Chronicles, we meet with this prayer on the mention of his retreat, May the Almighty give him honour (a), alluding to the little respect shewn him at Court. But this however was not without the King's consent. On the contrary, Edgar obtained licence to sail with a certain number of ships, and two hundred soldiers on board, to Apulia. This therefore was no disgraceful flight, but rather an honourable exile. About the same time, his younger sister Christina became a nun in Ramfey abbey (b). How long Edgar continued in Apulia is uncertain. Yet when he returned from thence he went into Normandy, where he was well received by Duke Robert, who gave him certain lands for his subsistence. Whether this was done to awe his brother William Rufus, who seized the kingdom of England, or purely to provide for an unhappy Prince, cannot now be determined. But in 1091, on the conclusion of a solemn treaty between the brethren Robert and William, the latter procured Edgar Atheling's being disposed of his lands, upon which he withdrew out of Normandy, and went into Scotland, to his brother-in-law King Malcolm (c). In the same year, this last mentioned Prince raised a puissant army, and therewith invaded England, and carried away much spoil; on the news whereof both brothers hastened out of Normandy, and sent a considerable force on board transports towards the north, that they might more speedily assemble an army in those parts, but being near Michaelmas, the weather proved stormy, and most of the men were lost. King William II, and Duke Robert, raised however an army, and though it was winter advanced therewith towards Scotland. Upon this Edgar interposed, reconciled the two Kings, and mediated a good peace (d). For this service he was restored to the King William's favour, and came back with the brothers to London. However, when Duke Robert returned into Normandy, Edgar chose to accompany him, either because he loved him best, or feared him least (e). This was in the beginning of 1092. His stay in Normandy was but short, for the next year we find him again in England, attending on, and in favour with, William II. That Prince resided at Gloucester about Easter, and was there so ill, that his death was expected. On the twenty-fourth of August, 1093, Malcolm King of Scots, importuned him by letters to regulate certain differences according to treaty, on which William summoned him to Gloucester, and sent Edgar to conduct him (f). This he performed, but after all King William treated Malcolm very ill, who returning into Scotland, levied an army, entered Northumberland, and besieging the castle of Alnwick, which had been unjustly taken from him, he was there treacherously slain, together with his eldest son Edward (g). This unfortunate event could not but afflict Edgar exceedingly, especially when he saw his nephews deprived of their rights, the Scots setting up Donald Bane, i. e. Donald the White, whom the English writers call Dufenald, for their King, who was brother to Malcolm (h). Edgar sent for his five nephews into England, and carefully brought them up. But not without some danger to himself if we credit the Scots Historians. One Orgar reported to King William Rufus, that Edgar should say boastingly to his nephews, that the right to the English crown was in him and in them. Edgar denied the charge, and was allowed to justify himself by combat. That is, he chose a Knight to enter into the lists for him, who was so happy as to conquer. Buchanan informs us, that the reason he did not fight in person, was because Edgar at this time was old and infirm; but in this he was mistaken, Edgar, not exceeding forty-three, and, as we shall see, went afterwards into Palestine (i). Two of Edgar's nephews died before they were of age, which hindered him from doing what he would otherwise have done for them. His third nephew, Edgar, growing towards man's estate, and the Scots inviting him when they were weary of his uncle, to accept the crown, he resolved to assist him in that undertaking. Applying therefore to King William, he procured a small assistance from him, and therewith marched to the borders of Scotland, where his forces quickly increased, so as to enable him to look Donald in the face. It was in the winter of 1097, he set forward on this expedition, and in the next spring, having defeated and taken Donald prisoner, he established his nephew on the throne, and then came back again into England (k). After this we meet with no account of him, till such time as with Robert the son of Godwin, a famous Knight, he undertook a journey into the Holy Land. It is probable this was in 1099 [F]. He was with Baldwin II, King of Jerusalem, when besieged in Rama, and having in their hazardous sally, wherein they escaped thence, lost his Knight, he thought of returning. This was in 1102, and accordingly he came back soon after into Europe, received great civilities from the Greek and German Emperors, who importuned him to remain in their courts, which he civilly excused, and continued his journey either into England and Normandy (l) [G]. Henry I, had

[F] It was probably in 1099.] Our conjecture is thus grounded. We cannot conceive, why Edgar should have left the kingdom after Henry I, ascended the throne, who married his niece, and was remarkably kind to his family; whereas it is easy to find the reason of his going in the end of William Rufus's reign. That Prince was an odd tempered man, Robert Duke of Normandy was already in the Holy Land, wherefore Edgar possibly chose to follow him, rather than remain at the King's mercy, or hazard his nephew's safety, by retiring into Scotland.

[G] Either into England or Normandy.] William of Malmesbury, is the only author who gives an account of this adventure of his; these are his words, 'He travelled with Robert, the son of Godwin, a valiant knight unto Jerusalem; and it so happened, that they were with King Baldwin, when besieged by the Turks in Rama. This Prince fallying escaped chiefly by the prowess of Robert, who going before him, cut down the Turks on the right and left. But in the end, dropping his sword, and overcome by numbers, Robert was taken;

had now ascended the English throne, and espoused Maud, Edgar's niece: he had therefore all imaginable reason to expect a good reception at Court, which however he either did not find, or else, it may be, declined. For we are certain, he was some short time after his return from the East, in Normandy with Duke Robert, for whom he had a great kindness. He even remained firm in his friendship to him, when King Henry invaded his dominions, and was taken prisoner fighting in his cause, as also was Duke Robert himself, at the fatal battle of Tenchebray, wherein the whole force of Normandy was routed; which fell out in the latter end of 1106 (m). King Henry dealt very severely with the rest of the prisoners, but as for Edgar, he dismissed him freely. This is the last time he is mentioned in our histories, and after his return into England, he went to pass the remainder of his days in the country, where, according to Malmshury, he was living in 1120, when he must have been seventy or thereabouts (n). In what year he died appears not, nor do we read that he was ever married. He was born during his father's exile, lost him when his life would have secured him a crown, struggled, though to no purpose, against the Conqueror, was through his whole life the sport of fortune, and died full of years and in a dark obscurity. To which we add, that till now, his life was never written, from a supposed want of materials, and from a real want of inclination, to glean from our antient historians, a multitude of little memorandums, concerning an injured unfortunate Prince. This justice we have at length done his memory, and the English history, which, from this article, we hope will appear not quite so barren, as some modern writers would represent it.

' taken; and, as it is said, being carried into Babylon, or Cairo in Egypt, and refusing to deny Christ, was there slain. Edgar having lost his knight, returned; and being honoured with rich presents, by the Greek and German Emperors, (who on account of his nobility, would have retained him in their courts) contemned all things, in regard to his native soil. For such is the fondness of some men for their country, that they can relish nothing out of the climate wherein they were bred. Wherefore Edgar, deluded by those notions, returned into England, and afterwards meeting various changes of fortune, spends now his extreme old age in an inglorious country retirement (19). On this, let us observe, Britain was not Edgar's native country, but rather the German Emperor's dominions; that Malmshury, was provoked by his siding with Duke Robert, against his master, Henry I, and that this discourse is addressed to Robert Earl of Gloucester, King Henry's natural son.

E

A T H E R T O N (JOHN) a Bishop in Ireland, in the reign of King Charles I, who has rendered himself a very remarkable warning-piece in history, to future ages. He is said to have been well descended; but whether he was allied to the antient family of the Athertons of Atherton in Lancashire, we know not [A]. He was born at Bawdrip, near Bridgwater in Somersetshire, anno 1598; of which parish, his father, the reverend Mr John Atherton, was then Rector, and had been fourteen years. He was sent for his education to Gloucester-Hall, in Oxford, in the year 1614; where continuing till after he had taken one degree in arts, he was transplanted to Lincoln college in the same university; took the degree of Master, as member of it, and entered into holy orders; and not long after, was made Rector of Huish Combflower, in the county he was born in (a). He married while he was young; for it may be computed, from what will more particularly appear, that it could not be later than the year 1620, that he entered into the state of wedlock; and that he had by his wife two or more daughters, and if any sons, they died before their father (b). We are also informed, that his said wife was a handsome and agreeable woman; but he being a man of strong passions, and too viciously inclined to gratify them, it seems the band of matrimony was too weak to bridle his sensual and voluptuous appetites; inasmuch, that he is affirmed to have committed incest with his wife's sister; and was so inadvertent in this unlawful intercourse, that it came to be discovered, to the shame and scandal of them both (c). And whereas men are not wont to fall into shameful and scandalous practices on a sudden, and without some previous or gradual introductions; neither did he: For, in the course of this narrative, we shall learn, that he was defiled or corrupted in his youth, by one of his own sex, probably before he left the university; and also, what horror the unexpected sight of that person struck upon his guilty mind, many years after in Ireland (*). But here we are to observe, that upon the discovery of that intrigue aforesaid, it appears he was driven to make suit for his pardon, which having procured, he transported himself to the city of Dublin, in the said kingdom; where, either by the recommendations he brought over, or his assiduous address,

[A] Whether allied to the ancient family of the Atherton's, near Atherton in Lancashire, &c.] Of which county, Sir John Atherton was, in the third year of Queen Elizabeth, High-Sheriff; as was also John Atherton, Esq; perhaps his son, in the twenty-fifth of the same reign; who both bore for their arms — Gules, Three Falcons, Or (1). Nor are we certain, whether that pedigree of the Athertons, which is still in being, among Mr Roger Dodsworth's manuscript collections at Oxford (2), does relate directly to that Lancashire family: But it should seem to do so, because there is also among those collections, an extract of notes taken by the said Mr Dodsworth, out of between forty and fifty old Evidences, which being communicated to him by John Atherton, of Atherton aforesaid, in the year 1635 (3), should seem most likely to concern chiefly his own family; and from whence, not improbably, that pedigree might be drawn, or at least augmented. It was this last John Atherton, or another of his name, contemporary with him, who, with certain other learned persons, wrote a collection of Latin verses, in praise of Sir Richard Napier, Doctor of Physick, as he is styled in the title thereof (4), whence those verses appear to have been written after the year 1642, Sir Richard being created Doctor in that faculty, the latter end of the said year (5).

addresses, he obtained the parsonage of St John's church, and became Chaplain to Adam Loftus, Viscount Lisle, and Lord Chancellor of that kingdom; through whose favour also, he is reported to have been further preferred, and made a Dignitary of Christ-Church in the said city, according to the above cited account of his life (d). Yet for all this good fortune, this noble friendship, to recover his character and settle him in creditable courses; nothing but his turbulent oppositions, trayterous ingratitude, tyrannical oppressions, and avaritious extortions; nothing but his discarding all religious duties from himself, and converting others to his vices; above all, his most abominable lewdness; can we find, unless it be his exemplary penitence and condign punishment, to fill up the remainder of his story! but of these particulars in their order. We are informed that in the year 1634, he made such oppositions in affairs relating both to Church and State [B], as he afterwards heartily repented of. As for his ingratitude; besides other examples which may occur (*), we have a very flagrant instance of it, in the said account of his exploits, which declares, that he most ungratefully betrayed that indulgent patron abovementioned into disgrace (e), with the stern and haughty Lord Deputy of Ireland, afterwards Earl of Strafford; between whom and that Lord Chancellor, there being a notorious contention fomented, and carried on with too much rigour and exaction of unreasonable submission, as the King himself judged, on the Lord Deputy's part, how little soever thereof appears in the publick histories, or in his own papers that are printed (f); our industrious solicitor of promotion took that opportunity to shift on this side, after he had got what he could on the other, and so to insinuate himself into the said Deputy's good graces, that, as others say, it was this Lord who first preferred him; and further, for his sufficiencies in the Canon Law, and ecclesiastical affairs (qualifications the Deputy knew well, for the schemes he had in view, how to make use of in such a tractable instrument) that he was by him made Prebendary of Christ Church aforesaid; and afterwards also advanced by him to the bishoprick of Waterford and Lismore, in the year 1636, he being then Doctor of Divinity (g). In this vineyard he laboured very profitably, and did grind the people of his diocese, the Roman Catholics especially, with too much severity; as it is sufficiently intimated by those, who veil over his other vices (h). In short, his episcopal government seems an entire scene of oppression and extortion [C], of aversion to all religious duties, and conversion

[B] He made such oppositions in affairs relating both to Church and State.] Even as well in the established ceremonies of the Church, and the ecclesiastical constitutions, as in the ordinances of government, he could not be quiet and conformable; but would be ever imposing some disgustful alteration, or withdrawing himself from all obedience to them. For we are told, even by a reverend author, who has varnished over his crimes, at least his capital ones, with too little regard to his own credit, that when he became a penitent, he confessed, and not without dissuading others from becoming such incendiaries, such petulant disturbers of human society, 'That he had exercised too much zeal and forwardness, both in introducing and pressing some church-innovations, and in dividing himself from the house of convocation, anno 1634, in opposition to the articles of Ireland, then voted to be received, on purpose to please some men's persons, who did not withstanding afterwards with just cause forsake him' (26).³ And these oppositions he made to such a violent degree, how lightly or generally soever, here expressed, as made him take notice, and judge no less of them himself, than that providence; for these, as well as his more shameful offences, had a just hand in his overthrow; and therefore, for avoiding the like, he gave good counsel to others.

[C] An entire scene of oppression and extortion] In truth his episcopal government seems to have been a continual warfare, with Protestants as well as Papists; and even the indigent, as well as opulent; being spurred on by pride, covetousness, and cruelty, to the harassing and persecuting them in the ecclesiastical courts, &c. to the great wrong and ruin of many. Nor was it without the Deputy's knowledge and toleration, that he was thus ever restless and rapacious in rending from, and stripping, whole families, of possessions they had been long and quietly settled in, when any colour could be found to make them part of the Bishop's Revenue; whereby he not only hooked in several considerable estates to his own See, but raked up also a plentiful one to himself. But when his worldly views of enjoying it, after his gross and sensual manner, were all over, 'He did then confess, he had been guilty of much overreaching of men; but if his estate might be continued to his wife, he had given charge for satisfaction to be made to a Penny (7). And then also, he did himself give satisfaction to any he had wronged in small matters; then, he sent for some who were mean persons, and asked them forgiveness; and endeavoured, to his utmost, to take off the fines of those whom he had persecuted too bitterly in the High Commission Court (8).³ Thus much Dr Bernard has owned; and another late author, who has been a greater purgator of our Bishop than he, but with more prudence with-held his name from his work, than he has with impartiality composed it; yet acknowledges it as the character of this his martyr for the recovery of church-lands, 'That he was of a proud, passionate, and litigious temper;' and adds, 'That, as his affairs forced him, so his inclinations induced him to contend, and go to law.' And a little farther, that 'This proneness of going to law, and too eagerly prosecuting his own suits, had he taken only the fair course of law, was a ready way to create him many enemies, &c (9).³ But that those enemies raised a conspiracy against his life, and swore it away, for crimes the good man was innocent of, his own confessions, minced and disguised as they are, sufficiently confute. Yet our last quoted author, to strengthen his Hypothesis, tells us, 'There is a particular story, of a received and credited tradition, that upon a certain time, the unfortunate Bishop being at a certain great man's house, which antiently belonged to the Bishoprick, and as he apprehended, of right did so still; upon his taking leave, he thanked the great man for his civil treatment, and hoped to return him the same, in the same place; which made the other turn from him with great indignation (10).³ From this time, 'tis in this author supposed, his ruin was meditated, and carried on, 'till accomplished. But if that great man was the Earl of Cork, as some circumstances hereafter occurring, may suggest it was; they came to an agreement, and seemed to have compromised all differences (*), long before the Bishop's ruin was either accomplished, or meditated, as is there surmised. It may be here further observed, as what relates to this part of our discourse, that when he arrived at his short state of penitence, before his fatal fall, that he would often apply to himself, that memorable speech of Cardinal Wolsey, who said, Had he been as diligent to have done God service, as he had done the King, he had kept the King's favour still:³ So conversion of others to his own carnal abominations [D]; especially those which were most odious and ignominious; in the gratification whereof, he seems to have given himself up, without bounds or distinction. As no condition, so no sex over whom he could get any ascendancy, escaped this ravenous and rampant Prelate; who was ever overbearing the one or the other; ever in litigation, or in league more irksome, with the men; or in fornication, or adultery with the women. Many of his feats in this part of his character have indeed been apparently stifled, or studiously palliated, through a false notion of tenderness to the Church; as if the blemishes of any individual professor of, or pretender to, religion, could cast a blot upon religion itself, any more than gold can be impaired in its value, by being sometimes confined in a dirty purse; yet enough is descended to us, to shew, by the means this man took to bring himself to justice, the reasonableness of its execution in the end upon him. But first, among the gallant encounters and overthrows performed by this consecrated warrior, in the female field of honour, whereof we have observed something before; there further occurs, his ready manner of lending an hundred pounds to a certain man in his neighbourhood, and then, while he had locked him into his study to count it over, as readily making him a cuckold (i). It also appears, that he was not only very expert, but intense; bestowed a great deal of application and exercise in this kind of discipline; and seduced, or otherwise pressed so many women into the wars of Venus, that if a list were to be taken, and a muster made of all this Bishop's concubines, they would form a band, amounting to the number of no less than sixty-four (k). However, it was his mind only that seemed invincible in his rencounters with them, which would spur his body on, even when discomfited, to rally and renew the charge. For it is obvious, that this absolute and licentious resignation to a libidinous life, was a vice rather of the spirit than the flesh; more owing to the second nature of custom, than the first, of any predominant elasticity in his constitution; and that he had no corporal infatigation extraordinary, more than others; for his forces were so foiled, so routed and defeated, that he was often reduced to receive into his service the woeful recruits of Cantharides (l). Nor did he neglect all the aids of mental incentives; the most prevailing chafers of cogitation, like the General who uses exhortations, to kindle fresh bravery in his disanimated invalids; as Dr Bernard has more candidly informed us, than in other places, upon this part of his story, he is wont to do: where he acquaints us, that 'his reading of naughty books, and viewing of immodest pictures [E], frequenting of plays,

'So had he been as conversant in the gospel, for the instruction of men, as he had in the law, for the settling of lands, he had not by the law, so deservedly lost lands, body, and estate, all at once (11).

[D] Aversion to all religious duties himself, and conversion of others to his own carnal abominations.] For how little conversant he was in the Gospel, as he confessed in the last note, may further appear in that other acknowledgment he made, 'Of his neglecting publick preaching, and catechising in the church; and private prayer in his family; for which sins of omission, he was justly given over to the sins of commission: For the neglect of the commandments of the first table, left to fall into the breach of the second. That he had come to the sacrament, and administered it, with his sins upon him. His roving thoughts at divine service, and sermon, with divers others, &c. And here he declared a very observable passage: Not many years ago (therefore not a great while after his advancement to his Bishoprick) he had a dangerous long sickness; when being sensible of the long neglect of his pastoral charge, he made a solemn vow to God, that if he should recover again, he would be diligent both in preaching and catechising every Sunday. After his recovery, it so fell out, that the first time he went to church, with an intent to have begun, the Judges of Assize were at Waterford; and then a thought arose within him, that if he should now enter upon that practice, which he had not used before, it would be imagined, he did it for fear of them; and so deferring it that day, he never did it afterwards (12).' As for his abilities, in preaching or speaking; the same author says, 'Tis known, what an excellent faculty he had naturally, in a ready present expression of what he understood, either in ecclesiastical or civil affairs (13).' And yet his depravities turned that faculty to his dispraise, and would not suffer him to exercise it, except in the oppression of others, or his own repentance. But for his abilities in composing; they being employed little enough upon what they should be, he was apt to cloud his thoughts with such obscurities, as could not escape even his own censure. For our Doctor aforesaid, recommending perspicuity, and plainness in sermons; adds, 'What hope is there of opening mens understandings, when the matter delivered is closed up from them. It was

'St Paul's aim, to speak words easy to be understood; and so it should be ours. There is little difference in speaking in an unknown Tongue, and speaking of things in an unknown stile. These strong lines, and forced eloquence, in so high a language, doth little suit with God's Oracles; less fit that word that must save the soul: A fault which this our Brother much condemned himself for (14).' But those talents of speaking, or writing, even in perfection, would render such a possessor of them but more pernicious; such a one, as the Doctor says of the Bishop, who, 'Instead of converting others had corrupted them; who, instead of opening their eyes, had shut his own; instead of gaining others out of darkness, had lived in the works of darkness himself; and instead of turning men from the power of Satan, had drawn more subjects to him (15).' In one sentence more, still stronger than all those, the Doctor says, in his very introduction of that sermon, that, 'For his life, to give it the least commendation, would be a scandal to the speaker.'

(15) Idem. p. 79.

[E] His reading of naughty books, and viewing of immodest pictures.] The Bishop seems to have had some collection of these naughty books, and immodest pictures, which were his movers to fouler faults; not only by his naming some of them so particularly to Dr Bernard, as he did in his state of contrition, and passing such a just and equitable sentence upon them, as to wish they were all burnt (16), having been so inflammatory to his own imaginations, and so instrumental to his destruction; but also, from what is intimated in a little tract published soon after his death; wherein the author hinting at some vices, which were more peculiarly the product of warmer climates, however they may have sometimes been transplanted, or casually found to run up as weeds of themselves in some mismanaged or uncultivated soils, less natural to them; yet wonders that their recommendations should be suffered to appear so publicly and permanently, as in print; to the great corruption of youth, not only then present, but in generations to come*. So alludes to such figures as were set forth in so many indecent attitudes, ascribed to an obscene poet, whom they profanely call the divine Aretin; as also that vile work of another of their divines, who was no less than an Archbishop, besides several others of the like kind, with which Italy their country abounds; 'But not to be found. it

'plays, and drunkenness, &c. were the causes and movers to fouler facts?' And adds, 'Let men by this example forbear them (m).' But what was worst of all, he became at last a Doctor in his Iniquity, and an Advocate for it; infomuch, that when he had infused his practical doctrine into any of his female converts, he was so far from endeavouring to dissemble, or make any secret of it, that he would justify it's orthodoxy; shew how expedient and salutary it was; and argue as if it was physically used, to circulate and purify the blood (n), or prevent repletions, stagnations, and the like. It is positively affirmed, that he was admonished to reclaim, and amend this libertine course of life, in a very solemn manner, by his own sister, the wife of one Mr Leakie; whose mother being dead, and having been very well acquainted, while living, with those enormous debaucheries to which the Bishop had abandoned himself; it was vulgarly reported, that her ghost appeared often to his said sister, and charged her to go over and warn him, that if he did not forthwith reform his wicked life, it would assuredly be cut off at the gallows (o). 'Tis certain that a rumour of such an apparition was very rife, and made a great alarm about that time, and long after, both in England and Ireland; and we have heard, there were some pamphlets or accounts then printed distinctly of it (*). But did we allow, that it was only a bare fancy or conceit of her's, the effect of a dream, or a mere device of her own, or her friends, to render her arguments or intreaties with her brother of greater authority and regard (which yet has not been supposed) whereby she was instigated, under the pretence of an extraordinary injunction, to give him such admonition; even any of those motives might be sufficient, to make her a special messenger to him. Accordingly she did go to Ireland [F], and declared to the Bishop what she said had been revealed to her; using many affectionate and pathetic exhortations, that he would no longer suffer the devil to have such power over him, to the ruin and disgrace of himself and his whole family. But he, with that headstrong and presumptuous obstinacy, to which he was now hardened, answered her, What must be, shall be; marriage and hanging go by destiny (p). So he sent her back as a weak woman, and went forward himself, still mending his pace, but varying his path to perdition. For as some appetites which have been vitiated by an evil habit of body, or inordinate inclination

'is hoped, in any person's library in England, whatever there might be in that of a late Prelate in Ireland (17).' As to those prints, or postures they are commonly called, of Aretin's, they were, from the drawings which Julio Romano made, about the year 1525, engraved by Marc Antonio of Bologne, in about sixteen plates; and Aretin only wrote the verses under them; manifest enough, both from the different parts of the work, he being no engraver; and even the title, by which he himself distinguished it (18). But the plates were long since bought up by a merchant of France, and destroyed, as hath been sufficiently related elsewhere; together with an account at large, of his other lewd compositions (19). But for the other Person above glanced at, it was Joannes de Casa, Archbishop of Benevento; who did publish a little piece upon a more unnatural subject, most shamefully praising the detestable vice his own country is, or should be, abhorred for, and glorying in his own practice of it. There have not been wanting dissolute and mercenary editors in more countries than that which first brought it forth, to revive and propagate the impressions of it; and though the author afterwards published books which bear a different character; they have not cleared his own for the publication of that. But writers of other nations, as well as ours, have deservedly stigmatized and exposed him for it. Among the rest, that learned author, who names himself Isaac Rabottenu of Louvain, and published a famous book in the year 1569 (according to the date at the end of his dedication) in which he has, by such a swarm of authorities, so flung the Popes, and all their churchmen, that it is wondered the Spanish Inquisition had not fired the hive which produced them. This book was about a dozen years after, both translated into English and printed, at the expence of John Still (the same we take it who was afterwards Bishop of Bath and Wells) and by him dedicated, 'To the right worshipful, wife, and virtuous gentleman, master Philip Sidney, Esq; (20).' There was another edition, or the same, with a new title-page, dated above fifty-four years after; in which we read these words, 'Joannes de la Casa, Archbishop of Benevento, hath written a book in commendation of Sodomity, calling it a Godly Worke; and saying, that he took great delight in the same, and used no other bedfellow. He was Deacon of the Apostolical Chamber, and the Pope's Ambassadour, throughout the whole country of Venice; and he is the same which first permitted the

Register of the forbidden bookes to be extant, in the year 1549, the 7th of May: And the booke whereof we mention, was printed at Venice by the Printers called Novus (21).'

[F] Accordingly she did go to Ireland.] It is very probable, that Mrs Leakie, during the course of those years that her brother was in Ireland, went thither oftener than this once, and upon other occasions than this. And yet even this seems to be alluded to, in one of the Earl of Strafford's letters from Dublin, to Laud, Archbishop of Canterbury. For there is an expression in it, that seems to approach remarkably close to the point, though his Lordship had as yet, but slender cognizance of her business there with her brother. The words are these: 'I will enquire after Mrs Leakey, and her errand; and if it be to be met with, I will learn, what the Devil hath to say to the Bishop of Waterford: Sure I am, the Earl of Cork, witheth them together already (22).' This letter is dated the last of December 1636, which was the first year of Dr Atherton's being in that Bishoprick. 'Tis likely, the Lord Deputy had heard, the had threatened her brother, that the Devil would be with, or have him, by the Earl of Cork's desire to hasten their meeting. Yet the answer which Archbishop Laud returned to that letter, near nine months afterwards, is for leading us quite beside the track of that conjecture or application; where he says, 'Certainly, that business of Mrs Leakey, was a money business; and if that Devil be so fast knit up in the Bishop's purse, it seems they will have but a cold pluck of it; but that matter is now quite out of speech (23).' This letter is dated from Croydon, August 28, 1637. And in the same letter, the Archbishop 'thanks his Lordship for his care of the Bishoprick of Waterford and Liffmore; and for an agreement signed by his Lordship and the Council, of great advancement to the Bishoprick (24).' In answer to this, the Lord Deputy tells the Archbishop, 'The agreement made betwixt the Earl of Cork, and Bishop of Waterford, is indeed in my judgment a very good one; and I now like it much the better, that it is pleasing to your Grace also (25).' This is dated from Dublin Castle, the 18th of October 1637. A few months before the Earl of Cork (between whom and Strafford, there was great enmity) was forced to compound; and parted with Ardmore to the See of Waterford: Yet the Bishop wanted as much of his estate, as was worth, in the whole, 2000 pounds per Annum.

inclination of mind, even to nauseate the most wholesome diet, and hunger after that which is not fit for food; so his depraved palate, satiated, it seems, with the Fair, plunged him into the most odious impurities, and he fell from their sex, preposterously to prey on his own; at least, one became to him as magnetick as the other. Nay it is further asserted, that he could not circumscribe himself here; but had more enlarged views, and acted greater parts in his own tragedy, for such the catastrophe will prove it; as if the world was to be new tenanted, with a race of Centaurs, or other monsters more strange and formidable than were ever begotten by the Heathen bards of old, or subsist in profane history; by indulging his corruptions to such a hideous debasement of his kind, as to render him unsatisfied even in the sphere of his own species! And this is thought to be pointed at, in those comparisons of him, so often to the vilest animals, in their most uncleanly habits (*). At length, in the midst of his foul career, to the scandal and abhorrence of all rational and sober society with him, he was stopped short, and surprized with the dreadful sight of a person he little thought of; from the first appearance of whom, he was totally damped and dismayed. 'Twas the man (says the author above) who had been the corrupter of him in his youth; whom he had not seen in twenty years before, and now came casually out of England into Ireland to visit him; the sight of whom did so affright him, as if some ghost had appeared to him; he said his very heart misgave him, and his conscience apprehended him, as some presage, or messenger of a present vengeance, drawing nigh him (q).’ This is all we are permitted, by Dr Bernard, to know of that man. Whether he was afterwards any evidence against the Bishop, is an incident, which, among many others, that author wanted either sincerity or liberty to inform us. But this we learn from him, that about three weeks after, a Bill of Complaint was preferred against Bishop Atherton, in the Parliament at Dublin. Hereupon he was suddenly seized, and strictly imprisoned; then followed his arraignment, which lasted a long while, and ended, on Friday the twenty-seventh of November, 1640, with sentence of death. The Doctor does own, ‘that the Bishop’s carriage then was by all condemned; and that it is not his intent, in the least measure, to excuse it (r).’ And this is all he lets us know of the Bishop’s Tryal; at least as to those facts in particular, for which he lost his life. For so it has been contrived, that you may read his two discourses over, The Penitent Death of the said Bishop, and the Caveat to the Ministry and People, or his funeral sermon; I say, through an hundred and sixty-six pages (s), and remain ignorant of what the Bishop suffered death for [G]; unless you draw

[G] Ignorant of what the Bishop suffered death for.] Dr Bernard, who was Archbishop Uther’s chaplain, published those two discourses by his command, as he says himself before them (26). But the Doctor, or whoever else had an hand in them, has so sophisticated, equivocated, and canted in them throughout; so amusingly befringed, and philactered the margins with holy texts of Scripture, and pious quotations out of the Fathers, Schoolmen, &c. so blended and twisted all the Bishop’s crimes and vices, in a general and ambiguous manner together, whenever he describes the unloading his conscience, and repeats any of his confessions, that the reader is quite dissatisfied from end to end, in the very first enquiry he would make—What the cause was of the Bishop’s condemnation? ’Tis said, he was so reserved and tenacious, that in the title of the first edition, he conceals the function (*) of the criminal, as well as his crime; and that it runs thus; The Penitent Death of a Woeful Sinner, or the Penitent Death of John Atherton, Executed at Dublin, &c. (27). The next edition was printed in 1642, which not having seen, we know not wherein it varies. The third edition, as he altered and enlarged it himself, is what we here make use of: However, thus much may be gathered out of the Doctor’s work, upon this head; that as to the Bishop’s male-practices, if we may be allowed to make a new or uncommon interpretation of a word, upon an uncommon subject, it is apparent enough, that his visitor out of England, as above-mentioned, was one of those with whom he had transacted them; and that he must be a different person (because he had not seen the Bishop in twenty years) from his Lordship’s steward, as some stile him (28), or his professor, and apparator, according to others (29), who suffered death as well as the Bishop, for their carnal communications together; what other men he had such intimate dealings with, is not come to our knowledge. As to the bestiality he is accused of, we have been informed, by a gentleman of repute, who had been long in Waterford, as well as other parts of Ireland, and conversant with many grave and intelligent persons there, that he had often heard, there was a favourite but unlucky Mare, by which the unwearied Bishop got his deadly downfall. And how true it is, we know not; but a late editor of Dr Bernard’s book on the Bishop, has named in the title-page, another four-footed Favourite, with whom our dainty courtier would in like manner solace; for the title of that edition runs thus, — The Case of John Atherton, Bishop of Waterford, in Ireland; who was convicted of the Sin of Uncleanness with a Cow, and other Creatures; for which he was hanged at Dublin, &c. (30). This title page has moved the spleen of a late apologist in this cause, before quoted, to mislead the world with a new-fangled Case of Bishop Atherton; in which he objects no untruth to that title, but chides the editor, for printing that creature in capital letters, and indeed for setting forth any edition at all; yet objects not to Dr Bernard, who gave the world three editions of it. He has also shewed a strange favour for the criminal, and as strangely forborne to speak one word against the crime he justly suffered for, according to Law (*). He is further nettled, that the said publisher should make his edition so much known, as to have it carried far and near, upon the wings of advertisements (31); as if all his care was, for concealing the sinner, not chastising, or deterring the sin. But to use a few of his own words upon this topic, where he is in a humour of communication, may not be here unnecessary: ‘When I first read Dr Bernard’s book, says he, I was so far from learning from his relation, what the crime was, for which the Bishop died, that I was forced for satisfaction, to enquire of a learned man, who had been born, and bred up in the kingdom of Ireland, What this unfortunate Bishop’s heinous crime was? And, as far as I can remember, his answer was, He suffered for this unnatural sin: But added, he thought it a great conspiracy against him; that he had, in the judgment of most men, hard and severe measure; and by very many, that he died innocent, and was not guilty of that brutal fact, for which he was executed (32).’ And a little further, this author himself, ‘grants it to be true, that the Bishop was convicted, and died for that crime (33).’ And yet, in one of the anonymous letters, he prints at the end, which, as he says, he received from Waterford, after he had new-dressed up

draw conclusions from the indirect and bordering intimations, sprinkled up and down therein; or collate them with more ingenuous and communicative narrations, as hath been here attempted; and then the blind-folded particulars will loosen their bandage, and better discover each other. In this manner, if we consider one of the Doctor's allusions, it may appear more emphatical; where, now after the Bishop's sentence, among his penitential reflections, the Doctor says, 'He apprehended it, as no small token of God's love to him, in giving him his portion of shame in this world, as a means to shun it in the world to come; which he once expressed with such a height of affection, as I wondered at it; believing, that nothing but this, or the like, would have wrought upon his masterless disposition; which under any other troubles, he feared would still have lingered, like Lot in Sodom, ready to be fired, till he was hauled out; or like Cattle within a house, and fire about them, yet stir not till they are drawn out (t).' After his condemnation, he was returned prisoner again to the castle (r) Idem. p. 231 at Dublin; and Dr Bernard the next day repaired to him, probably by direction from Archbishop Usher, whose Chaplain he was as we have observed, to prepare his soul for it's separation from this life. He was allowed seven days to fit himself for his dissolution, and leave the world, from which he had made himself such a despised outcast; to disburthen his mind of his sins, to repent, and seek forgiveness for them. And indeed, the picture of him in this most lamentable period; under all his violent conflicts, and bitter agonies; his stinging recollections, and cruciating remorse; his plenary confession, and grievous repentance; in showers of tears, raptures of prayer, with the most prostrate detestation of himself, and desires to be cut off, as a mortified limb, from the body of Humankind; is so remarkable, so deeply affecting, and commanding of attention; so forcibly forbidding, and convincingly admonishing all Readers to avoid the miry ways which led him to this terrible state and end; that we were induced to give the foregoing up the Bishop's case, it is affirmed of the bestiality alleged, 'That all agree, it is not that, but too much freedom with his own steward, one Child by name; for which he was put to death (34).'

By another author, he is named John Child, and called the Bishop's proctor, who, as we observed, was hanged for that same freedom there was between them; but it was in March following, therefore three months after the Bishop's execution, and at Bandon-Bridge, in or near Cork, having been condemned at the assizes held there (35.) There is a dying speech in print, made, or pretended to be, by him at his execution; wherein, as we have been informed, he recanted one of the facts or circumstances, he had accused the Bishop with, whether concerning the bestiality, we know not. But partly upon the ground of this Pamphlet, it should seem Dr Bernard intimates, 'That the Bishop did, not only at his trial, but since (his condemnation) deny the main thing in the indictment, which the law laid hold of; and which hath been since confirmed, says he, by the confession of his chief accuser, at his execution also; yet, (the next words are, that the Bishop) in his own conscience, applauded and magnified God's justice in it (36).'

Nay, the same author had told us, but in the antecedent page, 'That the Bishop acknowledged the justice of the law of man, as God's in condemning him.' Which seems not very consistent with that pretended denial before, and after he was condemned, of the main thing, which the law took hold of: And the Doctor does also in his own person speak, a little further, of 'Those things (but what things he speaks not) he was justly condemned for (37).'

Besides, the Bishop himself, in his last letter to his wife, hereafter recited, confesses how much he had deserved his punishment. As for what is to be found on this matter in the English edition of Sir James Ware (38), it is only a repetition of that passage in Dr Bernard, about the pretended denial and confession as above; which was an interpolation of the translator's, and has misguided some to infer, as if the Bishop was condemned wrongfully, and through revenge for his recovering of lands, before-mentioned (*), as a late editor of Sir James Ware has observed; where he mentions all Sir James says, which signifies no more, than that the Bishop was exceeding penitent, and with abundance of tears and groans, bewailed the sins of his past life (39).

He also adds, that 'Sir James Ware, at the time of Bishop Atherton's execution, was a member of the Privy-Council, and had opportunities enough of knowing the truth; and zeal enough to declare it, if there had been room to have acquitted him.' Then he quotes many places in Dr Bernard, as we have done, to prove the Bishop's guilt: So leaves the Reader to judge, whether those exaggerated expressions of the Bishop can be construed to relate to the commission of common frailties, or to the crime for which he was brought to punishment? Whether he fell a sacrifice to his litigations, rather than to justice? or, whether Dr Bernard acquits him, when he tells us, he was justly condemned? And lastly says, he believes, 'No body can be so unjust to think, that I cast a blemish upon the order, by relating the miserable fate of one of their body (40).'

This is all we have met with of the capital crimes, which produced this condemnation. But had that Trial of Bishop Atherton, which lasted so long a while, or the complaint in Parliament, been ever published, or a fair and proper extract of it; as it might have been, without any reproach to the Prelacy; as that execrable affair of the Lord Audley, has been often printed (41), without any reflection on the Peerage; the law might then be found to have laid hold of no more than it had cause to do, and the justice of it, might have been more positively maintained: Then also we might better have seen, whether through any temptations to explain the Bishop's story, which the Doctor's blind book may have been the source of, he has been loaded with any greater burden of offences, than he drew upon himself, which was heavy enough, God wot: It might moreover, by the shameful punishment denounced on those offences, have scared others more from committing them, and prevented the recompliments of his Case, under the pretence of fairly representing it, but falsely glossing it over, with misguiding principles and suspected partiality, not so much to the cloth, as the crimes. It is not improbable but that Trial is in being; or some Narrative of it, more compleat than any account of the Bishop's condemnation that has been exhibited; because the names of the witnesses have been imparted to the publick, or several of them; as, besides the menial servant, who swore home against the Bishop, seemingly the same before-named; there was another, called Howell Powell, a man of good substance in Waterford; another named White, was the Sheriff of that city; and there was also one Butler, a Counsellor at Law, Recorder of the city at that time, and a man of interest and fortune; and said to be the fiercest of his persecutors: But their characters are all disparaged to us; they are said, none of them to have prospered after it; and 'tis laboured to make us imagine, it was a judgment upon them, for this conspiracy (42). But if that Trial is in being, or any tolerable account of it; as the light of Truth has the surprising faculty of struggling thro' dark clouds, she possibly may, one time or other, oblige the world with it; to the further defeat of falshood, and terror of all backsliders, foregoing short view of his life, for no other end, but the benefit which may accrue, from the Abstract we shall here subjoin of The Week's Preparation he made for his death [H]; which

In which is to be shown, how after his condemnation, he judged and condemned himself for his heinous sins, and the dreadful sufferings he endured for the same. On Saturday the 28th of November, being the day after his sentence, Dr Bernard went first to see him in Dublin castle; and after having had some speech with him, of the scandal of the fact, justice of the sentence, and misery of his condition, without repentance (43); he, in an hour's time, made him pliable to attention, determined to open himself unreservedly to him, desirous of being made sensible of what might be his future state, and that he would see the end of him. The Doctor then, first advised him to lay aside his rich cloaths, to let the chamber be kept dark, to admit of no company, but such as came to give him spiritual counsel, and so to commit himself close prisoner to his thoughts; to eat in solitude; give himself to fasting; even to the afflicting of his body, which he had so pampered, as a means to affect the sorrow of his soul; and also, to get his coffin made, and have it in his chamber (44). Thus he was by degrees, not only brought to recollect all his transgressions; but, the more entirely to discharge his conscience, he drew out the black corruptions therein, with his own pen, all into one Indictment; that he might at once, as in a glass, view the face of his soul (45). And then, to the further astonishment of himself, when he had added his marginal aggravations, of time, place, person, and other circumstances, they appeared exceeding sinful. His severe and publick reprehension of others, for the crimes he had committed, his relapses, and repetitions of them, he sadly lamented, and grieved for a receipt to augment his grief. All my friends, said he, as ashamed of me, have forsaken me; but if God withdraw his grace, what shall I do? so begged the Doctor to get some compassionate people in the town to pray for him; for which he thought there was more cause, than for any bodily sickness (46). He saw there was a fountain of salvation opened to him for sin and for uncleanness, but like the poor impotent man at the pool of Bethesda, wanted one to put him in (47); and returned God hearty thanks for sending a brother to assist him. Thus did he wrestle for a proportionable measure of sorrow, all Monday and part of Tuesday. The next day he kept a fast; and was then so altered, that, such a countenance, says the Doctor, of a perplexed soul, did I never see, as he seemed to me that morning, so sore had the weight of his sins pressed his feeble conscience that night, in a private audit between God and himself (48). In this sense of his wretched condition, and loathing of himself, he said to the Doctor, Look not upon me, as one that hath had some honour in the Church, from which I am worthily fallen; but as upon the most abject, base person in the world. So set his whole heart open indeed, in a plenary, particular confession, of all his sins he could remember from his youth till now (49); with such bitter tears, and sorrowful sighs, kneeling, or prostrate on the ground, as made the Doctor himself weep more, than he had ever done at the loss of the dearest friend (50). Then in his prayers, who had never before felt what belonged to them, he was earnest and vehement to admiration. He wished for the fears and troubles of Francis Spira, whose life and death he had a great desire to read, but the Doctor thought it unfit. He was troubled at the Doctor's weeping, because himself could outwardly express no greater sign of compunction, and had many other terrible conflicts. Fears, doubts, and fits of despair, would sometimes shake him, and he ran through many trials with the Doctor, for signs of saving grace (51). He repented that the night before he had slept so quietly; and the next night, he was kept awake with such intolerable horrors of mind, that in the morning he repented of his repentance. His time now grew so short, that as he had not years, nor months, nor weeks to live, he counted how many hours his misdeeds had allowed him. But here there was a sudden alteration in the government, which gave some persons a notion it might be in his favour; for Sir Christopher Wandefford, the new Deputy of Ireland, while the Earl of Strafford was in England preparing for his own Trial, now dying, on Thursday the 3d of December, some suppositions of a reprieve were suggested to the Bishop, at least till another Governor succeeded; but it moved him not; nor any body else to promote it, especially of the Cloth, who thought it necessary he should suffer for expiation, and that no umbrage might lie upon the Church. And the Bishop himself was now so well prepared, that he chose rather a present and deserved death, than the prolonging of an ignominious life; and though he had a thought to have petitioned for being beheaded, he answered himself by himself, with indignation, That a dog's death was too good him (52), and so judged himself to the last. He wished his grave were at the bottom of the sea, and a mill-stone about his neck; and sent for, and charged the Clerk of St John's, and the Verger of Christ-Church, not to suffer him to be buried in an ordinary part of the church-yard, but in a remote corner, where no body had been buried before (53). And now came on many other acts of his penitence, as desire of making satisfaction, restitution, and payments of debts, as before-mentioned. It was his desire to have been degraded of the honours he had received, either in the church or university. He gave good counsel to all about him, not omitting the Doctor (54), and expressed his intentions to have reformed his family, and given over all his law-business. The stories he had read of some pious and penitent men's death, had now animated him against the terrors of his own; inasmuch, that the night before he was to leave this world, it was a wonder to see his resolution in taking leave of all his family, especially his children, and giving them good advice; and some hours after, in taking his last farewell of his wife, with heavenly counsel and comfort, in her most passionate sorrow. After his week's preparation came Saturday morning, which was execution day; when he told the Doctor, that if they did not bury him 'till Sunday, he would be desired to preach: But I pray speak no good of me (55) only what, abating any scandal to the ministry, would render him an example of useful warning to mankind. Now he appeared totally weaned from the world, and full of inward consolation, as if he had already been in the suburbs of Heaven. Shed abundance of tears again; but as of sorrow before, now of joy; and here the Doctor makes him a deep interpreter of the mystical writings, expounding the hidden manna, and white stone, in the Revelations, to signify the blessed state he was in (56). And here we have his other holy raptures, upon the sweet and comfortable temper he was strengthened with, to receive his doom. After he had taken leave of the prisoners in the castle, and refreshed his soul with the morning service, he made, as some refreshment for his body, a slight breakfast, upon a little salt-butter, brown bread, and small beer, the better to make his speech; hoping at night to be invited to the Supper of the Lamb, in another World (57). When the time drew nigh, and he heard the crowd gathering, his heart quivered at the thoughts of his children, but he recovered himself, and gave away, as tokens of remembrance, his gloves, staff, girdle, and pious books to some friends, and to the Doctor his seal-ring (58). Then the Sheriff of the county, who was a Papist, came to receive him; who, though the Lord Chief Justice of the King's Bench, and Justice Cressley had granted the Bishop's petition, that he might not be pinioned, refused the request; as also, to do it with a strong black ribband, or leather girdle, which were offered; but bound him with a three penny cord, and would have had him held in the coach besides, in a man's lap, as they went (59). At the place of execution, a fellow who got upon one end of the gallows derided and interrupted him, which he bore patiently, and his footman got his head broke for his diligent attendance by the coach-side (60), which moved him. And as he was ready to ascend the ladder, another called out to him about some papers and letters, who was rebuked for the inhuman insult. He then made a large speech; but because he had not penned it down, our Doctor evades relating it, as what would do which he suffered before a great multitude, on Gallows-Green at Dublin, on the fifth day of December in the year aforesaid. And we cannot but believe, that if such a rare example of the dreadful sorrows and sufferings he endured for his vices, both in his penitence and punishment, had been duly known, and considered by many persons in the world, since he left it; it might have preserved them in credit, retained them at home in their own country, and prevented those detections, or those fears of them, which have made Lords as well as Commons, and Clergy as well as Laity, fugitives abroad. Not long before the Bishop was executed, his wife and daughters received the last letters he wrote to them; which are here annexed [I], entirely as we find them, for the satisfaction of

do him wrong, unless he could remember exactly his own words. Yet could give us near ten lines of it, in which he says, I think I am the first of my profession, that ever came thither to this shameful end (61).

And so he goes on till he is entering upon his open confession, and there the Doctor breaks off, and says in his own words; in summe, he owned the justice of the law of man, and that the hand of God was throughout the whole (as if there was something wonderful in all parts of the discovery); 1. In the Witnesses and Informers; some of whom were at dinner with him the day before the complaint. 2. The Jury; whom he believed honest gentlemen, and that they went according to their consciences: and though he thought the evidence was not so clear, but they might have stuck at it, yet, he said it was Digitus Dei (62); the justice of which, he fully and solemnly acknowledged to a friend, at the instant he heard the jury had returned him guilty; though he denied the main thing in the indictment, which the jury laid hold of, as we have before observed. Yet here, in his own conscience, he still applauded and magnified God's justice in it: So burnt a volume of papers he had wrote out of law books in his own defence. 3. In the Judges; who, though they were hot against him, he imputed it only to their zeal against vices which did deserve it: Yet thought, he should not have been denied counsel; and conceived some errors he had pleaded in the indictment, reasonable; but most willingly submitted, as God's hand was in it. 4. In the insatiation of Himself: For that he could have sent his chief accuser into England, and had him indicted for a hand in a stealth there; and by this time have outlawed him, and made his testimony void. That he could have also excepted against twenty of his jury (though just before, the Doctor has said, he believed them very honest and conscientious gentlemen) and have put it off 'till next Term, before which he might have had other thoughts. That he knew the foreman was outlawed also; yet that he omitted these things thro' the height of his spirit, in scorning to stoop to such poor shifts and protractations, and the confidence he had, that there would be no need of them; as trusting in his wit and expressions; which, till now, had not miscarried: But even here also, that he took it to be God's hand evidently, which he thankfully embraced (63).

And these are some of the branches of that dying speech, as Dr Bernard has pruned them off to us, concerning those things he says the Bishop was justly condemned for, and now spoke of to the publick, but not one of them here appears; for though he begun it in the Bishop's words, he ends it in his own. And as the Bishop had opened his whole life to him, as to his ghostly Father, without any extenuation: his said ghostly Father might, in this point, have followed his example, and have been as explicit with the world, as the Bishop was with him; and as a true penitent, did design he should be; when he expressly desired, that a name of infamy might rest upon himself (64); and not be imputed to his profession. But the imprudent or ill-advised concealment of his crimes, yet liberal display of such prodigious repentance, may have proved a detrimental friendship to him, and nourished apprehensions of sins, perhaps beyond measure, to account for such unmeasurable sorrows. But to conclude; after the Bishop had made his speech, he prayed and wept in such a manner, as drew tears from the people, all on their knees about him, even the Priests and Papists who heard him (65); and desired, if any of them, belonging to the town of Waterford, were present, that they would commend him to his neighbours there, and let them know, he had taken notice, that none of the Romish Church, though differing from him in religion;

had a hand in this complaint against him (66): Nor is there the least hint of any who had. He then took leave of all who were near him, put off his morning gown, hat, and black cap, and called to his man for his other cap and handkerchief. When he was setting his foot on the ladder, he would fain have taken a friendly farewell of the Sheriff; who made him no answer (67). So he went up the ladder, pinned the handkerchief about his face with his own hands; then after a short prayer, and giving the signal that he was prepared, a woeful and shameful end was put to a wicked and scandalous life. After he had hung some three quarters of an hour (68), he was cut down, and his corps carried back, and the Doctor with it, in the coach which brought them, to the house where they were received; and that same night, about ten o'clock, when the Doctor had preached a short discourse (afterwards enlarged, and printed) by way of funeral sermon upon the occasion, in St John's church, to satisfy the expectations of the people; the Bishop was buried in the church-yard belonging thereto, according to the directions he had given; and there the Doctor performed the last office; with whose words we shall close this scene of the Bishop's tragedy.

Object not his life, to justify your own: If you remember his life, forget not his death; as the one was offensive, so let the other be useful; as the one made the breach, so let the other repair it (69).

[I] His wife and daughters received the last letters he wrote to them, which are here annexed.] These letters, as Dr Bernard has given them us, are as follow:

'The LETTER to his WIFE.

'My Deare Wife,

'MARKE well these last words of him, who these twenty years and upwards, hath been your husband, and might have so continued much longer, by the course of nature, had not his continued and crying finnes, deservedly drawne this punishment upon him, to be cut off from the living, as unworthy of their society in this life. I suffer for my wickednesse, which I beseech God in his mercy through Jesus Christ to forgive me. In my suffering, you suffer both in your credit and estate, and what else foever concerns this world. This advantage you have of me; I have only left unto me a small time of repentance, but you, by God's grace, may have a large time of amendment; which I would have you improve to the full, and not lose a minute. Turne unto the Lord your God with all your heart. Cloath yourself with patience and thanksgiving. I doubt not but God will have mercy on you, and prove a husband to you, and a father to my children; yea, I doubt not, but you shall live with the same happiness, and greater content, than if I were with you.

'Serve Him, He will not fail you.
'Bring up your children in the fear of God:
'That household which you keep, let it be the servants of God.

'Above all things, be diligent in private prayer:
'Make all your needs known unto the Lord: Undertake nothing, which you cannot find in your heart to begge a blessing for.

'Misconster not these my dying advertisements, which proceed, as in the presence of God, from true affection; that at length, I might really give some supply to my former defaults, and put you in a right way of everlasting comfort; that though we part in this world, yet we may enjoy a more happy of the curious. As for that idle story, which might have been for some time spread among some of the credulous and common people, of his ghost also appearing, as that of his sister's mother-in-law was before rumoured to do, and as if it were to frighten, or torment his prosecutors; it no sooner haunted a Paragraph in one place (u), but a pamphlet arose of it in another; containing an Account of the Apparition of John Atherton, Bishop of Waterford; and said to be published from an original manuscript, in the custody of the late Dr John Quick, and communicated by his son: With Remarks upon, or a full Reply to, The Case of John Atherton, &c. fairly represented, as above quoted. To which Account, and Reply (w), we refer those, who have further enquiries to make upon that subject, or would further elucidate, or strengthen this Caveat to the Ministry and People, as Dr Bernard has before intitled also one of his discourses upon this Bishop; whose own dying will and intreaty was, That himself might be made a useful warning to others.

' happy meeting in Heaven; and after all our afflictions, be there partakers of endlessse blisse. So prayes, and ever shall praye, as long as he lives,

' Your husband,

JOHN ATHERTON.

' Cast not away this paper when you have read it, but keep it as a jewel, and peruse it often; as the legacie of him, who can now give no other.

' Decemb. 1, 1640.

' The LETTER to his CHILDREN.

' My deare Children,

' IT was ever my desire to have seen you well preferred, but God thought otherwise, and my sins would not suffer it; which have not only sentenced me to death, but bereaved me of that small worldly blessing, which I proposed unto you as a patrimony, and evidence of my fatherly affection. And how, now it will be disposed of, or what share will come to your lot, I leave to God; who, as he hath given you body and soul, so I doubt not but wil, of his great goodnesse, provide for your estate. What is left unto me, and cannot be taken from me, I freely impart and give unto you; not dividing it amongst you by shares and proportions, but giving each of you the whole; wherein, though you communicate one with another in my blessing, and last counsel; yet each,

' without wrong to the other, may take and challenge the whole to hersele.

' First, the Blessing of God the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost, light upon you; give you, a true knowledge of his word, a true fear of his will, and a true faith in his promises.

' Let no day passe over you, wherein you do not cal yourselves to a reckoning before you sleep, and make your peace with God, for the offences of that day.

' Be constant in private prayer, twice every day at least, upon your knees; and God wil be a father unto you.

' Do nothing, great or final, without first craving a blessing from God; and forbear that, upon which you cannot find in your hearts to crave such a blessing.

' Be content with whatsoever God shall afford you; poverty or riches: Take heed, repine not at his pleasure; who in the end, though it be sometimes contrary to our fence; works all things for the good of his children.

' If you marry, prefer an honest man that fears God, before all other respects in the world.

' Be obedient to your mother; love one another; and live in hope to enjoy again in Heaven the company of your father,

' Now ready to dye,

' Decemb. 4, 1640.

' JOHN ATHERTON.

' Cast not away this loose paper; but each of you take a copy of it, and preserve it by you as a jewel all the dayes of your life (70). G

ATKINS or ET KINS (JAMES), Bishop of Galloway in Scotland, was the son of Henry Atkins Sheriff and Commissary of Orkney, and was born in the town of Kirkwall in the Stewartry of Orkney. He was educated in the college of Edinburgh, where he commenced Master of Arts; and from thence went to Oxford in 1637-8, to finish his studies under the tuition of Dr Prideaux the Regius Professor of Divinity. Soon after he was appointed Chaplain to James, Marquis of Hamilton, his Majesty's High-Commissioner for Scotland; in which station he acquitted himself so well, that, by the application of his noble patron upon his return to England, he obtained from the King a presentation to the church of Birsa, in the Stewartry of Orkney; where continuing some years, his prudence, diligence, and faithfulness, in the discharge of his office procured him much veneration and respect from all persons, especially from his Ordinary, who conferred upon him the dignity of Moderator of the Presbytery. In the beginning of the year 1650, when James, Marquis of Montrose, landed in Orkney, Dr Atkins was nominated by the unanimous votes of the said presbytery, to draw up a declaration in their names, containing the strongest expressions of loyalty and allegiance to King Charles II; for which the whole presbytery being deposed by the assembly of the Kirk at that time sitting at Edinburgh, Dr Atkins was likewise excommunicated as one who held a correspondence with the said Marquis. At the same time the council passed an act for the apprehending and bringing him to his trial: but upon private notice from his kinsman Sir Archibald Primerose, then clerk of the council, he fled into Holland, where he lay concealed till the year 1653; and then returning into Scotland, he settled with his family at Edinburgh, where he resided quietly and obscurely till the year 1660. Upon the restoration of the King, he accompanied Dr Thomas Sydserf, Bishop of Galloway, (the only Scotch Bishop, who survived the calamities of the usurpation) to London, where the Bishop of Winchester presented him to the rectory of Winfrith in Dorsetshire. In 1677, he was elected and consecrated Bishop of Murray in Scotland, to the great joy of the episcopal party; and, in 1680, he was translated to the

the see of Galloway, with a dispensation to reside at Edinburgh [A]. He continued to govern his diocese seven years, and died at Edinburgh of an apoplexy, Oct. the 28th, 1687, aged 74 years. His body was decently interred in the church of the Grey-Fryars [B], and his death was extremely regretted by all good and pious men (a) [C].

(a) Wood, Ath. Oxon. Vol. II. col. 1170, 1171;

[A] He had a dispensation to reside at Edinburgh. The reason of this dispensation, it seems, was, because it was thought unreasonable to oblige a reverend Prelate of his years, to reside among such rebellious and turbulent people, as those of his diocese were; the effects of whose furious zeal had often appeared in their affronting, beating, robbing, wounding, and often murdering the curates (1.)

[B] His body was interred in the church of the Grey-fryars. His funeral sermon was preached by John, Bishop of Dunkeld; and upon his coffin was placed this inscription:

Maximus, Atkinsi, pietate, et maximus annis,
Ante diem, invita religione, cadis.
Ni caderes, nostris inferret forsitan oris
Haud impune suos Roma superba deos.

Which may be thus englished;

Atkins, rever'd for piety and years,
Thou die'st, and sad religion is in tears.
For ob! did'st thou her righteous cause sustain,
Rome and her gods might tempt our shores in vain.

[C] His death was extremely regretted by all good and pious men. His sincere piety, constant loyalty, singular learning, and true zeal for the Protestant religion, made his death a very great loss to the Church of Scotland. He very zealously opposed the taking off the penal laws in that kingdom; at which time, notwithstanding the infirmities of age and sickness, under which he laboured, he was daily conveyed to the Parliament, where he publicly declared his aversion to the abolishing the said laws, and used all his interest with the members, in persuading them to a firm and constant adherence to the Protestant religion, and a zealous opposition to all designs which might be prejudicial thereto (2.)

A T K I N S (RICHARD), author of some pieces, particularly A Treatise Of the Original and Growth of Printing [A], was descended of a good family seated at Tuffeigh, in Gloucestershire; his father being son and heir of Richard Atkins, Esq; Chief Justice of West-Wales, and one of Queen Elizabeth's Counsel of the Marches of Wales, and brother to Sir Edward Atkins of Lincoln's-Inn, one of the Barons of the Exchequer; and his mother second daughter of Sir Edwin Sandys, of Latimer in Buckinghamshire, Bart. by his wife the Lady Elizabeth Sandys, daughter and heiress of William Lord Sandys of the Vine near Basingstoke in Hampshire, descended from Margaret Bray, the only child of John Bray, next brother and heir to Sir Reginald Bray, Knight-Banneret, and Knight of the Garter, who died without issue. Our author, having been partly educated in English and grammar learning under two very bad masters, was sent to the college school at Gloucester; from whence he was removed, at fourteen years of age, to Baliol college

[A] He wrote several pieces, particularly a Treatise of the Original and Growth of Printing in England. The list of his works given us by Mr Wood (1), consists of, I. The above-mentioned Treatise; printed at London, in 1664, in four sheets, 4to. II. His Vindication, London 1669, 4to. III. A Relation of several passages in the western war of England, in which himself was concerned. IV. Sighs and Ejaculations. These two last were printed with the Vindication. I shall give the reader an extract from his Original and Growth of Printing in England, which he published by order of Sir William Morrice, then Secretary of State. It is transcribed from an old manuscript Chronicle, said to be preserved in the Archbishop's palace at Lambeth, containing an historical account of the introduction of that noble art into this kingdom; and is as follows. 'Thomas Boucher, Archbishop of Canterbury, moved the then King (Henry VI) to use all possible means for procuring a mould (for so it was called) to be brought into this kingdom. The King, (a good man, and much given to works of this nature) readily hearkened to the motion, and taking private advice how to effect this design, concluded it could not be brought about without great secrecy, and a considerable sum of money given to such person or persons, as would draw off some of the workmen from Harlem in Holland, where John Guttenberg had newly invented it, and was himself personally at work. 'Twas resolved, that less than one thousand marks would produce the desired effect; towards which sum, the Archbishop presented the King with three hundred marks. The money being now prepared, the management of the design was committed to Mr ROBERT TOURNOUR, who was then of the robes to the King, and a person most in favour with him, of any of his condition. Mr TOURNOUR took to his assistance Mr CAXTON, a citizen of good abilities, who trading much into Holland, might be a creditable pretence, as well for his going, as staying in the Low-Countries. Mr TOURNOUR was in disguise (his beard and hair quite shaven off); but Mr CAXTON appeared known and public. They having received the sum of one thousand marks, went first to Amsterdam, then to Leyden, not daring to enter Harlem itself; for the town was very jealous, having imprisoned and apprehended divers persons, who came from other parts for the same purpose. They staid till they had spent the whole one thousand marks in gifts and expences, so that the King was fain to send five hundred marks more; Mr TOURNOUR having written to the King, that he had almost done his work, a bargain (as he said) being struck between him and two Hollanders for bringing off one of the workmen, who should sufficiently discover and teach the new art. At last, with much ado, they got off one of the under-workmen, whose name was Frederick Corfells, (or rather Corfellis) who late one night stole from his fellows in disguise into a vessel prepared before for that purpose, and so the wind, (favouring the design) brought him safe to London. 'Twas not thought so prudent to set him on work at London, but by the Archbishop's means, who had been vice-chancellor, and afterwards chancellor of the university of Oxon, Corfellis was carried with a strong guard to Oxon; which guard constantly watched to prevent Corfellis from any possible escape, till he had made good his promise in teaching how to print; so that at Oxford, Printing was first set up in England; which was before there was any printing-press, or Printer in France, Spain, Italy, or Germany, except the city of Mentz, which claims seniority as to printing, even of Harlem itself; calling herself, Urbem Moguntinam artis typographicæ inventricem primam: though 'tis known to be otherwise, that city gaining that art by the brother of one of the workmen of Harlem, who had learned it at home of his brother, and afterwards set up for himself at Mentz. This press at Oxon was at least ten years before there was any printing in Europe, (except at Harlem and Mentz) where also it was but new-born. This press at Oxford was afterwards found inconvenient to be the sole printing place in England, as being too far from London, and the sea; whereupon the King set up a press at St Albans, and another at the abbey of Westminster, where they printed several college in Oxford, and continued there about two years in the quality of a gentleman-commoner. From Oxford he removed to Lincoln's-Inn; and soon after travelled into France, with the son of Thomas Lord Arundel of Wardour by a second venter: but that young gentleman dying before they could proceed farther, he returned home, improved himself in the accomplishments of a courtier, and married. Afterwards, upon the breaking out of the Civil Wars in England, he raised a troop of horse for the service of the King at his own expence; by which he suffered much in his estate. After the Restoration of King Charles II, he was appointed one of the Deputy-Lieutenants of Gloucestershire; in which station he distinguished himself as a loyal subject of the King, and an affectionate son of the Church of England. His character is that of 'an ingenious and observing man, who saw the vanity of this world sooner than others, tho' of elder years; which fitted him the better for another.' At length being committed prisoner to the Marshalsea goal in Southwark, for debt, he died there the fourteenth of September 1677, and was buried in the parish-church of St George the Martyr, by the care and appointment of Sir Robert Atkins, one of the Justices of the Court of Common-Pleas, and Edward Atkins, Esq; afterwards one of the Barons of the Exchequer, both nearly related to the deceased (a).

'veral books of divinity and physic; for the King, for reasons best known to himself and council, permitted then no law-books to be printed, nor did any Printer exercise that art, but only such as were the King's sworn servants, the King himself paying the price and emolument for printing books.' But the authority of this Chronicle may well be called in question for these reasons; first, because Mr Atkins does not pretend to have seen the original, but only to have transcribed it from a copy, sent him by an anonymous friend: secondly, he gives no account by whom it was written, or how it was bequeathed to the library at Lambeth: thirdly, no author besides Mr Atkins, and those who follow him, mention this Chronicle as being in that library: fourthly, it is not to be found there now, the late Earl of Pembroke having employed a person to search for it, but in vain; lastly, there are inconsistencies in it, and contradictions to plain facts, now certainly known. I shall not here enter upon an examination of this subject, but shall refer the reader to Mr Palmer's General History of Printing, where the mistakes of this Chronicle are fully laid open, and the true origin of the Art historically deduced. I shall only add, that the design of Mr Atkins's book is little more than an invective against the company of Stationers, and to prove, that Printing is a branch of the Royal Prerogative, and a Flower of the English Crown.

A T K Y N S (Sir ROBERT) Lord Chief Baron of the Exchequer, descended of a very ancient family, settled at the time of his birth, and long before in Gloucestershire (a) [A]. His father was Sir Edward Atkyns, one of the Barons of the Exchequer, and his mother Urfula, daughter of Sir Thomas Dacres, of Cheshunt in Hertfordshire (b). This Sir Robert of whom we are to speak, was born some time in the year 1621. He received the first tincture of letters, in his father's house in Gloucestershire, from whence he removed to the university of Oxford, where he studied in Baliol college for some time, and was removed thence to the Inns of Court, that is, as may be supposed from his arms in the chapel windows to Lincoln's-Inn, where he applied himself very closely to the study of the Law (c), in which he became very eminent, as well as for his loyalty in those melancholy times preceding, and following the murder of King Charles I. On this account, he was in the month of April 1661, made Knight of the Bath, with many other persons of the first distinction, at the coronation of King Charles II (d). He was also, on the twenty-eighth of September in the same year, created Master of Arts, in full convocation at Oxford (e). Thenceforward, he was considered in Westminster-Hall, as one of the great ornaments of his profession. In 1671, he was appointed one of the King's Serjeants at Law (f), and in 1672, he was appointed one of the Judges of his Majesty's Court of Common-Pleas (g), in which honourable station he behaved with great wisdom and integrity, till the year 1679, when, from a foresight of very troublesome times, he thought fit to resign, and to retire

[A] Settled at the time of his birth in Gloucester.] The family of the Atkyns's did antiently reside in Monmouthshire. Thomas Atkyns, lived in the reign of King Edward III, and died in London, and was buried in the church of St Peter Cheap, 2 Hen. IV, in the year 1401. Richard Atkyns, son of Thomas, followed the profession of the Law, in Monmouthshire. Thomas Atkyns, was son of Richard, and was of the same profession. Richard Atkyns, Son of Thomas died 11 Hen. VII. Thomas Atkyns, son of Richard, died 4 Hen. VIII, and was succeeded by David Atkyns, who married Alice, daughter of an eminent merchant in Cheap-stow, and removed to Tuffeigh, near Gloucester; he died 1552. Thomas Atkyns, son of David, married Margaret, daughter of John Cook of London, and was Judge of the Sheriffs Court in London; he argued the first case in Plowden's Commentaries, and died before his father 1551, and lies buried in Aldermanbury church in London. Richard Atkyns, son of Thomas, was under age at his father's death, and was granted in Ward, to Thomas Wendy, Esq; Physician to King Edward VI, and was found by inquisition to be seized of the manors of Tuffeigh, Hempsted, and Morecot, in the parish of Minsterworth, and of Brickhampton, in the parish of Churchdown, held of the King in capite; and of lands in Sodbury, Belesly, and Tudenham, all in the county of Gloucester. He married Eleanor, daughter of Thomas Marsh, of Wareley, in Huntingdonshire, Esq; and was one of the Justices of the Sessions in North Wales, and one of the Council of the Marches of Wales; he died 1610, and lies buried at Hempsted. Sir Edward Atkyns, third son of Richard, (whose elder brothers have since been extinct) married Urfula, daughter of Sir Thomas Dacres, of Cheshunt, in Hertfordshire; he died one of the Barons of the Court of Exchequer, aged eighty-two years (1). It was Sir Robert Atkyns, whose Life we are now writing, purchased the family seat and manor of Sapperton, from Sir William Pool in 1660 (2). It was remarkable of this family, that there was always some person belonging thereto presiding in some of the courts of judicature in this kingdom, for upwards of three hundred years (3).

retire into the country, which he accordingly did (b). His attachment to the laws and liberties of his country, made him unwilling to afford any countenance, as he must have done if he had continued a Judge, to the arbitrary proceedings which about that time came into fashion, and against which, he had with so much strength of argument, and profound learning declared, in the case of Sir Samuel Barnardiston (i) [B]. In this retirement he acted as became so great a man, for as he did nothing to disturb the government of his country, so he was far from meanly deserting her cause, or that of her friends (k). In July, 1683, when the unhappy Lord Ruffel was first imprisoned, on account of that conspiracy, for which he afterwards suffered, application was made to Sir Robert Atkyns, for his advice, which, in so nice a conjuncture, and when it might have been so dangerous to himself, he did not either refuse or decline. This letter, so curious in point of matter, and so declarative, not only of the prudence and learning, but of the courage and integrity of this worthy person, the reader will find in the notes [C]. The same person to whom Sir Robert wrote this letter, transmitted him, immediately

[B] Declared in the case of Sir Samuel Barnardiston] This was a very nice and intricate affair, and in order to make it clear to our readers, we must give a short account of this case from it's beginning. Upon a writ out of the court of Chancery, bearing date 8 Febr. 25 Car. II, directed to Sir William Soame, Sheriff of Suffolk; commanding to return a Knight for that county, in the place of Sir Henry North, lately dead; Sir William made a double return, in one indenture, specifying Sir Samuel Barnardiston, to be duly elected, and in another, the Lord Huntingtower. This election being examined in parliament, Sir Samuel Barnardiston, was declared duly elected, whereupon he brought his action of trespass, upon the case, for the pains and expence, which he had been at, to obtain his seat in parliament, against Sir William Soame, in the Kings-Bench. The defendant pleaded the general issue, and upon a trial, the jury found for the plaintiff, and gave him eight hundred pounds damages. Sir William Soame, sued a Writ of Error in the Exchequer, and there two of the Judges of the Common-Pleas, and all the Barons of the Exchequer, were for reversing the judgment given in the Court of King's-Bench as erroneous. But Sir William Ellis, and Sir Robert Atkyns, both judges of the Common-Pleas, were of opinion, that the judgment was good, and the argument here referred to, is, That made by Judge Atkyns, in support of his opinion. In this argument he maintains, That the plaintiff had a just cause of action, that the law gave him a remedy, and that he had taken his proper remedy, by bringing an action upon the case. On each of these heads he insisted largely, from reason, law, and history, and then proceeded to answer all the objections that had been made against the judgment of the Court of Kings-Bench. In the course of his harangue, it is manifest, that he was not a little apprehensive of offending the House of Commons, who were wont to look upon themselves, as sole judges in such matters. But by wisely declining to meddle with any points, which did not immediately regard the Record before them, he secured himself from danger, and sustained at the same time the jurisdiction of the Courts in Westminster-Hall, with much courage and learning. However the judgment was reversed, notwithstanding all that he, and Sir William Ellis could say, and so the plaintiff lost his damages, and ninety-eight pounds costs. But Sir Robert Atkyns, in quieter times, thought fit to print his argument, and to intimate, that this case needed a redress, by error in Parliament (4). Nothing however was done therein, even after the Revolution. In the printed collection of our author's tracts, this is placed after his argument, in the case of William Williams, Esq; but for what reason I cannot imagine, since it is prior in point of time, by no less than ten years, the Record in the case of Sir Samuel Barnardiston, being of Trinity Term 26 Car. II, and that in the case of Williams, in Trinity Term 36 of the same King.

[C] The reader will find in the notes. It is not certain, to whom this letter was addressed, probably it was to some noble relation, or to some solicitor, or other very intelligent person, who had the care of Lord Ruffel's affairs. It has also no date, but that may be easily supplied. On the 28th of June, 1683, Lord Howard, who is the person hinted at to be particeps criminis in the following letter, surrendered, and charged Lord Ruffel with High-Treason; this

Lord was tried on the 13th of July following, and consequently, the date of this Letter must fall some time between the beginning of the month, and the said 13th of July (5).

S I R,

I Am not without the apprehensions of danger that may arise by advising in, or so much as discoursing of publick affairs; yet no fear of danger shall hinder me from performing the duty we owe one to another, to counsel those that need our advice, how to make their just defence, when they are called in question for their lives, especially if they are persons, that have, by their general carriage, and conversation, appeared to be men of worth, and lovers of their King and country, and of the religion established among us. I will follow the method you use, and answer what you ask, in the order I find it in your letters. I cannot see any disadvantage or hazard, by pleading the general plea of Not Guilty: If it fall out upon the proofs, that the crime is only misprision of treason, and not the very crime of treason, the jury must then find the prisoner not guilty of treason; and cannot upon an indictment of treason, find the party guilty of misprision, because he was not indicted for the offence of misprision; and treason, and misprision of treason, are offences that the law hath distinguished the one from the other, and the one is not included in the other; and therefore, if the proofs reach no farther, than to prove a misprision, and amount not to treason, the prisoner may urge it for himself, and say, that the proofs do not reach to the crimes charged in the indictment, and if the Truth be so, the court ought so to direct the jury not to find it. Now being in company with others, where those others do consult and conspire, to do some treasonable act, does not make a man guilty of treason, unless by some words or actions, he signify his consent to it, and approbation of it; but his being privy to it and not discovering of it, makes him guilty of misprision of treason, which consists in the concealing it, but it makes him not guilty of treason; and if the same person be present a second time, or oftener, this neither does not make him guilty of treason, only it raises a strong suspicion, that he likes it, and consents to it, and approves of it, or else he would have forborn, after being once amongst them: But the strongest suspicion does not sufficiently prove a guilt in treason, nor can it go for any evidence, and that upon two accounts. First, the proofs in case of treason must be plain, and clear, and positive, and not by inference or argument, or the strongest suspicion imaginable; thus saith Sir Edward Coke, in many places in his 3d Institutes in the chapter of High-Treason. Secondly, In an indictment of High-Treason, there must not only be a general charge of treason, nor is it enough to set forth of what sort or species the treason is: As killing the King, or levying war against him, or coining money, or the like; but there must be also set forth some overt or open act, as the Statute of the 25th of Edward III, calls it, or some instance, given by the party or offender, whereby it may appear, he did consent to it, and consult, and approve of it: And if the barely being present, should be taken, and construed, to be a sufficient overt, or open act, or instance, then there is no difference between treason, immediately on that noble Lord's conviction, a full and exact account of his trial, and the evidence on both sides, on which Sir Robert wrote his remarks freely, with such a spirit of candour, loyalty, and zeal for the laws, as will always do honour to his memory (l). This letter which is to be found in his printed works, is dated the twenty-third of July, 1683, two days after Lord Ruffel was executed, which however could not be known to him at that distance (m). His great zeal for liberty, and his known affection for several persons, at that time under the displeasure of the government, would certainly have drawn him into some inconveniences, if his own prudence in keeping very little correspondence, the popular opinion of his great integrity, and the King's personal esteem, had not protected him. We may be the more fully persuaded of this, from the following instance. One Mr Laurence Braddon, having taken upon him to prosecute the discovery of what he called the Earl of Effex's murder, whom he supposed to have been assassinated in the Tower, though the Coroner's inquest had found him felo de se; applied himself to one Mr Hugh Speke, a young gentleman of fortune, and who had the honour to be well acquainted with Sir Robert Atkins, to whom he wrote a very warm letter, in recommendation both of Mr Braddon and the design he was upon, intreating Sir Robert to assist him therein. This letter however, never came to Sir Robert's hand, for Mr Braddon being apprehended in the country, this letter was found upon him, and though in February 1683-4, he was convicted at the King's-Bench-Bar for a misdemeanor, in conspiring to make the people believe, that the Earl of Effex was murdered, and with him Mr Hugh Speke, merely for writing the aforesaid letter, for which he was fined a thousand pounds, yet Sir Robert Atkyns son, and misprison of treason; for the being present without consenting, makes no more than misprison; therefore there must be something more than being barely present to make a man guilty of treason, especially since the law requires an overt or open act, to be proved against the prisoner accused. See Sir Edward Coke's 3d Institutes, fol. 12, upon those words of the statute (per overt fact) and that there ought to be direct and manifest proofs, and not bare suspicions or presumptions, be they never so strong and violent. See the same fol. in the upper part of it, upon the word Proveablement. And the statute of the 5th of Edward VI, cap. ii. requires, that there should be two witnesses to prove the crime; so that if there be but one witness, let him be never so credible a person, and never so positive, yet if there be no other proof, the party ought to be found not guilty; and those two witnesses must prove the person guilty of the same sort or species of treason. As for example, if the indictment be for that species of treason, of conspiring the King's death, both witnesses must prove some fact, or words tending to that very sort of treason; but if there be two witnesses, and one proves the prisoner conspired the death of the King, and the other witness prove the conspiring to do some other sort of treason, this comes not home to prove the prisoner guilty upon that indictment; for the law will not take away a man's life in treason, upon the testimony and credit of one witness; it is so tender of a man's life, the crime and the forfeitures are so great and heavy. And as there must be two witnesses, so by the statute made in the thirteenth year of his present Majesty, cap. i. (intituled, for the safety of his Majesty's person) those two witnesses must not only be lawful, but also credible persons. See that statute in the 5th paragraph, and the prisoner must be allowed to object against the credit of all, or any of the witnesses; and if there be but one witness of clear and good credit, and the rest not credible, then the testimony of those that are not credible must go for nothing, by the words and meaning of this statute: See the statute. Now were I a jury-man, I should think no such witness a credible witness, as should appear either by his own testimony, or upon proof made by others against him, to have been particeps criminis, for that proves him to be a bad, and consequently not so credible a man; especially if it can appear, the witness has trapped the prisoner into the committing of the crime: Then the witness will appear to be guilty of a far higher crime, than the prisoner, and therefore ought not to be believed as a credible witness against the prisoner, for he is a credible witness that has the credit of being a good and honest man, which a trapper cannot have; and this trapping proves withal, that the trapper did bear a spite and malice against the person trapped, and intended to do him a mischief, and designed to take away his life. Shall such a one be a credible witness, and believed against him? God forbid! Then again, it cannot but be believed, that such persons as have been guilty of the same crime, will, out of a natural self-love, be very forward, and willing to swear heartily, and to the purpose, in order to the convicting of others, that they may, by this service, merit their pardon, and save their own lives. And for this reason are not so credible witnesses, such as the statute of 13 Car. II, does require. Read over the whole chapters of Sir Edward Coke, of high-treason, and of petty-treason; for in this latter of petty-treason, there is much matter that concerns high-treason. I wish with all my soul, and I humbly and heartily pray to Almighty God, that these gentlemen, that have given so great proof of their love to the true religion, and of the just rights, and liberties of their country, and of their zeal against Popery, may upon their trial appear innocent; I am so satisfied of their great worth, that I cannot easily believe them guilty of so horrid a crime. I pray God to stand by them, in the time of their distress. I wish I might have the liberty fairly to give them what assistance I could, in that wherein I might be any way capable of doing it. I beseech Almighty God, to heal our divisions, and establish us upon the sure foundation of peace, and righteousness. I thank you, for the favour you have done me, by imparting some publick affairs, which might perhaps have been unknown to me, or not known till after a long time, for I keep no correspondence. When there is an occasion, pray oblige me by a further account, especially what concerns these gentlemen; and though I have written nothing here, but what is innocent and justifiable, yet that I may be the surer against any disadvantage or misconstruction, pray take the pains to transcribe what notes you think fit, out of this large paper, but send me this paper back again, inclosed in another, by the same hand that brings it. There is, nor ought to be, no such thing as constructive treason; it defeats the very scope, and design of the statute of the 25th of Edw. III, which is to make a plain declaration, what shall be adjudged treason by the ordinary courts of Justice. The conspiring any thing against the King's person, is most justly taken to be, to conspire against his life; but conspiring to levy war, or to seize the guards, is not conspiring against the King's life; for these are treasons of a different species.

Your faithful friend and servant,

R. A.

was never questioned, though his name was so often mentioned in the course of those proceedings (n). It was not long after, that our publick spirited lawyer gave an open testimony, of his unshaken zeal for the laws and liberties of his country, by his excellent argument in the case between the King and Sir William Williams, who was prosecuted by the Attorney-General, for signing an order for the printing of Dangerfield's narrative, by order of the House of Commons, he being at that time Speaker of the House. In this argument, Sir Robert entered deeply into the nature and power of Parliaments, and showed a prodigious skill, not only in the laws, but in the history and antiquities of this kingdom, for which reason, this argument of his, when it came to be printed, was looked upon as a political, as well as a law tract, and as such is still in the highest esteem (o) [D]. In the succeeding reign of James II, he gave another signal proof of his knowledge as a lawyer, and his steadiness as a patriot, by his argument in the case of Sir Edward Hales, which hath been also printed, and, like the author's other works, received with just admiration and applause (p) [E]. This piece he supported by another, in answer to a book published by Sir Edward Herbert, Lord Chief Justice of the Common-Pleas, wherein he endeavoured to justify the judgment given in that cause by authorities (q) [F]. When matters came to a crisis, and things seemed ripe for bringing about that great change, since called the Revolution; Sir Robert Atkyns did all that could be expected from him, to further and promote it. On this account, he was received with great marks of distinction by King William and his royal consort, who, in the month of May, 1689, made him Lord Chief Baron of the Exchequer, Sir Edward Nevill, Nicholas Lechmere, and John Turton, Esquires, being the other Barons (r). This dignity however, did not hinder him for vindicating in print, the memory of the deceased Lord Russell, who, though his attainder was reversed by act of Parliament, yet there were not wanting some, who maintained the justice of his sentence with great eagerness. Against these, Sir Robert Atkyns wrote two pieces with the same spirit and accuracy, visible in his other discourses, though he was then very far in years, and had also much business upon his hands (s) [G]. On the nineteenth

[D] And as such, is still in the highest esteem. The title to this tract is, The Power, Jurisdiction, and Privilege of Parliament, and the Antiquity of the House of Commons asserted (6). The occasion of it was this, An information was exhibited against William Williams, Esq; late Speaker of the House of Commons, for endeavouring to stir up sedition and procure ill-will, between the King and his subjects, by appointing a certain seditious and infamous libel, entitled The Information of Thomas Dangerfield, to be printed and published. The defendant pleaded to the jurisdiction of the court, setting forth, that he was Speaker of the House of Commons, and that in obedience to their order, he had appointed that Narrative to be printed; wherefore he demanded the judgment of the Court of Kings-Bench, whether it ought to take farther cognizance of the matter. Sir Robert Atkyns's argument is in support of this plea, and therein he undertakes to prove three propositions. First, That what was done in this case, was done in a course of justice, and that in the highest court of the nation, and according to the law and custom of Parliament. Secondly, That however, that which was done in this case, was not to be imputed to the defendant, who acted in it but as the servant, or minister, of the Parliament, though in a very honourable station. Thirdly, That these, being matters transacted in Parliament, and by the Parliament, the Court of Kings-Bench ought not to take cognizance of them, nor had any jurisdiction to judge or determine them. To each of these points, Sir Robert speaks freely, fully, and from the best authorities. It must be allowed, that he sometimes digresses pretty far, but the reason is visible; he intended to give the people a just idea of the subject, which at that time was extremely necessary, and it must be acknowledged, that this argument of his admirably answered his purpose.

[E] Received with just admiration and applause The title of this treatise is, An Enquiry into the Power of dispensing with Penal Statutes (7). The reason of it is this: An action was brought in Easter Term, in the second year of King James II, against Sir Edward Hales, for acting as a Colonel of Foot, without receiving the Sacrament, or taking certain oaths appointed by an act of Parliament, to be taken within a certain time; whereupon he was legally indicted in the county of Kent, and convicted, whereby the plaintiff became entitled to the forfeiture of five hundred pounds. To this the defendant pleaded, that the King, by his letters patents, had dispensed with his taking the Sacrament, or the oaths, and thereupon demurred generally: The plaintiff joined in demurrer, and judgment was given for the defendant. This induced Sir Robert Atkyns, to consider at large the doctrine of Dispensations, which in this discourse is fully handled.

[F] Given in that cause by authorities. While Sir Robert was employed in writing this treatise, the Lord Chief Justice Herbert, sent abroad a book entitled, A short Account of the Authorities in Law, upon which Judgment was given in Sir Edward Hales's Case. The reason of his writing it was, because he apprehended a disquisition would be made into this affair in Parliament, and therefore he thought it incumbent on him, to give the clearest account he could, of his own conduct in that affair. Sir Robert Atkyns having before written on the subject, and maintained the reverse of most of the propositions maintained by the Chief Justice, conceived it to be absolutely necessary for him to join to his former book, an examination and refutation of this treatise of Sir Edward Herbert (8). In doing this, he treated him however with all the candour and decency imaginable, and though he leaves no stone unturned to shew the insufficiency of what had been alledged, in favour of the judgment, given in the Court of Kings-Bench; yet throughout the whole, he expresses a great respect for the Chief Justice, and admits, that in the pronouncing this judgment, all the Judges, except two, concurred in his opinion. In discussing the Doctrine of Dispensations, Sir Robert had frequent occasion to mention the Canon Law, and the proceedings in Ecclesiastical courts; but not thinking that what he had said therein was full enough, he resolved to compose another treatise on that subject, which he accordingly did. It is entitled, A Discourse concerning the Ecclesiastical Jurisdiction, in the Realm of England, occasioned by the late Commission in Ecclesiastical Causes. It is a very clear, as well as a very learned piece, containing a great deal of matter in a very little room, so that whoever reads it, and is inclined to pursue the plan there laid down, may be in a short time acquainted with all that is to be met with, in our law or history, on this subject. This tract is generally annexed to that on the Dispensing Power, which is the reason of my giving an account of both in one note.

[G] Also much business on his hands. The first defence of the Lord Russell's innocence (9), was written in answer to a piece entitled, An Antidote against Poison; wherein the last speech of the Lord Russell was examined, and great pains taken to prove, that it was artful rather than sincere; and many arguments added to show, that this Lord suffered justly, and that the complaints of his friends had no foundation.

of October, 1689, the Marquis of Halifax, whom the Lords had chosen for their Speaker, desired to be excused from discharging that office any longer, upon which, The Lord Chief Baron Atkyns, was immediately chosen in his stead, and so continued till the Great Seal was given to Sir John Somers, in the beginning of the year 1693 (t). The last act of this great man's life, which deserves to be particularly taken notice of, is his speech to Sir William Ashurst, Lord Mayor of London, elect, when he was sworn before him in the Exchequer, October 30, 1693 (u). The government was then very apprehensive, and thought it necessary to convince the people of their danger, for which no man was thought to be more fit than the Chief Baron, who discharged his duty with great zeal and spirit, and with proportionable success. This speech hath also been preserved, and will always afford entertainment to the curious, on account of the extraordinary matters of fact mentioned therein (w) [H]. In the beginning of the Summer, 1695, Sir Robert Atkyns shewed an inclination of resigning his great office. He was then in the seventy-fourth year of his age, and might well be esteemed desirous of passing the rest of his days in quiet. Yet it is a prevailing opinion, that his resignation was owing to another and more secret cause, viz. his failing in his design of becoming Master of the Rolls, in the room of Sir John Trevor (x). Some pains were taken to persuade the Lord Chief Baron from this resolution, but he continued steadily fixed therein, so that in the beginning of June, 1695, Sir Edward Ward, then Attorney General, was made choice of, to preside in the court of Exchequer. Sir Robert Atkyns thenceforward laid aside all thoughts of publick affairs, and retired to his seat of Saperton-hall in Gloucestershire, where he spent the last fourteen years of his life in ease and quiet. He died in the beginning of the year 1709, aged eighty-eight years (y). He was a man of great probity, as well as of great skill in his profession, a warm friend to the Constitution, which he was ready to maintain against all opponents. Besides the several learned tracts mentioned in the notes, he is said to have been the author of a treatise, against the exorbitant power of the court of Chancery (z). In the course of his life he was twice married, first to Mary, daughter of Sir George Clerk, of Walford in Northamptonshire, and a second time, to Anne, daughter of Sir Thomas Dacres (a). He left behind him an only son, Sir Robert Atkyns, of whom in the next article, and to him descended three very considerable estates in the county of Gloucester, viz. Saperton, Pinbury, and Swell, with a fine seat belonging to each of them. These estates he entailed, in case the issue male of his son should fail, on the issue male of his brother, Sir Edward Atkyns, Knt. but this settlement he was afterwards prevailed upon to break through (b). Having mentioned this Sir Edward Atkyns, it may not be amiss to inform the reader, that he was our author's younger brother, though his predecessor in the Exchequer, having sat as Lord Chief Baron there, in the reign of King James II. This Sir Edward, was the father of Sir Richard Atkyns, who was Colonel of dation. Sir Robert Atkyns in his answer, keeps close to the printed trial, and endeavours to make it plain, that, according to the rules of law, the indictment was insufficient, and that with respect to the rule of legal evidence, there was a great deficiency in point of proof. Soon after the publication of this answer, and while a bill was depending in Parliament for reversing the Lord Ruffel's attainder, the author of the Antidote appeared again in print. His piece was called, The Magistracy and Government of England Vindicated, &c. Wherein he used a good deal of rough language, and treated Sir Robert Atkyns very tartly. It was generally supposed, that the author of these tracts was Sir Bartholemew Shore, an eminent lawyer, and one of the King's counsel, at Lord Ruffel's trial. Sir Robert Atkyns intimates, so much in his reply, which he called, A Farther Defence of Lord Ruffel's Innocency (10). In this piece he shews, the weakness of his adversary's arguments, and, with great solidity of reason, exposes a practice in the preceding reigns of making florid rhetorical speeches, against prisoners tried for high-treason, on which he expressly charges the death of Lord Ruffel. Sir Robert also insists on the expediency of allowing state prisoners counsel at their trials, and what he advances on this head, is so clear and so convincing, that it raised that spirit among the true Patriots of those times, to which we owe the enjoyment of an excellent law to that purpose. In the same treatise, Sir Robert maintains, that King Charles's guards were troops maintained in defiance of law, the trained bands being as he says, the proper guards of their King and country, and therefore he thinks, the laying an attempt against these guards in the indictment, as an act of overt-treason, was insufficient; and he cites an expression of the Lord Chief Justice at the trial, which seems to prove his Lordship thought so too.

terrible picture of the power and designs of the French King: He says, his intention was to become Monarch of the West, that he intended to subdue England, and settle Popery therein; he magnifies his power at sea, as equal to that of England, Holland, and Spain, taken together. Next he proceeds to shew, that King Charles II, and King James II, had entered into engagements with the French King, in order to make themselves absolute, and to settle Popery here. In the third place, he speaks of the changes made in the coronation oaths of King Charles I, and King James II. After this, he proceeds to compliment the Lord Mayor, assuring him, that the choice made by the city at that juncture, gave great pleasure to all good men. This leads him to speak of the functions of a Mayor, which are very concisely described, and pathetically recommended to the consideration of the person to whom he spoke. At the conclusion of his harangue, he touches again on the French King, with a good deal of warmth. How seasonable this speech was, and of how great service to the government, appears from it's having several editions, and it's being preserved with other curious papers in that valuable collection of State Tracts, in the reign of King William (12), which is so deservedly esteemed. All these pieces of Sir Robert Atkins, have been collected into one volume, and whoever inclines to be thoroughly informed of the true constitution of his country, of the grounds and reasons of the Revolution, and of the danger of suffering prerogative to jostle law, cannot read a better or a plainer book. His stile is strong, but not stiff; there is a mixture of wit, but of such wit, as is proper to the subject; comes in pertinently, and serves to enlighten, not to amuse or mislead, the reader; whatever he says, is supported by authorities, and there is such a visible candour in all his discourses, that if a man does not relish his arguments, he must at least admire the manner in which they are offered. In a word, whether we consider him in his private, nothing but what is great and amiable, worthy of love and of respect, and of that veneration which is due to virtuous men from posterity. E

A T K Y N S (Sir ROBERT) junior, son to the former Sir Robert Atkyns, by Anne, daughter of Sir Thomas Dacres, of Hertfordshire. He was born in the year 1646 (a), and educated with great care under the eye of his father. He became very early a great lover of, and in a short space a great proficient in, the laws and history of his country in general, which by degrees led him to that undertaking, which will for ever preserve his memory (b). As he had a very considerable estate settled upon him, he affected chiefly a country life, and was eminent for all the virtues which could adorn an English gentleman. He was chosen to represent his county in Parliament, as often as he would accept that great honour (c). His knowledge and integrity, induced many of his neighbours to make him the arbitrator of their differences, which he readily undertook, and generally executed to the satisfaction of both parties (d). He married Louisa, daughter to Sir John Carteret, of Haws in Bedfordshire (e), but having by her no issue male, he gave occasion thereby to his father, to settle his estate on the male issue of Sir Edward Atkyns, which settlement was the unlucky occasion of a law-suit between the father and son (f). As for this Sir Robert Atkyns, of whom we are now speaking, though he differed pretty much from his father in his opinions [A], yet he inherited both his prudence and his probity, and was equally esteemed and beloved by men of all parties (g). His design of writing the History of Gloucestershire, took birth from an intention of the same sort in Dr Parsons, Chancellor of the diocese of Gloucester, who had been at great pains and trouble to collect the materials for such a work, in the compiling of which, he was hindered by many great infirmities, and a general declining state of health (h). Sir Robert Atkyns having once conceived the use and value of such a history, thought himself obliged to carry on, and to compleat it, as a just return for that great affection, which the inhabitants of this county had shown for his family, and for himself (i). After once he had undertaken it, he was indefatigable in the enquiry after, and procuring all the numerous helps necessary to so extensive a design, and having succeeded in this scheme of his, beyond perhaps his own expectations, he digested his matter into an easy and familiar method, that after all the trouble he had sustained, his reader might feel as little of it as possible. This great and valuable work he lived to perfect, and send to the press; though he did not survive long enough to see it published (k). A fire which consumed the house of Mr Bowyer the Printer, destroyed a great part of the copies of this History of Gloucestershire, which consequently render it scarce and dear, for which reason it seemed necessary to give the reader a view of it's contents in the notes (l) [B]. This learned and worthy gentleman, resided usually at

The following passage from his history of Gloucestershire, occasioned by his mentioning the siege of Gloucester in 1643, will sufficiently prove the truth of our observation, and account, perhaps, better for the coldness between the father and son, than any detail of family differences (1). 'The unfortunate siege of this city, gave a stand to the King's victorious army; which being raised as has been related, it turned the state of the war, and the King could never after obtain success; which confirms that the greatest of Kings, and the best of men, are not secured from the violence of the wicked. This royal family will always be honoured in the memory of good men, and must have been so throughout the Christian world, had it been as prosperous as it is deserving. King James I, was the most learned King; King Charles I, was the most religious King; King Charles II, was the best natured King; and King James II, was the best friend; which virtue was most eminent, in his tender love to his children, and his steady kindness to his servants. This succession of Kings has been oppressed by their virtues; for peace, religion, good nature, and friendship, ruined them. It is remarkable of this royal family, that the witty King was over-reached by the wit of the Spanish Ambassador: That the religious King was murdered by rebellious saints: The voluptuary was conspired against by men of no religion; and the best friend was betrayed, and forsaken by them whom he most entirely loved. It does not hence follow, that this family will always be unfortunate.'

[B] A view of it's contents in the notes.] The title of this work is plain and comprehensive, viz. The Antient and Present State of Gloucestershire, by Sir Robert Atkyns. It is a large folio, consisting of 859 pages, exclusive of the preface and index. In the first place, our author gives us preparatory instructions for the better understanding the ensuing discourse. These introductory remarks, consist of abundance of curious particulars, such as, An historical account of the several religious foundations within the diocese: A view of our antient constitution, The original of our laws, The rise of our national councils. Then he proceeds to shew, That there were but fifty lay freeholders in Gloucestershire, in the reign of King William I, and of these, their families, descents, and estates, there is a distinct account. We are next presented with a general description of the county, and of the city of Gloucester, then comes the history, in regular order, under fifteen heads. 1. We are informed in what Hundred each parish lies, it's distance from Gloucester, and from the two next market towns, with the best account that can be had of the derivation of it's name, and an account of the religious house, or ancient family, to which it belonged. 2. Contains the historical antiquities of each place, with so much of Doomesday book, as relates to Gloucestershire, and in many of the parishes, the succession of proprietors, is set down for six or seven hundred years. 3. Gives the names of the Lords of manors, and a genealogical history of their families. 4. Shews the deanery each parish belongs to, that is the rural deanery. 5. Sets down the value of every living, the names of the patrons and incumbents from the Reformation. It gives also the value of impropriations and exempted tythes. 6. Exhibits the true state of the first fruits, tenths, and other charges of the clergy. 7. Gives the History of the charities, describes their form, and whatever is remarkable in them. 8. Preserves the memorial of monuments, as a due encouragement to virtue. 9. Enumerates the charities in each parish above twenty pounds. 10. Shews the extent of every parish, the nature of the soil, the brooks, rivers, &c. 11. Sets down the names of the several hamlets hamlets in each parish, with the number of their families, and their distance from the parish church. 12. Gives the number of houses, inhabitants, and freeholders. 13. Contains the yearly births and burials. 14. Informs us of the publick taxes, and how they have altered from time to time in method of collection, and in proportion. 15. Presents us with the trade, the battles and curiosities of each place. The whole is enriched with maps, plans, and curious draughts of all the gentlemen's seats in the county. Ancient records in the tower are duly applied to such places as they have any relation to. And whatever is to be met with in the works of Camden, or Dugdale, in Latin, is here translated into English, that the uniformity of the work might be preserved. There is also exhibited a table of the coats of arms, of the nobility and gentry in the county, antient and modern. In short, all the pains possible has been taken to make this as complete a history of the county, as it could be in the power of one man to frame, and with a little industry, any native of Gloucestershire may from time to time, add whatever is necessary to preserve it always perfect.

Pinbury Park in Gloucestershire, during the summer, and at his house in Westminster during the winter season, where in 1711, he was seized with a dysentery, of which he died on the twenty-ninth of October, in the same year, in the sixty-fifth year of his age, having survived his father somewhat more than a year (m). His corps was carried down to Gloucestershire, and interred in the parish-church of Saperton, where a noble monument was erected to his memory, by Louisa Lady Atkyns, his disconsolate widow (n) [C]. It is worthy of remark, that two authors of the most opposite principles, Anthony Wood (o), and the author of the Annual History of Europe, speak with equal respect of our author (p), which shows that the virtues of some men, can command the respect of all parties.

[C] By Louisa Lady Atkyns, his disconsolate widow.] There is on this monument a very copious inscription (2), containing a just character of the deceased, but inasmuch as there is nothing contained therein which the reader will not find in this life, it has not been thought necessary to transcribe it. Let this however be remarked that it ends thus. His sorrowful widow erected this monument to his memory, tho' he left behind him one more durable, THE ANCIENT AND PRESENT STATE OF GLOSTERSHIRE. E

A T T E R B U R Y (LEWIS), an eminent Divine, and father of the celebrated Dr Francis Atterbury, Bishop of Rochester (a), was the son of Mr Francis Atterbury, Rector of Middleton-Malfor, or Milton, in Northamptonshire [A], and born about the year 1631. In 1647, he was entered a Student of Christ-Church in Oxford, being then about seventeen years of age (b). He took the degree of Bachelor of Arts the twenty-third of February 1649 (c), and was created Master of Arts, by virtue of a dispensation from the Chancellor (*), the first of March 1651 (d). In 1654, he became Rector of Great or Broad Rivington, in the diocese and county of Gloucester; and, after the Restoration, took a presentation for that benefice under the Great Seal, and was instituted again to confirm his title to it. On the eleventh of September 1657, he was admitted Rector of Milton or Middleton-Keynes, in Buckinghamshire; and took the same method of corroborating his title to this living, at the King's return (e). July the twenty-fifth, 1660, he was made Chaplain Extraordinary to Henry Duke of Gloucester (f); and the same year, December the 1st, was created Doctor in Divinity (g). In 1693, returning from London, he was unfortunately drowned near his own house (b), leaving behind him two sons, Lewis and Francis (i). He published three occasional Sermons [B].

[A] Mr Francis Atterbury, Rector of—Milton in Northamptonshire.] He was an eloquent, judicious, and useful preacher, and left behind him the character of a worthy and good man. He was one of the many children of Lewis Atterbury, of Great Houghton, in that county; where the family of Atterbury flourished for many years (1). Anthony Wood tells us (2), he subscribed the Solemn League and Covenant, in 1648.

[B] Three occasional sermons.] viz. I. The good subject, or, the right test of religion and loyalty; preached the 17th of July, at the assizes at Buckingham, London, 1684, 4to. II. The ground of Christian feasts, with the right way of keeping them; preached at a meeting of several natives, and inhabitants of the county of Bucks, in the parish church of St Mary le Bow, the 30th of November, 1685; London, 1686, 4to. III. Babylon's downfall, or, England's happy deliverance from Popery and Slavery, London, 1691, 4to. It is the substance of a sermon, preached at Guildhall chapel, before the Lord Mayor and Aldermen, the 28th of June, 1691 (3).

A T T E R B U R Y (LEWIS), an eminent Divine, elder brother of Dr Francis Atterbury, Bishop of Rochester (a), was born at Caldecot, in the parish of Newport-Pagnel, in Buckinghamshire, the second of May, 1656 (b). He was educated at Westminster-School, under the celebrated Dr Busby, between whom, and our Divine's father, Dr Lewis Atterbury, there was a friendship and intimacy. In the eighteenth year of his age, he was sent to Christ-Church in Oxford, and matriculated in that university the tenth of April 1674, under the tuition of Dr George Walls. The twenty-first of September 1679, he was ordained Deacon at Christ-Church by Dr John Fell, Bishop of Oxford, and Dean of that college. He commenced Master of Arts the fifth of July 1680; and, the year following, was ordained Priest, at Bugden, by Dr Thomas Barlow, Bishop of Lincoln [A]. In 1683, he officiated as Chaplain to Sir William Pritchard, Knt, then Lord Mayor of London. In February 1684, he was instituted Rector of Sywell in Northamptonshire; which living he afterwards resigned, upon his accepting

[A] He was ordained Priest—by Dr Barlow, Bishop of Lincoln.] What hopes that prelate then entertained of our young Divine, appears from the certificate of his ordination, in which the Bishop testifies, 'That he was a person (both for life and learning) capable and worthy of orders,' and that 'it did further appear, by a good and pious sermon he then preached before the said Bishop, that he was able to execute the ministerial function with benefit to any congregation, to the cure of which Providence should call him (1).'

accepting of other preferment. The eighth of July 1687, he accumulated the degrees of Bachelor and Doctor of Civil Law. In December 1688, he married Penelope, the daughter of Mr John Bedingsfield (c) [B]. In 1691, we find him Lecturer of St Mary Hill in London; and, not long after his marriage, he settled at Highgate [C], where he supplied the pulpit of the reverend Mr Daniel Lathom, who was very old, and had lost his sight. Upon the death of this gentleman, Dr Atterbury was unanimously elected, the sixteenth of June 1695, by the trustees of that chapel, to be their preacher; being at the same time one of the six preaching Chaplains to the Princess Anne of Denmark, at Whitehall and St James's: which place he continued to supply, after that Princess's accession to the throne; and likewise during part of the reign of King George I. In September 1707, he was presented, by the Queen, to the rectory of Sheperton in Middlesex, the incumbent thereof being deprived for neglecting to take the oaths within the time limited by law. On the third of March 1719, he was collated by Dr John Robinson, Bishop of London, to the rectory of Hornsey in Middlesex; in which parish the chapel of Highgate is situated. Dr Atterbury never rose to any dignity in the Church, as might have been expected from the power and interest of his brother, who even refused him the archdeaconry of Rochester, in his own gift [D]. At about seventy years of age, he had a slight stroke of the palsy, which occasioned his going frequently to Bath; where he died [E], after a short illness, on the twentieth of October 1731. He published several Sermons and other pieces [F]; and, since his death, two volumes of

(c) He was brother of Sir Robert Bedingsfield, Knt. Lord-Mayor of London, in 1707.

[B] He married Penelope, the daughter of Mr John Bedingsfield. Of this marriage came three sons and a daughter. The first and second son died in their infancy. The third son, named Bedingsfield Atterbury, was born the 8th of January, 1693, and, after a school education at Westminster, was sent to Christ Church in Oxford, and matriculated the 9th of April, 1713. He commenced Master of Arts the 20th of January, 1718, and took Deacon's orders. He was a sober, modest, and ingenious young gentleman. But the hopes, which his parents and friends conceived of him, were soon disappointed; for he died of the small-pox the 27th of December, 1718. Dr Atterbury's daughter, named after her mother, was born the 15th of June, 1699; married to Mr George Sweetapple, of St Andrew's, Holbourn, Brewer; and died in August, 1725, leaving one daughter, who lived to inherit her grandfather's fortune, but died about seven months after him, the 3d of June, 1732, in the eleventh year of her age. Mrs Atterbury, the mother, died the 1st of May, 1723 (2).

[C] He settled at Highgate. When he first resided there, he observed what difficulties the poor in the neighbourhood then underwent, for want of a good Physician or Apothecary; and therefore he applied himself to the study of Physick, and, having attained a good skill therein, he practised it (gratis) occasionally among his poor neighbours (3).

[D] His brother (the Bishop of Rochester) refused him the archdeaconry of Rochester. The editor of Dr Atterbury's sermons has given us some letters, which passed between the two brothers upon this occasion. The first is from the Doctor to the Bishop, upon a report of the death of the Archdeacon of Rochester. The Bishop had, the day before, given his brother reasons, why he thought it improper to make him his Archdeacon. To which the Doctor here replies: 'Your Lordship very well knows, that Lanfranc, Archbishop of Canterbury, had a brother for his Archdeacon; and that Sir Thomas More's father was a puffy Judge, when he was Lord Chancellor. And thus, in the sacred history, did God himself appoint, that the safety and advancement of the patriarchs should be procured by their younger brother; and that they, with their father, should live under the protection and government of Joseph (4).' In answer to this, the Bishop informs his brother, that the Archdeacon was not dead, but well, and likely to continue so: 'When he was in danger, of late, says he, the first person I thought of was you. But there are objections against that, in point of decency—It had been a much properer post for my nephew, if God had pleased to spare his life (5).' This is followed by two others, from the Bishop to his brother, acquainting him, that he had resolved to collate Dr Brydges, the Duke of Chandos's brother, to the archdeaconry of Rochester, then actually vacant; assuring him at the same time, he would use all his endeavours to procure him some good dignity in the Church. 'Such, says he, as you, and I, and all the world shall agree, is every way proper for you (6).' Dr Atterbury was far from being satisfied with the reasons af-

signed by the Bishop for his refusal; as appears by his last letter, in which he says: 'I cannot imagine what indecency there can be, to have raised your elder brother in place under you—There is some shew of reason, I think, for the non-acceptance, but none for the not giving it.—I hope I shall be content with that meaner post, in which I am, my time, at longest, being but short in this world, and my health not suffering me to make those necessary applications others do: Nor do I understand the language of the present times; for I find, I begin to grow an old fashioned gentleman, and am ignorant of the weight and value of words, which in our times rise and fall like stock (7).'

[E] He died at Bath. By his will he gave directions to be buried at Highgate, and that a monument should be erected in the chapel, and an inscription in such or like words as he should leave behind him. All which was punctually complied with: A fluted marble column, with a pedestal and capital of the Corinthian order, surmounted with his paternal arms, being set up on the wall near the pulpit, with an inscription on the pedestal, expressing his several preferments, his marriage, issue, age, and death. Underneath the base of the column, is a book opened; on the leaves of which is, Abi, spectator, et te brevi moriturum scito! i. e. Go, spectator, and know that thou shalt soon die (8). By his said Will, Dr Atterbury gave some few books to the libraries at Bedford and Newport, and his whole collection of pamphlets, amounting to upwards of 200 volumes, to the library of Christ Church, Oxford. He charged his estate for ever with the payment of 10l. yearly to a schoolmistress, to instruct girls at Newport-Pagnel, which salary he had himself in his life-time paid for many years. He remembered some of his friends, and left a respectful legacy of an hundred pounds to his dear Brother in token of his true esteem and affection. He likewise made the Bishop's son (after his grand-daughter, who did not long survive him) heir to all his fortune (9).

[F] He published several sermons, and other pieces. Here follows a catalogue of the works of Dr Lewis Atterbury. I. The Penitent Lady; or Reflections on the Mercy of God. Written by the famed Madam La Valiere, since her retirement from the French Court to a Nunnery. Translated out of the French, by a Divine of the Church of England. 12mo. 1684. [G] Two volumes of his sermons, published by the Rev. Edward Yardley, Archdeacon of Cardigan. These sermons are published in compliance with the Will of the deceased, who devised to the publisher of them, whom he appointed his executor, all his manuscript sermons, and other manuscript books and papers of his writing or composition, desiring that he do revise and select such of them, as he shall think may serve to the honour of God, and bring no discredit to his memory; and that he do cause such to be printed (10). Most of these discourses, the editor assures the public (11), were noted by the author to be printed, tho' they had not all his last hand to fit them for the press; and that, in the revision of them, he hath taken care to do justice both to the author and the reader. We shall subjoin the character he gives of the author and his sermons. 'If nature was more lavish in giving his brother, the Bishop, the most ornamental and useful endowments of a fine genius; a ready wit, an eloquent pen, and an engaging and proper elocution; she was not wanting in bestowing on our author good and sound natural parts, which, even in his youth, he much improved by severe studies. By his constant and repeated pulpit exercises, for upwards of forty years together, he acquired the reputation of a plain, useful, and solid preacher. The drift of his discourses was to make men better Christians, and therefore he never chose to dwell upon nice and high speculations; and whenever he did enter upon those more elevated subjects, his principal endeavour was, to render such considerations useful towards amending the lives of his congregation. His delivery was akin to the style of his discourses, plain and easy, without any manner of affectation. His style has nothing in it of labour, and, perhaps, may sometimes, by nicer judges, be taxed with want of accuracy: But, the truth is this; his sense flowed easily from him, and he was happy in a plain and intelligible way of expressing himself; and therefore was the less careful of turning and smoothing his periods, or studying for the choicest words to convey his meaning; and yet, notwithstanding this, we often are surprized to find in his discourses such beauteous strokes, as, though they do not smell of the lamp, yet the most florid writer might justly be proud of. The great Archbishop Tillotson was his acquaintance, and the works of that excellent Prelate what he admired and studied; and it is not improbable that to this was owing that easy, flowing, style, in which his sermons are indited (12).'

A T T E R B U R Y (FRANCIS), Bishop of Rochester in the reigns of Queen Anne and King George I, was born, the 6th of March 1662, at Middleton or Milton-Keynes, near Newport-Pagnel, in Buckinghamshire (a). He had his education in Grammar learning at Westminster-School; and from thence, in 1680, was elected a Student of Christ-Church college in Oxford (b): where he soon distinguished himself for the politeness of his wit and learning; and gave early proofs of his Poetical Talents, in a Latin version of Mr Dryden's Abfalom and Achitophel [A], an Epigram on a Lady's Fan [B], and

Cognovere pias nondum pia sæcula fraudes
Arte Sacerdotum, nondum vetuere maritos
Multiplici celebrare jugo connubia leges;
Cum vir sponfarum numeraverat agmen, & uni
Non fervire toro, fato adverstante, coactus
Plurima fertilibus produxit stemmata lumbis;
Cum stimulos natura daret, nec legibus ullis
Et sponsæ & lenæ vetitum est commune cubile:
Tunc Israëlis, cælo cedente, monarcha
Concubitu vario vernas nuptaque fovebat;
Quaque erat imperii limes, ibi messe feraci
Transcripti Archetypi sparsim generatur imago.
Ornavit regale caput Diadema Michalis;
Cultori ingratum, vel quod sterilecerat, arvom:
Non aliud par hujus erat; nam plurima mater
Jam pridem multos utero satis ubere natos
Jessidi peperit: sed sacra cubilia vernæ
Cum premerent, soboles obliquo tramite sceptrum
Arripuit, spurioque fuit de sanguine princeps.

Has inter stirpes eluxerat Abfalom, ipsâ
Nec forma inferior, cessit virtute nec ulli:
An magè divino pater inspiratus amore
Ipsum progenuit majore libidinis æstro
Præcocis ingenii, vel quod bene conficia fata
Felicem dederint ad sceptrâ virilibus ansam
Formæ ornamentis, & iter proclive parassent;
Huic Fama in campis sonuit matura remotis,
Invictumque ducem agnôrant socialia regna:
Pace minus oculis, animoque excusserat arma
Quælibet, ut natus tantum videatur amori.

This year, he made his first Essay in controversial writing, in a piece, intitled, An Answer to some Considerations on the Spirit of Martin Luther, and the Original of the Reformation [D]. During his stay in the university, he is generally thought to have borne no inconsiderable part in the famous controversy, between Dr Bentley, and the honourable Mr Charles Boyle (afterwards Earl of Orrery) concerning the genuineness of Pbalaris's Epistles [E]; though Mr Atterbury's name was not made use of on that occasion (e).

[D] His answer to some considerations on the spirit of Martin Luther, and the original of the Reformation.] The Considerations on the Spirit of Martin Luther were published under the name of Mr Abraham Woodhead, an eminent Roman Catholic of those times, who wrote several tracts in defence of the Church of Rome; but the true author was Mr Obadiah Walker, master of University College. Mr Atterbury's Answer was published the 10th of August, 1687, and presently after animadverted upon by Mr Thomas Deane, fellow of University College (4). Another edition of the Answer was published at London in 1723, in 8vo. It is a very learned performance, and written with uncommon spirit and vivacity. It refutes all the objections brought against Luther's doctrines and manners, and concludes with observing, that, 'Let the Spirit of Martin Luther be as evil as it is supposed to be, yet the proof of this would not blast any single truth of that religion he professed; though upon a faithful enquiry it will be found, that his life was led up to those doctrines he preached, and his death was the death of the 'Righteous.' This vindication of that great Reformer induced Bishop Burnet (5) to rank the author among those eminent Divines, who had distinguished themselves by their admirable defences of the Protestant Religion. Our Prelate himself, in that part of his speech, at his trial, in which he vindicates himself from the suspicion of a secret inclination to Popery, appeals to this book, as well as the whole tenor of his preaching and writings ever since: and Mr Wynne, his counsel, observes, in his defence of the Bishop, how grievous it was for one, of his Lordship's character and function, to be charged with designs in favour of Popery, who was the only Clergyman in England, that ever thought it worth his while to draw his pen in defence of Martin Luther, the great instrument of our Reformation from Popery.

[E] He is thought to have borne no inconsiderable part in the controversy concerning the genuineness of Pbalaris's Epistles.] The occasion of the controversy was this. The honourable Mr Boyle, afterwards Lord Orrery, was a student in Christ-Church, and under the tuition of Mr Atterbury, when, about the year 1695, he obliged the world with a new edition of Pbalaris's Epistles; in the preface to which, he complains of Dr Bentley, the King's library-keeper, who had (pro solita sua humanitate) denied him the inspection of a valuable manuscript. This sarcasm so exasperated the Doctor, that, in order to his revenge on Mr Boyle, he published a long letter to Dr Wootton, who was then employed in writing on the State of antient and modern Learning; in which he undertakes to prove, that the Epistles, which go under the name of Pbalaris, are spurious, and probably the work of some modern forger. This drew from Mr Boyle a reply, so full of

At what time he entered into holy orders, is not certainly known: but, in 1693, upon the death of his father, he made application to the Earl of Nottingham, to succeed in the rectory of Milton, which he then called the height of his ambition and wishes, as being the place of his birth. But, being disappointed in his expectation of this preferment (+), and long since tired of a college life [F], Mr Atterbury resolved to quit the university, and produce himself on a more active scene: and accordingly, making London his residence, he soon distinguished himself in such a manner, that he was appointed one of the Chaplains in Ordinary to King William and Queen Mary, and was elected Preacher at Bridewell, and Lecturer of St Bride's (f). In 1694, our young divine preached a remarkable sermon at Bridewell chapel, before the governors of that and Bethlehem hospital, on the Power of Charity to cover Sin (g); to which Mr Benjamin Hoadly (since Bishop of Winchester) published some Exceptions [G]. The same year, he was warmly attacked for his sermon, preached before the Queen at Whitehall, intitled, The Scornor incapable of true wisdom (h) [H]. But the largest field of controversy, in which he ever engaged, was that which opened itself in the year 1700, and continued four years, between him, Dr Wake (afterwards Archbishop of Canterbury) and genteel satire and fine rallery, that, on which side soever truth and argument may be supposed to lie, the wit, and the laugh too, was evidently on Mr Boyle's. This reply was said to be written, jointly, by a select club of ingenious men belonging to Christ-Church; among whom Mr Boyle's tutor was thought to be the chief. And this is plainly alluded to in that witty performance The Battle of the Books, &c. where Mr Boyle is introduced, on the side of the Antients, clad in a suit of armour, which had been given him by all the gods (6). Mr Budgell however is of opinion (7), that Mr Boyle must have been the author of the greatest part of that book, since the same style and spirit runs through the whole piece, so that it must have been formed and put together by one hand; and he never yet heard, he tells us, any reason to doubt but that hand was the late Earl of Orrery. Mr Stackhouse (8) thinks it evident, from the strength of genius, warmth of invention, and easy display of wit and learning, in Mr Boyle's reply, that Dr Bentley was foiled by some eminent master, however decent it might be thought at that time, for a young gentleman to give him the Coup de Grace, and sharpen it with this sarcasm; Pallas to hoc vulnere, Pallas immolat.

[F] He grew tired of a college life. This we learn from a letter of his to his father, dated from Oxford, October 24, 1690 (9); in which he expresses himself thus: 'My pupil (Mr Boyle) I never had a thought of parting with till I left Oxford. I wish I could part with him to-morrow on that score; for I am perfectly wearied with the nauseous circle of small affairs, that can now neither divert nor instruct me. I was made, I am sure, for another scene, and another sort of conversation; though it has been my hard luck to be pinned down to this. I have thought and thought again, Sir, and for some years; now, I have never been able to think otherwise, than that I am losing time every minute I stay here. The only benefit I ever propose to myself by the place, is studying; and that I am not able to compass. Mr Boyle takes up half my time; and I grudge it him not, for he is a fine gentleman; and while I am with him, I will do what I can to make him a man. College and university business take up a great deal more; and I am forced to be useful to the Dean in a thousand particulars; so that I have very little time.'

[G] His sermon — on the Power of Charity to cover Sin; to which Mr Hoadly published some Exceptions. Mr Atterbury's text was, Charity shall cover the multitude of sins, 1 Pet. iv. 8. which words of St Peter he explains in this sense; 'That the virtue of Charity is of so great price in the sight of God, that those persons, who possess and exercise it in any eminent manner, are peculiarly entitled to the Divine favour and pardon, with regard to numberless Slips and Failings in their duty, which they may be otherwise guilty of: This great Christian perfection, of which they are masters, shall make many little Imperfections to be over-looked and unobserved; it shall cover the multitude of Sins (10).'

Mr Hoadly, in the Postscript to his Second Letter to Dr Atterbury, published in 1708 (11), excepted against this doctrine, as farther enlarged and explained by Mr Atterbury. Among other things, he says: 'If God will accept of one duty in lieu of many others, and if our performance of That shall be our Justi- fication, notwithstanding our omission of many others; this is a sort of Salvation, in my judgment, unworthy of the Nature of Man to receive, and unworthy of the Nature of God to offer. — Let me therefore (adds he in the conclusion) intreat you to review the groundless and pernicious doctrine you have unwarily taught on this subject: consider, if Charity ought to be represented as founded upon a Temper inconsistent with Innocence and an spotted Conscience; as productive of vice, and folly, and madness; as leading to the neglect of the principal branches of itself; and the like: and whether it becomes a Christian Divine to fet the several parts of God's Law at variance, and to make the performance of one of them an atonement for the neglect of others, as indispensably required.' We shall not enter into the controversy, but only observe, that the author of the Sermon did not think fit to make any reply to the Exceptions.

[H] His sermon intitled, The Scornor incapable of true Wisdom It was immediately attacked in a piece, intitled, A Two-fold Vindication of the late Archbishop of Canterbury, and of the author of the History of Religion, the first part defending the said author against the defamations of Mr Francis Atterbury's Sermon, and both those eminent persons against a traitorous libel, intitled, The Charge of Socinianism against Dr Tillotson considered. In Two Letters to the Honourable Sir R. H. The second containing remarks on the said Sermon, and a reply to the same Libel. Wherein some right is done to that great and good man Dr Tillotson in the points of the Original of Sacrifices, the Sacrifices of Christ, Future Punishments, &c. And a word in defence of the eminent Bishop of Salisbury. By another hand, London, 1696, in octavo. The author of the History of Religion, vindicated in this piece, was Sir Robert Howard, who, taking himself to be meant, in that passage of Mr Atterbury's sermon, where he says, that 'Some men, who write pretended Histories of Religion, are beholden to the real religion of others, that their histories are not written (12),' observes, in a letter prefixed to the above-mentioned piece, how improper a place (the pulpit) Mr Atterbury had taken to vent a passion unsuitable to Christianity, or common morality. 'Yet he seems (adds Sir Robert) to have a Christian consideration, that hinders him from writing some-body's life: if he means mine, I will free him from his tender Christianity, and own that I write the History of Religion; and if he pleases to use the freedom I give him, I assure him, I shall not be displeas'd with any truth that he can write: but if his usual passion guides him other ways, I shall attend him with such answers, and make him such suitable returns, as will be proper for the occasion, and consider his calling with as little respect, as he did the sacred place where he chose to rail.' The author of the first letter ridicules one of the reasons, assigned by our preacher, Why the scornor seeketh wisdom, and findeth it not, namely, Because the scornor is a man of quick and lively parts, and such men are apt to give themselves a loose, beyond plain reason and common sense (13): 'That is, says our author, the Scornor seeks for what he has, and he misses it, because he possesses it.' And 'According to him, (Mr Atterbury) the only hopeful Candidate of Wisdom is Sancho Pancho.'

and others, concerning the Rights, Powers, and Privileges of Convocations [I]: in which [I] His controversy with Dr Wake, and others, concerning the Rights, Powers, and Privileges of Convocations.] The curious reader will be pleased to see here a short history of this remarkable controversy, with some account of the many books and pamphlets it occasioned. In the year 1697, came out an anonymous pamphlet in 4to, intitled, A Letter to a Convocation-Man, concerning the Rights, Powers, and Privileges of Convocations, supposed to be written by the Reverend Dr Binckes, on occasion of the interruption of those assemblies. The chief points the author insisted upon, were, 1st, The Clergy's Right to meet in Synods, according to the Canons of the Christian Church, and the Constitution of this Realm: 2dly, Their Right of assembling in Convocation as often as a new Parliament meets and sits: And, 3dly, A Right of treating and deliberating about such affairs as lie within their proper sphere, and of coming to fit resolutions upon them, without being necessitated antecedently to qualify themselves for such acts and debates, by a licence under the Broad Seal of England. The opinions of men in both Houses of Convocation were strangely divided about these questions: some thinking them rights entirely due to the Clergy, and essential to the being of Ecclesiastical Synods; others looking upon them as introductive of too bold an Independency, and as encroachments on the regal authority. Among those of the latter opinion appeared Dr Wake (afterwards Archbishop of Canterbury) who, in the year 1697, published his book, intitled, The Authority of Christian Princes over their Ecclesiastical Synods asserted, with particular respect to the Convocations of the Clergy of the Realm and Church of England; occasioned by a late Pamphlet, intitled, A Letter to a Convocation-Man, &c. In this book, he endeavours to prove, 1st, That the right of calling the Clergy together in synods is veiled solely in the Prince: 2dly, That the Clergy, so assembled, have no right to debate or determine any point of doctrine or discipline, without his permission: 3dly, That the Prince may annul, alter, or suspend the execution of any of their constitutions or decrees: and, lastly, that no Synod can dissolve itself without consent of the Prince. The same year, came out an anonymous piece, said to be written by one Mr Wright, a gentleman of the Law, intitled, A Letter to a Member of Parliament, occasioned by a Letter to a Convocation-Man, &c. the author of which maintains the same opinions with Dr Wake. Not long after, Dr Wake's book was attacked by Mr Samuel Hill, Rector of Killington, in an anonymous piece, intitled, Municipium Ecclesiasticum: or, The Rights, Liberties, and Authorities, of the Christian Church asserted, against all oppressive Doctrines and Constitutions; occasioned by Dr Wake's Book, &c. 1697, 8vo. This produced from the Doctor, An Appeal to all the true Members of the Church of England in behalf of the King's Ecclesiastical Supremacy, as by Law established, by our Convocations approved, and by our most eminent Bishops and Clergymen stated and defended, against both the Popish and Fanatical opposers of it. London, 1698, 8vo. Mr Hill defended himself, in a piece, intitled, The Rights of the Christian Church farther defended, in answer to the Appeal of Dr Wake, 1698, 8vo. The next year, appeared, on Dr Wake's side of the question, a small anonymous tract, intitled, A Brief Enquiry into the Ground, Authority, and Rights of Ecclesiastical Synods, upon the Principles of Scripture and right Reason; occasioned by a late Book, intitled, Municipium Ecclesiasticum, 1699, 8vo. And, much about the same time, another, intitled, Some Thoughts on a Convocation, and the Notion of a Divine Right, &c. 1699, 4to. The next year, Mr Atterbury entered into the controversy, and published his Rights, Powers, and Privileges of an English Convocation stated and vindicated, in Answer to a late Book of Dr Wake's, intitled, The Authority of Christian Princes, &c. and several other pieces, London, 1700, 8vo. This book appeared, at first, without the author's name: but, the year following, Mr Atterbury published a second edition, with his name prefixed to it, and very considerable additions, which were printed separately for the use of the purchasers of the first edition. He treats Dr Wake's book as 'A shallow, empty, performance; written without any knowledge of our constitution, any skill in the particular subject of debate; upon such principles as are destructive of all our Civil, as well as Ecclesiastical Liberties; and with such aspersions on the Clergy, both dead and living, as were no less injurious to the body, than his doctrine.' — 'The very best construction, he tells us, that has been put upon Dr Wake's attempt by candid readers, is, that it was an endeavour to advance the prerogative of the Prince in Church matters as high, and to depress the interest of the Subject spiritual as low as ever he could, with any colour of truth.' — 'Were all Dr Wake says strictly true and justifiable, adds our author, yet whether the labouring the point so heartily as he does, and shewing himself so willing to prove the Church to have no rights and privileges, be a very decent part in a Clergyman, I leave his friends to consider — But, when all a man advances, is not only ill designed, but ill grounded, and his principles are as false, as they are scandalous (as I have evidently proved his to be) there are no names and censures too bad to be bestowed on such writers, and their writings (14).' This may serve to shew the spirit, with which Mr Atterbury entered into this controversy. The second edition is dedicated to The Archbishops of the Provinces and the Presidents of the Convocations of Canterbury and York. We shall not enter into a detail of the principles and arguments advanced in this book, which are directly the reverse of those laid down by Dr Wake; but shall give the reader Dr White Kennet's character of it (15). 'The bulk of this book, says the Doctor, the specious preface to it, the number of citations, and, above all, the spirit of assurance, made people think this would determine the whole matter. And then the artificial giving a great and just character of the King, the many insinuating addresses to the Commons, the pretty ways of ingratiating with the inferior Clergy, the high zeal for our Church, and pleading fundamental rights and liberties of it, with the briskness of running down an adversary into the utmost contempt and odium; all this was apt to create in many a kind reception of the book; which when set off with the industrious applause of considerable people, who admire every thing of themselves and their own, gave all possible advantage to the cause and this defence of it.' Mr Atterbury having, in his Rights, &c. occasionally remarked upon Bishop Burnet's History of the Reformation, as too free in censuring the manners of the Clergy, though 'Capable of this excuse, that the author, being a stranger, might not then have thoroughly acquainted himself with the state of our Church, or the character of its members;' his Lordship wrote a piece against him, intitled, Reflections on a Book, entitled, Rights, &c. 1700, 4to; wherein he observes, that the author of the Rights, &c. 'Had so entirely laid aside the Spirit of Christ, and the characters of a Christian, that, without large allowances of charity, one can hardly think, that he did once reflect on the obligations he lay under to follow the humility, the meekness, and the gentleness of Christ. So far from that, he seems to have forgot the common decencies of a man or of a scholar.' His Lordship adds, that 'A book writ with that roughness and acrimony of spirit, if well received, would be a much stronger argument against the expediency of a Convocation, than any he brings or can bring for it.' The year following, Dr White Kennet, afterwards Bishop of Peterborough, undertook a particular reply to Mr Atterbury's book, in his Ecclesiastical Synods, and Parliamentary Convocations, in the Church of England, historically stated, and justly vindicated from the misrepresentations of Mr Atterbury, Part I, 1701, 8vo. In the Preface, he tells us, the Historical part of the argument, in this dispute, had been very falsely represented, and the zeal for our Church was indeed without any knowledge in the constitution of it. He charges Mr Atterbury with great unfairness and dissimulation in the second edition of his book, in which are a vast number of material alterations in points of History and Law, not one of which he has mentioned in the Addenda, tho' he had professed to the world, that all the alterations of moment were contained in those separate sheets. He declares the motives of his own writing to be, 'To reprove that deriding and insulting way of which, however the truth of the question may be supposed to lie, he displayed fo much

‘rallery and wrath, that wounds religion, and does but weaken that Church, whose priests shall so attempt to vindicate her rights and powers; to promote the peace of our Mother-Church, by the King and Parliament’s constant protection of her; and to request his brethren, not to set up for independence and another fatal separation; which none but their enemies can project or wish.’ Soon after, came out a pamphlet in 4to, supposed to be written by Dr Richard West, intitled, The Principles of Mr Atterbury’s Book considered, and his Arguments against Dr Wake, and others, stated and examined; and another in 4to, intitled, Mr Atterbury’s Arguments for the Rights, Powers, and Privileges of an English Convocation considered. The same year, Dr Hody, Chaplain to the Archbishop of Canterbury, published his History of English Councils and Convocations, in 8vo. There appeared likewise, about the same time, an anonymous pamphlet in 8vo, intitled, The Regal Supremacy in Ecclesiastical Affairs. This was followed by Some Remarks upon the Temper of the late Writers about the Convocations, particularly Dr Wake, Dr Kennet, and the Author of Mr Atterbury’s Principles, &c. by a Gentleman in the Country, 1701, 4to. This piece is not intended as a defence of Mr Atterbury, but only to shew, that his antagonists, notwithstanding their pretences to moderation, have failed in that point in their writings. Dr Kennet then published An Occasional Letter on the Subject of English Convocations, 1701, 8vo. in vindication of the temper, with which he had proceeded in the controversy. The same year, came out a pamphlet in 4to, said to be written by Dr Edmund Gibson, (now (*) Bishop of London) intitled, A Letter to a Friend in the Country, concerning the Proceedings of the present Convocation; in which he vindicates the Archbishop’s right to prorogue the Lower House of Convocation, as well as the Upper. This was presently answered by a pamphlet, ascribed to Mr Atterbury, intitled, The Power of the Lower House of Convocation to adjourn itself, vindicated from the Misrepresentations of a late Paper, &c. Then followed a pamphlet, supposed to be written by Dr George Hooper (afterwards Bishop of Bath and Wells) intitled, A Narrative of the Proceedings of the Lower House of Convocation, relating to Prorogations and Adjournments, from Monday, Feb. 10, 1700, (English Account) to Wednesday, June 25, 1701. Drawn up by the Order of the House, 4to. Soon after, came out, by the author of the Letter to a Friend, &c. a Reply to the two foregoing pieces, intitled, The Right of the Archbishop to continue or prorogue the whole Convocation, asserted in a Second Letter, &c. 1701, 4to. This was followed by A Letter to the author of the Narrative, containing A Vindication of the Proceedings of some Members of the Lower House, with relation to the Archbishop’s Prorogation of it, May 8, 1701, 4to. This was answered (it was said, by Mr Atterbury himself) in a piece, intitled, A Letter to a Clergyman in the Country, concerning the choice of Members, and the execution of a Parliament-Writ, for the ensuing Convocation; dated Nov. 17, 1701, 4to. The author recommends a more than ordinary care in the choice of members, considering the present disputes between the two houses; which if they are determined in prejudice of the lower Clergy, there will be an end of the rights and liberties of their house, and they will become from that moment an useless and insignificant part of the constitution. This was followed by a Second Letter upon the same subject, dated Dec. 10, 1701. In answer to both these pieces, appeared The Case of the Præmunientes considered, 1701, 4to: And, about the same time, another Reply, intitled, The late Pretence of a constant Practice, to enter the Parliament, as well as the Provincial, Writ in the front of the Acts of every Synod, considered in a Letter to the Author of that Assertion, &c. 1701, 4to. This was followed by a second Reply, intitled, The late Pretence, &c. further considered and disproved, &c. 1701, 4to. This occasioned A Third Letter to a Clergyman in the Country, &c. in defence of the two former, dated Jan. 8, 1701, by the same hand; which was presently replied to in An Answer to a Third Letter, &c. wherein the great dissingenuity of the author of it is plainly shewn, and the rashness and falshood of his former assertion is fully proved upon him, 1701, 4to. In 1702, came out Dr Atterbury’s Case of the Schedule

stated, wherein an account is given of the rise and design of that instrument, and of the influence it hath on the adjournments of the Lower House of Convocation; and all the authorities urged in behalf of the Archbishop’s sole power to prorogue the whole Convocation are occasionally examined. By a member of the Lower House of Convocation, 4to. This was answered in a piece, supposed to be written by Dr Edmund Gibson, intitled, The Schedule review’d, or the Right of the Archbishop to continue or prorogue the whole Convocation, cleared from the Exceptions of a late Vindication of the Narrative of the Lower House, and of a Book, intitled, The Case of the Schedule stated, 1702, 4to. This was followed by The Parliamentary Original, and Rights of the Lower House of Convocation cleared, and the Evidences of it’s separation from the Upper House produced on several heads, particularly in the point of making separate applications (as a distinct body of men) to other bodies or persons, in pursuance of an argument for the Power of the Lower House to adjourn itself, 1702, 4to. About the same time, Mr Nicholson, afterwards Bishop of Carlisle, published A Letter to Dr White Kennet, in defence of his Historical Library, against Mr Francis Atterbury’s Objections to that work, in his Rights, &c. in which he treated Mr Nicholson, with a good deal of abuse and invective, particularly, for defining Convocations to be only occasional assemblies of the Bishops and inferior Clergy, for such purposes as the King shall direct, when they meet. The year following, Dr Gibson published, A short State of some present Questions in Convocation, particularly of the Right to continue or prorogue; by way of Commentary upon the Schedule of Continuation, 1703, 4to. To this Dr George Hooper replied in his Summary Defence of the Lower House of Convocation, particularly concerning Adjournments, in Answer to a Pamphlet, intitled, A Short State, &c. 1703, 4to. This was answered by Dr Gibson, in his Marks of a defenceless Cause in the proceedings and writings of the Lower House of Convocation, particularly in their third and last System of principles invented by the Vindicator of their Narrative, and repeated in a Pamphlet, intitled, A Summary Defence, &c. 1703, 4to. The same author likewise published, The pretended Independence of the Lower House upon the Upper, a groundless notion, &c. being a Vindication of Synodus Anglicana, and the Schedule review’d; together with the integrity of their author, from the censures and reflexions of a late Pamphlet, intitled, The Parliamentary Original, &c. 1703, 4to. About this time, our author’s original antagonist in this controversy, Dr Wake, published his large work, intitled, The State of the Church and Clergy of England in their Councils, Synods, Convocations, Conventions, and other public Assemblies, historically deduced from the conversion of the Saxons to the present time; occasioned by a book, intitled, The Rights, Powers, and Privileges, &c. 1703, Folio. In the preface, he tells us, that, upon his first perusal of Dr Atterbury’s book, he saw such a spirit of wrath and uncharitableness, accompanied with such an assurance of the author’s abilities for such an undertaking, as he had hardly ever met with in the like degree before. Afterwards he says, ‘In my examination of the whole book, I found in it enough to commend the wit, though not the spirit of him who wrote it.—To pay what is due even to an adversary; it must be allowed, that Dr Atterbury has done all, that a man of forward parts and a hearty zeal could do, to defend the cause which he had espoused. He has chosen the most plausible topics of argumentation; and he has given them all the advantage, that either a sprightly wit or a good assurance could afford them. But he wanted one thing; he had not Truth on his side: And error, though it may be palliated, and by an artificial manager, such as Dr Atterbury without controversy is, be disguised so as to deceive sometimes even a wary reader, yet it will not bear a strict examination. And accordingly I have shewn him, notwithstanding all his other endowments, to have deluded the world with a meer Romance; and, from the one end of his discourse to the other, to have delivered a history, not of what was really done, but of what it was his interest to make it believed had been done.’ Dr Atterbury made no reply to Dr Wake’s book; so that here the Convocation dispute ended for the present, there much learning and ingenuity, as well as zeal for the interests of his order, that the Lower House of Convocation returned him their thanks [K], and the university of Oxford complimented him with the degree of Doctor in Divinity [L]. January the twenty-ninth, 1700, he was installed Archdeacon of Totnefs, being promoted to that dignity by Sir Jonathan Trelawny, then Bishop of Exeter (i). The same year he was engaged with some other learned divines, in revising an intended edition of the Greek Testament, with Greek Scholias, collected chiefly from the Fathers, by Mr Archdeacon Gregory (k). Upon the accession of Queen Anne in 1702, Dr Atterbury was appointed one of her Majesty's Chaplains in Ordinary (l); and, in October 1704 (m), he was advanced to the Deanry of Carlisle [M]. About two years after this, he was engaged in a dispute with Mr Hoadly, concerning the advantages of Virtue with regard to the present life [N], occasioned

there being little after this of any importance written on the subject, till the year 1708, in which Dr Atterbury published, without his name, Some proceedings in the Convocation, A. D. 1705, faithfully represented: To which is prefixed an account of the several ineffectual Attempts at divers times made by the lower Clergy, towards quieting all disputes, and proceeding upon Synodical Business, 4to. This was answered in a Pamphlet intitled, Partiality detected, or a Reply to a late Pamphlet, intitled, Some Proceedings, &c. discovering the many partial representations and unjust reflections, contained in the said Pamphlet, particularly as to what concerns the Proceedings of the Convocation in Ireland, 1708, 4to. Before we conclude this remark, we will transcribe a short story, relating to the disputes then on foot, from a Pamphlet, intitled, The present State of Convocations, in a Letter, &c. 1702, 4to; after premising, that Dr Atterbury had declared, in one of his pieces, that, If he deceived his readers, he was contented to forfeit all credit with any good man for ever. 'After the form of prorogation had been this day (February the 12th) read and signed in the Upper House, as the Clergy were departing out of the Jerusalem-Chamber, Dr Atterbury towards the door was earnestly pushing on some members, and crying, Away to the Lower House, to the Lower House. The Chancellor of London, turning back to him, asked, If he were not ashamed to be always promoting contention and division? Dr Atterbury answered to this effect; That he was not ashamed to be for the rights of the Clergy; that there never was an instance before the last year, where the clergy were dismissed by a prorogation in the Upper House. The Chancellor replied; I am afraid, Sir, you are not to be believed; for I think, by your own confession, you have forfeited your credit with all good men for ever. We shall conclude with Bishop Burnet's severe reflections on our author's conduct in these disputes. Having observed, that the High-Church party of that time had set up a complaint of the want of Convocations, the danger of the Church, &c. he says (16): 'Some books were writ to justify it, with great acrimony of style, and a strain of insolence, that was peculiar to one Atterbury, who had indeed very good parts, great learning, and was an excellent preacher, and had many extraordinary things in him; but was both ambitious and virulent out of measure, and had a singular talent of asserting paradoxes with a great assurance, shewing no shame when he was detected in them, though this was done in many instances. But he let all these pass, without either confessing his errors, or pretending to justify himself. He went on still venting new falsehoods in so barefaced a manner, that he seemed to have outdone the Jesuits themselves. He thought the government had so little strength or credit, that any claim against it would be well received. He attacked the Supremacy of the Crown with relation to ecclesiastical matters, which had been hitherto maintained by all our Divines with great zeal.'

[K] The Lower House of Convocation returned him thanks. On the 8th of April, 1701, Dr Finch, having been sent with a message from the Lower to the Upper House of Convocation, returned with an account, that no message would be received from them for want of the Prolocutor's presence. Hereupon the Dean of Gloucester took occasion to observe, that, since the Upper House refused this correspondence with them, it was now time for that house to return their thanks to Mr Atterbury, for his learned pains in asserting and vindicating the rights of Convocation. Upon which a debate ensued, and it was proposed to change the form of thanks, from learned pains in asserting and vindicating, to his endeavours to assert and vindicate; but, upon a division, it was carried for the first motion, and the thanks of the house returned accordingly (17).

[L] The University of Oxford complimented him with the degree of Doctor in Divinity. In consequence of the vote of the Lower House of Convocation mentioned in the last remark, a letter was sent to the university of Oxford, expressing, that, whereas Mr Francis Atterbury, late of Christ Church, had so happily asserted the rights and privileges of an English Convocation, as to merit the solemn thanks of the Lower House of it for his learned pains upon that subject; it might be hoped, that the university would be no less forward in taking some public notice of so great a piece of service to the Church: And that the most proper and seasonable mark of respect to him, would be to confer on him the degree of Doctor in Divinity by diploma, without doing exercise, or paying fees. The university approved the contents of this letter, and accordingly created Mr Atterbury Doctor in Divinity (18).

[M] He was advanced to the Deanry of Carlisle. Upon his nomination, either through ignorance of the common forms, or an over-hastiness to get possession, he took out his instruments before his predecessor Dr Graham had resigned. This mistake he endeavoured to rectify in the following extraordinary manner. When he first waited on Dr Nicholson, then Bishop of Carlisle, that prelate demanded of him a formal resignation from Dr Graham, without which, he told him, he could not admit him. The new-appointed Dean seemed to laugh at this demand: But the Bishop, who resolved to shew Dr Atterbury no favour, and barely to do him justice, continuing obstinate, the Doctor, to his no small mortification, was kept a whole month at Carlisle, unadmitted, and slightly regarded, till the resignation, insisted on, was produced. This resignation, however, upon examination, was found to have a flaw in it; the date of it being almost a month subsequent to Dr Atterbury's collation, which rendered the latter null and void. Hereupon being returned to London, he contrived to invite the Dean of Wells, his predecessor, to a certain place; where he desired him to antedate his resignation, and, instead of the 5th of August, to date it the 8th of July, that so it might be reconciled to his letters-patent of collation. The Dean of Wells, who thought the proposal a very odd one, desired a day's time to consider of it; and, having advised with his friends, and an eminent Civilian, who all assured him, the practice was both scandalous and dangerous, he sent a civil letter to Dr Atterbury, excusing himself for not complying with his request. When the Doctor found this step ineffectual, he took another no less extraordinary; for a friend of his endeavoured to prevail with a considerable officer in Chancery, to alter the date of the Resignation in the original Record. But this proposal was likewise rejected; and so the publick instruments continued irregular (19). All the reflection we shall make upon this story, is, that in the Civil Law, the clandestine alteration of dates is Crimen Falsi, and the bare attempt to do it Subornatio Falsi.

[N] His dispute with Mr Hoadly concerning the advantages of virtue with regard to the present life. Dr Atterbury's sermon, which occasioned this dispute, was on 1 Cor. xv. 19. If in this life only we have hope in Christ, we are of all men most miserable. Which he explains thus: 'If all the benefits, we expect from the Christian institution, were confined within the bounds of this present life, and we had no hopes of a better state after this, of a great and lasting reward in a life to come; we Christians should be the most abandoned and wretched of creatures: All other sorts and sects of men would occasioned by his Sermon, preached the thirtieth of August 1706, at the funeral of Mr Thomas Bennet, a Bookseller (n). In 1707, Sir Jonathan Trelawny, then Bishop of Exeter, appointed him one of the Canons Residentiaries of that Church; and, in 1709, Sir John Trevor, a great discerner of men and their abilities, was so struck with his fame, and charmed with his eloquence, that he made him Preacher of the Rolls-chapel (o). This year he was engaged in a fresh dispute with Mr Hoadly, concerning Passive Obedience [O], occasioned by his Latin Sermon, intitled, Concio ad Clerum Londinensem habita in Ecclesia S. Elpbeigi (p). In 1710, came on the famous tryal of Dr Sacheverell, whose remarkable speech on that occasion was generally supposed to have been drawn up by our author, in conjunction with Dr Smalridge and Dr Friend (q). The same year, Dr Atterbury was unanimously chosen Prolocutor of the Lower House of Convocation, and had the chief management of affairs in that house [P]. The eleventh of May 1711, he was appointed, by the Convocation, one of the Committee for comparing Mr Whiston's doctrines with those of the Church of England; and, in June following, he had the chief hand in drawing up A Representation of the present State of Religion (r) [Q]. In 1712, Dr Atterbury was made Dean of Christ-Church

'evidently have the advantage of us, and a much surer title to happiness than we (20).' In proof of which assertion, he endeavours to shew, that were there no other life but this, First, men would really be more miserable than beasts; and, secondly, the best men would be often the most miserable: 'I mean, says he, as far as happiness or misery are to be measured from pleasing or painful sensations; and, supposing the present to be the only life we are to lead, I see not, but that this might be esteemed the true measure of them (21).' This doctrine Mr Hoadly examined, in A Letter to Dr Francis Atterbury, concerning Virtue and Vice (22), published in 1706; in which he undertakes to shew, that Dr Atterbury has extremely mistaken the sense of his text: that 'the Apostle speaks of Christians professing Faith in Christ; Dr Atterbury, of persons practising the moral precepts of religion; the Apostle speaks of the condition of such Christians, in a state of the most bitter persecution; Dr Atterbury, of the condition of virtuous persons, in the ordinary course of God's providence; the Apostle designs nothing by his assertion and supposition, but to shame those ignorant, unwary, professors of Christianity, out of the denial of a general resurrection; Dr Atterbury, on the contrary, draws from them an absolute argument for the certainty of a future state: So that upon the review it seems evident, that Dr Atterbury has mistaken the assertion itself, the persons concerning whom the Apostle intends it, the times to which he manifestly limits it, and the conclusion which he designed should be drawn from it (23).' Mr Hoadly, then, endeavours to shew, that the practice of virtue, even in this life, contributes more to the happiness of mankind, than that of vice; for which, besides the arguments from reason and nature, he produces the express declarations of scripture. Dr Atterbury, in his volume of Sermons, published by himself, prefixed a long preface to the sermon at Mr Bennet's funeral; in which he replies to Mr Hoadly's arguments, and produces the concurrent testimonies of expositors, and the authorities of the best writers, especially our English Divines, in confirmation of the doctrine he had advanced. In answer to this Preface, Mr Hoadly published, in 1708, A second Letter, &c. and, in the preface to his Treatise, tells us, these two letters against Dr Atterbury were designed to vindicate and establish the tendency of virtue and morality to the present happiness of such a creature as man is; which he esteems a point of the utmost importance to the Gospel itself.

[O] His Dispute with Mr Hoadly concerning Passive Obedience. Dr Atterbury, in his pamphlet, intitled, Some Proceedings in Convocation, A. D. 1705, faithfully represented, had charged Mr Hoadly (whom he sneeringly calls, the modest and moderate Mr Hoadly) with, 'treating the body of the established Clergy, with language more disdainful and reviling, than it would have become him to have used towards his Presbyterian antagonist, upon any provocation, charging them with rebellion in the Church, whilst he himself was preaching it up in the State.' This induced Mr Hoadly to set about a particular examination of Dr Atterbury's Latin Sermon; which he did in a piece intitled, A Large Answer to Dr Atterbury's charge of Rebellion, &c. London 1710, wherein he endeavours to lay open the Doctor's artful management of the controversy, and to let the reader into his true meaning and design; which, in an Appendix to the Answer, he represents to be 'The carrying on two different causes, upon two sets of contradictory principles,' in order to 'gain himself applause amongst the same persons at the same time, by standing up for and against liberty; by depressing the prerogative, and exalting it; by lessening the executive power, and magnifying it; by loading some with all infamy, for pleading for submission to it in one particular, which he supposeseth an encroachment, and by loading others with the same infamy, for pleading against submission to it, in cases that touch the happiness of the whole community.' This, he tells us, is 'A method of controversy so peculiar to one person (Dr Atterbury) as that he knows not that it hath ever been practised, or attempted by any other writer.' Mr Hoadly has likewise transcribed, in this Appendix, some remarkable passages out of our author's Rights, Powers, and Privileges, &c. which he confronts with others, from his Latin Sermon.

[P] He had the chief management of affairs in that house.] Bishop Burnet, in his account of this Convocation (24), having observed, that the Queen, in appointing a committee of Bishops to be present, and consenting to their resolutions, not only passed over all the Bishops made in King William's reign, but a great many of those named by herself, and set the Bishops of Bristol and St David's, then newly consecrated, in a distinction above all their brethren, by adding them to the committee, upon the indisposition of the Archbishop and others, adds: 'All this was directed by Dr Atterbury, who had the confidence of the chief minister; and because the other Bishops had maintained a good correspondence with the former ministry, it was thought fit to put the marks of the Queen's distrust upon them, that it might appear with whom her royal favour and trust was lodged.' The same historian informs us (25), that, in this Convocation, a doubt being suggested, whether the Queen's licence, by which she had appointed the above-mentioned committee, did still subsist after a prorogation by a royal writ, and the Attorney-General having giving his opinion, that it was still in force, whereupon the Bishops went on with the business, with which the former sessions had ended; Dr Atterbury thereupon started a new notion, that, 'As in a Session of Parliament, a prorogation put an end to all matters not finished, so that they were to begin all a-new, the same rule was to be applied to Convocations;' in pursuance of his favourite notion, that 'The proceedings in Parliament were likewise to be observed among them.' This being contrary to precedents, and the express words of the royal writ, by which the Archbishop had prorogued the Convocation, the Bishops did not agree to it, but resolved to adhere to the method of former Convocations. And this occasioned a dispute between the two houses, which put a stop to all business, so that they could not determine those points, which had been recommended to them by the Queen.

[Q] He drew up a Representation of the present State of Religion.] Let us hear Bishop Burnet's account of this affair. The Convocation, he tells us (26),

Church [R], notwithstanding the strong interest and warm applications of several great men in behalf of his competitor Dr Smalridge (s). The next year saw him at the top of his preferment, as well as of his Reputation: for, in the beginning of June 1713, the Queen, at the recommendation of the Earl of Oxford, advanced him to the bishopric of Rochester, and deanry of Westminster; and he was consecrated at Lambeth the 4th of July following (t). It is said, he had in view the Primacy of all England, and that his credit with the Queen and Ministry was so considerable, and his schemes so well laid, as probably to have carried it, upon a vacancy, had not Her Majesty's death, in August 1714, prevented him (u). At the beginning of the succeeding reign, his tide of prosperity began to turn; and he received a sensible mortification presently after the coronation of King George I, when, upon his offering to present his majesty (with a view, no doubt, of standing better in his favour) with the Chair of State and Royal Canopy, his own perquisites as Dean of Westminster, the offer was rejected, not without some evident marks of dislike to his person (w). During the rebellion in Scotland, which broke out in the first year of this reign, Bishop Atterbury gave an instance of his growing disaffection to the established government, in refusing to sign the Declaration of the Bishops [S]. Besides which, he constantly opposed the measures of the Court in the House of Lords, and drew up some of the most violent Protests with his own hand (x). Thus he went on, 'till the year 1722, when, the Government having reason to suspect him of being concerned in a plot in favour of the Pretender [T], he was accordingly apprehended, on the

having entered on the consideration of the matters referred to them by the Queen; and a committee being appointed to draw up a Representation of the present State of the Church and of Religion in the nation; after some heads were agreed on, Atterbury procured, that the drawing up of this might be left to him: And he drew up a most virulent declamation, defaming all the administrations from the time of the Revolution. Into this he brought many impious principles and practices, that had been little heard of or known, but were now to be published, if this should be laid before the Queen. The Lower House, he adds, agreed to Atterbury's draught; but the Bishops laid it aside, and ordered another Representation to be drawn in more general and more modest terms. But it was not settled, which of these two draughts should be made use of, or, whether any Representation at all should be made to the Queen. The author of the Memoirs of Queen Anne (27), speaking of this affair, tells us, 'The leading men among the Clergy, especially those, who fought after honour and preferment, were zealous to go hand in hand with the new Ministry, and to strengthen the House of Commons in all their hot proceedings. Among others, Dr Atterbury had a deep share in this business, and led most of the Clergy by his pretended zeal for their interests. This Representation was very long, and contained a great deal concerning the atheism and irreligion of the times, which they ascribed chiefly to the late growth of heresy and schism, and to the printing of wicked and atheistical books, which tended to promote many dangerous opinions; the fault being laid chiefly on those, who had been lately in power.' The Representation in question, tho' never presented, was yet printed and dispersed; and soon after was attacked in a pamphlet, intitled, The Nation vindicated from the aspersions cast on it in a late pamphlet, intitled, A Representation of the present state of Religion, &c. in which the author undertakes to prove, against the Representation, first, that the nation is much mended, in point of licentiousness, and impiety, since the Revolution; secondly, that the Representation gives a disingenuous and unfair account of the spreading of Atheism, Deism, and Heresy, and, whilst it complains of the growth of Popery, advances such notions, as, were they true, would oblige the nation to return to the Church of Rome; and, thirdly, that it has omitted the chief cause of these evils, the misconduct of our spiritual guides; which considered, it is next to a miracle, he says, that the laity are so good and virtuous, as they are at present.

[R] He was made Dean of Christ-Church. 'No sooner was he settled there, says the writer of his life (28), till all ran into disorder and confusion. The Canons had been long accustomed to the mild and gentle government of a Dean (*), who had every thing in him that was endearing to mankind, and could not therefore brook the wide difference that they perceived in Dr Atterbury. That impetuous and despotic manner, in which he seemed resolved to carry every thing, made them more tenacious of their rights, and inclinable to make fewer concessions, the more he endeavoured to grasp at power, and tyrannize. This opposition raised the ferment, and, in a short time, there ensued such strife and contention, such bitter words and scandalous quarrels among them, that 'twas thought advisable to remove him, on purpose to restore peace and tranquillity to that learned body, and that other colleges might not take the infection. A new method of obtaining preferment, by indulging such a temper, and pursuing such practices, as least of all deserve it! In a word, adds this writer, where-ever he came, under one pretence or other, but chiefly under the notion of asserting his rights and privileges, he had a rare talent of fomenting discord, and blowing the coals of contention; which made a learned Successor *, in two of his preferments, complain of his hard fate, in being forced to carry water after him, to extinguish the flames, which his litigiousness had every where occasioned.'

(*) Dr Smalridge.

[S] He refused to sign the Declaration of the Bishops. In that juncture of affairs, when the Pretender's Declaration was posted up in most market-towns, and, in some places, his title proclaimed, it was thought proper, by most bodies of men, to give the government all possible assurance of their fidelity and allegiance; and accordingly there was published A Declaration of the Archbishop of Canterbury, and the Bishops in, and near, London, testifying their abhorrence of the present Rebellion; and an exhortation to the Clergy, and People under their care, to be zealous in the discharge of their duties to his Majesty King George. This paper the Bishop of Rochester, and, by his instigation, Bishop Smalridge, refused to sign, on pretence of a just offence taken at some unbecoming reflections cast on a party, not inferior to any (they said) in point of loyalty. The words objected to were these: We are the more concerned, that both the Clergy and People of our Communion should shew themselves hearty friends to the Government upon this occasion, to vindicate the honour of the Church of England, because the chief hopes of our enemies seem to arise from discontents artificially raised among us; and because some, who have valued themselves, and have been too much valued by others, for a pretended zeal for the Church, have joined with Papists in these wicked attempts; which as they must ruin the Church, if they succeed, so they cannot well end without great reproach to it, if the rest of us do not clearly and heartily declare our detestation of such practices. The reader must be left to judge, whether there be any thing in these words so exceptionable, as to countenance such a behaviour, at such a time.

[T] The Government having reason to suspect him of being concerned in a Plot, in favour of the Pretender, &c. Various methods were attempted (as we learn from the Report of the Secret Committee of the House of Commons) and various times fixed, for putting this design in execution. The first intention was to have procured a regular body of foreign forces to invade these kingdoms, at the time of the Elections for Members of Parliament. But the conspirators, being disappointed in this expectation, resolved, next, to make an attempt at the time, it was generally believed, his Majesty intended to go to Hanover, by the help of such officers and soldiers, as could pass into England, unobserved, from abroad, under the command of the late Duke of Ormand; who was to have landed in the river, with a great quantity of arms, provided in Spain for that purpose. The Tower at the same time was to have been seized, and the city of London made a place of arms. But this design also being disappointed by many concurring events, the conspirators found themselves under a necessity of deferring their enterprize, 'till the breaking up of the camp: During which interval, they laboured, by their agents and emissaries, to corrupt and seduce the officers and soldiers of the army; and depended so much on their defection, as to entertain hopes of placing the Pretender on the Throne, though they should have no assistance from abroad. What share our Prelate was suspected to have had in this conspiracy, appears from the same Report, which charges him with carrying on a traitorous correspondence, in order to raise an insurrection in the kingdom, and to procure foreign forces to invade it. In support of which accusation, three letters were produced, supposed to be written by the Bishop, to General Dillon, the late Lord Mar, and the Pretender himself, under the feigned names of Chivers, Musgrave, and Jackson. This occasioned a Resolution of the House of Commons, March the 11th 1723, That Francis, Lord Bishop of Rochester, was principally concerned in forming, directing, and carrying on a wicked and detestable conspiracy, for invading these kingdoms with a foreign force, and for raising insurrections, and a rebellion at home, in order to subvert our present happy Establishment in Church and State, by placing a Popish Pretender on the Throne.

[U] He was apprehended, and committed prisoner to the Tower.] Two officers, the Under-Secretary, and a Messenger, went about two o'clock in the afternoon, to the Bishop's house at Westminster, where he then was, with orders to bring him, and his papers, before the Council. He happened to be in his night-gown, when they came in; and being made acquainted with their business, he desired time to dress himself. In the mean time his Secretary came in; and the officers went to search for his papers; in the sealing of which, the Messenger brought a paper, which he pretended to have found in his close-stool, and desired that it might be sealed up with the rest. His Lordship observing it, and believing it to be a forged one of his own, desired the officers not to do it, and to bear witness, that the paper was not found with him. Nevertheless, they did it; and, though they behaved themselves with some respect to him, they suffered the messengers to treat him in a very rough manner, threatening him, if he did not make haste to dress himself, they would carry him away undrest as he was. Upon which, he ordered his Secretary to see his papers all sealed up, and went himself directly to the Cock-pit, where the Council waited for him (29). The behaviour of the messengers upon this occasion seems to have been very unwarrantable, if what the author of A Letter to the Clergy of the Church of England, &c. tells us, be true, that the persons, directed by order of King and Council, to seize his Lordship and his papers, received a strict command to treat him with great respect and reverence. However this was, when he came before the Council, he behaved with a great deal of calmness, and they with much civility towards him. He had liberty to speak for himself as much as he pleased, and they listened to his defence with a great deal of attention; and, what is more unusual, after he was withdrawn, he had twice liberty to re-enter the Council-chamber, to make for himself such representations and requests as he thought proper. It is said, that, while he was under examination, he made use of our

Saviour's Answer to the Jewish Council, while he stood before them; If I tell you, you will not believe me; and if I also ask you, you will not answer me, nor let me go. After three quarters of an hour's stay at the Cock-pit, he was sent to the Tower privately, in his own coach, without any manner of noise or observation (30). As to his behaviour, and treatment within those walls, they are neither so material, nor so certainly known, as to deserve a particular narration; though, if his own account may be credited, his usage there was far from being justifiable: for, in his Speech to the House of Lords, he makes this complaint: 'I have been under a very long and close confinement, and have been treated with such severity, and so great indignity, as, I believe, no prisoner in the Tower, of my age, and function, and rank, ever was; by which means what strength and use of my limbs I had, when I was first committed in August last, is now so far declined, that I am very unfit to make my defence against a bill of such an extraordinary nature. The great weakness of body and mind, under which I labour, such usage, such hardships, such insults, as I have undergone, might have broken a more resolute spirit, and much stronger constitution, than falls to my share.' And in a letter of his, which was intercepted the 26th of February 1722-3, there is the following passage, of very dark and ambiguous import: 'You may, says he to his friend, when you see Br—y, impart the story of that villainy to him, and desire his advice upon it, at what time, and in what manner, it may be proper for me to bring that matter upon the stage, and shew what extraordinary methods are taken to get at me, and beg the Lords protection in the case against such vile practice. I hope William has not given in to it, and then my way will (some time or other) be clearer towards a complaint: Whenever it is proper, I think the rascal, my neighbour, may be summoned before the Lords, and made to tell, who employed him to proffer such sums, and be punished by them for such practices.' Who the person is, whom he stigmatizes with so odious a character, is not so apparent; but we may venture to say, it could be no one employed by the government to use him ill, much less to oppress him by methods of violence and corruption. It is true, there was an unhappy misunderstanding between him and Colonel Williamson, Deputy-Lieutenant of the Tower, from his very first commitment; but, whether this dark passage has any relation thereto, we cannot say.

[W] This Commitment—occasioned various speculations among the people.] Those, who were the Bishop's friends, and pretended to the greatest intimacy with him, laid the whole odium of the matter upon the Ministry. They knew the Bishop so well, they said, his love to our Constitution, and attachment to the Protestant Succession, his professed abhorrence of Popery, and settled contempt of the Pretender, and his caution, prudence, and circumspection, to be such, as would never allow him to engage in an attempt of subverting the government, so hazardous in itself, and so repugnant to his principles; and therefore, they imputed all to the malice and management of a great Minister of State or two, who were resolved to remove him, on account of some personal prejudices, as well as the constant molestation he gave them in Parliament, and the particular influence and activity he had shewn in the late election. The friends to the Ministry, on the other hand, were strongly of opinion, that the Bishop was secretly a favourer of the Pretender's cause, and had formerly been tampering with things of that nature, even in the Queen's time, and while his party was excluded from power; but upon their re-admission, had relinquished that pursuit, and his confederates therein, and became a good subject again. They urged, that the influence, which the late Duke of Ormond had over him, assisted by his own private ambition and revenge, might prompt him to many things, contrary to his declared sentiments, and inconsistent with that cunning and caution, which, in other cases, he

of March, 1722-3, a bill was brought into the House of Commons, for inflicting certain pains and penalties on Francis Lord Bishop of Rochester; a copy of which was sent to him, with notice that he had liberty of Counsel and Solicitors for making his defence. Under these circumstances, the Bishop applied, by petition, to the House of Lords, for their direction and advice, as to his conduct in this conjuncture [X]; and, on the fourth of April, he acquainted the Speaker of the House of Commons, by a letter, that he was determined to give that House no trouble, in relation to the bill depending therein; but should be ready to make his defence against it, when it should be argued in another house, of which he had the honour to be a member (y). On the ninth, the bill passed the House of Commons [Z], and was the same day sent up to the House of Lords for their concurrence (z). On the sixth of May, being the day appointed by the Lords for the first reading of the Bill, Bishop Atterbury was brought to Westminster [Z], to make his defence. The counsel for the Bishop were, Sir Constantine Phipps, and William Wynne, Esq; for the King, Mr Reeve and Mr Wearg. The proceedings continued above a week; and on Saturday May the eleventh, the Bishop was permitted to plead for himself; which he did in a very eloquent speech [AA]. On Monday the thirteenth, was master of. And to obviate the difficulty, arising from the Bishop's aversion to Popery, and the Pre-tender's bigotry to that religion, they talked of a new-invented scheme of his, not to receive the Pre-tender, whose principles were not to be changed, but his Son only, who was to be educated a Protestant in the Church of England, and the Bishop to be his Guardian, and Lord Protector of the kingdom, during his minority (30). These, and many more speculations, amused the nation at that time, and men, as usual, judged of things by the measure of their own affections and prejudices.

[X] He applied to the House of Lords for their direction and advice, as to his conduct in this conjuncture. He particularly desired their opinion in relation to a standing order of that House, prohibiting, under a penalty, any Lord to appear, either in person, or by his counsel, before the House of Commons, to answer any accusation there. The Debates among the Lords, upon this occasion, were many; the privileges peculiar to their House were largely insisted on, and the late encroachments, made upon them by the Commons, loudly complained of; but at last it was carried, by a majority of seventy-eight to thirty-two, that the Bishop, being only a Lord in Parliament, and no Peer, might, without any diminution to the honour of that House, appear, if he thought fit, in the House of Commons, and in what manner he thought fit, make his defence and vindication there. The Bishop, however, was not pleased with this concession, nor willing to trust his cause, where he thought himself injured, and even prejudged (31).

[Z] The Bill passed the House of Commons. The tenor of it was this: 'That after the first of June, 1723, he shall be deprived of all his offices, dignities, promotions, and benefices, ecclesiastical whatsoever, and that, from thenceforth, the same shall be actually void, as if he were naturally dead; that he shall for ever be disabled, and rendered incapable, from holding or enjoying any office, dignity, or emolument, within this realm, or any other his Majesty's dominions; as also from exercising any office, Ecclesiastical or Spiritual, whatever; that he shall suffer perpetual exile, and be for ever banished this realm, and all other his Majesty's dominions; that he shall depart out of the same by the 25th of June next; and if he return into, or be found within this realm, or any other his Majesty's dominions, after the said 25th of June, he, being thereof lawfully convicted, shall suffer as a felon, without benefit of Clergy, and shall be utterly incapable of any pardon from his Majesty, his heirs, or successors: That all persons, who shall be aiding and assisting to his return into this realm, or any other his Majesty's dominions, or shall conceal him within the same, being lawfully convicted thereof, shall be adjudged guilty of felony, without benefit of Clergy; that if any of his Majesty's subjects (except such persons as shall be licensed for that purpose under the sign manual) shall, after the 25th of June, hold any correspondence in person with him, within this realm, or without, or by letters, messages, or otherwise, or with any person employed by him, knowing such person to be so employed, they shall, on conviction, be adjudged felons, without benefit of Clergy: And lastly, that offences against this Act, committed out of this realm, may be tried in any county within Great-Britain (32).'

[Z] He was brought to Westminster. The first day, he was disturbed in his passage thither, by the clamours and insults of the mob; but, upon his application to the House of Lords for safety and protection, strict orders were given to seize and secure all who should be guilty of such inhumanity, and a guard appointed to defend his person; so that, all the week after, he passed along the streets very quietly, and without molestation, being pitied, rather than reviled (33).

[AA] His Speech. As it is not our design, and indeed would spin this article out to too great a length, to take a view of the evidence for and against the Bishop, we shall only select a passage or two from his speech, in which he plays the Orator, and endeavours to work upon the passions of his hearers.

'Here is a Plot, says he, of a year or two standing, to subvert the government with an armed force; an invasion from abroad; an insurrection at home; just when ripe for execution, it is discovered; and twelve months after the contrivance of this scheme, no consultation appears, no men corresponding together, no provision made, no arms, no officers provided, not a man in arms; and yet the poor Bishop has done all this. What could tempt me to step thus out of my way? Was it ambition, and a desire of climbing into an higher station in the Church? There is not a man in my office, farther removed from this than I am. Was money my aim? I always despised it too much, considering what occasion I am now like to have for it: For out of a poor Bishoprick of five hundred pounds per annum, I have laid out no less than a thousand pounds towards the repairs of the church and Episcopal Palace; nor did I take one shilling for dilapidations. The rest of my little income has been spent, as is necessary, as I am a Bishop. Was I influenced by any dislike of the Established Religion, and secretly inclined towards a Church of greater pomp and power? I have, my Lords, ever since I knew what Popery was, opposed it; and the better I knew it, the more I opposed it. I began my study in Divinity, when the Popish controversy grew hot, with that immortal book of Tillotson's, when he undertook the Protestant cause in general; and as such, I esteemed him above all. You will pardon me, my Lords, if I mention one thing: Thirty years ago, I writ in defence of Martin Luther (34), and have preached, expressed, and wrote to that purpose from my infancy; and whatever happens to me, I will suffer any thing, and, by God's grace, burn at the stake, rather than depart from any material point of the Protestant religion, as professed in the Church of England. Once more; Can I be supposed to favour arbitrary power? The whole tenor of my life has been otherwise: I was always a friend to the liberty of the subject, and, to the best of my power, constantly maintained it: I may have been thought mistaken in the measures I took to support it; but it matters not by what Party I was called, so my actions are uniform.' Afterwards speaking of the method of proceeding against him as unconstitutional, he says: 'My ruin is not of that moment to any number of men, to make it worth their while to violate, or even to seem to violate, the Constitution in any degree, he was carried, for the last time, from the Tower, to hear the reply of the King's Counsel to his Defence [BB]. On the fifteenth, the bill was read the third time; and, after a very long and warm debate [CC], passed on the sixteenth, by a majority of eighty three to forty-three. On the twenty-seventh the King came to the House, and confirmed it by his royal assent. It is said, his Majesty passed this bill with some regret, being much concerned, as he expressed it, that there should be just cause of dooming to perpetual banishment a Bishop of the Church of England, and a man of such eminent parts and learning. To alleviate, however, in some measure, the severity of of this sentence, the Bishop's daughter, Mrs Morrice, was permitted to attend her father in his travels; and his son-in-law, Mr Morrice, by virtue of his Majesty's sign manual, had leave to correspond with him. On the eighteenth of June, 1723, this eminent Prelate, having the day before taken leave of his friends, who, from the time of passing the bill against him, to the day of his departure, had free access to him in the Tower, embarked (aa) on board the Aldborough man of war, and landed the Friday following at Calais. From thence he went to Brussels; and afterwards to Paris, where he resided till his death, softening the rigours of his exile by study, and conversation with learned men; and by a constant epistolary correspondence with the most eminent scholars, particularly with M. Thiriot, an ingenious French gentleman, for whom he had a great esteem, and who has obliged the public with some of the Bishop's Original Letters, which are chiefly Critiques on several French authors. Bishop Atterbury died at Paris the fifteenth of February 1731. His body was brought over to England, and interred the twelfth of May following, in Westminster-Abbey [DD]. Some time before his death, ' which they ought to preserve against any attempts whatsoever. Though I am worthy of no regard; though whatsoever is done to me, may, for that reason, be looked upon to be just; yet your Lordships will have some regard to your own lasting interest, and that of posterity. This is a proceeding, with which the Constitution is unacquainted; which, under the pretence of supporting it, will at last effectually destroy it. For God's sake, lay aside these extraordinary proceedings; set not up these new and dangerous precedents. I for my part will voluntarily, and cheerfully, go into perpetual banishment, and please myself that I am, in some measure, the occasion of putting a stop to such precedents, and doing some good to my Country; and will live, where-ever I am, praying for it's prosperity; and do, in the words of Father Paul, to the State of Venice, say, Esto perpetua: It is not my departing from it, I am concerned for; let me depart, and let my country be fixed upon the immovable foundation of law and justice, and stand for ever.' After a solemn protestation of his innocence, and an appeal to the Searcher of Hearts, for the truth of what he had said, he concludes thus: 'If on any account, there shall still be thought by your Lordships, to be any seeming strength in the proofs against me; if, by your Lordships judgments, springing from unknown motives, I shall be thought to be guilty; if for any reasons, or necessity of state, of the wisdom and justice of which I am no competent judge, your Lordships shall proceed to pass this Bill against me; I shall dispose myself quietly and tacitly to submit to what you do; God's will be done: Naked came I out of my mother's womb, and naked shall I return; and, whether he gives or takes away, blest be the name of the Lord!'

[BB] The Reply of the King's Counsel to his Defence.] Mr Reeve and Mr Wearg were both men of great knowledge and sagacity in the Law, but of different talents in point of Eloquence. Their Speeches on this occasion were made publick; and they seem to have formed their Replies, designedly, in a different way. The former sticks close to the matter in evidence, and enforces the charge against the Bishop with great strength and perspicuity: The latter answers all his objections, and refutes the arguments brought in his defence, in an easy, soft, manner, and with great simplicity of reasoning. Mr Reeve is wholly employed in facts, in comparing and uniting together circumstances, in order to corroborate the proofs of the Bishop's guilt: Mr Wearg is chiefly taken up in silencing the complaints of the Bishop and his Counsel, and replying to every thing they advance, in order to invalidate the allegations of his innocence. The one, in short, possesses the minds of the Lords with strong convictions against the Bishop: The other dispossesses them of any favourable impression, that might possibly be made upon them by the artifice of his defence. And accordingly Mr Reeve is strong, nervous, and enforcing;

but Mr Wearg, smooth, easy, and insinuating, both in the manner of his expression, and the turn of his periods. Mr Wearg pays the highest compliments to the Bishop's eloquence; but at the same time represents it as employed to impose upon the reason, and misguide the judgment of his hearers, in proportion as it affected their passions; and he endeavours to strip the Bishop's defence of all it's ornaments and colours of Rhetoric. We shall only transcribe a passage from the conclusion of his speech, in which he asserts the lenity of the government in the mildness of the punishment to be inflicted on the Bishop. 'The nature of the punishment, says Mr Wearg, has been much talked of in the course of these proceedings, and great lamentations made upon it; but surely without any reason; for I may venture to affirm, this is the mildest punishment that ever was inflicted for such an offence. His life is not touched; his liberty nor property affected; he is only expelled the society, whose government he disapproves, and has endeavoured to subvert; and deprived of the publick employment, which the government had entrusted him with: The enjoyment of his life, his private estate, and his liberty under any other government, that may be more agreeable, is allowed him. This is scarce to be called a punishment, being nothing more than what was absolutely necessary for the publick security.'

[CC] — A very long and warm debate.] The Speakers for the Bill were, amongst others, the Duke of Argyle, the Earls of Peterborough, Cholmondeley, and Finlater, Lord Lechmere, Dr Willis, Bishop of Sarum, and Dr Gibson, Bishop of London: Those against it, the Earl of Strafford, Duke of Wharton, the Earls Poulet, and Cowper; the Lords Bathurst, Trevor, and Gower; and Dr Gastrel, Bishop of Chester. The principal arguments alledged against the Bill were, the dangerous consequences of such an extraordinary way of proceeding, and the want of legal, and sufficient, evidence against the Bishop: The arguments in it's favour were, besides asserting the legality, and sufficiency of the evidence, the necessity of applying extraordinary remedies to extraordinary diseases, and that, when the very being of the State lies at stake, if the Common-Law cannot reach great offenders, the Legislature ought to exert itself. The Bill did not pass without a strong Protest, signed, Wharton, Strafford, Bruce, Poulet, Dartmouth, Craven, Hay, Bathurst, Gower, Weston, Exeter, Willoughby Br. Cowper, Bingley, Scarsdale, Salisbury, Montjoy, Cardigan, Anglesey, Foley, Osborne, Uxbridge, Arundel, Guilford, Middleton, Hereford, Stawell, Denbigh, Northampton, Fr. Ceftrien, Litchfield, Ashburnham, Trevor, Compton, Masham, Berkley Strat. Pomfret, Brooke, Oxford and Mortimer (35).

