THE monasteries of Scotland, in their flourishing state, are believed to have equalled, if not surpassed, in wealth and splendour, most establishments of the same kind in the other countries of Europe.* Their lands and domains equalled in extent the possessions of the most powerful barons, and were the richest and best cultivated in the kingdom. The members of their communities were, for a long period, revered as the learned instructors and spiritual guides of the people, the indulgent masters of numerous vassals and retainers, and the kind benefactors of the poor. Their churches and conventual buildings, raised with consummate art and skill, and profusely adorned with carving and painting, were the chief architectural ornaments of the country.

* Hanc antiquam Scotorum Religionem sat indicat templorum magnificentia, ac splendidissimus eorum apparatus, in ipso Scotiæ regno, ut res fere fidem superet, tot et tam illustria ædificia, ac tam bene instructa, in tam angusto regno potuisse; cujus tamen rei testes esse possunt multi qui ea oculis suis aspexerunt, et qui ea non viderunt, ex ruderibus, quanta ædificiorum magnificentia extiterit facile conjiciunt. GEO. THOMSONUS, De Antiquitate Christianæ Religionis apud Scotos.

Their halls were the seats of splendid hospitality, where princes and distinguished persons were entertained, and where minstrels, and professors of the liberal arts, were welcome guests.* The example of the order, and economy of their establishments, must have had a beneficial influence on the habits of domestic life; and the deference and respect they were bound to observe towards each other,† could not but contribute greatly to soften the harsh manners of a rude age, and to introduce elegance, and disseminate urbanity and politeness throughout the intercourse of society.

History presents few changes of fortune more sudden and complete than that which befel the monastic communities at the period of the Reformation. Within a few years, their wealth, their honours, their avocations, their establishments, were swept away. However useful their institutions might have been in an earlier and different stage of society, juster views of religion now condemned them as founded on error, and worse than useless. This, together with the misconduct of individuals among them, degraded them in public estimation; and the covetousness of those persons who expected to share in the plunder of their ample possessions, made them listen willingly to the disgraceful stories which were easily propagated against them, and readily believed in those times which did not afford the facilities, which exist in the present day, for ascertaining the truth of such allegations. The unfortunate monks, often, perhaps, deeply wronged, though many of them were doubtless loaded with some just accusations, were driven from their ancient seats ; and their magnificent edifices, if the chance of war had not already desolated them, were either demolished by the blind rage of the populace, and the barbarous ignorance of the government, or left to crumble into premature decay.

It cannot but appear desirable to every person of taste and intelligence, that the architectural beauties that are still so strikingly seen in the ruins of many of these buildings, should be faithfully delineated, and, by the power of art, transmitted to posterity, before they are still farther defaced by the slow, but surely destructive, hand of time. Independent of the traditionary legends, and tales of peace and war relating to them, and which clothe them with a romantic interest, their connection with the history of the Christian church, and of the progress of society, excites also a desire to learn the particulars of their authentic story.

These considerations, together with a feeling of local partiality, induced the author to undertake the present work ; and although, in the execution of it, he cannot lay claim to any other merit than that of industry and fidelity, yet as he has been so fortunate as to obtain the co-operation of the eminent artist who has furnished the drawings and engravings, he hopes that he is performing an acceptable service in giving it to the public.

To the account of the revenues of Kelso abbey, it should have been added, that the convent had a right to the tithes of Sir Gilbert de Umfraville's horses, bred in his forest in Redesdale, the boundaries of which went from Blackhope to Rammeshope; and from thence to Harhope, to Goldingpottes, to Flexlei, to Caldelawe above Wilkeude, and so on to the head of Yerdehope. This right being disputed by Roger, the rector of Ellesden, the matter was decided in favour of Kelso, in 1228, by the authority of the pope. — Chart. Kel. 126, v.

THE HISTORY OF THE ABBEY OF JEDBURGH.

JEDBURGH, the chief town of Roxburghshire, is beautifully situated on the banks of the Jed, about two miles above its influx into the Teviot. The course of this small river, which is not longer than twelve miles, is singularly picturesque. It rises near the confines of Liddisdale, at the foot of Carlin-tooth, one of the mountains that divide Roxburghshire from Northumberland; and, being soon joined by the smaller streams of the Blackburn and Carter, winds considerably among round-topped green hills, through an open pastoral valley, once covered with thick forests, but now enlivened with villages and farms. As its limpid waters roll on, the valley contracts and becomes more woody, cultivated, and populous. The ruins of ancient towers and castles are seen on its banks, which, in some places, are overhung by lofty perpendicular cliffs, of a kind of soft red sandstone, the sides of which are wreathed with wild shrubs, and their summits clothed with forest trees. There are caverns in those precipices, which may have been safe retreats, in former times, to the families of the warlike inhabitants, when in danger of the enemy. On the left hand, screened from the river by a deep wood of large and tall trees, lies the ruinous castle of Fernihurst, a place which, although it was never of much strength nor importance, yet was the scene of some fierce contests during the border wars. It was built by Sir Thomas Ker of Kershaugh, in 1490; but it was probably demolished during the wars between 1544 and 1550, and afterwards rebuilt, as we find the date 1598 carved upon the stone over the door of one of the remaining towers, where are also the arms of the Kers, and the initials A. K. This tower is still very entire, and was, till lately, inhabited by a gamekeeper. An adjoining part of the castle has undergone considerable repairs, and is now a commodious farmhouse. As we proceed down the river side, and approach Jedburgh, the vale again expands, and presents on its high sloping sides a cheerful prospect of cultivated fields, orchards, and gardens; at the bottom of which lies the town, and adjacent to it the interesting remains of the abbey, its chief ornament.

Jedburgh consists of three principal streets, besides several others of less importance, diverging from an irregular area in the centre, where the weekly market is held on Tuesdays. The name by which it is most frequently designated by its inhabitants, and the people of the surrounding country, is Jethart, a corrupt form of its original name, Jedworth, compounded of the name of the river, and the Saxon Worth, a farm, or hamlet. At the most ancient period to which the history of this place extends, we find that there were two Jedworths. The other was situated about four miles and a half farther up the valley, where a small hamlet still retains the name of Old Jedburgh, and where there was formerly a church or chapel, the cemetery of which is still used as a place of interment. Both were built by Ezred, or Egred, a man of noble birth and ample possessions, who was bishop of Lindisfarne, or Holy Island, from the year 830 till his death in 845. In the history of that see, by Simeon of Durham, it is recorded that Bishop Egred, among other liberal gifts with which he endowed the monastery at Lindisfarne, gave it the two villages, with whatever belonged to them, both called Jedworth, which he built himself in the district south of the Tweed.* The authority of the bishop in this northern part of his diocese gradually declined after the removal of the episcopal seat, in 995, from Holy Island to Durham; yet Jedworth was still subject to the church of St Cuthbert in 1093; for it is related, that Eadulf, one of the assassins of the Bishop Walcher, having been himself murdered by a woman, and buried in the church at Geddeverde, his body was afterwards cast out from thence as execrable, by Turgot, the prior and archdeacon of Durham; and history informs us, that Turgot was appointed to the archdeaconry in 1093.†

† Ibid. Lib. iv. cap. viii.

Upon the accession of Henry I. in 1100, Ralph Flambard, the bishop of Durham, having fallen under the displeasure of that monarch, his diocese was stripped of Carlisle and Teviotdale;* when that part of the latter which lies on the north side of the river Tweed, was united with the diocese of St Andrews, and the remaining division, situated between that river and the border mountains, was, through the care of David, brother to Alexander I. King of Scotland, annexed to the bishopric of Glasgow. This see is said to have been established as early as the sixth century; but it had fallen into great decay from the long continued wars between the Picts, Scots, Britons, Saxons, and Danes, by whom the country under its superintendance was successively wasted and harassed. Being now restored and augmented, John, called also Achaius, an ecclesiastic of great worth, who had been David's preceptor, and was his chaplain and intimate friend, was preferred to it in 1115. By the advice and assistance of this prelate, the prince, always intent upon the promotion of religion and learning among his subjects, and himself delighting in the society of men of letters, who, in that age, were hardly to be found but in monasteries, invited over a body of religious men from the abbey of St Quentin, at Beauvais, in France, and established them at Jedworth, near his own castle, which was one of his favourite places of residence, both before and after his accession to the throne of Scotland. They were of the order called Regular Canons, or Augustine Friars, from their observance of the rules of monastic life instituted by Saint Augustine, bishop of Hippo, in Africa, who died in the year 430. Their discipline was less rigid than that of other monks; but, like them, they lived under one roof, had a common refectory and dormitory, and were bound, by solemn vows, to live according to the rules and statutes of their order.† Their habit was a long black cassock, with a

* The see of Durham possessed considerable property in Teviotdale. white rochet over it, and over that a black cloak and hood. The monks were always shaved; but these canons wore beards, and caps upon their heads, instead of cowls.* The exact time of their first settling at Jedburgh, is not clearly ascertained. Andrew of Wyntown, in his Chronicle, places it in 1118;† while Fordun says, that the monastery was founded in 1147.‡ The probability is, that the canons were first brought to Jedburgh, at the time assigned by Wyntown; and that the establishment, which was at first a priory, was made an abbey, and received other additions to its privileges and importance, at the time mentioned by Fordun.

Concerning the superiors of this religious house, whose names have been transmitted to us, very few other particulars are recorded; and of not a few, even the names appear to be altogether lost in oblivion, as they have been sought after in vain, in the Chartularies, and other ancient documents.

The first who appears upon record, is DANIEL, who is styled “prior de Geddwrd,” in a charter, by King David, to a monastery at Coldingham, dated 16th August, 1139.§

The name of OSBERT, prior de Gedworda, occurs frequently as a witness to charters by King David, his son Earl Henry, and Robert bishop of St Andrews, to Coldingham, Kelso, and other religious communities. It is related of him, that he was a man of singular integrity and unaffected piety, and that he wrote a treatise, addressed to the king, concerning the founding his monastery, composed the rules, and registered the acts of the chapter.|| He continued to style himself prior in 1150; but is called abbot of Geddwrd, in charters by Malcolm IV. This king died at Jedburgh, on the 9th of December, 1165, in the 26th year of his age, and the 13th of his reign. Osbert died in 1174, according to the Melros Chronicle, where he is styled “primus abbas de Jedwood.”

His successor was RICHARD, the cellarer of the abbey, who presided till his death, which happened in 1192; when RALPH, one of the canons, succeeded him on the 29th of May.¶ This abbot had the reputation of a seer;•• but no particular account of his frequent revelations has been preserved. Whatever may have given rise to this doubtful celebrity, he appears to have possessed qualities which endeared him to the brethren, by whom he was much regretted, when he died on the 7th of August, 1205.

He was succeeded by HUGH, the prior of Restenote, which was a cell, or dependent priory, subject to the convent at Jedburgh, and was situated near Forfar, in the shire of Angus. At what time this religious confraternity was established, is not ascertained; but it must have been before 1162, as, in that year, Robert, a canon of Jedburgh, and prior of Restenote, was made prior of Scone.* As it was a place of considerable strength, being situated on a peninsula, formed by a lake, and accessible from the land only by a drawbridge, the canons deposited in it the writings and most valuable effects of the abbey, to secure them from an invading enemy, and from the unsparing gripe of the border marauders.

The priory of Canonby, in Dumfries-shire, situated between the Eske and the Liddal, near their junction, was another cell to Jedburgh abbey, as early as the time of the Abbot Osbert; and, with Restenote, continued in the same subjection to it until the Reformation. The priory of Blantyre, in Clydesdale, is also stated to have been a dependency of this monastery.†

There had been, for some years, disputes between the bishop of Glasgow and the canons of Jedburgh, respecting their several rights and privileges, which interfered with each other, and were imperfectly defined. The matters in question were at last referred to the judgment of five arbitrators, who, after due inquiry, being assembled in the chapel of Nesbit, in 1220, before many witnesses, pronounced their decision in favour of the claims of the bishop. "The abbot and canons were directed to obey the bishop, or his official, in all canonical matters, in a canonical manner, saving their mutual privileges. The chaplain of the parish church of Jedburgh, was enjoined to yield fit obedience to the bishop, or his official, when they should come to perform episcopal offices in that church. The abbot was, according to ancient custom, to attend in person, or by his procurator, at the festival of the dedication of the church of Glasgow. When summoned, he was not to omit attendance at synods. The canons were ordered to provide, in the churches under their care and patronage, meet accommodations for the bishop, when performing his visitations, except where the vicarage was only worth ten marks. And some other points of less importance were adjusted, in order to leave nothing for future dispute."‡

‡ CHALMERS'S Caledonia, vol. ii.

Dempster, in his Ecclesiastical History of Scotland, speaks of one KENNOCU, abbot of Jedburgh, a saint, who, by virtue of his unceasing prayers, or entreaties, prevailed upon the kings of Scotland and England to maintain peace, when their minds were strongly inclined to war, for ten years. We are not informed at what period this holy abbot lived; but we are told, that his festival was kept annually on the 14th of November.

The next abbot, after Hugh, whose name and era are recorded, was HENRY; but of him we are only informed, that he resigned his charge in 1239, on account of his great age and infirmities. He was succeeded by PHILIP, a canon, who ruled the abbey ten years; and at his death, in 1249, ROBERT DE GYSEBORN, another of the canons, and one whose very appearance inspired devotion, was appointed in his stead; but died the same year.*

His successor, NICHOLAS, was also chosen from among his brother canons, and presided over them until the year 1275, when, disabled by the infirmities of old age, he retired from the pastoral office, bearing the character of a man of wisdom and prudence. He was thought qualified to transact matters of civil policy; and was sent, in 1265, in company with three other persons, on a mission from King Alexander III. to his father-in-law, Henry III. of England, then in custody of the Earl of Leicester, whose prisoner he had been since the battle of Lewes, the preceding year.†

JOHN MOREL, a canon of Jedburgh, was raised to the abbot's place, upon the resignation of his predecessor Nicholas.

A scene of the most joyous kind, attended with greater pomp and festivity than had previously been witnessed in Scotland, but soon to be followed by the greatest trouble and sorrow to the whole nation, took place at the second nuptials of Alexander III, who was married at Jedburgh, on the 14th of October, 1285, to Jolande, daughter of the Count of Dreux. This town, we are told, was selected as peculiarly fit, on account of its delightful situation, and the beauty of its woods and river, to be the scene of these mirthful solemnities, at which were assembled all the Scottish, and many of the French nobility. But the mirth and hilarity of the company received a shock, from an occurrence, which the credulity of the age deemed preternatural. In the midst of the royal banquet, a sort of theatrical masque, which had been arranged previously, entered the hall, and proceeded through the middle of it, between the parties of guests that sat on either side. First came a band of revellers, playing upon various musical instruments, and accompanied with splendid pageants; and, after them, a party who exhibited their skill and agility in a military dance, with a variety of movements and gesticulations. The procession was closed by an unexpected figure, whose mysterious and singular appearance startled the beholders, who were in doubt whether they saw a human being or a phantom; for, like a shadow, it seemed to glide, rather than walk. While the whole company gazed upon this ill-omened visitor with increasing disquiet, it suddenly vanished, leaving them impressed with a gloomy anxiety, which ill disposed them to renew the interrupted sports and revelry.*

The prevailing opinion of the supernatural and ominous character of this unbidden guest, was not lessened by the sudden death of the wise and virtuous King Alexander, who, on the 19th of March thereafter, was killed by a fall from his horse; an event most disastrous to Scotland, and

* FORDUN, x. 40. Other narrators describe the spectre as a skeleton, resembling Death; as in the following poetical version of the story, from HEYWOOD's Hierarchie of the Blessed Angels, Book viii.—

“ In the mid revels, the first ominous night
 Of their espousals, when the room shone bright
 With lighted tapers,—the king and the queen leading The curious measures, lords and ladies treading
 The self-same strains,—the king looks back by chance;
 And spies a strange intruder fill the dance,
 Namely, a mere anatomy, quite bare,
 His naked limbs both without flesh and hair,
 (As we decipher Death,) who stalks about,
 Keeping true measure till the dance be out.
 The king with all the rest affrighted stand;
 The spectre vanish'd, and then strict command
 Was given to break up revels; each 'gan fear
 The other, and presage disaster near.
 If any ask, what did of this succeed?
 The king, soon after, falling from his steed
 Unhappily died. After whose death, ensuing,
 Was to the land sedition, wrack, and ruin.”

which put a stop to that considerable degree of national prosperity and happiness to which it had advanced through the progressive improvements of two centuries.

Shortly after this calamitous event, the rival claims of Bruce and Baliol to the inheritance of the crown, failing the descendants of the late king, being brought before the parliament, which met at Scone, it was agreed to refer the matter to the arbitration of Edward I. of England, who was then in Gascony; and the parliament appointed three commissioners to go to him for that purpose, of whom the abbot of Jedburgh was one. They set out on St Donatus's day, [August 7,] and performing their journey with speed, found the king at Santonge, and brought back his answer to the guardians of Scotland assembled at Clacmanan, on St Catharine's day, [November 25,] waiting for the expected delivery of the queen, in which they were disappointed; but whether from her not being really pregnant, or from her child's dying in its birth, is not ascertained.* The purport of King Edward's answer is not told by the original historian; but, as the same cause was afterwards referred to his decision, it may be inferred, that, for the present, he declined giving his opinion in it, and took time to consider what manner of proceeding would best forward the ambitious designs which the posture of affairs in Scotland now suggested to him.

In 1290, the abbot of Jedburgh concurred in a letter of the commonwealth of Scotland to King Edward, declaring their approval of the proposed marriage of his son with Margaret of Norway, the heiress of the Scottish crown.†

There is extant an order, dated July 6, 1292, by which Edward directs William Comyn, keeper of the forest of Selkirk, to send, in his name, a present of six fat bucks to the abbot of Jedburgh. Similar conciliatory gifts were ordered, at the same time, for other persons of distinction in Scotland.‡

John, abbot of Jedburgh, was present, with other persons of consequence, at Newcastle, on the 26th of December, 1292, when John Baliol, having acknowledged the English monarch's claim to be his superior lord, did homage to him for the kingdom of Scotland. In 1296, when Edward, in virtue of this pretended right of feudal superiority, seized the crown of Scotland for himself, and demanded the homage and submission of the people, the Abbot John, and the convent of Jedburgh, were among those who obeyed the summons, and swore fealty to him as their liege lord at Berwick; upon which they had their forfeited property restored to them. As their estates lay both in Berwick and Roxburgh, the letters commanding restitution, dated September 2d, were addressed to the sheriffs of both these counties. The master of the hospital, or Maison Dieu, of Jedburgh, also submitted, and obtained the same favour.* On the 13th of the same month, King Edward sent Thomas de Byrdeleye, clerk, with a letter to the abbot and convent, requesting them to admit the bearer of it among them for life.† It may be conjectured that this religious brother was placed among them as a spy upon their actions. A monastery was not an unlikely place for the friends of Scottish independence to meet together secretly, and concert measures for delivering their country from unjust domination; and the situation of Jedburgh, near the limits of the kingdom, and on the verge of an extensive forest, which afforded peculiar facilities for the rendezvous of forces, might render it of some importance to Edward to have sure intelligence of any strangers that resorted there, and of the nature of the affairs they appeared to be occupied with.

The castle of Jedburgh, at this time one of the strongest places on the borders of the kingdom, was another object which drew his attention. In 1291, the principal fortresses of Scotland were placed under his custody, through the influence of the different claimants of the crown, who, on this and other occasions, shewed themselves more ready to risk the honour and interests of their country than to thwart the designs of the man by whose favour each of them hoped to mount to the object of their common ambition. Jedburgh castle was yielded by John Comyn, about the middle of June, into the hands of Laurence Seymour, who, on the 4th of August the same year, was commanded by King Edward to deliver it into the keeping of Brian Fitzalan.‡ The reason alleged for this temporary occupation of the Scottish castles was to enable Edward to give quiet possession of the kingdom to him to whom he should award it; but, judging from the whole of his conduct, it can hardly be doubted that he had also more particularly in view to accustom the Scots to see him exercise authority within their country, and thus pave the way for his meditated usurpation of the kingdom itself. The fortresses were, indeed, restored, as soon as John Baliol was settled on the throne; but, in 1295, he demanded that the towns and castles of Berwick, Roxburgh, and Jedburgh, should be again intrusted to him as a pledge to bind the Scottish nation to remain at peace with him during the time that he should be at war with France.* This demand was, however, disregarded; for Baliol, wearied and provoked by the repeated indignities to which he had been subjected by the insolent interference of his liege lord, was now resolved to throw off the yoke of vassalage, and was negotiating an alliance, for the purposes of mutual aid and defence, with the King of France. This treaty was concluded at Paris, on the 23d of October;† and its consequences were, invasions of each other's country to the Scots and English, in the following spring, ending in the defeat and dethronement of Baliol, who resigned his kingdom into the hands of King Edward, on the 2d of July, 1296. The strong places in the south of Scotland were reduced in the beginning of summer, when, on the 16th of May, the castle and forest of Jedburgh, and the forest of Selkirk, were committed to Thomas de Burnham, and on the 5th of October thereafter, to Hugh de Eyland.‡

The safety enjoyed by the canons of Jedburgh, under the protection of the King of England, was of short duration. The undisciplined Scots army, in their recent invasion of England, had set an evil example, in destroying the monastery of Hexham, and some other religious houses. These outrages were, at the time they were committed, overlooked by the politic Edward, who, Baliol being now removed, regarded Scotland as his own property, and wisely resolved to try the effect of conciliatory measures in establishing his authority there,—a design which, if he had been seconded in it by those to whom he committed the government of that country, might perhaps have succeeded. But, through the cruelty and injustice of his tyrannical agents, war being rekindled in 1297, while the Scots, under the conduct of the heroic Wallace, struggled to regain their violated independence, the protection granted by the English monarch to the religious communities of Scotland was either revoked, or it proved an insufficient check upon the covetous and vindictive spirit of his forces, by whom many of those hitherto venerated seats of religion and learning were ruthlessly wasted and spoiled. Jedburgh abbey was not only plundered, and the conventual buildings unsparingly destroyed, but the lead was stripped off the roof of the church, and was detained by Sir Richard Hastings, even after he had been commanded by King Edward to restore it. The abbot sought legal redress of the grievances done to his community by Sir Richard, which being delayed, he petitioned the king and his council, praying, with particular earnestness, that the lead of his church might be restored.* This laudable anxiety to preserve the hallowed and beautiful edifice from the farther injury to which, thus dismantled, it was exposed, was peculiarly honourable to the abbot, at a time when, it must be concluded, he and his brethren had not the refuge of a home themselves.† The canons were, indeed, at this time, reduced to a deplorable state of poverty and distress, insomuch that the monarch, in pity, procured them, in 1300, a separate asylum in different religious houses of the same order in England, where he commanded that they should be received, and kindly treated, until their own monastery might be repaired and made fit for their reception.‡ The priory of Restenote was likewise impoverished and ruined; but its tithes and revenues, which had been seized by the King of England's officers, were restored upon the petition of the convent of Jedburgh; and twenty oaks were granted them out of the forest of Platir, in Forfarshire, to repair the church and other buildings of that religious brotherhood.§

When, after many vicissitudes, the patriotic valour of the Scottish nation had re-established their independence under Robert the Bruce, their rightful sovereign, Jedburgh and several other strong places on the frontiers still remained, for some time, in the enemy's hands, and enabled them to exercise an oppressive dominion over the neighbouring country. Among other excesses committed by the English garrisons, they exacted heavy contributions from the inhabitants, and seized the cattle, goods, and even the persons, of such as failed to satisfy their demands. The complaints of the oppressed people having been conveyed to King Edward II, he issued orders, on the 10th of November, 1313, that the captains who held his castles in Scotland should treat the inhabitants who were subject to him with kindness.*

But the inhabitants of Teviotdale found a better protector in the brave Sir James Douglas, surnamed the Good, who, by his valour and conduct, kept the enemy within their remaining fastnesses, and freed the country from their domination. His usual retreat, and the rendezvous of his forces, was in Jed Forest, where he had secret intelligence of whatever the enemy, who kept the opposite marches and neighbouring castles, were doing or preparing; and wherever a hostile inroad was attempted, he was at hand, with his warlike followers, to punish the invaders and rescue the prey. The English warden, provoked at his success, determined to make a vigorous effort against so formidable an enemy, hoping to crush him at once. With this design, Thomas de Richmond† marched to the banks of the Jed, at the head of ten thousand men, furnished with woodmen's axes to hew down the forest, that it might never again be a place of refuge and security to the Scots. Douglas was about to make an inroad into the English border, and had assembled his men at Lintalee, a pleasant retreat on the river's side, where they had built wooden huts, and were preparing to entertain themselves with good cheer, previous to their excursion, when he was certified of the purpose of the enemy to fall upon them in the unguarded hour of conviviality. He quickly drew his little army into a hollow place by the side of a narrow defile, through which the English must pass, and, until they came near, his men endeavoured to render the path through the thickets impervious to their enemy's horse, by twisting and tying together the branches of the underwood which grew on each side,—a circumstance which is still commemorated by a wreath of stakes in the armorial bearings of Douglas's descendants.‡ When the enemy came up, the Scots lay concealed, until Douglas thought they had advanced far enough within the defile, when, rushing out, he gave the preconcerted signal for the onset, and falling upon the foremost party, he encountered with the English commander himself, and, after a gallant combat, slew him. The Scottish archers, in the mean while, showered their arrows from the woods, and the men-at-arms closed with their enemies, who, discouraged by the death of their leader, were soon thrown into confusion, and fled, pursued by the Scots. When, however, they got out of the woods, and found themselves in the open country, they rallied; and Douglas, not being in sufficient force to cope with them in this situation, led his men back to Lintalee, having received intelligence that a party of three hundred Englishmen, with a churchman named Ellis, were making free with the entertainment provided by the Scots before the battle. Their hasty return proved an unseasonable and fatal interruption to these unbidden guests, to whom so little courtesy was shewn, that few of them escaped with their lives. Disheartened by this additional misfortune, the rest returned into England without attempting any thing farther.* — It is probable that this transaction, the date of which is not recorded, took place in 1317; as Bruce was in Ireland at the time, and the Earl of Arundel was warden of the English marches.† The king went to Ireland about July, 1316, and did not return till the following summer; and Arundel was appointed warden in November, 1316.‡ It is likewise probable, that the castle of Jedburgh was yielded to the Scots soon afterwards. The time and circumstances of its recovery are not mentioned by the chroniclers of the period; but they inform us, that Berwick, which was retaken by the Scots in April, 1318, was the last of the strong places in Scotland which the English retained. To reward the good services of Douglas, King Robert granted him the lordship of the town, castle, and forest of Jedworth, with Bonjedworth and the mains of Jedworth. §

In such disturbed times, it was probably a long while before the abbey recovered from its impoverished and dilapidated condition ; and there is no record of its affairs for a considerable period. After the Abbot John, there was an abbot of Jedburgh named WILLIAM, who may have been his immediate successor. He witnessed a charter granted to Melros Abbey,* along with William, abbot of Kelso, who did not attain that office till after 1314, and William de Lamberton, bishop of St Andrews, who died in 1328. ROBERT appears to have been the next abbot. His name is found as a witness in the chartulary of Arbroath, in the years 1322, 1325, and in the chartulary of Kelso, in 1329.† When the invading army of Edward II, in their retreat in 1322, dealt unsparingly with the monasteries of Melros and Dryburgh, they do not appear to have visited Jedburgh ; and, when a general peace was concluded, in 1328, it was provided, that the estates and revenues in England, belonging to the abbeys of Jedburgh, Melros, and Kelso, should be restored to them. The orders, which the English king gave for this purpose in behalf of the convent at Jedburgh, were addressed to the abbess de Pratis, near Northampton ; the parson of Abbotslee, in Huntingdonshire ; John de Bolynbroke, his own escheator ; and Thomas de Featherstonhalgh.‡

The few incidents relative to the monasteries that henceforth occur, are too much interwoven with the public events affecting the country in general, to be distinctly traced, without keeping the latter in view. By the treaty of peace, Edward III. formally renounced the claim of superior dominion over the king and kingdom of Scotland, so unjustly set up by his grandfather, and pursued by his father. Afterwards, however, he made no scruple of reviving the same iniquitous pretensions, when circumstances seemed to afford him an opportunity of urging them with success. King Robert died in 1329, and was succeeded by his son, David II, then only six years of age. Within three years more, Douglas, and most of the other warlike chieftains, who had been Bruce's companions in arms, and powerful coadjutors in contending for the freedom of their country, also died. Thus the state of Scotland was left destitute of men of sufficient experience and authority to guide and defend it. At this juncture, Edward Baliol, son of the late King John, was induced to claim the inheritance of the crown, chiefly through the encouragement and assistance of Thomas Lord Wake, and Henry de Beaumont, powerful English noblemen, who hoped thereby to recover their forfeited estates in Scotland, which, through some difficulty or neglect, had not been restored to them, as they ought to have been, according to agreement, at the peace.* Their enterprise was, at first, discountenanced, and even forbidden, by the king of England; nevertheless, when he saw the success that attended their invasion of Scotland, where they gained an important victory on the 14th of August, 1332, at Duplin, near Perth, soon after which Baliol was crowned at Scone, he changed his policy, and agreed to support Baliol, upon his consenting to hold the kingdom in vassalage under him as lord paramount. When, soon after, the hostility of his subjects made Baliol glad to escape into England, King Edward made offers to the party of King David, to support him under the same conditions of subjection; which being indignantly rejected, he marched with a formidable army into Scotland, in April, 1333;† and, after gaining the battle of Halidon hill, reinstated his royal vassal, who, the following year, ceded to him lands and rents on the borders of Scotland, of the value of two thousand pounds yearly, in consideration, as he professed, of the aid afforded him in recovering his kingdom. In this gift was included the town of Jedburgh, of which Robert Maners was directed to take possession; and the castle and forest of Jedburgh, of which William de Prestfen was to take possession, in behalf of the king of England, their master.‡ On the 23d of September, the same year, the English monarch made an exchange with Lord Henry de Percy, giving him the castle and constabulary of Jedburgh, with the towns of Jedburgh, Bonjedworth, and Hassynden, and the forest of Jedburgh, and receiving Annandale in return, which he immediately conferred upon Edward de Bohun.§ But the Scottish nation, who could ill brook being governed by a vassal of England, were still less willing that their country should be dismembered of an extensive territory, comprehending several of their most fertile counties.|| The inhabitants of the town and forest of Jedburgh, in particular, refused to become subjects of the English king, and it must have been a useless appointment he conferred upon Thomas de Heton, when, in June 1335, he sent him to receive their submission.* Sir William Douglas, the lord of Liddesdale, recovered all Teviotdale from the enemy in 1338; and, in 1342, when King David returned from France, where he had resided with his tutor, the abbot of Kelso, during the usurpation, the English were expelled from every part of Scotland, except the town of Berwick. This prosperous state of things was unfortunately of short continuance; and the fruits of so much valour and patriotism were, in a great measure, destroyed by the discomfiture of a numerous army of Scots, and the captivity of their king, at the battle of Durham, fought on the 17th of October, 1346; after which the border counties were again taken possession of by the king of England.

We are not informed what share of the disasters of this period fell to the monastery of Jedburgh; but we may conjecture that the canons would endeavour, as much as possible, to avoid incurring the displeasure of either of the contending parties. We find the Abbot JOHN, about the year 1338, witnessing a grant to the abbey of Dryburgh, by William de Felton, the English governor of Roxburgh castle, and sheriff of Teviotdale.† In 1343, he witnessed a confirmatory charter of King David Bruce, to the abbey of Kelso;‡ and, in 1354, his name occurs among the witnesses of a similar deed of King Edward III. to the church of St James, at Roxburgh.§ In 1356, the abbot of Jedburgh was present, with the abbots of Kelso, Melros, and Dryburgh, at the castle of Roxburgh, on the 29th of January, when Edward Baliol made a formal concession of the kingdom of Scotland, and of his own private estates, to the king of England, for the sum of five thousand marks, and an annual pension of two thousand pounds.|| ROBERT of Jedburgh, who was probably abbot, had a letter of safe-conduct to go to England on the affairs of King David, on the 6th of May, 1358, the year after the king was released from his long captivity.¶ In 1373, the affairs of the convent seem to have been prosperous, as they were able to export wool, the produce of their estates. King Edward issued an order, on the 14th of May, to the collectors of his customs at the port of Berwick, forbidding them to exact, or extort, more than half a mark of duty upon each sack of wool of the growth of Scotland, to the number of fourscore sacks, which should be exported by each of the abbots of Kelso, Melros, Dryburgh, and Jedburgh. Two days after, he gave letters of protection, to continue in force three years, in behalf of the abbots, monks, servants, and property, of the same monasteries.* But even royal authority was often found to be only a precarious and insufficient check upon the ferocious habits of people so long subject to the brutalizing influence of predatory warfare. We read that, three or four years after this, no Scotsman could travel in England, notwithstanding his being furnished with a passport, without being stopped and robbed; and that some canons of Jedburgh and Dryburgh, who took a journey into England, to sue for the restoration of property belonging to the churches annexed to their monasteries, were even barbarously murdered.†

The English, having possession of all the castles and places of strength on the Scottish frontier, maintained their footing many years in the territory they had forcibly occupied, though harassed by incessant attacks of the dispossessed proprietors, and hostile neighbours. Besides the public and national enmity, there existed a particular quarrel between the Lord Percy, warden of the English border, and William, Earl of Douglas, who guarded the Scottish marches, because the former, by virtue of the King of England's grant, already mentioned, kept possession of the lands and forest of Jedburgh, and other estates, which belonged by inheritance to the latter. This animosity gave additional sharpness to the hostilities which about this period desolated the border districts of both kingdoms, and stimulated those warlike chieftains, and their partisans and dependants, to daring exploits, that have long been the subject of popular tradition and song.‡ At length, by the conduct and persevering valour of Douglas, the intruders were forced to quit their settlements in Teviotdale, which they never again permanently occupied; and in the year 1384, they were all driven out of the kingdom, but such as shut themselves up in Berwick, and in the castles of Roxburgh and Jedburgh, where they were closely watched, and cut off from all intercourse with their countrymen, except during short intervals of truce.* Thus, in the articles of a truce agreed upon by the wardens of the opposite marches, on the 27th of June, 1386, it was stipulated, that the garrisons and inhabitants of the above-mentioned places should be suffered to have free communication with England, and be at liberty to purchase provisions in Scotland, within the distance of two miles to the north and west of them.†

The Earl of Northumberland, with his son Hotspur, having fought successfully against the Scots at Homildon, in 1402, Henry IV. made him a grant, which must have been merely nominal, of Teviotdale and all the lands in Scotland belonging to the earls of Douglas;‡ but having been concerned in the rebellion against his sovereign in 1403, Henry deprived him of the wardenship of the border; and, the next year, anxious to reduce his power still farther, he made him exchange his possessions in Scotland for others of equal value in England, which the king engaged to give him. The castle and forest of Jedworth were to be delivered up to Robert Swinowe, together with the rights of regality, advowsons of abbeys, priories, churches, and hospitals, and all other profits and advantages contained in the grant of Edward III. to Sir Henry de Percy, grandfather of the present earl.§ From the mention of advowsons, or patronage of abbeys and priories, it appears that the canons were no longer at liberty to elect their own superior, as in more ancient times, that privilege having now fallen into the hands of a lay patron, and, in ordinary times, belonging to the king, as will appear in the sequel.

Jedburgh castle, which the English had kept ever since the battle of Durham in 1346, was wrested from them at the expiration of a truce, in the spring of 1409, by the common people of Teviotdale, the peasants and inhabitants of the neighbouring towns and villages; a hardy and warlike race, no less practised in the use of the spear and the battle-axe, than of the implements of mechanical and rural labour. The inhabitants of Jedburgh town and forest, in particular, were of known prowess; and their formidable weapons, the Jeddart axe and Jeddart staff, are still celebrated. The latter is described as a stout stake, shod with iron, the iron being four feet in length.* The castle was situated on the brow of the hill adjacent to the upper part of the town, where its site, occupying a considerable space of ground, may still be traced. The garrisons lodged within it had often laid the surrounding country under contribution, and oppressed the town; wherefore, to prevent the recurrence of such grievances, and that it might never again be a stronghold of the enemy, it was determined to demolish it to its foundations. But, as this was a work of much difficulty and labour, it was proposed, in a meeting of the states of the realm held at Perth, that a tax of two pennies upon every hearth should be levied to defray the expense of its demolition. This, however, was effectually resisted by the Duke of Albany, who was regent during the minority and captivity of James I, and it was ordered that the sum required should be paid out of the revenues of the crown. †

The year 1410 was signalized by a naval expedition of the enemy into the Firth of Forth, and an inroad into Teviotdale; both conducted by Sir Robert Umfraville, vice-admiral of England, and governor of Berwick. In the latter, they burned the town of Jedburgh, and ravaged the country on the banks of the Jed, and the adjacent valleys, watered by the romantic streams of the Kale and the Rule. ‡ The town was again burned, six or seven years after, by the same commander; § and a third time by the Earl of Warwick, in 1464, to punish the Scottish borderers for having given assistance to Queen Margaret of Anjou, in the civil wars between the houses of York and Lancaster. ||

In the transactions of the times, there is no mention of any circumstance relating to the abbey of Jedburgh for a considerable period. WALTER, abbot of Jedburgh, was concerned in an agreement, dated November 16, 1444, with the abbots of Kelso, Melros, and Dryburgh, respecting the corn tithes of the parish of Lessudden. ¶ In the year 1473, we find the Abbot

ROBERT, with the abbot of Kelso and others, commissioned by King James III, holding a meeting at Alnwick, on the 28th of September, with commissioners from the King of England, for the redress of grievances, and settling conditions of truce.* JOHN HALL was appointed abbot in 1478, on the presentation of the king. †

When the Scottish parliament, in 1481, expecting war, ordered garrisons to be stationed at different places, for the defence of the borders, the Laird of Cranstoun had the command of sixty men in Jedburgh, twenty in Cocklaw, and twenty in Dolfinstoun, with power to appoint two captains under him at two of the places, himself being in the third. ‡

THOMAS, abbot of Jedburgh, was one of the Scottish commissioners at a meeting for a truce and redress of grievances, held at Coldstream on the 25th of March, 1494. Among the matters of complaint exhibited by the Scots, were certain trespasses, committed by Englishmen, on the lands of Canonby priory, a cell of Jedburgh abbey. § The name of HENRY, abbot of Jedburgh, is subscribed to charters dated in 1507, 1508, and 1511. ||

The citizens of Jedburgh thought proper, in 1513, to establish in the town a convent of Franciscan friars, about thirty in number, of the reformed class, called Observantines, ¶ from their rigid observance of the rules laid down by their original founder, St Francis of Assisi, by which they were bound to a very austere mode of life. Neither individuals nor communities of this order were allowed to possess any property, excepting only the ground on which their houses stood. They subsisted entirely upon precarious alms; and a certain number of them, in their turns, went about with wallets on their shoulders, begging for the fraternity; whence they were also called mendicants, or begging friars. They went about barefoot, and wore a gray woollen gown, with a cowl, and girt round the middle with a rope. Adam Abel, or Bell, the author of a chronicle relating chiefly to the history of Scotland, who was a regular canon of the monastery of Inchaffray, changed his order, and became a member of this community, in which he spent the remainder of his days. He wrote his work, which he called Rota Temporum, or The Wheel of Time, in Latin, beginning at the creation of the world, and ending in the year 1535. It was printed at Rome, with some small alterations and additions, by John Lesly, bishop of Ross. Father Hay says, that the author made an abridgment of it in English, and continued it to the year 1536; and that he, having procured the original copy of this from Lord Cromarty, then lord register, lost it at Roslin, in 1688, when the mob spoiled the castle.*

JOHN HOME, abbot of Jedburgh, was one of the lords who sat in the parliament held at Perth, in November, 1513.† He was a member of one of the most powerful families at that time in Scotland, being the son of Alexander, second earl of Home, and brother of the third earl, who held the office of great chamberlain of the kingdom.

The public peace had been maintained, and even the borders had enjoyed a state of comparative rest and tranquillity, for a considerable period previous to the unfortunate battle of Flodden, [September 9, 1513;] but soon after that disastrous event, the mountain passes of Cheviot, and the glens of Teviotdale, again re-echoed the harsh clang and barbarous uproar of predatory warfare. The scenes of rapine and destruction that were exhibited cannot be better understood than from the descriptions, however uncouth, of the actors themselves. Lord Thomas Dacre, warden of the middle marches of England, who acted under the direction of King Henry VIII, thus records his achievements, in a letter to the bishop of Durham, dated at Carlisle, October 28, 1513:—"Ascertyning your lordship, that sens I mett the chamberlain on Setterday was sevinnight, I caused iiij roods to be made in Tevidale; oone to the toure of Howpaslet, and there brynt, tooke, and brought away xxviiij score shepe, with insight and goodes; another roode to Carlanrig, made be the inhabitants of Tyndale and Riddesdale, to the castle of Ancrom, and brynt the town of the same, and toke and brought away lx prisoners, with much goodes, cattell, and insight. And three roods in Annandale, where as great distruction was, both of brynning and taking of goodes. And over that, I entend Tevidale shal be kept waking whils I deale with them myself."‡ King Henry had the gratification of reading the details of this intended incursion into Teviotdale, in the following letter to himself, dated at Harbottle, November 13, the same year:—"Opon Thuresday last past, I assembled your grace's

The natural and obvious consequences of this petty war of devastation and plunder, which deprived a spirited and hardy enemy of the means of subsistence, was to force them, from necessity as well as revenge, to acts of retaliation. Accordingly, we find it stated in a letter of the Duke of Albany, written in the year 1515, that the people were animated with a determined spirit of hostility against the English, “that they had had frequent and successful rencounters with them, and had done them more damage than they had received from them.”† But the demoralizing influence of this state of things, in which there was no security for the fruits of industry, nor motive for its exertion, and the ferocity of character engendered and fostered by a life of rapine and continual danger, alternately suffering and inflicting the severest injuries, rendered the borderers oftentimes little scrupulous whether they obtained a booty from the enemy or their own countrymen ; especially when, in the case of the latter, local feuds, and the feelings of rival clanship also intervened. The same causes made them ready and dangerous instruments in the hands of the powerful chiefs and nobles, in their ambitious and turbulent quarrels, so frequent in this and succeeding periods of Scottish history. The Earl of Home had recourse to their aid, when, by the intrigues of his enemies, and the failure of his own factious designs, he and his family were placed in hostility to the Duke of Albany, who held the reins of government during part of the minority of James V.‡ One of the charges brought against him and his brother William, in 1516, was their encouraging and protecting the banditti of the borders. Upon this, and the improbable charge, imputed to the chamberlain, of having been accessory to the death of the late king on the day of the battle of Flodden, the two brothers having been enticed to Edinburgh by perfidious promises of safety given them by the regent, who summoned them to assist at a meeting of council in the abbey of Holyrood, in the beginning of October, were there treacherously seized, and beheaded, the one the day following their summary trial and condemnation, and the other the second day thereafter. Their brother, the abbot of Jedburgh, was at the same time banished beyond the river Tay.* Albany then went to Jedburgh, and held a court of justice for the trial and punishment of the licentious borderers.

Sir Andrew Ker of Ferniherst, who was seneschal, or bailie, of the monastery, being an ally of the Homes, and implicated with them in the transactions for which the chamberlain and his brother lost their lives, was apprehended along with them, but had the good fortune to escape, either by an acquittal, or by the favour of the regent.† By virtue of his office, he claimed a right to exercise jurisdiction in Jed Forest, as included in the regality, or lordship, of the abbey, which became the subject of a dispute, in 1519, between him and the Earl of Angus, the proprietor of the forest. Disputes of this nature seldom terminated, in that age, without bloodshed. On this occasion, Ker of Cesford, warden of the middle march, took part with Angus, and, coming with his followers to Kelso, he met and attacked Sir James Hamilton, who was on his way to join Ferniherst with a company of Mersmen, and forty lawless borderers, who served him for pay.‡ The men of the Mers deserted Hamilton in the beginning of the conflict, and thirty of his horsemen being taken prisoners, and five killed, he was forced to fly, for safety of his life, to Home castle, which he reached with difficulty, being closely pursued by John Somerville of Cambusnethan, to whom some accounts attribute the whole fame, both of the attack and pursuit.§ Ferniherst, soon after this occurrence, yielded the point in dispute, and held a court in the town of Jedburgh as bailie to the earl of Angus.|| its chiefs, happily it had no external enemy to struggle with for about five years; and the peace of the borders was only disturbed by occasional out-breakings of the lawless inhabitants, who could not easily be restrained from indulging their inveterate habits of rapine and spoliation, notwithstanding the strict measures of justice taken by the wardens of the opposite marches, at their stated meetings and courts, held for the punishing and repressing such misdeeds. Offences of this kind began again to increase, in 1521, when political circumstances too faithfully indicated that a dissolution of the amicable relations of the two kingdoms was at hand. In the beginning of that year, it was alleged, that "the Potts, Rotherfords, Dalgleishes, and Robsons, with their complices, came into England with two slothunds, lyke as they had wantit goods, and wantit nane, folloand ane trod; * and sa, in the colour of the said following, come to the toun of Kilham, and thair spoilzit a part of the toun, and took away 500 sheep, and 5<sup>xx</sup> nowt, and spoilzit the pore men and women folloing ther goods." † In the course of the same year a party of English burnt the village of Eckford; and on the 14th of December a numerous band of Scots, many of whom wore masks, that they might not be known by the conservators of the peace, made an unsuccessful attempt to carry away the cattle belonging to the people of Wark, and returning in greater force a little before midnight, they burnt and destroyed the neighbouring village of Learmouth with the corn in it, produced by the labour of thirty ploughs, and took away 400 cattle, 2000 sheep, 400 goats, 30 geldings, and 20 prisoners. ‡ Lancelot Ker, who had been one of the leaders in this exploit, had his tower of Gaitshaw, with the neighbouring steads and hamlets, burned on the 15th of April, 1522, when the English ravaged the country on the banks of the Bowmont and the Kale. § On the 20th of July, the English warden, at the head of two thousand men, made an inroad into Teviotdale, "and went to Leynton towr, and sett upon it with spere and sheld, and in conclusion, or it past none, wan it and brant it clene down to the bare stane walles. Notwithstanding, all the men that were within, whiche was xvi, were saved be reason of a gable of the house that was of stone, and the wind that was ther friend, for betwix the said gable and the batialing, they lay unto the huse rofe was fallen," where their enemies "left them all, except one Robyn Carr, whiche cam down in a rope, when the huse was furst fired."

There was now open war between the two nations, the conduct of which, on the part of England, was, about the end of July, committed to the Earl of Shrewsbury, who, proceeding to the borders, speedily collected an army of the warlike inhabitants, and the numerous garrisons of the frontier towns and castles; and, being joined by Lord Dacre, warden of the west marches, with his forces, they burst suddenly into Teviotdale, when the corn was ripe in the fields, and forming themselves into separate parties of sufficient strength, began, as usual, to sack, pillage, and destroy castles and cottages, and to burn the produce of the fields. The town of Kelso, in particular, was pillaged and partly burnt by the detachments under the command of the Lords Ross and Dacre.* Meanwhile, the alarm spread over hill and valley in every direction, and the men of the Mers and Teviotdale, flocking together under their proper chiefs, hastened to the scene of action, and their usual courage being quickened by resentment, they dealt their blows with such effect, that their enemies, though twice as numerous as themselves, were forced to make a hasty retreat, and many of them were taken prisoners. Eighteen fortified places were demolished in this expedition. †

The King of England conferred the chief command on the Earl of Surrey, in 1523, an eventful year in the history of the border wars. The first inroad into Teviotdale was made on Holy Thursday, which was the second day of April, by the Marquis of Dorset, warden of the east and middle marches, with other distinguished captains, who, after they had burned "Grimsly, Mowhouse, Dufford Mylles, Ackeforthe, Crowlyng, Nowes Maner, Midder Crowlyng, Marbottel, Cow Bog, Sessforthe Maner, Myddyl Rigge, Primsed, Brocket-Shaws, Haruel, ‡ Wide-open-haugh, and other borderers at the demolition of the towers and castles in the Mers and Teviotdale, and states his opinion, that more good is likely to ensue to England "by the same, than if Edenbrough and iij of the best townys of Scotlande had been brent and destroyed," the Scots being thereby not only deprived of the means of securely annoying their neighbours, but even of defending their own country. With this persuasion of security, he, with the king's advice, immediately disbanded a great part of his forces, which altogether had exceeded ten thousand men; but the Scots soon took advantage of this, and made several inroads into England. In return, Surrey planned an expedition against Jedburgh, which, at that time, was a much more considerable place than it is at present; for it contained twice as many houses as Berwick, with six strong towers, and many handsome buildings, that might have lodged a thousand horsemen.* This inroad was to have been made in August, but the ammunition and warlike stores not being ready before the moon began to wane, it was found necessary to defer it some weeks. Surrey, giving an account of the reasons for this delay, in a letter to Cardinal Wolsey, written at Newcastle, on the 27th day of August, says, that he considers it as more hurtful to the Scots, than if the inroad were made sooner, since, by the time intended, "their wheat, rye, and barley, would be for the mooste parte inned and redy to be burned, whiche nowe shuld take nothing so moche hurt."† Being, at length, furnished with the necessary supplies, he quickly assembled six thousand fighting men, in companies, severally commanded by the Earl of Westmoreland, Lord Dacre of Gilsland, Sir William Eure, Sir William Bulmer, Sir Thomas Tempest, Sir Arthur Darcy, and Sir Marmaduke Constable, and putting himself at their head, on the 22d of September, when it was full moon, he led them to Jedburgh, and encamped them in a convenient place by the river side. Next morning they stormed the town, which, although gallantly defended by about fifteen hundred, or two thousand men, who were within it, yet, being without walls, was soon taken. Committing the care of burning it to Sir William Bulmer and Sir Thomas Tempest, Surrey then went to direct the attack upon the abbey, which occupied him till two hours after night-fall, when it was also taken, and burnt by the merciless foe. On the morrow, while the main body were continuing the work of destruction, Lord Dacre, his brother Sir Christopher, and some other captains, with seven hundred men, were sent to attack Fernherst, the castle of Dacre's mortal enemy, the redoubted Sir Andrew Ker, well known on the borders by the familiar appellation of Dand Ker,—a man equally remarkable for his abilities and his courage, who took a distinguished part in the affairs of the country, both in peace and war, for nearly fifty years, till his death in 1545. The place was difficult of access, being situated in the middle of an extensive wood, through which the assailants were obliged to drag their ordnance, and to fight and skirmish at every step with parties of the enemy. Their valour and perseverance, however, surmounted every obstacle; and, having at length brought their cannon to bear upon the castle, it was taken and battered down, after thirty of the besieged had bravely fallen in its defence. Many of them were taken prisoners, among whom were Fernherst himself,* and the Laird of Gradon, also named Dand Ker, famous for his predatory exploits on the English frontier.† The victors returned in the evening to the camp at Jedburgh, which was fenced round with dikes, carts, and pieces of ordnance, and contained the whole army, except Lord Dacre and his company, who, not having consulted the commander, had chosen to lodge without. About eight o'clock, while they were at supper, they were alarmed by the quick tramp and clattering of hoofs without, occasioned by the horses of Dacre's company breaking out of an enclosure, and running at large. Those within, imagining the noise to proceed from a sudden attempt of the Scots to surprise the camp, discharged their arrows at them, of which they shot away above a hundred sheaves before they discovered their mistake. This made the animals so wild and furious that more than fifty of them rushed over a steep rock and were killed, and two hundred more ran into the burning town, where they were caught, and carried away by women. The amount of their loss by this accident appeared, on the following day, to be about eight hundred horses; and they superstitiously attributed it to the agency of evil spirits. "I dare not write," says Surrey, in a letter to Cardinal Wolsey, "the wondres that my Lord Dacre and all his company doo saye they sawe that nyght vj tymys, of spirits and fereful sights. And universally all their company saye playnly, the devil was that nyght amongs them vj tymys; whiche mysfortune hath blemysed the best jorney that was made in Scotland many yeres." They continued in their camp and its vicinity all the next day, but departed on the twenty-fifth, and arrived at Berwick the same night at ten o'clock. The Scots annoyed them with incessant skirmishing during the whole excursion, and fought so well, that Surrey, in the letter above quoted, thus expressed his admiration of them:—"I assure your grace, I found the Scottes, at this tyme, the boldest men, and the hottest, that ever I sawe any nation. And all the jorney, upon all parts of the armye, kepte us with soo contynuall skyrmyshe, that I never sawe the like. If they might assemble xl<sup>ti</sup> M<sup>t</sup> as good men as I now sawe xv<sup>c</sup>, or ij M<sup>t</sup>, it wold bee a herd encountre to mete theym."*

The English commander, and the wardens and their lieutenants, continued, from time to time, their desolating excursions, as long as there was any thing to plunder or destroy within fifteen or twenty miles of the marches, and until the booty was at too great a distance for them to go in small parties, and without a regular, and more powerful, force. The sum of their achievements is impressively stated by Lord Dacre, in a letter to Cardinal Wolsey, dated June 11, 1524. He says, "Litill or nothing is left upon the frontiers of Scotland, without it be parte of ald howses, whereof the thak and coverings are taken away, by reason whereof they cannot be brint."†

It would have been wonderful if the untamed and fearless race on whom those miseries were inflicted, had remained passive under them, out of respect for the truce concluded with England in autumn, and continued by short renewals, for about eight years. Reckless of the authority of a government, under which they had seldom found protection, or been subject to just restraint, it was hard, and almost impossible, to convince them that they had not a right to win back by force what force had reft from them. That they might prosecute their daring enterprizes with less danger of control, and, perhaps, to find an occasional refuge and congenial hospitality, while their own dwellings lay ruined and desolate, many of the Teviotdale freebooters retired to the impervious wilds and fastnesses of the mountainous district of Liddisdale. But the Earl of Angus, who was now regent, being determined to maintain order, and not altogether trusting to the effect of the bishop of Glasgow's excommunication, which he procured to be fulminated against them, made a secret and expeditious journey thither from Edinburgh, in the summer of 1525; and coming suddenly upon the Armstrongs, he apprehended twelve of the chiefs of these bold outlaws, who were reported to be the greatest thieves upon the borders, and "the gretteste maynteners of the theves of Tyvidail."* In the spring 1526, the regent came again to the borders, and summoned the chiefs to proceed with him against the same rebels, when the Kers of Teviotdale refused to go, because they were under "a bond of assurance" with the Armstrongs; † but they supported him when he came with the king to Jedburgh in July the same year, to hold a court of justice for the trial of those who were accused of theft, slaughter, and oppression. The young king is said to have felt displeasure at the partiality and injustice of the proceedings, as well as impatience at the restraint under which he was held by Angus, his guardian; and it was when they were on their way back to Edinburgh that Scott of Buccleugh attempted to rescue him from his control. ‡ It is said that the plan had been previously concerted, and even, that the borderers had been incited to commit trespasses, with the view of bringing the regent into this part of the country, and affording facility for its execution. Early in the morning, as they were leaving Melros, where they had passed the night, Buccleugh, with a thousand horsemen, appeared descending the Eildon hills, and a desperate encounter took place, in which that chieftain was forced to retire, with the loss of above eighty men. Elliot of Stobs, who was of Buccleugh's party, slew

Sir Andrew Ker of Cessford, which gave rise to a feud between the Scotts and Kers, which fatally disturbed the borders for many years.*

To repress the increasing disorders that arose from the numerous quarrels of this nature now subsisting, Angus proceeded to Jedburgh in the following summer, with six thousand men, and, in the king's name, compelled the principal chieftains to give him pledges as a security that they would keep the peace. The king himself, having recovered his liberty, governed with vigour, and, in 1529, executed severe justice upon the Armstrongs, and other outlaws, of Liddisdale; which is said to have produced quiet and security for a time, on both sides of the marches. But these blessings were again interrupted in the autumn of 1532, and several wasteful excursions were made, both by Scots and Englishmen, into each other's territory, until peace was restored towards the end of 1533.† The

† The Earl of Northumberland, writing to King Henry VIII, gives the following account of an inroad of the Scots, on the 21st of November, 1532:—"The Scotts being assembled to the number of iij<sup>m</sup> did com secret upon the close nyght, and kest of thare forray to the number of ecc men, and toke up a towne called Rosse, and layed their bushment in the edge of Cheviot; after whiche so doon, and the bushment and forray met, they did cast off two other forrays about xij of the cloke of the day light. same unbridled spirit of the inhabitants of the borders broke forth in 1541, and 1542, which, co-operating with other causes of displeasure, effected a more fatal breach of the relations of amity between the two kingdoms. In July, 1542, Sir Robert Bowes, with three thousand horse, assisted by the exiled Douglasses, attempted to enter Scotland with the intention of destroying Jedburgh, but was met and defeated on Hadden-rig, by the earls of Huntley and Home. In October, the Duke of Norfolk, with an army twenty thousand strong, destroyed Kelso and its neighbourhood; but when he had advanced a few miles farther to the village of Fairnington, he was compelled to retire, by the address of Huntley, in cutting off his supplies of provisions. The resentment of the king of Scots at this attack, was shewn by his hasty and ill-concerted enterprise against the western marches of England in the following month, which ended in fatal discomfiture of his army at Solway, and embittered his mind with such grief, that he died of a broken heart nineteen days thereafter.

