had turned about upon my heel, and said I had wrote a book, and did not care who knew it. And upon this evidence, I was expelled that house for blasphemy (10).

[E] He was expelled.] Out of the long defence of Mr Asgill, wherein he accounts for this notion coming into his head, his writing a treatise to support it, and his publishing that treatise when it was written, it will be necessary to select only one passage, because therein, we have his answer to the charge brought against him, and the most material evidence to justify that character which we have given of him. * I find, says he, the report of the Committee is not levelled at the argument itself which I have advanced; nor yet against the treatise I have published to prove it: But against some expressions I have used in that proof, and which I intend to give particular answers to. But there is something else laid to my charge (as my design in publishing that argument) of higher concern to me, than any expressions in the treatise, or any censure that can fall on me for it. As if I had wrote it, with a malicious intention to expose the Scriptures as false, because they seemed to contain what I have asserted. And that therefore, if that assertion did not hold true, the Scripture must be false. Now, whether this was my intention or no, there is but ' one witness in heaven or earth can prove, and that is he that made me, and in whose presence I now stand; and who is able to strike me dead in my place. And to him I now appeal, for the truth of what I protest against: That I never did write or publish that argument or treatise upon it, with any intention to expose the Scriptures. But, on the contrary, (tho' I was aware that I might be liable to that censure; and which I knew not how to avoid) I did both write and publish it, under a firm belief of the truth of the Scriptures: And with a belief (under that) that what I have asserted in that argument, is within that truth. And if it be not, then I am mistaken in my argument, and the Scripture remains true: Let God be true, and every man a liar. And having made this protestation, I am not much concerned, whether I am believed in it or no. I had rather tell a truth, than be believed in a lye at any time. But having made this protest against an accusation, greater than the charge in the report, 'tis time for me to come to the report itself. But by what I apprehend from the nature of the exceptions thereby taken, I may first offer one general answer to most, if not all, of them, before I descend to particulars. I do own that, in that treatise (the subject whereof relates to eternal salvation), I have used some familiar expressions of common things, which I did with intent to be sooner read, and more readily understood: All men in the world being (in this thing) like children, most affected with what is spoken in their own dialect. From whence any one of our Saviour's short parables, in comparing the kingdom of God to small and trivial things, hath proved more instructive in religion and morality, than all the works and orations of the learned philosophers (11). To this let us add, an account of his expulsion from an impartial writer. There was, says he, one Mr John Asgill, a Member of the House of Commons, who at the opening of this session of Parliament, was unhappily laid under execution in the Fleet prison; and his adversary Mr Holland, a Staffordshire gentleman, being apprehensive lest he might plead his privilege, he petitioned the House, that he might not be allowed it, till he had made just satisfaction for the debt he owed him. Now the house having appointed a Committee to examine this affair, and Mr Asgill having some years before published a pamphlet, entitled, An Argument, &c. This, instead of the matter of privilege, was wisely made a handle to expel him the House; which, when Mr Asgill, who was then in the House, saw would unavoidably befall him, he went out, and by a stratagem made his escape from those that lay in wait for him at the door (12).

and in the rules of one or other of these prisons continued thirty years, during which time he published a multitude of small political pamphlets, which were most of them well received [F]. He also drew bills and answers, and did other business in his profession with great dexterity. He had something extremely singular in his person, his air, his dress, and his manner of speaking. His conversation was inexpressibly lively and entertaining, and his vivacity continued, in spite of old age and infirmities, to the last. He had a very unaccountable contempt for money, parting with it very readily on all occasions, though he acquired it hardly. The death of his wife affected him more than all the rest of his misfortunes (m) [G]. But even the sense of this he wore off by degrees, and continued a boon companion till within a few weeks before his death, which happened in the rules of the King's-Bench, some time in November 1738, when he was upwards of fourscore (n).

[F] Which were most of them well received.] It would be a very difficult thing, to attempt making an exact catalogue of Mr Asgill's writings, since there were few publick disputes after his expulsion, in which he did not take a share. The most considerable of his works however, which have not been already taken notice of, are these, De Jure Divino, or, an Assertion, That the title of the house of Hanover to the succession of the British monarchy (on failure of issue of her present Majesty) is a title hereditary and of divine institution, 1710, 8vo. Mr Asgill's defence on his expulsion, to which are added an introduction and postscript, 1712, 8vo. Of the first pamphlet there were several editions; however, not long after it was published, he sent abroad another treatise, under the title of, Mr Asgill's apology for an omission in his late publication, in which are contained summaries of all the acts made for strengthening the Protestant succession, for which Mr Asgill was a strenuous advocate. Another pamphlet of his was, The Pretender's declaration abstracted from two anonymous pamphlets: The one entitled, Jus Sacrum; the other, Memoirs of the Chevalier de St George, with memoirs of two other Chevaliers in the reign of Henry VII. 1713, 8vo. The succession of the house of Hanover vindicated, against the Pretender's second declaration in folio, entitled, The hereditary right of the crown of England asserted, &c. 1714, 8vo. This was in answer to Mr Bedford's famous book, and indeed the best answer it ever had, for Mr Asgill was a good lawyer, and knew better what he was about, than that Rev. Divine, or any of his assistants. The Pretender's declaration from Plombiers, 1714, englished, with a postscript before it, in relation to Dr Lesley's letter sent after it, 1715, 8vo. Besides these he wrote An essay for the press. The metamorphoses of man. Asgill against Wolfson, and many other things.

[G] The death of his wife afflicted him more than all his misfortunes.] The truth of this cannot be doubted, if we will take his own word for it. In the postscript to his defence he writes thus. 'Under this confinement God hath been also pleased to take away the desire of mine eyes with a stroke, which hath (however) drowned all my other troubles at once (for the less are merged in the greater). Qui venit hic fluctus, fluctus supereminet omnes. And since I have mentioned her, I'll relate this of her. She having been educated a Protestant of the Church of England, by a Lady her grandmother (her immediate parents, and other relations being Roman Catholics) an honest gentleman of that persuasion, who knew her family, presented her (while she was my fellow-prisoner) with a large folio volume, (being the history of the saints canonized in that Church) for her reading: With intention (as I found) to incline her that way. With which (delighting in reading) she entertained herself till she had gone through it. And some time after that she told me, that she had before some thoughts towards that religion; but that the reading that history had confirmed her against it. And in truth, were I to prescribe an antidote against Popery, I can't think of a better, than to have that legend reprinted, and read in Protestant churches. And yet she would never read the book I was expelled for, till after my last expulsion. But then reading it through, told me she was reconciled to the reasons of it, though she could not say she believed it. However, she said something of her own thoughts with it, that hath given me the satisfaction that she is dead in Christ, and thereby sure of her part in the first resurrection: The dead in Christ shall arise first. And this Pars decessa mei leaving me half dead (while she remains in the grave) hath since drawn me (in diving after her) into a nearer view, and more familiar (tho' more unusual) thoughts of that first resurrection, than ever I had before (13). This Lady, for whom Mr Asgill expresses so much tenderness and respect, is said to have broke her heart on account of the misfortunes of her family, which were chiefly owing to her husband's management. ASHLEY (ROBERT) a Wiltshire gentleman (a), descended from the family of that name residing at Nashhill in that county, was admitted a gentleman-commoner of Hart-Hall in Oxford, in the year 1580, being then fifteen years of age. From the university he removed to the Middle-Temple, where he was called to the dignity of Barrister at Law. After some time, he travelled into Holland, France, &c. [A], conversing with the learned, and frequenting the public libraries. Being returned into England, he lived many years in the Middle-Temple, and honoured the commonwealth of learning with several of his lucubrations. He died in a good old age, the beginning of October, 1641, and was buried in the Temple-Church, the fourth day of the same month. He gave several books to that society. We shall mention some of his works in the remark [B].

[A] He travelled into Holland, France, &c.] Mr Wood tells us, that Mr Ashley, 'finding the practice thereof, (the Law) to have ebbs and tides, applied himself to the learning of the languages of our neighbours, the French, Dutch, Spaniard, and Italian; to the end that he might be partaker of the wisdom of those nations, having been many years of this opinion, that as no one soil or territory yieldeth all fruits alike, so no one climate or region affordeth all kind of knowledge in full measure (1)'. The same author tells us, Mr Ashley returned from his travels, a very knowing and complete gentleman (2).

[B] We shall mention some of his works.] I. A Relation of the kingdom of Cochim-China, containing many admirable rarities and singularities of that country. London 1633, 4to. This book is chiefly, if not entirely, taken from an Italian relation (then lately presented to the Pope) of Christopher Barri, who lived several years in that country. II. A translation from French into Latin verse of Du-Bartas's Urania, or Heavenly Muse; in about two sheets quarto, dedicated to Sir Henry Unton of Wadley. London, 1589. III. A translation from Spanish into English of Almanzor, the learned and victorious King, that conquered Spain; his Life and Death. London, 1627, quarto. It was printed in Spanish at Saragossa, 1603, from an Arabian copy remaining in the Elcurial; where, our author says, he once saw a glorious golden library of Arabian books. IV. A Translation from Italian into English of Il Davide perseguitate, i. e. David persecuted. London, 1637. Written originally by the Marquis Virgilio Malvezzi. Mr Wood tells us, that part of the impression of this book had a new title

A S M O L E, (ELIAS) an eminent Philosopher, Chemist; and Antiquary, of the last century, and founder of the noble Musæum at Oxford, which still bears his name (a). He was the only son of Mr Simon Ashmole, of the city of Lichfield, in Staffordshire, Sadler, by Anne, the daughter of Mr Anthony Boyer, of Coventry in Warwickshire, Woollen-Draper (b). He was born May 23, 1617, a little after three in the morning, as himself informs us, with other particulars relating to his tender years, which for their singularity he thought worth remembering (c) [A]. It happened that his mother's sister was married to James Paget, Esq; Puisne Baron of the Exchequer, and his second son Thomas being extremely fond of his cousin Ashmole, proved the cause of his future preferment, which our author gratefully recorded both in his memory and diary (d). On this gentleman's motion he was taught Musick as well as Grammar; and having a genius thereto, succeeded so well, as to become a chorister in the cathedral at Lichfield. When he had attained the age of sixteen, young Mr Ashmole was sent for up to London, and taken into Baron Paget's family (e). In the month of June, 1634, he lost his father, of whom he has left us a very modest and candid character [B]. He continued for some years after in his dependance on the Paget family, during which time he made a considerable progress in the Law, and spent his leisure hours, in perfecting himself in Musick and other genteel accomplishments (f). In the year 1638, he settled himself in the world, and on the twenty-seventh of March, married Eleanor, daughter of Mr Peter Manwaring, of Smallwood, in the county Palatine of Chester, and in Michaelmas term the same year, became a Solicitor in Chancery (g). On the eleventh of February, 1641, he was sworn an Attorney of the Court of Common Pleas (b), and on the fifth of December in the same year, he lost his wife, who died suddenly, and of whom he has left us a very natural and affectionate memorial [C]. The troubles coming on, he retired from London, agreeable to his principles, being always a zealous and steady Loyalist, and on the ninth of May, 1645, he became one of the gentlemen of the ordnance in the garrison at Oxford (i), from whence he removed to Worcester, where he was Commissioner, Receiver, and Register of the Excise, became soon after Captain in the Lord Ashley's regiment

[A] Which for their singularity he thought worth remembering. As this gentleman had a very strong turn to Astrology, he was singularly nice in his dates, and I am apt to think, the minuteness of such remarks in many old diaries owing to the same cause. The following circumstances from our author's diary, are such as were collected for rectifying the scheme of his nativity when he first studied that art, and I am inclined to believe, that he then began to keep so exact an account of his actions. 'I was born the 23d of May, 1617, (and as my dear and good mother hath often told me) near half an hour after 3 o'clock in the morning. When I rectified my nativity, An. 1647, I found it to be 8 hours and 25 minutes, 49 seconds, A. M. the quarter 38 of 11 ascending. But upon Mr Lilly's rectification thereof, Anno 1667, he makes the quarter 36 ascending. I was baptized the 2d of June following, at St Mary's Church in Lichfield, my Godfathers were Mr Christopher Baxter, one of the proctors of the Bishop's court, and Mr Thomas Offey, Sacrist of the cathedral church. Before I was carried to church, it was agreed my name should be Thomas (as was my grandfather). But when the minister bad name the child, my godfather Offey answered Elias, at which his partners wondered and being (at their return home) asked why he so called me, he could render no account, but that it came suddenly into his mind by a more than ordinary impulse of spirit. My godmother's name was Mrs Bridges. When I was about a year old and fat by the fire, I fell into it, and burned the right side of my forehead; it resting upon the iron bar of the grate, (of which a scar always remained) but my good mother being near, presently took me up and applied something for the cure. I had the small-pox (yet but few) as also the swine-pox and measles, when I was young, but know not the certain time of either. Being about 8 or 10 years old (but the year I cannot remember) my mother and I were invited to my cousin Blackburn's in Longparish, at that time they were building a barn, and I getting up by ladders, to the top thereof fell down, in which fall the inside of my right knee struck against the edge of a great beam, which thereby received a great triangular gash, of which I lay a long time before I was cured (1).'

use, and never intended it for publick inspection. But why so? Did he set down his father and mother's names for fear he should forget them? or is it not more probable, that he committed these particulars to writing, that they might be preserved and read? I therefore commend him for speaking so of his father, as to render his best qualities conspicuous, at the same time he throws a decent veil of obscurity over the rest. '1634 my father died about eleven o'clock before noon, Mr Simon Martin's letter, who gave me notice of his death, bears date the 22d of June. My father was born upon a Whituesday in the morning, he was bred up by his father to his trade. Yet when he came to man's estate, followed it but little. He more affected war than his profession, and spent many of his years abroad, which drew on him a course of expences and ill husbandry. His first voyage was into Ireland with Robert Earl of Effex, anno 159... Two other voyages he afterwards made with his son Robert Earl of Effex, into the Palatinate, from whom he received good respect. He was an honest fair conditioned man, and kind to others, yet through ill husbandry became a great enemy to himself and poor family (2).'

[C] A very natural and affectionate memorial. It appears by the diary, that in the summer of 1641, Mr Ashmole and his wife were in the country together, and that he came up to London without her because she was with child. A maid of his died the same year of the plague, but whether his wife died of the same distemper is uncertain. His entry concerning her death runs thus, 'December 5, My dear wife fell suddenly sick about evening and died (to my own grief and the grief of all her friends) she was buried the next night about 9 o'clock in Atsbury church in Cheshire, near the entrance of the fourth ile of that church, viz. the west end of that isle. December 14. I went from London towards Cheshire, 16th arriving at Lichfield, I first heard of my wife's death, she was a virtuous, modest, careful, and loving wife, her affection was exceeding great towards me, as was mine to her, which caused us to live so happy together. Nor was I less beloved and esteemed both by her father and mother, inasmuch as at her funeral her mother sitting near the corps, with tears professed to the Baron of Kinderton's Lady (who after told it to me) and others present, that she knew not whether she loved me or her only son better (3).'

regiment, and Comptroller of the ordnance (k). In the midst of all this business he was far from neglecting his studies, on the contrary, having entered himself of Brazen-Nose-college in Oxford, he applied himself vigorously to the sciences, but more particularly to Natural Philosophy, Mathematicks, and Astronomy, and his intimate acquaintance with Mr, afterwards Sir George Wharton, gave him a turn to Astrology, which was in those days in greater credit than now (l). In the month of July 1646, he lost his mother, who had always been a very kind parent to him, and for whom he had a very pious regard, as appears by the fair account he has given of her in his diary [D]. On the sixteenth of October the same year, he was elected a brother of the ancient and honourable society of Free and Accepted Masons (m), which he looked upon as a very distinguishing character, and has therefore given us a very particular account of the lodge established at Warrington in Lancashire, and in some of his manuscripts, there are very valuable collections relating to the history of the Free Masons [E]. The King's affairs being now grown desperate, Mr Ashmole withdrew himself, after the surrender of the garrison of Worcester, into Cheshire, where he continued till the end of October, and then came up to London, where he became acquainted with Mr, afterwards Sir Jonas Moore, Mr William Lilly, and Mr John Booker,

[D] The fair account he has given of her in his diary. At the time of her demise, he was besieged in Worcester. His entry on hearing the news of her death, runs in the following terms, ' July 31, 1646, Mr Richard Harrison minister of Tetnal formerly, and afterwards of Lichfield, told me of my mother's death, and that she died about the 8th or 9th of July of the Plague, not long before, that city being visited this summer. She was a discreet, sober, provident woman, and with great patience endured many afflictions, her parents had given her exceeding good breeding, and she was excellent at her needle, which (my father being improvident) stood her in great stead. She was competently read in Divinity, History, and Poetry, and was continually infilling into my ears, such religious and moral precepts as my younger years were capable of; nor did she ever fail to correct my faults, always adding sharp reproofs and good lectures to boot; she was much esteemed by persons of note with whom she was acquainted, she lived in much friendship among her neighbours, and left a good name behind her; in fine, she was truly religious and virtuous (4).'

(4) Ibid. p. 15.