[DD] He was buried in Westminster Abbey.] His funeral was performed in a very private manner, attended only by his Son-in-law, Mr Morrice, and his death, he published a vindication of himself, Bishop Smalridge, and Dr Aldrich, from a charge, brought against them by Mr Oldmixon, of having altered and interpolated the copy of Lord Clarendon's History of the Rebellion [EE]. Bishop Atterbury's Sermons are extant in four volumes in octavo: those contained in the two first were published by himself, and dedicated to his great patron Sir Jonathan Trelawny, Bishop of Winchester; those in the two last were published, after his death, by Dr Thomas Moore, his Lordship's Chaplain [FF]. His Epistolary Correspondence with Mr Pope [GG] is extant in the collection of that Poet's Letters. As to Bishop Atterbury's character, however the moral and political part of it may have been differently represented by the opposite parties, two Chaplains, Dr Savage, and Dr Moore. Upon the urn, which contained his bowels, was inscribed, In hac urna depositi sunt cineres, Francisci Atterburi, Episcopi Roffensis.

[EE] He published a Vindication of himself — from the charge — of altering and interpolating Lord Clarendon's History of the Rebellion. Mr Oldmixon, in the Preface to his History of the Stuarts, suggests, that 'The History of the Rebellion, as it was published at Oxford, was not entirely the work of the Lord Clarendon;' that, in the original Manuscript, 'the characters of the Kings, whose reigns are written, were different from what they appear in the Oxford History;' and that the copy had been 'altered and interpolated, while it was at the Press.' As a confirmation of this suggestion, he produces a letter (from Colonel Duckett) in which that Gentleman affirms, that Mr Edmund Smith, of Christ-church, author of the Tragedy of Phædra and Hippolytus, had declared to him, a little before his death in 1710, that 'what was published under Clarendon's name, was only patch-work; and that he himself was employed by Dr Aldrich, Dr Atterbury, and Dr Smalridge, successive Deans of Christ-Church, to interpolate and alter the original;' and that, 'Among several hundreds of alterations and additions, he had made by their order, the application of the famous saying, concerning Cinna

(36) (36), to the character of Mr Hampden was one.' This passage of Mr Oldmixon's preface was translated into French, and published in the Bibliothèque Raisonnée, &c (37), and Dr Atterbury strongly called upon to justify himself; which he did in a piece, dated from Paris, the 26th of October 1731, and intitled, Bishop Atterbury's Vindication of Bishop Smalridge, Dr Aldrich, and himself, from the scandalous reflections of Oldmixon, relating to publication of the Lord Clarendon's history. This Vindication was sent by him, with a letter, to the author of the Bibliothèque, &c. who published them both in French in that Journal (38). The Bishop, in justification of himself, declares, he never saw Lord Clarendon's history in manuscript, either before or since the publication of it, nor ever read a line of it but in print; and that, with regard to Mr Smith, he never (as far as he could recollect) exchanged a word with him in all his life, nor so much as knew him by sight, till after the edition of that history. As for Bishop Smalridge, he was not any way concerned in preparing it for the Press; the revival of the manuscript being solely intrusted to the care of Bishop Spratt, and Dean Aldrich, by the Earl of Rochester, who himself assisted in that work; and all three were persons of known probity and truth, and incapable of conspiring in a design to impose on the publick. He then urges the improbability of any alterations having been made in that history, not only from the express declaration of the editors, in the Preface to the First Volume, that They who put forth the History, durst not take upon them to make any alterations in a work of this kind, &c. but also from the great difficulty, if not impossibility, of imitating the author's style and manner, particularly his characters, which are allowed to be the most distinguished, and beautiful part of the work, and to be really inimitable. And as to the words in the close of Mr Hampden's character, they are perfectly in my Lord Clarendon's manner, and contain nothing new in them, but only sum up in short, what he has scattered thro' different parts of the First Volume. With respect to the testimony of Mr Smith, Dr Atterbury observes, that, as it was undoubtedly false, in regard to Dr Smalridge and himself, so is it as little to be relied upon in regard to Dr Aldrich; his personal aversion for whom, and the well-known reasons of it, making it altogether incredible, that he should have the least share in his confidence, on so nice, or indeed on any occasion.

[FF] The two last Volumes of his Sermons were published by Dr Moore, his Lordship's Chaplain. The editor, in excuse of himself, for not publishing a greater number of the Bishop's posthumous Sermons, since every one will naturally conclude, that he left a great many more behind him, having been a constant Preacher about twenty years, and an occasional one a great deal longer; tells us, in his preface, that the true reason of his not doing it was this: 'He (the Bishop) burnt a good many of them himself at Paris, and, by a writing found among what were left, signified, that these were the only ones fit to be printed; so that, without acting contrary to the Bishop's opinion of his own performances, of which he was certainly the best judge, no more could, and therefore no more ought to be published: And it being from thence resolved, that no more should, the only effectual way, adds the Editor, was, to commit the rest to the flames: which was accordingly done, in my presence, by William Morrice, Esq; his dutiful and worthy Son-in-law and executor.'

[GG] His Epistolary Correspondence with Mr Pope. Among the letters, which passed between the Bishop, and that Gentleman, for whom he had the highest friendship and esteem, is the following, dated from the Tower, April 10, 1723.

'Dear Sir,

I Thank you for all the instances of your friendship, both before, and since my misfortunes. A little time will compleat them, and separate you and me for ever. But in what part of the World soever I am; I will live mindful of your sincere kindness to me; and will please myself with the thought, that I still live in your esteem and affection as much as ever I did; and that no accidents of life, no distance of time or place, will alter you in that respect. It never can me, who have loved and valued you ever since I knew you, and shall not fail to do it when I am not allowed to tell you so; as the case will soon be. Give my faithful services to Dr Arbuthnot, and thanks for what he sent me, which was much to the purpose, if any thing can be said to be to the purpose, in a case that is already determined. Let him know, my defence will be such, that neither my friends need blush for me, nor will my enemies have great occasion of triumph, though sure of the victory. I shall want his advice before I go abroad, in many things. But I question whether I shall be permitted to see him, or any body, but such as are absolutely necessary towards the dispatch of my private affairs. If so, God bless you both! and may no part of the ill fortune that attends me ever pursue either of you! I know not but I may call upon you, at my hearing, to say somewhat about my way of spending my time at the Deanry, which did not seem calculated towards managing plots and conspiracies. But of that I shall consider — You and I have spent many hours together upon much pleasanter subjects; and that I may preserve the old custom, I shall not part with you now, till I have closed this letter with three lines of Milton, which you will, I know, readily, and not without some degree of concern, apply to your ever affectionate, &c.

parties, it is universally agreed, that he was a man of great learning and uncommon abilities, a fine writer, and a most excellent preacher [HH].

[HH] He was a man of great learning and uncommon abilities, a fine writer, and a most excellent preacher. His learned friend Bishop Smalridge, in the speech he made; when he presented him to the Upper House of Convocation, as Prolocutor, styles him, Vir in nullo literarum genere hospes, in plerisque Artibus et Studiis diu et feliciter exercitatus, in maxime perfectis literarum disciplinis perfectissimus. i. e. 'One, who is well acquainted with all parts of literature, long and successfully exercised in most arts and studies, and most accomplished in those sciences, which admit of the greatest perfection.' In his controversial writings; he was sometimes too severe upon his adversary, and dealt rather too much in satire and invective: but this his panegyrist imputes more to the natural fervor of his wit; than to any bitterness of temper, or prepossession of malice. Sit igitur venia, sit laudi, sit gratitudini locus; si quid forte asperius, si quid ardentius, si quid liberius effuderit, lectori paulo humanior id non odio, non livori, nec arrogantiae tribuet, sed aut ingenio suapte natura aliquantulum praeservido, aut fortasse iracundiae, in milite pro aris focique acriter dimicante, in filio ab injuria et vi matrem suam eripiente, facile ignoscendae. Quod si plures in illius scriptis effulgent virtutes, si res tractaverit cognitum difficiles, utiles, jucundas; si eas validissimis argumentis firmaverit; si puro ac dilucido sermone in ipsis legentium animis inscripserit; eruditioni apud eruditos, eloquentiae apud disertos suis conferat bonos. i. e. 'Be there then room left for pardon, for praise, for gratitude. If some sharp, warm, and free expressions have fallen from him, a good-natured reader will not ascribe them to resentment, envy, or arrogance; but either to a natural warmth of disposition, or perhaps to a passion, very excusable in a soldier, who is fighting for all that is near and dear to us, and a son, who endeavours to rescue his mother from injury and violence. But if many and great beauties shine in his writings; if he has treated of things, in themselves difficult, so as to make them useful and entertaining; if he has confirmed them by the strongest arguments; if he has imprinted them in the minds of his readers by a purity and perspicuity of style; let the learned give due applause to his learning, and the eloquent set a just value on his eloquence.' In his Sermons, however, he is not only every way unexceptionable, but highly to be commended. There is that exactness of method, and justness of thought, those weighty arguments, judicious reflections, and unaffected eloquence running through the whole; as denote him the celebrated preacher: he was, and not undeserving this commendation given him by his friend. Quo audientium plausu apud Populum, apud Magistratum, apud Clerum, apud Senatores, apud Aulicos et rostris frequenter concionatus est! Qua facundia et Mariae in caelum jam receptae aures saepe demulsi, et Sororis Animum gravi ac recenti dolore fere oppressum recreavit! i. e. 'With what applause has he often preached before the People, the Magistrates, the Clergy, the Senate, and the Court! How often has he charmed the ears of the late Queen Mary, now with God; and with what address did he administer consolation to her sister (*), almost oppressed and overcome by her late affliction (†)!' The truth is, his talent as a preacher was so excellent and remarkable, that it may not improperly be said, that he owed his preferment to the pulpit, nor any hard matter to trace him, through his writings, to his several promotions in the Church. We shall conclude Bishop Atterbury's character as a preacher, with the encomium bestowed on him by the author of the Tatler (39); who, having observed that the English clergy too much neglect the art of speaking, makes a particular exception with regard to our Prelate (‡); who, says he, 'has so particular a regard to his congregation, that he commits to his memory what he has to say to them; and has so soft and graceful a behaviour, that it must attract your attention. His person (continues this author), it is to be confessed, is no small recommendation; but he is to be highly commended for not losing that advantage, and adding to the propriety of speech, (which might pass the criticism of Longinus) an action, which would have been approved by Demosthenes. He has a peculiar force in his way, and has many of his audience, who could not be intelligent hearers of his discourse, were there not explanation as well as grace in his action. This art of his is used with the most exact and honest skill. He never attempts your passions, till he has convinced your reason. All the objections, which you can form, are laid open and dispersed, before he uses the least vehemence in his Sermon; but when he thinks he has your head, he very soon wins your heart, and never pretends to shew the beauty of holiness, till he has convinced you of the truth of it.' AUBREY, in Latin ALBERICUS (JOHN), descended from an ancient genteel family in Wiltshire (a), was born at Easton-Piers, in the North division of that county, November the third, but whether in 1625, or 1626, is uncertain (b). He was christened very soon after his birth, being, as himself expresses it, weakly, and not in a probability of living (c). He received the first tincture of letters, in the grammar-school at Malmesbury, under Mr Robert Latimer, who taught there forty years, and was the Preceptor of his countryman (as being also a native of Wiltshire) the famous Thomas Hobbes (d) [A], with whom, as he commenced a friendship, even in his childhood, so he maintained it, as long as Mr Hobbes lived, without declension or interruption. May the sixth, 1642, Mr Aubrey was entered a gentleman-commoner of Trinity college at Oxford (e). There he pursued his studies with much diligence, and dedicated himself early to the service of his country, by making her History and Antiquities his peculiar delight. About this time, the scheme of that invaluable work the Monasticon Anglicanum, was talked of in the university; to which Mr Aubrey, not only contributed all the assistance which his pains and industry could afford, but preserved to posterity, at his own

[A] The famous Thomas Hobbes. The author of the life of Mr Aubrey placed before his Antiquities, and also before his Miscellanies, tells us, that at the grammar-school of Malmesbury, he was contemporary with Mr Hobbes (1). Father Niceron copies this in his Memoirs (2). From him it is transferred into the two last editions of Moreri (3). And yet without question it is a very gross error, as the reader from the following observations will perceive. Mr Hobbes was born, as Mr Aubrey himself tells us, April 5, 1588 (4). When he was fourteen years old (5), he went from the grammar-school to the university, which of consequence must be in 1602, that is, at least twenty-three years before Mr Aubrey was born. The mistake arose thus: Anthony Wood, who speaks very sparingly of Mr Aubrey, though he was under great obligations to him, tells us as it were by chance in his life of Thomas Hobbes; that Mr Aubrey and he, that is, Mr Hobbes, were bred under the same master, and Dr Blackbourne in the latin life, saying so too (6). The writer of his life supposing they must have been so at the same time, set it down so without any further inquiry, and these implicit copiers have reported it with as little judgment.

own expence, a curious draught of the remains of Osney Abbey, near Oxford, which were entirely destroyed in the Grand Rebellion (f) [B]. In 1646, he was admitted a student of the Middle-Temple; but the death of his father, which happened on the twenty-first of October, 1652, and with several estates in the counties of Wilts, Surrey, Hereford, Brecknock, and Monmouth, brought him also many law-suits, hindered him from applying himself to that study, to which, otherwise, he would have devoted his thoughts (g). These law-suits, together with other inevitable misfortunes, by degrees eat up all his estates, and forced him to lead a more active life than he was otherwise inclined to, engaged him in frequent and expensive journies, and not a little discomposed the natural mildness of his disposition. He did not, however, entirely abandon his books, or break off his acquaintance with the learned at Oxford, or at London. On the contrary, he kept up a close correspondence with the lovers of Antiquity, and Natural Philosophy, in the university, and furnished the celebrated Anthony Wood, with a considerable share of the materials, out of which he composed his two large and useful works (h). He likewise preserved an intimacy with those great wits and profound scholars, who then met privately, and were afterwards formed into the Royal Society. At London, Mr Aubrey frequented Miles's coffee-house, in the New Palace Yard, where the famous Harrington was surrounded every evening, by all the men of parts and reading, which that fertile age produced. There they balloted, disputed on government, and gave a free loose to their sentiments on all sorts of subjects (i). A little after the Restoration, Mr Aubrey went to Ireland, and returning from thence in the autumn of 1660; narrowly escaped shipwreck near Holy-Head (k). On the first of November, 1661, his notes inform us, that he suffered another shipwreck. I then, says he, made my first addresses in an ill hour to Joan Sommer (l). When he married is uncertain, but from this remark we may be sure, that he found no great felicity in that state. In the year 1662, he was elected and admitted a Fellow of the Royal Society. In June 1664, he travelled through France to Orleans, and returned again to England in the month of October. In 1666, he sold his estate in Wiltshire, and his troubles coming then very thick upon him, he was obliged to dispose by degrees of all he had left, so that in the space of four years, he was reduced, not only to straits but to indigence (m). Yet his spirit remained unbroken, as appears by his own remark on his circumstances. From 1670, says he, I have, I thank God, enjoyed a happy delitescency (n). This obscurity, which he calls happy, consisted in following the bent of his genius, while he owed his subsistence to the kindness of his friends; and in labouring to inform that world, in which he knew not how to live. His chief benefactress was the late Lady Long, of Draycot in Wilts, in whose house he had an apartment, and by whom he was generously supported as long as he lived. But how long that was is uncertain. All that is known concerning it is this, that he died on a journey at Oxford, in his way to Draycot, suddenly, was there buried, as near as can be conjectured, in 1700 (o). He was a man of good natural parts, much learning, and indefatigable application, a great lover of, and diligent searcher into, Antiquities, a good Latin poet, an excellent naturalist, but withal somewhat credulous, and strongly tinged with superstition. As to his works, we shall give a full account of them in a note [C].

As to the nature of this work it appears sufficiently from the title, however, it may not be amiss to add the first paragraph of the author's dedication, dated in 1696, and addressed to James (Bertie) Earl of Abingdon. 'My Lord, when I enjoyed the contentment of solitude in your pleasant walks, and gardens at Lavington, the last summer, I reviewed several scattered papers which had lain by me for several years, and then presumed to think, that if they were put together, they might be somewhat entertaining: I therefore digested them there in this order, in which I now present them to your Lordship. The matter of this collection is beyond human reach, we being miserably in the dark as to the œconomy of the invisible world, which knows what we do, or incline to, and works upon our passions, and sometimes is so kind as to afford us a glimpse of it's prescience.' In 1697, as appears by a letter dated the first of June in that year, directed to Mr Awnsham Churchill, bookfeller, Mr Aubrey corrected for the press a printed copy of his book with considerable alterations and additions, intended doubtless for a second edition (11), which did not however appear 'till after the death both of the author and the bookfeller, viz. in 1721, in 8vo. containing 236 pages the index included. To this edition is prefixed some memoirs of the life of the author, by the editor of that edition, who was according to my information, a very worthy Gentleman still living.

III. A Perambulation of the County of Surrey, begun 1673, ended 1692. This work the author left behind him in manuscript, and it was printed and published in the year 1719, in 5 Vols. 8vo. The author's account of this laborious undertaking is worthy notice. 'In the year 1673, says he, it was my intention to have described the pleasant county of Surrey, which I am sorry I did not compleat. Not finishing it, I made an abstract of all natural remarks, a copy whereof, I after gave to Dr Robert Plott of Oxford, when he had published his new history of Oxfordshire, hoping that he would have been pleased to undertake the finishing of mine, and go through with it, but he would not hearken to it. For said he, the next county I go upon in this kind will be Staffordshire, and if any other it shall be my native county of Kent, which is a great county, I lent my papers to my worthy friend Mr A. Wood, to extract some notes for his history of the university of Oxford. In October last 1691, he desired me to take them with me and transcribe them fair, and to preserve them, there being many good remarks, that deserve not to be buried in oblivion. I wish I had done it soon after my perambulation, while the idea of them was fresh and lively.—They will be of some use to such as love antiquities, or natural history; and on that account, I expose them to the view of the candid reader, wishing him as much pleasure in the perusal of them as I had in the seeing of them (12).' This address is dated, St Thomas's day, 1691, but the perambulation itself bears date May 1, 1692, conformable to the title. The editor, who I take to be the same person be-forementioned, tells us, that he refurveyed the county, and brought the account of monuments, &c. down to 1718.

IV. The Natural History of the North Division of Wiltshire. An unfinished manuscript remaining in the Museum at Oxford (13). In the dedication prefixed to this manuscript, addressed to Thomas Earl of Pembroke and Montgomery, he gives this account of his work. 'I was from my childhood affected with the view of things rare, which is the beginning of philosophy, and though I have not had leisure to make any considerable progress in it, yet I was carried on by a secret strong impulse to undertake this task; I knew not why, unless for my own private pleasure; credit there was none, for it procures the disrespect and contempt of a man's neighbours, but I could not be quiet 'till I had obeyed this secret call.—I am the first that ever made an essay of this kind for Wiltshire, and for ought I know in the nation, having begun it in 1666 (14).' This dedication is dated, Gresham College, June 6, 1685. But he afterwards changed his opinion as to a patron. For in the dedication of his miscellanies before-mentioned, to the Earl of Abingdon in 1696. He has these words, 'My Lord, it was my intention to have finished my description of Wiltshire, half finished already, and to have dedicated it to your Lordship, but my age is now too far spent for such undertakings; I have therefore devolved that task on my countryman, Mr Thomas Tanner *, who hath youth to go through with it, and a genius proper for such an undertaking.' However, this manuscript never was published, though it is said, the copy at Oxford is very fair, and more correct than any other of his writings.

This Prince, soon after, did him a greater favour; Roger Mortimer Earl of March, who was this Lord's guardian, had, in his minority, exacted from him a recognizance for ten thousand marks, which debt, on the attainder of Mortimer, becoming due to the King, he totally discharged the Lord Audley therefrom (c). In 1343, the same Prince made him Governor of Berwick upon Tweed, and the two next years he served in France (d). Edward III [A]. He was present at the famous battle of Poitiers, where, having demanded of the Black Prince leave to charge in the front, it was, on account of a vow he had made, given him; there, with four Esquires who attended him, he performed such extraordinary feats of arms, as distinguished him from all the gallant noblemen, who that day engaged; at length, however, he was so grievously wounded, that his Esquires were constrained to bear him out of the field of battle, to lay him under a hedge, and there take off his armour, and bind up his wounds. As soon as the French were beaten, the Prince enquired for Lord Audley, and being informed that he was grievously wounded, and lay in a litter hard by, By my faith, said he, of his hurts I am right sorry, go and ask if he may be brought hitber, otherwise I will go to him where he is. Then two of his Knights went to Lord Audley, and said, Sir, the Prince desireth greatly to see you. Ab Sirs, replied he, I thank the Prince, that he is pleased to think of so poor a Knight as I am. Then he directed his servants to carry him in his litter to the Prince, into whose presence when he came, his Highness embraced him with great tenderness, and after many compliments, said, Sir James, I, and all here present, acknowledge you to have distinguished yourself from us all, in the bloody business of this day, wherefore, I retain you for ever to be my Knight, with five hundred marks of yearly revenue, which I shall assign you of my heritage in England. Sir, said Lord Audley, God grant me to deserve the great goodness you have shewn me; and so he took his leave, being very feeble. This annuity Lord Audley bestowed upon his four faithful Esquires, which coming to the Prince's ears, he sending for him, said, My Lord, we thank you for doing what we ought to have done, and we give you besides, a pension of six hundred marks by the year (g). This account we have from Froissard, and it appears to have been exactly true from the records, wherein we find an annuity of four hundred pounds to the Lord Audley, charged on the coinage of the Stanneries in Cornwall, during the life of the Lord Audley, and a year afterwards (h). In 1360, he attended King Edward III, and his three sons, in their wars in France (i); and in the year following, swore to the peace then concluded in the Name of King Edward (k). For these services he was appointed Constable of the castle of Gloucester for life (l); and was also Governor of Aquitain, and Seneschal of Poitou (m). He married first, Joan, daughter of Roger Mortimer, Earl of March (n), by whom he had issue a son, Nicholas, and two daughters, Margaret and Joan. Secondly, he married Isabel, by whom he had a daughter named also Margaret (o). By his will, made in 1386, he directed his body to be buried in the choir of his abbey at Stilton, before the high altar, in case he died in the Marches; but if in Devon or Somersetshire, then in the choir of the Friars Preachers at Exeter, before the high altar there; and he directed that there should be about his corps, five great tapers, and five mortuaries of wax, burning on the day of his funeral, as also forty pounds sterling to be distributed to the poor, to pray for his soul. He gave likewise to his son Nicholas, one hundred pounds in money, one dozen of silver vessels, and all the armour for his own body. To his daughter Margaret Hillary, ten pounds in money; and to the Monks of Stilton Abbey, ten pounds to pray for his soul (p). He deceased the first of April in the same year (q), and was succeeded in his honours

[A] In 1356, and thirtieth of Edward III.] The battle of Poitiers was fought on Monday the 19th of September, 1356. The English army was commanded by Edward, Prince of Wales, and did not consist of above nine thousand men at the most; the French Army under King John consisted of fifty-thousand foot, and as many horse, among whom were the flower of the French nobility, as Froissard says expressly (1). The King of France, and his youngest son Philip, who bravely defended his father, when his two elder brothers were fled, were both taken prisoners with many other persons of great quality, with as many private men as the English army could with safety to themselves carry away (2). Daniel in his history gives us a short account of the Lord Audley's adventure, but as short as it is, there are some mistakes. His words are these, The most remarkable instance of honour and valour, was the Lord James Audley, who having vowed to be the foremost of the battle performed his word, and confirmed it with many wounds; for which the Prince having rewarded him with five hundred marks per annum fee simple in England; he presently gave it to four of his Esquires, who had undergone the same dangers as himself. The Prince knowing it, asked him whether he did not accept his gift? He answered yea, but those men had deserved it as well as himself, and had more need of it. The Prince was well pleased at this reply; and gave five hundred marks more to him; as if he resolved that so much worth should not go unrewarded (3). It is certain, that Mr Daniel had no authority for suggesting that the Prince at first took amiss what the Lord Audley had done. In the next place, the last gift was not five, but six hundred marks. By his manner of wording it, one would imagine the last gift was fee simple, whereas, it was not as is shewn in the text. Speed in his history mentions but one gift, which he says, the Lord Audley divided amongst his Esquires, and yet which is remarkable, he cites Froissard (4). It is also observable, that our own old historian Henry Knighton is silent as to him, though he gives us a most particular account of this battle (5), and I should have said the same thing of Walsingham; if I had not found him quoted to prove the contrary in Dugdale. For as he is printed in Mr Camden's collection; thus he writes (6), Ibi claruit Victoria Domini Jac. Arundel Militis, qui potenti Virtute confregit, & perforavit aciem Gallicorum, &c. Mr Dugdale leaving out the proper name, applies the rest of the passage to Lord Audley, by what authority I know not (7). He cites indeed another edition of Walsingham in his margin, but in that citation there is a visible error (8), for he makes Walsingham place this victory under 1357, whereas all other historians, and Walsingham with them, fix it to the year preceding. All I would infer from these remarks is this, that the French historians, who treat either expressly or occasionally of our affairs, and especially of our wars in France, ought to be sedulously examined, because in them many particulars are found unrecorded by, and very probably absolutely unknown to, our own historians, who being most of them sedentary men, and taking their accounts from others, are less likely to be acquainted with minute circumstances than those who lived upon the spot, and were more immediately concerned in the event of those military exploits of which they write.

honours and large estate by his only son Nicholas [B], then fifty years of age.

[B] His only Son Nicholas.] This James Lord Audley, died possessed of a very large estate in several counties, which as is said in the text, descended to his son Nicholas, who dying the 22d of July 1392, being the 15th of Richard II, without issue, John Touchet, and Margaret, the wife of Sir Roger Hillarie, became his heirs. Now this John was the son of another John Touchet, by Joan the elder sister of Margaret, and daughter of that Lord Audley, whose life this note refers to (9), whereby the ancient Barony of Heleigh, passed into the family of Touchet, and the present Earl of Castlehaven, sits at present in the British House of Peers by that title. A U D L E Y (EDMUND) son of James, Lord Audley, by Eleanor his wife, but what year he was born in does not appear (a). He was educated in Lincoln college in Oxford, and in the year 1463, took the degree of Bachelor of Arts in that university, and it is presumed, that of Master of Arts also, though it does not appear from the register, which is imperfect (b). In 1471, he became Prebendary of Farendon in the church of Lincoln, and in October, 1475 (c), attained the like preferment in the church of Wells. On Christmas-day the same year, he became Archdeacon of the East riding of Yorkshire, and had other considerable preferments (d). These preferments he quitted, on his being promoted to the Bishoprick of Rochester, in 1480, being the twentieth of Edward IV, in which see he succeeded John Russell, who was translated to Lincoln, and who was tutor to Edward Prince of Wales (e). In 1492, being the eighth of Henry VII, our Bishop Audley was translated to Hereford (f), and thence in 1502, being the eighteenth of the same King, to Salisbury, and about that time was made Chancellor of the most noble Order of the Garter (g). He was a man of learning [A], and of a generous spirit. In 1518, he gave four hundred pounds to Lincoln college to purchase lands, and bestowed upon the same house, the patronage of a chantry which he had founded in the cathedral church of Salisbury (h). He was a benefactor likewise to St Mary's church in Oxford, and contributed to the erecting the curious stone pulpit therein. Bishop Godwin likewise tells us, that he gave the organs (i); but Anthony Wood says that does not appear (k). This good Bishop departed this mortal life, the twenty-third of August 1524, being the sixteenth of Henry VIII, at Ramsbury in the county of Wilts, and was buried in a chapel which he erected to the honour of the Assumption of the Virgin Mary, in the cathedral of Salisbury, being then doubtless a very old man, since he had sat forty-four years a Bishop. He was succeeded by Cardinal Campejus (l), but whether he enjoyed the honour of being Chancellor to the Order of the Garter, is uncertain.

[A] He was a Man of learning] It may appear a little odd to the critical reader, that the life of this Bishop should find a place in this work, tho' he makes no figure in history, and was no writer. But when our reasons are heard, we make no doubt we shall stand excused. It is very reasonable in a Dictionary of this nature, to infer what can be collected of persons any way remarkable. Now Bishop Audley, is certainly the most eminent instance of the early exercise of the power of translating which is to be met with. His being of a noble family, probably was the sole motive to his first preferments, but we may naturally conclude, that he owed his translation to his two last Bishopricks, to the attachment of himself and his family, to the Lancastrian Line. Besides, when Dr Seth Ward endeavoured to fix the honour of Chancellor of the Garter to his see of Salisbury, he modestly called it, a restoring of it, because it had belonged to this his predecessor. Our Bishop Audley was himself a man of letters tho' no author, and a great encourager of learning in others, for which we find him particularly complimented in a letter from the University of Oxford, the occasion this:

Amongst other Oxford Divines, there was one Edward Powell, who had written a book under the Title of Propugnaculum summi sacerdotii Evangelici ac septennarii Sacramentorum adversus M. Lutherum, fratrem fumosum et Wicliffitum insignem. lib. iii. Lond. 1523. 4to, that is, The Bulwark of the Papacy and Seven Sacraments against Martin Luther, &c. (1) which, as it was intended to check what was then thought Heresy, was very acceptable to the university, by order of which, a letter was written to compliment the Bishop of Salisbury who was patron to this Powell, and who had given him a Prebend in his Cathedral (2). A Letter was also written to Dr Powell himself, and another to the King, in which all the books compiled against Luther and his writings by members of this university are enumerated, and this book of Powell's is particularly commended (4). Our Bishop also as a mark of his respect to the university of Oxford, in which he had been bred, gave to Chickley's Chest which had been then lately robbed, the sum of two hundred pounds, which in those days was a considerable benefaction (5). A U D L E Y, or rather A W D E L Y (THOMAS) descended of an antient and honourable, nay, if we might altogether depend on the authority of a certain author (a), we might add, once noble family, of the county of Essex [A]. He was born in 1488, but

(a) Lloyd's State Worthies, p. 72.

[A] Once noble family in Essex.] Lloyd the Biographer speaking of this noble person, says, his birth was generous, his education more, Essex bred him to that honour which his ancestors lost (1). It is true, there is not much to be built on this author's authority, his affectation of eloquence transporting him sometimes, where the love of truth would never have carried him. However, suppose that Lloyd's expression proves only that he was an Essex man, which however, is what might have been proved without him, since it is affirmed by Fuller and the author of the Worthies of England (2); and then let us see what we can make of his suggestion, that our Chancellor's family was noble before he was made a Baron by creation. Sir William Dugdale says expressly, that he knows not what family our Audley sprung from; he goes farther, and from the Arms, asserts that he was not of the antient family of Audley (3), which however may be doubted: for Dugdale himself informs us, that Hugh Audley Earl of Gloucester, was with others assigned to array all the able men of Essex in the 13th of Edward III. And tho' it be true, that this noble family ended in that Earl, yet it is as true, that there were others of this name settled in the same county of Essex, who had summons to parliament in the reigns of Henry V, and his son Henry VI. Now it is by no means either impossible or improbable, that in the subsequent reigns of Edward IV, and Richard III (4), this family might be much distressed, and there might be very plausible reasons offered in favour of their changing even their paternal coat, in order to preserve a fair estate, but in what month does not appear. Being by nature endowed with great abilities; from his ancestors he inherited an ample fortune, and was also happy in a regular education; passing from the university, whether of Cambridge or of Oxford, is not certain, to the Inns of Court (b). At what time he was entered of the Inner-Temple, does not appear, but in the year 1526, being the eighteenth of Henry VIII, Mr Audley, then in the thirty ninth year of his age, was Autumn Reader of that house (c). At this time, there is reason to believe, he read on the Statute of Privileges, which he handled with such caution, and, withal, with so much learning and eloquence, that he acquired great reputation thereby (d). This, with the Duke of Suffolk's recommendation, to whom he was Chancellor, brought him to the knowledge of his Sovereign (e), whose affairs, at that time, needing men of Audley's character, who, with the learning of a Lawyer, had all the politeness usually acquired in Courts, favour quickly followed. He was, by the King's influence, chosen Speaker of that Parliament which sat first on the third of November, 1529, in the twenty-first year of the King (f); which, from the acts passed therein, is by some styled the Black Parliament, and by others, on account of its duration, the Long Parliament (g). As soon as the House of Commons proceeded to business, great complaints were made therein against the Clergy, and against the proceedings in Ecclesiastical Courts, upon which, several bills were ordered to be brought in (h), which put the whole Order into a ferment, and especially provoked some of the Prelates. Fisher, Bishop of Rochester, inveighed boldly against these transactions, in the House of Lords, with which the House of Commons were so much offended, that they thought proper to complain of it, by their Speaker, to the King (i); the Bishop was thereupon forced to explain himself, and Sir William Fitzwilliams, in the King's name, excusing the matter, with respect to his Lordship, to the House, it ended there with respect to him; but as to the business of Reformation, it went on more briskly than ever, as the reader will see in the note [B]. The best historians agree, that great care was taken by the King, or at least by his Ministry, to have such persons chosen into this House of Commons as would proceed therein readily and effectually, and with the same view, Audley (k) was made choice of, to supply the place of Sir Thomas More, who was become Speaker of the Lord's House, and Chancellor of England. The New House and its Speaker justified his Majesty's expectations, by the whole tenor of their behaviour, but especially by the passing of a law, which, as it is not to be found among our statutes, we shall take the liberty to mention here. The King, it seems, had borrowed very large sums of money of particular subjects, and had entered into obligations for the repayment of the said sums. The House being informed of this, brought in, and passed a Bill, in the preamble of which they declared, that inasmuch as those sums had been applied by his Majesty to publick uses, therefore they cancelled and discharged the said obligations (l), &c. The King, to shew how well he was pleased with this loyal House, continued the Parliament, which sat again in the month of January, 1530-1. In this session also, many extraordinary things were done, amongst the rest, there was a law made, whereby the Clergy were exempted from the penalties they had incurred, by submitting to the legantine power of Wolfsey. This took its rise in the Lord's House, and when it came down to the Commons, they were for inserting a clause in favour of the laity, being conscious, that many of themselves had also incurred the penalties of the statute. But the King took umbrage at this. He said, that Acts of Grace ought to flow spontaneously, and that this was not the method of obtaining what they wanted. In short, the House, notwithstanding the intercession of its Speaker, and several of estate, and this would tally exactly with Lloyd's expression of our Lord Audley's recovering an honour his ancestors had once possessed. This will appear still more feasible, if we consider this Lord's Arms as they are exhibited by Dugdale himself (5), compared with those of the Earl of Castlehaven, who bears the Arms of the ancient family of Audley, as he enjoys a Barony, in right of being descended from a female of that house.

[B] As the reader will see in a note.] It is requisite that we should give a distinct account of this speech, because there is a good deal of diversity among our historians with respect to this matter. In that life of Fisher, Bishop of Rochester, which is said to be written by Dr Bailly, we are told, that at the same time the writs were directed to the counties, &c. for the election of Members, there came private letters directing whom they should chuse, which letters few or none durst disobey; so that to use my author's expression, there was a Parliament filled to the King's hearts desire (6). The same author farther tells us, 'The regulation of all abuses of the Clergy were referred to the House of Commons, where severe complaints against the whole Clergy, as well as against particular Clergymen, were daily presented, whereof some the House of Lords took into consideration, and some they rejected (7).' I have transcribed this sentence entire, that the nonsense of it might appear to be the author's own. After this, what credit can we give to his speech which is penned in a file not agreeable to those times, and concludes thus, 'My Lords, I will tell you plainly what I think, that except you resist manfully by your authorities this violent heap of mischiefs offered by the Commons, you shall see all obedience first drawn from the Clergy, and secondly, from yourselves; and, if you search into the true causes of all these mischiefs which reign among them, you shall find that they all arise through want of faith (8).' He then proceeds to inform us, that the Commons by their Speaker, Mr Audley, complained grievously to the King, as if the Bishop represented them as Infidels or Hereticks. Whereupon he owns the King sent for Bishop Fisher and reproved him, tho' according to our author, he justified to the King's face all he had said; which drew from his Majesty this admonition, to use his words for the time to come more temperately (9). And that, says this author, was all, which gave the Commons little satisfaction. This is so far from being true, that Fisher explained away his speech, and said, That in speaking of want of faith, he intended only the people of Bohemia, which explanation of his was reported to the House of Commons by the King's command, and thereupon the business dropt (10). But what demonstrates the speech in Bailly's life to be a forgery, is the mention therein made of a Bill for vesting the small monasteries in the King; which Bill however was not brought in, in 1529 when this speech was made, but in 1535.

- it's members, who were the King's servants, was obliged to pass the bill without the clause; but when they had done so, the King granted them likewise a pardon, and so they parted very well pleased with each other, the Houses rising in the month of June (m). In the recess, the King thought it necessary to have a letter written to the Pope by the Lords and Commons, or rather by the three estates in Parliament, which letter was drawn up and signed by Cardinal Wolsey, the Archbishop of Canterbury, four Bishops, two Dukes, two Marquisses, thirteen Earls, two Viscounts, twenty-three Barons, twenty-two Abbots, and eleven Members of the House of Commons (n). Lord Herbert tells us, this letter was written by Parliament, but this is a mistake, since the letter is dated the thirteenth of July, and the Houses rose on the twenty-first of the preceding month (o). The purport of this letter, was to engage the Pope to grant the King's desire in the divorce business, for the sake of preventing a civil war, on account of the succession, and to threaten him if he did not, to take some other way. To gratify the Speaker for the great pains he had already taken, and to encourage him to proceed in the same way, the King made him this year Attorney for the duchy of Lancaster (p), advanced him in Michaelmas term, to the state and degree of a Serjeant at Law (q), and on the fourteenth of November following, to that of his own Serjeant (r). In January 1531-2, the Parliament had it's third session, wherein the grievances occasioned by the excessive power of the Ecclesiasticks and their courts, were regularly digested into a book, which was presented by the Speaker, Audley, to the King (s). The King's answer was; He would take advice, hear the parties accused speak, and then proceed to Reformation (t). In this session, a bill was brought into the House of Lords, for the better securing the rights of his Majesty, and other persons interested in the care of wards, &c. which rights it was alledged, were injured by fraudulent wills and contracts. This bill, when it came into the House of Commons, could not make it's passage at all, nay the members were so much out of humour, that they expressed a desire of being dissolved, alledging, that they had sat too long, and been at too great an expence. But the King would not permit this; however, after they had done some business, they had a recess to the month of April (u). When they next met, the King sent for the Speaker, and delivered to him the answer which had been made to the roll of grievances, presented at their last sitting (w). The House was very little satisfied therewith, and indeed their temper was now pretty much altered. For, towards the close of the month, one Mr Themse moved, that the House would intercede with the King, to take back his Queen again (x). The King extremely alarmed at this, on the thirtieth of April, 1532, sent for the Speaker, whom he discoursed to this effect. 'That he was amazed at what had passed in the House, and that he marvelled, any among them should meddle in businesses which could not properly be determined there. As for this particular, that it concerned his soul so much, that he many times wished the marriage had been good, but since the Doctors of the universities had generally declared it unlawful, he could do no less than abstain from her company. Which therefore, he wished him to take as the true reason, without imputing it to any wanton appetites, since, being in the one and fortieth year of his age, it might be justly presumed, such motions were not so quick with him, all which that they might the better understand, he had informed himself in all parts of Christendom concerning strange marriages, and that, saving in Spain and Italy, he could never find any man had so much as married two sisters, if the first was carnally known. But for the brother to marry the brother's wife, was so abhorred among all nations, that he never heard any Christian so did but himself, and therefore wished them to believe that his conscience was troubled (y).' On the eleventh of May, the King sent for the Speaker, Audley, again, and then told him, that he had found that the Clergy of his realm were but half his subjects, or scarce so much, every Bishop and Abbot at the entering into his dignity, taking an oath to the Pope, derogatory to that of their fidelity to the King, which contradiction he desired his Parliament to take away. Upon this motion of the King's, the two oaths he mentioned were read in the House of Commons, which House would probably have complied with the King's request, if the plague had not forced his Majesty to put an end to the session somewhat abruptly (z). This was on the fourteenth of May, and two days after, viz. May the sixteenth, 1532, Sir Thomas More, Knt. then Lord Chancellor of England, went suddenly, without acquainting any body with his intention, to Court, his Majesty being then at York place, and there, about three in the afternoon, surrendered up the seals to the King (a). The King going out of town to East-Greenwich, carried the seals with him, and there, on Monday the twentieth of May, delivered them to Thomas Audley, Esq; with the title of Lord Keeper, and at the same time conferred on him the honour of knighthood (b). On the sixth of September following, Sir Thomas delivered the old seal which was much worn, and received a new one in it's stead, yet with no higher title (c); but on the twenty-sixth of January, 1533, he again delivered the seal to the King, who kept it a quarter of an hour, and then delivered it to him with the title of Lord Chancellor, in execution of which office, he sealed, in the King's presence, a subpoena to one John Gilbert (d). A little after, the King granted to him the site of the priory of Christ Church, together with all the church plate, and lands belonging to that house (e), concerning which gift, there is a great deal said by our historians, and and not a little falshood and confusion in what they say, as in the note the reader will perceive [C]. In his high office, he did the business of the King as effectually as when Speaker of the House of Commons. For in July 1535, he sat in judgment on Sir Thomas More, his predecessor, (as he had before on Bishop Fisher) who, though in the month of November, 1534, he had been attainted of misprision of treason (f), yet he was now indicted of high-treason, for that he had traiterously imagined to deprive the King of his title and dignity of Supreme Head of the Church, in respect to which, he first maliciose silebat, i. e. kept a malicious silence, and had afterwards said, the act about supremacy was a two-edged sword, for if one answer one way, it will confound his soul, and if the other, his body. Upon which indictment the jury found him guilty (g). The Lord Chancellor Audley then pronounced judgment of death upon him. This done, we are told that Sir Thomas More said, that he had for seven years bent his mind and study upon this cause, but as yet he found it no where writ by any approved Doctor of the Church, that a layman could be head of the Ecclesiastical State. To this Audley returned, Sir, Will you be reckoned wiser, or of a better conscience, than all the Bishops, the Nobility, and the whole kingdom. Sir Thomas rejoined; My Lord Chancellor, for one Bishop that you have of your opinion, I have a hundred of mine, and that among those that have been Saints; and for your one Council, which what it is God knows, I have on my side all the General Councils for a thousand years past; and for one kingdom, I have France and all the other kingdoms of the Christian world. He added also, that their act was not well made, because they had sworn professedly to do nothing against the Church, which, throughout all Christendom, is one, entire and undivided, wherefore they had not authority, without the consent of other Christians, of making laws, or so much as assembling a council against the union and concord of the Christian world. But I am not ignorant, added he, why you have adjudged me to death, namely, because I would never assent to the business of the King's new matrimony (h). As our Chancellor was very active in the business of the divorce, he was no less so in the business of abbies, and had particularly a large hand in those proceedings, which were previous to the dissolution of the religious houses, which had not two hundred pounds by the year (i). This was in the twenty-seventh of Henry VIII, and the bill sticking long in the House of Commons, his Majesty became impatient, and therefore sent for the members of that House to attend him in his gallery, where he passed through them with a stern countenance, without speaking a word; the members not having received the King's command to depart to their House, durst not return till they knew the King's pleasure, so they stood waiting in the gallery. In the mean time the King went a hunting, and his Ministers, who seem to have had better manners than their master, went to confer with the members; to some they spoke of the King's steadiness and severity, to others, of his magnificence and generosity. At last the King came back, and passing through them again, said, with an air of fierceness peculiar to himself, That if his bill did not pass it should cost many of them their heads. Between the Ministers persuasions and the King's threats, the matter was brought to an issue; the King's bill, as he called it, passed, and by it, he had not only the lands of the small monasteries given him, but also their jewels, plate, and rich moveables (k). This accomplished, methods were used to prevail with the Abbots of larger foundations to surrender. To this end, the Chancellor sent a special agent to treat with the Abbot of Athelny, to offer him a hundred marks per annum pension, which he refused, insisting

[C] As in the note the reader will perceive. As to the history of the dissolution of this Priory, it remains at present in a sort of Chaos, out of which it will be a difficult thing to produce order, yet as our subject leads us to it, we shall do therein what we may. Fuller in his Church History writes, that 'King Henry VIII, for reasons best known to himself, singled out the Priory of Christ-Church near Aldgate, and dissolved the same. This he bestowed as a boon on Thomas Audley, Speaker in the Parliament, and indeed it was an excellent receipt to clear his voice, to make him speak shrill and loud for his master (11).' Bishop Burnet tells us, that in his opinion this Priory was dissolved, or rather suppressed, in virtue of the Pope's Bull, and censures Fuller for his reflection on the Speaker, because says he, Audley when he received this gift was not Speaker, but Chancellor (12). But both Fuller and he are mistaken in their dates, and in some measure in the fact. Fuller who says, it was surrendered by the Prior, for whose name he leaves a blank on a promise of preferment, places it in the month of July 1531 (13). Bishop Burnet says, it was suppressed in 1533 (14). The truth of the matter is, that the Prior, Nicholas Hancock, with the consent of his chapter, on account of the bad circumstances the convent was in, did surrender under the seal of their house all that they were possessed of into the hands of the King. This Act is subscribed by Nicholas Hancock, the Prior, and eighteen other persons, and is attested by a Notary Publick to have been done spontaneously, solemnly, and authentically, on the 24th day of February 1531, according to the computation of the Church of England. That is, on the 24th of February 1531-2, and in the 23d of Henry VIII (15). Seven months after the date given us by Fuller, and about two years earlier than the date mentioned by Bishop Burnet. Yet the Bishop is right in censuring Fuller, for though the Priory was surrendered to the King in 31, yet he did not give it to Audley till after he was Chancellor, and this donation was confirmed by Act of Parliament in 1534 (16). Fuller is also mistaken in asserting, that this was the first religious House surrendered to the King's use, since it is certain that the Monastery at Sheene had been surrendered in the month of November preceding (17). Hall in his Chronicle tells us, that the Priory church and steeple were offered to whosoever would take them down; but no body accepting this offer, Sir Thomas Audley was forced to be at more charges than he could make of the materials; the workmen with great labour beginning at the top, loosed stone from stone, and throwing them down, most part of them were broke in the fall and remained useless (18). Fuller carries this history farther, 'As for the Lord Audley, says he, on whom this Priory was bestowed, Margaret his sole daughter and heir, was married to Thomas Howard Duke of Norfolk who dwelt therein, and from him was called the Duke's-Place (19).'

The Chancellor was more successful with the Abbot of St Osithes in Essex, with whom he dealt personally, and, as he expresses it in a letter to Cromwell the Visitor-General, by great sollicitation prevailed with him; but then he insinuates, that his place of Lord Chancellor being very chargeable, he desired the King might be moved for addition of some more profitable offices unto him (m). In suing for the great abbey of Walden, in the same county, which with much ado he obtained, besides extenuating it's worth, he alledged under his hand, that he had in this world sustained great damage and infamy in serving the King, which the grant of that should recompence (n). But if the year 1536 was grateful to him in one respect, it was far from being so in another, since notwithstanding the obligations he was under to Queen Anne Bullen, he was obliged, by the King's command, to be present at her apprehension and commitment to the Tower (o). He sat afterwards with Cranmer Archbishop of Canterbury, when he gave sentence of divorce on the pre-contract between the Queen and the Lord Percy (p); and on the fifteenth of May in the same year, he sat in judgment on the said Queen (q), notwithstanding we are told by Lloyd, that with great address he avoided it (r). The lengths he had gone in serving the King, and his known dislike to Popery, induced the northern rebels in the same year, to name him as one of the evil counsellors, whom they desired to see removed from about the King's person (s); which charge however, his Majesty, as far as in him lay, wiped off, by his well-penned answer to the complaints of those rebels, wherein an excellent character is given of the Chancellor (t). When the authors of this rebellion came to be tried, the Chancellor declined sitting as Lord High-Steward, which high office was executed by the Marquis of Exeter (u), on whom shortly after, viz. in 1538, Audley sat as High-Steward, and condemned him, his brother, and several other persons, to suffer death as traitors (w). In the latter end of the same year, viz. on the twenty-ninth of November, 30 Hen. VIII, the Chancellor was created a Baron of this realm, by the title of Lord Audley of Walden in the county Essex, and was likewise installed Knight of the Garter (x). In the session of Parliament in 1539, there were many severe acts made, and the prerogative carried to an excessive height. The establishing those which were stiled the six bloody articles, may well serve as an instance of the former, and the giving the King's proclamation the force of a law, is a pregnant proof of the latter. It does not very clearly appear, who were the King's principal counsellors in these matters; but it is admitted by the best historians, that the rigorous execution of these laws which the King first designed, was prevented by the interposition of the Lord Audley, in conjunction with Cromwell who was then Prime Minister, and the Duke of Suffolk, the King's favourite throughout his whole reign (y). In the beginning of the year 1540, the court was excessively embarrassed. Cromwell had brought about the marriage between his master and Anne of Cleves, and the King from the beginning expressed a great coldness for the lady; however he married her, and heaped extraordinary honours upon his Minister, created him Earl of Essex, made him Lord High-Chamberlain of England, and honoured him with the Garter, which he seems to have done only to make his fall the greater, and by so much the more acceptable to the people; for shortly after he was committed to the Tower, and attainted by bill, which though it seems to have been a method made use of merely to avoid his trial by his Peers, yet it was passed in the House of Lords without opposition, or so much as one vote against it, which shews the disposition of the times, and the temper of the Chancellor (z). Immediately after his fall, a new question was stirred in Parliament, viz. How far the King's marriage was lawful? This was referred to the judgment of a spiritual court, and there are yet extant the depositions of Thomas Lord Audley, Lord Chancellor, Thomas, Archbishop of Canterbury, Thomas, Duke of Norfolk, Charles, Duke of Suffolk, and Cuthbert, Lord Bishop of Durham, wherein they jointly swear, that the papers produced to prove the retraction of the Lady Anne's contract with the Duke of Lorraine, were inconclusive and unsatisfactory (a). Other Lords and Ladies deposed to other points, and the issue of the business was, that the marriage was declared void by this court, which sentence was supported by an act of parliament, affirming the same thing, and enacting, that it should be high-treason to judge or believe otherwise (b). This obstacle removed, the King married the Lady Catherine Howard, niece to the Duke of Norfolk, and cousin-german to Anne Bullen (c). Nothing is clearer from history, than that the Chancellor was freightly attached to the House of Norfolk; and yet in the latter end of the year 1541, he was constrained to be an instrument in the ruin of the unfortunate Queen. Information of her bad life before her marriage, being laid first before the Archbishop of Canterbury, and by him communicated to the Chancellor (d). The King being made acquainted with the matter, appointed Lord Audley one of the Commissioners to examine her, which they did, and there is yet extant a letter subscribed by him and the other Lords, containing an exact detail of this affair, and of the evidence on which in the next session of Parliament the Queen and others were attainted (e). The whole of this business was managed in Parliament by the Chancellor, and there is reason to believe, that he had some hand in another business transacted in that session, which was the opening a door for the dissolution of hospitals, the King having now wasted all that had accrued to him by the suppression of abbeys (f). Some other things of the like nature, were the last testimonies of the Chancellor's concern for his master's interest, but the next year he did still more for the

the House of Commons. The case is very remarkable and therefore we shall relate it: In the 34th of Henry VIII, George Ferrers, Esq; Burgess for Plymouth, was arrested, and carried to the Compter, by virtue of a writ from the Court of King's-Bench. The House on notice thereof, sent their Serjeant to demand their member, in doing which, a fray ensued at the Compter, his mace was broke, his servant knocked down, and himself obliged to make his escape as well as he could. The House upon notice of this, resolved they would sit no longer without their member, and desired a conference with the Lords; where, after hearing the matter, the Lord Chancellor Audley declared the contempt was most flagrant, and referred the punishment thereof to the House of Commons; whereupon Thomas Moyle, Esq; who was then Speaker, issued his warrant, whereby the Sheriff of London, and several other persons, were brought to the bar of the House, and committed, some to the Tower, and some to Nwegate (g). This precedent was gained by the King's want of an aid, who at that time expected the Commons would offer him a subsidy; the ministry, and the House of Lords, knowing the King's will, gave the Commons the compliment of punishing those who had imprisoned one of their members. Dyer, mentioning this case, says, The Sages of the Law held the commitment of Ferrers legal, and though the privilege was allowed him, yet was it held unjust (b). As the Chancellor had led a very active life, he grew now infirm, tho' he was not above fifty years old, and therefore began to think of settling his family and affairs. But previous to this, he obtained from the King a licence to change the name of Buckingham college in Cambridge, into that of Magdalen, or Maudlin (i) some will have it, because in the latter word his own name is included (k). To this college he was a great benefactor, bestowed on it his own arms, and is generally reputed it's founder (l). His capital seat was at Christ-Church in town, and at Walden in Essex; and to preserve some remembrance of himself and fortunes, he caused a magnificent tomb to be erected in his new chapel at Walden (m). About the beginning of April 1544, he was attacked by his last illness, which induced him to resign the seals; but he was too weak to do it in person, and therefore sent them to the King, who delivered them to Sir Thomas Wriothesley with the title of Keeper, during the indisposition of the Chancellor (n); which is a circumstance not remarked by any of our historians, and which notwithstanding we shall fully justify in a note [D]. On the nineteenth of April, Lord Audley made his will, wherein, amongst other things, he directs, that his executors should, upon the next New-year's day after his decease, deliver to the King a legacy of one hundred pounds, from whom, as he expresses it, he had received all his reputations and benefits (o). He died on the last of April, 1544, when he had held the seals upwards of twelve years, and in the fifty-sixth of his life, as appears by the inscription on his tomb (p) [E]. He married Elizabeth, daughter of Thomas Grey, Marquis of Dorset, by

[D] Justified in a Note We are indebted for this remarkable passage to Mr Rymer's excellent collection, wherein we have the following account of this matter, Memorandum quod Die Lunæ, &c. i. e. Memorandum that on Monday the 21st of April, in the year of our Lord Henry VIII, by the Grace of God, of England, France and Ireland, King, Defender of the Faith, and of the Churches of England and Ireland, Supreme Head, the thirty-fifth, Thomas Audeley, Knight, Lord Audeley of Walden, the Chancellor of England being then thro' infirmity of body weak, and considering his incapacity to execute the functions of his office, either in doing justice to the King's subjects, or in overlooking the processes passing under the Great Seal of our Sovereign Lord the King; the said seal then in the hands of the said Thomas Lord Chancellor, to our said Lord the King, by Edward North, Knight, and Thomas Pope, Knight, sent, and the said Edward and Thomas, the said seal in a certain white leathern bag included and sealed with the seal of the said Lord Chancellor to the King's Majesty, at his New Palace in Westminster, about three in the afternoon, in the presence of Thomas Hennagè, Knight, and Anthony Denny, Esq; did there present, humbly beseeching on the part of the said Thomas Lord Chancellor, his said Majesty, that he would be graciously pleased to accept the said seal. Whereupon our Sovereign Lord the King, the seal, by the hands of the said Edward and Thomas did receive and accept, and in his custody did retain 'till the next day, viz. until Tuesday the 22d of April, in the 36th year of the reign of our Sovereign Lord the King; on which day, about three in the afternoon, our said Lord the King, the said seal, in the same chamber, in presence of Anthony Denny, Esq; and Thomas Carden, Esq; unto the Honourable Thomas Wriothesley, Knight, Lord Wriothesley, to keep and exercise during the infirmity of the said Thomas Audeley Lord Chancellor committed, and him the said Thomas Lord Wriothesley, Lord

Keeper of the King's Great Seal, during the infirmity of the said Lord Chancellor there constituted and ordained, with authority to exercise and perform all and singular such acts, as the Lord Chancellor of England, by virtue of his office, might do and perform; and the said Thomas Lord Wriothesley, the said seal, from the hands of our Sovereign Lord the King, thankfully receiving the care and custody of the said seal upon him took, and therewith retired (20).

EPITAPH of Thomas Lord Audley, in Walden Church.

The stroke of death's inevitable dart,
Hath now (alas!) of life bereft the heart
Of Sir Thomas Audley, of the Garter Knight, Late Chancellor of England, under our Prince of might;
Henry the eighth, worthy of high renown,
And made by him, Lord Audley of this town.
Obiit ultimo Aprilis, A. D. 1544. Henrici 36.

To this we will add his character as contained in the following Elegy, the diction of which is far from being despicable, as the matter is perfectly consistent with his history.

Treasure of arms and arts, in whom were set
The mace and books, the court and college met,
Yet both so wove, that in that mingled throng
They both comply, and neither, either wrong,
But pois'd and temper'd, each reserv'd it's seat,
Nor did the learning quench, but guide the heat;

by whom he had two daughters, Margaret and Mary, Mary died unmarried, so Margaret became his sole heir (q). She married first Lord Henry Dudley, a younger son of John Duke of Northumberland, and he being slain at the battle of St Quintin's in Picardy, in the year 1557 (r), she married a second time, Thomas Duke of Norfolk, to whom she was also a second wife, and had by him a son Thomas, who by act of Parliament, in the twenty-seventh of Elizabeth, was restored in blood; and in the thirty-ninth of the same reign, summoned to Parliament by his grandfather's title as Baron of Walden (s). In the first of James I, he was created Earl of Suffolk, and being afterwards Lord High-Treasurer of England, he built on the ruins of the abbey of Walden, that noble palace, which, in honour of our Chancellor, he called Audley-End (t).

The courtier was not of the furious strain,
The hand that acts, doth first consult the brain;
Hence grew commerce betwixt advice and might,
The scholar did direct the courtier right,
And as our perfumes mixt, do all conspire
And twist their curls about the hallow'd fire,
'Till in that harmony of sweets combin'd
We can nor musk, nor single amber find,

But gums meet gums, and their delights so crowd,
That they create one undistinguish'd cloud;
So to thy mind these rich ingredients press,
And were the mould and fabrick of thy breast,
Learning and courage mixt, and temper'd so,
The stream could not decay, nor overflow;
And in that equal tide, thou didst not bear,
From courage, rashness; nor from learning fear (22).

AVESBURY (ROBERT of) a very antient English historian. We are altogether ignorant at what time he was born, or who were his parents; but as to his condition, he tells us himself, in the title of his history, that he was register of the Archbishop of Canterbury's court (a). His design seems to have been the composing a history of the reign of that glorious Prince Edward III, from such authentick materials as came to his hands, but when he had ran through about thirty years, he was very probably surprized by death, in the latter end of the year 1356, or in the beginning of the year following (b). As he propos'd to himself only a plain narrative of facts, illustrated by exact copies of such publick papers as came into his power; he did not trouble himself much about the elegance of his stile. We may however affirm, that it is far from being harsh, or disagreeable, allowing for the bad taste and rudeness of those times, and that the apparent candour and impartiality of the historian, makes us full amends for his want of eloquence. His accuracy in point of dates, is another very great advantage, which our author has, over most of the writers of his time, and his care in stating all publick actions from records, rather than from his own notions, is another incident, which renders his history truly valuable. One may justly wonder how so curious a MS. as this came to lie so long hid, even from some of the most industrious searchers after English antiquities. The learned and industrious Leland, most certainly never saw it, otherwise he had not doubt of his taking notice of it. It was likewise unknown to Bale, though he had a great collection in this way, and was particularly curious about MSS. which concerned our history. Fox, the Martyrologist, had seen it (c). Archbishop Parker, had it in his custody, and perused it (d). So had John Stowe, who mentions Avesbury in his Chronicle (e), and, from him, Pits ventures to tell us, that he flourished about 1340, though he is so modest, as not to pretend to any acquaintance with his works (f). A foreign writer following this authority, fixes him to the same year (g). What is not a little extraordinary, the famous Mr Jocelin, chaplain to Archbishop Parker, never saw this MS. though in his patron's possession (h): neither in later times did it come to the hands of the industrious Anthony Wood (i), otherwise he would certainly have cited it in his history, and antiquities of the university of Oxford, there being in this history, a large account of a squabble between the scholars and townsmen of Oxford, in 1354 (k), of which Wood speaks copiously from other writers (l). At last, after being so long buried in obscurity, the indefatigable Thomas Hearne, printed it at Oxford, from a MS. belonging to Sir Thomas Seabright (m). This MS. was the same that had formerly been in the hands of Archbishop Parker, from whom it passed to William Lambard, the famous Antiquary, from him to Thomas Lambard, and at length it came to Sir Roger Twisdale, a remarkable lover of English history, and with the rest of his valuable library, was purchased by Sir Thomas Seabright (n). Besides these, there are two other MSS. in being, one in the Harleian Library, and the other, in the University Library at Cambridge, with both which, the accurate printed edition was compared. All these MSS. are thought to be as old, as the time in which our author flourished. There is joined to this history, and in the same hand writing, a French chronicle, from the first planting of Britain, to the reign of King Edward III; but this, Mr Hearne, with good reason, conceives to have been the work of some other author, and therefore did not print it with Avesbury's history (o). In all probability, the reason they were thus joined together was this, that the French chronicle ends exactly where our author begins. That Avesbury himself could not so easily write in French, appears plainly from this, that he chose to insert long papers in that language, in his Latin history; whereas, he would surely have translated them, if he had been so well skilled in French, or else have written the whole in that language, which would have made it more uniform. In the Harleian MS. this chronicle hath the following title, Cronica Gallice, cujusdam Anonimi, à primis incolis Britanniæ usque, ad initium Regni Regis, E. III, vulgo nuncupat, fructus temporum (p). This title was placed there by Sir Simonds d'Ewes, Knight and Baronet, a celebrated Antiquary, and once the possessor of that MS. There were likewise added to the MS. copies, certain notes of a miscellaneous nature, under the title of, Minutiæ, i. e. Trifles, these too are denied by Mr Hearne, to have been written by Avesbury, however, he has preserved them, as well as a genealogical table, which shows the right Edward III, had to the crown of France (9). As this antient historian is so little known to the generality of readers, and as the printed copy of his works is now become as scarce as many MSS. it cannot be improper to give a concise account of his work, and the character it bears in the judgment of some of the ablest critics in this kind of learning, in the notes [A]. In the same place, the reader will also find a farther account of Mr Hearne's edition of this author, which is the more necessary, because, in his appendix, there are several curious pieces, which the inquisitive reader will be glad to hear of, and know where to find. This method we shall make use of, whenever we mention any of the old historians published by him, because as these books grow every day more scarce, their contents ought to be published elsewhere, and especially in a work like this; wherein is endeavoured an historical and critical account of all our antient historians, for the works of many of whom, the publick stands indebted to the labours of this industrious man [B]. A few of the Minutiæ also are added as curiosities worthy particularly the English

[A] In the Notes] The title of this history in the MS. ran thus, Mirabilia gesta magnifici Regis Angliæ Domini Edwardi tercii post Conquestum, Procerumque, tactis Primitus quibusdam gestis de tempore Patris sui Domini Edwardi secundi, quæ in Regnis Angliæ, Scociæ & Franciæ, ac in Aquitania & Britannia, non humana fed Dei Potencia, contigerunt, per Robertum de Avesbury, Curie Cantuariensis Registrum Custodem, compilata, Anglorum Memoriam merito commendanda Legi poterunt in hac verba. That is, The wonderful acts of the most magnificent Lord Edward the third, after the Conquest, King of England, and of his Peers, with some touches of what happened in the time of his father Edward the second, in the kingdoms of England, Scotland, and France, as also Aquitain and Britanny, not through the will of Men but of God, compiled as worthy of being known to Englishmen, by Robert of Avesbury, Keeper of the Registry of the Court of Canterbury, in the following Words (1). He opens his history with the marriage of Edward the second with Isabella the daughter of Philip the French King, firnamed the Fair, which was solemnized the 25th of January 1307. By which lady he had his son Edward, afterwards King Edward the third, in the year 1313. He then proceeds to shew, that King Edward the second reigned with a continued series of ill fortune for nineteen years, till Queen Isabella and her son Edward landing with some foreign troops at Harwich, and joining with the Barons, dethroned him. Edward the third, then entered on the government, being but fourteen years old, and was solemnly crowned at Westminster on the feast of the conversion of St Paul, in the year 1326 (2). After this, we have the history of the famous Roger Mortimer to the time of his fall and death. The pretensions of Edward the third on the kingdom of Scotland come next under the author's care, and are very largely treated, and then in it's order. The history of the war carried on in that country, the victory of Hunningmore, and the peace with the Scots (3). After this we have an account of King Edward's pretensions to the French crown, with the war that followed in support of them. A particular account of the great achievements of King Edward, and of his son Edward the Black Prince, with several original letters of the Prince and Sir John Wyngfeld (4). Another Scots war employs afterwards his pen, in which King David Bruce was taken prisoner. He also relates very minutely, all the transactions between King Edward and the Baliol family, the taking and retaking the town of Berwick, and concludes his work with an account of a bad season in the year 1356 (5). Then follows a list of the persons killed and taken prisoners in the famous battle of Poitiers, which was fought by Edward the Black Prince, on the 19th of September in the same year (6). Dr Robert Brady made great use of our historian, and mentions him with much respect in these words. Robert of Avesbury wrote the life of Edward the third, and as he reports of himself, was Keeper of the Registry of the Court of Canterbury, he lived in the time of Edward the third. A MS. in Sir Simonds D'Ewes library in Stow Lanthorn in Suffolk (7). Mr Tyrrell cites him also, and says he was a considerable writer of that age, and very exact in his account of King Edward's actions beyond the sea, as having taken them from several original letters of persons of note (8). It seems the MS. this gentleman had, went no lower than the year 1355, but that published by Mr Hearne, contains the occurrences of the next year to the end of Summer, or rather to the beginning of Autumn (9). [B] To the labours of this industrious man.] Before this edition of Avesbury by Hearne, there is a Preface of forty pages, dated from Edmund Hall in Oxford, the 21st of November 1720. It contains a very large account of the MSS. made use of in this edition, together with abundance of literary anecdotes which one would hardly expect there. He is particularly hard upon Anthony Wood, whom he charges with making use of the MS. collections of Twyne and Langbain, without quoting them, and this he tells us of his own knowledge (10). There are also some curious remarks on the story of Rosamond, and explanatory notes on the fray between the townsmen and scholars of Oxford mentioned in the text (11). Then follow testimonies relating to the author, and a list of the subscribers to this edition. The book itself comes next, and contains 255 pages. It is very carefully printed from the MS. with various readings, and all the marginal remarks of the several possessors of the MS. he had consulted, together with such emendations as could be collected from Walsingham and other antient-English historians. The Minutiæ take up eleven pages exclusive of a scheme, shewing the genealogy of Edward the third, and his claim in consequence thereof to the crown of France. Thus far the MS. We have then in one leaf, a list of the Saxon authors which had come to the hands of Mr John Jocelyn mentioned in the text (12). To this is added another list of the MS. writers of English history, and the places where their works were to be found (13). It contains 28 pages. Both these were printed from MSS. in the Cotton library. We come now to Mr Hearne's appendix. The first piece we meet with there is a transcript of an old Beadle's book at Oxford, it belonged formerly to Anthony Wood, and contains a great many curious things, it consists of 14 pages, and is illustrated with notes and references (14). The second paper is a collection of MS. notes, relating to the antient orders of the University of Oxford (15). Then we have a letter written by Dr Christopher Potter, relating to the privileges of the University of Oxford, with the form of degrading Mr William Prynne, this was sent to the editor by the reverend and learned Mr Baker of St. John's (16). The fourth piece is a transcript of a very antient roll relating to the manor of Woodstock, made in the reign of Edward the first, and of which the editor had this copy, through the kindness of John Brydges, Esq; of Lincoln's-Inn, a great collector of such curiosities (17). The last piece, and indeed the most curious of them all, is a transcript of the love letters, between Henry the eighth, and Anne Bullen, taken from the originals kept in the Vatican at Rome, A. D. 1682 (18). After the index, there follows in this as in most of Mr Hearne's books, a list of the pieces published by him to that time, and which is a full proof of the usefulness of such notes as this. There is inserted in this catalogue a very curious piece printed from an authentick MS, the title of which follows,

AUGUSTIN, or, by contraction, AUSTIN (St), usually stiled the Apostle of the English, and the first Archbishop of Canterbury, was originally a Monk in the convent of St Andrew at Rome, and had his education under St Gregory, afterwards Pope Gregory I [A]; by whom he was dispatched into Britain, together with forty other Monks of the same order, for the conversion of the English Saxons to the Christian religion (a). This mission was undertaken about the year of Christ 596 [B]. Augustin and his companions, having proceeded a little way on their journey, began to disrelish their employment, and concluded it was more advisable to return, than to take so long a journey to a savage and infidel nation, to whose language they were utter strangers. This resolution being taken, they dispatched Augustin to Rome, to obtain the Pope's leave for their return: but that Monk soon came back with a letter of exhortation

[A] St Gregory, afterwards Pope Gregory I. This pious and good Pope had himself projected, and undertaken, the conversion of the English Saxons, before his advancement to the See of Rome. For, walking one day thro' the market, and observing certain beautiful youths exposed to sale, he asked of what country they were; and being informed they were Britons, he fetched a deep sigh, and said, it was a lamentable consideration that the prince of darkness should be master of so much beauty, and that so fine an outside should have nothing of God's grace within. The sight of these youths made so great an impression on Gregory's piety, that he applied himself to Pope Benedict, earnestly requesting that some persons might be sent to preach Christianity in Britain. But perceiving no body willing to undertake the mission, he offered himself for the service, and, with the Pope's leave, set forward on his journey, to the great regret of the clergy and people of Rome. He had not been gone above two or three days, before the Pope had a remonstrance delivered to him in the streets for sending away Gregory, and was therefore obliged to re-call him. Johannes Diaconus, in his Life of St Gregory, tells this story so well, that the learned reader shall have the pleasure of seeing here the Original. Quadam die, cum advenientibus nuper negotiatoribus, multa venalia in foro Romanæ urbis fuissent proposita, multique ad emendum unaque confluxissent; contigit et Gregorium virum Deo dignissimum præterire. Qui cernens inter alia pueros corpore candidos, forma pulcherrimos, vultu venustos, capillorum quoque nitore perspicuos, esse venales, interrogavit mercatorem de qua patria illos attulisset. Ille respondit, de Britannia insula, cujus incolarum omnium facies simili candore fulgescit. Gregorius dixit: Christiani sunt iidem insulani, an adhuc Paganis erroribus implicentur? Mercator respondit, Non sunt Christiani, sed Paganis tenentur laqueis irretiti. Tum Gregorius graviter ingemiscens, heu, prob dolor, inquit, quam splendidas facies principes tenebrarum nunc possidet, tantaque frontis speciei vacuum ab interna Dei gratia mentem gestat! Rursum interrogavit quod esset vocabulum gentis illius? Mercator respondit, Angli vocantur. Bene, inquit, ANGELI, quasi ANGELI, quia Angelicos vultus habent, et tales in cælis Angelorum decet esse concives. Iterum ergo interrogat, quod

nomen haberet ipsa Provincia? Mercator respondit, Provinciales illi Deiri vocantur. Et Gregorius, Bene, inquit, DEIRI, quia DE IRA sunt eruenti, et ad Christi gratiam convocandi. Rex, ait, illius provincie quomodo nuncupatur? Mercator respondit; Aelle. Et Gregorius alludens ad nomen, dixit, Bene rex dicitur AELLE, ALELUIA etenim in laudem creatoris in partibus illis oportet decantari. Mox itaque accedens ad Benedictum Apostolicæ sedis Pontificem, cœpit vehementer expetere, ut in Britanniam aliquos verbi ministros mitteret. Quo cum neminem velle ire cognosceret, semet ipsum quoque non dubitavit ingerere, dummodo sibi pontifex licentiam commodaret. Qui licet cum magna cunctatione totius cleri ac populi, Gregorium sponte proficisci cupientem, abire permisit, imprecatus ei divinitus prospera ministrari. De cuius absentia Romani plurimum perturbati, deliberato consilio, trisario per loca viæ contigua unde Pontifex ad B. Petri Basilicam profecturus erat, partiuntur, eumque turmatim taliter alloquuntur: Petrum offendisti, Romam destruxisti, quia Gregorium dimisisti. Quibus sententiis omnino Papa perterritus, misit continuo nuntios qui virum domini revocarent. A quibus, trium dierum itinere jam emenso, compulsus est (licet magnopere tristaretur) ad proprii monasterii curam redire (1). I hope Punning is no offence to Religion: if it is, I know not how we shall excuse St Gregory, who, upon so very serious an occasion as the conversion of poor ignorant Pagans to Christianity, could not forbear quibbling three times in a very short conversation with a merchant upon that subject.

[B] This mission was undertaken in the year of Christ 596. Bede, and the whole stream of authors after him, assign this date; so that the year, in which Augustin was sent into Britain, is past dispute. How long he continued in this island, till death took him away, is not so generally agreed. Most of the writers in Wharton (2), who have given us the succession of the archbishops of Canterbury, tell us, that Augustin sat sixteen years, and place his death in the year 616, about twenty years after his arrival in Britain. But Wharton (3) and the Editor of Bede (4), have shewn, with great probability, that he died in 604 or 605, and consequently the interval from his mission to his death comprehends no more than eight or nine years.

exhortation to the Missionaries [C], by which they were encouraged to prosecute their undertaking (b). At the same time the Pope wrote to Etherius, Archbishop of Arles (c) [D], and to the King and Queen of the Franks, to assist them with necessaries in their journey: by means of which recommendations they were every where entertained with great kindness and respect, and furnished with interpreters [E]. And now Augustin and his companions, having taken their journey through France, embarked for Britain, and, landing in the isle of Thanet, sent some of the French interpreters to King Ethelbert [F], acquainting him that they were come from Rome with the most joyful tidings, and offering him an everlasting kingdom in Heaven. The King, having for the present ordered them to continue in the isle of Thanet, some time after sent for them, and gave them audience, sitting in the open air [G]. Augustin having opened his commission, the [C] Pope Gregory's Letter of exhortation to the Missionaries.] In this Letter he tells them 'it is better not to enter upon a worthy design, than to break off what is commendably begun.' For this reason he earnestly beseeches them 'to exert themselves to the utmost in carrying on the great work they were engaged in, and not to be discouraged at the fatigues of the journey, or censures of bad men; but to press forward with the greatest zeal and application, being well assured they should be rewarded with eternal glory in heaven.' By the same Letter he enjoined them to pay obedience to Augustin as their Abbot, and concludes with his benediction, and wishing them success in their labours. But let us produce the letter itself. It is extant in the sixth Book of St Gregory's Letters (5).

[D] — Etherius, Archbishop of Arles.] It is generally taken for granted, that here is a mistake in the printed copies of Bede, and that Etherius is put instead of Virgilius, since Etherius was at that time Bishop of Lyons. But whether the mistake consists in that, is a matter of doubt. For, in the first place, the Letter, which is in Bede inscribed to Etherius Archbishop of Arles, is not to be found under that title in the collection of Gregory's Letters. In the next place, there is in that collection another Letter to Virgilius, Archbishop of Arles, of the same tenor, but a different form. From whence we may collect, that the mistake is rather in the Letter itself, than in the inscription. Augustin being ready to set out on his journey, Pope Gregory wrote several letters in the same day; the originals of which lying together in his Holiness's scrutoire were transcribed by Nothelmus: and why might he not take one for another, and, by mistake transposing the names and titles, carry to Bede the letter which was written to Etherius, Bishop of Lyons, in the room of that which was written to Virgilius, Archbishop of Arles?

[E] They were — furnished with French interpreters.] Bishop Godwin observes from hence, that the language of the Anglo-Saxons and Franks was at that time much the same: which is not unreasonable to suppose, since those two nations were both of German original, and were transplanted into Britain and Gaul much about the same time, it being not above an hundred and fifty years since the arrival of the Saxons in this island. Nam præterquam quod humanissime ubique accepti sunt, comitatus illo-

rum non paucos adinvenerunt qui interpretum vice fungerentur; ut eadem quodammodo lingua Angli Francique tunc usi viderentur; quod à ratione quidem non abhorret, cum uterque et Franci et Angli (sive Anglo-Saxones malueris appellare) Germaniæ fuerint populi, unde isti in Britanniam ante annos 150, illi in Galliam 130 vix dum elapsi migraverint (6).

[F] — Ethelbert, King of Kent.] This prince's dominions, as Bede observes (7), extended as far as the Humber. It is true, the kingdoms of the East-Saxons and the East-Angles were now in being: but Ethelbert being a more potent prince than the rest, several of those petty kings were tributaries to him. He was at that time married to Bertha, daughter of Clotaire I, king of the Franks. That Lady was a Christian, and, by the articles of her marriage, had the free exercise of her religion allowed her, and a church in the suburbs of Canterbury, called St Martin's. One Luidhard a French Bishop (8), who came over with her, officiated as her chaplain and confessor (9). Christianity having this countenance at Ethelbert's court, we may reasonably imagine that several of the Saxons were either brought over, or at least disposed for conversion, before the arrival of Augustin. And thus, by these preparatory steps, the way was plained for the Missionaries, and King Ethelbert disposed to give them a more favourable reception. For this reason Capgrave (10) calls Luidhard Augustin's Harbinger, and affirms, that he prepared the way for his coming, and made his enterprize more practicable. Which remark will appear very reasonable to any one, who considers with what unexpected kindness Augustin was received at his first arrival in Britain.

[G] The King — gave them audience, sitting in the open air.] The reason why Ethelbert received them in this manner proceeded from a superstitious fancy, which made him decline trusting himself in a house with these strangers; for fear, if they had dealt in the black art, they might have surprized his understanding, and proved too hard for him. Caverat enim ne in aliquam domum ad se introirent, veteri usus augurio, ne superventu suo, si quid maleficæ artis habuissent, eum superando deciperent (11). 'But these good men,' continues Bede, 'held no correspondence with the Devil, but had their authority and credentials from Heaven. When they were introduced to the King, they carried a silver cross for their banner, together with the picture of our blessed Saviour, and, singing divine service, they put up their prayers to God Almighty for his blessing on themselves and those they came to convert.' At illi non demoniaca, sed divina virtute præditi veniebant, crucem pro vexillo ferentes argenteam, et imaginem Domini salvatoris in tabula depictam, letaniiisque canentes, pro sua simul, et eorum propter quos et ad quos venerant, salute æterna Domino supplicabant (12). Baronius (13), in transcribing this passage of Bede, falls into some tragical reflexions on the condition of the modern Church of England. He represents the case, as if the English, in his time, had, in a manner, apostatized from Christianity. He tells us, that Augustin the Apostle of the English was a monk, and that the rest of the Missionaries were of the same order; that they appeared at their audience, and made their entrance into Canterbury, with the cross and the picture of our Saviour carried before them: and then he complains, that these things were all forgotten and laid aside by the modern English. Let us hear how Mr Collier replies to this charge. That author observes, that the terms of communion stand by no means upon the same foot, they did in Gregory the Great's time (14). Then he proceeds to a particular refutation of the Cardinal's charge.

the King told them, their doctrine was new to him, and that he could not suddenly recede from the religion of his country: however, as their coming was with a kind intention, he gave them leave to convert as many of his subjects as they could, and assigned their place of residence at Dorovernum, since called Canterbury [H]; which they entered in procession, singing an hymn (d) [I]. Here Augustin and his companions applied themselves to the strict severity of the monastic life, and preached the Gospel jointly with the French Christians in the church of St Martin's; to which they were confined till the conversion of the King himself [K]; after which they had full liberty to preach in any part of that Prince's dominions (e). Augustin was so successful in his labours for the propagation of Christianity, that it is said he baptized ten thousand persons of both sexes, in one day, in the river Swale [L]. And now, by direction of the Pope, charge. 'It may be replied, in the first place (says he) as to the monastick life, that the Church of England has not declared against it in any of her articles. Besides, the Cardinal may remember, that the dissolution of Abbies here, was an act of the State, and not of the Church; that it was prior to the Reformation, and carried on by a prince and parliament of the Roman Communion in all points, excepting the Supremacy. Secondly, As to the cross and our Saviour's picture, the Church of England has a great regard for both of them, and makes use of the first in the solemn administration of Baptism. 'Tis true, we dare not carry our respects to the lengths of the Church of Rome. And if we examine the passage in Bede, though we find St Augustin, and his companions, carried the cross, and our Saviour's picture, in their procession, yet there is not the least intimation that they worshipped them. Nay, 'tis plain that image-worship was none of the doctrine of Rome in that age: for Pope Gregory the Great determines flatly 'against it.' Here Mr Collier produces partly of two letters, written by St Gregory to Serenus Bishop of Marzeilles (15), in proof of his assertion; and then goes on to shew, that this Pope did not carry the supremacy up to the pretensions since insisted on by the court of Rome, as appears from his complaint against John Bishop of Constantinople, for taking the title of Universal Bishop upon him (16), and from three other letters, one to the Emperor Mauritius (17), the second to Anastatius Bishop of Antioch (18), and the last to Eulogius Bishop of Alexandria (19).

[H] The King assigned their place of residence at — Canterbury. Namely, in the parish of St Alphege, on the north-side of the High or King's Street, where, in Thorn's time, the Archbishop's palace stood, now called Stable-gate (20). Before Augustin's time, here was a kind of Oratory, or Chapel for the Royal Family, where they worshipped and offered sacrifice to their Gods. Concessit iis locum habitationis in civitate Doroberniæ situatum, videlicet in parochia sancti Alphegi ex opposito regie strætæ versus aquilonem, per quam murus palatii archiepiscopalis in longitudine se extendit — situs ille Stablegate vocatus est; fuerat enim tunc temporis quasi oratorium pro familia regis, ut ibi adorarent, et diis suis libamina immolarent (21).

[I] They entered Canterbury in procession, singing an hymn. It was a very short one, consisting only of this petition. 'Deprecamur te, Domine, in omni misericordia tua, ut auferatur furor tuus et ira tua a civitate ista, et de domo sancta tua, quoniam peccavimus. Alleluia (22). — O Lord, according to thy mercy, we beseech thee, let thine anger and thy fury be turned away from this city, and from thy holy place; for we have sinned. Hallelujah.'

[K] — Till the conversion of the King himself. This Prince could not long hold out against the exemplary life of the Missionaries, the reasonableness of their doctrine, and the miracles wrought by Augustin, in confirmation of it. In short, King Ethelbert was baptized, and his example had a wonderful effect in promoting the conversion of his subjects. One part of his conduct on this occasion deserves the highest commendation. Though he was extremely pleased at his subjects becoming Christians, yet he compelled no body to his own belief, only bestowing more countenance and affection upon those that were profelyted to Christianity. For he had learned (says venerable Bede) from his instructors in the way of salvation, that force and dragooning was not the method of the Gospel; that the religion of Jesus Christ was to make his way by argument and persuasion; to be matter of choice, and not of compulsion. Didicerat enim a Doctõribus auctoribusque suæ salutis, servitium Christi voluntarium non coactitium esse debere (23). I shall leave the reader to make his own reflexions on this matter, and to compare the spirit of moderation and Christian charity, which actuated St Augustin and King Ethelbert, with that persecuting, inquisitorial spirit, which has since prevailed in the Church of Rome.

[L] Augustin baptized ten thousand persons in one day in the river Swale. This we are told by Gervase: 'Beatus autem Augustinus verbum Dei prædicans, et ubique pedibus non in equis faleratis incedens, concurrentibus populis baptizavit una die promiscui sexus decem millia in flumine quod ab incolis Sualeve vocatur, prope Eboracum (24) — But St Augustin, preaching the word of God, and going about every where on foot, not on a horse with rich trappings, baptized in one day a mixed multitude of both sexes, in number ten thousand, in a river near York, called by the inhabitants Sualewe.' Camden (25) gives us the following extract from an antient fragment of that age, in which the story is thus related. Upon one single Christmas-day (to the eternal honour of the English nation) Austin baptized above ten thousand men, besides an infinite number of women and children. But, pray, how should Priests, or others in holy orders, be got, to baptize such a prodigious number? the Archbishop, after he had consecrated the river Swale, commanded by the criers and the principal men, that they should with faith go in two by two, and in the name of the holy Trinity baptize each other. Thus were they all regenerate, by as great a miracle, as once the people of Israel passed through the divided sea, and through Jordan, when it was turned back. For in the same manner here, so great a variety of sex and age passed such a deep chanel, and yet (which in human account is incredible) not one received harm. A strange miracle this was! but what is yet a greater, the river cures all diseases and infirmities. Whoever steps in faint and disordered, comes out sound and whole. What a joyful sight was this for angels and men! so many thousands of a profelyte nation coming out of the chanel of the same river, as out of the womb of one mother! one single pool preparing so many inhabitants for the heavenly mansions. Hereupon Pope Gregory (with all the companies of the Saints above) broke forth into joy, and could not rest till he had written to Eulogius, the holy patriarch of Alexandria, most joyfully to congratulate him upon so vast a number being baptized on one Christmas-day. But this story is not without it's difficulties. For in the first place, the river Swale, in which this wonderful Baptism was performed, is said to be near York. But it does not appear from Bede, that Augustin ever travelled so far northward.

In the next place, what these authors ascribe to Augustin, is by Bede related of Paulinus Archbishop of York; who, according to that historian, baptized in the river Swale, which runs by Catterick. Baptizabat in fluvio Sualeva, qui vicum Cataractam præterfluit (26). Nevertheless we have the testimony of Pope Gregory, in the above-mentioned letter to Eulogius Patriarch of Alexandria, that Augustin baptized no fewer than ten thousand converts. The truth of the case seems to be, that our missionary baptized his converts, not in the Swale near York, but in another river of the same name at the mouth of the Medway. The mistake of Gervase and others arose from confounding Augustin with Paulinus. I shall only observe farther, that the view of these writers, he went over to Arles in France, where he was consecrated Archbishop and Metropolitan of the English nation [M] by the Archbishop of that place; after which, returning into Britain, he dispatched away Lawrence a Priest, and Peter a Monk, to Rome, to acquaint the Pope with the success of his mission, and to desire his resolution of certain questions. These emissaries being returned, brought with them Gregory's answers to Augustin's queries [N], together writers, in sending him so far northward, seems to have been, partly to give the higher idea of his labours and his authority, and partly to make it the more probable that he was the occasion of the slaughter of the Monks of Bangor (27).

[M] He was consecrated Archbishop and metropolitan of the English nation.] Baronius pretends, that Augustin was consecrated a Bishop in France, before his arrival in Britain (28). This he infers from St Gregory's letter to Eulogius Patriarch of Alexandria, in which he acquaints him that the new English converts were baptized the Christmas after Augustin's arrival (29). If this be true, Bede must be mistaken in reporting that he travelled from Britain to Arles for the Episcopal character. But, in the beginning of the next century (30), the Cardinal seems to quit the authority of Pope Gregory's epistle, and rely upon Bede; for he tells us, that Augustin, pursuant to the Pope's instructions, went from Britain to Arles for his consecration. M. Rapin censures Augustin for being in too much haste to take upon himself the dignity of an Archbishop. 'Had he been content (says that author) with the simple title of Bishop, there would have been nothing extraordinary in it. But one cannot help being surprized to see him aspire to the dignity of an Archbishop, at a time when there was as yet no Bishop under his jurisdiction. It is true, the Pope had given him leave to assume that title in case his mission was followed with success. But, by success, it is most probable Gregory meant the general conversion of the English, and not that of a part only of the kingdom of Kent, one of the smallest of the Heptarchy. How great a progress soever Augustin had made in respect to the short time of his abode in Britain, it was however but small in comparison of what remained to be converted. So that his precipitation in assuming the dignity of Archbishop and Primate of England, at a time when there was but one single church there, namely that of Canterbury, is doubtless not very much to his honour. All that can be said in his justification is, that the progress, which Christianity made at it's first setting out at Canterbury, gave him reason to think that the conversion of the rest of England would soon follow' (31).

[N] Gregory's answers to Augustin's queries.] Venerable Bede has reported them at length (32); and here follows an abridgment of them, to satisfy the curiosity of the English reader. I. Question, 'How ought the Bishops to behave towards their Clergy?' 'Into how many portions ought the offerings at the altar to be distributed? And how is a Bishop to act in the church?' With respect to the first point, the Pope refers Augustin to St Paul's Epistles to Timothy. With regard to the second, he tells him, that the Roman Church requires the Bishops to divide the revenues of the church into four portions; the first for the Bishop, the second for the Clergy, the third for the Poor, and the fourth for the repairs of the churches. As to the third point, which would have been very obscure, if the Pope had not cleared it up in his answer, he says, that Augustin being a Monk, ought not to live separated from his brethren, but after the custom of the first Christians, who had all their goods and possessions in common. He adds, that if there were any of the brethren, who had not received holy orders, and who could not contain, they were at liberty to marry, and might receive their portions in their own houses; because it is said in Scripture, that, in the beginning of Christianity, distribution was made to each according to their necessities. As to other Christians, the Pope tells him, it was not necessary to prescribe any rule concerning the giving alms to them, since Jesus Christ himself has said, Give alms of such things as you have, and behold all things are clean unto you. II. Question, 'Since there is but one Faith, how comes it to pass, that the customs of Churches are different in relation to publick worship, and that the Gallican and Roman Churches are not uniform in this matter?' The Pope advises him, upon this head, to take from each Church, what he should judge to be most suitable and convenient for the Church of England. III. Question, 'What punishment ought to be inflicted on those, who rob or plunder the church of it's goods?' Gregory answers, that we ought to distinguish the motives of the theft, whether it was through necessity or covetousness; and that, in punishing the robber, we should proceed with gentleness and charity. As to the measure of the restitution to be made to the church, he decides, that she ought by no means to receive more than she lost. IV. Question, 'May two brothers marry two sisters, who are not related to them by blood?' Gregory answers, that such marriages are lawful. V. Question, 'Within what degree of consanguinity are marriages lawful?' Pope Gregory bars this relation no farther than Cousin-Germans; so that one remove from this nearness of blood, leaves the parties at liberty to inter-marry; which is more than the present Church of Rome allows. VI. Question, 'May a Bishop be consecrated by one Bishop alone, when the distance of place makes it inconvenient for the Bishops of other dioceses to assemble for that purpose?' Gregory replies, that, for the present, Augustin being the only Bishop in England, there was a necessity he should ordain Bishops without assistants: But, to avoid the like inconvenience for the future, he orders him to establish Bishops in places not too far distant from each other. VII. Question, 'How am I to behave with respect to the French, and British Bishops?' The Pope answers peremptorily, that he gives him no jurisdiction over the French Bishops, because the Archbishops of Arles had for a long time received the Pall from his predecessors, and he did not think it lawful to deprive them of the authority they were in possession of; but as to the British Bishops, he puts them all under Augustin's jurisdiction. VIII. Question, 'Is it lawful to baptize a woman, who is with child?' The Pope answers in the affirmative, not apprehending any inconvenience that might arise from such practice. IX. Question, 'How long ought a woman to stay, after her lying in, before she is re-admitted into the church?' Gregory limits no time, but allows women to enter into the church as soon after their delivery, as they can with safety. X. Question, 'How long after the birth of a Child, ought the ceremony of baptism to be deferred?' The Pope allows baptism to be administered, the very moment after the birth. XI. Question, 'How long ought the husband to stay, after the Wife's lying-in, before he returns to her embraces?' Gregory gives a very long answer to this question, and takes occasion to blame those mothers, who suffer their children to be suckled by strange nurses, ascribing so blameable a practice to their incontinence; for which reason he decides, that the husband ought not to return to his wife, till after the child is weaned. Nevertheless he permits those women, who do not suckle their children, to lie with their husbands after the usual time of purgation. XII. Question, 'Is it lawful for a woman to enter into the church at all times?' The Pope has a great deal of reasoning upon this head, and concludes, that the infirmities of women ought not to hinder them from assisting at the public devotions of the church. XIII. Question, 'May a Man, who has lain with a woman, come into the church, or receive the Communion, before he has washed himself?' Here, Gregory, as usual, makes a good number of distinctions, and concludes, that such men would do better to refrain some short time from going into the church, or receiving the Communion. XIV. Question, 'Is it lawful for a man, after impure dreams, to receive the Communion; and, if he be a Priest, may he administer it?' The Pope's answer to this question is exceedingly full of distinctions, between what is, and what is not a sin. At last he concludes, that a man, under such circumstances, ought to abstain together with a Pall [O], and several books, vestments, utensils, and ornaments for the churches (f). His Holiness, by the same messengers, gave him directions concerning the settling episcopal Sees in Britain [P], and ordered him not to pull down the idol-temples,

from the Communion. Nevertheless, he allows a Priest in this case to administer the Sacrament, provided no other can be found to officiate in his room. These are the difficulties, of which Augustin desired a solution from his Holiness. It is true, they do not serve to give us the highest idea imaginable of this Missionary's judgment. However Gregory thought it proper to reply to them in the fullest manner, as if they had been of the last importance. He had the conversion of the English very much at heart; and for this reason, he is so far from discouraging Augustin, that he bestows the highest commendations on him.

[O] He received from Pope Grégoire the Pall] This being the first example in our history of the Pall being sent into England, I shall here entertain the reader a little with the form, antiquity, and design of this habit of distinction, and the great consequences it has drawn along with it. The PALL, as Harpsfield (33) describes it, is a small piece of woolen cloth, put over the Archbishop's shoulders, when he officiates. It is not ornamented with any rich dye, but is of the original colour of the wool on the sheep's back. It is laid upon St Peter's tomb, by the Bishops of Rome, and then sent away to the respective Metropolitans. This ancient ceremony is supposed to signify these two things; first, that the homeliness of the Pall might prevent the Archbishop's growing vain, from the richness of the rest of his habit; secondly, that, considering the Pall was taken from St Peter's tomb, he might be careful to adhere to St Peter's doctrine. Thus far Harpsfield. But the learned Peter de la Marca, Archbishop of Paris, has a much larger and more instructive discourse upon this subject. As to the form, he observes (34), that the modern Pall is very different from the ancient. That now in use is nothing but a border of white woolen cloth, made round, and thrown over the shoulders; from which hang two other pieces, the one falling down upon the breast, and the other upon the back; the whole ornamented with red crosses, and tacked on with three golden pins. But the ancient Pall was a rich robe of state, and hung down to the ground, being the same with that which the Greeks called ἠμοφορεον. This the Latins called Pallium; which is a proof that it was an entire garment, and not, as at present, a cover only for the shoulders, breast, and back. And Pope Gregory informs us, in one of his letters (35), that it was a magnificent habit, designed to put the Prelate in mind, that his life ought to answer the dignity of his habit. The learned Peter de la Marca observes farther (36), that the Pall was part of the Imperial habit, and that the Emperors gave the Patriarchs leave to wear it. Thus Constantine's Donation, inserted in Gratian's Decretum, informs us, that the use of the Pall was given to the Bishop of Rome by that Prince. It is true, De Marca acknowledges this donation to be a counterfeit evidence: nevertheless the antiquity of it is not very inconsiderable, it being extant in the time of Charles the Great, and Adrian I (37). So that the Pall's being a favour from the Emperors, is an opinion of above eight hundred years standing. This point may be farther proved by unquestionable authority; for Liberatus Diaconus tells us (38), that Anthimus, Patriarch of Constantinople, being expelled his See, returned the Pall to the Emperor Justinian; which must imply, that he had received it from that Prince. De Marca produces some other proofs of this point (39), which the reader may consult, if he is not already satisfied. Among other encroachments of the Papal on the Imperial power, the privilege of granting the Pall was no inconsiderable one, as it made the Archbishops and Patriarchs entirely dependent on the See of Rome. The necessity of procuring the Pall, was decreed in the eighth General Council of Constantinople, held in the year 872, in the Pontificate of Adrian II. This council passed a Canon to oblige the Metropolitans to receive confirmation from their respective Patriarchs, either by imposition of hands, or the grant of the Pall. This Canon is not in the Greek text of the council, but only in the version of A-naftafus. However we may infer thus much from it, that it was no less customary for the Eastern Patriarchs, to send the Pall to the Metropolitans within their jurisdiction, than for the Pope to send it to those of the West (40). After the Metropolitans of Europe had submitted to the above-mentioned Canon, and owned themselves obliged to receive the Pall, they had new conditions of servitude imposed upon them by the See of Rome. For now they were obliged to promise obedience and subjection to the Apostolic See under their hand-writing. This new law was introduced by Boniface, Archbishop of Mentz, in the Synod held by him, A.D. 742 (41). Gregory VII, who was of an enterprising temper, resolved to secure the subjection of the Metropolitans by a stronger tie, and accordingly changed the promise of obedience into the following oath of allegiance; Non ero in consilio, neque in facto, ut vitam, aut membra, aut Papatum perdam. i. e. 'I will neither be assisting with my person or advice, to the intent that they (the Popes) may lose life, limb, or Popedom (42).' As to the Pall, the Decretals, published by order of Pope Gregory IX, in the XIII Century, obliged every Archbishop not to call a council, bless the chrysm, consecrate churches, or ordain Bishops, till he had received his Pall from the See of Rome; at the delivery of which he was to swear fidelity to the Pope.

[P] The Pope gave him directions concerning the settling Episcopal Sees in Britain.] This he did in a letter dated the 10th of the Kalends of June. After acquainting him, that he had sent him the Pall, as a mark of his esteem for the great service he had done in converting the English, he orders him to erect twelve Sees within his Province, and that the Bishop of London should receive the Pall from the Apostolic See. He likewise orders him to settle a Bishop at York; adding withal, that, if that city and the adjacent country should become Christians, he was to form it into a Province, with twelve Suffragans under the Metropolitan of York; to which Archbishop his Holiness designed to send a Pall, with this reservation, that he should be subject to the Primate of Canterbury. His Holiness proceeds to direct, that, after Augustin's death, the Archbishop of York was to preside over the Bishops ordained by him, and to be perfectly independent of the See of London; that the precedence of the Bishops of London and York was to be regulated by the priority of their consecrations; and that they should act with unanimity for the common interest of Christianity, and not clash or interfere with each other. I shall transcribe the letter itself. It is extant in Bede (43).

temples, but convert them into Christian churches [Q]; cautioning him withal not to be puffed up with the miracles (g) he was enabled to work in confirmation of his ministry [R]. Augustin, having fixed his See at Canterbury, dedicated an old church; formerly built by some Roman Christians, to the honour of our Saviour; and King Ethelbert founded the abbey of St Peter and St Paul, since called St Augustin's (b) [S]. Being thus supported by the interest of King Ethelbert, Augustin made an attempt to settle a correspondence with the British Bishops, and to bring them to a conformity with the Roman Church [T]. To this purpose a conference was held at a place in Worcester-

This letter is the more curious and important, as it contains the original plan of the English Hierarchy, and as it gave rise to the frequent disputes in succeeding ages between the Sees of Canterbury, York, London, and St Andrew's in Scotland.

[Q] Gregory ordered him not to pull down the Idol temples, but convert them into Christian churches.] The reason of this injunction was this; that the natives, by frequenting the same temples they had been always accustomed to, might be the less shocked at their entrance into Christianity. And therefore his Holiness directed, that the idols should be destroyed, and those places of worship sprinkled with holy water. And, whereas it had been their custom to sacrifice oxen to their false gods, he advised, that, upon the anniversary of each church's consecration, the people should erect booths round about it, and feast therein, not sacrificing their oxen to devils, but killing them for their own refreshment, and praising God for the blessing. And thus by allowing them some gratifications of sense, they might relish Christianity the better, and be raised by degrees to the nobler pleasures of the mind. And here Gregory alleges the example of God himself, who, when he discovered himself to the Israelites in Egypt, did not forbid them the customary rites of sacrificing, but transferred their worship from the devil to himself (44). Thus Pope Gregory wisely condescended to the weakness of the new converts, and complied with part of their prejudices, as a more likely expedient to reconcile them to Christianity, than if he had indulged them in no circumstance of their former customs, but drove them wholly from one extreme to another.

[R] — Cautioning him not to be puffed up with the miracles, he was enabled to work, in confirmation of his ministry] After having premised his great satisfaction at the conversion of the English, he lets him know he was convinced, that God had wrought surprizing miracles in favour of his mission. He tells him, he had reason to rejoice, that the exterior pomp and dazzling lustre of miracles, had brought the English to the inward reformation and spiritual advantage designed by them; but, on the other side, he ought to be afraid, lest, through human infirmity, he should grow vain upon this privilege. And therefore he desires him to remember, that, when the disciples told our Saviour, with an air of transport, Lord, even the devils are subject unto us through thy name, they received this answer, Rejoice not, that the spirits are subject unto you, but rather rejoice that your names are written in heaven, Luke x. 17. He proceeds to exhort the Archbishop to examine the state of his mind with great care and impartiality, otherwise the power of working miracles might prove a snare to him. He advises him to consider, how much the English were the favourites of heaven, since God enabled him to alter the course of nature, and perform such wonderful things, to promote their conversion. He advises him farther, frequently to recollect his own failings, this being a good expedient to preserve his humility, and suppress the tumours of pride. Lastly, he puts him in mind, that whatever degrees of supernatural power were bestowed upon him, they were not designed for figure and greatness, nor given for his own sake; but intended principally for the advantage of those, whose happiness he was sent to procure. Scio, frater charissime, quia omnipotens Deus per dilectionem tuam in gentem quam eligi voluit, magna miracula ostendit; unde necesse est, ut de eodem dono cælesti et timendo gaudeas, et gaudento pertimescas. Gaudeas videlicet, quia Anglorum animæ per exteriora miracula ad interiorum gratiam pertrahuntur: pertimescas vero, ne inter signa quæ sunt infirmus animus sui præsumptione se elevet, et unde foras in honorem tollitur, inde per inanem gloriam intus cadat. Meminisse etenim debemus, quia discipuli cum gaudio a prædicatione redeuntes, dum cælesti magistro dicerent; Domine, in nomine tuo etiam dæmonia nobis subjecta sunt; protinus audierunt: Nolite gaudere super hoc, sed potius gaudete quia nomina vestra scripta sunt in cælo. In privata enim et temporali lætitia mentem posuerant qui de miraculis gaudebant; sed de privato ad communem, de temporali ad æternam lætitiâ revocantur quibus dicitur: In hoc gaudete, quia nomina vestra scripta sunt in cælo. Non enim omnes Electi miracula faciunt; sed tamen eorum nomina omnium in cælo tenentur adscripta. Veritatis etenim discipulis esse gaudium non debet, nisi de eo bono quod commune cum omnibus habent. Restat itaque, frater charissime, ut inter ea quæ operante Deo exterius facis, semper te interius subtiliter judices, ac subtiliter intelligas, et temetipsum quis scis, et quanta sit in eadem gente gratia, pro cuius conversione etiam faciendorum signorum dona percepisti. Et si quando te Creatori nostro seu per linguam, sive per opera reminisceris deliquisse, semper hæc ad memoriam revoces, ut surgentem cordis gloriam memoria reatus premat. Et quicquid de faciendis figuris accepseris vel accepisti, hæc non tibi sed illis deputes donata, pro quorum tibi salute collata sunt (45).

[S] King Ethelbert founded the abbey of St Peter and St Paul, since called St Augustin's.] Cœnobii magnificētissimi (says Godwin) jecit fundamenta sub ipsis mœnibus Cantuariensis civitatis, ab ipso Petri et Pauli, sed a posteris Divi Augustini in hodiernum usque diem nuncupati. Nam nondum demolitum visitur adhuc, et pars patrimonii regii censetur. Regia vero, succedentium deinceps Archiepiscoporum semper fuit et est adhuc palatium (46).

— He (King Ethelbert) laid the foundation of a most magnificent convent, close by the walls of the city of Canterbury, to which he gave the title of St Peter and St Paul; but in after-times it was called the Abbey of St Augustin, which name it retains to this day. For it is not entirely destroyed, and what remains is looked upon as a part of the royal patrimony. It was antiently the residence of the Kings of Kent; afterwards it was given to the Archbishops, whose palace it still continues to be.

[T] Augustin attempted to settle a correspondence with the British Bishops, and to bring them to a conformity with the Roman Church.] The Britons, from the first time of planting Christianity in the island, had constantly followed the rules and customs left them by their first masters. But the Church of Rome had made certain alterations in the manner of celebrating divine service, to which it pretended all other Churches ought to conform. The Churches of the West, as being the nearest to Rome, were the most easily gained; and almost all of them, excepting those of France and Milan, conformed at last to the Roman Ritual. But Britain still continued, as it shire since called Augustin's Oak; where the Archbishop endeavoured to persuade the British Prelates to make but one communion, and assist in preaching to the unconverted Saxons. But failing in this attempt, he was willing to appeal to the supernatural evidence of a miracle, and accordingly, at the close of the dispute, a blind Saxon being brought to the British Bishops for a cure, and not meeting with relief, was carried to St Augustin, who presently restored him to sight. But this not yet satisfying the Bishops, a second conference was proposed and held [U]; which proving as unsuccessful as the former, Augustin is said to have threatened the Britons with a terrible calamity, as a punishment of their disobedience; which, the historians tell us, accordingly fell upon them were, A World apart. Since the embassy of Lucius to Pope Eleutherius, the Britons had very little communication with the Bishops of Rome. They acknowledged them only as Bishops of a particular Diocese, or, at most, as heads of a Patriarchate, on which they did not think the British Church ought to be any way dependent. They were so far from receiving orders from the Pope, that they were even strangers to his pretensions. But Augustin, full of zeal for the interests of the See of Rome, made an attempt to bring them to acknowledge the superiority of the Pope over all other Churches. It is not easy to say, how far Augustin intended to have led them, since it does not appear, that he had any instructions on this head from Gregory I, who was very far from aspiring to that excess of authority, which his successors arrogated to themselves. However it cannot be denied, that this Pope claimed a jurisdiction over the churches of Britain, since, in his letter to Augustin, he appointed him Metropolitan of the whole island. Nor can it be supposed, that Augustin would have insisted so strongly on this article, if he had not been very sure of the Pope's approbation.

[U] A second conference was proposed, and held. The appearance at this assembly was much greater than at the former; for now there came seven British Bishops, and a great many learned Monks from the monastery of Bancornaburg or Bangor, who were under the direction of their Abbot, Dinoth. These Britons, at their setting forward to the Synod, applied themselves to a certain Hermit, eminent for virtue and good sense; and asked his opinion, whether they should give up the usages and traditions of their Church, and acknowledge the pretensions of Augustin. His answer was; if he was a man of God, they ought to be governed by him. They desired to be informed how they should know whether he was, or not. He replied, 'Our Saviour says; Take my yoke upon you, for I am meek and lowly in heart. If therefore Augustin be a man of an affable and humble disposition, it is very probable he has taken the yoke of Christ upon him, and offers you the same privilege. But if his behaviour be haughty and insolent, it is plain he is no agent from Heaven, nor is his discourse to be regarded.' They asked him farther, by what marks they were to discover his temper of mind. The Hermit answered, they should manage it so, that Augustin and his company should come first to the place; and then, if he rose up to salute them at their coming in, they might conclude, that he was sent from God; but if he neglected to pay them this civility, they might return his contempt, and have nothing to do with him (47). Baronius is by no means pleased with the Hermit's criterion: he calls him a false Prophet, and charges him with laying down a wrong mark of humility (48). But why all this hard language upon the poor Anchorite, whom Bede acknowledges to have been eminent both for piety and prudence? But the Cardinal pretends to justify his satire from this text of St John: If there come any unto you, and bring not this doctrine, receive him not into your house, neither bid him God speed. Where he seems not to have considered, that those who were to be received thus coldly, and kept at such a distance, were such as denied our Saviour's being come in the flesh. But Augustin could not charge the Britons with any infidelity or apostasy from the faith; and therefore he might have received them with respect and civility. But Baronius will have it, that Augustin knew them to be an obstinate people, and that they were not to be moved by the authority of the Apostolick See. If this be true, why did he give himself all this trouble, and appoint a second meeting? Besides, the Cardinal might have remembered, that it was always the custom of the Church, to treat Hereticks, and even Heathens, with common civility. But still the Cardinal will not allow, that Augustin's not rising up to salute the Britons, was a sufficient ground for rejecting his proposals. What, says he, are malefactors to except against the authority of their judge, because he will not compliment them? Our Saviour enjoined obedience to the Scribes and Pharisees, because they sat in Moses's seat; for their pride was no forfeiture of their authority. Thus Baronius argues upon the supposition of the Pope's supremacy, which was a doctrine the British Church knew nothing of. But to proceed to the conference. When the Britons came into the Synod, and found that Augustin received them sitting, they resented the affront, and warmly opposed every thing offered by him. The articles insisted on by Augustin were; that they should celebrate Easter, and administer Baptism, according to the practice of the Roman Church; and that they should acknowledge the Pope's authority. If they would comply in these respects, and assist in the conversion of the Saxons, he would bear with the disagreement of their customs in other cases. But the Britons replied, they could yield none of the points contested (49). As to the Pope's authority, what their sense was upon that article, appears by Abbot Dinoth's answer, who spoke for the rest. He told Augustin, 'That the British Churches owed the deference of brotherly kindness and charity to the Church of God, the Pope of Rome, and to all Christians; but they knew of no other obedience due from them to him, whom they called the Pope; that, for their parts, they were under the direction of the Bishop of Caerleon upon Usk, who, under God, was their spiritual overseer and director.' This part of the conference is not related by Bede, but was transcribed from a manuscript by Sir Henry Spelman (50), who has given it us in Welsh, English, and Latin, and tells us, he had it from Mr Peter Mostin, a Welsh gentleman. It appeared to Sir Henry, to be a very old manuscript, transcribed from an older, but without date or author. However, to weaken the authority of this manuscript, it is objected, that there was at that time no Bishop of Caerleon upon Usk, nor had been, since the metropolitanical jurisdiction had been translated to Menevia, by St David. In answer to which, it is granted, that, from the time of Dubricius, the See was transferred, first to Landaff, and then to St David's; but this latter translation was not agreed to by all the British Bishops; and Caerleon being the ancient Metropolitanical See, it was no absurdity to mention that place, in a dispute which turned upon ancient right. But the certainty of the British Churches rejecting the Pope's authority, does not depend on the credit of this Welsh manuscript. For the point is sufficiently clear from Bede, who tells us (51), the British Clergy declared against owning Augustin for their Archbishop; whereas, had they acknowledged the Pope's supremacy, they could not but have submitted to Augustin, who acted under his commission. If it be enquired why the British Clergy were so tenacious of their old customs, as to break with Augustin, rather than alter their way of keeping Easter, and administering Baptism; it may be replied, that these terms were not required of them, as conditions of brotherly communion, but as marks of submission and inferiority. And therefore, the British Bishops, perceiving their liberties were struck at, and relenting, at the same time, the seeming disrespect with which they were treated, were by no means in a disposition to comply with any propositions Augustin could make to them.

them (i) [W]. In the year 604, Augustin consecrated two of his companions, Mellitus (i) Bede, l. ii. c. 2. and Justus, the former to the See of Rochester, and the latter to that of London. The same year, having appointed Laurence to succeed him, this Apostle of the English died at Canterbury, and was buried in the church-yard of the monastery that went by his name, the cathedral being not then finished: but, after the consecration of that church, his body was taken up, and deposited in the north porch (k); where it lay, till, in the year 1091, it was removed and placed in the church, by Wido Abbot of Canterbury (l) [X]. The inscription upon St Augustin's tomb, given us by Bede (m), is generally thought

[W] Augustin is said to have threatened the Britons with a terrible calamity — which — accordingly fell upon them.] Being disappointed in the success of this Synod, he said to them, at going away, If ye will not accept of peace with your brethren, ye shall receive war from your enemies; and if ye will not preach the way of life to the English, ye shall suffer death from their hands, by way of revenge. This unfriendly prediction, Bede tells us, was afterwards fulfilled; for Ethelfrid, King of Northumberland, marched with a great army to Caerlcon, and made a terrible slaughter of the Britons. The description of this battle, in which near twelve hundred of the Monks of Bangor were put to the sword, may be seen in Bede (52), who takes care to inform us, that it was fought after the Death of Augustin. But several writers are of opinion, that this passage of Bede is interpolated, because it is not found in King Alfred's Saxon version. And Bishop Godwin (53) takes notice of a Charter signed by Ethelfrid and Augustin, in the year 605, which he makes to be the year of this battle. In answer to these objections, it may be observed, that, though the contested passage be not in King Alfred's translation, yet it was in all the most ancient manuscripts of the original (54); and that Alfred omitted translating it, because the history of Augustin's Life was not yet finished; for, in the next chapter, he is said to have consecrated two Bishops, Mellitus and Justus. As to the objection of Augustin's signing King Ethelbert's charter, the learned Sir Henry Spelman observes (55), that it was the Saxon custom of that age, to pass estates and privileges without instruments in writing; and that King Withred, who reigned about the year 700, was the first who introduced written deeds; so that all the charters, prior to this time, are to be suspected of forgery. Farther, that Augustin died in the year 604, and before the slaughter of the Monks of Bangor, the learned Wharton endeavours to put beyond all question. For he alleges the testimony of an ancient book, cited by William Thorn; from whence it is evident, that Augustin and Pope Gregory both died in the same year; but it is past all dispute, that the latter died in 604 (56). It is of great consequence to settle this point, since no less depends upon it, than the truth or falshood of an accusation, which reflects the highest infamy on the memory of Augustin. For he is charged with having been, not only the author, but even the principal actor, in the tragedy above-mentioned. Bishop Godwin, who is not inclined to speak favourably of Augustin, calls him, with a sneer, an excellent Prophet indeed, who could so readily foretell, what was in his own power to bring to pass. Vatem scilicet præclarum, qui illa potuit prædicere, quæ ut efficeret, in sua novit esse potestate (57)! Then he goes on to acquaint us, that, by his authority and influence over King Ethelbert, he easily prevailed with that Prince, to make war with the Britons, and to excite Ethelfrid, King of Northumberland, against them. And in support of this charge, he cites the following passage out of one Thomas Graius, who (he tells us) lived three hundred years ago, and wrote Annals in the French language. 'Augustinus ab Episcopis et aliis inter Britannos doctis hominibus hoc pacto rejectus, Ethelberto Cantiorum regim graviter conquestus est, ut exercitum protinus grandem collegerit, et in eos impetum faciens, magnam illorum numerum interfecerit, quorum nihil magis miserum est quam solet lupus ovcularum. — Augustin, being in this manner rejected by the Bishops and other learned men among the Britons, complained so heavily thereof to Ethelbert, King of Kent, that that Prince immediately levied a considerable army, and falling upon them, destroyed great multitudes of them, taking no more pity of them than a wolf does of a flock of sheep.' Then the Bishop goes on to acquaint us farther, upon the authority of a very ancient anonymous manuscript, which he does not cite, that Ethelbert, at the instigation of Augustin, borrowed forces of Ethelfrid, King of Northumberland, for carrying on the war against the Britons inhabiting Wales; and that Archbishop Augustin himself came up with them, and gained a complete victory over them, at Chester (58). If this account were a true one, the Bishop might well exclaim; Nimum profecto hæc sapient ambitionem et potentiam in immensum augendæ cupiditatem illam effrenem, qua semper a primis incunabilis Roma laboravit (59). i. e. 'Such proceedings surely favour a little too much of that ambition and unbounded thirst after power, which the See of Rome has constantly discovered.' But if Augustin, as is most probable, died before the slaughter of the Britons, then one half at least of the story is false; and if one half be not true, the reader is left to judge what credit the other part deserves. As a farther justification of Augustin from the charge in question, let us cite Mr Collier. 'As for Augustin's prediction of this calamity (says that author) it does not at all infer, he was any way instrumental in it. It amounts only to a warm expression, dropt upon a disappointment, and a probable conjecture upon the posture of affairs; for, at that time, the country was much embroiled, and the Britons surrounded with formidable enemies, so that unless, by closing with Augustin, they procured King Ethelbert for their ally, he foresaw the case might probably go hard with them. Besides, we are to observe, that the defeat was given the Britons by King Ethelfrid, a Pagan Prince, whose dominions lay beyond the Humber, and by consequence could be no homager to King Ethelbert. For these reasons, there is no manner of likelihood, that Augustin should have any interest or correspondence with him. To this we may add, in the last place, that the annals of Ulster reckon the slaughter of the British Monks by King Ethelfrid to the year of our Lord 613, which was certainly after the death of Archbishop Augustin: And this computation is allowed by the learned Primate Usher (60).' Nicholas Trivet, who wrote a Chronicle in Norman French, tells us, as he is cited by Sir Henry Spelman (61), that the cruelty of King Ethelfrid, in falling upon those unarmed Monks, was quickly revenged upon him. For this Prince marching forward, after the victory, towards Bangor, was encountered by a fresh body of Britons, who killed above ten thousand of his men, routed the rest, and pursued Ethelfrid as far as the Humber.

[X] His body was removed, and placed in the church, by Wido, Abbot of Canterbury.] William Thorn informs us, that, on the 8th of the Ides of September, A. D. 1091, Abbot Wido translated the body of St Augustin from the place where it had lain near five hundred years, and placed all the larger bones, together with the Saint's head, in a stone-coffin; on which was this inscription:

Inclitus Anglorum Preful, pius, et decus altum, Hic AUGUSTINUS requiescit corpore Sanctus.

But lest the Danes and Normans, who made frequent incursions on the parts of Kent, should deprive the nation of so valuable a treasure; therefore, when the ceremony of the translation was over, and the people were retired home, the venerable Abbot, with a few of the senior Monks, went privately into the church by night, and taking out the Saint's head, and part of his body, excepting only the smaller bones and some ashes, they placed them in a small urn, strongly secured with iron and lead; which they hid in the wall under the East-window. And as there were but a few brethren entrusted with the secret, the thought to be spurious [Z]. The Popish writers have, as usual, ascribed several miracles to St Augustin, of which we shall give the reader a specimen below [Z]. As to his character; Bishop Godwin charges him with a restless ambition, by which he occasioned great disturbances in this island [AA]; and that writer is of opinion, that the

the memory of it was soon extinct; and the body lay concealed an hundred and thirty years, till the time of Abbot Hugh III (62); when, on the fifth of the Kalends of May, A. D. 1221, it was discovered, and honourably deposited in three different places. That Abbot, to excite the devotion of the people, did, at his own expence, cause the Saint's head to be ornamented with gold and precious stones, and repositd by itself (63). At last, on the third of the Kalends of May, A. D. 1300, Thomas Findon, then Abbot of Canterbury, deposited St Augustin's relics on a marble tomb, adorned with beautiful carved work; adding withal to the above-mentioned distich, this other, in which he expressed his great affection for the memory of that Saint:

Ad tumulum laudis Patris almi ductus amore.

Abbas hunc tumulum THOMAS distavit honore (64).

[I] The inscription on his tomb, given us by Bede, is generally thought to be spurious. It is this: Hic requiescit Dominus Augustinus Dorwernenfis Archiepiscopus primus, qui olim huc a beato Gregorio Romano urbis pontifice directus, et a Deo operatione miraculorum suffultus, Adalbertum Regem, ac gentem illius ab idolorum cultu ad Christi fidem perduxit, et completis in pace diebus officii sui, defunctus est septimo Kalendas Junias, eodem rege regnante (65): i. e. Here rests Augustin, the first Archbishop of Canterbury, who being formerly sent hither by St Gregory, Pope of Rome, and assisted by God with the power of working miracles, converted King Ethelbert and his subjects from idolatry to the Christian faith; and having finished in peace the days of his ministry, he departed this life on the seventh of the Kalends of June, in the same King's reign. Against the authority of this inscription, and its pretension to so great antiquity, it is usually objected, that the term Archiepiscopus (Archbishop) was not then in use in the Western Church; as not being commonly allowed to Metropolitans (according to Mabillon and others) till about the ninth Century (96). With Augustin, there were buried in the same porch the six archbishops, who immediately succeeded him; and in honour of the whole seven, viz. Augustin, Laurence, Mellitus, Justus, Honorius, Deus-Dedit, and Theodactus; these verses, Mr Camden tells us (67), were engraven on marble.

These seven Prelates were buried in the porch of the Cathedral; but all the succeeding Archbishops were interred in the body of the church, the porch not being large enough to receive any more (68).

[Z] The Popish writers have—ascribed several miracles to St Augustin, of which we shall give a specimen. William Thorn relates, that, when Augustin first landed in the isle of Thanet, at his getting out of the ship, he stepped upon a stone, which retained the print of his foot, as if it had been only mud. That historian adds, that this stone was taken up, and preserved in a chapel, built by the Saint in that very place; and that great multitudes of people resorted thither annually, on the day of its deposition, to pay their devotions to it, and for the recovery of their health (69). John Brompton mentions a very clear fountain of water, which Augustin, by his prayers, caused to spring up, at a time when he wanted water for baptizing (70). The same author tells us so very extraordinary a story of St Augustin, that I shall give it the reader at length. That Prelate coming one day to preach at a village called Cumpston, in Oxfordshire, the Priest of that town complained to him, that a certain officer in the army refused to pay him his tythes. Whereupon Augustin sent for the officer, and gently reprimanded him for his obstinacy in withholding the church's dues. But the soldier still refusing to comply, Augustin threatened him with excommunication; and then going up to the altar, he said aloud in the hearing of all the people, Let no excommunicated person be present at the Mass. This being said, a dead corpse, which had been buried in the church porch, came immediately out of its grave, and, going into the church-yard, stood there erect and motionless, during the celebration of Mass. The people, who saw it, came in a fright to Augustin, and related the matter. Whereupon the Archbishop, preceded by the Cross and Holy Water, and accompanied by all the people, went to the place, and demanded of the dead body, who he was? To whom the corpse replied: When you commanded on God's part, that no excommunicated person should be present at the Mass, the Angels of God, who constantly attend your steps, cast me out of the place where I was buried, telling me, that Augustin, the friend of God, commanded all stinking carcases to be thrown out of the Church of God. For, in the time of the Britons, before the fury of the Anglo Saxons had laid waste this country, I was Lord of this village; and, though often admonished by the Priest of this church, I refused paying tythes, till being excommunicated by him I died, and was cast down into hell. Hereupon Augustin and all the company wept bitterly. Then Augustin bid the dead body shew him where the Priest lay buried; which being done, and a few dry bones being found, the Saint addressed himself to prayer, and then said, In the name of God, I command thee to arise, for I have business with thee. Immediately the bones began to unite, and in a short time the Priest stood before them; who, at the Saint's command, pronounced absolution on the excommunicated corpse; after which, both the dead bodies returned to their graves, and fell into dust. Then Augustin, calling the officer, asked him, if he yet persisted in refusing to pay his tythes. But he, trembling and astonished, fell at the Saint's feet, and confessed his crime; and, bestowing all his goods on the church, he became a constant follower of Augustin, till the day of his death (71). If the reader is not yet satisfied, he may read a great deal more of such Legendary stuff in the author cited in the margin (72).

[AA] Godwin charges him with a restless ambition, whereby he occasioned great disturbances in this island. Homo is (Augustinus) videtur sanctitate morum quam scientia aut eruditione laudatior, etsi ut homo vitis non caruerit, ac illo in primis ambitionis, qua dum plusquam nimis ardescit, magnas hic turbas excitavit, ut quasi contagio quodam infectus, a loco unde venerat hanc pestem accepisse videatur, si Pontificum subsequendum superbiam ad apertam tyrannidem grassantium, potius quam Gregorii, et antecessorum suorum humilitatem spectemus (73).—Augustin seems more worthy of praise for the holiness of his life, than his knowledge or learning; though as a man he was not free from faults, especially that of ambition, with which being too strongly possessed, he was the occasion of great disturbances here; insomuch that he seems to have been infected with the malignity of the plague from whence he came, and to have brought this plague with him from Rome, if we consider the pride of the succeeding Popes, who openly played the tyrants, rather than the humility of Gregory and his predecessors. What disturbances this author means, or what marks of ambition he discovered in Augustin's conduct, I am at a loss to say; unless he had in view the slaughter of the Britons, and that Prelate's taking upon himself the character of Metropolitan of England, the English were not so much obliged to the Church of Rome for the success of Augustin's mission, as is generally pretended [BB]. But in favour of Augustin, it must be said, that he lived suitably to the character of a Missionary, and practised great austerities. And if he betrayed any restlessness of temper, or strained his authority too far in respect to the Britons, it ought to be placed to the account of human infirmities, and covered by his greater merit: This is certain; he engaged in a glorious undertaking, surmounted danger and discouragement, and was blessed with wonderful success. And what ought to endear his memory to us, is, that he was a signal instrument in the hand of providence establishing Christianity in this island. The observation of the festival of St Augustin was first enjoined in a synod held under Cuthbert Archbishop of Canterbury (u), and afterwards by the Pope's bull in the reign of King Edward III (o).

England, before Christianity had extended itself beyond the bounds of Kent, or there were any suffragan Bishops to acknowledge his jurisdiction. But the reader will know better what to think of both these events, if he will consult the remarks [M] and [W].

[BB] ——— And is of opinion, that the English were not so much obliged to the Church of Rome, for the success of Augustin's mission, as is generally pretended.] Let the Bishop once more speak for himself. 'Cui tamen Apostoli Anglorum non invidemus appellationem, modo commodè intellectam. Missum siquidem non inficiamus; sed per quem? Per Gregorium Episcopum Romanum, cui nequicquam plus juris erat in nostram Angliam quam ipsi Augustino——Dabimus porro, ut Anglis predicaret missum. Angliæ tamen pars magna (cur non dixerim maxima) infidelitatis tenebris immerfa jacuit plurimis post mortem ejus annis, donec tandem Paulinus in Septentrione anno 625, Wilfridus apud Australes Saxones 681, Fœlix apud orientales Anglos in Norfolciæ 630, alique alibi postea Christum primi annuntiarunt (74). ——— I shall not deny him the title of Apostle of the English, understood in a proper sense. For I acknowledge, he was sent; but by whom? By Gregory Bishop of Rome, who had no more authority over our England, than Augustin himself. I will grant likewise, that he was sent to preach to the English. Yet a great part (I might say much the greatest part) of England lay buried in the darkness of infidelity many years after his death, till at length Paulinus converted the 'Northern parts in the year 625, Wilfrid the South-Saxons in 681, Fœlix the East-Angles in Norfolk' 'in 630, and others other parts of the island.' But, with submission to this author, if it be no objection (and I think it never was urged as such) against the merit and character of the first preachers of Christianity, that they did not live to see the Gospel fully established in the countries where they preached; why should it be thought to derogate from the good intentions of Pope Gregory, or the services of Augustin, that the latter died long before the entire conversion of this island? The Britons, it is true, had received the Christian faith a considerable time before Augustin's arrival; but the Saxons, who were idolators, having driven the natives into Wales, and possessed themselves of the greatest part of the island, Heathenism had resumed it's antient seat in Britain, and the great work of conversion was to be undertaken afresh. And if the labours of St Augustin succeeded so far, as to lay a sufficient foundation for the gradual propagation of Christianity, till the whole country should at length embrace it; the praise and the thanks due to so blessed a work ought not to be the less, because it pleased God to take the labourer to himself long before it was finished. I might add, that Paulinus, who preached to the Northumbrians, was consecrated by Justus, Archbishop of Canterbury, who was contemporary and fellow-labourer with Augustin himself; so that our missionary may be considered as an instrument in the Conversion of that kingdom, though he did not live to be witness of it.

AUNGERVYLE (RICHARD) commonly known by the name of Richard de

Bury, was born at St Edmundsbury in Suffolk, in 1281 (*), the ninth of King Edward I (a). His father, Sir Richard Aungervyle, Kt. dying while he was young, his uncle ——— Willowby, a Priest, took a particular care of his education; and when he was fit, sent him to Oxford, where he studied Philosophy and Divinity (b), and distinguished himself by his learning, and regular and exemplary life [A]. When he had finished his studies there, he became a Benedictine Monk at Durham (c). Soon after he was made tutor to Prince Edward, afterwards King Edward III (d). And being Treasurer of Guienne in 1325, he supplied Queen Isabel, when she was plotting against her husband King Edward II, with a large sum of money out of that Exchequer. For which being questioned by the King's party, he narrowly escaped to Paris, where he was forced to hide himself seven days in the tower of a church (e). When King Edward III came to the Crown, he loaded his tutor Aungervyle with honours and preferments. For he at first made him his Cofferer, then Treasurer of the Wardrobe, Archdeacon of Northampton, Prebendary of Lincoln, Sarum, and Litchfield (†), and afterwards Keeper of the Privy-Seal. This last place he enjoyed five years, and was in that time sent twice ambassador to the Pope. In 1333 he was promoted to the Deanery of Wells, and before the end of the same year, being chosen Bishop of Durham, he was consecrated about the end of December [B] at Chertsey in Surrey; the Kings of England and Scotland, the Queen, the two Archbishops, five Bishops, seven Earls, and many other persons being present. The next year he was appointed High-Chancellor, and in 1336 Treasurer of England (f). In 1338 he was twice sent with [A] He distinguished himself by his learning] Boston and Rolfe of Warwick testify, that In utraque (philosophia tam divina quam humana) magnus evasit; i. e. He became very eminent for his knowledge both in philosophy and divinity (1).

[B] He was consecrated about the end of December.] Bishop Godwin says, he was consecrated the 19th of December; but it appears from Walsingham that it was a mistake. For the person consecrated about that time, was a Monk of Durham, whom the rest of the Monks had chosen Bishop, against the King's inclination. Wherefore, upon the King's recommendation, the Pope nominated Richard de Bury, who was consecrated accordingly, cito post festum natalis domini, soon after Christmas. The Monk being a Bishop without a Bishoprick, sine Episcopatu Episcopus, returned to his cloyster, where he died soon after (2). I cannot, by the way, but take notice of a very visible mistake that hath crept into Walsingham, at line 24 of the same page; the words — nomine Richardum de Bury — ought certainly to be blotted out.

with other Commissioners to treat of a peace with the King of France, tho' to no purpose (g). As to his character, he was not only one of the learnedest men of his time, but also a very great patron and encourager of learning. Petrarch he frequently corresponded with: And had for his chaplains, Thomas Bradwardin and Richard Fitzralph, afterwards Archbishops, the first of Canterbury, and the second of Armagh; Richard Bintworth soon after Bishop of London, and Walter Segrave of Chichester; and Walter Burley, J. Mandut, Rob. Holcot, R. Killington, Doctors of Divinity, the most eminent men in that age. His custom was, to have some of his attendants read to him while he was at meals, and when they were over, to discourse with his chaplains upon the same subject. He was likewise of a very bountiful and charitable temper; every week he made eight quarters of wheat into bread, and gave it to the poor. Whenever he travelled between Durham and Newcastle, he distributed eight pounds sterling in alms; between Durham and Stockton five pounds; between Durham and Auckland five marks; and between Durham and Middleham five pounds (h). But the noblest instance of his generosity and munificence, was the publick library he founded at Oxford, for the use of the students (i). This library he furnished with the best collection of books that was then in England; fixed it in the place where Durham, now Trinity-college, was built afterwards; and writ a treatise containing rules for the management of the library, how the books were to be preserved, and upon what conditions lent out to scholars [C]. He appointed five keepers, to whom he granted yearly salaries [D]. This worthy person having thus employed himself in works of charity and munificence, died at his manor of Auckland, April 24, 1345; and was buried in the south part of the cross isle of the cathedral church of Durham, to which he had been a benefactor (k).

[C] He writ a treatise, &c. This book he entitled Philobiblos, from whence he came to be called himself Philobiblos, a lover of books; and very justly if, as he says himself in the preface to it, his love of them was so violent, that it put him in a kind of rapture, and made him neglect all his other affairs. He finished it at Aukland, January 24, 1344-5, being just sixty-three years of age (3). It was printed at Spires in 1483, at Paris by Badius Ascensius in 1500, by the learned Thomas James at Oxford in 1599, 4to. and at Leipzig in 1674, at the end of Philologicarum Epistolarum Centuria una, ex bibliotheca Melch. Haminsfeldii. It is also in manuscript, not only in the Cottonian library, as appears by the margin, but also in the Royal (4), and other libraries at Oxford and Cambridge, &c (5). The book is written in very indifferent Latin, and a declamatory stile: It is divided into 20 chapters. In the I. he praises wisdom, and books in which it is contained. II. That books are to be preferred to riches and pleasures. III. That they ought to be always bought. IV. How much good arises from books, and that they are misused only by ignorant people. V. That good monks write books, but the bad ones are otherwise employed. VI. The praise of the ancient begging friars, with a reproof of the modern ones. VII. In the 7th he bewails the loss of books, by fire and wars. VIII. He shows what fine opportunities he had of collecting books, whilst he was Chancellor and Treasurer, as well as during his em-

A X T E L (DANIEL) a Colonel in the service of the Long Parliament, and executed for the share he had in the murder of King Charles I. The particulars of this gentleman's life, before he engaged in the service of the Parliament, are so deeply buried in oblivion, that notwithstanding all the industry we have used, a very few only, and those of less consequence than we could wish, can be brought to light. He was of a good family, and had a tolerable education, that is to say, such a one as might fit him for that course of life it was intended he should lead, being placed by his relations as an apprentice to a Grocer in Watling-street (a). As he was of a very serious disposition, and had been very early tinctured with those principles, which were in that age stiled Puritanical, he became an eager follower of such ministers, as distinguished themselves by their zealous preaching (b). His great attachment to these sort of people, and the natural warmth of his own temper, were the occasions of his quitting his own calling, and going into the army, to which he was principally determined, by keeping a day of fasting and prayer with Mr Simeon Ath, Mr Love, Mr Woodcocke, and other ministers, in Lawrence-lane, wherein, according to his judgment, they did so clearly state the cause of the Parliament, that he was fully convinced of the justice of their cause, and resolved to venture his life for it (c). Such were the consequences of the professors of the Christian religion, converting their pulpits into schools of politicks, to which it may truly be said, the Civil War owed it's beginning, as most of the dismal consequences with with which it was attended, flowed, but too apparently, from the same source [A]. After having thus chosen his party, he behaved in the army with so much zeal, courage, and conduct, that he rose by degrees to the several commands, of Captain, Major, and Lieutenant-Colonel, in a regiment of foot (d). It was in this last capacity, that he acted with great vehemence against all endeavours for a reconciliation with the King, and particularly concurred in exhibiting a charge of high-treason, against eleven members of the House of Commons, for betraying the cause of the Parliament, endeavouring to break and destroy the army, with other particulars, which obliged those gentlemen to withdraw, which was the first force put upon that House of Commons, and the remembrance of the concern Colonel Axtel had therein, contributed not a little to his destruction (e). Upon several changes that afterwards happened, these members were again admitted, sat, and voted in the House, and new schemes were entered upon, for restoring the Constitution by resettling the government, in order to which the House of Commons, on the fifth of December, 1648, resolved, 'That his Majesty's concessions to the propositions upon the treaty of the Isle of Wight, were sufficient grounds for the Houses to proceed upon for the settlement of the kingdom.' But a great party in the army who thought otherwise, determined to prevent the effects of this, and accordingly placed one Colonel Pride with a guard at the door of the Parliament-house, having in his hands a list of those members who were to be excluded, and accordingly he prevented all of them from entering the House, and secured some of them who were most suspected, under a guard provided for that purpose (f), which act of his, was supposed by some of the wisest men in England, to dissolve and destroy the representative of the Commons of England, and to leave those who remained and acted, without any legal authority [B]. Yet this remnant of the House of Commons, on the thirteenth of

December,

[A] Flowed but too apparently from the same source] It is certainly a thing worthy of observation, that a spirit of religion ill conducted, was the cause of all the evils with which the histories of those times are crowded. The first ill blood between King Charles and his subjects, was occasioned by the severe proceedings in the High-Commission Court, and the cruel censures in the Star-Chamber; in both of which, the Court Clergy were allowed too much power. But while they studied the art of raising themselves by becoming learned in Fathers, Councils, and Polemic Divinity, the other sort of Clergy applied themselves to a quite different method, which however, was as well suited as theirs, to the purposes they intended it should answer. Instead of the Fathers they quoted Scripture, instead of other people's interpretations they gave them their own; and instead of keeping up the dignity of the subject, they took all the pains they could to make it level to the meanest understandings. By this means, the breach was widened to a monstrous degree, and while one side stood high on their Learning, the other was run away with by their enthusiasm. But what was most wonderful, each side saw the other's error, and remained blind to it's own; though at the same time, what convinced them of the one, would, if it had been impartially applied, have demonstrated to them the other. For the common error of both was, that they contended for things as essential, which at the same time, and in the same breath, they confessed to be indifferent. By this means it was, that such as meant best, were drawn to do the worst of things for want of clearly apprehending their own meaning. This will fully appear to be the case, if we attentively consider the principal facts mentioned in this life. Since nothing can be plainer, than that King Charles the First was murdered, for maintaining the power of the Clergy, to which he steadily adhered, even after he had given up his own prerogatives. On the other hand, this gentleman, Mr Axtel, thought his cause, the cause of God, and believed to the last moment of his life, that he shed his blood to very good purpose, if it hindered his friends from being ever reconciled to the Surplice and Common-Prayer. These are reflections that naturally arise from the subject, and which therefore we have a right to make, for certainly the great use of this sort of reading is, to prevent mistakes in our own conduct, by observing the fatal consequences of them in the conduct of other men.

[B] To leave them who remained and acted without any legal authority] The beginning of these disputes in regard to civil affairs, was zeal for the constitution. It was thought by many able men, that the King's prerogative had entrenched too much upon the liberty of the subject, which certainly implied, that there was a Constitution, by which both ought to be regulated; and to remedy this, it was thought requisite to have the assistance of a Parliament, the continuance of which should not depend on the will of the King; to which he assented, and thereby altered the Constitution in a very material point. When this power was taken from the King, the two Houses assumed to themselves a power of making laws, which was as great an encroachment on the liberty of the subject, as the King's expecting as much obedience to be paid to his Proclamations, as to acts of Parliament. By degrees things went much farther, and at last so far, that even the warmest friends to Liberty, and those too who were believed to understand our Constitution best, thought it entirely lost. Serjeant Maynard, who certainly was no courtier, and who was never suspected of inclining too much to the power of the Crown, made no scruple of declaring, when the vote of Non-Addresses was under consideration, that if it passed the Parliament was dissolved. He founded his judgment upon this, that the Parliament of England was the great council of the King of England; that therefore the relation was reciprocal, and that one could not subsist without the other. A vote therefore, that they would have no farther correspondence with the King, was a plain declaration that they would be no longer his council, and then it was very natural for a Lawyer, to think they would be nothing. It is also very remarkable, that such of the wisest and ablest men, as in the beginning of this Parliament opposed the Crown with the greatest vehemence, made no difficulty afterwards of declaring, that they looked upon the House of Commons as dissolved, after the first force was put upon it. It was from their conceiving things in this light, that Mr Denzil Hollis, afterwards Lord Hollis; Mr Annesley, afterwards Earl of Anglesey; and Sir Orlando Bridgman, sat as judges upon this Mr Axtel, and the rest of the Regicides, without departing in their opinion from their former principles, as appears clearly from their behaviour on these trials, in which they all of them affirmed, the force put upon the House made it no House, and that such as endeavoured to screen themselves under the authority of the Parliament, by pleading the warrants they received from the remnant that were left sitting, had no legal justification, because that remainder ceased to be a Parliament. In their judgment therefore, the murder of the King was not only Treason against his Person, Crown, and Dignity, but Treason also against the Constitution, because it was an act done in consequence of the Constitution's being broken and dissolved, by virtue of an usurped power. In all which, they seemed to have acted very sensibly and with great justice. For if a man may be guilty of Treason, and be punished for it by law, tho' he pleads the King's command for what he did, which is what no Lawyer ever denied; then, by a parity of reason, no man can justify the doing an act which is Treason by Law, from the au-

December, revived the vote of non-addresses, and though they were but twenty-six in number, took upon them to issue a commission for trying the King, passing a vote on New-year's-day, That it was treason in the King to levy war against the Parliament (g). On the ninth of January, the tryal of the King was proclaimed by found of trumpet and beat of drum, in Westminster-Hall, at the Old Exchange, and in Cheapside, and all people were summoned who had any thing to say against the King, to appear and be heard (h). On the twentieth of January, when the King was brought before the High Court of Justice; Colonel Stubberd, and Colonel Axtel, had the command of the soldiers below stairs. The King demanded of Serjeant Bradshaw, who was the President, by what authority they brought him there, and the President appealing to the charge, which was in the name of the Commons and People of England, Lady Fairfax, the General's wife, cried out, It is a lye, it is false, not a half, not a quarter of the people, Oliver Cromwell is a rogue and a traitor, which words were repeated by Mrs Nelson. Upon this Colonel Axtel cried out, Down with the whores, shoot them, which vehemence of his made him taken notice of (i). The people at the time of his Majesty's passing to his tryal, moved by the sadness of the sight, cried out God save the KING, which obliged such as drove on his death, to procure another cry to countenance their design, and therefore Colonel Axtel beat the soldiers till they cried Justice! Justice (k)! And on the last day of the tryal, when the common people cried God preserve your Majesty, the soldiers were again taught, by the prevailing argument of the cane, to cry out, Execution! Execution (l)! After the sentence was passed, the King was carried through the middle of King's street, in a common sedan, by two porters, who out of reverence to his person, went bare-headed, till the soldiers, under Colonel Axtel's command, beat them, and forced them to put on their hats (m). After the murder of the King, when Cromwell was sent into Ireland, the regiment in which Colonel Axtel served, was drawn out by lot for that expedition, which occasioned his going over into that kingdom, where he made a considerable figure, was much esteemed and trusted by Cromwell, and raised for his fidelity, courage, and conduct, as General Ludlow tells us, to the command of a regiment, and the government of Kilkenny and the adjacent precinct, which important trust, Ludlow farther tells us, he discharged with diligence and success, and in his station, shewed a more than ordinary zeal in punishing those Irish, who had been guilty of murdering the Protestants (n). Other writers represent this in quite a different light, and charge him with severities, not at all inferior in cruelty to those committed by the Irish rebels themselves (o) [C]. After Cromwell, on the twentieth of April, 1653, had turned the Long Parliament out of the House, things took another turn, and he having assumed the supreme power to himself, sent over his son Henry to Ireland, where he commanded at first as Major-General, and by his endeavours to establish the new government, so disgusted all the godly, but more particularly the Anabaptists, that on the twenty-eighth of November, 1656, they sent Major Jones, and one Mr Doyley, to acquaint him, that Quarter-master-General Vernon, Adjutant Allen, Colonel Barrowe, and Colonel Axtel, desired to speak with him, upon which he offered to confer with them immediately (p). As soon as they came into his presence, Colonel Barrowe, premising his and their many personal obligations received from the Major-General, told him, that thority of any other part of the Constitution. Of this Cromwell was so sensible, that when the act for trying the King was moved to be brought into the House of Commons, he said (1), That if any man moved this upon design, he should think him the greatest traitor in the world. But since Providence and necessity had cast them upon it, he should pray God to bless their counsels, tho' be aware not provided on the sudden to give them counsel.

[C] Committed by the Irish rebels themselves. At the end of the Earl of Clarendon's history of the Irish rebellion there is an Appendix, in which two pieces are contained, the first entitled, A Collection of the several Massacres and Murders committed by the Irish since the 23d of October, 1641; and the second is called, a Collection of some of the Massacres and Murders committed on the Irish in Ireland, since October 23, 1641. It is from this last, these facts which follow in relation to the conduct of Mr Axtel, while invested with martial power in that kingdom, are taken (2).

1650. Colonel Daniel Axtel, cut off the head of Mr Fitz-Gerret of Browniford's son, and hanged the sons of Mr Butler of Ballickify, and Mr Butler of Bonidstown, because their fathers enlisted themselves in his Majesty's army.

One Francis Frisby, an Englishman and a Protestant, Butler to the Duke of Ormond, having had quarter upon the rendition of Kilkenny to Cromwell, was apprehended by the said Colonel Axtel, and for not confessing his Lord's plate, was tortured to death by burning matches between his fingers, in the castle of Kilkenny.

1651. Major Shertel, an officer of his Majesty's army, having delivered the castle of Ballimay, upon quarter of life and liberty to Colonel Axtel, was run thro' the body by the said Colonel, and all his soldiers, to the number of one hundred and ninety, were killed.

Captain Thomas Shertel, a Captain of horse in his Majesty's army, coming to Kilkenny upon safe conduct, was hanged by the said Axtel, because he had a good estate within two miles of Kilkenny.

1650. Colonel Axtel hanged fifty of the inhabitants near Thomastown living under his protection, for no other reason, but that a party of Cromwell's army was defeated the day before in that place, by some of the Royalists.

Colonel Axtel meeting one day forty men, women, and children, near the wood of Kildonan, who were coming for greater security to live within his quarters, caused them all to be killed.

Some soldiers of the king's army, being taken in a village in Grace's parish, Colonel Axtel caused all the inhabitants of the said village to be apprehended, hanged three of them, and sold the rest of them to the island of Barbadoes.

The said Axtel (as matter of recreation) commanded his troops to gather together a great number of the protected people near Kilkenny, and being all in a cluster, bid the troops rush thro' them, and to kill as many as happened on the left hand of the troop, and to spare the rest. Thirty persons were murdered then on that account.

that finding themselves of late not made use of they could not with satisfaction to their consciences receive pay from the publick, without doing service for it, and therefore came to acquaint him, that they had upon solemn seeking of God, and serious deliberation with themselves, represented to his Highness and the Lord Deputy, their resolutions to quit their commands, and had sent their reasons for doing it, signifying that they had reserved the delivering up of their commissions to the Major-General, as a particular mark of their respect for him; wherefore he did in his own, and in the name of the rest of the officers, declare, that they were from thenceforward discharged from any publick employment in the army, and at the same time they all of them tendered their commissions, which the Major-General however did not think fit to accept, but they having publicly declared, that they looked upon their offer as a sufficient discharge, he thought fit to appoint them another meeting, the next day, in the afternoon. He told them at this meeting, that he was very sorry to find they were so resolute in what they had proposed the day before, as to giving up their commissions, and that it was no pleasant thing to him to receive them, from persons who had so long served the publick as they had done. If they quitted indeed upon a conscientious dissatisfaction, he knew not well what to reply, but that he hoped, when he parted with them the day before, that they would have given him time to have reasoned the matter with them, and not have put him upon giving so sudden an answer. But since considering how positive they had been, and that they had, contrary to his expectation, and that not in so decent a manner as he could have wished, made it the talk of the town, he thought himself concerned forthwith to declare his acceptance of their proposal; and that he should take care, since they insisted so earnestly upon it, without any provocation of his, and contrary to his desires, they should be fairly discharged the army, and satisfied what was due to each of them; and that since they were resolved to retire, he should wish them well in their private capacities, and shew them all respect befitting the place he stood in there; and hoped that they would mind the promise they made the day before, of serving God, and being always ready to serve the publick, in order thereto. Upon this they seemed to express great thankfulness, and very high satisfaction in the choice they had made, only Colonel Axtel having first premised, that he thought himself now on a level with the Major-General, complained in very rough and bitter language of the ill usage he had met with, and the slights that had been put upon him since the great Revolution in England, and the power of the Parliament had been devolved upon a single person, which Mr Cromwell bore as patiently as he could; but it appears clearly enough from the letters he wrote to Secretary Thurloe, that he was extremely sensible of the usage he had met with, and looked upon these people, as absolutely disaffected both to the government in general, and to his family in particular (q) [D]. The condition of Colonel Axtel

[D] And to his family in particular.] The facts contained in this remarkable letter of Major-General Henry Cromwell, the reader has above in the text, and what we are to give here, regards only Mr Cromwell's sentiments, and the apprehensions he was under, from the open railing and private intrigues of the Anabaptists and other sectaries, with which the army in Ireland abounded, even in a greater proportion, than the army in England, where however they were numerous enough. His words are these. 'Now although they pretended, says he, that what they had thus generally charged me with, was the ground of their dissatisfaction; yet amongst all the venom they spit against me, and in all the plainness and freedom they were pleased to use towards me, as looking on themselves to be on even ground with me, they would neither now, nor hereafter, instance any one particular, whereon to bottom their general calumnies, although myself, and others, have been urging them thereunto. I cannot deny, but my actions, and the way I have taken for the management of things here, having thwarted and checked that exorbitant power, which they formerly exercised, may probably, have added to their other discontents. Yet 'tis notoriously known, how these gentlemen did with more than ordinary insolence, manifest their discontents, and that in as publick manner as they could, against his Highness and the government, when his Highness first assumed it, and how they have persisted and grown therein, is as well known, and that they have not acquiesced in their own dissatisfactions, but have likewise endeavoured to corrupt and seduce all others, whom they thought capable of receiving the impressions of their factious and troublesome principle. It has been since observed by others, and since said by some of their own party, that whatever they might pretend to me, as the grounds and cause of this their withdrawing; yet that the apprehensions which two of them, namely Allen and Vernon, had of being under his High-

ness's displeasure, and the mean esteem the other two had of their commands, with their general dissatisfaction to the government, was the true principal cause which induced them to it; and tho' they have said, that the godly are discouraged, I do yet find a general rejoicing in those that are godly, sober, and well affected; that these gentlemen have thus quitted their employments, and none troubled but a few of their own party, who are more afflicted, that these gentlemen have thus beset themselves, in this their action, rather than for any danger imminent to themselves (3).'

After this, Mr Cromwell grew so uneasy at the aspersions thrown upon him by these people, that in another letter to the Secretary, he intimated a desire to lay down his own command, in order to retire and live in peace; on which the Secretary wrote him a long letter, dated from Whitehall, December 16, 1656, in which there are some things, that may contribute to the reader's more clearly apprehending these matters, and therefore it may not be amiss to transcribe a paragraph or two.

Your Lordship's of the third instant, came to my hands upon Friday last; since which, viz. yesterday, I received another, whereby I was sorry to find your Lordship is under some indisposition of body, but hope that your next will bring us the good news, that the Lord hath again restored you, as also the young Lady, which we heartily pray for. I humbly thank your Lordship, for the great pains you have taken in your's of the third instant, to make so particular relation of what passed between your Lordship, and those officers, who have quitted their commands, which I communicated to his Highness, that as he had an account of the former part of this business, from your own hand, so he might also understand the issue it was brought to.

I am very sorry to see, that discontent hath so far prevailed upon the spirits of those, who do profess to live by higher principles; and truly, I should

from this time was very unpleasant, he lived in a private condition upon the estate he had acquired in the service, but instead of that power and authority which he had exercised for six years together over the town and district of Kilkenny, he was now in the state of a disaffected man, and not only without trust and without authority, but also so much suspected by his superiors, that he could not take the slightest journey about his private affairs, without having spies set over him, and being very frequently called to account (z). All this was occasioned by the wild principles and restless spirits of the Anabaptists, which as they had brought about the subversion, first of one government, and then of another, were now grown as turbulent under a third. Yet Henry Cromwell, when vested with the character of Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, was contented to watch over them without persecuting, and except the great jealousy that he expressed of their motions, he kept his word with them very exactly, and treated them as well as they could expect (s). After the death of the Protector, Oliver, which happened on the third of September, 1658, things took a new turn, and his son Richard, who had assumed the title of Protector, immediately after his father's death, saw himself, in the beginning of the next year, reduced to the fatal necessity of dissolving, what he called a Parliament, with which ended his authority, and on the seventh of May, 1659 (t), the remnant of the Long Parliament, resumed the power of which they had been deprived by Cromwell; and his son Henry, who commanded as Lord Lieutenant in Ireland, having submitted, as well as his brother Richard, Lieutenant-General Edmund Ludlow was sent over to take the supreme authority there, and one of the first things he did, being to new model the army, Colonel Axtel came again into play, had a regiment given him, and was one of the few persons, in whom Ludlow chiefly confided (u). It may not be amiss to remark, that though this gentleman changed his opinion with respect to Church matters, and of a Presbyterian became an Anabaptist, yet as to his notions of civil government he remained somewhat more steady, and was always looked upon as a zealous friend to a commonwealth. It was this disposition of his, and his clear reputation for courage and conduct, as an officer, that induced General Ludlow to make choice of him, to command one division of the Irish Brigade, that was sent over to maintain the Parliament in possession of their authority, and to keep out the King, which however they were so far from doing, that they contributed very much to his return (w). The rising of Sir George Booth, which happened in August the same year, was the occasion of their being transported to England, but they had no share in reducing him, which, was performed before their arrival, by Major-General Lambert (x). Their coming however was esteemed of great service to the Parliament, though it proved otherwise, for Colonel Zanche, who commanded them, concurred with the army in putting a new force upon that assembly, which lasted till Christmas, and then the Rump as it was called, was again restored by the terror of Monk's army, which was marching out of Scotland (y). As he at the beginning declared positively for the Parliament, Colonel Axtel, and the rest of the officers of the Irish Brigade, kept that body of troops which were esteemed the best in the kingdom, from acting against him, which if they had done in conjunction with Lambert, his design in all probability had miscarried. But as Monk very well knew, that those forces would never concur in restoring the King, while under the officers who then commanded them, he resolved to try whether it might not be possible, to engage them first to change their officers, and then to fall into his measures, which was the most critical point he had to manage. They were at that time quartered in Yorkshire, and thither he sent Colonel Redman, who had commanded a part of those troops in Ireland, under Henry Cromwell, and who was turned out by Ludlow. He carried with him some of his friends who had served under him, and on his first appearance, the best part of the Irish brigade very fairly told Colonel Zanche, and Colonel Axtel, that they might take what measures they thought fit, but that for themselves, they were determined to serve under Colonel Redman, and their old officers (z). This revolt gave the death's wound to the Republick, for Colonel Redman, pursuant to the orders he had received from General Monk, immediately marched that body of old troops into Cheshire, which so weakened Lambert's army, that was before superior to Monk's, that it left him in no condition to oppose the march of that General to London, which Colonel Axtel perceiving, resolved to shift for himself, and being thenceforward deprived of all command, endeavoured to settle his private affairs, and secure himself the best way he could (a). But when a fresh opportunity offered of asserting the Good Old Cause, Colonel Axtel shewed his affection to it, by venturing his life in a very desperate undertaking, and that too as a private man. The occasion was this, the Council of State had committed General Lambert to the Tower, in the beginning of the month of March, but on the ninth of April, 1660 (b), he made his escape from thence,

thence, and got down as far as Daventry in Northamptonshire, where, having assembled a considerable body of horse, he was joined by Colonel Okey, Colonel Axtel, Colonel Cobbet, Lieutenant-Colonel Young, Major Creed, Captain Timothy Clare, Captain Gregory, Captain Spinage, besides diverse foldiers that were Anabaptists (c). Colonel Richard Ingolfsby, and Colonel Streater, who were sent to reduce Lambert, followed him with such diligence, that on Easter-day, which was that year on the twenty-second of April, they came up with him in a plain near Daventry, having only a brook between them. When the two bodies came near, just as Colonel Ingolfsby was going to charge, Streater commanded six files of musqueteers to advance. One file gave fire, and hurt one or two of Lambert's horse. His drums beat, and in good order he advanced, having given strict command, that his musqueteers should not fire, till they came as near as push of pike. But Lambert's men held the noses of their pistols towards the ground, and Nelthorpe's troop came off to Ingolfsby, Haslerigg's troop having deserted him before. For Colonel Ingolfsby sending Captain Elfemore before him with a party, as he marched to find Lambert, met Captain Haslerigg, and took him prisoner, but released him upon his parole, to send his whole troop over to join Ingolfsby, which he faithfully performed, sending it to them by his Quarter-Master, but he retired himself. Colonel Ingolfsby told Lambert he was his prisoner, whereupon Creed and the rest, earnestly intreated him to do what he pleased with them, but to let Lambert escape, acquainting him that his life could be of no advantage to him, which Ingolfsby absolutely refused, telling them, that he would not be treacherous to those that had commanded him, by such an ungenerous act. Lambert then turned about his horse, and attempted to make his escape, but Ingolfsby pursued him so close, that he came quickly up to him, and vowed to pistol him if he did not immediately yield. Lambert in great depression of spirits, twice prayed him to let him escape, but when he saw he could not prevail, submitted as all as the rest did, except Okey, Axtel, and Cleer, who escaped (d). There is still in being a very extraordinary letter, written by Sir Anthony Ashley Cooper, giving an account of this defeat, which deserves the reader's notice, and is therefore preserved in the notes [E]. This was the last struggle that was made in favour of the Commonwealth, and Colonel Axtel used his utmost industry afterwards to conceal himself, as foreseeing that it would not be long, before he might be called to an account, for the large share he had taken in the trial of the King; but his care in this respect was to very little purpose, for before the close of the month, he was discovered and committed to prison (e). We are told by one of his friends, that he was betrayed by a Royalist, who having engaged him at a meeting, on pretence of treating with him for the purchase of some lands, gave notice of the time and place, by which he was apprehended and committed to the Tower (f). After the King's Restoration, the bill of indemnity being then depending in the House of Commons, they, on the fourteenth of June, 1660, resolved, That Daniel Axtel should be one of the Twenty excepted out of that bill (g). On the twelfth of July following, a warrant was sent for his detention in the Tower, for high-treason (h). On the twenty-ninth of August, the King passed the so long expected act, of free and general pardon, out of which only two and fifty persons were excepted, of which Colonel Daniel Axtel was the fiftieth, as also the two persons disguised in frocks and vizors, who appeared upon the scaffold at the murder of King Charles I, which persons were left to be proceeded against as traytors, according to the laws of England (i). On the tenth of October following, the grand-jury for the county of Middlesex, having found bills against twenty-eight persons, for their concern in the King's murder, of which Mr Axtel was the last, they were brought to the sessions house in the Old Bailey, where Colonel Axtel was the same day arraigned, upon an indictment for compassing and imagining the death of the late King, when for some time he refused to plead, alledging that what he had done was in pursuance of an Act of Parliament, and therefore he conceived no inferior court ought to judge of it, to which point he desired he might have counsel assigned (k). But the Court having reasoned with him, and told him, that in case of treason, it was the same thing

[E] Is therefore preserved in the notes. This singular piece was after the Earl of Sandwich's decease found among his papers, and shews plainly the importance of this defeat, in the opinion of that statesman, who was held to have the best head for publick affairs of any man in his time. It is very short indeed, but short as it is, we find it very extensive in point of sense, and we may likewise observe that cant so univerally prevailed at that time, that even those men who most despised it were obliged to use it, and that too not only in publick pieces, but in private letters to their friends.

A letter from Sir Anthony Ashley Cooper, directed for General Montague, dated Monday morning, indorced April the 23d, 1660 (5).

MY Lord, your Lordship's letter brings that account of the fleet, and so satisfactory as might be expected from it, since put under the conduct of such a general ——— This morning the certain news of Colonel Lambert his being taken, came to the council. There appeared with him six troops of horse in Daventry-Fields in Northamptonshire. Colonel Okey, Axtel, Creed, Sir Arthur Haslerigg's son and others; but when Colonel Ingolfsby came up, the kind men, without much courage, rendered themselves. Thus God has blasted the wicked in their reputations and bloody designs, and I hope, will bless us with a happy settlement, which is the prayers of,

My Lord,
Your most faithful, and Humble Servant,
ANTHONY ASHLEY COOPER.

thing to stand mute or to confess the indictment, he was prevailed upon to plead Not Guilty. When he was asked How he would be tried? and told that the proper answer was, By God and his country, he said that was not lawful, God not being locally present; however, he soon after made the usual answer, and put himself upon his trial. This did not come on till the fifteenth of October, 1660, when after challenging ten of the jury, the indictment was opened, in which the Counsel for the Crown observed, that the High Court erected for the tryal of the late King, had all the formalities of a court, such as their President, their Counsel, their Chaplain, and their Guards, and as some of their Judges, one of their Counsel, and their Chaplain, had been already tried, they had now brought this gentleman to the bar as the Commander of the Guard, and then proceeded to call their evidence (l). Mr Holland Simpson proved, that Colonel Axtel had the command of the soldiers below stairs, and threatened to shoot Lady Fairfax for disturbing the Court. Colonel Hercules Huncks deposed, that on the day the King died, himself, Colonel Phayre, Colonel Hacker, and Cromwell, being in a room together, Cromwell desired him to sign a warrant for the King's execution, which he having refused to do, and Cromwell having given him some harsh language on that account, Mr Axtel said, 'Colonel Hunks, I am ashamed of you, the ship is now coming into the harbour, and will you strike sail before we come to anchor'. Mr Axtel positively denied this, and told Colonel Hunks that himself was named in the warrant for execution, and that he wished he did not make others a peace-offering to save himself. Sir Purbeck Temple swore, that Mr Axtel beat the soldiers to make them cry Justice and Execution, that he laughed and scoffed with them during the trial, and that he suffered, and, as the witness believed, procured the soldiers to fire powder in the palms of their hands, which threw such clouds of smook into the King's face, that he was obliged to rise out of his chair, and beat it off with his hand. Mr John Jeonar, who was one of the King's domestick servants, and attended him at the tryal, gave positive evidence, that when the Court broke up the first day, Colonel Axtel ordered the guards to cry Justice, Justice; and the last day, Execution, Execution; and he farther deposed, that being very near the Colonel, he heard him lead that cry, by making use of the same words himself (m). One Samuel Burden, who had been a soldier in the King's army; but at the time of the tryal in Colonel Axtel's regiment, swore, that himself and others were commanded by the Colonel to give evidence against the King, and for that purpose were sent to Mr Cook, who managed the charge against the King, to have their examinations taken, which was accordingly done. This man likewise swore, that the Colonel sent one Elisha Axtel with a file of soldiers, to take boat and go down to the common hangman, who lived beyond the Tower, in order to fetch him to execute the King (n). Lieutenant-Colonel Nelson deposed, that in private conversation at Dublin, Colonel Axtel acknowledged to him, that he was concerned in the secret of managing the King's execution, and being desired by the witness to tell him who the persons were that appeared upon the scaffold in vizors, he told him they were two Serjeants, well known both to him and to the witness, and that their names were Hewlet and Walker (o). Such was the evidence given to support the charge in the indictment, for compassing and imagining the death of the King. In his defence, Colonel Axtel alledged, that he was a commission officer under the Lord Fairfax, as he had been before under the Earl of Essex, and by his commission was to obey his superior officer, (who commanded him that day to Westminster-Hall,) according to the customs of war; so that if he had disobeyed his superior officer, then he had died, and now must die for obeying him. But the Court told him he might have refused without any danger, as well as Colonel Hunks; and that passive as well as active obedience was required from every man, and that neither his nor his superior's commission bid him kill his father, much less the father of his country. As for the musquets mounted towards the Lady, he said that if a Lady grew uncivil to disturb the Court, he could do no less than check her. That his striking the soldiers for not crying Justice was a mistake, for he said he struck them because they did it, saying, I'll give you Justice. That his inciting them at the sentence to cry Execution, was the execution of Justice, and that could do no hurt. The Court took a great deal of pains to shew him the insufficiency of these pretences, and how incompatible they were with the constitution of this kingdom, and the laws of the land (p), upon which subject we meet with a very curious and instructive passage, in the Reports of a very learned Judge [F]. The tryal lasted, on account

[F] A very curious and instructive passage in the Reports of a very learned Judge. The person here meant is Sir John Kelyng, some time Chief Justice of the court of King's Bench. But in order to judge of this point, it is necessary to consider Mr Axtel's defence more at large, especially as some writers magnify it, as the strongest, clearest, and most heroick piece any where extant (6). The best and most sensible speech he made was this, wherein he puts the objection resolved by Kelyng, and therefore let it serve as a specimen of his eloquence.

' My Lords, I must acknowledge my ignorance of the laws, being a thing I never studied, nor have the knowledge of. But I have heard it is the duty

' of your Lordships and the Judges to be of counsel for the prisoner in things wherein he is ignorant in matter of Law, to make his just defence; and therefore, my Lord, the indictment itself being matter of Law, if your Lordship pleads not to grant me counsel to speak to matters of Law, I humbly pray that your Lordships will be pleased that for want of knowledge in formalities, punctillios, and niceties of the Law, I may not undo myself. I have heard by a learned Judge, that tho' the Judge be of counsel to the King, yet by his oath he is also to be counsellor to the prisoner, and stands as mediator between the King and prisoner; and therefore, my Lord I shall beg that humble favour, that wherein I shall account of the prisoner's long and large defence, for upwards of three hours, but the jury without going from the bar found him guilty. On the sixteenth of October, he was brought up again to the sessions-house, in order to receive sentence, at which time Mr Axtel insisted, that there was no overt-act proved against him sufficient to support the indictment, and suggested, that he died only for words; upon which the Lord Chief Baron observed, that it was otherwise, that he was present in the Court, beating the soldiers, and sending for an executioner, which were all of them facts and not words. Upon this Colonel Axtel appealed to God, that he did not find himself guilty of consulting, contriving, or having any hand in the death of the King, and concluded that he was innocent, and prayed God that his blood might not cry against them (q). Then silence being commanded, the Lord Chief Baron made a long speech, in which he told Colonel Francis Hacker and Mr Axtel, that they had no cause to hope for mercy, nor was there any room for mercy, and then pronounced that sentence which is usually given in cases of high-treason (r). After he was carried back to Newgate, he shewed himself very full of spirit and courage, spoke to every body that was about him with great vehemence and zeal for the cause in which he died, as appears very fully from the account

‘ I shall fall short to make the best improvement
‘ of my plea in matter of Law, that your Lordships
‘ will help me, and not take advantages against me, ‘ as to the niceties, formalities, and punctilioes of the ‘ Law; and my Lord, this is a resemblance of that ‘ great day where Christ will be Judge, and will ‘ judge the secrets of all hearts, and of all words, and ‘ of all persons, and by him all actions are weighed,
‘ he knows all our hearts, and whether there be malice,
‘ or how it stands in the frame of each heart before ‘ him in this place; and therefore I hope, there will ‘ be nothing by prejudging, or any thing by pre‘ cluding to be so black a person, as is seemed to be ‘ said against me: my Lords I must shorten the time, ‘ and come to speak as to the authority?

‘ Lord Chief Baron. As to what, Sir?

‘ Col. Ax. I speak as to the authority by which, or under ‘ which, I acted; I humbly conceive, my Lord, under ‘ favour, that I am not within the compass of that statute ‘ of 25 Ed. III. for that questionless must intend pri‘ vate persons, counselling, compassing, or imagining
‘ the death of the King. But you know, my Lords,
‘ the war was first stated by the Lords and Commons,
‘ the Parliament of England, and by virtue of their ‘ authority was forced to be raised; and they pre‘ tended by Law, that the right of the militia was in ‘ them, and your Lordships well remember, in several ‘ declarations and acts that were mutually exchanged ‘ between his Majesty and Parliament; and, my Lord,
‘ that was the authority, the Lords and Commons ‘ assembled in Parliament, raised a force, and made the ‘ Earl of Essex General, and after him the Earl of ‘ Manchester of the Eastern association, and after ‘ that, Sir Thomas Fairfax Lord General of the ‘ forces; by this authority I acted, and this authority
‘ I humbly conceive to be legal, because this Par‘ liament was called by the King's writ, chose by the ‘ people, and passed a bill they should not be dis‘ solved without their own consents, that the Parlia‘ ment was in being when the trial was, and a que-‘ sition whether yet legally dissolved.

‘ In the fourth place they were not only owned (and ‘ obeyed) at home, but abroad, to be the chief au‘ thority of the nation, and also owned by foreign ‘ states and kingdoms, who sent ambassadors for that ‘ purpose, under them did all Judges of the land ‘ act, who ought to be the eye of the land, and the ‘ very light of the people to guide them in their ‘ right actions, and I remember the Judges upon trial,
‘ (I have read it of high-treason) Judge Thorp, Ni‘ chols, and Jermin, have declared it publicly, that ‘ it was a lawful, justifiable thing, by the law of ‘ the land to obey the Parliament of England. My ‘ Lord, it further appears as to their authority over ‘ the people of this nation, petitioning them as the ‘ supreme and lawful authority; and, my Lords, as ‘ I have heard it hath been objected that the Houses
‘ of Lords and Commons could make no act; truly
‘ my Lord, if you will not admit them to be acts, ‘ tho' they entitle them so, call them so, and are ‘ obeyed as so, by the Judges, ministers, and officers
‘ of state, and by all other persons of the nation, yet
‘ I hope, they cannot be denied to be orders of Par‘ liament, and were they no more so but orders, yet
‘ were they sufficient, as I humbly conceive, to bear
‘ out such as acted thereby; and, my Lord, the Par‘ liament thus constituted, and having made their ‘ Generals, he, by their authority, did constitute and ‘ appoint me to be an inferior officer in the army, ‘ serving them in the quarters of the Parliament, and ‘ within their power, and what I have done, my ‘ Lord, it hath been done only as a soldier, deriving

‘ my power from the General. He had his power
‘ from the fountain, to wit, the Lords and Commons:
‘ and, my Lord, this being done, as hath been said
‘ by several that I was there, and had command in ‘ Westminster-hall, truly, my Lord, if the Parliament
‘ command the General, and the General the inferior ‘ officers, I am bound by my commission, accord‘ ing to the laws and customs of war, to be where the ‘ regiment is, I came not thither voluntarily, but
‘ by command of the General, who had a commission
‘ (as I said before) from the Parliament. I was no ‘ counsellor, no contriver, I was no Parliament-man,
‘ none of the Judges, none that sentenced, signed, ‘ none that had any hand in the execution, only that ‘ which is charged, is, that I was an officer in the ‘ army; if that be so great a crime, I conceive I am
‘ no more guilty than the Earl of Essex, Fairfax, ‘ or the Lord of Manchester.’ [Who was then sitting ‘ on the bench.] Judge Mallet told him he was not ‘ charged as an officer in the army. ‘ My Lords, said
‘ he, that is the main thing they do insist upon. My ‘ Lord, I am no more guilty, than his excellency the ‘ Lord General Monk, who acted by the same au‘ thority, and all the people in the three nations;
‘ and, my Lord, I humbly suppose, if the authority
‘ had only been an authority in fact and not right, ‘ yet those that acted under them ought not to be ‘ questioned; but if the authority commanded, what‘ soever offence they committed, especially that that ‘ guided me was no less, than the declared judgment
‘ of the Lords and Commons sitting in Parliament;
‘ they declared that was their right as to the militia,
‘ and having explained several statutes of Henry VII,
‘ wherein the King having interchanged several de‘ clarations with the Parliament, the Parliament comes ‘ to make an explanation on that statute, and, my Lord,
‘ it is in folio 280, wherein they do positively ex‘ pound it, and declare it as their allowed judg-

of his behaviour, printed after his death, by the care of those of his party [G]. In this disposition he continued, without the least alteration or sinking of his spirits, which must be attributed to his notions of religion, that had made such an impression upon his mind, as entirely prevented his feeling any thing of that weakness and terror, which is incident to human nature, at the near approach of death, and of a violent and shameful death especially (s). But the account beforementioned shews us, that he remained firm to the last, and spoke with the same freedom that day he died, as on any other in his whole life [H].

' in the declaration made in 1643, folio 722. I come to the declared judgment, wherein they did positively say, that the persons that do act under their authority, ought not to be questioned as persons guilty, folio 727; that is the exposition that the Lords and Commons assembled in Parliament do make upon the statute (7).'

This speech, shews how capable Mr Axtel was of defending himself, and pleading for his life, and at the same time demonstrates how calmly, equally, and justly, the court dealt with him, allowing him all the liberty requisite for a man in his condition. But notwithstanding all these plausible arguments, the Lord Chief Justice before mentioned, has told us what the Law is, and what a man has to trust to, when he comes before a court of justice, in these words. "(8) Memorandum, that upon the trial of one Axtel, a foldier, who commanded the guards at the King's trial and at his murder; he justified that all he did, was as a foldier by the command of his superior officer, whom he must obey or die. It was resolved that was no excuse, for his superior was a traitor, and all that joined with him in that act were traitors, and did by that approve the treason, and where the command is traitorous, there the obedience to that command is also traitorous.'

[G] After his death by the care of his party.] He asserted constantly, that he was a martyr for the good old cause; said he wished the King as well as his own soul; but conceived that they had murdered him, and might as well have done it in the Tower, as have made all that bustle, for they had nothing in their own Law, or in God's Law, that would condemn him, but it was enough, his name was Axtel. Such was his disposition, and such his notion of the justice that was done him. But to proceed with that relation which his friends have given of him.

Having given an account to some persons for their satisfaction, about his proceedings against the rebels in Ireland, he said, I can say in humility, that God did use me as an instrument in my place, for suppressing of the bloody enemy, and when I considered their bloody cruelty in murdering so many thousands of Protestants and innocent souls, that word was much upon my heart; give her blood to drink for she is worthy; and sometimes we neither gave nor took quarter, though self-preservation would have said, give that which you may expect to have.

One coming in told him, that his fellow-prisoner died nobly and chearfully; (well said he; how do they stand) answer was made, upon a ladder. Blessed be God, said he, it is a Jacob's ladder.

The sun shining in the room, he said, if it be so glorious to behold the sun, what will it be to behold the Son of Glory? Laying his hand upon (his fellow-prisoner) Colonel Hacker, he said, Come, brother, be not so sad, by this time to-morrow we shall be with our Father in glory; and what hurt will they do us, to bring us through the cross to the crown? Well, our God is the God of Newgate.

Then the officer coming to carry them down into the dungeon, he took his leave of many of his friends then present, saying, Love the Lord Jesus, love the Lord, and weep not for me, for God hath wiped away all tears; and coming to the door of the dungeon said, I am now going to my bed of roses, my last bed.

Many friends being with him, there was an eminent godly minister of the Presbyterian way, and Colonel Axtel taking him by the hand said, I have one word to speak to you, it is much upon my heart, that one great cause, why the Lord contends thus with his people, is for want of their love towards them that were not of their minds; to which the minister replied, truly, Sir, I think so too; the Lord help us, that wherein we see we have done amiss we may do for no more.

Then said Colonel Axtel, I bless God I have not much to charge myself with in this matter, Colonel

Hacker then said, but I have much to complain of in that matter. Colonel Axtel afterwards sitting on his bedside, clapping his hands said, if I had a thousand lives I would lay them all down for the Cause: whereupon another godly minister then present, asked him what he meant by the Cause. Colonel Axtel replied, Sir, I tell you I mean the cause which we were encouraged to and engaged in under the Parliament, which was for common right and freedom, and against the Surplice and Common-prayer book, and I tell you, that Surplices and Common-prayer books shall not stand long in England, for it is not of God.

And afterwards thinking he should not die that day, desired some retirement, but news coming that he must die within an hour; (though it was not so) he quickly made himself ready to go, and looking upon his gloves, said, These are my wedding gloves, my mortal must marry immortality.

Some friends going to see him the night before he was executed, found him at supper very chearful, and many being present, he said, take heed of temporizing, &c. for that hath been the occasion of great evil. Then speaking to an officer there present that had continued till of late in the army, said, Brother, thou hast been greatly guilty herein, the Lord forgive thee, thou hast a great hand in this. To which the person replied, I confess I have been so too much. Colonel Axtel answered, there is yet mercy for thee if the Lord give repentance.