When, upon the failure of the negotiations to effect a marriage between Prince Edward of England, and the infant princess Mary of Scotland, the Earl of Hertford, to whom the conduct of the war was committed, was devising a plan of hostile operations, his attention was drawn to Jedburgh, which, having recovered from the ruin and devastation into which it was thrown by the Earl of Surrey, now Duke of Norfolk, twenty years before, was still looked upon as a place of importance to the defence of the country, and formidable to the enemy. In a letter written to him on the 11th of March, 1554, by Sir Ralph Eure, it is spoken of as "the strength of Teviotdale, which, once destroyed, a small power would be sufficient to keep the borders of Scotland in subjection." * As it was without walls, its strength must have consisted in the towers, or bastile houses within it, and in the number and valour of the inhabitants. It appears that some Scotsmen, false to their country, had offered to set fire to this town, upon condition of their receiving twenty marks from the enemy. Hertford, in reply to Eure's letter, next day gave his opinion, that, "in case the whole town, or the better part thereof, shall be spoiled and burnt, the twenty marks would be well bestowed; but if they were only to burn here and there a house about the town, he thought the twenty marks might be better employed.”*

When the English council planned the invasion of Scotland on the east, which was conducted by the Earl of Hertford in May, it was intended that the Lord Wharton, warden of the west marches, should, at the same time, enter Teviotdale, and burn Jedburgh. This, however, was not done at the time proposed; and Hertford, after his return from his most destructive inroad, wrote to King Henry to inform him, that “he had devised with the wardens of the east and middle marches, that as soon as their horses, which were much tired in their late journey in Scotland; should be well refreshed and rested, there should be a warden’s rode made unto Jedworth, not doubting but, with the grace of God, it should be feasible enough to win the town, and also the church, or abbey, which was thought a house of some strength, and might be made a good fortress. And the same town being the chief place of resort and assembly of all the Mers and Teviotdale, and their principal relief in those parts, if it be taken from them, shall not a little abate their courage, and engender much quietness on the borders.” In case the town should not be tenable without a main army, he wishes to know whether he should garrison it, or “proceed to the burning and utter destruction of the same.” In reply, he is directed, by the lords of the council, to garrison both Jedburgh and Home Castle, if they can be taken and made tenable.† Accordingly, on the 11th of June, Lord Eure, and his son, Ralph Eure, wardens of the east and middle marches, with all their forces, and a hundred men from the west, assembled together, by appointment, at Milnfield, and set forward towards Jedburgh by night. They got within half a mile of the town next morning by four o’clock; and a messenger was forthwith sent to the provost, to say that Lord Eure was come to receive the town into the allegiance of the king of England, or, if resistance were made, to take it by storm, and sack it. The provost demanded that they might be allowed to deliberate till noon; otherwise, the inhabitants were resolved to stand to their defence. Judging this to be only a pretext to gain time, the English commander divided his men into three companies, who immediately began the attack, and forced their way into the town at three different avenues. The townspeople had brought seven or eight pieces of ordnance into the market place, where they could place them so as to command the three principal streets; but, disconcerted by the suddenness of the assault, they left their guns, and fled into the woods, pursued by their enemies, who slew six or seven score of them, within and without the town, with the loss of only six or seven of their own number. The English then pillaged and burnt the town and abbey, the Franciscan convent, and many towers or strongholds; and having loaded five hundred horses with the spoil, turned their faces homewards, and took with them seven of the pieces of cannon which they found in the streets. On their way they burnt Crailing-grange, Cesford castle, Otterburne, Cowbog, Morbattle church, and all the other villages and steads they passed, till they came to Kirk Yetholm, where they learnt that a band of Scots, conducted by the eldest son of the Earl of Home, had ridden into Northumberland, and were burning Heaton, Tillmouth, Twisel, and other places in that vicinity. Upon this, Sir Richard Bowes, captain of Norham castle, was sent forward, at his own request, and took with him Sir John Witherington, Sir Thomas Grey of Horton, Thomas Foster, and a party of riders, to chastise the invaders; and they had not advanced half a mile, before Sir Ralph Eure got leave to follow them with five hundred horsemen. Eager to get to the scene of action, they rode very fast; but many of their horses, overcome with the fatigue of their previous journey, fell behind, and were unable to proceed, so that when they came to the burning villages, their company was reduced to two hundred. The Scots fled at the first sight of their standards, and Sir Ralph ordered a hundred of his men to pursue them, while he, with Sir Richard Bowes, and Sir John Witherington, with the other hundred, crossed the Tweed at a place called Chapel-ford, between Cornhill and Tillmouth; but so many had failed through fatigue, that, by the time he reached Scottish ground, he had not forty men left. Nevertheless, he advanced two miles into Scotland, and falling in with an assemblage of the unarmed inhabitants, who were concealed among thickets, but fled, mostly on foot, at his approach, his party pursued and cut down above a hundred of them, and then returned over the Tweed, where they found Lord Eure waiting for them, and probably apprehensive of his son's danger. Sir Thomas Grey and his party were so successful in the pursuit on their side, that they took as many prisoners as they were able to bring away, amounting to two hundred; and, according to the English warden's report, which indeed appears somewhat exaggerated, "there was so few Englyshmen, and so many Scotts, that some one Englysheman toke viii or ix Scotts prisoners, and brought all away."*

The vales of the Jed and Teviot received another visit from Sir Ralph Eure on the 7th of August ensuing, when Bonjedworth, East Nisbet, West Nisbet, Ancrum-Spital, and several bastile houses were burned; eighty Scots killed, and thirty prisoners taken; 220 oxen, 400 sheep, and other spoils carried away.† In the following spring, he and Sir Brian Laiton, with an army of 3000 mercenaries, 1500 English borderers, and about 700 Scots freebooters, chiefly of the clans of Liddisdale, occupied Jedburgh, intending to make it their head-quarters, while they reduced Teviotdale into subjection to the King of England, who, to reward and encourage them in the barbarous warfare in which they had so greatly distinguished themselves, made them a grant of as much land as they might win from the Scots. The Scottish government, distracted by contending factions, had taken no timely or effectual measures to defend the country from the incessant attacks by which it was now desolated; but the Earl of Angus, already roused to resentment by repeated losses and insults, no sooner heard of this design of conquest than he vowed that he would defend his possessions, and avenge his own and his country's wrongs, or die in the attempt. Being joined by the Earl of Arran, who was then regent of the kingdom for the infant Queen Mary, they set out from Edinburgh with only three hundred horsemen, expecting to be reinforced by the nobility and gentry in their way to the borders; but they had received little addition to their numbers when they reached Melros. Meanwhile, their enemies at Jedburgh having notice of their arrival, and the smallness of their force, prepared to attack them during the night; but they, being apprised of this design, retired to the neighbouring hills to await the coming of their friends, and to watch the movements of the enemy. The English being come to Melros, and finding themselves thus thwarted, spoiled the town, and were returning to Jedburgh with their booty, when the Scots, being joined by Norman Lesley with three hundred horsemen from Fife, and afterwards by Sir Walter Scott of Buccleuch with his followers, hovered near them till they came to the heights in the vicinity of Ancrum, a village about six miles from Melros, and three from Jedburgh. There a party of the Scots, by a successful stratagem, pretended to run away, and their enemies, thinking themselves already in possession of victory, pursued them with such inconsiderate haste, that they soon became breathless and disordered, when, on a sudden, the main body of the Scots, starting up from an adjacent hollow, where they had been concealed by the advice of Buccleuch, fell upon them with impetuosity, and began a close and general fight. But the English, being unable to recover the order of their ranks, were forced to give way, notwithstanding their great superiority in number, before the undaunted courage of their enemies, who bore them down by the greater length of their spears, and who were likewise favoured by having their backs towards the declining sun, which dazzled the eyes of the Englishmen, and the wind, which drove the smoke of the fire-arms against their faces. The Scots also, who had engaged to serve with them, forsook them in the hour of need, and turned their arms against them, pursuing and committing great slaughter among the fugitives. The leaders Eure and Laiton, the former of whom fell by the hand of the laird of Molle,* with eight hundred of their men, were killed, and a thousand yielded themselves prisoners, among whom were eighty of the rank of gentlemen.†

Thus was fought the well known battle of Ancrum muir, which once more compelled the English to abandon their schemes of permanent conquest in Scotland: but their defeat upon this occasion was fiercely avenged in the month of September, by the Earl of Hertford, who, with an army of twelve thousand men, laid waste the whole of the Mers and Teviotdale.

* Among the exploits of the English in 1546, we find the following:—“Item, the xxij of May, the lord warden of the est marches” [William lord Eure, or Eures,] “having information that the laird of Mowe” [Molle] “who slew his son, repaired to ij towres of his awn, upon the head of Bowbente, [Bowmont] in Tyvidale, th’one called Mowe, and th’other Coteruste, he sent forth the said day at nyght v<sup>c</sup> men of the garrisons of this cestmarches under the leadinge of his sone Herry Ewry, and George Bowes, son to Richard Bowes, captain of Norhame, who went to the said toweres, and wan, and undermyndett them both, and beat them down, and burned the steads and towns thereabouts; the laird of Mowe nott being therein, there was one of his brethren, and iiij kynsmen of his, with a dosan of his servandes and frendes that stode at their defence, and wold not give it over, which wer all slayn in the said toweres.” COTTON MS. Calig. B. v.

In this inroad were destroyed seven monasteries and friaries, sixteen castles towers and piles, five market towns, two hundred and forty-three villages, thirteen milns, and three hospitals.* While this destruction was going forward in Scotland, the Earls of Home and Bothwell, and the abbots of Dryburgh and Jedburgh, with certain companies of Frenchmen in the service of Scotland, amounting to three thousand men, made an incursion into Northumberland, on the fifteenth of the same month, and having burned Horecliff on the Tweed, were destroying Thornton and Shorswood, when the garrison of Norham sallied forth, and drove them back to New-water ford, where two hundred of the French and Scots were killed or drowned, and sixty made prisoners.†

After the fatal battle of Pinkie, in 1547, the southern districts of Scotland were again occupied by the English, who stationed some companies of Spanish soldiers at Jedburgh, to keep the surrounding country in subjection. The Scotch government, in 1549, fearing that they intended to fortify the town, sent a body of Frenchmen, under the command of Monsieur Dessé, to retake it, which was soon accomplished, as the Spaniards fled at his approach. Next day, the laird of Fernihurst came to request his aid in recovering his castle, which had been surprised three or four months before, and was held by sixty or eighty Englishmen, commanded by a man of the most savage and merciless disposition, under whose conduct they cruelly oppressed the neighbouring country. Dessé consented, and immediately sent forward some of his officers, with two hundred arquebusiers, and some men-at-arms, to reconnoitre the place; while he and Fernihurst, with the seigneurs d'Oisel and de la Chapelle de Biron, and a sufficient number of Scots and Frenchmen, prepared to follow. When the first party got within bow-shot of the castle, they saw about twenty-five English arquebusiers prepared to defend the narrow passage that led to it; but, at the first charge, they retreated into the wood, and, being hotly pursued, maintained a running fight till they reached the gate of the outer court of the fortress, where ten of them, less nimble than their companions, fell to the ground slain, or grievously hurt, and almost all with strokes given in close encounter. The more advanced having found means to get within and shut the gate, the Frenchmen proceeded to reconnoitre the castle. When the rest of the party came up, they began to scale the wall, using long poles instead of ladders, and some of them climbing up with their hands and feet, where they found crevices or projections in the wall to lay hold of, being all the while exposed to showers of stones and arrows from the besieged. When they attained the summit, they used their weapons with such effect, that they forced the English to retreat into the inner tower, or doujon; and then, leaping down, they gained the base court, and began to force their way into the tower by mining, covering themselves with some tables they chanced to find as a penthouse, or shelter, from the missiles thrown from within. In less than an hour they effected a breach in the wall, through which the captain of the Englishmen came out, and offered to give up the place, upon assurance that their lives should be safe. But Dessé would have nothing less than an absolute surrender; wherefore, seeing no remedy, and fearing lest he should fall into the hands of the enraged borderers, a large body of whom had just burst into the base court, by forcing the gate, he surrendered himself to the Seigneurs de Dussac and de la Mothe Rouge, imploring them to protect his life. Immediately, however, one of the Scotsmen, recognizing in him the ravisher of his wife, came suddenly behind, and struck off his head with so dexterous a blow, that it leaped four or five paces from his body; and then the borderers, with savage ferocity, vied with each other in mangling and insulting the carcass, and in tearing out the eyes of the prisoners they took in this den of violence, and inflicting other torments upon them, before they put them to death. Not satisfied with the victims who fell into their own hands, they even purchased those taken by the French, and on them also exercised such barbarities as their revenge and cruelty suggested.* The French general, Beaugé, is not ashamed to relate, in the history of his Campaigns in Scotland, that, upon this occasion, he himself "sold them a prisoner for a small horse; and that they laid him down upon the ground, galloped over him with their lances in rest, and wounded him as they passed. When slain, they cut his body in pieces, and bore the mangled gobbets in triumph upon the points of their spears."* So many atrocities had the English committed, during the three or four months that they had held the castle, that the historian, though he disapproved of the cruelty of the Scots, yet could not but think it was a fair retaliation. †

The French auxiliaries under Dessé, amounting to fifteen hundred foot and five hundred horse, continued at Jedburgh some time, and annoyed the enemy by several incursions into Northumberland, in small parties, where they collected considerable booty. But they were obliged to quit this station, and retire from the borders in May, to avoid encountering an English army of eight thousand men, led by the Earl of Rutland, who, coming to Jedburgh, found the town deserted, and the houses unroofed; a precaution frequently used in times of invasion, to prevent the enemy from burning them. Next day, the English took and plundered, and then burnt, Bonjedworth, Hundalee, Hunthill, and other strong places in the neighbourhood, in which the inhabitants of Jedburgh, for security, had deposited their most valuable property. At the same time, a party was despatched to Ancrum bridge, where some Frenchmen, left to secure the retreat of their countrymen and protect the village, made a stout resistance, but were, at last, forced to retire; and Ancrum was pillaged and destroyed. The enemy, finding the country destitute of provisions, returned into Northumberland the following day. ‡

The peace, concluded in 1550, was little regarded by the borderers on both sides, who took every opportunity to indulge their old habits of rapine. To repress and punish them, the regent, accompanied by Mary of Guise, the queen dowager, and a number of the nobility, held a court of justice at Jedburgh, in the autumn of 1552, when, after a strict inquiry, some of the principal persons, whose conduct was found to have been meritorious, were rewarded with the order of knighthood; and offenders were compelled to deliver up their nearest kindred as pledges of their future good conduct. A similar method of binding them to the maintenance of order was pursued in 1561, by Queen Mary, soon after her return from France, when she also caused severe justice to be dealt to the most guilty of them at

Jedburgh, by her brother, James Stewart, afterwards Earl of Moray, and regent of Scotland. Mary herself was holding a court of justice here, on the 16th of October, 1566, when intelligence being brought her that the Earl of Bothwell was wounded, in an encounter with the outlaws of Liddisdale, her anxiety for her reputed favourite induced her to take a journey of twenty-four miles to visit him at Hermitage castle, whence she returned to Jedburgh the same day.* From the fatigue of this journey over hills and muirs, during which she had wellnigh perished in a morass, she contracted an illness which threatened her life, and confined her at this town till the 10th of the following month. The house where she is said to have resided upon this occasion still exists.†

The firmness and vigilance of the Earl of Moray kept the frontiers, during the two years and a half of his regency, in a state of comparative quiet and security;‡ but, after his death, the wild inhabitants broke out with fresh violence into their former excesses. There appeared reason to believe, that some of their chieftains were privy to the plot of the assassin who murdered him at Linlithgow, on the 22d of January, 1570. The very next day after the deed was perpetrated, Ker of Fernihurst and Scott of Buccleuch, who were among the adherents of Queen Mary, now a captive in England, made a destructive inroad into the English marches, in company with some English rebels, whom they protected, being a remnant of the unfortunate party of the earls of Northumberland and Westmoreland.§ The object of the invaders was to bring about a war between the two countries, which

§ The English wardens reported, that the following towns and steads had been wasted and pillaged by the Scots, before the 10th of March: viz.—“Learmonth, Mindrum, Belem, Hethepoole, Ewart, Humbleton, West Newton, and Lanton, spoiled and partly burned. Downam, Doddington, Kirke Newton, and Fenton, spoiled and burned. Monielaws, the Huggle House, Preswine, Akolde, Torburne, North and South Middleton, Spinnelston, Bednell, Sunderland, Coplan, and Middleton by the sea, spoiled. might further the political designs of them and their friends; but the retaliation which it provoked, fell almost entirely upon the two Scottish chieftains only, or rather upon their unhappy dependants and adherents. The Earl of Sussex, with a strong force, crossed the border at Carham, on the 18th of April, and directed his march towards Jedburgh, but stopped on his way to burn the Moss Tower, belonging to Buccleuch; Crailing Tower, where Ker's mother dwelt, and every place he came to belonging to either of them. At Jedburgh, he was well received by the inhabitants and magistrates; and, as they had not been concerned in the late hostilities, he spared the town. Ker of Cesford, warden of the middle marches of Scotland, came and exculpated himself of any blame in the late breaches of the peace; and, in consequence, his property, and that of his kindred and friends, were also spared. Sussex then led his men to Hawick, which they burnt; after which he sent off two detachments, one of which ravaged all the valley of the river Kale, and the other that of the Bowmont. He returned with his army to Berwick, on the 23d of April, having, in this expedition, destroyed more than fifty castles and piles, and three hundred towns, villages, and steads.

The political differences between the inhabitants of Jedburgh and Ker of Fernihurst, at this time, was the cause of a memorable feud, which, says Sir Walter Scott, "was accompanied with some curious circumstances. The chief was attached to the interest of Queen Mary; the burghers of Jedburgh espoused that of King James VI. When a pursuivant, under the authority of the Queen, was sent to proclaim that every thing was null which had been done against her, during her imprisonment in Lochleven, the provost commanded him to descend from the cross, and 'caused him to eat his letters, and thereafter loosed down his points, and gave him his wages on his bare buttocks, with a bridle, threatening him, that if ever he came again, he should lose his life.'*" In revenge of this insult, and of other points of quarrel, Fernihurst made prisoners, and hanged ten of the citizens of Jedburgh, and destroyed with fire the whole stock of provision, which they had laid up for the winter."†

Jedburgh was still in the hands of those who were faithful to the regent's government and to the peace with England, when, in 1572, an attempt was made to seize it for the adherents of the captive Queen Mary, by Buccleuch and Fernihurst, with their dependants, and other desperate men of the border, aided by a company of musketeers from Edinburgh. The regent, aware of their design, sent the Lord Ruthven, with a sufficient force, to oppose them, and he had reached Dryburgh, on his way, when the Jedworthers, encouraged by their knowledge of his approach, and by the aid already brought to them by Sir Walter Ker of Cesford, went out to meet Buccleuch's party, and prevent their entering the town. Before they began to fight, Ruthven came up and attacked the enemy's rear, who soon dispersed and withdrew into places of strength. *

The peace of the borders was disturbed in 1575, by an affray, in which the townsmen of Jedburgh bore a part. It took place at a meeting held for the redress of grievances, on the seventh day of July, at the Reid Swire, † a hill on the limits of the two kingdoms, by Sir John Forster, warden of the middle march of England, and Sir John Carmichael, deputy warden, or keeper of Liddisdale. Besides those who attended on account of the proper business of the meeting, a great concourse of people of both nations assembled, as was usual on such occasions, some from curiosity, and the interest and jealousy they naturally felt about proceedings in which both their friends and their enemies were concerned, and others merely for the purpose of amusement, mutual intercourse, and traffic. When the wardens, in the midst of this multitude, had chosen a convenient place, on English ground, for holding a court of justice, they proceeded to hear complaints and determine causes. An English freebooter, named Henry Robson, whose case had stood over from a former meeting, being called, answer was made that he was absent on account of sickness; but those who made this answer, refusing to confirm it by an oath, the English warden condemned the party by default. Upon this, Carmichael is said to have demanded the criminal to be delivered up to him, in terms implying his belief, that the English warden wished to screen him from justice. ‡ Forster answered resentfully, and an altercation followed, with signs of anger visible to their followers, who soon began also to express their displeasure, and some of the Englishmen of Tynedale made their arrows fly at the Scots, although the English affirmed that the Scots began the fray by shooting the first arrow. Some of the Tynedale men, who loved booty better than blows, began to spoil the pedlars; and among others, one belonging to Jedburgh being plundered, he raised the war cry, "A Jedworth, a Jedworth," while the different parties of the English likewise raised their cries. The Liddisdale men ran to the place where the English horses were grazing, and seized them as prey. On the other hand, the loose men of the English border were carrying off the horses of the Scots. The rest of the multitude were, in the meanwhile, at blows; the Croysers being opposed to the Fenwicks, and every other clan in like manner having singled out those on the opposite side with whom they were at feud. The wardens tried in vain to pacify their followers and stop the fighting, in which the Scots were at first worsted and put to flight, but meeting with a reinforcement of the craftsmen and citizens of Jedburgh, who came, according to custom, with drums beating and banners displayed, to attend the warden, they returned to the fight, and not only routed their enemies, but pursued them into England, and took many prisoners, among whom were Sir John Forster, Francis Russel, son to the Earl of Bedford, James Ogle, and Sir Cuthbert Collingwood.* These were carried to the Scottish regent at Dalkeith, who detained them some days to give them time to recover their temper, and entertained them kindly, lest, if immediately dismissed, they should in their resentment adopt some violent course of revenge. Carmichael was sent prisoner into England, and detained a few weeks at York, after which, as it was found that he was not to blame, he was dismissed with gifts and marks of approbation. This encounter, which is usually called The Raid of the Reid Swire, was the last of any note between the inhabitants of the borders, who nevertheless continued long after this period to cherish an inclination for predatory enterprise, and from time to time broke through the restraints of law, and committed deeds of rapine and violence, for which they were usually visited with rigorous and summary punishment, by a watchful and pacific government. The severity exercised against such offenders at Jedburgh, in 1608, by George Home, earl of Dunbar, who is said to have condemned and executed a great number of them without trial, gave rise to the reproachful phrase Jeddart justice, which is still used proverbially.

Jedburgh abbey never recovered from the destruction it suffered from the enemy in 1544, and the establishment being suppressed at the Reformation of religion in 1559, its revenues were afterwards annexed to the crown; but some part of them was probably enjoyed by Andrew, son to George, fourth earl of Home, who was abbot of Jedburgh at the time of the Reformation, and was alive in 1578.* The laird of Fernihurst had long exercised the office and authority of bailie of the monastery, as well as of the forest of Jedburgh. In 1587, the bailiery of the abbey was continued, or restored to the same family by a grant of King James VI. to Sir Andrew Ker; and in 1622, the entire property of the lands and baronies which had belonged to the canons of Jedburgh, was erected into a temporal lordship, and granted to him along with the title of Lord Jedburgh.

The only part of the monastic buildings now standing, is the church, which is partly in ruins. Nearly the whole of the walls of the nave, the central tower, and the choir, remain. The tower and choir are much dilapidated, and still bear marks of having been battered with the English cannon in 1544. The north transept, which has a beautiful traceried window, is entire, and has long been set apart as a burial-place for the family of the Marquis of Lothian, the descendant and representative of the Kers of Fernihurst. The eastern half of the nave, next the tower, is roofless. The western part, or rather the middle and north aisle of it, being fitted up as a place of worship for the parish, according to the established religion of Scotland, has a modern roof, lower than that which covered the ancient church. The corresponding south aisle was demolished when the parish church was altered, in the last century. The building altogether is lofty, light, and elegant; having above the arches of the middle part of the nave, throughout its whole length on both sides, a close range of Gothic windows, which rise above the present modern roof. Nothing remains of the south transept, but a small fragment of the walls. The western doorway is a semicircular arch, deeply and richly moulded; and in the lofty front of the building, above this entrance, is a beautifully radiated circular window.

This church was dedicated to God, under the invocation of the Virgin Mary.

NOTES BY GEORGE SMITH, ESQ. ARCHITECT.

JEDBURGH abbey must have been, when entire, one of the finest buildings in Scotland ; though now greatly in ruins, the remains shew it to have been a large cross church, comprehending a nave with side aisles, a cross with transepts, and a choir with chapels. (See Plate IV. ground plan.)

The altar, or east end of the choir, is completely gone, and there are no remains either of the cloisters or chapter-house ; but it is evident they had extended to the south side, as the ruins of an old wall is standing at the distance of sixty feet from the transept.

In the ruins of this abbey there are three or four distinct styles of ancient architecture to be seen, each characteristic of the period when it was built, and calculated to exemplify the taste of the age. In the choir there are massive Saxon piers, with deep splayed circular arches ; and over these the Norman style appears ; and again, in the superstructure of the nave, we have the old English character, so beautifully exemplified in the long range of narrow pointed windows, and likewise in the blank arches of the west end, (see Plate I.) Over the cross rises a lofty square tower, with angular turrets and projecting battlements.

The west end of the nave has been fitted up in a most barbarous style as the parish church, which has completely destroyed the character of this part of the edifice, and, at the same time, it appears to be a most uncomfortable place of worship. The sooner it is abandoned the better, and restored, so far as the ruins will admit, to its original state.

There are two magnificent Norman doors in this edifice, one at the west end, the principal entrance to the church, and the other in the south wall of the nave, close by the transept, which appears to have been the entrance from the cloisters to the church ; the west one is shewn in Plate I. and the south one in Plate III. These doors are of great richness and beauty, and may be ranked amongst the finest Norman doors remaining in this country. The depth of the arch of the west door measures seven feet and a half, enriched with a variety of ornamented mouldings, springing from the capitals of the slender shafts at each side of the ingoing.

The only decorated Gothic architecture in the remains of this edifice are the windows of the north transept, which appear to have been renewed during the time that the decorated style was practised in this country. This part of the building having buttresses, is likewise a proof that it has been built at a subsequent period. This transept is now enclosed as a cemetery for the family of the Marquis of Lothian.

It is thus evident, from the mixture of these distinct styles, that Jedburgh abbey must have been built, or renewed, at different periods.

POSSESSIONS AND REVENUES OF JEDBURGH ABBEY.

WE learn from the confirmatory charter of Earl Henry, that his father, King David I, when he established the abbot and convent at Jedburgh, made or confirmed to them the following grants of property; viz.—The monastery of Jedworthe, with every thing belonging to it; namely, the tithes of the two Jedworths, Langton, Nesbyt, and Creling, the town of Earl Gospatric, * with the consent of his chaplain: and in the same town, a ploughgate and a half and three acres of land, with two houses: also the tithes of the other Creling, the town of Orm, the son of Eylav; † and of Scrauesburghe: the chapel situated in the forest opposite Hernwingeslawe: ‡ also, Ulfstoun, near Jedworth; Alneclive, near Alncromb, Crumsethe, § and Reperlaw. || He also granted them the tenth part of the game taken by him in hunting in Teviotdale; the multure of the miln at Jedworth,

He was the founder of the nunnery at Coldstream. He is styled vicecomes, viscount, or sheriff, in Earl Henry's charter; but in general is simply styled earl. His descendants were earls of Dunbar and March; and the present representative is the Earl of Home.

|| Berengarius de Engain, a noble Anglo-Norman, was one of the followers of Earl David, to whom he gave lands in Scotland, after his accession to the throne.—CHALMERS'S Caledonia.

¶ David Olifard was King David's godson, and much attached to him, although he served in King Stephen's army, which besieged him in Winchester, in 1141. When the King of Scots escaped, Olifard concealed him and conducted him to Scotland ; for which service he had lands given him in Smailholm and Crailing.

** Probably Cavers. There are two places of this name in Teviotdale, distinguished after the names of the proprietors,—Cavers Douglas, and Cavers Ker.

†† The lands of Lessudden were granted to Thomas de London by King David. He married Margaret Lovel, a widow.

Christiana, the wife of Gervas Ridel, gave the third part of the village of Hernwingslawe.*

Gaufrid de Perci gave the convent the church of Oxenham, with two ploughgates, and two oxgangs of land adjacent thereto, and right of pasture and fuel in the common; also Newbigging, with common pasture and fuel, as enjoyed by the other inhabitants of the same village.†

Ralph, the son of Dunegal, and his wife, Bethoc, gave them a ploughgate in Rughechestre, with common pasture.‡

Turgot de Rossedale gave them the Religious House on the Lidal,§ with all its adjacent lands; and the church of Kirchandres,|| with every thing thereto belonging.

Guido de Rossedale, with the consent of his son Ralph, granted the convent forty-two acres, between the Esk and the Lidal, at the junction of these rivers, with the right of fishing from the foss¶ of Lidal to the church.

Ranulph de Sulas gave them the church of the vale of Lidal, the church of Dodington, near Berton,** and half a ploughgate in Nesbith.

* Gervas Ridel, descended of an Anglo-Norman family of distinction, settled at Ryedale, in Yorkshire, came into Scotland with Earl David, and was sheriff of Roxburgh in 1116. The king gave him the lands in the parish of Lilliesleaf, which, although not entailed, continued in the possession of his posterity, by direct male descent, until the twenty-fifth generation, when, in consequence, it is said, of the losses of the late Sir John Buchanan Riddell, in endeavouring to cultivate waste land, the property has been sold by the present baronet to Mark Sprott, Esq.

† Gaufrid, or Geoffrey, de Perci, inherited the lands of Heton and Oxenham from his brother Allan, surnamed "le Meschin," who obtained them from King David, for whom he fought in the battle of the Standard.

‡ Rule Bethoc, now called Bedrule, was named after this lady. From her descended Randolph, Earl of Moray, the brave and faithful friend of King Robert Bruce. By Rughechestre, is probably meant Rewcastle, near Jedburgh.

§ It may be conjectured that this religious house was of more ancient date than the priory of Canonby, which occupied the same spot.

¶ Part of this ancient foss, or artificial bank of earth, still exists in a very perfect state on the lands of Liddal-bank, and is called the Railzie. It may have been thrown up for the defence of a military station.

Gervas Lidal, who afterwards became a canon of Jeddeworth, and his brother Ralph, gave them the church of Alboldesle,* with all its rights and dues.

William de Vetereponte, or Vipont, gave them a ploughgate in his lordship of Caredene,† with common rights.

Waltheof, the son of Gospatric, gave them the rectorial church of Bassenthwaite, in Cumberland. ‡

The church of Dalmenie, in Linlithgowshire, was acquired by the convent, in the reign of King William, or Alexander II. The canons enjoyed the rectorial tithes, and appointed a vicar to serve it. It was valued, in 1275, at £2, 13s. 4d. §

The church of Hownam, in Teviotdale, was acquired by the convent about the end of the twelfth century. In 1220, it was settled that the whole of the corn tithes of Hunam should be enjoyed by the abbot and canons; out of which the vicar was to receive a salary of ten pounds, or the altarages, if he preferred them. The convent reserved an acre of ground for stacking their corn, from which it appears that the vicar enjoyed the rest of the glebe.||

King Robert I, among other grants, and confirmations of former grants, to the "priory of Rostinot, and the abbot of Jedworth, byding there," confers upon them "the teinds of the king's horses and studs, and the third of the hay of the forest of Platir;" also that they should get, every day that the king remained at Forfar, two loaves of the bread, called Sunday bread; four loaves of the second bread; and six of the bread called hagemans; two rivers, on a different spot from the present church of Castleton. It was dedicated to St Martin, and valued, in 1275, at £4. It was agreed between the bishop of Glasgow, and the abbot of Jedworth, in 1220, "that the vicarage of Lidal should remain as the charter of the bishop had fixed it; and that the chaplain officiating, as well as the prior residing there, should yield canonical obedience to the bishop."—Caledonia, ii. 177.

stoups of the best ale ; two stoups of the small ale, called second ale ; and two pair of dishes of each of the three services from the kitchen.*

The hospital of St Mary Magdalene, at Rutherford, was given to the convent in 1377, by Robert III, upon the resignation of Alexander de Symondton, the last master thereof. By the conditions of this grant, the canons were obliged to maintain a chaplain, properly qualified, to celebrate divine service regularly in the chapel of the hospital ; and it was provided, that if, by the inroads of the English, or the events of war, the place should happen to be destroyed, so that the chaplain could not reside there, the said canons were to cause the same divine offices to be celebrated in their own convent, until the said hospital should be rebuilt.†

There was an altar in the abbey church dedicated to St Ninian, and another to St Mungo. In 1479, Mr James Newton, parson of Bedrule, granted, for the support of St Mungo's altar, in the parish kirk of Jedward, twenty marks of annual rent, to be paid out of two tenements belonging to him in Jedward, the presentation whereof was to belong to James Rutherford of that ilk, and his heirs ; and upon their failing to present within twenty days, the presentation, that time, was to belong to the provost and bailies of Jedward.‡

* "Duo paria ferculorum de quolibet trium cursuum de Coquina." Harleian MSS. 4134, and 4693. Lists of ancient charters. It does not clearly appear from the abbreviated words of the MS. whether the canons were to furnish the king with these provisions during his stay at Forfar, or to receive them from his bounty.

† Registrum Magni Sigilli. The hospital at Rutherford possessed a burgage in the city of Berwick, in 1276. In 1296, the master of this house swore fealty to Edward I. In 1335, the mastership of this hospital was given by Edward III. to Simon de Sandford ; at whose death, in 1337, it was conferred upon William de Emeldon, October 31 ; and again, December 20 ensuing, upon John de Thorp. On the first of March, 1338, King Edward revoked this presentation, which appears to have been made under a supposition that the said mastership was then vacant, the king now remembering that he had previously appointed William de Emeldon, to whom he now confirms it, and whom, in 1350, he made chancellor and chamberlain of Berwick, and of all the lands in Scotland, subject to the English crown. In 1352, the king gave him likewise the prebend of Old Roxburgh, in Glasgow cathedral. In 1360, November 23, King Edward gave the guardianship of the hospital of Rutherford to John de Baumburgh, clerk, who obtained, likewise, the prebend of Old Roxburgh the following year. About 1444, this hospital was granted to Alexander Brown. Rotuli Scotiæ, Harl. MSS. 4620.

The property of the monasteries having been confiscated at the Reformation of Religion, an account of it was taken in 1562, when the revenues of Jedburgh abbey, together with those of Restenot and Canonby, were estimated at £1274, 10s. Scots money.

 2 chalders and 2 bolls of wheat.
 23 chald. of barley.
 36 chald. 13 bolls, 1 firloft, and 1 peck of meal.

The temporal possessions of the monastery, at that time, were, the baronies of Ulfstoun, Windington, Ancrum, Belshes, Reperlaw, and Abbotrule. Its spirituality consisted in the kirks of Jedburgh, Eckford, Hownam, Oxnam, Langnewton, Dalmeny, Selbie, Wauchope, Castletoun, Crailing, Nesbit, Plenderleith,* and Hopkirk. Of these, Selbie, Wauchope, and Castletoun, belonged properly to Canonby. To Restenot belonged the kirks of Forfar, Dounyvald, and Aberlemno.†

In "ane accompt of the thirds of the benefices, taken from the accompts of Robert, lord Boyd, collector-general of the saids thirds, for the year 1576," are the following articles :—

"Third of the abbacy of Jedburgh, £333, 6s. 8d.
 Wheat, 11 bolls, 1 firloft, 3 pecks.
 Bear, 7 chalders, 10 bolls, 3 firlofts, 2 pecks.
 Meal, 12 chald. 4 bolls, 1 firloft, 3 pecks.
 Third of the altarage of St Ninians, in Jedburgh,‡ £3, 4s. 5d."

A new order was issued in 1587, to collect the king's thirds of the benefices ; when Jedburgh was to pay £200, and Restenneth £100.§

* Plenderleith was a village with a tower and church, at the foot of Hindhope, one of the border mountains. A farm house is all that now remains of it. The turf-covered foundations of the church may still be traced by their elevation on the surface of the ground.

IN honorem sanctæ et individuæ Trinitatis: Ego Henricus comes Northanhumbriorum canonicis patris mei quos in monasterio Sanctæ Mariæ de Jedworde constituit, in perpetuam eleemosinam concedo, et hujus cartæ meæ attestatione confirmo, donatum illis ab eodem patre meo, predictum monasterium de Jedworthe, cum omnibus ad illud pertinentibus, viz. decimas villarum totius parochiæ, scil. duarum Jeddword, et Langton, Nesbyt,

* Henry, Earl of Huntingdon and Northumberland, was a prince endued with every noble and excellent quality, and who warmly seconded the benevolent and enlightened exertions of King David, his father, to instruct and civilize his subjects. His untimely death, in 1152, the year preceding that of the king, was a painful disappointment to the hopes of the nation, which has often been remarkably unfortunate in the premature death of its ablest sovereigns. He was buried in Kelso abbey, of which he had been a liberal benefactor. His character is thus eulogized by the prior of Lochleven:—

* Walter, the son of Alan, was the first grand steward of Scotland, and ancestor of the kings of the race of Stewart, a name derived from his office.

† Richard Morville was the son of Hugh, who was constable of Scotland, and founded Dryburgh abbey. He had great possessions in Lauderdale, the Lothians, and Cumberland. His family became extinct at the death of his son William in 1196.

‡ Philip de Valoines, or Valance, was chamberlain to the king, and possessed lands in Teviotdale.

§ Robert Avenel obtained lands in Eskdale from David I. He held, for a short time, the office of Justiciary of Lothian. He was a liberal benefactor to Melros Abbey, in which he became a monk, and died in 1185. His daughter bore to King William an illegitimate child, Isabel, who married Robert Bruce.

|| Bernard, the son of Brien, an Anglo-Norman, who settled in Scotland in the reign of King William. His son, Bernard de Hawden, was sheriff of Roxburgh in the reign of Alexander II. He had the lands of Hawden, now Hadden, on Tweedside. CRAWFORD'S Lives.—CHALMERS'S Caledonia.

HISTORY OF THE TOWN AND ABBEY OF KELSO.

THE Town of Kelso is situated in the parish of the same name, in Roxburghshire, on the north bank of the river Tweed, opposite its junction with the Teviot, about twenty-three miles from Berwick, where that river flows into the sea. Its name is evidently derived from Chalkheugh,* the name of a remarkable cliff overhanging the Tweed, on the summit of which part of the town is built. This cliff is so called from its containing veins of gypsum, and other calcareous earths, which were visible in its sides before the year 1810, when the river, in its impetuous floods, threatening to undermine it, it was cut down into terraces and sloping gardens, and defended from the stream by a strong wall. This etymology may be distinctly traced in the various forms in which the name appears in ancient records, where it is written Kalkhow, Kelquou, Calco, Calchou, Calcheowe, and Kellesowe. The earliest mention of it is at the time of the founding of its monastery, in 1128, when it appears, from the charter of the royal founder, that there was then a church called “the church of the blessed Virgin Mary, on the bank of the river Tuede, in the place which is called Calkou.”

* Locally pronounced “Cawkheuch.” Calch, in the ancient British language, and Cealc, in the Anglo-Saxon, like the Latin Calx, signify Chalk. How, in Anglo-Saxon and old Scots, and Heugh, in modern Scots, “a hill, or height.” — CHALMERS'S Caledonia.

The beauty of this town and its environs has always been justly admired. The confluence of two broad and rapid rivers, hanging woods, rocks, and verdant declivities, ancient ruins, elegant modern buildings, distant hills and mountains, form a diversified and lovely scene, in which the works of man serve to heighten and embellish the most comely features of nature. The following poetical description of it occurs in Leyden's Scenes of Infancy :—

Bosom'd in woods, where mighty rivers run,
 Kelso's fair vale expands before the sun ;
 Its rising downs in vernal beauty swell,
 And, fringed with hazel, winds each flowery dell.
 Green spangled plains to dimpling lawns succeed,
 And Tempé rises on the banks of Tweed ;
 Blue o'er the river Kelso's shadow lies,
 And copse-clad isles amid the waters rise.

One of the most approved points of view, in which this enchanting landscape is seen, is from the bridge—itsself a noble and perfect work of architecture. On the right, looking westward, is the town, gaily extended along the swelling bank of the river, in the bosom of which is the “copse-clad” islet, locally called the Awna ; nearer, is the beautiful villa of Ednam House, and, beyond it, the lofty ruins of the Abbey, which give an air of ancient grandeur and historical interest to the place. In front, the winding of the river brings into view the magnificent ducal mansion of Fleurs, with a sylvan lawn in the foreground, and deep woods behind. On the left, are the woods and mansion of Springwood Park, with the elegant bridge of the Teviot ; the site of the ancient town of Roxburgh, formerly one of the four principal burghs of Scotland, but now long subjected to the plough. Beyond this, encircling the summit of an elevated mound, shaded with trees, are seen massy fragments of the walls of Roxburgh castle—the Marchmond of remote antiquity,—the favourite abode of ancient kings,—the stronghold, alternately, of the Scottish and English wardens of the border, and the object of hostile force and stratagem for many ages. The back ground discovers the castle of Home, the hills of Stinchell and Mellerstain, the three picturesque summits of the Eildon Hills, Penielheugh, and a more distant and loftier range of remote mountains.

Pennant, the celebrated tourist, who visited Kelso in 1775, describes it as "a neat place, built much after the manner of a Flemish town, with a square, and town-house." The houses are chiefly built of excellent freestone, and slated. The four principal streets, with others of smaller consequence, meet in the square, where the weekly market is held; on the east side of which is the town-house, which, with many other parts of the town, has been rebuilt since Pennant's time. It is a handsome building, of two stories, with a pediment in front, supported by four elegant Ionic columns, and a dome springing from the centre of the roof, which is flat, and surrounded with an ornamental stone balustrade. The lower story consists of an arcade for the accommodation of the market people; and over this is a spacious room, where the incorporated trades, and municipal authorities, hold their meetings; and where courts are occasionally held by the Justices of the Peace for the trial of petty offences; and also their monthly courts, for the hearing, and final decision, of small debt cases.

The churchyard of this town is of remarkable extent. The parish church is a plain octagonal building, eighty-two feet in diameter, and of a singularly inelegant exterior. It is built of rough freestone, and covered with an immense roof of blue slate, supported by a circle of eight pillars within the building, at the distance of sixteen feet from the walls. This "mis-shapen pile," which a lively and ingenious writer* has compared to a "mustard pot of immense size," was erected in 1773.

The most striking object in Kelso is the ruined church of the abbey, which is a noble specimen of the solid and majestic style of architecture, called the Saxon, or early Norman. (See Plates V. and VI.) It is described by Pennant as "built in the form of a Greek cross," in which all the four limbs are of equal length; but this is a mistake, into which that intelligent writer appears to have fallen, from his neglecting to observe, that, contrary to the general practice, the head of this cross, which is of the usual form, is turned toward the west, so that the eastern limb, of which only two arches are now standing, had, when entire, the longer dimensions commonly given in the Latin cross, to its opposite part. (See Plate VIII.) This, though a singular, was doubtless an economical plan of construction, by which a large and spacious choir was obtained for the celebration of divine worship, without the necessity of extending the nave, used chiefly for pompous ceremonies and processions, to a proportionate length, and at a much greater expense.

The Scottish reformers are guiltless of stirring up the multitude to the demolition of this church ; for, being occupied as a place of defence by the town's people during the Earl of Hertford's invasion in 1545, it was destroyed by the enemy, sixteen years before " the lords of the secreit counsaill maid ane act, that all places and monumentis of idolatry sould be destroyed."* From the state of the ruin, it may be inferred, that the cannon employed in battering it down, were directed against it from the northeast. The two arches already mentioned, with their superstructure, are all that remain of the choir. They spring from massive Saxon piers, having slender circular half-pillars attached to three sides of the same ; and these have moulded capitals, forming imposts for the springing of the arches. These two arches are in the south side of the choir next the cross, and support a part of the wall which upheld the main roof. Within the thickness of this wall are two galleries, one over the other, open to the interior by an arcade of small round arches, springing from slender stone shafts. (See Plate VI.) Narrow passages within the thickness of the walls, communicating with these galleries, and with the stairs and other avenues, run round the whole building at different heights, opening at intervals to the interior. The choir had two side aisles, with two rows of strong piers, or columns, supporting the arches and their superstructure. The transept and western division of the church have no side aisles. The walls of the north and south transept are still nearly entire ; and more than half of the western part, or head of the cross, also remains, containing a segment of a most magnificent archway, enriched with a profusion of grotesque carvings, which, though much worn away and defaced, still display considerable elegance, both of design and execution. The north entrance remains entire ; and the numerous mouldings of its deep arch exhibit the dancette, or zigzag, the billet, and other decorations of the Saxon style. The walls, both within and without, are adorned with a course of blank semicircular arches, interlaced with each other, and some of them richly, and some sparingly, relieved with ornaments. Over the intersection of the cross in the centre of the building, rose a lofty square tower, or lantern, upon four spacious arches, in the pointed style, with six windows in each of its sides, and open galleries within. Only the south and west sides remain, which are the grandest and most striking parts of the ruin. At each of the exterior angles of the cross, the building projects a little, and forms a square tower, which contains a narrow winding stair, and finishes in a round turret at the top, except at the north angle of the west end of the fabric, which terminates in an octagonal turret. The corresponding south-west angle is demolished. There is no appearance of buttresses in any part of the building, the walls of Saxon edifices being constructed with such strength and solidity as not to require supports of this kind. The windows, which are numerous, are almost all long, narrow, and circular headed, without any appearance of tracery. One in front of the north transept forms a complete circle, and two in each side of the central tower are quatrefoils, set in circles.

With regard to the other buildings of this monastery, the cloister occupied a large square on the south side of the choir. There was a chapel of the Virgin, in which were curiously carved stalls, and which was probably contiguous to the east end of the church; a dormitory with separate cells; an abbot's hall of suitable splendour; and a gate house. But these, and all the other offices, have been entirely swept away, and nothing is left to indicate their probable site but the remains of the church, of the principal parts of which the following are the dimensions:—

Length of the transept, within the walls, 71 feet.

Breadth of the same, 23 feet.

Height of the central tower, 91 feet.

Breadth of the same, 23 feet.

Thickness of the walls of the same, 5 feet 6 inches.

Height of the pointed arches under the tower, 45 feet.

Width of the same, 17 feet.

Diameter of the columns in the choir, 7 feet.

HISTORY OF THE ABBEY OF KELSO.

THE monks of Kelso were of a reformed class of the Benedictine order, first established at Tiron in France, in the year 1109, and hence called Tironenses. The elder St Bernard,* their founder, and first abbot, was born at Abbeville, in the same country, in 1046; and, at the age of twenty, embraced the monastic life in the Benedictine convent of St Cyprian at Poitiers. At thirty, he was chosen prior of the monastery of St Savin, and held that office with credit twenty years, but returned to St Cyprian upon his being elected abbot in 1096. Some time afterwards, having adopted the principles of a sect who were endeavouring to effect what was called a revival of religion, and a reformation of the monastic discipline, he quitted his abbey, and joined the society of the zealous itinerant Robert d'Arbricelle, archdeacon of Rennes, and founder of the monastic order of Fontevraud, who, followed by a multitude of people, was then preaching in the province of Normandy. The zeal of this ecclesiastic is reported to have been not according to sound knowledge, for he is accused of habitually exposing himself to the strongest temptations, in order to prove his virtue; for which a satirical eulogist has compared him to a salamander, which endures the fire without burning.† Bernard, desirous of retirement, and probably disapproving of such fanatical practices, withdrew from his society with a few companions; when, after trying several places of retreat, and meeting with various interruptions, they finally settled in the woods of Tiron, in the county of Ponthieu, in Picardy, where they formed themselves into a religious fraternity under Bernard's direction, who caused them strictly to observe the rules of monastic life instituted by St Benedict, and added new regulations of his own, which required that each of the brethren should practise within the convent whatever mechanical art he knew, both to preserve them from the corrupting power of idleness, and to provide, by useful industry, for the maintenance of the community, poor at its commencement. Accordingly, the monks of Tiron, and the other monasteries of this order, consisted of painters, carvers, carpenters, smiths, masons, vine-dressers, and husbandmen, who were under the direction of an elder; and the profits of their work were applied to the common use. Their dress at first was of gray cloth, but they afterwards wore a black habit.*

* This monk must be distinguished from Bernard, abbot of Clairvaux, who is frequently styled the Great St Bernard, and is justly esteemed one of the most eloquent theological writers of his age. He died in 1153.

† Nouvelle Hist. des Ordres Monastiques, tom. II. p. 224.

Independently of the religious considerations which, in that age, operated with peculiar force in behalf of monastic institutions, a society thus constituted must have appeared highly advantageous in a civil point of view, as tending directly to the encouragement of industry, and the cultivation of many useful and ornamental arts, which, doubtless, contributed much to obtain for the monks of this order that patronage and encouragement under which they quickly increased in number and in wealth. David, Earl of Huntingdon and Northumberland, a wise, politic, and religious prince, brother and successor to the King of Scots, was one of their early benefactors; and it is reported, that he even went to France to visit Bernard, who happened to die before his arrival. This prince had already introduced the Tironensians into Scotland, having sent for thirteen monks from the original monastery, and settled them near his castle at Selkirk, in the year 1113,† when he made a suitable provision for their support, and appointed their abbot to be his chaplain. This appointment he confirmed after his accession to the throne, and the removal of the convent to Kelso; when he ordained that the abbots of Kelso should be chaplains to him and his successors.

* ODERICUS VITALIS, lib. 8, p. 715. HELYOT Hist. des Ordres Monastiques, tom. VI. p. 118—120. The Tironensian order in France was suppressed before the year 1629, and the chief monastery, Tiron, was united to the congregation of St Maur; but a few monasteries continued still to observe their own rules.

† The year 1113 is the date assigned by Simcon of Durham, (apud X Scriptores à Twysden, col. 236,) who adds, that the monks continued fifteen years at Selkirk, which corresponds with the date of their removal to Kelso, in 1128. Fordun places them at Selkirk in 1109, the year in which Bernard first established the order at Tiron; and he dates their removal to Kelso in 1126, although he agrees with the Metros Chronicle in saying, that the church at Kelso was founded in 1128.

I. RALPH, the first abbot, had presided at Selkirk four years, when, being chosen abbot of Tiron, upon the death of Bernard in 1117, he returned to France.*

II. WILLIAM, the second abbot, was likewise called to rule the parent monastery, upon the death of his predecessor Ralph, in 1119.†

III. HERBERT was the next abbot of Selkirk, and continued at the same time to hold the distinguished office of chancellor of the kingdom, to which he was appointed in the reign of Alexander I.‡ It appears that the principal residence of the kings of Scotland, at this period, was the castle of Roxburgh, a large and strong fortress, situated on a lofty eminence overhanging the river Teviot on one side, and having the Tweed at a small distance on the other, with the fortified town of Roxburgh on the adjacent rising ground, nearer the confluence of the two rivers. When David received the Scottish crown, after the death of his brother, in 1124, he bethought him of removing the convent to the vicinity of this seat of royalty, from which Selkirk is sixteen miles distant; wherefore, with the consent and advice of John, bishop of Glasgow, the diocesan, and other counsellors, he chose a delightful situation for them at Kelso, on the bank of the Tweed, opposite the town of Roxburgh, within view of his royal castle, and distant from it about a mile.§ The foundation of the church, * Fordun places this event in 1115; Helyot says, that Bernard died in 1116; but according to the history of the abbey of Tiron, in Gallia Christiana, (tom. viii.) he died in 1117, where, however, his successor's name is not Ralph but Hugh.

† Mel. Chron. Gallia Christiana, tom. viii.

‡ CRAWFORD'S Lives of the Officers of the Crown and State of Scotland, p. 4.

§ In almost all the accounts of Kelso hitherto published, it has been erroneously asserted, that the convent was removed first to Roxburgh, and afterwards to this place. This mistake has evidently arisen from a careless examination of the words of the foundation charter, in which King David distinctly says, that he has "removed the monastery from Selechirche to Roxburg, to the church of the Virgin Mary, which is situated on the bank of the river Tweede, in the place which is called CALKOU," i. e. KELSO, which is here clearly spoken of as a part, or suburb, of Roxburgh, probably because it was at that time a very inconsiderable place, and chiefly known on account of its vicinity to that important town. This sufficiently accounts for the superior of the convent being at first sometimes styled abbot of Roxburgh; as we find in a charter to the priory of Coldingham in 1139, among the witnesses to which is "Hereberto, abbate de Rochesburc;" and also, at a later period, in the continuation of SIM. Hist. Eccles. Dun. cap. iii. although in a different MS. of the same work, (Bibl. Cotton. Titus, A. II.) he is styled in the same passage abbot of Kelkove. See in the various readings, the magnificent remains of which still arrest the eye, and give additional interest to the peculiarly beautiful and romantic scenery around, was laid on the 3d of May, 1128. When finished, it was dedicated to God, under the invocation of the Virgin Mary, and the holy evangelist John, in regard to a circumstance of our Saviour's life, related in the 26th and 27th verses of the sixth chapter of St John's Gospel: "When Jesus saw his mother, and the disciple standing by whom he loved, he saith unto his mother, Woman, behold thy son! Then saith he to the disciple, Behold thy mother! And from that hour that disciple took her unto his own home."

Kelso being situated in the diocese of St Andrews, Robert, the bishop of that see, granted the abbot and convent perpetual exemption from all episcopal dues and restrictions, permitting them to receive ordination, and the other sacraments of the church, and likewise their consecrated oil and chrism, used in sacred offices, from whatever bishop they pleased in Scotland, or in Cumbria.* He also gave them the church of the Virgin Mary, which already stood on the banks of the Tweed at Kelso, when the abbey was founded.

In 1144, the king established a priory of the same order at Lesmachut, or Lesmahago, in Clydesdale, so called from its having been at an early period the residence of Machutus, a missionary and reputed saint, believed to have been a native of Scotland, and to whom the church of this place was dedicated. He is sometimes called Machlou or Malou; whence St Maloes in France, of which he was the first bishop, derives its name. He was a disciple of St Brendan, who flourished in the middle of the fifth century, and was the companion of his marvellous and romantic voyage to page 335 of the excellent edition of this work, published in 1732, by Thomas Bedford, from a very ancient MS. in the episcopal library at Durham.

* In Cumbria was comprehended part of the northwest of England and the southwest of Scotland. It was one of the provinces of the ancient Scoto-British nation, which included also the Galweians and Strath-Clyde Britons, who, after the Saxon invaders had settled in the eastern part of their territory, withstood them in the west, and formed there an independent kingdom, that subsisted for some centuries. They were at last conquered and made subject to the crown of Scotland, by King Gregory, who, according to Wyntown and the Melros Chronicle, reigned from 879 till 897; but, continuing to enjoy some degree of independence, and retaining their ancient language and manners for more than two centuries afterwards, they were looked upon as a separate people, like the Welsh at this day.

the happy isles of the north.* King David gave Lesmahago the privilege of being an asylum, or sanctuary, into which those who fled for refuge from their enemies or avengers should obtain peace and protection from the king, in honour of God and of St Machlou, as soon as they came within the four crosses erected within the limits of the priory.† The monks were taken from the society at Kelso, and Lesmahago became a cell, or subject priory, under the government of the abbots of Kelso, in which state of dependence it continued until the suppression of monachism in Scotland, in 1559. The monasteries of Aberbrothoc, Lindores, and Kilwinning, were likewise planted from Kelso; but the abbot John granted a charter in 1178, in which he quits all claim to the subjection and obedience of the abbot of Aberbrothoc; and it is probable that the convents of Lindores and Kilwinning obtained a similar exemption, as there is no mention of their being subject to the parent monastery.

Herbert, the abbot of Kelso, being promoted to the see of Glasgow in 1147, resigned his abbey, and was consecrated bishop, on the 24th of August, the same year, by Pope Eugenius III, at Auxerre in Burgundy. He died in 1164. He was the author of a book giving an account of the rebellion of Somerled, thane of Argyle, and his punishment. ‡

IV. ERNALD, the next abbot, presided thirteen years. In his time, the monks, in common with the whole country, had to lament the death of their munificent patron, King David, and of his only son, Henry Earl of Huntingdon and Northumberland, a prince no less beloved for the mild and gentle virtues of his character, than admired for his manly spirit and valour. He died on the 12th of June, 1153, and his remains were interred in Kelso abbey. The king expired at Carlisle on the 24th of May, the following year, and was buried at Dunfermline. The purity of his life, his great piety and charity, the zeal and liberality with which he founded and endowed institutions for diffusing the knowledge and the influence of religion among his subjects, joined with every patriotic and princely virtue, were more than sufficient, in that age, to invest him with the reputation of sanctity; and the credulity of an affectionate and grateful people, easily discovered miraculous proofs of it, even in the common appearances of nature. John, the prior of Hexham, relates, that when those to whom that care was committed, were conveying his body from Carlisle to the place of sepulture, and came to the shore of the Firth of Forth, at Queensferry, they found the sea in so boisterous and agitated a state, that they were afraid to venture upon it; but no sooner had they placed the royal corpse in the boat, than the storm abated, so that they reached the opposite shore without difficulty, when immediately the tempest began again to rage with redoubled fury.* Malcolm IV, the son of Earl Henry, like his father and grandfather, seeking to instruct and civilize his subjects through the influence of the monks and clergy, made several donations to the convent at Kelso, and, in 1159, gave them a general charter of confirmation, ratifying to them all the grants of land, and other property, made to them by former benefactors up to that period.†

Upon the death of Robert, bishop of St Andrews, in 1160, the vacant see having been offered to Waltheof, abbot of Melros, and refused, it was afterwards accepted by the abbot of Kelso. He was consecrated by William bishop of Moray, legate of the Roman see for Scotland, in presence of the king and a numerous assemblage of the Scottish nobility. Ernald began to build the cathedral church of his diocese the same year, the king and his court assisting at the ceremony of laying the first stone. He died September the 13th, 1162.‡ Spotswood, in his History of the Scottish Church, says, that the bishop of Moray, being at Rome in 1159, when he returned, “carried himself as legate to the pope; which power he resigned to Ernald after his consecration, as he was enjoined by Eugenius III, who then held the chair.” He also informs us, that, “in a convention of the estates, kept the same year, Ernald did earnestly insist with the king to make choice of a wife, for assuring the royal succession, and to that effect made a long speech in the hearing of the estates; but the king had taken a resolution to live single, and would not be diverted.§ The abbot also wrote a treatise On the Right Government of a Kingdom, and addressed it to the king.||

V. JOHN, the precentor of the monastery, was chosen abbot on the 29th of November, 1160, and received the episcopal benediction from Herbert, bishop of Glasgow, on the 6th of January following.* Walter, who was prior about this time, was a person of distinguished merit, and much considered on account of his learning. He wrote a book On the Freedom of the Scottish Church ; An Appeal to the Court of Rome, probably on the same subject ; and A Collection of Letters, addressed to divers Persons. † He opposed with spirit the ambitious claim of Roger, archbishop of York, to the primacy of the Scottish Church. This prelate, the rival of the celebrated Thomas à Becket, then archbishop of Canterbury, having, as a step to his meditated usurpation, got himself appointed, by intrigue, legate of the Roman see for Scotland, which he probably represented as included in his archiepiscopal province, sent a haughty summons to the Scottish clergy to meet him, in his legatine capacity, at the castle of Norham. But they, aware of his designs against the independence of their national church, and having usually enjoyed the privilege of having the papal representative chosen from among themselves, unanimously agreed to deny the legitimacy of his authority, and sent Ingelram, the bishop elect of Glasgow, with other select deputies, well escorted, to convey to him their determination. Among these, were Solomon, dean of Glasgow, and Walter, the prior of Kelso, who are said to have debated, in defence of their privileges, with eloquence and ability, although they did not prevail upon the archbishop to lay aside his pretensions. The matter was afterwards settled by an appeal to the papal court, when Pope Alexander III. decided, that the Scottish church was independent of any other, save that of Rome. ‡ The same pontiff conferred a mark of great distinction upon the abbot of Kelso and his successors, when he granted them permission to wear a mitre, upon fit occasions, during the celebration of mass in the church, in processions in the cloister, and when assisting at the pope's councils. § The Abbot John,

§ From the pope's bull upon this occasion, which follows, it appears, that the monastery, being free from subjection to any other ecclesiastical authority, was considered as in immediate dependence on the see of Rome. " Alexander episcopus, servus servorum Dei, dilecto filio Johanni, Abbati de Calkou, salutem et apostolicam benedictionem : Devotionis tuæ sinceritatem, et quem circa nos et ecclesiam Dei geris affectum, diligenti studio attendentes, et quod ecclesia who had gone to solicit this honour in person, returned from Rome, having obtained it, in 1165.*

The possession of wealth naturally excites the desire, as it facilitates the acquisition, of power, honours, and distinction. Only half a century had elapsed from the time of the original foundation of the monastery at Selkirk, yet, by the liberality of its numerous benefactors, and, probably, by the skilful management and improvement of its property by the intelligent monks, it had already reached a high degree of riches and splendour. The abbot claimed the precedence of all the other superiors of religious houses in the kingdom: this, however, was disputed by the prior of St Andrews, upon the plea of the greater antiquity of his monastery, and its being under the protection of the patron saint of Scotland, and its church that of the metropolitan see. The time when this controversy commenced is not ascertained; but, after it had been long agitated, it was finally decided by King James I, about the year 1420, in favour of the prior of St Andrews.† Another dispute, which began in the time of the Abbot John, between him and Walter, abbot of Tiron, concerning which of them should have authority over the other, marks still more strongly the grandeur and high pretensions of the monks of Kelso; since it was generally considered as an unquestionable rule, that religious houses, unless specially exempted, should continue under a certain degree of subjection to the society from which they sprung, and all of them to the original, or parent convent of the order.‡ There is no account of the termination of this controversy. The Abbot John died in 1180, when he had presided twenty years.§

VI. OSBERT, who was prior of Lesmahago, next received the mitre and crosier from the monks of Kelso.|| About this time, King William having had the spirit to resist the interference of the pope, in the appointing a bishop to the diocese of St Andrews, after all other means which were employed to bring him to submission had failed, he was excommunicated, and the kingdom was interdicted, or prohibited the use of the sacraments and public offices of religion, by Alexander III, a short while before the death of that able and imperious pontiff.* His successor, Lucius III, being a man of more temper and moderation, and less firmly seated in the papal chair, William set on foot a negotiation with him, which was conducted by Josceline, bishop of Glasgow, who was sent upon an embassy to Rome, attended by the Abbot Osbert, Ernald, Abbot of Melros, and other persons of honourable rank. By this means a reconciliation was effected, and the pontifical curses were taken off; a compromise being made whereby the pope's pretensions were saved, while the king obtained his immediate object, which was the appointment of his chaplain, Hugh, to the metropolitan see, and the exclusion of another candidate, an Englishman, who had been supported by papal influence. When the ambassadors took leave of the pope, on the eve of their return home, he sent by them his paternal blessing to the king, together with a rose of gold, curiously wrought, upon a golden twig, in the form of a sceptre.† This was a frequent present of the Roman pontiffs to kings,‡ being considered as an emblem of Christ, according to the generally received interpretation of the words, "I am the rose of Sharon, and the lily of the valley." The cavity of this mystic rose was usually filled with balm, which was another sacred emblem. The same pontiff conferred upon the convent at Kelso, the privilege that no sentence of excommunication should have any force against them, unless it proceeded

* It required not only great firmness of mind, but an understanding in an extraordinary degree enlightened, to despise the papal censures in that age. The usual form of excommunication was, at least, sufficiently awful to strike terror into any one who believed in the lawfulness of that authority so impiously assumed by the popes. It was done by taking lighted torches, throwing them on the ground, and trampling them out to the ringing of bells, after pronouncing the following words:—"By the authority of Almighty God, the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, and the blessed Mary, the mother of God, and all the saints, I excommunicate, anathematize, and put out of the confines of the holy mother church, A. B. that evil doer, with his abettors, and accomplices; and, unless they repent and make satisfaction, thus may their light be put out before Him that liveth for ever, and ever. So be it, Amen, Amen, Amen."