[E] Collections relating to the history of Free-Masons. He made very large collections on almost all points relating to English history, of which some large volumes are remaining at Oxford, but much more was consumed in the fire at the Temple (5), which will be hereafter mentioned. What is hinted above, is taken from a book of letters, communicated to the author of this life, by Dr Knipe, of Christ-church, in one of which is the following passage relating to this subject. ' As to the ancient society of Free-Masons, concerning whom you are desirous of knowing what may be known with certainty, I shall only tell you, that if our worthy brother, E. Ashmole, Esq; had executed his intended design, our fraternity had been as much obliged to him as the brethren of the most noble Order of the Garter. I would not have you surprized at this expression, or think it at all too assuming. The Sovereigns of that order have not disdained our fellowship, and there have been times when Emperors were also Free-Masons. What from Mr E. Ashmole's collection I could gather, was, that the report of our society's, taking rise from a Bull granted by the Pope, in the reign of Henry III, to some Italian Architects, to travel over all Europe, to erect chapels, was ill-founded (6). Such a Bull there was, and those Architects were Masons; but this Bull in the opinion of the learned Mr Ashmole, was confirmative only, and did not by any means create our fraternity, or even establish them in this kingdom. But as to the time and manner of that establishment, something I shall relate from the same collections. St Alban, the Proto-Martyr of England, established Masonry here, and from his time it flourished more or less, according as the world went, down to the days of King Athelstane, who, for the sake of his brother Edwin, granted the Masons a charter, tho' afterwards growing jealous of his brother, it is said, he caused him together with his Page, to be put into a boat and committed to the sea, where they perished (7). It is likely that Masons were affected by his fall, and suffered for some time, but afterwards their credit revived, and we find under our Norman Princes, that they frequently received extraordinary marks of royal favour. There is no doubt to be made, that the skill of Masons, which was always transcendent, even in the most barbarous times, their wonderful kindness and attachment to each other, how different soever in condition, and their inviolable fidelity in keeping religiously their secret, must expose them in ignorant, troublesome, and suspicious times, to a vast variety of adventures, according to the different fate of parties and other alterations in government. By the way, I shall note, that the Masons were always loyal, which exposed them to great severities when power wore the trappings of justice, and those who committed treason, punished true men as traitors. Thus in the third year of the reign of Henry VI, an Act of Parliament passed to abolish the society of Masons (8), and to hinder, under grievous penalties, the holding chapters, lodges, or other regular assemblies. Yet this act was afterwards repealed, and even before that King Henry VI, and several of the principal Lords of his court became fellows of the craft (9). Under the succeeding troublesome times, the Free-Masons thro' this kingdom became generally Yorkists, which as it procured them eminent favour from Edward IV, so the wife Henry VII, thought it better by shewing himself a great lover of Masons to obtrude numbers of his friends on that worthy fraternity, so as never to want spies enough in their lodges, than to create himself enemies, as some of his predecessors had done by an ill-timed persecution (10). As this society has been so very ancient, as to rise almost beyond the reach of records, there is no wonder that a mixture of fable is found in it's history, and methinks it had been better, if a late insidious writer had spent his time in clearing up the story of St Alban, or the death of Prince Edwin, either of which would have found him sufficient employment, than as he has done in degrading a society with whose foundation and transactions, he is visibly so very little acquainted (11), and with whose history and conduct Mr Ashmole, who understood them so much better was perfectly satisfied, &c. (12). I shall add to this letter, as a proof, of it's author's being exactly right as to Mr Ashmole, a small note from his diary, which shews his attention to this society, long after his admission, when he had time to weigh, examine, and know the value of the Masons secret (13). 1682, Mar. 10. About 5 Hor. post Merid. I received a summons to appear at a lodge to be held the next day at Masons-hall, in London. 11th accordingly I went, and about noon, were admitted into the fellowship of Free-Masons, by Sir William Wilton, Knight; Captain Richard Bothwick, Mr William Woodman, Mr William Grey, Mr Samuel Tylour, and Mr William Wise; I was the senior fellow among them, (it being thirty-five years since I was admitted) there was present besides myself, the fellows after-named; Mr Thomas Wise, master of the Mason's company, this present year; Mr Thomas Shorthofe, &c. we all dined at the Half-Moon Tavern in Cheapside, at a noble dinner prepared at the charge of the new accepted Masons.

Booker, esteemed the greatest Astrologers in the world, by whom he was cared, instructed, and received into their fraternity, which then made a very considerable figure, as appeared by the great resort of persons of distinction to their annual feast, of which Mr Ashmole was afterwards elected Steward (n). In 1647 he went down into Berkshire, where he made choice of the pleasant village of Englefield, for the place of his retirement. There he pursued his studies very closely, and having so fair an opportunity, and the advantage of some very able masters, he often went a Simpling, and very soon became an eminent Botanist; for it was the peculiar felicity of this man's genius, that he speedily attained whatever he attempted (o). Here, as appears from his own remarks, he enjoyed in privacy the sweetest moments of his life, the sensation of which perhaps was quickened, by his just idea of the badness of the times (p). It was in this retreat that he became acquainted with a fair lady, whom he afterwards married, tho' the prospect of that marriage had very near cost him his life. This lady's name was Mary, sole daughter of Sir William Forster, of Aldermarston in the county of Berks, Bart. who was first married to Sir Edward Stafford, after his decease to one Mr Hamlyn, and lastly to Sir Thomas Mainwaring, Knt. Recorder of Reading, and one of the Masters in Chancery. Mr Humphrey Stafford her second son, had such a dislike to this match, that when Mr Ashmole was very ill, he broke into his chamber, and if he had not been prevented, would have murdered him (q). In the latter end of 1648, Lady Mainwaring conveyed to him her estate at Bradfield, which was soon after sequestered on account of Mr Ashmole's loyalty, but the interest he had with William Lilly, and some others of that party, enabled him to get that sequestration taken off (r). On the sixteenth of November, 1649, he married Lady Mainwaring, upon which he settled in London, and his house became the receptacle of the most learned and ingenious persons that flourished at that time (s). It was by their conversation, that Mr Ashmole, who had been more fortunate in worldly affairs than most scholars are, and who had been always a curious collector of manuscripts, was drawn to think of publishing a treatise written by Dr Arthur Dee, relating to the Philosopher's stone, together with another tract on the same subject, by an unknown author, which pieces actually came abroad in the year following, but Mr Ashmole was so cautious, or rather modest, as to publish them by a fictitious name (t) [F]. He at the same time addressed

[F] To publish them by a fictitious name.] The first step into the world in print, is for a modest man always a little hard, let his abilities be what they will; but besides the usual inconveniences, Mr Ashmole laboured under many, from the subject he had chosen to cultivate, and very probable this it was that induced him to break the ice, by publishing other mens works, and to appear as an editor and translator, before he took upon him the character of an author. The title of this piece was. I. FASCICULUS CHEMICUS: or Chymical Collections expressing the Ingress, Progress, and Egress, of the secret Hermetick Science, out of the choicest and most famous authors. Whereunto is added, the Arcanum, or Grand Secret of Hermetick Philosophy. Both made English by James Hasolle, Esq; Qui est Mercurius Anglicus. London. 1650 12°. In his Prolegomena to the ingeniously elaborate Students of Hermetick Learning he speaks thus. 'I here present you with a summary collection of the choicest flowers growing in the Hermetick gardens, sorted and bound up in one compleat and lovely posy, a way whereby painful inquisitors avoid the usual discouragements met with in a tedious wandering through each long walk, or winding maze; which are the ordinary and guileful circumstances, wherewith envious Philosophers have enlarged their labours purposely, to puzzle or weary the most resolved undertakings. 'Tis true, the manner of delivery used by the antients upon this subject, is very far removed from the common path of discourse; yet I believe, they were constrained, (for the weight and majesty of the secret) to invent those occult kind of expressions in Ænigmas, Metaphors, Parabols, and Figures.

'Now amongst the catalogue of authors that have treated of this sacred learning, I have chiefly observed four sorts.

'The first, are such whose well-mindedness and honesty have caused them to lay down the whole mystery, faithfully and plainly, giving you a clew, as well as shewing you a labyrinth; and they only are to be studied.

'The second, are those whose magisterial handling a part, or branch thereof, did it rather to discover themselves masters, than with intent to instruct others: These may be read, but they are too sublime for those who stand in need of any introduction.

'Others there are, who, out of ignorance or mistake, have delivered blind and unbottomed fictions,

'which have too much deluded and abused the credulous world; so that of this sort, I may say, (not blemishing the honour, which some of them have justly acquired in other parts of learning) their works are like Pygmalion's image, (full of exquisite proportion, feature, delicacy, and beauty, but not animated with the life and soul of truth) and whilst a man consults with such, he shall always doubt, whether what he reads be to the matter or not; however, the judicious may smell their levity by the rankness of their impertinencies.

'But the last and worst sort of all, are those who, through envy, have scattered abroad their unfaithful recipes and false glosses, (taking for president the devil, that can sow tares and transform himself into an angel of light) with intent to choak and obfuscate the more evident light of the plain-dealing Philosophers, and to discern these impostures, requires a judgment able to divide a hair.

'From this variety of writers it is, that many otherwise steady minds, are tossed up and down, as from racket to racket, being forced to change their thoughts as often as they change their authors, and conceiving they have settled right upon a point, (just like ticklish weather-cocks) are necessitated to shift with the next puff (although but of an empty windy conceit). New discoveries begetting new opinions, which raise more untoward and turbulent doubts, than their greatest strength of judgment can conjure down. Thus (unhappy men) thinking themselves ready to anchor, a cross gust blows them off the shore, perhaps into a rougher sea of debate and perplexity than before, and with greater hazard and danger of splitting.

'I know that the truth of the proper argment, it's preparation, and the fire (the three most important steps to this blessed work) with the whole process is by some philosophers so sincerely laid down and unfolded, that, to a knowing artist, it is a cause of much wonder, why he that reads, (though but smatteringly acquainted with nature) should not meet with clear satisfaction: But here is the reason, many are called but few are chosen. 'Tis a haven towards which many skilful pilots have bent their course, yet few have reached it. For as amongst the people of the Jews, there was but one that might enter into the Holy of Holies, (and that but once a year) so there is seldom more in a nation whom God lets into this sanctum sanctorum of Philosophy, yet some there are. But though the addressed himself to a work of greater consequence, which was the preparing for the press, a compleat collection of the works of such English Chemists, as had till then remained in MS: which cost him a great deal of labour, and for the embellishment of which he spared no expence, causing the cuts that were necessary, to be engraved at his own house in Black-Fryars, by Mr Vaughan, who was then the most eminent artist in that way in England (u). He was brought to have such an affection for Chemistry, by his intimate acquaintance with Mr William Backhouse, of Swallowfield in the county of Berks, who was reputed an adept, and who, from his free communication of chemical secrets, Mr Ashmole was wont to call Father, agreeable to the custom which had long prevailed among the lovers of that art (w) [G]. He likewise employed a part of his time in number of these Elect are not many, and generally the fathom of most mens fancies, that attempt the search of this vast and subtle mystery, too narrow to comprehend it, and their strongest reason too weak to pierce the depth it lies obscured in; being indeed so uncarchable and ambiguous, it rather excites the sacred and courteous illuminations of a Cherub, than the weak assistance of a pen to reveal it. Yet let no man despair; For surely there is a spirit in man, and the inspiration of the Almighty giveth understanding. And though all things before us seem huddled up in a deformed chaos, yet can he place them in comeliness and order. For many philosophers closely shut up, or concealed divers things, which they left the ingenious inquirer to sift into or find out, presuming to whom God intended the discovery of the wonder, he would afford eyes that should pierce through the mist of words, and give them a ray of light, which should lead them through this darkness. To find out that path which no fowl knoweth, and which the vulture's eye hath not seen. For if seriously perused, you will find their books are much like drawers, that lead to some choice and secret box in a cabinet, (one opening the way to the rest) which if heedfully revolved, the satisfaction you miss in one author, you will meet with in another; and all perhaps may at length discover such pregnant and sublime secrets, as shall manifest thee to be one of those chosen vessels ordained to be informed of this knowledge, which sometimes God hath hid from the wise and prudent, but revealed unto babes (14). The bringing so much of this introductory discourse into publick view, may be of service to the inquisitive reader, as it shews him at once, what sort of learning this was, and what kind of phraseology was thought requisite to recommend it. Mr Ashmole's Prolegomena alone contains thirty-one pages, exclusive of the postscript, which accounts for the publication of the second piece in the collection. The former of these prefaces is dated March 1, 1649-50; the second April 1, 1650. As for the original author of the Fasciculus, we shall have occasion to mention him at large hereafter (15), but as for the author of the Arcanum, he was not known to Mr Ashmole, which is one good reason to suspect he was not one of the Adepts, as will be shewn in it's proper place. Before we quit this treatise it is requisite to observe, that before it there is a kind of Hieroglyphical frontispiece in several compartments. At the top there is the representation of a King (Phœbus), sitting on a lion, holding the resemblance of the sun in his hand at one end of the page, and opposite to him a lady (Diana) with the moon in one hand and an arrow in the other, sitting on a crab. Between them is the figure of Hermes, on a tripod, with the scheme of the heavens in one hand, and his caduceus in the other. These are intended to express the materials of the stone, and the proper season for the process. In the middle of the page is an altar, with the bust of a man, to the middle of his neck, his head being covered by an astrological scheme, dropped by a hand from the clouds. In the middle of this scheme are these words, Astra regunt homines, i. e. The stars mankind command. On the altar are these words, Mercurio-philus Anglicus, i. e. The English lover of Hermetick philosophy. On the right side of the frontispiece is the sun, moon, and crows, in conjunction, and from them hangs down a scrowl with these words, Quod est superius, est sicut inferius, i. e. What is above, is as what is beneath. Under this scrowl is a tree, and a creature knowing the root. On one side is a pillar adorned with musical instruments, rules, compasses, and mathematical schemes; on the other, a pillar of the like kind, with all sorts of martial musick, and instruments of war. At the bottom of the page, this tetrastick stands by way of explication.

These letters signify Thomas Wharton, Doctor of Physick. Anthony Wood (16), gives a large but incorrect account of this picture, in which we find assembled all the learned fooleries of that age, which because untouched by Wood, I will endeavour to explain. The scrowl from above, and the mole at the foot of the asb-tree, express the author's name, which is also anagramized in James Hasolle, i. e. Elias Ashmole. The column on the right hand refers to his proficiency in Musick, and his being a Free-Mason, as that on the left does to his military preferences; and thus with Dr Wharton's leave, these Ænigma's, as he calls them, are revealed.

[G] Prevailed among the lovers of that art. As to this gentleman's kindness to our author, he mentions it frequently in his Diary, and tells us expressly, that after revealing to him so many of his secrets, Mr Backhouse told him, he must needs be his son. Yet somewhat he long concealed, for we find this entry in Mr Ashmole's Diary after this (17). '1653 May, 13. My father Backhouse, lying sick in Fleet-street, over-against St Dunstan's church, and not knowing whether he should live or die, about eleven of the clock, told me in syllables, the true matter of the philosopher's stone, which he bequeathed to me as a legacy.' The nature of this kind of philosophick adoption, is very copiously explained by our author himself, in his Notes on Norton's Ordinal (18), and perhaps the passage may not be disagreeable the reader.

(17) Page 29.

There has ever been a continued succession of Philosophers in all ages, altho' the heedless world hath seldom taken notice of them, for the antients usually (before they died) adopted one or other for their sons, whom they knew well fitted with such like qualities, as are set down in the letter that Norton's master wrote to him, when he sent to make him his heir unto this science, and otherwise than for pure virtue's sake, let no man expect to attain it, or, as in the case of Tonfile,

' Now under what ties and engagements, this secret is usually delivered (when bestowed by word of mouth), may appear in the weighty obligations of that oath, which Charnock took before he obtained it: For thus spake his master to him (21), in acquiring the art of engraving seals, casting in sand, and the mystery of a working Goldsmith (x), but all this time, his great work of publishing the ancient English writers in Chemistry, went on, and finding that a competent knowledge of the Hebrew, was absolutely necessary for understanding and explaining such authors as had written on the Hermetick science, he had recourse to Rabbi Solomon Frank (y), by whom he was taught the rudiments of the sacred tongue, which he found very useful to him in his studies. At length, towards the close of the year 1652, his Theatrum Chymicum Britannicum, appeared, which gained him great reputation in the learned world, as it shewed him to be a man of a most studious disposition, indefatigable application, and of wonderful accuracy in his compositions; and as it was then very much admired, so it is still highly esteemed, by such as are addicted to that kind of learning (z) [H]. ‘ That you disclose the secret that I shall you teach

 ‘ Hath ever searched after the secrets of nature;
 ‘ To him you may reveale the secret of this arte, ‘ Under the covering of Philosophic, before this ‘ world yee depart.

‘ And this oath he charged him to keep faithfully,
 ‘ and without violation, as he thought to be ‘ saved from the Pit of Hell.