Moreover he said, the Lord forgive that poor wretch, Lieutenant-Colonel Nelson, for he hath sworn falsely in his evidence, and now is that word made good, that brother shall betray brother unto death, and speaking of Colonel Tomlinson said, ah! he hath appeared five pound lighter in twenty, than I thought him to be; and for Colonel Huncks, he was the uncivillest of all about the late King, and yet he comes in a witness against Hacker and me.

That evening many friends being with him, he prayed with them, and in that duty the Lord by his Spirit, filled him with excellent expressions to the great refreshing of those about him, and bewailing the great divisions amongst God's people, he said, Lord, if they will not live together in love, thou wilt make them lie together in sufferings. Then minding their present condition said, Lord, death is the King of terrors to nature, but it is a believer's choice friend, it is thy high-way to lead us into glory. After prayer, taking notice of his daughter, he said to her, get an interest in Christ, and keep close to him, he will be a better father to thee than I; and so took his leave of her (9).

[H] On that day as on any other in his whole life.] It is very clear from the account that has been already given, that no man could behave with greater firmness than Mr Axtel did; yet was he very far from boasting of it, or from attributing it to his natural courage; on the contrary, he checked some of his friends for praising his constancy, and very wisely advised them, to say nothing of him till they saw him upon the uppermost round of the ladder: he told his daughter at the same time, that he had left Jesus Christ an executor in trust for her (10). This was in the evening of the day before he died, in which day, he is said to have prayed solemnly five times, by which, very probably, he heated himself to such a degree, as served to keep up that extraordinary fervour he shewed to the last.

The day of their execution being come, several godly ministers spent some time in prayer with Colonel Axtel and Colonel Hacker, and many friends coming in to pay their last respects, Colonel Axtel seeing one of his familiar friends and companions, said, my dear brother, thou art better than I am, and yet I must go to heaven before thee for all that.

He very chearfully said to divers then with him, dear friends, rejoice, I am going where ye shall be also; yea, where we shall be for ever with the Lord, and never part, and be without any more change.

I beseech

On Friday the nineteenth of October, about nine in the morning, Colonel Francis Hacker, and Colonel Daniel Axtel, were drawn on one hurdle from Newgate to Tyburn, where they behaved with great boldness and resolution, more especially the latter, who was the better speaker of the two, and who did not fail to justify his conduct to the people, with the same sort of arguments he had used before his Judges, as may be seen in a note (t) [J]. After the execution was performed, the head of Colonel Axtel

' I beseech you follow the Lamb wherever he goeth, tho' he may lead you in a harsh, dismal, and difficult way; yet at last he will bring you into a pleasant path, and cause you to lie down in pleasant pastures in the land of rest.

' Oh! be faithful unto the death and he will give you a crown of life, as he hath given to your suffering brethren. Oh! all that we have or do suffer, is but to make Christ and heaven more sweet, dear, and glorious unto us; all the sad steps we shall tread on this ladder, is but to mount us to heaven, for at the top are angels ready to receive us, as was on Jacob's ladder; ALL the things I meet with move me not, I bless my God, for I am sure to fight a good fight, and finish my course with joy.'

Afterwards taking his leave of his son, embracing him in his arms, he said, My dear son, fare thee well, I must leave thee, get an interest in Christ and love him, nothing else will stand thee in stead, but an interest in him. Then calling for his Bible he hugged it, saying, this hath the whole cause in it, and I may carry this without offence; and calling to a friend, he desired him to remember his love to the congregation where he was a member; and after took his leave of all his friends, exhorting them, with much cheerfulness, to love the Lord Jesus Christ and keep close to him, and so with great joy addressed himself to go to his next work (11).

[I] As may be seen in a Note.] When they came to the place of execution, Mr Axtel desired leave of the Sheriff to speak freely to the people, because, as he said, it was the last time he was to speak. The Sheriff told him, that he knew very well what the court forbid him to enter upon when at his trial, which therefore he should avoid there and confine himself to his present concern, and then he should have free leave to deliver what he thought fit, the rather because he had intimated that he would speak somewhat for the benefit of the people. This leave thus obtained, Mr Axtel turned towards the people with a rope about his neck; and, because Colonel Hacker was no great Orator, delivered the sense of them both to a prodigious concourse of people, in a speech to the effect following.

I say the very cause for which I have engaged is contained in this book of God (having the Bible in his hand) both in the civil and religious rights of it, which I leave to you (giving the book to Mr Knowles). You see a dead man living, and yet I hope I shall live to all eternity, thro' the mediation of Jesus Christ the mediator of the covenant of Free Grace. I must truly tell you, that before the late war it pleased the Lord to call me by his Grace thro' the work of the ministry, and afterwards keeping a day of humiliation in fasting and prayer, with Mr Simeon Ash, Mr Love, Mr Woodcock, and other ministers in Laurence-Lane, they did so clearly state the cause of the parliament, that I was fully convinced in my own conscience of the justness of the war, and thereupon engaged in the parliament service (which as I did and do believe) was the cause of the Lord; I ventured my life freely for it, and now I die for it.

Then Mr Sheriff said to this purpose, Sir, remember yourself.

Colonel Axtel proceeded: And after the work of the Lord was done in England, my lot cast me in the service of Ireland, and I thank the Lord I was serviceable to the English nation in that country, and have discharged my duty fully, according to the trust committed to me there. As for the fact for which I now suffer, it is for words, only for words, and but for words, and the sentence is already reversed in my own conscience; and it will be reversed by Jesus Christ, by and by; I pray God, from the very bottom of my soul, to forgive all that have had any hand in my death, both witnesses and jury, and the court that passed sentence; for considering the doctrine of our Lord Jesus Christ, as he hath laid it down. Matt. v. 44. 'It hath been said of old time, love your neighbours, and hate your enemies; but I say unto you, love your enemies, and pray for them that hate and despitefully use you,

' that you may be the children of your father which is in heaven.'

I desire, according to this doctrine, from the bottom of my heart, that God would give them true repentance, and not lay their sin to their charge, nor my blood, which by God's and man's law, (I think) could not justly have been brought here to suffer: But I bless God I have some comfortable assurance, that I shall be embraced in the arms of Christ, and have cause to hope that his spirit shall carry my soul into the Father's hands. And if the glory of this sunshine be so great (the sun then shining bright) how much more is the glory of the Son of God, who is the Sun of righteousness? I think it convenient to give you some account of my faith. I believe all things written in the Old and New Testament, as the principles and doctrine of a believer's faith: I believe the blessed ordinances of Christ, that it is our duty to hear the word preached, to seek unto God in prayer, and to perform family duties, and to walk in the communion of Saints; and for my own part, I am a member of a congregation, which I judge to be the way of Christ, (and were it for that only I were to die I would witness to it) which is a company of men born again by his grace, that walk in the ways of Christ blameless and harmless. I believe Jesus Christ dyed for poor sinners, of whom I am chief as the Apostle Paul saith. This is a faithful saying and worthy of all acceptance. That Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners of whom I am chief. And if the Apostle might say so, much more may I.

My friends and countrymen, I have reason to bewail my own unprofitable life, having been very unfruitful unto the people of the Lord. The Lord knows I have much fault upon my part, were it not for the blood of Christ that cleanseth and washeth me, according to his promise saying, I loved you and washed away your sins in my own blood. For there is no remission of sins without the blood of Christ. I desire you all to loath and cast off sin, it were better to suffer than to sin. It is better to die than to sin, nothing could grieve our Saviour but sin, and therefore have a care of that. You and I must meet one day at the bar of Christ, and the Son of God shall be our judge, for God hath committed all judgment to the Son, that all men should honour the Son as they honour the Father. This day is a resemblance of that day, therefore be serious; I beg as much good to your immortal souls as I expect to enjoy by and by. I beseech you beg of God, that he would save your souls, and omit no opportunity through the strength of the Lord, to believe and put your trust in the Lord Jesus Christ. Be sure to labour after assurance of your interest in him, or else you will be of all men most miserable; for I of all men were most miserable, if I had not believed to see the goodness of the Lord in the land of the living.

Blessed be the Lord that brings me into this state; let the way or means be what they will, it is God's sovereignty who made these creatures so, to dispose of them how he pleaseth, and God hath ordained this death for me from all eternity. The Lord Christ often prayed, Thy will be done; this is the Lord's will. He hath numbered my days, and my times are in his hand. Many seek the ruler's favour, but every one's judgment is from the Lord. When Pilate said unto Christ, Knowest thou not, that I have a power to crucify thee? Christ answered him, Thou couldest have no power against me, except it were given thee from above. Therefore I acknowledge the righteous hand of God; he is righteous, but I am sinful. Therefore will I bear God's indignation, because I have sinned against him.

It is said of Jesus Christ, that for the joy set before him, he endured the cross and despised the shame, and is set down at the right hand of God, where I hope to see him by and by in glory and majesty, and to see his angels and believers worshipping of him, and therefore I despise the shame; our Saviour died upon the cross without sin; I am a sinful creature, a wretched sinner, and shall I expect better than he that was my master? He who was fet up at the further end of Westminster-Hall, and his quarters were in like manner disposed of, so as to become spectacles in other publick places. But the body of Mr Hacker, was by his Majesty's great favour given entire to his friends, and by their care was decently interred. At the time of his death, the Colonel left behind him a widow and several children, for whose subsistence he had made a competent provision in the time of his prosperity.

was holy, and never had a sinful thought, in all his life, and died not for himself, but for us, that we might live through his death, that through his poverty, we might be made rich; and Christ having done this for his people, it should not be in their eyes thought a despicable thing, that we should suffer for him, having been engaged in the work of God. But Christ must prevail in righteousness, and he will prevail. Now, Mr Sheriff, I thank you for your civility and for this leave (12).

Then Colonel Hacker rose up, and spoke to him in private, after which Colonel Axtel asked the Sheriff, whether they were both to die together, and being answered in the affirmative, Colonel Hacker read a paper, containing what he had particularly to say, and which was very short; he then intreated Colonel Axtel, that he would be (to use his own words) both their mouths to God. Mr Axtel complying with this request, having first entreated the silence and attention of the people, and that they would join with him in his application to God, with a composed frame of spirit, and an audible voice, he prayed for better than half an hour, in which he prayed for the government, the magistrates, and for the executioner; he likewise prayed very heartily for the King, under the name of the Chief Magistrate of this nation, and throughout the whole, did not receive the least interruption (13).

After he had ended his prayer, he gave the Sheriff thanks again for his civility, and then turning to Colonel Hacker, they saluted and embraced each other in their arms, and said, the Lord sweeten our passage, and give us a happy meeting with himself in glory. Then pulling his cap over his eyes, expecting as is supposed, that the cart should be drawn away, with his hands lifted up, he uttered these words with a loud and audible voice, Lord Jesus receive my spirit; but the cart staying a little longer, he lift up his hands a second time, and with the like audible and loud voice, said, Into thy hands, O Father! I recommend my spirit; and yet in regard there was no man found to put forward the horse to draw away the cart, until the common hang-man came down out of the cart himself to do it. The carman, as many witnesses affirm, saying he would lose his cart and horse, before he would have a hand in hanging such a man; by this means he had opportunity to lift up his hands and utter the like words a third time also (14).

One thing more his friends thought very remarkable, that when Colonel Axtel, and Colonel Hacker, were taken out of the sledge into the cart, the spectators being in great numbers there, behaved themselves very civilly, only two persons among them, as soon as the ropes were put about their necks, cried out very earnestly, hang them, hang them, rogues, traitors, murderers; hang them, draw away the cart. Whereupon a man that stood by them, desired them to be civil, and said, Gentlemen, this is not civil, for the Sheriff knoweth what he has to do; and thereupon they were silent, and gave attention to Colonel Axtel's speech and prayer; but before he had done, those very persons were so affected, that they could not refrain from pouring out many tears upon the place, and went aside to a place a little more retired to weep; and that man that before desired them to be civil, went after them, and beheld them to his great admiration, as himself hath narrated (15).

This behaviour fully justifies, what was said in a former note, of the force of Enthusiasm.

A Y L E S B U R Y (THOMAS) the second son of William Aylebury, by his wife Anne, daughter of John Poole, Esq; was born in the city of London, some time in the year 1576 (a). He received his education in Westminster-school, from whence he went to Oxford, and in 1598, became a student of Christ-Church. He distinguished himself there by his assiduous application to his studies, and especially affected the Mathematicks. This made him known to persons of the greatest parts in the university, and was the reason of his being cared for by some of the greatest quality in the kingdom (b). On the nineteenth of June, 1605, he took his degree of Master of Arts. After he quitted the university, he became Secretary to Charles Earl of Nottingham, then Lord High-Admiral of England; in which post he had an opportunity of improving his mathematical knowledge, as also of giving many and shining proofs of it. On this account, when George Villiers, Duke of Bucks, succeeded the Earl of Nottingham as High-Admiral, Mr Aylebury not only kept his employment, but was also, by the favour of that powerful Duke, created a Baronet, the nineteenth of April, 1627, having been before made Master of Requests, and Master of the Mint (c). These great employments, as they furnished him with the means of expressing his regard for learned men, so in him they met with a person, who put them to their right use. He not only made all men of science welcome at his table, and afforded them all the countenance he could, but likewise gave to such of them as were in narrow circumstances, regular pensions out of his pocket, and carried them with him to his house in Windsor-Park, where he usually spent the summer. In this manner he treated Walter Warner, a most skilful Mathematician, and who, at his request, wrote a treatise of coins and coinage (d). The famous Mr Thomas Harriot, was another of his dependants, as appears by a poem addressed to Sir Thomas Aylebury, by Bishop Corbet [A], as also from the grateful acknowledgment

[A] By Dr Corbet.] This Poem was written on the appearance of the Comet on the 9th of December 1618, and is, considering the stile of that age, a good performance. From the following lines the point mentioned in the text is sufficiently established.

Now for the peace of God and men advise (Thou that hast wherewithal to make us wise)
Thine own rich studies and deep HARRIOT'S mine,
In which there is no dross, but all refine, &c (1).

The study of the Mathematicks was at this time much encouraged, and had been so for many years. The Earl of Leicester, Queen Elizabeth's favourite, had some skill in this science, and a great esteem for such as were learned therein. His son, Sir Robert Dudley, was also a patron of Mathematicians, and so was Henry Earl of Northumberland, who being confined many years in the Tower of London, diverted himself with the conversation of eminent scholars in this kind of knowledge, among whom our Sir Thomas Aylebury often obtained a seat. His collections of scarce and valuable acknowledgment made by that learned person in his will, whereby he bequeathed to Robert Sidney, Viscount Lisle, and Sir Thomas Aylebury, Baronet, all his writings, and all the manuscripts he had collected (e). Nor was the assistance which Sir Thomas afforded to men of merit, confined within the bounds of his own capacity, but extended to the recommendation of them to such noble and generous patrons, as he had an interest in. Thus he recommended Mr Thomas Allen of Oxford, to his master the Duke of Bucks, and to other noble persons, who honoured him with their friendship and protection. This very learned person confided his manuscripts, for he would never publish any thing to Sir Thomas, who was in these matters the most knowing and most candid critic of his time (f). In 1642, adhering steadily to the King, he was of consequence stripped of his places, and plundered of his estate. However he bore up cheerfully under his misfortunes till 1649, when having seen the bloody murder of his Sovereign, he grew sick of his country, and retiring with his family into Flanders, lived for some time at Brussels. In 1652, he removed to Breda, where he led a very private life, his loyalty having left him very little to live on; and in 1657, being then eighty-one years of age, he ended his days with honour, and was interred in the great church, through the care of his illustrious son-in-law. He left a son, William, of whom in the next article, and a daughter, Frances, who married Edward Hyde of Petton in the county of Wilts afterwards the justly famous Earl of Clarendon (g).

valuable books, learned and curious MSS, which he acquired, not only by his own industry, and at great expence, but also as in the text mentioned, by the gifts of his obliged friends, were either lost in our troubles at home, or were disposed of in the time of his distress abroad. Among these were several of Mr Hariot's pieces, and amongst those bequeathed to him by Mr Warner, some of which well deserved to have been made publick. As to those which were given him by Mr Allen, they related mostly to Astrology, and among them, were the second and third books of the famous Ptolemy the Geographer, de

Astrorum judiciis cum expositione Thomæ Allen (2). These were in those days, when Astrology passed for a science, held to be invaluable treatises, and therefore some copies were procured, one of which was in the hands of William Lilly, the Almanack-maker, who presented his transcript to Elias Ashmole Esq; (3). It does not appear Sir Thomas Aylebury ever wrote any thing himself, but inasmuch as he bountifully assisted such men of parts as stood in need of his favour, we cannot think the compliment we have paid more than he deserved. E

A Y L E S B U R Y (WILLIAM) son of the beforementioned Sir Thomas Aylebury, Baronet, became very early a gentleman-commoner of Christ-Church, and took a degree in Arts at sixteen years of age (a). Though he had at that time the prospect of a very plentiful fortune, yet he pursued his studies with such diligence, and behaved with so much modesty and prudence, that King Charles I, made choice of him to be governor to George Villiers, Duke of Bucks, and his brother Lord Francis, with whom he went to travel (b). He met in Italy with a very extraordinary misfortune. Walking one evening in the garden of the house where they lodged, he was shot, through a hole in the wall, and a couple of bullets lodged in his thigh: those who did it leaped over the wall, came up, and looked upon him, begged his pardon, told him they were mistaken, and that they intended to have shot another person, which was all the satisfaction he ever received (c). He returned into England with his pupils a little after the Civil War commenced, and carried them with him to Oxford, where he presented them to the King. His Majesty expressed his great satisfaction in regard to Mr Aylebury's conduct (d), and promised on the first vacancy, to make him Groom of his Bed-chamber; which promise however he lived not to perform. His Majesty likewise recommended it to Mr Aylebury, to translate into English the History of the Wars in Flanders, by Davila. How far he complied, the reader will see in the note [A]. After the King's murder, he retired with his father to Antwerp, and dwelt there as long as his circumstances would afford it; but at length, through very want, returned into England in the year 1650; spending his time here, as most of the Royalists did, in seeking shelter and a meal of meat where it was to be had. Living some times in one place, sometimes in another, chiefly at Oxford, which was always loyal, till the year 1657, when the Protector fitting out a fleet to go on some expedition to the West Indies, as also to carry a supply to the island of Jamaica, our author, from pure necessity,

[A] The reader will see in a note.] The reason why his Majesty made choice of Mr Aylebury to translate this book was, because he was perfect master of the Italian language. It should seem however, that our author was a little indolent, since even with the assistance of his friend Sir Charles Cotterel, it was not fitted for the press till some years afterwards, when it appeared under the following title, The History of the Civil Wars of France. Written in Italian by Henry Canterino d'Avila, London 1647 folio. There was a second edition of this work in 1678, and in the Epistle prefixed thereto, it is said, that the whole was translated by Sir Charles Cotterel, except here and there a passage in the four first books (1). This shews how dangerous a thing it is to write in partnership, for Mr Aylebury had been then many years dead, and could not therefore possibly answer for himself. Before I close this note, I must crave leave to observe, that there is something very remarkable in King Charles I, commanding this book to be translated, since it is certain, that those dreadful scenes of blood and slaughter, of private calamities and publick confusion, which were so admirably depicted in that work, came afterwards to be acted on the Theatre of Britain, and therefore a better caveat could not have been thought of for preventing those mischiefs, than the timely publication of this book. As to our author Aylebury, and his friend Sir Charles Cotterel, they for some time lived together in the house of Mr Aylebury, at Breda, where Dr Morley, afterwards Bishop of Winchester, officiated as their chaplain, necessity, engaged himself as Secretary to the Governor; which post he enjoyed not long, death removing him when he had been but a short time in the island (e).

'till Mr Ashmole's misfortunes came upon him (2). By the immature death of our author in Jamaica, the male line of this family extinguished, and his surviving sister Frances, Countess of Clarendon, became heiress of what could be recovered of her father's, Sir Thomas Aylesbury's, estate (3). E

AYLMER, or rather as himself wrote it, ÆLMER (JOHN) was descended of a very antient [A] and honourable family, seated at Aylmer-Hall in the county of Norfolk (a). He was born some time in the year 1521 (b), and being a younger brother, was either recommended by his relations, or recommended himself by his pregnant parts even in his nonage, to the then Marquis of Dorset (Henry Gray) afterwards Duke of Suffolk, who was pleased to honour him with the title of his scholar, and exhibited to him at the university of Cambridge (c). When he had there attained a competent provision of university learning, the Marquis recalled him from thence, and took him into his own house, where he became tutor to his children, amongst whom was the Lady Jane, who for some days was styled Queen (d). This excellent lady, under Mr Aylmer's Tuition [B], became wonderfully learned in the Latin and Greek tongues, reading in the latter with great ease and pleasure, the most sublime and difficult authors, and even writing in that language with great elegance, as well as strength of sentiment (e). By the care of Mr Aylmer, she received right principles of religion. For he went early into the opinions of the primitive Reformers, and having for his patrons the Duke of Suffolk and the Earl of Huntingdon, in the reign of Edward VI, he was for some time the only preacher in Leicesterhire, where he so effectually fixed the Protestant religion in the minds of the people, that neither force nor fraud could blot it out (f). The first preferment bestowed upon him, was the Archdeaconry of Stow, in the diocese of Lincoln (g), which giving him a seat in the Convocation [C] held in the

[A] Defended from a very antient family. There is no doubt of our author's being of a very antient and genteel family, since his elder brother was Sir Robert Aylmer, of Aylmer-hall, in the county of Norfolk, and their ancestor Sheriff of his county in the reign of Edward II (1). But it must be allowed, Mr Strype, in his Life of this Prelate, confounds himself and his reader on this head, and by endeavouring to make the thing excessively plain, hath rendered it scarce intelligible (2). That the Bishop really wrote his name Ælmer, at least sometimes is certain, and that this might proceed from some affectation of descending from a Saxon family, is not improbable, since it is as certain, that the Aylmers of Norfolk, did not use this manner of writing, nor is the name of a Sheriff of London, A. D. 1501, so written, but plainly Aylmer, as in the text (3). The foregoing articles will shew, that there really was such a name as this in use in those times; but then it was a christian name, and Mr Strype does not pretend to account for it's becoming a surname, which however we shall endeavour to do. Fuller had informed him, that Aylmer-hall stood in the parish of Tilsley (4), which parish not being to be found, Mr Strype supposes that it must be in Tilney parish, which lies in Marshland, or Marshland, where a later writer confidently places it (5), though I find no direct testimony that in this parish it really stands. But this part of the country appears so evidently gained from the sea, and was formerly with such difficulty kept from it's old master, that it is not very likely any Saxon family should remain here. But in North Erpingham Hundred, in the same county, there is a considerable village, called Ailmerton or Elmerton (6), which is truly a Saxon name, and signifies a place seated on the Old Marsh, and there seems to be no reason to doubt that after furnaces became fashionable, the possession of this manour took that of Aylmer or Elmer, a thing usual in other places (7).

[B] Under Mr Aylmer's tuition. It is not a little strange, that Mr Strype, with all his industry, should not be able to discover at what college in Cambridge our author had his education (8). As to his conjectures that it might be here, or it might be there, they may serve to mislead, but not to instruct us; and therefore it is sufficient to note, that Fuller affirms he was bred there, and that Anthony Wood suggests he took his degrees in Arts at that university (9). In Strype's Life, there is not one date between his birth and first preferment, though there are several circumstances mentioned, the time of which might have been easily fixed. Mr Afcham visited the Lady Jane Gray, in the month of August 1550 (10), and found her under the tuition of Mr Elmer, who was then in the 30th year of his age. The place at which she then resided, was her father's seat at Broadgate, in Leicesterhire, the family were hunting, and Mr Afcham going to wait on the young Lady, surprized her reading the Phædon of Plato. This naturally led him to enquire, how a lady of her age, for she could not be then above fourteen, arrived at such a perfection both in Philosophy and the Greek tongue. To which she answered thus, as Mr Afcham himself informs us; 'I will tell you, quoth she, and tell you a truth, which perchance you will marvel at. One of the greatest benefits which ever God gave me, is that he sent me sharp and severe parents, and so gentle a schoolmaster. For when I am in presence either of father or mother, whether I speak, keep silence, sit, stand, or go; eat, drink, be merry or sad; be sowing, playing, dancing, or doing any thing else, I must do it, as it were, in such weight, measure, and number, and even so perfectly, as God made the world, or else, I am so sharply taunted, so cruelly threatened, yea, presently sometimes with pinches, nips, and bobs, (and other ways which I will not name, for the honour I bear them) so without measure misordered, that I think myself in Hell, till time come that I must go to Mr Elmer, who teacheth me so gently, so pleasantly, with fair allurements to learning, that I think all the time nothing while I am with him; and when I am called from him, I fall a weeping, because whatsoever I do else but learning, is full of grief, trouble, fear, and wholly misliking unto me; and this my book hath been so much my pleasure, and bringeth daily to me more pleasure, and more yet, in respect to it, all other pleasures in very deed, be but trifles and troubles unto me (11).' So much the first year of Queen Mary, he boldly opposed that return to Popery; to which the body of the Clergy seemed generally inclined. He was one of Six, who in the midst of all the violences committed in that assembly, offered to dispute all the controverted points in religion, against the most learned and famous champions of the Papists. But when the supreme power began to argue, not by words but by force, Archdeacon Aylmer withdrew, and if we may credit one of our ecclesiastical Historians, escaped in almost a miraculous manner [D], beyond the seas (b); where he resided first at Strasbourg, afterwards at Zurich in Switzerland, and there in peace followed his studies, employing all his time [E] in acquiring knowledge, or in providing that others should acquire it (i). During the time of his exile, he improved himself likewise by travel, and towards the end of it, gave a signal proof of his learning, moderation, and love to his native country, by penning a sober answer to an outrageous book, written by John Knox, against the government of women [F]. in the same year, in the Archdeaconry of Stow, in the diocese of Lincoln, if Wood may be believed (13); but Mr Strype says, that he succeeded Dr Dedicot (14). However it was, he sat in the Convocation, which met the 16th of October, in the same year at London: The first day he said little, but the next he disputed boldly against the Real Presence, and with great learning, reading several quotations from the Fathers, which he had collected, from his note book. But the history of this dispute is much too long for a note, and therefore we shall content ourselves with referring the reader to a book, where it may still be read at large (15). This conduct though it gained him great reputation, lost him his Archdeaconry; into which came John Harrison, in the year 1554, being no doubt a zealous Papist (16).

[D] Almost a miraculous manner. Mr Fuller takes notice, that the ship on board which Mr Aylmer embarked, was so unlucky as to be searched and yet he escaped, partly through the friendship of the captain, and partly through his own lowliness of stature. For there being in the hold a very large wine vessel, with a partition in the middle, Mr Aylmer sat in the one end of it, while the searchers drank wine drawn out of the other (17). No question, but many such contrivances there were in the days of Queen Mary, when the confusions in Church and State, made numbers of all ranks prefer safety in foreign climates, to that affection which nature taught them for their own.

[E] Employing all his time. His thoughts, tho' in a distant country, were continually employed in the service of England, and of Englishmen. He published (as Mr Strype supposes) Lady Jane Gray's letter to Harding, who had been her father's chaplain, and who apostatized. He assisted the famous Fox, in translating the History of English Martyrs into Latin, as also in the version of Archbishop Cranmer's Vindication of the Book on the Sacrament, against Gardiner, Bishop of Winchester, which version however was never printed or published. When his studies and the care he took of his fellow-exiles allowed him leisure, he visited most of the universities of Italy and Germany, and had an offer from the Duke of Saxony, of the Hebrew Professorship of Jena, which he refused, on a prospect of speedily returning home (18).

[F] Against the government of women. As this was the only work of consequence, which our author Aylmer ever published, as it was the groundwork of his future fortunes, and at the same time, the source of those calumnies, which were thrown upon him, it is requisite that we should give here a full and distinct account of the occasion, and the manner in which it was written, and this we shall endeavour to do as briefly as may be. In 1556, John Knox, printed at Geneva a treatise under this title: The first Blast against the monstrous Regiment and Empire of Women. The drift of the author was to shew, that by the laws of God women could not exercise Sovereign authority (19). The reason of his writing of it, was his spite against two Queens; Mary of Lorraine, then Regent of Scotland, and Mary Queen of England; it was like the rest of that Divine's pieces, a vehement performance full of strange opinions, supported by a warm flow of enthusiastick Rhetorick, which sufficiently recommended it to all persons of the same complexion. He intended a second, and a third part; but the times altering, he did not rend the ears of the publick with any more Blasts. However, this first did a great deal of mischief, and prejudiced the Protestant religion exceedingly in the minds of Princes, and those in authority under them. Mr Aylmer perceiving this, and apprehending also the consequences which might attend the leaving this book unanswered, resolved to employ his pen in the performance of a duty incumbent upon him, as a Christian Divine, and a good subject. His piece was entitled, An Harboure for faithfull and true Subjects, against the late blowne Blasse, concerning the Government of Women. Wherein bee confuted al such Reasons as a stranger of late made in that Behalfe. With a briefe Exhortation to Obedience. It was printed at Strasbourg, anno 1559, and was dedicated to the Earl of Bedford, and Lord Robert Duddely (afterwards Earl of Leicester, then) Master of the Queen's Horfes. This book is written with great vivacity, and at the same time discovers it's author's deep and general learning. At the opening of this work, there are some curious remarks on Mr Knox's want of skill in Politicks, and the Law of Nations; the author then proceeds to a logical refutation of his arguments, and in doing this, he enters into a comparison of the Civil or Roman Law, with that of this land. In his exhortation to obedience, he pays great compliments to the new Queen Elizabeth, giving however this reason for his not setting his name to his book, that he might write with greater liberty, and be the less suspected of flattery. A seasonable and well-judged antidote this was to Knox's furious poison, and well calculated to soften Queen Elizabeth's resentment, which had begun to discover itself against the exiles (20). Yet with all this moderation, it so happened, that our author retaining in his mind, too quick a sensation of the severities exercised by Queen Mary's Popish Bishops, let fall some odd expressions, and amongst them these; 'Come off, ye Bishops, away with your superfluities, yield up your thousands, be content with hundreds; as they be in other reformed churches, where be as great learned men as you are. Let your portion be Priest-like, not Prince-like. Let the Queen have the rest of your temporalities, and other lands, to maintain these wars, which you procured, and your mistress left her embroiled in; and with the rest to build and found schools throughout the Realm. That every parish-church may have his preacher, every city to have his superintendent to live honestly, and not pompously, which will never be, unless your lands are dispersed, and bestowed upon many, which now feed and fat but one.' Other passages there are to the same purport, which Mr Strype tells us very confidently, were intended of the Popish Bishops, which, with his leave, is a visible absurdity, as appears from the words above cited; other reformed churches. Not but that the Popish Bishops are also struck at by what follows, but the scope of the words take in the whole order, and in this sense they were understood. Aylmer himself, when this passage was afterwards objected to him, disdain'd such trifling, and answered like a man of sense; When I was a child, I spoke like a child, and thought like a child, &c (21). His inclining to what was afterwards called Puritanism in those days, appears further by his choice of his Patrons, the Earl of Bedford, and Lord Dudley. This was a topick his enemies would never part with, when he came afterwards to change his opinions, and to act with the same quickness and vehemency in defence of Prelacy, which he had before discovered in this work, in writing to the English throne, Aylmer returned home, and was one of the eight Divines, appointed to dispute with as many Popish Bishops at Westminster, in the presence of a great assembly (k). A. D. 1562, he obtained the Archdeaconry of Lincoln, by the favour of Mr Secretary Cecil (l). In right of this dignity, he sat in the famous Synod held the same year, wherein the doctrine and discipline of the Church, and its Reformation, from the abuses of Popery, were carefully examined and wisely settled (m). In this situation he continued for many years [G], and discharged the duty of a good subject to the government under which he lived, in Church and State; being one of the Queen's Justices of the Peace, as also an Ecclesiastical Commissioner, which gave him a great insight into affairs, and rendered him fitly qualified for the episcopal function (n). October the tenth, 1573, he accumulated the degrees of Bachelor and Doctor in Divinity, in the university of Oxford (o). The next year the Archbishop of Canterbury made choice of him, to answer a book written in Latin against the government of the Church of England; but after thoroughly considering it, Dr Aylmer declined the task (p), which some in those days (perhaps unjustly) attributed to discontent, because he was not made a Bishop. To this dignity he had been often named by that excellent man, Matthew Parker, then Archbishop of Canterbury, but always set aside, either through the interest of the Archbishop's enemies, or his own (q). For there were enough of both, and the latter failed not to suggest, that in the same book where Aylmer had made his court to the Queen, he had also shewn his spleen against Episcopacy (r). At last, in the year 1576, on Dr Edwin Sandys being promoted to the Archbishoprick of York, Dr Aylmer was made Bishop of London (s), not without the furtherance of his predecessor, who was his intimate friend, and had been his fellow-exile. Yet immediately after his promotion, Bishop Aylmer found, or thought he found, cause to complain of the Archbishop [H]; however his Grace assisted at his consecration, on the writing against it. While we are upon this subject, it may not be amiss to note, that the reflection this piece drew upon him, did probably deter Mr Aylmer from meddling with the Press again; to which he retained an irreconcilable aversion, except in cases of necessity, to the very end of his life.

[G] Continued for many years. In this note we shall lay before the reader, some particulars worthy his notice, which happened to Mr Aylmer, between his return to England and his promotion to the Bishoprick of London. He was about forty years old when he first became known at court, having for his fast friend, Parker, Archbishop of Canterbury, and for his Patron, Secretary Cecil. Before the ecclesiastical preferments were settled, Cecil made lists of Divines, proper to be recommended to Bishopricks. In one of these, consisting of nineteen names, stood Aylmer, but though twelve of that number were honoured with mitres, he was passed by (22). However he had no great reason to complain, his Archdeaconry being a very profitable preferment. In the roll of the subscriptions to the thirty-nine articles in the Synod, mentioned in the text, which subscriptions were made on the 15th of February 1562, he subscribed thus; Johannes Aylmerus, Archid. Lincoln. (23). He did not stir much in this assembly, and when the great debate was on the six points, relating to feast-days, ceremonies, organs, &c. he was absent, and so were many more to the number of twenty-seven (24). It was doubtless by the Archbishop's interest, Mr Aylmer was made a Justice of Peace, and put into the high commission; and Mr Wood assures us, that his being in these posts, is taken notice of in the Oxford register in the entry of his degrees (25). He was very active in all his several employments; however his book was still harped upon, by such as had no kindness for his person. Amongst the rest, one Mr Norton, a Minister, writing to Dr Whitgift, to dissuade him from answering Mr Cartwright, the Puritan's book, remarked, that Mr Aylmer's unreasonable paradox to truth, had hurt the Church, and yet not advanced his preferment so much as he hoped. But Dr Whitgift in his answer, supported Mr Aylmer's doctrine, and vindicated him from the charge of writing for preferment (26). Many of these reports no doubt, had reached our Archdeacon's ears, and therefore we need not wonder that he declined the Archbishop's motion of writing an answer to the treatise, de Disciplina, which would certainly have created him new enemies, and have contributed nothing towards pacifying the old. It was not only Parker, our author's friend and countryman, that thought him the properest person to be employed in such a work, Grindal then lately preferred from London to York, thought so too; but was apprehensive that Aylmer would not take the pains (27). Indeed it was not reasonable to expect he should. He had already a great deal upon him, and it is admitted on all hands, that he left nothing unexecuted which depended upon him; inasmuch that many years after it was acknowledged, the diocese of Lincoln felt the good effects of his administration. The Archdeacon's diligence was somewhat impeded by a dispute he had with the Bishop, which induced a law-suit; but at length the parties, to avoid scandal, submitted the matter in debate to Matthew, Archbishop of Canterbury, and Robert, Bishop of Winchester, by whom it was finally determined in 1572 (28). When Grindal was made Archbishop of York, Aylmer was talked of for his successor in the See of London, and Parker recommended him warmly to Secretary Cecil. The Earl of Leicester, our author's first Patron, started an objection, though he seemed to espouse his interest; which objection was, that it would seem strange to raise an Archdeacon at once, to so considerable a See; after all, Sandys was preferred for that time (29). It is pretty evident, that neither of the parties which were then in the Church, had any liking to our Archdeacon. Those who were warm for Uniformity, remembered his declamation against Bishops, and the other party again, hated him also on account of his book; for though none durst openly own it, yet Knox's doctrine had many followers. Besides, Aylmer's conduct as an Archdeacon, and an ecclesiastical commissioner, seemed to speak an alteration in his sentiments; and thus, though no objection could be made to his parts, learning, or application to business; yet doubts and jealousies, retarded his preferment for near fifteen years, notwithstanding his own merit, and the warm solicitation of powerful friends.

[H] Cause to complain of the Archbishop. The dispute between our Bishop Aylmer, and his predecessor, Archbishop Sandys, is a point not to be sifted over hastily, or treated with any partiality. We shall endeavour to state it fairly, truly, and from proper authorities. Sandys was Aylmer's particular friend, had been his fellow-exile, and recommended him warmly for his successor in the See of London (30). In his farewell sermon preached at Paul's Cross, he was pleased to give this character of him, then, appointed to supply his place. 'My hope is that the Lord hath provided one of choice, to be placed over you, a man to undertake this great charge, for strength, courage, great wisdom, skill in government, knowledge, as in many other things; especially in the Heavenly mysteries of God, that I doubt not, but my departure shall turn very much to your advantage (31).' When Dr Aylmer came twenty-fourth of March, 1576. But this did not hinder Bishop Aylmer from suing Sandys for dilapidations, which after some years prosecution he recovered (t). December the fifteenth, 1577, our Bishop began his first visitation, wherein he urged subscriptions, which some ministers refused, and not contented therewith, reviled such as saw no reason to hinder them from subscribing, calling them dissemblers, and comparing them to Arians and Anabaptists, such was the temper of the Puritans at their very beginning (u). He was also extremely assiduous in publick preaching, took much pains in examining such as came to him for ordination, and kept a strict eye over all the Dissenters in those times, as well Papists as Puritans. In which he acted so far as his episcopal authority would permit, and where he found that not sufficient, he wrote freely to the Treasurer Burleigh [I], as to what he thought further necessary (w). When the plague raged in London, in the year 1578, our Bishop shewed a paternal care of his clergy and people. For as on the one hand he would not expose the former to needless perils, so on the other he provided, that these last should not be without spiritual comforts (x). In 1581 came out Campion's book, shewing the reasons why he had deserted the Reformed, and returned to the Popish communion. It was written in very elegant Latin, and dedicated to the scholars of both the universities, for which reason the Treasurer, Burleigh, thought it very proper that it should be answered, and referred the care thereof to our Bishop, who though he gave his opinion freely upon the subject, and promised his assistance, if the answering it was put into a method which he proposed, yet he declined the undertaking singly [K], on account of the great business he had upon his hands (y). He was indeed to town on this occasion, the Archbishop courteously entertained him at his house; when he departed for York, he left several things in the houses belonging to his Bishoprick, for his use and benefit, all which so obliged the new Bishop of London, that a little before his consecration, he said, he would demand nothing for dilapidations; and a little after, promised to be contented with an hundred pounds, as the Archbishop offered to justify on his oath, in a paper under his hand (32). When Sandys was gone to York, our Bishop, or, as Strype says, some busy lawyer for him, set up many demands; requiring first the rent to Lady-day, and some time after sept back to Michaelmas (33). To this Sandys objected, that till Candlemas, he was Bishop of London, and had spent in hospitality there five hundred and fifty pounds, more than he had received since Michaelmas. That neither Bishop Young, nor the late Archbishop Grindal, had been so dealt withal, but enjoyed all they received. This answer which was addressed to the Treasurer, ended with these words; 'He is able, and I am a beggar, I have in that space been at all the costs, and taken all the pains, he none; so that if the restitution-day be found on the Purification of our Lady, it will look farther back than I thought (34).' Bishop Aylmer, it seems, in order to demonstrate the ability of his Grace to answer his demands, sent to the Lord Treasurer, a note of what accrued to the Archbishop in his new diocese. His Lady-day's rents 500*l.* demesnes 400*l.* benevolence of his Clergy 800*l.* in wood 3000*l.* (35). The Treasurer fairly sent a copy of this note to the Archbishop, who in his answer to his Lordship's letter says, 'I have set a brief and true comment on this false text, as by the billet enclosed to your Lordship, you may perceive.' That billet ran thus; *The Lady-day rents are untrue by a great sum, and perhaps part of the tenths will be required of me; the demesnes not 500*l., the Clergy's benevolence in two years to come; as to the wood he might as well have rated the houses to pull down and sell, he hath as much wood at London. At the end of the Archbishop's letter are these remarkable words; 'Coloured covetousness, an envious heart, covered with the coat of dissimulation, will, when opportunity serve, shew itself; my Lord, I am fore dealt withal, and most shamefully wronged on every side; my only comfort is, that a clear conscience will answer for me before God, and that when I shall be tried, veritas liberabit mibi?' In another letter to the Treasurer, the Archbishop insinuates, that this note was sent to the Treasurer, rather to bring difficulties upon him, than from any hopes the Bishop had of getting by it himself. 'For how, continues his Grace, came he to look for this, that the Bishop of York would give his revenues to so unthankful a man, that so soon as he had holden him on with his rochet, was transformed, and shewed himself in his own nature (36).' It does not appear how this matter was ended, but Mr Strype tells us, that Bishop Aylmer commenced another suit against his predecessor for di-lapidations, computing them at upwards of twelve hundred pounds (37), which demand was afterwards carried much higher, as the reader will see in the text.

[I] To the Treasurer Burleigh.] By a letter of the Bishop's, dated the 30th of December 1579, it appears, that he kept a very strict eye over the Papists. That letter is directed to the Treasurer, and it relates to one Carter, a Printer, whom together with his Press, the Bishop seized, and sent the man to the Gatehouse. In his custody the Bishop found a French treatise, intitled, The Innocency of the Scottish Queen, which his Lordship calls a very dangerous book, because the said Queen, is there filed heir apparent of this crown; he also intimates, that the man was an old offender, out of whom there was nothing to be sifted (38). What influence the Bishop's letter had on the Treasurer at this time appears not, but something may be guessed, from the following passage out of Stowe. 'On the 10th of January 1584, at a Session holden in the Justice-Hall of the Old Bailey London, William Carter, of the City of London, was there indicted, arraigned, and condemned of High-Treason, for printing a seditious and traitorous book in English; intitled, A Treatise of Schism; and was for the same according to the sentence pronounced against him, on the next morning, drawn from Newgate to Tyburn, and there hanged, bowelled, and quartered (39).' On all other occasions, the Bishop bore hard upon the Papists, and upon all the favourers of the title of the Queen of Scots. Another particular instance of this, we have in the case of one Mr Thomas Pond, formerly a person of some distinction, now a prisoner in the Marshalsea. Two Ministers it seems, went to confer with him upon religious subjects, but they found him so knotty a disputant, that they could by no means manage him; which when they had reported to the Bishop, he instantly gave directions for his being removed to his castle of Bishops-Stortford. where, as the Papists say, he was confined in a very dark melancholy dungeon (40). The truth seems to be, that the Bishop thought that men of this disposition, in the neighbourhood of London, might do a great deal of mischief, by perverting weak people to their religion, as we may gather by several letters of his to the Treasurer on this subject. In all of them, he writes very pathetically, and expostulates with his Lordship, for not being so warm in this matter as himself was; intimating that rebellion was a thing necessarily connected with their religion, wherefore Statesmen, as well as Churchmen, were bound to look strictly after all favourers of Popery (41).

[K] Declined the undertaking singly.] This book of Campion's which was published in 1581, gave the Administration no small uneasiness; it was written in very elegant Latin, in a quick and taking style, dedicated to the scholars in both universities, among whom it was secretly dispersed. One of the principal points insisted on therein, was the strange and contradictory doctrines taught by some of the first Reformers, on which subject

no great friend to controversy, which he thought turned the minds of the people too much from the essence of religion, made them quarrelsome and captious, indifferent subjects, and not very good Christians. On this account, he held a freighter rein over the Puritans than over the Papists, imprisoning one Woodcock, a Stationer or Bookseller, for vending a treatise, intituled, An Admonition to Parliament, which tended to subvert the Church as it was then constituted (z). He had likewise some disputes with one Mr Welden, a person of a good estate and interest, in Berkshire, whom he procured to be committed by the ecclesiastical commissioners (a). These proceedings roused the Puritans, who treated him as a persecutor, and an enemy to true religion [L]. However this did not discourage the Bishop, he was a warm and steady man, thought the peace of the Church was to be secured by the authority of it's Fathers, and therefore he executed his episcopal power, as far and as often as it was necessary (b). Thus he suddenly summoned the clergy of London to his palace, on Sunday the twenty-seventh of September, 1579, at one of the clock. On this summons forty appeared, and the Dean being likewise present, the Bishop cautioned them of two things, one was, not to meddle with the Ubiquitarian controversy; the other, to avoid meddling with the points treated in Stubb's book, intituled, The Discovery of a gaping gulph, &c. written against the Queen's marriage, with Monsieur, the French King's brother, and wherein it was suggested, that the Queen wavered in her religion (c). This method being found very effectual, he summoned his clergy often, and made such strict enquiries into their conduct, as gained him great reputation with some, though it exposed him to the censures and ill-will of others (d). This disposition perhaps might occasion, in some measure, that violence with which he was prosecuted before the Council, in May 1579, for cutting down his woods, in respect to which he was severely checked by the Lord Treasurer, a circumstance which much raised the Bishop's choler. However, notwithstanding his angry letters to that great nobleman, and his long and laboured defence of himself, he was at length, by the Queen's command, forbid to fell any more [M]. He had notwithstanding better

he had a whole chapter intituled Paradoxa (42). The Treasurer was very desirous that this book should be answered, and answered effectually, for which reason, he applied himself to the Bishop of London; but it so happened, that his Lordship was then but just recovered of an ague, which at going off left him a fore leg. Besides, he could not with all his industry, procure the book; however he wrote his opinion to the Treasurer freely, and that opinion was this. He thought some of the Deans, Archdeacons, and Clergy who had preferences without cures of souls, should be employed in collecting materials for such an answer, and that others should be appointed to put them in order: He even drew up a list of these, and no doubt his Lordship's design was to have gone to the bottom of things; and to have justified the Reformation thoroughly. He suggested however to his Lordship, that tho' himself had been well acquainted with many of these great men (the chief reason of the Treasurer's applying to him) and had a profound veneration for their virtues; yet that he well knew, even these great men were not free from blame, or their writings from faults; wherefore he was for supporting the Reformation, rather than the Reformers (43). He continued in this sentiment after Lord Burleigh sent him the book, which he was far from thinking so extraordinary a performance as many held it to be (44). The Treasurer thought such an answer as the Bishop desired, too great an honour done him, and so Dr Whitaker was employed to confute it, which he did in a learned piece written also in the Latin tongue (45). [L] An enemy to true religion. The opinion the Puritans entertained of our Bishop, will best appear from what is said of him by Mr Peirce in his Vindication of the Dissenters; for as he is a very accurate author, and never speaks but from authority, whatever he delivers may be considered as the judgment of his party in the times of which he speaks, 'Dr John Aylmer, says he, Bishop of London, was a man of a most intemperate heat, who persecuted the Puritans with the utmost rage, and treated Ministers with such virulent and abusive language, as a man of sense, and indifferent temper, would scorn to use towards porters and cobblers (46).' As an instance of this he gives us the examination of one Merbury, a Minister, which is too long to be transcribed here; there are in it abundance of hard names, which are said to have fallen from the Bishop; but then it must be owned, that there is a great deal of impertinency in the Minister's discourse (47). As to the particular instances of his severity mentioned in the text. Thomas Woodcock was a young Stationer, who supposing that the book called an Admonition to the Parliament, might be sold to good profit, because it was prohibited, got a considerable number of them into his hands, which he vended freely, tho' with as much secrecy as he could (48). For this, Bishop Aylmer committed him to Newgate, and tho' he was strongly solicited by eminent persons for his release, yet he absolutely refused it, whereupon the Master, Wardens, and principal persons of the Stationer's company, addressed themselves to the Lord Treasurer for the man's release, but with what success does not appear (49). The affair of Mr Welden gave his Lordship more trouble. In the year 1597, the Ecclesiastical Commission suspended the Minister of Cookham, in Berkshire; Bishop Aylmer sent down one Keltridge, to supply the Minister's place; but Mr Welden, who was a considerable man in the parish, opposed him, and spoke very disrespectfully of the Bishop. Upon this, his Lordship granted an attachment against him, which the Defendant held to be illegal, and did not submit to; which occasioned the Bishop's sending a Pursuivant with a letter, Mr Welden submitted to this, saying, 'That now the Bishop of London had learnt good manners; adding afterwards, what is he but a private man, yet it must be, An't please your Lordship at every word, there never was a Bishop so vilely esteemed as he, I believe he is as ill thought of as ever was Bonner.' These words being proved by deposition, Mr Welden, for speaking them and for refusing to answer, was committed by the Ecclesiastical court in the absence of the Bishop, because it was his own cause (50). However, his Lordship wrote a warm letter to the Treasurer upon this subject, beseeching him to support the Commissioners in their proceedings against this man, for that otherwise the Queen's service must suffer (51).

[M] Forbid to fell any more. One of the greatest troubles this prelate ever met with, was an information exhibited against him to the Council, for cutting down his woods, and thereby prejudicing his successors in the See of London. The Bishop justified himself, and gave in a long answer to all the objections, which answer is still extant. The whole amount of the sales, as those who accused him set it forth, was a thousand pounds; the Bishop in the close of his answer, says very cautiously, that in three years, he thinks they may amount to six hundred pounds (52). The Treasurer spoke to him warmly at the Council-table, and went even so far as to tell him, that a Bishop had been deprived for such doings (53). This matter hung a long while before the Council, but in the end, her Majesty thought fit to direct, that he should cut down no more of his wood. After some time this matter broke out again. One Litchfield, a Court Musician, informed against him, that he cut down the elms at Fulham, better success against the Archbishop of York, his predecessor. For instead of his first demand of twelve hundred pounds for dilapidations, upon a view in 1580 (e), they were estimated to be one thousand, six hundred, and two pounds; and though the cause then had not a final hearing, yet the Archbishop of York, only endeavoured to obtain a mitigation of damages, and that a part of the burthen should fall on the executors of Archbishop Grindal, who had been his predecessor in the diocese of London (f). On the sixth of April in the same year, there was a dreadful earthquake, and in the dead of the night on the first of May, it was felt again, which as it exceedingly terrified the people, so the Bishop, that he might turn their concern to a proper object, and at the same time exhibit to them reasonable grounds of comfort, composed certain prayers to be made use of in the publick service (g). In 1581, the Bishop had a pretty rough struggle with the Lord Rich, who kept one Wright a Puritan minister in his house, and would have compelled the Bishop to license him to preach in his diocese. In the end however the Bishop had the better; for on a hearing before the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, Wright was committed to the Fleet, and some others who had been busy in this affair, to other prisons (h). This increased the number of his enemies, of whom he had not a few before, who daily suggested that he was a violent man, and fought to vest too great a power in Churchmen. These representations had such effect, that sometimes messages were sent to him, to abate somewhat of the rigour of his proceedings (i). His Lordship however still supported the ecclesiastical commission, by his presence and authority, and though a milder course might have made him more easy, yet he thought it better to suffer himself, than that the Church should (k). As he had formerly, so now he had many doubts concerning the Treasurer, from whose hands usually came his reproofs; but upon the winding up of his cause, before the Council about selling of woods, he saw clearly, that he had no friend equal to the Treasurer, who, though he endeavoured by his admonitions to prevent his falling into such difficulties, yet generously exerted his utmost power to help him out of them, so far as was consistent with equity, and the good of the common-weal (l). From this time forward, therefore, the Bishop applied chiefly to the Treasurer, for any favours he expected from Court, particularly with regard to the business of his translation; for what with one thing or other, he was exceedingly solicitous to be removed from London, either to Winchester or Ely; but with respect to this, though he had many fair promises, all his interest could not procure a performance (m). New informations, some with little, many with no cause at all, were exhibited against him, and the trouble these gave him was not a little, notwithstanding that on a thorough examination, his conduct constantly escaped censure (n). In 1583, he performed his triennial visitation, and having therein discovered many scandalous corruptions in the ecclesiastical courts, especially in the business of commuting penances, he wisely and honestly represented what came to his knowledge to the Privy-Council, which was all he could do. About this time also he suspended certain Ministers, who were accused of Nonconformity; and it appears, that upon a thorough examination of the matter, his Lordship did impartial justice, in restoring one Mr Giffard, whom he had twice suspended, when those who had charged him were able to make nothing out (o). In 1584, he obtained judgment against Archbishop Sandys for a thousand pounds. In this year also he committed Mr Thomas Cartwright, a famous Puritan Minister, who had written warmly against the Hierarchy, and was a very stirring man in that cause, which the Bishop understood to be the disturbance of the publick peace (p). Yet for this his Lordship incurred the Queen's displeasure, and a little after his Lordship was given to understand, that he stood accused to her Majesty, for impairing the revenues of his bishoprick, of which he purged himself, by exhibiting a state of the bishoprick as it then stood, compared with the condition it was in when he became Bishop (q). Other difficulties he met with, on account of the share he had in executing her Majesty's ecclesiastical commission, from which there were continual appeals to the Privy-Council, where the Lords who favoured the Puritans, did not fail to object to the Bishop's conduct, which, considering his warm temper, afflicted him not a little (r). In 1585, he composed a prayer to be used on account of the rainy unseasonable weather, which he recommended to private families, as well as directed to be read with the publick prayers. He also used his interest to quiet the murmurs of the common people in London, against the crowds of strangers who fled hither, to avoid the persecutions raised against them, for embracing the Protestant religion (s). In the summer of the year 1586, the Bishop went his next triennial visitation, and at Malden in Essex, his Lordship narrowly escaped an outrageous insult,

Fullham, an accusation, which, very luckily for the Bishop, the Queen knew to be false; for she had lodged at Fullham, after the time the elms were said to be cut down, and had complained that the prospect from her lodgings had been spoiled by the over thickness of the trees (54). The Bishop's enemies and especially the Puritans, did not fail to magnify these little imputations, inasmuch as to allege that the Bishop's name ought to be transposed; and that instead of Elmar, he should be called Mar-Elm (55). Strype vindicates the Bishop very warmly in his Life, but certain it is, that Bishop Bancroft, amongst other things which he charged upon our Prelate, insisted strenuously on this, that he had spoiled the woods of his See, and left them in such a condition, that they would scarce serve his successor with firewood (56); and indeed, if the reader reflects on the note he gave in to the Archbishop of York, he cannot but discern what right the Bishop had in his own opinion, to the cutting down of timber (57).

insult, intended against him by some disaffected persons [N]. His son Dr Theophilus Aylmer, whom he had made Archdeacon of London, did this year also call the clergy before him, and gave them many excellent instructions, being himself a very pious and primitive divine (l). In 1587, the Bishop entered into a new scene of trouble, on account of one Mr Robert Cawdry, schoolmaster, whom the Lord Burleigh had presented to the living of South Luffenham in Rutlandshire, where after preaching sixteen years, he was convened before the ecclesiastical commission, and at length, the Bishop sitting as Judge, deprived (u). Cawdry would not submit to the sentence, whereupon the matter was re-examined by the ecclesiastical commission at Lambeth, where to deprivation, degradation was added. However the thing did not end so, for Cawdry still refusing to submit, made new and warm representations to the Lord Burleigh, who favoured him as much as with justice he could, but after near five years contest, nothing could be obtained, the Bishop's and Archbishop's sentences being strongly supported, both by the Civil and Common lawyers (w). In 1588, his Lordship restored one Mr Henry Smith, a very eloquent and much admired preacher, whom he had suspended for contemptuous expressions against the Book of Common-Prayer, which however Smith denied (x). In 1589, his Lordship expressed, in pretty strong terms, his dislike of certain libels against the King of Spain, giving it as his reason, that on so glorious a victory, it was better to thank God, than insult men, especially Princes (y). That year also he visited his diocese, though he was grown old and very infirm, and suspended one Dyke at St Alban's, though he had been recommended by the Lord Treasurer (z). In 1591, he caused the famous Mr Cartwright to be brought before him out of the Fleet, and expostulated with him roundly, on the disturbance he had given the Church (a). In 1592, he strongly solicited in favour of Dr Bullingham, and Dr Cole, that they might be preferred to bishopricks, but without success, which his Lordship foresaw. For he observed when he applied for them, that he was not so happy as to do much good for his friends; yet he added, he would never be wanting in shewing his good will, both to them and to the Church (b). About this time, casting his eye on Dr Bancroft, a rising and very active man, he warmly endeavoured to obtain leave to resign his bishoprick to him, as a man every way fit for such a charge, but in this also he was disappointed, which it seems lay heavy at his heart; for even on his death-bed, he expressed his earnest desire that Bancroft might succeed him (c). So indeed he did, but not immediately, and dealt as sharply with our Bishop's children, as he had done with his predecessor Sandys; and on the same head, that is, of dilapidations (d). In 1592, the Bishop assisted at his son's visitation, as Archdeacon of London, and it is remarkable, that at this visitation, the Bishop exerted himself with as much zeal and spirit as he had ever shewn in his life (e). His great age, and great labours, however, weighed him down by degrees, so that on the third of June, 1594, he yielded to fate, being seventy-three, and his body being brought from his palace at Fulham, was interred in his own cathedral church of St Paul, before St George's chapel, under a fair stone of grey marble, with an inscription which is still preserved, as the reader will find in a note, though the stone on which it was engraven, together with many others, were demolished by the saints, when St Paul's church was converted to another use than it's founders designed (f). Bishop Aylmer married Judith Bures, or Buers, of a very good family in Suffolk, by whom he had a very numerous offspring, viz. seven sons, and two or three daughters, of whom in their proper place. As to the personal qualities of the Bishop, they were as those of most men are, good and bad, the former perhaps too much magnified by his friends, as the latter certainly were by his enemies. We will speak briefly and candidly, first of the one and then of the other. He was solidly and extensively learned in all things, that became either a great churchman, or a polite man to know. He was very well versed in the three learned languages, had read much history, was a good logician, and very well skilled in the Civil Law. As a Divine, he wanted no accomplishments; for he had studied, and understood the Scripture thoroughly; could preach, not only rhetorically but pathetically; and in the course of his

[N] By some disaffected persons. The common people in Essex were extremely averse to our Bishop, and at Malden especially his enemies were not a few. In order to express their resentments, when he came thither in the course of his visitation, certain tradesmen in the town, hired a fellow to come into the church in the guise of an idiot, to whip off the Bishop's cap, and to toss it amongst them, who under pretence of restoring it, were to throw it about the church; this goodly contrivance the Bishop discovered, before it was carried into execution, and prevented it. This he looked upon as a very fortunate thing, because probably, it might otherwise have been attended with great tumult, and might perhaps have produced bloodshed. He inquired narrowly after the authors of this scandalous machination, and having discovered, committed them, which not a little terrified the magistrates of this place, and abated the spirits of the Bishop's enemies. He wrote also to the Council with great earnestness upon this subject, but after all, it seems he did not think fit to proceed farther that way in his visitation (58.) He purchased the Manor of Much-Hadham in Hertfordshire, and resided frequently at the house belonging thereto, whereby he brought this part of his diocese into better order than it had been before. His son Theophilus he made Rector of this place, and used his assistance in the discharge of a burthen, which was now grown too heavy for him. This, as it was a great ease to the Bishop, so it was of great benefit to the diocese, for Dr Theophilus Aylmer was a most excellent man, and indefatigable in his duty, as appears by the articles drawn up by him, and delivered to his Clergy, which are mentioned in the text. All however could not still the clamours of those, who were offended at our prelate's activity; and who took pains so to misinterpret all his actions, that perhaps, never any Bishop since the Reformation, was pictured in a worse light, than he hath been (59).

his life-time, never buried his talent [O]. He was in his heart from the conviction of his head a Protestant, and opposed Popery warmly, not from a fanatical peevishness, but from a just sense of its errors, which he had the courage to combat openly in the days of Queen Mary, and the honesty to suppress, as it was his duty, in the reign of Queen Elizabeth. With all this, and indeed with a temper not a little hasty, he was a good-natured, facetious man, one extremely diligent and painful in the several employments he went through; of too generous a temper to be corrupted, and of much too stout a one to be brow-beat. He was a magnificent man in his house, as appears by his household, which consisted of fourscore persons, to whom he was a good master; that is, both a father and a friend. After his fatigues he was wont to refresh himself, either with conversation or at bowls. As to his failings, his temper was without doubt a little too warm, his expressions sometimes a little too blunt, and his zeal, it may be, somewhat above the true standard. His enemies charged him with an exorbitant love of power, which displayed itself in various extraordinary acts of severity, of which the reader will find an account in the notes; with covetousness, which prompted him to spoil his See, and injure a private man; with intemperate heat against Puritans, with a slight regard of the Lord's-day, and with indecencies in ordinary speech; all which are likewise in the notes examined [P]. On the

[O] Never buried his talent.] We have already in the course of these notes, as well as of the text, entered so often into the Bishop's character, as a scholar and a divine, that we have not much to say here. Some particulars however, which others have thought remarkable we must not omit, and others that have occurred in the perusal of the history of these times deserve a place; of both we shall treat as succinctly as possible. The Bishop was not only well versed in Hebrew literature himself, but also a great friend of all such as applied themselves to the study of that tongue. Amongst others, he was remarkably kind to the celebrated Mr Broughton, and warmly espoused his interpretation of that article in the Creed, which respects Christ's descent into Hell, a point in those days very warmly disputed. Broughton's interpretation to which the Bishop adhered, was this: That the descent spoken of, was not a local descent into the prison of the damned; but Christ's passing into Paradise, agreeable to the Greek word Hades, and the Hebrew Schoel; which are often rendered into English by the Grave, and do not strictly, or properly signify Hell (60). When he observed the thoughts of the congregation to wander while he was preaching, he would take a Hebrew Bible out of his breast, and read a chapter out of it, at which, when the people naturally gaped and looked astonished, he putting it up again, shewed them the folly of listening greedily to new and strange things, and giving small attention to matters regarding themselves, and of the utmost importance (61). The spirit and eloquence of his discourses recommended him as a popular preacher; and it was observed, that in all times of difficulty or danger, Bishop Aylmer was called to preach at court, which he did willingly, and with such cheerfulness as raised the minds of his audience, and had very happy effects (62). His zeal for the Church was unfeigned, as appeared especially in the latter part of his life, when it bred him nothing but discontent and disquiet; yet he never abated it, never departed from what he thought right on account of any solicitations, or omitted giving advice, and such advice too as he judged most proper, tho' he knew it would neither be well liked or at all followed. In the course of his life he had seen adversity as well as prosperity; and as in the former he had never betrayed any timidity, so he would never forsake or dissemble his principles for the fear of losing the latter.

[P] Examined in the notes.] The pains taken by the Bishop's adversaries to draw together whatever might hurt his character cannot be well magnified; nor can it be denied, that in many instances his temper and actions are much misrepresented. In a celebrated work, published on purpose to set certain Prelates in an indifferent light, our Bishop is very roughly handled. Among lesser matters, he is charged with detaining stolen goods. It seems certain thieves, after stealing a parcel of cloth belonging to some Dyers at the Old Swan in Thames-street, left it in his manor of Fulham. The Dyers claimed it, but the Bishop said it was his own, because taken in his Lordship. On which the remarker passes this sentence, That it being part blue, part green; the former might well serve for the Bishop's liveries, and the latter for covering his cushions and tables. One George Allen, a Grocer, dying, and by his will appointing Thomas Allen, and Richard Alworth of London, Merchants, his executors, they finding an entry of fourteen pounds in the decessed's books, as due from the Bishop of London, went on an Easter-Wednesday to demand it: the Bishop answered he owed them nothing; or if he did, they might go sue him. Upon this they expostulated with him, to which if they were to be believed, he returned, Away citizens! you are rascals! you are worse than wicked Mammon! then lifting up his hands, and letting them fall again, You are thieves, you are coseners, take that for a Bishop's blessing, and so get you hence! And so he caused them to be thrust out of doors. It is said, that he kept one Benison, a poor man, a long time in the Clink prison, without any great cause (63). The ordaining of his porter, and making him Minister at Paddington, and continuing him there long time after he was blind, hath afforded much matter of complaint. That matter however, which we find oftenest objected to the Bishop, is his playing at bowls on the Sabbath-day; and to place this in the strongest light, it is alleged, that he would sometimes lose his temper thereat; or, to express it in the words of our author, following his bowl, he would cry rub, rub, adding when it went too far, the Devil go with it, and then says the relator, he would follow it himself (64). To most of these charges answers have been given, which it is our duty to report. As to the cloth it was thrown in a dry ditch, where the Bishop caused it to be watched for two nights, in hopes of detecting the thieves, afterwards he directed it to be brought into his own house, where it was kept till the Dyers claimed it, who yet did not make proof that it was their cloth, or that the thieves were executed for stealing it; and, on the other hand, the Bishop was informed by his lawyers, that this cloth being waived in his manor, the property was altered, and transferred to the liberties. The debt due to the Grocer was it seems contracted, without the Bishop's knowledge, it being his constant direction to all with whom he dealt, to suffer none of his family to have anything without ready money; yet it was paid. As to Benison, he was a very refractory stubborn man. However the Bishop overthot himself in committing him, since he was censured for it by the Council; and had it recommended to him to make him some sort of satisfaction. As to the ordaining of his Porter, Mr Strype endeavours to defend it, by urging that there was but a small congregation at Paddington, where commonly for the meanness of the stipend, no Preacher could be had. An odd excuse, if Mr Strype knew, as he might have easily done, that this depended altogether on the Bishop of London; for which reason, when Dr Sheldon leased the manor to his family, he took away this reproach, by obliging them to make a handsome allowance to the minister. In respect to bowling, it is alleged, that the Bishop learned this custom at Geneva, where though the people were very strict, it was never held unlawful, even on the Sabbath after divine service was over. The Bishop himself used to say on this head, that he never withdrew himself from service or sermon. That Christ was the best judge of the Sabbath, and he had said, that it was made for man, and not man for it, and that as to any hasty expressions

- the whole, we may justly affirm, that the times he lived in considered, he might be stiled a person of extraordinary wisdom [2], a worthy Prelate, and a blessing to the Church. At the time of his decease he left seven sons, and either two or three daughters (g). His sons were, first, Samuel, who was bred to the Law, in which he became very knowing. He was stiled, of Claydon-Hall in the county of Suffolk, and was High-Sheriff of that county in the reign of King Charles I, and by two wives left a numerous posterity (b). His second, Theophilus, a most worthy Divine, Archdeacon of London, Rector of Much-Hadham in Hertfordshire, and Doctor of Divinity. He was Chaplain to King James, an able and zealous preacher, apt to be a little too warm against the Puritans; charitable to so extensive a degree, that he left his own family in but indifferent circumstances. He lived a true pattern of Christian piety, and died heroically, closing his own eye-lids, and with these words in his mouth, Let my people know that their Pastor died undaunted, and not afraid of death; I bless my God, I have no fear, no doubt, no reluctancy, but a sure confidence in the sin-overcoming merits of Jesus Christ. This happened January 1625. He was buried in his own parish church, and the excellent Primate Usher preached his funeral sermon (i). His third, John, who for some eminent service was knighted, and stiled Sir John Aylmer, of Rigby, in the county of Lincoln, Knt (k). Fourth, fifth, and sixth, Zachary, Nathaniel, and Edmund, of whom we know nothing particularly, except that Zachary and Edmund, were the warmest friends that age produced. When Edmund lay sick, Zachary continued with him night and day till his death, and when a person came to measure the body, in order to make a coffin, Zachary would be measured also, and in a very short space, took possession of the coffin made for him, at the same time with that of his deceased brother (l). These gentlemen seem to have been Divines. His seventh, Tobel, i. e. God is good. Archbishop Whitgift was his godfather, and the reason he was thus named, was his mother's being overturned in a coach, without receiving any hurt, when she was big with child. He wrote himself, Tobel Aylmer, of Writtle, in the county of Essex, Gentleman. He married a gentleman's daughter in that county, and had by her several children (m). As to the Bishop's daughters, Judith, the eldest, married William Lynch, of the county of Kent, Esq; The second, Elizabeth, married Sir John Foliot, of Perton, in the county of Worcester, Knt. Either a third daughter, or else Lady Foliot, took for her second husband, Mr Squire, a clergyman, a man of wit but very debauched, and a great spendthrift, though he had large preferments. He made a very unkind husband to his wife, which her father, the Bishop, so much resented, that as Martin Mar-Prelate phrases it, He went to buffets with his son-in-law, for a bloody nose. This Squire died poor, leaving a son named John, who was well educated, and provided for as a clergyman, at the expence, and by the procurement of his uncle, Dr Theophilus Aylmer, which he repaid with the utmost gratitude (n). To all his children, our Bishop, by his will, bearing date the twenty-second of April, 1594, bequeathed large legacies, as also some to his grand-children, appointing his two sons Samuel and Theophilus his executors, with Dr Richard Vaughan, who was also his relation.

[2] A person of extraordinary wisdom. Our Prelate in his person had nothing extraordinary, being of a mean stature, and remarkable for wearing of a very long beard; in his private life he was a man of economy, but withal, loved magnificence, which induced him to keep so large a family as he did. In his youth, he gave pregnant marks of his courage, which did not desert him in his old age; for it is reported, that when he conceived himself very ill treated, by his son-in-law, Squire, who by a base contrivance would have tarnished the reputation of his wife, the Bishop's daughter; the old man took him into a private room, and having reproached him for his wickedness and ingratitude, afterwards disciplined him stoutly with a cudgel (14). Another instance of his courage, Mr Strype gives us a long account of; which, in few words, amounts to this. Queen Elizabeth was once grievously tormented with the tooth-ach, and though it was absolutely necessary, was yet afraid to have her tooth drawn; Bishop Aylmer being by, to encourage her Majesty sat down in a chair, and calling the tooth-drawer. Come, said he, tho' I am an old man, and have but few teeth to spare, draw me this; which was accordingly done, and the Queen seeing him make so slight a matter of it, sat down, and had her's drawn also (68). He was very regular in his private devotions, hearing prayers constantly twice a day with his family, and breeding up his children very strictly; he was a wife and careful man, with respect to his temporal affairs; and as he came to his Bishoprick in good circumstances, so he died very rich, having laid out a little before, sixteen thousand pounds in one purchase (69).

But as he had prosecuted his predecessor, Sandys, very severely for dilapidations; so his successor Bancroft, was no less troublesome to his eldest son, on the same account. Mr Aylmer, who had studied the Law, alledged that his father's personal estate, only was liable on this account, and as the greatest part of that was expended on his funeral, he thought himself safe. But Bishop Bancroft, alledging, that lands being purchased with the money, which should have repaired the houses belonging to the Bishoprick, those lands ought in reason to be liable; he prevailed, and so at last a part of the estate was sold, in order to make him satisfaction (70). The inscription mentioned in the text is still preserved in Stowe's Survey of London, and ran thus.

Here lieth in a certain expectation of the Resurrection of the body, John Aylmer, Lord Bishop of London, who died A.D. 1594, aged 73.

A Y R M I N or A Y E R M I N (WILLIAM), Bishop of Norwich in the reigns of Edward II, and III, was descended of an antient and wealthy family, seated at Osgodby in Lincolnshire (a). He was a Canon in the cathedral church of York, and afterwards in that of Wells; and was for some time Keeper of the Seal, and Vice-Chancellor to King Edward II, under the Chancellor John Bishop of Norwich, who could not discharge his office by reason of sickness (b). About this time, an. 1319, a war being broke out between England and Scotland, Ayrmin had the misfortune to be taken prisoner, in a battle between the Scotch and the Yorkists [A]. Afterwards recovering his liberty, he was made Chancellor of England under King Edward III, and afterwards Treasurer (c). Being sent Ambassador to the court of Rome, he is said to have neglected the business of his embassy, and to have employed his time and interest in obtaining the bishoprick of Norwich, which was then vacant. In which application meeting with success, he returned to take possession of that See: which the King hearing, and being disgusted at his proceedings, sent soldiers to Norwich to apprehend him; but Ayrmin lay hid in the cathedral church, till, by the interposition of friends, the King was reconciled to him, and consented to his consecration (d) [B]. This Prelate gave two hundred pounds to buy lands for the maintenance of two Priests to say mass for his soul for ever (e). Fuller (f) tells us, he was credibly informed, that Bishop Ayrmin purchased the manour of Silk-Willoughby, in Lincolnshire, which, with other fair estates, continued still in the possession of his descendants. He died March the 28th, 1337, after having sat eleven years (g).

[A] He was taken prisoner in a battle between the Scotch and Yorkists. Fuller tells us this from an old anonymous Chronicle in manuscript (1), which take as follows, with that author's translation. 'Episcopus Eborum, Episcopus Eliæ, Thefaurarius, Abbas Beate Marie Eborum, Abbas de Selbie, Decanus Eborum, Dominus Willielmus Arymanec, Vice-cancellarius Angliæ, ac Dominus Johannes Dabeham, cum 8000 ferme hominum, tam equitum quam peditum, & Civibus propter civitatem egredientes, quoddam flumen Swale nuncupatum sparsis cuneis transeuntes, et indifpositis seu potius confusis ordinibus, cum adversariis congressi sunt. Scoti squidem in Marte gnari amplitudinem eorum exercitus caute regentes, in nostris agminibus strictis audacter irruerunt; nostrorum denique in brevi laceratis cuneis atque dissipatis, corruerunt ex nostris, tam in ore gladii, quam aquarum scopolis suffocati, plus quam 4000, et capti sunt Domini Johannes de Papeham, et Dominus Willielmus de Arymanec, ut praefertur, de Cancellaria, &c.—The Archbishop of York, the Bishop of Ely, Lord-Treasurer; the Abbot of St Mary's in York, the Abbot of Selby, the Dean of York, Mr William Arymanec Vice-chancellor, and Mr John Dabehame, with almost 8000 men, as well horse as foot, and citizens hastily going out of the city, passing over a certain river, called Swale, with scattered parties (*), and with disordered, or rather confused ranks, encountered the enemy. The Scotch, cunning in war, warily ruling the greatness of their army, boldly rushed on our men with well-ordered troops, and afterwards in short time having broken and scattered our parties, there fell of our men, with the mouth of the sword, and choked with the water, more than 4000, and Mr John de Papehame, and Mr William Armayne of the Chancery, as aforesaid, were taken prisoners.'

(*) Fashioned in form of a wedge.

[B] The King——consented to his consecration.] The Monks of Norwich had elected into the See, Robert Baldoc, Archdeacon of Middlesex, and Chancellor of England; and some pretend he had received the temporalities from the King, but, being informed that the Pope had reserved the disposition of that See to himself, he voluntarily renounced his election (2). But others, with more probability, tell us, the King refused his assent to Baldoc's election (3). However it be, it is certain it was set aside in favour of Ayrmin, who had obtained the Pope's collation to the See of Norwich.

A Y S C U E, A Y S C O U G H, or A S K E W (Sir GEORGE), an eminent English Admiral in the last century. He was descended from a very good family in Lincolnshire, and entered early into the sea-service, where he obtained the character of an able and experienced officer, and the honour of knighthood from King Charles I (a). This however did not hinder him from adhering to the Parliament, when by a very singular intrigue they got possession of the fleet, and so zealous he was in the service of his masters, that when in 1648, the greatest part of the navy went over to the Prince of Wales, he, who then commanded the Lion, secured that ship for the Parliament, which was by them esteemed both an acceptable service, and an action of great importance (b) [A]. As this

[A] An acceptable service, and an action of great importance.] This revolt of the fleet was among those extraordinary things, which it was impossible either to foresee or to prevent. It was owing entirely to the disposition of the common seamen, for scarce any officer was at all concerned in it, and at a time too, when the Parliament was every where victorious, so that it is not easy to conceive the causes of so great a change. In order to understand this matter, it must be remembered, that the Parliament had in the beginning of the war, drawn off the fleet from the King's service, partly by working upon the minds of the seamen, and partly by the turning upon him his own commission of Admiral, which he had granted to the Earl of Northumberland, but with a proviso in that commission, to hold this office no longer than till the Duke of York was of age to execute it, as the King his father intended he should (1). It was of this very clause, which had served them in the beginning, that the Parliament began now to be afraid, and it was their fear that produced the very thing which it apprehended. The Earl of Warwick, and his Presbyterian officers, who had brought off the navy from the King, were not likely to go all the lengths that were then expected from them. The Parliament therefore thought fit to bring in new officers, and accordingly appointed one Colonel Rainsborough, Vice-Admiral, and sent him into the Downs, to take upon him the command of the fleet with that title (2). But when he came thither, the sailors had been for some time politicians, and having probably caught up some words that fell from their officers, had, after mature deliberation, settled these three points among themselves. The first was, that the Parliament must be either doing or contriving something very bad, because in Scotland, Essex, Lancashire, Kent, and especially at London, people were generally discontented, and also because they could not trust those good old officers, who had so faithfully served them at sea, but were putting others into the fleet, in whom, though they might, the seamen could not at all confide. They were likewise very clear, that as the King's cause declined from the moment the fleet left him, so without doubt it would recover, when the fleet returned to his service, was a sufficient proof of his fidelity, he had the command given him in a squadron, that was employed to watch the motions of the Prince of Wales, and accordingly sailed there-with to the coast of Ireland, where, by his vigilance, he prevented his Highness from doing what he would otherwise have done, and by his great interest with the seamen, he drew many of them back to that service from which they had deserted (c). This recommended him strongly to the Parliament, who, the next year, sent him with a considerable number of ships, and the honourable title of Admiral in those seas, to the coast of Ireland, which commission he discharged with equal vigour and vigilance, supplying Dublin with provisions, attending the army upon all emergencies, and contributing in every respect so effectually to the reduction of Ireland, that the Parliament not only thought fit to continue him in his command for another year, but likewise ordered an immediate provision to be made for the payment of his arrears, and presented him with one hundred pounds, as a special mark of their favour, and the just reward of his services (d) [B]. After the war was finished in Ireland, and the Parliament had thereby time and opportunity, to think of the proper means of subduing the rest of the dominions of the crown of England to their obedience, Sir George Ayscue had orders to sail with a small squadron, to reduce the island of Barbadoes, but before he was in any readiness to sail, his orders were countermanded. The reason of this was, that the Parliament had received information, that the Dutch were treating with Sir John Greenville, in order to have the isles of Scilly put into their hands, and therefore it was thought necessary to reduce these islands first. Blake and Ayscue were employed in this expedition (e), in the spring of the year 1651, and performed it with honour and success. They had but a small body of troops on board, and Sir John Greenville had a considerable force in the island of St Mary, commanded by some of the best officers in the late King's army, so that if those disputes had been decided by the sword, the engagement must have been both bloody and doubtful. Sir John easily perceived that this must end fatally in respect to him, and the remains of the King's forces under his command; and therefore entered into a treaty with General Blake, and Admiral Ayscue, who used him very honourably, and gave him fair conditions, after which Blake returned to England, and Ayscue proceeded on his voyage to Barbadoes (f). The Parliament, when they first heard of the reduction of Scilly, were extremely well pleased, as indeed they had reason, since privateers from thence did so much mischief, that scarce any trade could be carried on with tolerable security. But when the conditions were known, some great men changed their opinions, and gave Blake to understand, that he and his colleague had been too forward, so that it was doubtful whether the Parliament would ratify this agreement. Blake said, that if they had given Sir John Greenville good conditions, they had done it with good reason; that in the first place, it saved the effusion of English blood; and next, that there was a strong squadron of Dutch ships at no great distance, the commander of which had offered Sir John no less than 100,000 pounds, to put these islands into his hands; that service, which was a point so clear in marine politics, that it was never once controverted. Thirdly, the Duke of York was now become a fine young Prince, had just made his escape to Holland, and was very capable of making them a good Admiral (3). When Rainsborough therefore came on board in the Downs, they asked him in very plain terms, Whether he would go with them, and seek their Admiral the Duke of York? which he refusing, and beginning to talk in high terms, they very fairly sent him and a boat-full of his new Captains on shore, and hoisted sail, and bore away for the Dutch coast (4). This was in the month of July 1648, and the ships that thus quitted the Parliament's service, were twenty men of war, most of them of the first and second rates, well manned and furnished, and these soon after appeared at the mouth of the river Thames, by which the commerce of the city of London suffered severely (5). We need not wonder therefore, that Sir George Ayscue's preserving, in such a juncture, his ship for the Parliament, gained him a great degree of credit, and confidence, with his masters.

[B] A special mark of their favour, and the just reward of his services. In the very beginning of this affair, the Parliament treated Sir George very respectfully, for they desired that he would go over in the expedition to Holland, to look after the ships that had deserted (6). But when their authority was a little better established, they took more upon them, for they did not grant him a commission, and thereby give him the rank of Admiral, but they passed a vote that he should command in those seas as Admiral (7). Yet Sir George was far from regarding these points of ceremony, but did his duty so effectually, that he entirely changed the face of affairs in Ireland, and this with a very small force; for, whereas the garrison of Dublin was in danger of starving, he took care to supply them from time to time with provisions, and thereby preserved that city. He so carefully watched the revolted fleet, under the command of Prince Rupert, that he put it entirely out of his power to execute any thing of importance, and at last blocked him up in the harbour of Kinsale. It was he also, who escorted and secured the landing of Cromwell's army, so that to this gentleman might be justly attributed, the Parliament's recovering themselves, and securing that kingdom after the King's murder, when they had very little hopes of it (8). They might very well thank their Generals at sea, pass congratulatory votes in their favour, order the ministers who preached before them, to take particular notice in their sermons, of their diligence and success, and endeavour to secure such necessary instruments to their service, by providing for the due payment of their arrears (9). All these steps were equally just and natural on both sides, and it was this conduct, that on one hand, raised the reputation of the Parliament so high, for wisdom, policy, and justice, and, on the other, secured them such an uninterrupted series of good fortune in all their designs. This we find very justly remarked by Ludlow, Hollis, and Whitlock, nay, and in some measure, by the great Lord Clarendon himself, who, as he had it not in his power to deny the fact, so he was by no means unwilling to own it; and indeed all the writers of those times agree, that however the Parliament came by their power, they managed it with dignity, decency, and discretion. The observation I would make upon all this, and I hope the reader will agree with me, that it is an observation worth making, is, That Sir George Ayscue, and the rest of the officers at sea, as they behaved well, were encouraged and rewarded by their masters, who kept so strict an eye over all the servants of the publick, that it was impossible for men of no merit to rise, or for such as really possessed it to pass unrewarded.

that if the Parliament did not approve of his conduct, he should be sorry for it, and would take care to prevent a mistake of that sort for the future, by laying down his commission, as he was confident Sir George Ayscue would likewise do (g). Upon this there was no more said of the articles, which were honourably complied with, and Sir George received orders to sail immediately to the West-Indies, which he obeyed, never expecting to hear any more of these articles, which as they were made with good reason, so he thought they would have met with a good reception, but he had afterwards cause given him to apprehend, that whatever benefit the Parliament might receive from the service itself, they were far enough from being satisfied with the manner in which it was done [C]. Sir George continued his voyage, without meeting with any cross accident, till his arrival at Barbadoes; which was on the twenty-sixth of October, 1651. He then found his enterprize would be attended with great difficulties, and such as had not been foreseen at home. The Lord Willoughby, of Parham, commanded there for the King, and had assembled a body of five thousand men for the defence of the island. He was a nobleman of great parts and greater probity, one who had been extremely revered by the Parliament, before he quitted their party to follow his duty, and whose worth had so strongly recommended him, both to the esteem and affection of the inhabitants, that he had as absolute a disposal of their persons and properties, as it was necessary for a Governor to have, who was in such a situation; and the use he made of his power and influence, was as perfectly right in itself, as the critical circumstances of those times required (b). Sir George, though he fully apprehended how many and how great obstacles lay in his way, yet shewed no signs of concern, but boldly forced his passage into the harbour, and made himself master of twelve sail of Dutch merchantmen that lay there, hoping that this might raise an insurrection in the island, in which however he was mistaken. The next morning he sent a summons to the Lord Willoughby, requiring him to submit to the authority of the Parliament of England, to which his Lordship answered, that he knew no such authority, that he had a commission from King Charles II to be Governor of that island, and that he would keep it for his Majesty's service at the hazard of his life. That he might be able to make good his word, he put the island and it's inhabitants into the best posture of defence possible, and being much superior in strength, Sir George thought it not prudent to land the few troops he had, and thereby discover his weakness to so cautious an enemy (i). In the mean time, he received a letter by an advice-boat from England, with the news of the King's being defeated at Worcester, with one intercepted from Lady Willoughby, containing a very particular account of that unhappy affair. Upon this he summoned Lord Willoughby a second time, and accompanied his summons with Lady Willoughby's letter, which however made no impression upon his Lordship, who continued firm in his resolution, of holding out the island as long as he could (k). All this time, Sir George anchored in Speights bay, and stayed there till December, when the Virginia Merchant fleet arriving, he resolved to take that opportunity to land with the greater advantage, for he made as if they were a reinforcement that had been sent him, and he had only waited for them till then; whereas, the truth was, he had not above two thousand men, and the sight of the little army on shore, made him cautious of venturing his men, till he thought the inhabitants had conceived a greater idea of his strength, than they had done before (l). The Virginia ships were welcomed at their coming in, as a supply of men of

[C] They were far enough from being satisfied with the manner in which it was done.] It is the misfortune of all governments, that have a distrust of their own tides, to be jealous and suspicious to a very unreasonable degree, and this was one of the very few foibles, to which our Long Parliament was subject, and which proved in the end the ruin of their power. For Oliver Cromwell, and the people he trusted, knowing that there was no means of subverting that Senate, but by dividing them, and thereby rendering their bottom narrower; they took great pains to infuse into honest mens heads than their own, that such as were meer acts of generosity and virtue, flowed from a secret regard to the Royal Cause. And thus they brought both Blake and Ayscue to be considered, after all their services, as men not fit to be trusted. There was some pains likewise taken, to infuse into the minds of Blake and Ayscue, a deep resentment of this undeserved usage; and that this was not altogether without effect, appears clearly, from the warmth expressed by Blake about it (10). Yet after all, there are some passages relating to the reduction of these islands, which deserve the reader's attention, and which will clear up many difficulties, even in the best histories we have of those times. In the first place it is certain, that the lesser islands were actually taken by the Parliament's forces; that Sir John Greenville was blocked up by land and sea in the island of St Mary, which he had fortified indeed, and had a competent number of men to defend; but then, there were two things against him: The first, that the King hismaster could afford him no succours; the second, that tho' the Dutch would have bought the island of him, yet he had no reason to hope, they would take him or his troops on board, in case they were distressed by the Parliament forces. These were certainly very good reasons, for that brave man's endeavouring to make the best terms for himself he could (11). Yet the Parliament had no just cause to blame their generals for what they did in this business, since these islands were so situated, that, in the hands of an enemy, neither England nor Ireland could have been safe; and if reasonable terms had not been granted to Sir John Greenville, he must have been obliged to have accepted the terms offered him by the Dutch, who both could and would have yielded him that protection, which it was not in the power of hismaster to afford (12). Yet after all, Sir George Ayscue had no share in actually granting him these conditions; since it manifestly appears; that he not only wrote for, and had the Parliaments orders to continue his voyage to Barbadoes, but was actually failed before the articles were signed, which was on the 23d of May 1651 (13). The account given by the Earl of Clarendon of this matter, is very short, and is wrong placed; for he brings it in after the Dutch war was begun, and at the close of his account of the reduction of Barbadoes and Virginia (14); which shews, how necessary a thing it is for the true understanding of English history, to have the lives of particular persons drawn up in this manner, with a cautious regard to facts and dates, and a clear distinction of what was and what was not done by them (15), which the authors of our general histories have not attended to, so much as they ought.

war, and he presently ordered his men on shore, 150 Scots servants aboard that fleet, were added to a regiment of 700 men, and some seamen, to make their number look more formidable. Sir George had on board his fleet one Colonel Allen, a gentleman of Barbadoes, who came from thence into England, to solicit from the Parliament, a force sufficient for the reduction of the island, and therefore he was thought the properest man to command the forces on shore (m). He accordingly landed with them on the seventeenth of December, and found Lord Willoughby's forces well entrenched, near a fort they had upon the sea-coast. They attacked him, however, and, in a sharp dispute, wherein about sixty men were killed on both sides, had so much the advantage, that they drove them to the fort, notwithstanding that Colonel Allen, their Commander, was killed by a musket shot, as he attempted to land. The soldiers and seamen however pushed on, and made themselves masters of the fort, and four pieces of cannon that were in it. After this, the sailors returned to their ships, which cruized up and down, to prevent any succours coming to the islanders, or any merchants trading with them. The soldiers posted themselves in the fort, and from thence made incursions into the country, upon which the chief of the inhabitants grew weary of the war, which Sir George understanding, by the correspondence he had in the island, he by the same means procured Colonel Moddiford, who was one of the most leading men on the place, to enter into a treaty with him, and this negotiation succeeded so well, that Moddiford declared publicly for a peace, and joined with Sir George to bring Lord Willoughby, the Governor, to reason as they phrased it (n). Sir George's men were now all on shore, and made up a body of two thousand foot, and an hundred horse, for many deserters had come over to him. If Colonel Moddiford had joined him with his party in attacking them, there was no hope of the Governor's escaping, who having before deserted the Parliament, could expect no mercy from them, if he was taken without a treaty (o). But perhaps all these considerations would scarce have prevailed with that generous nobleman to have given up the island, if an accident had not happened, which put most of the gentlemen about him into such confusion, that he could no longer depend upon their advice or assistance. The thing happened thus; his Lordship perceiving his superiority lay chiefly in horse, resolved to make a brisk push with the body under his immediate command, and having, previous to the execution of his design, called together his officers, while they were sitting in council, a cannon-ball beat open the door of the room, and took off the head of the centinel posted before it, which so frightened all the gentlemen of the island, that they not only compelled their Governor to lay aside his former design, but to retire to a place two miles farther from the harbour (p). Sir George Ayscue, taking advantage of this unexpected good fortune, immediately ordered all his forces on shore, which consisted as was said of two thousand foot, and one hundred horse, to advance under the command of Captain Morrice, as if he intended to have attacked them in their entrenchments, which struck such a terror into some of the principal persons about the Governor, that, after mature deliberation on his own circumstances, and their disposition, he began to alter his mind, and thereupon to avoid the effusion of Christian and English blood, both parties appointed commissaries to treat (q). Sir George named Captain Peck, Mr Searl, Colonel Thomas Moddiford, and James Colliton, Esq; The Lord Willoughby, Sir Richard Peers, Charles Pim, Esq; Colonel Ellice, and Major Byham, who on the seventeenth of January agreed on articles of rendition, which were alike comprehensive and honourable. The Lord Willoughby had what he most desired, indemnity, and freedom of estate and person, upon which, soon after, he returned to England (r). The islands of Nevis, Antigua, and St Christopher, were, by the same capitulation, surrendered to the Parliament, with a proviso, that Lord Willoughby, Colonel Walrond, and some other persons mentioned in that treaty, were restored to their estates, and the inhabitants were promised, not only indemnity but protection, in the quiet enjoyment of their plantations, upon condition that they did nothing to the prejudice of the commonwealth (s). This treaty being signed, Mr Searl was appointed Governor of Barbadoes, and Mr Rynell, of Antigua and the Leeward Islands (t), in virtue of a commission, granted to Sir George Ayscue for this purpose. The news of the reduction of these islands, made such a noise in that part of the world, that Captain Dennis who was detached with a few ships to Virginia, reduced it without much trouble (u), after which, Sir George considering that he had fully executed his commission, and that his presence was no farther necessary in America, resolved to return with the squadron under his command to England, which he accordingly did, and arriving at Plymouth on the twenty-fifth of May, 1652 (w), was received with all imaginable testimonies of joy and satisfaction by the people there, to whom he was well known before, as his late success also served not a little to raise and heighten his reputation [D]. It was not long after his arrival, before he

[D] Served not a little to raise and heighten his reputation.] The reduction of Barbadoes was first attempted, because it was thought of greater consequence than any of our plantations, and the people least affected to the new government. We have an excellent, tho' concise, account of this, from the pen of Lord Clarendon (16). Barbadoes, says he, which was much the richest plantation, was principally inhabited by men that had retired thither only to be quiet, and to be free from the noise and oppressions in England, and without any ill thoughts towards the King, many of them having served him with fidelity and courage during the war, and that being ended, made that island their refuge from farther persecutions; but having now gotten good estates there, (as it is incredible to what fortunes men raised themselves in few years in that plantation) they were more willing to live in subjection under that government at that distance, than

He proceeded next to join Blake in the northern seas, where he continued during the best part of the month of September, and took several prizes, and towards the latter end of that month, Sir George returned with General Blake into the Downs, with one hundred and twenty sail of men of war (b). On the twenty-seventh of that month a great Dutch fleet appeared, after which, Blake with his fleet failed, and Sir George Aylcue, pursuant to the orders he had received, returned to Chatham with his own ship, and sent the rest of his squadron into several ports to be careened (i). It does not appear that the Parliament openly expressed any dislike, or distaste, at Sir George's behaviour upon his coming home, but, on the contrary, shewed him all the regard and respect imaginable, though he had some friends who informed him, that this was in appearance only, since they could not help expressing a dislike to the terms he had granted to the Lord Willoughby at Barbadoes, which they considered as the second part of Sir John Greenville's business, for which they had been so angry both with him and Blake; all which, however, Sir George bore without any visible signs of discontent, professing that he had done what he took to be his duty, and would continue so to do, as long as he commanded in the English fleet, without troubling himself about the humours of particular men, whom, after all his endeavours, he might find it impossible to please. But while these jealousies and heart-burnings subsisted on both sides, an occasion offered which enabled all parties to satisfy themselves. It so fell out, that towards the end of November, 1652, the famous General Blake lying at the mouth of our river, began to think that the season of the year left no room to expect farther action, for which reason he detached twenty of his ships, to bring up a fleet of colliers from Newcastle, twelve more he had sent to Plymouth, and our Admiral, as is before observed, with fifteen sail, had proceeded up the river in order to their being careened. Such was the situation of things, when Van Tromp appeared with a fleet of eighty-five sail (k). Upon this Blake sent for the most experienced officers on board his own ship, where, after a long consultation, it was agreed, that he should wait for, and fight the enemy, though he had but thirty-seven sail of men of war, and a few small ships (l). Accordingly, on the twenty-ninth of November a general engagement ensued, which lasted with great fury from one in the afternoon till it was dark. Blake in the Triumph, with his seconds the Victory and the Vanguard, engaged for a considerable time near twenty-sail of Dutch men of war, and they were in the utmost danger of being oppressed and destroyed by so unequal a force (m). This however did not hinder Blake from forcing his way into a throng of enemies, to relieve the Garland and Bonaventure, in doing which he was attacked by many of their stoutest ships, which likewise boarded him, but after several times beating them off, he at last found an opportunity to rejoin his fleet (n). The loss sustained by the English consisted in five ships, either taken or sunk, and several others disabled. The Dutch confess, that one of their men of war was burnt towards the end of the fight, and the Captain and most of his men drowned, and also that the ships of Tromp and Evertson were much disabled (o). At last, night having parted the two fleets, Blake supposing he had sufficiently secured the nation's honour and his own, by waiting the attack of an enemy, so much superior, and seeing no prospect of advantage by renewing the fight, retired up the river; but Sir George Aylcue, who inclined to the bolder but less prudent counsel, was so disgusted at this retreat, that he laid down his commission (p) [G]. The services this great that the most impartial and English historians own, that de Ruyter offered Sir George Aylcue battle afterwards, who refused it (23); this must appear in a very different light. It was some time before I could penetrate this mystery; for tho' Mr Colliber, a very industrious writer, and one whose perfect knowledge in the Dutch history, enabled him to see many things in a better light, than any of our writers of naval history, denies the fact, and treats de Ruyter's speech as a meer fiction (24); yet I could not subscribe in that to his opinion, because, as I have observed, the English writers of those times confirmed what the Dutch say, and acknowledge, that Sir George Aylcue declined fighting (25); but though there must be something more in it, and upon sifting the matter thoroughly, I found the truth to be this: Sir George Aylcue had a fleet of thirty-eight sail, but the greatest part of them neither did nor would fight; so that the whole fire of the Dutch fleet fell upon nine or ten sail that did their duty; and the reason that the Dutch fired at their rigging, was in hopes of disabling them from making a retreat, that the next day they might be able either to sink or take them. This accounts clearly for all the dark and contradictory passages that we have met with. It shews us, why Sir George Aylcue retired to his own ports to rest, it explains and justifies de Ruyter's speech, and it manifests the true reason why Sir George afterwards refused to fight when de Ruyter challenged and provoked him. This I say is the mystery hitherto never explained by any of our writers, and which therefore I take to be a very curious and valuable discovery. But the reader may perhaps imagine that this is all conjecture; and if it were so, I should have no reason to be ashamed of it. But William Lilly has set down the very fact, and it is from his account, that I have made this discovery. His words are these: 'August 16, 1652, Sir George Aylcue, near Plymouth, with fourteen or fifteen ships only, fought threescore sail of Dutch men of war, had thirty shot in the hull of his own ship, twenty merchant ships (I suppose merchantmen converted into men of war) never came in to assist him, yet he made the Dutch give way. Why our State shall pay those ships that fought not, we of the people know not. This is he that is a gentleman, lives like a gentleman, and acts the part of a generous commander in all his actions.' There cannot, I think, be any clearer account or better authority than this, either expected or demanded, since thereby all the different relations of this engagement, which have appeared hitherto so unintelligible, and in many respects so contradictory, are fully explained and perfectly reconciled.

[G] Was so disgusted at this retreat, that he laid down his commission.] We have this circumstance in the author cited in the text, who took it from the Dutch accounts; for the English say not one word of Sir George Aylcue's being in the engagement; but they acknowledge that Blake retreated, as being sensible both of the great loss he had sustained, and of the too great superiority of the enemy. The next day which was the thirtieth, Tromp sent into Harwich and Yarmouth to see if the English fleet was there; but they had retired first to Dover, and then up the river, where they were safe. In the mean time, the Dutch great man had rendered his country, were none of them more acceptable to the Parliament, than this act of laying down his command. They had long wished and waited for an opportunity of dismissing him from their service, and were therefore extremely pleased that he had saved them this trouble; however, to shew their gratitude for past services, and to prevent his falling into absolute discontent, they voted him a present of three hundred pounds in money, and likewise bestowed upon him three hundred pounds per annum in Ireland (g). There is good reason to believe, that Cromwell and his faction were as well pleased with this gentleman's quitting the sea-service; for as they were then meditating, what they soon afterwards put in execution, the turning the Parliament out of doors, it could not but be agreeable to them, to see an officer who had so great credit in the navy, and who was so generally esteemed by the nation, laid aside in such a manner, both as it gave them an opportunity of insinuating the ingratitude of that assembly to so worthy a person, and as it freed them from the apprehension of his disturbing their measures, in case he had continued in the fleet; which it is highly probable might have come to pass, considering that Blake was far enough from being of their party, and only submitted to serve the Protector, because he saw no other way left to serve his country, and did not think he had interest enough to preserve the fleet, after the defection of the army, which perhaps might not have been the case, if Sir George Ayscue had continued in his command (r). This is so much the more probable, as it is very certain that he never entered into the Protector's service, or shewed himself at all willing to concur in his measures, though there is no doubt that Cromwell would have been extremely glad of so experienced an officer in his Spanish war. He retired after this to his country-seat in the county of Surrey, and lived there in great honour and splendor, visiting and being visited by persons of the greatest distinction both natives and foreigners, and passing in the general opinion of both, for one of the ablest sea-captains of that age (s). Yet there is some reason to believe that he had a particular correspondence with the Protector's second son, Henry, since there is still a letter in being from him to Secretary Thurloe, which shews that he had very just notions of the worth of this gentleman, and of the expediency of consulting him in all such matters as had a relation to maritime power, which letter, as it is equally curious and short, the reader will find in the notes (t) [H]. The Protector, towards the latter end of his life, began to grow dissatisfied

Admiral kept plying between Calais and Dungeness, so much elated with his last success, that he failed with a birch broom in his main top, to signify that he had swept the seas of the English (26). This was what Ayscue forefaw; and the very apprehension of which, made him resolve to quit the service; for as we shall see hereafter, he was a man of such undaunted courage, that he knew not how to submit to fortune; and was much more inclined to embrace a voluntary death, than to expose his country to the loss of any credit by his miscarriage; which notwithstanding came to be his fate, in spite of all the care he took to avoid it. There was one reason which at this juncture inclined the Parliament to part the more readily with this excellent officer, which deserves to be considered. It is this; they began to discern Cromwell's intention to overturn them, and to set up a new form of government by the power of the army, which they saw he had gained, by putting in creatures of his own. In order therefore to get the better of this design, they formed a very extraordinary project; which was to new model the army, by sending such of the regiments as they suspected most, to serve on board the fleet; and to make this scheme answer their purpose the better, they thrust in abundance of land-officers to command their fleet, and it was to make way for these that they suffered Sir George Ayscue and some other officers to quit that service (27). But in this they strangely over-reached themselves; for Cromwell seeing there was no time to be lost, and that by this step they had for the present equally obliged the seamen and alarmed the army, pushed on his design with greater vehemence, and by craftily managing two parties, who tho' they wished equally ill to the Parliament, least of all intended the setting him up, deceived and got the better of them all; while the officers of the fleet having their hands full of the Dutch war, thought themselves obliged to serve their country the best they could, notwithstanding this change of government, which tho' they did not relish they could not remedy. Before this great change was brought about which was in the month of April 1653, Sir George Ayscue was retired to his country-seat in Surrey, with a settled resolution to live in an honourable privacy, and never concern himself farther with publick affairs; which is the reason that we never meet with him in the councils of state, or any other of the new schemes of government that were set up in succeeding times. How far this conduct of his may on the strict principles of patriotism be justified, I shall not take upon me to determine; but this is certain, that some of the wisest and ablest men in the kingdom thought in the same way, and acted in the same manner, till they had an opportunity afterwards of entering again into the publick service, when the government was better established, and stood once more upon a legal basis. There might also be a particular reason that might determine Sir George Ayscue to act as he did, which was this, that he had never interfered in any of those dark designs by which the government was overturned, or been made use of as an instrument in any of the violent measures practised for overturning it; so that in his state of rural retirement, he had very little to apprehend from new changes, but might be truly said to have all things to hope and little or nothing to fear.

[H] As it is equally curious and short, the reader will find it in the notes. It does not appear from the letters that go before, or that follow after this, what the business was that Sir George Ayscue was to be consulted upon; but in all probability it might be with regard to the settlement at Jamaica, which was then a point under consideration, about which Mr Cromwell took a great deal of pains; and therefore it is not at all improbable that he might wish Mr Secretary Thurloe would enquire the sentiments of so able an officer as Sir George Ayscue, and one whose experience, in regard to that subject, must render him as fit a man to be consulted thereupon, as any in the kingdom. But this is a conjecture only, and as such is left to the reader's judgment. The letter follows:

dissatisfied with the Dutch, the rather, because of the share they had taken in the affairs of the North, where they had espoused the cause of the King of Denmark to a degree of partiality, and were projecting the total suppression of the Swedish power. This did not by any means agree with the Protector's plan in regard to foreign affairs, and as it was not in his nature to bear with any disappointment in his views, so he resolved to destroy this system of the Dutch, and yet without entering immediately into a war with them. It was with this view, that he encouraged the Swedes to cultivate with the utmost diligence a maritime force, promising in due time to assist them with a sufficient number of able and experienced officers, and with an Admiral to command them, who in point of reputation was not inferior to any then living (u). It was upon this occasion, and for this service, that he cast his eyes upon Sir George Ayscue, but not caring to deal directly with a man who had declined acting under his government, and had never frequented his court, he resolved that the proposition should be made him by the Swedish Ambassador, and sent the Lord Keeper Whitlock to introduce him to the Admiral at his country seat (w). We have a large and very curious account of this conference, and of that part of the conversation which was fit for the publick view, preserved by Whitlock himself, and which the reader no doubt will be very well pleased to see in his own words [I]. This interview had it's effects; Sir George Ayscue from that time began to entertain favourable thoughts of the design, and brought himself by degrees to approve of the proposition that was made him, so far as to think at least, not only of quitting the retreat he had chosen, but even of accepting the offer made him, and of going over for that purpose to Sweden (x). But as great undertakings move slowly, and there is much time necessary for ripening such vast projects into execution; so we find that Sir George Ayscue had not brought himself to an absolute compliance in reference to this design, before the death of the Protector (y). Yet that did not hinder his closing at last with the proposals made him from Sweden, and putting every thing in order for his journey, towards the latter

[I] The reader will no doubt be very well pleased to see it in his own words.] It appears clearly from Mr Whitlock's own authority, that a treaty was concluded with the Swedish Minister Mr Coyett, whom the Protector had knighted, and who was therefore called Sir Peter Coyett, on the seventeenth of the preceding month; for the concluding of which treaty, Whitlock himself was a Commissioner, the rather because he had been Ambassador from the Parliament of England in Sweden, where he had been very well received; and this probably created in him an extraordinary respect for that nation, as a signal proof of which, he undertook, before the Ambassador's departure, to carry him to dine with Sir George Ayscue, of which interview he wrote thus (29):

'August the 13th, 1656, the Ambassador of Sweden dined at Sir George Ayscough's house in Surrey, where they had a very noble entertainment. The house stands environed with ponds, motes, and water, like a ship at sea, a fancy fitter for the master's humour who is himself so great a seaman. There he said he had cast anchor, and intended to spend the rest of his life in a private retirement.'

'The Ambassador understanding the abilities of Sir George in sea affairs, did (according to his custom) endeavour to improve his own knowledge by his discourses and questions to the company, according to their several capacities and abilities. He therefore found many questions to demand of Sir George, and had much discourse with him about sea matters, and particularly concerning our English frigates; he was very inquisitive to know of Sir George, Whether he esteemed them the best of any sort of ships for fight.' Sir George answered freely, that he did not esteem them the best ships for fight, but held, that the old fashioned English ships of the biggest rate best for fight; and being asked his reason, said, because they were stronger than the frigates, would endure the speaking of their own guns and the blows of the enemy, better than the frigates could, and were firm and like castles in the sea, and not so easy to be boarded as the frigates, being higher built.'

The Ambassador replied, That they themselves could not so easily board another ship being so high built. Sir George answered, that when they came to boarding, they that assailed, had not so great a trouble of going down their own ship as the going up their enemies; and the high building was no hindrance to their boarding of another, but was the better defence for themselves. The Ambassador also objected, That they could not so easily come about and fetch up another ship as the frigates could. Sir George answered, That they could easily enough tack about upon any occasion in fight, but confessed that they could not so soon fetch up another ship, nor take, or leave, as the frigates could, which he said was rather an inducement to cowardice than courage; and some Captains, when they knew they could leave an enemy as they pleased, would engage in the fewer blows; whereas the old built ships must stand to it, and the men knowing that there was no running away, would have the better mettle to fight it out.' The Ambassador asked, which would last longest, the ships built after the old fashion or the frigates. Sir George answered, That the old buildings were more strong and substantial than the building of the frigates, which was made long and light for sailing, and therefore could not last so long as the other; and they carrying many guns, and being thus made, their own guns did much shake and wear them more than the guns of the other did. They had much discourse of this nature which added much to the entertainment.

It appears clearly from hence, that Sir George Ayscue was exactly of the same opinion with the able seamen of our times, in respect to the building of ships of war. He judged, that the capacity, firmness, and strength of our men of war, gave us great advantages, that the end and design of ships should be chiefly considered in building them, and therefore that ships of war should rather be distinguished by their strength and conveniency for fighting, than by the neatness of their form or their being extraordinary good failers. Sir William Monson, the ablest of our writers upon maritime affairs, thought the same way, and it is very remarkable, that long before the Dutch wars began, he foretold, that if ever that State differed with us, they would make their utmost efforts to gain the first battle at sea, for which he gives several reasons (30); and it is no less remarkable that they really attempted this, and that their famous Admiral Tromp attacked Blake in the first battle in the Downs, with a force vastly superior, and that Blake escaped by nothing but the size and strength of his ships, which enabled him with four or five to bear the fire of almost the whole Dutch fleet, till such time as the rest of his own ships were able to come in to his relief, and then the matter was speedily determined, and contrary to the hopes and expectation of the Dutch, who thought they should have gained an easy and compleat victory by surprize, which would have forced the English Common-wealth to make peace upon their terms (31). In like manner through the whole course of that war, it was the large size and firmness of our ships, which gave us such great advantages, not only in the opinion of our own commanders, but of the Dutch themselves, as might be shown at large if this were a proper place; but I have already exceeded the just bounds of a note, and can only plead in excuse the great weight and importance of the subject.

latter end of the year 1658. But as such a design as this was could not be put in execution without making some stir, and thereby raising publick discourse about it; so this had such an effect upon the Danish minister then residing here, that he could not forbear writing to Mr Secretary Thurloe, in pretty strong terms upon the occasion, insinuating at the same time, some general reflections on the character of Sir George Ayscue (z) [K]. This however had no effect, either in procuring an interposition from the State, to prevent Sir George from prosecuting his design, or in obliging him to alter his resolution. On the contrary, as soon as he had seen the officers embarked, and had dispatched some private business of his own, he prosecuted his voyage, though in the very depth of winter. This exposed him to great hardships, which however he endured with much constancy, and on his arrival in Sweden, was received with all imaginable demonstrations of civility and respect by the King, who was extremely well pleased with his coming, and might very probably have made good his promise, of promoting him to the rank of High-Admiral of Sweden, if he had not been taken off by an unexpected death (a) [L]. ‘ May it please your Lordship,

‘ TALK has been this many months, that Sir George Ayscue, and ten or twelve sea Captains were to take service under the King of Sweden, which I would not be induced to believe, thinking the said Ayscue, could not turn a mercenary soldier of another Prince, whilst the war in his own country lasted; if he could not be satisfied with that wealth and honour he has gotten, and live a retired and quiet life; but I have been deceived, in my opinion, and find, that certainly he, and the said Captains, are to depart in a few days; they to command each a man of war, and Sir George the whole Swedish fleet; wherewith I have thought it my duty to acquaint your Lordship, in hope, his Highness will think it convenient to stay his and their journey, as judging it more convenient, that his subjects should rather assist the King my master, than, in the service of the King of Sweden, help to oppress him; and this, I think, would be also conform to the sense of the article of that treaty, concluded between his late Highness, of immortal memory, and the King, my master, viz. Ita ut neutra pars populuse, aut subditi alterutrus, neque per se, neque per alios, directè, vel indirectè, quidquam agat, vel quantum in se est, agi, permittat, in damnum aut præjudicium alterius, verum altera alteram omnibus bonis officiis adjuvavit, atque alterius rem & commodum pro virili promovebit. i. e. so that no part of the people or subjects of the one or of the other, either by themselves or by others, directly or indirectly, shall either do, or, as far as in their power lies, permit to be done, any damage or prejudice to the other, but shall to each other render all sorts of good offices, and promote one the other's advantage as much as in them lies.

[L] If he had not been taken off by an unexpected death. This Swedish monarch who invited Sir George into his dominions, and who was always firmly attached to England, was Charles Gustavus, who came to the throne by the voluntary resignation of Queen Christina, daughter to the famous Gustavus Adolphus, in the year 1654, and soon after engaged in a war with Poland, because the monarch who then governed had opposed his accession, on the score of his hereditary right to the crown of Sweden, and in a very short space of time, King Charles over-run the greatest part of Poland, forcing the King to take shelter in Silesia. This war, which lasted as long as the Swedish monarch lived, and was the sole business of his reign, ended in a manner very far different from that in which it began; for the Poles, foreseeing that the conquest of their country would raise his Swedish Majesty abundance of enemies, absolutely refused to make peace with him upon any terms, though he was master of both their capitals, Cracow and Warfaw, and of the greatest part of the kingdom, and themselves constantly beaten in every engagement. In this they judged right, for though at the beginning King Charles was at peace with all his neighbours, yet his rapid conquest of Poland, stirred him up many enemies: For first, the Emperor dreading this accession of power to a Swedish Prince, granted succours to King Casimir of Poland, then the Muscovites invaded Livonia, the Danes broke with him next, in hopes of recovering what they lost to his predecessors; and though, in the beginning, he had the Elector of Brandenburg for his ally, he afterwards deserted him and joined his enemies; and Prince Ragotski of Transilvania, who invaded Poland likewise at his Instance, was called home by the Turks entering his own dominions; and in the first battle he fought against them, was killed upon the spot (33). The King of Sweden, notwithstanding this change of affairs, continued the war, and, which is more surprizing, continued it with success, more especially against the Danes, which drew the Dutch into the quarrel, under pretence of their alliance with Denmark. But in reality, out of regard to their own interest, for they were persuaded, that if this monarch succeeded in his designs, he would exclude them from the trade of the Baltick: And it was to prevent this, that they sent a strong fleet to the assistance of the Danes. This measure of theirs greatly offended the Protector Oliver, who had always kept up a strict friendship with Sweden, which he would willingly have assisted with a powerful fleet, if it could have been done without breaking with the Dutch, for which his affairs were not then ripe (34). This put him upon sending twenty experienced officers, to command the Swedish ships, and to encourage Sir George Ayscue to enter into the same service, upon a proposal the King had made of declaring him Admiral; and if this scheme had answered in his life-time, there is no doubt, he would have sent a stout English fleet to have supported them. His son Richard might, probably, intend to have pursued his father's measures, and it is very likely, that with this view he ordered Admiral Montague, with a numerous squadron of men of war to sail for the Sound, but the long Parliament refusing the supreme authority, sent instructions to that Admiral to join the Dutch (35). But while these things were transacting, King Charles had pushed on the war with such vigour, that he was actually become master of most part of the Danish territories, and had even laid siege to Copenhagen, which he would infallibly have taken, if the Dutch had not relieved it by beating his fleet; which constrained him to turn the siege into a blockade, which he continued in spite of the Dutch. It was at this juncture that Sir George Ayscue arrived, who at first put him in hopes of some assistance from England, but this quickly vanished in consequence of the Revolution before mentioned, notwithstanding which, Sir George Ayscue continued in great credit with his Majesty, and attended him to Gottenburg, where he had summoned an assembly of the

an end to his hopes in that country, and disposed Sir George Ayscue to return home, where a great change had been working in his absence, which was that of restoring King Charles II. It does not at all appear, that Sir George had any concern in this great affair, but the contrary may be rather presumed, from his former attachment to the Parliament, and his making it his choice to have remained in Sweden, if the death of the monarch who invited him thither had not prevented him. On his return however, he not only submitted to the government then established, but gave the strongest assurances to the administration, that he should be at all times ready to serve the publick if ever there should be occasion, which was very kindly taken, and Sir George Ayscue had the honour to be introduced to his Majesty, and to kiss his hand (b). It was not long before he was called to the performance of his promise, for the Dutch war breaking out in 1664, he was immediately put into commission by the direction of the Duke of York, who then commanded the English fleet. In the spring of the year 1665, Sir George Ayscue hoisted his flag as Rear-Admiral of the Blue, under the right honourable the Earl of Sandwich, and in the great battle that was fought on the third of June in the same year, that squadron had the honour to break through the centre of the Dutch fleet, and thereby made way for one of the most glorious victories ever obtained by this nation at sea (c). For in this battle, the Dutch had ten of their largest ships sunk or burned, besides their Admiral Opdam's, that blew up in the midst of the engagement, by which the Admiral himself, and upwards of five hundred men perished. Eighteen men of war were taken, four fire-ships destroyed, thirteen Captains, and two thousand and fifty private men made prisoners; and this with so inconsiderable loss, as that of one ship only, and three hundred private men (d). As there was some time requisite, for refitting and repairing the English navy after so warm an action, the Duke of York, who commanded the fleet in that engagement, returned to London, but not till the King had visited the navy, where, going on board the Royal Charles at the Buoy of the Nore, he knighted several of the officers who had distinguished themselves in the late battle, and made a grand naval promotion. The fleet being again in a condition to put to sea, was ordered to rendezvous in Southwold-Bay, from whence, to the number of sixty sail, they weighed on the fifth of July, and stood over for the coast of Holland. The standard was borne by the gallant Earl of Sandwich, to whom was Vice-Admiral Sir George Ayscue, and Sir Thomas Tyddiman Rear-Admiral, Sir William Penn was Admiral of the White, Sir William Berkley Vice-Admiral, and Sir Joseph Jordon Rear-Admiral. The Blue flag was carried by Sir Thomas Allen, whose Vice and Rear, were Sir Christopher Mimms, and Sir John Harman (e). The design they went on was, to intercept de Ruyter in his return, or, at least, to take and burn the Turkey and East-India fleets, of which they had certain intelligence. They succeeded in neither of these schemes; de Ruyter returned unexpectedly by the north of Scotland, and arrived safely in Holland, where he was immediately promoted to the chief command of the fleet. The Turkey and India fleets, consisting of twenty sail, under the command of Commodore Bitter, chose to take the same northern rout, in hopes of avoiding the English navy, but having intelligence at sea, that this would prove very difficult if not impossible, they took shelter in the port of Berghen in Norway (f). The Earl of Sandwich having detached Sir Thomas Tyddiman to attack them there, returned home, and in his passage had the good luck to take eight Dutch men of war, which served as convoys to their East and West India fleets, and several merchant-men richly laden, which finished the triumphs of that year (g). The plain superiority of the English over the Dutch at sea, engaged the French, in order to keep up the war between the maritime powers, and make them do their business by destroying each other, to declare on the side of the weakest, as did the King of Denmark also, which nevertheless had no effect upon the English, who determined to carry on the war against the allies, with the same spirit they had done against the Dutch alone (h). In the spring therefore, of the year 1666, the fleet was very early sea, under the command of the joint Admirals, for a resolution having been taken at Court, not to expose the person of the Duke of York any more, and the Earl of Sandwich being then in Spain with the character of Ambassador-Extraordinary, Prince Rupert, and old General Monk, now Duke of Albemarle, were appointed to command the fleet, having under them as gallant and prudent officers as ever distinguished themselves in the English navy, and amongst these, Sir William Berkley commanded the Blue, and Sir George Ayscue the White squadron (i). Prince Rupert, and the Duke of Albemarle, went on board the fleet, the twenty-third of April, 1666, and sailed in the beginning of May. Towards the latter end of that month, the Court was informed, that the French fleet under the command of the Duke of Beaufort, were coming out to the assistance of the Dutch. This rumour of their joining the Dutch was spread by France, in order to deceive us, and distress the Dutch, themselves in reality having no such intention.

the States, because of it's lying upon the coast, which gave him an opportunity of minding the affairs of his kingdom, and of the war at the same time. But it falling out unluckily, that a malignant fever reigned there at that time, the King was seized thereby, and after an illness of a few days, died on the 13th of February 1660, in the sixth year of his reign (36), which, as we have observed in the text, determined Sir George Ayscue to return home. Thus the reader has seen, in as narrow a compass as possible, the grounds of this expedition, which I judged would be more satisfactory, than referring him to various other books, in order to clear up the meaning of what the subject led me to deliver in this.

intention (k). Upon the receiving this news, the Court sent orders to Prince Rupert to sail with the White Squadron, the Admirals excepted, to look out and fight the French, which command that brave Prince obeyed, but found it what many wise people thought, a mere groundless bravado, intended to raise the courage of their new allies, and thereby bring them into the greater danger. At the same time Prince Rupert sailed from the Downs, the Dutch put out to sea, the wind at north-east, and a fresh gale. This brought the Dutch fleet on the coast of Dunkirk, and carried his Highness towards the Isle of Wight, but the wind suddenly shifting to the south-west, and blowing hard, brought both the Dutch and the Duke to an anchor (l). Captain Bacon, in the Bristol, first discovered the enemy, and by firing his guns, gave notice of it to the English fleet. Upon this a council of war was called, wherein it was resolved to fight the enemy, notwithstanding their great superiority. After the departure of Prince Rupert, the Duke had with him only the Red and Blue squadrons, making about sixty sail, whereas the Dutch fleet consisted of ninety-one men of war, carrying 4716 guns, and 22,460 men. It was the first of June when they were discerned, and the Duke was so warm for engaging, that he attacked the enemy before they had time to weigh anchor, and as de Ruyter himself says in his letter, they were obliged to cut their cables; and in the same letter he owns, that to the last the English were the aggressors, notwithstanding their inferiority and other disadvantages (m). This day's fight was very fierce and bloody, for the Dutch, confiding in their numbers, pressed furiously upon the English fleet, while the English officers, being men of determined resolution, fought with such courage and constancy, that they not only repulsed the Dutch, but renewed the attack, and forced the enemy to maintain the fight longer than they were inclined to do, so that it was ten in the evening before their cannon were silent (n). The following night was spent in repairing the damages suffered on both sides, and next morning the fight was renewed by the English with fresh vigour. Admiral Van Tromp, with Vice-Admiral Vander Hulft, being on board one ship, rashly engaged among the English, and were in the utmost danger either of being taken or burnt. The Dutch affairs, according to their own account, were now in a desperate condition, but Admiral de Ruyter at last disengaged them, though not till his ship was disabled, and Vice-Admiral Vander Hulft killed (o). This only changed the scene, for de Ruyter was now as hard pushed as Tromp had been before; however, a reinforcement arriving, preserved him also, and so the second day's fight ended earlier than the first. The Duke finding that the Dutch had received a reinforcement, and that his small fleet, on the contrary, was much weakened, through the damages sustained by some, and the loss and absence of others of his ships, took, towards the evening, the resolution to retire and endeavour to join Prince Rupert, who was coming to his assistance (p). The retreat was performed in good order, twenty-six or twenty-eight men of war that had suffered least, brought up the rear, interposing between the enemy and the disabled ships, three of which, being very much shattered, were burnt by the English themselves, and the men taken on board the other ships. The Dutch fleet followed, but at a distance. As they thus sailed on, it happened on the third day that Sir George Ayscue, Admiral of the White, who commanded the Royal Prince (being the largest and heaviest ship of the whole fleet) unfortunately struck upon the sand called the Galloper, where being threatened by the enemy's fire-ships, and hopeless of assistance from his friends, (whose timely return, the near approach of the enemy, and the contrary tide, had absolutely rendered impossible) he was forced to surrender (q). This was that famous engagement, which did equal honour to both the maritime powers, and in which both their officers and seamen are allowed to have performed as great things as were ever attempted on the watery element. Yet our historians have given but very imperfect accounts of it, even those who ought to have made it their business to be more particularly acquainted with this transaction, so that if we would learn any particulars relating to it, we must look for them in the works of strangers, and even of enemies, who in this respect have been both juster and kinder, than the authors either of our General or Naval histories (r) [M]. The Dutch Admiral de Ruyter, in

It is certainly a very great fault in men, who undertake to record the transactions of past ages, that they do not take care to provide themselves with such authentick papers, in regard to the times of which they write, as are necessary to set things forth clearly, and to afford sufficient authority, to support whatever is thus set forth. It is by this kind of negligence, that our histories labour under the reproach of being less uniform and correct, than those of other nations. In the present instance it is observable, that in the continuation of Heath's Chronicle by Philips, it is only said, that there was none burnt of the English fleet but the Prince, which had the misfortune to run a-ground upon the Galloper, by means of which, Sir George Ayscue the commander became a prisoner (38). This is very lame and incorrect, for without a competent knowledge of our naval history, a man might be easily led to believe, that Sir George Ayscue was only captain of the Prince, whereas, he was Admiral of the white Squadron in this engagement. In the Complete History of England, as it is called, there is only an extract of Sir John Harman's account of this battle, in which this circumstance is mentioned, in as few words as it is possible (39). The reverend Mr Echard tells us, the English had nine men of war taken or burnt, of which the chief was the Prince, a first rate ship, commanded by Sir George Ayscough, which being unfortunately stranded, Sir George Ayscough was taken prisoner, and the ship burnt (40). The continuation of Baker's Chronicle omits this circumstance entirely, though in other respects, there is a pretty good account of this memorable engagement (41). In Mr Burchett's Naval History, the whole account of this battle takes up but sixteen lines, in which therefore, we cannot expect many circumstances; but there is one very astonishing, which is, that he makes this fight to have lasted only three days, affirming that Prince Rupert coming in on the third, obtained for

in his letter to the States-General, says in few words, that Sir George Ayscue, Admiral of the White, having run upon a sand-bank, fell into their hands, and that after taking out the commanders and the men that were left, they set the ship on fire (5). But the large relation, collected by order of the States out of all the letters written to them upon that occasion, informs us, that Sir George Ayscue in the Royal-Prince, ran upon the Galloper, an unhappy accident, says that relation, for an officer who had behaved very gallantly during the whole engagement, who only retired in obedience to his Admiral's orders. The unfortunate Admiral made signals for assistance, but the English fleet continued their rout, so that he was left quite alone, and without hope of succour, in which situation he was attacked by two Dutch fire-ships, by which, without doubt, he had been burnt, if Lieutenant-Admiral Tromp, who was on board the ship of Rear-Admiral Sweers, had not made a signal to call off the fire-ships, perceiving that his flag was already struck, and a signal made for quarter, upon which Rear-Admiral Sweers, by order of Tromp, went on board the English ship, and brought off Sir George Ayscue, his officers, and some of his men, on board his own vessel, and the next morning Sir George was sent to the Dutch coast, in order to go to the Hague in a galliot, by order of General de Ruyter. The English ship was afterwards got off the sands, notwithstanding which, General de Ruyter ordered the rest of the crew to be taken out, and the

the English a compleat victory (42). The truth, however, certainly is, that the Duke of Albemarle fought the Dutch fleet on the first, second, and third of June, that in the evening of the last day, he was joined by Prince Rupert with the squadron under his command, and that on the fourth of June he engaged the Dutch again, in conjunction with Prince Rupert, and after an obstinate dispute, forced the enemy to retire towards their own coasts. Mr Collier had reason, therefore, to say, that Mr Burchett's accounts of the Dutch wars were so short, that they were more apt to raise the reader's curiosity, than to satisfy it (43). But after all, Mr Burchett is a very good writer in other respects, and his history of the French wars in King William and Queen Anne's reigns, are very copious, circumstantial, and well digested. As for Mr Collier himself, he took a great deal of pains in perusing the Dutch historians, and in taking out of them, whatever might do honour to the British nation (44). Mr Lediard has copied him in this respect, and very little more (45). As to the writers of private memoirs, we are not much obliged to them for any light they have given us, one only excepted, of whom we shall presently speak. Bishop Burnet's description of this battle is penned with great bitterness, much in favour of the Dutch, and extremely to the discredit of the English, but he mentions no particulars, and seems more desirous of giving his reader his own sense of things, than to inform him of any circumstances, that might enable him to form a true judgment of them himself (46). Bishop Parker's history of his own times, is rather a picture than a history, so that no assistance could be received, or indeed expected from thence (47). There is in Sir William Temple's Memoirs, a passage relating to this engagement, which deserves to be remembered, because it shews what the sense of the Dutch was upon this subject. Sir William tells us, that the famous John de Wit speaking of this action, said (48), 'That the English got more glory to their nation, and the invincible courage of their seamen by those engagements, than by the two victories of this war, and that he was sure, their own people could never have been brought on the following days after the advantages of the first, and he believed, that no other nation was capable of it but the English.' But the clearest and best account, that with the utmost industry I have been able to meet with, both of the whole engagement, and of Sir George Ayscue's misfortune, is in Dr Skinner's life of General Monk, and therefore, I shall give the reader that part of it which regards my subject in his own words (49). 'On the third of June in the morning, his Grace ordered all the men out of two or three slug ships which were unserviceable, and commanded them to be fired, rather than put them to the hazard of falling into the enemies hands in his retreat, and now he had not full forty good ships with him, to make good his retreat against about ninety of the enemies. But commanding all his weak and disabled frigates to go off before him, and placing about sixteen or twenty of the soundest and most in heart to the enemies front, he began a regular and leisurely retreat, which was managed with so much bravery and courage, that the Dutch, though possessed with so many great advantages upon him, had no great stomach to the pursuit, contenting themselves to follow aloof-off, and to fire their guns at such distance as gave no prejudice to the English fleet; till about four in the afternoon, the wind increasing, they came close upon the Duke in two bodies, and spent some broadsides upon his ship, but were so warmly plied from the English fleet with their stern pieces, as made them contented to lie further off. The same fresh gale which at this time had brought up the Dutch fleet, brought also the Prince with his squadron in view of the Duke's ships, which now appeared in the most seasonable minute, having made all the fail they could to come to his relief. Nor was the Duke less willing to join the Prince and his squadron; but in making their way towards him, several of the principal ships; and among them the Duke in the Royal Charles, came aground on the Gapper or the Galloper sands, but had all of them the good fortune to get off again, only the Royal Prince, a great and brave frigate was so deeply stranded, that it was not possible to bring her off, but became a prey to the enemy, where Sir George Ayscue, that commanded in her, and his company, were taken prisoners; and when the Dutch also had in vain attempted to get her off the sands, at night they burnt her down. This unfortunate striking of so many of our ships upon the sands, gave the Dutch so great an opportunity of destroying the Duke's fleet, as they have cause never to forgive the commanders, that made no greater advantage of it, where all might have been lost, if the enemy had been brave enough to have adventured for it.' The great Mr Dryden, in a poem on the memorable events of the year 1666, has given us at once, the most beautiful and the most copious description of these four days fights. But though this subject might have afforded as fine a picture in poetry, as any thing that has appeared in that finished piece, yet there is not the least notice taken therein of Sir George or his misfortune, of which however at first sight, though applied by the poet to the Duke of Albemarle, the following stanzas might be thought intended (50).

Now at each tack our little fleet grows less;
And like maim'd fowl, swim lagging on the main:
Their greater loss their numbers scarce confess,
While they lose cheaper than the English gain.

Have you not seen when whistled from the fift,
Some falcon stoops at what her eye design'd,
And, with her eagerness, the quarry miss'd,
Straight flies at check, and clips it down the wind.

The dastard crow that to the wood made wing,
And sees the groves no shelter can afford;
With her loud kaws her craven kind does bring;
Who safe in numbers, cuff the noble bird.

in his letter to the States-General, says in few words, that Sir George Ayscue, Admiral of the White, having run upon a sand-bank, fell into their hands, and that after taking out the commanders and the men that were left, they set the ship on fire (s). But the large relation, collected by order of the States out of all the letters written to them upon that occasion, informs us, that Sir George Ayscue in the Royal-Prince, ran upon the Galloper, an unhappy accident, says that relation, for an officer who had behaved very gallantly during the whole engagement, who only retired in obedience to his Admiral's orders. The unfortunate Admiral made signals for assistance, but the English fleet continued their rout, so that he was left quite alone, and without hope of succour, in which situation he was attacked by two Dutch fire-ships, by which, without doubt, he had been burnt, if Lieutenant-Admiral Tromp, who was on board the ship of Rear-Admiral Sweers, had not made a signal to call off the fire-ships, perceiving that his flag was already struck, and a signal made for quarter, upon which Rear-Admiral Sweers, by order of Tromp, went on board the English ship, and brought off Sir George Ayscue, his officers, and some of his men, on board his own vessel, and the next morning Sir George was sent to the Dutch coast, in order to go to the Hague in a galliot, by order of General de Ruyter. The English ship was afterwards got off the sands, notwithstanding which, General de Ruyter ordered the rest of the crew to be taken out, and the

the English a compleat victory (42). The truth, however, certainly is, that the Duke of Albemarle fought the Dutch fleet on the first, second, and third of June, that in the evening of the last day, he was joined by Prince Rupert with the squadron under his command, and that on the fourth of June he engaged the Dutch again, in conjunction with Prince Rupert, and after an obstinate dispute, forced the enemy to retire towards their own coasts. Mr Colliher had reason, therefore, to say, that Mr Burchett's accounts of the Dutch wars were so short, that they were more apt to raise the reader's curiosity, than to satisfy it (43). But after all, Mr Burchett is a very good writer in other respects, and his history of the French wars in King William and Queen Anne's reigns, are very copious, circumstantial, and well digested. As for Mr Colliher himself, he took a great deal of pains in perusing the Dutch historians, and in taking out of them, whatever might do honour to the British nation (44). Mr Lediard has copied him in this respect, and very little more (45). As to the writers of private memoirs, we are not much obliged to them for any light they have given us, one only excepted, of whom we shall presently speak. Bishop Burnet's description of this battle is penned with great bitterness, much in favour of the Dutch, and extremely to the discredit of the English, but he mentions no particulars, and seems more desirous of giving his reader his own sense of things, than to inform him of any circumstances, that might enable him to form a true judgment of them himself (46). Bishop Parker's history of his own times, is rather a picture than a history, so that no assistance could be received, or indeed expected from thence (47). There is in Sir William Temple's Memoirs, a passage relating to this engagement, which deserves to be remembered, because it shews what the sense of the Dutch was upon this subject. Sir William tells us, that the famous John de Wit speaking of this action, said (48), 'That the English got more glory to their nation, and the invincible courage of their seamen by those engagements, than by the two victories of this war, and that he was sure, their own people could never have been brought on the following days after the advantages of the first, and he believed, that no other nation was capable of it but the English.' But the clearest and best account, that with the utmost industry I have been able to meet with, both of the whole engagement, and of Sir George Ayscue's misfortune, is in Dr Skinner's life of General Monk, and therefore, I shall give the reader that part of it which regards my subject in his own words (49). 'On the third of June in the morning, his Grace ordered all the men out of two or three slug ships which were unserviceable, and commanded them to be fired, rather than put them to the hazard of falling into the enemies hands in his retreat, and now he had not full forty good ships with him, to make good his retreat against about ninety of the enemies. But commanding all his weak and disabled frigates to go off before him, and placing about sixteen or twenty of the soundest and most in heart to the enemies front, he began a regular and leisurely retreat, which was managed with so much bravery and courage, that the Dutch, though possessed with so many great advantages upon him, had no great stomach to the pursuit, contenting themselves to follow aloof off, and to fire their guns at such distance as gave no prejudice to the English fleet; till about four in the afternoon, the wind increasing, they came close upon the Duke in two bodies, and spent some broadsides upon his ship, but were so warmly plied from the English fleet with their stern pieces, as made them contented to lie further off. The same fresh gale which at this time had brought up the Dutch fleet, brought also the Prince with his squadron in view of the Duke's ships, which now appeared in the most seasonable minute, having made all the fail they could to come to his relief. Nor was the Duke less willing to join the Prince and his squadron; but in making their way towards him, several of the principal ships, and among them the Duke in the Royal Charles, came aground on the Gapper or the Galloper sands, but had all of them the good fortune to get off again, only the Royal Prince, a great and brave frigate was so deeply stranded, that it was not possible to bring her off, but became a prey to the enemy, where Sir George Ayscough, that commanded her, and his company, were taken prisoners; and when the Dutch also had in vain attempted to get her off the sands, at night they burnt her down. This unfortunate striking of so many of our ships upon the sands, gave the Dutch so great an opportunity of destroying the Duke's fleet, as they have cause never to forgive the commanders, that made no greater advantage of it, where all might have been lost, if the enemy had been brave enough to have adventured for it.' The great Mr Dryden, in a poem on the memorable events of the year 1666, has given us at once, the most beautiful and the most copious description of these four days fights. But though this subject might have afforded as fine a picture in poetry, as any thing that has appeared in that finished piece, yet there is not the least notice taken therein of Sir George or his misfortune, of which however at first sight, though applied by the poet to the Duke of Albemarle, the following stanzas might be thought intended (50).

Now at each tack our little fleet grows less;
And like main'd fowl, swim lagging on the main;
Their greater loss their numbers scarce confess,
While they lose cheaper than the English gain.

Have you not seen when whistled from the fist,
Some falcon stoops at what her eye design'd,
And, with her eagerness, the quarry mis'd,
Straight flies at check, and clips it down the wind.

The dastard crow that to the wood made wing,
And sees the groves no shelter can afford;
With her loud kaws her craven kind does bring;
Who safe in numbers, cuff the noble bird.

the vessel set on fire, that his fleet might be the less embarrassed, which was accordingly done (t). But in the French relation, published by order of that court, we have another circumstance which the Dutch have thought fit to omit, and it is this, that the crew gave up the ship against the Admiral's will, who had given orders for setting her on fire (u). There were some circumstances which made the loss of this ship, in this manner, very disagreeable to the English court, and perhaps this may be the reason that so little is said of it in our own relations [N]. In all probability, General de Ruyter took the opportunity of sending Sir George Ayscue to the Dutch coast the next morning, from an apprehension that he might be retaken in the next day's fight (w). On his arrival at the Hague, he was very civilly treated; but to raise the spirits of their people, and to make the most of this dubious kind of victory, the States ordered Sir George to be carried as it were in triumph, through the several towns of Holland, and then confined him in the castle of Louvestein, so famous in the Dutch histories for having been the prison of some of their most eminent patriots, and from whence the party which opposed the Prince of Orange, were styled the Louvestein Faction (x). As soon as Sir George Ayscue came to this castle, he wrote a letter to King Charles II, to acquaint him with the condition he was in, which letter is still preserved in the Life of the Dutch Admiral, de Ruyter (y), and the reader will find a translation of it in the notes [O]. How long he remained there, or whether he continued a prisoner to the end of the war, is what we cannot determine from any lights that we have been able to procure; but it is said that he afterwards returned to England, and spent the remainder of his days in peace (z). It is a thing greatly to be regretted, that so little care has been taken, to do justice to the memories of so many great men as have served this nation, some at the expence of their lives, and others of their liberties; their virtues surely deserve a better reward, and it is to be hoped that the pains we have taken in this collection, will render the doing justice to such great and good men, so visibly necessary, that succeeding generations will have no reason to make this complaint. It is with a view to this, that even where we cannot render our memoirs of such illustrious persons so compleat as we could wish, we labour with the utmost diligence to render them

[N] So little said of it in our relations.] There are very often circumstances attending losses which so aggravate and heighten them, as to conduce more to our misery and grief, than the very losses themselves. These, while we feel this passion strongly upon us, we are apt to relate; but by degrees, as that passion subsides, we come to consider things in a very different light, and often strive to hide and to conceal what we before affected to publish. The Royal Prince, as all our writers agree, was the largest and best built ship in the royal navy, she carried ninety two guns, and six hundred and twenty men, her guns were all of them brass, and the vessel in the best condition possible, these were reasons sufficient to make the loss of her regretted; but the particular circumstance hinted at in the text is this, the Royal Prince was the ship in which the King came over from Holland at his Restoration; a fact, set down in none of our private memoirs, though sufficiently known and talked of at the time. But the Dutch who knew this circumstance full as well as the English, have taken special care to preserve it (51). It was not a little hard upon Sir George Ayscue to be laid aside for this misfortune, which for any thing appears, did not at all arise from any mistake or oversight of his, but it seems that our seamen conceived from hence, that he was an unlucky commander, and that was enough in those days to lay any man aside, it being a constant rule with the court to employ none but popular Admirals, and such as were beloved by the seamen. It was on Sunday the third of June, about five in the afternoon, that this ship was given up to the Dutch, and about nine she was set on fire, because about that time it appeared, that Prince Rupert having joined the Duke of Albemarle, was bearing down again upon the Dutch fleet; so that though the Royal Prince was got off the sands, they would not spare the time necessary to bring her away, but burnt her according to the express instructions given by the States-General to de Ruyter.

[O] The reader will find a translation of it in the notes.] The reader has seen all the account I am able to give him of this letter in the text, and when he has read the piece itself, he will be sensible of the reasons which induced me to leave out some particulars in the relation, to spare him the trouble of perusing them twice. The letter exactly rendered into English runs thus (52):

S I R E,

YOUR Majesty without doubt has been informed that we engaged the Dutch fleet on the 1—10th of this month, between Dunkirk and the North-point of England, the enemy lying at anchor, but cutting their cables immediately upon our approach. We attacked them however with success two or three times, but as our fleet was much inferior to theirs in number, we were not able to sustain the fight. There happened on this occasion a great concern among our people, on the score of your Majesty's cousin being sailed to the Westward with a large squadron of ships, by which we were very much weakened and distressed. Several of our ships were that day very ill treated; the Duke of Albemarle's particularly suffered much; the Dutch too had several ships set on fire, either by accidents happening to their own powder-rooms or by our fire-ships. We fought the next day with fresh courage, but on the third we were so unlucky as to run aground, and just as we began to float again, we found ourselves with some other ships of our squadron surrounded by the enemy; so that our great regret we were obliged to strike, after having upwards of one hundred and fifty men killed on board our vessel, and have since been carried prisoners hither. After I went on board the ship of the Dutch Rear-Admiral, we were informed, that the ship confided to my care by your Majesty had been burned, my Vice-Admiral is also taken, and my Lord Berkeley is killed. I cannot say what happened afterwards in the action, because it has been kept a secret from me. In general however they say, they have taken, sunk, and burned, thirty-six of our ships, and that the Dutch have not made fewer than four thousand prisoners, which God forbid. I beseech your Majesty not to take our misfortunes too much to heart, and that you would have compassion on my family.

From my prison at Louvesteyn,

GEORGE AYS CUE.

[P. S. The officers of the Dutch fleet as also the States-General, have treated me with all imaginable civility. On my arrival at Rotterdam, I was amazed to see so many thousand men there, considering how many they have on board the Dutch fleet.]

There are some circumstances in this letter, from whence I suspect, that either it is entirely forged, or at least altered to serve the purposes of the Dutch; as for instance, his saying that his Vice-Admiral was taken, and Lord Berkeley killed, the former must be meant of the ship if it be true, and as to the person he names in the latter them as perfect as we can, which observation will be sufficient to excuse us to our readers, for concluding this article somewhat abruptly, since it is done merely through want of materials and not of inclination.

latter place, he was not Lord Berkley but Sir William Berkley (53), and therefore this is an error that we can scarce suspect Sir George Ayscove to be guilty of. But what is written after the letter is much more gross than any thing contained in it; for, in the first place, Sir George was not extremely well treated, since the Dutch themselves owned that they took his plate and every thing else that was valuable from him; and in the next to magnify the strength of the enemy to his Prince, was a meanness of which an English Admiral must have been certainly incapable. These remarks I thought due to Sir George Ayscove's reputation, though as the letter so nearly concerns his personal history, I conceived myself obliged to insert it. E

A Y S S E R I U S, or A S S E R I U S (MENEVENSI), by some called A S S E R (a), by others A S K E R (b), a learned Monk of St Davids, concerning whom, though much has been said, yet we find very little written with certainty, rather, as we apprehend, for want of considering the matter thoroughly, than from any want of materials, or from any real obscurity in which his story is involved. We shall therefore give as clear and distinct an account of him as may be, remove most of the difficulties which have been hitherto thought to obscure his history, and leave those controversial points to be discussed in the notes, which otherwise would serve only to puzzle and perplex the text. He was of British extraction (c), probably of that part of South Wales called Pembrokeshire, and was bred up in the learning of those times, in the monastery of St Davids (d) (in Latin Menevia) whence he derived his surname of Menevensis. There he is said to have had for his tutor Johannes Patricius, one of the most celebrated scholars of his age (e). Here he had also the countenance of Nobis or Novis Archbishop of that See, who was his relation (f); but it does not appear, that he was either his Secretary or his Chancellor, as some writers would have us believe [A]. From St Davids he was invited to the court of Ælfred the Great, merely from the reputation of his learning. This seems to have been about the year 880, or somewhat earlier (g). Those who had the charge of bringing him to Court, conducted him from St Davids to the town of Dene (Dean) in Wiltshire, where the King then was (b). He received him with great civility, and showed him in a little time the strongest marks of favour and affection, insomuch that he condescended to persuade him not to think any more of returning to St Davids, but rather to continue with him as his domestick chaplain and assistant in his studies. Afferius, however, modestly declined this proposal, alledging, that it did not become him to desert that holy place where he had been educated, and received the order of priesthood, for the sake of any preferment that he could meet with elsewhere. King Ælfred then desired, that he would divide his time between the court and the monastery, that is to say, that he would spend six months at Court and six at St Davids. Afferius would not lightly comply even with this request, but desired the King's leave to return to St Davids, to ask the advice of his brethren, which he obtained, but in his journey falling ill at Winchester of a fever, he lay there sick twelve months and a week, till the King, wondering at his long stay, wrote him letters requiring his return to Court. But it seems he was too weak to ride, of which when King Ælfred was informed by his letter, he desisted from his request (i).

[A] Some writers would have us believe.] The first author who started this notion was Bale (1). He had read probably in our author's own work, that he was related to an Archbishop of St Davids (2), and thence he took occasion to make him his Chancellor: He does this very abruptly, inserting his conjecture by way of parenthesis. However, he does not tell us what Bishop; that was an error left for his transcriber Pits (3), who affirms without hesitation, that he was Secretary or Chancellor to Affer the Elder then Archbishop of St Davids. Bishop Godwin outtrips both Bale and Pits, and makes Affer himself the author of this story (4). The great Dr Cave, following his predecessors, asserts, that Afferius, Bishop of Sherburn, was a relation and Chancellor to Afferius Archbishop of St Davids (5). The industrious Thomas Hearne tells us very magisterially, that the Annals of Ælfred were not written by Affer Bishop of Sherburn, but by his uncle Affer Archbishop of St Davids (6). In answer to all these numerous authorities, we shall only say, that Affer, whoever he was, became Archbishop of St Davids A. D. 909 (7), that is twenty-six years after the death of Affer Bishop of Sherburn, according to the computation of these authors, and about a year before the true time of his death (8); so that he was Secretary or Chancellor to this Archbishop some thirty or forty years before he became so, and this Affer is ridiculously styled the Elder, tho' he was made an Archbishop thirty years after our Afferius became a Bishop, and if he had been a different person, must have been consequently much younger than he. All this long train of mistakes grew out of the following easy passage of our author's own writing, viz. 'Spe-

'rabant enim nostri, minores tribulationes et injurias
'ex parte Hemeid Regis sustinere, (qui sæpe depræ-
'dabatur illud Monasterium et parochiam Sancti
'Degui, aliquando expulsiore illorum antistitum, qui
'in eo præsent, sicut & Novis Archiepiscopum pro-
'pinquum meum & me expulsiore aliquando sub ipsis)
'si ego ad notitiam & amicitiam illius Regis qualecunque
'pactio pervenirem.' That is, Our Monks were in hopes that they should sustain fewer troubles and insults from King Hemeid, (who had often plundered that Monastery and the Parish of St Degui, sometimes expelling those who presided in both places, as it happened to my relation Archbishop Novis and myself) in case by any such agreement I came to be considered and gain the friendship of that Prince (9). He means Ælfred the Great, for this passage contains the reasons which induced the Monks of St Davids to consent that Affer should comply with the King's request and live half the year at court. From hence it appears, that the Archbishop to whom he was related was Novis, who, according to the ancient Annals of St Davids, became Archbishop in 841, and died in 873 (10); and instead of being his Chancellor, it seems that Afferius was parson of the parish of St Degui or Dewi, as it was called in the British language, which is also asserted by some writers (11). This shews the great use of a Critical Dictionary, since here is an error detected, which has passed current from hand to hand for so long a tract of time, and has been transcribed without scruple by persons well versed in our antient history.

- As soon as he recovered, Afferius made a journey to St Davids, where consulting with his brethren on the King's proposal, they unanimously agreed that he should accept it, promising themselves great advantages from his favour with the King, of which, at that time it seems, they had great need; one Hemeid, a petty Prince of South Wales, making them exceedingly uneasy, and sometimes compelling their Archbishop to quit the place of his residence. But at the same time they requested of Afferius, that he would prevail on the King, to allow him to reside quarterly at Court and at St Davids, rather than that he should remain absent six months at a time (k). When he came back he found the King at Leoneforde, who received him with great marks of distinction. He remained with him then eight months at once, reading and explaining to him whatever books were in his library, whereby he grew into so great credit with that generous Prince, that on Christmas-eve following, he gave him the monasteries of Amgrefbyri, and Banuwille, that is, Ambrosbury in Wiltshire, and Banwell in Somersetshire, with a silk pall of great value, and as much incense as strong man could carry, sending together with them this compliment That these were but small things, and by way of earnest of better which should follow them (l). And indeed, soon after, Afferius tells us, he had Exeter bestowed upon him, and not long after that, the bishoprick of Sherburn, which however he seems to have quitted in 883 (m) [B], though he always retained the title, as Wilfred Archbishop of York was constantly so styled, though he accepted of another bishoprick (n). Thenceforward he constantly attended the Court, in the manner before stipulated, and is named as a person, in whom he had particular confidence by King Ælfred in his Testament, which must have been written some time before the year 885 (o); since mention is made therein of Esna Bishop of Hereford, who died that year. He is also mentioned by the King, in his preparatory Epistle placed before his translation of Gregory's Pastoral, addressed to Wulfsig Bishop of London, and therein the King does not call him Bishop of Sherburn, but my Bishop, acknowledging the help received from him and others in that translation (p). For as we learn, both from the King and from Afferius himself, the method used by that Prince in translating was this, he had the sense of his author given him by one or other of the many learned men he had about him, and then he digested it into an easy flowing style (in which he had a peculiar excellency) that men might thereby be invited to reading (q); for Ælfred did not translate as an author to gain reputation, but as a Prince, to promote the publick good; neither did he design that the books he published should pass for exact translations, but for good and useful treatises, from which such as understood none but their mother tongue, might reap profit and instruction. It seems to have been the near resemblance, which the genius of Afferius bore to that of the King, which gained him so great a share in his confidence; and very probably, it was on this account, that Afferius drew up those Memoirs of the life of Ælfred which we still have, and which he dedicated and presented to the King in 893 (r). In which work we have a very remarkable account of the manner, wherein that Prince and our author spent their time together. Afferius tells us, that having one day, being the feast of St Martin, cited in conversation a passage of some famous author, the King was mightily pleased therewith, and would have him write it down in the margin of a book he carried in his breast; but Afferius finding no room to write any such thing there, and yet being desirous to gratify his master, he asked King Ælfred, whether he should not provide a few leaves, in which to set down such remarkable things, as occurred either in reading or conversation; the King was extremely delighted with this hint, and directed Afferius to put it immediately in execution, which he accordingly did: pursuing this method constantly, their collection began to swell, till at length it became of the size of an ordinary Psalter; and this was what the King called his Hand-book or Manual, Afferius however, calls it Enchiridion (s). In all probability, Afferius continued at Court during the whole reign of Ælfred, and, for ought we know, several years after; but

[B] He seems to have quitted in 883. The reason why many writers (12) have placed the death of Affer Bishop of Sherburn in this year, is their finding that he was succeeded in his Bishoprick by Sighelmus, who was sent by King Ælfred to carry his alms to the Christians of St Thomas in the Indies. William of Malmesbury (13) is sometimes cited to prove the death of our author in the life-time at least of King Ælfred; but whoever reads him will find that he says no such thing: He says indeed, that Afferius and Sighelmus were both Bishops of Sherburn in the reign of Ælfred (14), which is true, but the conjecture founded hereupon, that Afferius died before Sighelmus succeeded is false, as appears from what this author himself says immediately afterwards. For he tells us that this Bishop Affer came from St Dewi, and consequently was the author of the Annals of Ælfred written in 893, precisely ten years after Sighelmus succeeded him (15). Tho' this is sufficient, yet I think it may not be amiss to add another proof of this fact, that tho' Afferius lived long after the year 883, yet he was not actually in possession of the Bishoprick of Sherburn. In the old history of the Bishops of Bath and Wells, published by the learned Wharton, there is an account, that in 905 Pope Formosus did by his letters to King Edward the Elder, son and successor to Ælfred the Great, and to Plegmund Archbishop of Canterbury, exhort them on account of the few Bishops who were then living, to fill up the vacant Sees; whereupon the Archbishop consecrated seven Prelates in one day at Canterbury, amongst whom one was Bishop of Sherburn (16). But the Saxon Annals plainly prove, that our Affer did not die till 910 (17), which is six years afterwards. His quitting this Bishoprick so soon, is perhaps the reason that he does not expressly mention it's being bestowed on him as he does his other preferments, but contents himself with an oblique account of it (18), and referring frequently to his church at Sherburn, as a place to which he had particular relation (19). This is one of the difficulties we promised to remove, and indeed it is one of the greatest with which the story of this Prelate is affected.

but where, or when he died was matter of dispute, tho' the Saxon Chronicle positively fixes it to the year 910, to which we think no just objection can be made (t). The reader will observe, that we take Affer the Monk, and Affer Bishop of Sherburn, for one and the same person, which some however have denied; yet we go farther still, and assert him to have been also Archbishop of St Davids, for all which, we hope the the reader will find sufficient authority in the notes [C]. We do indeed admit, that if there was such a reader in the publick schools at Oxford as Affer the Monk, he must have been some other person of the same name, and not our author; but we do not think this point so clearly made out, as to deserve much dispute about it, since it rests almost wholly on the authority of Harpsfield (u); for tho' he cites the Annals of Winchester; yet we find no such things in the Annals that we have, nor is the account consistent with itself in several other respects, besides this of Affer, as Sir John Spelman has justly observed [D]. There is no less controversy about the works of Afferius, than about his preferences; for some alledge that he never wrote any thing but the Annals of King Ælfred; whereas, Pits gives us the titles of no less than five other books (w) of his writing, and adds, that he wrote many more: The first of these is a Commentary on Boëtius, which is mentioned by Leland, on the authority of the Chronicle of St Neots (x); the truth is, he explained this author to King Ælfred when he made his Saxon translation, whence the censure passed upon it, that though it was a work of great use in those times, yet it was in a manner ridiculous in ours (y); the same thing might be said of any literal version: The second piece mentioned by Pits, is the Annals of Ælfred's

[C] The reader will find sufficient authority in the notes] It would take up too much time, and give the reader too much trouble, to mention all the mistakes that have been made in relation to our author. It will be a much easier and shorter method to demonstrate the truth of the facts above asserted, and speak only as occasion requires of what others have advanced.

We will first prove, that Affer the Monk and Affer Bishop of Sherburn was the same person, and this without relying upon authority at all; for if authority could absolutely decide, we have that of Matthew of Westminster (20) and Florence of Worcester (21) on our side which ought to be decisive. But we will waive these and take another method of proving the fact. If Affer Menevensis and Affer Bishop of Sherburn were two persons, then certainly the former treated the latter very ill; for when he is speaking of the learned men the King had about him, he mentions John the Monk of St Davids, Werfeth Bishop of Worcester, Plegmund Archbishop of Canterbury, Ethelstan and Werwalf the King's Chaplains, as persons assisting that Prince in his studies (22), but he says not a word of Affer Bishop of Sherburn, tho' he speaks of the very work wherein that Bishop assisted the King as the King himself tells us (23). This would be the highest injustice in the world, especially considering he addressed his book to the King, and utterly inconsistent with his own character. But if himself was that Affer, then it is an instance only of his modesty, and as such is agreeable to the whole tenor of his writings. Yet in another place, he acknowledges the King made use of him for those very purposes, for which the King himself says he made use of the Bishop of Sherburn. That Affer was also Archbishop of St Davids is no new opinion, for both Mr Tyrrel and Mr Wife have asserted it, tho' we differ in some respects from each of these authors. Mr Tyrrel's notion was, that his being Archbishop of St Davids was a fiction of the Monks, in order to do honour to their brother Affer (24). Mr Wife again believed he was Archbishop of St Davids and afterwards Bishop of Sherburn (25); and in order to support this, he alleges that there is an omission in the Annals of St Davids of the year wherein he was made Archbishop; and that whereas he is said to have become so in 909, the author ought to have placed his death there. But perhaps this is taking too great a liberty with MSS. That Affer was really Archbishop appears not only from the ancient Annals so often mentioned, and from another very ancient manuscript in the Cotton Library (26), but also from the indubitable authority of Gerald Barry, commonly called Cambrensis, one of his successors, who in his list of the Archbishops, sets down Novis, Etwal, Affer (27). Our supposition therefore is, that he succeeded Etwal in 883, in which we contradict no manuscript. As to what the Annals of St Davids say that he was made Archbishop in 909, we must set down the phrases made use of by the author of those Annals (28).

Anno 909, Affer Episcopus Britannia fit.

It should seem therefore, that upon the new regulations made in the Church, mentioned in the former note, Affer had an additional jurisdiction given him; otherwise, why is he called Episcopus Britannia, Bishop of Britain? whereas Novis, and all the other Bishops, are styled Bishops of St Davids. Affer therefore might become Bishop of St Davids in 883, and now receive from King Edward, the Primacy of Britain, or Wales, so far as he could bestow it, which being a very remarkable fact, was taken notice of by the author of these Annals. To prove that Affer Archbishop of St Davids, if he was a different person from Affer Bishop of Sherburn, could not be author of the Annals of Ælfred, we need only take notice, that he never mentions his namesake Affer of Sherburn, who assisted that King in his literary labours, particularly in his translation of Gregory's Pastoral, of which mention is expressly made in those Annals (29). Add to this, that the Saxon Chronicle, the History of Æthelward the Monk, and other ancient records of those times, never mention two Affer, though they speak copiously of one. On the whole therefore we think, that it is at least extremely probable, that Affer the Monk of St Davids became first Parish-Priest of St Dewi, afterwards Abbot of Ambrosbury and Banwell, then Bishop of Sherburn, and lastly Archbishop of St Davids by the favour of King Ælfred, and Primate of Britain through the kindness of Edward his son.

[D] As Sir John Spelman has justly observed. If Affer had really read at Oxford, it is not easy to guess why he never mentioned it. It is generally conceived that Grimbald went to Oxford in 886, at least it is in that year, Afferius places the great tumult that happened there on his account (30), which being so fair an opportunity, one would think the author could not have passed it by without mentioning his own employment, if he really had any in the same place. The truth seems to be, that whoever framed the story of the Oxford professors, took all the learned men, that are spoken of in the history of Ælfred's reign, and bestowed them as the accounts he had met with of their works led him; one to Divinity, another to Grammar, which fell to Affer's share, because he had grammatically construed Boëtius for the use of Ælfred, as William of Malmbsbury tells us. Indeed if it were true, what some have suggested, that Affer was employed in bringing over St Grimbald from France (31), then by placing the date a little higher, we might bring this story to square well enough with the chronology of Affer's history; but even then it would not agree with the matter of it, for if he read in the schools at Oxford, how could he divide his time between the court and his monastery? There is no comparison between what Affer himself tells us, and what we have from an anonymous writer, of whom we have but a very indifferent account.

Ælfred's life and reign: The third he styles Annales Britannicæ, or the Annals of Britain in one book, mentioned also by Leland and Bale (z), and which hath been since published by the learned Dr Gale (a), who inclined to think it genuine, which is certainly more than it deserved, as will be shewn in a note [E]. The fourth piece, he calls Aurearum Sententiarum Enchiridion, lib. 1. id est, An Enchiridion of golden Sayings, in one Book, which is without question, the Manual or Common-Place-Book made for King Ælfred, and reckoned among his works by this very Pits (b): It must be owned that Leland had also spoken of this Enchiridion, but more accurately, and in a manner becoming so great a writer; for he speaks of it as an instance of the learning and diligence of Asser, which it certainly was; and though the collections he made concerning this author, are much better and larger than those of Bale and Pits, yet he modestly upon this subject, apologizes for speaking so little and so obscurely of so great a man (c). The next in Pits's catalogue, is a Book of Homilies, and the last, a Book of Epistles; he took it for granted, that Asser being a Bishop, preached sometimes, and that having so many friends, he must needs write letters, which is all the foundation that can be in nature for these two volumes, no antient author saying a word of them. Of the like stamp is Bishop Godwin's account, of his being buried in his cathedral church of Sherburn (d), which is meer guess-work, founded on his being Bishop there; and with equal probability we might say, he was buried at St Davids, though there is not any authority for either. Thus we conclude the article of this most excellent person, who was, without question, one of the most pious, most learned, and with all, one of the modestest prelates of the age in which he lived.

[E] As will be shewn in a note. The first notice we had of these Annals was from Leland (32), for as to what Brompton says, concerning Asser's mentioning King Offa, it does not appear to relate of these Annals (33). As to the account given by Leland, it is certain that he speaks very doubtfully, and in a long passage which he afterwards blotted out (34), and which is therefore omitted in the printed edition, he ascribes this very book, commonly called the Chronicle of St Neots, to a domestick of King Ælfred's. Though in another place he says, this Domestick abridged the Annals of Asserius (35). Dr Gale who published it, inclines to think it really the work of Asserius (36), and Bishop Nicholson concurs with him, because, says he, his book insists chiefly on the fortunes of King Ælfred (37). Yet never sure was a greater injury done to any author, than is done to Asserius, by ascribing to him a work altogether unworthy of him. The very beginning of the Chronicle is little better than nonsense, and as to what the author says of King Ælfred, he transcribes the genuine Annals of Asserius, interpolating however many fabulous stories, which, without doubt, were invented long after our author's decease. It is true that he speaks often in the person of Asser (38), but this is no proof of any thing, but the author's ignorance, since in the former part of his work he speaks in the person of Beda (39), which is a plain proof, that the whole is a transcript from various authors, by one who had not judgment enough to leave out these personal phrases which disturb and confound the work. As to what Leland hath written about this Chronicle it is easily accounted for, he had many large and arduous works upon his hands, and therefore had not leisure to read every manuscript which came into his power. Perusing a part of this manuscript, and perceiving that the author called King Ælfred his Lord, his patron, and him to whom he was many ways obliged, he took it for granted, that he must have lived in his time; whereas, if he had read the beginning of the book, he must, according to the same way of reasoning, have supposed he lived two hundred years higher; besides, at the end of this Chronicle, and there appears no marks of any continuation, we have an account of the death of Asser Bishop of Sherburn, which is placed in the year 909 (40). Hence forward therefore, it is to be hoped, this Chronicle will be cited in the same way good judges have always cited it, that is, by the name of Pseudo-Asserius, or the pretended Asser (41), as it's author is fitly stiled; if this should be thought too hard a censure, we will offer a conjecture of another nature, which is at least new, and not altogether improbable: This Chronicle of St Neots was said to be the work of Joannes Asserius, whence Pits stupidly enough, calls our author by the same name (42), tho' it is certain, that surnames were not in use here, till after our acquaintance with the Normans; it is therefore not impossible, that this Chronicle might be transcribed by some person whose name was John Asser or Asker, for that there has been such a surname, is evident from the author cited in the margin (43); in process of time, the likeness of the name, and the likeness of the matter, might well enough occasion such a mistake, but it is now certainly high time to correct it.

B.

BABINGTON (GERVASE) a learned Bishop in the end of the XVIth, and beginning of the XVIIth century, was born in Nottinghamshire [A], being descended from the antient family of the Babingtons, in that county (a). After having received there the first rudiments of learning, he was sent to Trinity college in Cambridge (b), of which he became Fellow (c). On the fifteenth of July, 1578, he was incorporated Master of Arts at Oxford, as he stood in his own university (d).

Having laid a good foundation in other parts of learning, he applied himself to the study of Divinity, and became a famous preacher in Cambridge, the place of his residence. When he was Doctor in Divinity, he was made domestic Chaplain to Henry Earl of Pembroke, President of the Council in the marches of Wales [B], by whose interest he was constituted Treasurer of the church of Landaff (e). In 1588, he was installed into the Prebend of Wellington in the cathedral of Hereford (f). And, through his patron's further interest, was advanced to the Bishoprick of Landaff [C], vacant by the death of William Blethin: He was consecrated the twenty-ninth of August, 1591 (g). In February 1594, he was translated to the See of Exeter (b), and confirmed the ninth of March (i) [D]. From whence, in 1597, he was translated again to Worcester (k), to which he was nominated August 30, elected September 15, and confirmed October 4, following (l). He was likewise made one of the Queen's Counsel for the marches of Wales (m). To the library of his cathedral at Worcester he was a very great benefactor; for he not only fitted and repaired the edifice, but also bequeathed thereto all his books, which was a gift of good value (n). After having continued Bishop of Worcester near thirteen years (o), he died of the jaundice (p), May 17, 1610, and was buried in his cathedral of Worcester, without any monument (q). As to his character; he was, in the midst of all his preferments, neither tainted with idleness, pride, or covetousness: not only diligent in preaching, but in writing books, for the understanding of the Holy Scriptures. So that he was a true pattern of piety to the people, of learning (r) to the ministry, and of wisdom to all governors (s). He was an excellent preacher, and happy in raising the affections and attention of his audience, which he would keep up till the end of his sermon (t). We shall give the rest of his character in the note [E]. He

[A] Was born in Nottinghamshire.] In his effigies, prefixed to his works, he is said to have been 59 years of age (undoubtedly at the time of his death). If so, he must have been born in the year 1511.

In saying that he was born in Nottinghamshire, I follow Mr Fuller, afterwards D. D. (1). But Mr Izacke (2), and after him Mr Prince (3), affirm, that he was a native of Devonshire. The latter, particularly, informs us, that a family of that name long flourished in and about Ottery St Mary in that county; which he supposes to have been a younger branch, of that of Nottinghamshire. But, after giving the pedigree of that family, he owns, That he did not find, which of the gentlemen (there mentioned) Bishop Babington challenged as his father: though probably one of them might be so.

L. Efq; preached by the author, whilst he was Bishop of Landaff. His stile is good, considering the time he lived in; though it is too full of quibbles, of jingles, and quaint expressions. But such was the false taste, which then almost universally prevailed. C

BACON (ROBERT) an eminent Divine in the XIIIth century. The place, or time of his birth, cannot be certainly known, but from various circumstances hereafter mentioned, it seems probable that it was about the year 1168 (a): Pits indeed informs us, that he was brother to the famous Roger Bacon, for which he produces no authority, and indeed the fact itself is highly improbable, if not impossible [A]. This Robert Bacon studied in his youth at Oxford, where he distinguished himself by the quickness of his parts, and his assiduous application to his studies. Thence, according to the custom of those times, he removed to Paris, where he perfected himself in all the branches of learning, which were in repute in those times (b). We are not told at what time he returned into England, but it appears clearly, that, after his return, he settled at Oxford, and read Divinity lectures there (c). His colleague in this office was Dr Edmund Rich, in our histories commonly stiled Edmund of Abingdon, a man famous for literature, and yet in the opinion of Leland inferior to our Bacon (d). This Dr Rich had been chosen by the Canons of Salisbury, Treasurer of their church, and in 1233, becoming Archbishop of Canterbury, his friend Robert Bacon succeeded him as Treasurer of the cathedral church of Salisbury (e). The same year he distinguished himself by a sermon before his royal master King Henry III, at Oxford, whither his Majesty came, in order to have held a great council of his Lords. In this discourse, Bacon plainly told the King, the mischiefs to which himself and his subjects were exposed, by his reposing too great a confidence in Peter de Rupibus, Bishop of Winchester, and other foreigners, which honest sermon had a great effect on the mind of his master, and inclined him to give satisfaction to his nobility, who were then, generally speaking, disaffected (f). This seasonable service rendered to the nation, did more to secure his memory from oblivion, than his many years laborious reading, or even his learned writings. Yet, by a strange proneness to attribute all great things to his namesake Roger Bacon, a story has been framed of his preaching at the same time, and on the same occasion, which doubtless was the occasion that Pits supposed them to be brothers, though in truth there is no good ground to believe, that Roger Bacon preached at all at that time, or on that subject [B].

The

[A] Highly improbable if not impossible. This circumstance is in the General Dictionary, transcribed without scruple in the Life of (1) Roger Bacon, for as to Robert, they are silent. Pits indeed relates it twice, affirming in both places, that Roger, as well as Robert Bacon, preached against the Bishop of Winchester at Oxford (2). In a subsequent note, we shall destroy the credit of this text, at present our busi-ness shall be to shew, that it is very unlikely they were brothers. First then the silence of Roger Bacon on this head, seems to be a good argument against the truth of it. He often mentions in his writings the learned men of his own time, speaks frequently of his patrons and benefactors, and not seldom of his disciples, but not once of his brother (3). Can we therefore believe, that he had one, especially so learned and so considerable a man? Secondly, Leland knew nothing of this relation, who wrote expressly of Roger Bacon, and mentions Robert occa-sionally more than once (4). In like manner, Bale, who wrote the lives of both the Bacons over and over, was either ignorant of their being brothers, or had a mind we should continue so, for he says nothing of him in any of his editions (5). It is true, these are but negative arguments, and yet, whoever considers the disposition of Roger Bacon, the integrity of Leland, and the industry of Bale, will scarce imagine so singular a thing as this could escape them. Thirdly, the ages of these celebrated men will by no means allow it. Pits himself tell us, that Robert Bacon died in 1248, and that he was senex et plenus dierum, old and full of days, which must imply fourscore or thereabouts (6), and indeed this agrees very well with all the circumstances of his life, for Bale tells us, he was very old, when he became a Friar, which was in 1240 (7), when, according to this computation, he must have been seventy-two, whereas Roger Bacon was born in 1214 (8), so that there must have been forty-six years between them, which is hardly credible there could have been, if they were brethren. We might add to this, the weakness, credulity, and hastiness of Pits, who concludes frequently from the slightest appearances, and made no difficulty of giving his readers his own conjectures for true history. But there is no need of insisting longer upon this, our former arguments being sufficiently conclusive.

[B] At that time, or on that subject. All that we know of this matter, is from Matth. Paris, who was contemporary with Robert, and with Roger Bacon, he gives us a large account of King Henry's coming to Oxford in 1233, the occasion of it, and what fell out there. Peter de Rupibus, Bishop of Winchester, at that time governed the King and King-dom, drawing over such numbers of his countrymen, the Poictovins, that the King was surrounded, and the nation swarmed with them. The King, sensible of the disaffection of his subjects, called a great council of the Lords, to meet at Oxford, on the Feast of St John; but when he came thither, he found his summons slighted by the Barons. On this he in great wrath, issued a second and a third sum-mons, resolving to proceed against such of the Lords as did not then attend, as traitors. At this time it was, that Friar Robert Bacon, preaching before the King and some Bishops, told him plainly, that

The learned Dr Cave thought otherwise (g), but even the authority of so great a man ought not to establish as a truth, a fact altogether absurd, as in the notes we have shewn it to be, though with all due respect to that great man's memory [C]. After the promotion of Dr Rich to the See of Canterbury, the famous Richard Fishakel, whom Leland calls Fizacrius, read, in conjunction with our Bacon, in St Edward's schools, for many years together, to their own great honour, and to the benefit of all their hearers, nor were they less assiduous in preaching, so that their labours were equally divided, between the learned and the vulgar (b). In 1240, Bacon lost his great patron and intimate friend, Edmund Archbishop of Canterbury, and very possibly this accident, joined to his fervent piety, and great love to a retired life, might induce Bacon, though he was very old, to enter into the order of Friars Preachers (i), of which order also was his associate Fishakel (k). In gratitude to the memory of the Archbishop, Bacon wrote his Life, notwithstanding that Prelate had for some years lived, and was even so unfortunate as to die under the King's displeasure, which work of his was highly (l) esteemed [D]. He wrote also many other learned pieces, sufficient to have established his reputation, and of which we have nothing now save their titles (m) [E]. At length, worn out with so long a course of studious application, he yielded to fate in the year 1248, and was interred at Oxford (n). His faithful friend Richard Fishakel, survived him but a very short time, his affection for him being so great, that he wanted a relish for life, when Bacon was no longer among the living (o). peace was not to be hoped for, till Peter, Bishop of Winchester, and Peter de Rivallis, his son, were removed from his councils. Others also about the King affirmed the same thing. We read farther in this author, that the King hereupon recollecting himself, began to incline his heart unto reason, which being perceived, a certain court chaplain, one Roger Bacon, of a facetious disposition, pleasantly, and yet cynically, reprehended him on this head. My Lord the King, said he, what is it that most hurts, and most terrifies such as cross the seas? The King answered, they know best, who do their business in great waters. But, replied the chaplain, my Lord, I will tell you, shelves and rocks (Petrae et Rupes), and it is said, Peter de Rupibus. It is however necessary to give the author's own words. 'In hoc autem colloquio frater quidam Robertus Bacum, de Ordine Prædicatorum, qui coram Rege et quibusdam Episcopis presentibus Verbum Dei prædicaret; libera voce Regi patentur dixit: quod nunquam diuturna pace frueretur, nisi Petrum Wintoniensem Episcopum, et Petrum de Rivallis filium ejus (aut consanguineum) à consiliis suis amoveret. Cùmque alii, qui aderant, idipsum protestarentur: Rex aliquantulum in seipso se recolligens, cor suum nationi inclinavit: et cum sic videret cum mitigatum, quidam clericus de curia, scilicet Rogerus Bacum, jocundus in sermone, jocunde ac lepidè, cynicè tamen reprehendens, ait: Domine, mi Rex, quid plùs nocet transfretum navigantibus, aut quid plus terret? At Rex: Noverunt facientes operationes in aquis multis. At clericus: Domine, dicam: Petrae et Rupes. Ac diceretur: Petrus de Rupibus. Hoc enim erat nomen Episcopi Wintoniensis cum tali cognomente (g). It is evident, enough that the Robert and Roger, mentioned here, induced Pits to make the celebrated Roger Bacon, the Franciscan brother to our Robert Bacon, and to assert, that they both preached upon this occasion, which if there were no objection to the latter part of this passage, could not possibly be true; since at that time Roger Bacon was not above twenty years of age, and consequently could never answer the character of the Roger Bacon, mentioned in the text. Besides, whoever reads this passage carefully, cannot but observe the latter part, comes in very abruptly, and looks like a vulgar story, built upon the passage before related, which is serious, solid, and has a strong air of truth. This seems indeed to be the bottom of the business, for in the best MS. (10) of Matth. Paris, the sentence ends with the word, protestarentur, and all the rest seems to be added by some later writers from common fame.

[C] To that great man's memory.] Dr Cave saw plainly the absurdity of this story, as the date stood, and therefore in his life of Roger Bacon, he has altered it, but without any authority. Roger Bacon, says he, flourished chiefly about the year 1278, but he began to distinguish himself many years before, for in 1259, he preached before Henry III, at Oxford, at which time he freely reproved him on account of the Poictovins and other strangers, whose councils he in a manner wholly followed, admitting them not only to his court, but advancing them likewise to the principal offices of State. Claruit præcipuè circa annum 1278, quum et jam ante plus annos inclarescere cæperat, etiam anno 1259, coram Henrico III, Oxoniæ tunc agente, concionem habuit, quæ regem ob Poictovienfes, aliosque exteros, quorum consiliis penè unicè agebatur, non modo in aula admittos, sed et summis reipublicæ muneribus adhibitos, liberè coarguebat (11). If this date could be supported, it would suit the story of Roger Bacon very well, because at that time he would have been forty-six years old; but the mischief of it is, that it is in the very teeth of truth, as well as against all authority; for first Robert Bacon, whose sermon is said to have given occasion to Roger's, had been then eleven years in his grave, and what is still worse, Peter de Rupibus, against whom the sermon is supposed to be preached, had been dead and buried one and twenty years (12). The only circumstance founded in fact is this, that King Henry was that year at Oxford, where was held that called the mad Parliament, of which though we have a long account in Matth. Paris, yet is there nothing said of this preaching, so that this emendation of Dr Cave's, cannot possibly be admitted. For if you take away the punning invective against the Bishop of Winchester, there is no colour of authority for the story, and if that remains, the date cannot be altered.