‡ In later times, the gift of the pope to kings was, not unfrequently, a sword, with a rich scabbard and belt, signifying to them their duty to fight in defence of the church. Such a present, together with a diadem, was sent by pope Julius II. to James IV. of Scotland, in 1507; and is still to be seen among the other royal ornaments preserved in the castle of Edinburgh.

directly from the apostolic see.* Innocent III. confirmed this and their other privileges and immunities, about the year 1201, declaring, that no archbishop, nor bishop, nor any person not specially commanded by the apostolic see, should have power to lay the monastery under an excommunication or interdict; and that though the whole kingdom were interdicted, they might celebrate divine offices in their church, in a low voice, with the doors closed, and without ringing of bells. In token of their immediate dependence upon the Roman see, they were to pay a mark of silver yearly; although, as an acknowledgment for their other privileges, they paid, annually, a piece of gold, or two pieces of silver.†

The Abbot Osbert died in 1203, when he had ruled the convent twenty-three years. ‡

VII. GEOFFREY, the prior, was now raised to the higher dignity of abbot; but, farther than this, nothing is recorded of him. §

About this time, Innocent III. wrote two pontifical epistles in behalf of the monastery. The one was to the chapter of the convent itself, directing that the emoluments of the benefices annexed to their house should be applied, as was originally designed, to the maintenance of the brethren, hospitality to strangers, and the relief of the poor, instead of being conferred on individuals, as had been done lately by some of the abbots. The other epistle was addressed to the bishops, and other ecclesiastics of rank and authority in Scotland, prohibiting them from injuring the monastery. || From this, it is probable that the immunities of the convent had been disputed. The same pontiff confirmed, by his authority, all their privileges,

VIII. RICHARD DE CANE was elected by the convent, on the 29th of March, 1206. The same year, John, prior of Kelso, was preferred to the episcopal see of Aberdeen.* He died the following year. The Abbot Richard died in 1208. † His successor,

IX. HENRY, the prior, was preferred by the choice of the convent, on the 17th of June, 1208. ‡ This abbot assisted at the general council, held at Rome, in November, 1215,§ for the purpose of concerting measures, and raising money to be employed in renewing the persecution against those Christian churches, generally known by the names of Waldenses and Albigenses, who, untainted by the errors and superstitions which had grown upon religion in the rest of Europe, had long preserved, in their remote habitations, in the wilds of the western Alps, the pure and scriptural knowledge of Christianity, which, for the last fifty years, had been spreading from them into the south of France, and into Spain and Italy, with a rapidity and success, that, but for the atrocious and cruel means employed to suppress it, might have speedily effected the overthrow of the papal tyranny. There were present at this assembly, twelve hundred and eighty-three prelates, of whom six hundred and seventy-three were bishops. Among the latter were the bishops of St Andrews, Glasgow, and Moray. The rest of the Scotch prelates sent deputies. The council sat fifteen days, at the end of which the abbot of Kelso, and Brice, bishop of Moray, returned home. The bishop of Glasgow did not return till the third year, and the bishop of St Andrews not until the fourth year thereafter. The Abbot Henry died October 5, 1218, having governed the abbey ten years.||

X. RICHARD, the prior, obtained the abbot's office, on the 19th of the same month, and held it till his death, which happened on the 2d of August, 1221. ¶

XI. HERBERT MAUNSEL, the secretary of the convent, was the next abbot. When he had presided fifteen years, he solemnly resigned his charge on the 8th of September, 1236, depositing his crosier, or pastoral staff, and mitre, upon the high altar of the church. **

XII. HUGH DE * * * * one of the monks, was raised to the dignity of abbot, on the resignation of his predecessor.* Three years afterwards, Cardinal Otho, legate of Pope Gregory IX, being at Melros on the eve of St Dennis, in the month of October, compelled Herbert to resume the government of Kelso abbey, which he is stated to have indiscreetly laid down. Upon this, Hugh, who is described as a man of advanced age, and most exemplary life, willingly retired from the office.† After this, however, there is no farther mention of the Abbot Herbert; and there is evidence, in the chartulary of the monastery, that Hugh exercised the authority of abbot of Kelso, in 1240 and 1241.‡ It is likewise recorded in the Melros Chronicle, that Hugh, abbot of Kelso, died in 1248.

About this period, the abbot and convent received authority from the papal see, which was to continue to them and their successors in future, whereby they might excommunicate by name known thieves, and invaders of their estates and property, and whosoever were guilty of doing evil to their church. The sentence of excommunication was to be solemnly pronounced, with lighted candles and ringing of bells, on a Sunday, or holiday, and they were empowered to repeat it every year, on the Thursday before Easter, the feast of the assumption of the blessed Virgin, and other solemn occasions; and the bishops within whose dioceses such malefactors might happen to live, were commanded to ratify and confirm it, and to avoid, and cause others to avoid, having any intercourse with them, till they made satisfaction. The pope's legate having written to the bishop of St Andrews for this purpose, he issued an injunction, on the 1st of July, 1247, to all the archdeacons, officials, deans, parsons, vicars, and chaplains, in his diocese, requiring them to give effect to such sentences of excommunication. §

XIV. PATRICK, another of the monks, was the next abbot, and held the office two years, when he was removed, without any just reason being assigned, but, as was believed, through the intrigues and influence of his successor at the papal court.

XV. HENRY DE LAMBEDEN, the chamberlain of the monastery, having been at Rome, returned to Kelso in 1260, and brought with him an order from Pope Alexander IV. to the Abbot Patrick, by which he was commanded to resign his charge immediately into the hands of the bearer. So completely was the despotism of the Roman see at this time established, that although this imperious mandate was understood to have been obtained by corrupt means, which called forth much censure, yet no resistance was offered to it, nor does it appear to have excited any doubts respecting the right of a foreign bishop to exercise such authority. The submissive abbot laid down his mitre, and other pontifical ornaments, upon the grand altar of the church; and Henry immediately invested himself in them, and assumed the government of the convent on the very day of his arrival. He presided fifteen years with little credit; for the ungenerous and irregular means by which he supplanted his predecessor, and obtained the office, could not easily be forgotten. His death, in 1275, was sudden, and appears to have been caused by apoplexy. It occurred as he sat at table, and was just beginning his repast. The monks, it is said, considered this as a special interposition of Heaven, to punish him for his wicked ambition; and they refused to pay him the respect of watching his corpse; but buried him the same day on which he died.†

XVI. RICHARD was abbot of Kelso in 1285, as appears from the chartulary of the abbey, in which he is mentioned as holding a court at Redden on the 15th of May, when Hugh de Reveden, son and heir of John, son of Hugh de Reveden, resigned for a sum of money, to his lords the abbot and monks of Kelso, all the land which he and his ancestors had, at any time, held in the territories of Reveden and Home.*

After the death of Alexander III. and his grand-daughter, the Princess of Norway, when Edward I. of England, Robert the Bruce, and John Baliol, each appointed forty commissioners, who should assemble together at Berwick, on the 3d of August, 1291, in order to examine the claims of the several competitors for the crown, the abbot of Kelso was one of those chosen by Baliol.† The Abbot Richard, and the convent, took an oath of fealty to the English monarch at Berwick, on the 20th of August, 1296, when their estates, forfeited by their previous hostility to his ambitious designs against the independence of the country, were restored to them. King Edward's letters, commanding this restitution, were addressed to the sheriffs of Berwick and Roxburgh, and dated September 2.‡

The miseries of the war between the two countries, which soon after ensued, fell heavily upon the monks. The monastery, which, being situated so near the limits of the kingdom, had been a scene of daily hospitality and charity to the wayfaring and poor of both countries, was now exposed to the incessant attacks of military freebooters, who, converting the war into an opportunity and licence to commit every sort of disorder, returned the monks evil for their good, and made their peaceful halls and cloisters a theatre of rapine, extortion, and bloodshed. In the end, the monastery was laid waste by fire, and the monks and lay brethren were reduced to the necessity of subsisting by the alms of the other religious houses in Scotland, until they recovered their estates by the expulsion of the enemy.§

XVII. WALRAN was abbot at this period. His name occurs in charters dated 1307, and 1311.||

XVIII. THOMAS DE DURHAM, an Englishman, who probably owed his preferment to the military success of his countrymen, is mentioned in a charter as having borne the name and office of abbot of Kelso by usurpation, some time previous to the year 1315.¶ He had also been prior of Lesmahago at the same time, and is accused of having wastefully spent or embezzled the goods of both the monasteries during his rule, which probably terminated with the battle of Bannockburn, in 1314.

XIX. WILLIAM DE ALYNCROM was abbot of Kelso after this. In 1316, he exchanged, with William de Lamberton, bishop of St Andrews, the parish church of Cranston, in Mid-Lothian, the patronage of which belonged to the convent, for the church of Naythanstirn, and the chapel of Little Newton.* This abbot summoned the burgesses of the town of Wester Kelcow† into his court, held there in 1323, to answer to his complaint of their having, of their own authority, made new burgesses, licensed brewers, and committed other acts of the same kind, without his consent, contrary to his rights and privileges as their feudal lord. The burgesses, by their prolocutor, Mr Hugh of Chirnside, clerk, made an apology, admitting that they had no right to act as they had done, but disclaiming any intention to offend their lord the abbot. The name of William, abbot of Kelso, occurs in 1326. ‡

XX. WILLIAM OF DALGERNOCK, preceptor to David II, the young king of Scots, was abbot of Kelso in 1329.§ When the King of England sent an army to invade Scotland, in 1333, upon the pretence of supporting the claims of Edward Baliol, but in reality to prepare the way for his own usurpation of the Scottish crown, David retired with his tutor to France, where they resided nine years, at Chateau Gaillard, on the Seine, in Normandy.|| In the mean time, the abbey was under the care of Thomas

It is to be observed, that of the five MSS. consulted by Macpherson, the editor of Wyntown, the passage in which the abbot is mentioned as the king's tutor, is found only in the Harleian copy; but as it appears from internal evidence, [see preface, page xxxvii.] that this MS. was "copied from one written in the abbey of Kelso," there is no reason to doubt the correctness of the information contained in the passage which follows:

de Hassynden, who was styled warden of the monastery of Kelso. Edward III. gave a letter of protection to the monks on the 26th of July, 1333.* The priory at Lesmahago was more unfortunate. It was cruelly burned in the beginning of the war by John of Eltham, brother to the English king, with a number of people within it, who, probably trusting to the inviolability of its privileges as a sanctuary, had taken refuge there from the sword of the enemy.† Baliol, in return for the support afforded him, made over to Edward the counties of Roxburgh, Berwick, Dumfries, Selkirk, Haddington, Edinburgh, and Linlithgow, in June, 1334, to be annexed to England for ever.‡ While things remained in this situation, it is probable that Kelso, and the other monasteries in this part of the kingdom, did not suffer much from the war, which was continued, with little intermission, till the king's return, in 1342. But, in the struggle which now took place, by which he was reinstated in his dominions, it appears that the convent was more unfortunate; for, in 1344, David granted permission "to the abbey of Kelcow, being burnt by England, to cut wood in Selkirk and Jedwart forests for reparation."§ Besides what they suffered from the public enemy, their exposed situation on the frontiers of the kingdom laid the property of the monks open to the predatory attacks of the disorderly marchmen of either country, who were habituated to plunder, and paid little regard to law or truce. To shield themselves, if possible, from marauders of this description, they usually obtained, in times of general truce, letters of protection from the King of England, in which punishment was threatened to any of his subjects who should injure or molest them, or their dependents, lands, property, or revenues. It may serve to shew to what distress this part of Scotland was reduced by the war, that, upon such occasions, permission was likewise commonly granted them to buy provisions in England, and to convey them, when purchased, to their monastery, without molestation. • The name of WILLIAM, abbot of Kelso, without any other designation, is found in charters dated in 1342 and 1354.†

XXI. WILLIAM de BOLDEN was abbot of Kelso in 1370. He is styled, in a charter, "The reverend lord, William de Bolden, by the grace of God, abbot of the monastery of Calkow." In a charter, dated in 1372, is found the name of "William, by divine mercy, abbot of Calkow."‡

XXII. PATRICK, who is sometimes styled, "by divine permission, abbot of Kelso," is mentioned in various charters, from the year 1398 till 1406. In 1398, we find him granting to one of the monks, who is stated to be in priest's orders, and in the full exercise of that office, licence to study, for the space of two years, at either of the English universities, any liberal science or art which might be lawfully permitted him; and to choose for himself a suitable confessor to absolve him of his sins.§ At this period, a new impulse towards learning had been given to the minds of men, and greater interest was felt in its studies and inquiries. The long night of comparative ignorance and superstition was giving way to the rising dawn of knowledge and truth, and its light had already exposed many of the errors of the papal theology, and was marshalling the way to that removal of its abuses which took place at the Reformation of religion. Many of the clergy, and even monks and friars, in England, had embraced the opinions of the proto-reformer, John Wiclif. The far greater body of those who were averse to reform, and, for conscience sake, or private interest, were attached to the papal system, had taken the alarm. Persecution was begun, and its denunciations had already, in 1402, been heard in the monastery at Kelso; not, indeed, against any of its own members, but against three English ecclesiastics, who, it may be inferred, had fled into Scotland, and, perhaps, were supposed to have found an asylum among them. This is, at least, a reasonable conjecture to account for the insertion in the chartulary of two injunctions of Walter Skirlaw, bishop of Durham, to the archdeacon of Northumberland, and his official; the one dated February 8, 1402, directing

XXIII. WILLIAM, abbot of Kelso, having represented to Pope Martin V, in the ninth year of his pontificate, 1428, that a perpetual chantry or chapellany, the presentation to which belonged to him and his successors, had been founded in the parish church of St James's at Roxburgh, by a certain layman, Roger de Auldton, for the celebration of mass at certain times of the year, for the safety of his soul, and that of his wife and their other friends, which had been duly performed for a long time, but was then discontinued, on account of the destruction of the said church and its property in the late wars; the pope gave him permission, with the consent of the rector of the church, and the heirs of the said founder, to transfer the service of the chapellany to some convenient chapel in his abbey, until the said parish church should be repaired, and the income of the chapellany restored to its former value, which was, in the mean time, to be fully enjoyed by the officiating priest. When Thomas, abbot of Dryburgh, was commissioned by the bishop of St Andrews, in 1434, to see the above conditions executed, William is mentioned as the late abbot of Kelso.†

XXIV. WILLIAM was abbot of Kelso in 1435, and continued to hold that office on November 16th, 1444.‡ At Kelso, on the 30th of May, 1435, John Trewnot, a monk of the abbey, with consent of William, the lord abbot, and convent, constituted the noble and discreet men, John de St Michael, Robert de B. and Robert de Fergushyl, legal procurators and factors of the monastery at the courts of Edinburgh and elsewhere, to defend them against the complaints of the Lord David de B. or other persons, before the provost and bailies, judges, justiciaries, &c.§

XXVIII. ROBERT, abbot of Kelso, was appointed, by the three estates of the Scottish Parliament, in 1493, one of the auditors of causes and complaints. Henry, who was prior of Kelso at this time, is said to have been well versed in Latin and Greek literature. He was an intimate friend of the elegant Italian poet, Angelo Poliziano, and of the distinguished philosopher and theologian, Marsilio Ficino, and was the author of a number of literary works himself, namely, 1. A Greek poem on the Virgin Mary, which he published and inscribed to Lorenzo de' Medici. 2. A translation of the twelve books of Palladius Rutilius on Rural Economy, into Scottish verse. 3. A Botanical Synopsis, or book on herbs. 4. Excerpts from Varro, and Columella, a copy of which was preserved in the Dominican convent at Bologna. 5. A collection of his letters, which were deposited in the Laurentian library at Florence, and are, perhaps, still there. The name of the Abbot Robert occurs in charters dated in 1495, and several of the intermediate years, till 1505.†

XXIX. ANDREW STEWART, bishop of Caithness, had the abbey of Kelso granted him to hold in commendam, in the year 1511, when he was appointed lord high treasurer of Scotland. He was also commendator of Ferne abbey, in Ross-shire. He died June 17, 1518.‡

The privilege of electing their own superiors, originally enjoyed by all the monastic communities, had now fallen generally, or rather universally, into disuse, and was become a mere form; the power itself being virtually exercised by the king, who, when an abbey or priory became vacant, found little difficulty in obtaining a mandate from the pope, directing the monks to choose the individual whom he nominated or recommended. This began to grow into use about the year 1474, when the king presented to the vacant abbeys of Dunfermline and Paisley.§ It soon led to the more corrupt practice of granting the superiority and revenues of religious houses to bishops and secular priests, who, not having taken the monastic vows, were not duly qualified to preside in a monastery. Out of this grew the still greater abuse of committing charges of this nature to laymen, and even to infants. All these things were done with the sanction of the papal authority; and the monasteries, thus disposed of, were said to be held in commendam, or in trust, until it should be found convenient to appoint a regular superior.

It is recorded, that, on the night after the disastrous battle of Flodden, which was September 9, 1513, Andrew Ker of Fernihurst, commonly called Dand Ker, an active and powerful adherent of the Lord Home, one of the greatest noblemen in Scotland at that time, broke into the abbey of Kelso, and, having turned the superior out of doors, forcibly kept possession of it.* This violence must have been perpetrated in behalf of his brother Thomas, the next abbot. The abbey being at that time, as we have seen, held in commendam, might perhaps have been considered as in some measure open to the pretensions of candidates; and the disorders of the government likely to ensue upon the death of the king, who was slain in the battle, might tempt this warlike chieftain to commit an act of usurpation, which, perhaps, he was afterwards able to maintain, although not without difficulty, as it appears, that, in August 1515, the abbot of Kelso, and other friends of Lord Home, were imprisoned at Dunfermline by the Duke of Albany, then regent of Scotland.† It is certain, that Bishop Stewart, when employed in negotiating with England, in 1515 and 1516, still enjoyed the title, if not the revenues, of commendator of Kelso abbey, and probably did so until the event of his death, in 1518.

XXX. THOMAS KER, abbot of Kelso, was principally concerned in carrying on the negotiations of truce with England in 1519, and in several succeeding years. By these annual treaties, peace had generally been maintained ever since the year following the fatal overthrow at Flodden; but in 1522, the conditions proposed to the Scots being such as they could not honourably agree to, the two countries were again placed in a state of active hostility. In the end of July, the Earl of Shrewsbury led a numerous army into Scotland, and made great havock in Teviotdale, but was at last driven back by the Scots. In this expedition Kelso felt the severity of two of his captains, the Lords Ross and Dacre, who, having pillaged it, burnt one half of the town, but do not appear to have injured the monastery.* This was only "scotching the snake, not killing it;" and the Earl of Northumberland, unwilling that such a work should be left imperfect, determined to complete it, although there is no evidence to shew that he executed his purpose, which he communicated to King Henry VIII. in a letter dated at Warkworth, October 22, the same year, in which he says, — "I, by the advice of my brother Clyfforthe, have devysed, that, within this iij nyghts, Godde wylling, Kelsey shal be brent, with all the corn in the said town, and then they shall have noo place to lye any garryson in nygh unto the borders. And for this burnyng of Kelsey, is devysed to be done secretly, by Tynsdail and Ryddisdale."†

The conduct of the war, on the part of England, was soon afterwards intrusted to the more powerful hands of the Earl of Surrey; and the Scots had reason to expect a formidable invasion the following spring. The abbot of Kelso, afraid of the impending storm, endeavoured to find shelter in the favour of Margaret, the queen dowager, sister to King Henry VIII, and prevailed upon that princess to intercede for him with the English commander that he would spare the abbey and town. With this view she wrote him a letter on St Katherine's eve, [January 6th,] 1523, of which the following is an extract: "Also, my lord, the abat of Kelsoo hath prayed me to vryt to you to be hys good lord, and that for my sake ze wol not let na ewel to bi don to that place, the whiche I wyl pray you to do, and that he may find hym the bettir for my request; with your answar agayn for that behalfe."‡ This application, however, proved altogether fruitless; for, on the 30th of June the same year, Kelso was sacked, burned, and destroyed by a body of the enemy led by Thomas, Lord Dacre; when they demolished and reduced to ashes the abbot's house, with the buildings around it, and the chapel of the blessed Virgin, in which were stalls, or seats of elegant workmanship. They likewise burnt all the cells of the dormitory, and unroofed every part of the monastery, carrying away the lead which covered it; in consequence of which the interior and walls were, a long while after, thoroughly exposed to the injuries of the weather; and all religious services were interrupted. During this period the monks retired into one of the nearest villages, and celebrated the rites of their religion in the greatest want and poverty.* A circumstantial account of this expedition is given in the following letter from Lord Dacre to the Earl of Surrey, written at Harbottle, on the first of July, 1523. "My lord, in my moost humble wise I recommend me unto your good lordship, certifying you upon Monday last I assembled the king's garrison, and the moost parte of the inhabitants of this towne, to Howtill Swyre, at iij of the klok after noone. And so, when I had viewed the nombre of our company, and appointed the vanguard and the rereward, we removed that night unto Twedeside, where the vanguard lay at Carham, and the rereward with th'ordynance in the haughe betwixt the said Carham and Warke, And then in the morne, in the breaking of the day, whiche was yesterday, we set forward, and wente to Kelsoo, where nott onely we brent and destroyed all the hole towne that wold burn by any labour, but alsoo cast downe the gate hous of th'abbey. And then we proceeded to a great towre called Synlawes, iij miles within Kelsoo, and kist it downe. And frothens to a fayre towre called Ormeston, one myle and an halfe within the said Synlawes, and kist it downe. And then we returned, bornying all the townes and steds in our waye, to the Moss Towre apperteynyng to the Lord of Buccleughe, and kist it downe. And so came homewards the high waye by the castell of Sesforth, and entered this realme at Shotton chappell, in suertie, lovings † to God." †

Hostilities were suspended in the autumn of 1524 by a short truce, which was renewed from time to time till 1526, when peace was made for three years. The abbot of Kelso was concerned in settling the conditions of this treaty, as we learn from the following communication of Dr Magnus to Wolsey, dated at Berwick, March 20th, 1526: "The confirmation of peace on the part of the Scots, was brought hider by th'abbot of Kelsoo, the hedesman of the Carres of Tevidail, well accompanied with honest men to the number of xl persons, to whom I made suche chere as I couth that day at dyner, and furthwith after we examined our commissions, and made collacion of other our greater writings. XXXI. JAMES STEWART, a natural son of King James V, by Elizabeth Shaw, of the family of Sauchie, was made commendator of the abbeys of Kelso and Melros in his childhood; and the king obtained the papal sanction to this appointment, and to that of John Stewart, another of his illegitimate sons, to the priory of Coldingham, in 1541. ‡ The king appropriated to his own use the profits of these benefices, during the minority of his children. This abbot, who was a pupil of the celebrated Buchanan, died in his youth, in 1558. ||

When the storm of war burst forth again in 1542, it fell with great severity on the town and abbey of Kelso, both of which were given to the flames by the army under the Duke of Norfolk, who, when Earl of Surrey, had burned the same nineteen years before. The year 1544 was memorable for the invasion of Scotland by the Earl of Hertford, who, in consequence of the refusal of the Scots to marry their infant queen to Prince Edward of England, landed a numerous army on the shores of Lothian, in May, and ravaged all the country between Edinburgh and Berwick. From this time began a series of most destructive hostilities, which were carried on for more than two years, by the garrisons of the towns and castles on the

‡ In soliciting the sanction of the pope to these appointments, "the king proposed that, in order to augment the revenues of these monasteries, the pope should empower the administrators for his sons, to let the tithes belonging to them for nineteen years, and their lands either in leases to that extent, or in perpetual feus. Writing to one of the cardinals, James describes them as small monasteries (monasteriola) situated on the borders of the kingdom, adjacent to some of the strongest places of the English, from which incursions used to be made into the Scottish borders, and where heretical sermons being frequently preached, the contagion of these, by the sameness of the language, was easily spread. For checking both which evils, the king demanded these monasteries to be intrusted to his natural sons. The governor Arran [in the minority of Queen Mary] asked the revenues of them to be employed for the service of the public, and particularly for the defence of the kingdom against the English, and that for that end he might have the administration of them, all needful expenses being first allowed out of them, for the support of the boys, and other necessary burdens." English frontier, in conjunction with the warlike inhabitants of the neighbourhood, who made almost daily inroads into the southern districts of Scotland, when they pillaged and burnt the towns, villages, churches, and monasteries; destroyed the fruits of the earth; and slew the inhabitants, or carried them away prisoners into England, in order to obtain money for their ransom, or to exchange them afterwards with their captive countrymen. These incursions were, for the most part, directed or conducted by William Lord Eure, governor of Berwick, and warden of the east marches; Sir Ralph Eure, his eldest son, warden of the middle marches; and the Lord Wharton, warden of the west marches of England. The chief captains who acted under Lord Eure were his son Henry Eure, master of the ordinance of Berwick; Sir Richard Bowes, captain of Norham; his son, Sir George Bowes; Sir Thomas Grey of Horton; Sir Brian Layton; Sir John Ellerker; John Horsley, captain of Bamburgh; Gilbert Swynhoe, captain of Cornhill; and John Carr, captain of Wark Castle. The field of their exploits being principally in the Mers, and the eastern parts of Teviotdale, Kelso and the places in its vicinity were more peculiarly exposed to the attacks of these spoilers. It is difficult to conceive how, in such insecure times, the buildings of the town could have been restored since it was destroyed by the Duke of Norfolk in 1542; yet we are assured that it was plundered and again burned on the 28th of June, 1544, by the garrisons of Wark, Cornhill, Bamburgh, Fenton, and Ford, who, marching with secrecy and despatch, came upon the inhabitants by surprise, when they slew forty of them, and took some prisoners; together with an hundred oxen, fifty horses, and a quantity of malt and corn.* It appears that the ruinous castle of Roxburgh was at this time used as a fold for cattle; since we read that on "the xxix of August the horsemen of Wark rode into Scotland, and lay in the cornfields beside Old Roxburgh, to the number of xl men, or thereabouts, and the rest kept their horses, so they seized the Lord of Cesforth's goods, that cam forth of the castell, and forth of the byres beside the castell, to the number of iij<sup>xx</sup> kye and oxen, xij horses and mares."† On the 5th of September, 1200 men of the English garrisons came into Teviotdale by Crookham muir, and dividing themselves into two parties, one of them "burned Littleden hall and stables, and all other houses about the same, but only the stone house which they could not get, it was so mured with earth, and they burned Rutherforth such-like, with many bastell houses in the same : while the other party went and assaulted Dawcove, and shot such ordinance as they had, and set fire to the gates of it, and sundry were hurt and slayn within, with half haikes, and handguns ; and so they gave over the house to Thomas Gower, who took ix prisoners, and burned and spoiled the house, and brought much insight geir ; and this done, in their marching homewards, the Scots assembled with the laird of Bucclowgh, the laird of Cessforth, Dand Carr of Littlelden, Cowdenknowes, and such company as came forth of Ettryke forest, to the number of iij hundreth men, who followed and pricked at the hinderend of the Englishmen, who returned towards the Scots, and the Scots fled, and they made a chase of them ij myle, but the lairds and those that were well horsed got away : Notwithstanding, they took fifty of them prisoners, and slew v or sex ; and hurt Mark Carre, who got straitly away ; and two Englishmen taken ; and so they got at this journey x score nolte, certain horse and sheep, and insight geir ; and burned such steads as was in their way homewards.”*

Although the defeat of the collected forces of the English borderers at Ancrum muir, in February, 1545, was a severe check to them, yet the predatory warfare was still continued, with various success, on both sides. “On the xvi of April, John Carr of Wark, and his garrison, ran a forray to Old Roxburgh, and there burnt the barns of the laird of Cesforth, with much corn in them, threshen and unthreshen. In returning, they met a party of Scots who had gone into England to burn and steal, of whom they slew two and took three.”†

One of the most active captains on the Scottish side at this period was Andrew Ker, brother to Sir Walter Ker of Cesford. Being stationed with a garrison at Kelso, for the defence of the town and neighbourhood, he and his followers made frequent and successful inroads into England, till it chanced, that, as they were returning homewards, on the 7th of May, 1545, with certain spoils they had taken at Wark, they were hotly pursued by several companies of Englishmen, and being overtaken at Frogdean, he was made prisoner, with thirty of his men.‡

In September, the same year, the Mers and Teviotdale were again overrun by an English army of twelve thousand men, commanded by the Earl of Hertford. Whatever had been overlooked or spared in former incursions, was now utterly laid waste. In their progress from Coldingham to Jedburgh, by Dunse, Eccles, Kelso, Dryburgh, and Melros, separate parties of the enemy were sent off in different directions to destroy the villages and farm steads; and, in the course of a few days, two hundred and eighty-seven places, including the four great monasteries, the seats of religion and learning, and the pride and ornament of the country, were sacked, pillaged, and dilapidated. The inhabitants, unable to oppose so great a force, made no resistance, except at Kelso, where three hundred men, who endeavoured to defend the abbey, were all either slain during the assault, or made prisoners when the place was taken. It is uncertain whether it was upon this occasion, or in 1560, that the east and north sides of the tower were thrown down, and the choir almost entirely demolished, which was probably effected by a battery of cannon directed against it from the northeast. The town was now in so ruinous a plight, that the weekly market could not be conveniently held in it, and it was, therefore, transferred to the village of Home, where it continued to be held for some time.*

We find, however, that the shattered walls of the abbey church were still occasionally resorted to as a place of shelter and defence from the sudden incursions of the enemy. One of these occasions is thus recorded in the report of Lord Eure to King Henry VIII:—“Item the xijth of Aprill, [1546.] John Carr of Warke, with his garryson there, and lx gonners of the same, with Gilbert Swynho of Cornell, and his garryson, and John Wicliffe, with the garryson of Norham, to the nomber, in all, of iije men, well horsed, mett all at Warke, at one of the klokke, after mydnyghte, and concludett, by th’ adwise of Richerd Carr, and others of the garrysons, to ron to Neanthorne with a c men, and the rest to lye in a bushement † at the Spittle, above Kelsoo, and that the gonners should lie nygh to Kelso in the brome there. Scotts slayn cx, prisoners lxx." ‡ In June, the same year, when another inroad was made by the same enterprising garrison of Wark, the ruins afforded an insufficient protection to sixteen men, who "had beilditt them a strength in the old walles of the steple." § Nevertheless, it appears that some part of the church continued to be used as a place of religious worship till after the Reformation, and the conventual buildings still afforded shelter to a remnant of the monks; for, in one of the tumults which took place in 1560, when the monks had been expelled, the church drew the attention of the excited populace, who, in their headlong zeal, not content with having defaced the images, and burned the reliques upon the steps of the high altar, demolished also whatever else remained of its internal furniture and ornaments, and destroyed still farther the already ruinous fabric. || Lesmahago was dealt with in a similar manner; the reliques of the martyrs were burned, and the church and monastic buildings pulled down, the same year. ¶

Upon the death of the abbot James Stewart, in 1558, Mary of Lorraine, the dowager queen-regent, gave the commendatorship of both Kelso and Melros to her brother, Cardinal Guise, who had not yet reaped any advantage from this preferment, when, upon the establishment of the reformed religion, in 1559, the revenues and property of the monasteries were taken possession of by the Lords of the Congregation, in the name of the crown. Though the spiritual office of abbot must have virtually ceased when the Roman Catholic form of religion was abolished, and its worship and ceremonies were forbidden as idolatrous, yet the title still continued, for a long time, to be used as a temporal distinction, to designate such persons as were charged with the management of the confiscated property of the abbeys, or had obtained grants of them from the crown. One of the Kers of Cesford enjoyed the title of abbot of Kelso not long after the Reformation. We are told by Birrell, in his curious diary of the transactions of this period, that, in August 1566, “ the abbot of Kelso, of the name of Ker, was slaine by the laird of Cesford, the younger, his awen kinsman, and hes frendes.” This abbot seems likewise to have acted as superior of the surviving monks, and to have had power, in conjunction with them, to give leases of certain lands and tithes, being probably the portion set apart for their maintenance out of the ample possessions of the abbey. We learn, from a MS. collection of notes out of the Register of the Privy Council of Scotland, that, on the 13th September, 1566, “ Ker of Corbet, Mowe of that ilk, and certane others callit befor the counsell, and, according to the charge produceand themselves, ane tak of certaine landis and teindis of Kelso being examined be the saids lords, confessed that the convent had subscriyvit the sam, aucht or ten days efter the deceiss of the last abbot.”*

The main part of the estates of this rich abbey were held in commendam by Sir John Maitland,† who, before the 8th of March, 1565–6, exchanged the commendatorship of Kelso with Francis Stewart,‡ afterwards Earl of Bothwell, for the priory of Coldingham. Bothwell was commendator in 1584, and had an interview at Kelso with the lords who had been concerned in the Gowrie conspiracy, as they passed through that town on their way to England, where they took refuge from the king’s displeasure.§

None of the unhappy monks were left alive in July, 1587, as we learn from the following act of the Scottish parliament then made, from which it also appears, that Sir John Maitland was again commendator of Kelso :— “ Forsameikle as the haill monkis of the abbay of Kelso ar decessit, sua that presentlie there is na convent thairof, quhairby the tennents and taksmen of the said abbey ar uncertane in quhat manner thai sall provide thair securities anent thair takkis, fewis, and rentallis, quhilk thai have taue, or may tak heirafter, of the said place and abbay of Kelso : Thairfoir, our soverane lord, and thre estaitis of this present parliament, presentlie declairis Sir Johne Maitland of Thirlstane, knight, his hienes secretair, and present commendatair of Kelso, to haif had full rycht, in his Maitland was raised, the same year, to the dignity of lord high chancellor of Scotland; and shortly after we find the Earl of Bothwell in possession of both Kelso and Coldingham. This nobleman, for his repeated treasons, was attainted in 1592, and both his abbey and priory were then annexed to the crown; † and though he was afterwards pardoned, it does not appear that these possessions were restored to him. If they were, he did not enjoy them long, for in 1594, being again frustrated in a treasonable design, he fled to the Continent, and after some years spent in an unsettled state of life in France, Spain, and Italy, he died in wretchedness at Naples.

The lands and possessions of Kelso abbey were finally conferred upon Sir Robert Ker of Cesford, one of the bravest and most active men of his time, who by his talents, courage, and vigilance, in the office of warden of the east marches, had obtained great favour at court, and was created a peer in 1599, with the title of Lord Roxburghe. On the 3d of August, 1602, he obtained a charter granting the lands of Haliden to him and his heirs for ever. On the 5th of the same month, he had a like grant of the town of Kelso. These and the other estates of the monastery, except the patronage of twenty of the churches belonging to it, which he gave up to the king in 1639, are still enjoyed by his descendant, the Duke of Roxburghe.

The shattered remains of the monastery are said to have been still farther dilapidated by the blind frenzy of the bigoted populace in 1580. It was probably after this period that certain buildings, in a clumsy and barbarous style of masonry, were constructed on the ruins of the ancient church. A protestant place of worship being wanted for the parish, a low, gloomy vault was thrown over the transept for this purpose, forming a dark, cavern-like retreat, which must have appeared a dismal contrast to those, if any were yet alive, who had seen the lofty elegance and grandeur of the original edifice. Over this was built another similar vault, to serve the purpose of a prison. This was called the outer prison, and communicated by a door with a smaller vaulted chamber, called the inner prison,* built in the head of the cross over another vault, which formed a kind of wing, or aisle, to the parish church, and had a corresponding opposite wing erected in the ruins of the choir. It may be conjectured that other parts of the ruins were demolished to furnish materials for the construction of those tasteless additions; by which much of the beauty of the ancient structure was hidden and disfigured. It continued to be used as the parish church till 1771, when, one Sunday during divine service, a fragment of cement happening to fall from the roof, the congregation, which was crowded, believing that the vault over their heads was giving way, hurried out, impressed with such terror and consternation, that, though the alarm proved false, they could never afterwards be brought to assemble in the old church, which from that time remained deserted; their fears having been long kept alive by the remembrance of an ancient prophecy attributed to Thomas of Ercildoune, otherwise called True Thomas, or The Rymer, “which bore that this kirk should fall when at the fullest.”†

The ruins were partly disencumbered of the rude modern masonry by the good taste of William, Duke of Roxburghe, in 1805. His successor, the late kind-hearted and liberal Duke James, caused the remaining encumbrances to be cleared away in 1816. By this means, not only the beauties of the fabric were disclosed to view, but the useful, though unpleasant, discovery was made, that some of its parts were verging to decay, and threatening to fall. To prevent so great a misfortune, the noblemen and gentlemen of the county met together in January, 1823, and employed an architect to survey the ruin; upon whose recommendation the decayed parts were strengthened and repaired, the crevices filled up, and the top of the walls covered with a coating of Roman cement, at the expense of several hundred pounds, raised by subscription.

* Sir Walter Scott, who, in his boyhood, frequently resided at Kelso, has made this prison the scene of an event described in the Antiquary. There are many persons alive who can bear witness to the correctness of the picture there so admirably drawn.

DESCRIPTION OF THE RUINS OF KELSO ABBEY CHURCH,
BY GEORGE SMITH, ESQ. ARCHITECT.

THIS ancient sacred edifice has been frequently referred to by antiquarians as one of the oldest specimens of ecclesiastical architecture to be found in Scotland.

Kelso abbey was one of the munificent foundations of David the First ; but no vestige is now left of any part but the ruins of the church, and of it the choir is nearly gone ; but the walls of the transepts, centre tower, and west end remain. On referring to the ground plan, (Plate VIII.) it will be observed, that, like some others of the old Saxon and early Norman churches, there is no nave, unless the compartment at the western entrance, which is merely a porch of twenty-three feet square, may be called a nave. The choir has had, when entire, three divisions, a centre and side aisles ; but the two piers, shaded black, with the arches and superstructure over, are all that remain of this part of the church. These arches spring from massive Saxon piers, having slender circular pillars attached, with bold projecting capitals, forming imposts for the springing of the arches.

The walls are thick and firmly built, and, like most other ancient churches, have narrow passages within their thickness.

The exterior character of this church is very imposing, and it is, undoubtedly, the finest remains in Scotland of Saxon architecture. The deep splayed circular arch, and its characteristic enrichments, the zigzag mouldings, the nail-head, the chevron, and the diagonal ornaments, and many more well known Saxon mouldings, are to be found in the north and west fronts.

There is evidently part of the superstructure of this church of the Norman style : The blank ranges of intersecting arches, placed round the walls, both within and without, the double arcade of small circular arches supported by slender shafts, that had, when entire, run round the walls of the choir, over the massive Saxon arches : these belong to the Norman style. There are likewise some fragments of early English in the centre tower.

Kelso abbey exhibits as perfect an example of interlacing arches as is to be found in the kingdom : thus, it is believed by many learned authors, that the Gothic, or pointed style, took its rise from the intermediate form of interlacing arches. (See Plate VII.) They were first used by the Norman architects as mere ornaments, carried round to relieve the dead walls of their churches ; and, soon after, the circular headed windows were abandoned, and long narrow pointed windows were substituted, which gradually merged into what is called the early English Gothic.

POSSESSIONS AND REVENUES OF KELSO ABBEY.

THE earliest possessions of Kelso Abbey were the lands bestowed upon it by King David I. at Selkirk, the original site of this monastery. The chartulary of Kelso speaks of the churches of two Selkirks, the one called King's, and the other Abbot's Selkirk. The first was probably the chapel of the royal castle, and was granted by David on condition that the abbot and his successors should be chaplains to the king, his sons, and their successors within the same.* The other church was originally the chapel of the abbot and monks, which continued to be a place of worship after their removal to Kelso. At King's Selkirk they had a property of 16 acres, called Bridge-land,† on both sides of the bridge over the Ettrick, with pasture in Minchmoor attached to it, granted by King Alexander II, on condition that out of the profits thereof the bridge should be kept in perpetual repair.‡ They had also the town of Abbot's Selkirk, their possessions in which were a ploughgate of land, the rent of which, in the time of King Robert the Bruce, was ten marks per annum; fifteen husband lands, each containing an oxgang rented at three shillings per annum, and ten days' work in autumn, and two of them furnished a cart, and other two a horse, to carry peats from the morass to the abbey. The tenant of each was likewise obliged to go one journey in the year with a horse and cart to Berwick, upon the business of the monastery. They enjoyed the rectorial revenues of the two churches; King's Selkirk being valued at £20, and Abbot's Selkirk at £40, per annum.

KELSO, when granted by King David, in 1128, was probably a small village, although it grew soon afterwards into a considerable town, and, in the time of King Robert I, consisted of two parts, eastern and western Kelso. The bishop of St Andrews, at the same time, granted the church of this place, with half a ploughgate of land belonging to it. And as this land consisted of separate portions, of less value from being scattered, King Malcolm IV. gave in exchange for it another half ploughgate, lying together, beside the road which led to Nenthorn.*

King William, brother and successor to Malcolm, gave licence to the men of the monastery, residing in Kelso, to buy in that town, every day of the week, except the day of the statute fair of Roxburgh, fuel, timber, and provisions; and that persons passing through the town with such wares might sell to them. The abbot's men had licence also to expose for sale in their windows, bread, ale, flesh, and fish, brought with their own horses or carts. But carts belonging to any other place, passing through the town, were not to unload or sell there, but to proceed to the king's fair. On the fair day, the inhabitants were forbidden to purchase any thing in the town, but at the fair, in common with the burgesses of Roxburgh.†

Arnald, the son of Peter of Kelso, in the time of King William, gave to the monks the messuage in Kelso, which had been his father's, and some land with toft and croft, and three shillings of annualrent, to be paid by Ralph, the provost of Kelso, and his heirs, out of a certain messuage in the town. He gave also a piece of ground in the town which had been the property of Walter the son of Hecke, and of Ingebald.‡

Andrew Maunsel,§ with consent of his son Walter, gave them liberty to make a wear, or dam-head, for their miln at Kelso, upon a part of his ground in the Halech,|| on the east side of the town of Roxburgh. Andrew the son of William, the dyer of Kelso, resigned, in 1237, a portion of ground which he inherited in Kelso, for two marks of silver, which were paid him by the lord abbot. The whole of eastern Kelso belonged to the monastery, with an annual rent of £9, 16s. 9½d. out of the town and burgh of western Kelso, with certain duties paid by the freeholders there. They had as much arable land as required seven ploughs to till it; and they possessed the mill, which brought them in £20 a-year. They had a fishing in the Tweed, extending from Brokesmouth down to the water of Eden.* William de Moreville, and Muriel his wife, in the time of Malcolm IV, gave the monks six oxgangs of land, with toft and croft, in the territory of Brokesmuth. This gift was confirmed after his death, by Muriel and her husband, Robert de Landeles.† In 1399, Patrick, by divine permission, abbot of Kelso, granted to his beloved and faithful Thomas de Vicaria, a tenement in Kelso, for 10d. yearly, and other services.‡

In ROXBURGH, King David gave the monks 40 shillings a-year out of the revenues of the burgh, and 20 chalders, half meal, half wheat, out of the milns.§ These revenues were afterwards exchanged for a mill at Ednam. He gave them all the churches and schools of the burgh, with the property belonging to them. || The churches appear to have been three: one situated in King's Street, in the town, called the church of the Holy Sepulchre, ¶ or the church of Old Roxburgh, which was attached to a prebendal stall in Glasgow cathedral; the church of St John within the castle; and St James's church without the walls. There was a chantry in St James's church, founded in the reign of King Robert the Bruce by Roger de Auldton, for procuring mass to be said at certain times in the year, for ever, at the high altar of the church, for the soul of the founder and his relations and benefactors. It was endowed with revenues to the value of £20 sterling, arising from lands and tenements at Auldton, Heton, and Wester Softlaw, and from six burgages in the town of Roxburgh. This chantry was under the patronage of the abbot and convent of Kelso, who were enjoined, upon the peril of their souls, at the death of the chantry priest, to present a successor within two months. If they failed, it lapsed to the archdeacon of Teviotdale, who was to present within six weeks; and, upon his neglect, the alderman and corporation of Roxburgh were to appoint a chaplain within six weeks. • When the church of St James was brought into so ruinous a condition by the war, that divine service could no longer be performed there, the abbot of Kelso obtained, in 1426, the consent of the pope, and of the rector of St James's, that the service of this chantry should be celebrated in some fit chapel of the abbey, until the church of St James should be repaired, and the income of the said chantry or chapelry restored to its former value. †

King David had given the monks a right to the tithe of his cows and swine, and kane cheese of Nithsdale and Tweeddale, and to the half of the hides and tallow of the cattle slaughtered for his kitchen, on the south side of the Firth of Forth, with all the skins of the sheep and lambs, and the tenth of the deer-skins. The collecting of these perquisites was probably found too troublesome, and Alexander II. gave in exchange for them an annualrent of 100 shillings, to be paid by his bailiffs, out of the revenues of Roxburgh. ‡ About the year 1300, the temporal income, which the convent derived from Roxburgh, was 100 shillings from the king's revenue, and £8, 2s. 9½d. arising out of divers tenements there. They derived from the church an annual pension of £13, 6s. 8d.§ In the fifteenth century, Walter Ker of Cesford, baron of Auld Roxburgh, founded a chantry at St Catherine's altar, in Kelso, and granted an annualrent of twenty marks out of his lands of Auld Roxburgh for its support. The presentation of the chaplain was to belong to him and his heirs, and to the abbot of Kelso if they failed to present after forty days.|| In the reign of David II, John Spottiswood of Spottiswood, founded an altarage, or chantry, in St James's church at Roxburgh. ¶

EDNAM. David I. granted the convent a yearly income of twelve chalders of malt from the miln at Edinham. King William gave them the miln itself in exchange for this, and for the 20 chalders of meal and wheat which they had from the milns of Roxburgh, and the forty shillings from the customs of the same ; and they had power to hinder the erection of any other miln within the parish, and a right to the same services from the inhabitants, which the latter were bound to yield to the proprietors of the miln.* They had liberty to dig turf for fuel from a certain part of the muir. Paganus de Bosseville gave them an oxgang in Edenham, consisting of fourteen acres.† King William also granted them a ploughgate in Ednam, which had been held by Henry and his nephew Randolph ; and the land which had been Roger Clerk's, and David's, the son of Thruct, or Tructe, and four oxgangs which Elzi and Alfred held in farm. These lands, which were in all three ploughgates, were delivered to them by Erkinbald, abbot of Dunfermline, at the command of the king ; viz. two ploughgates and a half near the limits of their land of Kelso, on the north side of the petary of Ednam, reaching thence along the boundary of the parishes to the southern bounds of Newton, and thence along the said bounds to the river Eden, and along the Eden to the bridge on the west side of Ednam, and thence to the road leading to the hospital, at the forking of the road which comes from the north side of the petary, and thence along the road to the place first mentioned ; with the pasturage of a piece of ground between the petary and the bounds of Kelso. The other half ploughgate lay on the east side of the quarry belonging to the abbey, between the 14 acres of Pagan de Bosseville, the hospital land, the petary, and the road leading to Sprouston ford. He gave them also a fishing in the Tweed which belonged to Ednam, extending from the bounds of Kelso to those of Brigham.‡

REDDEN. King David gave them the domain of Revedene, or Redden, with right of water, pastures and petary, as fully as he possessed the same himself, only excepting a ploughgate of land which he gave to the hospital of Roxburgh. He added the land of Osulf, the son of Wictburg, which was to fall to the abbey after the death of the said Osulf.§ Bernard de Hauden resigned his claim to the miln and miln-pool of Reveden, in favour of the monks of Kelso ; and also to the piece of meadow land lying on the north side of their half ploughgate near the brook, which was the ancient boundary between Hauden and Reveden.|| Hugh de Reveden gave up his claim to some land called Floris, in the territory of Reveden, of which he and his ancestors had long kept possession, contrary to justice, and the will of the abbot. He resigned it in the abbot's court, at the bridge of Etterick, in the year 1258.* His grandson, Hugh, the son of John de Reveden, resigned, for a sum of money, to his lords the abbot and convent of Kelso, in the court of the Abbot Richard, in 1285, all the land which he and his ancestors had at any time held in the territories of Reveden and Home.† About 1300, their property in Redden was as follows:—The grange, which they tilled with five ploughs, and where they had pasture for fourteen score of ewes, besides oxen; half a ploughgate, which was let to Richard of the Holm; eight husbandlands, and one oxgang, for each of which certain bond services were performed by the tenant at stated times,—namely, every week in summer, a journey to Berwick with one horse, which was to carry three bolls of corn, and return either with two bolls of salt, or one boll and a ferloch of coals, and, on the next day after every such journey, one day's work of whatever kind might be wanted. When not required to go to Berwick, they wrought two days in summer, and three in autumn. To stock his little farm, each husbandman received two oxen and a horse; three chalders of oats, six bolls of barley, and three of wheat. The Abbot Richard afterwards commuted these services for money, when they gave back their stock, and each paid eighteen shillings per annum for his land. Nineteen cottages, eighteen of which were let for twelvecpence a-year, and six days' work in autumn, during which they were found in food, which they were also when they assisted in washing and shearing the sheep; the nineteenth cottage paid eightpence a-year, and nine days' work. They had also two brewhouses which paid two marks a-year, and a miln which paid nine marks.‡

HAUDEN, or HADDEN. The monks were in possession of a ploughgate, or half a ploughgate, in Hauden, previously to the grant of that manor by King William to Bernard, the son of Brien, who added to it a toft adjacent, with easements, and exempted the occupier of the same from customs and services. He gave them also ten acres on the west side of the village. His nephew, Bernard de Hauden, who was sheriff of Roxburgh in the time of Alexander II, confirmed these gifts in the reign of King William, and added eight acres and a rood, lying contiguous to their property, on the east side of Hauden, on both sides of the road to Carram, between Blinde-welle, and another spring next the acre called Croc. In return for this bounty, the abbot and convent granted him permission to have a private chapel in his mansion, where he and his guests might hear divine service all the days of the year, except on Christmas-day, Easter-day, and the Feast of Saint Michael, when they were bound to go to the parish church at Sprouston. His chaplain was to swear fealty to the abbot, and the offerings made in the chapel were to belong to the parish church.* In the Rent Roll, their property in Hauden is stated to be one ploughgate, which they kept in their own occupation.

SPROUSTON. King David I. with the consent of John, bishop of Glasgow, gave them the church of Sprouston; also a ploughgate and ten acres of arable land, with buildings, and three acres of meadow.† King Malcolm IV. gave two oxgangs near Prestre-bridge, in Sprouston, in exchange for two oxgangs at Berwick.‡ Ralph de Veir, or Weir, in the time of King William, gave an oxgang.§ Serlo, the king's clerk, gave half a ploughgate. Sir Eustace de Vesci, who, in 1193, married Margaret, the illegitimate daughter of the king, by a daughter of Sir Adam Hutcheson, had the manor of Sprouston granted to him by a royal charter; and, in 1207, he obtained permission from the abbot and monks to have a private chapel at his mansion, the usual rights of the parish church being reserved.|| He was slain by an arrow in 1216, when he was reconnoitring Castle Bernard, in company with Alexander II.¶ About 1300, they had in Sprouston two ploughgates, with a right to common pasture for twelve oxen, four work horses, and 300 yearold lambs; an oxgang which let at ten shillings a-year; six cottages, one of which, situated near the vicarage, had a brewhouse and six MAXWEL. The church of the village of Maxwel,† near the confluence of the Tweed and the Teviot, dedicated to St Michael, was granted by Herbert de Maxwell, or Maccuswel, who lived in the reigns of David I. and Malcolm IV. To this was appended the gift of the chapel of St Thomas at Harlaw, near the head of Wooden Burn, about a mile from Maxwel, which was founded by the same Herbert, who gave it a toft.‡ In the Rent Roll, the rectory of Maxwel is valued at £11, 16s. 8d. per annum.

HETON. In the reign of Malcolm IV. Galfrid de Perci gave the monks a ploughgate containing five score and four acres in Heton, next to the land belonging to the hospital of Roxburgh.§

CRAILING, called in the ancient charters Treverlin, was granted by David I, with the crag of the same vill, and easements in the adjoining strother, called Came-ri, in exchange for lands at Hardingesthorn, near Northampton, valued at £ 10. ||

JEDBURGH. They had an annualrent of eightpence from a possession in Castlegate in this town. ¶ In 1464, Alan, abbot of Kelso, granted to John Rutherford of Hundolee, and his wife Elizabeth, and their male heirs, giving the preference to George, their second son, and his heirs, two contiguous lands in Gedworth, on the north side of Castlegate, for one mark yearly. It was stipulated that the said John, or George, or their heirs, should lodge the abbot or monks in the houses to be built upon the said ground, in preference to any other persons, whenever he or they should come to Gedworth, at a time when the town was crowded with strangers. They were, however, to live at their own expense. *

SHOTTON and COLPINHOPES. Robert de Schottun, or Scottoun, in the time of Alexander II, gave five acres in Schottun in Northumberland, on the west side of the road, beside the burn which divides England and Scotland, near Yetholm. † Colpinhopes, within the English border, was granted by Walter Corbet, laird of Makerston. William, the son of Patrick, Earl of Dunbar, with the consent of his wife, Christian, the daughter and heiress of Walter Corbet, confirmed the grant of Colpinhopes, with the miln. The boundaries extended from Edredsete to Grengare, under Edredsete, and to the bridge at the head of the brook, which divides England from Scotland, and down this brook, towards the chapel of St Edeldrida the virgin, to another brook which runs down by Homeldun, and then up this brook to a glen, where the brook comes to Homeldun, across the way which comes from Jetam, and along this way to the two great stones. They had also common pasture and fuel, and a right to grind without paying multure at the miln of Schottun. Likewise, pasture for 40 sheep, and 40 cows in Schottun, every where except in the corn-fields and meadows. Nobody was to plough, or do any thing on the west side of Homeldun, that might impede free entrance to these pastures. ‡ According to the Rent Roll, they had two acres in Scottoun, and pasture for 400 sheep, with fuel. Formerly, they kept a man in the miln to grind their corn of Colpinhopes; but, since they got liberty to have a miln at Colpinhopes to grind their own corn, they gave annually half a mark to the miln at Scottoun. They laboured their grange of Colpinhopes in winter with two ploughs, and they had there pasture for 20 oxen, 20 cows, 500 ewes, and 200 other sheep.

YETHOLM. Ralph Nanus granted three acres in Yetham. They had also common pasture there, which was occupied by the miller of Colpinhopes. William de Hawdene, laird of Kyrkyethame, gave the monks the advowson of the church of Kyrkyethame in Teviotdale, when he imprecated the curse of Almighty God upon whomsoever of his heirs should dispute their right to it; and bound himself and them, if he or they molested the church of Kelso and its rights, to pay £20 towards the fabric of the church of Glasgow, and the same to the fabric of the church of St Laurence at Merbotyl, for each offence.* They had at Yetham a safe receptacle for storing up their goods of Colpinhopes, when they apprehended danger from any quarter.†

MOLLE. Uctred of Molle, the son of Liolf, granted, for the good of the souls of King David and Earl Henry, the church of Molle, with land adjacent, within the boundaries which he and Aldred the dean had perambulated. “ Scil. ab Hulaeshou usque ad rivum ejus, et a rivo per Hulaeshou usque ad vadum Bolebent, ‡ contra ecclesiam, et a vado illo, sursum versus, usque ad Hulaeshou, et inde per viam usque ad Hunedune, et inde usque ad capud rivi Hulaeshou.” § Anselm of Molle, in the time of King Malcolm IV, gave the land, meadow, and wood in Molle, on the east side of Ernbrandesdene, extending from the limits of the property of the monks of Melros, in a straight direction, to Ernbrandesdene, and thence along the same to the ford of the Bolbent, and the boundaries of the land of Molle church, and up towards Hunedune to the boundaries of the land belonging to Melros; with the whole of Huletheshow in wood and cleared land, except one acre, which he gave to William Cementar. || Instead of an indefinite right of pasture in Molle, and the tithes of the miln, Anselm gave them pasture, in Berehope and Mollehope, for 700 sheep and 100 cattle. ¶ Richard Scot, the son of Anselm of Molle, gave eight acres and a rood of arable land in Lathlade, in Molle.** This grant was confirmed by Richard de Lincoln, who obtained part of Molle by his marriage with Matildis, Anselm’s daughter. Isolda, or Isoude, another daughter of Anselm of Molle, and her husband, Alexander, gave to the monks an oxgang, which she held of Richard de Nichole. After the death of Agnes, the wife of her father Anselm, when Richard de Nichole gave her a ploughgate in Mollehopcs, she gave the monks an oxgang there, in exchange for the former oxgang.* Richard de Nichole granted a part of his land in Molle, called Temple-acre, on the west of Hyllokishow, opposite the hall of Gilbert Avenel.† He gave also an acre at Thewles, between his meadow and the land which Richard Scot gave the monks. His son, Richard de Nichole, gave them a lease for ten years, beginning at Whitsunday 1255, of twenty acres of arable land and meadow in Mollehope, which had previously been let to the abbot and convent of Jeddeword, with pasture for 60 sheep and 4 cows. For this they gave him ten marks; and it was agreed, that if they should be disturbed in the enjoyment of this land and pasture, by the power of the king, or feudal lord, they were to remain tenants so much longer than the fixed term of their lease, as would be equivalent to their loss.‡ Matildis, the widow of Richard de Lincoln, laird of Molle, granted to the convent, in 1260, the thirds of the land let to them by her late husband, and apportioned to her as dowry, upon condition of her son being boarded in the abbey, along with the scholars of the first quality entertained there.§ Eschina de Londoniis, the wife of Henry of Molle, gave a confirmatory charter to the convent, in 1185, of the church of Molle, its lands and liberties.|| She likewise granted, for the good of the soul of her lord, Walter, the son of Alan, and the soul of her daughter, buried at Kelso, common pasture and fuel, and other easements in wood and plain, for the use of the chaplain, and the men of the monastery, residing at Molle: also part of a meadow between Edride-sete and Ruhope-burn, as far as the water of Blakepol, and a piece of land on the Bolbent, over against Blakepol, and a croft on the north side of William Forestar's house, under Hogham.¶ Henry and his wife, Eschina, questioned the right of the monks to the pasture land which they claimed in Molle. When the case was tried, it was found, that they had a right to pasture for 700 sheep and 120 cattle, with easements, and that the vicar and their men had a right to common pasture.* Cecilia, the daughter of Eshina of Molle, who was the wife of Symon Maulevezer, and the mother of Gilbert Avenel, made numerous grants to the convent of arable land and pasture, viz. a toft and croft in the muirs, “juxta exitum versus Wytelawe;” twenty acres in Hauacres; nine and a half near Auldturnburne; one acre near the way to Persouth; two at Persouth-side; one on the west of Benelaun; nine and a perch in Dederig; three and a perch, with her part of Hoga, and half an acre in Kidlawecroft; eight acres of meadow in Hauastrother; and thirteen acres of arable land in her own domains, viz. her part of Mollestele, consisting of four acres and a half; and her part of the land which lies near the burn that runs down from Brademedu to the Bolbent; and half an acre called Crokecroft; and two acres and a half near the way to Persouth; and three acres of arable near Persouth, with all her part of Brademedwe, and pasture for three hundred sheep, ten cattle, and four horses, in her own pastures and domains. She gave them likewise her Bercaria† at Aldetunburne, with free ingress and egress between their lands and pastures, and a right to take materials from Persouth to make their ploughs and their walluras‡ for ever.§ The monks of Melros had likewise possessions in Molle, for which they paid tithes to Kelso abbey; but, conceiving that they had a right to be exempted from such payment, they were sued at law by the abbot and convent of Kelso for arrears, amounting to £300 in value; and it was adjudged, in the year 1269, that the convent of Melros should pay to the value of two hundred and sixty marks for arrears due, and £20 for expenses.|| It was then agreed, that the monks of Melros should give annually thirteen chalders of good oatmeal for the whole, great and small, tithes of their lands in Molle. In 1273, both parties agreed to commute this into a payment of fifteen marks yearly, each mark being of the value of 13s. 4d.¶ Their property at Molle is enumerate in the ancient rent roll, viz. four acres of arable and meadow land at Altonburn, with pasture for three hundred sheep, ten oxen, and four horses, and stac and flac from the wood of Scrogges to repair their houses and ploughs ; and other four acres, with pasture, occupied by their shepherd, who was permitted to have a brewhouse. In the village of Molle, fourteen cottages, each of which was let at two shillings a-year, and six days' work, with easements, and pasture along with the laird's cattle. Also a brewhouse, which let at half a mark yearly. They had at Senegidside seven acres, and pasture in Berehope for seven hundred sheep. At Stapelaw four acres, the gift of Adam de Roule, and Jeneta, his wife. At Lathlade four acres. The grange of Hethow, consisting of two ploughgates, with pasture for forty cattle and four hundred and fifty sheep. They had at Clifton seven acres, granted by the patron of the church of Molle for providing consecrated bread.*

PRIMSIDE. Gaufrid Ridel, in the time of King William, gave two oxgangs, with toft and croft, free from multure ; and pasture for a thousand sheep, in two or three flocks, and for twenty-four cows and eight oxen, in his vill of Pranwrsete ; also, part of a meadow on the east side of the vill, for the good of the soul of Earl Henry, by whom this vill was granted to his father, and for the soul of his father, and the safety of his lord, King William. Part of the two oxgangs were in Cruchoh, near the boundaries of Clifton, and the remainder next the village.† He made another grant of “ totum halech de territorio de Pronewessete, sicut jacet juxta aquam de Bolbent, juxta divisas de Cliftun, ab occidentali parti viæ quæ tendit de Cliftun ad Pronewessete, scil. per viam quæ tendit ab aqua de Cliftun usque ad proximam costeriam versus Molle, quæ claudit totum halech inter se et aquam.”‡ The rent roll mentions seven acres at PROVISSET, with right of common for three hundred sheep ; let at half a mark.