‘ And if it so fell out, that they met not with ‘ any, whom they conceived in all respects worthy ‘ of their adoption (22) they then resigned it into ‘ the hands of God, who best knew where to bestow
 ‘ it. However, they seldom left the world, before ‘ they left some written legacy behind them, which ‘ (being the issue of their brain) stood in room and ‘ place of children, and becomes to us both parent
 ‘ and schoolmaster, throughout which they were so ‘ univerfally kind, as to call all students by the dear
 ‘ and affectionate tytle of Sons (23), (Hermes, giving ‘ the first precedent) wishing all were such, that take ‘ the true pains to tread their fathers steps, and ‘ industriously to follow the rules and dictates they ‘ made over to posterity, and wherein they faithfully ‘ discovered the whole mystery.

‘ As lawfully as by their fealty they may,
 ‘ By lycence of the dreadful Judge at domesday (24).

‘ In these legitimate children, they lived longer ‘ than in their adopted sons; for though these certainly ‘ perished in an age, yet their writings (as if
 ‘ when they dyed, their souls had been transmigrated ‘ into them) seemed as immortal, enough at least to ‘ perpetuate their memories, ’till time should be no ‘ more: And to be the father of such sons, is (in ‘ my opinion) a most noble happiness.’ Our author’s ‘ Commentary making this point quite clear, there is ‘ no necessity of insisting farther upon it, only it may ‘ be proper to observe, that Mr Ashmole’s father, ‘ Backhouse, did not die ’till May 30, 1662, as ap‘ pears by our author’s Diary (25). He was esteemed ‘ a very great Chemist, and admirably versed in what ‘ was stiled the Rosicrucian learning, and he was so;
 ‘ but it appears plainly from Mr Ashmole’s writings,
 ‘ that he understood his father Backhouse, in too literal
 ‘ a sense, and did not discover the confusion occa‘ sioned by applying a method of removing all the ‘ imperfections of metals to Physick, and thereby mis‘ leading people on that subject, by the promises of ‘ an universal medicine, true perhaps in the less obvious ‘ sense, and false in the other, in which however it ‘ is generally taken. This I only hint, and that for ‘ a reason which will be more fully insisted on in the ‘ ensuing note.

[H] By such as are addicted to that kind of learn‘ ing. There are very few Books that have been ‘ printed in our language, which have made so much ‘ noise abroad, and yet are so little known at home, ‘ as this piece of our author’s, which however brought ‘ him into esteem and credit with all the Virtuosi, who ‘ were living at the time of it’s publication. The title
 ‘ at large ran thus:

Our learned author, in his Prolegomena to this work, having first magnified the Science of Alchymy, as it is called, proceeds next to an historical account of English writers, on that subject which is extremely to our purpose, as containing many curious strockes not to be found elsewhere. His words are these:

‘ Our English Philosophers generally (like Prophets) ‘ have received little honour (unless what has been ‘ privately paid them) in their own country, nor have ‘ they done any mighty works amongst us, except in ‘ covertly administering their medicine to a few sick, ‘ and healing them (for greater experiments than ‘ what it performs in Physick, they never publicly ‘ made shew of). Thus did I. O. (one of the first ‘ four fellows of the Frates R. C.) in curing the ‘ young Earl of Norfolk of the Leprosy, and Dr
 ‘ B, in carrying off the virulency of the small-pox, ‘ twice from Queen Elizabeth; inso much that they ‘ never appeared: But in parts abroad, they have ‘ found more noble reception, and the world greedy ‘ of obtaining their works, nay, (rather than want ‘ the sight thereof) contented to view them through ‘ a translation, witness what Maierus, Hermannus, ‘ Combachius, Faber, and many others have done;
 ‘ the first of which came out of Germany, to live
 ‘ in England, purposely that he might so understand ‘ our English tongue, as to translate Norton’s Or‘ dinal into Latin verse, which most judiciously and ‘ learnedly he did: yet (to our shame be it spoken)
 ‘ his entertainment was too, too coarse for so deserving
 ‘ a scholar.

‘ How

work gave him, extended his acquaintance considerably, insomuch, that the great Mr Selden took notice of him in the year 1653, encouraged his studies, and lived in great friendship with him to the day of his death (a). He was likewise very intimate with

‘ How great a blemish is it then to us, that refuse to read so famous authors in our natural language, whilst strangers are necessitated to read them in ours, to understand them in their own; yet think the subject much more deserving than their pains. If this we do but ingenuously consider, we shall judge it more of reason, that we look back upon, than neglect such pieces of learning as are natives of our own country, and by this inquisition, find no nation has written more or better, although at present (as well through our own supineness, as the decrees of fate) few of their works can be found. John Leland took very much pains, even at the yielding up of the ghost of our English learning, to preserve it’s latest (but weakest cause almost spent) breath; and from him John Bale, with John Pitts, (who indeed is but Bale’s plagiarist) hath left us a catalogue of the writers of this nation, and that’s near all: Yet posterity for this is deeply obliged. What punishment then did their pestilent malice deserve, who robbed us of their whole works?’

‘ A judicious author speaking of the dissolution of our monasteries, saith thus, Many manuscripts, guilty of no other superstition than the red letters in their front, were condemned to the fire, and here a principal key of antiquity was lost to the great part of posterity, (such was learning’s misfortune at that great devastation of our English libraries that) where a red letter or a mathematical diagram appeared, they were sufficient to entitle the book to be Popish or Diabolical.’

Our author then strikes out into the praises of the Druids among the Britons, the learned Philosophers among the Saxons, and the politer writers amongst the Normans. He next turns to the particular subject of Hermetick philosophy, and though he intimates he never adventured to practise it, he seems confident, that he knows what he speaks of thus:

‘ I must profess, I know enough to hold my tongue, but not enough to speak; and the no less real than miraculous fruits I have found, in my diligent enquiry into these Arcana, lead me on to such degrees of admiration; they command silence, and force me to lose my tongue. Yet as one greatly affecting my native country, and the satisfaction of all ingenious artists, I have published (for their use) these ensuing collected Antiquities, and shall here say something more than they speak of.

‘ He who shall have the happiness to meet with St Dunstan’s work de Occulta Philosophia, (a book which E. G. A. I. made much use of, and which shall chiefly back what here I am about to say) may therein read such stories as will make him amazed, to think what stupendious and immense things, are to be performed by virtue of the Philosopher’s mercury, of which a taste only and no more.

‘ And first of the mineral stone, the which is wrought up to a degree only, that hath the power of transmuting any imperfect earthy matter into it’s utmost degree of perfection; that is, to convert the basest metals into perfect gold and silver, flints into all manner of precious stones, (as rubies, saphirs, emeralds, and diamonds, &c.) and many more experiments of the like nature. But as this is but a part, so it is the least share of the blessing which may be acquired by the philosopher’s materia if the full virtue thereof were known. Gold I confess is a delicious object, a goodly light which we admire and gaze upon, ut pueri in Junonis avem, but as to make gold (saith an incomparable author) is the chiefest intent of the Alchymists, so was it scarce any intent of the ancient philosophers and the lowest use the adepts made of this materia.

‘ For they being lovers of wisdom more than worldly wealth, drove at higher and more excellent operations, and certainly he to whom the whole course of nature lies open, rejoiceth not that he can make gold and silver, or the Devils, to become subject unto him, as that he sees the heavens open, the Angels of God ascending and descending, and that his own name is fairly written in the book of life.

‘ Next to come to the vegetable, magical, and angelical stones, the which have in them no part of the mineral stone, (quatenus stone fermented with metalline and earthly nature) for they are marvelously subtil, and each of them differing in operation and nature, because fitted and fermented for several effects and purposes. Doubtless Adam (with the fathers before the flood and since) Abraham, Moses, and Solomon, wrought many wonders by them, yet the utmost of their virtues they never understood, nor indeed any but God the maker of all things in heaven and in earth, blessed for evermore.

‘ For by the vegetable may be perfectly known the nature of man, beasts, fowls, fishes, together with all kind of trees, plants, flowers, &c. and how to produce and make them grow, flourish, and bear fruit. How to increase them in colour and smell, and when, and where we please, and all this not only at an instant, experimenti gratia, but daily, monthly, yearly, at any time, at any season, yea, in the depth of winter, and therefore not unlike the walnut-tree which antiently grew in Glassenbury’s church-yard, and never put forth leaves before St Barnabie’s-day, yet then was fully loaded with them, as also the hawthorn there, so greatly famed for shooting out leaves and flowers at Christmas; together with the oak in New Forest, that bore green leaves at the same season, may be some experiments made of the vegetable stone.

‘ Besides the masculine part of it which is wrought up to a solar quality, and through it’s exceeding heat will burn up and destroy any creature, plant, &c. That which is lunar and feminine (if immediately applied) will mitigate it with it’s extrem cold, and in like manner the lunar quality benumbs and congeals any animal, &c. unless it be presently helped and resolved by that of the Sun. For though they both be made out of one natural substance, yet in working they have contrary qualities, nevertheless there is such a natural assistance between them, that what the one cannot do, the other doth, can, and will perform. Nor are their inward virtues more than their outward beauties, for the solar part is of so resplendent transparent lustre, that the eye of man is scarce able to endure it. And if the lunar part be exposed abroad in a dark night, birds will repair to (and circulate about) it as a fly round a candle, and submit themselves to the captivity of the hand. And this invites me to believe, that the stone which the antient Hermit (being then 140 years old) took out of the wall in his cell, and shewed Cornelius Gallus, An. 1602, was of the nature of this vegetable stone, for (upon opening the golden box wherein it was inclosed) it dilated it’s beams all over the room, and that with so great splendor, that it overcame the light that was kindled therein, besides the Hermit refused to project it upon metal (as being unworthy of it) but made his experiment upon veronica and rue.’

It is very strange, that a Person of such admirable natural parts, and of so much acquired learning, should express himself with so great vehemence, and venture his reputation so boldly in a matter of this nature, which he very well knew, laboured under so many suspicions; but he was so led away by the exterior appearances, and relied so entirely on what the fages he had read delivered, that he never once suspected that this universal medicine acted only within it’s own kingdom, and that what he represents as the lowest, was in truth it’s highest effect. But it may justly be alledged, in favour of Mr Ashmole, that he studied the history of the science, rather than the science itself, and knew more of the Philosopher’s stone by reading than practice, which however it might shew his own wisdom, contributed very little to that of his reader. This preface is dated January 26, 1651-2, but the book itself did not appear till about that time twelve-month, and was then extremely well received by the Virtuosi, who grew wonderful well pleased with our author, and offered him all manner of encouragement for the completing his design, by publishing the prose as well as poetick authors.

with Mr Oughtred, the famous Mathematician, and with Dr Wharton, a Physician of great character and experience (b). His marriage with Lady Mainwaring involved him first in abundance of law-suits with other people, and at last produced a dispute between themselves, which came to a hearing on the eighth of October, 1657, in the Court of Chancery, where Serjeant Maynard having observed, that in eight hundred sheets of depositions taken on the part of the Lady, there was not so much as a bad word proved against Mr Ashmole, her bill was dismissed, and she delivered back to her husband (c). He had now for some time addicted himself to the study of antiquity and records, for which he had a wonderful genius. This recommended him to the intimate acquaintance of Mr, afterwards Sir William Dugdale, whom about this time he attended in his survey of the Fens, and was very useful to him in that excellent undertaking, the consequence of which shortly appeared to the world, in the most valuable performance that ever fell from the pen of that great writer, and indefatigable Antiquary, whose writings do so much honour to his country (d). Mr Ashmole himself soon after took the pains to trace the Roman road, which in Antoninus's Itinerary, is called Bennevanna, from Weedon to Litchfield, of which he gave Mr Dugdale an account, in a letter addressed to him upon that subject (e). It is very probable, that after his studies had thus taken a new turn, he lost somewhat of his relish for Chemistry, since he discontinued the Theatrum Chemicum, which according to his first project was to have made several volumes; yet he still retained, as most people do who dip into that kind of study, such a remembrance of it, as induced him to part civilly with the sons of art, which he did, by publishing a treatise in prose on the Philosopher's stone, to which he prefixed an admirable preface, wherein he seems to have apologized for taking leave of the subject, as he appears to have done by sending abroad this treatise (f) [I]. In the spring of the year 1658, our author

[I] As he appears to have done by sending abroad this treatise] It was with a view to continue and compleat his former design, that Mr Ashmole got this, and many other pieces of a like nature, into his custody, from such of the Literati as were his friends; as appears plainly, from the beginning of his preface to this very piece, the next book he published, which was, III. The Way to Bliss in three Books, made publick by Elias Ashmole, Esq; Qui est Mercuriophilus Anglicus. London 1658, 4to. He opens himself thus to the world on that occasion.

‘It is now somewhat above six years, since I published the first part of my Theatrum Chemicum Britannicum, immediately after which, my studies of that nature received most unfortunate interruptions from the commencement of several vexatious suits against me; but God, not only enabled me to endure those impetuous, multiplied storms, but some few months since, was pleased to sweeten my long sufferings with a fair and peaceful issue.’

How he came to alter his purpose of publishing several such volumes, and send this piece singly into the world, we are frankly told by him in these words.

‘All this while, I hoped to meet with one or other, who (inclined to advance the honour of Hermes his family) would have taken the pains of adding a second volume, to my said Theatrum, in regard those successive troubles (hanging so long, and heavily upon me) had denied me the leisure; nor were either my invitations to it wanting, or the free contributions of whatever I had so painfully collected unoffered, to the end (my design of letting the world, see what excellent men we had once of our nation, famous as well for that kind of philosophy as any other learning, and masters of so transcendent a secret) might have been furthered. Notwithstanding this, I hear of nothing (hitherto) done, nothing endeavoured: But instead thereof, I lately met with a pretended copy of the following discourse, ready fitted for the press, which (upon perusal) I found mutilated with many imperfections, much injured by several incongruous additions, and they, confessed to be only made up of some scattered shreds and fragments, collected from the whole work, and besides intended, that the world should take it for the child of one Eugenius Theodidactus, being (by Re-baptization) called the Wise-Man's Crown, or Rosie-cruftian Physick, under which titles notice hath been given of it's coming abroad, by other books since published.

This person E. Theodidactus, was one John Heydon, a great pretender to Roficrufian knowledge, who married the widow of Nicholas Culpepper, the famous Quack, and published abundance of idle books, in some of which, he abused Mr Ashmole on this subject (22), though certainly there was no comparison between the men, one being as despicable as the other was justly esteemed. In the same preface, Mr Ashmole gives us the following ingenuous account of the original author of this treatise.

‘As for our author, he was without doubt an Englishman, but has hitherto passed with us among the anonymi, and the book (his off spring) shews itself sufficiently legitimate, though the true father thereof be as yet unknown. I have heard some notable stories, and those backed with persuasive circumstances, to make an easy faith think the providence very observable, that not only furnished a laborious searcher into this mysterious learning with the original itself, but most fortunately directed him to three grains of the powder closed up between two leaves thereof, with which he made projection; but I affect not to fly-blow the ears of my readers, only this I can modestly aver, that my copy was a transcript of that original.

‘The work seems to be written about the beginning of the last (or end of the former) century; the main drift of the author being from weighty and serious arguments and examples, to prove the possibility of such a thing as the Philosopher's stone, whereby is largely manifested, that nature has exhibited greater wonders to the view of the world; and as great things have been (and consequently may be) performed by other weaker and lesser means, where a due, friendly, and philosophical conjunction of art and nature is fully understood, and yet how be it (because such are familiar unto, and ordinary among us) we consider them not; 'tis a discourse fraught with variety of excellent rational matter, and fitted to the learned, as well as meaner capacities; nay, such as I boldly persuade myself, will fully satisfy both, beyond any thing yet extant of this nature. And I believe many captious arguments, heretofore used and urged against the truth of this so infallible a science, will here meet with satisfactory solutions, and henceforth find no further place in any discourse favouring but of sobriety.

‘I must also acquaint the reader, that this piece was of so high a value, with the industrious Doctor Everard, as it invited him to bestow his pains in the marginal notes; wherein (like a skilful Philosopher, whose first operation is to make hidden things manifest) he drew forth and discovered, that which our author's magisterial pen thought fit to conceal, and having obtained those notes (they being added to a transcript of this work, and both fairly written in the Doctor's hand) from a very intimate friend (one extraordinarily learned, and a great ornament of our nation) I was willing to make them publick also (23).’