[D] Which work of his was highly esteemed.] The long and intimate acquaintance, which had subsisted between these two great men, St Edmund, Archbishop of Canterbury, and our Bacon, excellently qualified the latter for writing the life of the former, which though it was a task that could not but expose him to the ill will of a court, yet he performed it so well, that when Matth. Paris afterwards wrote more largely upon the same subject, he tells us expressly, that he had recourse to the writings of Richard de Witz, Bishop of Chichester, who had been chaplain to the Archbishop, and to this work of Robert Bacon's (13), as to the most authentick memoirs of that Prelate (14). Leland and many others have attributed this life to Roger Bacon, who did indeed receive some favours from the Archbishop while at Oxford, but as we have seen from unquestionable authority, could have no sort of title to this work.

[E] And of which we have nothing now, save their titles.] Bale and Pits, agree exactly in the account they give us of the books written by our author, which were the four following, viz. Glossarum in sacras Scripturas, lib. i. i. e. Of Glosses on the Holy Scriptures, one Book. Super Psalterium Lib. i. i. e. On the Psalter, one Book. Sermonum Variorum, Liber unus, i. e. Of Various Discourses, one Book. Lectio. Ordin. Liber unus, i. e. One Book of Lectures. These, with the Life of St Edmund, Archbishop of Canterbury, mentioned in the text, and in the preceding note, are all his works, so far as we have any account of them, and only two of these, were known to Bale, when he published the first edition of his book (16).

copiously upon this extraordinary event (p) [F]. It is scarce to be conceived, how many mistakes, both antient and modern writers have committed in relation to this man. The editor of Leland's Commentaries, has in many places corrupted his author, and instead of Robert has Roger Bacon, probably because in the MS. he found it contracted. However it be, certain it is, that these mistakes of his have brought great errors into Leland's book, as in the notes will be fully demonstrated [G]. The famous Dr Fuller hath, with his usual good humour, taken notice of the common custom of confounding several learned men of the name of Bacon with each other (q), the passage is curious and deserves to be read [H]. But what seems most extraordinary is this, that the industrious Thomas Hearne was so little acquainted with our author, that he was for substituting

[F] Upon this extraordinary event] It is in the life of Richard Fishakel, that this occurs. He tells us, that he was a most excellent Philosopher and Divine, and on that account so dear to Robert Bacon, a man exquisite in all the branches of literature, that he became his inseparable companion. He afterwards adds, neither ought we to conceal what our writers of those times mention, that Fizacrius, and Bacon were as closely united as Bithus and Bacchius, a noble English pair, whether we consider their friendship, or their learning. As living they were the dearest companions, so in death they were not divided; for as the turtle when it has lost it's mate, pines itself to death; so Bacon being dead, Fizacrius neither could nor would survive. O singular amity, and worthy of perpetual remembrance! In our printed copy of Leland, the sentence first cited, runs thus. 'Nam et insignis Philosophus et Theologus fuit, quibus nominibus tam charus erat Rogero Bacono, viro undecunq; doctissimo, ut comes illi individuus adhereret (17).' This determines all the subsequent passages to Roger Bacon, than which there could not be a more monstrous absurdity, since Roger Bacon, outlived Fishakel forty four years, the latter dying in 1248, and the former surviving to 1292. Now that this is no mistake in Leland, appears from what Bale has written of the said Fishakel. 'He was, says he, the constant companion of Robert Bacon, with whom he studied at Paris. Leland tells us of them, that they were as strictly united as Bithus and Bacchius, whom death itself could not divide, for Bacon being dead, Fishakel could not survive him (18).' The MS. Bale used therefore was right, or at least it must have been R. Baconus, which he had skill enough to read Robert as it ought to be, and not Roger. To put the matter out of dispute, Matth. Paris, under the year 1248, gives us this account of their deaths. 'This year, says he, died Walter Maucerc, Bishop of Carlisle, of the order of Friars preachers; as also two other Friars of the same order, who left not greater men, perhaps not their equals in Divinity, and other sciences, among the living. These were Friar Robert Bacon, and Friar Richard Fishaker (or de Fishakele) who for many years had read excellently in the same faculty, and had gloriously preached the word of God to the people (19).'

[G] In the notes will be fully demonstrated.] Not to tire the reader with a multitude of dry citations, we shall here mention, but two instances of that carelessness, which is complained of in the text. In the life of Matth. Paris, Leland is made to say, that this author composed the life of Edmund Rich, Archbishop of Canterbury, from the Memoirs of Ricardo Vicanius, and Roger Bacon. Scriptis etiam Vitam Eadmundi Riccii, Cantuarum Archiepiscopi, omnia tamen à Ricardo Vicanio, et Rogeri Bacone, prius edoctus (20). This mistake Leland himself could never have made, for he had this out of Matth. Paris's history, wherein it is said. Hujus igitur assertionibus, necnon et Frarris Magistri Roberti Bacun, de Ordine Prædicatorum, certificatus Dominus Matheus Parisiensis, Monachus Ecclesie sancti Albani, Vitam memorati sancti Edmundi scripsit, et que indubitanter didicit à fide dignis, diligenter digestit. Quam qui videre desiderat, in Ecclesia sancti Albani ipsam poterit reperire (21). The other passage is still more flagrant, it is in the article of Edmund Rich, Archbishop of Canterbury, where Leland is made to say, There was in his time one Roger Bacon at Oxford, a man distinguished among the lovers of learning, with whom Edmund was very familiar, and often made use of his assistance; for though in many things, he was much superior to Bacon, yet was he inferior to him in learning, or I am much mistaken. Afterwards he tells us, that this Bacon, succeeded Rich in his office of treasurer to the church of Salisbury (22). But how could any part of this be true of Roger Bacon? How could Dr Rich use the assistance of a child, or how could Leland prefer the learning of Bacon, who was not twenty years old, when Rich was made Archbishop of Canterbury? Is it possible, that at those years he could succeed in the treasurership of Salisbury? Leland's own account of Roger Bacon contradicts it. But if instead of Roger, we read Robert Bacon, then all is clear and plain, for he was at that time sixty-five years of age. But if authority be desired to support this, even that may be had, in the clearest and most express terms, for Nicholas Trivet, speaking of Dr Edmund Rich, and his reading at Oxford, says, that he had for his colleague, as reader in Divinity, Master Robert Bacon of the order of Friars Preachers, who also read with Richard Fishakel (23). Thus we see what confusion may be introduced by the mistake of a single letter, and how necessary it is to transcribe and print antient authors, literatim, since if instead of Roger, it had stood in the printed copy R. Bacon, every reader must have judged for himself, and the editor had escaped all blame.

[H] The passage is curious and deserves to be read.] It is in his Church History, wherein having given a concise account of Roger Bacon, and the ill treatment he met with from the Monks, he proceeds thus. 'For my own part, I behold the name of Bacon in Oxford, not as of an individual man, but a corporation of men; no single cord, but a twisted cable of many together. And as all the acts of strong men of that nature, are attributed to an Hercules; all the predictions of prophesying women to a Sibyl; so I conceive all the achievements of the Oxonian Bacons, in their liberal studies are ascribed to one, as chief of the name. And this in effect, is confessed by the most learned and ingenious orator of that university (24). Indeed we find one Robert Bacon, who died anno 1248, a learned Doctor, and Trithemius fileth John Baconthorpe, plain Bacon, which addeth to the probability of the former assertion. However, this confounding so many Bacons in one, hath caused Anticronisms in many relations. For how could this Bacon ever be a reader of Philosophy in Brazen-Nose-College, founded more than one hundred years after his death; so that his Brazen Head (so much spoken of to speak) must make time pass to be again, or else these inconsistencies will not be reconciled; except any will save it with the Prolepsis of Brazen-Nose-Hall, formerly in the place where the college is now erected. I have done with the Oxford Bacons, only let me add, that those of Cambridge, father and son, Nicholas and Francis; the one of Bennet, and the other of Trinity college, do hold (absit invidia) the scales of desert even, against all of their name in all the world besides (25). After this, it will perhaps surprize the reader to tell him, that in the late edition of Moreri's Dictionary, the articles of Robert and Roger Bacon, are very properly distinguished, and a very remarkable circumstance relating to our author, is preserved therein, viz. that during his whole life, he kept up a strict correspondence with the learned men of the university at Paris, and was so careful of the reputation of the university of Oxford, and of the proficiency of the students therein, that he procured the constitution relating to professors, which is found in their volume of ordinances, directed by Pope Clement V, to the General Council at Vienna, which are from thence styled the Clementine Constitutions (26).

substituting the name of Roger instead of Robert, in a MS. he published out of pure regard to the reputation of the former (r), which is however too just, and too extensive, to stand in need of any such helps [I].

(7) Robert of Gloucester's Chronicle, p. 520. See also the word BACON in the Index.

[I] Too extensive to stand in need of any such helps.] The circumstance mentioned in the text, is to be met with in Robert of Gloucester's Chronicle, published by Mr Hearne, at Oxford, 1724. There is a large gap in the poem, where the story of King Henry III, should be related; and to supply this, some prose writer hath inserted a kind of annals, in which we find this note. A^o. xxiii. Hen. III. Master Robert Bacon, with Master Edmund of Abyngdone, forebode in Oxenorde, of the Crafte of whiche Bakon many Mervayles but I tolde a monkes Clerkes (27). In the index (28), to the book where this passage is referred to, Mr Hearne corrects his author, and says, that instead of Robert, we should read Roger, in which he is certainly mistaken, for Edmund of Abington, never read with Roger, but with Robert Bacon, and according to the best accounts we have, Roger Bacon did not return from his studies in France till a year or two after. But to put the matter out of dispute, this prose writer owns, that he took most of his facts from Trivet, who, in the year following, speaking of the death of

St Edmund, Archbishop of Canterbury, adds, Fuerat buic Socius in Schola Magister Robertus Bacon, qui Oxoniis regens in Theologia, Prædicatorum Ordinem est ingressus (29): Hence it is clear, that Hearne was wrong in his correction; for this is the very passage from which his old writer took the fact, which could not possibly be reconciled with the time and course of Roger Bacon's life, and yet what the author adds of the wonders performed by this Bacon, might very possibly be meant of Roger Bacon. Indeed the Merton college MS. of Trivet's Annals, reads Roger in this place, instead of Robert; but erroneously, as appears by comparison with other MSS, and from the concurring testimony of Matthew Paris, so often cited. Such dry remarks as these, are sometimes necessary; and never more so, than in the present case, where so many writers, ancient and modern, have confounded two great men, and by attributing the acts of the one to the other, embarrass both their stories, which being now read, separately, will appear perfectly clear and satisfactory. E

BACON, BAKON, BACUN, (ROGER); a learned English Monk of the Franciscan order, who flourished in the XIIIth century. He was born near Nchester in Somersetshire, which is held to be the Iſcalis of Ptolemy (a), some time in the year 1214, and was descended of a very antient and honourable family (b). He received the first tincture of letters at Oxford, where having gone through Graminar and Logic, the first dawnsings of his genius were so conspicuous, that they gained him the favour and patronage of the greatest lovers of learning, and such as were equally distinguished by their high rank, and the excellence of their knowledge (c), of which, even in that age, there were not a few [A]. It is not very clear whether he was of Merton college (d) or Brazen-nose Hall (e), and perhaps he studied at neither, but spent his time at the publick schools, and when he arrived at years sufficient to qualify himself for academical

[A] Of which even in that age there were not a few.] As there is scarce any mention made in our antient history, of a man more famous, or indeed more justly famous, than Roger Bacon; so we may safely affirm, that notwithstanding his high reputation, there never was any man's personal history more embarrassed or perplexed than his; and that chiefly through the want of care and diligence, in such as have undertaken to pen his story. The great Leland has given us little more than a character of him, and confesses himself, that nothing was more difficult, than to obtain a reasonable account of his life and writings (1). Bishop Bale, in the first work he published concerning our English writers (2), has treated our author very indifferently; but when he was afterwards better informed, he changed his opinion, and did him that justice, which his learning and great abilities deserved (3). From these writers we are informed, that he studied at Oxford in the early part of his life, and discovering an extraordinary genius for the sciences, was encouraged and protected by the most learned men of that time. What we propose in this note, is to discover, in some measure, who those learned men were, since we have shewn in the former article, that there have been very great mistakes made in this matter, chiefly by confounding him with his namesake, Robert Bacon, who flourished much earlier, and who died, when our Roger Bacon was about thirty-four years of age. We will begin with Dr Edmund Riche, Archbishop of Canterbury, who, though he was not, as some have asserted, the companion of our Roger in his studies (4), since he was promoted to the Archiepiscopal dignity, when our author was but twenty years old; yet, as he resided much at Oxford, and was a great encourager of learning, he might be, and indeed was, among the great men, who afforded Roger Bacon frequent marks of kindness and favour, when he first applied himself to learning (5). He was probably under the like obligation to Richard Pihacre, who distinguished himself by his learned lectures in the sciences at Oxford and Paris, in both which places our Bacon studied (6). We learn also from the writings of Bacon himself, that he was much indebted to William Shirwood, Chancellor of Lincoln, whose excellence in all kinds of knowledge, but chiefly in mathematical learning, he very highly celebrated (7). But the most remarkable of all his patrons, and him to whom he owed the greatest gratitude, was Robert Grouthead, Bishop of Lincoln, a man of prodigious learning, and of most unblemished integrity; from whom, in all probability, our author received those lights, that were of greatest use to him in his studies, since, as he freely professes in his writings, there was hardly any man in that age, except this Bishop of Lincoln and his disciples, who distinguished between real and useful learning, and that kind of empty and useless reading, which, through want of good sense, and a true taste, bore the name and carried the reputation of learning (8), and that, as we shall have occasion to shew hereafter, to such a degree, as to intitle those who turned their thoughts that way, to reputation and dignity; while such as cultivated that sort of science which was of real benefit to mankind, fell under grievous suspicions, and were treated as persons prone to novelties, and dangerous, from their having this disposition, both to Church and State. We may reasonably suppose, and indeed there is sufficient authority to support us in affirming, that it was the signs not only of pregnant parts, and a happy disposition to literature, that recommended, even in the earliest part of his life, our Roger Bacon to the notice and patronage of the great men before mentioned, but likewise his docility, and readiness to pursue, though with the greatest labour and pains, that method in his studies, which wiser heads thought might be most for his benefit and advantage. It was with this view, that having laid the first foundation of learning in the languages and Logick, he went, as the custom of those times was, to Paris, where he improved himself, by a regular and natural method in all the sciences, and returned, to the satisfaction of all his patrons, with a fair character and high reputation to Oxford, in the twenty-sixth year of his age (9), which is the first date we meet with in his history.

academical learning, he went over to Paris, where he made still greater progress in all parts of learning, insomuch that he was looked upon as the glory of that university, and an honour to his country (f). It was the fashion then, for such as desired to distinguish themselves by an early and effectual application to their studies, to resort to that city, where, at this time, not only many of the greatest men in Europe resided and taught, but many of the English nation, by whom Bacon was highly encouraged and carested. Among others, he became known to Robert Grouthead, or, as the French write it, Grosseteste, afterwards Bishop of Lincoln (g), who was his great Patron, and singular good friend. While he remained here, he did not confine his studies to any particular branch of literature, but endeavoured to embrace and comprehend the sciences in general, not however in a slight or superficial manner, but fully, perfectly, and to the bottom, by the help of a right method, and a constant and eager application. When he had attained the degree of Doctor, he returned again to his own country, and, as some say, took the habit of the Franciscan order in 1240 (b), when he was about twenty-six years of age; but others assert, that he became a Monk before he left France (i); however that matter be, certain it is, that after his return to Oxford, he was considered by the greatest men of that university, as one of the ablest and most indefatigable enquirers after knowledge, that the world had ever produced, and therefore they not only shewed him all the respect, and had for him all the esteem that his great abilities deserved, but likewise, perceiving that the course he took of improving and advancing all the sciences by experiments, required another sort of Assistance than that either of books or favour, they generously contributed, out of their purses, to his expences, so that, as he tells us himself, he laid out, within the compass of twenty years, no less than two thousand pounds, in collecting curious authors, making trials of various kinds, and in the construction of different instruments, for the improvement of useful knowledge (k) [B]. But if this assiduous

[B] For the improvement of useful knowledge] While our author studied at Paris, he had an opportunity of discovering the true state of learning at that time; and he has given us a very just picture thereof in his writings. There had been in the preceding century, a kind of persecution commenced against Philosophy, founded chiefly upon some passages collected from the ancient Fathers, by Gratian in his Decretals, which had proceeded so far, that the divines of that city condemned Aristotle's Philosophy, and excommunicated such as should study or peruse his writings (10), which was principally owing to the bad behaviour of one Amauri of Chartres, who advanced abundance of heretical opinions; and amongst the rest, that God served for the form to the matter of all natural beings, and that this matter being uncreated was divine; which notion he pretended to support from the writings of Aristotle (11). This prejudice was however in some measure worn off, by our countryman Michael Scotus publishing a Latin translation of some of Aristotle's works, keeping closely to the original, whereas most of those translations, which had been before in use, were made from the Arabic, and attended with commentaries of the philosophers of that nation, which contributed not a little to obscure the sentiments of Aristotle, and to discredit his writings; but when this new version appeared, Aristotle's writings began to recover their credit; and the new orders of Dominicans and Franciscans, which were instituted about the same time, favouring the doctrine of that philosopher, and defending it in their public lectures, Aristotle's character was raised so high, that the title of philosopher was solely appropriated to him (12). By this means, several others, besides Michael Scotus, laboured in explaining his works, and soon after divers versions of them, which were said to have been made by Gerard of Cremona, Alured Anglicus, Herman Alemanus, and Willielmus Flemingus, were made publick (13). However, Philosophy was still in a very rude state, and Bacon himself tells us, that though there never was so great an appearance of knowledge, nor so great an application to so many sciences in so many countries, as there had been for forty years past, yet there never was so great ignorance, and such a variety of errors as then. Those who had undertaken to publish new translations of Aristotle's works, were not sufficiently conversant in the languages, or in the sciences of which they treated; Herman confessed to Bacon, that he was rather an assistant in the translations than a translator himself, since he employed Saracens in Spain, who had the chief hand in his versions; Michael Scotus borrowed all that he published in his own name, from one Andrew, a Jew; and Willielmus Flemingus says,

Bacon, 'as every body knows at Paris, has no skill in the Greek language, though he pretends to it; and therefore he translates every thing falsely, and corrupts the learning of the Latins: And therefore though Bacon esteemed Aristotle's works, as the foundation of all knowledge, yet he thought it would have been an advantage to learning, if all the copies of them, which were then in use among the Latins, were destroyed; and he declares, that if it had been in his power, he would have burnt them all; for the study of them was mere loss of time and the occasion of error, and the multiplying of ignorance beyond what could be expressed; he adds farther, that the herd of students with their teachers, had no valuable knowledge for the object of their pursuits, and therefore they languished in a stupid application to bad translations, and lost both their time and expence (14); in short, that they were amused with a mere appearance, or shadow of knowledge, and did not value what they really knew, but what they were thought to know by the ignorant multitude. Such was the situation of learning, when our enterprising author began to set about that reformation which he thought necessary, and which he likewise thought it was impossible to make, by any other method than that of experiments, which he therefore set about with the utmost diligence: It was chiefly in these experiments, that he laid out so large a sum as is mentioned in the text; about which two questions have arisen, which however, at the bottom, the reader will find to be but one. Taking them however as commonly stated, they are these: First, whether the two thousand pounds that were thus spent, ought to be accounted French or sterling money? And secondly, where these experiments were made? I must confess, I apprehend they were made at Oxford, and as this is an affair, that must be solely determined by authorities, I shall mention those upon which my opinion is grounded. In the first place, Bale tells us, that Friar Bacon incurred the vulgar imputation of magick and forcery, by the extraordinary things he performed while he resided at Brazen-Nose Hall at Oxon (15); which seems plainly to prove, that his experiments were made there. We are likewise told by several authors, that Friar Bacon was made so uneasy by his enemies in the university, that he was obliged to quit it, and live in a little retirement by himself, in a place which to this day is called Friar Bacon's study (16), and we are farther told by the industrious Mr Hearne, that he sometimes retired in the summer to Sunning-Well (17), the knowledge of which, and of the place where he resided when there, are likewise preserved by tradition. I desire it may be remarked; that how little weight soever may be due to this tradition, with respect to the places, yet assiduous application to his studies, and the stupendous progress he made in them, raised his credit with the better part of mankind, it excited envy in some, and afforded plausible pretences for covering the malicious designs of others (l). It is very easy to conceive, that the experiments he made in all parts of Natural Philosophy and the Mathematicks, must have made a great noise in an ignorant age, when scarce two or three men in a whole nation, were tolerably acquainted with those studies, and when all the pretenders to knowledge, affected to cover their own ignorance, by throwing the most scandalous aspersions on those branches of science, which, they either wanted genius to understand, or which, demanded greater application to acquire, than they were willing to bestow. They gave out therefore, that mathematical studies, were in some measure allied to those magical arts which the Church had condemned, and thereby brought suspicions upon those, whose learning ought to have defended them from such imputations, more than any other men. It was under colour of such kind of suspicion, that Bacon's first troubles began, which issued in restraining him from reading lectures to the young students in the university, and at length in a close confinement, in which he was almost starved, and a prohibition to send his writings beyond the limits of his convent, except to the Pope (m). But there is great reason to believe, that though his application to the occult sciences was pretended, yet the true cause of his ill usage was, the freedom with which he had treated the clergy in his writings, in which he spared neither their ignorance nor their want of morals (n); besides, his great intimacy with Bishop Grouthead, might add not a little, to the power as well as spirit of persecution; for that Prelate had gone so far, as to reprove Pope Innocent IV by letter, and was said to have made no scruple of declaring to those with whom he was intimate, that in his judgment the Pope was Anti-Christ (o). Our author's being the bosom-friend of such a man, must naturally bring upon him the hatred of a great part of the clergy, more especially, since his zeal led him to follow the practice as well as the opinion of his patron, by writing freely to the Pope about the necessity of a Reformation (p) [C]. But notwithstanding this base and the tradition itself is a good argument, to prove that those extraordinary experiments, which exposed our author when living, to the inveterate malice of his ignorant enemies, and which will preserve his reputation with the learned world to latest posterity, were made at Oxford; for had it been otherwise, it is not easy to conceive how there should have been any tradition there about his study or observatory. There is another thing I would remark upon this head, which, for any thing I know, has not been taken notice of before, and it is this: That the earliest of his works, and in which, as will be shewn hereafter, he gave the largest account of experiments, was addressed to William of Paris, and consequently was not written there, but probably at Oxon (18). It may indeed be objected, that in other parts of his works, our author certainly reckons by French pounds; and if from thence it should be thought requisite to know what the difference at that time was, between French pounds and pounds sterling; the question may be easily answered from our author's own writings, who speaking of the cost of a burning-glass, says, that the first he made, stood him in sixty pounds Paris money, or twenty pounds sterling, which shews that the French livre was once worth six shillings and eight pence, though it is now dwindled down to less than one shilling (19).

[C] Writing freely to the Pope about the necessity of a Reformation. It appears clearly, that the great motive which induced Roger Bacon to embrace a monastick life, was that he might have greater leisure to attend his studies, and that he was desirous that all his discoveries should tend to the advancement of useful knowledge, which he thought of the highest consequence to the honour and peace of the Church. He therefore takes great pains in all his writings to prove this, and to shew that the perfecting Natural Philosophy, was the surest method of extirpating all heresies, abolishing superstition, and destroying the kingdom of Antichrist, as the perfecting Moral Philosophy, was the most effectual means of establishing true religion in the hearts of man, and manifesting the correspondence between the laws of nature and the doctrine of the gospel (20); in which he plainly followed the example of Robert, Bishop of Lincoln, his great patron, and who had written many treatises in the same way. It was after the death of that great prelate, that he began to be disturbed by the clergy; and especially by the monks of his own order, under pretence of his endeavouring to innovate and establish new doctrines, which they insinuated might tend to disturb the peace of the Church. This usage made a great impression upon his spirits, but did not in the least alter his sentiments, as appears by what he says in his address to Pope Clement IV, that out of a reverence due to his high dignity, which ought to engage him in seeking to procure the benefit of the whole world, he was willing, as far as the impediments he laboured under would permit, and his memory would allow, to deduce a regular system of true philosophy to the utmost of his power; adding, at the same time, that if it were not for this reverence, which he had for the Vicar of Jesus Christ, and the benefits that by him alone might be procured to the whole Christian world, he would not have undertaken what he did, under the circumstances in which he then was, however pressed or solicited by the whole Christian Church (21). This shews the spirit and temper of the man, who had no secret or worldly views, but was sincerely inclined to employ the mighty abilities which God had bestowed upon him, and all that learning, which by his own indefatigable pains and industry, he had acquired for the service of mankind, with which view he would have laboured, if his society would have permitted him, in the education of youth, that a new turn might have been given to their studies; and that instead of employing themselves as they had hitherto done, in what was of little or no use, they might apply in a regular method to such sciences, as might prove beneficial both to Church and State. If in this attempt he had succeeded, we may easily conceive how advantageous it would have been to the whole Christian world, and what a new face it must have given to the affairs of learning, since, as we shall hereafter see, our author, by dint of his own penetration, and a right use of Experimental Philosophy, arrived at, and even perfected, many of those discoveries, which have done so much honour to the moderns, and which by the enquiring into, and publishing his writings, it is unquestionably manifest, might have been long ago known and rendered useful to the world, if our author had not been treated as he was, or if there had not been such a tyrannical power exercised in the Christian Church, as put it out of the capacity of private men to spread their discoveries, and to render the progress they made in knowledge, as useful to mankind as they now do. But it must be acknowledged, in justice to the memory of this great man, that he does not appear to have had the least tincture of a private spirit, but was as communicative as he could; and that all his obscurities, are owing to the malice of his enemies, and not to any inclination he had to conceal his talents, or to raise his own reputation, by leaving others in ignorance.

barbarous usage from those, who, of all others, ought to have behaved to him in a different manner, his reputation continued to spread itself over the whole Christian world, insomuch, that Pope Clement IV, one of the wisest and worthiest men that for many years had been raised to that dignity, wrote him a letter, desiring that he would send him all his works (q). This was in 1266, when our author was in the flower of his age, and who, to gratify his Holiness, collected together, greatly enlarged and ranged in some order, the several pieces he had written before that time, and sent them the next year by his favourite disciple John of London, or rather, of Paris, to the Pope (r). This collection, which is the same that himself intituled Opus Majus, or his great work, is yet extant [D]. It is said, that this learned book of his procured him the favour of that Pontiff and

[D] This collection, which himself intituled Opus Majus, or his great work, is yet extant. As this has been esteemed, and with great justice, the most perfect of all our author's works, and is indeed in some measure, a complete system of science, built upon his principles of free inquiry, and useful experiments; so it is requisite, that we should give as large and full an account of the motives which engaged him to compose it, as, at this distance of time, it is possible for us to acquire; the rather, because though much has been said on this subject, especially by the learned and excellent Dr Jebb, whose industry and care in making it publick, can never be too much admired or applauded; yet some circumstances there are, that still require some light, which if we can bring, it is certainly our duty, and what we ought not to neglect, as well out of regard to the memory of so extraordinary a person, as what we owe to the publick, for the kind reception they have already afforded to our endeavours of a like kind. It was the opinion of the famous Dr John Dee, who published an edition of another work of our author's, that his Opus Majus, was addressed to Pope Clement III (22); which was certainly an egregious error, since that Pope died above twenty years before Roger Bacon was born: We shall hereafter account for the occasion of this strange mistake, and at present content ourselves with observing, that there is unquestionable authority for asserting that our author composed this work, at the request of Clement IV, before he was raised to that dignity; and in order to clear this point, it will be necessary, to give a succinct account of this excellent person. He was descended of a noble family in the province of Languedoc, in the kingdom of France, and his name was Gui le Gros Fulcodi; he applied himself in his youth to the study of the Law, and distinguished himself at the bar to so high a degree, as to be stiled the light of that science (23). After the decease of his wife, by whom he had several children, he entered into the ecclesiastical state, and rose gradually to the Archbishoprick of Narbonne in 1259, in which high station he conducted himself with such piety and prudence, that in the month of December 1261, he was promoted by Pope Urban IV to the dignity of Cardinal Bishop of Sabina (24), and was afterwards declared his Legate in England, in order to compose the dissensions which reigned there, between Henry III and his Barons. These rose however to such a height before he could get to England, that he found himself obliged to continue at Boulogne, where he remained a long time; and having called together several English Bishops, that were then beyond the seas, by their advice and consent he excommunicated such as took up arms against their prince (25), and having committed the execution of the censure to those Bishops, he set out for Rome; but being arrived at Perugia, he there met with the news of his being elected Pope. He then continued his journey to Rome with the utmost diligence, in the habit of a mendicant Friar; and on his arrival, did all that in his power lay, to avoid accepting that high dignity, but finding his endeavours to no purpose, he applied himself with the utmost diligence to the discharge of his duty, which he performed with such apostolick severity, that never any Pope was more feared or beloved. He was such an enemy to pluralities, that he obliged his nephew who had three Prebends, to relinquish two of them, and behaved in every other respect in such a manner, as very plainly shewed, that he had nothing so much in view as the Reformation of the Church (26). It is no wonder, that so wise, so great, and so good a man, should have a just esteem for the merits of Friar Bacon, or that he should condemn the weak and foolish calumnies that had been spread to his prejudice. It was probably during his stay at Boulogne, that he sent letters to our author by Raymond de Lauduno, earnestly desiring that he would send him his works, which at first our Monk declined, because the chief persons of his order had forbid him to communicate any of his writings, to any person whatever, on pain of losing them, and being compelled to live many days on bread and water (27); but when he afterwards heard, that the Cardinal Legate, was raised to the pontifical dignity, and had taken the name of Clement IV, our author out of reverence to the Holy See, signified to him by letter, that he was ready to perform what his Holiness had desired. The Pope immediately wrote in answer, that he was extremely well pleased with the readiness which he had expressed, and commanded him by his apostolick authority, and notwithstanding any injunctions laid upon him, by the chief persons of his order, or others, to send him what he had required by his former messenger, assuring him that he would take order, with respect to those matters of which he had complained. This letter, dated at Viterbo the tenth of the kalends of July, in the second year of his pontificate (28), no sooner came to the hands of our author, than he prepared to satisfy his own promise, and the Pope's request. When he had finished his great work, which, as we shall presently shew the reader, contains a complete circle of learning for the time in which it was written, he resolved to send it to the Pope by a disciple of his own, whom he had instructed while he was writing it, in all the sciences of which it treats. There has been a prevailing mistake with regard to the name of this youth, which almost all our writers will have to be John of London (29), and they quote our author Bacon himself to prove it; yet it is very certain that he says no such thing, as his learned editor Dr Jebb has well observed, but, on the contrary, has distinguished him from John of London, who the same gentleman very ingeniously, and, I think, very truly, guesses to have been John Peccam, a monk of the Franciscan order, then at London, and who was afterwards Archbishop of Canterbury (30). Whereas, this John sent by our author with his book, was, as himself tells us therein, a poor boy, but of quick and lively parts, whom Bacon undertook to instruct with a view, as well to the boy's advantage, as to make an experiment of the possibility of infusing, by the new and natural method which he had invented, the principles of all the sciences in a very short space of time, which succeeded very happily; yet such was the modesty of our author, that instead of taking occasion from hence to boast, either of his own or his scholar's abilities, he draws from it this judicious conclusion, viz. that there was no room to conceive any high notions of the perfection of human wisdom, when it was possible in a year's time, to teach a young man, all that with the utmost industry and application, a zealous enquirer after knowledge, was able either to acquire or to discover in the space of twenty or even of forty years (31). It is also a conjecture of the editor's, that this young man whom others have stiled John of London, ought rather to be supposed to be John of Paris, because to one of that name there are several epistles addressed by our author, which is so just and reasonable an account, that I think a better can hardly be given of this extraordinary young scholar (32). It is very surprizing, that this large and excellent work, should remain so long buried in obscurity, but it is very happy for the learned world, that at length it has been delivered from dust and oblivion, and sent abroad with all the advantages imaginable, as it is at present in a beautiful

folio, neatly and accurately printed for William Bowyer at London, A. D. 1733, under the title of Fratri ROGERI BACON ordinis Minorum Opus Majus ad Clementem quartum Pontificem Romanum. Ex M.S. codice Dublinensi, cum aliis quibusdam collato, nunc primum editum. S. JEBB, M. D. The editor has prefixed a long epistle addressed to Dr Richard Mead, wherein he gives an account of his author and edition, and observes, that very few of his writings had been before published, though Leland, Balæus, and Pitæus, have given us a long catalogue of them; however he tells us, that Sir Kenelm Digby, and Dr George Langbain, Provost of Queen's College at Oxford, had formerly undertaken to publish Bacon's works, by the advice of Mr Selden, as appears from their letters to that great man, some extracts of which Dr Jebb has printed. Sir Kenelm Digby has this passage in his letter dated from Paris, the 11th of February 1637: Your collections concerning Bacon, I shall print before his works under your name. Dr Langbain in a letter dated January the 30th 1653, says, When I have heretofore made report to some judicious friends, of several passages in Friar Bacon's epistle to Pope Clement, which I perceive is the same with what you call, de utilitate scientiarum, they were very much taken, and suitors to me for a publication. In a letter dated February the 9th, 1653, he says, I am very much encouraged by your last, to resume those thoughts which I had laid aside, of publishing that piece of Dr Bacon: And in another, dated February the 20th 1653, he says, That latter copy is of so legible a hand, as unless I receive a countermand from you, I shall not long forbear to get it transcribed, with a purpose to print all together, for I judge it well deserves to be more publick. Dr Jebb had proposed to have published all his works about three years before his edition of the Opus Majus, but while he was engaged in that design, he was informed by letters from his brother at Dublin, that there was a manuscript in the college library there, which contained a great many treatises generally ascribed to Bacon, and disposed in such order, that that they seemed to form one compleat work; but the title was wanting, which had been carelessly torn off from the rest of the manuscript. The Doctor soon found that it was a collection of those tracts, which Bacon had written for the use of Pope Clement IV, and to which he had given the title of Opus Majus, since it appeared, that what he said of that work in his Opus Tertium, addressed to the same Pope, exactly suited with this; which contained an account, of almost all the new discoveries and improvements that he had made in the sciences; upon this account Dr Jebb laid aside his former design, and resolved to publish only an edition of this Opus Majus. The manuscripts which he made use of to compleat this edition, are as follows, 1. M.S. in the Cotton library, inscribed Jul. D. V. which contains the first part of the Opus Majus, under the title of a treatise de Utilitate Scientiarum. 2. Another M.S. in the same library marked Tib. C. V. containing the fourth part of the Opus Majus, in which is shewn the use of the Mathematicks in the sciences and affairs of the world, in the M.S. it is erroneously called the fifth part. 3. A M.S. in the library belonging to Corpus Christi in Cambridge, containing that portion of the fourth part which treats of Geography. 4. A manuscript of the fifth part containing a treatise upon Perspective, in the Earl of Oxford's library. 5. A M.S. in the library of Magdalen College Cambridge, comprehending the same Treatise of Perspective. 6. Two MSS in the King's library, communicated to the editor by Dr Richard Bentley, one of which contains the fourth part of Opus Majus, and the other the fifth part. The reader will probably be pleased, with the general account of a work, which till lately was imagined to have been lost, and which is esteemed the most considerable of all his writings. He opens it with observing, that there are four great impediments which hinder men from arriving at true and useful knowledge, which he lays down thus, I. Too great dependence upon authority. II. Allowing too great weight to custom. III. The fear of offending the vulgar. IV. The affectation of concealing ignorance, by the display of a specious appearance of knowledge. In order to remove these, he very fully and clearly states the nature and force of authority, experience, and reason, and shews how injurious to mankind mistakes upon these subjects may be, by misleading them into absurd and dangerous opinions, and hindering them from discerning truth. After handling these nice subjects in his six first chapters, he proceeds in his seventh to draw this conclusion, That we are not bound to adhere to every thing we hear or read, but that we ought strictly to examine the sentiments of those who have gone before us, to add where their notions appear defective, and to correct them, where we may conclude, with reason, that they have erred, but with modesty and decency. He supports this by various authorities from profane authors, and from the Fathers of the primitive Church. In his ninth chapter, he exposes the folly of affecting singularity; in the tenth, the danger of learned pride; and in the eleventh, the folly of being ashamed of ignorance, and striving rather to conceal than to remove it. In his twelfth, he complains that a great many parts of learning, and those too of the utmost importance, were neglected merely from the ignorance of mankind, and that the knowledge of languages and Mathematicks, though highly valued by the antients, were despised by the moderns, who endeavoured to vindicate themselves in that point, by the authority of some weak though good men. He shews that many of the Saints and Fathers were subject to the common infirmities of human nature, and, consequently, that their example ought not absolutely to determine our conduct; and in the following chapter he observes, that there were some peculiar reasons, which prevented them from applying themselves to Philosophy, and particularly, because Aristotle's books were not then translated into Latin, and they were extremely attached to Plato's writings, whose doctrines they found to be inconsistent with those of Aristotle. In his fourteenth chapter, he proceeds to mention other reasons, for the neglect of philosophy in the early ages of the Church, which neglect likewise continued among the later divines. In the last chapter, he addresses himself to Pope Clement, and tells him, that if it was not possible for him during his pontificate, to perfect the reformation of these vulgar errors, yet he might lay a foundation, so that his successors might, with greater facility, compleat what should be thus happily begun. In the first chapter of the second part, he maintains that there is one perfect kind of wisdom, which is contained in the holy scripture, from which source all real truth is derived. In the following chapters he demonstrates, that true Philosophy is not inconsistent with Divinity, but rather contributes to the true knowledge of the Deity and religion, which he confirms from the authority of the antient Christians themselves; and he tells us in the beginning of the seventh chapter, that the whole design of Philosophy consists in this, that we may know the Creator by means of the creature, and perceive the obligations which we are under from the excellence of his nature, and the good which he has exerted in the creation and preservation of mankind, with the assurances of a future felicity, to serve him with a proper reverence of mind, and regulation of our behaviour, according to the laws of justice and reason. In his third part, he shews largely the usefulness of grammar, and observes, that it is impossible for the Latins to attain the knowledge of those things which are necessary both in divine and human learning, without a proper skill in other languages, since the Old and New Testaments, are translated from the Hebrew and Greek, and Philosophy is likewise borrowed from those languages and the Arabic. And since it is impossible to preserve the propriety and force of one language in another; the consequence of this therefore is, that none of the Latins can obtain such a knowledge as is necessary in the Holy Scriptures and Philosophy, without understanding the original tongues from whence they are translated. The second consideration which he urges in proof of this is, that the translators had not words enough in Latin to express the terms of the sciences. In the third place he tells us, that it is necessary the translator should understand and then we find our author under new difficulties, from the same causes as before, but the storm now rose higher, and the General of his order, Jerom de Esculo, having heard his

understand the science which he treats of, and the languages which he translates from and into, whereas almost all of them have been extremely defective in every one of these points. The fourth reason is, that many things both in Philosophy and Divinity were still wanting to the Latins, of which he mentions many instances. The fifth, that as the sciences are delivered to the Latins from other languages, all among the Latins who treat of the sciences have made great use of those languages, and have employed a variety of Greek, Hebrew, Chaldee, and Arabic words. The sixth reason is, the necessity of correcting an infinite number of errors, both in the text of Divinity, as he files it, and that of Philosophy, which errors are not only in the letter, but likewise in the sense, and because errors are of more consequence in Divinity than Philosophy, he proceeds to point out the corruptions of the text of the Holy Scripture, the better to shew the necessity of the knowledge of the original tongues, in order to correct them. His seventh is, that it is necessary for the Latins to understand the languages, even supposing the text were pure and uncorrupt, in order to obtain the true sense of the words amidst the variety of interpretations. His last reason for this necessity of the tongues is, that the grammar of the Latin is derived from the Greek and Hebrew. Our author's fourth part is designed to shew the use of Mathematicks in the sciences, as also in the affairs and employments of this world. In the first chapter he tells us, that these are four capital sciences without which the rest cannot be understood, but by the knowledge of which, any person may make a progress without any difficulty both in divine and human learning; that the key of these sciences is the Mathematicks, which holy men discovered from the beginning of the world, which was always in use among wise men above other sciences; but that the neglect of this for thirty or forty years past, had destroyed all true learning among the Latins, since a person who is not conversant in that science can never understand the rest, nor the affairs of this world, as he shews in the course of his work; and what is still worse, those who are ignorant of it do not perceive their ignorance, and therefore seek no remedy: Whereas on the other hand, the knowledge of the Mathematicks prepares the mind for complete skill in all things; so that if men make themselves masters of this, as the foundation of their studies, and apply it to the other sciences in a proper manner, they may then be able to attain what follows with the utmost facility, and without any error or doubt: But without the assistance of the Mathematicks, neither the preceding nor consequent parts of learning can be obtained, since the study of it is the only means of opening the way to farther improvement in knowledge. In the second chapter he shews from authority, that every one of the sciences requires the knowledge of the Mathematicks: And in the third, he demonstrates the same from reason. In the second distinction of the fourth part, he shews the necessity of that science, in order to understand the things of this world. In the third and fourth distinctions he lays down mathematical principles, for the explication of several of the phenomena of the universe, and examines into the nature of the several climates of the world, especially of those near the poles and the middle of the earth. In the fifth chapter of the fourth distinction, he treats of the cause of the ebbing and flowing of the sea: And in the seventh chapter, of the infinity of matter. In the eighth chapter, he enquires whether bodies touch each other in a point: And in the ninth he treats of the figure of the universe, which he determines to be spherical, and asserts, that the earth is likewise of the same form. In the twelfth chapter he endeavours to shew, that there are no more worlds, nor suns, nor moons than one, and that matter is not extended in infinitum. In the thirteenth, he treats of the unity of time: And in the fourteenth he shews, that motion occasions heat. In the fifteenth, he speaks of the motion of a balance. After having shewn the necessity of Mathematicks in human affairs and sciences, he proceeds then to shew it likewise in those which are divine, and he observes, that since he had proved that Philosophy cannot be understood without Mathematicks, and since every one perceived that Divinity cannot be understood without Philosophy; it follows therefore, that a Divine is obliged to acquire the knowledge of the Mathematicks. He next shews, that all holy men have made use of the Mathematicks, and alleges seven reasons, to prove the study fit and necessary to a Divine, more especially, from the use of Astronomy and Chronology in the explication of the Scriptures, and in doing this, he enters into several curious enquiries, as to those sciences and Musick; he then answers the objections urged against Mathematicks, and particularly that which is drawn from the unlawfulness of judiciary Astrology, upon which occasion he observes; that true Astrologers do not pretend to an absolute certainty in their judgments, nor assert that human actions are necessarily determined by the influence of the stars, but always proceed upon the supposition of human liberty. He exposes next the errors in the kalendar, points out the causes of them, and proposes most judiciously the means of reforming them, of which we shall hereafter speak more largely. The next subject he handles is, the use of Mathematicks in the practice of Physick, which he shews must vary according to the difference of climates, which gives him an opportunity of discoursing very largely upon that head. He makes a natural transition from thence to the influence of the heavenly bodies, in discoursing of which he informs us, that the number of fixed stars in his time, was held to be one thousand and twenty two, and much time he spends in shewing the possibility of the celestial influences on terrestrial bodies, in which he shows a prodigious reading. We come now to the fifth part of his Opus Majus, which contains his Treatise of Perspective, which is one of the most curious pieces in his whole book, for in the third part of it, he very copiously discourses of reflected and refracted vision, and from thence explains the nature of a vast variety of glasses: To this part of his work is added his famous treatise de Multiplicatione Specierum. The sixth part of his Opus Majus is concerning experimental knowledge, in the first chapter of which he says, that having thus laid the foundation of learning in Languages, Mathematicks, and Perspective, he shall proceed to the science of experiments, since nothing can be sufficiently understood without experiments; for he observes that there are two methods of obtaining knowledge, one by argument or reason, and the other by trial or experiment; an argument determines a question and obliges us to determine it, but it does not give us absolute certainty or remove all doubt, so that the mind cannot acquiesce in the perception of truth, unless it discover it by way of experiment; many persons know arguments enough in the several parts of knowledge, but not having made experiments they are negligent, and do not avoid and pursue what they ought to do. He observes that this science of experiments, has three great prerogatives beyond all other sciences; the first of which is, that it examines the noble conclusions of those sciences by experience, and this he illustrates by a long explication of the phenomenon of the rainbow; the second prerogative of it is, that it discovers several truths within the limits of the other sciences, which could not be found out by means of those sciences themselves; he mentions some instances, which he tells us he knew by experience to be true: the first instance is as follows; Mathematicks, says he, can easily produce a spherical instrument, in which are described all the parts of the heavens which are necessary, according to the longitudes and latitudes, with the proper circles agreeable to Ptolemy's method in his Almagest: But it is not in the power of the Mathematicks to cause a body of that form to move naturally with a diurnal motion, whereas a man perfectly skilled in Experimental Philosophy, is able to devise various methods towards accomplishing that motion, being induced to it by many things which follow the motion of the heavenly bodies; as in the first place, the three elements, which are moved circularly by the celestial influences, then the comets, seas, rivers, marrow, the brains of animals, and the matter of his cause, ordered him to be imprisoned (2). This is said to have happened in 1278, and we are farther told, that to prevent his appealing to Pope Nicholas III, that General diseases; plants likewise open and shut themselves according to the sun's motion. The Philosopher therefore, is excited by the consideration of these things, which have some resemblance to what he intends, so that he may possibly be able at last to compleat his design. Such an instrument as this, he says, would be worthy a King's treasure, and the instruments of Astronomy and clocks would become useless. He draws his second instance from the use of experiments in Physick, in respect to which he says, that a medicine might be found capable of extending human life much beyond it's ordinary length. On this subject he discourses very copiously, shewing his great learning and exquisite judgment, interspersing therein a multitude of very curious relations, all tending to prove the possibility of prolonging life, and retarding the inconveniences of old age by the help of philosophick medicines. His third example he draws from Alchemy, which he defines an art, by which the baser metals may be converted into the purer, so that gold may be made from lead, and silver from copper. This art he allows is liable to many fraudulent practices, notwithstanding which he avers, that such an art there is, as is not only capable of converting base metals into gold, but also of exalting gold itself far beyond that degree of purity which it receives from nature, which secret, he says, is not only of the greatest use to mankind, in furnishing as much as may be desired of that precious metal, but also of infinitely greater consequence in prolonging life. For, continues he, that medicine which taketh away all the foulness and corruptions of a baser metal, so as to convert it into the purest silver and gold, is by wise men esteemed likewise capable, of wholly purging out the corruptions of the human body, and this, says he, is that extraordinary medicine before mentioned (33). Nam illa medicina quæ tolleret omnes immunditias et corruptiones vitioris metalli, ut ferret argentum et aurum purissimum, æstimatur a sapientibus posse tollere corruptiones corporis humani in tantum, ut vita per multa secula prolongaret, et hoc est corpus ex elementis temperatum, de quo prius dictum est. The third prerogative of this science of experiments is, as he tells us, proper and essential thereto, which, without having regard to other sciences, by it's own power investigates the secrets of nature, and this acts doubly, first, in bestowing the knowledge of things, past, present, and to come; and secondly, in admirable operations, far exceeding any thing that can be wrought by what is stiled Judiciary Alrology. In proof of this he alleges, not only many authorities but many instances; he speaks of a kind of bitumen called malta, capable of burning men even through armour; and hints to us that it was by the use of something like gunpowder with which their pots were filled, that Gideon with a handful of men did such dreadful execution in the camp of the Midianites (34), and many other things of a like nature he touches upon; insinuating to the Pope, that where verses, superstitious rites, and charms, are made use of, it is not from any belief in the force of those circumstances, in such as use them, but barely to cover and conceal the wonderful effects of natural causes from the knowledge of the vulgar. He labours therefore assiduously, in the close of his work, to persuade the Pontiff, to whom it is addressed, to countenance and encourage this kind of experimental knowledge, by reason of the many and great advantages, which may be deduced from thence, for the protection of the Church and Common-wealth, and for the reduction of the enemies of both. In reference to the last he maintains, that much greater and more extraordinary things, have been performed by the power of wisdom than by force of arms, of which he assures us, an infinite number of examples might be deduced. 'But I, continues he, will mention but one of all these, which is that of Alexander the Great, who when he marched out of Greece to subdue the whole world, had no more than thirty-two thousand foot, and four thousand five hundred horse; yet, as Orosius says in his treatise addressed to Augustin, with this handful of people he attempted this great design, in which it is hard to say, whether it be more wonderful that he succeeded, or that he durst undertake it. In his first engagement with King Darius, he slew six hundred thousand Persians, with the loss of one hundred and twenty horse, and nine foot only of his own army. In the second battle, he destroyed forty thousand men, yet lost of his own army but one hundred and thirty foot, and one hundred and fifty horse, by which, the rest of the afflicted world was easily subdued. But Orosius says, that it was not less by skill than valour that the Macedonians conquered. Nor do I wonder at this, since Aristotle, as we read in his life, attended the King in his wars. And Seneca also in his Natural Questions informs us, that Alexander conquered, having Aristotle and Calisthenes for his instructors, who were his masters in all kind of science. But Aristotle was in all respects the chief, and it plainly appears from what has been before said, how by the effects of wisdom Aristotle might deliver up the world to his master Alexander; and this the Church ought to consider in her disputes against Infidels and rebels, that the effusion of Christian blood may be prevented, and more especially upon account of the great dangers to which the Church will be exposed in the times of Antichrist, which, with the blessing of God, may be easily prevented, if Prelates and Princes would promote study, and the searching out the secrets of nature and art (35)."

Sed nunc offero unum pro omnibus de Alexandro Magno, qui quum de Græcia profectus esset, ut mundum expugnaret, non habuit peditem nisi triginta duo millia & equitum quatuor millia & quingentos; tamen, ut dicit Orosius ad Augustinum, in libro de Ormesta mundi, inferens hæc tam parva manu bellum universo terrarum orbi, utrum admirabilis sit quod vicit aut quod aggredi ausus fuerit, incertum est. Primo ergo cum Dario rege congressu sexcenta millia Persarum profstravit, sed in suo exercitu centum viginti equites & novem pedites defuere; in secunda vero congressu devicit, quadraginta millia hominum, & de suo exercitu centum triginta pedites et centum quinquaginta equites ceciderunt; per hoc residuum mundi territum facilius subiecit. Sed Orosius dicit, non minus arte quam virtute Macedonum superavit. Nec mirum, cum Aristoteles fuerit cum eo in his bellis, ut legimus in vita Aristotelis. Et etiam Seneca in naturalibus dicit, quod mundum vicit Alexander Aristotele & Calisthene ducibus, quod magistri ei fuerunt in omni sapientia. Sed Aristoteles extitit principalis & facile patet per prædicta, quomodo per vias sapientiæ potuit Aristoteles mundum tradere Alexandro; & hoc deberet ecclesia considerare contra infideles & rebelles ut parcat sanguini Christiano; & maxime propter futura pericula in temporibus Antichristi, quibus cum Dei gratia facile esset obviare, si Prelati & Principes studium promoverent, & secreta naturæ & artis indagarent. Such is the conclusion of this famous piece, of which we have given the English reader, as exact and as full an account as was consistent with the nature of our plan. We were the rather inclined to this, because as this great work was originally written, so it is like to continue, in the Latin tongue, which makes such an extract as we have given, absolutely necessary for the use of such, as cannot with facility go through a folio volume in that language. This extract likewise fully justifies and confirms all that has been delivered in the text, either as to the wonderful abilities, assiduous application, or prodigious progress made by Friar Bacon in all the sciences. Whoever considers either the matter of his Opus Majus or the manner of it, and reflects at the same time on the state of learning in general in the thirteenth century, will need few arguments to convince him, that Roger Bacon was the wonder of his age and country, and in every respect as great and good a man, as he is represented to have been by such as best understood his worth. The learned editor of his work, the ingenious and judicious Dr Jebb observes very truly, that it does not appear from any thing contained in the Opus Majus, that our author Bacon, either meant to defend himself from the imputation of magick, or that he was so much as apprized that ever he was accused thereof to the Pope. But though this appears very clearly, yet I must take leave to observe, that both in this and in all the other works of our author which are still remaining, there are abundance of passages which of his order, procured a confirmation of his sentence from Rome immediately (u), but it is not very easy to say, upon what pretences this condemnation was founded [E]. Yet we are told by others, that he was imprisoned by Reymundus Galfredus, who was General of his order, on account of some Alchemical treatise which he had written but that this man afterwards set him at liberty, and became his scholar (x). However obscure the nature and circumstances of his troubles may be, thus much is clear and certain enough, that they endured for many years, and must have brought him very low, since he was sixty-four years of age when he was first put in prison, and consequently the less able to sustain the hardships he endured, which were without question so much the more grievous, as they deprived him of the opportunity of prosecuting his studies, at least in the way of experiments, for that he was still indulged the use of his books, appears very clearly from the great use he made of them, in the learned works he composed, even under these misfortunes (y). Pope Nicholas III, dying in the year 1280, Simon de Brie, Cardinal of St Cecilia, was elected Pope, and took the title of Martin IV, who with great trouble and perplexity held that dignity about four years, and was then succeeded by Cardinal Savelli, who took the name of Honorius IV, in the year 1285. His reign also was full of troubles and very short, so that we not wonder, that in all this time our

shew his great willingness to set the world right about Magick, Necromancy, and other unlawful arts, of which to be sure he thought very justly, and as it became a wise man to do; for it is manifest that he conceived them in many cases to be meer vanities, and the idle delusions of weak minds; that in many other, he looked upon them as fraudulent practices, invented and used by knaves for the better deceiving of fools; and that in some few, he beheld them in the light, of specious but innocent pretences for covering that science, which it was not fit to reveal to the vulgar, and thereby keep up their ignorance with their admiration. But as for our author himself, it is very evident that he was not in the least infected with any of these narrow notions, but would most willingly have communicated all that he knew to the whole republick of Letters, and if ever he seems either to think or to act in a manner different from this, there is the justest reason to conclude that he was forced thereto by the circumstances he was under, of which we shall have occasion to mention some instances, before we part with his memoirs. This Opus Majus of Bacon, was not only addressed or dedicated to Pope Clement IV, but is, in fact, a discourse or epistle written entirely to him, and in which all that is delivered is particularly adapted to his use, yet without any mixture either of meanness or flattery; for our author tells him plainly, that as from the nature of his high office, the welfare or the suffering of the Christian world must, in a great measure depend on him, so it was from a just sense of this, and from a thorough persuasion that he would never be able to instruct others well, if he had not first right notions of true and useful knowledge himself, that he therefore thought himself bound in duty, especially when required thereto by his Holiness's letter, to exhibit this summary of science to his view, that he might the better perceive the consequence of giving a right turn to the studies of the rising generation, and prefer true taste and solid learning to that false shew of both, which had so long and generally prevailed, to the unspeakable detriment both of Church and State.

[E] It is not easy to say on what pretences this condemnation was founded. We need wonder the less at the great uncertainty which attends this matter of fact, if we consider how extremely difficult a thing it is, to obtain clear and perfect lights into matters of this nature, which happen in our own country, and as it were under our eyes. But the difficulty of the thing will not acquit us, from the obligation we are under of giving the best account of this transaction, that at this distance of time can be attained. After the death of his patron Clement IV, Gregory X ascended the pontifical throne, and on his death Innocent V and John XXI succeeded in one year, and to John succeeded Nicholas III (36), in the second year of whose reign our author's doctrine was condemned. The General of his order was at that time, Hieronymus de Efulo, an Italian by birth, and called in his own country, Jerom de Acoli, a man of a severe temper, but one who was neither deficient in probity or learning. He is said to have condemned the doctrine of Friar Bacon at Paris, by the advice of the brethren of his order, to have forbidden any of the brethren to study or follow it, and to have ordered it's author to be confined in prison, and all this because, as Bale tell us, his books contained some suspected novelties (37). Spondanus sets down the matter in much the same terms (38): 'This year, says he, the doctrine of Roger Bacon, an Englishman, was condemned on account of some suspected novelties, for he who was in all sorts of learning and in every kind of study and science perfectly well versed, and subtle to a miraculous degree, while employed in the most curious discoveries in Mathematicks and Philosophy, to which he was every way equal, was by the vulgar looked upon as a Conjurer and Magician.' Hoc anno inquit, damnata est doctrina Rogerii Baconis Angli, propter aliquas novitates suspectas, quippe qui in omni doctrinae facultatis, et scientia genere versatissimus, et ad miraculum subtilis dum Mathematicam et Philosophiam naturalem curiosius, quam par erat inquireret, vulgò habitus est Praestigiator et Magus. But another author who treats more particularly, of the transactions of the Franciscans here in England informs us, what the several treatises were, which upon this occasion the General of his order condemned, and he reports them to be his several tracts de Necromanticis, de Prognosticis ex stellis, and de Astronomia Vera (39). As to the other story mentioned in the text, it is reported by Anthony Wood, who tells us, he found it at the end of a manuscript formerly belonging to the Earl of Dorset, in these words (40). 'Here ends the brief discourse (verbum abbreviatum) the work of Reymundus Galfredus, General of the order of Friars Minors, which said discourse he had from Brother Roger Bacon, who was of the order of Friars Preachers, which is a mistake, for he was also of the order of Franciscans, and the said Roger for this very work, at the command of the said Reymundus, by the Brethren of the same order was taken and imprisoned; but Reymundus released Roger out of prison, who taught him this work, and the said Roger was himself the disciple of Brother Albert.' Wood likewise tells us, that he met with an entry of the same kind in another Alchemical treatise, titled Breve Brevariarum fratris Rogerii Bacon ex dono Dei, which has been likewise attributed to this Reymundus Galfridus, though it is printed among other Chemical pieces of our author Bacon's in Germany (41). To speak my own opinion freely, I consider this story as an invention of the modern Alchemists, though I can say nothing as to the treatise itself, having never had an opportunity to examine it. This imprisonment of our author, consisted in his being shut up in his apartment in his monastery, in his being deprived of conversation and obliged to a very severe abstinence; all which agreed very little with his free and cheerful disposition; so that one may truly wonder, how, under such oppressions as these, he was able not only to support life, but to maintain such a constancy of mind, as enabled him to revise and augment his former performances, to enlarge his Astronomical tables, and to take all the care he could, his labours should be transmitted with some degree of perfection to posterity (42). But the hopes of having justice done him after death, enabled him to bear the miseries of life; and his confidence, of future fame, lessened the sense of present calamities.

author could never find an opportunity of applying to the Holy See, for the mitigation or repeal of the sentence pronounced against him (z). But when he had been ten years in prison, Jerom de Ascoli, who had condemned his doctrine, was chosen Pope, and assumed the name of Nicholas IV (a). As he was the first of the Franciscan order that had ever arrived at this dignity, was reputed a person of great probity and much learning, our author, notwithstanding what had before happened, resolved to apply to him for his discharge; and in order to pacify his resentment, and at the same time to shew both the innocence and the usefulness of his studies, he addressed to him a very learned and curious treatise, On the Means of avoiding the Infirmities of old age (b) [F]. [F] On the means of avoiding the infirmities of old age. Upon the decease of Pope Honorius IV, the Cardinals then at Rome assembled at his palace, which was near St Sabina, in order to elect a successor. As this happened in the very heat of summer, which is never a very healthy season at Rome, a kind of malignant fever broke out amongst them, which in a very short space carried off six or seven, and so frightened the rest, that they quitted the place of election, and retired each to his own palace; this Jerom de Ascoli, then Cardinal Bishop of Palestrina, was the only person that remained in the palace, where he secured his health by a very ingenious and philosophical contrivance; for perceiving that the distemper was bred by the foulness and stagnation of the air, he very wisely directed fires to be made in all the rooms of the palace, notwithstanding the heat of the weather, by which he caused a new and brisk circulation of that fluid, and so preserved himself in perfect health, when his associates despaired of it (43). When the Cardinals unanimously chose the Cardinal of Palestrina, Pope, who, in gratitude to his benefactor Nicholas III, took the name of Nicholas IV. I have mentioned this circumstance attending his election, to shew that he was a person of great abilities, and one who had turned his thoughts to philosophical studies (44). It was in all probability the knowledge of this, that induced Roger Bacon to aim at acquiring his favour by writing this treatise. If it be true that our author was more closely confined by the directions of this Pontiff, I should imagine it must have been in the very beginning of his reign, and that Bacon addressed this book to the Pope, to shew him how falsely he had been represented, and how innocent and useful his studies were. He divided his work into three books, which, as we shall shew hereafter, was the reason, that such as made a catalogue of our author's writings, have represented these as three distinct treatises (45). In the second chapter of his work he discovers the person, (tho' very obscurely) to whom it was addressed, for having laid down these principles, that the infirmities of old age are to be avoided and kept off, first, by a regular course of life, and next, by the use of certain secret and extraordinary medicines, he proceeds thus, 'The doctrine of soberly ordering one's life, teacheth how to oppose, drive away, and restrain, the causes of old age; and this it does by appropriating the six causes distinct in kind, which are reckoned necessary to fence, preserve, and keep the body, which things when they are observed and taken in quantity and quality as they ought, and as the rules of Physicians persuade, do become the true causes of health and strength; but when they are made use of by any man without regard to quality and quantity, they cause sickness, as may be gathered from Galen's regimen with Haly's exposition, where he treats of the regimen of health. But exactly to find out the true proportion of these causes, and the true degree of that proportion, is very hardly, or not at all to be done, but that there will be some defect or excess therein: Thus the sages have prescribed more to be done than can be well put in practice, for the understanding is more subtle in operation, so that the true portioning of these causes seems impossible, unless in bodies of a better nature, such as now are rarely found: But medicines obscurely laid down by the Antients, and as it were concealed, whereof Dioscorides speaks, do make up these defects and proportions, for who can avoid the air infected with putrid vapours, carried about with the force of the winds? Who will measure out meat and drink? Who can weigh, in a sure scale or degree, sleep and watching, motion and rest, and things that vanish in a moment, and the accidents of the mind, so that they shall neither exceed nor fall short? Therefore it was necessary that the Antients should make use of medicines, which might in some measure preserve the body from alteration, and defend the health of man, oft-times much hurt and afflicted with these things and causes; least the body, utterly eaten up of diseases, should fall to ruin. Now for the benefit of Your Excellency, I have gathered some things out of the books of the Antients, whose virtue and use may avert those inconveniencies, keep off this defect and weakness; may defend the temper of the innate moisture, may hinder the increase and flux of extraneous moisture, and may bring to pass (which usually otherwise happeneth) that the heat of man be not so soon debilitated. But the use of these things and medicines are of no service, nor any thing avails them that neglect the doctrine of the regimen of life; for how can it be, that he who either is ignorant or negligent of diet, should ever be cured by any pains of the Physician, or by any virtue in physick? Wherefore the Physicians and wise men of old time were of opinion, that diet without physick sometimes did good, but that physick without due order of diet never made a man one grain the better. Thence it is reckoned more necessary, that such rather should be treated of which cannot be known, unless of the wife, and those too of a quick understanding, and such as study hard and take a great deal of pains, than those things which are easily known, even as a man reads them. As for my own part, being hindred partly by the charge, partly by impatience, and partly by the rumours of the vulgar, I was not willing to make experiment of all things, which may easily be tried by others, but have resolved to express those things in obscure and difficult terms, which I judge requisite for the conservation of health, lest they should fall into the hands of the Infidels. One of which lies in the bowels of the earth (46); another in the sea (47); the third creeps upon the earth (48); the fourth lives in the air (49); the fifth is likened to the medicine which comes out of the mine of the noble animal (50); the sixth cometh out of the long lived animal (51); the seventh is that whose Mine is the plant of India (52). I have resolved to mention these things obscurely, imitating the precept of the Prince of the Philosophers to Alexander, who said that he is a transgressor of the divine law, who discovers the hidden secrets of nature and the properties of things; because some men desire as much as in them lies to overthrow the divine law, by those properties that God has placed in animals, plants, and stones. But some of these things stand in need of preparation, others of a careful choice: Of preparation, lest with the healthful part poison be swallowed down; of choice, lest among the best those things that are worse be given, and those that are more hurtful be taken.' Thus the reader plainly discerns, that the obscurities in this treatise of our author, are not such as proceeded from vanity, affectation, respect to custom, or any other weakness of mind; but from pure concern for his own safety, and fear of drawing upon himself greater evils than he had yet suffered. This treatise was first printed at Oxford in 1590, and has been since translated into English by Dr Richard Browne, under the title of The Cure of Old Age and Preservation of Youth. Shewing how to cure and keep off the accidents of Old Age, and how to preserve the Youth, Strength, and Beauty of Body, and the Senses, and all the Faculties of both Body and Mind; by that great Mathematician and Physician Roger Bacon, a Franciscan Friar (53): He added notes upon every chapter of this appear however, that either his application, or the method he took to soften his Holiness's temper, had any great effect; on the contrary, some writers say, that he caused him to be more closely confined (c). But however that matter might be, towards the latter end of his reign, Fryar Bacon, by the interposition of some noblemen, obtained his release, and returned to Oxford, where, at the request of his friends, and very probably of those who were most instrumental in obtaining his liberty, he composed, old as he was, and after all the hard usage he had met with, A Compendium of Theology, which seems to have been his last work (d) [G]. He spent the remainder of his days in peace, and dying in the college of his order, on the eleventh of June, 1292 (e), as some say, or in 1294 (f), as others assert, was interred in the church of the Franciscans (g) [H]. These are all the circumstances, that with the utmost care and diligence we have been able to collect, concerning the life and actions of this great man, whose deep science and vast penetration, enabled him to make such a prodigious progress in all useful knowledge, that even the wisest and ablest men of later times, read his works with astonishment, and readily confess, that he was well distinguished (however ill they treated him in other respects) by the title the Monks gave him of Doctor Mirabilis (b) [I], or, the Wonderful Doctor, which most certainly he deserved, in whatever sense this work, and explains therein the phrases by which our author concealed his secret medicines. He will have that which lives in the air to be Rosemary, but I have seen some Latin annotations in which it is supposed to be Rue, the reader will judge of these interpretations as he thinks fit. It may not be amiss to observe, that Dr Browne likewise explains the fifth medicine, which is said to resemble what comes out of the mine of the noble animal, and he conceives it to be the youthful heat of a maid, and cites the instance of Abibag, who was given for this purpose to King David; others have thought that it was an extract or quintessence of human blood, and some again have fancied that it was some kind of precious stone; for my own part I must confess, it does not appear to me so clearly, as that I dare pronounce what it is, but it sufficiently appears, that none of these interpretations can satisfy a rational enquirer, especially one who is well acquainted with our author's exactness. It were to be wished that some ingenious and skilful physician would review this work, and compare it with others of the same kind, more especially with that excellent treatise written by the Lord Chancellor Bacon (54) upon the same subject; by which method many discoveries might be made, and this most important topic set in a light capable of being turned to the advantage, whereas hitherto it has served for little more than the amusement, of mankind.

[G] A Compendium of Theology, which seems to have been his last work. This work, of which there is still a copy preserved in the royal library, is divided into two parts; in the first of which the author proposes, by a free enquiry into the nature of true science, to find out the causes of errors, and the several manners in which men have erred in this study, that truth, and the proper method of pursuing it, might the more evidently appear; in the second, he makes it his business to establish capital truths, and to unfold and expose all sorts of errors and mistakes (55). But it is at least probable from the titles of various MSS. that our author afterwards added three other treatises, or parts, to this work (56) of his, which we should not have mentioned particularly, if it had not afforded us an opportunity of fixing the date of this book, and consequently in some measure of our author's life, since it is certain that he did not long survive the writing it; for in this book he tells us, that among the forward and rash professors, whose vehemence and impetuosity contributed greatly to the hindrance of true learning, he knew one Richard of Cornwall, the worst and foolishlest of them all, who was in great credit with the silly multitude, though despised and rejected by the wiser sort, at Paris, for the errors which he invented and propagated, when he read there publicly the sentences before he read at Oxford, which was in the year 1250, from which time, says he, to the present, many of this man's errors still prevail, though it be now forty years ago and more. Et optime novissimum & subtilissimum istorum, qui vocatus est Richardus Cornubiensis, famosissimus apud sultam multitudinem, sed apud sapientis fuit infamis & probatus Parisiis propter errores quas invenerat & promulgaverat, quando solemniter legebat sententias ibidem, prius quam legeret sententias Oxoniae ab anno Domini

1250. Ab illo 1250, igitur tempore remansit multitudo in hujus magistri erroribus usque nunc, sc. per quadraginta annos & amplius (57). It is sufficiently evident from this passage, that our author did not compose this work before the year 1291, and as he made several additions to it he must have lived some time longer, but as to the exact time of his death, we shall give the reader the best account of it we can in the succeeding note.

[H] Was interred in the church of the Franciscans. The time of this great man's death, is as differently reported as are most of the accidents of his life; and we may justly attribute thereto, many of the mistakes that have been made about his history and writings, and therefore we shall labour to clear up this point, as far as at this distance of time it is possible. The famous Leland tells us, that he died at Oxford, and was buried in the church of the Franciscans in the year 1248 (58), which is very amazing, since he elsewhere tells us, that he both dedicated and sent his works to Pope Clement IV, who did not arrive at that dignity till the year 1265: It must however be allowed, that this mistake was occasioned by the setting down the time of Robert Bacon's death for that of Roger's, which in all probability the author would have corrected, if he had lived to put the last hand to his own work (59). Bale changes the date which Leland has given us, and places his death in 1284 (60), which is also a little strange, since he had seen his work, on the means of avoiding the infirmities of old age, which was writ in 1288 at the soonest: This error is transcribed by Pits, as indeed almost all Bale's errors are, notwithstanding he takes particular notice, not only of the book which he addressed to Pope Nicholas IV, but also of Bacon's Compendium of Theology, which he tells us, was contained with other treatises of our author's in two volumes, in the library of the Lord Lumley, which book; as we have clearly shewn, was written at least eight years after the time, which this author has fixed for his death (61). The learned Dr Cave speaks expressly of his being imprisoned at the command of Pope Nicholas IV (62), and says, that he did not know whether he was released or not, and yet he places his death in 1284, which is three years before Pope Nicholas was raised to that dignity, in which he is implicitly followed by Oudin, who is otherwise a very diligent and careful writer (63). Anthony Wood, from two MSS. which he mentions, fixes his death to the eleventh of June 1292; to which date the learned Dr Freind, who had taken great pains in the perusal of our author's works, adheres (64). The excellent editor of his Opus Majus, however, places it in 1294, about which time also, he thinks, his Compendium of Theology was written (65).

[I] By the title they gave him of Doctor Mirabilis. It was the custom of those times, to distinguish the characters of eminent scholars by such kind of appellations. Thus St Thomas Aquinas was called Doctor Angelicus, or the Angelic Doctor; Johannes Duns Scotus, Doctor Subtilis, or the Subtile Doctor; William Ockham, Doctor Singularis, or the Singular Doctor; but none of them were more expressive or à propos than this given our author, who appears as wonderful to us at the distance of four hundred and fifty years, as to the Monks of his order, who were his ſenſe the phraſe is taken. But it is not ſufficient to obſerve this in general terms, the fame of the man, the reſpect due to truth, and the regard we owe to the honour of our country, which in point of literary credit, has nothing greater to boaſt than the glory of producing ſuch a genius, require from us a more exact, authentick, and particular diſplay of his diſcoveries, in order to juſtify what has been already ſaid in his praife, and what will be hereafter delivered on the ſame ſubject, from the teſtimonies of others. If by doing this methodically, we can ſet his merits in a clearer and fuller light, or add any thing new on ſo curious and ſo important a ſubject, it will ſufficiently atone for the labour it requires, by adding to the pleaſure of the ingenious and inquiſitive reader. To begin then with the languages, which he thought the foundation of all true learning, as being abſolutely neceſſary to the peruſal of the beſt authors in ſeveral ſciences, in their originals; he not only underſtood them ſufficiently for that purpoſe, but was alſo a perfect maſter of the Latin, Greek, and Hebrew, and has left poſterity ſuch indubitable marks of his critical ſkill in them, as might have ſecured him a very high character, more eſpecially conſidering the age in which he lived, if he had not diſtinguiſhed himſelf in any other branch of literature. But his various knowledge in other reſpects, has made his ſkill in the languages leſs taken notice of than it ought to be (i) [K]. In all branches of the Mathematicks he was wonderfully well verſed, and there is ſcarce any part of them, on which he has not written with a ſolidity and clearneſs, which have been deſervedly admired by the greateſt maſters in that kind of ſcience. In reſpect to Mechanicks particularly, the learned Dr. Freind ſays very juſtly, that a greater genius had not ariſen ſince the days of Archimedes (k), the truth of which the reader will readily allow, when he has conſidered the contents of a ſingle page of one of his treatiſes [L]. He underſtood likewiſe the whole ſcience of Optics, to a ſurprizing degree

his contemporaries. Yet it is currently reported, that for ſome time, our author's books were perfecuted with as much malice as his perſon, as Dr Browne tells us, in his ſhort account of this great man's life; 'Many of Bacon's works, ſays he, and of Groſt-head's alſo, curiouſly written and well bound, were by ſome ignorant men, that would be accounted ſcholars, when they could not underſtand them, condemned for books of the Black Art, and ſo faſtened with long nails to the boards, they either became food for worms or moths, or rotted with mould and duſt.' This account was originally taken from John Twine (66). But Dr Langbain, who had once ſome thoughts of publiſhing Bacon's works, was far from being ſatiſfied as to the truth of it, as appears by the following paſſage, in a letter of his to the learned Selden, dated January the 20th 1653: 'I doubt whether the ſtory be probable, as the ſcene is laid by Twine, where Abbot Voche ſpeaks it, as done before his time, which, if true, I think, would not have eſcaped the knowledge of Leland; and conſidering he was ſo much an admirer of Bacon, and withal ſo highly angry with that houſe, for making his acceſs into their library ſo difficult, I do not ſee well how he could omit to have taken notice of it, &c. Though it be no neceſſary conſequence in Logick, to argue ab authoritate negativè, yet this authority, all circumſtances conſidered, makes it to me very probable (67). It is true, Leland ſays nothing of this particular, but he ſays, that it was as difficult to collect the works of Roger Bacon, as to find the Sibyls leaves. Another argument to prove that his fame and writings long laboured under the calumnies and aſperſions of the Monks, is the character afforded him by Biſhop Bale in the firſt edition of his work, when he was under thoſe prejudices reſulting from education, and had not applied himſelf, as he afterwards did, to the peruſal of our antient writers. We may add to this, the reports ſpread to his prejudice abroad, which could ariſe from nothing but the bold aſſertions of the Monks, who could not ſuſtain their own characters but at the expence of his, ſince they had perfecuted him ſo cruelly in his life-time, and that wholly on account of his writings. But what ſeems to put this matter out of diſpute, is the condition of ſcience in the next century; for had Roger Bacon's books been regarded or ſtudied, it muſt have been where it is at this day, our greateſt men having gone very little beyond him, whereas, in fact, it ſunk lower than where he found it.

[K] Made his ſkill in the languages leſs taken notice of than it ought to be. It is very certain from the account given us by Bacon himſelf, that Grammar was at a very low ebb in his time, and as for the learned languages they were not underſtood, at leaſt to any tolerable degree, by above three or four perſons whom he names. It is really matter of wonder how in ſuch an age he became ſo excellently knowing himſelf, for he was not only acquainted with Latin, Greek, and Hebrew, but with the Chaldee alſo, and was able to write grammars in them all. That part of his Opus Majus which treats of this ſubject is exceedingly curious and entertaining, in as much as it is written with a critical exactneſs (68). He ſhews his Holineſs therein, that all ſciences, human and divine, depend in ſome meaſure upon the languages; and in ſhewing this, he not only uſes the authorities of the Fathers and Doctours of the Chriſtian Church, and of the Philoſophers, but alſo of the Poets, particularly Horace and Statius; and he obſerves very pertinently, that the reading their works ſhould be encouraged, for the ſake of delighting the minds of young people, and engaging them to apply themſelves with diligence to the ſtudy of the languages; he even defends to pronunciation and quantity, which ſhews with how great accuracy he had ſtudied this ſubject, and how perfectly he was acquainted with every branch of it. To do him juſtice, the method and ſtile of his works, are as admirable as the matter of them, not that I would be underſtood to mean, he was a claſſical writer, for in that perhaps I might go beyond the truth, but his Latin ſtile is neat, ſtrong, and remarkably expreſſive, nor was there any writer of his age, perhaps we might carry it farther, that either knew how to range his matter better, or to bring it into a ſhorter compaſs; ſo that in all his treatiſes on ſuch a variety of ſubjects, he ſeems to have written with equal facility and judgment, leaving nothing perplexed or obſcure, either from a want or from a redundancy of words. It is very ſurprizing that ſome learned men have cenſured him, for believing it poſſible to teach the learned languages in a very ſhort compaſs of time, but it muſt be owned, that they were led into theſe miſtakes for want of being well acquainted with his writings; ſince before his Opus Majus was publiſhed, it was impoſſible to conceive any true notion of it's contents, and therefore, we need the leſs wonder at the miſtaken judgments that were paſſed upon it, or rather upon the ſeveral treatiſes of which it is compoſed, and which nobody, till that work appeared, conceived to have any relation to each other, much leſs that they formed, as they really do, a compleat ſyſtem of learning; but the reader being already acquainted with the plan and diſpoſition of that great work, will have acquired ſuch an idea of it, as muſt enable him to enter perfectly into the truth and juſtice of theſe obſervations, and therefore I will dwell on them no longer.

[L] When he has conſidered the contents of a ſingle page of one of his treatiſes. This occurs in the ſmall tract ſo often mentioned, which was one of the firſt publiſhed of our author's works, and intitled Epistoſa Fratris Rogerii Baconis, de ſecretis operibus Artis et Naturæ; et de nullitate Magia: .i.e. 'An epiſtle of brother degree of accuracy and exactness, and is very justly allowed to have understood, both the theory and practice of those discoveries, which have bestowed such high reputation on those of our own and of other nations, who have brought them into common use (1) [M].

In

‘ brother Roger Bacon, concerning the secret works ‘ of Art and Nature, and the non-entirety of Magick.’ In this very curious treatise, our author very clearly states the means of working upon nature, and heightening the wonders she produces by the power of art, and in the fourth chapter of this work, he proposes to speak of wonderful instruments which may be artificially contrived, by which, says he, such things may be done without the help of Magick, as indeed Magick is unable and incapable of performing. For a vessel may be so constructed, and oars therein so disposed, as to make more way with one man in her, than another vessel fully manned. Several authors tell us, that this has been attempted since the time of Bacon, and the German author who wrote notes upon this treatise of Bacon’s, expressly affirms, that one Thomas Norton made such a boat, in which while he sat reading or writing, he quickened or retarded it’s motion at pleasure. He likewise says, that one Hornington of Suffex invented a mill which went of itself; and some other instances he gives, of which he was an eye-witness at London (69): But as to the invention mentioned by our author, it has been practised on the canals in Flanders and Holland with some degree of success; and a writer who is allowed to be an excellent judge of things of this nature, declares his opinion, that this scheme will be one day brought to perfection, and such vessels come into use (70). But let us hear our author again: It is possible, says he, to make a chariot, which without any assistance of animals, shall move with that irresistible force, which is ascribed to those scythed chariots in which the antients fought. Something of this kind we are told has been attempted in China with success, which is the more credible, since it is certain that one Thomas Stevens, a celebrated Mathematician of the XVIth century, invented a kind of machine with masts and sails, which ran on plain ground at the rate of two leagues an hour, and which was used by Maurice Prince of Orange (71). It is possible also, says our author, to make instruments for flying, so that a man sitting in the middle thereof and steering with a kind of rudder, may manage what is contrived to answer the end of wings, so as to divide and pass through the air. It is no less possible to make a machine of a very small size, and yet capable of raising or sinking the greatest weights, which may be of infinite use on certain occasions, for by the help of such an instrument not above three inches high or less, a man may be able to deliver himself and his companions out of prison, and to ascend or descend at pleasure. This is a direct proof that our author was acquainted with the perpetual screw. He speaks also in the same chapter of machines for diving, and of flying bridges that may be thrown at pleasure for the passage of armies over rivers, assuring us, that except the instrument for flying, he had seen and experienced all the rest, and that he very well knew the author of that invention. We need not wonder that a man, who understood and described such amazing machines, and who, by frequent experiments, plainly shewed, that he was not either a vain or a credulous person, should pass in those days for something more than man, and, in spite of all he writ to prove the contrary, for a magician; and perhaps there are countries even in Europe, where if a person attempted things of this nature, he might yet fall under the like imputation. But what made reflections of this kind on Roger Bacon more inhuman than upon any other man, was his plain and honest manner of communicating these things, not as wonders and prodigies, the effects of a secret and miraculous art, but as the genuine produce of true science, the principles of which he offered to teach and to explain; so that he published these discoveries, not to astonish or amuse mankind, but to encourage and excite them to a vigorous search after true knowledge, by which they might have been convinced, that mathematical science was much superior to Magick.

[M] And of other nations who have brought them into common use. The design of this note is no more than to satisfy the reader of the truth of what is advanced in the text; in doing of which we shall

partly rely on the evidence derived from our author’s own writings, and in part, on the authorities of such learned men of our own and of other countries, as have been universally allowed proper judges of the subject. In respect to the science of Perspective, he took incredible pains, not only in the theory, but the practice, in which he spent considerable sums, that he might bring into some method a science, which was then understood but by very few; and he tells us, that no lectures had been read upon it at Paris, and but twice at Oxford, and that there were but three who had any skill in it (72). However, these persons made such prodigious advances in it, that, as Dr Jebb observes, they seem to have left nothing for posterity to add to the perfection of their instruments. Bacon has very accurately described the uses of reading glasses, and shewn the way of making them, as appears from the following passage from his Opus Majus. Si vero homo aspiciat literas & alias res minutas per medium crystalli, vel vitri, vel alterius speculi, suppositi literis & sit portio minor spheræ, cujus convexitas sit versus oculum & oculus sit in ære longe melius, videbis literas & apparebant, ei majores & ideo hoc instrumentum est utile senibus & habentibus oculos debiles. Nam literam quantumcumque parvum possunt videre insufficienti magnitudine (73). This point is also admitted by the very learned Professor, Peter van Muschenbroeck of Leyden, who attributes to our author the invention of reading-glasses (74). Dr Freind likewise remarks, that he describes the camera obscura, and all sorts of glasses which magnify or diminish any object, bring it nearer to the eye or remove it farther off (75). Bacon tells us also himself, that he had made great numbers of burning-glasses, and that there were none ever in use among the Latins, till his friend Peter de Maharn Curia, had applied himself to the making of them. He informs us in another passage of his writings, that this Peter had already laboured three years about one glass, which was to burn at a certain distance, and that he would soon compleat it through the favour of God; tho’ the Latins knew not how to do that, nor was it ever attempted by them, notwithstanding, says he, we have books concerning the method of forming glasses of that kind (76). We may observe likewise, that Thomas Galileo ascribes the invention of the optic tube or telescope to himself (77), and Peter Borellus contends, that the honour of it is due to Zachary Joannides, a citizen of Middleburgh (78), yet it is evident, the invention was known to our author from a passage wherein he tells us, that he was able to form glasses in such a manner, with respect to our sight and the objects, that the rays shall be refracted and reflected wherever we please; so that we may see a thing under what angle we think proper, either near or at a distance, and be able to read the smallest letters at an incredible distance, and to count the dust and sand, on account of the greatness of the angle under which we see the objects; and also that we shall scarce see the greatest bodies near us, on account of the smallness of the angle under which we see them. It is very clear, that he made use of his telescope in his astronomical observations, from what he says in his Opus Tertium, dedicated to Pope Clement, concerning such things as were necessary for completing those astronomical tables which he designed: ‘ But, says he, what is much more requisite than these things, is to have men who understand Perspective and the instruments of it very well, because the instruments of Astronomy are only made use of by sight, according to the laws of that science (79). The learned Dr Plott, for the honour of the city and university of Oxford, considers the invention of the telescope at large, and declares, that without wrestling of words or begging favourable constructions, it is very possible to prove, that Friar Bacon was either the inventor or improver of that useful instrument. How able he is to make good his assertion will best appear from his own words, since in matters of this nature, it is but fair to let an author speak for himself, especially when, as in this case, we make use at once both of his arguments and his authority (80).

In Geography also he was admirably well skilled, as appears from a variety of passages in his works, which shew that he was far better acquainted with the situation, extent, and inhabitants, even of the most distant countries, than many who made that particular science their study, and wrote upon it in succeeding times. This I suppose was the reason, which induced the judicious Hackluyt to transcribe a large discourse out of his writings, into his noble Collection of Voyages and Travels (m) [N]. But his skill in Astronomy, was still more amazing, since it plainly appears, that he not only pointed out that error, which occasioned the reformation in the calendar (n), that has given rise to the distinction between the old stile and the new, but also offered a much more effectual and perfect reformation, than this which was made in the time of Pope Gregory XIII [O]. There

That this learned Friar understood all sorts of glasses, and to order and adapt them to such like purposes (not to cite other places that might easily be brought) I think I may with truth as well as confidence affirm, from the unconstrained sense of his own words in his book of Perspective (81). Si vero corpora non sunt plana per quæ visus videt, sed spherica; tunc est magna diversitas, nam vel concavitas corporis est versus oculum, vel convexitas. But, says he, if the glasses be not plain, (having treated of them before) but spherical, the case is much otherwise, for either the concavity of the glass is next the eye, or the convexity, &c. Now that he used these glasses in celestial observations, is altogether as evident from the same book, where he proceeds in these words (82). De visione fracta majora sunt, nam de facili patet, maxima posse apparere minima, & è contra; & longe distantia videbantur propinquissime, & e converso; sic etiam faceremus solem & lunam & stellas descendere secundum apparentiam hic inferius, &c. Greater things are performed if the vision be refracted, for (by refraction) 'tis easily made appear, that the greatest things may be represented less, and little things as the greatest, and that things afar off may be represented near. Thus we can make the sun, and moon, and stars, to all appearance, to come down to us here below, &c.

(83) Cap. 5.

Again, in his epistle ad Parisensem concerning the secret works of art and nature (83). Possunt enim sic figurari perspicua, ut longissime posita, appareant propinquissima, & e contrario; ita quod ex incredibili distantia legeremus literas minutissimas, & numeravimus res quantumcumque parvas, & stellas faceremus apparere quo vellemus. Glasses may be so figured, that things the most remote may appear near, so that at an incredible distance we may read the smallest character, and number things though never so small; and lastly, make stars appear as near as we please; and these things he says in another place, were to the illiterate so formidable and amazing, ut animus mortalis ignorans veritatem non possit aliquoties sustinere (84), that no mortal, ignorant of the means, could possibly bear it; wherein this learned Franciscan did so far excel the antient Magicians, that whereas they represented the moon's approach by their magical charms, he brought her lower with greater innocence, and with his glasses did that in truth, which the antient poets always put in a fable. All which put together, it must necessarily be confessed that he had some such instrument, though not so trimly made, 'tis like, as our telescopes are now, in favour of which truth much more might be alledged, did I not think this sufficient to vince it to the unprejudiced reader. Such is the judgment of this curious and able man, and such the reasons on which it is founded, and which we may safely add, are such as cannot be refuted.

(84) Perspect. P. iii. dist. 3.

[N] A large discourse out of his writings into his noble Collection of Voyages and Travels.] I mention this circumstance for the honour of both authors. It was the design of Hackluyt in his excellent collections, to instruct, to exhort, and to raise the emulation of his countrymen, by shewing them what was known to, and what had been performed by, their ancestors, and not to amuse his reader with strange tales and wonderful relations (85). It was this design, that led him to enquire after the best writers of our country upon these subjects, as this brought him acquainted with the works of Bacon, which he soon found were extremely fit for his purpose. What he has published, is taken out of that part of our author's Opus Majus, in which he treats expressly of Geography, and gives

(85) See his several prefaces and dedications to the different parts of his collections.

VOL. I. No. 30.

so clear and plain, so full, and yet so succinct, an account of the then known world, as, I believe, is scarce to be found in any other writer, either of the past or present age (86). What is published in this collection of voyages, relates to the countries between the Danube and the utmost extremities of Tartary (87). A field sufficiently large for any man's abilities, and in which he has shewn his own in an amazing degree; for whoever reads this fragment of his, as it stands in this English collection, will evidently see, that as he spared no pains to make himself absolutely master of all the new discoveries which that age afforded; so he likewise knew how to make a right judgment of those discoveries, so as to dispose them in the properest manner, for the improvement of useful knowledge. It likewise very plainly appears, that he had a very just notion of the country of the Tartars, of the empire of China, and of all the adjacent kingdoms, which are scarce any where to be found more clearly, or more properly described, than in this discourse. We must therefore allow it is true for the credit of our author, that as soon as true learning revived, his works came again into credit, so that all who studied to bring useful knowledge into repute, had recourse to the works of Bacon, and brought them out of the dust of libraries, where they had been long buried, into daylight and by a necessary consequence into reputation.

(87) Hackluyt's Voyages, Vol. III.

[O] A more effectual and perfect reformation than this in the time of Gregory XIII.] The first thing to be observed in this note is, that our author saw and demonstrated the errors in the Kalendar, without any assistance, and purely from the knowledge he had in Astronomy. He observes indeed, that the mistake about the length of the year, was commonly known and objected to the Church, but he says nobody durst attempt to mend it, without the authority of a General Council. To facilitate the amending so scandalous an error, he offers his assistance to the utmost of his power, and speaking to Pope Clement IV, he thus lays open both the causes of this mistake, and the means by which it might be remedied. Julius Cæsar, says he, being well skilled in Astronomy, settled, as well as it was possible in his time, the Kalendar, and, as history informs us, maintained in Egypt, against Achorius the Astronomer, and Eudoxus, his notion of the length of the solar year, upon which our computation is founded. Hence it is, that the poet Lucan brings him in speaking thus:

Non meus Eudoxi vincetur fastibus annus.

Nor shall Eudoxus change my settled year.

But Julius however, did not discover the exact length of the year, for he has fixed it in our kalendar at three hundred and sixty five days and the fourth of a day, which fourth part is collected once in four years, so that in the bissextile year, one day more is reckoned in every fourth year than in the common years. It is however manifest, not only by the old and new computation, but is also known from astronomical observations, that the solar year is not of that length but somewhat shorter, and this small difference, wise men have computed to be the one hundred and thirtieth part of a day. So that in the space of one hundred and thirty years, there is a superfluous day taken in, which if it were taken away, our calendar would be corrected as to this fault; and therefore, as all things in our computation depend upon the quantity of the solar year, it is necessary to recede from this position, when it thus appears to be a fundamental error. From hence there arises still a greater error, that is, in fixing the equinoxes and solstices; and this error not only arises from the quantity of

are also remaining, some works of his relating to Chronology, which would have been thought worthy of very particular notice, if his skill in other sciences had not made his proficiency in this branch of knowledge the less remarkable. But it may not be amiss to observe, that he was perfectly well versed in the history of the four great empires of the world, which he has treated very accurately and succinctly, in his great work addressed to Pope Clement IV. (o). He was so thoroughly acquainted with Chemistry, at a time too that it was scarce known in Europe, though it had been long cultivated among the Arabians, that Dr Freind says truly, it is no more than doing justice, to ascribe the honour of introducing it to this our countryman, who, as he likewise says, speaks in some part or other of his works, of almost every operation now used in Chemistry, and describes the method of making tinctures and elixirs (p). But we must not so hastily pass over his excellency in this art, since there are no less than three capital discoveries made by him, which deserve to be particularly considered. The first is, the invention of gun-powder, which, however confidently ascribed to others, was unquestionably known to him, both in regard to it's ingredients and effects (q) [P].

the year, but has also very mischievous consequences; for the equinoxes and solstices are thereby fixed to certain days, as if they really happened upon them, and were so to happen for ever (88): But it is certain from Astronomy, which cannot lye, that they attend in the kalendar, as by the help of tables and instruments may be unquestionably proved. Thus far we have used our author's words, but to avoid prolixity, we will content ourselves now with pursuing his sense only. He observes, that this error with respect to the equinoxes and solstices was so great, as not only to disgust the learned, but to fall under the notice of every ploughman, for the Church having originally fixed the vernal equinox on the eighth of the kalends of April, and the autumnal equinox on the eighth of the kalends of October, that is, on the twenty fifth of March and twenty fourth of September, they were now risen, that is, at the time he wrote, the one to the thirteenth of March, and the other to the sixteenth of September. He collects from these observations, that the equinoxes ascend about one day in one hundred and twenty-five years, and he therefore proposes, that the alteration of the kalendar should be made, not from the time afterwards fixed by the council of Nice, but according to the places which the equinoxes and solstices held at the time of our Saviour's nativity, and this he thought might very well be known, from an observation made by Ptolemy in his Almagest, who, one hundred and forty years after the birth of Christ, found the vernal equinox to have been on the twenty-second of March, and the winter solstice on the twenty-second of December, upon which he founds his computation of their rising one day in one hundred and twenty-five years. It must be owned, that this reasoning of his is very clear and exact, and not very far from the truth, for according to this method of computing, the vernal equinox should have risen this year, one thousand seven hundred and forty-five, to the eleventh of March, whereas it happened on the ninth. He goes on to shew very clearly, what prodigious inconveniencies must necessarily attend the suffering this error to continue, and therefore he concludes, that it was then high time to apply a remedy to these palpable mistakes, which brought so much shame and scandal upon the Church. For, says he, all who are versed in computations and Astronomy know these mistakes well, and deride the Prelates for their ignorance, in not suffering them to be corrected, and the Infidel Philosophers, Arabians, Jews, and Greeks, who live amongst Christians in Spain, in the East, and many other parts of the world, abhor the folly that appears in settling the times, on which the solemn festivals of the Church are celebrated, and this too, when Christians are skilful enough in Astronomy to settle all these points as they should be. Your Reverence therefore may command, and there will be found persons every way capable of applying proper remedies in these respects, and not only to these, but to the defects of the whole kalendar; for there are no less than thirteen radical errors, which have almost an infinite number of branches. If therefore this glorious work could be done in the reign of your Holiness, it would be one of the greatest, best, and fairest performances, that ever was attempted in the Church of God (89). Our author afterwards framed a kalendar for this very purpose, a fair and perfect MS copy of which was once in the hands of Mr Theyer of Gloucestershire. There is also another transcript of this kalendar in the Bodleian library at Oxford (90). Dr Plot, who had seen Mr Theyer's copy (91), discourses farther on this subject thus, 'From which, or some other kalendar of his, Paulus Middleburgenfis, Bishop of Fossombrone, in the dukedom of Urbin, stole half of his great volume, which he calls his Paulina, concerning the true time of keeping Easter, and day of the passion of our Lord Jesus, directed to Pope Leo X, in order to the reformation of the Roman kalendar and ecclesiastical cycles, written just in the same order and method, generally and particularly, as Roger Bacon long before had done to Clement IV, and yet full slender mention, (says Dr Dee (92), doth this Bishop make of him, though his chief instructor in the best part of the matter contained in his book: In which design, though the plagiary were unsuccessful, his endeavours being frustrated for a time, yet 'twas he that stirred up Nicholas Copernicus, (as the fame Nicholas honestly confesses, in an epistle of his to Paul III (93),) more accurately to observe the motions of the sun and moon, and thence to define the quantities of years and months, more truly than they were before in the Julian kalendar; upon whose foundations Aloysius, and the rest of the sumptuous college of Mathematicians at Rome, having built their reformation, it is easily deducible, that whatever has been done in this matter, from the time of Friar Bacon to that of Pope Gregory XIII, must in a great measure be ascribed to him, their whole reformation scarce differing from his (94). In fact however, as Dr Plot also observes, it was not only stolen from our author Bacon, but manifestly injured by those who had the direction of that reformation, and who might have made it much more effectual, and have carried it back as he advised, not to the Nicene Council, but quite to the nativity of our Lord; for then the vernal equinox this year, would have been placed much nearer the true time than it is, and the kalendar have sooner become perfect (95). The learned editor therefore of the Opus Majus, Dr Jebb, had reason to say of this proposal of our author's to Pope Clement IV, that it was one of the noblest efforts of human industry (96). It is indeed, considered in all it's circumstances, one of the most stupendious instances of the force of human understanding that has been recorded, and will do honour to our learned countryman's memory as long as the sun and moon endure (97).

[P] Was unquestionably known to him both in regard to it's ingredients and effects. It is in the first place to be observed, that our author died near one hundred years before the invention of gun-powder, according to the ordinary computation; but that he was really acquainted with the secret, such as have examined his works have readily confessed, and the only question is, whether he has or has not fully revealed this secret. We shall have occasion to say something new upon this head, and which has not hitherto ever been taken notice of, but we will first lay down what has been generally advanced on this subject. In the sixth chapter of his famous work of the Secrets of Nature and Art, he tells us, 'That from salt-petre and other ingredients, we are able to make a fire that shall burn at what distance we please.' In omnem distantiam quam volumus, pos-

The second is that which commonly goes under the name of Alchemy, or the art of transmuting metals, of which he has left many treatises, some published, and some still remaining in MS. which, whatever they may be thought of now, procured him the reputation of an adept, among the greatest masters in that mysterious branch of learning; and in which writings, there are, without doubt, a multitude of curious and useful passages, which, independent of their principal subject, will render them always valuable (r) [Q]. The third discovery in Chemistry which deserves the reader's attention, sumus artificialiter componere ignem comburentem ex sale petræ et aliis. He likewise mentions other methods of doing the same thing, and then speaking of the effects of these strange fires, he says, 'That sounds like thunder, and corrutions may be formed in the air, and even with greater horror than those which happen naturally; for a little matter, properly disposed, about the bigness of a man's thumb, makes a dreadful noise, and occasions a prodigious corrution: And this, says he, is done several ways, by which a city or an army may be destroyed, after the manner of Gideon's stratagem, who having broke the pitchers and lamps, and the fire issuing out with an inexpressible noise, killed an infinite number of the Midianites, with only three hundred men.' Nam soni velut tonitrus & corrusiones possunt fieri in aëre, immo majore horrore quam illa quæ fiunt per naturam. Nam modica materia adaptata, scilicet ad quantitatem unius pollicis, sonum facit horribilem & corrusionem ostendit vehementem; & hoc fit multis modis quibus civitas aut exercitus destruitur, ad modum artificii Gideonis qui lagunculis fractis & lampadibus, igne exsiliente cum fragore inestimabili, infinitum Midianitarum destruxit exercitum cum trecentis hominibus (98). This very plainly proves, that he knew the effects that such a composition, as what we now call gun-powder, would produce, and if it were of any consequence to make this point still clearer, it might very easily be done from another passage in his Opus Majus, wherein he expresses himself in yet stronger terms upon the same subject. But still a question may be asked, was this thundering powder precisely the same with that which we call gun-powder? In answer to this, Dr Plot tells us positively, that the alia before mentioned in a MS copy of the same treatise, in the hands of the learned Dr G. Langbain, which was seen by Dr John Wallis, was explained to be sulphur and wood-coal (99). We are told the same thing by the judicious Dr Freind (100); but who vouches that these words were of Bacon's writing? It was no difficult thing, when salt-petre and a thundering powder was mentioned, to think of sulphur and wood coal, but the point is, did Roger Bacon think of it? If he did, how does this appear? I answer, from all the MSS of this very treatise, but never in the place these learned gentlemen looked for it; for our author did not then intend to reveal it. But after he had written his treatise, of the secret Works of Nature and Art, he added two appendixes which are the tenth and eleventh chapters, in which he farther explains to his correspondent, some passages which appeared to him obscure in the foregoing works, and it is in the last of these chapters, that he divulges this secret, yet not absolutely but in a cypher, by transposing the letters of two of the words, for thus it is set down. Sed tamen salis petræ LURU MOPE CAN UBRE et sulphuris; et sic facies tonitrum et corrusionem, si scias artificium (101). So that if the words carbonum pulvere, were set down in the sixth chapter of Dr Langbain's MS they were taken from hence, the author, as I observed before, not intending at that time to mention all the ingredients of this dangerous discovery, for if he had, there would have been no need of his appendix.

[Q] Will render them always valuable. We have already considered our author in the several lights of a Philologist, a Critick, a Mathematician, a Mechanist, a Natural Philosopher, an Astronomer, and are now come to view him in that of a Chemist. He was, as we have shewn in the text, one of the earliest in Europe, and contemporary with Albertus Magnus, or Albert the Great, Bishop of Ratisbon. A man exactly of Bacon's temper, for he quitted his bishoprick, that he might pursue the pleasures of Experimental Philosophy in quiet, in a monastery at Collogne (102). Yet our author appears to have had no instructor, but gathered all from his books and his own meditation. However, with this assistance only, he became the greatest Chemist of his own time beyond comparison, and perhaps, without exceeding truth, we might say, of any other. His writings on this subject are highly finished, and they seem to speak the master in every line. His stile is neat, elegant, concise, perspicuous, and expressive, so that the reader not only understands whatever he delivers, but is also sensible at the same time, that he perfectly understood what he wrote. The most considerable of his chemical works have been printed, but the MSS. which were at Oxford are now at Leyden, being carried abroad amongst those of Vossius. In these pieces of his he attempts to prove, that imperfect minerals may be ripened into perfect metals. He maintains Geber's principles, that mercury is the common basis of all metals, and sulphur the cement. Upon these principles he shews, that it is by a gradual depuration of the mercurial matter, and the accession of a subtle sulphur, that nature forms gold; and that if while the gold is producing any third matter intervenes, some baser metal arises, according to the nature of the intervening substance. Hence he infers, that it is a thing very practicable by pursuing nature's method, to purify and change all baser metals into gold (103). He is so perfectly clear in all he has written on this subject, and appears to have been so well versed from experience in the facts which he lays down, and the consequences he draws from them, that one would be tempted to imagine, some of those trials were actually made by him, that in latter times have passed for new experiments. The late Duke of Orleans, Regent of France, and one of the most curious and inquisitive, as well as knowing and penetrating Princes that have lived in our times, commanded an excellent Chemist to examine into the nature of metals, and more especially of gold, that it might appear, whether the old principles of the Arabs (most clearly defined and rationally explained by our author) were solid truths or empty chimeras. This was putting the ancient science of Chemistry to the experimentum crucis, and giving posterity an opportunity of learning, by unexceptionable trials, what was to be depended upon in this respect. If our author and his instructors had been, as some have fancied, mere enthusiasts and dreamers, their folly had been now discovered and exploded; but the very contrary of this happened, and the experimental Philosophers, who profess themselves only the disciples of nature, have been obliged to adopt, or at least to admit, the principles of the Chemists. But to come closer to the point, and to compare the doctrine of our Bacon with the conclusions of the French proficient. The former we know laid it down in direct terms, that the component parts of gold, are, a most pure mercury, and a subtle sulphur (104). On the other hand, M. Homberg, in his Essai du souffre principe, gives us two experiments, the first with mercury, which upon being exposed to a digesting heat, ceases to be fluid, becomes a powder heavier than mercury, and at length acquires such a fixedness, as to be capable of remaining red-hot for twenty-four hours without loss, though upon applying a naked fire, the greatest part flies off in fume, leaving a piece of hard metal formed of the mercury behind. The other experiment is with regulus of antimony, which, upon being exposed to the Duke of Orleans's great burning-glass to calcine, gained one eighth part in weight; from the experiments he concludes, that light may be introduced into porous bodies, may there fix and increase both their weight and bulk, and that the light thus retained in mercury, becomes inseparable therefrom in the most vehement fire, and even changes the form of the mercury into a malleable ductile metal, heavier than any other metal except gold. In another place the same author argues, that gold consists principally of two kinds of matter, viz. mercury or quicksilver, and a metallic sulphur; the latter, according to him, being no other than light, was the tincture of gold for the prolongation of life, of which as Dr Freind says, he has given broad hints in his writings (s), and which it is very probable he would have laid open more fully, if his discourses upon these and other important subjects, had been received with the candour they deserved. As it is, he has said enough to shew that he was no pretender to this art, but understood as much of it (in this respect at least) as any who have lived since his time (t) [R]. That he was far from being unskilled in the art either of which being taken apart, evaporates with the least heat, but when joined together in a metal, after the manner just mentioned, they lose their volatility and become so fixed, that the most intense fire of our laboratories cannot separate them (105). Thus this very knowing and judicious person, who in consequence of all the trials and experiments he ran through on this subject, was never taught to speak clearer or more assuredly than our author, who lived so many ages before him. But let us next hear a greater and more famous author among the Moderns than Homberg; I mean the most excellent and incomparable Boerhaave, whose learning, great as it was, yielded much to his veracity, and whose diligence was only equalled by his candour. This admirable man, who had not only the courage to seek truth wherever he might be met with, but likewise to own where he met with her, let it be in what place it would, discourses thus, both on the subject and of our author (106). 'By all that I have hitherto delivered it appears, that Chemistry is of great use and extent through all, or at least the chief of, the mechanical arts, so that they who cultivate them might truly be called artificers, and make incredible improvements in their several provinces, if at the same time they were skilled in Chemistry; consequently there are many and weighty reasons to induce men to superadd Chemistry to all the other sciences employed in the consideration or changing of bodies; and lastly, carefully to observe and faithfully write down such effects as arise therefrom, to be afterwards reduced into order and made publick, that by a number of contributions thus brought from all quarters, the arts may at length be brought to perfection; what was in my power I have endeavoured to perform in this undertaking, wherein though I make no great advances, I am of some use, as I have set an example of labour before you; which with the advantage of genius, may lead you on to make much greater discoveries. I come now to add a few, but candid and ingenuous, considerations on the great use of Chemistry in Alchemy. To speak my mind freely, I have not met any writers on Natural Philosophy, who treat of the nature of bodies, so profoundly, and explained the manner of changing them so clearly, as those called Alchemists. To be convinced of this, read carefully their genuine writings, for instance, the piece of Raymond Lully, which he entitles Experiments, you will find him, with the utmost clearness and simplicity, relating experiments, which explain the nature and actions of animals, vegetables, and fossils; after this, you will hardly be able to name any author, wherein physical things are treated of to so much advantage. The bodies which Chemistry resolves before our eyes, afford demonstrations which call for our assent, infinitely more cogently than any words could do; by these we do what we say, and what we teach we perform, inasmuch, that these writers seem to have attempted to build that body of Philosophy wished for by the great Lord Bacon, viz. a Philosophy, which should lay down such powers of bodies, as the bodies themselves when present really exhibit effects to warrant, and consequently, should assign such causes of things, as being given, will readily produce the things themselves, so that when it pleased, it could do what it taught.' He then enters on a most judicious abridgment of the principles, practice, and promises of the Alchemists, the last of which he censures, as in some measure absurd and extravagant. He adds however after all, this modest, candid, and most sensible conclusion (107). 'But enough is said on this head, we are always to remember, that the limits of nature are by no means to be defined by us, things are taken for impossible, which are only unknown by the ignorant. The ancient writers spoke something of a perpetual fire, which was of a solid nature, and endured even under water, but it was exploded as an idle chimera, though the same has since been actually discovered by Kraff, and prepared by Kunkel, described by Boyle, further explained by Nieuwentyt, and more amply still by Hoffman. Roger Bacon's artificial thunder and lightning were long laughed at as empty fictions, but have been discovered by Schwartz to be too true, and many of the other things related in the chapter of Natural Magic, will appear much more incredible to those unacquainted with experiments, than that lead should lose its natural form and be converted into gold. Credulity is hurtful, and so is incredulity; the business therefore of a wise man is to try all things, hold fast what is approved, never limit the power of God, nor assign bounds to nature.' Such are the sentiments of the learned and unprejudiced Boerhaave on this subject, and as to our author; whose reputation as a Chemist has been always highest among those, by whom the practice of this art was best understood, because they found from their own experience, the correctness, closeness, and veracity of all his numerous writings.

[R] As any who have lived since his time.] In this note I intend to examine what our author's notions were, in regard to the medicinal virtues of gold, of which, as the learned Physician quoted in the text, says, he gave broad hints of a tincture, which must have been a sort of aurum potabile, or golden elixir. There is no doubt to be made that our author had a very high opinion of gold as a medicine, it is the first in his list of secret or concealed medicines, which he recommends to Pope Nicholas IV, and the phrase he uses to express it is, the medicine found in the bowels of the earth. He largely explains its virtues, and shews particularly how great they are in the cure of head-achs, palsies, and other disorders which spring from the brain. He says, that Aristotle thought the life of man could not be preserved by any preparation from gold, because gold itself is perishable, or at least the medicines drawn from it; but our author advises the Pope not to believe this; for, says he, this medicine will do admirable things when it is well prepared, and thoroughly drawn out. That he might also shew what he meant by this drawing out, he tells his Holiness, that perhaps the liquor was of that kind, i. e. a tincture of gold, which an old husbandman in the kingdom of Sicily found, as he was ploughing, in a gold vessel; the man it seems was hot and faint, and taking this yellowish water which the vessel contained for a kind of dew, he greedily swallowed it, which so entirely changed his habit of body and complexion, that of an old man of sixty he became like one of thirty, his judgment, memory, and understanding, becoming much better than they were before, so that of a labouring peasant he became a courtier, and was advanced to be a gentleman of the chamber to William King of Sicily, in whose service (and that of his successor's I suppose) he lived four score years. This fact seems to have been very well known, for our author mentions it thrice: First in his book of the Secrets of Art and Nature (108), again in his Opus Majus (109), and lastly, in this book of the Cure of Old Age (110), and it is from all three relations that I have collected the several circumstances before mentioned. But I cannot help observing upon this occasion, that our author not only hints at the tincture of gold; but also at another tincture much beyond it in operation, which is the famous medicine taken notice of in a former note, and of which I propose to say something here, because I think it is not impossible to give a better account of it, than has been hitherto done. But first it will be requisite to give the author's description. 'Wife men, says he, have cautiously made mention of a certain medicine, which resembles that going out of the mine of the noble animal. They affirm, that in it there is a force and virtue, which restores and increases the natural heat; as to its disposition, they say it is like youth itself, and contains an equal and temperate of physick, we might rationally conclude, from his extensive knowledge in those sciences, which have the nearest relation thereto; but besides this, we have a particular and manifest proof of his perfect acquaintance with the most material and useful branches of Physick, in his Treatise of Old Age, which, as Dr Freind, whose authority on that subject cannot well be disputed, observes, is very far from being ill writ (u); and Dr Brown, who published it in English, esteemed it one of the best performances that ever was written (w). In this work he has collected whatever he had met with upon the subject, either in Greek or Arabian writers, and has added a great many remarks of his own. The whole, considering the time in which it was wrote, is in reality a very extraordinary performance, in point both of learning and judgment, and will appear the more curious and the more valuable, the oftener it is read, and the more it is considered [S]. In Logick and Metaphysicks he was excellently well versed, as appears by those temperate complexion; and the signs of a temperate complexion in men are, when their colour is made up of white and red, when the hair is yellow inclining to redness and curling. According to Pliny, when the flesh is moderate both in quality and quantity, when a man's dreams are delightful, his countenance chearful and pleasant, and when his appetite of eating and drinking is moderate. This medicine indeed is like to such a complexion, for it is of a temperate heat, it's fume is temperate and sweet, and grateful to the smell. When it departs from this temperature, it departs so far from it's virtue and goodness. This medicine therefore doth temperately heat, because it is temperately hot, it therefore heals because it is whole, when it is sick it makes a man sick, when it is distempered it breeds distempers, and changeth the body to it's own disposition, because of the similitude it hath with the body; for the infirmity of a brute animal rarely passeth into man, but into another animal of the same kind, but the infirmity of man passeth into man, and so doth health because of likeness. Know (most gracious Prince) that in this there is a great secret, for Galen saith, that whatever is dissolved from any thing, it must of necessity be assimilated to that thing, as is manifest in diseases passing from one to another; such as weakness of the eyes and pestilential diseases. This thing hath an admirable property, for it doth not only render human bodies harmless from corruption, but it defends also the bodies of plants from putrefaction, this thing is seldom found, and although sometimes it is found, yet it cannot commodiously be had of all men; and instead of it, the wife do use that medicine, which is in the bowels of the earth compleat and prepared, and that which swims in the sea, and that which is in the square stone of the noble animal, so that every part may be free from the infection of another: But if that stone cannot be acquired, let other elements separated, divided, and purified, be made use of; now when this thing is like to youth, that is of temperate complexion, it hath good operations, if it's temperature be better, it produced better effects, sometimes it is even in the highest degree of it's perfection, and then it operates best, and then there is that property whereof we have spoken before. This differs from other medicines and nutriments, which heat and moisten after a certain temperate manner, and are good for old men; for other medicines principally heat and moisten the body, and secondarily they strengthen the native heat; but this doth principally strengthen the native heat, and after that refreshes the body by moistening and heating it: For it reduces this heat in old men, who have it but weakly and deficient, to a certain stronger and more vehement power: If a plaister be made hereof and applied to the stomach, it will help very much, for it will refresh the stomach itself and excite an appetite. It will very much recreate an old man, and change him to a kind of youth, and will make complexions, by what means soever depraved or corrupted, better. Many wise men have spoken but little of this thing, they have indeed laid down another thing like it, as Galen in his fifth book of Simple Medicines, and Joannes Damascenus in his Aphorisms. But it is to be observed, that Venus doth weaken and diminish the power and virtue of this thing; and it is very likely that the son of the Prince, in his second Canon of the Operations of Simple Medicines, spoke of this thing, where he saith, that there is a certain medicine concealed by

wife men, lest the innocent should offend their creature; there is such a heat in this thing, as is in young men of a found complexion, and if I durst declare the properties of this heat, this most hidden secret should presently be revealed; for this heat doth help the palsical, it restores and preserves the wasted strength of the native heat, causeth it to flourish in all the members, and gently revives the aged. It is from this description that Dr Brown (111), as we before observed, concludes, that the medicine here recommended, was a healthy young woman of a proper complexion. But whoever will consider the whole of this account attentively, and will compare it with what our author says upon the same subject in his Opus Majus (112), in which he speaks much more clearly than in this treatise, will (or I am much mistaken) see good grounds to believe, that this medicine is no other than the great secret, the grand elixir of the Chemicists, far beyond the tincture of gold in it's effects, though where this cannot be had, that may be used (according to our author) for the same purpose, but with less success.

[S] The oftner it is read, and the more it is considered.] There never was an author who took more pains to finish and perfect his discourses than Friar Bacon, who was continually reviewing, retouching, and augmenting his pieces, that as he grew older and wiser, these children of his brain might partake of their parent's fortune. The subject of this book appears plainly to have thrice exercised it's author's application; for it makes the seventh chapter of his celebrated treatise of the secret Works of Art and Nature, he revised it again, and inserted so much of it as he thought proper in his Opus Majus (113), yet in both these works he delivers himself only in general terms; but in this last treatise, which was written for the use of Pope Nicholas the fourth, he descends to practice, and give those receipts in direct and exprest terms, which he had only hinted at before. If the reader inclines to see the subject of all these three treatises in a narrow compass, and to take a view of the author's theory, as to the extent of human life, he may find it in the following extract from his first work; which contains a short view of his whole system (114). 'The possibility of prolonging life, says he, is confirmed by this: That a man is naturally immortal, that is, able not to die, and even after he had sinned, he could live near a thousand years; afterwards, by little and little, the length of his life was abbreviated; therefore, it must needs be, that this abbreviation is accidental. Therefore, it might be either wholly repaired, or at least in part. But if we would but make enquiry into the accidental cause of this corruption, we should find it neither was from Heaven, nor from ought but want of a regimen of health. For in as much as the fathers are corrupt, they beget children of a corrupt complexion and composition, and their children from the same cause are corrupt themselves, and so corruption is derived from father to son, till abbreviation of life prevails by succession. Yet for all this it does not follow, that it shall always be cut shorter and shorter, because a term is set in human kind, that men should at the most of their years arrive at fourscore, but more is their pain and sorrow. Now the remedy against every man's proper corruption is, if every man from his youth would exercise a complete regimen, which consists in these things; meat and drink, sleep and watching, motion and rest, evacuation and retention, air, the passions of the mind; for if a man would observe this regimen from his nativity, he might live those parts of his works, in which he has treated of these subjects; neither was he unskilled in Philology and the politer parts of learning, as might be demonstrated from his writings, if we had not touched upon so many subjects already (x). In Ethicks or Moral Philosophy he was a very great master, and as he was a man of good sense and unblemished probity, so he has laid down the noblest and most generous principles for the conduct of human life, in the treatise he has left us upon that subject (y) [T]. But as his profession and course of life required a particular application to Theology, so it plainly appears, that he made all his other studies subservient thereto, and directed both his actions and his writings to the glory of God, and the good of his fellow-creatures. He had the highest deference for the Holy Scriptures, and thought that in them were contained the principles of true science, and of all useful knowledge. He therefore pressed the study of them in their original languages, and an assiduous application to the several branches of learning, which he thought necessary for the thorough understanding them (z). To say the truth, the impressing this strongly on the minds of men, who made religion peculiarly their profession, is the great endeavour of all his works, as the applying this properly was the business of his last treatise, which he left as a kind of Testament to those of his order, and is a very excellent work in it's kind [U]. As to the vulgar imputation on his character, of his leaning to Magick, it

‘ as long as his nature assumed from his parents would permit, and might be led to the utmost term of nature, lapsed from original righteousness, which term nevertheless he could not pass; because this regimen does not avail in the least against the old corruption of our parents. But it being in a manner impossible, that a man should be so governed in the mediocrity of these things, as the regimen of health requires, it must of necessity be, that abbreviation of life do come from this cause, and not only from the corruption of our parents. Now the art of Physick determines this regimen sufficiently. But neither rich, nor poor, neither wise men, nor fools, nor Physicians themselves, how skilful soever, are able to perfect this regimen, either in themselves or others, as is clear to every man: But nature is not deficient in necessaries, nor is art compleat; yea it is able to resist and break through all accidental passions, so as they may be destroyed, either altogether or in part: And in the beginning when men's age began to decline, the remedy had been easy; but now after more than five thousand years, it is difficult to appoint a remedy. Nevertheless, wise men being moved with the aforesaid considerations, have endeavoured to think on some ways, not only against the defect of every man's proper regimen, but against the corruption of our parents. Not that a man can be reduced to the life of Adam or Arterius, because of prevailing corruption, but that life might be prolonged a century of years or more beyond the common age of men now living, in that the passions of old age might be retarded, and if they could not altogether be hindered, they might be mitigated; that life might usefully be prolonged, yet always on this side the utmost term of nature; for the utmost term of nature is that which was placed in the first men after sin, and there is another term from the corruption of every one's own parents. It is no man's fortune to pass beyond both these terms; but one may well the term of his proper corruption: Nor yet do I believe, that any man, how wise soever, can attain the first term, though there be the same possibility and aptitude of human nature to that term, which was in the first men; nor is it a wonder, since this aptitude extends itself to immortality as it was before sin, and will be after the resurrection. But if you say, that neither Aristotle, nor Plato, nor Hippocrates, nor Galen, arrived at such prolongation? I answer you, nor at many mean truths, which were after known to other students; and therefore they might be ignorant of these great things, although they made their assay, but they busied themselves too much in other things, and they were quickly brought to old age, while they spent their lives in worse and common things, before they perceived the ways to the greatest of secrets: For we know that Aristotle faith in his Predicaments, that the quadrature of the circle is possible, but not then known, and he confesses, that all men were ignorant of it even to his time: But we know that in these our days this truth is known, and therefore, well might Aristotle be ignorant of far deeper secrets of nature. Now also ‘ wife men are ignorant of many things, which in time to come every common student shall know, therefore this objection is every way vain.’ These were the thoughts of our author when he first turned his inquiries upon this subject, and it is upon these principles that he reasons in his third book. It is remarkable that he professes in all his treatises, that he had never made any experiments upon himself, whence one might be tempted to conclude, that though he did not suffer his misfortunes so to break his spirits, as to hinder him from pursuing his studies; yet was he so little pleased with life, that he would not take any measures to prolong it; notwithstanding the sentiments he was in as to that point. For though it might be surmised, that Bacon might amuse others with grave discourses accommodated to their humours, though not at all to his own belief; yet whoever reads his works, will evidently perceive that such notions must be utterly groundless, since there is not only the strongest character of veracity in all he writes, but the whole is so systematical, that one part sustains another in such a manner, that it is almost impossible to form any doubts, or to fall into any mistakes about his opinions, when his Opus Majus has been once thoroughly perused and attentively considered; because it is a kind of key to all the rest.

[T] In the treatise he has left us upon this subject. The sentiments of our author on morality, are very singular both in this treatise and in other parts of his works; for he considered Moral Philosophy as the end and perfection of all human knowledge. He therefore considered all speculative science, as useful or useles in proportion as it contributed to the advantage of mankind. He declares, that in his judgment the Moral Philosophy of Christians is the same with their Divinity, and that though it is by far more perfect than the Philosophy of the Pagans; yet it rests upon and takes in their principles; so that he makes Natural Religion the ground-work, and Revealed, the structure, supposing each necessary to the other; and therefore, not to be separated or divided. He constantly manifests so much clearness and good sense, in treating every subject, and this, notwithstanding the difficulties under which he laboured, and his differing almost upon every topick from the notions then in vogue, that instead of wondering, there was so strong a clamour against him, we ought rather to wonder that he was able to support himself at all against the tide of popular prejudice, which is always strongest in the most ignorant ages. To say the truth, Bacon was the farthest from being a popular writer, perhaps of any man that ever wrote, and this I take to be one reason, why his writings have hitherto been admired only by the few, and I very much question, whether any age will arise so learned and so just, as to afford them a general reception.

[U] And is a very excellent work in it's kind. Besides the MS. in the Royal Library, there are several others still remaining, some more and some less perfect. Mr Theyer of Gloucestershire had several parts of this work (115), and perhaps there are some copies of it yet undiscovered, which however might be brought to light, if any man of equal learning and industry with the excellent editor of his

(115) As appears by the catalogue of his MSS.

it was utterly unfounded, and the ridiculous story of his making a brazen head, which spoke and answered questions, is a calumny indirectly fathered upon him, having been originally imputed to his patron Robert Grouthead, Bishop of Lincoln (a) [W]. The pains therefore that have been taken to vindicate him in this respect, by the learned Gabriel Naudé (b), and other writers, however charitably designed, was not very necessary; and that he had too high an opinion of Judicial Astrology, and some other arts of that nature, was not so properly an error of his as of the age in which he lived; and considering how few errors, among the many which infected that age, appear in his writings, it may be easily forgiven (c). As his whole life was spent in labour and study, and he was continually employed, either in writing for the information of the world, or in reading and making experiments, that might enable him to write with greater accuracy; so we need not wonder his works were extremely numerous, especially when it is considered, that on the one hand his studies took in the whole circle of the sciences, and that on the other, the numerous treatises ascribed to him, are, often in fact, but so many chapters, sections, or divisions, and sometimes we have the same pieces under two or three different names; so that it is not at all strange before these points were well examined, that

Opus Majus, would undertake the publication of it, which could not but prove extremely agreeable to the learned world, since it contains a multitude of things, that one would scarce expect to find in a performance under this title. For it was the custom of our author, never to confine his thoughts too strictly unto any particular subject, but, on the contrary, believing, as he did, that all sciences had a relation amongst themselves, and were of use to each other, and all of them to Theology; it was very natural for him to illustrate this, in a work calculated to shew how the study of Divinity might be best promoted. It might also let us into many particulars, relating to the Ecclesiastical and Literary History of those times, which could not but be very curious and instructive. We may add to all this, that it would undoubtedly have very good effects, in elucidating and explaining the other works of our author, which are already made publick, and which are in many places not a little obscure. We may say the same thing, with regard to other treatises of our author yet remaining, but never hitherto printed; all of which, if carefully considered and compared, might be of very great use, the rather because there are some things hinted at in several parts of Bacon's works, which if we could derive lights sufficient from his hitherto unpublished works, perfectly to understand, might be of as great benefit to mankind, as any of those discoveries, which, though now common, have given great credit to this author, since it appeared from his works, that they were originally due to him, or at least, that they were long before in his possession. It would be no very difficult matter to give instances of these things, but that we have already exceeded our ordinary bounds, and are therefore forced to confine ourselves more strictly, that these memoirs may not exceed the just rules of proportion.

[W] Originally imputed to his patron, Robert Grouthead Bishop of Lincoln] One may very easily imagine, how when the common people are at a loss to account for any thing, they should call in, more especially in the darkest and most ignorant ages, the assistance of the Devil. To them this is as easy and as necessary, as the machinery of the poets, or of the playhouse, and answers the end as effectually; but what is most extraordinary, and which really deserves wonder, is, that men of good sense, and no way despicable in their understandings, should adopt these silly tales and publish them to the world as truths. Yet this happened to many others besides our author, and those too of the worthiest persons of the ages in which they lived. As for instance, William of Malmshury (116) tells us very gravely, of Pope Sylvester II, who flourished in the Xth century, that he made such a head under certain constellations, which would speak when spoken to, and oraculously answer such questions as were proposed to it. But it seems these answers were confined to single words. For the same writer tells us, that being asked by his master Whether he should ever become Pope? it answered Yes; and when he enquired, Whether he should die before he sung Mass in Jerusalem? it answered No. Which however proved a lye, for the Pope died at Rome; but to keep up the credit of this story it was pretended, that he died on that Sunday, which in the Roman Ritual is entitled, Statio ad Jerusalem, immediately after he had sung Mass. After this foolish story had got into the world, without any other foundation than the Pope's being a great Mathematician: there never arose in any country a person of extraordinary abilities, especially in those sciences that were least cultivated, but presently he was reported to have made a brazen head. Hence Robert Grouthead, Bishop of Lincoln, is reported by an antient writer of his life in verse, to have made such a brazen head when he was Master of Arts at Oxford, which being broken by some accident, the relics thereof are said by him to have been kept in a vault under Lincoln College (117). Something of the same kind is thrown out by John Gower the poet (118). And indeed the story was so universally spread, and so firmly believed among the vulgar, that because Roger Bacon was his disciple, they could not help supposing, that he must be as learned in these secret arts as his master, and therefore they bestowed a brazen head upon him too, in conjunction with Fryar Bungy, of whom we shall say something in another place (119). But the design of making this head was so extraordinary, and the end it met with so odd, that it deserves to be remembered. For these two learned Fryars were no less than seven years employed in framing it, and the matter about which they were to enquire, was, Whether it might not be possible to build a wall of brass round this island? But as they had a great many things upon their hands, it seems they forgot the time at which their head was to speak, and so lost the opportunity of hearing the answer distinctly, and thus their labour being vain, and the head in a manner useless, it was demolished (120). But of all the great men who are foolishly said to have dealt in brazen heads, Albertus Magnus was the most extraordinary, for he is said to have made not barely a head, but a man, who not only answered questions very readily and truly when demanded, but was also so flippant with his brazen tongue, that Thomas Aquinas, a reserved and contemplative person, and pupil at that time to Albertus Magnus, knocked the idol to pieces to stop it's talking (121). These great men lived at the same time with our author, and it is not impossible that he might have heard something of this nature, for in a work of his which has been often mentioned, he deplores the attributing every thing that was great and remarkable to the power of Art Magick, which hindered the propagation, as it also did the reputation, of true science, depriving men thereby of that reward, which could alone encourage them to take the pains necessary to succeed in the pursuit of useful knowledge. The most learned Selden (122), in a discourse of his, wherein, with vast reading and judgment, he has examined the rise and progress of these notions, declares positively, that this story of Fryar Bacon's brazen head was equally foolish and groundless, and never gained belief, but with the meanest and lowest of the people. Yet there want not some writers who have had more credit than they deserve, that have really doubted whether our author was not a Magician (123)? and perhaps in this respect, his character would not have been much assisted, if the famous John Dee had published as well as promised his defence of him (124). To say the truth, there cannot be a greater injury offered to the memory of so wise a man, and so universal a scholar, as to treat such a calumny as this with any degree of gravity, because, in fact, there cannot be any thing more absurd, or more ridiculous.

that the accounts we have of his writings appeared very perplexed and confused [X].
But

[X] The accounts we have of his writings appeared very perplexed and confused. This was the natural consequence of the bad usage our author met with while living, and the great declension of learning after his death. Leland complains, that either through negligence or other casualties the writings of Bacon were so dispersed, that it would be easier to collect the leaves of the Sibyl, than the very names of the treatises he wrote. He sets down however the titles of thirty, of which he had seen about a third part (125). The industrious Bale, by that time he finished his useful collection, had met with and digested the titles of upwards of fourscore pieces attributed to our author, of which he had seen near one half (126). Pits speaks with amazement of the multitude of books written by our author, and increases the number of their titles to near one hundred (127). The learned Dr Jebb has digested all these titles under the proper heads of the sciences to which they belong, so that the whole of what was either written by, or attributed to, our author, appears to the eye of the reader at one view, as in the following table he will perceive.

But notwithstanding this seeming perplexity and confusion, it is not a very difficult thing; from the lights we now have, to give a very fair and distinct account of our author's works, the far greater part of which are still in being, and it were to be wished, that they were also made publick. It will likewise appear from this account, how great service has been done to the learned world, by such as have made it their business to collect and preserve ancient MSS, and to bring together the scattered memorials of those learned men who have flourished in past times, and who, until this care was taken, have been represented in very false lights to posterity. It will also appear, that this excellent person was very far from being a hasty, incorrect, or desultory writer, but that, on the contrary, all his works have a just reference to one great and general system, which he has executed in all it's parts to a much greater degree of perfection, than hitherto even the learned have imagined [2]. So that on the whole we may very safely affirm, that the history, character,

[2] Than even the learned imagined.] When we find on one hand, some modern authors complaining that almost all the works of our old writers are either destroyed out of malice; or, through carelessness, have the monuments of their learning buried in oblivion, and on the other, see such a multitude of books ascribed to our old authors by Leland, Bale, and Pits, we can hardly tell what to believe, or how to doubt the truth of either of these assertions. Yet this instance of Roger Bacon may serve to shew us, that such general expressions ought not to have too much weight, but that it becomes us to enquire as carefully as we can after these precious monuments of antiquity, notwithstanding some who have gone before us in the search, assure us it is to little or no purpose. At first sight, it must appear an endless, and, at the same time, a fruitless labour, for us to endeavour to pick up all the little treatises written by Roger Bacon. Yet for all this it may be, the thing is not altogether as difficult as it seems; for, as the learned Dr Jebb very justly observes, the number of our author's works may be much reduced, if we consider, that the copies of his writings being dispersed into several places, it fell out that the same tracts had different titles given them, and, which has added still more to the confusion, the titles of the several chapters of his works, have been taken for the titles of so many treatises. Now to extricate ourselves as well as may be out of these difficulties, let us consider what our author himself tells us concerning his writings. He asserts in his Opus Majus, that before he set about that work, he had published only a few pieces, and we know that he wrote this book in the year 1267. The business then is to find out first of all these Capitula quædam as he calls them, and then we are sure we have his first writings. But this we shall find no very difficult matter, since it plainly appears, that the pieces addressed to William of Paris, were written before the Opus Majus, and were published altogether in 1542, under the title of Epistola Fratris Rogerii Baconis de secretis Operibus Artis et Naturæ, et de Nullitate Magiæ (128). i. e. 'The Epistle of Brother Roger Bacon of the secret Works of Art and Nature, and of the Non-Entity of Magick.' At the end of this treatise we have explicitur epistola Baconis, &c. ad Gulielmum Parisiensem conscripta. It is divided into eleven chapters, of which the two last, (as we before observed) are appendices or postscripts. The other nine chapters, from their titles appear to be what have passed for his treatises, de Potestate mirabili Artis et Naturæ, i. e. 'Of the wonderful Power of Art and Nature;' de Vigore Artis et Naturæ, i. e. 'Of the Force of Art and Nature;' de Operibus occultis Naturæ, i. e. 'of the secret Works of Nature;' de Operibus non occultis, i. e. 'of the Works not secret;' de Rerum mirabilibus, i. e. 'of Wonders;' contra Necromanticos, i. e. 'against Necromancers;' de Necromanticis Imaginibus, i. e. 'of Necromantic Images;' de Geomantia, i. e. 'of Geomancy, or Divination by Points;' de Excantationibus, i. e. 'of Charms;' de Practicis Magiæ, i. e. 'of the Practices of Magick;' and, de Prolongatione Vitæ, i. e. 'of the Prolongation of life;' which is a different thing from that addressed to Pope Nicholas IV on the same subject. As to the two last chapters they are dated, but so confusedly, that instead of affording any light, they have hitherto served only to increase the obscurity. For example, the tenth chapter begins in the six hundred and second year of the Arabians, but it seems the manuscript was so obscure, that it might be read the six hundred eighty eighth year of the Arabians. John Dee (129) takes the first date, and from thence infers, that our author wrote to Clement the third instead of Clement IV, because the year 602 of the Hegira, answers to the year of Christ 1205, which is nine years before our author was born; the other date of 688 might possibly be true, since it answers to the year 1289, which is three years before our author's death. But though this be possible, yet it is far enough from being probable, and therefore we will next consider the date of the eleventh chapter, or second postscript. This is A. H. 630, which answers the year of our Lord 1232, and to the eighteenth year of our author's life; whence I am persuaded that both dates are wrong, nor do I know how it is possible to correct them; we may with certainty enough conclude, that these several little pieces were writ before character, and reputation of Roger Bacon, is in a great measure restored, so that we may truly judge of them all, and determine from the light of evidence, of the usage he has received from all parties. We may now justly applaud those learned prelates of Canterbury and Lincoln, and all the great men who were the patrons of his junior years, the encouragers of his riper studies, and the protectors of his injured innocence. We can plainly discern how harshly, cruelly, and unjustly he was persecuted, by the ignorant and malicious Monks of his order, who envied that learning which they ought to have imitated, and hated that reputation which it became them to admire. We know now with the year 1267, and that the the two last chapters were penned some years after the rest, and possibly A. H. 648 and 650. His next work was his Opus Majus divided into six parts, and had three tracts of his annexed. The several parts being separately transcribed, with a proper and distinct title to each, increased the supposed number of our author's works, by at least so many tracts. But let us explain this more particularly, and having so experienced a guide, as Dr Jebb, to direct us, let us try if we cannot point out the particular treatises which are involved in that great work. In the two first books are contained the treatises which have hitherto gone under the titles of de Impedimentis Sapientiæ, i. e. 'of the Impediments to Wisdom'; de Causis Ignorantiæ humanæ, i. e. 'of the Causes of human Ignorance'; and, de Utilitate Scientiarum, i. e. 'of the Usefulness of the Sciences.' The third book, is what was formerly called his book, de Utilitate Linguarum, i. e. 'of the Use of Languages.' In the fourth book of the Opus Majus, are his tracts of Centris Gravium, i. e. 'of the Centres of heavy Bodies'; de Ponderibus, i. e. 'of weights'; de Valore Musicis, i. e. 'of Musick'; de Judiciis Astrologiæ, i. e. 'of the Judgments of Astrology'; de Cosmographia, i. e. 'of Cosmography'; de Situ Orbis, i. e. 'of the Situation of the World'; de Regionibus Mundi, i. e. 'of the Regions of the World'; de Situ Palestinæ, i. e. 'of the Situation of Palestine'; de Locis Sacris, i. e. 'of the holy Places'; and, Descriptiones Locorum Mundi, i. e. 'Description of the World.' To this fourth book is annexed, his tract de Prognosticis ex Stellis, in which is comprehended, de Utilitate Astronomiæ, i. e. 'of the Usefulness of Astronomy'; Prognostica ex Siderum Cursu, i. e. 'Prognosticks from the Course of the Stars'; and perhaps also his tract, de Aspectibus Lunæ, i. e. of the Aspects of the Moon. His fifth part includes the various treatises of Perspective ascribed to him in the foregoing catalogue, viz. Perspectiva quædam singularis, Perspectiva distincta, and Perspectiva continua. To the end of this book is added, his large treatise de Specierum Multiplicatione. In the sixth book we find contained his tracts de Arte experimentalis, i. e. 'of the experimental Art'; de Radiis solaribus, i. e. 'of the solar Rays'; and, de Coloribus per artem fiendis, i. e. 'of the Colours that may be produced by Art.' Besides his Opus Majus, our author wrote two other pieces, and addressed them to the same patron, that is to say, Pope Clement IV. One of which he titled his Opus Minus, and the other Opus Tertium, of which there are still copies amongst the MSS in the Cotton library; but that of the Opus Minus is imperfect. It is not to be doubted, that in these works, abundance of the tracts which have been ascribed to our author are involved, the rather, because it is certain, that after the death of Pope Clement, Bacon revised and augmented these pieces, in order to render his system more compleat, and of greater use to posterity. There is in the Royal Library a treatise of our author's, which bears the title of Liber Naturalium Rogeri Bacon, which is the same that in the common catalogues of his works, is titled Communia Naturalis Philosophiæ, i. e. 'the Heads of Natural Philosophy'; which, on a closer inspection, appears to be the third part of the Opus Minus. On the whole, there is reason to believe, that in this treatise are comprehended the tracts following, de Summa Grammaticalis, de Constructione Partium, de Logica, de Laudibus Artibus Mathematicæ, Communis Naturalis Philosophiæ, de Intellectu et Intelligibili, and de Universalibus. His treatise of Chronology, which in the MS in the King's Library (130), is entitled Computus Rogeri Baconis, called by Balæus and Pitæus, Computus Naturalium. He divided it into three parts, at the end are subjoined a kalendar and some astronomical tables, which, though they have not his name to them, are most probably of his own composition; since he tells us himself, that he had undertaken to draw up such a set of tables, and some of them relate to the year 1269, which very well agrees with the age of Bacon (131). As to the chemical writings of our author, that are extant in MS. or in print, they are these; Traçtatus duo de Chemia, i. e. 'Two Treatises of Chemistry.' Speculum Alchemiæ, 'Mirror of Alchemy.' Thesaurum Chymicum, i. e. 'Chemical Treasure (132).' Specula Mathematica, i. e. 'Mathematical Mirrors.' Medulla Alchemiæ, in 8vo, ann. 1608, i. e. 'Marrow of Alchemy.' De Arte Chemia Scripta, i. e. 'Writings upon the Art of Chemistry.' Breviarium de dono Dei, 'Breviary of God's Gifts.' Verbum abbreviatum de Leone viridi, i. e. 'A short Word of the Green Lyon.' Secretum secretorum Naturæ de laude Lapidis Philosophorum, i. e. 'Secret of Nature's Secrets in praise of the Philosopher's Stone.' Traçtatus trium Verborum, i. e. 'Treatise of three Words.' Epistola de Modo miscendi, i. e. 'Epistle on the Manner of mixing.' Epistola secretissima de Ponderibus, i. e. 'A secret Epistle of Weights.' Speculum secretorum, 'Mirror of Secrets.' It is not easy to assign the dates of these several pieces, but most probably they were wrote and sent abroad before the time of his imprisonment, and they seem to have had a much greater currency than his other writings, since we find them frequently quoted by the succeeding sages in that school, such as Norton, Ripley, &c. About the year 1288, he addressed to Pope Nicholas IV, his book De retardandis senectutis accidentibus, which being divided into three parts, each of these has been taken for a separate treatise, and so the whole divided into De retardatione senectutis, i. e. 'Of the retarding Old Age.' De universalis regimine senum, i. e. 'Of the Regimen for Men in Years'; and De conservatione Senium, i. e. 'Of the Preservation of the Senes.' His last work, as we have already shewn, was his Compendium Theologiæ, i. e. 'Compendium of Divinity,' of which there are several MSS. yet in being, some more and some less perfect. Thus it plainly appears, that though it may be true, that some of our author's works are lost, or at least so hid, as that the publick has no knowledge of them; yet that the far greater part of Bacon's works still remain, and if they were published with the same care that has been taken about his Opus Majus, it would undoubtedly be an acceptable service rendered to the commonwealth of learning, and contribute not a little, to the bringing such pieces of our author to light, as are still buried in obscurity. We must likewise observe, in order to compleat the design of this note, that several of the pieces mentioned in the foregoing catalogue, are falsely ascribed to our author, and ought really to be accounted the works of other men. Such as the Treatise Of the Flux and Reflux of the British Sea, which belongs to William Burley (133). The discourse on the Usefulness of Astronomy, which is attributed to William Botoner (134). The treatise of the Magnet or Loadstone, said to have been written by Peter Peregrinus (135): The Rogerina Major & Minus, which as Dr Freind justly observes, are not at all like to be his, but belong rather to Roger of Parma (136). The treatise on the Psalms, and the Life of St Edmund Archbishop of Canterbury, we have already asserted to be the works of Robert Bacon (137). On the whole therefore it will appear from this account, that we are already in a much better condition in this respect, than Leland thought was possible; and that we know much more of the life, character, and writings, of this famous man, than Bale or Pits, or any of the writers who transcribe from them, which is not said with any design of discrediting their labours, but with a view to encourage others to surpass our's, and give still a clearer account of this admirable person and his discoveries, to which we shall esteem ourselves happy, if we have any way contributed by the pains we have bestowed.

(130) As we are informed by Dr Jebb in his preface to the Opus Majus.

with certainty to what Popes he address'd his writings, what those writings were, and why they were address'd to them. We can form a just notion of the reason why he was honour'd to so extraordinary a degree, by the most learned and the most worthy men of the age in which he flourish'd, and how his writings have been in some sort the standard of a true taste for science, that is to say, sought for and admir'd when it prevail'd, neglected and misrepresent'd whenever it was clouded or obscur'd. We are now sensible of the folly of those prejudices, the falshood of those calumnies, and the causes of those mistakes, which have been spread concerning our author and his writings. Lastly, we are enabled to discern, from the fullest and most authentick evidence, the justice and sincerity of those praises, which in the highest degree have been bestowed upon him, by the ablest writers and best judges of true and useful knowledge, in our own and in foreign countries [Z]. It is true, that a great deal of time and pains have

[Z] In our own and in foreign countries. It is a very just reflection made by Dr Freind, on the writers of our English history, who are so copious in their praises of much more inconsiderable persons, and yet silent as to Roger Bacon, 'that surely some relation of so extraordinary a genius, would have as well deserv'd to have had a place in their writings, as the detail of a blazing star or a bloody shower, which they never fail to register at large. And it might perhaps have been of as much use and pleasure to the reader, as a long recital of the rise and fall of a great minister, or the wars and victories of our Kings (138).' It is indeed doubtful, whether he would have been remembred at all in the times nearest his own, if it had not been for the rumours spread amongst the vulgar of his being a great Magician, and the honours paid him by the Alchemists at home and abroad, by whom he is always mention'd with great esteem, and as one of the Patriarchs in their science. Thus Thomas Norton, in his famous book on this subject, places him before Raymond Lully, and frequently cites his very words (139). He is also mention'd with great applause by George Ripley (140), which evidently shews, that his chemical works were universally known, among such as addict'd themselves to that study. It is not at all strange therefore, that when John Leland, with most laudable zeal, undertook to rescue some part of the literary history of his country from oblivion; he found it so difficult to obtain any tolerable account of our author's life and writings; as to which, however, he made very diligent search, and found enough to warrant his declaring our author, a man most diligent in acquiring every kind of learning, and justly meriting the title, of the miracle of the age in which he liv'd. Nay, so great an opinion had he of Bacon's learning, more especially in the Mathematicks, that he wishes for an hundred mouths and an hundred tongues to proclaim his praises, and most passionately deploras the various accidents, by which he was deprived of the pleasure of perusing all his works (141). Bishop Bale, though carried away at first by the stream of common opinion, yet afterwards did him ample justice, and fairly acknowledges, that he was both an excellent Mathematician, and a most learned Philosopher (142). John Pits gives him a very high character, and celebrates him as one perfectly skil'd in Poetry, Rhetoric, and every part of polite learning, all the liberal arts, in the several branches of Mathematicks, Physicks, and Philosophy, eminent in Divinity and Law, well read in Greek and Hebrew learning, and thoroughly vers'd in all the monuments of venerable antiquity. So that, says he, there was nothing wanting to render him the most knowing person of his age, and in every various kind of knowledge, most excellent. He vindicates him from all the injurious calumnies that had been thrown upon him, and very justly pronounces them the effects of that envy, to which the ignorant are provok'd against such as distinguish themselves by their extraordinary learning (143). After this, we find him mention'd with the greatest honour, by the most learned and most judicious writers, and it began to be account'd a merit to publish his writings, and to defend his character. The famous Dr John Dee (144), undertook the former, and promis'd the latter, and perhaps perform'd it too, though his work was never published. The learned Selden often mentions our author, with reverence and applause (145). The judicious Sir Thomas Brown, speaks of him with great respect, and takes particular notice of the story of the brazen-head, which he tells us, said no more than Time is; he will have it that this tale is too literally received, as being but a mystical fable concerning the Philosopher's great work, wherein he eminently labour'd, implying no more by the copper-head, than the vessel wherein it was wrought, and by the words it spake, than the opportunity to be watch'd of the birth of the mystical child, or Philosophical King; which critical opportunity having slipped, he mist'd the intended treasure; which, says Sir Thomas, had he obtain'd, he might have made out the tradition of making a brazen wall about England, that is the most powerful defence and strongest fortification, which gold could have effect'd (146). But our author's memory has been indebted to none more than the industrious Anthony Wood, who, with incredible pains and diligence, first drew together the most remarkable passages of Friar Bacon's history, from his own, and from the writings of original authors near his time (147). We have already shewn what the learned Dr Plot has said in his defence, in his excellent Natural History of Oxfordshire; but it may not be amiss to observe, that in another work of his, he takes notice of Friar Bacon's curious remarks, on the efficacy of unction and painting for preserving the body, and thereby prolonging life (148); as also, of his having observ'd the motion of asteria or star stones in vinegar, four hundred years before he wrote (149). Our author is likewise celebrated for his discoveries by the famous Joseph Glanvil, who wrote in defence of the Royal Society (150). The great Mr Boyle speaks of him as the father of the Chemists, and the author of that notion, that metals are compos'd of mercury and sulphur, which however he does not absolutely approve (151). The famous Dr Cave, says of him very truly, that being immerst in philosophick studies, he wholly gave himself up to the search of hidden things, so that penetrating into the secret recesses of nature, he was able to assign the causes of things, and so to exert the effects of his wisdom in practice, as by the performance of extraordinary deeds, to create in the vulgar an apprehension of his being a Magician (152). We have often quoted Dr Freind in his praise, so that we shall at present borrow only a few words from him, and these such as shew him to have been a very impartial judge. 'We find, says he, enough in him to let us see, that the pursuit after the Philosopher's stone began early; and Lully, who owns himself his disciple (which probably might be when both were at Paris) carried these visionary notions to an extravagant height. However, there is a great deal of new and solid learning upon this subject of Chemistry in the works of Bacon; if we strip it of that jargon of language, which was so fashionable in those times. We may be the less surpris'd to find such discoveries in him, who was indeed the miracle of the age he liv'd in (153).' After this excellent person, I shall not mention any more of our own countrymen, but content myself with shewing, in how great esteem our learned author has been with such foreigners, as were so happy to meet with, and so well vers'd in the sciences, as to be able to judge of his writings: For as to such as have written general introductions to literature, or short characters of great men, whose works they never saw, and on whom therefore they pass rash censures, capable only of misleading raw and weak minds, they are not worth regarding (154). The celebrated Picus de Mirandula, who was himself such a prodigy of learning, that, solely on this account, he was traduced for a Magician, from a supposition that it was impossible for him to have acquired so large a stock of science, without more than human assistance, speaks himself with reverence been employed, as indeed they were most necessary, to bring these several points, with the authorities requisite to support them, to the view of the publick; but, when the design of this work is considered, the merit of the man duly weighed, together with the glory which results to this nation from having produced, and that too in one of the darkest and most unlettered ages, the brightest and most universal genius, that perhaps the world ever saw, it is hoped that this time and pains, both with regard to the reader and the writer, will be esteemed properly employed.

and admiration of Roger Bacon (155). One of the most eminent members of the republick of learning in Holland, Gerard Joannes Vossius, has bestowed many and high commendations upon our author, whose works he had read and studied. I will mention only what he says of him in one place. 'In the year 1270

'flourished in every kind of learning among the English, Roger Bacon, a Monk of the Franciscan order, and an Oxford Divine, a man of such vast learning, that England, nay the whole world beside, had not in this respect his equal, or his second; yet either through the envy, or the ignorance, of the age in which he lived, he was stigmatized as a Magician (156). That most ingenious Danish Philosopher Olaus Borrichius, shewed himself a zealous admirer of Bacon's learning and merit, with which he was well acquainted, and asserts him to have discovered all the kinds of glasses now in use, to have known gun-powder, and to have made many other important discoveries, which entitle him, as he observes, to immortal reputation (157). In another book of his, he declares, that he had a most extensive and surprizing capacity, in penetrating whatever subject he studied. He recommends him as one of the most candid, as well as most able of the Chemists, and one from whom many of the rest borrowed (158).

There are few of the French writers who have given us greater marks of their general learning, than Gabriel Naudé, who expressly undertook the defence of our author, and who appears to have been very well acquainted with such of his writings, as in his time were made publick (159). The famous Morhoff mentions him often, and always with the greatest marks of approbation and esteem, and often with the highest praises; neither does he make any doubt of the discoveries ascribed to him by Wood, and other English writers (160). To him I may subjoin the learned and impartial Casimir Oudin, who, with infinite labour and diligence, has collected the best accounts that are any where to be met with, of the pieces written by Bacon, and the places where his manuscripts are preserved (161). The most judicious and indefatigable Fabricius, commends him highly in the short account he has given us of his life and writings. I cannot help taking notice of the amazing industry of this excellent person, whose labours are, and ever will be extremely useful to the lovers of learning; for though his account of Roger Bacon very little exceeds two pages, yet it plainly proves, that he had neglected nothing in his power, to gain a competent knowledge of this author and his works, and the desire he expresses of seeing Dr Jebb's edition of his Opus Majus, an account of which he had met with in a French Journal, is a singular instance of his veracity and willingness, to let his readers know, how far his materials extended and where they fell short (162). The most ingenious author of the History of Hermetick Philosophy Abbé Langlet du Fresnoy, has given a very concise and accurate account of Roger Bacon as a Chemist, and done him all the justice that could be desired (163). Another French writer of distinguished abilities, speaks of him with such an air of admiration, and so warmly asserts his right to those discoveries which have made other men famous, as shews, that he preferred truth to all things, and was resolved to espouse merit, in what age or country soever he found it (164). I shall conclude this catalogue of authorities in support of Bacon's character, which however long it may appear, comes very far short of what might have been collected, with that of the famous Boerhaave, who, in his account of Chemical writers, tells us, that Roger Bacon, an English Monk, who flourished in the thirteenth century, excelled in Alchemy, Chemistry, Natural Magic, Mechanics, Metaphysics, Physics, and Mathematics, and that such of his works, as have been handed down to us, are generally written in a clear, easy stile, without circumlocutions (165). Thus it appears that the reputation of this extraordinary person, has not risen from any superstitious regard to antiquity, or the prejudices of a few great men in his favour, but is truly founded on merit, and has been cherished and maintained, from a principle of justice, by the ablest men, and the most competent judges in all ages, and of all countries, from the times nearest his own, down to those in which we live.

B A C O N (Sir NICHOLAS) Lord Keeper of the Great Seal in the reign of Queen Elizabeth. He descended from an antient and honourable family in Suffolk [A]. His father was Robert Bacon of Drinkston in that county, Esq; and the name of his mother was Isabel, the daughter of John Gage of Pakenham in the said county, Esq (a). Our Nicholas was their second son, and born some time in the year 1510, at Chiffhurst in Kent (b). After having received the first rudiments of learning, either in the house of his father, or at some little school in the neighbourhood; he was sent when very young to Corpus Christi (vulgarly) Bennet college in Cambridge (c), where having improved himself in all branches of useful knowledge, for which he made a very grateful return [B], he travelled into France, and made some stay at Paris, in order to give the last polish to his education (d). On his return he settled in Gray's-Inn, and applied himself with such assiduity to the study of the Law, that he quickly distinguished himself in that learned profession, so that on the dissolution of the monastery of St Edmund's-Bury in Suffolk, he had a grant from King Henry VIII, in the thirty-sixth year of his reign, of

[A] An ancient and honourable family in Suffolk. The learned Camden tells us, that Averton, in the county of Suffolk, was the seat of the antient family of Bacon, who held the manor of Thornage and that of Brome, by conducting all the footmen of Suffolk and Norfolk to the wars in Wales (1), and indeed there is a fair pedigree of this family extant, which deduces them from Grimbaldus, who came over hither at the Norman conquest, and had lands given him near Holt in Norfolk, where he founded the parish church of Letheringset, of which he made his second son Parson. From him Robert Bacon, the father of our Nicholas, was lineally descended. In support of this account many quotations might be made from our most antient writers, and particularly from Weaver's Monuments, wherein there is mention made of many of the family of Bacon in Suffolk (2).

[B] A very grateful return. In regard to the university in general, he shewed his kindness, by making a present to the publick library of 103 Greek and Latin books, when such presents were much wanted, and not a little encouraged by his example (3). To the college he was a great benefactor, by endowing it with six scholarships, three of which he appropriated to his school of Botefdale, which he built, together with the chapel and library over it, shewing himself thereby a true lover and encourager of learning, which never enabled any family more conspicuously than his own (4).

of the manours of Redgrave, Botefdale, and Gillingham, with the park of Redgrave, and fix acres of land in Wortham, as also the tythes of Redgrave to hold in capite by Knight's service (e), which shews that he stood high at that time in the favour of his Prince, who was one that never gave or preferred but where true merit invited. In the thirty-eighth of the same King, he was promoted to the office of Attorney in the court of Wards, which was a place both of honour and profit. In this office he was continued by King Edward VI, his patent being renewed in the first year of that Prince (f), and in 1552, which was the last year of his reign, Mr Bacon was elected Treasurer of Gray's-Inn (g). His great moderation and consummate prudence, preserved him thro' the dangerous reign of Queen Mary. In the very dawn of that of Elizabeth he was knighted, and the Great Seal of England being taken from Nicholas Heath Archbishop of York, was delivered to Sir Nicholas Bacon, on the twenty-second of December 1558, with the title of Lord Keeper (h). He was also of the Privy-Council to her Majesty, who had much regard to his advice. The Parliament met on the twenty-third of January, but was prorogued on account of the Queen's indisposition to the twenty-fifth, when the Lord Keeper opened the session with a most eloquent and solid speech [C]. Some of the Queen's Counsellors thought it necessary that the attainder of the Queen's mother should be taken off, but the Lord Keeper was of another mind, he thought the crown purged all defects, and in compliance with his advice, two bills were brought into Parliament, and passed into laws, one for recognizing the Queen's title, the other for restoring her in blood as heir to her mother (i). The main business of this session was the settlement of religion, in which no man had a greater share than the Keeper, though he acted with such prudence as never to incur the hatred of any party. On this account he was made choice of, together with the Archbishop of York, to be Moderator in a dispute between eight Protestant Divines, and eight Popish Bishops, and the latter behaving very unfairly in the opinion of both the Moderators, and desiring, to avoid a fair disputation, to go away, the Lord Keeper put that question to each of them, and when all except one insisted on going, his Lordship dismissed them with this memorandum, For that ye would not that we should hear you, perhaps you may shortly hear of us, and accordingly for this contempt, the Bishops of Winchester and Lincoln were committed to the Tower, and the rest were bound to appear before the Council, and not to quit the cities of London and Westminster without leave (k). The whole business of the session, than which there was none of greater importance throughout that reign, was chiefly managed by his Lordship, who pursued therein his wife maxim, Let us stay a little, that we may have done the sooner (l), and thereby brought all to a good conclusion, ending the session as he began it, with a most excellent speech [D]. Thence-

[C] A most eloquent and solid speech.] The sum of his discourse was to this purpose, 'That the Queen had God before her eyes, and was not unmindful of holy precepts and divine counsels, and therefore meant chiefly in this conference; that the advancement of God's honour and glory, should be fought as the sure and infallible foundation, whereupon the policies of every good commonwealth were to be erected, and was as the strait line, whereby it was wholly to be directed and governed; and as the chief pillar and buttress, where-with it was to be continually sustained. And as the well and perfect doing of this, could not but make good success in all the rest; so the remis and loose dealing in it, would not but make the rest full of imperfection and doubtfulness, which must needs bring with them continual change and alteration; a thing to be eschewed in all good governments, but most of all in matters of faith and religion. That the Queen therefore, principally required them, for the duty they bore to God, and their service to her and their country, that in this consultation they would with all humbleness, fugleness, and pureness of mind, use their whole endeavour and diligence to establish that which by their wisdoms should be thought most meet, for the well preserving this godly purpose; and this without respect of honour, rule, or sovereignty, profit, pleasure, or ease; or of any thing that might touch any person in estimation or opinion of wit, learning, or knowledge; and without all regard of other affection. And that in their conference about this, they should wholly forbear, as a great enemy to good counsel, all manner of contention, reasonings, disputes, and sophistical, captious, and frivolous arguments and quiddities, matters for ostentation of wit, rather than consultation of weighty matters; comlier for scholars than counsellors. And because commonly they were causes of much expence of time, and bred no good resolutions. He advised that by counsel, provision should be made, that no contentious and contumelious words, as heretic, schismatic, papist, and such like, being nurses of seditious factions and sects, should be used, but banished out of men's mouths as the causers, continuers, and increasers of displeasure, hate, and malice; and as utter enemies of all concord and unity; and the very marks they were now come to shoot at. And that as nothing should be advised or done, that might any way breed or nourish any kind of idolatry or superstition; so heed was to be taken, that by licentious or loose handling, any occasion were given, whereby contempt, or irreverend behaviour towards God and godly things, might creep in (5).'

[D] A most excellent speech.] On the subject of religion he spoke thus: 'That as to the observation of the uniform order in religion, they of the Parliament, in their several places, should endeavour, to the best of their powers, to further and set forth the same; which by great and deliberate advice in that Parliament, had been established. That watch should be had of the withdrawers and hinderers thereof, especially of those that subtly, and by indirect means, sought to procure the contrary. Among these he comprehended, as well those that were too swift, as those that were too slow; those that went before the Law or behind the Law, as those that would not follow. For good government could not be where obedience failed, and both these alike broke the rule of obedience. That these were they, that in all likelihood would be the beginners and maintainers of factions and sects, the very mothers and nurses of all seditious and tumults. Of these therefore great heed should be taken; and upon their being found, sharp and severe corrections should be imposed, according to the order of Law; and that in the beginning, without respect of persons, as upon the greatest adversaries that could be to unity and concord, without which no commonwealth, he said, could long endure.' After this speech, which was made on the fifth of May, 1559, the Parliament was dissolved (6).

forward the Lord-Keeper stood as high in the favour of the Queen as any of her ministers, and he took care to fortify his friendship, by maintaining a cordial interest with other great men, particularly with those eminent persons (m), who had married into the same family with himself, viz. Cecil, Hobby, Rowlet, and Killigrew. By their assistance he maintained his credit at Court, though he sometimes differed in opinion from the mighty favourite Leicester, who yet once bid fair for his ruin. There was, it seems, great intrigues at that time carried on in relation to the succession. Some great men, and particularly the Earl of Leicester, pretended to favour the title of the Queen of Scots, whereas others were more inclined to the House of Suffolk. The Queen sometimes affected a neutrality, but at others, she shewed a tenderness for the title of the Scottish Queen. In 1564, when these disputes were at the height, one Mr John Hales, Clerk of the Hanaper, thought fit to write a treatise, or rather to publish it, for it seems to have been written before in favour of the Suffolk line, and directly, and in plain terms, against the title of the Queen of Scots. This book was complained of by the Bishop of Ross, who was Ambassador from the Queen of Scots, and his cause being warmly supported by the Earl of Leicester, Hales was committed to prison, and so severe an enquiry made after all who had any notice of, or had expressed any favour for, this piece, that at last the Lord-Keeper came to be suspected, which drew upon him the Queen's displeasure to such a degree, that he was forbid the Court, removed from his seat at Council, and prohibited from meddling with any affairs but those of the Chancery; nay Camden carries it so far as to say he was confined. Certain it is, that the Queen was much estranged from him, and he in the utmost danger of total ruin (n) [E]. At last, however, Cecil with much difficulty restored him to the Queen's good opinion, who in all probability liked him not the less in the succeeding part of her reign, for this distaste he had shewn towards the title of the Queen of Scots (o), as appears by her setting him at the head of that commission, granted in the year 1568 (p), for hearing the difference between that unfortunate Princess, and her rebellious subjects; and in 1571 (q), we find him again acting in the like capacity, though very little was done before the Commissioners at either time, and very likely this was what Queen Elizabeth chiefly desired, and the covering her inclination with a decent appearance of justice, was perhaps not a little owing to the address of the Lord-Keeper. Thenceforward he continued not only in, but at the head of her Majesty's Councils, and had a great hand in preventing, by his moderation, some warm advices that afterwards took effect. The share however that he had in the business of the Duke of Norfolk, his known dislike to the title of the Queen of Scots, and his great care for promoting the Protestant religion, created him many bitter enemies among the Papists both at home and abroad, who though they were able to do him no great hurt, yet by several bitter libels gave him no small pain (r) [F]. As a statesman he was remarkable for a clear head, and deep counsels, and

[E] In the utmost danger of total ruin.] This is the most curious, as well as most difficult point to settle, that occurs in the memoirs of this great man, and yet few of our historians have given any clear account of this matter. I will therefore endeavour to set it in the best light that may be, so that the reader may at least comprehend, how a matter of no great importance at first sight, came to affect so great a man so deeply. Among other projects formed by Queen Elizabeth, to make herself easy in relation to the Queen of Scots, one was contrived in the beginning of 1564, for marrying that Princess to Lord Robert Dudley, created for that purpose Earl of Leicester, and the great argument used to persuade the Queen of Scots to this marriage, was a solemn assurance, that upon it's taking place, Queen Elizabeth would declare her presumptive heir to the crown. This project alarmed all the great men, who were of a party opposite to that of the Earl of Leicester, and this induced them to wish that something might be written, to shew that this new project was impracticable, by reason of the title of the House of Suffolk to the crown. This occasioned some countenance to be given to a treatise written the year before, on the marriage of the Earl of Hertford with Lady Katherine Gray, under the title of A Declaration of the Succession of the Crown Imperial of England, which the author laboured to prove, must belong to the issue of this marriage (7). The Earl of Leicester highly resented this, for which various reasons have been assigned, the most obvious is it's crossing his intended match; a late writer has guessed, that he might think it necessary to declare against the House of Suffolk, because of his near relation to it, which might otherwise have brought him into suspicion with Queen Elizabeth (8). For my own part, I think a better reason than any of these may be given, and that is, his hopes of ruining his adversaries, by fixing this book upon them, which he knew must be as odious to the Queen his mistress, as to the Queen of Scots. In the month of April 1564, Hales was committed to the Fleet, and the farther enquiry into the matter, was committed to Sir William Cecil Secretary of State. He, in a letter to Sir Thomas Smith, written at this very time, expresses a great concern at his being obliged to meddle in so knotty a business, however he professes that he would act in it uprightly, and move neither to the right-hand nor to the left. Upon his report, one Mr Nudigate was likewise committed, and upon farther searching into the business, Lord John Gray of Pyrgo was retrained. These proceedings occasioned such general discontent, that the Queen thought proper to prorogue the Parliament, and in the month of November, Hales was committed to the Tower, and the Lord-Keeper disgraced, upon which Secretary Cecil in one of his letters says, The affairs of the nation suffered much, as well as the Lord-Keeper's life, being in danger through heaviness of mind (9), and this appears the more probable, since Lord Gray before-mentioned, died thro' apprehension of what might befall him. The matter suspected was, that the Lord-Keeper had some hand in writing the book. Anthony Wood tells us, that Cecil had as much hand in it as Bacon, but that it was agreed he should lay the whole weight upon the former, that he might preserve his interest with the Queen entire, and so be the more capable of bringing the Keeper again into favour, which however he was not able to do, till the beginning of the next year, nor had it been done at all, if Sir Anthony Browne, who in the reign of Queen Mary was Chief Justice of the Common-Pleas, would have accepted the seals, but he a wife man, and of a religion different from that of the State, wisely and steadily refused them, though strongly importuned by the Earl of Leicester, who by this gentleman's prudence, found all his fine-spun schemes defeated (10).

and while it was thought of some other great men that they seemed wiser than they were, yet the common voice of the nation agreed in this, that Sir Nicholas Bacon was wiser than he seemed. His great skill lay in balancing factions, and it is thought he taught the Queen that secret, the more necessary to her because the last of her family, and consequently without many of those supports incident to Princes (s). In the Chancery he distinguished himself by a very moderate use of power, and shewing great respect to the Common Law. At his own request, an act of Parliament was made, to settle and establish the power of a Lord-Keeper (t) [G]; though he might probably have taken away all need of this, by procuring the title of Lord Chancellor, but according to his motto which was Mediocra firma, he was content to be safe, and did not desire to be great. In that court, and in the Star-Chamber, he made use on proper occasions, of set speeches, in which he was happier than most men, pleasing the people by their sound, and charming the wisest men of that age with their sense, whence he attained the reputation of uniting two opposite characters, viz. of a witty and a weighty speaker (u). His great parts and great preference were far from raising him in his own opinion, as appears from the modest answer he gave Queen Elizabeth, when she told him his house at Redgrave was too little for him, Not so, Madam, returned he, but your Majesty has made me too great for my house. Yet to shew his respect for her Majesty's judgment, he afterwards added wings to his house (w). His modesty in this respect was so much the greater, since he had a great passion for building, and withal a very fine taste, as appeared by his house and gardens at Gorbambury near St Albans, a description of which the reader will find in the notes [H]. Towards the latter end of his life he became very corpulent, with having printed there several seditious books, sent one of them, entitled A Detection of certain Practices, &c. with the following letter, addressed to their loving friends, Sir Thomas Littleton, and Sir Thomas Russel, the Queen's Lieutenants in the county of Worcester. 'After our hearty commendations; foreseeing, by mature advice and consideration, the present perils and imminent dangers whereinto the realm is like to fall, and that even at hand, if wisdom prevent not the same; and having a natural care, and faithful affection towards our country, as becometh all true Englishmen, we have thought good, as well to prevent the peril, as also to take care for the continual, prosperous, and peaceable government of this State, to signify unto you, what we, as well by credible report of strangers, as also by the universal speech of our countrymen at home, understand to be the causes of these so sudden dangers like to ensue. The commonality of this realm are thoroughly persuaded, that the Lord-Keeper, Master Secretary, Mr Mildmay, and Mr Sadler, should so misgovern the State, and abuse our Sovereign; that all, or the most part, of these dangers should arise from them, as procurers of the same; and that by them, and the Paganical pretended Bishops, now usurping in this realm, we should be thus still drawn and continued in a religion of their devising, much worse than Turkerie, &c. (11).'

From the close of this letter it appears, that letters of the same sort had been dispatched to every county in England, with a view, no doubt, to stir up a general rebellion, under pretence, that the Queen was guided by evil Counsellors. In the beginning of the year 1572, there was a libel published in France, deeply charging the Lord-Keeper, and the Lord-High-Treasurer Burleigh, as traitors to the State of England, which book was written with such bitterness, that it gave these great men much disquiet. The Treasurer hereupon wrote to the English Ambassador, 'That he had a great mind to know who the author was, and desired him to make his enquiry, adding that if by means of the printer it might be found out, he would bestow a reward upon the discovery. But that if it could not, then he wished that some means might be used, as of himself, to the Queen-mother, that the print might be destroyed, for that otherwise they should think themselves, considering the places they held in this estate, not well considered by that estate. He added, that this licentiousness to inveigh against men by name in printed books, who did not themselves use by books to provoke any, was in all good estates intolerable. And then he added, by way of protestation of the integrity and faithfulness of both their services, God, said he, send this estate no worse meaning servants in all respects than we two have been, who indeed have not spared labour nor care to serve our Queen and country, and if we had not, we might truly avow, neither our Queen nor country had enjoyed

'that common repose that it hath done (12).' Mr Camden, in his Annals, tells us, the title of this book was, A Treatise of Treason, and that the Queen was so moved therewith, as to publish a proclamation to justify her Ministers, and directing that all these books should forthwith be brought in and burnt, under severe penalties (13).

[G] The power of a Lord-Keeper. We have before observed, that he was made Keeper of the Great Seal, the twenty-second day of December, 1 Eliz. (14), but it seems, after he had been some months in his office, he began to doubt to what degree his authority extended, which seems to have been owing to the general terms used upon the delivery of the Great-Seal, of which we have various instances in Rymer's Fœdera (15). Upon this, he first applied himself to the Queen, from whom he procured a patent, bearing date at Westminster, the fourteenth of April, in the first year of her reign, whereby she declares him to have as full powers as if he were Chancellor of England, and ratifies all that he had already done (16). This however did not fully satisfy him, but four years afterwards he procured an act of Parliament (17), which declares, 'That the Common Law always was, that the Keeper of the Great Seal always had, as of right belonging to his office, the same authority, jurisdiction, execution of laws, and all other customs, as the Lord Chancellor of England lawfully used.' What the true reason was that made his Lordship so uneasy, is not perhaps known to posterity, but Sir Henry Spelman (18) has observed, that for the benefit of that wise counsellor Sir Nicholas Bacon, the authority of the Keeper of the Great Seal, was by this law declared to be in all respects the same with that of the Chancellor.

On the dissolution of the monastery, it was granted to Ralph Rowlet, Esq; afterwards knighted, and by him conveyed to Sir Nicholas Bacon (19), who charmed with the pleasant situation, built here a neat and elegant house, adorned with fine gardens, which in those days made it very famous. Over the entrance into the hall stood these lines (20):

corpulent, which made Queen Elizabeth say merrily, that Sir Nicholas's soul lodged well, to himself however his bulk was very cumbersome, inasmuch, that after walking from Westminster-Hall to the Star-Chamber, which was but a very little way, he was usually so much out of breath, that the Lawyers forbore speaking at the bar till he recovered himself, and gave them notice of it by knocking with his staff (x). After having held the Great-Seal more than twenty years, this able Statesman and faithful Counsellor, was suddenly removed from this life, as a certain writer informs us, by the following accident. 'He was under the hands of his barber, and the weather being sultry, had ordered a window before him to be thrown open. As he was become very corpulent, he presently fell asleep, in the current of fresh air that was blowing in upon him, and awaked after some time distempered all over. Why, said he to the servant, did you suffer me to sleep thus exposed? the fellow replied, That he durst not presume to disturb him. Then said the Lord-Keeper, By your civility I lose my life; and so removed into his bed-chamber, where he died a few days after (y).' I have transcribed this story exactly, though I think there is some reason to doubt the circumstances of it, for all our writers agree, that Sir Nicholas Bacon paid his last debt to nature, on the twentieth of February 1579 (z), and one would imagine, that the weather could not then be very sultry, if it had, that must have been very unusual, and the historians of those times would not have failed to take notice of it. It cannot however be supposed, that such a fact as this is absolutely unsupported by authority, though the original writer, whoever he was, must probably have been mistaken, and have applied to Sir Nicholas Bacon, what was true of some other great person in those times. However that matter may be, most certain it is, that the Lord-Keeper Bacon, after a long, happy, and honourable life, died, equally lamented by the Queen and her subjects, as I have said, on the twentieth of February 1579, and on the ninth of March following, was buried with great solemnity, under a sumptuous monument erected by himself in St Paul's church (a) [I]. Camden's character of him is just and plain, Vir præpinguis, ingenio acerrimo, singulari prudentia, summa eloquentia, tenaci memoria, & sacris Conciliis alterum Columnen (b). i. e. Over a gate leading into the orchard, which had a garden on one side and a wilderness on the other, under the statue of Orpheus, stood these verses:

Horrida nuper eram aspectu latebræque ferarum,
Ruricolis tantum numinibusque locus.
Edomitor faustò huc dum forte supervenit Orpheus
Ulterius qui me non sinit esse rudem;

And rais'd a shade that deities might please.
Labours like his my Orpheus here employ,

In the orchard was a little banquetting-house, adorned with great curiosity, having the liberal arts beautifully depicted on it's walls, over them the pictures of such learned men as had excelled in each, and under them, verses expressive of the benefits derived from the study of them.  The same who was so long
 The second pillar of the British state,
 Scourge of the wicked, to the good a refuge;
 Whom no blind fate exalted
 To this high honour; but equity and truth,
 Learning, piety, and exalted prudence:
 Think not that death has snatched him,
 Because in one short life, he merited two without end:

 His fame, which fills the world, is to him a third life:
 Here inscribed lies the body, his soul once inhabited,
 Under a monument sacred to his deathless memory.

BACON (FRANCIS) Viscount St Albans, and High-Chancellor of England in the reign of King James I, the glory and ornament, as he has been justly stiled, of his age and nation. His parents were, Sir Nicholas Bacon, Lord-Keeper of the Great-Seal, with whose character the reader is already acquainted; his mother, Anne, one of the daughters of Sir Anthony Cook, Tutor to King Edward VI, a lady equally distinguished by her piety, prudence, and learning (a). She was the second wife of Sir Nicholas Bacon, and this Francis her second son, was born at York-House in the Strand, on the twenty-second of January, 1561 (b). His infancy being past, his noble genius, cultivated and encouraged by his excellent parents, gave early proofs of its surprizing strength and pregnancy, insomuch, that we may justly say, his fame commenced with his childhood, as it accompanied him to his grave; for so remarkably conspicuous were his parts, even in his tender years, that persons of great worth and high dignity, delighted in conversing with him while a boy, and Queen Elizabeth herself, whose peculiar felicity it was to make a right judgment of merit, was so charmed with the solidity of his sense, and the gravity of his behaviour, that she would often call him her young Lord-Keeper (c); a happy presage, which, in the succeeding reign, was fully accomplished. When he had acquired the necessary rudiments of learning to qualify him for academical studies, he was sent to the university of Cambridge, where, on the sixteenth of June 1573, he was entered of Trinity-college, under Dr John Whitgift, afterwards Archbishop of Canterbury, being then in the twelfth year of his age (d). The quickness of his natural parts, assisted by an uncommon diligence and application, under the direction of as able and careful a Tutor, as any that learned age afforded, enabled our young scholar to make a most surprizing progress in his studies; so that before he was full sixteen, he had not only run through the whole circle of the liberal arts, as they were then taught, but began to perceive those imperfections in the reigning Philosophy, which he afterwards so effectually exposed, and thereby, not only overturned that tyranny which prevented the progress of true knowledge, but laid the foundation of that free and useful Philosophy, which has since opened a way to so many great and glorious discoveries (e). A thing highly worthy of notice, and which would certainly be esteemed incredible, if it were not supported by as clear evidence, as the nature of the fact requires [A]. His father, the Lord-Keeper, discovering in his son such a ripeness of judgment and discretion, as seemed to warrant taking an extraordinary step in his education, resolved to send him, young as he was, to France, that he might improve himself in the knowledge of the world, under a Minister, as capable and as honest as that age produced, Sir Amias Powlet, then the Queen's Ambassador at Paris. His behaviour while in the house of that famous statesman was so well conducted, that he gained the esteem and confidence of Sir Amias to such a degree, as to be intrusted with a commission of importance to the Queen, which required both secrecy and dispatch. To execute this he came over hither, and performed it with such applause, as gained both himself and the Ambassador credit (f). He afterwards returned to Paris, from whence he made some excursions into the French provinces, that he might be the better acquainted with the country, residing for some time at Poitiers, and making such observations upon men and things, as opportunities would allow, of which we have a remarkable instance in his writings [B]. He applied himself during his stay there, not only to such studies as were agreeable to his inclination, but to those likewise, for his improvement in which, his father might probably be supposed to have sent him thither, as appears from a very ingenious and elegant performance of his, containing A succinct View of the State of Europe at that time, which, as the worthy writer of his life, with great penetration has observed, appears plainly to have been written when our author was but nineteen (g). In this short treatise there appears, not only much of the spirit and judgment, but of the method also which he pursued in his succeeding writings, which is a point particularly worthy of notice, because it corroborates and supports what has been before related, of his early proficiency, and surprizing progress in learning, and is indeed, not only worthy in all respects of so great a genius, but deserves likewise to be especially pointed out, for the imitation of other young gentlemen in like circumstances [C].