BOWDEN, or BOLDEN. David I. made the convent the munificent grant of the barony of Bolden, containing the villages and lands of Bowden, Haliden, Middleham, Lilliesleaf, Clarilaw, Fawdon, Whitner, Whitelaw, and Newton.

At Bolden, they had, in the reign of Robert I, twenty-eight husbandlands, each of which paid annually 6sh. 8d. and four days' work in harvest, and one in winter ; and each husbandman was obliged to furnish a cart to carry peats from the moss at Gordon to the abbey, and to go once a-year to

Berwick with one horse ; to plough every year an acre and a half in the grange at Newton ; to harrow one day with one horse ; to find a man to assist in the washing, and another in the shearing, of the sheep ; to carry corn one day in autumn, and wool, from the barony to the abbey ; and to find themselves carriages beyond the muir towards Lesmahago. Abbot Richard commuted this service into a payment of money, by the assessment of brother William de Alincromb, who was then his chamberlain. They had likewise, at Bolden, thirty-six cottages, with an acre and a half, and half a rood to each cottage, and the rents of the whole amounted to about 55 sh. 8d. annually, with nine days' harvest work, and assistance in washing and shearing the sheep : also, four brewhouses, each of which let at ten shillings, and was bound to sell the abbot a lagen and a half of ale for a penny ; and every house furnished him with a hen, before Christmas, for a halfpenny. They had likewise a miln at Bolden, which paid them eight marks per annum.* The ploughgate of Priestfield, in Bolden, was let to four husbandmen, who were bound to find a man-at-arms to be the leader of the thirty archers raised in the barony to serve in the king's army. " Et divisæ dictæ carucatæ terræ de Prestfield, incipiunt ad crucem dudum positam ante ostium tenementi illius terræ, et ab illa cruce, proseguendo viam ducentem apud Denrygpottes, procedendo versus occidentem extra terram cultam, usque viam illam quæ tendit de Midleham, usque ad murum de Qwitlaw, et ab illo muro, transeundo versus austrum, usque quendam rivulum currentem ad Prestdenheued. Deinde descendendo per illum rivulum usque Holdenheued. Deinde ascendendo versus occidentem usque Harilauden. Deinde redeundo ad crucem supradictam. Et sciendum est quod quicumque tenens dictam terram ad firman, ultra dictas divisas non poterit communicare ; sed homines de Midleham, infra dictas divisas, cum animalibus suis, possunt communicare, præterquam infra stipulam."†

The grange of HALIDEN contained three ploughgates, with pasture for eighty cows, and two hundred and sixty sheep.

MIDDLEHAM contained twenty-nine husbandlands, of which twenty-seven paid half a mark, with bondservices, as the men of Bolden. The other two paid twelve shillings of rent, and thirteen days' work. The services were commuted for money by Abbot Richard, each husbandland being assessed at eleven shillings. There were also eleven cottages, with nine acres of land amongst them, each of which paid 18d. Also a brewhouse, which paid half a mark, with services; and a miln, which, together with the miln of Bolden, paid twenty-one marks.* In 1260, Alan de Sarcino yielded up to the convent his right to two oxgangs, and whatever other lands he held of them in Myddilham, by hereditary tenure. In 1270, William of the Hylle of Myddilham yielded, in like manner, his land to the monks. The Abbot John gave half a ploughgate in Midleham to his man Hosbern, and his heirs, for which he became the vassal of the convent, and was bound to pay eight shillings yearly, with bondservices. In 1398, the Abbot Patrick gave an annual pension of two marks out of the farms of Midelham, to Richard de Hanggandsid, for his faithful counsel and aid given, and in future to be given. †

LILLIESCLIF, or LILLIESLEAF, contained thirty acres, lying between the Aln and the burn which was the boundary between Lilliesleaf and Middleham. Herbert, bishop of Glasgow, made this land tithe-free: they had also the tithes of the miln. In the reign of King William, there was a dispute between the monks and the rector of Lilliesleaf, about some lands in Roxburgh and Kelso, and some tithes which he claimed as due to his church. The pope deputed John, bishop of Dunkeld, Hugh, abbot of Newbottle, and Symon, archdeacon of Glasgow, to settle the controversy, by whose advice the rector resigned his claim. ‡ They had a tenement at Whitslade, let for six shillings a-year.

At CLARILAW they had twenty-one cottages, with three acres wanting a rood attached to each, and pasture for two cows. The rent of each was two bolls of meal, with services. §

The grange of FAUDOUN, with twenty-one cottages, used to produce £10 per annum. || “*Istæ sunt marchiæ et divisæ antiquæ inter villam de Bolden, et villam de Faudon. The grange of WHITMER, consisting of two ploughgates, was valued at ten marks yearly. The vill, or town of Whitmer, contained ten husbandlands, each of which paid six shillings yearly, with bondservices; and seven cottages, with an acre of ground to each, three of which paid six shillings per annum; three paid 4sh. 6d.; and the remaining one 16d. There was also another cottage, without land, which paid 6d. † The grange of WHITELOW contained three ploughgates, with pasture for two flocks of sheep, and five young horses. ‡

The grange of NEWTON was cultivated with seven ploughs, and maintained four score of oxen, and six cows in summer, and sixty in winter at forage; also 1000 ewes, 60 hogs, and work-horses as many as were wanted for the ploughs. § Sir Robert de Hullecestre gave the monks all his land, with the building and croft in the vill of Newton, for ninepence yearly. ||

MAKERSTON. Walter Corbet, laird of Makerston, gave to the convent, before 1159, the church of Malcaruston, with the tithes thereof, and a piece of land lying on the Tweed at Brookesford, which he had given to that church at the time of its dedication. This land they afterwards exchanged with him, and as he gave them one of inferior value, he added to it another called Gretrigesmedow. He made another grant of half a ploughgate, with toft and croft; and he confirmed a grant of two acres on the north side of the road from Langtune to Roxburgh, by Michael of Malcarvistun, with the consent of Christiana his wife. When Patrick, Earl of Dunbar, obtained the lands of Malcarveston by his marriage with Christiana Corbet, Hugh, the abbot of Kelso, and the convent, in 1241, gave him permission to have a private chapel at his residence, the mother church reserving her right to certain fees and oblations. ¶ When the Rent Roll was written, there belonged to the monks two ploughgates at Malcarveston, with pasture for four hundred lambs, which was worth forty shillings a-year. Also twelve cottages, with a toft and half acre to each, and pasturage for two cows in the common. Four of these cottages paid each four shillings a-year, and nine days' work ; and each of the others eighteence and nine days. They had also a brewhouse with an acre of land, which paid five shillings a-year. *

HERMITAGE, in Liddisdale. William de Bolebech granted to God, and St Mary, and brother William of Mercheleye, and all his successors, the Hermitage called Merchingleye, founded in his waste beside the Merchingburn, with the church of St Mary there, and all belonging to it. His son Walter, confirmed the same to William and Roger, monks of the order of Kelso, and ordered that the hermitage should be, thenceforth, always held by two of the monks of Kelso, and by none other. Eustace de Baliol endowed this Hermitage with twenty-six acres of land beside Heleychestres. †

BERWICK. From David I. the convent obtained two ploughgates at Berwick, with two dwelling-houses, forty shillings yearly out of the revenues of the burgh, half of the profits of the milns. ‡ This last gift was afterwards yielded to the mayor and community by an agreement with the monks. § Prince Henry gave them a toft in Berwick, called Dodin's land. || This land was afterwards claimed by one Lambert as his inheritance, and the bishops of St Andrews and Glasgow were deputed, in 1177, to examine into and settle the controversy. They found that Lambert could not prove his right; yet to cut the matter short, they prevailed on the abbot and convent to give him the land in Roxburgh which Gilbert del Halach gave them, and twenty shillings towards erecting buildings; and as that land was then occupied by a woman who could not immediately be removed, it was agreed that, during her tenancy, she was to pay to Lambert the two shillings yearly, which she used to pay to the abbot, and the abbot was to add half a mark until he was put in possession of the land, after which he was to receive no more from the abbot, but to pay to him twelve pence yearly. ¶ Marjory, the wife of William Forgrund, sold them an annualrent of two marks, which she derived from a house in Berwick. They obtained some land in Berwick from Ralph de Berneville.** Adam, the son of Huddings, in 1227, gave them half his land in Huddingate, in Berwick. †† Thomas de Ravinisher sold them his land in Waldefgate in 1290; and Thomas Batayle sold them his land in

Jordan of Flanders gave half a ploughgate in the lower town of Orde; and John de Huntedun, rector of the church of Durisdeer, gave a fishery called Folestream. ‡ Alexander de Riparia, yielded to them his claim to a toft and an acre at Tweedmouth. § Arnald, the son of Peter of Kelso, on condition that they should say mass for the good of his soul, gave them the land in Berwick which he bought from Matilda Sufaze, and her grand-daughter, situated between the land of Arnald the Frenchman, and that of William de Bernahme; also a messuage with meadow, &c. to be held of the convent by his son-in-law, John of Newton, and his heirs, for the payment of one mark yearly. || Their possessions in Berwick are enumerated in the Rent Roll, viz. a fishing worth £ 20 per annum; forty shillings out of the customs at the Tolbooth; a dwelling near the Bridge-house, which they kept for their own use; rents, amounting to £ 10, 8s. 6½d. in Briggate, Waldefgate, and elsewhere; a dwelling-house with three shops in Uddingate, let to John Hall at ten marks per annum; the fishing of Woodhorne, which produced thirteen marks yearly; the fishing of North-yare, which yielded two marks. A building with a well, and three acres of ground at Tweedmouth, which produced twenty shillings a-year. Two ploughgates and two tofts at Bondington, near the church of St Lawrence; a toft near the church of St Mary, and a bank below the church for herbage. In 1334, when King Edward III. restored to the monks their confiscated property in Berwick, it was as follows: The seventh part of the milns; forty shillings out of the firm of the town; twenty-six shillings from two messuages in Southgate; ninepence from a messuage in Le Bocherie; six shillings from a messuage in Briggate; two shillings and threepence, two shillings and sixpence, two shillings and sixpence, and two shillings and eightpence, from four messuages in Uddyngate; six shillings and eightpence, from a messuage in Waldefgate; and four shillings from a messuage in the corner of the same street; and two shillings from a messuage in Seintemarie-gate. ¶

HORNDEAN. Sir William de Veteriponte, or Vipont, gave the monks, with consent of his wife Marjory, two acres in the meadow called Hollanmedu, in his lordship of Horverden, lying between the cultivated fields of Hollans and Brewlands. * He gave also certain eschalingas, [shealings, or upland pastures,] called Diveringdounes [Deryngton] in Lammermuir, which belonged to Hworvorden. † He gave them likewise the church of Horndean; and David, bishop of St Andrews, in 1251, gave them permission to apply the revenues of the said church to their own use, on condition of their maintaining a chaplain duly to celebrate divine service in the same. ‡ Robert Byseth, lord of Upsetlington, gave the convent the Hospital of St Leonard, in Upsetlington on Tweedside, opposite to Horwerden. They were to have no common without the bounds of the Hospital land, but might build and fish within its limits. The abbot and convent, and their successors, were to provide a chaplain to celebrate divine offices for the faithful there, and to maintain two poor persons. § In the time of Robert I. they had at Horndean half a ploughgate, with pasture for a hundred ewes, six oxen, two cows, and two horses, along with the laird's cattle; also a toft and a meadow called Hollanmedu; and the Hospital, with sixteen acres, and a fishery in the Tweed, with pertinents; and they were to provide a chaplain and to maintain two poor persons. At Dunrigdon they had an annual rent of 5sh. with ward and relief. ||

SYMPRINC. Hye of Symprinc, in presence, and with consent, of his son Peter, in the reign of Malcolm IV, gave the church of Symprinc to the monks, with toft and croft, and eighteen acres of land, reserving the right of Thor, archdeacon of Lothian, to enjoy the revenues of the church during his life. In 1251, David, bishop of St Andrews, gave them permission to serve the church of Symprinc, not by a vicar, but by a chaplain, and to apply the whole fruits of the said church to their own use, to help them to assist the poor, and to shew strangers hospitality. ¶ In the Rent Roll, they are stated to have at Symprinc two oxgangs, which brought them one mark per annum; and the Fogo. This church was conferred on the monastery by Earl Gospatric in the reign of Malcolm IV, together with a ploughgate of land, and the land and pasture of Bothkilscheles, “Per istas divisas, viz. de sursa fontis de Kaldwelle, usque in vacellum in quo rivulus prædicti fontis descendit, et ab illo vacello sicut rivulus ille cadit in Bothkil; et inde sicut Bothkil cadit in Witheddre, et post de Witheddre usque ad viam magnam quæ vadit ultra Spertildoun, et per eandem viam usque in prædictum fontem de Kaldwelle; et communem pasturam inter eos et scalingas hominum meorum de Pinkerdun.”* William, the son of Patrick, Earl of Dunbar, confirmed the gift of his ancestor, and gave also the dwelling-house which John the Dean possessed, a croft adjacent, and some land contiguous, “tendente versus austrum usque ad Grenrig, et ex transverso Grenrig per quandam antiquam semitam usque ad pratum meum quæ jacet inter Grenrig et Aldefoghou et ab illo prato in occidentem usque ad lapides positos pro divisa inter terram eorundem monachorum et terram hominum villæ, et de lapidibus usque ad quandam rivulum descendentem de Blyndewelle. Testibus, domino P. fratre meo. Waltero de Lindeseii vicecomite de Berewic; Ada de Poulword; Bernard de Hauden et aliis.† At a later period, Patrick Corbet, laird of Foghou, confirmed to the monks the possession of the chapel of Foghou, with the miln, and other possessions conferred by his father William, and his brother Nicholas.‡ In the time of King Robert the Bruce, they had at Fogo a ploughgate, with easements, which brought them four marks yearly : and a chapel with two ploughgates and a miln, from which they derived ten marks per annum.*

GREENLAW, LAMBDEN, and HALIBURTON. The church of Greenlaw, with the chapel of Lambden, and land adjacent, were granted by Earl Gospatrick, in 1147.* Patrick, the son and heir of Patrick, Earl of Dunbar, gave the convent a ploughgate of land in Bothkilsheales. He gave them also a letter of protection, in which he engages “quod non impediēt commodum religiosorum virorum abbatis et conventus de Kalchou, sed fovebit et mantenebit eos et bona eorum, eorum tenentes, firmarios, servientes, et eorum fratres et conversos, præsentēs et futuros.”† William, the son of Patrick, gave two oxgangs, with the toft and croft which Adam Cassin once held of him in Grenelaw : and he engaged that the mother church of Grenelaw should suffer no loss from his having built a chapel in his curia at Grenelaw. He gave also “illum toftum in Grenelawe quem Lyolfus equicius tenuit subtus ecclesiam, ita longum versus occidentem sicut cimeterium se extendit. Et præterea in eadem villa quinque acras terræ et unam rodam circa Cauchesterlawe.”‡ John de Lambdene, the son of W. de Strivelyn, gave a toft and croft in Lambdene, next that which Nigel held ; also eight acres of land, four of which were in Morilaw, and the other four in Arthurs-croft. David, the son of Tructe, in the time of David I, gave to the mother church of Grenelaw, and to the monks of Kelso, the chapel of his vill of Haliburton, with a toft and croft, and two oxgangs of land. This was confirmed by his son Walter, in presence of Earl Patrick, Eustace de Vescy, John, Sheriff of Roxburgh, Bernard de Hauden, and others. In 1261, Philip de Haliburton resigned all right over the said chapel.§ The abbot and monks granted permission to Roland of Grenelaw to have a chapel within the court of his mansion, on condition that no loss should accrue to the church of St Mary, at Kelso, nor to the parish church of Grenelaw. The chaplain of the parish church was to serve the said chapel three days in the week when Roland was at home, and no other chaplain without his consent, and Roland and his family were to hear service in the parish church on the great festivals.* William de Lamberton, bishop of St Andrews, about the beginning of the reign of King Robert the Bruce, granted them permission to apply the revenues of the church of Greenlaw, with its chapels of Haliburton and Lambden, to their own use, in consideration of the great poverty to which they were reduced, by the plundering and burning of their monastery, and the destruction of their property by war, and upon condition of their presenting a vicar to the said church whenever it should be vacant, and assigning him a stipend of a hundred shillings per annum, and providing as usual for divine service in said chapels.† About this time they had in Greenlaw half a ploughgate, worth two marks annually, which was usually held by the vicar, and another half ploughgate held by Alan, son of Matthew. Also two oxgangs, with toft and croft near the church; and five acres in another quarter, held for a mark and a half per annum. At Lambden they had an annual rent of a pound of pepper from the estate of William de Lambden. The rectory of Grenclaw was valued at £26, 13s. 4d. per annum.‡

LANGTON. In the time of King David I, or of Malcolm IV, Roger de Ou, or How, in the presence of Hugh and Thomas de Ou, and for the soul of his lord Earl Henry, gave the monks the church of Langton, as held by Henry, the parson thereof.§ William de Veteriponte, in the reign of King William, confirmed to them the same church, with its tithes and land granted by his father. The boundary went along the road on the east side of the church to Wedderburn, and thence to Humpulles and Langlands, where, passing between the laird's property and that of the church, it went on to Wedderburn northward, and to the toft of Henry, the former parson. To make a full ploughgate, he added the land called Gretryg, bounded by ditches from Holeburn to Stocfutcluh, and from thence to Fulstrother by the syke, and eastward to the limits of the arable land and meadow of Fulstrother, and thence to the syke which runs between Gretryg and Stankilchestre, and down the syke to the path which goes to Holeburn, on the west of Chimbelawe, and up Holeburn to the above named ditches. He gave also a portion of land in Langton, called Coleman's-flat, which had formerly belonged to the church.|| In 1240, David, bishop of St Andrews, gave them power to appropriate to their own use the great tithes of this parish, reserving for the vicar the glebe and altarages.* In the Rent Roll, the rectory is valued at £20 per annum, and they had a toft for gathering in their tithes.

ULFKILSTON, or OXTON. Alan, son to Roland of Galwey, constable of Scotland, gave them five ploughgates in Ulfkilston, in Lauderdale, with easements, as a composition for certain revenues which they had in Galwey, in the time of his ancestors. Those revenues, which appear to have been the tithes of the cattle and swine, and kain cheese granted by King David, and confirmed by King Malcolm IV, the monks renounced, with arrears and every claim on Galwey, in exchange for this land, the boundaries of which, beginning at the head of Holdene-burn, went down the same to Derestrete, and along Derestrete, northward, to Fuleford, and along the Ledre, by the south road, up to Derestrete, then southward to a cross, and westward to the road which leads back to the head of Holdene-burn.† He gave them likewise an annualrent of eight shillings, to be paid out of certain lands in Ulfkilston, in consideration of their relinquishing their claim to a ploughgate called Fulwidnes, which he had given in alms to the Hospital of Soltre.‡ In the time of King Robert I, they were in possession of half the village of Ulfkilston, from which they derived rents to the amount of ten marks yearly.§

HOME. Earl Gospatric, with consent of his sons, Gospatric, Edward, and Edgar, granted to the church of St Nicholas, in Home, a ploughgate of land, with parochial rights over that village, and the half of Gordon.|| He afterwards conferred the same church, with two ploughgates and a meadow called Harastrodar, upon the monastery of Kelso.¶ Ada, the wife of William de Courtenay, and daughter of Patrick, Earl of Dunbar, gave a portion of her land, with buildings, in the territory of Home, called Pullys, * Chart. Kel. 153, r. In 1203, William de Veteriponte relinquished every claim he had against the abbot and monks, (except the dispute concerning the multure of the scalings of Derrington, which was referred to arbitration,) in consideration of their services in bringing his father's bones out of England, and burying them in their cemetery. At the same time the monks forgave him a debt of thirty shillings, and gave him forty shillings, while they granted his petition that his father's name should be expressly recited among the special benefactors of the monastery whenever prayers and masses were said for the benefit of their souls for ever.—Ibid. 55, v.

or Pulles, situated on the banks of the Eden, where that river formed the boundary between Home and Nenthorn.* A dispute concerning this property arose between the convent and William de Home, who, in 1268, executed a deed, acknowledging that he had unjustly harassed and provoked the monks, and that he has sworn upon the holy gospels to respect and protect their rights in future, binding himself to pay a hundred shillings for damages and expenses, and granting pledges till the same be paid. Because his own seal was not sufficiently known, he caused this deed to be sealed with the seals of the archdeacon of Lothian, and the dean of the Mers.† It is probable that this concession was made under the influence of impressions produced by the prospect of approaching death, for, in 1269, William, laird of Home, son of William, the late laird, became bound to sign a charter confirming the grant of the church of Home, and the land called Pullys, to Kelso, as soon as he shall assume military arms, and change his seal.‡ Sir Patrick, son of Lord Walter de Laynale, gave to the convent all the land, tofts, messuages, &c. in Home, which Robert, the son of Adam Long, conferred on him, and which the said Robert and Adam held of the monks, for the payment of ten shillings yearly.§ In 1270, Gamelin, bishop of St Andrews, gave them power to convert the revenues of the church of Home to their own use.|| Their value, at the commencement of the fourteenth century, was £20 per annum. At this period, their property at Home consisted of a ploughgate and four tofts, with easements, which let at six marks; two oxgangs belonging to the church, with a toft and easements; a meadow of twenty acres, called Harestrother; an annual-rent of two shillings and sixpence, with two hundred eggs, and four days' work, from the land of William de Bosseville; ground for building a house, and a receptacle for their fuel, at the Pulles; seven acres, with a toft, easements, and pasture for three hundred sheep at WEDDERLEY; where they had also an annual-rent of two shillings and sixpence, and four days' labour, from the land of Geoffrey of Home.¶ Gilbert, the son of Adam of Home, resisted their claim to tithes and other ecclesiastical dues from Wedderley, but at last allowed it; and the abbot and convent gave him and his heirs a right to have a chapel there, upon the usual conditions.

On this chapel he conferred ten acres of land, with pasture for a hundred sheep, and forty horned cattle.*

GORDON. Richard de Gordon granted to the monastery the church of St Michael, at Gordon, and the land with which he had endowed it, viz. "totam terram illam a cimeterio usque ad Lippestan sacerdotis, et inde usque ad acram sacerdotis, et ad fossam quandam percroftam Roberti Rikeloc, usque ad Gateyeth, et ad viam quæ venit de Gordon, et per viam illam sursum usque ad Navidhic, et de Navidhic versus austrum usque ad unum magnum lapidem, et sic ad fossas repletas lapidibus, et ad extremitatem curiæ Alexandri, et sic per curiam ejus, et sic ascendendo usque ad cimeterium." He gave likewise an acre on Toddelawe, and an acre of meadow in Hundeistrower.† His grandson, Thomas de Gordon, made a grant of land, situated on the road-side near Fairford. He gave also a part of the petary called Brun-mos, extending from Todholes southward to Blakeburn, which runs between Faunes, Melocstan, and Gordon. He likewise gave eight perches of land, with liberty to make a bridge to the petary, and to take timber out of his woods to make it and keep it in repair, and also to strengthen and keep in perpetual repair their miln-dam at Kelso.‡ His daughter Alicia, who, in the reign of Alexander III, married Sir Adam Gordon of Haddo, confirmed the gifts of her ancestors, and especially that piece of land given by her father, situated between the road to Spottiswode and the domain of Dedrig, in breadth; and between the road to Hunteley and Huplongsflath, in length.§ Her son, Adam de Gordon, made a grant of land extending from Bradeford northward along the side of the river Eden, with pasture in his marsh at Westruther for 30 cows or oxen.|| Andrew Fraser, son to Sir Gilbert Fraser, gave the monks a ploughgate in West Gordon, between Fairford, Deadrig, Cothlandisforde, Swarthbrandknuc, Robertslaw-ditch, Harewell, Berestede, and the Red Quarry; also, fifteen acres, with two tofts and crofts, and three acres of meadow in the domain of Gordon. He gave them likewise his bondservant Adam, the son of Henry "del Hoga," with all his family, and pasture for forty horses and two hundred sheep.¶ A dispute having arisen between the monks and Sir Adam de Gordon, concerning some claim which he had to the ploughgate given by Sir Andrew Fraser, a meeting of their mutual friends was held in Kelso church, after the feast of St Peter in Cathedra, in the year 1308, when the convent agreed to pay him two marks annually for the ploughgate, and to permit him to have an oratory, wherever he chose, in the parish of Gordon, saving the rights of the church.* The Rent Roll enumerates, at Gordon, the half ploughgate belonging to the church, with pasture in the laird's land for five score young horses, and 400 wedders; the ploughgate which had been Andrew Fraser's, for which they paid to the laird of Gordon two marks per annum; six cottages, to each of which belonged an acre and a half of land, with easements, of which each of the tenants was bound to deliver annually thirty cart-loads of dry peats at the cloister, and to perform six days' labour, of whatever kind might be required: also, a toft whereon to build a house for the chaplain; and two petaries. The church of Gordon, of which they enjoyed the full tithes, is valued at £20 per annum.

MELOCSTAN, or MELLERSTAINES. David de Graham, brother to Richard de Faunes, granted to the convent two tofts in Melocstan, one of which, consisting of two acres, was situated where the old hall stood, and the other on the south side of Melocstan; also twenty-one acres in Wytefeld and Kingissete, and thirty-five acres next the Eden, nearer Faunes. These possessions were held of Patrick, Earl of Dunbar, who confirmed the grant. Richard conferred them on his brother, who, before he granted them to the convent, had given their mother, Amable, her liferent of them for twelve pence yearly, to be paid at Hexham at the time of Corbridge fair.† William de Hatteley, son and heir of Robert de Hatteley, gave the monks liberty to make a bridge over the rivulet Blakeburn, in his ground of Melocstan, and to have a road through his land to their petary. Philip de Haliburton, knight, and Christian, his sponse, about the year 1261, confirmed the grants of David de Graham in Melocstan, and the right of pontage and waynage over Blackburn.‡ Their possessions in Melocstan, enumerated in the Rent Roll, are a ploughgate which paid one mark annually, four acres, and a brewhouse, which paid five shillings, and a tenement, with easements. In 1465, Alan, abbot of Kelso, and the convent, let all their property in Mellostanys and Fawnys to Alexander Purves of Mellostanys, and Hugh, his brother-german, conjunctly and separately, for the period of nineteen years, at the rent of forty shillings per annum.*

NENTHORN, anciently called NAITHANSTHIRN. By an agreement entered into on the the 6th of March, 1316, the convent obtained the church of Nenthorn, and the chapel of Little Newton, from William de Lamberton, bishop of St Andrews, in exchange for the church of Cranston, and the land of Preston, in Mid-Lothian, which lay contiguous to the bishop's property, as the other did to Kelso. But as the said church and chapel were destroyed, and greatly reduced in value by the war, and the income of the church of Cranston amounted to twenty-five marks a-year, the bishop bound himself and his successors for ten years, beginning at the feast of Pentecost, 1317, to pay annually to the convent the sum of twenty-five marks, deducting the salary of the chaplain of the said church, unless the revenues of Nenthorn and Newton should any year amount to the value of twenty-five marks, in which case the bishop was not bound to pay. Whatever the monks should derive from the tithes and fruits of the said church and chapel, beyond the amount of the chaplain's salary, was to be placed to the account of the bishop or his successors, as payment of part of the said sum; and they were to be exempted from the obligation to pay, if, at any time during the ten years, the church of Cranston, and land of Preston, should, in like manner, be destroyed by war. If the destruction were partial, the damage was to be duly estimated, and a just proportion of the payment was to be remitted. At the end of ten years, these payments and remissions were to cease entirely. † To facilitate this exchange, William de Eglisam, archdeacon of Lothian, engaged for himself and successors to exact no procuration money from Nenthorn and Newton, but to bear his own charges when he should come to visit them. ‡ Richard de Hauggandsyd, to engage the monks to pray for the souls of William and James, Earls of Douglas, and for the safety of his lord, Archibald, Earl of Douglas, § granted them the land called Camflat, in the territory of Little Newton, bounded by the parish of Kelso on the south, and on the north by the morass of Kanmuir, through which the causeway and highway runs; with some other portions of land and meadow adjoining. ||

CRANSTON was granted by Hugh Ridel, for the souls of King David and Earl Henry. The profits, except the corn tithes, were to be enjoyed by the secretary of the convent. He gave also the vill and tenement of East Krauston, otherwise called Preston, or Presteton, reserving to himself and his heirs an annual rent of twenty shillings sterling, in lieu of the multure, of every kind, which might be exacted from the laud thus granted, and restraining the monks from erecting a mill upon the Tyne to his prejudice. * The boundaries of this grant are thus minutely described : “ Incipiendo ad aquam de Tyne, subtus Craneston a parte orientali, ex opposito Hoge, et sic versus aquilonem descendendo secundum antiquum cursum dictæ aquæ de Tyne, seorsim usque ad pratum quod vocatur abbotismedue ; et sic de inceptione dicti prati, per veterem cursum dictæ aquæ, circa dictum pratum, quousque alias per eundem anticum cursum venerit in aquam de Tyne ; et sic ex transverso dictæ aquæ usque in terram de Ormiston, et per divisas inter Preston et Ormeston, incipiendo ad unam vallem versus austrum, ascendendo sursum per syketum usque ad antiquam balcam, quæ est antiqua marchia ad pedem del Whitelawe ; et sic ascendendo per dictam balcam directe usque ad crucem quæ stat in marchia inter Preston et Ormeston, in via quæ tendit versus Hadington ; et a cruce versus austrum orientis usque ad Peth-hevid ; et sic descendendo in rivulum qui vocatur Wreke ; et ascendendo per dictum rivulum quousque veniat ad sycum qui venit de New Craneston ; et ascendendo per illum syketum inter terram arabilem de Preston et de Ormeston, qui syketus antiqua est marchia, quousque veniat ad syketum qui venit extra le Fareny-acre-dene ; per extremitatem terræ del Morehuses quousque pervenerit ad finem de Kenelmore Denum ; per orientalem partem dictæ More versus austrum ; per balcam lapideam juxta terram arabilem del Morehuses, sursum usque ad caput illius balcæ ad quandam congeriem lapidum ; et sic versus orientem usque ad quandam lapidem ad inferiorem partem de Renuechestre ; et sursum versus austrum per quandam balcam latam ex parte orientali de Rynchestre, usque ad quandam syketum a parte boreali de Tyh Witemore ; et per syketum, versus orientem, inter extremitates terræ, usque in quoddam antiquum fossatum, et sursum per illud fossatum versus austrum usque ad le Harestane ex parte orientali de Bertinbote ; et deinde sursum a parte boreali

DUDDINGSTON. The monks were in possession of the church of Duddingston, and the lands of East and West Duddingston, at an early period, but the chartulary does not say from whom they acquired them. The abbot Herbert granted the lands of Ester and Wester Duddingston to Reginald de Bosco for an annualrent of ten marks, to be paid by him and his heirs for ever. His successor, Hugh, who died in 1248, granted to Emma, the wife of Thomas, the son of Reginald de Bosco, or her assign, the wardship of her son and heir during his minority, for which she paid the abbot £20. * The abbot Alan, in 1466, granted in fee, for four marks annually, to Cudbert Knytheson, burgess of Edinburgh, "illam peciam terræ in baronia de Dodingston, prout jacet ex ambabus partibus viæ regiæ inter le Fegot Myrhede, et quandam congregationem lapidum ibidem depositorum ex parte orientali, ex parte una; et descendendo ab oriente prout quædam fossa ex antiquo constructa, et metæ in eadem depositæ se extendunt usque ad merchias terrarum villæ de Wester Dodynston ex parte occidentali, ex parte altera; et deinde a le Fegot, prout aqua currit in mare, et ad pedem unius Leth ex parte boreali; et sic a pede de le Leth per merchias, metas, et divisas, ascendendo usque ad dictum le Fegot Myrhede et dictum congregationem lapidum ex parte orientali," &c.† In the time of King Robert I. the Abbot William granted the half of Wester Dodingston, "salvo statu rectoris, ecclesiæ et vicariæ," to Sir William de Frischelai, and his heirs, for ever, for the yearly payment of twelve marks of silver, with homage, &c.‡ At this period Easter Duddingston produced ten marks, and Wester Duddingston twenty-four marks, yearly. The rectory was worth £20 per annum.

EDINBURGH. The Abbot John granted to Lawrence, the son of Edmund of Edinburgh, a toft, situated between the West Port and the Castle, on the left of the entrance into the city.§ The Rent Roll mentions a tenement in Edinburgh which paid the convent sixteen pence per annum rent. The abbey of Holyrood paid them a mark annually, as a composition for the tithes of Slaperfelde, and the abbey of Newbotil paid six shillings and eightpence annually, for the tithes of their salt work of the Cars.||

CALDOUR, anciently called CALDOUR CLERE. Ralph de Clere gave the monks the church of St Cuthbert of Caledoure, or Kaledofre, with the tithes of the miln, reserving to himself the right of having a private chapel within the court of his mansion, without detriment to the mother church. David, bishop of St Andrews, allowed them to appropriate the tithes to their own use, upon condition of paying ten marks annually to the vicar.* This rectory was worth £26, 13s. 4d. in the time of King Robert I.

PENCAITHLAND. Everard de Pencathlan conferred the church of Pencathlan upon the monks of Kelso, to engage them to pray for the safety of King William, his lord, who confirmed the grant.† This church is not enumerated in the Rent Roll.

KEITH, OR HUNDEBY KEITH, now called HUMBIE. This church was given to the convent, by Simon Fraser, in the time of King Malcolm IV. “Cum tota illa terra, et toto nemore ab australi parte rivuli qui currit juxta ecclesiam; scilicet, per predictum rivulum usque ad Kyrekeburn; et inde usque ad viam quæ vadit ad Hadyngton; et inde usque ad Kyrnestrother, et de Kyrnestroder usque in Reavedene, et de R. usque ad præfatum rivulum qui currit juxta ecclesiam; et illam terram ex orientali parte viæ juxta ecclesiam usque ad supercilium montis, usque ad quercum quæ est super rivulum.”‡ John de Keth, the mareschal, quitted his claim to a portion of land lying between the monk’s wood, and the burn which runs down from the church; concerning the right to which there had been a dispute between him and the convent. The monks gave up their pretensions to the church of Keith Hervey, which they had claimed as a chapel to the other church of Keith, which, by way of distinction, was called Hundebi Keth. Josceline, bishop of Glasgow, and the prior of Paisley, having been delegated by the Pope to settle this controversy, the mareschal settled upon the convent an annual pension of twenty shillings out of the living, and engaged, that should he give the church to any religious house, he would give it to none in preference to Kelso. There arose another dispute between the lords of Keith and the monks, the latter having erected a miln, and made a miln pond, thereby depriving the former of their right to the multure of the corn grown on the lands of Hundeby Keth, belonging to the latter. They had also made a road over his land of Laysiniston. Lord Robert de Keth gave them liberty both to have their miln, and to traverse his ground with carts and ploughs to their fields.§ In the Rent Roll the vill of Hundeby Keth is valued at ten marks, and the rectory at £20, per annum.

A toft, in HADDINGTON, with some land adjacent, belonged to the monastery as early as the reign of King William.* In the Rent Roll, the tenement in Haddington is valued at tenpence annually.

INNERWICK. In 1190, Robert de Kent, Robert Hunaud, Robert Avenel, and Roland of Innerwick, let, severally, to the monks of Kelso, for twenty-three years, for sums amounting to twenty shillings per annum, their portions of forest and pasture land in Innerwick, which lay near the land that already belonged to the convent, and was thus bounded: "Sicut rivulus de Edwardescloth cadit in Bothkil juxta Elzieshalet; et ita sicut Bothkil descendit ad Buccam de Fulhope, in transversum per divisas de Ellum usque ad Mammet; et per M. usque ad aquilonarem partem de Witslede; et ab W. in transversum usque in Edwardescloth ubi cadit in Bothkil." This agreement was ratified by Walter, the king's steward, the son of Alan; and the same proprietors, or their heirs, afterwards converted the lease into a perpetual grant.† Walter, the king's steward, granted to the convent the whole of his land in Innerwic, thus bounded, viz. "a Bothkil, ascendendo per rivulum qui cadit a Scoulande, usque ad Scoulandesheved, ubi sulcus trahitur; et per illum sulcum usque ad viam quæ tendit de Risilbrig versus Innerwic; et sic ab illa via versus orientem, usque ad quandam fossam; et sic descendendo usque ad Meldrescloes-heved; et sic per rivulum de Meldrescloes-heved, semper descendendo, usque in Mammet; et sic usque ad Buccam de Estfulhope; et sic ascendendo versus occidentem juxta divisas de Ellum et de Risilbrig, usque in Westfulhope, et in Withedre, et in Bothkil, et usque in prædictum rivulum qui cadit de Scouland."‡ The monks, having, in a short time, by their skill and industry, brought part of the waste land of this grant into cultivation, claimed to have it exempted from tithes; and this being opposed by Sir Alan Montgomery, the pope's legate appointed the abbot of Dryburgh, the prior of Coldingham, and the archdeacon of St Andrews, to judge between them. They held a chapter of the deanery of the Merse at Ednam, in 1221, on the Friday next after the Sunday on which the "Letare Jerusalem" is chanted, when the matter terminated in favour of the monks.§ Innerwick is not mentioned in the Rent Roll; but their grange of SPERTILDON, in the same neighbourhood, consisted of two ploughgates, with pasture for 1000 sheep, 400 wedders, 60 horses, and as many swine as they might have occasion for. They had sixteen or more cottages for their shepherds and serfs, and a brewhouse, which let at five shillings a-year.

PEEBLES. King William confirmed to the monks the possession of the chapel of the castle of Peebles, with a ploughgate belonging to it, and ten shillings a-year, granted by his grandfather King David out of the revenues of the burgh, to found a chapel in which to say mass for the soul of his son, Earl Henry.*

INNERLEITHEN. This church was granted by King David, to which Malcolm IV. added a toft; and because the body of his son rested here the first night after his death, he ordained that this church and its territory should thenceforth be a place of refuge or sanctuary, possessing the same privileges as Wedale or Tynningham.† In the Rent Roll, the rectory of Innerleithen is valued at £26, 13s. 4d. yearly; besides which they had a pension out of the vicarage, and twelve pence a-year from an acre adjacent to the church. HOPEKELCOW, alias HOPECALZIE, where they had three shillings of annualrent from three acres of ground, appears to have been a chapel in this parish.

LINTON, anciently called LYNTON RUTHERIC. In a charter of Herbert, bishop of Glasgow, this church is said to have been granted by Dodin, in his presence. There is another grant of it by Richard Cumyn, for the souls of Earl Henry, and his own son John, both of whom were buried in Kelso abbey.‡ In the Rent Roll, this rectory is valued at twenty marks yearly.

CAMBUSNETHAN, in Clydesdale. King William confirmed the grant of this church by William Finemund. There is another grant of it by Ralph de Clere, together with the tithes of the profits of his milns.§ It is not mentioned in the Rent Roll.

DUNSYRE church, with its lands and tithes, was granted by Helias, the brother of Josceline, bishop of Glasgow, in presence of John, dean of Teviotdale, and Osbert, the chaplain of Kelso; but in King William's confirmatory charter, it, with its chapels, is said to be the gift of Fergus Mackabard.|| In the Rent Roll, it is valued at £5, 6s. 8d.

WISTON. In the time of Malcolm IV, Wicius gave the church of his vill, Wicestun, with its two chapels, viz. the chapel of the vill of Robert, the brother of Lambin, [Roberton,] and the chapel of the vill of John, the stepson of Baldwin.* The church was served by a vicar, and the convent enjoyed the rectorial tithes, which are valued in the Rent Roll at £6, 13s. 4d. per annum.

ROBERTON, now forming part of the parish of Wiston, was originally a chapel belonging to it, and afterwards a parish church, served by a perpetual vicar, while the rectorial tithes, valued in the Rent Roll at £6, 13s. 4d. yearly, were enjoyed by the monks of Kelso. One of the vicars, named Walter, objecting to this appropriation, in 1279, seized and detained the corn tithes as his just due; but, when the matter was tried by the authorities of the church, judgment was given in favour of the convent.†

SYMINGTON. Symon Lochard claimed the patronage of the chapel of his vill, called Symon-Loccardstown, in opposition to the monks of Kelso, who claimed it as a dependency of their church of Wicestun. Josceline, bishop of Glasgow, being deputed by the pope to settle the dispute, persuaded both parties to an amicable agreement, when Symon withdrew his claim, and the convent consented that the chaplain appointed by him should hold it of them during his life. His descendant, Sir Symon Loccard, not only revived this claim to the patronage of the living, but kept back tithes to the amount of forty chalders of meal. The authority of the bishop, however, compelled him to relinquish his pretensions, to make restitution, and to bind himself by an oath never again to molest the monks under pain of excommunication. The convent consented to receive seven chalders, instead of the forty which were due to them.‡ In the Rent Roll, the rectory of Simondeston is valued at £10 per annum.

THANKERTON. The church of Tancard's-tun, otherwise called Wode Kyrch, was conferred by Anneis de Brus, and the grant was confirmed by Bishop Josceline, and Symon Loccard.§ Thankerton is now contained in the parish of Covington.

Robert de Londoniis granted a part of his land of KADHU, "in vasto suo, scilicet, de Roshanan, viz. a quadam quercu, cruce signata, quæ stat ad caput cujusdam sici; et sic per sicum illum descendendo, usque in

The convent had an annual pension of forty shillings from the church of Tyntou ; and they had the church of Crawfordjohn, the rectorial tithes of which produced them £6, 13s. 4d.†

The church of EGLISMALESOKS, in Clydesdale, was granted or confirmed to them by Robert I, in 1321. In 1324, John Lindsay, bishop of Glasgow, considering that the monastery of Calchou is situated on the borders of the kingdom, and that it had always been a place of free hospitality, where the poor and indigent found ready succour, but was now, by the hostile inroads and long continued wars between the two countries, impoverished, spoiled of its goods, and in a state almost desolate ; and considering also that the said monastery is the true patron of the church of Eglismalesoks, he, for the safety of the soul of Robert, King of Scots, grants and confirms the said church to the convent of Kelso, by his pontifical authority, and, with the consent of his chapter, in pure alms, as soon as the present rector, Dominus Nigellus de Cunningham, resigns or dies, reserving to himself the collation of the vicar to serve the said church, and twenty marks yearly for his sustenance.‡

The church of CARLUKE belonged to the convent at the time of the Reformation.§

They had a toft and a fishing in RENFREW and tofts in RUTHERGLEN, LANARK; INVERKEITHING, and STIRLING.||

CAMPSIE. This church was granted by David, Earl of Huntingdon, for the safety of his brother, King William, and the grant was confirmed by Maldouen, Earl of Lennox. In 1221, a controversy between the bishop of Glasgow and the abbot of Kelso, concerning the church of Campsie, was settled in the chapel of Roxburgh Castle, in the presence of an assembly of churchmen and nobles, when the abbot and convent resigned to the bishop and his successors their right to the said church, on condition that whoever holds the living should pay them an annual pension of ten marks. This pension afterwards became a subject of litigation, in which the convent prevailed in 1266, and, in 1322, King Robert commanded the church of Glasgow duly to pay the same.*

The church of ALTERCUMMIN, in LENNOX, was likewise granted by David, Earl of Huntington.†

The church of CULTER was confirmed to the convent by King William. Walter Byseth, founder of the house of the knights templars at Culter, engaged, in presence of the abbot and monks of Kelso, assembled in full chapter, that he and his heirs would observe all the liberties of the said church, and that it should lose none of its rights in consequence of the house of the templars being erected within its limits. But afterwards a complaint was brought by the abbot and convent against the master and brothers of the Temple of Jerusalem, because they had, without permission, rebuilt their chapel in the parish of Culter, and had kept the great and small tithes, and offerings of their lands and other goods in the parish, which justly belonged to the parish church. The master and brothers pleaded, that their order enjoyed a general exemption from paying tithes, and that they had a right to build chapels and make cemeteries in the waste lands conferred on them; also that the parish church of Culter, standing on the other side of a great river, on which there was no bridge, was seldom accessible to them without great danger, &c. The cause being heard by commissioners duly appointed, it was decided, that the knights templars should retain possession of their chapel, tithes, cemetery, baptistry, &c. but should pay yearly to the monks, eight and a half marks, in the house of the Temple at Blantrodock. This was agreed to at Lauder in November, 1287.‡ In the Rent Roll the value of the rectory of Culter, together with the pension of the templars, is stated at £18, 13s. 4d: In 1240, the corn tithes were let to the chaplain, Alan de Soltre, for 18 marks.§

BIRNIE. Brice Douglas, who, about the beginning of the thirteenth century, was promoted from being a monk at Kelso, to be prior of Lesmahago, and afterwards bishop of Moray, gave, with consent of his diocese, the church of Brennath to the convent, to be fully enjoyed by them, without dues or burdens. ||

King David gave them a right to the kain, or tribute, due to him from one of the ships belonging to Perth. This was afterwards commuted for the payment of three marks yearly. *

DUMFRIES. King William gave them the church of Dumfries, and the chapel of St Thomas at the same place, with the lands, tofts, and tithes, belonging to them, to which he added five acres. Ralph, the dean of Dumfries, soon after the beginning of the thirteenth century, disputed the right of the convent to this patronage, and presented his nephew, Martin, styled Clerk, to the livings; but when the case was tried, he was obliged to renounce his pretensions, and the monks, "intuitu misericordiæ," consented that his nephew should continue to hold both the church and the chapels of the burgh, and castle, during his life, upon condition of paying twenty marks annually to the convent, except when the land of Dumfries should be laid waste by war; in which case due remission would be granted. †

Roland of Galwey, the constable of Scotland, son to Uctred, gave them a salt work at LOCHKENDELOCH on the Solway, with pasture for four cows and a horse, and easements from his wood, sufficient to serve the pans. ‡

MORTON. Eadgar, the son of Dufenald of Strathnith, gave the monks the church of Morton, in presence of Killecrist, judge of Strethnith. In King William's confirmatory charter, this church, together with a plough-gate, is said to have been granted by Hugo, sine manicis. § In the Rent Roll, it is valued at £10 per annum.

KILLOSBERN, or CLOSEBURN. Eadgar, the son of Dovenald, in presence of his son Gylconell, gave the convent this church, for the safety of King William, and Alexander, his son. The right of the monks was afterwards ineffectually disputed by Sir Adam de Kirkpatrick. || They enjoyed its entire revenues, which are valued in the Rent Roll at £26, 6s. 8d.

TRAYERFLAT, or TRAILFLATT, and DRUMERYOCH, or DRUMGREY. These churches were granted by Walcherius de Carnoto, [Cairns,] for the soul of his brother Robert. ¶ In the Rent Roll, the value of Trailflat is £6, 6s. 8d, and of Drumgrey, 13s. 4d.

STAPILGORTON. William de Cuniggebure gave the monks the patronage of this church, with the land and fishery belonging to it, for the soul of his uncle, Gaufrid. King William confirmed the gift of William de

The church of WILBALDINGTON, with the property belonging to it, was granted by Adam de Port, in the time of King William, in presence of Robert, chaplain of Roxburgh, and William, chaplain of Kelso. †

Pope Innocent III. confirmed the grant of the patronage of the church of Lesingibi, in Cumberland, to the convent at Kelso. ‡

King David gave them a salt work in Karsach. King Malcolm gave them a right to half of the fat of the craspies, or whales, that might be stranded on either of the shores of the Firth of Forth. King David granted them a right to half of the skins and fat of the beasts slaughtered for his use, on the south side of the Forth, with all the skins of the rams and lambs, the tenth of the deer skins, and the tenth of the cheeses he received from his estates in Tweeddale, and of the cattle, swine, and cheese, he received from Galwey. This was afterwards partly commuted by Alexander II. for 100 shillings yearly out of the feu-duties and customs of Roxburgh. §

Alexander II. commanded that his subjects should not pound, or distrain, the cattle or property of the abbot and convent. ||

LESMAHAGO.

IN 1144, the King, with consent of the bishop of Glasgow and his clergy, granted the church and barony of Lesmahago, for the honour of God and of Saint Machutus, to the monks of Kelso, that they might found there a religious house for the maintenance of as many monks of their own order as the means provided would support, and for the hospitable reception of poor travellers; and, also, that it might be a place of refuge and protection for those who, in danger of life or limb, should flee to it, or come within the four crosses standing around it. ¶ The monks, in course of time, granted leases, or fee farms, of parts of this land to various individuals, who held them upon condition of the payment of certain sums annually.

KILMAURS. Robert, son to Wernebald, gave the church of Kilmaurs to the monks of Kelso, who granted him the privilege of fraternity. He promised, that, if ever he changed his life, it should be with their advice, and that he would leave them two parts of his substance at his death.* In 1245, William, bishop of Glasgow, confirmed the grant of this church to the priory of Lesmahago. In 1505, the Abbot Robert granted the whole of the church lands of Kilmaurs, called the Girnale Croft, to William Conynghame of Craganis, and Mariote, his wife, and their heirs, for the yearly payment of six shillings and eightpence.†

JOHN, who was chosen abbot in 1160, granted the town of Little Draffan to Robert, the son of Warnebol, for half a mark yearly. ‡

ERNALD, who became abbot in 1147, granted, with consent of the convent, to Theobald the Fleming, for two marks annually, certain lands belonging to them on the river Douglas,—“Scil. de surso de Polnele ultra le latum mos ad longum Fau, de illuc ad Hirdelaw, de illuc ad Thevisford in Mosmenin. El Corroc, et sic ad longum nigrum ford, et ita ut via jacet usque Crossford.§

He likewise granted to Lambin Asa the lands of Draffane and Dardarach for two marks and a half yearly, “in liberum et firmum feudum scil. sicut Wascellus cadit a mussa de Carnegogyl, descendit in aquam quæ vocatur Candover, et ita, Candover ascendendo, usque ad rivulum qui vocatur Smalbec, et ita, illum rivulum ascendendo, usque ad rectam transversam de rivulo illo usque ad Wascellum sub Culnegray, et ita sicut Wascellus ille descendit in Naythane, et ita sicut Naythane descendit in Clude.”||

Osbert, who became abbot in 1180, granted the vill of Dowane to Constantine, the son of Gilbert Presbiter of Lesmahago, for twenty shillings a-year.¶ In 1294, Adam de Dowane resigned his land in the barony of Lesmahago for a sum of money.** In 1301, Adam de Dowane, junior, resigned his hereditary claim to the land of Dowane, in exchange for Auchtyferdale, granted by the abbot and convent to him and his heirs.†† In 1311, Adam de Dowane, senior, resigned his land of Greenrig to the convent, for which they engaged to provide for the maintenance of him and of one servant in their house of Lesmahago.‡‡ In 1326, the Abbot William granted to John, son and heir of Adam de Dowane, junior, the land of Aghtyferdale, &c. and appointed that the said John and his heirs should be hereditary porters at the gate of the priory of Lesmahago, and, if they performed the office by a deputy, that they should be accountable for his conduct.* In 1370, Adam de Auchinlek resigned Greenrigs, &c. to the convent, who, in 1372, renewed the grant of the same for the annual payment of eight shillings and ninepence.†

Osbert granted a part of Glenane, for half a mark yearly, to Ralph, one of the servants of the priory.‡

Richard Burd gave his whole land, called Little Kyp, to Lesmahago before 1222.§

The Abbot John, who was elected in 1160, granted to his man, Waltheof, the son of Bodin, and his heirs, the third part of Auchinlek, and part of Culter Segle. He gave him also the eighth part of Curroc.||

He gave a part of Fincurroks to Gilmagu for twenty shillings yearly.¶

In 1269, William de Folkard, to avoid the pain of excommunication, and to deliver the soul of his father from the same, quitted claim to the land called Pollenelle, which his father had unjustly detained.**

The convent recovered Folkardiston from the same person in 1295.††

King Robert I. granted ten marks yearly, from the rents of the milns of Maldisley, to purchase eight wax lights, of one pound weight each, to burn at the tomb of St Machutus every Sunday and holiday, as was customary in the cathedrals and collegiate churches of Scotland.‡‡

The Abbot Patrick granted to Rothald Wer the half of Blackwodd and Dermounyston, with the whole of Mossmyne.§§

In 1497, the Abbot Robert granted Rogerhill and Brownhill to Robert Weyr, for services rendered.||||

In 1528, the Abbot Thomas sold and alienated to his dear brother, Ralph Ker, and his heirs, the lands of Blackhyll, with the mark land of Hoilhouse, in the barony of Lesmahago, William Weir of Stanebires having resigned them for a sum of money.¶¶

The different lands and manors that belonged to the convent formed a regality, or jurisdiction, over which the abbot exercised the power and authority of a baron in times of feudal government. When hereditary jurisdictions were abolished, by act of parliament, in 1747, the Duke of Roxburgh received £1300 in compensation for the regality of Kelso.

At the Reformation of religion in Scotland, when the monasteries were dissolved, the revenues of Kelso abbey, according to an account taken by the government, were as follows :—

£3716, 1s. 2d. Scots money.
 9 chalders of wheat.
 106 chald. 12 bolls of bear.
 4 chald. 11 bolls of oats.
 112 chald. 12 bolls, 3 firlots of meal.*

By the act of assumption of church revenues, in December 1561, the Scotch parliament ordained, that the fourth part of the teinds of the whole benefices within the kingdom should be levied yearly, and applied to the support of the ministers of the reformed religion, and other purposes relating to the state of the realme; and if a fourth should be found insufficient, that a third should be taken, and so on, until a sufficient provision were made for the ends proposed; the clergy, and others in possession, retaining the remainder. In consequence of this order, the revenues of all the churches and convents were inquired into and valued, when the following report was made of the yearly income of the abbey of Kelso, with the cell of Lesmahago annexed to it :—

£2495, 11s. Scots money.
 9 chalders of wheat.
 91 chald. 4 bolls of bear.
 91 chald. 4 bolls of meal.

This was “payed out of the town and lands of Kelso, Sproustone, Humber, Lawsons, Greinheid, Fauldonsyde, Lyndene, Clarilaw, Haliden, Howdons, Bowdane, Mellerstaines, &c. " The kirks of Dumfries, Closeburne, and the rest above rehearsed in Nithsdale and the West, belonged to this cell ; with the teynds of Aven-dail, Corehous, Stone-Byres, Blackwood," &c.*

A new order was issued, in 1587, to collect the king's thirds of the benefices ; and it appears by the Rent Roll, that Kelso, with Lesmahago, was to pay to the king £533, 6s. 8d.

In 1594, the revenues of Kelso, with Lesmahago, were valued at £1983, 17s. 8d.