This address to the reader, which is dated April 16, 1658, was a kind of farewell to Hermetick philosophy from Mr Ashmole. For though he afterwards applied himself to the collecting materials for his history of the Order of the Garter, which he afterwards lived to finish, and thereby rendered both the order and himself immortal, the just reward of the prodigious pains he took in searching records in the Tower, and elsewhere, comparing them with each other, and obtaining such lights, as were requisite to render so perplexed a subject clear, and to reduce all the circumstances of such a vast body of history into their proper order (g). In September following he made a journey to Oxford, where he was extremely well received, and where he undertook the making a full and distinct description of the coins given to the publick library by Archbishop Laud, which was of great use to him in the works which he afterwards composed (h). He had lodged and boarded sometimes at a house in South Lambeth, kept by Mr John Tredescant, whose father and himself had been physick-gardeners there for many years, and had collected a vast number of curiosities, which after mature deliberation, Mr Tredescant and his wife determined to bestow on Mr Ashmole, and accordingly sealed and delivered a deed of gift for that purpose, on the sixteenth of December, 1659 (i). Upon the happy restoration of King Charles II, Mr Ashmole was early introduced into the presence and favour of his Majesty, and on the eighteenth of June 1660, which was the second time he had the honour of discoursing with the King, he graciously bestowed upon him the place of Windsor Herald (k). A few days after he was appointed by the King to make a description of his medals, and had them delivered into his hands, and King Henry VIIIth's closet assigned for his use, being also allowed his diet at Court (l). On the twenty-first of August in the same year, he presented the three books which he had published to his Majesty, who as he both loved and understood Chemistry, received them very graciously (m). On the third of September he had a warrant signed for the office of Commissioner of the Excise, in consequence of a letter written by his Majesty's express command, to the Earl of Southampton, then Lord High-Treasurer, by Mr Secretary Morris (n). About this time, a commission was granted to him as incidental to the care of the King's medals, to examine the famous, or rather infamous Hugh Peters, about the contents of the royal library which had fallen into his hands, and which was very carefully and punctually executed, but to very little effect (o) [K]. On the second of November he was called to the bar in Middle-Temple hall (p). On the fifteenth of January, 1661, he was admitted a Fellow, of the Royal Society (q). On the ninth of February following, the King signed a warrant for constituting him Secretary of Surinam in the West Indies (r). In the beginning of the year 1662, he was appointed one of the Commissioners for recovering the King's goods (s), and about the same time he sent a set of services and anthems to the cathedral church of Litchfield, in memory of his having been once a Chorister there, and he gave afterwards twenty pounds towards repairing the cathedral (t). On the twenty-seventh of June, 1664, the White Office was opened, of which he was appointed a Commissioner (u). On the seventeenth of February, 1665, Sir Edward Bylke sealed his deputation for visiting Berkshire, which visitation he began on the eleventh of March following (w). On the ninth of June 1668, he was appointed by the Lords Commissioners of the Treasury, Accountant-General, and Country Accountant in the Excise (x). His second wife, Lady Mainwaring, dying on the first of April in the same year, he soon after made his wards deposited many valuable MSS. relating to this science in a publick library for the benefit of posterity, yet he wrote nothing more upon the subject. The book itself, deserved the pains that both Dr Everard, and Mr Ashmole bestowed about it, for beyond all doubt, in this genuine edition of our author, it is the best and most sensible book in our language, containing as much truth, and much more learning and reason, than the boasted performances of Eugenius, or of Irenaeus Philalethes.

[K] Carefully and punctually executed, but to very little effect. It was a thing notorious, that this enthusiastical buffoon, Hugh Peters, had got possession of the King's library and closet, in those times of rebellion and confusion, and it was no less notorious, that the most valuable curiosities in them, were embezzled and dissipated all over Europe, and therefore the parliament shewed an early care in this respect (24), and the King also issued the following warrant for obtaining the best account, that could be had of his royal father's effects.

CHARLES REX.

To our trusty and well-beloved Sir John Robinfon, Knt. and Bart. Lieutenant of our Tower of London.

OUR will and pleasure is, that you permit Thomas Rofs, and Elias Ashmole, Esquires; to speak with and examine Hugh Peters, concerning our books and medals, that have been embezzled, and this to be performed in your presence; for which this shall be your warrant. Given at our Court at Whitehall, the 10th day of September, 1660, in the twelfth year of our reign.

By his Majesty's command,

EDW. NICHOLAS.

Upon this Mr. Ashmole, and Mr Rofs, who was Tutor to the D. of Monmouth, did accordingly take some pains with Hugh Peters, on this head, but with how small effect the following report shews.

An Account of what Mr Hugh Peters, gave upon his Examination before the Honourable Sir John Robinfon, Lieutenant of his Majesty's Tower, taken by Mr Rofs and Mr Ashmole, assigned thereunto 12 Sept. 1660.

The examinant saith, That about the year 1648, in August, he preserved the library in Saint James's, against the violence and rapine of the soldiers, and the same continued three or four months under his custody, and that he did not take there any thing, but left it unviolated as he found it. He doth confess that he saw divers medals of gold, silver, and brass, and other pieces of antiquity, as iron rings, and the like, but that he took nothing thence, and then delivered up the key and custody of them, to Major General Ireton; and further he saith, that he never had or saw any thing belonging thereto.

addresses to Mrs Elizabeth Dugdale, daughter to his good friend Sir William Dugdale, Knt. Garter King at Arms, and to this lady, who was his third wife, he was married in Lincoln's-Inn chapel on the third of November, by Dr Lloyd afterwards Bishop of Worcester (y). The university of Oxford, considering the many favours they had received from Mr Ashmole, on the nineteenth of July, 1669, created him Doctor of Physick by diploma, which was presented to him on the third of November following, by Dr Yates, Principal of Brazen-Nose college, in the name of the university (z). He was now courted and esteemed by the greatest people in the kingdom, both in point of title and merit, who frequently did him the honour to visit him at his chambers in the Temple, and whenever he went his summer progress, he had the same respect paid him in the country, more especially at his native town of Litchfield, to which, when he came, he was splendidly entertained by the corporation (a). On the eighth of May, 1672, he presented his laborious work on the most noble order of the Garter, to his most gracious master King Charles II, who not only received it with great civility and kindness, but soon after granted to our author, as a mark of his approbation of the work, and of his personal esteem for him, a privy seal for 400 pounds out of the custom of paper (b). This was his greatest undertaking, and indeed if he had published nothing else, it ought to have preserved his memory for ever, since it is in it's kind one of the most valuable books in our language [L]. On the twenty-ninth of January, 1675, he resigned his office of Windsor Herald, which, by his procurement, was bestowed on his brother Dugdale (c). It was with great reluctance that the Earl Marshal parted with him, and it was not long after, that he bestowed on him the character of being the best officer in his [L] One of the most valuable books in our language. The title of this excellent work at large runs thus. IV. The Institution, Laws, and Ceremonies of the most noble order of the Garter. Collected and digested into one body by Elias Ashmole, of the middle Temple, Esquire; Windesore, Herald at Arms. A work furnished with variety of matter relating to Honour and Noblesse. Lond. 1672, Folio. It is, beyond comparison, the most finished piece that ever fell from the hand of our author, and contains a vast treasure of history and antiquities, which had they not been thus preserved, had been unquestionably lost to all posterity. As to the design of the performance, the preface, which is very short, and written in a much plainer and more correct stile, than any thing he had formerly penned in the same way, sufficiently informs us, as well as the manner in which it is disposed; and therefore we have transcribed two or three of the most remarkable and material paragraphs, in order to confirm these remarks to the reader.

As I ever had a great veneration for the most noble order of the Garter, so must it needs be imagined, that I was accordingly much concerned in the late unhappy times, to see the honour of it trampled on, and itself sunk into a very low esteem among us. That reflection put me upon thoughts, not only of doing something, that might inform the world of the nobleness of it's institution, and the glory which in process of time it acquired, both at home and abroad, but also of drawing up, in the nature of a formulary, both the legal and ceremonial part thereof, for the better conduct of such as might be therein afterwards concerned, in case the eclipse it then laboured under in our horizon, should prove of so long continuance, as that many occurrences, worthy of knowledge, might come to be in a manner forgotten.

Upon the first communication of my design, to the late Reverend Doctor Christopher Wren, Register of the said order, it received not only his approbation, but also his ready assistance in the use of the annals thereof, then in his custody. From these and other authentick manuscripts and autographs, particularly relating to the order, and a painful and chargeable search of our publick records, I had collected the greatest part of my materials before the happy restoration of his now Majesty, the present Sovereign of this most noble order; who being afterwards acquainted with what I had done, was most graciously pleased to countenance it, and encourage me in the prosecution thereof.

The work in general contains an historical account of the laws and ceremonies of the said most noble order; but more particularly it's institution, the manner and order observed in elections, investitures, and installations of Knights, the holding of chapters, celebration of festivals, the formality of proceedings, the insignificance of embassies, sent with the habit to stranger Kings and Princes, in sum

all other things relative to the order. In the illustration whereof, I have inserted (where they properly occurred) the most eminent and considerable cases, which have required and received discussion in chapters, the determination thereupon, becoming rules and laws; whence it may be observed, that the foundation and superstructures of the order, were laid and raised upon the exactest rules of honour. And to supply the failure and defects of the annals, I have been forced to make use of memorials and relations, yet such as were taken notice of and committed to writing, either by some of the officers of the order, or those of arms, during the times of their attendance on the service of the order, and consequently of sufficient authority for me to rely on.

To usher in those, I have given a prospect of knighthood in general, of the several orders of knighthood, as also of the antiquity of the castle and college of Windsor, and closed all with the honours, martial employments, and famous actions, the matches, and issues of the founder, and first knights-companions; as also a perfect catalogue of their successors to this very present. All which are adorned with variety of sculptures, properly relating to the several parts of the work.

He was not only so happy as to receive those extraordinary marks of the Sovereign's favour, mentioned in the text, but was complimented in an obliging manner, by his Royal Highness the Duke of York; who tho' then at sea against the Dutch, sent for his book by the Earl of Peterborough, and afterwards told our author he was extremely pleased with it (26). The rest of the Knights-companions of the most noble order, received him and his book with much respect and civility, and yet the regard shewn to it, and to it's author abroad, was much more singular (27). It was deposited by the then Pope, in the library of the Vatican. King Christiern of Denmark, sent him in 1674, by Thomas Henshaw, Esq; the King's Resident at Copenhagen, a gold chain and medal, which, with the King's leave, on certain high festivals he wore. Frederick William, Elector of Brandenburg, sent him the like present, and ordered his book to be translated into High-Dutch (28). He was afterwards visited by the Elector Palatine's, the grand Duke of Tuscany's, and other foreign Princes Ministers, to return him thanks for this book, which he took care should be presented them, and thereby spread the fame of the Garter, the nation, and himself, all over Europe (29). Yet it does not appear, that this laborious and exquisite performance, advanced at all the design he had formed some years before, of getting himself appointed Historiographer to the order, to which proposal some objections were made, and by our author fully answered (30), although we find no mention of this circumstance in any memoirs of Mr Ashmole hitherto extant.

On the twentieth of February, 1677, Sir Edward Walker, Garter King at Arms, deceased, upon which a controversy grew between the King and the Duke of Norfolk, as Earl-Marshal, about the right of disposing of his place, on which Mr Ashmole was consulted, who declared in favour of the King, but with so much prudence and discretion, as not to give any umbrage to the Earl Marshal (e); he afterwards refused this high office which was conferred on his father-in-law Sir William Dugdale, for whom he employed his utmost interest (f) [M]. [M] For whom he employed his utmost interest. This was one of the noblest and most generous actions of our author's life, and he has left a particular account of it under his own hand, which not being included in the Diary of his life, that has been printed, seems the rather to deserve a place here (31). 1676-7 February 21, My Lord Bishop of Salisbury (Dr Seth Ward) having been at my house in Sheer Lane, (which then stood empty, having some time before retired into the country to dwell) and at my chamber in the Temple, but missing me at both places, heard at length I dwelt at South-Lambeth, whereupon, the next day he sent me an obliging letter (Feb. 22) to acquaint me, that as soon as he heard of Sir Edward Walker's death, he endeavoured to find me out, but being not able, he immediately spoke to the Duke of York, and some other Knights of the Garter, to move the King on my behalf to succeed him. But the Duke, wished him rather to move the matter to the King, because he was pre-engaged, viz. to the Earl-Marshal, and immediately gave him an opportunity to do it. The King gave him such an answer, as caused him to believe and hope his inclinations were very good to me; but it appeared after, that the Earl-Marshal had acquainted the King, with a claim himself had of the disposing of that office, which induced his Majesty to give the Bishop no positive answer.

The letter his Lordship sent me by one of his gentlemen, who found me at home, under a fortnight's ill indisposition, by whom I returned my most humble thanks, and informed him I had no inclination to accept of the place, and therefore desired him to press it no farther, and that I would attend him as soon as I was able to stir out of doors, and then acquaint him with the reasons of my refusal.

March 3d, I went to give my Lord Bishop of Salisbury, my personal thanks, for so real a kindness, and told him I was retired into the country, with resolutions to take upon me no new employments, and had (to make my retirement more comfortable and easy) resigned my Herald's place, and thrown off all other kinds of business, (except the Comptrollership of the Excise) and for that reason was not willing to enter again upon any other whatsoever; and that in case his Majesty should enquire of him, why he did not present his suit on my behalf, he should be ready to answer, that my employment in the Excise, took up my whole time, and I was doubtful, least my attendance at White-Hall, the Heralds-Office, or elsewhere, upon matters relating to this office, might occasion me to neglect that service, which so nearly related to his Majesty's profit and advantage.

March 7th, This morning I went to wait upon my Lord Marshal, who told me, he heard I used means to the King, to obtain Garter's place, but conceived it was his right, as Earl-Marshal, to dispose of it. I repeated him the reasons I had before given his secretary, why I was of opinion it was the King's right, not his, and denied that I so much as looked after the place, and therefore acquainted him first with what the Bishop of Salisbury, out of kindness to me had done, (though without my knowledge) next that I had entreated him to proceed no further, and lastly gave his Lordship the same reasons for declining the employment, which I had before given to the Bishop. He thereupon desired me to give him leave to tell the King so much, which I readily did. He then told me, he heard Sir William Howard made means to the King for it, and asked my opinion whether he could be Garter, who was not of the Office of Arms. I answered, there had antiently been two persons made Garter, who had not been officers of Arms, but I hoped the King would not so far discourage the present officers, as to chuse a stranger in the place. Whereupon he asked me leave, to let the King know this was my sense, which he did; then I acquainted him, that the King had commanded me to assist the Chancellor, in making out his right to the nomination of Garter, and though I refused the place, yet I durst not deny him that service: This he did not very well like, but I told him I knew not which way to avoid it.

March 31, 1677. The next morning after the Earl-Marshal's pretensions to the right of nominating Garter, had been heard before the committee appointed for that purpose, I had occasion to attend my Lord Treasurer Danby, about some business in the excise-office. Mr Ch. Bertie, his secretary, seeing me there, asked me why I did not seek after the place? and intimated that my Lord Treasurer, thought me the fittest person for it; but I told him I had no ambition towards it, and feared that my attendance about this place, might occasion some neglect in the excise-office; and tho' this excuse stood me in some stead, and seemed considerable to others, to whom I had made use of it, yet he presently replied, my Lord Treasurer would give me leave to execute my comptroller's place by deputy. To which I had nothing to reply, but that I had many other reasons that induced me to wave the employment; upon this he told me, my Lord would speak with me in the Park, where I attended till he came thither. When he came, he began to ask me some few questions about the preparations he was to make against his Installation, and who he should send for to inform him therein. I answered it was the duty of Garter to inform him; and that this affair being debated the night before, (where his Lordship was, and of the Committee) I presumed would be known ere long what was then determined. He answered, the matter had that night before the Committee rose, been determined on the King's side against my Lord Marshal; upon which I told his Lordship, I presumed within a few days, Garter would be nominated, and in regard, it was above a fortnight to the day of his Installation, it would be time enough to attend him, and make all things ready against that time. And here I presume (by what I gathered from Mr Bertie's pressing me to make friends to obtain Garter's place) his Lordship expected I would have moved him to have spoke to the King for me, and pausing a little while, asked me, if I had any thing to say to him, I answered no, and so took my leave.

In the Afternoon Mr Bertie meeting me again, asked me what discourse passed between his Lordship and me. I told him, who wondered I would not move him to speak for me, and used many arguments to induce me yet to do it, and told me how unfit Mr Lee (whom my Lord Marshal intended for the place) was for it, nor was capable of it, not being a Gentleman of Blood; as he heard the constitution of the Order required. I still shewed my unwillingness and left him: Notwithstanding which, on Monday morning April the 1st, after he sat more earnestly again upon me, and told me he heard the place must speedily be disposed of, because the day appointed for Installation approached; and most earnestly pressed me to apply myself to the King to obtain it, but I told him, I was unfit for the place; at which he wondered I should alledge that, when it appeared by my Book of the Garter, there was no Man fitter. I answered, my unfitness grew from deafness increasing upon me, from decay of my cyefight, and greater decay in my memory, all which considered, did very much incapacitate me from that service, to which he replied, he never knew any man discommend himself before, when so fair a way lay open for his preferment; I then gave him

1677, a propofal was made to Mr Afhmole to become a candidate for the city of Litchfield, with which it was with fome difficulty that he clofed, and when he did, he found the magiftrates and fome other leading perfons of the place, notwithstanding both their obligations and their invitations, fo far from being cordial, that he thought it prudent to draw off in time (g). On the twenty-fixth of January, 1679, about Ten in the morning, a fire began in the Middle Temple, in the next chambers to Mr Afhmole's, by which he loft a library he had been collecting thirty-three years, but his MSS escaped, by their being at his houfe in South Lambeth; he likewife loft a collection of 9000 coins, ancient and modern, but his more valuable collection of gold medals were likewife preferred by being at Lambeth; his vaft repository of feals, charters, and other antiquities and curiofities, perifhed alfo in the flames (h). In 1683, the univerfity of Oxford having finished a noble repository near the Theatre, Mr Afhmole fent thither that great collection of rarities which he had received from the Tredescants beforementioned, together with fuch additions as he had made to them, and to this great benefaction he afterwards added that of his MSS and Library (i), which ftill remain a monument of his generous love to learning in general, and to the univerfity of Oxford in particular [N]. him many hearty thanks for his kind inclinations to me, and fo parted.