But

[A] As clear evidence as the nature of the fact requires. We are indebted to Dr Rawley, who was our author's Chaplain, for this and many other circumstances relating to the earlier years of his life. He tells us, for instance, that Queen Elizabeth was charmed at an answer given her by Bacon, when a perfect child. Her Majesty it seems had asked him how old he was, to which he answered, that he was two years younger than her Majesty's happy reign. (1). There was certainly a great deal of wit in this sprightly and well-turned compliment, from whence one may easily be induced to believe, that by the help of his education, and the example of his parents, the best bred and the most learned couple of their time, Mr Bacon might have acquired very extraordinary lights even before he went to the University. But the point which in this note we are to make good, was not at all of this nature, since, whatever he heard of Aristotle before he went to College, must have been such things as would have served rather to impress on him an awe of his authority, than a distrust of his knowledge. Yet we are assured by Dr Rawley, that he received this particular from Lord Bacon's own mouth, who likewise told him, that his exceptions against that great Philosopher were not founded upon the worthlessness of the author, to whom he would ever ascribe all high attributes, but for the unfruitfulness of the way; being a Philosophy (as his Lordship used to say) only for disputations and contentions, but barren in the production of works for the benefit of the life of man, in which mind he continued to his dying day. (2). Dr Tenison likewise, in his introduction to the Baconiana tells us, that when our author began his studies, Aristotle was in effect, the Pope in Philosophy, the lectures both in his private college and in the publick schools, were generally expositions upon Aristotle's text, and every opinion written by him as his own, was esteemed as authentic, as if it had been given under the seal of the Fether; it was therefore a very singular felicity in a young gentleman, to see farther into nature than the celebrated Philosopher, at whose feet he was placed; and it was as happy as it was extraordinary, that he took dislike betimes at the vulgar schemes of Natural Philosophy. 'Use and custom in that way, continues Dr Tenison, might have reconciled it to him, as it had done to others of great learning. For a Philosopher is like a vine, of which they say, it must be set of a plant and not of a tree. But tho' there was bred in Mr Bacon so early a dislike of the Physiology of Aristotle, yet he did not despise him with that pride and haughtiness, with which youth is wont to puffed up. He had a just esteem of that great master of learning, a greater than that which Aristotle expressed himself, towards the Philosophers that went before him, for he endeavored (some say) to stile all their labours,

'designing to himself an universal monarchy over opinions, as his patron Alexander did over men. Our hero owned what was excellent in him, but in his enquiries into nature, he proceeded not upon his principles. He began the work anew, and laid the foundation of philosophic theory in numerous experiments (3). Thus we see that upon the whole, there is not the least reason to doubt the truth of this matter of fact, how extraordinary soever it may appear in its nature, and we shall very soon have occasion to support the evidence already given, by another proof as convincing as either of those which we have alledged already; for truths appear clearer the more closely they are examined, whereas errors, however specious, cannot endure such tests.

[B] Of which we have a remarkable instance in his writings. The most curious as well as the most authentic passages of the lives of learned men, are usually drawn from their own works, and therefore they ought to be read with the utmost attention for this purpose. The passage I am to cite on this occasion, has not, for any thing that I know, been taken notice of by any who have laboured to oblige the world with memoirs of this learned person; and I the rather cite it, because it shews how early he began those enquiries into human nature, which were finished only with his life. Speaking of the differences between youth and old age, and having enumerated many of them, he proceeds thus: When I was a young man at Poitiers in France, I familiarly conversed with a young gentleman of that country, who was extremely ingenious, but somewhat talkative, he afterwards became a person of great eminence. This gentleman used to inveigh against the manners of old people, and would say, that if one could see their minds as well as their bodies, their minds would appear as deformed as their bodies; and indulging his own humour, he pretended; that the defects of old men's minds, in some measure corresponded to the defects of their bodies. Thus dryness of the skin, he said, was answered by impudence; hardness of the viscera, by relentlessness; blear-eyes, by envy; and an evil eye, their down look, and incurvation of the body, by atheism, as no longer, says he, looking up to heaven; the trembling and shaking of the limbs, by unsteadiness and inconstancy; the bending of their fingers, as to lay hold of something, by rapacity and avarice; the weakness of their knees, by fearfulness; their wrinkles, by indirect dealings and cunning, &c (4).

[C] The imitation of other young gentlemen in like circumstances. The principal design in travelling is, or ought to be, the shaking off such prejudices as are contracted in a manner unavoidably in the course of common education, and the acquiring such lights, by experience and enquiry, as can be obtained no

But while he was thus improving his talents abroad, his fortune received a very untoward check at home, by the sudden and unexpected death of his father, the Lord-Keeper, who having provided amply for his eldest son by his second venter, had laid by a considerable sum of money for the settlement of the younger son, but dying before he could find a proper purchase, Mr Francis Bacon had no more than the fifth part of this money for his whole fortune, which proving but a narrow provision, he found himself obliged to return to England, and to think of some profession that might sustain his fortune (b). He was not long in making this choice, in which perhaps the advice of his relations, the persuasion of friends, and the fame of his father, had to the full as great a share as his own inclinations. However that might be, he, on his return home, applied himself to the study of the Common Law, and for that purpose entered himself of the honourable society of Gray's-Inn, where his superior talents rendered him the ornament of the house, as the gentleness and affability of his deportment, procured him the affection of all its members. The place itself was so agreeable to Mr Bacon, that he erected there a very elegant structure, which for many years after was known by the name of the Lord Bacon's Lodgings, which he inhabited occasionally through the greatest part of his life, and thereby testified, how pleasantly he had passed his time in that seat of learning, while he had no higher title than that of a member of Gray's-Inn (i). He spent his time during the first years of his residence in that place, in very hard study, not confining himself entirely to the Law, which however he made sufficiently his care, but indulging his extensive genius, in the free contemplation of the whole circle of science. This appears clearly from hence, that he framed, as he tells us himself, not long after his being settled here, the plan of that great philosophical work, which will not only render his name immortal, but do honour to his age and country, so long as learning shall continue to flourish (k). As to this tract of his, in which, as an ingenious writer observes, he traced the out-lines of that magnificent structure, which after thirty years labour he finished; it seems (at least to me) doubtful, whether it be entirely lost, or whether we have it still as it's author left it, imperfect and unfinished [D]. But though he did not entirely other way. It was to facilitate these, that Mr Bacon composed, as far as we can judge from the piece itself, this treatise intitled, Of the State of EUROPE (*), in which he sets down the names of all the Princes then reigning, their characters, families, interests, dominions, forces, revenues, and principal transactions of their reigns; together with some notices of their ministers, favourites, and the principal persons in their dominions; which without doubt our author drew forth into this form, that he might with the greater ease, understand what he heard or read concerning them, as also to help his own conversation on any of these subjects, and thereby prevent his falling into any of those errors, which are but too common with young travellers, and which frequently lay them open to such corrections, as must naturally put them out of countenance. It is a very ingenious observation of Mr Mallet, who has written our author's life with great spirit and vivacity, that this tract must have been written about the year 1580, because he tells us therein, that Henry III of France was then thirty years old; and as that Prince began his reign in 1574, when he was twenty-four years of age; this is certainly a very clear proof of the fact, and that our author composed this work by that time he was nineteen (5). I cannot however help believing, that it was not composed all at once, but rather, that our author began it in his travels, and afterwards revised and finished it when he was settled at Grays-Inn. I am confirmed in this by observing some other dates, mentioned in this short tract, which do not fall in exactly with that year; as for instance, speaking of Pope Gregory XIII, he says, he was then seventy years old, but as that Pontiff died in 1585, at the age of eighty-three (6); it is plain that he must have wrote this particular passage in 1582. Again, speaking of Philip II King of Spain, he says he was about sixty years of age, but this King Philip was born in 1527, and consequently, was not sixty till the year 1587 (7); and if we examine his other dates with the same care, we shall find that they refer to different years, which plainly proves that my conjecture is probable at least, if not certain. But what is extremely remarkable in this small treatise, is the care and accuracy with which he has set down most of the little Princes in Germany, with the state of their dominions. In short, the whole of this piece argues the author's great diligence and exactness, and at the same time demonstrates, how early he had found the advantages of committing whatever he thought worthy of notice to writing, and reducing it into a proper method: To say the truth, this was a thing very customary in those days, with such as applied themselves to the study of publick affairs, with a view to make themselves useful to the state; of which many instances might be given, if we had not already exceeded the bounds of a note, and spent rather too much time upon a performance, chiefly remarkable, for being in all probability the first that fell from the pen of this eminent writer, and in all likelihood, was never intended by it's author for the eye of the publick; though from the great esteem attracted by many excellent works, it was justly held a benefit conferred upon posterity to deliver from obscurity, whatever was assuredly the product of so vast a genius.

[D] Or whether we have it still as it's author left it imperfect, and unfinished.] In order to clear up this subject, I shall endeavour to shew on what grounds it is believed our author wrote such a work so early; next, what the title of that piece really was; and lastly, what reasons there are to conceive it is not wholly lost, as has hitherto been the common opinion. As to the first, the author himself, in a letter to Father Fulgentio, a very learned Italian (9), who desired to have an account of the works he had already written, and of those he had still thoughts of making publick, having first mentioned the several parts of his great body of Philosophy, which had already seen the light, he goes on thus: 'Attamen in prodromis (sui dico) tantum, quæ ad universalis naturæ fere pertingunt non levia jacta erunt hujus rei fundamenta. Conamur (ut vides) tenues grandia: in eo tamen spem ponentes, quod videntur ista a Dei providentia & immensa bonitate profecta. Primo, propter ardorem & constantiam mentis nostræ, quæ in hoc instituto non confenuit, nec tanto temporis spatio refrixit. Equidem memini me quadraginta abhinc annis juvenile opusculum circa has res confecisse, quod magna prorsus fiducia et magnifico titulo, temporis partum maximum inscripsi. Secundo quod propter utilitatem infinitam Dei opt. max. auctoramento gaudere videatur (10).' That is, Nevertheles, in these introductory pieces (those I mean which related chiefly to generals) the foundation of this matter was not hastily laid. We struggled (as you see) to effect great things by a small force, putting our firm confidence in God, that through his providence and great goodness, we should accomplish them. First, because of the ardour and constancy of our mind, which grew not languid after making a beginning, or cooled at all in so long a space. For well I remember that forty years ago, I composed a juvenile work about these things, which with great confidence, I graced with the swelling confine his thoughts to his profession, yet his quick parts and surprizing penetration, enabled him to make as rapid a progress in that, as in other kinds of learning, and the rather, because he was extremely methodical, and wonderfully diligent in his study, taking all imaginable pains, to make himself thoroughly master of the principles of the Law, and to extend his knowledge gradually through all the branches of that laborious, but most useful and noble profession, as is very evident, from his solid and learned writings. He distinguished himself no less in his practice, which was very considerable, and after discharging the office of Reader at Gray's-Inn, which he did in 1588, when in the twenty-sixth year of his age; he was become so considerable, that the Queen, who never over-valued any man's abilities, thought fit to call him to her service, in a way which did him very great honour, by appointing him her Counsel learned in the Law Extraordinary; by which, tho' she contributed abundantly to his reputation, yet she added but very little to his fortune, as indeed in this respect he was never much indebted to her Majesty, how much soever he might be in all others (1). We are henceforth to consider him in a new character, I mean that of a statesman and candidate for Court favour, as well as a Lawyer, and it will require some pains, and much caution, so to speak of him in this light, as to avoid injuring either his character or the truth. He seemed to come into the world with as great advantages, and with as high pretensions to preferment as any man

ling title of the Greatest Birth of Time. Secondly, because for it's infinite utility, the most wise God seemed to encourage my progress. It is very clear from hence, that our author wrote a book, containing the rudiments of his Philosophy, when he was very young; for if we should even allow this letter which is without date, to have been written in the last year of his life, yet this will carry the treatise so far back as to the year 1586, when our author was in the twenty-sixth year of his age, and before he had attained to any preferment; and it is possible, that it might have been wrote some time before. As to the title of this book, the Reader has it in the letter, but then there is some doubt, whether this title were the true one, or rather as I think, whether it was the only one. It may not be amiss to hear, what a very learned editor of some of our author's works has said upon this subject, in which, speaking of the works of Lord Bacon that are missing, he says (11), 'Loft likewise is a book, which he wrote in his youth, he called it (Temporis Partus Maximus) the Greatest Birth of Time, or rather, Temporis Partus Masculus, the Masculine Birth of Time, for so Gruter found it called in some of the papers of Sir William Boswell; this was a kind of embryo of the Instauration, and if it had been preserved, it might have delighted and profited philosophical readers, who could then have seen the generation of that great work, as it were, from the first egg of it.' In like manner the ingenious Mr Mallet (12), speaking of this treatise, is pleased to deliver himself thus: 'Tho' the piece itself is lost, it appears to have been the first out-lines of that amazing design, which he afterwards filled up and finished, in his grand Instauration of the Sciences; as there is not a more amusing, perhaps a more useful speculation, than that of tracing the history of the human mind, if I may so express myself, in it's progression from truth to truth, and from discovery to discovery; the intelligent reader would, doubtless, have been pleased, to see in the tract I have been speaking of, by what steps and gradations, a spirit like Bacon's advanced in new and universal theory.' But perhaps, after all this, the treatise so much deplored may not be lost, for it is certain, that the tract mentioned by Gruter, under the title of Temporis Partus Masculus, or the Masculine Birth of Time; is in some measure preserved by him, in the Latin works which he published of Lord Bacon, and we find it again in the latest English edition of his works, in the language and state in which it's noble author left it (13). But here seems to lie the difficulty, some writers who have reviewed the scattered works and fragments of Lord Bacon, have with great labour and industry, endeavoured to bring in this treatise, otherwise stiled Of the Interpretation of Nature, as a part of that great body of Philosophy which he had framed; whereas our author himself, speaking of this treatise, tells us, as the reader may see above, that it was not a part or portion of his great structure of Philosophy, but the first sketch or rough draft of the whole. Now I conceive, that whoever looks into these fragments of the book on the Interpretation of Nature, as they stand in the works of our author, and shall afterwards compare them with the beginning of his Instauration, will not need many arguments to persuade him, that this conjecture is founded in truth, and that there is as much reason to conceive that the great work just mentioned, rose out of the Temporis Partus Masculus, as that the Novum Organon, sprung from another of the fragments which accompanies this, and is commonly called his Cogitata & Visa. If the reader would be told what is the issue, what the advantage of this laboured inquiry, he will surely be satisfied with this answer, That by drawing these fragments of the Interpretation of Nature into a good light, it appears, that what the honest and candid Tenison thought so fine a fight, the generation of Lord Bacon's Philosophy from the egg is still in our power; and what the ingenious and instructive Mr Mallet most truly observes, the ability of reviewing and tracing the author's steps from one discovery in science to another, is yet in a great measure with us, which, to such as rightly apprehend Lord Bacon's worth, and have a just conception of the value of his writings, will appear somewhat of considerable consequence. I am satisfied, that in matters of this nature there is no absolute certainty, and that in the depths of Lord Bacon's knowledge, a man of ordinary talents may be very easily lost; but I own at the same time, the thing struck me so strongly, that I could not help putting it down, yet with all imaginable submission to the reader, to whose service as I dedicate my labours, I hope (should it be found so) he will the more easily pardon my mistake. There are, however, a few circumstances more, to which I must desire the reader's attention, and then he will have a just notion of Mr Bacon's frame of mind. While at Gray's-Inn, he was eagerly engaged in the study and pursuit of his new Philosophy, the whole scheme of which he had already formed. It was to this he applied his thoughts, and this was the great object of his ambition. If he desired or laboured for preferment in civil life, it was but with a view to gain thereby the means of improving and accomplishing his system, for he made even the most shining transactions of his life, but subservient thereto. In a word, the introducing this new method of attaining wisdom was his ruling passion, and his great spring of action through life. It quickened him in the pursuit of employments, it consoled him when he met disappointments in that pursuit; it filled up (most agreeably) his few leisure moments when in the zenith of his grandeur; it softened his fall, by proposing a new road to fame and esteem, in which he was in no danger of being either imposed on by one set of men, or sacrificed to the interests of another. Thus, this was always, and in all conjunctures, his leading object, of which he never lost sight, and as we have already had a train of evidence sufficient to convince us, that he conceived something of this kind when he was but sixteen, and brought it into some form by that time he was twenty-six; so the remainder of this article will show, how warmly he prosecuted this point till death overtook him on the road, when his mind was wholly occupied with these speculations.

man of his time; for, besides being the son of a Lord-Keeper of the Great-Seal, and one of the ablest statesmen of the age, he was nephew to William Lord-Burleigh, who married his mother's sister, and first cousin to Sir Robert Cecil, his son, who was Principal Secretary of State, so that one would have thought Mr Bacon's abilities, supported by such powerful mediators, might easily have made their way at Court (m). But it was his misfortune to have too much merit, and too extensive interest, the former rendered him suspicious to his Court patrons, and the latter engaging both parties in his favour, produced him much credit, but contributed more than any thing to spoil his fortune. The Court and Ministry of Queen Elizabeth, was through her whole reign divided into two parties, at the head of one of which were the two Cecils, and at the head of the other, first the Earl of Leicester, and afterwards his son-in-law the Earl of Essex (n). If Mr Bacon, who, as we have already shewn, was nearly allied to their family, had steadily adhered to the Cecils, he might very probably have risen by their interest, but he made a very early friendship with Robert Earl of Essex, who was at the head of the other faction, and attached likewise his elder brother, Mr Anthony Bacon, to that nobleman's service, and that in so strict a manner, as could not fail to give great jealousy to the Cecils (o). All these are indisputable matters of fact, and therefore such as are acquainted with the intrigues of a court, will not be very much surprized at the fate of Mr Bacon, of whose parts and application, while both parties made their advantage, yet neither made his fortune. Sir Robert Cecil is represented, and perhaps justly, as the person who threw those obstacles in Mr Bacon's way, that throughout this whole reign he was never able to surmount, for he who had all the arts and address of a Court, failed not to suggest, that Mr Bacon was a speculative man, and consequently the less fit for business, one who had his head full of philosophical notions, and therefore more like to perplex than to promote publick affairs, if permitted to have any share in their direction (p). However, that they might not seem to neglect so near a relation, or to slight a person of such distinguished abilities, the Cecils procured for him the reversion of a very considerable place, viz. the Register of the Court of Star-Chamber, which nevertheless he did not enjoy till the next reign (q) [E]. As for his other patron, Robert Earl of Essex, as he was a nobleman justly celebrated for his great qualities and eminent virtues, so he approved himself to Mr Bacon, a warm, steady, and indefatigable friend. This appeared clearly, upon Mr Bacon's pressing very earnestly to be made Queen's Solicitor, in the year 1594, in which he made use of all his friends, and exerted his own endeavours to the utmost; it was now that he discovered, how little reason he had to trust to, or depend upon, the Cecils, and had very little cause to be well pleased with the conduct of the then Lord-Keeper (r); but as for the Earl of Essex, he not only afforded him all the assistance, both by personal application, and by engaging his friends to interest themselves on the behalf of Mr Bacon, that was in his power, but had so generous a concern for his want of success in that application, which he believed to be owing to his own appearing in this gentleman's cause, that he most kindly and freely made him amends for his disappointment out of his own fortune (s) [F]. This was so rare, so extraordinary an [E] The register of the court of Star-Chamber which however he did not enjoy till the next reign. When our author first applied himself to publick affairs, he studied to recommend himself solely to the good graces of the Lord High-Treasurer Burleigh, from whom, as his uncle, he expected, and had reason to expect, the fairest quarter in the world. We learn this from his own writings, for there are many of his letters to that noblemen still extant, in which he declares no less, and expresses a very warm and passionate desire, to dedicate himself entirely to the Queen's service, through the interposition, and solely by the recommendation of that great minister (14). It was by the means of that Lord he obtained the reversion of this office, as he acknowledges in the same letters, with this additional circumstance, that his Lordship obtained it for him, notwithstanding a vehement opposition. What this place was and the value of it, Dr Rawley, who was his Lordship's Chaplain, and one who lived with him in the strictest intimacy, tells us plainly, and with circumstances worthy notice (15). 'His birth and other capacities, says he, qualified him above others of his profession ' to have ordinary access to Court, and to come ' frequently into the Queen's eye, who would often grace ' him with private and free communication, not ' only about matters of his profession or business ' in Law, but also about the arduous affairs of state, ' from whom she received from time to time a great ' satisfaction. Nevertheless, though she cheared him ' much with the bounty of her countenance, yet she ' never cheared him with the bounty of her hand, ' having never conferred upon him any ordinary place, ' or means of honour, or profit, save only one dry ' reversion of the Register's office in the Star-Chamber, ' worth about 1600 l. per Ann. for which he waited

' in expectation, either fully, or near, twenty years; ' of which his Lordship would say in Queen Elizabeth's time, That it was like another man's ground ' buttalling upon his house, which might mend his ' prospect, but it did not fill his barn. His having the reversion of this place, I take to be the reason, why several writers stile him one of the clerks of the privy-council (16), for that he had no other employment than this under that reign, is very clear from the foregoing passage in Dr Rawley's Memoirs, and from his own letters (17). It was in gratitude for his obtaining for him this reversion, that in the year 1592, our author composed a large treatise, which he called Certain Observations upon a Libel entitled, A Declaration of the true Causes of the great troubles; in which he very warmly vindicates the Lord Treasurer particularly, and his own father, and the rest of Queen Elizabeth's ministers occasionally, and this I take to have been the first political production of his pen (18), and, by the way, it may not be amiss to remark, that these sort of ministerial pamphlets were much in fashion in those days, and proved the great support of that Queen's administration; for her Ministers being wise and able men, and acting upon just and honest principles, were not afraid of explaining and justifying their conduct, by which they were sure to satisfy the sensible part of the nation, and secure to themselves the rational support of a well founded popularity during their lives, and a just respect for their memories after their decease; which are blessings that can never be enjoyed by wicked or weak ministers, such as act either upon bad principles, or upon no principles at all.

[F] Made him amends for his disappointment out of his own fortune. We learn this singular particular from best authority possible; viz. that of our

an instance of this nobleman's sincere friendship, and tender regard for Mr Bacon, and at the same time, so noble a testimony of his spotless honour and boundless generosity, that one would have thought it must for ever have attached Mr Bacon to that Earl's fortunes. But it happened otherwise; that great favourite fell into deep misfortunes; which prove so frequently the fate of all Court favourites, that it ought not to be esteemed a wonder; yet, that Mr Bacon should be apparently, and in the eye of the world, an instrument of his misfortunes, that in the exercise of his profession he should appear against him as a Lawyer, that he should plead for the Crown when that nobleman was tried for his life, and that after he had suffered a shameful death, Mr Bacon should endeavour to perpetuate this shame, by drawing that declaration of the treasons of the late Earl of Essex, which was calculated to justify the government, in a measure very disagreeable to the bulk of the people, and to ward off the publick hate, from those who had ruined the Earl of Essex, and had never done Mr Bacon any good; this indeed is strange, but at the same time it is true, so true, that our author found himself obliged to write an apology for his conduct, which he addressed to the Earl of Devonshire, who was the fast friend of the unhappy Earl of Essex, and his own (t) [G]. But this apology, though admirably well penned, and which seems to be as much distinguished by the sincerity of the writer's heart, as enlivened by the beauties of his eloquence; yet amounts to no more than this, that he had given the Earl good advice, which he did not follow; that upon this a coldness ensued, which kept them at a greater distance than formerly; that however he continued to give his advice to the Earl, and laboured all he could to serve him with the Queen; that in respect to his last unfortunate act, which author himself, who in his apology (19) addressed to the Earl of Devonshire, gives us the story at large in these words: 'I trust and will ever acknowledge my Lord's love, trust, and favour towards me, and last of all his liberality, having enfeoffed me of land, which I sold for eighteen hundred pounds to Master Reynold Nicholas, which I think was more worth, and that at such a time, and with so kind and noble circumstances, as the manner was as much as the matter, which though it be but an idle digression, yet because I am not willing to be short in commemoration of his benefits, I will presume to trouble your Lordship with relating to you the manner of it. After the Queen had denied me the Solicitor's place, for the which his Lordship had been a long and earnest suitor on my behalf, it pleased him to come to me from Richmond to Twicknam-park, and brake with me, and said, Mr Bacon, the Queen hath denied me the place for you, and hath placed another; I know you are the least part of your own matter, but you fare ill, because you have chosen me for your mean and dependance; yet you have spent your time and thoughts in my matters; I die, (these were his words) if I do not somewhat toward your fortune, you shall not deny to accept a piece of land, which I will bestow upon you. My answer, I remember, was, that for my fortune, it was no great matter, but that his Lordship's offer, made me call to mind what was wont to be said when I was in France of the Duke of Guise, that he was the greatest usurer in France, because he had turned all his estate into obligations; meaning, that he had left nothing, but only had bound numbers of persons to him. Now, my Lord, said I, I would not have you imitate his course, nor turn your estate thus by great gifts into obligations, for you will find many bad debtors. He bad me take no care for that and pressed it; whereupon I said, my Lord, I see I must be your homager, and hold land of your gift, but do you know the manner of doing homage in Law? Always it is with the saving of his faith to the King, and his other Lords; and therefore, my Lord, said I, I can be no more your's than I was, and it must be with the antient savings, and if I grow to be a rich man, you will give me leave to give it back again to some of your unrewarded followers.' There is an odd story reported by a person who was once in Lord Bacon's service, which attributes this gift to another cause, which I must confess, is not very probable; but however, as the man tells it with extraordinary confidence, it ought not to be passed over. He says, that our author, then his master, presented to the Earl of Essex a secret curiosity of nature, whereby to know the season of every hour of the year by a philosophical glass (with a small proportion of water) in a chamber; with which that Earl was so pleased, that he bestowed upon him Twitnam-park, and it's garden of paradise, as a place for his studies (20). It was such a story as a servant might pick up and repeat, but, as Dr Tenison (21) justly observes, could have no farther foundation in fact, than what is contained in the beforementioned account by our author himself on such an occasion to such a person, and attended with such circumstances, as leaves no room to surmise, he would either conceal or depart from truth, which at the time he wrote could have done him no good.

[G] Which he addressed to the Earl of Devonshire, who was fast friend to the unhappy Earl of Essex and himself. This discourse of our author's, in vindication of his conduct towards the Earl of Essex, was wrote many years after the death of that nobleman, and is certainly a very curious and very elegant performance; the chief topicks insisted on therein are briefly summed up in the text. But whereas our author positively declares in his address at the beginning of that work, that he did not write it for the satisfaction of the many but of the few; it from thence most clearly appears, that with all his learning and all his art, he did not think it possible to satisfy common minds on that topic, and therefore affected to despise them. But undoubtedly, he was too good a judge of truth and of the nature of mankind to be really of this opinion; since at the bottom it will be found that the measures and obligations of gratitude, must depend upon the sentiments of mankind in general, or have no foundations at all. The ground-work of his defence is this, that he indeed had obligations to the Earl of Essex as his friend and patron, which we have already seen he had in the highest degree, but then he likewise owed duty and obedience to the Queen, which he thought, and very justly too, ought not to be sacrificed to his private obligations to the Earl of Essex. But this is so far from untying, that it does not touch the knot, which he ought to have resolved, and which was plainly this; whether, after the Earl of Essex had been so active in his favour, he should have been so busy as he was in the proceedings that brought him to the block: That he was not bound to rebel with the Earl because he was his friend, which yet the Earl of Southampton did, no man in his wits would deny; but that he should be so ready to do against the man that he had professed such friendship for, and that had been so good a friend to him, what any other man might have done as well, is what even the wit of this able author could not account for. I could mention a late instance of a great man in the like circumstances with the Lord Bacon, who when called upon by the highest authority to prosecute his benefactor, modestly declined it, though he might have pleaded the same excuse, and even a better than our author had to alledge, which proved no bar to his preferment, and which, when his name shall come to adorn a work like this, will redound to his immortal honour, as at the time it happened, it procured him universal applause; which shews the truth of what I advanced, that the obligations of gratitude are determined by common opinion.

was in truth no better than an act of madness, he had no knowledge or notice whatever; that he did no more than by duty he was bound to do for the service of the Queen, in the way of his profession; and that the declaration was put upon him altered, after he had drawn it, both by the Ministers and the Queen herself; and it had not the wished-for effect, of entirely wiping off the imputation of ingratitude, but left him under such a stain, as injured his reputation, in the common opinion of mankind, as long as he lived (u) [H]. The ingenious author of his life has treated this matter very freely and fairly, and has shewn that he was not led away by that fond spirit of partiality, which too often betrays the writers of great men's lives, into an approbation of their weaknesses, as well as a zeal and admiration for their virtues (w) [I]. But it is now time to return, not only to the thread of our memoirs, but to the course of our author's studies, which were always the principal business of his life, and which we interrupted a little, that we might prosecute the story of his transactions as a courtier, without breaking the thread. His enemies represented him as a man, who, by applying too much of his time in pursuit of other branches of knowledge, could not but neglect that of his profession; which, however, at this distance of time, when all prejudices are worn off, and nothing hinders men from perceiving or owning truth, is confessed by the best judges to have been a rank calumny. This judgment of theirs is founded on his writings upon the Law, most of which were written, though not published under this reign. About the year 1596, he finished his Maxims of the Law (x) [K], which, though

[H] Injured his reputation in the common opinion of mankind as long as he lived.] There is extant a letter of our author's to Queen Elizabeth, written some little time after this unlucky affair, when it seems he thought fit to absent himself from court, on account of the uneasy situation in which he found himself there; and yet it appears, his privacy did not give him that quiet and content he looked for in it, as we may gather from the following conclusion of this letter to her Majesty (22): 'But in this mind I find such solitude and want of comfort, which I judge to be because I take duty too exactly, and not according to the dregs of this age, wherein the old anthem might never be more truly sung: Totus mundus in maligno positus est. My life hath been threatened, and my name libelled, which I count an honour. But these are the practices of those whose despairs are dangerous, but yet not so dangerous as their hopes, or else the devices of some that would put out all your Majesty's lights, and fall on reckoning how many years you have reigned, which I beseech our blessed Saviour may be doubled, and that I may never live to see any eclipse of your glory, interruption of safety, or indisposition of your person, which I commend to the Divine Majesty who keeps you and fortifies you.' This plainly shews into how great danger as well as obloquy he was fallen by taking this course, to which, from this letter, and whatever else he has written about it, he would persuade us he was moved by duty and reverence for the Queen his mistress, but perhaps, there might be also a mixture of fear, which I do not by any means hint as an imputation on his memory, but on the contrary suggest it by way of excuse. If we may credit a writer who lived near, not to say in those times (23), the Queen and her ministry, drove the prosecution upon Essex's treason, which might as well have been stiled madness, with unaccountable fury, and exercised such rigour against all offenders, nay, and all suspected of having a will to give offence, as is scarce credible to us in better times. Thus for instance, he talks of Sir Henry Lee losing both life and fortune, for wishing well to the three Lords in the Tower, and of another meaner person who was hanged in Smithfield, for only writing to his father in the country, an account of their apprehension and commitment. In a season like this, our author, who had been both a favourite and of the privy-council to the Earl of Essex, might very well doubt his safety, and make it his choice, rather to perform the functions of his office, yet with tenderness and decency (as it is owned he did) than expose himself either to the Queen's anger, or to the resentment of those ministers who had her confidence at that time, and whose power in the succeeding reign not only continued, but increased, which I take to be the reason that this affair was never more truly stated by men of knowledge and capacity, but left to the pens of such, as for want of more authentic vouchers had recourse to traditional memoirs, enlarged and pieced out by their own fancies, by which means, this is become one of the most perplexed passages in our history.

as well as zeal and admiration of their virtues.] The author cited in the text speaking of this transaction says (24), 'The untimely fate of this nobleman, who died on a scaffold in the prime and vigour of his years, excited universal pity, and was murmured against by all conditions of people. Their reflexions on the prevailing party at Court, even on the Queen herself, were so bold and injurious, that the Administration thought it necessary to vindicate their conduct in a publick appeal to the people. This task was assigned to Bacon, even then in high esteem for his excellencies as a writer, some say it was by his enemies insidiously imposed on him, to divert the national resentment from themselves upon a particular person, who was known to have lived in friendship with Essex, and whom they intended to ruin in the publick esteem. If such was their intention they succeeded but too well in it. Never man incurred more universal or more lasting censure than Bacon by this writing. He was every where traduced as one who endeavoured to murder the good name of his benefactor, after the ministry had destroyed his person. His life was even threatened, and he went in daily hazard of assassination. This obliged him to publish in his own defence the apology we find among his writings. As it is long and elaborate, but not perhaps in every part satisfactory, let us believe him on his own testimony, that he had never done that nobleman any ill offices with the Queen, though she herself had insinuated the contrary; that, on the other hand, he had always, during the time of their intimacy, given him advice no less useful than sincere; that he had wished, nay endeavoured, the Earl's preservation, even at last, purely from affection to him, without any regard to his own interest in that endeavour; let all this be allowed, some blemish will still remain on his character. Essex deserved the fate he underwent, but he had paid his debt to justice, and the common-wealth had now nothing to fear from any of his party. The declaration abovementioned could therefore be intended to still the present clamours of the multitude, and though the matter of it might be true, Bacon was not the man who should have published those truths, he had been long and highly indebted to the Earl's friendship, almost beyond the example even of that age. In another man this proceeding might not have been blameable; in him it cannot be excused. In the next reign, Sir Henry Yelverton ventured on the displeasure both of the King and his minion, rather than do the ministry of his office, by pleading against the Earl of Somerset who had made him Solicitor-General; had Bacon refused that invidious part, there were others among the herd of aspiring and officious lawyers ready enough to have performed it, and his very enemies must have thought more advantageously of him, for declining a task itself of no essential importance to the State, and in him unjust to friendship, obligation, gratitude, the most sacred regards among men.'

[K] About the year 1596 he finished his maxims of the Law.] As these are now published they make only the first part of what are stiled, the Elements of the

though he had been so hardly dealt with the year before in his suit for the Solicitorship, he dedicated to Queen Elizabeth, and yet for reasons we are unacquainted with, he did not think proper to print it, which was a great misfortune to the publick, since, by coming abroad after his decease, it has considerably suffered. The next year he published a work of quite another kind, that is to say, the first part of his Essays or Counsels, Civil and Moral (y) [L]; an admirable work, in which our author instructs men in the most useful principles of wisdom and prudence, and teaches how to acquire what are esteemed the greatest blessings, and how to avoid the evils which are most dreaded in the conduct of human life. His penetration, exactness, and perfect skill in all the offices of civil life, appeared to great advantage in this performance, which, as our author himself was sensible, proved of great service to his character, and promoted the high esteem that was already conceived of his parts and learning. About the close of the succeeding year 1598, he composed, on a particular occasion, his History of the Alienation-Office (z) [M], which however COMMON LAW of ENGLAND (25), but I think there can be no sort of doubt, that the author himself intended a separate work. His own title was, A Collection of some principal Rules and Maxims of the COMMON LAW with their Latitude and Extent. To this work of his, which however was intended but as a specimen of a much larger, since it contains but twenty-five rules out of three hundred which he had collected, he prefixed a dedication and a preface, in both which he largely explains, both the intention and utility of his performance. The former is addressed to Queen Elizabeth, and is written in a very high strain of compliment, yet mixed with many serious and important truths; he observes, that those were times in which if science increased, conscience decayed, and laws, though multiplied in number, were slackened in vigour and execution; so that suits in law, the major part of which, he says, are always unjust, daily multiplied and increased; and, which was still worse, indirect courses and practices to abuse Law and Justice, where often attempted and put in use; from whence he adds, much greater enormities would have been bred, but for the royal policy of the Queen, the foresight at her Council-table and Star-Chamber, and the integrity of her Judges, by whom they were repressed and restrained; for he farther notes, that for the preventing frauds in agreements, abuses in the Law, and the bad behaviour of it's ministers and instruments, there had been more statutes made in her Majesty's reign, and those too of deeper reach, than in any of her predecessors. He then proceeds to the reasons which induced him to offer this work, in representing which, we will make use of his own words (26). 'But I am an unworthy witness to your Majesty, of an higher intention and project, both by that which was published by your Chancellor in full parliament from your royal mouth, in the five and thirtieth year of your happy reign, and much more by that which I have been since vouchsafed to understand from your Majesty, imparting a purpose for these many years infused into your Majesty's breast, to enter into a general amendment of the state of your laws, and reduce them to more brevity and certainty, that the great hollownes and unsafety in assurances of lands and goods, may be strengthened, and swerving penalties that lie upon many subjects removed, the execution of many profitable laws revived, the Judge better directed in his sentence, the Counsellor better warranted in his counsel, the student eased in his reading, the contentious suitor that seeketh but vexation disarmed, and the honest suitor that seeketh but to obtain his right relieved; which purpose and intention, as it did strike me with great admiration when I heard it, so it might be acknowledged to be one of the most chosen works, and of the highest merit and beneficence towards the subject, that ever entered into the mind of any King, greater than we can imagine. Because the imperfections and dangers of the Laws, are covered under the clemency and excellent temper of your Majesty's government.' In his preface he very fully shews, the nature and the consequence of his design, and explains with great accuracy, the benefit and advantage arising from the use of maxims or general rules in the Law, and their being universally known and understood. As for the second treatise, which together with this, goes to the making up of what is called his Elements of the Common Law, it was by himself stiled, The Use of the Law for Preservation of our Persons, Goods, and good Names, according to the Laws and Customs of this Land (27).

(27) Bacon's Works, Vol. IV. P. 56.

An excellent work it is, and not only compleatly fitted for the improvement of such as study the Law, but also the book in the world best calculated, to give every man of good sense and unbiassed judgment, both a general idea, and a good opinion of the Law, which is represented therein in that light, which is at once the fairest, fullest, and most agreeable; that is, not as a contrivance to limit the freedom, and abridge the natural liberty of mankind, but as an institution, principally intending the benefit and advantage of men, as rational beings, and members of society, by protecting them in their persons, fame, and estates, and therefore I esteem it one of the best and most useful pieces that our author ever composed.

[L] The first part of his Essays or Counsels Civil and Moral.] The reason why Mr Bacon published these essays at this time, is assigned in his dedication of them to his brother Mr Anthony Bacon, which was, that many of them had stolen abroad in writing, and were very likely to come into the world in print, with more imperfections than the author thought it just to take upon himself (28). About sixteen years afterwards, he had thoughts of publishing a new edition of them, which he intended to dedicate to Prince Henry, and in his dedication he inserted a very clear and candid account of the book (29). 'To write just treatises, says he, requires leisure in the writer and leisure in the reader, and therefore are not so fit neither in your Highness's princely affairs, nor in regard of my continual service, which is the cause that I hath made me chuse to write certain brief notes, set down rather significantly than curiously, which I have called Essays. The word is late, but the thing is antient, for Seneca's Epistles to Lucilius, if you mark them well, are but essays, that is, dispersed meditations, tho' conveyed in the form of epistles. These labours of mine I know, cannot be worthy of your Highness, for what can be worthy of you! But my hope is, they may be as grains of salt, that will rather give you an appetite than offend you with satiety. And although they handle those things, wherein both men's lives and their persons are most conversant, yet what I have attained I know not, but I have endeavoured to make them not vulgar, but of a nature whereof a man shall find much in experience and little in books, so as they are neither repetitions nor fancies.' Sir Francis Bacon designed to have prefixed this epistle to his Essays, printed in the year 1612, but was prevented by the Prince's death. Yet it was so well liked by Mr Matthew, that he inserted in his declaration to the Duke of Tuscany, before his translation of those Essays printed in 1618 (30). This second edition when published, the author addressed to Sir John Contable, his brother in law. He afterwards sent them abroad again revised and enlarged in Latin and in English, dedicating them in both languages to the Duke of Buckingham, in which dedication he tells his Grace, that he thought it agreeable to his affection and obligations to prefix his name before them, because he conceived they might last as long as books last (31); there are other places in our author's writings in which these Essays are mentioned, and in which he expresses a particular sense of their usefulness to mankind, and redounding as much or more to his honour, than those large and extensive works, which had cost him much greater pains and labour, in which he certainly was not mistaken, as we shall have occasion to shew in it's proper place.

[M] He composed, on a particular occasion, the History of the Alienation-Office.] This curious and highly finished

however was not published till many years after his decease. In this learned work he has fully shewn, how great a master he was, not in our Law only, but in our History and Antiquities, so that it may be justly said, there never fell any thing from his pen, which more clearly and fully demonstrated his abilities in his profession. It is not written in that dry, dark, and unentertaining way, which so much discourages young readers in the perusal of books of this kind; but, on the contrary, the style is pleasant and agreeable, though plain and suitable to the subject, and facts, authorities, observations, remarks, and reflections, are so judiciously interwoven, that whoever reads it with a competent knowledge of the subject, must acknowledge him an able lawyer, and an elegant writer. It is needless to mention some smaller instances of his abilities in the Law, which nevertheless were received by the learned society of which he was a member, with all possible marks of veneration and esteem, and which they have preserved with that reverence due to so worthy a person, and so eminent an ornament of their house (a). As a further argument of their respect, they chose him Double Reader in the year 1600, and in the thirty-ninth of Mr Bacon's age, which office he discharged with remarkable sufficiency, as appears by his learned reading on the Statute of Uses, being one of the first who argued Chudleigh's case, largely reported by Lord Coke (b), which reading, as it well deserves, has been printed in his works, and in the collection of his Law Tracts, where it remains an everlasting monument of his abilities in his profession (c). He distinguished himself likewise, during the latter part of the Queen's reign, in the House of Commons, where he spoke often, and yet with such weight and wisdom, that his sentiments were generally approved by that august assembly, and himself so much esteemed therein, that though he usually spoke on the side of the Court, yet he was ever looked upon as a friend to the people, and therefore as popular a member as any, though sometimes, as appears from his letters, it created great jealousy in the Ministers, who took it ill, that any thing they thought proper to introduce into that House, should be opposed by such as were in the Queen's service (d). However, this did not hinder him from persevering in the same course to the end of that reign, in which, though he received but slender marks of honour, and scarce any of profit, which yet his family, his merit, and his circumstances, not to mention his near relation to the Ministers, and his personal favour with the Queen, seemed to require; yet this was so far from warping him either in duty or affection, that, so long as the Queen lived, he served her both with zeal and fidelity, and after her decease, composed a memorial of the happiness of her reign, which did equal honour to her administration, and to the capacity of its author, being esteemed a most exquisite performance in its kind, and as such made use of by the learned M. de Thou, in his invaluable History (e) [N]. After the finished tract, which has been but lately published from a MS. in the Inner-Temple Library (32), is one of the most laboured pieces penned by our most learned author, containing his resolutions of a very perplexed question, Whether it was most for the Queen's benefit, that the profits arising from this office for Alienations, should be let out to farm or not? In handling this he has shewn such diversity of learning, and so clear a conception of all the different points of Law, History, Antiquities, and Policy, as is really amazing; for I think it may be truly said, that there is not any treatise of the same compass extant in our language, which manifests so comprehensive a genius, and so accurate a knowledge, both with respect to theory and practice as this, and therefore it cannot but seem strange, that it lay so long hid from the world; but what appears to me most surprizing is, that it shews our author to have had as true notions, and as good a turn for economy as any man ever had, which before the publication of this treatise, was thought the only kind of knowledge in which he was deficient. But it seems it was one thing as a Lawyer, Statesman, and candidate for court favour, to enter into a detail of the Queen's revenues, to consider the various methods in which they might be managed, together with the advantages and disadvantages attending each method; and quite another, to enter with like spirit and diligence into his own affairs, which if he had done, he might have passed his days more happily, and have left his fame without blemish.

[N] Made use of by the learned M. de Thou in his invaluable history.] It was one, and that not the least remarkable, point of the felicity of Queen Elizabeth, that not only those who owed their being, or at least their greatness to her bounty, but even such as experienced little or nothing of her favour, were equally desirous of supporting her fame and transmitting it to posterity. As for this piece written by our author, it seems to have been originally composed in the life-time of that Queen (33), and after her decease thrown into another form, revised, corrected, and translated into Latin (34). It was transmitted by the request of the author to M. de Thou, who freely owns, that he made use of it in his history (35). As for our author, he was not only pleased with shewing this mark of esteem and honour for his deceased mistress, but considering that the piece he had written was not published in his life-time, he particularly directed, that it should be printed after his decease, which, tho' at a considerable distance of time, was performed (36). There is not, perhaps, in all the works of Lord Bacon, any treatise which does more honour to his memory than this, in which he shews himself not only a great master of learning and language, one capable of expressing great things in an equal and elevated style, but an admirable politician also; one capable of penetrating even into the depths of the councils of those times, which perhaps were as deep and as intricate, as any this country ever saw, or perhaps that have guided the concerns of any country whatever. Yet if this performance does honour to the solid wisdom and prodigious abilities of our author, it does much more with respect to the great Princess celebrated therein, and is, beyond all doubt, the noblest of the many monuments erected to her memory. The great point laboured in this panegyrick is to shew, that as, on the one hand, the wise councils, prudent measures, and great undertakings of this high-spirited Queen, merited the greatest success; so they were conducted in such a manner as to be, generally speaking, crowned with that success which they deserved; herein he places, and indeed very justly places, the felicity of Queen Elizabeth. But there is still another light in which this piece may be considered with equal reputation to the author who wrote, and to the monarch who is the subject of this excellent discourse: The light I mean is that of a political history, or rather speculation of the politicks of this reign, and I think one may truly assert, that it was the peculiar felicity of this Queen, to have the actions of her reign recorded by so able and so candid a historian, as the learned and judicious Camden (37); and the councils and springs of those actions, represented to posterity by the pen the decease of his mistress, he applied very early to her successor King James VI, who, by a quiet and peaceable accession, became King James I of England. Mr Bacon had many reasons to hope, that this tender of his services would be well received by that Prince, as he was known to be learned himself, and a great encourager of learning; as he was well acquainted with the general characters and reputation of all persons of note in England, and as he had a singular esteem for, on account of the signal services rendered him by, our author's brother, Mr Anthony Bacon (f). So that taking all these circumstances together, there was nothing forward or haughty, much less mean or indecent in the first applications of our author to that Prince. He seems in this, as in the former reign, to have fixed his hopes of advancement upon the prosecution of a plan of his own framing, which consisted in procuring a fair report of him to the King, by men of different parties and different nations; and it is remarkable on this occasion, that he offered his service to the Earl of Northumberland, and at the same time sought the friendship of the Earl of Southampton, who was so near destruction in the unfortunate affair of the Earl of Essex (g). But if he depended upon the English, he did not totally neglect the Scotch, with some of whom he had formerly had an acquaintance, which he now renewed, and thereby wrought himself into great credit with that nation (b). He likewise offered his pen, and drew up the form of a proclamation, which, though it was not used, had nevertheless a good effect, and was taken for an instance of his duty and good affection (i). On the twenty-third of July, 1603, he was introduced to the King at Whitehall, when he received the honour of knighthood, as a mark of his Majesty's gracious acceptance of past services, and of the tender he had made of the continuance of them for the future (k). This might have been thought a greater favour, if the new King had been more careful of his honours, but most of our historians have remarked, that King James was as profuse in this particular, as Queen Elizabeth was sparing. But however it ought to be considered, that many circumstances concurred to make this difference in their conduct. It was necessary at the opening of a new reign, and even customary, so that Queen Elizabeth herself had then used it; but this was not only a new reign, but the coming in also of a new family, and, which was still more, a family from another country, which made such numerous acts of royal favour more expedient. We may add to this another reason, which was the quiet and peaceable accession of King James, arising from the readiness of all ranks of people, to own and acknowledge him for their Sovereign, and as he could not without ingratitude avoid bestowing some honours on so singular an occasion; so in policy he could not bestow such marks of distinction on one set of people, or in one part of the kingdom, without taking notice of the loyalty and affection shewn in other places, and by other persons. There was yet another cause of the beneficence of this Monarch in this particular, which was his desire to unite the whole nation in their affections to himself, and to one another, instead of governing, as his predecessor had done, by factions, which, though no error in her, because founded in necessity, had been a great error in him, when that necessity was taken away (l). In his first applications to the King, Sir Francis Bacon appeared as a courtier and servant to the crown, but it was not long before he had occasion to approach his Majesty in quite a different capacity. The country people found themselves greatly oppressed in the last reign by Purveyors, and had complained of their exactions as an intolerable grievance. Queen Elizabeth had been informed of it by accident, and, it is said, had given way to an act of extraordinary severity to repress it; but still there had been nothing done towards a thorough reformation, which obliged the House of Commons, in the first Parliament of King James, to think of some method for effectually redressing this evil. The way they took, was by a solemn representation of this grievance and its consequences, and the person they made choice of to set forth the sense of the House on this subject, was Sir Francis Bacon, which shews his credit in Parliament at that juncture. He performed it in such a manner, as both satisfied the House, whose servant he was in this particular, and pleased the King (m) [O]. His Majesty, from his

of so capable a writer as Bacon; who in this treatise has given us an admirable supplement to the histories of those times, and has therein taken notice of many things that would otherwise have escaped the knowledge of succeeding ages, and set all the facts of which he takes notice in such lights, as they could have scarce been represented by any other writer than himself. This tribute therefore to the memory of his sovereign, deserved, in every respect, the regard paid to it both at home and abroad, as well as the particular concern which our author expressed that it might be printed after his decease, as an everlasting testimony of his reverence for the memory of his incomparable sovereign.

[O] Both satisfied the House whose servant he was in this particular, and at the same pleased the King.] It appears evidently enough by a letter still extant, from Sir Francis Bacon to his Majesty, that he managed the business of this complaint with great address, in which I conceive, the chief point was the procuring himself to be chosen to this difficult task:

difficult indeed, it might well be called, since, on the one hand, it required much delicacy to press a complaint of this kind, to a Prince of King James's temper, so as not to wound his authority by the manner of doing it; and next, there required no less art, so to represent the grievance as to come up to what the people expected from their representatives, and the house from their member. He did both very happily, for by magnifying the King's power, wisdom, and natural clemency, at the beginning, and promising likewise, that the House had no intent to injure the royal prerogative, but barely to provide against the abuse of it; he thereby obtained the means, under colour of vindicating his majesty's person and government, from the imputations brought upon both, by these illegal and unjustifiable actions, to deliver the very utmost, of what even the warmest patriots of those times, could desire should be spoken in the royal presence. The reader will fully apprehend this, from the manner of his stating the complaint (38): (38) Bacon's Works, Vol. IV. 'The abuses of purveyors, says he, naturally divide themselves p. 23.

his first entrance, had continued him in his service, in the same manner in which he had served the late Queen, but when his affairs were better settled, he thought fit to shew him higher marks of favour than he had received from her late Majesty; and accordingly, on the twenty-fifth of August 1604, constituted him by patent, one of his Counsel learned in the Law, with a fee of forty pounds a year, which is said to have been the first act of royal power in that nature (2). He granted him the same day, by another patent under the Great-Seal, a pension of sixty pounds a year, for special services received from his brother Anthony Bacon and himself, which I rather take notice of, because it has not hitherto been mentioned by any of the authors who have undertaken to write his life (3). He was from this time a special servant to the crown, and seemed to be in a fair road to preferment; but however, he found himself still crossed by the jealousy and envious dislike of two great men, who were afraid of his parts, and apprehended that the course of his fortune might thwart the views of their ambition. The first of these, was his near relation and old antagonist, Sir Robert Cecil, now created Earl of Salisbury, and in as great credit with King James, as ever his father, the wise Lord Burleigh, had been with Queen Elizabeth; the other was Sir Edward Coke, distinguished by his great knowledge of the Law, and the King's Attorney-General, a man who affected to slight our author's knowledge in his profession, who envied his general reputation, and feared his abilities as a statesman. But though no man saw clearer than Sir Francis Bacon into matters of this nature, and though he perceived very early, how little service the one, and how much disservice the other of these great men meant him; yet he behaved towards both in the manner that became him; towards the Earl of Salisbury, who was now become Lord-Treasurer and Prime-Minister, with submission and respect, and yet with frequent admonitions, as to what he had reason to believe he might expect, from the nearness of their relation, and his Lordship's fair promises. Towards the other, he used more freedom and less ceremony, as appears clearly from a letter of his, in which he expostulates with Mr Attorney very roundly, on the usage he had met with (4). But in the midst of these difficulties and disappointments, he not only prosecuted his own plan for preferment with the utmost steadiness, but also that of his studies; so that in the year 1605, he published the first specimen of his great work, in his book of the Advancement of Learning (5) [P], a performance most excellent in itself, and considered by ‘ themselves into three sorts; the first they take in kind, that they ought not to take; the second they take in quantity, a far greater proportion than cometh to your Majesty's use; the third, they take in an unlawful manner, in a manner, (I say) directly, and expressly, prohibited by diverse laws. To the first of these I am a little to alter their name, for instead of Takers, they become Taxers; instead of taking provision for your Majesty's service, they tax your people ad redimendam vexationem; imposing upon them, and extorting from them diverse sums of money, sometimes in gross, sometimes in the nature of stipends annually paid, ne nocent, to be freed and eased of their oppression. Again they take trees, which by law they cannot do, timber trees, which are the beauty, countenance, and shelter of men's houses, that men have long spared from their own purse and profit, that men esteem (for their use and delight) above ten times the value, that are a loss which men cannot repair or recover; these do they take to the defacing and spoiling of your subjects mansions and dwellings, except they be compounded with to their own appetites. And if a gentleman be too hard for them while he is at home, they will watch their time when there is but a Bailiff or servant remaining, and put the axe to the root of the tree, ere ever the master can stop it. Again, they use a strange and most unjust exaction, in causing the subjects to pay poundage of their own debts due from your Majesty unto them; so as a poor man, when he has had his hay, or his wood, or his poultry, (which perchance, he was full loth to part with, and had for the provision of his own family, and not to put to sale) taken from him, and that not at a just price, but under the value, and cometh to receive his money, he shall have after the rate of twelve pence in the pound abated for poundage, of his due payment upon so hard conditions: Nay farther, they are grown to that extremity, (as is affirmed, tho' it be scarce credible, save that in such persons all things are credible) that they will take double poundage, once when the debenture is made; and again the second time, when the money is paid, &c.' As to the particular facts which had been laid before the House in order to justify this charge, Sir Francis Bacon caused them to be digested into as narrow a compass as possible, and desired they might be read to his Majesty, as accordingly they were after he had finished his speech.

[P] In his book of the Advancement of Learning]

This admirable and elegant performance was intitled, ‘ The two Books of Francis Bacon of the Proficiency and Advancement of Learning Divine and Human; to the King (39).’ We have a large and excellent account of this work given us by the learned Dr Tenison (40), who speaking of the great Infaturation of the Sciences, which our author divided into six parts, proceeds thus. The first part proposed, was the partition of the sciences, and this the author perfected in that golden treatise of the Advancement of Learning, addressed to King James; a labour, which he termed a comfort to his other labours (41). This he first wrote in two books in the English tongue, in which his pen excelled; and of this first edition, that is to be meant, which with some truth and more modesty, he wrote to the Earl of Salisbury, telling him (42), That in his book he was contented to awake better spirits, being himself like a bell-singer, who is first up to call others to church; afterwards he enlarged those two discourses, which contained, especially the forementioned Partition, and divided the matter of it into eight books; and knowing that this work was desired beyond the seas, and being also aware, that books written in a modern language, which receiveth much change, in a few years were out of use, he caused that part of it which he had written in English, to be translated into the Latin tongue by Mr Herbert, and some others, who were esteemed masters in the Roman eloquence. Notwithstanding which, he so suited the stile to his conceptions, by a strict castigation of the whole work, that it may deservedly seem his own. The translation of this work (that is, of much of the two books written by him in English) he first commended to Dr Playfer, a Professor of Divinity in the university of Cambridge, using, among others, these words to him (43). ‘ The privateness of the language considered, wherein the book is written, excluding so many readers, as on the other side, the obscurity of the argument in many parts of it, excludeth many others; I must account it a second birth of that work, if it might be translated into Latin, without manifest loss of the sense and matter: For this purpose, I could not represent to myself any man, into whose hands I do more earnestly de-itself, and not as a part of that great system to which it belonged, and into which it was afterwards incorporated by its author. He likewise continued his diligence in Parliament, where he did the King and his Ministers great service, which ought to have been so much the more regarded, because scarce any other man could have rendered them such service (r). One thing there was above the rest, about which the King was extremely sollicitous, and yet only in part successful, which was the promoting an union between his subjects in the two kingdoms, and becoming thereby fully and perfectly, as well as strictly and literally, King of Great Britain. In Parliament, Sir Francis Bacon laboured this point with great diligence, and to his great reputation, though it went on slowly, and never came to any conclusion; but in Westminster-Hall, his eloquence was more prevailing, and the Judges did for the King there, almost as much as he fought elsewhere (s) [Q]. In other things of the like nature, he proceeded with the like diligence, and this giving him not only great countenance at Court, but gaining him also the general esteem of the world, his friends advised him to take this opportunity

'fire the work should fall than yourself, for by that I have heard and read, I know no man a greater master in commanding words to serve matter.' The Doctor was willing to serve so excellent a person and so worthy a design, and within a while sent him a specimen of a Latin translation; but men generally come short of themselves, when they strive to outdo themselves, they put a force upon their natural genius, and by a straining of it crack and disable it; and so it seems it happened to that worthy and elegant man upon this great occasion; he would be over accurate, and he sent a specimen of such superfine Latinity, that the Lord Bacon did not encourage him to labour further in that work, in the penning of which, he desired not so much neat and polite, as clear, masculine, and apt expression. The whole of this book was rendered into English by Dr Gilbert Wats of Oxford, and the translation has been well received by many; but some there were who wished, that a translation had been set forth, in which the genius and spirit of the Lord Bacon had more appeared; and I have seen a letter written by a certain gentleman to Dr Rawley, wherein they thus importune him for a more accurate version by his own hand: It is our humble suit to you, and we do earnestly solicit you, to give yourself the trouble to correct the too much defective translation of de Augmentis Scientiarum, which Dr Wats hath set forth. It is a thousand pities so worthy a piece should lose its grace and credit by an ill expositor, since those persons who read that translation, taking it for genuine, and upon that presumption not regarding the Latin edition, are thereby robbed of the benefit, which (if you would please to undertake the business) they would receive. This tendeth to the dishonour of that noble Lord, and the hindrance of the advancement of learning. This work hath been also translated into French, upon the motion of the Marquis Fiat, but in it there are many things wholly omitted, many things perfectly mistaken, and some things (especially such as relate to Religion) wilfully perverted; inasmuch that in one place, he makes his Lordship to magnify the Legend, a book sure of little credit with him, when he thus began one of his essays (44): I had rather believe all the fables in the Legend, and the Talmud, and the Alcoran, than that this universal frame is without a mind. The fairest and most correct edition of this book in Latin is that in folio, printed at London, anno 1623: And whosoever would understand the Lord Bacon's cypher, let him consult that accurate edition (45); for in some other editions which I have perused, the form of the letters of the alphabet, in which much of the mystery consisteth, is not observed; but the Roman and Italic shapes of them are confounded. To this book we may reduce the first four chapters of that imperfect treatise, published in Latin by Isaac Gruter, and called, The Description of the Intellectual Globe; they being but a rude draught of the partition of the sciences, so accurately and methodically disposed in the book of the Advancement of Learning: To this also we may reduce the treatise called Thema Cæli, published likewise in Latin by Gruter; and it particularly belongeth to the fourth chapter and the third book of it, as being a discourse tending to an improvement of the system of the Heavens, which is treated of in that place, the houses of which (had God granted him life) he would have understood, as well almost as he did his own. For the same reason, we may reduce to the same place of the Advancement, the fifth, sixth, and seventh chapters, of the Descriptio Globi Intellectualis above remembered.

[Q] Did for the King there almost as much as he sought elsewhere. There was no one point which King James pressed for eagerly as this, which he thought would do him honour in his own country, and procure him credit in this. The last attempt made in the House of Commons, was to procure a law for a general naturalization of all the inhabitants of Scotland, which met, as might be very readily expected, a very warm opposition: It is very easy to conceive, that though there might be many reasons for the King's desiring the thing, and some very good ones why the English nation, should, out of regard to their own interests, have yielded to it; yet there were many causes, why the people in general should be then extremely averse to it; and indeed, it does sufficiently appear that their prejudices were very strong against it; in this situation things were, when Sir Francis Bacon was prevailed upon to speak in favour of this point in the House of Commons, and one cannot help wondering, that he should do this with great warmth, without losing his character for popularity (46): But upon perusing of his speech it will appear, that he had studied this subject so well, and understood it so perfectly, that tho' he might not be able to conquer the prejudices of some, or to convince the judgments of all, yet he shewed evidently, that he was far enough from having taken up his own opinion upon trust, or undertaking to manage this affair upon no better ground, than that of making his court to his master. His discourse was so eloquent, and withal so weighty, the arguments he offered so strong in themselves, and so well supported by examples drawn from history, that though they might be over-ruled, they could not easily be answered; and as in most other things so in this, what he has delivered upon the subject, is as full and as satisfactory as the learning of those could, or the experience of succeeding times is ever like to furnish. In as much as that I may venture to assert, the inhabitants of Scotland never had so good an advocate, and never can have a better. Yet after all, the dispute upon this head was of no great consequence, as Sir Francis Bacon well observed, for it was only whether the fathers should be put into as good a condition as their children, for it was held for Law then by the ablest men of the profession, and decided afterwards in a great cause argued by Sir Francis Bacon, when King's Solicitor, that the Post Nati, or such as were born in Scotland after the King's accession to the throne of England were naturalized; so that the point then under the consideration of the House, was whether the Ante Nati should be naturalized by law or not (47). The reader, from what has been said on this head in the text and in this note, will easily comprehend the merit of Sir Francis Bacon's services in this affair, which is all that we intended; for if a history were to be written of the endeavours used in this reign, to procure an union between the two nations, it would take up much more room than we have to spare, and would besides, lead us too far from our present subject; and therefore we have included, in as few words as possible, those points in which this gentleman was principally concerned; and if the reader is inclined to obtain a farther view of this matter in all its branches, he may consult the histories of those times, and the letters and works of our author, which will afford him tolerable satisfaction (48).

of marrying, that so he might establish his family; which motion he readily embraced, and soon after took to wife, Alice, daughter of Benedict Barnham, Esq; Alderman of London, a lady who brought him an ample fortune, but by whom he never had any children (v). A little after this marriage, there happened a promotion in the Law, which induced him to renew his application for the Solicitorship, which was then like to become vacant, by the promotion beforementioned, in which, with some difficulty, he prevailed, and upon Sir John Doderidge's being advanced from that post to be the King's Serjeant, he was, in the year 1607, appointed Solicitor, with the consent at least, if not by the recommendation, of his cousin, the Earl of Salisbury, and then he appeared more frequently in Westminster-Hall, grew into more extensive practice as a Lawyer, and had a share in almost all great causes; which were the reasons he assigned, for being so pressing in his applications for that employment, though one may reasonably suppose, he was influenced in some degree by motives of a superior nature, as considering this, but as a step to higher preferment (w). He assured the King, before he obtained this employment, that it would give him such an increase of capacity, though not of zeal, to serve his Majesty, that what he had done in times past should seem as nothing, in comparison of the services he would render for the future. In this respect, Sir Francis Bacon kept his word, for in that session of Parliament, held in the year in which he was made Solicitor, he ran through great variety of business, and that of a nature which demanded a man, not only of great abilities but of great art, and yet of general reputation, for he was employed from the House of Commons to the King, to represent to him the grievances under which the nation laboured; and though the paper relating to them was couched in pretty strong terms, which could not but be disagreeable to his master's temper, yet Sir Francis, by a soft and smooth speech, so abated their harshness, as to perform this difficult commission with universal applause (x). He was likewise employed by the House at a conference with the Lords, to persuade them to join in an application to the Crown, for the taking away the ancient tenures, and allowing a certain and competent revenue in lieu of them, and in his speech on this occasion, Sir Francis Bacon set that affair in so clear a light, as excited that spirit, which at length procured the dissolution of the Court of Wards, which has been justly esteemed a point of the highest consequence to the liberties of this kingdom (y). He likewise satisfied the House, at a time when they were much out of temper, at the manner in which the King's messages were conveyed to them; and towards the close of the session, when the supply stuck in the House, he procured a passage for it, by a very short and well-timed speech, which effectually shewed of how great consequence it was to the King, to have so able and so popular a speaker at his devotion (y). One would have imagined, that in the midst of so many arduous affairs of State, joined to the cares of his employment, and the business of his profession, Sir Francis Bacon should have had but little leisure for his philosophic studies; and yet we find, that about this time, he had in some measure digested the plan of the second part of his great work, which he transmitted to his friends, who were the ablest and the best judges in the kingdom, in order to have their free sentiments upon the subject; for as Sir Francis laboured only to arrive at truth, and not to acquire a mighty reputation, so he was rather desirous of hearing the objections that might be made against his new system, than to seek the praises of such, as were more willing to bestow applause, than to enquire into his title to it (z) [R].

Was

[R] More willing to bestow applause, than to inquire into his title to it.] This piece of our author's was intitled, Cogitata & Visa, and contained the ground-work or plan of his Novum Organum, so essential a part of his Instauration, that it sometimes bears that title. He was sensible of the difficulties that would attend his great design of building up the whole Palace of Wisdom anew, and that he might be the better able to overcome those difficulties, he was desirous of seeing what they were, before he undertook his large work, of which this piece was no more than the out-lines. We may form a true notion of what he sought by considering the letter, which he wrote to the learned Bishop Andrews, when he sent him the discourse of which we are speaking (49). 'Now your Lordship hath been so long in the Church and the Palace disputing between Kings and Popes, methinks you should take pleasure to look into the field, and refresh your mind with some matter of Philosophy, though the science be now through age waxed a child again, and left to boys and young men; and because you were wont to make me believe you took a liking to my writings, I send you some of this vacation's fruits, and thus much more of my mind and purpose. I hasten not to publish; perishing I would prevent, and I am forced to respect, as well my times as the matter; for with me it is thus, and I think with all men in my case. If I bind myself to an argument it loadeth my mind, but if I rid my mind of the present cogitation, it is rather a recreation;

this hath put me into these Miscellanies, which I purpose to suppress, if God give me leave to write a just and perfect volume of Philosophy, which I go on with, though slowly. I fend not your Lordship too much, least it may glut you; now let me tell you what my desire is; if your Lordship be so good now, as when you were the good Dean of Westminster, my request to you is, that not by pricks but by notes, you will make known unto me whatsoever shall seem unto you, either not current in the stile, or harsh to credit and opinion, or inconvenient for the person of the writer. For no man can be judge and party, and when our minds judge by reflexion of ourselves, they are more subject to error, and though for the matter itself, my judgment be in some things fixed, and not accessible by any man's judgment, that goeth not my way; yet even in those things, the admonition of a friend may make me express myself diversly.' He likewise recommended with the same view, the perusal of the Cogitata & Visa to Sir Thomas Bodley, who wrote him a very full answer, which, together with the piece itself, is printed amongst the Latin works of our author (50). There is also in the last Collection of Mr Stephens, a small discourse in English, under the Latin title of Filum Labyrinthi; see Formula Inquisitionis, ad Filios. Pars prima. This we see plainly was the original of the Cogitata & Visa, and the first draught of our author's first plan. Of this very short treatise, the three first paragraphs (which may serve as a specimen of the whole) run thus (51). 'FRANCIS BACON thought was by this means, which very few great writers have taken, that Sir Francis obtained those lights, which enabled him to finish those parts of the Instauration to so high a degree of perfection; he likewise in a great measure avoided, by taking this method, those ill-natured censures, and critical examinations, to which works of this nature are usually exposed, and to which his own system was so much the more liable, as it went entirely upon new principles, and could therefore only be supported by its own worth, and stand on no other foundation than its own solidity (a). But that he might relieve himself a little from the severity of these studies, and as it were amuse himself with erecting a magnificent pavilion, while his great palace of Philosophy was building; he composed and sent abroad in 1610, his celebrated treatise Of the Wisdom of the Antients, in which he shewed that none had studied them more closely, was better acquainted with their beauties, or had pierced deeper into their meaning (b) [S]. There have

' thought in this manner, the knowledge where of the world is now possessed, especially that of nature, extendeth not to magnitude and certainty of works, the Physician pronounces many diseases incurable, and faileth oft in the rest: The Alchemists wax old and die in hopes: The Magicians perform nothing that is permanent and profitable: The Mechanicks take small lights from Natural Philosophy, and do but spin out their own little threads: Chance sometimes discovereth inventions, but that worketh not in years but ages; so he saw well, that the inventions known are very imperfect, and that new are not like to be brought to light but in great length of time, and that those are come not to light by Philosophy. He thought also this state of knowledge was the worse, because men strive (against themselves) to save the credit of ignorance, and so satisfy themselves in this poverty: For the Physician, besides the cautes of practice, hath this general cautele of art, that he discharges the weakness of his art upon supposed impossibilities, neither can his art be condemned, when itself judgeth. That Philosophy also, out of which the knowledge of Physick which now is in use is hewed, receiveth certain positions and opinions, which (if they be well weighed) induce this persuasion that no great works are to be expected from art and the hand of man; as in particular, that opinion that the heat of the sun and fire differ in kind, and that other in composition is the work of man, and mixture is the work of nature and the like, all tending to the circumscription of man's power, and to artificial despair; killing in men not only the comfort of imagination, but the industry of trial; only upon vain glory, to have their art thought perfect, and that all is impossible that is not already found. The Alchemist discharges his art upon his own errors, either supposing a misunderstanding of the words of his authors, which maketh him listen after auricular traditions, or else a failing in the true proportions and scruples of practice, which maketh him renew infinitely his trials, and finding also that he lighteth upon some mean experiments and conclusions by the way, feedeth upon them and magnifieth them to the most, and supplieth the rest in hopes. The Magician, when he findeth something (as he conceiveth above nature) effected, thinketh when a breach is once made in nature, that it is all one to perform great things and small, not seeing that they are but subjects of a certain kind, wherein Magick and superstition hath played in all times. The mechanical person, if he can refine an invention, or put two or three observations or practices together in one, or couple things better with their use, or make the work in less or greater volume, taketh himself for an inventor. So he saw well, that men either persuade themselves of new inventions as of impossibilities, or else think they are already extant but in secret and in few hands, or that they account of those little industries and additions, as of inventions, all which turneth to the averting of their minds from any just and constant labour, to invent further in any quantity. He thought also, that when men did set before themselves the variety and perfection of works produced by mechanical arts, they are apt rather to admire the provisions of man, than to apprehend his wants, not considering that the original inventions and conclusions of nature, which are the life of all that variety, are not many nor deeply fetched; and that the rest is but the subtle and ruled motion of the instrument and hand, and that the shop therein, is

' not unlike the library, which in such number of books, containeth (for the far greater part) nothing but iterations, varied sometimes in form, but not new in substance; so he saw plainly that opinion of store was a cause of want, and that both works and doctrines appear many, and are few.' We may from hence conceive, the manner in which this piece was written, and how well it was suited to serve the author's purpose, of so far manifesting his own design, as to obtain a tolerable account of the strongest and best founded objections which could be brought against it, so as that in his larger work, he might either correct his own faults, or shew such as were inclined to criticize his performance, theirs.

[S] Had pierced deeper into their meaning] In the first part of his Instauration our author had observed, that there was a great deficiency in explaining the allegorical poetry of the Antients, and more particularly in laying open the Philosophy of ancient fables; and as he was desirous of affording instances of the possibility of supplying all the deficiencies he pointed out, he composed this work, to answer the end of supplying the deficiency before mentioned (52). In his introduction to this book, he gives a large and very clear account of the reasons which induced him to believe, that notwithstanding the seeming absurdities in the fabulous history of the Antients; there was however, something at the bottom which deserved to be examined into and enquired after: These observations, which are full of very curious learning, he concludes thus: But the argument of most weight with me is this, that many of these fables by no means appear to have been invented by the persons, who relate and divulge them, whether Homer, Hesiod, or others; for if I were assured they first flowed from those latter times, and authors that transmit them to us, I should never expect any thing singularly great or noble from such an origin. But whoever attentively considers the thing, will find that these fables are delivered down and related by those writers, not as matters then first invented and proposed, but as things received and embraced in earlier ages: Besides, as they are differently related by writers nearly of the same ages, 'tis easily perceived, that the relators drew from the common stock of ancient tradition, and varied but in point of embellishment, which is their own, and this principally raises my esteem of these fables; which I receive not as the product of the age, or invention of the Poets, but as sacred relics, gentle whispers, and the breath of better times, that from the traditions of more ancient nations, came at length into the flutes and trumpets of the Greeks: But if any one shall, notwithstanding this, contend that allegories are always adventitious, or imposed upon the ancient fables, and no way native, or genuinely contained in them, we might here leave him undisturbed in that gravity of judgment he affects (though we cannot help accounting it somewhat dull and phlegmatick) and if it were worth the trouble, to proceed to another kind of argument. Men have proposed to answer two different and contrary ends by the use of parable, for parables serve as well to instruct and illustrate, as to wrap up and envelope; so that though for the present we drop the concealed use, and suppose the ancient fables to be vague undeterminate things, formed for amusement, still the other use must remain and can never be given up; and every man of any learning must readily allow, that this method of instructing is grave, sober, and exceedingly useful, and sometimes necessary in the sciences, as it opens an easy and familiar passage to the human understanding in all new discoveries, that are abstruse, have been very few books published, either in this or in any other nation, which either deserved or met with more general applause than this, and scarce any that are like to retain it longer, for in this performance, Sir Francis Bacon gave a singular proof of his capacity to please all parties in literature, as in his political conduct, he stood fair with all the parties in the nation. The admirers of antiquity were charmed with this discourse, which seems expressly calculated to justify their admiration; and, on the other hand, their opposites were no less pleased with a piece, from which they thought they could demonstrate, that the sagacity of a modern genius, had found out much better meanings for the Antients, than ever were meant by them (c). At this time, Sir Francis Bacon was in such high credit with his master, as well as in such high esteem with all ranks and degrees of people, that as, on one hand, he was able to attain, with little or no assistance from the Ministers, whatever he thought expedient to ask of the King; so, on the other, there was no danger that any suit he obtained, should beget either popular dislike, or distaste those of his profession; yet it does not appear, that Sir Francis made any great advantages of this favourable situation, except that in the year 1611, he procured the office of Judge of the Marshal's Court (d), jointly with Sir Thomas Vavasor, then Knight Marshal, by which he presided, though for a very short time, in the court newly erected, under the title of the Palace-Court for the verge of the King's house, in which station he has left us a most learned and methodical charge, given to the jury there upon a commission of oyer and terminer (e). One may easily discern from hence, that he had not either a very aspiring, or a very covetous disposition, but was content to wait the proper seasons and favourable opportunities of rising, which are brought forth by time. It must however be owned, that his private fortune was never in a better condition, or his domestick affairs in a happier situation, than at present; he was possessed, and had been so for some years, of a good estate in Hertfordshire, and of his father's pleasant seat of Gorhambury, which came to him by the death of his brother, Mr Anthony Bacon. He was in great practice at the bar, the King's Solicitor, and, besides the new place last mentioned, was just come into the possession of that office, which had been granted him twenty years before, of Register of the Court of Star-Chamber, which was of great value; so that at this time he could not enjoy less than five thousand pounds a year, including the fortune brought him by his wife, of which, though there are good reasons to believe that he took little to himself, yet it must have prevented a very considerable expence in his family, which would have been otherwise necessary. Besides, as his employments were not of a nature to require much splendor or magnificence, so, notwithstanding the generosity of his temper, which it must be confessed leaned a little towards profuseness, yet he must have been at this juncture in very easy circumstances, which to a man who never affected riches, must have been a very comfortable condition, especially when joined to the high reputation and unenvied credit which at this time he enjoyed (f). He had now the King's ear so entirely, that he obtained a promise of succeeding Sir Henry Hobart, then Attorney-General, in case either of his death or removal. In the beginning of the year 1612, that worthy man had a very severe fit of illness, which induced Sir Francis Bacon to put the King in mind of his promise, and it seems by another letter of his, that he was now on very good terms with the Earl of Salisbury, Lord-Treasurer, who supported his pretensions (g), but however the Attorney recovered, and he did not succeed him in that employment till the year following, when Sir Henry Hobart was made Chief Justice of the Common-Pleas, upon the removal of Sir Edward Coke from that office, who was made Chief-Justice of the King's-Bench. Sir Francis Bacon took possession and are out of the road of vulgar opinions. Hence in the first ages, when such inventions and conclusions of the human reason, as are not trite and common, were new and little known, all things abounded with fables, parables, similes, comparisons, and allusions, which were not intended to conceal, but to inform and teach, whilst the minds of men continued rude and unpractised in matters of subtilty or speculation, or even impatient, or in a manner incapable of receiving such things, as did not directly fall under and strike the senses; for as hieroglyphicks were in use before writings, so were parables in use before arguments; and even to this day, if any man would let new light in upon the human understanding, and conquer prejudice without raising contests, animosities, opposition, or disturbance, he must still go in the same path, and have recourse to the like method of allegory, metaphor, and allusion. To conclude, the knowledge of the early ages was either great or happy, great, if they by design made this use of trope and figure; happy, if whilst they had other views, they afforded matter and occasion to such noble contemplations; let either be the case, our pains perhaps will not be misemployed, whether we illustrate antiquity, or the things themselves; the like indeed has been attempted by others, but, to speak ingenuously, their great and voluminous labours have almost destroyed the energy, the efficacy, and grace of the thing, whilst being unskilled in nature, and their learning no more than that of common-place, they have applied the sense of the parables to certain general and vulgar matters, without reaching to their real purport, genuine interpretation, and full depth; for myself therefore, I expect to appear new in these common things, because leaving untouched such as are sufficiently plain and open, I shall drive only at those that are either deep or rich (53). In this admirable work our author has laid open with great sagacity and penetration, the secret meaning of the physical, moral, and political fables of antiquity, in doing which, he very wisely and prudently took occasion to throw out many observations of his own, for which he could not have found other ways so fit and favourable an opportunity. He published this treatise in Latin, in which language he seems to have wrote it, and dedicated it to his cousin, the Lord Treasurer Salisbury, and the university of Cambridge. This work has been very often reprinted since, and, except his Essays, is of all his writings the most generally known and esteemed. Sir Arthur Gorges rendered the whole into English, which is usually added to the author's essays, and it is to this book the great poet as well as traveller, Mr George Sandys (54) doth, in his learned notes on his version of Ovid's Metamorphoses, acknowledge himself to be much indebted, styling my Lord St Albans, the crown of all modern authors.

possession of his new office, on the twenty-seventh of October, 1613 (b), in which he made as great a figure as any of his predecessors, and had some particular honours done him, which few or none of them had received; as for instance, he was allowed to take his seat in Parliament, though it was adjudged, that by reason of his office he had no right to it, as being an attendant on the House of Lords; but this favour was granted him, purely out of respect to his person, and the services he had formerly rendered his country in that House (i). In the court of Star-Chamber again, a solemn decree having been made against the fashionable, though fatal practice of duelling, his speech, which gave occasion to it, was, contrary to custom, printed therewith [T]. These are the strongest

[T] His speech which gave occasion to it, was, contrary to custom, printed therewith.] This barbarous and bloody custom, like most of our other bad customs, was derived to us from France, where, notwithstanding the edicts of Henry IV and Louis XIII, it occasioned the shedding of rivers of blood, till the great Cardinal de Richelieu, though cruel and revengeful himself, put some stop to it, by the execution of Lord Bouteville, a man of high quality, and of as great interest as any in France, which, though severe, was universally allowed one of the best acts of his administration. It is easy to perceive from the writings of Wilton, Osborne, and other authors of those times, to what height it was risen in England, and what lamentable effects it produced; for when once it grew into practice amongst persons of distinction, those of an inferior degree, forgetting that it was altogether inconsistent with the laws of God and man, affected it as a point of good breeding; so that it grew every day more and more frequent, notwithstanding the melancholy consequences with which it was attended, and the severity with which some had been prosecuted, who by this means had been drawn in to commit capital offences: But still the root of the evil was left, such persons, though they died with shame, had the pity and compassion of the people, and, though murderers, were regarded as men of honour (55). This served to keep up the practice to the scandal of Law, Religion, and Government, which were set at defiance by this lawless and bloody course of calling men to account for trifles, and taking that satisfaction by the sword, which the laws of nature and the land would never have granted. Sir Francis Bacon being made the King's Attorney, used all his efforts to put a stop to this practice here, and his charge with regard to duels, upon an information in the Star-Chamber against Priest and Wright, was so highly approved by the Lords of the Council, who were then in the Star-Chamber, that they ordered it, as is said in the text, to be printed and published with the decree of the Court itself (52). 'In this charge he speaks of the nature and greatness of the mischiefs of duels, the causes and remedies of it, the justice of the Law of England, which some, he says, sticks not to think defective in this matter; of the capacity of the Court in the Star-Chamber, where certainly the remedy of that mischief was to be found; and of his own purpose and resolution, wherein he humbly desires the assistance of that Court. With regard to the mischief itself, he observes, that when revenge is once extorted out of the magistrate's hand, contrary to God's ordinance; and every man shall bear the sword, not to defend but to assail, and private men begin once to presume to give law to themselves, and to right their own wrongs, no man can foresee the dangers and inconveniences which may arise and multiply by that means. Other offences yield and consent to the law, that it is good, not daring to make defence, or to justify themselves; but this offence expressly gives law an affront, as if there were two laws, one a kind of gown law, and the other a law of reputation as they term it: So that Paul's and Westminster, the pulpit and courts of justice, must give place to the Law (as King James expresses it in his proclamation) of ordinary tables, and such reverend assemblies. The year books, and statute books, must give place to some French and Italian pamphlets, which handle the doctrine of duels, which if they be in the right, transsumus ad illa, let us receive them, and not keep the people in conflict and distraction between two laws. He considers then the loss which the nation suffers by the destruction of those persons by private, insignificant quarrels, whose blood, if it was adventured in the service of the King and realm, would be able to make the fortune of a day, and to change the fortune of a kingdom, with respect to the cause of it; the first motive undoubtedly is a false and erroneous imagination of honour and credit, upon which account, King James in his proclamation, calls them bewitching duels, 'for if one judge of it truly, says the Attorney, it is no better than a forcery that enchanted the spirits of young men, that bear great minds with a false shew, species falsa, and a kind of fatanical illusion, and apparition of honour against Religion, against Law, against moral virtue, and against the precedents and examples of the best times, and the valiantest nations.' Besides this, men have almost lost the true notion, and understanding of fortitude and honour. 'For fortitude distinguisheth the grounds of quarrels whether they be just, and not only so, but whether they be worthy, and setteth a better price upon men's lives than to bestow them idly, nay it is a weakness and and disesteem of a man's self, to put a man's life upon such lieger performances; a man's life is not to be trifled away, it is to be offered up and sacrificed to honourable services, publick merits, good causes, and noble adventures: It is in expence of blood as it is in expence of money, it is no liberality to make a profusion of money upon every profane occasion, no more is it fortitude to make effusion of blood, except the cause be of worth.' The remedies which he proposes for the restraint of this evil are, First, that there appear and be declared a constant and settled resolution in the State to abolish it: Secondly, care must be taken that it be no longer countenanced, or the humour of it indulged: Thirdly, says he, 'I must acknowledge that I learned out of the King's last proclamation, the most prudent and best applied remedy for this offence (if it shall please his Majesty to use it) that the wit of man can devise. This offence is grounded upon a false conceit of honour, and therefore it should be punished in the same kind, in eo quis rectissime plebitur, in quo peccat; the fountain of honour is the King and his aspect, and the access to his person continueth honour in life, and to be banished from his presence, is one of the greatest eclipses of honour that can be: If his Majesty shall be pleased, that when this court shall censure any of these offences in persons of eminent quality, to add this out of his own power and discipline, that these persons shall be banished and excluded from his court for certain years, and the courts of his Queen and Prince; I think there is no man, that hath any good blood in him, will commit an act, that shall cast him into that darkness, that he may not behold his Sovereign's face.' Lastly, that this court should punish all the middle acts and proceedings which tend to the duel, and so to hew and vex the root in the branches, which no doubt will kill the root, and yet prevent the extremity of the Law. The Attorney observes then, that the Law of England is excepted to, tho' ignorantly, in two points; the one, that it should make no difference between an insidious and foul murder, and the killing a man upon fair terms, as it is called: The other, that the Law has not provided sufficient punishment and reparations for contumely of words, as the lye, and the like: But these are no better than childish novelties against the divine law, and all laws in effect; and against the example of all the bravest and most virtuous nations in the world; for in the law of God there is never to be found, any difference made in homicide, voluntary and involuntary, which we term misadventure: As for example in civil states, 'All memory, says he, doth consent that Greece and Rome were the most valiant and generous nations of the world, and that which is more to be noted, they were free states, and not under a monarchy, whereby a man would think it a great deal the more reason, that particular persons should have righted themselves, and yet they had not this practice strongest marks of the high esteem he was then in that can be desired, and indeed Sir Francis Bacon had now overcome all difficulties, and stood securely on his own interest with the King, the Earl of Salisbury being dead, and for any thing that appears, Sir Francis having no dependence on the Earl of Somerset, who was the reigning favourite, but kept at a distance from him when he was in his greatest power, and consequently had nothing to answer for, with respect either to his personal or political failings (k). It is however manifest, that after the death of the Earl of Salisbury, there grew many disorders in the government, which verified the character Sir Francis Bacon gave of that great Minister to the King his master, viz. That though it was not likely the King's affairs should ever have gone much better under his management, yet he was such a Minister, as would have hindered them from growing worse (l), which as things stood would have been of very great service, as appeared by what happened in the year following, when the King having called a Parliament in hopes of obtaining a supply, some forward people in the House of Commons, to ingratiate themselves with the Court, made a tender to the King of their interest, with a kind of promise, that in case they were obliged, his Majesty's affairs in Parliament should go to his wish (m). These people, from this bold, and as it afterwards appeared, illgrounded presumption of their own abilities and interests, were stiled undertakers; yet so far were they from being able to carry matters, as they pretended, in the House of Commons, that this foolish and unjustifiable scheme of theirs having taken air, one of the first things the House fell upon, was an enquiry after these Undertakers (n). To pacify the heats occasioned by this strange project, the Attorney-General made a long and very fine speech, which is still preserved. It had not however the desired effect, for the House was so much out of humour at this, and some other mistakes in the administration, that the King seeing no hopes of obtaining any thing from them, dissolved the Parliament in a heat, and soon afterwards committed several members, who had spoken freely of his measures in the House of Commons. This instead of allaying increased the ferment in the nation (o), and that to such a degree, that the King seeing little hopes of better success in another, than he had found in the former Parliament, declined calling one; but being extremely distressed for money, he was glad to receive it in any manner, and by any means; and upon this, several of the nobility and clergy in and about London, made at least a seeming voluntary present to his Majesty, which the Council taking notice of, and being willing to encourage such an example, and make it more diffusive, they wrote letters to the Sheriffs, and Justices of Peace of the counties, and Magistrates of several corporations, informing them what had been done above, and how acceptable and reasonable the bounty of his subjects would be to the King and his occasions, but without any clauses of compulsion; or requiring, or returning of the names of such as should refuse (p). Among others, one was directed to the Mayor of Marlborough in Wiltshire, where Mr Oliver St John, a gentleman of an antient family, was then residing, who being consulted thereupon, he wrote a letter to the Mayor upon the eleventh of October, 1614, representing to him, that this benevolence was against the laws, reason, and religion, insinuating, that the King, by promoting the same, had violated his coronation oath, and that by such means as these, King Richard II, had given an opportunity to Henry IV, to deprive him of his crown, desiring if he thought fit, to communicate his sentiments to the Justices who were to meet about the benevolence (q). For this action, Mr St John was prosecuted in the Star-Chamber, and upon the fifteenth of April, 1615, the cause was brought to a hearing, as appears by

of duels, nor any thing that bare shew thereof, and sure they would have had it if there had been any virtue in it; nay, as he saith (fas est et ab hoste doceri) it is memorable, that is reported by a Counsellor, Ambassador of the Emperor's, touching the censure of the Turks of these duels. There was a combat of this kind, performed by two persons of quality of the Turks, wherein one them was slain, the other party was convented before the council of Bashaws, the manner of the reprehension was in these words: "How durst you undertake to fight one with the other, are there not Christians enough to kill? Did you not know, that whether of you should be slain, the loss would be the Grand Seigneur's?" So as we may see, that the most warlike nations, whether generous or barbarous, have ever despised this, wherein now men glory. As for the second defect pretended in our Law, that it hath provided no remedy for lies or fillips; it may receive the same answer. It would have been thought a madness amongst the antient lawgivers to have set a punishment upon the lye given, which, in effect, is but a word of denial, a negative of another's saying. Any lawgiver if he had been asked the question, would have made Solon's answer, That he had not made any punishment for it, because he never imagined the world would have been so fantastical as to take it so highly. The Civilians dispute whether an action of injury lie for it, and rather resolve the contrary; so every touch or light blow of the person is not in itself considerable, except that they have got upon them the stamp of a dif-

grace, which makes these light things pass for great matter. The law of England and all laws hold these degrees of injury to the person, slander, battery, maim, and death; and if there be extraordinary circumstances of despite and contumely, as in case of libels, and bastinadoes, and the like, this court taketh them in hand, and punisheth them exemplarily: But for this apprehension of a disgrace, that a fillip to the person should be a mortal wound to the reputation, it were good that men did hearken to the saying of Consalvo, the great and famous commander, that was wont to say, that a Gentleman's honour should be, de tela crassiore, of a good strong warp or web, that every little thing should not catch it, whereas now it seems they are but cobweb, lawn, or such like stuff, which certainly is weakness, and not true greatness of mind; but like a sick man's body, that is so tender that it feels every thing. We find likewise, that in December in the year 1616, he prosecuted one Mr Markham, for dispersing letters of challenge to the Lord Darcy: He mentions this in a letter to the Lord Viscount Villiers, published in the works of our author; who in reference to this crime, shewed himself no respecter of persons, but prosecuted with the utmost severity, such as, forgetting their duty to God and the government by which they were protected, ran into offences of this kind, merely to gain or to support their reputation, with such as were the worst judges of what deserved praise or dispraise.

Sir Francis Bacon's letter of that date (r). In this Court, which was composed of a great many Lords of the Council, the Chief-Justices and Chief-Barons, some of them thought that this offence was of a higher nature than a contempt; but they all agreed, that this benevolence, as it was circumstanced, was not restrained by any of the acts of parliament, which prohibits that sort of taxation, and that the defendant should be fined five thousand pounds, imprisoned during the King's pleasure, and make submission in writing, which he accordingly did (s). While this cause was depending, Sir Francis Bacon, in right of his office, was employed in the prosecution of two other offenders for high-treason, and they were both cases in some sort singular, and in which he had a great deal of trouble. The first was that of Peacham a clergyman, who had inserted several treasonable passages in a sermon never preached, and which, as some said, was never intended to be preached; however the papers being found in his study, it was resolved he should be prosecuted, and the King being, it seems, doubtful of the event, was resolved to go upon as sure grounds as he could, and therefore directed Sir Francis Bacon, to procure the opinion of Sir Edward Coke and the rest of the Judges beforehand, which was accordingly done, but the Chief-Justice Coke was not prevailed upon to give his without much difficulty, declaring it to be a thing unusual, and which he was very much afraid might be attended by very ill consequences; the point was at last carried notwithstanding, and Peacham was afterwards tried and found guilty, but not executed (t), which, however it may lessen the severity, does not in the least excuse the injustice of the proceeding, since several of the Judges were of opinion, that his crime was not high-treason. The other case was that of Mr Owen, of Godstowe in Oxfordshire, who returning out of Spain, did not only affirm, but enforce with reasons, a doctrine, which 'tis probable Suarez and some other Jesuits had disseminated, in that country; That if the King were excommunicated and deprived by the Pope, it was lawful for any person to kill him. This being a position in direct terms contrary to the late Oath of Allegiance, and of dangerous consequence if believed and propagated, it was thought necessary that he should be made an example, and accordingly in Easter term, 1615, he was prosecuted and convicted in the King's-Bench, my Lord Coke and the other Judges of that Court declaring, that it was high-treason within the statute of 25 Edw. III (u). The speech of Sir Francis Bacon at the arraignment of this Owen, is preserved in his works (w) [U], and there are also a great many passages in his letters, relating to both these prosecutions. But we are now to shift the scene a little, and to take notice of a new favourite, who began to engross King James's good

[U] Is preserved in his Works.] The case of this Owen was very remarkable, and the true reason of his being prosecuted, seems to have been, in order to awe the more violent sort of Papists. This man had asserted, that if the King was excommunicated, it was lawful to kill him, which assertion the Attorney maintained to be high-treason, in which he was supported by the Lord Coke, who was even more forward in this business than the Attorney himself, and inclined to carry the thing higher, as may appear from the following passage in a letter, written by Sir Francis Bacon to the King upon this subject (53). 'The Judges desired us to leave the examinations and papers with them for some little time to consider, (which is a thing they use) but I conceive there will be no manner of question made of it. My Lord Chief Justice, to shew forwardness, (as I interpret it) shewed us passages of Suarez, and others, thereby to prove, that though your Majesty stood not by particular sentence, yet by the general bulls of Cæna Domini, and others, you were upon the matter excommunicate, and therefore, that the treason was as de presenti. But I that foresee, that if that course should be held, when it cometh to a publick day, to disseminate to the vulgar an opinion that your Majesty's case is all one, as if you were de facto, particularly and expressly, excommunicate, it would but increase the danger of your person with those that were desperate Papists; and that it is needless, commended my Lord's diligence, but with all put it by, and fell upon the other course (which is the true way) that is, that whosoever shall affirm in diem, or sub conditione, that your Majesty may be destroyed, is a traitor de presenti, for that he maketh you but tenant for life, at the will of another; and I put the Duke of Buckingham's case, who said, that if the King caused him to be arrested of treason, he would stab him; and the case of the impostress, Elizabeth Barton, that said, if King Henry VIII took not his wife again, Katherine Dowager, he should be no longer King, and the like.' When this man came to be indicted for high-treason, at the bar of the court of King's Bench, Sir Francis Bacon supported the charge against him by that speech which is mentioned in the text, of which the latter part is lost, or at least, has not hitherto been printed; and it is remarkable, that it is that very part of the speech in which he maintained, that tho' the prisoner did not affirm simply, that it is lawful to kill the king, but conditionally only, that if the King be excommunicated, that it is lawful to kill him; yet this was treason. It was for this reason, that I cited in this note, the foregoing passage from his letter to the King, because it fully supplies the sense and argument, tho' not the form of the speech, and shews in what manner he made that out, which, for any thing I know, has not been observed before. At the beginning of this speech there is something very remarkable; this Mr Owen, it seems, was but an obscure man, and therefore the Attorney-General thought it requisite, to take off the imputation of severity in this respect, by shewing the true reason for this proceeding against him. His words are these (54): 'I have now served his Majesty, Solicitor and Attorney, eight years, and better, yet this is the first time that ever I gave in evidence against a traitor at this bar, or any other. There hath not wanted matter in that party of the subjects, whence this kind of offence floweth, to irritate the King, he hath been irritated by the powder treason, which might have turned judgment into fury; he hath been irritated by wicked and monstrous libels, irritated by a general insolvency and presumption of the Papists throughout the land, and yet I see his Majesty keepeth Cæsar's rule, Nil malo, quam eos esse similes sui, Et me met, he leaveth them to be like themselves, and he remaineth like himself, and striveth to overcome evil with goodness. A strange thing! bloody opinions, bloody doctrines, bloody examples, and yet the government still unstained with blood: As for this Owen that is brought in question, tho' his person be, in his condition, contemptible; yet we see by miserable examples, that those wretches which are but the scum of the earth, have been able to stir earthquakes by murdering of Princes, and if it were in case of contagion, (as this is a contagion of the heart and soul) a rascal may bring a plague into the city, as well as a great man; so it is not the person but the matter, that is to be considered.'

(54) Ibid. p. 322.

good graces, to whom Sir Francis Bacon was both a friend and counsellor. This was Mr George Villiers, afterwards so well known to the world by the title of Buckingham. His rise at Court was very swift and surprizing, to which the advice of his friend Bacon contributed not a little; and yet it must be allowed that this advice was such, as is not usually given in Courts, but of a strain equally free and friendly, calculated to make the person to whom it was addressed, both good and great, and so equally honourable for the giver and the receiver (x) [W]. But while this gentleman was rising, his predecessor Somerset was falling, in which Sir Francis Bacon also had a share, and a large one too, of which however we shall speak as briefly as possible, as having occasion to treat this matter much more at large, in several other articles (y). The occasion of this extraordinary event, was the unexpected discovery, of the deep concern that the Earl and Countess of Somerset had, in the barbarous fact of poisoning Sir Thomas Overbury, the first occasion of which discovery, as I find it no where clearly mentioned but in one of the speeches of Sir Francis Bacon, I shall take notice of here. Sir Thomas Overbury was poisoned in the beginning of the year 1613, chiefly by the means of one Weston, formerly an Apothecary's man, who had been put about him for this purpose. This Weston was afterwards promoted by Sir Gervaise Elways, Lieutenant of the Tower, who was also privy to the murder; and this gentleman having in other respects a good character, being strongly recommended to a certain nobleman by a friend of his, the share he had in the ill usage of Sir Thomas Overbury was objected, and this having led the Lieutenant to protest, that he had persuaded Weston from the design he had of poisoning Sir Thomas, and had engaged him to let it fall; this again afforded such light, that by pursuing it steadily the whole matter was found out (z). There never was an affair of this kind made more noise in England than this, and the King shewed a very earnest desire of bringing all who were concerned in it to justice; so that the Earl and Countess of Somerset were immediately committed, and the rest of the offenders prosecuted with all imaginable severity. It does not appear, that Sir Francis Bacon meddled at all with this affair at the beginning, for Richard Weston, who was tried on the nineteenth of October 1616, had the charge against

[W] And so equally honourable for the giver and receiver. It was immediately after this new favourite came to be distinguished, that Sir Francis Bacon entered into a strict and close friendship with him, which lasted with little, or no interruption, so long as they lived. Mr Villiers came well recommended to the King, for he was introduced by the Queen, persuaded by Archbishop Abbot, and other persons of the first quality (55). When he had received the honour of knighthood, and was made one of the bed-chamber, our author compiled, at his request, such a scheme of advice for his conduct, as perhaps was never before penned, and will hardly ever be amended (56). It is very large, and may be used very successfully, in the education of young men of quality, as it contains every thing necessary to be known or attended to, by a person in great favour, and admitted to great offices in the state. It was first printed in 4to in the year 1661, and again in the Cabala (57), and very correctly in our author's works (58). I shall select a paragraph or two at the beginning, to justify what is said in the text, and to prove that this piece was written, not in the stile of a flatterer, but of a friend. 'You know, says our author to Sir G. Villiers, I am no courtier, nor versed in state-affairs, my life hitherto hath rather been contemplative than active, I have rather studied books than men, I can but guess at the most, at those things in which you desired to be advised; nevertheless, to shew my obedience, tho' with the hazard of my discretion, I shall yield unto you. Sir, in the first place, I shall be bold to put you in mind of the present condition you are in, you are not only a courtier, but a bed-chamber man, and so in the eye and ear of your master, but you are also a favourite, the favourite of the time, and so are in his bosom also, the world hath so voted you, and hath so esteemed you, for Kings and great Princes, even the wisest of them, have had their friends, their favourites, their privadoes, in all ages, for they have their affections as well as other men. Of these they make several uses, sometimes to communicate and debate their thoughts with them, and to ripen their judgments thereby; sometimes to ease their cares by imparting them, and sometimes to interpose them between themselves and the envy or malice of their people; for Kings cannot err, that must be discharged on the shoulders of their ministers, and they who are nearest to them must be content to bear the greatest load. Remember then what your true condition is, the King himself is above the reach of his people, but cannot be

above their censures; and you are his shadow, if either he commit an error and is loth to avow it, but excuseth it upon his ministers, of which you are first in the eye, or you commit the fault, or have willingly permitted it, and must suffer for it, and so perhaps you may be offered a sacrifice to appease the multitude. But truly, Sir, I do not believe or suspect you are chosen to this eminency, out of the last of those considerations; for you serve such a master, who by his wisdom and goodness, is as free from the malice or envy of his subjects, as I think I may truly say, ever any King was, who has sat upon his throne before him; but I am confident his Majesty has cast his eyes upon you, as finding you to be such as you should be, or hoping to make you to be such as he would have you to be; for this without flattery I may say, your outside promiseth as much as can be expected from a gentleman; but be it in the one respect or other, it belongeth to you to take care of yourself, and to know well what the name of a favourite signifies. If you be chosen upon the former respects, you have reason to take care of your actions and deportment, out of your gratitude for the King's sake; but if out of the latter, you ought to take the greater care for your own sake. You are as a new risen star, and the eyes of all men are upon you; let not your own negligence make you fall like a meteor.' There is certainly great spirit and freedom in this Introduction, and it cannot be denied that the same spirit and freedom also runs through the whole piece. There might be somewhat of lightness and indiscretion in the King's choice of so young a favourite, but certainly, there was nothing strange, nothing that could give offence in the endeavours of Sir Francis Bacon, to make him become his place, to enable him, of a young courtier, to become a good statesman; and to turn the King's condescension to his own liking, to the benefit of his people. I have dwelt the longer upon this, because the application of Sir Francis Bacon to this rising star, has been made one of the principal objections against our author's conduct; whereas, whoever shall consider, what need Sir Francis Bacon had of the interest of Sir George Villiers; and, on the other hand, how necessary to Sir George Villiers, the counsels were of Sir Francis Bacon, will easily discern that this was, in it's beginning at least, a very equal friendship, and that the King's Attorney-General, did not run himself into a hasty and an indecent dependance, upon a boy just come into favour at Court.

againſt him opened by the Queen's Attorney-General (a). This man at firſt refuſed to plead, and by that means endeavoured to obſtruct the courſe of juſtice, but the famous Lord Coke directing all the evidence there was againſt him to be publiſhed in open court, he retracted his plea, and putting himſelf upon his trial, was found guilty, and received ſentence of death, which was afterwards executed (b). But the Earl of Somerſet, though a fallen Miniſter, had ſo many friends, that notwithstanding this clear proceeding, they endeavoured, by miſrepreſenting what had paſſed at Weſton's trial, and by interrogating him at the gallows, to make the whole paſs for nothing better, than an artificial contrivance to ruin that nobleman. This attempt of theirs brought Sir Francis Bacon into the buſineſs, for, as Attorney-General, he was commanded by the King to proſecute the perſons, who had been moſt buſy in this baſe undertaking, in the Star-Chamber. Accordingly he there brought a charge againſt Mr Lumſden, a courtier and a gentleman of good family in Scotland, Sir John Hollis, afterwards Earl of Clare, and Sir John Wentworth, upon which occaſion he made a moſt excellent ſpeech, which is not only preſerved among his other works, but was alſo inſerted by Mr Wilſon in his Hiſtory. In conſequence of this proſecution, all the parties were moſt ſeverely puniſhed in that court (c) [X]. It was his wiſe and prudent conduct in this proſecution, that engaged his maſter King James, to entruſt him chiefly in the management of the trials of the Earl and Counteſs of Somerſet, as appears by his own letters to the King upon this ſubject, in which it is evident, that this affair was now become, in ſome meaſure, a matter of State; and the King, who from the beginning had taken a great deal of pains, as his manner was, to magnify his zeal for, and ſkill in, doing juſtice, continued now to intereſt himſelf therein to ſuch a degree, as drew very heavy imputations upon his character, and ought to be a warning to Princes, to leave matters of this nature to the free courſe of the laws, without any interpoſition whatever (d). After many examinations, and much unneceſſary ſtir about

[X] Were moſt ſeverely puniſhed in that court. The deſign of this proſecution, was to vindicate the juſtice of the nation, and to prevent the obſtructing of it's courſe, which might have been the conſequence, if the methods taken by theſe gentlemen, and indeed by many others, ſuch as Mr Sackvil, Sir Thomas Vaſaſor, and the famous Sir Henry Vane, out of their too great affection for the Earl of Somerſet, had prevailed, and eſtabliſhed a notion, that Weſton died innocently, or at leaſt, that he had not accuſed the Earl. Sir Francis Bacon, in the opening of his charge (59), expoſed very fully the great danger of poiſoning, and why it was formerly accounted high-treaſon; becauſe, ſays he, it is an offence that evidently tends, to the ſubverſion and diſſolution of human ſociety, which he aſſigns as one reaſon, why the King had taken ſo much pains in this matter. He next obſerves, that Sir Thomas Overbury, at the time he was poiſoned, was a priſoner of ſtate in the Tower, and conſequently, more immediately under the King's protection. He adds to theſe, a third, that by the means of theſe three gentlemen, the honour of the King was deeply injured, by the aſperſions thrown upon his juſtice, for which no remedy could be had but here in the Star-Chamber. Having thus introduced the cauſe, he proceeded to the particular offences of the ſeveral perſons at the bar. As to Mr Lumſden, he ſays, that in the time between Weſton's ſtanding mute, and his trial; he drew up a falſe and libellous relation, containing as many untruths as lines, and delivered it to Mr Henry Gibb of the King's bed-chamber, that he might put it into his Maſtey's hands, with intent to ſlander the Chief Juſtice, of whom Sir Francis gives a great encomium upon this occaſion. As to Sir John Wentworth, he charges, that at the gallows he asked Weſton, whether he poiſoned Overbury or no? And with his giving this reaſon for his queſtion, that he deſired to know it, that he might pray with him. For Sir John Hollis, he does not charge him with asking any queſtions, but for acting as a kind of Confeſſor, by deſiring Weſton to diſcharge his conſcience, and to ſatisfy the world; to which he giving no answer, Sir John turned about his horſe and ſaid, he was ſorry for ſuch a concluſion. He farther charges him with another offence, prior in point of time, which was, that on the day the verdict was given againſt Weſton, he ſaid, If he were of the jury, he would doubt what to do. After having gone through theſe particulars, Sir Francis thus ſummed up his charge (60). 'Of the offence of theſe two gentlemen in general, your Lordſhip muſt give me leave to ſay, that it is an offence greater or more dangerous than is conceived, I know well, that as we have no Spaniſh Inquiſitions, nor juſtice in a corner; ſo we have no gagging of men's mouths at their deaths, but that they may ſpeak freely at the laſt hour, but then it muſt come from the free motion of the party, not by temptation of queſtions. The queſtions that are to be asked, ought to tend to farther revealing of their own or others guiltineſs. But to uſe a queſtion in the nature of a falſe interrogatory, to falſify that which is re judicata, is intolerable, for that were to erect a court or commiſſion of review at Tyburn, againſt the King's Bench at Weſtmiſter: And beſides, it is a thing vain and idle, for if they answer according to the judgment paſt, it adds no credit, or if it be contrary, it derogateſ nothing, but yet it ſubjecteth the maſtey of juſtice, to popular and vulgar talk and opinion. My Lords, theſe are great and dangerous offences, for if we do not maintain juſtice, juſtice will not maintain us.' All this was juſt and decent, what aroſe from the nature of the cauſe, and what was fit for a man in his office to ſay upon ſuch an occaſion. Sir John Hollis in his answer ſaid, 'That Mr Attorney had ſo well applied his charge againſt him, that tho' he carried the ſeal of a good conſcience, he would almoſt make him believe that he was guilty; but he hoped that their Lordſhips would take the bird by the body, and not by the feathers.' But the Chief Juſtice Coke dealt with them a little more rudely (61), telling Mr Lumſden, that he was the Earl of Somerſet's pimp, and that he could prove him to be ſo under the Earl's own hand: As for Sir John Hollis, he ſaid his crime was very great, for that he had queſtioned the truth of a fact after a verdict, which was of ſo ſacred a nature, that the law could not allow a man to do it, tho' ever ſo much concerned in intereſt: And becauſe in his defence Sir John had made uſe of this expreſſion, that if any thing were determined againſt him, he did humbly ſubmit himſelf thereto. The Chief Juſtice ſaid, he thought, that by determining, he meant the court were to give their cenſures againſt him by conſpiracy: For my own part, continued he, I talked with none other, nor I think did any of us, one ſpeak with the other before we came together here. Peradventure he thinks, as ſome have thought, that all the carriage of this buſineſs is but a conſpiracy againſt the Earl of Somerſet (62). Upon the whole, the court gave the following ſentence, viz. Mr Lumſden, was fined two thouſand marks, impriſoned in the Tower for a whole year, and after, until he ſhould at the King's-Bench bar, ſubmit himſelf and confeſs his fault, and alſo produce his authors. Sir John Hollis was fined one thouſand pounds, impriſoned in the Tower for the ſpace of a year. Sir John Wentworth fined one thouſand marks, impriſoned in the Tower for a year, and both were to make ſubmiſſion at the King's-Bench bar (63).

about it, Frances, Countess of Somerset was brought to her trial, on the twenty-fourth of May 1616, and there pleaded guilty, upon which occasion Sir Francis Bacon made a speech, in which the beforementioned circumstance, relating to the discovery of this whole affair was contained (e). The next day the Earl of Somerset was brought to his trial, and Sir Francis Bacon, as Attorney-General, opened the matter very fully, and with much perspicuity, and though the Earl defended himself with great art and skill, yet he was found guilty (f). It is true, that neither the Countess who confessed her guilt, nor the nobleman who was convicted upon evidence, suffered, though all who had been their instruments in this black and barbarous affair did; but the mercy extended to the former, was in regard to her family, the most noble in the kingdom, and the intercession of the Peers in her behalf; and the latter flowed from the King's tenderness towards a man, who had been once so high in his favour, and who is generally allowed to have been much less guilty than his wife. However, the sparing of them has been always accounted one of the greatest stains on King James's administration, and is a proof, that ill-timed mercy in a Prince, is often an act of severity to himself, and was more especially so in this case, because the King had taken so much pains to make the justice of that sentence appear, which afterwards he declined to execute (g). It must notwithstanding be allowed, that there is no kind of reason to believe, Sir Francis Bacon had any hand at all in procuring the Earl of Somerset's pardon, to whom as he had no obligations, so he conducted himself towards him in this matter, with a laudable indifference, shewing a warm, but decent diligence in the discharge of his duty, as Attorney-General, without any prejudice against either of the prisoners; so that in an affair which proved fatal to the Chief-Justice, he conducted himself with such wisdom and caution, as to deserve the approbation of the King his master, and the general applause of the whole nation (h). He was now trusted and employed by the King, not only in the business of his profession, but in so many affairs of another nature, and of superior consequence to the State, that he judged it would be for his own honour, and at the same time advantageous to the King's service, that he should be sworn of the Privy-Council, which, tho' unusual for a man in his station, was, by the interposition of his friend, Sir George Villiers, brought about, and he accordingly took his place at the Board, on the ninth of June 1616, at Greenwich, where the Court then was (i). His credit at this time was so great with the King, that his Majesty depended chiefly upon his integrity and abilities, in the regulation of an affair that very nearly concerned himself, and was of the highest consequence to the nation. There had grown a very high difference between the two Courts of Chancery and King's-Bench, as to the point of Jurisdiction, which seems to have arisen in a great measure from the warmth and haughtiness of Sir Edward Coke, then Lord Chief Justice, who instead of endeavouring to bring matters to a fair hearing and amicable conclusion, did all he could to drive things to extremities, and to get the better of the Court of Chancery, by setting on foot some violent prosecutions at law. This, as might reasonably be expected, occasioned a very great noise, which was not a little heightened by a very unfortunate circumstance, viz. that the Chancellor was very dangerously ill, when the Chief Justice fell upon him in this manner (k). The King proceeded in this affair with great coolness and caution, and referred it to the examination of those, who he thought were most able and most willing to give him a right information, of which Sir Francis Bacon was one, and as far as at this day we can discern, his opinion went the farthest, towards settling the point [Y]. The conclusion of the matter was, that the King

[Y] His opinion went the farthest in settling that point.] It may not be amiss to give a short account of the first rise of this controversy, which then occasioned so much clamour, and has been more than once revived since. It was in few words this, one Mr Courteney suing in Chancery to be relieved, against a judgment obtained at the Common-Law; an indictment for a Præmunire, grounded upon the statute 27 Edw. III. cap. 1. was preferred against him and his agents, in the King's-Bench at the end of Hillary term, 1615-6. Tho' the jury refused to find the bill yet thereupon sprung that contended question, whether by virtue of the said statute, and that of the fourth year of Henry IV, cap. 3. the Chancery, after judgments given in the courts of Law, was prohibited from giving relief upon matters arising in equity, which the judges at law, could not determine or relieve (64)? This affair, as has been observed in the text, making a great noise in the world, the King, as supreme Judge of the jurisdictions of his courts, used the utmost care to inform himself therein, and referred the same to Sir Francis Bacon, and Sir Henry Yelverton, his Attorney and Solicitor; Sir Henry Montague, and Sir Randolph Crewe, his Serjeants at Law, and Mr Walter, the Prince's Attorney, all eminent men in their profession; who, upon a serious consideration of the statutes and the occasion of making them, and of the precedents since that time, did, in April 1616, present the King with their opinions and reasons, why they conceived these statutes did not extend to the court of Chancery; consonant to which resolution, his Majesty, upon further advice, gave judgment in July following, and ordered the case, the certificate, and the transactions thereupon, to be enrolled in the same court (65). All the time this great business was depending, Sir Francis Bacon, besides the pains he took in his office, and as a Commissioner in right thereof, wrote from time to time to the King upon this subject, and at last, when the affair drew near to a conclusion, drew up a memorial for the King's conduct in this matter, as also in another of no less importance, with which, as we shall have an occasion to mention it in another place (66), we have not meddled here. This memorial, as the King followed it closely, so far as it concerns the present case, we shall insert here (67).

 ' That about the end of Hillary term last, there came to his Majesty's ears, only by common voice and report, not without great rumour and wonder, that there was somewhat done in the King's-Bench the last day of that term, whereby his Chancery should be pulled down and be brought in question for Præmunire, being the most heinous offence after treason, and felony, and misprison of treason, and that the time should be, when the Chancellor lay at the point of death.
 ' That his Majesty was so far from hearing of this by any complaint from his Chancellor (who then had given over worldly thoughts) that he wrote letters

King in person pronounced a kind of judgment in the Star-Chamber, in favour of the Lord Chancellor Egerton, with some pretty sharp remarks on the conduct of his antagonist, who soon after lost his master's esteem, tho' he lived to recover and lose it again (l). Sir George Villiers was all this time rising in his Sovereign's favour by very swift degrees, in which perhaps he was not a little assisted by the good advice that was given him by his friend Sir Francis Bacon, who certainly took a great deal of pains to serve him, and therefore had the greatest right to expect, that in return he should render him all the good offices that were in his power, in which, as from their letters it very clearly appears, he was not at all backward, but, on the contrary, promoted his interest with great warmth and sincerity, agreeable to the character which is given of him by the Earl of Clarendon, than whom there are few who have shewn themselves better judges of men (m). But however it does not appear, that Sir Francis Bacon relied entirely upon his assistance; but that, on the contrary, he addressed himself with much plainness and freedom to the King, representing very fairly and strongly, tho' with modesty and decency, the nature and length of his services, and the several reasons he had to expect, that the King, in case of a vacancy, should think of him for the custody of the Seals, as a matter equally honourable for himself, and advantageous to his Majesty's service. It is not easy to conceive, how applications for favour can be conducted with dignity, or how a man can set forth his merits and services, explaining at the same time his own fitness for any particular employment, and marking the inaptitude of others, without a mixture of meanness on the one hand, and of envy and injustice on the other. But the more difficult such a task appears, the more his excellency must shine, who was able to discharge it, and to discharge it with honour to himself, without wrong to others, and with duty and benefit to the King his master. Yet this, as the reader will plainly see, Sir Francis Bacon did, at a time when the death of the then Lord Chancellor was daily expected, and consequently, when he might aspire to that high dignity, without any breach of the friendship with which he had been honoured by that worthy person. It is true, the libellers of those times, or, which is the same thing in milder words, the writers of secret history, report matters otherwise (n), but for the honour of his memory, his letter written upon that occasion yet remains, to set the thing in it's true light (o) [Z]. But the Lord Chancellor recovering, his application

' of comfort to him upon this accident, before he heard
' from him; and for his Attorney, his Majesty chal' lenged him for not advertizing him of that, of
' which it was proper for his Majesty to be informed
' from him.

' That his Majesty being sensible of this so great
' novelty and perturbation in his courts of justice,
' nevertheless used this method and moderation, that
' before he would examine this great affront and
' disgrace offered to his Chancery and Chancellor,
' he would first inform himself whether the Chancery or
' Chancellor were in fault, and whether the former
' precedents of Chancery did warrant the proceedings
' there, after judgment passed at Common Law (which ' was the thing in question) and thereupon his Ma' jesty called his learned Counsel to him, and com' manded them to examine the precedents of Chan' cery, and to certify what they found, which they ' did; and by their certificate it appeareth, that the ' precedents of that kind were many and precise in
' the point, and constant and in good times, and
' allowed many times by the Judges themselves.

' That after this, his Majesty received from the ' Lord Chancellor a case, whereby the question was ' clearly set down, and contained within the proper ' bounds of the present doubt; being, whether upon
' apparent matter of equity, which the Judges by ' the law, by their place, and oath, cannot meddle
' with or relieve, if a judgment be once pass at Com' mon Law, the subject shall perish, or the Chancery shall
' relieve him, and whether there be any statute of Prae-
' munire or other, to restrain this power in the Chan' cellor? Which case, upon the request of the Lord
' Chancellor, his Majesty likewise referred to his learned ' Counsel (and the Prince's Attorney, Mr Walter, ' was joined with them) who, upon great advice, and
' view of the original records themselves, certified,
' the Chancery was not restrained by any statute in ' that case.

' That his Majesty again required his learned Coun' sel to call up the Clerks of the King's-Bench to ' them, and to receive from them any precedents of ' indictments in the King's Bench against the Chan' cery, for proceeding in the like case; who produced
' only two precedents, being but indictments offered,
' or found, upon which there was no other proceeding;
' and the Clerks said, they had used diligence and
' could find no more.

' That his Majesty, after he had received this sa' tisfaction, that there was ground for that the

' Chancery had done, and that the Chancery was not in
' fault, he thought then it was time to question this
' misdemeanour and contempt, in scandalizing and
' dishonouring his justice in that High Court of Chan' cery, in so odious a manner, and commanded his
' Attorney-General, with the advice of the rest of his
' learned Counsel, to prosecute the offenders in the Star-
' Chamber, which is done, and some of them are
' fled, and others stand out and will not answer.

' That there resteth only one part more towards his ' Majesty's compleat information in this cause, which is,
' to examine that which was done in open court the said
' last day of Hillary term; and whether the Judges of the ' King's-Bench did commit any excess of authority, or ' did animate the offenders otherwise than according to ' their duty and place; which enquiry, because it ' concerneth the Judges of a court (to keep order and ' decorum) his Majesty thinketh not so convenient to ' use his learned Counsel therein, but will commit
' the same to some of the council table, and some of ' his learned Counsel to attend them.

' This declared, or what else his Majesty in his ' own high wisdom shall think good, it will be fit
' time to have the certificate of the learned Counsel
' openly read.'

[Z] His letter writ upon that occasion yet remains, to set the thing in it's true light.] The scope of this letter is fully shewn in the text, and so much thereof as is necessary to give the reader a true notion of Sir Francis Bacon's conduct in this particular, follows (68): ' I hope I may be acquitted of pre' sumption if I think of it, both because my father ' had the place, which is some civil inducement to ' my desire, (and I pray God your Majesty, may have
' twenty no worse years in your greatness, than Queen
' Elizabeth had in her model after my father's ' placing) and chiefly because the Chancellor's place
' after it went to the Law, was ever conferred upon
' some of the learned Counsel, and never upon a
' Judge; for Audeley was raised from a King's Ser-
' jeant, my father from Attorney of the Wards,
' Bromley from Solicitor, Puckering from Queen's
' Serjeant, Egerton from Master of the Rolls, having ' newly left the Attorney's place. Now I beseech
' your Majesty, let me put you the present case truly.
' If you take my Lord Coke this will follow, first,
' your Majesty shall put an over-ruling nature into an
' over-ruling place, which may breed an extreme;
' next, you shall blunt his industry in matter of fi' nances, which seemeth to aim at another place; and education did not at that time take effect; and therefore he betook himself to the duties of his office, and to such other employments as were imposed upon him by the King his master. Various indeed they were, and thereby speak the vast extent of his abilities in civil life; for besides settling the jurisdiction of Courts, and the nature of the King's prerogative, which were things some way incident to his office and profession (p): we find him frequently consulted in affairs of state and of the revenue, more particularly in a great dispute between the Merchant-Adventurers, or, as we find them commonly called, the Old Company, and another company of merchants, with one Alderman Cockaine at their head, who by promising great things to the King, and greater to the nation, had procured to themselves powers, which they were not able to manage so advantageously, as either they expected, or was expected from them (q). We find him likewise deeply engaged in Irish affairs (r), and acting in both, not as a busy and forward man, fond of thrusting himself into every thing, but as an active and diligent servant to his Prince, who thought nothing a burthen, nothing a hardship, which it was in his power to perform for the benefit of the State, or as an instance of his gratitude to so good and kind a master. He likewise shewed himself exceedingly careful and sollicitous, in whatever related to the preferments, honours, or fortunes of Sir George Villiers, to whom he professed an early friendship, and for whom however, if we may judge from his letters, he did nothing officiously, but rendered him such services only, as fell properly in the way of the Attorney-General: such as the preparing his warrants for patents, and for the grants of land, in which, if besides the bare duties of his function, he gave him some marks of particular friendship; it ought rather to be attributed to his affection for his person, and his regard for one who had shewn great willingness to serve him, than to a servile spirit and mean adulation of power, since he had never shewn any thing of that sort with respect to Somerset, who had enjoyed a much greater measure of power, than Sir George Villiers had hitherto done (s). The last act of Sir Francis Bacon as Attorney-General, was of the same nature with the first, by which I mean, his prosecuting Mr Markham in the Star-Chamber, for sending a challenge to Lord Darcy, wherein he gained great reputation (t). So that in the course of upwards of three years, in which he held the post of Attorney-General, which, as an able writer has observed, proves often a rock on which the greatest lawyers split; he behaved himself with such prudence and moderation, and went through so many difficult and perplexed affairs, with such evenness and integrity, that, for any thing appears, his conduct was never called in question, nor has malice itself dared to utter of him the least reproach (u). When this is considered, we need the less wonder at his so confidently expecting the high employment to which he was raised. It was a very natural elevation from the post he was then in, the good old Lord Chancellor desired to have him for his successor, and indeed there was no man of the profession so fit for it at that time as himself. The manner in which it was done was every way great and gracious, for the Lord Viscount Brackley, then Lord Chancellor, being worn out with age and infirmities, on the third of March 1617, at a visit which the King paid him, resigned the Seals into his Majesty's hands, whose tenderness at parting with so ancient and faithful a servant, made him shed tears (w). Upon the seventh of the same month, the King delivered the Great Seal to Sir Francis Bacon, then in the fifty-fourth year of his age, with the title of Lord-Keeper, giving him at the same time these three cautions; first, That he should not seal any thing but after mature deliberation. Secondly, That he should give righteous judgments between parties. And lastly, That he should not extend the royal prerogative too far. These wise and grave admonitions were highly worthy of a good Prince, and happy had it been for the new Lord-Keeper, if they had been and lastly, popular men are no sure mounters for your Majesty's saddle: If you take my Lord Hobart, you shall have a Judge at the upper end of your council board, and another at the lower end, whereby your Majesty will find your prerogative pent; for tho' there should be emulation between them, yet as Legists, they will agree in magnifying that wherein they are best. He is no statesman but an economist wholly for himself, so as your Majesty (more than an outward form) will find little help in him for the business; If you take my Lord Cantorbury, I will say no more, but the Chancellor's place requires a whole man, and to have both jurisdictions spiritual and temporal in that height, is fit but for a King. For myself I can only present your Majesty with gloria in obsequio, yet I dare promise, that if I sit in that place, your business shall not make such short turns upon you as it doth, but when a direction is once given, it shall be pursued and performed; and your Majesty shall only be troubled with the true care of a King, which is, to think what you would have done in chief, and not how for the passages. I do presume also, in respect of my father's memory, and that I have been always gracious in the Lower House; I have interest in the gentry of England, and shall be able to do some good effect in rectifying that body of parliament men which is cardo rerum; for let me tell your Majesty, that that part of the Chancellor's place, which is to judge in equity between party and party, that same regnum judiciale, (which since my father's time is but too much enlarged) concerneth your Majesty, least, more than the acquitting of your conscience for justice, but it is the other parts of a moderator amongst your counsel, of an overseer over your judges, of a planter of fit justices and governors in the country, that importeth your affairs, and these times most. I will add also, that I hope by my care the inventive part of your council will be strengthened, who now commonly do exercise rather their judgments than their inventions, and the inventive part cometh from projectors and private men, which cannot be so well, in which kind my Lord of Salisbury had a good method if his end had been upright. To conclude; if I were the man, I would be, I should hope, that as your Majesty hath of late won hearts by depressing, you should in this lose no hearts by advancing, for I see your people can better skill of concretum than abstractum, and that the waves of their affections flow rather after persons than things, so that acts of this nature (if this were one) do more good than twenty bills of grace.

been as constantly remembered, as they were graciously given and submissively received (*). He went afterwards to visit the late Lord Chancellor, as well to acquit himself of the debt of personal gratitude which he owed to that worthy person, as to acquaint him with his master's gracious intentions, which were to give him the title of an Earl, with a pension for life, which though he did not survive long enough to receive, yet they were made good to his son, who was created Earl of Bridgewater, by the first patent to which the new Lord-Keeper affixed the seal (y). Within eight days after Sir Francis Bacon was raised to this high honour, the King set out for Scotland, notwithstanding his favourite lately created Earl of Bucks, had opposed that journey as far as he durst. By this means the Lord-Keeper was placed at the head of the Council, and intrusted with the management of publick affairs in the King's absence, which if it proved an accession of honour, proved also a source of much envy and malice. He was succeeded as Attorney-General, by Sir Henry Yelverton, who was replaced as Solicitor-General, by Sir Thomas Coventry. How much soever Sir Francis Bacon might gain in dignity by this promotion, it seems very doubtful whether he gained any thing in point of profit, since he quitted three very gainful offices, First, that of Attorney-General, which, as he told the King himself, was worth to him six thousand pounds a year (z); next, that of Chancellor to the Prince, which he likewise mentions in one of his letters (a); and lastly, his post of Register of the Court of Star-Chamber. What the profits were of his new office is uncertain, but the fees granted him by patent were not large, being no more than five hundred forty-two pounds fifteen shillings a year, as Lord-Keeper, three hundred pounds a year for his attendance in the Star-Chamber, threescore pounds a year for wine, and sixteen pounds a year for wax (b). On the seventh of May following, which was the first day of the term, he went to Westminster in great state, and there took possession of his high office, being attended by many of the nobility, and other persons of distinction. Upon this occasion he did, what whether it was usual or not was certainly very decent and becoming, that is to say, he made a long and large speech, of the nature and duty of his office; of what might be expected from him in it, and of the manner in which he meant to discharge it; in the opening of this speech he took notice of the cautions given him by the King, which however he enlarged, and so made them the ground-work of his copious oration, which has been always esteemed one of the finest in our language, and which perhaps is no less for his honour, has been most esteemed by those, who from their learning in the profession understood it best (c). In this speech he laid down rules for his own conduct, for the conduct of the suitors to the Court, and the gentlemen at the bar. At this distance of time we cannot say what effect it had, but in all probability it must have raised his reputation very high, and himself tells us, that it reflected no small honour on the King (d). He very soon experienced the truth of that solid observation, That the highest seats are the most exposed; for within a little time after the King's setting out for Scotland, the Spanish match, was, by direction of his Majesty, brought upon the carpet, and his Lordship had too much wisdom and penetration, not to perceive the many and great difficulties, with which it was like to be attended, which he hinted to the King in a letter, wherein he very prudently and honestly advised his Majesty not to proceed therein, but with an united Council, expressing at the same time his just sense of the misfortunes that had already attended, in various instances, discordancy of opinions. As that business proceeded, his dislike increased; yet he did not declare himself openly against it, but contented himself with such insinuations, as he thought might have restrained and discountenanced it (e). In other affairs of no small consequence, he behaved as circumstances required, with the gravity of a great officer of State, or with the freedom of an accomplished gentlemen. Thus, in his set speech to the Judges before the summer circuit in 1617, and in his several speeches to such as were sworn before him into offices of high trust, he conducted himself with all imaginable gravity; but to qualify this, he soon after invited all the Judges to dinner, and when over in a friendly conversation satisfied them, that he had no intention to extend the power of the Court of Chancery beyond it's ordinary limits, to the prejudice of other courts, and therefore desired them, in case they were at any time dissatisfied with his proceedings, to acquaint him therewith, adding, that he made no doubt of their adjusting things to their mutual satisfaction (f); he recommended to them likewise, their bringing him reports of their several circuits, that according to his command they might be certified to his Majesty (g). In all other respects he was equally cautious and methodical, transmitting from time to time, clear and distinct accounts of whatever passed of any moment to the Earl of Buckingham, who wrote to him also in a very respectful stile, expressing not only his own admiration of his great parts and prudent conduct, but likewise the commendations given of them by the King (h), which makes it very improbable, that ever this favourite pretended to treat the Lord-Keeper in the manner which some pens have represented [AA]. But however

[AA] In the manner some pens have represented. There is perhaps no country in the world in which exalted fortune does not beget envy, but at the same time, I believe, it may be truly said that kind of envy rises no where higher, or manifests itself with more violence and bitterness than with us in England. The Lord Keeper Bacon felt this very severely, for no sooner was he advanced to this high point of preferment in his profession, than all tongues were opened against him, that either from interest or inclination, wished to have seen some other person seated in that high post. He was very sensible of this, and sought by all possible means to guard against it, endeavouring always to conduct business suavibus modis.

however, it must be allowed, that not long after this, Sir Francis Bacon fell into some kind as his own expression is, by the softest and gentlest methods, that to his utmost he might avoid giving provocations, which however had not altogether the force that might have been expected. For this there may be many reasons assigned, but I shall mention only a few; he was on bad terms with all Somerset's party, which was numerous and powerful; he was an opponent to the famous Sir Edward Coke, who had a great train of admirers and dependants; he was a constant friend to Buckingham, which drew upon him the ill will of such as hated that haughty favourite; and besides all this, he provoked many of that great man's dependants by stopping their grants at the Seal. However, very little evil was publicly divulged of him during his life-time, when it might afforded room for apology or defence, but has discovered itself in libels, penned indeed by such as lived in his days, but not such as were most likely to be well acquainted with him, or the points of which they so confidently wrote. Sir Anthony Weldon, in his Court and Character of King James asserts,

'That Buckingham, to vex the very soul of Lord Chancellor Egerton in the last agony, sent Bacon to him for the seals; and that the dying Chancellor hated that Bacon should be his successor, and that the old man's spirit could not brook this, but sent the seals by his own servant to the King, and shortly after yielded up his soul to his Maker (69).'

But this account contains two egregious fallacies; for in the first place, though as we have seen in the text, Camden says, the Chancellor resigned to the King himself; other authors agree, that it was the King sent for the Seals, and not the Duke of Buckingham; and he sent for them, not by Sir Francis Bacon, but by Secretary Winwood, with this message, that himself would be his under-keeper, and not dispose of them while he lived to bear the name of Chancellor; nor did any person remove the seal out of the King's sight till the Lord Egerton died, which happened soon after (70). In the next place, the Lord Chancellor Egerton, as Dr Tenison observes, was willing that the Attorney-General, Bacon, should be his successor, and ready to promote it, so far from conceiving any hatred against him either upon that or any other account. He had been a friend to Sir Francis Bacon even in the Queen's time, as appears from a letter of the latter to him, mentioned by Dr Tenison, and this favour of his continued to the last (71): For Sir Francis Bacon writes as follows in a letter to Sir George Villiers, dated the 15th of February 1615 (72): 'My Lord Chancellor told me himself yesterday in plain terms,

'that if the King would ask his opinion, touching the person that he would commend to succeed him upon death or disability, he would name me for the fittest man. You may advise whether use may not be made of this offer.' And in a letter to King James dated January 29, 1614, he wrote as follows: 'It pleased the Lord Chancellor out of his antient and great love to me, (which many times in sickness appeared most) to admit me to a great deal of freedom of speech with him this afternoon, which during these three days he hath scarce done to any (73). Sir Anthony Weldon reproaches my Lord Bacon, as a very necessitous man, and one for that reason made Keeper by the Duke of Buckingham, to serve such turns as men of better fortunes would never condescend to. But this is a mere groundless and malicious insinuation; for he had enjoyed for a long time many profitable places, which preserved him from indigence, though, as Dr Tenison observes, his great mind did not permit him to swell his purse by them to any extraordinary height, and in the Queen's time when he was in meaner circumstances, he did not look upon himself as in that estate of necessity, which tempteth generous minds to vile things. But let us hear himself in the letter to the Lord Chancellor Egerton, quoted by Dr Tenison (74), 'My estate says he, I confess a truth

'to your Lordship, is weak and indebted and in need of comfort; for both my father (though I think I had greatest part in his love of all his children) in his wisdom served me as last comer, and myself in mine own industry, have rather referred and aspired to virtue than to gain, whereof yet I am not wise enough to repent me. But the while, whereas Solomon speaketh, that want cometh first as a wayfaring man, and after as an armed man, I must acknowledge myself to be in primo gradu, for it stealth upon me; but for the second, that it should not be refilled, I hope in God I am not in that case; for the preventing whereof as I do depend upon God's providence all in all, for in the same his providence, I set opened unto me three not unlikely expectations of help; the one, my practice; the other, some proceeding in the Queen's service; the third, the place I have in reversion, which as it now standeth unto me, is but like another man's ground buttalling upon my house, which may mend my prospect, but it doth not fill my barn.' However, it must be owned, that the Earl of Buckingham was very instrumental in the Lord Keeper's preferment, which he acknowledged in his letter, written the same day that the Seals were presented to him; and surely, says Mr Stephens (75), fewer lines did never contain a greater sense of gratitude, or expressed it in a more becoming manner, though by the original they seemed to have been hastily written, and may serve to confirm what had been told me, by one who lived in his latter times, that his first copies required no great labour to render them competent for the nicest judgments; it is as follows:

'It is both in care and business, that small ones float upon the tongue, and great ones sink down into the heart in silence; therefore I could speak little to your Lordship to day, neither had I fit time, but I must profess thus much, that in this day's work you are the truest and perfectest mirror and example of firm and generous friendship that ever was in court, and I shall count every day lost wherein I shall not either study your well doing in thought, or do your name honour in speech, or perform you service indeed.' In the same volume we have likewise his speech at the taking his place in Chancery, in performance of the charge of his Majesty had given him, when he received the Seals in 1617. Sir Anthony Weldon has upon this occasion introduced another scandalous story with regard to Sir Francis Bacon, and tells us (76), that this great favourite (Buckingham) sent a noble gentleman and of much worth to him with this message, 'That he knew him to be a man of excellent parts, and as the times were, fit to serve his master in the Keeper's place, but he also knew him of a base and ungrateful disposition, and an errant knave, apt in his prosperity to ruin any that had raised him in his adversity; yet for all this, he did so much study his master's service, knowing how fit an instrument he might be for him, that he had obtained the Seals for him, but with this assurance, should he ever requite him as he had done some others to whom he had been bound, he would cast him down as much below scorn, as he had now raised him high above any honour he could ever have expected. Bacon, continues that author, was at that time Attorney-General, who patiently hearing this message, replied, I am glad my noble Lord deals so friendly and freely with me, and hath made that choice of so discreet and noble a friend, that hath delivered his message in so plain language. But, says he, can my Lord know these abilities in me, and can he think when I have attained the highest preferment my profession is capable of, I shall so much fail in my judgment and understanding as to lose these abilities, and by my miscarriage to so noble a patron, cast myself headlong from the top of that honour to the very bottom of contempt and scorn. Surely my Lord cannot think so meanly of me. The gentleman replied, I deliver nothing from myself, but the words are put into my mouth by his Lordship, to which I neither add nor diminish; for had it been left to my discretion, surely, tho' I might have given you the substance, yet I should have apparelled it in a more modest attire; but as I have faithfully delivered my Lord's to you, so will I as faithfully deliver yours to his Lordship. You must understand, continues Sir A. Weldon, the reason of this message was his ungratefulness to the Earl of Essex, which every one could remember, for the Earl saved him from starving, and he requited him so as his apology must witness; were there not a great fault there needed no apology, nor could any age, but a worthless and corrupt in men and manners, have thought him worthy of such a place of honour. Very hard language this of a man so eminent and well known, and this from a person

kind of disgrace, both with the King and the favourite, and this about a family concern of Buckingham's, which, to say the truth, shews a most shameful weakness in that government, as it very plainly proves, that the private concerns of a particular person, were grown to be of as great consequence as matters of State (l): The case then, to state it in as few words as possible, was this, Sir Edward Coke had formerly rejected, with some marks of contempt and disdain, a marriage that had been proposed between Buckingham's elder brother, Sir John Villiers, and one of Sir Edward's daughters, by Lady Hatton, but now finding the power of this family so great, and being desirous of coming again into favour, he applied himself to Secretary Winwood, and with great professions of sorrow for having offended the King, and of not being able to live if he was not restored to his good graces; he offered to do any thing that was required from him, and particularly to consent to this marriage (k). As soon as the Lord-Keeper was informed of this, he wrote very freely and fully both to Buckingham, and to the King, against the marriage, which however, had not the desired effect, but, on the contrary, drew upon him the displeasure of the favourite and his master. It must likewise be acknowledged, as indeed it appears clearly by his letters, that the Lord-Keeper was chiefly moved to this opposition, from his apprehension of it's bringing Sir Edward Coke again into favour, and there is no denying that this was a great meanness in him, and very unbecoming a person of his great abilities, as well as one in his high station (l). But after all, this proves no more, than that even the greatest men have their weaknesses, and that the corruptions of Courts are capable of tainting the most noble minds. On the King's return from Scotland, which was in the beginning of the month of September 1617, the Lord-Keeper and some other members of the Council, were reprimanded for the concern they had in this affair; but it does not appear, that it went so far as to create a breach between his Lordship and the Earl of Buckingham; and indeed, considering all things, one can see no just ground why it should, since, in the course of the whole dispute, it very plainly appears, that it was not from any coldness or distaste that his Lordship had taken, but rather from the excess of his fidelity and affection to Buckingham, that he had interested himself so much in this affair; and therefore, when the Earl had maturely considered it, he, of his own accord, thought proper to mitigate his Majesty's displeasure against the Lord-Keeper, and very soon procured, that is, within a fortnight after the King's return, a thorough reconciliation, for which the Lord-Keeper wrote Buckingham a letter of thanks, conceived in the strongest terms possible (m). Towards the close of the month, the marriage which had raised all those disputes, was solemnized, in consequence of which, Sir Edward Coke was recalled to the Council table, yet it was not long that he continued in favour, for his great friend Secretary Winwood dying, things soon ran again into their old channel, and therefore the stories we meet with in some writers of those times, may well be accounted, rather instances of Court malice, than representations of any real facts (n) [BB]. This storm once over, the Lord-Keeper returned to his former province, of superintending the King's affairs in general, and of no character at all, or, which is worse, of a very bad one, as will be very fully shewn in another place, where we shall have occasion to enter more fully into the history and value of Sir Anthony Weldon's performance (77). At present it shall suffice that we observe, there is not the least degree of probability in the story which he relates, at the same time that he pretends not to the least shadow of evidence; so that we are to take a fact, which would scarce deserve credit, though supported by ever so good witnesses, without any witness at all, and this against the light of one's own reason, and of a multitude of facts which may be alledged to discredit it; for whereas this is made to have been a sudden promotion, in consequence of a bargain with Buckingham, we have seen that it was so far from being such a promotion, that it was long before in agitation with the King himself, upon whom it is evident enough Sir Francis Bacon chiefly depended. This story makes Buckingham even before he had acquired that title, an insolent and overbearing favourite, which is directly contrary to what all the historians of those times say, who commend him for his affability and generosity at the beginning, by which, as he rose in the King's favour, he grew likewise in esteem with his subjects, pursuing therein a conduct very different from that of his predecessor, Somerset, who really raised and disgraced, brought into credit or drove out of the court, without the least regard to decency, men of great merit or men of none, just as his interest required or his fancy dictated. It is not therefore at all probable, that the new favourite, who so well knew by what steps the old one became so very odious, should immediately pursue his path, more especially when he could not but very well know, that he was far enough from being absolutely master of the King's good graces, out of which he had very near thrown himself a very little after this, by most imprudently discovering his aversion to the King's intended journey into Scotland.

[BB] Instances of Court malice than representations of any real facts.] We have in the former note given the reader a specimen of Sir A. Weldon's malice to Sir Francis Bacon, and of his small regard for truth; in this we are obliged again to quote him, and quote him for the very same reason. He was informed of the quarrel between the Lord Keeper and Buckingham, while the latter attended his Majesty in Scotland, and he could not but see, that, during his Majesty's absence, the Lord Keeper Bacon had the chief direction of affairs, which in some measure he lost, while this quarrel subsisted. Now let us hear the whole of this story in his own language: 'Now was Bacon, says he, invested in this office, and within ten days after the King goes to Scotland. Bacon instantly begins to believe himself King, lies in the King's lodgings, gives audience in the great banquetting-house, makes all other counsellors attend his motions with the same state, the King used to come out to give audience to ambassadors; when any other Counsellors sat with him about the King's affairs, would (if they sat near him) bid them know their distance, upon which, Winwood, then Secretary, rose, went away, and would never sit more, but instantly dispatched one to the King, to desire him to make haste back, for his seat was already usurped. At which, I remember, the King reading it to us, both the King and we were very merry; and if Buckingham had sent him any letter, would not vouchsafe opening it, or reading in publick, though it was said it required speedy dispatch, nor would vouchsafe him any answer. In this posture he lived until he heard the King was returning, and began to believe the play was almost at an end; he might perfonate and more particularly the bringing the expence of the King's government, now called the Civil List, into such a compass, as that it might not exceed his ordinary revenue (o). We have many of the Lord-Keeper's letters on this and on other subjects of importance, both to the King himself and to Buckingham, in which there is nothing discovered of a supple cringing or low spirit, but quite the contrary, for he often stopped at the seal, patents and grants obtained by the interest of the favourite, and gives him his reasons in very free and clear terms, which most evidently shews, that he was not of such a servile temper, as his enemies have represented him (p); and though he must have been exceedingly occupied, by that prodigious variety of business which passed through his hands, yet, even at this time, we have a remarkable instance of his care and concern for the publick, expressed in the care he took to procure a patent, which was inrolled in Chancery, for constituting two Reporters in the courts of Westminster-Hall, with a fee of one hundred pounds per annum to each, which, how little fruit soever it may have brought forth, was certainly a thing well designed, and which might have proved highly advantageous, as well to the nation in general, as to the profession of the Law in particular (q). Towards the end of this year, which had been so fruitful of extraordinary events to his Lordship, he was in some little danger of losing his life. This fell out from the passion of an angry man, against whom he had made a decree in Chancery, viz. Gervase Lord Clifton, who publickly declared, that he was very sorry he had not stabbed the Lord-Keeper in his chair, at the time he pronounced the decree (r). He was for this offence committed close prisoner to the Tower of London, and the thing made the more noise, because, but the year before, one Sir John Tyndal, a Master in Chancery, had been actually shot by one Mr Bertram, a man of considerable fortune and very fair character, and this for making a report against him, that was perfectly agreeable to justice. There is several times mention made of this affair of Lord Clifton's, in the Lord-Keeper's letters, from which it is easy enough to discern, that though his Lordship professes, that he neither hated him for what was past, nor feared what might happen from him in time to come, yet he did not care that he should be enlarged suddenly, and without such notice taken of him, as the nature of his crime deserved (s). There is no certainty, though there may be a probability, that a prosecution was commenced against this angry Lord in the Star-Chamber, but however it was, to secure himself from the effects of those misfortunes drawn on by his own ill conduct, he laid violent hands upon himself the next year, which shews how great danger the Lord-Keeper was in, from the resentment of a person of such strong passions (t). In the very entrance of the succeeding year 1618, viz. on the fourth of January, Sir Francis Bacon had the title given him of Lord High Chancellor of England (u), which shews how effectually he had got over that coldness, which arose about the marriage beforementioned, and as to which it began already to appear, that he had formed a much better, or at least a truer, judgment, than those who had promoted it; and about the same time his friend the Earl of Buckingham was raised to the degree of a Marquis (w), by the same title, and if we may judge from their letters, their friendship at this time was as cordial as ever. Yet the Chancellor personate a King's part no longer, and therefore did again re-invest himself with his old rags of baseness, which were so tattered and poor at the King's coming to Windsor; that he attended two days in Buckingham's anti-chamber, being not admitted to any better place, than the room where trencher scrapers and lacques attended, there sitting upon an old wooden chest (amongst such as for his baseness were only fit for his companions, although the honour of his place did merit far more respect) with his purse and seal lying by him on that chest, myself told a servant of my Lord of Buckingham's, it was a shame to see the purse and seal of so little value or esteem in his chamber, though the carrier without it merited nothing but scorn, being worst among the basest; he told me they had command it must be so. After two days he had admittance, at first entrance fell down flat on his face at the Duke's foot, kissing it, vowing never to rise till he had his pardon; then was he again reconciled, and since that time so very a slave to the Duke, and all that family, that he durst not deny the command of the meanest of the kindred, nor oppose any thing; by this you see, a base spirit is ever most concomitant with the proudest mind, and surely, never so many parts, and so base an abject spirit, tenanted together in any one earthen cottage, as in this one man (78). The very manner in which this libel is delivered, sufficiently destroys it's credit, the facts contained therein are so unlikely and improbable, that there seems to be no occasion for refuting them; yet as they have been very unaccountably transcribed, as well attested truths by some writers, I think it may not be amiss, to shew how little appearance of truth there is in them. There are still remaining abundance of Lord Bacon's letters to Buckingham, and many of his answers, not one of which bears any mark of meanness on the one side, or of haughtiness on the other, but rather, I think, quite the contrary (79). It is indeed true, that the author of this book attended King James in his journey to Scotland, as one of the Clerks of the Green-Cloth, but it is not very probable that the King should read the Secretary of State's letter in abuse of the Lord Keeper, either to, or in the presence of such a Clerk. It was this man's misfortune to be disgraced in this journey, and that for writing a libel on the people of Scotland, while they were endeavouring to outdo one another in caressing the King's English servants, for which he was turned out, as a man unfit to be in the King's family, but had a sum of money given him, and a small pension for life, which he gratefully returned by writing this book: This makes it improbable that he should be so intimate at Buckingham's, as he pretends to be on the King's return (80): He contradicts himself also in this account, for in another part of his book, he says, that Buckingham behaved modestly so long as his brother Purbeck was about him; and it appears plainly, that this brother of his, then Sir John Villiers, was in greater credit with him then, than at any time afterwards (81): Add to all this, the unlikeliness, that, after such treatment, the Lord Keeper should in three months time be made Lord Chancellor, by the interest of that very person, who, according to this account, had offered him such an insult as could not well be forgiven, or at least, forgot on either side, and that no other person except this obscure man, ever mentions any circumstance that agrees with, or affords the least credit to, this wild and improbable story.

(77) See the article of YELVERTON (Sir HENRY).

Chancellor still continued to use the same freedom as formerly, with respect to grants and patents which came recommended by the favourite, several of which he stopped at the Seal, and on signifying his reasons to the Marquis of Buckingham, he was so far from resenting any thing in the Chancellor's conduct, or expressing himself with any loftiness upon such occasions, that, on the contrary, he thanked his Lordship by letter, telling him expressly, that he desired nothing should pass the Seal at his instance or request, but what was just and convenient (x). As the new year entered with an Act of Advancement, so the spring afforded frequent opportunities to the Chancellor, to ingratiate himself with his master by free and honourable counsels, which inclined his Majesty to confer still higher marks of his favour, and accordingly by letters patents dated at Wanstead the eleventh of July 1618, Sir Francis Bacon was created Baron of Verulam in the county of Hertford; and in the preamble to those letters it is recited, that his Majesty was moved thereto, by the grateful sense of the many and faithful services rendered him by this worthy person, as well in the Court of Chancery, as in the Privy-Council, and elsewhere; and the witnesses to the aforesaid letters, are Charles Prince of Wales, the Duke of Lenox, the Marquis of Buckingham, Marquis Hamilton, the Earl of Pembroke, the Earl of Arundel and Surrey, and others of the prime nobility (y). This new honour excited his Lordship to new services, and it appears from his own writings, that he was very attentive to every thing that might conduce, either to the immediate benefit of his Majesty, or to the general good of his subjects. He has indeed been censured for giving some opposition to the charity of Mr Alleyne the Player, but it is very evident, that his Lordship meant no more therein, than to prevent an extravagant increase of licences in Mortmain, agreeable to the sentiments he had expressed while Solicitor-General, on account of the foundation of Sutton's Hospital, and as at this distance of time, we have an opportunity of comparing his advice with the events that have followed, there seems but little room to take offence, either at his Lordship's opinions or proceedings (z) [CC]. The next affair of great moment, in which his Lordship had a particular concern, was the prosecution of the Dutch merchants, for transporting abroad vast quantities of gold and silver, in money, plate, and bullion, in which his Lordship proceeded with great caution, and due respect to justice. The first step taken in it, was the Attorney-General's applying to the Chancellor, on the nineteenth of October 1618, for writs of Ne exeant Regnum, against several of those merchants, on a suggestion of their offending in this matter; upon which he immediately wrote to the Marquis of Buckingham, expressing an unwillingness to grant those writs in prejudice of the merchants, without being acquainted with evidence, and at the same time gave these salutary cautions; That his Majesty would

[CC] Little room to take offence, either at his Lordship's opinions or proceedings.] This imputation of his having no great affection to charitable foundations, is a very high reflection on his memory, and, though in itself very groundless, has been maintained with great warmth by many well meaning people, from unreasonable prejudices, and for want of due information. When he was Solicitor-General, he opposed the erecting that hospital which is now called the Charter-house, pursuant to the will of Mr Sutton the founder, and this in two capacities; first, in that of his profession, for he was of counsel with Simon Baxter, nephew to Mr Sutton, who claimed his estate as heir at law, together with Mr Walter and Mr Yelverton, afterwards Attorney-General and a Judge. Secondly, as Solicitor-General, he advised the King, in case the heir at law failed in his suit, to improve this charity of Sutton's, which he thought was but crudely digested, and therefore he compares it to a sacrifice without salt. The defects he apprehended were, that by degrees this design might be corrupted, and such persons placed therein as poor, as the owner never intended; that the master would grow into a place of great profit, and be considered rather as a good preferment, than as the head and director of a charity, that the great revenue assigned by the founder, of near six thousand pounds a year, would in the end make a few people rich, instead of affording a comfortable maintenance to many. In his discourse upon this subject, as indeed in his discourses upon all subjects, there are many curious and uncommon remarks, which, to an unbiassed reader, will fully prove, that he opposed this charitable foundation, from no other principle than that of an extensive charity (82). Yet a certain writer has been pleased to assign three very unworthy motives for his behaviour on this occasion: The first is, the comfortable expectation of a great share of the revenues (83). But how could this be, since, as a Lawyer, he contended for the right of the heir at law, which would have vested Sutton's estate in him; and in his advice to King James, he recommends three things; first, the erecting a college of controversy against the Papists; secondly, an hospital for converts to the Protestant religion; and thirdly, the maintaining itinerant preachers in such parts of the King's dominions as were infected with Popery. I should be glad to know in which of these he would have placed himself. The second motive to this opposition is said to be, because he was not named by Sutton, as one of the trustees for the foundation (84); which very reflection was suggested by Mr Laws, the executor, about the time of the trial. A reflection it is very justly called, for it could never be proved, and therefore cannot be answered; but one may have leave to suggest, that if he had really had a mind to have had a hand in the direction of this charity, he might very easily have succeeded, by employing his pen and his interest in the support of it. The last motive for his opposition is said to have been, that he and Sir Edward Coke could never agree, and therefore no wonder if they differed in this affair. I should be glad to know what can be inferred from this difference; was Sir Edward Coke a man always in the right, so that whoever differed from him must be necessarily in the wrong? Or can it be supposed, that Sir Francis Bacon, who was so wise a man, should act so unpopular a part, as to oppose this charity merely because Sir Edward Coke espoused it? The reasons himself assigned for his conduct very evidently prove the contrary, in as much as they have been judged very strong, and very well grounded by men of the best understandings in succeeding times. As to the case of Alleyne the Player, he meant not to hurt or to oppose his charity, but to restrain it from eight hundred pounds a year to five, to make way for a grant of three hundred pounds a year to the two universities, which he judged might be of greater use to the publick. The reader may inform himself farther upon this subject, by perusing the letter itself, with some remarks upon it already inserted in a foregoing article (85). Upon the whole, it may be justly affirmed, that if no other part of his conduct had been more liable to exception than this, few men's characters would have been more unpotted.

(84) Might not Sir Francis Bacon have retorted on Mr Laws, that his zeal arose from his being an executor?

would not grant to Sir Thomas Vavafor, or Sir John Brittain, the forfeitures accruing from this discovery, but rather reward them at discretion; and next, that his Majesty would grant a commission to his Lordship, Mr Chancellor of the Exchequer, Sir Edward Coke, and the Lord Chief-Justice of England, for examining into, and conducting this affair to his Majesty's profit (a). These notices were both kindly received, and readily complied with, by his royal Master; and the consequences were, that the Attorney-General filed informations against one hundred and fourscore of these merchants, but at first proceeded to trial against twenty only, of the richest and most remarkable, who were convicted and fined to the amount of one hundred and fifty thousand pounds. Some time after, several more of these merchants were likewise brought to trial, and fined, the rest of the prosecutions being stayed at the instance of Buckingham, who was moved thereto by letters from the States-General, and the severity of the fines was afterwards mitigated to a third part, by the intercession of Sir Noel Caron, then Minister here from the republick of the United Provinces (b). While this business was depending, there fell out another affair, in which the Lord Chancellor had a pretty large concern, of which we should have been able to give a better account, if all the letters written by the Lord Verulam about this matter had been preserved. It was, in short, this, Thomas Howard, Earl of Suffolk, Lord High-Treasurer, being removed from this high employment upon a suspicion of corruption, a commission was granted for enquiring into his conduct, and upon the report of these Commissioners, there was a prosecution commenced against him in the Star-Chamber (c). If we may credit the writers of those times, his Lordship was an honest, open-hearted man, but had a cunning, rapacious, and busy wife, who by the help of one Sir John Bingley, an under officer to his Lordship, had driven several scandalous bargains, which brought the Earl under this prosecution, carried on with a great deal of rigour, and brought to a hearing on the nineteenth of November, 1619 (d). In pronouncing the judgment of the Court, Sir Edward Coke led the way, and having shewn his learning, by running through the prosecutions against Treasurers in past times, for like offences, concluded for a fine of one hundred thousand pounds, the imprisonment of the Earl and Countess in the Tower, and a fine of five thousand pounds on Sir John Bingley, and commitment to the Fleet; the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and the Secretary Sir Robert Naunton, concurred with him in this judgment, but the Lord Chief-Justice Hobart thought this rather a ransom than a fine, and therefore declared for thirty thousand pounds on the Earl, and two thousand on Sir John Bingley, with whom the rest of the Court concurred (e). The Earl and Countess were both for some time committed to the Tower, but by the interposition of the Marquis of Buckingham were set at liberty, and the fine reduced to seven thousand pounds, which was paid (f). It appears from the letters of the Lord Verulam that are still remaining, that he was very assiduous in this business, that he had a principal hand in detecting the frauds and corruptions practised in the Treasury, and that at the time of passing sentence, he approved the more moderate proceeding, and laboured to establish in the minds of the Court and of the audience, an high opinion of the King's tenderness and mercy (g), for which he received his Majesty's thanks, together with a full approbation of his conduct, by a letter from the Marquis of Buckingham (h). Such were the great transactions of these two years, for if we were to mention all the matters of importance which passed through his hands, and of which he has either left memorials in his letters, or that might be collected from records, it would swell this life into a volume, and therefore we touch only the most memorable accidents that we meet with in his memoirs, and that with a due regard to the times in which they happened, a circumstance wherein we have met with great difficulties, from the many false and imperfect dates which occur in the histories of that reign. While he was High Chancellor of England, he procured from the King the farm of the Alienation-Office, which was of considerable benefit, and proved a great part of his subsistence, after he lost his office; he likewise procured York-House for the place of his residence, for which he seems to have had an affection, as being the place of his birth, and where his father had lived, all the time he possessed the high office of Lord-Keeper of the Great-Seal (i). Here, in the beginning of the year 1620, he kept his birth-day with great splendor and magnificence, as appears by a short performance of the famous Poet Ben. Johnson upon that occasion, in which, though the verse be somewhat harsh, there is so much good sense, and such a vein of Poetry, as very well deserves the reader's notice (k) [DD]. One of the most remarkable transactions of this year, was the prosecution of the Attorney-General, Sir Henry Yelverton, in which the city of London was also involved. The offence with which he was charged, being the exceeding [DD] Such a vein of Poetry as well deserves the reader's notice. This poem is amongst those which Ben Jonson, of immortal memory, filed his Underwood, in allusion to a former work of his, which he named his Forest. The reader will observe, that the form of the poem implies a very beautiful fiction, the poet starting, as it were, on his entering York-House, at the sight of the Genius of the place performing some mystery, which, penetrating from the gayety of his look, affords matter for the compliment (85).

ing his instructions in drawing a charter for this metropolis (l). This gentleman had the misfortune to incur the displeasure of the Marquis of Buckingham, who, according to his nature, which inclined him to do much good to his friends, and much evil to those he esteemed his enemies, persecuted him with great fury, and it seems, from a letter of Verulam's, that this disposition of the Marquis had made some impression upon himself, since he advises the King not to accept the Attorney's submission, as a satisfaction, and yet to make use of it as evidence; but in the same letter he shews, that such violent methods were not suitable to his temper, since he concludes it, with recommending the Attorney to his Majesty's mercy (m). In consequence of this advice, an information was preferred in the Star-Chamber against the Attorney, and the Lord-Mayor of London, which ended in a heavy sentence and a severe imprisonment; but however he was afterwards restored to Buckingham's favour, by whose recommendation he was made a Judge of the Common-Pleas; but as this happened long after that Lord Verulam was removed from having any share in publick affairs, we shall take no farther notice of it here, but refer the reader to his article, in which he will find it fully set forth (n). The same cares, with respect to the King's business, and chiefly with regard to his revenue, still employed and took up a great part of his Lordship's time, in which he seems to have agreed better with Sir Edward Coke, than could have been well expected, and always represents him as labouring heartily and effectually in the King's service, which shews that he was very far from being of an unforgiving nature, and indeed his whole study seems at this time to have been directed, to keep all who were concerned in the King's affairs on good terms with each other (o). About this time however, an attempt was made to the prejudice of his Lordship, which might have given him some warning of his fall. For one Mr Wrenham, against whom he had made a decree, surmising he had wrong done him, presented a libellous petition to the King against him, the suggestions of which were thoroughly examined, from whence it clearly appeared, that the Chancellor had acted as became him, and that he had in truth been very much injured by this Wrenham (p). Happy had it been for his Lordship, had he been always as ready and able to defend himself. But tho' he was fully acquitted of all blame on account of this matter, yet the effects of it stuck close to him, and in the end proved his ruin, the industry of Wrenham producing those complaints, of which we shall hear enough hereafter (q). But in the midst of so much difficulty, under the weight of so great a load of business, and notwithstanding the diligence and attention shewn by him in the discharge of the several branches of his duty, he was so far from forgetting or neglecting his philosophick studies, that in the month of October 1620, he sent the King his master the ripest fruits of them, in the most perfect and most important work that ever fell from his pen, and which of all others he valued most, his Novum Organum (r) [EE]. This his Majesty received as graciously

[EE] Which of all others he valued most, the Novum Organum.] In order to give the reader a just idea of the value and importance of this work, we will first describe the nature of it, and then mention the judgment passed thereon by some of the greatest ornaments of the republick of letters. The design of the Novum Organum was, to execute the second part of the Instauration, by advancing a more perfect method of using the rational faculty than men were before acquainted with, in order to raise and improve the understanding, as far as it's present imperfect state admits, and enable it to conquer and interpret the difficulties and obscurities of nature; with this view it undertakes the care and conduct of the understanding, and draws out and describes the apparatus and instruments of reasoning; whence it appears to endeavour at a new kind of Logick, tho' greatly superior to the common, which, through the abuses crept into it, appears fitter to corrupt than strengthen and improve the mind, for the scope and use of this new Logick, is not to discover arguments and probable reasons, but arts and works. It is divided into two principal parts, viz. into a preparatory part, and one that is scientificall and instructive; the first part tends to prepare and purge the mind, and fit it to receive and use the instructions and instruments laid down in the second; the mind, like a mirror, requiring to be levelled and polished, or discharged of it's false imaginations and perverted notions, before it can be set to receive and reflect the light of truth and just information; and the levelling part is of four kinds, with respect to the four different sorts of idols or false notions, that possess the mind: These idols are either acquired or natural, and proceed either from the doctrines and sects of Philosophers, the perverted and corrupt laws and methods of demonstration, or else are innate and inherent in the very constitution of the mind itself. The first labour therefore is to discharge and free the mind from it's swarms of false theories, which occasion such violent conflicts and oppositions; the next point is to release it from the slavery of perverted demonstrations; and the last is to put a check upon this seducing power of the mind, and either to pluck up those innate idols by the root, or if that cannot be done, to point them out that they may be thoroughly known and watched, and so have the depravities which they occasion corrected: This levelling part therefore is performed by three kinds of consultations, viz. the consultation of philosophies, the consultation of demonstrations, and the consultation of the natural unassisted reason. When thus the mind is rendered equable and unbiassed, the work proceeds to set it in a proper situation, and as it were, with a benevolent aspect to the remaining instructions, whereby the business of preparing the mind is still further carried on, and the whole drift of this ensuing part, is only to possess mankind with a just opinion of the whole Instauration for a time, that they may wait with patience, the issue and event thereof, upon solid assurances of some considerable benefit and advantage from it, when it's scope shall come to be well understood; and thence it proceeds distinctly to obviate all the objections and false suspitions which may be raised about it, through the prevailing notions and prejudices drawn from religious consideration, those of abstract speculation, natural prudence, distrust, levity, &c. thus endeavouring to pacify and allay every wind of opposition: to render this preparation still more compleat and perfect, the next thing is to raise the mind from the languor and torpidity it may contract from the apparent miraculous nature of the thing, and as this wrong disposition of the mind cannot be rectified without the discovery of causes; the work proceeds to mark out all the impediments, which have hitherto perversely retarded and blocked the way of true Philosophy, and thus makes it appear no wonder at all, that mankind should have been so long entangled and perplexed with errors. When the ways of removing these impediments are shewn, there follows a chain of arguments for establishing a solid foundation of hope, for the better success of genuine and serviceable Philosophy in future; for it is hereby demonstrated, that tho' the interpretation of nature intended by the Infaturation may indeed be difficult, yet much the greater parts of the difficulties attending it, are in the power of man to remove, as arising, not from the nature of the senses and things themselves, but only require that the mind be rectified, in order to their removal; and this first general part concludes, with an account of the excellence of the end in view. The preparatory part being thus dispatched, the work proceeds to the business of information, the perfecting of the understanding, and the delivery of the art of working with this new machine in the interpretation of nature: This is laid down in three several branches, with regard to the sense, the memory, and the reason, each whereof is assisted in its turn. This work he addressed to his Majesty, who, in his letter dated October 16, 1620 (86), tells him that he could not have made him a more acceptable present, and that for his part he could not express his thanks better, than by informing him of the resolution he had taken to read it through with care and attention, tho' he should steal some hours from his sleep, having otherwise as little spare time to read, as his Lordship had to write it, with many other gracious expressions, which fully demonstrate how much the Chancellor was in the King's good graces, and how high an esteem he had for his parts and learning. The famous Sir Henry Wotton, to whom his Lordship sent three copies of this book, wrote him a large letter of praise in return, which, as we have no room for complements, we shall omit. He received the like tribute of commendation from such as were the most learned, or so affected to be thought, in this and in the neighbouring nations; yet after all, this performance was rather praised than read, and more generally applauded than understood. This produced a kind of latent censure, a sort of owl-like criticism that durst not abide day-light: Honest Ben. Johnson produced this to the world a little after our author's death, when he very generously, as well as judiciously, gave this character of the Novum Organum (87): 'That tho' by most superficial men, who cannot get beyond the title of Nominals, it is not penetrated or understood, really openeth all defects of learning whatsoever and is a book,

Qui longum noto scriptori prorogat ævum.
To latest times shall hand the author's name.

We need not wonder at this, when we consider the pains it cost the noble Verulam, for Dr Rawley assures us, that he had seen twelve copies revised, altered, and corrected year by year, before it was reduced into the form in which it was published (88). We must however allow that it is not absolutely perfect, as appears from what a most ingenious and judicious writer has delivered upon it, with that modesty, circumspection, and good sense, which is discernible in all his writings: The person I mean, is the late learned and excellent Mr Baker of St John's College in Cambridge, who allows, that my Lord Bacon, saw clearer into the defects of the art of reasoning than most men did, and being neither satisfied with the vulgar Logick, nor with the reformations that were made; suitable to his vast and enterprising genius, attempted a Logick wholly new and plain, which is laid down in his Novum Organum (89). The way of syllogizing, says he, seemed to him very fallacious, and too dependent upon words to be much relied on, his search was after things, and therefore he brought in a new way of arguing from induction; and that grounded upon observation and experiments: But the same gentleman observes, that this plan, as laid by him, looks liker an universal art than a distinct Logick, and the design is too great, and the induction too large to be made by one man, or any society of men in one age, if at all practicable. For whatever opinion he might have of the conclusiveness of this way, one cross circumstance in an experiment would as easily overthrow his induction, as an ambiguous word would disorder a syllogism; and a man needs only make a trial in any part of natural history, as left us by my Lord Bacon, to see how conclusive his induction was like to have been. To say nothing, that notwithstanding his blaming the common logicks, as being too much spent in words, himself runs into the fault he condemns, for what else can we make of his Idola Tribus, Idola Specus, Fori, Theatri; or of his instantia solitariae, migrantes, ostensiva, clandestinae, constitutiva, &c. but fine words put to express very common and ordinary things? After the way of free-thinking had been laid open by my Lord Bacon, it was soon after greedily followed; for the understanding affects freedom as well as the will, and men will pursue liberty though it ends in confusion. There is certainly a great deal of truth in what Mr Baker says, with regard to the consequences of Lord Verulam's Philosophy, and the manner in which it has been profecuted; but surely this ought not to be imputed to him, who, if I understand him at all, was of all philosophical writers the least addicted to free-thinking. Of this opinion is the famous Morhof (90), who bestows the highest praises on the work of which we are now speaking, making no scruple to declare, that he had found but very little in the books since written by Englishmen, the grounds of which he had not long before met with in Bacon, the extent of whose genius struck him with admiration, as it must do every man who takes the pains to understand him; because, tho' this new Logick of his be very difficult, and requires much study and application to master it, yet it leads to the knowledge of things and not of words. Mr Voltaire, in his Letters concerning the English nation (91), remarks, 'That the most singular and the best of all his pieces, is that which is most useless and least read, I mean, says my author, his Novum Scientiarum Organum, this is the scaffold with which the new Philosophy was raised, and when the edifice was built, part of it at least, the scaffold was no longer of service. The Lord Bacon was not yet acquainted with nature, but then he knew, and pointed out the several paths that led to it. He had despised in his younger years the thing called Philosophy in the universities, and did all that lay in his power to prevent those societies of men, instituted to improve human reason, from depraving it by their quiddities, their horrors of vacuum, their substantial forms, and all those imperinent terms, which not only ignorance had rendered venerable, but which had been made sacred by their being ridiculously blended with religion.' There cannot be any thing more honourable for the memory of this great person, than the testimony of the writer before mentioned, who, it is certain, has not shewn too great a readiness to praise or commend any body, and much less the English authors, whom, except Newton, he seems to applaud with reluctance. There is however one thing in his judgment of this work, which deserves to be particularly considered, and that is, his comparison of it to a scaffold, which it cannot be denied, is at once very just and very significant; but then it is not very easy to know, what this great Critick means by representing it as useless, and assigning that as a reason, why this treatise is now so little read or understood. The very contrary of this seems to be the fact: The new Philosophy stands like a vast magnificent palace, in some places half finished, in others the walls carried up to a moderate height, their memories (s). He received also the complements of many learned men on the same subject, and had all the reason in the world to be satisfied with the general reception of a work, which cost him so much time and pains. The King's affairs were by this time come to such a pass, that notwithstanding all the labour that his Council had bestowed in regulating his expences and revenues, a Parliament was not only expedient but necessary, and this in no man's judgment more than in that of the Chancellor, who was always desirous of governing according to the Constitution, and who valued himself particularly upon his abilities in managing such assemblies (t). When the calling a Parliament was resolved upon, he was directed to consult with the proper persons, about the means most likely to render that measure safe and salutary for the King and kingdom, and accordingly taking to his assistance the two Chief-Justices, Montague and Hobart, and Serjeant Crewe, they, after mature deliberation, agreed upon four points, which the Chancellor represented in a letter to his Majesty. The first was looking carefully into the grievances formerly complained of, and examining into such things of a like nature, as might probably afford room for new complaints. The second was, the settling a proclamation, explaining the causes which at that juncture moved his Majesty to call a Parliament, so as to quiet and conciliate the minds of the nation. The third related to the admonitions that might be fitly given, as to the choice of members. The fourth referred to commonwealth bills, as his Lordship called them, a phrase which I take to be equivalent to popular laws, as they are now styled (u). The King was extremely well pleased with this advice, for which the Marquis of Buckingham returned him his Majesty's thanks, and recommended to him the drawing of such a proclamation, which he accordingly performed, and sent it to his Majesty, after it had received the approbation of Sir Edward Coke, the two Chief-Justices, and Serjeant Crewe. We have it still extant in his Works, and it must be allowed, that never any thing of it's kind surpassed it; however it did not entirely please the King, who thought it too long, and that it told the people too much of what ought to be reserved for his Majesty's speech and his own, at the opening of the Parliament (w). It was therefore contracted, and only the substance of it retained, in the proclamation issued for calling the Parliament, on the sixth of November following. But after all it was found impossible to put things in order by that time, which made another proclamation necessary, which was referred to his Lordship to draw, and so happily he succeeded therein, that the King declared he thought a word could not be altered in it (x). By this proclamation the meeting of the Parliament was put off to the thirtieth of January following, and in the mean time, several steps were taken to please the people, in order to render this meeting between the King and his great Council, more agreeable to all parties. Amongst these, on the twenty-seventh of January, his Majesty by his letters patents of that date, raised Sir Francis Bacon, Knt. Baron of Verulam, to the dignity of a Viscount, by the style and title of Viscount St Albans in the county of Hertford. In the preamble to this patent the King sets forth, that as he thought nothing could adorn his government more, than raising of worthy persons to honour, or afford greater encouragement to virtue and publick spirit, he, after mature deliberation, had thought fit to advance his dearly beloved and faithful Counsellor, descended from an antient and honourable family, so much the more illustrious, by his succeeding his most worthy and prudent father in the office of Keeper of the Great-Seal, to which, through various offices of inferior dignity, from a just experience of his capacity and fidelity, he had by his Majesty been led, and reflecting finally on the acceptable and faithful services, which as well by his assiduity and integrity in the administration of justice, as by his care and prudence in the discharge of his duty as a Privy-Counsellor, and in the management of his revenue, without respect either to private advantage or vain breath of popularity, to a higher degree of nobility (y). At the same time this new dignity was granted to him and his heirs male, there was annexed to it a small pension out of the customs. The witnesses to this patent, were more illustrious in some respects than those to the former. For besides the Prince of Wales, there were the Viscount Maundevile, Lord High-Treasurer; the Earl of Worcester, Lord Privy-Seal; the Marquis of Buckingham, Lord High-Admiral; Marquis Hamilton, the Earls of Pembroke, Arundel, Rutland, Montgomery, Leicester, March, Holdernes, height, in some, just raised above the ground, in others, hardly marked out; what reason therefore for taking away the scaffold? Or rather, what reason to expect the work should ever be finished, at least thoroughly and regularly, if the scaffold be taken away? The truth of the matter is, that several who have wrought upon this noble structure since; have erected scaffolds for their own use, of their own contrivance, and when they have in some measure finished the part they were about, taken them away, and concealed from the eye of the publick their manner of working (92). Others again have attempted to raise scaffolds from the lights received from our author, and so far as they have copied them, have done this with great success. But Lord Verulam's was a more noble design, he knew that the life of one man, could not suffice for the finishing, even a small part of this stately edifice, and therefore he spent so many years in constructing this scaffold, which might have served for perfecting and completing the whole work, if others had been as diligent in pursuing his plan, as he was studious and careful, in rendering it every way fit for the use which he designed. This is the true account, and the only true one, of the Novum Organum, and one may safely venture to assert, that if his design had been pursued with that steadiness which it deserved, the new Philosophy had been by this time, not only more perfect than it is, but more perfect than it is ever like to be, unless the learned at last discern their error in this respect, and are content to make use of the helps he has left them, which, the more they are considered, the more they are tried, will be found more adequate to the great design of their author, than well can be imagined.