CARTA REGIS DAVID DE PRIMA FUNDACIONE DE KALCHOU.*

DAVID Dei gratia rex illustris Scottorum, omnibus sanctae matris ecclesiae filiis et fidelibus, salutem. Notum sit omnibus presentibus et futuris, me fundasse, dum fui comes, quoddam monasterium in Selechirche ad abbatiam, in honorem sanctae Mariae virginis et sancti Johannis Evangelistae, pro salute mea, et omnium antecessorum et successorum meorum : Sed postquam, divina clementia, post obitum fratris mei, regis Alexandri, successi in regnum, consilio et ammonicione venerabilis memoriae Johannis episcopi Glasguensis, aliorumque procerum meorum, predictum monasterium, quod locus non erat conveniens abbatiae, apud Roxburgum transtuli, in ecclesiam beatae Mariae Virginis, quae sita est super ripam fluminis Twede, in loco qui dicitur Calkou ; quam ecclesiam Robertus Sancti Andreae episcopus, in cujus erat episcopatu, pro Dei amore et meo, concessit mihi et ejusdem loci abbati et monachis, solutam et quietam, et ab omni subjectione et exactione liberam ; ita, scilicet, ut abbas et monachi supradictae ecclesiae a quocunque episcopo voluerint, in Scotia vel in Cumbria, crisma suum, et oleum, et ordinationem ipsius abbatis et monachorum, et cetera ecclesiae sacramenta accipiant. Ego, vero, huic ecclesiae, in eleemosinam perpetuam, donavi villam de Kelchou, cum suis rectis divisis, in terris et in aquis, solutam, et quietam, et ab omni exactione liberam. Et quotiescunque in eadem ecclesia, in solempnitatibus vel in aliis diebus, servicium Dei audiero, omnes offerendas meas, et omnium qui mecum erunt, perpetuam dedi in eleemosinam : Et in Edinham, de molendino, xij celdras de brasio quolibet anno : Et de mora de Edynham, ad fodiendum cespites, ad faciendum ignem, a quodam fossato quod descendit de quadam alia mora, transeundo recto tramite illam moram, usque ad tres magnos lapides ex altera parte existentes. Et in burgo de Roxburgh, xl solidos de censu unoquoque anno; et omnes ecclesias et scolas ejusdem burghi, cum omnibus earum pertinenciis; et unum toftum juxta ecclesiam sancti Jacobi, et alterum in novo burgo; et terram quae fuit Gualteri Cymentarii; et in molendinis, xx celdras inter farinam et frumentum; et septinam partem piscaturae: Et in Sprouston, unam carrucatae terrae et decem acras, et maisuras carrucatae pertinentes, et tres acras de prato, et ecclesiam ejusdem villae et terram ecclesiae pertinentem, domino Johanne, episcopo Glasguensi, simul dante et episcopali auctoritate confirmante: Et villam Ravendene, sicut unquam in meo dominio eam melius habui, in terris et aquis, in pasturis de Sprouiston, et moram ad fodiendum turvas, communes hominibus de Ravendene sicut hominibus de Sprouiston: Et in Berewyc, unam carrucatae terrae, et unam maisuram carrucatae pertinentem, juxta ecclesiam Sancti Laurentii, et alteram maisuram in burgo, et xl solidos de censu ejusdem burghi unoquoque anno; et dimidiam partem unius piscaturae quae vocatur Berewyestreem, et septimam partem molendinorum. Et villam de Mydilham; et Bouldene, sicut unquam melius habui, in terris, et in bosco, in aquis et plano. Et xxx acras terrae de territorio Lyllesclef, inter Alnam et rivulum qui dividit terram de Mydilham et de Lyllescleve; et decimam molendini ejusdem villae, scil. Lyllescleve: Et Withelawe, cum suis rectis divisis, sicut eam melius habui in meo dominio. Et terram de Selkyrke, sicut rivulus descendens a montibus currit in Gierwa, usque ad rivulum illum qui descendens de Crossansmer currit in Twede; et ultra eundem rivulum qui cadit in Gierwam, quandam particulam terrae inter viam quae venit de castello, et super veterem abbathiam cadit in eundem rivulum, et Gierwam; et veterem villam, sicut unquam melius habui, in terris et in bosco, in aquis et in plano: Et aquas meas circa Selekirke, communes ad piscandum suis propriis piscatoribus ut meis; et pasturas meas, communes suis hominibus ut meis; et boscos meos domibus suis faciendis, et ad arandum, ut mihi. Et Traverlen, cum suis rectis divisis, sicut Vineth eam melius et plenius tenuit et habuit: Et craggam ejusdem villae, sicut domini abbas Alfwynus Sanctae Crucis, et Arnoldus abbas de Kalchou se ad invicem concordaverunt de quadam calumpnia, quae fuit inter eos, de ipsa craggam, coram hiis testibus: R. abbate de Newbotill et aliis. Hanc autem Traverlin dedi predictae ecclesiae de Kelchou, in excambium x libatarum terrae, quam habuerunt in Hardingesthorn, juxta Northamtoun, quam mihi accomodaverunt, ad meum magnum negotium : Et in Renfru, unum toftum, et unam navim, et piscaturam unius retis, solutam et quietam et ab omni exactione liberam. Et decimam animalium et porcorum et caseorum de can, de quatuor cadrez de illa Galweia quam, vivente rege Alexandro, habui, per unumquemque annum ; et decimam caseorum de Tweddal similiter, per unumquemque annum : Et medietatem [coriorum] coquinae, et de omnibus occisionibus meis, omniumque successorum meorum, ita ut ubicunque unum corium habuero, habeant monachi et alterum : Et similiter de unctis et sepis, sicut de coriis : Et omnes pelles arietum et agnorum : Et decimam coriorum cervorum et cervarum quos veltrarii mei capient : Hos autem redditus coquinae meae, et occisionem mearum, dedi eis pro illa terra tantum quam vivente rege Alexandro habui : Et in Karsah unam salinam : Et omnia, supradicti monasterii abbati et monachis, ita libere et pacifice jure perpetuo possidenda confirmavi, ut mihi succidentium nullus nichil omnino, nisi solas orationes ad animæ salutem, de supradicta ecclesia exigere presumat : Hiis testibus : Henrico filio regis, et aliis. Et preterea ecclesiam de Selkirke, liberam et quietam, sicut eleemosina debet dari et concedi ; ita, scil. quod predicti abbates sint capellani mei, et filii mei, et successorum meorum de predicta ecclesia.

CHARTER OF CONFIRMATION, GRANTED TO THE MONKS OF KELSO BY KING MALCOLM IV.

TRANSLATED FROM A FAC-SIMILE OF THE ORIGINAL, * PUBLISHED IN ANDERSON'S DIPLOMATA SCOTIÆ.

MALCOLM, by the grace of God, King of Scots, to all his friends, French, English, and Scots, and to all the sons of God's holy church, wisheth perpetual health. Know all men, now and hereafter, that David, King of Scots, my grandfather, of pious memory, whilst he was earl, founded an abbey at Seleschirche, in honour of the holy Virgin Mary, mother of God, and Saint John the evangelist; for the health of his own soul, and the souls of his father and mother, his brothers and sisters, and all his ancestors and successors. But when, by Divine Mercy, after the death of his brother Alexander, he succeeded him in the kingdom, by the counsel and advice of John, of revered memory, bishop of Glasgow, and his nobles, men who feared God, he removed the aforesaid abbey, because the former place was not a convenient situation for a monastery, to Roxburg, to the church of the blessed Virgin Mary, which is situated on the bank of the river Tuede, in the place which is called Kelcho. Which church, Robert, bishop of St Andrews, in whose diocese it was, from love to God, and of his own free will, granted that it should be free from all episcopal authority, insomuch, that the abbot and monks might receive their consecrated ointment and oil, † and the ordination of the abbot himself, and the monks, from whatsoever bishop they pleased, in Scotland or Cumbria. ‡ This privilege, with the other privileges and possessions which they enjoy through the liberality of my grandfather, King David, my father, Earl Henry, or my own, I concede to them, as far as my right extends, for ever, and by my royal power confirm to them for perpetual alms : viz. the town of Kelcho, with its due bounds in land and water, discharged, quit, and free from every burden ; also the land which Gerold gave me near the confines of the said town, which land comes down to the road that goes to Neithansthyrn.* And whenever I hear the service of God in that church on holidays, or other days, I confirm to the same all my offerings, and the offerings of all those who shall be with me. Also from the miln of Edenham, twelve chalders of malt every year ; and liberty to dig peats in the muir of Edenham, from the ditch that comes down from the other muir, crossing that muir in a straight direction, to the three large stones on the other side. Also forty shillings a-year from the revenue of the burgh of Rokesburg, and a toft beside the church of St James, and another in the new town, and the land which was Walter Cementars. Also the churches of the same burgh, with their land, as freely and fully as ever Acelline, the archdeacon, possessed them. Also the half toft which was Acculf's ; and twenty chalders, half meal, half wheat, at the milns ; and the seventh part of a fishing. Also in Sproston, a ploughgate of land and ten acres, with the buildings belonging to the ploughgate ; and three acres of meadow ; and the church of the same village, with the land belonging to the church : and two oxgangs of land beside Presterbridge, which I gave them in exchange for two oxgangs, with which the monks accommodated me, of the land of the church of St Laurence, at Berewic. Also the village of Ravendene,† in land and water ; and the pastures of Sproston, and the muirs for digging turfs, common as well to the inhabitants of Ravendene as to those of Sproston. Also, in Berewich, a ploughgate of land, and a dwelling belonging to the same, beside the church of St Laurence ; and another dwelling in the burgh, and forty shillings out of the revenue of the same burgh yearly ; and the half of a fishing, which is called Berewiestrem. Also the seventh part of the milns, and the land of Dodin, in the same town, and the land of Waltheof, the son of Ernobold. Also the village of Middleham, and Botheldene,‡ with their due bounds in lands and waters, in woods and cleared ground. Also thirty acres of land in the domains of Lillesclive, * between the Alna and the brook that divides the grounds of Middleham and Lillesclive; and the tithes of the miln of the same village, viz. Lillesclive. Also Whitelaw and Whitemere, with their due bounds; and the land of Seleschirche, with its due bounds, in lands and waters, in woods and cleared ground; and my waters about Seleschirche, as free to them to fish in with their fishermen, as to me with mine; and my pastures, as free to their people as to mine; and my woods for building their houses and for fuel, as free to them as to me. Also the church of the other Seleschirche, with half a ploughgate of land; and the church and land of Lesmahagu, with its due bounds; and Traverlin, † with its due bounds, as Vineth fully and freely possessed and enjoyed it, with all the easements of the adjoining strother, ‡ which is called Cameri; and the crag of the same village, [as the Lord Alswin, abbot of Halyrude, and Ernald, abbot of Kelso, came to a mutual agreement concerning a dispute which was between them about that same crag—before these witnesses, Ralph, abbot of Newbottle; William, abbot of Strevelin; Osbert, prior of Jeddeword; Richard, the clerk; Machbet.] For my grandfather gave this Traverlin to the foresaid church of Kelcho, in exchange for the ten-pounds-land which they had in Hardiggasthorn, near Northamton. Also, in Rinfric, a toft and one net, exempted, quit, and free from all customs; and, in Edinburg, a toft; and in Pebbles a toft; and in Lannarch a toft; and the church of Keth; § and half of the fat of the craspies || that shall have been stranded in the Forth. Also the tenth of the beasts, and swine, and kain ¶ cheese of that part of Galwey, which my grandfather had during the lifetime of King Alexander; and the tenth of the cheeses of Tuedale, in like manner annually; and the half of the hides of all the beasts slaughtered for my kitchen, so that whenever I, or any of my successors, have one hide, the monks may have another. And they shall have a like share of the suet

These products of my kitchen, and my slain beasts, the monks shall have over all that territory only which my grandfather possessed when King Alexander was alive. Also a salt work in Karsach. Likewise, as far as it depends upon me, I grant and confirm to the said church, by the gift of Earl Gospatric, the church of Hom, with two ploughgates of land and a meadow, in the precincts of the same village ; also the church of Fogho, with a ploughgate of land ; the church of Macchuswel,* by the gift of Herbert de Macchuswell ; the church of Simprig, by the gift of Hye, and his son Peter ; the church of St Laurence of Berewic, by the gift of Robert, the son of William ; the church of Malcarvaston,† with a ploughgate of land, by the gift of Walter Corbeth ; the church of Molla,‡ with the adjacent land, by the gift of Uctred of Molla ; the church of Witha's-town,§ by the gift of Witha ; the church of Cambusneithan,§ by the gift of William Finemund ; and the church of Lintonrutheric, by the gift of Richard Cumin. All the above-named lands and possessions, therefore, I grant to the church of the blessed Virgin Mary of Kelcho, and to the monks serving God there ; to be freely and peaceably enjoyed by perpetual right ; and by this my charter I confirm the same to them, as perpetual alms ; so that none of my successors shall presume to demand any thing of the foresaid church, or any of its possessions, but only prayers for the good of their souls. And this charter is confirmed in the year one thousand one hundred and fifty-nine after the incarnation of the Lord ; the following persons being witnesses : Herbert, bishop of Glasgow ; William, bishop of Moray ; Gregory, bishop

* The vestiges of the ancient church of Maxwel are still visible in the field called Bridge-end-park, at the junction of the Tweed and Teviot, opposite Kelso. This parish, with that of St James's of Roxburgh, was united to the parish of Kelso after the Reformation. The foundations of St James's church, also, can still be traced on the banks of the Tweed opposite Fleurs. In 1232, the bishop of Glasgow confirmed to the monks of Kelso the church of Maxwel, and the chapel of Harlaw, in the same parish. This chapel, which was founded by Herbert de Maccuswel, and dedicated to St Thomas, was situated near Wooden burn, in the field still called Chapel.

* The original MS. of this curious document is written in the same manner, and bound in the same volume, with the Chartulary of Kelso, in the Advocates' Library in Edinburgh. At the end of Macfarlane's transcript of the same, there is the following remark:—" 'Tis pretty evident, at least very probable, that this rental of the abbacy of Kelso has been written before anno 1316. For the church of Cranston is mentioned therein as belonging then to the abbacy of Kelso, to which it appears they had no manner of title after the year 1316, for then they excambed it with William Lamberton, bishop of St Andrews, for the church of Nenthorn, which church would have been mentioned in this rental, if it had been written after the excambion." To this may be added, that, as it does not mention the church of Eglismalesoks, in Clydesdale, which was granted to the convent by King Robert I, in 1309, it must have been written before that period. ### HISTORY OF THE MONASTERY OF MELROS.

OLD MELROS.

THE monastery of Old Melros was beautifully situated on the south side of the river Tweed, which, taking a remarkable sweep, nearly encircles the ground on which it stood. The smooth sloping sides of this river peninsula, which rises to a gentle eminence in the centre, are gracefully contrasted with the opposite banks, which are high, abrupt, rocky, fringed with wild shrubs, and overhung with woods. In ancient times, when all the surrounding country was a thick forest, this spot is said to have presented an open surface of green turf, whence it derived its name, which is compounded of two Celtic words, mull, signifying bare, and rhos, a promontory. The agreeableness of the place, no less than its retired situation, must have recommended it to the missionaries, who, settling here, first instructed the inhabitants of this part of Britain in the knowledge of the Christian religion.

In the year 635, Oswald, the Anglo-Saxon king of Northumberland, whose dominions extended from the river Humber to the Firth of Forth, having embraced the religion of the gospel, while, during the misfortunes of his family, he enjoyed an asylum among the Scots or Picts, prevailed upon several of the brethren of the Culdee monastery of St Colomba, in the island of Hy, commonly called I-colm-kil, to come and assist him in his endeavours to convert his subjects. When he had built them a monastery, and established an episcopal see in Lindisfarne, since called Holy Island, in the neighbourhood of his royal castle of Bamburgh, Aidan, one of the missionaries, was invested with the united offices of bishop and abbot. So zealous was the king, that he in person assisted Aidan in his charitable office; and when the bishop, who was at first ignorant of the Saxon tongue, preached to the people in his native language, Oswald stood by and interpreted. Twelve Saxon youths, whom Aidan himself instructed with peculiar care, became proficient in religious learning, and were afterwards his fellow-labourers in converting their countrymen.* In course of time, churches were built, and societies of priests or monks were settled in different parts of the country, to exercise their sacred function in instructing the people, and celebrating religious worship. One of these religious fellowships was established at Old Melros on the Tweed, and another at Coldingham, in the Mers. It is very probable, that a society of the same kind was likewise settled at Jedburgh about this time, although no account has reached us concerning the origin of the church, which is known to have been in existence there two centuries later, in the time of Bishop Ezred, when he built the two towns called Jedworth.†

EATA, one of the twelve Saxon disciples of Bishop Aidan, was the first abbot of Melros; and, under him, the office of prior was held by Boisil, better known by the name of St Boswell, who is said to have excelled the rest of the brotherhood in sanctity and spiritual gifts.‡

Upon the death of bishop Aidan, in the year 651, he was succeeded by Finan, one of the monks who had accompanied him from I-colm-kil.§

* BEDÆ Hist. Ecclesiast. Simeon Dunelm, Lib. i. cap. 1.

† The author takes this opportunity to correct and apologize for an error in page 6 of this work, where, in speaking of Kennoch, abbot of Jedburgh, he has inadvertently stated, that "we are not informed at what period he lived." Upon a re-examination of the authority there referred to, he finds it asserted, that St Kennoch lived in 1000, which, if it is true, makes the inference unavoidable, that there must have been a monastic establishment at Jedburgh prior to that founded by David I.

‡ Ric. Hagustold, apud x. Scriptores à Treysden. Col. 294.

§ Finan died in 661, and was succeeded by Colman, another of the Scottish monks, who, in 664, displeased with King Oswy for the countenance and support he gave to the encroachments of the bishop of Rome, whose ambitious pretensions to spiritual supremacy over the universal church were now, for the first time, asserted in this part of Britain, returned to Scotland with thirty of the Saxon monks, and as many of his countrymen as adhered to his opinions. At his departure, he is said to have requested the king to appoint Eata to succeed him. Sim. Dunelm, Lib. i. cap. 5.

About the same time, the brethren at Melros were joined by Cuthbert, a name celebrated in the legends of monachism. He was a youth, and followed the peaceful occupation of a shepherd, on the banks of the Leader, a small river which flows into the Tweed, a little above the monastery, on the opposite side, when he is said to have beheld the soul of the holy bishop of Lindisfarne borne up in triumph to heaven by a company of angels. Under the impressions caused by this vision, he laid aside all care for the affairs of the world ; and, resolving to devote himself entirely to a religious life, joined the society at Melros, and embraced their rules of life and discipline. During his noviciate, he was carefully instructed in divine learning by St Boisil, with whom, on account of his excellent qualities, he was a peculiar favourite. A copy of the Scriptures, in which he used to read while the prior taught him, was long preserved, uninjured by time, among other venerated relics in the cathedral at Durham.*

Some time after these events, Eata went to assist Alehfrid, son to Oswy,† King of Northumberland, in founding and establishing a monastery at Ripon, in Yorkshire. He took with him a company of the monks of Melros, from whom he selected Cuthbert, and made him prior of Ripon, himself having been appointed abbot. Afterwards, when required by Alehfrid to submit to the authority of the bishop of Rome, with regard to the time of keeping the festival of Easter, and other religious ceremonies, rather than comply, they all left Ripon, and returned to Melros, in the year 661, where Eata resumed his former office ; and Boisil, who had been

* Sim. Dunelm, i. 3. Butler, in his Lives of the Roman Catholic Saints, speaks of a copy of St John's Gospel which Cuthbert, after the example of his master, Boisil, often read, which was put into his coffin when he was buried, and, long afterwards, was found in his tomb. "It is now," says he, "in the possession of Mr Thomas Philips, canon of Tongres, on whom the present Earl of Litchfield bestowed it." Vol. iii. 224. "In the British Museum, [Nero, D. 4.] is another MS. of the Gospels, beautifully written about the year 686 by Eadfrid, who was afterwards bishop of Lindisfarne. Ethelwald, his successor, illuminated it with several elegant drawings. By the anachoret Bilfrith it was covered with gems, silver gilt, and gold, in honour of St Cuthbert ; and Aldred, the priest, afterwards added an interlineary version. During the removal of St Cuthbert's body in 885, this copy was lost in the sea, but recovered three days afterwards. If we may credit Simeon of Durham, [p. 117,] it had not been injured by the water ; but Mr Wanley thought he could discover some stains. It is still in the best preservation." abbot during his absence, again became prior. The latter died, three years after, of the great plague, known by the name of "the yellow pestilence," which, after desolating the other countries of Europe, spread into Britain, and visited the northern part of the island in the summer of 664.* Agreeably to his dying request, his favourite disciple, Cuthbert, who is said to have been recently restored to health by his prayers, and those of his fellow monks, succeeded him in the priorate; but he resigned it the same year, being appointed prior of Lindisfarne by Eata, who became abbot of that monastery upon the resignation of Colman.† The offices of bishop, and abbot of Lindisfarne, which had hitherto been united, were now made separate charges; and Tuda, one of the original Culdee missionaries from I-colm-kil, was made bishop, who, dying of the plague the same year, was succeeded by Ceadda, or Chad, one of the Saxon disciples of bishop Aidan. In the time of his short episcopate, the bishop's see was removed to York, which was not yet erected into a separate diocese, but included within that of Lindisfarne. Chad was translated to Litchfield the same year; and Wilfrid, abbot of Ripon, who had been preceptor to Alchfrid, King Oswy's son, succeeded him in the episcopal charge at York. This bishop, having given offence to Egfrid, who was now king, was deposed, at his instance, by Theodore, archbishop of Canterbury, in 678; and, at the same time, his extensive diocese was divided into two; the see of Lindisfarne being restored, and the episcopal care of it committed to the abbot Eata.‡ Lindisfarne was again diminished in 680, when Hexham was formed into a separate diocese, with the charge of which Tumbert was invested by Archbishop Theodore, who was then strenuously endeavouring to establish the authority of his own see over all the churches in England. Tumbert afterwards incurred the archbishop's hostility, by denying his jurisdiction over the northern churches, and was deposed by him from the see of Hexham, in a council of the clergy, held at Twiford, on the river Alne, in 684, at which King Egfrid was present.§

Cuthbert, who had resigned his priorate in 676, and had ever since led an austere and solitary life, in the rocky and barren isle of Farne, situated about four miles off the shore of Northumberland, was now called to the see of Hexham, but could not be prevailed upon to leave his solitude. The bishopric of Lindisfarne, however, being offered, he accepted it, and was consecrated at York, on Easter day, 685, by Theodore, attended by seven other bishops. Eata was, at the same time, translated to Hexham, where he died the following year.* According to Dempster, he was the author of a book of homilies, and composed a system of monastic rules, for the regulation of his convent.† In the beginning of 687, Cuthbert returned to his hermitage in the isle of Farne, and died there about two months after.

It was about this period that the austere visionary Dryethelme, retired to the monastery of Melros, where he spent the remainder of his life in the exercise of the most rigorous voluntary penance. Of this man it is related, that, in a severe fit of illness, he became, towards evening, to all appearance lifeless; and, upon his recovery in the morning, believed that he had actually passed a whole night in the state of the dead. During this interval, it seemed to him that he was conducted through the abodes of departed spirits, and beheld the places of punishment, of purgatorial chastisement, and of bliss. Awaking from his trance, to the amazement and terror of those who, thinking him dead, watched his corpse, he gradually recovered his health, but from this time his character seemed totally changed. Leaving off all his former pursuits and pleasures, and disregarding the common concerns of life, he soon afterwards made a division of his substance, and, having given a third part of it to the poor, and the remainder to his family, he embraced the monastic life at Melros, where he obtained from the abbot a cell apart from the other monks. Among other methods by which he sought to mitigate the pains of purgatory by anticipating them, it was his daily practice to immerse himself in the river Tweed, even in the depth of winter, without undressing himself, or afterwards changing his wet garments. When asked how he could endure such a painful degree of cold, he commonly answered, that “he had witnessed greater cold and pain.” The account he gave of his vision was as follows: “Methought a person, arrayed in shining garments, with a bright and serene countenance, suddenly stood before me, and commanded me to follow him. We proceeded in silence towards the southeast, until we came to a valley of vast extent and depth, in one side of which were dismal fires, and in the other rattling hail showers, and furious blasts of wintry wind. In this valley were confined innumerable souls of men, which were seen incessantly darting across from the one side to the other, seeking relief from one extremity of pain by rushing into its opposite. Surely, thought I, this place must be hell; but my guide, knowing my thoughts, said, 'You are mistaken, this is not Hell.' We again set forward, and darkness gradually closed around us as we advanced, till at last I could see nothing but the resplendent person of my conductor. Soon, however, lurid and uncertain gleams of light appeared at a distance; and, approaching, I beheld a deep pit emitting vapour and sulphurous flames. Here my guide forsook me before I was aware, and left me alone. As I continued to gaze at the flames that rose out of the pit, I soon perceived that they were full of the souls of men, which alternately shot up into the air, and sunk down again, like burning sparks. A foul stench that rose from the fiery abyss poisoned the air. Behind me were heard woeful cries of despair; and, looking round, I saw a company of demons, with insulting laughter, dragging five miserable souls to the place of torment, one of whom appeared, from his shaven crown, to be an ecclesiastic. The accursed spirits dragged them into the midst of the flaming gulf, while I stood in fearful amazement, and heard the laughter of the demons, and the wailing of the souls, grow fainter and fainter as they sunk. Then there arose out of the place of torment certain accursed spirits, with glaring eyes and breath of flame, armed with red hot pincers, with which they in vain essayed to lay hold of me, being withheld, as it seemed, by some invisible power. Terrified by their menacing gestures, I looked round for help, when a twinkling star appeared at a distance, at sight of which, as it rapidly approached, and increased in brightness, the malignant spirits fled away. It was my celestial guide, who immediately turning to the right, conducted me in a northeasterly direction to a region of clear light, where I saw before me a wall of immeasurable extent and height, which seemed an insuperable bar to our farther progress. On a sudden, we were transported to the summit, whence I beheld an extensive and delightful country, where the ground was enamelled with the most beautiful flowers, that with their sweet scents perfumed the pure air. Innumerable groups of blessed souls were seen under the leafy canopy of the woods and in the open meads, with looks in unison with the loveliness of the place. As I traversed this happy region, and mingled with its inhabitants, I could not help thinking, that surely this can be none other than the kingdom of heaven; but my guide again corrected my thoughts, and led me to the confines of another region, where I heard the most ravishing vocal melody, and where the brightness and serenity of the sky, and the beauty and fragrance of the trees and flowers, exceeded, beyond comparison, what I had already beheld. I stood expecting that my guide would conduct me into this blessed place; but he suddenly turned round, and, leading me back by the way we came, explained to me as we went the things I had seen. ‘In the valley of fire and frost,’ said he, ‘the souls of those persons are chastised and purified who, although they led wicked lives, yet had recourse to the mercy of God when at the point of death. At the day of judgment they will be admitted into heaven, and even before that period many of them will be released through the efficacy of the alms, fasting, and prayers of the living, and especially through the celebration of masses. The flaming pit you saw is the mouth of hell, where the impenitent shall be tormented for ever. Those who have done good in their lives, but have not attained to that perfection which would entitle them to receive at once the highest reward, are admitted into the happy region you passed through, there to remain till the last day, when the gates of heaven shall be opened to them. But those who are perfect in thought, word, and deed, shall enter through the gates into that blessed city as soon as they die. It is situated hard by the place where you were so greatly charmed and delighted with the sweet melody of voices, and the exquisite fragrance and beauty of the flowers. In the short interval during which you were left alone near the place of torment, I was gone to inquire what might be decreed concerning you, and have learned that you are now to return to life. Let your conduct henceforward be such, that when you die you may be immediately admitted into the company of those happy spirits whom you beheld.’ Here my guide was silent, and I felt great reluctance to return to life; but, in a moment afterwards, I found myself restored to my family.” Such is the account of this extraordinary dream, given by the learned and venerable Bede, on the authority of Englis, a priest of Melros, who affirmed that he received it from Dryethelme himself, who condescended to relate it to such persons only as were disposed to reap edification from it; which probably means those who were disposed to give credit to it. Among this number was Alchfrid, King of Northumberland, by whose influence the visionary was admitted into the monastery at Melros, and who was accustomed frequently to visit and converse with him there.

* Sim. Dunelm., i. 9.

Of the abbots of Old Melros, after this period, only a few of the names, and some other unimportant particulars, occur in the old writers; and it is sometimes difficult to ascertain, consistently, the times in which they lived.

ODUNALD, a saint, commemorated on the 26th of June, may probably be placed first. It is recorded of him, that when at the point of death, an angel appeared to him, and encouraged him with the assurance of eternal glory.*

ETHELWALD, also a saint, and, according to Bede, a disciple of St Cuthbert, became abbot in 696, and presided till 724, when he was elected bishop of Lindisfarne, in which situation he continued till his death in 740. He is said to have written a Life of St Cuthbert, and a Treatise on the Succession of the Abbots of Mailros.† About this time lived Winfrid, better known by the title of St Boniface, the apostle of the Germans, who is stated, though without sufficient appearance of truth, to have been a Scotsman, and educated in the monastery at Melros.‡ He began his labours as a missionary among the Germans in 715, and continued there till 755, when he was murdered, with fifty of his converts, by the savage inhabitants of Friesland, after he had succeeded in planting the religion of the gospel, together with the innovations introduced into it by the Roman church, in many of the provinces of Germany. He was appointed archbishop of Mentz, and primate of Germany and Belgium, by Pope Zachary, in 746. He had a curious dispute with Virgilius, an Irish missionary, on the subject of the antipodes, the existence of which Boniface denied. In his defence of the celibacy of the clergy, and other papal dogmas, he was opposed by three Scotsmen, Claudius Clement, Samson, and John of Mailros. The last mentioned theologian is said to have been appointed abbot of the Benedictine convent at Pavia, by Charlemagne, and to have died there in 792.§

THEVUAN, who was commemorated as a saint on the 26th September, long presided as abbot of Melros, where he may have been Ethelwald's immediate successor, in 724. He is mentioned as having been counsellor to Eugenius VI. King of Scots, who reigned from 699 to 717, and successfully employed by him both in religious and civil affairs.* St Gailbald, or Gowibald, the first bishop of Ratisbon, is said to have been a missionary from the convent at Melros, and distinguished for his eloquence as a preacher, and his knowledge of the Scriptures, about the year 780.†

The monastery was burned, in 839, by Kenneth II. King of Scots, who, after he had subdued the Pictish kingdom, invaded the country of the Saxons six different times.‡ During the frequent wars with the Danish invaders, which subsequently afflicted this part of the island, it is probable that the monks did not find it easy or expedient to rebuild their cells. The commentator, or interpolator of Nennius, the British historian, speaks of the monastery at Melros as having been formerly great and renowned. Nicolson, in his English Historical Library, makes it appear probable that Nennius wrote in 828. But it is uncertain when these interpolations were added, although their reputed author, Samuel Beulanius, is said by Dempster, who places him in the year 640, to have spent the latter part of his life in the monastery at Melros.§ The buildings were probably restored and inhabited before 875, as in that year it became one of the resting-places of the body of St Cuthbert, when it was removed from its sepulchre at Lindisfarne, on account of the invasion of the Danes; and being, it was said, uncorrupted, was transferred from place to place, by seven of the monks, for safety, during seven years. It was at last suffered to rest some time at Chester-le-Street, whence it was afterwards removed to the cathedral at Durham, where it continued to be regarded with superstitious veneration, and miracles were believed to have been wrought by means of it, until the period of the Reformation of religion, when it appears to have been buried in the cathedral.|| The manner of its removal from Melros is sufficiently wonderful, for it is traditionally reported to have floated in a stone coffin down the Tweed to Tillmouth, where it stopped of itself. The ruins of a chapel may still be traced on the bank of the river where it was landed, and the alleged stone coffin was to be seen there till a recent period.*

WILLIAM DOUGLAS was abbot of Melros in the beginning of the eleventh century, if we may believe Dempster, who states it on the authority of a fragment of a catalogue of the abbots of this monastery, which he had probably seen. He is said to have been a favourite of St Fothad, bishop of St Andrews, who died in 962; and of Grime, King of Scots, who died in 1003. The cloister of his monastery was built by him, at his own expense. He became confessor to Malcolm II, who succeeded King Grime, and he was still alive in 1011. He is said to have written De Proelio ad Achhabart, Lib. I. Pro Malcolmno Rege, Lib. I. †

In the time of Bishop Eadmond, who was preferred to the see of Durham, in 1020, one of the priests of the cathedral, named Ælfrid, a man no less remarkable for his moral virtues, than for his religious zeal, and his superstitious belief in the efficacy of relics; being, as he thought, directed by a vision to collect the bones of divers holy persons buried in the ancient and ruined churches of Northumberland, paid a visit of research to Melros, and, having taken up the remains of St Boisil, he carried them away, and placed them in a shrine, near that of St Cuthbert, at Durham. ‡ cathedral, so artfully contrived as to elude the most diligent and scrutinizing search. There it was believed to remain uncorrupted, to be again enshrined and venerated when the papal form of religion should be restored. The secret of its hiding place was supposed to be still preserved by three priests of that persuasion; and when one of the number died, the survivors chose another in his stead, to whom to confide it. It appears, however, that the important secret is now divulged. The following account of its accidental discovery was published in the Durham Advertiser, May 1827.—“In carrying into effect certain alterations at the eastern end of the cathedral here, and in that part known as the chapel of the nine altars, an old oaken coffin was found, containing the remains of some distinguished personage, believed to be no other than the patron saint, St Cuthbert. The skeleton was found to be remarkably perfect, and enclosed in the remains of robes richly worked with gold. A large and bright gold ring, having a crucifix, apparently of silver, appended, was found lying on the breast; and below it the remains of a book: a large comb was also found in the coffin. The wood of which the coffin was composed, was about three inches in thickness, and strongly clamped with bars of iron.”

Melros was a desolate and ruined place in 1073, about which time it became again, for a short period, the retreat of a few monks, among whom was Turgot, the historian, afterwards bishop of St Andrews. They were under the conduct of Aldwine, prior of Wincelcombe, in Gloucestershire, who, with two associates brought from that monastery, had instituted a peculiarly strict rule of discipline at Girwy, now called Jarrow, in the county of Durham, before they removed to Melros. Here, being required by King Malcolm III. to swear allegiance to him, they refused, upon the ground that they could not do so consistently with their obligation to observe the precept of the gospel; whence it may be conjectured, that they understood the words of our Saviour, Matt. v. 34, 37, in the same sense in which they are taken by the Society of Friends in the present day. In consequence of this refusal, they received from the king such proofs of his displeasure, that they considered themselves unjustly aggrieved and persecuted. In the meanwhile, Bishop Walcher having sent, at different times, to entreat and command them to return to Durham, and now threatening them with excommunication if they did not obey him, they reluctantly quitted Melros, in 1075, and were soon after settled by the bishop at Monkwearmouth, when, with his assistance, they restored the ancient monastery there from the ruinous state in which it had been left by the Danish invaders.*

The few occasional notices that are met with concerning the religious foundation at Old Melros, subsequently to this period, speak of it only as a chapel, dedicated in honour of St Cuthbert, and much resorted to by devout pilgrims. Tradition formerly spoke of a sacred way, called the Girthgate, having the privilege of a sanctuary, leading to it from the more populous parts of the kingdom towards the north, traces of which are said to be still visible.† Before 1136, St Cuthbert's chapel was a dependency of the priory of Coldingham, on which it was probably conferred by King Edgar, when he rebuilt that monastery, in the year 1098. King David recovered it from Coldingham, in 1136, by giving the church at Berwick in exchange for it, when he annexed it to the new monastery of Melros, which he founded about two miles higher up the river Tweed. It appears, from the Chartulary of Melros Abbey, that Petrus de Haga, laird of Bemerside, who died in the reign of King Alexander III, engaged to pay to the chapel of St Cuthbert, at Old Melros, on St Cuthbert's day, annually, half a stone of wax, or thirty pence instead thereof, to light the said chapel, as a composition for certain trespasses committed by him, and persons belonging to him, against the convent. This payment was in commutation of five fresh and five dried salmon, which he had previously been obliged to pay to the convent yearly, for the same trespasses. Among the witnesses to this engagement are Oliver, abbot of Dryburgh; Thomas Rymor of Ercildoun; and Hugh de Perisby, sheriff of Roxburgh.*

This chapel was destroyed by the English in the reign of Robert I. In 1321, Symon, bishop of Galloway, published an indulgence of forty days' remission of the penance enjoined them, to all persons who should, with the consent of their ordinary, make a devout pilgrimage to the chapel of St Cuthbert, at Old Melros, or should contribute of their substance to rebuild the same, which had lately been burned by the English. † Pope Martin V, who held the Roman see from 1417 till 1431, granted to all persons who should make a pilgrimage to the said chapel, and should contribute by their alms towards its support, a similar remission of penance on all the festivals of St Cuthbert, and certain other holidays, for seven years, and as many Lents. ‡

The estate of Old Melros was long possessed by a family of the name of Ormestoun.* It is now the property of William Elliot Lockhart, Esq. who has a house there, delightfully situated.

The ancient convent was secured by a wall drawn across the narrowest part of the peninsula. The foundations of this wall were still visible in the lifetime of the Rev. Adam Milne, who published, in 1748, an account of the parish of Melros, of which he was minister. The entrance to the monastery was about the middle of the wall, where had been a house, called the Red house, apparently the dwelling of the porter. Other memorials of its ancient state are found in the names of certain spots. The place where St Cuthbert's chapel stood, is still called "the chapel knoll;" and there are places in the Tweed called "the haly wheel," and "the monk's ford."†

† MILNE.

HISTORY OF THE ABBEY OF MELROS.

MELROS is situated on the south side of the Tweed, about eighteen miles above the point where that river begins to form the boundary between North and South Britain. The vale of the Tweed is every where fertile and beautiful; and here grandeur is combined with beauty and fertility. The eye is presented with a wide range of pleasing and impressive scenery—of villages and hamlets; the river, winding rapidly among smiling fields and orchards; the town, with its groves, and gardens, and neat rural church; wooded acclivities, and steep pastoral slopes, crowned with the shapely summits of majestic hills,—forming a richly diversified and striking panorama; not to speak of the elegant and graceful remains of the ancient abbey, the sight of which conveys a deep interest to the mind, carries it back through ages and events long past, and leads to sober reflections on the vicissitude of human affairs, and the instability of human institutions. Towards the north, the valley is bounded by a hilly tract lying between the rivers Leader and Gala, and intersected by the Allan. The name of Wedale, or, as it has been interpreted, the Vale of Woe,* was anciently given to this district, though it seems originally to have belonged only to the little valley of the Allan : perhaps, a battle, fought there at some remote period, may have given rise to the appellation. It was, in ancient times, a royal forest, in which the monks of Melros, and the bishop of St Andrews, had extensive, but imperfectly defined, privileges and possessions, which gave occasion to frequent disputes, and were even the cause of tumult and bloodshed, between their herdsmen and servants. It now forms a large division of the parish of Melros. On the south, the vale is bounded by the Eildon Hills, rising from one extensive base into three finely shaped summits, 1330 feet in height. At their northern base, lies the small town of Melros, the streets of which diverge in the form of a St Andrew's cross ; on the side of which, next the river, and about a furlong from its banks, are the gray ruins of the abbey.

* Vallis doloris, NENNII, Hist. Britonum, cap. lxiii. apud GALE, Scriptores Rer. Angl. vol. i. Nennius speaks of a cross, made at Jerusalem, after the likeness of the real cross of Christ, which King Arthur carried on his shoulders when he defeated the Pagans at Castle Gunnion. The interpolator, who seems to have written marginal notes, which were afterwards admitted into the text by the transcribers, says, that a fragment of this cross was still preserved with great veneration in Wedale.

When King David I. laid the foundations of this abbey, in the year 1136, the ground on which the town of Melros now stands was occupied by a village, called Fordel.* It may be conjectured that the king at first intended to restore the religious house of Melros to its original site, two miles farther down the Tweed ; and that, when he afterwards saw reason to prefer the present situation, he named it after the ancient monastery. The monks were of the reformed class, called Cistertians, from their having established their first and chief monastery at Cisteaux, in France, in the year 1098, when they revived the strict observance of the rules for the monastic life, instituted by St Benedict, at Monte Cassino, in Italy, above five centuries before. According to those rules, which had fallen into general neglect and disuse, they were obliged to perform their devotions together, seven times every four and twenty hours. "The Nocturnal, the first of these services, was performed at two o'clock in the morning ; 2. Matins, or Prime, at six o'clock ; 3. Tierce, at nine o'clock ; 4. The Sexte, at twelve o'clock ; 5. The None, at three in the afternoon ; 6. Vespers, at six o'clock in the evening ; and, 7. The Compline, which was said after seven. As the monks went to bed at eight, they had six hours to sleep before the nocturnal service began. If they betook themselves again to rest after that service, it was not reckoned a fault ; but after matins, they were not allowed that liberty. At the tolling of the bell for prayers, they were immediately to leave off whatever business they happened to be engaged in ; and even those who copied books, or were employed in any kind of writing, if they had begun a text letter, were not allowed to finish it. They were to fast every day in Lent till six in the evening. During meals, the Scriptures were read to them by one of the brethren, who performed this, and certain other offices, by weekly turns. After the compline, they were not allowed to talk, but went to bed immediately. They all slept in the same dormitory, which was a long room, not divided into separate cells ; and each monk had a bed to himself, furnished with a mat, blanket, coverlet, and pillow, which was prescribed to be only a foot and a half long. When any of them went abroad, they were obliged always to go two together, to guard and witness each other's conduct, and to prompt each other to good thoughts." *

At a general chapter of the Cistercian order held in the year 1134, it was resolved, that the rules of St Benedict, with regard to food, clothing, morals, and divine service, should continue to be observed ; and at the same time many new regulations, which afterwards proved ineffectual, were added, with a view to suppress and prevent luxury. It was directed that their monasteries should be situated in the most retired and solitary places. The monks were to live by the labour of their hands in cultivating the earth and keeping cattle. They might therefore possess lands, water, woods, vineyards, and meadows ; with sheep, oxen, horses, and other domestic animals ; but they were not allowed to have deer, bears, or such other animals as are kept for mere amusement.† They were forbidden to possess tithes, the advowsons and revenues of churches, dues of ovens or milns, bondservants, or even rents of land. The reason for this was, that they might not live by the labour of others ; yet upon the pretext of enabling the monks to live in greater retirement and abstraction from the world, they were allowed to admit into their community a certain number of lay brethren, sometimes called converts, whose office consisted in managing the secular business of the convent, including the cultivation of their land, in which they might also be assisted by hired servants. These lay brethren did not take the monastic vow ; but in every other respect they were treated exactly like the monks. The dress of the Cisterians was a white cassock, with a narrow scapulary, over which they wore a black gown when they went abroad, but a white one when they went to church. They also wore hoods of plain cloth, fustian, or linen. The sumptuary regulations extended even to the ornaments of their churches and the vestments of the ministers. The altar cloth, the alb, and the amice, were to be of plain linen. The stole and maniple, which at first were of cloth, were afterwards allowed to be of silk. Palls, capes, dalmatics, and tunics, were forbidden. The crosses were to be of wood, painted ; and it was forbidden to have them of carved work, or silver, or gold. The cruets for the service of the altar were not to be of gold or silver. The chalice and fistula might be of silver gilt, the candlesticks were to be of iron, and the censers of iron or copper. Pictures and painted glass were not to be allowed in their churches. All the churches in monasteries of this order were dedicated to God, under the invocation of the Virgin Mary. *

With respect to their food, variety of dishes was forbidden. Flesh was allowed only to the sick. Even fish, eggs, milk, butter, and cheese, were not to be used on common days, but were only allowed on particular occasions, as pittances, or dainties. None but their guests, and the sick, were allowed any other than brown bread. They might use the common herbs of the country ; but pepper and other foreign spices were forbidden. †

No convent was permitted to send forth a colony to found a new monastery, unless the community consisted of at least sixty monks, and unless licence was also obtained, both from the general chapter, and from the archbishop or bishop. The monastery was to consist of at least twelve monks and their superior. Before they could be brought to their new residence, the buildings required for their immediate accommodation were to be provided ; namely, an oratory, a refectory, a dormitory, a stranger's cell, and a porter's lodge. The books required in divine service were also to be got ready. The superior of the new establishment was bound to pay a visit to the parent monastery once a-year ; and the abbots of all the monasteries of the Cistercian order were obliged to attend the general chapter held annually at Cîteaux ; except those who were excused on account of sickness or distance. Abbots in Scotland, Ireland, and Sicily, were obliged to be present only every fourth year. In some cases it was even allowed to send delegates. *

No person desirous of becoming a monk was suffered to enter upon his noviciate under fifteen years of age. The candidate having made his petition to be admitted, was, after four days, brought before the abbot and a select number of the monks, in the chapter-house, where he threw himself down with his face to the ground. Being asked by the abbot what he wanted, he replied, "The mercy of God, and yours." Upon this the abbot made him stand up, and explained to him the strictness of the rules, and the self-denial required in keeping them ; after which he asked him if he was willing to submit to the restraints they imposed. Upon his replying in the affirmative, the abbot again admonished him, and when he concluded with these words, "May God finish the good work that he hath begun in thee!" all the rest who were present said Amen, and the candidate bowed, and retired to the guest chamber. A similar ceremony was observed when he was again introduced into the chapter-house the next day, after having read the rules of the order. On the third day he was admitted into the cell of the novices, and began the year of his probation ; during which he was instructed, and prepared for taking the vows, by a person called the Master of the novices, who was usually one of the oldest, and most learned of the monks. At the conclusion of the year, when it was considered that he had had a sufficient trial of their discipline and manner of life, he was again formally interrogated ; and, if he persisted in his request, he was then allowed to make his profession, and became a regular member of the order. †

The Cistercians took considerable pains to cultivate and promote learning: The transcribing of books was one of the principal occupations in all their monasteries. A certain number of the brethren were constantly employed in the Scriptorium, or writing room, in making copies of the most esteemed works, to furnish and augment the common library. None, however, were permitted to write new books without first obtaining a licence to that effect from the general chapter. In the principal monasteries a chronicle was kept, in which the monks recorded, in the Latin language, the most remarkable events, both of general and local interest, that occurred within their knowledge. The Chronicle of Melros abbey, or rather a considerable part of it, was fortunately preserved from that destruction to which so many of the books found in monasteries were consigned at the Reformation, and is considered as one of the most authentic sources of Scottish history; but it is written in a barbarous style, and with too great brevity, except towards the end. It commences with the year 735, and breaks off abruptly in 1270. The early part of it is said to have been compiled by an abbot of Dundrainan.* It is probable that when he wrote it he was a monk of Melros, and that he was afterwards appointed to preside in the abbey of Dundrainan, in Galloway, which was founded in 1142, and colonized with monks from Melros. Sylvanus, the first abbot, who was afterwards abbot of Rievall in Yorkshire, appears to have been the writer, as the events which it records previous to his time belong rather to general history, and are entirely gathered from other monkish writers; while the succeeding portion has evidently been written from original information, and gives some account of local affairs.

The Cistercian order soon acquired great celebrity, and had monasteries in every country in Europe, all of which had the privilege of being independent of the bishops within whose dioceses they were situated. They were introduced into England in 1128, and had their first settlement at Waverley, in Surrey. The monks of Melros were brought from the abbey of Rievallé, in the North Riding of Yorkshire, and were the first of this order who came into Scotland. The king, by a charter, which was confirmed by his son, Prince Henry, granted them the lands of Melros, Eildon, Dernwick, and Gattonside, with the right of fishing in the Tweed, and of pasturage and timber in the forests of Selkirk and Traquair, and the pasturage of the land that lies between the Gala and the Leader, on the north side of the Tweed. The nobles of David's court also, following his example, vied with each other in their gifts to this monastery, which, in a short time, became possessed of very ample revenues.

ABBOTS OF MELROS.

I. RICHARD, the first abbot, is said to have been a man of strict piety and integrity; greatly esteemed at court on account of his learning, eloquence, and other good qualities; but little beloved by his convent, on account of the warmth of his temper, and the harshness with which he exercised his authority. For the faults which sprung from this defect in his character, he was removed from his office, by William, abbot of Rievallé, * in 1148, after he had ruled the abbey twelve years. Upon this, he retired to the abbey of Clairvaux, in France, where he died the following year. He opposed, without effect, the appointment of William Cumin, chancellor of Scotland, to the episcopal see of Durham, having discovered, by means of one of Cumin's agents, that the letters he produced as from the pope, confirming his election, were artfully forged.† The church of Melros, which was ten years in building, was finished in 1146, and dedicated, under the invocation of the Virgin Mary, with great pomp and solemnity, on Sunday, the 28th of July.†

II. WALTHEOF, or WALDEVE, who, after his death, was canonized and honoured as a saint, was the second abbot. He was the younger son of

Simon de St Liz, Earl of Northampton, by his wife Matilda, daughter to Waltheof, Earl of Northumberland, who inherited the earldom of Huntingdon from her mother, Judith, niece to William the Conqueror, who had it for her dower. The Earl Simon happening to fall under the displeasure of his sovereign, Henry I, in consequence of which his lands were forfeited, he assumed the cross, and went to the wars in Palestine, where he soon after died, leaving two sons, Simon and Waltheof, the former of whom obtained the earldom of Northampton. The Countess Matilda was afterwards married to David, Prince of Cumberland, brother and successor to Alexander, King of Scotland, who then resided chiefly at the English court, his sister, Matilda, being Henry the First's queen.*

A life of Waltheof, containing many marvellous stories, was written, about fifty years after his decease, in a continued strain of eulogy, by Josceline, a monk of Furness abbey, in Lancashire. It does not appear whether this work is yet extant any where, in a complete state, either in print or in manuscript; but there are large extracts from it inserted in the Scotichronicon, and in the Annals of the Cistercian Order, by Angelo Manriquez, in four volumes, in folio. From these sources we learn, that, from a child, Waltheof was remarkable for his meekness, humility, and other saintlike qualities; and that, while the favourite amusement of his brother Simon, and the rest of his playfellows, was to imitate the attack and defence of castles, which they constructed of such materials as they could, he shewed a predilection for the diversion of building baby churches.

His stepfather, by whom he was much beloved, took him to Scotland in 1124, when, upon the death of his brother, he ascended the throne of that kingdom. He there completed his education along with his friend Ailred,† afterwards abbot of Rievall, who became the recorder of the virtues of the king, his patron. David, thinking to gratify his youthful favourites, often took them with him to the chase; but Waltheof had no taste for this sport, and commonly strayed from his companions in the woods, where, taking a book from his bosom, he sat down on some pleasant shady bank to read or meditate, till it was time to rejoin the hunters on their way home from the chase. Upon one occasion, the king happened to surprise him in his sylvan retreat; and having long remarked his fondness for study, and his habitual piety, began to form the design of promoting him, in due time, to some high office in the church.* But Waltheof had other views, and declined to accept of any ecclesiastical dignity. Instead of becoming a secular priest, according to the wishes of his friends, he resolved to embrace the monastic life, entertaining the opinion so common in that age, that the seclusion and austerities of the cloister were a safer road to heaven than a life spent in the active duties of the world, but proportionably exposed to its temptations. A circumstance which might have been expected to overcome his resolution, served only to confirm and hasten it. This was his happening to fall in love with a beautiful young lady at court, who felt an equally tender passion for him. Unconscious at first of the state of his affections, some expressions used by her on presenting him with a ring, and the remarks of others on seeing him wear it, awakened him to a sense of what he considered to be his danger. Looking upon this as a warning, that he should withdraw at once from the world, he immediately retired to the convent of St Oswald's, at Nosthill, near Pontefract, in Yorkshire, where he was admitted into the order of canons regular of St Augustine. While he held the office of sacristan in this monastery, he was called, by the unanimous voice of the canons regular of Kirkham,† to be their prior. This invitation he reluctantly accepted, in obedience to the injunctions of the abbot of St Oswald's; but his diligence in the discharge of his duties, and the meekness and humility with which he bore himself, won the hearts of all the brethren at Kirkham, although, by the reforms which he introduced, he considerably increased the strictness and severity of their discipline.

* Scotichron. vi. 3—6.

† Sometimes called Baldred. Ibid. v. 41.

It is at this period of Waltheof's history that the legend begins to be * Scotichron. vi. 6, 7.

† Kirkham is on the western bank of the Derwent, not far from Malton, in Yorkshire, where the ruins of the priory still remain. It was founded, in 1122, by Sir Walter Espec, lord of Werk, one of the most powerful barons of his time, who endowed it with various possessions in Northumberland, among which were the village and church of Carham, the church of Newton, in Glendale, the church of Ilderton, &c. He also founded and endowed two other monasteries, viz. Rievale, in Yorkshire, in 1131, and Wardon, in Bedfordshire, in 1136, to the end, it is said, that masses might be always celebrated in them for the soul of his only son, who was unhappily killed by a fall from his horse. Sir Walter himself took the monastic habit in Rievale, about two years before his death, which happened in 1153. DUGDALE'S Monasticon, i. 728.

fruitful in those absurd stories of visions and miracles, which abound in almost all ancient accounts of Roman Catholic saints, but which are generally softened or suppressed by modern compilers of their lives, although they are not more extravagant than many of the legendary stories still retained in the Roman breviary. They are introduced here as illustrative of the habits of monastic life, and the state of religious belief at the period, at least, when they were written.

On Christmas day, as Waltheof was celebrating mass alone in the church at Kirkham, and was in the act of elevating the host, he beheld the consecrated bread changed into the likeness of an infant, more beautiful than the sons of men, crowned with a diadem of gold and jewels, who, with a look of ineffable sweetness, embraced him, kissed his lips, gently touched his face and head with his hands, and then, making the sign of the cross over him, suddenly disappeared.* Upon another occasion, during mass in the same church, a spider happened to fall into the holy chalice; and as this insect was accounted poisonous, the officiating priest, afraid to drink the consecrated wine, signified to the prior, by his gestures, his need of advice. Waltheof, having approached the altar, uttered a short prayer, and then commanded him to drink without fear. The priest obeyed, and, in doing so, felt no inconvenience from it at the time; but a few hours afterwards, as he sat in the cloister with the rest of the brethren after dinner, one of his fingers itching, he scratched it, and felt a little swelling on the spot, which soon increased, and burst, when, to the amazement of all present, the same unfortunate spider came out of it alive, and was, by the prior's order, committed to the flames.†

The excellent order and discipline maintained at Kirkham, caused that monastery to be enriched with many noble gifts, and brought the virtues of Waltheof's character so much into notice, that, when the see of York happened to become vacant, the clergy would have elected him archbishop, if they had not been prevented by King Stephen. That monarch objected to him on account of his affinity to the King of Scotland, who supported the claims of the Empress Matilda, and her son Henry II, to the English crown. ‡ While this matter was in agitation, he was himself so far from desiring worldly rank, that, thinking the life of a canon regular not sufficiently austere, he resigned his priorate, and, retiring into the Cistercian convent at Wardon, in Bedfordshire, began his noviciate in that order; greatly to the displeasure of his brother Simon, Earl of Northampton, who regarding it as little better than folly, endeavoured, at first by persuasion and afterwards by threats and violence, to deter him from it. That the monks of Wardon might not suffer on his account, Waltheof removed to the monastery at Rievall, to which his brother's influence did not reach. During the remainder of his noviciate, he was himself often perplexed with not unreasonable doubts as to the utility of the lengthened vigils and psalm-singing, and the excessive severity of the discipline of the Cistercians; and he began even to entertain thoughts of returning to his former condition. On the other hand he felt a suspicion that these doubts might be the secret whisperings of the arch-enemy of mankind, and he often prayed for divine counsel to direct him. One day, we are told, when he threw himself on the ground, on the threshold of his cell, and poured forth his fervent desires to that effect, he found himself transported, in a moment, without knowing how, to his place of study within.* This was too significant a miracle to be mistaken; and from that hour his resolution was fixed. He was at once reconciled to the insipid food, the coarse garments, manual drudgery, long fasts, and other harsh and mortifying institutions of the first Cistercians; and as soon as the year of his probation was expired, he took the vows, and soon became a bright example of monastic virtue, by the unfeigned cheerfulness with which he submitted to every self-denying ordinance.

He continued at Rievall, devoted to this ascetic life, till the year 1148, when he was elected abbot of Melros; the monks, in their choice, being influenced both by regard to his excellent qualities, and a desire to conciliate the king, who was displeased with their conduct in deposing the late abbot Richard. Waltheof was no less unwilling now, than he had been upon a similar occasion before, to exchange the quiet and tranquillity of a private station, for a condition of greater dignity, but of greater care and anxiety; nor was his consent obtained till the abbot of Rievall interposed his authority to that effect.† In the more elevated rank to which he was now advanced, as the virtues of his character could less easily be concealed, he was more than ever venerated and beloved. His beneficence and kindness to the poor and the sick, and the paternal mildness of his rebuke when any of the monks had committed a fault, were the surest proofs of the genuineness of his piety ; which was likewise evinced by the strictness and impartiality with which he examined and corrected himself. Not even a vain or idle thought ever intruded itself into his mind for which he did not express his contrition by confession and penance. At that period the religious were accustomed to confess with their backs bare, in token of their willingness to submit to whatever stripes their spiritual director might think fit to inflict upon them, before he gave them absolution. Waltheof's confessor was his constant friend St Everhard, who, being a canon regular at Kirkham, embraced the Cistercian order along with him at Wardon, and removed with him to Rievale and Melros. He afterwards became the first abbot of Holm-Cultram in Cumberland, which was founded by King David in 1150.*

* Scotichron. vi. 31.

Dempster mentions Thomas Rubettus, another of the monks who enjoyed the friendship of the abbot, and is said to have written his life, and a separate work concerning his miracles ; also a book called Decreta Synodalia. †

To the increased number of his other merits, of a less questionable nature, the legendary writers add the greater frequency of Waltheof's miracles after his removal to Melros abbey. It appears that in times of scarcity, which, owing to the low state of agriculture and commerce in that rude age, were of frequent occurrence, the destitute and famished poor of the neighbourhood often found alleviating succour in the charity of the monks. Upon one occasion, we are told, during a severe famine, four thousand starving people resorted to the monastery in hopes of obtaining food, many of whom, for want of other lodging, built huts for themselves in the fields and woods adjacent. The charity of the benevolent monks was never so severely tried ; for unfortunately, upon this occasion, their stock of corn was barely sufficient for their own subsistence till harvest. They had, indeed, another resource in their cattle ; but to kill them, as was proposed by Tyna, the kind-hearted cellarer, * would be ruinous to their tillage and hopes of future increase. When the convent assembled to deliberate upon this alternative, and were at a loss what to resolve upon, Waltheof stood up, and desiring Tyna to accompany him, they proceeded to the farm at Eildon, where the abbot stuck his staff into a heap of wheat which lay in the granary, and prayed for a blessing upon it. This done, they bent their steps to the other farm belonging to the abbey, at Gattonside, where having in like manner blessed a heap of rye, designed for bread to their servants, he commanded that daily rations of grain should be dealt out to the starving multitude. They were thus fed continually for three months from the stores the abbot had blessed, which lasted till the corn in the fields was ready for the sickle. †

Upon a similar occasion, when the monks, by Waltheof's suggestion, agreed to share their daily portions of bread with the hungry, the loaves were no sooner cut in two, than each half was converted into a whole loaf. ‡

The monastic rule which enjoined the exercise of hospitality, was nowhere better observed than at Melros, where wayfaring men, and strangers of every condition, from the king to the peasant, found a welcome, and such cheer as the monastery afforded. One day when some guests had arrived, and Walter the hospitaller, whose office was to provide for their accommodation and entertainment, had set food before them, it happened that some other newly arrived strangers were ushered in, and placed also at table. Although the viands were not more than might suffice for the original number of guests, yet when all had partaken of them they appeared undiminished, and only began to decrease when one of the company, in the middle of the repast, called the attention of the rest to the miraculous circumstance. §

* Tyna was the author of a life of Waltheof; of a treatise on Alms-giving; and of a series of Sermons for Lent. Ibid.

† Scotichron. vi. 34. The cellarer stated, that the convent at this time possessed great store of oxen at pasture, as well as sheep, wedders, and well fed pigs, with plenty of cheese and butter. This, in a time of general scarcity, conveys a most favourable idea of the good husbandry and skilful management of the venerable fraternity, and of the benefit which the country must have derived from their influence and example, in the cultivation of their lands.

‡ Annales Cistercienses.