April the 2d, The next morning my Lord Marfhal coming out of the Lords houfe, he told me, the King had pitched upon my Father Dugdale to be Garter, and believed it would not difpleafe me. I answered, I was very glad of it, and I thought it was the beft choice; but he being in Warwickfhire, his Lordfhip added, he would fend for him up by that night's poft.

I have been thus particular, becaufe after this time, fome of the officers of Arms, (Mr Holdford, &c.) afferted, my Lord Marfhal had faid, (and it was moft certain) I fought underhand to get Garter's place, though openly I feemed to decline it; which I could not but wonder at, becaufe I had been fo clear with his Lordfhip, in averring the contrary; and alfo becaufe his Lordfhip had told my father, upon his coming to town, that I had carried myfelf very fairly in the managing the bufinefs againft him. Though both honour and profit lay on this occafion before me; yet God having taken from me both ambition and covetoufnefs, I fet more value upon the retired life I was entered into, than all the advantage and honour I fhould reap by that office.

[N] To the univerfity of Oxford in particular.] The reason why our author had fo warm an affection for Oxford, was plainly from his becoming a member thereof, in thofe dreadful times of publick confufion, when all who were loyal reforted to Oxford, and that moft tender mother of arts, and nurfe of all virtues, opened her arms to embrace all who were loyal, let their circumftances be what they would. This correpondence begun in difficult, continued in difmal times, begat on one fide regard for fo eminent a perfon, as appears by the notice taken of him among the writers of Brazen-nofe college (32), and on the other, the deepeft refpect for fo venerable a body in a happier age, when peace, profperity, and learning, returned with the King. Thefe fentiments difcovered themfelves on both fides, by a variety of publick acts, which are mentioned in the text, and were clofed by this. It was towards the latter end of October 1677, that he made an offer to the univerfity, of beftowing on it all that valuable collection of the Tredescants, which was fo well known to the learned world, and which had been exceedingly improved fince it came into his poffeffion, together with all the coins, medals, and manufcripts of his own collecting, provided they would erect a building fit to receive them; to which propofition the univerfity willingly affented (33). Accordingly on Thurfday the 15th of May 1679, the firft ftone of that ftately fabrick, afterwards called Afhmole's Mufeum, was laid on the weft fide of the theatre, and being finifhed by the beginning of March, 1682, there were put therein on the 20th of the fame month, about twelve cart-loads of rarities, fent to Oxford by Mr Afhmole, which being fixed in their proper places, by Robert Plott, L.L.D. who before had been intrufted with the custody of the faid Mufeum, were firft of all publickly viewed on the 21ft of May following, by his Royal Highnefs James Duke of York, his royal Confort Jofepha Maria, Princefs Anne, and their attendants, and on the 24th of the fame month, by the Doctors and Mafers of the univerfity. In a convocation held on the 4th of June following (1683) were letters openly read, whereby Mr Afhmole gave for ever to the univerfity of Oxford, all the faid rarities, notwithstanding he had been courted by fome to beftow them elfewhere, and that others had offered great fums for them. Whereupon a Latin letter of thanks, penned by him who was then deputy orator, being publickly read, was forthwith fent to Mr Afhmole at South Lambeth (34). In July 1690, he vifited the univerfity with his wife, and was received with all imaginable honour, and entertained at a noble dinner in his Mufeum; upon which occafion Mr Edward Hannes, A. M. the Chemical Profefor, afterwards an eminent phyfician, made an elegant oration to him (35). His benefaction to the univerfity was very confiderably enlarged at his death by the addition of his library, which confifted of one thoufand feven hundred and fifty eight books, of which fix hundred and twenty were manufcripts, and of them three hundred and eleven folio's, relating chiefly to Englifh Hiftory, Heraldry, Aftronomy, and Chemistry, with a great variety of pamphlets, part of which had been fortified by himfelf, and the reft are methodized fince, and a double catalogue made, one claffical, according to their various fubjects, and another alphabetical (36). He bequeathed alfo to the fame place, two gold chains and a medal, the one a philigreen chain of ninety links, weighing twenty-two ounces, with a medal of the Elektor of Brandenburg, upon which is the effigies of that Elektor, and on the reverse, a view of Straelfund, ftuck upon the furrender of that important city, a Collar of S.S. with a medal of the King of Denmark, and a gold medal of the Elektor Palatine, and a George of the Duke of Norfolk, worn by his grandfather, when he was ambafador in Germany. All thefe he had received as acknowledgments of the honour which he had done the Garter, by his labours on that fubject (37). Over the entrance to the Mufeum, fronting the ftreet is the following infcription in capital letters:

beginning of the year 1685, he was invited by the magistrates, and by the Dean of Litchfield, to represent that corporation in Parliament, but upon King James's intimating to him by the Lord Dartmouth, that he would take it kindly if he would resign his interest to Mr Lewson, he waited upon his Majesty and told him, that he was all obedience (k). On the tenth of January, 1686, died his father-in-law, Sir William Dugdale, on which occasion Mr Ashmole declined a second time the office of Garter King at Arms, and did all that was in his power to recommend his brother Dugdale, in which, tho' he did not fully succeed, yet he procured him the place of Norroy (l), and this was one of the last publick acts of his life, the remainder of which was spent in an honourable retirement to the day of his demise, which happened on the eighteenth of May, 1692, in the seventy-sixth year of his age (m). He was, beyond a question, one of the greatest men, and one of the greatest patrons of learning in the last century. He was a great lover of Chemistry, and by his care and diligence, preserved many valuable MSS relating to that science, besides those that he caused to be printed and published [O]. He had a great genius for history and antiquities, as sufficiently appears by his learned and laborious works, both printed and manuscripts [P]. He was likewise a generous

[O] Besides those he caused to be printed and published.] After Mr Ashmole once added himself to the study of antiquities and records, he never deserted it, or could he be prevailed upon to resume his design of sending abroad the works of the other English Adepts, though he had made large collections towards it. I have a very good authority for what I say. Mr William Cooper in his preface to one of Philalethes's pieces, which he published in 1678, speaking of our author's Theatrum Chymicum Britannicum, says

(39) See his advertisement to the reader before Ripley revived, or an Exposition on Sir George Ripley's Hermetic-Poetical works. Written by Eyræ-næus Philalethes, London, 1678, 8vo.

(39) I heartily wish that the learned Philosophers of our age, could prevail with him to publish his second volume of that collection, which he had almost finished almost twenty years since (as I had it from his own mouth) and hath lain a-sleep ever since, and likely so to lie; for to the perfecting thereof, he is now unwilling to be brought, unless some worthy friend of his can be wrought upon to prevail with him, before the sleep of death seizes him, and leaves these rare pieces of antiquity to be inevitably lost, to the prejudice of all philosophers, and great dishonour to the English nation. This very complaint, shews how well (even then) he stood with the Hermetick tribe, of whom this Mr Cooper, was the most zealous encourager, and yet no reason is assigned for his remissness, which suits so little with the character of the indefatigable Mr Ashmole, that I am convinced he was with-held by some more worthy motive. In short, I am persuaded some of the abler Alchemists shewed him his mistakes, as to what he had already published, particularly as to the Arcanum before-mentioned, which he calls the work of a concealed author, though in what seems to be the motto, viz. the words Penes nos uada Tagi, the very name of the author was expressed, viz. Jean Espagnet. He was President of the Parliament of Bourdeaux, and is esteemed the ablest writer on this sort of learning, whose works are extant. But this piece published by Mr Ashmole, was only the second part of Espagnet's work, the first being published under this title, Enchiridion Physicæ resitutæ cum Arcano Philosophiæ Hermeticiæ. Paris. 1623, 8vo. i. e. The Enchiridion of revived Physick, with the secret of the Hermetick Philosophy. In the title of this work, the author's name is concealed under another anagrammatical motto, viz. Spes mea in agno est. The second part was entitled, Enchiridion Philosophiæ Hermeticiæ. Paris. 1628, 8vo. It was printed again in 1647, and a third time in 1650, and from this last edition our author translated it. The truth is, and the Abbé Fresnoy, has very justly observed it, our author was never an Adept, and began to write when he was but a disciple (40). He grew afterwards more cautious, and though he never missed any opportunity of purchasing chymical MSS, yet he was cured of the itch of publishing them, and held it sufficient to deposit them in the Bodleian library for their greater security, and for the benefit of society. As this has not been taken notice of at all by any of the writers of his life, I imagine, I may do some service to the lovers of Chemistry, if I just mention a few of those pieces, thus preserved by the care of Mr Ashmole. 1. Geberii, super Artem Alchymicæ, lib. vi. i. e. Geber's Art of Alchemy in six books, a quarto MS. on parchment. 2. Albohali, i. e. Avicennæ liber de rebus Alchymicis. i. e. Albohali, that is, Avicenna's Treatise on Chemical Matters. This piece is highly valuable and curious.

(40) Histoire de la Philosophie Hermetique, Tom. III. p. 105, 106.

3. De distinctione Mercurii Aquarum, liber unus. i. e. Of the Distinction of the Mercury of Waters. This piece is ascribed to Morienus, a Roman Hermit, who flourished in the XIIth century. 4. Pupilla oculi, i. e. The Apple of the Eye; by Sir George Ripley. This was to have been included in the second volume of his Theatrum, and this copy he had prepared for the prefs. 5. De Regimine Ignium Philosophorum Et quibusdam Experimentis probatissimis, i. e. Of the management of the Philosophers Fires, together with some approved Experiments. This treatise was written also by Sir George Ripley, and was to have made a part of the same collection. I might add to these, a noble copy of the Chemical works of Raymond Lully, in two folio's, and many others, but these are more than sufficient to shew the curious and intelligent reader, how industrious and careful, and, at the same time, how capable, and how accurate, a collector he was of treatises of this kind, having wonderfully improved himself in this knowledge, after he declined writing more upon it, or at least the publishing of what he wrote. In foreign countries he was highly extolled for the pains he took in collecting, publishing, and explaining, the English authors on Hermetick Philosophy, and when his work of the Garter made him still more known to the Princes of Germany, he received their complements on his former performance (41). Neither has his reputation abroad been at all injured by time; for since the very learned Olaus Borrichius, Morhoff, Boerhaave, and other great men, have shewn the ignorance of such as ran down Chemical writers without distinction, and have revived, very deservedly, the reputation of some of these old authors; Mr Ashmole, who saved so many of the best of them from oblivion, has been justly mentioned, as a great preserver, patron, and protector of learning, which indeed was a character he very justly merited, since no man ever shewed in this respect, either more zeal, diligence, or publick spirit. If therefore we consider him in this light, we must allow that he very worthily filled that post which he assigned himself, when declining the arduous labours which were necessary to the gaining his father Backhouse's legacy, and becoming an Adept, he modestly and truly stiled himself Mercuriophilus Anglicus; a title so just, and so expressive of his real deserts, that one would have thought he had exerted his skill as a Herald, in devising it, if we had not known that Chemistry was his first, and to his last continued his favourite study.

[P] Laborious works both printed and manuscripts.] We have already given an exact account of all the works that were published by our author in his lifetime; it remains therefore, that we say something of such as were published after his decease, and of those that still continue in MS. V. The Arms, Epitaphs, Fenestral Inscriptions, with the Draughts of the Tombs, &c. in all the Churches in Berkshire. It was penned in 1666, and the original visitation taken in the two preceding years, in virtue of his deputation from Sir Edward Bysshe, Clariencieux King at Arms, which makes another folio volume, stands next to this in Mr Ashmole's collection of MSS, but both have been published to the world within these few years, under another title than their author ever designed them. a generous encourager and protector of such ingenious and learned men, as were less fortunate in the world than himself, as appears by his kindness to Sir George Wharton in the worst of times (n), his respect to the memory of his friend Mr John Booker (o), and the care he took in the education of the late eminent Dr George Smalridge (p), as will be shewn in our article of him. His corps was interred in the church of Great Lambeth in Surrey, on the twenty-sixth of May, 1692, and a black marble stone laid over his grave, with a Latin inscription, in which, tho' there is much to his honour, there is nothing which exceeds the truth [2]. It was the peculiar happiness of Mr Ashmole, that, living and dead, a due respect was paid to his learning, virtue, and publick spirit. His unshaken loyalty to his Royal Master, in the worst of times, recommended him to the worthiest men in the kingdom, as his application to the Sciences then most in esteem, gained the friendship of the powerful and considerable amongst the other party, by which he secured peace, and the leisure necessary to follow his private studies, when it

Medals of the illustrious Families and Roman Emperors, preserved in the Bodleian library at Oxford, described and explained. This work was finished by the author in 1659, and given by him to the Publick Library in Oxford, in 1666, in three volumes in folio, as it was fitted for the press. VII. A Description and Explanation of the Coins and Medals, belonging to King Charles II. a folio MS. in the King's cabinet. VIII. A brief Ceremonial of the Feast of St George, held at White-hall 1661, with other papers relating to the Order. IX. Remarkable Passages in the Year 1660, set down by Mr Elias Ashmole. X. An Account of the Coronation of our Kings, transcribed from a MS. in the King's private closet. XI. The Proceedings on the Day of the Coronation of King Charles II, mentioned by Anthony Wood, as printed in 1672, but he owns he never saw it (42). XII. The Arms, Epitaphs, &c. in some Churches and Houses in Staffordshire, taken when he accompanied Sir William Dugdale in his Visitation. XIII. The Arms, Epitaphs, Inscriptions, &c. in Cheshire, Shropshire, Derbyshire, Nottinghamshire, &c. taken at the same time. Bishop Nicholson, tells us something of his intention to write the History and Antiquities of his native Town of Litchfield, which it may be presumed his Lordship took upon memory, since in the same paragraph, he calls Mr Ashmole, Garter King at Arms, which shews no great attention to what he was writing (43). XIV. Answers to the Objections urged against Mr Ashmole's being made Historiographer to the Order of the Garter, A. D. 1662. XV. A Translation of John Francis Spina's Book of the Catastrophe of the world, to which was subjoined Ambrose Merlin's Prophecy. Mr Wood tells us, that he was not informed by Mr Ashmole's letter (44), when or where this translation was published, and indeed I make some doubt, whether it was published at all. Father Niceron (45), in his short account of the life of Ashmole, which is entirely transcribed from Wood, mentions none but the books published in his life-time, and is not very correct even as to these; but we have fully shewn that which he printed, was but a very small part of what he wrote, and indeed there is scarce any branch of our English history and antiquities, on which he has not left us something valuable, of his own composing, in that vast repository of papers, which make several folios, in his Collection of MSS, under the title of, XVI. Collections, Remarks, Notes on Books, and MSS, which is a noble proof of his industry and application. To close this account, and to give the reader some notion of a piece which we have so often cited, we shall lastly mention, XVII. The Diary of his Life, written by himself was published at London 1717, in 12mo. with the following title. Memoirs of the Life of that learned Antiquary, Elias Ashmole, Esquire, drawn up by himself by way of Diary, with an Appendix of Original Letters. Published by Charles Burnan, Esquire. The editor tells us in the preface, 'That the copy from whence these papers were published, was in the hand-writing of Dr Robert Plott, chief keeper of the Ashmolean Museum at Oxford, and Secretary of the Royal Society, and was transcribed by him for the use of a near relation of Mr Ashmole's, a private gentleman in Staffordshire. That they had been collated a few years before, by David Perry, M. A. of Jesus College, in Oxford, and chief keeper to the Museum, who corrected from the original manuscripts (46), some few literal errors.' The editor concludes with observing, that he shall not dissent upon the usefulness of this kind of works, but only say thus much, That they let us into the secret history of affairs of their several times, discover the springs of motion, and display many valuable, though minute circumstances, overlooked, or unknown to our general historians; and, to conclude all, satiate our largest curiosity. The appendix contains a letter of thanks, dated January 26, 1666, from the corporation at Litchfield, upon the receipt of a silver bowl presented to them by Mr Ashmole. A preface to the catalogue of Archbishop Laud's medals, drawn up by Mr Ashmole, and preserved in the publick library at Oxford. A letter from Dr Thomas Barlow, afterwards Bishop of Lincoln, to Mr Ashmole, dated December 28, 1668, on the present of his books, describing Archbishop Laud's cabinet of medals. A letter from John Evelyn, Esq; to recommend Dr Plott to him for reader in Natural Philosophy, and another from Mr Joshua Barnes, dated from Emanuel college, Cambridge, October 15, 1688, wherein he desires Mr Ashmole's pardon, for having reflected upon his Order of the Garter, in his own history of King Edward III, with Mr Ashmole's answer to that letter, dated October 23, following. How dry and unentertaining soever the perusal of such a note-book may be in itself, yet as a support in regard to facts and authorities, it is certainly impossible to find one that deserves greater credit.