Holderness, and many others. He was likewise solemnly invested in this new dignity, the Lord Crewe carrying the robe of state before him, which robe was held up by the Marquis of Buckingham, and the new Viscount gave the King solemn thanks for all the favours he had bestowed upon him, which he particularly recapitulated (z). On the thirtieth of January he opened the Parliament with a short speech, and made another larger at the receiving Sir Thomas Richardson, whom the Commons chose for their Speaker (a). The King had great hopes of this Parliament, from the general inclination shewn by the people, to enable his Majesty to assist his son-in-law, who was not only deprived of the kingdom of Bohemia, to which he was elected, but also in great danger of utterly losing his hereditary dominions, whence his Majesty flattered himself, that knowing his necessities, they would immediately apply themselves to the means of relieving them, without digressing into any disagreeable enquiries after grievances. But in this he soon found himself mistaken, for, like a true House of Commons, they were resolved to express their loyalty to their Prince, by cheerfully voting a supply, and to testify their zeal for the service of their country, by examining diligently all the complaints that were laid before them (b). These in a few days became numerous enough, so that early in the month of February, many of the Agents of the Marquis of Buckingham and his family, who had been busy in obtaining patents, and very active in making a bad use of them, found themselves in the utmost danger of being brought to a severe account (c). Nor was it long, before the House saw cause to extend their enquiries further, and to appoint a Committee, for examining into the proceedings of the Courts of justice, which exceedingly alarmed the Ministers, and is thought to have given rise to those resolutions, which made way for the ruin of the Chancellor, which so soon followed his advancement in title. For upon the fifteenth of March 1620-1, Sir Robert Phillips reported, from the Committee appointed to enquire into the abuses in the courts of justice, that two charges of corruption had been brought against the Lord-Chancellor (*). The first was in the case of one Awbrey, who finding a suit he had in Chancery to go on very slowly, he was advised to quicken it, by giving the Lord-Chancellor one hundred pounds. The poor gentleman being in great distress, took up this money of an usurer, and when he had got it, he sent it by Sir George Hastings and Mr Jenkins, to the Lord-Chancellor, going with them when they carried it. They took the money in to the Lord-Chancellor, at his lodgings in Gray's-Inn, and when they came out again, Sir George Hastings told Mr Awbrey, that his Lordship was thankful, and assured him of good success in his business, which however he had not (d). The other case was of one Mr Egerton, and it came out to be, that he had mortgaged his estate for four hundred pounds, which he sent by Sir George Hastings and Sir Richard Young, who presented it to the Lord-Chancellor, telling him, that it was in gratitude for the assistance he had given this gentleman when he was Attorney-General. At first his Lordship refused it, saying it was too much, but at last he accepted it, as it was for favours past, and these gentlemen coming out to Mr Egerton, told him, that their Lord said he did not only enrich him, but laid a tie upon him, to assist him in all just and lawful business. Sir George Hastings and Sir Richard Young being examined, acknowledged the receiving and delivery of a purse, but pretended that they knew not what was in it, but it could not be made appear to the Committee, that Mr Egerton had at that time any cause depending, either in the Chancery or the Star-Chamber (e). Sir Robert Phillips in making the report, proceeded not only with caution and decency, but with visible reluctance and tenderness towards the Lord-Chancellor. The House ordered a farther enquiry by the Committee, and on the seventeenth of the same month, Sir Robert Phillips reported some stronger circumstances; Sir George Hastings, who was himself a member, becoming a witness, and testifying positively to both facts. Sir Edward Sackville, and Mr Finch, then Recorder of London, spoke in favour of the Chancellor, and endeavoured to extenuate the thing, though now it appeared plainly that there were causes depending in both cases, and that Dr Field, Bishop of Llandaff, was deeply concerned in the last mentioned business; Sir Edward Coke, his Lordship's old antagonist, pressed for the sending up of the complaint to the House of Lords, but without any heat or bitterness (f); after the debate, the House ordered, 'That the complaint of Awbrey and Egerton against the Lord-Chancellor and the Bishop for corruption, for the 100, and 400 pounds, and the recognizance, should be drawn up by Sir Robert Phillips, Sir Edward Coke, Mr Noy, and Sir Dudley Diggs, and that the same be related to the Lords without prejudice or opinion, at a conference, and that a message be sent to the Lords for this purpose, on Monday the nineteenth.' Accordingly, on that day the complaint was made to the House of Lords, in the manner prescribed by the Commons (g), and when it came to be debated, the Marquis of Buckingham presented a letter from the Lord-Chancellor, who was then sick, wherein he desired four things of their Lordships; First, that they would maintain him in their good opinion till his cause was heard. Secondly, that they would give him a convenient time, as well in regard of his ill state of health, as of the importance of the charge, to make his defence. Thirdly, that they would allow him to except against the credit of the witnesses against him, to cross-examine them, and to produce evidence in his own defence. And fourthly, that in case there came any more petitions of the like nature, that their Lordships would not take any prejudice at their number, considering they were against a Judge, that made

two thousand orders and decrees in a year (b). Upon which exhortatory letter, answer was sent on the twentieth of March unto the Lord-Chancellor, viz. 'That the Lords received his Lordship's letter, delivered unto them by the Lord-Admiral. They intended to proceed in his cause now before their Lordships, according to the right rules of justice, and they shall be glad if his Lordship shall clear his honour therein, to which end they pray his Lordship to provide for his just defence.' The very next day there came up fresh complaints from the House of Commons, which induced their Lordships to appoint a select Committee to take examinations, and to report the proofs in respect to these and other instances of corruption in the Lord-Chancellor, which Committee reported above twenty several facts, in which he had taken bribes to the amount of several thousands of pounds (z). It may be very easily conceived, that things were now grown too high to be got over, especially in such times, by any interposition from the court. However his Lordship applied to the Marquis of Buckingham, as appears by his letter of the twenty-fifth of March, to present another which was enclosed to the King, wherein he passionately laments his misfortunes, and with all possible submission intreats his Majesty's favour. In consequence of this letter he had an audience of the King, who received him, as appears by another letter of thanks, with great tenderness and compassion (k). To say the truth, there is the utmost reason to believe, that his master was very unfeignedly sorry for his calamity, since he tells us himself, that the King shed tears on the first news of it, and it very evidently appears from the circumstances before related, that he had every kind of assistance given him, and all the signs of friendship and protection afforded, that was either in the power of the Marquis of Buckingham, or even in the King his master, who actually procured a recess of Parliament, in hopes that some means might be found to soften things a little (l). But that method, though probably dictated by himself, had a quite contrary effect; for the more time there was allowed to enquire into and examine this matter, the plainer the facts appeared, and the higher the clamour rose against him. This it was, that very probably determined the Lord-Chancellor to depart from his first design, and instead of entering into a long and formal defence, to throw himself on the mercy of the House, by a humble submission which he drew up in writing, and prevailed upon the then Prince of Wales, afterwards King Charles I, to present to the House of Peers, which he accordingly did on the twenty-fourth of April, when this matter came again under their Lordship's consideration. There never was perhaps any piece of this kind, penned with more beauty of style or strength of expression, which shews that even in the depth of misery, he was able to command his thoughts and his pen too, so as to express himself with great force and freedom (m) [FF]. This submission of his being read, as also the report of the Lords

[FF] Express himself with great force and freedom] There is no great wonder in this sudden and dreadful fall of the Chancellor St Albans. He was attacked in a constitutional way, in consequence of a regular inquiry set on foot in the House of Commons, and conducted not only with calmness and justice, but with great decency and tenderness. It does not appear that this was either contrived or carried on by any particular person, or encouraged or supported by any faction, though there did not want warm spirits enough in the House, but they seem to have had other persons, and other things in their view, and to have been forced out of their way in taking notice of this; for as his Lordship truly observes, he was at the opening of this parliament in the greatest credit of any man with both houses, but at that time it seems no man's credit was too strong for justice, and of this he was so sensible, that he determined to try how far a moving and submissive letter might prevail in his favour, which he resolved to send, rather than venture upon a dangerous defence: This letter was dated the twenty-second of April, 1621. He desired first of their Lordships a benign interpretation of what he shall write, since words that came from wasted spirits and an oppressed mind, are more safe in being deposited in a noble construction, than in being circled in any reserved caution. He tells them then, that in the midst of a state of as great affliction, as he thinks a mortal man can endure, (honour being above life) he shall begin with the professing of gladness in some things; the first is, that hereafter the greatness of a Judge or Magistrate shall be no sanctuary or protection of guiltiness, which, in few words, is the beginning of a golden world; the next, that after this example, it is like that Judges will fly from any thing that is in likeness of corruption, (though it were at a great distance) as from a serpent, which tendeth to the purging of the courts of justice, and the reducing them to their true honour and splendor; he observes, that he understood that some justification had been expected from him, and therefore he had chosen one only justification instead of all others, out of the justification of Job; for after the clear submission and confession which he should then make to their Lordships, he hoped he might say and justify with Job in these words, I have not hid my sin as did Adam, nor concealed my fault in my bosom: That it rested therefore, that without fig leaves, he should ingenuously confess and acknowledge, that having understood the particulars of the charge, not formally before the House, but enough to inform his conscience and memory, he found matters sufficient and full, both to move him to desert his defence, and to move their Lordships to condemn and censure him: That he would not trouble their Lordships by singling those particulars which he thought might fall off; Quid te exempta juvat de millibus una? nor prompt them to observe upon the proofs, where they come not home, on the scruple touching the credit of the witnesses; neither would he present to their Lordships, how far a defence in diverse things might extenuate the offence, in respect of the time and manner of the gift, or the like circumstances, but only leave those things to spring out of their own noble thoughts and observations of the evidence and examinations themselves, and charitably to wind about the particulars of the charge here and there, as God should put it into their minds, and to submit himself wholly to their pity and grace; that having spoken to their Lordships as Judges, he should say a few words to them as Peers and Prelates, humbly commending his cause to their noble minds and magnanimous affections, that their Lordships were not simply Judges, but parliamentary Judges, and had a farther extent of arbitrary power than other courts, and if their Lordships were not tied by ordinary courses of courts, or precedents in points of strictness and severity, much more in points of mercy and mitigation; and yet if any thing which he should move might be contrary to their worthy ends of introducing a reformation, he should not seek it: That his humble desire was, that his Majesty would take the seal into his hands, which would be a great downfall, and might serve, he hoped, in itself for an expiation of his faults; therefore if mercy and mitigation were in their Lordship's power, and did

Committees, containing the collections of his corruptions and the proofs, they sent a copy of the former but not of the latter, by Mr Baron Denham, and Sir Thomas Coventry, then Attorney-General, to the Lord-Chancellor, with this message from their Lordships, viz. That they did not conceive his submission to be full enough, for three reasons; 1. His Lordship confesseth not any particular bribe or corruption. 2. Nor shews how his Lordship heard the charge thereof. 3. The confession, such as it is, is afterwards extenuated in the same submission, and therefore their Lordships have sent him a particular of the charge, and do expect his answer to the same with all convenient expedition. Unto which message the Lord-Chancellor answered, that he would return the Lords an answer with speed. And on the twenty-fifth of April, the Lords considered of the Lord-Chancellor's said answer, sent unto their message of the day before, and sent a second message unto his Lordship to this effect, by the said Mr Baron Denham, and Mr Attorney-General, viz. The Lords having received a doubtful answer unto the message their Lordships sent him yesterday, therefore they now send to him again, to know of his Lordship directly and presently, Whether his Lordship will make his confession, or stand upon his defence? Answer returned by the said messengers, viz. The Lord-Chancellor will make no manner of defence to the charge, but meaneth to acknowledge corruption, and to make a particular confession to every point, and after that an humble submission, but humbly craves liberty, that where the charge is more full than he finds the truth of the fact, he may make declaration of the truth in such particulars, the charge being brief, and containing not all circumstances. The Lords sent the same messengers back again to the Lord-Chancellor, to let him know, that their Lordships had granted him until Monday the thirtieth of April, by ten in the morning, to send such confession and submission, as his Lordship intended to make (2). Accordingly on that day, the Lord-Chancellor sent a very full and particular confession and submission to the House, in which he acknowledges most, but extenuates some, of the many instances of corruption with which he had been charged, and so once more threw himself entirely upon the mercy of his Peers (3) [G G]. The Lords having heard this paper read, the following members of no ways cross their noble ends, why should he not hope of their favour and commiseration? 'Your Lordships, says he, will be pleased to behold your chief pattern, the King our Sovereign, a King of incomparable clemency, and whose heart is inscrutable for wisdom and goodness. Your Lordships will remember, that there sat not these hundred years before a Prince in your house, and never such a Prince, whose Presence deserves to be made memorable by records and acts mixed of mercy and justice: Your Lordships are either Nobles, (and compassion ever breathed in the veins of noble blood) or reverend Prelates, who are the servants of him, who would not break the bruised reed, nor quench the smouldering flax; you all sit upon one high stage, and therefore, cannot but be more sensible of the changes of the world, and of the fall of any of high place; neither will your Lordships forget that there are vitia temporis, as well as vitia hominis; and that the beginning of reformations, hath the contrary power of the pool of Bethesda, for that had strength to cure him only that was first cast in; and this hath commonly strength to hurt him only that is first cast in; and for my part, I wish it may stay there, and go no farther. Lastly, I assure myself, your Lordships have a noble feeling of me, as a member of your own body, and one that in this very session had some taste of your loving affections, which I hope was not a lightning before the death of them, but rather a spark of that grace, which now in the conclusion will more appear. And now therefore, my humble suit to your Lordships is, that my penitent submission may be my sentence, and the loss of the Seal my punishment, and that your Lordships will spare me further sentence, but recommend me to his Majesty's grace and pardon for all that is past.'

[G G] Once more threw himself entirely on the mercy of the Peers.] In almost all the accounts hitherto published of the Viscount of St Albans, there has been not only a veil drawn over these transactions, (which was needless and to no purpose) but great pains have been likewise taken to insinuate, that he was rather suspected than guilty, that he might be more properly said to be given up than convicted; and on the whole, that he ought to be considered as a court sacrifice, and not as a victim to publick justice. But let us consider whether this be right? An author who takes upon him to transmit the actions of great men to posterity, ought to be sure to have no servile compliance, no party-views in favour of a court. And why? Because this is inconsistent with that regard for truth, which is necessary, and indeed, almost the one thing necessary for an Historian; but if this be so, ought not the same regard to be always paid to truth, or can there be any merit in sacrificing courts, kings, and nations, to any favourite character of a man, great in respect to parts, or high in reference to his station? surely there is not, and therefore it is more than time that the world should be undeceived in this matter: It would take up a great deal of time to go through the whole charge and defence, or rather apology; we will therefore take the first article of each, and leave it to the reader's judgment, after seeing what was said against him, and what he was able to say for himself, whether this great man was suspected only, or whether he was really guilty (93).

The Commons, at a conference with the Lords, which was reported by the Lord-Treasurer, then Viscount Mandeville, formerly Sir James Montague, and Lord Chief Justice of the King's-Bench, stated their charge thus (94). 'The case of Edward Egerton is this: There being diverse suits between Edward Egerton and Sir Rowland Egerton in the Chancery, Edward Egerton presented his Lordship a little after he was Lord-Keeper, with a bason and ewer of the value of 50 pounds and upwards, and afterwards he delivered into Sir George Hastings and Sir Richard Young, 400 pounds in gold; Sir Richard Young presented it his Lordship, who took it and poised it, and said it was too much; and returned answer, that Mr Egerton had not only enriched him, but had laid a tie upon his Lordship to do him favour in all his just causes. The proofs for this are the testimony of Sir George Hastings, and the testimony of Meresfil, a Scrivener, thus far, that he took up 700 pounds for Mr Egerton, Mr Egerton then telling him, that a great part of it was to be given to the Lord-Chancellor, and that Mr Egerton afterwards told him, that the 400 pounds in gold was given to the Lord-Chancellor. At this conference was farther declared somewhat relating to a Bishop, who was touched in this business upon the bye, whose function was much honoured, but his person touched herein. The business depending between the Egertons being ordered against Edward Egerton, he procured a new reference thereof from the King to the Lord-Chancellor, his Lordship demanded the parties to bound in 6000 marks to stand to his Lordship's award; they having entered into that bond, his Lordship awarded the matter against Edward Egerton for Sir Rowland Egerton; but Edward Egerton refusing to stand to the said award; a new bill was exhibited in the Chancery, and there-

of that illustrious assembly, viz. the Earl of Pembroke, Lord-Chamberlain, the Earl of Arundel, the Earl of Southampton, the Bishop of Durham, the Bishop of Winchester, the Bishop of Coventry and Lichfield, the Lord Wentworth, and Lord Cromwell, the Lord Sheffield, the Lord North, the Lord Chandois, and the Lord Hunfdon, were sent to him the said Lord-Chancellor, and shewed him the said confession, and told him, that the Lords do conceive it to be an ingenuous and full confession, and demanded of him, Whether it be his own hand that is subscribed to the same? and Whether he will stand to it or not? Unto which the said Lord-Chancellor answered, My Lords, It is my act, my hand, my heart. I beseech your Lordships to be merciful to a broken reed. The which answer being reported to the House, it was agreed by the House, to move his Majesty to sequester the Seal (p). And the Lords intreated the Prince's Highness, that he would be pleased to move the King, whereunto his Highness condescended, and the same Lords which went to take the acknowledgment of the Lord-Chancellor's hand, were appointed to attend the Prince to the King, with some other Lords added. And his Majesty did not only sequester the Seal, but awarded a new commission unto the Lord-Chief-Justice, to execute the place of Chancellor or Lord-Keeper, as Speaker in the Lords House. It was on the first of May, as appears by a very particular account of the whole transaction, drawn up by the King's order, and inrolled in Chancery, that his Lordship delivered up the Great-Seal with the greatest decency, as well as with the highest signs of gratitude to the King, for the many favours conferred upon his Lordship ordered, that this bond of 6000 marks, should be assigned unto Sir Rowland Egerton, and to put the same in suit in his Lordship's name: The Bishop of Llandaff, as a friend to Mr Edward Egerton, adviseth with Randolph Dampart, and Buttler, (which Buttler is now dead) that they would procure a stay of decree of that award, and procure a new hearing, upon which it was agreed, that the said 6000 marks should be given for this, and shared among them and certain noble persons: A recognizance of 10,000 marks was required from Mr Egerton to the Bishop for the performance hereof. The Bishop, his share of this 6000 marks was so great as no course of justice would allow, to prove this, they produce letters of the Bishop, naming the sum, and setting down a course how these 6000 marks might be raised; viz. the land in question to be decreed for Mr Egerton, and out of that money to be levied, and if this were not effected, then the Bishop, in verbo sacerdotis, promised to deliver up this recognizance to be cancelled. The new recognizance is sealed accordingly, and Randolph Dampart rides to court, and moved the Lord-Admiral for his Lordship's letter to the Lord Chancellor herein, but his Lordship denied to meddle in a cause depending in suit; then the said Randolph Dampart assayed to get the King's letter, but failed therein also; so that the good they intended to Mr Egerton was not effected, and yet the Bishop, tho' required, refused to deliver up the said recognizance, until Mr Egerton threatened to complain thereof unto the King.

The humble submission and confession of me the Lord-Chancellor.

Upon advised consideration of the charge depending into my own conscience, and calling my memory to account, so far as I am able, I do plainly and ingenuously confess, that I am guilty of corruption, and do renounce all defence, and put myself upon the grace and mercy of your Lordships; the particulars I confess and declare to be as followeth: To the first article of the charge, viz. In the cause between Sir Rowland Egerton and Edward Egerton, the Lord-Chancellor received three hundred pounds on the part of Sir Rowland Egerton, before he had decreed the cause. I do confess and declare, that upon a reference from his Majesty of all suits and controversies between Rowland Egerton and Edward Egerton, both parties submitted themselves to my award by recognizances reciprocal in 10,000 marks a piece; thereupon after diverse hearings, I made my award with the advice and consent of my Lord Hobart; the award was perfected and published to the parties, which was in February: Then some days after the three hundred pounds mentioned in the charge, were delivered unto me; afterwards Mr Edward Egerton flew off from the award: Then in Midsummer Term following, a suit was begun in Chancery by Sir Rowland to have the award confirmed, and upon that suit was the decree made mentioned in the article. The second article in the charge, viz. in the same cause he received from Edward Egerton four hundred pounds; I confess and declare, that soon after my coming to the Seal, being a time when I was persecuted by many, the four hundred pounds mentioned in the said charge, was delivered unto me in a purse, and, as I now call to mind, by Mr Edward Egerton, but as far I can remember, it was expressed by them that brought it, to be for favours past, and not in respect of favours to come (95).

It is very evident from his own account of the matter that there was too much ground for this complaint, as indeed there was for most of the rest. The last article of the charge was, that he had given way to great exactions by his servants, both in respect to private seals and otherwise, for sealing of injunctions, to which he gave no other answer than this, I confess it was a great fault of neglect in me, that I looked no better to my servants. It is very remarkable, that this large and long confession, was scarce known to any of our Historians, who, when they speak of the Chancellor's submission, mean by it that paper, the substance of which is given in the former note: His Lordship concluded all with the following most humble and submissive prayer.

This declaration I have made to your Lordships with a sincere mind, humbly craving, that if there should be any mistake, your Lordships will impute it to want of memory, and not to any desire of mine to obscure truth, or palliate any thing; for I do now again confess, that in points charged upon me, though they should be taken as myself have declared them, there is a great deal of corruption and neglect, for which I am heartily sorry, and submit myself to the judgment, grace, and mercy of the court; for extenuation I will use none concerning the matters themselves, only it may please your Lordships, out of your nobleness, to cast your eyes of compassion upon my person and estate; I was never noted for an avaritious man, and the Apostle saith, That covetousness is the root of all evil. I hope also that your Lordships do the rather find me in the state of grace, for that in all these particulars, there are few or none that are not almost two years old, whereas those that have an habit of corruption, do commonly wax worse, so that it hath pleased God to prepare me by precedent degrees of amendment to my present penitency; and for my estate, it is so mean and poor, as my care is now chiefly to satisfy my debts; and so fearing I have troubled your Lordships too long, I shall conclude with an humble suit unto you, that if your Lordships proceed to sentence, your sentence may not be heavy to my ruin, but gracious and mixed with mercy, and not only so, but that you would be noble intercessors for me to his Majesty, likewise for his grace and favour (96).

conferred upon him, and of the utmost sorrow, for his own abuses of those acts of his Sovereign's kindness (q). This being reported to the Peers the next day, they resolved to proceed immediately to sentence, and thereupon sent the Gentleman-Usher, and Serjeant at Arms attending the House, to summon his Lordship before them, from which however he excused himself on account of sickness, professing that otherwise he would willingly have attended them. The Lords resolved to proceed notwithstanding, and sent a message to the Commons to that purpose (r). Accordingly, on the third of May 1621, the Commons being come to the bar of their Lordship's House, their Speaker, Sir Thomas Richardson, delivered himself in the following manner. 'The Knights, Citizens, and Burgeſſes, of the Commons House of Parliament, having made complaints unto your Lordships, of many exorbitant offences of bribery and corruption committed by the Lord-Chancellor, understand that your Lordships are ready to give judgment upon him for the same; wherefore I, their Speaker, in their name, do humbly demand and pray judgment against him the said Lord-Chancellor, as the nature of his offence and demerits do require.' The Lord-Chief-Justice answered, 'Mr Speaker, Upon complaint of the Commons against the Viscount St Alban's, Lord-Chancellor, this high court hath thereby, and by his own confession, found him guilty of the crimes and corruptions complained of by the Commons, and of sundry other crimes and corruptions of the like nature. And therefore this high Court having first summoned him to attend, and having his excuse of not attending by reason of infirmity and sickness, which he protested was not feigned, or else he would most willingly have attended, doth nevertheless think fit to proceed to judgment, and therefore this high court doth adjudge, That the Lord Viscount St Alban's, Lord-Chancellor of England, shall undergo fine and ransom of forty thousand pounds, that he shall be imprisoned in the Tower during the King's pleasure, that he shall for ever be incapable of any office or employment in the state or commonwealth, that he shall never sit in Parliament, or come within the verge of the Court (s).' Such was the issue of this great affair, and such the sentence passed upon this noble person, whereby he had scarce any thing left him of his honours except the bare titles, and even these he is said to have saved by the tenderness of the Bishops. It appears however, that this was entirely owing to a strict and steady pursuit of justice, though there want not some who have refined upon this matter, and attributed the severity of this sentence to the evil arts of a great Minister, the weakness of the King, and too great submission in the Viscount St Alban's, in support of which, the opinions of some considerable persons may be cited, as well as some passages from his own writings (t) [HH]. [HH] The opinions of some considerable persons may be cited, as well as some passages from his own writings. It must be allowed, that, considering the extraordinary length into which this life has already run, one ought to be tender of entering far into any controverted points; but when I reflect on the importance of setting this matter in it's true light, and remember, that hitherto nothing has had a place in these memoirs which did not deserve it, I cannot refrain from stating fairly to the reader, and from the best authorities, what has been offered in his excuse. Such as have written critically, or rather politically, of the occurrences of this reign, have endeavoured to represent Buckingham, as the great object of the people's hatred, and of the parliament's ill will, one whom at any rate they meant to destroy, and to get at whom they were constrained to fall upon the Lord Chancellor, who might have delivered himself by a prudent and circumspect defence, if he had not devoted himself entirely to the King's commands, and consequently would insinuate, that he was restrained from this course, and abandoned by King James to the fury of the House of Commons, in order to obtain his own ends, and more particularly to screen and secure his favourite. The project is far from being ill laid, considering the temper of the times, the power of the Minister, and the maxims of King James's government; we may add to this, that the Lord Viscount St Alban's himself insinuates in some of his letters, that he fell a sacrifice; that at the beginning of his troubles, as we have seen in the text, he at first denied things, and after more charges were brought in, desired that the Lords would not be prejudiced against him by the increase of complaints, but consider, that he had sat in a court, where a multitude of decrees and orders were made in a year, and that it was after all this he made his submission and that particular confession, which has been taken notice of in the preceding note: Yet perhaps this story had never gained so much credit, if it had been picked up and pieced together only from casual expressions and phrases of ambiguous meaning. But the truth is, that we have a long and formal detail of this matter, from one who might certainly be presumed to know a great deal of it: viz. Mr Bushel, who was his Lordship's servant at that time, and who having ruined himself by engaging in the working of mines, upon pretence of following his Lord's philosophical theory on that subject, endeavoured, while a prisoner in the Fleet, to apologize for his own conduct, by publishing a speech, which he asserts his master intended to have made to that parliament in which he was undone, upon this subject, and for procuring the establishment of a Royal Academy of Sciences, on the plan delivered in a work of his, entitled, his New Atlantis, which speech of his, tho' it may contain some thoughts of Lord Bacon's, is allowed by the learned Dr Tenison to be in a great measure fictitious, and not only unworthy of that noble person, but such as it was impossible for him to have drawn. It is at the close of this speech, and in order to account for it's not being spoke, that Mr Bushel mentions his master's fall, which, he says, intervened before it could be spoken, and thereupon undertakes to give us all the circumstances of that extraordinary event from his own knowledge, which, if it could be depended upon, must be admitted to be a thing extremely worthy our notice; but I at present produce it with a view to gratify the inclination of the ingenious reader, of seeing whatever has been advanced on this subject on either side. In this light too, Mr Bushel's account is a matter of some consequence, since it is the fullest and most circumstantial that has been hitherto given. Having, as I said, mentioned his Lord's design of proposing several projects to the Parliament for the publick service, he then proceeds thus (97). 'Before this could be accomplished to his own content, there arose such complaints against his Lordship, and the then favourite at court, that for some days put the King to this Quere, whether he should permit the favourite of his affection, or the oracle of his council, to sink in his service, whereupon his Lordship was sent for by the King, who, after some discourse, gave him this positive advice, to submit himself to his House of Peers, and that (upon his princely

Tower he was discharged, and in a little time he applied himself to the King and Marquis word) he would then restore him again, if they, (in their honours) should not be sensible of his merits: Now though my Lord saw his approaching ruin, and told his Majesty there was little hopes of mercy in a multitude, when his enemies were to give fire, if he did not plead for himself; yet such was his obedience to him from whom he had his being, that he resolved his Majesty's will should be his only law, and so took leave of him with these words, Those that will strike at your Chancellor, (it is much to be feared) will strike at your crown, and wished, that as he was then the first, so he might be the last of sacrificers. Soon after, (according to his Majesty's commands) he wrote a submissive letter to the House, and sent me to my Lord Windsor to know the result, which I was loth, at my return, to acquaint him with, for alas! his Sovereign's favour was not in so high a measure, but he, (like the phoenix) must be sacrificed in flames of his own raising, and so perished (like Icarus) in that his lofty design. The great revenue of his office being lost, and his titles of honour faved but by the Bishops votes, whereto he replied, that he was only bound to thank his Clergy; the thunder of which fatal sentence did much perplex my troubled thoughts as well as others, to see that famous Lord, who procured his Majesty to call this Parliament, must be the first subject of their revengeful wrath, and that so unparalleled a master should be thus brought upon the publick stage, for the foolish miscarriage of his own servants, whereof (with grief of heart) I confess myself to be one. Yet shortly after, the King dissolved the Parliament, but never restored that matchless Lord to his place, which made him then to wish, the many years he had spent in state policy and Law study, had been solely devoted to true Philosophy; for, (said he) the one, at the best, doth but comprehend man's frailty, in it's greatest splendour; but the other, the mysterious knowledge of all things, created in the six days work.' Mr Stephens in his introduction, having observed, that the last article in the charge against his Lordship was, that he had given way to great exactions by his servants, and that he confessed, it was a great neglect in him that he looked to them no better, tells us, that he mentions this the rather, because those writers who excuse the master, lay the greatest blame upon his servants, and there is no doubt but that some of them were very guilty, and that their Lord had that opinion of them, which it is reported his Lordship in the time of his troubles signified, in passing through a room where many of his retainers rising up to salute him, he said, Sit you down, my masters, your rise hath been my fall (98). We are told likewise, by Rushworth in the first volume of his Historical Collections: 'That he treasured up nothing for himself, or family, but was over indulgent to his servants; and connived at their takings, and their ways betrayed him to that error; they were profuse and expensive, and had at their command whatever he was master of. The gifts taken were for the most part for interlocutory orders, his decrees were generally made with so much equity, that, though gifts rendered him suspected for injustice, yet never any decree made by him was reversed as unjust, as it has been observed by some who were well skilled in our laws. To this we may add, what he alleges by way of excuse, that great part of the gifts, &c. were made as presents, in cases where no suits were depending, or a good while before they were begun, or after they were ended (99). Upon this occasion, says Mr Stephens, who can forbear to observe and lament the weakness and infirmity of human nature? To see a man so far exalted above the common level of his fellow creatures, to sink so far below it; to see a man, who, like Seneca, gave admirable rules for the conduct of life, and condemning the avaritious pursuit after riches, and what is unlike Seneca, condemning them in his own person and yet be desir'd thereby. To see a man applauding Sir George Villiers, whilst very young, for despising money where it crossed reason of state or virtue, to take money in his mature age, in opposition to both, and to his own destruction! Above all, to see a great master of Reason and Philosophy, who had been a credit and ornament to the Reformed Religion, to abate the lustre of his example, by submitting to a temptation which many of the Heathen Philosophers had the power to resist. But as his Lordship had the misfortune to be made a memorial for the greatest and the wisest to take heed lest they fall; so hath he the good fortune, (which he observes attended three famous writers fallen under the like circumstances) to have the remembrance of this calamity looked on by posterity as a little picture of night-work, remaining amongst the fair and excellent tables of his acts and works. The same gentleman also tells us, that the Marquis of Buckingham, in a letter which he wrote to Sir Lionel Cranfield, soon after the accusing of the Chancellor, says, That he hoped that God, who had given that great Lord many other gifts, had also preserved him from being guilty of such crimes; yet that he likewise hoped that the House of Commons would wave their application to the Lords, and go their direct way to the King, who both could and would do them justice (100). Dr Heylyn likewise in his life of Archbishop Laud (101), and Mr Elsing, in a MS. discourse concerning Parliaments, considered the giving up of this great Minister to the Parliament, as a false step made by the King, and a leading card to others soon after: Yet the Committee seem'd to be of another opinion, when they told the Peers, that they followed antient precedents, which shew'd that greater persons had been accused for the like crimes in Parliament, intimating that they not only went in the way, but also trod in the high road of justice (102). Such writers therefore as reflect on the King's conduct in this particular, seem to have a view to that sort of Machiavellian policy, which admits of no constraint from the laws either of God or man, which, to say no more of it, is a policy to be abhorred by a free people; and the truth is, that King James did not suffer either in fame or in peace, by giving up St Albans to the justice of a Parliament, but by screening others from it; and whoever reads our history with discretion will see, that not giving up ministers to legal prosecutions has done ten times more mischief to the crown, than suffering them to fall under sentences rather too severe; which however, generally speaking, the crown has power to correct or mitigate, and that usually with the approbation of the people. But as his Lordship must have known himself best, and was abundantly inclin'd, as well as every way capable, to say what might best excuse him, let us hear him to Dr Andrews Bishop of Winchester (103), setting forth the thoughts that kept him in best humour with himself: He observes in that letter, that amongst consolations, it is not the least to represent to a man's self like examples of calamities in others, and as it favours of vanity to make ourselves highly in our own conceit, so on the other side it is a good sound conclusion, that if our betters have sustained the like events, we have the less cause to be griev'd; that in this consolation he had not been wanting to himself, and as a Christian, he had tasted through God's great goodness of higher remedies: Having therefore, through the variety of his reading set before him many examples both of antient and latter times, his thoughts, he confessed, had chiefly staid upon three particulars, as the most eminent and the most resembling, all three persons that had held chief place of authority in their countries, all three ruined not by war, or by any other disaster, but by justice and sentence, as delinquents and criminals, all three famous writers, inasmuch as the remembrances of their calamity, is now to posterity but a little picture of night-work, remaining amongst the fair and excellent tables of their acts and works, and all three (if that were any thing to the matter) fit examples to quench any man's ambition of rising again, since they were every one of them restored with great glory, but to their further ruin and destruction ending in a violent death: These men were Demosthenes, Cicero, and Seneca, persons that he durst not claim affinity with, except the similitude had contracted it; that when he cast his eyes on these examples, he was carried on farther to observe how they bore their fortunes, and principally how they employ'd their times, being banished and disabled for publick business, to the end that he might learn by them, and that they might be as well his counsellors as his comforters.

Marquis of Buckingham, for access to his Majesty, which he obtained, and because his sentence restrained him from coming within the verge of the Court, the King thought fit to dispense therewith for some time, that his Lordship might have the better opportunity to take care of his health, and to pursue the proper measures of putting his debts into some course of payment (u). The Parliament being prorogued in some heat, his Majesty was pleased to consult his Lordship, as to the properest methods of reforming the courts of justice, and taking away other grievances which that Parliament had enquired into, and he thereupon drew up a memorial, which is still extant in his works (w). On the thirteenth of September, the King signed a licence for him to remain for six weeks at Sir John Vaughan's house at Parson's-Green, or at London, as his occasions should require. On the twentieth of the same month, his Majesty signed a warrant to Sir Thomas Coventry, then Attorney-General, for the assignment of his fine to such persons as he should name, in order to make him the more easy as to his debts. On the twelfth of October the King signed a warrant for his pardon, (his parliamentary sentence excepted) which however met with some stay at the Seal, then in the custody of the Lord-Keeper Williams (x). His licence being expired, he would willingly have had it renewed, which however he could not obtain; and therefore was obliged to retire to his seat at Gorhambury, at which time probably that accident happened, which has been mentioned

Whereupon he happened to note how differently their fortunes wrought upon them, especially in that point at which he most aimed, which was the employing of their times and pens. 'In Cicero, says he, I saw that during his banishment (which was almost two years) he was so softened and dejected, as he wrote nothing but a few womanish epistles, and yet in mine opinion, he had the least reason of the three to be discouraged, for that although it was judged, and judged by the highest kind of judgment in form of statute or law, that he should be banished, and his whole estate confiscated and seized, and his houses pulled down, and that it should be highly penal for any man to propound a repeal, yet his case even then had no great blot of ignominy, for it was thought but a tempest of popularity which overthrew him. Demosthenes contrariwise, though his cause was foul, being condemned for bribery, and not simple bribery, but bribery in the nature of treason and disloyalty, yet nevertheless took so little knowledge of his fortune, as during his banishment he did much busy himself and intermeddle with matters of state, and took upon him to counsel the state (as if he had been still at the helm) by Letters, as appears by some epistles of his which are extant. Seneca indeed, who was condemned for many corruptions and crimes, and banished into a solitary island, kept a mean, and though his pen did not freeze, yet he abstained from intruding into matters of business, but spent his time in writing books of excellent use for all ages, though he might have made better choice sometimes of his dedications. These examples confirmed me much in a resolution, (whereunto I was otherwise inclined) to spend my time wholly in writing, and to put forth that poor talent, or half talent, or what it is that God hath given me, not as heretofore, to particular exchanges, but to banks or mounts of perpetuity, which will not break.' These thoughts seem to have dwelt much upon his Lordship's mind, since he repeated them very nearly in the same words to the King, in a letter to him while under his misfortunes (104). But to sum up the whole matter fairly, and to do justice to truth, let it be at whose expence it will. Bushel was a very strange man, and has told so many improbable stories of his master, and so many silly ones of himself, that what he says deserves no credit, farther than as it agrees with other evidence (105). The Chancellor himself never pretended to be absolutely innocent, but only that he was less guilty, than from the charge brought against him might be thought. His Lordship seems to have had a very particular notion of bribery, he thought it must be connected with injustice, and therefore if his decrees were upright, he persuaded himself that he was not guilty of that offence, notwithstanding he had taken money, or presents of great value, and this distinction runs through all his writings on this subject; so that he was willing to own corruption, though he did not think it amounted, strictly speaking, to the taking bribes (106). This accounts for what Mr Rufhworth says, and for the reflections made thereupon by Mr Stephens: As to his being made a sacrifice by the King, he meant no more by it than this, that his Majesty had it in his power to save him by dissolving the parliament, but he did not think that his Majesty did him any injustice, otherwise he would not have said, as he did when he resigned the seals, Rex dedit, culpa absulit, that is, the King gave, and my own faults have taken away, with many other expressions to the same purpose (107). The most candid and the best informed of our historians, state this matter so as to account the King of any severity, Camden writes thus (108): 'The Chancellor being convicted of bribery pretends, as if being weary of honour, he would resign his place, being much loaded with calumnies.' Wilson, speaking of his submission, says, 'His great spirit was brought low, and this humiliation might have raised him again, if his offences had not been so weighty as to keep him down (109).' He had said before, 'His crimes were bribery and extortion, which were proved and aggravated against him with so many circumstances, that they fell very foully upon him (110).' He says afterwards, which shews that he was not prejudiced against the man (111), 'He was a fit jewel to have beautified and adorned a flourishing kingdom, if his flaws had not disgraced the lustre that should have set him off.' Bishop Hacket, in his life of the Lord Keeper Williams, has given a large, true, and candid account of this matter: We learn from him, that the King, in the beginning of the Parliament, had said before all the members, Spare none where you find just cause to punish. This encouraged the Parliament to attack such as were concerned in monopolies and impositions, and together with these vermin, says my author, the Lord-Chancellor was questioned without pity to his excellent parts. The consequence of this was, that such as were afraid of being brought to justice, endeavoured to frighten Buckingham and prejudice the King against the Parliament, insinuating, that he had better take as much or more by his prerogative, than to wait for a small exhibition of money from them, which would cause the ruin of his most loyal and faithful servants (112). But Dean Williams having prepared an antidote to this poison, the Parliament was suffered to sit and to go on as it had begun; 'Yet, continues our Prelate, they were prorogued at Easter from the 27th of March to the 18th of April, the Marquis having his eye therein upon the Lord-Chancellor, to try if time could mitigate the displeasure, which in both houses was strong against him: But the leisure of three weeks multiplied a pile of new suggestions, and nothing was prefiged more certain than his downfall (113).' Thus in a larger, than a note might seem to allow, but in as narrow a compass as it was possible for me bring it, I have given the reader the best testimonies, on both sides, and with great pains have set that in a true light, which others have laboured to obscure: As to such faults in this great man as are imputed only in libels, I do not think them worthy of preserving, but as I believe them begot by malice, shall leave them to perish in oblivion.

as a proof, that his spirits did not sink with his fortunes. The Prince coming to London, saw at a distance a coach followed by a considerable number of people on horseback, and upon enquiry, was told it was the Lord St Albans attended by his friends, on which his Highness said with a smile, Well! do what we can, this man scorns to go out like a snuff (y). He had indeed very little reason to complain of the Court, since his misfortunes rose entirely from himself, and he met with nothing under them, that could heighten or increase his sense of them. The King was gracious to him, not only as far as his circumstances would then give him leave, but to a degree that offended many; the Prince willingly undertook whatever he desired for his service, and Buckingham seems to have been as hearty, and more respectful in his friendship to him after, than before his fall; these circumstances may be collected from their respective writings, and those of Lord Bacon to them (z). Publick histories may contain misinformations, secret histories are frequently full of wilful mistakes, but facts from private letters can never mislead us. There was indeed some misunderstanding between Viscount St Albans and the Marquis of Buckingham, but it is very plain, that though offence was taken by the former, it was never meant him by the latter. The case was this; after his Lordship's fall, the Marquis of Buckingham had a mind to York-House, and made some overtures to his Lordship for his term in it, which he took ill, and expostulated upon it very freely, which was so far from provoking the Marquis, that he answered him not only with great decency, but also with all the marks of concern, that could be expected from their long friendship (a). It is also evident, that his kindness towards him was not confined to bare expressions, for very soon after this, he procured for him the discharge of that part of his sentence which afflicted him most, viz. his being restrained from coming within the verge of the Court, which he called an imprisonment, nor was he wanting in any thing else, that could well be expected from him. These favours had so far settled the mind, and raised the spirits of Lord St Albans, that he soon applied himself again to his studies with equal diligence and vigour, so that in the spring of the succeeding year, he published his History of King HENRY VII, which he dedicated to Charles Prince of Wales, a work, which though not absolutely free from faults, is certainly as well performed as any thing of that kind in our language (b). It is true, that after this, his troubles bore very hard upon him, as appears clearly from a very long, very humble, and very passionate letter written to the King upon that subject, which is without date, but this was owing chiefly to his own circumstances, which would not allow him to settle things to his wish, and in some measure also to the King's, which would as little permit him to relieve his Lordship in proportion to his wants, or to the kindness which he still retained for him. Yet however uneasy his condition might be, he was, or might have been, far enough from necessity, since he had a pension from the crown of twelve hundred pounds a year, and retained his grant from the Alienation-Office, worth six hundred pounds a year more, besides his own estate, which was worth seven hundred pounds per annum, all which taken together, might certainly have preserved him from indigence (c). He was however greatly in debt, which seems to have been the heaviest part of his load, and towards the satisfaction of this, we are told, he paid eight thousand pounds after his fall. And yet at his death, he died in debt upwards of twenty-two thousand pounds (d). So that at the time of his writing this letter, he might well be supposed to owe thirty thousand, a sufficient cause of uneasiness to himself, and therefore may be justly esteemed that misery which touched him so deeply. His Lordship also lived at a great expence even after his fall, notwithstanding what some writers, who, as they lived in or near his time, ought to have known better, have reported to the contrary; these things therefore taken together, might very well weigh him down, and keep him low, so as to occasion continual applications to his Majesty, and to his friends at Court (e), which though it might seem to be attended with great disturbance and distraction of mind, yet of such a singular construction was his Lordship's temper, and so thoroughly were all passions wrought to obedience, that though he was very well able to express his sollicitude about matters that concerned his interest, discovered his resentments with becoming freedom, and willingly paid a just tribute of thankfulness for the benefits he received, he suffered none of these to hurry his thoughts to the prejudice of his studies, which he always regarded as the principal occupation of his life (f). We have an instance of this, which will always do honour to his memory, reported by Dr Rawley, whose fidelity is unquestionable; one day his Lordship was dictating to that Doctor, some of his experiments in his Sylva. The same day he had sent a friend to Court, to receive for him a final answer, touching the effect of a grant which had been made him by King James. He had hitherto only hope of it, and hope deferred, and he was desirous to know the event of the matter, and to be freed one way or other from the suspense of his thoughts. His friend returning, told him plainly, that he must thenceforth despair of that grant, how much soever his fortunes needed it. Be it so, said his Lordship, and then he dismissed his friend very cheerfully, with thankful acknowledgments for his service. His friend being gone, he came straightway to Dr Rawley, and said thus to him, Well, Sir, your business won't go on, let us go on with this in our power; and then he dictated to him afresh for some hours, without the least hesitancy of speech, or discernible interruption of thought (g). year 1623, was a great prejudice to his affairs, and taught him, by experience, that no body about the Court, had so warm and so sincere an inclination to promote his requests, which, together with his former difficulties, brought down his hopes to such a degree of humility, that, upon the death of Mr Murray, he solicited the King to succeed him, as Provost of Eaton-college, to which this answer was given, That the King could not value his Lordship so little, or conceive he limited his desires so low, in which however he should have been gratified, if his Majesty had not been engaged for Sir William Beecher, his agent in France (b). While the Marquis of Buckingham was abroad with the Prince of Wales, he was created Duke; and at his return, saw himself in such plenitude of power, as never any subject had enjoyed in this kingdom, being at once the favourite both of the possessor and heir of the crown, and, which was no less singular, in as great credit with the people. The Viscount of St Albans presented his Grace at his return, with The Advancement of Learning, translated into Latin, and so much augmented and enriched, that it might with equal justice have passed for a new performance, which his noble patron not only kindly received, but continued likewise to do him very many, and those very important, services, more especially in procuring him considerable sums of money, and from time to time fresh marks of royal favour (i). In acknowledgment for these, he dedicated to him a Latin translation of his Essays, which he also augmented and polished to the highest degree of perfection (k). A new Parliament having been called, in which the House of Commons shewed great zeal for his Majesty's service, his Lordship turned his pen to a new subject, and composed a treatise, intitled, Considerations of a War with Spain (l), which he presented to the Prince of Wales, and afterwards to the Queen of Bohemia. He likewise drew up Heads of a Speech (m), for his friend Sir Edward Sackville, upon the same subject, and these services were so well received, that upon an application to the King for a full pardon, he easily obtained it. In the warrant directed for this purpose to the Attorney-General, his Majesty took notice of his Lordship's having already satisfied justice by his sufferings, and that himself being always inclined to temper justice with mercy, and likewise calling to remembrance his former good services, and how well and profitably he had spent his time since his troubles, he was graciously pleased to remove from him that blot of ignominy which yet remained upon him, of incapacity and disablement, and to remit to him all penalties whatsoever, inflicted by that sentence (n). This was one of the last acts of his government; for he died very soon after, and, in consequence of this pardon, his Lordship was summoned to the second Parliament in the succeeding reign, though his infirmities would not allow him to sit therein. He received also some comfort, from the great respect shewn him by foreigners of distinction, particularly by the Marquis D'Effiat, the French Ambassador, who caused his Essays to be translated into his own language, and, upon his first visit, compared his Lordship to the Angels, of whom he had heard and read much, but had never seen them; to which the Viscount St Alban's very modestly and wisely replied, That if the charity of others compared him to an Angel, his own infirmities told him he was a man (o). This nobleman contracted so close a friendship with him, that they corresponded constantly ever after, and his Excellency esteemed it a particular honour, to be stiled in those letters his son; he likewise desired and obtained his picture, which he carried into France. These honours did not hinder the Viscount St Albans from thinking of, and preparing for, his end; which he forefaw was drawing on, though he was so happy as to escape the great plague, in the spring of the year 1625. Having sufficiently established the fame of his learning and abilities, by his writings published by himself, he committed by his Will several of his Latin and Philosophical compositions, to the care of Sir William Boswel, his Majesty's agent in Holland, where they were afterwards published by Gruter. His Orations and Letters he commended to Sir Humphrey May, Chancellor of the duchy, and the Bishop of Lincoln (who had been his successor in the Court of Chancery, and acknowledged the honour of that trust) the letters to be preserved but not to be divulged, as touching too much on persons and matters of State (p). By this judicious care of his, most of his papers were preserved, and the greatest part of them at different times have been printed and published, collected into volumes, and stand immortal monuments, not to his own honour only, but to that of his age and country, nay, and even of human nature also, if the testimony of the best judges may be allowed; for as his merit deserved, so it has received the universal praise of all true friends to knowledge (q) [II]. [II] So it has received the universal praise of all true friends to knowledge.] If one should attempt to collect and digest into order the various characters bestowed, and the ample commendations afforded the Viscount of St Albans by first rate writers only, it would demand a volume; and alas! I have scarce a page to spare; but let me make the best use of this little room I can; and as Dr Rawley, who was his Lordship's amanuensis, rejected many of the Cambridge verses on his Lord's death, because he knew that great man considered rather weight than number; so let the order and the choice of those names I mention on this occasion, atone for my mentioning a few only out of a multitude, and that multitude too compared with the herd of mankind, deserving to be stiled the few. I will begin with his contemporaries, such as knew him best, and knew him with all his failings; who yet could not but admire the splendor of his parts, and of those great qualities which rendered him so truly the glory of his age and nation. Sir Walter Raleigh (114), that true judge of men and things; of ages past and present; discoursing of the great men of his time, said, 'That the Earl of Salisbury was an excellent speaker, but no good penman; that Lord Henry Howard was an excellent penman, but no good speaker; Sir Francis Bacon, alike eminent in both.' The judicious summer of 1625, brought him very low, but the spring reviving his spirits, he made a little judicious and penetrating Ben Jonson thought, that English eloquence ascended till the time of the Viscount Albans, and from thence went backward and declined; he, who was not too apt to praise, was profuse in his praises of Bacon, clofing them with these admirable reflections (115):

(115) Jonson's Works, Vol. II. in his Discoveries, p. 102.

‘ My conceit of his person was never increased toward him by his place or honours; but I have and do reverence him for the greatness that was only proper to himself, in that he seemed to me ever by his works one of the greatest men, and most worthy of admiration that had been in many ages: In his adversity, I ever prayed that God would give him strength, for greatness he could not want, neither could I condole in a word or syllable for him, as knowing no accident could do harm to virtue, but rather help to make it manifest.’ Archbishop Williams, to whose care the Viscount St Albans committed his Orations and Epistles, expressed his sense of that confidence reposed in him in these words (116).

(116) Bacon's Works, Vol. IV. p. 738.

‘ Your Lordship doth most worthily therefore, in preserving these two pieces amongst the rest of those matchless monuments you shall leave behind you; considering, that as one age hath not bred your experience, so is it not fit it should be confined to one age, and not imparted to the times to come; for my part therein, I do embrace the honour with all thankfulness, and the trust imposed upon me with all religion and devotion.’ The famous Sir Henry Wotton, on receiving from him the Novum Organum, wrote to him thus in return (117).

(117) Sir Henry Wotton's Remains, p. 298.

‘ Your Lordship hath done a great and everlasting benefit to all the children of nature, and to nature herself in her utmost extent of latitude, who never before had so noble nor so true an Interpreter, or (as I am readier to stile your Lordship) never so inward a Secretary of her cabinet.’ But one of the noblest, and perhaps the most noble testimony in honour of his great abilities, was the letter written to him not long after his fall by the University of Oxford, on their receiving from him his book de Augmentis Scientiarum, the first paragraph only of which shall be here transcribed (118).

(118) Bacon's Works, Vol. II. p. 405.

‘ Right honourable, and what in nobility is almost a miracle; most learned Viscount! Your honour could have given nothing more agreeable, and the University could have received nothing more acceptable than the Sciences; and those sciences which she formerly sent forth poor, of low stature unpolished, she hath received elegant, tall, and by the supplies of your wit (by which alone they could have been advanced) most rich in dowry. She esteemeth it an extraordinary favour to have a return with usury made of that by a stranger, (if so near a relation may be called a stranger) which she bestows as a patrimony upon her children, and she readily acknowledgeth, that though the Muses are born in Oxford, they grow elsewhere; grown they are and under your pen, who like some mighty Hercules in learning, have, by your own hand, further advanced those pillars in the learned world, which, by the rest of that world, were supposed immovable.’ Neither were the best judges in the succeeding age less sensible of, or less inclined to celebrate, his worth. Thus, for instance, the famous Mr Francis Osborn, whose talent lay not much in commending, and who in many places of his works shews he was under no prepossession in favour of our author, allows him to have been the most universal genius he had ever seen, or was ever like to see had he lived ever so long. He tells us, that he was so excellent, so agreeable a speaker, that all who heard him were uneasy if he was interrupted, and sorry when he concluded; but what he thought, and very justly too, most remarkable, was his understanding all subjects to the bottom, for which he endeavours to account in the following manner (119).

‘ Now this general knowledge he had in all things husbanded by his wit, and dignified by so majestic a carriage he was known to own, struck such an awful reverence in those he questioned, that they durst not conceal the most intricate part of their mysteries from him, for fear of appearing ignorant or saucy: All which rendered him no less necessary than admirable at the Council-table, where, in reference to impositions, monopolies, &c. the meanest manufactures were an usual argument, and, as I have heard, did in this baffle the Earl of Middlesex, that was born and bred a Citizen; yet without any great (if at all) interrupting his other studies, as is not hard to be imagined, of a quick apprehension, in which he was admirable.’ Dr Peter Heylyn, who was thought in his time a great judge of men, things, and books, represents the Viscount St Albans as a man of a strong brain, and capable of the highest performances, more especially of framing a body of perfect Philosophy (120).

(120) Life of Archbishop Laud, p. i. p. 64.

‘ Pity it was, said he, he was not entertained with some liberal salary, abstracted from all affairs both of court and judicature, and furnished with sufficiency both of means and helps for the going on in his design, which, had it been, he might have given us such a body of Natural Philosophy, and made it so subservient to the publick good, that neither Aristotle, nor Theophrastus amongst the Antients, nor Paracelsus, or the rest of our later Chymists, would have been considerable.’ Our famous Poet, Abraham Cowley, has justly celebrated the mighty discoveries of the great Lord Bacon, and in a poem too long to be inserted here, done him all the justice that might be expected from one vast genius to another (121).

(121) See his Pin-darick on the Royal Society.

Bishop Sprat, the most elegant writer in our language, bestows on him the highest praises when he says, that his books contained the best arguments in the defence of Experimental Philosophy, and the best directions for promoting it. To say the truth, his character is so clear, so curious, and so remarkably worthy of the great man it celebrates, that I cannot help setting down a part of it, though it should oblige me to be shorter in other citations (122).

(122) In his Lordship's Hist. of the Royal Society, Lond. 1734, 4to, p. 35, 36.

‘ Thus then he speaks, ‘ But methinks, in this one man I do at once find enough occasion to admire the strength of human wit, and to bewail the weakness of a mortal condition; for is it not wonderful, that he who had run through all the degrees of that profession, which usually takes up men's whole time, who had studied, and practised, and governed the Common-Law, who had always lived in the crowd, and borne the greatest burden of civil business, should yet find leisure enough for these retired studies, to excel all those men who separate themselves for this very purpose? He was a man of strong, clear, and powerful imaginations, his genius was searching and imitable, and of this I need give no other proof than his stile itself, which as, for the most part, it describes men's minds as well as pictures do their bodies, so it did his above all men living, the course of it vigorous and majestic; the wit, bold and familiar; the comparisons, fetched out of the way, and yet the most easy; in all, expressing a soul equally skilled in men and nature.’

(*) Boyle's Works, Vol. I. p. 196, 453. III. p. 154. V. p. 24, 41, 51.

The incomparable Mr Boyle * speaks often of our author in his works, and always with honour; he stiles him sometimes an illustrious, at others, an admirable and excellent Philosopher; and, which is a higher commendation than any phrase could have expressed, he often imitates him, and professes a desire of treading in his paths. Dr Power, one of the most active and judicious among the first members of the Royal Society, in a learned treatise of his†, places at the head of his chapters, the Latin text from the Lord Verulam's work, to shew, that all the honour he claimed was to have profecuted his views. Bishop Nicholson, speaking of the authors who have written concerning the reign of Henry VII, gives this character of his Lordship's performance on that subject (123).

(†) Experimental Philosophy, in three books, Lond. 1694, 4to.

‘ But this good work was most effectually undertaken and completed by the incomparable Sir Francis Bacon, who has bravely surmounted all those difficulties, and passed over those rocks and shallows, against which he took such pains to caution other less experienced historians; he has perfectly put himself into King Henry's own garb and livery, giving as sprightly a view of the secrets of his Council, as if himself had been Prefident in it: No trivial passages, such as are below the notice of a statesman, are mixed with his sage remarks; nor is any thing of weight or moment, shubbered over with that careless haste and indifference, which is too common in other writers: No allowances are given to the author's own conjecture or invention, where a little pains and consideration will

will serve to set the matter in it's proper and true light: No impertinent digressions, nor fanciful comments distract his readers; but the whole is written in such a grave and uniform stile, as becomes both the subject and the artificer. I shall add to these authorities but two more from the learned of our own nation, but they are two such as might alone have secured immortality to any author they had commended. The first of these was Mr Addison, who in one of the Tatlers, in which he vindicates the Christian religion, by shewing that the wisest and ablest men in all ages have professed themselves believers, speaks of our author thus (124), 'I shall in this paper only instance Sir Francis Bacon, a man, who, for the greatness of his genius and compass of knowledge, did honour to his age and country, I could almost say to human nature itself; he possessed at once all those extraordinary talents, which were divided amongst the greatest authors of antiquity; he had the sound, distinct, comprehensive knowledge of Aristotle, with all the beautiful lights, graces, and embellishments of Cicero, one does not know which to admire most in his writings, the strength of reason, force of stile, or brightness of imagination. This author has remarked in several parts of his works, that a thorough insight into Philosophy makes a good believer, and that a smattering in it naturally produces such a race of despicable infidels, as the little profligate writers of the present age, whom, (I must confess) I have always accused to myself, not so much for their want of faith, as their want of learning. I was infinitely pleased to find among the works of this extraordinary man, a prayer of his own composing, which, for the elevation of thought and greatness of expression, seems rather the devotion of an angel than of a man: His principal fault seems to have been the excess of that virtue which covers a multitude of faults: This betrayed him to so great an indulgence towards his servants, who made a corrupt use of it, that it stripped him of all those riches and honours, which a long series of merits had heaped upon him.' The second is that short character of his writings, given us by the pen of the most noble John Sheffield, Duke of Buckinghamshire, who asserts (125), That all his works are for expression as well as thought, the glory of our nation and of all latter ages. This respect paid to his extraordinary merit by his countrymen, did not either commence more early, or extend to greater distance, or rise to a higher degree at home than abroad. The famous Condé de Gondamar, so long Ambassador here from his Catholic Majesty, wrote him a very handsome letter upon his misfortune, in which he assures him of the King his master's interposition, if he judged it any way convenient for the restoring his condition (126). So well was his character known in Spain and so much regarded, though his conduct had been always opposite to that of the Spanish faction in the court of King James. Dr Rawley tells us, he had seen a letter to the then Lord Cavendish, afterwards Earl of Devonshire, from Italy, wherein it was said, that my Lord Bacon was more and more known, and his books more and more delighted in; so that those men who had more than ordinary knowledge in human affairs, esteemed him one of the most capable spirits of that age (127). The elegant Mr Voiture gives this character of the Latin works he had seen of the Viscount St Albans (128): 'I find every thing perfectly fine that you have sent me of Bacon, but do you not think that Horace, who said would be much astonished to hear a barbarian talk in this manner, and to see that there is not perhaps at this day a Roman, who speaks so good Latin as this Englishman? And would not Juvenal say with greater reason than ever,

'Nunc totus Grajas nostrasque habet orbis Athenas?'

The learned Grotius in a private letter to a friend of his (129), highly commends his Lordship's life of Henry VII, as a work written with admirable judgment; and in this opinion the no less learned

Conringius fully agrees. But the character of his writings in general, afforded by so exquisite a judge of all the numerous subjects on which they were written, I mean the celebrated Baron Puffendorf, does still greater honour to his memory (129), 'The late most wise Chancellor of England, says he, was the chief writer of our age, and who carried as it were the standard that we might press forward, and make greater discoveries in Philosophick matters, than any of which hitherto our schools had rung. So that if in our time any great improvements have been made in Philosophy, there has been not a little owing to that great man.' The accurate and judicious Francis Buddeus, (that I may mention some of the authors of our own time) applauds the Viscount St Albans extremely (130): He styles him a new light in Philosophy, one who first united speculation and practice, and opened a passage to those mighty discoveries that have been made since his time; he indicates also the several parts of his great Body of Science, which have been commented on and explained by the learned Philosophers of Germany; and thereby shews, that the memory of this admirable man, expanded more fragrantly abroad for many years than here in his native country, where foreign approbation too frequently teaches us to revere the names of those, who in their lives wanted common respect, tho' this was not, strictly speaking, the case of our author; and yet, as himself foresaw, in some sort it was; for tho' there never wanted some amongst the most learned in this island who understood and applauded his writings, yet undoubtedly it was their being translated into Latin that procured both them and their author the praise they deserved. The last authority I shall cite on this subject shall be Mr Voltaire (131), who very justly styles him, the father of Experimental Philosophy, and enters into abundance of very judicious reflections on his discoveries and writings, owning at the same time, that what surprized him most was, to find the Doctrine of Attraction, which is looked upon as the foundation of another Philosophy, expressly set down in Lord Bacon's, in words not to be controverted or mistaken. I shall not take upon me to decide how far this may be just or not, but leave it to the search and decision of the learned and ingenious reader; only give me leave to say, I have always suspected the Novum Organum has been so little commended by the Moderns for two reasons; first, that it requires a deep head and a strong attention to become fully master of it, and so has been thoroughly understood by few; secondly, that those few who have fully penetrated it, used it to raise structures of their own, and not to finish Bacon's palace of wisdom. It was peculiar to this great man to have nothing narrow and selfish in his composition; he gave away without concern whatever he possessed, and believing other men of the same mould, he received with as little consideration; nay even as to fame he had the like notion, he was desirous to enjoy it, but in the same way, not from his knowledge, but from his free and liberal communication of that knowledge; so that it may be truly and without flattery said, his worst qualities were the excesses of the most exalted virtues.

To the memory of such a man, of what importance is it, if James Horwell (132) has set down some vulgar tales mixed with many mistakes? If the foreign dictator in our history, Rapin (133), has treated him harshly on the credit of Weldon, and other libellers, who knew no way of escaping oblivion, but by assassinating great names, condemning thereby their own to immortal infamy? Or if POPE, forgetting at once the distance and resemblance of their characters, suffers his petulant muse to say,

If parts allure thee, think how Bacon shin'd,

The wisest, brightest, meanest of mankind (134).

His glory cannot be blasted by such envious flashes as these; his failings hurt only his contemporaries, and were expiated by his sufferings; but his virtue and knowledge, and, above all, his zeal for mankind, will be felt while there are men; and consequently, while they have gratitude, the name of Bacon, Verulam, or St Albans, can never be mentioned but with admiration!

in which journey he was taken so ill, that he was obliged to stay at the Earl of Arundel's house at Highgate, about a week, and there he expired, on the ninth of April 1626, being Easter-day (r), and was privately buried in the chapel of St Michael's church, within the precincts of Old Verulam. In the chancel of which church, his faithful friend, and indefatigable servant in his troubles, Sir Thomas Meautys, caused a neat monument of white marble to be erected, with his Lordship's effigies sitting in a contemplative posture, with an inscription written by Sir Henry Wotton (s), every way worthy of that excellent writer, and of that admirable man to whose honour it is dedicated [KK]. The most eminent scholars of the university of Cambridge shewed their concern for his death, and the just sense they had of the honour resulting to that noble seminary of learning, from his receiving his education there, by composing verses in several languages on that occasion, which were afterwards printed (t). The same justice, posterity has also rendered to his memory, inasmuch that it may be truly said, his own prophecy has been fulfilled, and that after flying through foreign countries for a time, his reputation stands now fixed at home, where all admire the strength and beauty of his genius, and, in favour of it's efforts, would willingly forget, a man so endowed was not altogether exempt from failings.

BACON (ANTHONY) elder brother to the Chancellor, and eldest son to the Lord-Keeper Bacon, by his second wife Anne, daughter to Sir Anthony Cook, a woman equally distinguished by her learning and her piety, and, as such, highly commended by the writers of those times (a) [A]. At this distance, we have not been able to fix the exact time of this gentleman's birth, but it appears from a variety of circumstances, that he was several years older than his brother Francis. He received an excellent education at home,

(a) Chauncey's Hertfordshire, p. 464.

[A] And, as such, highly commended by the writers of those times.] It was no unusual thing in those days for ladies to apply themselves to the same studies, with the same strictness, and, consequently, with the same success, that the other sex did. The Lady Jane Grey was excellently learned in Greek; and Queen Elizabeth translated several pieces both from that language and from the Latin: The most remarkable instance however, of the spirit of learning which prevailed in that age, was in the family to which this lady belonged (1), for all the four daughters of Sir Anthony Cook were perfectly skilled in the learned languages, and this his second daughter Anne, wife to the Lord-Keeper Bacon, made both a florid and exact translation of Bishop Jewell's Apology for the Church of England from Latin into English, which was esteemed so useful in it's nature, as well as so correct in it's manner, that in the year 1564 it was published for common use by the special order of Archbishop Parker, with some additions of his own at the end (2). There have been many ladies remarkable for their learning and their writings, but very few whose works, like the Lady Bacon's, were published by authority and commended to publick reading; it was this that stirred the gall of Father Parsons, commonly called Parsons the Jesuit, who has reflected bitterly upon this lady (3) for her performance, without reflecting that his ill language redounded more to her reputation than all the praises of her friends, as a late ingenious writer has very judiciously observed (4). It was to the great abilities and tender care of so accomplished a parent, that her two sons, Anthony and Francis, owed the early part of their education, and without doing any injustice to the genius of either of these great men we may safely affirm, that they were not a little indebted for the reputation they acquired, to the pains taken with them by this excellent woman in their tender years, when the mind is most susceptible of learning, and thereby rendered more capable of retaining the principles of science, than when they are infilled in an age farther advanced. It was in gratitude to her memory, and from a just sense of the advantages received from her in this way, that her son, the Viscount St Albans, directed by his Will, that his body should be laid near her's in the church of St Michael within the precincts of Old Verulam (5).

home, and giving evident signs of pregnant parts, his father, the Lord-Keeper, though fit to send him early abroad, to improve his abilities by visiting foreign countries, in which he spent some years with great profit to himself, though his father did not live to see the fruits of his great improvements (b). But before his departure, the good old Lord-Keeper, though proper to convey to him his manour of Gorhambury in Hertfordshire, which he had purchased from Mr Rowlet. In the course of his travels, Mr Anthony Bacon was resident for some time at Venice, and having visited other parts of Italy, received the news of his father's death at Geneva, which very probably hastened him home. While he remained in the city last mentioned, he entered into a very close friendship with the famous Beza, who, by his persuasion, wrote to the Lord-Treasurer Burleigh, and presented to the library of Cambridge, a very antient copy of the Pentateuch in six languages, which was esteemed a great curiosity, and it is from his letter dated in December 1581, that we are able to fix the time of Mr Bacon's return from his travels (c). Whether he went abroad again or not, seems a little uncertain, but if he did, there is good reason to believe, that it was but for a very short time, since we find, that as soon as his brother began to be taken notice of by the Earl of Essex, he made it his business to draw Mr Anthony Bacon to that nobleman's service (d). The two brothers were alike prodigies for parts, but of very different kinds, for whereas the younger spoke eloquently and wrote admirably, the elder was reserved in conversation, had a deep reach in Politicks, and was the best versed in foreign affairs of any man of his time. Mr Francis Bacon did not affect to hide his talents, but gave early proofs of them to the world, both by speaking and writing. Mr Anthony Bacon distinguished himself neither way, but remained contented with the reputation he acquired among the circle of his private acquaintance, and the interest he had with some persons of the first quality, who knew how to value as well as to employ his great abilities. We have seen in the former article, that Mr Francis Bacon with all his knowledge wanted œconomy, and that to a very high degree, a point in which his brother Anthony chiefly excelled; for though he had a very fair estate of his own, yet he knew how to set a just price on his labours, and did not think it reasonable to waste his time in the service of others, without receiving a proper recompence (e). He had the misfortune to be very lame, so that he was able to stir little abroad, and indeed could not so much as move about his room, for which reason the Earl of Essex, who relied much upon his advice, and made use of him in all his affairs, and even in those of the greatest secrecy, thought proper to take him into his house, and to make him a handsome allowance for his services (f). It was by his advice, that the Earl entered into a very early and close correspondence with the King of Scotland, presumptive heir to the crown of England, which he carried on, chiefly by the means of Mr Anthony Bacon, who managed it with such dexterity and address, that though the Cecils always suspected, and left no means untried to discover it, yet they were never able to come at any proofs of it. It was his having this great and dangerous secret in his hands, that enabled him to advance his fortune very considerably, of which notwithstanding the secrecy that must naturally have attended such transactions, there are still some testimonies remaining, supported by undeniable authority (g) [B]. We are not however to suppose, that though this gentleman took so much care of his own affairs, and though he was very nearly related

[B] Supported by undeniable authority.] Amongst other curious pieces of history penned by the celebrated Sir Henry Wotton, one of the most judicious as well as ingenious writers of his age, there is one intitled, A Parallel between Robert Devereux, Earl of Essex, and George Villiers, Duke of Buckingham, in the times of their favour, which containing for the most part facts, that lay within the compass of the author's immediate knowledge, has been always, and very deservedly, in the most general esteem: It is from this treatise, than which certainly better authority cannot be had, that the circumstances hinted at in the text have been taken, and that the reader may view them in a just and natural light, they are here presented to him in Sir Henry's own words (6):

'The Earl of Essex had accommodated Master Anthony Bacon in a partition of his house, and had assigned him a noble entertainment: This was a gentleman of impotent feet but a nimble head, and through his hand run all the intelligences with Scotland, who being of a provident nature, (contrary to his brother the Lord Viscount St Albans) and well knowing the advantage of a dangerous secret, would many times cunningly let fall some words, as if he could amend his fortunes under the Cecilians (to whom he was near of alliance and in blood also) and who had made (as he was not unwilling should be believed) some great proffers to win him away, which once or twice he pressed so far, and with such tokens and signs of apparent discontent to my Lord Henry Howard, afterwards Earl of Northampton, (who was of the party and stood himself in much umbrage with the Queen) that he flies presently to my Lord of Essex (with whom he was commonly prima admissio[n]is by his bedside in the morning) and tells him, that unless that gentleman was satisfied with a round sum all would be vented; this took the Earl at that time ill provided (as indeed oftentimes his coffers were very low) whereupon he was fain suddenly to give him Essex house, which the good old Lady Walsingham did afterward disengage out of her own store, with two thousand five hundred pounds, and before he had distilled fifteen hundred pounds at another time by the same skill. So as we rate this one secret, as it was finely carried, at four thousand pounds in present money, besides at least one thousand pounds of annual pension, to a private and bed-ridden gentleman: What would he have gotten if he could have gone about his own business? It may not be amiss to add here, what seems to relate to the same subject, from another piece which bears the title of The Disparity between the Estates and Conditions of George Duke of Buckingham, and Robert Earl of Essex: The author of which, speaking of the peculiar advantages and felicities attending the last of these noblemen, says (7); 'In his friendships he was so fortunate, that though he contracted with antient enemies, and such as he had undeserved by some unkindness, as grievous as injurious, it is not known that ever he was betrayed in his trusts, or had ever his secrets derived unhandfully to any ears that they were not intended to, and this, if he had not planted himself upon such, whose zeal to his service was more remarkable than their other abilities, would have preserved him from so prodigious a fate.'

(7) Ibid. p. 47.

related to those who brought about that noble Earl's ruin, he was in any degree accessory thereto, either by discovering his secrets, or deserting his service; on the contrary, we are assured by a writer of great knowledge and fidelity, that Mr Bacon remained ever true to his noble patron, and indeed the thing speaks itself, for when his enemies accomplished their designs, they were not able to give any thing against him in evidence, in reference to his correspondence with King James, which if they had ever had it in their power, they would most certainly have done (b). The correspondence between this great favourite and the ingenious Mr Bacon, though very probably it began in convenience, very soon grew up into a stricter and more close friendship, than, the distance of their circumstances considered, could have been well expected; which may perhaps be justly attributed to the likeness of their tempers. For the Earl was naturally studious and contemplative, with a little leaning towards melancholy, and his usual recreations were musick, poetry, and walking, in all which, except the last, he found Mr Bacon an agreeable companion. There was another use which very probably my Lord Effex made of him, which was to examine such as were commended to him for preferment, not in a saucy supercilious manner, as one who had an entire dominion over his patron's inclinations, but in a gentle and almost imperceptible method, that there might be none about his Lordship from whom he might not expect a return of credit, in proportion to that degree of favour he bestowed. At least thus much is certain, that his recommendations had always great weight with the Earl of Effex, who made use of his power and influence, not in the gratification of the common passions of the mind, or enriching himself or his family, or to satisfy the cravings of such, as by complying with his weaknesses had gained an ascendancy over him; but in a way becoming a great man, in relieving and supporting men of merit, and thereby attaching them to his interests, which induced him to receive whoever was introduced to him in this light, not as a new dependant, but as a real acquisition (i). In this way (as himself (k) very gratefully remembers) Richard Boyle, afterwards the Great Earl of Cork in Ireland, was by Mr Anthony Bacon brought to the notice of the Earl of Effex, a little before his last unfortunate voyage to that island, by whom he was very kindly received, and employed in several things relating to the suing out his patents, 'till Mr Boyle's enemies procured him (on very false pretences) to be seized and imprisoned, in which condition he lay when the Earl went over to Ireland, and which accident, however unexpected or unrelished when it happened, very probably preserved him from being involved in the Earl's misfortunes, and most certainly proved the source of all his future felicity, in which it is some honour to Mr Bacon, that he was so far instrumental. But in regard to those measures and counsels which were so fatal to his great friend, neither records, or history, private memoirs, or the libellous remembrances of those times, which have descended in a competent proportion to manifest any man's character to ours, say so much as a syllable of this gentleman's interfering. The truth of the matter is, that this Lord had two sets of Counsellors, one who set him upon rash and violent methods, which proved his undoing; and the other, those who thought to raise their own fortunes by supporting the Earl's, and who constantly laboured to keep him within the bounds of moderation, in hopes of restoring him by degrees to the Queen's favour. At the head of the former was his Secretary Cuffe, a man of parts, but of a fierce and violent temper; and the chiefs of the other, were the two Bacons (l). We have an instance of their sincere endeavours to save, and to restore that unfortunate nobleman, even after his rash exploit in returning from Ireland, and a little before his much rasher exploit, which cost him his head. They agreed together, but with his Lordship's consent, that Mr Francis Bacon should pen a letter of advice, in the name of, and as if written by, Mr Anthony Bacon, to the Earl, and an answer in the Earl's name to him, which Mr Francis Bacon undertook to shew the Queen, and which were extremely well calculated to do him service, as appears from the letters themselves, which are still extant (m) [C]. It is certain that

[C] From the letters themselves, which are still extant.] These letters have caused a great deal of noise, and some very gross mistakes have been made about them. The Earl at his trial provoked at hearing Mr Francis Bacon plead against him, delivered himself thus, directing his discourse to the Lord-High-Steward (8). 'May it please your Lordship, I must produce Mr Bacon for a witness, for when the course of private persecution was in hand and most assailed me, then Mr Bacon was the man that profered me means to the Queen, and drew a letter in my name, and in his brother Sir Nicholas Bacon's name, (apparently mistaken for Mr Anthony Bacon) which letter he purposed to shew the Queen, and Gosnal was the man that brought them unto me, wherein I did see Mr Bacon's hand pleaded as orderly, and appointed them out that were my enemies, as directly as might be; which letters I know Mr Secretary Cecil hath seen, and by them it will appear what conceit he held of me, and no otherwise than he here coloureth and pleadeth the contrary.' To which Mr Francis Bacon gave this answer (9): 'My Lord, I spent more hours to make you a good subject, than upon any man in the world besides; but since

'you have stirred up this point, my Lord, I dare warrant you this letter will not blush, for I did but perform the part of an honest man, and ever laboured to have done you good if it might have been, and to no other end, for what I intended for your good was wished from the heart without touch of any man's honour.' There was nothing more passed at this trial concerning this matter but in the apology written by Mr Francis Bacon: The point is stated as in the text, and we are assured that these letters were written at the time the Earl of Effex was confined to his own house (10). The first of them in the name of Mr Anthony Bacon, is by way of advice to his Lordship, on the then untoward situation of his affairs, in which he very artfully sets forth, that tho' some affected to give out, he had no farther room for hope left at Court, but might very well consider himself as a man doomed to pass the remainder of his years in privacy, and in the enjoyment of his particular fortune, without any farther thought of the publick; yet in his, the writer's conception, there was no reason that his Lordship should give into such notions, or suffer himself to fall into absolute despair, so as to frame his mind to such a spirit that while things were in this situation, and before the Earl was hurried into his last unadvised action, the Bacons had in some measure softened the Queen, who frequently spoke to Mr Francis Bacon of the Earl of Essex, with an air of concern (n). Once when he was speaking to her Majesty on this subject, she took occasion to ask him, How the man had succeeded, who had undertaken to cure his brother Anthony of the gout? He answered, 'That at first the medicine he gave him did him good, but after a little while it lost it's efficacy, and at last he thought it did him harm.' The Queen replied to this in the following terms, 'I will tell you, Bacon, the error of it; the manner of these Physicians, and especially these Empericks, is to continue one kind of medicine, which at the first is proper to draw out the ill humour, but after, they have not the discretion to change their medicine, but apply still drawing medicines, when they should rather intend to cure and corroborate the part.' Mr Bacon immediately applied this, 'How wisely and aptly, Madam, said he, do you speak and discern of physick ministered to the body, and consider not that there is the like occasion of physick ministered to the mind? as now in the case of my Lord Essex; your princely word ever was, that you intended to reform his mind, and not to ruin his fortune; you cannot but think you have drawn the humours sufficiently, and therefore it is more than time, for fear of mortifying, that you minister strength and comfort unto him, for these same gradations, are fitter to corrupt than to correct any great mind.' But however Mr Francis Bacon might afterwards cool, if he did cool, in his affections to that noble person, most certain it is, that Mr Anthony Bacon loved him beyond the the grave, as appears by a paper directed to him, which fully vindicates his Lordship's character, and shews that he was influenced by publick spirit, and not by the desire of revenging his private quarrel on his enemies (o). This paper which is still preserved, remains an incontestible proof of Mr Anthony Bacon's having openly espoused his Lord's cause, even after it had brought him to the block, and on that account doubly deserves notice [D]. In all probability the death of the Earl of Essex affected him very

a spirit of retirement, as this fancy, if he should receive it, would lead him to. The first reason he assigns, is the temper of the Queen, that it was steady and constant, so that whoever she once liked she never absolutely disliked; and having pressed this point very strongly, he then proceeds to another argument, and so forward in these words: 'If I can spell, and scholar like put together, the parts of her Majesty's proceedings now against your Lordship, I cannot but make this construction, that her Majesty, in her royal intention, never intended to call your Lordship's doings into publick question, but only to have used a cloud without a shower, in censuring them by some temporary restraint only of liberty, and debarring you from her presence. For first, the handling the cause in the Star-Chamber, your not being called, was enforced by the violence of libelling and rumours, (wherein the Queen thought to have satisfied the world, and yet spared your Lordship's appearance) and after, when the means which was intended for the quenching of malicious bruits turned to kindle them, (because it was said, your Lordship was condemned unheard, and your Lordship's sister wrote that piquant letter) than her Majesty saw plainly, that these winds of rumours could not be commanded down without the handling of the cause, by making you a party, and admitting your defence, and to this purpose I do assure your Lordship, that my brother, Francis Bacon, who is too wise (I think) to be abused, and too honest to abuse, tho' he be more reserved in all particulars than is needful, yet, in generality, he hath ever constantly, and with asseveration affirmed to me, that both those days, that of the Star-Chamber, and that at my Lord-Keeper's, were won from the Queen merely upon necessity and point of honour against her own inclination. Thirdly, in the last proceeding, I note three points which are directly significant, that her Majesty did expressly forbear any point, which was irreparable, or might make your Lordship in any degree incapable of the return of her favour, or might fix any character indelible of disgrace upon you, for the spared the publick place of the Star-Chamber which spared ignominy, she limited the charge precisely not to touch upon any pretence of disloyalty, and no record remaineth to memory of the charge or sentence. Fourthly, the very distinction which was made in the sentence of sequestration from the places of service in state, and leaving to your Lordship the place of Master of the Horse, doth to my understanding indicative point at this, that her Majesty meant to use your Lordship's attendance in court, while the exercises of ' the other places stood suspended. Fifthly, I have heard, and your Lordship knoweth better than I, that now since you were in your own custody, her Majesty, in verbo regio, and by his mouth to whom she committed her royal grants and decrees, hath assured your Lordship she will forbid and not suffer your ruin.—— I know your Lordship may justly interpret, that this which I persuade may have some reference to my particular fortune, but I may truly say, te stante (not virebo, for I am withered in myself, but) manebo or tenebo, and that I shall in some sort be able to hold out: But though your Lordship's years and health may expect return of grace and fortune, yet your eclipse for a time is an ultimum vale to my fortune, and were it not that I desire and hope to see my brother established by her Majesty's favour, (as I think him well worthy for what he hath done and suffered) it were time I did take that course from which I dislodge your Lordship; but now in the mean time I cannot chuse but perform those honest duties unto you, to whom I have been so deeply bounden (11). The answer to this written in the Earl's name, but by the same pen which drew the former, is full of duty and affection to the Queen, but with some free and sharp touches on his enemies, which perhaps were thrown in to give it more the air of his Lordship's writing; the conclusion of it as it relates particularly to the two brothers, it is requisite the reader should see in the words of the letter itself (12). 'But for her first love and for her last protection, and for all her great benefits, I can but pray for her Majesty, and my endeavours are now to make my prayers for her Majesty and myself better heard; for, thanks be to God, they that can make her Majesty believe that I counterfeit with her, cannot make God believe that I counterfeit with him; and they which can let me from coming near unto her, cannot let me from drawing near unto him, as I hope I do daily: For your brother, I hold him to be an honest gentleman, and wish him all good, much the rather for your sake; yourself I know hath suffered more for me and with me, than any friend I have; yet I cannot but lament freely, as you see I do, and advise you not to do that which I do, which is, to despair; you know letters what hurt they have done me, and therefore make sure of this, and yet I could not (as having no other pledge of my love) but communicate freely with you, for the ease of my heart and your's.'

[D] And on that account doubly deserves notice.] This letter was directed to Mr A. Bacon, and dated from the writer's chamber in London, May the deeply, since his own followed within less than a year. He was, as appears by various passages in his brother's writings, a person perfectly well skilled in polite learning, and in all the arts requisite to the conduct of human life. How near soever he was related to the Cecils, and, how great soever his interest might be with the Lord-Treasurer, it does not by any means appear, that he had any intercourse with that family in the latter part of Queen Elizabeth's reign, but dedicated all his time, except what was employed in the service of his patron, to his studies. It was owing to this reserved life of his, that his father's fine seat fell to decay, and that the water which had been laid to it from springs at a considerable distance, was cut off in such a manner, that it could not afterwards be recovered, but at so great an expence, that the Lord Viscount St Albans chose rather to build a little neat house near the great pond; saying merrily (p), that Since the water could not be brought to his house, he would bring his house to the water. The friendship between these two brothers was not only warm and sincere, but constant and lasting, as appears by Francis Bacon's dedicating the first work he published to his brother Anthony, and celebrating his memory in many of those pieces which he published after his decease (q). There is good reason to believe, that this gentleman also wrote several things, though none of them have come down to our times, or at least none under his name, but as we shall shew in another place, it is more than probable, that some of those sonnets and other little pieces of poetry, that are generally ascribed to his patron the Earl of Essex, were, either in the whole or in part, of his composition, and were owned by the Earl, not from any affectation of learning which he did not possess, for his abilities were not of a nature to need any such assistance, or his spirit of that sort to seek or desire it, but for political reasons, he adopted what his occasions required, and what, if he had had leisure, he could have performed with equal elegance and beauty (r). It does not appear whether Mr Anthony Bacon was interred at Verulam or not, but if he had, one might reasonably suppose, some monument would have been erected there to his memory, considering not only the obligations, but the affection of his brother towards him; and yet it is not impossible that the circumstance of time might prevent his erecting such a testimony of respect to his memory, as not allowing room for celebrating his attachment to the Earl of Essex, his fidelity in which must have made a principal part of the character afforded him therein. He left behind him, besides the manour of Gorhambury, which descended to his brother Francis, a considerable personal estate, which he likewise bequeathed to him, and which it is believed he laid out in the purchase of the manour of Kingsbery (s), both of which, at the decease of the Viscount St Albans, came to Sir Thomas Meautys, and passed from his heirs to the family of Grimston, to whom they still belong [E]. As he laid the foundation of his brother the Chancellor's fortunes in one sense, so he was very useful to them in another likewise, I mean that of favour; since the first marks which Sir Francis Bacon received of King James's kindness and good will, are in the very grant expressed, to be in consideration of the many good services rendered him before his accession to the throne of England, by his brother Mr Anthony Bacon, as well as by himself (t). Such are the few scattered memoirs we have been able to collect of this great man, which at the same time that they are very curious in themselves, render them likewise a very useful Supplement to the foregoing articles.

30th, 1601. In it the writer tells him, that after the Earl of Essex was condemned, one Mr Ashton, a Preacher, was sent to him by the Lords, with intent to get out of him what he could. This man talked to him in a very high and faucy strain, imputing to him such base and black designs, that at length, the Earl, who professed that he feared such imputations on his memory, more than he did a thousand deaths, found himself obliged, in defence of all that was now left him, his good name, to speak more clearly to the point, than perhaps he ever intended: Thus, being extremely urged, says the letter writer, 'He made confession, according to the premises, namely, that he meant to have established the King of Scots his title in succession, and that in this intention he had many of the worthiest persons of the land in consent with him, which also he had an earnest purpose to have revealed at his death, as Ashton and others have confessed; but that he was so mightily dissuaded and commanded to the contrary, as a thing that might tend to the great danger of her Majesty's person: Now how little his honour is herein touched, and what small reason, he had then, of all times, to dissemble, your wife and religious heart may easily judge. Thus having, according to my wonted plainness, given you a true

'satisfaction in your desire, I must humbly recommend you to the protection of God, wishing much more health and comfort to you, than either your weak body hath of late enjoyed, or these times do afford (13).'

[E] And passed from his heirs to the family of Grimston, to whom they still belong.] Sir Thomas Meautys who lived many years with the Viscount St Albans, and who upon his sentence in the House of Lords, made over his estate to him, was likewise his heir, and he marrying Anne, daughter to Sir Nathaniel Bacon of Culford in the county of Suffolk, Knight of the Bath, left the manour of Gorhambury to her for her life, and she afterwards marrying Sir Harbottle Grimston, he procured from Hercules Meautys, for a valuable consideration, an assignment of his right to the reversion of this estate, which would have descended to him as nephew and heir of the beforementioned Sir Thomas Meautys (14). This Sir Harbottle Grimston, Knight and Baronet, was the direct ancestor of the Viscounts Grimston of the kingdom of Ireland, the present owners of this manour and seat (15), of which having so largely discoursed in the foregoing articles, it seemed requisite for the reader's satisfaction to add these few lines here.

BACONTHORP (a), or BACONDORP (b), or simply BACON (c) (JOHN), surnamed the Resolute Doctor, and one of the learnedest men of his times, WAS born, towards the end of the XIIIth century, at Baconthorp, an obscure village in Norfolk, from which he took his name. In his youth, he was a Monk in the convent of Blackney (d), a small town in Norfolk, about five miles from Walsingham. After some years dedicated to learning and piety, he removed to Oxford, and from thence to Paris; where he was honoured with the degrees in Divinity and Laws, and acquired a great reputation for learning, being esteemed the head of the Averroists [A], or followers of the Philosopher Averroës (e). Upon his return into England, he was unanimously chosen the twelfth Provincial of the English Carmelites, in a general assembly of that order held at London, in the year 1329. Four years after, he was invited by letters to Rome; where, in several disputations on the subject of marriage, he gave no little offence, by carrying the Papal authority too high in the case of divorces: but he thought fit afterwards to retract his opinion [B], and was held in great esteem at Rome, and other parts of Italy. This learned Doctor wrote several pieces, mentioned below [C]. He was small of stature [D], but of a great and lofty genius, as

[A] He was esteemed the head of the Averroists.] Averroës, the author of this sect, was an Arabian Philosopher, of Corduba, who flourished in the XIIth century. He was extremely attached to Aristotle, whose works he commented on with such ability, that he was styled, by way of eminence, The Commentator. He was professor in the university of Morocco, and distinguished himself by his great skill in the theoretical part of Physick. He taught that there is an intelligence, which, without multiplication of itself, animates all the individuals of the human species, in respect to their exercising the functions of a rational soul. As to religion, he had really none at all: for, according to him, Christianity was absurd, Judaism the religion of Children, and Mahometism (which he outwardly professed) the religion of Swine (1). 'Averroës of Corduba (says another writer) was instructed by his father in the laws and religion of his country. He was extremely fat, though he used to eat but once a day. He passed whole nights in the study of Philosophy; and when he found himself tired, he diverted himself with reading some book of poetry or history. He was never seen to play, or to seek after any amusement. The errors, of which he was accused, drew on him a sentence, whereby he was despoiled of his goods, and obliged to recant. After his condemnation, he went to Fez, and afterwards returned to Corduba; where he stayed, till, at the earnest request of the people, he was recalled to Morocco, and continued there till his death, which happened in 1206 (2).' It was with respect to the philosophical, not the religious, opinions of Averroës, that our Baconthorp was said to be the head or chief of his followers: for he understood the writings of Aristotle, and maintained his doctrines, in a manner agreeable to the explications or comments of this Philosopher. Hence his Panegyrist Baptista Mantuanus:

Nemo magis mentem cognovit Averrois, illum
Si sequeris, fies alter Aristoteles (3).

[B] He thought fit afterwards to retract his opinion.] Bale assures us, that Baconthorp not only recanted his former doctrine, but took the other side of the question, proving, by the strongest arguments fetched from reason and Scripture, that, in degrees of consanguinity prohibited by the divine law, the Pope has no dispensing power. Sed erroris a Dei verbo admonitus, vitium agnovit, detestabat noxam, ac palinodiam modestissime cecinit, solidissimis scripturis et rationibus probans, in gradibus consanguinitatis divina lege prohibitis, Papam dispensare non posse (4). It is remarkable, that Pits says not one word of Baconthorp's giving offence, and afterwards changing his opinion, but only tells us in general, that he was sent for to Rome upon some important questions relating to marriage, and that he was as much esteemed in Italy, as he had been in France. Romam vocatus est super gravissimis de matrimonio dubiis. Tum cepit fama boninis apud Italos, uti prius apud Gallos magis magisque indies clarescere (5).

[C] He wrote several pieces.] Among those, which have seen the light, the most remarkable are the following: I. Commentaria, seu Quaestiones super quatuor libros Sententiarum. i. e. Commentaries, or Questions on the four books of Sentences. This book was published at Milan in 1510 and 1611; at Cremona by John Chrysothom Marafce in 1618, in two volumes; twice at Paris, and once at Venice. II. Compendium Legis Christi, et Quodlibeta. i. e. An Abridgment of the Law of Christ, and Quodlibets. Venice, 1527. The Quodlibeta were published, together with the Commentaries on the Sentences, at Cremona in 1618 (6). Dr Cave mentions another piece, which he is not sure was ever published. It is intitled, Tractatus Duo de Regula Ordinis Carmelitani, et Compendium historiarum et juris pro defensione ejusdem ordinis. i. e. Two Treatises concerning the Rule of the Order of the Carmelites, and an historical and juridical Compendium in defence of the said Order. Leland, Bale, and Pits, give us, as usual, a very long catalogue of our author's works never yet published; among which the most worthy of notice are these: I. Commentaries on all the books of the Bible, and on St Austin's Book De Civitate Dei. II. Several Treatises against the Jews. III. A Treatise against Pope John concerning the Vision of the Blessed. And IV. Discourses on various Subjects.

[D] He was small of stature.] This circumstance is pleasantly aggravated by Pits and Fuller. 'Erat quidem, ut alter Zachæus, statura pusillus, sed ingenio magnus, ut mirum sit in tam exili corpore tantas habitasse virtutes, et naturam in tantulo homuncione tam sublime collocasse ingenium. Tam ingentia scriptis volumina, ut corpus non tulisset quod ingenium protulerat. Nam si moles librorum ejus, composita farcina, auctoris humeris imposita fuisset, homulum sine dubio comprimere suffecisset' (7). He was, like another Zachæus, a very dwarf in stature, but of so great a genius, that it is surprising such exalted virtues should dwell in so small a body, and that nature should have placed so sublime a wit, in such an epitome of a man. He wrote such large volumes, that his body could not have sustained the product of his mind. For if the weight of his books, bundled together, had been laid upon their author's shoulders, the little man must undoubtedly have sunk under it.' In like manner Fuller makes himself merry with little Baconthorp. One remarkable, says he, first for the dwarfishness of his stature:

Scalpellum, calami, atramentum, charta, libellus,

His pen-knife, pen, ink-born, one sheet of paper, and any of his books, would amount to his full height. As for all the books of his own making, put together, their burden were more than his body could bear. Secondly, for his high spirit in his low body. Indeed, his soul had but a small diocese to visit, and therefore might the better attend the essential informing thereof. I have heard it delivered by a learned Doctor in Physic (at the Anatomy Lecture in London) who a little before had been present at the emboweling and embalming of Duke Hamilton and the Lord Capel, that the heart of the former was the largest, the latter the least he had ever beheld, inferring hence, that contracted spirits act with the greatest vigorousness (8).

[E] The greatness of his genius is acknowledged by writers of other nations. Baptista Mantuanus celebrates him in the following lines (9).

Quis liber in lucem nuper qui venit ab umbris?
Hic est Carmeli gloria magna Bacon.
Nemo magis mentem cognovit Averrois, istum
Si sequeris, fies alter Aristoteles.
Iste tenebrofi damnat vestigia Scoti,
Et per sacra novis it documenta viis.

Paulus Panfa, a celebrated Orator of Italy, has immortalized the memory of Baconthorp in the following eulogium. 'Si Dei optimi maximi penetrabilia adire suadeat animus, nemo accuratius essentiam ejus mandavit literis. Si rerum causas, si naturæ effectus, si cæli varios motus, ac elementorum contrarias qualitates discere exoptet quisquam, hic se officinam offert. Christianæ religionis arma Vulcaniis munitiora contra Judæos, solus hic Resolutus Doctor ministranda tradidit: Messias adventum dilucidat, Antichristi aperit venturas fallacias, Mahumeti sectam profermit, scripturæ nodos solvit, et ænigmata cuncta serenat (10).—If your inclination leads you to search into the nature of Almighty God, no one has written more accurately upon his essence. If you would enquire into the causes of things, the effects of nature, the various motions of the heavens, and the contrary qualities of the elements, here you are presented with a magazine. This one Resolute Doctor has furnished the Christian religion with the strongest arms against the Jews: he clears up the coming of the Messiah, detects the future fallacies of Antichrist, overthrows the sect of Mahomet, and explains all the difficult parts of the Scriptures.' The same author celebrates Baconthorp both as a Philosopher and a Divine in the following distich:

Noscere vis rerum causas, ipsumque tonantem,
Et Sophiæ omne genus? sume Baconis opus (11).

I shall conclude these foreign testimonies with certain barbarous verses, written by Laurence Burell of Dijon, in the person of Baconthorp himself. They relate chiefly to our author's works, and their publication after his death. If the reader has a mind to skip over them as too long, or for any other reason, with all my heart; he has my free leave.

[F] ——— As well as our own. His virtues, according to Leland, were in themselves so illustrious, that they stand in no need of borrowed colours. Virtutes hominis tam per se illustres erant, ut pigmentis aliunde adscitis jam per se non egeant (13). Bale assures us, he was the learnedest Monk of the Mendicant order that England ever produced; and that in all his writings, he abhorred sophistry, as heresy, blasphemy, and the bane of the Christian faith. But this historian thinks, he would have performed much greater things, and been the completest writer that ever was, had it not been for the darkness of the age he lived in, under the tyranny of Antichrist; that is, in other words, if he had not been a Papist; however, in the midst of that darkness, he saw many things of which he durst not declare his opinion. The Bishop of Ossory adds, that he had found some sentences in Baconthorp's works more weighty, than in all the other writers of his time; and that he had made a collection of them, as so many instances of the author's piety, but fears he had lost them in Ireland. Talis ille erat in omni bonarum artium genere, qualem nec ante nec post habebat Anglia, ex omni Mendicantium Monachorum cumulo. — In omnibus scriptis sobrius, ut hæresim, blasphemiam, ac perniciosissimam fidei pestem aspernabatur. — Si non fuisset hic scriptor ejus ætatis caligine impeditus, sub Antichristi tyrannide, multa et magna præstitisset, nec eo fuisset quicquam absolutius. Multa certe in ipsis tenebris vidit, quæ pronunciarè non audebat. Porro inveni sententias aliquot graviores apud illum, quam apud omnes ejus temporis scriptores: et eas, ut fragmenta quedam pietatis ejus, collegi; quæ tamen apud Hybernos periisse timeo (14). Pits praises him almost in the very words of Paulus Panfa (15). Nemo doctius confundebat Judæos, nemo nervosior consutabat Turcos, vel quoscunque infideles; nemo feliciter expugnabat Hæreticos; nemo solidius Christi veritatem dilucidabat; nemo manifestius Antichristi falsitatem et imposturas detegebat, suisque coloribus depingebat; nemo subtilius difficile nodos solvebat; nemo clarius obscura sacre Scripture loca explanabat, et sensus reconditos et arcana mysteria dilucidius aperiebat (16).

BADEW (RICHARD DE) the first and original founder of Clare-Hall in Cambridge, was descended from a knightly family seated at Great Badew, or Badow, near Chelmsford in the county of Essex (a). From this place of their residence they took their surname; and here, probably, Richard de Badew was born. In 1326, he was

Chancellor

Chancellor of the university of Cambridge (b): and having purchased two tenements in Miln-street of Nigel Thornton a Physician [A], he laid there, in the year above-mentioned, the foundation of a building, to which was given the name of University-Hall. In it he placed a Principal, who was to take care of the pensioners that came to live there at their own expence (c), or, as others say, at the charges of the university (d); for as yet it was not endowed. It continued in this condition for the space of sixteen years, and then by an accidental fire was burnt down (e). Richard de Badew being unable to rebuild it, it lay for a few years in ruins. But one of the late pensioners having a great interest with Elizabeth, daughter of Sir Gilbert de Clare Earl of Gloucester, and third sister and coheir of Sir Gilbert de Clare the last Earl of Gloucester and Hertford [B], he prevailed upon her to undertake what de Badew was not able to perform (f). Whereupon this charitable lady, after the resignation of Walter Thaxtead the Principal, and with the consent of Richard de Badew, new-built that hall, and endowed it, in the year 1347, with revenues for one Master, ten fellows, and ten scholars (g). At the same time she named it Clare-Hall, from her own family-surname (b). When she founded it, King Edward III, gave licence of mortmain to the Master and Scholars, to take lands and tenements, to the value of forty pounds a year (i). The revenues of this hall have been augmented since by several benefactors [C], so that at present it contains one Master, eighteen fellows, and sixty-three scholars (k). Some conclude (l) from the two following verses of Chaucer (m) that it was formerly called Sollere or Scholler-hall,

And namely there was a great college,
Men clepen (n) it the Sollere-hall of Cambrege.

[A] Having purchased two tenements in Miln-street, &c.] Stow says (1), that it was founded by the Chancellor, R. Badew, and Masters of the university of Cambridge, upon a ground whereon stood two houses, belonging of old time to the said Chancellor and university, in Miln-street.
[B] Third sister and coheir of Sir Gilbert de Clare, the last Earl of Gloucester and Hertford.] Namely of that name and family. She was married, three times, 1. To John de Burgh, son and heir to the Earl of Ulster (2), by whom he had William de Burgh last Earl of Ulster. 2. To Theobald of Verdon. and
3. To Sir Roger Damary, or Tamari (3). She had formerly been a benefactress to University-Hall, having bestowed upon it the perpetual patronage of Littington, and been otherwise very bountiful to that foundation (4).

[C] The revenues of this hall have been augmented since by several benefactors.] The chief of them have been, John Thaxton, Editha Green, William Ducket, William Worleigh, William Marhal, Ralph Scrivener, Thomas Cave, Thomas Stoyle, or Stoite, Edmund Naturels, Edward Leedes, Robert Scot, Thomas Cecil Earl of Exeter, and his lady Dorothy, who gave 108 pounds a year in rent, William Butler, John Freeman, George Ruggle, Sir Robert Heath, Thomas Binge, Humphrey Hide, Robert Johnson, Erasmus Farrar, William Briden, Thomas Croply, &c (5). C

BAINBRIDGE (JOHN), an eminent Physician and Astronomer of the XVIIth century, was the son of Robert Bainbridge by Anne his wife, daughter of Richard Everard, of Shenton in Leicestershire, and born, in the year 1582, at Ashby de la Zouch, in the same county. He was educated at the grammar-school in that town, and from thence removed to Emanuel College in Cambridge, under the tuition of his kinsman Dr Joseph Hall, afterwards Bishop of Norwich. He took the degrees of Bachelor and Master of Arts, and studied Physic in that university; after which he retired to his own country, where he taught a grammar-school for some years, and practised Physic (a). He applied himself likewise to the study of the Mathematics, especially Astronomy, of which he had been extremely fond from his earliest years. By the advice of his friends, he removed to London, where he was admitted a Fellow of the college of Physicians (b). His Description of the Comet in 1618 brought him acquainted with Sir Henry Savile, who, without any application or recommendation in favour of Dr Bainbridge, appointed him his first Professor of Astronomy at Oxford, in the year 1619; whereupon he removed thither, and was entered a master-commoner of Merton College; of which society he continued a member some years. In 1631, he was appointed by the Master and Fellows of Merton, Junior-Reader of Linacre's lecture, and in 1635 Superior Reader of the same lecture (c). Having resolved to publish correct editions of the antient Astronomers, agreeably to the statutes of the founder of that professorship, in order to acquaint himself with the discoveries of the Arabian Astronomers, he began to study the Arabic language, being then about forty years of age (d). Some time before his death, he removed to an house over against Merton College church, and died there November the 3d, 1643, in the sixty-second year of his age. His body was conveyed to the publick schools, where it rested some time; and, an oration having been spoken in praise of the deceased by Mr William Strode, the university Orator, it was carried from thence, attended by a great number of members of the university, to Merton College, and there deposited near the high altar (e). An epitaph, said to be written by his successor Mr Greaves [A], was inscribed on his monument.

[A] His epitaph ——— said to be written by Mr Greaves.] It is as follows: Si scire cupias, viator, quis et quantum hic jacet, alibi quæras oportet; dicere satis inæquo. Britannia tota viri famam non capit.

'If, passenger, you would know who, and how great a man lies here, you must enquire elsewhere; I cannot sufficiently inform you; all Britain is too little for his fame. But that you may not be ignorant of the rest, take the following account for your benefit. JOHN BAINBRIDGE, a person of the most unblemished character, and unequalled learning, Professor of Physic and Mathematics, as successful in removing new diseases, as sagacious in his observations on the stars; whom Sir Henry Savile, that excellent judge of men and books, appointed his first Professor of Astronomy, and his worthy colleague in the mathematical lectures he had so nobly founded; who, having been educated at Cambridge, was cherished by the university of Oxford as her own son, and honoured by her with a public oration and funeral, as equally an ornament of both; who corrected Scaliger with more success than Scaliger had corrected Chronology; died too early for the interest of learning, in the year 1643. Go now and learn the rest even from foreigners.'

Dr Smith, who gives us this epitaph (1), tells us, he is not certain it was written by Mr Greaves, though many assert it was; and that he had transcribed the following epitaph from a manuscript of that gentleman's. *Quod superest clarissimi viri D. Joannis Bainbridge, in Academia Oxoniensi publici Astronomiae Professoris, sub hoc marmore clauditur. Quod vero amavimus, quod suspexit, quod maesti desideramus, frustra hic quaeras: illud caelo, cui vivas animo cogitationeque incubuit, receptum est. Obiit A. D. 1643. 10c. In English.

'Under this marble is deposited, what remains of the celebrated Dr John Bainbridge, public Professor of Astronomy at Oxford: but it is in vain to look for, in this place, what we loved, what we admired, and what we now lament the loss of; that part of him is raised to Heaven, on which, while he lived, his mind and thoughts were earnestly intent. He died the third of November 1643, aged sixty-two, at six o'clock in the morning.'

[B] His works.] 1. An Astronomical Description of the late Comet from the 18th of November 1618, to the 16th of December following, London 1619 in 4to (2). This piece was only a specimen of a larger work, which the author intended to publish in Latin under the title of Cometographia, i. e. 'the doctrine of Comets.' He seems indeed to have given a little too much into the vulgar notion of comets being presages of some impending calamity; with which persuasion he has subjoined in this treatise, certain Moral Prognostics (3). 2. Procli Sphaera et Ptolemaei de Hypothesibus Planetarum liber singularis; to which he added Ptolemy's Canon regnorum: both collated with manuscripts, put into Latin, and published by our author with figures: Printed in 1620 in 4to. 3. Canticularia; being a treatise concerning the Dog-star and the Canicular Days; published at Oxford in 1648 by Mr Greaves, together with a demonstration of the Heliacal rising of Sirius or the Dog-star for the parallel of Lower Egypt (4). Dr Bainbridge wrote this treatise at the request of Archbishop Usher, but left it imperfect, being prevented either by the troubles, which followed upon the breaking out of the civil war, or by death; so that he was not able to finish his demonstration of the Heliacal rising of the Dog-star, which, as Mr Greaves says, was the only pillar of that discourse (5). These are all our author's writings that have been published: but these were several dissertations of his prepared for the press, the year after his death, with the approbation of the Vice-Chancellor of Oxford, though the edition of them was never completed. The titles of them are as follows, 1. Antiprognosticon, in quo μαντικῆς astrologicae, caelestium domorum, et triplicitatum commentis, magnisque Saturni et Jovis (cujusmodi anno 1623 et 1643 contigerunt, et viceversa fere quoque deinceps anno, ratis naturæ legibus, recurrent) conjunctioibus innixæ, vanità breviter detegitur: i. e. 'Antiprognostics, in which is briefly

'detected the vanity of Astrological predictions, grounded upon the idle conceits of celestial houses and triplicities, and the grand conjunctions of Saturn and Jupiter, such as happened in the years 1623 and 1643, and will recur once in almost every twenty years hereafter, agreeably to the stated laws of nature.' 2. De Meridianorum sive Longitudinum differentis inveniondis Dissertatio: i. e. 'A Dissertation concerning the Meridians or Longitudes.' 3. De Stella Veneris Diatriba: i. e. 'A Dissertation concerning the Planet Venus.' To these pieces was added, the oration spoken at his funeral by the University Orator, Mr William Strode. They fell into the hands of Dr Thomas Smith, who promised to publish them, if the avarice of the Booksellers, as he terms it, would give him leave (6). Besides these, a specimen of Celestial Observations, made by Dr Bainbridge at Oxford, may be seen in Ismael Bullialdus's Astronomia Philolaica (7), published at Paris in 1645. But the pieces hitherto mentioned are very inconsiderable in comparison of those other tracts of our author's, which never were published, but left by his will to Archbishop Usher; among whose manuscripts they are preserved in the library of Trinity College in Dublin. Among others, are the following: 1. A Theory of the Sun. 2. A Theory of the Moon. 3. A Discourse concerning the Quantity of the Year. 4. Two volumes of Astronomical Observations; and 5. Nine or ten volumes of Miscellaneous Papers relating to the Mathematics (8). Dr Bainbridge undertook likewise, a Description of the British Monarchy, distinguished into three columns, in order to shew the advantages of the union of England and Scotland under one Monarch; as appears from his dedication of the Description of the Comet in 1618 to King James I; but this treatise was either suppressed by him, or is lost (9).

[C] An odd story concerning Dr Bainbridge related by Dr Walter Pope.] That writer, in his Life of Seth Ward, Bishop of Salisbury (10), speaking of the Doctor, says, 'This was the same Dr Bambridge (*), who was afterwards Savilian Professor of Astronomy at Oxford, a learned and good Mathematician; yet there goes a story of him, which was in many scholars mouths, when I was first admitted there, that he put upon the school-gate an Affiche, or written paper, as the custom is, giving notice, at what time, and upon what subject, the Professor will read, which ended in these words, lecturus de polis et axis, under which was written by an unknown hand as follows;

'Doctor Bambridge

'Came from Cambridge,

'To read de polis et axis:

'Let him go back again,

'Like a dunce as he came,

'And learn a new Syntaxis.

Dr Smith takes notice of this story, and tells us, the Doctor's reputation had suffered, upon the most trifling account, from the false and malicious calumny of some persons, who charged him with an offence against Syntax in one of his lectures; which absurd and ridiculous story he should have omitted, as unworthy of any reply, had not a certain eminent buffoon inserted that stupid epigram in a late book of his reason for being so very angry with this epigram;

which does not, as he pretends, charge Dr Bain-upon the mistake of axis for axibus, which might

BAKER (Sir RICHARD) a writer in the XVIIth century, and noted chiefly for being the author of a Chronicle of the Kings of England [A], was born at Sissingherst in Kent (a), about the year 1568 (b). His mother was Catherine, daughter of Sir Reynold Scot of Scots-hall in Kent, Knight: and his father, John Baker of London, Gentleman, a younger son of Sir John Baker, of Sissingherst abovementioned, Knight, Chancellor of the Exchequer, and one of the Privy-Council to King Henry VIII (c). Our author was entered a Commoner of Hart-Hall in Oxford, in 1584, and matriculated in Michaelmas-term the same year, being in the sixteenth year of his age (d). After he had spent in this place about three years, in the study of Logic and Philosophy [B], he went to one of the Inns of Court, and compleated his education by travelling into foreign parts; nothing being omitted by his parents to render him an accomplished gentleman. In 1594, after the celebration of a solemn Act, he was, with other persons of quality, created Master of Arts at Oxford (e); and in May 1603 [C], he received the honour of knighthood from King James I, at Theobalds (f). At that time he lived at Highgate near London, and was esteemed a most compleat and learned person (g). In 1620 he was High-Sheriff of Oxfordshire, being possessed of the manour of Middle-Aston, and other estates in that county; and was also a Justice of Peace for the same (h). He married Margaret, daughter of Sir George Manwaring of Ightfield in Shropshire, Knight; which marriage caused him a great deal of trouble, and involved him into inextricable difficulties. For, engaging unwisely for the payment of some of

[A] Noted chiefly for being the author of a Chronicle of the Kings of England. The whole title of it was as follows, 'A Chronicle of the Kings of England,
' from the time of the Romans Government unto the ' death of King James. Containing all Passages of ' State and Church, with all other Observations pro' per for a Chronicle. Faithfully collected out of ' Authors ancient and modern; and digested into a ' new method. By Sir Richard Baker, Knight.'
The first edition of it was published at London in 1641, fol. the second in 1653, and the third in 1658.
To this third edition was added, 'The reign of King
' Charles the First,' with 'A Continuation from his ' death to 1658.' By Edward Phillips, sometimes a student of Magdalen-Hall, Oxon, and nephew to the celebrated poet J. Milton. The fourth edition came out in 1665, having a continuation of the Chronicle to the coronation of King Charles the Second: in ' which were many material Affairs of State never ' before published; and likewise the most remarkable
' Occurrences relating to his Majesties Restauration,
' by the prudent conduct of General Monck, Duke
' of Albemarle, and Captain-General of all his Ma-
' jesties Armies: as they were extracted out of his
' Excellencies own Papers, and the Journals and Mem' orials of those employed in the most important and ' secret Transactions of that Time.' The account of the Restauration was said to be mostly done by Sir Thomas Clarges, whose sister the Duke of Albemarle had married, and put into the hands of Edward Phillips, who attributing more to the Duke's glory than was true, 'got his ill-will' (1). This Chronicle was in great vogue for several years, being a common piece of furniture in almost every country Esquire's hall. And justly indeed, if what the author of it said in it's commendation was true, 'That it was collected with so great care
' and diligence, that if all other of our Chronicles should ' be lost, this only would be sufficient to inform pos' terity of all passages memorable or worthy to be ' known' (2). But all persons have not entertained the same favourable opinion of that performance.
One says (3), 'that it being reduced to method, and ' not according to time, purposely to please gentlemen
' and novices, many chief things to be observed
' therein, as name, time, &c. are egregiously false,
' and consequently breed a great deal of confusion in
' the pruser, especially if he be curious or critical.'
Another (5) allows, that 'the author was a person
' of those accomplishments, in wit and language, that ' his Chronicle has been the best read and liked of ' any hitherto published; and that his method is new, and seems to please the rabble; but, adds he, learned ' men will be of another opinion.' The greatest adversary to that book, was Thomas Blount, Esq (6);

who in 1672, published at Oxford in 12mo, 'Ani-
' madervisions upon Sir Richard Baker's Chronicle,
' and it's Continuation. Wherein many Errors are ' discovered, and some Truths advanced.' In the preface, he expresses his wonder, to see that Chronicle twice printed by itself, and three times with a Continuation (7), and no person should impugn it, being stuffed with so many contradictions and repetitions, so many mistimings and mistakings, as of other things of moment, so especially of the pedigrees, names, and place of our ancient Nobility, Bishops, Baronets, Gentry, &c. In the same preface, he calls the Continuator 'a person of incompetent parts for
' so great an undertaking; and observes, that many ' passages are omitted in the reign of King James,
' which was the time Sir Richard lived in, and had ' been fit for the Continuator to have supplied; who ' instead thereof, has swelled the Continuation into
' such a bulk of indigested matter, as is not at all ' suitable to the rest of the History.' Notwithstanding these Animadversions, that Chronicle was reprinted since that time, and sold as well as ever, though no notice was taken of the animadversions, but all the old faults remained uncorrected, as Mr Nicolson complained (8). In 1730, a new edition of this Chronicle was printed at London, fol. with E. Phillips's Continuation; and a 'second Continuation, containing ' the Reigns of King Charles II from his Restauration,
' King James II, King William and Queen Mary II,
' Queen Anne, and King George I; by an impartial
' Hand.' Many mistakes are said to be corrected in Sir Richard Baker's part; and E. Phillips's Continuation is contracted, many publick pieces, lists of names, &c. being either omitted, or the substance of them only given in this edition. But, after all, it is a very mean and jejune performance; and no wife to be relied on.

BAKER (THOMAS) an eminent Mathematician in the XVIIth century, was the son of James Baker of Ilton in Somersetshire, Steward to the family of the Strangways of Dorsetshire (a). He was born at Ilton about the year 1625 (b), and entered in Magdalen-Hall Oxon. in the beginning of the year 1640. On the 27th of April 1645 he was elected scholar of Wadham-College; and did some little service to King Charles I within the garrison of Oxford. He was admitted Bachelor of Arts April 10, 1647, but left the university without completing that degree by determination. Afterwards he became Vicar of Bishop's-Nymmet in Devonshire, where he lived many years in a most retired and studious condition. What he chiefly applied himself to, was the study of the Mathematics, in which he made a very great progress: But in his obscure neighbourhood, he was neither known, nor sufficiently valued for his eminent skill in that useful branch of knowledge, till he published a book entitled 'The Geometrical Key, &c [A].' A little before his death, the members of the Royal Society sent him some mathematical queries: to which he returned so satisfactory an answer, that they gave him a medal with an inscription full of honour and respect. He died at Bishop's-Nymmet aforementioned, on the 5th of June 1690, and was buried in his own church (c).

[A] The Geometrical Key, &c.] The whole title of the book, is, 'The Geometrical Key; or, the Gate of Equations unlocked; or, a new Discovery of the Construction of all Equations, howsoever affected, not exceeding the fourth degree, viz. of Linears, Quadratics, Cubics, Biquadratics, and the finding of all their Roots, as well false as true, without the use of Mesolabe, Trisection of Angles, without Reduction, Depression, or any other previous Preparations of Equations, by a Circle, and any (and that one only) Parabole, &c.' London 1684, 4to in Latin and English. An account is given of this book in the Philosophical Transactions (1). And it is there observed, that the author, in order to free us of the trouble of preparing the equation by taking away the second term, shews us how to construct all affected equations not exceeding the fourth power, by the intersection of a circle and Parabola, without omission or change of any terms. And a circle and a parabola being the most simple, it follows, that the way which our author has chosen is the best. In the book (to render it intelligible even to those who have read no conics) the author shews, how a parabola arises from the section of a cone, then how to describe it in plano, and from that construction demonstrates, that the squares of the ordinates are one to another, as the correspondent sagittæ or intercepted diameters; then he shews, that if a line be inscribed in a parabola perpendicular to any diameter, a rectangle made of the segments of the inscript, will be equal to a rectangle made of the intercepted diameter and parameter of the axis. From this last propriety our author deduces the universality of his central rule for the solution of all biquadratic and cubic equations, however affected or varied in terms or signs. After the synthesis the author shews the analysis or method, by which he found this rule; which, in the opinion of Dr R. Plot (who was then Secretary to the Royal Society) is so good, that nothing can be expected more easy, simple, or universal.

and, in 1294, Dean of St Paul's (c). The See of London being vacant by the death of Richard de Gravesend, Baldock was unanimously chosen, September the 20th 1304 (d). But, his election being controverted, he was obliged to repair to Rome [A], and, having obtained the Pope's confirmation, was consecrated at Lyons by Peter Hispanus Cardinal of Alba, January the 30th, 1306 (e). Being returned into England, he made profession of canonical obedience to the Archbishop in the church of Canterbury, March the 29th, 1306 (f), and was enthroned, the 27th of July, in St Paul's church (g). The same year, he was appointed by the Pope one of the Commissioners for examination of the articles alledged against the Knights Templars (h). The year following, he was made Lord High-Chancellor of England: but, Edward I dying soon after, he held that post scarce a year (i). December the 2d, 1308, this Prelate, with the approbation of the Chapter, settled a stipend on the Chancellor of St Paul's, for reading lectures in Divinity in that church, according to a constitution of his predecessor Richard de Gravesend (k). He contributed two hundred marks towards building the chapel of St Mary [B] on the east side of St Paul's. He founded also a chantry of two priests in the said church, near the altar of St Erkenwald (l). He was a person of a very amiable character [C] both for morals and learning, and deserved well of his country by his writings, which were; I. Historia Anglica, or 'An History of the British Affairs down to his own Time.' It is not now extant, though Leland says (m) he saw it at London [D]: II. A Collection of the Statutes and Constitutions of the church of St Paul's, extant in the library of that church in 1559 (n). Bishop Baldock died at Stepney, July the 24th, 1313, having sat from his consecration a little more than seven years, and was buried under a marble monument in the chapel of St Mary (o).

There was about the same time a ROBERT DE BALDOCK, a Canon of London, and Archdeacon of Middlesex, who, upon the vacancy of the See of London by the death of Bishop Baldock, was (together with John Colchester, another Canon) presented by the Chapter of London to the Chapter of Canterbury (that See being likewise vacant) for the choice of one of them to be official of the diocese of London (p). This Robert Baldock was in great favour with King Edward II, who made him his Chancellor, and nominated him to the bishoprick of Norwich, into which he was elected about the middle of the year 1325, and confirmed by the Archbishop in the month of August. But he could not obtain the See, by reason of a Papal provision in favour of William de Ayremin. Soon after, he lost his liberty and life by the intestine sedition, which deprived King Edward of his crown: for, being seized by the enraged populace, he was dragged to

[A] His election being controverted, he was obliged to repair to Rome.] During the vacancy of the See, the Archbishop had visited the church of St Paul's, and suspended three of the Canons, one of whom was Peter de Dene. Afterwards, when the Chapter met for the choice of a Bishop, the three deprived Canons demanded their seat among the rest; but being refused it, they protested against the election, and appealed to the Pope. The chapter nevertheless proceeded in their choice; after which Peter de Dene, in the name of the three Canons, appealed a second time against the election and confirmation, and obtained from the Pope a citation to the Bishop elect, to appear on a certain day at Rome, before Landulph Cardinal Deacon of St Angelo, who was appointed to hear and determine the cause. Accordingly the new Bishop set out for Rome the 8th of September (1); but Pope Benedict dying in the interim, Cardinal Landulph referred the cause to his successor Pope Clement. In short, Baldock and Peter appeared on the day assigned; but, Peter renouncing his appeal, and dropping the cause, the Pope ratified Baldock's election and confirmation, and ordered him to be consecrated (2).

[B] The chapel of St. Mary.] It was called the New Work *, and in 1312 was paved with marble. Three years after, a great part of the spire, being decayed with age, was taken down, and rebuilt with greater magnificence; and on the top was fixed a very large cross, in which were placed the relics of several saints (3). As the magnificent cathedral of St Paul's was now finished by the building this chapel, it will not be improper in this place to mention the conjecture of our great Antiquarian Mr Camden, that a temple of Diana formerly stood upon the same spot. But take it in his own words, as translated by his learned editor (4). 'Some have fancied that the temple of Diana formerly stood here; and there are circumstances that strengthen their conjecture; as the old adjacent buildings being called in their records Diana Camera, i. e. the chamber of Diana; the digging up in the church-yard in Edward the first's reign (as we find by our annals) an incredible number of ox-heads; which the common people at that time, not without great admiration, looked upon to have been Gentile-sacrifices; and the learned know, that the Tauropolia were celebrated in honour of Diana. And when I was a boy, I have seen a stag's head fixed upon a spear (agreeable enough to the sacrifices of Diana) and carried about in the very church with great solemnity and sounding of horns. And I have heard, that the stag, which the family of Baud in Essex were bound to pay for certain lands, was used to be received at the steps of the choir by the members of this church, in their sacerdotal robes, and with garlands of flowers about their heads. Whether this was a custom before the Bauds were obliged to the payment of this stag, I know not; but certain it is, this ceremony favours more of the worship of Diana and the Gentile errors, than of the Christian religion. And it is beyond all doubt, that some of these strange rites did creep into the Christian religion; which the primitive Christians either closed with, out of that natural inclination mankind has to superstition, or bore with them in the beginning, with design to draw over the Gentiles by little and little to the worship of the true God.' Whether these arguments are sufficient to support Mr Camden's conjecture, is not our business here to enquire.

[C] He was a person of very amiable character.] Pits tells us (5), he was a man of a mild and gentle disposition, a wonderful affability, and incredible sweetness of manners; which qualifications of mind, joined with an extraordinary piety, and no less learning, recommended him to the favour of great men and Princes, especially the Kings Edward I and II. Vir miti placidoque ingenio, mira affabilitate, incredibili morum suavitate. Propter quas animi dotes cum singulari pietate et eruditione pari conjunctas magnatum et principum benevolentiam gratiamque mirifice conciliavit. Imprimis eum magno in pretio habuerunt Reges Edwardus primus, ejusque filius Edwardus secundus.

[D] Leland says, he saw it at London.] That writer tells us (6), that, carefully perusing John Abbot of Burgh's Annals of the English Affairs, and coming to the year 1292, he met with a passage, in which honourable mention was made of Baldock's history. This put our Antiquarian upon enquiring after the book, which at length he found in the library of St Paul's church, and read it through. Nuper enim

BALDWIN, Archbishop of Canterbury in the reigns of Henry II and Richard I, was born of obscure parents at Exeter, where he received a liberal education, and in his younger years taught school (a). Afterwards, entering into Holy Orders, he was made Archdeacon of Exeter. But, soon quitting that dignity and the world together, he took the habit of the Cistercian order in the monastery of Ford in Devonshire, and in a few years became Abbot thereof (b). From thence he was promoted to the See of Worcester, and consecrated August the 10th 1180 (c). Upon the death of Richard Archbishop of Canterbury in 1184 (d), he was translated to that See, not without some difficulties in the way of his election [A], being the first of his order in England, that was ever advanced to the archiepiscopal dignity (e). He was enthroned at Canterbury the 19th of May 1185, and the same day received the pall from Pope Lucius III (f), whose successor Urban III appointed him his Legate for the diocese of Canterbury (g). Soon after he was settled in his See, he began to build a church and monastery at Hackington near Canterbury, in honour of St Thomas Becket, for the reception of secular Priests: but, being violently opposed by the Monks of Canterbury, supported by the Pope's authority, he was obliged to desist [B]. The 3d of September 1190, he solemnly performed the ceremony

[A] Some difficulties in the way of his election. The See of Canterbury being vacant, the King came to Reading, and summoned thither the Bishops and Monks of Canterbury, in order to proceed to an election. And here there happened a contest between the Monks and the Bishops: The Monks pretended to the privilege of voting first, and the greatest interest in the election; for which they produced the King's charter. The Bishops, on the other side, argued against the authority of the charter; that it was a grant against common right, and made in prejudice of the Church of England; insinuating at the same time, that Suffragans ought to have the liberty of choosing their Metropolitan. The dispute running high, the assembly broke up without effect: But not long after, the King convened the Bishops and Monks of Canterbury at London for the same purpose. Here the Monks reviving the dispute, Gilbert, Bishop of London, who, in right of his See, had the privilege of voting first, chose Baldwin, Bishop of Worcester. All the rest of the Bishops concurred in this election; but the Monks of Canterbury, refusing to comply, appealed to the Pope, and went off. The Bishops presented their elect of Canterbury to the King, who received him as Archbishop; and he was saluted as such by Richard, Geoffry, and John, the King's sons. Soon after, the King came to Canterbury, to satisfy the peevishness of the Monks, and put an end to the contest. And, at last, giving them the formality of a new choice, he prevailed with them to pitch upon Baldwin. Whereupon Alan, Prior of Christ-Church, with a select number of the Chapter, came to London, with letters of deputation from the whole house; and meeting in the Chapter-house at Westminster, chose Baldwin Archbishop of Canterbury. And that they might not seem to own any thing done already, or assent to the Bishop's election, they sung Te Deum, led the Archbishop to the altar, and saluting him on the cheek, presented him to the King and his sons, when the same ceremony was repeated to him (1).

[B] He was obliged to desist from building the church and monastery of Hackington] The circumstances of this affair merit a particular detail. You are to know then, that the Monks of Canterbury having been troublesome at the late election, the King and the Archbishop projected an expedient to check their influence, and render them less offensive for the future. This was by founding a society of secular Canons, and building a college upon St Stephen's church-yard at Hackington, about half a mile from Canterbury. This college was to consist of twenty canonries, one of which was to be endowed by the King, and the rest by each of the suffragans of the province. These benefices, as they became vacant, were to be filled up by the respective founders. The Archbishop's part was to build the church and the college, for which he had drawn a very magnificent model. The foundation was to be in honour of Archbishop Becket, whose memory and martyrdom made so great a blaze in Christendom; and the King's establishing a Prebend was to be, as it were, a perpetual penance upon the crown for the death of that Prelate. These appearances gave so honourable a colour to the undertaking, that the Pope gave Baldwin a commission to pursue his model, and granted him a fourth part of the offerings made from that day forward at Becket's tomb. But, in truth, the secret of the project was, to draw the election of the Archbishop from the convent of Christ's-church to this new foundation; it being reasonably supposed, that the canons would prove more manageable upon such occasions than the Monks, and be influenced by the directions of their respective patrons. In short, there were great preparations of materials; the building was begun, and carried on with great diligence; and several estates were settled for the maintenance of the Canons. But the Monks at last penetrated the design, and, perceiving how prejudicial it would be to their convent, made a heavy complaint to the Pope upon that subject, setting forth, that the Archbishop designed to strip them of their antient privileges; that his intention in building this collegiate church, was, to make the holy Christm, and consecrate Bishops there, to injure their convent in it's authority and revenues, and to remove the archiepiscopal see to this new foundation. To give this remonstrance the greater force, they complained, that Baldwin was in a manner forced upon them by the over-bearing influence of the Court; that he had shewn himself disaffected to their society; that he had seized the customary presents made to them, deprived them of their advowsons, expelled some of their members, and excommunicated others. The Archbishop, it seems, had sent agents to Rome, to complain of the stubborn and intractable behaviour of the Monks, and particularly their intolerable pride and perverseness in respect to the late election. These commissioners represented, that Baldwin was both their Metropolitan and Abbot; that the Archbishops, in this double character, had all along had the disposal of every thing belonging to the See of Canterbury; that the placing and displacing the Prior, Sub-Prior, and all other officers and members of the society, belonged to them; whence they argued à fortiori, that, if the Archbishop could make and unmake the Prior, other business of less consequence must, of course, fall within his jurisdiction. But, to return to the remonstrance of the Monks. They informed the Pope farther, that the Archbishop had suspended their Prior, and some others of their members, who were sent to his Holiness with their appeal; that he had published an order to forbid the Monks going out of the cloister upon any occasion whatever; that he had sent Clercs into all parts of the kingdom, to preach up a contribution for the new church; that he had brought the crown into his interests, and was become irresistible in his encroachments; that he endeavoured to make the King and the ceremony of crowning King Richard I at Westminster (b). The same year, the King (b) ibid. having given the See of York to his bastard brother Geoffry Bishop of Lincoln, Archbishop Baldwin took this occasion to assert the pre-eminence of the See of Canterbury, forbidding the Bishops of England to receive consecration from any other than the Archbishop of Canterbury (i). The next year, designing to follow King Richard to the Holy Land [C], he made progress into Wales [D], where he performed mass pontifically in all the cathedral churches, and induced several of the Welsh to join the Crusade (k). Afterwards, embarking at Dover, with Hubert Bishop of Salisbury, he arrived at the King's army in Syria; where being seized with a mortal distemper, he died at the siege of Acres or Ptolemais [E], and was buried there (l). His character [F], and the Bishops the judges of the controversy; and that by this means the convent would be brought under this dilemma, either to incur the displeasure of the King and kingdom, or be forced to betray their society, and put a contempt upon his Holiness. But, notwithstanding this application to Rome, the Archbishop went on with his structure, consecrated the church, and installed several Prebendaries. Whereupon the Prior Honorius posted to Rome with all speed imaginable. The King being willing to put an end to the contest, and understanding that the Monks refused to refer the difference to himself and the Bishops, went down to Canterbury, in hopes to bring the convent off from their obstinacy. But the Monks rejected the King's mediation, and alledged in excuse, that the matter lay before the Pope, and could not be referred to any other decision. An accommodation being thus impracticable, the King and the Archbishop sent their agents to Rome; who, besides their instructions, were charged with letters to the Pope from each of the Bishops of the province of Canterbury. The Pope, upon the hearing of both parties, gave judgment in favour of the Prior and Monks, and ordered the Archbishop to restore the Religious he had displaced. Baldwin took little notice of this order, and, instead of restoring the Monks, gave the convent a new provocation by consecrating the Chirm at London. The Monks address his Holiness for relief, and Baldwin receives a menacing order from the Pope to pull down the new church, and proceed no farther in the undertaking. And thus the King, the Archbishop, and his suffragans, were over-ruled by the Pope's authority, and suffered themselves to be baffled by the Monks. Not long after, Pope Urban III being dead, and Gregory VIII advanced to the Papal chair, the Archbishop, expecting more favourable treatment from this Pope, attempted to carry his point another way. To this end he purchased, of the Bishop and convent of Rochester, a manor at Lambeth in Surrey, and ordered all the timber and materials, prepared for the college at Hackington, to be brought thither. And here, where the palace of the Archbishops now stands, he began to build upon the old plan; but did not live long enough to carry it on (2).

[C] — Designing to follow the King to the Holy Land. The Christians in Palestine being hard pressed by the Mohammedan Prince Saladin, and despairing to restore their affairs by their own strength, Baldwin King of Jerusalem sent Heraclius the Patriarch, and the Masters of the Knights Hospitalers and Templars, ambassadors to the King of England, to entreat him to send speedy relief to the Holy Land, and to present him with a Royal Standard, and the keys of our Saviour's Sepulchre, of the Tower of David, and of the City of Jerusalem. They had an audience of King Henry at Reading, where they delivered a very pressing letter from Pope Lucius III. The King promised to let them know his intentions upon the first Sunday in Lent; at which time the Lords spiritual and temporal being convened, the convention came to a resolution, that Philip King of France should be consulted, and so broke up. As for the King of England, he gave all his subjects, both Clergy and Laity, leave to undertake the Crusade. Upon which permission, a great number of Earls, Barons, and gentlemen of note, and, among the rest, our Archbishop of Canterbury, engaged in the undertaking. The next year, the Kings of England and France had an interview; at which time, my author says, the sign of the cross was plainly seen in the sky by all the company; which miraculous appearance encouraged great numbers to the expedition; and, the undertaking being resolved upon, the Kings took leave of each other to prepare for the service (3). But King Henry dying soon after, his son and heir Richard I took upon him the execution of this design, and accordingly transported an army into Palestine (4).

[D] He made a progress into Wales. The Archbishop was accompanied in this journey by Giraldus Cambrensis, who has described it at large (5), with a plentiful mixture of miracles, prodigies, and other superstitious accounts, too tedious and ridiculous to be set down in this place. After his return, he held a council at Westminster, in which he pronounced sentence of excommunication against all who should invade or disturb the rights of the See of Canterbury during his absence (6).

[E] He died at the siege of Acres or Ptolemais. At his arrival in the Holy Land, he found the affairs of the Christians in an ill situation, and the army much distressed by sickness and famine. He was not at all wanting to the cause, but endeavoured to encourage the troops both by his preaching and his purse. Finding himself near death, he made Hubert Bishop of Salisbury his executor, and ordered him to distribute his effects among the soldiers at his own discretion; which office that Prelate faithfully and exactly performed (7).

[F] His character. Giraldus Cambrensis, who accompanied this Prelate, both in his progress thro' Wales, and in his expedition to the Holy Land, tells us (8), he was of a dark complexion, an open and pleasing aspect, a middling stature, and a spare, but healthful, constitution of body; modest and sober, of great abstinence, of few words, and not easily provoked to anger. The only fault he charges him with, is, a remissness in the execution of his pastoral office, arising from an innate lenity of temper; whence Pope Urban III, in a letter addressed to our Archbishop, began thus, Urbanus Episcopus, servus servorum Dei, Monacho ferventissimo, Abbati calido, Episcopo tepido, Archiepiscopo remisso. i. e. Urban, &c. to the most fervent Monk, warm Abbot, lukewarm Bishop, and remiss Archbishop; plainly intimating, that he behaved better as a Monk than as an Abbot, and as a Bishop than as an Archbishop. With respect to his temperance, he is said never to have eaten flesh from the time he became a Monk to his death: concerning which particular, Brompton relates (9), that, once on a journey, he was met by a very lean and skinny old woman; who asking him, if it was true, that he had never eaten flesh, he answered, it was. It is false, replied the old woman, for you have eaten my flesh to the very bones. The Archbishop demanding what she meant, she acquainted him, that some of his officers had taken from her a cow, which was her only support. The Archbishop, not offended at her freedom, promised to repair her loss with as good a cow. I shall subjoin four verses by Joseph of Exeter, (the best Poet of that age, whose book passes under the name of Cornelius Nepos) addressed to Archbishop Baldwin (10).

In numerum jam crescit honor, te tertia poscit
Infula, jam meminit Wigornia, Cantia discit, Romanus meditaturs apex, et naufraga Petri
Ductorem in mediis expectat Cymba procellis.

Now thy vast honours with thy virtues grow,
Now a third mitre waits thy sacred brow.
Deserted Wigorn mourns that thou are gone,
And Kent's glad sons thy happy conduct own.
Now Rome desires thee; Peter wants thy hand,
To guide his leaky vessel safe to land.

BALÉ (JOHN), in Latin Baleus or Baleus, Bishop of Ossory in Ireland, about the middle of the XVIth century, was born the 21st of November 1495, at Cove, a small village in Suffolk, near Dunwich. His parents, whose names were Henry and Margaret, being incumbered with a large family, young Bale was entered, at twelve years of age, in the monastery of Carmelites at Norwich (a); and from thence was sent to Jesus College in Oxford (b). He was educated in the Romish religion; but, afterwards, at the instigation of the Lord Wentworth, turned Protestant [A]. This exposed him to the persecution of the Romish clergy, against which he was protected by Lord Cromwell, favourite of King Henry VIII. But, that Lord being dead, Bale was forced to retire into the Low-Countries, where he resided eight years; during which time he wrote several pieces in the English tongue (c). He was recalled into England by King Edward VI (d), and obtained the living of Bishop's Stocke in the county of Southampton (e). The 15th of August 1552, he was nominated by King Edward, then at Southampton, to the See of Ossory [B]; and, the 25th of March following (f), was consecrated, at Dublin, by the Archbishop of Dublin (g) [C]. He underwent a variety

[A] He turned Protestant.] Let us hear his own account of his conversion. 'In omni literarum barbarie ac mentis cecitate illic et Cantabrigiæ pervagabar, nullum habens tutorem aut Mecenatem; donec, Lucente Dei verbo, ecclesiæ recitari cœpissent ad veræ theologiæ purissimos fontes. In eo autem splendore ortus novi Hierusalem, non à monacho aut sacrificio vocatus, sed ab illustri domino Wenfordo, tanquam a Centurione illo qui Christum Dei filium esse dicebat, serio excitatus, deformitatem meam quam primum vidi et agnovi. Protinûque divina bonitate ab arido monte in floridam ac fecundum Evangelii vallem transferebar; ubi omnia reperi non in arena, sed supra solidam petram ædificata. Unde scelestissimi Antichristi characterem illico abradi, jugaque ejus omnia à me longe projecit, ut esset in fortem et libertatem datum filiorum Dei. Et ne deinceps in aliquo esset tam execrabilis Bestiæ creatura, uxorem accepi Dorotheam fidelem, diviniæ huic voci aulfatans, Qui non continet, nubat (1). — I wandered in utter ignorance and blindness of mind both there (at Norwich) and at Cambridge, having no tutor or patron; till, the word of God shining forth, the churches began to return to the pure fountains of true divinity. In which bright rising of the New Jerusalem, being not called by any Monk or Priest, but seriously stirred up by the illustrious the Lord Wentworth, as by that Centurion who declared Christ to be the son of God, I presently saw and acknowledged my own deformity. And immediately, through the divine goodness, I was removed from a barren mountain to the flowry and fertile valley of the Gospel, where I found all things built, not on the sand, but on a solid rock. Hence I made haste to deface the mark of wicked Antichrist, and entirely threw off his yoke from me, that I might be partaker of the lot and liberty of the sons of God. And that I might never more serve so execrable a beast, I took to wife the faithful Dorothy, in obedience to that divine command, Let him that cannot contain, marry.' Bishop Nicholson would insinuate, that a dislike of celibacy was the grand motive of Bale's conversion. 'He was converted (says he) by the procurement of Thomas Lord Wentworth; tho' (in truth) his wife Dorothy seems to have had a great hand in that happy work (2).'

[B] He was nominated — to the See of Ossory.] We have a very particular account of our author's advancement to this bishopric, his sufferings in Ireland, and his escape from thence, in a piece written by himself, intitled, The Vocation of Joban Bale to the bishopricke of Ossorie in Irelande, his persecutions in the same, and final delyverance. Printed at Rome in 1553, in a black letter, 12mo. Here we are told (3), that our author, who had lived retired at Bishop's Stocke, waited upon the King, who was then at Southampton, about five miles from his living. His Majesty, who had been informed that he was dead, was surprized to see him, and, the bishopric of Ossory being then vacant, summoned his Privy Council, and appointed him to that See: whereupon the Lords present wrote the following letter to our author.

To our very lovinge friende Doctour Bale. After our hartye commendacions. For as much as the Kinges Majestie is minded in consideracyon of your learninge, wysdome, and other vertuous qualities, to bestowe upon you the bishopricke of Ossorie in Irelande presently voyde, we have thought mete both to give you knowledge thereof, and therewithall to lette you understande, that his Majestie wolde ye made your repayre thither to the courte as soon as conveniently ye may, to thende that if ye be inclined to embrace this charge, his Higbnesse may at your comynge give such ordre for the farther proceedinge with you herein, as shall be convenient. And thus we bid you hartely farewell. From Southampton the 16 daye of August 1552. Your lovinge frendes, W. Winchestre, J. Bedford, H. Suffolke, W. Northampton, T. Darcy, T. Cbeine, J. Gate, W. Cecil.

Our author tells us (4), he refused this offer at first, alledging his poverty, age, and want of health. But the King not admitting this excuse, Dr Bale went to London about six weeks after, where every thing relating to his election and confirmation were dispatched in a few days, without any manner of charge or expence. On the 19th of December he set out, with his books and other effects, and arrived at Bristol, where he waited 26 days for a passage to Ireland. On the 21st of January, he embarked, with his wife and one servant, and in two days arrived at Waterford; and from thence went by land to Dublin.

[C] He was consecrated — by the Archbishop of Dublin.] The Archbishop was assisted by the Bishops of Kildare and Down; and at the same time Hugh Goodacre, a particular friend of our author's, was consecrated Archbishop of Armagh. There was some dispute about the form of consecration. The Dean of the Church, Dr Lockwood (*), desired the Lord Chancellor, that he would not permit the form, in the Book of Common Prayer lately set forth in England by Act of Parliament, to be used on this occasion, alledging that it would cause a tumult, and that it was not as yet consented to by the Parliament of Ireland. The Lord Chancellor proposed the affair to the Arch-

of persecutions from the Popish party in Ireland [D]; till at length having intimations given him, that the Romish Priests were conspiring his death, he withdrew from his See, and lay concealed in Dublin (b). Afterwards, endeavouring to make his escape in a small trading vessel in that port, he was taken prisoner by the Captain of a Dutch man-of-war, who rifled him of all his money, apparel, and effects. This ship was drove by stress of weather into St Ives in Cornwall, where our Prelate was taken up on suspicion of treason, but was soon discharged (i) [E]. From thence, after a cruize of several days, the ship arrived in Dover Road, where the poor Bishop was again put in danger by a false accusation [F]. Arriving afterwards in Holland, he was kept a prisoner three weeks, and then obtained his liberty on the payment of thirty pounds (k) [G]. From Holland he retired to Basil in Switzerland; and continued abroad during the short reign of Queen Mary. On the accession of Queen Elizabeth, he returned to England, but not to his bishopric in Ireland, contenting himself with a prebend in the cathedral church of Canterbury (l), to which he was promoted the 15th of January, 1560 (m). This Prelate is author of a celebrated work, containing the Lives of the most eminent Writers of Great Britain in Latin [H], besides several other pieces mentioned in the remark bishop and the Bishops, who agreed in opinion with the Dean. Dr Goodacre wished it might be otherwise, but was unwilling to dispute the matter with them. But our author positively refused being consecrated according to the old Popish form, alledging, that, as England and Ireland were under one King, they were both bound to the observance of the same laws. Upon which, the Lord Chancellor ordered the ceremony to be performed according to the new book, and afterwards entertained the Bishops at dinner (5).

[D] He underwent a variety of persecutions from the Popish party in Ireland. The reader may see a full account of them in our author's own narrative (6), which it would be tedious here to transcribe. We shall only observe, that all his endeavours to reform the manners of his diocese, to correct the lewd practices and debaucheries of the Priests, to abolish the Mass, and to establish the use of the New Book of Common Prayer set forth in England, were not only rendered abortive by the death of King Edward, and accession of Queen Mary, but exposed him so much to the fury of the Papists, that his life was frequently endangered thereby. Once in particular (7), they murdered five of his domestics, who were making hay in a meadow near his house, and would probably have done the same by him, if the Sovereign of Kilkenny, hearing of it, had not come to his defence, with an hundred horsemen and three hundred footmen.

[E] He was taken up on suspicion of treason, but was soon discharged. The accusation was brought against the Bishop by one Walter an Irishman, who was Pilot of the Dutch ship, in hopes of coming in for a share of the Bishop's money, which was in the Captain's hands. When our author was brought to his examination before one of the Bailiffs of the town, he desired the Bailiff to ask Walter, How long he had known him, and what treason he (the Bishop) had committed. Walter replied, he had never heard of, nor seen him, till he was brought into that ship. Then said the Bailiff, What treason have you known by this honest gentleman since? For I promise you he looks like an honest man. Mary, said Walter, he would have fled into Scotland (*). Why, said the Bailiff, know you any impediment why he should not have gone into Scotland? If it be treason for a man, having business in Scotland, to go thither, it is more than I knew before. Walter was so confounded by what the Bailiff said, that he had nothing to reply. In the interim, the Captain and Purser coming in deposed in favour of the Bishop, assuring the Bailiff that he was a very honest man, and that Walter was a vile fellow, and deserved no credit. For the Captain, our author observes, was afraid lest the money he had stripped him of should be taken out of his hands. Thus he was discharged (8).

[F] The Bishop was again put in danger by a false accusation. One Martin, a Frenchman by birth, but an English Pirate, persuaded the Dutch Captain and his crew, that our author had been the principal instrument in putting down the mass in England, and in keeping the Bishop of Winchester, Dr Gardiner, so long in the Tower; and that he had poisoned the King. With this information the Captain and Purser went ashore, carrying with them our author's episcopal seal, and two letters sent him from Conrad Gesner, and Alexander Alefius, with commendations from Pellicanus, Pomeranus, Philip Melancthon, Jo-achimus Camerarius, Mathias Flacius, and other learned men, who were desirous to inform themselves in the doctrines and antiquities of the English Church. They had likewise taken from him the letter from the Council (9), concerning his appointment to the bishopric of Osfory. These things aggravated the charge against him. For the episcopal seal was construed to be a counterfeiting of the King's seal, the two letters were heretical, and the Council's letter a conspiracy against the Queen. When the Captain returned to the ship, it was proposed to carry the Bishop to London; but at length they resolved to send the Purser and one more, with a message to the Council in relation to the affair. However this resolution was dropped; upon our author's strong remonstrances to the Captain, and his agreement to pay fifty pounds for his ransom, on his arrival in Holland.

[G] He obtained his liberty, on the payment of thirty pounds. He was carried into Zealand, and lodged in the house of one of the four owners of the ship; who treated the Bishop with great civility and kindness. He had but twenty-six days allowed him for raising the money agreed upon for his ransom, and could not obtain the liberty of going abroad to find out his friends. In the mean time he was sometimes threatened to be thrown into the common goal, sometimes to be brought before the magistrates, sometimes to be left to the examination of the Clergy, at other times to be sent to London, or else to be delivered to the Queen's ambassador at Brussels. At last his kind host interposed in his behalf, and desired the Captain to consider, how far he had exceeded the limits of his commission, in mistaking a subject of England, with which nation they were not at war. This produced the desired effect, and the Captain was persuaded to take only thirty pounds for the Bishop's ransom, as he should be able to pay it, and so to discharge him (10).

[H] Author of a celebrated work, containing the Lives of the most eminent Writers of Great-Britain in Latin. This work was not published complete at first, but came out at three different times. The author published, first, his Summarium illustrium Majoris Brytanniæ Scriptorum, in quarto. Wesel, 1549. This performance was addressed to King Edward VI, and contained only five centuries of writers. Afterwards he added to these four more, and made several additions and corrections throughout the whole work. The title of the book, thus enlarged, is as follows. *Scriptorum illustrium majoris Brytanniæ, quam nunc Angliam et Scotiam vocant, Catalogus; à Japhetho per 3618 annos usque ad annum hunc Domini 1557, ex Bersa, Gennadio, Beda, Honorio, Bostone Buriensi, Frumentario, Capgrave, Bostio, Burello, Triffa, Tritemio, Gesnero, Joanne Lelando, atque aliis authoribus collectus, et IX Centurias continens: In quo Antiquitates, Origines, Annales, Loca, Successus, celeberrimæque cujusque Scriptoris facta, dicta, consilia, scripta, obitus, et alia scitu non indigna recensentur; reliqua ubique annorum supputatione servata, ut inde tam reproborum quam electorum ecclesiæ ministrorum facta, mysteriis in S. remark [I]. Bishop Bale died in November 1563, in the 68th year of his age, at Canterbury, and was buried in the cathedral of that place (u). No character has been more variously represented than our author's, as will be seen in the Testimonies of authors concerning him [K].

Basil, apud Joannem Oporinum.— I have set down the title at length, because it is the best Analysis of the author's design in this work. It informs us, that the writers, whose lives are there treated of, are those of the Greater Britain, namely, England and Scotland; that the work commences from Japhet, one of the sons of Noah, and is carried down, thro' a series of 3618 years, to the year of our Lord 1557, at which time the author was an exile for religion in Germany; that it is collected from a great variety of authors, as Berosus, Gennadius, Bede, Honorius, Boston of Bury, Frumentarius, Capgrave, Bostius, Bullerius, Trithemius, Gesner, and our great Antiquarian John Leland; that it consists of nine Centuries, comprising the antiquity, origin, annals, places, successes, the more remarkable actions, sayings, and writings of each author; in all which a due regard is had to Chronology: the whole with this particular view, that the actions of the Reprobate as well as the Elect Ministers of the Church may historically and aptly correspond with the mysteries described in the Revelation, the stars, angels, horses, trumpets, thunders, heads, horns, mountains, vials, and plagues, thro' every age of the same Church. There are Appendixes to many of the articles; also an account of such actions of the contemporary Popes as are omitted by their flatterers, Carsulanus, Platina, and the like; together with the actions of the Monks, particularly those of the mendicant order, who (he pretends) are meant by the locusts in the Revelation; ch. ix. ver. 3 & 7. To these Appendixes is added a perpetual succession both of the Holy Fathers and the Antichrists of the Church, with curious instances from the histories of various nations and countries; in order to expose their adulteries, debaucheries, strifes, seditions, sects, deceits, poisonings, murders, treasons, and innumerable impostures. The book is dedicated to Otho Henry, Prince Palatine of the Rhine, Duke of both the Bavarias, and Elektor of the Roman Empire; and the Epistle dedicatory is dated from Basil in September, 1557. On the back of the title page is a print of the author, and under it the following distich and tetrastich:

In February 1559, came out a new edition of this work, with the addition of five more centuries, making in all fourteen; to which is prefixed an account of the writers before the deluge and the birth of Christ, with a description of England from Paulus Jovius, George Lilly, John Leland, Andrew Althamerus, and others. This volume is dedicated to Count Zkradin, and Dr Paul Scalichius of Lika.

In this catalogue of John Bale's works, taken from the author cited in the margin, we have not the titles of each piece at length, but merely the subject, briefly expressed. For example, in the last class, N^o 16, the title at length is; The Apology of Johan Bayle agaynſt a ranke Papiſt, answering both hym and hys Doctours, that neither their Vowes nor yet their Priesthode are of the Gospell, but of Antichrist. And N^o 29 is intitled, The Vocacyon of Johan Bale to the Bishoprick of Ossorie in Irelande, his persecutions in the same, and fmall Deliberance. But, as our author's pieces are very scarce, it was impossible to supply all the titles.

[K] The Testimonies of authors concerning him.] I shall throw together the praises and censures bestowed on Bishop Bale, as they arise. Gesner, in his Bibliotheca, calls him vir diligentissimus, 'a writer of the greatest diligence;' and Bishop Godwin, in his treatise of the Conversion of the Britons to Christianity, gives him the character of a laborious enquirer into the

the British antiquities; Antiquitatum Britannicarum diligentissimus per scrutator. The reverend Laurence Humphrey, in his Vaticinium de Roma, has this distich on our author:

Plurima Lutherus patefecit, Platina multa, Quædam Vergerius, cuncta Baleus habet.

i. e. Luther and Platina discovered many things, and Vergerius same; but Bale detected them all; viz. the errors and frauds of the Papists. Valentine Henry Vogler, in his Introduct. Universal. in notit. Scriptor. c. 22. thinks, 'it will be less matter of wonder, that Bale inveighs with so much asperity against the power of the Pope, when it is considered, that England was more grievously oppressed, by the tyranny of the Holy See, than any other kingdom.' Quod vehementius in Pontificium Dominatum invehantur Baleus, tanto minus forte quispiam mirabitur, quanto gravius præ aliis regnis sacram tyrannidem Anglia fuit experta. But he adds, that, notwithstanding our author had rendered himself so odious to the Papists, yet his very enemies could not help praising his Catalogue of English Writers. Tametsi vero Baleus adeo inivisus fuerit Pontificiis, tamen ipsimet Catalogum ejus de Anglicis scriptoribus coguntur commendare. Bishop Montague, in his Apparat. prim. scilicet. 83. though he censures our author for his unjustifiable freedom in writing and speaking, yet thinks him of credit and weight in many things. Impotentis linguæ et callidissimi scriptor, sed in multis non rejectissimus. Valerius Andreas, in his Pref. Biblioth. Belgic. calls him an impious wretch and a wicked apostate; but at the same time allows him his merit as a writer. Joannes Baleus, homo impius quidem et infamis apostata; nominari tamen hoc loco vel ideo potuit, ut quis è sordibus gemmas legat (12). Vossius charges him with dissimilarity in his accounts of antient writers. Unum scio, in priorum sæculorum scriptoribus non raro Balei fidem claudicare (13). But of all the writers, who have censured Bale, no one has fallen upon him with greater severity than his follower John Pits. Here are a few of those invenomed arrows he has shot at him. Hic Lelandi Catalogum non tam prolixè auxit, quam prodigiosè depravavit. Omnia namque sædissimis mendaciis et calumniis replevit, et opus Lelandi pollutissimo stylo turpiter conspurcavit. Multa habet ille digna quidem hæretico spiritu et ore, sed ab omni urbanitate et morali honestate prorús aliena, et Christianis auribus nonnulla plane indigna.—Ille miser homuncio, præter calumnias in homines, et blasphemias in Deum et sanctos, nihil habet suum, quod notatu dignum judico — In illo sterquilinio sperabam saltem aliquam antiquitatis gemmam me inventurum. Sed Episcopo Gallo infortunator, spe mea-frustratus sum (14) — i. e. 'This writer did not so much enlarge Leland's catalogue, as corrupt it in a monstrous manner. For he has stuffed it full of lies and calumnies, and spoiled Leland's work, by his own barbarous stile. He says many things worthy indeed of the mind and mouth of an heretic, but absolutely void of all civility and moral honesty, some things plainly unworthy of a Christian ear.— If we except his slanders against men, and his blasphemies against God, the poor wretch has nothing of his own, which deserves our notice.— I hoped to have found at least some gem of antiquity in that dunghil: but, more unlucky than Esop's cock, I was disappointed in my expectation.' He gives us some instances of the severity and injustice, with which Bale treats the most famous Doctors of the Church, such as Venerable Bede and St Aldhelm; and of the scurrilousness, which he uses towards Bishops, Monks, and Priests, whom he accuses of hypocrisy, superstition, and the worst of crimes (15). He brands him with the name of Bal or Baal, and calls him an apostate Carmelite Monk, and a married priest. Idolon apud simplices Anglos Joannes Bal, qui se Latine Baleum cognominat, fuit hæreticus Anglus, ab ordine Carmelitarum apostata Monachus, et Sacerdos (salva Lectoris reverentia) maritatus (16). But it will take off from the edge of this author's satire, if we recollect, that he was a zealous Papist, and an exile for his religion; and that he is here declaiming against a writer, who was a furious enemy to the Papists, by whom he had been ill treated, and who never spoke of their religion but with peculiar bitterness and asperity. But to go on with our Testimonies. Dr Fuller says: 'One may wonder, that being so learned a man, who had done and suffered so much for religion, higher promotion was not forced upon him; seeing about the beginning of Queen Elizabeth, bishopricks went about begging able men to receive them. But probably he was a person more learned than discreet, fitter to write than to govern, as unable to command his own passion; and Biliofus Baleus passes for his true character (17).' Wharton, in the preface to his Anglia Sacra (18), tells us, Bale paid very little regard to truth, provided he could increase the number of the enemies of the Romish Church. Veritas Balæo parum curæ erat, dummodo Romanæ ecclesiæ numerum augere posset. And again (19): Clausus vero plerumque oculis Scriptorum Anglicorum atates Baleus definiit. i. e. 'Bale for the most part settled the Chronology of the English writers with his eyes shut.' Bishop Nicholson says: 'The ground-plot of this work (the Script. Brit.) was borrowed from Leland; and the chief of his own superstructure is malicious and bitter invectives against the Papists.— Some have thought his making of books of some little Saxon epistles excusable, and what would admit of an apology. But if we mark him well, he is continually multiplying the writings of all his authors at a very unsufferable and unjustifiable rate (20).' Lastly, Mr Harrington of Christ-church in Oxford, in his preface to the first volume of Wood's Athenæ Oxonienses, passes this censure on both Bale and Pits: 'All good Antiquaries, men of enlarged souls, and of an even temper, however of divers professions, have always been of the same principle: they all equally sacrificed to truth and learning, and suffered not their private opinions to put a bias on their history. And whoever will compare the Cento's of Bale and Pits with the excellent works of Leland and Camden, must necessarily discern, how near an alliance there is between zeal and ignorance, and between learning and moderation.' And again, in the introduction to the second volume: 'Before this age, and somewhat within it, Leland, who, by the command of King Henry VIII, had undertaken to survey and perpetuate books of the antient monasteries, after the dissolution thereof, hath completed that work with so great exactness, that Bale and Pits, who have since attempted the same, have only made use herein of the Gorgon's common eye, and have reflected that single light only upon posterity.' Our author's books are prohibited by the Church of Rome, among those of the first class of Heretical books; and the Index Expurgatorius, published at Madrid in 1667, calls him a most impudent and scurrilous writer against the See of Rome, the Mass, and the Eucharist, and one that is perpetually breathing out poison; for which reason, it forbids the reading any of his works for ever. Scriptor impudentissimus ac maledicentissimus adversus Romanam Sedem, Missam, et Eucharistiam, virus nunquam non spirans; nihil propterea ex ejus operibus unquam permittendum (21).

B A L E S (PETER) the most famous master in the art of Penmanship, or Fair Writing, and all it's relative branches, of his time, in our country. He was born in 1547, and he is styled by Anthony Wood, 'a most dextrous person in his profession, to the great wonder of scholars and others;' who adds, 'That he spent several years in sciences among the Oxonians; particularly, as it seems, in Gloucester-Hall: but that study which he used for a diversion only, proved at length an employment of profit (A).' Nevertheless it seems more likely, that he resided not at that university, so much to attain sciences, as to teach his own art; and that he used it rather for profit than diversion [A]. The earliest account we have of his perfection therein, takes notice

[A] For profit rather than diversion.] As A. Wood affirms not positively, that Bales was a regular student in any college, but only seems to have been in Gloucester-hall; we may give the greater regard of a Micrographical performance, in which the writing was so wonderful small, yet so very legible, that it surprized all who saw it, and honourably advanced his name into the most noted Chronicle of the times (b). This delicate specimen of his art, is also thus celebrated by Mr Evelyn. 'Adrian Junius speaks of that person as a miracle [B], who wrote the Apostles Creed, and beginning of St John's Gospel, in the compass of a farthing; what would he have thought of our famous Bales, says he, who in 1575, wrote the Lord's Prayer, Creed, Decalogue, with two short Latin prayers, his own name, motto, day of the month, year of our Lord, and of the Queen's reign, to whom he presented it at Hampton-Court, all within the circle of a single penny; enchased in a ring and border of gold, and covered with crystal! so nicely wrote as to be plainly legible, to the admiration of her Majesty, her Privy-Council, and several Ambassadors who then saw it (c).' He was also well skilled in many other excellencies of the pen, besides such matters of mere curiosity in miniature, which seem to have recommended him to some employment, upon certain particular emergencies, under the Secretary of State, about the year 1586, when the conspiracies of Mary Queen of Scots with the Popish faction, were discovered. And as Sir Francis Walsingham had other able instruments to unveil the disguised correspondence which passed between them; such as Arthur Gregory, who could unseal a letter, and so dextrously close it again, under the same impression, that no eye could discern it's having ever been opened; and likewise Thomas Philips, whose business was to transcribe and decypher such letters as were written in secret characters; whereof that Queen had no less than three-score tables or alphabets (d): so had the said Secretary also, now and then, need of some one who was expert in the imitation of hands; and could add, according to instruction, any postscript, or continuation of one, in the very form and turn of letters wherein the rest of the epistle was written, to draw out such further intelligence as was wanted for a compleat discovery, from the traitors themselves, of their treasonable intercourse. And as we shall anon observe also from Camden, that Master Bales was famous for this talent, on another extraordinary occasion, which hereafter happened, so it seems he was now employed to exercise the same, sometimes, for the service of the State, in the dangerous machinations aforesaid against it. For some few years after, that is, in 1589, and not long before the death of the said Secretary, Bales, by a friend, got it remonstrated to Mr Randolph the Ambassador, who was intimate with the Secretary, that some preferment which Bales had been led in expectation of, had not been settled upon him, for what he had heretofore performed in behalf of the government, before the said Queen's death (e). And we shall further perceive, that he was several years after in quest of a place at Court, though we cannot find that he ever obtained it. The death of that Secretary might weaken his interest, or make way for other competitors. And it appears also, that he had some occasion given him to write or speak something in defence of accurate penmen, or those who were masters in the art of writing, against the unreasonable and illiberal insinuations of some supercilious or malignant courtier, who would have objected his profession against his promotion; as if Writing was but a mechanic art, and the masters of it, fitter to guide the hands of boys than the heads of men; and though some persons might have been advanced for the dexterity and readiness of their pens, to places of eminence and even titles of honour, yet afterwards they usually affected an inability of exercising that instrument with any degree of elegance, lest, as a French author has observed, they should

to a tradition which has passed among our old Writing-masters, that the best of their profession were wont, in Queen Elizabeth's days, and afterwards, to repair to the universities, and did reside, or were employed in the colleges and schools, to instruct the younger students in the arts of Writing and Arithmetick: In which light, Bales will appear rather a teacher, than a scholar at Oxford; not one who spent several years in sciences there, or practised writing for his diversion only, but only for his profit. Not but there might be a mutuality of instruction or improvement, by such his residence at that seat of the Muses: And as he improved the hands of several in the art of fair writing; so some of them might improve his head with learning, and a taste of some sciences, and more visibly that of Poetry; which we find in his works so often interperfed. In the like obscure manner A. Wood intimates, that John Davies of Hereford was afterwards also sent to the University of Oxford, as if to be a student there; tho' he knows not in what house of learning (1): Whereas it plainly appears, in his own works, that he went for no other end, but to teach the arts of writing and accompts there; and he tells us, that he thrived by it, as one of his brothers named James did also after him, in the same University; to whom, and his brother Richard, likewise master in the same faculty, he has addressed two of his poems (2).

[B] — Speaks of that person as a miracle.] This person seems to have been Francis Alumnus, who wrote the Apostles creed, and the first fourteen verses of St John's Gospel in the compass of a penny, and in full words, which he did in the presence of the Emperor Charles V, and Pope Clement the VIIth, as Genebrand relates (3), and Simon Mayolus out of him; who had in his own possession, such a miracle, as he calls it, or the very same; Nos domi idem miraculum servamus, being his words (4). Such examples render Pliny's account more credible, of the penman who wrote all Homer's Iliad, so very small and close, that it was contained in a nut shell; which Cicero, and others also mention, tho' Lancelotti puts it among his Farfallonis, and reckons it one of the popular errors of Pliny; as a learned author has observed (5): Which he might not so readily have done, had he seen the performances in this kind of Micrography, by those two late famous Scots, John Dundas the father and the son; 'The latter of whom wrote, in the compass of a guinea, the Lord's Prayer, Creed, Ten Commandments, Psalms 117, 120, 131, and 134; Collected for the 10th Sunday after Trinity, Prevent us, O Lord; Prayers for the Royal Family, Clergy, Gentry, and Commonalty; with vacant space for much more.' This curiosity, a late eminent Writing-master says he was possessed of (6); which we take to be the same that we have also seen afterwards in other hands, and is still to be seen; the said writing being preserved in a locket of gold, covered with chrystal, and set round with pearls; and was designed as a present to the late Princess Sophia.

should be suspected to owe their advancement to such an ordinary acquisition (f). Bales did, it seems, sufficiently confute these sophistical objections in that Defence; though his arguments, as well as his adversary's, are but lightly touched upon in the letter aforesaid; and so, as rather to describe their way of thinking in general, than to repeat their particular words [C]. However, that application for some convenient preferment, did not slacken his industry, or avert him from the pursuit of his business; for he taught the sons and daughters of many persons of distinction, some at their own houses, others at his school, situated at the upper end of the Old Bailey; where also some of the best citizens sent their children. Here we find him in the year 1590, and then he set forth in print, the first fruits of his pen, as he observes in his epistle, which he communicated to the Publick, his Writing Schoolmaster, in three parts [D]. From the first of which, shewing how by the contraction of words into literal abbreviations, the pen of a writer should soon learn to keep pace with the tongue of a moderate speaker, Mr Evelyn, as aforesaid, thinks he was the inventor of those Short-Hand cyphers, and other nota furtiva, so much in use among us [E]. And whereby, as a learned foreigner has observed, we Englishmen

(f) Montaigne's Essays.

[C] Their way of thinking in general, than their particular words.] As for Master Bales thoughts in general, they appear to have been, that he conceived, it became every body, who could write, to shew their gratitude, rather than detraction, towards an art, of which they were so constantly in need, and from which, only their own indifferention could hinder them of deriving the greatest advantages; that those who are but meanly accomplished with it, would be worse without it; that a bad hand might be affected by some men, more out of policy to conceal bad sense, than shame of getting good preferment by a good pen; it being less disgrace to such, that they be not understood thro' the badness of their hands, than of their heads: He also thought, that Fame's highest flights were made with those plumes, which have been lent her by good writers; and that the greatest Ministers of state have sprung even out of their own inkhorns. Of which our own history is not wanting to furnish, among others, a very conspicuous example. For there was in the reign of King Henry III, one Mansel, an inferior Clerk, or Priest, who besides fifty promotions, with the cure of souls, rose to expend an annual revenue of four thousand marks; how much more becoming soever, more moderate profits may have been thought, for a penman, no better qualified than with the ordinary fruits of a writing-school (7). Yet such a Penman, whose qualifications, perhaps, at this distance, should not be severely judged of; since he appears to be the same Mansel, whose merits made him a companion for Kings, Queens, and Nobles; and whose, hospitality was such, that he once entertained an illustrious assembly of them, with 700 dishes of meat, in the year 1256 (8); and since he appears to be the same person with that Sir John Mansell, who is described to have been about the same time a faithful counsellor to the said King (9). In short, after Bales had hinted many inconveniences which have happened, thro' the want of fair, distinct, and legible writing, especially to the works of the learned; many having been spoiled at the press, because they could not be read, or transcribed; and more turned to waste paper, for the same reason: He concludes with much the same way of considering this qualification, as another late professor of the art has done; who, in his excellent copy-book, has these words: 'To write a good hand is a fine accomplishment; and is as useful to the gentleman and scholar, as to the man of business: For as a graceful manner of speaking, gives a lustre to good sense; so a bad hand, like a stammering tongue, very often obscures it (10).'

third book is, the Key of Calligraphie; opening the ready way to write fair, in a very short time, &c. invented by Peter Bales: the first of January, 1590; imprinted at London by T. Orwin, &c. in quarto. After this title, follows our author's dedication to the Lord Chancellor Hatton: There are Latin verses before it, by T. Newton, of Cheshire; also in English and Latin, by P. Hunston of Cambridge, and in English, by Tho. Lodge. His rules in the last part, or Key of Calligraphie, are written in verse as well as prose: And indeed we may observe several of his fraternity since, addicted to Poetry; which may be naturally accounted for, from their being so conversant with the Poets; by transcribing their moral sentences, short maxims, and distichs, to set their scholars as copies; which is certainly laudable, to season their youthful minds with elegant admonitions, at the same time that they are forming their hands to business; besides the precepts of any art are well known to be most successfully communicated in verse; which, besides the pleasure of rhyme, is also even thereby, not to mention other advantages, rendered more engaging to the memory, which rhyme so knits up, by the affinity of sounds, that in remembering the last word of one line, we often call to mind both verses; as the critics have judiciously observed (11). Our author concludes his whole work with one epigram, from the book to the reader; and another, from himself to his country-men: The former is as follows.

(11) Sir Philip Sidney's Defence of Poesie; and Mr Dryden's Dedication of his Rival Ladies to the Earl of Orrery.

Swift, True, and Fair, good Reader, I present;
Art, Pen, and Hand, have played their parts in me:
Mind, Wit, and Eye, do yield their free consent;
Skill, Rule, and Grace, give all their gains to thee:
Swift Art, true Pen, fair Hand, together meet;
Mind, Wit, and Eye, Skill, Rule, and Grace to greet.

The second edition of this work was published in twelve, seven years after the former. Among the many verses in our author's praise before it, four copies, or more, were composed by the scholars at Gloucester-Hall; among whom, Edward Michelbourne, a noted Poet of his time, hath two: And there are three or more copies by the students of St John's College, as A. Wood has observed (12).