One evening, three strangers knocked at the abbey gate, and being admitted to lodge there for the night, they were immediately conducted into the church, as the rule of St Benedict, upon such occasions, directs. When they had finished their devotions, they were led back to the guest chamber, and taken care of by brother Walter. By the time they had washed their feet, they were summoned to supper in the refectory; but had scarcely sat down, when it was discovered that one of the strangers was missing, and his place empty. The hospitaller asked the other two what had become of their companion, when, with surprise, they affirmed that no third person had been in their company. The friar insisted that he had placed three of them at table. The porter, and another monk, who had received them at the gate, declared that they had let in three persons. Nobody had been observed to go out, yet the third stranger could nowhere be found. The following night, however, a person of an angelic appearance shewed himself to the hospitaller, in a dream, and said, "Dost thou know me, brother Walter? I am the stranger, whose sudden disappearing from amongst you yesterday, nobody could account for. The Lord has appointed me to watch over this monastery; and I am come to certify you, that the alms and prayers of the community, and especially of your abbot, are accepted, and ascend unto heaven like the odours of sweet incense." *

On the eve of the Epiphany, when the abbot and monks were singing the praises of God, in the choir, the abbot had a vision of the Virgin Mary, with the infant Jesus on her knee, and the three kings, or wise men of the East, coming, preceded by a bright star, to offer him mystic gifts. On Easter day, at early matins, he had a vision of the sufferings, death, and resurrection of Christ. †

Waltheof had not only spiritual, but personal contests with Satan. One evening, we are told, after the singing of the compline, when all the monks had retired from the church, save the abbot, who, according to his usual practice, remained behind, to pray alone, the malignant fiend, for no other purpose, as it seemed, than to disturb his devotions, appeared to him successively in a variety of antic shapes, and, after playing an infinite number of provoking tricks, at last declared open war, assuming the terrific form of a gigantic soldier in complete armour, brandishing a spear, and breathing fire. The saint, who already essayed, but without effect, to drive him away by making the sign of the cross, now armed himself with the pix, which contained the consecrated wafer, and, making the hallowed sign with this, advanced intrepidly against the adversary, exclaiming, "Behold, thou wicked soldier, thou base hireling, here is thy judge, who shall quickly send thee to the bottomless pit! Wait for him if thou darest!" It is hardly necessary to say, that, at these words, the foul fiend, baffled and confounded, vanished away in a cloud of smoke. *

* Annales Cistercienses, 1154, iv. 2, 3, 4.

† Ibid. Scotichronicon, vi. 8.

The author of the legend remarks, that Waltheof's piety grew more fervent, and his miracles more frequent, as his bodily strength declined, and the burden of his old age and infirmities increased. By his blessing and touch, he healed three of the brethren who lay dangerously ill in the infirmary, and who earnestly solicited him to use this means of restoring them; each of them having been warned, the preceding night, in a dream, that it would prove effectual.†

Upon the death of Robert, bishop of St Andrews, in 1159, Waltheof was unanimously fixed upon to succeed him; and the clergy of the cathedral came to Melros, accompanied by many of the principal noblemen of Scotland, to announce his election, and conduct him with honour to the episcopal city. But he who, in the days of youth and strength, was never attracted by the love of worldly distinction, shrunk from it now, in the season of age and feebleness; nor could he be entreated to undertake an office the duties of which he felt himself no longer able to fulfil. When the abbot of Rievall, who was present, endeavoured to persuade him, he pointed with his finger to the ground at the entrance of the chapter-house, where he had fixed upon a spot for his grave; and, in allusion to his having laid aside all earthly cares, to prepare for death, recited these words of Scripture: "I have put off my coat; how shall I put it on? I have washed my feet; how shall I defile them?"

Thus Waltheof kept his resolution, and continued to exercise his functions, at Melros, till the day of his death, an event which he joyfully anticipated, and often prayed for. The legend, in one of the most extravagant of its marvellous tales, informs us, that he received from heaven a written assurance that his prayer would be granted. The peace of the convent, we are told, had often been disturbed by the rude behaviour of one of the lay brethren, named Simon, a man of great muscular strength, and a skilful artificer, but of an arrogant disposition, which made him treat his fellow labourers with contempt. This person, having fallen asleep, during the hour of rest, at noon, dreamed that a being of gigantic form and terrific aspect, armed with a scythe, stood before him, and, in a voice that made him tremble, reproached him with his wicked life ; after which, hewing him in pieces, he put the severed limbs into a basket which he carried, and was preparing to depart, when a being of a glorious appearance came suddenly and drove him away, after he had compelled him to fit again all the dissevered pieces to each other. Then, the angelic being, having restored Simon to life, and exhorted him to repentance and amendment, put into his hands a written roll, charging him to deliver it faithfully to his abbot, to whom it was sent from God and the Holy Mary. The lay brother awaking, found the roll lying upon his breast, and did with it as he was directed, giving, at the same time, an account of his vision. Waltheof, with reverence, unfolded the epistle, and, kneeling down, read it with tears of thankfulness. The words were these : “ Jesus Christ, and Mary his mother, greet their beloved Waltheof. Know that thy prayer is heard ; and, between the two feasts of John the Baptist, * thou shalt come to us to live for ever : prepare thyself. Farewell.” †

* Annales Cistercienses, 1154, iv. 6.

† Ibid. 1160, iii. 1, 2.

Agreeably to this revelation, we are told, that, on the feast of the nativity of John the Baptist, he was seized with a mortal sickness, which continued till the 1st of August, when, feeling himself worse, he received the sacraments of the Lord's Supper and extreme unction, and, after blessing his assembled friends, bade them farewell. He continued, however, says his biographer, “ to suffer in the body two days longer, that his soul might depart altogether stainless, and that he might not be confounded when he should speak with his enemies in the gates of death.” On the 3d of the month, at the hour of tierce, the convent was summoned to witness his departure ; when he was laid upon a haircloth, as the custom was, while they stood around, and sung the psalms and litanies proper for the occasion. He lived, however, till the hour of sext, when, the monks being re-assembled, and singing as before, he expired. Having, according to custom, washed his body, it was proposed, in honour of his saintly character, to bury him in his sacerdotal robes ; but some objecting to this, for what reason is not mentioned, they clothed him in his monk's habit and hood, wrapped him in a wax cloth, and laid him out in the church till the time of his funeral obsequies, which were performed by the bishop of Glasgow, attended by four abbots, and a great number of religious men of different orders. The bishop, and many other persons, were for burying him within the church ; but Galfrid, abbot of Newbottle, persuaded them to comply with the request he had so distinctly expressed before his death, and he was accordingly buried on the spot he had himself pointed out, in the chapter-house.*

* The nativity of John the Baptist is commemorated on the 24th of June ; his beheading, on the 29th of August.

The literary works attributed to Waltheof are, 1. De Claustri Bono ; 2. Evangeliorum Flores ; 3. Sanctorum Plurium Vitæ ; 4. Commentarium in Regulam Ecclesiasticam.† Certain pretended prophecies, in rhyme, evidently written four hundred years after his time, pass under his name, in a well known collection of predictions, ascribed to Merlin, Thomas of Ercildoun, Bede, and other ancient sages, originally published at Edinburgh, by Andro Hart, in 1613. He is there called Waldhave ; and it may be remarked, that Fordun calls him Walthevus ; other chroniclers Wallevus ; and by an erroneous reading, Wallenus. On Tweedside, he is still known, by tradition, as St Waudie.

III. WILLIAM, one of the monks, was the next abbot of Melros, being elected by his brethren, on the 27th of November, 1159, in a chapter held, according to the Cistertian rules, by Ailred, Waltheof's friend, who now presided in the parent monastery of Rievale. William soon became unpopular, and was looked upon by the monks as an austere and harsh superior, who took more pains to make himself feared than loved.‡ The real cause of their dislike appears rather to have been his supposed incredulity, as to the frequent miracles said to have been wrought at Waltheof's tomb, and his endeavouring to put a stop to the superstitious practices founded on them. The late abbot was no sooner dead, than reports began to be circulated of miraculous visions, seen by different persons, which, if true, made it not doubtful that he had been immediately admitted into the state of blessedness. The day before he died, Nicolas, the king's chancellor, who was then at Rome, upon business of state, had a vision of paradise, and, among other things, saw the holy abbot conducted by an angel to the gate, where they stood singing, and requesting to be admitted. A voice within demanded who they were, and the angel replied, "Waltheof of Melros is here." The keeper of the gate answered, "He cannot enter to-day : let him come to-morrow, when he shall have put off his earthly spoils."* Walter, a lay brother, who was confined to his bed in the infirmary by sickness, was wonderfully restored to health by the abbot, who appeared to him, in a vision, and informed him that he was now a partaker of the joys of paradise.† Henry, another of the lay brethren, beheld his late superior, with St Benedict, and St Bernard of Clairvaux, borne through the air, each in a splendid litter ; and was informed, by a miraculous voice, that they were on their way to the abbey of Kinloss, to rescue from the power of besetting fiends, the soul of Robert, one of the monks, who was to die on the morrow. ‡

As these marvellous tales fell in with many of the popular superstitions which a barbarous age, and a credulous or an interested clergy, had ingrafted on religion, they were quickly circulated, and readily believed, without the convent, and perhaps within it. The beatification of the late abbot was an easy inference ; and now diseased and infirm persons were brought to his tomb, supplicating him to intercede in behalf of their prayers for health. Those who imagined, or hoped, that their prayers were granted, gave to the monastery wax tapers, lamps, and other gifts, which they had vowed. Bernoul, a rich inhabitant of Rothbury, in particular, was restored, from sickness to health and strength, by watching one night beside the venerated tomb. Josceline, the recorder of this legend, conversed with Bernoul's son, who became a monk at Melros.

With whatever kind of evidence these alleged miracles were supported, the abbot William does not seem to have been satisfied with it ; and he was too honest to lend his countenance to what he thought a scandal to the monastery, and to religion. We are not, indeed, informed that he avowed his disbelief ; but it is difficult, on any other supposition, to account for his shutting up the chapter-house, and refusing access to the crowds of people who came daily to perform their devotions at Waltheof's grave. His enemies were less willing to impute it to his desire to maintain the quiet and seclusion of the convent, which was disturbed by the concourse of so many visitors, than to an invidious feeling towards his predecessor. "Is it not a presumptuous thing," said they, "in a mortal man to attempt to shut up the fountain of mercy, and to cover with the turf of silence, that which is glorified by heavenly grace, and manifested to the world by miracles?"* The abbot, however, continuing inflexible, the discontented monks, with Josceline, the prior, at their head, accused him of harshness in the exercise of his authority; and Sylvanus, abbot of Rievall, who gave credit to their complaints, having enjoined him to rule with less severity, he, perhaps disgusted at the injustice with which he thought himself treated, resigned his office on the 23d of April, 1170,† and retired to the abbey of Rievall, where he died fifteen years afterwards.

He is said to have written, 1. In Cantica Salomonis; 2. De Officio Monachi; 3. Ad Joannem Cardinalem, Scotiae et Hiberniae Legatum. The brethren of the convent most distinguished in his time, were, Ralph, who, in 1171, was made abbot of Cupar; and Simon de Tonei, or Thondi, who became abbot of Coggeshall, in Essex, where he continued some years, but returning to Melros, resumed his station as a private monk, till, in 1171, he was elected bishop of Moray, in which situation he died in 1184. The works ascribed to him are, 1. Reformatio Cleri; 2. De Regia S. Malcolmi Successione; 3. In Epistolas Pauli, Lib. vi.‡

IV. JOSCELINE, the prior, was preferred to the abbot's seat the same day on which William retired from it. The zeal with which he had defended the opinion of Waltheof's beatification having mainly conduced to his advancement, one of the first cares that now engaged him, was an endeavour to justify the part he had acted, by proving that opinion to be well grounded. The belief that the bodies of those holy persons who at their death were immediately admitted into glory, were not subject to decay and corruption like the bodies of other men, was in that age universally prevalent. By this criterion, therefore, Josceline resolved to try the saintship of his deceased patron and friend. Having prepared a new slab of polished marble to replace the stone covering of the tomb, he invited a goodly company of grave and religious men to see it laid. On the 2d of May, 1171, Ingelram, bishop of Glasgow, four abbots, a considerable number of monks of different orders, and all the brethren of Melros, being assembled in the chapter-house, the grave was uncovered in their presence, when, to the admiration of all, not only the body, but also the garments in which it had been buried twelve years before, appeared to have suffered no decay. * By some accident, it happened that the body had been wrapped in a wax-cloth ; although this was prohibited by the rules of the Cistercian order. The wonder was increased, therefore, when it was observed that the forbidden cerement was completely reduced to dust. Bishop Ingelram, stooping down, touched the garments and different parts of the body, at first gently, and then with a stronger pressure of his hand, to assure himself that every joint and limb was flexible and sound. But Peter, the chanter, who was among the bystanders, doubting the propriety of so accurate a scrutiny, could not help saying, "In sooth, my lord bishop, saving your reverence, methinks you handle the body of the holy man somewhat roughly." When some of the rest murmured their approbation of this remark, the bishop thus addressed them, "Be not offended, my dear children, that I have scrupulously examined into this matter, but rather praise God, since I have thereby clearly ascertained and made manifest, that this is indeed a miracle, which proves that you have now another saint belonging to you, and that your venerated father Waltheof, is become a companion to the holy Cuthbert, who also was once a monk of Melros." At these words many of the brethren shed tears of joy ; every body present uttered some expression of thankfulness, and at the suggestion of the abbot of Kelso, Te Deum was solemnly chanted. It was then consulted whether they ought to remove the body to a more honourable place of sepulture, and lay it in a stately tomb within the church. Why should they hide in the earth this precious talent which God had given them ? Was it not opposing the divine will, which had so honoured Waltheof, and manifested that he was now a partaker of glory in the heavens ? Their deliberations, however, ended in resolving to leave the precious deposit where it was, for the present, and until the sanction of the general chapter of the order at Cisteaux, confirmed by the pope, could be obtained for its enshrinement.* Whether any efforts were made to this effect, is not known, but it is recorded that Waltheof's remains were never removed from the spot in which they were first laid; and although he continued to be honoured as a saint, and many pilgrimages were made to his tomb, before which a wax candle was kept constantly burning, yet it may be doubted whether he was ever regularly canonized. Josceline, notwithstanding the zeal he displayed for his memory, as above related, is blamed by the monk of Furness for neglecting to procure him this distinction at the court of Rome, when having been made bishop of Glasgow in 1174, he went, in 1182, with Ernald, abbot of Melros, and other honourable persons, upon an embassy to the pope. He established, however, a house of hospitality on the banks of the Teviot, at Hassendean, for the entertainment of strangers and pilgrims coming to Melros, and, with the consent of King William, he gave for its support the patronage of the church of Hassendean, with all its lands, tithes, and possessions. † This abbot is praised for the kindness and urbanity of his manners, and his elevation to the episcopal dignity is said to have given universal satisfaction. He began to rebuild and enlarge the cathedral church of Glasgow in 1180, which was finished in a magnificent style in 1196, three years before his death. ‡

Josceline is reported to have been the author of a treatise, De Translatione Augustini, Anglorum Apostoli. One of his contemporaries at Melros, was St Nervus, the patron usually invoked by travellers, in consequence of a miracle believed to have been done by him. Two pilgrims, it is said, having been found murdered on their way to visit the holy places in Scotland, this devout monk restored them to life for a short space, that they might confess their sins, and receive the sacrament of the eucharist. In 1174, he became abbot of Kinloss, where he rebuilt the cloister, and secured it with a high wall. A work entitled In Leges Claustrales, is attributed to him. §

V. LAURENCE, one of the monks, was elected abbot, on the 14th May,

1175, and received the accustomed episcopal benediction, in the church of the abbey, the next day, from his predecessor, Josceline, who had himself been recently consecrated bishop, and probably retained his office at Melros till that ceremony was over. Laurence had previously been abbot of a monastery in the Orkneys, and he is said to have been deeply skilled in theological learning. He died in 1178. *

VI. ERNOLD, the next abbot, received the benediction from Bishop Josceline, on the day of the Epiphany, 1179. About this time there existed a dispute, between the convent and Richard de Morville, concerning their respective rights of forest and pasture in the district of Wedale, situated between the rivers Leader and Gala. The matter was referred to King William, who, assisted by several persons of distinction, both secular and ecclesiastic, having examined and inquired into the merits of the case, at Haddington, in 1180, gave a decision in favour of the monks.† Another dispute between the monks and the men of Wedale, about their rights of pasture in the same forest, was settled by the king, upon the testimony of Richard de Morville, constable of the kingdom, and twelve other jurors, who, after they had perambulated the boundaries, being sworn upon the

† The charter which William gave the convent in confirmation of his decision, is curiously minute in its description of the boundaries of the disputed territory, and shews the antiquity of the names of several of the places mentioned in it:—"Sciatis me pacem fecisse inter monachos de Melros et Ricardum de Moravilla, de foresta inter Galou et Ledir per has divisas: Scilicet, 'Per flumen Galue versus monachos ab orientali parte ejusdem fluminis sursum usque ad terminos de Wedale, et item per rectas divisas terræ Ricardi de Morevillis, scil. de sico Mereburne [ubi] cadit in Ledir usque ad sursum ejusdem Mereburne, et inde per sicum qui exit de Mereburne usque ubi sicus ille cadit in rivulum de Standen, et inde usque ad Pot, et de Pot usque ad Standanstan, et sic deinceps usque ad viam regiam ubi illa intrat nemus, et dividit nemus de Standen, et de Threpwude, et sic per eandem regiam viam usque ad Fairforde, et postea per illam viam quæ vadit in dextram usque ad predictos terminos de Wedale, et sic per rectos terminos de Wedale usque in Galou, R. de Morevillis et Willielmus hæres ejus clamaverunt quietem de se et hæredibus suis Deo et sanctæ ecclesiæ de Melros, &c. quidquid juris habuerunt de bosco et pastura infra prænominatas divisas versus austrum, ab illa via quæ dividit Threpwude et nemus de Standen, excepto quod R. de M. et ejus hæredes habebunt illud nemus quod vocatur Threpwude, sive pastura, quod eis monachi quietem clamaverunt, per has divisas, scil. de Fairforde deorsum per Aloent usque ad mussam quæ est inter Threpwude et Cumbesley Cnoll, et sic per eandem mussam usque ad prædictum Pot. holy relics preserved at Melros, attested that the royal forest extended to the highway leading to the westward of the church of Wedale, and that the right of pasture belonged to Melros as far as the marches of Wedale, and the rivulet called Fasseburn.

The Abbot Ernald was distinguished for his prudence and discretion, and his great knowledge of the holy Scriptures.* He was one of the chief persons in the embassy sent to Rome, in 1182, by means of which the sentence of excommunication pronounced against King William was recalled, and the kingdom freed from the papal interdict. He was chosen abbot of Rievale, on the 2d of March, 1189, upon the resignation of his predecessor, Sylvanus. †

VII. REINER, abbot of Kinloss, originally a monk of Melros, succeeded Ernald on the 23d of the same month. He resigned his charge of Melros abbey into the hands of the abbot of Rievale, on the 17th of September, 1194, and again became abbot of Kinloss, where he died, in the year 1219. One of the monks, named Reginald, who lived about this time, is mentioned by Dempster as a distinguished person, who became bishop of Ross, and a cardinal, and wrote, 1. Præcepta Salutaria ad Fratres; 2. Collectiones Synodales. From the same authority, we learn that Gilbert, another monk of Melros, who became abbot of Holy Island, and died in 1200, was the author of eight most delectable and elegant sermons upon the Song of Solomon.

RALPH, another abbot of Kinloss, succeeded Reiner, at Melros, two days after his resignation. A dispute respecting their boundaries having arisen between the monks and their brethren of Kelso abbey, whose lands of Bowden lay contiguous to their domains of Eildon and Dernwick; the pope's legate, John de Salerno, after holding a general council at Perth, in 1201, for the reformation of the clergy, came to Melros, to inquire into and settle this difference. But after he had enjoyed the hospitality of the monks almost two months, and cajoled both parties with hopes of a decision in their favour, whereby he drew from them considerable presents of money and horses, leaving the matter undetermined, he went to Ireland, and took with him Ralph, the abbot of Melros, whom he made bishop of Down, in that country. Ralph was at Melros in 1211, and there gave the episcopal blessing to three abbots, viz. of Fountain's abbey, Furness, and Caldeia, on St Lucia's day. He died in 1233; and was said to have written, 1. Acta Concilia Perthani; 2. Ad suos Melrosienses; Epistola ad Joannem legatum.*

IX. WILLIAM, who had been master of the novices at Melros, and was made abbot of Cupar, in 1200, was brought back by the votes of his former brethren, and succeeded the Abbot Ralph in 1202. When he died, in 1206, the opinion of his sanctity was such, that it was agreed to bury him near his sainted predecessor, Waltheof. While the grave was making, curiosity impelled some of the monks to look at the remains of the saint; and one of them, brother Robert, who was a mason, began, with religious dread, to raise the cover of the tomb sufficiently to allow them to look into it, which was not accomplished before a most sweet and fragrant odour issued from the cavity, as if it had been filled with odoriferous drugs and spices. It being the dusk of the evening, a lighted taper was brought, and the whole company, consisting of six monks, and as many lay brethren, looked in, and saw the body of the holy man as it lay uncorrupted, and clothed in garments apparently fresh and beautiful.

X. PATRICK, the subprior was elected abbot, on the 8th of June, 1206, and died the following year.

XI. ADAM, the prior of Melros, was chosen abbot in 1207. Next year, the differences between the monks of Melros and those of Kelso, which had been referred by Pope Celestine to the arbitration of King William, were finally adjusted. One of the matters in dispute was a piece of ground at the foot of the Eildon Hills. This was adjudged to the monks of Kelso, who, at the same time, were obliged to make over to Melros abbey, two oxgangs of land, and two acres of meadow, in Primside, with pasture for four hundred sheep, in the common of that village. To prevent quarrels in future, the boundaries between the grounds of Eildon and Bowden were minutely described, in a writing drawn up by both parties, and attested by the abbots of Jedworth, Dryburgh, Newbottil, and Cupar. From this document, which is preserved in the Chartulary of Melros,† we learn, that the line of separation, beginning at Bowden burn, proceeded to a cross erected between Witherig and Harcarleche; then to a white thorn tree, in Witherig;

and so northwards to Akeden ; and up to another cross, beside a green dike ; and along this dike to a third cross, above Sprouisden ; then up to a spring, beside a white thorn, by the side of the brook that flows from the same spring ; and so along Ferneley, to the willows, and crosses, and ditches, in the middle hill, up to the summit, where King David caused the ditches to be made ; and so westward down to the place called Derebley ; and through the divided wood ; * and by the crosses and ditches, to the oaks marked with crosses, as far as the lake beneath Blakelaw ; and from thence to another lake ; and so on to Bowden ; and down the rivulet of Bowden, to the river Tweed.

The Abbot Adam was elected bishop of Caithness on the 5th of August, 1213, but appears not to have vacated his office at Melros until the time of his consecration, the 11th of May, 1214, as his successor was not appointed till after that period. In the ninth year of his episcopate, his days were cut short by a catastrophe which marks the barbarousness of the people of his diocese in that age, as well as the imperfections of a system which, however venerable in its origin, however just, however beneficial, as providing the means of religious instruction to the public, without expense to any individual, and however unexceptionably useful it might be rendered by wise and just modifications, yet still continues to be the occasional source of serious evils to religion and society, by bringing into collision the rights and interests of two classes of men, which, of all others, ought to be prevented from conflicting ; namely, those of the Christian pastor and his flock. Unfortunately for the bishop, his flock had been accustomed, in time past, to pay what he considered a very inadequate composition for the tithes appointed for his maintenance. He therefore thought it right to insist upon a more equitable payment ; and when they refused, perhaps with some circumstances of aggravation, it is said, that, in the heat of his resentment, he excommunicated them, — a terrible infliction in those days, when it was believed that no person who died under that curse could escape eternal punishment. This harsh and cruel measure, instead of subduing their obstinacy, served only to infuriate them ; so that they bent

* “Scissum nemus.” King David divided the wood, and the side of the mountain, between the two monasteries, and marked out the boundaries by ditches, &c. Harleian MS. fol. 40, v. their thoughts towards revenge. At last, on the 11th of September, 1222, a tumultuous body of them, amounting to three hundred, having weapons in their hands, and with avowed hostility, surrounded his house at Hawkirk, at an untimely hour in the morning. Some of his domestics ran to John, Earl of Orkney and Caithness, who lived near, and besought his assistance. But he who, from his conduct, was afterwards suspected to have instigated the people to this act, evasively answered, "Is the bishop afraid? let him come to me." Meanwhile, the mob broke into the bishop's house, and having dragged him out of his chamber, and slain a monk of Melros, named Serlo, who was his companion, and also a servant who was with him, they bound him, and beat him with sticks and stones; and then, shutting him up in his kitchen, set fire to the house, where he was burned to death.* When the flames were extinguished, his body was found under a heap of stones, unconsumed, and was buried in the parish church; but the clergy, viewing him as a martyr who had died in defence of the rights of their order, disinterred his remains, in 1239, and removed them to a more honourable tomb, in the cathedral church of the diocese, where no small number of miracles were said to have been wrought by virtue of his bones. When intelligence of this outrage was brought to King Alexander, who was then at Jedburgh preparing for a journey into England, he immediately postponed every other concern, and, proceeding to the spot, punished the murderers with death,† and confiscated the lands of the Earl of Caithness, for which he afterwards received a letter of thanks and commendation from Pope Celestine IV. The Earl subsequently recovered part of his estates, by paying a considerable fine; but the monastic historians are careful to inform us, that, in 1231, he was cut off by a deed of violence, which bore some resemblance to that which proved so fatal to the bishop; being murdered by his servant, who, to conceal his guilt, burnt the house in which lay his mangled body.‡ It were to be wished that some of the literary works attributed to the Bishop Adam, if indeed they ever had

† The King is said to have also mutilated their children: "filiis eorum exsectis," an act of cruelty which Dempster, in the true persecuting spirit of his time, calls "a memorable instance of his piety;" but as Alexander II. appears nowhere else to have been of a cruel disposition, it may be presumed, with Lord Hailes, (Annals of Scotland, i. 148.) that "there may be some exaggeration in this part of the story."

They are, 1. A History of Scotland, in three books; 2. Letters to the King against the Earl of Caithness; 3. Biblical Extracts; 4. Descriptions of the Isles. He is also stated to have been the author of Letters to Pope Alexander IV, which must be an error, as that pontiff did not obtain the chair of St Peter till the 25th December, 1259.

XII. HUGH de CLIPPESTON, one of the monks, was raised to the office of abbot of Melros, in May, 1214, but resigned it the next year, at a general chapter of the Cistercian order. †

XIII. WILLIAM de CURCY, abbot of Holm-Cultram, in Cumberland, succeeded Hugh on the 16th of November, 1215. He was translated to Rievall, by the monks of that abbey, who chose him for their superior, on the 30th of August, 1216. ‡

XIV. RALPH, the cellarer of Melros, was elected to the abbot's office on the 14th of September, 1216, which he held till the 1st of June, 1219, when he died. §

The King of Scotland had not been an uninterested observer of the contests between King John and his barons, which, in the issue, secured the foundations of the liberty of Englishmen. On the 11th of January, 1216, Alexander met and conferred with the chief men of Yorkshire, and the northern counties, in the chapter-house of Melros abbey, where they swore fealty to him, and engaged to put him in possession of Northumberland, and the city of Carlisle, upon his agreeing to take them under his protection, and to assist them in the assertion of their rights. John having, in the mean time, destroyed their lands and castles, invaded Scotland with an army of foreign mercenaries, and laid waste the country between Roxburgh, Dunbar, and Berwick. The Scottish King retaliated, by two destructive incursions into England the same year; and, on the 17th of October, John died, leaving his kingdom to the protection of the pope,

* It is not intended to accuse Dempster of the intentional error of swelling his list of Scottish writers with the names of imaginary authors, and their works. He drew his information from sources which, to us, are unfortunately lost, by the more complete dispersion and destruction of the libraries of the monasteries since his time; and much of that which appears improbable in his writings, may, nevertheless, be true. But he has evidently been very negligent in the examining of dates, and other corroborative testimony, and he certainly had too much credulity, as well as national and religious partiality.

upon which, Cardinal Gualo, the legate, excommunicated all his enemies, among whom were the King and people of Scotland. The churches were, therefore, shut up, religious services were discontinued, and all the clergy ceased from exercising their functions, except the monks of the Cistercian order, who held themselves exempted from the curse, by virtue of their privileges. Gualo took offence at this, and, in the beginning of the year 1218, when he thought proper to absolve the Scottish church and people, he continued the interdict against all the Cistercian convents, and likewise against the bishops and more opulent of the clergy, intending to make them pay well for their absolution. He, therefore, directed his commissioners, William, the prior of Durham, and Walter de Wisbech, archdeacon of the East Riding of Yorkshire, to summon them to meet him at Northallerton about Easter. At this meeting, many of the clergy complied with the avaricious demands of the legate, and were absolved; but the abbots of Melros, Newbottle, Cupar, Kinloss, and Lochleven, pleaded the privileges of their order, and refused to pay, or to obey the interdict, professing their determination rather to appeal to the pope. At last the matter was compromised, by the monks consenting to abstain from every act of religious worship, and from entering any church until the decision of the pope should be known to them. Soon afterwards, Gualo commissioned the bishop of St Andrews to give them absolution. In the mean time, a general chapter of the order was held at Cisteaux, at which were present almost all the abbots of their body in England, Scotland, and Wales; and, in consequence of their deliberations, the abbots of Cisteaux and Clairvalle, with six others, went to Rome to complain of the infraction of their privileges, and made the justice of their cause so evident, that the legate was immediately recalled, and the order was confirmed in the possession of all its former rights.*

XV. ADAM DE HARKARIS, abbot of Newbottle, a relation of Patrick, Earl of March, was translated to Melros abbey on the 6th of August, 1219, and governed the monks twenty-six years, during which the community increased greatly in wealth and importance. From the high estimation in which they were held, many of the members were, at different times, raised to the episcopal office, or chosen to preside over other monasteries. Many persons of distinction, in their old age, got themselves admitted into the abbey as novices, with a view to pass the remainder of their days in the edifying conversation of the brethren, and, with their help, to prepare themselves for death. In such cases, they contributed to the wealth of the community, by making them donations and bequests. Even the habit of the monks itself was believed to possess a miraculous efficacy, and was worn by the dying as a passport to heaven. Patrick, Earl of Dunbar and March, when near dying, assembled his friends and neighbours in his castle, at Christmas, in the year 1231, and, having kept the festival with them with great cheerfulness and hospitality during four days, he sent for his friend, the abbot of Melros, who gave him extreme unction, and invested him with the Cistercian habit on the 30th of December, when he affectionately bade his guests farewell, and died the next day. "Never," observes a modern historian, "did superstition appear in a more pleasing form."* This superstition arose from a story, that the Virgin Mary changed the black habit, originally worn by the Cistercians, into white, upon the person of Alberic, the second abbot of Cisteaux; † and that she afterwards presented one of the monks of that abbey with a girdle, to bind up his scapulary, which incommoded him while at work in the fields. ‡

The possessions of Melros were considerably augmented, in the year 1235, by a grant from King Alexander II. of the lands of Etterick Forest. With increasing wealth, the community rose in public influence and importance; and the abbots, invested with the privileges and state of barons, no longer confined their attention to the concerns of religion, but likewise engaged in secular and political affairs, acting as counsellors of the realm, officers of state, and ambassadors. The Abbot Adam, with Gilbert, bishop of Whitehern, who had formerly been master of the novices at Melros, attended the Earl of March on a warlike expedition, in 1234, against the people of Galloway, who, upon the death of their late lord, supported the claims of an unlawful heir, and were in arms against the king's authority. In later times, dignitaries of the church were not unfrequently seen exercising military command in the field of battle; but, upon the present occasion, it is more likely that these ecclesiastics went as mediators of peace, since, by their counsels, they procured the submission and pardon of the rebels. §

In the year 1240, the remains of all the abbots who were buried at the entrance of the chapter-house of Melros, except the remains of St Waltheof, were disinterred, and removed to a place prepared for them in the east side of the same building. Waltheof's tomb was opened, and, when it was found that his body was now reduced to bones and dust, it was covered up again, the persons who were present having first selected some of the small bones, to keep as holy relics. William, son to the Earl of Dunbar, obtained a tooth, by which, as he afterwards affirmed, many sick persons were cured.* The Abbot Adam de Harkaris, died in 1245.

XVI. MATTHEW, the cellarer of Melros, was elected abbot, on the 19th of April, 1246. He retired from this office in July, 1261, and delivered the seal of the abbey into the custody of the prior. Bodily infirmity is stated as the cause of his resigning; but, according to another account, he did it by order of the abbot of Rievall, who was displeased with him for some reason which he did not divulge.† The monks were attached to him, and regretted his removal, on account of his kind attention to their welfare. He was indulgent to them with regard to food, allowing them a finer sort of bread, called pittance bread, on Fridays in Lent, when they were obliged to live upon bread and water only. He had been the means of obtaining some desirable gifts to the community, and had increased their comfort by erecting convenient buildings and offices. One of his works was a magnificent hall which he built on the bank of the river, for himself and his successors.‡ In 1249, Alexander II. died, and was buried at Melros, as he had directed, in a very elegant chapel, on the right side of the great nave.§

XVII. ADAM DE MAXTON, abbot of Newbottle, who had formerly been cellarer of Melros, was elected abbot, on the 1st of August, 1261. He was deposed, in 1267, by a general chapter of the Cistercian order, on account of his pride and obstinacy, which he had manifested in deposing Henry, abbot of Holm-Cultram, by his own private authority, when he ought first to have consulted his brethren at the general chapter. The abbot of Holm-Cultram was, at the same time, restored.||

In 1265, the western isles of Scotland, which had long been in the possession of the Norwegians, were yielded to Scotland by a treaty, whereby King Alexander III. engaged to pay to the King of Norway four thousand merks, within four years from the date of the treaty, and one hundred merks a-year ever after. The negotiations, on the part of Scotland, were conducted by a monk of Melros, called Reginald of Roxburgh, who was sent as ambassador to the court of Norway. *

XVIII. JOHN DE EDERHAM, master of the novices, was the next abbot. He was excommunicated, together with many of the monks, by a sentence of the Scottish clergy, at a provincial council, held at Perth, in 1268, when it was proved that they had broken the peace of the district of Wedale, by violently entering the houses belonging to the bishop of St Andrews, where they killed one ecclesiastic, and wounded many others. He ceased from being abbot the same year, having probably been deposed for the same misdeeds.†

XIX. ROBERT DE KELDELETH, after he had been subject to various turns of fortune, was made abbot of Melros, in 1268. Originally a Benedictine monk at Dunfermline, he was elected abbot of that monastery in 1240, and was afterwards chancellor of Scotland. In 1251, he was charged with having conspired with Alan Durward, the chief justiciary, who had married an illegitimate sister of the king, to procure the legitimation of that lady at the court of Rome, that, in the event of the king's death, she might succeed to the throne. His accusers, Walter Comyn, Earl of Menteith, and William, Earl of Mar, alleged that he had solicited the people to that effect, with letters and gifts, and had even used the great seal of the kingdom to forward the design. Henry III. of England, to whom the charges had been privately communicated, laid them before King Alexander, and the barons of Scotland, when assembled at York to celebrate the nuptials of the young king with Henry's daughter, the chancellor himself being present, who, immediately upon his return to Scotland, resigned the seals and retired to his abbey. But a quarrel arising between him and the monks, who accused him of pride and obstinacy, perhaps thinking themselves at liberty to treat him disrespectfully after his disgrace at court, he, in a few weeks, quitted the abbey entirely, and, for protection from his enemies, the counsellors and guardians of the young king, withdrew into the Cistercian monastery of Newbottle, where he became a private monk. It is probable that the charges brought against him as chancellor were afterwards discredited; for we find Comyn and his party removed from power, and Alan, the justiciary, in favour both with the English and Scottish king. Robert de Keldelth died in 1273, having been abbot of Melros five years. According to Dempster, he wrote De Successione Abbatum de Melros, lib. i. Florilegium Spirituale, lib. i.*

XX. PATRICK DE SELKIRKE, one of the monks, was now raised to the abbot's office. How long he continued in it is uncertain, as our only constant guide, the Melros Chronicle, goes with us no farther; nor do the other historians, who occasionally mention the affairs of the monasteries, afford us means of ascertaining the regular succession of the abbots from this period.

In the year 1291, Edward I, acting upon his usurped authority as feudal lord of Scotland, granted a letter of protection for one year to the abbot and convent of Melros; and he renewed to them this assurance annually for several years. But, in 1296, when King John Baliol, encouraged, it is said, by the advice of the abbot of Melros, and others, † attempted to resist his encroachments, the English monarch, pretending that the lands, and every thing belonging to Scotsmen, were forfeited to him by the rebellion of their king against his feudal sovereign, seized, with the property of other communities and individuals, the lands and possessions of the abbey of Melros, which, however, he soon restored to the proprietors, upon their consenting to do him homage as their liege lord. The monks of Melros, with Patrick, their abbot, swore fealty to the conqueror at Berwick, on the 20th of August; and they obtained his letters, commanding the restitution of their property, dated at the same place, on the 2d of September, ‡ addressed to the sheriffs of Berwick, Ayr, Jedworth, Peebles, Edinburgh, Rokesburgh, Dumfries, Northumberland, and Cumberland, in each of which districts, some part of the possessions of this wealthy monastery was situated.

Hugh Audley, who attended the English king in his expedition against Scotland, in 1303, being lodged at Melros abbey, with sixty men at arms under his command, was attacked in the night by Comyn, the regent of Scotland, who forced the abbey gates, and killed several of the English. Sir Thomas

Grey fled over the bridge, and defended himself in a house until it was in flames over his head, when he came out, and yielded himself prisoner. *

King Edward's letters of protection, renewed from year to year, did not effectually shield the monastery from the ravages of war, during this period of fierce hostility. The monks complained of the losses and damage they had suffered; and, for their better security, obtained from the king the confirmation of their charters, and permission to cut down timber to the amount of forty oaks, in the forest of Selkirk, in order to repair their houses, which were burned and demolished in the war.† They also besought the monarch to take into his consideration that they had never received payment for fifty-five sacks of wool, purchased from them on his account by Sir Hugh de Cressingham, when he was treasurer of Scotland; and for fourteen sacks of wool, and one last of leather, purchased from them, on the same account, by Sir Osbert de Spaldington, sheriff of Berwick. For the settlement of these debts, Edward, in his reply, referred them to his chamberlain of Scotland. ‡

The abbot of Melros was one of the ten commissioners appointed by the national council of Scotland, who met at Westminster, in September, 1305, with twenty commissioners from the English parliament, and settled a plan of government and police for Scotland, as a dependent state under the English sovereignty.§

WILLIAM de FOGHOU was abbot in 1310;|| and the name of William, abbot of Melros, is found among the witnesses to various charters until the year 1329.¶ In 1313 he had a letter of protection from Edward II; and, on the 6th of October, 1316, that king being at York, gave him a letter of safe-conduct, that he might come to him unmolested.** At the desire of the convent of Holm-Cultram, Edward again granted a letter of safe-conduct, on the 12th of August, 1318, to the abbot of Meuros, with two of the monks, and their necessary attendants, to pass to Holm-Cultram, there to preside at the election of an abbot, the monks being forbidden, by their rules, to choose their superior, except in the presence of the said abbot of Meuros, their maternal house.*

It may reasonably be conjectured, that the Abbot William, in his several interviews with the King of England, endeavoured to cultivate his good will, with a view to the safety of his monastery in times of invasion. Edward gave him another letter of safe-conduct, on the 20th of July, 1319,† to enable him to come and confer with him when he was in the north, preparing to enter Scotland with a hostile army, a design which he found himself unable at that time to execute, otherwise than by laying siege to Berwick, without effect. He succeeded little better when he invaded Scotland with a great force in the autumn of 1322, and advanced as far as Edinburgh; for, being baffled by the prudence and caution of his enemies, he was obliged to retire, after his army had suffered greatly from want of provisions, the Scots having removed their corn and cattle, and adverse winds having disappointed him of his supplies by sea. In his retreat, he did as much mischief as he could, and spoiled several religious houses, beginning with the abbey of Holyrood.‡ Intending to lodge at Melros, he sent forward three hundred men-at-arms to prepare for his reception; but the Lord Douglas, who lay in the neighbouring forest with a party of his followers, having intelligence of their movements, got unobservedly to the abbey before them, and waited till they came up, when, rushing out suddenly, he attacked and killed a considerable number of the three hundred, the remainder having fled to rejoin the main army. The signal was given by a sturdy friar on horseback, armed with a spear, who, being set to watch the enemy's approach, began the fray himself with great intrepidity, as soon as they reached the abbey wall.§

This ill-timed exploit could not but kindle the resentment of Edward

§ BARBOUR, xviii. 291. This event is not related by Fordun; and Barbour takes no notice of the consequent destruction of the abbey. Wyntoun omits this expedition of Edward II. altogether. and his army, already exasperated by their severe losses and privations. Therefore, when they came up, they shewed no mercy ; but, entering the dormitory, they slew there the prior, William de Peblis, with an infirm monk, and two lay brothers who were blind, and inflicted deadly wounds on many of the other monks. They likewise pillaged and destroyed the monastery, reducing it to a state of ruin and desolation. Among the plunder, they sacrilegiously carried away the silver pix from the church, when they had taken out of it, and profanely cast on the high altar, the host, or consecrated wafer, which their religion taught them to consider as the real body of Christ. From Melros, the army proceeded to the neighbouring monastery, at Dryburgh, which they burnt to ashes ; and, on their way homewards, did the like damage to many other religious places of smaller consequence.*

When the successive renewal of truces between the two nations, and the increasing firmness of the state of Scotland under the good government of King Robert I, afforded the encouraging prospect of continuing peace and security, the convent of Melros began to think of restoring their church and monastery, which lay in ruins. In this undertaking they were liberally assisted by the munificence of the king, who, to enable them to rebuild their church with a suitable degree of splendour, granted them, in the year 1326, two thousand pounds sterling, a sum equal, in intrinsic value, to six thousand pounds, which, in proportional or exchangeable value, was then equal to fifty thousand pounds of the money of the present day.† This sum, which was to be paid out of the fines, forfeited lands, and other revenues of the crown, within the sheriffdom of Roxburgh, was raised chiefly from the baronies of Cesford and Eckford, forfeited by Sir Roger de Mowbray, and the lands of Nesbit, Langnewton, Maxton, and Caverton, forfeited by William Lord Soulis. ‡ The present beautiful fabric, which is still the object

The interests of the monks were not forgotten in the treaty of peace, and final settlement of the disputes between England and Scotland, in 1328, when it was stipulated, on both sides, that the lands and pensions belonging to religious houses, in either country, should be restored to them.*

King Robert augmented the revenues of the abbey with other considerable gifts; and, in 1329, a few weeks before his death, to confirm and secure his benefactions to the same, he addressed a letter to his son, and his other successors in the kingdom, earnestly recommending to their favour the monastery of Melros, where he appointed that his heart should be entombed, and entreating them to shew such kindness to the monks as might encourage them to pray for him with greater fervour after his death. He also earnestly enjoined them to permit the said monks to enjoy the rents he had assigned them for rebuilding their church, increasing them, if necessary, rather than diminishing them, and to defend them against their enemies.† The king died on the 7th of June; and having directed that his

The next year, therefore, that gallant nobleman, with a numerous retinue, set out for Palestine, bearing the king's heart enclosed in a silver casket; but, in passing through Spain, happening to find King Alphonso at war with the Saracens, he could not avoid indulging at once his martial spirit, and his religious antipathy, by taking an active part against those enemies of Christendom; and, after exhibiting prodigies of valour, he fell in battle. Sir William Sinclair, Sir Robert Logan, and many other Scottish noblemen, also fell, upon which the rest of the party returned to Scotland; and the heart of King Robert, being brought back by Sir William Keith, was, in the end, entombed at Melros, his body having been magnificently interred under the grand altar of the church of Dunfermline abbey.*

The monks were probably still engaged in rebuilding their monastery, when the country was again involved in war, by the attempt of Edward Baliol, in 1332, to seat himself on the throne of Scotland. When he agreed to hold his crown as a vassal of England, in return for the interested support he received from Edward III, and all persons of rank and consideration in the country were required, under the penalty of forfeiture, to swear fealty and do homage to that monarch, the abbot and convent of

Melros were among those who complied, and were allowed to retain possession of their estates ; for which purpose, he gave them letters of protection, dated at Berwick, July 26, 1333.*

THOMAS DE SOLTRE may have been abbot of Melros at this time, as his name occurs, so designated, in a grant to the abbey of Dryburgh, which appears to have been made in 1338, by Sir William de Feltoun, sheriff of Roxburgh, † who held that office in 1336, and several following years.

During this stormy period, when the King of Scotland was a minor, residing for safety in a foreign country, and the nation distracted with war, faction, and usurpation, there is no account of any injury or disturbance having been suffered by the convent, although living in a disputed territory, the field of the most frequent conflicts, in consequence of the cession of Teviotdale, and six more of the southern counties of Scotland, by Edward Baliol, in 1334, to the King of England, to be annexed to his dominions for ever. It was no doubt the most prudent course for the monks, and the most suitable to their profession, to confine their attention to their religious and charitable offices, and, by timely yielding to the necessity of their circumstances in paying the contributions that might be required of them, to endeavour to give no offence to any party ; and to this conduct, it may be presumed, they owed their safety.

It is recorded, that Edward III, being at Melros, in warlike array, in 1338, Sir William Douglas intercepted a supply of provisions that were bringing to him on Christmas eve, and therewith victualled the castle of Hermitage, which he had taken from the English a little while before. ‡ But as King Edward was at this time in Flanders, there must be some error, either in the date or the circumstances of this transaction. We are also informed, that the winter after the siege of Tournay, 1340, the King of England went to Melros during a truce, whence he made an excursion into the forest of Ettrick, in very stormy weather, and, returning again to Melros, celebrated the festival of Christmas there, and held a tournament, which was attended by Sir William Douglas, and three other Scottish knights ; when Douglas justed, in the king's presence, with Henry of Lancaster, Earl of Derby, who, having heard of his numerous deeds of valour, greatly desired his acquaintance, and had challenged him to this chivalrous sport.* The tilting appears to have been at Roxburgh, where Derby, who was the king's lieutenant, lay with his forces.† In the first course, Douglas's spear broke, and a splinter of it hurt his hand; whereupon the Earl of Derby, who was one of the most courteous, as well as most brave and generous men in England at that time, would not suffer him to just any longer. This gave occasion to another tilting match at Berwick, on the following Easter, between twenty English and twenty Scottish knights, which lasted three days, when two English knights, and a knight and a squire of Scotland, were slain.‡

WILLIAM is the name of the next abbot of Melros, of whose existence there is any evidence. He is mentioned in charters dated 1342, 1343, 1354, and 1369. § About this time lived PETER FENTON, one of the monks, who wrote A Metrical History of the Life of King Robert the Bruce. It is not known whether any copy of this work be yet in existence. From an imperfect copy of it, Patrick Gordon drew some of the materials of his poetical history of the same king, composed in stanzas of eight lines, and printed at Dort in 1615. In the preface he says, "My friend, Donald Farquharson, brought me a book of virgin parchment, which he had found among the rest of his books. It was old and torn, almost illegible, in many places wanting leaves, yet it had the beginning, and had been set down by a monk, in the abbey of Melros, called Peter Fenton, in the year of God 1369. It was in old rhyme, like to Chaucer, and had many remarkable tales, worthy to be noted, and also probable, agreeing with the truth of the history." ||

The Scots, by their well directed efforts and persevering courage, had delivered the whole of their country from the dominion of their enemies, in 1342, when David II. returned from France, and assumed the reins of government. But after their fatal overthrow, and the capture of their king, in the battle of Neville's Cross, near Durham, in 1346, the southern counties were again occupied by the English, and the inhabitants reduced to that state of partial and hated subjection, which they had hitherto borne so impatiently, and which now lasted almost forty years. During this period, the monks of Melros, in common with their neighbours, felt the inconveniencies and vexations incident to such an unhappy state. In 1365, they were accused of selling wool and victuals to their countrymen, and of traitorously defrauding the King of England of his customs or dues. In 1375, Edward gave them liberty to purchase, in Norfolk or Suffolk, two hundred quarters of barley, or malt, for the use of the convent, for prompt payment, and to carry it by sea from the port of Lynn to Berwick, and thence by land to the abbey. They had letters of protection, with a similar permission to buy victual in England, in 1377.*

The Scottish frontiers were at last, by the persevering exertions of the Earl of Douglas, wrested from the enemy in 1384, and the inhabitants again became formidable to their late oppressors. To punish and repel their aggressions, Richard II. entered Scotland with a great army, in 1385, and wasted the country on all sides, as he marched through Teviotdale to Edinburgh, being exasperated by the difficulties he experienced from want of provisions, the Scots having removed their corn and cattle to inaccessible parts of the country. He lodged one night in the abbey at Melros, and caused it to be burned the next morning. Dryburgh, Newbottle, and other religious houses and churches, met with similar treatment.† It is asserted, that he intended at first to spare the monasteries and churches, and, as a token of peace and protection, caused his banners to be fixed on the gates of the abbeys of Melros and Newbottle; but that some Englishmen who remained behind after the army had advanced, having been killed there, he, in his anger and revenge, commanded that they should be burned and destroyed.‡

Richard perhaps felt some compunction for the sacrilegious acts thus committed under his authority; for, when a truce was concluded, in October, 1389, he granted the monks of Melros a reduction of two shillings of the duty upon each sack of wool of Scottish growth, to the number of a thousand sacks, which they should send to be exported from Berwick. He gave them and their servants, likewise, within the bounds of their abbey, a protection from pillagers or plunderers, with licence to buy and sell in

Northumberland and Cumberland. * To protect them from the licentious among their own countrymen, Robert III. gave them, on the 4th of April, 1400, a letter, addressed to his subjects in general, forbidding them to injure or molest the abbot or convent, or their servants, cattle, or goods, and ordering that the half of every fine incurred by the infraction of this mandate should be paid to the said abbot and convent. †

DAVID BENYN, or BINNING, is the next abbot whose name has been found on record. He had permission from Henry IV, December 2, 1409, to go, with twelve servants in his company, to Canterbury, abide there, and return again to Scotland, within a year, without hurt or molestation. ‡ In 1422, he excommunicated John Haig of Bemerside, and his servants, for certain alleged trespasses and oppressions committed by them upon the servants and cattle of the convent, on their land at Redpath. §

JOHN FOGO, a monk of Melros, and doctor of divinity, was abbot in 1425, when he was sent to Rome, with other prelates, on an embassy from King James I. He was the king's confessor, and appears to have been a man of learning and ability. He had previously distinguished himself as an active partizan of Pope Martin V, in opposition to the adherents of the antipope, Benedict XIII. || He endeavoured, both with argument and authority, to stop the progress of the opinions, now beginning to be diffused in Scotland, respecting the errors and corruptions of the papal system; and is said to have had a principal hand in the condemnation of Paul Crawar, the Bohemian, who was burned at St Andrews in 1433, for preaching the doctrines taught by the reformers, Wiclif and Huss. ¶ Crawar came into Scotland as a physician, well recommended, and he embraced with zeal and success the opportunities his profession afforded him of inculcating his opinions, which he was able to confirm by his readiness and accuracy in quoting from the Holy Scriptures. His bitterest opponent was Laurence of Lindores, the pope's inquisitor, who condemned him.** The abbot himself took a different side from the inquisitor, in a question which was then agitated concerning the obligation of the King of Scots, by treaty, not to make peace with the King of England without the

RICHARD LUNDY is mentioned in the Chartulary as a monk in 1428, and as abbot in 1440 and 1442. †

ANDREW HUNTER, abbot of Melros, and confessor to James II, was much employed in affairs of state. He was sent to France on an embassy in 1448, with the chancellor and the bishop of Dunkeld; and was concerned in all the negotiations with England, from that time till 1460. He held the office of lord high treasurer of Scotland, from 1449 till 1453. ‡ His armorial bearings are carved on one of the buttresses of the church: they are two crosiers, or pastoral staves in saltier, and two hunting horns, with a rose in chief, and a mallet in base; a device signifying the name of the abbey, mallet being in the Scottish dialect mell. The initials A. M. are on the right and left of the shield, which is supported by two mermaids. In 1452, Alexander Geddes, one of the monks, a licentiate in theology, was admitted regent, or teacher of philosophy, in the lately established university of Glasgow. §

WILLIAM was the next abbot. He was a commissioner of truce in June, 1460. ||

RICHARD, abbot of Melros, was a commissioner of truce in 1473; and his name occurs as a witness to a charter of James III. to the church of Glasgow, in 1476. ¶

JOHN FRAZER, abbot of Melros, was descended from a good family of the same name in Tweeddale, and was respected for his worth and hospitality. He was promoted to the episcopal see of Ross in 1485, where he completed the building of the cathedral church. He was a privy counsellor and lord of session. He died in 1507, aged 78. **

In the course of the century, which was now drawing to a close, it appears that the discipline of the cloister had fallen into great neglect and disuse throughout Europe. That renunciation of property, abstinence and simplicity in food and clothing, and other artificial virtues, strictly enjoined by the monastic rules, were now rarely practised. Not only the abbots and other superiors kept luxurious tables, dwelt in magnificent halls, wore costly garments, and were attended by youths of good families as pages, in rich liveries, but the private monks also spurned the sober fare, homely garb, and devout retirement of their predecessors. They kept horses, and, upon various pretences, were continually going about in public; they lived separately, upon portions allowed them out of the common stock; they bought their own clothes, which were of the finest materials that could be procured; and the common dormitory in which they slept was now partitioned off into separate chambers. That many of them greatly erred in "weightier matters" than these, was, for no slight reasons, commonly asserted and believed; but these were the principal grounds on which the visitors, who, from time to time, were sent by the chief authorities to examine into the conduct of the brethren of their respective orders, rested their complaints.* In the time of Innocent VIII, who wielded the papal sceptre from 1484 till 1492, the general chapter at Cisteaux, by his injunction, commissioned John Schanwell, abbot of Cupar, to visit and reform the Cistercian monasteries in Scotland; when, from some cause of this nature, not specifically recorded, he deposed the abbots of Melros, Dundrainan, and Sweetheart abbey.† As there is no precise date to this transaction, in the record where it is incidentally mentioned, and the names of the deposed are not given, we are left to conjecture who this abbot of Melros may have been; but if he was the Abbot Bernard, he must have been speedily restored.

WILLIAM, the next abbot, appears to have been a son of Sir Walter Scott of Howpasly. His name occurs in 1504 and 1506.‡

ROBERT was abbot in 1310.§

Some years after this, there is reason to think that a nephew of James Beaton, archbishop of St Andrews, was abbot. Pitscottie states, that the “abbacy of Melrose, with many other benefices,” were given to James Beaton, who was bishop of Glasgow till 1522, when he was removed to St Andrews. This probably means that he had the disposal of them; and Dr Magnus, in a letter, informs Cardinal Wolsey, that “the abbots of Melros and Dunfermline, both brethren, and nephews to the archbishop, be slain.”* This letter is dated 13th September, 1526, which must be wrong, as there is undoubted evidence that the abbey was vacant for some time in 1524 and 1525, when there was an active competition for it, which ended in the appointment of Andrew Durie. The Earl of Angus was desirous to obtain it for his brother, and besought Cardinal Wolsey to use his influence with the court of Rome to that effect, in a letter, dated 27th November, 1524, where he says, “Also, it will ples your grace to remember that I wrat to you for the byshopyrk of Moray, and for the abbay of Melros, whilkis are baith vacant. I beseik zour grace for the bullis of thaim, an or baithe, as zour grace thinks expedient, and I sall redownd zour grais all costs and expensis ye make yair upon.”† He wrote again to the same effect, on the 29th March, 1525.‡

In the meantime, Margaret, the queen dowager, Angus’s wife, was endeavouring to procure this rich benefice for John Maxwell, abbot of Dundrainan, brother to the Lord Maxwell, an agreement having been made, that an annual pension of a thousand pounds Scots money should be secured to her out of the revenues of the abbey, if she procured his appointment. For this end, she caused letters to be written in the name of her son James V, then under age, and likewise urgently solicited both her brother Henry VIII. and Wolsey to forward the same, by their interest at the papal court. She did not conceal her own selfish views in this transaction, but urged them as a motive to greater diligence in the cause. On the 23d of January, 1525, she thus writes to King Henry:—“Item, gif it ples your grace to remember that I have written of before, for the expeditioun of the bullis of Melrose, for quhilk I will have sped to me ane pensioun of £ M. yerlie, quhilk will help me in sunn part, richt humilie beseiking your grace to help me to the furthering of that promotioun to my Lord Maxwell’s bruder, for quhill§ the said promotioun be sped, I will not get the said pensioun. Scottis money, for the expeditione of the said pensioune.”* On the 12th May, she thus addresses Wolsey: — “My Lord Cardynal, I comend me hartly to you, and wold be glad to here fro you, and of your good helth. My lord, I trust zo remember that I dyd vryt to the kyng’s grace, my brothar, for the expedycyon of Mellorz, and accordyng to his graecys reqwest it is sped, whareof I thank his grace humbly, and you, my lord, for your part, prayeng you hartly that ze desyr the kyng’s grace, my brothar, to vryte to the pape that no nuthar be sped in the cause, for and it be, it wyl dysaventache me a thowsand pound that I suld have yerly.”†

The friends of the princess, and the regent, however, did not second their views with sufficient zeal and ability to prevent the appointment of ANDREW DURIE, a member of an ancient family of that name in Fife, who, being recommended by a letter, written likewise in the name of the King of Scots, to the pope, appears to have obtained the abbacy through his commendation. But the effect of this was annulled by an act of parliament, on the 14th of June, 1526, in which the king, who was still a minor, under the guardianship of Angus, is made to disavow any knowledge of the letter in favour of Durie, and to confirm his former recommendation of Maxwell.‡ Although this was followed, November 17, 1526, by a farther ratification of all the acts and statutes before made in favour of “Dene Johne Maxwell, abbot of Melros, anent the abbacy of Melros, contrair Mr Andro Dury,” yet the appointment of the latter was finally allowed and confirmed, at least as early as September 24, 1527. §

The general chapter at Cisteaux made a new effort to restore their ancient discipline in 1533; and a commissioner was sent to visit and reform the monasteries of that order in Scotland. The faults which particularly called forth his animadversion, were infringements of the rule which forbade the brethren to possess any private property, but to have all things in common. It was found that many of the monks, especially in the abbeys of Melros, Newbottle, and Balmerino, had not only portions and pensions allowed them for their food and clothing, but that each monk had also a garden appropriated to his own particular use and pleasure. The visitor, therefore, in his visitation roll, specified these things as illicit indulgences, which he enjoined them forthwith to relinquish. The monks in general murmured at this, and some of them excused themselves by saying, that it would be time enough for them to enter upon such a reform when the convent at Melros, which was the chief house of their order in Scotland, had set them the example. Next year, therefore, the general chapter gave authority to Donald, abbot of Cupar, and Walter, abbot of Glenluce, to charge Andrew, abbot of Melros, upon pain of deposition, to carry the said reformation into immediate effect, and to punish with excommunication the monks who, after twenty days' warning, should prove refractory. The reluctant monks, who evidently regarded the proposed reform as a useless and needless retrenchment of their comforts, met at Edinburgh, probably by delegates, and addressed the commissioners in a petition and remonstrance. They denied that they could justly be charged with possessing property, since they had nothing but what the abbot allowed them, and which they were willing to resign when required by him ; and they begged to be permitted to retain the harmless indulgences which their predecessors, for a hundred years past, had enjoyed, alleging, that to deprive them of these, implied a severe and harsh censure, at which their consciences revolted, against those grave and holy men whom they had always been taught to look up to as of more wisdom, prudence, and learning, and better acquainted with the rules of pious living than themselves. In conclusion, they prayed that farther proceedings might be delayed, until they should have an opportunity of appealing to the general chapter. The commissioners assented to their request, with certain restrictions, viz. 1. They might retain their private gardens, provided no monk had a larger one than another, and that a common way was made through all the gardens, by opening a passage from one to another ; the productions of the whole being made a common stock, and applied to the use of the convent. 2. They might enjoy their separate portions ; but double portions were forbidden,* and they were not to have the disposal of what might be left, which was to be dispensed to the domestics and others, by a proper officer appointed by the community. 3. They might receive from the bursar only as much money as would purchase what was immediately wanted, until the abbot, or a person officially charged, should provide a stock of the necessary articles of clothing. The abbot of Melros was to expend immediately 200 marks; the abbot of Newhottle £100; and the abbot of Balmerino, 100 marks, Scots money, for this purpose.*

Efforts, such as these, to revive the obsolete and useless practices, and factitious virtues, of more ancient times, responded but feebly to the public voice, which began to call more loudly for a complete and effectual reform of the real and scandalous abuses of religion, which were now the subject of general animadversion and satire. But the Scottish clergy, both regular and secular, with the exception of a few individuals, saw not the necessity of correcting either their personal errors or those of their system. They appear to have felt little alarm for the safety of their institutions, and probably regarded the call for reformation as a temporary clamour, arising from the excitement of passing events; because, though the opinion of its necessity had long been gaining ground, recent events, and the example of other countries, had indeed given encouragement to the open and general expression of that opinion. They felt a degree of security also in the support they received from the king, who, although he is said to have warmly recommended to the clergy to amend their lives,† yet continued firm in his adherence to the doctrines and institutions of popery; being encouraged thereto by the prelates, among whom, in preference to the nobility, he chose his counsellors and chief ministers, on account of their superior learning and ability, and who took prudent care not to offend him by objecting to his cupidity when he appropriated to himself the profits of some of the richest benefices of the church. We find him, in 1535, invested with the administration of the revenues of Melros abbey, in the character of bailie, or seneschal of the monastery;‡ and he obtained more complete possession of the benefice in 1541, when he procured the resignation of the abbot, that he might confer it upon his infant son, and reap the fruits of it in his name.* Out of these, Durie, on his retiring, had an annual pension of a thousand marks granted him, and was, at the same time, made bishop of Galloway. He died in 1558.†

JAMES STEWART, an illegitimate son of King James V, by Elizabeth Shaw, was appointed abbot, or commendator, of the abbeyes both of Melros and Kelso, in 1541, being then in his infancy. He died in 1558.