[2] There is nothing which exceeds the truth. This truly worthy and great man, lies buried in the fourth aisle, at the east end, and on the north side of the aisle, in South Lambeth church, and the inscription above referred to, runs thus (47):

was no longer possible for him to serve the Publick. But notwithstanding he concealed; he never changed, or made a shew of changing, his principles; so that on the Restoration of King Charles II, he stood so clear in his Majesty's opinion, that, by his order, Mr Secretary Nicholas acquainted the Lord High-Treasurer, Southampton, that Mr Ashmole was a person that his Majesty had a more than ordinary desire to prefer, adding, on his own knowledge, that he was a very deserving person, and a man of more than ordinary parts. The learned Dr Plott, thought our author an honour to the country in which he was born, and therefore places him amongst the most eminent men it had produced, and to justify this, gives him the following character (q). 'The worshipful Elias Ashmole, Esq; of Brazen-Nose college, Oxon. was born at Litchfield in this county, who for his general skill in all the politer sorts of learning, such as Heraldry, Antiquities, Chemistry, Astrology, Natural Philosophy, &c. was made first Windsor Herald, and had the supervising and ordering the King's cabinet of coins, and made catalogues of those in the university of Oxford, which university, upon his extraordinary merit, sent him a diploma, for his Doctor's degree in the faculty of Physick, ex mero motu, without his knowledge or seeking; he was also honoured in the Inns of Court, with the title and degree of Barrister at Law. Lastly, our late dread Sovereign, King Charles II, being conscious of his great knowledge, industry, and fidelity, made him Comptroller of all the Excise in England and Wales; he hath obliged the learned world with many curious books, and lately the university of Oxford, with the best History of Nature, Arts, and Antiquities, to be seen any where in the world, not in print or sculpture, but in a generous donation of the real things themselves, where with they have furnished the new Musæum, lately there erected, and gratefully stiled it, (as a perpetual memorial of so noble a benefaction) the Musæum Ashmoleanum.' It is true, Dr Plott had great obligations to our author, and therefore it may be suspected (especially as Mr Ashmole was living at the time of his publishing that work) that his gratitude had a large share in his eulogium, but nothing of this sort can be objected to Anthony Wood who wrote after Mr Ashmole's decease, and seldom erred on the side of panegyrick. He says, speaking of our author, 'I must take leave to tell the reader, he was the greatest Virtuoso or Curioso that ever was known or read of in England before his time. Uxor solis took up it's habitation in his breast, and in his bosom the great God did abundantly store up the treasures of all sorts of wisdom and knowledge (r).' This we must allow an extraordinary commendation from so splenetick a writer, who has not failed giving place to every thing he had heard, that might abate the reputation of this worthy person [R], as well as to these just praises, which envy herself could not refuse him. But the university of Oxford more courteous than her Antiquary, expresses our author's merit in few words, in the diploma, by which without his sollicitation (or so much as his knowledge) she created him Doctor in Physick, for there his profound learning, as well as his benevolence to that learned body, is said to have rendered him most dear to the university, ab eruditione recondita & benevolentia in academia propensa nobis charissimus (s), are their words, and for the same causes should his memory remain dear to latest posterity; since to them have descended not only the testimonials he gave of his, deep science, but also those mighty helps, which by his pains he procured, and by his bounty bestowed, where they might best answer the ends of judicious enquirers through all succeeding ages.

[R] That might abate the reputation of this worthy person. After mentioning the rarities, coins, medals, books, and manuscripts, given by Mr Ashmole in his life-time, and at his death, to the university of Oxford, he very abruptly proceeds thus (48), 'But the best elixir that he enjoyed, which was the foundation of his riches, wherewith he purchased books, rarities, and other things, were the lands, and jointures, which he had with his second wife, Mary, &c. widow of Sir Thomas Manwaring, of the Inner Temple, Knt. some time Steward of Reading: After whose death Mr Ashmole taking her to wife, Nov. 16, 1649, enjoyed her estate, though not her company, for altogether, to the day of her death, which happened April 1, 1668.' In this jumbled and unconnected paragraph, there is a large proportion of malice, and a very small mixture of truth, as the reader will easily discern from a short examination. 1. There is a bale innuendo, as if Mr Ashmole had studied Chemistry to little purpose, since without his wife, he had missed of the elixir, whereas in fact, he was a lover of Chemistry, only never wrought with his hands, and consequently never fought the elixir, which indeed he never needed. 2. It is insinuated that from this marriage Mr Ashmole obtained all that he had, and that if he was a great benefactor to the university of Oxford, it came all out of his lady's, lands, and jointures: But is this true? A very large part of his collection was bequeathed to him by Mr John Tredescant, and consequently did not come by his wife. Besides a prodigious share of what curiosities, &c. he might have purchased in that wife's time, were burned in the fire, which consumed his chambers in the Temple, and so were lost to him and the university too. Lastly, after this lady's decease, Mr Ashmole remained Windsor Herald, Keeper of Rarities to the King, Commissioner for recovering King Charles the first's goods, Secretary of Surinam, and Comptroller of the Excise, which places one would imagine, might furnish occasion and money too, for buying books and curiosities, as well as Lady Manwaring's jointure; so that after all, there is as little of veracity, as of decency or gratitude, in these remarks of our Antiquary of Oxford. 3. But the feverest stroke of all, is as to the separation of him and his wife, which might induce an unwary reader, to believe Mr Ashmole used this lady very ill, who brought him all this money; whereas in fact, she used him so, or the Court of Chancery had never sent her back to him again, after her complaint to that Court, as it had been before shewn was actually done.

But what is still more extraordinary in Mr Wood's manner of penning this life, is his taking an opportunity at the close of it, to shew his distaste in very unmannerly terms, towards the widow of Mr Ashmole, of whom he gives us this account (49). 'Soon after Mr Ashmole's death, his widow, Elizabeth, who seemed to have had a great love and fondness for her husband (which was sometimes before company expressed) married a lusty man, called John Reynolds, a Stone-Cutter, but had no issue by him.' These are particulars, which no way deserve the notice of posterity, and are quite below the dignity of a Biographer, who ought to have no other view, than to serve the publick, by recording what succeeding generations ought either to follow, or to shun.

ASHTON (THOMAS), a clergyman in the time of the Usurpation, was the son of Thomas Ashton, and born at Teuerdley in Lancashire, in 1631 (a). At sixteen years of age, he was admitted a Servitor of Brazen-Nose college in Oxford, and took the degree of Bachelor of Arts, February 7, 1650 (b). He was chosen fellow of his college, and took holy orders. Mr Wood tells us (c), he was a 'forward and conceited scholar,' and 'became a malapert preacher in and near Oxford.' Being appointed to preach at St Mary's, on Tuesday (a lecture-day) July 25, 1654, he gave so great offence by his sermon [A], that he was in a fair way of expulsion; but, by the intercession of friends, the matter was compromised: nevertheless he was obliged, about two years after, to quit his fellowship upon some quarrel which he had with Dr Greenwood Principal of his house. In 1656, he was intrusted with a commission from the Protector to be chaplain to the English forces in the island of Jersey; but was soon after displaced upon the arrival of a new Governor. After the King's Restoration, he was beneficed somewhere near Hertford in Hertfordshire; where, Mr Wood says, 'he soon after finished his restless course.' He published two pieces [B], mentioned below.

I find another THOMAS ASHTON (d), a Knight, of an antient and wealthy family in Lancashire; who lived in the reign of King Henry VI, and was famous for his skill in Chemistry [C].

[A] He gave great offence by his sermon.] His Text was, these words of Job (xxxvii. 22). With God is terrible majesty; from whence taking occasion to speak of the attributes of God, particularly that of the text, he observed, that terribilis might signify terra bilis; and concluded, that God was a melancholy God, and that those who had no teeth to gnash, should gnash their gums, &c. (1).

(B) He published two pieces.] I. Blood-thirsty Cyrus, unsatisfied with blood. Or, The boundless Cruelty of an Anabaptist's Tyranny, manifested in a Letter of Colonel John Mafon, Governor of Jersey, 3 Nov. 1659; wherein he exhibits seven false, ridiculous, and scandalous articles against Quarter-Master William Swan, &c. London 1659, in one sheet 4to. II. Satan in Samuel's Mantle, or, the Cruelty of Germany, acted in Jersey; containing the arbitrary, bloody, and tyrannical Proceedings of John Mafon, of a baptized Church, commissioned to be a Colonel, and sent over into the island of Jersey, Governor, in July 1656, against several Officers and Soldiers in that small place, &c. London 1659, in four sheets in 4to (2).

[C] Sir Thomas Ashton — was famous for his skill in Chemistry.] This appears from the following patent (transcribed by Dr Fuller (3) from the original in the Tower, granted by King Henry VI, in the 24th year of his reign, to Sir Thomas Ashton, and Sir Edmund Trafford. Rex omnibus ad quos, &c. Salutem. Sciatis, quod cum dilecti et fideles nostri, Edmundus de Trafford Miles, et Thomas Ashton Miles, nobis per quandam supplicationem monstraverint, quod quamvis ipsi super certis metallis, per artem sive scientiam philosophicæ, operari velent, metalla imperfecta de suo proprio genere transferre, et tunc ea per dictam artem sive scientiam, in aurum sive argentum perfectum transubstantiare, ad omnimodas probationes et examinationes, sicut aliquod aurum sive argentum in aliqua minera crescens, expectandum et indurandum, ut

dicunt; Nihilominus certæ personæ illis malevolentes et malignantes, supponunt ipsos per artem illicitam operari, et sic ipsos in probatione dictæ artis sive Scientiæ impedire et perturbare possunt: Nos præmissa considerantes, ac conclusionem dictæ operationis sive Scientiæ, scire volentes, de gratia nostra speciali concessimus et licentiam dedimus ipsi Edmundo et Thomæ, et ipsorum servientibus, quod ipsi artem sive scientiam prædictam operari et probare possent licite et impune, absque impetitione nostra vel Officiariorum nostrorum quorumcumque; aliquo Statuto, Actu, Ordinatione, sive Provisione in contrarium facto ordinat. sive provis. non obstante. In cujus, &c. T. R. apud Westmon. septimo die Aprilis. Thus translated by Fuller, 'The King to all whom, &c. Greeting. Know ye, that whereas our beloved and loyal Edmund de Trafford, Knt. and Thomas Ashton, Knt. have by a certain petition shewn unto us, that although they were willing by the art or science of philosophy to work upon certain metals, to translate imperfect metals from their own kind, and then to transubstantiate them by the said art or science, as they say, into perfect gold or silver, unto all manner of proofs and trials, to be expected and indured, as any gold or silver growing in any mine; notwithstanding certain persons unwilling and maligning them, conceive them to work by unlawful art, and so may hinder and disturb them in the trial of the said art and science: We, considering the premises, and willing to know the conclusion of the said working or science, of our special grace have granted and given leave to the fame Edmund and Thomas, and to their servants, that they may work and try the aforesaid art and science lawfully and freely, without any hindrance of our's, or of our officers whatsoever; any Statute, Act, Ordinance, or Provision, made, ordained, or provided to the contrary notwithstanding. In witness whereof, the King at Westminster, the 7th day of April.'

ASHWELL (GEORGE), Rector of Hanwell, near Banbury in Oxfordshire, was the son of Robert Ashwell of Harrow on the Hill in Middlesex, and was born in the parish of St Martin near Ludgate in London, November the 8th, 1612. He was admitted a scholar of Wadham college in Oxford in 1627, took the degrees in arts, was elected fellow, and became a celebrated tutor in that house. In the time of the Grand Rebellion he continued in Oxford, and preached several times before the King, Court, and Parliament. A little before the surrender of the garrison of Oxford, he had the Degree of Bachelor in Divinity conferred on him (a). About the latter end of the year 1658, he was presented to the living of Hanwell, vacant by the death of Dr Robert Harris, having been before (as Mr Wood thinks) chaplain in the family of Sir Anthony Cope, Lord of the Manour of Hanwell (b). He had the character of a very peaceable and religious man, and was well versed in Logic, the Schoolmen, and the Fathers. He wrote the following books. I. Fides Apostolica, or A Discourse asserting the received Authors and Authority of the Apostles Creed. Oxon. 1653, 8vo. II. A Double Appendix, the first touching the Albanian, the second touching the Nicene Creed, printed with the Fides Apostolica [A]. III. Gestus Eucharisticus, concerning the Gesture to be used at the receiving receiving of the Sacrament. Oxon. 1663, 8vo. IV. De Socino et Socinianismo. i. e. A Treatise concerning Socinus and the Socinian Heresy [B]. A Dissertation concerning the Church of Rome, being part of a much larger Work concerning the Judge of Controversies.* Oxon. 1688, 4to. This piece was published at the request of Dr Gilbert Ironside, Warden of Wadham college. VI. An Answer to Plato Redivivus, written by Henry Nevil. This is in manuscript in the author's own hand. VII. He also translated out of Latin into English, Philosophus Autodidactus, sive Epistola Abi Giapbar Ebn Topbail de Hai Ebn Yokdan, &c. London 1586, 8vo [C]. Our author died at Hanwell, the eighth of February 1693, and was buried in the church of that place, having been thirty-five years Rector thereof [D].

[B] De Socino et Socinianismo.] This was but a part, and that the least, of a much greater work, entitled De Judice Controversiarum, et Catholicæ veritatis regula. i. e. 'Of the Judge of Controversies, and the Rule of Catholic Truth;' which the author had finished, and kept by him in manuscript. He published the Dissertation as a specimen of his performance, and to try what success he might reasonably expect from the publication of the whole (2).

and degrees human reason, improved by diligent observation and experience, may arrive to the knowledge of natural things, and from thence to the discovery of super-naturals, more especially of God, and the concerns of another life. It was published in Arabick and Latin, by Edw. Pocock, A. M. of Christ-church in Oxford 1671, 4to (3).

ASSHETON (WILLIAM), Doctor of Divinity, and Rector of Beckenham in Kent, was the son of the reverend Mr Asheton Rector of Middleton in Lancashire, of the antient family of the Baronets of that name and place (a). He was born in the year 1641, had his education in a private country school, and was from thence removed to Brazen-Nose college in Oxford, July 3, 1658 (b). Here he imbibed the strongest principles of true religion and loyalty [A], and made so quick a progress in every branch of good literature, that he soon merited a fellowship, into which he was elected in 1663, being then Bachelor of Arts (c). After he had taken the degree of Master of Arts, he went into orders, and was a preacher for some time in the parts about Oxford (d). He was appointed chaplain to James Duke of Ormond, Chancellor of that university, whom he served in that capacity both in England and Ireland. He took the degree of Doctor in Divinity in January 1673; and, the February following, he succeeded Dr Benjamin Parry, in the Prebend of Knaresburgh, in the church of York (e). His attendance on his patron brought him to London, where he obtained the living of St Antholin (f); and in 1676, by the Duke's interest with the family of the St Johns, he was presented to the rectory of Beckenham in Kent. He was frequently and unanimously chosen Proctor for Rochester in Convocation [B]. This worthy Divine was the first projector of the scheme for providing a maintenance for clergymen widows, and others, by a jointure payable out of the Mercers company [C]. He wrote several pieces against the

[A] He imbibed, at Oxford, the strongest principles of true religion and loyalty.] Mr Wood pretends (1), he was, at his first admission in the college, put under a Presbyterian tutor; by which means he was very early tinctured with the principles of that sect; inasmuch that (as our Antiquarian expresses it) he frequented, with Sam. Parker, the religious meetings in the house of Bessè Hampton, an old decrepid laundress, living in Halywell in the north suburb of Oxford; but that he changed his principles after the Restoration of King Charles II. This is not easily reconciled with what the author of his Life tells us, that 'He was providentially blessed in some orthodox and loyal instructors, such as secured him from the general contagion (2).' It is true, the same author confesses, 'He fell into some dangerous hands at school and the university, and lay under many temptations, where the leavens of error and hypocrisy prevailed;' but at the same time he argues against the probability of his having ever fallen in with the Presbyterian party. Besides, (says he) as it pleased God to endow him with a most towards disposition, a most compassionate good nature, a very studious humble mind, and modest behaviour, as with all virtuous inclinations and special graces; so he could never be so much as tainted with ill notions of any kind, nor ever be drawn into the party of any furious zealots, libertines, &c. whom he wanted not spirit to oppose on all due occasions, and in proper seasons throughout his life (3).

[B] He was frequently and unanimously chosen Proctor for Rochester in Convocation.] He was so often elected into this office, that at length he begged leave to decline the favour; as he found the distempers of his studious sedentary life, the gravel and stone, growing upon him, which disabled him for attendance and fatigues. However he was prevailed upon to continue in that function, his great abilities and integrity rendering him the fittest person to represent those of his order (4).

(4) Id. ibid. p. 41.