[E] Inventor of those Short-Hand cyphers, &c. so much in use among us.] A learned Author, who lived at the time that this art of Short-Hand was first invented, or newly revived among us, speaks of it after this manner. 'In this citty, he taught the arts of Calligraphie, or faire writing of divers handes, and characters; and of ciphering, and algorisme; and (which is much to be regarded) the art of Brachygraphie; which is an art newly discovered, or newly recovered; and is of very good and necessarie use, being well and honestly exercised: For by the meanes and helpe thereof (they which know it) can readily take a sermon, oration, play, or any long speech; as they are spoken, dictated, acted, and uttered, in the instant: It hath a good part in the art of Steganographie, and is a principall member thereof (13).'
Master Bales may in effect be called the first inventor among us, of this art, as Mr Evelyn thought him to be; since he was the first who made it practicable, the first who made it commodious,

Englishmen have the reputation abroad, of being the most expert Short-Hand writers in the world (g). In, or not long after the year 1592, he was some how employed in writing for, or to, Sir John Puckering, Lord-Keeper of the Great-Seal; whose servant, as I remember, he some where stiles himself: but it is certain there were several petitions, letters, &c. about that time, written in the fine small Secretary and Italian hands, by this Bales, among that Lord-Keeper's papers; many of which are still in being (b). Among the rest, there are several letters written by one Topcliffe, who was much employed modious, and comprehensible even to children; the first who publicly taught it, and whose method first induced others to build improvements upon his foundation. But his scheme was not indeed the first that appeared in print, by two years; for a learned Physician of Cambridge, Dr Timothy Bright, set forth, so long before him, a little treatise upon the same subject (14), which he dedicated to the Queen; and observes to her Majesty therein, that Cicero accounted it worthy of his pains, and profitable to the publick; to invent a more expeditious kind of character, as we may read in Plutarch's life of Cato the younger. His invention, as he also informs her, was mere English; without precept, or imitation: But it has, in the judgment of ingenious men, been thought difficult to be understood, much more to be put in practice. The improvement made by Bales in his book aforesaid, was to write after the Doctor's characterly words, divided into dozens, by the Roman letter, with certain commas, and other periods or short marks, to be set about each letter in twelve several places, for the distinction of every word. But the love of variety, or ambition after perfection, would not let the art rest here; for about the time of the Queen's death, or soon after, Mr John Willis, a Divine, published a new Art of Stenography, or short Writing, by Spelling Characterie; and he promoted it to many editions; but that greater simplicity from which he had deviated, and the greater multiplicity of which he compounded and perplexed his character, brought it after a course of years, into total disuse, notwithstanding his high opinion of it, and the advantages he imagined others drew from it; notwithstanding that he published it in Latin (15), as well as English; and set forth a schoolmaster besides, to his own art (16). His successor upon this topic, Mr Edmund Willis, a man less conceited of his own offspring, and of clearer conceptions for such a work, produced a neater, and more perspicuous Abbreviation of Writing by Character (17); but not without regard to, and some directions from, Mr Bales's invention. Yet much more popular became the method of Theophilus Metcalfe, whose Essay passed thirty-five editions, or more (18); notwithstanding he also thought it necessary to publish another, which he called a School-Master, to explain it. Thomas Shelton became famous after him for his Tachygraphy; or easy, exact, and speedy short writing: And some years after, he published his Zeiglography; or new Art of short Writing; the former was translated into Latin (19), for the benefit of foreigners. The acute and comprehensive Jeremiab Rich, had a distinguished genius for this sort of contractions, and was so expert in executing his own rules, that the notorious John Lilburne would have acknowledged under his hand, had it been permitted him, that he had minuted down his trial at the Old-Bailey with the utmost exactness. We have the Psalms in his short-hand; his Semigraphy; or Arts Rarity (20), recommended by several hands; and his Pen's Dexterity; approved by both Univerfities. Some have attempted to improve upon him, who still want improvement; and others, by enlarging his Short hand, have been thought to prolong it. The chief excellence in him, and his followers, consists in contracting sentences, by points and marks placed about the characters; still preserving we see, some traces of Mr Bales's device. But others still found room for alterations, and some for amendments. Mr Everard published a Short-hand not long after (21). Mr Noah Bridges set forth his Art of Short and Secret Writing within a twelve month after him (22); and Thomas Heath appeared not long after the Restoration (*). But William Mafon's improvements in the art for above twenty years, has advanced his reputation perhaps above them all. He first grounded himself upon Mr Rich's scheme, in his Pen plucked from an Eagle's Wing; but built more successfully upon a new plan, in his Art's Advancement; or exact Method of Short-Hand, and his Table of natural Contractions, by Persons, Moods, and Tenses, &c. and especially in his last treatise, intituled La Plume Volante; in which he has brought the art nearer to perfection than others who had taken that, or the like path to it. Yet is not Mr Steel, a School-master of Bristol to be overlooked, who has several particulars new and considerable in his Short Writing begun by Nature, completed by Art; manifesting the irregularity of placing the artificial, before the natural, or symbolical contractions, &c. The book consists of three parts; first, the emblems; second, the expression of words concisely, that are not to be emblematically expressed; and third, the contraction of sentences like words. Mr Elisha Coles, who was a School-master in Ruffel-street, near Covent-Garden, and author of two most compendious and well known Dictionaries, published also upon this subject (23) a book which has been deservedly well received; for his brief Account of the Short-Hands extant; his method, less burthenfome than others to the memory; and his new inventions, for contracting of words and sentences; with other ingenious devices, pleasant and profitable: He proposes by a variety of letters, in variety of places, suppose a threefold situation, above, upon, or under a line, real or imaginary, wherein something of Bales is still discernible, to comprehend monosyllables of every sort; has given us some judicious observations upon the schemes of others, and made several commendable advancements of the art in his own. After him Mr William Addy published another Short-Hand with applause (24), and chose rather to improve upon the principles of the ingenious Mr Rich, than to raise a fabrick de novo. He also published the Bible, and, if we mistake not, the Testament, in a beautiful little character, engraved by the curious hand of John Sturt, and bound in a small pocket volume. We should be too extensive upon this subject of brevity, were we to mention all who have refined upon it; seeing that an author who offered a new character, most simple and succinct, above thirty years since, acknowledged he had consulted above thirty short-hand writers then in print, to compose it (25). We shall therefore only mention Mr J. Weston's book, called Stenography completed, or the Art of Short-Hand brought to Perfection, which is now in some vogue; and Dr Byram's scheme, for which we hear he has obtained a patent; tho' he has not made his art yet publick; and conclude with the observation of a learned gentleman, who has also published An Essay towards a further Improvement of Short-Hand; and prefixed to it a discourse, whereby we have been much enabled to deduce the short Succession aforesaid of our Short-Hand writers; and wherein are these words: 'I think, that, both with respect to the cultivation, and practice of such a way of writing, no people upon earth can justly pretend to dispute the pre-eminence with the English. The neighbouring nations, indeed even the most celebrated for skill in other arts, must be reckoned strangers to Short Hand; if not absolutely, yet in comparison with us. Accordingly, Mr Locke says he had been told, that this was an art known only in England (26). And the author of the Essay on Literature, declares, that he scarce ever met with any who understood it in France or Spain (27): 'Though as to the French, I am assured, they have got a Short-Hand book, which was published a good while ago, and is intituled, Tachygraphie, ou l'Art d'ecrire aussi vit qu'on parle, 12mo. But notwithstanding so many of the English have laboured and done worthily in cultivating Short-Hand; and it is now certainly far improved among us, beyond what it was at the beginning; I cannot agree that this art has been yet completed, much less can I agree that it has been brought to the utmost perfection it is capable of (38).'

employed about the country, in ferreting out the Popish Priests and their plots, in those times, and he made some discoveries, which he wanted to communicate in a secret manner; but disliking the use of multiplied alphabets, as a method too tedious, preferred an invention of Bales's, which is called his Lineal Alphabet, or Character of Dashes, as the shortest and simplest he had heard of; wherein every letter was expressed by a single straight stroke, only in different postures and places [F]. We are informed also, by some

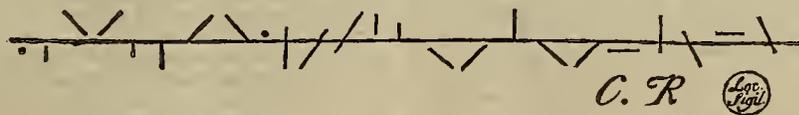

[F] Every letter was expressed by a single straight stroke, only in different postures and places.] We are left to guess at the scheme itself of this improvement in Cryptography, or Stenography, or both, from what has descended to our sight, through very eminent hands, of the like nature, or answering much to the said description. This invention seems to have regarded a double improvement, a short, as well as secret way of writing, at once; and more speedy than any ordinary alphabet; however it may not seem to have been fully intended to answer the design of short-hand; the use of dashes, or single straight strokes for every letter, as in the description of that cypher, implying an inconnection of them, and no abbreviation of words or syllables; no such contraction and concurrence, as we find in those compendious and expeditious characters, which will best hold any pace with the voice. The other part of the description, calling it a lineal alphabet, might partly intend to describe the marks used for the letters themselves, straight strokes being lines of what continuance soever; but might chiefly import, that those substituted marks, which have no distinction of shape, tho' they may of height and disposition, to answer the remainder of the description, as to their posture and place, should be principally distinguished by their vicinity, inclination, and contiguity to, or transgression of, some one or more lines, running quite through, or between them. For example, if you draw an horizontal line as far as it will conveniently receive over it half the alphabet, and dispose of four perpendicular strokes, or dashes, each under a letter; so as one stroke shall be some space above the line; another, come down near it; a third, touch it; and the fourth, pass somewhat through it; they will sufficiently distinguish any four of the letters; then the eight remaining, may be as distinctly signified, by so many straight strokes diagonally disposed, after the same manner; four, sloping to the right, and four, to the left. Thus half the alphabet is accounted for; and it is but doing the like, beneath the line, as you have done above, and you have a most simple, or unperplexed, and compendious supply for the whole. This cypher is so obvious to the eye, so familiar to the hand, and easy to the memory, that a child may learn it without a master. We cannot say positively, that this was exactly Mr Bales's scheme, tho' it may answer the description of it above-mentioned in the text; and therefore we do not offer to give any diagram, or figure of it; for he might use more horizontal lines than one; or fewer dashes, and in more varied positions; so approach nearer the scale of Musick;

which also, by the way, has been proposed to perform the offices of any, or all alphabets, with great advantage; so that the words of a psalm, or a sonnet, might be couched in the notes of it; seeing that two of them only, upon the five bars, will express all the necessary letters; by the use whereof, the instruments of musick, would become the instruments of speech; and all practitioners might parley with, in playing to one another. All lawyers, tergiversants, and other strife-mongers, might then wrangle and scold melodiously; and all instructions, intelligence, conference, and correspondence, vocal or instrumental, might be carried on to some tune. For the learned have presumed, that musical sounds and signs, might not only signify and communicate all letters and words, but all things and notions; that the uttering of them would serve for an universal language, as the writing of them would for a universal character (29); and so the whole globe being turned into an orchestra, we should all live and die in universal harmony. But to return, that scheme which we have seen, as was before said, so much corresponding with the explanation above attempted of that we have not seen, we shall here produce to the reader's sight; as what may not only conduce to the better comprehension, and perhaps to the recovery of Master Bales, but it may be with improvements. We must first observe this more modern scheme differs from that, already proposed to answer the foregoing, not only in one point, which is indifferent, the extending of all the alphabet above the line; but in others, which are material; as varying the position of the signatures, in two instances, and augmenting them in two more: The variations are in having but one distance from the line, and two degrees of perpendiculars that touch it; and the augmentations are, of two parallel lines, and two dots, or full points; which is more complex, less uniform, and deviates more from the name of a lineal character; if the propriety of that expression is to be preserved in the substitutes for the letters themselves, as well as the transverse line which is the rule of direction to them. However, this character has a distinct brevity, and beautiful simplicity in it: 'Tis most easily learnt, readily written, and not readily discovered. The said cypher, in it's original, with it's alphabetical key over it, is still to be seen, under the hand and seal of King Charles I, as he inclosed it in one of his letters to Edward Somerset, Earl of Glamorgan, dated at Oxford, April the 5th, 1646 (30). In which letter, the conclusion is written in this character, interpretable by the said key; which are as follow,

You will more easily decipher it by that key, than by all the rules in Mr Falconer's Cryptomenyfis Patensata (31). That Earl of Glamorgan, soon after Marquis of Worcester, published not long after the Restoration, an ingenious little book, full of rare improvements in art; and among his secret ways of writing, or communication, he has undoubtedly described this in the following words:— 'A cypher and character, so contrived, that one line, without returns, and circumflexes, stands for each, and every of the twenty four letters; and as ready to be made for one, as the other.' And the title he gives it, in his table of contents, is, 'A one line cypher (32).'

some of our best Antiquaries in the profession, and those who have been most conversant in the works of our ancient Calligraphers, that he was one of the earliest Writing-Masters among us, who had his pieces engraven upon copper plates [G], and printed off at the rolling-

[G] He was one of the earliest Writing-Masters among us, who had his pieces engraven on copper plates. When Jodocus Hondius, who was a fine Penman himself, as well as Designer, and Engraver, undertook to collect and engrave several copies from his own writings, and those of the most celebrated 'masters of the pen in Europe, he seems to have invited Master Bales, among the rest, to communicate some specimen of his performance, in a size proposed, to make a regular and uniform copy-book; and we are informed by a late famous professor of the art, who was very curious in his enquiries after our ancient improvers of it, that those copies of the several masters engraven by Hondius, appeared in 1594 (33). The same author, in that Essay from which we receive this intelligence, having ranked Mr Bales, as earliest in time, at the head of the English masters, who published their works at the rolling-press, says again, That 'his, with Mr Mar-
'tyn's, and other pieces, made part of a copy book 'engraven by Hondius; one of which, with many 'valuable fragments in it, I have, says he, in my 'collection (34).' The edition of Hondius his book which we have seen, was published twenty years after that date above (35), and among other copies written by the admired J. Vauden Velde, Hondius himself, J. Honthufius, Solomon Henrix, one of whose pieces is dated 1594; besides Pælix Van Sambix, E. Goos, Il Curione in Roma, J. Beau Chefne of Paris, and M. Martyn, our countryman; there is also one piece subscribed with the name of Peter Bales: It is written in the Latin tongue, and in the English character; but it is very probable that there were more of his copies engraven and printed in that manner; and we have read, that many such valuable pieces of his writing were published by Hondius as aforesaid. Howbeit, when fame had found a channel through his example, for this kind of publication, other artists of his own country, by their labours kept it open, for the stream to refine in, as it rolled down to us. It has been thought, that the reason our countrymen did not appear earlier in publick, with their writings, by this means of letter-graving on copper, was their not having the Rolling-press in England, 'till it was introduced from Antwerp, by Mr John Speed, about the year 1610; as a late author has furnished (36). But we certainly had the custom by some engine or other, to print off copper plates, tho' not in Calligraphy, long before that time, and even before Justus Lipsius is reported to have invented it; tho' the use of it might not be so common in England as abroad. Among those who followed the steps of Master Bales, Mr John Davies of Hereford was not the least conspicuous, who has been celebrated for his fast, fair, close, and various writing, of the Secretary, Roman, Court, and Text hands, by Dr Fuller (37), who says, he could also flourish matter, as well as letters; and with his fancy, as well as with his pen: Indeed he published several books of Poetry, as may be seen elsewhere (38); and some few of penmanship (39); something also In Laudem Artis Scriptoriae. The praise he sought as a Poet, obstructed his acquiring much profit by his practice as a Penman, tho' he had taught his art successfully at Oxford; where Magdalen College was his best beloved patroness; as in one of his poems, addressed thereto, he confesses (40): He was also some time tutor in his art to Prince Henry, as he writes before one of his copy-books; and elsewhere, calls the Lord Chancellor Ellesmere his good Lord and Master (41). He certainly envied Master Bales the credit of that golden pen, we shall hereafter mention him to have won from one, or more competitors in the art; but in divulging his malignity, Mr Davies has exposed his own Disposition, more than the other's Reputation; by not only falsely traducing him in the character of a fair writer, but against all laws of humanity, made his inculpable exigencies the subject of lampoon; and in many other instances, justified the epigram that was composed by another Poet upon him; wherein it is said, he would make a good author, if he could pen, as well as he could write (42); as he has recorded himself, against himself; and in his

Scourge of Folly, shewed the scourging of his own. He died about the year 1618, and was buried in St Giles's in the Fields. His countryman, J. Geringe, was a man of more modesty, and brought the art to greater perfection; some of his plates were graven in the year 1615. And Martin Billingsley, another eminent hand, whose works were also well received (43), is commonly joined with him in the applauses which were payed to the art, or those who excelled in it, by some noted Poets of their time. Not long after, William Comley of Henley, published his Copy-Book of the most useful English Hands; with an Alphabet of the Capital Text Letters: To which is joined, A new Alphabet of the Capital, Roman, Knotted Letters; fit and ready to set any manner of hand to: And there is further joined, A Book of the Secretary and Round Hands; with another Alphabet of Capital Antique Letters (44), as he calls them; being composed of human postures; afterwards imitated by succeeding publishers, in a smaller size; that youth might, with writing, learn drawing at the same time. Speedily after, Mr David Browne, an ingenious Scotchman, addressed his Examples of Fair Writing to King James (45), whose Scribe, he styles himself. His work is said to have been printed at the letter-press, but more probably was from wooden blocks, like the foregoing author's; whose method also he seems to follow, in leaving blanks for learners to fill up. Afterwards Mr Goodere, Richard Weston, and Peter Gery (46), kept up the art in it's various excellencies with good commendation; and it was carried on in this flourishing state till the death of that great ornament of it, Mr Thomas Faye, who had a curious felicity in all his performances, but could not be induced to make them publick. Edward Cocker, on the contrary, was thought too general a publisher; he was the engraver of his own writings; and some of them on silver plates: He first published in the early part of his life; and before Oliver Cromwell died. We have at least fourteen or fifteen copy-books of his in print (47); for he kept writing and printing himself off, 'till the time of his death, which was about the year 1677. Mr Evelyn having mentioned Mr Geringe, Billingsley, Gery, and Cocker, says of them, 'That what they published of letters and flourishes, 'are comparable to any of those masters whom we 'have so much celebrated among the Italians and 'French, for Calligraphy, and fair writing (48).' But then followed such an incontinency of publication and piracy, that the very press groaned under the prostitution of the art. Passing over therefore Mr Watfon, James Seamer, J. Hodder, J. Fisher, Louis Hughes, M. Johnson, besides others; who indulged their pens so much in springing of capitals, knottings of figures, penicilling of flourishes; in twirling and tangling the heads and tails of letters together, with such extravagance; and in hunting a single line through such unnatural, perplexing, and tedious labyrinths, as no eye could follow without pain; we shall only mention those who retrieved the art from these exorbitant fancies, and attired it in that most unaffected and becoming dress it now wears. Among the first, appears to be Col. John Ayres, who introduced the plain, neat, Bastard-Italian-hand, and by the assistance of Mr John Sturt, that excellent letter-graver, carried the glory of English penmanship far beyond those who went before him (49). Then also Mr Eleazar Wigan charmed his readers with boldness and volubility in command of hand: Mr John Seddon (50), with the choice variety of his fruitful fancy, and neatness in his compositures: Mr Booting, who excelled most, when he copied most: Mr Peter Story, an universal artist, but peculiarly eminent for his masculine and beautiful disposition of large and elaborate pieces; as were the Dundaffes, for the marvellous minuteness of their writings, before taken notice of. These were followed by the late Mr Charles Snell, George Shelley, John Clarke, and Robert More, to whose Essay before quoted, we have been much indebted for several parts of this brief Descend of his famous predecessors. The former of these, Mr Snell, published several pieces (51), and so rigidly opposed all moderate use of those decorations, even under due

rolling-prefs; wherefore he is ranked the foremost amongst those English masters of the pen, who have, by such publications, rendered themselves capable of being marshalled according to their seniority, and judged of according to their merits, by those of their successors who have gratefully undertaken to preserve their memory. On Michaelmas-day in 1595, he being then forty-eight years of age, had a great tryal of skill in the Black-Fryars, with one Daniel Johnson, for a Golden Pen, of twenty pounds value; and won it, though his antagonist was a younger man by above eighteen years (i), and was therefore expected to have the advantage of a greater steadiness, or other command of hand. We are further told by a contemporary author, that he had also the Arms of Calligraphy given him, which are, Azure, a Pen, Or, at a prize, where solemn trial was made for mastery in this art, among the best penmen in London (k), which being a tryal among more opponents than one, this, wherein the said arms were given to him, should seem different from that, wherein he won the golden pen of Daniel Johnson aforesaid. That is the first contention we meet with for the golden pen, though other memorable ones have since occurred [H]. In 1597, when he republished his Writing School-Master, he was in such high reputation for it, that no less than eighteen copies of commendatory verses, composed by learned and ingenious men of that time, were printed before it, as A. Wood has observed (l). He also, by other exercises of his pen, recommended himself to many other persons of knowledge and distinction; particularly by making fair transcripts of the learned and ingenious compositions of some honourable authors, which they designed as presentation-books to the Queen, or others their friends or patrons, of high dignity: some of which Manuscripts have been, for the beauty of them, as well as for their instructive contents, preserved as curiosities to these times. We know not very particularly, what other branches of the art he cultivated, more than that we shall, in our future observation, find him distinguished also with the title of a Scrivener, as if he had sometime professed the business of writing contracts, or drawing deeds, or other instruments; unless the signification of that word was not then so confined as it is now, to that particular business, but was used in a general sense, as the word Scribe sometimes is, to signify a practitioner in any branch or degree of penmanship. A. Wood was not sufficiently acquainted with the matter of fact, to represent it with due distinction, when he said that Bales was engaged in the Earl of Essex's treasons in the year 1600 (m), as if he was an adherent to that unfortunate nobleman, or instrumental in promoting his tumultuous insurrection. The truth is, he was innocently engaged, in serving the treacherous purposes of one of that Earl's mercenary dependants, named John Danyell of Dersburie

(i) An Account of this Tryal of Skill, written by Bales himself, was preserved in a MS. Vol. in Bishop Stillingfleet's Library, No. 216, as the late Bishop Tanner has remarked in one of his MS. Note-Books, now in the Hands of Mr Joseph Ames, Secretary to the Soc. of Antiquaries.

due propriety and regulation, in his rules, tho' he retained them in his practice, that the others, his contemporaries, therein opposed him; and restored the use of judicious embellishments upon proper occasions. For Mr More admonishes the Ornamentator to be upon his guard, lest he merits the character of a fancy-monger; and says, he must have regard to time, place, and circumstances; that the sportive faculty must be banished the court of business, and he must neither ludere cum seriis, nor paratragœdiare in trifles (52). Mr Shelley having made a glance at engrossers of reputation, says of ornaments in fine Penmanship, as the divine Herbert does of Poetry, with some alteration,

A knot may take him, who from letters flies,
And turn delight into an exercise (53).

Agreeable to whom, Mr Clarke was rather for correcting the false taste of ornament, than abolishing a true one; and has given good directions for conduct, in his arguments, as well as good improvements of the more essential part, fine writing itself, in his own copies of it (54). Under these masters, and one or two more, whose works gained them a character of supremacy in their profession, in the reigns of Queen Anne, and his late Majesty (55), the fair Italian, and especially, the free Round-text, and the Round hand, those two genuine parents of the free, most commodious, and most expeditious hand of business, which we call a Running-hand, prevailed over all others, and were brought to that perfection they are still preferred, or even improved in, by those masters who are the ornament of the art at this day; above twenty of whom have permitted many curious pieces of their writing to be engraved and published, not many years since, in a fair and elegant volume together (56); which being written and printed, from the top of the pages to the bottom, like the generality of other books, and not from end to end of the leaf, or in the oblong form, as the practice of our Writing-Masters, from the example of the old foreigners, has before been; and there being also enough of the leaves in that collection to gain them the preservation of binding

ing, the impression will not be so liable to be lost, or soiled, and torn, as the works of our best Penmen usually in a few years are, thro' the publication of them in the manner aforesaid, most liable to all the casualties of destruction.

[H] Other memorable ones have since occurred.] Among which none was perhaps more remarkable than that trial for a golden pen, made within the memory of many living, between one Mr German, a Writing-Master of note in Queen Anne's reign, and one of the six, at that time most celebrated for the art; but whether it was Mr Snell, or Mr More, we cannot now positively recollect. It seems there was a competition between German and More; and the former insisted, that the latter should set the copy, which More did in these words:

As more and More our understanding clears,
So more and more our ignorance appears.

German fell short in his art, as well as his wit of this antagonist; but in the judgment given for the golden pen, it was said, that the umpires found such an equality of excellence in the two copies, that they could not, for some time pronounce a determination, till one of them espying in Mr German's piece, the omission of one single point, only the title of an i, they gave their verdict against him, and so he lost the prize. The said Mr More has made some ingenious reflexions upon such like vain and impotent oppositions, as are made against those who have approved themselves masters of their Art, upon the occasion of what was first begun by that Daniel Johnson against Bales; where he says, 'Art with me is of Party. A noble emulation I would cherish, while it proceeded neither from, nor to malevolence. Bales had his Johnson, Norman his Mason, Ayres his (57) Matlock and his Shelley; yet art the while was no sufferer. The busy-body, who officiously employs himself in creating misunderstandings between artists, may be compared to a turn-stile, which stands in every man's way, yet hinders nobody; and he is the slanderer, that gives ear to the slander.'

(57) So in the last edit. of Mr More's Essay on the Invention of Writing, &c. p. 5. In the first edit. before his friend Mr Shelley's second Part of Natural Writing, it is only A—bad his S—, which seems rather to be meant for Mr Snell. Quere, How it is in the second edition? when we know Mr More was alive, and whether he died not before the Third!

(o) An Abstract whereof, may, or should appear, in the Book of Star-Chamber Cases, which we have not at present leisure to consult.

Deresburie, Esq; as he files himself. This man, resolving out of the distresses of his Lord, to raise a considerable addition to his own substance, already sufficient, being worth, by his own confession, above twenty thousand pounds (n), contrived, in compassing the same, through his deceitful procurement of Bales to imitate some of that Earl's letters, which he would have sold to his Lordship's enemies, as he did the copies to his friends for a large sum of money, contrived, I say, the absolute loss of his own estate, liberty, and reputation, the compleat ruin of himself and his family; being sentenced in the Star-Chamber, upon the evidence of Bales, and other witnesses, in June 1601, to pay a fine of three thousand pounds, for which his whole effects were extented, also to be exposed on the pillory, and endure perpetual imprisonment besides, for his said forgery, fraud, and extortion. As this will appear a notable example, how a comfortable and creditable competency may be destroyed, by covetous and dishonourable courses to augment it, 'twill deserve a more ample Memorial than has been hitherto divulged in print; not only to deter others from the guilt of any such like imposition, but to clear Master Bales from having any guilty hand in this. He was indeed, for a short time, under some confinement, that they might be certain of his evidence at the tryal; and we find also, that Bales wrote a large Declaration to the Countess of Essex, and, it seems, at her request or command, wherein he set forth the whole manner of his engagement, and the justification of his conduct in this business; which narrative would no doubt have laid open this black contrivance (o) to our full satisfaction. But though we shall be chiefly obliged for the particulars thereof, to another Declaration also in manuscript, written by that criminal himself [I], this cunning contriver of his own ruin; yet were he calmly to have revised,

[I] We shall be obliged for the particulars thereof, to another Declaration in manuscript, written by that criminal himself] The said author, John Danyell, was a different person from that John Daniel, who was a Master of Arts at Oxford, in the beginning of King James the First's reign, and a publisher of some musical compositions; also different from that John Daniel, who was brother to Samuel Daniel, the noted Poet and Historian; and publisher of some of his poetical works, after his death, towards the latter end of the same reign; nor yet the same with that John Daniel contemporary with this last, who published several sea-charts, or maps of the coasts of England, and other countries. But this John Danyell of Deresbury (58), whereof we are further to speak, having served the Earl of Ormond in Ireland above twenty years, procured to be recommended by him to the Earl of Essex, for some employment under his Lordship, or in the court. He mentions a preferment or two, which he expected thro' the Earl's means, but failed of; and appears to have been very diligent in procuring advantageous leases, or purchases of several parsonages in Cheshire: He cites two letters, he says the Earl wrote to the Dean and Chapter of Christ Church in Oxford, the one in May 1594, to favour him in renewing a lease of the rectory of Runcoine in that county, and the other in July following, wherein the Earl appears to recommend his servant T. Brook to the same, adding, — 'I understand that one Danyell, pretending a desire to take a lease of certain concealed tithes, hath, under that colour, got certain hamlets, which were before demised in my servant's lease, and now seeketh to take advantage against him, upon some words mistaken; wherein my servant is chiefly to be helpen and relieved.' He pretends also the Countess had written several letters against him to the Lord-Keeper about that lease; and that for these disappointments, his expences, and loss of time, in service and attendance upon them, he looked upon the Earl and his Lady to be greatly indebted to him. The first step he took to make himself reparation, was to marry the Countess's gentlewoman, with whom, as he insinuates, he received hopes of an handsome portion: He cites the release, which the Countess gave his wife for eight thousand pounds, and all other accounts that had passed between them, dated in May 1596. And in 1598 appears to have solicited the Earl for a commission, or company of soldiers in Ireland, through the mediation of Sir Edward Dyer; who, by his answer, seemed not very forward to espouse his pretensions. But through the interest of his father-in-law, Sir Guyllyam Merrycke, his Lordship was persuaded to stand godfather at the christening of one of his children, which was termed the first badge of his Lordship's favour or reconciliation. But he never received further countenance or confidence of trust, in any negotiations of importance; nor recompence for his services, or preferment with his wife, as he says, except some plate at their marriage, and at the christening of two of his children. But when the fatal impetuosity in that Earl's disposition, gave way to further inflammations by his parasites and incendiaries; till at last he made that turbulent eruption, in order to remove an opposite party at the court, which proved the cause of his untimely end; Danyell found an opportunity to throw his angle into the troubled stream; resolved to raise himself a profit upon the Earl's ruin; and that, out of some letters written by his Lordship to his Lady, which fell into his hands. Some of those letters, were eight or nine years old; mentioning matters of affection, and perhaps courtship; some expressed his dislike of divers persons; others treated of some solicitations made to, and transactions with, or for him; some contemning the time he spent at court, and shewing his desire of a private life; others describing his loathsome and unpleasent employments; and in many of them, a continual impatience and disquiet of mind. Danyell pretends he could not read any of these letters, till Bales had copied them; to serve a purpose which will hereafter appear. Indeed the Earl, like many others who write in great hurry, was apt to make his pen, in some syllables, or terminations of a word, dwindle away oftentimes into a scrawl, or strait line; but nothing so illegibly as is here pretended, by a man who had been conversant with him at least six years, and could give us the purport of his letters above, and make quotations from two of them, written to his Lady from Ireland, in August 1599; from the one, as follows, — 'The Queene's commandment in her servyces may breake my necke; but my enymes practyces shall never trouble my hearte.' And these words from the other, — 'I trust, () or longe, to reduce Ireland to a peaceable government; if the traytors of England, be not confederates with the traytors of Ireland.' And yet there was nothing in these letters that the Law took exceptions at, to the Earl's detriment at his trial; tho' Danyell, to terrify his afflicted Lady into a compliance with his barbarous extortions for them, falsely threatened her he could sell them to his Lordship's enemies, the Lord Cobham and Sir Walter Raleigh, for three thousand pounds (59); and the counterfeits he imposed upon her, for which he gave him more than half that money, might aggravate the Earl's rashness, and consequently his guilt; therefore the covetous impostor escaped no kind of reproach when his deeds were detected, and suffered the censure for them without any compassion. Thus much was thought necessary to be premised of this story, that our readers might not be misled by his palliated representation of it. They may therefore now behold the juggle in the shape and colours he has transformed it into, for want of Master Bales's more ingenious discovery; and these are Danyell's words. — 'About the 20th of October 1599, I found bie chance, under my bed, in my house, then at Charing Crosse, a verie fayre caskett covered with purple velvet and laced with gould lace, which I thought strange in that revised, and at sufficient distance of time had thought maturely on it, he might have perceived that place; and fynding the same easie to be opened, I satysfied my dysfyre; wherein appeared letters, sent from the late Earle to his Ladie, wrytten in such a hand as I coule not reade. But whylest I was thus perusing these letters, my wyffe, being abroad, came fudenlie into the howse; so that I tooke onlie one bundle of those letters hastellie out of the caskett, and sett the caskett under the bed agayne, locked with the ffall of the cover, for it was a spring locke; which bundle of letters I carried into my studie, where yt remayned careleslie above three monethes, before I dyd any thynge with them, for I could not understand the contents of any of them. Befydes I havinge, as many thousands then had, an absolute opynyon of the Earle's fidelitie and allegiance to her Majestie, state, and countrie, could not be brought to ymagyne that hys Lordship had any evell thought to any of these, untill, by some specyall intelligence, I had notice that hee was very dysfyrus to accept of any condycions, to have friendship with some, whom before he termed hys enemies. Which thinge I thought could hardlie procede from hym, unlesse there were greater cause then was generally conceyvid, or I before could ymagyne. Thereupon I began to feare the event, and a lyttle to looke about me, whether there were matter in the letters that myght endanger mee; and having taken the sayde bundle of letters as aforesayd, I revewed the same, and styll fynding that I could not reade them, was much troubled how to understand the effect of them. In this tyme of delyberacion, the Countess sent for her caskett; which was delyvered to her kynswoman, and Gentleman-Usher, beinge both sent for them, to my wyffe, in a coche, about the 7 of Januarie, 1599. But the next day after, the Countesse of Essex came to my house herselfe, and demanded her letters myssing, which I purpofelie concealed, both from the Countesse, and from my wyffe; for I was resoalved to use meanes to understand the contents of them, before they were delyvered to the Countesse, or to any other. But when the Countesse perceyvid that I denied her letters, then sayd she, I must tell my Lord of them, if it were my owne mother that had them; ffor he hath dysfyred to have a fight of them, and I told hym, they were in your wyffe's keepynge; therefore, now they are gone, I must tell hym how the matter ys; otherwyse, I shall be condempned, although I know there ys noe bad matter in the letters, neither against her Majestie, nor State; but onlie, because my Lord hath alreadye dysfyred to have a fight of them; therefore, I pray, make diligent search for them among your servants: And foe departed, not then very much dyspleased, as yt seemed to me. But the next day, both I and my wyffe, were dyverslie folycyted from the Countesse; and at the last, in some sortte, there was a thousand pounds offered for the letters myssing; which I feared to accept, or to be known of having any of the letters. For bie thys large offer I had caule more and more to suspect the Earle's doings; whereof, after some consyderation had in that behalfe, aboute the tenth of February then next following, I took four or fyve of those letters out of the bundle, and went with them to Mr Peter Bales, ye Scryvener; who, perceyving that I could not reade them, endeavored, by all meanes, to make me understand the contents of them. But then, I was to devyce, in what manner I should remove all suspycyon, either how I came bie those letters, or els, to what purpose I mente to converte them. Therefore, to colour the same from Bales; I told hym, That thys employment was done by the Countesse of Essex; and bye that meanes, I kept from hym my intent and purpose; which was, that yf there hapned matter of state, or fytt matter to be dyscovered out of any of the letters, I would have manifested the same to her Majestie. But then I was to travell a litle further, and to devyse in what manner I should understand the rest of the letters, which were aboute twenty six in number; and those, I was unwilling that Bales should be acquainted withall; for then hee myght have endangered mee, bie makinge the fyrst discovery, and so have reaped the fruytes of my travell, yf there had chanced any matter of State in the rest of the letters. So that I willed Bales to ymytate the sayd Earle's hand-wrytynge as neare as he could, both in the lynes, letters and supercryption; which I did, to obscure my secret determination from hym: And hee willinglie performed all my dysfyre, in wryting those letters dyvers tymes; as I appoynted hym; especyallye one letter. But let me here remember the opynyon of some, that have condempned mee, for that I dyd not cause Bales, at the fyrst, to wryte the Earle's letters playnlie, which they thinke had been better and redyar to teach mee to reade the letters I brought to hym, and that therefore thys my longe dyscryption of learning to reade the sayd letters should be idle and vayne; whych cannot be denied, as some understand yt to bee in the letters which I brought to Bales. But I would gladlie know how you can devyse to learne the reading of those letters which I dyd not bringe to hym, for the causes before remembered: Therefore, for my parte, I could fynd noe better meanes than to have Bales ymytate the Earle's hand-wrytynge, which brought me to thys perfectyon, that by talyng the best of Bales imytations, and using them as carefctores to the rest of the letters, I found these benefyts; fyrst, bie perusing Bales, in wrytinge the sayd letters often over, I was reasonable perfect in makinge the letters known to me. Then before he left mee, I could reade those fyve letters soe perfect, that I dyd dyctate some letters as he wrote them. Thyrdlie, beinge afterward at Ritchmond; I used the best of Bales ymytations as carefctores to the rest of the letters; whereof I wrote four or fyve copies, with stoppes (), which I sent to the Countesse. Fourthlie, and before that tyme, I found matter which served my turne, to prove Bales meaning towards mee, in the tyme of his wryting those letters; and therobie freed myself from the Cunstable, bie using these words in one of the letters before remembered, viz. The Quene's commandment, &c. which wordes, for my remembrance, I wrote forth with my owne hand, and caused Bales to incert those wordes into dyvers of hys copies, because I myght, at one tyme or other, take occatyon to prove Bales meaning towards me; which I did, not for any doubte I made of the wordes to be matter of State, but to prove from tyme to tyme how Bales was disposed towards me; for he gave me greate cause to sussepte hym, in speakinge one tyme to me very particularlie, saying, That if he had found matter of state in the letters, hee would have sent for a Cunstable and arrested mee. Then he asked mee what I ment, to have him copy those letters? I sayd, That the Countesse of Essex willed mee. But why doe you cause mee to wryte one letter soe often, said hee, and so lyke a hand you cannot reade? I answered, That I ment to geve some a gull; ffor I gulled hym, in that hee beleevved mee, tuching the Countesse commandment; which fyctyon I made, for feare of a Cunstable; for at that tyme I had all the bundle of letters about mee. But when he told me, that Mr Wiseman folycyted the Earle of Essex, to have a Clarke's place in the Courte for hym; as I take yt, to be Clarke to her Majestie, of her Highnes bills to be signed, yf I be not deceyved; for these causes, I had some reason to doubt his delinge; and otherwise, I had used hys help in readinge some part of the letters concealed. But fynding hys affectyon, and seeing his dyspofytion, I had more reason to seeke meanes to escape the Cunstable, then to hassard my estate, by engaging myselfe into the danger of foe craftie a person; which might easelie have hapned dailie, yf he had found matter of state in any of the letters. Nevertheles, yt ys fallen more beavrelie upon mee, in another kynd, then I dreamed of; not onlie bie Bales meanes, but unfortunately wrought by sundrie devyces, beyond my expectation: I beinge more carefull, to preserve the credyt and reputacions of others, then to preserve the estate of mee, my wyffe and chyldren, am taken in a snare, bie comytting my tonge to sylence; and bie sufferinge one halfe of my determination to be obscured; much lyke the man that alleaged these wordes of the Psalme, Non est Deus, but omittinge the preceding wordes, Dixit insipiens, in corde suo: As the Nun did, bie readinge Omnia probati, but never turned the leaffe.

(60) This is the same P. Ferriman whose Letter is before quoted; and the same, to whom J. Davies in his Scourge of Folly, p. 200, directs an epigram; declaring, that, thro' love, this Peter keeps the Keys of his Heart's Heaven, and yet is locked in.

' So that, henceforth, I never used Bales further, in thys busynesse; nor, sythence that tyme, had I any dealing with hym; untill he, and one Peter Ferriman, aboute the last of March 1600, made meanes to borrow twentie pounds of mee for six monethes; which motyon, at the fyrst, I enter- tained; but when I heard Ferrimans (60) bond was lyttle worth, then I refused to deale further with them; but yf I had knowen, or suspected myselfe to be in eyther of theyre dangers, yt had been a fmeale matter for mee, at that tyme, to have lent them 20 pounds, wherbie I had escaped theyr con- spyracies; which I little esteemed, because I could not ymagyne, that these matters would, bie any meanes, have growen to foe high a poynte; con- sydering that neyther my intent, act, nor any part of my meynage, could, bie any meanes, worke in the Earle any such cause of dycontentment, or any such cause of offence to the lawes of this land, as is now conceaved and devulged, bie some to be agaynst her Highnes lawes, as matter of state, and the chaffe cause of the Earle's overthrowe; which I will labour to manifest hereafter. But when Bales was denyed twentie poundes, hee pre- sentlie combined with Ferriman, and devised a Declaration; conteynyng, and amplyfyng the man- ner of my dealing with hym, about the sayd letters, and delyvered the same to her Ladiship, about the 2d of Apryll; which came not to my knowledge, tyll about the Earle's arraignment: So that thys Declaration comyng then to the late Earle hys hands, was never publlyshed, but kept secrett, from the second of Aprill 1600 tyll the eight of Februarie followinge; at which tyme, the Earle, being at Essex-houffe the day of hys pretended action, before the Lords, and a greate multitude there assembled, pronounced these words (61); viz. *That hys lyffe was sought; that hee should have ben murdered in his bedd; that hee had ben perswyouslie delate with; that hys hand had ben counterfeyted, and letters awrytten in hys name; and that therefore they were there assembled to defend their lyves; with moche other speech to the lyke effect: Hereupon the Lord Cheyffe Justice sayd unto the Earle, that yf hee had any such matter of greyffe, or yf any such matter were attempted, or purposed agaynst hym, hee willed the sayd Earle to declare yt; assuring hym that yt should be trulie related to her Majestie, and that yt should be indyfferentlie heard; and justice should be done, whosoever yt concerned. Thys offer of the Lord Cheyffe Justice, dyd not then agree with hys Lordship's purposes; for he ment to endeavour another matter, as hath ben spread abroade; and knew the truth to be otherwyse, as hys Devynes have sett forth, that hymselfe verie honourable confessed at hys last breath, in hys humbled mynd, which shall appeare more at large in another place. But to returne to my purpose, after I had made this end with Bales, about the 20th of Februarie 1599, I determined by way of petytion to have delyvered the sayd bundle of letters to the Queene's Majestie, then being at Rytchmond; whether I repayed, and stayed there six days together for that purpose: But although I had greate dyslyre to performe the same, and, for the causes afforesayd, was before that tyme, retryled from the late Earle, yeat, being styll esteemed to be one of hys followers, I was stayed from approachinge her Majesties prefence; so that yt greaved mee greatlly, consydering I had followed and served in the Court foe many yeares, and always mayntayned myselfe in state of a gentleman; and then, to be kept from presentinge myselfe to her Majestie, and altogether rejetted, in delyvering the sayd petytion and letters as I would; bie reason whereof I was dyscourage, and alsoe crossed in performyng my dutie and deter- mination in that behalfe; whereupon ensued, that through the ymportant request, and pytyfull mon made bie the Countesse, and others at her request, at the last I yealded to come and speake with her honour in York-houffe, where the Earle of Essex was then comytted to the custodie of the Lord- Keeper; and her Ladiship, at my comyng thether, used many urgent and vehement perswasytions, viz. That she lyttle thoughte I had any such letters, as* those I sent her cotypes of, from the Court. For, said she, I protest I thought those letters had been burnt longe synce; and now I perceyve you have them, and meane to delyver them to the Queene, to the undowing of my Lord and mee: If you will delyver mee my letters, I will procure my Lord to bee better to you then hee hath ben, and besydes, you shall have full recompence for all your losses.' After all this courthip, all these promises, as he pre- tends, and a great deal more, he was struck with compassion! and prevailed on to part with the letters, for a sum of money, agreed upon in the following manner. When he came from Richmond, he had a great deal of discourse with the Countesses, at York-houffe; who expressed abundance of remorse at the obstructions that had been made to the improvement of his for- tune, and their neglect of allowing some handsome provision with his wife, all which stopped his return to the Court; expecting the effect of these fair words, which, says he, seemed then as sweet as honey, but in the end as bitter as gall. To go on in his own stile, 'The next day the Countesses sent a Knight, Sir Edward Dyer, to my house at Charing-Crosse; who told mee, that hee had not, as yeat, any warrant to deale with me; but sayd, hee had of some matter betwene me and the Countesse of Essex; therefore dyslyred I would come to hys lodgings the next morning, which I dyd; and then hee confessed, that the Countesse had entreated hym to take order with mee; and foe, wyth that I should sett downe the cause of my greyffes, and the effect of my demand; to which I answered, that non knew better then hymself, what wronge, losse, and hynderance, I receyved bie followinge the said Earle.' So re- peats his Lordship's failing to prefer him to the Queene's service; recommendinge another to the parsonage of Runcorne; and the not having received any fortune with his wife: 'Then the Knight took pen and inke, saying, hee would sett downe a thousand poundes for my recompence; and I told hym, that three thou- sand poundes would hardlie answer my losses. Then he offered mee seventeen hundred poundes; to which I answered, that I was worthie of a 1000*l.* with a wyffe in marryage, and a 1000*l.* more, in recom- pence of my services, and other losses; and then he charged me with my promys, because I had before referred myselfe to his judgment, and therefore sayd, that twentie poundes more ys all I can geve; which, by his perswasion, I yealded to accept; whereupon he willed me to write the cause of my demand, and subscribe my name under this summe of 1720 poundes; which summe he had before written in figures upon a whole sheet of paper; under which summe, I wrote these words; *The said summe of 1720*l.* I dyslyre to have, in consideration of my wyves marriage, and our services; and then sub- scribed my name, John Danyell: Which he ac- cepted on the Countesse's behalfe; and the next day, being the third of March 1599; hee, and others, brought to my house at Charing-Crosse, 1720 poundes. Thys money being receyvid, the letters mysing, were called for; I went with that money to my clofett, and brought downe all the bundle of letters; and then, those four or five letters whereof I had sent cotypes from Rytchmond, as afforesayd, were speycallie dyslyred; which cotypes they had brought, to conferre together with the orygynalls; for which orygynalls I made searech, in the bundle of letters; but being styll very un- readie in the hand-writing, I was longe in seekyng for them. Then one of them who was more per- fect in reading the Earle's hand-writing, tooke the bundle out of my hands, and found the orygynalls presentlie; and in examinyng, began to reade them openlie; but the other blamed hym, and bade hym reade to hymselfe; which being donne, the petytion to her Majestie, and my letter to the Countesse from Rytchmond, were brought forth, and in perusing the sayd petytion, one shaked hys head, and sayd, thys matter was neare broching: And foe they both dyslyred, that the Countesse letter to my wyffe, the petytion to her Majestie, and my said letter to the Countesse, with all the copies of the said let- ters, might be burned; all which was performed accordinglye. And after thys, I was demanded, yf* bird of prey, who saw the fatal feathers which had dropped from his own wings, upon the arrow that shot him. In 1607, there being one thousand pounds of the aforesaid fine paid into the Exchequer, King James granted, by his letters patent, to the relict of the said Earl, then Countess of Clanrickard, the remaining two thousand pounds, to be paid in the same annual proportions as the other had been; to reimburse her losses by the said fraudulent extortioner. A true abstract of that grant is here subjoined, for the better intelligence of this affair [K]. After the aforesaid censure of John Danyell, and what

* I had made any acquainted with the sayd letters :
 * I told them, I had the help of one Bales, to teache
 * me to reade some of them. Then they entreated
 * mee to swere upon a booke, that I had delyvered

 * I answered, that I had either delyvered them, or

 * as much good of her money, as she had comfort

In most other parts of his book, whence we have transcribed this most material circumstance, he is incessantly upon his justification; and is for convincing us of his sincerity, and innocence throughout this transaction, by telling us that, 'Yff I had not holden my selfe free from all danger of law, I would never have resumed the inherytance of the parsonage of Mynsbull, in my own name, paying for the same 520*l.* nor have bought the state of the parsonage of Hackney; which cost me above 700*l.* with reparations, new buylding, and making the assurances with other charges. Befydes, I delyvered out plate, to the value of 300*l.* in gylt and sylver; with many oxen, kyne, horses and geldings; together with apparel; which I made, to attend in the court, and other goods; for which I had bonds, statutes and judgments, with other assurances from severall persons, to the value of 1600*l.* in good debt, all which parsonages, debtes, and the assurances for the same, I passed in my own name, after I receyved the the sayd summe of 1720*l.* which may satsisfie every reasonable man, that I helde my selfe free from all danger of the law; although the contrarie hath hapned agaynst me.'

After the Countesse of Essex had thus finished with Danyell, she caused Bales to draw up a Declaration of his whole engagement in this affair; which he did in the beginning of April 1600, and it appears, that besides his own name, there were those also signed to it, of Peter Ferriman, and George Lylle as parties, or witnesses to the matter of fact contained therein; which Danyell never heard of, tho' he had often been with the Countess at York-house, and at the Lady Walsingham's, at Barn-Elms, since he received the money aforesaid; till Bales himself told him of it, as they were going together to Westminster, the day of the Earl's arraignment; at which, as well as before, at Essex-house, his Lordship objected, out of that Declaration, the counterfeiting his hand, and other indirect practices used upon his letters. At the Earl's Trial, as appears in a manuscript account of it, Mr Attorney took occasion of entering into the matter of counterfeiting his Lordship's letters, and declared it was performed by his Lordship's direction, that others might be charged with it: But the Earl said, he was so far from employing Danyell to procure such copies, that he earnestly desired his punishment; yet the robbery of his Lady's casket, and extortion from her of so much money, was then overlooked; the letters being acknowledged in court, to have nothing of moment in them against the said Earl(62). But in little more than a twelvemonth after the writing of the said Declaration, both that, and the evidence of it's author, were made use of, at the conviction of John Danyell in the Star-Chamber, for forgery and cotenage; and he was fined, pilloried, and imprisoned, as was before declared. He spent his time in the Fleet much upon writing Apologies, Petitions, Letters, and Dedications of them, to King James, Queen Anne, &c. All which may be seen in his MS. volume before us (63), from whence we have above recited every passage in which he mentions Master Bales. We find him further by this book, to have been in the Fleet at least four years; where himself, his wife, and three or four children, were reduced to the extremity of having nothing to live upon, but the profits of certain artificial flowers; some of them frosted, some of needle work, and others called fatten-flowers; which she invented and disposed of for three of those years together; as appears by the petition of the said Jane his wife, to the King; wherein she prays, that she may have the sole privilege of vending her said inventions. There is a Tract at the end of this book, also of his writing, called Danyell's Dysasters; in the dedication whereof, to Sir T. Houlcrofte, he tells him, that he here presents to his discret patience, the first fruits of his travail, since his liberty. But if he could have borrowed that patience he celebrates in his patron, he would not have turmoiled his brains with such unsatisfying repetitions of his case; from whence it were easy to fill two or three sheets more, with the ebullitions of his corroding inquietude; and all to the same purpose already mentioned, tho' in different words; so true it is, that He who will not take Conscience for his Conductor, shall have her for his Tormentor. But that no future reader of the extracts above, from this MS. may be perverted by the specious pretences therein, of Danyell's procuring copies of the Earl's letters, only to find offences in them, for which the state might condemn him justly, and not to sell them, as well as the originals; we shall conclude, with Mr Camden's account of the matter in these words: 'To this cause (Essex's) also belongeth a censure given at this time in the Star-Chamber; and therefore is not to be passed over in silence. I said before, that the Earl complained of his letters being counterfeited; hereof a diligent enquiry was made, and a notable imposture discovered. The Countess, his wife, misdoubting some mischief to her husband and herself in this troublesome time, put certain love-letters, which she had received from him, into a cabinet, and intrusted them in the keeping of a Dutch woman named Ribove; this Dutch woman hid them at her house: By chance, John Danyell her husband (64), lighted upon them, read them, and observing that there was somewhat in them which might endanger the Earl, and incense the Queen, caused them to be transcribed by one that was expert in imitating hands very like the original: And when the fearful Countess was ready to lie-in, he told her, that he would presently deliver them into the hands of the Earl's enemies, unless she would forthwith give him 3000 pounds. She to avoid the danger, gave him presently 1720 pounds (65), and yet for that great sum, she received not the original letters, but the copies from the impostor; who purposed to wipe the Earl's adversaries also of a great summe of money for the originals. For this imposture he was condemned to perpetual imprisonment, fined three thousand pounds, whereof the Countess was to have 2000, and to stand with his ears nailed to the pillory, with this inscription, a wicked Forger and Impostor (66). All that we know further of this John Danyell, may be read in the next note.

[K] For the better intelligence of this affair.] The said letters patent set forth: That King James, in the fifth year of his reign, made a grant to the aforesaid Countess, now of Clanrickard; in which it appears, that it having been decreed on the 17th of June, in the 43d year of the late Queen's reign, by her counsel in the Star-Chamber at Westminster, that John Daniell of Dersburie in the county of Chester, Esq; for divers great offences by him committed, in counselling, and indamaging of the said Frances, then Countess of Essex, and now wife to Richard Earl of Clanrickard; and for divers other wrongs, and abuses offered unto her, should pay to the said late Queen Elizabeth, her heirs, &c. the sum of three thousand pounds for a fine. And it is in the said decree also expressed, that the meaning of the Lords of the Council was, to be suitors to her Majesty, that she would allow the said Countess two thousand pounds for her damage, and loss out of the said fine; for the satisfaction whereof, an inquisition was taken the 14th day

(65) This sum is erroneously printed in the edition before us, which should be corrected as we have done here.

what he has said of Master Bales, little more occurs to us of this our famous Penman. Whether he ever hurt himself, by any such improvident generosity, as to be easily drawn into suretyship by his acquaintance, for any considerable sums of money; or it is only a mere allusion to his name, we are not certain; but we have met with it, used in a manner proverbially, in some humorous display of characters published in the beginning of King James's reign, where some extravagant spendthrifts are described to have been reduced to such a situation, as To need the friendship of Peter Bales; which may indeed signify no more, than that they were, or likely to be, arrested for debt, and wanted some friends who would be their Bails (p). However that be, an oblique and invidious reflection, that seems some few years after, to have been publicly made on his circumstances, representing him obliged to remove from place to place to avoid his creditors, might favour the former conjecture. This reflection we have in an epigram, composed with prejudice perceivable enough, by one of his own profession, as we observed before; who has therein traduced his abilities, through envy of his success by them; and has perhaps therefore as unjustly traduced his circumstances: for writers, and especially poets, the title of which they both claimed, would envy one another, as well as potters, blacksmiths, and even beggars; the brightest authors, as well as the dirtiest artizans, being subject to that mean and beggarly passion towards one another, so long since as the days of Hesiod (q). The epigram aforesaid, which we take to have been imposed upon his character, in his seeming decayed, or declining condition, was published, as we compute, in 1610, and though he therein appears to have been alive when it was written, it is possible he might have been not long dead when it was printed: but this is submitted, by a transcript here given of it [L], to the judgment of our readers.

day of September in the 43d year of the reign aforesaid, by Thomas Aston, Sheriffe of Chester, of such lands, and goods, whereof the said John Daniell was then seized; and they were extended to the yearly value of 68*l.* 18*s.* 8*d.* and the said extent was duly returned. Afterwards the Queen, by her letters patents, under the great seal, dated 26th of January in the 44th year of her reign, demised, granted, and to farm let, unto the said Countess, all the lands and hereditaments of the said John Daniell, mentioned in that inquisition; to have, and to hold, so long as they should continue in possession of the crown, for payment of that fine. In which said letters patents there is reserved the rent of 68*l.* 18*s.* 8*d.* yearly to be paid into the Exchequer. And whereas, by the payment of that rent, and by the sale of certain goods of the said John Daniell, there has been paid towards the said fine 102*l.* 1*s.* 6*d.* as by a certificate under the hand of Edward Wardour, Clerk of the Pells, appears (being 24*l.* 1*s.* 6*d.* more than was intended to the crown by that decree). Therefore his said Majesty, inclining to accord with that intention, grants, by these presents, to Richard Earl of Clanrickard, and the said Lady Frances, now his wife, the remains of the said sum, or fine, of 3000 pounds as yet unpaid; and all his interest in the said extent, and in the said rent of 68*l.* 18*s.* 8*d.* till they shall receive the remains of the said fine. And that they may have, hold, and enjoy all the lands, messuages, and tenements expressed in the said letters patents, and apply to their own use, and behoof, all the profits and benefits that may arise from the said premises, till the fine be fully satisfied: and for the better keeping account how the same is paid, the said Earl and Countess, shall, according to the times appointed, pay yearly, into the Exchequer, the said sum of 68*l.* 18*s.* 8*d.* And the officers thereof, are thereupon hereby authorized and commanded forthwith to repay them the said yearly rent. For the doing whereof, these letters patents, or the inrollments of them, shall be sufficient warrant and discharge to the Treasurer, Chancellor, &c. and all officers of the Exchequer, &c. Dat. Westminster, the third day of November in the fifth year of his reign of England, France, and Ireland; and of Scotland, the one and fortieth.

BALEY or BAILEY (WALTER), author of some treatises mentioned below [A], was son of Henry Baley of Warnwell in Dorsetshire, and born at Portsmouth

[A] He wrote some Treatises. I. A Discourse of three Kinds of Pepper in common Use. This piece was printed in 1558, in 8vo, and dedicated to Sir John Horley. II. A brief Treatise of the Preservation of the Eye-sight; printed in Queen Elizabeth's reign in 12mo, and at Oxford in 1616, and 1654, in 8vo.

In the edition of 1616 there is added another Treatise of the Eye-sight, collected from Fernelius and Riolanus; but by what hand, we are not told. They both pass under Dr Baley's name. III. Directions for Health, natural and artificial, with Medicines for all Diseases of the Eye, 1626, 4to. IV. Explicatio Galeni de potu convalescentium

[L] By a transcript here given of it.] Our reason that the book wherein the said epigram is printed, was published in the year 1610, is drawn from the 170th page of it, where there is an epigram addressed to Dr Geo. Abbot Bishop of London; he being in that see but that one year. But the epigram which we take to have been written against Master Bales, is as follows.

Of a Pen for a Running-Hand.

The Hand, and Golden Pen, Clophonian
Sets on his Sign; to shew, O proud, poor Soul,
Both where he wones, and how the same he wan,
From Writers fair, though he writ ever foul:
But by that Hand, that Pen so borne hath been,
From Place to Place, that for this last half Year,
It scarce a sen'night at a place is seen,
That Hand so plies that Pen, though neer the neare;
For when men seek it, else-where it is sent;
Or there shut up, as for the Plague, for Rent:
Without which stay, it never still could stand,
Because the Pen is for a Running-Hand (67).

Portsham in that county. He was educated at Wincheſter-ſchool, and admitted perpetual Fellow of New College in Oxford, in the year 1550, after having ſerved two years of probation. Having taken the degrees of Bachelor and Maſter of Arts, he proceeded upon the Phyſic line, and was admitted to praſtiſe in that Faculty, in 1558, being at that time Proctor of the univerſity, and Prebendary of Dultingcote or Dulcot in the church of Wells; which preferment he reſigned in 1579. In 1561, he was appointed the Queen's Profeſſor of Phyſic in the univerſity of Oxford. Two years after, he took the degree of Doctor in that Faculty, and at laſt was appointed Phyſician in Ordinary to her Maſteſty. He was eſteemed to be very ſkilful in his profeſſion, and was much followed for his praſtiſe. He died March the 3d 1592, at 63 years of age, and was buried in the Inner Chapel of New College in Oxford. His poſterity, Mr Wood tells us, ſubſiſted at Ducklington near Whitney in Oxfordſhire, and ſome of them had been Juſtices of the Peace for the ſaid county (a).

BALIOL or BALLIOL (JOHN DE) [A] founder of Balliol-College in Oxford, was the ſon of Hugh de Balliol [B] of Bernard's-caſtle in the dioceſe of Durham (a). He was a perſon very eminent for power and riches, being poſſeſſed of thirty Knights fees [C], a conſiderable eſtate in thoſe times. But he received a great addition thereto, by his marriage with Dervorgille [D], one of the three daughters and coheireſſes of Alan of Galloway (a great Baron in Scotland) by Margaret the eldeſt ſiſter of John Scot, the laſt Earl of Cheſter, and one of the heirs to David, ſome time Earl of Huntingdon (b) From the year 1248 to 1254 he was Sheriff of the county of Cumberland (c); and in 1248 was conſtituted Governor of the caſtle of Carlifle (d). Upon the marriage of Margaret daughter of King Henry III to Alexander III King of Scotland, the guardianship of them both, and of that kingdom, was committed to our Sir John de Balliol (e), and to another Lord (f); but, about three years after, they were ſo grievouſly accuſed of abuſing their truſt, that the King marched towards Scotland with an army, to chaſtiſe them. However, in conſideration of the many important ſervices performed in the moſt difficult times,

[A] BALLIOL (JOHN DE.) So his name is commonly written (1). But it is found otherwiſe in different authors: As, for inſtance, in M. Paris, de Bailliol (2), de Bailloil (3), de Bailloil (4), and de Baiiol (5). In Matthew of Weſtmiſter, de Baliolo (6), de Baiiol (7), and de Bailloil (8). And in Henry de Knyghton, de Baliolo (9). Modern authors commonly write it Baliol.

[B] Was the ſon of Hugh de Balliol.] N— de Balliol, Lord of the Manors or Seigneuries of Baillol, Harcourt, Dampat, and Horne in France (10), came in with William the Conqueror. — His ſon Guy, as is ſuppoſed, was made Lord of the Foreſt of Teefdale and Marwood by William Rufus, who gave him alſo the manors of Middleton and Gainsford in Northumberland (11). — He was ſucceeded in thoſe eſtates by his ſon Bernard de Baillol, who built that ſtrong caſtle on the banks of the river Teefe, called from him Bernard-caſtle. — His ſon was named Eufſace; — whoſe ſon Hugh de Baillol was father of John, who is the ſubject of this article. This is the pedigree of that noble family, as traced by Sir W. Dugdale (12). Dr James Anderſon ſets it down thus (13), Guy—Guy—Hugh—Bernard—John. And Dr Henry Savage, in a manner different from both, viz. Bernard Balliol—John—Edward—Bernard—John founder of Balliol college (14). Which is the truſt, we cannot poſſibly determine, at ſo great a diſtance of time.

[C] He was a perſon very eminent for power and riches, being poſſeſſed of thirty Knight's fees.] That he was eminent for power and riches, we learn from Matt. Paris; who calls him — magne virum potentie & auctoritatis (15), and — Miles dives & potens (16). — And that he was poſſeſſed of thirty Knight's fees appears from hence: becauſe in the twenty-ninth of King Henry III, he paid thirty pounds upon levying the aid for marrying the King's eldeſt daughter, for the thirty Knight's fees he held (17). And again, in the fortieth year of the ſaid King, he paid ſixty pounds for the ſame, upon levying the aid for making the King's eldeſt ſon a Knight (18). — To ſatisfy the reader's curioſity, we ſhall give a ſhort account of what a Knight's fee was. It was then ſo much inheritance in land as was ſufficient to maintain a Knight; and this was fifteen pounds a year in the time of King Henry III (19): but by the Statute 1 Edw. II. c. i. a Knight's fee was twenty pounds a year. Sir Tho. Smith rates it at Forty pounds per ann. (20). According to Sir Edw. Coke, a Knight's fee contained four hundred and eighty acres of land (21): but, according to others (22), ſix hundred and eighty, or eight hundred, acres. So that, allowing for the difference in the preſent value of money from what it was in the reign of King Henry III, a Knight's fee of twenty pounds per ann. then, would be now worth near 400 l. a year.

[D] Dervorgille.] Her name is variously written, Dervorgille, Dervorgulle, Dervorguille, Dervorguilla, Dervorgoyle, and Dervorgulla (23). She was, in her own right, Counteſs of Huntingdon, Lady of Galloway, and alſo coheireſs to the Earldom of Cheſter. The two former titles, of Counteſs of Huntingdon, and Lady of Galloway, ſhe obtained, as being one of the three daughters and heirs of Alan Baron of Galloway, by his wife Margaret, eldeſt daughter of David Earl of Angus, Galloway, and Huntingdon, brother to William the Lion, King of Scotland (24). But it is a queſtion, whether this Earldom was ſuffered actually to devolve unto her, in aſmuch as ſhe is in no record whatſoever, ſiſled Counteſs or Lady of Huntingdon, nor her huſband John de Balliol Earl thereof, though they enjoyed the lands and caſtle of Podringhay in Northamptonſhire thereunto belonging; only ſhe gave the arms of the Earl of Huntingdon in her ſeal (25). She was alſo, as I have ſaid, coheireſs to the Earldom of Cheſter; becauſe her mother, Margaret, was the eldeſt ſiſter of John (ſurnamed Scot) Earl of Cheſter, who died without iſſue in the year 1244. But King Henry would not ſuffer ſo great an honour, as that County-Palatine was, to be divided among women: Therefore he took it into his own hands, and annexed it to the Crown for ever; giving the laſt Earl's ſiſter ſome lordſhips and eſtates by way of compenſation: And to the Lady Dervorgille, in particular, the manors of Luddingland and Torkeſey in Lincolnſhire, and Yarmouth in Norfolk (26) Her two ſiſters were, Helen, married to Robert de Quincy hereditary Conſtable of Scotland; and Chriſtiana wife of William de Fortibus Earl of Albemarle, which dying without iſſue, her eſtates in the counties of Northampton and Lincoln, fell to John de Balliol and his wife (27).

times, to K. John the King's father, by Hugh our John Balliol's father; and especially by a sum of money, of which he had great plenty, he soon made his peace (g). In the year 1258, he had orders to attend the King at Chester, with horse and arms, to oppose the incursions of Llewelyn Prince of Wales (h). And, two years after, in recompence of his services to King Henry, as well in France as England, he had a grant of two hundred marks; for discharging which, the King gave him the wardship of William de Waffingle (i). In part of the years 1260, 1261, 1262, 1263, and 1264, he was Sheriff for the counties of Nottingham and Derby (k): and in 1261, was appointed keeper of the honour of Peverell (l). In 1263 he began the foundation and endowment of Balliol-College in Oxford, which was perfected afterwards by his widow (m) [E]. During the contests and wars between King Henry III and his Barons, he firmly adhered to the King; on which account his lands were seized and detained by the Barons, but restored again through one of his sons interposition (n). In 1264, he attended the King at the battle of Northampton, wherein the Barons were defeated (o): but, the year following, he was taken prisoner, with many others, after the King's fatal overthrow at Lewes (p). However, it seems he soon after made his escape, and endeavoured to keep the northern parts of England in King Henry's obedience (q). Moreover, having obtained authority from Prince Edward, he joined with other of the northern Barons, and raised all the force he could to rescue the King from his confinement (r). He died a little before Whitfuntide, in the year 1269 (s): leaving three sons behind him, Hugh, and Alexander, who both died without issue: and John, afterwards chosen King of Scotland. See the next article.

[E] In 1263 he began the foundation and endowment of Balliol-college in Oxford, which was perfected afterwards by his widow.] I follow Dr Savage (28), in placing this foundation under the year 1263. But Mr A. Wood, without assigning any reasons for it, brings it as low as the year 1267, or 1268: which undoubtedly was done on purpose to make it later than that of his college of Merton (29); for which he hath been severely animadverted upon by Mr W. Smith, in his Annals of University-college. — All that our founder John de Balliol did, was to settle yearly exhibitions upon sixteen scholars (30), till he should provide them a fit house and other accommodations. His allowance to them was only eight pence a week each, ad communem eorum mensam (31); now equal to ten or twelve shillings. At his death he recommended this pious design to his wife and executors. In pursuance of which, the Lady Dervorgille settled those scholars in a tenement the hired of the University, in Horsmongers-street (32), in St Mary Magdalen's parish, now part of the upper end of the present quadrangle of the College (33), and prescribed statutes for their government in the year 1282 (34). Two years after, she purchased another tenement near the former, called Mary's-Hall; and when she had repaired it, the society were here settled by her charter; confirmed by her son Sir John de Balliol, afterward King of Scots, and by Oliver, Bishop of Lincoln (35). By which confirmation it appears, that this new foundation was filed, Domus Scolarium de Balliolo; and dedicated to the Holy Trinity, the glorious Virgin Mary, St Catherine, and the whole court of Heaven (36). Her endowment of the same consisted in some houses in Oxford; which, together with the site of the College, cost her fourscore marks (37); and lands in Stanforabam, and the Howgh, in the county of Northumberland; but most of these were afterwards lost (38). However, by the subsequent benefactions of Sir Philip de Somerville, Kt. who founded six scholarships; of Peter Blundell, &c. and especially of John Warner, Bishop of Rochester, who gave fourscore pounds a year, for the maintenance of four scholars born in Scotland; the revenues of that College are now able to maintain twelve fellows, and fourteen scholars.

BALIOI, BALLIOI, BOILLIOI, BOYLLOL, or BAILLOI (JOHN DE) King of Scotland, was descended from a most illustrious family, and was possessed of very large estates in Scotland and France, as well as England, though he chiefly resided here (a). The particulars of his history, so far as they can be with any certainty collected, either from the writings of historians or records, are of infinite consequence to the right understanding of the English and Scottish histories, during that period in which he flourished, and for want of having a Life of this Prince written with care, and from the authority of original authors, both English and Scottish writers have run into great confusion, often abusing each other for involuntary mistakes, and charging those things on a spirit of falsehood and partiality, which were, in reality, owing to misapprehension or want of due intelligence (b). As the clearing up those difficulties in our history, is the great point aimed at by compiling this life, and as it is indeed a point of far greater consequence, than the assembling the scattered memoirs of a person so long deceased, would otherwise be; it is requisite for this purpose, that we should introduce this article, by giving a distinct view both of the state of England and Scotland, at the time to which it relates (c). The great point of policy pursued by King Edward the first, was attaining the absolute sovereignty of this whole island, which he began by the conquest of Wales, and had well nigh finished by that of Scotland; which indeed, he more than once conquered, as we shall have occasion to shew in this article. But first we are to observe, how things stood in that kingdom before the extinction of the male line of the Royal family, which gave occasion to that controversy, by which John Balliol mounted the throne of Scotland (d). Alexander the third, King of Scots, a Prince equally renowned for his great and good qualities, married, when very young, Margaret, the daughter of Henry the third, King of England, and sister to Edward the first, which alliance brought him to have a greater intercourse with the court of England than most of his predecessors, and he was so happy, as to spend his whole life in the same intimacy and friendship with his father and brother-in-law, notwithstanding the high dignities they all possessed, as if they had been private persons, inasmuch, that he made several visits with his Queen to the English court; and, on the other hand, both her brothers and her nephew Edward, while Prince of Wales, visited the Queen of Scots in her own kingdom (e). In the midst however, of all this friendship and affection, King Alexander was very careful to avoid doing any thing that might prejudice the rights of his crown, or fortify that claim which the Kings of England had set up, as Lords Paramount of the kingdom of Scotland: Thus for instance, when he went with his Queen to assist at the coronation of her brother King Edward, who succeeded his father King Henry III in 1272, he took a very extraordinary precaution; for he previously obtained from that Monarch a solemn act, by which he declared, that the presence of the King of Scots upon this occasion, should be no way prejudicial to him or to his kingdom (f). A. D. 1273, we find him again at Westminster, where he was present in a Parliament held by King Edward, in which he did homage to that Monarch by Robert de Bruce, Earl of Carrick, for his lands in England (g). This King Alexander having had long wars and great controversies with the Monarchs of Norway, at length compromised them all, and by a treaty of marriage which is still extant, gave his daughter Margaret, who was also niece to King Edward I, to Eric, King of that country. By the sixteenth article of this treaty which was concluded in 1281, it was stipulated, that the issue of this marriage, should succeed to the kingdom of Scotland, in case the King died without heirs male of whom he had then two hopeful Princes Alexander and David, even tho' the issue of that marriage should be daughters only (h). This provision came very soon after to take place, the King losing first his son David, and then Alexander Prince of Scotland, who had married the daughter of the Earl of Flanders, but died nevertheless without issue (i). In this melancholy situation of his affairs, King Alexander to provide in the best manner possible for the succession in his own family, and for the peace of his dominions, engaged the nobility of Scotland by a solemn act to promise allegiance to Margaret the daughter of Eric, King of Norway by Margaret his daughter, which act was dated A. D. 1284, in the thirty-fifth year of that Monarch's reign (k). But he being at that time a widower married, in hopes of having male issue, a French Lady, daughter to the Earl of Dreux, soon after which he most unhappily broke his neck by a fall from his horse, on the 19th of March 1286. Upon his demise Buchanan tells us, tho' certainly very falsely, that the States of Scotland met at Scoon in order to elect a new King (l), which, as we have seen, was not in their power to do, neither is it probable, that King Edward of England would have borne with such an attempt as this, to the prejudice of their lawful Sovereign Queen Margaret, the grand-daughter of his own sister. The truth of the matter is, that on the 11th of April, A. D. 1286, the nobility of Scotland met at the place before mentioned, in order to provide for the security of the government and the execution of the laws, which they did by choosing six guardians or regents, accountable to their Queen when she should be at home and of full age (m). This however proved a slender security, for in a short time after these guardians fell out among themselves, and instead of preserving the peace of the kingdom, created therein by these unseasonable disputes a civil war, which lasted between two and three years to the destruction of several of them, as well as to the endangering of their country (n). All this while it seems, little notice was taken of the young and absent Queen Margaret: Her father Eric, King of Norway, at whose court she still continued, beheld the growing distractions of her subjects from afar, but being unable to remedy them by himself, had at length recourse to a friendly mediation of Edward I, King of England, whom, by reason of his great power, his neighbourhood to Scotland, the long friendship entertained between the two nations, his influence over the guardians, and more particularly, by reason of his near relation to the Queen, he thought, and he was in the right, the fittest man in the world to see that quick justice should be done her. In hopes of this, he commissioned his Plenipotentiaries at Bergen on the first day of April, A. D. 1289, to go over to the King of England, and in his presence, to treat with the Scots about affairs relating to the honour and interest of himself and his daughter (o). These Ambassadors were very kindly received, by that great Monarch to whom they were sent, and who had not as yet, at least so far as appears from history, formed any designs to the prejudice of Scotland; but, on the contrary, was very assiduous in his endeavours to promote the interest of it's inhabitants, as appears by his letter dated at Clarendon, November 6, 1289, directed to the Prelates, Nobility, and other principal persons in the kingdom of Scotland, by which he very pathetically exhorts them to a peaceable, steady, and faithful obedience to their lawful Sovereign, Queen Margaret, and testifies his intention to send very speedily some of his principal Nobility to enquire into the state of things in their country (p). He did accordingly soon after send such Commissioners, not barely to look into the affairs of Scotland, but upon an affair of far greater importance, for he had now formed a design of uniting the two kingdoms, by a marriage between his eldest son, Edward of Caernarvan, stiled afterwards, Prince of Wales, and the young Queen Margaret, which he was desirous might be accomplished with the consent of the States of Scotland (q). His Ambassadors accordingly proposed it in an assembly convened for that purpose, and set forth all the advantages that would attend this marriage with the utmost eloquence. There are very different accounts given, of the reception this proposition met with from the States of that kingdom, for some say that, it was universally applauded; and others, that it was but very coldly entertained (r): The latter seems to be the more probable account of the two, because it is certain, that tho' the point was carried and a treaty agreed on, by which the two kingdoms were to be united, yet the very articles themselves themselves shew, that the Scotch obtained all they could ask, which makes it plainly appear, that they were not over ready to come into this agreement: As they are certainly very curious in every respect, but chiefly as they appear to be the first plan that was ever drawn for such a coalition, the reader therefore may very probably be inclined to see them [A]. That there was a great party formed against this measure is also certain, for Robert Bruce, and several others, declined taking their seats there, tho' afterwards they came to the assembly on the report of the young Queen's death (s). It must be admitted notwithstanding, that King Edward had a very strong party in Scotland, at the head of which was the Bishop of St Andrews, whom the King had lately made his Chaplain, and our John Balliol, who had always adhered to the English interest, as indeed most of his family had done, and had thereby gained great advantages to themselves (t) [B]: Some

[A] The reader therefore, may, very probably, be inclined to see them. The Commissioners or Ambassadors mentioned in the text, were Anthony, Bishop of Durham, and Ralph, Bishop of Carlisle, John, Earl of Warren, and Henry, Earl of Lincoln, Sir William de Vesey, Knight, and Henry Newarke, Dean of York: And in the preamble to the articles it is expressly said, that they, as procurators, or persons empowered by their master, King Edward of England, negotiated this treaty of marriage with the Guardians of the kingdom, and the rest of the Bishops, Abbots, and Clergy, as well with the Nobility, Earls, Barons, and the whole Community of Scotland (1); so that nothing was omitted that could render this union solemn and binding on all parties; and it fully appears, by the penning of the articles, that it was intended to give all manner of satisfaction to the Scots, in doing which, the King ran no sort of hazard; for if there was issue of this marriage, all he granted came to his grand-children, and if there was none, he was left to the measures he had before concerted. The substance of these articles were as follows,

I. That the rights, laws, liberties, and customs of Scotland, shall for ever remain entire and unalterable, and the kingdom continue separated, divided, and free in itself from the kingdom of England without any subjection, by it's true bounds and limits as it had been before; saving the right of the King of England, or of any other person whatever, which he or they might have either to the marches or elsewhere, which before this treaty belonged to them, or might justly belong to them in time to come.

Mr Abercromby supposes, that this salvo was inserted for certain dark and secret purposes, to which I can by no means agree, because I think the words may be very fairly interpreted of the rights, which either he or some of his subjects might have to lands within the boundaries of the kingdom of Scotland, as assigned by this treaty (2).

II. That if Edward and Margaret shall die without issue of the Body of Margaret, the kingdom shall revert entire, free, absolute, and independent, to the next immediate heir.

III. That in case of the death of Prince Edward, without issue of the body of Margaret, her Majesty's person shall be remitted in like manner free and independent to Scotland.

IV. That no persons either ecclesiastick or laick, shall be compelled to go out of the kingdom, to ask leave either to elect or to present their elects, nor to do their homage, fealty, and services, nor to prosecute law-suits, nor, in a word, to perform ought usual performed in Scotland.

V. That the kingdom of Scotland shall have it's Chancellor, officers of state, courts of judicature, &c. as before, and that a new seal shall be made and kept by the Chancellor, but with the ordinary arms of Scotland, and the name of none but the Queen of Scotland be engraven upon it.

VI. That all the papers, records, privileges, and other documents of the royal dignity of the crown and kingdom of Scotland, shall be lodged in some secure place within the kingdom, at the sight of the Nobility, whose seals shall be appended to them, and there kept till either the Queen shall return to her own kingdom, or shall have heirs to succeed her.

VII. That Parliaments when called to treat of matter concerning the State or inhabitants of Scotland, shall be held within the bounds of the kingdom.

VIII. That no duties, taxes, levies of men, &c. shall be exacted in Scotland, but such as being usual in former times shall consist with the common interest and good of the nation.

IX. That the King of England shall oblige himself and his heirs, in a bond of one hundred thousand pounds sterling, payable to the Church of Rome, in aid of the Holy-Land, to make restitution of the kingdom, in the cases aforesaid, and that he shall consent that the Pope restrain him and his heirs by excommunicating them, and interdicting their kingdom, both to the aforesaid restriction, and payment of the said sum of money, if he or they do not stand to the premises. And,

X. Lastly, that King Edward, at his own charges, shall procure the Pope to confirm these articles, within a year after the consummation of the marriage; and that within the same time, the Bull of his Holiness shall be delivered to the Community of the kingdom of Scotland.

These articles and concessions were sealed by the Commissioners on Tuesday next before the feast of St Margaret, that is, on the 18th of July, A. D. 1290: And the letters patents for confirmation of this agreement, which was word for word repeated in them, were sealed with the King's seal at Northampton on the 28th of August following (3); and on the same day, the King appointed, by special commission, the Bishop of Durham to be Lieutenant to Queen Margaret, and his son Prince Edward in Scotland, for preserving the peace and government of that kingdom, with the advice of the Guardians, Prelates, and great men, according to their own laws and customs (4); and the Guardians and Nobility of Scotland, with the Governors and Captains of the castles and fortresses, engaged themselves by an instrument to deliver them up, when their Queen and her husband should come into that kingdom (5): So that every precaution possible was taken, for the mutual satisfaction of both nations, in case this marriage had taken effect, which, as is said in the text, was defeated by the death of Queen Margaret in the autumn of the year 1291, in the island of Orkney, whither she had been conducted by Sir Michael Scott, and Sir David Weems, as Commissioners from the States of Scotland to bring her home to her dominions.

[B] And had thereby gained great advantages to themselves. It will be proper here to shew how this illustrious family of Balliol came to have such large estates, and so great an interest, as at this time it plainly appears they had in the kingdom of England.

The first then of this family whom we find mentioned in the English history, is, Guy de Balliol, to whom King William II gave the manor of Biwell in Northumberland (6), his son Bernard de Balliol adhered steadily to King Stephen, and is supposed to have been the founder of Bernard castle upon the bank of Teise (7), his son Eustace flourished in the reign of King John (8), and his son Hugh de Balliol did great service against the Scots in the same reign (9). In the reign of Henry the third we find several Balliols serving with great fidelity in the worst of times, and always true to the royal family. It was owing to the various branches of this great family, that some confusion appears in their genealogy, but it is very certain, that John Balliol, son to Hugh de Balliol, married Dervorguill, or, as she is sometimes called, Darvorigilla, daughter to Alan of Galway, in whose right he was seized of Galway or Galloway in Scotland, and of many large estates in England (10), she being co-heiress of John Scott, the last Earl of Chester. This John de Balliol, upon the marriage of Margaret, daughter of King Henry III, to Alexander the third King of Scotland, was constituted one of the Governors of that kingdom, in which office he is said to have misbehaved, which exposed him to some trouble (11); but however, he recovered the King's favour, and did him great service writers say, that he had great promises made him for the service he did the English court upon this occasion, which is not at all improbable, and perhaps he might have in view either the sole government, or a large share in the regency, in case this marriage had taken effect; but this was soon rendered impracticable by the death of the young Queen Margaret, which happened in her passage from Norway, her native country, to her hereditary kingdom of Scotland. This opened a new scene of affairs, for the direct line of the royal family being in her extinct, a great dispute arose about the right of succession in the collateral branches (u). The two chief competitors were John Balliol and Robert Bruce, both claiming under their common ancestor David, Earl of Huntington, both having fair pretences, but neither, as the law of that kingdom then stood, a clear or indisputable right [C]. But besides these, there started up no less than eight other pretenders, whether moved by their own ambition, or secretly incited thereto by the arts of King Edward, is a point, which, at this distance of time, cannot well be determined; but, however, this is very certain, that none of them could well be said, to have so much as a colour of right (w) [D]. The Barons of Scotland assumed to themselves the quality of Judges, and were afterwards declared to be the only legal and proper judges of a point, in which, except the competitors, none were so nearly concerned as themselves. But considering the great and extensive interest of Balliol and Bruce, it was foreseen, that these judges would not easily come to a determination, and besides there very soon appeared good grounds to doubt, whether, if they did, the claimants would readily submit to their decision (x). It was therefore agreed, from a mixture of policy, fear, and irresolution, that the whole matter should be left to the arbitration of King Edward, who no doubt very readily accepted a trust, which he had been so long endeavouring, by all against the rebels, maintaining all the northern parts of the kingdom firm in his interest, by the assistance of the King of Scots (12). He died in the year 1269, but his wife survived him; and from records it seems that he left three sons, Hugh, the eldest, was at that time twenty-eight years of age, but he did not long survive him, dying in the year 1272 (13); he was succeeded by his brother Alexander Balliol (14), who died in 1278, or thereabouts, and was succeeded by the third brother, John Balliol, who is the subject of this article, and who seems to have been under age at this time, since, upon the demise of his brother, the custody of his lands was committed to Robert de Evre (15), but in the 10th year of the reign of Edward I, he appears to have had seigniorship of his tenants, being then abroad in the King's service in an expedition into Wales (16); so that it is probable, he might be born about the year 1260, or perhaps somewhat earlier.

[C] Then stood, a clear and indisputable right.] In the former note, we have given as clear an account as could be collected from our Records of the family of Balliol in England, which account agrees perfectly well with that, which in this note we are to give of the claim, set up by this John Balliol to the crown of Scotland, in default of the direct line of the royal family (17). In the first place, however, it will be requisite to shew, when, how, and whence the collateral branches sprung. In few words then, the fact stood thus, Henry, Prince of Scotland, son to King David the first, who died before his father, left three sons, Malcolm, surnamed the Maiden; William, surnamed the Lion, from his great courage; and David, Earl of Huntington. King William had but one son, called Alexander the second, and who was father of Alexander the third, his only surviving issue, who married Margaret, daughter to King Henry III of England, and sister to Edward I, by her he had two sons, viz. Alexander, and David, who died without issue, and one daughter, named Margaret, married to Eric, King of Norway, by whom she had one only daughter, named also Margaret, late Queen of Scotland, who dying without issue, the whole line of William the Lion failing, the right of the crown remained in one of the defendants of the said David, Earl of Huntington, but to which of them it belonged was a difficulty somewhat hard to be decided. This David, Earl of Huntington, had three sons, viz. Henry, Robert, and John, the two first died young, the last took the surname of Scot, and was Earl of Chester; he dying also without issue, his succession fell to the heirs female of his father David, who left three daughters, the eldest of which was Margaret, who married Allan, Lord of Galloway, by whom she had an only daughter, Dervorgilla, or, as some write it, Dergovilla, who married John Balliol, the founder of Balliol college in Oxford, and father to John Balliol of whom we are speaking; and who, in his mother's right, claimed the kingdom of Scotland (18). The second daughter of David Earl of Huntington was Isabella, who married Robert Bruce, by whom she had Robert Bruce, Lord of Annandale, the other claimant (19). According to this account it is very clear, that Balliol represented the eldest daughter of David, Earl of Huntington, and Robert Bruce, the second daughter; but then Balliol was one degree more remote, as being the great-grandson of the said David, Earl of Huntington, whereas Robert Bruce was only his grandson, so that the one was of the elder line, the other, nearest in degree; which, in few words, expresses clearly the point in debate between them.

[D] Could well be said to have so much as a colour of right.] We will state, for the sake of perspicuity, the claims of the rest of the pretenders to the crown of Scotland, in the order in which their petitions lie in the great roll of proceedings before King Edward (20), which leads us to speak, 1. Of Florence, Earl of Flanders, who set forth, that his great-grandmother was Ada, eldest sister of William, King of Scotland, but then it is to be considered, that this lady was sister likewise to David, Earl of Huntington, who, consequently, had a prior right to the crown, and the claimants beforementioned derived their right from him. 2. Patrick Dornbar, Earl of March, set forth a much shorter and clearer right, as being descended from Ilda, the daughter of King William, but then she was a natural daughter, of which he takes no notice in his petition. 3. William de Vesey claimed under Margery, another daughter, that is, also another natural daughter of King William. 4. William de Ros claimed under Isabella, the eldest natural daughter of King William. 5. Robert de Pynkeney set forth that he was descended by the mother's side from Margery, the sister of William King of Scotland. 6. Nicholas de Soules claimed under Margery, sister to King Alexander III. 7. Patrick Gallythly conceived he had a claim from his father Henry Gallythly, who was a bastard son of King William's. 8. Roger de Mandeville was descended from a bastard daughter of the same King. 9. John Cumine had quite another title, for he claimed under King Donald, that is Donald Bane, or, Donald the White, an usurper about two hundred years before; but he was willing to lay by his pretension in favour of John Balliol. He might also have added of Robert Bruce and John Hastings, for to say the truth, none but these three had colourable pretensions, nay, that of Hastings was scarcely such, when balanced with that of Bruce. Both were the immediate sons of the lawful daughters of Earl David, the brother of Malcolm the Maiden, and of King William; but Ada, the mother of Hastings, was the younger sister, who must therefore yield to Isabella the mother of Bruce; but then both Isabella and Ada were younger than Margaret, who was the grandmother of John Balliol, so that, as we before observed, the question was; who represented David, Earl of Huntington (21).

all the arts a great politician could use, to have reposed in his hands; nor was it long, before he discovered to the world, what use it was he intended to make of it (y). In this however, as well as in every thing else, he proceeded with great caution and dexterity. The first step taken, was the assembling of the States of Scotland at Norham, a town on the borders, at the request of King Edward, to which he repaired in person, and on the tenth of May 1291, opened himself to that assembly in a very extraordinary and unexpected manner, declaring that he looked upon himself as the superior and direct Lord of Scotland, and that he expected in the first place, that the States should acknowledge him as such (z). They expressed a very great surprize at so strange a demand, but the answer they made was very sensible and judicious. They said that they were very unhappy in being at present without a head, and that this unhappiness was increased, by the demanding of them an acknowledgment of a right, of which, till then, they had never heard; and that they had bound themselves by an oath, to acknowledge no Prince or Superior, but the person who should be declared heir to their late King Alexander III, and this under pain of excommunication (a). King Edward having received this answer, adjourned the Assembly to the next day, when the States met again and desired further time, that, in a matter of such importance, they might have leisure to consult their countrymen. This could not decently be refused, and therefore the King very readily granted them a respite for three weeks, and this was the end of that assembly, and of its proceeding (b) [E]. They met again about the appointed time, and on the second of June following, the Bishop of Bath and Wells, Chancellor of England, declared to them, that since nothing was offered in bar to the right his master claimed, the King took his sovereignty to be acknowledged, and that he expected the competitors, the Guardians of the Kingdom, together with the Prelates and Barons, styling themselves the Community of Scotland, to recognize him as their Superior and direct Lord, which was accordingly done by such as were present, and, amongst the rest, by Robert Bruce, as the record still extant witnesses, though the Scotch Historians absolutely deny it (c) [F]. John Balliol was not there, and very probable his absence was premeditated

[E] And this was the end of that assembly, and of its proceedings. Whoever consults that great record concerning this important transaction, which still remains in being, will find that every thing was conducted therein with the greatest shew of justice. Yet Mr Tyrrel seems to have gone a little too far, in asserting this assembly at Norham to have been a parliament of Scotland, called by King Edward I, as supreme and direct Lord thereof (22), which, to speak truth, neither agrees with the record, with the matter of fact, or indeed, with common sense: Not with the record, for therein it is expressly said, that they assembled there at the request of King Edward, to hear what he had to say to them, which, considering their submitting to his arbitration, was very just and reasonable; not reconcileable to fact, for if the King had called them in right of his superiority and direct dominion over Scotland, they could not have pretended any surprize on his assuming that title; and lastly, this is not reconcileable to common sense, since if he had summoned this assembly, as superior Lord of Scotland, he must have summoned them upon the oddest occasion in the world, since all he pretended to on that occasion, was to get this right of his acknowledged, as will more clearly appear by considering the steps that were taken. It was not the King himself, but the King's Justice who opened his Majesty's claim to the assembly in French, who adjourned them to the eleventh of May, to give their answer to this claim, and met them for this purpose at the parish church of Norham, when, as the record tells us, they earnestly pressed the King to give them longer time to consult with such as were absent, and to answer his demands concerning their recognition of his superiority and direct dominion over the kingdom of Scotland, which he said was his right: Then upon further deliberation, he gave them time until the second of June next coming, and on that day precisely they were to answer his demands, and if they had any evidences, writings, or antiquities, to produce, which might exclude him from the right and exercise of his said superiority, or direct dominion, or overthrow his reasons and arguments for it, they were then to exhibit and shew them; protesting he was ready to allow them what the law permitted, and to do what was just; and that they might better understand his title, and make their objections against it if they pleased, the Bishop of Durham was appointed to set it forth to all the Nobles, and Prelates there present. It is true, the declaration he then made, and arguments he used, were wholly historical, and had been searched for, and taken out of the chronicles of Marianus Scotus, William of Malmbury, Roger de

Hoveden, Henry de Huntington, Ralph de Diceto, and the Chronicle of St Albans, Matt. Paris, that lay then in several of the abbies of England, being to this effect: That the Scots had been conquered by several of our Saxon Kings, that many of their Kings had submitted and sworn fealty to them, done homage, and received the crown and kingdom from them, and that the Scots had also submitted and been governed by such Kings, as the English Saxon Kings had placed in that kingdom. That after the Conquest, the very same things had been done, submitted to, and complied with, in the reigns of William I, and II, Henry I, Stephen, Henry II, Richard I, King John, and Henry III (23). Mr Tyrrel's remarks on all this, appears equally just and impartial. 'This is the substance of that declaration, which you may find more at large in the histories of Matth. Westminster, and Tho. Walsingham, and which the King caused to be set forth, to satisfy the clergy and nobility of Scotland: but to speak the truth, though the matters of fact, which are therein cited, are rightly enough set down, yet there is no mention made of any homage or fealty done by the Scottish Kings; for the whole kingdom of Scotland, properly so called, which extended antiently no farther than the bridge of Sterling, which in the time of King Edgar, was the boundary between the Scottish and the Northumbrian kingdoms (24).' This clears up the whole matter, and very plainly shews, 1st, What right King Edward really had to homage from the King of Scots; and 2d, What, laying hold of this opportunity, he had a mind (under colour of this right) to exact from them for the future.

[F] Though the Scotch historians absolutely deny it. It is a very natural thing, and one may almost pronounce it excusable, for an historian to have some inclination to heighten the honour, and palliate the disgraces of his country (25). But then this should be done with judgment and address, rather by reconciling than varying of facts, never at the expence of truth. Buchanan, who was not very tender in this point, and whose pride made him zealous for the honour of the Scots, tells us, upon this occasion, a very fine story of Robert Bruce, Lord of Anandale, for which however he gives us no authority, and, to say the truth, there was none to be had; because, as fine as the story is, it is founded on a false fact, or rather upon a multitude of false facts, which very plainly prove, that Buchanan wanted both that industry, and that fidelity, which is necessary to a good historian. But since we have accused him, let us hear what he says: 'There, that is, at Norham, Edward, by very fit instruments premeditated, that he might have the example of others to plead in excuse of his own behaviour; but, however, he came the next day, and submitted to make the same acknowledgment (d). This great point carried, pleased King Edward extremely, for he was no less satisfied with acquiring a kingdom by art, than if he had obtained it by conquest, and he took care to publish this sufficiently to the world, as a proof of his great policy, which undoubtedly it was [G]. The several claims to the crown came next to be considered; and as it was not at all King Edward's interest to come to a hasty instruments, tried by soft methods to persuade the Scots to submit to him, as he pretended their ancestors had often done before: But when they all constantly refused, he practised upon the competitors for the crown whom he himself had set up; and by large promises drew them to come into his proposal, persuading the rest to transfer the assembly from Norham to Berwick, as to a more proper place. There selecting twenty-four judges he shut them up in a church, with orders to decide this controversy, forbidding any to resort to them. As he found the thing go on very slowly, he went however in to them himself, and by conferring with them he found, that tho' Balliol had the better right, yet Bruce had more friends: He therefore first applied to him, supposing, that as his right was but indifferent, he would the more readily come into his measures; he therefore promised him the kingdom of Scotland, if he would accept it from the King of England, and hold it of him as of his superior. Bruce answered clearly, that his desire of reigning was not so strong, as that, to gratify it, he should in any degree lessen that liberty which the Scottish nation derived from their ancestors (26). Thus has Buchanan raised the credit of his country, weakened Bruce's title, and, to make him amend, bestowed upon him a magnanimity to which he had no claim; to shew the fallshood of all this, to place so material a point of history in its true light, and to avoid as much as possible that dryness which naturally attends all criticism, we will proceed from the record, and resume the proceedings of the assembly on their next meeting, as they are there stated. On the second of June, the Bishops, and other ecclesiastick Prelates, together with the Earls, Barons, and other Nobles of the community of the said kingdom of Scotland, met right over against Norham castle, where King Edward then was, in a green, on the other side of the river Tweed, as did also all the Princes and Noblemen that claimed the kingdom. Then the Bishop of Bath and Wells was sent to demand, in the King's name, what they had done since their last meeting, and whether they would shew, propound, or say any thing, that could, or ought to, exclude the King of England from the right and exercise of his superiority, and direct dominion over the kingdom of Scotland, that they would produce and exhibit it, if they believed it expedient for them; protesting in the name of the King of England, that he would favourably hear them, and allow what was just, and report what they said to him and his council, that upon deliberation they might do what justice required; but since they had answered nothing, neither propounded or exhibited any thing against it, therefore the Bishop recapitulating what had been said and urged for the King's title, and what had been done at these several meetings, in all which they had offered nothing considerable against it, declared to them, the Bishops, Prelates, Earls, Barons, and others of the Community of Scotland, that the King would make use of his right of superiority and direct dominion in Scotland, in deciding the controversy between the several competitors for that kingdom. Then the Bishop beginning with Robert Bruce, Lord of Anandale, being one of the chiefest competitors for the kingdom of Scotland, he demanded of him, in the presence of all the estates of the kingdom last mentioned, whether, in claiming the said right, he would answer and receive justice before the King of England, as superior and direct Lord of the kingdom of Scotland, who openly and expressly, in the presence of all there present, answered, That he did acknowledge the King of England superior and direct Lord of the kingdom of Scotland, and that he would before and from him, as superior and direct Lord of the kingdom of Scotland, answer and receive justice. Then all the other competitors there present, viz. Florence, Earl of Holland, the Lord John Hastings, Patrick of Dunbar, Earl of March, William Vesey, William de Ros, Robert de Pinkeney, and Nicholas de Soules, had the same question put to them, and made the same answer. John Balliol was then absent, but upon his Proctor's request, the meeting was continued until the next day the third of June, to be in the parish church of Norham, when he gave the same answer to the third question. This was very strong and full, without doubt, and yet it did not absolutely satisfy King Edward, who insisted upon having letters patents in the French tongue from all the claimants, expressing their full satisfaction as to the right he claimed, of being superior Lord of the kingdom of Scotland, promising to submit to his decision of their title, and that he should enjoy the kingdom, to whom King Edward adjudged it (27). We may add to all this, with respect to Robert Bruce, that in the very preamble of his petition, wherein he sets forth his right to the succession of the crown of Scotland, he gives King Edward the title of superior and direct Lord (28). So that there can be nothing more contrary to truth, than what is asserted by Buchanan, and the only excuse that can be made for him is, that he has followed Boethius in general, tho' he has added several circumstances of his own invention (29).

[G] As a proof of his great policy, which undoubtedly it was] There cannot be a stronger instance given of the folly and danger of an ambitious disposition in a Prince of great abilities, than what is contained in the history of the conduct of this Monarch, who was so well pleased with the success he had hitherto met with, in the prosecution of this scheme of his to annex a whole kingdom to his dominions, by the exercise of his wit rather than his sword; that the very day after he had obtained the letters patents before-mentioned, he took a much stronger step, insisting, that as they had now granted him a right, they should next give him the land: Yet still he proceeded with a colour of justice, and took care that those he practised upon should do so too; for having insinuated, that in order to make a King he must have a kingdom to give him, he prevailed upon the claimants of the crown to grant him under their hands and seals another charter, by which they consent, that he should have possession given him of the kingdom, in trust for the person to whom it should be adjudged (30): When he had got this he thought he had got all, and therefore, not only took upon him the title of Superior and direct Lord of Scotland, but endeavoured all he could to establish a general opinion of his right in the minds of the English nation, by which he entailed long wars upon his posterity, infused seeds of dissension between the inhabitants of the two kingdoms, and thereby provided, as if he had done it on purpose, for the weakening the force of this island, and lessening the power of both nations with respect to foreign Princes and States; nay, so much was he possessed with the notion of the right given him by these charters, that he sent authentic copies of them under his privy-seal to all the chief monasteries in England, with orders, that they should be entred in the Chronicles and Ledger-Books of their respective houses, divers of which are still extant in the Cottonian library, where they that doubt the truth of it may consult them, and our authors have been so exact, as to give us a copy of the writs whereby the Abbots and Priors of those religious houses were enjoined to perform it (31). It bears date the 9th of July in the 19th year of his reign, A. D. 1297, being about seven years after the grant of that charter, and seems to have been done about the time when the Pope began to question the King's superiority over Scotland, and that none may question the truth of it, the very original of the charter of recognition is still preserved, with the seals of the competitors appendant to it, in the same library, that great repository of rarities of this kind (32).

a hasty decision, he consented to a commission, which was thus composed; Robert Bruce was to name forty Commissioners, John Balliol, and John Comin, Lord of Badenoch, were to name forty more between them, to whom King Edward, if he thought fit, might add twenty-four (e). These Commissioners were to meet, and accordingly did meet, at Berwick, on the second of August 1292. But they fell out about the preliminary Question, viz. by what law or rule they would conduct themselves in the decision of this question, and this made an adjournment necessary, so the King gave them till the fourteenth of October following, for after all they were not to judge in the last resort, but barely to report their opinion, as to the rights of the two principal competitors, to King Edward, and this without prejudice to the other claimants. The truth of the matter seems to have been, that King Edward himself was not as yet perfect in the part he was to act, for when they met again, he had quite changed, or at least new modelled, the preliminaries, to which the Commissioners, at their next meeting, which was on the fourteenth of October following, tamely agreed (f) [H]. All this being settled, the King sent for Balliol and Bruce, demanding of them, if they had any farther reasons to alledge than those which they had set forth, in the papers which they had delivered to the Commissioners, and they answering in the affirmative, those farther allegations were with great formality heard, after which, King Edward took upon himself to put the main question upon which the whole affair turned, and which he worded in the following manner, viz. ‘Whether the more remote by one degree in succession, coming from the ‘eldest sister, ought, according to the laws and customs of those kingdoms, to exclude the ‘nearer by a degree, coming from the second sister? or, Whether the nearer by one ‘degree descending from the second sister, ought, by the laws and customs of those ‘kingdoms, to exclude the more remote by a degree, coming from the elder sister?’ to which, when pressed, they unanimously answered, That he who descended from the elder sister, though in the more remote degree, was to be preferred, which, as the reader will perceive, was a very explicit declaration in favour of Balliol (g). There is one circumstance more in relation to this great process, which deserves to be remarked, because it is particularly insisted upon by the Scotch historians, which is, that, to keep up a greater shew of justice and moderation, King Edward caused this case, under fictitious names, to be proposed to the ablest Lawyers abroad, who all, or at least the greatest part of them, declared in favour of Balliol, to which it is suggested they were drawn, by the method used in stating the case (b) [I]. This great point being fully determined, with respect

[H] The Commissioners tamely agreed. The great length into which these proceedings were drawn by the art and contrivance of King Edward, joined to some other circumstances, such as that Balliol and Bruce (previous and notwithstanding their claim to the kingdom of Scotland) were his subjects, and had very large estates in England, put all things absolutely in his power, so that he was able to direct what he pleased, and to provide that whatever he directed should be complied with readily, and without being afterwards called in question (33): Things being thus circumstanced, he demanded, first, by what laws and customs this question was to be determined; next, if the laws and customs in the kingdoms of England and Scotland were different, how judgment was to be given, and whether the right to the kingdom of Scotland was to be adjudged, as if the question was of earldoms, baronies, and other such like tenures. The Commissioners were very clear and unanimous, that by the laws and customs of the two kingdoms, in case there were any such, the question was to be decided; that in case there were no such laws and customs, then the King, by the advice of his Peers and great men, might, and ought to, establish a new law; and they farther said, that the rule with regard to the kingdom, ought to be the same that took place in respect to the succession to earldoms, baronies, and other indivisible tenures. These answers being given, the King heard Bruce and Balliol at large upon their respective claims, till such time they themselves declared that they had not any thing farther to offer, and all this with a view, that no step might be taken, which did not, in appearance, agree with, and none omitted, that it might be thought was required by the strictest and most exact regard to justice (34).

[I] By the method used in stating the case. It is a little singular, that the English and Scotch historians are so silent about this circumstance, in a transaction which they have affected to examine with so much care. Heftor Boëthius does indeed tell us the fact in few words, as I have stated it in the text, affirming that the greatest part of the foreign Lawyers gave their opinion in favour of Robert Bruce, in regard to his high birth, and his being the nearest heir male (35). This I take to be a clear and full authority as to the thing, but Buchanan relates it very largely and circumstan-

tially; for he tells us, ‘That the King being willing to ‘shew that he did not act rashly, in an affair so great ‘and so weighty, resolved to consult those men in ‘France, who were esteemed the most pious and wise, ‘and to have the greatest knowledge in the Law; ‘and as these sort of men are never of the same ‘opinion, he did not doubt but that some of them ‘would give such an answer as would suit with his design. An Englishman therefore, who had the whole ‘management of this affair in France, proposed the ‘question to the French Civilians in this captious ‘manner. “A certain King, who is neither crowned ‘nor anointed, but only placed in a certain seat, and ‘proclaimed King, and yet is not so independent as ‘not to be under the protection of another King, ‘whose feudatory he acknowledges himself to be, ‘died without children; two relations descended ‘from Sempronius, the late King’s great-uncle, claim ‘the inheritance; namely, Titus, great-grandson of ‘Sempronius’s eldest daughter, and Sejus, grandson ‘of the younger daughter, which of them two is ‘to be preferred to an inheritance which cannot be ‘divided.” The question having been proposed in ‘this manner, most of the Civilians answered, that ‘if there was any law or custom concerning this in ‘the kingdom which was claimed, it ought to be observed; if not, it was usual to follow the custom of ‘that kingdom of which the other was a fief; that in ‘determining questions relating to fiefs, the custom ‘did not ascend but descend, that is, that the ‘custom of the superior ought to be a law to the ‘inferior. It would be too long to relate all the opinions ‘of the Civilians; but, to sum up the whole in a word, ‘almost all of them disputing concerning the right, ‘gave undetermined and contradictory answers, agreeing only in this, that they all allowed Edward a sovereign power to determine the matter, being imposed upon by the false light in which the question ‘had been put to them (36).’ It is very evident from (36) Rerum Scotic. Hist. lib. viii.

hence, that when men of great parts are conscious to themselves of designs that are not just, they take more care to preserve appearances, and to keep up the forms of justice, than men of the greatest integrity, who, as they desire to hide nothing from the eye of the world that passes in their hearts, are less concerned about the circumstances attending their actions. But besides respect to the preference due to Balliol against Bruce, the King, according to his promise, proceeded to hear what could be said in favour of the other claimants, among whom there was, by this time, a new one, viz. Eric King of Norway, who pretended, that as heir to his daughter Margaret, he ought to succeed to the crown of Scotland; but however, neither his nor the rest of the claimants titles were found to contain any thing that deserved much consideration, and it is very likely, that King Edward would then have proceeded to the last act in this great affair, if he had not been retarded by two new petitions from Bruce and Hastings, setting forth, that they were descended from the daughters of David Earl of Huntington, as well as John Balliol, and therefore praying that each might enjoy his third part of the kingdom, which they alledged, ought to be equally divided among the coheireffes, which is a dreadful blow to the Scotch historians, who take so much pains to magnify the publick spirit of Bruce (i). Now although the English writers concur with them also in this opinion, and condemn Bruce for preferring this new petition, yet at the bottom there was nothing foul or unjust in his behaviour, but, on the contrary, it was from the very beginning very uniform, and in this particular perfectly just, as in it's proper place shall be shewn. At present we will proceed in the very words of the record, and shew how this great controversy was brought to an end. The King, willing to deliberate with his Council upon this new matter, demanded whether the Kingdom of Scotland was partible among females, who all answered it was not. Upon which answer, the King appointed Monday next after the feast of St Martin, as the peremptory day, for all the competitors to hear their judgments in his Parliament at Berwick, intending in the mean time, further to deliberate and examine these matters, with knowing men of both kingdoms, besides the auditors and others of his Council, that so he might be fully informed, what in justice ought to be done (k). On the seventeenth of November 1292, which was the Monday after the feast aforesaid, the nobles and prelates of both kingdoms, the auditors, other great men, and a vast number of the people, being met in the hall of the castle of Berwick, with the Publick Notary, who signed the acts of the Court, all the other competitors claiming the kingdom, viz. Eric King of Norway, Florence Earl of Holland, William de Vescy, Patrick Earl of Marche, William de Ros, Robert de Pinkeny, Nicholas de Soules, and Patrick Galightly, though they had sufficient notice and summons to be there, had withdrawn themselves, because they found they were excluded, by the better titles of the two last abovementioned competitors. Whereupon it was then adjudged, and judicially pronounced by the King, with the consent of the noblemen and prelates of both kingdoms, that all these last competitors should obtain nothing by their petitions: and because John Cumin, and Roger de Mandeville, did not prosecute their petitions, they had the same judgment. But as to the last petition of Robert de Bruce, whereby he claimed the third part of the kingdom for his share, as of a partible inheritance, because it appeared by his first petition before the King, that he demanded the whole kingdom of Scotland, he therefore did by that acknowledge and grant that the kingdom was impartible, and one entire inheritance, which recognition and confession he could not then deny, and for that it had been agreed and adjudged by the Prelates, Earls, Barons, Nobles, great men, and the whole Council of both kingdoms, that the kingdom ought to be possessed by one heir alone, because of it's own nature it was impartible, as other kingdoms; for these reasons therefore it was adjudged, and judicially declared by the King, that he should gain nothing by what was set forth in his petition. The same judgment was given against John Hastings, for the same reasons. As to the petition of John Balliol, it was found and agreed by all the noblemen, prelates, &c. of both nations, that the kingdom of Scotland was impartible, and ought to remain to one heir; and because the King was judge of the right of his subjects, by the laws and customs of both the kingdoms, which was approved and affirmed by all the noblemen and prelates of both kingdoms; and by the same laws and customs in the case before them, it was agreed, and judicially declared in favour of John Balliol, That the more remote by descent in the first line, was to be preferred to a nearer in the second line, in the succession of an impartible inheritance, and since none of the competitors denied him to be heir of the first line, therefore he was to be preferred before all others, as next heir to the kingdom of Scotland, by hereditary succession. Whereupon the King of England, as superior and direct Lord of Scotland, adjudged, that The said John Balliol should recover and have seisin of that kingdom, with all it's appurtenances, according to the form of his petition, upon condition that he shall rightly and justly govern the people subject to him, that none might have occasion to complain for want of justice, nor the King, as superior Lord of that kingdom, upon the suit of the parties, be hindered to interpose his authority and direction (l): a right, which the King of England and his heirs always reserved in such cases, besides satisfying the world, or at least, the English nation, as to the purity of it's intentions, King Edward had visibly another design, in applying as he did to the Lawyers of other nations, for by this means he at all events established his right of deciding the question, in virtue of his superiority and direct dominion over Scotland; and upon this I must beg leave to hint an observation of my own, that he might first engage all the competitors for the crown to acknowledge his superiority, by shewing them, that nothing but owning this right in him, could enable him to do justice to any of them, though when the step was once taken, he turned the argument against the competitor for whom he declared, by professing, that his right to the superiority over Scotland, and Balliol's title to throne, were equally clear, that if he presumed to question the former, it must necessarily destroy the latter.

cases, when he would make use of it. In pursuance of this judgment, he granted his writ to the Guardians of the kingdom of Scotland, to put him in possession thereof, as also to the Captains and Guardians of the several castles and fortresses in that country, for the same purpose. The next day, being the twentieth of November 1292, John Balliol did homage to King Edward, at his castle of Norham, and then set out for Scotland, where, on St Andrew's day, he was placed on the royal throne by John de St Johnstoun, appointed to that office by King Edward, because Duncan Earl of Fife was at that time under age. He did not remain long at home, or in possession of that shadow of royalty, which with so much difficulty he had gained, for upon St Stephen's day we find him again in England, and at Newcastle, where he did homage to King Edward for his kingdom, in the fullest and clearest terms that could be devised (m) [K]. He had now some hopes of being quiet, as having, at least in his own judgment, performed all that the King of England could either desire or expect. But he was very soon made sensible of his mistake. For upon the complaint, of no higher person than a Burgess of Berwick, against him, the King thought fit to appoint Judges, by a special commission, to hear and determine it. This appeared to King John a direct infringement of King Edward's promises, and therefore that he might be at a certainty, he preferred a petition to these Judges, setting forth, that the King of England, Superior Lord of Scotland, had promised to the Prelates and Nobility of that kingdom, that he would observe the laws and customs thereof, and that pleas of things done there, might not be drawn out of it; wherefore it was prayed, that he would observe this promise, and direct his Justices accordingly. To this petition, Roger Barbazon, Chief-Justice of England, answered, 'That if the King of England had made any such temporary promises when there was no king in Scotland, he had performed them, and that by such promises he would not now be restrained or bound.' King Edward went even farther than this, for in the presence of the Prelates and Nobility of both kingdoms, he declared, 'That he meant, in virtue of his superiority, to receive all complaints touching the kingdom of Scotland, and it's inhabitants, and to use and exercise his superiority and direct dominion, and to call the King of Scotland himself, if it was necessary, and the quality of the cause required it, to appear before him in his kingdom of England (n).' He even pushed this matter to a much greater length, and not satisfied with releasing himself from his promises, he insisted upon King John's releasing them also, and to this purpose he caused a release or acquittance to be drawn, setting forth all his grants and promises, and acknowledging, that they were all performed and fully determined, when he adjudged the kingdom to John Balliol, which release, dated the second day of January 1293, in the twenty-first of King Edward, and in the first year of King John's reign, was sealed with the King of Scotland's own seal, and with the seals of such of the Bishops, Earls, and Barons

[K] In the fullest and clearest terms that could be devised. It is very evident from what is said in the text, that from the very moment John Balliol received the crown of Scotland from the hands of King Edward, it proved to him rather a burthen than an honour (37). In some things indeed, Edward acted as if he intended to treat him with kindness, but even in these there was such a mixture of haughtiness and self-interest, as greatly diminished, if it did not totally destroy, those favours. As for example, on the 19th of November 1292, King Edward caused the broad seal, which had been used in the time of the regency, to be brought before the great men of both nations, and there broke in pieces, because the King's broad seal was now to be used in that country; but at the same time he directed the broken pieces of the seal to be laid up in his treasury, as a perpetual monument unto posterity of his right to the superiority and direct dominion over the kingdom of Scotland (38). He was so fond of this title, and of having a King attend upon him, that he obliged King John to appear on St Stephen's day at Newcastle, where he did homage to the King in these words: 'My Lord Edward, King of England, superior Lord of the kingdom of Scotland: I John, King of Scotland, become your liege man for the whole kingdom of Scotland, with it's appurtenances, which kingdom I claim and hold, and ought of right to hold, for me and my heirs Kings of Scotland, hereditary of you and your heirs, Kings of England, and shall bear faith to you and your heirs, King of England, of life and limb, and terrene honour, against all men that may live and die (39).' It may not be amiss to observe, that upon his doing this homage, King Edward's Chamberlain demanded a fee; but, as is very justly observed by Rapin (40), this very demand was a very strong proof against his master's right, because, though peremptorily made, the Chamberlain, whose name was Peter de Chaunceant, could not tell what it was to be, for which he had never been at a loss, if there had been so much as a single instance of any such homage done before. King Edward, however, did not consider it in this light, but in his next parliament held at Westminster settled the point, and declared, that Balliol should give his Chamberlain twenty pounds for his homage-fee, being double to what was paid by an Earl on the like occasion (41). To make Balliol some amends, in appearance at least, he, by his charter dated the 4th of January 1293, was graciously pleased to renounce for himself and his successors, all other rights over the kingdom of Scotland, save that of homage, and to declare that they pretended not to the wardships, or right of giving in marriage the heirs or heiresses of noble families in Scotland (42). He likewise ordered the records of that kingdom to be delivered to King John, and, by these small gratifications, endeavoured to send him away satisfied from this interview at Newcastle, which, in all probability, might have taken effect, if he had behaved towards him for the future, with the same spirit of kindness and decency; but, as we have shewn in the text, King John was scarce got home to Scotland, and begun to take upon him the exercise of the government, before he found himself treated with as little regard as any other feudatory, of what rank soever, which, at the same time, that it must in other respects have made him uneasy, could not fail of lessening his reputation and credit among his own subjects, of which they gave him immediate proof, by declining his court and presence, and treating his decisions, even in parliament, with the utmost contempt. Things standing thus, the Lords of his party failed not to insinuate to him, that, as this was the effects of his dependance on the King of England, the only remedy of which these mischiefs were capable, was his thinking of some way to throw it off. His listening to their council, instead of enabling him to do this, plunged him into a new series of misfortunes, which ended only with his life.

Barons of his kingdom, as attended him in this journey (o). But whether this act of theirs was performed willingly, or only because such as gave their assent to it durst do no otherwise, is a point, as one of our best historians observes, very much to be doubted (p). If this matter lay heavy on King John's mind, and he began to foresee on what hard terms he was like to hold his new dignity, he was very soon confirmed in that sense of things, by repeated instances of King Edward's resolution, to draw all the affairs of Scotland that were of any importance, before himself in England. It was with this view, that summons after summons was sent to King John, requiring him to appear and answer before the King of England in his Parliament, to complaints exhibited against him, for denying, or not doing, justice in Scotland, every one of which cases, as it aggravated his uneasiness, so it put him under fresh difficulties with respect to his own subjects, who imputed all these unlucky accidents, to his having accepted the crown upon such hard terms, whereas in truth, if Robert Bruce had succeeded, he could have held it upon no better (q). It is highly probable, that these repeated citations, were intended by King Edward to establish, beyond all controversy, his title to the direct dominion over Scotland, and for this reason were carefully preserved upon record [L]. There was, however, but one of the complaints against King John that was prosecuted with remarkable effect, and that perhaps with a design to establish it as a precedent. This was the complaint of Macduff, who had been imprisoned by judgment given by the King of Scots in full Parliament, from which he appealed to King Edward, as the Superior Lord, and not without some colour of justice (r) [M]. The citation upon this appeal, was delivered to the [L] And for this reason, were carefully preserved upon record.] In this note it may contribute extremely to the perfect understanding the subject of this article, which, without doubt, is one of the most curious and important in reference to English history, that will occur in this work; I say, it will contribute to render this subject perfectly intelligible, if we give a distinct account of these citations, and of the grounds upon which they were founded, since they will make two things absolutely manifest, as to which all our historians have written very darkly and confusedly; and yet, they are the only two points upon which all the controversies, between King Edward and King John constantly turned (43). The first is, what those rights of superiority were, which King Edward claimed, and meant to exercise over the kingdom of Scotland? The next, what were those hardships that King John thought so intolerable, as, rather to risk his life and crown, his family and his kingdom, than sit down tamely under them; tho' otherwise he was far from being a warm man, and farther still, from having a high spirit? An account of these several citations, in the order in which they stand on our records, will put these matters out of all doubt.

The first citation is dated the 8th of March 1293, and it sets forth, That Alexander III, late King of Scotland, stood indebted to John Mafon, a Merchant of Gascony, in the sum of two thousand one hundred and ninety seven pounds, eight shillings, which sum, though often requested, John King of Scots, had denied to pay; for which delay and refusal of justice, the said John Mafon found himself obliged to apply for remedy to the most gracious Prince Edward, King of England, and Superior Lord of Scotland; whereupon, he commands King John to be and appear before him in his parliament held at Westminster, on the morrow of the Ascension, there to answer this complaint, for delaying or denying justice (44).

The second citation was dated the 25th of March in the same year, from Canterbury, at the suit of Macduff, for causes that will be set forth more largely in the succeeding note, but amounting in the whole, as in the former case, to a delay or denial of justice, for which, King John is required to answer before King Edward, on the morrow of the Holy Trinity, wherever he should then be in his kingdom of England; and the Sheriff of Northumberland is commanded to deliver the said writ to King John in his proper person, which he accordingly did, and made a return thereof, upon which all the subsequent proceedings were founded, as will be shewn hereafter, when we come to speak particularly of this suit (45).

The third citation was dated at Westminster, the 15th of June in the same year; the occasion this. While both the Kings were at Newcastle, King Edward had directed his letters to Walter de Huntercomb, his Governor of the island of Man, to give possession thereof to King John, which was accordingly done: After this, comes a Lady whose name was Aufrica, setting herself forth to be the cousin and heiress of Magnus, formerly King of Man, and demands of King John to be put in possession of the said island, offering to make out her just claim thereto; to which, little or no regard being had by that Prince, she appeals to King Edward, as the Superior and direct Lord of Scotland, who, for this delay and denial of justice, requires King John to appear before him, within fourteen days next after the feast of St Michael, wherever he should then be in England. These letters, as well as the former, are directed to the Sheriff of Northumberland, with this particular instruction, that he should deliver them to the King in person, before sufficient witnesses, and should likewise certify this service to King Edward, on the day and at the place beforementioned, on the return of the writ (46).

The fourth is dated the second of September in the same year, and therein it is set forth, That David, late King of Scotland, had heretofore bestowed on the Royal Abbey of Reading in England, a priory dependant on the Bishop of St Andrews: This priory was afterwards alienated by the Abbot of Reading, in favour of the Bishop of St Andrews. The success of that Abbot being willing to recover the priory, set forth, that this alienation was contrary to the will of the major part of the Monks, in a petition to King John. The Bishop of St Andrews appeals from that King to the Pope, and this appeal the King received and admitted. The Abbot, upon this, appeals himself to King Edward, as Superior Lord of Scotland; who, upon this suggestion of denial and delay of justice, requires the said King to appear before him, to answer the same within fifteen days next after the feast of St Martin, wherever he should then be in England (47).

The fifth citation is dated the 20th of April 1294, and recites, That the reverend Father Anthony, Lord Bishop of Durham, had claimed before King John, his right of ecclesiastical jurisdiction over the towns of Berwick and Haddington, as belonging to his bishopric of Durham, but without effect; of which, having complained to King Edward, as the Superior Lord of Scotland, he, for this denial, and delay of justice, requires King John to appear before him, on the morrow of St John the Baptist, wherever he might then be in England. The Sheriff of Northumberland had the same directions in respect to this as in regard to the third citation (48).

[M] Not without some justice.] This remark is made to shew the wisdom of King Edward, who, very prudently enforced his process on that appeal, which being best grounded gave some degree of credit, even to that warmth and rigour with which it was pursued (49). The case then of Macduff (who by a very gross mistake, our historians stile Earl of Fife) was this: He was son of Malcolm, Earl of Fife, and by his grant, had a title to the lands of Bereys and Crey, but was turned out of the possession, by William Bishop of St Andrews, as guardian of the county of Fife, during the vacancy of the throne of Scotland, upon which he applied himself to King Edward, who by his writ directed the Guardians of Scotland to do the King of Scots at Sterling, on the second of August 1293, requiring him to appear before the King of England in his Parliament, to be held after Michaelmas in the same year, where accordingly he was present, and being urged to answer the matter of that complaint, he replied, That he was a King, and that he could not answer without the advice of his subjects (s). He was told that this was altogether insufficient, that he had done homage to the King of England for his crown, and was therefore bound to answer. He persisted however in adhering to his former declaration, adding, that it was a matter which concerned his kingdom, and therefore he would do nothing without the assent of his people. Upon this Macduff demanded judgment, which the Parliament was ready to give with respect to the contempt, and it was, That three of King John's principal castles should be seized till he made satisfaction, upon which he submitted, which being all King Edward wanted, was received, and he had farther time given him (t) [N]. There happened about this time some disputes between the Kings of France and England, which afforded some hopes to Balliol, of being delivered from that uneasy situation he had been in ever since he attained the kingdom. Some of our old historians say, that he quitted England privately, which so enraged King Edward, that he seized all his estates there, and they likewise add, that the reason he gave such an answer, and avoided pleading directly to Macduff's complaint, was because the Scots had already appointed twelve Commissioners, viz. four of the Clergy, four Earls, and four Barons, to whom he was to account for his actions after his return home (u). I cannot help thinking, however, that they are mistaken in this, or rather, that they confound the times in which these events happened, since it is evident enough from our records, that King John did not break with King Edward either this year or the next, but, on the contrary, appeared again in the English Parliament, when the plea between him and Macduff was continued, and King John at the same time granted an aid out of his English estates, for the recovery of Gascony, which King Philip of France had seized into his own hands (w). It is however certain, that King John was privately taking the best methods he could, to put himself into a condition to throw off his dependance upon England. But he was so far from having thrown it off already, that when King Edward was determined to recover Gascony by force of arms, he not only directed his letters to King John, which were dated from Portsmouth, the twenty-ninth of June 1294, but also to the principal nobility of Scotland, requiring him to send men, and then to come in person, with military supplies to London, so as to be ready to pass with him on the first of September into France, for the recovery of Gascony (x), and a little before this, he had required the King of Scots to lay an embargo on all the shipping of his subjects, for the same reason (y). How far he complied with any of these demands does not appear, but it is very certain, that at this time, and a little after, King John was treating with Philip the Fair, King of France, about an alliance against England, and this he did not only with the privacy, but with the absolute consent of his subjects, and things being now far advanced, he granted full powers, by virtue of an instrument, dated at Sterling the fifth of July 1295, to his Ambassadors, William, Bishop of St Andrews; Matthew, Bishop of Dunkel; Sir John Soules, and Sir Ingeram Umfraville, to negotiate and conclude a treaty him justice (50). In consequence of this, he was again put into possession of the said lands, and held them till after King John was in possession of the crown of Scotland, when in a parliament held at Scoone, in the Octave of the Purification of our Lady, he was attached to answer for his entering into possession of the said lands, which were in the possession of the late King Alexander III at the time of his decease, on account of the nonage of Coalbanus, Earl of Fife, who dying, left his son Duncan a minor, and he dying likewise seized of the same lands, left his son Duncan a minor and the King's ward. To this Macduff pleaded, that these lands were granted to him by his father Malcolm, Earl of Fife, which grant was confirmed by the late King Alexander III, whose charter he produced. Notwithstanding this he was imprisoned, and judgment given against him, saving to him however, his right of suit against Duncan the son of Duncan, when he should come to full age (51). After he was discharged from this imprisonment, which it was furnished he underwent, for having addressed himself during the vacancy of the throne to King Edward; he applied again to that Prince, who, thereupon directed his writ, or letter missive, as we have shewn in the former note; but King John not appearing, another writ was directed to the Sheriff, returnable fifteen days after Michaelmas, upon which he did attend, and not being allowed an Attorney, was obliged to plead in person, as is shewn above in the text (52).

[N] Was received, and he had time given him.] The King of Scots was under very uneasy circumstances in this affair, for what he had done in the case of Macduff was in full parliament, and very probably it was on this account he pressed so strongly his not answering, until he had consulted his subjects. But this would not serve King Edward's turn, who clearly shewed him what he wanted, and what he was resolved to have from him, which was a new acknowledgment of his superiority, in default of which, he was to seize three of his best castles in Scotland. But before the pronouncing of the sentence, he came before the King and his Council, and made supplication to the King with his own mouth, and delivered it unto him with his own hand in writing to this effect: 'SIR, I am your liege-man for the realm of Scotland, and I pray you as to what I am come hither, and for which concerns the people of my kingdom as well as myself, that you will forbear while I speak with them, that I may not be surprized for want of advice; for that those that are with me will not, nor ought to advise me without others of the realm; and when I have advice from them, I will answer at your first parliament after Easter, and will behave myself towards you as I ought to do (53).' The King advising hereupon, at the instance of the great men of his Council, and with the consent of Macduff himself, granted his petition, and gave him a longer day, until his next parliament after Easter, that should be holden on the morrow of the Holy Trinity. He appeared accordingly in that parliament, and the cause was again adjourned at his request, but he still continued to feel in his heart, the deep wound that had been given to his honour, by the usage he had met with in the former parliament at Westminster, which, it seems, he could not either forget or forgive (54): Besides the time seemed favourable, and the quarrel lately broke out between the Kings of France and England, gave him a prospect of shaking off that yoke, which he could no longer bear.

treaty with the crown of France, which was accordingly signed and sealed, on the twenty-third of October following (z) [O]. It was not long that a transaction of this nature could be concealed from a Prince of so great penetration as King Edward, and yet he dissimbled his discovery of it for several reasons, and continued to treat King John as formerly, or rather with greater civility; but in the mean time, he laboured two points with equal vigour and secrecy, the one was to fettle the terms of a foreign alliance, that might enable him to oblige the French to do him justice; the other to engage the court of France to consent to a truce which he proposed, till the former had taken effect, in both of which he fully succeeded (a). He then directed his letters to the King of Scots, demanding the castle and town of Berwick upon Tweed, the castle and town of Roxburgh, and the castle and town of Jedburgh, to be put into his hands, until such time as the war with France was over, promising then to restore them. These letters were dated at Westminster, the sixteenth of October 1295 (b), but they met with a very cool reception from King John, who thought himself by this time in a condition to defend his own cause, and therefore instead of appearing as formerly in the English Parliament, he sent the Abbot of Aberbrothock to excuse him, which King Edward seemingly took patiently enough, but in the mean time he was preparing to reduce him by force, resolving while the truce beforementioned lasted, to employ that army which he had levied against the French, in conquering the Scots (c). King John gave him fair opportunity to do it, by taking a very extraordinary step, which was banishing all Englishmen out of his dominions; for he now thought himself under no obligation to temporize longer with this monarch, since he was sure of the assistance of France, and had been absolved from his oaths by the Pope (d). In the spring of the year 1296, King Edward began to move northwards, and coming to Newcastle, he caused a proclamation to be issued, requiring King John to appear there on the first of March, to which he neither paid obedience, nor sent, as he had done before, any person to excuse him (e). While King Edward was at Newcastle, the war begun both by sea and land, for the English fleet having orders to block up Berwick, the Scots, who were not then it seems totally destitute of a naval force, attacked that fleet with so much success, as that eighteen ships were sunk, and the rest dispersed. About the same time, Sir Robert de Rois, Captain of the castle of Werk, for the love of a Scots lady basely betrayed his trust, and deserted to King John. His brother William gave notice of this to King Edward, and desired that a body of troops might be sent him, with which he undertook to secure the castle. Accordingly one thousand men were detached for that service, who when they were come to a place called Prestfen, were surprized by the traitor Sir Robert, and the Scots under his command, by whom they were totally cut off (f). King Edward, when he heard this, said no more, than that he was glad that hostilities were begun by the Scots. Soon after this, the Earls of Monteith, Strathern, Athol, and Mar, with a body of five thousand men, entered the county of Cumberland; and advanced as far as Carlisle, the suburbs of which city they burnt, but were not able to take the place. It was not long before King Edward severely revenged these losses, for coming before Berwick on the twenty-ninth of March, and finding a strong garrison therein, capable and resolved to make a long defence, he put in practice a stratagem extremely well contrived, and attended with all the success he could desire or expect. For pretending to raise the siege, and withdrawing his forces some distance from the town, he caused it to be reported, that King John with a numerous army was come to their relief, and was advanced within a mile of the place. The townsmen, and many of the officers running out to meet these supposed succours, were

[O] Signed and sealed on the twenty-third of October following.] It is very remarkable, that we find the full powers granted by John Balliol to his Ambassadors, and the treaty or alliance concluded by them with the crown of France, entered on the English records, and transcribed from thence by some of the old monkish historians, which plainly shews, that they were more careful in those days as to penning their Chronicles, than has been commonly imagined. As this alliance was the source of those wars, of which we are to give some account in this, as well as in several succeeding articles, it will be requisite to give the reader, a short sketch of the principal points which were settled in that treaty, and which may be reduced to the following seven (55).

I. That Edward, King John's son, shall marry the daughter of Charles of Valois, Earl of Anjou, the King of France's brother; that Prince Edward shall receive with the said Lady, twenty-five thousand livres de Tournois current money, and that she shall be assigned a dowry of one thousand five hundred pounds sterling of yearly rent, of which, one thousand pounds to be paid out of King John's lands of Balliol, Dampier, Helicourt, and de Hornay, in France, and five hundred out of those of Lanerk, Cadiou, Cunningham, Haddington, and the Castellany of Dundee in Scotland.

II. That King John and his successors, shall with all their power, by sea and land, be assisting to King Philip and his successors, in the prosecution of the present war, against the King of England and his Allies, as well the King of Almain as others.

III. That he should, at his own charge, make war against the King of England, when he was employed in, or diverted by war in other places.

IV. That King John shall prevail with the Prelates, Earls, Barons, Noblemen, and the Communities of all the cities in Scotland, so far as of right they may, to testify their assent to this agreement, by transmitting their letters patents under their seals to France.

V. That in like manner, if the King of England shall invade Scotland, the King of France shall make war upon him in other parts by way of diversion, and, if required, shall send auxiliary forces at his own charges, till they come thither.

VI. That if the King of England went out of his kingdom, or sent many forces abroad, the Commissioners promised, that the King of Scotland should enter England with his whole power as far as he could, making war in the field, besieging towns, wasting the countries, and by all possible ways destroying England.

VII. That they should not make peace on either side without the consent of the other.

(55) Rymer's Fœd. Tom. II. p. 695, & seq. Prynne's Collect. Tom. III. p. 602, 603. Du Tillet, P. II. p. 195.

were surprized by part of the English army, who on that occasion had Scots ensigns, the better to deceive them, and who pursuing them closely, entered the town with them, seized the gates, and let in all the rest of the troops, by whom the whole Scots garrison was totally cut off, to the number of seven thousand (g), as their writers report, or of about ten thousand (h), as the English Historians agree. Upon receiving an account of two such losses, as that of this important fortress, and the flower of his army that was in it, King John, who was not a very warm man, was so much provoked, that he drew up a solemn instrument, renouncing his homage and fealty to King Edward, and breathing, in the strongest terms, defiance, which he sent, by one of the Fryar-Minors of Roxburgh, to the King, then at Berwick, who according to his usual custom, in regard to every thing relating to the affairs of Scotland, caused it to be recorded, and as it is a very singular and extraordinary piece, we thought it might not be amiss to insert it in the notes (i) [P]. King John followed this declaration of his, with as great an army as he could raise, for at that time his subjects were much divided, the Bruces and their party, with the Earls of March and Angus, and others of the nobility, adhering to King Edward, and besides this, part of his forces were then in Northumberland, so that it was a kind of infatuation in him, to place all as he did upon the event of a battle, in which he shewed as much rashness now, as he had done weakness and timidity in his former conduct. King Edward having laid siege to Dunbar, and King John marching to its relief, the armies soon met, and came to a decisive action near that place, some time in the month of April, in which the Scots were totally defeated, with the loss, some say of ten, others of twenty thousand men (k). But the former account is the more likely to be true, since only Sir Patrick Graham of the King's Council or persons of distinction, fell there. We are indebted to one of our old historians for some particulars of this action, which are not mentioned in any of the rest. He says, that King John's army consisted of fifteen hundred horse, and forty thousand foot, that they had the advantage of ground, and that after their defeat, they fled to the forest of Selkirk (l). But several of the principal nobility took shelter in the castle of Dunbar; where, however, they found themselves presently besieged by the English army, and either through the treachery of the Governor, or for want of provisions, were obliged to surrender at discretion. The chief persons taken there were William Earl of Ross, William Earl of Athol, Alexander Earl of Monteith, four Barons, thirty-one Knights, an hundred Esquires, and about three hundred private men. The Scotch historians say, that King Edward treated the persons of rank that fell into his hands here, with great severity; but I find, that he only sent them prisoners into England, and caused them to be kept in different castles, twelve or fifteen in a place; but all writers agree, that as to the private men, they were used with all possible tenderness, the King causing them to be set at liberty, on their taking an oath that they would not take up arms against him any more (m). Upon the loss of the battle, and the taking the castle of Dunbar, King John and his army retired beyond the Frith of the Forth, and for any thing that appears, made no farther resistance, which some of their own writers, not without great appearance of truth, attribute to the divisions in their Councils, occasioned by the Bruces, father and son, that is, son and grandson to the competitor, adhering to King Edward, and as they had made many friends in King John's army, they doubtless did him a great deal of mischief, both by giving him bad advice, and by betraying to the King of England, what better advice he received from other hands (n). King Edward with his victorious army, marched on to Roxburgh, where the Steward of Scotland lay with a considerable

[P] It might not be amiss to insert it in the notes.]

We are told by Buchanan, that the person who brought this extraordinary piece, very narrowly escaped with his life (56); which, considering the strangeness of the contents of it, is not at all wonderful. One of our antient historians, who says nothing of the ill usage of this man, informs us of many circumstances that seem not have been known to Buchanan, indeed to any of the Scottish historians; such as that the name of the person who brought it, was Adam Blunt, that he was Guardian or Warden of the Friars Minors at Roxburgh, that he brought with him three of his Monks, that he delivered it to the King, April 5, 1296; and that his Majesty directly ordered it to be enrolled in Chancery, intending no doubt to justify thereby his own proceedings, and the design he had then formed of acquiring the possession of, as well as the superiority over, the kingdom of Scotland, by conquering and annexing it to his own kingdom of England, as appears by the whole of his conduct afterwards (57). At present, let us peruse the letters of King John, thus then they ran, 'To the magnificent Prince Edward, by the grace of God, King of England; John, by the same grace, King of Scotland. Whereas, you, and others of your kingdom, have purposedly and knowingly, by your violent power, notoriously, and frequently, done grievous and intolerable injuries,

'contempts, grievances, and enormous damages against us, the liberties of our kingdom, and also against God and justice, citing us at your pleasure, upon every slight occasion, out of our kingdom, unduly vexing us, seizing our castles, lands, and possessions in our kingdom, unjustly, and for no fault of our's, taking the goods of our subjects, as well by sea as by land, and carrying them into your kingdom, killing our merchants and other traders with you, and taking away our subjects and imprisoning them. For the reformation of which things, tho' we sent our messengers unto you, yet they remain not only unredressed, but there is every day an addition of worse, for now you are come with a great army upon our borders, to disinherit us and the inhabitants of our kingdom, and proceeding forwards, have inhumanly committed many slaughters, burnings, and violent invasions, as well by sea as by land: We therefore not being able to sustain the said injuries, grievances, and damages any longer, nor to remain in your fealty or homage, extorted by your violent oppression, do hereby return them to you, for ourself and all the inhabitants of our kingdom, as well for the lands we hold of you in your kingdom, as for your pretended government over us (58).'

body of men, with whom he might certainly have defended the castle. But he chose rather to make terms for himself and his adherents, and as the circumstances of the times were favourable, and King Edward was desirous of doing a great deal in a short space, he obtained as much as he could expect, which induced him not only to submit, but to take an oath of fealty to that Monarch (o). King Edward then marched to Edinburgh, and had both city and castle surrendered to him. He proceeded thence to Sterling, which, though a place of some strength, fell into his hands without any defence, the garrison having deserted it before he appeared in it's neighbourhood (p). All this very clearly shews, how ill King John was served, and how little reason he had to hope any thing from a dispirited army, and a divided nation, which induced him to listen to such reasons as were offered, to persuade him in such wretched circumstances, to think rather of preserving his person, than of protecting a people, who wanted virtue and loyalty enough, to make him or themselves free (q). It was certainly a bad choice he made, but then we ought to consider, necessity compelled him to it. In short, he determined to throw himself upon the mercy of King Edward, and having intimated this resolution of his to that Prince, he sent Anthony Bishop of Durham to encourage him to persist in that design, and to make him certain promises to keep him steady to it. This Bishop was very well received by the unfortunate Prince to whom he was sent, and those mean spirited counsellors he had about him, with whom having agreed upon the terms of their submission, he brought the King of Scots along with him to King Edward, being then at a place called Stroutharrack, without any state, only mounted upon a little nag, with a white rod in his hand (r). There being admitted into the King's presence, he made his acknowledgment of his offence, and begged pardon by word of mouth, and went thence with the King to the castle of Brechin, where he not only made another solemn acknowledgment of the errors which he had committed, in breach of his oath and duty to King Edward, but likewise absolutely surrendered himself, with the whole kingdom of Scotland, and his royal dignity, and in short, whatever belonged to him, either in a private or publick capacity, into the hands of Anthony Bishop of Durham, who received them in the place and in the name of King Edward (s). He likewise thought fit to seal and subscribe a certain instrument in writing, expressing this to be his free will and act, in the presence of some of his, and many of the English nobility, which as it is in itself one of the most extraordinary pieces that is any where extant, and as it very nearly concerns the subject of this article, we shall insert in the notes (t) [2].

As

[2] We shall insert in the notes.] There are several circumstances in relation to this matter, which seem to be wanting in our histories, in order to render it clearly and fully understood; and indeed, this is no wonder, because in this chasm lies the whole secret contrivance of King Edward to make himself master of this country. It appears clearly enough both from the Scotch and English historians, that John Balliol was all along most scandalously betrayed, and it was his misfortune to meet with no one author so much concerned for his character, as to endeavour doing him common justice. With the English writers of Chronicles, he is a false, perjured traitor; with the Scotch authors, he is a weak, mean-spirited, and cowardly Prince (59). Perhaps, after all, the unfortunate John Balliol might be a very worthy, good man, and we may really presume he was so, since the Pope, and many foreign Princes, notwithstanding all the evils that befel him, never left struggling for his liberty till they obtained it. In respect to this very transaction, a small degree of attention will enable us to discern, that he was deceived and abused; for laying things together, the truth appears to be this: King Edward, in the management of the whole affair of getting the kingdom of Scotland into his hands, made use of Dr Anthony Beak, Bishop of Durham; he it was, who, in the assembly at Norham, undertook to establish the King's right to the superiority and direct dominion over Scotland, he was employed to bring King John, in the submissive manner mentioned in the text, to King Edward, which he did on the seventh of July 1296, at which time, as we find it entered on record, he, by word of mouth, acknowledged himself heartily sorry for the unlawful confederacies he had made with Philip, King of France, against the King of England; he also then renounced all such confederacies and unlawful contracts, made in the name of himself, his son Edward, and the inhabitants of Scotland, against his due homage and fealty done to the King of England (60). This he performed in the presence of the Bishops of Durham and Hereford, and of other persons of quality, whose names are mentioned in the record; and we may fairly presume, that he thought this was all that would be expected from him; but being now a prisoner, together with his son, he was required to go much farther, nay, as far as it was possible for him to go, and before a Publick Notary, to surrender his kingdom and royal dignity, which accordingly he did, and afterwards confirmed it by the following charter, which we promised to produce (61). It is found in many of our antient historians, in some of them we have it in Latin, in others in French, but in English it ran thus.

John, by the grace of God, King of Scotland, To all that shall hear or see these present letters, greeting, Whereas we, by evil and false council, and our own simplicity, have greatly offended and provoked our Lord Edward, by the grace of God, King of England, &c. to wit, for that being in his faith and homage, we have allied our self to the King of France, who then was, and is now his enemy, offering a marriage between our son and the daughter of his brother, the Lord Charles, and assisting him by war and other ways with all our power, and furthermore, by our evil counsel aforesaid, we defied our Lord the King of England, and put ourself out of his faith and homage, and sent our people into the kingdom of England, to burn, spoil, plunder, kill, and commit other mischiefs, fortifying the kingdom, (of Scotland) that is, his fee, (or feignory) against him, putting garrisons into the towns, castles, and other places; for which transgressions, our Lord the King of England, having entered Scotland by force, conquered and took it, notwithstanding all we could do against him, as of right he might, as Lord of the fee, seeing after we did homage to him, we rebelled against him: We being therefore yet free, and in our own power, do hereby surrender unto him the land of Scotland, and the whole nation with all it's homages. In witness whereof, we have caused to be made these our letters patents, dated at Brechin the tenth day of July, in the fourth year of our reign (62).

I cannot help mentioning a very singular circumstance upon this occasion, that has not been taken notice of before, and it is this, that notwithstanding all that has been said upon this subject, by our antient and modern historians, we find a very great variation in the copy of this instrument given us by Mr Rymer. He first exhibits it in French, which, he says, was taken from the very original, sealed with the great seal on white wax, hanging thereto by a parchment label,

As soon as the Great-Seal of Scotland had been affixed to this strange charter, by which the King of Scots quitted his dignity, it was immediately broke to pieces, as a thing no longer of any use or consequence, King Edward being determined to take that kingdom into his own hands, and to govern it as he did the rest of his dominions. In order to perfect this design, the King resolved to march into the heart of Scotland, that he might see whether any of the people meant to dispute his authority, or pretend to adhere to a Prince who had quitted his dignity, and therewith all right to their allegiance. He moved on accordingly as far as Elgin in the shire of Murray, and finding every thing perfectly quiet, thought it needless to advance farther north (z). In his return he came to the abbey of Scone near Perth, from whence he thought fit to remove the famous stone, upon which the Kings of Scotland sat when they were crowned, as a monument of his conquest, and a mark of his having totally subverted that monarchy. This stone he caused to be conveyed to the abbey of Westminster, and directed it to be placed in a chair there, where it has ever since remained (w) [R]. He is charged by some of the historians of that kingdom, with having committed various acts of severity in this progress, such as burning their records, abolishing their old laws, altering the form of divine service, and obliging such amongst them as were distinguished for their learning, to remove out of their own country, in order to go and settle at Oxford, which facts, however, if they are not totally forged, may be very truly said to have been much exaggerated (x). From the abbey of Scone the King returned to Berwick, in the beginning of the month of August, where he held a Parliament for the kingdom of Scotland, to which most of the clergy, nobility, and freeholders repaired, and there did homage for their lands and possessions, and swore fealty to King Edward, as appears by four large rolls, still preserved amongst our records in the Tower, and which are intituled, The Rolls, or the Oaths of Homage and Fealty made to Edward King of England, by every individual Freeholder of the Kingdom of Scotland (y). At the same time he appointed a new Treasurer, a new Chancellor, and a new Chief-Justice for the realm of Scotland, into whose custody he delivered a new Great-Seal, which he had caused to be made for that kingdom, and having thus taken away all marks of a separate and independent label (63). He gives us next a Latin translation, but both are dated not on the tenth, but on the second of July, not at Brechin but at Kyncardyn. This is very strange, and though it is hard to argue against records, yet undoubtedly, these facts are not reconcilable to the current of our history; for first, with respect to the date; King Edward held the feast of St John the Baptist at Perth, from thence he went to Montrose and the castle of Brechin in his way to Aberdeen, where we find him on the 15th of July of Mr Rymer's own shewing (64). It was after the feast of St John the Baptist that the King began to treat with Balliol, and he gave him a fortnight's time to come in and make his submission. It is out of doubt, that the ceremony of appearing with a white wand in his hand, and renouncing his alliance with France, was different from, and prior to his resignation, and yet, according to this date, the whole must have been transacted in less than a week (65). Next we ought to consider, that the authors in which this charter is preserved, wrote some of them in, and all of them near, the time of Edward I, and that they agree in the date of the 10th of July, which makes the whole transaction of a piece, and suits exactly with the King's motions (66). But, secondly, as to the place, Kyncardyn lies in the fourth, and at a great distance from Brechin and Aberdeen, which makes it very improbable, that King John should be carried thither, or that, when the King was marching north, he should leave him behind him. But if, after all, the original is still extant, and dated as we find it in Rymer, then it must be supposed, that the Bishop of Durham, was left there to transact these matters in the King's name, and that all the historians who have mentioned these facts are most grossly mistaken (67).

[R] Where it has ever since remained. It is very manifest, that King Edward was now intent upon removing whatever might hinder his design of making himself absolute master of Scotland, and as he was resolved, that it should be no longer a separate monarchy, he was desirous of taking out of the way and fight of the Scots, whatever might put them in mind of their former conditions, and thereby excite them to insurrections and rebellions. In the castle of Edinburgh he found the crown and sceptre, and the rest of the Regalia, which he carried away; and knowing the Scots were very superstitious and had various Palladia, which they flattered themselves would contribute to the preservation of their government, he resolved to take these with him also, in order to convince them, that Scotland was to be no more a distinct kingdom. Amongst these were two crosses kept in several monasteries which were very famous, the one called the Black-rod of Scotland, the other the Cross-Neytte, both which he transferred into England (68). But that which of all their antiquities they valued most, was the marble stone upon which their Kings sat at the time they were crowned, and of which we find a short description in Walter of Hemingford (69), this, as is said in the text, he caused to be removed to Westminster, where, by the King's direction, it was fixed under the bottom of a large wooden chair for the use of the Priest who officiated at divine service, but it has been since employed here, as formerly in Scotland, for the inauguration chair of our monarchs. Upon this stone there are engraved the following Latin verses.

Invenient lapidem, regnare tenentur ibidem* (70).

In English thus.

If truth there be, in what old prophets say;
Where 'ere this stone is found, the Scots shall sway.

It may not be amiss to remark here, that there might be as much superstition in removing these ancient monuments by the English, as the Scots had shewn in preserving them; for if the reader will consult the old rhiming Chronicle of Robert of Brunne, published by Mr Hearne, he will find that this whole expedition of King Edward's was in those days thought to have been predicted by the famous Merlin, and that by assuming to himself the dominion of Scotland as well as Wales, King Edward was believed to have fulfilled his prophecy (71), neither will it appear at all improbable, to such as shall peruse King Edward's letter to Pope Boniface, in support of his title to the kingdom of Scotland, if we should suggest, that he was not altogether ignorant himself of this prophecy, or unwilling that it should be applied to him, since therein he goes as high as Brute, asserts him to have been sole Monarch of Albion, and that he gave that part of the island called Scotland, to his son Albanact, whence he infers the constant dependance of that kingdom upon the imperial crown of England (72).

independent state, he caused King John and his son Edward Balliol, to be transferred under a strong guard from Berwick to the Tower of London, to which they were committed prisoners, but were treated there with all imaginable decency and respect, and allowed as much liberty, as was consistent with King Edward's design of keeping them in safe custody (z). The King likewise thought proper, the better to prevent any new insurrections or disturbances in Scotland, to forbid any of the nobility, then prisoners in England, to pass the river Trent upon pain of death. And thus in the space of a few months, and with a very inconsiderable loss, the King made a total conquest of that country, and thereby completed, for the present, the great design he had in view (a). But how wise and prudent soever his measures might be in themselves, and notwithstanding that success which seemed to attend them, yet it very soon appeared, that tho' the Scots had submitted, they were not subdued, several insurrections breaking out the year following, under different leaders, which prevented them from coming to any great head, though it shewed that there still remained such a spirit of discontent, as could not fail of rendering his government uneasy (b). It is very remarkable, that notwithstanding the solemn resignation of John Balliol, his title to the crown of Scotland was still owned by all that kingdom, who refused to submit to King Edward, as it likewise was by the Pope, the King of France, and other foreign Princes. But whether he kept any private correspondence in Scotland or elsewhere, does not very clearly appear, tho' the Scottish historians very positively affirm, that Sir William Wallace acted under his commission, which may be so far true, that as he owned him for his Sovereign, he might be said to act for him, and the same might be likewise said of Robert Bruce the elder, who, when in arms at first against King Edward, expressly owned King John, and in his name concluded several truces, or temporary cessations of arms with King Edward's officers, who were employed against him. But tho' they thus acknowledged King John, when in truth they had no other King to acknowledge, yet this is far enough from being a direct evidence, that King John acknowledged them, or authorized them to act by his commission. To say the truth, the contrary of this is more than probable, from the manner in which King Edward treated him, for though the war continued against his subjects, yet King Edward does not seem to have been at all apprehensive of King John, neither did he abridge him of any part of that liberty which he had granted him, though at the same time, he confiscated the estates of many of the nobility in Scotland, for being, as he styled it, in a rebellion against him. And indeed, considering the submissions they had made, and the engagements they had entered into towards King Edward, it might very well be styled so, tho' they themselves still maintained their independency, and when the French had consented to a truce, and afterwards to a peace, no pains were spared to include the Scots therein (c). This treaty was a long time in negotiating, under the special mediation of the Pope, who omitted no opportunity of interceding for John Balliol, or of endeavouring to dispose King Edward to grant him his liberty, for which King John was likewise soliciting, and that by a more effectual method, which was making a solemn declaration, that he neither desired to recover the kingdom of Scotland, nor to interfere in, or have any thing to do with, the affairs of that kingdom or nation any more (d) [S]. This it was, in all probability, that determined the King the next year

[S] Nothing to do with the affairs of that kingdom or nation any more.] Whoever considers the manner in which our antient histories were written, will very easily conceive, that there is little or nothing to be found in them, concerning the transactions of John Balliol, after he was brought over prisoner into England. Some indeed tell us, that he went to reside at Oxford, and Rapin very gravely and magisterially assures us, that he built a college there, and liberally endowed it (73). There is no wonder that he made this mistake who was a stranger, and who deserves to be commended, not only for his accuracy and diligence in writing the history of King Edward's wars in Scotland, but also for his candour and impartiality in recording the disputes between the two nations. But we may justly be surprized, that one of the best writers of the history of Scotland should lead him into this mistake, by affirming the very same thing (74, which shews how little credit is due to General Histories in matters of this nature, and of how great use works of this kind are, in detecting such errors and clearing up the truth. It has been observed in the text, that some writers have affirmed, King John was allowed the liberty of going abroad, which appears to be a matter of fact, though probably not without a keeper (75). We likewise find, that he still kept up a close correspondence with Dr Anthony Beak, Bishop of Durham, and that he made use of him chiefly to negotiate with King Edward, the terms upon which he was to obtain his liberty, all which we are able to prove, from a very extraordinary piece that remains still upon record, which we find often cited by our

English historians, but which, for any thing I know, has never yet appeared in English; and therefore I hope it will be very acceptable (as it is certainly one of the most curious papers relating to this article) if we produce it here.

' In the name of God, Amen. In the year 1298, on the first of April, in the house of the reverend Father Anthony Bishop of Durham, without London. The said Bishop discoursing of the state and condition of the kingdom of Scotland, and of the inhabitants of the said kingdom, before the noble Lord John Balliol, the said John of his own proper motion, in the presence of me, the Notary, and the subscribing witnesses, amongst other things, said and delivered in the French tongue to this effect, that is to say, that while he the said realm of Scotland, as King and Lord thereof, held and governed, he had found in the people of the said kingdom, so much malice, fraud, treason, and deceit, that for their malignity, wickedness, treachery, and other detestable facts, and for that, as he had thoroughly understood, they had, while their Prince, contrived to poison him, it was his intention, never to go or enter into the said kingdom of Scotland for the future, or with the said kingdom, or it's concerns, either by himself or others, to intermeddle, nor for the reasons aforesaid, and many others, to have any thing to do with the Scots. At the same time, the said John desired the said Bishop of Durham, that he would acquaint the Most Magnificent Prince, and his Lord, Edward, the Most Illustrious King of England, with his intention, will, and firm resolution in this respect, year to release him as he did, on the fresh instances made by the Bishop of Vicenza, the Pope's Legate then in France, to whom he was delivered at Whitford, by Robert de Bourgherth, Knt. Constable of Dover Castle, the King's proxy, upon Saturday before St Mary Magdalen's day, or the twentieth of July, upon condition that the Pope might direct and order what he pleased as to his person, and the estate he had in England, as King Edward might have done, if he had been personally with him in England; saving to him and his heirs Kings of England, the kingdom of Scotland, the people and inhabitants, with all the appurtenances to that kingdom. It being also there read, and rehearsed before his delivery, and in his own presence, and in that of the Bishop of Vicenza, that he had committed many inhuman trespasses and treasons against his sovereign Prince King Edward, contrary to his homage and fealty, &c. and that the Pope should not ordain or direct any thing in the kingdom of Scotland, concerning the people or inhabitants, or any thing appertaining to the same kingdom, on behalf of John Balliol, or his heirs, &c. And upon these terms the Bishop, in the name of, and as the Pope's Proxy, received him from the King's Commissioner, on the said Saturday abovementioned, A. D. 1299, and 27 Edw. I. (e). But notwithstanding this solemn act, by which in the fullest and plainest manner in the world, he divested himself of his regal character, and relinquished both his kingdom and the allegiance of his subjects; yet they continued to own him for their Sovereign, as appears by a very authentick act of the Lords Justices, or Guardians of the kingdom of Scotland, who were William Bishop of St Andrews, Robert Bruce Earl of Carrick, and John Comyn the Younger, who by their letter to King Edward, dated from Torwood, November 13, 1299, owned themselves subjects to King John, and desire, in very submissive terms, a cessation of hostilities (f), which however, at that time, was not granted. Yet after all this, when King Edward in a better temper consented to such a suspension of arms, and to hear what they had to offer, they proposed the restoring of King John and his son, and offered to live under them as good subjects, which because of his resignation King Edward would not allow, but rejected those terms as unjust and unreasonable (g). After all this the Pope interposed, and, by his letters admonitory, undertook to shew King Edward, that he had no right whatever to the kingdom of Scotland (b) [T]. This Bull had no effect upon the King, who was determined to maintain his title, and to continue the war against Scotland, which he did with various success, till in the year 1303, he made an absolute conquest of that kingdom, and in the succeeding year, he settled the affairs of it entirely, designing for the future, that the kingdom of Scotland should be represented by Commissioners sent to the Parliament of England (i). The next year the Scots took up arms again, under Robert Bruce Earl of Carrick, and then it was they threw off all regard to John Balliol, and placed the crown of their kingdom on the head of the nobleman beforementioned.

'spect, &c. This act was signed and sealed by the Publick Notary, in the presence of the Bishop of Durham aforesaid, and of Ralph de Sandwich, Constable of the Tower of London, and others, who heard this discourse (75).'

[T] That he had no right whatever to the kingdom of Scotland.] It is very extraordinary, that this Pope, Boniface VIII, should be able to enter so clearly and so fully into this dispute, and urge such cogent reasons against the pretensions of King Edward to a superiority over that kingdom, as in this monitory epistle we find he did, and therefore it may be reasonably presumed, that he was furnished with proper hints by some of the Prelates of Scotland, as the reader will readily judge, from the several heads upon which he insists. In the first place he observes, that Henry, the King's father, at the time he was distressed by his rebels, applied himself for assistance to Alexander King of Scotland, his son-in-law; granted him letters patents, declaring, that he did not demand this as due to him of right, but as an act of grace and favour. He takes notice next, that when the same King Alexander assisted at his the King of England's coronation, he demanded and obtained letters patents for the same purpose. He in the third place observes, that when King Alexander did homage to him for the lands of Tindale and Penrith, he publicly declared, that he did not either pay or owe him any homage as King of Scotland. His next remark is, that upon the death of the said Alexander, the custody of his grand-daughter and heiress Margaret, did not devolve to him, as it must have done had he been superior and direct Lord of Scotland, but to such as, by the Nobility of that kingdom, were appointed to that office. He goes on to observe, that when the King applied to the Holy See for a dispensation, in order to the marriage of his eldest son Edward, to the said Margaret, he set forth the consent of the Nobility of Scotland, that he had acknowledged it to be a free and independent kingdom, and had engaged it should remain so, in case there was no issue of this marriage. To this he adds, that after the death of Margaret, when the dispute about the succession began, the Nobility of that kingdom apprehending their going beyond their own frontiers at his request, might prove detrimental to their right, he, by his own charter, secured them from that inconvenience, and from these premises he infers, that whatever had happened since was the effects of force and violence, and could not therefore confer any right whatever. To all these he subjoins an argument of another nature, that the Legates of the See of Rome to the Kings of England, could not enter Scotland in virtue of that commission, but were obliged to have special letters to the Kings of Scotland, as to all other Princes. But after all, there is one thing excessively wild and extravagant in this Bull, which is, that at the same time the Pope insists, that the crown of Scotland is not a fee of England, he insists no less positively, that the kingdom depended upon the See of Rome. This writing is dated the twenty-seventh of June, in the year 1299 (77). To this epistle two solemn answers were given, the first by the Nobility of England, in a great council assembled at Lincoln, dated the twelfth of February, 1301 (78). In which they assert, not only the King's right to the superiority and direct dominion over Scotland, but also the independency of his crown, and declare that they cannot allow any cause of this nature to be canvassed before, much less determined by, his Holiness. The other is by the King himself, dated at Kemeleye the same year, in which he enters into a long detail of his rights over the kingdom of Scotland, and absolutely denies many of the facts insisted upon in the Pope's letter; concluding with an absolute declaration, that he would maintain his title to, and possession of, the kingdom of Scotland, as a right descended to him from his ancestors, Kings of England, which, whatever that Pope thought of it, was tacitly acknowledged by his successors (79).

beforementioned (k). All this time John Balliol lived quietly as a private man, on his own estates, which were very considerable in France (l). His son Edward remaining some years a prisoner, as some say, as others will have it, a hostage here, but at length he was sent over to his father, nor does it appear, that either of them interfered at all with the affairs of Scotland, but contented themselves with the enjoyment of what was left of their private fortunes. Some writers say, that John Balliol lived till he was blind, which, if true, must have been the effect of some disease, or of some accident, since it is certain that he died A. D. 1314, when he could not be above fifty-five at most (m). His son Edward Balliol afterwards set up a title to the kingdom of Scotland, invaded and recovered it, but held it not long, and dying afterwards without issue, the family failed (n) [U]. Thus, with much labour and difficulty, we have in a great measure cleared one of the most perplexed periods of our history, and set a multitude of material facts in a clear light, from the comparison of our antient historians, and correcting their relations by our records, which was one of the principal points proposed in the compiling this work.

[U] And dying afterwards without issue, the family failed.] In order to render this article as complete as possible, and to shew the end, as we have already explained the beginning of the contest, between the houses of Balliol and Bruce, for the crown of Scotland, it will be requisite to say somewhat of the fortunes of this Edward Balliol. At the time of his father's decease, which was in the year 1314, he was in England, and King Edward II, wrote to the King of France, to desire that he might have possession given him of his father's estates in that country (80), which it seems was done, and he lived there quietly as a private person for many years, and without thinking, as far as from his story we can learn, of renewing the pretensions of his family to the crown of Scotland. But in the year 1331, an English servant of his having killed a Frenchman, and he taking pains to send this servant out of the reach of justice, he was himself imprisoned, and his estates seized, till on the Lord Beaumont's coming from England, he was, at his intercession, released, and this Lord Beaumont it was, that advised him to come over to England, and set up his claim to the crown of Scotland (81). King Robert Bruce being dead, and David his son having succeeded him in the kingdom, he had married the sister of Edward III King of England, who for that reason would not assist Balliol openly and directly against his brother-in-law, though he suffered him to raise men privately in Yorkshire, with which he invaded that kingdom in 1332, with such success, that he got himself declared King, but not long after was driven out again, when King Edward resolved to assist him, having first quarrelled with the Scots for not delivering up Berwick. This war was carried on with such success, that Balliol was again fixed upon the throne, and King David was forced to fly to France. Balliol by his charter acknowledged himself homager to King Edward III, as his father had done to King Edward I, for that kingdom, and besides this, in consideration of his expence in restoring him, he gave and granted to King Edward of England, Berwick, Roxburgh, Jedburgh, Selkirk, Edinburgh, Haddington, and other towns, and the countries depending upon them (82), which so alienated the hearts of the Scots, that he never had any quiet in that kingdom afterwards, though, by the assistance of the English, he kept up the war for many years, till at last in the year 1356, being quite tired out with the opposition given him by that nation, he surrendered his title to King Edward of England, in consideration of a pension of two thousand pounds a year, to be paid him quarterly (83), which he enjoyed to the year 1363, when he died at Doncaster in Yorkshire, without issue. Yet upon the death of King David Bruce, William Earl of Douglas is said to have set up a title to the crown of Scotland, which he is also said to have founded upon that of the Balliols, but this title of his is very obscure, at least as it is set forth by one who ought to have understood it (84). He says that Alan Lord of Galloway had two daughters, Dornagilla or Dervorgilla, who married John Balliol father to King John, and Mary, who married John Comin, from whom William Earl of Douglas was descended. It is true indeed, though most of our historians say otherwise, that Alan Lord of Galloway had two daughters, viz. Christina and Dervorgilla, so that this last was not the elder but the younger daughter, however she was sole heiress to her father, her elder sister dying unmarried (85). By this means therefore no title could accrue to the Earl of Douglas, but however a title he had, and a title from the Balliols, which arose thus, John Comin married Margery (86), daughter to John Balliol by Dervorgilla his wife, sister to King John Balliol, by whom he had that John Comin who was killed by Robert Bruce, who left a daughter Dornagilla, who was married to Archibald Douglas, father to William Earl of Douglas (87), who claimed the crown, but the States of Scotland declared Robert Stuart, son of Margery Bruce, daughter to King Robert Bruce, and sister to King David, the lawful heir of the crown (88). To this William Earl of Douglas assented, and the new King Robert gave his eldest daughter Euphemia, to James Douglas the Earl's son, and thus this contest ended (89). If the judicious and inquisitive reader is displeased with the conciseness of this note, which stands in the place of another article, once intended of Edward Balliol, he may have recourse to other articles in this work, in which this history is pursued (90); and he is also desired to observe, that the reason we chose to omit that of Edward Balliol, and confine these circumstances relating to him within such narrow bounds, was to avoid repetitions, and thereby keep ourselves within the smallest compass, that a due regard to accuracy, and the importance of the subjects of which we treat, will possibly allow.

BALL (JOHN), a Puritanical Divine in the XVIIth century (a), was born, in the year 1585, of an obscure family, at Cassington or Cherfington, near Woodstock in Oxfordshire. He was educated in grammar learning at a private school, under the Vicar of Yarnton, a mile distant from Cassington; and was admitted a student of Brazenose college in Oxford, in 1602. He continued there about five years, in the condition of a fervitor, and under the discipline of a severe Tutor; and from thence he removed to St Mary's Hall, and took the degree of Bachelor of Arts in 1608. Soon after, he was invited into Cheshire, to be Tutor to the Lady Cholmondeley's children; and here he became acquainted with some rigid Puritans, who gained so far upon his affections, that he went over to their party. About this time, having got a sum of money, he came up to London, and procured himself to be ordained by an Irish Bishop, without Subscription. Soon after, he removed into Staffordshire, and became curate of Whitmore, a chapel of ease to Stoke. Here he lived in a mean condition, upon a salary of about twenty pounds a year, and the profits of a little school. Mr Baxter tells us (b), he deserved as high esteem and honour, as the best Bishop in England; yet looking after no higher things, things, but living comfortably and prosperously with these. He has, among the Puritan writers, the character of an excellent School-Divine, a painful preacher, and a learned and ingenious author; and, though he was not well affected to ceremonies and Church discipline, yet he wrote against those, who thought these matters a sufficient ground for separation. His works are mentioned in the remark [A]. He died the 20th of October 1640, aged about fifty-five, and was buried in the church of Whitmore.

[A] His works.] I. A Short Treatise concerning all the principal grounds of the Christian Religion, &c. Fourteen times printed before the year 1632, and translated into the Turkish language by William Seaman, an English traveller. II. A Treatise of Faith, in two parts; the first shewing the Nature, the second the Life of Faith. London, 1631 and 1637, 4to. There is a commendatory preface to it, written by Richard Sibbes. III. Friendly Trial of the Grounds tending to Separation, in a plain and modest Dispute touching the Unlawfulness of stined Liturgy and set Form of Common Prayer, Communion in mixed Assemblies, and the primitive Subject and first Receipt of the Power of the Keys, &c. Cambridge, 1640, 4to. A rude and imperfect draught of this book was first made for the satisfaction of Mr Richard Knightly, and afterwards, at the request of several Ministers and others, enlarged into this treatise. IV. An Answer to two Treatises of Mr John Can, the first intitled, A necessity of Separation from the Church of England, proved by the Nonconformist's Principles; the other, A Stay against Straying; wherein, in Opposition to Mr John Robinson, he undertakes to prove the Unlawfulness of bearing the Ministers of the Church of England. London, 1642, 4to. Published by Simeon Ash. The epistle to the reader is subscribed by Thomas Langley, William Rathband, Simeon Ash, Francis Woodcock, and George Croft, Presbyterians. After our author had finished this last book, he undertook a large ecclesiastical treatise, in which he proposed to lay open the nature of Schism, and to handle the principal controversies relating to the essence and government of the visible Church. He left fifty sheets of this work finished. Notwithstanding all this (says Anthony Wood) yet, by what our author hath written in his answer to John Can, and in his Friendly Tryal, some dividing spirits of his own party censured him, as in some degree declining from his former professed conformity, in deserting the Nonconformist's cause and grounds, being too much inclined (especially in the last of these two) to favour the times in ceremonies and the service-book: Yet, if you will give credit to what these men deliver, they will tell you that he lived and died a strict forbearer, and constant opposer of all those pretended corruptions, which the Nonconformists had commonly in their public writings disallowed in the Church of England. So that they of his own persuasion would willingly have it believed, that, altho' he was in these his pieces against aggravating and multiplying conceived corruptions, and that these were not of so great weight, as to enforce the unlawfulness of our set forms, or warrant a separation from our churches and public worship in regard thereof, yet he acknowledged some things blame-worthy in the English Liturgy, which he designed to have evidenced (as these men tell us) in some public treatise, had he lived but a little longer. For all this he died abundantly satisfied in the justness of that cause, which he so well defended against Separation. V. Trial of the new Church-way in New-England and Old, &c. London, 1644, 4to. VI. A Treatise of the Covenant of Grace. London, 1645, 4to. Published by his great admirer Simeon Ash. VII. Of the power of Godliness, both doctrinally and practically handled, &c. To which are annexed several treatises, as 1. Of the Affections. 2. Of the Spiritual Combat. 3. Of the Government of the Tongue. 4. Of Prayer, with an Exposition on the Lord's Prayer, &c. London, 1657, fol. Published by the aforesaid Simeon Ash. This Ash, it seems, had been of the university of Cambridge, Chaplain to the Lord Brook, and afterwards to the Earl of Manchester. In 1644, he became Minister of St Michael Bassishaw, and afterwards of St Austins, in London, and died the 20th of August 1662. VIII. A Treatise of Divine Meditation. London, 1660, 120. published also by the said Ash (1).

BALLENDEN or BELLENDEN (Sir JOHN), an elegant Scottish writer of the XVIth century. He was descended from an antient and very honourable family in that kingdom, and his father, Mr Thomas Ballenden of Auchinoul, was Director to the Chancery, A. D. 1540, and Clerk-Register in 1541 (a). It does not appear when our author was born, or where educated, but from his writings, (frequently intermixed with words of Gallick derivation) I am inclined to believe in France (b). In his youth he served in the Court, and was in great favour with King James V, as himself informs us, which he might very probably owe to his fine vein in poetry, that Prince being a great admirer, as he was also a great proficient in that kind of learning (c). Having so good interest with his Prince, he attained extraordinary preferment in the Church, being made Canon of Ros, and Archdeacon of Murray, to which last dignity perhaps he opened his passage, by taking the degree of Doctor of Divinity at the Sorbonne (d). He likewise obtained his father's employment of Clerk-Register, which was very considerable, in the minority of the King beforementioned, but was afterwards turned out by the struggle of factions, in the same reign (e). We have no direct authority, to prove that he had any share in the education of King James V, but from some passages in his poems, and from his addressing many of them to that King, one would conceive he was in some measure particularly attached to his person, and from one of them more especially, that he had an interest beyond that of bare duty, in forming a right disposition, and giving wholesome instructions to that Prince (f) [A]. But the work which gave him highest

[A] Giving wholesome instructions to that Prince.] It is always requisite in writing the lives of men distinguished by their writings, to read them carefully, and not to take upon the credit of others, what may with more certainty be learned from themselves. I have taken some pains to procure, and have enjoyed a great deal of pleasure in reading, some of our author's works, and from them I clearly discern, that he was put about King James V in his nonage, which is a circumstance worth regarding, since he was one of the best bred Princes of that age, and a great encourager of learning and learned men, which reflects much honour on those who had the care of his education, of whom, I conceive, our author to have been one, and to have merited his church preferments that way (1). His genius was truly poetick, and he usually wrote in the Lyrick way, in Stanza's much after the manner of Spencer, and chiefly too, like him, on allegorical subjects. It is a great misfortune to us, that his epistles to King James are not extant, for if they were, they would probably inform us, as to many points of which we are now totally ignorant. As it is, we know, that he was thrown out of his employment, and driven from court, by the mischievous effects of envious slanders (2),

(1) There are many curious collections of pieces of this age in the hands of gentlemen of this country, and in all of them some of our author's, which shews how much his writings were esteemed.

highest reputation, and has transmitted the name of our author to posterity, is his translation of Hector Boëthius, or, as his countrymen call him, Hector Boeis's History, out of Latin into the Scottish tongue, which he performed at the command of his royal master admirably, but with a good deal of freedom, departing often from his author, but generally for the sake of truth, and sometimes also adding circumstances, which perhaps might not be known to Hector Boeis. (g). However, his version, as he called it, was very well received both in Scotland and England, and soon became the standard of that History [B]. It does not appear either from his own writings or otherwise, how he came to lose his office of Clerk-Register, but he certainly recovered it in the succeeding reign, was likewise made one of the Lords of Session, and had credit then at Court, perhaps from his zeal in respect to his religion, for he was a very warm and inflexible Romanist, and not satisfied with persisting in his own sentiments, laboured assiduously, in conjunction with Dr Laing, to hinder the progress of the Reformation (b). It may with great probability be conjectured, that the disputes into which he plunged himself on this subject, made him so uneasy, that he chose to quit his native country, to go and reside in a place, where that disposition, instead of being an hindrance, would infallibly recommend him. This (as it is supposed) carried him to Rome, where, as Demster tells us, he died, A. D. 1550 (i). He was unquestionably a man of great parts, and one of the finest Poets his country had to boast. It is true, the language is now so altered, that to attempt giving (as some have done) specimens, would be ridiculous; it is sufficient to say, that so many of his works remain, as fully prove this, inasmuch as they are distinguished by that noble enthusiasm which is the very soul of Poesy (k) [C]. It is a great misfortune, that but receiving the King's command, to put the Latin history of Boëthius, into the common language of Scotland, this afforded him some hope, and that he might rise the sooner in the King's favour, he composed a Poem intitled, VERTUE and VICE, addressed to the Monarch of the Scots, JAMES V. This we find the title in MSS, but Dr Mackenzy tell us very positively, it is prefixed by way of Proëm to his Cosmography: So very possibly it may be, though the Poem has nothing in it, that has the least relation to that subject; but the Doctor is absolutely in the wrong, for supposing them to be mistaken who filed it a dream, since certainly it is so (3): Our author very ingeniously feigns, that walking in a garden to amuse himself after the labour of translating, and musing on the disgrace he had suffered at Court, which to prevent any offence to the King, he suggests might be owing to the pernicious influence of his ill stars, oppressed by melancholy, and not able to solve these doubts to his satisfaction, his cares at length wearied him into a deep sleep, in which he beheld a very handsome young Prince on a throne, to whom two ladies, lovely in their persons, and splendid in their equipage, applied themselves, contending for his love. He makes DELIGHT speak first, and place all pleasure in the company of women: VIRTUE speaks next, and maintains, that the only bestows real and lasting pleasure, and leads men to the acquisition of immortality. Having thus set both before the King, he tells us, he awoke, that he might not be constrained to violate truth, in describing the King's choice.

[B] And soon became the standard of that history.] This great work of our author appeared in folio at Edinburgh, A. D. 1536, under this title (4), viz. The History and Chronicles of Scotland, compiled and newly corrected and amended by the reverend and noble Clerk Mr Hector Boeis, Chanon of Aberdene, translated lately by Mr John Ballenden, Archdene of Murray, and Chanon of Rosse, at command of James the fyfte, King of Scottis, imprinted in Edenburgh by Thomas Davidson, dwelling fornems the Fryere-Wynd. This translation, as has been observed in the text, was very far from being close, our author taking to himself the liberty of augmenting and amending the history he published as he thought proper. He likewise distinguished it into chapters as well as books, which was the only distinction employed by Boëthius, which plainly proves, that it was this translation and not the original, that Richard Grafton made use of in penning his Chronicle, which Buchanan could not but know, though he never misses any opportunity of falling upon Grafton, as if he had corrupted and falsified this author, in order to serve his own purposes and abuse the people of Scotland (5); which however has been shewn to be, as in fact it is, a barbarous and groundless charge (6). Our author's work was afterwards taken into the largest of our British histories, of which the Bishop of Carlisle (7) has given us the following account. 'R. Holinshed published it in English, but was not the translator of it himself, his friend began the work and had gone a good way in it, but did not, it seems, live to finish it. In this there are several large interpolations and additions out of Major, Lesley, and Buchanan, by Fr. Thinne, who is also the chief author of the whole story after the death of King James the first, and the only penman of it from 1571 to 1586; towards the latter end, this learned Antiquary occasionally intermixes cataloges of the Chancellors, Archbishops, and Writers, of that kingdom.' We learn from the very industrious John Bale (8), that our author, whom he calls John Balantyne, not only translated it but continued it also down to 1536, that his countrymen might have their history as complete, as it was in his power to give it in their own language; and the pains he took in this respect, appears to have been very well bestowed, since almost all who had written after him upon this subject, have, in a manner, transcribed his labours. He translated also Hector Boëthius's description of Scotland; and besides that, wrote a description of his own, under the title of a Description of Albany, which Bale had seen, and of which he gives us the beginning (9): In all probability he was moved to every one of these works, either by the command of King James (10), or with a view to recommend himself to that Prince's favour. As to the Epistles directed by him to that Monarch, which are now lost, they were certainly published, since Bale had seen them likewise (11), and perhaps, they may be some time or other recovered. Since it is certain, that many of his writings are in the hands of persons of distinction in Scotland, who are careful preservers of such kind of curiosities.

[C] By that noble enthusiasm which is the very soul of Poesy.] He wrote, as both Demster and Bale inform us, many other pieces which are now buried in oblivion, such as Visions, Miscellanies, Proëms to his prose works, and, as I conceive, an explanation of the Pythagorick Y. Dr Mackenzy indeed, is for correcting his principal author Demster (12), and reading de vita Pythagoræ, or, of the life of Pythagoras, instead of de litera Pythagoræ, or, of Pythagoras's letter; but as it stands so likewise in Bale, and is to the full as good sense this way as the other, I see no cause to make this alteration. In the large collection of Scottish poems made by Mr Carmichael, there were some of our author's on various subjects, and Mr Lawrence Dundas had also several, whether in MS or printed I cannot say. The mode of that age was chiefly allegory and fable, after the manner of the Italians, whom all the English and Scottish writers followed, as the great standards of elegance and politeness: This appears not only by our author's poems, but from those of his contemporaries, such as Dunbar, who wrote the Thistle and the Rose, in honour of the marriage of James IV, with Margaret, daughter to King Henry VII of England, and the Golden Target, was written, if I mistake not, by the same author. This last, beyond controversy, is one of the finest poems in the

(9) I suspect however, that there is some mistake about these two books, which cannot be corrected without seeing those pieces.

that the History of the learned men of this part of our island, has not exercised the pen of some writer equal to the task, and who would have patience to enquire after, and peruse the works of those he celebrates, and thereby furnish us with facts and dates, instead of publishing his own thoughts under the sanction of their names.

Scottish language, a beautiful moral allegory, well conducted, and the verse so far, as at this distance of time we can judge, numerous, and full of harmony. I the rather mention this, because we find therein most ample commendations of Chaucer, Lydgate, and Gower, which shews that their works were exceedingly admired in Scotland. But the great Poet of this age and country, to whom very probably King James himself, and our author likewise stood indebted for their proficiency in verse, was Sir David Lindsay of the Mount, Lord Lyon King at Arms, who we are sure had the care of James V, in his homage, and who in his writings boasts of this Prince's early respect for the Muses. He wrote, amongst other excellent poems, one called the Testament and the Complaint of King James's PAPINGO, and in the preface to this performance, he gives a pleasant account of all the Scots Poets to his own time, in the close of which, he gives this encomium of our author, the brightness of the character still shining, even through the rust and obscurity of the language.

But now of late, has start up heastily,
A cunning Clerk, which writeth craftily,
A plant of Poets, called Ballantin,
Whose ornat writs, my wit cannot desyne ;
Get he into the court authority,

(13) Preface to the Complaint of the Papingo.

This poetical elogy of Ballenden brings me back to my subject, and enables me to say somewhat in excuse for this digression. We have already seen this article appear more than once in our literary histories, but never so as to be read with any tolerable satisfaction, for want of shewing the state of literature at that time in Scotland, so that all the particulars of his life were concealed, that could possibly interest an English reader in his favour. But now when it is observed, that after the marriage of Queen Margaret to King James IV, there was a constant intercourse between the two courts, and more especially between the wits of the two courts, who wrote then very nearly in the same language; the case alters, and Arch-deacon Ballenden does not appear so much a stranger. Besides, Grafton and Harrison, having already naturalized his book, and incorporated his history with that of England, there is the more reason for knowing something about him. It is true, that with all our pains we can learn but very little of him; still however, it is a little more than others have discovered upon this subject, it is enough to prove, he has a right to a place here, and makes what is said of him both pleasant and useful. There are indeed, many that slight all memorials of such as lived in these times, as an eminent Poet of the last age could never be brought to relish Chaucer, but this is mere laziness, or want of taste; laziness, if we will not take the pains of acquiring the language of our ancestors, for the sake of understanding what they have left us worth the reading; and want of true taste, if while we account it laudable to be well acquainted with the writings of Petrarch and Ronfard, because their fame is established, we despise the application to our own old Classics, that have equal merit, though, from the negligence of their countrymen, their worth is less known. We do not often find points of this kind so freely treated, or truths of this nature, stated with so little reserve: The memoirs of men who have made some figure in the world, are transcribed by one author from another, with very little improvement; whereas, a due acquaintance with antiquity, and the subjects we have treated, will always afford a man of tolerable application, the means of making any article agreeable.