Melros received a hostile visit, in 1544, from some of the parties of Englishmen, under the command of Sir Ralph Eure, and Sir Brian Laiton, when they did much damage to the abbey, and barbarously defaced the tombs of the Douglasses therein, — an insult which was avenged the following year by the signal defeat of the same enemies on Ancrum Muir.‡ On the night before this battle, they came suddenly from Jedburgh, where they had stationed themselves, expecting to surprise the little army of Scots, with the Earl of Arran, who lay at Melros; but not finding them, they ravaged and burned the town, and were returning to Jedburgh with the spoils, when they were overtaken and defeated by the Scots, who had now been reinforced.§ In September, the same year, the abbey of Melros, with the other border monasteries that were not already destroyed, were burned and demolished by the army commanded by the Earl of Hertford, which laid waste the whole of the Mers and Teviotdale. It is probable, that on account of the progress of the Reformation, and other events, the abbey was never restored from the state of ruin to which it was now reduced.

CARDINAL GUISE became commendator of Melros abbey, upon the death of James Stewart, in 1558, being appointed by his sister, Mary of Lorraine, the queen dowager, who was then regent. He enjoyed the benefice a very short time, and perhaps never participated of its fruits, as the revenues of this and the other monasteries were seized by the lords of the reformed party, in the name of the government, in 1559, and committed, in trust, to the Earl of Arran. The property of this and other religious houses, was annexed to the crown, in 1560, by a statute, which provided that the sovereign should not have power to alienate it; but this article was rendered nugatory by various subsequent acts of parliament, authorizing grants of different portions of this property to individuals, favoured by the court, on account of their public services, or for other reasons. When the revenues of all the great benefices were valued, in 1561, the rent of the abbey of Melros was stated as follows :—

Scots money, £1758.
 Wheat, 14 chalders, 9 bolls.
 Bear, [barley,] 56 chald. 5 bolls.
 Meal, 78 chald. 13 bolls, 1 firloft.
 Oats, 44 chald. 10 bolls.
 Capons, 84.
 Poultry, 620.
 Butter, 105 stone.
 Salt, 8 chalders. Paid out of Prestonpans.
 Peats, 340 load.
 Carriages, 500.

Out of this income an allowance was granted to eleven monks, and three portioners, of twenty marks a-year to each, with the addition of four bolls of wheat, one chalders of barley, and two chalders of meal to the monks. The dean of the chapter, John Watson, embraced the reformed religion. * There is no account of what became of the rest of the monks ; but it may reasonably be conjectured, that their number would be much reduced some time previous to the Reformation, in order that the revenue, paid to government in the name of the abbot, James Stewart, during his minority, might be increased. The number seems to have varied, at different periods, from sixty to a hundred monks, with nearly an equal number of lay brethren. In the year 1520, there were eighty monks ; in 1540, there were seventy, and sixty lay brethren ; and, in 1542, according to a visitation roll inspected by Mr Hay, the number of monks was one hundred. † In another document preserved by the same industrious collector, they are stated to have been two hundred, the lay brethren apparently being included in this number.* They received annually, for their consumption, sixty bolls [modia] of wheat, and three hundred casks of ale. For the service of the mass they received eighteen casks of wine; and for the entertainment of strangers, thirty bolls of wheat, forty casks of ale, and twenty casks of wine. For the nourishment of the sick, they were allowed four thousand livres Tournois; and the barber, who was also surgeon to the community, received a salary of a hundred livres. †

In 1564, there was a commendator of Melros, named MICHAEL, ‡ who was also summoned to parliament in each of the three years immediately following. But the estates of the abbey were granted by Queen Mary, in 1566, to JAMES HEPBURN, Earl of Bothwell, by whose forfeiture, in 1567, they reverted again to the crown; and the usufruct, with the title of commendator, was conferred, the following year, upon JAMES DOUGLAS, second son to Sir William Douglas of Lochleven. § He made a collection of all the original evidences of the rights and property of the monastery, which were preserved, until a recent period, in the archives of the Earls of Morton, of whose family his father, Sir William, became the representative, in 1588, by inheritance. In 1587, FRANCIS, Earl of Bothwell, petitioned in parliament for the inheritance of the forfeited James, Earl of Bothwell, which was granted as far as it respected the original heritage; the lands held of other superiors being excepted, and likewise “the abbacie of Melros pertaining in property to James Douglas, the commendatour.” || In 1591, King James VI. granted to Archibald Douglas, son to the commendator, a pension for life, of “sex monkis portionis furth of the abbay of Melros, and of the superplus of the third thereof, in consideratioun of the guid, trew, and thankfull service done to his hieness be his weilbelovit James, commendator of the said abbay.” ¶

§ Ibid. The appointment was doubtless owing to the affection of the regent, Earl of Moray, who was an illegitimate son of James V, by the commendator's mother.

|| Acts of the Parliament of Scotland, iii. 596.

¶ Ibid. Mr Milne thinks it probable that Douglas disposed of this pension to Mr John Hamilton, since, “by the grant afterwards made to Thomas, Earl of Melros, he purchases a demission from Mr John Hamilton, commendator of Melros, for demitting the said abbey.” MILNE'S Description of Melros.

Sir John Ramsay, who had been created Viscount Haddington, for his services in preserving the king from the treasonable attempt of the Earl of Gowrie and his brother, Alexander Ruthven, had a chartered grant, on the 28th of August, 1609, of all the lands and baronies which belonged to the abbey of Melros, with certain exceptions specified in the same grant, united into a lordship, to be called the lordship of Melros; and, at the same time, a handsome allowance was settled upon James Douglas, the commendator, during his life. Viscount Haddington was created Lord Ramsay of Melros, on the 25th of August, 1615; but he afterwards resigned this title in favour of his brother, Sir George Ramsay of Dalhousie, who, not being satisfied with it, obtained the king's consent, on the 5th of January, 1619, to change it for the title of Lord Ramsay of Dalhousie.* Lord Haddington, who was afterwards created Earl of Holderness, in England, appears to have disposed of the possessions belonging to the lordship of Melros, when he resigned the title to his brother; since we find that all the lands and baronies which belonged to the abbey of Melros were granted, by charter, on the 30th of September, 1618, to Sir Thomas Hamilton of Priestfield, who had already been raised to the peerage, in 1613, by the title of Lord Binning and Byres, and was likewise created Earl of Melros, on the 20th of March, 1619. The title of Viscount Haddington becoming extinct, by the death of the Earl of Holderness, in 1625, without issue, the Earl of Melros obtained a patent, suppressing his own title, and creating him Earl of Haddington, on the 27th of August, 1627. This eminent person, who held successively the offices of king's advocate, lord clerk register, secretary of state, lord president of the Court of Session, and keeper of the privy seal, died in 1637, in his 74th year. In his charter of the lordship of Melros, there are many additional exceptions of lands, the property or the feudal superiority of which was transferred to other individuals. Walter Scot, Earl of Buccleuch, whose forefathers had been hereditary bailies of the regality of Melros, under the abbots, had a considerable grant of lands, together with the advowson of the parish churches of Melros, Hassendean, and Cavers. His descendants, about the beginning of the eighteenth century, acquired, by purchase, the remainder of the abbey lands included in the lordship of Melros, which still form a part of the extensive possessions of the same noble family. When feudal jurisdictions were abolished in Scotland, by act of Parliament, in 1747, the Lady Isabella Scott was allowed the sum of twelve hundred pounds sterling, as a compensation for her right to this bailiery.

The unfortunate monks, who, at the Reformation, saw their community dispersed and their possessions alienated, beheld also their beautiful church in ruins, and their ancient halls and cloisters, if any thing of them had escaped destruction during the wars, or had been since restored, now completely demolished. The tumultuary violence of the populace, who in 1559 and 1560, in their zeal against popery, destroyed the monasteries and religious edifices throughout the kingdom, is thought to have been instigated and encouraged by such of the nobility, and others, as coveted, or had already been enriched by the plunder of the church. Apprehensive of the disappointment of their cupidity, if the ancient form of religion should be revived, they were naturally anxious that its abolition should be as complete as possible; and they might justly calculate, that it would be the interest of all those who had been instrumental in destroying monastic buildings, to promote the same end. It appears probable, from the pieces of burnt oak and melted lead, that have often been found by digging upon the site of the monastery, that its buildings were destroyed by fire. Afterwards, for more than a century, the ruins were repeatedly subjected to farther dilapidation, and the materials taken to construct other buildings. Douglas, the commendator, took down some part of the walls, and used the stones to build a house for himself, which is still standing, and has the date, 1590, with his own and his lady's name over one of the windows.* In 1618, a vault of rude masonry was thrown over part of the nave of the church, from which the ancient roof had fallen, and it was then fitted up as a place of worship for the parish, the stones used in its construction being taken from other parts of the ruins. At a subsequent period, they furnished materials for building a tolbooth, or prison, in the town, and for repairing the mills and sluices.† A great number of the stone images of saints, that stood in the numerous richly carved niches which adorn the walls, buttresses, and pinnacles of the church, escaped destruction till the year 1649, when they were almost all thrown down and demolished, but by whose authority, or on what occasion, has not been ascertained. The remains of a lofty building of excellent masonry, supposed to have been the bakehouse of the monastery, were taken down about 1695. It contained several well constructed ovens, one over another, in the different stories. A vaulted passage, or drain, of such dimensions, that two or three persons might easily walk in it abreast, went under ground from this place to several other parts of the convent.*

The cloisters, offices, and other buildings of the monastery, were situated on the north side of the church, towards the river Tweed, and appear to have been of considerable extent. The Reverend Adam Milne, minister of Melros, whose account of his parish, published in 1780, has frequently been referred to in these pages, says, that "the buildings within the convent, for the residence and service of the abbot and monks, with gardens, and other conveniencies, were once enclosed within an high wall, about a mile in circuit." Some traces of a building, with the bases of pillars, were still visible on the northeast side of the church, in Mr Milne's time, which he supposed to have been a large chapel, but which may rather be conjectured to have been the remains of the chapter-house, where the abbot and monks usually assembled to consult about their common affairs, and where the superiors and dignitaries of the community were elected. In monasteries, this edifice, it is well known, was generally built and ornamented with no less richness and elegance than the church itself. Adjoining to this were the foundations of another building, probably the house of the abbot; on the north side of which were the vestiges of a curious oratory, or private chapel, in which was discovered a large stone cistern, with a leaden pipe, for conveying water into it. "In ditching any place within the convent," continues Mr Milne, "particularly near the church, the foundations of houses have been discovered. Not only the monks had their houses there, but several gentlemen, that retired from the world, built themselves convenient lodgings; the ruins of one of these is only to be seen, called Chisholm's Tower."

* MILNE'S Description of the Parish of Melros.

DESCRIPTION OF THE RUINS.

THE other buildings being completely erased, the ruined church alone remains to indicate the ancient magnificence of this celebrated monastery. It is in the usual form of a Latin cross, with a square tower in the centre, eighty-four feet in height, of which only the west side is standing, raised upon a lofty pointed arch, and terminating on the summit, in a stone ballustrade, the rails of which form quatrefoils, and have immediately under them a frieze of roses in basso relievo.

The nave, extending westward from the central tower, consists of a middle avenue, and two narrow side aisles, there being a range of pointed arches on each side of the middle avenue, over which are windows, immediately under the eaves of the main roof, and above the roof of the side aisles. The pillars are all clustered, and the corbells, or capitals, from which the arches spring, and also the keystones of the vaults, are elegantly and grotesquely carved, with the likeness of fruit, flowers, vegetables, masks, historical figures, and religious emblems. Eight small square chapels, of uniform dimensions, corresponding with the breadth of the opposite arches of the interior, and separated from each other by thin partition walls of stone, run along the south side of the nave, and form an addition which contributes much to its lightness and roominess.* Each chapel is lighted by a pointed window, sixteen feet in height, and eight in breadth, having upright bars, or mullions, of stone, with rich tracery, varying in the different windows. The west end of the nave, and five of the chapels included in it, are now roofless. The end next the central tower is arched over, the side aisles and chapels with their original Gothic roof, and the middle avenue with a plain vault, thrown over it in 1618, when this part of the church was fitted up as a place of worship for the reformed religion. A new church was built for the parish, on a different spot, about twenty years ago; and it was then in contemplation to take down this vault, and the modern wall at the west end of it, and thus to open an unobstructed view of the whole interior of the ruins; but when, upon reflection, it was found that this would leave a free passage through the fabric for a strong current of wind, which might endanger the beautiful east window, it was resolved to let the encumbrances remain.

* One of the private chapels in this church was dedicated to St Stephen, and another to St Bridget. Before the altar of St Bridget's chapel was buried Sir William Douglas, the knight of Lothian. Chart. Mel. 101, v.

The transept has an arcade in the east side of it next the choir, of the same breadth with the side aisles of the nave. The north transept is roofless; but the original ribbed and groined vault still covers part of the south transept. It has eight windows; six looking to the east, and the other two to the north and south. The tracery of one of the windows in the north transept represents a crown of thorns. On the west side, upon two elevated niches in the wall, are statues of St Peter and St Paul; the one having a book and keys, the other a sword. In the north end is a recess in the wall containing fourteen pedestals for small statues. Under this is a door of Saxon architecture, opening into a low vaulted chamber, traditionally called the wax cellar, where the tapers, and other things used in religious worship, are supposed to have been kept. Near this are the remains of a turnpike stair; under the first step of which, there was formerly a small concealed vault; probably an armarium, in which the most precious effects of the monastery might have been secreted, in times of disturbance and danger. The stair was demolished in 1730.

There is a small door in the west side of the south transept, opening to a stair which winds to the top, in seventy-four steps, and leads to galleries in the south side of the nave. Upon the wall, near it, is the following inscription:—

John : murdo : sun : tyn : callit :
 was : E : and : born : in : parysse :
 certainly : and : had : in keying :
 al : mason : werk : of : santan

 pray : to : god : and : mari : baith :
 and : swet : sanct : iohn : to : keep : this : haly : kirk :
 fra : skaith.

Over the same door, a shield is carved, bearing compasses and fleurs-de-lys, probably to indicate the profession and native country of the architect. There is also an inscription, partly obliterated, above and beside the shield, which has been read thus :—

Sa gays y<sup>e</sup> compas rbyn about sa truth and laute do, but doute.
behaulde to y<sup>e</sup> hende q. iohne murdo.***

The choir, or chancel, is built in the form of half a Greek cross ; the east end of it, which was probably a chapel in honour of the blessed Virgin, being only half the breadth of the part next the transept. Here the greatest architectural taste is displayed, especially in the structure of the eastern window, which is strikingly elegant and beautiful. It is thirty-seven feet in height, and sixteen in breadth ; and has four upright bars, each about eight inches broad, straight from top to bottom, and, in the upper part, interwoven with tracery of a peculiarly light and graceful form. The original beautifully fretted and sculptured stone roof still covers the east end of the chancel ; and there lies on the floor, in the south side of it, a large slab of polished marble, of a greenish black colour, with petrified shells imbedded in it, and of a semi-hexagonal form, which is believed to cover the dust of King Alexander II, who was interred beside the high altar of this church in 1249.

The walls are strengthened on the outside with buttresses, some of which shoot up into elegant pinnacles ; and, when the building was entire, every buttress, and even every pillar, in the interior of the church, shot up through the roof into a pinnacle, adorned with niches, and terminating in a sharp crocketed point, springing from the midst of four miniature crocketed pediments. Flying buttresses, stretching from pinnacle to pinnacle, impended over the roof of the chapels in the nave, and over the roof of all the side aisles. Some of these, and many of the pinnacles remain, and are highly ornamental.

The outside of the fabric is every where profusely embellished with niches, having canopies of an elegant design, exquisitely carved, and some of them still containing statues. The east end and south transept are richest in sculpture. Around the pointed arch of the east window, is a range of niches, with mutilated statues in some of them ; and in the centre, over the point of the window, are two figures sitting, supposed to represent David I. and his queen, Matilda. They wear open crowns ; and the king has a globe in his left hand resting on his knee.

In the south transept is a deeply and richly moulded Gothic portal, which is now the principal entrance to the church. Over the point of the arch is carved a shield, bearing the royal arms of Scotland, a lion rampant, within a double tressure. In the front of the building, over this doorway, is a magnificent window, twenty-four feet in height, and sixteen in breadth, having four upright bars, which branch out and interlace each other at the top, in a variety of graceful curves. Over this window is a highly wrought niche that formerly held an image of Christ ; on either side of which, and upon the nearest buttresses, are other niches, which were once filled with figures of the twelve apostles. The carving upon the pedestals and canopies of the niches exhibits quaint and curious figures and devices. On the buttress at the west corner is a figure in monastic costume, supporting a pedestal, and holding a scroll, with this inscription, cu : venit : jes : seq : cessabit : umbra.* A pedestal corresponding to this, on the east corner, is upheld by a venerable monk, with a long beard, having a scroll, on which is inscribed, Passus. e : q : ipse : voluit. † Beneath the window is a statue of John the Baptist, with his eye directed upward, as if looking upon the image of Christ above, and bearing a label inscribed thus, Ecce filius Dei.

The buttresses and pinnacles on the east and west sides of the same transept, present a curious and entertaining variety of sculptured forms of plants and animals, both real and fabulous. “ Under some of the statues and pillars are figures of men, some with their legs crossed, and others leaning on one knee, putting back one of their hands to support their burdeus, the muscles of their neck standing out as crushed with pressure, and gaping with their mouths. On the southeast side are a great many musicians, admirably cut, with much pleasantness and gaiety in their countenances, having their instruments in their hands, such as the bagpipe, fiddles, dulcimers, organs, and the like ; also several nuns, with their veils, and others richly dressed." * On the same transept is a group executed with great spirit, consisting of a lame man on the shoulders of one that is blind.

* This inscription should perhaps be read, “ Cum venit Jesus, seculi cessavit umbra,— When Jesus came, the darkness of the world ceased.”

One of the most finely ornamented niches is on the side of a pinnacle over the nave, the canopy of which represents a temple, under which is an image of the Virgin, with the infant Jesus in her left arm. The head of the infant is demolished ; and tradition reports, that when the person who was employed to destroy the statues on the building, in 1649, was striking at this image, a piéce of it fell and hurt his arm, which was disabled ever afterwards. † Superstition proved here, though rather late, an antidote to blind zeal ; and to this circumstance is probably owing the preservation of the few statues that are left in the sixty-eight niches still remaining on the different parts of this highly finished edifice.

There are stone spouts stretching out from the caves, to carry the water from the roof, which are carved in the form of animals and strange figures with gaping mouths. One of these, on the roof of the nave, represents a sow playing on a bagpipe.

The apartments of the abbot are traditionally reported to have stood contiguous to the north side of the church. Some projecting fragments on the outside of the walls, make it probable that it was connected with the transept, where there is a Saxon arched doorway, at some height from the ground, which led into the church by a stair, now demolished. The threshold of this door appears to have been a tombstone, of a date anterior to the rebuilding of the church, from some heraldic figures engraven upon it, which are partly built upon. ‡

The cloisters formed a quadrangle on the northwest side of the church, one side of the square extending the whole length of the nave, which on this side has no buttresses. The wall of the north transept formed part of the east side ; and the remainder of the square may have been enclosed by the refectory, and the lodgings of the abbot and monks. There remain no vestiges of the arches of the cloister ; but, on the walls of the church, there are false arches, with seats in them, ornamented in a more florid style than the rest of the building ; especially seven of them, which are ranged along the wall of the north transept. The mouldings of these arches are composed of running flowers and foliage; and over them is a beautiful frieze, in square compartments, each representing a cluster of some plant, flower, or other figure, among which are lilies, ferns, grapes, house-leeks, oak leaves, with acorns, palm, holly, fir cones, scallops, quatrefoils, &c. The false arches on the north side of the nave, being eighteen in number, are similar to those in the wall of the transept, but less richly ornamented, except the first and the last in the range. An arched doorway, leading from the cloisters at the angle formed by the transept, is exquisitely carved. The foliage upon the capitals of the pilasters, on each side, is so nicely chiseled, that a straw can be made to penetrate through the interstices between the leaves and stalks. *

There are several tombstones within the church, belonging to the principal families in the neighbourhood, with inscriptions of comparatively modern date, and of no general interest. One of them, however, is remarkable for its brevity and simplicity:—HEIR LYIS THE RACE OF THE HOUS OF ZAIR.

On the wall of one of the chapels, in the south side of the nave, is an inscription, which has been read thus:—

niniani : katine :
thome : pauli : cuthb :
te : s : petre : ketigin. †

The following is upon an old tombstone in the churchyard:—

The earth goeth on the earth Glistring like gold. The earth goes to the earth Sooner than it wold.	The earth builds on the earth Castles and towers. The earth says to the earth All shall be ours.
---	---

* Through this door the aged monk, in the Lay of the Last Minstrel, led William of Deloraine to the grave of Michael Scott, after conducting him through the cloister.

† Mr Milne read it thus:—

Nunam : Katine,
Thome : Pauli Guthb.
te : s : Petr. : k. Etigin.

To one whose eye has been accustomed to range over the grand dimensions of the cathedral and collegiate churches of England, or who has had an opportunity of admiring some of the lofty and spacious ecclesiastical edifices of Normandy and Belgium, with their multiplied rows of arches and pillars, and "long drawn aisles," the termination of which is almost lost in the distant obscurity, the church of Melros abbey, upon the first view of it, though strikingly beautiful, is not, perhaps, sufficiently imposing, and does not satisfy the expectations formed from its great celebrity. Hence strangers have occasionally been heard to express a feeling of disappointment upon visiting it. But this feeling will generally give way to admiration and satisfaction, when, upon a more detailed examination of the fabric, the elegance and symmetry of its various parts, and the profusion of tasteful and exquisitely wrought ornaments, are duly observed. Intelligent persons, who visit it without having previously formed high expectations, will generally receive impressions similar to those expressed in the following letter to Roger Gale, Esq. written from Norham, July 14, 1742, by Mr Francis Drake of York : * —

"SIR, — I could heartily wish that some judicious brother of your Society [of Antiquaries] was but to see a Gothic rarity that is in this neighbourhood, viz. the beauteous ruins of the abbey of Melros, which I shall take upon me to say, has been the most exquisite structure of its kind in either kingdom. I won't say but other abbeys have been larger, such as St Albans, and some conventual churches more august, as Beverley; but this of Mailros is extravagantly rich in its imagery, niches, and all sorts of carving, by the best hands that Europe could produce at that time; nay, there is such a profusion of nice chiselwork, in foliage and flowers, at the very top of the steeple, that it cannot be seen from the ground, without the help of a glass. The capitals of every pillar that supports the arches of the church, and the doors, are all hollowed with a small tool; being wreathed work of all sorts of flowers, such as you have at the entrance of your chapter-house at York. Every brother has had a stall in the cloister, (now much demolished,) which have been variously adorned with leaves of fern, oak, palm, holly, or some other kind of trees.

* Printed in HUTCHINSON'S View of Northumberland, vol. ii. p. 282.

“The building, from the steeple to the east end, is entire in the walls ; but the roof, (which has been of stone, and carved,) is much decayed.

“The quire is but small, but has a noble east window, the glass all out ; therein lies a marble stone, without any inscription, half a hexagon, tapering smaller at the foot, of a bright green colour, and powdered full of white feathers.

“The whole structure is in the form of a St John of Jerusalem’s cross ; The north and south aisles [transepts] pretty complete ; at the north side of which is a staircase that has led into the prior’s house.

“From the steeple westward, remain six arches of the nave, in which is the present kirk, that takes up about three of them ; but how much farther the ancient church has extended, I believe, will be hard to know.

“In every arch of the nave, both north and south, has run a cross wall into the two side aisles,* making so many sacella each, with an altar and holy water pot. The windows are of an equal dimension, but variously figured and carved.

“The cloister has been on the north side of the church, which opened into a garden that led to the Tweed, that is there of a good breadth ; and there was another garden on the opposite side of the river. Our neighbours are not wanting in the faculty of amplifying, but the thing does really exceed all their exaggerations of praise. By this you’ll sneer, and say I have lived too long here, and am become as vain as they ; however, I stand to my assertion.†

“There is printed an upright of this abbey, which is ill done. I could wish there was not only an exact whole plate, but also a view of the east end, with a distinct draught of the doors, columns, capitals, and some of the finest images, which are so well finished to the life, that Dr King of Oxford, who has lately been to see it, wished they were taken down and preserved from the weather. The whole building is of a fine stone.

“I could wish also there was an exact ichnography drawn of the whole. The minister is a good sensible man, a lover of this kind of antiquity, and is daily studying the walls of this church. He shewed me

* This is evidently incorrect.

† A true Scotsman may be forgiven if he perceives a mixture of the old Southron prejudice in some of these remarks.

some of the glass of the windows, which is of an uncommon thickness, not stained through, but painted upon.

“ If, by this mean effort, your Society could be prevailed upon to take this structure into their consideration, (I know not how far the Scotch gentlemen are engaged in the Monasticon Scoticum,) I have gained my end, especially if you will vouchsafe me an answer to this, who am,” &c.

In order to obtain a lively and accurate idea of what this beautiful structure must have been, in its entire state, the reader must be referred to the glowing and admirable description of it by Sir Walter Scott, in the Lay of the Last Minstrel,—a work which, as it is in every person’s hands, need not be quoted here.

DESCRIPTION OF THE RUINS OF MELROS ABBEY.

BY GEORGE SMITH, ARCHITECT.

THIS is one of the most remarkable monastic structures in Scotland, whether we reflect on what it has once been in its pristine magnificence, or contemplate what the ravages of time, and the ruthless hand of the destroyer, has left us.

The new Abbey of Melros was founded by King David, in the year 1136; and he bestowed on it many possessions and privileges, and enriched it above all the other abbeys in his kingdom; but of this ancient edifice little or nothing remains, as it was completely destroyed, and laid in ruins, by Edward II, in the year 1322. For this, and other barbarous acts, Robert Bruce severely punished the English king, and afterwards rebuilt the abbey in a magnificent style of architecture. The work commenced in the year 1326, and was carried on and completed in the decorated style of Gothic architecture as practised at that period. The design of this abbey gives a style peculiar to that period, and which immediately succeeded that mode of work made use of in the erection of Jedburgh abbey. The transition, from the early English style of Jedburgh, to the decorated Gothic of Melros, was not, however, marked by any extraordinary change. The alterations were not so much in the form or plan, as in the manner of lighting and ornamenting the building. In Jedburgh the windows are more plain in the openings, while those at Melros contain both mullions and tracery.

The style of Kelso Abbey is recognized by its massive columns, and semi-circular arches. In the first Saxon churches, the mouldings were extremely simple, the greater part consisting of fillets and platbands at right angles to each other. The archivolts and imposts were similar to those found in Roman edifices. The pillars were generally circular; and such was their thickness, and also that of the walls, that buttresses were not necessary, neither were they in use in the Saxon era; the apertures of the windows were generally splayed from both sides. After the Norman Conquest, the general form of the plan remained the same, though the extent and dimensions of the churches were greatly enlarged; the vaultings became much more lofty, the pillars, and their ornaments, more elaborately finished; towers of very large dimensions, and great height, were placed either in the centre or at the west end of the cathedral. The first transition of the arch seems to have taken place towards the close of the reign of King David; its figure, which had hitherto been circular, becoming slightly pointed, and the heavy single pillar made into a cluster, which was at first ill formed, but gradually assumed a more elegant figure, and graceful proportion, the archivolts still retaining many of the Saxon ornaments. It may be here observed, that, antecedent to this period, neither tabernacles, nor niches with canopies, statues in whole relief, pinnacles, pediments, or spires, nor any tracery in the vaultings, were used; but at this time, or soon after, these ornaments were generally executed. Towards the close of the thirteenth century, the pillars, then supporting sharply pointed arches, were much more slender; the ceilings were generally sustained by groined ribs, resting on the capitals of the pillars, and the windows were lighted by several openings instead of one. It was in this distinguished era of Gothic architecture that Melros abbey was built.

The last repair given to this abbey was during the reign of James IV, and at this period, a different style of decoration was practised, being the last era of Gothic architecture. This style is called by some writers the perpendicular, a splendid example of which we have in the great altar window of this church. (See Plate XIII.) The mullions, in place of waving at the top as in the decorated style, run up in perpendicular lines; the day light of this window is thirty-six feet by sixteen, divided by four slender mullions of eight inches in thickness. The arch lines of this window are straight, in place of being curved as usual. This window, from the richness of the tracery, the proportion of its parts, the sharpness and extreme beauty of the work, is a valuable specimen of that style of ancient art. Indeed, the composition of the whole of the east end of Melros abbey, (as engraved in Plate X.) is hardly exceeded in the kingdom. The whole, collectively, displays the most elaborate specimen of ancient Gothic architecture to be found in Scotland.

The church constitutes the most entire part of the ruins, and by an inspection of the ground plan (Plate XV.) it will be seen, that it is in the form of a St John's cross. The west end of the nave being entirely gone, we cannot state with certainty the length of that portion of the church; but from the extremity of the ruin, as it now stands, to the back of the altar end, it measures two hundred and fifty-one feet. The length of the cross, or transept is one hundred and fifteen feet and a half. The breadth of the nave and side aisles, sixty-nine feet within the walls.

The plan of the nave of this church is rather uncommon, having a very narrow but lofty north aisle, and a double south aisle, the outer one being much lower than the other two, and divided into eight square chapels running the whole length of the nave; each of these chapels has a decorated four light Gothic window, except the east one, which is a three light. These windows are all different in the form and arrangement of the tracery. There is a buttress betwixt each window, and those that are still complete, run up in several diminished stages towards the top, and terminate with pinnacles, from which spring flying buttresses over the roof of the side aisle, for the support of the main wall of the nave, and the proper balancing of the interior arches,—a scientific principle so admirably understood by the Gothic architects who reared those magnificent abbeys. The portions of the church where the roof is still entire, are shewn in the plan by the crossed dotted lines.

The roof of the altar is uncommonly beautiful; the soffit is covered with delicately groined tracery. The groined ribs spring from corbels, carved in grotesque figures, and as these diverge across the ceiling, the intersections are carved with large twisted knots of flowers, &c. A few specimens of these ornaments are given in Plates XII. and XIV.

The compartment of the nave, from the screen wall to the cross, was fitted up as the parish church, in the year 1618; but, in place of being restored to harmonize with the enriched masonry of the ancient monastery, a plain vaulted roof was thrown over betwixt the pillars of the nave; and it is evident, from an inspection of the materials used in this innovation, that the modern Goths quarried the stones from another part of the ruins.

The choir of this church is very short ; and the transepts have only side aisles along the east side.

The great tower, which rose from the centre of the cross, must have been, when entire, a noble specimen of ancient architecture. The spire is entirely gone. The height of what remains is eighty-four feet.

The south transept window and door is, perhaps, the most perfect part of the ruin. The day light of the window is twenty-four feet by sixteen, divided by four mullions. The tracery and cusping are all of the decorated style of Gothic. It is finished with crockets and creeping foliage. There are a number of niches, canopies, and tabernacles, on the south transept ; and the corbels that had supported the statues, are carved with grotesque figures, some representing monks with cowls upon their heads ; others, musicians playing upon different kinds of instruments ; others represent nuns : but some are most hideous to look at.*

The decorated work of this abbey, as well as the whole mason work, had been admirably executed. The mouldings are still so sharp, that they seem as if lately from the chisel of the mason, a decisive evidence of the excellence of the stone ; a thing of great importance to be attended to in the erection of public works, that are to last for ages. The ruins yet standing, besides the church, consist chiefly of a part of the walls of the cloisters ; the other buildings of the monastery having been long since leveled with the ground.

To the Scotch architect and antiquary, these monasteries afford objects of beauty and interest, in the various styles of Gothic art. The engravings in this work, it is hoped, will ever afford a high treat, both to the professional architect, and the amateur.

* Sir Walter Scott has procured casts of many of these grotesque figures, which we observed placed in the ceiling of the Hall at Abbotsford ; and, after we had made our drawings from the venerable ruins of the Abbey, we were very much gratified to see these strange goblin looking figures in a new dress, looking down upon us from the hall of Sir Walter's mansion.

POSSESSIONS AND REVENUES OF MELROS ABBEY.

MELROS, ELDUN, DERNWICK. When David I. founded this abbey, in 1136, he gave for its support his lands of Melros, Eldun, and Dernewic, to be held for ever, free from every service or secular burden to which the soil might be liable. He also conferred upon the monks the chapel of Old Melros, with its rights and property, which had been annexed to the priory of Coldingham, the king having given the church of St Lawrence, in Berwick, to the said priory in exchange for the same. He also gave the convent the right of fishing in the Tweed, where it bounded their property, as well on his side of the river as their own.*

WEDALE. The king likewise gave the monks the right of easements in his lands and forests of SELKIRK and TRAQUAIR, viz. pasturage and pannage, and wood and timber for building; especially in that part of the forest called Wedale, bounded on the southwest by the river Gala, on the east by the Leder, and on the north by the lands of the Morvilles, who had great possessions in Lauderdale. †

GATTONSIDE. To the above gifts the king afterwards added Galtuness-halech, and the whole land and wood of Galtunesside, on the north bank of the Tweed; the boundary of which ran up the river Leder to the place where Fawhope burn falls into the same; and up the same burn, and over the muir to Raeburn, which falls into the Aloat; * and then down the Aloat into the Tweed. †

COLMSLIE. † Malcolm IV. confirmed these grants, and added a portion of land in the lower part of Cumbesley, where they might build a place for keeping their cows, and have a fold. §

BUCKHOLM and WHITELEE. Richard Morville, constable of Scotland, gave the convent liberty to have a place that would contain sixty cows, at Buckholm, on the west side of the Alwent, and a convenient dairy-house within the enclosures that were there previous to this grant. || He likewise gave them ground in Quhyteley, within the limits of the forest, where they might have stalls for a hundred cows. ¶

BLAINSLIE and MILKSID. Richard Morville gave the monks liberty to plough and sow in the plain of Blainsley, “extra nemus, usque ad Ledir et inde faciendum commodum suum ubique infra divisas suas excepto sarto** faciendo, usque ad Windeslauc, et inde per magnam stratam quæ descendit per Windeslauc versus Lauedir, usque ad divisas de Lauedir.” He and his wife Avicia, gave them the chapel of Park, called the chapel of St Mary, with the chapel yard, and the whole land of Milchesyde, which is divided from Blainslie by the Mereburn. Richard Morville, in his old age, became an inmate of the monastery, and died there in 1189. His son William, confirmed and enlarged the above gifts of his father. He gave “in augmentum terræ de Milcheside, totam terram et pasturam ab orientali capite fossati quod monachi fecerunt; quod caput pertingit usque ad magnam stratam quæ vadit de Lauedir versus Birchensid.” ††

* This romantic stream is now called the Allan, and sometimes the Alwent, or Elwand. It flows into the Tweed near Lord Somerville's seat, called the Pavilion. There is another wild rivulet of the same name, which joins the Teviot above Hawick.

ALLANSHAW. Alan of Galwey gave the convent the lands of Alwentschaws in Lauderdale; scil. a Fairforde ascendendo usque ad divisas de Wedale; et sic per viam que est divisa inter Wedale et Lauderdale usque ad Alwentsheucte. •

SORROWLESSFIELD. The exclusive right to certain parts of the territory of Wedale, which the monks had obtained, involved them in a series of disputes with their neighbours; who, in common with them, enjoyed rights of forest and pasture in the same territory. In 1180, King William decided in their favour a controversy of this nature, which they had with Richard Morville, the grand constable; † and, in 1184, he settled another dispute, relating to the same subject, between them and the men of Wedale, belonging to the bishop of St Andrews. About twenty years afterwards, the monks accused Patrick, Earl of Dunbar, whose possessions lay on the east side of the Leder, of having forcibly occupied part of a pasture, which was their exclusive property. Their complaints being carried to the court of Rome, Innocent III. commissioned the bishop of St Andrews, and the archdeacon of Lothian, to inquire into the matter, who having repeatedly summoned the earl to appear before them to answer to the complaint, when he paid no regard to the summons, they, with the advice of prudent men, laid his lands under an interdict, which allowed no religious offices to be performed therein, excepting only the baptism of infants, and the communion, and other rites used for the sick. Upon this, the earl submitted; and a representation of the claims of both parties having been forwarded to the pope, he, on the 17th September, 1207, delegated the bishop of Moray to decide between them. By his mediation the matter was finally settled at Selkirk, in July 1208, when the earl gave up to the monks “the whole arable land called Sorouelesfeld, on the west side of the Leder, towards the grange of the foresaid monks, as fully as William Soroueles held it.” He made them also a perpetual grant of pasture, for five hundred sheep, and seven score of cattle, both in wood and plain, in the ground lying between the Leder and the causeway ‡ called Malcolmisrod, which goes towards Lauedir, from the confines of Cadisley to Faulhopburne. It was agreed, that neither the monks, nor the earl, or his heirs, should be allowed to have either houses, sheepcotes, enclosures, huts, folds, or any sort of dwelling within the pasture ; and they were not to plough any part of the ground except Sorouclesfeld. His cattle were to return every night to the town of Erslindun,* unless they were hindered by a storm, or an inundation. Finally, he gave the monks the right of taking one hundred and twenty cart loads of peats every year, from neighbouring petary of Scalbedraburch. † His son and successor, Patrick, the sixth Earl of Dunbar, went to Palestine with Louis IX, in 1247, and died at Damietta in 1248. Previous to his departure, he sold to the monks his whole stud of horses, which he had upon his property in Lauderdale, for money to defray his expenses. The price was one hundred marks sterling, besides twenty marks, paid to his son Patrick, for his confirmation of the deed. ‡

ADINGSTON. The monks had a hospital at Aultenestun, or Auldenistun in the upper part of Lauderdale, for their sick brethren, they being at that time much afflicted with leprosy. Walter, the son of Alan, the steward of Scotland, gave them a ploughgate and a half of land in that village, and another ploughgate and a half, which Dame Emma de Ednahim held, with right of pasture and easements, in the forests of Birkeneside and Liggardewude ; and liberty to grind at his miln without paying multure. §

LAMNERMUIR. Earl Waltheof gave the convent common pasture in Lambremor, thus limited, “ Scil. de Boldrestan per altam viam usque ad Eslingh ; et inde deorsum sicut Helingdol cadit in Bothkil,” &c. || Alan, the son of Roland, the grand constable, gave the convent the whole of his waste of Lambremuir, where they already had right of pasture, in exchange for the land called Keresbarn. ¶ King William confirmed the grant of the new land, which Alan, the son of Roland, gave them in exchange for that which William de Moreville bequeathed to them in Cunningham.** Earl Patrick gave them fifty-one acres in the south part of Mosiburgierig, in addition to their land in Lambremor. ††

REDPATR. This land, situated between Ercildon and Bemerside, was granted by Thomas Ranulph, Earl of Moray, Lord of Annandale and of Mann. Patrick, Earl of Dunbar and Merch, as feudal lord, confirmed the grant. †† They had also two oxgangs in BEMERSIDE. §§

GORDON. Adam of Gordoune, gave them some land on the south side of Clovindikis in Gordoune, next the highway that goes to Berwick. *

HASSINGTON. William de Alwenton, called also William de Grenlaw, gave the monks three ploughgates of land, in the vill of Halsinton, which he got from Sir Robert de Muscamp. † In 1428, Patrick Dunbar, Lord of Beil, with other worthy men, decided a controversy between Dean John Fogou, abbot of Melros, and Sir Walter Haliburton of that ilk, relative to some lands in Halsington and Moneylaws; when it was found that the convent had there, three plewlands, two oxgangs, and three acres; and also the lands called Bar's lands. ‡

EDMONSTON. Walter, the grand steward, the son of Alan, gave the convent four ploughgates, at Edmundiston, for the good of the soul of King Malcom IV. About the same time, Patrick, Earl of Dunbar gave them one ploughgate, at Edmundiston, near Greenlaw. The Lady Eve, the wife of Robert de Quinci of Edmonston, gave them twenty-five acres, which she had bought, contiguous to their grange of Edmonston, in the time of King William. In 1490, Robert Laudir of Edrington, engaged to pay to the Abbot Bernard, eight chalders of victual yearly, by way of rent for the lands of Edmunstun Grange. §

HARDLAW and HUNGERIG, near the village of Harseare, in the territory of Fogo, were given by William, the son of Patrick, Earl of Dunbar, for providing a pittance annually, for ever, on the feast of the nativity of the Blessed Virgin. When the convent had been some years in possession of this property, the Abbot Adam de Maxton gave it away, without consulting them, to Nicolas Corbet, the brother of the donor; ¶ who bestowed it upon the chapel of Fogo; but some years afterwards, the abbot being dead, his successor sued for, and recovered it from Richard, rector of the church of Lynton, and the chapel of Fogo. ¶

HORNDUAN. Sir W. de Hornduan, in the time of Alexander III, gave them the whole lands of Milnecroft in Hornduan. **

Joceline, a burgess of Peblis, quitted claim to the land and house in the southeast corner of Briggate for 140 marks. Nicholas, the weaver, gave half of his land in Briggate to the monks in pure alms, and sold them the other half for 100 marks sterling, and a yearly allowance of ten bolls of wheat, one chalder of barley, and half a mark of money to him and his wife for their lives. The convent bought another land in the same street, from Robert de Berncham. Walter the steward, son of Alan, gave them a toft near the Tweed, and twenty acres in the plain of Berwick. Grim the son of Guido, the carter of Roxburgh, gave them a toft. Mariota de Monachis, who had been the wife of Nicholas the apothecary, gave them all her land in Narewgate, upon le Nesse, below the town of Berwick, with all the buildings thereon. Thomas de Selkirk, gave a tenement upon le Nesse. They were to pay forty pence yearly to the Maison Dieu, and nine shillings to his sisters' heirs. His son Peter, gave them three marks yearly, for ever, in a burgage in Cross-gate. Alexander Fraser gave them his lands and houses, in the south side of Ravennisden street upon le Nesse. Adam Glasgow gave them ten acres of arable land, called Kiddeslaw in Bondington beside Berwick. Moyses, the crossbow-maker, gave ten acres, without the town, below Hangechester. They had also the land of Snoc, for the payment of two shillings yearly, and the land near the "stagnum vivarii sicut fossa castelli descendit in stagnum usque ad stratam regiam," paying sixpence yearly to the constable of the castle. Robert de Bernham gave them a fishing in Berwick stream. *

TROLHOPE in Northumberland. Robert Muscamp, for the souls of Richard and John, kings of England, and for his King Henry, gave that part of his land and pasture, in the territory of Hethpol called Trolhope, from the east side of Ailduneskot to Hethouswyre, and along the syke southward to Trolhope burn; with liberty to cut wood in the forest for building. Hugo de Morwic, Odonello de Forde, and others, are witnesses. The prior and canons of Kirkham, had a right to the tithes of Trolhope, and obtained a bull from Pope Honorius III. in 1222, commanding the monks to pay them yearly fifty shillings and twenty pence, on St James's day, in the church of St Gregory at Newton in Glendale.†

acres of arable land upon Witelawestele, with pasture for twenty-four sheep, twelve oxen, and two horses.*

HOWNAM. John of Hunum, the son of Orm, made the convent a grant of land in Hunum, in the presence of Ingelram, bishop of Glasgow, who held that see from 1164 till 1174. The boundaries are thus described:—"Ubi parvus rivulus cadit in Hundunburne, ex orientali parte de Hulkilstroe; et inde sursum per eundem rivulum usque ad sursam ejus; et inde versus orientem usque ad parvum collem; et exinde ex transverso condoso inter Brunecnoh et Helle; et inde descendendo per divisas quas feci eis, usque in Haufurlangden; et inde sicut burna descendit in Kalna."† William, the son of John, gave the lands of Raeshaw, in Hunum, to the monks. It is thus bounded:—"A rivo de Cuethenop sursum totam illam semitam usque ad fossatum inter Ranweshanve et Cuthbrithishop; et sic totam divisam inter me et Ricard' de Umframvill, usque in Derestreth versus occidentem; et de Derestreth descendendo usque ad divisas de Chathow; et sic per illam divisam inter me et Chathou, usque ad rivum de Cuethenop." The monks were to find a chaplain to say mass in a chapel within the said boundaries, for the souls of him and his wife Donancia de Cleresei.‡ The giver having afterwards repented of this gift, and forcibly resumed it, the monks complained of him at Rome, and Innocent III, in 1208, appointed commissioners to examine and decide in the matter, when William confessed having given the land to the monks, and they permitted him to enjoy it during his life, so that it became theirs at his death.§ The church of Hunum was under the care of the canons of Jedburgh, but it appears that the monks of Melros thought they had a claim to it; for, in 1237, an agreement was made, whereby the abbot and convent of Melros renounced all right which they had, or said they had, to the church of Hunum; and the canons exempted them from paying tithes for their lands within the parish; and agreed to find a chaplain to pray for the souls of William the son of John, and Donancia his wife, and all the faithful departed, in whatever place the bishop of Glasgow should appoint. ||

WHITTON. Robert de Bernolvebi gave the monks the twenty acres of land called Ravenesfen, in the territory of Wittum, before 1199. It extended westward from the head of Harehopedene, up to the land which William de Ridel gave his wife, Matildis Corbet, as her dowry.* Geoffrey, the son of Walleve of Lilleseleve, gave them four oxgangs of arable land situated above Ravenesfen.† Ysabelle, the wife of William de Ridel, gave them an oxgang, lying between Hordlaw and Tockesheles, which William, the parson of Hunum, bought from Geoffrey the cook, and gave her.‡ Patrick de Ridale, by his charter, confirmed to them “illam partem terræ quam tenent in ter<sup>o</sup> de Wiltuna versus grangiam de Hunedun, sicut antiquus cursus atque de Calne dividit terram de Wittune et de Hunum ; et inde ad superiorem finem superioris halech ; et inde ab aqua in transversum usque ad hoch de Heviside ; et inde descen<sup>o</sup> per eundem hoch, usque ad Harchouden ; et inde sursum per H. usque ad locum ubi vetus murus incipit ad H. et ita sursum per murum sicut m. vadit versus occidentem, versus Wictun ab austro de Harehoch, usque ad locum ubi idem m. flectitur v. aquilon. et inde a m. versus occ. usque ad caput fontis ; et inde v. occ. usque ad Elnedoch ; et inde descend<sup>o</sup> per E. usque ad divisas de Merbotil ; et inde descend<sup>o</sup> per rivulum inter terram de M. et de Wictun, usque ad Elstanes halech, et ita deorsum, usque idem rivulus cadit in Calne.”§

GRUBET. Huctred de Grubbeheued gave them some land in Grubbeheued, called Halkale, next the water of Kalne, in Elstaneshaleche, about the year 1181. ||

CLIFTON. Walter de Corbet, laird of Makerston, about the year 1200, gave the monks a considerable tract of land in the muirs of Cliftun, on the east side of Crookhou, contiguous to the lands of Hunum, Grubet, Primside, and Molle ; and bounded in part by the Mereburn and Culroneburn. The Bireburn is also mentioned, and the high road that went to Molle from Rokisburgh. ¶

PRIMSIDE. When King William settled the dispute between the convents of Kelso and Melros, respecting the limits of their property on the Eildon Hills, in 1208, the latter were obliged to yield up a piece of ground claimed from them by the former ; and they, in consideration thereof, by the king's appointment, gave to the abbot and convent of Melros two oxgangs, excepting two acres, in Prenwensete ; with two acres of meadow, and pasture for four hundred sheep. **

MOLLE. Anselm of Wittun gave the monks part of his lands of Molle, on the south side of Hownamlaw, adjacent to their lands in Hownam; with a petary between Mollhope, Berehope, and Herdstrete; also as much brushwood out of his wood of Mollhope as a horse could carry to their grange of Hunum, every year, between Easter and the feast of the birth of Saint Mary. * Walter, the son of Alan, gave them some land in Molle in exchange for Freertoun, and two hundred marks of money. †

ALTONBURNE, in Molle, was given, in 1279, by John de Vesci, to William de Sprowstone, his chaplain, formerly vicar of Molle, who granted it to the abbot and convent. ‡ The monks paid the tithes of their land in Molle to the convent of Kelso. §

FAIRNINGTON. Roger Burnard, in the time of Alexander II, granted them thirteen acres of arable land, and a meadow of eight acres, lying on the east side of the land of Symon de Farburne, in Farnindun, beneath the high road to Rokisburgh. The monks caused a ditch to be made around the eight acres called Estmedou, which they had bought from Richard Burnard for thirty-five marks. Roger Burnard granted them also a portion of his petary in Farnindun, the boundaries of which were marked by large stones; and permitted them to make a ditch six feet in width around it, on the outside of the boundary. He gave them also space on his ground to dry their peats on, with right of wainage to and from the petary. ||

MAXTON. Robert de Berkeley, and Cecilia his wife, gave the convent, before 1199, a ploughgate of land in Mackiston, on the east side of Derestrete, between Morigg on the north, and Lilisyhates and Gretkerigge on the south; with common pasture for a hundred sheep, and twenty-two other animals, with their young, till they were two years old; also common fuel, "tam in turbaria quam in brueria," and stones from his quarry of Alwerden, for building. Hugh de Normanville, who married Alicia, the daughter of Robert de Berkeley, gave them Kelvessete and Faulau, on the confines of Ruderfurde, on both sides of the road from Ekeford to Melros. His son John gave them Lilisyhates, between Grenrig, Derestrete, Farningdun, and the highway from the vale of Anant to Rokisburg. He also more than doubled their pasture, and gave them the land called Jerbrandrig consisting of four acres, with part of the muir on the west side of Ruderfurde muir, between Suthside and Arewes. Thomas de Normanville, the brother of John, gave the monks his land called the Ploughgate, inter les denes, for which they were bound to pay him, at Roxburgh fair, a pair of gilt spurs: and to the feudal lord a tercelet, or three shillings sterling. As they were bound to pay tithes of their lands, called Morhus, to the baptismal church of Maxton, they made an agreement, in 1227, with Leo, the parson of the same, to pay four marks annually, as a composition for them; the bishop of Glasgow and John de Normanville agreeing thereto. *

LESSUDDEN. Robert I. granted the whole lands of the barony of Lessedwyne to the monks in 1317, and caused inquiry to be made, whether Maxpoffyl, Hevisyde, Camayston, and Illeffiston, belonged to the same. Laurence de Abernethy gave them his whole land of Makyspoffil, about the year 1320. † James Fraser of Ferendrath gave them the whole of his land of Cambeston, in 1402, for the annual payment of three pounds of the usual money of the realm. This was not to be exacted when the said land was laid waste by the war. ‡

LILLIESLEAF. Patrick Ridale, in the time of King William, gave the convent a portion of his lands of Lillesclive, § with pasture for twelve oxen, ten cows, five horses, and a hundred sheep; Margaret de Vesci confirmed this gift; and his son Walter added to it Cotemedwe, Meremedwe, the meadow at the head of Kingesflat, the meadow at Laidholfueslend, and Pounemedwe in Caveris. To this he added another donation, || which made the gifts of his family to the monks of Melros, in Lillesclive, amount to eleven oxgangs. He also confirmed to them the possession of Clerkislande, in West Lillescleve, consisting of land in Todholside and Standestanrig, which they purchased from Adam, the son of Adam of Durham, for twenty shillings sterling.*

HASSENDEAN. There was a dispute between King William and Josceline, bishop of Glasgow, concerning the patronage of the church of Hastanden, which they both claimed; and as it could not be otherwise satisfactorily settled, they agreed that the revenues and property of the said church should be devoted to some work of charity. The bishop, therefore, with the consent of the king, conferred the patronage thereof, with its lands, tithes, and dues, upon the convent at Melros, to be expended in founding and maintaining a house of hospitality at Hastanden, for the reception and entertainment of the wayfaring poor, and pilgrims journeying to Melros abbey. A pension of twenty shillings yearly was reserved to the church of Glasgow. The monks had pasturage in the common for two hundred ewes, sixteen oxen, and four cows.† The hospital which they founded, and where some of them always resided to take care of the pilgrims, and perform the duties of this and the neighbouring parish of Cavers, was afterwards called Monk's Tower, and their lands are still called Monk's Croft. ‡

CAVERS. The advowson of the church of Great Cavers was given to the monks by William, first Earl of Douglas, in 1358. James, the second Earl, renewed this grant of the church, with the glebe and the chapel, reserving to himself the right of one presentation to the rectory of the said church.§ Earl William gave also Penangushope and Caldecleuch, in the barony of Cavers, for masses to be said, especially for the soul of Sir William Douglas of Lothian, who was buried before St Bridget's altar in Melros. ||

‡ Hassendean ceased from being a separate parish in 1682, when it was divided among the adjoining parishes of Robertson, Wilton, and Minto. The ruins of its fine old Saxon church, with nearly all the churchyard, in the margin of the Teviot, were carried away by a flood in 1796. There is an etching of the ruins in DE CARDONNEL'S Picturesque Antiquities of Scotland, published in 1788.

RINGWUDE, upon the Alwent and Teviot, was given to the monks by Osulf, in the time of Malcolm IV. *

ETTRICK. Alexander II. gave them a large tract of waste land and pasture in Ettrick forest; † and exempted the abbey and four granges lying round it from his forest laws. In 1415, they obtained the lands of Winzehop, or Glenkerry, on the south side of the rivulet Temay, between their land of Midgehope and the lands of Ettrick and Dalglese, with twelve acres of meadow, from Robert Scot, laird of Rankilburne, in exchange for the lands of Bellynden. ‡

ESKDALE. Robert de Avenel, in the reign of Malcolm IV, gave the monks his land in Eskdale, consisting of two parts, viz. Tumloher and Weidkerroc, between the Black and the White Eskè, extending from their junction to the forest of Thimei and the mountains. He reserved to himself the right of hunting the wild boar, the deer, and the stag, with other manorial and feudal rights, which he afterwards partly resigned. He reserved also an annual rent of five marks, one of which he subsequently remitted for the maintenance of a light to burn perpetually before the altar of the blessed Virgin; and afterwards, upon the death of his wife Sibilla, he resigned the other four marks, which were to be expended upon four pittances for the monks, every year at appointed seasons. He retired into the monastery in his old age, and died there in 1185; "cujus beata anima," says the writer of the Melros Chronicle, "semper vivat in gloria." His son, Gervas Avenel, confirmed his father's grant, and gave the monks liberty to build huts wherever they pleased in the same territory; but Roger Avenel, the son of Gervas, disputed their right to the property, and sent his cattle into their grounds, and caused his servants to pull down their houses, and level their fences. Both parties met to settle their disputes, in the presence of the king, at Liston, in 1235, when it was agreed that the pasture belonged to the monks, but they were not to hunt there with packs of hounds, nor bring others to hunt; nor were they to set any traps, except for wolves; and they were not to cut down the trees whereon hawks and falcons built their nests.* Robert I. gave them part of the barony of Westerker in Eskdale, forfeited by Lord Soulis. †

REINPATRICK. William de Brus, in the time of Alexander II, gave the convent a fishing near the church of Reinpatrick, in Annandale, with an acre of land, and pasture for four cows and six oxen. ‡

BRUNSCATH, AUCHENCRIEF, and DERGAVEL. These lands were conferred on the monastery by Thomas de Annoy. §

DUNSCORE. Affrica, the daughter of Edgar, gave a part of her land at Dunscor, in Nithsdale, for the safety of Alexander II, and his queen Joanna, and upon condition that the monks were to have a pittance out of the profits thereof, every year, on St Andrews day. In 1257, it was settled that they should not pay tithes for their possessions in Dunscor, and that the church of that parish should belong to the abbot and convent of Dercongal. ||

BARMUIR and GODONEC. Richard Wales gave the monks the land called Godonec, in Galwey, at the head of the burn called Polcarn. He gave them also the land called Barmor, extending from the mouth of the burn of Hastnewethne up to its source. ¶

TURNBERRY and MAYBOLE. Duncan, Earl of Carrick, gave them two salt-works in his property of Tornebiri, with eight acres of arable land, and pasture for their horses. Duncan, the son of Gilbert, son of Fergus, gave them the lands of Meibothelbeg, and of Beacchoc. In 1236, Duncan, Earl of Carrick, freed them from the annual payment of three marks for their land of Beacchoc. In 1212, the parson of Maibotil complained that the abbot and convent had wronged him of his tithes. Pope Innocent III. appointed commissioners to inquire into the matter, who settled that the monks should pay ten shillings annually for the tithes of Maibothilbech and Largys. *

GREENAN. Roger de Scalebroc gave them a fishing upon the beach at the mouth of the river Doon, with a salt-work, and some land and tofts, in the territory of Grenan. Before 1199, he gave them the lands of Drumteismene, Alesburc, and Auchnephure. †

OCHILTREE. The patronage of the church of Ouchyltre was given to the convent, in 1316, by Eustachia de Colville, the widow of Reginald le Chene. ‡

TARBOLTON. They obtained the patronage of this church from Robert Græme, laird of Welston, before 1369. §

DALSANGAN and BANGOUR. The monks had a dispute concerning their right to these lands, in 1205, with Peter de Curri, who, afterwards becoming a brother of the convent, quitted his claim to them, by a charter which he offered upon the high altar of the church. ||

MAUCLINE. Walter, son of Alan, the Steward, who became an inmate of the monastery, and died there in 1177, gave the monks the whole lands of Mauchlyn; and a fishing on the water of Ayr, and one of three nets at the mouth of the same river. He gave them also the whole pasture of his forest, extending to the mountain of Cairntable on the limits of upper Clydesdale, and to Glengyle, and the boundaries of Douglas, and Lesmahago, with easements in the wood, and one ploughgate, which they might till; reserving to himself only the birds and the beasts of chase in the said forest. The monks were to pay him five marks annually, and neither they, nor the lay brethren, nor any other, were to hunt or hawk in the forest. They were afterwards freed from the pension of the five marks; and, in 1266, Alexander the Steward exempted them from the jurisdiction of his baronial court, and gave them liberty to buy and sell in whatever market they chose, without opposition by any of his servants or bailies; and to hold their own courts at Karentable, Mauchlyn, or

WOLFCLYDE. Sir David Menyheis, laird of one half of the barony of Culter, in Lanarkshire, gave the whole of his part of the same, called Wolchelyde, to the convent, in 1431.† After the Reformation, this land came into the possession of Sir William Menzies of Gladstones.‡

KINGLEDOORS and HOPECARTON. In the reign of Robert the Bruce, Simon Fraser gave the monks the land of South Kingildor, with the chapel of St Cuthbert, and the lands of Hopcarton, with certain rights of pasture, in the parish of Drumelzier in Tweeddale.§

PEEBLES. Sir William de Durem gave them all the lands or burgages, with messuages, &c. which he had in the town of Peblis. They were to pay what was due to the king. He also acknowledged having received fourteen marks of good sterling money, in full payment for a burgage in the same town, which he had sold them.||

PERTH. Malcolm de Lyn, a burges of Perth, gave them a land in South Street for six shillings yearly.¶

KINROSS. Robert I. gave them a toft and croft in the town of Kinros, in the corner beside the road to Perth, and freed them from the payment of forty pence yearly, due to him for the same.**

EDINBURGH. Margaret Bronhill sold the monks, in 1408, a tenement in the south side of the town, which had been previously mortgaged to them by her late brother, Adam Tore. In 1428, John Vernour gave a land near the town of Edinburgh, on the south side of the same, in the street called Cowgate, to Richard Londy, a monk of Melros, for twenty shillings yearly. He, or his heirs, were to have the refusal of it, if it were sold. In 1440, William Vernoure granted the same to Richard Londy, abbot of Melros, without reserve, for thirteen shillings and fourpence yearly. In 1433, Patrick, by divine permission, abbot of Holyrood, confirmed the PRESTONPANS. Roland, the son of Uctred, gave them a salt-work in Preston, with pasture for six cows, six oxen, and a horse, a toft and croft on which to build a dwelling-house, and easements from his wood of Preston to supply the pans. In 1460, Robert de Hamylton of Fyngalton gave them, in his territory of Saltpreston, “illas tres rupes patenarum, sive patellarum salis, sive salini, et unum granarium jacens inter prædictas rupes.” ‡

INVERWICK. Walter, the son of Alan, confirmed to them the possession of certain lands in the territory of Innerwick, with pasturage in the common of the same town, granted them by Roger, the son of Glay, and others of his vassals. §

HEARTSIDE and SPOT. Earl Gospatric, in the time of David I, gave them the lands of Hertisheued and Spot. Patrick de Whitsum, a part of his land in Spot, called Lochaneshalech. ||

PEATCOX. Philip de Petcox gave them the land which lay between their land of Hartesheued and the rivulet called Prestumnethburn, with ten acres in the tilled grounds of Beleside. He gave them also liberty to change the course of Presmunen burn, which was the boundary between him and them, because it frequently injured their meadows and cornfields. ¶

PAINSHIEL. John, the son of Michael of Meckil, gave the convent the whole land of Paneschelys, upon condition that three marks of silver should be given every year at Pentecost to the prior, to be expended in furnishing a pittance for the monks upon Trinity Sunday. He gave also the land which Aldred, the smith, and his son Oliver, held on the east side of the brook Fastenei. Henry de Beltun, in 1231, gave them the whole of his land called Kingissete, in the territory of Panschelis, lying between Calneburn, Kingeburn, and Witeddre, for the annual rent of two marks to him and his

FISHINGS in the TWEED. David I. gave them liberty to fish in the Tweed, where it bounded their property at Deruwick, Melros, Eildon, and Gattonside; as well on his own side of the river as theirs. Malcolm IV. gave them the fishing at Yhare, called Selkirk fishing, and seven acres of land, with buildings, a meadow, pasture for eight oxen, and eight cows, in Wauhop, and timber in the forest, for keeping in repair their wear in the same fishery. In 1263, Nicolas Corbet, laird of Mackerston, granted them all his fisheries adjacent to his land of Malcarviston, between the limits of Dalcove and Brokismouth, upon the condition that the whole produce of their fishing should be faithfully applied by the sub-cellarer to the proper use of the convent. The monks and lay brethren, and their servants, might land with their cobells and nets upon any part of his ground, and have free ingress and egress through it, and might even build a house upon it for the convenience of their fishing. Moreover, he undertook, in the king's presence, in the refectory of the abbey, to be answerable to him for all services due to him by the monks for the same fisheries. David I. gave them the fishing of old Roxburgh, extending to the Brockestrem. Malcolm IV. gave them one of the two nets fishings, which he had in Brockestrem; and Robert de Bernham gave them another, which he got from Ralph Hauvil, King Alexander's falconer. ‡

Nes. the son of Nes. de Walent, gave them ten acres of arable land in Lyveringham, to find the convent in white bread on Easter day. §

Philip, Count of Flanders, before 1185, gave the monks a free passage through his dominions, and exempted them from paying taxes and dues therein.||

Alexander II. gave them the privilege, when passing through the country with carriages, of stopping one night wherever they chose, and

HISTORY OF THE MONASTERY OF DRYBURGH.