[C] He projected the scheme for providing for clergymen widows, and others, by a jointure payable out of the Mercers company.] Dr Asheton gave the publick an account of this scheme, in a book entitled, A full account of the rise, progress, and advantages of Dr Asheton's Proposal, &c. (5). In the Preface we are told, that 'As Dr Asheton did not project this Proposal for his own private advantage, but doth sincerely design a public good; in like manner, the worthy members of the Mercers company have undertaken to manage this Proposal, not from any prospect of advantage to their own private persons, but only out of a generous design to make the company more capable to answer the end and reason of their charter; which is to establish and manage public charities, and thereby to enlarge their capacity of doing good.' An Advertisement, which follows the Preface, informs us, that 'This Proposal being first projected for the benefit of those who have small estates, the words poverty and poor do sometimes occur in the explication of it; and therefore, that persons of honour and quality may not be prejudiced against it, as if it nothing concerned them; they may please to be informed, that this Proposal, as now modelled and improved, may be serviceable to those of quality and estate: 1. By enabling them to settle or enlarge jointures, without clogging their lands: 2. By encouraging them to demand larger portions

tions than otherwise, without the help of this Propofal, they could rationally expect.' The bringing this scheme to perfection, took up Dr Afsheton's thoughts many years. For though he was encouraged by many judicious persons, in the prosecution of the design, yet where to fix it, or how to provide such a fund as might secure the Subscribers, was a matter of some difficulty. However, he resolved to go on, and, if possible, to finish what he had so long projected. His first address was to the Corporation of the Clergy, who declared, they were not in a capacity to accept the Propofal. His next Application was to the Royal Bank of England, where he met with no better success. Whereupon the Doctor applied himself to the Mercers company; who, after full debates in their general Courts and Committees, agreed with him upon certain rules and orders; out of which I shall extract the following particulars. 1. That the Company will take in subscriptions at any time, till the sum of 100,000 l. be subscribed, but will never exceed that sum. 2. That all married men, at the age of thirty years or under, may subscribe any sum not exceeding 1000 l. That all married men, not exceeding the age of forty years, may subscribe any sum, not exceeding 500 l. And that all married men, not exceeding the age of sixty years, may subscribe any sum, not exceeding 300 l. And that the widows of all persons, subscribing according to these limitations, shall receive the benefit of 30 per cent. per annum, according to the former Propofal, free of all taxes and charges, at the two usual Feasts of the Annunciation of the blessed Virgin Mary, and St Michael the Archangel; and that the first of these payments shall be made at the first of the said Feast days, which shall happen four months or more after the decease of the person or persons so subscribing; excepting such as shall voluntarily make away with themselves, or by any act of theirs occasion their own death; either by duelling or committing any crime, whereby they shall be sentenced, and put to death by justice: In any, or either of these cases, the widows to receive no annuity; but, upon delivering up the Company's bond, to have the subscription money paid to them. 3. That no sea-faring men may subscribe, who follow it is as their business or vocation; nor others, who go farther than Holland, Ireland, or the coasts of England; and that any person may subscribe for any others, whom he shall nominate in his last will, during the natural life of his wife, if she survive, and his intention be declared in his subscription.' The Company had several meetings in Committees with the Doctor, about settling a sufficient security; in which they satisfied him that their estates, being clear rents, amounted to 2888 l. 8 s. 10 d. besides the payments of the benefactors, to be paid out of the same; which, by a moderate calculation, would yield, when the leases came out, above 13500 l. per annum. All things being agreed upon, the Deed of Settlement was executed by the Company and Trustees, at a general Court of the said Company, held on Wednesday the 4th of October, 1699. This Deed is enrolled in the High Court of Chancery, and an authentic copy of it kept by the Company (6).

[D] He wrote several pieces against the Papists and Dissenters, and some practical and devotional tracts.] I shall here give the reader a compleat Catalogue of Dr Afsheton's works, extracted from the author of his Life. I. TOLERATION disapproved and condemned by the authority and convincing reasons of, 1. That wife and learned King JAMES, and his Privy-council, Anno Reg. II^{do}. 2. The honourable Commons assembled in this present Parliament, in their Votes, &c. Feb. 25, 1662. 3. The Presbyterian Ministers in the City of London, met at Sion college, Decem. 18, 1645. 4. Twenty eminent Divines, most (if not all) of them members of the late assembly; in their Sermons before the two Houses of Parliament on solemn occasions. Faithfully collected by a very moderate hand, and humbly presented to the serious consideration of all Dissenting Parties. Printed at Oxford, in the year 1670. He published a second edition of this book, the same year, with his name, and the Pro-Vice-Chancellor of Ox-ford's Imprimatur, prefixed to it. The title was the same as that of the first edition, only with this addition to it: Faithfully collected by William Afsheton, Master of Arts, and Fellow of Brazen-nose college in Oxford. The second Edition corrected and enlarged, with an additional Preface; wherein the nature of Persecution in general, and the unjust complaints of the dissenting parties concerning it in particular, are distinctly considered. Printed likewise at Oxford, in 1670. II. The Cases of Scandal and Persecution; being a seasonable enquiry into these two things: 1. Whether the Nonconformists, who otherwise think subscription lawful, are therefore obliged to forbear it, because the weak brethren do judge it unlawful? 2. Whether the execution of penal laws upon Dissenters, for non-communication with the Church of England, be persecution? Wherein they are pathetically exhorted to return into the bosom of the Church, the likeliest expedient to stop the growth of Popery. Printed at London, in the year 1674. This piece, Mr Wood tells us (7), is reflected upon by Mr Richard Baxter, in his Apology for the non-conforming Ministry, &c. London, 1681. There is an occasional Postscript to it, concerning a gentlewoman, who was perverted from Protestantism to Popery, by the arguments of some Presbyterian Divines. III. The Royal Apology: Or, An Answer to the Rebel's Plea; wherein are the most noted Anti-monarchical Tenets, 1st published by Doleman the Jesuit, to promote a Bill of Exclusion against King James I. 2^{dly}, Practised by Bradshaw, and the Regicides, in the actual murder of King Charles I. 3^{dly}, Republished by Sidney, and the Associates to depose and murder his present Majesty, London, 1685. The second Edition. IV. A seasonable Vindication of their present Majesties; Printed at London. In this piece, the author published to the world the reasons, which induced him to swear allegiance to King William, and Queen Mary. V. The Country Parson's Admonition to his Parishioners against Popery; with directions how to behave themselves, when any one designs to seduce them from the Church of England. London, Printed in the year, 1686. VI. A full Defence of the former Discourse against the Missionaries Answer: Being a farther Examination of the pretended Infallibility of the Church of Rome: or, as it is intuled in the first impression, A Defence of the Plain Man's Reply to the Catholic Missionaries, &c. To this is prefix'd an Imprimatur, signed by William Needham, Chaplain to the Archbishop of Canterbury. March 29, 1688. VII. A short Discourse against Blasphemy, 1691. VIII. A Discourse against Drunkenness, 1692. IX. A Discourse against swearing and cursing, 1692. These three last pieces were written and published in pursuance of their Majesties injunctions, against all sorts of prophaneness; and, that they might be the more generally read, they were sold for no more than 2 d. each discourse. X. Directions in order to the suppressing of Debauchery and Prophaneness, 1693. XI. A Conference with an Anabaptist; Part I. Concerning the Subject of Baptism: Being a Defence of Infant-Baptism. This book is authorized with the Imprimatur of Ralph Barker, Chaplain to the Archbishop of Canterbury, Nov. 6, 1694. It was occasioned by a separate congregation of Anabaptists, being set up in Dr Afsheton's Parish; but the Meeting soon breaking up, the author never published a second Part. XII. A Discourse concerning a Death bed Repentance. This is the substance of a Sermon preached at Court before Queen Mary, enlarged and dedicated to the King, after her Majesty's death. XIII. A Theological Discourse of last Wills and Testaments. London, 1696. XIV. A seasonable Vindication of the blessed Trinity: Being an Answer to this Question, Why do you believe the Doctrine of the Trinity? Collected from the Works of the most Reverend Doctor John Tillotson, late Lord Archbishop of Canterbury, and the Right Reverend Dr Edward Stillingfleet, now Lord Bishop of Worcester, London, 1679. [E] An Extract of Dr Afsheton's Character from the Author of his Life. (10) 'He was very regular and assiduous in private Devotion, Meditation, and Reading. History and Philosophy, he justly used as the proper handmaids to Divinity, which was his business and delight, his Study indeed. He readily subscribed to the publishing all critical, learned, and laborious works. Thus he completed one of the best Libraries any Clergyman can desire, having the blessing of a sufficient revenue, out of which he laid out at least 10*l.* per annum, to improve and increase his first stock of books; whereof he sent many duplicates, upon request, for Wales, and the Highlands of Scotland. Among all his books, those of devotion were intermixed, or at hand, to begin and end with. His zeal in and for the Church, was ever conspicuous. He preached twice every Sunday, to keep the people from straggling, and engage them to frequent the church; otherwise he knew, and lamented, that we have but too much preaching in the nation. At length he found his labour too great for him; which yet rather than lessen, (though in a small parish) he was willing to keep an assistant before he died; to whom he committed the catechizing part in his declining age, allowing him 5*s.* per Sunday, over and above 30*l.* per annum, and the benefit of his table all Church-days, &c. with several gifts and advantages that made up the whole about 50*l.* per annum. He watched diligently over his flock, and never neglected to pray for them, and bless them; neither would he suffer any to perish for want of admonition or reproof; as well in the spirit of meekness, as with all authority; though he never sued, cited, or prosecuted the most injurious and obdurate offenders; yet he rebuked and avoided the unruly, and kept the impertinently censorious, and perverse, at a due distance. He knew, and did his own duty well;

and would have all his people mind theirs, who were not to tell him what to preach, &c. however offended at his just reproofs and warnings; of which he had an instance in a wilful profaner, and absenter from the Church sometimes, and from the Lord's Table always; pretending that the Doctor had preached against him, and told him, he should be damned, before all the congregation. — He so much the more deserved of his parish, as he was more generous and charitable among them, than just to himself, in disregarding often his small tythes and perquisites, taking quietly what some left him, and helping all; wherein, to make all just and easy too, he tried all possible fair ways without contention, by letting out the whole, and letting every man his part; and at last taking all in kind, when they would not come near the value. He persisted in taking his tenths many years, till his death, with all imaginable ease to his people, and too much loss and expence to himself; who yet always observed and declared, that the worst tythe was better than the best composition he could make; most country-men being too hard at bargains, and often so unreasonable, as to stand in their own light, as they call it. — He kept a constant good table, and seemed glad of daily guests, excepting on Fast-days, &c. otherwise the more frequent visits were to him, the more welcome. — He kept up the true moderate English hospitality, genteely managed by an excellent Virgin-sister, (who lived and died with him, while he continued single) and some few years by a truly virtuous wife, though sickly, for whom he set up his coach, being most tender of her, and sorrowful at her death. — As he was a most affectionate, tender husband, and brother; so he was a just indulgent master, and had generally careful and honest servants, whom he took pains to make religious, peaceable, and sober. — He daily observed the good old religious way of Family-devotions, and Sunday-repetitions, &c. in the evening, for heavenly knowledge, grace, and protection hourly. — He sometimes used extempore Sermons, (having a body of Divinity in his head) until he was disturbed, and put into consternation with his congregation, by a woman swooning away in the church, who was soon carried out, and the people became silent; yet he could not recover his subject, nor recollect any thing he had said before; which obliged him to make an apology and come down. This he took as a warning, never to presume upon the strength of his parts or memory any more; neither would he ever after venture into any pulpit without notes. — He was easy of access, most courteous and affable, meek as a lamb, harmless as a dove; but withal, wise to distinguish persons, times, and places. His table-talk was both delightful and improving; he diverted sad stories, and decried false ones; he would not willingly know a wicked person, nor suffer a liar or tale-bearer in his sight. He never looked so frowning, as when a certain gentleman was backbiting another, and telling them a scandalous story; he started up, and with emotion asked him, if he could face the absent? which soon confounded the whisperer. In this extract the reader will perceive, that I have selected only those particulars, which most strongly mark Dr Afsheton's character; which I shall sum up in the words of an ingenious writer, quoted by the author of his Life, (11). (11) Page 187, 188. Tho' low of stature, and mean aspect, yet truly reverend; his countenance was full of mildness and courtesy; his eyes more smiling than his mouth; his discourse grave and sober; words smooth and proper, distinctly uttered, with due respect to time, place, and person. His religion was legible in the innocency of his life, exactness of his morals, integrity and truth of his words, and the justice and honesty of his conversation. He abstained from offending, as if none ever pardoned; yet pardoned, as if he daily offended. His passions he made servants to his reason and religion; and if they rebelled, first concealed, and then suppressed suppressed their mutiny. He generally spake little; saw others tempers, without discovering his own; yet, when occasion served, showed that his silence neither proceeded from affectation nor weakness: for by running back to ages past, and recovering events out of memory, and then preventing time in flying forward to future things, and comparing one with the other, he would give a verdict very near propheticall; yet was so free from vanity, he could bear interruption patiently. Such was his prudence, and so exact his judgment as to discern between pride and greatness, religion and superstition, quickness and rashness, government and tyranny, liberty and licentiousness, subjection and servitude, frugality and covetousness, &c. and to give to every cause it's proper actions and effects. He drank wine, as sick men take physick, meerly for health: Reason was his rule, conscience his counsellor; and his actions were ever contrary to those he found fault with. Age rendered him neither morose nor imperious; his conversation was so affable, pleasant, and instructive, that young and old both delighted and profited in his company.

A S T L E Y (JOHN) second son of Sir Thomas de Astley, Knt. by Elizabeth, daughter and heiress of Richard Harcourt, Esq; descended of the antient and noble family of Astley, of Astley in Warwickshire (a) [A]. He was born in the beginning of the XVth century, and distinguished himself by feats of arms, in the reign of our great English conqueror, King Henry V. It was in those days customary, for persons who had distinguished themselves by military achievements, to tilt publicly for the honour of their nation, or of their mistresses. Thus in 1438, one Peter de Masse, a Frenchman, having challenged all comers in honour of a certain lady, it was accepted by our hero, Astley, who, on the twenty-ninth of August that year, in the street of St Antoine in Paris, engaged him on horseback in the presence of Charles VII, the French King, and having with his lance pierced the head and helmet of his opponent quite through, he presented the latter to his lady, according to the conditions of combat (b). Being by this exploit become famous, on his return into England he was made choice of to fight Sir Philip Boyle, an Arragonian Knight, who, by the command of the King his master, had been in France, and had there challenged any person to fight with him on horseback or on foot, and was now come into England for the same purpose. The combat was on the thirtieth of January, 1442, being the twentieth of Henry VI. It was fought in Smithfield in the presence of that King, and all his nobility (c). Our John Astley was then an Esquire of the King's house, and was made choice of on this occasion, to support the honour of the nation. They fought on foot, both being compleatly armed, and first Astley threw his spear, which was avoided by Sir Philip Boyle, who put it by with his sword. After this Astley took his battle-ax, and went against the Knight suddenly, says my author, on whom he struck many strokes hard and fore upon his basnet, and on his hand, and made him loose his battle ax, and let it fall to the ground, and burst up his umber, i. e. the vizor of his helmet three times, and caught his dagger, and would have smitten him in the face to have slain him in the field, and then the King cried Hoo! and so they were parted and went to their tents (d). Immediately after, the King dubbed the said John Astley a Knight, and granted him an annuity of one hundred marks per annum (e). As for Sir Philip Boyle, or, as Stowe calls him, Sir Philip de Beaufe, he went and offered his arms at Windfor (f) [B]. Sir John de Astley continuing in the exercise of arms, became in process of time Knight of the Garter, and having passed through life with the greatest honour, he at length deceased at Patehull in Staffordshire, and lies buried there under a handsome monument (g) [C].

[A] Astley of Astley in Warwickshire. This antient family is supposed, on account of the likeness of arms, the lands they held by military service, and the employments they from time to time, had under the Earls of Leicester, to have been a younger branch, descended from Simon de Montfort Earl of Leicester, great grandchild to Almaric, base son to Robert King of France (1). This is the conjecture of Sir William Dugdale, and seems to have a great deal of probability. As to the name it is thus derived. In Domesday book, this manor is called Estleja, i. e. Locus Orientalis, a place lying east, and the first mention we have of the family of which we are speaking, is in the twelfth of Henry II, when it appears, that Philip de Estleja, Estley, or Astley, held three Knights fees of William, Earl of Warwick, de veteri feoffamento, by which it is plain, that this estate was either in his father, or grandfather in the time of Henry I (2), of which three Knights fees, Estley was part with Wedington, Hillmorton, Milverton, &c. by the service of holding the Earl's stirrup when he either mounted or alighted (3). This is the antient and chief family of Astley, from which the families seated at Hillmorton, and Wolvey in Warwickshire, and at Patehull in Staffordshire, both which are still subsisting and flourishing, draw their source (4). As to the eldest branch it failed in William de Astley, in the reign of Henry V, for he leaving an only daughter, Joan, she married first Thomas Raleigh of Farnborough, in the county of Warwick, and afterwards Reginald, Lord Grey of Ruthin, in whose family the manor of Astley long continued (5).

[B] He went and offered his arms at Windfor. As to these combats, and the laws relating to them, the reader may meet with large accounts of them, in the books cited in the margin (6), but however, it may not be amiss to say something in few words of them here. In the first place, the King's leave was to be asked in a solemn manner, when that was obtained, a place was assigned which was railed in, and convenient stations appointed for the judges and for the spectators. Men and women being in separate boxes. In the Area were pitched two tents, one for the challenger, and one for the defendant, then each of the parties swore, that he fought fairly. There is an oath of this sort on record, in a trial which should have been by battle, in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, and as all oaths on such occasions were of the same tenor, it may not be amiss to produce it. Thus it ran, This, hear you Justices, that I have this day neither eat, drank, nor have upon me either bone, stone, or glass, or any enchantment, forcery, or witchcraft, where, through the power of God, might be implead or diminished, and the Devil's power increased (7). After the combat was over, the conqueror went and solemnly returned thanks to God, and in this case it appears, that he who was foiled, did also offer his arms.