B A L S H A M (HUGH DE) or de Bedesale, or Belesale, the tenth Bishop of Ely, and founder of St Peter's college, otherwise Peter-House, in Cambridge (a), was in all probability born at Balsam in Cambridgeshire (from whence he took his surname) towards the beginning of the XIIIth century [A]. He was at first a Monk, and afterwards Sub-prior of the Benedictine monastery at Ely (b). In 1247, November 13, he was chosen, by his convent, Bishop of Ely, in the room of William de Kilkenny, deceased. But King Henry III, who had recommended his Chancellor Henry de Wengham (c), being extremely angry at the disobedience of the Monks, refused to confirm the election; and, moreover, he felled the woods, spoiled the ponds, and otherwise wasted the manors and estates belonging to the Bishoprick. He endeavoured at last to persuade the Monks to proceed to a new election; alledging, that it was not fit, so strong a place as Ely [B] should be intrusted with a man, that had scarce ever been out of his cloister, and who was utterly unacquainted with political affairs. Balsam finding he was not likely to succeed at home; went to Rome, in order to be confirmed by the Pope (d), who, through the plenitude of his apostolical power, pretended to dispose of all ecclesiastical preferments in Christendom [C]. In the mean time, Boniface, Archbishop

[A] Was born — towards the beginning of the XIIIth century.] This I infer from the time when he laid the foundation of St Peter's college, which was in 1257, and from his death, which happened in 1286, as will be shewn presently. So that in all likelihood he was born about the year 1210 or 1215. — And that it was very customary, in former times, for people to take their surnames from the place of their birth, is so very certain as not to need any proof.

[B] So strong a place as Ely.] It is a place of very great natural strength, as being an isle, and all the country round covered with water in the winter-time. And therefore, several persons revolting against King William I. in 1070, they retired to Ely, as a place of the greatest safety, in eadem pro castro et loco tuto morantes, and there endured a long siege or blockade (1).

[C] Pretended to dispose of all ecclesiastical preferments.] The Pope taking an advantage of the frequent appeals made to him, upon any controverted elections, came by degrees to render himself master of most preferments; and to maintain, that he had an incontestable right to dispose of them as he thought convenient. Accordingly, he usurped the collation of almost all the church-preferments, not excepting the bishopricks and archbishopricks, contrary to the rights of the King, the Chapters, and the Patrons. This encroachment grew at length to that height, that there was not a benefice, great or small, in England, but what the Popes disposed of, by the infallible means they had contrived to be masters of all the collations. Sometimes, pretending not to like, or finding an objection against, the person recommended to them for confirmation, they set him aside and nominated another. One while, by the plenitude of the apostolical power, they reserved to themselves all the Benefices which should become void by translation. Another while, such as should be vacant by death, or any other way whatever. And finally, they bestowed the bishopricks, and other benefices, even before they were vacant, by way of Provision (2).

[D] They,

Archbishop of Canterbury, used his utmost interest at Rome to obstruct Hugh de Balsam's confirmation, tho' he could alledge no one fault against him; and recommended Adam de Maris, a learned Minorite Frier, as a fit person to be promoted to the bishoprick: but all his endeavours proved unsuccessful. As to Wengham, having been recommended by the King without his own desire and knowledge, he did not stir in the least to get himself elected by the Monks; but rather, out of an uncommon excess of modesty, declined the honour, alledging that the two others (Balsam and Maris) were more worthy of it, and more deserving than himself. This matter remained in suspense for above ten years, and was at length determined in favour of Hugh de Balsam. For Wengham being promoted to the bishoprick of London, upon Fulk de Basset's decease; the Pope confirmed Hugh de Balsam's election, on the 10th of March 1257, and he was consecrated the 14th of October following. Being thus fixed in his See, he applied himself to works of charity, and particularly, in the year 1257 (e), or 1259 according to some (f), put in execution what he had designed, if not begun, before; that is, he laid the foundation of St Peter's college, the first college in the university of Cambridge. He built it without Trumpington gate, near the church of St Peter, (since demolished) from whence it took its name; and on the place where stood Jesus Hostel, or de penitentia Jesu Christi, and St John's hospital (g), which he purchased and united. At first, he only provided lodgings for the scholars, who were before obliged to hire chambers of the townsmen at an extravagant rate (h); and they, and the secular brethren of St John the Baptist, lived together till the year 1280 [D]. Then the Monks passing over to him their right to the hospital abovementioned, he endowed his college, on the 30th of March of the same year (i), with maintenance for one Master, fourteen Fellows, two Bible-clerks, and eight poor scholars, whose number might be increased or diminished, according to the improvement or abatement of their revenues. And he appointed his successors, the Bishops of Ely, to be honorary Patrons and Visitors of that college (k). The revenues of it have since been augmented by several benefactors [E]. The munificent founder had not the satisfaction to see all things finished before his decease (l). He died at Dodington June 16, 1286, and was buried in the cathedral church of Ely, before the high altar (m).

[D] They, and the secular brethren of St John the Baptist, lived together till the year 1280.] I follow J. Caius in fixing the endowment of this college at the year 1280, tho' he seems to imply afterwards, that it was not done till 1282 (3). T. Fuller places it in the same year (4), and others say, the founder settled not the endowment till the year 1284 (5). Perhaps, the whole difference between them consists in this, that there might be a space of some few years between his beginning to endow, and his finally settling the endowment. He removed the secular brethren mentioned above, to his new college; having before separated them from the regulars, whose monastery stood near All-saints church, and translated them to the place where he founded his college. St Peter's church, which stood near it, falling down, the church of St Mary's de Gratia, or of Grace, was built where it now stands, from whence the college came to be commonly stiled for an hundred years together, the college of St Mary's of Grace (6).

[E] The revenues of it have since been augmented by several benefactors.] The chief of them have been Simon de Montacute, Simon Langham, and John Fordham, Bishops of Ely. This college consists at present of twenty two fellows, thirty four bible-clerks, and eight poor scholars.

BAMBRIDGE or BAINBRIDGE (CHRISTOPHER) Archbishop of York, and Cardinal-Priest of the Roman Church, was born at Hilton near Appleby in Westmorland, and educated at Queen's college in Oxford. Having taken holy orders, he became Rector of Aller in the diocese of Bath and Wells. He enjoyed three Pretends successively in the cathedral church of Salisbury; that of South-Grantham in 1485, that of Chardstock the same year, and that of Horton in 1486. He was elected Provost of Queen's college in 1495, and about the same time created Doctor of Laws. On September the 28th 1503, he was admitted Prebendary of Strenshall in the cathedral church of York, void by the consecration of Jeffrey Blyth to the See of Lichfield and Coventry; and on the 21st of December following, he was installed in the deanery of that church, in the room of the said Blyth. In 1505 he was made Dean of Windfor, and the same year Master of the Rolls, and one of the King's Privy-Council. In 1507, he was advanced to the See of Durham, and received the temporalities the 17th of November. The next year he was translated to the archbishoprick of York, and received the temporalities the 12th of December (a). Pits assures us, that Bambridge had been very intimate with Morton Archbishop of Canterbury, and shared in that Prelate's sufferings during the usurpation of Richard III: after whose death, his affairs took a more prosperous turn; for he was appointed Almoner to King Henry VII, and employed by that Prince on several embassies to the Emperor Maximilian, Charles VIII King of France, and other potentates of Europe (b). But he distinguished himself chiefly by his embassy from King Henry VIII to Pope Julius II, who created him a Cardinal [A], with the title

title of St Praxede, in March 1511 (c), and, eight days after, appointed him Legate of the ecclesiastical army, which had been sent into the Ferrarese, and were then besieging the fort of Bassia (d). In return for which marks of honour, our new Cardinal and Legate prevailed with the King his master, to take part with his Holiness against the King of France [B]. Nor was he less zealous in the service of that Pontiff during his life, than in honouring and defending his memory after his death (e). There are extant in Rymer's Fœdera, &c. (f) two letters; one from Cardinal Bambridge, during his residence at Rome, to King Henry VIII [C], concerning the Pope's Bull giving him the title of Moss Christian King; and another from the Cardinal de Sinigallia to the King [D], acquainting his Highness that he had delivered that instrument to Cardinal Bambridge. This Prelate died at Rome, the 14th of July 1514, being poisoned by one of his domestics, in revenge for some blows he had given him [E]; and was buried there in the English church of St Thomas (g) [F]. jealous of the honour, which the King of France, his neighbour, was acquiring in Italy, and the considerable advantages his most Christian Majesty every day gained over the Venetians, against whom a league of the most powerful princes of Europe had been lately formed at Cambrai; dispatched the new Archbishop of York, Ambassador to Rome, with express orders to favour as much as possible the party of the Venetians, and to endeavour, by all means, to reconcile them to the Pope: An employment (adds our author) truly worthy of so great a Prelate, and an embassy highly becoming an Archbishop, if Christian charity alone, and a desire of promoting the general peace of Europe, had been the motive of this illustrious mediation, and not rather a secret passion in the English King to extinguish the war in Italy, in hopes of seeing it break out again in France. To effect which, our Ambassador, who mingled his own interests with those of his Prince, and had his eye upon the red hat, carried on his negotiations at first with so much artifice and disguise, that the real intentions of his master were not presently discovered. But the league against the Venetians being broken, and the Pope having picked a quarrel with the King of France, his Holiness, in order to gain over the King of England to his side, caressed his Ambassador more than ever, and not only created him a Cardinal, but gave him likewise the precedence, which belonged of right to the Archbishop of Siponto, as being the eldest Prelate of the eight or nine, who were promoted in the same creation. An historian of our own (2) tells us, the Pope solicited King Henry VIII, by putting him in mind of the glory of his ancestors, and offering him the honour to be, Caput Fœderis Italici, head of the Italian league; whereupon our King sent Christopher Bambridge, Archbishop of York, to reside at Rome, and treat of these matters. In his epitaph (3), it is said, he was created a Cardinal for his eminent services done to the Holy See; but, if M. Aubery has set the affair in a true light, the red hat was rather the motive to, than the consequence of, his merit; rather the bribe, than the reward, of his services.

[B] He prevailed with his master to take part with the Pope against the King of France.] The observation in the close of the last remark is farther confirmed by what Polydore Vergil tells us, that Cardinal Bambridge sent dispatches to the King, to acquaint him, that the Pope expected assistance from England; and as he was sensible of the great obligations he lay under to that Pontiff, for the honour of the Cardinalate conferred upon him, he was the more urgent with the King to undertake his Holiness's cause, and not to suffer a Pope, who had so strenuously asserted the liberties of Christendom, to fall a sacrifice to his enemies. The Cardinal's zeal upon this occasion influenced the King to lay the affair before his Council; in which, after long debates, it was resolved to undertake the war. Legatus interea Anglus Christophorus Cardinalis literis et nuntiis significabat Henrico Regi, Julium Pontificem auxilia ab Anglia expectare, et quo magis sciebat se Pontifici ob delatum sibi Cardinalatus honorem debere, hoc impensius obtestabatur, rogabatque regem, ut ejus salutis rationem haberet, ac neququam Pontificem, de reipublicæ Christianæ libertate optimè meritum, pateretur ab improbis hominibus oppressum iri — Christophori studium ita Henricum permovit, ut res ad Concilium delata sit. Multæ et variæ sententiæ in utramque partem dictæ sunt. — Ita bellum esse suscipiendum, decretum est (4).

[C] A Letter from Cardinal Bambridge to King Henry VIII.] In this letter there is mention of a certain brief of Julius II, committed to the keeping of the Cardinal de Sinigallia, in order to be delivered to King Henry, after he had vanquished the enemies of the Church. In all probability, this was a brief, by which Julius transferred to Henry, the title of Moss Christian King. Cardinal Bambridge having demanded it of the Cardinal de Sinigallia, after the battle of Guinegate, and the taking of Terouane, the latter answered, That he could not deliver it without an express order signed by the King's own hand. It appears by this letter, that there was some formality wanting in the Pope's brief, and that it was apprehended, there would be a difficulty in getting it confirmed by Leo X, who succeeded Julius. Cardinal Bambridge's letter is dated at Rome, Sept. 12, 1513 (5).

[D] A letter from the Cardinal de Sinigallia to the King.] It is dated at Rome, Oct. 14, 1513 (6). He therein gives the King the title of His most Christian Majesty; which is a confirmation of the conjecture in the last remark. To which may be added, that Lord Herbert, who had seen the original contract of the capitulation of Toumay, dated Sept. 23, 1513, expressly tells us (7), That the citizens therein gave King Henry the title of Roy très Chrétien, that is, the Moss Christian King.

[E] He was poisoned by one of his domesticks.] M. Aubery informs us (8), that the Cardinal, being one day in a violent passion, to which he was naturally subject, fell upon his Major-Domo, one Renaud of Modena, and beat him excessively; and that the enraged domestic revenged the beating with a dose of a poison, which he found means to administer to his master; for which being apprehended and imprisoned, he prevented the execution of publick justice by hanging himself. That whimsical author Dr Fuller says upon this occasion: Herein something may be pleaded for this Cardinal out of the Old, sure I am, more must be pleaded against him out of the New Testament, if the places be paralleled:

A servant will not be corrected by words, &c.	A Bishop must be no striker, &c.

But grant him greatly faulty, it were uncharitable in us to beat his memory with more stripes, who did then suffer so much for his own indiscretion (9).

[F] He was buried in the English church of St Thomas.] On his tomb was the following epitaph (10).

nothing of which has come down to us. But a foreign author has given us a very different idea of this Cardinal's abilities [G]. The abovementioned writer (i) is mistaken (i) Pits, ibid. in giving him the name of Christopher Urswic [H].

[G] A foreign author gives us a very different idea of the Cardinal's abilities.] This author is Paris de Grassi, who relates (11), that Bambridge, before his advancement to the purple, being one day to return thanks to the Pope and the Sacred College, for the honour done to the King his master in sending him the Golden Rose, was forced to break off his speech, and to quit the Confistory in great confusion. And the like disgrace befel him when Cardinal, a few days after his promotion; for it being his lot to thank the Dean of the Sacred College, in the name of all the new Cardinals, he was again at a loss, and, what was still worse, spoke directly contrary to the instructions given him by the Master of the Ceremonies; which were, to divide his speech into four points, to magnify, under the first, the dignity of the Cardinalate; to lessen, in the second, the merit of himself and his associates; in the third, to extol the goodness and condescension of the Pope; and to end with compliments of thanks, and offers of their most humble service.

[H] Pits is mistaken in giving him the name of Christopher Urswic.] Christophorus Urswicus, says he (12), quem alii Bambriggum, alii Branbridge, cognominant, &c. But Anthony Wood assures us (13), that Christopher Urswic was the Cardinal's predecessor in the deanery of Windfor.

BANCROFT (RICHARD), Archbishop of Canterbury in the reign of King James I, was son of John Bancroft, Gentleman, and Mary daughter of Mr John Curwyn, brother of Dr Hugh Curwyn, Archbishop of Dublin (a); and was born at Farnworth in Lancashire in September 1544. After being severely trained up in grammatical learning, he was entered a student of Christ-college in Cambridge, where, in 1566-7, he took the degree of Bachelor of Arts (b); and from thence he removed to Jesus-college, where, in 1570, he commenced Master of Arts (c). Soon after, he was made Chaplain to Dr Cox Bishop of Ely, who, in 1575, gave him the rectory of Tevertham in Cambridgeshire (d). The year following, he was licensed one of the university Preachers (e); and, in 1580, was admitted Bachelor of Divinity (f). September the 14th, 1584, he was instituted to the rectory of St Andrew, Holbourn, at the presentation of the executors of Henry Earl of Southampton (g). In 1585, he commenced Doctor in Divinity; and the same year, was made Treasurer of St Paul's cathedral in London (h). The year following, he became Rector of Cottingham in Northamptonshire, at the presentation of Sir Christopher Hatton, Lord-Chancellor, whose Chaplain he then was (i). February the 25th 1589, he was made a Prebendary of St Paul's (k); in 1592, advanced to the same dignity in the collegiate church of Westminster (l); and, in 1594, promoted to a stall in the cathedral of Canterbury (m). Not long before, he had distinguished his zeal for the Church of England by a learned and significant Sermon, preached* against the Puritans at St Paul's Cross [A]. In 1597,

[A] He preached a sermon against the Puritans at St Paul's cross.] We will give the reader an extract of this discourse, as it is made by one of our historians. The Sermon itself is prefixed to the Archbishop's Survey of the pretended Holy Discipline — His text was: Dearly beloved, believe not every spirit; but try the spirits, whether they be of God; for many false prophets are gone out into the world: 1 John iv. 1. In prosecuting this text, he gave a strong image of the Puritans, and painted them in glowing colours. He set forth their intemperate language against Bishops, described their ambition, and such other indirect motives, that pushed them to mutiny and publick disturbance. Among other things, he charges the party with covetousness; he laments that slibly lucre was frequently made the pretence of Reformation; and that the prospect many persons had of plundering Bishopsricks, seizing the endowments of cathedrals, and scrambling for the remainder of the church revenues, was the principal cause of nonconformity and schism in this Church. He adds, that had not clear evidence drove him to this censure, he should have forbore the imputation. To explain himself farther upon this head, he divides the Nonconformists into Clergy and Laity, and considers their pretensions apart. Their Clergy make a warm demand of all the livings settled upon the establishing Church. These estates, they pretend, ought to be conveyed to their Presbyteries. And, for fear of being underfurnished, they put in a claim to the abbey-lands. To this purpose, in a petition to the parliament exhibited in the name of the Commonalty, they lay it down for a maxim in Divinity, that things once dedicated to religious uses, are unalienable from their original intendment: When they are thus enclosed by vows, and solemn conveyance, they ought never to be thrown open to the world. The Lay-Nonconformists were of a quite different sentiment, and ran boldly to a scandalous extrem. For this he quotes a pamphlet, called, An Admonition to the people of England. Our preachers, say these Lay-Puritans, ought to live by the example of Christ and his Apostles.

Now no one was more unprovided with conveniencies than their master: He had no place where to lay his head: Luke ix. And as for the Apostles, their predecessors, Silver and gold they had none: Acts iii. Now why should these men, whose industry and merit are less, be better accommodated? Why should those, who are so much inferior to the Apostles in their qualifications, exceed them in figure and preferment? There is no coarfeness in eating or drefs, which men of their profession ought to repine at. Alas! their dignities and promotions do but hinder them in their business, and disserve their character. And, to turn these men's artillery upon themselves, and ruin them by their own reasoning, he borrows some of the principles of the German Anabaptists. And here he directs his discourse to the poorer sort of the audience in this manner: 'My brethren, says he, these gentlemen of the laity use you extremely ill. The children of God, you know, are heirs of the world: The earth is the Lord's, and the Saints are to inherit it. The wicked therefore do but usurp the blessings of Providence, and hold their estates by a wrong title. You have an equal share with those of the best distinction in the kingdom of heaven: Why then will you suffer yourselves to be thrown out of your property upon earth, and acquiesce under so unequal a distribution? In the Apostles times, the faithful had all things common. Then those who had estates sold them, and laid the purchase money at the Apostles feet, and every one had his share in proportion to his necessity. And since the Christian religion is still the same, why is the usage so very different? But, alas! so it is; you are but little better than beasts of burthen to the wealthier sort. Your landlords make no scruple to rack your rents, to grind your faces, and exhaust your bodies. And to what end is all this oppression in liberty and livelihood? 'Tis to maintain an unnecessary equipage, to humour their pride, and feed their luxury: 'Tis to supply their pockets for gaming, and furnish their diversions of hawking and hunting. And are these warrantable motives 1597, Dr Bancroft, being then Chaplain to the Archbishop of Canterbury, Whitgift, was advanced to the See of London, in the room of Dr Richard Fletcher, and consecrated at Lambeth the 8th of May (n). From this time he had, in effect, the archiepiscopal power; for the Archbishop, being declined in years, and unfit for business, committed the sole management of ecclesiastical affairs to Bishop Bancroft (o). Soon after his being made Bishop, he expended 1000 marks in the repair of his house in London (p). In the year 1600, he, with others, was sent by Queen Elizabeth to Embden, to put an end to a difference between the English and Danes: but the embassy had no effect (q). This Prelate interposed in the disputes between the Secular Priests and the Jesuits, and furnished some of the former with materials to write against their adversaries [B]. In the beginning of King James's reign, Bishop Bancroft was present at the conference held at Hampton-Court [C], between the Bishops and the Presbyterian Ministers (r).

The

‘ motives to keep the greatest part of the world low and uneasy? To make them wear out their lives in labour and poverty? Why don't you push for redress of these grievances, and revive the practice of the Apostles times? To attempt something of this kind would be charity to your wealthy neighbours, no less than yourselves. For these bulky estates of theirs do but pamper their pride, abate their zeal, and check their progress in virtue. Indeed, unless you make them primitive Christians in their fortunes, they will never be so in their lives; unless you reduce them to evangelical poverty, and rescue them from their riches, they must be undone.’ Dr Bancroft here puts the question to the wealthier part of the audience, how they like this doctrine? And, if they are unwilling to have it practised upon themselves, they should take care not to urge it against the Clergy: Thus much for covetousness. To make the text bear upon the Dissenters in other respects, he shews on what a weak foundation they erected their discipline: That there were no traces of this scheme from the Apostles time down to Calvin: That the parity these men are so earnest to bring into the Church, was made a mark of infamy in the Arian heretics. Farther, he represented the great danger, which must inevitably follow, if private men should contest the constitutions of the Church, and presume to over-rule that which had been settled by so considerable an authority. And, as to their complaint of the rigour of forcing them upon subscription of articles, he endeavours to justify this imposition by the precedent of Geneva, and some other Reformed Churches in Germany. The Doctor proceeds to insist upon the excellency and unexceptionableness of the Common-Prayer-Book; shews what commendation had been given it by foreign Divines; how it was approved by Bucer, Alesius, and Fox, and by the Parliaments and Convocations of this realm; how Archbishop Cramer had defended it against the Papists, and Bishop Ridley against Knox, and others. And here he argues from the absurdity of extemporary prayers, and how often such unpremeditated devotions slide into indecency and irreverence. Next, he maintains the superiority of Bishops over Presbyters, argues for the civil supremacy, and alarms the audience with the danger they had reason to apprehend from the practice and principles of the Disciplinaryans (1). This sermon was managed with great learning and strength of argument, and in all likelihood made an impression. And of this the Act of Grace, at the breaking up of the parliament, seems something of a proof. For those, who did not come to church, hear divine service, and conform to the ecclesiastical establishment, were excepted from the benefit of this act (2).

[B] He furnished some of the Secular Priests with materials to write against the Jesuits. The reader is to know, that there were great misunderstandings at that time between the Secular Priests of the Romish Clergy and the Jesuits. And it is probable, the assistance Bishop Bancroft lent the former, was, partly to keep up the division, and partly to encourage the honest side. For, that the Seculars, notwithstanding their difference in religion, were men of loyal principles, appears by a paper signed by several of them about that time, and by themselves delivered into Bancroft's hands: A copy of it may be seen in the above-cited historian (3).

[C] He was present at the conference held at Hampton-Court. The reader may see an account of this famous conference, which was held in the King's presence, in a piece entitled; The Sum and Substance of the Conference held at Hampton-Court. By William

Barlow, Doctor in Divinity, and Dean of Chester. Printed in 1604. We shall only take notice here of what particularly relates to the Bishop of London's behaviour upon this occasion. In the first day's conference, the King having desired the Bishops to satisfy him in three things, namely, about Confirmation, Ab-solution, and Private Baptism, as practised in the Church of England; Bishop Bancroft seconded Archbishop Whitgift in giving his Majesty the satisfaction he required. With respect to Confirmation, he alleged, that it had not only the practice of the Primitive Church, and the testimony of the Fathers, in it's defence, but that it was likewise an Apostolical institution, and a part of the doctrines expressly mentioned in the Epistle to the Hebrews, ch. vi. ver. 2. He added, that Calvin expounded that passage in this sense; and earnestly wished the custom might be revived in those Churches, which had suppressed it. As to the point of Ab-solution, the Archbishop having cleared the practice of the Church of England from all abuse and superstition, and appealed for this to the Confession and Ab-solution in the beginning of the Communion-Book; the Bishop of London, stepping forward, told the King, that in the Communion-Book there was another particular and personal form of ab-solution, prescribed in the Visitation of the Sick; adding withal, that not only the Confessions of Augsb-urgh, Bohemia, and Saxony, retained it; but that Calvin approved such a general Confession and Ab-solution as is used in the Church of England. The form being read, the King liked it extremely, and called it an Apostolical Ordinance. In regard to Private Baptism, the Archbishop having endeavoured to satisfy his Majesty, that the administration of baptism by women and lay-persons was not allowed by the Church of England; and the Bishop of Worcester having allowed that the words of the office were ambiguous, and might be construed so as to permit such a practice; the Bishop of London, not satisfied with this discourse, replied, that the learned and reverend compilers of the Common-Prayer had no intention to mislead the people by perplexed and double-meaning expressions, but really designed a permission to private persons for baptizing in cases of necessity; and for this he appealed to their letters, some passages of which were read. He proceeded to prove, that this permission was agreeable to the practice of the Primitive Church; and to this purpose he urged the text in the second of the Acts, where three thousand are said to have been baptized in one day; alledging, that it was impossible, or at least improbable, that the Apostles could administer that sacrament to such numbers in so short a time; and that, in those early days of Christianity, there were no Bishops or Priests besides the Apostles. He likewise cited the authorities of Tertullian and St Ambrose. And here he laid open the absurdity and impiety of supposing no necessity of baptism. In the second day's conference, the Bishop of London, perceiving, that the design of the Presbyterians was entirely to overthrow the Ecclesiastical Constitution, humbly moved the King, first, that the ancient canon, Schismatici contra Episcopos non sunt audiendi, might be remembered: Secondly, that, if any of the Agents for the Nonconformists had subscribed the Communion-Book, and yet exhibited a remonstrance against it, they might be set aside, pursuant to an antient Council, in which it is decreed, that no man shall plead against his own act and subscription. But the King interposing, ordered the Bishop to reply to the exceptions made by Dr Reynolds, one of the Nonconformist Delegates. This gave the Bishop occasion to declare his opinion,

The same year, 1603, he was appointed one of the Commissioners for regulating the affairs of the Church, and for perusing and suppressing books, printed in England, or brought into the realm without publick authority (s). A Convocation being summoned to meet March 20, 1603-4, and Archbishop Whitgift dying in the mean time, Bishop Bancroft was, by the King's writ, appointed President of that assembly (t). October 9th 1604, he was nominated to succeed the Archbishop in that high dignity, to which he was elected by the Dean and Chapter Nov. 17, and confirmed in Lambeth chapel Dec. 10 (u). Sept. 5, 1605, he was sworn one of his Majesty's most honourable Privy Council (w). This year, in Michaelmas-term, Archbishop Bancroft exhibited certain articles, to the Lords of the Council, against the Judges [D]. In 1608 he was declared Chancellor opinion, first, with respect to Predestination: This proposition, If I shall be saved, I shall be saved, he called a desperate doctrine. He alledged, that it was a contradiction to orthodox belief; that in the points of Predestination, we should rather infer ascendendo than descendendo, that is, we should conclude our Election from the regularity of our lives, rather than rest our happiness upon any absolute irrelative decree; and that if God has ordained us to happiness, no habits or degrees of wickedness can make us miscarry. From hence the Bishop went on to acquaint his Majesty with the doctrine of the Church of England touching Predestination. Secondly, Reynolds having objected the inconvenience of reserving Confirmation to the Bishop alone, it being impracticable for the Diocesan to examine all who came to be confirmed; Bancroft replied, that it was the custom of the Bishops, in their visitations, to appoint either their Chaplains, or some other Ministers, to examine those who came to be confirmed; and that they seldom confirmed any, unless their qualifications were certified by their own Parsons or Curates. To the opinion, his answer was, that none of the Fathers ever admitted any to confirm, under the order of Bishops; and that even St Jerome (tho' otherwise no friend to the episcopal superiority) confesses, the executing this function was solely lodged with the Bishops; tho' with this qualifying expression, ad bonorem potius sacerdotii, quam ad legis necessitatem. However, this Father owns, the Bishops ought to have a power paramount to the rest of the Clergy; and that, without this prerogative, the unity and well-being of the Church could not subsist. In this conference, Reynolds having moved for several alterations in doctrine and discipline, Bishop Bancroft addressed the King kneeling, and humbly desired, that since it was a time for moving petitions, he might have leave to put up two or three. First, he requested, that care might be taken for a Praying Clergy: For notwithstanding there are many serviceable branches in the sacerdotal function, such as absolving penitents, praying for the people, pronouncing the blessing, and administering the sacraments, it is now (said he) come to that pass, that some men conceive the duty of a parish Priest is wholly confined to the Pulpit; where, God knows, they sometimes manage with a very slender share either of learning or discretion; that preaching has such an ascendant in their fancy, that the celebrating divine service is scandalously neglected; that some Ministers chose rather to walk in the church-yard 'till sermon time, than join in publick prayer. He confessed, that for missionaries in unconverted countries, where a Church was planting, preaching was most necessary; but, where Christianity had been a long time settled, he thought pulpit-harangues were not the only business of a Pastor, and that this exercise ought not to be followed to the neglect of other parts of his office. This motion was highly approved by the King. The Bishop's second request was, that 'till men of learning and sufficiency might be procured for every congregation, godly Homilies might be read, and their number increased; and that those men, who had decried these instructions, would retract their censures, and endeavour to bring them into credit. The Bishop's reason for recommending the homilies was, because every clergyman that could pronounce well had not a talent of composing. Both the King and the Agents thought this request very reasonable. The Lord Chancellor taking occasion here to argue against pluralities, and expressing his wishes, that some Clergymen might have single coats before others had doublets, adding that himself had managed in this manner in bestowing the benefices in the King's gift; the Bishop of London replied, I commend your honour- able care that way; but a doublet is necessary in cold weather. The Bishop of London's last motion was, that pulpits might not be turned into batteries, and every malecontent allowed to play his spleen against his superiors from thence. The King received this complaint very graciously, and advised, in case of any misconduct in Church-officers, not to let fly personal reflexions from the pulpit, but to appeal in the first place to the Ordinary, then to the Archbishop, from thence to the Lords of the Council; and if all these applications fell short of a Remedy, then to bring the grievance before his Majesty himself. The King chalked out this method, upon the Bishop of London's suggesting, that in case he left himself open to receive all complaints at the first instance, neither his Majesty would be quiet, nor his under-officers regarded; for the criminal, when pressed with discipline, would immediately threaten the carrying his complaint before the King. Thus much it was thought proper to set down of the conference at Hampton-Court, in which Bishop Bancroft bore so considerable a share.

[D] He exhibited articles to the Lords of the Council against the Judges.] They were entituled, Certain Articles of Abuses, which are desired to be reformed, in granting Prohibitions. To this remonstrance, in Easter-term following, all the Judges in England gave in their answers signed to the Council-Board; which unanimous resolution, Sir Edward Coke calls the Highest Authority in Law (4). Upon which Mr Collier has the following remark: 'This case being a complaint of encroachment, and a contest for jurisdiction between the temporal and ecclesiastical Judges, by the principles of equity the controversy ought to be decided by neither side. That this learned Gentleman (Sir Edward Coke) was clearly of this opinion, when competition and conquest was not in his view, appears from his report of Dr Bonham's case. Coke's Rep. lib. 8. fol. 117, &c. The Censors of the College of Physicians had imprisoned this Dr Bonham for practising in London without their licence. Bonham brings an action of false imprisonment against the College. In reporting this, Coke cites the judgment of Warberton, Chief-Justice, and Daniel, another of the Justices, that the Censors of the College of Physicians could not to be judges and parties, Quia aliquis non debet esse Judex in propria causa; and that no body can be Judge and Attorney for any party. Dyer 3. Ed. VI. fol. 65. 38 Ed. III. 15. 8 Hen. VI. 19, 20, 21. Ed. IV. 47, &c. This in the opinion of these reverend Judges is so fundamental a maxim of reason and common-law, that even an act of parliament shall be over-ruled by it. Thus for the purpose: If a statute impowers any person to have cognizance of all manner of pleas, arising within his manor, notwithstanding such an act, he shall hold no plea of any matter where himself is a party: The reason assigned is, iniquum esse aliquem suæ rei esse Judicem. In the close of the argument, Coke, then Chief-Justice of the Common-Pleas, where the cause was tried, declares the College no Judge in the present dispute: And, in short, judgment was given for the plaintiff. By this Report 'tis plain the Judges resolution upon Bancroft's Articles are so far from being the Highest Authority in Law, that they are no authority at all. What they deliver is in favour of their own jurisdiction and interest: And thus, by being deeply parties, they are by this Report disabled from pronouncing in the cause (5). The reader may see the articles exhibited by Bancroft, together with the answers given in by the Judges, transcribed at length from the Record, in the historian just cited (6).

[E] He was Chancellor of the University of Oxford. In the time of his chancellorship, a dispute was determined between the University and New College. By a composition entered into between William of Wickham, founder of that college, and the University, it was agreed, that the fellows thereof should be admitted to all degrees in the University, without asking any grace of the congregation of masters, or undergoing any examination for them in the publick schools, provided they were examined in the college according to the form of the University, and had their graces given them in like manner by the government of the house. But in process of time, the other students of the University envying this privilege, it began to be disputed by the Regent-Masters in 1607; and the affair was brought before the Chancellor, who adjudged the controversy in favour of the college (7).

[F] He offered to the parliament a project for the better providing a maintenance for the Clergy. The heads of the scheme are as follows (8). I. That all Predial Tythes of Benefices with Cure may be paid in kind hereafter. II. That Personal Tythes may be urged upon Oath, being confessed to be due by Law. III. That as Oblations are due by Law to Parsons and Vicars that have Cure of Souls, they may accordingly be paid unto them as heretofore hath been accustomed; viz. at Marriages, Burials, and upon solemn Feast-days, as Christmas-day, Easter-day, Whitsunday, Allhallowes-day, and at the Times of receiving the Holy Communion, &c. IV. That all Abbey-Lands now exempted may pay Tythes in kind to the Parsons and Vicars, in whose Parishes they lye. V. That all lands altered within these sixty years past from tillage may pay Tythes according to the value they formerly paid. VI. That all Parks and Warrens, made within these sixty years last past, may pay Tythes, either according to their former value when they were in Tillage, or according to some reasonable rate by the Acre. VII. That Parks disparked within these sixty years may pay Tythes in kind. VIII. That the Occupiers of Lands of such parishes that have been within these sixty years past utterly depopulated, and do now pay no Tythes at all, may hereafter pay all their Tythes in kind to the next poor Parsons adjoining. IX. That small benefices near adjoining may be so united, as they may be holden by one man. X. That Parsons and Vicars may have right and freedom of Common with the rest of the Parishioners. XI. That the antient ecclesiastical Constitution in England for paying of Tythe-Lambs, and Wool, may be renewed and established. Lindewood de Decimis. § Quoniam. XII. That all persons may hereafter be discharged, which are not paid to ecclesiastical Persons. XIII. That Ministers in cities and towns incorporate, and other great towns, may have their tythes according to the Rents of Houses, after the rate of London. XIV. That the Landlords of such houses in every city incorporate, and great towns, may be chargeable with such payments to their Ministers, and not their Undertenants. XV. That Parsons and Vicars may have Tythe-wood duly paid to them, according to the Constitution of John Stratford, Archbishop of Canterbury. Lindewood, de verborum significatione. XVI. That an order may be taken for the settling of Glebe-Lands, which are by strong hand detained from divers Parsons and Vicars, by some Commissions for survey upon oaths; and that it may be provided, that no Patron, or Lord of any Manor in any parish, may hereafter have the Glebe in farm. XVII. That in Chapels of ease the Cure may be maintained hereafter by them that have ease thereby, without diminishing the Parson's or Vicar's tythes. XVIII. That it may be lawful hereafter for any well-disposed man or woman to give, purchase, or lay Tenements, Rents, Lands, or Annuities in fee, to the Glebe of the Church, notwithstanding the Statute of Mortmain. XIX. That all Lay Patrons, when they present any Minister to an ecclesiastical Living, may take the like oath against Simony that Ministers do; or else that they may forfeit their Patronage for ever to the King, when it shall be proved, that they have committed Simony upon any such presentation. XX. That it may be held Simony to sell Advowsons as well as Presentations; or that all Advowsons to be made hereafter may be utterly void. XXI. That the Tythes of Oade, Hops, Roots, Coals, and other Minerals, and likewise of Lime Kilns and Brick-kilns, may be truly paid to the Parson or Vicar that hath Cure of Souls. XXII. That it may be lawful for spiritual persons to purchase and take leases for Lives or Years, as other of his Majesty's subjects may do, notwithstanding any Statutes made to the contrary. XXIII. That all Lands, that have been either won from the Sea, or otherwise drained and recovered from surrounding, may be laid to some Parishes adjoining; and that the Owners or Occupiers, and all others that have any benefit of such Lands, may pay their tythes in kind to the Parsons or Vicars of those parishes, whereunto the said Lands are laid. XXIV. That a Subsidy may be granted for the redeeming of Improvements, and that the same redeemed may be of the Bishop's patronage, in whose Diocese they lye. XXV. That if the last motion may not now be entertained, then there may be a free passage given to the Law yet in force, (as it is supposed) that all Improvements may be declared void, and become Presentatives, which have no endowment for Vicars. XXVI. That where there are Vicaridges endowed, which do belong to Improvements, but yet are no competent Living for a sufficient Minister, Bishops may have authority in their Dioceses, where such Vicaridges are, to allot some farther portions for their better maintenance out of the said Improvements. XXVII. That some Order may be set down for the repairing of Chancels of Churches impropriate, which are every where in wonderful decay. XXVIII. That Mortuaries may be restored. Here Bancroft's project seems to have ended, though the subject is continued upon a break with these initial letters,

The L. S.

By this scheme (tho' the attempt failed of success) the Archbishop's care for the interest of the Clergy, and his capacity in suggesting measures, are sufficiently discovered.

[G] It is said, he set on foot the building a college near Chelsea. Let us hear what Wilson says of this affair: 'It was he (the Archbishop) that first brought the King to begin a new college by Chelsea, where in the choice and ablest scholars of the kingdom, and the most pregnant wits in matters of controversies were to be associated under a Provoost, with a fair and ample allowance, not exceeding three thousand pounds a year, whose design was to answer all Popish books, or others, that vented their malignant spirits against the Protestant religion, either the heresies of the Papists, or the errors of those that struck at Hierarchy; so that they should be two-edged fellows, that would make old cutting and slashing; and this he forwarded with all industry during his time; and there is yet a formal act of parliament in being for the establishment of it: But after his death, the King wisely considered, that nothing begets more contention than opposition, and such fuelers would be apt to inflame, rather than quench the heat that would arise from those embers: For controversies are often (or for the most part) the exuberancies of passion; and the Philosopher saith, men are drunk with disputes, and in that inordinateness take the next thing that comes to hand to throw at one another's faces: So that the design fell to the ground with him; and there is only so much building standing by the Thames side, as to shew, that what he intended to plant, he meant should be well watered; and yet it withered in the bud (9).' The Editor of the Complete History of England tells us, Wilson is mistaken about the original of this intended college at Chelsea. He says, it was one Sutcliffe*, Doctor in Divinity, that procured a patent from King James for erecting this College, to consist of a Provoost and twenty Fellows, to be chosen by the Archbishop controversial writings against the Church of England. This Prelate died, Nov. 2, 1610, of the stone, in his palace at Lambeth (z). By his will he ordered his body to be interred in the chancel of Lambeth church [H]; and, besides other legacies, left all the books in his library to the Archbishops his successors for ever [I]. Archbishop Bancroft was a rigid disciplinarian, a learned controversialist (aa), an excellent preacher, a great statesman, and a vigilant governor of the Church; and filled the See of Canterbury with great reputation [K].

Archbishop of Canterbury, the Bishop of London, and the Vice-Chancellors of the two universities for the time being; which college he intended to build and endow, and in part did, with his own money, and the free contributions of others. He was the first Provost himself, and died either after Archbishop Bancroft, or about the same time; for there were three Provosts after him successively, whereof the learned Dr Feathly was one. Now (adds he) how far Archbishop Bancroft might encourage Sutcliffe's design, I know not: But if it had been originally Bancroft's own, it is not probable King James would have discouraged it afterwards as he did; or that his next successor but one, Archbishop Laud, would have utterly neglected a foundation laid by a Prelate, whose memory he held in the highest veneration, and whose maxims and character he made it his business to imitate (10).

[H] He ordered his body to be interred in the chancel of Lambeth church. He likewise ordered, that his body should not be opened, but be buried within forty or fifty hours after his decease; that all needless expences should be avoided; and that, upon some Sunday within a month after his death, the then Bishop of London (Abbot), or the Bishop of Chichester (Harriet), or one of his Chaplains, should be desired to preach in Lambeth church, and to make such mention of him, as might tend to God's glory (11). On a flat stone over his grave, is the following inscription (12).

Volente Deo,

Hic jacet Richardus Bancroft, S. Theologiae Professor, Episcopus Londinensis primo, Deinde Cantuariensis Archiepiscopus, et Regi Jacobo a secretioribus Consiliis. Obiit Secundo Novembris An. Dom. 1610. Ætatis suæ 67.

Volente Deo.

[I] He left his library to the Archbishops his successors for ever. He left it conditionally, that his successor should give security, that he would leave it entire and without embezzlement; but upon refusal of such security, he bequeathed it to Chelsea college, then building, on condition it should be finished in a certain term of years after his decease; but if not, he gave it to the University of Cambridge (13). Whether his successors, Abbot and Laud, gave the security demanded, appears not; however, the books continued at Lambeth till the approach of the troublesome times, when (Chelsea college having failed, and the order of Bishops being voted down) Mr Selden suggested to the University of Cambridge their right to the said books; and accordingly, by order of parliament, not only Bancroft's books, but those likewise of his successor Abbot, were delivered into the possession of the university, and by them kept till after the Restoration, when Archbishop Juxon demanded them back; and he dying in a short time, his successor Sheldon pursued the same demand so effectually, that to him they were restored (14).

[K] He filled the see of Canterbury with great commendation. Camden gives Archbishop Bancroft the character of a person of singular courage and prudence, in all matters relating to the discipline and establishment of the Church (15). Lord Clarendon, in his character of Archbishop Abbot (16), tells us, he was promoted to Canterbury, upon the never enough lamented death of Dr Bancroft, that Metropolitan, who understood the Church excellently, and had almost rescued it out of the hands of the Calvinian party, and very much subdued the unruly spirit of the Nonconformists, by, and after the conference at

Hampton-Court; countenanced men of the greatest parts in learning, and disposed the Clergy to a more solid course of study than they had been accustomed to; and, if he had lived, would quickly have extinguished all that fire in England, which had been kindled at Geneva; or if he had been succeeded by Bishop Andrews, Bishop Overall, or any man, who understood, and loved the Church, that infection would easily have been kept out, which could not afterwards be so easily expelled. Wilfon (17) does not speak so favourably of him; he calls him a person severe enough, whose roughness gained little upon those who deserted the ceremonies. Dr Fuller (18) treats him as a great Statesman, and Grand Champion of Church discipline, and tells us, he met with much opposition. Aud 'No wonder (adds this author) if those who were silenced by him in the Church, were loud against him in other places. David speaketh of poison under men's lips. This Bishop tasted plentifully thereof from the mouths of his enemies, till at last (as Mithridates) he was so habited to poisons, they became food unto him.' Hereupon Fuller tells us this story: 'Once a Gentleman coming to visit him, presented him with a libel, which he found past on his door; who nothing moved thereat, Cast it (said he) to an hundred more, which lye here on a heap in my chamber.' His enemies accused him of covetousness; but this asperion (the same author lets us know) was confuted by the estate which he left, small in proportion to his great preferment.' He cancelled his first will, in which he had bequeathed much to the Church, which occasioned the following invidious distich on him;

He who never repented of doing Ill, Repented that once he made a good Will.

whereas indeed (says the Doctor) suspecting an impression of popular violence on cathedrals, and fearing an alienation of what was bequeathed unto them, he thought fit to cancel his own, to prevent others cancelling his testament.' This Prelate governed with great vigour, and pressed a strict conformity to the Rubric and Canons, without the least allowance for latitude and different persuasion. This conduct was censured as too rigorous by those, who favoured the Nonconformists. The author of the Altar of Damascus reports, that three hundred preaching Ministers were either silenced or deprived for refusing to pass this test. But this narrative swells the number to a romantick bulk; for by the rolls delivered in by Bancroft not long before his death, it is evident there were but forty nine deprived upon any account whatever: Now this, in a kingdom of about nine thousand parishes, was no very tragical number. However by animadverting upon some few of the principals, he struck a terror into the rest, and made their scruples give way. In short, Bancroft's unrelenting strictness gave a new face to religion: The service of the Church was more solemnly performed; the fasts and festivals were better observed; the use of copes was revived; the surplice generally worn; and all things in a manner restored according to their first establishment under Queen Elizabeth. Some, who had formerly subscribed in a loose reserved sense, were now called upon to sign their conformity in more close, unequivocal, terms. For now the 36th canon obliged them to declare, that they did willingly and ex animo subscribe the three articles, and all things contained in the same. So that now there was no room left for scruples and different persuasion (19). Whether our Archbishop did not carry the point of Church discipline too far, must be left to the reader's own judgment.

born at Aftell or Estwell, a small village between Whitney and Burford in Oxfordshire, and admitted a student of Christ Church in Oxford in 1592, being then about eighteen years of age. Having taken the degrees in Arts, and entered into holy orders, he became a preacher for some years in and near Oxford. In 1609, being newly admitted to proceed in Divinity, he was, through the interest and endeavours of his uncle, elected Head of University-college, in which station he continued above twenty years; during which time, he was at great pains and expence, in recovering and settling the ancient lands belonging to that foundation. In 1632, he was advanced to the See of Oxford, upon the translation of Dr Corbet to that of Norwich, and consecrated about the 6th of June. This Prelate died in 1640 [A], and was buried at Cudefden in Oxfordshire, the 12th of February, leaving behind him, among the Puritans or Presbyterians then prevailing, the character of a corrupt, unpreaching, Popish Prelate (b). This Bishop Bancroft built a house or palace, for the residence of his successors, at Cudefden aforesaid [B].

(b) Wood, Athen. Oxon. Vol. I. col. 739, 740.

[A] He died in 1640.] Anthony Wood ascribes his death to the effects of fear. In 1640, says he (1), when the Long Parliament began, and proceeded with great vigour against the Bishops, he was possessed so much with fear, (having always been an enemy to the Puritans) that with little or no sickness he surrendered up his last breath in his lodgings at Westminster.

[B] He built a palace at Cudefden, for the residence of the Bishops of Oxford.] Our Antiquarian informs us (2), that, before Bancroft's time, the Bishops of Oxford had no house left belonging to their see, either in city or country, but dwelt at their parsonage-houses, which they held in commendam; tho' Dr John Bridges, who had no commendam in his diocese, lived for the most part in hired houses in the city. For though at the foundation of the bishoprick of Oxford, in the abbey of Osney, Gloucester college was appointed for the Bishop's palace, yet, when that foundation was inspected into by King Edward VI, that place was left out of the charter, as being then designed for another use. So that from thence forward the Bishops of Oxford had no settled house or palace, till Bancroft came to the see; who, at the instigation of Archbishop Laud, resolved to build one. In the first place, therefore, in order to improve the slender revenues of the bishopric, he suffered the lease of the impropriate parsonage of Cudefden aforesaid, five miles distant from Oxford (which belonged to the Bishop in right of his see) to run out, without any more renewing. In the mean time, the vicarage of his own donation, becoming vacant, he procured himself to be legally instituted and inducted thereunto; and afterwards, thro' the Archbishop's favour, obtained an annexation of it to the episcopal see, the design of the impropriation's falling in still going on. Soon after, with the help of a large quantity of timber from the forest of Shotover, given him by the King, he began to build a fine palace, which, with a chapel in it, was completely finished in 1634. The summer, after it was visited out of curiosity by Archbishop Laud, who speaks of it in his Diary thus: September the second, An. 1635, I was in attendance with the King at Woodstock, and went thence Cudefden, to see the house, which Dr John Bancroft, then Lord Bishop of Oxford, had there built, to be a house for the Bishops of that see for ever; he having built that house at my persuasion. But this house or palace (which cost 3500 l.) proved almost as short-lived as the founder. For, in the latter end of 1644, it was burnt down by Colonel William Legg, then Governor of the garrison of Oxford, to prevent it's being garrisoned by the Parliament forces. It lay in ruins till 1679, when Dr John Fell, Bishop of Oxford, at his own expence, and with the help of timber laid in for that purpose by Dr William Paul, one of his predecessors, rebuilt it upon the old foundation, with a chapel in it, as at first.

BANISTER (JOHN) a Physician of good repute in the XVIIth century, was born of honest and wealthy parents (a). He studied for a time in the university of Oxford; but without taking a degree in Arts, he entered upon the Physic line, and applied himself entirely to the study of that faculty, and to Chirurgery. In July 1573, he took the degree of Bachelor of Physic; and was admitted to practise (b). Being settled about that time at Nottingham, he lived there many years in great esteem, and was very much followed by all sorts of people, for his successful practice in Physic and Chirurgery (c). He was author of several books [A]. The time of his death is unknown: But there was a long Memorial of him, in the church of St Olave, Silver-street, London (*).

There was another Physician, named Richard BANISTER, who writ, 'A Treatise of one hundred and thirteen Diseases of the Eyes and Eyelids;' commonly called Banister's Breviary of the Eyes. And, 'An Appendant part of a Treatise of one hundred and thirteen Diseases of the Eyes and Eyelids, called Cervisia Medicata, Purging Ale, with divers Aphorisms and Principles [B]. From this book it appears (d), that the author was living in 1617, and 1619, and probably in 1622, when the second edition was published.

[A] He was author of several books.] I. A needful, new, and necessary Treatise Chirurgery, briefly comprehending the general and particular curation of Ulcers. Lond. 1575, 8vo. II. Several years after his death, his works were collected into six books, and published in this order.

4. Of Fractures and Luxations. 5. Of the Curation of Ulcers. 6. The Antidotary before-mentioned. Lond. 1633, 4to.

[B] An appendant part of a Treatise of one hundred and thirteen diseases of the eyes and eye-lids, &c.] When it was first published, cannot be found. But the second edition was printed at London in 1622, 12mo. And the same year, 'The Treatise of the one hundred and thirteen Diseases, &c.' was reprinted. — In Chapter IV. of the 'Appendant part, &c.' he says, 'In my Treatise of the Eyes I have named the best Oculists that have been in this land for fifty or sixty years, who were no Graduates either in Cambridge or Oxon (2).'

BANKES (Sir JOHN) Lord Chief-Justice of the Common-Pleas, in the reign of King Charles I. He was descended from a good family seated at Keswick in Cumberland, where he was born in A. D. 1589 (a). The first part of his education he received at a grammar-school in his own county, whence, in 1604, he removed to Queen's-college in Oxford, being then about fifteen, and there for some time pursued his studies. He left the university without a degree (b), and taking chambers in Gray's-Inn, he applied himself to the Law, in which science he quickly became eminent (c). His extraordinary diligence in his profession, his grave appearance, and excellent reputation, recommended him early to his Sovereign Charles I, by whom he was first made Attorney to the Prince (d). He was next year, 1630, Lent-Reader at Gray's-Inn, and in 1631, Treasurer of that society (e). In August 1634, he was knighted, and made Attorney-General, in the place of Mr Noy deceased (f). He discharged this arduous employment, in those perilous times, with great reputation, till in Hillary term 1640, he was made Chief-Justice of the Common-Pleas (g), in the room of Sir Edward Littleton, made Lord-Keeper. In this high station he acted also with universal approbation, remaining at London after the King was compelled to leave it, in order to discharge the duties of his office (h). But when he once understood that his continuance amongst them was looked on by some, as owning the cause of the Parliamentarians, he retired to York (i). So just an idea the King had of this act of loyalty, that when he had thoughts of removing the Lord-Keeper, he at the same time was inclined to deliver the Great-Seal to the Lord Chief-Justice Bankes, whose integrity was generally confessed, but was by some suspected (tho' wrongfully as it afterwards appeared) in point of courage (k). He subscribed the declaration made June 15, 1642, by the Lords and Gentlemen then with his Majesty at York (l), and yet his conduct was so free from aspersions, that even the Parliament in their proposals to the King, in January 1643, desired he might be continued in his office (m). Before this, viz. January 31, 1642, the university of Oxford, to manifest their high respect for him, created him Doctor of Laws (n). His Majesty also caused him to be sworn of his Privy Council, and always testified a great regard for his advice (o). In the summer circuit he lost all his credit at Westminster, for having declared from the bench at Salisbury, that the actions of Essex, Manchester, and Waller, were treasonable, the Commons voted him and the rest of the Judges in that sentiment traitors (p). In the mean time, Lady Bankes with her family being at Sir John's seat, Corfe-castle in the Isle of Purbeck in Dorsetshire, the friends of the Parliament, who had already reduced all the sea-coasts but that place, resolved to reduce it likewise. The courageous Lady Bankes, though she had about her only her children, a few servants and tenants, and little hopes of relief, yet refused to render the fortress, (q). Upon this Sir W. Earl, and Thomas Trenchard, Esq; who commanded the Parliament forces, had recourse to very rough measures. Thrice they attempting the place by surprize, and as often were repulsed with loss, though the first time Lady Bankes had but five men in the place, and during the whole time her garrison never exceeded forty. Then they interdicted her the markets, and at length formally besieged the house with a very considerable force, a train of artillery, and a great quantity of ammunition. This forced the little town dependant on the castle to surrender, which inclined the besiegers to think the business done; but Lady Bankes taking advantage of their remissness, procured a supply of provision and ammunition, which enabled her still to hold out. At last the gallant Earl of Carnarvon, having with a considerable body of horse and dragoons, cleared a great part of the West, came into the neighbourhood of Purbeck, whereupon Sir W. Earl raised his siege, August 4, 1643, precipitately, that he left his tents standing, together with his ammunition and artillery, all which fell into the hands of Lady Bankes's household (r). There is no question but this action was very pleasing to the King at Oxford, where Sir John continued in the discharge of his duty, as a Privy-Counsellor, till the last day of his life, viz. December 28, 1644 (s). But that he ever had any other preferment, much less was Chief-Justice of the King's-Bench, as some have affirmed, is certainly false [A]. He was interred with great solemnity in the cathedral of Christ-Church, and a monument erected to his memory, the inscription on which we have preserved in the notes, because, though more than once printed before, yet it has never appeared correctly, or with it's dates, the most material part

[A] As some have affirmed, is certainly false.] The author of this article in the General Dictionary says, "In 1640, he, i. e. Sir John Bankes, was made Lord Chief Justice of the King's-Bench, and soon after following his Majesty, when he was obliged to leave Westminster, he was chosen one of his Privy Council at Oxford, and Lord Chief Justice of the Common-Pleas." Of all which facts not one is true, Sir John Bankes never was Chief Justice of the King's-Bench. He did not follow the King to Oxford but to York, where he was of the Council, and he was Lord Chief Justice of the Common-Pleas before the King left London. It is true, all these errors are religiously copied by this Gentleman from

Anthony Wood (1), who cites Dugdale as his authority (2), but still they are errors, and palpable errors, which shews the danger of trusting to Wood entirely. Could any man living suppose, that Sir John Bankes being solemnly interred in the cathedral of Christ-church, and having a monument erected there to perpetuate his loyalty, no notice should be taken of his chief dignity in the inscription placed thereon? But then, as to Sir William Dugdale there is no fault to be found with him: His accounts of Sir John Bankes's preferments are very just and accurate, as appears by comparing them with the Registers at Grays-Inn. In his Origines Juridicales (3), he has given us a series of the Judges of the court of Common-Pleas, and therein we find Sir John parts of such pieces [B]. He left behind him a numerous posterity, both males and females, of whom his eldest son, Sir — Bankes, paid 1974 pounds; his eldest daughter's husband, Sir John Bulace, 3500 pounds; and his widow for herself and seven younger children, 1400 pounds (t). By his will, the Lord Chief-Justice Bankes gave various sums to pious uses, particularly thirty pounds per annum, to the town of Kewick in Cumberland, for the support of a manufacture of coarse cottons, then lately set up in this town (u), and which had been lost but for that supply.

John Bankes promoted to the dignity of Lord Chief Justice of the Common-Pleas, 16 Car. I. xv Hill. and that he continued so till xv Mart. 20 Car. I. which is the last return in the Michaelmas term preceding his death. Again in the Chronica Series, A. D. 1640, cited by Wood, there is no mistake but the entry is Job. Bankes Miles, constit. Capit. Justic. 29 Jan. in the column of Judges of the Common-Pleas. Farther still, his arms with this inscription, are in one of the windows in the hall at Grays-Inn (4). How Mr Wood fell into this error of supposing him to have been Lord Chief Justice of the King's-Bench, or how it came to pass, this error has never been corrected till now, I am not, strictly speaking, bound to inquire: But as I have some reason to believe I can give a fair account of both, I presume the reader will gladly hear what I have to offer. I conceive, Anthony Wood must have trusted some body to make these collections relating to the Judges from Sir William Dugdale's book, because they are all false, as well as that relating to Sir John Bankes. For example, it is there said (5), Sir Robert Forster, Knt. after the King's Restoration, was made Lord Chief Justice of the King's-Bench, 31 May 1660; and Lord Chief Justice of the Common-Pleas in October following, and for this Dugdale is also cited. But he says (6), 31 May 1660, Sir Robert was restored to his place of Justice of the Common-Pleas, from which he had been expelled by the parliament, and on the 22 Octob. 1660, he was made Chief Justice of the King's-Bench, so he never was Chief Justice of the Common-Pleas, any more than Sir John Bankes of the King's-Bench. These mistakes are within ten lines of each other in the same column. Now that they have not been corrected, I imagine is owing, 1. To their want of knowledge in the history of the Law, who revised Wood's book, and 2. To the respect, paid to the Dugdale's authority.

BARCLAY, BARCLEY, BARKLAY, or de BARKLAY (ALEXANDER) an elegant writer in the XVIth century. It is a point strongly disputed, whether he was English or Scotch by birth (a), nor is there any clear proof on either side [A]. The most probable opinion however seems to be, that he was born in Somersetshire, where there is both a village called Barclay, and an ancient family of the same name (b) [B]. But of whatever country he was, we know nothing of his family or fortune,

[A] Any clear proof on either side. This was the judgment of Bale, who was his contemporary. Some, says he, reckon him a Scot, while others believe him to have been born in England (1). Pits is positive that he was an Englishman, and says, that it is probable he was born in Devonshire (2), but he is not so kind as to tell us why. On the other side, Dr Mackenzey is as positive that he was a Scot; and in order to prove it, enters into the genealogical history of the ancient family of Berkeley in Scotland, which, at the most, only tends to shew, that he might be of that country (3). From all therefore that has been said, either by these writers or by Wood (4), there is nothing that can incline us to decide in favour of either opinion, or so much as absolutely to determine, which has the greatest appearance of truth; a question however that shall be handled in the next note.

Here lies interred in hopes of a future Resurrection, the Remains of John Bankes; who was a Student in Queen's College in this University, a worthy Knight, Attorney-General, Chief Justice of the Common-Pleas, and a Privy Counsellor to King CHARLES, distinguished by his Knowledge, Integrity, and Fidelity. He passed from Christ's Church to the Church (triumphant) of Christ, December 28, A. D. 1644. Of his age 55.

author's rose, viz. from his enriching and improving the English tongue. Had he written in Latin or on the sciences, the thing had been probable enough, but in the light in which it now stands, I think it very far from being likely. In the next place, it is pretty extraordinary, that Barclay himself, in his several addresses to his patrons, should never take notice of his being a stranger, which would have made their kindness to him the more remarkable; whereas the reader will quickly see, that in his address to the young Gentlemen of England, he treats them as his countrymen (5). Farther still it makes strongly against this opinion, that the Duke of Norfolk, and the Earl of Kent were Barclay's principal patrons, who are known to have been the fiercest enemies to the Scots. These, I say, are probable reasons why we should not believe him of that country. On the other hand, his patrons and preferments both sprung from the West, which would seem to shew him of that part of the island, and inasmuch as there is a village in the hundred of Frome in Somersetshire, of the fortune, before his coming to Oriel-college in Oxford, which might be about the year 1495, when Thomas Cornish was Provost of that house (c). Having distinguished himself there, by the quickness of his parts, and his great affection for learning, he went over into Holland, and travelled thence into Germany, Italy, and France, where he applied himself assiduously to the learning the languages spoken in those countries, and to the study of the best authors in them, wherein he made a wonderful proficiency, as appeared after his return home, by many excellent translations which he published (d). His patron was now become Bishop of Tyne, and Suffragan under the Bishop of Wells, who first made him his Chaplain, and afterwards appointed him one of the Priests of St Mary, at Ottery in Devonshire, a college founded by John Grandison, Bishop of Exeter (e). After the death of this patron of his, he became a Monk of the order of St Benedict, and afterwards, as some say, a Franciscan (f). These are circumstances of his life commonly known, but that he was a Monk of Ely, is a point, as to which, all our Biographers are silent, and yet it is more certain, than almost any thing they have told us about him (g) [C]. Upon the dissolution of the monastery at Ely, which happened A. D. 1539, he was left to be provided for by his patrons, of which his works had gained him many. He seems to have had, first, the vicarage of St Matthew at Wokey, in Somersetshire, bestowed upon him, on the death of Thomas Eryngton, and afterwards was removed from that small living to a better, if indeed he received not both at the same time. However, certain it is, that on the seventh of February 1546, being then Doctor of Divinity, he was presented to the vicarage of Much-Badew, or, as it is commonly called, Baddow-Magna, in the county of Essex and diocese of London, by Mr John Pascal, on the death of Mr John Clowes (h); neither were these, as Wood imagines, his last preferments, for the Dean and Chapter of London upon the resignation of William Jennings, Rector of Alhallows Lombard-street, on the thirtieth of April 1552, presented him to the said living (i), which he did not however enjoy above the space of six weeks at most. He was admired in his life-time for his wit and eloquence, and for a particular fluency of writing, unattained by any author of that age. This recommended him to many noble patrons, though it does not appear that he was any great gainer by their favour, otherwise than in his reputation. He lived to a very advanced age, and died at Croydon in Surrey, in the month of June 1552, and was interred in the church there (k). Bale has treated his memory with great indignity, he says, he remained a scandalous adulterer under colour of leading a single life (l). Pits again assures us, that he employed all his study in favour of religion, and in reading and writing the lives of the Saints (m). There is probably a strong tincture of partiality in both these characters, but that he was a polite writer, a great refiner of the English tongue, and left behind him many testimonies of his wit and learning [D], cannot be denied the name of Barclay, and not one, but several families of the same name in that neighbourhood, it seems to me pretty evident, that he was a native of this shire (6), at least, I think this opinion more probable than either of the other two; for that a Scot should have so general an acquaintance in the West of England, especially considering he was some years abroad, is not easy to be accounted for; and then, as to his preferments in Devonshire, we know very well to whose favour he owed them, and therefore they conclude nothing as to his birth in that county, where, I think, it cannot be proved there ever was any considerable family of this name.

[C] They have told us about him. This appears from a small folio of his publishing, which was long in the custody of the famous Thomas Rawlinson, Esq; the title, prologue, and colophon of which, as they are great curiosities in their kind, deserve the intelligent reader's notice. The title runs thus, Here begynneth a ryght frutefull treatyse, intituled the Mirrour of good Manners, conteyning the IV Vertues called Cardynall, compyled in Latyn by Domynyke Mancyn; and translate into Englyshe at the desyre of Sir Gyles Alyngton, Knight, by Alexander Berclay, Prest and Monke of Ely. A wooden cut of a nobleman sitting in a chair, and a Monk kneeling before him, presenting him a book, and two standing by, one seems to be a Lay-Brother, the other a servant beside his Lord. Afterwards follows, The Prologue of Alexander Barclay, &c. to his ryght honorable Mayster Gyles Alyngton, Knight, &c. In the end thus: Rede this lyttel treatyse, O juwent of Englande, as Myrroure of good Maners; ye chesely of London stande, and when ye it redyng shall perfyte understande, gyve ye laude and thankes to Gyles Alyngton, Knight, at whose precept this treatyse was begon. If this do you profyite that shall my mynde excyte of mo frutefull matters after this to awryte. Finis. Thus endeth the ryght frutefull matter of the foure Vertues Cardynall: Imprinted by Rycharde Pynson, Prynter unto the Kynges noble Grace; with his gracious pryvylege, VOL. I. No. 40.

the which boke I have prynted at the instance and request of the ryght noble, Richard, Yerde of Kent (7).

[D] Many testimonies of his wit and learning. His books were very numerous, inasmuch that we have no perfect catalogue of them any where, and what contributes much to this, is the translating his English titles into Latin, to mention however a few. I. His Eclogues on the Miseries of Courtiers (8). It appears that all the Writers who have mentioned these, did it without consulting them, and have fallen into many errors about this performance. They were printed at London by Richard Pynson, in quarto, without date under this title: 'Here begynneth the Egloges of Alexander Barclay, Prest, whereof the first three containeth the Myseries of Courtiers and Courtes of all Princes in generall. The matter whereof was translated into Englyshe, by the said Alexander, in fourme of dialoges, out of a booke in Latin, named Miserie Curialium, compiled by Eneas Silvius, Poete and Orator, which after was Pope of Rome and named Pius.' These on the Miseries of Courtiers make three, the whole number of eclogues in this volume making five. The fourth eclogue is, 'Of the Behaviour of riche Men anent Poetes.' At the end of this there is an elegy, intituled, 'The discription of the Towre of Vertue and Honour, into whiche the noble Hawarde (9) contended to entre by worthy actes of Chivalry.' The fifth is, 'Of the Citizen and Uplandishman.' In his poetical preface the author mentions ten eclogues, perhaps the other five were those he translated from Mantuan, of which hereafter; it may not however be amiss, before we quit this part of his writings, to observe the pages of his book are not marked, or his verses numbered. II. A Treatise against Skelton, he was Poet Laureat, and a great enemy to Priests, which we may presume, turned our author's pen against him. The Life of St George from Baptist Mantuan. The Life of St Catherine. The Life of St Margaret. The Life of St Ethelreda (10). III. Five Eclogues from the Latin

VIII. The Figure of our Mother Holy Church oppressed by the French King (15), printed at London in quarto by Richard Pynson. IX. Navis Stultifera, or the Ship of Fools (16), the most celebrated of all our author's writings. It consists partly of verses of his own composition, and in part of translations from the Latin, French, and Dutch. It is indeed a kind of version of a book written under the same title by Sebastian Brantius, but then it is translated with great freedom and with considerable additions. It is adorned with a great variety of pictures, printed from wooden cuts; we may judge of the high esteem this book was in not only from its being often cited, but also from its various editions. It was first printed at London by Richard Pynson in 1509 in small folio, again in the same size in 1519, and in quarto in 1570, it was dedicated by our author to his patron, Dr Thomas Cornith, Bishop of Tyne. X. The History of the Jugurthine War, translated from the Latin of Sallust. This was printed in quarto in 1557, five years after the author's death, and at the end of the book there is this note. Thus endeth the famous Chronicle of the warre whyche the Romaynes had against Jugurth, Usurper of the kyngedome of Numydie, whyche Chronicle is compyled in Latin by the renowned Romayne Salust; and translated into English by Syr Alexander Barkeley Priestle, at Commaundement of the ryght, hyghe, and mighty Prince, Thomas Duke of Northfolke, and imprinted at London in Forster-lane, by John Waley (17).

BARCLAY (ROBERT) justly esteemed the best writer among the Quakers, and one of the most considerable persons of his time. He was descended from an antient and honourable family in Scotland by his father's side, who was Colonel David Barclay of Mathers, a man universally esteemed and beloved, and by his mother Mrs Katharine Gordon, daughter to Sir W. Gordon, from the noble house of Huntley, so that if his principles had not led him to slight the advantages of birth, few gentlemen could in that particular have gone beyond him (a). He was born at Edinburgh in the year 1648, and as he grew up, the troubles of his country, in which also his family had a share, induced his father, Colonel Barclay, to send him, while a youth, to Paris, where his brother was at that time Principal of the Scots college, who taking advantage of the tender age of his nephew Robert, drew him over to the Romish religion (b). His father being informed of this, thought fit to send for him home, and accordingly he returned to Scotland in the year 1664, as accomplished, as at his age, which was scarce sixteen, the most sanguine of his relations could expect. He had a competent knowledge of the sciences, understood the French and Latin tongues perfectly, for the latter he wrote and spoke with wonderful facility and correctness, and afterwards attained Greek and Hebrew. The principal authors that have attempted to give the world the history of the people called Quakers, assure us, that our author's father had embraced their doctrine, before the return of his son from France (c): but against this we have the express testimony of our author himself, who fixes the time of his father's joining himself to the Quakers, to the year 1666 (d), which we are told by others, was chiefly owing to the persuasions of one Mr Swinton, a man of great credit among those people, and who had for some time after the Restoration, been confined with Colonel David Barclay, in the castle of Edinburgh, where by long and frequent conversations, he drew him over to his opinions [A]. It was not long

[A] Frequent conversations to draw him over to his opinions. It may not be amiss to give some account here, of the first preaching those doctrines maintained by the people called Quakers in Scotland, and of the manner in which they were so wonderfully propagated in so short a space, as between their first appearance and their being embraced by Colonel David Barclay. George Fox, the elder, who is looked upon as the author and founder of this sect, began to preach publicly about the time of our author Robert Barclay's birth, and was soon followed by great numbers who adhered to the opinions he taught them, in spite of the most violent persecutions; to which, notwithstanding the regularity of their lives, they stood exposed, while the Presbyterians especially were at the helm, who were zealous from principle for church-power, which the Quakers little regarded (1). In 1657, George Fox went himself a kind of pilgrimage into the north, and being informed that the number of Friends (which is the name used by these people when speaking of their sect) was greatly increased in Scotland, he went thither to visit them; which proved a means of enlarging their Church, especially in the Northern parts of the kingdom about Aberdeen and Elgin; and soon drew a heavy persecution upon them from the Clergy (2). But it was not here that this gentleman, who converted Colonel Barclay, received these opinions. There is something so singular in his history, that tho' we have not particulars enough to form an article, yet the circumstances of his conversion may very well justify their appearing in a note. John Swinton of Swinton, Esq; was of a very good family, and had as good education as almost any man in Scotland, which, joined to very strong natural parts, rendered him a most accomplished person. He shewed himself very ill affected to King Charles II when in Scotland, laboured to serve the English and heighten their interest, which at last, rendered it necessary to send for a party of Cromwell's soldiers to carry him away prisoner into England; notwithstanding which ingenious artifice, practised at his own house near the borders, the Scots parliament held at Stirling in 1651, attainted him of high-treason (3). At this time the act affected him little, the King's affairs growing soon after desperate, but so soon as the Restoration was brought about, Mr Swinton was seized in London, and sent down, as the Marquis of Argyle had been, to be tried in Scotland, or rather called to his former judgment (4). It was universally believed that his death was inevitable, as it was notorious that Oliver Cromwell had trusted him more than any body, and that almost every thing had been done in Scotland by his advice: Yet Mr Swinton lived cheerfully in the castle of Edinburgh where he was prisoner, and seemed much more concerned to spread the principles of Quakerism than to defend his own life. He had embraced these opinions in England, went into them sincerely, and being a person of learning, very taking in his behaviour, and naturally eloquent, he not only defended his notions vigorously when attacked, but brought over many to his sentiments while in confinement (5). He was at length brought before the parliament at Edinburgh, to which the Earl of Middleton was Commissioner in 1661, and there called upon to shew cause, why he should long before Robert Barclay likewise joined himself to the Quakers, not so much moved thereto, either by the solicitations or example of his father, as by the dictates of his own mind, for though he was but eighteen years of age when he took this step, yet he had considered it very attentively, and having a genius wonderfully solid, he appears to have made as clear a judgment, even at that early season, of the cause in which he engaged, as at any time during his whole life (e). He soon distinguished himself by his zeal in the cause of the Quakers, in which, from the beginning, he discovered that strength and power of reasoning, that perspicuity and accuracy of language, for which his writings have been, and in all probability ever will be, admired. His first treatise in defence of the principles he professed, appeared at Aberdeen in the year 1670, and, as occasion required, he supported what he had delivered by his subsequent writings, which very soon shewed him much an over-match for his antagonist (f) [B]. In these discourses of his, our author chiefly should not receive sentence upon his former attainer. It is certain, that he might have avoided the force of that law by two pleas, either of which would have saved him: For, first, he might have denied that any such act had passed, and the contrary could not have been proved, as the record of his attainer, with all that passed in that parliament at Stirling, had been lost. His second plea might have been still stronger in point of law; for all the proceedings in that parliament having been rescinded and annulled by the parliament, before which he was now called in question, they were no longer of any authority. So that the record of his attainer could not be found, or if found, could not be urged against him (6), and yet he took advantage of neither of these pleas; but answered entirely consonant to his religious principles, that he was at the time these crimes were imputed to him in the gall of bitterness and bond of iniquity, but that, God having since called him to the light, he saw and acknowledged his past errors, and did not refuse to pay the forfeit of them, even though in their judgment this should extend to his life. His speech was, tho' modest, so majestic, and, tho' expressive of the most perfect patience, so pathetick; that, notwithstanding he had neither interest nor wealth to plead for him, yet the impression made by his discourse on that illustrious assembly was such, that they recommended him to the King as a fit object for mercy, at the very time they were in an extreme degree severe, against some who were not at all more obnoxious than he (7). This strange escape of Swinton's was ascribed by those of his own persuasion (very naturally) to the special interposition of Providence; by men of another turn, to the irresistible force of true eloquence, and by the refined politicians, to the scheme of the King's Lord Commissioner, the Earl of Middleton, who, knowing the Earl of Lauderdale had begged his estate, resolved to save both that and his life, to spite a man he hated, as well as to raise his own character (8). Such was the person who is said to have drawn to his principles the father of our author, and indeed it is probable, that he might have some hand therein, though about 1663 there were many persons of good sense and unspotted integrity, who joined themselves to the Quakers; and it was in 1666 that Colonel David Barclay declared himself, as his son informs us (9). He found himself very soon exposed to persecutions and sufferings on the score of his religion, for tho' there was no express law against the Quakers, yet the Council found them within the construction of an act against conventicles, and thence assumed a power of calling them to answer, imprisoning and fining them, and all, but chiefly the last, Colonel David Barclay, suffered more than once. Yet a Church historian, who is continually clamouring against the persecution of the Presbyterians by the Bishops, seems to be displeas'd that the same rigour, or a greater, was not exerted against the Quakers; by which (he says) they grew as well as took root, he is particularly chagrined that the Laird of Swinton (as he calls him) was neglected; which is a proof that the government was not very severe against them at this time (10). But after the battle of Pentland hills, when Scotland was in some confusion, Colonel Barclay was confined for some time, though no just reason was assign'd for it; his principles binding him to be a good subject. On his humble petition, however, he was first suffer'd to return home, on giving security for his appearance, and soon after he was discharged entirely (11). He was a man, venerable in his appearance, just in all his actions, had shewed his courage in the wars in Germany, and his fortitude, in bearing with all the hard usage he met with in Scotland with cheerfulness as well as patience (12). The acquisition of so considerable and so respected a person, was of no small use to those of his persuasion, as appeared plainly by the daily additions to their sect in the neighbourhood of Aberdeen, more especially after his son Robert began to appear, and to display such a strength of reasoning, and such an extent of learning in support of this cause, as placed the controversy with the Quakers on a new foot, and shewed they were far enough from being frantick, half-witted enthusiasts, who had little or nothing to say for themselves (13). In this manner, with great comfort to himself, Colonel Barclay spent the last twenty years of his life, being all along blessed with sound health and a vigorous constitution. He died on the 12th of October 1686, in the seventy-seventh year of his age, at his own house not far from Aberdeen; and though he gave express directions (agreeable to his principles) that none but persons of his own persuasion should be invited to his funeral, yet the time being known, many gentlemen, and those too of great distinction, attended him to the grave, out of regard to his humanity, beneficence, and publick spirit, virtues which endeared him to the good men of all parties. His son (according to the custom of those of his sect) has left us an ample testimony, in his works, to his father's dying as well as living in hopes of salvation through JESUS CHRIST.

[B] Which very soon shewed him to be much an over-match for his antagonist.] It very rarely happens that an author's first performance, is written with as much correctness as vigour, which however may be affirmed of this book of Robert Barclay's, the title of which runs thus: Truth cleared of Calumnies, wherein a book intituled, a Dialogue between a Quaker and a stable Christian (printed at Aberdeen, and upon good ground, judged to be writ by William Mitchell, a Preacher near by it, or at least, that he had the chief hand in it) is examined, and the Disingenuity of the Author in his representing the Quakers is discovered; here is also their Case truly stated, cleared, demonstrated, and the objections of their Opposers answered according to Truth, Scripture, and right Reason. The preface to this treatise is dated from our author's house at Ury, the 19th of the second month 1670, and therein he give us a very clear account of the controversies that had been for some time carried on between the Clergy and the Quakers; in which he complains of great disingenuity, and of their taking pains, first, to make themselves masters of the true principles and opinions of the Quakers, and afterwards studying to misrepresent, that they might find it the more easy to answer them, which he affirms to be the case of the author in this work which he had chosen to refute; and therefore, the business of this book is to shew, that they had been extravagantly abused by their adversaries, who sometimes would have them pass for people distracted, and at other times, for men possessed by the devil, and practising abominations, under pretence of being led to them by the spirit, as denying the existence of Christ, the reality of a heaven and a hell, the being of angels, the resurrection of the body, and the day of judgment. He shews upon what slight pretences these notions were taken up, how consistent all the doctrines of the Quakers were with the gospel in respect to these points, and how unjust the persecution they had sustained for maintaining what the Apostles maintained, the light of CHRIST JESUS shining in the mind of man (14).

chiefly laboured to remove the prejudices against, and throw such light on the real sentiments of the people whom he espoused, as might silence the calumnies thrown out against them, and which he was satisfied, were the true grounds of that hatred which was borne them. He succeeded so thoroughly therein, as to procure for them a fair hearing from the more sensible part of the nation, and very soon raised both their credit and his own so high, that they were much better treated by the government than before that time they had been. But with all this coolness and moderation, which might tempt one to think, he rather attempted to frame a new system of religion, than to support that which had been preached by the Quakers, he was as obedient to the spirit as any of his party, inasmuch, that he tells us himself, that feeling an impression from God, to pass through the streets of Aberdeen in sackcloth and ashes, and to preach the necessity of faith and repentance to the inhabitants, he accordingly performed it; his mind suffering the greatest agonies, till such time as he had fulfilled this command (g). This demonstrated his sincerity and simplicity of heart, for without being thoroughly satisfied in his own conscience, it is impossible to conceive, how so wise and good a man, as it is universally agreed he was, should bring himself to do such an action. To propagate the doctrines, as well as to maintain the credit he had gained for those of his way of thinking, he, in 1675, published a regular and accurate discourse, in order to explain and defend the system of the people called Quakers, which as it appeared absolutely a new kind of writing, and was so excellently compiled, to shew clearly the good sense and great learning of its author, was universally well received [C]. He was very sensible, that such as disliked those of his profession, often took occasion to confound them with, or at least impute to them as Quakers, the opinions maintained by another sort of people, who held indeed some of the tenets of the Quakers, but were, in other respects, of a very contrary spirit; to remove this scandal effectually, and to manifest the difference between those of his persuasion, and this other sect who were styled RANTERS, he wrote a very curious and instructive work, in which, he, with much solidity and perspicuity, laid open the causes,

(g) Barclay's Works, p. 105, 106.

His second treatise had this title, Some things of weighty Concernment, proposed in Meekness and Love by way of Queries, to the serious Consideration of the Inhabitants of Aberdeen, which also may be of Use to such as are in the same mind with them elsewhere in this Nation. This was added by way of appendix to the former treatise, and contains twenty questions, relating chiefly to the persons who had taken so much pains to represent the Quakers in ridiculous lights, when if that kind of language had been allowed among this sort of people, they might themselves have been rendered far more ridiculous. These writings made Mr W. Mitchell so uneasy, and rendered it so apparent, that either he was in the wrong, or wanted abilities necessary to prove himself in the right; that he immediately had recourse again to the press, in order to return an answer to Robert Barclay, which produced our author's third book upon this subject, in which he effectually silenced that angry and impatient writer (15).

(15) See an Account of this matter in the Preface before Barclay's Works, p. xi.

The title of this third treatise was, W. Mitchell unmasked, or the staggering Instability of the pretended stable Christians discovered, his Omissions observed, and Weakness unveiled, in his late faint and feeble Animadversions by way of Reply to a Book intitled, Truth cleared of Calumnies; wherein the integrity of the Quakers Doctrine is the second time justified and cleared from the re-iterate Clamours, but causeless Calumnies of this cavilling Catechist. The preface to this discourse is likewise dated from Ury, the 24th of December 1671. In this treatise, our author discovers an amazing variety of learning, which shews how good use he made of his time at Paris, and how thorough a master he was of the Scriptures, Fathers, and Ecclesiastical History, and with how much skill and judgment he applied them, so that we need not wonder he was much too hard for a country Clergyman in that part of the world, who, very probably, had not the same advantages of education, and was evidently a man of much less temper. The author of the preface before our author's works, has given a very fair account of this performance, and therefore we will make use of his words: 'In this rejoinder, says he, the dispute rises high, and the contest seems sharp and close, but to every impartial reader, the advantage evidently runs upon our author's side, who appears rather zealous than heated, and sharper on his enemy's matter than person; for he rather pities his enemy than triumphs over his weakness and envy; here, as in an exact draught, the reader has an account of the fabulous principles given under our names, and those that we really profess; and the pleasure even men pretending to religion take to render a poor,

' self-denying people that which they are not; as if they feared we should be in the right, or hold principles nearer to what they profess themselves to believe, than is convenient for their interest with the people to allow; least that, together with the sobriety, their worst enemies confess to be so conspicuous among them, should give them too great a credit with their hearers (16).

[C] Was universally well received. The writings of our author had been hitherto only controversial, but now he judged it expedient to publish somewhat systematical, that their opinions might appear with more regularity and connection than they had hitherto done, and that it might be seen they held nothing inconsistent with the Scriptures: The title of this book was, A Catechism and Confession of Faith, approved of and agreed unto by the General Assembly of the Patriarchs, Prophets, and Apostles, Christ himself chief Speaker in and among them, which containeth a true and faithfull Account of the Principles and Doctrines which are most surely believed by the Churches of Christ in Great Britain and Ireland, who are reproachfully called by the Name of Quakers, yet are found in one Faith with the Primitive Church and Saints, as is most clearly demonstrated by some plain Scripture Testimonies (without Consequences or Commentaries) which are here collected and inserted by way of Answer to a few weighty, yet easy and familiar, Questions, fitted as well for the wisest and largest, as for the weakest and lowest Capacities. To which is added, an Exposition with an Appeal to all other Professors by R. B. a Servant of the Church of Christ. The author in his Preface dated from Ury, the eleventh of the sixth month (August) 1673, endeavours to prove, that Quakerism is the very perfection of the Reformed Religion, and that other Protestant Churches, so far as they differ from the Quakers, were inconsistent with themselves, and returned in part at least, to those superstitions for which they held it necessary to separate from the Church of Rome. According to him, the scripture only ought to be regarded as the foundation of truth, and no doctrines ought to be received as Christian, which cannot be proved by the express words of scripture, which, he asserts, might be alledged in maintenance and support of all things delivered by the Quakers, notwithstanding the insinuations of their enemies, that the Quakers vilified and denied the scriptures, in order to set up their own imaginations instead of them: 'To disprove which, says he, addressing himself to the reader, this Catechism and Confession of Faith is compiled and presented to thy serious and impartial view; if thou lovest the scripture indeed, causes, and displays the consequences of Superstition on one hand, and Fanaticism on the other, clearing the Quakers from both [D]. These endeavours of his, to vindicate and bring indeed, and desire to hold the plain doctrine there delivered, and not those strained and far-fetched consequences which men have invented, thou shalt easily observe the whole principles of the people called Quakers, plainly couched in scripture words without addition or commentary, especially in those things their adversaries oppose them in, where the scripture plainly decideth the controversy for them without niceties and school distinctions, which have been the wisdom by which the world has not known God, and the words which have been multiplied without knowledge, by which counsel hath been darkened. In answer to the questions, there is not one word, that I know of, placed, but the express words of scripture; and if in some of the questions there be somewhat subsumed of what in my judgment is the plain and naked import of the words, it is not to impose my sense upon the reader, but to make way for the next question for the dependance of the matter's sake. I shall leave it to the reason of any understanding and judicious man, who is not biased by self-interest (that great enemy to true equity) and who, in the least measure, is willing to give way to the light of Christ in his conscience, if the scriptures do not pertinently and aptly answer to the questions. As I have, upon serious grounds, separated from most of the confessions and catechisms heretofore published, so, not without cause, I have now taken another method. They usually place their confession of faith before the catechism, I judge it ought to be otherwise; in regard, that which is easiest, and is composed for children, or such as are weak, in my judgment, ought to be placed first; it being most regular to begin with things that are easy and familiar, and lead on to things that are hard and intricate. Besides, that things be more largely opened in the catechism, and diverse objections answered which are proposed in the questions, the reader having passed through that first, will more perfectly understand the confession, which consisteth mainly in positive assertions. Not long after I had received and believed the testimony I now bear, I had in my view both the possibility and facility of such a work, and now, after a more large and perfect acquaintance with the holy scripture, I found access to allow some time to set about it, and have also been helped to accomplish the same (17).

[D] Displays the consequences of Superstition on one hand, and Fanaticism on the other, clearing the Quakers of both.] This learned and excellent treatise, which contains as much sound reasoning as any book of it's size in our's, or perhaps in any modern language, is called, The Anarchy of the Ranters, and other Libertines, the Hierarchy of the Romanists, and other pretended Churches equally refused and refuted, in a two-fold Apology for the Church and People of God called in derision Quakers, wherein they are vindicated from those, who accuse them of disorder and confusion on the one hand, and from such as calumniate them with tyranny and imposition on the other; shewing, that as the true and pure principles of the gospel are restored by their testimony, so is also the antient apostolick order of the Church of Christ, re-established among them, and settled upon it's right basis and foundation. He observes in his preface to this work, that the people to whom he had joined himself had been abused in a most barbarous manner, and charged with very different offences; some treating them as foolish, mad creatures, while others reputed them as deep, and subtle politicians, in many of the books written against them, they are stiled illiterate, ignorant fellows, yet in others, they are affirmed to be learned, cunning Jesuits, and pensioners of the Pope, while the Papists themselves abhorred and persecuted them, as the worst kind of Hereticks. But, he says, that these people have laboured all they could to follow the example of the primitive Church in all things, and he observes, that the two following points, did, in those times, contribute much towards the edification of the Church. Viz.

I. The power and authority which the Apostles had given them by Christ, for gathering, building up, and governing of his Church, by virtue of which power and authority they also wrote the holy scriptures.

II. That privilege given to every Christian under the gospel, to be led and guided by the spirit of Christ, and to be taught thereof in all things.

But he farther remarks, that since that time the harmony of these two principles has been destroyed, and the authority and power which resided in the Apostles, is annexed and entailed on an outward ordination, and succession is made use of to cover all manner of abuses, even the height of idolatry and superstition. For by virtue of this succession, these men, claiming the like infallibility that was in the Apostles, will oblige others to agree to their conclusions, however different from, or contrary to, the truths of the gospel, and in respect of the Clergy's arrogating to themselves so great a power in this, and in declaring the sense of the scripture, he professes, that he thinks both Protestants and Papists have gone aside from the right way. As to the second point, which more immediately concerns his subject, he speaks thus, 'On the other hand, some are so great pretenders to inward motions and revelations of the Spirit, that there are no extravagancies so wild which they will not cloak with it, and so much are they for every one's following their own mind, as can admit of no Christian fellowship and community, nor of that good order and discipline, which the Church of Christ never was, nor can be, without. This gives an open door to all libertinism, and brings great reproach to the Christian faith, and on this hand have foully fallen the German Anabaptists, so called, John of Leyden, Knipperdoling, &c. (In case these monstrous things committed by them be such as they are related.) And some more moderate of that kind have been found among the people in England, called Ranters, as it is true, the people called Quakers have been branded with both of these extremes. It is as true, it hath been, and is, their work to avoid them, and to be found in that even and good path of the primitive Church, where all were (no doubt) led, and actuated by the holy Spirit, and might all have prophesied one by one, and yet there was a subjection of the prophets to the spirits of the prophets. There was an authority some had in the Church, yet it was for edification, and not for destruction; there was an obedience in the Lord to such as were set over, and a being taught by such, and yet a knowing of the inward anointing, by which each individual was to be led into all truth; the work and testimony the Lord hath given us, is to restore this again, and to set both these in their right place, without causing them to destroy one another; to manifest how this is accomplished, and accomplishing among us is the business of this treatise, which, I hope, will give some satisfaction to men of sober judgments and impartial and unprejudicate spirits, and may be made useful in the good hand of the Lord, to confirm and establish friends against their present oppressors (18).'

This treatise exposed him to a great many inconveniences, for we find him obliged to write a Vindication of it in the beginning of the year 1679, when, it seems, that he was in prison at Aberdeen; and indeed, at that time, the persecution of the Quakers in Scotland was very warm, and therefore considering the figure he made, it is no wonder that he had a share in it (19): But without question, his sufferings of this sort did not give him near so much concern, as the disputes in which he was involved, by the publication of this treatise, with his brethren; chiefly thro' the obstinacy of one William Rogers, who wrote against him, and spread his objections privately, notwithstanding the author had taken pains to satisfy him in a conference. The account which the author of the preface before his works gives of this matter, is worth reading: 'This discourse, says he, touching the tender place both of those that exercise a coercive authority over conscience on the one hand, and of those that, to avoid that extreme, run into an absolute personal independancy in point of order and government on the other hand, both sorts were not a little disgusted; but the latter more especially, that thought them-

(19) This appears from the date of this Treatise, which runs thus: Aberdeen Prison, 6th of the first month 1679. We are in this note, in order to connect like things, obliged to trespass a little upon time, otherwise this vindication must have been spoke of afterwards.

bring the Quakers into reputation with people of sense, moderation, and learning, brought various disputes upon his hands, and one particularly, with some considerable members of the university of Aberdeen, an account of which was afterwards made publick (b). But though it might be conceived, that so many undertakings within so narrow a compass of time, must have wholly taken him up, and left him not so much as a moment to spare; yet it is certain, that at this very time he was meditating his great work, which he intitled, An Apology for the true Christian Divinity, as the same is held forth and preached, by the People called in scorn Quakers; since the epistle prefixed thereto, and addressed to King Charles II, is dated the twenty-fifth of November 1675 (i). This was indeed a painful and laborious performance, and therefore our author took, with great prudence and sagacity, such precautions as he thought necessary, with respect to its publication. It was with this view, that the Theses Theologicae (k), which were the ground-work of this elaborate treatise, were sent abroad some time before the book itself, in Latin, French, High and Low Dutch, and English, addressed to the clergy of what sort soever, and that his candour, impartiality, and sincere love of truth, might be still more manifest, he sent them to the Doctors, Professors, and Students in Divinity, both Popish and Protestant, in every country throughout Europe, desiring they would seriously examine them, and send him their answers. As soon as the Apology was finished, he sent two copies of it, to each of the publick Ministers then at the famous Congress of Nimeguen, where it was received with all imaginable favour and respect, and the knowledge, charity, and disinterested probity of its author, justly applauded (l). In 1676 it was printed in Latin at Amsterdam, and two years after, he published an English translation of it, which made it more generally known and read here, by which the end of it was effectually answered, since it was universally allowed to surpass every thing of its kind, and to set the principles of the Quakers in the fairest light possible [E]. It was quickly

‘ selves chiefly concerned in the author's intention and labour, and indeed the rise and ground of the discourse, was the dissatisfaction of some that professed to be of the same society, about the methods of proceeding as a christian community, for the honour of our holy profession. Some mistook him, others too designedly inveighed against him; the animosity rose so high in some few leading persons of that dissent, as to question his sincerity to the profession he made of religion in general, whispering him to be popishly affected, if not a Papist, and perhaps a graduated one too: And why? First, because he was bred in France at school, under an uncle who was a Papist, if not a Priest. Secondly, because he maintained Church authority, at as high a rate, at least upon the same principles: But for the first, his father who was always a zealous Protestant, coming heartily to embrace the communion of the despised Quakers, and shewing himself an exemplary member of their society, commanded his son over, being yet a child, and only sent thither for the advantage of a relation, and of learning French and Latin together, and that upon the pressing importunity of his father's own brother, that was President of the Scotch college, where the learning common at our schools, as well as at the universities, is daily taught (20).’ After having set this matter in its proper light, he proceeds to refute the second argument used by the objectors, in which he defends the author's use of Popish reasoning in support of his own cause, with the greatest strength and clearness, and as to Robert Barclay's own vindication before-mentioned, he tells us, that it was drawn from him to clear his former discourse from the mistakes and scruples of such as did not understand it, or seemed however offended both with him and it, and that it is dedicated to the communion in general he was of; written with a serious and clear mind, and hearty love to those that were his opposers.

[E] To set the principles of the Quakers in the fairest light possible. The title of this famous book in the English edition of it runs thus: An Apology for the true Christian Divinity, as the same is held forth and preached by the people called in scorn Quakers, being a full Explanation and Vindication for their Principles and Doctrines, by many arguments deduced from Scripture and right Reason, and the Testimonies of famous authors both antient and modern, with a full answer to the strongest Objections usually made against them: Presented to the King. Written and published in Latin for the information of Strangers, by Robert Barclay, and now put into our own language, for the benefit of his Countrymen. The account given us, by the author of the preface to Barclay's works, of the nature of this work, and the reasons upon which he published it, is so candid, and withal so clear and so concise, that I believe, it would be very hard to give a better (21): ‘ It was, says he, the most comprehensive of all his pieces, published in Latin, Dutch, and English: It came out at the close of a long and sharp engagement between us of this kingdom, and a confederacy of adversaries, of almost all persuasions: It was his happiness both to live in a more retired corner, and to enjoy at that time a space of quiet above his brethren, which, with the consideration of their three or four years toil, and a sense of service in himself, put him upon undertaking and publishing this discourse, as an essay towards the prevention of future controversy: It first lays down our avowed principles of belief and practice, distinguished from what our enemies are pleased to say in our names, who, by making us erroneous, give themselves the easier tasks to confute us, and then triumph: After he has stated our principles, he has put the objections which he had collected out of our adversaries books, or that he did apprehend might be made to these principles, and answers them; and lastly, cites divers authors both antient and modern, especially some of the primitive Ages, for further illustration and confirmation of our said belief and practice.’ The address of this book is as material as curious, and as extraordinary as any part of it, and has been justly admired both by our own countrymen and strangers, it runs thus: Unto Charles II, King of Great-Britain, and the dominions therunto belonging, Robert Barclay, a servant of Jesus Christ, called of God to the dispensation of the gospel now again revealed, and after a long and dark night of apostacy, commanded to be preached to all nations, wiseth health and salvation. After having opened his discourse with a very becoming observation, that the lives of Kings are more observed than those of other men, and what relates to them, or passes under their observation, more regarded, he goes on with great freedom and yet with much decency in the following manner: ‘ But among all these transactions, which it hath pleased God to permit, for the glory of his power and the manifestation of his wisdom and providence, no age furnisheth us with things so strange and marvellous, whether with respect to matters civil or religious, as these that have fallen out within the compass of thy time, who, tho' thou be not yet arrived at the fiftieth year of thy age, hast yet been a witness of stranger things than many ages before produced; so that, whether we respect these various troubles wherein thou foundest thyself engaged, while scarce got out of thy infancy; the many different afflictions wherewith men of thy circumstances are often unacquainted, the strange and unparalleled fortune that beset thy father, thy own narrow escape

cape and banishment following thereupon, with the great improbability of thy ever returning; (at least, without very much pains and tedious combatings) or finally the incapacity thou wert under to accomplish such a design, considering the strength of those that had possessed themselves of thy throne, and the terror they had inflicted upon foreign states, or the contrivance and work of human policy; all these so sufficiently declare, that it is the Lord's doing, which, as it is marvellous in our eyes, so it will justly be a matter of wonder and astonishment to generations to come, and may sufficiently serve, if rightly observed, to confute and confound that atheism wherewith this age doth so much abound: As the vindication of the liberty of conscience (which thy father, by giving way to the importunate clamours of the Clergy, the answering and fulfilling of those unrighteous wills has often proved hurtful and pernicious to Princes, fought in some part to restrain) was a great occasion of the troubles and revolutions, so the pretence of conscience, was that which carried it on and brought it to the pitch it came to; and tho' (no doubt) some that were engaged in that work designed good things, at least in the beginning, (albeit, always wrong in the manner they took to accomplish it; viz by carnal weapons) yet so soon as they had tasted that sweet of the possessions of them they had turned out, they quickly began to do those things themselves for which they had accused others; for their hands were found full of oppression, and they hated the reproof of instruction, which is the way of life; and they evilly intreated the messengers of the Lord, and caused to beat and imprison his prophets, and persecuted his people, whom he had called and gathered out from among them, whom he had made to beat their swords into plowshares, and their spears into pruning hooks, and not to learn carnal war any more; but he raised them up and armed them with spiritual weapons, even with his own spirit and power, whereby they testified in the freets, and highways, and public markets, and synagogues, against the pride, vanity, lusts, and hypocrisy of that generation, who were righteous in their own eyes, tho' often cruelly intreated therefore; and they faithfully prophesied and foretold them of their judgment and downfall which came upon them, as by several writings and epistles delivered to Oliver and Richard Cromwell, the Parliament, and other then powers, yet upon record doth appear. Tho' it was evident enough from this language that the author did not intend by this address to depart at all from his principles, yet he thought it requisite to affirm this still more expressly, and to shew his meaning in this address more clearly, in the following paragraphs: 'As it is inconsistent with the truth I bear, so it is far from me to use this epistle as an engine to flatter thee, the usual design of such works; and therefore, I can neither dedicate it to thee, nor crave thy patronage, as if thereby I might have more confidence to present it to the world, or be more hopeful of it's success; to God alone I owe what I have, and that more immediately in matters spiritual, and therefore to him alone, and to the service of his truth, I dedicate whatever work he brings forth in me, to whom only the praise and honour appertain, whose truth needs not the patronage of worldly Princes, his arm and power being that alone by which it is propagated, established, and confirmed: But I found it upon my spirit to take occasion to present this book unto thee, that as thou hast been often warned by several of that people who are inhabitants of England, so thou mayest not want a seasonable advertisement from a member of thy ancient kingdom of Scotland, and that thou mayest know (which I hope thou shalt have no reason to be troubled at) that God is raising up and increasing that people in that nation; and the nations shall also hereby know, that the truth we possess is not a work of darkness, or propagated by stealth, and that we are not ashamed of the gospel of Christ, because as we know it to be the power of God to salvation, and that we are no ways inconsistent with government, nor such disturbers of the peace, as our enemies, by traducing us, have sought to make the world believe we are; for which to thee I dare appeal, as a witness of our peaceableness and Christian patience. Generations to come shall not more admire that singular step of divine providence, in restoring thee to thy throne without outward bloodshed, than they shall admire the increase and progress of this truth without all outward help, and against so great opposition, which shall be none of the least things rendering thy memory remarkable: God hath done great things for thee, he hath sufficiently shewn thee, that it is by him Princes rule, and that he can pull down and set up at his pleasure; he hath often warned thee by his servants, since he restored thee to thy royal dignity, that thy heart might not wax wanton against him, to forget his mercies and providences towards thee, whereby he might permit thee to befoothed up and lulled asleep in thy sins by the flattering of court parasites, who, by their fawning, are the ruin of many Princes.' But what follows in that dedication, is still much stronger and more extraordinary, shewing clearly the spirit of the author, and how much truth there was in his assuring the King, that he did not write in order to flatter him: 'There is no King in the world, who can so experimentally testify of God's providence and goodness, neither is there any who rules so many free people, so many true Christians, which thing renders thy government more honourable, thyself more considerable, than the accession of many nations filled with slavish and superstitious souls. Thou hast tasted of prosperity and adversity, thou knowest what it is to be banished thy native country, to be over-ruled, as well as to rule, and sit upon the throne, and being oppressed, thou hast reason to know, how hateful the oppressor is both to God and man: If after all those warnings and advertisements, thou dost not turn unto the Lord with all thy heart, but forget him who remembered thee in thy distress, and give up thyself to follow lust and vanity, surely, great will be thy condemnation.' As to the book, it is entirely methodical, and contains a logical demonstration of the propositions sent abroad in his Theses Theologicae, and these, in few words, were as follow: I. Concerning the true foundation of knowledge. II. Concerning immediate revelation. III. Concerning the scriptures. IV. Concerning the condition of man in the fall. V. & VI. Concerning the universal redemption by Christ, and also the saving and spiritual Light, wherewith every man is enlightened. VII. Concerning justification. VIII. Concerning perfection. IX. Concerning perseverance, and the possibility of falling from grace. X. Concerning the ministry. XI. Concerning worship. XII. Concerning baptism. XIII. Concerning the communion, or participation, of the body and blood of Christ. XIV. Concerning the power of the civil magistrates in matters purely religious and pertaining to the conscience. XV. Concerning salutations and recreations, &c. He discourses very largely and learnedly upon these heads, and yet with wonderful ease, and with the greatest plainness imaginable; which may be esteemed one great reason, why this book of his was so universally read and esteemed by all ranks and degrees of people, and even by such as opposed his doctrines with the greatest zeal. His conclusion is remarkably pathetick, and he therein states, with as much brevity and perspicuity as is possible, the doctrines owned by, and those imputed to Quakers by their adversaries; which, as it contains a great deal of matter in a very narrow compass, the reader will probably, not be displeas'd to see: 'Thus, says he, because we have desired people earnestly to feel after God, near and in themselves, telling them, that their notions of God, as he is beyond the clouds, will little avail them, if they do not feel him near: Hence they have sought maliciously to infer, that we deny any God except that which is within us. Because we tell people, that it is the light and the law within, and not the letter without, that can truly tell them their condition and lead them out of all evil: Hence they say, we vilify the scriptures, and set up our own imaginations above them; because we tell them, that it is not their talking or believing of Christ's outward life, sufferings, death, and resurrection, no more than the Jews crying, the temple

be naturally supposed, that a performance of this nature could not remain long unattacked, and accordingly we find it has been over and over answered, as well abroad as at home, which has only contributed to make it more read and more esteemed, while very few of these answers have been hitherto much regarded, though many of them fell from the pens of men, who had before gained considerable reputation in the learned world [F]. Our author of the Lord, the temple of the Lord, that will serve their turn, or justify them in the sight of God, but that they must know Christ in them, whom they have crucified, to be raised, and to justify them, and redeem them from their iniquities; hence, they say, we deny the life, death, and sufferings of Christ, justification by his blood, and the remission of sins through him. Because we tell them, while they are talking and determining about the resurrection, that they have more need to know the just one whom they have slain, raised in themselves, and to be sure they are partakers in the first resurrection, and that if this be, they will be the more capable to judge of the second; hence, they say, that we deny the resurrection of the body. Because, when we hear them talk foolishly of heaven and hell, and the last judgment, we exhort them to come out of that hellish condition they are in, and come down to the judgment of Christ in their own hearts, and believe in the light and follow it, that so they may come to fit in the heavenly places that are in Christ Jesus: hence, they maliciously say, that we deny any heaven or hell but that which is within us, and that we deny any general judgment; which slanders, the Lord knows are foully cast on us, whom God hath raised for this end, and gathered us, that by us he might confound the wisdom of the wise, and bring to nought the understanding of the prudent.* These citations will afford the reader, a very clear notion of the general scope of this work, and of the spirit and style of this author, to which end they were absolutely necessary, since his manner of thinking and writing, have in them something so peculiar, that it is not possible to give the reader a just view of them any other way. It is said by Mr Voltaire, that Barclay's Address and book had a proper effect upon King Charles II, and put a stop to that persecution, to which the people called Quakers had been so much exposed for many years (22): This, however, is very far from being well founded, for after this book was published, the Quakers were treated with as great or greater severity than before; and, which comes still closer to the point, both Colonel David Barclay, our author's father, and our author himself, had their share therein, which plainly proves this fact could not be true; yet the King, perhaps, might be in some measure excused, for the heats of party in those times were so violent, that it was not in his power to hinder the law, under colour of which the Quakers were persecuted, from being put in execution. The suspicion he lay under of favouring Popery, put it out of his power to shew any indulgence to Dissenters of any denomination, and the enemies of the Quakers had so much address as to throw a suspicion of Popery even on them, tho' the writings of their most considerable men, and particularly those of Robert Barclay, are not only penned with as much warmth, but are to the full as conclusive against the doctrines of Popery, as any published by Protestants of what denomination soever (23). But tho' our author's apology had not this effect of stopping the persecution against the people in whose cause it was written; yet it answered a more important end, by shewing, that the pretences upon which they were persecuted were false and ill grounded; and that those, who, on one side, represented them as concealed Papists, and such, as, on the other hand, denied their being Christians, were equally in the wrong, and equally misled by their prejudices; and this sufficiently justifies what we have said in the text, of the great service our author's work did to those of his persuasion.

[F] Gained considerable reputation in the learned world.] The author's design in writing this book, was not to shew his learning, though very great, or to magnify the cause he maintained, but to come at truth. It was with this view, he first sent abroad the Theses Theologicæ, containing the propositions which he intended to maintain, and a short explanation of their sense, and this he did, that he might obtain from such learned men as examined them, the objections to which they thought them liable. He next published the work itself in the Latin tongue, that it might again pass the examination of those who had read his first scheme, or draught of it; and after this, he translated it himself into English, for the general use of his countrymen. There could not certainly be a better or a fairer way found of bringing the sentiments he defended to the test of reason and scripture; and accordingly we find, that upon the first appearance of his propositions, they were examined by a person of great note amongst foreign Divines, one Nicholas Arnold, Professor in the university of Franeker (24), who had gained a great character by his polemical writings, and who undertook to deliver his sentiments of our author's work in a Theological Exercitation; and our author stated and answered all his objections in his book so fully, that nothing more was heard from him upon that subject. The next who appeared in this controversy was Mr John Brown, a Presbyterian Divine in Scotland, of whose performance we shall speak more particularly in the next note. The third answer to the Apology fell from the pen of John George Bojerus of the Lutheran Church, Doctor in, and Professor of, Divinity at Jena (25). He wrote a large piece on the subject of the Beginning of the true and saving Knowledge of God, in which he very confidently attacks our author's Theses and Apology, intermixing some very harsh and injurious expressions, with what little he has in his book of argument; as for instance, he pretends that many of Barclay's expressions are improper, others absurd, and some unintelligible, but he was answered by Mr George Keith, who was then our author's great friend; because at that time, Barclay's thoughts were so taken up with other concerns, that he had not leisure to write himself: This answer of Mr Keith's was so full, and, with respect to the learned world, so satisfactory, that the Professor in Divinity never thought fit to reply to it (26). But it was not long before the Apology was attacked again by a Divine of the Augsburg Confession, one Christopher Holthufius (27), a famous Preacher at Francfort, whose work has received great commendations, and by some is represented as unanswerable, and a clear confutation of Barclay: But the book being penned in the German language, is perhaps the best reason for its having remained so long without an answer, and if its merit was really so great as is pretended, one would think, that some or other of the German Divines would have put it into Latin, that, in this respect, it might have stood upon a level with the Apology, and the Answer be as universally read as the book itself. When our author's old friend and fellow-labourer George Keith, deserted the Quakers, he thought he could not do a greater service to the cause he had embraced, than by writing against the Apology, and accordingly he published an answer to it, under the title of the Quakers Standard examined, of which we shall give an ample account in another place (28). But besides these large works, which were written expressly against our author's Apology, there were others penned against particular parts of it. As for instance, Barclay, having in that work attacked, in his first, seventh, ninth, eleventh, fourteenth, and fifteenth theses, the Lutherans, their sentiments were defended by one Mr Reifer, a native of Augsburg, who being driven from that city for his religion, retired to Hamburg, and there became Pastor of the church of St James (28). The title of his book was, Anti-Barclaius, id est, Examen Apologie, quam non ita pridem Robertus Barclaius, Scoto-Britannus, pro Theologia vere Christiana edidit, institutum in gratiam Evangelicorum, a L. Anton. Reifero Augustiano, nunc Pastore ad D. Jacobi Hamburgensis. That is, 'Barclay refuted, or an Examination of the Apology not long ago published by Robert Barclay, a Scotman, for the true Christian Divinity, in defence of the Lutherans, &c.' We have a large account of this work in the Literary Journal of Leipsick, and a shorter in Baillet. This author is reputed a man of learning and ability, but however, he gives his antagonist a good deal of hard language, charging him with many absurdities and various contradictions, yet, upon author was not in the least elevated by the surprizing success of his writings, or the high veneration expressed for his abilities, even by the warmest of his adversaries. On the contrary, he went on in his former method, and in the space of two or three years following, published several other pieces, in support of the doctrine delivered in that book, and thereby maintained the credit he had gained, and did incredible service to those of his persuasion all over Europe[G]. He travelled likewise with the famous Mr William Penn, through upon the whole, he freely acknowledges, that the Lutherans, in whose defence he writes, have some defects in their discipline, which the wisest and most pious men amongst them wish to see corrected. The Journalists of Leipsick, in speaking of this work, give a very high character of our author Barclay and his performance, and Baillet also acknowledges, that the Apology was looked upon as a most extraordinary book in it's kind, and in which, the defence of the Quakers was carried as far as it was possible (29). The famous Mr Thomas Bennet, who fought to raise his character, by attacking all who differed from the Church of England, published in 1705, a large work against the Quakers, which was very highly commended: The title of it ran thus, A Confutation of Quakerism, or a plain proof of the falsehood of what the principal Quaker Writers (especially Mr R. Barclay in his Apology and other works) do teach, concerning the necessity of immediate Revelation in order to a saving Christian Faith, the being, nature, and operation of the pretended universal Light within, it's stirring with men, moving them to prayer, and calling them to the ministry, regeneration, sanctification, justification, salvation, and union of God, the nature of a Church, the rule of faith, water-baptism, and the Lord's Supper; diverse questions also concerning Perfection, Christ's Satisfaction, the judge of controversies, &c. are briefly stated and resolved. In this, as in all his other writings, Mr Bennet discovers a great deal of heat and acrimony, but at the same time he confesses, that our author's Apology is the exactest piece that ever was written in defence of Quakerism. His book was answered by several persons, and some of them treated him very roughly, as the reader will see in it's proper place (30). The famous Mr Trenchard (31), has likewise written with as much reason and good sense, and much greater decency against our author, than any of his opponents, and he allows, that Christian Divinity as stated in his Apology, is a most masterly, charitable, and reasonable system, but his exception lies against the first principle of our author's doctrine, which is immediate Revelation, and which, this great man would willingly exchange for human reason, and this done, he says, he could have readily subscribed to a great part of his system; we shall see hereafter what our author said to a very great man, who, in his life-time, proposed the very same difficulty, and thereby engaged him to write largely upon this subject, which pieces of his it is very probable Mr Trenchard never saw. The last antagonist of his that I shall mention, is the famous Mr Thomas Chubb, who, in the year 1726, published a short discourse, occasioned by the remarks of Mr Trenchard before-mentioned, which was called An Examination of Mr Barclay's Principles with regard to man's natural ability since the Fall, as laid down in his book, intitled an Apology for the true Christian Divinity, as the same is held forth, and preached by the people, called, in scorn, Quakers. Wherein is shewn, that the said principles are erroneous, and in which human nature is vindicated from the burthen and reproach he has loaded it with; in a Letter to a friend, occasioned by the great commendation given to Mr Barclay's performance in the British Journal, No. XXXI. and now offered to the consideration of the people called Quakers. In the very beginning of this treatise the author declares roundly, that in his opinion, Mr Barclay's book contained, a confused, absurd scheme of religion, in which God was considered as dealing with his creatures, not according to the moral fitness of things, but from arbitrary pleasure. This induced one Mr Bevan to write a treatise against his, which was intitled, Supernatural influences necessary to Salvation, being a vindication of the fourth proposition of R. Barclay's Apology; to which Mr Chubb replied in a treatise intitled, Human Nature vindicated, as he likewise did to a letter written by Dr Thomas Morgan of Bristol, in support of our author Barclay's opinion, and after this he wrote two other pieces against the same adversaries, in which he pursues his argument against the Apology with his usual vehemence (32). Thus we have given the reader a short account of the answers to the Apology, in case he should be inclined to examine this controversy to the bottom, but at the same time we must put him in mind, that even the most bitter of his antagonists have constantly owned, that our author was a man of great candour and charity, one who loved truth sincerely, and did not make use of his great learning and abilities, in order to impose, by the strength of them, his own opinions on weaker minds.

[G] Incredible service to those of his persuasion all over Europe.] In the text some notice was taken of a dispute managed by our author against some students of Aberdeen: It made a great stir in the world, and the more because both sides claimed the victory, and therefore it was thought necessary to print a full account of it, which was accordingly done under the following title. A true and faithful account of the most material passages of a dispute, between some Students of Divinity (so called) of the University of Aberdeen, and the People called Quakers, held in Aberdeen in Scotland, in Alexander Harper his close (or yard) before some hundred of witnesses, upon the fourteenth day of the second month called April 1675, there being John Lelly, Alexander Sberreff, and Paul Gellie, Master of Arts, Opponents; and Defendants upon the Quakers part, Robert Barclay, and George Keith, Præses for moderating the meeting chosen by them, Andrew Thompson, Advocate, and by the Quakers, Alexander Skein, some time a Magistrate of the City: Published for preventing Mis-reports by Alexander Skein, John Skein, Alexander Harper, Thomas Merser, and John Corvie; to which is added, Robert Barclay's offer to the Preachers of Aberdeen, renewed and reinforced. This was soon after followed by another piece in support and defence of the Apology, or rather of the principles laid down in the Apology, which are likewise those of the former dispute, occasioned by the students publishing a book, in which this whole controversy was very unfairly stated. The title of this treatise, in which our author was, as the reader will see, assisted by one of the Brethren, ran in the following terms; Quakerism confirmed, or a Vindication of the chief Doctrines and Principles of the People called Quakers, from the Arguments and Objections of the Students of Divinity (so called) of Aberdeen, in their Book intitled Quakerism canvassed; by Robert Barclay, and George Keith. But besides these formal challenges from the Students, our author and his friends were exposed to some attempts of another sort, such as the large book written by Mr John Brown against our author's Apology, in which he labours to prove, that the principles of Quakerism, instead of leading to Christian perfection, were like to lead people into heathenism; and that, in short, it was a system raised out of private men's opinions, who had such high conceits of their own notions, as to fancy them all suggested by the Holy Spirit. This book came out soon after our author's was published in Holland, in the Latin tongue, and Mr Barclay quickly wrote a reply to it, which however he did not publish till some years afterwards, that is, he did not send it abroad till his first and great work, the Apology, came out, in English; that the generality of readers might have before them the whole controversy in one language. This vindication was esteemed by many (33), and particularly, by William Penn, to be equal in every respect to his Apology, and we do not find that either Brown, or any of his friends, offered any thing by way of rejoinder to this reply of our author's, who gave it the following title, viz. Robert Barclay's Apology for the true Christian Divinity vindicated, from John Brown's Examination and pretended Confutation thereof, in his Book called, Quakerism the Path-way to Paganism: In which Vindication John Brown his many gross Perversions and Abuses are discovered, and his furious and violent

through the greatest part of England, Holland, and Germany; was every where received with respect, and dismissed with concern; for though his conversation as well as his manners were strictly suitable to his doctrine, yet there was such a spirit and liveliness in his discourse, and such a serenity and cheerfulness in his deportment, as rendered him extremely agreeable to all sorts of people (n). It was indeed the peculiar felicity of Mr Barclay, to gain so entire a conquest over envy, as to pass through life (and which is so much the more wonderful, such a life as his was) with almost universal applause, and without the least imputation on his integrity. The great business of his life was doing good, promoting what he thought to be the knowledge of God, and consequently the happiness of man. He discovered the true principles of his life and conduct, in a large treatise of his upon the subject of Universal Love, in which he manifests such high, and with all, such rational sentiments of humanity, as have justly recommended to universal applause, this noble description of Christian beneficence (o) [H]. His talents however were not entirely confined to this kind of abstracted writing, he was very capable of shining in another sphere, and of treating such affairs as the world esteems of greatest consequence, with as much dignity, and as thorough a comprehension, as any man of his time, as appeared (when published) from his excellent letter to the publick Ministers at Nimeguen, and therefore we need not be surprized, that notwithstanding his profession, this epistle was received with all the marks of esteem and respect possible (p) [I]. His great modesty, Railings and Revilings soberly rebuked by R. B. It was written, as we have observed, in 1677, but was not printed till 1679. Before our author's Vindication appeared, Brown's book was much magnified by his party in Scotland and Holland, which made the reply necessary.

[H] This noble description of Christian beneficence. This treatise in which abundance of very weighty points are with great judgment and moderation handled, was penned by our author in the prison of Aberdeen in the beginning of the year 1677, and published soon after under the following title: Universal Love considered and established upon it's right Foundation, being a serious Enquiry how far Charity may, and ought to extend towards Persons of different Judgments in matters of Religion, and whose Principles among the several Sects of Christians, do most naturally lead to that due moderation required, writ in the Spirit of Love and Meekness for the removing of Stumbling-blocks out of the way of the Simple, by a Lover of the Souls of all Men, R. B. In this, as in all his other performances, our author was extremely methodical, taking the utmost care to handle thoroughly every part of his subject, and not to digress from it, so that whatever point is sought for therein may be immediately found, and the reasons on which he maintains it. This discourse he divided into five sections, the first containing an account of his own experience in this matter, and the reasons which induced him to write upon this subject; in the second, the nature of Christian love and charity is demonstrated, shewn to be consistent with true zeal, and the means of distinguishing this from false zeal; in the third, we find the controversy stated with respect to the different sorts of Christians, how it is to be fetched from the nature of their principles, and not from the practice of particular persons; the fourth, contains an examination of the principles of several sorts of these called Christians, compared with this universal love and found defective; as 1. of Papists; 2. of Protestants in general; 3. of Socinians; and in the fifth, some principles of Christianity are proposed, as they are held by a great body of people, and some gathered churches in Great Britain and Ireland, which do very well agree with true universal love. Thus the reader may perceive, that the great end and design of this work was to recommend the persuasion he had embraced, as having in it a greater measure of Christian charity than any other Church whatever. In the first section of this treatise, the author gives a large account of his own conduct in his youth, which, as it strictly regards his personal history, cannot but be agreeable to the inquisitive reader, and shall therefore find a place here in his own words (34): 'My first education from my infancy up, fell amongst the strictest sort of Calvinists, those of our country being acknowledged to be the severest of that sect in the heat of zeal, surpassing not only Geneva, (from whence they derive their pedigree) but all other the Reformed Churches abroad (so called); so that some of the French Protestants, being upbraided with the fruits of this zeal, as it appeared in Jo. Knox, Buchanan, and others do; (besides what is peculiar to their principles of this kind) alledge the superabundance thereof to proceed a fervido Scotorum ingenio: i. e. from the violent complexion of our countrymen. I had scarce got out of my childhood when I was, by the permission of Divine Providence, cast among the company of Papists, and my tender years and immature capacity, not being able to withstand and resist the insinuations that were used to proselyte me to that way, I became quickly defiled with the pollutions thereof, and continued therein for a time, until it pleased God, through his rich love and mercy, to deliver me out of those snares, and to give me a clear understanding of the evil of that way. In both these sects the reader may easily believe, that I had abundant occasion to receive impressions contrary to the principles of love herein treated of, seeing, the straintness of several of their doctrines, as well as their practice of persecution, do abundantly declare, how opposite they are to universal love, as shall hereafter more at large be shewn. And albeit the time it pleased God to deliver me out of these snares, I was so young, that it may be presumed, my observations could be but weak, and consequently, my experience inconsiderable; yet forasmuch as from my very childhood, I was very ambitious of knowledge, and by a certain felicity of understanding (I think I may say without vanity) successful beyond many of my equals in age (though my observations at that time were but weak); yet since I have with more leisure and circumspection gathered thence so much experience, as I am confident will serve for a sufficient foundation to any superstructure I shall build upon it in this treatise. The time that intervened betwixt my forsaking of the Church of Rome, and joining with whom I now stand engaged, I kept myself free from joining with any sort of people, though I took liberty to hear several; and my converse was most with those that inveigh much against judging, and such kind of severity, seeming to complain greatly for want of this Christian charity amongst all sects, which latitude may perhaps be esteemed the other extrem, opposite to the preciseness of these other sects, whereby I also received an opportunity to know what usually is pretended on that side likewise, and thence can say somewhat experimentally on that part also. There needs no more than to read this short account of him from his own pen, to be absolutely satisfied of the openness, simplicity, and frankness of his mind, which prosperity could not corrupt, or adversity sour, so true a sense he had of his duty, and so little did he consider what befel him while he was doing it.

[I] With all the marks of esteem and respect possible. The congress held at Nimeguen was to compose the long and perplexed list of disputes, which for many years had disturbed the peace of Europe, and had produced the fatal war of 1672, so prejudicial to the Dutch (35). This congress began in 1675, and the Plenipotentiaries appointed by King Charles II were Sir William Temple and Sir Leoline Jenkins: All the Ambassadors present in this assembly, were looked upon as the wisest and most accomplished persons modesty, his extensive learning, and, above all, his known sincerity in matters of Philosophy and Religion, made him acceptable to all, who were seriously inclined to the examination of those important truths, which ought to influence the conduct of men in their passage through this life; and his zeal for these truths on the other hand, made him ever ready and willing, to lend his assistance to such, as doubted about those things, he thought clear and certain. There was a person of distinction in Holland, the Heer Adrian Paets, who had turned his considerations on such subjects, and having received some wrong impressions as to the principles of the Quakers, wrote upon this head an epistle to Christian Hartzoecker, which was not long after made publick. With this worthy person, after his return from Spain, where he was resident with a publick character, from the States-General, our author had a long conference On the Possibility of an inward and immediate Revelation (q), which at parting he recommended to our author's recollection, which he understood to be an invitation to send him his farther thoughts upon that important point. He accordingly digested them into a large Latin letter, dated the twenty-fourth of November, 1676, which letter he transmitted to his friend Benjamin Furley at Rotterdam, who about a year after delivered it to the person for whom it was directed, and desired, that if he was not entirely satisfied he would write an answer, which he promised but did not perform. Some years after, the Heer Adrian Paets coming over to England, as one of the Commissioners for the East India company, our author saw him at London; and discoursed him again upon this head, representing the matter to him, so that he readily yielded he had been mistaken in his notion of the Quakers, for he found they could make a reasonable plea for the foundation of their religion (r). Upon considering this matter attentively, and being urged thereto by his friends, our author thought fit to translate this letter into English, and to make it publick in the year 1686, which he accordingly did. It was the last, but not the least, of the services he rendered to those of his persuasion, and has been esteemed by such as have read it with attention, as accurate and solid a piece as any that ever fell from his pen (s) [K]. He passed the remaining sons in that age, and to them our author addressed his Epistle in these words: To the Ambassadors and Deputies of the Christian Princes and States met at Nimeguen, to consult the Peace of Christendom, R. B. a Servant of Jesus Christ, and hearty well-wisher to the Christian World, wishes Increase of Grace and Peace; and the Spirit of sound Judgment, with Hearts inclined and willing to receive and obey the Counsel of God. He proceeds to inform them, that being the summer before in Holland and Germany, it first came into his mind, from seeing the miseries induced by war, to write to them as he now did, but that however he waited, as not willing to be hasty in a matter of such importance, and now being at leisure, and at his own home, he cheerfully addressed himself to this great work, laying open to them the true causes of war, confusion, and bloodshed, the dreadful and barbarous consequences attending it, and the only certain and indubitable means of attaining, by the pursuit of Christian principles, true, lasting, and solid peace. After signing this letter, he dates it thus: 'This came upon me from the Lord to write unto you, at Ury in my native country of Scotland, the second of the month called November 1677.' After this we find the following account of the manner in which this letter was circulated, viz. 'Copies of the aforesaid epistle in Latin, were upon the 23d and 24th days of the month called February 1678, delivered at Nimeguen to the Ambassadors of the Emperor, of the Kings of Great Britain, Spain, and France, Sweden, and Denmark, of the Prince Elector Palatine, as also of the States-General, and of the Dukes of Lorraine, Holstein, Lunenburg, Osnabrug, Hannover, and the Pope's Nuncio, to wit, one to each Ambassador, and one to each of their Principals, together with so many copies of the book, whereof the author makes mention in the letter: The title whereof is, Robert Barclay his Apology, &c.' It is not at this distance of time possible to say what effect this epistle of our author's produced; but whatever it was, in regard to quickening the great work of peace, which was accomplished soon after, most certainly it took off those prejudices, and wore away those prepossessions, which had been obtruded on them, with regard to the people called Quakers, as if they were a company of wild, ignorant, enthusiastic creatures, governed by no certain principles, and aiming at no certain end; whereas this shewed them to be men of thought and solidity, addicted to no opinion so extravagant, as not to be comprehended in a general system, or not equally calculated for promoting true piety and publick peace.

[K] As accurate and solid a piece as ever fell from our author's pen. This treatise, though not very long, has been regarded however, as the very corner-stone of this system of Divinity, and as such we find it inserted at large in Sewell's History of the Quakers, with several other pieces relating thereto (36). In the English edition published by our author, the title at large ran thus: 'The Possibility and Necessity of inward and immediate Revelation of the Spirit of God, towards the Foundation and Ground of true Faith, proved in a Letter written in Latin to a Person of Quality in Holland, and now also put into English by R. B.' His preface before this piece, though very concise, contains many close and weighty observations altogether out of the common road, and which shew that its author had read and studied what had been advanced on this subject by all parties, and the decision, as to the rule of faith set up by the Papists on one hand, and by the Protestants on the other, is very well worthy of notice. 'It is, says he, a question now frequently tossed, What is the ground and foundation of Faith? and when the matter is sifted to the bottom, it resolves in Tradition or Revelation: For those who lay claim to the Scripture, and would not make it the foundation of their faith, do resolve it but in a Tradition, when the motives of credibility are inquired into, since the subjective Revelation which they yield comes but in the last place, and is by themselves termed medium incognitum assentiendi; and such a Revelation those of Rome, will not refuse to influence them to assent to the determination of the Church. So those Protestants, who say the subjective operation of the Spirit influences them (though they know not how) to believe the Scripture, presented and conveyed to them by Tradition, as the dictates of God's Spirit, and so understand them as their Preachers interpret them; differ not much, or at least, have not reason to differ from the Church of Rome, who say, the Spirit influences them to believe the Scriptures as proposed by the Church, and according as her Doctors and Councils interpret them. And neither has any better foundation than Tradition, and to speak the truth plainly, the faith of both resolves in the veneration they have for their Doctors, but whereas the one affirms they do it by an entire submission, they think it decent to say, they judge them infallible, and certainly, it is most reasonable, that such as affirm the first, believe in the last. The other, because they pretend they believe the Church, but continually have denied to her, infallibility, tho' generally they be as credulous as the other, and I find the Doctors of their Church as angry to be con-

remaining part of his life in quiet and peace, having a large family, which he governed with great dignity, wisdom and discretion, living always decently and honourably upon his own fortune, which was very considerable. He died at his own house at Ury, on the third of October 1690, very near the forty-second year of his age, of a sickness which did not last long, and in which he testified the greatest calmness and serenity of mind, grounded on a thorough confidence in God (1). Those of his own persuasion gave, as they had just reason, the most ample testimonies concerning his life and manners, in terms full of warmth and of sincerity, with some specimens of which the reader will not be offended [L]. But it was not only from them that Robert Barclay received marks of profound esteem and general approbation, he received the like while living, and his memory has since his death been treated with the same candour, by those who differed from him in sentiments, and even by such as deserted those in which he lived and died, as the reader may see at the bottom of the page, though a few instances only are there mentioned, out of a multitude that might have been alledged to the same purpose (u) [M].

tradited as the other; that is an ingredient goes to the composition of all Clergymen since it became a trade, and went to make a part of the outward policy of the world, from whence has flowed that monster Persecution. In short, the matter is easily driven into this narrow compass: We believe either because of an outward or inward testimony, that is, because it is outwardly delivered, or inwardly revealed to us; for my part, I think the Papists do wisely in pleading for infallibility, for certainly the true Church never was nor can be without it; and the Protestants do honestly in not claiming it, because they are sensible they want it. I should therefore desire the one to prove that they are infallible; and advise the other to believe they may, and seek after it. But I am sure, neither the one is, nor the other cannot, without immediate divine revelation.

[L] With some specimens of which the reader will not be offended.] There were, I conceive, many good reasons, especially at this juncture, for prefixing testimonies of this nature, to the books of men of this profession; for first, they shewed that such men died, as well as lived in that communion, and trusted in their last moments to that faith they had preached while living. Next it shewed the union and conformity of the doctrines preached by the deceased to those of that body of men, the heads of whom gave under their hands their approbations; and thirdly, it secured many remarkable passages of their lives from oblivion, and established the truth of such facts beyond all question or altercation: In the present case, we find at the end of the large Preface to our author's works, a general attestation dated at London, September 16, 1691, and signed by seven of the most eminent persons of that persuasion, of these the first is that of George Fox, the father of this sect, who speaks thus of him: 'He was, says he, a scholar, and a man of great parts, and underwent many calumnies, slanders, and reproaches, and sufferings, for the name of Christ, but the Lord gave him power over them all. He travelled often up and down Scotland, and in England, and in Holland, and Germany, and did good service for the Lord, and was a man of repute among men, and preached the everlasting gospel of Christ freely, turning people from darkness to light, and from the power of Satan unto God.' The next testimony to the memory of Robert Barclay, is by his faithful friend William Penn, who gives a large account both of his life and writings, with which no man was better acquainted, and therefore, the greater regard ought to be had to what he delivers as to the character of the deceased, which take in his own words: 'We sometimes travelled together both in this kingdom and in Holland, and some parts of Germany, and were inward in diverse services from first to last, and the apprehension I had of him was this, he loved the truth and way of God, as revealed among us above all the world, and was not ashamed of it before men, but bold and able in maintaining it, found in judgment, strong in argument, cheerful in travels and sufferings, of a pleasant disposition, yet solid, plain, and exemplary in his conversation; he was a learned man and a good Christian, an able minister, a dutiful son, and a loving husband, a tender and careful father, an easy master, and a good and kind neighbour and friend: These eminent qualities in one that had employed them so serviceably, and that had not lived much above half the life of a man (having out-lived his father but few years, and died, at least thirty years short of his age) aggravates the loss of him, especially in that nation where he lived.' To add but one more, Andrew Jaffray, who had lived with him in all the strictness of private friendship, as well as a member in the same society, and himself reputed as honest and upright a man as any in his country, speaks of him in these terms: 'He was an exemplary husband, parent, and master in his family, so that the beauty, good order, holiness, gravity, and lowliness of the truth shined therein, I can say to my refreshment, and many others as in a quiet habitation. He was a man of great meekness, sweetness, and lowliness of spirit, and of such a bearing contented mind, that tho' a man of such great parts and great authority over evil, in his servants, and others, yet kept in such a dominion over any thing that would have disordered his own spirit, that I can truly say, I never saw him in any peevish, angry, brittle, or disorderly temper, since ever I knew him, tho' I had as much intimacy, and frequency of concerns with him as most thereaway: He was so far from being lifted up or exalted; by the great gifts he had received from his Maker, both in truth, and as a man, that I can say I have often desired to grow in the plain, downright, humble, and lowly spirit, wherein he became as weak with the weakest, and poor with the poorest, and low with the lowest, as well as he could be deep with those that were deep, so that in a good measure he had learned to become all things, to all men with a true and upright endeavour to gain some.' We may join to these the testimony of the Historian, William Sewell, an eminent Dutch Quaker, though of English extraction, the rather, since he did not write from hearsay, or with a view of raising the credit of one of the most eminent defenders of his religious sentiments, but from his personal knowledge, and full persuasion from thence of the truth of what he writes. The character he gives him runs thus (37): 'A man of eminent gifts and great endowments, expert not only in the languages of the learned, but also well versed in the writings of the antient Fathers, and other ecclesiastical writers, and furnished with a great understanding, being not only of a sound judgment, but also strong in arguments, cheerful in sufferings; besides, he was of a friendly and pleasant, yet grave conversation, and eminently fitted for the composing of differences, and he really lived up to what he professed, being of an unblameable deportment, truly pious, and well beloved of those he conversed with.'

[M] Out of a multitude that might have been alledged to the same purpose.] In that learned, candid, and copious History of the Quakers, written in Latin by Gerard Croese (38), who was however, far enough from agreeing with them in opinions, our author and his writings are very often mentioned, and always applauded. The author of the History of the Quakers in French, who is supposed to be a very learned Jesuit, gives our author a very high character, and speaks of his book as written with the greatest elegance, his language being, as he says, perfectly pure, and his manner of writing close, precise, and carrying in it a strong appearance of truth and reason (39). Mr Ferriab Jones, tho' a very warm writer, is disposed to think very kindly of our author, and acknowledges him a man unquestionably of a good genius (40). Mr Geo. Keith, who left the Quakers, and wrote against that very book of Barclay's which himself had so strenuously defended, allows nevertheless, that he ought to be placed amongst such erring Christians, as cannot be denied to be in Christ (41). But the famous Mr Norris of Bemerton goes much farther, for he tells us, that he cannot help thinking, the sect of the Quakers to be far the most considerable of any that divide from the Church, in case the Quakerism that is generally held be the same with that which Mr Barclay has delivered to the world, whom I take, says he, to be so great a man, that, I profess freely, I had rather engage against an hundred Bellarmins, Hardings, and Stapletons, than with one Barclay (42). Mr Bennett, who is by many thought to have wrote as well against the Quakers as any (43), speaks with great deference of our author's abilities, expressed in the defence of these people, and says, he employed them in dressing up their religion to the best advantage. The celebrated Mr Voltaire (44), speaking of the Apology, allows, that it is a work as well executed as the subject would possibly admit. And last of all Mr Trencbard (45), whom we have before-mentioned, asserts, with respect to the same book, that Mr Barclay has defended his opinions with as much wit, happy turn, and mastery of expression, as is consistent with the plainness and simplicity affected by those of his sect, and for the most part used in the Holy Writings. Thus it clearly appears from the concurring judgments of friends, of enemies, and of indifferent persons, that our author was both a great and a good man, which is sufficient to justify the pains taken in this article to preserve his memory, and to represent him, as far as we are able, in the light which his learning and labours have so well deserved.

BARKHAM, or BARCHAM (JOHN), a very learned Divine and Antiquarian, in the end of the XVIth, and part of the XVIIth century, was born in the parish of St Mary the More, in the city of Exeter, about the year 1572 (a). He was the second son of Lawrence Barkham, of St Leonard's, near that city [A]; by Joan his wife, daughter of Edward Bridgeman of Exeter, a near relation of John Bridgeman Bishop of Chester. In Michaelmas-term 1587, he was entered a Sojourner of Exeter-college in Oxford; and on the twenty-fourth of August, the year following, admitted scholar of Corpus-Christi-college in the same university (b). He took the degree of Bachelor of Arts, February 5, 1590-1 (c), and that of Master, Decemb. 12, 1594 (d). On the twenty-first of June 1596, he was chosen Probationer-Fellow of Corpus-Christi-college abovementioned; being then in orders (e): And July 7, 1603, took the degree of Bachelor in Divinity (f). Some time after, he became Chaplain to Ric. Bancroft Archbishop of Canterbury; and, after his death, to George Abbot his successor in that See (g). On the eleventh of June 1608, he was collated to the rectory of Finchley in Middlesex (h); and on the thirty-first of October 1610, to the prebend of Brownwood, in the cathedral of St Paul's (i): moreover, on the twenty-ninth of March 1615, to the rectory of Packleham (k); the twenty-seventh of May following to the rectory of Lachingdon (l); and, the fifth of December 1616, to the rectory and deanry of Bocking, all in the county of Essex (m). But, in 1617, he resigned Packleham (n); as he had done Finchley in 1615 (o). The fourteenth of March, 1615, he was created Doctor in Divinity (p). He had great skill and knowledge in most parts of useful learning; being an exact Historian, a good Herald, an able Divine, a curious Critic, master of several languages, an excellent Antiquarian, and well acquainted with coins and medals, of which he had the best collection of any clergyman in his time. These he gave to Dr Laud Archbishop of Canterbury, who made a present of them to the university of Oxford; and they are to this day kept in the picture-gallery over the publick schools there (q). Dr Barkham writ several pieces [B], but never put his name to any. He died at Bocking, March 25, 1642, and was buried in the chancel of that church, without a monument. He was a man of a strict life and conversation, charitable, modest, and reserved in his behaviour and discourse; but, above all, remarkable for those good qualities which become a clergyman (r). By his wife, Anne Rogers, of Sandwich in Kent, he had several children (s).

[A] The second son of Laurence Barkham, &c.] This Laurence was the son of William Barkham of Mersfield in Dorsetshire, where his ancestors had resided for above three generations (1). Laurence, abovementioned, was Steward of the city of Exeter in 1576 (2).

[B] Dr Barkham writ several pieces.] He was, in particular, very helpful to John Speed, in composing his History of Great-Britaine, &c. as that author thankfully acknowledges, in the following words (3). 'The like most acceptable helps, both of books and collections, (especially in matters remoter from our own times) I continually received from that worthy Divine, Master John Barkham, a gentleman composed of learning, vertue, and curtesie, as being no lesse ingenuously willing, then learnedly able, to advance and forward all vertuous endeavours.' What part especially of that history Dr Barkham composed, was, I. The life and reign of King John; which sheweth more reading and judgment than any life besides in that book (4). II. He wrote, or at least had a chief hand in composing, The life and reign of King Henry II, in the same history (5). III. He is likewise the author of The Display of Heraldry, &c. first published at London in 1610, Fol. under the name of John Guillim; being the best in that kind for method that ever was printed before. The learned author having mostly composed it in his younger years, thought it too light a subject for him (who was a grave Divine) to own. Therefore being well acquainted with John Guillim, an Herald, he gave him the copy; who adding some trivial things published it, with the author's leave, under his own name; and it goeth to this day under the name of Guillim's Heraldry (6). IV. He published Mr Ric. Crakanthorpe's book against the Archbishop of Spalato, intituled, Defensio Ecclesie Anglicanæ contra M. Anton. de Dominis Archiep. Spalatenfis injurias Lond. 1625, 4to (7). with a learned preface of his own. V. He wrote 'A book concerning Coins;' never published. He was a great master of that subject; being, as Fuller expresses it (8), 'A greater lover of coins than of money, rather curious in the stamps, than covetous for the metal thereof.'

at Oxford, where the religious of that order had an abbey and a priory; and, arriving to a competent knowledge of Divinity, was made Doctor in that faculty (a). He was afterwards Prior of the Canons of his order at Bisham in Berkshire, and by that title was sent on an embassy to Scotland in 1535 (b). At the dissolution of the monasteries, he readily resigned his house (c) [A], and prevailed upon many Abbots and Priors to do the like (d). Having thereby ingratiated himself with the King, he was appointed Bishop of St Asaph; and the temporalities being delivered to him on the second of February 1535 (e), he was consecrated the twenty-second of the same month (f). Thence he was translated to St David's in April 1536 (g), where he formed the project of removing the episcopal See to Caermardhyn, more in the midst of the diocese, but without success. In 1547 he was translated to Bath and Wells [B]; but being a zealous professor and preacher of the Protestant religion, he was, in 1553, upon Queen Mary's accession to the throne, deprived of his bishoprick, on pretence of his being married (h). Moreover he was committed to the Fleet, where he continued prisoner for some time: At length finding means to escape, he retired, with many others, into Germany, and there lived in a poor condition, till Qu. Elizabeth's happy inauguration (i). Returning then to his native country, he was not restored to his See (k), but advanced to the bishoprick of Chichester, in December 1559 (l), and, the next year, was made the first Prebendary of the first stall in the collegiate church of Westminster, founded by Qu. Elizabeth; which dignity he held five years with his bishoprick (m). This learned Bishop writ some things, of which we shall give an account in the note [C]. He died in August 1568, and was buried in Chichester-cathedral (n). What is most particularly remarkable concerning him, is, that by his wife Agatha Wellesbourne he had five daughters, which were all married to Bishops, namely, 1. Anne, married first to Austin Bradbridge, and afterwards to Herbert Westphaling Bishop of Hereford. 2. Elizabeth, wife of William Day Dean of Windsor, afterwards Bishop of Winchester. 3. Margaret, wife of William Overton Bishop of Lichfield and Coventry. 4. Frances, married first to Matthew Parker, younger son of Matthew Parker, Archbishop of Canterbury, and afterwards to Toby Matthew Archbishop of York. 5. Antonia, wife of William Wykeham Bishop of Winchester. He had also a son; of whom we shall give an account in the next article (o); and five more of whom nothing memorable is recorded (p).

[A] At the dissolution of the monasteries, he readily resigned his house [A]. A. Wood says (1), that 'About the time of the dissolution of his Priory, he was elected to the episcopal see of St Asaph.' But he was certainly made Bishop in 1535, and the resignation of that house, as inserted in Rymer's Acta Regia, &c. (2), bears date June 9, 1539. So that there must be a mistake somewhere. Perhaps Barlowe resigned, or quitted his priory in 1535, and another (a formal) resignation of it was made in 1539: Or else probably, that resignation is misplaced in the confused and ill-digested collection, published under T. Rymer's name.

[B] He was translated to Bath and Wells. Of which he alienated most of the revenues. See Brief View of the State of the Church of England, &c. by Sir John Harrington, p. 106, &c.

[C] This learned Bishop writ some things, &c.] Namely, I. Christian Homilies. II. Cosmography. III. He was one of those Bishops, who compiled, The godly and pious institution of a Christian Man, commonly called, the Bishop's Book. Printed at London, 1537. IV. There is in Bishop Burnet's History of the Reformation (3), 'His answers to certain queries concerning the abuses of the mass.' V. In Edward the VIth's reign, he is said to have translated into English the Apocrypha, as far as the book of Wisdom (4). We should have observed above, That he was employed by King Henry VIII, particularly in the great cause between that King and the Pope about his divorce; and was greatly in favour with the Lady Anne Boleyn (5).

B A R L O W E (WILLIAM) son of the former, was born in Penbrokeshire while his father was Bishop of St David's (a). In 1560 he became a member of Baliol-college, and, four years after, took a degree in Arts; which being completed by determination, he left the university, and, travelling, became very well skilled in Navigation. About the year 1573, he entered into Orders, and was made Prebendary of Winchester, and Rector of Easton near that city. On December the 14th, 1588, he was admitted Prebendary of Collwich in the cathedral of Lichfield, which he quitted for the place of Treasurer in the same church, and was installed in it October 17, 1589 (*). Afterwards, he became Chaplain to Prince Henry, and at length Archdeacon of Salisbury: to which last he was collated the 12th of March 1614 (b). He is memorable, for being the first that writ on the nature and properties of the loadstone, even twenty years before Dr William Gilbert published his book on that subject: and was accounted superior, or at least equal to him, for his industry in searching, and happiness in finding out, many uncommon magnetical secrets. He was the first that made the inclinatory instrument transparent, and to be used hanging, with a glass on both sides, and a ring at the top, whereas Dr Gilbert's hath it but of one side, and to be set on a foot. Moreover, he hang'd it in compass-box, where, with two ounces weight it was made fit for use at sea. He was, likewise, the first that found out the difference between iron and steel, and their tempers, for magnetical uses. He also first showed the right way of touching magnetical needles (c): And was the first that invented the piecing and cementing of loadstones. Finally, he was the first that showed the reasons, why a loadstone being double-capped, must take up so great weight (d). On these subjects he writ books, of which there is an account in note [A]. This ingenious person died the 25th of May 1625, and

B A R L O W (THOMAS) a very learned Divine, and Bishop, in the XVIIth century (of whom Mr Bayle hath given an imperfect account) was born at Langhill in the parish of Orton in Westmoreland, in the year 1607; being the son of Mr Richard Barlow, descended from the antient family of Barlow-moore in Lancashire (a). He had his first education at the free-school at Appleby, in his own country (b). From thence being removed, in the sixteenth year of his age, to Queen's-college in Oxford, he took there the degrees in Arts (c), that of Master being completed the 27th of June 1633 (d), and the same year was chosen fellow of his college (e). In 1635 he was appointed Metaphysic-Reader in the university; and his lectures being much approved of, were published in 1637 for the use of the scholars [A]. When the garrison of Oxford surrendered to the Parliament in 1646, he sided with the persons then in power (f); and, by the interest of Colonel Thomas Kelsey, Deputy-Governor of that garrison, preserved his fellowship [B], notwithstanding the parliamentary visitation [C]. In 1652 he was elected Head-Keeper of the Bodleian library; and, about the same time, was made lecturer of Church-hill near Burford in Oxfordshire (g). July the 23d 1657, he took his degree of Bachelor in Divinity (h); and, in the latter end of the same year, was chosen Provost of his college *, upon the death of the learned Dr Langbaine (i). After the restoration of King Charles II, he procured himself to be one of the Commissioners, appointed first by the Marquis of Hertford Chancellor of the university, and afterwards by the King, for restoring the members which were wrongfully ejected in 1648 (k). The 2d of August 1660, he was not only created Doctor in Divinity among the Royalists, but also chosen Margaret Professor of Divinity, the first of September following (l), upon the ejection of Henry Wilkinon, senior. He writ the same year The Case of a Toleration in Matters of Religion, addressed to the famous Rob. Boyle, Esq [D]; In 1661, he was appointed Archdeacon

[A] His lectures — were published in 1637.] They were printed at Oxford in 4to. at the end of Scheibler's Metaphysics, under the title of Exercitationes aliquot Metaphysicæ de Deo; ' some metaphysical Exercitations concerning God (1). They were afterwards reprinted in 1658, &c. 4to. One of those Exercitations was translated into English, by Sir Peter Pett, and inserted in Bishop Barlow's Genuine Remains (2). It is upon the famous question, Whether it is better not to be at all, than to be miserable? Durandus, an old Schoolman, maintained, That it was better to be, tho' in a miserable condition, than to cease to be; or, in other words, That it was better to be miserable, than be annihilated. Dr Barlow asserts the contrary. — In the same book, there is an abstract of another Exercitation (3) concerning the existence of God; in which the author demonstrates, That there is some knowledge of God attainable here by the light of nature.

[B] By the interest of Col. T. Kelsey — he preserved his fellowship.] Wood says (4), that he and others, kept their fellowships, by ' presenting to ' Kelsey's wife certain gifts.' But 'tis more probable, that it was through Mr Selden's and Dr Owen's favour and interest, as we are told elsewhere (5). However, it appears from a book of his, (which will be mentioned below) (6) that if he submitted to the higher powers for his interest, he abhorred at the same time their practices.

[C] Notwithstanding the parliamentary visitation.] He published there an anonymous pamphlet, dated Oxford, April 18, 1648; and intituled Pegasus, or the Flying-Horse from Oxford: Bringing the proceedings of the Visitours and other Bedlamites there, by command of the Earle of Montgomery. Printed at Montgomery, heretofore called Oxford; in which he gives a very ludicrous account of that visitation. Some passages in it (7) are as follows, ' Tuesday, April the eleventh, ' the long-legged piece of impertinency (which they ' mis-call Chancellor) was to bee brought with state ' into Oxon: To this end, those few inconsiderable, ' and ill-faced Saints, hired all the hackneyes in towne ' (which were basely bad, yet good enough for them). ' Out they went, and met the Hogben Moghen I told ' you of; what courtship passed between them at ' meeting, how hee swore at them, and they said ' grace at him; how many zealous faces and ill-legs ' they made, and at what distance, I know not; a ' long time they were about it. — In the mean ' time, Tho. Smith of Magdalen college had an excellent designe; he would ride in with them too, and ' that he might have futeable accomodation, would ' needs borrow an asse, nay an asse he would have, ' and ride in next before the Chancellor, and when ' they told him it was a mad trick, he told them noe; ' for he knew there would bee many asses besides ' his: — &c.

[D] He writ — the case of a toleration in matters of religion.] In which he first observes, that the toleration he means, is a toleration of several religions, or several opinions concerning religion; and that therefore Atheists come not under it. Next, that no opinion ought to be tolerated, which contains in it any thing destructive to the civil peace, and safety of the State. As for the rest, he declares it difficult and dangerous for the civil magistrate to use temporal and compulsory punishments against Hereticks and Sectaries (8). He expresses himself elsewhere to the same purpose, — ' For my part, I should not be ' willing, that any Heretick should be punished with ' death; unless he join with his heresy, blasphemy of ' God, or disloyalty against the King, or some sins ' against

Archdeacon of Oxford, in the room of Dr Barten Holiday, deceased; but he was not installed till June 13, 1664: For a contest arose between him and Dr Tho. Lamplugh about that dignity, which, after having lasted some time, was at length decided in favour of Dr Barlow, at the affizes held at Oxford, March 1, 1663-4 (*). Being a person eminent for his skill in the Civil and Canon Law, he was often applied to as a Casuist, to resolve cases of conscience, about marriage, and the like (m). And, upon such an occasion it was, that in 1671, he writ Mr Cottington's Case of Divorce (n), wherein is discussed the validity or nullity of his marriage, with a lady whose former husband was living. And also, some years after, another case of marriage, inserted in his Genuine Remains (o). Upon the death of Dr W. Fuller, Bishop of Lincoln, which happened April 22, 1675, he obtained, the very same day, a grant of that bishoprick, at the recommendation of some of the nobility, and chiefly through the interest of the two Secretaries of State, Henry Coventry, Esq; and Sir Joseph Williamson, both some time of his college, and the first formerly his pupil (p). The 27th of June following he was consecrated at Ely-house-chapel (q). Archbishop Sheldon opposed his promotion (r), tho' the reasons of it are not assigned. After his advancement to this See, Bishop Barlow writ several curious things. They were generally short, and most of them by way of letter. The most considerable are these: In 1676, The Original of Sine-Cures. Concerning Pensions paid out of Church-Livings. And a Survey of the Numbers of Papists within the Province of Canterbury [E]. In 1679, A Letter concerning the Canon Law, allowing (s) the whipping of Hereticks [F]. But what he mostly distinguished himself by, was in writing against Popery; tho' herein he is charged by A. Wood with inconsistency. For that author tells us (t), that 'before the discovery of the Popish plot, Bishop Barlow had been a seeming friend to the Papists; but, after that, he became a bitter enemy to them, and to the Duke of York.' However, 'tis certain he writ several things against them with great strength of argument, and a prodigious variety of learning. The chief of them were, 'Popery: or, the Principles and Positions approved by the Church of Rome, &c. are very dangerous to all[G.]' And, 'A Discourse concerning the Laws Ecclesiastical and Civil, made against Hereticks by Popes, Emperors, and Kings, Provincial and General Councils, approved by the Church of Rome [H]'. We shall give an account of the rest of his writings against Popery, in the note [I]. He expressed his zeal against the Papists, not only by writing, but also by his other behaviour. For when, in 1678, after the discovery of the Popish Plot, a bill was brought into Parliament, requiring all members of either House, and all such as might come into the King's court, or presence, to take a test against Popery; our Bishop appeared for that bill in the House of Lords, and spoke in favour of it (u). Notwithstanding which we are told (w), that, after

King

'against the law of nature, evidently punishable by the civil magistrate, for the preservation of the publick peace, and safety of the common-wealth (g).'

[E] A survey of the numbers of Papists within the province of Canterbury. By this survey it appears, there were then computed in that province eleven thousand eight hundred and seventy. This survey was taken by the Bishops in 1676, by King Charles II's direction (10).

[F] A letter concerning the Canon-law allowing the whipping of Hereticks. This was upon occasion of a story related in the book of Martyrs, namely, That Bishop Bonner used to whip some of the Protestants (or Hereticks, as he called them) in his gardens (11).

[G] Popery, or the Principles and Positions, &c. The whole title of the book runs thus, 'Popery, or the Principles and Positions approved by the Church of Rome (when really believed and practised) are very dangerous to all; and to Protestant Kings and Supreme Powers, more especially pernicious; and inconsistent with that Loyalty, which (by the Law of Nature and Scripture) is indispensably due to Supreme Powers. In a Letter to a Person of Honour. London 1679, 4to. reprinted the same year in 8vo. It was translated and published in Latin 1681, 8vo. by Rob. Grove, B. D. afterwards Bishop of Chester.' It is against the Pope's excommunicating and deposing of Princes.

[H] A discourse, &c. The title of this, besides what is set down of it above in the text, goes on thus 'Shewing, (1.) What Protestant subjects may expect to suffer under a Popish Prince acting according to those laws. (2.) That no oath, or promise, of such a Prince can give them any just security, that he will not execute the laws upon them. Lond. 1682, 4to.' So that it was plainly levelled against the Duke of York. There is a large preface thereto, against persecuting and destroying Hereticks, and something in favour of the Dissenters. There is no name to it.

[I] We shall give an account of the rest of his writings against Popery] They are as follows,

I. Confutation of the Infallibility of the Church of Rome; written in 1673 (12). II. A letter to J.

Evelyn, Esq; concerning Invocation of Saints, and Adoration of the Cross. Lond. 1679, 4to. III.

The same year, he reprinted, in 8vo, The Gun- Powder-Treason; with a discourse of the manner of

it's Discovery. &c. (Printed at first in 1606) and placed in the beginning of it, A Preface touching that horrid conspiracy, dated Feb. 1, 1678-9.

In this preface, he takes notice of a Popish Lie in the

Calendarium Catholicum, or Universal Almanack,

1662, namely, 'That the Gun-Powder Treason, was more than suspected to be the contrivance of

Cecil, the great Politician, to render Catholicicks

'odious: ——— That some Roman Catholicicks

were in that Plot; but there were but few detected, and they that were detected, were desperado's.'

He also shows there, that it is the practice of the Church of Rome, to endeavour to destroy Hereticks all manner of ways. IV. Brutum Fulmen; or the Bull of P. Pius Sextus concerning the damnation, excommunication, and deposition of Q. Elizabeth; as also the absolution of her subjects from the oath of allegiance, with a peremptory injunction, upon pain of an anathema, never to obey any of her

laws or commands, with some observations upon it.

Lond. 1681, 4to. V. Whether the Pope be Anti-christ? And whether the Turk, or the Pope be the greater Antichrist? Whether salvation may be had in the Church of Rome? That worshipping the Host is idolatry. Concerning the intention of the Priest, as necessary to the validity of the sacrament.

A letter about the Papists founding dominion in Grace. Several letters about the Council of Trent (13).

VI. A few plain reasons why a Protestant of the Church of England should not turn Roman Catholic.

King James II's accession to the throne, Bishop Barlow took all opportunities to express his affection, or submission, to him: For, he sent up an address of thanks to him, for his first declaration for liberty of conscience, signed by six hundred of his clergy (x): He writ Reasons for reading that King's second Declaration for Liberty of Conscience (y); he caused it to be read in his diocese (z); nay, he was prevailed upon to assert and vindicate the regal power of dispensing with penal laws, in an elaborate tract, with numerous quotations from Canonists, Civilians, and Divines (a). And yet after the Revolution, he was one of those Bishops who readily voted that King James had abdicated his kingdoms: He took the oaths to his successors; and no Bishop was more ready than he, to fill the places of such clergymen as refused to take the oaths to King William and Queen Mary (b). So that from his whole conduct it appears, he was of a very timorous* and complying disposition, and always ready to side with the strongest. With regard to some of his notions; he was entirely addicted to the Aristotelian Philosophy (c), and a declared enemy to the improvements made by the Royal Society, and to what he called in general the New Philosophy [K]. He was likewise a rigid Calvinist, and the school Divinity was that which he most admired (d). His great attachment to Calvin's notions engaged him in a publick opposition to some of Mr Bull's works, which did not much redound to our author's honour [L]. He is moreover justly blamed for never appearing in his cathedral, nor visiting his diocese in person, but residing constantly at his manor of Buckden [M]. But, notwithstanding, he must be allowed to have had the following excellencies: He was a good Casuist, a man of very extensive learning, an universal lover and favourer of learned men, of what country or denomination soever, and a great master of the whole controversy between the Protestants and Papists. He died at Buckden in Huntingdonshire, Octob. 8, 1691, in the 85th year of his age; and was buried the 11th of the said month, on the north side of the chancel belonging to that church (e), near the body of Dr R. Sanderfon, some time Bishop of Lincoln, and, according to his own desire, in the very grave of Dr William Barlow, formerly Bishop of the same See: to whose memory, as well as his own, is erected a monument, with an inscription [N] which he composed himself, a few days before his death. He bequeathed to the Bodleian library, all such books of his own, as were not in that noble collection at the time of his death: And the remainder he gave to Queen's college in Oxford (f); whereupon the Society erected in 1694, a noble pile of buildings, on the west side of their college, to receive them. All his manuscripts, of his own composition, he left to his two domestic Chaplains, William Offley, and Henry Brougham, Prebendaries of Lincoln, with a particular desire, that they would not make any of them publick after his decease (g). We shall give an account in the note [O], of the rest of his works, not taken

[K] He was a declared enemy ——— to what he called in general, the New Philosophy.] This plainly appears from the following passages in one of his letters (15), 'I confess I am, and (a long time) have been 'not a little troubled, to see Protestants, nay Clergy- 'men and Bishops, approve and propagate, that 'which they mis-call New Philosophy; so that our Uni- 'versities begin to be infected with it, little consider- 'ing how it tends evidently to the advantage of Rome, 'and the ruine of our religion. For this new Philo- 'sophy ——— hath been set on foot, and carried on 'by the arts of Rome, to breed divisions among Pro- 'testants. ——— And all the Romish Schoolmen, 'Casuists, and Controversy-writers, have so mixed 'Aristotle's Philosophy with their Divinity, that he 'who has not a comprehension of Aristotle's prin- 'ciples, will never be able rationally to defend or 'confute any controverted position in the Roman 'or Reformed Religion.'

[L] His great attachment to Calvin's notions engaged him in a publick opposition to Mr Bull's works.] Namely to his Harmonia Apostolica, published in 1669, wherein he asserts the necessity of good works, conjoined with faith, for man's justification. This book Dr Barlow attacked in his Divinity-Lectures, and treated the author very roughly, even so far as to give him opprobrious names. Mr Bull being informed of it, came to Oxford, and offered to vindicate himself by a publick disputation; but the Professor declined it; nay he endeavoured to avoid owning the fact, till it was fully proved to his face (16).

[M] But residing at his manor of Buckden.] He was often reflected on upon that account, and called the Bishop of Buckden that never saw Lincoln. But as he hath written something upon that subject, it will be proper to hear what he had to say in his justification (17). 'I have writ (saith he) to My Lord 'Privy-Seal, (Marquis of Halifax) the reasons of my 'not going to Lincoln: 1. I have no house there. [It 'was beat down in the civil wars.] 2. Buckden is in 'the center of my diocese, and stands far more conveniently for all business. 3. Bishop Sanderfon 'lived and died at Buckden, and Bishop Lany lived 'there too, till he was translated to Ely; nor were 'they ever accused or complained on for it. 4. That 'Lincoln might not think I was unkind and neglected 'them; I sent them 100 £. of which 50 £. to the 'church, and the other 50 £. to the city; and since 'that I gave the city 20 £. towards their expence in 'renewing their charter, which none of my prede- 'cessors have done.'

[N] With an inscription.] It is in Latin; but as it contains nothing remarkable in that language, we shall set down here only the English translation of it. 'Tis as follows, 'Here lie the remains of Thomas Bar- 'low, D. D. Provost of Queen's College, Oxon, 'Head-keeper of the Bodleian Library, Archdeacon 'of Oxford, Lady Margaret Countess of Richmond's 'Divinity Professor, and (tho' unworthy) Bishop of 'Lincoln, in hope of a joyful resurrection. He com- 'posed this epitaph when he was dying, and at his 'own charge rebuilt the monument of his right-reve- 'rend predecessor William Barlow, which was almost 'demolished by fanatical rage. He died the 8th 'day of October 1691, in the 85th year of his 'age (18).'

[O] We shall give an account of the rest of his works, not taken notice of above.] They are as follows, 'I. Pietas in Patrem; or a few tears upon the la- 'mented death of his most dear and loving father 'Richard Barlow, late of Langhill in Westmorland, 'who died 29 December 1636; printed at Oxford, '1637, 4to. There are in it copies of verses upon 'the same subject, from several gentlemen of Queen's 'College. II. A Letter to Mr John Goodwin, con- 'cerning universal redemption by J. Christ, 1651. 'III. For Toleration of the Jews, 1655. IV. 'Αυ- 'τοσυγγε διδασματα; or Directions to a young Divine 'for his study of Divinity, and choice of Books. 'V. BARNARD or BERNARD (JOHN), author of the undermentioned books[A], was the ſon of John Barnard, Gentleman; and was born at Caſtor, a market town in Lincolnſhire. He had his education in the grammar ſchool of that place; from whence he was ſent to Cambridge, where he became a penſioner of Queen's-college. From thence journeying to Oxford, to obtain preferment from the Viſitors, appointed by Act of Parliament, he there took the degree of Bachelor of Arts, the 15th of April 1648 (a); and, the twenty-ninth of September following, was, by order of the ſaid Viſitors, made Fellow of Lincoln-college (b). The twentieth of February 1650, he took the degree of Maſter of Arts (c). At length, having married the daughter of Dr Peter Heylyn, then living at Abingdon, he became Rector of Waddington near Lincoln; the perpetual advowſon of which he purchaſed, and held it for ſome time, together with the ſine cure of Gedney in the ſame county. After the Reſtoration, he conformed, and was made Prebendary of Aſgarby in the church of Lincoln (d). July the 6th, 1669, he took the degree of Bachelor in Divinity (e); and, the ſame year, was created Doctor in Divinity, being then in good repute for his learning and orthodox principles. He died at Newark, on a journey to the Spaw, the 17th of Auguſt 1683; and was buried in his own church of Waddington (f).

BARNES (JOSHUA), a learned Divine, and Profeſſor of the Greek language at Cambridge, was born at London the 10th of January 1654 (a). His father was a tradeſman of that city. Joſhua had his education in grammar learning at Chriſt's Hoſpital in London, where he diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his early knowledge of Greek, and by ſome Poems in Latin and Engliſh [A], written before he went to the Univerſity. December the 11th 1671, he was admitted a Servitor in Emanuel-college in Cambridge (b). In 1675, he published, at London, a little piece, intitled, Gerania: or, A new Diſcovery of a little Sort of People called Pygmies (c). June the 7th 1678, he was elected Fellow of Emanuel-college (d). The next year, 1679, he published at London, in οὐρανῶ, his Poetical Paraphraſe on the Hiſtory of Eſther [B]. In 1686, he took the degree of Bachelor Latin translation in the opposite page, and Greek Scholia or Notes; in which (to illustrate the sacred Text) besides many other particulars, the Antiquities and more remote customs of the Eastern nations are explained. To which is added a parody in Homeric style upon the same Story, and a copious Index of Things and Words. It was printed, as the title-page informs us, at his own charge. The Imprimatur is dated July 3, 1676. It is dedicated to Dr John Dolben, Bishop of Rochester, and Dean of Westminster (2), who, as the Dedication tells us, contributed largely to the expence of the impression. In the preface he tells us, he had finished this piece five years before, but, by advice of his friends, had deferred the publication of it, in order to polish it at his leisure. He justifies, by the authority of Josephus, his placing this history after the time of Nehemiah, contrary to the opinion of many considerable writers. He considers, who Ahafuerus, mentioned in the History of Esther, was; and determines him to have been the famous Xerxes. He displays the moral uses that may be made of his poem, and vindicates his introducing the names of the pagan deities and prophane allusions into a sacred subject. The preface is followed by several copies of verses in Greek and Latin, addressed to the author by Dr James Duport and others. As a specimen of Mr Barnes's talent at Greek Poetry, we shall oblige the learned reader with the following beautiful description of Esther's person.

The Homeric Parody, mentioned in the title, consists of but fifty-six lines, and is an Epitome of the story of Esther in the very words of Homer. It begins, like the first book of the Iliad, thus:

Μῦθον αἰεὶς Θεᾶ Ἀμαλνυχιάδεω Ἀμαυῖος
 Οὐλομένην, ἢ μυστ' Ἐθεραίοις ἄλγε ἔθηκε, Περσεῶν δ' ἰφθίμους ψυχὰς αἰεὶ ποροῖαφεν, &c.

The author tells us, he wrote it in less than an hour. It is intitled, Σουσιᾶδος Ῥαψῶδία ἢ Παρωδία Ὀμηρεῖα. It is followed by a copy of Greek verses intitled; Εὐχαριστήριον εἰς τὸν τῶν τῆς ἐμῆς Ἐδῆρος οἶκον κατάλογον κῆ Μνημόσυνον: i. e. 'A Thanksgiving; or, Catalogue and Memorial of the Friends of my Esther.'

[C] His Life of King Edward III. It is intitled, The History of that most victorious Monarch Edward III, King of England and France, and Lord of Ireland, and first Founder of the most noble order of the Garter; being a full and exact account of the Life and Death of the said King; together with that of his most renowned Son, Edward Prince of Wales and Aquitain, signed The Black Prince; faithfully and carefully collected from the best and most ancient Authors domestic and foreign, printed Books, Manuscripts, and Records: By Joshua Barnes, Bachelor of Divinity, and one of the Senior Fellows of Emanuel-College Cambridge. Cambridge, 1688. In folio. In the Preface he tells us, 'He had undertaken a work of so much difficulty, that nothing but a sense of the honour and real advantage thereof could have animated him to it. For the obscurity of our histories being so great, and the mistakes and opposition of them one with another being so frequent, it must necessarily seem a labour not small to endeavour to give a just account of the whole series of all public actions for the continuance of fifty years and upwards, at such a long distance of time, as more than three centuries.' However he observes, 'That his resolution had been to shew so much diligence in the collecting, and so much integrity in the composing, that if he could not obtain the knowledge of all the most momentous truths, yet he should purposely decline all fabulous narrations, all groundless opinions, all popular errors, partiality, and prejudice, and seriously conform himself to those rules and decencies, which belong to a faithful historian. That the subject-matter of his discourse is the honour of his country, the life and actions of one of the greatest Kings, whom perhaps the world ever saw, the rights of the English crown, and how well our ancestors were able to vindicate them'. He informs us also, 'That he does not confine himself wholly to the relation of King Edward's exploits, or to those of his invincible son the Black Prince, and the rest of his noble and victorious children; but that whatever name he found memorable of his subjects in either of his kingdoms, whether they were famed for arts of war or peace, he had endeavoured to pay them that just duty, which he thought they deserved; because it seemed to him altogether fit, that those, who then stood with their sovereign in his grand offices of war or government, should by no means now be deprived of a participation with him in his glorious memoirs; especially since not a few are still remaining, derived from those famous ancestors, whose minds may be more strongly affected with due incentives of honour, when they shall understand by what methods their forefathers attained such estates and titles, which they now as worthily enjoy.' Bishop Nicholson, in his English Historical Library (4), gives this character of our author's performance. 'Above all, Mr Joshua Barnes has diligently collected whatever was to be had (far and near) upon the several passages of this great King's reign. His quotations are many; and (generally) his authors are well chosen, as such a multitude can be supposed to have been. His inferences are not always becoming a statesman; and sometimes his digressions are tedious. His deriving of the famous institution of the Garter from the Phœnicians*, is extremely obliging to good Mr Sammes †; but came too late, it seems, to Mr Ashmole's knowledge, or otherwise would have bid fair for a choice post of honour in his elaborate book. In short, this industrious author seems to have driven his work too fast to the press, before he had provided an Index, and some other accoutrements, which might have rendered it more serviceable to his readers.' In this history Mr Barnes seems to affect imitating Thucydides, and other ancient historians, particularly in introducing his heroes making long and elaborate speeches, which seem to be the result of his own imagination.

[D] His Euripides. It is intitled; Euripidis quæ extant omnia; Tragediæ nempe XX, præter ultimam omnes completæ: Item Fragmenta aliarum plusquam LX. Tragediarum et Epistolæ V, nunc primum et ipse adjecitæ: i. e. 'All the works of Euripides, namely, Twenty Tragedies, all perfect but the last; also Fragments of above sixty other Tragedies, and five epistles, now first added'. Mr Barnes has corrected the text of Euripides, which was greatly corrupted in all the preceding editions, and particularly restored the metre, of which he has discoursed at large in his Preliminary Dissertation, De Tragediâ veterum Græcorum. As to the Latin version, he has retained that to Charles Duke of Somerset; and, in 1695, he was chosen Greek Professor of the university of Cambridge. In the year 1700, Mr Barnes married Mrs Mason [E], a widow lady of Hemmingford near St Ives in Huntingdonshire, with a jointure of 200 l. per annum. In 1705, he published, at Cambridge, his edition of ANACREON [F], dedicated to the Duke of Marlborough; and, in 1710, his HOMER [G]; the Iliad dedicated to the Earl of Pembroke, and the Odyssy to the Earl of Nottingham. Mr Joshua Barnes died the 3d of August 1712, in the 58th year of his age (f), and was buried at Hemmingford, where is a monument erected to him by his widow [H]. Our author wrote many other pieces, which were never published [I]. His character, both as a man of William Canter, and Æmylius Portus, which he has corrected in many places; esteeming it preferable to the old version, which passes under the name of Dorotheus Canillus, or that of Melancthon. He has prefixed a Dissertation on the Life and Writings of Euripides; in which, following the common opinion, he has placed that Poet's birth in the first year of the 75th Olympiad, tho' the Arundelian marble (5) places it in the fourth year of the 73d Olympiad. He has given us three Inæxes; the first upon the Poet himself, the second upon the Scholia, and the third upon the authors quoted in the Scholia and the notes.

[E] He married Mrs Mason.] The story goes, that this lady, who was between forty and fifty, having for some time been a great admirer of Mr Barnes, came to Cambridge, and desired leave to settle an hundred pounds a year upon him after her death; which he politely refused, unless she would condescend to make him happy in her person, which was none of the most engaging. The lady was too obliging to refuse any thing to Joshua, for whom, she said, the sun stood still; and soon after they were married.

[F] His Anacreon] The title is; Anacreon Teius, Poeta Lyricus, summa cura et diligentia ad fidem etiam vet. MS. Vatican. emendatus, ac pristino nitore numerisque suis restitutus, dimidia fere parte auctus, aliquot nempe justis Poematis et fragmentis plurimis ab undiquaque conquisitis: i. e. Anacreon the Teian, a lyric Poet; corrected with the utmost care and diligence from an antient manuscript in the Vatican library; restored to his pristine beauty and metre; and enlarged almost half, namely, by some entire Poems, and several fragments collected from various authors.' There was a second edition, after Mr Barnes's death, printed at Cambridge, in 1721. It is dedicated to John, Duke of Marlborough. The dedication (dated from Hemmingford near St Ives in Huntingdonshire, March 26, 1705) is followed by a Greek Anacreontic Ode upon the Duke's victory at Blenheim, with a Latin translation in the same measure. Then follows the Life of Anacreon, in which he has endeavoured to vindicate that Poet from the charge of unnatural love, and to shew that his poems contain nothing indecent, or contrary to good manners, or improper to be put into the hands of youth; to which end he rejects some pieces in the Vatican manuscript, which he will not allow to have been composed by Anacreon. In the Prolegomena he treats of the antiquity and invention of lyric Poetry, and the peculiar character of Anacreon; also of the metre of that Poet. He answers likewise an objection urged against himself, as a Christian Divine, for employing his time and pains on a subject of so light a nature; which he justifies from his having no benefice, or cure of souls, to engage his attention; and from his character as Professor of the Greek tongue. To his edition of Anacreon he has subjoined the Epigrams of the Antients and Moderns upon that Poet, and some Odes of his own composition, under the title of Anacreon Christianus, with a Latin version of them in the same metre; also an Index to the whole.

[G] His Homer.] The title is; Homeri Ilias et Odyssæa, &c. Besides a very correct text, the editor has given an exact Latin translation, with the antient Scholia, continued notes upon the text and Scholia, and many various readings; and has subjoined the Batrochomyomachia, the Hymns and Epigrams, the Fragmentis, and two Indexes. He informs us, he had written a treatise upon the age of Homer, his life, genealogy, &c. which he designed to have inserted in this edition, but for a particular reason had deferred it to some other time. He has prefixed several pieces to the first volume, comprehending the Iliad; as, I. The Life of Homer, commonly ascribed to Herodotus. II. Three small pieces taken from Leo Allatius, De Patria Ho- meri. III. A passage from Suidas, and another from Pausanias, relating to Homer. IV. Plutarch's account of the Life of this Poet. V. Certamen Homeri et Hesiodi. VI. A Dissertation concerning Homer's Poetry, ascribed by the Editor to Dionysius Halicarnassensis. VII. Porphyry's Questiones Homericae. VIII. The same author's De Nympharum Antro. IX. Dion Chrysostom's oration concerning Homer, with some notes thereon by Dr John Davies, afterwards master of Queen's-college in Cambridge. There is an account of this edition of Homer in the Acta Eruditorum for January 1711 (6), in which we are told, that Mr Barnes has given us a more correct and perfect edition of Homer than any which had appeared before, and that he has discovered in it great diligence, and skill in the Greek poetry. Nevertheless we have there some objections against it, ascribed to the learned Dr Bentley. Particularly, Mr Barnes is censured for retaining several of Schrevelius's absurd interpolations in the antient Greek Scholia; and exceptions are made to several points in the Prolegomena. When this edition was ready for the press, Mr Barnes wrote a long copy of English verses, now extant in the library of Emanuel-college; the design of which is to prove, that Solomon was the author of that divine work. It is imagined, he wrote these verses, not so much from the persuasion of his own mind, as to amuse his wife, and by that means engage her to supply him with money to defray the expences of the edition.

[H] The inscription on his monument.] It is as follows. H. S. E. Joshua Barnes, S. T. B. Collegii Emmanuelis Socius, Lingue Græcæ in Academia Cantabrigiensi Professor Regius peritissimus. Mr Barnes read a small English Bible, that he usually carried about him, one hundred and twenty one times over at leisure hours. He was born January 10, 1654. All this is upon his monument.

In this catalogue, besides the books already mentioned, we find the following: I. The Warlike Lover, or the Generous Rival; an English Dramatick piece upon the war between the English and Dutch, and the death of the XLIII. Common-Places in Divinity, Philology, Poetry, and Criticism; and Emendations of various Greek and Latin Authors, with Fragments of many of the Poets.

[K] His character both as a man and an author. He had a great deal of enthusiasm in his temper, which discovered itself in various circumstances of his life. He constantly maintained, that spiritual sins, such as pride, defamation, &c. were more offensive in the eyes of God, than those which arise from a too great indulgence of the senses. He believed, that charity seldom or never passes without its reward in this life. And this opinion prevailed so far with him, that he has given his only coat to a vagrant begging at the door; and he used to relate some extraordinary retributions conferred upon him by unknown persons for his charities of this kind. He was remarkable rather for the quickness of his wit, and the happiness of his memory, than for the solidity of his judgment; upon which some body recommended this pun to be inscribed upon his monument;

Johua Barnes,