THE river Tweed, after sweeping round Old Melros, continues to lengthen its course by winding, as if reluctant to quit the sequestered and lovely scenes through which it flows ; and, about a mile below, fetching a bold compass, it embraces the grounds of Dryburgh, where, among fruit trees and flowering shrubs, on the verge of a wood, stand the picturesque remains of the ancient abbey, and, at a short distance, the neat mansion of Sir David Erskine, the proprietor. As Dryburgh is on the north side of the river, and within the limits of Berwickshire, between which and the county of Roxburgh the Tweed is here the boundary, it is not, strictly speaking, in Teviotdale ; but it may fairly be so placed when that name is used in its ancient, and less restricted signification, which, for convenience, has been thought proper to be adopted in the present work. The ruins, on whatever side they are approached, are seen mingled with the surrounding trees, and have a reddish appearance, from the colour of the stone, which is of an excellent and very durable quality.

There are indications, from which it has reasonably been inferred, that Dryburgh was originally a place of Druidical worship. Its name is supposed to have come from the Celtic Darach-Bruach, “ the bank of the sacred grove of oaks, or, the settlement of the Druids." * On a neighbouring mound, called the Bass Hill, which appears to have been a burial place, vestiges of Pagan worship have been discovered, and, among them, an instrument used for killing the victims in sacrifice, which was in the possession of the late Earl of Buchan.

When the Pagan superstitions gave way to the religion of the Gospel, Dryburgh became the abode of a society of Christian missionaries, of whom Modan, who, after his death, was revered in the Scottish church as a saint, was elected abbot, or bishop, in the year 522. Of this holy man, the legends inform us, that he was a bright example of piety and humility, devoting six or seven hours every day to meditation and prayer, and seeking to subdue the affections of the body by mortifying austerities. Zealous and active in the duties of his sacred function, he made frequent excursions into the remoter parts of the province in which he had undertaken to minister, especially to the banks of the Forth and the Clyde, and preached to the rude inhabitants with touching and powerful eloquence. At times he retired to a lonely place, near Alcluyd, † where he was wont to meditate thirty or forty days in solitude; and, in this retreat, he spent the latter days of his life. His reliques were long preserved in the church dedicated to him at Roseneath. ‡ He was likewise the patron saint of the high church at Stirling, where, and at Dunbarton and Falkirk, his name was long honoured, and is said to be even yet traditionally remembered.

Of this early Christian establishment at Dryburgh no farther account has been traced. It was probably destroyed by the ferocious Saxon invaders, under Ida, the Flame-bearer, who landed on the Yorkshire coast in 547, and, after subduing Northumberland, added this part of Scotland to his dominions, by his victory over the Scoto-Britons at Cattræth. The elegant ruins, which now adorn the landscape at Dryburgh, are the remains of * GROSE'S Antiquities of Scotland. This name would apply to the hill behind Dryburgh, on the brow of which the late Earl of Buchan, with patriotic taste, erected a colossal statue of Wallace, which will remind those who have travelled in Italy of the magnificent bronze statue of that eminently virtuous prelate, Carlo Borromeo, archbishop of Milan, which stands in a commanding situation on the banks of the Lago Maggiore, near Arona. The statue of the Scottish hero was cut by a native artist, of reddish stone, taken from the same quarry which supplied materials for the abbey.

another monastery, founded on the same spot, in 1150; but it is thought, that, at that period, there were still some buildings left of the more ancient fabric, as fragments of an earlier style of architecture, supposed to have been part of it, still exist in the substructure of the present ruin.

David I. is usually considered as the founder of Dryburgh abbey; but it has been thought probable, that he only contributed to this work, by adding some gifts, when he sanctioned the donations of Hugh de Morville, constable of Scotland, and Beatrix Beauchamp, his wife, who are also mentioned as the founders, and were, indeed, among the first and greatest benefactors of this religious house.* Lord Hailes conjectures, that when the king, in his charter, spoke of himself as the founder, he meant only that he had laid the foundation stone; † but this seems less probable than that he considered that as his own deed, which was done by his vassals, with his aid, consent, and authority.

The convent were canons of the Premonstratensian order; and were brought from the abbey recently founded at Alnwick. ‡ This order was instituted in 1120, by Norbert, archbishop of Magdeburgh, who was canonized after his death. The rules they followed, were the same with those composed by St Augustine, bishop of Hippo, for his disciples; whence they are sometimes called Augustinians, or canons of St Augustine. It was believed that those rules, written in a book, curiously bound in gold, were presented to Norbert in a dream by Augustine himself, who said to him, "Take these rules which I have written; if thy brethren observe them faithfully, they, like my other children, need fear nothing in the day of judgment." Norbert built his first convent in a meadow, near Laon, in Picardie. § The site is said to have been previously shewn to him by an angel; whence it was called Premontré, in Latin Præmonstratus, and the religious men Præmonstratenses. In Britain they were usually styled White Canons, from the colour of their dress. This was a white cassock, with a rochet and cape over it, a long white cloak, and a square hat, or bonnet, of white felt. They likewise wore breeches and shoes, but no shirt. The abbot wore red shoes, and a short cloak, and had a pastoral staff, like a shepherd's crook. At first they were poor, and lived by their labour; but their piety soon gained them benefactors, and they became rich. Their possessions were exempted from paying tithes; they were not subject to the bishop's jurisdiction; and they could not be cited before a secular tribunal. Their time was divided between their religious exercises, the cultivation of their fields, their household offices, copying books, and reading.

Their devotions, which were performed seven times a-day, began at a very early hour with MATINS. They were awaked by the bell of the dormitory, which was rung as long a time as would be required to say the seven penitential psalms; during which they dressed themselves, and said their private prayers, till, upon a sign from the prior, they proceeded regularly into the church, each individual kneeling in the middle of the choir, and bowing reverently toward the altar, before he went to his seat. The matutinal service being finished, they went to bed again, and reposed till the hour of PRIME, or six o' clock, when they were summoned to attend during the celebration of the ordinary mass, and the private masses, which, on particular days, might happen to be said at any of the side altars at the same hour. After this, they were accustomed to remain some time in private prayer in the church; and some of them went to confession, in the chapter-house. Such exercises occupied the time, until the bell rang for holding the daily meeting of the chapter; when they all assembled in the cloister, before proceeding into the chapter-house; the copiers of books, and those at work out of doors, hastening in to be present with the rest. Every one, as he entered, bowed towards the place of dignity; and the abbot, when they were all assembled, invoked a blessing upon them. Suitable prayers having been said, a lesson was then read from the rules of the order; and the names of those appointed to any particular services were read from the register; every one, on his name being pronounced, bowing reverently, in token of obedience. Next, the deaths, and other events to be commemorated, were given out from the calendar. Then the abbot, standing in his place, pronounced the absolution of the souls of the dead. Those who had been convicted of any fault, were accustomed, at this time, to prostrate themselves on the ground, and, making a humble confession, entreat forgiveness. Penance was enjoined, and, if it was judged fit, punishment was sometimes inflicted on the spot, by the prior, or his deputy. Accusations were likewise heard by the abbot, openly, in the chapter, against any one under his jurisdiction or authority. The business being concluded, they united in saying the cxxx psalm, "De profundis," unless it happened to be a high festival. Then the abbot, or president, said, "Our help is in the name of the Lord," and the rest added, "Who made heaven and earth." In winter, the hour of Tierce, or nine o'clock, immediately followed the chapter; and the "Salve Regina" having been given out by the precentor, they proceeded into the church, two by two, singing this hymn. In summer, there was an interval before Tierce, during which they went about their usual employments. High mass was sung at Tierce in summer; but at Sexte, or twelve o'clock, in winter.*

The community dined in the great hall, or refectory, at one o'clock; and the abbot, if present, said the blessing. During this, and their other meals, one standing at a desk in the side of the hall, read to them out of the Holy Scriptures, or some other edifying book; and they took this office by weekly turns. They also waited on each other at table, in the same rotation; having taken their meal previously, along with the reader. They all stood in their places till blessing was pronounced, after which the reader, having mounted to his desk, began to read, and the rest to eat. Only two dishes were allowed, except on particular occasions, when another, called a pittance, usually consisting of some sweet, or more delicate food, was added. It was brought in after the second dish, and presented to the abbot, or him who presided in the abbot's place, who caused it to be distributed. Much civility and politeness were practised. They were attentive to each other's wants, and indicated them to the cellarer, or to the brother who served. They bowed to each other on presenting, or receiving any thing. He to whom the abbot, or president, sent any thing, first bowed to the servant who brought it, and then, rising up a little, to the superior who sent it. They who came into the hall too late, and without a good excuse for their delay, said a Paternoster and an Ave Maria, by way of penance, sat down at the bottom of the least frequented table, and were not entitled to any ale or wine, without the special permission of the abbot, or president. After dinner some went to repose, others kept up a conversation till the hour of Nones, or three o'clock, when there was another service in the church, at the end of which they washed their hands, and sat down together in the cloister, till, a signal being given, they entered the refectory, for a few minutes, to drink. At six o'clock they attended at VESPERS, or evening service. The COMPLETORIUM, or COMPLINE, was said or sung in church after seven; and then taking a light supper, called COLLATIO, they went to bed. Sheets were not allowed, nor any linen, except in sickness; and they all slept in the same room, called the dormitory, but in separate beds, in their usual clothes. Not content with the forty days' abstinence appointed by the church, they kept a fast from Holyrood, [September 14,] till Easter; taking no food till after Nones, and abstaining entirely from flesh. They began, however, to relax somewhat of their strict observance of this rule before the year 1245; and in 1460, Pope Pius II. gave them power to dispense with it.*

In time of hay-making and harvest, they went to work early in the morning, and sometimes did not return home till after Vespers; but were bound to recite their prayers in the fields at the canonical hours. On festivals they did no work, but read during the time usually appropriated to work. There were to be no schools in monasteries of this order;† but no one ignorant of Latin could be admitted into it. The lay brethren were taught to recite the Creed, the Paternoster, Ave Maria, and other prayers, but were not allowed books.

The collected rules and regulations of this religious order, including the additions made at different times, and documents relating to them, are contained in a ponderous folio volume, entitled Bibliotheca Præmonstratensis.

The history, like the fabric of Dryburgh abbey, presents only a few disjointed fragments, that have escaped the destroying hands of time and change.

The monastery was founded in 1150; and the same year, on St Martin's day, the cemetery was consecrated, that no demons might haunt it.‡ The convent came to reside at Dryburgh on the 13th December, 1152; the buildings for their accommodation being then, probably, completed.

ROGER was the first abbot. He resigned his charge in 1177,* and was succeeded by GERARD, the prior, who is described as a person of much gravity, full of days, of fragrant renown, and a most devout worshipper of the blessed Virgin.† In 1183, Pope Lucius III. granted permission to the canons of Dryburgh, whenever the kingdom should be under a general interdict, to celebrate divine service in their church, in a low voice, with the doors shut, and without ringing of bells—all excommunicated and interdicted persons being shut out.

RICHARD was abbot in 1190 ;‡ and ALAN in 1196.§

GALFRID resigned the abbacy in 1208, when he accepted the same office in the abbey at Alnwick.||

WILLIAM, the prior, was his successor at Dryburgh. The same year, a new cemetery was consecrated there, by William Malvoisin, bishop of St Andrews.¶

HUGH was the name of the abbot in 1221, and 1228.**

WALTER, abbot of Dryburgh, resigned his office in 1240.

JOHN was his immediate successor.††

OLIVER was abbot in 1269.‡‡ In the course of this century, two societies of canons from this monastery were planted in Ireland ; one of them in the abbey of Druin-la-croix, or Drumcross, in Armagh, and the other in the priory of Woodburn, in the county of Antrim.§§

WILLIAM the abbot, and the canons of Dryburgh, submitted to the usurped dominion of Edward I. of England, by taking an oath of fidelity to him at Berwick, on the 2d of September, 1296, when they obtained restitution of their property, which he had unjustly declared to be forfeited. The letters commanding this restitution were addressed to the sheriffs of Fife, Berwick, Roxburgh, and Edinburgh.|||| The name of the abbot William occurs in 1316.¶¶

The general privilege of exemption from episcopal authority granted to monasteries of this order, appears not to have been acknowledged in Scotland, since we find that the abbots of Dryburgh were obliged to attend the synodal meetings at Haddington, held under the authority of the bishop of St Andrews. From this obligation they were released by William de Lamberton, who was bishop from 1298 till 1328.*

ROGER, abbot of Dryburgh, occurs as witness to a charter along with the same Bishop William.†

The convent received a destructive visit in 1322 from Edward II. and his army, who in their retreat from an unsuccessful invasion of Scotland, encamped on the grounds of Dryburgh, and, setting fire to the monastery, burnt it to the ground.‡ They had suffered much from famine in their expedition, and they must have been greatly exasperated, if, as is probable, they came expecting to find provisions at the abbey, and were disappointed. Tradition says the English were provoked by the imprudent triumph of the convent in joyfully ringing the church bells at their departure; the sound of which made them return and burn the abbey, in revenge. King Robert I. contributed liberally towards its repair; but it has been doubted whether it was ever fully restored to its original magnificence. Patrick, one of the canons, who was reckoned among the first men of his age as a philosopher, divine, orator, and poet, lived at this period, and wrote a poem upon the destruction of his monastery, which he addressed to the king and the superiors of religious houses.§

DAVID was the name of the abbot in 1324 and 1338.

ANDREW ruled the monastery in 1354.¶

Certain flagrant disorders, which were found to have occurred in the community, but of which the date is not mentioned, may with probability be referred to a period not many years subsequent to this. It was found that strife and debate had existed; and blows had been dealt, not only among themselves, but to other religious persons, and secular clerks. Some of the brethren had infringed the rule which forbade the possession of private property; some had obtained admission into the convent by simony; and others, who lay under censures, had been admitted to holy orders, and had even exercised the sacred function in that unhallowed state. For these offences they had been cut off from the communion of the church, and could not, upon submission, be lawfully restored without appearing personally at the apostolical see. But the observance of this obligation was inconvenient, and involved consequences perilous to their souls; for, in so long a journey, during which they were necessarily removed from observation and control, they were apt to fall into irregularities, to wander about at their ease, and to contract vagabond habits of life. These things being represented to Pope Gregory,* he, in the second year of his pontificate, gave the abbot power, according to his discretion, to absolve the least guilty, upon due penance done; but more enormous offenders were still to be sent to receive correction and absolution at the papal court. †

About this time lived Ralph Strode, a distinguished poet and philosopher; who, in the early part of his career, devoted himself to literary pursuits, in the monastery of Dryburgh; whence he was sent, at the expense of the King of Scots, to study at Merton College, Oxford, of which society he became a fellow. ‡ He was a friend of Geoffrey Chaucer, who, at the conclusion of his Troilus and Cresseide, inscribes that poem to “the moral Gower,” and to “the philosophical Strode.” He travelled through France and Germany, into Italy; perhaps in company with that celebrated poet, who was at Milan in 1368, where he became personally acquainted with Petrarca. Strode travelled also to the Holy Land, and wrote an account of his journey. By some writers he is represented as a follower, and by others an opponent, of his contemporary, John Wiclif. The title of one of his works, and Wiclif’s answer to it, § prove the latter to be the fact, which would have been sufficiently apparent, from his having long continued a tutor at Merton College, where Lewis Chaucer, the son of his friend, was among his pupils. || His literary works, according to Dempster, were these:—

ANDREW FORMAN, the next superior of Dryburgh, whose name has been found on record, was a person of some consequence. He was actively concerned in the principal affairs both of the church and state of Scotland, in the reigns of James IV. and James V, and shewed considerable talents and address in bringing them to a successful issue. He took an effectual part in the negotiations for the marriage of the first of these princes with Margaret the daughter of Henry VII, in 1501. In 1512, he was employed in an embassy to the court of France, and was chiefly instrumental in concluding a treaty of mutual assistance, upon the footing of the ancient league, between the French and Scots. || In 1498, he was the pope's protonotary, and was afterwards his legate a latere. ¶ The number of his ecclesiastical benefices is remarkable. The monks of the Isle of May acknowledged him as their prior, in 1498. He was appointed to the bishoprick of Moray in 1501, and held at the same time the priories of Coldingham and Pittenweem; to which was added, before 1512, the commendatorship of Dryburgh. ** Through the favour of Louis XII, he was made archbishop of Bourges, in France, in 1513; †† but he had scarcely done homage for this preferment, when, having received intelligence that the archbishop of St Andrews had fallen in the field of Flodden, he hastened away to Rome, to solicit the vacant see. nation, and to bind closer the ties of kindness between him and them, had already given the see, in commendam, to his nephew, Cardinal Cibo ; but, having been given to understand, that it was repugnant to the feelings of the Scots, that the highest ecclesiastical office in their land should be held by a foreigner, he cancelled that appointment, and nominated Forman to this, and all the other benefices enjoyed by the late archbishop,* among which were the abbeys of Dunfermline and Aberbrothoc. After much opposition, from the influence of rival candidates, one of whom was Gavin Douglas, the translator of Virgil's Æneis, he was enthroned in the cathedral of St Andrews, in 1514 ; when he resigned the sees of Moray and Bourges, and the priory of Coldingham. When the Duke of Albany came from France, and assumed the regency in 1516, Forman resigned into his hands, as the laws of Scotland required, all the benefices which he had hitherto enjoyed only by the pope's nomination, and was reappointed only to the see of St Andrews, and the abbey of Dunfermline.† He died in 1522. His family was of Hatton, in Berwickshire ; and his brother, Sir John Forman of Dalvenie, married Helen Rutherford, one of the two coheiresses of Rutherford of that ilk, in Teviotdale.‡ Andrew Forman is said to have written, 1. Contra Lutherum. 2. De Stoica Philosophia. 3. Collectanea Decretalium.§

§ DEMPSTER. Pitscottie attributes the Archbishop's favour at the courts of Rome and France to his having had the address to bring about a peace between Pope Julius II. and Lewis XII, when they were in the field, at the head of their respective armies, ready to give each other battle. This agrees ill with the acknowledged truth of history ; and the following curious account of a banquet, given by Forman to the pope and cardinals, appears equally absurd and inaccurate:—"When the dinner came, the pope and his cardinals placed, and sat down, according to their estate ; then the use and custom was, that, at the beginning of meat, he that aught the house, and made the banquet, should say the grace, and bless the meat. And so they required the holy bishop to say the grace, who was not a good scholar, and had not good Latin, but began rudely in the Scottish fashion, in this manner, saying, 'Benedicite ;' believing that they should have answered 'Dominus.' But they answered 'Dans,' in the Italian fashion, which put this noble bishop by his intendiment, that he wist not how to proceed forward ; but happened out, in good Scottish, in this manner, the which they understood not, saying, 'To the devil I give you all, false carles, in nomine Patris, Filii, et Spiritus Sancti.' 'Amen,' quoth they. Then the bishop and his men leugh. And the bishop shewed the pope the manner, that he was not a good clerk, and his cardinals had put him by his intendiment, and, therefore, he gave them all to the devil in good Scottish ; and then the pope leugh among the rest." PITSOTTIE, Hist. of Scotland, p. 166.

JAMES OGILVIE, rector of Kinkell, a son of Sir James Ogilvie of Deskford, in Banffshire, was appointed abbot or commendator of Dryburgh, by the Duke of Albany, in 1516. Like his predecessor, and other able churchmen of that period, he was much employed in affairs of state. He conducted from France, in 1512, two ships, laden with artillery, military stores, and wines, which were a present from Anne, the Queen of France, to the King of Scots. He was sent again to France, in 1514, by the council of Scotland, in company with the Lord Fleming, to request the Duke of Albany to come and assume the regency. He was the first professor of civil law in King's College, Aberdeen; and was an unsuccessful candidate for the office of bishop of that see, in 1515.*

DAVID HAMILTON, bishop of Argyle, a natural son of James Lord Hamilton, father of the Earl of Arran, held the abbeys of Dryburgh and Glenluce in commendam. He died in 1523.†

JAMES STEWART, a canon of Glasgow cathedral, was the next abbot. In a letter, written December 13, 1523, without a signature, but apparently by the Duke of Albany, to Cardinal Accolti, the agent, or cardinal protector of Scotland at the court of Rome, it was stated, that the abbey of Dryburgh, now vacant by the death of the late commendator, David, bishop of Argyle, being situated on the borders of the kingdom, its buildings and the produce of its lands were miserably wasted and destroyed by the English, who, making continual inroads, spared neither churches, monasteries, nor any other sacred place, nor people of any age or sex; wherefore, the monks needed such a superior as would give his whole attention to the affairs of the said abbey, repair its buildings, and restore the worship of God therein. For these reasons, the writer adds, he has nominated James Stewart to rule the said abbey; whom he humbly recommends to the pope, and entreats that he would confirm the appointment, the said James Stewart assuming the habit of the Præmonstratensian order; and there being reserved an annual pension of a hundred pounds Scots to Andrew Hume, out of the revenues of the monastery. In conclusion, the cardinal is solicited to use his influence in behalf of the same.‡ Between this abbot and the family of Haliburton of Mertoun, there was a feud respecting their right to hold some of the abbey lands, which they claimed. After some years, it was settled, in 1535, by the king's arbitration, that the Haliburtons should enjoy the lands, and be "good servants to the abbot, like as they and their predecessors were to him and his predecessors, and he a good master to them." The pacification was not, however, effectual till the following year, when it was sealed by the marriage of Elizabeth Stewart, the abbot's daughter, to Walter, the eldest son of David Haliburton. "The offspring of this marriage was an only daughter, named Elizabeth Haliburton. As this young lady was her father's heir, the Haliburtons resolved that she should marry one of her cousins, to keep her property in the clan. But as this did not suit the views of the abbot, he carried off by force the intended bride, and married her to Alexander Erskine, a brother of the laird of Balgony, a relation and follower of his own. From this marriage sprang the Erskines of Shielfield. This exploit of the abbot revived the feud betwixt him and the Haliburtons, which ended only with the dissolution of the abbey." *

Dryburgh was the object of one of the hostile incursions of the English forces on the borders, in 1544, of which the following account is given by Lord Eure:—"Upon Friday the vii of November, at iij of the cloke at afternoon, Sir Geo. Bowes and his company, Sir Brian Layton and his company, Herry Ewry, Liell Gray, porter, and the garrison of Barwick; John Carre, captain of Wark, and his company; Thomas Beamond, Geo. Sowlby, Launcelot Carleton, and their companies, to the number of vii hundreth men, rode into Scotland, upon the water of Tweide, to a town called Drybrough, with an abbay in the same, which was a pratty town, and well buylded;† and they burnte the same town and abbay, savyng the churchie, with a great substance of corne, and gote very moche spoylage and insight geire, and brought away an hundreth nolte, lx naggs, a hundreth sheipe. And they gave to certane Scotshmen of Tyvidale, laitlie comen in and laid their pledges to serve the king's majestie, who met them at Kelso in their home comynge, xxx<sup>ti</sup> or xl<sup>ti</sup> nolte; and they tarried so longe at the said burnynge and spolaige, that it was Satterday at viii of the cloke at nycht or they com home." ‡

Next year, September 15th, we find the abbot of Dryburgh acting as a feudal chief, and, in company with other chieftains, at the head of their followers, crossing the Tweed into Northumberland, where, having burned the village of Horncliff, with the corn in it, and attempting to do similar damage to other places, they were repulsed with loss by the garrisons of Norham and Berwick, assisted by the warlike inhabitants. *

JOHN STEWART was commendator in 1555, as appears by a lease granted by him to Thomas Haliburton and his wife. He was brother to Matthew, Earl of Lennox, and uncle to Lord Darnley, who married Queen Mary. His arms are engraven in the cloister of the abbey. †

DAVID ERSKINE, a natural son of Robert, Lord Erskine, was the next commendator, and is described as "ane exceeding, modest, honest, and shamefast man." ‡ His name appears in the list of the nobility and gentry of Scotland who were associated together, in 1567, to support the government of the regent Earl of Moray. § He and his brother, Adam Erskine, abbot of Cambuskenneth, and prior of Inchmahome, were sub-preceptors, under George Buchanan, to the young King of Scots, in 1570. ¶ Their father, who was killed in the battle of Pinkie-field, in 1547, was the eldest son of John, Earl of Mar, and brother to John, Earl of Mar, who was appointed regent of Scotland in 1571.

The lands and revenues of the abbey were annexed to the property of the crown of Scotland in 1587. David Erskine, however, continued to style himself perpetual commendator of Dryburgh in 1580. ¶¶

James VI. granted this abbey, with the abbey of Cambuskenneth, and the priory of Inchmahome, to the lord treasurer, John, Earl of Mar, in 1604, to enable him the better to provide for his six younger sons.** The king afterwards erected Dryburgh into a temporal lordship and peerage, with the title of Lord Cardross, to the same Earl, who made it over to his third son Henry, ancestor of the Earl of Buchan. The abbey was afterwards sold to John Haliburton of Mertoun, who built a house for himself on the brow of the hill above Dryburgh, which he called Newmains; whence his family were called Haliburtons of Newmains. From them it was purchased by Colonel Todd, whose heirs sold it to the late David Stewart Erskine, Earl of Buchan, in 1786. The Earl, at his death, in 1829, left it to his son, Sir David Erskine, the present proprietor.

In a history of Dryburgh abbey, it would be improper to omit the following story, and it would be foolish to attempt to give it in any other than the words of Sir Walter Scott:—Soon after the failure of the last attempt of the house of Stewart to recover the throne of Britain, “an unfortunate female wanderer took up her residence in a dark vault among the ruins of Dryburgh abbey, which, during the day, she never quitted. When night fell, she issued from this miserable habitation, and went to the house of Mr Haliburton of Newmains,* or to that of Mr Erskine of Shielfield, two gentlemen of the neighbourhood. From their charity she obtained such necessaries as she could be prevailed on to accept. At twelve each night, she lighted her candle, and returned to her vault, assuring her friendly neighbours that, during her absence, her habitation was arranged by a spirit, to whom she gave the uncouth name of Fatlips; describing him as a little man, wearing heavy iron shoes, with which he trampled the clay floor of the vault, to dispel the damps. This circumstance caused her to be regarded, by the well-informed, with compassion, as deranged in her understanding; and by the vulgar with some degree of terror. The cause of her adopting this extraordinary mode of life she would never explain. It was, however, believed to have been occasioned by a vow, that, during the absence of a man to whom she was attached, she would never look upon the sun. Her lover never returned. He fell during the Civil War of 1745–6, and she never more would behold the light of day.

“The vault, or rather dungeon, in which this unfortunate woman lived and died, passes still by the name of the supernatural being with which its gloom was tenanted by her disturbed imagination, and few of the neighbouring peasants dare enter it.” †

POSSESSIONS AND REVENUES OF DRYBURGH ABBEY. •

DRYBURGH. King David, by his charter, confirmed to the canons the grant of the church of St Mary at Dryburghe, with the chapels, tithes, offerings, and whatever belonged to it.

BEMERSIDE. Peter de Haga, in the time of Alexander II, gave them two oxgangs in Bemerside, with a messuage and garden, and pasture for three cows and twenty sheep ; also, a part of his forest of Flatwood, viz. " Quæ incipit ad crucem lapideam sitam in capite dicti nemoris, descendendo per viam quæ vocatur Horsmangate, usque ad Mukeforde de Twede, et de Mukeford ascendendo juxta fossam adhaerentem terræ de Driburgh, usque ad magnam viam existentem inter Flatwode et Trepewode, et sic totam illam viam usque ad caput de Horsmangate ; cum libero intruitu et exitu cum caritagiis et rebus suis, exceptis terris seminatis, et pratis non falcatis."

MERTOUN church belonged to the canons before 1221, when it was confirmed to them by Pope Honorius III. Roger de Quinci, Earl of Winchester, in England, and great constable of Scotland, who died in 1200, gave them the whole fishing of the lake of Mertoun. Alexander de Baliol, laird of Cavers, granted them, in 1271, half of the wood of GLADISWOOD, in the same parish, with half of the woodhead, in feu or copyhold, for forty shillings annually.

BROTHERSTANE. Helias gave them some land at his village of Brotherstansyde, extending on the north to the foss called Watridike, with pasture for a hundred sheep, eight oxen, four cows, and two horses ; also six acres of arable land, between Witerig marsh and Blakeburn. Thomas of Brotherstane gave six acres, with pasture for eighty sheep, four oxen, and one horse. Simon de Wardrope, who married the daughter of Helias of Brotherstanesyde, gave eighteen acres which Helias gave him at his marriage. Alan, the son of Helen, sister of Thomas of Brotherstanesyde, gave a toft and croft, and four acres of arable land; also, ten acres beneath, and other ten above the way leading to Rokesburg.

• Compiled chiefly from the MS. Chartulary, called Liber Sanctæ Mariæ de Dryburg, in the Advocates' Library, Edinburgh.

SMALHOLM. David Olifard gave the canons a ploughgate, and pasture for three hundred sheep in Smalham. Walter de Moray, in 1278, exempted them from multure for their corn grown on the above land, and on their ground at Smalham miln.

NENTHORN miln was the gift of Beatrix de Beauchamp. For the tithes thereof the canons paid half a mark yearly to the parish minister. They had also an acre of land in Nenthorn.

EDNAM. King Malcolm IV. gave them half a ploughgate in Edinham, and two marks annual rent there. They granted this land to the master and congregation of the hospital of St Leonard at Edinham for half a mark and a pound of incense yearly. This rent they afterwards exchanged for some land at Peteorthyn.

ECCLES. The nuns of Eccles were bound to pay the canons half a mark annually, for a pittance at Christmas, out of the feus due to Thomas of Lessedewyn and his heirs, for the land of Huntrodes, granted to the same nuns.

BERWICK. They had some land on the south side of the cemetery of the Holy Trinity at Berwick, and five shillings yearly out of some land in Revenysden, near the town. In 1390, when Robert III. suppressed the Cistercian nunnery of South Berwick, on account of the dissolute lives of the nuns, whose number were in future to be reduced to two, he gave their property to the convent at Dryburgh. In 1410, Walter Haliburton of Dirlton consented that the lands in his barony, formerly belonging to the same nuns, should be annexed to the said abbey.

FAUNS. Patrick, Earl of Dunbar, gave the convent a meadow in Fauns. Adam of Fauns gave them a petary on the southwest side of Kingswell. Sir Adam of Gordon gave another petary. Richard, son to Nicolas of Fauns, gave an acre next the common, on the west side of Southbuttes; and his sister Ede gave half an acre adjoining. He gave also a turbary and pasture.

EARLSTON. Patrick, Earl of Dunbar, gave them two oxgangs in Ercildon, with a toft and croft near the way which led up to the cross on the west side of the town, and common pasture for a hundred sheep, twelve oxen, twelve swine, and two horses, with easements; also Hunter's-land, with common pasture for three hundred sheep, four oxen, and four cows. Alexander, son to Alan Purways, gave a messuage, with toft and croft, in the northeast part of Ercildon; a husband-land in the same, viz. one oxgang in Hwytfyld, and another in Bromsyde, and, in augmentation, three acres in Quhytlaw, an acre in Pottermeadow, near the Redfurd, and common pasture, &c. Patrick, Earl of March, confirmed this gift of thirty acres in 1333.

ELWINESLEY. Earl Patrick of Dunbar gave Elvinesley, bounded by the hedge which reached up to Duneden, and to Resbrygge, whence it was limited by Malcolmsrode to Styrkerden, and by Styrkerden to the Ledre. He gave them also two and a half acres in Dunbar.

CADDISLEY, with pasture in the forest, was the gift of David I. Walter, the son of Alan, gave the adjacent land of Herdesley. The chapel at Caddisley, and the chapel of St Leonard, both on the west side of the Leder, belonged to the convent. They had one mark yearly out of Birkynside, from Patrick, son to the Earl of Dunbar.

LAUDER. John Baliol, and Devorgilla his wife, gave them the church of Lauder, upon condition of their maintaining six chaplains to pray for them, and their ancestors and successors. They had an acre in Lauder, called Alrichesscroftys, and an acre of meadow.

THIRLSTANE. Richard Mautaland gave them Houbenthowsyde, in Thirlstane, and the land which had been Walter Gilling's, with pasture for four hundred sheep, sixty cows, and twenty horses. They had also the tithes of Thirlstane miln; the lands which had been Simon de Smerdale's; Oswin's land, with tofts and crofts, and twenty acres in Briggislet; the land called Croukes, with the two meadows called Langlethes; and Brunecrok, situated between Croukes and the same meadows. Snawdown was confirmed to them by John, the son and heir of Robert Mautland.*

* It was thus bounded, viz. "Incipiendo sicut Bucksfad cadit in rivulum Houbenthow, et sic ascendendo per medium Bucksfad versus occidentem, usque ad Rauphysrohd, et transverso versus borealem, inter terras husbandorum de Thirlstane et Clottysyde; et sic ad Haldford, quod jacet ad occidentalem partem de Clottyside; et sic de Haldford ascendendo per le Grynegheat, inter Flexwellys et Fauside, et sic ascendendo per illud Grynegheat, quod ducit versus Egrohp, usque ad Stanlaw, apud le Halsakirkheuedis; et ex transverso versus orientem usque ad Knolestruythyr; et sic per Knolestruythyr usque ad Ryhardheued; et sic

SAMSONSCHELIS. Henry, the son of Samson de Logis, gave them a toft and croft in this village, with arable land and meadow by the side of the brook which divided his land from Pilemuir, extending from the stone cross on its margin northwards to Derestrete; and also the land by the side of the foss, extending from the same stone cross to the road leading to Wenesheid, and thence to Broade Scropirburne, and to the Leder, with pasture for three hundred sheep, sixty cattle, and easements. They had another grant of two crofts and a toft in Samsonchel, with the meadow between Morelaw and Kaldewell; and the arable land and muir between Morelaw, Kaldewell, Standandstane, and the Leder. William de Burncastell gave them a meadow called Flayillis in Logis Samson, and a muir, and Lousilawe, and four acres in Flokesflate, for which they were to pay fourpence annually, or a pound of pepper, at Roxburgh fair.

OXTON. In 1273, Sir William de Abernethy gave an annualrent of two marks, to be paid out of the miln of Ulkilston, to buy wax for candles to be used in the celebration of mass at Dryburgh. He afterwards gave them the miln itself, with all its profits.

CHANNELKIRK. This church was given to the canons by Hugh de Morville. When Henry de Mundevilla built the chapel of Glengelt, in the parish of Childenchirch, he guaranteed the rights and dues of the parish church, and gave the canons of Dryburgh three acres contiguous to the seven acres which they had from his ancestor, Ivo de Veteriponte. John de Sauncler engaged that the rights of the same church should be faithfully preserved when he built a chapel at Carfrae, and another at Herdmanston; and he gave the canons two acres in Herdmanston, adjacent to their land in Saulton. The hospital at Soltre had a ploughgate, called Futhewetheris, at Wedale ford, in Childenchirch, for the tithes of which the canons agreed to accept a pound of pepper, and a pound of cumin, annually, at Roxburgh fair, as long as it should be cultivated for the proper use of the hospital.

SAULTON. Hugh de Morville gave them the church of Sawelton. John of Saulton, and Agnes his spouse, gave to the church of St Michael at Saulton, and the canons of Dryburgh, its rectors, five acres near the east side of the cross. John Burgulum gave four acres on the north side of Langlees, with common pasture and easements. Henry Style gave per Ryhardheued, usque ad altam viam quæ ducit de Egroph usque ad Snawdoun; et sic de alta via illa per Houbenthouside usque ad Standandstane; et sic descendendo usque in rivulum de Houbenthow, et sic ad Buckslad ubi cadit in Houbenthow."

them an acre and four rod-falls. William de Abernethy, the laird of Saulton, gave them a messuage, a brewery, seven acres of arable land, pasture for twelve cattle, and fuel in the muir sufficient for one husbandman.

John Giffard, laird of Yester, gave them half a mark yearly, out of the town of Bothans. Alexander de St Martin gave them Langlaw.

PENCAITHLAND. The patronage of this church was granted by Lady Catherine Stewart of Cardross, before 1376.

DIRLETON. Sir William de Wallibus * gave them the church of Golyn, † upon the condition of their finding two canons to say mass for the soul of his lord, King William, in the chauntry of St Nicholas, in the isle of Elbottle. He gave them also Stanyaere, consisting of twenty acres and a half on the northeast side of the old castle of Elbottle, with pasture for three hundred sheep, and twenty-two cattle, and easements in common with the villagers of Elbottle and Dirleton. John de Wallibus, laird of Dirleton, gave the convent two crofts in Golyn, and a meadow. For the privilege of having a chapel at Dirleton, he paid a stone of wax yearly to the mother church of Golyn, to which the said chapel paid also a pound of frankincense yearly. The nuns of South Berwick resigned their claim to the patronage of Golyn church to the canons, in 1221. Alexander de Vallibus, in consideration of the danger of the times, released them from their obligation to say mass at Elbottle, on condition of their causing the same service to be performed for ever by one canon at Stodfald, and another at Dryburgh, for the souls of his ancestors and successors.

CRAIL, in Fife. King David gave them a habitation in his burgh of Caruile, with three roods of ground.

KILRENNY. The Countess Ada, mother of Malcolm IV. and King William, gave the canons the church of Kilrenny. The canons claimed half of the dues paid by persons fishing in boats in the river which divided Kilrenny from the parish of Anstruther, belonging to the monastery in the isle of May. The monks of May disputed this right; and it was settled, in 1225, that they should pay the canons one mark yearly for the same. Margaret of Ardrosse, the wife of Hugh de Perisby, gave them the land of Innergelly in 1281.

* The old Latin form of the names Vaux and Wallace.

† Now called Gulan, or Goolan.

ANSTRUTHER. Henry, laird of Aynestruther, gave them three shops* in the east side of this town, with a messuage and garden, and some pasture.

ROXBURGH. King David confirmed to them a toft without the west gate of this town, and some ground within the wall of the same, with freedom from taxes and customs therein. King William gave them twenty shillings yearly out of the revenues of the same burgh. Beatrix de Beauchamp gave them some land there. Robert de Boneire gave the canons half of the land which was Edolph's, the miller, in Heudegate,† for which they were to pay to the nuns of Redesdale fivepence yearly. They had seven shillings and sixpence yearly out of a burgage in the north side of King Street, opposite the church of the Holy Sepulchre, between the Blachall, on the east, and the property of Peter of Old Roxburgh, on the west. Sir William Felton, sheriff of Roxburgh, gave them this burgage entirely, in 1338.

HETOUN. Philip de Colville gave them two oxgangs of land in Hetoun.

MAXTON. In 1200, the canons yielded the claim they had to the church of Maxton to Sir Hugh de Normanville, for which he gave them half a ploughgate of land in Newtoun, on the west side of Derestrete. Walter, the steward of Scotland, father of Robert II, granted them the same church, with the globe, to which he added four acres in Loncrofts. They were to pay the vicar ten pounds yearly, according to the statute of the council of Scotland.

LESSUDDEN. The church of Lessedwyne was granted by Richard de Loudonia, with tofts, an orchard land, and a meadow. In 1252, the convent of Melros agreed to pay the canons half a mark yearly at Roxburgh fair, instead of the tithes of their land in this parish.

ELLISTOWN. John, the son of Yliff, gave them ten acres in Ylistoun, viz. two on the east side of the brook which ran under his garden, five in Rokflat, and three in Greenrig. He made them another grant of a toft and two acres, and an acre in Greenside, on the east of Hairstanes. They acquired also some land in Ylistoun by purchase.

NEWTOUN. Ada, the daughter of Hugh de Morville, give them the tenths of the miln of Newtoun. Isabella de Merlintoun, the wife of

† i. e. Headgate. The above appears to be the true reading of the name which Chalmers, in his valuable work, calls Senedegate.

William de Bosvill, gave them an acre in Brokislawe, in the same territory. They had the chapel of Newtown, but it was claimed by the canons of Jedburgh, and afterwards yielded to them.

ETTERICK. They had the patronage of the church of St Mary, in Etterick forest, in the time of David II.

LANARK. David I. granted to the convent the church of St Kentigern of Lanark, with the chapel of Glegern,* which he annexed thereto. He gave them, likewise, the chapel of Pedyne,† the grange of Imbirston, or Inglebriston, the whole parish of Nempilar and Carteland, with the tithes of all his cattle in the same villages. Alexander, the rector of Cowanistoun,‡ gave up to them his right to the tithes of Clouburn.

GIFFEN, in Ayrshire. Alexander de Nenham gave the canons that half ploughgate of land at Triern, in the territory of Giffyn, in Cunningham, upon which the chapel of St Bridget was situated, and which lay along the side of the brook which runs down from Starwele to Triernburn, and is bounded also by the brook which runs down from St Bridget's well, with pasture and easements, in exchange for four oxgangs, given them by his father William, and his brother Richard. Alan, the son of Roland, the constable of Scotland, confirmed this agreement. The convent granted this land to Alan's chaplain for four shillings yearly, to be paid at Roxburgh fair, and to his heirs and assigns for half a mark yearly.

SORBY, in Wigtonshire. The church, and the land Lesser of Sowerby, was the gift of Robert de Veteriponte. In 1280, the prior and convent of Candida Casa,§ agreed to pay twenty marks for the fruits, revenues, and dues of the churches of Sowerby and Kirkfolan, of which the abbot and convent of Dryburgh had appointed them procurators.

Hugh de Morville gave them the church of WORGIS,|| in Galwey; and his wife Beatrix gave them the church of BOSJETH.

Walter, bishop of Galloway, who died in 1335, gave the convent the church of SEMBRY; and Bishop Gilbert, his successor, gave them the church of VOGRIE.¶

King David exempted them from paying toll and customs, and gave them a right to take timber from his woods, for their buildings, and other uses.

In 1242, the bishop of St Andrews, in consideration of the charity of the canons, and the debts they had incurred in building their monastery, and other expenses, gave them permission to enjoy the revenues of the churches under their patronage, within his diocese, one of their number, approved by him, performing the office of a vicar in each parish.

In 1561, the revenues of Dryburgh abbey were estimated as follows :—

Money, £912, 3s. 4d.
 Wheat, 2 chalders.
 Bear, 21 chald. 8 bolls.
 Meal, 25 chald. 12 bolls.
 Oats, 4 chald.

“ This was paid out of the temporal lands of Dryburgh town and milns ; Gleddiswood ; St John’s chapel at Caddislee ; Fouldane ; the lands of Ynglisberry grange, belonging to the Lord Somerville ; Smailholme Spital, &c. The kirks of Smailholme, Mertoun, Maxtoun, Lawder, Chennilkirk, Lessudden, Saltoun, Pencaithland, Kilrennie, Lanerk, and Gulane, with the teyndes of Pitcairnie, East Fentoun, and Kingstoun.” * .

In 1567, a new order was issued from the crown, commanding the payment of the third part of the revenues of all ecclesiastical benefices within the kingdom, for the maintenance of the ministers of the reformed church. † The third of the abbey of Dryburgh, in 1576, amounted to, —

Money, £304.
 Wheat, 10½ bolls.
 Bear, 8 chald. 2½ bolls.
 Meal, 7 chald. 10½ bolls.
 Oats, 1 chald. 5¼ bolls. †

In 1587, the king’s third of this abbey was £266, 13s. 4d. †

HOSPITALS,

AND OTHER

RELIGIOUS HOUSES.

BESIDES the four greater monasteries, there were, in the district of Teviotdale, in ancient times, several hospitals, friaries, and other religious houses of minor importance.

The friary of Observantines at Jedburgh, and the hospitals at Rutherford and Hassendean have already been noticed. *

ROXBURGH FRIARY. On the banks of the Teviot, under the walls of Roxburgh, stood a monastery of Franciscans, usually called Gray Friars, from their dress, or Minor Friars, from their affected humility. Their church, an arch of which was standing within the memory of persons yet alive, was dedicated in honour of St Peter; and their cemetery was dedicated, on the 4th of May, 1235, by William de Bondington, bishop of Glasgow, in presence of Herbert, abbot of Kelso, and Martin, warden of the Minor Friars in Scotland. It was stipulated, that none should be buried there but persons belonging to their order; to protect the rights and dues of the monks of Kelso, the ground between the ditches of Roxburgh, and the rivers Tweed and Teviot, being under the spiritual jurisdiction of the abbey.† This house was subject to the friary at Newcastle, and was probably the first of the kind in the country, as we are informed, by the Melros Chronicle, that the Minor Friars came first into Scotland in 1231. Adam Blunt, the warden, or superior, of this house, was sent by John Baliol, on the 4th of April, 1296, to Edward I. at Berwick, to hear his complaints of that monarch's unjust encroachments upon the liberties of Scotland, and to renounce his superiority. We learn that this warden was a celebrated lecturer on theology, and that he wrote, 1. Pro rege Joanne. 2. Summarium Sententiarum. 3. Conciones et Lecturæ.*

King Edward lodged at this friary, on Monday, the 14th of May, 1296, and the next day Roxburgh castle was yielded to him, where he abode fourteen days.†

This house was frequently a place of meeting for the ambassadors of the two countries. In 1367, the negotiations begun at Morehouslaw on the first of September, were carried on and concluded here on the three following days.‡

The religious of this order were not allowed to possess any property, except the ground on which their house stood; but we find they had a pension from the town of Roxburgh, and fishings in the river.§

“The Freers near Kelso,” was one of the numerous places burned by the English during the Earl of Hertford’s invasion, in September, 1545.||

After the Reformation, the buildings and site of this convent were granted to the Earl of Roxburghe, who, from that time, made it his occasional residence; and here the Earl of Lauderdale, the king’s high commissioner, was entertained, on the 8th of October, 1669, on his progress to Edinburgh to hold the parliament. He was attended to this place by the noblemen and gentlemen of Teviotdale and the Mers, with their followers, computed to amount to the number of two thousand horsemen.¶ There is now only a small farm-house on the site.

MAISON-DIEU. In a retired spot, on the opposite side of the river, about a mile from Kelso, is the small hamlet of Maison-Dieu, where, from an early period, there existed a hospital, or asylum, for pilgrims, and for the diseased and poor. On the spot, which was once its garden, daffodils and primroses still continue to spring up annually. David I. gave a ploughgate of land, in Ravendene, to the hospital of Rochesburg. In 1296, Nicol, the chaplain of the Maison-Dieu of Roxburgh, took the oath of allegiance to Edward I, and had the property of the hospital restored. In 1319, Edward II. gave the wardenship of the hospital of St Mary Magdalene of Rokesburg to John de Oxonia. Robert II. gave the chaplaincy of the same to Robert Archebald in 1388. James IV. gave the patronage of the same Maison-Dieu to Walter Ker of Cesford in 1488.*

There was also a hospital, called Maison-dieu, at Jedburgh, the master of which submitted to Edward I. in 1296.

NESBIT SPITAL, in the parish of Crailing, was the site of an hospital; and at each of the places named Spital, in the parishes of Smalholm, Ednam, and Cavers, houses of charity, of this kind, were situated.

In the parish of Ancrum, some vestiges of ruins, called the Maltn Walls, mark the site of a hospital, or preceptory, of the Knights of St John of Jerusalem.

At Newstead, near Melros, is a place called the Red Abbey Stead, which is supposed by Milne † to have been the site of a house belonging to the Knights Templars; but of this there is no evidence.

CHARTERHOUSE, in the parish of Mackerston, appears to have been the abode of a small society of Carthusians, who were governed by a prior. They possessed half of the Midtown and Mains of Sprouston. ‡

DESCRIPTION OF THE RUINS OF DRYBURGH ABBEY,
BY GEORGE SMITH, ARCHITECT.

THESE venerable ruins stand on the north bank of the Tweed, by which they are almost surrounded, and are backed by hills covered with woods of the richest foliage. The abbey, as well as the modern mansion-house of the proprietor, is completely embosomed in wood. Around this sylvan spot the Tweed winds in a beautiful crescent form; and the scene is interesting to a degree, embracing both wood and water, mountain and rock scenery, by which the picturesque ruins of the abbey are surrounded. The variety of the forms is very striking, and the whole scene gives rise to the most pleasing sentiments of religious tranquillity.

The ruins of Dryburgh abbey are so overgrown by foliage, that it was with great difficulty we could take accurate dimensions of them. Every where you behold the usurpation of nature over art. In one roofless apartment a fine spruce and holly are to be seen flourishing in the rubbish; in others the walls are completely covered with ivy; and even on the top of some of the arches, trees have sprung up to a considerable growth, and there clustering with the aspiring pinnacles, add character to the Gothic pile. These aged trees on the summit of the walls, are the surest records we have of the antiquity of its destruction.

The beauty of this ruined abbey is not, like those of Kelso and Jedburgh, injured by being in part surrounded by common dwellings. It is placed in an open lawn, environed with plantations of fruit and forest trees, which throw a rural simplicity around it. The ruins, as they now stand, are carefully preserved from wanton destruction by the present proprietor, Sir David Erskine.

This abbey is said to have been founded in the year 1150, being in the Norman era of British architecture, by Hugh de Morville, Lord of Lauderdale, a powerful Norman baron, who obtained a royal charter from David I, who likewise contributed to the monastery. From a minute inspection of the ruins, we are led to believe, that there are portions of the work of a much earlier date ; the arch being the distinctive feature of all structures of the middle ages, as the column was of those of classic antiquity ; and among these ruins we observed no fewer than four distinct styles of arches, — namely, the massive Roman arch, with its square sides ; the imposing deep splayed Saxon ; the pillared and intersected Norman ; and last, the early English Gothic arch. These not only differ in design, but in the quality of the materials, and in the execution. The chapter-house, and abbot's parlour, with the contiguous domestic dwellings of the monks, we consider are of much greater antiquity than the church.

From an inspection of the ruins of the church, we suspect it had never been wholly repaired after its destruction in 1322 ; and Sir David Erskine informed us, that, in clearing out the rubbish, masses of melted lead and vitrified glass were found in the area of the church. From the remains of the church, (see plate XVIII.) it will be seen that it was in the form of a cross, divided, in the breadth, into three parts, by two colonnaded arcades ; the cross, or transepts, and choir, had all been short ; a part of the north transept, still standing, is called St Mary's aisle ; it is of beautiful early English Gothic work ; but the western door to the church is a fine Norman arch, highly enriched with the characteristic mouldings of that style.

The stone is of a gray pinkish colour ; it is a very hard sandstone, and the mouldings are still very sharp. Their having stood for centuries without decomposing, is a sure proof that, even in such remote times, the quality of the building material had been attended to, by the architects of these monkish piles.

There is a singular diversity of levels in this monastery, which is not to be found in either of the others.

The church, the cloisters, and the chapter-house, and other apartments in the south side, are all on different levels. The church, which lies along the north side, is on the highest level ; it requires ten steps to get down to the level of the cloisters, and as many more to get down to the level of the chapter-house.

This monastery is a complete ruin. Nothing is now entire but the chapter-house, St Moden's Chapel, and the adjoining passages ; these have all vaulted roofs, as denoted by the crossed lines in the plan.

The chapter-house is forty-seven feet long, by twenty-three broad, and twenty high. At the east end there are five early English Gothic windows, and at the west end, there is a large circular-headed centre window, and a small one at each side of it. The inside of the hall is ornamented by a series of intersected arches.

To illustrate the styles of ancient architecture displayed in the abbeys of Teviotdale, it is absolutely necessary to compare the one with the other, from the varieties of which the student will derive much useful information.

APPENDIX.

IT was once intended to introduce into this work an account of the rise and progress of Monachism in Scotland, with a detailed inquiry into the duties, habits, and employments of the Monks, the order and economy observed in their establishments, and their influence upon society in general. The length, however, to which these pages have extended beyond what was designed, makes it inexpedient to fulfil this intention, except so far as to give a brief enumeration of the officers employed in monastic communities, and their duties, which may perhaps serve to give an additional interest to the preceding history.

1. The LORD ABBOT ruled over the whole convent with an authority almost despotic. Both he and they were, however, accountable to the parent monastery, or rather to a general chapter of the order, usually held there once a year, whose decisions were also subject to confirmation or rejection by the pope, acting for the whole church. The abbot lived in great state in his private apartments, and sometimes in a separate hall or palace. He had servants, horses, hawks, and hounds, and entertained guests and individuals of the convent at his private table. He had a chaplain, who, besides his spiritual duties, managed his household.

2. The PRIOR was chosen by the abbot, and acted for him, presiding in the choir, chapter-house, and refectory, when he did not choose to be present himself. He likewise maintained considerable state in his private apartments.

3. The SUBPRIOR was the prior's assistant and occasional deputy. He noted those who were guilty of any neglect of duty, or were absent without leave; took care that all the doors of the convent were kept locked, from five o'clock in the evening till the same hour in the morning; and, when he visited the dormitories at night, read over the names of the monks, who were bound to answer to them.

4. The CELLARER superintended the business of the storehouse, cellar, kitchen, and refectory, and saw that nothing that belonged to them was wanting.

5. The REFLECTIONER had the care of the furniture of the table in the refectory, or eating room.

6. The CHAMBERLAIN had the care of furnishing the wardrobe and bedding.

7. The SACRIST, or SECRETARIUS, took charge of the vessels and ornaments of the church, and provided the candles, and the bread and wine for the communion.

8. The ALMONER distributed food and clothing to the poor, especially the fragments left at meals.

9. The INFIRMARER watched over the interests of the sick within the convent, administered to their wants, and, on urgent occasions, was their confessor.

10. The HOSPITALER received strangers and the wayfaring poor, and provided for their entertainment in a room appropriated for them, called the hospice, or guest chamber. Strangers of rank were entertained by the abbot.

11. The CHANTOR, or PRECENTOR, conducted the service of the choir, instructed the singing boys, and had the custody of the archives, or records, and sometimes of the library.

12. In most monasteries there was a LIBRARIAN, who kept the books, in a room built for the purpose, adjoining to which was the Scriptorium, or writing room, where some of the monks were constantly employed in making copies of books.

13. The BAILIE, SENESCHAL, or STEWARD, was the abbot's deputy, in the exercise of his seigniorial rights, as temporal lord of the abbey lands. This office was usually held by a layman of distinction in the neighbourhood, and, in later times, became almost hereditary in their families.

14. The TREASURER received the rents, and paid accounts and wages.

15. The PORTER had a lodging at the gate, and had power to admit pilgrims, strangers, and all proper persons, and to exclude others.

16. The KITCHENER, or chief cook, was sometimes a layman.

17. The MASTER OF THE NOVICES superintended the education of the young persons who were upon trial for admission into the order. He was sometimes styled Master of the Converts; persons who, having lived long in the world, afterwards took the monastic habit, being called Converts.

18. The LAY BRETHERN were also sometimes called Converts. They were the servants of the community, who performed the menial offices, and were employed in the labours of husbandry. They were attired like the monks; this being ordained as a token of the humility of the latter.

19. HEBDOMADARIES, or weekly officers, was a name given to any of the monks while employed in waiting at table, or in other services, which they performed by weekly turns. Such were the Readers, who stood at a desk in the refectory, and read, while the rest were at their meals.

20. There was a Master Builder in some monasteries, and also persons who exercised most of the other useful employments.*