[C] Buried under a handsome monument. It is pity we have not an exact description of this monument, because we know particularly from an ancient MS. of the ensigns of the Knights of the most noble Order of the Garter, that this Sir John de Astley bore for his arms the coats of Astley and Harcourt quarterly, and a label of three points ermine (8), perhaps they may be upon this tomb.

A S T O N (Sir ARTHUR), an officer of note in King Charles I's army, was son of Sir Arthur Aston of Fulham in Middlesex, who was the second son of Sir Thomas Aston, of Aston of Bucklow. Hundred in Cheshire; 'an antient and knightly family of that county (a).' He was a great traveller, and made several campaigns in foreign countries. Being returned into England about the beginning of the Grand Rebellion, with as many soldiers of note as he could bring with him, he took part with the King [A] against the Parliament. He commanded the dragoons in the battle of Edge-hill, and with them did his Majesty considerable service. The King, having a great opinion of his valour and conduct, made him governor of the garrison of Reading in Berkshire (b), and Commissary-General of the Horse (c); in which post he three times repulsed the Earl of Essex, who, at the head of the Parliament army, laid siege to that place. But Sir Arthur being dangerously wounded [B], the command was devolved on Colonel Richard Fielding, the eldest Colonel in the garrison. Sir Arthur was suspected of taking this opportunity to get rid of a dangerous command [C]. Some time after, he was appointed governor of the garrison of Oxford [D], in the room of Sir William Penniman deceased (d). In September following, he had the misfortune to break his leg by a fall from his horse, and was obliged to have it cut off; whereupon, on the twenty-fifth of December, he was discharged from his command, which was conferred on Colonel Gage (e). After the King's death, Sir Arthur was employed in the service of King Charles II, and went with the flower of the English veterans into Ireland, where he was appointed governor of Drogheda, commonly called Tredagh; 'at which time (Mr Wood tells us) he laid 'an excellent plot to tire and break the English army (f).' But at length Cromwell having taken the town, about the tenth of August, 1649, and put the inhabitants to the sword [E], Sir Arthur the governor was cut to pieces, and his brains beaten out with his wooden

[A] He took part with the King. The reader is to be informed, that Sir Arthur Aston was a reputed Papist; and this, among other circumstances, gave the King's enemies occasion to reflect upon him, as favouring the Romish religion. Let us hear my Lord Clarendon. 'In this equipage the King marched, — having in his whole army not one officer of the field who was a Papist, except Sir Arthur Aston, if he were one; and very few common soldiers of that religion. However the Parliament in all their declarations, and their clergy much more in their sermons, assured the people, that the King's army consisted only of Papists (1).' And in another place, 'Tho' he (the King) had some Papists entertained in his armies, yet all men trusted by him in superior commands, were men of unblemished integrity in the Protestant religion: and in all his armies he had but one general officer of the contrary religion, Sir Arthur Aston, whom the Papists notwithstanding would not acknowledge for a Papist (2).'

(1) Hist. of the Rebellion, Vol. II. Part i. p. 41. edit. Oxon. 1721.

(2) Ib. p. 153.

[B] He was dangerously wounded. 'Within a week after the beginning of the siege, Sir Arthur Aston, the governor, being in a court of guard near the line, which was nearest to the enemies approaches, a cannon-shot accidentally lighted upon the top of it, which was covered with brick-tyle; a piece whereof, the shot going thro', hit the governor on the head, and made that impression upon him, that his senses shortly failed him, so that he was not only disabled afterwards from executing in his own person, but incompetent for counsel or direction. — This accident was then thought of great misfortune to the King; for there was not in his army an officer of greater reputation, and of whom the enemy had greater dread (3).'

(3) Ibid. p. 231.

[C] Sir Arthur was suspected of taking this opportunity to get rid of a dangerous command. Colonel Fielding, upon whom the command of the garrison was devolved, having surrendered the town to the Parliament forces, was committed to prison for so doing, and ordered to be tried by a court-martial. Upon his trial he pleaded, among other things, in his defence; That by the unfortunate hurt of the governor, the command was devolved upon him by his right of seniority, not any ambitious design of his own: that he had, from time to time, acquainted Sir Arthur Aston with the state and condition they were in, and tho' his indisposition of health was such, that he would not give positive orders, he seemed to approve of all that was done; and tho', for the former reason, he refused to sign the articles, yet they were read to him, and he expressed no dislike of them. The truth of it is (says my Lord Clarendon) Sir Arthur Aston was believed by many, not to be in so incompetent a condition to command, as he pretended; and that albeit his head was so much swollen, that he might not in person venture upon any execution, yet his understanding or senses were not much disordered or discomposed; and that he only positively waved meddling, out of dislike of the condition they were in. And it is true, that when he came to Oxford, he could speak as reasonably of any matter, as ever I knew him before, or after (4).'

(4) Ibid. p. 241.

[D] He was appointed governor of the garrison of Oxford. It was thro' the Queen's interest he obtained this post: for her Majesty, being then at Oxford, thought she should be safer under the care and charge of a Roman Catholic, than of a Protestant governor. Sir Arthur's behaviour in this station was not very agreeable to the people of that city. He had the fortune (says the noble historian hitherto cited) to be very much esteemed where he was not known, and very much disliked where he was; and he was by this time too well known at Oxford, to be beloved by any; which the King well understood, and was the more troubled, because he saw the prejudice was universal, and with too much reason: and therefore his Majesty had given an extraordinary commission to the Lords of his council, to whose authority he was to submit; which obliged him to live with a little more respect towards them, than he desired to do; being a man of a rough nature, and so given up to an immoderate love of money, that he cared not by what ungrateful ways he exacted it. There were likewise some officers of name, who, having then no charge in the army, staid in the town; and those, by the King's direction, the Lords disposed to assist the governor, and particularly to take care of the several quarters of the town, one whereof was assigned to each of them (5).'

(5) Ibid. Part ii. p. 526, 527.

[E] Cromwell — put the inhabitants of Drogheda to the sword. To go on with Lord Clarendon; 'Before the Marquis of Ormond (General for the King) could draw his army together, Cromwell had besieged Tredagh (or Drogheda); and tho' the garrison was so strong in point of number, and that number of so choice men, that they could wish for nothing more, than that the enemy would attempt to take them by storm; the very next day after he came before the town, he gave a general assault, and was beaten off with considerable loss. But, after a day more, he assaulted it again in two places, with so much courage, that he entered in both; and tho' the governor and some of the chief officers retired in disorder into a fort, where they hoped to have made conditions, a pannick fear so possessed the soldiers, that they threw down their arms upon a general offer of quarter; so that the enemy entered the works without resistance, and put every man, governor (6), officer, and soldier, to the sword; and the whole army being entered the town, they executed all manner of cruelty, and put every man,

A S T O N (Sir THOMAS), a brave and worthy gentleman in the reign of King Charles I, was the son of John Aston, of Aston in Cheshire, Esq; by his wife Maud daughter of Robert Nedham of Shenton in Shropshire. He was entered a gentleman-commoner of Brazen-Nose college in Oxford, in 1626-7; but was soon called home by his relations, and, being married, was created a Baronet in July 1628. In 1635 he was High-Sheriff of Cheshire, being then esteemed a person of good natural parts, and a high-flown Monarchist. Upon the approach of the Rebellion, he wrote some pieces against the Presbyterians [A], and was afterwards the chief man in his country, that took part with the King. During the civil war, he raised a party of horse for his Majesty's service, which was beaten by a party of Rebels under Sir William Breerton of Honford near Nantwich in Cheshire, on the twenty-eighth of July, 1642; but Sir Thomas escaped with a slight wound. Some time after, he was taken in a skirmish in Staffordshire, and carried prisoner to Stafford; where endeavouring to make his escape, a soldier spied him, and gave him a blow on the head; which, with other wounds he had a little before received, threw him into a fever, of which he died on the twenty-fourth of March, 1645. His body was carried to Aston, and interred in the chapel belonging to his own house (a).

These were: I. A Remonstrance against Presbytery, exhibited against divers of the Nobility, Gentry, Ministers, and Inhabitants of the County Palatine of Cheshire, London, 1641, 4to. II. A short Survey of the Presbyterian Discipline. III. A brief Review of the Institution, Succession, and Jurisdiction of the ancient and venerable Order of the Bishops. These two last were printed with the Remonstrance before-mentioned. IV. He also made a Collection of sundry Petitions presented to the King's most excellent Majesty, as also to the two Houses now assembled in Parliament, and others already signed by most of the gentry, ministers, and freeholders of several counties, &c. containing ten sheets in 4to, 1642 (1).

A T H E L I N G (EDGAR) the son of Edward, the son of Edmond Ironside, King of England, by Agatha, daughter to Solomon, King of Hungary (a) [A], or rather of the Emperor Henry II (b). In what year he was born is not certain; but he was very young in 1057, when his father and family were recalled into their native country, by their kinsman Edward the Confessor, then King thereof (c). His father died soon after his return, before the King had time to give him any essential marks of that kindness, which he professed to him (d). Edgar was carefully bred up by him, who was his great uncle, and was undoubtedly intended for his successor, as the best authors assure us (e), and as his title Atheling, or Most Noble, implies; which is rightly noted by Mr Selden, correcting in this respect Polydore Vergil, who mistook it for a surname (f). But on King Edward's death, Edgar was deprived of his right, because of his youth, his being born abroad, and his having too little experience for a crowned head in such troublesome times (g) [B]. Harold the son of Earl Godwin, chiefly through the intrigues of the clergy (h), was preferred before him, for which they are severely censured by some

[A] By Agatha Daughter to Solomon King of Hungary. As to the father of Edgar, there is no colour of doubt, all authors agreeing him to be Edward the Outlaw, son to Edmond Ironside, elder brother to the Confessor, consequently the rights of Edward and our Edgar to the Crown, were prior to his own. This induced Buchanan to say, he sent for Edgar in order to resign to him the crown (1). This however, is a meer dream of this inaccurate historian, for the person sent for, was Edward, the father of Edgar, whom the King intended for his heir (2). That his mother's name was Agatha is clear, but not that she was the daughter of Solomon, as Buchanan, following many English authors, asserts without scruple (3). Edward was sent out of England about 1017, being then probably seven years old. Peter the German, who was the son of the Emperor, was then King of Hungary, and took him and his brother Edmond under his care (4). They continued in Hungary during the reigns of several Princes till about 1050, when Andrew, King of Hungary, concluding a peace with the Emperor Henry II, married his eldest son Solomon to one of the Emperor's daughters, and Edward to another. This Solomon did not mount the throne of Hungary till 1067, in the first year of William the Conqueror's reign (5), and because Edgar and his mother sought to fly thither, our historians concluded Agatha was his daughter (6), whereas she was his wife's sister. Ethelredus, who wrote expressly of the genealogy of the English Kings, who was particularly acquainted with this family, and flourished within a short time after Edgar Atheling's death, asserts his mother to have been the Emperor's daughter, and that Edward the Confessor sent for Edward and his family from that Monarch's court (7).

[B] In such troublesome times] Bromton tells us, many of the nobility were for Edgar. Sed quia puer erat et tanto oneri minus idoneus, i. e. But as he was a youth, and no way fit for such a burthen, they consented to accept Harold (8). This is the language of the fairest writers, for some Abbey Chronicles pretend, Edward the Confessor named Harold for his successor (9). John Fordun, says expressly, that Edward the Confessor, on the decease of Edward the Outlaw, declared Edgar his successor, and recommended him as such to the nobility (10). Matthew Paris is remarkably clear, Edmundus autem latus ferreum Rex naturalis de Stirpe Regum, genuit Edwardum: Edwardus Edgarum, cui de jure debetur Regnum Anglorum. Edmund Ironside, the natural King of this land, of the old royal stock begat Edward: Edward, Edgar, to whom of right appertained the crown (11).

writers (i). This happened in the beginning of A. D. 1066. Harold however treated him with great respect, as long as he lived. After whose death and defeat in the fatal battle of Hastings, the nobles and people in general looked upon Edgar as King, and even acknowledged him as such (k). But William Duke of Normandy, awing them with his victorious army, was owned and crowned Monarch of England at Westminster, in the same year (l). To him, if we credit some of our ancient historians, Edgar immediately submitted, and was amongst the number of those, whom William carried with him as hostages, into Normandy (m). Other authors are silent on this head, but all agree, that in 1067, Edgar, attended by many of the prime Nobility, retired first into Northumberland, afterwards into Scotland (n) [C]. The persons who adhered to him, had so considerable an interest both at home and abroad, that they quickly drew together a numerous army, and therewith began to bid fair for unsettling the new establishment. In 1068 (o), King William sent Robert Comyn into the North, in order to expel Edgar and his associates out of those parts, constituting him Earl of Northumberland. But this great man had but an ill fate, being slain by such forces as he had about him (p). The next year a great succour came to these malecontents from Denmark, and more English Lords reconciling themselves to Edgar, he made head against the Normans, and after several successful engagements, made himself master of the city of York, and wintered between the Ouse and Trent, notwithstanding all the efforts of the Conqueror (q). In 1070, he was less fortunate. William found means by money and promises, to draw off the Danes and some of the Lords of his party, and in the end, obliged him to retire again into Scotland. Malcolm King of that country, married this year his sister Margaret, so excellent a woman, that in her life-time she was stiled the Good, and after her decease was regarded as a Saint (r). This marriage enabled Edgar to make new attempts, in which he had mostly the better, the King of Scots openly assisting him, notwithstanding King William had demanded him, and threatened to invade Scotland in case of refusal (s). Some domestick troubles hindered that Prince from performing his threat for two years. In 1072 however, King William entered Scotland with an army, but with indifferent success. Upon this he readily made peace with Malcolm, and regulated, according to ancient treaties, the bounds of their respective dominions (t). In this peace the Scots historians say Edgar Atheling was included, and, on his submission, received into King William's favour, which is very probable, since the war was on his account (u). In 1074 Edgar left Scotland where he had been so kindly entertained, and where his sister was Queen [D]. He crossed the sea into Normandy, and was kindly received by King William, who gave him a grand allowance (w). Some of our authors say, it was a pound of silver a day, others twenty shillings. However, he was therewith contented, and lived quietly (x). William of Malmesbury, his contemporary (and who expressly takes notice he was living when he wrote) speaks of him in terms little to his advantage. He says he behaved meanly and foolishly in the King's court, and as an instance thereof, mentions his quitting his great allowance for an horse (y). But this is not very consistent with the testimonies of other authors, or with the general current of history [E]. After this submission our histories are silent concerning him for many years. This however is a plain proof, that he acted like a man of honour towards the Norman, since in that space there were many stirrs, of which he might have made his advantage (z). In 1086, that is, about twelve years after his submission, Edgar, conceiving himself ill treated at court, retired from thence. This does not seem to speak him of quite so mean a spirit as Malmesbury would make him. Certain it is, that even now he had the hearts of the English nation, since in the old Abbey

Chronicles,

[C] Afterwards into Scotland. This was the second time Edgar was set aside. In the Saxon Chronicle we find, he was generally looked on as King, after the death of Harold; inasmuch, that the Abbot of Peterborough, then called Burh, was sent by his Monks to Edgar for his approbation (12); because, says the author, the people of this land thought he ought to have been King, and he graciously acknowledged him for Abbot. This William, whose sword had made King, punished severely. Matthew Paris repeats on this occasion, his former assertion; Eadgarus Atheling, hæres legitimus Anglorum regni. i. e. Edgar Atheling, the lawful heir of the English kingdom, seeing his country in confusion, endeavoured to retire to Hungary, but by a storm was forced on the Scots coast (13). Hence his common appellation,

Edgar Atheling,
England's Darling.

[D] Where his sister was Queen. Many of our historians to raise the credit of their country, would persuade us, that this Queen civilized King Malcolm, and his Scots, making the King as well as his subjects almost barbarians (14). In this, however, they must be a little partial, since Malcolm was educated entirely in England, and was one of the greatest monarchs of that age. He had by this Queen Margaret, six sons, Edward, Edmund, Ethelred, Edgar, Athelred, and David; and two daughters, Maud the Good, who married Henry I, and Mary who married Eustace, Earl of Bulloign (15). This King Malcolm favoured the English so much, and treated those who fled to Scotland so well, that they remained there; and from them are descended some of the noblest houses in that kingdom, as the Lindseys, Vaux, Ramfays, Lovells, Sandlands, Foulis's, Wardlaws, Maxwells, &c (16). M. Paris places Edgar Atheling's coming to court first in 1060, and says he afterwards retired into Scotland, and some time after that was reconciled to the King again (17).

[E] The general current of history. We shall hereafter demonstrate Malmesbury's spight to Edgar. At present let us consider he had behaved well in several battles, had now, and afterwards, the hearts of the nation, was always courted by foreign Princes, and, as we shall see hereafter, was trusted by William II, with an army to restore his nephew, which he performed; these actions speak him neither weak, nor mean spirited; even our author's story proves no more than that he despised money, from which and his loving this country, the Monk concludes him a fool (18).
